INTRODUCTION.

THE present is emphatically an age of Bible study. Not only is this true of the theological school, college, and the preparatory institutes, but of very many of the people in their homes. Nor is such study confined to the Theology of Scripture; it includes the fields of Geography, History, Ethnology, and Archæology. There has never been a time when so much material has been available for the illustration and vindication of that wonderful book. From library, monastery, ancient tomb, and ruined city the diligent searcher has brought forth long-hidden lore. Very much of this information has been made available to the Bible student by special treatise and magazine and newspaper article.

The present is also the age of the encyclopedia, in which all this varied information may be preserved and arranged for ready reference. The encyclopedia is a convenience to the professional student; but to the general Bible-studying public it is a necessity, since his library is usually limited and his time pretty fully occupied. It has been the aim of the editor to present the results rather than the processes of study, giving material carefully prepared and instantly available. This work is presented to the public with the firm conviction that it will greatly aid all classes of Bible students.

A good encyclopedia must possess the following features:

I. FULLNESS AND ACCURACY. Every topic should be treated with fullness and accuracy, all reliable information respecting it being recorded. The range of strictly Bible topics in this encyclopedia is as extensive as that of any other, even though the number of volumes may be much larger.

To secure accuracy the works of distinguished and recent writers have been consulted by the editor, and specialists in different lines have been happily secured. Among these may be mentioned Professor J. F. McCurdy, Ph.D., LL.D., of Toronto, Canada; Professor H. A. Buttz, D.D.; Rev. George E. Post, M.D., of Beirut, Syria, an authority on Eastern lands and customs; Rev. A. H. Tuttle, D.D.; W. Haskell, of Yale University; the distinguished Assyrian scholar, Rev. R. W. Rogers, Ph.D., F.R.G.S.; Rev. S. L. Bowman, D.D.; Professor D. S. Martin, formerly of Barnard College, New York City; and Rev. E. McChesney, D.D.

II. EASE OF REFERENCE. Frequently one consults an encyclopedia to find information on only a single point, and does not care or has not time to read an entire article. To aid in this matter of ready reference a systematic and uniform division of articles has been adopted. Thus a person consulting the article "Isaac" will find the following divisions: Name and Family, Personal History, Character, Note (in which special attention is called to difficulties of interpretation, alleged discrepancies, etc.). The same divisions will be found in all biographical articles. Whenever the editor has found a figurative use of a word in the Bible such use has been given in the last division of the article, viz., Figurative. Thus anyone consulting this encyclopedia will find the divisions following the same order in all the articles and indicated by prominent type.

III. PROPER CONDENSATION. While a Bible encyclopedia is desired that is small in size and comparatively inexpensive, it should be equally accurate with those more costly and cumbersome. It must not suffer by a too rigid condensation. While an equally extensive field has to be traversed as by editors of the larger encyclopedias, space must be carefully economized. This has been accomplished by avoiding mere discussion and the repetition in several articles of the same material. But the material is made available by cross references.

IV. ILLUSTRATIONS. The large amount of valuable material and the need of economizing space have led the editor to be careful in the selection of illustrations. Cuts have been used not for padding, but only as they serve to illustrate the text. Of these there are over three hundred, besides the full-page illustrations. The cuts illustrating the article "The Jewish Tabernacle" were made from photographs of the model erected under the supervision of the editor.

V. CONSECUTIVE STUDY. In addition to the above features the editor has provided, where it seems desirable, for consecutive study of different subjects. It frequently happens that a person wishes to gain a comprehensive knowledge of a general subject; for example, Music. Under the usual arrangement of cyclopedias it would be necessary to hunt up every item, as each instrument and the several musical terms. Ability to do this presupposes possession of the very information sought. In this work grouping of subarticles under a general head has been adopted. Thus under "Music" is discussed Vocal Music and its History; followed by Instrumental Music, its various types, and Instruments; after which, in alphabetical succession, are given the Musical terms of the Bible. In addition all these terms are given in their proper alphabetical place, with the reference, "See Music." Similarly have been treated the general topics of the Animal, Mineral, and Vegetable Kingdoms, Armor, Diseases, Dress, Festivals, Handicrafts, Laws (Mosaic), Sacrifices, etc. Persuaded of the value of these features, and believing that he has in a good degree made them prominent in this work, the editor submits the results of his labors to those whose prayer has been voiced by the psalmist, "Make me to understand the way of the precepts; so shall I talk of thy wondrous works" (Psa. 119:27).

PUBLISHERS' STATEMENT

THE présent awakening in the study of the Bible demands a superior class of helps to assist those who would understand its teachings and discover its mysteries. Since the issue of this Encyclopedia thirteen years ago, several Biblical dictionaries and encyclopedias of various sizes and prices have been issued both in this country and in Europe. Most of these were prepared with special reference to the highly educated classes, and lack simplicity, convenience, and attractiveness in which this work excels. During this period many important discoveries which throw side-lights of remarkable brilliancy upon the sacred pages of the Bible have been made. Notwithstanding the comparative recency of similar works, the need of a strictly up-to-date dictionary and encyclopedia of the Bible has been recognized and keenly felt by many people. We have therefore undertaken to supply this need by providing a supplement to this work in which the results of all recent discoveries and other valuable facts are given with convenient cross references from the articles in the body of the work to this supplement. By this means we have provided the latest alphabetically arranged, popular help to the study of the Bible yet issued. The advantages of this Encyclopedia, by reason of the convenient arrangement of its articles for reference under a system of general divisions and subdivisions, its compact yet clear type by which an immense amount of reading matter is compressed into a comparatively small space, the remarkable condensation of its important subjects into concise articles, and its choice illustrations adapted to the text, both artistic and educational in value, particularly commend this work to those who need the best dictionary and encyclopedia which it is possible to procure at a moderate price. The supplement has been prepared by the Rev. Melvin G. Kyle, A.M., D.D., one of the foremost archæologists of the world. He has here given the best results of recent discoveries in a convenient form for reference, so that those who use this work may be absolutely confident of obtaining here the latest and best attested results of archæology as applied to the study of the Holy Scriptures. This revised edition of The People's Bible Encyclopedia will be welcomed by many thousands of busy men and women as well as pastors and scholars who desire condensed and up-to-date information on these important subjects. To all such it will prove an invaluable aid both in personal study and in teaching. It is with pleasure and satisfaction that we present this work to all seekers after truth.

THE PEOPLE'S BIBLE ENCYCLOPEDIA.

A'ARON, or AR'ON.—1. Name and Family. (Heb. אַהֲרֹן, ā-har-one', mounlaineer, or enlightener.) The brother of Moses. Aaron was the oldest son of the Levite Amram by Jochebed (Exod. 6:20; Num. 26:59). He was three years older than Moses (Exod. 7:7), and was born B. C. about 1293.

2. Personal History. Of Aaron's early life we know nothing. The first mention made of him is in the narrative of the Burning Bush (Exod. 4:14), in which Moses is reminded of Aaron's readiness of speech, and could, therefore, properly act as his spokesman. Aaron had married a woman of the tribe of Judah, named Elisheba, by whom he had four sons—Nadab, Abihu, Eleazar, and Ithamar (Exod. 6:23). (1) Moses's assistant. Instructed by God, Aaron went into the wilderness to meet Moses, now on his way to Egypt, and found him in Horeb (Exod. 4:27), B. C. 1210. Returning to Goshen, Aaron introduced Moses to the elders of Israel, and acquainted them with his mission (Exod. 4:29, 30). In all their interviews with Pharaoh, Aaron acted as spokesman, and was the actual instrument of working most of the miracles (Exod. 7:9, sq.). After the passage of the Red Sea we have several notices of Aaron during the journey to Sinai (Exod. 16:6–10, 33, 34). While the battle raged between Israel and Amalek, Aaron, with Hur, sustained the weary hands of Moses, which held the official rod, the uplifting of which secured victory for Israel (Exod. 17:9–13). With the elders of Israel he assisted at the reception of Jethro, Moses's father-in-law (Exod. 18:12). When Moses ascended Mount Sinai to receive the tables of the law (Exod. 24:12), Aaron and his sons—Nadab and Abihu—and seventy of the elders accompanied him part of the way, and were permitted to behold the symbol of the divine presence (Exod. 24:1, 2, 9–11). (2) Golden calf. During the absence of Moses in the mount the people demanded of Aaron a visible image of their God. Either through fear, ignorance, or a desire to please, Aaron complied with their request. From the ornaments of gold which they freely offered he cast the figure of a calf (a young bull), copied from the Egyptian Apis. To fix the meaning of this image as a symbol of the true God, Aaron proclaimed a feast to Jehovah for the following day. The reappearance of Moses confounded the multitude, who were severely punished for their sin. Aaron cast the whole blame upon the people, but was sternly rebuked by his brother (Exod. 32), through whose intercession, however, he received the divine forgiveness (Deut. 9:19, 20). See SUPPLEMENT.

(3) High priest. In the ecclesiastical establishment Aaron was high priest, and his sons and descendants priests; and the whole tribe of Levi was set apart as the sacerdotal caste. After the tabernacle was completed, and every preparation made for service, Aaron and his sons were consecrated by Moses (Lev. 8:6), B. C. 1209. A sad affliction soon came to him in the conduct of Nadab and Abihu, and their untimely end; although Aaron and his surviving sons—Eleazar and Ithamar—being priests, were forbidden to manifest the usual signs of mourning (Lev. 10:1–7). (4) Aaron and Miriam. Aaron joined Miriam in her invidious conduct against Moses. They were jealous of his exalted position, and Miriam found an opportunity for the expression of her discontent in the marriage of Moses with a Cushite woman. She was smitten with leprosy, which was removed, and forgiveness secured for her and Aaron, through the intercession of Moses (Num. 12:1, sq.). (5) Rebellion of Korah. Later a conspiracy was formed against Aaron and Moses led by Korah, of the tribe of Levi, and Dathan and Abiram, Reubenites. This resulted in the destruction of the conspirators at the hand of God. On the morrow the people gathered and murmured against Moses and Aaron, saying, "Ye have killed the people of the Lord." A plague broke out among the people, which was stopped by the intercession of Aaron. "The true vindication of Aaron's priesthood was, not so much the death of Korah by the fire of the Lord, as the efficacy of his offering of incense to stay the plague, by which he was seen to be accepted as an intercessor for his people" (Num. 16:1, sq.). As a further evidence of Aaron's divine appointment, the chiefs of the various tribes were required to deposit their staves (rods) with Aaron's in the tabernacle. In the morning it was found that Aaron's rod had budded, blossomed, and yielded almonds, while the others remained as they were. The rod was preserved "for a token against the rebels" (Num. 17:1, sq.). (6) At Meribah. When Moses sinned at Meribah, and rebuked the people for their complaining, Aaron shared his wrongdoing, and on this account was not permitted to enter the Promised Land (Num. 20:8-13, 24). (7) Death. Aaron died soon after. When Israel reached Mount Horeb the divine command came that Aaron, his brother Moses, and Eleazar, his son, should ascend the mountain in view of all the people; and that he should there transfer his priestly robes to Eleazar. "And Aaron died there in the top of the mount" (Num. 20:23-28), aged one hundred and twenty-three years (Num. 33:39), and the people mourned for him thirty days, B. C. 1170. See SUPPLEMENT.

3. Character. A man of ready speech, Aaron seems to have been wanting in steady self-reliance, and was, therefore, fitted to be an adjutant only. Thrown at Sinai, for a moment, on his own responsibility, he failed; not from any direct unbelief on his own part, but from a weak inability to withstand the demand of the people for visible "gods to go before them." He manifested a firm, constant devotion to his brother, only disturbed by his joining Miriam in her murmuring against Moses. Leaning, as he seems to have done, wholly on Moses, it is not strange that he should have shared his sin at Meribah.

4. Figurative. "Aaron was a type of Christ, not in his personal, but in his official, character: (1) As high priest, offering sacrifice; (2) In entering into the holy place on the great day of atonement, and acting as intercessor; (3) In being anointed with the holy oil by effusion, which was prefigurative of the Holy Spirit with which our Lord was endowed; (4) In bearing the names of all the tribes of Israel upon his breast and shoulders, thus presenting them always before God, and representing them to him; (5) In being the medium of their inquiring of God by Urim and Thummim, and of the communication of his will to them" (M'C. and S., Cyclopaedia).

A'ARONITE, descendants of Aaron, and therefore priests, who to the number of three thousand seven hundred fighting men under Jehoiada joined David at Hebron (1 Chron. 12:27). Later we find that their leader was Zadok (1 Chron. 27:17).

AB (Heb. אב, avb, probably from av-bab', to be fruitful), the Chaldee name of the fifth ecclesiastical and the eleventh civil month of the Jewish year. It was introduced after the Babylonish captivity, and is not mentioned in Scripture, in which it is known as the fifth month (Num. 33:38).

AB (Heb. אב, avb, father), the first member of several Hebrew compound names, e. g., Absalom, etc. It is used to designate some quality or circumstance of the person named; e. g., Absalom means father of peace.

ABADDON (Gr. Ἀβδδών, ab-ad-dōhn', destruction), the angel of the bottomless pit (Rev. 9:11), and corresponding to Apollyon (Ἀπολλύων), destroyer. The word abaddon means destruction (Job 31:12), or the place of destruction, i. e., Hades or the region of the dead (Job 26:6; 28:22; Prov. 15:11).

ABAG'THA (Heb. אבגתא, ab-ag-thaw', given by fortune), one of the seven chief eunuchs of Xerxes, who were commanded by the king to bring Queen Vashti into the royal presence (Esth. 1:10), B. C. after 529.

ABA'NA (Heb. אבנא, ab-aw-naw', stony), one of the rivers of Damascus (2 Kings 5:12). It is, no doubt, the present Barada or Barady, and has its source in Anti-Libanus, and flows through the city of Damascus; thence after fifty miles it is lost in the marshy lake Bahret el-Kibliyeh. Mr. Porter says that one hundred and fifty thousand souls are dependent upon this river, and fourteen villages. It was one of the rivers which Naaman would have washed in rather than the river Jordan (marg. Amana). Greek, Chryssorrohas.

ABANDON. See GLOSSARY.

AB'ARIM (Heb. אבארים, ab-aw-reen', regions beyond), a mountain chain S. E. of the Dead Sea, and of which Pisgah is a part, or Mount Nebo (Deut. 3:27; 32:49). Israel had an encampment in the mountains of Abarim (Num. 33:47, 48).

AB'BA (Gr. Ἀββᾶ, ab-bah', the father), a customary title of God in prayer (Mark 14:36; Rom. 8:15; Gal. 4:6). It was in common use in the mixed Aramæan dialect of Palestine, and was used by children in addressing their father. It answers to our papa. The right to call God "Father" in a special and appropriative sense pertains to all who have received the testimony of the Spirit to their forgiveness. See ADOPTION.

AB'DA (Heb. אבדא, ab-daw', the servant, i. e., of God).

1. The father of Adoniram, which latter was an officer of the tribute under Solomon (1 Kings 4:6), B. C. about 960.

2. The son of Shammua, and a Levite of the family of Jeduthun, resident in Jerusalem after the exile (Neh. 11:17), B. C. after 444. Elsewhere (1 Chron. 9:16) he is called Obadiah the son of Shemaiah.

AB'DEEL (Heb. אבדאל, ab-deh-ale', servant of God), the father of Shelemaiah, which latter was one of those appointed to apprehend Jeremiah (Jer. 36:26), B. C. before 606.

AB'DI (Heb. אבדני, ab-dee', my servant).

1. A Levite, and grandfather of Ethan; the latter was one of the singers appointed by David for the sacred service (1 Chron. 6:44).

2. A Levite, in the reign of Hezekiah, father of Kish (2 Chron. 29:12).

3. One of the sons of Elam, who put away his Gentile wife after the return from Babylon (Ezra 10:26), B. C. 456.

AB'DIEL (Heb. אבדיאל, ab-dee-ale', servant of God), son of Guni and father of Ahi, one of the Gadites resident in Gilead (1 Chron. 5:15).

AB'DON (Heb. אבדון, ab-dohn', servile).

1. The son of Hillel, a Pirathonite, of the tribe of Ephraim. He ruled Israel for eight years, B. C. about 1120-1112. The only other fact respecting him is that he had forty sons and thirty nephews (marg. sons' sons), who rode on young asses—a mark of their consequence. Upon his death he was buried in Pirathon (Judg. 12:13-15).

2. A son of Shashak, and one of the chief Benjamites dwelling in Jerusalem (1 Chron. 8:23), B. C. before 1200.

3. The firstborn of Gibeon, a Benjamite and resident at Jerusalem (1 Chron. 8:30; 9:36), B. C. before 1200.

4. The son of Micah, and one of those sent by King Josiah to Huldah to inquire concerning the recently discovered books (2 Chron. 34:20, sq.), B. C. about 624. In 2 Kings 22:12, he is called Achbor.

ABED-NEGO (Heb. אֲבֵד נֶגוֹ, ab-ade' neg-o', servant of Nego, i. e., of Nebo, or the Chaldaic Mercury), the Chaldee name given to Azariah by the king of Babylon's officer. Azariah was one of the three Jewish youths who, with Daniel, were selected by Ashpenaz (master of the eunuchs) to be educated in the language and wisdom of the Chaldeans (Dan. 1:3, sq.). With his two friends, Shadrach and Meshach, he was cast into the fiery furnace for refusing to worship the golden statue set up by Nebuchadnezzar, but was miraculously delivered (Dan. 3), B. C. about 606.

ABEL, 1 (Heb. אֵבֶל, heh'-bel, a breath). The second son of Adam and Eve, B. C. perhaps 4003. He was a keeper of sheep, and in the worship of his Creator offered "of the firstlings of his flock and of the fat thereof." Cain, who was a husbandman, "brought of the fruit of the ground." "The Lord had respect unto Abel and to his offering;" whereupon Cain became greatly enraged at his brother, and eventually slew him (Gen. 4:1-8). The superiority of Abel's sacrifice is ascribed by the apostle Paul to faith (Heb. 11:4). And as faith implies a previous revelation, it is probable that there was some command of God, in reference to the rite of sacrifice, with which Abel complied and which Cain disobeyed. There are three references to Abel in the New Testament. Our Saviour calls him "righteous" (Matt. 23:35; comp. 1 John 3:12). In Heb. 12:24, it is written that "the blood of sprinkling speaketh better things than that of Abel."

ABEL, 2. (Heb. אֵבֶל, aw-bale', a grassy place, or, meadow.)

1. A word used as a prefix in a number of cases (2 Sam. 20:14, 18). See ABEL-BETH-MAACHAH.

2. A great stone (1 Sam. 6:18) near Bethshemesh, upon which the Philistines set the ark when they returned it to Israel.

ABEL-BETH-MA'ACHAH (Heb. אֵבֶל בֵּית מַאֲכָה, aw-bale' bayth-ma-a-kah', meadow of the house of oppression) (2 Sam. 20:14, 15; 1 Kings 15:20; 2 Kings 15:29), a place in the north of Palestine, near the waters of Merom, identified with Abil-el-Kumh. In 2 Sam. 20:14, 18, it is called simply Abel. It was a place of importance, a metropolis, and called a "mother in Israel" (2 Sam. 20:19). It was besieged by Joab, Ben-hadad, and Tiglath-pileser (2 Sam. 20:14; 1 Kings 15:20; 2 Kings 16:29).

ABEL-MA'TIM (Heb. אֵבֶל מַיִם, aw-bale' mah'-yim, meadow of water), the name by which Abel-beth-maachah is called in 2 Chron. 16:4.

ABEL-MEHO'LAH (Heb. אֵבֶל מְהוּלָה, aw-bale' mekh-o-law', meadow of dancing), a place in the Jordan valley, and the home of Elisha (1 Kings 19:16; Judg. 7:22). It was in the tribe of Issachar. It has been described as a "rich meadow land extending four miles S. of Beth-shean; moist and luxuriant."

ABEL-MIZ'RAIM (Heb. אֵבֶל מִצְרַיִם, aw-bale' mits-rah'-yim, meadow of Egypt), the scene of the mourning of Egypt over Jacob (Gen. 50:11). It is located W. of the Jordan, according to Thomson. Another authority places it in the plain of Jericho, between that city and the Jordan.

ABEL-SHIT'TIM (Heb. אֵבֶל שִׁטִּים, aw-bale' shit-teen', meadow of acacias), the last halting place of Israel (Num. 33:49). Called simply Shittim (Num. 25:1; Josh. 2:1; Mic. 6:5). The scene of Israel's gross idolatry and the consequent death of twenty-four thousand by plague.

ABEZ (Heb. אֵבֶז, eh'-bez; to gleam, conspicuous, Josh. 19:20), in Issachar, in the N. of the plain of Esdraelon.

ABI (Heb. אָבִי, ab-ee', my father), the daughter of Zachariah and mother of King Hezekiah (2 Kings 18:2). The fuller form of the name, Abijah, is given in 2 Chron. 29:1.

ABI- (Heb. אָבִי, ab-ee', an old construct form of father of) forms the first part of several Hebrew proper names.

ABI'A, another form of אֲבִיָּה (q. v.).

1. The name given in 1 Chron. 3:10 to the son of Rehoboam, king of Judah.

2. (Gr. Ἀβιά, ab-ee-ah'.) A priest in the time of David (Luke 1:5), called Abijah (1 Chron. 24:10).

ABI'AH, another mode of anglicizing אֲבִיָּה (q. v.).

1. The second son of Samuel, appointed with Joel, his elder brother, judge of Beer-sheba, by his father. The brothers "turned aside after lucre, and took bribes, and perverted judgment." By reason of their conduct Israel demanded of Samuel a king (1 Sam. 8:2, sq.; 1 Chron. 6:28), B. C. before 1030.

2. The wife of Hezron and mother of Ashur (1 Chron. 2:24).

3. One of the sons of Becher, the son of Benjamin (1 Chron. 7:8).

ABI-AL'BON (Heb. אָבִי-עֵלְבֹן, ab-ee'-al-bone', father of strength, valiant), one of David's mighty men (2 Sam. 23:31), called in the parallel passage (1 Chron. 11:32) by the equivalent name ABIEL (q. v.).

ABI'ASAPH (Heb. אָבִי-אֶסָפָה, ab-ee-aw-sauf', father of gathering), the last-mentioned (Exod. 6:24) of the sons of Korah, the Levite, B. C. 1210. His identity with ABIASAPH (q. v.) (1 Chron. 6:23, 37) is a matter of much uncertainty and difference of opinion. The probability is that they are different persons.

ABI'ATHAR (Heb. אֲבִיָּאֲתָר, ab-yaw-thawr', father of abundance, i. e., liberal), the thirteenth high priest of the Jews, son of Ahimelech, and third in descent from Eli. His father and brethren were slain by order of Saul, because Ahimelech had inquired of the Lord for David, given him showbread to eat and also the sword of Goliath (1 Sam. 22). Abiathar, with an ephod, fled to David in Adullam (1 Sam. 22:1, 20-23). He was well received by David, and accompanied him in his wanderings, inquiring of the Lord for him (1 Sam. 30:7), B. C. before 1000. David became his firm friend for life, and when he ascended the throne appointed Abiathar high priest (1 Chron. 15:11; 1 Kings 2:26), and a member of his cabinet (1 Chron. 27:34). David did not remove Zadok, who had been appointed high priest by Saul after the death of Ahimelech, so both appointments stood, and Zadok and Abiathar were joint high priests (1 Kings 4:4). Together they superintended the removal of the ark to Jerusalem (1 Chron. 15:11; 1 Kings 2:26). Abiathar remained faithful to David during the rebellion of Absalom (2 Sam. 15:24), but joined Adonijah when he set himself up as the successor of David, while Zadok was on Solomon's side (1 Kings 1:19). For this Solomon banished Abiathar to Anathoth, and deposed him from the priesthood (1 Kings 2:26, 27). Zadok was put in the room of Abiathar (v. 35). This completed the doom predicted against the house of Eli, and restored the pontifical succession—Zadok, who remained high priest, being of the elder line of Aaron's sons.

NOTE.—“It appears strange that Abiathar should be named as priest, i. e., as high priest, along with Zadok, since Solomon had deposed him from the priestly office (2 Chron. 2:27, 35), and we cannot imagine any subsequent pardon. The only possible explanation is that proposed by Theodore, viz., that Solomon had only deprived him of the priest's office, but not of the priestly dignity, because this was hereditary” (Keil, Com.).

In Mark 2:26, occurs the phrase “in the days of Abiathar the high priest,” which may be rendered, “in (the time) of Abiathar (the son) of the high priest.” Or perhaps Abiathar was actively assisting his father at the time referred to (2 Sam. 8:17; 1 Chron. 18:16, etc.).

A'BIB (Heb. אֲבִיב, aw-beeb', from אָבַב, to fructify; properly an ear of grain), the month of green ears, the first of the Jewish ecclesiastical year (Exod. 13:4; 23:15; 34:18; Deut. 16:1), and afterward (Neh. 2:1) called NISAN (q. v.). According to the Rabbins it began with the new moon of March, or rather of April, according to Michaelis; when the first ripe grain ripens in Palestine. It should not be regarded strictly as the name of a month, but rather as a designation of the season. See TIME.

ABIDA, many ABIDA (Heb. אֲבִידָא, ab-ee-daw', father of knowledge, that is, knowing), the fourth of the five sons of Midian, the son of Abraham by Keturah (Gen. 25:4; 1 Chron. 1:33).

ABI'DAH, many AB'DAH, a less correct mode of anglicizing Abida (Gen. 25:4).

ABI'DAN (Heb. אֲבִידָן, ab-ee-dawn', father of judgment, i. e., judge), son of Gideon, prince of the tribe of Benjamin (Num. 1:11; 2:22; 10:24), B. C. 1210. See Num. 7:60, 65.

ABIDE. See GLOSSARY.

A'BIEL (Heb. אֲבִי־אֵל, ab-ee-ale', father of strength, i. e., strong).

1. A Benjamite, son of Zeror (1 Sam. 9:1) and father of Ner (1 Sam. 14:51), which last was the grandfather of King Saul (1 Chron. 8:33; 9:39). In 1 Sam. 9:1 the phrase “son of Abiel” should be “grandson of Abiel.”

2. One of David's mighty men (1 Chron. 11:32). He is the same as Abi-albon, the Arbathite (2 Sam. 23:31), B. C. about 1000.

ABIE'ZER (Heb. אֲבִיעֶזֶר, ab-ee-eh'-zer, father of help, i. e., helpful).

1. The second son of Hammoleketh, sister of Gilead and granddaughter of Manasseh (1 Chron. 7:17, 18). He was the founder of the family to which Gideon belonged, and which bore his name as a patronymic (Josh. 17:2; Judg. 6:34), B. C. before 1170. He is elsewhere called Jeezer, and his descendants Jeezerites (Num. 26:30).

2. The Anethothite, one of David's thirty chief warriors (2 Sam. 23:27). Abiezer commanded the ninth division of the army (1 Chron. 27:12), B. C. 1000.

ABIEZ'RITE (Heb. אֲבִיעֶזֶרִי, ab-ee' haw-eez-ree', father of the Ezrite), a patronymic designation of the descendants of Abiezer (Judg. 6:11, 24; 8:32.)

ABIGAIL (Heb. אֲבִיגַיִל, ab-ee-gah'-yil, father of joy, i. e., exultation).

1. The wife of NABAL (q. v.), a sheep master of Carmel (1 Sam. 25:3), B. C. about 1000. In sheep-shearing time David sent some of his young men to Nabal for a present, which was insolently refused. David was greatly enraged, and set out with four hundred men to avenge the insult. Abigail, having been informed of her husband's conduct and the impending danger, went to meet David with an abundant supply of bread, corn, wine, etc. She prayed David's forbearance, arguing from Nabal's character (v. 25), the leadings of God by which David had been kept from murder by her coming to meet him, and the fact that God is the avenger of the wicked (v. 26). David was mollified by Abigail's tact and beauty, and he recalled his vow. Returning home, Abigail found her husband intoxicated, and told him nothing of her conduct and his danger until morning. The information produced so great a shock “that his heart died within him, and he became as a stone” (v. 37), and he died about ten days after. Abigail became David's wife, and shared his varying fortunes, dwelling at Gath (1 Sam. 27:3), being among the captives taken by the Amalekites from Ziklag (30:5), and accompanying her husband to Hebron when he was anointed king (2 Sam. 2:2). She bore David a son named Chileab (3:3), called also Daniel (1 Chron. 3:1).

2. A daughter of Nahash (Jesse) and sister of David, and wife of Jether, or Ithra, an Ishmaelite, by whom she had Amasa (2 Sam. 17:25; 1 Chron. 2:16, 17).

ABIHAIL (Heb. אֲבִיהַיִל, ab-ee-khak'-yil, father of might, i. e., mighty).

1. The father of Zuriel, which latter was chief of the Levitical family of Merari when Moses numbered the Levites at Sinai (Num. 3:35), B. C. 1210.

2. The wife of Abishur (of the family of Jerahmeel) and mother of Ahban and Molid (1 Chron. 2:29).

3. The son of Huri, and one of the chiefs of the family of Gad, who settled in Bashan (1 Chron. 5:14).

4. The daughter, i. e., descendant, of Eliab, David's oldest brother, and second wife of Rehoboam. She could hardly have been the daughter of Eliab, as David, his youngest brother, was thirty years old when he began to reign, some eighty years before her marriage (2 Chron. 11:18).

5. The father of Esther and uncle of Mordecai (Esth. 2:15; 9:29), B. C. before 538.

ABI'HU (Heb. אֲבִי־הוּ, ab-ee-hoo', to whom he, i. e., God, is father), the second son of Aaron by Elisheba (Exod. 6:23; Num. 3:2), who, with his father, eldest brother, and seventy elders of Israel, accompanied Moses part way up Mount Sinai, and beheld manifestations of God's presence (Exod. 24:1, 9, 10). Afterward, with his brothers Nadab, Eleazar, and Ithamar, he was set apart and consecrated to the priesthood (Exod. 28:1). Nadab and Abihu neglected, on one occasion, to use fire from off the altar in burning incense, substituting "strange" or common fire instead. They were instantly struck dead (probably by lightning), and were taken away and buried in their clothes without the camp (Lev. 10:1, ff.), B. C. 1210. It is probable that the sacrilege was committed in drunken recklessness, as immediately a law was given prohibiting wine or strong drink to the priest whose turn it was to enter the tabernacle (v. 9).

ABI'HUD (Heb. אֲבִי־הוּד, ab-ee-hood', father of renown), one of the sons of Bela, the son of Benjamin (1 Chron. 8:3).

ABI'JAH (Heb. אֲבִי־יָה, ab-ee-yaw', whose father God is).

1. A son of Jeroboam I, king of Israel. On his falling ill Jeroboam sought help secretly from the God whom he had openly forsaken. He sent his wife, disguised and bearing a present of bread and honey, to Ahijah, the prophet, who was at Shiloh. The prophet was blind, but had been warned by God of her coming. He revealed to her that, though the child was to die, yet because there was found in Abijah only, of all the house of Jeroboam, "some good thing toward the Lord," he only, of all that house, should come to his grave in peace, and be mourned in Israel. The queen returned home, and the child expired as she crossed the threshold. "And they buried him; and all Israel mourned for him" (1 Kings 14:1-18), B. C. about 930.

2. The second king of the separate kingdom of Judah, the son of Rehoboam and grandson of Solomon (1 Chron. 3:10). He is called Abia (1 Chron. 3:10), Abijah (2 Chron. 12:16), and Abijam (1 Kings 14:31; 15:1-8). Abijah began to reign B. C. 918, in the eighteenth year of Jeroboam, king of Israel, and reigned three years. Considering the separation of the ten tribes of Israel as rebellion, Abijah made a vigorous attempt to bring them back to their allegiance. He marched with four hundred thousand men against Jeroboam, who met him with eight hundred thousand men. In Mount Ephraim he addressed a speech to Jeroboam and the opposing army, in which he advocates a theocratic institution, refers to the beginning of the rebellion, shows the folly of opposing God's kingdom, and concludes with urging Israel not to fight against God. His view of the political position of the ten tribes with respect to Judah, though erroneous, is such as a king of Judah would be likely to take. He gained a signal victory over Jeroboam, who lost five hundred thousand men, and though he did not bring Israel to their former allegiance, he took Beth-el, Jeshanah, and Ephraim, with their dependent towns, from them, and Jeroboam never again warred with him (2 Chron. 13:1-20). He imitated his father's sins (1 Kings 15:3), and had fourteen wives, by whom he had twenty-two sons and sixteen daughters (2 Chron. 13:21). He was succeeded by Asa, his son (2 Chron. 14:1).

NOTE.—The maternity of Abijah. In 1 Kings 15:2, we read, "His mother's name was Maachah, the daughter of Abishalom" (comp. 2 Chron. 11:20, 22); but in 2 Chron. 13:2, "His mother's name also was Michajah, the daughter of Uriel of Gibeah." The solution of the difficulty probably is that the mother of Abijah had two names, and that Absalom was her grandfather.

3. One of the descendants of Eleazar, the son of Aaron, and chief of one of the twenty-four courses or orders into which the whole body of the priesthood was divided by David (1 Chron. 24:10). Of these the course of Abijah was the eighth, B. C. 1000.

4. The daughter of Zechariah and mother of King Hezekiah (2 Chron. 29:1), and, consequently, the wife of Ahaz. She is called Abi (2 Kings 18:2), B. C. before 719.

5. One of the priests, probably, who affixed their signatures to the covenant made with God by Nehemiah (Neh. 10:7). He seems to be the same (notwithstanding the great age this implies) who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Neh. 12:4), and who had a son Zichri (Neh. 12:17), B. C. 445.

ABI'JAM (Heb. אֲבִי־יָמ, ab-ee-yawm', father of the sea, i. e., seaman), the name always given in the Book of Kings to the king of Judah (1 Kings 14:31; 15:1, 7, 8); elsewhere called Abijah. 1 Kings 14:1, refers to another person. Abijam is probably a clerical error, some manuscripts giving Abijah.

ABILE'NE (Gr. Ἀβιλενή, ab-ee-lay-nay', a plain), a small district of Coele-Syria, on the eastern slope of Anti-Libanus. Abilene (Luke 3:1) was eighteen miles from Damascus and thirty-eight miles from Heliopolis or Baalbek. It lay in the Suk Wady Barada, a gorge cut originally, as the inscriptions reveal, by the Emperors Aurelius Antonius and Lucius Aurelius Verus, in the 2d century.

ABIM'ÆL (Heb. אֲבִי־מַאֵל, ab-ee-maw-ale', father of Mael), one of the sons of Joktan, in Arabia (Gen. 10:28; 1 Chron. 1:22). He was supposed to be the founder of an Arabian tribe called Maël.

ABIM'ELECH (Heb. אֲבִימֶלֶךְ, ab-ee-mel'-ek, father of the king, i. e., royal father), probably a general title of royalty, as Pharaoh among the Egyptians.

1. The Philistine king of Gerar in the time of Abraham (Gen. 20:1, sq.), B. C. about 2200. After the destruction of Sodom, Abraham removed into his territory, and remained some time at Gerar. Abimelech took Sarah, whom Abraham had announced to be his sister, into his harem, being either charmed with her beauty or desirous of allying himself with Abraham. God, in a dream, appeared to Abimelech, and threatened him with death on account of Sarah, because she was married. Abimelech, who had not yet come near her, excused himself on the ground that he supposed Sarah to be Abraham's sister. That Abimelech, in taking Sarah, should have supposed that he was acting "in the integrity of heart and purity of hands" is to be accounted for by considering the customs of that day. Abimelech, the next morning, obeyed the divine command, and restored Sarah to Abraham, providing him with a liberal present of cattle and servants, and offered him a settlement in any part of the country. He also gave him a thousand pieces of silver as "a covering of the eyes" for Sarah; i. e., according to some, as an atoning present. Others think that the money was to procure a veil for Sarah to conceal her beauty, that she might not be coveted for her comeliness. "Thus she was reproved" for not having worn a veil, which as a married woman, according to the custom of the country, she ought to have done. Some years after, Abimelech, accompanied by Pichol, "the chief captain of his host," repaired to Beersheba to make a covenant with Abraham, which is the first league on record. Abimelech restored a well which had been dug by Abraham but seized by the herdsmen of Abimelech without his knowledge (Gen. 21:22-34).

2. Another king of Gerar in the time of Isaac (Gen. 26:1-22), B. C. about 2100. Supposed to have been the son of the preceding. Isaac sought refuge with Abimelech from famine, and dwelt at Gerar. Having the same fear respecting his wife, Rebekah, as his father entertained respecting Sarah, he reported her to be his sister. Abimelech discovered the untruthfulness of Isaac's statement (v. 8), whereupon he reproved him for what he had said, and forbade any of his people to touch Rebekah on pain of death. The agricultural operations of Isaac in Gerar were very successful, returning him in one year a hundredfold. He also claimed his proprietary right to the soil by reopening the wells dug by his father. The digging of wells, according to the custom of those times, gave one a right to the soil. His success made the Philistines envious, so that even Abimelech requested him to depart, fearing his power. Isaac complied, and encamped in the open country ("the valley of Gerar"). In this valley he opened the old wells of Abraham's time, and his people dug three new ones. But Abimelech's herdsmen contended concerning two of these, and the patriarch removed to so great a distance that there was no dispute respecting the third. Afterward

Abimelech visited Isaac at Beersheba, and desired to make a covenant of peace with him. Isaac referred to the hostility that the Philistines had shown; to which Abimelech replied that they did not smite him, i. e., drive him away by force, but let him depart in peace, and closed by recognizing Isaac as being one blessed of God. Isaac entertained Abimelech and his companions with a feast, contracted the desired covenant with them, and dismissed them in peace (Gen. 26:26-31).

3. King of Shechem. (1) His conspiracy.

After Gideon's death Abimelech formed a conspiracy with his mother's family, who seem to have had considerable influence in Shechem. The argument used was the advantage of the rule of one person to that of seventy. He also reminded them that he was one of themselves. Thus influenced, the Shechemites furnished him money out of the treasury of Baal-berith, with which Abimelech hired desperate men, and, repairing to Ophrah with them, slew all his brothers save Jotham, the youngest, who hid himself. (2) The Bramble King. At a general assemblage of the men of Shechem and the house of MILLO (q. v.) Abimelech was declared king, B. C. after 1100. When Jotham was told of the election of Abimelech he went to the top of Mount Gerizim, where the Shechemites were assembled for some public purpose, perhaps to inaugurate Abimelech (Kittó), and rebuked them in his famous parable of the trees choosing a king (Judg. 9:7-21).

(3) Revolt of Shechem. Judgment against Abimelech was not long delayed, for in three years "God sent an evil spirit between" him "and the men of Shechem," and they "dealt treacherously with Abimelech." They caused ambuscades to be laid in the mountains, and robbed all that passed. The design was, probably, to bring the government into discredit by allowing such lawlessness, or to waylay Abimelech himself. The insurgents found a leader in GAAL (q. v.), the son of Ebed, who, while they were cursing Abimelech in the excitement of a village feast to Baal, called upon them to revolt from Abimelech, and declared that he would dethrone him. He then challenged the king to battle (Judg. 9:22-29).

(4) Destroys Shechem. Zebul, the ruler of Shechem, sent word to Abimelech of the revolt, and requested him to place himself in ambush that night, and be prepared to surprise Gaal in the morning. As was expected, Gaal started out in the morning, was met and defeated by Abimelech, and prevented by Zebul from entering the city. The next day the people went out into the field, possibly to continue their vintage, and Abimelech slew them with two of his companions, while with his other two he seized the city gates. After fighting against the city all day he took it, destroyed it utterly, and strewed it with salt (Judg. 9:30-45).

(5) Destroys the hold. When the inhabitants of the town of Shechem heard of the fate of the city they betook themselves to the temple of Baal-berith. Their purpose in so doing was evidently not to defend themselves, but to seek safety at the sanctuary of their God from the vengeance of Abimelech. When he heard of this, Abimelech went with his men to Mount Zalmon, and brought from thence branches of trees. These were piled against the building and set on fire. The building was consumed with all its occupants, about one thousand men and women (Judg. 9:46-49). (6) Abimelech's death. At last the fate predicted by Jotham (v. 20) overtook Abimelech. He went from Shechem to Thebez, besieged the town, and took it. This town possessed a strong tower, and in this the inhabitants took refuge. When Abimelech approached near the door to set it on fire a woman threw a piece of millstone (the upper millstone) upon him, crushing his skull. Seeing that he was mortally wounded, he called upon his armor-bearer to thrust him through with a sword, lest it should be said, "A woman slew him." After Abimelech's death his army was dissolved. "Thus God rendered the wickedness of Abimelech" upon his head "which he did unto his father, in slaying his seventy brethren" (Judg. 9:50-56).

4. The son of Abiathar, and high priest in the time of David (1 Chron. 18:16). The name is probably an error of transcription for Abimelech (2 Sam. 8:17).

5. In the title of Psa. 34 the name Abimelech is interchanged for that of ACHISH (q. v.), king of Gath, to whom David fled for refuge from Saul (1 Sam. 21:10).

ABIN'ADAB (Heb. אֲבִינָדָב, ab-ee-naw-dawb', father of generosity, i. e., liberal).

1. A Levite of Kirjath-jearim, in whose house the ark was deposited after it was returned by the Philistines (1 Sam. 7:1; 2 Sam. 6:3, 4; 1 Chron. 13:7), B. C. before 1030.

2. The second of the eight sons of Jesse (1 Sam. 17:13; 1 Chron. 2:13), and one of the three who followed Saul to the campaign against the Philistines in which Goliath defied Israel (1 Sam. 17:13).

3. One of the four sons of King Saul (1 Chron. 9:39; 10:2). He was slain by the Philistines in the battle of Gilboa (1 Sam. 31:2; 1 Chron. 10:2), B. C. 1001. His name appears as Ishui in the list in 1 Sam. 14:49.

4. The father of one of Solomon's purveyors (or, rather, Ben-Abinadab is to be regarded as the name of the purveyor himself (M'C. and S., Cyclo-pædia, s. v.; also marg.), who presided over the district of Dor, and married Taphath, the daughter of Solomon (1 Kings 4:11), B. C. after 960.

ABIN'OAM (Heb. אֲבִינְעָם, ab-ee-no'-am, father of pleasantness or grace, i. e., gracious), the father of Barak, the judge (Judg. 4:6, 12; 5:1, 12), B. C. after 1170.

ABIR'AM (Heb. אֲבִירָם, ab-ee-rawm', father of height, i. e., lofty, proud).

1. One of the sons of Eliab, a Reubenite, who, with his brother Dathan, and with On, of the same tribe, joined Korah, a Levite, in conspiracy against Moses and Aaron, B. C. about 1190, in which he, with the other conspirators, were destroyed by an earthquake (Num. 16:1-33; 26:9, 10; Deut. 11:6). See KORAH.

2. The eldest son of Hiel, the Beth-elite, who died prematurely (for such is the evident import of the statement) for the presumption or ignorance of his father, in fulfillment of the doom pronounced upon the posterity of him who should undertake to rebuild Jericho (1 Kings 16:34). For prophecy, see Josh. 6:26.

AB'ISHAG (Heb. אֲבִישָׁג, ab-ee-shag', father of error), a beautiful young woman of Shunem, in the tribe of Issachar, who was selected by the servants of David to minister unto him in his old age (1 Kings 1:3, 4), B. C. 959. She became his wife, but the marriage was never consummated (1 Kings 1:4). Soon after David's death Adonijah sought, through the intercession of Bath-sheba, Solomon's mother, the hand of Abishag. But as the control and possession of the harem of the deceased king was associated with rights and privileges peculiarly regal, Solomon supposed this demand to be part of a conspiracy against the throne. Adonijah was therefore put to death (1 Kings 2:17-25). See ADONIJAH.

AB'ISHAI, many ABISH'AI (Heb. אֲבִישָׁי, ab-ee-shah'ee, father of a gift), a son of Zeruiah, sister of David (by an unknown father), and brother to Joab and Asahel (1 Chron. 2:16). The first we learn of Abishai is his volunteering to accompany David to the camp of Saul, B. C. about 994. The two went down by night and found Saul and his people asleep. Abishai begged of David that he might slay Saul with his spear, which was stuck in the ground near his head (1 Sam. 26:6-12). With his brot. Joab he pursued after Abner (who had just slain Asahel) until sundown, and until they had reached the hill of Ammah (2 Sam. 2:24), and aided in the treacherous assassination of Abner (2 Sam. 3:30). In the war against Hanun, undertaken by David to punish the Ammonites for insulting his messengers, Abishai, as second in command, was opposed to the army of the Ammonites before the gates of Rabbah and drove them headlong into the city (2 Sam. 10:10, 14; 1 Chron. 19:11, 15). The same impetuous zeal and regard for David which he showed in the night adventure to Saul's camp Abishai manifested in his desire to slay Shimei, when the latter abused David (2 Sam. 16:9, 11; 19:21). When the king fled beyond Jordan, Abishai remained faithful to David, and was intrusted with the command of one of the three divisions of the army which crushed the rebellion (2 Sam. 18:2, 12), B. C. 967.

In the revolt of Sheba, the Benjamite, David ordered Amasa to muster the forces of Judah in three days. His tardiness compelled David to again have recourse to the sons of Zeruiah, and Abishai was appointed to pursue Sheba, which he did (accompanied by Joab), leading the Cherethites, the Pelethites, and all the mighty men (2 Sam. 20:6-10). Later, when David's life was imperiled by Ishbi-benob, Abishai came to his help and slew the giant (2 Sam. 21:15-17). He was chief of the three "mighties" who performed the chivalrous exploit of breaking through the host of the Philistines to procure David a draught of water from the well of his native Bethlehem (2 Sam. 23:14-17). Among the exploits of this hero it is mentioned (2 Sam. 23:18) that he withstood three hundred men and slew them with his spear, but the occasion of this adventure, and the time and manner of his death, are equally unknown.

In 2 Sam. 8:13, the victory over the Edomites in the valley of Salt is ascribed to David, but in 1 Chron. 18:12, to Abishai. It is hence probable that the victory was actually gained by Abishai, but is ascribed to David as king and commander (Kitto, s. v.).

ABISH'ALOM, a fuller form (1 Kings 15:2, 10) of the name ABSALOM (q. v.).

ABISH'UA (Heb. אֲבִישׁוּא, ab-ee-shoo'-ah, father of welfare).

1. The son of Phineas (grandson of Aaron), and fourth high priest of the Jews (1 Chron. 6:4, 5, 50).

2. One of the sons of Bela, the son of Benjamin (1 Chron. 8:4); possibly the same as Jerimoth (1 Chron. 7:7).

AB'ISHUR (Heb. אֲבִישׁוּר, ab-ee-shoor', father of the wall, i. e., stronghold, or perhaps mason), the second son of Shammai, of the tribe of Judah. He was the husband of Abihail, and father of two sons, Ahban and Molid (1 Chron. 2:28, 29).

AB'TAL (Heb. אֲבִיטַל, ab-ee-tal', father of the dew, i. e., fresh), the fifth wife of David and mother of Shephatiah, who was born in Hebron (2 Sam. 3:4; 1 Chron. 3:8).

Hand Washing in the East.

AB'TTUB (Heb. אֲבִיטוּב, ab-ee-toob', father of goodness, i. e., good), a son of Shaharaim, a Benjamite, by his wife Hushim, in Moab (1 Chron. 8:11).

ABI'UD, a Grecised form (Matt. 1:13) of ΑΒΗΟΥΔ (q. v.), the great-great-grandson of Zerubabel, and father of Eliakim, among the paternal ancestry of Jesus (Matt. 1:13). He is probably the same with Judah, son of Joanna, and father of Joseph in the maternal line (Luke 3:26), and also with Obadiah, son of Arnan, and father of Shechaniah in 1 Chron. 3:21.

AB'JECT (Heb. נָקֵה, nay-keh', a smiter), one smiting with the tongue, i. e., a railer, slanderer (Psa. 35:15; comp. Jer. 18:18). See GLOSSARY.

ABLUTION, a ceremonial washing, it might be of the person (or part thereof), clothing, vessels, or furniture, as a symbol of purification.

1. Cleansing from the taint of an inferior condition preparatory to initiation into a higher one. Of this sort was the washing with water of Aaron and his sons before they were invested with the priestly robes and anointed with the holy oil (Exod. 29:4; Lev. 8:6). The same is doubtless true of the ablution of persons and raiment which was required of the Israelites as a preparation to their receiving the law from Sinai (Exod. 19:10-15).

2. Preparation for special act of religious service. The priests before they entered into the service of the tabernacle were required, under penalty of death, to wash their hands and feet. For this purpose a large basin of water always stood in readiness (Exod. 30:18-21; Lev. 16). The Egyptian priests carried the practice to a burdensome extent. Herodotus tells us (ii. 37) that they shaved their bodies every third day, that no insect or other filth might be upon them when they served the gods. The Mohammedan law requires ablution before each of the five daily prayers, permitting it to be performed with sand when water is not to be had, as in the desert.

3. Purification from actual defilement. Eleven species of uncleanness of this nature are recognized by the Mosaic law (Lev. 12-15), the purification for which ceased at the end of a prescribed period, provided the unclean person then washed his body and his clothes. In a few cases, such as leprosy and the defilement caused by touching a dead body, he remained unclean seven days. The Jews afterward introduced many other causes of defilement, being equaled, however, by the Mohammedans.

4. Declaration of freedom from guilt of a particular action. An instance of this is the expiation for the murder of a man by unknown hands, when the elders of the nearest village washed their hands over a slain heifer, saying, "Our hands have not shed this blood, neither have our eyes seen it" (Deut. 21:1-9). The Pharisees carried the practice of ablution to such excess, from the affectation of purity while the heart was left unclean, that our Lord severely rebuked them for their hypocrisy (Matt. 23:25).

"All these practices come under the head of purification from uncleanness; the acts involving which were made so numerous that persons of the stricter sect could scarcely move without contracting some involuntary pollution." Therefore, they never entered their houses without ablution, from the strong probability that they had unknowingly contracted some defilement on the streets. They were especially careful never to eat without washing their hands (Mark 7:1-5). A distinction must be made between this ceremonial washing and ordinary cleansing of the hands as a matter of decency. When the charge was made against our Lord's disciples that they "ate with unwashed hands" it was not meant that they did not at all wash their hands, but that they did not do it ceremonially.

These ceremonial washings were prescribed with such minute details as to be not only burdensome, but sometimes impossible. Before the ceremony one must decide the kind of food to be partaken of—whether it was prepared first fruits, common food, or holy, i. e., sacrificial food. "The water was poured on both hands, which must be free from anything covering them, such as gravel, mortar, etc. The hands were lifted up, so as to make the water run to the wrist, in order to insure that the whole hand was washed and that the water polluted by the hand did not again run down the fingers. Similarly, each hand was rubbed with the other (the first), provided the hand that rubbed had been affused; otherwise the rubbing might be done against the head, or even against a wall. But there was one point on which special stress was laid. In the 'first affusion' which was all that originally was required when the hands were not Levitically 'defiled,' the water had to run down to the wrist. If the water remained short of the wrist, the hands were not clean. Accordingly, the words of St. Mark can only mean that the Pharisees eat not 'except they wash their hands to the wrist.' If the hands were 'defiled' two affusions were required; the first to remove the defilement, and the second to wash away the waters that had contracted the defilement of the hands. Accordingly, on the affusion of the first waters the hands were elevated, and the water made to run down at the wrist, while at the second waters the hands were depressed, so that the water might run off by the finger joints and tips" (Eldersheim, Life and Times of Jesus, ii, 11).

ABNER.—1. Name and Family. (Heb. אֲבִנֵר, ab-nar', father of light, i. e., enlightening.) The son of Ner and uncle of Saul (being the brother of his father, Kish).

2. Personal History. (1) Under Saul. Abner was a renowned warrior, and the commander-in-chief of the army of Saul (1 Sam. 14:50), B. C. 1030. He was the person who conducted David into the presence of Saul after the death of Goliath (1 Sam. 17:57). He was doubtless held in high esteem by Saul, and with David and Jonathan sat at the king's table (1 Sam. 20:25). He accompanied Saul to Hachilah in his pursuit of David, who sarcastically reproached him for not keeping more securely his master (1 Sam. 26:1, 5, 15). (2) Under Ish-bosheth. After the death of Saul, B. C. 1000, Abner, taking advantage of the feeling entertained in the other tribes against Judah, took Ish-bosheth, a surviving son of Saul, to Mahanaim, and proclaimed him king, and ruled in his name. This happened five years after Saul's death, the intervening time being probably occupied in recovering land from the Philistines (K. and D., Com., in loco) and in gaining influence with the other tribes. A sort of desultory warfare was kept up for two years between the armies of David and Ish-bosheth. The only engagement of which we have an account is the battle of Gibeah, Joab and Abner commanding the opposing forces. (3) Slays Asahel. Abner was beaten and fled for his life, but was pursued by Asahel (brother of Joab and Abishai). Abner, not wishing to have a blood feud with Joab (for, according to usage, Joab would become the avenger of his brother Asahel, in case he was slain), begged Asahel to cease following him and pursue some other one. Asahel refused, and Abner thrust him through with a back stroke of his spear. The pursuit was kept up by Joab and Abishai until sunset, when a parley was held between the leaders, and Joab sounded the trumpet of recall. Abner retired to Mahanaim and Joab to Hebron (2 Sam. 2:8-30). (4) Breaks with Ish-bosheth. At last Abner took a step which was so presumptuous and significant of his consciousness of power that even the feebler Ish-bosheth protested. It was the exclusive right of the successor to the throne to cohabit with the concubines of the deceased king. Yet Abner took to his own harem Rizzpah one of Saul's concubines. The rebuke of Ish-bosheth so greatly enraged him that he declared his purpose of abandoning the house of Saul and allying himself with David (2 Sam. 3:6-9). To excuse his conduct he asserted that he was aware of the divine purpose concerning David. (5) Joins David. He made overtures through messengers to David, who required, as a preliminary, the restoration of his wife, Michal, who had been given to Paltiël by Saul. Abner made a tour among the elders of Israel and Benjamin, advocating the cause of David. He then repaired in person to David, who showed him great attention and respect, giving him and the twenty men accompanying him a feast. In return Abner promised to gather all Israel to the standard of David, and was then dismissed in peace (2 Sam. 3:9, sq.). (6) Slain by Joab. Joab, returning from Hebron from a military expedition, and fearing the influence of such a man as Abner, resolved to avenge his brother's death. Unknown to the king, but doubtless in his name, he sent messengers after Abner to call him back. Drawing Abner aside under the pretense of private conversation, he smote him under the fifth rib so that he died (2 Sam. 3:6-30). Abner was buried at Hebron with the honors due to a prince and chieftain, David himself following the bier (vers. 31, 32). David's lamentation over Abner exonerated him in public opinion from any blame, and his declaration to his servants (2 Sam. 3:38, 39), showed that he could properly estimate the character even of an enemy, and that he would have punished his murderer had he only the power.

ABOMINATION (Heb. לִמְנוּעָה, pig-gool', filth, Lev. 7:18; שְׁקִירָה, shik-koots', unclean, Deut. 29:17, etc.; שֶׁלֶת, shel'-kets, rejected, Lev. 7:21, etc.; וְרִיבָהּ, to-ay-baw', causing abhorrence, Gen. 43:32; Gr. βδέλυγμα, bdel'-oog-mah, Matt. 24:15, etc.). This word is used to denote that which is particularly offensive to the moral sense, the religious feeling, or the natural inclination of the soul. Israel became an abomination to the Philistines because of the antipathy caused by reverses in war (1 Sam. 13:4); David, for his distressed condition, was an abomination to his friends (Psa. 88:8). See SUPPLEMENT.

The practices of sin—such as the swellings of pride, lips of falsehood, the sacrifices of the wicked, and the foul rites of idolatry—are stigmatized as abominations (Prov. 6:16; 12:22; 15:8; Jer. 6:15, etc.).

There are some peculiar applications of the term, to which attention is called:

1. "The Egyptians might not eat bread with the Hebrews, for that is an abomination (to'ebah) unto the Egyptians" (Gen. 43:32). The explanation probably is that the Egyptians thought themselves ceremonially defiled if they ate with strangers. The primary reason may have been that the cow was the most sacred animal to the Egyptians, and the eating of it was obnoxious to them; whereas it was eaten and sacrificed by the Jews and most other nations. The Jews themselves, in later times, considered it unlawful to eat or drink with foreigners in their houses, or even to enter their dwellings (John 18:28; Acts 10:28; 11:3).

2. Joseph told his brethren to answer when questioned by Pharaoh, "Thy servants' trade hath been about cattle from our youth even until now, both we, and also our fathers." Joseph adds as a reason for giving this statement, "That ye may dwell in the land of Goshen; for every shepherd is an abomination unto the Egyptians." The origin of this feeling is nowhere given either in sacred or profane history, but the fact is beyond dispute, being amply attested by the evidence of the monuments, on which shepherds are always represented in a low and degrading attitude. It may be that this feeling arose from the subjugation of Lower and Middle Egypt by a tribe of nomad shepherds; or that the Egyptians, as a settled and civilized people, detested the lawless and predatory habits of the wandering shepherd tribes, which then as now bounded the valley of the Nile and occupied the Arabias.

3. When Pharaoh told the Israelites to sacrifice to "your God" without going to the desert, Moses replied, "It is not meet so to do; for we shall sacrifice the abomination of the Egyptians to the Lord our God: lo, shall we sacrifice the abomination of the Egyptians before their eyes, and will they not stone us?" (Exod. 8:26.) Some think the abomination to consist in the sacrifice of the cow. Others (K. and D., Com., in loco) think that "the Israelites would not carry out the rigid regulations observed by the Egyptians with regard to the cleanness of the sacrificial animals, and in fact would not observe the sacrificial rites of the Egyptians at all." The Egyptians would, doubtless, consider this a manifestation of contempt for themselves and their gods, and this would so enrage them that they would stone the Israelites.

ABOMINATION OF DESOLATION (Heb.

שְׁקִירַת שְׁמַיִם, Dan. 11:31; or שְׁקִירַת שְׁמַיִם, Dan. 12:11; desolating filthiness), means, doubtless, the removal of the stated worship of Jehovah, and the setting up of the idol altar on Jehovah's altar of burnt offering by Antiochus Epiphanes, who dedicated the temple to Jupiter Olympus. Josephus and the author of the first book of Maccabees refer to this as the accomplishment of Daniel's prophecy, in declaring that "they set up the abomination of desolation upon the altar" (1 Macc. 1:59; 6:7; Josephus, Ant., xii, 5, 4; 7, 6). Jesus quotes the words in Matt. 24:15, and applies it to what is to take place when the Romans invest Jerusalem, advancing with their image-crowned standards, regarded as idols by the Jews. A still later appearance of the "abomination of desolation in the holy place" was when Hadrian set up the figure of a boar over the Bethlehem gate of the city, erected a temple to Jupiter upon the site of the Jewish temple, and caused an image of himself to be set up in the part which answered to the most holy place.

A'BRAHAM (Heb. אַבְרָהָם, ab-raw-hawm', father of a multitude). Up to Gen. 17:5, also in 1 Chron. 1:27; Neh. 9:7, he is uniformly called Abram (Heb. אַבְרָם, ab-rawm', high father). "The name of Abram—Abu-ramu, 'the exalted father'—is found in early Babylonian contracts" (Sayce, Higher Crit., p. 159).

1. Family. Abraham was a native of Chaldea, and descendant in the ninth generation from Shem, the son of Noah. His father's name was Terah, and he was born in Ur, B. C. perhaps 2333 (Gen. 11:27). See SUPPLEMENT.

2. Personal History. "The life of Abraham, from his call to his death, consists of four periods, the commencement of each of which is marked by a divine revelation of sufficient importance to constitute a distinct epoch."

(1) The First Period.—The Call. (1) REMOVAL TO CHARRAN. When Abraham was about seventy years of age he, with his father Terah, his nephew Lot, and his wife Sarah, went and abode in Charran (Gen. 11:27-31). The reason for this movement is given in Acts 7:2, 3: "The God of glory appeared unto our father Abraham when he was in Mesopotamia, before he dwelt in Charran, and said unto him, Get thee out from thy country, and from thy kindred, and come into the land which I shall show thee." (2) LEAVES CHARRAN. At the death of his father the call to Abraham was renewed. "Now the Lord had said unto Abram, Get thee out of thy country, and from thy kindred, and from thy father's house, unto a land that I will show thee" (Gen. 12:1-3). A condition was annexed to the call that he should separate from his father's house and leave his native land. He left his brother Nahor's family (who had also come to Charran, comp. Gen. 22:20, 23; 24:29, and 27:43) and departed, taking with him Lot, probably regarded as his heir (Josephus, Ant., i, 7, 1), and all his substance, to go not knowing whither" (Heb. 11:8). (3) REACHES CANAAN. He traveled until he came into the land of Canaan, and formed his first encampment in the vale of Moreh, between the mountains of Ebal and Gerizim, where his strong faith was rewarded by the second promise that his seed should possess this land. Here Abraham built "an altar to the Lord, who appeared unto him." It is probable that the Canaanites were jealous of Abraham, and that he therefore soon removed to the mountainous district between Beth-el and Ai, where he also built an altar to Jehovah. (4) IN EGYPT. He still moved southward until, at length, compelled by a famine, he went into Egypt. Fearing that the beauty of Sarah would tempt the Egyptians and endanger his life, he caused her to pass for his sister, a term used in Hebrew, as in many other languages, for a niece, which she really was (Smith's O. T. Hist., p. 72). Sarah was taken to the royal harem and Abraham loaded with valuable gifts, that could not be refused without an insult to the king, which he did not deserve. Warned of his mistake, Pharaoh summoned Abraham, and indignantly rebuked him for his subterfuge. He then dismissed Abraham, who went out of Egypt, taking his wife and Lot and his great wealth with him (Gen. 12). (5) RETURN TO CANAAN. Having reached his former encampment between Beth-el and Ai, he again establishes the worship of Jehovah (Gen. 13:3, 4). The increased wealth of Abraham and Lot became the cause of their separation. The country did not furnish sufficient pasture for the flocks and herds of Abraham and Lot, and dissensions arose between their herdsmen. In order to avoid strife and consequent weakness before their enemies, Abraham proposed that they occupy different districts. He gave the choice of locality to Lot, who selected the plain of Jordan, and went thither and pitched his tent. The childless Abraham was rewarded with a third blessing, in which God reiterated his promise to give him the land and a posterity like the dust of the earth for number. Then Abraham removed his tent, and came and dwelt in Mamre, near Hebron, and built an altar (Gen. 13). (6) RESCUES LOT. Lot was now involved in danger. The five cities of the plain had become tributary to Chedorlaomer, king of Elam. In the thirteenth year of their subjection they revolted, and Chedorlaomer marched against them with three allied kings. The kings of Sodom and Gomorrah fell, their cities were spoiled, and Lot and his goods were carried off (Gen. 14:1-12). Word was brought to Abraham, who immediately armed his dependents, three hundred and eighteen men, and with his Amorite allies overtook and defeated them at Dan, near the springs of Jordan. Abraham and his men pursued them as far as the neighborhood of Damascus, and then returned with Lot and all the men and goods that had been taken away. B. C. perhaps 2250. (7) MEETS MELCHIZEDEK. Arrived at Salem on their return, they were met by MELCHIZEDEK (q. v.), king of Salem, and "priest of the most high God," who brought him refreshments. He also blessed Abraham in the name of the most high God, and Abraham presented him with a tenth of the spoils. By strict right, founded on the war usages still subsisting in Arabia, Abraham had a claim to all the recovered goods. The king of Sodom recognized this right, but Abraham refused to accept anything, even from a thread to a shoe latchet, lest any should say, "I have made Abram rich" (Gen. 14:17, sq.).

(2) The Second Period.—The promise of a lineal heir and the conclusion of the covenant (Gen. 15, 16). (1) VISION OF ABRAHAM. Soon after this Abraham's faith was rewarded and encouraged by a distinct and detailed repetition of former promises, and by a solemn covenant contracted between himself and God. He was told, and he believed, that his seed should be as the stars of heaven for number, and that his posterity should grow up into a nation under foreign bondage, and that after four hundred years they should come up and possess the land in which he sojourned (Gen. 15). (2) BIRTH OF ISHMAEL. Ten years Abraham had dwelt in Canaan, and still he had no child. Sarah, being now seventy-five years of age, and probably despairing of bearing children herself, persuaded Abraham to take Hagar, her Egyptian handmaid, who bore him Ishmael (Gen. 16), B. C. 2247.

(3) The Third Period.—The establishment of covenant, change of name, and the appointment of the covenant sign of circumcision (Gen. 17-21).

(1) CHANGE OF NAME. Thirteen years more pass by, and Abraham reached his ninety-ninth year. God appeared to him, and favored him with still more explicit declarations of his purpose. He changed his name from Abram to Abraham, renewed his covenant, and in token thereof commanded that he and his should receive circumcision. Abraham was assured that Sarah, then ninety years old, should a year hence become the mother of Isaac, the heir of the special promises. Abraham wavered in faith and prayed for Ishmael, whom God promised abundantly to bless, but declared that he would establish his covenant with Isaac. (2) CIRCUMCISION. That very day Abraham, his son Ishmael, and all the males of his household were circumcised (Gen. 17).

(3) VISIT OF ANGELS. Abraham was favored, shortly after, with another interview with God. Sitting in his tent door under the oaks of Mamre, he saw three travelers approaching, and offered them his hospitality. They assented, and partook of the fare provided, Abraham standing in respectful attendance, according to oriental custom. These three persons were, doubtless, the "Angel Jehovah" and two attending angels. The promise of a son by Sarah was renewed, and her incredulity rebuked. The strangers continued their journey, Abraham walking some way with them.

(4) DESTRUCTION OF SODOM. The Lord revealed to him the coming judgment upon Sodom and Gomorrah; and then followed that wondrous pleading in behalf of the cities (Gen. 18). Abraham rose early the next morning to see the fate of the cities, and saw their smoke rising "up as the smoke of a furnace" (Gen. 19:27-29), B. C. 2225. (5) SARAH TAKEN BY ABIMELECH. After this Abraham journeyed southward, and dwelt between Kadesh and Shur, and sojourned in Gerar. Abimelech, king of Gerar, sent and took Sarah, but was warned of God in a dream, and sent her back the next morning to Abraham, whom he reproved for the deceit he had employed. He was healed in answer to Abraham's prayer (Gen. 20). (6) ISAAC BORN. At length, when Abraham was one hundred years old, and Sarah ninety, the long-promised heir was born, B. C. 2233. The altered position of Ishmael in the family excited the ill-will of himself and his mother. This was so apparent in the mocking behavior of Ishmael at the weaning of Isaac, that Sarah insisted that he and Hagar should be sent away, to which Abraham reluctantly consented. Abraham, after settling a dispute concerning a well taken by Abimelech's servants, made a treaty with him (Gen. 21).

(4) The Fourth Period. (1) ABRAHAM'S GREAT TRIAL (Gen. 22-25:11), B. C. 2213. When Isaac was nearly grown (twenty-five years old, says promises formerly made to Abraham were then confirmed in the most solemn manner. Abraham returned unto his young men, and with them went to Beer-sheba and dwelt there (Gen. 22:1-19). (2) DEATH OF SARAH. The next event recorded in Abraham's life is the death of Sarah, aged one hundred and twenty-seven years, at or near Hebron, B. C. 2193. Abraham purchased, of Ephron the Hittite, the cave of Machpelah, the field in which it stood, and all the trees in the field, and there he buried Sarah (Gen. 23). (3) MARRIAGE OF ISAAC. His next care was to procure a suitable wife for Isaac. He commissioned his eldest servant to go to Haran, where Nahor had settled, and get a wife for his son from his own family. He went, and, directed by God, chose Rebekah, the daughter of Bethuel, son of Nahor. In due time he returned, and Rebekah was installed in Sarah's tent as chief lady of the camp (Gen. 24), B. C. 2193. Some time after Abraham took another wife, Keturah, by whom he had several children. These, together with Ishmael, seem to have been Abraham's Oak.

Josephus, Ant., i, 13, 2) God subjected Abraham to a terrible trial of his faith and obedience. He commanded him to go to Mount Moriah (perhaps where the temple afterward stood) and there offer up Isaac, whose death would nullify all his hopes and the promises. Probably human sacrifices already existed, and therefore the peculiar trial lay in the singular position of Isaac and the improbability of his being replaced. Abraham decided to obey, "accounting (literally, reasoning) that God was able to raise him up, even from the dead" (Heb. 11:19). Assisted by his two servants he made preparations for the journey, and started early the next morning. On the third day he saw the place, and told his servants that he and his son would proceed on further to worship and return. Upon Isaac's asking, "Where is the lamb for a burnt offering?" Abraham replied, "The Lord will provide himself a lamb." The altar was built and Isaac placed thereon. The uplifted hand of the father was arrested by the angel of Jehovah, and a ram caught in the thicket was substituted for Isaac. Abraham called the name of the place Jehovah-jireh, "the Lord will provide." The portioned off by their father in his lifetime, and sent away to the east, that they might not interfere with Isaac. (4) DEATH. Abraham died, aged one hundred and seventy-five years, and was buried, by Isaac and Ishmael, in the cave of Machpelah (Gen. 25), B. C. 2158.

3. Character. In studying the life of Abraham one is deeply impressed with several beautiful traits of his character. Where, for example, do we find such an example of courteousness as Abraham furnishes for our imitation in his entertainment of the strangers in Mamre? How promptly he offers his hospitality; with what delicate regard for the feelings of his guests would he make it appear that they will oblige him more by accepting than he does them by offering his hospitality (Gen. 18:3-5). Nor was Abraham's generosity less apparent, so graciously shown, in his treatment of Lot. He insists neither upon the obligations due him as Lot's adopted father nor his advanced age; neither does he claim his rights under the promise of God to give him the land. He allows his nephew to have the first choice, uttering these noble words: "Let there be no strife, I pray thee, between me and thee, and between my herdmen and thy herdmen; for we be brethren." The tenderness of Abraham is no less remarkable than his other virtues. Aware of the sin of Sodom, his heart is stirred by the contemplation of its impending doom. As he patiently, earnestly pleads, with the Lord to spare the wretched inhabitants, we are reminded of Him who wept over the Holy City, and cried, "O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, how would I have gathered thy children, as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, but ye would not." But it is as an example of faith that Abraham shines pre-eminent. How severe its tests—called to leave his country, and go he knew not where; to sojourn in the land of promise as in a strange country; to expect an heir when his wife was past age; but he never wavers. This faith culminates on Moriah, where he is to slay his promised heir, but falters not, expecting, by reason of his faith, that God would from the ashes of sacrifice restore him his son. "In Paul's catalogue of immortals Abraham shines a star of greatest magnitude." Abraham had his failings, as who has not? He trusted God to restore the life of his son, yet he did not trust him to protect the honor of his wife, and was thus twice led into falsehood.

NOTE.—(1) Sacrifice of Isaac. Some have found it difficult to reconcile God's command to sacrifice Isaac with his prohibition of human sacrifices (Lev. 18:21; 20:2). We answer, "God's design was not to secure a certain outward act, but a certain state of mind, a willingness to give up the beloved object to Jehovah" (Haley). "The divine command was given in such a form that Abraham could not understand it in any other way than as requiring an outward burnt offering, because there was no other way in which Abraham could accomplish the complete surrender of Isaac than by an actual preparation for really offering the desired sacrifice" (Keil, Com.). See SACRIFICE, HUMAN. (2) Gen. 12:5, states that Abraham "went forth to go into the land of Canaan," but Heb. 11:8, that "he went out, not knowing whither he went." At first the name of the country was not revealed to him. It is designated simply as "a land that I will show thee" (Gen. 12:1). But even if the name "Canaan" had been mentioned at the outset, it might still be true that he went forth "not knowing whither he went." For, in those days of slow transit, imperfect intercommunication, and meager geographical knowledge, the mere name of a country several hundred miles distant would convey almost no idea of the country itself (Haley). See SUPPLEMENT.

ABRAHAM'S BOSOM. The phrase "to be in one's bosom" applies to the person who so reclines at the table that his head is brought almost into the bosom of the one sitting next above him. To be in Abraham's bosom signified to occupy the seat next to Abraham, i. e., to enjoy the same felicity with Abraham. Jesus, accommodating his speech to the Jews, describes the condition of Lazarus after death by this figure (Luke 16:22, 23). "Abraham's bosom" is also an expression of the Talmud for the state of bliss after death. Father Abraham was, to the Israelites, in the corrupt times of their later superstitions, almost what the Virgin Mary is to the Romish Church. He is constantly invoked as though he could hear the prayers of his descendants, wherever they are; and he is pictured standing at the gate of paradise to receive and embrace his children as they enter, and the whole family of his faithful descendants is gathered to his arms.

A'BRAM (Heb. אַבְרָם, ab-rawm', father of height, i. e., high father), the original name (Gen. 17:5) of Abraham.

ABRECH' (Heb. אַבְרֵךְ, ab-rake', A. V. "bow the knee"), a word in the original of Gen. 41:43, where it is used in proclaiming the authority of Joseph. It is very difficult to fix absolutely the meaning of the word. Wilkinson (Anc. Egypt., ii, 24) says that the word abrek is used to the present day by the Arabs when requiring a camel to kneel and receive its load. The word is, probably, of Egyptian origin, but changed so as to have a Hebrew sound. In the Coptic Aberek or Abrek means "bow the head." Origen and Jerome think Abrech means "a native Egyptian;" consider how desirable it was to have Joseph cease to be regarded as a foreigner: it has the meaning of naturalization.

AB'SALOM.—1. Name and Family. (Heb. אֲבִישׁוֹן, ab-shaw-lome', אֲבֵשׁוֹן, ab-ee-shaw-lome', father of peace.) The third son of David, and his only one by Maacah, the daughter of Talmi, king of Geshur (2 Sam. 3:3), born B. C. about 1000.

2. Personal History. (1) Avenges Tamar. Absalom's sister, Tamar, became the object of the lustful desire of Amnon, her half brother, David's eldest son, and was violated by him (2 Sam. 13:1-18). According to Eastern notions the duty of avenging his sister's wrong fell upon Absalom. He therefore took Tamar and kept her secluded in his own house, saying nothing to Amnon, "neither good nor bad." After two years had passed he found an opportunity for revenge. He then invited all his brethren, including Amnon, to a great sheep-shearing at Baal-hazor, and, to lull suspicion, requested the presence of his father also. Amid the mirth of the feast, while they were warm with wine, the servants of Absalom, at a preconcerted signal, fell upon Amnon and slew him (2 Sam. 13:23-29). Absalom fled to his grandfather, Talmi, and remained there three years (vers. 37, 38). (2) Return to Jerusalem. David, yearning for his exiled son Absalom (v. 39), yielded easily to the scheme of Joab, and permitted Absalom to return to Jerusalem, but not to appear before him. Absalom dwelt for two whole years in Jerusalem, and then sent for Joab, who refused to see him, until Absalom ordered his servants to burn his (Joab's) barley field. Then Joab secured for him an interview with the king (2 Sam. 14). (3) Preparations for revolt. But Absalom proved himself false and faithless. He secretly plotted a revolt, propitiating the populace by the beauty of his person and the magnificence of his surroundings, riding in a chariot with fifty outriders. He also fostered the discontent of the people by insinuations against his father's justice. Other causes, doubtless, were favorable for Absalom: the affair of Bath-sheba, the probable disaffection of Judah for being merged in one common Israel, and less attention on the part of David, through age, to individual complaints (2 Sam. 15:1-6). (4) Revolt. When the plot was ripe, Absalom sought and obtained leave to go to Hebron, to pay a vow which he had made at Geshur in case he should be permitted to return to Jerusalem. He had sent spies throughout all the tribes of Israel, summoning those favorable to his cause to assemble at Hebron, whither he went attended by two hundred unsuspecting adherents (2 Sam. 15:7-11). His next step was to send for Ahithophel, David's counselor, and secure his approval and advice (2 Sam. 15:12), he being an oracle in Israel (2 Sam. 16:23). (5) Entry into Jerusalem. When David heard the sad tidings of revolt he at once prepared for flight, and, leaving Jerusalem, repaired to Mahanaim, beyond Jordan (2 Sam. 15:13, sq.). Absalom now entered Jerusalem (2 Sam. 15:37), and, through the advice of Ahithophel, publicly took possession of the portion of his father's harem left in the city. The motive in this latter act was the more unreserved support of the people, from the assurance that any reconciliation between Absalom and his father would hereafter be impossible (2 Sam. 16:20-22). Absalom had already met Hushai, who had been sent to join him by David, that he might be instrumental in thwarting the counsels of Ahithophel (2 Sam. 15:33-37; 16:16-19). A council of war was held to consider the course to be pursued against David. Ahithophel advised the immediate pursuit and death of the king—that one death would close the war. Hushai, to gain time for David, urged his skill and bravery, the number and might of his warriors, the possibility and disastrous consequences of defeat, and advised a general gathering against David, and the total annihilation of him and his followers. The advice was accepted by Absalom. Information was secretly sent to David, who then went beyond Jordan, and there collected force sufficient to oppose Absalom (2 Sam. 17:1-14, 21-24). (6) Anointed king. Absalom was formally anointed king (2 Sam. 19:10), appointed Amasa captain of his host, and crossed over Jordan in pursuit of his father (2 Sam. 17:25, 26). A battle was fought in the wood of Ephraim. The army of Absalom was defeated, twenty thousand were slain, and a still greater number perished in the defiles of the forest. (7) Death. Absalom fled on a swift mule, and, riding through the forest, his long locks became entangled in the boughs of a great terebinth (or oak), and he was left suspended. Joab, being informed of this, hastened to the spot and slew him, notwithstanding David's request that he should be spared. The body was taken down and cast into a pit, over which the people raised a great heap of stones as a mark of abhorrence, a burial which the historian contrasts with the splendid monument prepared by Absalom for himself in the "King's Dale" (2 Sam. 18:1-18), B. C. 967. Absalom had three sons and one daughter, the latter named Tamar (2 Sam. 14:27), who alone survived him (2 Sam. 18:18) and became the mother of Maachah, the wife of Rehoboam (2 Chron. 11:20, 21).

NOTE.—(1) Weight of hair. "At every year's end." Literally, from the end of days to days; i. e., from time to time. Though Absalom's hair was doubtless very heavy, and thus was considered beautiful, the weight given, two hundred shekels, is too much. There is evidently an error in the text (Kell, Com.; 2 Sam. 14:26). (2) After forty years. "This is an error in the text, for David reigned but forty years in all (1 Kings 2:11), and he certainly had reigned many years before Absalom's rebellion. The Syriac and Arabic versions read four years, and with this agrees Josephus" (Whedon, Com.).

ABSTINENCE, a general term signifying to refrain from something or some action. In the ecclesiastical sense it means the refraining from certain kinds of food or drink on certain days.

1. Jewish. The first mention of abstinence in Scripture is found in Gen. 9:4, where the use of blood was forbidden to Noah. The next is in Gen. 32:32: "Therefore the children of Israel eat not of the sinew which shrank, which is upon the hollow of the thigh, unto this day: because he (the angel) touched the hollow of Jacob's thigh in the sinew that shrank." The law confirmed abstinence from blood (Lev. 3:17), and the use even of lawful animals if the manner of their death rendered it likely that they were not properly bled (Exod. 22:31; Deut. 14:21). Whole classes of animals which might not be eaten are given in Lev. 11. See ANIMAL; FOOD. Certain parts of lawful animals, as being sacred to the altar, were forbidden, viz.: the caul (or net covering the liver), the kidneys, and the fat upon them, the fat covering the entrails, also the tail of the "fat-tailed sheep" (Lev. 3:9-11). Everything consecrated to idols was also interdicted (Exod. 34:15). While engaged in their official duties, the priests were commanded to abstain from wine and strong drink (Lev. 10:9), and the Nazarites had to abstain from strong drink and the use of grapes during the whole time of their separation (Num. 6:3). The RECHABITES (q. v.) voluntarily assumed a constant abstinence from wine (Jer. 35:6). The Essenes, a Jewish sect, were very stringent in their abstinence, refusing all pleasant food, eating nothing but coarse bread and drinking only water, while some abstained from all food until evening.

2. Christian. Some among the early Christian converts thought themselves bound by the Mosaical regulations respecting food, and abstained from flesh sacrificed to idols, and from animals accounted unclean by the law. Others considered this a weakness, and boasted of the freedom with which Christ had set them free. Paul discusses this matter in Rom. 14:1-3; 1 Cor. 8, and teaches that everyone was at liberty to act according to his own conscience, but that the stronger should refrain from that which might prove a stumbling-block to his weaker brother. In 1 Tim. 3:3, 4 he reproves certain persons who should forbid marriage and enjoin abstinence from meats. The council of the apostles at Jerusalem limited enforced abstinence upon the converts to that of "meats offered to idols, blood, and things strangled" (Acts 15:29).

In the early Church catechumens were required, according to Cyril and Jerome, to observe a season of abstinence and prayer for forty days; according to others, twenty days. Superstitious abstinence on the part of the clergy was considered a crime, and if that abstinence arose from the notion that any creature of God was not good they were liable to be deposed from office. Strict observance of the Church fasts was enjoined.

ABUSE. See GLOSSARY.

AC'CAD (Heb. אַכַּד, ak-kad', a fortress), the name of a city in Babylonia mentioned in Genesis (Gen. 10:10) as belonging to the kingdom of Nimrod in the country of Shinar. See SHINAR. With it are named Babel, Erech, and Calneh. Erech and Babel are well known in later history, and their sites have not been lost, but the very locations of Accad and of Calneh are still unknown. Accad is probably the city which is known in the early Babylonian inscriptions under the name of Agade. Here in a very early period, by many supposed to be about 3800 B. C., a king named Sargon I held his court and established a powerful kingdom. From Agade Sargon swept westward, conquering as he went, and plundering even to the coasts of the Mediterranean. In early times Accad was coupled with Sumer as the name of a small kingdom known always as the kingdom of Sumer and Accad. How this name arose we do not know. It may be that Accad was also the name of a country round about the city, and that the kingdom had its early location in that territory. However that may be, the name Sumer and Accad was rather a political than a geographical term in its common use in the Babylonian and Assyrian inscriptions. The people who first formed this kingdom were the ancient Sumerians, whose racial connections are not yet known. They were the inventors of the cuneiform system of writing, and laid the basis upon which the whole system of culture of the ancient Babylonians rested. The Sumerians were gradually absorbed by the Semites when they entered the country, and the control of the kingdom of Sumer and Accad passed into their hands. The city of Accad, or Agade, disappeared in ancient times, and nothing is heard of it in the period of Assyrian supremacy. No mention of it is elsewhere made in the Bible. See SUPPLEMENT.—R. W. R.

ACCEPT, Acceptable, Accepted (Heb.

קָבַץ, raw-tsaw', to take pleasure in; Gr. δέχομαι, dekh'-om-ahce, to take with the hand, i. e., to receive with hospitality). To accept is to receive with pleasure and kindness (Gen. 32:20), and is the opposite to reject, which is a direct refusal with disapprobation (Jer. 6:30; 7:29). An accepted or acceptable time (Psa. 69:13; 2 Cor. 6:2) is the time of favor, a favorable opportunity. Luke 4:24 means that no prophet is welcomed, appreciated favorably in his own country. "Neither acceptest thou the person," etc. (οὐ λαμβάνεις πρόσωπον), means that Jesus was not a partisan, given to partiality. See Meyer, Com.; Grimm, Lex.

Acceptance also means that relation to God in which he is well-pleased with his children, for by children of God only is it enjoyed. In Acts 10:35 we learn that "in every nation he that feareth him and worketh righteousness is accepted of him."

The Christian scheme bases acceptance with God on justification. Paul in Eph. 1:6 refers to "the grace" of God, "wherein he hath made us accepted in the beloved." In Christ only are we acceptable to God. Out of him we are sinners and subjects of wrath.

The Calvinist teaches that the sins which are pardoned in justification include all sins, past, present, and future, and that God will not deal with the believer according to his transgressions; whereas the Arminian holds that the state of acceptance can be maintained only by perpetually believing in and appropriating to himself the atoning merits of Jesus, and obediently keeping God's holy commandments.

ACCESS TO GOD (Gr. προσγωγή, pros-ague-ay', act of moving to), that friendly relation with God whereby we are acceptable to him and have assurance that he is favorably disposed toward us (Rom. 5:2; Eph. 2:13; 3:12). In substance it is not different from the "peace of God," i. e., the peaceful relation of believers toward God, brought about through his death. By the continuous power and efficiency of his atoning act, Jesus is the constant Bringer to the Father. Access means the obtaining of a hearing with God, and if a hearing, the securing in some form of an answer to our requests. St. John (1 John 5:14, 15) says: "This is the confidence that we have in him, that, if we ask anything according to his will, he heareth us; and if we know that he hear us, whatsoever we ask, we know that we have the petitions that we desired of him." Here we learn that access to God involves asking according to his will. A child has right of access to his father. Such right and privilege are granted to, and should be enjoyed by, every child of God. We must not infer that our access is cut off if we do not realize direct answers to some of our requests, but believe that God heareth his children always and does for them the best things. See GLOSSARY.

AC'CHO (Heb. אַכּוֹ, ak-ko', sultry or heated sand), a town on the Mediterranean coast, thirty miles south of Tyre, and ten from Mount Carmel (Judg. 1:31). Known to the ancient Greeks and Romans as Ptolemais, from Ptolemy the king of Egypt, who rebuilt it in 100 B. C. During the Middle Ages called Acra, and subsequently called

St. Jean d'Acre. Paul visited this place (Acts 21:7). See PTOLEMAIS.

ACCOUNTABILITY is not a Bible word, but an abstract term for that return for his talents and opportunities which every soul must make to God day by day, and especially at the judgment, as we are taught in Matt. 12:36; Rom. 14:10; Heb. 13:17, and 1 Pet. 4:5. It is a well-established doctrine of holy Scripture, attested to by the human consciousness, that we are free moral agents, entirely dependent upon our Creator for our existence and maintenance, and rightly answerable to him for our conduct; and that God consequently has a right to our perfect obedience and service. It is accordingly easy for us to feel that he is justified in calling us to a strict reckoning for all he has intrusted us with. Disabled by our fall into sin, gracious strength has been provided for us in the atonement, so that we are without excuse if we fail to do God's will.

Aceldama, "The Potter's Field."

ACCURSED. See ANATHHEMA, BAN, OATH.

ACCUSER (Heb. לִשְׁטָן, law-shan', to lick, to use the tongue; in the New Testament, κατηγορος, kat-ay'-gor-os, prosecutor).

1. One who has a cause or matter of contention; the accuser, opponent, or plaintiff in any suit (Judg. 12:2; Matt. 5:25; Luke 12:58).

2. In Scripture, in a general sense, an adversary or enemy (Luke 18:3; 1 Pet. 5:8). In the latter passage reference is made to the old Jewish opinion that Satan was the accuser or calumniator of men before God (Job 1:6, sq.; Rev. 12:10). See ADVERSARY.

ACELDAMA (Gr. Ἀκελδამά, ak-el-dam-ah'), called at present Hak ed-damm. It signifies field of blood, once called the "Potter's Field" (Matt. 27:8; Acts 1:18, 19). Now at the east end and on the southern slope of the valley of Hinnom. The tradition which fixes this spot reaches back to the age of Jerome. Once the tradition was that the soil of this spot, a deep pit or cellar, was believed to have the power of consuming dead bodies in the space of twenty-four hours, so that whole shiploads of it are said to have been carried away in A. D. 1218, in order to cover the famous Campo Santo in Pisa.

ACHAIA (Gr. Ἀχαΐα, ach-ah-ee'-ah, grief, trouble; derivation not certain), the name once applied to the northwest portion of the Peloponnesus. It was afterward applied to the entire Peloponnesus, called now the Morea. It was one of the two provinces, of which Macedonia was the other, into which the Romans divided Greece. It was under a proconsular government at the time when Luke wrote the Acts of the Apostles, so that the title given to Gallio, "deputy," was proper (Acts 18:12).

ACHAÏCUS (Gr. Ἀχαϊκός, ach-ah-ee-kos', an Achaean), a Christian of Corinth who had rendered Paul personal aid, and by him was kindly commended to the Corinthian church (1 Cor. 16:17), A. D. 54.

A'CHAN (Heb. אַחָאן, aw-kahn', troublesome), a son of Carmi, of the tribe of Judah; called also Achar (1 Chron. 2:7).

Personal History. (1) Achan's sin. By one incident of his life Achan attained a disgraceful notoriety. Jericho, before it was taken, was put under that awful ban, whereby all the inhabitants (excepting Rahab and her family) were devoted to destruction; all the combustible goods to be burned, and the metals consecrated to God (Deut. 7:16, 23-26; Josh. 6:17-19). After Jericho fell (B. C. 1170) the whole nation kept the vow of devotement, with the exception of Achan. His covetousness made him unfaithful, and, the opportunity presenting, he took a goodly Babylonish garment, two hundred shekels of silver, and an ingot of gold of fifty shekels' weight (Josh. 7:21). (2) Result of Achan's sin. Ai had been visited by spies, who declared that it could easily be taken. An expedition of three thousand men, sent against the city, was repulsed, and returned to Joshua, who inquired of the Lord concerning the cause of the disaster. The answer was that "Israel had sinned, . . . for they have even taken of the accursed thing, and have also stolen, and dissembled also, and they have put it even among their own stuff" (Josh. 7:11). This was the reason for Israel's defeat; and Joshua was commanded to sanctify the people, and on the morrow to cast lots for the offender. Achan was chosen, and, being exhorted by Joshua, made a confession of his guilt; which was verified by the finding of the spoil in his tent. (3) Achan's punishment. Achan was conveyed, with his family, property, and spoils, to the valley (afterward called Achor, trouble), where they "stoned him with stones, and burned them with fire" (Josh. 7:25).

NOTE.—(1) Objection has been urged against the use of the lot to discover the guilty party. We answer that the decision by lot, when ordered by God, involved no chance, but was under his special direction, as is evident from the expression, "Which the Lord taketh" (Josh. 7:14); "The lot is cast into the lap, but the whole disposing thereof is of the Lord" (Prov. 16:33). (2) The severity of the punishment of Achan, as regards his family, has excited considerable comment. Some vindicate it by saying that Achan, by his sin, had fallen under the ban pronounced against Jericho, and was exposed to the same punishment as a town which had fallen away into idolatry (Deut. 13:16, 17); others believe that the family of Achan were privy to his crime, and therefore were deserving of a share in his punishment (K. and D., Com.); others, again, consider it as the result of one of those sudden impulses of indiscriminate popular vengeance to which the Jewish people were exceedingly prone (Kitto).

A'CHAR (Heb. אַחָר, aw-kawr', trouble), another form of the name Achan, and given to that person in 1 Chron. 2:7.

A'CHAZ (Matt. 1:9), elsewhere ΑΧΑΖ (q. v.).

1. The father of Baal-hanan, the seventh Edomitic king, mentioned in Gen. 36:38, 39.

2. The son of Michaiiah, and one of the courtiers whom Josiah sent to Huldah to inquire the course to be pursued respecting the newly discovered book of the law (2 Kings 22:12, 14), B. C. 624. In the parallel passage (2 Chron. 34:20) he is called Abdon the son of Micah. He is doubtless the same person whose son, Elnathan, was courtier of Jehoiakim (Jer. 26:22; 36:12).

A'CHIM (perhaps the same word as Jachin, whom God makes firm), the son of Sadoc, and father of Eleazar, among the paternal ancestors of Christ (Matt. 1:14), B. C. after 410.

A'CHISE (Heb. אַכִּישׁ, aw-keesh', perhaps angry), probably a general title of royalty, like A-MELECH (q. v.), another Philistine kingly name, with which, indeed, it is interchanged in the title of Psa. 34.

1. A Philistine king of Gath with whom David sought refuge from Saul (1 Sam. 21:10-15). The servants of Achish soon recognized David as the successful champion of Israel against Goliath, and he only escaped by pretending madness, "well knowing that the insane were held inviolable, as smitten but protected by the Deity" (De Rothschild, Hist. of Israel). The same person is likely meant by Achish, to whom David again repaired. Achish received him kindly, probably considering their common enmity against Saul as a strong bond of union. After living awhile at Gath, David received from Achish the town of Ziklag for a possession (1 Sam. 27:2-6). He made numerous forays against the neighboring nomads, which he persuaded Achish were as much in his interest as his own (1 Sam. 27:8-12). Achish still had great confidence in David, and he proposed making him chief of his bodyguard (1 Sam. 28:1, 2). He took David and his men with him when he went up to the battle which sealed the fate of Saul, but was led to dismiss them by the jealousy and opposition of the Philistine leaders. Thus David was spared from participating in the battle (1 Sam. 29:2-11), B. C. about 999.

2. Another king of Gath, the son of Maachab, to whom two servants of Shimei fled. Shimei went to reclaim them, and thus, by leaving Jerusalem, broke his parole and met his death (1 Kings 2:39, 40), B. C. 957.

ACH'METHA (Heb. אַחְמֵתָא, akh-methaw', a station, fortress), the capital of northern Media. The classical name is Ecbatana. Cyrus held his court here. It is stated (Ezra 6:2) that here was found in the palace a roll upon which was the decree of Cyrus for the rebuilding of the temple at Jerusalem.

A'CHOR (Heb. אַחֹר, aw-kore', trouble), now called Wady-el-Kelt. Its name resulted from the sin and consequent punishment of Achan (Josh. 7:24-26). The valley ran up from Gilgal toward Beth-el. The term "valley of Achor" was proverbial, and the expression of the prophet (Hos. 2:15), "the valley of Achor, a door of hope," is still more suggestive of the good results of discipline.

ACH'SA, a less correct mode (1 Chron. 2:49) of anglicizing the name ΑΧΣΑΗ (q. v.).

ACH'SAH (Heb. אַכְסָה, ak-saw', anklet), the name of Caleb's daughter (1 Chron. 2:49). Caleb offered her in marriage to the man who should capture the city of Debir, B. C. 1162. His own nephew, Othniel, won the prize, and on her way to her future home she asked of her father an addition to her dower of lands. She received the valley full of springs situated near to Debir. Her request was probably secured the more readily as it was considered ungracious to refuse a daughter under such circumstances (Josh. 15:16, 17; Judg. 1:12, 13).

ACH'SHAPH (Heb. אַכְשָׁפ, ak-shawf', fascination). Identified with the modern ruins of Kesaf or Yasif, northeast of Accho. It belonged to Asher (Josh. 19:25).

ACH'ZIB (Heb. אַחְזִיב, ak-zeeb', falsehood, deceit), a town of Asher (Josh. 19:29; Judg. 1:31), identical with es-Zib, about ten miles north of Accho.

The town of the same name in Judah (Josh. 15:44; Mic. 1:14) is probably the same as Che-zib (Gen. 38:5).

ACKNOWLEDGE, Acknowledgment (Gr. ἐπίγνωσις, ep-ig'-no-sis, precise and correct knowledge), used in the New Testament of the knowledge of things ethical and divine; of God, especially the knowledge of his holy will and of the blessings which he has bestowed and constantly bestows through Christ (Eph. 1:17; Col. 1:10; 2 Pet. 1:2); of Christ, i. e., the true knowledge of Christ's nature, dignity, benefits (Eph. 4:13; 2 Pet. 1:3; 2:20). Grimm, Lex., s. v.

ACRE (Heb. אֲכָר, tseh'-med, a yoke) is given as the translation of the Hebrew word which is used as a measure of land, i. e., so much as a yoke of oxen can plow in a day (1 Sam. 14:14; Isa. 5:10).

ACROSTIC (Gr. ἀκρον, ak'-ron, extremity, and στίχος, stikh'-os, verse), an ode in which the first, the first and last, or certain other letters of the lines taken in order, spell a name or sentence. They are not found in this form in the Bible. In the poetical parts of the Old Testament are what may be called alphabetical acrostics; e. g., Psa. 119 has as many stanzas or strophes as there are letters in the Hebrew alphabet. Each strophe has eight lines, each beginning with the same letter, the first eight lines beginning with א, Aleph, the next with ב, Beth, and so on. Psa.

25 and 34 have one verse to each letter in its order. In others, as Psa. 111, 112, each verse is divided into two parts following the alphabet. The Lamentations of Jeremiah are mostly acrostic, and the last chapter of Proverbs has the initial letters of its last twenty-two verses in alphabetical order. The term acrostic is used to describe a mode of performing the psalmody of the ancient Church. A precentor began a verse and the people joined him at the close. The following illustrates:

Jesus, who for me hast borne
E very sorrow, pain, and scorn,
S tanding at man's judgment seat,
U njust judgment there to meet:
S ave me by thy mercy sweet, etc.

The acrostic was also commonly used for epitaphs. But the most famous of all ancient acrostics is the one used by ancient Christians as a secret symbol of the faith. This is the Greek word Ἰχθῦς, ichthys, fish, formed from the initial letters of five titles of our Lord, "Jesus Christ, God's Son, Saviour."

Ἰησοῦς... I ἔσους.
Χριστὸς... CH ριστός.
Θεός... TH εός.
Υἱός... U ἰός.
Σωτήρ... S οτήρ.

ACTS, Book of. SEE BIBLE.

AD'ADAH (Heb. אַדְאָדָה, ad-aw-daw', festival), a place in Palestine, in the southern part of Judah (Josh. 15:22).

A'DAH (Heb. אַדָּה, aw-daw', ornament, beauty).

1. One of the two wives of Lamech, and mother of Jabal and Jubal (Gen. 4:19-23), B. C. about 3875.

2. Daughter of Elon the Hittite, the first of the three wives of Esau, and mother of Eliphaz (Gen. 36:2, 4, 10, 12, 16). She is elsewhere (Gen. 36:34) confounded with Bashemath.

ADATAH (Heb. אַדָּתָה, ad-aw-yaw', whom Je-kovah adorns).

1. A native of Boscath (Bozkath, in the valley of Judah, Josh. 15:39), and father of Jedidah, the mother of Josiah, king of Judah (2 Kings 22:1), the latter born B. C. 632.

2. The son of Ethni and father of Zerah, of the Levitical family of Gershon, in the ancestry of Asaph, the celebrated musician (1 Chron. 6:41). Probably the same with Iddo (v. 21).

3. A son of Shinhî, and one of the chief Ben-amites resident in Jerusalem before the captivity (1 Chron. 8:21), B. C. before 586.

4. A priest, son of Jeroham, who, after the return from Babylon, was employed in the work of the sanctuary (1 Chron. 9:12; Neh. 11:12).

5. Father of Maaseiah, who was one of the "captains of hundreds" during the protectorate of Jehoiada (2 Chron. 23:1).

6. A "son of Bani," an Israelite who divorced his Gentile wife after the captivity (Ezra 10:29).

7. Another of the sons of Bani (probably not the same Bani) who put away his Gentile wife (Ezra 10:39).

8. Son of Joiarib and father of Hazaiah, of the tribe of Judah (Neh. 11:5), some of whose posterity dwelt in Jerusalem after the captivity, B. C. 445.

ADA'LIA (Heb. אַדְאִיָּה, ad-al-yaw', probably of Persian origin), one of the ten sons of Haman, the enemy of the Jews. He was slain by the Jews under the royal edict at Shushan (Esth. 9:8), B. C. probably 477.

AD'AM. I. The first man.—1. Name and Family. (Heb. אָדָם, aw-dawm', red; hence adamah, the ground.) The first man and "son of God" (Luke 3:38) by special creation. The name which God gave him (Gen. 5:2) is founded upon the earthly side of his being: Adam from adamah, earth, the earthly element, to guard him from self-exaltation; not from the red color of his body, since this is not a distinctive characteristic of man, but common to him and to many other creatures (K. and D., Com., 2:7).

2. Personal History. (1) Creation. In the first nine chapters of Genesis there appear to be three distinct histories relating more or less to the life of Adam. The first (1:1-2:3) records the creation; the second (2:4-4:26) gives an account of paradise, the original sin of man, and the immediate posterity of Adam; the third (5:1-9:29) contains mainly the history of Noah, referring to Adam and his descendants principally in relation to that patriarch. "The Almighty formed man out of the dust of the earth, breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, and man became a living soul" (2:7).

(2) In Eden. He gave him dominion over all the lower creatures (1:26), and placed him in Eden that he might cultivate it and enjoy its fruits (2:15, 16). The beasts of the field and the birds of the air were brought to Adam, who examined them and gave them names. This examination gave him an opportunity of developing his intellectual capacity, and also led to this result, that there was not found a helpmeet for man.

(3) Creation of Eve. "And the Lord God caused a deep sleep to fall upon Adam, and he slept; and he took one of his ribs, and closed up the flesh instead thereof. And the rib, which the Lord God had taken from man, made he a woman, and brought her unto the man."

The design of God in the creation of the woman is perceived by Adam when she is brought to him by God, and he said, "This is now bone of my bones, and flesh of my flesh: she shall be called Woman, because she was taken out of man." Thus we find Adam appointed Lord of the earth and its inhabitants, endowed with everything requisite for the development of his nature and the fulfillment of his destiny. In the fruit of the trees he found sustenance; in "the tree of life," preservation from death; in "the tree of knowledge," a positive law for the training of his moral nature; in the care of the garden, exercise of his physical strength; in the animal and vegetable kingdom, a capacious region for the development of his intellect; and in the woman, a suitable companion and help.

"The first man was a true man, with the powers of a man and the innocence of a child." (4) Fall. But Eve, having been beguiled by the tempter to eat of the forbidden fruit, persuaded her husband to do the same. When called to judgment before God, Adam blamed his wife, who in turn blamed the tempter. God punished the tempter by degradation and dread, the woman by painful travail and submission (see EVE), and the man by a life of labor. With the loss of innocence came a feeling of shame, and they sought to hide their nakedness with leaves, but were afterward taught of God to make clothing of the skins of animals. Adam and Eve were expelled from the garden, at the eastern side of which cherubim and a sword of flame turning every way were placed. The object of these were to guard the way of the tree of life (q. v.), and prevent Adam's return to it (Gen. 3). (5) Subsequent history. It is not known how long Adam lived in Eden, and therefore we cannot determine the length of his life after the expulsion. Shortly after leaving Eden, Eve gave birth to Cain (Gen. 4:1). Scripture gives the names of only three sons of Adam—Cain, Abel, and Seth—but contains an allusion (Gen. 5:4) to "sons and daughters." He died B. C. perhaps 3074, aged nine hundred and thirty years.

3. Figurative. Paul declares that Adam was a type of Christ, "the figure of him that was to come" (Rom. 5:14); hence our Lord is sometimes called the second Adam. This typical relation stands sometimes in likeness, sometimes in contrast. In likeness: Adam was formed immediately by God, as was the human nature of Christ; in each the nature was holy; both were invested with dominion over the earth and its creatures (see Psa. 8). In contrast: Adam and Christ were each a federal head to the whole race of mankind, but the one was the fountain of sin and death, the other of righteousness and life (Rom. 5:14-19); Adam communicated a living soul to all his posterity, Christ is a quickening Spirit to restore life and immortality to them (1 Cor. 15:45).

NOTE.—Many questions of deep interest and of difficult solution arise in connection with our first parents. And yet it is wise for us to accept the scriptural account as a literal statement of facts, and dismiss the rationalistic theories and speculations to which it has given rise. (1) Antiquity of Man. The Scriptures seem to teach that man has been in existence about sixty centuries, and his creation an act of the personal God. There are many who maintain a much greater antiquity for man, and his descent from the lower order of animals, and they from inorganic matter. Faith, however, against all this opposition, has no reason as yet to feel ashamed of its confession that in the creation of man, a new, a separate, word has here been spoken by the Almighty Creator. "The descent of man from apes cannot be demonstrated, either from history, since nowhere is there a record that during thousands of years one beast has developed itself into a man; or from natural science, since it cannot show the indispensable links by means of which the transition from beast to man is explicable" (Van Oosterzee, Dog., vol. i, p. 382). (2) Unity of the Human Race. This question has given rise to much discussion of late. "Did the Almighty Creator produce only one man and one woman, from whom all other human beings are descended? or did he create several human pairs, from whom distinct stocks of men have been derived?" Deltzsch has given this admirable summary of the proofs of unity: "That the races of men are not species of one genus, but varieties of one species, is confirmed by the agreement in the physiological and pathological phenomena in them all, by the similarity in the anatomical structure, in the fundamental powers, traits of the mind, in the limits to the duration of life, in the normal temperature of the body and the average rate of pulsation, in the duration of pregnancy, and in the unrestricted fruitfulness of marriages between the various races" (K. and D. Com., Gen. 2:18-25). See DEATH.

II. A town near the Jordan, and beside Zaretan (Josh. 2:16). All traces of the city are gone. Van de Velde is inclined to identify the town Zaretan with Kurn Surtabeh, and find both names in 1 Kings 7:46, which he would render, "The king cast them (the vessels, etc., of the temple) at Adam, between Succoth and Zarthan." Here the waters miraculously rose in a heap while the Israelites crossed the river Jordan.

AD'AMAH (Heb. אֲדָמָה, ad-aw-maw', earth, ground), a fenced city of Naphtali (Josh. 19:36), probably the same as Adami (Josh. 19:33). The modern Damieh.

ADAMANT. See MINERAL KINGDOM.

AD'AMI (Heb. אֲדָמִי, ad-aw-mee', earthy, Josh. 19:33), a place in Palestine, near the border of Naphtali. Rosenmüller, Keil, and others join Adami with the following name Nekeb. Keil renders the two "Adami of the pass;" and it is supposed by Knobel to be Deir-el-ahmar, i. e., red cloister, a place still inhabited, three hours N. W. of Baalbec, on the pass from the cedars to Baalbec.

ADAR, the sixth month of the civil and last of the ecclesiastical Jewish year. See TIME.

AD'BEEL (Heb. אֲדִבְעֵל, ad-beh-ale', disciplined of God), the third-named of the twelve sons of Ishmael (Gen. 25:13; 1 Chron. 1:29).

ADDAN (Heb. אֲדָדָן, ad-dawn'), another form (Ezra 2:59) of the name (Neh. 7:61) ADDON (q. v.).

AD'DAR (Heb. אֲדָר, ad-dawr', thrashing floor, or wide, open place), a son of Bela and grandson of Benjamin (1 Chron. 8:3), elsewhere (Gen. 46:21) called Ard.

ADDER, the rendering in the A. V. of four Hebrew words, each of which probably signifies some kind of venomous serpent. See ANIMAL KINGDOM.

AD'DI (Gr. 'Ađdi, ad-dee', for Heb. אָדִי, Adi, ornament), the son of Cosam and father of Melchi, in the maternal ancestry of Jesus (Luke 3:28).

ADDICT. See GLOSSARY.

AD'DON (Heb. אֲדֹנָי, ad-done', powerful), the name of the second of three persons (Neh. 7:61) who, on returning from the captivity to Palestine, were unable to "show their father's house, nor their seed, whether they were of Israel," B. C. 536. In Ezra 2:59, he is called Addan. Kitto and others think this the name of a place.

A'DER (Heb. אֲדָר, eh'-der, a flock), a chief Benjaminite, son of Beriah, resident at Jerusalem (1 Chron. 8:15).

A'DIEL (Heb. אֲדִיֵּל, ad-ee-ale', ornament of God).

1. One of the family heads of the tribe of Simeon, who seem to have dispossessed the aborigines of Gedor (1 Chron. 4:36).

2. A priest, son of Jahzerah and father of Maasai, which last was very active in reconstructing the temple after the captivity (1 Chron. 9:12), B. C. 536.

3. The father of Azmaveth, which latter was treasurer under David (1 Chron. 27:28).

ADIN (Heb. אֲדִין, av-deen', effeminate).

1. The head of one of the Israelitish families, of which a large number returned with Zerubbabel to Jerusalem from Babylon, B. C. 536. The number is given, in Ezra 2:15, as four hundred and fifty-four; in Neh. 7:20, as six hundred and fifty-five, the discrepancy being occasioned by an error in the hundreds and the including or excluding of himself (M'C. and S., Cyc., s. v.). Fifty more of the family returned (with Ebed, the son of Jonathan) under Ezra (Ezra 8:6), B. C. 457.

2. One of those who sealed the covenant made by Nehemiah and the people after their return to Jerusalem (Neh. 10:16), B. C. about 445.

ADINA (Heb. אֲדִנָּה, ad-ec-naw', slender, delicate), the son of Shiza, a Reubenite, captain of thirty of his tribesmen—one of David's mighty men (1 Chron. 11:42), B. C. before 1000.

ADINO (Heb. אֲדִינוֹ, ad-ee-no', slender, as a spear), the name given, in 2 Sam. 23:8, as one of David's mighty men. Much difference of opinion respecting it exists. Some think the passage has been corrupted. "It is clear that these words 'Adino the Ezmite' are not proper names, although their grammatical construction is not very easy" (M'C. and S., Cyc., s. v.). See also the parallel passage (1 Chron. 11:11).

ADITHAIM (Heb. אֲדִיתַיִם, ad-ee-thuh'-yim, double prey, Josh. 15:36), a place in Palestine, but location unknown.

ADJURATION (Heb. אֲדָוָה, av-law', in Hiph., to cause to swear, in 1 Kings 8:31; 2 Chron. 6:22, טָבַע, shuv-bah', to make swear; Gr. ἐξορκίζω, ex-or-kid'-zo, to exact an oath).

1. An act or appeal whereby a person in authority imposes upon another the obligation of speaking or acting as if under the solemnity of an oath (1 Sam. 14:24; Josh. 6:26; 1 Kings 22:16; 2 Chron. 18:15). In the New Testament we have an example of this where the high priest calls upon Jesus to avow his character as the Messiah (Matt. 26:63; compare Mark 5:7). Such an oath, although imposed upon one without his consent, was binding in the highest degree; and when connected with a question, made an answer compulsory.

2. In Acts 19:13, the term occurs with reference to the expulsion of demons.

3. In the Roman Catholic Church, the use of the name of God, or of some holy thing, to induce one to do what is required of him.

AD'LAI (Heb. אֲדָלַי, ad-lah'-ee, just), the father of Shaphat, which latter was a chief herdsman under David (1 Chron. 27:29), B. C. after 1000.

AD'MAH (Heb. אֲדָמָה, ad-maw', red earth), a city in the vale of Siddim (Gen. 10:19), destroyed with Sodom (Gen. 19:24; Deut. 29:23). Supposed by some to be identical with the Adam of Josh. 3:16.

AD'MATHA (Heb. אֲדָמָתָה, ad-maw'-thaw', perhaps earthy, dark-colored), the third-named of the princes or courtiers of Ahasuerus (Esth. 1:14), B. C. about 519.

ADMINISTRATION (Gr. διακονία, dee-ak-on-ee'-ah, service), in the New Testament signifies "to relieve," "to minister," as in 2 Cor. 9:12.

ADMIRATION. See GLOSSARY.

AD'NA (Heb. אֲדָנָה, ad-naw', pleasure).

1. An Israelite of the family of Pahath-moab, who divorced his Gentile wife after the captivity (Ezra 10:30).

2. A chief priest, son of Harim, and contemporary with Joiakim (Neh. 12:15), B. C. about 536

AD'NAH (Heb. אֲדָנָה, ad-naw', pleasure).

1. One of the captains of the tribe of Manasseh who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron. 12:20), B. C. before 1000.

2. A warrior of the tribe of Judah, and principal general under Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. 17:14), B. C. about 863.

ADO'NI-BE'ZEK (Heb. אֲדוֹנִי-בְּזֶק, ad-o'-nee-beh'-zek, lord of Bezek), king or lord of Bezek, a city of the Canaanites. He had subdued seventy of the petty kings around him, and, after having cut off their thumbs and great toes, compelled them to gather their food under his table. At the head of the Canaanites and Perizzites he opposed the men of Judah and Simeon, and, being defeated, was served in the same manner as he had treated his own captives, B. C. about 1145. He died of his wounds at Jerusalem, whither he was carried by his captors (Judg. 1:5-7).

ADONIJAH (Heb. אֲדוֹנִיָּהוּ, ad-o-nee-yaw', my lord is Jehovah).

1. The fourth son of David and second by Hagith, born in Hebron while his father reigned over Judah only (2 Sam. 3:4), B. C. about 1003. According to oriental usages Adonijah might have considered his claim superior to that of his eldest brother, Amnon, who was born while his father was in a private station; but not to that of Absalom, who was not only his elder brother, and born while his father was a king, but was of royal descent on the side of his mother. When Amnon and Absalom were dead Adonijah became heir apparent to the throne. But this order had been set aside in favor of Solomon, who was born while his father was king over all Israel. (1) Anointed king. Adonijah aspired to the throne, prepared a guard of chariots and horsemen and fifty foot runners, and gained over to his side Joab and Abiathar, the priest. He was also a man of handsome appearance and likely to win the people. Waiting until David seemed to be at the point of death, he called around him his brothers (excepting Solomon) and other influential men, and was proclaimed king at Zohelath. The plot was defeated by the prompt action of the aged king, who, through the influence of Nathan and Bath-sheba, caused Solomon to be proclaimed king and to be anointed by Zadok, the priest. (2) Pardoned. Adonijah fled for refuge to the altar, which he refused to leave until pardoned by Solomon. He received pardon, but was told that a future attempt of the same kind would be fatal to him (1 Kings 1:5-53). (3) Death. Some time after David's death he covertly asserted his claim in asking for ABISHAG (q. v.) (the virgin widow of his father in marriage. Adonijah was immediately put to death by the order of Solomon (1 Kings 2:23-25), B. C. 960. The execution of Adonijah by Solomon must not be judged of by the standards of the present day. According to the custom of Eastern princes, a thousand years before Christ, Solomon would probably have slain all his brothers upon ascending the throne, whereas we learn of the death of Adonijah alone, and that only after his second treasonable attempt.

2. One of the Levites sent by King Jehoshaphat to assist in teaching the law to the people of Judah (2 Chron. 17:8), B. C. after 875.

3. A chief Israelite after the captivity (Neh. 10:16), probably the same elsewhere (Ezra 2:13; 8:13; Neh. 7:18) called ADONIKAM (q. v.).

ADONIKAM, many ADONIKAM (Heb. אֲדוֹנִיכָם, ad-o-nee-kawm', whom the Lord sets up, or lord of the enemy), one whose descendants, to the number of six hundred and sixty-six, returned to Jerusalem with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:13), B. C. 536. He himself is included in Neh. 7:18. Somewhat later three of his immediate descendants, with sixty male followers, came with Ezra (Ezra 8:13), B. C. 458. He appears (from the identity of the associated names) to have been the Adonijah who joined in the religious covenant of Nehemiah (Neh. 10:16).

ADONIRAM (Heb. אֲדוֹנִירָם, ad-o-nee-rawm', lord of height, i. e., high lord), the son of Abda, and receiver-general of the imposts in the reigns of David, Solomon, and Rehoboam (1 Kings 4:6). During his extended term of office he rendered both himself and the tribute so odious to the people, in sustaining the immense public works of Solomon, that when Rehoboam rashly sent him to enforce the collection of the taxes the exasperated populace rose upon him and stoned him to death. This was the signal for the revolt under Jeroboam (1 Kings 12:18), B. C. 930. Adoniram is called, by contraction, Adoram (2 Sam. 20:24; 1 Kings 12:18) and Hadoram (2 Chron. 10:18).

ADONI-ZEDEK (Heb. אֲדוֹנִי־זֶדֶק, ad-o'-nee-tsek'-dek, lord of justice, i. e., just lord), the king of Jerusalem when the Israelites invaded Palestine (Josh. 10:1), B. C. 1170. After Jericho and Ai were taken, and the Gibeonites had succeeded in forming a treaty with the Israelites, Adoni-zedek induced the Amorite kings of Hebron, Jarmuth, Lachish, and Eglon to join him in a confederacy against the enemy. They began operations by besieging the Gibeonites, who sent to Joshua for help. Joshua marched all night from Gilgal, and, falling unexpectedly upon the besiegers, put them to utter rout. The five kings took refuge in a cave at Makkedah, but were detected, and the cave's mouth was closed by placing huge stones against it. When the Israelites returned from the pursuit the cave was opened and the kings taken out. The chief men of Israel then set their feet upon the necks of the prostrate monarchs—an ancient mark of triumph. The five kings were then slain, and their bodies hung on trees until evening, when, as the law forbade a longer exposure of the dead (Deut. 21:23), they were taken down and cast into the cave, the mouth of which was filled up with large stones, which remained long after (Josh. 10:1-27). In considering the severe treatment of these kings we must remember that the war was one of extermination, and that the war usage of the Jews was neither better nor worse than those of the people with whom they fought. See SUPPLEMENT.

ADOPTION (Gr. viótesia, hwee-oth-es-ee'-ah, the placing as a son), the admission of a person to some or all of the privileges of natural kinship. As the practice of adoption was confined almost exclusively to sons—the case of Esther being an exception—it probably had its origin in the natural desire for male offspring. This would be especially true where force, rather than well-observed laws, decided the possession of estates.

1. Among the Hebrews. Abraham speaks of Eliezer (Gen. 15:3), a houseborn slave, as his heir, having, probably, adopted him as his son. Jacob adopted his grandsons, Ephraim and Manasseh, to be counted as his sons (Gen. 48:6), thus enabling him to bestow, through them, a double portion upon his favorite son Joseph. Sometimes a man without a son would marry his daughter to a freed slave, the children being accounted her father's; or the husband himself would be adopted as a son (1 Chron. 2:34). Most of the early instances of adoption mentioned in the Bible were the acts of women who, because of barrenness, gave their female slaves to their husbands, with the intention of adopting any children they might have. Thus Sarah gave Hagar to Abraham, and the son (Ishmael) was considered as the child of Abraham and Sarah (Gen. 16:1, sq.). The childless Rachel gave her maid, Bilhah, to her husband (Gen. 30:1-7), and was imitated by Leah (Gen. 30:9-13). In such cases the sons were regarded as fully equal in the right of heritage with those by the legitimate wife.

2. Among the Romans. Adoption was a familiar social phenomenon, and its initial ceremonies and incidents occupied a large and important place in their laws. By adoption an entire stranger in blood became a member of the family in a higher sense than some of the family kin, than emancipated sons, or descendants through females. Such a one assumed the family name, engaged in its sacrificial rites, and became, not by sufferance or at will, but to all intents and purposes, a member of the house of his adoption. The tie thus formed could only be broken through the ceremony of emancipation, and formed as complete a barrier to intermarriage as relationship by blood. At Rome there were two kinds of adoption, both requiring the adopter to be a male and childless: arrogatio and adoption proper. The former could only take place where the person to be adopted was independent (sui juris) and his adopter had no prospect of male offspring. The adopted one became, in the eyes of the law, a new creature. He was born again into a new family. This custom was doubtless referred to by Paul (Rom. 8:14-16).

The ceremony of adoption took place in the presence of seven witnesses. The fictitious sale and resale, and the final "vindication" or claim, were accompanied by the legal formula, and might mean the sale of a son into slavery or his adoption into a new family, according to the words used. The touch of the festuca or ceremonial wand might be accompanied by the formula, "I claim this man as my son," or "I claim this man as my slave." It was the function of the witnesses, upon occasion, to testify that the transaction was in truth the adoption of the child.

3. Greek. At Athens adoption took place either in the lifetime of the adopter or by will; or if a man died childless and intestate, the state interfered to bring into his house the man next entitled by the Attic law of inheritance, as heir and adopted son. If there were daughters, one of them was usually betrothed to the adopted son. If after that a male heir was born, he and the adopted son had equal rights.

4. The custom of adoption still prevails in the East among the Turks, Greeks, and Armenians. This is done in order to have an heir to the estate, and implies the renouncing of all claim to the child by its parents. Among the Mohammedans the ceremony of adoption is sometimes performed by causing the adopted one to pass through the shirt of the adopter. Something like this may have been the action of Elijah when he threw his mantle on Elisha (1 Kings 19:19).

ADOPTION.—Theological. This term as used in a theological sense commonly denotes that act of God by which he restores penitent and believing men to their privileges as members of the divine family, and makes them heirs of heaven.

1. Theology owes its use of the word adoption in this way to the apostle Paul. He is the only Scripture writer who employs the term thus translated. The passages in Paul's writings in which the doctrine of adoption is stated in connection with the use of that term are Rom. 8:15-17; Gal. 4:4-6; Eph. 1:5. These are not by any means, however, the only passages in his writings in which the essential thought is plainly declared (2 Cor. 6:18). And more generally speaking this may be said to be one of the doctrines upon which the New Testament lays special stress. That we who have forfeited and lost our place and privileges as children of God may be fully reinstated therein was one of the great teachings of Jesus Christ. For that the parable of the prodigal son was spoken.

Adoption, it appears, taking the Scripture teachings as a whole, while not the same as our justification, is necessarily connected therewith, as forgiveness would be empty without restoration to the privileges forfeited by sin. Adoption and Regeneration also are two terms closely related, as they represent two phases of the same fact, regeneration meaning the reproduction of the filial character, and adoption the restoration of the filial privilege. See JUSTIFICATION, REGENERATION.

2. The word adoption is also used by the apostle Paul with reference to the full and final outcome of salvation, the complete "manifestation of the sons of God" and perfect investiture with all their heavenly privileges, for which Christians must wait. So he writes of waiting "for the manifestation of the sons of God," and "waiting for the adoption, to wit, the redemption of our body" (Rom. 8:19, 23).

3. Another use of this word by the same apostle is in Rom. 9:4, where he speaks of the Israelites "to whom pertaineth the adoption." By this is meant the special place that was given to Israel among the nations as the chosen people of God.—E. M'C.

ADORA'TM (Heb. אֲדוֹרָתִים, ad-oral'-yim, double mound), a town, doubtless in the S. W. of Judah, since it is enumerated among the cities fortified by Rehoboam (2 Chron. 11:9). It is met with in 1 Macc. 13:20 as an Idumean city, Ἄδωρα, and so also frequently in Josephus. It was taken by Hyrcanus. Robinson has identified it with the present Dûra, a village about seven and one half miles to the westward of Hebron.

ADORA'M (Heb. אֲדוֹרָאִים, ad-oral'-m), an officer in charge of the tribute (2 Sam. 20:24; 1 Kings 12:18), elsewhere called ADONIRAM (q. v.).

ADORATION, in its true sense, is the act of paying honors to a divine being. In the Scriptures various forms of adoration are mentioned; e. g., putting off the shoes (Exod. 3:5; Josh. 5:15), bowing the knee (Gen. 41:43; 43:26; Dan. 2:46), kissing (Psa. 2:12; Luke 7:38). The passage, "If I had beheld the sun when it shined, or the moon walking in brightness; and my heart had been secretly enticed, or my mouth had kissed my hand: this also were an iniquity to be punished by the judge" (Job 31:26-28), clearly intimates that kissing the hand was considered an overt act of worship in the East. In the same manner respect was shown to kings and other persons of exalted station. "Laying the hand upon the mouth" (Job 21:5; 29:9; Psa. 39:9) implied the highest degree of reverence and submission.

ADORN (Gr. κοσμέω, kos-meh'-o, to ornament), to embellish with honor, gain; followed by participle designating the act by which the honor is gained (Tit. 2:10; 1 Pet. 3:5).

ADRAM MELECH (Heb. אֲדָרָם מֶלֶךְ, ad-ram-meh'-lek, splendor of the king).

1. A son of Sennacherib, king of Assyria. The king was dwelling at Nineveh after his disastrous expedition against Hezekiah. While worshipping in the house of Nisroch, his god, Sennacherib was murdered by Adrammelech and his brother Shareza, B. C. 681. Having accomplished the crime, the two brothers fled into Armenia (2 Kings 19:36, 37; Isa. 37:38).

2. The name of an Avite god (2 Kings 17:31). See GODS, FALSE.

ADRAMYT'TIUM (Gr. Ἀδραμυττῆνος, ad-ram-oot-tay-nos, the mansion of death), a seaport of Mysia, in Asia Minor (Acts 27:2-5), whence Paul sailed in an Alexandrian ship to Italy. It now bears the name Adramyti.

ADRIA (Gr. Ἀδριας, ad-ree'-as), called the "sea of Adria" in R. V. (Acts 27:27). It is the modern Gulf of Venice, the Mare Supernum of the Romans, as distinguished from the Mare Inferum or the Tyrrhenian Sea. It probably derived its name from Adria, a city in Istria.

ADRIEL (Heb. אֲדִרְיֵאל, ad-rec'-ale, flock of God), a son of Barzillai the Meholathite. Saul gave to him in marriage his daughter Merab, who had been promised to David (1 Sam. 18:17-19). His five sons were among the seven descendants of Saul whom David surrendered to the Gibeonites (2 Sam. 21:8) in satisfaction for the endeavors of Saul to extirpate them, although a league had been made between them and the Israelites (Josh. 9:15). In 2 Sam. 21:8 the name of Michal occurs as the mother of these sons of Adriel. In explanation, see MICHAL.

ADUL'LAM (Heb. אֲדוּלָיִם, ad-ool-lawm'), the resident city of a Canaanitish king, not far from Gath, and near also to the scene of David's victory over Goliath (Josh. 12:15; 15:35; 2 Chron. 11:7; Neh. 11:30). Fortified by Rehoboam, and still a city in the time of the Maccabees (2 Macc. 12:38).

ADUL'LAM, CAVE OF (Heb. אֲדוּלָיִם, ad-ool-lawm'). Two locations are claimed for this cave made memorable by David's connection therewith (1 Sam. 22:1; 2 Sam. 23:13; 1 Chron. 11:15). The traditional site is the great cave of Khareitun, S. E. of Bethlehem. Harper (Bib. and Mod. Dis., p. 224), advocating this location, says:

"These are the most remarkably situated caves in the side of the grandest and wildest gorges in Palestine. A few resolute men could defend the pass against a host. There are three caves opening one into the other; the first is lofty and of considerable size, and could easily accommodate four hundred men, and was found dry and dusty even at the end of the rainy season. The sides of the valley are lined with caves, some now used to fold flocks and herds."

Conder (Palestine, p. 49) locates the site of the cave "on the side of the valley of Elah, the scene of David's meeting with Goliath. It was first discovered by M. Clermont Ganneau, whose views were fully carried out by our researches. The cave itself is a small one, blackened by the smoke of many fires, and scooped in the side of a low hill, on which are remains of a former town or village." Smith (His. Geog., p. 229, sq.) thus sums up the argument in favor of the eastern site: "The Adullam of the Old Testament lay off the central range altogether, for men from the latter went down to it (Gen. 38:1; 1 Sam. 22:1; 2 Sam. 23:13). The prophet Gad bids David leave it and go into the land of Judah (1 Sam. 22:5); and it is reckoned with Socoh, Azekah, Gath, Mareshah, and other towns in the Shephelah west of Hebron (Josh. 15:35, etc.). It is not contradicted by the two passages (2 Sam. 23:13; 1 Chron. 11:15) describing how water was brought to David in Adullam."

ADUL'LAMITE, an inhabitant (Gen. 38:1, 12, 20) of ADULLAM (q. v.).

ADULTERY.—1. Defined. (1) Jewish. The willful violation of the marriage contract by either of the parties, through sexual intercourse with a third party. The divine provision was that the husband and wife should become "one flesh," each being held sacred to the other. So taught Jesus: "Have ye not read, that he which made them at the beginning made them male and female. . . . Wherefore they are no more twain, but one flesh." When the Pharisees, with the apparent hope of eliciting some modification in favor of the husband, put the question, "Why did Moses then command to give a writing of divorce-ment, and to put her away?" Jesus replied, "Moses because of the hardness of your hearts suffered you to put away your wives: but from the beginning it was not so. . . . Whosoever shall put away his wife, except it be for fornication, and shall marry another, committeth adultery," etc. (Matt. 19:3-9). In perfect accord with this also is the teaching of St. Paul (Eph. 5:25-33; 1 Cor. 7:1-13; 1 Tim. 3:12). It will be seen that according to the fundamental law it is adultery for the man as well as the woman to have commerce with another person than the legal spouse. In ancient times, however, exception was made among the nations generally in favor of the man. He might have more wives than one, or have intercourse with a person not espoused or married to him, without being considered an adulterer. Adultery was sexual intercourse with the married wife, or what was equivalent, the betrothed bride of another man; for this act exposed the husband to the danger of having a spurious offspring imposed upon him. In the seventh commandment (Exod. 20:14) all manner of lewdness or unchastity in act or thought seems to be meant (Matt. 5:28). (2) Roman. The Roman law appears to have made the same distinction with the Hebrew between the unfaithfulness of the husband and wife, by defining adultery to be the violation of another man's bed. The infidelity of the husband did not constitute adultery. The Greeks held substantially the same view.

2. Trial of Adultery. A man suspecting his wife of adultery, not having detected her in the act, or having no witness to prove her supposed guilt, brought her to the priest that she might be submitted to the ordeal prescribed in Num. 5:11-31. See JEALOUSY, OFFERING OF. When adultery ceased to be a capital crime, as it doubtless did, this trial probably fell into disuse. No instance of the ordeal being undergone is given in Scripture, and it appears to have been finally abrogated about forty years before the destruction of Jerusalem. The reason assigned is that the men were at that time so generally adulterous that God would not fulfill the imprecations of the ordeal oath upon the wife.

3. Penalties. (1) Jewish. The Mosaic law assigned the punishment of death to adultery (Lev. 20:10), but did not state the mode of its infliction. From various passages of Scripture (e. g., Ezek. 16:38, 40; John 8:5) we infer that it was by stoning. When the adulteress was a slave the guilty parties were scourged, the blows not to exceed forty; the adulterer to offer a trespass offering (a ram) to be offered by the priest (Lev. 19:20-22). Death does not appear to have been inflicted, perhaps by reason of guilt on the part of those administering the law (John 8:9). We find no record in the Old Testament of a woman taken in adultery being put to death. The usual remedy seems to have been a divorce, in which the woman lost her dower, right of maintenance, etc., thus avoiding public scandal. The word παρθευματιαίαι, "make a public example" (Matt. 1:19), probably means to bring the matter before the local Sanhedrin, the usual course. (2) Roman, etc. The Roman civil law looked upon adultery as "the violation of another man's bed," and thus the husband's incontinence could not constitute the offense. The punishment was left to the husband and parents of the adulteress, who under the old law suffered death. The most usual punishment of the man was by mutilation, castration, cutting off the nose and ears. Other punishments were banishment, heavy fines, burning at the stake, drowning. Among the Greeks and other ancient nations the adulterer might lose eye, nose, or ear. Among savage nations of the present time the punishment is generally severe. The Mohammedan code pronounces it a capital offense.

4. Spiritual. In the symbolical language of the Old Testament adultery means idolatry and apostasy from the worship of Jehovah (Jer. 3:8, 9; Ezek. 16:32; 23:37; Rev. 2:22). This figure resulted from the sort of married relationship, the solemn engagement between Jehovah and Israel (Jer. 2:2; 3:14; 13:27; 31:32; Hos. 8:9). Our Lord uses similar language when he charged Israel with being an "adulterous generation" (Matt. 12:39; 16:4; Mark 8:38), meaning a faithless and unholy generation. An "adulterous" means an apostate church or city (Isa. 1:21; Jer. 3:6-9; Ezek. 16:22; 23:7).

5. Ecclesiastical. The following views obtained in the early Church: (1) The crime. Under Justinian the wife was regarded as the real criminal, and her paramour as a mere accomplice. This view seems to have been held during the whole early Christian period. Gregory of Nyssa makes a distinction between fornication and adultery. A canon of Basle furnishes this definition:

"We name him who cohabits with another woman (not his own wife) an adulterer." Ambrose says: "All unchaste intercourse is adultery; what is illicit for the woman is illicit for the man." Gregory Nazianzen argues that the man should not be left free to sin while the woman is restrained. Chrysostom says: "It is commonly called adultery when a man wrongs a married woman. I, however, affirm it of a married man who sins with the unmarried." Jerome contends that 1 Cor. 6:16 applies equally to both sexes. (2) Penalties. A convicted adulterer cannot receive orders. An adulterer or adulteress must undergo seven years' penance. A presbyter so offending is to be excommunicated and brought to penance. The layman whose wife is guilty cannot receive orders, and if already ordained must put her away under pain of deprivation. An unchaste wife must be divorced, but not the husband, even if adulterous. The adulterer must undergo fifteen years of penance, but only seven for incontinence. Two conclusions were drawn by canonists and divines: (a) Divorce, except for adultery, is adultery. (b) To retain an adulterous wife is adultery. A woman must not leave her husband for blows, waste of dower, incontinence, nor even disbelief (1 Cor. 7:16), under penalty of adultery. An offending wife is an adulteress, and must be divorced, but not so the husband. The Catholic Church holds that marriage is not and ought not to be dissolved by the adultery of either party (Council of Trent, sess. xxiv, can. 7). (3) Constructive adultery. The following are treated as guilty of actual adultery: A man marrying a betrothed maiden; a girl seduced marrying another than her seducer; consecrated virgins who sin, and their paramours; a Christian marrying a Jew or an idolater.

ADUMMIM (Heb. אֲדֻמִּים, ad-oom-meen', red, or bloody), the place on the road from Jerusalem to Jericho (Josh. 15:7; 18:17), and supposed to be the scene of the good Samaritan's rescue of the man who fell among thieves. It has the modern name of Kulat-ed-Dem.

ADVENT, SECOND. See MILLENNIUM.

ADVERSARY, in its general meaning, is an enemy; as "The Lord will take vengeance upon his adversaries" (Nah. 1:2). Very frequently it is derived from Heb. אָצַר, tsur, to bind; in 1 Sam. 2:10, רִיב, rib, to strive. In the New Testament we have ἀντικείμενος, antikeimios, one who opposes; and ἀντιδικος, antidikos, opponent in law. In Isa. 50:8, the expression בַּעַל מִשְׁפָּט, Baal mishpat, means "he who has a judicial cause or lawsuit against me;" just as in Roman law dominus liti is distinguished from the procurator; i. e., from the person who represents him in court (Delitzsch, Com.). Specifically (Heb. שָׂטָן, Satan), the devil, as the general enemy of mankind (1 Pet. 5:8).

ADVISE. See GLOSSARY.

ADVOCATE (Gr. Παράκλητος, par-ak'-lay-tos, Paraclete), one who pleads the cause of another. The term is applied to the Holy Spirit by Jesus (John 14:16; 15:26; 16:7), where it is rendered Comforter; and by John to Christ himself (1 John

2:1). The word Advocate (Lat. advocatus) might designate a consulting lawyer, or one who presented his client's case in open court; or one who, in times of trial or hardship, sympathized with the afflicted and administered suitable direction and support.

ÆNEAS (Gr. Αἰνέας, ah-ee-neh'-as), a paralytic of Lydda cured by Peter (Acts 9:33, 34).

ÆNON (Ga. Αἰνών, ah-ee-nohn', springs), the place "near Salim" where John baptized (John 3:23). Dr. Barclay locates it at Wady Farah, five miles N. of Jerusalem.

ÆON (Gr. αἰών, age), a human lifetime, life itself (according to Homer, Herodotus, etc.); an unbroken age, perpetuity of time, eternity. With this signification the Hebrew and Rabbinic idea of the word עלמ, o-lamw', concealed, combines in the biblical and ecclesiastical writers. Hence in the New Testament æon is used: 1. In the phrases εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα (Gen. 6:3, "always"), forever (John 6:51, 58; 14:16; Heb. 5:6; 6:20, etc.); εἰς αἰῶνα (John 13), εἰς ἡμέραν αἰῶνος (2 Pet. 3:18), unto the day which is eternity; with a negative, never (John 4:14; 8:51; 10:28; 11:26, etc.); εἰς τοὺς αἰῶνας, unto the ages, i. e., as long as time shall be, forever (Luke 1:33; Rom. 1:25; 9:5; 11:36, etc.). In the expression εἰς τοὺς αἰῶνας τῶν αἰῶνων (Gal. 1:5; 2 Tim. 4:18; 1 Pet. 4:11; Rev. 1:8, 18, etc.) the endless future is divided up into various periods, the shorter of which are comprehended in the longer. "From the age" is used in the sense of from the most ancient time, from of old (Luke 1:70; Acts 3:21; 15:18).

2. As the Jews distinguished the time before the Messiah, and the time after the Messiah, so most of the New Testament writers distinguish ὁ αἰὼν οὗτος, this age (and similar expressions), the time before the appointed return or truly Messianic advent of Christ, and αἰὼν μέλλον, the future age (Matt. 12:32; Eph. 1:21).

3. Figurative. The container is used for the contained, and οἱ αἰῶνες denotes the worlds, the universe, i. e., the aggregate of things contained in time (Heb. 1:2; 11:3) (Grimm, Gr. Lex., s. v.).

AFFECT. See GLOSSARY.

AFFLICTION (mostly Heb. צָרָה, on-ee', depressed; Gr. θλίψις, thlip'-sis, pressure). Other Hebrew and Greek words are used, and if they were all literally rendered we should have iniquity, straitness, lowered, evil, breach, suffering. This last word expresses its meaning in common use. The English word comes from the Latin afflictus, a striking, as one thing against another; pain, grief, distress of body or mind, etc.

Respecting the well-known and oft-quoted passage, "For our light affliction, . . . worketh for us," etc. (2 Cor. 4:17), we quote from Meyer, Com., Notes by American Editor: "The Revision of 1881 gives this weighty and impressive verse in a rendering which is exact, and yet faithful to our English idiom. The verse contains the whole philosophy of the Christian view of affliction. It does not deny the reality of earthly sorrows or underrate their power, as did the Stoics; but after allowing them all their force, calmly says that they dwindle into insignificance when compared with the exceeding and eternal glory to which they lead. But this applies only to believers, as appears by the next verse, 'while we look,' etc. Afflictions have a salutary operation, provided that we look at the things which are eternal."

AFTER. See GLOSSARY.

AFTERNOON (Heb. נְשָׁרֹת הַיּוֹם, ne-toth' ha-yom', the day's declining, Judg. 19:8), according to the Jewish reckoning the fifth of the sixth divisions of the day. See TIME.

AG'ABUS (Gr. Ἄγαθος, ag'-ab-os, perhaps to love), a prophet, supposed to have been one of the seventy disciples of Christ. He with others came from Jerusalem to Antioch while Paul and Barnabas were there, and predicted an approaching famine, which actually occurred the following year. The expression "throughout all the world" was probably used in a national sense, and by it Judea was doubtless meant, and the words must be understood to apply to that famine which, in the fourth year of Claudius, overspread Palestine. The poor Jews in general were then relieved by the queen of Adiabne, who sent to Egypt to purchase corn for them (Josephus, Ant., xx, 2, 5; 5, 2). For the relief of the Christians in Judea contributions were raised by their brethren in Antioch, and taken to Jerusalem by Paul and Barnabas (Acts 11:28-30). Many years after, this same Agabus met Paul at Cesarea, and warned him of the sufferings which awaited him if he prosecuted his journey to Jerusalem (Acts 21:10-12). Agabus took the girdle of St. Paul and fastened it round his own hands and feet, and said, "Thus saith the Holy Ghost, So shall the Jews at Jerusalem bind the man that owneth this girdle, and shall deliver him into the hands of the Gentiles."

A'GAG (Heb. אָגָג, ag-ag', flame), probably a common name of all the Amalekite kings, like Pharaoh in Egypt, etc.

1. The king, apparently, of one of the hostile neighboring nations at the time of the Exode, B. C. 1169. He is referred to by Balaam (Num. 24:7) in a manner implying that the king of the Amalekites was, then at least, a great monarch, and his people a greater people, than is commonly imagined (M'C. and S., Cycl., s. v.).

2. The king of the Amalekites, who, being taken prisoner by Saul, was spared by him, contrary to the solemn vow of devotion to destruction whereby the nation, as such, had of old precluded itself from giving any quarter to that people (Exod. 17:14; Deut. 25:19). When Samuel came to the camp of Saul he chided him and told him of his rejection, and ordered Agag to be brought to him. Agag came "delicately," i. e., in a joyous state of mind, thinking that his life would still be spared to him (K. and D., Com., in loco). But the prophet ordered him to be cut in pieces; and in the expression which he employed—"As thy sword hath made women childless, so shalt thy mother be childless among women"—indicates that, apart from the obligations of the vow, some such example of retributive justice was intended as had been exercised in the case of ADONI-BEZEK (q. v.). Perhaps Agag had treated prisoners in the same way he was now treated by Samuel (1 Sam. 15:8-33), B. C. 1032.

A'GAGITE is found (Esth. 3:1, 10; 8:3, 5; 9:24) in connection with Haman, the enemy of Mordecai. Josephus (Ant., xi, 6, 5) explains it as a synonym of Amalek, and so it possibly was.

AGAIN, AGAINST. See GLOSSARY.

AGAPE, pl. AGAPE (Gr. ἀγάπη, ag-ah'-pay, love), a simple meal of brotherly love celebrated daily in the apostolic times in connection with the Eucharist, the two being spoken of together as the Lord's Supper. At this meal the Christians, in connection with their common Redeemer, ignored all distinctions of rank, wealth, and culture, and met as members of one family. At the feast the bishop (or presbyter) presided, the food having been prepared at home, or at the place of meeting, according to circumstances. Before eating the guests washed their hands, prayer was offered, and the Scriptures were read. After the meal a collection was taken for widows and orphans, the kiss of charity was given, and communications from other congregations were read and answered.

The Agape was never enjoined by divine command, and gradually, losing its peculiar feature of childlike unity, it led to all sorts of abuses, such as we find rebuked by St. Paul. Another cause for its discontinuance was that the Third Council of Carthage (A. D. 391) decreed that the Eucharist should be taken fasting. Later several councils forbade their being held in the church buildings. Vestiges of the practice remained as late as the Council of Basle, in the 15th century.

A'GAR, a Greek form (Gal. 4:24, 25) of the name HAGAR (q. v.).

AGATE (Heb. אֶגֶט, sheb-oo), the name of one of the precious stones in the breastplate of the high priest (Exod. 28:19; 39:12). In Isa. 54:12 and Ezek. 27:16 the word agate is used for another Hebrew word, אֶגֶדֶת, kad-kode', which modern interpretation is disposed to identify with RUBY (q. v.). See MINERAL KINGDOM.

AGE, in the A. V., is the word used to represent several Hebrew and Greek words; generation (Heb. דּוֹר, dore, the circle of the years of human life (Job 8:8; Isa. 38:12); old age (Heb. זָקֵן, zaw-kane', aged, Gen. 48:10); lifetime (Heb. חַיֵּי, khek'-led, that which is fleeting, Job 11:17; Psa. 39:5); grayheadedness (Heb. שֵׁיב, sabe, 1 Kings 14:4); day (Heb. יוֹם, yome, so called from the diurnal heat, Gen. 18:11; 24:1; Josh. 23:1, 2; Zech. 8:4); naturity, a particular period of life (Gr. ἡλικία, hay-lik-ee'-ah, Heb. 11:1). See ÆON.

AGEE (Heb. אַגֵּי, aw-gay', fugitive), a Hararite, father of Shammah, which latter was one of David's chief warriors (2 Sam. 23:11).

AGONY (Gr. ἀγῶν, ag-on-ee'-ah, struggle), used both in classical and New Testament Greek of severe mental struggles and emotions; our anguish. The word is used in the New Testament only by Luke (22:44) to describe the fearful struggle through which our Lord passed in the garden of Gethsemane. The circumstances of this mysterious transaction are recorded in Matt. 26:36-46; Mark 14:32-42; Heb. 5:7, 8. Luke alone notices the agony, the bloody sweat, and the appearance of the strengthening angel. All agree that he prayed for the removal of "this cup," and are careful to note that he qualified this petition by a preference of his Father's will to his own. The question is, what did he mean by "this cup?" what was the cause of this sorrow unto death?

For answer we quote Edersheim: "Not fear, either of bodily or mental suffering; but death. Man's nature, created of God immortal, shrinks (by the law of its nature) from the dissolution of the bond that binds body to soul. Yet to fallen man death is not by any means fully death, for he is born with the taste of it in his soul. Not so Christ. It was the unfallen Man dying; it was he, who had no experience of it, tasting death, and that not for himself but for every man, emptying the cup to its bitter dregs. It was the Christ undergoing death by man and for man; the incarnate God, the God-man, submitting himself vicariously to the deepest humiliation, and paying the utmost penalty: death—all death. No one could know what death was (not dying, which men dread, but Christ dreaded not); no one could taste its bitterness as he. His going into death was his final conflict with Satan for man, and on his behalf. By submitting to it he took away the power of death. He disarmed Death by burying his shaft in His own heart. And beyond this lies the deep, unutterable mystery of Christ bearing the penalty due to our sin, bearing our death, bearing the penalty of the broken law, the accumulated guilt of humanity, and the holy wrath of the righteous Judge upon them" (Life of Jesus, ii, 538, 539).

AGRAPHIA (Gr. ἀγράφος, ag-raf'-os, unwritten), a term applied to the sayings of our Lord not recorded in the gospels. Naturally, there would be many of these, and such is recorded as the fact (John 21:25). The sources of our knowledge of these sayings are threefold: (a) The first and surest is to be found in the books of the New Testament itself. An unquestionable example is given in Acts 20:35: "Remember the words of the Lord Jesus, how he said, It is more blessed to give than to receive." Mayor in his comments on James 1:12, "He shall receive the crown of life, which the Lord promised to them that love him," thinks these words a semiquote of some saying of Christ. (b) The next source, both in amount and authority, is supplied by some manuscripts of the New Testament, among them the well-known addition in Codex Bezae to Luke 6:4. "On the same day, beholding one working on the Sabbath, he said unto him, Man, if thou knowest what thou doest, blessed art thou; but if thou knowest not, accursed art thou and a transgressor of the law." (c) Quotations in early Christian writers and in lost gospels. The quotations of these sayings cease almost entirely after the fourth century, when the current gospel text had won its way to acceptance. Of these unrecorded sayings Resch has collected seventy-four which he regards as genuine, and one hundred and three apocryphal. "In the main these sayings neither have historical setting nor affect the truth of our Lord's life. They do, however, often illustrate his teaching, and express it perhaps in a terser, more remarkable form than is found elsewhere." The following are some of the most remarkable of these sayings: "He that is near me is near the fire; he that is far from me is far from the kingdom;" "That which is weak shall be saved by that which is strong" (Rev. W. Locke, The Expositor). (d) "The Logia, or Sayings of our Lord," found in Oxyrhynchus, one hundred and twenty miles south of Cairo, Egypt, by Messrs. B. F. Grenfell and Arthur S. Hunt, 1896. "The document in question is a leaf from a papyrus book containing a collection of Logia, or Sayings of our Lord, of which some, though presenting several novel features, are familiar, others are wholly new. It was found . . . in a mound which produced a great number of papyri belonging to the first three centuries of our era, those in the immediate vicinity of our fragment belonging to the second and third centuries. This fact, together with the evidence of the handwriting, which has a characteristically Roman aspect, fixes with certainty 300 A. D. as the lowest limit for the date at which the papyrus was written. The general probabilities of the case, the presence of the usual contractions found in the biblical manuscripts, and the fact that the papyrus was in book, not roll form, put the 1st century out of the question, and make the first half of the 2d century unlikely. The date, therefore, probably falls within the period of 150-300 A. D. . . . The fragment measures 5½x3¼ inches, but its height was originally somewhat greater, as it is unfortunately broken at the bottom" (pp. 5, 6).

The rendering from the English is given by Grenfell and Hunt (pp. 10-15) thus:

Logion 1. ". . . and then shalt thou see clearly to cast out the mote that is in the brother's eye."

Logion 2. "Jesus saith, Except ye fast to the world, ye shall in no wise find the kingdom of God; and except ye keep the sabbath, ye shall not see the Father."

Logion 3. "Jesus saith, I stood in the midst of the world, and in the flesh was I seen of them, and I found all men drunken, and none found I athirst among them; and my soul grieveth over the sons of men, because they are blind in their heart. . . ."

Logion 4. Undecipherable.

Logion 5. "Jesus saith, Wherever there are . . . and there is one . . . alone, I am with him. Raise the stone and there thou shalt find me; cleave the wood, and there am I."

Logion 6. "Jesus saith, A prophet is not acceptable in his own country, neither doth a physician work cures upon them that know him."

Logion 7. "Jesus saith, A city built upon the top of a high hill, and stablished, can neither fall nor be hid."

Logion 8. Undecipherable.

AGRICULTURE. The cultivation of the soil dates back to Adam, to whom God assigned the occupation of dressing and keeping the garden

(Gen. 2:15). We are told that "Cain was a tiller of the ground" (Gen. 4:2). The ancestors of the Hebrews in Mesopotamia followed pastoral pursuits, which were kept up by Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, whose sons settled as shepherds on the fruitful pasture lands of Goshen (Gen. 47). During their four hundred years' residence in Egypt the Israelites engaged in the pursuit of agriculture (Deut. 11:10), so that they were prepared to make the cultivation of the soil their principal employment, and in this sense the Mosaic state was founded on agriculture (Michaelis, xxxviii, 11). As the soil could not be alienated, but reverted to the owner in the year of jubilee, each family had a stake in the soil, and its culture was held in high esteem (1 Sam. 11:5; 1 Kings 19:19, sq.; 2 Chron. 26:10). As the pastoral life of Israel had kept it from mixture and local attachment, especially while in Egypt, so agriculture in Canaan tended to check a freebooting and nomad life.

1. Irrigation. In all countries climate and soil have much to do with the methods of agriculture and sorts of crops. In Eastern countries, generally, the heat and dryness of the greater portion of the year makes irrigation by canals and aqueducts indispensable. This is true to a considerable extent of Palestine, although its rains are more frequent than in Egypt or Assyria. There is reference, however, to natural irrigation by conduits מַבְרֵי מַיִם, water-partings, canals (Job 38:25; Prov. 21:1). These were well-known to the Israelites in Egypt (Deut. 11:10).

2. Care of Soil. The several portions of the land were carefully marked off (1 Sam. 14:14; Prov. 22:28); divided for the various products of the soil (Isa. 28:25); secured against injury from wild animals by hedges and walls (Isa. 5:5; Num. 22:24); and the soil fertilized by manuring (2 Kings 9:30; Psa. 83:10). The preparation of manure from straw trodden in the dunghill appears from Isa. 25:10. The dung, the carcasses, and the blood of animals were used to enrich the soil (2 Kings 9:37; Psa. 83:10; 8:2; Jer. 9:22). Salt, either by itself or mixed in the dunghill in order to promote putrefaction, is specially mentioned as a compost (Matt. 5:13; Luke 14:34, 35). The land was burned over to destroy the seed of noxious herbs (Prov. 24:31; Isa. 32:13), and was then enriched with ashes. The cultivation of hill-sides in terraces cannot be proved from any clear statement of Scripture, but the nature of its soil makes it necessary. Terraces are still seen on the mountain slopes, rising above one another, frequently to the number of sixty or eighty; and on them fields, gardens, and plantations.

The soil was broken up by the plow (q. v.), a crude affair, probably similar to those used in Egypt. The ground was cleared of stones and thorns (Isa. 5:2) early in the year; sowing or gathering from "among thorns" being a proverb for slovenly husbandry (Job 5:5; Prov. 24:30, 31). New land was plowed a second time. The plow was followed by men using hoes to break the clods (Isa. 28:24) but in latter times a harrow was employed. This appears to have been then

The Israelites, probably, learned the working of these in Egypt (Exod. 9:31), and they seem to have grown them in Palestine, for according to Hos. 2:9, and Prov. 31:13, flax and wool were to be found in every house. Cotton must have been early cultivated by the Israelites, for in 1 Chron. 4:21 among the ancient households of Judah is named a family of workers in byssus.

4. Harvest. Grain was cut with the sickle (Deut. 16:9), the reapers living on parched grain and bread dipped in vinegar (Ruth 2:14). It is probable, however, that the modern custom of pulling up by the roots prevailed to a considerable extent in ancient times. This was done to save all the straw, as it grew very short. When cut it was gathered on the arms (Psa. 129:7), bound in sheaves, and laid in heaps (Cant. 7:2; Ruth 3:7) to be thrashed. Thrashing floors were placed in as now merely a thick block of wood pressed down by the weight of a stone or a man (Job 39:10; Isa. 28:24). The seed appears to have been sowed and harrowed at the same time, although sometimes it was plowed in by a cross furrow.

3. Crops. The principal crops of Palestine were, undoubtedly, wheat and barley, from which was derived the common bread of the country. Mention is also made of spelt, millet, lentils, flax, cucumbers, melons, beans, cummin, fennel, etc. Hay was not in use, and, therefore, barley with chopped straw was fed to cattle (Gen. 24:25, 32; Judg. 19:19, sq.).

The sowing began after the Feast of Tabernacles (the end of October and in November), in the time when the autumn rains come gradually, thus leaving the farmer time to sow his wheat and barley. Summer fruits (millet, beans, etc.) were sown in January and February. Harvest began with barley (2 Sam. 21:9; Ruth 2:23), which ripens in Palestine from two to three weeks before wheat, and was opened by law on the 16th Nisan with the presentation of the first barley sheaf. Lentils, etc., were ready at the same time with barley. Then came wheat and spelt, so that the chief part of the grain harvest closed about Pentecost.

the open air, leveled and tramped hard, generally on elevated ground, so that in winnowing the wind might carry away the chaff (Hos. 13:3; Jer. 4:11). Thrashing was done by oxen driven over the grain to tread out the kernels with their hoofs (Hos. 10:11), by machines made either of planks with stones or bits of iron fastened to the lower surface to make it rough, and rendered heavy by some weight upon it, or small wagons with low cylindrical wheels like saws (Isa. 28:27; 41:15).

In thrashing small quantities of grain, or for tender cereals, flails were used (Ruth 2:17; Isa. 28:27). Winnowing was done with a broad shovel or wooden fork with bent prongs. The mass of chaff, straw, and grain was thrown against the wind so that the chaff might be blown away. This was usually done in the evening, when there was generally a breeze (Ruth 3:2; see Jer. 4:11; 51:2). The chaff and stubble were burned (Isa. 5:24; Matt. 3:12). Finally the grain was sifted (Amos 9:9).

Laes. Israel owed Palestine as its possession, and its fertility to Jehovah; hence its cultivation was put under obedience to the Lord's commands. The Sabbath rest was to be observed (Lev. 19:3), the soil was to lie fallow in the sabbatic (25:3, sq.) and jubilee years (25:11). The Israelites were forbidden to yoke an ox and ass together (Deut. 22:10), the one being a clean and the other an unclean animal; to sow with mingled seed (Lev. 19:19; Deut. 22:9), or moistened seed on which the carcass of an unclean animal had fallen (Lev. 11:37, 38). The corners of the fields were not reaped, and the gleanings of the fields were left for the poor (Lev. 19:9; Deut. 24:19; comp. Ruth 2:2).

It was allowed to pluck the heads of ripened grain while passing along in the path left in the field (Deut. 23:25; Matt. 12:1; Luke 6:1). The first fruits of all kinds of planting belonged to Jehovah, in recognition of his being the giver of all good things. The fruit of the orchard the first three years was uncircumcized (unclean), and not to be eaten. All of the fourth year's yield was consecrated to Jehovah; and the first eating by men was to be that of the fifth year (Lev. 19:23). For cultivation of Vine and Olive, see under respective words.

AGRIPPA (Gr. 'Αγρίππας, ag-rip'-pas, perhaps wild horse tamer), the name of two of the members of the Herodian family. See HEROD.

A'GUR (Heb. אָגוּר, av-goor', gathered), the author of the sayings contained in Prov. 30, which the inscription describes as composed of the precepts delivered by "Agur the son of Jakeh." Beyond this everything that has been stated of him, and of the time in which he lived, is pure conjecture (Kitto, s. v.).

C. 875-853. His wife was Jezebel, a heathen princess, daughter of Ethbaal, king of Zidon. (1) Idolatry. Jezebel was a decided and energetic character, and soon acquired complete control over her husband, so that he eventually established the worship of the Phœnician idols, and especially of the sun-god Baal. Ahab built him a temple and an altar in Samaria, and made a grove for the impure orgies of the goddess Ashtoreth (1 Kings 16:29-33). So strong was the tide of corruption that it appeared as if the knowledge of the true God would be lost among the Israelites. But a man suited to this emergency was raised up in the person of Elijah (1 Kings 18), who opposed the royal power, and succeeded in retaining many of his countrymen in the worship of the true God. See ELIJAH. Ahab had a taste for splendid architecture, which he indulged by building an ivory house and several cities (1 Kings 22:39). He erected his royal residence at Jezreel, in the plain of Esdraelon, still keeping Samaria as capital of his kingdom. (2) Death of Naboth. Refused a neighboring vineyard, which he desired to add to his pleasure grounds, Ahab, through the influence of Jezebel, caused its proprietor, Naboth, to be put to death on a false charge of blasphemy. For this crime Elijah prophesied the total extinction of the house of Ahab. The execution of the sentence was delayed in consequence of Ahab's repentance (1 Kings 21). (3) Wars. Ahab undertook three campaigns against Ben-hadad II, king of Damascus, two defensive and one offensive. In the first Ben-hadad had laid siege to Samaria, and Ahab, encouraged by God's prophets, made a sudden attack upon him while at a banquet, and totally routed the Syrians. Ben-hadad was the next year again defeated by Ahab, who spared his life and released him on condition of restoring the cities of Israel he had held, and allowing Ahab certain commercial and political privileges (1 Kings 20:34). For three years Ahab enjoyed peace, when, with Jehoshaphat, king of Judah, he attacked Ramoth in Gilead. Michaiah told Ahab that the expedition would fail. The prophet was imprisoned for giving this warning, but Ahab was so impressed that he took the precaution of disguising himself when he went into battle. (4) Death. He was slain by a man who "drew a bow at a venture," and although stayed up in his chariot for a time he died at even, and his army was dispersed (1 Kings 22). When he was brought to be buried in Samaria the dogs licked up his blood as a servant was washing his chariot, thus fulfilling the prophecy of Elijah (1 Kings 21:19). See SUPPLEMENT.

2. A false prophet who deceived the Israelites at Babylon, and was threatened by Jeremiah, who foretold that he should be put to death by the king of Babylon, in the presence of those whom he had beguiled; and that in following times it should become a common malediction to say, "The Lord make thee like Zedekiah and like Ahab, whom the king of Babylon roasted in the fire" (Jer. 29:21, 22), B. C. 606.

AHAR'AH (Heb. אָחֵי רָאֵה, akh-rakh', after the brother), the third son of Benjamin (1 Chron. 8:1), elsewhere called Ehi (Gen. 46:21), Ahiram (Num. 26:38), and Aher (1 Chron. 7:12).

AHARHEL (Heb. אָחֵי רָחֵל, akh-ar-khal', behind the breastwork), a son of Harum, whose families are named among the lineage of Coz, a descendant of Judah (1 Chron. 4:8).

AHAS'AI (Heb. אַחַזְאִי, akh-zah'ee, perhaps a prolonged form of Ahaz, possessor, or contracted form of Ahaziah, whom Jehovah holds), a grandson of Immer, and one whose descendants dwelt in Jerusalem after the return from Babylon (Neh. 11:13). Gesenius thinks him the same with JAHZERAH (q. v.), who is made the grandson of Immer (1 Chron. 9:12).

AHAS'BAI (Heb. אַחַזְבַּי, akh-as-bah'ee, I take refuge in Jehovah—Gesenius), a Maachathite, father of Eliphelet, one of David's warriors (2 Sam. 23:34). In 1 Chron. 11:35, he is apparently called Ur (q. v.).

AHASUERUS (Heb. אַחַשְׁוֵרֶשׁ, akh-ash-vay-rash', probably Lion king), the title of three Median and Persian monarchs mentioned in the Bible.

1. The Persian king to whom the enemies of the Jews sent an accusation against them, the result of which is not mentioned (Ezra 4:6). He was probably Cambyses, son of Cyrus, who came to the throne B. C. 529, and died after a reign of seven years and five months.

2. The Persian king mentioned in the Book of Esther. He is probably identical with Xerxes, whose regal state and affairs tally with all that is here said of Ahasuerus. His kingdom was very extensive, extending from India even unto Ethiopia (Esth. 1:1). (1) Divorces Vashti. In the third year of his reign he made a sumptuous banquet for his nobility, and prolonged the feast for one hundred and eighty days. On one occasion, being partially intoxicated, he ordered Vashti, his wife, to be brought before him, that he might exhibit her beauty to his courtiers. She, however, refused to appear; for, in fact, it was contrary to Persian etiquette as well as to female propriety. Thereupon Ahasuerus indignantly divorced her, and published a royal decree asserting the superiority of husbands over their wives. (2) Marries Esther. In the seventh year of his reign (2:16) he married Esther, the beautiful Jewess, who, however, concealed her parentage. (3) Haman's plot. His prime minister, Haman, was enraged with Mordecai, the Jew, because he did not do him reverence; and, in the twelfth year of the king's reign, offered him ten thousand talents of silver for the privilege of ordering a general massacre of the Jews in the kingdom on an appointed day. The king refused the money, but granted the request. Couriers were dispatched to the most distant parts of the realm to order the execution of the decree. Mordecai immediately sent word to Esther of the impending danger, and, through her intercession, the decree was so far annulled as to empower the Jews to defend themselves against their enemies. Ahasuerus disgraced and hanged Haman and his ten sons (7:10; 9:14), and made Mordecai his prime minister (10:3). (4) Identity. The following evidence is in favor of the identity of Ahasuerus and Xerxes. (1) In the third year of the reign of Xerxes was held an assembly to arrange the Grecian war; in the third year of Ahasuerus was held a great feast and assembly in Shushan, the palace. (2) In the seventh year of his reign Xerxes returned defeated from Greece, and consoled himself in the pleasures of his harem; in the seventh year of his reign "fair young virgins were sought" for Ahasuerus, and he replaced Vashti by marrying Esther.

3. The father of Darius the Mede (Dan. 9:1). It is generally agreed that the person here referred to is the Astyages of profane history, but some identify him with Cyaxeres.

AHA'VA (Heb. אַחַוָּא, ah-av-aw', water), the river or place where was a river at which gathered the Jewish exiles who were to return from Babylon to Jerusalem (Ezra 8:21). Possibly the place called Hit, on the Euphrates E. of Damascus.

AHAZ (Heb. אַחַז, ah-khawz', possessor).

1. The twelfth king of the separate kingdom of Judah, being the son and successor of Jotham. Personal History. He reigned sixteen years (according to some authorities, two years as viceroy), B. C. 735-719. (1) Wars. At the time of his accession Pekah, king of Israel, and Rezin, king of Syria, were in league against Judah. They proceeded to lay siege to Jerusalem, intending to place on the throne Ben-Tabael, probably a Syrian noble (Isa. 7:6). Isaiah hastened to announce to him the destruction of the allied monarchs, who failed in their attack upon Jerusalem, although they inflicted serious damage on him elsewhere. Rezin, king of Syria, captured Elath (2 Kings 16:6); Zichri, an Ephraimite, slew the king's son, the governor of his house, and his prime minister; and Pekah, king of Israel, gained a great advantage over him in a battle in Judah, killing one hundred and twenty thousand men, and taking captive two hundred thousand of his people. These, however, were returned through the remonstrance of the prophet Oded (2 Chron. 28:6-15). (2) Becomes a vassal. In his extremity Ahaz applied to Tiglath-pilezer, king of Assyria, for assistance, who freed him from his most formidable enemies by invading Syria, taking Damascus, and killing Rezin. He purchased this help at great cost, becoming tributary to Tiglath-pilezer. He sent him the treasures of the temple and of his own palace, and even appeared before him at Damascus as his vassal. (3) Idolatry. While he was there his idolatrous propensities induced him to take the pattern of a heathen altar and have one like it built in Jerusalem. Upon his return he offered upon the altar, closed the temple, removed its sacred utensils, and raised shrines to heathen deities everywhere. (4) Death. He died unlamented, and his body was not deposited in the sacred sepulchers (vers. 16-27).

NOTE.—In 2 Kings 16:2 the age of Ahaz, at his accession, is given as twenty years. This probably refers to some earlier viceroyship, otherwise he would have been only eleven years old at the birth of his son Hezekiah (comp. 2 Kings 16:2, 20; 18:2). In the latter passage his age is given as 25 years.

2. A great-grandson of Jonathan, son of King Saul, being one of the four sons of Micah, and father of Jehoadah or Jarah (1 Chron. 8:35, 36; 9:42).

AHAZIAH (Heb. אַחַזְיָהוּ, akh-az-yaw', held by Jehovah).

1. The son of Ahab, king of Israel, whom he succeeded in every sense, being as completely under the control of Jezebel and idolatry as was his father (1 Kings 22:51-53). He was the eighth king of Israel, and reigned two years, B. C. 853, 852. The most signal public event of his reign was the revolt of the vassal king of the Moabites, who took the opportunity of the defeat and death of Ahab to discontinue the tribute which he had paid to the Israelites, consisting of one hundred thousand lambs, and as many rams with their wool (2 Kings 1:1; 3:4, 5). Ahaziah became a party with Jehoshaphat to revive the maritime traffic of the Red Sea. Because of this alliance God was displeased with Jehoshaphat, the vessels were destroyed, and the enterprise blasted (2 Chron. 20:35-37). Soon after Ahaziah was injured by falling from the roof gallery of his palace in Samaria (the "lattice" of the text probably meaning a balustrade to keep persons from falling). He sent to inquire of Baal-zebub, the idol of Ekron, what should be the result of his injury. But the messengers were met and sent back by Elijah, who announced that he should rise no more from the bed upon which he lay. He died shortly after, and was succeeded by his brother Jehoram (2 Kings 1:17; 3:1).

2. The son of Jehoram by Athaliah, and sixth king of Judah, B. C. 843. He is also called Jehoahaz (2 Chron. 21:17; 25:23) and Azariah (2 Chron. 22:6). He followed the example of his father-in-law, Ahab, and was given to idolatry (2 Kings 8:25-27; 2 Chron. 22:1-4). He joined his uncle, Jehoram, of Israel, in an expedition against Hazael, king of Syria, which proved disastrous. The king of Israel was wounded, and Ahaziah visited him in Jezreel. During this visit Jehu was secretly anointed king of Israel, and conspired against Jehoram. The two kings rode out in their several chariots to meet Jehu, and when Jehoram was shot through the heart Ahaziah attempted to escape, but was pursued as far as the pass of Gur, and, being there mortally wounded, had only strength to reach Megiddo, where he died. His body was conveyed by his servants to Jerusalem for burial (2 Kings 9:1-28).

NOTE.—In 2 Kings 8:26 Ahaziah is said to have been twenty-two years old when he began to reign; but in 2 Chron. 22:2 his age is stated to be forty-two years. The former is undoubtedly correct, as in 2 Chron. 21:5, 20, we see that his father was forty when he died, which would have made him younger than his son. 2 Chron. 22:7-9 informs us that "the destruction of Ahaziah was of God," since, by fraternizing with the house of Ahab, he was included in the commission given to Jehu to root them out.

AH'BAN (Heb. אֲחִיבָּן, akh-bawn', brother of the wise), the first named of the two sons of Abishur by Abihail, of the descendants of Judah (1 Chron. 2:29), B. C. about 1471.

A'HER (Heb. אַחֵר, akh-air', after), a descendant of Benjamin (1 Chron. 7:12); probably the same person as Ahiram (Num. 26:38). Some translators consider it as not a proper name at all, and render it literally "another."

A'HI (Heb. אֲחִי, akh-ee', brotherly).

1. A son of Abdiel, and chieftain of the tribe of Gad, resident in Bashan (1 Chron. 5:15).

2. The first named of the four sons of Shamer, a chieftain of the tribe of Asher (1 Chron. 7:34).

AHI'AH (Heb. אֲחִי'אֵה, akh-ee-yaw', brother of Jehovah, another mode of Anglicizing the name Ahijah).

1. The son of Ahitub, and high priest in the reign of Saul (1 Sam. 14:3, 18), B. C. about 1022. He is here described as being "the Lord's priest in Shiloh, wearing an ephod." In 14:18 it appears that the ark was under his care. There is some difficulty in reconciling this with the statement (1 Chron. 13:3) that they inquired not at the ark in the days of Saul. Some avoid the difficulty by inserting "ephod" for "ark" (K. and D., Com., in loco); others, by interpreting the ark, in this case, to mean a chest for carrying about the ephod in. Others apply the expression only to all the latter years of the reign of Saul, when we know that the priestly establishment was at Nob, and not at Kirjath-jearim, where the ark was. But probably the last time that Ahiah inquired of the Lord before the ark was on the occasion related in 1 Sam. 14:36, when Saul marred his victory over the Philistines by his rash oath, which nearly cost Jonathan his life. But God returned no answer in consequence, as it seems, of Saul's rash curse. If, as is commonly supposed, Ahiah is the same person as Ahimelech, this failure to obtain an answer may have led to an estrangement between the king and the high priest, and predisposed him to suspect Ahimelech's loyalty, and to take that terrible revenge upon him for his favor to David (M'C. and S., Cyc., s. v.). Gesenius supposes (Theo. Heb., p. 65) that Ahimelech may have been a brother to Ahiah, and that they officiated simultaneously, the one at Gibeah, or Kirjath-jearim, and the other at Nob.

2. Son of Shisha, and secretary of King Solomon (1 Kings 4:3), B. C. 960.

3. One of the sons of Bela, son of Benjamin (1 Chron. 8:7), elsewhere (v. 4) called ΑΙΟΑΗ (q. v.).

AHI'AM (Heb. אֲחִיאָם, akh-ee-amm', perhaps for Achiab', father's brother), a son of Sharar, the Hararite, and one of David's thirty heroes (2 Sam. 23:33; 1 Chron. 11:35), B. C. 1000.

AHI'AN (Heb. אֲחִיאָן, akh-yawn', brotherly), the first named of the four sons of Shemidah, of the tribe of Manasseh (1 Chron. 7:19), B. C. about 1444.

AHIE'ZER (Heb. אֲחִיעֶזֶר, akh-ee-eh'-zer, brother of help, i. e., helpful).

1. The son of Ammishaddai, and chief of the tribe of Dan when the people were numbered at Sinai (Num. 1:12), B. C. 1210. He made an offering for the service of the tabernacle, like the other chiefs (Num. 7:66).

2. The chief of the Benjamite warriors who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron. 12:3), B. C. before 1000.

AHI'HU'D. 1. (Heb. אֲחִיהוּד, akh-ee-hood', brother of renown.) The son of Shelomi, and prince of the tribe of Asher. He was one of those appointed by Moses to oversee the partition of Canaan (Num. 34:27), B. C. 1172.

2. (Heb. אֲחִיהוּד, akh-ee-khood', brother of a riddle, i. e., mysterious.) The second named of the two later sons of Bela, the son of Benjamin (1 Chron. 8:7).

AHI'JAH (Heb. אֲחִיָּאָה, akh-ee-yaw', brother of Jehovah).

1. A prophet of Shiloh (1 Kings 14:2), and hence called the Shilomite (ch. 11:29). There are two remarkable prophecies of Ahijah extant. The one in 1 Kings 11:31-39 is addressed to Jeroboam, B. C. 960. In this he foretold the rending of the kingdom of Solomon, in punishment for his idolatries, and the transference of ten tribes after his death to Jeroboam. Solomon, hearing of this prophecy, sought to kill Jeroboam, who fled to Shishak, king of Egypt, and remained there until Solomon's death. The other prophecy (1 Kings 14:6-16) was delivered to the wife of Jeroboam, who came to him in disguise to inquire concerning the king's son, who was sick. In this he foretold the death of the son, the destruction of Jeroboam's house on account of the images he had set up, and the captivity of Israel. In 2 Chron. 9:29, reference is made to a record of the events of Solomon's reign contained in the "prophecy of Ahijah the Shilomite."

2. An Israelite of the tribe of Issachar, father of Baachia, king of Israel (1 Kings 15:27), B. C. before 911.

3. The last named of the five sons of Jerahmeel by his first wife (1 Chron. 2:25), B. C. after 1170.

4. A Pelonite, one of David's famous heroes (1 Chron. 11:36), apparently the same called ELIAM (q. v.), the son of Ahithophel the Gilonite in the parallel passage (2 Sam. 23:34).

5. A Levite appointed, in the arrangement by David, over the sacred treasury of dedicated things at the temple (1 Chron. 26:20), B. C. 1000.

6. One of those who subscribed the covenant, drawn up by Nehemiah, to serve the Lord (Neh. 10:26), B. C. 445.

AHI'KAM (Heb. אֲחִי־כָמֹ, akh-ee-kawn', brother of rising, i. e., high; according to Gesenius, brother of the enemy), one of the four persons sent by King Josiah to inquire of the prophetess Huldah concerning the proper course to be pursued in relation to the acknowledged violations of the newly-discovered book of the law (2 Kings 22:12-14; 2 Chron. 34:20), B. C. 624. He afterward protected the prophet Jeremiah from the persecuting fury of Jehoiakim (Jer. 26:24), B. C. about 609. His son, Gedaliah, showed Jeremiah a like kindness (Jer. 39:14). He was the son of Shaphan, and father of Gedaliah, the viceroy of Judea after the capture of Jerusalem by the Babylonians (2 Kings 25:22; Jer. 40:5-16).

AHI'LUD (Heb. אֲחִי־לֹוד, akh-ee-lood', brother of one born), father of Jehoshaphat, recorder under David and Solomon (2 Sam. 8:16; 20:24; 1 Kings 4:3), and also of Baana, one of Solomon's purveyors (1 Kings 4:12), B. C. 960.

AHIM'AAZ (Heb. אֲחִי־מֵאָז, akh-ee-mah'-ats, brother of anger).

1. The father of Ahinoam, wife of King Saul (1 Sam. 14:50), B. C. before 1022.

2. The son and successor of Zadok (1 Chron. 6:8, 53) in the high priesthood. When Absalom revolted David refused to allow the ark to be removed from Jerusalem, believing that God would bring him back to the city. The high priests, Zadok and Abiathar, necessarily remained in attendance upon it; but their sons, Ahimaaz and Jonathan, concealed themselves outside the city to be in readiness to bear off to David any important movements and designs of Absalom which they might receive from within. When, therefore, Hushai informed the priests that Absalom had preferred his own counsel to that of Abithophel, they sent word to Ahimaaz and Jonathan by a girl, doubtless to avoid suspicion. A lad saw the transaction and informed Absalom, who dispatched servants after them. They were hid by a woman in a dry well, the mouth of which was covered and strewn over with corn. She told the pursuers that the messengers had passed on in haste, and when all was safe released them, and they made their way to David (2 Sam. 15:24-27; 17:15-22), B. C. 967. After the death of Absalom, Ahimaaz prevailed upon Joab to let him run after the Cushite who had been sent to inform David. He outstripped him, being doubtless swift of foot and taking another route, and proceeded to break the news gently to David, telling him at first only of the victory. While speaking the Cushite entered and bluntly revealed the truth. The estimate in which he was held by David is shown in his answer to the watchman who announced his coming: "He is a good man, and cometh with good tidings" (2 Sam. 18:19-32).

3. Solomon's purveyor in Naphtali, who married Basmath, daughter of Solomon (1 Kings 4:15), B. C. after 960.

AHI'MAN (Heb. אֲחִי־מָן, akh-ee-man', brother of a gift, i. e., liberal).

1. One of the three famous giants of the race of Anak, who dwelt at Hebron when the Hebrew spies explored the land (Num. 13:22), B. C. 1210, and who (or their descendants) were afterward expelled by Caleb (Josh. 15:14), and eventually slain by the Judaites (Judg. 1:10).

2. A Levite who was one of the porters (wardens) of the temple (1 Chron. 9:17).

AHIM'ELECH (Heb. אֲחִי־מֵלֶךְ, akh-ee-meh'-lek, brother of the king).

1. High priest of the Jews, son of Ahitub (1 Sam. 22:16) and father of Abiathar (v. 20), and probably the same with AHIAH (q. v.). He was a descendant of the line of Ithamar through Eli (1 Chron. 24:3, 6; Josephus, Ant., v. 11, 5; viii, 1, 3). When David fled from Saul (B. C. 994) he went to Nob, where the tabernacle then was. His unexpected appearance alarmed Ahimelech, whose anxious inquiry was answered by David's falsehood, "The king hath commanded me a business." Under this pretext Ahimelech was induced to give him bread and the sword of Goliath (1 Sam. 21:1-9). A servant of Saul, Doeg, an Edomite, witnessed the transaction, and informed King Saul, who immediately sent for Ahimelech and the other priests then at Nob, and charged them with treason. But they declared their ignorance of any hostile designs on the part of David. This, however, availed them nothing, for the king ordered his guard to slay them.

Upon their refusing to do so he commanded Doeg, who slew the priests, eighty-five in number. He then marched to Nob and put to the sword everything it contained (1 Sam. 22:9-20). The only priest that escaped was Abiathar, Ahimelech's son, who fled to David, and who afterward became high priest (23:6; 30:7). The names in 2 Sam. 8:17 and 1 Chron. 24:6 are commonly regarded as having been transposed by a copyist.

2. A Hittite, one of David's warriors, whom David invited to accompany him at night into the camp of Saul in the wilderness of Ziph; but Abishai seems alone to have gone with him (1 Sam. 26:6, 7), B. C. about 996.

AHI'MOTH (Heb. אֲחִימוֹתַי, akh-ee-mōth', brother of death, i. e., destructive), one of the sons of Elkanah, a Levite (1 Chron. 6:25). In v. 26 he is called Nahath.

AHIN'ADAB (Heb. אֲחִינָדָב, akh-ee-naw-dawb', liberal brother), son of Iddo, and one of the twelve purveyors of Solomon. His district was Mahanaim, the southern half of the region beyond Jordan (1 Kings 4:14), B. C. 1000.

AHIN'OAM (Heb. אֲחִינֹעַם, akh-ee-no'-am, brother of pleasantness, i. e., pleasant).

1. The daughter of Ahimaz, and wife of King Saul (1 Sam. 14:50), B. C. about 1023.

2. A Jezreelitess, and one of David's wives while he was yet a private person (1 Sam. 25:43), B. C. 996. She and his other wife, Abigail, lived with him at the court of Achish (ch. 27:3); were taken prisoners by the Amalekites when they plundered Ziklag (ch. 30:5), but were rescued by David (v. 18). She went with him to Hebron and resided with him while he remained there as king of Judah (2 Sam. 2:2), and was mother of his eldest son, Amnon (3:2).

AHI'O (Heb. אֲחִי'וֹ, akh-yo', brotherly).

1. One of the sons of the Levite Abinadab, to whom, with his brother, was intrusted the care of the ark when David first attempted to remove it to Jerusalem. Ahio probably guided the oxen, while his brother Uzzah walked by the cart (2 Sam. 6:3, 4; 1 Chron. 13:7), B. C. 992.

2. A Benjamite, one of the sons of Beriah (1 Chron. 8:14).

3. One of the sons of Jehiel, a Gibeonite, by Maachah (1 Chron. 8:31; 9:37).

AHI'RA (Heb. אֲחִירָי, akh-ee-rah', brother of evil, i. e., unlucky), the son of Enan, and chief of the tribe of Naphtali (Num. 2:29). He was appointed as "head man" of his tribe to assist Moses in numbering the people (ch. 1:15), and made his contribution to the sacred service on the twelfth day of offering (7:78, 83; 10:27), B. C. 1210.

AHI'RAM (Heb. אֲחִירָם, akh-ee-rawm', brother of the height, or high), a son of Benjamin, from whom one of the families of the Benjamites was named (Num. 26:38). He was, apparently, the same with Ehi (Gen. 46:21), Aher (1 Chron. 7:12), and Aharah (1 Chron. 8:1).

AHI'RAMITE (Heb. אֲחִירָמִי, akh-ee-raw-mee'), a descendant (Num. 26:38) of the Benjamite AHIRAM (q. v.).

AHIS'AMACH (Heb. אֲחִיסָמַח, akh-ee-saw-mawh', brother of help), father of one of the famous workers upon the tabernacle, Aholiab, the Danite (Exod. 31:6; 35:34; 38:23), B. C. 1210.

AHISH'AHAR (Heb. אֲחִישָׁחַר, akh-ee-shakh'-ar, brother of the dawn, i. e., early), a warrior, last named of the sons of Bilhan, of the tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron. 7:10).

AHI'SHAR (Heb. אֲחִישָׁר, akh-ee-shaw'r', brother of song, or of the upright), the officer who was "over the household" of Solomon (1 Kings 4:6), i. e., steward, or governor of the palace, a place of great importance and influence in the East, B. C. 960.

AHITH'OPHEL (Heb. אֲחִיתּוֹפֵל, akh-ee-tho'-fel, brother of folly), a counselor of David, whose wisdom was so highly esteemed that his advice had the authority of a divine oracle (2 Sam. 16:23). Absalom, when he revolted, sent to Ahithophel, who was at Giloh, his native city, and secured his adhesion. He, perhaps, thought to wield a greater sway under the prince than he had done under David, and also resented David's conduct to his granddaughter, Bath-sheba (comp. 2 Sam. 11:3 with ch. 23:34). When David heard of Ahithophel's defection, he prayed God to turn his counsel "to foolishness" (doubtless alluding to his name), and induced Hushai, his friend, to go over to Absalom to defeat the counsels of this now dangerous enemy (15:31-37). Ahithophel's advice to Absalom was to show that the breach between him and his father was irreparable by publicly taking possession of the royal harem (16:20-23). He also recommended immediate pursuit of David, and would probably have succeeded had not Hushai's plausible advice been accepted by the council. When Ahithophel saw that his counsel was rejected for that of Hushai the far-seeing man gave up the cause of Absalom for lost; and he forthwith returned to his home in Giloh, hanged himself, and was buried in the sepulcher of his father (2 Sam. 17), B. C. 967.

AHI'TUB (Heb. אֲחִיתּוּב, akh-ee-toob', brother of goodness).

1. The son of Phinehas and grandson of Eli. He probably succeeded the latter in the high priesthood, his father being slain in battle, B. C. 1141. He was succeeded by his son, Ahiah, or Ahimelech (1 Sam. 14:3; 22:9, 11, 20), B. C. about 994.

2. The son of Amariah and father of Zadok, who was made high priest by Saul after the death of Ahimelech (2 Sam. 8:17; 1 Chron. 6:8), B. C. 984. It is not probable that this Ahitub was ever high priest. The coincidence of the names (1 Chron. 6:8, 11, 12) would lead us to infer that the latter list was spurious, or that by the Ahitub found therein is meant Azariah (2 Chron. 31:10). Of the Ahitub mentioned in 1 Chron. 9:11; Neh. 11:11 nothing definite is known, save that he was "ruler of the house of God."

AH'LAB (Heb. אֲחִלָב, akh-lawb', fatness, i. e., fertile), a town of Asher, whose inhabitants the Israelites were unable to expel (Judg. 1:31). It has not been identified.

AHLAI (Heb. אַחְלַי, akh-lah'ee, Oh that! wishful).

1. The daughter of Sheshan, a descendant of Judah, married to her father's Egyptian slave, JARHA (q. v.), by whom she had Attai (1 Chron. 2:31, 34, 35).

2. The father of one of David's valiant men (1 Chron. 11:41), B. C. 991.

AHO'AH (Heb. אַחוֹאֵה, akh-o'-akh, brotherly), the son of Bela, the son of Benjamin (1 Chron. 8:4); called also Ahiah (v. 7), and perhaps Iri (1 Chron. 7:7), B. C. probably about 1600. It is probably he whose descendants are called Aho-hites (2 Sam. 23:9, 28).

AHO'HITE (Heb. אַחוֹחִיטִי, akh-o-khee), a patronymic applied to Dodo or Dodai, one of the captains under Solomon (1 Chron. 27:4); his son Eleazar, one of David's three chief warriors (2 Sam. 23:9; 1 Chron. 11:12); and Zalmon, or Ilai, another bodyguard (2 Sam. 23:18; 1 Chron. 11:29); probably from their descent from אַחוֹאֵה (q. v.).

AHO'LAH (Heb. אַחֹלָה, ah-hol-aw', her own tent), the name of a probably imaginary harlot, used by Ezekiel (23:4, 5, 36, 44) as a symbol of the idolatry of Samaria, the apostate branch of Judah being designated by Aholibah. The terms indicate respectively that, while the worship of Samaria had been self-invented, and never sanctioned by Jehovah, that at Jerusalem was divinely instituted, but now degraded and abandoned for foreign alliances. They are both graphically described as lewd women, adulteresses, prostituting themselves to the Egyptians and Assyrians, in imitating their abominations and idolatries; wherefore the allegory is an epitome of the history of the Jewish Church (Kitto, s. v.).

AHO'LIAB (Heb. אַחֹלִיאֵב, ah-hol-e-awb', tent of his father), the son of Ahisamach, of the tribe of Dan, an expert workman in the precious metals and other materials, and, together with Bezaleel, appointed to superintend the preparation of such articles for the tabernacle (Exod. 31:6; 35:34; 36:1, 2; 38:23), B. C. 1210.

AHOL'BAH (Heb. אַחֹלְבָה, ah-hol-ee-baw', my tent is in her), a symbolical name given to Jerusalem (Ezek. 23:4, 11, 22, 36, 44), under the figure of an adulterous harlot, as having once contained the true worship of Jehovah, and having prostituted herself to foreign idolatries. See AHOLAH.

AHOLIBA'MAH (Heb. אַחֹלִיבַמָּה, ah-hol-e-baw-maw', tent of the height).

1. The granddaughter of Zibeon the Hivite, and one of the wives of Esau (Gen. 36:2), B. C. about 2100. In the earlier narrative (Gen. 26:34) Aholibamah is called Judith the daughter of Beeri the Hittite. The probable explanation is that her proper name was Judith, and that Aholibamah was the name that she received as the wife of Esau and foundress of the three tribes of his descendants.

2. One of the dukes who sprang from Esau (Gen. 36:41; 1 Chron. 1:52). The list of names in which this is included is probably of places, and not of persons. This would seem to be evident from the expression in the heading, "after their places by their names," (v. 40) as compared with v. 43, "according to their habitations in the land of their possession" (Keil, in loco; Smith, Dictionary, s. v.).

AHU'MAI (Heb. אַחֹמַי, akh-oo-mah'ee, brother of water), the son of Jahath, a descendant of Judah, and of the family of the Zorathites (1 Chron. 4:2), B. C. about 1300.

AHU'ZAM (Heb. אַחֹזָם, akh-ooz-zawm', their possession), the first named of the four sons of Ashur ("father of Tekoa") by one of his wives, Naarah, of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 4:6), B. C. about 1300.

AHU'ZATH (Heb. אַחֹזָת, akh-ooz-zath', possession), one of the friends (perhaps "favorite") of the Philistine king Abimelech, who accompanied him on his visit to Isaac (Gen. 26:26), B. C. about 2100.

AI (Heb. אֵי, ah'ee, ruin, heap of ruins).

1. One of the royal cities of the Canaanites, and the scene of Joshua's defeat (Josh. 10:1; Gen. 12:8; 13:3). It lay to the E. of Beth-el, beside "Beth-aven." It was the second Canaanite city captured by Israel (Josh. 7:2-5; 8:1-29).

2. A town of the Ammonites, apparently opposite Heshbon (Jer. 49:3). Nothing is known of this Ai. Some have thought that the correct reading of the name (as Isa. 15:1) should be Ar.

AI'AH (Heb. אֵיֵא, ah-yaw', a cry, often hawk).

1. The first named of the two sons of Zibeon the Horite, or rather Hivite (Gen. 36:24, A. V., Ajah; 1 Chron. 1:40), B. C. about 1840.

2. The father of Rizpah, Saul's concubine (2 Sam. 3:7; 21:8, 10, 11), B. C. about 1053.

AI'ATH (Heb. אֵיֵת, ah-yawth', Isa. 10:28), another form of the city AI (q. v.).

AI'JA (Heb. אֵיֵי, ah-yaw', Neh. 11:31), another form of AI (q. v.).

AI'JALON, another form of the city AJALON (q. v.).

AI'JELETH SHA'HAR occurs in the title of Psa. 22. See MUSIC.

A'IN (Heb. עַיִן, ah'-yin), literally, an eye, and also, in the simple but vivid imagery of the East, a spring or natural burst of living water, always contradistinguished from the well or tank of artificial formation, and which latter is designated by the words Beer and Bor. Ain oftenest occurs in combination with other words forming the names of definite localities, as En-gedi, En-gannim, etc. It occurs alone in two cases:

1. One of the landmarks on the eastern boundary of Palestine, as described by Moses (Num. 34:11). It is probably Ain el-'Azy, the main source of the Orontes, as spring remarkable for its force and magnitude.

2. One of the southernmost cities of Judah (Josh. 15:32), afterward allotted to Simeon (Josh. 19:7; 1 Chron. 4:32) and given to the priests (Josh. 21:16). In the list of priests' cities in 1 Chron. 6:59 Ashan takes the place of Ain.

AIR (Gr. ἀήρ, ah-ayr', the air, particularly the lower and denser, as distinguished from the higher and rarer, ὁ αἰθήρ, ether, the atmospheric region (Acts 22:23; 1 Thess. 4:17; Rev. 9:2; 16:17). In Eph. 2:2 "the ruler of the powers of the air" is the devil, the prince of the demons that, according to Jewish opinion, fill the realm of the air. It is not to be considered as equivalent to darkness (Gr. σκότος). "To beat the air" (ἀέρα δέρειν, 1 Cor. 9:26) refers to pugilists who miss their aim, and means "to contend in vain." "To speak into the air" (εἰς ἄρα λαλεῖν, 1 Cor. 14:9, i. e., without effect) is used of those who speak what is not understood by their hearers.

A'JAH, another form of ΔΙΑΗ (q. v.).

AJ'ALON, or AJ'JALON (Heb. אַיְאֵלֹן, ah-yav-loné, place of deer or gazelles).

1. A Levitical city of Dan (Josh. 19:42); a city of refuge (Josh. 21:24; 1 Sam. 14:31; 1 Chron. 6:69). It was with reference to the valley named after this town that Joshua said, "Sun, stand thou still upon Gibeon; and thou, Moon, in the valley of Ajalon" (Josh. 10:12). Ajalon is the modern Yalo, fourteen miles from Jerusalem, north of the Jaffa road.

2. A city in the tribe of Zebulun (Judg. 12:12). Elon, the judge, was buried there. The modern Jalun.

A'KAN (Heb. אַכָּן, aw-kawn', twisted), the last named of the three sons of Ezer, the son of Seir, the Horite (Gen. 36:27), called also (1 Chron. 1:42) Jakan.

AK'KUB (Heb. אַכְּוּב, ak-koob', insidious).

1. The fourth named of the seven sons of Elieonai, or Esi, a descendant of David (1 Chron. 3:24).

2. One of the Levitical gatekeepers of the temple after the captivity (1 Chron. 9:17; Neh. 11:19; 12:25), B. C. 536. Perhaps the same who assisted Ezra in expounding the law to the people (Neh. 8:7). His descendants appear to have succeeded to the office (Ezra 2:42).

3. The head of one of the families of Nethinim that returned from Babylon (Ezra 2:45), B. C. 536.

AKRAB'BIM (Heb. אַקְרַבִּים, ak-rab-beem', a deep of scorpions), a place, as the name suggests, which abounded in scorpions, and located where the country ascends from the neighborhood of the southern end of the Dead Sea to the level of Palestine. It is called the ascent of Akrabhim (Num. 34:4).

ALABASTER. See MINERAL KINGDOM.

ALAMETH (less correct form of ALEMETH, q. v.), the last named of the nine sons of Becher, the son of Benjamin (1 Chron. 7:8).

ALAM'MELECH (Heb. אֶלְאָמֶלֶךְ, al-lam-meh'-lek, oak of [the] king), a town in the territory of Asher (Josh. 19:26).

AL'AMOTH, a musical term (1 Chron. 15:20; title Psa. 46). See Music.

ALARM (Heb. תְּרוּעָה, ter-oo-aw', a loud noise or shout), the peculiar sound of the silver trumpet of the Hebrews, giving them signals while on their journey (Lev. 23:24; 25:9; Num. 10:5, 6; 29:1). "In times of peace, when the people or rulers were to be assembled together, the trumpet was blown softly (Heb. טְרַף). When the camps were to move forward, or the people march to war, it was sounded with a deeper note" (Jahn, Bibl. Arch., 95, v). A war note, or call to arms, or other public emergency (Jer. 4:19; 49:2; Zeph. 1:16). See GLOSSARY.

AL'EMETH (Heb. אֶלְעֵמֶת, aw-leh'-meth, covering), the first named of the sons of Jehoadah, or Jarah, the son of Ahaz, of the posterity of Saul (1 Chron. 8:36; 9:42), B. C. after 1030.

ALEXAN'DER (Gr. Ἀλέξανδρος, al-ex'-an-dros, man-defender).

1. A man, whose father, Simon, a Cyrenian Jew, was compelled to bear the cross of Jesus (Mark 15:21).

2. A kinsman, probably, of the high priest, and one of the chief men in Jerusalem, present at the examination of Peter and John before the Sanhedrin for the cure of the lame man (Acts 4:6), A. D. 30.

3. A Jew of Ephesus, known only from the part he took in the uproar about Diana, which was raised there by the preaching of Paul (Acts 19:33), A. D. 58. He was probably put forward by the Jews to defend them from any connection with the Christians. His appeal to them for opportunity was in vain, an uproar following for two hours.

4. A coppersmith or brazier, who, with Hymenæus and others, apostatized (1 Tim. 1:20). It is not certain, but not at all improbable, that he is the same person as the one mentioned in 2 Tim. 4:14, who seems to have opposed and hindered Paul.

ALEXANDRIA (Gr. Ἀλεξάνδρεια, al-ex-ant'-res-ah), a celebrated city and seaport of Egypt, situated on a narrow stretch of land between Lake Mareotis and the Mediterranean, about twelve miles from the Canopic mouth of the Nile. It was named for Alexander (man-defender), who founded it about B. C. 333. The long, narrow island of Pharos was formed into a sort of breakwater to the port, by joining the middle of the island to the mainland by means of a mole, seven stadia in length, and hence called the Hepta-stadium. Upon the island of Pharos was constructed the famous lighthouse, which Alexander called after his friend Hephaestion, but not finished till the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus, B. C. 284-246.

The most famous of all the public buildings planned by Ptolemy Soter were a library and museum, or college of philosophy, the professors of which were supported out of the public income. The library soon became the largest in the world, numbering seven hundred thousand when the Saracens destroyed it by fire. It was here that the version of the Scriptures called the Septuagint was made by the seventy learned men who gave it its name.

Alexandria is not named in the Old Testament, and only incidentally in the New Testament (Acts 2:10; 6:9; 18:24; 27:6), and yet it is most important in connection with the history of the Jews, and from the foundation of an independent sect of the Jewish religion.

ALEXANDRIAN (Gr. Ἀλεξανδρεῖς, al-ex-and-reuce'), an inhabitant of Alexandria in Egypt, specially a Jew resident there (Acts 6:9; 18:24). The Jews, being highly valued as citizens, were encouraged to settle in the city, and were admitted into the first of its three classes of citizens, having equal rights with the Greek inhabitants. In the reign of Tiberius (A. D. 16), the Jews in Alexandria numbered about one third of the population. Notwithstanding many persecutions and massacres, they continued to form a large proportion of the population, and retained their civil rights till A. D. 415, when forty thousand of them were expelled at the instigation of Cyril, the Christian patriarch. They recovered their strength, and appear to have been very numerous at the time of the Saracen conquest.

ALGUM, or ALMUG. See VEGETABLE KINGDOM.

ALI'AH (Heb. אֲלִיָּא, al-ee-yaw', perhaps evil), a less correct form of ALVAH (q. v.). The second named of the dukes of Edom, descended from Esau (1 Chron. 1:51).

ALI'AN (Heb. אֲלִיָּא, al-yawn', tall), a less correct form of the name ALVAN (q. v.). The first named of the five sons of Shobal, a descendant of Seir (1 Chron. 1:40), B. C. about 1858.

ALIEN (Heb. גַּר, gare; נָכַר, nay-kawr', both stranger; Gr. ἄλλοτριος, al-loy'-ree-os, belonging to another, i. e., foreign), a foreigner, or person born in another country, and thus not entitled to the rights of citizenship in the country in which he lives (Exod. 18:3; Deut. 14:21; Eph. 2:12, etc.). See FOREIGNER.

ALL, ALLEGE. See GLOSSARY.

ALLEGORY (Gr. ἀλληγορέω, al-lay-gor-eh'-o), occurs only once (Gal. 4:24), "Which things are to be allegorized" (Gr. ἀπὸ ἀστὺν ἀλληγοροῦμενα). "To allegorize" (ἀλληγορεῖν) means to express or explain one thing under the image of another. "St. Paul is here declaring, under the influence of the Holy Spirit, that the passage he has cited has a second and a deeper meaning than it appears to have: that it has that meaning, then, is a positive, objective, and indisputable truth" (Ellicott, Com.). To say that a history is allegorized is quite different from saying that it is allegory itself. "As Hagar bore children to bondage, so does the Sinaitic covenant produce sons under circumcisonal bondage to the heavy ritual" (Whedon, Com.). Dean Trench says, "The allegory needs not, as the parable, an interpretation to be brought to it from without, since it contains its interpretation within itself." The real object of the allegory is to convey a moral truth. Every allegory is a kind of parable, containing a statement of a few simple facts followed by the explanation or allegorical interpretation (Luke 8:5-15). The allegories found in Scripture are its parabolical representation, such as, in the Old Testament, Canticles, Psalms 45, 80, Isa. 5:1-7, and in the New the parables of our Lord.

In early times there was an allegorical mode of interpreting the historical portions of the Old Testament, which reached its climax in the writings and school of Origen. It assumed a double or threefold sense of the Scriptures, an obvious literal sense, and a hidden spiritual sense, both being intended by the author. Thus the book of Joshua has recently been treated as an allegory of the soul's victory over sin and self. The allegorical interpretation of the Bible arose among the Alexandrian Jews in their attempt to reconcile the Mosaic account with Greek philosophy. The four rivers of Paradise were Plato's four cardinal virtues. Adam was the lower, sensuous man, etc. The early Christian Church received allegorical interpretation also from the Jews of Alexandria, wishing to reconcile Christianity with Greek thought. Origen taught a threefold sense of Scripture, corresponding to man's body, soul, and spirit. As we come to the Middle Ages, four senses were found in Scripture: historical, allegorical, moral, and anagogical; e. g., Jerusalem is, literally, a city of Palestine; allegorically, the Church; morally, the believing soul; anagogically, the heavenly Jerusalem.

Swedenborg held that "all and every part of Scripture, even the most minute, not excepting the smallest jot or tittle, signify and involve spiritual and celestial things" (Arcana Cælestia, i, 2). This mode of interpreting Scripture is very fascinating and yet dangerous, because there is a temptation to read into the word one's imaginings, and not to be content with its plain and simple teachings.

ALLELUIA, ALLELUJAH (Gr. ἀλλη-λοῦν, a Grecized form (Rev. 19:1, 3, 4, 6) of HALLELUJAH (q. v.).

ALLIANCE, the political or social relations formed between nations by treaty. In Scripture such compacts are known as leagues, covenants, treaties, etc. In this article we treat them only as related to the Israelites.

1. Pre-Mosaic. The patriarchs entered into international relations with the peoples of Canaan, for their subsistence in the land of promise, but not yet given in actual possession. Abraham was "confederate" with some of the Canaanite princes (Gen. 14:13), and he also entered into an alliance with Abimelech the Philistine king (Gen. 21:22-24, 32), which was renewed by their sons (Gen. 26:27, sq.).

2. Mosaic. Israel, as the covenant people of Jehovah, was to hold itself aloof from heathen influences and idolaters; and, therefore, when they settled in Palestine, intercourse with such nations was strongly interdicted (Lev. 18:3, 4; 20:22, 23). Their country and their occupation protected them from mixing with peoples which would have endangered their nationality and mission. But it was by no means intended that they should live without any intercourse with other nations; but to cultivate friendly relations with them, and seek their good. The Mosaic legislation taught Israel to love and respect strangers (Exod. 22:20; 23:9; Lev. 19:33, sq.; Deut. 10:18, 19). The law commands Israel to root out the nations of Canaan, because of their abominations, and to make no covenant with them (Exod. 23:32, sq.; 34:12, sq.; Deut. 7:1, sq.); also the Amalekites (Exod. 17:14, 16; Deut. 25:17-19), because of their cruel attack upon the Israelites. Yet it forbade them to make war upon the other peoples, the Edomites, Ammonites, and Moabites, or to conquer their land (Deut. 2:4, sq.). The law, therefore, was not opposed to Israel's forming friendly and peaceful relations with other peoples, nor even to maintain peace with them by covenants and treaties.

3. In Later Times. When the commonwealth of Israel was fully established in Canaan, formal alliances sprang up between it and other nations. Thus David entered into friendly relations with Hiram, king of Tyre (2 Sam. 5:11), and with King Hanun, the Amorite (2 Sam. 10:2); and Solomon made a treaty with Hiram to furnish materials and workmen for the temple (2 Kings 5:15, sq.). In neither case was their theocratic standing falsified or endangered. Solomon also entered into treaty relations with a Pharaoh, by which he secured the monopoly of trade in horses and other products (1 Kings 10:28, 29). We find Asa, when at war with Baasha, king of Israel, sending an embassy to Ben-hadad, king of Syria, reminding him of a league existing between Israel and Judah (2 Chron. 20:35, 36), which ceased in Jehu's reign. When Pekah, king of Israel, with Rezin, king of Syria, laid siege to Jerusalem, Ahaz formed a league with Tiglath-pileser, king of Assyria (2 Kings 16:5-7). Later we find the kings of Judah alternately allying themselves with Egypt and Assyria, according as the one or other of these powers was most likely to aid them.

The prophets, however, rightly denounced the treaties by which Israel, distrusting the help of its God, sought to find support from the invasion of nations by allowing themselves to become entangled in idolatrous practices and licentious habits (Ezek. 16:23; Hos. 5).

Respecting the rites by which treaties were ratified, see COVENANTS.

AL'LON (Heb. אֵלֹן, al-lone', an oak).

1. Easton says: "The expression in the A. V. of Josh. 19:33, 'from Allon to Zaananim,' is more correctly rendered in the R. V. 'from the oak in Zaananim,'" which served as a landmark.

2. The son of Jedaiah and father of Shiphai, a chief Simeonite, of the family of those who expelled the Hamites from the valley of Gedor (1 Chron. 4:37), B. C. about 715.

AL'LON-BACH'UTH (Heb. אֵלֹן בְּכֹוֹת, al-lone' baw-kooth', oak of weeping), a landmark consisting of a tree marking the spot where Deborah, Rebekah's nurse, was buried (Gen. 35:8).

ALLOW. See GLOSSARY.

ALMIGHTY, the word used in the Old Testament as the translation of the Hebrew אֱלֹהִים, shad-dah'ee, mighty, as, "I am the Almighty God" (Gen. 17:1). In the New Testament it is the word for the Greek παντοκράτωρ, pan-tok-rat'ore, all-powerful.

ALMODAD (Heb. אֶלְמוֹדָד, al-mo-dawd', meaning unknown), the son of Joktan, of the family of Shem (Gen. 10:26; 1 Chron. 1:20), B. C. before 2300. He is supposed to have been the founder of an Arabian tribe, the locality of which is unknown.

AL'MON (Heb. אֶלְמוֹן, al-mone', hidden), the last named of the four sacerdotal cities of Benjamin (Josh. 21:18; Alemeth, 1 Chron. 6:60). It is identified with the ruins of Almit, or el-Mid.

ALMOND. See VEGETABLE KINGDOM.

AL'MON-DIBLATHA'IM (Heb. אֶלְמוֹן דִּבְלַתְחַיִּים, al-mone' dib-law-thaw'-yem-aw), the fifty-first station of the Israelites in the wilderness E. of the Dead Sea (Num. 33:46, 47). Perhaps the same with Beth-diblathaim (Jer. 48:22), and Diblath (Ezek. 6:14).

ALMS, ALMSDEEDS (Gr. ελεημοσύνη, el-eh-ay-mos-oo'-nay, beneficence, or the benefaction itself). In Heb. צְדָקָה, tsed-aw-kaw', righteousness, is the usual equivalent for alms (Psa. 24:5; Prov. 10:2; 11:4; Mic. 6:5). The word alms is not found in the A. V. of the Old Testament, but is met with frequently in the Apocrypha. The great antiquity of almsgiving is shown in Job 29:13, sq.

1. Jewish Almsgiving. The general distribution of property in Israel, and the precautions taken to prevent the alienation of inheritances on the one hand, as well as the undue accumulation of wealth on the other, with the promised blessing of Jehovah in case of obedience, tended to make extreme poverty very rare. Still, there would arise cases of need. Moses imposed for all time the obligation, "Therefore I command thee, saying, Thou shalt open thine hand wide unto thy brother, to thy poor, and to thy needy, in thy land" (Deut. 15:11). Specific provisions were made for the regular distribution of alms on a large scale among the poorer members of the commonwealth—the Sabbatical year—"that the poor of the people might eat" (Exod. 23:11); the gleanings of field and fruit and the forgotten sheaf (Lev. 23:22; Deut. 24:19-22); the tithings laid up in store every third year for the Levite, the stranger, the fatherless, and the widow (Deut. 14:28, 29); the freeing at Jubilee of the poor (Lev. 25:39-54); the law giving the poor the right to enter a field or vineyard and satisfy hunger (Deut. 23:24, 25); interest forbidden on loans to the poor (Exod. 22:25; Lev. 25:35, 36); the command to entertain at the annual festivals the Levite, stranger, orphan, and poor (Deut. 16:11-14). It is only as we remember these laws that we can understand the expression righteousness, which the Old Testament uses to express the idea of charity (Deut. 24:13; Prov. 10:2; 11:14). Literally meaning right or acts of right, or justice, tsedakah' came to mean "charity," because according to the Mosaic law the poor had an inalienable right to certain produce of the soil. Hence it does not exactly correspond to our term "alms," but occupies a midway position between deeds of right and love.

Very naturally, almsgiving came to be considered a virtue (Ezek. 18:7; Prov. 19:17), and a violation of the statutes regarding it a heinous sin (Isa. 58:6, 7). Among the later Jews poverty became quite prevalent, owing to foreign dominion and the oppression of wealthy Israelites. The Mosaic statutes were changed to meet the increasing claims upon the charity and benevolence of the community. Two collections were ordered: (1) a daily collection of food (Heb. תַּמְכוּת, tam-khoo', alms for the dish), distributed every morning; and (2) a weekly collection of money (קוּפָּא, koop-paw', alms for the box), distributed weekly. There was also a chamber in the temple where alms were secretly deposited for the poor of good families who did not wish to openly receive charity.

Almsgiving came to be associated with merit, and was looked upon as a means of conciliating God's favor and warding off evil (Dan. 4:27), and as among the essential virtues of the godly (Isa. 58:4-7; Ezek. 18:7; Amos 2:7). To be reduced to soliciting alms was regarded as a curse from God, and Judaism gave no encouragement to begging as a sacred calling.

2. Christian. Almsgiving was noticed by Jesus in his warning against following the example of those who gave "to be seen of men." He urged his followers to give without ostentation, looking to God alone for reward (Matt. 6:1-4). The Christian spirit of caring for the needy is forcibly expressed (1 John 3:17). Christianity does not encourage indolence and consequent poverty (2 Thess. 3:10); and yet is very emphatic in insisting upon the general duty of ministering to those in distress (Luke 3:11; 6:30; 12:33; Acts 9:37; 10:2, 4). The disposition of the giver is of more account than the amount of the gift (Mark 12:42; 2 Cor. 8:12; see also Acts 11:29 Rom. 12:13; Eph. 4:28; 1 Tim. 6:18; Heb. 13:16).

ALMUG TREE. See VEGETABLE KINGDOM.

ALOE, ALOES. See VEGETABLE KINGDOM.

A'LOTH (Heb. אֶלוֹת, aw-loth', 1 Kings 4:16).

See BEALOTH.

ALPHA AND O'MEGA

(Gr. ἀλφα, al'-fah; ὦμεγα, o'-meg-ah), the first and last letters of the Greek alphabet, used to express the eternity of God (Rev. 1:8, 11; 21:6; 22:13; see also Isa. 44:6). The early Christians frequently placed the letters A, alpha, and Ω, omega, on either side of the cruciform monogram, formed from the letters X, chi, and P, rho, the first two letters of the name Christ in Gr. ΧΡΙΣΤΟΣ.

ALPHÆUS (Gr. Ἀλφαῖος, al-fah'-yos).

1. The putative father of James the Less (Matt. 10:3; Mark 3:18; Luke 6:15; Acts 1:13), and husband of that Mary who, with the mother of Jesus and others, was standing by the cross during the crucifixion (John 19:25). By comparing John 19:25 with Luke 24:10 and Matt. 10:3 it appears that Alphæus is the Greek, and Cleophas, or CLOPAS (q. v.), the Hebrew or Syriac, name of the same person.

2. The father of the evangelist Levi, or Matthew (Mark 2:14).

ALPHE'US. See ALPHÆUS.

ALTAR (from Lat. altus, high; ara, eleva- tion; Heb. מִזְבֵּחַ, miz-bay'-akh; Gr. θυσιαστήριον, thoo-see-as-tay'-ree-on, place of sacrifice).

1. Early. The altar was originally a simple elevation made of earth, rough stones, or turf. The altars for constant use, especially in temple service, were generally of stone, though they might be of other materials. Thus, in Greece, several were built of the ashes of burnt offerings, as that of Zeus at Olympia; and one at Delos made of goats' horns. The probability is that some of the ancient monuments of unhewn stones, usually thought to be Druidical remains, were derived from altars of primitive times, as cromlechs, in the form of a table, one large stone being supported in a horizontal position upon other stones.

Another form of altar was a heap of small stones with a large, flat stone placed upon its top. Many of these cairns still remain. In some instances, as at Stonehenge, a circle of stones incloses a central one, somewhat similar in construction to those found in Persia. Two pictures discovered at Herculaneum represent sacred Egyptian ceremonies, probably in honor of Isis. The altars in these pictures have at each corner a rising, which continues square to about one half its height, gradually sloping off to an edge or point. These are, no doubt, the "horns of the altar" (Exod. 27:2, sq.). See SUPPLEMENT.

Heathen altars generally faced the east, standing one behind the other, and so placed that the images of the gods appeared behind them. Upon them were carved the name of the deity or some appropriate symbols. They were of two kinds, higher and lower: the higher for the celestial gods, and called by the Romans altaria; the lower for terrestrial deities, and called arae. There was a third kind of altar, enclabris, or enclabris, a sort of table on which the sacrificial utensils were placed and the entrails of victims laid. The mensa sacra was a table on which incense was sometimes presented and offerings not intended to be burned. Some altars, as well as temples, were dedicated to more than one god; we even read of some being dedicated to all the gods.

2. Hebrew. The first altar on record is the one built by Noah after leaving the ark (Gen. 8:20). Mention is made of altars erected by Abraham (Gen. 12:7; 13:4; 22:9), by Isaac (26:25), by Jacob (33:20; 35:1, 8), and by Moses (Exod. 17:15; 20:24-26). In the tabernacle and temple two altars were erected, the one for sacrifices and the other for incense.

1. The Altar of Burnt Offering (Heb. מִזְבֵּחַ הַיְשׁוּלָה, miz-bakh' havo-o-law', Exod. 30:28; brazen altar, מִזְבֵּחַ הַיְהוֹשֻׁעַ, miz-bakh' hannekh-sheth', Exod. 39:39; table of the Lord, Mal. 1:7, 12). This altar differed in construction, etc., at different times.

(a) In the Tabernacle (Exod. 27:38) it was a hollow square, five cubits in length and breadth and three cubits high, and was made of shittim (acacia) wood, overlaid with brass (probably copper). The corners terminated in "horns" (q. v.). The altar had a grating, which projected through openings on two sides, and had four rings fastened to it for the poles with which the altar was carried. These poles were made of the same materials as the altar. The priests being forbidden to go up to the altar by steps (Exod. 20:26), the earth was, probably, raised about the altar to enable them to serve easily.

The utensils for the altar (Exod. 27:3), made of brass (copper), were, ash pans; shovels, for cleaning the altar; basins, for receiving the blood to be sprinkled on the altar; flesh hooks, i. e., large forks, to handle the pieces of flesh; fire pans (Exod. 38:3, called censers, Num. 16:17); snuff dishes (Exod. 26:38). According to Lev. 6:13, the fire on this altar was never to be allowed to go out.

(b) In Solomon's Temple. In adapting the instruments of worship to the larger proportions of the temple, the altar of burnt offering was, naturally, increased in size. It became now a square of twenty cubits, with a height of ten cubits (2 Chron. 4:1), made of brass (bronze or copper). This is the altar that was repaired by Asa (2 Chron. 15:8), removed by Ahaz, probably to make room for the one erected after a model seen by him in Damascus (2 Kings 16:14), "cleansed" by Hezekiah (2 Chron. 29:18), and rebuilt by Manasseh (2 Chron. 33:16).

(c) In the Second Temple. This altar was erected before the temple (Ezra 3:3, 6), and on the place occupied by the former (Josephus, Ant., xi, 4, 1). It was probably made of unhewn stone (Exod. 20:15), for in the account of the temple service by Judas Maccabæus it is said, "They took whole stones according to the law, and built a new altar according to the former" (1 Macc. 4:47).

(d) In Herod's Temple. According to Josephus, this altar was a square whose sides were fifty cubits each, with a height of fifteen cubits. It had corners like horns, and the passage up to it was by an insensible acclivity from the south. It was formed without any iron tool, nor did any iron tool so much as touch it at any time (Wars, v, 5, 6). According to the Mishna, it was a square thirty-two cubits at the base, and decreasing at intervals until it was twenty-four cubits. The Mishna states, according to Josephus, that the stones were unhewn, and whitewashed every year at the Passover and the Feast of Tabernacles. A pipe connected with the S. W. horn conveyed the blood of victims by a subterranean passage to Kedron.

2. Altar of Incense (Heb. מִזְבֵּחַ מִקְטָר, miz-bakh' mik-tar' ket-o-reth', altar of incensing of incense, Exod. 30:1; called also the golden altar, מִזְבֵּחַ הַזָּהָב, miz-bakh' haz-zaw-hawb', Exod. 39:38; Num. 4:11).

(a) This would seem to be the "altar of wood," further described as "the table that is before the Lord" (Ezek. 41:22). It was made of shittim wood overlaid with gold, and was one cubit square, with a height of two cubits having horns of the same materials (Lev. 4:7). Running around the sides near the top was a "crown" (border) of gold, beneath which were rings for the staves of shittim wood covered with gold, "to bear it withal" (Exod. 30:1-5). Its place was in front of the veil, midway between the walls (Lev. 16:18; Exod. 30:6). In Exod. 40:5 Moses was commanded to place this altar "before the ark of the testimony," and in Heb. 9:4 it is enumerated among the articles within the second veil, i. e., in the Holy of Holies. The meaning, probably, is that the great typical and symbolical importance of this altar associated it with the Holy of Holies.

(b) In Solomon's Temple this altar was similar, but made of cedar (1 Kings 6:20; 7:48; 1 Chron. 28:18). Upon this altar incense was burned every morning and evening (Exod. 30:7, 8), and the blood of atonement was sprinkled upon it (v. 10). Being placed immediately before the throne of Jehovah (ark of the covenant), it was the symbol of believing and acceptable prayer.

This is the only altar which appears in the heavenly temple (Isa. 6:6; Rev. 8:3, 41). It was the altar at which Zacharias was ministering when the angel appeared to him (Luke 1:11).

3. Mention is made (a) In Isa. 65:3 of "altars of brick," which Rosenmüller thinks an allusion to some Babylonish custom of burning incense on bricks covered with magical formulas or cunei-form inscriptions. (b) Of the Assyrian-Damascene altar erected by Ahaz from model seen by him in Damascus (2 Kings 16:10-13). (c) An altar to the "unknown God" (ἀγνώστῳ θεῷ, Acts 17:23). Reliable authorities assure us that there were several altars in Athens with this inscription. Meyer (Com., in loco) says, with reference to the meaning of this inscription, "On important occasions, when the reference to a god known by name was wanting, as in public calamities of which no definite god could be assigned as the author, in order to honor or propitiate the god concerned by sacrifice, without lighting on a wrong one, altars were erected which destined and designated ἀγνώστῳ θεῷ."

4. Christian. An elevated table or slab consecrated for the sacrament of the holy Eucharist.

I. NAMES. (1) Trapeza (Gr. τράπεζα, a table, 1 Cor. 10:21), the term most commonly used by the Greek fathers and in Greek liturgies. (2) Thusiastērion (Gr. θυσιαστήριον, the place of sacrifice, Heb. 13:10). (3) Mensa Domini, or mensa Dominica, is frequently employed by the Latin fathers. An altar raised in honor of a martyr often bore his name, as "mensa Cypriani." Mensa is frequently used to designate the slab which forms the top of the altar. (4) Ara is used by Tertullian with some qualification, but was repudiated by the early Christian apologists on account of its heathen associations. This term, in the rubrics, means a portable altar (q. v.) or consecrated slab, and is also used for the substructure on which the mensa, or altar proper, was placed. (5) By far the most common name employed by the Latin fathers and in liturgical diction is altare, a high altar. In the first prayer book of Edward VI the altar was called "God's board."

II. FORM AND MATERIAL. In early times the altar was usually of wood, and altars of this kind are in the churches of St. John Lateran and St. Praxedes at Rome. These early altars, no doubt, were like tables in their form and general character, in remembrance of the Jewish solemnity at which Jesus instituted the holy Eucharist. The change of material from wood to stone probably grew out of the use of tombs in the Catacombs, in the celebration of the Lord's Supper. Afterward, when the Church had peace, the form of a tomb was preserved. As wealth increased altars were frequently constructed of silver and gold, sometimes of bronze and copper, elaborately embossed, engraved, and adorned with enamels. The altars of country churches were commonly of stone, without carving or ornamentation. In the Eastern churches the altars are generally wooden; and so in England since the 16th century. The law of the Church of England requires that the lower portion of the altar be of wood. "The use of wood as the material for their construction connected the solemn act there wrought upon them with the offering on Calvary; the use of stone symbolized the sure foundation of the faith" (Lee, Glossary of Liturg. Terms, p. 14). The slab of stone forming the top of the altar was marked with five crosses, in memory of the wounds of Jesus.

III. NUMBER AND POSITION. Of old, as in the Greek Church now, there was but one altar in a church, although exceptions to this rule existed even in the time of Constantine. At the end of the 6th century we find traces of a plurality of altars in Western churches; and in the 7th and 8th centuries the number had so increased that Charlemagne, in a capitulary (805-806) at Thionville, attempted to restrain their excessive multiplication. In the plan of the Church of St. Gall, Switzerland, there are no less than seventeen altars.

Anciently the altar stood away from the wall, at the chord of the apse, when the church ended in an apse; when the end of the church was square the altar occupied a corresponding position. The officiating priest stood with his back to the apse, and facing the congregation and entrance. As the number of altars increased in a church it was found convenient to place one or more against the wall.

IV. ACCESSORIES. Usually the altar was raised on steps, one, two, or three in number, from which the bishop sometimes preached. Under these steps was the cofessio, i. e., a small receptacle for relics, without which it is not customary to consecrate an altar. In the Eastern church a piscina is usually found under the altar. Altars from a very early date were inclosed within railings of wood, metal, or stone, upon which columns and arches of silver are fixed, and veils or curtains of rich stuff suspended from the arches.

No altar can be raised without relics, which were customarily kept (from the 9th century) on the top of the altar surrounded by an altar piece; later, the relics were returned to their former place, viz., under or in the altar.

AL-TAS'CHITH, a term found in title of Psalms 57, 58; 59, 75. See Music.

A'LUSH (Heb. אֶלֶשׁ, aw-loosh', place of wild beasts), the place of encampment of Israel in the desert, next to Rophidim, where was no water (Num. 33:13, 14).

AL'VAH (Heb. אֶלְוָה, al-vaw', perhaps evil), the second named of the Edomitish chieftains descended from Esau (Gen. 36:40). B. C. about 1496. The name is translated Alich in 1 Chron. 1:51.

AL'VAN (Heb. אֶלְוָן, al-vawn', tall), the first named of the five sons of Shobal, the Horite, of Mount Seir (Gen. 36:23); called also Alian (1 Chron. 1:40), B. C. about 1853.

A'MAD (Heb. אֶמָד, am-awd', people of duration), a town near the border of Asher (Josh. 19:26).

A'MAL (Heb. אֶמָל, aw-mawl', toil), the last named of the four sons of Helem, of the tribe of Asher (1 Chron. 7:35), B. C. about 1444.

AM'ALEK (Heb. אֶמְאֵלֶק, am-aw-lake', dweller in a valley), the son of Eliphaz (the firstborn of Esau) by his concubine, Timna (Gen. 36:12; 1 Chron. 1:36), and chieftain of an Idumæan tribe (Gen. 36:16), B. C. about 1740. This tribe was probably not the same with the Amalekites so often mentioned in Scriptures, for Moses speaks of the Amalekites long before this Amalek was born (Gen. 14:7). See AMALEKITES.

AM'ALEKITES (Heb. mostly אֶמְאֵלֶקִים, am-aw-lake', Amalek; more rarely אֶמְאֵלֶקִי, am-aw-lay-kee', the Amalekite), a very ancient race, whose history is thus summed up by Balaam (Num. 24:20): "Amalek was the first of the nations; but his latter end shall be that he perish forever." Arabian tradition, which, though unverifiable, is yet deserving of some respect, makes Amlak, or Amlik, the son of Lud, the son of Shem, though sometimes he is said to be the son of Aram, and represents that the Amalekites were driven westward from Babylonia before the time of Joktan.

In Abraham's time we find the Amalekites S. W. of the Dead Sea (Gen. 14:7). In the time of Moses they occupied all the desert of et Tih to the borders of Egypt, and most of the Sinaitic peninsula, with the south country of Palestine. There was also a "mount of the Amalekites" in Ephraim (Judg. 12:15). Some have felt justified in identifying the Amalekites with the Hyskos, or "shepherd kings," who ruled Egypt for five hundred years, according to some about the time of Israel's sojourn in Egypt. Two routes lay through the land of Amalek, one by the Isthmus of Suez to Egypt, the other by the Ælanitic arm of the Red Sea (i. e., the Gulf of Akabah). It has been thought that the expedition noticed Gen. 14 may have been connected with the opening of the latter route.

According to the view which we have taken, Amalek, the son of Esau (Gen. 36:12, 16), may have been progenitor of a tribe which was merged with the original Amalekites so as to form part of the great Amalekite race, or he may have taken his name from some connection with the Amalekites, possibly as Scipio won his name Africanus, or it may have been a mere coincidence. Historical accounts of Amalekites in southern Arabia will then refer to a time subsequent to their dispossession by the Israelites. According to another account, the Amalekites were from Yemen (Geikie, Hours with the Bible, ii, 253).

Some have supposed that all the Amalekites were descended from Amalek, son of Esau. In that case the language of Gen. 14:7 would mean what was afterward the country of the Amalekites.

The Amalekites were always bitter foes of Israel, sometimes alone, sometimes in conjunction with other tribes. Their first attack was made in time of distress at Rophidim. They were doomed to utter destruction; but though they suffered heavily, especially at the hands of Saul and David, the sentence was so imperfectly executed that there was a remnant to be smitten in the days of Hezekiah (1 Chron. 4:43). This is their last appearance in Bible history. In the Sinaitic peninsula are massive stone buildings averaging seven feet high by eight feet diameter inside; which may perhaps be remains of the Amalekites (Geikie, ii, 257).—W. H.

A'MAM (Heb. אֶמָם, am-awm', gathering-spot), a city in the south of Judah (Josh. 15:26), probably in the tract afterward assigned to Simeon (Josh. 19:1-9); probably midway between the Mediterranean and the Dead Sea.

AM'ANA, or AMA'NA (Heb. אֶמְנָה, am-aw-naw', fixed, i. e., a covenant).

1. The marginal reading (2 Kings 5:12) of ABANA (q. v.).

2. A mountain (Cant. 4:8), part of Anti-Libanus, from which the waters of Abana flow.

AMARANTHINE (Gr. ἀμαράντινος, am-aran'-lee-nos, unfading), the original of A. V. "that fadeth not away" (1 Pet. 5:4; comp. 1:4, Gr. ἀμαράντος), and "meaning composed of amaranth, a flower so called because it never withers or fades, and when plucked off revives if moistened with water; hence it is a symbol of perpetuity and immortality" (Grimm, Gr. Lex., s. v.).

AMARIAH (Heb. אֶמָרִיָּה, am-ar-yaw', said [i. e., promised] by Jehovah).

1. A person mentioned in 1 Chron. 6:7, 52, in the list of the descendants of Aaron by his eldest son, Eleazer, as the son of Meraioth and father of Ahitub, B. C. after 1210. There is no means of determining whether Amariah was ever high priest, but it is probable that he was the last of the high priests of Eleazer's line prior to its transfer to the line of Ithamar in the person of ELI (q. v.). Josephus calls him Arophæus, and says he lived in private, the pontificate being at the time in the family of Ithamar.

2. A high priest at a later date (B. C. probably 740), son of another Azariah and father of another Ahitub (1 Chron. 6:11; Ezra 7:3).

3. A Levite, second son of Hebron and grandson of Kohath, and of the lineage of Moses (1 Chron. 23:19; 24:23), B. C. 1015.

4. A chief priest active in the reforms instituted by King Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. 19:11), B. C. 896.

5. One of the Levites appointed by Hezekiah to superintend the distribution of the temple dues among the sacerdotal cities (2 Chron. 31:15), B. C. 726.

6. A Jew, son of Bani, who divorced his Gentile wife, whom he had married after the return from Babylon (Ezra 10:42), B. C. 456.

7. One of the priests who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Neh. 11:4), B. C. 536; and probably the same person who years after (B. C. 445) sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. 10:3). He appears to have been identical with the chief priest, the father of Jehohanan (Neh. 12:13).

8. The son of Shephatiah and father of Zechariah. His descendant, Athaiah, was one of the Judahite residents in Jerusalem after the captivity (Neh. 11:4), B. C. 445.

9. The great-grandfather of the prophet Zephaniah (Zeph. 1:1), B. C. long before 630.

AM'ASA (Heb. אֲמָסָא, am-aw-saw', burden).

1. The son of Abigail, a sister of King David, by Jether, or ITHRA (q. v.), an Ishmaelite (2 Sam. 17:25; 1 Kings 2:5, 32; 1 Chron. 2:17). His paterternity probably led David to neglect him in comparison with the more honored sons of David's other sister, Zeruiah. He joined Absalom in his rebellion, and was by him appointed commander-in-chief in the place of Joab, by whom he was totally defeated in the forest of Ephraim (2 Sam. 18:6, 7). David afterward gave him command of his army in the room of Joab, who had incurred displeasure by his overbearing conduct and his slaying of Absalom (2 Sam. 19:13), B. C. 1023. On the breaking out of Sheba's rebellion, Amasa was so tardy in his movements (probably from the reluctance of the troops to follow him) that David dispatched Abishai with the household troops in pursuit of Sheba, and Joab joined his brother as a volunteer. Amasa overtook them at the great stone of Gibeon, and Joab, while in the act of saluting him, smote him dead with his sword, thus ridding himself of a dangerous rival. Joab continued the pursuit of Sheba, and, by his popularity with the army, prevented David from removing him from command or calling him to account for his bloody deed (2 Sam. 20:4-13), B. C. 1022. Whether Amasa be identical with the Amasai who is mentioned among David's commanders (1 Chron. 12:18) is uncertain.

2. A son of Hadlai and chief of Ephraim, who with others vehemently and successfully resisted the retention as prisoners of the persons whom Pekah, king of Israel, had taken captive in a campaign against Abaz, king of Judah (2 Chron. 28:12), B. C. about 738.

AMAS'AI (Heb. אֲמָסָי, am-aw-sah'ee, burdensome).

1. A Levite, son of Elkanah, and father of Mahath, of the ancestry of Samuel (1 Chron. 6:25, 35), B. C. about 1300.

2. One of the chief captains of Judah who, with a considerable body of men from Judah and Benjamin, joined David while an outlaw at Ziklag. He with others was made captain of David's band (1 Chron. 12:18), B. C. before 1030. This is the Amasai who is supposed by some to be identical with Amasa.

3. One of the priests appointed to precede the ark with blowing of trumpets on its removal from the house of Obed-edom to Jerusalem (1 Chron. 15:24), B. C. after 1030.

4. Another Levite, and father of the Mahath who assisted Hezekiah in restoring the worship of God, and was active in cleansing the temple (2 Chron. 29:12), B. C. 726.

AMASH'AI (probably an incorrect form of the name Amasai), the son of Azareel, and one of the priests appointed by Nehemiah to reside at Jerusalem and do the work of the temple (Neh. 11:13), B. C. 445.

AMASIAH (Heb. אֲמָסִיָּה, am-as-yaw', burden of Jehovah), the son of Zichri, a chieftain of Judah, who volunteered to assist King Jehoshaphat in his religious reform, with two hundred thousand chosen troops (2 Chron. 17:16), B. C. 872.

AMAZIAH (Heb. אֲמָזִיָּה, am-ats-yaw', whom Jehovah strengthens).

1. The son and successor of Jehoash, or Joash, and the ninth king of Judah. He ascended the throne at the age of twenty-five years, and reigned twenty-nine years (2 Kings 14:1, 2; 2 Chron. 25:1), B. C. 797-769. He commenced his reign by slaying the persons who had murdered his father, but spared their children, according to the Mosaic injunction (Deut. 24:16). In the twelfth year of his reign he prepared a great expedition for the recovery of Edom, which had revolted from Jehoram. He raised a large army (three hundred thousand) of his own, and increased it by hiring one hundred thousand Israelites, the first example of a mercenary army that occurs in the history of the Jews. At the command of the prophet he dismissed these mercenaries, who returned in anger and sacked several of the cities of Judah. The obedience of Amaziah was rewarded by a great victory over the Edomites, ten thousand of whom were slain in battle, and ten thousand more dashed to pieces from the rocks of Selah, which Amaziah took, and called Jokteel. Among the spoil which he took were the idols of Mount Seir, in the worship of which Amaziah suffered himself to be engaged. Then began his disasters. A prophet was sent to reprove him, and he resented his faithful admonition. The prophet then foretold his downfall. Urged by arrogance, or provoked by the conduct of the disbanded mercenaries, he sent a challenge to the king of Israel to meet him in battle. The king returned him a scornful reply through a parable, and advised him to remain at home. Amaziah, still belligerent, was met by Jehoash, and by him defeated, taken prisoner, and brought to Jerusalem, his own metropolis. The north city wall was broken down, the temple and palace despoiled, and hostages taken. Amaziah was allowed to remain upon the throne and survived about fifteen years, when a conspiracy was formed against him, and he was slain at Lachish. His body was brought "upon horses" to Jerusalem, and buried in the royal sepulcher (2 Kings 14:3-20; 2 Chron. 25:2-28).

2. The father of Josiah, which latter was one of the Simeonite chiefs who expelled the Amalekites from the valley of Gedor in the time of Hezekiah (1 Chron. 4:34), B. C. after 726.

3. The son of Hilkiah and father of Hashabiah, a Levite of the ancestry of Ethan, a singer of the temple (1 Chron. 6:45), B. C. considerably before 1000.

4. The priest of the golden calves at Beth-el, in the time of Jeroboam II. He complained to the king of Amos's prophecies of coming evil, and urged the prophet to withdraw into the kingdom of Judah and prophesy there. Amos in reply told him of the severe degradation his family should undergo in the approaching captivity of the northern kingdom (Amos 7:10-17), B. C. 782.

AMBASSADOR (Heb. מַלְאָכִים, tseer, one who goes on an errand; לֹמֵד, loots, interpreter; מַלְאָכִים, mal-awk', messenger). The isolated position of ancient Israel rendered comparatively unnecessary the employment of ambassadors, although examples are afforded of the employment of such functionaries. They do not seem to have known of "ministers resident" at a foreign court, all the embassies of which we read being "extraordinary." David sent ambassadors to Hanun, king of the Amorites, to congratulate him upon his accession to the throne (2 Sam. 10:2), and Hiram sent them to Solomon for a like purpose (1 Kings 5:1). Toi, king of Hamath, sent his son Joram to David "to salute him and to bless him" after his victory over Hadadezer (2 Sam. 8:10). Ambassadors were also sent to protest against a wrong (Judg. 11:12), to solicit favors (Num. 20:14), and to contract alliances (Josh. 9:3, sq.).

Ambassadors were not considered as representing the person of the sovereign, according to the present thought, but rather as distinguished and privileged messengers, and their dignity was rather that of heralds (2 Sam. 10:1-5). More frequent mention is made of them after Israel came to have relations with Syria, Babylon, etc. They were usually men of high rank. The word occurs once in the New Testament (2 Cor. 5:20, Gr. πρεσβευτα, pres-byoo'-o, to be a senior).

AMBASSAGE. See GLOSSARY.

AMBUSH (Heb. יָבֵט, aw-rab', to lie in wait), a lying in wait and concealment to attack by surprise. Joshua, at the capture of Ai, shows himself to have been skilled in this method of warfare (Josh. 8). The attempt on the part of Abimelech to surprise Shechem (Judg. 9:30, sq.) appears to have been unskillful.

AMEN (Heb. אָמֵן, aw-mané'; Gr. ἀμήν, am-ane', true, faithful), a word used to affirm and confirm a statement. Strictly an adjective, meaning firm, metaphorically faithful, it came to be used as an adverb, by which something is asserted or confirmed. Used at the beginning of a sentence it emphasizes what is about to be said. It is frequently so employed by our Lord, and translated "verily." It is often used to confirm the words of another, and adds the wish for success to another's vows and predictions. "The repetition of the word employed by John alone in his gospel (twenty-five times) has the force of a superlative, most assuredly" (Grimm, Gr. Lex., s. v.).

ITS LITURGICAL USE. Among the Jews this use of the word is illustrated by the response of the woman in the trial by the water of jealousy (Num. 5:22), by that of the people at Mount Ebal (Deut. 27:15-26; comp. Neh. 5:13; see also 1 Chron. 16:36). "It was a custom, which passed over from the synagogues into the Christian assemblies, that when he who had read or discoursed had offered up a solemn prayer to God the others in attendance responded Amen, and thus made the substance of what was uttered their own" (1 Cor. 14:16). Several of the Church fathers refer to this custom, and Jerome says that at the conclusion of public prayer the united voice of the people sounded like the fall of water or the noise of thunder.

AMERCE. See GLOSSARY.

AMETHYST. See MINERAL KINGDOM.

AMI (Heb. אָמִי, aw-mee'), one of the servants of Solomon, whose descendants went up from Babylon (Ezra 2:57). In Neh. 7:59 he is called Amon.

AMIABLE (Heb. יָדוּדִים, yed-eed', loved). This word occurs only in Psa. 84:1, "How amiable are thy tabernacles," etc. In Psa. 127:2 it is rendered "beloved." Its plural form, signifying "delights," is found in the title to Psa. 45, "A song of loves."

AMIN'ADAB, a Greek form (Matt. 1:4; Luke 3:33) of AMMINADAB (q. v.).

AMITTAI (Heb. אִמִּיתַי, am-it-tal'ee, true), a native of Gath-hepher, of the tribe of Zebulun, and father of the prophet Jonah (2 Kings 14:25; Jonah 1:1), B. C. before 820.

AM'MAH (Heb. אִמְמָה, am-maw', a cubit), the place reached by Joab and Abishai, in their pursuit of Abner, at sundown (2 Sam. 2:24).

AM'MI (Heb. אִמְמִי, am-mee', i. e., as explained in the margin of A. V., "my people"), a figurative name applied to the kingdom of Israel in token of God's reconciliation with them, in contrast with the equally significant name Lo-ammi given by the prophet Hosea to his second son by Gomer the daughter of Diblaim (Hos. 2:1). In the same manner Ruhamah contrasts with Lo-ruhamah.

AM'MIEL (Heb. אִמְמִיֵּאל, am-mee-ale', people of God).

1. The son of Gemalli, of the tribe of Dan, one of the twelve spies sent by Moses to explore the land of Canaan (Num. 13:12), B. C. 1209. He was, of course, one of the ten who perished by the plague for their "evil report" (Num. 14:37).

2. The father of Machir of Lo-debar, which latter entertained Mephibosheth until he was befriended by David (2 Sam. 9:4, 5; 17:27), B. C. before 1000.

3. The father of Bath-sheba, wife of Uriah and afterward of David (1 Chron. 3:5), B. C. before 1080. In 2 Sam. 11:3 he is called ELIAM (q. v.), by the transposition of the first and last syllables.

4. The sixth son of Obad-edom, and one of the doorkeepers of the temple (1 Chron. 26:5), B. C. after 1000.

AMMIHUD (Heb. אַמִּי הוּד, am-mee-hood', people of glory).

1. An Ephraimite, whose son, Elishama, was appointed chief of the tribe at the time of the Exode (Num. 1:10; 2:18; 7:48, 53; 10:22; 1 Chron. 7:26), B. C. before 1210.

2. The father of Shemuel, which latter was the Simeonite chief who was appointed for the division of the Promised Land (Num. 34:20), B. C. before 1452.

3. A man of the tribe of Naphtali, whose son, Pedahel, was prince of the tribe, and was appointed for the division of the land (Num. 34:28), B. C. before 1452.

4. The father of Talmal, king of Geshur, to whom Absalom fled after his murder of Amnon (2 Sam. 13:37), B. C. before 1030.

5. The son of Omri and descendant of Pharez, and father of Uthai, which last was one of the first to live at Jerusalem on the return from Babylon (1 Chron. 9:4), B. C. before 536.

AMMIN'ADAB (Heb. אַמִּינָדָב, am-mee-naw-dawb', people of liberality).

1. Son of Raun, or Aram, and father of Nashon (or Naasson, Matt. 1:3; Luke 3:32), who was prince of the tribe of Judah at the first numbering of Israel in the second year of the Exodus (Num. 1:7; 2:3), B. C. before 1210. He was the fourth in descent from Judah, the sixth in ascent from David (Ruth 4:19, 20; 1 Chron. 2:10), and one of the ancestors of Jesus Christ (Matt. 1:4; Luke 3:33). He is the same Amminadab, probably, whose daughter, Elisheba, was married to Aaron (Exod. 6:23).

2. A son of Kohath, the second son of Levi (1 Chron. 6:22). In vers. 2 and 18 he seems to be called IZHAR (q. v.).

3. A Levite of the sons of Uzziel, who, with one hundred and twelve of his brethren, was appointed by David to assist in bringing up the ark to Jerusalem (1 Chron. 15:10, 11), B. C. 1000.

AMMIN'ADIB (Heb. אַמִּינָדִיב, am-mee'-naw-deeb', another form of Amminadab), a person whose chariots are mentioned as proverbial for their swiftness (Cant. 6:12), from which he appears to have been, like Jehu, one of the most celebrated charioteers of his day.

AMMISHAD'DAI (Heb. אַמִּישַׁדַּי, am-mee-shad-dah'ee, people of the Almighty), the father of Abiezer, chief of the tribe of Dan at the time of the Exodus (Num. 1:12; 2:25; 7:66, 71; 10:25), B. C. before 1210.

AMMIZ'ABAD (Heb. אַמִּיזָבָד, am-mee-zaw-bawd', people of endowment), the son and subaltern of Benaiiah, which latter was David's captain of the host commanding in the third month (1 Chron. 27:6), B. C. 1000.

AM'MON (Heb. אַמּוֹן, am-mone', inbred, another form of BEN-AMMI, q. v.), the son of Lot by his youngest daughter (Gen. 19:38), B. C. about 2230. His descendants were called Ammonites (Deut. 2:20), children of Ammon (Gen. 19:38), and sometimes simply Ammon (Neh. 13:23).

AM'MONITES (Heb. אַמּוֹנִי, am-mo-nee'), a nomadic race descended from Lot's youngest daughter, as the more civilized Moabites were from the elder one (Gen. 19:36-38). The two tribes were so connected that their names seem sometimes to have been used interchangeably (comp. Deut. 23:4 with Num. 22:2-7; Num. 21:29 with Judg. 11:24; and Judg. 11:13 with Num. 21:26).

Ammon, having dispossessed the Zanzumim (Deut. 2:19-21), dwelt E. of N. from Moab, from the Arnon to the Jabbok; "Sihon king of the Amorites" having just before the Exodus taken the land between these streams from "the former king of Moab" (Num. 21:26), "from the wilderness even unto Jordan" (Judg. 11:22), and thus crowded Ammon eastward into the desert.

Although the Israelites were forbidden to molest the Ammonites, Ammon was often in league with other nations against Israel, as, with Moab (Deut. 23:3, 4); with Moab and Amalek (Judg. 3:13); with the Syrians (2 Sam. 10:1-19); with Gebal and Amalek (Psa. 83:7), and was almost always hostile, both before and after the captivity (Neh. 4:3, etc.; see also Judith, chaps. 5-7; 1 Macc. 6:30-43), till all were swallowed up by Rome. In the time of Justin Martyr (about 150 A. D.) the Ammonites were quite numerous, but in the time of Origen (about 186-254 A. D.) they were merged with the Arabs.

The Ammonites were governed by a king (1 Sam. 12:12). The national deity was Molech (1 Kings 11:7), often called Milcom (1 Kings 11:5, 33.) The capital was Rabbah, or Rabbath Ammon, for a while called Philadelphia, from Ptolemy Philadelphus, but now called Ammon.

The Ammonites seem to have furnished a small contingent to the Syrian confederacy against Shalmaneser II (854 B. C.), and Budnilu of Ammon was among the twelve kings of the Hatti and of the seacoast who sent ambassadors to Esar-haddon at Nineveh (671 B. C.).

The Ammonite names in the Bible go to show that the language was akin to the Hebrews.

Solomon set an example in marrying Ammonite women. Rehoboam's mother being Naamah, an Ammonitess (1 Kings 14:31), which example Israel was too ready to imitate (Neh. 13:23).

The doom of desolation prophesied against Ammon (Ezek. 25:5, 10; Zeph. 2:9) has been literally fulfilled. "Nothing but ruins are found here by the amazed explorer. Not an inhabited village remains, and not an Ammonite exists on the face of the earth" (Thomson, Land and Book, iii, 622).

AM'NON (Heb. אֲמֹנִים, am-nohn', faithful).

1. The eldest son of David by Ahinoam, the Jezreelitess, born in Hebron (2 Sam. 3:2; 1 Chron. 3:1), B. C. before 1000. By the advice and assistance of Jonadab he violated his half-sister Tamar, which her brother Absalom revenged two years after by causing him to be assassinated (2 Sam. 13).

2. The first named of the four sons of Shimon, or Shammai, of the children of Ezra, the descendant of Judah (1 Chron. 4:20).

A'MOK (Heb. אֲמוֹק, aw-moke', deep), the father of Eber, and a chief among the priests who went up from Babylon with Jerubbabel (Neh. 12:7, 20), B. C. 536.

AMOMUM. The Gr. word ἀμωμον, am-ō-mon, occurs only in Rev. 18:13, where it is rendered "odours." It is, however, the name of a plant. See VEGETABLE KINGDOM.

A'MON (Heb. אֲמוֹנִים, aw-mone', builder).

1. The governor of "the city" (probably Samaria) in the time of Ahab, who was charged to keep Micaiah till the king should return from the siege of Ramoth-gilead (1 Kings 22:26; 2 Chron. 18:25), B. C. 897.

2. The fifteenth king of Judah, who succeeded his father Manasseh at the age of twenty-two years (B. C. 641), and reigned two years. He followed Manasseh's idolatries without sharing his repentance. Falling a victim to a court conspiracy, the people avenged his death by slaying the conspirators and placing upon the throne his son Josiah, aged eight years. Amon was buried with his father in the garden of Uzza (2 Kings 21:19-26; 2 Chron. 33:20-25; Jer. 1:2; 25:3; Zeph. 1:1).

3. The head, or ancestor, of one of the families of the Nethinims who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel after the captivity (Neh. 7:59), B. C. before 536.

AM'ORITES (Heb. always singular, used collectively, אֲמֹרִי, haw-em-o-ree', the Amorite), a tribe descended from Canaan (Gen. 10:16), and one of the seven whose lands were given to Israel (Deut. 7:1; comp. Gen. 15:16). Haw-em-o-ree' means literally "the high one," whence the name Amorites is very generally supposed to mean "highlanders" (Num. 13:29; Deut. 1:7, 20; Josh. 10:6), or "tall ones" (Amos 2:9; comp. Num. 23:32; Deut. 2:11), or, possibly, "chiefs," as the name Aryans is said to mean "nobles." We might then compare the title emir, from אֲמִיר, aw-mar', which combines the meanings of "project upward," whence אֲמִירָה, aw-meer', top, as of a tree, and "say," "command."

The Amorites were so prominent that their name seems sometimes to be used for Canaanites in general (Josh. 24:8, etc.), and in the Tel-el-Amarna letters Amurri is the name for Palestine-Phœnicia.

In Abraham's day they dwelt W. of the Dead Sea, in Hazezon-tamar (Gen. 14:7), "which is Engedi" (2 Chron. 20:2), now Ain Jidi, and about Hebron (Gen. 14:13, comp. 13:18). The Israelites found E. of Jordan two Amorite kingdoms: that of Sihon, which lay along the Jordan from the Arnon (Wady Mojib) to the Jabbok (Wady Zerka), and from the Jordan to the Desert (Judg. 11:22); and that of "Og the king of Bashan," from the Jabbok to Mount Hermou (Jebel esh Sheik) (Deut. 3:4, 9). See SUPPLEMENT.

As Sihon and Og attempted to act on the offensive Israel immediately possessed their territories (Deut. 3:8-10). Their next collision with Amorites was with the anti-Gibeonite confederacy of the five Amorite kings of Jerusalem, Hebron, Jarmuth, Lachish, and Eglon (Josh. 10:1-43). Amorites also appear in the northern confederacy which was vanquished near the waters of Merom (Josh. 11:1-14). This was the last hostile stand of the Amorites. In the days of Samuel they were at peace with Israel (1 Sam. 7:14). Solomon levied on the remnant of the Amorites and of the other Canaanite nations a tribute of bond service (1 Kings 9:20, 21). The other notices of the Amorites after Solomon's day are mere historical reminiscences.

No peculiar Amorite system of government or religion is mentioned; hence it is argued that the name "Amorites" is not the name of any particular tribe. There are possible traces of a wider application of the name than we have indicated. "It is plausible that the cuneiform ideogram of Damascus means 'the Amorite city,' as being the chief seat of that people" (McCurdy, Hist., Proph., and the Mon., i, 244, § 201). The Egyptian name for Palestinians was Amu.

According to the Amer. Jour. of Arch., January-March, 1896, the "land of the Amorites" from a Babylonian point of view in Abraham's day was properly Syria N. of the future Palestine, but it was actually applied to the whole country to the southern limit of Canaan.—W. H.

AMOS (Heb. אֲמוֹס, aw-moce', burdensome).

1. One of the twelve minor prophets and a native of Tekoah, a town about six miles S. of Bethlehem. He belonged to the shepherds there, and was not trained in any school of the prophets. And yet, without dedicating himself to the calling of a prophet, he was called by the Lord to prophesy concerning Israel in the reigns of Uzziah, king of Judah, and Jeroboam, king of Israel, two years before the earthquake (Amos 1:1), B. C. about 763. The exact date of his appearing, or the length of his ministry, cannot be given. The two kingdoms were at the summit of their prosperity. Idleness, luxury, and oppression were general, and idolatry prevalent. It was at such a time as this that the plain shepherd of Tekoah was sent into Israel and prophesied at Beth-el. This is almost a solitary instance of a prophet being sent from Judah into Israel, and, doubtless, attracted universal attention. His prophetic utterances were directed against Judah as well as Israel, and close with promises of divine mercy and returning favor to the chosen race. He was charged with a conspiracy against Jeroboam, the king, and threatened by Amaziah, the high priest of Beth-el. After fulfilling his mission he probably returned to Judah. The time and manner of his death are unknown.

2. The ninth in the line of ascent from Christ, being the son of Naum and father of Mattathias (Luke 3:25), B. C. about 400.

AMOZ (Heb. אֲמוֹז, aw-moh's', strong), the father of the prophet Isaiah (2 Kings 19:2; Isa

1:1), B. C. before 738. According to rabbinical tradition, he is also the brother of King Amaziah, and a prophet; but of this there is no proof.

AMPHIPOLIS (Gr. Ἀμφίπολις, am-fee'-ol is, a city surrounded, so called because the Strymon flowed round it), a city of Macedonia through which Paul and Silas passed on their way from Philippi to Thessalonica (Acts 17:1). It was about thirty-three miles from Philippi; it is now in ruins, and its site occupied by a village called Neophorio.

AM'PLIAS (Gr. Ἀμπλιας, am-plee'-as), a Christian at Rome, and mentioned by Paul as one whom he particularly loved (Rom. 16:8), A. D. 60.

AM'RAM (Heb. אֲמֵרָם, am-rawm', high people).

1. The first named of the sons of Kohath, a Levite. He married his father's sister, Jochebed, and by her became the father of Miriam, Aaron, and Moses (Exod. 6:18, 20; Num. 26:59). He died aged one hundred and thirty-seven years, probably before the Exode.

2. A son of Dishon and descendant of Esau (1 Chron. 1:41). In Gen. 36:26 he is called more correctly HEMDAN (q. v.).

3. One of the sons of Bani, who, after the return from Babylon, separated from his Gentile wife (Ezra 10:34), B. C. 456.

AM'RAMITES, descendants (Num. 3:27; 1 Chron. 26:23) of Amram, No. 1.

AM'RAPHEL (Heb. אֲמֵרָפֶל, am-raw-fel', derivation uncertain), a king of Shinar, who, with three others from neighboring countries, invaded Palestine and fought with the kings of the Jordan country (Gen. 14). The name Amraphel has been the subject of great controversy since the discovery of the Assyrian inscriptions, in some of which scholars early expected to find it. Schrader early identified Amraphel with Hammurabi, though the two names seem very unlike. Other explanations have been recently proposed, but none are satisfactory. If, as Hommel supposes, on the ground of an early Assyrian list of names, Hammurabi was also read Hammurapaltu the names may be identified with some assurance.

Hammurabi was the real founder of the great empire at Babylon. He conquered the lesser states of which the country was composed, united the North and the South, built great canals, and cultivated the arts of peace no less successfully than the arts of war. His reign (2287-2233 B. C. ?) was long and brilliant. A small fragmentary inscription of his mentions his wars with Eri-Aku, Tudghulla, and Kudur-lagamar, and seems therefore to set at rest all doubt that he is really the king Amraphel of the Old Testament. See CHER-ORLAOMER, ARIOCH, and TIDAL; also SUPPLEMENT.

LITERATURE.—Sayce, Patriarchal Palestine, London, 1895. Schrader, Cuneiform Inscriptions and the Old Testament, translated by Whitehouse, 2 vols. Rogers, Outlines of the Early History of Babylonia, Leipzig, 1895 (with accounts of the reign of Hammurabi and chronological data).—R. W. R.

AMULET, a supposed preservative against sickness, accident, witchcraft, etc. Amulets consisted of precious stones, gems, gold, and sometimes of parchment written over with some inscription. They have been widely used from remote antiquity, and are still worn in many parts of the world. They were often worn as earrings (q. v.), as the centerpiece of a necklace, and among the Egyptians frequently consisted of the emblems of various deities. Among the Arabs the figure of an open hand is used, as well as that of a serpent.

The English word Amulet does not occur in Scripture, but the word אֲמִילִים (leh-kaw-sheem', charms; Isa. 3:20, A. V., earrings) is now generally understood to have the meaning of amulets. Hence they formed part of the trappings which Jacob commanded his household to put away (Gen. 35:4). The most fanciful and superstitious notions have prevailed respecting the marvelous powers of gems (q. v.). The gem appropriate for a particular month was worn as an amulet during the month, and was supposed to exert a mysterious control in reference to beauty, health, riches, etc. One's person and house were thought to be protected from malign influences by holy inscriptions placed upon the door. The existence of such a custom is implied in the attempt of Moses to turn them to a proper use by directing that certain passages of the law should be employed (Exod. 13:9, 16; Deut. 6:9; 11:18), "that they might look upon it, and remember all the commandments of the Lord, and do them" (Num. 15:38, 39). Such written scrolls afterward degenerated into instruments of superstition among the Jews, so that "There was hardly any people . . . that more used or were more fond of amulets, charms, mutterings, exorcisms, and all kinds of enchantments" (Lightfoot, Horæ Heb., Matt. 24:24). These amulets consisted of little roots, parts of animals, or, more commonly, bits of paper or parchment upon which were written words or characters, and were supposed to have magical power. One of the most frequent of the latter was the cabalistic hexagonal figure known as "the shield of David," and "the seal of Solomon."

Many of the Christians of the 1st century wore amulets marked with a fish, as a symbol of the Redeemer, or the pentangle, consisting "of three triangles intersected and made of five lines, which may be so set forth with the body of man as to touch and point out the places where our Saviour was wounded." Among the gnostics Abraxas gems were used. At a later period ribbons with sentences of Scripture written on them were hung about the neck. The Council of Trullo ordered the makers of all amulets to be excommunicated, and deemed the wearers of them guilty of heathen superstition. See TERAPHIM.

AM'ZI (Heb. אֲמִזִּי, am-tsee', strong).

1. Son of Bani, of the family of Merari, and in the ancestry of Ethan, who was appointed one of the leaders of the temple music (1 Chron. 6:46), B. C. long before 960.

2. Son of Zechariah and ancestor of Adaiab, which latter was actively engaged in the building of the second temple (Neh. 11:12), B. C. before 445.

A'NAB (Heb. אֲנָב, an-awb', grape town), a place upon the mountains of Judah, from which Joshua expelled the Anakim (Num. 13:33; Josh. 11:21; 15:50); now bearing the same name, Anab, about ten miles S. W. of Hebron.

ANAGOGICAL (Gr. ἀνάγω, an-ag'-o, to lead up), pertaining to the mysterious, spiritual. The older writers on biblical interpretation mention four senses of Scripture—the literal, allegorical, tropical, and anagogical. This last is the spiritual sense relating to the eternal glory of the believer up to which its teachings are supposed to lead; thus the rest of the Sabbath, in an anagogical sense, signifies the repose of the saints in heaven (Heb. 4:4–11); or the mystery of the union between man and wife, of the union between Christ and the Church (Eph. 5:22–32).

ANAH (Heb. אַנָּה, an-aw', answer), the son of Zibeon and grandson of Seir. His daughter Aholibamah is the second named of Esau's wives (Gen. 36:2, 14, 25). An Anah is mentioned in Gen. 36:20 as one of the sons of Seir, and head of an Idumæan tribe. Both passages probably refer to the same person, the word "son" being used in v. 20, in the larger sense of descendant. While feeding his father's asses in the desert he discovered warm springs, from which circumstance he probably obtained the name Beeri, "the man of the wells" (Gen. 26:34).

ANAH'RATH (Heb. אַנְחָרָת, an-aw-kharavth', gorge), a town on or within Issachar (Josh. 19:19).

ANAI'AH (Heb. אַנְיָאֵה, an-aw-yaw', Jah has answered), one of the persons (probably priests) who stood at the right hand of Ezra, while he read the law to the people (Neh. 8:4), and perhaps the same with one of the chiefs of the people who joined Nehemiah in a sacred covenant (Neh. 10:22), B. C. 445.

ANAK (Heb. אַנָּק, aw-nawk', long-necked, i. e., a giant), the son of Arba, the founder of Kirjath-arba. He was the progenitor of a race of giants called Anakim. These Anakim were a terror to the children of Israel (Num. 13:22, 28), but were driven out by Caleb, who came into possession of Hebron (Josh. 15:13, 14), B. C. after 1170.

AN'AKIM. See ANAK.

ANALOGY (Gr. ἀναλογία, proportion).

1. As applied to the works of God generally, analogy leads to the conclusion that (a) a part of a system of which he is the author must, in respect of its leading principles, be similar to the whole of that system; (b) the work of an intelligent and moral being must bear in all its lineaments traces of the character of its author; (c) the revelation of God in the Scriptures is in all respects agreeable to what we know of God from the works of nature and the order of the world.

2. Analogy of Faith. This phrase is derived from the words of St. Paul (Rom. 12:6), "Let us prophesy according to the proportion (analogy) of faith," and signifies the harmony of the different parts of Scripture. The parts of Scripture must be explained according to the tenor of the whole, not bringing any one part so conspicuously into view as to obscure or contradict others. Thus exaggerated teaching respecting the dignity of the Virgin Mary's relation to our Lord has tended to obscure the doctrines relating to our Lord as the only Mediator. The better to follow the analogy of the faith, one should study the Scriptures with a love of truth for its own sake, and not with the purpose of finding proof for opinions already formed.

AN'AMIM (Heb. אַנְמִיִּם, an-aw-meem'), descendants of Mizraim (Gen. 10:13; 1 Chron. 1:11), and, according to Knobel, inhabiting the Delta in Egypt.

ANAM'MELECH. See GODS, FALSE.

ANAN (Heb. אַנָּן, aw-nawn', a cloud), one of the chief Israelites that sealed the covenant on the return from Babylon (Neh. 10:26), B. C. 445.

ANANI (Heb. אַנְנִי, an-aw-nee', cloudy), the last named of the seven sons of Elioenai, a descendant of David, after the captivity (1 Chron. 3:24), B. C. about 400.

ANANI'AH (Heb. אַנְנִיָּאֵה, an-an-yaw', protected by Jehovah).

1. The father of Maaseiah and grandfather of Azariah. The latter repaired a portion of the wall of Jerusalem after the return from exile (Neh. 3:23), B. C. about 445.

2. The name of a town in Benjamin, mentioned as inhabited after the captivity (Neh. 11:32).

ANANIAS (Gr. Ἀνανίας, an-an-ee'-as, of Gr. Ananiah, protected by Jehovah).

1. A member of the early Christian Church at Jerusalem, who, conspiring with his wife, Sapphira, to deceive and defraud the brethren, was overtaken by sudden death, and immediately buried (Acts 5:1, sq.). The members of the Jerusalem Church had a common fund, which was divided by the apostles among the poor. Those who carried into full effect the principle that "naught of the things which he possessed was his own" sold their lands and houses and laid the price at the apostles' feet. One Joses, surnamed Barnabas, had done this, and, it would seem, had received hearty commendation therefor. Probably incited thereby, and desirous of applause, Ananias, in concert with his wife, Sapphira, sold a possession, and brought the pretended price to the apostle. Either their covetousness or fear of want influenced them to keep back part of the price—an acted lie. Peter was moved by the Spirit to uncover the deceit; and instead of extenuating it because the lie had not been uttered, he passed on all such prevarication the awful sentence, "Thou hast not lied unto men, but unto God." Upon hearing these words Ananias "fell down and gave up the ghost," and was carried out and buried by the young men present. See SAPPHIRA.

NOTE.—"They had all things common" (Acts 5:32). "By becoming Christians the Jewish converts suffered the loss of all things, unless they had property independent of the will, favor, or patronage of others, and the proportion of these was few. So deep an offense against Jewish prejudices cast them loose from Jewish charities, and involved loss of employment to such as were traders, and dismissal from their employments to such as were workmen and servants, producing a state of destitution which rendered extraordinary exertions necessary on the part of the more prosperous brethren. This is illustrated and proved by what we actually see in operation at this day in Jerusalem" (Kitto, Med.). The first Christians did not adopt the fantastical and impracticable theory known in modern times by the name of communism, divesting themselves of individual property, and throwing all they had and earned into a common stock. They had a common fund, but that it was not binding upon all to contribute everything thereto is evident from what Peter said to Ananias, that he might have kept the land if he had chosen, or even have used its price after it was sold. The principle universally accepted was, that none should want while any of their brethren had the means of helping them.

2. A devout and honored Christian of Damascus, to whom the Lord appeared in vision and bade him go to a street called Straight and inquire at the house of Judas for Saul of Tarsus. Ananias at first hesitated, because of his knowledge of Saul's former character and conduct. But, assured of Saul's conversion and God's purpose concerning him, he consented. He "went his way, and entered into the house; and putting his hands on him said, Brother Saul, the Lord, even Jesus, that appeared unto thee in the way as thou camest, hath sent me, that thou mightest receive thy sight, and be filled with the Holy Ghost. And immediately there fell from his eyes as it had been scales;" and, recovering his sight which he had lost when the Lord appeared to him on the way to Damascus, Paul, the new convert, arose, was baptized, and preached Jesus in the synagogues (Acts 9:10-20; 22:12), A. D. 37. Tradition makes Ananias to have been afterward bishop of Damascus, and to have suffered martyrdom.

3. The high priest before whom Paul was brought previous to being taken to Felix (Acts 23). He was made high priest by Herod, king of Chalcis, who for this purpose removed Joseph, son of Comydus (Josephus, Ant., xx, 1, 3). Being implicated in the quarrels of the Jews and the Samaritans, he with others was sent to Rome to answer for his conduct before Claudius Cæsar (Josephus, Ant., xx, 6, 2). The emperor decided in favor of the accused party, and Ananias returned with credit, and remained in office until Agrippa gave it to Ismael (Josephus, Ant., xx, 8, 8). When Paul appeared before Ananias he made the declaration, "I have lived in all good conscience before God until this day." Thereupon the high priest ordered the apostle to be smitten in the face. Paul, indignant at so unprovoked an assault, replied, "God shall smite thee, thou whited wall." Being asked, "Revilest thou God's high priest?" Paul said, "I wist not that he was the high priest," perhaps having overlooked in his warmth the honor due him in his official station. A plot having been formed against Paul, he was sent by Claudius Lysias to Felix, whither he was followed by Ananias (accompanied by the orator Tertullus), who appeared against him. Ananias was deposed shortly before Felix quitted his government, and was finally assassinated (Josephus, War, ii, 17, 9), B. C. 67.

ANATH (Heb. אָנַח, an-anth', an answer, i. e., to prayer), the father of Shungar, the third of the judges of Israel after the death of Joshua (Judg. 3:31; 5:6). B. C. perhaps 1150.

ANATHEMA (Gr. ἀνάθεμα, an-ath'-em-ah, a thing laid by), a votive offering consecrated to a god and hung up in the temple. When used in this general sense, as it often is by classical writers, it is written with a long e (ἀνάθημα, an-ath'-ay-mah, Luke 21:5, A. V., "gifts"). The form ἀνάθεμα and its special meaning seem to be peculiar to the Hellenistic dialect, probably from the use made of the word by the Greek Jews. In the Septuagint anathema is generally the translation of the Hebrew word כָּהֵן, kheh'-ren, to consecrate. The following are its uses:

1. Old Testament. (1) A species of vow (q. v.) by which persons and things were irrevocably and irredeemably devoted to the Lord (Lev. 27; Num. 21:2), and in such a way that the persons devoted had to be put to death, while the things fell to the sanctuary or to the priests. But, inasmuch as the deliberate killing of anyone, even a slave, was treated as a punishable offense (Exod. 21:20), it is evident that the pronouncing of the anathema could not be left to the pleasure of any individual, since it might be used for impious purposes. The anathema, being a manifestation of the judicial holiness of God, realizing itself in executing righteous judgment upon men, assumed the character of a theocratic penalty. It could, therefore, be inflicted only by God or by the divinely appointed authorities, acting with a view to the glory of God and the upholding and edifying of his kingdom (see Keil, Bib. Arch.). (2) It was sometimes a command and not a vow. The only instance in which the anathema is expressly enjoined in the law is the command against those who served other gods (Exod. 22:20), even against whole cities. In such cases the men and cattle were ordered to be put to death by the sword, and the houses with their contents to be burned (Deut. 13:12, sq.). This was carried out, especially in the case of the Canaanites (Deut. 20:17, sq.), but in all its severity against Jericho alone (Josh. 6:17, sq.). In the case of the other cities, only that which had life was put to death, the cities themselves being spared (Josh. 10:28, sq.), though often the cattle were spared and with the rest of the spoil divided among the soldiers (Deut. 2:34, sq.; 3:6; Josh. 8:21, sq.; 11:11, sq.). In case anyone retained a part of that which had been anathematized for his own use, he brought upon himself the anathema of death (Josh. 6:18; 7:11, sq.; comp. Deut. 13:17).

2. Among the later Jews the ban of the synagogue was the excommunication or exclusion of a Jew (usually for heresy or blasphemy) from the synagogue and the congregation, or from familiar intercourse with other Jews. This modification of the anathema owes its origin to Ezra 10:8, where the khel'rem consisted in the anathematizing of the man's whole goods and chattels, and the exclusion of the anathematized individual from the congregation. The later rabbinical writers mention three degrees of anathema: (1) Niddu'i, separation, a temporary suspension from ecclesiastical privileges, which might be pronounced for twenty-four reasons. It lasted thirty days, and was pronounced without a curse. The person thus anathematized could only enter the temple on the left hand, the usual way of departure; if he died while under anathema there was no mourning for him, and a stone on his coffin denoted that he was separated from his people and deserved stoning. (2) Khel'rem, curse. This was pronounced upon the individual who did not repent at the expiration of thirty days, by an assemblage of at least ten persons, and was accompanied with curses. The person so excommunicated was cut off from all social and religious privileges, it being unlawful to eat or drink with him (1 Cor. 5:11). The anathema could be removed by three common persons, or one person of dignity. (3) Upon the still impenitent person was inflicted the severer punishment of shammata', imprecation, a solemn act of expulsion from the congregation, accompanied with fearful curses, including the giving up of the individual to the judgment of God and to final perdition.

3. In the New Testament. From the above we are prepared to find that the anathema of the New Testament always implies execration, but do not think that the word was employed in the sense of technical excommunication either from the Jewish or Christian Church. It occurs only five or six times. (a) In Acts 23:12 it is recorded that certain Jews "bound themselves under a curse" (literally, anathematized themselves) "that they would neither eat nor drink till they had killed Paul." The probability seems to be that these persons looked upon Paul as unworthy of life, and considered it their religious duty to compass his death. They therefore anathematized, i. e., devoted themselves to destruction if they drew back from their purpose. (b) When Peter was charged the third time with being a follower of Jesus he began "to curse and to swear," etc. (Matt. 26:74, ἀναθεματίζω). This is thought by some to be a vulgar oath; by others, an imprecation called down upon himself by Peter in case he should be found telling an untruth. (c) In Rom. 9:3 Paul writes, "I could wish that myself were accursed (ἐγὼ ἀνάθεμα εἶναι) from Christ." We have no means of knowing exactly what the apostle understood by the above expression. From the words "accursed from Christ" we are hardly warranted in believing that he referred to either the Old Testament anathema (1) or the ban of the synagogue (2). Nor do they seem to refer to sudden death or a judicial act of the Christian Church. Meyer (Com., in loc.) observes, "Paul sees those who belong to the fellowship of his people advancing to ruin through their unbelief; therefore he would fain wish that he himself were a curse offering, if by means of this sacrifice of his own self he could only save the beloved brethren." Much of the difficulty of understanding this passage would be obviated if we remember that the apostle does not give expression to a decision formally reached, but rather to a sentiment stirred within him by an unutterable sorrow. He "could wish himself accursed, if the purport of the wish could be realized to the advantage of the Israelites" (Meyer, Com.). (d) "Let him be anathema" (Gal. 1:8, 9) has the probable meaning of, Let him be execrable and accursed. (e) "Calleth Jesus accursed" (anathema, 1 Cor. 12:3) means, doubtless, the act of any private individual who execrated Christ and accounted him accursed. The thought appears to be that those who speak by the Spirit do not execrate Jesus, but confess him as Lord. (f) In 1 Cor. 16:22 we find the expression "Anathema Maran-atha" (ἀνάθεμα μαρὰν ἀθά). In this the apostle announces his accord with the will of God, that those who are destitute of love to Jesus should be doomed to final perdition. Maran-atha is the Chaldaic phrase for the Lord comes, and seems to be used in this connection to indicate that the fulfillment of such punishment will be associated with his coming. After "let him be anathema" there should be a full stop.

4. Ecclesiastical. "The Church has used the phrase 'anathema sit' from the earliest times with reference to those whom she excludes from her communion, either because of moral offenses or because they persist in heresy. In pronouncing anathema against willful heretics the Church does but declare that they are excluded from her communion, and that they must, if they continue obstinate, perish eternally" (Cath. Dict.).

ANATHEMATA (from ἀνατίθημι, an-atith'-ay-mee, to lay up). In general the term was applied to all kinds of ornaments in churches, these things having been set apart to the service of God. In Luke 21:5 the word is thus used for the gifts and ornaments of the temple. In a stricter sense the word is used to denote memorials of great favors which men had received from God. Very early a custom, still existing, sprang up of anyone receiving a signal cure presenting to the Church what was called his ectypoma, or figure of the member cured, in gold or silver. Anathemata is also a term used to designate the coverings of the altar

AN'ATHOTH (Heb. אֲנָתוֹת, an-aw-thoth', answers, i. e., to prayer).

1. One of the sons of Becher, the son of Benjamin (1 Chron. 7:8), B. C. before 1210.

2. One of the chief Israelites who sealed the covenant after the return from Babylon (Neh. 10:19), B. C. about 445.

3. A town in the tribe of Benjamin, belonging to the priests, also a city of refuge (Josh. 21:18; Jer. 1:1). It is chiefly noted as the birthplace of the prophet Jeremiah, and mostly his residence (Jer. 1:1; 11:21-23; 29:27). It was a walled town of some strength, seated on a broad ridge of hills, overlooking the valley of the Jordan and the northern part of the Dead Sea. It was three miles N. of Jerusalem. Robinson identifies the present Anata with Anathoth, distant an hour and a quarter from Jerusalem, containing about one hundred inhabitants. See 2 Sam. 23:27; 1 Chron. 12:3; Ezra 2:23; Neh. 7:27.

ANCHOR (Gr. ἀγκυρα, ang'-koo-rah). Very naturally the anchor has been in use from the remote ages. In the heroic times of the Greeks large stones called εἰβάι were used for anchors.

Anchor Used as a Symbol.

Those used by the Romans were usually of iron, and in shape resembled the modern anchor. The scriptural mention of the use of anchors is in Acts 27:29, 30, 40. From this passage it would seem that anchors were used at both the stern and bow of vessels.

Figurative. In Heb. 6:19 the anchor is used metaphorically for a spiritual support in times of trial, in which sense it is still frequently employed. In the early Church it was also used with reference to the persecutions which threatened the ship of the Church. In some cases above the transverse bar of the anchor stands the letter E, probably an abbreviation of Elpis, hope. Sometimes the anchor was associated with the fish, the symbol of the Saviour, the union of the two symbols expressing "hope in Jesus Christ."

ANCIENT OF DAYS (Chald. אֲנִיִּן יְהוָה, at-teek' yov-meen', advanced in days), an expression applied to Jehovah in a vision of Daniel (7:9, 13, 22). "When Daniel represents the true God as an aged man, he does so not in contrast with the recent gods of the heathen which Antiochus Epiphanes wished to introduce, or specially with reference to new gods; for God is not called the old God, but appears only as an old man, because age inspires veneration and conveys the impression of majesty. This impression is heightened by the robe with which he is covered, and by the appearance of the hair of his head, and also by the flames of fire which are seen to go forth from his throne" (Keil, Com., in loc.).

ANCIENTS (Heb. זִקְנֵי zaw-kane', old), aged, either decrepit or vigorous (Gen. 18:12, 13; 19:31; 24:1, etc.); elders, i. e., chief men, magistrates (Isa. 3:14; 24:23; Jer. 19:1; Ezek. 7:26; 8:11, 12, etc.). See ELDERS; GLOSSARY.

AND IF. See GLOSSARY.

ANDREW.—1. Name and Family. (Gr. Ἀνδρέας, an-dreh'-as, manly.) A native of the city of Bethsaida in Galilee (John 1:44), the son of Jonas (John 21:15) and brother of Simon Peter (Matt. 4:18; 10:2; John 1:40).

2. Personal History. (1) Receives Christ. At first a disciple of John Baptist, Andrew was led to receive Jesus by John pointing him out as "the lamb of God" (John 1:36-40). He then brought his brother Simon to the Master, telling him that he had "found the Messiah" (v. 41). They both returned to their occupation as fishermen on the Sea of Galilee, and there remained until, after John Baptist's imprisonment, they were called by Jesus to follow him (Matt. 4:18, sq.; Mark 1:14-18).

(2) As apostle. The further mention of him in the gospels is his being ordained as one of the twelve (Matt. 10:2; Mark 3:18; Luke 6:14); his calling the attention of our Lord to the lad with the loaves and fishes at the feeding of the five thousand (John 6:8); his introducing to Jesus certain Greeks who desired to see him (John 12:20-22); and his asking, along with his brother Simon and the two sons of Zebedee, for a further explanation of what the Master had said in reference to the destruction of the temple (Mark 13:3). He was one of those who, after the ascension, continued at Jerusalem in the "upper room" (Acts 1:13). Scripture relates nothing of him beyond these scattered notices. (3) Traditions. The traditions about him are various. Eusebius makes him preach in Scythia; Jerome and Theodoret in Achaia (Greece); Nicephorus in Asia Minor and Thrace. It is supposed that he founded a church in Constantinople, and ordained Stachys (q. v.), named by Paul (Rom. 16:9), as its first bishop. At length, the tradition states, he came to Patrae, a city of Achaia, where Ægeas, the proconsul, enraged at his persisting to preach, commanded him to join in sacrificing to the heathen gods, and upon the apostle's refusal he ordered him to be severely scourged and then crucified. To make his death more lingering, he was fastened to the cross, not with nails, but with cords. Having hung two days, praising God, and exhorting the spectators to embrace, or adhere to, the faith, he is said to have expired on November 30, but in what year is uncertain. The cross is stated to have been of the form called Cruz decussata, and commonly known as "St. Andrew's cross, X." Some ancient writers speak of an apocryphal Acts of Andrew.

ANDRONICUS (Gr. Ἀνδρόνικος, an-dron'-ee-kos, man-conquering), a Jewish Christian, kinsman and fellow-prisoner of Paul. He was converted before Paul, and was of note among the apostles (Rom. 16:7), A. D. 60. According to Hippolytus, he became bishop of Pannonia; according to Dorotheus, of Spain.

ANEM (Heb. אָנֵם, aw-name', two fountains), a Levitical city in Issachar, assigned to the Gershomites (1 Chron. 6:73). It is called En-gannim (Josh. 19:21; 21:29).

ANER (Heb. אָנֵר, aw-nare', a youth, an exile).

1. A Canaanitish chief near Hebron who, with Eshcol and Mamre, was confederate with Abraham. He joined in pursuit of Chedorlaomer and shared in the spoil, not following the example of Abraham (Gen. 14:13, 24), B. C. about 2250.

2. A Levitical city assigned to the Kohathites, and situated in Manasseh, W. of the Jordan (1 Chron. 6:70). It is called Tanach (Josh. 21:26).

ANETHOTTE, or ANETOTHITE, less correct forms of Anglicizing the word ANATHOTHITE. See ANATHOTE.

ANGEL (Heb. מַלְאָכִים, mal-avak'; Gr. ἄγγελος, ang'-el-os, both meaning messenger). In some cases the word is applied to human beings (Isa. 48:19; Mal. 2:7; Rev. 1:20), or even figuratively to impersonal agents (Exod. 14:19; 2 Sam. 24:16, 17; Psa. 104:4). The connection must determine its force. In its most common use in Scripture the word nevertheless designates certain spiritual and superhuman beings, who are there introduced to us as messengers of God. There are but few books of the Bible—such as Ruth, Nehemiah, Esther, the epistles of John and James—that make no mention of angels.

With respect to their existence and nature, we find the Scriptures presenting the same progress and development as with many other subjects of revelation. Thus it is that the doctrine of angels becomes more distinct in the later periods of Jewish history, and is more full and significant in the New Testament writings. Angels appear most frequently and conspicuously in connection with the coming and ministry of our Lord. His words concerning the angels are of unmistakable meaning and value. According to his teaching they are personal, sinless, immortal beings, existing in great number, and in close relation not only with individual men, but also with the history of God's kingdom (Matt. 13:39; 18:10; 22:30; 25:31; 26:53; Luke 15:10; 16:22).

There is harmony between the teachings of our Lord upon this subject and those of the apostles and of the Scripture writers generally. Many questions that may be raised can receive no answer whatever from the Scriptures. Of the history of the angels we can know but little. It appears that some of their number "kept not their first estate," but fell under divine displeasure, and are reserved "unto the judgment of the great day" (Jude 6).

Aside from the teachings of Scripture there is nothing irrational, but quite the opposite, in believing in the existence of creatures superior to man in intelligence, as there are many inferior. But we depend wholly upon the Scriptures for our knowledge. The denial of the existence of angels, as that of devils, springs from the materialistic, unbelieving spirit, which in its most terrible form denies the existence of God.

The revelations of Scripture concerning angels, while they possess a subordinate value, nevertheless have a real value.

1. They furnish a necessary safeguard against narrowness of thought as to the extent and variety of the creations of God.

2. They help us in acquiring the proper conception of Christ, who is above the angels, and the object of angelic worship.

3. They give a wonderful attractiveness to our conception of that unseen world to which we are hastening.

4. They set before us an example of joyous and perfect fulfillment of God's will. "Thy will be done in earth as it is in heaven," i. e., by the angels.

5. They put to shame the horrible indifference of multitudes of mankind with respect to the great work of conversion. "There is joy among the angels over one sinner that repenteth."

6. They broaden our view of the manifold mercies of God, whose angels are "sent forth to minister for them who shall be heirs of salvation" (Heb. 1:14; comp. 12:22).

7. They remind us of our high rank as human beings, and our exalted destiny as Christians. We who are "made but little lower than the angels" may become as the angels of God in heaven (Psa. 8:5, R. V., "lower than God;" Matt. 22:30).—E. McC.

ANGELIC HYMN, the hymn Gloria in excelsis, so called because the former part of it was sung by the angels when announcing the birth of Jesus (Luke 2:14). In several oriental liturgies it is used in the earlier part of the service. Before the time of Edward VI it was sung before the collect, epistle, and gospel, but was afterward transferred to the closing part of the office, as a song of thanksgiving after communion.

ANGELIC SALUTATION, the greeting extended to the Virgin Mary by the angel when he announced to her that she was to become the mother of Jesus (Luke 1:28). See AVE MARIA.

ANGER (usually Heb. אָף, af; Gr. ὀργή, or-gay'), the emotion of instant displeasure, indignation, arising from the feeling of injury done or intended, or from the discovery of offense against law.

The anger attributed to God in the New Testament is that in God which stands opposed to man's disobedience, obstinacy (especially in resisting the Gospel), and sin, and manifests itself in punishing the same.

Anger is not evil per se, being, as love, an original susceptibility of our nature. If anger were in itself sinful, how could God himself be angry? Paul commands the Ephesians (Eph. 4:26) that when angry they are not to sin. "Paul does not forbid the being angry (Gr. ὀργίζεσθε) in itself, and could not forbid it, because there is a holy anger, which is the 'spur to virtue,' as there is also a divine anger; . . . but the being angry is to be without sin" (Meyer, Com., in loc.).

Anger is sinful when it rises too soon, without reflection; when the injury which awakens it is only apparent; when it is disproportionate to the offense; when it is transferred from the guilty to the innocent; when it is too long protracted and becomes revengeful (Matt. 5:22; Eph. 4:26; Col. 3:8).

ANGLE (Heb. חֶקֶן, khak-kaw', Isa. 19:8; Hab. 1:15), mediæval English for "hook" (Job. 41:1). See GLOSSARY.

A'NIAM (Heb. אֲנִיָּאִים, an-ee-awm', sigling of the people), the last named of the sons of Shemidah, of the tribe of Manasseh (1 Chron. 7:19), B. C. after 1210.

A'NIM (Heb. אֲנִים, aw-neem', fountains), a city in the mountains of Judah (Josh. 15:50), ten miles S. W. of Hebron, and probably the same as the present Ghuwein.

ANIMAL, an organized living body, endowed with sensation. In the Hebrew there are several terms rendered "creature," "living thing," "cattle," etc. "The animals are in Lev. 11 divided into four classes: (1) Larger terrestrial animals (v. 2); (2) aquatic animals (vers. 9, 10); (3) birds (v. 13); (4) smaller animals (vers. 20, 29, 41, sq.); and these classes were again distinguished into clean, i. e., eatable, and into unclean, whose flesh was not to be eaten (comp. Lev. 11 and Deut. 14:1-20). The larger terrestrial animals were, moreover, in the Old Testament separated into cattle, i. e., tame domestic animals, and into beasts of the field or wild beasts (Keil, Bib. Arch.).

Clean and Unclean. The distinction between clean and unclean animals goes back to the time of primeval man (Gen. 7:2; 8:20), but it did not originate in a dualistic view of creation. According to Bible teaching all the creatures of the earth were created good and pure, as creations of the holy God (Gen. 1:31). Impurity entered into creation through man's fall; and the irrational creature, although not affected by sin, suffered under its consequences. From the lists (Lev. 11:1-31, 46; Deut. 14:1-19), the clean animals (i. e., such as could be eaten) were ruminant quadrupeds, which parted the hoof, were cloven-footed, and chewed the cud; aquatic animals with fins and scales; all birds except the nineteen species named; flying insects, having two long legs for leaping, as the grasshopper.

For Sacrifice. Sacrifices were of (a) the beeve kind, a cow, bull, or calf; the ox, having been mutilated, could not have been offered (Lev. 22:24); (b) the goat kind—a he-goat, a she-goat, or a kid; (c) the sheep kind—a ewe, ram, or lamb. See SACRIFICE.

These regulations would seem to have been abrogated by our Lord, when he taught that inward purity was the great essential (Matt. 15:11, 17-20). In the vision Peter was taught the essential cleanliness of all God's creatures (Acts 10:11-16).

Paul speaks decidedly upon this point (Rom. 14; Col. 2:16; Tit. 1:15), and yet the apostolic council at Jerusalem placed "things strangled," and "blood," along with "pollutions of idols and fornication," on the list of things prohibited (Acts 15:20).

ANIMAL KINGDOM.

The proportion of animals mentioned in the Bible compared with the total number found in Bible lands is far larger than that which obtains in the case of plants. There are 38 mammals, out of perhaps 130, 34 birds out of about 350, 11 reptiles out of nearly 100, and one amphibian out of a considerable number indigenous in these lands. It is a notable fact that not a single species of fish is mentioned by name. Of insects there are sixteen, out of a number not as yet satisfactorily settled. Scorpions and spiders are mentioned generically. The number of species is considerable. Four only of the large number of mollusks and only one of the worms are specifically named. Coral and sponge are the generic representations of their respective orders. Few even of the mammals, except the domestic animals, are specific. Most of them are generic or family names, to which is often appended, "after his kind." Some, as the chamois, mole, unicorn, are mistranslations; others, as the dragon and satyr, are fabulous.

ADDER. See SERPENT.

ANT (Heb. אַנְתִּיָּה, an-aw-law'). There are large numbers of species of ants in the East, and innumerable hosts of them make their nests beside the thrashing floors, and wherever their favorite food is found. In every country in the world the ant is proverbial for industry, so there has never been any controversy with regard to the passage in Prov. 6:6, "Go to the ant, thou sluggard." The habits of the ants of cool climates and of those of the tropical and semitropical countries differ so much that considerable controversy has arisen as to the wisdom and foresight of this insect. Prov. 30:25: "The ants are a people not strong, yet they prepare their meat in the summer." There are, however, certain facts in regard to the ants of the Holy Land which settle this controversy in favor of the rigid accuracy of the author of the Proverbs. They are: (1) The ants of these countries lay up vast stores of grain in their nests. (2) To facilitate this act of providence they place their nests as near as possible to the places where grain is thrashed or stored. (3) They certainly eat this grain during the winter season. (4) They encourage certain insects which secrete sweet juices to consort with them, and collect and store their eggs with their own, that they may have them at hand for future use when they shall have hatched.

In regard to their wisdom, we have abundant evidence of it in their social and military organization, the fact that they take and train slaves, and that they have elaborately constructed nests, with overground and underground roads, and, in some cases, practice a sort of agriculture.

ANTELOPE (R. V., Deut. 14:5; Isa. 51:20). See Ox.

APES (Heb. אֲפִים, kofe, monkey). We have no hint as to the kinds of apes which were brought by the merchant navies of Solomon and Hiram, but it is probable that they were very numerous. as they continue to be to the present day on all the ships coming from the East Indies through the Suez Canal. They are distributed in this way in considerable numbers throughout all the countries bordering on the Mediterranean, though not indigenous in any except the Barbary States and Gibraltar.

ARROWSNAKE. See SERPENT.ASP. See SERPENT.

ASS (Heb. אֲשֵׁר, kham-ore', the male ass; אֲשֵׁרָה, aw-thone', she ass; Gr. βους, ou'-os, donkey; ὑποζύγιον, hoop-od-zoog'-ee-on, under the yoke). The ass is one of the earliest and most frequently mentioned animals alluded to in the Bible. Asses are spoken of in connection with the history of Pharaoh (Gen. 12:16), Abraham (Gen. 22:3), Jacob (Gen. 32:5), Moses (Exod. 4:20), Balaam (Num. 22:21-33), and in fact most of the notable persons mentioned in the Old Testament. There was nothing in any sense degrading in the idea of riding on an ass, as might perhaps be inferred from Zech. 9:9 (comp. Matt. 21:7). It was the sign of the peaceful mission of Christ. Kings, high priests, judges, and the richest people of ancient and modern times, have ridden on an ass. Many of the asses of Damascus, Bagdad, Aleppo, Cairo, Cyprus, and other parts of the East are beautiful animals, very easy in gait, and perfectly surefooted. They often cost very high prices, and are adorned with magnificent caparisons.

They have also been used from the remotest antiquity as beasts of burden. Special breeds of them are raised for this purpose. Some of them are very small and cheap, while others are but little smaller than a mule, and carry burdens of greater weight in proportion to their size than any other animal. The pack saddle differs according to the use to which it is put. The familiar crosstree is employed for firewood. Abraham doubtless loaded the wood for the sacrifice in this way (Gen. 22:3). When sheaves of grain are to be loaded a kind of cradle is suspended to this or to the flat saddle. This latter, called in Arabic a jeld, is composed of an under layer of thick felt and an upper of strong haircloth, with a padding between, about six inches in thickness, of straw or sedges. This saddle is flat on top and bent down over each side of the animal, so as to protect his ribs from the pressure of the load. Over such a saddle as this sacks of grain or cut straw are thrown and tied fast by a rope passing under the breast. The sons of Jacob probably used this sort (Gen. 42:26, 27). If sand is to be carried, small panniers are slung over the saddle, and hang down on either side without touching the body. If bread or other provisions, not liable to be injured by pressure, are taken larger panniers are used. In such Jesse and Abigail may have sent their presents (1 Sam. 16:20; 25:18). If fruit is to be carried two boxes are slung in similar manner. Children are often carried in this way in larger boxes. Probably Moses's wife sat on a jeld, with her children in boxes on either side of her, when going down to Egypt (Exod. 4:20). Sacks of grain or straw are often slung across the bare back of an ass.

Asses were also used for plowing (Isa. 30:24; 32:20).

It was not allowed to the Israelites to yoke an ox and an ass together (Deut. 22:10). They were not allowed to eat its flesh, yet in the stress of hunger during the siege of Samaria they violated this law (2 Kings 6:25).

The she ass is the one intended in a number of places not indicated in our translations (Num. 22:21-33; 1 Sam. 9:3; 2 Kings 4:22, 24). David had an officer to take care of his she asses (1 Chron. 27:30).

Ass colts (Gen. 49:11) are also called foals (Gen. 32:15), young ass (Isa. 30:6), and colt (Job 11:12). They are all translated from the same Hebrew word, 'ayir.

Wild asses are frequently mentioned, two Hebrew words (פָּרֵה, peh'-reh, running wild; עֵרֶד, aw-rodé', lonesome) being so translated. Both are found together in one parallelism (Job 39:5), but rendered by the single expression wild ass. We have no means of knowing whether they refer to the same or different species. Asinus onager, Pall., and A. hemippus, St. Hilaire, are found in the deserts nearest to Palestine.

BADGER (Heb. תַּחַשׁ, takh'-ash). Although the badger is found throughout the Holy Land, its skin is unsuitable for the outer covering of the tabernacle (Exod. 25:5, etc.), and for sandals (Ezek. 16:10). Moreover, the Heb. techashim would seem to be from a root cognate with the Arab. tuchas, which signifies the dolphin, and possibly sea animals similar in general appearance, as the porpoise, halibore, and seal. The R. V. has rendered the Hebrew original by seal, with a marginal of porpoise. The skins of all these would suit the requirements of the case, and it is not unlikely that the term is to be understood in the broad sense of such marine creatures, rather than in the restricted application to a single species. A number of such species were obtainable in the Red Sea, near Sinai. Seals are, and must have been, rare. We prefer dolphin or porpoise to any other rendering.

BALD LOCUST. See LOCUST.

BAT (Heb. עֵיטָא, at-al-lafé'). The Hebrew idea of a bat was "a fowl that creeps, going upon all fours." It was unclean (Lev. 11:19). It is in reality a mammal, and its wings are membranous and destitute of feathers. It has a mouse-like odor. It lives in caverns, tombs, or ruins (Isa. 2:19-21). The bat is a voracious destroyer of fruit, making it necessary for those who try to raise it in the neighborhood of cities to cover the clusters, or even the whole tree, with a net. There are about fifteen species of bats in the Holy Land.

BEAR (Heb. דֹּב, or דֹּבָה, dobe). The bear is now a somewhat rare animal in Syria, being confined to the higher regions of Lebanon, Antilebanon, and Amanus, and found very sparingly in the wilder portions of Bashan, Gilead, and Moab. It is rarely or never seen now in western Palestine. It is known in science as Ursus Syriacus, Ehr., and differs from the brown bear of Europe by its grayish fur. It was once abundant in Palestine (1 Sam. 17:36; 2 Kings 2:24). The Scripture alludes to the cunning of the bear (Lam. 3:10), to the ferocity of the she bear robbed of her whelps (2 Sam. 17:8; Prov. 17:12; Hos. 13:8), to the danger of the bear to man (1 Sam. 17:34, 36; Amos 5:19). The bear feeds principally on roots, fruits, and other vegetable products, but does not fail to avail itself of the chance to devour any animal which may come in its way. Hence the significance of the picture of the peaceful reign of Christ (Isa. 11:7).

BEAST. There is so great a want of uniformity and accuracy in both the A. V. and the R. V. in their renderings of the three Hebrew words for living creatures that our limits will not allow us to make an analysis of them. Beasts were created on the fifth and sixth day. The term is sometimes used by the translators for Heb. בְּהֵמָה, bē-hay-maw', dumb; at others for בְּיָרֵךְ, beh-ere'; and still again for חַי, khal'ee, to live. It is sometimes employed for living things (Gen. 7:14), or animals in contradistinction to man (Gen. 6:7), or mammalia (1 Kings 4:33), or the animal kingdom (Prov. 30:30), or wild beasts as distinguished from cattle (Gen. 7:14), or quadrupeds (Gen. 7:2), etc. Paul describes his opponents as wild beasts (1 Cor. 15:32). Peter speaks of certain sinners as natural brute beasts (2 Pet. 2:12). In the same manner, Jude 10. The New Testament word for beast is θηρίον, thay-ree'-on.

BEES (Heb. דְּבַר־בְּעֵל, deb-o-raw', orderly). In the Holy Land, while bees occasionally make their hives in trees, as in other countries (1 Sam. 14:25, 26), they generally resort to clefts in the rocks, usually almost inaccessible to man. There are several allusions to the rocky homes of the bees (Deut. 32:13; Psa. 81:16). They are especially abundant in the wilderness of Judea (Matt. 3:4). They resent with great fury any interference by man with their retreats (Deut. 1:44; Psa. 118:12).

The numbers of wild bees at present in Palestine would not justify the expression "a land flowing with milk and honey." It is, however, probable that they were far more numerous at the time when the Israelites entered Canaan. But the number of domesticated bees in the country is enormous, and, added to the wild ones, fully justifies the hyperbole. Among the peasant population they are in almost every house.

Honey is used not only in its separate state, but fruit is preserved in it, and it is used as a sauce for a variety of confections and pastries. It was a standard article of commerce (Ezek. 27:17). Stores of it were collected at Mizpah (Jer. 41:8). It was not allowed to be used in burnt offerings (Lev. 2:11). The honey in the carcass of the lion (Judg. 14:8) is best explained by the rapidity with which a carcass is denuded by wild beasts and ants in this hot climate and then dried in the blazing sun.

According to the author of Proverbs (24:13), it is good to eat honey, but (25:16, 27) not to indulge to surfeit. Other references to honey convey sundry moral lessons (Ezek. 3:3; Psa. 19:10; Prov. 16:24).

BEEFLE, an insect of the grasshopper kind (Lev. 11:22). See LOCUST.

BEEVES. See CATTLE, Ox.

BEHEMOTH, the plural of the Hebrew word for BEAST (q. v.), used (Job 40:15-24) of the hippopotamus, the beast, only excelled by leviathan, with the description of which ends the climax begun in ch. 38, and carried upward until it finds its acme in the "king over all the children of pride" (41:34). The hippopotamus is a pachyderm, the largest except the elephant and the rhinoceros, amphibious in habits, living on vegetable food, and corresponding well with the description in the above passage. It is found in the upper Nile, and was common in the lower in ancient times. It may have been found in the Jordan (40:23), although poetic license would make it quite possible that the mention of that river should have reference only to its aquatic habits and its courage, and not to its geographical range. Indeed, "the river" of the first member of the parallelism can only mean the Nile, and the mention of the Jordan in the second would seem to be simply to strengthen the hyperbole.

BIRD. See FOWL.

BITTERN. See SUPPLEMENT.

BOAR. See SWINE.

BULL, BULLOCK. See Ox.

CALF. See Ox.

CAMEL (Heb. גַּמְלִי, gaw-maw', labor, burden-bearing; Gr. κάμηλος, kam'-ay-los), one of the most useful of the domestic animals of the East. With the exception of the elephant it is the largest animal used by man. It is often eight feet or more in height, and possessed of great strength and endurance. It has a broad foot, which enables it to walk over sandy wastes without sinking deeply beneath the surface. It has a provision in its stomach for storing water enough to enable it to travel for days together without drinking. It is capable of subsisting on the coarsest and bitterest of herbage, and can take into its horny mouth the most obdurate thorns, which it grinds up with its powerful teeth and digests with its ostrich-like stomach. To offset its great height it is formed to kneel, so that it can be loaded as easily as an ass, and then rise with its burden of five hundred pounds and plod on through the hottest day, and the most inhospitable waste of the deserts, in which it finds its congenial home. The hump on its back is not only a help to retaining its pack saddle, but a storehouse of fat, in reserve against its long fasts. The flesh, although forbidden to the Israelites, is eaten by the Arabs, and sold in the markets of all oriental cities. Its skin is used in making sandals, and its hair in the weaving of the coarse cloth of which their tents and outer garments are made. Its milk, and the products made from it, are a prime element in the diet list of the Bedouin.

The allusions to the camel in the Scripture are so numerous that it is unnecessary to point them out. They prove that it was used from the earliest times in the very regions where it is now the main reliance of the people for traversing the otherwise almost impassable deserts, and transporting burdens too heavy for other animals to carry.

The word rendered dromedaries (Isa. 60:6; Jer. 2:23) does not refer to the peculiar breed of blood camels known by that name, but to young camels, the latter reference being to the female.

Figurative. In the two passages (Matt. 19:24; 23:24) the size of the camel is made the basis of comparison. There is not a particle of evidence in favor of the statement that the needle's eye, in the former passage, refers to the smaller gate cut through the panel of the city gates of the East, or that such a gate is, or ever was, called a needle's eye. The whole force of the comparison in both passages is found in the hyperbole. Moreover, no camel could ever be forced through one of these small gates.

CANKERWORM, probably a stage in the development of the Locust (q. v.).

CAT. The cat is nowhere alluded to in the Bible, excepting in the Apocrypha (Epistle of Jer. 21). It is not mentioned in classical authors, except when treating of Egyptian history. This seems the stranger as there are two species of wild cats in Palestine, and the domestic cat is exceedingly common now all through the East.

CATERPILLAR. See Locust.

CATTLE (the rendering of several Hebrew and Greek words) were of prime importance to the Hebrews. Their first employment was the care of flocks and herds. On their arrival in Egypt they were assigned to the land of Goshen, on account of its pastoral facilities. They then became herdsmen and shepherds to Pharaoh. One of the words, mikneh, translated cattle, signifies possessions. It includes horned cattle, horses, asses, sheep, and goats. The specific words for animals of the bovine species, and for sheep and goats, are also occasionally rendered cattle. Also behémáh, which means, primarily, beast in general.

There is no possibility of determining with certainty the animal intended by this Hebrew word in the list of creeping things (Lev. 11:30). It was probably a lizard, and more likely to have been the Nile monitor than the chameleon. The R. V. renders it land crocodile. The former of these attains a length of five to six feet, and the latter of four to five. On the authority of the LXX. and the Vulgate the A. V. has rendered it chameleon.

On the other hand the R. V. has rendered tinshemeth, at the end of the verse, by chamelcon, instead of mole of the A. V. This is based on the fact that tinshemeth is derived from a root signifying to breathe, and that the ancients believed that the chameleon lived on air. This somewhat fanciful idea is hardly probable enough to do away with the authority of the LXX. and the Vulgate, which render the word mole. The reference, however, is not to the true mole, but to the mole rat, Spalax typhlus, which is abundant in Bible lands. If the above views be correct, chameleon should be dropped from the biblical fauna.

CHAMOIS (Heb. צִמְרֵן, zeh'-mer). The chamois of Europe is not found in the Holy Land. The animal referred to by this name (Deut. 14:5) was certainly not one of the domestic animals. It was also certainly known to them by its Hebrew name, zemer, and within the reach of the Israelites, as it was spoken of as an animal that they might eat. No animal satisfies the probabilities of the case so well as the mountain sheep of Egypt and Arabia, known as the oudad and the kebsh. It is probable that it was abundant in Sinai, where it is to be found even now. It is distinguished from the other animals of its group by the long hair on its throat and breast, extending like a ruffle to its foreknee. Its horns resemble those of the beden, or mountain goat.

CHICKEN. See Cock.

COCK. The only mention of domestic fowls in the Old Testament is in connection with the daily provision for Solomon's table (1 Kings 4:23). The Hebrew word, צִמְרֵן, bar-boo', has been rendered swans, geese, guinea fowls, capons, and fatted fish, as well as the fatted fowl of the A. V. and the R. V. In the absence of decisive evidence we may accept the opinion of our translators and assume that such an epicure as Solomon did not fail to have so delicious an element in his larder.

In the New Testament the cock crowing is mentioned as a measure of time in connection with Peter's denial of Christ (Matt. 26:34, 74; Mark 14:30; Luke 22:34; John 18:27). Cocks are not regular in their times of crowing, sometimes crowing twice (Mark 13:35), and at other times irregularly through the night or before the dawn.

The hen is alluded to but once in the Scripture (Luke 13:34).

COCKATRICE. See SERPENT.

COLT. See ASS, HORSE.

CONEY (Heb. פָּזִי, shaw-fawn), a small pachydermatous animal, with a dentition and feet resembling those of the hippopotamus. It is as large as a rabbit. It has a plump body and very short ears and tail. Its scientific name is Hyrax Syriacus. It does not really chew the cud, but has a motion of the jaws which resembles that function. Had it divided the hoof it would undoubtedly have been admitted into the list of animals allowed to the Hebrews for food (Lev. 11:5; Deut. 14:7).

The coney lives in holes and clefts of the rocks (Psa. 104:18; Prov. 30:24, 26). It is found throughout the whole length of Sinai, Palestine, and Lebanon.

CORAL (Heb. רִמֹּתַי, raw-maw', high in value).

It is uncertain what substance is intended by the word rāmōth, rendered coral by both the A. V. and the R. V. As coral, however, is a precious commodity, and highly suitable for the requirements of the only two passages in which the word occurs, we may rest contented with this translation (Job 28:18; Ezek. 27:16). This substance is the skeleton of microscopic zoophytes. It is of a great variety of colors, shapes, and consistency. The most valuable is the red. Many of the branches of coral are extremely beautiful. The Red Sea was probably named so on account of the red coral growing in its waters. The best coral is brought from Persia and the Red Sea, but a very good quality is also found in the Mediterranean. Fine specimens of the best colors may bring fifty dollars the ounce. Coral was much valued among the ancients and the Arabs for making beads and other ornaments.

CORMORANT. In the list of unclean birds (Lev. 11:17; Deut. 14:17) the word cormorant is probably the correct rendering of the Heb. שָׂוֹלֵף, shaw-lawk', bird of prey. It is abundant in the Holy Land. It is a large black bird, living by fishing. Its scientific name is Phalacrocorax carbo. In all other places in the A. V. where cormorant is used pelican should be substituted for it, as the true rendering of the original, לַוִּיתַי, law-ath', vomiting.

COW. See Ox.

CRANE (Heb. סוּס, soos, leap). The word occurs only twice in the Bible (Isa. 38:14; Jer. 8:7), and in both places should be rendered twittering, or twitterer, as applied to the swallow or some similar bird. Notwithstanding the opinion of the A. V. and the R. V., we think that the crane ought to be dropped from the list of biblical birds.

CROCODILE (marg. Job 41:1), a well-known saurian, found in ancient times in lower as well as upper Egypt, but now confined to the upper waters of the Nile. It was probably abundant in the Kishon in Bible days. It is said to be still found there. It is the creature intended by "dragon" (Ezek. 29:3) and "whale" (32:2; comp. Jer. 14:6, R. V., marg.). See LEVIATHAN.

CUCKOW, a mistranslation of a Hebrew word, שָׁחַף, shakh'-af, which is probably generic for bird of the sea gull family. The word occurs only twice (Lev. 11:16; Deut. 14:15, R. V., "seamew").

DOE (R. V., Prov. 5:19, for roe, A. V.) is the female of the wild goat. See GOAT, WILD.

DOG (Heb. כִּלְבֵּי, kel'-leb, yelping; κύνιον, koo-nar'-ee-on, puppy; κύων, koo'-ohn, dog). The dog referred to in the Scriptures is invariably the unclean animal, so familiar in the streets of all oriental cities. He is a cowardly, lazy, despised creature. He eats garbage, dead animals (Exod. 22:31), human flesh (1 Kings 14:11), blood (1 Kings 22:38). He is the lowest type of villainy (Eccl. 9:4; 2 Sam. 3:8; Isa. 66:3). Dogs wander through the streets (Psa. 59:6, 14). With all their cowardice they are treacherous and violent (Psa. 22:16, 20). The only good thing said of them is that they watch the flocks (Job 30:1; Isa. 56:10). Christ compares the Gentiles to them (Matt. 15:26). Those who are shut out of heaven are called dogs (Rev. 22:15). The price of a dog (Deut. 23:18) probably refers to sodomy. The return of a fool to his folly is compared to one of the most disgusting of the many filthy habits of the dog (Prov. 26:11; 2 Pet. 2:22).

DOLEFUL CREATURES (Heb. אֲוִיִּם, o'-akh, a howler; Isa. 13:21; A. V., marg., "Ochims") refer to birds or beasts which emit shrieks or howlings or ominous sounds, such as the booming of owls, the wailing cry of jackals, and the dismal howling of wolves. The point of the allusion is the fact that such creatures resort to ruins and deserted dwellings, and indicate the desolation which has overtaken them.

DOLPHIN. See BADGER.

DOVE (Heb. יוֹנָה, yo-naw'; Gr. περιστέρα, per-is-ter-ah'). Four species of wild pigeons are found in Bible lands, the ring dove, or wood pigeon, the stock dove, the rock dove, and the ash-rumped rock dove. They are all known by the name of hamān in Arabic. They make their nests in the clefts and holes of the rocks (Cant. 2:14; Jer. 48:28; Ezek. 7:16). They also nest in trees. They are unresisting (Matt. 10:16), and therefore suitable for sacrifice (Gen. 15:9; Lev. 12:6-8; Luke 2:24; Mark 11:15; John 2:14-16). They are timid (Hos. 11:11); they fly to great distances in their migrations (Psa. 55:6-8); they are gentle (Cant. 1:15; 4:1, etc.). Therefore a dove was the form in which the Holy Spirit descended on Jesus Christ (Matt. 3:16, etc.). See TURTLEDOVE. Wild doves are very numerous in some parts of the Holy Land. There are also vast numbers of tame pigeons in all the cities and villages. They have been kept from the earliest times. Being acceptable for sacrifices, they were also clean, and used as food.

DOVE'S DUNG (Heb. תְּרֵיבֵי יוֹנָה, khar-ay'-yo-neem). Several theories have been formulated to explain the difficulty in regard to this material as an article of food (2 Kings 6:25): (1) That it was a kind of plant. No plant with this name has been discovered, however, and it is unlikely that any plant would have been found in any quantity in a place in the last extremity of famine. (2) That it was in reality dung, but used as a fertilizer, to promote the quick growth of vegetables for food. This is fanciful, and not supported by the context. (3) That the people, in the depth of their despair and starvation, actually ate this disgusting material. This seems the most probable view, and is supported by the fact that a similar occurrence took place in the English army in 1316.

DRAGON (Heb. תַּנִּינִי, tan-neen). This word is used in the A. V. with several meanings: (1) In connection with desert animals (Isa. 13:22; 34:13, 14, etc.), it is best translated by wolf, and not by jackal, as in R. V. The feminine form of the Heb. תַּנִּינָה, tan-nau', is found in Mal. 1:3. (2)

Sea monsters (Psa. 74:13; 148:7; Isa. 27:1). (3) Serpents, even of the smaller sorts (Deut. 32:33; Psa. 91:13). (4) The crocodile (Ezek. 29:3; 32:2, marg.). (5) In the New Testament (Rev. 12:3, et seq.) it refers to a mythical monster, which is variously described and figured in the legends of all nations. One of the Hebrew words, usually rendered dragon, is in some places translated serpents (Exod. 7:9, 10, 12).

DROMEDARY (Heb. רֶמֶשׂ, reh'-kesh, swift beast; רַמְמָה, ram-mauk', a brood mare). Besides the references to the dromedary in the A. V. (Isa. 60:6; Jer. 2:23), where the word should be rendered young camel (Heb. בְּהֵמָה, beh'-ker), it is also mentioned in 1 Kings 4:28 and Esth. 8:10; in the first being an erroneous rendering of a Hebrew word signifying "swift beasts," as in margin, and in the second another word signifying "mares." There is no clear and undoubted reference to the dromedary in the Scripture.

EAGLE (Heb. נְשֵׁר, neh'-sher; רֶהָם, raw-khawn'; Gr. ἀετός, ah-et-os'). The word eagle in the A. V. includes both the eagles proper and the vultures. There are no less than four of the former and eight of the latter in the Holy Land. The most common of the vultures are the griffon and the Egyptian vulture, commonly known as Pharaoh's chicken. The commonest of the eagles is the short-toed eagle, Circæus Gallicus, Gmel. All of these birds are swift (Deut. 28:49), soar high (Prov. 23:5), nest in inaccessible rocks (Job 39:27-30), and sight their prey from afar (Job 39:29). Besides the above references the habits of eagles and vultures are alluded to in numerous passages (Num. 24:21; Job 9:26; Prov. 30:17, 19; Jer. 49:16; Ezek. 17:3; Obad. 4; Hab. 1:8; Matt. 24:28; Luke 17:37). The tenderness of the eagle to its young is also graphically set forth (Exod. 19:4; Deut. 32:11). Its great age is also noted (Psa. 103:5; Isa. 40:31).

EGGS. See FOWL.

ELEPHANT. This animal is not mentioned in the text of the A. V., but twice in the margin (1 Kings 10:22; 2 Chron. 9:21). The animal is mentioned in Maccabees.

ewe. See SHEEP.

FALCON, R. V. for A. V. "kite" (Lev. 11:14; Deut. 14:13), and A. V. "vulture" (Job 28:7).

FALLOW DEER, a mistranslation of Heb. יַחַמְמוֹר, yakh-moor' (Deut. 14:5; 1 Kings 4:23), which is correctly rendered by R. V. "roebuck."

FERRET. See GECKO.

FISH. The Greek language has over four hundred names of fishes. The Hebrew, as we have it in the Bible, has not even one. Nevertheless fishes are mentioned frequently in the Scriptures. They were classified as clean, having fins and scales, and unclean, not so furnished. Whales, seals, dolphins, and other creatures, now known to be lung breathers, were regarded by the Hebrews as fish. There are forty-five species in the inland waters and very large numbers in the Mediteranean Sea. Dagon, the god of the Philistines, had a man's body and a fish's tail. There are many allusions to fishing in the Bible.

FLEA (Heb. פַּרְוֹשֶׁת, par-oshe'), a most annoying and unfortunately most common insect in the East. David compares himself to a flea in order to discredit Saul (1 Sam. 24:14). The similar reference (1 Sam. 26:20) is considered by some an error in the text.

FLY (Heb. זְבוּב, zeb-ool'). The immense number of flies in the East is one of its most striking characteristics. The number of species is also very large. The Heb. zeb-ool', which is part of the name of the god of Ekron, Baal-zebub, is generic, but as the house fly is the most familiar representative it would be most frequently thought of in connection with this name. It is uncertain whether the plague of flies, עֲרֹב, aw-robe', refers to the swarming of a single species (R. V., Psa. 78:45, "swarms of flies"), or a multiplication of such noxious insects (A. V. "divers sorts of flies"). "Devoured them" can hardly mean ate them up bodily, nor bit them; but destroyed their food, and overwhelmed them with their nastiness.

FOAL. See ASS, HORSE.

FOWL. A number of Hebrew words are rendered fowl, as בַּרְבוּר, bar-boor'; עֹפֶה, ofe; צִפּוּרִים, tsip-pore'. They are all translated by other words also, as "bird," "birds of prey," "sparrow," etc. This want of uniformity tends to obscure meanings which would otherwise be simple.

1. Birds were divided into clean and unclean, the latter including the carrion birds, fish hunters, and some others, as the hoopoe. Domestic fowls are mentioned, but it is nowhere said that they were eaten. It is, nevertheless, extremely probable that they were so used.

2. Nest. The allusions to birds' nests in the Bible are frequent and forcible. They were made in the sanctuary (Psa. 84:3), rocks (Job 39:27; comp. Num. 24:21; Jer. 49:16), trees (Psa. 104:17; Jer. 22:23; Ezek. 31:6). Nests are concealed in ruins (Isa. 34:15) and holes (Jer. 48:28). The New Testament nests (Matt. 8:20; Luke 9:58) are mere roosts.

3. Eggs are frequently alluded to (Deut. 22:6; Job 39:14; Isa. 10:14). They were well-known articles of food (Luke 11:12).

4. Migration of birds (Cant. 2:11, 12; Jer. 8:7), their singing (Eccles. 12:4; Psa. 104:12), flight (Exod. 19:4), care of young (Deut. 32:11, 12), voracity (Matt. 13:4), and many other characteristics are alluded to.

FOX. In several places it is uncertain whether Heb. שׁוּפְּרַיִם, shoo-aw'ul'; Gr. ἀλώπηξ, al-o'-pakes, signifies fox or jackal (Lam. 5:18; Ezek. 13:4; Cant. 2:15). In others it doubtless means jackals (Judg. 15:4; Psa. 63:10). The difficulty in regard to the number of jackals which Samson turned loose into the fields of the Philistines disappears if we consider that he probably collected them, doubtless with the aid of his companions, over a wide district of the Philistine plain, and set them loose in pairs, at perhaps as many as a hundred and fifty centers, so as to burn up as much as possible of the "shocks, and also the standing corn, and the vineyards and olives." In only one place is it more probable that fox is intended (Neh. 4:3). Ἀλώπηξ, al-o'-pakes, in the New Testament can mean nothing but fox. The Syrian fox is identical with the common European fox, Vulpes vulgaris, L.

FROG (Heb. צְפַרְדֵּיִם, tsef-ar-day'-ah). The frog of the Egyptian plague (Exod. 8:2-14) is Rana esculenta, L., an amphibian, common everywhere in Egypt and the Holy Land (see Wisd. 19:10).

GAZELLE, the correct rendering of צִבְיָה, tsebee', translated, A. V., roe and roebuck. It is the smallest of the antelopes in the Holy Land. It is abundant in the wildest portions of the country. Its beauty and speed are often alluded to in sacred and profane poetry. Its scientific name is Gazella Dorcas, L.

GECKO (Heb. קַדְדָּיִם, an-aw-kaw', R. V., Lev. 11:30, for A. V., "ferret"). This lizard is named from the sound which it emits. Its scientific name is Ptyodactylus Hasselquistii, Schneid. It is frequently found in houses. It runs with great rapidity, and clings to walls and ceilings by the suckers with which its feet are furnished. It is no way probable that the Hebrew original of this word signifies the ferret.

GIER EAGLE, a term in English of indefinite meaning, referring to the soaring of birds of prey. A. V. uses it for Heb. חֲמִצְתַּיִם, raw-khawm', which is Pharaoh's chicken, Neophron percnopterus. R. V. uses it for צְהַרְהַרֵּי, peh'-res, which is better rendered ossifrage.

GLEDE, an old name for the kite. If the Hebrew original, רָחַב, raw-aw' (Deut. 14:13) be not the same as dā'ah (Lev. 11:14, A. V., "kite;" R. V., "vulture"), glede is as good a rendering as can be given.

GNAT (Gr. κνώπη, ko'-nopes), the wine gnat or midge in fermenting and evaporating wine. Gnats or mosquitoes are most irritating pests in all parts of the East, and are very common in the low-lying marshy lands of Palestine and Egypt. It may refer to any small bloodsucking insect, and the more minute creatures, whether bloodsuckers or not, which torment man and beast.

Figurative. The custom of filtering wine, among the Jews, was founded on the prohibition of "all flying, creeping things" being used for food, excepting saltatorii (see Lev. 11:22, 23). The saying of our Lord, "Blind guides, who strain out a gnat and swallow down a camel" (Matt. 23:24), was doubtless taken from this custom. The contrast between the smallest insect and the largest animal is used to illustrate the inconsistency of those who are superstitiously anxious in avoiding small faults, yet do not scruple to commit the greatest sins.

GOAT (Heb. אֵזִי, ak-ko', slender; יָבֵל, yaw-ale', climbing; אֵז, aze, strong; צִמְרֵי, at-tood', prepared, and so leader; שֹׁמֵרֵי, saw-er', shaggy; Gr. ἐρίφιον, er-ifi'-ee-on; τράγος, trag'-os), an animal often associated with sheep, and mentioned with them in many places in Scripture, once sharply contrasted (Matt. 25:32, 33). Owing to the unlovely disposition of the goat it was less chosen for ordinary sacrifices. Nevertheless it was an allowable victim (Lev.

3:12; 4:24; 9:15; 10:16; ch. 16, passim; Num. 15:27; 28:22, etc.). Goats were only second in importance, as a source and investment of wealth, to sheep.

Figurative. In Matt. 25:32, 33, sheep and goats are used to represent the righteous and the wicked respectively. "The wicked are here conceived of under the figure of goats, not on account of the wantonness and stench of the latter (Grotius), or in consequence of their stubbornness (Lange), but generally because these animals were considered to be comparatively worthless (Luke 15:29); and hence, in v. 33, we have the diminutive τὰ ἐρίφια for the purpose of expressing contempt" (Meyer, Com., Matt. 25:32, 33).

GOAT, WILD, a graceful animal, Capra Bedouin, L., with semicircular horns two and a half to three feet long. It is found in the more inaccessible mountains and deserts. Of the two Hebrew words ya'alath and akko (Deut. 14:5) the first certainly, and the second probably, refers to this species.

GRASSHOPPER. See LOCUST.

GREAT OWL. See OWL.

GREYHOUND, a very doubtful rendering of Heb. זָרְזִיר קְוִינִים, zar-zeer' mauh-na'-yeem, slender in the loins (Prov. 30:31). The marginal readings, "horse" and "warhorse," show that the translators were not quite satisfied with the rendering of the text.

HARE (Heb. אֶרְנֵבֶה, ar-neh'-bell, Lev. 11:6; Deut. 14:7), a rodent of which there are four species in the Holy Land, of which Lepus Syriacus, Hempr. et Ehr., is generally diffused. The others, L. Sinaiticus, Hempr. et Ehr., L. Aegyptius, Geoffr., and L. Isabellinus, Rüpp., are desert species.

HART, Cervus Dama, L., an animal once found in Palestine, but now probably extinct S. of Amanus. The Hebrew אֵיִל, ah-yawl', and not yahmôr (Deut. 14:5; 1 Kings 4:23), is the fallow deer. The female is called Hind. See FALLOW DEER.

HAWK (Heb. נָיָץ, nays, Lev. 11:16; Deut. 14:15; Job 39:26; תַּחַמְוֵץ, takh-mawce', Lev. 11:16; Deut. 14:15). There are eighteen species of the hawk "after his kind," ranging in size from the little sparrow hawk to the buzzard. These are exclusive of the kites and gledes.

HE ASS. See ASS.

HEIFER. See OX.

HEN. See COCK.

HERON. There are six species of herons in the Holy Land. As the Heb. אֲנָפִי, an-aw-faw' (Lev. 11:19; Deut. 14:18), is associated with the stork, and accompanied by the qualifying phrase "after her kind," it is reasonable to accept "heron," rather than eagle, parrot, swallow, or ibis, all of which have been suggested in its place.

HIND, the female of HART (q. v.).

HIPPOPOTAMUS. See BEHEMOTH.

HONEY. See BEE.

HOOPOE, probably the correct translation of Heb. דּוּכֵיפִית, doo-kee-fath', R. V., Lev. 11:19; Deut. 14:18; A. V., "lapwing." It is a migratory bird, Upupa epops, L., which spends the summer in the Holy Land and the winter in more southerly districts. Its head is often figured on the Egyptian monuments. If it be the bird intended by doo-kee-fath' it was unclean. It is, however, now freely eaten.

HORNET (Heb. צִרְיָה, tsir-aw', as stinging), an insect with a formidable sting. It is found in considerable abundance in the Holy Land. Commentators are at variance as to whether the intention of the passages in which it is mentioned (Exod. 23:28; Deut. 7:20; Josh. 24:12) is literal or figurative. There are several species of hornets in the Holy Land.

HORSE. The Hebrews were at first forbidden to retain the horses they captured (Deut. 17:16), and accordingly houghed most of those which they took (Josh. 11:4-9). But they soon ceased to regard this restriction, and accumulated large studs of cavalry and chariot horses, mostly from Egypt and Assyria. Solomon had twelve thousand cavalry and four thousand chariot horses. Riding a horse was usually a sign of military rank. Many high functionaries, however, rode asses, mules, and camels.

HORSELEECH (Heb. עֲלוּקָה, al-oo-kaw', sucking, Prov. 30:15), either one of the leeches, Hirudo medicinalis, Sav., or Hæmopsis sanguisorba, Sav., found in the stagnant waters throughout the land, or a specter like the "night monster."

HOUND. See GREYHOUND.

HYENA (Heb. צְבוּיָה, tsau-boo'-ah, speckled), probably the correct rendering of Jer. 12:9, "speckled bird." It suits well the context. The hyena is very common throughout the Holy Land, and would be one of the "beasts of the field" to devour the carrion so vividly represented in the above passage.

JACKAL (Heb. עֲיָן, tan-neen', monster), R. V., Isa. 34:13; Jer. 9:11; 10:22; 51:37; Mic. 1:8, for A. V. "dragon." It would better be rendered wolf. Also R. V., Jer. 14:6, marg., "crocodile;" A. V. "dragons." We believe that this should also be rendered wolf. On the other hand, "wild beasts of the islands" should be jackals. Jackal should in some cases be substituted for fox, as the translation of שׂוּעָל, shoo-awl'. See FOX. The jackal is a familiar nocturnal animal, with a peculiar howl, feeding on live prey and carrion.

KID. See GOAT.

KINE. See OX.

KITE. Three Hebrew words (אֵיִל, ah-yaw'; דָּאוּאֵף, daw-aw', fly rapidly; and דָּהּיָאֵף, dah-yaw') are general terms for birds of prey of the falcon sort. R. V. renders ah-yaw' "falcon;" A. V., sometimes "kite" (Lev. 11:14; Deut. 14:13), sometimes "vulture." R. V. renders daw-aw' and dah-yaw' "kite;" A. V., "vulture." Three kites exist in the Holy Land, Milvus iclinus, Sav., M. migrans, Bodd., and M. Aegyptius, Gmel.

LAMB. See SHEEP.

LAPWING. See HOOPOE.

LEOPARD (Heb. נָאוּ-מָרֵה, naw-mare', spotted; Gr. πάρδαλις, par'-dal-is), Felis leopardus, L., a wily, active, ferocious beast (Isa. 11:6; Jer. 5:6; Dan. 7:6; Hab. 1:8; Rev. 13:2). It is next to the bear the largest of the existing carnivora in the Holy Land. It has a beautiful spotted skin (Jer. 13:23), which is highly admired by the people. It is used for rugs, saddle covers, and one is sometimes hung over the back by religious medics. The cheetah, or hunting leopard, Felis jubata, Schreb., is probably included under the Hebrew generic name naw-mare'.

LEVIATHAN (Heb. לִוְיָתָן, liv-yaw-thawn'), a word signifying an animal, writhing or gathering itself into folds; used for the crocodile (Job 41:1, and probably 3:8, R. V., "leviathan;" A. V., "their mourning," marg. "leviathan;" also Psa. 74:14; for a serpent (Isa. 27:1); for another sea monster (Psa. 104:26), possibly the whale.

LICE. Notwithstanding the authority of R. V. (marg., Exod. 8:16; Psa. 105:31) "sandflies" or "fleas" for Heb. לָבַד, kane, fastening, and its derivatives, the weight of evidence is in favor of lice. These filthy insects are an endemic pest of the first magnitude in the East. What it must have been when they became universal is beyond the power of our imagination to conceive. The Mohammedans shave their heads, and use means to cause hair to fall out by the roots in other parts of their bodies, to escape this pest. This is the inheritance of an ancient custom of the Egyptian priests, and others of the inhabitants.

LION, the well-known king of beasts, formerly abundant in Palestine (Judg. 14:5; 1 Sam. 17:34; 2 Kings 17:25; Jer. 49:19, etc.), and not extinct there until the end of the 12th century. Seven words, aryeh, kephâr, gâr, lûbi, layish, shahal, and shihûz, are used to denote the lion in general, or at different ages and in different states. Four words, shû'ag, nû'ar, nûham, and hûgabh, express his voice in varying moods, as the roar, yell, or growl. Six words denote his attitudes and movements in quest of prey, rabaz, shûhah, yûshabh, arûbh, rûnnas, zinnûk, as prowl-ing, crouching, and ambushing.

Figurative. The Scriptures abound in allusions to the strength, courage, cruelty, and rapacity of this beast. His royal attributes made him an emblem of Christ (Rev. 5:5).

LITTLE OWL. See OWL.

LIZARD (Heb. לָצָוּד, let-aw-aw', hiding), a family term, occurring in a list (Lev. 11:30) of six, all of which are rendered in R. V. by names denoting lizards. A considerable number of the lizard family is found in the Holy Land, and several of them are common about houses, especially the wall lizard, Zootica muralis, Laur.; the sand lizard, Lacerta agilis, L., and the green lizard, L. viridis, L. See TORTOISE, GECKO, CHAMELEON, MOLE.

LOCUST (Heb. אַרְבֵּי, ar-beh', generic term). The devastations which the locust is capable of producing made it a fitting instrument of one of the ten memorable plagues of Egypt. Two species, Edipoda migratoria and Acridium pere- grinum, are the most common. They are always to be found in the southeastern deserts, but, from time to time, multiply in vast numbers and spread over the whole country, carrying ruin and despair everywhere. The poetical and prophetic books abound in vivid descriptions of their destructiveness, and the powerlessness of man to resist them. Eight Hebrew words seem to refer to locusts; some of them probably to various stages in their development. It is, however, impossible to determine the exact meaning of each. Locusts were undoubtedly eaten (Matt. 3:4).

The following vivid description of locusts is given by Jahn (Bib. Arch., §23, s. v.): "Vast bodies of migrating locusts, called by the orientals the armies of God, lay waste the country. They observe as regular order, when they march, as an army. At evening they descend from their flight, and form, as it were, their camps. In the morning, when the sun has risen considerably, they ascend again, if they do not find food, and fly in the direction of the wind (Prov. 30:27; Nah. 3:16, 17). They go in immense numbers (Jer. 46:23), and occupy a space of ten or twelve miles in length, and four or five in breadth, and are so deep that the sun cannot penetrate through them; so that they convert the day into night, and bring a temporary darkness on the land (Joel 2:2, 10; Exod. 10:15). The sound of their wings is terrible (Joel 2:2). When they descend upon the earth, they cover a vast track a foot and a half high; if the air is cold and moist, or if they be wet with the dew, they remain . . . till they are dried and warmed by the sun (Nah. 3:17). Nothing stops them. They fill the ditches which are dug to stop them with their bodies, and extinguish by their numbers the fires which are kindled. They pass over walls and enter the doors and windows of houses (Joel 2:7-9). They devour everything which is green, strip off the bark of trees, and even break them to pieces by their weight (Exod. 10:12-19; Joel 1:4, 7, 10, 12, 16, 18, 20; 2:3)."

MICE. See MOUSE.

MOLE. No true mole exists in the Holy Land. The mole rat, Spalax typhlus, Pall., may be the animal intended by Heb. תַּשְׁשֻׁמִּית, tan-shek'-meth (Lev. 11:30, R. V., "chameleon"). Another Hebrew word, חַפְזֹרֶה, khaf-ore' (Isa. 2:20), is translated "moles." It would perhaps better be translated burrowing rats or mice, being understood as generic for all the numerous burrowers found in waste places. The mole rat is a rodent, while the mole is one of the insectivora, which comprise the shrews, hedgehogs, and moles.

MOTH (Heb. מַשְׂכָּה, awsh; Gr. sis, sacc), several species of the family Tineidae which infest woolen goods and furs. It is almost impossible to guard against them in the eastern climate. The people wrap up their carpets and clothes with pepper grains, tobacco, pride of India leaves, and other substances. The scriptural and apocryphal allusions to moths are very significant of their subtle and noxious agency (Job 4:19; 27:18; Hos. 5:12; Matt. 6:19, 20; Luke 12:33; Sir. 19:3; 42:13).

MOUSE (Heb. עֲבָרָה, ak-bawr, as nibbling). The number of species of mouselike animals in the Holy Land is about forty. All of them are probably included in the generic prohibition (Lev. 11:29). One species was eaten by the recusant Israelites, along with swine's flesh (Isa. 66:17). We cannot be sure what species it was. It may have been the hamster, which is said to be eaten by the Arabs.

MULE. Mules were not allowed according to the Mosaic law (Lev. 19:19). Yet they were used early in the period of the kings (2 Sam. 13:29; 18:9; 1 Kings 1:33, etc.). They were imported from Togarmah (Ezek. 27:14). Besides the Hebrew term, פֶּרֶד, peh-red, which undoubtedly refers to the mule, two other words are so translated in the A. V., viz., רֶכֶשׁ, reh-kesh (marg., 1 Kings 4:28, R. V., "swift steeds"), and יְחֵמָה, yeh-meem (Gen. 36:24, R. V., "hot springs").

NEST. See Fowl.

NIGHT HAWK. The Heb. תַּחֲמוּסִים, takh-mawce', is uncertain in meaning. Some have rendered it "ostrich," others "owl." As the owl is mentioned in the list (Lev. 11:16; Deut. 14:15), and at least one other word exists for the ostrich, the R. V. has done well in transliterating in the margin "tahmas," with the gloss "of uncertain meaning."

NIGHT MONSTER. R. V. for A. V. "screech owl" (Isa. 34:14; R. V., marg., "Heb. Lilith"). The Hebrew root signifies night, and the allusion is doubtless to a fabulous specter, such as are supposed to haunt ruins.

ONYCHA (Heb. שֶׁחַלִּית, shekh-ay' leth, a scale), a substance mentioned as an ingredient of the holy perfume (Exod. 30:34). It is the operculum of shells of Strombi, and is prepared for use by roasting, which evolves an empyreumatic oil, on which its aromatic properties depend.

OSPRAY (Heb. עֲזַנְיָהוּ, oz-nee-yaw'), the fish eagle, Pandion haliaetus, L., an unclean bird (Lev. 11:13; Deut. 14:12), which fishes along the coasts of the Holy Land and in the Hûleh.

OSSIFRAGE (Heb. פֶּרֶס, peh-res), the lammergeier, Gypetus barbatus, L., the largest of the vultures of the Holy Land. As it is a familiar bird in Europe its habits are well known. It kills its own prey, but also does not disdain carrion. Hence it was unclean (Lev. 11:13; Deut. 14:12). R. V. renders the Hebrew original gier eagle.

OSTRICH (Heb. בִּרְצִיָּה, no-tsaw', flying, Job 39:13; elsewhere יָבֵן, yaw-ane'). The A. V. translates this latter in five out of the eight passages in which it occurs by "owl," sometimes with marginal reading "ostrich." R. V. correctly and uniformly renders it "ostrich." The ostrich is a well-known bird, found in the deserts of Africa and Arabia. Its renown for voracity is due to the large size of the pebbles, bits of glass, or other objects which it swallows, as fowls swallow gravel, to assist in the subdivision of their food in the gizzard. The female ostrich makes a shallow nest, and lays so many eggs that some of them are left uncovered and therefore not incubated. She, however, covers most of them with sand, and, while leaving them to the influence of the sun's rays by day, incubates them by night. The ostrich, when pursued, runs against the wind, and in large circles, a fact which enables the hunter to lie in wait for it, and thus partially neutralizes the advantage of its great speed. It is not true that it hides its head in the sand on the approach of danger. When compared with some other birds, as the partridge, noted for their cunning in concealing their eggs and young, and escaping from their enemies, the ostrich, which runs away from eggs and chicks, in the frantic desire to escape by its great speed, seems open to the charge of stupidity (Job 39:14-17).

OWL. Five Hebrew words are rendered in A. V. "owl." (1) בַּת יָבֵן, bath yah-an-aw'. In five out of the eight places in which it occurs A. V. text translates it "owl." R. V. correctly renders them all "ostrich." (2) יַגְשׁוּף, yan-shoof', or יַגְשׁוּפֶה, yan-shofe', means twilight. It may refer to some species of owl, or owls in general, or, as in LXX. and Vulgate, mean ibis. (3) כּוֹעַץ, kocce, is a general term for the owl (Lev. 11:17; Deut. 14:16, "little owl;" Psa. 102:6, "owl"). (4) קִפְּזוֹת, kip-poze' (Isa. 34:15, A. V., "great owl;" R. V., "arrowsnake"), probably refers to any owls which frequent ruins. Nesting, laying eggs, and hatching must refer to a bird, not to a snake. (5) לַיְלִית, lee-leeth' (Isa. 34:14, A. V., "screech owl;" R. V., "night monster"), is probably no bird at all. See NIGHT MONSTER. Only two of the above five words certainly refer to owls. Both of these are probably generic, or at least their specific meaning has been lost. There are numerous species of owls in the solitary places, caves, and ruins of the East, as Asio Otus, L., A. brachyotus, J. R. Foster, Bubo ascalaphus, Sav., Scops giu, Scop., and Athene glaux, Sav., and others. All of them are regarded by the people as birds of evil omen. They were all unclean, according to the Mosaic law.

OX. 1. The translation of Heb. שׂוֹר, shore. The cognate Arab. thaur, Gr. ταύρος, taw'-ros, Lat. taurus, refer to the male. Shore, however, is generic for both sexes and all ages. Though generally translated "ox," it is sometimes rendered "bullock."

2. Cow, Kine. The rendering of Heb. בָּקָר, baw-kawr', which is also generic for bovines, bak-aw-raw', with the feminine ending, signifies the cow.

3. Bull, Bullock. Usually the equivalent of Heb. פָּר, par, or פָּוּר, pawr. The feminine pardh is once used (Num. 19:2) for heifer. Sometimes the term abbir, strong ones, is used metaphorically for bull (Psa. 22:13; Lev. 13; Isa. 34:7), but it is also used in the same sense for the horse (Jer. 8:16; 47:3).

4. Calf, Heifer. The rendering of Heb. עֵגֶל, ay'-ghel, and עֵגְלוֹ, eg-law'. Once "heifer" is the equivalent of עֵגְלוֹ, gaw-law' (Num. 19:2).

5. Wild Ox (Heb. אֵילָנִים, teh-o', A. V., Deut. 14:5), Wild Bull (Heb. טוֹחַ, toh, A. V., Isa. 51:20). R. V. in both passages, "antelope." It is probably Oryx beatrix, L., also known as Antilope leucoryx, Pall., an Arabian and African species, which extends to the borders of Syria. "Unicorn" of A. V. is rendered "wild ox" in R. V., Num. 23:22; 24:8; Job 39:9, 10; Psa. 29:6; 92:10. See UNICORN.

No animal, except the sheep, is so frequently alluded to in Scripture as the ox and his derivatives.

PALMERWORM (Heb. מִזְרָה, gaw-zawm', devouring, Joel 1:4; 2:25; Amos 4:9), a destroying larva, possibly a caterpillar, more probably a stage in the development of the locust. Its root signifies to cut off. It is impossible to identify it.

PARTRIDGE (Heb. קוֹרָא, ko-ray', a caller, from its cry). There are two species of partridges in the Holy Land, Caccabis chukar, C. R. Gray, the red-legged partridge, and Ammoperdix Heyi, Temm., the sand partridge. The former is generally in the middle and upper mountain regions and the Syrian desert. The latter is peculiar to the Dead Sea and Jordan valley. This may be the one alluded to by David (1 Sam. 26:20). The passage Jer. 17:11, in which R. V. has adopted A. V. marginal rendering, "gathereth young which she hath not brought forth," is obscure. It may refer to pirating a nest, after the manner of the cuckoo, or decoying away the chicks of another bird. Although no modern authority has witnessed such theft, some of the ancients believed that the partridge was guilty of it.

PEACOCKS. In one place where A. V. has given "peacock" (Job 39:13) the original is Heb. רֵהֶן, reh'-nen, which is undoubtedly a name for the ostrich, as in R. V. In the other two passages where "peacocks" occurs in A. V. and R. V. (1 Kings 10:22; 2 Chron. 9:21) the reference is unquestionably to this lordly bird. The Heb. טוֹקֵי, took-kee', survives in the allied tokei, which is the Tamil name of the bird. So far as we know Solomon was the first to import it into western Asia. It soon became well known all over the civilized world, and has never ceased to be raised for its gorgeous feathers.

PEARL is mentioned in A. V. in Old Testament only once (Job 28:18, יָבֵשׁ, gaw-beesh'). R. V., with probability, translates it "crystal." Pearls are mentioned several times in the New Testament (Matt. 7:6; 13:45, 46; 1 Tim. 2:9; Rev. 17:4; Gr. μαργαρίτης, mar-gar-ee'-tace). The gates of pearl (Rev. 21:21) refer to mother of pearl. Both are depositions from the juice of the pearl oyster, Avicula margaritifera, L.

PELICAN, probably the correct translation of Heb. קוֹאֵל, kaw-ath'. It was an unclean bird (Lev. 11:18; Deut. 14:17). It was found in desolate places (Psa. 102:6) and ruins (R. V., Isa. 34:11; Zeph. 2:14, A. V. "cormorant," marg. "pelican"). Two species are found in the Holy Land, Pelecanus onocrotalus, L., and P. crispus, Brush. The pelican lives on fish, which it catches with its long beak and stores in the capacious pouch beneath it. When gorged with food it flies away to some lonely place, and pressing its pouch against its breast stands in this attitude for hours or days, until it is hungry again, when it resumes its fishing. If kaw-ath' be the pelican, this attitude would well suit the melancholy inactivity to which David alludes in comparing himself with the "pelican in the wilderness."

PORPOISE. See BADGER.

PURPLE, a dye extracted from the throat of several shellfish of the genera Murex and Purpura, found on the coast of the Mediterranean. The art of preparing it is lost. It is uncertain whether the A. V. "scarlet," marg. "purple," R. V. "purple" (Heb. אֶרְגָּמָן, ar-gaw-mawn', Dan. 5:7, 16), is the same as "purple," πορφυροῦν, por-foo-roon' (John 19:2), which is called "scarlet," κόκκινον, kok-kin'-ane (Matt. 27:28). See COLORS.

PYGARG (Heb. דֵּישָׁן, dee-shone', leaper), probably the addax, Antilope addax, Licht., an animal found in the Syrian and Arabian deserts. It is mentioned in only one of the two lists of clean animals (Deut. 14:5). There seems to be no authority for A. V. marg. "bison."

QUAIL (Heb. שִׁלְאָנִים, sel-awn'), a gallinaceous bird, Coturnix vulgaris, L., more or less resident in Egypt and the Holy Land, but also passing through them on its migrations northward in March, and southward in September. The quails pass over narrow portions of the sea, but arrive greatly exhausted. Many of them perish in the transit. Those which the Israelites captured (Exod. 16:13; Num. 11:31, 32) were on their way N. Tristram has pointed out their course up the Red Sea, across the mouth of the Gulf of Akabah and Suez, to the Sinaitic peninsula, and so blown by a sea wind over the camp of the Israelites.

R.A.M. See SHEEP.

RAVEN. The raven, Corvus corax, L., is the first bird named (Gen. 8:7). It feeds in part on seeds and fruit. To this fact our Saviour alludes (Luke 12:24; Gr. kópaξ, kor'ax). It also captures small creatures alive, but it loves carrion (Prov. 30:17), and so was unclean. Orientals, as well as occidentals, look upon it as a bird of evil omen (Isa. 34:11). The

The Quail.

Hebrew word עֲרָב, or עֲרָב, o-rab'e, of which raven is the translation, doubtless includes the crows, rooks, jays, and choughs, as is implied in the expression "after his kind" (Lev. 11:15; Deut. 14:14).

ROE. In one place (A. V., Prov. 5:19; R. V. "doe;" Heb. יַחֲלֹה, yah-al-aw) it should be wild she-goat; in all other places, GAZELLE (q. v.).

ROEBUCK, a mistranslation of the Heb. צִבְיָה, tseb-ee', which signifies the GAZELLE (q. v.). The roebuck, Cervus capreolus, L., is found in the Holy Land, and is the proper translation of Heb. יַחֲמוֹר, yakh-moor' (Deut. 14:5; 1 Kings 4:23; A. V. wrongly "fallow deer"). It must have been very abundant in the days of Solomon. It is now found rarely in northern Galilee and Carmel, and in the woods of Gilead. It is still known in Carmel by the name yakh-moor', and E. of the Jordan by that of hamâr.

SAND FLIES. See LICE.

SAND LIZARD. See SNAIL and LIZARD.

SATYR, the equivalent (Isa. 13:21; 34:14) of שָׂעִיר, saw-er', which means a he-goat, and is usually so translated. The same word is rendered in A. V. (Lev. 17:7; 2 Chron. 11:15) "devils," R. V. "he-goats," marg. "satyrs." Grotesque creatures, half man and half goat, figure in the Greek and Roman mythologies under the name of satyrs and fauns.

SCARLET, the product of the cochineal insects, Coccus ilicis and C. cacti, which are raised in Palestine. Crimson is also produced by the same insects, as also purple and violet. See COLORS.

SCORPION, a generic term for about a dozen species of the Arachnida, which inhabit the Holy Land. The poison is in the sting at the end of the tail. The scorpion is an emblem of torture and wrath. Some of the species of southern Palestine are six inches long.

SCREECH OWL. See OWL, NIGHT MONSTER.

SEAL, SEAL SKINS. See BADGER.

SEAMEW. See CUCKOW.

SEA MONSTER. See DRAGON, WHALE.

SERPENT. It is impossible to unravel the tangle in which the translators, ancient and modern, have involved the eight words used in the Hebrew for serpents. Only one of them (Heb. שֵׁפִיפִן, shef-ee-fone) can be identified with any degree of certainty. This is in all probability Cerastes Hasselquistii, Strauch, the horned cerastes of the desert. It is reasonably probable that pethen refers to the cobra. Zepha' and ziph'oni and eph'eh are uncertain. Heb. תַּנְיָנִים, tan-nee'n', is usually translated dragon, and if it refers to a snake in the story of the controversy between Moses and Pharaoh we have no means of guessing the species. Heb. נָחָשׁ, naw-khaws'h', is a general term, corresponding exactly to the English serpent or snake. Heb. שָׂרָפָה, saw-rawf', means fiery, and is therefore only a term to characterize the venomousness of the unknown species intended.

Cobra.

The serpents of Egypt, Sinai, and the Holy Land are numerous. Of the venomous ones the principal are Daboia zanthina, Gray, Cerastes Hasselquistii, Strauch, Naja haje, L., Echis arenicola, Boie, Vipera Enphratica, Martin, and V. ammodytes, L. The English names of snakes mentioned are adder, arrowsnake, asp, basilisk (fabulous), cockatrice (fabulous), fiery flying serpent, viper, and the generic term serpent. Besides these the following terms are used: Crooked, crossing like a bar, fleeing, gliding, piercing, swift, winding, as adjectives to the serpent, but seeming to refer to the crocodile, under the name leviathan (Isa. 27:1).

Almost all the allusions to the serpent in the Scriptures are to its malignity and venom. Probably the Hebrews regarded most or all snakes as poisonous. Only once (Matt. 10:16) is there a doubtful commendation of the serpent on account of its wisdom. Its habits, even to being oviparous (Isa. 59:5), were minutely noted. The devil is the "old serpent."

SERPENT CHARMING has always been an Asiatic specialty. The cobra is the snake specially used for this purpose.

SHEEP, the rendering of several Hebrew and Greek words. This animal is mentioned about five hundred times in the Bible. The broad-tailed variety is the one which is, and probably has been from ancient times, the one raised in the East.

Allusion is made to its fat tail ("rump," A. V.; Exod. 29:22; Lev. 3:9; R. V. "fat tail"). The number of sheep raised in ancient times was prodigious. We read of the tribute of 200,000 fleeces from the king of Moab (2 Kings 3:4). Reuben took 250,000 sheep from the children of Ishmael (1 Chron. 5:21). Lambs were offered in immense numbers in sacrifice, usually males, in one case a female (Lev. 14:10). Solomon offered 120,000 on occasion of the consecration of the temple (1 Kings 8:63). Sheep's milk and wool were and are of immense importance for food and clothing, and as articles of commerce. Ram's skins entered into the structure of the tabernacle.

Shepherds in Bible lands have the same personal knowledge and exhaustive care of their flocks as in ancient times. Their offices were chosen as emblems of those of Christ and his ministers in the care of the believers committed to their charge.

A Sheepfold.

The interest of the sheep to Christians culminates in the fact that Christ is the atoning, illuminating, life-giving, reigning Lamb of God.

SHE GOAT. See GOAT.

SNAIL. The Hebrew word חֲנִיט, kho'-met, rendered (A. V., Lev. 11:30) "snail," is generic for lizard (R. V., l. c., "sand lizard," which rendering is, however, only conjectural). Another word, שָׁבֵלֵל, shab-lool' (Psa. 58:8), is probably generic for snail, although neither the LXX. nor Vulgate support the rendering. The surface of rocks, walls, and tree trunks in this land is often covered with a thin pellicle, looking like a film of collodion or gelatine. This is caused by the passing and re-passing of snails, which always leave a slimy track behind them. This is the melting of the snail, alluded to in the above passage. If a snail remain attached to a place in the hot sun it will dry up, but be stuck fast to its resting place by this inspissated mucilaginous fluid. The number of species of snails in Bible lands is large.

SOW. See SWINE.

SPARROW, one rendering of Heb. צִפּוֹר, tsip-pore', which, like 'usfâr in Arabic, is generic for small birds. Only in one or two instances (Psa. 84:3; 102:7) is it specific for the house sparrow. Zippôr is more frequently rendered "bird" and "fowl." The New Testament στρούθίου, stroo-thee'-on, probably refers to the house sparrow (Matt. 10:29; Luke 12:6, 7).

SPECKLED BIRD. See HYENA.

SPIDER. Two Hebrew words are translated in A. V. spider. 1. שֵׂמֵאֵמֶת, sem-aw-meeth' (Prov. 30:28), from a root signifying to be poisonous. R. V. gives "lizard." Both the spider and several varieties of lizards frequent houses. 2. אַקְבֵּישׁ, ak-kaw-beesh' (Job 8:14; Isa. 59:5, 6), is generic for spiders, of which there is a large number in the Holy Land.

SPONGE (Gr. σπόγγος, spong'-gos), a porous body, produced in the sea, composed of tubules and cells, lined with ameboid substance. The vital action of these protozoa keeps up a steady circulation of water through the channels. Commercial sponges consist only of the skeleton, out of which the lining and investing ameboid substance has been cleaned. The only mention of the sponge is in connection with the crucifixion of our Saviour (Matt. 27:48, etc.).

STALLION (Sir. 37:8). Unaltered horses are more highly esteemed in the East for all except menial offices. Geldings are seldom seen.

STORK (Heb. חֲסִידָה, khasee-daw). Two species, Ciconia alba, L., the white stork, and C. nigra, L., the black stork, are found in the Holy Land. It was an unclean bird. Although its usual nesting place is in ruins, it also, especially the black species, resorts to trees (Psa. 104:17). It is a migratory bird, going to northern Europe in the summer, flying high "in the heaven" (Jer. 8:7), and making a rushing noise ("the wind was in their wings," Zech. 5:9). Their affection for their young is proverbial.

SWALLOW. The only Hebrew words properly translated swallow are דֶּרֶוֹר, der-ore' (Psa. 84:3; Prov. 26:2), and סוּס, soos (Isa. 38:14; Jer. 8:7). אַו־גוּר, aw-goor', in the latter two signifies twitterer, instead of "swallow," as in A. V., or "crane," as in R. V. The swallows and swifts and martins are numerous in Bible lands. Their shrill cries, as they skim the ground and sweep through the air with incredible rapidity, are among the most characteristic features of oriental towns.

SWAN. Probably the Heb. תַּנְשֵׁמֶת, tan-sheh'-meth (Lev. 11:18; Deut. 14:16; A. V. "swan," R. V. "horned owl," marg. "swan"), refers to the purple gallinule, Porphyrio cæruleus, Vandelli, or one of the ibises. Ibis religiosa, L., or I. falcinella, L., and not to the swan, which is hardly found in the Holy Land, and would not have been regarded as unclean.

SWINE (Heb. חֲזִיר, khaz-zer'; Gr. χοίρος, khoy'-ros). The hog is regarded by Mohammedans with no less loathing than by the Jews. Many of the oriental Christians share this feeling, while others raise swine and freely eat of its flesh. The Jews in Christ's time had come to ignore their own law on this subject (Matt. 8:30, etc.), as had some of their ancestors who ate their flesh (Isa. 66:17).

TORTOISE (A. V., Lev. 11:29; R. V., "great lizard"). The Heb. צב, tsaub, is the cognate of the Arab. dabb, which is the term applied to the land monitor, Psemmosaurus scincus, an animal often six feet long, and to another lizard, Uromastyx spinipes, which attains a length of two feet, and has a short rounded head, and a tail surrounded by rings of spines. Although there are land and sea tortoises in the Holy Land and its adjacent sea, zib does not refer to any of them, and therefore the tortoise must be dropped from the list of Scripture animals.

TURTLE, TURTLEDOVE (Heb. תור, to're), one of the best-known birds of the Holy Land. It was used by the poor for sacrifices (Lev. 5:11, etc.). Its peculiar note and gentle disposition (Psa. 74:19) made it a type of Christ. There are three species in the Holy Land, Turtur auritus, L., the common turtledove, T. risorius, L., the collared turtledove, and T. Senegalensis, L., the palm or Egyptian turtle.

UNICORN (R. V., "wild ox," Heb. רְעִים, reh-ame'), probably Bos primigenius, L., the true aurochs. This animal is now extinct, but certainly existed in Germany in the time of Cæsar, and did not probably become extinct in Europe until the Middle Ages. Cæsar describes it as immense in size, of great strength (comp. Num. 23:22; 24:8), speed (Psa. 29:6), and ferocity, untamable (Job 39:9, 10), associated with bulls (Isa. 34:7; A. V. marg. "rhinoceroses") (Cæs., Bell. Gall., iv, 29). It cannot be the Arab. ri'm, which is doubtless Antelope leucoryx (see WILD OX under Ox), nor Bison bonasus, which is called by the modern Germans aurochs, but which is an animal with short horns, quite unsuitable for "horns of the unicorn." Still less can it be the intention to speak of a fabulous creature like the traditional unicorn, with the single horn springing from the center of the forehead. The re'em had more than one horn (Deut. 33:17).

VIPER. See SERPENT.

VULTURE. Several vultures have already been described. See EAGLE, GIER EAGLE, OSPRAY, and OSSIFRAGE. The Hebrew words דַּאֲ-אוֹ, daw-aw', דַּאֲ-יָאוֹ, rendered in A. V. "vulture," should be kite, and דַּאֲ-יָאוֹ, ah-yaw', perhaps (as in R. V., Job 28:7) "falcon." The word רַחֲמַיִם, rah-hawm', translated "gier eagle" (Lev. 11:18), should be vulture. It refers to Pharaoh's chicken, Neophron percnopterus, Sav.

WASP. The reference in the only passage in which this insect is mentioned (Wis. 12:8) is doubtless to the common yellow jacket, Vespa vulgaris, L. It is very common throughout the Holy Land, and is especially so in the vineyards during vintage, and about the grape presses, and the fruit shops in towns.

WEASEL (Heb. חֹלֵד, kho'-led). This is, perhaps, the best translation of kho'-led (Lev. 11:20), notwithstanding the fact that the cognate Arab. khuld refers to the mole rat, Spalax typhlus. The term must be understood in a family sense for all the Mustelidae, as the marten, ichneumon, genet, and polecat.

WHALE (Heb. תַּיִן, tan, or תַּיִן-נֶעֱמַל, tan-neem', a monster). The "great whales" (A. V., Gen. 1:21; R. V. "sea monsters;" Job 7:12; Ezek. 32:2) are to be understood of all aquatic creatures not considered as fishes. See DRAGON. Jonah's whale (κῆτος, kay'-tos, Matt. 12:40, from the LXX., Jonah 1:17) was a "great fish," דָּג גָּדוֹל, dawg gaw-dole'. It might have been a spermaceti whale, had one wandered into the Mediterranean, or a large shark, of which that sea contains many large enough to have swallowed Jonah.

WHITE OF AN EGG (A. V., Job 6:6) may better be rendered, as in R. V. marg., "juice of purslane."

WILD ASS. See ASS.

WILD BEASTS. The signification of beasts in many places, and of wild beasts in all, is beasts of prey. The context will always settle the meaning. There are no more any lions in Syria and Palestine. They were, however, numerous in Bible times. Bears are still found in considerable numbers in Antilebanon, and a few still linger in Lebanon. They become more abundant in Amanus and the Taurus. Wolves are common throughout. Leopards are occasionally met with in Lebanon, and more frequently in Antilebanon and E. of the Jordan, and in the neighborhood of the Dead Sea. Jackals are very common everywhere. Foxes are also very numerous. Hyenas haunt ruins and waste places. Badgers, marten, polecats, ichneumons, and genets are also found. Among the wild beasts which are not carnivorous are the roebuck, the gazelle, the addax, hart, wild ass, the beden (wild goat), swine, and coney.

Hunting, except for roebuck and gazelles, is not common. A few bears are shot every year. Wolves are killed by the shepherds. Foxes are occasionally trapped or shot. Hyenas are caught in steel traps or shot, and rarely a leopard is killed in the more lonely parts of the mountains. Hares are shot in the winter, and brought to the markets of the large cities. The allusions to wild beasts in the Bible are numerous (2 Kings 14:9; Job 39:15; Psa. 80:13; Hos. 13:8, etc.).

WILD GOAT. See GOAT, WILD.

WILD OX. See Ox, UNICORN.

WOLF (Heb. זֶבַע, zeh-abe'; λύκος, loo'-kos). We believe it also to be the proper rendering of תַּיִן, tan-neem', translated, A. V., "dragons;" R. V., "jackals" (Job 30:29; Psa. 44:19; Isa. 13:22; 34:13; 43:20; Jer. 9:11; 10:22; 14:6, R. V. marg. "the crocodile;" 49:33; 51:37; Mic. 1:8). The wolf is the terror of the sheep but usually flees from the shepherd. Wolves are very numerous in all the sheep walks of this land. The emblematic reference to the ferocity and bloodthirstiness of the wolf are numerous and forcible.

WORM. The only worms alluded to in Scripture are the larvæ of insects, as סַוְסַע, sawce (Isa. 51:8).

the grub of the moth; רִמְמוֹ, rim-maw', maggots bred in decaying vegetable and animal substances (Exod. 16:24; Job 7:5, etc.), and tôlâ'im, also maggots similar to the last. Tôlê' and tôlâ'ath, from the same root, refer to the cochineal insect. Earth worms are not mentioned in the Bible. The worms which devoured Herod (Acts 12:23) were probably also maggots, bred in a wound or sore.

ANIMAL, SYMBOLISM OF. See SYMBOLISM.

ANIMAL, WORSHIP OF, is of great antiquity, and its origin is involved in much obscurity. Zoolatria (animal worship) is said to have been introduced into Egypt by King Kekau of the second dynasty. The gods of the Egyptian, Indian, Greek, and Teutonic mythologies were the "powers" of nature; and the principal sacred animals and reptiles were worshiped as their incarnations or servants. Many of them were carefully tended while living, and when dead were buried with great pomp. To cause the death of any of these creatures designedly was punishable with death; but if anyone caused the death of a cat, hawk, or ibis, with or without intent, he must die.

The Israelites often degraded themselves by an imitation of this kind of worship (Exod. 32), for which they were severely punished.

Among the Aztecs, the animal kingdom was represented by the gods Nitzilpochtli, signifying Humming bird to the left (in northern Mexico the humming bird being the messenger of spring), and Quetzalcoatl, "the feathered serpent" or "the serpent bird" (Reville, Native Religions of Mexico, etc.). Traces of this ancient cult are found in Great Britain and Ireland, where in the worship of wells the presence of animals or fish as guardians or tutelary deities of the wells is a marked feature (Comme, Etymology in Folklore).

ANISE. See VEGETABLE KINGDOM.

ANKLET (Heb. אַנְקֵלֶת, eh'-kes, A. V. "tinkling ornaments"), the ornament mentioned in the description given of female attire (Isa. 3:18). It was a ring of gold, silver, or ivory, worn round the ankles. The anklet was very widely used by the ancients, nor has its use ceased yet in the East. The Egyptian monuments show them to have been worn by both sexes. The practice was forbidden in the Koran (24:31), though the prohibition may refer rather to the small bells worn, especially by dancing girls, around the ankles.

AN'NA (Arva, an'-nah, Greek form of Hannah), the prophetess, and daughter of Phanuel, of the tribe of Asher. Married in early life, she, after seven years, lost her husband. From that time she devoted herself to attendance upon the temple services, and probably by reason of her great piety was allowed to reside in some one of the chambers of the women's court. Anna was eighty-four years old when the infant Jesus was presented to the Lord. Entering as Simeon was thanking God, Anna also broke forth in praise for the fulfillment of the divine promises (Luke 2:36).

AN'NAS (a contracted form of Ananias), a high priest of the Jews. He is called by Josephus Ananus, the son of Seth, and was first appointed high priest by Quirinus, proconsul of Syria, about A. D. 7, but was removed after seven years (Kitto says fifteen years) by Valerius Gratus, procurator of Judea (Josephus, Ant., xviii, 2, 1 and 2). Annas is mentioned in Luke 3:2 as being high priest along with Caiaphas. Our Lord's first hearing was before Annas (John 18:13), who sent him bound to Caiaphas (v. 24). In Acts 4:6 he is plainly called high priest. He had four sons who filled that office, besides his son-in-law, Caiaphas. There have been several theories advanced to reconcile the application of high priest to Annas and Caiaphas at the same time. Kitto thinks that Annas was regarded as being high priest jure divino, and having authority in spiritual matters, while Caiaphas was the pontiff recognized by the government. The probability is that his great age, abilities, and influence, and his being the father-in-law of Caiaphas, made him practically the high priest, although his son-in-law held the office.

ANOINTED (Heb. מְשֻׁחַ, maw-sheeh'-akh, anointed), a consecrated person, as king (1 Sam. 24:6); by way of preeminence, Jesus the Messiah.

ANOINTING. Anointing the body with oil was a very ancient and widespread custom, being very common among the Egyptians, the Hebrews, and the inhabitants of the far East, as well as among the Greeks and Romans. The purpose was, doubtless, to keep the skin supple, and to moderate the evaporation which is so great in hot climates.

SCRIPTURAL ANOINTING (Heb. usually מָשַׁח, maw-shakh'; Gr. χρίω, khree'-o, to rub).

1. Toilet. The allusions to anointing as part of the toilet are numerous, both in the Old and New Testaments (Ruth 3:3); as expressive of joy (Psa. 23:5; 45:7; Heb. 1:9); its disuse indicative of grief (2 Sam. 14:2; Psa. 92:10; Dan. 10:3). It was reckoned among the civilities extended to guests (Luke 7:46), although the unguents used on such occasions seem to have been perfumes rather than oils. It was also used medicinally (Isa. 1:6; Mark 6:13; James 5:14). See OIL.

The practice of anointing the bodies of the dead is referred to in Mark 14:8 and Luke 23:56. This ceremony was performed after the washing of the body, and was doubtless intended to check decay. See EMBALMING.

2. Consecration. The first instance of the religious use of oil is the anointing of the stone by Jacob (Gen. 28:18; 35:14), evidently designed to be a formal consecration of the stone, or spot, to a sacred purpose. Under the Mosaic law persons and things set apart for sacred purposes were anointed with the "oil of holy ointment" (Exod. 30:23-26; 29:7). See PRIEST, ORDINATION OF.

3. Coronation. It was a custom among the Jews to anoint with oil those set apart as kings, which custom was adopted by the Christian Church.

4. Figurative. The anointing with oil was a symbol of endowment with the Spirit of God (1 Sam. 10:1, 6; 16:13; Isa. 61:1) for the duties of the office to which a person was consecrated (Lev. 8). See KING, PRIEST.

ANON. See GLOSSARY.

ANSWER (Heb. יָנַח, aw-naw', to testify; Gr. ἀποκρίνομαι, ap-ok-ree'-nom-ah-ee, to respond) has in Scripture other meanings than the usual one of reply.

1. Miriam is said to have "answered," i. e., taken up the strain of victory sung by Moses and the men (Exod. 15:21; see 1 Sam. 18:7; 29:5; comp. Num. 21:17).

2. To respond to requests or entreaties (1 Sam. 4:17; Psa. 3:4; 18:41; 27:7); to announce future events (1 Sam. 14:37; 28:6).

3. In a forensic sense: of a judge investigating (Acts 17:11), or giving sentence (Exod. 23:2); of a witness answering inquiries of judge, hence to testify, bear witness (Deut. 19:16; Job 16:8); to accuse or defend in court (Deut. 31:21; Gen. 30:33; Hos. 5).

4. To "answer" is also used for the commencement of a discourse, when no reply to any question or objection is expected (Job 3:2; Cant. 2:10; Matt. 11:25; 12:38, etc.).

"Answer of a good conscience" (1 Pet. 3:21) seems to signify the ability to address God with a conscience free from guilt.

ANT. See ANIMAL KINGDOM.

ANTEDILUVIANS, people who lived before the flood. Of this period we have but little authentic information (Gen. 4:16-6:8), although additional knowledge may be gathered from the history of Noah and the first men after the deluge. In the Bible account we find few indications of savagery among these people, and there need not be the opinion that they civilized themselves.

It is the opinion of some that the antediluvians were acquainted with astronomy, from the fact of the ages of Seth and his descendants being recorded (Gen. 5:6, sq.), and they appear to have been familiar with botany, from the mention of the vine, olive, etc. (Gen. 6:14; 8:11), mineralogy (Gen. 2:12), music (Gen. 4:21), architecture, from the fact of Cain having built a city (Gen. 4:17), metallurgy, so far as forging and tempering are concerned (Gen. 4:22). Agriculture was evidently the first employment of Adam (Gen. 2:15; 3:17, 18), afterward of Cain (Gen. 4:2) and of Noah, who planted a vineyard (Gen. 9:20). The slight intimations to be found respecting government favor the notion that the particular governments were patriarchal, subject to general theocratic control.

Respecting religion, sacrifices are mentioned (Gen. 4:4); some think that the Sabbath was observed; mention is made that "men began to call upon the name of the Lord" (Gen. 4:26). "We have here an account of the commencement of that worship of God which consists in prayer, praise, and thanksgiving, or in the acknowledgment and celebration of the mercy and help of Jehovah." Noah seemed to have been familiar with the distinction between clean and unclean beasts (Gen. 7:2) (K. and D., Com., in loc.).

ANTHROPOPATHISM (from Gr. ἀνθρωποπάθεια, with human feelings), the attributing of human emotions, such as anger, grief, joy, etc., to God. Traces of this are found in Scripture (Gen. 6:6; 8:21; 11:5, 6, and many other passages). If we understand such expressions, not as the antipode, but rather the imperfect approximating expression of eternal truth, then they become the means of a better knowledge of God.

ANTICHRIST (Gr. ἀντίχριστος, an-tee'-khristos, against Christ; some, instead of Christ), a word used only by the apostle John (Epistles 1 and 2).

1. Meaning. The Greek preposition anti, in composition, sometimes denotes substitution, taking the place of another; hence, "false Christ." The connection in which the word is used appears to import opposition, covert rather than avowed, with a professed friendliness.

2. Antichrists. St. John seems to make a distinction between "antichrist" and "antichrists" (1 John 2:18), for he declares that "even now are there many antichrists," but "that antichrist shall come." Dr. Bloomfield (Greek Testament, i, 541) quotes approvingly the following: "An antichrist is one who opposes Christ, whether he oppose the doctrine of his deity or his humanity; or whether he set himself against him, in respect of his priestly office, by substituting other methods of atoning for sin, and finding acceptance with God; his kingly office, by claiming authority to exact laws in his Church contrary to his laws, or to dispense with his commandments; or his prophetic office, by claiming authority to add to, alter, or take away from the revelation which he has given in his holy word." "This," he adds, "is very agreeable to the description of antichrist" (1 John 2:22; 4:3; 2 John 7). In a general sense an antichrist is a person who is opposed to the authority of Christ as the head of the Church, and to the spirit of his religion.

3. The Antichrist. From early times the opinion has prevailed that the antichrists referred to were rather the forerunners of an evil than the evil itself. Some individual, it was thought, would arise who, by way of eminence, should be fitly called the antichrist; and who, before being destroyed by Christ, should utter horrid blasphemies against the Most High, and practice great enormities upon the saints. This view came from connecting the passages in St. John's epistles with the descriptions in Daniel and the Apocalypse of the great God-opposing power that should persecute the saints of the Most High; and of St. Paul's "man of sin" (2 Thess. 2:3-8). See also our Lord's own prediction respecting the last age of the world (Matt. 24:24), and the description of such an antichrist (Rev. 13:8).

4. Identification. The early Christians looked for antichrist as a person, and not a polity or system. The general opinion seems to have been that he would be a man, in whom Satan will dwell utterly and bodily, and who will be armed with Satanic powers. In the Middle Ages antichrist was supposed to be either the offspring of a virgin or of a bishop and a nun. Pope Innocent III (A. D. 1213) designated Mohammed as antichrist; the Reformers thought it to be the papal Church, which is the prevailing opinion of Protestants to this day. The Mohammedans also expect an antichrist, whom they call Al Dajjal, from a name which means an impostor or liar.

ANTICHRISTIANISM, a convenient term to designate in a collective manner the various formed a large portion of the population, with which class Seleucus Nicator colonized the place. It became the third city in the Roman empire, with a population of five hundred thousand. Pompey made it the seat of the legate of Syria, B. C. 64, and a free city.

Antioch was early associated with Christian effort. Thither fled the persecuted disciples after the death of Stephen (Acts 11:19, 20). The name "Christian," as applied to the followers of Jesus, and the first missionary movement conducted by St. Paul, each had their origin in Antioch. The most flourishing period in the history of the Christian Church in Antioch was in the time of Chrysostom, who was born there in 347. In 635 it was taken by the Saracens, and by the Turks in forms of hostility to Christianity. It is equivalent to the "spirit of Antichrist" (1 John 4:3). It was this which Enoch and Noah denounced in their preaching (Jude 14; 2 Pet. 2:5-7); that "vexed the righteous soul" of Lot; the "carnal mind" ever opposed to God (Rom. 8:7); the "mystery of iniquity" foreseen by Paul (2 Thess. 2:7). It has since the days of persecution been chiefly confined to intellectual modes of opposition, known as Infidelity, Deism, Rationalism, etc.

ANTIOCH (Gr. Ἀντιόχεια, an-tee-okh'-i-ah, from Antiochus, a Syrian king).

1. In Syria, on the left bank of the Orontes, sixteen and a half miles from the Mediterranean, and three hundred miles N. of Jerusalem, between the Lebanon and Taurus mountain ranges. It was founded about 300 B. C. by Seleucus Nicator, and called Epidaphnes (near Daphne), or "on the Orontes," to distinguish it from fifteen other Antiochs. The city was several times destroyed by earthquakes, by one of which, A. D. 526, two hundred and fifty thousand persons were killed. It was luxurious. Its main street, four miles in length, was lined with magnificent mansions. It was highly cultivated, but its cultivation was debased, sensual, and shocking. The Jews

1084, captured by Crusaders in 1098. It has been gradually declining under Mohammedan rule since 1268. Six thousand people now comprise the population. The modern name is "Antakia."

2. Identified with "Yalobatch," the modern town, in the extreme northern part of Pisidia. It contained a synagogue and some proselytes. Paul twice visited the place (Acts 13:14; 14:21).

ANTIPAS (Gr. Ἀντίπας, an-tee'-pas).

1. Herod Antipas was the son of Herod the Great by Malthace, a Samaritan. He inherited of his father's dominions Galilee and Perea, as tetrarch. He was the Herod who executed John the Baptist. See HEROD.

2. A "faithful martyr" mentioned in Rev. 2:13, A. D. before 100. He is said to have been one of our Saviour's first disciples and a bishop of Pergamus, and to have been put to death in a tumult there by the priests of Æsculapius, who had a celebrated temple in that city. Tradition relates that he was burned in a brazen bull under Domitian.

ANTIPATRIS (Gr. Ἀντιπατρῖς, an-tip-at-reee', instead of his father), a city built by Herod the Great in honor of his father, Antipater. It is the modern Ras-el-Ain. It lay on the road built by the Romans, leading from Cæsarea to Jerusalem, thirty-eight miles from the former place. Paul was taken thither a prisoner, and by night (Acts 23:31).

ANTITYPE (Gr. ἀντίτυπον, an-teet'-oo-pon, a counterpart, Heb. 9:24; 1 Pet. 3:21, rendered figure), that which is represented or prefigured by a type. The type may be considered a rough draught, while the antitype is the perfect image. The type is a figure, and antitype is the reality which the type prefigured, as Christ is the Antitype of the paschal lamb.

ANTO'NIA, a strong fortress built and named by Herod in honor of Antonius, or Marc Antony, situated to the N. W. of the temple area in Jerusalem, partly surrounded by a deep ditch one hundred and sixty-five feet wide. It was garrisoned with Roman soldiers, whose watchfulness preserved order in the temple courts. Spoken of as the castle (Acts 21:37). Here Paul made an address (Acts 22:1-21). Herod constructed a secret passage from the fortress to the temple.

AN'TOTHITE, a dweller in Anathoth (1 Chron. 11:28; 12:8). See ANATHOTH.

A'NUB (Heb. אֲנוּב, av-noob', bound together, confederate), son of Coz and descendant of Judah through Ashur (1 Chron. 4:8).

ANVIL (Heb. פֶּסֶם, pah'-am, beaten, Isa. 41:7), the utensil employed among the Hebrews, as by other nations, for hammering on.

ANYTHING, APACE. See GLOSSARY.

APE. See ANIMAL KINGDOM.

APEL'LES (Gr. Ἀπελλης, ap-el-lace'), a Christian in Rome, whom Paul salutes in his epistle to the church there (Rom. 16:10), and calls "approved in Christ," A. D. 60. According to the old Church traditions, Apelles was one of the seventy disciples, and bishop either of Smyrna or Heracleia. The Greeks observe this festival on October 31.

APHAR'SACHITES (Heb. אֲפָרְסָכִי, af-ar-sek-ah'ee, Ezra 5:6; 6:6), or APHAR'SATH-CHITES (Heb. אֲפָרְסָתִי, af-ar-sath-kah'ee, Ezra 4:9), an unknown people, quite probably identical with Assyrian tribes who furnished colonists for Samaria after its captivity. Some compare the Partakka (Partukka) of the Assyrian inscriptions, which were remote districts of Media. Some have noted a slight resemblance to Parætace, or Parætacem, the names of mountaineers, specially on the borders of Media and Persia. But it is possible, after all, as Hoffman suggests, that the name may be some official title.—W. H.

APHAR'SITES (Heb. אֲפָרְסִי, af-aw-re-sah'-ee, only in Ezra 4:9), an inhabitant of an unknown region of the Assyrian empire (Mc. & S., Cyc.), whence colonists had been sent to Samaria after its capture.

Assuming the S to be prosthetic, this name has been compared with the name Persæ. The name פָּרַס, or פָּרָס, in Ezra 1:1; 4:3, has been thought to render this doubtful, it being the name of a country (i. e., Persia), while אֲפָרְסִי, or אֲפָרְסָה, is the corresponding patrial Persian; and the mention of Cyrus in all three places shows that the same country is referred to in all. Moreover, Ezra 1:1; 4:3 are Hebrew, while Dan. 6:29 is Tower of Antonia.

Aramaic, or "Chaldee." Thus the occurrence of the name פָּרַס need not negative the connection between אֲפָרְסִי and אֲפָרְסָה, if it is accepted on other grounds. Delitzsch compares the Parshua of the Assyrian inscriptions, which may have been Persia, or a Median region.—W. H.

APHEK (Heb. אֲפֶק, af-ake', strength, and so fortress).

1. One of the cities of the tribe of Asher, which the children of Israel did not conquer (Josh. 19:30; 13:4; Aphik, Judg. 1:31). It was famous for its temple of Venus, which Constantine destroyed.

2. A city of Issachar, near Jezreel, and where the Philistines encamped on the eve of Saul's death and Ahab took Ben-hadad II (1 Kings 20:26).

3. A city near Mizpeh, N. W. of Jerusalem, near the battlefield on which the sons of Eli were slain (1 Sam. 4:1; 7:12).

4. A city, most probably the place called at present Fik, six miles E. of the sea of Galilee (2 Kings 13:17).

APHE'KAH (Heb. אֶפְרַיִם, af-ay-kaw', fortress), a city in the hill country of Judah (Josh. 15:53). Its site has not been discovered.

APHI'AH (Heb. אֶפְרַיִם, af-ee'-akh, blown upon, i. e., refreshed), the father of Bechorath, a Benjamite and ancestor of Saul (1 Sam. 9:1).

A'PHIK (Heb. אֶפְרַיִם, af-eek', strong), another form (Judg. 1:31) of APHEK (see No. 1).

A'PHRAH (Mic. 1:10). See BETH-LE-APHRAH.

APH'SES (Heb. פְּזִזִּים, pits-tsades', dispersive), the head of the eighteenth sacerdotal family of the twenty-four into which the priests were divided by David (1 Chron. 24:15). B. C. 1005.

APOLLONIA (Gr. Ἀπολλωνία, ap-ol-lo-nee'-ah, dedicated to Apollo), a city in Macedonia through which Paul and Silas passed (Acts 17:1). "No one mentions el Haram, but I think this is the true site of Apollonia. . . . Here are outlines of an ancient city. . . . The citadel probably occupied that singular cliff on the N. W. which overhangs the sea. . . . The top was entirely covered by a castle now in ruins; but when in good condition, and held by a competent garrison, it must have been almost impregnable."

APOL'LOS (Gr. Ἀπολλῶς, ap-ol-loce'), a learned (or eloquent) Jew of Alexandria, well acquainted with the Scriptures and the Jewish religion (Acts 18:24). About A. D. 56 he came to Ephesus, where he began to teach in the synagogue "the things of the Lord, knowing only the baptism of John" (v. 25). Here he met Aquila and Priscilla, who "expounded unto him the way of God more perfectly," and Apollos preached Christ with great zeal and power (v. 26). After this he preached in Achaia, and especially at Corinth (18:27, 28; 19:1), having been recommended by the brethren in Ephesus (v. 27). On his arrival at Corinth he was useful in watering the seed which Paul had sown (1 Cor. 3:6). Many of the Corinthians became so much attached to him as to well-nigh produce a schism in the Church, some saying "I am of Paul;" others, "I am of Apollos" (1 Cor. 3:4-7). That this party feeling was not encouraged by Apollos is evident from the manner in which Paul speaks of him, and his unwillingness to return to Corinth (1 Cor. 16:12). Apollos was, doubtless, at this time with Paul in Ephesus. Paul again mentions Apollos kindly in Tit. 3:13, and recommends him and Zenas, the lawyer, to the attention of Titus, knowing that they designed to visit Crete, where Titus was. Jerome thinks that Apollos remained there until he had heard that the divisions in the Church at Corinth had been healed by Paul's letter, and then returned and became bishop of that city. Other authorities make him bishop of Duras, of Colophon, of Iconium (in Phrygia), of Cæsarea.

APOL'LYON (Gr. Ἀπολλύων, ap-ol-loo'-ohn, destroyer), the Greek equivalent (Rev. 9:11) of ABADDON (q. v.).

APOSTASY (Gr. ἀποστασία, ap-os-tas-ee'-ah, a falling away). The common classical use of the word is, a political defection (Gen. 14:4, Sept.; 2 Chron. 13:6, Sept.; Acts 5:37). In the New Testament its more usual meaning is a religious defection (Acts 21:21; 1 Tim. 4:1; Heb. 3:12). This is called "apostasy from the faith" (apostasia a fide): a secession from the Church, and a disowning of the name of Christ. Some of its peculiar characteristics are mentioned: seducing spirits, doctrines of demons, hypocritical lying, a seared conscience, forbidding of marriage and of meats, a form of godliness without the power (1 Tim. 4:1; 2 Tim. 3:5). The grave nature of apostasy is shown by such passages as Heb. 10:26-29; 2 Pet. 2:15-21; John 15:22. Commenting upon Heb. 10:26, sq., Weiss (Bib. Theology in the New Testament, ii, 228) says: "The falling away of such as have gotten the knowledge of salvation in Christ (10:26), and experienced all his blessings (6:4-6), is therewith characterized as a sin, which is yet more terrible than that of frivolous disobedience, for which, under the old covenant, death was assigned (10:28); it is a daring sin, a willful sinning against better knowledge and conscience, for which there is no more any sacrifice, but only the avenging judgment over the enemies of God (vers. 26, 27). There is, therefore, even in the new covenant, as in the old, a malignant sin for which its atoning institute is not available, and which can hence never be forgiven, like the sin against the Holy Ghost, of which Jesus speaks because he who commits it can no more be renewed to repentance (6:4-6)."

APOSTLE (Gr. ἀπόστολος, ap-os'-tol-os, a delegate).

1. In General. One sent with a special message or commission. In this sense the word is used in the Septuagint (1 Kings 14:6; Isa. 18:2), and in the New Testament: John 13:16, "Neither is he who is sent (apostle) greater than he who sent him;" 2 Cor. 8:23; Phil. 2:25, where persons deputed by churches on special errands are called their apostles, or messengers. In Heb. 3:1 Jesus is called "the Apostle and High Priest of our profession."

2. Hebrew. The Jews, it is said, called the collector of the half-shekel, which every Israelite paid annually to the temple, an apostle; also those who carried about encyclical letters from their rulers. Paul may have used the word in this sense when he declares himself "an apostle, not of men, neither by men" (Gal. 1:1), plainly indicating that his commission was directly from Christ. (See also Rom. 1:1; 1 Cor. 15:1.)

3. Christian. The official name of those twelve of the disciples chosen by our Lord to be with him during his ministry, and to whom he intrusted the organization of his Church. These he chose early in his ministry, and ordained "that they should be with him." The number twelve was, doubtless, with reference to the twelve tribes of Israel, and was fixed, so that the apostles were often called simply "the twelve" (Matt. 26:14, 17; John 6:67; 20:24; 1 Cor. 15:5). Their names were: 1. Simon Peter (Cephas, Bar-jona); 2. Andrew; 3. John; 4. Philip; 5. James; 6. Bartholomew (perhaps same as Nathanael); 7. Thomas (Didymus); 8. Matthew (Levi); 9. Simon Zelotes; 10. Jude (Lebbæus, Thaddæus); 11. James the Less; 12. Judas Iscariot. The original qualification of an apostle, as stated by Peter (Acts 1:21, 22), was that he should have been personally acquainted with our Lord's ministry, from his baptism by John to his ascension. By this close personal intercourse with him they were peculiarly fitted to give testimony to the facts of redemption. Shortly after their ordination "he gave to them power against unclean spirits to cast them out, and to heal all manner of diseases;" "and sent them forth two by two, to preach the kingdom of God" (Mark 3:14; Matt. 10:1-5; Mark 6:7; Luke 6:1, 13; 9:1). They accompanied our Lord on his journeys, saw his wonderful works, heard his discourses to the people (Matt. 5:1; Luke 6:18-49) and those addressed to the learned Jews (Matt. 19:13, sq.; Luke 10:25, sq.). They sometimes worked miracles (Mark 6:13; Luke 9:6), sometimes attempted to do so without success (Matt. 17:16). They recognized Jesus as the Christ of God (Matt. 16:16; Luke 9:20), and ascribed supernatural power to him (Luke 9:54), but did not have a high understanding of his spiritual mission (Matt. 15:16; 16:22; 17:20, 21; Luke 9:54; 24:25; John 16:12), and acknowledged the weakness of their faith (Luke 17:5). Jesus taught them to understand the spiritual meaning of his parables (Mark 4:10, sq.; Luke 8:9, sq.), and yet when he was removed from the earth their knowledge of his kingdom was very limited (Luke 24:21; John 16:12). Apparently loyal at heart, when he was arrested they all forsook him and fled (Matt. 26:56). Before his death our Lord promised to the apostles the Holy Spirit, to fit them to be founders and rulers of the Christian Church (John 14:16, 17, 26; 15:26, 27; 16:7-15), and after his resurrection he confirmed their call, and commissioned them to "preach the Gospel to every creature" (John 20:21-23; Matt. 28:18-20). Shortly after Christ's ascension they, under divine guidance, chose Matthias to be the successor of Judas Iscariot (Acts 1:26). On the day of Pentecost the Holy Spirit descended upon the Church (Acts 2), and the apostles became altogether different men, testifying with power of the life and death and resurrection of Jesus (Luke 24:48; Acts 1:22; 2:32; 3:15; 5:32; 13:31). Their first work was the building up of the Church in Jerusalem (Acts 3-7), and then they carried the Gospel into Samaria (Acts 8:5-26). With this ends the first period of the apostles' ministry, with its center at Jerusalem, and Peter as its prominent figure. In this age Peter represents Jewish Christianity, Paul Gentile Christianity, and John the union of the two. The center of the second period of the apostolic agency is Antioch, where a Church was soon built up, consisting of Jews and Gentiles. Of this and the subsequent period St. Paul was the central figure, and labored with the other apostles (Acts 11:19-30; 18:1-5). In the third period the twelve almost entirely disappear from the sacred narrative, and we have only bits of personal history, which will be found under their respective names.

4. The Apostolic Office. As regards the apostolic office, it seems to have been preeminently that of founding the churches, and upholding them by supernatural power specially bestowed for that purpose. It ceased, as a matter of course, with its first holders, all continuation of it, from the very conditions of its existence (comp. 1 Cor. 9:1), being impossible. The bishops of the ancient Churches coexisted with, and did not in any sense succeed, the apostles; and when it is claimed for bishops or any Church officers that they are their successors it can be understood only chronologically and not officially.

5. In a lower sense the term apostle was applied to all the more eminent Christian teachers, e. g., to Adronicus and Junia (Rom. 16:7).

APOSTLES' CREED. See CREED.

APOSTOLIC, APOSTOLICAL, belonging or relating to or traceable to the apostles, as apostolical age, apostolical doctrine, etc. The title, as one of honor, and likely also implying authority, has been falsely assumed in various ways. The pretended succession of bishops in some churches is called Apostolical Succession. So the Roman Church calls itself the Apostolical Church, and the see of Rome the Apostolical See, the bishop of Rome styling himself Apostolical Bishop. In the early Church all bishops' sees were called apostolical, but at length some of the popes declared that the title "apostolical" was their right as successors of St. Peter, and the Council of Rheims (1049) declared the pope to be the sole apostolical primate of the universal Church.

APOSTOLIC AGE, that period of Church history which covers the time between the day of Pentecost and the death of John, the last apostle. The apostolic age lasted as long as the churches were under the immediate guidance of an apostle. The arrangements made by the apostles can be ascribed to our Lord so far as relates to the principle, but not to the details of execution. The form of worship seems to have been very simple, much being left to the choice of individuals and churches. Its principal features, however, with regard to the Sabbath, church festivals, and the sacraments were fixed. There were many pious customs among these Christians, partly new and partly derived from Judaism. The apostolic age is commonly divided into three periods: 1. From the Pentecost until the second appearance of Paul (about A. D. 41). 2. Until the death of Paul (about 67). 3. The Johannean period (about 100).

APOSTOLICAL COUNCIL, the assembly of the apostles and elders, held in Jerusalem (A. D. 50), an account of which is given in Acts 15. At Antioch, under the labors of Paul and Barnabas, many uncircumcised persons had been gathered into the Church. Some Jewish Christians on a visit from Jerusalem contended that circumcision was necessary to salvation. Paul and Barnabas, with others, were deputed to lay the matter before a general meeting of the Church in Jerusalem.

A preliminary meeting appears to have been held, at which some converts from among the Pharisees showed such opposition (Acts 15:5, 6; Gal. 2) that it was thought best to submit the matter to the whole body. After much disputation Peter told of his experience with Cornelius, and was followed by Barnabas and Paul, who told of their great success among the Gentiles. Then James, as president of the Council, summed up the debate, and pronounced in favor of releasing Gentile converts from the necessity of circumcision and other observances of the Mosaic ceremonial law. The conclusion being agreed to, a letter was drawn up and sent to Antioch by two delegates chosen to accompany Paul and Barnabas (see Acts 15:22, sq.). The letter when read at Antioch gave great cheer to the Gentile converts.

APOTHECARY (Heb. אֲפוֹתֵקָרִים, rao-kakh', to perfume, Exod. 30:25; 37:29; Eccles. 10:1, marg. "perfumer"). A person whose business it was to compound ointments in general was called an apothecary or perfumer (Neh. 3:8). The work was sometimes carried on by women "confectionaries" (1 Sam. 8:13). Originally the "anointing oil" was prepared by Bezaleel (Exod. 31:11; 37:29), after which it was probably prepared by one of the priests.

APPAIM (Heb. אֲפַיִם, ap-pah'-yim, the nostrils), the second named of the sons of Nadab, and the father of Ishi, of the posterity of Jerahmeel, of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 2:30).

APPAREL (usually Heb. בְּגָדִים, beg'-ed, dress, or some form of Chald. לְבוּשׁ, leb-ooosh', clothing). See DRESS.

APPEAL (Gr. ἐπικαλέομαι, ep-ec-kal-eh'-om-ah-ee, to invoke for aid, Acts 25:11, 12, 21, 25).

1. Jewish. In patriarchal times the head of the tribe, or sheik, administered justice, and, having no superior, there was no appeal from his decisions. In the condemnation of Tamar (Gen. 38:24) Judah exercised the power usual over the women of his family. Had the case been between man and man it would, doubtless, have been referred to Jacob. After the Exodus, Moses at first adjudged all cases himself, but at the suggestion of Jethro he arranged for a number of inferior judges, with evident right of appeal to himself (Exod. 18:13, 26). Later on the judges of the different towns were to bring all difficult cases which they were unable to decide before the Levitical priests and judges at the place of the sanctuary for a final decision (Deut. 17:8-11).

According to the above regulation the appeal lay in the time of the Judges to the judge (Judg. 4:5), and under the monarchy to the king, who appears to have deputed certain persons to inquire into the facts of the case, and record his decision thereon (2 Sam. 15:3). Jehoshaphat delegated his judicial authority to a court permanently established for the purpose (2 Chron. 19:8). These courts were reestablished by Ezra (Ezra 7:25). After the institution of the Sanhedrin the final appeal lay to them.

2. Roman. A Roman citizen under the republic had the right of appealing in criminal cases from the decision of a magistrate to the people; and as the emperor succeeded to the power of the people there was an appeal to him in the last resort. St. Paul, as a Roman citizen, exercised a right of appeal from the jurisdiction of the local court at Jerusalem to the emperor (Acts 25:11). But as no decision had been given there could be no appeal, properly speaking, in his case; the language used (Acts 25:9) implies the right on the part of the accused of electing either to be tried by the provincial magistrate or by the emperor. Since the procedure in the Jewish courts at that period was of a mixed and undefined character, the Roman and Jewish authorities coexisting and carrying on the course of justice between them, Paul availed himself of his undoubted privilege to be tried by the pure Roman law (Smith, Dict., s. v.).

3. Ecclesiastical. In the early Church all ecclesiastical matters were determined by the bishop with his court, an appeal being allowed to the provincial synod. Appeal to the pope was first formally recognized by the Council of Sardica (A. D. 343), where it was agreed that a condemned bishop had the right of appeal to the pope, who should either confirm the verdict of the synod or appoint new judges. The decision of the council was not at first generally accepted, yet within the next half century the assumption obtained that in all important cases an appeal could be made not only by a bishop, but by anyone aggrieved. Thus it came to pass that during the mediæval period the pope became, ex officio, the ecclesiastical judge of highest resort for all the nations whose Churches acknowledged obedience to him. The first instance in England of an appeal occurred in the reign of Stephen, but the concession was withdrawn under Henry II when one of the Constitutions of Clarendon decided that no appeals should be made to the pope without the king's consent. In Germany the first reaction against papal usurpation appeared in the "Golden Bull," which forbade appeals to Rome from a civil court. The Concordatum Constant (1418), and the decree of the thirty-first sitting of the Council of Basel, determined that appeals to the pope should not be decided in Rome by the curia, but by judices in partibus, chosen first by provincial or diocesan synods, and afterward by the bishops and chapters. The following is from the Catholic Dictionary (s. v.): "The object of appeals is the redress of injustice, whether knowingly or ignorantly committed. Appeal can be made from any judge recognizing a superior; thus no appeal is possible in secular matters from the decision of the sovereign power, or the highest secular tribunal, in any country; for these, in such matters, recognize no superior. There can be no appeal from the pope, for he, as the vicar of Christ, recognizes no superior on earth. . . . Nor can an appeal be made from a general council legitimately convened and approved, because it, being in union with the Roman pontiff who approved it, represents the whole Church, from the sentence of which there can be no appeal." In the Methodist Episcopal, the Presbyterian, and most of the Protestant Churches the right of appeal is recognized and modes of procedure provided for in their several books of Discipline.

APPEARANCE, a term usually applied to the interviews granted to the disciples by Jesus after his resurrection. From the several accounts we see that our Lord's body had undergone a change, having extraordinary powers of locomotion, of becoming invisible and visible at pleasure, while it still retained characteristics of matter, and was capable of taking food in the ordinary way. The following appearances are recorded: To Mary Magdalene (Mark 16:9, 10; John 20:11-18); to other women (Matt. 28:9, 10); to Simon Peter (Luke 24:34; 1 Cor. 15:5); to the two going to Emmaus (Luke 24:13, s.q.); to ten apostles (Mark 16:14; John 20:19); to apostles, including Thomas (John 20:26, s.q.); to seven disciples at the Sea of Galilee (John 21:1, s.q.); to five hundred (Matt. 28:16-20; Mark 16:15-18; 1 Cor. 15:6); to James, then to all apostles, and gives them a commission (Luke 24:44-49; Acts 1:3-8; 1 Cor. 15:7); at the ascension (Mark 16:19, 20; Luke 24:50-53; Acts 1:9-12).

APPEARING of our Lord (1 Tim. 6:14; 2 Tim. 1:10; 4:1, 8, etc.). See ADVENT, SECOND.

APPHIA (pronounced Af'fia, Gr. Ἀφφία, ap-fee'-a), the name of a female affectionately saluted by Paul (A. D. 64) as a Christian at Colosse (Philem. 2), supposed by Chrysostom and Theodoret to have been the wife of Philemon, with whom, according to tradition, she suffered martyrdom. See PHILEMON.

APPII FORUM, the market place of Appius. A town or station located forty-three miles from Rome, upon the "Appian Way," over which Paul passed on his way to the capital (Acts 28:15). Three Taverns was a village about ten miles nearer Rome.

AQUILA (Gr. Ἀκίλας, ak-oo'-las, an eagle), a Jew and a native of Pontus, and by occupation a tentmaker. Fleeing from Rome in consequence of an order of Claudius commanding all Jews to leave that city, he went to Corinth, where he was living when Paul found him; and, being of the same handicraft, abode with him, A. D. 54. Some time after, being opposed by the Jews, and perhaps to remove any obstacle to his acceptance by the Gentiles, Paul left the house of Aquila and dwelt with one Justus. It is not certain when Aquila and his wife, Priscilla, were converted to Christianity, but it was before Paul left Corinth, for they accompanied him to Ephesus. While there they instructed Apollos in "the way of God more perfectly" (Acts 18), and appear to have been zealous promoters of the Christian cause in that city (1 Cor. 16:19). At the time of Paul's writing to Corinth, Aquila and his wife were still at Ephesus (1 Cor. 16:19), but in Rom. 16:3 we find them again at Rome, and their house a place of assemblage for Christians. Some years after they appear to have returned to Ephesus, for Paul sends salutations to them during his second imprisonment at Rome (2 Tim. 4:19), as being with Timothy. Nothing further concerning them is known.

AR (Heb. אַר, awr, a city), the same as Ar Moab (Num. 21:15, 28; Deut. 2:9, 18, 29), on the border of the Arnon (22:36).

ARBA (Heb. אַרְבָּא, ar-aw', lion), the last named of the three sons of Jether, of the tribe of Asher (1 Chron. 7:38).

ARAB (Heb. אַרְבִּי, ar-awb', ambush), a city in the mountains of Judah, and given to that tribe (Josh. 15:52). Site unknown.

AR'ABAH (Heb. אֲרָבָה, ar-aw-baw', desert, Josh. 18:18), the Arabah (A. V. "the plain"), is applied (Deut. 1:1; 2:8; 3:17; 4:49; Josh. 3:16; 12:1, 3; 2 Kings 14:25; Amos 6:14) to the great valley between the Dead Sea and the Gulf of Akabah. It may, however, be used as the proper name of the whole valley lying between Mount Hermon and the Red Sea. "By using two of its names which overlap each other we may call it the Jordan-'Arabah valley. From the Lake of Galilee to the S. of the Dead Sea it is called by the Arabs the Ghôr, or Depression." "Toward Jericho, . . . although there is so much fertility, the stretches of sour soil, the unhealthy jungle, the obtrusive marl, and the parched hillsides out of the reach of the streams justify the Hebrew name of the Arabah or Desert. In the New Testament also the valley is called a wilderness (Mark 1:4, 5)." "Robinson (B. R., ii, 490) states that the exact point of division between El Ghôr and El 'Arabah is a line of white cliffs which crosses the valley obliquely beyond the flat marshland to the S. of the Dead Sea. From there S. to Akabah is the 'Arabah; but N. to the Lake of Galilee, the Ghôr" (Smith, Hist. Geog., pp. 47, 484, 507, note).

ARA'BIA (Heb. אֲרָבָה, ar-awb', desert; Gr. Ἀραβία, ar-ab-ee'-ah). Arabia does not in the Bible denote the whole peninsula between the Red Sea and the Persian Gulf, but only the northern part, contiguous to Palestine (Isa. 21:13; Jer. 25:24; Ezek. 27:21); and in the same manner "the Arabian" (Isa. 13:20; Jer. 3:2) does not denote the Arab in general, but only the inhabitant of the northern prairies and deserts. Only in the later books of the Old Testament, as, for instance, 2 Chron. 21:16, where the Arabians are spoken of together with the Ethiopians, or in Neh. 2:19; 6:1, and in the New Testament (Acts 2:11; Gal. 1:17; 4:25) the name seems to have obtained a more general signification. Arabia comprises an area of about one million square miles, with about eight million inhabitants (Schaff-Herzog).

The people who originally inhabited the desert of Arabia still inhabit it, and have never been expelled. The three ancient divisions of Arabia were: Arabia Petræa, occupying the most northern part of the territory between the Persian Gulf and the Red Sea. Modern travelers have a better knowledge of this part than the rest of the peninsula. It is a desolate region, abounding in limestone, basalt, and granite, the extreme northern part being especially inaccessible and partially inclosed by steep cliffs. Mount Sinai, with its triple peaks or ridges, one of which has the name of Horeb, lies in the southwestern part of Arabia Petræa. See SINAI.

Arabia Deserta, referred to Hos. 2:14; Isa. 35:1; 40:3, and called by the Bedouins "the desert," was the scene of Israel's wanderings. Its physical conditions are noticed Isa. 35:7.

Arabia Felix, in which are the modern Mecca and Medina, is said to contain some of the most beautiful and fertile spots on the globe. In lower Arabia was the kingdom of Sheba, whose queen visited Solomon (1 Kings 10:1-13). The Sabæans are referred to as to their character and resources (Jer. 6:20; Ezek. 27:22; Psa. 72:15; Isa. 60:6; Joel 3:8).

Recent geographical divisions of Arabia are: Arabia Proper, or Jezirat el-Arab, or the country

2. An Israelite, whose posterity (variously stated as seven hundred and seventy-five and six hundred and fifty-two in number) returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:5; Neh. 7:10), B. C. 536. He is probably the same with the Arah whose son, Shechaniah, was father-in-law of Tobiah (Neh. 6:18).

A'RAM (Heb. אֲרָם, ar-awn', high region).

1. The fifth named of the sons of Shem, and father of the people inhabiting Syria, who, from him, were called Aramæans, or Aramites (Gen. 10:22).

2. The son of Kemuel and grandson of Nahor (Gen. 22:21), B. C. about 1900. According to as far up as to the waste territory; then Northern Arabia or El-Badiel, being S. of the Euphrates and Syria, reaching S. to Arabia Petraea; and Western Arabia, comprising Sinai and the desert of Petraea. The entire country was peopled by essentially the descendants of Semitic and Cushitic tribes generally coming under the designation of "the Arab." The country is associated with the most heroic Bible characters, Job, Moses, Abraham, etc., etc. The natives in this country had a part in the day of Pentecost revival. Paul also retired thither (Gal. 1:17).

ARABIANS. See ARABIA.

A'RAD (Heb. אֲרָד, ar-awd', fugitive).

1. In Num. 21:1 "king Arad" should read "king of Arad." One of the "sons" of Beriath, of the tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron. 8:15).

2. A Canaanite city on the southernmost borders of Palestine, whose inhabitants drove back the Israelites while trying to enter Canaan from Kadesh (Num. 21:1; 33:40), but were finally subdued by Joshua (Josh. 12:14; Judg. 1:16). It lay twenty miles S. of Hebron, and is now called Tell Arad.

A'RAH (Heb. אֲרָח, aw-rahk', wayfaring).

1. The first named of the three sons of Ullu, of the tribe of Asher (1 Chron. 7:39).

Smith (s. v.), he is probably identical with Ram (Job 32:2).

3. The last named of the sons of Shamer, of the tribe of Asher (1 Chron. 7:34).

4. The son of Ezrom and father of Amminadab, among the ancestors of Christ (Matt. 1:3, 4; Luke 3:33). The Greek form of Ram (1 Chron. 2:9).

A'RAMITNESS (Heb. אֲרָמִיטָה, ar-am-mee', 1 Chron. 7:14), a female Syrian, as the word is elsewhere rendered. See ARAM.

A'RAM-NAHARA'IM (Heb. אֲרָם נְהַרַיִם, ar-am' nah-har-ah'-yim, Aram between the two rivers), the country situated between the rivers Euphrates and Tigris (Gen. 24:10; Judg. 3:8; Psa. 60, see caption). At Hos. 12:12, R. V., it is called the "field of Aram," and in A. V. the "country of Syria." It included in it Padan-aram.

A'RAM-ZO'BAH (Heb. אֲרָם צֹבָה, ar-am' tso-baw', Psa. 60, see caption), at the period of Saul and David the most powerful realm of Syria. Near Damascus (1 Sam. 14:47; 2 Sam. 8:3).

A'ARAN (Heb. אֲרָן, ar-awn', wild goat), the second named of the two sons of Dishan, and grandson of Seir, the Horite (Gen. 36:28; 1 Chron. 1:42), B. C. 1853.

AR'ARAT (Heb. אֲרָרָט, ar-av-rat', sacred land or high land, Gen. 8:4; Jer. 51:27). This name, from being applied to the country between the Tigris and the Caucasus Mountains, known as Armenia, and called in the Assyrian inscription Urarti, came to apply to the mountain range, and especially to the double conical peak about seven miles apart and respectively fourteen thousand and ten thousand three hundred feet in height above the plain below. The greater height, called by the natives Massis, or Varaz-Baris, and by the Persians Kuhl-Nuh, "the mountain of Noah," has its top covered with perpetual snow. Native traditions locate the resting-place of the ark on the southern slope; Syrian traditions and Assyrian inscriptions settle upon a peak further S. in Kurdistan.

ARAU'NAH (Heb. אֲרָוְנָה, ar-av-naw', meaning doubtful), a Jebusite who had a thrashing floor on Mount Moriah, which he sold to David as a site for an altar to Jehovah, B. C. 961. The angel of pestilence, sent to punish King David for taking a census of the people, was stayed in the work of death near the plot of ground belonging to this person. When David desired to purchase it he liberally offered the ground to him as a free gift. David insisted upon paying Araunah, giving him, according to 2 Sam. 24:24, fifty shekels of silver, and according to 1 Chron. 21:25, six hundred shekels of gold.

NOTE.—Many efforts have been made to reconcile this difference, some saying that the fifty shekels were given for the oxen, and the six hundred shekels for the land; others, that the fifty shekels were for the thrashing floor and oxen, and the six hundred shekels for additional ground. This land was the site of the temple (2 Chron. 3:1). Araunah's name is sometimes written Ornan. See Chronicles.

AR'BA (Heb. אַרְבָּה, ar-bah', four), a giant, father of Anak. From him Hebron derived its early name of Kirjath-arba, i. e., city of Arba (Gen. 35:27; Josh. 14:15; 15:13; 21:11).

AR'BATHITE, THE, i. e., a native of the ARABAH (q. v.) or Ghôr. Abialbon the Arbathite was one of David's mighty men (2 Sam. 23:31; 1 Chron. 11:32).

AR'BITE. Paarai the Arbite was one of David's guards (2 Sam. 23:35). The word signifies a native of ARABIA (q. v.). In 1 Chron. 11:37 the name is given as Naarai.

ARCH (Heb. אֵיכָל, ay-lawm'), an architectural term in Ezek. 40:16, 22, 26, 29. These terms are very difficult of explanation. By some they are thought to be the same as אֵיכָל, oo-lawm', a vestibule or porch. Dr. Keil, following Kliefoth, considers them to be those portions of the inner side walls of the gateway which projected in the same manner as the two pillars by the porch, viz., the intervening walls between the three guard rooms, and also those portions of the side walls which inclosed the two thresholds on either side (Com., in loc.). In these projecting side walls were the windows mentioned in v. 16. See ARCHITECTURE.

ARCHÆOLOGY (Gr. ἀρχαιολογία, science of ancient things), the knowledge of antiquity.

1. Biblical Archæology may be defined as the scientific representation of the forms which life assumed among the people of Israel, as that nation of antiquity selected by God to be the bearer of revelation; also so much of the conditions of life existing among the other nations which came into contact with Israel as will give us a clearer understanding of the Bible and the conditions of life among the Israelites. These nations were those having race relationship, as the Aramæans, Arabs, Canaanites, Philistines, etc., or were temporary oppressors or rulers, as the Egyptians, Assyrians, Medo-Persians, Greeks, and Romans; of these antiquities we introduce only such as bear directly on some Scripture passage. See SUPPLEMENT.

(1) Contents. The matters belonging to biblical archæology are: (1) The religious institutions of Israel, the places of worship, the personnel of worship, the acts of worship, consisting of sacrifices, purifications, etc.; worship according to its times, festivals, and changes. (2) The civil and social relations of the Israelites: domestic life as to dwellings, food, marriage, children, sickness, death, etc.; employments, as agriculture, rearing of cattle, trades, commerce, etc.; affairs of state, as law, administration of justice, and relation to other nations.

Archæology, it will be seen, is closely allied with history, the latter depicting the growth and progress, the former describing the actual condition of the development attained.

(2) Sources. The sources of biblical archæology are written and representative monuments. (1) Among the written monuments, the Bible must be placed in the first rank, then the writings of Josephus and Philo, the Talmud, Targums, and the Rabbins; notices regarding Palestine and the Jews by Greek and Roman authors, such as Herodotus, Xenophon, Diodorus Siculus, Plutarch, Strabo, Appian, Pliny, Tacitus, and Justin; native writers among the Egyptians, Phœnicians, Babylonians, etc.; descriptions of travels in the East, and the publications of the "Palestine Exploration Fund," instituted in England in 1865, of the "Palestine Exploration Society" of America, and of the "Deutsche Palestine Verein," founded in 1877. (2) Representative monuments, as the remains of the Temple walls, the bridge leading from the Temple to Zion, the Tower of Hippicus, and the tombs of the patriarchs at Hebron; the Arch of Titus at Rome; Jewish coins from the time of the Maccabees—often called Samaritan from the resemblance of their written characters; the ancient monuments of the Egyptians, Syrians, Babylonians, and Assyrians, consisting of remains of palaces, temples, public buildings, sculptures, etc., lately brought to light by excavations.

(3) History and Literature. The treatment of biblical archæology began in the 16th century with the spread of Bible study, especially of the Old Testament in the original. It resulted in only a few works of no great importance either in extent or intrinsic value. More was done in the 17th century, especially through a study of the Talmud and of the rabbinical writers, as well as of classical and oriental literature. A great revival of interest has resulted from the important discoveries made by excavating during the last thirty years. For lists of valuable aids in the study of biblical archaeology, see McC. and S., Cyc.; Schaff-Herzog, Encyc.; Keil, Bib. Arch., i, 1-18.

2. Christian Archaeology has for its object "the systematic study of the art, constitution, government, discipline, worship, rites, and life of the early Christian Church." Bennett (Christian Archaeology) gives the following divisions: (a) The archaeology of Christian art, which examines Christian thought, life, doctrines, and institutions as they are found crystallized in monuments. (b) Archaeology of the constitution and government of the Christian Church, including the examination of the fundamental idea of the Christian Church as revealed in the New Testament, the Church in its organized form, its offices, government, and discipline. (c) Archaeology of Christian worship and rites, embracing public services, as preaching, the sacraments, and the sacred times and seasons. (d) Archaeology of Christian life, the Christian family, the Church and marriage, slavery and home religion, the Church and charities, the social and literary position of the early Church, the care for the dead, Christian burial, etc. Christian archaeology, as a science, dates from the 16th century, when the Protestant reformers rigorously arraigned the Church for a wide departure from primitive simplicity. To answer this indictment the Magdeburg centuriators, the adherents of Rome, were compelled to enter upon its study. Cæsar Baronius (1607), a cardinal, after thirty years of laborious study, published his Annales Ecclesie, which has ever since been regarded by Roman Catholic writers as a well-furnished arsenal of defense.

Up to what date the boundaries of Christian archaeology should be fixed has not been finally settled. Some confine it to the first three centuries, some have regarded the death of Gregory the Great (A. D. 604) as its proper limit. Others extend it to the 11th century, or to the age of Hildebrand, while still others carry it forward to the Reformation. Bennett (Christian Archaeology) confines his studies to the period ending with the second Trullan Council at Constantinople, in 692.

ARCHANGEL. See MICHAEL.

ARCHELA'US (Gr. 'Αρχέλαος, ar-khel'-ah-os, ruler of the people), son of Herod the Great by a Samaritan woman, Malthace (Josephus, War, i, 28, 4), and brought up, with his brother Antipas, at Rome (Josephus, War, i, 31, 1). Upon his father's death, Cæsar divided his kingdom, giving to Archelaus (B. C. 4) Idumea, Judea, and Samaria, with the important cities, Cæsarea, Sebaste, Joppa, and Jerusalem. His share of the kingdom brought him a yearly income of six hundred talents. He was made ethnarch, with promise of becoming king if he ruled virtuously (Josephus, Ant., xvii, 11, 4). After Herod's death, and previous to going to Rome to receive the government, Archelaus ordered his soldiers to attack the Jews, who were becoming very tumultuous, at the temple. The attack resulted in the death of about three thousand Jews. On his going to Rome the Jews sent a deputation of the principal citizens protesting against his cruelty, and asking to be permitted to live according to their own laws, under a Roman governor. Some have thought that our Lord alludes to this circumstance in Luke 19:12-27. Archelaus returned to Judea, and, under pretense that he had countenanced the seditions against him, he deprived Joazar of the high priesthood, and gave that dignity to his brother Eleazar. He governed Judea with so much violence that in the tenth (ninth according to Dio Cassius) year of his reign he was dethroned, deprived of his property, and banished to Vienna, in Gaul (Josephus, Ant., xvii, 13, 2). His cruelty was manifested toward Samaritans as well as Jews. The parents of our Lord turned aside, from fear of him, on their way back from Egypt, and went to Nazareth, in Galilee, in the domain of his gentle brother Antipas (Matt. 2:22). Archelaus illegally married Glaphyra, the wife of his brother Alexander, during the lifetime of the latter.

ARCHERS (Heb. קַשְׁוֹת, kash-shaveth', bowman, Gen. 21:20; בַּיַּל חָוֶץ, bah'-al khayts, arrow-man, Gen. 49:23; אֲנֹשׁ בַּקֶּשֶׁת, en-nosh' bak-keh'-shayth, bowman, 1 Sam. 31:3; also shooter with the bow, 1 Chron. 10:3; one bending the bow, Jer. 51:3). The bow and arrow are weapons of very ancient origin (Gen. 48:22; 49:24; comp. Gen. 9:14, 15). Archers were very numerous among the Hebrews, especially in the tribes of Benjamin and Ephraim (Psa. 76:3; 1 Chron. 8:40; 2 Chron. 14:8; 17:17). Archers are frequently found on the Egyptian monuments and Babylon sculptures. Reference is made to the Philistine archers in 1 Sam. 31:3, and the Persians were famous for their archers (Isa. 18:18; Jer. 49:35; 50:29). See ARMOR.

AR'CHEVITE (Chald. אֲרֵכְוִי, ar-kev-ah'ee, Ezra 4:9). The Archevites were inhabitants of Erech (Warga). This seems to be quite generally agreed. Thence came part of the colonists of Samaria after its capture.—W. H.

AR'CHI (Heb. אֲרֵכִי, ar-kee'), a city or district in the neighborhood of Beth-el (Josh. 16:2). Site difficult of identification.

ARCHIP'PUS (Gr. 'Αρχιππος, ar'-khip-pos, master of the horse), a Christian minister at Colosse, to whom Paul sends a salutation, calling him "our fellow-soldier" (Philem. 2), and whom he exhorts to increased activity (Col. 4:17), B. C. 63. In the Epistle to Philemon he is addressed jointly with Philemon and Apphia, from which it has been inferred that he was a member of Philemon's family. Tradition states that he was one of Jesus's seventy disciples, and suffered martyrdom at Chonæ, near Laodicea.

ARCHITE (Heb. אַרְכִּי, ar-kee). The Archites, if we may judge from Josh. 16:2, were a family whose possessions were upon the southern boundary of the tribe of Ephraim, between Beth-el and Astaroth. The term is applied to HUSHAI (q. v.), who adhered to David during Absalom's rebellion (2 Sam. 15:32; 16:16; 17:5, 14; 1 Chron. 27:33).

structed on a colossal scale. These prove their builders to have been far advanced in architectural art, and profoundly versed in the science of mechanics, and indicate a long period of anterior development. "Egyptian architecture, in many points, such as the majestic disposition of the masses, the sublime massiveness and durability of its walls, the long vistas through successive courts and lines of columns and sphinxes, the predominance of the interior over the exterior ornament, the universal use of color, the subordination of sculpture and painting to architectural effects, the symbolism of its ornaments and the monumental character of its edifices, was the most perfect the world has ever seen." The Egyptian public edifices consisted of temples, palaces, tombs, and aqueducts. In Egyptian architecture the columns are of three kinds, emblematic of the papyrus, the lotus, and the palm. The earliest temples and ARCHITECTURE. Although we know but little of the early achievements and progress of the science of architecture, sufficient remains to prove their antiquity. To the race of Shem is attributed (Gen. 10:11, 12, 22) the building of the cities of Nineveh, Rehoboth, Calah, and Resen. In Gen. 11:3-9 we learn of the earliest recorded building art of the materials employed in its construction. Inasmuch as the Hebrews were brought into contact with many of the surrounding nations, and their own architecture was, doubtless, more or less influenced thereby, it will be profitable to speak briefly of their architecture also.

1. Egyptian. Concerning the rise of Egyptian art we know nothing, but we are brought face to face with the Pyramids of Gizeh, the Sphinx, obelisks, and temples, many of them constructed of wood, or excavated from the solid rock, and gave a typical character to the later temples, built mostly above ground and of cut stone. See TEMPLE; PYRAMID.

2. Babylonian, etc. One of the most ancient nations known to us as having made any considerable progress in the arts of design is the Babylonian. They have left celebrated monuments, such as the Temple of Belus, the Kasr, the hanging gardens, and the wonderful canals of Nahar Malca, and Pallacopas. The dimensions of their ruins afford some idea of the colossal size of the original structures. We have no entire architectural monument of Nineveh, but enough has come to light to prove the advanced condition of the Assyrians. They are found to have understood and applied the arch; to have made tunnels, aque-ducts, and drains; and to have been acquainted with the lever and screw.

3. Greek. The earliest efforts of the Greeks in architecture were the cyclopean walls surrounding the castles of the kings in the Heroic Age at Tiryns, Argos, Mycenæ, and elsewhere. These are of colossal blocks, the interstices filled with smaller stones; others are built more or less carefully hewn, and fitting each other. Among the most striking relics of these primitive times are the so-called Thesauroi (treasuries), the usual form of which was a circular chamber vaulted over by horizontal courses approaching from all sides until they meet. An open-air building preserved from that age is the supposed Temple of Hera on Mount Ocha, in Eubœa, a rectangle built of regular square blocks, with walls over a yard in thickness, two small windows, and a door with leaning posts and a huge lintel in the southern tion to many ruined temples in Sicily, mention should be made of the Temple of Poseidon at Pæstum, in southern Italy, one of the best preserved and most beautiful relics of antiquity. The Doric order is represented by the Temple of Theseus and the Parthenon, while the Erechtheum is the most brilliant creation of the Ionic order in Attica. The progress of the drama led to improvement in the building of theaters (q. v.). The following are Greek orders of architecture:

(1) Doric. The Doric column consists of (a) the shaft, which increases in diameter almost invisibly up to about one quarter of its height, and diminishes slightly after that point. It has no base, but rests immediately on the stylobate. It is surrounded by semicircular flutings meeting each other at a sharp angle. (b) The capital, consisting of three parts, the hypotrachelion, or neck of the column, a continuation of the shaft, but separated by an indentation from the other drums; side wall. The sloping roof is of hewn flagstones resting on the wall and overlapping each other. Columns were introduced at an early period, being mentioned by Homer. Architecture developed her favorite forms in the construction of temples, and so all other public buildings borrowed their artistic character from them. The structure and furniture of private houses (see HOUSE) were, during the best days of Greece, kept down to the simplest forms. The first architects known by name are Rhœcus and Theodorus of Samos, who built the great Temple of Hera in that island; while Chersiphron of Cnôsus, in Crete, with his son Metagenes, began the Temple of Artemis (Diana) at Ephesus, one of the seven wonders of the world, which was not finished till one hundred and twenty years after.

A vast temple to Zeus was begun at Athens in the 6th century. Here and there in the western colonies the Doric style still predominated. Among the chief remains of this period, in addition to the echinus, a circular molding, or cushion, which widens greatly toward the top; the abax, or abacus, a square slab supporting the architrave, or epistylon. The architrave is the quadrangular stone reaching from pillar to pillar. Above this is the frieze (zophoros), surmounted by the cornice.

(2) Ionic. This column is loftier than the Doric; the enlargement of the lower part is less than the Doric; the distance between the columns is greater, and the flutings deeper, and separated by flat surfaces. The Ionic column has a base, consisting of a square slab, and several cushion-like supports separated by grooves. The capital again is more artistically developed, while the architrave is divided into three bands, projecting one above the other, and upon it rises, in an uninterrupted surface, the frieze, adorned with reliefs along its whole length, and, finally, the cornice is composed of different parts.

(3) Corinthian. The base and shaft are identical with the Ionic, but the capital takes the form of an open caliz formed of acanthus leaves, from between which grow stalks with small leaves, rounded into the form of volutes. On this rests a small abacus widening toward the top, and on this the entablature, borrowed from the Ionic order.

The style known as the Tuscan is a degenerate form of the Doric. The column has a smooth shaft, tapering up to three quarters of its lower dimensions. Its base consists of two parts, a circular plinth and a cushion of equal height.

4. Etruscan and Roman. The Etruscans united wonderful activity and inventiveness with a passion for covering their buildings with rich ornamental carvings. None of their temples remain, for they built the upper parts of wood; but we have evidences of their activity in walls and tombs. Some very old gateways, as at Volterra and Perugia, exhibit the true arch of wedge-shaped stones. The most imposing monument of ancient Italian arch-building is to be seen in the sewers of Rome, laid in the 6th century B. C.

The Roman architects kept alive the Etruscan method of building the arch, which they developed and completed by the inventions of the cross arch and the dome. With the arch they combined, as a decorative element, the columns of the Greek order. They also introduced building with brick (see POTTERY). A vigorous advance was made from the opening of the 3d century B. C., when the Romans began making great military roads and aqueducts.

In the last decades of the republic simplicity gradually disappeared, and a princely pomp was displayed in public and private buildings; witness the first stone theater erected by Pompey as early as 55 B. C. All that had gone before was eclipsed by the works undertaken by Cæsar, the theater, the amphitheater, circus, Basilica Julia, and the Forum Cæsaris. These were finished by Augustus, under whom Roman architecture seems to have reached its culminating point. The greatest monument of that age, and one of the loftiest creations of Roman art in general, is the Pantheon, built by Agrippa. Of the luxurious grandeur of private buildings we have ocular proof in the dwelling houses of Pompeii, a paltry country town in comparison with Rome. The progress made under the Flavian emperors is evidenced by Vespasian's amphitheater (the Coliseum), the nightiest ruin in the world; the baths of Titus, and his triumphal arch. But all previous buildings were surpassed in size and splendor when Trajan's architect, Apollodorus of Damascus, raised the Forum Traianum, with its huge Basilica Ulpia, and the still surviving Column of Trajan.

5. Hebrew. The Israelites were shepherds, and, by habit, dwellers in tents, and had, therefore, originally no architecture. Even Hebron, a city of higher antiquity than the Egyptian Zoan, was called originally from its founder, perhaps a Canaanite of the race of Anak, Kirjath-arba, the city of Arba (Num. 13:22; Josh. 14:15). It was probably in connection with Egypt that the Israelites first became builders of cities, being compelled to labor at the buildings by the Egyptian kings. From the time of their entrance into Canaan they became dwellers in towns and houses of stone (Lev. 14:34, 45; 1 Kings 7:10); but in most cases these were not built by themselves (Deut. 6:10; Num. 13:19).

(1) Hebrew architecture, in the proper sense of the word, did not exist until the time of the kings. Immediately after the conquest of Zion David began to rebuild and fortify the city, and erected a palace for himself. But the peaceful reign and vast wealth of his son, Solomon, gave a great impulse to architecture. He enlarged and strengthened the city wall and the castle of Millo (1 Kings 3:1; 9:15, 24; 11:27), built fortresses and cities in various places, among which Baalath and Tadmor are in all probability represented by Baalbec and Palmyra (1 Kings 9:17-20), and a costly aqueduct by which drinking water was brought from the region of Etam to Jerusalem. The temple and the palace were his two most magnificent buildings. Other kings of Israel and Judah are recorded as builders: Asa (1 Kings 15:23), Baasha (15:17), Omri (16:24), Ahab (16:32; 22:39), Hezekiah (2 Kings 12:11, 12; 22:6), and Jehoiakim, whose winter palace is mentioned (Jer. 22:14; 36:22; see also Amos 3:15). On the return from captivity the chief care of the rulers was to rebuild the temple and the walls of Jerusalem in a substantial manner, with stone, and with timber from Lebanon (Ezra 3:8; 5:8; Neh. 2:8; ch. 3). But the reigns of Herod and his successors were especially remarkable for their great architectural works. Not only was the temple restored, but the fortifications and other public buildings of Jerusalem were enlarged and embellished (Luke 21:5). The town of Cæsarea was built on the site of Strato's Tower; Samaria was enlarged and received the name of Sebaste. The connection of Solomon with Egypt, and with Tyre, and the influence of the captivity, must necessarily have affected the style of the palatial edifices of that monarch, and of the first and second temples. The enormous stones employed in the Assyrian, Persepolitan, and Egyptian buildings find a parallel in the constructions of Baalbec, and in the huge blocks which still remain at Jerusalem, relics of the buildings either of Solomon or of Herod. But few monuments are known to exist in Palestine by which we can form an accurate idea of its buildings, and even of those which do remain no trustworthy examination has yet been made. It is probable, however, that the reservoirs known under the names of the Pools of Solomon and Hezekiah contain some portions at least of the original fabrics (Smith, Bib. Dict. s. v.).

(2) Various Periods. "There are in Palestine eight great periods of building, beginning with the rude stone or prehistoric age, including Hebrew, Greek, Roman, Byzantine, Arab, Crusading, and Saracenic. The rude stone monuments (q. v.) . . . are probably the earliest remains in the country. Hebrew remains are chiefly represented by rock-cut tombs, rock scarp, tunnels, and pools (as at Siloam), the great tells or mounds beside springs and streams, and a very few inscriptions. The wall on Ophel, found by Sir C. Warren, is probably as old as Nehemiah, and in the extreme North we have Phœnician sculptures, tombs, and sarcophagi of equal antiquity. The Greek age presents several examples of native art under Greek influence, such as the palace of Hyrcanus and some of the Jerusalem tombs. To the earliest Roman period belong the walls of the Jerusalem and Hebron harems, with the temple at Siah, the colonnade at Samaria, the earliest remains at Masada and Cæsarea. Advancing to the 2d century of our era, we find Syria to have been suddenly covered with Roman cities, Roman roads, Roman temples and inscriptions; and this period, to which the synagogues also belong, is one of the greatest building ages in Palestine. The Roman work gradually gives place to the Christian architecture of the Byzantines. . . . At Bethlehem we have one of the oldest churches in the world, the 4th-century pillars still standing in place. The church was five hundred years old when England became a kingdom. The early Arabs have left us very few buildings beyond the Dome of the Rock at Jerusalem, the great Damascus mosque. . . . They employed Persian and Greek architects, and brought no original style of their own from the deserts of Arabia. The Crusaders, who followed, were great builders, civil and ecclesiastical; the country is full of their castles and of their churches" (Conder, Palestine, p. 226, sq.). See HOUSE, TEMPLE; also SUPPLEMENT.

6. Christian. The early Christians held their services in synagogues, private houses, the fields, the catacombs—indeed, wherever opportunity afforded. As early as in the 3d century buildings erected by them existed, but they were neither substantial nor costly. Christian architecture did not become an art until the time of Constantine, when it appeared in two entirely different forms, the Basilican and the Byzantine.

(1) Basilican. When Christianity became the religion of the state the ancient basilicas, or halls of justice, were turned into churches, and this style became prevalent throughout the Western countries, and lasted until the 11th century. The lower floor was used by the men, and the galleries reserved for the women. Specimens of this style of architecture still existing and in good repair are S. Paolo fuori le mura, S. Clemente in Rome, S. Apollinare in Classe in Ravenna, etc.

(2) Byzantine. The principal feature of this style is the dome, which was frequently used in Roman tombs. In Persia the problem was first solved of placing the cupola on a square substructure, by forming an octagon in the interior of the square by means of a huge pillar in each angle. The Latin cross was abandoned for the Greek cross, whose branches are of equal length. The objection to images obliged the architects to seek some other means than sculpture of enriching the churches, hence the profusion of mosaic work. The masterpieces of this style are St. Mark's at Venice, St. Vitale at Ravenna, and St. Sophia at Constantinople. Still later the Greek cross was combined with the square, and the number of cupolas was increased to nine—one at the end of each arm, one over the crossing, and one in each corner of the square.

(3) Romanesque. This results from a union of the two previous styles, the basilica and the dome. The ground plan and the interior and exterior of the old basilica were materially changed. A very important feature was the transept, with fixed proportions, the cross being invariably produced by repeating the square, chosen as unit, three times to the W., and one time respectively to the N., E., and S. Other features were, apses for the side altars; the raised choir, to allow for the crypt; a belfry, first one, and as an independent building, then two, and connected with the western termination of the building; small arched galleries running round parts or the whole of the church within and without; the exterior was covered with numerous well-disposed arches, pilasters, and other ornaments, and the richly decorated doorways and windows drew the eye to the central part of the facade. The result was that the whole external had a dignity not to be found in any other style of church architecture. Among the finest examples of this style are the cathedrals of Pisa, Vercelli, Parma, Modena, and Lucca (in Italy), of Worms, Bonn, Mayence, and St. Gereon and St. Apostoli in Cologne. To this style belong the peculiar churches and round towers of Ireland, and the round tower of Newport, R. I.

(4) Gothic. This style retains the ground plan and general arrangement of the Romanesque, but substituted the pointed for the round arch. The pointed arch was probably brought to Europe by the Crusaders from Asia, where it was used by the Saracens. The use of the pointed arch requires, for harmony, a corresponding upward tendency in all parts of the structure, and by obliterating the idea of a mechanical contrivance produces the impression of organic growth. This style arose in the 12th century, reaching its culmination in the 13th century, which is known as the "golden period of Gothic architecture." The earliest fully developed example of this style is the cathedral of St. Denis, consecrated in 1144. In northern France it is seen in highest perfection in the cathedrals of Notre Dame (Paris, 1163-1312), Chartres (1195-1260), Rheims (begun 1212) and Amiens (1220-1288). In England examples are seen at Canterbury (1174), Westminster Abbey, London (1245-69), Salisbury (1220-58), and Exeter (1327-69).

(5) Renaissance. The Gothic style had never taken such deep root in Italy as in the other countries of Europe. The revival of classic studies resulted in architecture in a return to classical forms. It began with eclecticism, the adoption of the round arch, the cupola, the column in its classical proportions and signification. It ended, however, in servile copying of ancient temples. The chief monument of this style is St. Peter's at Rome.

Respecting modern architecture it can be said that it is marked by no style such as is followed by all builders of the period. "Sometimes there is a mixing together of several styles, sometimes a renunciation of style altogether."

ARCTURUS (Heb. אַרְכֻּרֻס, arush, or אֲרֻרֻס, ar'urish), the Latin form of the Gr. ἀρκτοῦρος, and generally believed to represent the constellation Ursa Major, the Great Bear (Job 9:9; 38:32).

ARD (Heb. אֲרָד, ard, perhaps fugitive), named in Gen. 46:21 as a son of Benjamin, and in Num. 26:40 as a son of Bela, and grandson of Benjamin. Both these passages probably refer to the same person, the former mentioning him as a descendant, the latter giving the exact relationship. In 1 Chron. 8:3 he is called Addar. His descendants were called Ardites.

ARD'ITE (Heb. אֲרִדִּיטָא, ar-dee'), a descendant of Ard, or Addar, the grandson of Benjamin (Num. 26:40).

AR'DON (Heb. אֲרִדּוֹן, ar-dohn', fugitive), the last named of the three sons of Caleb, but whether by Azubah or Jerioth is uncertain (1 Chron. 2:18).

ARE'LI (Heb. אֲרֵלִי, ar-ay-lee', heroic), the last named of the seven sons of Gad, and founder of the family of Arelites (Gen. 46:16; Num. 26:17).

ARE'LITES (Heb. same as Areli, Num. 26:17), the descendants of Areli, the last of the seven sons of Gad (Gen. 46:16).

AREOP'AGITE (Gr. Ἀρεοπαγίτης, ar-eh-op-ag-ee'-tace, Acts 17:34), a member of the court of AREOPAGUS (q. v.).

AREOP'AGUS; another name for Mars' (Ares) Hill, which is the rendering of the Greek word of which Areopagus is the Latin form. It was called Mars' Hill because Mars, the god of war, was said to have been tried there for the murder of Halirrhothius, the son of Poseidon. It was an elevated and rocky place at Athens, W. of the Acropolis.

The Court. An ancient criminal court, called by the same name, sat here. "Solon's legislation raised the Areopagus into one of the most powerful bodies by transferring to it the greater part of the jurisdiction of the Ephetae (a judicial court of high antiquity at Athens), as well as the supervision of the entire administration, the conduct of magistrates, the transactions of the popular assembly, religion, laws, morals, and discipline, and giving it power to call even private persons to account for offensive behavior. The Court of Areopagus, as its full name ran, consisted of life members (Areopagites), who supplemented their number by the addition of such archons as had discharged their duties without reproach. Not only their age, but their sacred character, tended to increase the influence of the Areopagites. They were regarded as in a measure ministers of the Furies, who under the name of Semnae (venerable) had their cave immediately under the Areopagus, and whose worship came under their care. . . . Its political powers seem never to have been clearly defined. It often acted in the name of, and with full powers from, the people, which also accepted its decisions on all possible subjects. Under the Roman rule it was still regarded as the supreme authority. Then, as formerly, it exercised a most minute vigilance over foreigners" (Seyffert, Class. Dict., s. v.).

AR'ETAS (Gr. Ἀρέτας, ar-ee'-as, a name common to many of the kings of Arabia Petraea), an Arabian king, the father-in-law of Herod Antipas. Herod afterward married the wife of his brother Philip, and in consequence of this the daughter of Aretas returned to her father. Enraged at the conduct of Herod, Aretas instituted hostilities against him, and destroyed his army. Complaint being made to the emperor, he sent Vitellius to punish Aretas, but while on the march news was received of the death of Tiberius, and the Roman army was withdrawn. It is probable that Caligula gave Damascus to Aretas as a free gift (A. D. 38), and he is mentioned as being king of that city by the apostle Paul (2 Cor. 11:32).

AR'GOB (Heb. אֲרִגּוֹב, ar-gobe', stone heap).

1. An accomplice of Pekah in the murder of Pekahiah, or, with Arieah, a prince of Pekahiah, whose influence Pekah feared, and whom he therefore slew with the king (2 Kings 15:25), B. C. 759.

2. An elevated district or table-land, in Bashan, an island in form, some twenty by thirty miles in extent; elsewhere (Luke 3:1) called Trachonitis. It was allotted to the half tribe of Manasseh. The statement (Deut. 3:4) of there being sixty cities in this region is confirmed by recent discoveries. "The sixty walled cities are still traceable in a space of three hundred and eight square miles. The architecture is ponderous and massive: solid walls, four feet thick, and stones on one another without cement; the roofs, enormous slabs of basaltic rock like iron; the doors and gates are of stone eighteen inches thick, secured by ponderous bars. The land bears still the appearance of having been called 'the land of giants under the giant Og'" (Porter, Giant Cities of Bashan).

ARID'AI (Heb. אֲרִידַי, ar-ee-dah'-ee, perhaps strong), the ninth of the ten sons of Haman, slain by the Jews in Babylonia (Esth. 9:9), B. C. about 509.

ARID'ATHA (Heb. אֲרִידַתָּא, ar-ee-daw-thaw', strong), the sixth son of Haman, slain by the Jews (Esth. 9:8), B. C. about 509.

ARI'EH (Heb. אֲרִיֵה, ar-yay', the lion), either one of the accomplices of Pekah in his conspiracy against Pekahiah, king of Israel, or one of the princes of Pekahiah, who was put to death with him (2 Kings 15:25), B. C. 759.

A'RIEL (Heb. אֲרִיאֵל, ar-ee-ale', lion of God), one of the "chief men" sent by Ezra to Iddo at Casiphia to bring ministers for the house of God to go with the people to Jerusalem (Ezra 8:16), B. C. about 457.

In commenting upon Isa. 29:1, sq., Delitzsch understands Ariel to mean the "hearth of God," as a figurative name given to Jerusalem. He argues this from the fact of Ezekiel's giving (43:15,16) this name to the altar of burnt offering in the new temple, and that Isaiah could not say anything more characteristic of Jerusalem than that Jehovah had a fir and a hearth there (Isa. 31:9, "furnace"). "By the fact that David fixed his headquarters in Jerusalem, and then brought the sacred ark thither, Jerusalem became a hearth of God."

ARIMATHÆ'A (Gr. Ἀριμαθαία, ar-ee-math-ah'-ee-ah, a height), the birthplace and sepulcher of Joseph in Judea. Here the body of Jesus was buried (Matt. 27:57; Mark 15:43; Luke 23:51; John 19:38). It is thought to be the same as Ramah, the birthplace of Samuel (1 Sam. 1:1, 19), which by Keil and Delitzsch (Com., in loc.) is identified with Ramah in Benjamin, about two hours N. W. of Jerusalem.

A'RIOCH (Heb. אֲרִיֹךְ, ar-yoke').

1. A king of Ellasar who accompanied Chedorlaomer, king of Elam, on his incursion into Palestine about 2250 B. C. (Gen. 14). The name and the person are almost certainly the same as the Eri-Aku (servant of the god Aku) son of Kudur-Mabug, king of Larsa, a few of whose brief inscriptions have come down to us. In origin Eri-Aku was not a Babylonian, but after his ancestors had conquered some of the Babylonian cities he and his successors became fully identified with their adopted home. He was conquered by Hammurabi, king of Babylon (2287-2233 B. C. ?), and his territory annexed to the empire, of which that city had become the capital. He joined the raid of Chedorlaomer into Palestine, and is heard of no more after the defeat by Abraham. The city of Ellasar mentioned in Genesis as his is probably Larsa, the ruins of which have been found at the modern Senkerch (see ELLASAR). The name, date, and place all agree perfectly with the conditions set forth in the Babylonian inscriptions mentioned above. See CHEDORLAOMER, AMRAPHEL, and TIDAL.

LITERATURE.—Sayce, Patriarchal Palestine, London, 1895; Schrader, Cuneiform Inscriptions and the Old Testament, translated by Whitehouse, 2 vols.; Hommel, The Bible in the Vale of Siddim (with translations of the inscriptions of Eri-Aku); Sunday-School Times, March 5, 1892.

2. The captain of the guard of Nebuchadnezzar (Dan. 2:14, ff.), not otherwise known to us.—R. W. R.

ARIS'AI (Heb. אַרִיסַי, ar-ce-sah'-ce, arrow of Aria), the eighth of the ten sons of Haman, slain by the Jews in Babylonia (Esth. 9:9), B. C. about 509.

ARISTAR'CHUS (Gr. Ἀριστάρχος, ar-is'-tar-khos, the best ruler), a native of Thessalonica, and a faithful adherent of the apostle Paul in his labors. He became the companion of Paul in his third missionary tour, accompanying him to Ephesus, where he was seized and nearly killed in the tumult raised by the silversmiths under Demetrius (Acts 19:29), B. C. 59. He left that city accompanying Paul to Greece, thence to Asia (Acts 20:4), and subsequently to Rome (Acts 27:2), whither he was sent as a prisoner, or became such while there (Philem. 24), for Paul calls him his "fellow-prisoner" (Col. 4:10). Tradition makes him to have suffered martyrdom in the time of Nero.

ARISTOBULUS (Gr. Ἀριστοβούλος, ar-is-tob'-oo-los, best counselor), a person to whose household at Rome Paul sends salutation (Rom. 16:10), A. D. 60. Tradition represents him as a brother of Barnabas, ordained a bishop by Barnabas or Paul, and as laboring and dying in Britain. Ramsay (St. Paul the Traveller, p. 353) identifies Aristobulus as a son of Herod the Great.

ARK, the name given to three vessels mentioned in the Bible.

1. Noah's Ark (Heb. תֵּבָה, tay-baw', a chest), the vessel in which Noah and his family were saved during the Deluge. It was made of gopher (i. e., cypress) wood, which on account of its lightness and durability was employed by the Phœnicians for shipbuilding. A covering of pitch (bitumen) was laid on inside and outside, to make it watertight and, perhaps, as a protection against marine animals. The ark consisted of a number of "nests," or small compartments, arranged in three tiers, one above another—"with lower, second, and third (stories) shalt thou make it."

The ark was three hundred cubits long, fifty broad, and thirty high; and appears to have been built in the form of a chest, with flat bottom and flat (or slightly sloping) roof, being intended not for sailing, but merely to float upon the water. Light and air were furnished through a window, the construction of which we have not data sufficient to form an intelligent idea of. It is uncertain whether the words, "in a cubit shalt thou finish it above," refers to the window or the ark. If to the window, then it would seem to imply that it was a cubit wide and ran the whole length of the ark. If to the ark, the passage can only signify that the window was placed within a cubit of the roof. The most probable conclusion is that the window was on the side. Some place the window on the roof, covering it with transparent (or translucent) material. The ark had a door in the side.

In addition to Noah and his family, eight persons in all (Gen. 7:7; 2 Pet. 2:5), one pair of all "unclean" animals, seven pairs of all that were "clean," and seven pairs of birds, with a contingent of "creeping things," were to be sheltered in the ark. As to the possibility of housing the animals, we must consider the extent of the flood, etc. See FLOOD.

2. The Ark of Bulrushes (Heb. same as above). In Exod. 2:3 it is recorded that when the mother of Moses could no longer hide him, she placed him among the reeds of the Nile in an ark (boat) of bulrushes, daubed with slime and pitch. This ark was made from the papyrus reed, which grows in the marshy places of Egypt. Pliny says that "from the plant itself they weave boats; and boats of this material were noted for their swiftness." They are alluded to in Isa. 18:2.

3. Ark of the Covenant (Heb. אֲרוֹן, or אֲרֹן, ar-roné', the common name for a chest or coffer).

(1) Names. It was called the "ark of the covenant" (Num. 10:33; Deut. 31:26; Heb. 9:4, etc.), because in it were deposited the two tables of stone, upon which were written the ten commandments, the terms of God's covenant with Israel; "the ark of the testimony" (Exod. 25:16, 22), the commandments being God's testimony respecting his own holiness and the people's sin; "the ark of God" (1 Sam. 3:3; 4:11), as the throne of the divine presence. For full description, see TABERNACLE.

(2) History. The history of the ark is in accordance with its intensely moral character. As the symbol of the Lord's presence, it was borne by the priests in advance of the host (Num. 10:33; Deut. 1:33; see also Psa. 132:8). At its presence the waters of Jordan separated, and only when it was carried to the farther shore did the waters resume their wonted course (Josh. 3:11-17; 4:7, 11, 18). The ark was carried about Jericho at the time of its downfall (Josh. 6:4-12). Very naturally, the neighboring nations, ignorant of spiritual worship, looked upon the ark as the god of Israel (1 Sam. 4:6, 7), a delusion which may have been strengthened by the figures of the cherubim upon it.

The ark remained at Shiloh until the time of Eli, when it was carried along with the army, in the hope that it would secure victory for the Israelites against the Philistines. The latter were not only victorious, but also captured the ark (1 Sam. 4:3-11); but they were glad to return it after seven months (5:7). It was taken to Kirjath-jearim (7:2), where it remained until the time of David. Its removal to Jerusalem was delayed three months by the death of Uzzah while carelessly handling it. Meanwhile it rested in the house of Obad-edom, from which it was taken, with greatest rejoicing, to Mount Zion (2 Sam. 6:1-19).

When the temple was completed the ark was deposited in the sanctuary (1 Kings 8:6-9). In 2 Chron. 35:3 the Levites were directed to restore it to the holy place. It may have been moved to make room for the "carved image" that Manasseh placed "in the house of God" (2 Chron. 33:7); or possibly on account of the purification and repairs of the temple by Josiah. When the temple was destroyed by the Babylonians the ark was probably removed or destroyed (2 Esdr. 10:21, 22).

ARKITE (אַרְכִי, ar-kee', a tush, Gen. 10:17; 1 Chron. 1:15), the name of a race descended from Canaan (Gen. 10:17), "and, from the context, evidently located in the N. of Phœnicia." It is generally connected with the Ἀρκην τῆν ἐν τῷ Λιβάνῳ of Josephus (Ant., i, 6, §2), and the classical Arca, called, as the birthplace of Alexander Severus, Cæsarea Libani. The modern 'Arka "lies on the coast, two to two and a half hours from the shore, about twelve miles N. of Tripoli and five S. of the Wahr el Khebir (Eleutherus). Arca was well known to the Crusaders. —W. H.

ARM (Hebrew usually זְרֹעַ, zer-o'-al), the common instrument of strength and agency, is often used in Scripture as the emblem of power. The "arm" of God is only another expression for his might (Psa. 89:13; Isa. 53:1). Hence a stretched-out arm, making bare his arm, ascribed to God, signifies his power and promptness to protect or punish (Exod. 6:6; Deut. 4:34; Isa. 52:10), a figure taken from the attitude of ancient warriors. To break the arm means to destroy one's power (1 Sam. 2:31; Job 22:9, etc.).

ARMAGEDDON (Gr. Ἀρμαγεδδών, ar-mag-ed-dohn', from Heb. הַר מְגִדּוֹ, har, hill or city of Megiddo, Rev. 16:16). Megiddo occupied a very marked position on the southern rim of the plain of Esdraelon, the great battlefield of Palestine. It was famous for two great victories: of Barak over the Canaanites (Judg. 4:18), and of Gideon over the Midianites (Judg. 7); and for two great disasters: the deaths of Saul (1 Sam. 31:8) and of Josiah (2 Kings 23:29, 30; 2 Chron. 35:22). Armageddon becomes a poetical expression for terrible and final conflict; and in the Apocalypse the reference is to the discomfiture of the people of God, as represented by Josiah and his army, by the profane worldly power. To the apocalypticist this was a fit type of a similar but much grander event in the far distant future, in which the ungodly world should rise up with such concentrated force as to gain the ascendancy over a degenerate though still professing Church.

ARMENIA (Heb. אֲרָמֶיָה, ar-aw-rat', 2 Kings 19:37; Isa. 37:38), in western Asia. It extends from the Black Sea to the Caspian Sea, and from the Caucasus to the Taurus. Here the Old Testament locates Paradise (Gen. 2:12). In Scripture the country is mentioned under several names, which, however, seem to apply to various parts of it. Probably Ararat (Gen. 8:4; 2 Kings 19:37; Isa. 37:38; Jer. 51:27) indicates the eastern part. Three provinces of Armenia are mentioned in Jer. 51:27—Ararat, Minni, and Ashchenaz.

ARMHOLE. See GLOSSARY OBSOLETE and ARCHAIC WORDS.

ARMLET. This word is not used in the A. V., being rendered in 2 Sam. 1:10 by "the bracelet on his arm." See BRACELET.

ARMONI (Heb. אֲרֹמֹנִי, ar-mo-nee', of a fortress), the first named of the two sons of Saul, by Rizpah, who was given up by David to be hanged by the Gibeonites. He was slain with six of his brethren in the beginning of the barley harvest (2 Sam. 21:8, sq.), B. C. about 966.

ARMOR, ARMS. The weapons of the nations mentioned in the Bible were essentially the same, with modifications according to age and country. In giving a description of the several weapons, we adopt the ordinary division of Offensive Weapons (Arms) and Defensive Weapons (Armor).

In order to aid the reader we present (see p. 84) the figure of a Greek heavy-armed warrior, showing most of the weapons of offense and defense

Battle-axes and Spears.

This will not, however, include all the weapons used by the people under consideration.

1. Offensive Weapons. (1) Battle-ax and Mace. The most primitive of weapons were the club and the throwing bat. The club at first consisted of a heavy piece of wood, of various shapes, used in hand-to-hand fighting. The mace (Heb. בַּרְזֵל, bar-zel') was of wood, bound with bronze, about two and one half feet long, with an angular piece of metal projecting from the handle, perhaps intended as a guard. At the striking end it was sometimes furnished with a ball. Maces were borne by the heavy infantry, and each charioteer was furnished with one. The Egyptian battle-ax was about two or two and one half feet long, with a single blade secured by bronze pins, and the handle bound in that part to prevent splitting. The blade was shaped like the segment of a circle and made of bronze or steel. The poleax was about three feet in length, with a large metal ball, to which the blade was fixed. Allusions to these weapons are supposed to occur in Psa. 2:9; 35:3; Prov. 25:18. The throwstick is the same weapon seen figured on Egyptian and Assyrian monuments. "Axes" (Ezek. 26:9), literally irons, is used figuratively for weapons or instruments of war.

(2) Sword (Heb. קֶרֶב, khel'-reb). The Egyptian sword was short and straight, from two and one half to three feet in length, usually double-edged and tapering to a point, and was used to cut and thrust. The king's sword was worn in his girdle, and was frequently surmounted by one or two heads of a hawk, the symbol of the sun, a title given to Egyptian kings. The sword thus worn was really a dagger, a common Egyptian weapon.

It was from seven to ten inches in length, tapering gradually to a point, the blade, made of bronze, being thicker in the middle than at the edges. Assyrian swords were often richly decorated, the hilt arranged with lions' heads so arranged as to form both handle and crossbar. The sword of the Greeks and Romans generally had a straight two-edged blade, rather broad, and of nearly equal width from hilt to point. It was worn on the left side.

The sword of the Hebrew resembled that of other oriental nations, and appears to have been short. That of Ehud was only a cubit (from eighteen to twenty-two inches) long. It was carried in a sheath held by the girdle (1 Sam. 17:39; 2 Sam. 20:8); hence the expression "to gird one's self" with a sword means to commence war; and "to loose the sword," to finish it (1 Kings 20:11).

Figurative. The sword itself is the symbol of war and slaughter (Lev. 26:25; Isa. 34:5, etc.), of divine judgment (Deut. 32:41; Psa. 17:13; Jer. 12:12; Rev. 1:16), and of power and authority (Rom. 13:4). The word of God is called "the sword" of the Spirit (Eph. 6:17). The sword is used in Scripture as illustrative of the word of God (Eph. 6:17; Heb. 4:12); Christ (Isa. 49:2; Rev. 1:16); the justice of God (Deut. 32:41; Zech. 13:7); the protection of God (Deut. 33:29); severe calamities (Ezek. 5:2, 17; 14:17; 21:9); deep mental affliction (Luke 2:35); the wicked (Psa. 17:13); their tongue (Psa. 57:4; 64:3; Prov. 12:18); their persecuting spirit (Psa. 37:14); their end (Prov. 5:4); false witnesses (Prov. 25:18); judicial authority (Rom. 13:4). Drawing of sword is figurative of war and destruction (Lev. 26:33; Ezek. 21:3-5); sheathing it, of peace and friendship (Jer. 47:6); living by it, of rapine (Gen. 27:40); not departing, of perpetual calamity (2 Sam. 12:10).

(3) The Spear, Javelin, Dart. The spear is a weapon common to all nations of antiquity. That of the Egyptians was of wood, from five to six feet long, with the head of bronze or iron, usually with a double edge like that of the Greeks. The javelin was similar to the spear, but lighter and shorter, the upper extremity of the shaft terminating with a bronze knob surmounted by a ball. It was sometimes used as a spear for thrusting, and sometimes it was darted, the knob of the extremity keeping it from escaping the warrior's hand. The spear of the Assyrian infantry was short, scarcely exceeding the height of a man. That of the cavalry was longer. Several kinds of spears are mentioned in Scripture, but how the several terms used are to be understood is somewhat uncertain. (a) The קֶרֶב, khan-eeth', a "spear" of the largest kind, was the weapon of Goliath (1 Sam. 17:7, 45; 2 Sam. 21:19; 1 Chron. 20:5), and also of other giants (2 Sam. 23:21; 1 Chron. 11:23) and mighty warriors (2 Sam. 2:23; 23:18; 1 Chron. 11:11, 20). It was the habitual companion of King Saul, and it was this heavy weapon, and not the lighter "javelin," that he cast at David (1 Sam. 18:10, 11; 19:9, 10) and at Jonathan (20:33). (b) Apparently lighter than the preceding was the קֶרֶב, kee-dohn', or javelin. When not in action the kee-dohn' was carried on the back of the warrior (1 Sam. 17:6, A. V. "target"). (c) Another kind of spear was רֹמַח , ro'-makh. In the historical books it occurs in Num. 25:7 and 1 Kings 18:28, and frequently in the later books, as in 1 Chron. 12:8 ("buckler"); 2 Chron. 11:12. (d) The קֶלֶבֶט , sheh'-lakh, was probably a lighter missile, or dart (see 2 Chron. 23:10; 32:5, "darts;" Neh. 4:17, 28, see marg.; Job 33:18; 36:12; Joel 2:8). (e) שַׁיִבֵּט , shay'-bet, a rod or staff, is used once only to denote a weapon (2 Sam. 18:14).

Figurative. The spear is used figuratively of the bitterness of the wicked (Psa. 57:4); the instruments and effects of God's wrath (Hab. 3:11).

(4) Bow and Arrow. The bow was the principal weapon of offense among the Egyptians, Assyrians, and Hebrews. That of the Egyptians was a round piece of wood, from five to five and one half feet long, either straight or bending in the middle when unstrung. The string was made of hide, catgut, or string. The Assyrian archer was equipped in all respects like the Egyptian, the bow being either long and slightly curved or short and almost angular. Among the Hebrews the bow (Heb. קֶלֶבֶט , keh'-sheth) and arrow (קֶלֶבֶט , khayts) are met with very early in their history, both for the chase (Gen. 21:20; 27:3) and war (48:22). In later times archers accompanied the armies of the Philistines (1 Sam. 31:3; 1 Chron. 10:3) and of the Syrians (1 Kings 22:34). Among the Hebrews captains high in rank (2 Kings 9:24), and even kings' sons (1 Sam. 18:4), carried the bow, and were expert in its use (2 Sam. 1:22). The tribe of Benjamin seems to have been especially addicted to archery (1 Chron. 8:40; 12:2; 2 Chron. 14:8; 17:17); but there were also bowmen among Reuben, Gad, Manasseh (1 Chron. 5:18), and Ephraim (Psa. 78:9). Of the form of the bow we can gather almost nothing. It seems to have been bent by the aid of the foot (1 Chron. 5:18; 8:40; 2 Chron. 14:8; Isa. 5:28; Psa. 7:12, etc.). Bows of steel, or rather brass, are mentioned as if specially strong (2 Sam. 22:35; Job 20:24). It is possible that in 1 Chron. 12:2 a kind of bow for shooting bullets or stones is alluded to (Wisd. 5:22, "stone-bow"). The arrows were carried in quivers (Heb. קֶלֶבֶט , tel'-ee') hung on the shoulder or at the left side. They were probably of reed, and mostly tipped with flint points; others were of wood tipped with metal, about thirty inches long and winged with three rows of feathers. They were sometimes poisoned (Job 6:4), or tipped with combustible materials ("fiery darts," τὰ περιωρημένα, pep-oo-ro-men'-ah, those set on fire, Eph. 6:16).

Figurative. This word is frequently used as the symbol of calamity or disease sent by God (Job 6:4; 34:6; Psa. 38:2; Deut. 32:23); the metaphor deriving propriety and force from the popular belief that all diseases were immediate and special inflictions from heaven. Lightnings are described as the arrows of God (Psa. 18:14; 144:6; Hab. 3:11). "The arrow that flieth by day" (Psa. 91:5) denotes some sudden danger. The arrow is also figurative of anything injurious, as a deceitful tongue (Jer. 9:8), a bitter word (Psa. 64:3), a false witness (Prov. 25:18). A good use of "arrow" is in Psa. 127:4, 5, where children are compared to "arrows in the hand of a mighty man;"—i. e., instruments of power and action. The word is also used to denote the efficiency of God's word (Psa. 45:5). The battle bow is figurative for weapons of war and the military power (Zech. 9:10; 10:4).

(5) The Sling (Heb. קֶלֶבֶט , keh'-lah) may be justly reckoned as among the most ancient instruments of warfare (Job 41:28). This weapon was common among the Egyptians, Assyrians, and Hebrews. Later the Greek and Roman armies contained large numbers of slingers. The weapon was very simple, being made of a couple of strings of sinew, leather, or rope, with a leathern receptacle in the middle to receive the stone. After being swung once or twice around the head it was discharged by letting go one of the strings. Besides stones, plummets of lead shaped like an acorn were used, and could be thrown to the distance of six hundred feet. The stones were selected for their smoothness (1 Sam. 17:40), and were considered as munitions of war. In action they were either carried in a bag (1 Sam. 17:40) or lay in a heap at the feet of the slinger. Among the Hebrews the Benjamites were especially expert slingers (Judg. 20:16; comp. 1 Chron. 12:2).

Figurative. The rejection of one by Jehovah

Its object was to make a breach in the wall of a beleaguered town.

2. Defensive Weapons. (1) The Shield.

The ancient soldier's chief defense, his shield, was various in form and material. The shield of the Egyptian was about one half his height, and generally about twice as high as broad. It was probably formed of a wooden frame covered with rawhide, having the hair outward, with one or more rims of metal and metal studs. Its form resembled a funeral tablet, circular at the top and square at the base. A rare form of Egyptian shield was of extraordinary size and pointed at the top. The shields of the Assyrians in the more ancient bas-reliefs are both circular and oblong; sometimes of gold and silver, but more frequently of wicker work, covered with hides. The shield in a siege covered the soldier's whole person, and at the top had a curved point or a square projection like a roof, at right angles with the body of the shield. This was to defend the combatants against missiles thrown from the walls.

Shield is the rendering in the A. V. of the following words, of which the first two are the most frequent and important: (a) The tsin-naw' (Heb. צִנְנָה, protection) was large enough to cover the whole body (Psa. 5:12; 91:4). When not engaged in conflict it was carried by the armor-bearer is represented by the expression, "The souls of thine enemies, them shall he sling out, as out of the middle of a sling" (1 Sam. 25:29); while in Zechariah (9:15) sling stones represent the enemies of God, which "are trampled under feet like sling stones."

(6) Engine, Battering-ram. (a) Klish-shaw-bone' (Heb. קִלִּישׁ-שָׁבוֹן, contrivance). The engines which went by this name (2 Chron. 26:15) were the balista, used for throwing stones, and the catapulta, for arrows, an enormous stationary bow. Both of these engines were of various throwing power, stones being thrown of from fifty to three hundred pounds weight. Darts varied from small beams to large arrows, and their range exceeded one quarter mile. All these engines were constructed on the principle of the string, the bow, or spring. (b) Mekh-ec' (Heb. מִכָּהֶצֶק, stroke, Ezek. 26:9), the battering-ram, so rendered (Ezek. 4:2; 21:22; Heb. כָּר, kar, butting). This instrument was well known both to the Egyptians and the Assyrians. The ram was a simple machine, consisting of a metal head affixed to a beam, which might be long enough to need one or two hundred men to lift and impel it. When it was still heavier it was hung in a movable tower and became a wonderful engine of war.

(1 Sam. 17:7, 41). The word is used with "spear" as a formula for weapons generally (1 Chron. 12:24; 2 Chron. 11:12). (b) The maw-gane' (Heb. מַוְגָּנָה) was smaller, a buckler or target, probably for hand-to-hand fighting. The difference in size between this and the above-mentioned shield is evident from 1 Kings 10:16, 17; 2 Chron. 9:15, 16, where twice as much gold is named as being used for the latter as for the former. This shield is usually coupled with light weapons, as the bow

(2 Chron. 14:8) and darts (32:5). (c) The sheh'-let (Heb. שֵׁלֶט). The form of this shield is not well known. Although by some it is translated "quiver," and by others "weapons" generally, it is evident that shields is proper by comparing 2 Kings 11:10 with 2 Chron. 23:9; 2 Sam. 8:7; 1 Chron.

18:7, 8. The so-khay-raw' (Heb. סוּחַרְרָה, "buckler") is found only in Psa. 91:4, and is used poetically. (d) Finally, we have the Gr. θυρεός, thoo-reh-os' (Eph. 6:16), a large oblong and square shield. The ordinary shield among the Hebrews consisted of a wooden frame covered with leather, and could be easily burned (Ezek. 39:9). Some shields were covered with brass, or copper, and when shone upon by the sun caused the redness mentioned in Nah. 2:3. Shields were rubbed with oil to render the leather smooth and slippery, and to prevent its being injured by the wet (2 Sam. 1:21, 22; Isa. 21:5), as well as to keep the metal from rusting. Except in actual conflict, the shield was kept covered (Isa. 22:6). The golden shields mentioned in connection with the equipment of armies (1 Macc. 6:30) were most probably only gilt; on the contrary, those of the generals of Hadadezer (2 Sam. 8:7) and those Solomon made (1 Kings 10:16, sq.; 14:26) are to be regarded as ornamental pieces of massive gold, such as were later sent to Rome as gifts (1 Macc. 14:24; 15:18). Brazen shields also occur only in connection with leaders and royal guards (1 Sam. 17:6; 1 Kings 14:27).

was usually of linen cloth quilted, which served as an effectual protection to the head, without the inconvenience of metal in a hot climate. The Assyrian helmet assumed different shapes in different ages, but its earliest form was a cap of iron, terminating in a point, and sometimes furnished with flaps, covered with metal scales, protecting the ears and neck and falling over the shoulders.

We find several references to the ko'-bah (Heb. כֹּבֵּעַ, twice קִרְבַּע) as being in use among the Hebrews. They seem to have been commonly of brass (1 Sam. 17:38).

Figurative. In Isa. 59:17 Jehovah is represented as arming himself for the defense of man, and among other articles he puts on is "a helmet of salvation," seeming to teach that salvation is the crowning act of God. The helmet as a part of the Christian's armor represents salvation (Eph. 6:17), "the hope" of salvation (1 Thess. 5:8, Gr. περσποικίαις, per-ee-poy'-ay-sis, an obtaining).

(3) The Breastplate, or Cuirass. The earliest material used to protect the body was probably the skins of beasts, which were soon abandoned for coats of mail. The cuirass of the Egyptians consisted of about eleven horizontal rows of metal plates, well secured by brass pins, with narrower rows forming a protection for the throat and neck. Each plate, or scale, was about an inch in width. In length the cuirass may have been little less than two and one half feet, covering the thigh nearly to the knee; and in order to prevent its pressing too heavily on the shoulder it was bound with a girdle about the waist. Usually, however, that part of the body below the girdle was protected by a kind of kilt, detached from the girdle. Such was the covering of the heavy-armed troops. With the light-armed infantry, and, indeed, among the Asiatic nations in general, the quilted linen cuirass was in much demand.

The Breastplate.

Figurative. The shield is illustrative of God's protection (Gen. 15:1; Deut. 33:29; 2 Sam. 22:3; Psa. 3:3; 5:12; 28:7; 33:20; 59:11; 84:9, 11; 115:9-11; 119:114; 144:2); truth of God (Psa. 91:4); salvation of God (2 Sam. 22:36; Psa. 18:35); of faith (Eph. 6:16).

(2) The Helmet. The helmet of the Egyptians

The Assyrians used coats of scale armor and embroidered tunics, both of felt and leather. Among the Hebrews we have (a) the breastplate (Heb. שִׁירְיוֹן, shir-yone', glittering), enumerated in the description of the arms of Goliath, a "coat of mail," literally, a "breastplate of scales" (1 Sam. 17:6), and further (v. 38), where shiryone alone is rendered "coat of mail." It may be noticed that this passage contains the most complete inventory of the furniture of a warrior to be found in the whole of the sacred history. Shiryone also occurs in 1 Kings 22:34 and 2 Chron. 18:33. The last passage is very obscure; the real meaning is probably "between the joints and the breastplate." (b) The takh-ar-aw' (Heb. תַּחְאֲרָאוֹ, takh-ar-aw') is mentioned but twice—in reference to the gown of the high priest (Exod. 28:32; 39:28). Like the English "habergeon," it was probably a quilted shirt or doublet put on over the head. Both of these terms are rendered "habergeon" (Exod. 28:30; 39:23; Job 41:26; 2 Chron. 26:14; Neh. 4:16).

Figurative. Being an efficient means of protection for the body, it is used metaphorically for defense: "the breastplate of righteousness" (Eph. 6:14), and "the breastplate of faith and love" (1 Thess. 5:8).

(4) Greaves (Heb. מִיטְחָוִי, mits-khaw', literally, a facing), for covering the leg, made of brass and widely known among the ancients, are mentioned in the A. V. only in the case of Goliath (1 Sam. 17:6), and the war boot (Heb. שַׁחְוִי, sch-own'), a sort of half boot made of leather, studded with strong nails, only in Isa. 9:5 (literally, "every shoe"). We infer, therefore, that they did not belong to the common armor of the Hebrews.

(5) Girdle (Heb. אַיִזֹרֶת, ay-zore'), from which the sword was suspended, is frequently mentioned among the articles of military dress (Isa. 5:27; Eph. 6:14). It was of leather, studded with metal plates. When the armor was light the girdle was broad and girt about the hips; otherwise it supported the sword scarfwise from the shoulder. See GIRDLE.

ARMOR-BEARER (Heb. נֹשֵׂא טַחֲשָׁנִים, naw-saw' kel-ee'), a person selected by prominent officers to bear their armor, to stand by them in danger, and to carry their orders, somewhat as adjutants in modern service (Judg. 9:54; 1 Sam. 14:6; 16:21; 31:4).

ARMORY, the place in which armor was deposited. In Neh. 3:19 mention is made of "the armory at the turning of the wall" in Jerusalem; probably the arsenal ("house of armor") which Hezekiah showed with so much pride to the Babylonian ambassadors (Isa. 39:2, Heb. נְחֹשֶׁת, neh'-shek). A poetical allusion is made to armory in Cant. 4:4 (Heb. תַּלְפֵּי־יָדַי, tal-pee-yaw'). In Jer. 50:25 God is said to have "opened his armory" (Heb. פָּתַח אֹצֵרוֹ, o-tsawr).

ARMY, represented in Scripture by several Hebrew and Greek names.

1. Jewish. Although Israel was not to be a conquering people, yet it had to defend itself against hostile attacks, at first in the wilderness and afterward in the promised land. Hence Israel marched out of Egypt (Exod. 12:41; 13:18), as the host of Jehovah, armed. As such, the people were arranged according to their tribes and divisions of tribes (Num. 1-4), and every man above twenty years of age was enrolled for military service (Num. 1, sq.; 26:2) with the exception of the Levites (Num. 2:33). Up to what age military duty lasted is not given. Josephus states (Ant., iii, 12, 4) that it was to the fiftieth year.

In time of war the number of fighting men needed was collected from the different tribes under the direction of inspectors (Heb. שְׁטָרֵי־מִלְחָמָה, sho-teh-reem', Deut. 20:5; 2 Kings 25:19), by whom also the officers were appointed (Deut. 20:9). The principle on which these levies were made is not known to us. The law provided that anyone having built a new house, not yet consecrated; having planted a vineyard, and not having as yet enjoyed its fruit; or having betrothed but not yet married a wife, should not go to battle (Deut. 20:5-7). The fainthearted were also dismissed, in order that they should not discourage their brethren (Deut. 20:8). The army thus constituted was divided into companies of thousands, hundreds, and fifties under their respective officers (Num. 31:14), and still further into families (Num. 2:34; 2 Chron. 25:5; 26:12); each father's house probably forming a detachment, led by the most valiant among them. The provisioning of the army was laid on each tribe (Judg. 20:10; 1 Sam. 17:17, sq.). From the time of Moses to that of David the army of Israel consisted of footmen (1 Sam. 15:4), and from the time Israel entered into Canaan until the establishment of the kingdom little progress was made in military affairs.

During the kingdom. Soon after the establishment of the kingdom a standing army was set up, the nucleus of which was the band of three thousand men selected by Saul (1 Sam. 13:2; 24:2), and to which he constantly added men (1 Sam. 14:52). Before David became king he had a band of six hundred men, gathered in his wars with Saul (1 Sam. 23:13, 25:13), from whom his most noted captains were chosen (2 Sam. 23:8, sq.). To these he added the Cherethites and Pelethites (2 Sam. 8:18; 15:18; 20:7). Moreover, he organized a national militia in twelve divisions, each consisting of twenty-four thousand, and responsible for a month's service every year (1 Chron. 27:1). At the head of the army when in active service was a commander-in-chief ("captain of the host," 1 Sam. 14:50).

The army hitherto had consisted entirely of infantry (1 Sam. 4:10; 15:4), the use of horses having been prohibited (Deut. 17:16). David had reserved a hundred chariots from the spoil of the Syrians (2 Sam. 8:4), which probably served as the foundation of the force which Solomon enlarged through his alliance with Egypt (1 Kings 10:26, 28, 29).

The army, with the exception of a regularly maintained bodyguard (1 Kings 14:28; 2 Kings 11:4, 11), was, strictly speaking, only a national militia, not in constant service, but in time of peace at home engaged in agriculture, and without pay. Even in war their pay probably consisted only of supplies, and a fixed portion of the spoil. These arrangements were kept up by his successors, and by some of them the military power was greatly strengthened by foot and horse (2 Chron. 14:8; 17:14; 25:5, etc.). Sometimes foreign troops were hired as auxiliaries (2 Chron. 25:6).

"With regard to the arrangement and maneuvering of the army in the field, little is known. A division into three bodies is frequently mentioned (Judg. 7:16; 9:43; 1 Sam. 11:11). Jehoshaphat divided his army into five bodies, but retained the threefold principle of division, the heavy-armed troops of Judah being considered as the proper army, and the two divisions of light-armed of the tribe of Benjamin as an appendage (2 Chron. 17:14-18)." It is very difficult to ascertain the numerical strength of the Jewish army, the numbers given in the text being manifestly incorrect. The discipline and arrangement of the army was gradually assimilated to that of the Romans, and the titles of officers borrowed from it.

2. Roman Army. The Roman army was divided into legions, the number of soldiers in a legion varying at different times. These legions were commanded by six tribuni ("chief captains," Acts 21:31), who commanded by turns. The tenth part of a legion, containing three hundred men, was called a cohors, cohort ("band," Acts 10:1); the cohort was divided into three maniples, and the maniple into two centuries, originally containing one hundred men, but later varying according to the strength of the legion. These centuries were under the command of centurions (Acts 10:1, 22; Matt. 8:5; 27:54). There were in addition to the legionary cohorts independent cohorts of volunteers. One of these was called the Italian (Acts 10:1), as consisting of volunteers from Italy. There is a cohort named "Augustus" (Acts 27:1), which Meyer (Com., in loc.) thinks to mean "the imperial cohort, one of the five cohorts stationed at Cæsarea, and regarded as bodyguard of the emperor, employed here on special service affecting the emperor." See WAR.

AR'NAN (Heb. אֲרָנָן, ar-naun', nimble), probably the great-grandson of Zerubbabel, in the line of David's descendants (1 Chron 3:21), perhaps the same with Joanna (Luke 3:27), an ancestor of Jesus.

AR'NON (Heb. אֲרָנוֹן, ar-nohn', murmur), a river rising in the mountains of Gilead, E. of the Jordan, and reaching the Dead Sea through a stony and precipitous chasm of red and yellow sandstone. The name is also applied to the valley, or valleys, now known as "Wady Mojib, an enormous trench across the plateau of Moab. It is about seventeen hundred feet deep, and two miles broad from edge to edge of the cliffs which bound it, but the floor of the valley over which the stream winds is only forty yards wide. About thirteen miles from the Dead Sea the trench divides into two branches, one running N. E., the other S. S. E., and each of them again dividing into two. . . . Properly all the country from Jabok to Arnon belonged northward to Ammon, southward to Moab. But shortly before Israel's arrival, SIRON (q. v.), an Amorite king from western Palestine, had crossed the Jordan, and driving Moab southward over Arnon, and Ammon eastward to the sources of the Jabok, had founded a kingdom for himself between the two rivers" (Smith, Hist.

Geog., p. 558, sq.). It was afterward taken possession of by Israel on its way to Palestine, and Arnon became the boundary between Israel and Moab (Num. 21:13, 26; Josh. 12:1; Judg. 11:22; Isa. 16:2; Jer. 48:20).

A'ROD (Heb. אֲרוֹד, ar-ode', a wild ass), the sixth son of Gad (Num. 26:17), whose descendants were called Arodites, B. C. about 1700. He is called Arodi (Gen. 46:16).

AR'ODI, A'RODITE. See ARON.

AR'OER (Heb. אֲרוֹר, ar-o-ayr', nudity).

1. A town on the N. bank of the Arnon (Deut. 2:36; 3:12; 4:48; Josh. 12:2; 13:9, 16; Judg. 11:26; 1 Chron. 5:8). As the southernmost town of Israel E. of Jordan, it has been called "the Beer-sheba of the East." Now called Arair, thirteen miles W. of the Dead Sea.

2. A town built by the Gadites (Num. 32:34; Josh. 13:25; Judg. 11:33; 2 Sam. 24:5), connected with the history of Jephthah.

3. A city S.-W. of Beer-sheba, associated with David and his warriors (1 Sam. 30:26-28; 1 Chron. 11:44), called now Ararah.

AR'OERITE (Heb. אֲרוֹרִי, ar-o-ay-ree'), an inhabitant of Aroer (No. 3), probably that in the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 11:44).

AR'PAD, or AR'PHAD (Heb. אֲרַפַּד, ar-pawd', spread out), a Syrian city near Damascus and Hamath, having its own king (2 Kings 19:13; 18:34; Isa. 10:9; Jer. 49:23), captured by the Assyrian king Tiglath-pileser II. It is rendered Arphad (Isa. 36:19; 37:13).

ARPHAX'AD (Heb. אֲרַפַּח־אֲדָם, ar-pak-shad', border or fortress of the Chaldeans), the first antediluvian patriarch, son of Shem, and father of Salah, born two years after the deluge, and died aged four hundred and thirty-eight years (Gen. 11:10-13; 1 Chron. 1:17, 18).

ARROW. See ARMOR, I, 4.

ARTAXERX'ES (Heb. אֲרַחְשָׁתָרְסָס, artakh-shash-taw'; Gr. Ἀρταξέρξης, ar-tux-er'-zace, probably the great warrior or king).

1. The Persian king who, at the instigation of the enemies of the Jews, obstructed the rebuilding of the temple (Ezra 4:7-24), B. C. 522, which ceased until the second year of Darius, B. C. 520. He is doubtless the same with the Magian impostor Smerdis, who seized the throne B. C. 522, and was murdered after a usurpation of eight months.

2. Probably Longimanus, who reigned over Persia forty years, B. C. 464-425. In the seventh year of his reign he commissioned Ezra to return to Jerusalem, granting large privileges to him and those accompanying him (Ezra 7:1, sq.), B. C. 457. About thirteen years later (B. C. 445) he granted permission to Nehemiah to assume control of the civil affairs at Jerusalem (Neh. 2:1-8).

ARTEMAS (Gr. Ἀρτεμάς, ar-tem-as', gift of Artemis, i. e., Diana), the name of a disciple mentioned in connection with Tycheus, one of whom Paul designed to send into Crete to supply the place of Titus, when he invited the latter to visit him at Nicopolis (Tit. 3:12), A. D. 65. According to tradition, he was bishop of Lystra.

ARTIFICER (Heb. חֹרֵשׁ, kho-rashé', or חָרָשׁ, khan-ransh'), a fabricator of any material, as carpenter, smith, engraver, etc. (Gen. 4:22; 1 Chron. 29:5; 2 Chron. 34:11; Isa. 3:3). See HANDICRAFT.

ARTILLERY (Heb. כֶּלִי, kel-ee', prepared), used of the armor (quiver, bow and arrows) of Jonathan (1 Sam. 20:40). See GLOSSARY.

ARTS. See HANDICRAFT.

AR'UBOTH (Heb. אֲרֻבוֹת, ar-oob-both', latitudes), a city or district, mentioned (1 Kings 4:10) as the purveyorship of the son of Heseid. "From the fact that it included Sochoh it would seem to have been a district of Judah; but as there were two Sochohs in Judah it is impossible to determine whether the one mentioned here was upon the mountains (Josh. 15:48) or in the plain (v. 35). The fact that it is associated with the land of Hopher rather favors the latter" (Keil, Com., in loc.).

ARU'MAH (Heb. אֲרוּמָה, ar-oo-maw', height), a place, in the neighborhood of Shechem, where dwelt Abimelech, the son of Gideon (Judg. 9:41).

AR'VAD (Heb. אֲרַוַד, ar-vad', place of fugitives), an island off the coast of Phœnicia, rocky, two miles from the shore, and peopled by mariners and soldiers (Ezek. 27:8, 11). Thomson says the island of Ruwad is a little more than two miles from the shore to the S. of Tartus. On that small island are Phœnician remains; there "the family" of the Arvadites are supposed to have settled.

AR'VADITE (Gen. 10:18; 1 Chron. 1:16), an inhabitant of the island of Aradus, or ARVAD (q. v.). The Arvadites were descended from the sons of Canaan (Gen. 10:18). They appear to have been in some dependence upon Tyre, as we find them furnishing a contingent of mariners to that city (Ezek. 27:8, 11). They took their full share in Phœnician maritime affairs, particularly after Tyre and Sidon fell under the dominion of the Greco-Syrian kings.

AR'ZA (Heb. אֲרִזָּה, ar-tsaw', earthenness), a steward over the house of Elah, king of Israel, in whose house, at Tirzah, Zimri, the captain of half his chariots, conspired against ELAH (q. v.), and killed him during a drunken debauch (1 Kings 16:8-10).

A'SA (Heb. אֲסָא, aw-saw', healing).

1. The son and successor of Abijah, king of Judah, who reigned forty-one years (Usher, B. C. 955-914; McCurdy, B. C. 915-875). (1) Religious conduct. On assuming the reins of government, Asa was conspicuous for his support of the worship of God, and opposition to idolatry. Even his grandmother, Maachah, was deposed from the rank of "queen mother" because she had set up an idol, which Asa overthrew and "burnt by the brook Kidron" (1 Kings 15:13). Still, the old hill sanctuaries were retained as places of worship. He placed in the temple gifts dedicated by his father, and rich offerings of his own, and renewed the altar, which had apparently been desecrated (2 Chron. 15:8). (2) Wars. The first ten years of his reign his kingdom enjoyed peace, which Asa improved in fortifying his frontier cities and raising an army, which numbered at the beginning of hostilities five hundred and eighty thousand men (2 Chron. 14:8), though this number has been thought an exaggeration of the copyist. In the eleventh year of his reign Zerah, the Ethiopian, invaded Judah with an army of a million men. Asa besought God for help, and, marching against Zerah, met and defeated him at Mareslah. He returned to Jerusalem with the spoil of the cities around Gerar, and with innumerable sheep and cattle (2 Chron. 14:9-15). The prophet Azariah met Asa on his return, and encouraged him and the people to continue their trust in God. (3) Reforms. Asa carried on his reforms; a gathering of the people was held at Jerusalem, sacrifices were offered, and a covenant was made with Jehovah. To these ceremonies there came many from the kingdom of Israel, believing that God was with Asa (2 Chron. 15). In the thirty-sixth year (according to some twenty-sixth) of his reign hostilities were begun by Baasha, king of Israel, who fortified Ramah, to prevent his subjects from going over to Asa. (4) Alliance with Ben-hadad. The good king then committed the great error of his life. He resorted to an alliance with Ben-hadad I, of Damascus, purchasing his assistance with treasures from the temple and the king's house. Ben-hadad made a diversion in Asa's favor by invading northern Israel, whereupon Baasha left Ramah. Asa took the material found there and built therewith Geba and Mizpah. His want of faith was reproved by the seer Hanani, who told him that he had lost the honor of conquering the Syrians because of this alliance, and also prophesied war for the rest of his days. Asa, angered at Hanani, put him in prison, and oppressed some of the people at the same time (2 Chron. 16:1, sq.). (5) Sickness and death. In the thirty-ninth year of his reign he was afflicted with a disease in his feet, and "sought not to the Lord," but depended upon the physicians. The disease proved fatal in the forty-first year of his reign. He died greatly beloved, and was honored with a magnificent burial (2 Chron. 16:12-14).

2. A Levite, son of Elkanah and father of Berechiah, which latter resided in one of the villages of the Netophathites after the return from Babylon (1 Chron. 9:16), B. C. after 536.

AS'AHHEL (Heb. אֲסָחֵל, as-aw-ale', God's creature).

1. The son of David's sister, Zeruah, and brother of Joab and Abjshai (2 Sam. 2:18; 1 Chron. 2:16). He was an early adherent of David, being one of the famous thirty (2 Sam. 23:24), and, with his son Zebadiah, was commander of the fourth division of the royal army (1 Chron. 27:7). He was renowned for his swiftness of foot, and after the battle of Gibeon he pursued and overtook Abner, who reluctantly, and in order to save his own life, slew Asahel with a back thrust of his spear (2 Sam. 2:18-23), B. C. about 1000. Joab, to revenge Asahel's death, slew Abner some years after at Hebron (2 Sam. 3:26, 27).

2. One of the Levites sent by Jehoshaphat into Judah to teach the law of the Lord (2 Chron. 17:8), B. C. after 875.

3. One of the Levites appointed by Hezekiah as overseer of the contributions to the house of the Lord (2 Chron. 31:13), B. C. about 700.

4. The father of Jonathan, who was one of the elders that assisted Ezra in putting away the foreign wives of the Jews on the return from Babylon (Ezra 10:15), B. C. 457.

ASAHIAH (Heb. אֲסָחִיָּהּ, ah-saw-yaw', created by Jehovah), an officer of Josiah, who was sent with others to consult Huldah, the prophetess, concerning the book of the law found in the temple (2 Kings 22:12-14), B. C. 624.

ASATAH (Heb. אֲסָטָהּ, ah-saw-yaw', whom Jehovah made).

1. A prince of one of the families of the tribe of Simeon who, in the time of Hezekiah, drove out the Hamite shepherds from the rich pastures near Gedor (1 Chron. 4:36), B. C. about 700.

2. The son of Haggiah (1 Chron. 6:30), and chief of the two hundred and twenty Levites of the family of Merari, appointed by David to remove the ark from the house of Obed-edom (1 Chron. 15:6, 11), B. C. after 1000.

3. The "firstborn" of the Shilonites who returned to Jerusalem after the captivity (1 Chron. 9:5), B. C. about 536.

4. The same (2 Chron. 34:20) with ASAPHIAH (q.v.).

A'SAPH (Heb. אֲסָפִי, aw-sawf', collector).

1. The father (or ancestor) of Joah, which latter person was "recorder" in the time of Hezekiah (2 Kings 18:18, 37; Isa. 36:3, 22), B. C. about 710.

2. A Levite, son of Berachiah, of the family of Gershom (1 Chron. 6:39; 15:17), eminent as a musician, and appointed by David to preside over the sacred choral services (1 Chron. 16:5), B. C. after 1000. The "sons of Asaph" are afterward mentioned as choristers of the temple (1 Chron. 25:1, 2; 2 Chron. 20:14, and elsewhere), and this office appears to have been made hereditary in the family (1 Chron. 25:1, 2). Asaph was celebrated in after times as a prophet and poet (2 Chron. 29:30; Neh. 12:46), and the titles of twelve of the Psalms (50, 73-83) bear his name, though in some of these (74, 79, 75) the "sons of Asaph" should be understood, as matters of late occurrence are referred to (Kitto, s. v.).

3. A "keeper of the king's forest," probably in Lebanon. Nehemiah requested Artaxerxes to give him an order on Asaph for timber to be used in the rebuilding of the temple (Neh. 2:8), B. C. about 445.

ASAR'EEL (Heb. אֲסָרְעֵל, as-ar-ale', right of God), the last named of the four sons of Jehaleleel, of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 4:16), B. C. about 1800.

ASARE'LAH (Heb. אֲסָרְעֵלָהּ, as-ar-ale'-aw, right toward God), one of the sons of the Levite Asaph, who was appointed by David in charge of the temple music (1 Chron. 25:2). He is probably the same with Jesharelah (v. 14), and if so, was in the seventh of the (twenty-four) courses, B. C. after 1000.

ASCENSION OF CHRIST, his glorious withdrawal, as to his bodily presence, from the earth, and entrance, as the God-man and mediatorial King, into heaven.

1. The Fact. The ascension was from the Mount of Olives forty days after the resurrection. (1) Predicted in Psa. 68:18; 110:1; then interpreted (Eph. 4:8-10; Heb. 1:13); also by Christ himself (John 6:62; 20:17). (2) Recorded (Mark 16:19; Luke 24:50, 51; Acts 1:9-11). (3) Recognized by St. John (passages above cited), and by other New Testament writers who based doctrines upon it (2 Cor. 13:4; Eph. 2:6; 4:8-10; 1 Pet. 3:22; 1 Tim. 3:16; Heb. 1:13; 6:20). (4) Certified by the disciples who were eyewitnesses; by the words of the two angels; by Stephen and Paul and John, who saw Christ in his ascended state (Acts 1:9-11; 7:55, 56; 9:3-5; Rev. 1:9-18). (5) Demonstrated by the descent of the Holy Spirit on the day of Pentecost (Matt. 3:11; Luke 24:49; Acts 2:1-4, 33), and by the manifold gifts bestowed by the ascended Lord upon his Church (Eph. 4:11, 12).

2. Doctrinal and Ethical Significance. The visible ascension of Christ was the necessary sequel and seal of his resurrection (Rom. 6:9).

Ashdod (Azotus).

It was the appropriate connecting link between his humiliation and glorification (Phil. 2:6-11). As consequences of the ascension the New Testament writers particularly note: (1) The removal of his bodily, but not his spiritual, presence from the earth; Christ "has passed into the heavens," but invisibly he is always near at hand (Heb. 4:14; Matt. 28:20; Acts 23:11; 2 Tim. 4:17). (2) The investiture of Christ with power and dominion in heaven and earth. He is "at the right hand of God" (Matt. 28:18; Phil. 2:10; Heb. 12:2). (3) The perpetual intercession of Christ, as our great High Priest (Rom. 8:34; Heb. 5:20; 7:25). (4) The sending forth of the Holy Spirit, and the bestowment of other gifts upon the Church (Acts 2:33; Eph. 4:11, 12).

Of practical import, accordingly, the ascension of Christ is closely related to the peace and sanctification and hope of believers. (1) He is their heavenly advocate (1 John 2:1). (2) He is still interceding for their perfection (John 17:20-24). (3) They are then encouraged to fidelity and to confident prayer (Heb. 4:14-16). (4) He powerfully attracts them to things above (Col. 3:1-4). (5) He has gone to prepare a place for them (John 14:2). (6) He awaits his perfect triumph over all his foes (Heb. 10:13). (7) He shall come again to judge the world (Acts 1:11; Matt. 25:31, 32).

ASENATH (Heb. אֲסֵנַת, aw-se-nath', probably who belongs to Neith, i. e., the Egyptian Minerva), the daughter of Poti-pherah, priest of On, who became Joseph's wife (Gen. 41:45), B. C. 1715. She became the mother of Ephraim and Manasseh (Gen. 46:20). Beyond this nothing is known concerning her. See SUPPLEMENT.

A'SER, the Grecized form of Asher (Luke 2:36; Rev. 7:6).

ASH. See VEGETABLE KINGDOM.

A'SHAN (Heb. אֲשָׁן, aw-shawn', smoke), a Levitical city (1 Chron. 6:59) in the low country of Judah, assigned first to Judah (Josh. 15:42), again to Simeon (Josh. 19:7; 1 Chron. 4:32) in which last passage it is given as a priests' city). Ain instead of Ashan is used in Josh. 21:16.

ASH'BEA (Heb. אֲשֵׁבַע, ash-bay'-ah, adjuration), the head of a family mentioned as working in fine linen, a branch of the descendants of Shelah, the son of Judah (1 Chron. 4:21).

ASH'BEL (Heb. אֲשֵׁבֶל, ash-bale'), the second son of Benjamin (Gen. 46:21; 1 Chron. 8:1), B. C. about 1700. His descendants were called Ashbelites (Num. 26:38).

ASH'BELITE. See ASHBEL.

ASH'CHENAZ, a less correct form of Anglicizing ASHKENAZ (q. v.), found in 1 Chron 1:6 and Jer. 51:27.

ASH'DOD (Heb. אֲשְׁדֹד, ash-dode', ravager), a town about three miles from the Mediterranean, lying between Joppa and Gaza. One of the five cities of the Philistines (Josh. 13:3; 1 Sam. 6:17). Captured by Uzziah (2 Chron. 26:6). The chief seat of Dagon worship. In the New Testament called Azotus (Acts 8:40).

"Ashdod, like Gaza, takes her name from her military strength. Her citadel was probably the low hill, beside the present village. It was well watered, and commanded the mouth of the most broad and fertile wady in Philistia. It served, also, as the halfway station on the great road between Gaza and Joppa. Ashdod also, like her sisters, had suffered her varying fortunes in the war with Israel, and, like them, suffered for her position in the way between Assyria and Egypt. Sargon besieged and took her (Isa. 20:1, sq.); Sennacherib besieged and took her; but her most wonderful siege, which Herodotus calls the longest in history, was for twenty-two years by Psammetichus. Judas Maccabæus cleared Ashdod of idols in B. C. 163, and in 148 Jonathan and Simon burnt her temple of Dagon" (Smith, Hist. Geog., p. 193).

ASH'DODITES (Neh. 4:7), inhabitants of ASHDOD (q. v.); less correctly rendered Ashdoothites (Josh. 13:3).

ASH'DOTHITES (Heb. אֲשֶׁדּוּתִי, ash-doo-thee'), a less correct mode (Josh. 13:3) of anglicizing the name ASHDODITES (q. v.).

ASH'DOTH-PIS'GAH (Heb. אֲשֶׁדּוּת פִּסְגַּה, ash-doth' pis-gaw', ravines of Pisgah, R. V. "slopes of Pisgah," Deut. 3:17; Josh. 12:3; 13:20. In Deut. 4:49, A. V., it is "springs of Pisgah." Ashdooth is rendered "springs," Josh. 10:40; 12:8, in the A. V., but "slopes" in R. V.). Thomson says: "The springs of 'Ayun Musa are a thousand feet directly below the summit of Jebel Neba, and their biblical name is supposed to have been Ashdooth-pisgah, the streams of Pisgah, mentioned in Deut. 3:17, and elsewhere. That identification, therefore, furnishes additional proof that Jebel Neba, towering above us on the south, is the veritable mountain of Nebo, to the top of which Moses probably ascended from these same streams."

ASHER (Heb. אֲשֶׁר, aw-share', happiness), the eighth son of Jacob, and second of Zilpah, the maid of Leah (Gen. 30:13), before 1640.

1. Personal History. Of this we have no record.

2. The Tribe of Asher. (1) Number. Asher had four sons and one daughter. Upon quitting Egypt the tribe numbered forty-one thousand five hundred, ranking ninth; and at the second census the number had increased to fifty-three thousand four hundred men of war, ranking fifth in population. (2) Position. During the march through the desert Asher's place was between Dan and Naphtali, on the N. side of the tabernacle (Num. 2:27). (3) Territory. The general position of the tribe was on the seashore from Carmel northward, with Manasseh on the S., Zebulun and Issachar on the S. E., and Naphtali on the N. E. The boundaries and towns are given in Josh. 19:24-31; 17:10, 11; Judg. 1:31, 32. (4) Subsequent history. The richness of the soil, and their proximity to the Phœnicians, may have contributed to the degeneracy of the tribe (Judg. 1:31; 5:17). In the reign of David the tribe had become so insignificant that its name is altogether omitted from the list of the chief rulers (1 Chron. 27:16-22). With the exception of Simeon, Asher is the only tribe west of the Jordan which furnished no judge or hero to the nation. "One name alone shines out of the general obscurity—the aged widow 'Anna, the daughter of Phanuel of the tribe of Aser,' who in the very close of the history departed not from the temple, but 'served God with fastings and prayers night and day'" (Stanley, Sinai and Palestine). See SUPPLEMENT.

ASHE'RAH (Heb. אֲשֶׁרָה, ash-ay-raw', A. V. "grove"). Respecting the meaning of Asherah three principal opinions have been advanced. We condense from Dr. Weir's article in the Imperial Bible Dictionary:

1. That Asherah means "grove." There is not a single passage in which the rendering "grove" is unavoidable, but in many it is inadmissible. It is frequently connected with the verbs "to make" (1 Kings 16:33; 2 Kings 17:16; 21:3; 2 Chron. 33:3); "to set up" (2 Chron. 33:19); "to bring out" (2 Kings 23:6). The passage most appealed to in defense of this rendering (Deut. 16:21), "Thou shalt not plant thee a grove (an Asherah) of any trees near unto the altar of the Lord thy God," etc., has for its most obvious meaning, "Thou shalt not plant (Dan. 11:45) near the altar of Jehovah an Asherah formed out of any tree," etc.; and the natural conclusion is that the Asherah was a wooden pillar, or trunk of a tree, to which a symbolical character of some kind was attached.

2. That Asherah was the name of a goddess, nearly identical with Ashtoreth. The passage, "the prophets of the grove" (1 Kings 18:19), seems to support this view at first sight. But in 1 Kings 16:32, 33 it is said that "Ahab set up an altar to Baal in the house of Baal, . . . and Ahab made the Asherah," plainly distinguishing between Baal the divinity in whose honor altars were erected and temples built, and the Asherah, a thing made.

3. That it was a symbolic figure, at first nothing more than the stem of a tree fixed in the ground, afterward a wooden image (2 Kings 21:7). That the Asherah had some intimate connection with the worship of Ashtoreth is evident (1 Kings 16:33; 2 Kings 17:10, 16; 18:4; 21:3, etc.). We must not confound the two, however, for the Scripture always speaks of Ashtoreth as a divinity, followed after, served, and worshipped, but of Asherah as a material symbol, a tree, or a trunk set up.

We are thus led to the conclusion that, just as the stone image was usually the symbol of Baal, so the Asherah of wood was the symbol of Ashtoreth.

ASHERITES, descendants of ASHER (q. v.) and members of his tribe (Judg. 1:32).

ASHES (Heb. אֵפֶן, ay'-fer; Gr. σπόδος, spod-os'; also אֵשֶׁן, deh'-shen, literally, fatness, i. e., the fat ashes from the sacrifices).

1. The ashes on the altar of burnt offering were removed each morning by a priest clad in linen (his official dress); and carried by him, dressed in unofficial dress, to a clean place without the camp (Lev. 6:10, 11). According to the Mishna, the priest who was to remove the ashes was chosen by lot. The ashes of the red heifer (see PURIFICATION) had the ceremonial efficacy of purifying the unclean (Heb. 9:13), but of polluting the clean.

2. Figurative. It has been the custom in all ages to burn captured cities; and so, to reduce a place to ashes is a well-understood expression for effecting a complete destruction (Ezek. 28:18; 2 Pet. 2:6). A very frequent figurative employment of the word is derived from the practice of sitting among ashes, or scattering them upon one's person, as a symbol of grief and mourning (Job 2:8; 42:6; Isa. 58:5; Jer. 6:26; Matt. 11:21, etc.). In Ezek. 27:30 it is declared of the mourning Tyrians that "they shall wallow themselves in the ashes," expressive of great and bitter lamentation. Eating ashes is expressive of the deepest misery and degradation (Psa. 102:9; Isa. 44:20). Ashes are also used to represent things easily scattered, perishable, and, therefore, worthless. Thus Abraham speaks of himself as "dust and ashes" (Gen. 18:27), and the wicked are said to be "ashes under the soles of the feet" to the righteous (Mal. 4:3).

3. The early Christians naturally adopted a ceremony which had acquired so much significance. Tertullian speaks of the "substitution of sackcloth and ashes for a man's usual habit" as a regular ceremony of public confession and penance in the 2d century. Penitents under excommunication used to sprinkle ashes upon their heads, and, standing at the doors of the churches, ask the prayers of those entering, that they might be readmitted to communion.

ASH'IMA, the god of the people of Hamath (2 Kings 17:30). See GODS, FALSE.

ASH'KELON, or AS'KELON (Heb. אֲשְׁכֶלֶן, ash-kel-one', weighing; Gr. Ἀσκήλων), one of the five Philistine royal cities, on the coast of the Mediterranean Sea. Samson went down to Ashkelon when he slew thirty men and took their spoil (Judg. 14:19); it was assigned to the tribe of Judah (Judg. 1:18); it is mentioned in the denunciations of the prophets (Jer. 25:20; 47:5, 7; Amos 1:8; Zeph. 2:4, 7; Zech. 9:5). The town forms a semicircle—in a hollow, declining toward the sea, surrounded on every side by artificial mounds. "Since the fortifications, as at Caesarea, are bound together by pillars of Herod's time, it is certain that the Askalon which Herod embellished (Josephus, Wars, xxi, 11) stood here, though extending farther inland; and there is no hint in Josephus that Herod's Askalon occupied any other site than that of the old Philistine city. . . . During the Crusades Askalon combined within herself the significance of all the fortresses of Philistia, and proved the key to S. W. Palestine. . . . To the Arabs she was the 'Bride of Syria,' 'Syria's Summit.' The Egyptians held her long after the Crusaders were settled in Jerusalem, . . . was captured by Baldwin III in 1154, . . . was retaken by Saladin in 1187, dismantled five years later, and finally demolished in 1270. . . . At Askalon there are visible at low water two shallows of crescent shape, which are perhaps remains of ancient moles, and at the bottom of the rocky basin, in which the mediæval city was confined, explorers think they can trace the lines of a little dock" (Smith Hist. Geog., pp. 131, 189, 190). See SUPPLEMENT.

ASH'KENAZ (Heb. אֲשֶׁן־אֶזַר, ash-ken-az', signification unknown), the first named of the three sons of Gomer, son of Japhet (Gen. 10:3), B. C. about 2347. The name is spelled Ashchenaz in 1 Chron. 1:6, and Jer. 51:27. In the latter, reference is made to his descendants as constituting a kingdom in Armenia, or, at least, not far from it. "There are various conjectures as to its precise locality."

ASH'NAH (Heb. אֲשֶׁן־נָח, ash-naw'), the name of two cities, both in the tribe of Judah (Josh. 15:33, 43). Neither of them has been positively identified.

ASH'PENAZ (Heb. אֲשֶׁן־פְּנָז, ash-pen-az', perhaps horse-nose), the master of the eunuchs, a chamberlain of Nebuchadnezzar, B. C. about 607, who was commanded to select certain Jewish captives to be instructed in "the learning and tongue of the Chaldeans" (Dan. 1:3). Among those whom he selected were Daniel and his three companions, Hananiah, Mishael, and Azariah, whose Hebrew names he changed to Chaldee (Dan. 1:7). The request of Daniel, that he might not be compelled to eat the provisions sent from the king's table, filled Ashpenaz with apprehension. But God had brought Daniel into favor with Ashpenaz, and he did not use constraint toward him, which kindness the prophet gratefully records (Dan. 1:16).

ASH'RIEL, in 1 Chron. 7:14, more properly ASRIEL (q. v.).

ASH'TAROTH (Heb. אֲשֶׁת־רֹתַח, ash-taw-röth').

1. A city of Bashan, E. of Jordan (Deut. 1:4, A. V., "Astaroth"; Josh. 9:10; 12:4; 13:12, 31), in the half tribe of Manasseh. In Josh. 21:27 it is called Beesh-terah.

2. Another form of the goddess Ashtoreth. See GODS, FALSE.

ASH'TERATHITE (Heb. אֲשֶׁת־רֹתַחִי, ash-ter-aw-thee'), an epithet of Uzziah (1 Chron. 11:44), probably as being a citizen of Astaroth.

ASH'TEROTH KAR'NAIM (Heb. אֲשֶׁת־רֹתַחִי כַרְנַיִם, ash-ter-öth' kar-nah'-yim, Ashteroth of the two horns, Gen. 14:5). This was probably distinct from Ashtaroth. The Raphaims dwelt in Ashteroth Karnaim, a place probably at or near Tell 'Ashtarah. There was a temple here, dedicated to the principal female divinity of the Phœnicians; both the city, in later Hebrew times called Carnaim, and the temple are mentioned in Maccabees.

ASH'TORETH, one of the names of a Sidonian goddess. See GODS, FALSE.

ASH'UR (Heb. אֲשֻׁר, ash-shoor', successful), a posthumous son of Hexron (grandson of Judah, Gen. 46:12), by his wife Abiah (1 Chron. 2:24), B. C. about 1471. He had two wives, Helah and Naarah, by each of whom he had several sons (1 Chron. 4:5), and through these he is called the "father" (founder) of Tekoa, which appears to have been the place of their eventual settlement.

ASH'URITES. 1. "The Ashurite" (Heb. אֲשֻׁרִי, haw-ash-oo-ree') mentioned in 2 Sam. 2:9 among the subjects of Ish-bosheth. As some copies of the Hebrew give אֲשֵׁרִי, "the Asherite," it would be, perhaps, "safer to follow the Targum of Jonathan, which has Beth-Asher (בֵּית אֲשֵׁר, the house of Asher). The Asherites will then denote the whole of the country W. of the Jordan above Jezreel (the district of the plain of Esdraelon), and the enumeration will proceed regularly from N. to S., Asher to Benjamin." Asherite also occurs in Judg. 1:32.

2. In Ezek. 27:6, we find בַּת אֲשֻׁרִים, bath-ash-oo-ree'm', which the A. V. renders "the company of the Ashurites." It is proposed to read בַּת אֲשֵׁרִים, beth-ah-shoor-ee'm', אֲשֵׁרִי, teh-ash-oor', being a tall cedar tree. The Chaldee and the Vulgate render it buzus, the box-tree; the Syriac and Hebrew interpret sherbin, a species of cedar. The R. V. translates the phrase "inlaid in box," literally, "daughter of boxwood."—W. H.

ASH'VATH (Heb. אֲשֻׁוֹת, ash-vavoth', perhaps bright), the last named of the three sons of Japhlet, great-grandson of Asher (1 Chron. 7:33).

A'SIA, a name of doubtful origin, which, as a designation along with Europe and Africa, came into use in the 5th-century B. C. The Scriptures do not mention Asia as a whole, the several references being to separate nations, or parts of the continent. In the New Testament the word is used in this narrower sense, sometimes for Asia Minor, and sometimes for Proconsular Asia, which latterly included Phrygia, Mysia, Caria, and Lydia. Proconsular Asia was governed by a pretor until the Emperor Augustus made it a proconsular province. Dr. J. Strong (Cyc.) thinks that "Asia" denotes the whole of Asia Minor in Acts 19:26, 27; 21:27; 24:18; 27:2; and that Proconsular Asia is referred to in Acts 2:9; 6:9; 16:6; 19:10, 22; 20:4, 16, 18; Rom. 16:5; 1 Cor. 16:19; 2 Cor. 1:8; 2 Tim. 1:15; 1 Pet. 1:1, and contained the seven churches of the Apocalypse (Rev. 1:4, 11). Luke appears to have used the term Asia in a still more restricted sense, as he counts Phrygia and Mysia as provinces distinct from Asia (Acts 2:9, 10; 16:6, 7).

A'SIA, CHURCHES OF. See under their respective names.

ASIARCHS (Gr. Ἀσιάρχης, as-ee-ar'-khace, rulers of Asia, A. V. "the chief of Asia," Acts 19:31), the ten superintendents of the public games and religious rites of proconsular Asia, who celebrated at their own expense the games in honor of the gods and emperor. Each city annually, about the time of the autumnal equinox, delegated one of its citizens with a view to this office; and out of the entire number ten were elected by the assembly of deputies. One of the ten, perhaps chosen by the proconsul, presided. It has been disputed whether only the president or the whole of the ten bore the title asiarch. From Acts 19:31 it would appear that all bore the title, and also that through courtesy it was extended to those who had held the office.

A'SIEL (Heb. אֲשִׁיֵּל, as-ee-ale', created by God), the father of Seraiah, and progenitor of one of the Simeonite chiefs that expelled the Hamites from the valley of Gedor, in the time of Hezekiah (1 Chron. 4:35), B. C. before 715.

AS'KELON (Judg. 1:18). See ASHEKELON.

AS'NAH (Heb. אֲסָנָה, as-naw', thorn, or perhaps storehouse), the head of one of the families of the Nethinim (temple servants) that returned from the Babylonian captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:50), B. C. about 536.

ASNAP'PER, or OSNAPPAR' (Heb. אֲסַנְפָּר, os-nap-par'), the name of a king mentioned only in Ezra 4:10, and called there the great and noble Asnapper (R. V. "Osnapper"). His name has been diligently sought in various Assyrian inscriptions, and he has been at times identified with Esar-haddon, and also with Senacherib and Shalmaneser. In 1875 it was first suggested by Gelzer that Asnapper is simply an Aramæan form of the Assyrian name Asshur-bani-pal. This view, which seems so strange at first sight, is now almost universally accepted. The name Asshur-bani-pal seems greatly to have puzzled foreign writers and speakers, and the Greek form Sardanapallos, and the Latin Sardanapalus, both derived from Asshur-bani-pal, are hardly less strange than the Aramæan form Asnapper.

Asshur-bani-pal followed his father Esar-haddon (see ESAR-HADDON) upon the throne of Assyria, by the express will of the latter. His long reign (667-626 B. C.) was one of the most brilliant in the annals of the Assyrian people. He was not a man of great native ability as was his father. He was not a great warrior, nor a great subduer of other lands. His reign was brilliant simply because he inherited a kingdom which his father had made strong without and within, and into which former kings had poured the wealth of plundered lands the whole world over. He had been carefully educated in the learning of the Babylonians, and no Assyrian king before ever had so little taste for war, and so great taste for knowledge, art, literature, and science. It was he who caused to be gathered into Nineveh the greatest library which had ever been assembled there. The books in it were written upon clay, it is true, but none the less were they real books, in that they contained records of the deeds, thoughts, and words of the men of the past. It is to this library that we owe much of what we know of the early history not only of Assyria, but also of Babylonia. While Asshur-bani-pal remained in Nineveh absorbed in his library, or in the worship of the gods, or in the pleasures of royalty, his armies, led by generals, were sent to carry on campaigns often in distant lands. His first campaign was in Egypt, where he carried on to a conclusion the efforts undertaken by his father, Esar-haddon. In two campaigns he drove Tirhaka from the country and set up Psammeticus as king in Memphis, to hold his throne as an Assyrian vassal. The other events of his reign are con-needed with stirring scenes. He besieged and took the city of Tyre; he defeated the Lydians under King Gyges, who had paid tribute to the Assyrians, and afterward played them false by giving aid to the Egyptians. He further drove back an Elamite invasion of his country, and later invaded Elam itself. By the will of his father Samash-shum-ukin, brother of Asshur-bani-pal, had been made king of Babylon, to rule in subjection to the great king in Nineveh. This arrangement worked poorly, and led to constant friction between the brothers. It was finally terminated by a war in which Asshur-bani-pal defeated the allied forces of the Babylonians, Elamites, and Arabians, and annexed Babylonia to Assyria. Many other campaigns into Arabia and in the West filled the years of his reign, most of them being almost certainly conducted by his generals. There is no Assyrian king whose career and whose name so well fit the narrative in Ezra 4:9, 10.—R. W. R.

ASP. See ANIMAL KINGDOM.

ASP'ATHA (Heb. אֲסַפְתָּה, as-paw-thaw'), the third of the sons of Haman slain by the Jews of Babylonia (Esth. 9:7), B. C. before 536.

ASPHALTUM. See MINERAL KINGDOM.

AS'RIEL (Heb. אֲשֵׁרִיֵּאל, as-ree-ale', vow of God), a son of Gilead and great-grandson of Manasseh (Num. 26:31; Josh. 17:2), B. C. about 1450. In 1 Chron. 7:14 the name is Anglicized Ashriel.

AS'RIELITE (Heb. אֲשֵׁרִיֵּאֵלִי, as-ree-ale-ee'), a descendant of Asriel (Num. 26:31).

ASS. See ANIMAL KINGDOM.

ASSEMBLIES, MASTERS OF (Heb. מַסְבֵּי בַּיָּדִים, bah-al-ay' as-oo-phool'h'). This phrase occurs in Eccles. 12:11, and is thought to mean the master spirits of the gatherings in the East, where sages and philosophers uttered their weighty sayings. The meaning appears to be that the preacher endeavored to so utter the truth as that it should impress the listener with its weight and authority; and that his words should take hold of men's consciences, holding them to obedience as nails bind together boards through which they are driven.

ASSEMBLY, the term used in the A. V. for several Hebrew words, elsewhere translated "CONGREGATION" (q. v.). It is also the representative of the following: (1) אֲתָוָה, ats-aw-raw', a coming together, especially for a festal occasion (Lev. 23:36; Num. 29:35; Deut. 16:8). (2) מִיקְרָא, mik-raw', something called, a public meeting (Isa. 1:13; 4:5). (3) מַסְבֵּי, as-up-paw', a collection of learned men (Eccles. 12:11). (4) "General assembly" (Gr. πανήγυρις, a festal gathering of all the people, Heb. 12:23), commonly believed to be the same as the Church. (5) Ἐκκλησία, a term in use among the Greeks from the time of Thucydides for an assemblage of the people for the purpose of deliberating (Acts 19:39).

AS'SHUR (Heb. אֲשִׁיּוּר, ash-shoor', a step), the second named of the sons of Shem (Gen. 10:22; 1 Chron. 1:17), B. C. before 2300. His descendants peopled the land of Assyria. The word appears in Gen. 10:11, as if it were the name of a person, but the verse should be rendered as in the margin, "he went out into Assyria."

ASSHU'RIM (Gen. 25:3). See ASHURITES.

AS'SIR (Heb. אֲשִׁיר, as-seer', prisoner).

1. A Levite, son of Korah (Exod. 6:24; 1 Chron. 6:22), B. C. before 1210. His descendants constituted one of the Korhite families.

2. Son of Ebiasaph, great-grandson of the preceding, and father of Tahath (1 Chron. 6:23, 37). There is some suspicion, however, that the name here has crept in by repetition from the preceding (McC. and S., Cyc., s. v.).

3. Son of Jeconiah, a descendant of David (1 Chron. 3:17), unless the true rendering is "Jeconiah the captive," referring to the captivity of that prince in Babylon.

AS'SOS (Gr. Ἀσσοί, as'-sos), a seaport town in Mysia, on the N. shore of the Gulf of Adramyttium, and about thirty miles from Troas by sea, and opposite Lesbos. Paul came hither on foot from Troas to embark for Mitylene (Acts 20:13, 14). It is now a miserable village, bearing the name of Asso.

ASSURANCE. 1. (Heb. בְּטָחָה, beh'-takh, security, trust), mentioned (Isa. 32:17), together with "quietness," as the effect of righteousness (R. V. "confidence").

2. (Gr. πίστις, pis'-tis, persuasion, credence.) The resurrection of Jesus from the dead is given by Paul as the ground of assurance in believers (Acts 17:31).

3. (Gr. πληροφορία, play-rof-or-ee'-ah, entire confidence.) In this sense it is used in Col. 2:2; 1 Thess. 1:5; Heb. 6:11; 10:22.

ASSURANCE, a term brought into theology from the Scriptures, sometimes used broadly by theologians as referring to certitude respecting the validity of Christian revelation; most commonly employed to denote the firm persuasion of one's own salvation. The latter must of course include the former. In experience the two are most closely connected. In both senses assurance is a product of the Holy Spirit (1 Thess 1:5; Col. 2:2; Heb. 6:11; 10:22; 2 Cor. 1:22; Rom. 8:16). See also other passages expressing "confidence," "boldness."

As to assurance of personal salvation the following are the points about which there has been the most discussion:

1. Assurance has been held, chiefly by Calvinists, to relate not only to present but also to final salvation. This is the logical outcome of the doctrine of unconditional election. It must stand or fall with that doctrine. Others, who regard more consistently mankind as in a state of probation, limit the assurance to present acceptance with God.

2. Is assurance the common privilege of believers? Thus the doctrine of the Roman Catholic Church answers in the negative "since no one can certainly and infallibly know that he has obtained the grace of God" (Council of Trent, sess. vi, ch. ix, "De Justificatione"). Luther and Melancthon and many other of the reformers held strongly to the affirmative, and even made assurance the criterion of saving faith. Calvinistic doctrine has regarded assurance (implying not only present but also final salvation) as a special gift of grace possessed by relatively few believers, though, theoretically at least, within the privilege and duty of all. Methodist theology has given strong emphasis to assurance as the common privilege of all who truly believe in Christ; presenting, not the doubting and desponding type, but the confident and joyous type of religious experience as the one which is normal and scriptural.

3. As to whether assurance is of the essence of, or a necessary element in, saving faith the first Protestant Confession (Augsburg) held that it is involved therein in accordance with Luther's declaration that "he who hath not assurance spews faith out." Other and later utterances of the reformed doctrine discriminated between the act of justifying and saving faith and the assurance which comes as its result. The Westminster Assembly was the first Protestant synod, however, that formally declared assurance not to be of the essence of saving faith. Wesley, while seeming at times to teach the opposite view, nevertheless clearly held and taught that assurance is not involved in justifying faith or necessarily connected therewith. "The assertion, 'Justifying faith is a sense of pardon,'" he says, "is contrary to reason; it is flatly absurd. For, how can a sense of pardon be the condition of our receiving it?" For a most discriminating presentation of his views as to the relation of assurance to faith, see his works, vol. xii, pp. 109, 110.

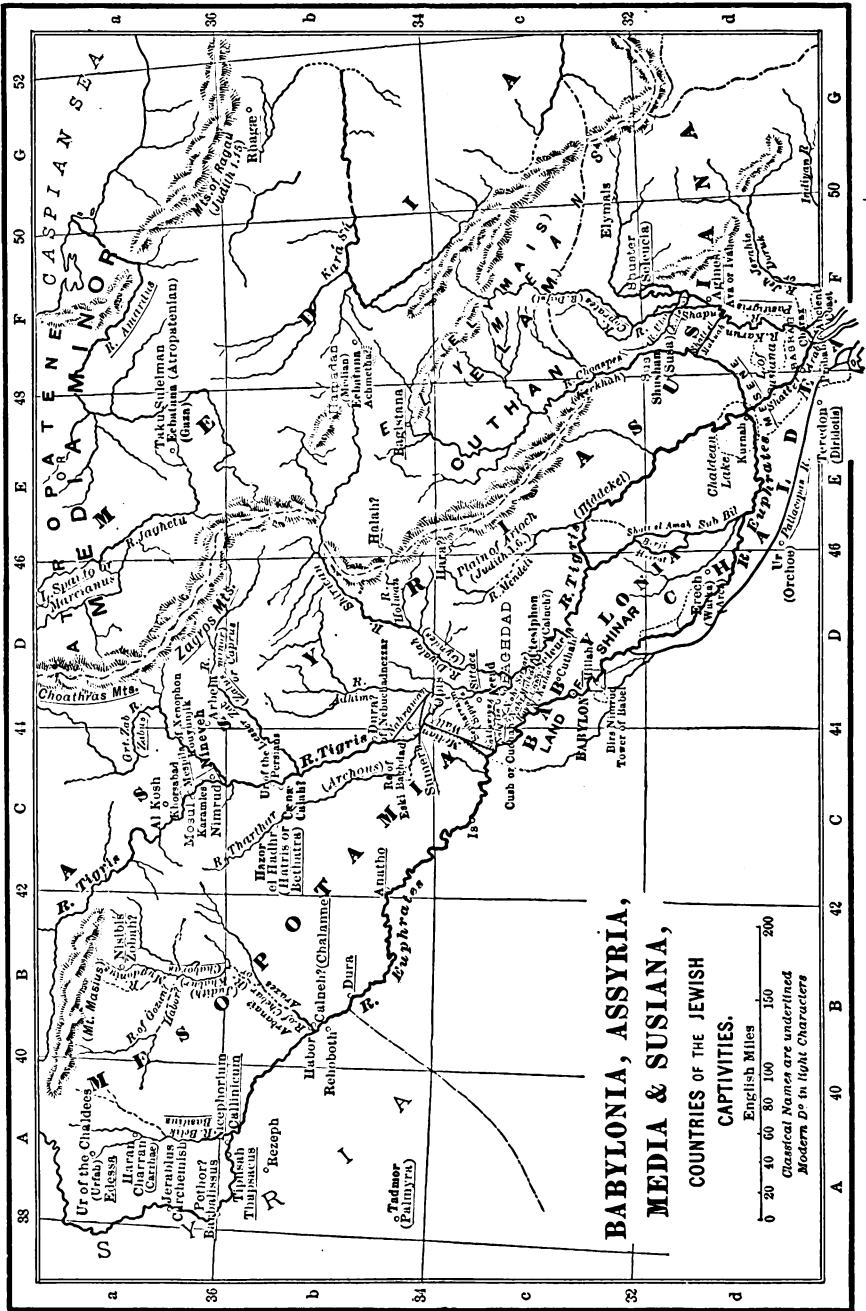

4. As to the grounds of assurance, opinions have also varied, especially as to their order and relative importance. Calvinists are rather disposed to lay stress upon the external grounds of confidence instead of those that are internal; i. e., the truths and promises of Scripture are dwelt upon more largely and strongly than the fruits of the Spirit and the "witness of the Spirit." See SPIRIT, WITNESS OF. Wesley and other Methodist theologians emphasize chiefly the "witness of the Spirit," though they by no means undervalue the confidence that comes from the recognition of the validity of the truth and promises of God, and that which comes from finding in one's self the graces which surely proclaim the fact of personal salvation. The "witness of the Spirit" brings faith to its full development, so that, uplifted to a joyous experience of the new life, we become possessed more abundantly of the fruits of the Spirit, and the faith in God's word which was intellectual, rational, and dim or wavering becomes spiritual, living, and certain. Thus is realized "the full assurance of faith," and "of hope" and "understanding." ASSYRIA, AS'SHUR (Heb. אַשּׁוּר, ash-shoor', or אַשּׁוּר, ash-shoor'), the name of a country.

1. The Land of Assyria was originally an exceedingly small tract, the triangular-shaped strip lying between the rivers Tigris and Zab, and bounded on the N. and E. by the Median and Armenian mountains. This territory was so small that it seems scarcely possible that a people confined within its borders could ever have reared an empire powerful enough to have dominated the civilized world. It is, however, to be remembered that it was not the people of this very narrow tract who made the world one vast tributary. That was done by a people of wider original possessions, for the land of Assyria was in close contact with Babylonia. The river Zab never formed a hard and fast boundary between the two lands. There was indeed no natural boundary at all. The political boundaries wavered back and forth in the great valley, just as political power went up and down. When Assyria was the stronger, then was the boundary pushed far below the Zab; when Babylonia became more powerful it retreated northward. So, also, westward the Tigris did not continue to confine the Assyrians on the W. At a very early period the borders were extended almost to the Euphrates. The populations of this wider country were absorbed into the kingdom of Assyria, and forgetting their origin became Assyrians to all intents and purposes. The world-wide dominion was achieved through the alliance with Babylonia, as well as by the absorption of the other peoples of the valley. During all their history the Assyrian people were of one family blood with the people of Babylonia, and their land was likewise of almost one piece. The land of Assyria is scarcely detachable from the Assyro-Babylonian land.

2. Climate, Flora, and Fauna. The land of Assyria is, by nature, divided into two parts. The southern part is low and level, almost exactly the same in appearance and character as Babylonia. The northern and eastern portions, on the other hand, rise rapidly into high and rolling plains, which, in turn, are lifted into foothills, and these again into the mountains. The proximity of these mountains materially affected the climate, which was in general cooler than that of Babylonia. It is, however, impossible to secure any definite information sufficiently comprehensive for a general view of the climate. The ancient inhabitants, who wrote so much concerning their lives, kept no records of temperature, and in modern times the passing traveler has only noted the temperature at irregular intervals. From the records it appears that the average maximum temperature indoors in Bagdad during June and July is 107° Fahrenheit, while it sometimes goes up as high as 120° or 122°. This average (107°) seems now also to be reached in Assyria, at least along the river Tigris, in the neighborhood of the modern town of Mosul. There is little doubt, however, that this is higher than the regular temperature in ancient times, for the failure of the extensive system of irrigation, the encroachment of the desert sands, and the denudation of forests have all conspired to change the climate. The land of Assyria was not so famed in the ancient world for fertility as was BABYLONIA (q. v.), of which the stories are perhaps too highly colored, but its circle of products was wider than those in the warmer land of Babylonia. Along the rivers Tigris and Zab grain was grown with a success perhaps fully equal to that of Babylonia. The palm tree, most valuable of all the products of the vegetable world, flourished by the side of figs, pomegranates, olives, almonds, and mulberry trees. The higher portions of the country produced also the foliage of the temperate zone. There was abundant pasturage, on which extensive flocks and herds were fattened, and over which great swarms of bees sought honey. The culture of the vine was carried on with great success, and the manufacture of wine—"the drink of life," as the Assyrians called it—was perhaps the chief industry in the North.

The fauna of the land was scarcely less rich than its flora. At the head stood the lion, scarcely so fierce as the lion of Africa, but affording sport in the chase sufficiently dangerous to attract the attention of many of the Assyrian monarchs. Other animals of the cat tribe—the leopard, lynx, and wildcat among them—were also found and pursued in the chase. Over the plains the wild ass and onager wandered in small herds. Deer existed in two varieties at least; the hare was numerous, the porcupine and beaver not unknown in the historical period. The rivers supplied food fish in abundance, and in the reeds along their banks sheltered pelicans, cranes, ducks, swans, geese, herons, and gulls. Partridges, bustards, and the ostrich were abundant; the thrush, the blackbird, and the ortolan were in the air, and eagles and hawks pursued their prey. Though the animals in a state of nature were so plentiful the animals which were domesticated were comparatively few; of these the chief were the horse, ox, ass, goat, and sheep, to which the camel was added, but not in the earliest periods.

In mineral wealth Assyria was much in advance of Babylonia, for stone of good quality for use in architecture and the arts was found in abundance in the mountains and foothills.

3. The People. The people who inhabited Assyria belonged to the great Semitic race. They had come originally, so it appears, from Babylonia to settle as colonists. They were not of pure race, for there had already been an intermixture of blood with the Sumerian people, who were the original inhabitants of the land. After this immigration the Babylonians continued the process of intermixture with successive invading peoples from Elam, Arabia, and elsewhere, but the Assyrians intermarried little with neighboring peoples, and held it a subject for much boasting that they were of purer blood than the Babylonians. In stature the Assyrians were of average modern European height, and were powerfully built. Their complexion was dark, the nose prominent, the hair, eyebrows, and beard thick and bushy. They were apparently of cheerful disposition, given to mirth and feasting, but of implacable cruelty. The pages of history are nowhere more bloody than in the records of their wars.

4. Language and Literature. The language of Assyria was closely akin to that of Babylonia, and may properly be regarded as practically the same language. It belongs to the Semitic family of languages, and is, therefore, akin to Arabic, Aramæan, and Hebrew. Unlike these three kindred languages, the Assyrian never developed an alphabet, though it did develop a few alphabetic characters. During its entire history the Assyrian language was prevailingly ideographic and syllabic. It expressed words by means of signs which represented the idea: thus there was a single sign for sun, another for city, another for wood, another for hand. These are called ideograms, and originated in considerable measure out of pictures, or hieroglyphs of the objects themselves. But besides these ideograms the language also possessed numerous syllabic signs such as ab, ib, ub, ba, bi, bu. By means of these words could be spelled out. Clumsy though this appears to be, the Assyrians were able to develop it far enough to make it a wonderfully accurate and sufficiently flexible tool. The materials on which they wrote were clay and stone, the use of which had come from Babylonia. In writing upon stone the characters were chiseled deeply into the surface, in regular lines, sometimes over raised figures of gods or kings. Writings thus executed were of monumental character, and could not be used for business or literary purposes. The great bulk of Assyrian literature has come down to us upon clay, and not upon stone. The clay tablets, as they are called, vary greatly in size. Some are shaped like pillows, two inches in length, by an inch and a quarter in width. Others are flat, and sometimes reach sixteen inches in length by nine or ten inches in width. The clay is also sometimes shaped like barrels, varying in height from five to nine inches, or like cylinders or prisms, which are found sometimes sixteen inches in height. When the soft clay had been formed into some one of these shapes the characters were formed by pressing into the surface a small metallic tool with a triangularly pointed end. Each pressure formed a wedge-shaped, or cuneiform, depression, and by repeated indentations the characters were made. On these clay tablets the Assyrians wrote a varied literature. We have now in our possession vast stores of this literature, representing widely differing phases. There are found historical inscriptions, narrating in annalistic form the deeds of Assyrian monarchs; public documents, royal and private letters and dispatches; lists of taxes; innumerable business documents, such as receipts and bills of sale; religious documents, as hymns, prayers, incantations, and lists of omens; linguistic documents, as lists of signs and of words with explanations; astronomical lists of eclipses and the like; tables of square and cube roots; medical treatises and lists of recipes for the healing of disease. But a small part of this vast literature has been published in facsimile, or made accessible in translations in European languages. When they are made thus accessible they will give such an insight into the whole life of these people as we are able to obtain of very few peoples of antiquity.

5. Religion. The people of Assyria derived their religious ideas from Babylonia, and during all their history had constant contact with the mother country in this matter, as in others. The faith was polytheistic, and never shows in any text yet found any approach to monotheism. The god who stood at the head of the Assyrian pantheon was the great god Asshur, always honored as the divine founder of the nation. After him and below him are the gods Anu, Bel, and Ea, the middle of whom, under slightly varying names and with changes of titles, was worshiped in Babylonia, and even far westward among other Semitic peoples. Besides this great triad, there was another consisting of the moon god Sin, the sun god Shamash, whose name appears in royal names so frequently, and Ishtar, the goddess of the crescent moon, and the queen of the stars; though her place in this triad is often taken by Ramman, the "thunderer," god of rain, of tempests, and of storms. These gods are invoked at times severally in phrases which seem to raise each in turn to a position of supremacy over the others. Early students of religious texts sometimes mistakenly supposed that these ascriptions of praise and honor were in reality tokens of monotheism. This is now well known to be a false influence. Monotheism is unknown, henotheism seems at times to be reached, but polytheism is the prevailing, as it was always the popular, belief. Besides these great triads of gods there were large numbers of minor deities, as well as countless spirits of heaven, earth, and sea. See NERGAL.

The religious ceremonial of the Assyrians, with its sacrifices morning and evening, and its offerings of wine, milk, honey, and cakes, was similar to that of Babylonia, but is not yet satisfactory known, save in outline.

6. History. It is clear that the origin of the Assyrian commonwealth is to be found among Babylonian colonists. Not only is this definitely stated to be the case in the Old Testament (Gen. 10:11), but the Assyrians themselves continually look back to Babylonia as the motherland. The earliest developments in the new table and mountain land of Assyria are not very clear. It appears probable that here, as in Babylonia, the earliest forms of government were connected with the lives of cities, and that from cities Assyrian civilization and rule gradually spread over the surrounding country, and later by the combination of different cities a kingdom was founded with the capital in one of them.

The earliest rulers in Assyria were called Patesi, a word which has been supposed to mean priest-king, or high priest. The reading of the word is, however, still uncertain, and the meaning still more so. Judging from the men who bore this title, it is, perhaps, safe to assume that the title indicated some kind of combination of priestly and governmental rule. The earliest kings of Assyria are little more than names, and the dates of their reigns are extremely uncertain.

The first great name among the Assyrian kings is the name of Tiglath-pileser I, who reigned about 1100 B. C. He carried the power of the Assyrian arms in great expeditions over almost all western Asia, from the mountains of Elam to the coasts of the Mediterranean, and from the ice-covered mountains of Armenia to the lowlands of the Persian Gulf. He even captured the city of Babylon, and made ancient Babylonia a sort of tributary state to the new commonwealth of Assyria. He extended his influence over a part of the Mediterranean, and threatened Egypt so that Pharaoh gave him presents. It is of course not to be supposed that the great free-booter and warrior extended or even attempted to extend Assyrian rule over so vast an empire. He went rather to plunder than to extend the benefits of Assyrian civilization, such as they were. It is, perhaps, inconceivable how vast a store of wealth in gold and silver, objects of apparel, and precious stones he brought into the city of Asshur, his capital.

His son and successor, Asshur-bel-kala, was a weak man, and the influence gained by Tiglath-pileser was suffered to wane and almost to disappear. It was during his reign and those of his immediate successors that the kingdom of the Hebrews seized the opportunity to develop under David and Solomon into a powerful kingdom. Humanly speaking, this would have been almost impossible during the lifetime either of Tiglath-pileser I or of Asshur-nazir-apal, who was the next of the great Assyrian conquerors (884-860 B. C.).

Asshur-nazir-apal imitated Tiglath-pileser I, and in some respects was a greater man than he. He carried on a series of wars with the same peoples who had suffered during the reign of Tiglath-pileser I, and there have been few wars in human history more relentless, more bloody, more destructive of property, and with less justification.

He was succeeded by his son, Shalmaneser II, who for more than thirty years carried on campaign after campaign against the West, giving to the Hebrew people their first foretaste of the horrors of Assyrian oppression, and the first threat of ultimate extinction through the Assyrians. See SHALMANESER.

The reign of his son and successor, Shamshir-Ramman II (824-812 B. C.), was disturbed by rebellion and civil war, though he later carried on extensive campaigns in the East and in the North, and materially strengthened the now rapidly growing Assyrian kingdom, while Ramman-nirari III (811-783), who succeeded him, turned his attention toward the West and temporarily conquered the city of Damascus. After his reign, the growing power of Assyria, hitherto apparently invincible, began to diminish. There were more civil disturbances, and, added to this, several outbreaks of pestilence, and with his death the oldest Assyrian kingdom may be said to have come to an end.

A new kingdom succeeded immediately by the reign of a usurper, Tiglath-pileser III. He was a man not only of tremendous energy, of strong character, but of real creative genius. The kings who had preceded him had been plunderers, but not rulers. They had marched to all points of the compass that they might plunder and bring their gains to their capital. He began with the fixed determination to make a great empire, to weld together the West and the East, to make the name of Assyria not merely dreaded as a force making for plunder, but to make it revered as a power for good government. See TIGLATH-PILESER.

On the death of Tiglath-pileser III, in 727, Shalmaneser IV ascended the throne, in whose reign the siege of Samaria was begun. See SHALMANESER. On the end of his reign there followed a brilliant series of reigns by kings who are generally spoken of as the Sargonides, being thus named after the first of them, and one of the greatest, Sargon (722-705). He was not only one of the greatest of Assyrian generals, but may even as an organizer be compared with Tiglath-pileser III. See SARGON. To his son Sennacherib he left an empire too great for the new king. There is even a doubt as to the personal courage of the new monarch. There are even stronger doubts of his military skill. In him boastfulness took the place of action, but in spite of his defects he did manage in some fashion to hold together a semblance of the authority which he had inherited. Were it not for the great interest felt for his connections with the Hebrew people, his name would find little mention in modern accounts of Assyrian history. See SENNACHERIB.

He was succeeded by his son Esar-haddon, who in every respect was a far greater man than his father and continued in his reign some of the best traditions of the Assyrian world power. See ESAR-HADDON.

Esar-haddon was succeeded by his son Asshur-bani-pal, who entirely lacked the military genius of his father, and was therefore not only unable to conquer anything more, but also to hold together the empire which he had inherited. He prided himself more upon great buildings, upon patronage of art, literature, and science, than upon deeds of prowess upon the field of battle, and in his reign the decay of the empire in physical strength was rapid. There was also a serious insurrection during his reign which threatened the very existence of the state. The revolt lasted more than fifty years, and while it continued Egypt broke loose from Assyrian thraldom, Syria joined the revolt, and the whole empire threatened to collapse. See ASNAPPER; also SUPPLEMENT.

There is doubt as to the order of the few kings who succeeded Asshur-bani-pal. The power of the empire was broken. The names of the kings represent men who possessed titles that were almost empty, and a storm that should engulf the whole fabric was brewing in Babylonia and in the territories of the Manda. See NINEVEH. When the city of Nineveh was taken (607-6) the Assyrian empire came to an end, and a new rule by Indo-European people and a new life took the place of the great empire and the remarkable life which had been slowly built up during the centuries.—R. ASTONIED. See GLOSSARY.

ASTROLOGY. See MAGIC.

ASTRONOMY (Gr. ἀστρονομία, laws of the stars). This science probably owes its origin to the Chaldeans, there being evidence that they had conducted astronomical observations from remote antiquity. Callisthenes sent to his uncle, Aristotle, a number of these observations, of which the oldest must have dated back to the middle of B. C. 2300. "The Chaldean priests had been accustomed from an early date to record on their clay tablets the aspect of the heavens and the changes which took place in their night after night, the appearance of the constellations, their comparative brilliancy, the precise moments of their rising and setting and culmination, together with the more or less rapid movements of the planets, and their motions toward or from one another." They discovered the revolution and eclipses of the moon, and frequently predicted with success eclipses of the sun (Maspero, Dawn of Civilization, p. 775, sq.).

The astronomy of China and India dates back to a very early period, for we read of two Chinese astronomers, Ho and Hi, being put to death for failing to announce a solar eclipse which took place B. C. 2169.

The Hebrews do not appear to have devoted much attention to astronomy, perhaps because astrology, highly esteemed among the neighboring nations (Isa. 47:9; Jer. 27:9; Dan. 2), was interdicted by the law (Deut. 18:10, 11). And yet we find as early as the Book of Job the constellations were distinguished and designated by peculiar and appropriate names (Job 9:9; 38:31; also Isa. 13:10; Amos 5:8).

ASUP'PIM (Heb. אֲשׁוּפִים, as-up-peem', collections (1 Chron. 26:15; house of collections, v. 17), a part of the temple assigned to the care of the family of Obed-edom. It appears to have been a building used for the storing of the temple goods, situated in the neighborhood of the southern door of the temple in the external court, and with probably two entrances (Keil, Com., in loc.). Dr. Strong (Cyc., s. v.) thinks that it was the inclosed space used for store chambers between the two N. E. gates, in the outer wall of the temple. The same word in Neh. 12:25 is incorrectly rendered (A. V.) "thresholds."

ASYLUM (Heb. מִקְלָט, mik-lawt'), a place of safety where even a criminal might be free from violence from the avenger.

1. Ancient. From Exod. 21:14; 1 Kings 1:50 we see that the Hebrews, in common with many other nations, held that the altar, as God's abode, afforded protection to those whose lives were in danger. By the law, however, the place of expiation for sins of weakness (Lev. 4:2; 5:15-18; Num. 15:27-31) was prevented from being abused by being made a place of refuge for criminals deserving of death. The Mosaic law also provided "cities of refuge" (q. v.). Among the Greeks and Romans, the right of asylum pertained to altars, temples, and all holy shrines. These sanctuaries were exceptionally numerous in Asia. During the time of the Roman empire the statues of the emperors were used as refuges against momentary acts of violence. Armies in the field used the eagles of the legions for the same purpose.

2. Christian. In the Christian Church the right of asylum was retained, and extended from the altar to all ecclesiastical buildings. By act of Theodosius II (A. D. 431) not only the Church was to be considered sacred, but also the atrium, the garden, bath, and cells. Many abuses crept in, until the custom has either become extinct or greatly reformed.

ASYNCRITUS (Gr. Ἀσύγκριτος, as-oong'-kree-tos, incomparable), the name of a Christian at Rome to whom St. Paul sends salutation (Rom. 16:14), A. D. 60.

ATAD (Heb. אֲתָד, aw-lawd', a thorn). It is uncertain whether Atad is the name of a person or a descriptive appellation given to a "thorny" locality. At the thrashing floor of Atad the sons of Jacob, and the Egyptians who accompanied them, "made a mourning" for Jacob seven days (Gen. 50:10, 11), B. C. 1689.

AT'ARAH (Heb. אֲתָרָה, at-aw-rav', a crown), the second wife of Jerahmeel, of the tribe of Judah, and mother of Onam (1 Chron. 2:26), B. C. about 1471.

AT'AROTH (Heb. אֲתָרוֹת, at-aw-rôth', crowns).

1. A city near Gilead, E. of Jordan, in a fertile grazing district (Num. 32:3). Rebuilt by the Gadites (v. 34).

2. A city on the border of Ephraim and Benjamin (Josh. 16:7). Called also Ataroth-adar (Josh. 18:13).

3. "Ataroth of the house of Joab," in the tribe of Judah, a city founded by the descendants of Salma (1 Chron. 2:54).

A'TER (Heb. אֲתָר, aw-tare', shut up).

1. A person "of" (probably descendant of) Hezekiah, whose family to the number of ninety-eight returned from the captivity (Ezra 2:16; Neh. 7:21), B. C. before 536.

2. The head of a family of Levitical "porters" to the temple, whose descendants went up to Jerusalem at the same time with the above (Ezra 2:42; Neh. 7:45), B. C. before 536.

3. One of the chief Israelites that subscribed the sacred covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. 10:17), B. C. about 445.

A'THACH (Heb. אֲתָחַז, ath-awk', lodging), a city in Judah to which David sent a present of the spoils recovered from the Amalekites who had sacked Ziklag (1 Sam. 30:30). Its site is unknown.

ATHALIAH (Heb. אֲתָלְיָה, ath-aw-yaw', perhaps the same as Asaiah), a son of Uzziah, of the tribe of Judah, who dwelt in Jerusalem after the return from Babylon (Neh. 11:4), B. C. 445.

ATHALIAH (Heb. אֲתָלְיָה, ath-al-yaw', afflicted by Jehovah).

1. The daughter of Ahab, king of Israel, doubtless by his wife Jezebel. She is called (2 Chron. 22:2) the daughter of Omri, who was father of Ahab, but by a comparison of texts it would appear that she is so called only as being his granddaughter. (1) Idolatry. She was married to Jehoram, king of Judah, who "walked in the way of the house of Ahab," no doubt owing to her influence, "for he had the daughter of Ahab to wife" (2 Chron. 21:6). After the death of Jehoram, Ahaziah came to the throne, and he also walked in the way of Ahab's house, following the wicked counsel of his mother (2 Chron. 22:2, 3). (2) Reign. Ahaziah reigned one year, and was slain by Jehu, whereupon Athaliah resolved to seat herself upon the throne of David. She caused all the male members of the royal family to be put to death; one only, Joash, the son of Ahaziah, escaping (2 Kings 11:1), B. C. 842. Athaliah usurped the throne for six years, 842-836. Joash, in the meantime, had been concealed in the temple by his aunt, Jehosheba, the wife of Jehoiada, the high priest. In the seventh year, Jehoiada resolved to produce the young prince, and, arrangements having been made for defense in case of necessity, Joash was declared king. Athaliah, who was probably worshipping in the house of Baal, was aroused by the shouts of the people, and repaired to the temple, where her cry of "treason" only secured her own arrest. (3) Death. She was taken beyond the sacred precincts of the temple and put to death. The only other recorded victim of this revolution was Mattan, the priest of Baal (2 Kings 11:1, sq.; 2 Chron. 23:1-17).

2. One of the sons of Jeroham, and a chieftain of the tribe of Benjamin, who dwelt at Jerusalem (1 Chron. 8:26).

3. The father of Jeshaiiah, which latter was one of the "sons" of Elam that returned with seventy dependents from Babylon under Ezra (Ezra 8:7), B. C. about 457.

ATHANASIAN CREED. See CREEDS.

ATHEISM (Gr. ἀθεος, ath'-eh-os, without God), the denial of the existence of God. The term has always been applied according to the popular conception of God. Thus the Greeks considered a man ἀθεος, atheist, when he denied the existence of the gods recognized by the state. The Pagans called Christians atheists because they would not acknowledge the heathen gods and worship them. In the theological controversies of the early Church the opposite parties not infrequently called each other atheists.

When we speak of atheism proper, we speak of a phase of the controversy touching a great first cause of creation. The word, however, is not in favor, and is renounced even by those whose reasonings naturally lead up to it. The question may be fairly asked, Is blank atheism or antitheism possible to the human mind? And the answer must be finally given that it is not. If we appeal to Scripture, and such an appeal should be allowed, we find that through the whole book there is no single allusion to men from whose mind the thought of God is erased. The book demonstrates everything about the Deity but his existence. It never descends to argue with an atheist. If it recognizes a man who is a disbeliever in God, it counts him a "fool" (Psa. 53:1). "In Eph. 2:12 the expression, ἀθεοί ἐν τῷ κόσμῳ, 'without God in the world,' the word ἀθεοί, godless, may be taken either with the active, neuter, or passive reference, i. e., either denying, ignorant of, or forsaken by God. The last meaning seems best to suit the passive tenor of the passage and to enhance the dreariness and gloom of the picture" (Ellicott, Com., in loc.).

Atheism proper has mostly sprung from moral causes, and denotes a system of thought which the healthiest instinct of mankind has always abhorred. Even among the heathen the denial of the existence of the gods was proscribed and punished.

ATHENIAN (Acts 17:21, rendered "of Athens" in v. 22), an inhabitant of ATHENS (q. v.).

ATHENS (Gr. Ἀθῆναι, ath-ay'-nahee), the capital of Attica, and the chief seat of Grecian learning and civilization during the golden period of the history of Greece. An account of this city would be out of place in the present work. St. Paul visited it in his journey from Macedonia, and appears to have remained there some time (Acts 17:14-34; comp. 1 Thess. 3:1). During his residence he delivered his memorable discourse on the Areopagus to the "men of Athens" (Acts 17:22-31). The Agora or "market," where St. Paul disputed daily, was situated in the valley between the Acropolis, the Areopagus, the Pnyx, and the Museum, being bounded by the Acropolis on the N. E. and E., by the Areopagus on the N., by the Pnyx on the N. W. and W., and by the Museum on the S. The remark of the sacred historian respecting the inquisitive character of the Athenians (17:21) is attested by the unanimous voice of antiquity. Demosthenes rebukes his countrymen for their love of constantly going about in the market, and asking one another, "What news?" The remark of St. Paul upon the "superstitious" character of the Athenians (17:22) is in like manner confirmed by the ancient writers. Thus Pausanias says that the Athenians surpassed all other states in the attention which they paid to the worship of the gods; and hence the city was crowded in every direction with temples, altars, and other sacred buildings. Of the Christian church founded by St. Paul at Athens, according to ecclesiastical tradition, Dionysius the Areopagite was the first bishop (Smith, Bib. Dict., s. v.). See PAUL.

ATH'LAI (Heb. אֲתָלַי, ath-lah'ee, oppressive), a son of Bebai, who put away his strange wife on the return from Babylon (Ezra 10:28).

AT ONE. See GLOSSARY.

ATONEMENT (Heb. from כָּפַר, kaw-far', to cover, cancel; Gr. καταλλαγή, kat-al-lag-ay', exchange, reconciliation).

1. Definition. In accordance with the force of these terms of Scripture the atonement is the covering over of sin, the reconciliation between God and man, accomplished by the Lord Jesus Christ. It is that special result of Christ's sacrificial sufferings and death by virtue of which all who exercise proper penitence and faith receive forgiveness of their sins and obtain peace.

2. Scripture Doctrine. Terms and Methods.

In addition to the terms above named there are other words used in the Scriptures which express the idea of atonement or throw special light upon its meaning. Of these may be here cited (a) ἱλάσκομαι, ilaskomai, translated (Heb. 2:17) "to make reconciliation." Also Rom. 3:25; 1 John 2:2; 4:10, where the kindred noun is rendered "propitiation;" (b) λύτρον, lutron, translated "ransom," "redemption" (Matt. 20:23; Mark 10:30; Luke 2:38; Heb. 9:12). By such words and in such passages as these the doctrine is taught that Christ died to effect reconciliation between God and man, to propitiate the divine favor in behalf of sinful men, and to redeem or ransom men from the penalties and the dominion of their sins.

There are also forms of expression in which the idea of substitution, or that Christ stands as our substitute in the economy of divine grace, appear with marked emphasis (Rom. 5:6-8; 1 Cor. 15:3; 2 Cor. 5:21; Gal. 3:13; Tit. 2:14; 1 Pet. 2:24; 3:18).

The divinely appointed sacrifices of the Old Testament dispensation are also full of significance, embracing as they did special offerings or sacrifices for sin. The uniform teaching of the New Testament is that these were typical of the sacrifice which Christ made of himself for the sins of the world.

3. Summary. While the Scriptures do not give a philosophical theory or explanation of the atonement, nor perhaps furnish us with data altogether sufficient for such a theory, still it is true that (a) The Scriptures reveal the atonement to us as an accomplished and completed fact (Heb. 9:13-26). (b) They represent this fact as necessary to human salvation (Luke 24:40-46, 47; Acts 4:12). (c) While the whole earthly life of Christ contained an atoning and even sacrificial element, the virtue of the atonement is to be found chiefly in his sacrificial death. His death was indispensable (John 3:14, 15). (d) In the atoning death of Christ was exhibited not only the holy wrath of God against sin, but quite as much the love of God toward sinful men (Rom. 3:25, 26; 5:6-8; John 3:16). (e) The gracious divine purpose realized in the atonement was inwrought with the creation of man. Redemption was in the thought and plan of the Creator so that man falling fell into the arms of divine mercy. The Lamb of God was "slain from the foundation of the world" (Rev. 13:8; 1 Pet. 1:19, 20). (f) The atonement is not limited, but universal in the extent of its gracious provisions (Heb. 2:9; 1 Tim. 2:5, 6; 4:10; Rom. 5:18; 2 Cor. 5:14, 15). (g) The universality of the atonement does not lead to universal salvation. The great offer of salvation may be, and often is, rejected, and when the rejection is final the atonement avails nothing for the sinner (Mark 16:16; John 3:36; Heb. 10:26-29). (h) The atonement is the actual objective ground of forgiveness of sins and acceptance with God for all penitent believers (John 3:16; Acts 2:38; Eph. 1:7; Col. 1:14).

4. Theological Treatment. This branch of the subject calls for two classes of statements: (1) as to the history of the doctrine; (2) as to the theological views most generally held at the present time.

(1) History. During the early centuries of the history of the Church, and particularly prior to the Nicene Council (A. D. 325), Christian theology reflected, in the main, simply the teaching of the New Testament upon this subject. The attention of theologians was concentrated upon the person of Christ. There was but little speculation as to the method of the atonement on the exact ground of its necessity. That the sacrifice of Christ was vicarious, that he suffered in the stead of men, was, however, an idea constantly held; and that these sufferings were necessary to meet the requirement of divine righteousness was sometimes declared with emphasis. A fanciful notion, it is true, began to appear at that early period, a notion which afterward obtained some measure of prominence. Christ was regarded as a ransom paid to the devil to redeem men who by their sin had come under the dominion of the devil. This was taught by Origen (A. D. 230), and more emphatically by Gregory of Nyssa (A. D. 370). This view has also, but incorrectly, been attributed to Irenæus (A. D. 180). Captious critics and infidels have often cited this incident in the history of theology in order to bring all theology into ridicule and contempt. But it is to be remembered that this phase of doctrine was always met with the strongest denial and opposition, as by Athanasius (A. D. 370) and Gregory of Nazianzum (A. D. 390). It was never the accepted doctrine of the Christian Church.

Anselm. Prominent in the history of the doctrine of the atonement must ever stand the name of Anselm, A. D. 1100. In his book, Cur Deus Homo, he brings out most clearly and emphatically the idea of the atonement as satisfaction to divine justice. He viewed the necessity of atonement as entirely in the justice of God. He made this term "satisfaction," it has been said, "a watchword for all future time." Certain it is that what is known as the satisfaction theory of the atonement will ever stand associated with his name.

Abelard. Chief among the opponents of Anselm was Abelard, A. D. 1141. He referred the atonement wholly to the love of God, and taught that there could be nothing in the divine essence that required satisfaction for sin. The death of Christ upon the cross was solely an exhibition of divine love. The effect is moral only. It is intended to subdue the hearts of sinful men, to lead them to repentance and devotion to Christ. Thus Abelard stands as the father of what is known as the moral influence theory.

Grotius. An epoch in the history of the doctrine was reached when Grotius, A. D. 1617, wrote his Defensio fidei Cathol. de Satisfactione. He wrote in refutation of the teaching of Socinus, who denied the vicarious character of Christ's death, and the need of any reconciliation of God with man. Grotius held fast to the vicariousness of Christ's sufferings, and used the term "satisfaction." But in his view it was a satisfaction to the requirements of moral government, and not to the justice which inheres in God himself. The necessity of the atonement, accordingly, he found not in the nature of God, but in the nature of the divine government. The purpose of the atonement is to make it possible to exercise mercy toward fallen and sinful men, and at the same time maintain the dignity of the law, the honor of the Lawgiver, and protect the moral interests of the universe. Grotius thus founded what is known as the rectoral or governmental theory.

The doctrines of Anselm, Abelard, and Grotius represent the principal tendencies of thought and discussion throughout the whole history of the doctrine. Under the treatment of various theologians these doctrines received modification more or less important; but in their leading principles these three forms of teaching have been the most prominent in the theology of the Christian Church.

(2) Modern views. Aside from the opinion of rationalists and semirationalists, who wholly or in part reject the authority of Scripture, and accordingly attach but slight if any importance to Scripture teaching concerning the atonement, the three theories prominent in the past are still the prominent theories of the present. With various shadings and modifications, and attempts at interblending, they embody in the main the thinking of modern times upon this subject.

The moral influence theory, however, it should be said, has never obtained formal or general acceptance in any evangelical communion. It has been regarded justly as falling far short of adequately representing the teaching of Scripture. It contains some measure of truth, but leaves out the truth most essential, that of real, objective atonement. It reduces the atonement to an object lesson.

The thought of the Christian Church of to-day is divided in its adherence between the satisfaction and governmental theories; these theories appearing in various forms. But no one of these views most prominent is free from grave logical objections if held too rigidly and exclusively. Thus the satisfaction theory, if held in the sense that Christ actually bore the punishment for the sins of men, or that he literally, according to the figure of Anselm, paid the debt of human transgressors, after the manner of a commercial transaction, must lead logically to one or the other of two extremes—either that of a limited atonement or that of universalism. It tends also to anti-nomianism, to say nothing of other objections often raised. The governmental theory, held alone and too boldly, loses sight of the fact that the divine government must be a reflection of the divine nature, and that what is required by that government must be required also by some quality inherent in God. Further, this theory, if not guarded strongly, and by bringing in in some form the idea of satisfaction to divine justice, reduces the death of Christ to a great moral spectacle. It becomes, in fact, another moral influence theory.

A strong tendency, accordingly, of the present day is to seek some way of mediating between or of uniting the elements of truth found in these various theories. Certain it is that the Scriptures do represent the death of Christ as a most affecting manifestation of the love of God. Certain, also, it is that his death is represented as sacrificial, and required by the justice of God. And equally true it is that it is often viewed in its relations to divine law and the moral economy that God has established. And if the earnest attempts of devout thinkers do not succeed wholly in penetrating the mystery of the cross, and in bringing the exact meaning of Christ's death within the compass of their definitions, still it is held as beyond all question that the atonement wrought by Christ is a fundamental fact in human salvation, a real "covering" for sin, the divinely appointed measure for "reconciliation" between God and man.

5. Extent of Atonement. The extent of atonement is much less discussed than formerly, Calvinism, though still divided upon that subject, having considerably departed from the view it once strenuously held, that the atonement was for the elect only. The prevailing doctrine is that of universal or general, though conditional, atonement.

LITERATURE.—The literature of this subject is very extensive. Reference may here be made to The Vicarious Sacrifice, Bushnell—the moral influence theory; Atonement in Christ, Miley—the governmental theory; Our Lord's Doctrine of the Atonement, Smeaton—the satisfaction theory; also to the chapters treating this subject in such works of systematic theology as Pope's Compendium of Christian Theology, Van Oosterzee's Christian Dogmatics, Hodge's Systematic Theology, H. B. Smith's System of Christian Theology.—E. McC.

ATONEMENT, DAY OF. See FESTIVALS.

AT'ROTH (Num. 32:35). See ATAROTH.

ATTAI (Heb. אַתַּי, at-tah'ee, opportune).

1. The son of a daughter of Sheshan, of the tribe of Judah, by his Egyptian servant, Jarha. He was the father of Nathan (1 Chron. 2:35, 36).

2. One of David's mighty men, of the tribe of Gad, who joined David at Ziklag, whither he had fled from Saul (1 Chron. 12:11).

3. The second of the four sons of King Rehoboam, by his second wife, Maachah, the daughter of Absalom (2 Chron. 11:20).

ATTALIA (Gr. Ἀττάλεια, at-tal'-i-ah), a seaport on the coast of Pamphylia, at the mouth of the river Cattarrhactes. The town was named after its founder, Attalus Philadelphus, king of Pergamos. Paul and Barnabas on the way to Antioch stopped there (Acts 14:25). Its name in the 12th century appears to have been Satalia; it still exists under the name of Adalia.

ATTENT. See GLOSSARY.

ATTIRE. See DRESS.

ATTITUDE. See PRAYER, SALUTATION.

AUGUSTUS (Gr. Αὐγουστος, ow'-goos-tos), the imperial title assumed by Octavius, successor of Julius Cæsar. He was born A. U. C. 691 (B. C. 63), and was principally educated by his great-uncle, Julius Cæsar, who made him his heir. After the death of Cæsar, he acquired such influence that Antony and Lepidus took him into their triumvirate. He afterward shared the empire with Antony, and attained supreme power after the battle of Actium, B. C. 31, being saluted imperator by the Senate, who conferred on him the title Augustus in B. C. 27. He forgave Herod, who had espoused the cause of Antony, and even increased his power. After the death of Herod, A. D. 4, his dominions were divided among his sons by Augustus, almost in exact accordance with his will. Augustus was emperor at the birth and during half the lifetime of our Lord, but his name occurs only once (Luke 2:1) in the New Testament, as the emperor who ordered the enrollment in consequence of which Joseph and Mary went to Bethlehem, the place where the Messiah was to be born.

AUL. See AWL.

AUNT (Heb. אֲוִיָּהּ, do-daw', loving), a father's sister (Exod. 6:20); also an uncle's wife (Lev. 18:14; 20:20).

AUTHORIZED VERSION (A. V.). See BIBLE.

AVVA (Heb. אָבָא, av-vaw', ruin, 2 Kings 17:24), or I'VAH (Heb. אִיבָה, iv-vaw', 2 Kings 18:34; 19:13). "As Irváh is placed by the side of Hena (18:34; 19:13), Avva can hardly be any other than the country of Hebeh, situated on the Euphrates between Anah and the Chabur" (Keil, Com. on Kings).

AVE MARIA (Hail Mary).

1. The words of the angel Gabriel to the Virgin Mary, when announcing the incarnation (Luke 1:28), as rendered by the Vulgate.

2. The familiar prayer, or form of devotion, in the Roman Catholic Church, called also the "Angelic Salutation." It consists of three parts: (1) The Salutation of Gabriel, Ave (Maria) gratia plena, Dominus tecum; benedicta tu in mulieribus; (2) the words of Elizabeth to Mary, et benedictus fructus ventris tui; (3) an addition made by the Church, Sancta Maria, Mater Dei, ora pro nobis peccatoribus nunc et in hora mortis nostræ. The whole Ave Maria, as it now stands, is ordered in the breviary of Pius V (1568) to be used daily before each canonical hour and after compline; i. e., the last of the seven canonical hours (Cath. Dict., s. v.).

AVEN (Heb. אָוֵן, aw'-ven, nothingness, vanity).

1. The popular name of Heliopolis, in Lower Egypt, probably selected intentionally in the sense of an idol-city (Ezek. 30:17) because On-Heliopolis was from time immemorial one of the principal seats of the Egyptian worship of the sun, and possessed a celebrated temple of the sun and a numerous and learned priesthood.

2. The "high places of Aven" are the buildings connected with the image-worship at Beth-el, and which were to be utterly ruined (Hos. 10:8).

3. Mentioned as "the plain of Aven" (Amos 1:5), and thought by some to be the same as the plain of Baalbek, where there was a magnificent temple dedicated to the sun. Robinson (Bibl. Res., p. 677) understands by it the present Bekaa, between Lebanon and Anti-Libanus, in which Heliopolis was always the most distinguished city.

AVENGER OF BLOOD. See BLOOD, AVENGER OF.

A'VIM (Heb. אַ״יִם, av-veem'; A'VIMS, or A'VITES, Heb. אַ״י, av-vee').

1. A people among the early inhabitants of Palestine, whom we meet with in the S. W. corner of the seacoast, whither they may have made their way northward from the Desert. The only notice of them which has come down to us is contained in a remarkable fragment of primeval history preserved in Deut. 2:23. Here we see them dwelling in the villages in the S. part of the Shefelah, or great western lowland, "as far as Gaza." In these rich possessions they were attacked by the invading Philistines, "the Caph-torim which came forth out of Capthor," and who after "destroying" them and "dwelling in their stead," appear to have pushed them further N. Possibly a trace of their existence is to be found in the town "Avim" (or "the Avvim"), which occurs among the cities of Benjamin (Josh. 18:23). It is a curious fact that both the LXX. and Jerome identified the Avvim with the Hivites, and also that the town of ha-Avvim was in the actual district of the Hivites (Josh. 9:7, 17, comp. with 18:22-27).

2. The people of Avva, among the colonists who were sent by the king of Assyria to reinhabit the depopulated cities of Israel (2 Kings 17:31). They were idolaters, worshipping gods called Nib-haz and Tartak (Smith, Bib. Dict., s. v.).

A'VITH (Heb. אַ״יִת, av-veeth'), a city of the Edomites, capital of King Hadad before there were kings in Israel (Gen. 36:35; 1 Chron. 1:46).

AVOID, AVOUCH, AWAY. See GLOSSARY.

AWL (Heb. מַרְצֵץ, mar-tsay'-ah, from verb signifying "to bore"), a boring instrument, probably of the simplest kind, and similar to those in familiar use at the present time. It occurs twice in the Scriptures (Exod. 21:6; Deut. 15:17).

AWORK. See GLOSSARY.

AX, the rendering in the A. V. of several original words:

1. Gar-zen' (Heb. גַּרְזֵן, to cut). This appears to have consisted of a head of iron (Isa. 10:34), fastened with thongs or otherwise, upon a handle of wood, and so liable to slip off (Deut. 19:5; 2 Kings 6:5). It was used for felling trees (Deut. 20:19) and for shaping timber, perhaps like the modern adze.

2. Khch'-reb (Heb. חֶרֶב, usually rendered "sword," is used of other cutting instruments; once rendered "ax" (Ezek. 26:9); probably a pickax, as it is said that "with his axes he shall break down thy towers."

3. Kush-sheel' (Heb. כּוּשׁ־שֵׁל, occurs only in Psa. 74:6, and appears to have been a later word denoting a large ax.

4. Mag-zay-raw' (Heb. מַגְזַי־רַו', "iron cutting tools" (K. and D., Com.; 2 Sam. 12:31). Meg-ay-raw' (Heb. מַגְרָה, is also used in the same passage, also 1 Chron. 20:3, and means a saw.

5. Mah-ats-awd' (Heb. מַח־אַטְאֻד', a heaving instrument), rendered "tongs" (Isa. 44:12) and "ax" (Jer. 10:3). Some axes were shaped like chisels fastened to a handle, and such may have been the instrument named in Jeremiah; but as Isaiah (44:12) refers to the work of a blacksmith the mah-ats-awd' was probably a chisel for cutting the iron upon the anvil.

Ancient Axes, etc.

6. Kar-dome' (Heb. כַּרְדֹּם, is the commonest name for ax or hatchet. This is the instrument referred to in Judg. 9:48; 1 Sam. 13:20, 21; Psa. 74:5; Jer. 46:22, and was extensively used for felling trees.

7. The Greek word for ax is ἀξίς, ax-ee'-nay (Matt. 3:10; Luke 3:9).

Figurative. The ax is used in Scripture as a symbol of divine judgment. John Baptist, referring probably to the excision of the Jewish people, says, "And now also the ax is laid unto the root of the trees." This denotes that it had already been stuck into the tree preparatory to felling it. The ax was also used as a symbol of human instrument, e. g., "Shall the ax boast itself against him that heweth therewith?" (Isa. 10:15.) i. e., Shall the king of Assyria boast himself against God?

AXHEAD (Heb. בַּרְזֶל, bar-zel', 2 King 6:5) is literally "iron;" but as an ax is certainly intended, the passage shows that the axheads among the Hebrews were of iron. Those found in Egypt are of bronze, such as was anciently used; but they have made them also of iron, the latter having been consumed by corroding.

AXLETREE occurs only in 1 Kings 7:32, 33, as the translation of יָד, yad, hand, the whole phrase being the hands of the wheels.

A'ZAL (Heb. אֲזַל, aw-tsale', noble), a place, evidently in the neighborhood of Jerusalem, and probably E. of the Mount of Olives (Zech. 14:5). Its site has not been identified.

AZALI'AH (Heb. אֲזַלְיָהוּ, ats-al-yaw'-hoo, reserved by Jehovah), the son of Meshullam and father of Shaphan the scribe. The latter was sent with others by Josiah to repair the temple (2 Kings 22:3; 2 Chron. 34:8), B. C. about 624.

AZANI'AH (Heb. אַזַּנְיָהוּ, az-an-yaw', whom Jehovah hears), the father of Jeshua, which latter was one of the Levites that subscribed the sacred covenant after the exile (Neh. 10:9), B. C. 445.

AZAR'AEL (Neh. 12:36). See AZAREEL (5).

AZAR'EEL (Heb. אַזַּרְעֵל, az-ar-ale', God has helped).

1. One of the Korhites who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron. 12:6), B. C. before 1000.

2. The head of the eleventh division of the musicians of the temple (1 Chron. 25:18), B. C. about 1000. Called Uzziel in v. 4.

3. The son of Jeroham, and prince of the tribe of Dan, when David numbered the people (1 Chron. 27:22).

4. An Israelite, descendant of Bani, who renounced his Gentile wife after the return from Babylon (Ezra 10:41).

5. The son of Ahasai and father of Amashai, which last was one of the chiefs of one hundred and twenty-eight mighty men who served at the temple under the supervision of Zabdai on the restoration from Babylon (Neh. 11:13, 14). He is probably the same with one of the first company of priests who were appointed with Ezra to make the circuit of the newly completed walls with trumpets in their hands (Neh. 12:36), where the name is rendered Azarael.

AZARI'AH (Heb. אַזַּרְיָהוּ, az-ar-yaw', helped by Jehovah), a common name in Hebrew, and especially in the families of the priests of the line of Eleazar, whose name has precisely the same meaning as Azariah. It is nearly identical and is often confounded with Ezra, as well as with Zeraiah and Seraiah.

1. A son or descendant of Zadok, the high priest, in the time of David and one of Solomon's princes (1 Kings 4:2), B. C. 960. He is probably the same with No. 6 below.

2. A son of Nathan, and captain of King Solomon's guards (1 Kings 4:5).

3. Son and successor of Amaziah, king of Judah (2 Kings 14:21; 15:1, sq.; 1 Chron. 3:12), more frequently called UZZIAH (q. v.).

4. Son of Ethan and great-grandson of Judah (1 Chron. 2:8).

5. The son of Jehu and father of Helez, of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 2:38, 39).

6. A high priest, son of Abimaaz and grandson of Zadok (1 Chron. 6:9), whom he seems to have immediately succeeded (1 Kings 4:2). He is probably the same with No. 1 above.

7. The son of Johanan and father of Amariah, a high priest (1 Chron. 6:10, 11). He was probably high priest in the reigns of Abijah and Asa, as his son Amariah was in the days of Jehoshaphat (Smith, s. v.).

8. The son of Hilkiah and father of Seraiah, which latter was the last high priest before the captivity (1 Chron. 6:13, 14; 9:11; Ezra 7:1).

9. A Levite, son of Zephaniah and father of Joel (1 Chron. 6:36). In v. 24 he is called Uzziel. It appears from 2 Chron. 29:12 that his son Joel lived under Hezekiah, and was engaged in the cleansing of the temple.

10. The prophet who met King Asa on his return from a victory over Zerah, the Ethiopian (2 Chron. 15:1), where he is called the son of Oded, but Oded simply in v. 8. He exhorted Asa to put away idolatry and restore the altar of God before the porch of the temple. A national reformation followed, participated in by representatives out of all Israel. Keil (Com.) thinks Obed in v. 8 is an interpolation.

11. Two sons of King Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. 21:2), B. C. 875. M'Clintock and Strong (s. v.) conjecture that there is a repetition of name, and that there was but one son of that name.

12. A clerical error (2 Chron. 22:6) for AHAZIAH (q. v.), king of Judah.

13. A son of Jeroham, one of the "captains" who assisted Jehoiada in restoring the worship of the throne, opposing Athaliah and placing Joash on the throne (2 Chron. 23:1).

14. The son of Obed, another of the "captains" who assisted in the same enterprise (2 Chron. 23:1).

15. High priest in the reign of Uzziah. When the king, elated by his success, "went into the temple of the Lord to burn incense," Azariah went in after him, accompanied by eighty of his brethren, and withstood him (2 Chron. 26:17, sq.).

16. Son of Johanan, and a chief of the tribe of Ephraim, one of those who protested against enslaving their captive brethren taken in the invasion of Judah by Pekah (2 Chron. 28:12).

17. A Merarite, son of Jehalelel, who was one of those who cleansed the temple in the time of Hezekiah (2 Chron. 29:12).

18. A high priest in the time of Hezekiah (2 Chron. 31:10, 13), B. C. 719. He appears to have cooperated zealously with the king in that thorough purification of the temple and restoration of the temple services which was so conspicuous a feature in his reign.

19. The father of Amariah, and an ancestor of Ezra (Ezra 7:3).

20. Son of Maaseiah, who repaired part of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:23, 24), was one of the Levites who assisted Ezra in expounding the law (Neh. 8:7); sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. 10:2), and assisted at the dedication of the city wall (Neh. 12:33).

21. One of the nobles who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Neh. 7:7). Called Seraiah in Ezra 2:2.

22. One of the "proud men" who rebuked Jeremiah for advising the people that remained in Palestine, after their brethren had been taken to Babylon, not to go down into Egypt; and who took the prophet himself and Baruch with them to that country (Jer. 43:2-7).

23. The Hebrew name of ABED-NEGO (q. v.), one of Daniel's three friends who were cast into the fiery furnace (Dan. 1:7).

A'ZAZ (Heb. אַזַּז, aw-zawz', strong), a Reubenite, the son of Shema and father of Bela (1 Chron. v. 8).

AZA'ZEL (Heb. אַזַּזְעֵל, az-aw-zale'), the Hebrew term translated in the A. V. (Lev. 16:8, 10, 26) "scapegoat." It is a word of doubtful interpretation, and has been variously understood.

1. By some it is thought to be the name of the goat sent into the desert. The objection to this is that in vers. 10, 26 the Azazel clearly seems to be that for or to which the goat is let loose. 2. Others have taken Azazel for the name of the place to which the goat was sent. Some of the Jewish writers consider that it denotes the height from which the goat was thrown; while others regarded the word as meaning "desert places." Dr. J. Mayer (Sunday-School Times) believes Azazel to be a word of Coptic origin, and equivalent to oasis. To this oasis he thinks the scapegoat was led by a man familiar with the desert. 3. Many believe Azazel to be a personal being, either a spirit, a demon, or Satan himself. The cabalists teach that in order to satisfy this evil being and to save Israel from his snares, God sends him the goat burdened with all the "iniquities and transgressions" of his people once a year. But we think it entirely improbable that Moses under divine guidance would cause Israel to recognize a demon whose claims on the people were to be met by the bribe of a sin-laden goat. 4. What appears to be the most probable rendering of Azazel is "complete sending away," i. e., solitude. The rendering then of the passage would be "the one for Jehovah, and the other for an utter removal." See ATONEMENT, DAY OF; SCAPEGOAT.

AZAZIAH (Heb. אַזַּזְיָהוּ, az-az-yaw'-hoo, strengthened by Jehovah).

1. One of the Levites who were appointed to play the harp in the service of the tabernacle at the time when the ark was brought up from Obed-edom (1 Chron. 15:21), B. C. about 991.

2. The father of Hoshhea, who was prince of the tribe of Ephraim when David numbered the people (1 Chron. 27:20), B. C. about 1015.

3. One of those who had charge of the temple offerings in the time of Hezekiah (2 Chron. 31:13), B. C. 726.

AZBUK (Heb. אַזְבוּק, az-book', strong devastation), the father of Nehemiah, who was the ruler of the half of Beth-zur, and who repaired part of the wall after the return from Babylon (Neh. 3:16), B. C. before 445.

AZEKAH (Heb. אֶזְקָה, az-ay-kaw', tilled), a town in the plain of Judah (Josh. 15:35; 1 Sam. 17:1), with suburban villages (Neh. 11:30), and a place of considerable strength (Jer. 34:7). The confederated Amorithish kings were defeated here by Joshua, and their army destroyed by an extraordinary shower of hailstones (Josh. 10:10, 11). Joshua's pursuit of the Canaanites after the battle of Beth-horon extended to Azekah; and between it and Shochoh the Philistines encamped before the battle between David and Goliath (1 Sam. 17:1). It was fortified by Rehoboam (2 Chron. 11:9), was still standing at the time of the invasion of the kings of Babylon (Jer. 34:7), and was one of the places reconquered by the Jews on their return from captivity (Neh. 11:30).

A'ZEL (Heb. אֶזֶל, aw-tsale', noble), the son of Eleasah, of the descendants of King Saul (1 Chron. 8:37, 38; 9:43).

A'ZEM (Heb. אֶזֶם, el'-tsem, a bone), a city in the tribe of Simeon, originally included within the southern territory of Judah, near Balah (or Bilhah) and Eltolad (Josh. 15:29; 19:3; 1 Chron. 4:29, A. V. "Ezem").

AZ'GAD (Heb. אַזְגָּד, az-gawd', strong in fortune), an Israelite whose descendants, to the number of 1,222 (2,322 according to Neh. 7:17), returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:12). A second detachment of one hundred and ten, with Johanan at their head, accompanied Ezra (Ezra 8:12). Probably the Azgad of Neh. 10:15 is the same person, some of whose descendants joined in the covenant with Nehemiah.

A'ZIEL, a shortened form (1 Chron. 15:20) for JAAZIEL (q. v.), in v. 18.

AZI'ZA (Heb. אֶזִּיזָא, az-ee-zaw', strong), an Israelite, descendant of Zattu, who divorced the Gentile wife he had married after his return from Babylon (Ezra 10:27), B. C. 456.

AZMA'VETH (Heb. אֶזְמַוֶּתַּי, az-maw'-veth, strong as death).

1. A Barhumite (or Baharumite), one of David's thirty warriors (2 Sam. 23:31; 1 Chron. 11:33), and father of two of his famous slingers (1 Chron. 12:3), B. C. about 1000.

2. The second of the three sons of Jehoadah (1 Chron. 8:36), or Jarah (9:42), a descendant of Jonathan, B. C. after 1030.

3. Son of Adiel, and keeper of the royal treasury of David (1 Chron. 27:25), B. C. about 1000.

4. A village of Judah or Benjamin (Neh. 12:29), called (7:28) Beth-azmaveth. It was occupied by Jews who returned with Ezra from Babylon. The notices of it seem to point to some locality in the northern environs of Jerusalem.

AZ'MON (Heb. אֶזְמוֹן, ats-mone', bonelike), a place on the southern border of Palestine, between Hazar-adar and "the river of Egypt" (Num. 34:4, 5; Josh. 15:4).

AZ'NOTH-TABOR (Heb. אֶזְנוֹת תְּבוֹר, az-nōth' tau-bore', tops of Tabor), a town in the W. of Naphtali, between the Jordan and Hukkuk (Josh. 19:34).

A'ZOR (Gr. Ἀζωρ, from אָזַר, to help), the son of Eliakim and father of Sadoc, in the paternal ancestry of Christ (Matt. 1:13).

AZOTUS (Gr. Ἀζωτος, ad'-zo-tos), the Grecized form (Acts 8:40) of ASHDOD (q. v.).

AZ'RIEL (Heb. אֶזְרִיאֵל, az-ree-ale', help of God).

1. A mighty man of valor, and one of the heads of the half tribe of Manasseh beyond Jordan, who were taken into captivity by the king of Assyria as a punishment for their national idolatry (1 Chron. 5:24), B. C. about 740.

2. The father of Jerimoth, which latter was ruler of the tribe of Naphtali under David (1 Chron. 27:19), B. C. about 1000.

3. The father of Seraiiah, who with others was appointed by King Jehoiakim to apprehend Baruch, the scribe, and Jeremiah for sending him a threatening prophecy (Jer. 36:26), B. C. 600.

AZ'RIKAM (Heb. אֶזְרִיקָם, az-ree-kavom', help against the enemy).

1. The last named of the three sons of Neariah, a descendant of Zerubbabel (1 Chron. 3:23), B. C. about 404. He is perhaps the same as AZOR (q. v.).

2. The first of the six sons of Azel, of the tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron. 8:38; 9:44).

3. A Levite, son of Hashabiah and father of Hasshub (1 Chron. 9:14; Neh. 11:15), B. C. before 586.

4. The governor of the king's house in the time of Abaz, slain by Zichri, a mighty man of Ephraim (2 Chron. 28:7), B. C. 741.

AZU'BAH (Heb. אַזוּבָּה, az-oo-baw', ruins, forsaken).

1. The daughter of Shilhi and mother of King Jehoshaphat (1 Kings 22:42; 2 Chron. 20:31), B. C. before 875.

2. The wife of Caleb, the son of Hezron (1 Chron. 2:18, 19), B. C. about 1471. See JERIOTH.

A'ZUR (Heb. אַזוּר, az-zoor', a less correct form of Azzur, helper).

1. The father of Hananiah of Gibeon, which latter was the prophet who falsely encouraged King Zedekiah against the Babylonians (Jer. 28:1), B. C. about 596.

2. The father of Jaazaniah, who was one of the men whom the prophet in vision saw devising false schemes of safety for Jerusalem (Ezek. 11:1), B. C. 594.

AZ'ZAH (Heb. אַזְזָה, az-zaw', the strong), the more correct English form (Deut. 2:23; 1 Kings 4:24; Jer. 25:20) of GAZA (q. v.). The latter is the form given in the R. V.

AZ'ZAN (Heb. אַזְזָן, az-zaw'n', perhaps a thorn), the father of Paltiel, the prince of the tribe of Issachar, and commissioner from that tribe in the dividing of Canaan (Num. 34:26), B. C. 1209.

AZ'ZUR (Heb. אַזְזוּר, az-zoor', helper), one of the chief Israelites who signed the covenant with Nehemiah on the return from Babylon (Neh. 10:17), B. C. 445.

BA'AL (Heb. בַּעַל, bah'al, lord, possessor).

1. A very common name for god among the Phœnicians. The word is also used of the master and owner of a house (Exod. 22:7; Judg. 19:22); of a landowner (Job 31:39); of an owner of cattle (Exod. 21:28; Isa. 1:3), etc. The word is often used as a prefix to names of towns and men, e. g., Baal-gad, Baal-hanan, etc.

2. The name of the chief male god of the Phœnicians. See Gods, FALSE.

3. A Reubenite, son of Reaia. His son Beerah was among the captives carried away by Tiglath-pileser (1 Chron. 5:5), B. C. before 740.

4. The fourth named of the sons of Jehiel, the founder of Gibeon, by his wife Maachah (1 Chron. 8:30; 9:36), B. C. before 1200.

5. The name of a place (1 Chron. 4:33), elsewhere BAALATH-BEER (q. v.).

BA'ALAH (Heb. בַּעַלְהָ, bah-al-aw', mistress).

1. A city on the northern border of the tribe of Judah (Josh. 15:10). Dr. Thomson says it may have been one of the religious sanctuaries of the ancient Gibeonites, as it appears (Josh. 15:9) that Baalah and Kirjath-jearim were applicable to the same place. See 1 Chron. 13:6.

2. A city on the S. of Judah (Josh. 15:29). Called Balah (Josh. 19:3); also Bilhah (1 Chron. 4:29).

3. A mountain on the N. W. boundary of Judah, between Shicron and Jabneel (Josh. 15:11), usually regarded as the same with Mount Jearim.

BA'ALATH (Heb. בַּעַלְתַּי, bah-al-aw'ith', mistressship), a town of the tribe of Dan (Josh. 19:44); supposed to be the place fortified by Solomon (1 Kings 9:18; 2 Chron. 8:6).

BA'ALATH-BE'ER (Heb. בַּעַלְתַּי בְּעַר, bah-al-ath' beh-ayr', mistress of the well), a city of Simeon (Josh. 19:8), and probably the same as Baal (1 Chron. 4:33). Doubtless identical with Ramoth-Negeb (Josh. 19:8). It is also the same with the BEALOTH (q. v.) of Judah (Josh. 15:24).

BA'AL-BE'RITH, a god worshiped in Shechem. See Gods, FALSE.

BA'ALE OF JU'DAH (Heb. בַּעַלֵי יְהוּדָה, bah-al-ay' yeh-hoo-daw', lords of Judah), a city of Judah, from which David brought the ark into Jerusalem (2 Sam. 6:2). Probably the same as BAALAH, 1 (q. v.).

BA'AL-GAD (Heb. בַּעַל גַּד, bah'al gawd, lord of fortune), a Canaanite city (Josh. 11:17; 12:7), at the foot of Hermon, hence called Baal-hermon (Judg. 3:3; 1 Chron. 5:23). It is the modern Banias, in the valley of Lebanon.

BA'AL-HA'MON (Heb. בַּעַל הַרְבִּיּוֹן, bah'al haw-mone', lord of a multitude), the place where Solomon had a vineyard (Cant. 8:11) which he let out to "keepers." Location is uncertain.

BA'AL-HA'NAN (Heb. בַּעַל הַנָּחַן, bah'al khaw-naw'n', lord of grace).

1. An early king of Edom, son of Achbor, successor of Saul, and succeeded by Hadar (Gen. 36:38, 39; 1 Chron. 1:49, 50), B. C. after 1676.

2. A Gederite, David's overseer of "the olive trees and sycamore trees in the low plains" (1 Chron. 27:28), B. C. after 1000.

BA'AL-HA'ZOR (Heb. בַּעַל הַצֹּר, bah'al khaw-tsore', having a village), a place near Ephraim where Absalom had a sheep farm, and where he murdered Amnon (2 Sam. 13:23). Probably the same with Hazor (Neh. 11:33), now Tell 'Asar.

BA'AL-HER'MON (Heb. בַּעַל הַרְמֹן, bah'al kher-mone', lord of Hermon).

1. A city of Ephraim near Mount Hermon (1 Chron. 5:23). Probably identical with Baal-gad (Josh. 11:17).

2. A mountain E. of Lebanon (Judg. 8:3), from which the Israelites were unable to expel the Hivites. "Baal-hermon is only another name for Baal-gad, the present Banjas, under the Hermon (see Josh. 13:5)" (K. and D., Com.).

BA'ALI (Heb. בַּעַלִי, bah-al-ee', my master). "Thou shalt call me Ishi; and shalt call me no more Baali" (Hos. 2:16). The meaning is that the Church will enter into right relation with God, in which she will look toward him as her husband (Ishi), and not merely as owner, master. "Calling or naming is a designation of the nature or the true relation of a person or thing. The Church calls God her husband when she stands in the right relation to him; when she acknowledges, reveres, and loves him, as he has revealed himself, i. e., as the only true God. On the other hand, she calls him Baal when she places the true God on the level of the Baals, either worshiping other gods along with Jehovah, or by obliterating the essential distinction between Jehovah and the Baals" (K. and D., Com., in loc.).

BA'ALIM, the plural of Baal. See GODS, FALSE.

BA'ALIS (Heb. בַּעֲלִים, bah-al-ecce', in exaltation), king of the Ammonites about the time of the Babylonian captivity, whom Johanan reported to Gedaliah, the viceroy, as having sent Ishmael to slay him (Jer. 40:13, 14), B. C. 588.

BA'AL-ME'ON (Heb. בַּעַל מְעוֹן, bah'al-meh-one', lord of the dwelling), one of the towns rebuilt by the Reubenites, and their names changed (Num. 32:38). Baal-Meon (Beon, v. 3; Beth-Meon, Jer. 48:23; and Beth-Baal-Meon, Josh. 13:17) is probably to be found in the ruins of Myun, S. E. of Heshbon (K. and D., Com.).

BA'AL-PE'OR, a god of the Moabites. See GODS, FALSE.

BA'AL-PER'AZIM (Heb. בַּעַל פְּרִיצִים, bah'al-per-aw-iseem', possessor of breaches), called Mount Perazim (Isa. 28:21), S. W. of Jerusalem, the modern Jebel Aly. Here David fought the Philistines (2 Sam. 5:20; 1 Chron. 14:11). The place and the circumstances appear to be again alluded to in Isa. 28:21, where it is called Mount Perazim.

BA'AL-SHAL'ISHA (Heb. בַּעַל שָׁלִישָׁה, bah'al shaw-lee-shaw', lord of Shalisha), a place of Ephraim, not far W. from Gilgal (2 Kings 4:38, 42). From this place a man brought provisions for Elisha.

BA'AL-TA'MAR (Heb. בַּעַל תְּמָרִים, bah'al-taw-mawr', lord of palm trees), one of the groves of Baal. Probably the palm tree of Deborah (Judg. 4:5). In the tribe of Benjamin near Gibeah of Saul (Judg. 20:33). The notices seem to correspond to the present ruined site Erhah, about three miles N. E. of Jerusalem.

BA'AL-ZE'BUB, the god of the Philistines at Ekron. See GODS, FALSE.

BA'AL-ZEPHON (Heb. בַּעַל צִפּוֹן, bah'al-tsef-one', Baal of winter, or north), a place belonging to Egypt on the border of the Red Sea (Exod. 14:2; Num. 33:7), mentioned in connection with Pi-hahiroth, on the journey of the Israelites. It must have been a well-known place, inasmuch as it is always mentioned to indicate the location of Pi-hahiroth.

BA'ANA (Heb. בָּאָנָה, bah-an-aw', son of af-ficion).

1. The son of Ahilud, one of Solomon's twelve purveyors, whose district comprised Taanach, Megiddo, and all Beth-shean, with the adjacent region (1 Kings 4:12), B. C. 960.

2. The father of Zadok, which latter person assisted in rebuilding the walls of Jerusalem under Nehemiah (Neh. 3:4), B. C. 445.

BA'ANAH, another form of BAANA.

1. A son of Rimmon, the Beerothite. He, with his brother Rechab, slew Ishbosheth while he lay in his bed, and took the head to David in Hebron. For this David caused them to be put to death, their hands and feet to be cut off, and their bodies, thus mutilated, hung up over the pool at Hebron (2 Sam. 4:2-12), B. C. about 992.

2. A Netophathite, father of Heleb, or Heled, which latter person was one of David's mighty men (2 Sam. 23:29; 1 Chron. 11:30), B. C. about 1000.

3. The son of Hushai, and purveyor of King Solomon. His district was in Asher and Aloth (1 Kings 4:16), B. C. 960. The name should be translated Baana.

BA'ARA (Heb. בַּעֲרָה, bah-ar-aw', brutish), one of the wives of Shaharaim, of the tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron. 8:8). In v. 9, by some error, she is called Hodesh.

BAASETAH (Heb. בַּעֲשֵׂתָה, bah-as-ay-yaw', work of Jehovah), a Gershonite Levite, son of Malchiah and father of Michael, in the lineage of Asaph the singer (1 Chron. 6:40), B. C. before 1000.

BA'ASHA (Heb. בַּעֲשָׂה, bah-shaw', offensive-ness), the third sovereign of the separate kingdom of Israel, and the founder of its second dynasty. He reigned B. C. 911-888. Baasha was the son of Ahijah, of the tribe of Issachar, and conspired against King Nadab, the son of Jeroboam (when he was besieging the Philistine town of Gibbethon), and killed him and his whole family (1 Kings 15:27, sq.). He was probably of humble origin, as the prophet Jehu speaks of him as being "exalted out of the dust" (1 Kings 16:2). In matters of religion his reign was no improvement on that of Jeroboam, and he was chiefly remarkable for his hostility to Judah. He built Ramah "that he might not suffer any to go out or come in to Asa king of Judah" (1 Kings 15:17). He was compelled to desist by the unexpected alliance of Asa with Ben-hadad I of Damascus. Baasha died in the twenty-fourth year of his reign, and was honorably buried in Tirzah, which he had made his capital (1 Kings 15:33; 16:6). For his idolatries the prophet Jehu declared to him the determination of God to exterminate his family, which was accomplished in the days of his son Elah, by Zimri (1 Kings 16:10-13).

BABBLER, the rendering (Eccles. 10:11) of the Heb. בַּבְּלֵן לְשׁוֹן, bah'al law-shone', master of the tongue. The word is understood by some as charmer, by others as slanderer. Paul was called a "babblor" (Acts 17:18, Gr. σπερμολόγος, sper-mol-og'-os, seed picker, as the crow), probably with a twofold meaning: (1) from the manner in which that bird feeds, a parasite; and (2) from its chattering voice.

BABBLINGS (Heb. דַּבָּר, see'-akh, Prov. 23: 29), conversing with oneself, as the drunkard; (Gr. κενολογία, ken'-o-nee'-ah) empty discussion, discussion of vain and useless matters (1 Tim. 6: 20; 2 Tim. 2:16).

BABE (Heb. עוֹלָל, o-lal'e'; or עוֹלָל, o-lawl', a little child, Psa. 8:2; 17:14; תַּחֲלוּל, tah-al-ool', caprice, vexation, Isa. 3:4; נַצֵּר, nah'-ar, tossing about, a wanderer, Exod. 2:6, usually a lad; Gr. βρέφος, bref'-os, an unborn child, Luke 1:41, 44; a newborn child, Luke 2:12, 16; 18:15; 1 Pet. 2:2). The expression "from a child" (2 Tim. 3:15) is the rendering of ἀπὸ βρέφους, from infancy. Νήπιος, nay'-pee-os, not speaking, is strictly used of infants, but also of little children generally (Matt. 21:16; 1 Cor. 3:1; 13:11; Heb. 5:13).

Figurative. Babe is used figuratively to represent a succession of weak and wicked princes who reigned over Judah from the death of Josiah to the destruction of Jerusalem (Isa. 3:4). In the New Testament the term refers to the weak in Christian faith and knowledge (1 Cor. 3:1; Heb. 5:13; 1 Pet. 2:2).

BA'BEL (Heb. בְּבֵל, bá-bel', confusion), the name originally applied to the Tower of Babel (Gen. 11:9), and afterward extended (10:10) to the city of BABYLON (q. v.). From the account given in Genesis (11:2-9) it appears that men had wandered since the Deluge without any permanent abode, but finally settled in the land of Shinar. There they resolved to build an immense tower, and for this purpose made bricks and burned them thoroughly, so that they became as stone. For mortar they used asphalt, in which the neighborhood of Babylon abounds. The motive for building the tower was the desire for renown, and the object was to establish a noted central point, which might serve to maintain their unity.

Jehovah interfered with this ungodly purpose, and sent upon the workmen confusion of tongues. This interposition was doubtless miraculous, as indeed, on simply natural principles, it were impossible to account for such a confusion of language as would be sufficient to arrest the progress of the building and force the builders into a separation from their cherished home.

Traditions, etc. There was a tradition among the Chaldeans that the building of an immense tower was prevented by the gods, who also caused the builders to differ in their speech. The identification of Birs-Nimrud with the Tower of Babel has an insuperable difficulty in its distance from Babylon. Indeed, there are no real grounds for identifying the tower with the Temple of Belus, or for supposing that any remains of the building long survived the check which the builders received.

The expression "whose top may reach unto heaven" (Gen. 11:4) is a mere hyperbole for great height, and should not be taken literally. See Deut. 1:28; Dan. 4:11, etc.

BABYLON, BA'BEL.—1. Name. The name of a city on the Euphrates River, capital of the country of Babylonia. The name is connected by the Hebrews with the root bá-lal' (בָּלַל), to confound, in the narrative of the confusion of tongues at the Tower of Babel (Gen. 11:9). The Babylonians called the city Bib-ili, gate of god, and Báb-iláni, gate of the gods. In the Sumerian inscriptions (see BABYLONIA) it is called Ka-din-gira, gate of god; Tin-tir, seat of life; Shu-anna, and E-ki. The biblical account ascribes its foundation to the descendants of Cush and followers of Nimrod (Gen. 11:2-9) who came from the East and settled in the plain of Shinar. This statement distinguishes the people who founded the city from the Semitic race who afterward possessed it. All that we have been able to learn of the city and its history points strongly to the same view.

2. Size and Appearance. (1) Sources of information. Our knowledge of the size and appearance of the ancient city is derived from several sources. We have first the Greek historians and geographers, and second the Babylonian inscriptions, especially those of Nebuchadnezzar, and third the various allusions in the Old Testament, and lastly the ruins and mounds of the ancient city which are still in existence. Of the last named we know even yet comparatively little. The ruins are so extensive that no individual or society has been bold enough to attempt their complete excavation. The cost of removing the soil from the buried streets, houses, palaces, and temples would be so great as to be at present prohibitive, even if the Turkish government and the fanatical inhabitants of the neighborhood were both disposed to permit and encourage such an undertaking. Furthermore, the ruins upon the western bank of the Euphrates have been much swept by the Euphrates during the spring floods, to the destruction of ancient landmarks. The desultory diggings by various investigators have produced but little compared to that which has rewarded digging at Nineveh and Nippur, while the natives have destroyed many antiquities and obliterated important lines of wall in their search for building material with which they have erected squalid villages far and wide. It is to be hoped that even yet some government or society will be bold enough to dig over the entire surface. There is reason to hope that in spite of the wasting of the river and the tunneling of the Arabs valuable antiquities may be found. As we cannot learn much of the topography of the city from the ruins in their present condition we are forced back upon the other sources, viz., the Greek, the Babylonian, and the Hebrew writers. Unhappily, these differ in their statements, and a reconciliation of them in all their details is not now possible. The Old Testament, however, says relatively little of the topography of the city, and we have, therefore, practically but two sources—the Greek and the Babylonian. It will be convenient to set down in order the more important facts as derived from these. (2) Greek sources. The first Greek authority is Herodotus, "father of history," or "father of lies," according to two diverse opinions of his veracity. He claims to have seen the city with his own eyes, and from his description the following facts may be gleaned (Book i, 178-186). The city was in the form of a square, one hundred and twenty stades (thirteen miles thirteen hundred and eighty-five yards) on each side. It had two walls, inner and outer. The vast space within the walls was laid out in streets, at right angles each to the other, and these streets were lined with houses three or four stories in height. The chief public edifices were the following: (1) The temple of Belus, consisting of a tower, pyramidal in form, of eight stories, with a winding ascent. On the top was a sanctuary. This tower was surrounded by a walled inclosure with brazen gates, measuring two stades (four hundred yards) each way. (2) The palace of the king. (3) The bridge across the Euphrates, connecting the eastern and western sections of the city. The representations of Herodotus present a city overwhelming in size and magnificence. The next Greek writers whose records are important are Ctesias and his reproducer and elaborator Diodorus Siculus (ii, 7, sq.). According to them the city was much smaller than Herodotus has represented. Its circuit was three hundred and sixty stades (forty-one miles six hundred yards). The walls are also smaller, being three hundred feet instead of three hundred and thirty-seven and one half feet (Herodotus) in height. To the bridge of Herodotus, Diodorus adds also a tunnel under the river, and describes the hanging gardens of Nebuchadnezzar as rising in terraces from a base four hundred feet square, upon which great depth were supported full grown trees. These representations of Herodotus, Ctesias, and Diodorus Siculus are copied by later writers, notably Strabo, Pliny, and Quintus Curtius, who make obvious mistakes in some places and copy accurately in others. Sometimes they reduce the great size by changing the measures into those of smaller size or capacity (such as cubits into feet) without changing the numbers attached to them. It is evident from even a cursory survey of the Greek writers that only an unsatisfactory view, untenable in details, can be made out of their descriptions. (3) Babylonian sources. It was Nabopolassar, father of the famous Nebuchadnezzar, who built the walls of Babylon. It is, however, not from him, but from his son, that we learn most about them. The inscriptions of Nebuchadnezzar agree, in the very beginning, with Herodotus in the statement that the city had two walls. The inner one was called Immitti-Bél (foundation of Bél) and the outer Imgur-Bél (Bél has been merciful). Around these walls were great moats for additional defense, dug out of the soil by Nabopolassar and bricked up by Nebuchadnezzar. The gates in the walls, says the latter, were of cedar covered with copper, though the Greek accounts were formerly interpreted as meaning that the gates were solid metal. It is interesting to note that gates like these have already been found at Balawat, in Assyria. The palace in the city, which had also been built by his father, Nebuchadnezzar restored and beautified. Its doors were constructed in the same manner as the gates of the walls; the thresholds were of bronze, and the interior was magnificently adorned with gold, silver, and jewels. Besides these great works he enumerates a number of temples within the city either erected or restored by him. As far as the inscriptions have been read they support Herodotus rather than Ctesias and the later Greeks. (4) The Hebrew accounts are more valuable for the history than for the topography of the city. As to the latter, however, they represent the city as great in size, beauty, and strength, and in this, as we have seen above, are amply sustained by the inscriptions.

3. History. The beginnings of the city of Babylon are unknown to us except for the biblical passage already mentioned (Gen. 10:10). The Babylonian inscriptions give us no information concerning the origin of the city. An omen tablet which mentions Sargon I alludes to Babylon as already in existence in his day (about 3800 B. C.). This may or may not have been the case. Of the great antiquity of the city there can be no doubt. During the period (3000-2400 B. C.) when the smaller states in Babylonia were uniting to form the kingdom of Sumer and Akkad no reference is ever made to Babylon. But from the period about 2400 B. C. the city is so powerful as always to command attention. The name of the first king of Babylon known to us is Sumu-abi (2399-2385 B. C. ?) of whom we know nothing. The real maker of the city's exalted position was the sixth king in her first dynasty—Hammurabi (2287-2233 B. C. ?), who conquered the kingdom of Sumer and Akkad and made Babylon its capital. He also dug great canals for irrigating the neighboring country, erected buildings, restored temples, and otherwise beautified and adorned the capital (see AMRAPHEL). From his time onward the city increased rapidly in power until the growing Assyrian power was able to assert its jealousy and begin to attack and invade the regions about Babylon. These successive invasions disturbed the commercial life and weakened the city's strength until at last (689 B. C.) Sennacherib destroyed it. It was rebuilt by his wiser son Esar-haddon (see articles SENNACHERIB and ESAR-HADDON), but did not again reach exalted power until the reign of Nabopolassar (625-605), who greatly strengthened and beautified it, as did also his son Nebuchadnezzar (605-562) (Dan. 4:30). The later Babylonian kings also claim to have added to the great buildings in the city. In 538 Babylon was taken by Cyrus, and with that the decay of the city may be said to begin. Xerxes plundered it. Alexander the Great thought to restore the great temple, in ruins in his day, but was deterred by the prospective cost. During the period of Alexander's successors it decayed rapidly and soon became a desert. From the days of Seleucus Nicator (312-280 B. C.), who built the rival city Seleucia on the Tigris, queenly Babylon never revived. The end of the greatest world city of antiquity had come.—R. W. R.

Figurative. Romish writers generally, and some also among Protestants, would understand the expression in 1 Pet. 5:13, "The church that is at Babylon, elected together with you," of Babylon in a mystic sense, viz., of pagan Rome. Capellus and others take it to mean Jerusalem. Others locate it on the Tigris, and identify it with Seleucia or Ctesiphon; others still, in Egypt. "The most natural supposition of all is that by Babylon is intended the old Babylon of Assyria, which was largely inhabited by Jews at the time in question" (Smith, Bib. Dict., s. v.).

The Babylon in the Book of Revelation (14:8; 16:19; 17:5; 18:2) is generally believed to be the symbolical name for Rome, some identifying it with pagan and others with papal Rome. "The power of Rome was regarded by later Jews as that of Babylon by their forefathers (comp. Jer. 51:7 with Rev. 14:8), and hence, whatever the people of Israel be understood to symbolize, Babylon represents the antagonistic principle" (Bib. Dict., s. v.).

Another interpretation identifies Babylon with Jerusalem, i. e., with the Jerusalem which was false to its heavenly King. But in this view "Babylon is not the Jerusalem only of 'the Jews.' She is the great Church of God throughout the world when that Church becomes faithless to her true Lord and King" (Dr. William Milligan, Com., Rev., ch. 17).

BABYLO'NIA.—1. Name. The name of Babylonia is derived from its chief city, Babylon, and the land, like the city, is often in late inscriptions called Bab-ili, gate of god. In earlier periods the country about the city was called Karadunyash, and this name may have been applied to the wider land which we know as Babylonia. The usual name of Babylonia, however, in the inscriptions, especially those of early periods, is Sumer and Akkad. Sumer is probably to be connected with the biblical Shinar, and Akkad with the city of Akkad, or Agade, though both these identifications are doubtful. It is, however, probable that Sumer and Akkad was long used as a political, not a geographical, designation for the land of Babylonia.

2. Geography. The territorial limits of Babylonia cannot be settled with any accuracy, for the reason that they varied greatly from time to time, according to the success or failure of Babylonian arms. In general the following facts are true: The northern boundary of Babylonia was formed by Assyria, and was marked by a line of forts known to the Greeks as the Median Wall. This boundary was the subject of friendly negotiation between early Babylonian and Assyrian kings, and the subject of ruthless war between their successors. It varied in position in different ages. The eastern boundary for the more part was the river Tigris, though certain cities beyond the Tigris often belonged to the political system of Babylonia. The southern boundary was the Persian Gulf. It is to be noted that this boundary was also changing, for the rivers Tigris and Euphrates were constantly making new soil. Even so late as the reign of Sennacherib they discharged their waters through two separate mouths into the Persian Gulf, though now they have but one. The western boundary was the Euphrates, though the country actually possessed extended to the edge of the desert, a short distance W. of the river. The entire land is flat, and if not in its entire length, certainly in its lower portions alluvial. The soil is largely of clay, but the top is exceedingly fertile when properly irrigated and drained, as it was in the Babylonian period. It was a wheat-producing country of the first rank, and the title lists of the native temples show that Herodotus was probably not exaggerating when he stated that it produced one third of the wheat grown in the whole Persian empire. Under the misgovernment and oppression of later times the land has been turned into a waste. The overflow of the rivers, uncontrolled by the great system of canals now in ruin, lies in stagnant pools, and one of the richest of lands in antiquity has become one of the poorest of the modern world.

3. Ethnology. The inhabitants of Babylonia during the historical period were a mixture of several races. In the earliest period the chief race was the Sumerians. This was the people who founded a number of the chief cities, invented the cuneiform system of writing, and in general may be said to have laid the foundations of culture and civilization in the land. A few inscriptions written in their language have come down to us. But these are mixed with words and even constructions that belong to the Semitic family of languages, and are therefore less valuable as sources of independent information. Besides these there are bilingual texts, consisting of Sumerian with interlinear Babylonian text. These are so strongly colored by Babylonian words as to be of subordinate use for the study of the Sumerian language. From all that can be now learned from these texts it appears that the language of the Sumerians was similar to the modern Finnish and Turkish, so that it may be conveniently grouped with them. This fact, however, gives us no clew to the racial affinities of the Sumerians, for identity of language is not a proof of identity of race, but merely of social contact. The sculptures of this people which are still preserved are not sufficient in themselves to determine the racial connections of the people, and the question must now be left without solution. The next important people in Babylonia were the Semites—a people belonging to the same family as the Hebrews, Arabs, and Assyrians. When they first entered the country and whence they came are alike unknown to us. At a very early period we find them beginning to found kingdoms and to incorporate in them the conquered Sumerian states. The Semitic language also appears very early by the side of the Sumerian. The branch of Semites who first conquered and ruled in Babylonia received accession from other Semitic peoples out of Arabia during the early periods. To the Sumerian and Semitic stocks were added, as time went on, yet other peoples from Elam, Media, and elsewhere, until the people of Babylonia were so completely mixed as to defy all analysis into separate races. It is strange that on the other hand the people of Assyria should suffer comparatively little from mixture, and should be able to pride themselves upon pure Semitic blood. See SUPPLEMENT.

4. History. (1) Early period. The political history of Babylonia has its beginning at a period so early that to assign any date for its origin exposes the chronologist and all his work to doubt. The history of Egypt is rivaled, if not exceeded, in antiquity by what is already known of the early history of Babylonia, and the latest discoveries tend to push back still further the beginnings of the history. It is as yet impossible to set dates for the early events in the history. We must, however, have some point at which to begin our story. It is safe to fix upon the year 4000 B. C. as marking a period of which we begin to have some knowledge. At this time there were no great kingdoms in Babylonia.

(2) City kingdoms. The land had a number of cities, each surrounded by its dependent cities, or its narrow tributary country. In each of these cities there ruled a king. Gradually these kings of cities were led by religion or ambition, or both, to attempt the conquest of other cities, and thus increase their territory and influence. From such attempted conquests small kingdoms were gradually formed. Out of these petty kingdoms later days were to make a mighty empire. The earliest kings of the small city kingdoms whose names are known to us are Alusharshid, king of Kish, and Sargon, king of Agade. It is impossible to say exactly when they ruled. There are good reasons for placing the latter about 3800 B. C., and the former is now probably to be placed even earlier. Both were conquerors. In their time the adding of city to city had already begun, and the city kingdoms were beginning to be extended so as to include territory far beyond the city limits or the limits of all its environs or colonies. Alusharshid conquered in Elam; Sargon marched westward even to the Mediterranean, and brought back from the Lebanon cedar beams wherewith to build his palace. He used these beams also in the construction of a temple to the god Bel in Nippur, so that he must have had some sort of influence in that city so far distant from his own city of Agade. After the days of these two kings a long period is passed over, of which we know nothing. Other city kingdoms were growing up in other parts of the land, especially at Lagash and at Ur. Of the former city there is known to us a ruler by the name of Gudea. His inscriptions, written in the Sumerian language, show him to have been the head of a very high civilization. He built great temples in his cities, bringing for this purpose both stone and wood from the Amanus Mountains in Syria. (3) King Urbau. In Ur about 2900 B. C. we find ruling a king by the name of Urbau, and with him the power of that famous city first becomes clearly known to us. Other cities, such as Isin and Larsa, are important centers of activity and of government at this early date. Each of these cities in turn seems to have exercised sovereignty over a considerable part of Babylonia. When a city began to have attached to it a considerable territory outside the natural sphere of influence the king was no longer satisfied to be called king of the city, but desired a more sounding title. This custom of adopting an additional title begins, for us, with Urbau. He calls himself not only "king of Ur," but also "king of Sumer and Akkad." This phrase is not geographical, but political, in meaning. It is the name of the kingdom located in southern Babylonia, consisting of a number of cities with their surrounding country. The capital of this kingdom is at one time Ur, at another Larsa, at another Isin. This consolidation of several cities into one large kingdom was the beginning of unity. The Sumerian and Semitic populations were beginning to cease opposition, each to the other, and were forming strong kingdoms in consequence. But this was not achieved without difficulties from the outside. About 2300 B. C. the city of Larsa was conquered by Kudur-Mabuk, king of Elam, who made his son Eri-Aku a king there. There was another Elamite king of apparently the same dynasty, Kudur-nankhundi, who also ravaged but did not rule in Babylonia (see ARIOCH and CHEDORLAOMER). These invasions from Elam only made the need of internal unity and strength more evident. These cities in Babylonia could not sustain their independence against assaults from strong kingdoms elsewhere if they were not united. (4) Babylon. While these movements were taking place in southern Babylonia a city was growing in northern Babylonia which should ultimately rule the entire land. Babylon was probably already an ancient city in the year 2400 B. C. But we know no king's name who ruled in it before Sumu-abi (2399-2385 B. C.?). At that time the city was already large and powerful, and must have had centuries of development behind it. Of this king and of the four who followed him we know but little. We hear of the building of temples and palaces and fortresses, and these notices testify to us of wealth and power. (5) Hammurabi. With the sixth king a new era begins. Hammurabi (2287-2233 B. C.?) began his reign under auspicious circumstances; the small kingdoms with which he was surrounded were weak and easy to conquer. It was his ambition to make a united Babylonia. The beginning of the execution of this plan was the conquest of Larsa. The king of Larsa was Eri-Aku (see ARIOCH), who is also called Rim-Sin, and he held the title of king of Sumer and Akkad. We know nothing of the details of this conquest. It happened about 2250 B. C., and with it came an end to the old Sumerian civilization. No rebellion against Hammurabi followed; his authority was everywhere recognized, and we are therefore probably justified in the inference that the conquest was an easy one. Hammurabi was a statesman as well as a soldier, and set himself at once to justify himself to the people of Sumer and Akkad by wise administration. The chief among his great public works was the building of a great canal, which he describes in these words: "Hammurabi, the powerful king, king of Babylon, . . . when Anu and Bel gave unto me to rule the land of Sumer and Akkad, and with their scepter filled my hands, I dug the canal Hammurabi, the Blessing-of-Men, which bringeth the water of the overflow unto the land of Sumer and Akkad. Its banks upon both sides I made arable land; much seed I scattered upon it. Lasting water I provided for the land of Sumer and Akkad. The land of Sumer and Akkad, its separated peoples I united; with blessings and abundance I endowed them; in peaceful dwellings I made them to live." He could have executed no more useful work than this. It brought water to a thirsty land. If he had been received doubtfully by the people of Sumer and Akkad he could have chosen no way in which to knit to himself and his royal house the hearts of a conquered people.

Besides this work of utility, Hammurabi followed the example of his predecessors in the erection and repair of public buildings. The temples of the Sun in Larsa and in Sippar he rebuilt; the temple of Ishtar in Zaulab he extended, and the great temples of E-sagila and E-zida in Babylon itself he enlarged and beautified. "But these buildings are only external evidences of the great work wrought, in this long reign, for civilization. The best of the culture of the ancient Sumerians was brought into Babylon and there carefully conserved. What this meant to the centuries that came after is shown clearly in the later inscriptions. To Babylon the later kings of Assyria look constantly as to the real center of culture and civilization. No Assyrian king is content with Nineveh and its glories, great though these were in later days; his chiefest glory came when he could also call himself king of Babylon, when the symbolic act of taking hold of the hands of Bel-Marduk had been accomplished. Nineveh was the center of a kingdom of warriors, Babylon the abode of scholars; and the wellspring of all this is to be found in the works of Hammurabi. But if the kings of Assyria looked unto Babylon with longing eyes, yet more did later kings in the city of Babylon itself look back to the days of Hammurabi as the golden age of their history. Nabopolassar and Nebuchadnezzar acknowledged the power of this great king in the most flattering way. They imitated in their inscriptions the very words and phrases in which he described his building, and, not satisfied with this, even copied the exact form of his tablets and the manner of the writing. In building, his plans were followed; and in rule and administration his methods were imitated. His works and his words entitle him to rank as the real founder of Babylon" (Rogers, Outlines of the Early History of Babylon, pp. 29, 30). Of the successors of Hammurabi we know very little. After him came five kings before the end of the first dynasty of Babylon, about 2096 B. C. After this came the second dynasty, which lasted until about 1727 B. C. In this the peace which Hammurabi had achieved continued. The reigns were long, and time was given to art, literature, and science. See AMRAPHEL. (6) Elamite invasions. The last two reigns, however, were short, and it is probably a safe inference that at this time the invasions had begun which were to result in a new dynasty. The fertile land of Babylonia had often tempted the mountaineers of Elam. They now began to invade it, not as organized armies, but in vast hordes of immigrants. The chief position among the invaders was held by a people known as the Kassites. Of their racial connections we know very little. They were apparently not Semites. They soon came to power in the state, and were able to put upon the throne a king of their own. The Kassite dynasty thus begun held control in Babylonia, according to the Babylonian king lists, for a period of five hundred and seventy-six years and nine months, or until 1019 B. C. Of most of these kings we know nothing beyond the names and probable dates. Among them the most famous seem to have been Agu, a successful warrior; Kara-indash, in whose reign we meet with the first evidences of contact with the northern kingdom of Assyria (see ASSYRIA), and Kallima-Sin, who carried on a correspondence with Amenophis III, king of Egypt. We do not know the cause of the downfall of the Kassite dynasty. There may have been a popular uprising against foreign domination, with a cry of "Babylonia for the Babylonians." (7) Dynasty of Pashe. It was followed by the dynasty of Pashe, which controlled the land for one hundred and thirty-two years. Of the eleven kings in this dynasty the most famous was Nebuchadnezzar I (1127-1117 B. C.?), in whose reign there was war with Assyria. Nebuchadnezzar lost to the rapidly developing power of Assyria the small land of Kisshati in northern Mesopotamia, but he was, on the other hand, victorious in an expedition into Elam. After the end of this dynasty our knowledge of Babylonia is for a time very slight. (8) Under Assyria. Soon the Assyrians began conquests in Babylonia, and the Assyrian power rapidly proved itself superior in war to the peace-loving and cultivated Babylonians. For a long time our knowledge of events in Babylonia is derived from the Assyrians, for the Babylonians have left but little historical material for this period of national humiliation. The story of this period is therefore told in the article on Assyria, for it is not properly Babylonian history at all, but the history of Assyria, which had now made Babylonia a subject state, or even a province of its own empire (see, besides the article on ASSYRIA, also TIGLATH-PILESER, SARGON, SENNACHERIB, and ESAR-HADDON). (9) Nabopolassar. The real Babylon of former times reasserted itself only after the fall of the Assyrian state. When Nineveh was evidently losing power, and the end of the proud city was not far off, the throne of Babylonia was seized by Nabopolassar (625-605 B. C.). At this time he was general of the garrison, and some think was connected collaterally with the royal line of Babylonian kings. At any rate, he married a Median princess, and so allied himself to royal blood. When the Indo-European peoples to the east of Elam began the invasions of Assyria, which were almost unresisted, he joined with them in the effort to bring to an end the hated city of Nineveh. He dispatched an army under his son Nebuchadnezzar to plunder Assyria. Nineveh fell in 607-6 B. C. (10) Nebuchadnezzar. In the next year Nabopolassar died, and Nebuchadnezzar became king in his place. His long reign (605-561) was one of the most glorious in all the annals of Babylonia (see NEBUCHADNEZZAR). He was on all sides victorious in war, and soon Babylon was the foremost power in western Asia. He became the real head of Syria by his victory at Carchemish. In 599 he took Jerusalem, and sent Jehoiakim, the king, into captivity to Babylon. In 588 he followed up this move by destroying the city and carrying off to Babylonia its chief inhabitants. He was a great builder. He restored palaces and temples, and erected new buildings all over the land. From every site yet excavated in Babylonia have come bricks stamped with his name and titles. None of his predecessors had ever built so widely or so magnificently. In 568 B. C. he invaded Egypt, defeated the Pharaoh Amasis, and occupied part of the country. This expedition he seems to have counted of especial moment, for he mentions it in his inscriptions. It is, indeed, the only military movement to which he alludes in all of the numerous inscriptions of his which have come down to us. With this single exception, his texts boast only of buildings and restorations. Of these only does he seem to be proud. It is quite in accordance with his own inscriptions that the Book of Daniel represents him as boasting of the great city of Babylon which he had builded. (11) Evil-merodach. Nebuchadnezzar was succeeded (561-560 B. C.) by his son EVIL-MERODACH (q. v.), who was murdered by his brother-in-law Nergal-sharezzer, the chief seer of one of the temples. (12) Nergal-sharezzer made himself king, built a new palace, and died, without any other mark of distinction, in 556 B. C., leaving the throne to his infant son Labashi-Marduk (called by Ptolemy Laborasorachad), who reigned but three months and was murdered by Nabonidus, not a member of the royal family at all. (13) Nabonidus was a man of force and character, whose reign is one of the glories of the long history. As a builder of temples he was almost equal to Nebuchadnezzar, and in one particular he overtops him. He was not merely a restorer of the works of previous kings. He was genuinely interested in the great works of his predecessors. His inscriptions record how he searched among the foundation stones of ancient temples for the tablets upon which the founder's name was written. We owe to him very much of our knowledge of the early dynasties of Babylonia, for he was careful to leave chronological and historical statements concerning temples which he had restored. Upon this or some other hobby he was so greatly bent that he actually neglected the country, and in the seventeenth year of his reign the land revolted against him for neglecting the country and its religion and leaving everything to his son Belshazzar (see BELSHAZZAR). (14) Cyrus. Aided by this rebellion, Cyrus was able in 538 to take the city of Babylon almost without the semblance of a struggle. Cyrus placed Gobryas in charge of the city. Three months later Nabonidus died. Cyrus made Babylonia a province in the Persian empire, and during his reign (538-529) there was peace, and there was also in the reign of Cambyses (529-521 B. C.). (15) Darius. When Darius, son of Hystaspis, came to the throne Babylon revolted, but was in three years subdued. In 513 there was another unsuccessful revolt. When these rebellions had been quelled the ancient spirit of Babylon was at an end. During the reign of Darius the other wall of the city of Babylon was leveled with the ground, and with this act may be said to begin the destruction of Babylon as a central fortress and the end of Babylonia as a political entity in the world's history. (16) Xerxes in his reign, either before or after the ill-fated campaign against Greece, destroyed some of the sacred objects connected with old Babylonian worship. Idols of great antiquity and of priceless historic value and interest probably disappeared at this time. As a sort of compensation for this act of vandalism Xerxes made the city of Babylon the capital of a satrapy, and placed in it some of the treasures of Greek art which he had brought back from the West with him. During the remaining time of the Persian dominion in Babylonia the city of Babylon remained the winter residence of the kings of Persia, who may have done something for the preservation of its buildings devoted to luxury or to worship, but apparently suffered its walls and defenses to sink gradually into ruin. Gradually the population of the city shrunk into a smaller compass, and where once there had been streets adorned with great buildings the land was turned into agricultural uses. At the end of the Persian period the portion of Babylon actually occupied by the residences of its inhabitants covered a district of only six hundred stadia in circumference, presenting a doleful picture in comparison with the glories of the days of Nebuchadnezzar and Nabonidus. This physical decay of the capital's glories was only the outward expression of the inward dissolution. (17) Alexander. In 331 B. C. Alexander the Great, with his Greek and Macedonian followers, took the city without striking a blow, as Cyrus had done before him. Even in its sad decay the city struck its conquerors almost dumb with astonishment at its size and magnificence. Alexander determined to restore all that was fallen and make Babylon his chief capital. The chief officials of the city were deposed, and in their places Macedonians were set up. Then began the work of restoration. The great buildings of Babylon had all been built of unburnt brick, with an outer covering of burnt brick. Erections of this kind were subject to atmospheric influences, and especially to rapid decay when the roofs were in bad repair. Suffered during the Persian period to fall into bad condition, the great temples were now almost ruins, and the task set by Alexander was colossal. His men began the work of restoration first with the great temple of Bel, with which was connected almost the whole history of Babylonia, for in it kings had performed the sacred ceremonies which made their title legal and their persons almost sacrosanct. It was in Alexander's mind that the rebuilding of this temple would add to his prestige in the city of Babylon and center on his person the affection of those who had been reared to love the old ways and to be devoted to the ancient shrines of worship. The task was too great or the agents of the king were not devoted to the work, for it made slow progress, and came to an end without a completion. Another project of Alexander made somewhat better progress. He designed a great port to be dug in the city in order that ships proceeding up the Euphrates might have a suitable place for unloading. This work seems to have made better progress than the other, but was likewise never completed. All the works of restoration and of new construction came to a sudden end with the death of Alexander in 323 B. C. (18) Concluding history. This year struck the death knell not only of the city, but of the whole land of Babylonia. From the slow but sure processes of decay there was to be no effective move made by any later ruler. Time would surely wipe away all traces of the wealth and power of the past, but to this there were now added the destructive wars of the Seleucid period, when one after another of rival claimants possessed the country for a season. When at last peace was restored the city of Babylon lost much, and the land of Babylonia gained nothing through the building of Seleucia (see BABYLON). In the reign of Antiochus I this policy was again somewhat changed, for he resumed the efforts of Alexander the Great to restore or rebuild the sacred shrines of the ancient Babylonians. Then came another dark period, for in the reign of Seleucus II the army of Ptolemy Euergetes passed through northern Babylonia, and even reached the city itself. How much the city suffered we do not know, but the wreck of the country was increased. In the following reigns there were several uprisings in Babylonia against the Greek rule, but these were without serious effects upon the country until the rebellion of Timarchos, governor of Babylon, who tried to make himself an independent ruler after the death of Antiochus V. Timarchos wrought ruin to city and land in his efforts to set up a new tyranny. Soon after Babylonia had fallen into the hands of the Parthians, who took revenge upon the city for having made some sort of stand against them. In 126-5 B. C. the Parthian satrap Euemerus, or Himeros, applied the torch to a part of Babylon. The decay of the whole land was now rapid. The city was capital of a satrapy of the Parthian empire for a time, but the glory of that honor was slight. Livy says that the city in this time was Partho-Greek-Macedonian in its character, but the people were leaving the city rapidly, and it was soon a heap of ruins (see BABYLON), and had become a parable and a subject of mockery among the sophists. Among the ruins of Babylon and in sundry other parts of the country Jews were now settled, and later colonies of Christians settled here and there. When the Mohammedan deluge of conquering hosts came from Arabia there were few to oppose their savage onslaught, and the whole land was soon in their hands. In their care the land has returned almost to a wilderness, beneath whose soil lie buried memorials of the glorious period when Babylonia led the world in civilization.—R. W. R.

BABYLO'NISH GARMENT (Heb. אֲדֵרֶת שִׁינָר, ad-deh'-reth shin-awr', cloak of Shinar or Babylonia), an ample robe with figures of men and animals either embroidered or interwoven in the fashion for which the Babylonians were noted. It came to mean a valuable piece of clothing in general (Josh. 7:21).

BA'CA (Heb. בִּצְבָ, baw-kaw', weeping.) The R. V. has it "valley of weeping" (Psa. 84:6). In the same version the margin has "balsam trees," rendered "mulberry trees" in 2 Sam. 5:23, 24; 1 Chron. 14:14, 15. David represents the faithful as weeping such tears of joy on the way to Jerusalem as cause the very dry and barren valley to become like a place of springs.

BACKBITE, the rendering (Psa. 15:3) of Heb. רָגַל, raw-gal', to run about tattling; סִפְּרָה, my-ther, secrecy, in tale bearing. In the New Testament the Gr. καταλάλω, kat-al-al-eh'-o, is to speak evil of, to traduce (Rom. 1:30; 2 Cor. 12:20).

BACKSLIDING (Heb. סָוָה, soog, to go back, Prov. 14:14; סָוָה, saw-rar', to be refractory, Hos. 4:16; מְשֻׁבָּה, mesh-oo-baw', turning away, apostasy, Jer. 3:6, etc.; 8:5; 31:22; 49:4; Hos. 4:16, etc.; in Heb. 10:39, the Gr. ἰποστέλλω is properly rendered "draw back"). In experience we find that backsliding may be partial or complete. In the latter case recovery is pronounced impossible. It is apostasy (q. v.). It may have its beginnings in "looking back" (Luke 9:62) and its progress in love waxing cold (Matt. 24:12). Hence our Lord's promise to those who "endure to the end" (Matt. 24:13), and the assurance that "we are become partakers of Christ, if we hold fast the beginning of our confidence firm unto the end" (Heb. 3:14).

BADGER. See ANIMAL KINGDOM.

BAG is the rendering in the A. V. for several words in the original:

1. Khaw-reet' (Heb. תְּרִיטָה, pocket), mentioned in 2 Kings 5:23 as the "bags" in which Naaman placed the talents for Gehazi. Gesenius thinks that they were called pockets from their long, conelike shape. In Isaiah (3:22) the word is rendered "crisping pins," but means really the reticules carried by Hebrew ladies.

2. Keece (Heb. כֶּעַע, bag for carrying weights (Deut. 25:13; Prov. 16:11; Mic. 6:11), and also used as a purse (Prov. 1:14; Isa. 46:6).

3. Kel-ee' (Heb. כֶּלִי, rendered "bag" in 1 Sam. 17:40, 49, is a word of general meaning. It is the "sack" in which Jacob's sons carried grain (Gen. 42:25), but in 1 Sam. 9:7; 21:5, it denotes a bag or wallet for carrying food (A. V. "vessel"). The "shepherd's bag" (1 Sam. 17:40) worn by David was probably (see Zech. 11:15, 16) used to carry the lambs which were unable to walk, and also materials for healing such as were sick and binding up those with broken limbs (comp. Ezek. 34:4, 16).

4. Tser-ore' (Heb. צֶרֶרֶר, properly a "bundle" (Gen. 42:35; 1 Sam. 25:29), appears to have been used in carrying money on a long journey (Prov. 7:20; Hag. 1:6).

5. In the New Testament two words are used: (a) γλοσσοκόμοιον (gloce-sok'-om-on), the "bag" which Judas carried, probably a small box or chest (John 12:6; 13:29); (b) the βαλάντιον (bal-an'-tee-on) or wallet (Luke 10:4; 22:35, 36, purse; 12:33, bag). All of these appear to have been receptacles for money.

BAHA'RUMITE (Heb. בְּחֻרִימִי, bakh-ar-oom-ee'), a native of BAHURIM (q. v.); an epithet applied to Azmaveth, one of David's warriors (1 Chron. 11:33). Called Barhumite in 2 Sam. 23:31.

BAHU'RIM (Heb. בְּחֻרִים, bakh-oo-reem', young men), a town of Judah on the road from Jerusalem to the Jordan, E. of Olivet (2 Sam. 3:16). David had trouble here with Shimei, and was hidden by the spies (2 Sam. 16:5; 17:18). Azmaveth is the only other native of this place except Shimei mentioned in Scripture (2 Sam. 28:

31; 1 Chron. 11:33). It is identified as 'Almit, three and a half miles N. E. of Jerusalem.

BAIL. See SURETY.

BA'JITH (Heb. בַּיִת, bah'-yith, house), supposed to be a city in Moab, where there may have been a celebrated idol temple; by others it is rendered temple house (Isa. 15:2).

BAKBAK'KAR (Heb. בַּקְבָּקַר, bak-bak-kar', searcher), one of the Levites inhabiting the villages of the Netophathites, after the return from Babylon (1 Chron. 9:15), B. C. about 536.

BAK'BUK (Heb. בַּקְבֹּק, bak-book', a bottle), the head of one of the families of the Nethinim that returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:61; Neh. 7:53), B. C. about 536.

BAKBUK'AH (Heb. בַּקְבֹּקָא, bak-book-yaw', emptying, i. e., wasting of Jehovah), a Levite, "second among his brethren," who dwelt at Jerusalem on the return from Babylon (Neh. 11:17). He was also employed on the watches, and was a porter of the gates (Neh. 12:9, 25), B. C. about 536.

BAKE. See BREAD.

BAKEMETS (Heb. מַחְאֵל מַחְאֵל, mah-ak-awl' mah-as-eh' aw-faw', food the work of the baker), baked provisions (Gen. 40:17). See GLOSSARY.

BAKING. See BREAD.

BA'LAAM (Heb. בַּלְעָם, bal-awm', foreigner), the son of Beor, and living at Pethor, which is said, in Deut. 23:4, to have been a city of Mesopotamia. Although doubtless belonging to the Midianites (Num. 31:8), he possessed some knowledge of the true God, and acknowledged that his superior powers as poet and prophet were derived from God, and were his gift. His fame was very great, and he became self-conceited and covetous. The Israelites having encamped in the plain of Moab (B. C. 1170), Balak, the king of Moab, entered into a league with the Midianites against them, and sent messengers to Baalam with "the rewards of divination in their hands" (Num. 22:5, sq.). Baalam seems to have had some misgivings as to the lawfulness of their request, for he invited them to remain over night, that he might know how God would regard it. These misgivings were confirmed by the express prohibition of God upon his journey. Baalam informed the messengers of God's answer, and they returned to Balak. A still more honorable embassy was sent to Baalam, with promises of reward and great honor. He replied that he could not be tempted by reward, but would speak what God should reveal. He requested them to tarry for the night, that he might know what the Lord would say unto him more. His impurity secured to him permission to accompany Balak's messengers with the divine injunction to speak as God should dictate. Baalam in the morning proceeded with the princes of Moab. But "God's anger was kindled against him, and the angel of the Lord stood in the way for an adversary against him." Though Baalam saw not the angel, the ass which he rode was aware of his presence. At first it turned into the field; again, in its terror, it pressed against the wall, squeezing Baalam's foot; upon the third appearance of the angel, there being no way of escape, it fell down. This greatly enraged Balaam, who smote her with a stick, whereupon the ass questioned Balaam as to the cause of the beating. He soon became aware of the presence of the angel, who accused him of perverseness. Balaam offered to return; the angel, however, told him to go on, but to speak only as God should tell him. Meeting Balak, he announced to him his purpose of saying only what the Lord should reveal. According to his directions seven altars were prepared, upon each of which Balak and Balaam offered a bullock and a ram. Thrice Balaam essayed to speak against Israel, but his utterances were overruled by God, so that, instead of cursings, there were blessings and magnificent prophecies, reaching forward until they told of "a star" rising "out of Jacob" (Num. 24:17). Balaam advised the expedient of seducing the Israelites to commit fornication (Num. 31:16). The effect of this is recorded in ch. 25. A battle was afterward fought with the Midianites, in which Balaam sided with them, and was slain (Num. 31:8), B. C. 1170.

"The high places to which Balaam was brought were three, . . . each sacred to a Moabite deity, each commanding a more or less extensive view of the Jordan valley. The first is BAMOTH-BAL (q. v.), . . . the Field of Zophim . . . another name for the Nebo ridge. . . . The third station of Balaam was the 'Cliff of Peor, that looked toward Jeshimon,' and whence apparently the whole host of Israel was visible in the plains of Abel-shittim" (Harper, The Bible and Mod. Dis., p. 134).

BA'LAC, another form of BALAK (Rev. 2:14).

BAL'ADAN (Heb. בַּלְאָדָן, bal-ad-awn', he has given a son).

1. The father of Merodach-baladan, king of Babylon in the time of Hezekiah, king of Judah (2 Kings 20:12; Isa. 39:1), B. C. before 713.

2. A shortened form of Merodach-baladan (Isa. 39:1), or Berodach-baladan (2 Kings 20:12).

BA'LAH (Heb. בַּלְאָה, baw-law', to decay), a city in Simeon (Josh. 19:3), probably the same with Bilhah (1 Chron. 4:29), or Baalah (Josh. 15:29).

BA'LAK (Heb. בַּלְעָק, baw-lawk', empty, emptier), the son of Zippor, and king of the Moabites (Num. 22:2, 4). He was so terrified at the approach of the victorious army of the Israelites, who, in their passage through the desert, had encamped near the confines of his territory, that he applied to Balaam to curse them, B. C. about 1170. His designs being frustrated in this direction, he acted upon Balaam's suggestion, and seduced the Israelites to commit fornication (Num. 25:1; Rev. 2:14).

BALANCES (Heb. מִזְנֵי, mo-zeh-nay'-eem, i. e., two scales). That these were known to the early Hebrews and in common use is evident from the frequent reference to them in the Old Testament (Lev. 19:36; Job 6:2; 31:6; Hos. 12:7, etc.). The probability is that the Hebrews used the common balances of Egypt. They were not essentially different from the balances now in use. Sometimes they were suspended by a ring, and in other cases the cross beam turned upon a pin at the summit of an upright pole, each end of the arm terminating in a hook, to which the precious metal to be weighed was attached in small bags.

Figurative. In a figurative sense the balance is employed in Scripture as an emblem of justice and fair dealing (Job 31:6; Psa. 62:9; Prov. 11:1). Balances used in connection with the sale of bread or fruit by weight is the symbol of scarcity (Rev. 6:5; see also Lev. 26:26; Ezek. 4:16, 17).

BALD LOCUST. See ANIMAL KINGDOM.

BALDNESS (Heb. from קָלוּ, kaw-ray'-akh, bald, i. e., on the top or back of the head; קָלוּ, ghib-bay'-akh, bald on the forehead). Baldness is mentioned in Scripture as a defect, interfering with personal beauty; and the more naturally so, as the hair was frequently allowed to grow with peculiar luxuriance as an ornament. Natural baldness appears to have been uncommon, and is alluded to in connection with a mark of squalor and misery (Isa. 3:24; 15:2; Jer. 47:5). The address to Elisha, "Go up, thou baldhead" (2 Kings 2:23), may mean that his scoffers referred to his age only. Baldness was expressly distinguished from leprosy, but had certain points of contact with it (Lev. 13:40-44). Artificial baldness was a mark of mourning (Jer. 16:6; Ezek. 7:18; Amos 8:10), and was forbidden to the Israelites on the ground of their being a holy people (Deut. 14:1, 2); it was a punishment inflicted upon captives (Deut. 21:12). The priests were forbidden to make baldness on their heads, as well as to shave off the corners of their beards (Lev. 21:5; Ezek. 44:20). The Jewish interpretation of this injunction excluded a bald priest from ministering at the altar, although baldness is not mentioned as a disqualification (Lev. 21:17-20). Baldness, by shaving, marked the conclusion of a Nazarite's vow (Num. 6:9, 18).

BALL (Heb. דָּוָר, dur, Isa. 22:18; rendered "round about," 29:3; and "burn" in Ezek. 24:5. In the last reference it probably means "heap," as in the margin). The ball was used anciently in many sports, and was similarly constructed to those now in use.

BALM. See VEGETABLE KINGDOM.

BAMAH (Heb. בְּמֹת, baw-maw', height), a high place where idols were worshiped. The word appears in its Hebrew form only in Ezek. 20:29, while in the first part of the verse it is translated "high place." By some the name is supposed to refer to some particular spot. Keil (Com., in loc.) says that the word "is to be taken collectively, and that the use of the singular is to be explained from the antithesis to the one divinely appointed Holy Place in the temple, and not from any allusion to one particular bamah of peculiar distinction."

BAMOTH (Heb. בְּמוֹת, baw-mōth', heights), the forty-seventh station of the Israelites (Num. 21:19, 20) in the country of the Moabites, and probably the same as BAMOTH-BAAAL (q. v.).

BAMOTH-BA'AL (Heb. בְּמֹת בַּעַל, baw-mōth' bah'-al, heights of Baal), a place E. of Jordan, and lying upon the river Arnon (Josh. 13:17). In the R. V. at Num. 21:28, called "the high places of Arnon." "Bamoth-baal falls into place as the ridge S. of the stream of Wady Jideid, now called the 'Crucified One,' which presents a group of more than one hundred rude stone monuments" (Harper, The Bible and Mod. Dis., p. 122). See BALAAH.

BAND, the representative of several Hebrew and Greek words, especially of σπεῖρα, spi'-rah, a cohort. See ARMY.

BA'NI (Heb. בְּנֵי, baw-nee', built).

1. A Gadite, one of David's mighty men (2 Sam. 23:36), B. C. about 1000.

2. A Levite, son of Shamer and father of Amzi, a descendant of Merari (1 Chron. 6:46), B. C. before 1300.

3. A descendant of Pharez and father of Imri, one of whose descendants returned from Babylon (1 Chron. 9:4), B. C. long before 536.

4. One whose "children" (descendants or retainers), to the number of six hundred and forty-two, returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:10). He is elsewhere (Neh. 7:15) called Binnui. He is probably the one mentioned (Neh. 10:14) as having sealed the covenant.

5. The name of Bani is given (Ezra 10:29, 34, 38) three times as one who, either himself or his descendants, had taken strange wives after the captivity.

6. A Levite, whose son, Rehun, repaired a portion of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:17). Apparently the same Bani was among those who were conspicuous in all the reforms on the return from Babylon (Neh. 8:7; 9:4, 5; 10:13). He had another son named Uzzi, who was appointed overseer of the Levites at Jerusalem; his own father's name was Hashabiah (Neh. 11:22).

BANISH (Heb. בָּדַד, naw-dakh', to push off, 2 Sam. 14:13, 14), BANISEMENT (Heb. בְּדִדּוּת, mad-doo'-akh, cause of banishment, Lam. 2:14; Chald. שַׂרְשָׁוָה, shar-shaw', rooting out, Ezra 7:26). Banishment was not a punishment prescribed by the Mosaic law; but was adopted, together with the forfeiture of property, by the Jews after the captivity. It also existed among the Romans, together with another form of exile, called disportatio, which was a punishment of great severity. The person banished forfeited his estate, and was transported to some island named by the emperor, there to be kept in perpetual confinement (see Smith's Dict. of Class. Antig., s. v. "Banishment"). Thus the apostle John was banished to the island of Patmos (Rev. 1:9).

BANK. 1. (Heb. סֶלֶף, so-lel-aw'). The name of the mound raised against a beleaguered city (2 Sam. 20:15; 2 Kings 19:32; Isa. 37:33); elsewhere rendered "mount," in the same sense.

2. The table or stand (Gr. τράπεζα, trap'-ed-zah) of a money changer, at which he sits exchanging money (Matt. 21:12; Mark 11:15; John 2:15). In Luke 19:23 the word is rendered "bank" in the modern sense of the term.

BANNER is the rendering of the Hebrew words דָּגֵל, del'-gel, conspicuous, and סֵדֶה, nace, from its loftiness. They are also translated ensign and standard (q. v.).

Reclining at a Banquet.

BANQUET (generally Heb. מִשְׁתֵּה, mish-teh', drinking).

1. Occasions. Besides being a part of the religious observance of the great festivals, banquets or feasts were given on great family occasions, as a birthday (Gen. 40:20; Matt. 14:6), the weaning of a son and heir (Gen. 21:8), a marriage (Gen. 29:22; Judg. 14:10; Esth. 2:18; Matt. 22:2-4), the separation and reunion of friends (Gen. 31:27, 54), a burial (2 Sam. 3:35; Jer. 16:7; Hos. 9:4), a sheep-shearing (1 Sam. 25:2, 8, 36; 2 Sam. 13:23-29).

2. Time. The usual time for holding the banquet was toward evening, corresponding to the dinners of modern times. To begin early was a mark of excess (Isa. 5:11; Eccles. 10:16). These festivals were often continued for seven days, especially wedding banquets (Judg. 14:12); but if the bride were a widow, three days formed the limit.

3. Invitations, etc. Invitations were sent out through servants (Prov. 9:3; Matt. 22:3, sq.) some time previous to the banquet; and a later announcement informed the expected guests that the arrangements were complete, and their presence was looked for (Matt. 22:8; Luke 14:7). This after-summons was sent only to those who had accepted the previous invitation, and to violate that acceptance for trivial reasons could only be viewed as a gross insult.

4. Etiquette. At a small entrance door a servant received the tablets or cards of the guests, who were then conducted into the receiving room. After the whole company had arrived the master of the house shut the door with his own hands, a signal that no others were to be admitted (Luke 13:25; Matt. 25:10). The guests were kissed upon their arrival (Tob. 7:6; Luke 7:45); their feet washed (Luke 7:44), a custom common in ancient Greece, and still found here and there in Palestine; the hair and beard anointed (Psa. 23:5; Amos 6:6); and their places assigned them according to rank (1 Sam. 9:22; Luke 14:8; Mark 12:39). In some cases each guest was furnished with a magnificent garment of a light and showy color, and richly embroidered, to be worn during the banquet (Eccles. 9:8; Rev. 3:4, 5). The refusal of such a mark of respect implied a contempt for the host and his entertainment that could not fail to provoke resentment (Matt. 22:11).

5. Fare, etc. In general the feasts of the Israelites were simple; but, no doubt, under the kings, with growing prosperity and luxury, riotous banquets were not unknown. Particularly choice dishes were set before the guest intended to be specially honored (1 Sam. 9:24), sometimes double (1 Sam. 1:5), and even fivefold portion (Gen. 43:34). In addition to a great variety of viands, wine was used, often drugged with spices (Prov. 9:2; Cant. 8:2); and the banquets frequently degenerated into drinking bouts (Isa. 5:12; Amos 6:5; Psa. 69:13).

The Jews of the Old Testament appear to have used a common table for all the guests, although persons of high official position were honored with a separate table. In some cases a ceremonial separation prevailed, as at Joseph's entertainment of his brethren (Gen. 43:32). In early times sitting was the usual posture (1 Sam. 16:11; 20:5, 18); but later they adopted the luxurious practice of reclining upon couches (Luke 7:37, 38; John 12:2, 3).

In the houses of the common people the women and children also took part in the feast (1 Sam. 1:4; John 12:3), the separation of the women not being a Jewish custom.

6. Diversion. At private banquets the master of the house presided, and did the honors of the occasion; but in large and mixed companies it was the ancient custom to choose a "governor of the feast" (John 2:8). This functionary performed the office of chairman, in preserving order, and also took upon himself the general management of the festivities. The guests were entertained with exhibitions of music, singers, and dancers, riddles, jesting, and merriment (Isa. 28:1; Wisd. 2:7; 2 Sam. 19:35; Isa. 5:12; 25:6; Judg. 14:12; Neh. 8:10; Amos 6:5, 6; Luke 15:25). See FESTIVALS, FOOD; also GLOSSARY.

BAPTISM, the application of water as a rite of purification or initiation; a Christian sacrament. See SACRAMENTS; also SUPPLEMENT.

The word "baptism" is the English form of the Gr. βαπτισμός, hap-tis-mos. The verb from which this noun is derived—βαπτίζω, hap-tid-zo—is held by some scholars to mean "to dip, immerse." But this meaning is held by others to be not the most exact or common, but rather a meaning that is secondary or derived. By the latter it is claimed that all that the term necessarily implies is that the element employed in baptism is in close contact with the person or object baptized. The Greek prepositions ἐν (en) and εἰς (eis) have played a very prominent part in discussions respecting the mode of baptism.

The scope of this article is limited mainly to Christian baptism, but as preliminary to this brief mention is made of:

1. Jewish Baptism. Baptisms, or ceremonial purifications, were common among the Jews. Not only priests and other persons, but also clothing, utensils, and articles of furniture, were thus ceremonially cleansed (Lev. 8:6; Exod. 19:10-14; Mark 7:3, 4).

2. John's Baptism. The baptism of John was not Christian, but Jewish. It was, however, especially a baptism "unto repentance." The only faith that it expressed concerning Christ was that his coming was close at hand. They who confessed and repented of their sins and were baptized by John were thus obedient to his call to "prepare the way of the Lord."

3. Baptism of Jesus. The baptism that Jesus received from John was unique in its significance and purpose. It could not be like that which John administered to others, for Jesus did not make confession. He had no occasion to repent. Neither was it Christian baptism, the significance of which we shall consider later. Jesus himself declared the main purpose and meaning of this event in his words, "Thus it becometh us to fulfill all righteousness." It was an act of ceremonial righteousness appropriate to his public entrance upon his mission as the Christ.

4. Baptism of Christ's Disciples. That Christ himself baptized his disciples is a matter, to say the least, involved in doubt. While it is probable that at the beginning of his ministry our Lord baptized those who believed in him, he not long afterward delegated this work to his disciples (John 4:1, 2). The office of Christ was and is to baptize with the Holy Ghost. His disciples administered the symbolical baptism, he that which is real (Matt. 3:11). The attention of the reader is now invited to—

5. Christian Baptism. We consider the points of chief interest: (1) Obligation. The obligation of Christian baptism rests upon the command of Christ (Matt. 28:19). Though Christianity is a spiritual, and not in any large sense a ceremonial, religion, yet nevertheless Christ gave the command to baptize, which of course implies the further command to receive baptism. That this obligation is perpetual appears from the breadth of the command, and the far-reaching promise that was given in connection with it. The Quakers, among those who profess faith in Christ, are the chief opponents of this view. They rest their objection mainly upon the spiritual character of Christianity, and hold that the baptism of the Holy Spirit alone is requisite. They assert that water baptism was never intended to continue in the Church of Christ any longer than while Jewish prejudices made such an external ceremony necessary. (2) Significance. The nature and effect of baptism have been the subject of much controversy. The Roman Catholic, the Greek, and the Lutheran Churches, and many in the Church of England and Protestant Episcopal Church, hold that baptism is the direct instrument of regeneration. This is the so-called doctrine of baptismal regeneration. See REGENERATION. Roman Catholics hold so strongly to this view that, accordingly, they also hold that all persons, adults or infants, who die unbaptized are excluded from heaven. Others have gone to the opposite extreme, taking the Socinian view, that baptism is merely a mode of professing faith in Christ, or a ceremony of initiation to the Christian Church. Others have reduced the rite to a symbol of purification, expressive of the purifying influence of the Christian religion. The prevailing doctrine of evangelical Churches is that baptism is not only the rite of initiation into the Church of Christ, and not only a sign, but also a seal of divine grace. For example, the Westminster Confession, art. xxviii, says: "Baptism is a sacrament of the New Testament, ordained by Jesus Christ, not only for the solemn admission of the party baptized into the visible Church, but also to be unto him a sign and seal of the covenant of grace, of his ingrafting into Christ, of regeneration, of remission of sins, and of his giving up unto God through Jesus Christ, to walk in newness of life; which sacrament is, by Christ's own appointment, to be continued in his Church until the end of the world." As circumcision was the sign and seal of the Mosaic covenant, so baptism is the sign and seal of the new covenant of the Gospel. On the one hand the person baptized becomes thus pledged to fidelity to Christ, and on the other hand baptism ratifies the divine pledge for the fulfillment of all his gracious promises to those who truly accept Christ. Baptism, under the new dispensation, takes the place of circumcision under the old. This is the fair implication of all those utterances of the apostle which represent Christians as numbered among the "faithful seed," "the chosen generation," "the circumcision," "the household of God." St. Paul distinctly declares this relation between the two rites (Col. 2:10-12).

(3) Proper subjects of baptism. In accordance with this last named view it is plain that not only adults who repent of their sins and give evidence of faith in Christ, but also infants, the children of Christian parents, or under the care of those who will give them Christian nurture, are proper subjects for baptism. The following quotation admirably states the view of those who believe in infant baptism: "We hold that all children, by virtue of the unconditional benefits of the atonement, are members of the kingdom of God, and therefore graciously entitled to baptism; but, as infant baptism contemplates a course of religious instruction and discipline, it is expected of all parents or guardians who present their children for baptism that they will use all diligence in bringing them up in conformity to the word of God; and they should be solemnly admonished of this obligation, and earnestly exhorted to faithfulness therein." Roman Catholics and others who teach that baptism is a saving rite, and absolutely essential to salvation, base their custom of infant baptism upon that ground. They who reject the baptism of infants do so because of their different view of the significance of the rite. If we bear in mind the fact that baptism takes the place of circumcision as the initiatory sign and seal of membership in "the household of God," and the gracious words of Christ concerning "little children," and the Scripture references to the baptism of families, as well as the established antiquity of infant baptism in the Christian Church, it would seem entirely reasonable to admit the correctness and scripturalness of this Christian usage. The Roman Catholic and Greek Churches, and all Protestant Churches, except Baptist, practice infant baptism. (4) Mode. The common doctrine of Christendom has been that all that is essential in the mode of baptism is the application of water "in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." It denies that immersion is the only valid baptism, and admits of sprinkling, pouring, and immersion. That immersion is a very ancient mode of baptism may be freely admitted. But the same may also be said of the other modes—sprinkling and pouring. Baptisms, or ceremonial purifications, among the Jews were performed undoubtedly in various ways. "Our Lord in his institution of baptism simply appropriated an ancient rite, and adapted it to the purposes of his kingdom. And he was silent as to the mode in which the water is to be applied. It is contrary to the whole spirit of Christ's teaching to attach great importance to details of ceremony. Also baptism, which is a universal rite, may properly, and sometimes must of necessity, be varied in mode according to climate and other circumstances." The Baptists hold "That Christian baptism is the immersion in water of a believer, into the name of the Father, and Son, and Holy Ghost; . . . that it is prerequisite to the privileges of a Church relation, and to the Lord's Supper." (5) Administrators. The administration of baptism is commonly regarded as exclusively a prerogative of the ministerial office. But it is difficult, to say the least, to sustain this view by an appeal to the Scriptures. The wise and proper observance of Church order, however, has committed the performance of this rite to the ministers of the Church. The Roman Catholic Church teaches that baptism administered in extreme cases by a layman, or a woman, or even a heretic is valid, though still ministers alone have the right to baptize. The same view obtains among Lutherans and others who hold strongly to the doctrine of baptismal regeneration.

BAPTISM FOR THE DEAD (Gr. ὑπὲρ τῶν νεκρῶν, 1 Cor. 15:29). Of this difficult passage there are many expositions, a few of which we present:

1. The Corinthians, the Marcionites, and other heretics had a custom, supposed to be referred to by the apostle. Persons who had been baptized had themselves baptized again for the benefit of people who had died unbaptized but already believing, in the persuasion that this would be counted to them as their own baptism. From this the apostle drew an argument to prove their belief in the resurrection. Meyer (Com., in loc.) believes that this is the practice to which the apostle refers. "For the benefit of the dead' remains the right interpretation."

2. Chrysostom believes the apostle to refer to the profession of faith in baptism, part of which was, "I believe in the resurrection of the dead." The meaning, then, would be, "If there is no resurrection of the dead, why, then, art thou baptized for the dead, i. e., the body?" Whedon (Com., in loc.) holds to this interpretation, and says: "The apostolic Christians were baptized into the faith of the resurrection of the dead, and thereby they were sponsors in behalf of the dead, that the dead should rise."

3. Another interpretation, that of Spanheim, considers "the dead" to be martyrs and other believers who, by firmness and cheerful hope of resurrection, have given in death a worthy example, by which others were also animated to receive baptism. This interpretation, however, may perhaps also be improved if Christ be considered as prominently referred to among those deceased, by virtue of whose resurrection all his followers expect to be likewise raised.

4. Olshausen takes the meaning of the passage to be that "all who are converted to the Church are baptized for the good of the dead, as it requires a certain number (Rom. 11:12-25), a 'fullness' of believers, before the resurrection can take place."

5. "Over the graves of the martyrs." Vossius adopted this interpretation, but it is very unlikely that this custom should have prevailed in the days of St. Paul.

BAPTISM OF BLOOD. Those who for the sake of Christ suffered martyrdom, without the time or opportunity of being baptized, were considered by the early Church to have been baptized in their own blood by the act of martyrdom. Gregory of Nazianzum speaks of a baptism of martyrdom and blood with which Christ himself was baptized. This baptism surpasses the others in proportion as it is free from sin (see Matt. 10:39; Luke 12:50).

BAPTISM OF FIRE. The words, "He that cometh after me shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost and with fire" (Matt. 3:11), have been variously understood. It is explained as referring to the fire of everlasting punishment, after Origen and several fathers. After Chrysostom and most Catholic expositors, it is understood as the fire of the Holy Spirit, which inflames and purifies the spirits of men. By some it is believed to be the fire of tribulations and sorrow; by others, the fire of penitence and self-mortification. The Seleucians and Hermians took the passage literally, and taught that material fire was necessary to the administration of baptism, but we are not told either how or to what part of the body they applied it, or whether they compelled the baptized to pass through or over the flames.

Meyer (Com., in loc.) says that all explanations "which take fire as not referring to the punishments of Gehenna are refuted by John's own decisive explanation in Matt. 8:12."

BAPTISM OF JE'SUS. See BAPTISM, 3.

BAR, a word of various meanings. (1) A bar, crossbar passing along the sides and rear of the TABERNACLE (q. v.), through rings attached to each board, and thus holding the boards together (Exod. 26:26, sq.). (2) A bar or bolt for fastening a gate or door (Judg. 16:3; Neh. 3:3, sq.). The word is used figuratively of a rock in the sea (Jonah 2:6), the bank or shore of the sea (Job 38:10), of strong fortifications and impediments (Isa. 45:2; Amos 1:5).

BAR- (Heb. בַּר, bar, son), a patronymic sign, used like Ben, which had the same meaning. Ben, however, prevails in the pure Hebrew names of the Old Testament, and Bar in those of the New Testament, because much more used in the Chaldee and Syriac languages.

BARAB'BAS (Gr. Βαραββᾶς, bar-ab-bas', for Chald. ܒܪܒܒܐ ܒܐܒܐ, bar ab-baw', son of Abba), a robber who had committed murder in an insurrection (Mark 15:7; Luke 23:19) in Jerusalem, and was lying in prison at the time of the trial of Jesus before Pilate, A. D. 29. The latter, in his anxiety to save Jesus, proposed to release him to the people, in accordance with their demand that he should release one prisoner to them at the Passover. Barabbas was guilty of the crimes of murder and sedition, making him liable to both Roman and Jewish law. But the Jews were so bent on the death of Jesus that of the two they preferred pardoning this double criminal (Matt. 27:20; Mark 15:11; Luke 23:18; John 18:40). "Pilate, willing to content the people, released Barabbas unto them, and delivered Jesus . . . to be crucified" (Mark 15:15).

BAR'ACHEL (Heb. בָּרַכְיָהוּ, bar-rak-ale', God has blessed), the father of Elihu the Buzite, one of the three "friends" who visited Job in his affliction (Job 32:2, 6).

BARACHI'AH. See BERECHIAH.

BARACHI'AS (Gr. Βαραχίας, bar-akh-ee'-as — Barachiah), the father of the Zechariah (Zacharias) mentioned in Matt. 23:35, as having been murdered by the Jews. See ZECHARIAH.

BA'RAH. See BETH-BARAH.

BA'RAK (Heb. בָּרַק, bar-rawk', lightning), the son of Abinoam of Kadesh, a city of refuge in the tribe of Naphtali (Judg. 4:6).

Personal History. He was summoned by the prophetess Deborah to take the field against the army of the Canaanitish king, Jabin, commanded by Sisera, with a force of ten thousand men from the tribes of Naphtali and Zebulun. He was further instructed to proceed to Mount Tabor, for Jehovah would draw Sisera and his host to meet him at the river Kishon, and deliver him into his hand. Barak consented only on the condition that Deborah would go with him, which she readily promised. Sisera, being informed of Barak's movements, proceeded against him with his whole army, including nine hundred chariots. At a signal given by the prophetess, the little army, seizing the opportunity of a providential storm, boldly rushed down the hill and utterly routed the host of the Canaanites. The victory was decisive: Harosheth was taken, Sisera murdered, and Jabin ruined (Judg. 4), B. C. 1120. The victory was celebrated by the beautiful hymn of praise composed by Barak in conjunction with Deborah (Judg. 5). Barak appears in the list of the faithful worthies of the Old Testament (Heb. 11:32).

BARBARIAN (Gr. βάρβαρος, bar'-bar-os, rudé) was originally the Greek epithet for a people speaking any other than the Greek language. After the Persian wars it began to carry with it associations of hatred and to imply vulgarity and lack of culture. The Romans were originally included by the Greeks under the name barbaroi. But after the conquest of Greece, and the transference of Greek art and culture to Rome, the Romans took the same position as the Greeks before them, and designated as barbarians all who in language and manners differed from the Greco-Roman world. The word barbarian is applied in the New Testament, but not reproachfully, to the inhabitants of Malta (Acts 28:4), who were of Phœnician or Punic origin, and to those nations that had indeed some refinement of manners, but not the opportunity of becoming Christians, as the Scythians (Col. 3:11). The phrase "Greeks and Barbarians" (Rom. 1:14) means all peoples.

BARBER (Heb. בַּרְבַּר, gal-laub') occurs but once in the Scriptures (Ezek. 5:1); but, inasmuch as great attention was paid to the hair and beard among the ancients, the barber must have been a well-known tradesman. See HAIR.

BAREFOOT (Heb. חַפְזֵי, yaw-khafe', unshod, Jer. 2:25). In the East great importance was attached to the clothing, and feelings respecting it were peculiarly sensitive, so that a person was looked upon as stripped and naked if he only removed an outer garment. To go barefoot was an indication of great distress (Isa. 20:2-4; 2 Sam. 15:30). Persons were also accustomed to remove their shoes when coming to places accounted holy (Exod. 3:5).

BARHU'MITE (Heb. בְּרֻחֵי, bar-khoo-mee'), a transposed form (2 Sam. 23:31) of the Gentile name BAHARUMITE (q. v.).

BARI'AH (Heb. בָּרִיאָה, baw-ree'-akh, fugitive), one of the five sons of Shemaiah, of the descendants of David, who are counted as six, including their father (1 Chron. 3:22), B. C. before 410.

BAR-JE'SUS (Gr. Βαρισηους, bar-ee-ay-sooe', son of Joshua), otherwise called ELYMAS (q. v.), who withstood Barnabas and Paul (Acts 13:6).

BAR-JO'NA (Gr. Βαριωνας, bar-ee-oo-nas', son of Jonah), the patronymic of the apostle Peter (Matt. 16:17; comp. John 1:42).

BAR'KOS (Heb. בְּרִיקוֹס, bar-kose', uncertain), the head of one of the families of Nethinim that returned from the captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:53; Neh. 7:55), B. C. 536.

BARLEY. See VEGETABLE KINGDOM.

BARN, the rendering of several words in the original:

1. Aw-sawm' (Heb. אֵסַם, Prov. 3:10; rendered "storehouse" in Deut. 28:8), a place for the storing of grain.

2. Go'-ren (Heb. גֶּרֶן, Job 39:12; "barn floor" in 2 Kings 6:27) signifies rather a thrashing floor, as elsewhere translated.

3. Meg-oo-raw' (Heb. מְגֻרָה, Hag. 2:19) and mam-meg-oo-raw' (Heb. מַמְגֻרָה, Joel 1:17), a granary.

4. The words in Luke (12:18) would seem to indicate that the Jews at that time had granaries above ground. See STOREHOUSE.

BAR'NABAS (Gr. Βαρνάβας, bar-nab'-as, son of prophecy), the name given by the apostles to Joses (Acts 4:36), probably on account of his eminence as a Christian teacher.

Personal History. Barnabas was a native of Cyprus, and a Levite by extraction. (1) Charity. Being possessed of land, he generously disposed of it for the benefit of the Christian community, and laid the money at the apostles' feet (Acts 4:36, 37). As this transaction occurred soon after the day of Pentecost he must have been an early convert to Christianity. (2) Associated with Paul. When Paul made his first appearance in Jerusalem Barnabas brought him to the apostles and attested his sincerity (Acts 9:27). Word being brought to Jerusalem of the revival at Antioch, Barnabas (who is described as "a good man, and full of the Holy Ghost and of faith") was sent to make inquiry. Finding the work to be genuine, he labored among them for a time, fresh converts being added to the Church through his personal efforts. He then went to Tarsus to obtain the assistance of Saul, who returned with him to Antioch, where they labored for a whole year (Acts 11:19-26). In anticipation of the famine predicted by Agabus the Christians at Antioch made a contribution for their poor brethren at Jerusalem, and sent it by the hands of Barnabas and Saul (Acts 11:27-30), A. D. 44. They, however, speedily returned, bringing with them John Mark, a nephew of the former (Acts 12:25). (3) First missionary journey. By divine direction (Acts 13:2) they were separated to the office of missionaries, and as such visited Cyprus and some of the principal cities in Asia Minor (Acts 13:14). At Lystra, because of a miracle performed by Paul, they were taken for gods, the people calling Barnabas Jupiter (ch. 14:8-12). Returning to Antioch, they found the peace of the Church disturbed by certain from Judea, who insisted upon the Gentile converts being circumcised. Paul and Barnabas, with others, were sent to Jerusalem to consult with the apostles and elders. They returned to communicate the result of the conference, accompanied by Judas and Silas (ch. 15:1-32). (4) Second missionary journey. Preparing for a second missionary journey, a dispute arose between Paul and Barnabas on account of John Mark. "Barnabas determined to take Mark with them; Paul thought it not good to take him." The contention became so sharp that they separated, Barnabas with Mark going to Cyprus, while Paul and Silas went through Syria and Cilicia (ch. 15:36-41). At this point Barnabas disappears from the record of the Acts. Several times he is mentioned in the writings of St. Paul, but nothing special is noted save that Barnabas was at one time led away by Judaizing zealots. All else is matter of inference.

BARREL (Heb. כַּד, jar, pitcher), probably an earthen vessel used for the keeping of flour (1 Kings 17:12, 14, 16; 18:33). In other places the word is rendered "pitcher" (q. v.).

BARREN (Heb. עָקָר, aw-kawr', when spoken of persons). Barrenness, in the East, was looked upon as a ground of great reproach as well as a punishment from God (1 Sam. 1:6, 7; Isa. 47:9; 49:21; Luke 1:25, etc.). Instances of childless wives are found (Gen. 11:30; 25:21; 29:31; Judg. 13:2, 3; Luke 1:7, 36). Certain marriages were forbidden by Moses, and were visited with barrenness (Lev. 20:20, 21). The reproach attached to barrenness, especially among the Hebrews, was doubtless due to the constant expectation of the Messiah, and the hope cherished by every woman that she might be the mother of the promised Seed. In order to avoid the disgrace of barrenness women gave their handmaidens to their husbands, regarding the children born under such circumstances as their own (Gen. 16:2; 30:3).

BAR'SABAS (Gr. Βαρσαβᾶς, bar-sab-as', son of Sabas), a surname.

1. Of Joseph, a disciple who was nominated along with Matthias to succeed Judas Iscariot in the apostleship (Acts 1:23).

2. Of Judas, who, with Silas, was sent to Antioch in company of Paul and Barnabas (Acts 15:22).

BARTHOL'OMEW (Gr. Βαρθολομαῖος, barthol-om-ah'-yos, son of Tolmai), one of the twelve apostles of Jesus, and generally supposed to have been the same person who, in John's gospel, is called Nathanael.

1. Name and Family. In the first three gospels (Matt. 10:3; Mark 3:18; Luke 6:14) Philip and Bartholomew are constantly named together, while Nathanael is nowhere mentioned. In the fourth gospel Philip and Nathanael are similarly combined, but nothing is said of Bartholomew. Nathanael must therefore be considered as his real name, while Bartholomew merely expresses his filial relation (Kitto).

2. Personal History. If this may be taken as true, he was born in Cana of Galilee (John 21:2). Philip, having accepted Jesus, told Bartholomew that he had "found him, of whom Moses in the law, and the prophets, did write, Jesus of Nazareth." To his question, "Can there any good thing come out of Nazareth?" Philip replied, "Come and see." His fastidious reluctance was soon dispelled. Jesus, as he saw him coming to him, uttered the eulogy, "Behold an Israelite indeed, in whom is no guile!" (John 1:45, sq.) He was anointed with the other apostles (Matt. 10:3; Mark 3:18; Luke 6:14), was one of the disciples to whom the Lord appeared after the resurrection (John 21:2), a witness of the ascension, and returned with the other apostles to Jerusalem (Acts 1:4, 12, 13). Tradition only speaks of his subsequent history. He is said to have preached the Gospel in India (probably Arabia Felix); others say in Armenia, and report him to have been there flayed alive and then crucified with his head downward.

3. Character. Nathanael "seems to have been one of those calm, retiring souls, whose whole sphere of existence lies not here, but 'Where, beyond these voices, there is peace.' It was a life of which the world sees nothing, because it was 'hid with Christ in God'" (Farrar).

BARTIMEUS (Gr. Βαρτιμαῖος, bar-tim-ah'-yos, son of Timæus), a blind beggar of Jericho, who sat by the wayside begging as our Lord went out of the city on his last journey to Jerusalem (Mark 10:46). Hearing that Jesus was passing, he cried for mercy, and in answer to his faith he was miraculously cured, and "followed Jesus in the way."

BAR'UCH (Heb. בָּרֻךְ, bar-rook', blessed).

1. The son of Zabbai. He repaired (B. C. 445) that part of the walls of Jerusalem between the north-east angle of Zion and the house of Eliashib the high priest (Neh. 3:20), and joined in Nehemiah's covenant (10:6).

2. Son of Col-hozeh, a descendant of Perez, a son of Judah. His son Maaseiah dwelt in Jerusalem after the captivity (Neh. 11:5).

3. Son of Neriah and brother of Seraiah, who held an honorable office in Zedekiah's court (Jer. 32:12; 36:4; 51:59). Baruch was the faithful friend and amanuensis of Jeremiah. In the fourth year of King Jehoiakim (B. C. about 604) Baruch was directed to write all the prophecies delivered by Jeremiah and read them to the people. This he did in the temple both that and the succeeding year. He afterward read them privately to the king's counselors, telling them that he had received them through the prophet's dictation. The king, when the roll was brought to him, cut it and threw it into the fire. He ordered the arrest of Jeremiah and Baruch, but they could not be found. Baruch wrote another roll, including all that was in the former and an additional prediction of the ruin of Jehoiakim and his house (Jer. 36). Terrified by the threats in the prophetic roll, he received the assurance that he should be spared from the calamities which would befall Judah (Jer. 45). During the siege of Jerusalem Jeremiah purchased the territory of Hanameel, and deposited the deed with Baruch (Jer. 32:12), B. C. 590. Baruch was accused of influencing Jeremiah in favor of the Chaldeans (Jer. 43:3; comp. 37:13), and he was thrown into prison with that prophet, where he remained until the capture of Jerusalem (Josephus, Ant., x, 9, 1). By the permission of Nebuchadnezzar he abode with Jeremiah at Mizpah, but was afterward forced to go to Egypt (ch. 43:6). Nothing certain is known of the close of his life. According to one tradition, he went to Babylon upon the death of Jeremiah, where he died, the twelfth year after the destruction of Jerusalem. There are two apocryphal books which purport to be the productions of Baruch.

BARZIL'LAI (Heb. בָּרְזִילַי, bar-zil-lah'ee, of iron).

1. A wealthy and aged Gileadite of Rogelim, who showed great hospitality to David when he fled beyond Jordan from his son Absalom, B. C. 967. He sent in a liberal supply of provisions, beds, and other conveniences for the use of the king's followers (2 Sam. 17:27). On the king's triumphant return Barzillai accompanied him over Jordan, but declined on the score of age (being eighty years old), and perhaps from a feeling of independence, to proceed to Jerusalem and end his days at court. He, however, recommended his son Chimham to the royal favor (2 Sam. 19:31-39). On his deathbed David recalled to mind this kindness, and commended Barzillai's children to the care of Solomon (1 Kings 2:7).

2. A Meholathite, father of Adriel, which latter was the husband of Michal, Saul's daughter (2 Sam. 21:8), B. C. before 1021.

3. A priest who married a descendant of Barzillai (1), and assumed the same name. His genealogy became so confused that his descendants, on the return from captivity, were set aside as unfit for the priesthood (Ezra 2:61; Neh. 7:63), B. C. before 536.

BASE (Heb. בַּיָּת, kane, 1 Kings 7:31; בְּכֹרֶת, mek-o-naw', pedestal, 1 Kings 7:27-40), a pedestal or stand upon which the laver was placed.

BA'SHAN (Heb. בַּשָּׁן, baw-shawn', light soil, fruitful). This country extended from Gilead in the S. to Hermon on the N., and from the Jordan to Salcah, the present Salkhat, on the E., and included Edrei (Deut. 3:10; Josh. 9:10), Ashtaroth (Deut. 1:4; Josh. 9:10, etc.), the present Tell-Ash-tur, and Golan (Deut. 4:43; Josh. 20:8; 21:27). Golan, one of its cities, was a city of refuge. Its productiveness was remarked in the Old Testament (Psa. 22:12; Jer. 50:19). The western part is exceedingly fertile to-day. On the E. rise the Hauran Mountains to a height of six thousand feet. It was noted for its fine breed of cattle (Deut. 32:14; Ezek. 39:18). The cities are described by Moses as "fenced cities with high walls, gates, and bars." The gates were made of stone. Burckhardt speaks of Kuffer, where the gates of the town, nine feet high, "are of a single piece of stone."

Some of the deserted towns are as perfect as when inhabited. When Israel entered Canaan, Argob, a province of Bashan, contained "sixty fenced cities" (Deut. 3:4, 5; 1 Kings 4:13). After the exile Bashan was divided into four districts: Gaulonitis, or Jaulan, the western; Auranitis, or Hauran (Ezek. 47:16); Argob, or Trachonitis; and Batanæa, now Ard-el-Bathan-yeh.

"In the Tel el-Amarna tablets the land of Bashan is called Ziri-Basana, 'the field of Bashan,' and the same name is found in an Egyptian text discovered at Abydos, which tells us that the prime minister of the first year of Menephtah's reign was a native of 'Zar-Basana'" (Sayce, Higher Crit. and Mon., p. 261).

BA'SHAN, HILL OF. In Psa. 68:15 the poet says, "The hill of God is as the hill of Bashan; an high hill as the hill of Bashan" (R. V. "A mountain of God is the mountain of Bashan; an high mountain is the mountain of Bashan"). "This epithet, not applicable to the long, level edge of the tableland, might refer either to the lofty triple summits of Hermon, or to the many broken cones that are scattered across Bashan, and so greatly differ in their volcanic form from the softer, less imposing heights of western Palestine" (Smith, Hist. Geog., p. 550).

BA'SHAN-HA'VOTH-JA'IR (Heb. בַּשָּׁן חַוּוֹת יַעֲרִיר, baw-shawn' khav-vothe' yaw-eer', the Bashan of the villages of Jair), the name given by Jair to the places he had conquered in Bashan (Deut. 3:14). It contained sixty cities with walls and brazen gates (Josh. 13:30; 1 Kings 4:13). In Num. 32:41 called Havoth-jair.

BASH'EMATH (Heb. בִּשְׁמַת, bos-math', fragrance, elsewhere, 1 Kings 4:15, more correctly, "Basmath"), a daughter of Ishmael, the last married of the three wives of Esau (Gen. 36:3, 4, 13), from whose son, Reuel, four tribes of the Edomites were descended. When first mentioned she is called Mahalath (Gen. 28:9), while, on the other hand, the name Bashemath is in the narrative (Gen. 26:34) given to another of Esau's wives, the daughter of Elon the Hittite. It may be that the name (Bashemath) has been assigned to the wrong person in one or other of the passages. Or it may have been the original name of one, and the name given to the other upon her marriage, for, "as a rule, the women received new names when they were married."

BASIN, the rendering in the A. V. of several words in the original. In old editions it is spelled "Bason."

1. Ag-gawn' (Heb. אֲגָוֵן), literally, pounded out; a vessel for washing, a laver (Exod. 24:6).

2. Kef-ore' (Heb. כִּפֹּרֶת), a covered dish or tankard, such as the gold and silver vessels of the sanctuary (1 Chron. 28:17; Ezra 1:10; 8:27).

3. Miz-ravk' (Heb. מִזְרָק), a bowl from which anything was sprinkled. The sacrificial bowls in the Tabernacle were of "brass" (bronze or copper, Exod. 27:3), and those in the Temple of gold (2 Chron. 4:8).

4. Saf (Heb. סַף), utensils for holding the blood of victims (Exod. 12:22; Jer. 52:19); the oil for the sacred candlestick (1 Kings 7:50); basins for domestic purposes (2 Sam. 17:28); also a drinking cup (Zech. 12:2).

5. Nip-tare' (Gr. παιτήρ), the basin from which the Lord washed the disciples' feet (John 13:5). See BOWL, CUP.

BASKET, the rendering of several Hebrew and Greek words:

1. Sal (Heb. סַל), so called from the twigs of which it was originally made, specially used for holding bread (Gen. 40:16, sq.; Exod. 29:3, 23; Lev. 8:2, 26, 31; Num. 6:15, 17, 19). The form of the Egyptian bread basket is delineated in Wilkinson's Anc. Egypt., iii, 226, after the specimens represented in the tomb of Rameses III. We must assume that the term sal passed from its strict etymological meaning to any vessel applied to the purpose.

In Judg. 6:19 meat is served up in a sal, which could hardly have been of wickerwork. The expression "white baskets" is of doubtful meaning, supposed to refer to the material of which they were made, to the white color of the peeled sticks, or to their being full of holes.

2. Sal-sil-loth' (Heb. סַלְסִלֹת), a word of kindred origin, applied to the basket used in gathering grapes (Jer. 6:9).

3. Teh'-neh (Heb. תֵּה־נֵחַ), in which the first fruits of the harvest were presented (Deut. 26:2, 4). From its being coupled with the kneading bowl (A. V. "store," Deut. 28:5, 17) we may infer that it was also used for household purposes, perhaps to bring the corn to the mill.

4. Kel'-oob' (Heb. כֶּל־עוֹב'), so called from its similarity to a bird cage or trap, probably in regard to its having a lid; it was used for carrying fruit (Amos 8:1, 2).

5. Dood (Heb. דוּד, a pot), used for carrying fruit (Jer. 24:1, 2), as well as on a large scale for carrying clay to the brickyard (Psa. 81:6; pots, A. V.), or for holding bulky articles (2 Kings 10:7). In Egypt heavy burdens, as grain, were carried in large baskets, swung from a pole upon the shoulders. In 1 Sam. 2:14; 2 Chron. 35:13; Job 41:20, the same word appears to mean pots for boiling.

6. In the New Testament baskets are described under the three following terms: κόφινος (kof'-ee-nos), σπυρίς (spoo-reee', hamper), σαργάνη (sar-gan'-ay). The last occurs only in 2 Cor. 11:33, in describing St. Paul's escape from Damascus. With regard to the two former words, it may be remarked that the first is exclusively used in the description of the miracle of feeding the five thousand (Matt. 14:20; 16:9; Mark 6:43; Luke 9:17; John 6:13), and the second, in that of the four thousand (Matt. 15:37; Mark 8:8); the distinction is most definitely brought out in Mark 8:19, 20 (Smith, Bib. Dict., s. v.).

BAS'MATH (Heb. בַּסְמַת, bas-math', fragrance), a daughter of Solomon, who became the wife of Ahimaaz, one of the king's purveyors (1 Kings 4:15), B. C. about 1000.

BASTARD (Heb. בְּזֵרִית, mam-zare', polluted). The word occurs in Deut. 23:2 and Zech. 9:6. Its etymology is obscure, but it appears to denote anyone to whose birth a serious stain attaches. The Rabbins applied the term not to any illegitimate offspring, but to the issue of any connection within the degrees prohibited by the law (see MARRIAGE). A very probable conjecture is that which applies the term to the offspring of heathen prostitutes in the neighborhood of Palestine, and who were a sort of priestesses to the Syrian goddess Astarte. In Zech. 9:6 the word is, doubtless, used in the sense of foreigner, expressing the deep degradation of Philistia in being conquered by other people.

1. Persons of illegitimate birth among the Jews had no claim to a share in the paternal inheritance, or to the proper filial treatment of children of the family. This is what is referred to in Heb. 12:8, where a contrast is drawn between the treatment which God's true children might expect, as compared with that given to such as are not so related to him.

2. Persons of illegitimate birth are forbidden, by the canon law, from receiving any of the minor orders without a dispensation from the bishop; nor can they, in the Latin Church, be admitted to holy orders, or to benefices with cure of souls, except by a dispensation from the pope. In the Church of England a bastard cannot be admitted to orders without a dispensation from the sovereign or archbishop.

BATH. See METROLOGY, p. 711.

BATHE, BATHING (Heb. יָטַף, raw-khats').

The hot climate of the East, with its abundant dust, made bathing a constant necessity for the preservation and invigoration of the health. This natural necessity was greatly furthered among the Israelites by the religious purifications enjoined by the law. For, although these precepts had a higher object, the teaching of personal purity, they could not fail to intensify the instinct of cleanliness, and to make frequent washing and bathing an indispensable arrangement of the life.

The Israelites, from early times, were accustomed not only to wash the hands and feet before eating, but also to bathe the body when about to visit a superior (Ruth 3:3), after mourning, which always implied defilement (2 Sam. 12:20), but especially before any religious service (Gen. 35:2; Exod. 19:10; Josh. 8:5; 1 Sam. 16:5), that they might appear clean before God. The high priest at his inauguration (Lev. 13:6), and on the day of atonement before each act of propitiation (Lev. 16:4, 24), was also to bathe. To cleanse the body snow water was used, or lye put into the water (Job 9:30), also bran, according to Mishna. Bathing in running water was specially favored (Lev. 15:13), or in rivers (2 Kings 5:10; Exod. 2:5). Baths were placed in the courts of private houses (2 Sam. 11:2; Susanna 15). In the later temple there were bath rooms over the chambers for the use of the priests. The "pools," as those of Siloam and Hezekiah (Neh. 3:15, 16; 2 Kings 20:20; Isa. 22:11; John 9:7), were public baths, no doubt introduced in imitation of a Roman and Greek custom (Keil, Bib. Arch., ii, 144).

BATH'-SHEBA (Heb. בַּת־שֶׁבַע, bath-sheh'-bah, daughter of the oath), daughter of Eliam (2 Sam. 11:3), or Ammiel (1 Chron. 3:5), the granddaughter of Ahithophel (2 Sam. 23:34), and wife of Uriah. She had illicit intercourse with David while her husband was absent at the siege of Rabbah, B. C. about 980. Uriah being slain by a contrivance of David, after a period of mourning for her husband Bath-sheba was legally married to the king (2 Sam. 11:3-27). The child which was the fruit of her adulterous intercourse with David died, but she became the mother of four sons—Solomon, Shimea (Shammuah), Shobab, and Nathan (2 Sam. 5:14; 1 Chron. 3:5). When Adonijah attempted to set aside in his own favor the succession promised to Solomon, Bath-sheba was employed by Nathan to inform the king of the conspiracy, and received from him an answer favorable to Solomon (1 Kings 1:11-31). After the accession of Solomon she, as queen-mother, requested permission of her son for Adonijah to take in marriage Abishag the Shunammite (1 Kings 2:21). The request was refused, and became the occasion of the execution of Adonijah (2:24, 25).

BATH'-SHUA, a variation of the name BATH-SHEBA (q. v.), the mother of Solomon (1 Chron. 3:5).

BATTERING-RAM. See ARMOR.

BATTLE. See WARFARE.

BATTLE-AX. See ARMOR.

BATTLE-BOW. See ARMOR.

BATTLEMENT (Heb. מַגְדָּלוֹן, mah-ak-eh', ledge), a breastwork, of wall or lattice, surrounding the flat roofs of Eastern houses, required as a protection against accidents (Deut. 22:8). "Battlements" is the rendering (Jer. 5:10) for נֵטֵי שָׂדֵה, net-ee-shaw', tendril, the parapet of a city wall.

BAV'AI (Heb. בַּבְי, bav-vah'ee), a son of Henadad, and ruler of the half part of Keilah. He repaired a portion of the wall of Jerusalem on the return from Babylon (Neh. 3:18), B. C. 445.

BAY (Heb. לְשׁוֹן, law-shone', tongue), the cove of the Dead Sea, at the mouth of the Jordan (Josh. 15:5; 18:19), and also of the southern extremity of the same sea (15:2). The same term is used (in the original) with reference to the forked mouths of the Nile ("the tongue of the Egyptian Sea," Isa. 11:15).

BAY, the color, according to the English version, of one of the spans of horses in the vision of Zechariah (6:3, 7). It is the rendering of מְבִיזִים, av-moh'ts', strong. Keil and Delitzsch translate "speckled, powerful horses" (Com., in loc.).

BAY TREE. See VEGETABLE KINGDOM.

BAZ'LITH (Heb. בַּצְלִיחַ, bats-leeth', nakedness), the head of one of the families of Nethinim that returned to Jerusalem from the exile (Neh. 7:54). He is called Bazluth in Ezra 2:52.

BAZ'LUTH (Heb. בַּצְלוּחַ, bats-looth'), another form of BAZ'LITH.

BDELLIUM. See MINERAL KINGDOM.

BEACON (Heb. מִצְדָּה, to'-ren), a tree stripped of its branches and used like a flagstaff (Isa. 30:17, marg., "tree bereft of branches"). In Isa. 33:23 and Ezek. 27:5 it is rendered "mast."

BEALI'AH (Heb. בְּעַלְיָה, beh-al-yaw', whose Lord is Jehovah), one of the Benjamite heroes who went over to David at Ziklag (1 Chron. 12:5), B. C. before 1000.

BE'ALOTH (Heb. בְּעַלְלוֹת, beh-av-loth'), probably citizens).

1. A town in the southern part of Judah, i. e., in Simeon (Josh. 15:24), probably the same as Baalath-beer (19:8).

2. A district in Asher of which Baanah was commissary (1 Kings 4:16, "in Aloth;" R. V. "Baloth").

BEAM is the rendering in the A. V. of the following words:

1. Ek'-reg (Heb. עֵבֶר, a web, Judg. 16:14), in the A. V. rendered beam. Keil and Delitzsch (Com., in loc.) understand this to mean the comb or press which was used to press the weft together and so increase the substance of the cloth. The meaning would then be, when Samson was awakened he tore out the weaver's comb and the warp from the loom with his plaits of hair that had been woven in.

2. Mau-nore' (Heb. מְנוֹרָה, literally, yoke, hence a weaver's frame, or its principal beam (1 Sam. 17:7; 2 Sam. 21:19; 1 Chron. 11:23; 20:5).

3. Gabe (Heb. גַּב, cutting), a board (1 Kings 6:9).

4. Obe (Heb. עֹבֵה, a term of architecture, a threshold step (1 Kings 7:6; Ezek. 41:25, A. V. "planks").

5. Tsay'-law (Heb. צֵלֶל, a rib), joists of a building (1 Kings 7:3; "board" in 6:15, 16; "plank" in 6:15).

6. Keh-rooth-oth' (Heb. כְּרִחוֹת, hewed), beams (1 Kings 6:36; 7:2, 12).

7. Ko-raw' (Heb. קוֹרָה, a crosspiece or rafter (2 Kings 6:2, 5; 2 Chron. 3:7; Cant. 1:17).

8. Kaw-raw' (Heb. קַרְיָה, to fit beams, hence to frame (Neh. 3:3, 6; Psa. 104:3).

9. Kaw-fee' (Heb. כַּפֵּיט, a crossbeam, girder (Hab. 2:11).

10. Dok-os' (Gr. δοκός, stick of wood for building purposes (Matt. 7:3, sq.; Luke 6:41, 42). In the passages referred to reference is made to a common proverb among the Jews, respecting those who with greater sins reproved the lesser faults of others. See MORE.

BEAN. See VEGETABLE KINGDOM.

BEAR. See ANIMAL KINGDOM.

BEARD. See HAIR.

BEAST. See ANIMAL KINGDOM; GLOSSARY.

BEAST, in a figurative or symbolical sense, is of frequent occurrence in Scripture, and generally refers to the sensual and groveling or ferocious and brutal natures properly belonging to the brute creation. The psalmist speaks of himself as being "like a beast before God," while giving way to merely sensuous considerations (Psa. 73:22). The word is sometimes used figuratively of brutal men. Hence the phrase, "I fought with wild beasts at Ephesus" (1 Cor. 15:32, comp. Acts 19:29), is a figurative description of a fight with strong and exasperated enemies. For a similar use of the word see Eccles. 3:18; 2 Pet. 2:12; Jude 10.

A wild beast is the symbol of selfish, tyrannical monarchies. The four beasts in Dan. 7:3, 17, 23, represent four kingdoms (Ezek. 34:28; Jer. 12:9).

In the Apocalypse the Beast obviously means a worldly power, whose rising out of the sea indicates that it owes its origin to the commotions of the people (Rev. 13:1; 15:2; 17:8).

The four beasts (Gr. ζῴα, dzo'-ah, living creatures, not θηπῖον, thay-ree'-on, beast in the strict sense) should be rendered the four living ones (Rev. 4:6).

BEATING, or BASTINADO, a punishment in universal use throughout the East. It appears to be designated by the Hebrew phrase "rod of correction" (שֵׁבֶט מוֹסֵר, shay'-bet moo-sawr', Prov. 22:15). Beating with rods ("scourging," Lev. 19:20; "chastising," Deut. 22:18) was established by law, and was very common among the Jews (Prov. 10:13; 26:3). The person to be punished was extended upon the ground, and blows, not exceeding forty, were applied to his back in the presence of a judge (Deut. 25:2, 3). Among the Egyptians, ancient and modern, minor offenses were generally punished with the stick, and persons who refused to pay taxes were frequently brought to terms by a vigorous use of the stick. Superintendents were wont to stimulate laborers by the persuasive powers of the rod. The bastinado was inflicted on both sexes. See PUNISHMENTS.

BEB'AI (Heb. בְּבַי, bay-bah'ee, father).

1. The head of one of the families that returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon (B. C. about 536) to the number of six hundred and twenty-three (Ezra 2:11) or six hundred and twenty-eight (Neh. 7:16). At a later period twenty-eight more, under Zechariah, returned with Ezra (Ezra 8:11), B. C.

Egyptian Bedsteads.

about 457. Several of his sons were among those who had taken foreign wives (Ezra 10:28).

2. The name of one who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. 10:15), B. C. 445.

BECAUSE. See GLOSSARY.

BE'CHER (Heb. בְּכֹרֶת, beh'-ker, firstborn, or a young camel).

1. The second son of Benjamin, according to the list of both in Gen. 46:21 and 1 Chron. 7:6, but omitted in 1 Chron. 8:1. Some suppose that the word "firstborn" in the latter passage is a corruption of Becher; others, that Becher in the two passages above is a corruption of the word signifying "firstborn." Yet 1 Chron. 7:8 gives Becher as a person, and names his sons. He was one of the sons of Benjamin that came down to Egypt with Jacob, being one of the fourteen descendants of Rachel who settled there. At the numbering of the Israelites in the plain of Moab (Num. 26) there is no family named after him. But there is a Becher and a family of Bachrites among the sons of Ephraim. This has given rise to the supposition that the slaughter of the sons of Ephraim by the men of Gath had sadly thinned the house of Ephraim of its males, and that Becher, or his heir, married an Ephraimitish heiress, a daughter of Shuthelah (1 Chron. 7:20, 21), and so his house was reckoned in the house of Ephraim.

2. Son of Ephraim; called Bered (1 Chron. 7:20); his posterity were called Bachrites (Num. 26:35). He is probably the same as the preceding.

BECHO'RATH (Heb. בְּכוֹרֵת, bek-o-rath', firstborn), the son of Aphiah, of the tribe of Benjamin, one of the ancestors of King Saul (1 Sam. 9:1), B. C. long before 1030.

BED, the rendering of several Hebrew and Greek words:

1. Mit-taw' (Heb. מִיטָה, bed as extended; used either for rest at night (Gen. 47:31; Exod. 8:3; 1 Sam. 19:13, etc.) or for ease and quiet, a couch, divan (1 Sam. 28:23; Esth. 7:8; Amos 3:12); a litter (Cant. 3:7).

2. Mish-kaub' (Heb. מִשְׁכָּב, generally the marriage bed (Gen. 49:4; Lev. 15:4); also a coffin or bier (2 Chron. 16:14; Isa. 57:2).

3. Yaw-tsoo'-ah (Heb. יָצוּרָה, spread as a bed (1 Chron. 5:1; Job 17:13; Psa. 63:6).

4. EH'-res (Heb. עֵשֶׂת, with a canopy). This bed was of a more imposing style than ordinary (Job 7:13; Psa. 41:3; "bedstead," Deut. 3:11).

5. Ar-oo-gaw' (Heb. אֶרְוֹגָה, piled up), probably referring to the custom of piling up cushions for the sake of comfort (Cant. 5:13; 6:2, A. V., "bed of spices").

6. Klee'-nay (Gr. κλίνη, Matt. 9:2, 6; Mark 4:21), a mere couch consisting of a litter and coverlet; krab'-bat-os (κράββατος), a pallet or mattress (Mark 2:4; John 5:8, sq.; Acts 9:33); koy'-tay (κοίτη), the marriage bed (Luke 11:7; Heb. 13:4).

We distinguish in the Jewish bed five principal parts: (a) The mattress, a mere mat, or one or more quilts. (b) The covering, a finer quilt than used for a. In summer a thin blanket, or the outer garment worn by day (1 Sam. 19:13), sufficed. Hence the law provided that it should not be kept in pledge after sunset, that the poor might not be without his covering (Deut. 24:13). (c) The pillow mentioned (1 Sam. 19:13) seems to have been material woven of goat's hair, with which persons in the East covered the head and face while sleeping. The

Heb. כֶּה־סֶתֶח, keh'-seth, should be rendered "covering." It may be that pillows were made of cloth rolled up to suit individual taste, or, as at the present day, made of a sheep's fleece or goat's skin stuffed with cotton. (d) The bedstead. The bedstead was not always necessary, the divan, or platform along the side or end of an oriental room, sufficing as a support for the bedding. Yet some slight and portable frame seems implied among the senses of the word, which is used for a "bier" (2 Sam. 3:31), and for the ordinary bed (2 Kings 4:10), for the litter on which a sick person might be carried (1 Sam. 19:15), for Jacob's bed of sickness (Gen. 47:31), and for the couch on which guests reclined at a banquet (Esth. 1:6). (e) Ornamental portions. These consisted of pillows and a canopy, ivory carvings, gold and silver, and probably mosaic work, purple, and fine linen (Esth. 1:6; Cant. 3:9, 10; Amos 6:4). The ordinary furniture of a bedchamber in private life is given in 2 Kings 4:10.

BE'DAD (Heb. בְּדָד, bed-ad', separation, or אֲדָד בֶּן-אָדָם, son of Adad), the father of Hadad, a king in Edom (Gen. 36:35; 1 Chron. 1:46).

BE'DAN (Heb. בְּדָן, bed-avan').

1. The name of a judge of Israel, not found in Judges, but only in 1 Sam. 12:11. It is difficult to identify him with any of the judges mentioned elsewhere, but it is probable that Bedan is a contracted form for the name of the judge Abdon (q.v.).

2. The son of Ulam, the great-grandson of Manasseh (1 Chron. 7:17), B. C. after 1600.

BEDCHAMBER (Heb. חֲדַר הַמִּשְׁכָּוֹת, khad-ar' ham-mee-toth', room of beds, 2 Kings 11:2; 2 Chron. 22:11; חֲדַר הַנִּשְׁכָּב, khad-ar' mish-kavb', sleeping room, Exod. 8:3; 2 Sam. 4:7; 2 Kings 6:12). The "bedchamber" in the temple where Joash was hidden was probably a store chamber for keeping beds (2 Kings 11:2; 2 Chron. 22:11). The position of the bedchamber in the most remote and secret parts of the palace seems marked in the passages, Exod. 8:3; 2 Kings 6:12.

BED'ELAH (Heb. בְּדֵי־יָוָה, bay-dē-yaw', servant of Jehovah), one of the family of Bani, who divorced his Gentile wife on the return from Babylon (Ezra 10:35), B. C. 456.

BEDSTEAD. See BED, 4, 6.

BEE. See ANIMAL KINGDOM.

BEEL'ADA (Heb. בְּעֵל-אָדָם, beh-el-yaw-daw', Baal has known), one of David's sons, born in Jerusalem (1 Chron. 14:7), B. C. after 1000. He is called Eliada (2 Sam. 5:16; 1 Chron. 3:8).

BEEL'ZEBUB (Gr. Βεελζεβούβ, beh-el-zeb-ool'), a heathen deity, believed to be the prince of evil spirits (Matt. 10:25; 12:24, 27; Mark 3:22; Luke 11:15, sq.). By some Beelzebub is thought to mean בְּעֵל זְבֵל, the dung-god, an expression intended to designate with loathing the prince of all moral impurity. It is supposed, at the same time, that the name Beelzebub, the Philistine god of flies, was changed to Beelzebub ("god of dung"), and employed in a jocular way as a name of the devil. Others prefer to derive the word from זְבֵל זָבִיל, bah'-al ze-bool', the lord of the dwelling, in which evil spirits dwell. The fact that Jesus designates himself as "master of the house" would seem to indicate that Beelzeboul had a similar meaning. See GODS, FALSE.

BE'ER (Heb. בְּעַיִר, bē-ayr', an artificial well, distinguished from EN, a natural spring). It is usually combined with other words as a prefix, but two places are known by this name simply:

1. A place in the desert on the confines of MOAB, where the Hebrew princes dug a well with their staves and received a miraculous supply of water (Num. 21:16-18). It is probably the same as Beer-elim (Isa. 15:8).

2. A town in Judah to which Jotham fled for fear of Abimelech (Judg. 9:21), probably about eight Roman miles N. of Eleutheropolis, the present el Birkh, near the mouth of the Wady es Surâr.

BEE'RA (Heb. בְּעֵרָא, bē-ay-raw', a well), the last given of the sons of Zophah, a descendant of Asher (1 Chron. 7:37), B. C. after 1600.

BEE'RAH (Heb. בְּעֵרָה, bē-ay-raw', a well), the son of Baal, a prince of the tribe of Reuben, and carried into captivity by the Assyrian Tiglath-pileser (1 Chron. 5:6).

BE'ER-EL'IM (Heb. בְּעַיִר אֱלִים, bē-ayr' ay-leem', well of heroes), a spot named in Isa. 15:8 as on the "border of MOAB," probably the S., Eglaim being on the N. end of the Dead Sea. It seems to be the same as Beer (Num. 21:16).

BEE'RI (Heb. בְּעֵרִי, bē-ay-ree', of a fountain, illustrious).

1. A Hittite, and father of Judith, a wife of Esau (Gen. 26:34), B. C. about 1796.

2. The father of the prophet Hosea (Hos. 1:1), B. C. before 748.

BE'ER-LAHAI-ROI (Heb. בְּעַיִר לַחַי רֹאֵי, bē-ayr' lakh-ah'ee ro-ee', the well of him that liveth and seeth me, or the well of the vision of life), the fountain between Kadesh and Bered, near which the Lord found Hagar (Gen. 16:7, 14). In Gen. 24:62; 25:11, the A. V. has "the well of Lahai-roi."

BEE'ROTH (Heb. בְּעֵרוֹת, bē-ay-roth', wells).

1. One of the four cities of the Hivites who made a league with Joshua (Josh. 9:17). Beeroth was allotted to Benjamin (Josh. 18:25), in whose possession it continued at the time of David, the murderers of Ish-bosheth belonging to it (2 Sam. 4:2). Beeroth, with Chephirah and Kirjath-jearim, is in the list of those who returned from Babylon (Ezra 2:25; Neh. 7:29).

2. Beeroth of the children of Jaakan is named (Num. 33:31, 32; Deut. 10:6) as a place through which the Israelites twice passed in the desert, being their twenty-seventh and thirty-third station on their way from Egypt to Canaan, probably in the valley of the Arabah.

BEER'ROTHITE, an inhabitant of BEEROTH (q. v.) of Benjamin (2 Sam. 4:2; 23:37).

BE'ER-SHE'BA (Heb. בְּעַיִר שֶׁבַע, bē-ayr' sheh'-bah, well of the oath, or of seven), a city in the southern part of Palestine, about midway between the Mediterranean Sea and the southern end of the Dead Sea. It received its name because of the digging of the well and making of a compact between Abraham and Abimelech (Gen. 21:31). It was a favorite residence of Abraham and Isaac (Gen. 26:33). The latter was living there when Esau sold his birthright to Jacob, and from the encampment round the wells Jacob started on his journey to Mesopotamia. He halted there to offer sacrifice to "the God of his father" on his way to Egypt. Beer-sheba was allotted to Simeon (1 Chron. 4:28), and Samuel's sons were appointed deputy judges for the southernmost districts in Beer-sheba (1 Sam. 8:2). Elijah fled to Beer-sheba, which was still a refuge in the 8th century, and frequented even by northern Israel (Amos 5:5; 8:14). The expression "from Dan to Beer-sheba" was a formula for the whole land. During the separation of the kingdoms the formula became from Geba to Beer-sheba, or from Beer-sheba to Mount Ephraim. After the exile Beer-sheba was again peopled by Jews, and the formula ran from Beer-sheba to the valley of Hinnom (Neh. 11:27, 30). There are still seven wells at Beer-sheba, and to the N., on the hills that bound the valley, are scattered ruins nearly three miles in circumference.

BEESH-TERAH (Heb. בְּעֵשְׁתֵּרָה, beh-esh-ter-ah, with Ashtoreth), one of the two Levitical cities allotted to the Gershonites, out of the tribe of Manasseh beyond Jordan (Josh. 21:27). In the parallel list (1 Chron. 6:71) Ashtaroth is given; and Beeshterah is only a contracted form of Beth-Ashtaroth, the "temple of Ashtoreth."

BEEBLE. See ANIMAL KINGDOM.

BEEVES. See ANIMAL KINGDOM.

BEG, the rendering of Heb. בָּקַשׁ, baw-kash', beseech (Psa. 37:25); שָׁאַל, shaw-al' (Psa. 109:10; Prov. 20:4); Gr. ἐπαίτεω, ep-ah-ee-tek'-o, to ask for (Luke 16:3); προσαιτέω, pros-ah-ee-tek'-o (Mark 10:46; Luke 18:35; John 9:8).

BEGGAR (Heb. עֲבֹנִי, eb-yone', destitute, 1 Sam. 2:8; Gr. πτωχός, pto-khos', Luke 16:20, 22; Gal. 4:9; elsewhere poor). A beggar, whose regular business it was to solicit alms publicly, or to go promiscuously from door to door, as understood by us, was unknown to the Pentateuchal legislation. The poor were allowed privileges by the Mosaic law, and indeed the Hebrew could not be an absolute pauper. His land was inalienable, except for a certain period, when it reverted to him or his posterity, and if this resource was insufficient he could pledge the services of himself and family for a valuable sum. In the song of Hannah (1 Sam. 2:8), however, beggars are spoken of, and beggary is predicted of the posterity of the wicked, while it was promised not to be the portion of the seed of the righteous (Psa. 109:10; 37:25); so that then the practice was probable, though not uncommon. In the New Testament we read of beggars that were blind, diseased, and maimed seeking alms at the doors of the rich, by the waysides, and before the gate of the temple (Mark 10:46; Luke 16:20, 21; Acts 3:2).

BEGINNING (Heb. רֵאשִׁית, ray-sheeth', first). "In the beginning" (Gen. 1:1) is used absolutely, like ἐν ἀρχῇ, en ar-khay' (John 1:1), and indicates the commencement of a series of things or events. The context of Gen. 1:1 gives it the meaning of the very first beginning, the commencement of the world, when time itself began.

Our Lord is styled the Beginning (Gr. Ἀρχή, ar-khay') by both Paul and John (Col. 1:18; Rev. 1:8; 3:14), and it is worthy of remark that the Greek philosophers expressed the First Cause of all things by the same name.

BEHEAD. See PUNISHMENT, p. 913.

BEHEMOTH. See ANIMAL KINGDOM.

BE'KAH, an early Jewish weight, being half a shekel. See METROLOGY, III.

BEL, the national god of Babylonia. See GODS, FALSE.

BELA (Heb. בִּלְעָא, bel'-lah, swallowed).

1. A king of Edom, the son of Beor, and a native of the city of Dinhabah (Gen. 36:32, 33; 1 Chron. 1:43). From the name of his father, Beor, we may infer that he was a Chaldean by birth, and reigned in Edom by conquest. He may have been contemporary with Moses and Balaam.

2. The eldest son of Benjamin (Gen. 46:21; 1 Chron. 7:6, 7; 8:3), B. C. about 1640. From him came the family of the Belaites (Num. 26:38).

3. A son of Azaz, a Reubenite (1 Chron. 5:8), "who dwelt in Aroer even unto Nebo and Baal-meon."

4. Another name (Gen. 14:2, 8) for the city of ZOAR (q. v.).

BELAH, a less correct mode of Anglicizing (Gen. 46:21) the name BELA (q. v.), the son of Benjamin.

BELAITE, the patronymic (Num. 26:38) of the descendants of BELA, 2 (q. v.).

BELIAL (Heb. בְּלִיַּאל, bel-e-yah'-al, worthlessness, wickedness; Gr. Βελιάλ, bel-ee'-al). Belial is often used in the A. V. as if it were a proper name, but beyond question it should not be regarded in the Old Testament as a proper name; its meaning being worthlessness, and hence recklessness, lawlessness. The expression "son" or "man of Belial" must be understood as meaning simply a worthless, lawless fellow (Deut. 13:13; Judg. 19:22; 20:13, etc.).

In the New Testament the term appears (in the best manuscripts) in the form Βελίας, bel-ee'-as, and not Βελιάλ, as given in A. V. The term, as used in 2 Cor. 6:15, is generally understood as applied to Satan, as the personification of all that is bad.

BELIEF (Heb. אֱמוּנָה, aw-man', to be firm; Gr. πίστις, pis'-tis, trust), the mental assent to a statement, proposition, or existing condition of things. The statement, however, may be untrue, in which case belief is opposed to knowledge. A statement of truth commends itself to us as commanding acceptance, which is belief. The testimony of consciousness always commands our belief. A falsehood may be repeated until we believe it to be true, though we believe truth much more readily than falsehood.

Those within whose reach the truth is are guilty in not believing. If they turn their minds in the direction of truth they will be convinced. God condemns those who will not come to the light. The words translated believe in both the Old and New Testament strongly carry the meaning of remaining steadfast, adhering to, as well as relying on and trusting, a fact which speaks volumes as to the way of salvation.

BELIEVERS (Gr. πιστοί, pis-toi'; Lat. fideles), a term applied to converts (Acts 5:14; 1 Tim. 4:12); in the early Church baptized laymen, in distinction from the clergy on the one hand, and catechumens, who were preparing for baptism. They had special privileges, titles, and honors, denied the catechumen, being called "the illuminated," "the initiated," "the perfect," "the favorites of heaven," and were allowed to partake of the Lord's Supper, join in all the prayers of the Church, and listen to all discourses delivered in the Church.

BELL (Heb. תְּזִזָּה, pah-am-one', something struck, Exod. 28:33, 34; 39:25, 26; מְצִלְלוֹת, mets-il-law', tinkling, Zech. 14:20). The bell is closely allied to the cymbal. The indentation of cymbals would be found to add to their vibrating power and sonority, and as this indentation became exaggerated nothing would be more probable than that they should eventually be formed into half-globes. This form is found in Roman and Greek sculpture. The most ancient bells yet discovered consist of a plate of metal, bent round and rudely riveted where the edges meet. Such were in use among the Assyrians and ancient Chinese.

1. Small golden bells were attached to the lower part of the blue robe (robe of the ephod) which formed part of the official dress of the high priest. These may have been partly for ornament, but partly also for use, to ring as often as the high priest moved, so as to announce his approach and retirement (Exod. 28:33-35).

2. In Isa. 3:16-18 reference is made to little tinkling bells, which are worn to this day by women upon their wrists and ankles to attract attention and gain admiration.

3. "Bells of the horses" (Zech. 14:20) were probably "concave pieces or plates of brass, which were sometimes attached to horses for the sake of ornament" (Jahn, Bibl. Arch., § 96). These by their tinkling served to enliven the animals, and in the caravans served the purpose of our modern sheep bells. In the passage referred to the motto "Holiness to the Lord," which the high priest wore upon his miter, being also inscribed upon the bells of horses, predicted the coming of a time when all things, even to the lowest, should be sanctified to God.

BELLOWS (Heb. מַנְפִּי, map-poo'-akh, blower), Jer. 6:29 only, though other passages which speak of blowing the fire (Isa. 54:16; Ezek. 22:21), may refer to them; but as wood was the common fuel in ancient times, and kindles readily, a fan would generally be sufficient. Bellows seem to have been of great antiquity in Egypt, and were used at the forge or furnace. They were worked by the foot of the operator, pressing alternately upon two skins till they were exhausted, and pulling up each exhausted skin with a string held in his hand. The earliest specimens seem to have been simply of reed tipped with a metal point where it came in contact with the fire.

BELLY (Heb. usually בֶּטֶן, bel'-ten, hollow; Gr. κοιλία, koy-lee'-ah; also Heb. מַיְעֵם, may-eem'; Gr. γαστήρ, gas-tare', especially the bowels). Among the Hebrews and most ancient nations the belly was regarded as the seat of the carnal affections, as being, according to their view, that which first partakes of sensual pleasures (Tit. 1:12; Phil. 3:19; Rom. 16:18).

Figurative. It is used figuratively for the heart, the innermost recesses of the soul (Prov. 18:8; 20:27; 26:22). The "belly of hell," literally, "out of the womb of the nether world," is a strong phrase to express Jonah's dreadful condition in the deep (Jonah 2:2).

BELOMANCY, divination by arrows. See MAGIC, p. 670.

BELSHAZ'ZAR (Heb. בַּלְשַׁצְצָר, bale-shatz-sar'), the name of the last native king of Babylon mentioned in Daniel (chaps. 5, 7, and 8). This name occurs also in Josephus, who identifies him with the Babylonian king Nabonidus, in the words, "the Baltasar, who by the Babylonians was called Naboadelos." Except for the references in these two places, viz., Daniel and Josephus, the name of Belshazzar was nowhere to be found. Since the discovery of the Babylonian inscriptions, however, the name has been frequently found. In Babylonian it is found Bel-shar-usur, composed of the name of the god Bel (Heb. Baal), the word sharru, king, and the imperative singular of nasaru, to protect, the whole meaning, "Bel protect the king." Belshazzar was the son of Nabonidus (556-539 B. C.), a Babylonian, not a Chaldean, who followed upon the throne of Babylon two incapable kings, and proved to be a man of force and character.

The historical inscriptions which have come down to us which relate to the last days of the Babylonian empire give us no information concerning Belshazzar, but his existence and his relationship to the king are placed beyond doubt by the Babylonian contract tablets in which he is mentioned. One of these tablets mentions a debt of Belshazzar's for which he had to give security, being thus compelled to conform to the same legal obligations as bound his subjects. In all of them he is specifically called "son of the king." Besides these commercial transactions and arrangements, there are many records of gifts to temples in Babylonia by Belshazzar, especially to the shrine of the sun god at Sippar. The reason of these gifts to the temple at Sippar is unknown, though it has been suggested that at this time Belshazzar may have been at the head of an army stationed in the country of which Sippar was a prominent city.

It seems probable that though Nabonidus continued to be king of Babylon until it was taken by Cyrus and annexed to the Persian empire, Belshazzar was regent during part of the time, and hence was properly called king in the Book of Daniel. The events which led up to the fall of Babylon are still not quite plain. As in the case of the fall of Nineveh, Babylonian documents dealing with the end of the state fail us, and we must have recourse to the inscriptions of Cyrus himself, and these have not yet satisfactorily solved all the difficulties.

There is some reason to hope that later discoveries may throw some light on Darius the Mede, and on the relation of Belshazzar to the kingdom. See BABYLON; also SUPPLEMENT.—R. W. R.

BELTESHAZZAR (Heb. בִּלְשַׁצְצָר, beltesh-atsar', Bel's prince), the name given to Daniel at the court of Nebuchadnezzar in Babylon (Dan. 1:7, etc.). See DANIEL.

BEN (Heb. בֵּן, bane, son), a Levite "of the second degree," one of the porters appointed by David to the service of the ark (1 Chron. 15:18), B. C. 938.

BEN-(Heb. בֵּן, bane, son of), often used as a prefix to scriptural proper names, the following word being either a proper name, an appellative, or abstract.

BENA'IAH (Heb. בְּנֵי־יָאוֹב, ben-aw-yaw', built by Jehovah).

1. The son of Jehoiada, the chief priest (1 Chron. 27:5), and a native of Kabzeel (2 Sam. 23:20; 1 Chron. 11:22). He was placed by David (1 Chron. 11:25) over his bodyguard of Cherethites and Pelethites (2 Sam. 8:18; 1 Kings 1:38; 1 Chron. 18:17; 2 Sam. 20:23), and given a position above "the thirty," but not included among the "first three" of the mighty men (2 Sam. 23:22, 23; 1 Chron. 11:24, 25; 27:6). He was a very valiant man, and his exploits against man and beast which gave him rank are recorded in 2 Sam. 23:21; 1 Chron. 11:22. He was captain of the host for the third month (1 Chron. 27:5). Benaiah remained faithful to Solomon during Adonijah's attempt on the crown (1 Kings 1:8, sq.). Acting under Solomon's orders, he slew Joab, and was appointed to fill his position as commander of the army (1 Kings 2:35; 4:4), B. C. 938. Jehoiada, the son of Benaiah, succeeded Ahiathophel about the person of the king, according to 1 Chron. 27:34. This is possibly a copyist's mistake for "Benaiah the son of Jehoiada."

2. A man of Pirathon, of the tribe of Ephraim, one of David's thirty mighty men (2 Sam. 23:30; 1 Chron. 11:31), and the captain of the host for the eleventh month (1 Chron. 27:14), B. C. 1000.

3. One of the princes of the families of Simeon, who dispossessed the Amalekites from the pasture grounds of Gedor (1 Chron. 4:36), B. C. about 715.

4. A Levite in the time of David, who "played with the psaltery on Alamoth" at the removal of the ark (1 Chron. 15:18, 20; 16:8), B. C. about 990.

5. A priest appointed to blow the trumpet before the ark when David caused it to be removed to Jerusalem (1 Chron. 15:24; 16:6), B. C. about 990.

6. A Levite of the sons of Asaph, the son of Jeiel, and grandfather of Jahaziel, which latter was sent by God to encourage the army of Jehoshaphat against the Moabites (2 Chron. 20:14), B. C. before 896.

7. A Levite in the time of Hezekiah, who was one of the overseers of the offerings to the Temple (2 Chron. 31:13), B. C. 726.

8-11. Four Jews who had taken Gentile wives after the return from Babylon, B. C. 456. They were respectively of the "sons" of Parosh (Ezra 10:25), Pahath-moab (v. 30), Bani (v. 35), and Nebo (v. 43).

12. The father of Pelatiah, which latter was a "prince of the people" in the time of Ezekiel (Ezek. 11:1), B. C. before 592.

BEN-AMMI (Heb. בְּנֵי־אָמִי, ben-am-mee', son of my kindred), son of Lot by his youngest daughter. He was the progenitor of the Ammonites (Gen. 19:38), B. C. 1897.

BENCH (Heb. כֶּלֶךְ־רֶשֶׁת, kehl'-resh, a plank, usually rendered board), once the rowing benches of a ship (Ezek. 27:6). The same Hebrew term is used (Exod. 26:15, sq.) for the boards of the TABERNACLE (q. v.). See CHITTIM.

BEN'E-BE'RAK (Heb. בְּנֵי־בְרַק, ben-ay-ber-ak', sons of lightning), one of the cities of Dan (Josh. 19:45), the present Ibn Abrak, an hour from Jehud. Sennacherib mentions it as one of the cities besieged and taken by him (Sayce, Higher Crit. and the Mon., p. 430).

BENEDICTION, an essential form of public worship was the priestly benediction, the form of which is prescribed in the law, "The Lord bless thee, and keep thee: the Lord make his face shine upon thee, and be gracious unto thee: the Lord lift up his countenance upon thee, and give thee peace" (Num. 6:24-26), the promise being added that God would fulfill the words of the blessing. This blessing was pronounced by the priest, after every morning and evening sacrifice, with uplifted hands, as recorded of Aaron (Lev. 9:22), the people responding by uttering an amen. This blessing was also regularly pronounced at the close of the service in the synagogues (see Keil, Bib. Arch., i, 457). The Levites appear also to have had the power of giving the blessing (2 Chron. 30:27), and the same privilege was accorded the king, as the viceroy of the Most High (2 Sam. 6:18; 1 Kings 8:55). Our Lord is spoken of as blessing little children (Mark 10:16; Luke 24:50), besides the blessing on the occasion of the institution of the Eucharist (Matt. 26:26).

BEN'E-JA'AKAN (Heb. בְּנֵי־יָאָקָן, ben-ay-yah-ak-awn', children of Jaakan), a tribe which gave their name to certain wells in the desert which formed one of the halting places of the Israelites on their journey to Canaan (Num. 33:31, 32). "Bene-Jaakan is simply an abbreviation of Beeroth-bene-Jaakan, wells of the children of Jaakan. Now, if the children of Jaakan were the same as the Horite family of Jakan mentioned in Gen. 36:27, the wells of Jaakan would have to be sought for on the mountains that bound the Arabah" (K. and D., Com., in loc.).

BEN'E-KE'DEM (Heb. בְּנֵי־קֵדֶם, ben-ay-keh'-dem, "children of the East") a people or peoples dwelling to the E. of Jordan, by which we are to understand not so much the Arabian desert, that reaches to the Euphrates, as Mesopotamia (Gen. 29:1; Job 1:3; Judg. 6:3, 33; 7:12; 8:10, etc.).

BENEVOLENCE, DUE (Gr. ἡ ὀφειλομένη εὐνοία), a euphemism for marital duty (1 Cor. 7:3).

BEN-HA'DAD (Heb. בְּנֵי־חָדָד, ben-had-ad', son of Hadad), the name of three kings of Damascus:

1. Probably the son (or grandson) of Rezon. In his time Damascus was supreme in Syria, and as an energetic and powerful sovereign he was courted by Baasha, king of Israel, and Asa, king of Judah. He finally closed with the latter on receiving a large amount of treasure, and conquered a great part of the N. of Israel, thereby enabling Asa to pursue his victories in the S. (1 Kings 15:18-20; 2 Chron. 16:2-4), B. C. about 907. He probably continued to wage war successfully against Israel in Omri's time (1 Kings 20:34).

2. Son of the preceding, and a king of great power and extended dominion. This is proven by the fact that thirty-two vassal kings accompanied him to his first siege of Samaria (1 Kings 20:1). Ahab submitted as a vassal until he was required to give up his wives and children to Ben-hadad, when he rebelled (vers. 2-9). Ben-hadad ordered his forces to be set in array against the city. Ahab's army, preceded by two hundred and thirty-two princes, went out against the Syrians while at their cups, and defeated them with great slaughter. Upon the supposition that Jehovah was a god of the hills, he resolved to fight the Israelites in the low country, and offered battle at Aphek. The Syrians were defeated with a loss of one hundred thousand men, while twenty-seven thousand were crushed by the fall (perhaps in an earthquake) of the wall of Aphek, in which they had taken refuge. Ben-hadad threw himself upon the mercy of Ahab, who spared his life on condition that he would restore the towns taken from Omri by Ben-hadad I (vers. 10-34), B. C. 901-900. Some time after the death of Ahab, Ben-hadad renewed the war, but his plans and operations were defeated, being made known to Jehoram by Elisha (2 Kings 6:8, sq.), B. C. 893. Once more he attacked Samaria, and pressed the siege so closely that a terrible famine ensued, but the Syrians withdrew because of a panic infused among them by the Almighty (2 Kings 6:24 to 7:1-16), B. C. 892. Seven years later Ben-hadad, being sick, sent for Elisha, who was in Damascus, to inquire of him as to the result of his sickness. The prophet announced that his sickness was not mortal, but that he should die, which prophecy was fulfilled by the king being smothered by Hazael, who succeeded him (2 Kings 8:7-15), B. C. 885.

3. A third king of Damascus, son of Hazael, and his successor on the throne of Syria. His reign was disastrous for Damascus, and the vast power wielded by his father sank into insignificance. The dying Elisha prophesied that the Syrians should be smitten at Aphek (2 Kings 13:3), and his prophecy was fulfilled by Jehoash beating Ben-hadad three times, and recovering the cities taken from Israel (v. 25), B. C. about 836. The misfortunes of Ben-hadad III are noticed by Amos (Amos 1:4).

BEN-HA'IL (Heb. בְּנֵי־יִל, ben-khah'-yil, son of strength, that is, warrior), one of the "princes" of the people sent by Jehoshaphat to teach the inhabitants of Judah (2 Chron. 17:7), B. C. 912.

BEN-HA'NAN (Heb. בְּנֵי־חָנָן, ben-khar-nawn', son of one gracious), the third named of the four "sons" of Shimon, of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 4:20), B. C. probably before 1300.

BEN'INU (Heb. בְּנֵי־נוֹ, ben-ee-noo', our son), a Levite who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. 10:13), B. C. 445.

BEN'JAMIN (Heb. בְּנֵי־יָמִין, bin-yaw-mene', son of my right hand).

1. The youngest of the sons of Jacob, and the second by Rachel (Gen. 35:18), born B. C. about 1640.

Personal History. Benjamin was probably the only son of Jacob born in Palestine. His birth took place on the road between Beth-el and Ephrath (Bethlehem), a short distance from the latter. His mother died immediately, and with her last breath named him Ben-oni (son of my pain), which name the father changed. We hear nothing more of Benjamin until the time when his brethren went into Egypt to buy food. Jacob kept him at home, for he said, "Lest peradventure mischief befall him" (Gen. 42:4). The story of his going to Joseph, the silver cup, his apprehension, etc., is familiar, and discloses nothing beyond a very strong affection manifested for him by his father and brethren.

The Tribe of Benjamin. In Gen. 46:21 the immediate descendants of Benjamin are given to the number of ten, whereas in Num. 26:38-40, only seven are enumerated, and some even under different names. This difference may probably be owing to the circumstance that some of the direct descendants of Benjamin died at an early period, or, at least, childless. (1) Numbers. At the first census the tribe numbered thirty-five thousand four hundred, ranking eleventh, but increased to forty-five thousand six hundred at the second census, ranking seventh. (2) Position. During the wilderness journey Benjamin's position was on the W. side of the tabernacle with his brother tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh (Num. 2:18-24). We have the names of the "captain" of the tribe when it set out on its long road (Num. 2:22); of the spy (13:9); of the families of which the tribe consisted when it was marshaled at the great halt in the plains of Moab, near Jericho (Num. 26:38-41, 63), and of the "prince" who was chosen to assist at the dividing of the land (Num. 34:21). (3) Territory. The proximity of Benjamin to Ephraim during the march to the promised land was maintained in the territories allotted to each. Benjamin lay immediately to the S. of Ephraim, and between him and Judah.

(4) Subsequent history. We may mention, among the events of note, that they assisted Deborah (Judg. 5:14); they were invaded by the Ammonites (10:9); that they were almost exterminated by the other tribes because they refused to give up the miscreants of Gibeah (chs. 19, 20); that the remaining six hundred were furnished with wives at Jabesh-gilead and Shiloh (ch. 21). To Benjamin belongs the distinction of giving the first king to the Jews, Saul being a Benjamite (1 Sam. 9:1; 10:20, 21). After the death of Saul they declared themselves for Ish-bosheth (2 Sam. 2:15, sq.; 1 Chron. 12:29). They returned to David (2 Sam. 3:19; 19:16, 17). David having at last expelled the Jebusites from Zion, and made it his own residence, the close alliance between Benjamin and Judah (Judg. 1:8) was cemented by the circumstance that while Jerusalem actually belonged to the district of Benjamin, that of Judah was immediately contiguous to it. After the death of Solomon Benjamin espoused the cause of Judah, and the two formed a kingdom by themselves. After the exile, also, these two tribes constituted the flower of the new Jewish colony (comp. Ezra 4:1; 10:9). The prediction of Jacob regarding Benjamin's future lot, or the development of his personal character in his tribe, is brief: "Benjamin shall raven as a wolf: in the morning he shall devour the prey, and at night he shall divide the spoil" (Gen. 49:27). The events of history cast light on that prediction, for the ravening of the wolf is seen in the exploits of Ehud the Benjamite (Judg. 3), and in Saul's career, and especially in the whole matter of Gibeah, so carefully recorded in Judg. 20. So, again, the fierce wolf is seen in fight in 2 Sam. 2:15, 16, at Gibeon, and again in the character of Shimei. Some find much of the wolf of Benjamin in Saul of Tarsus, "making havoc of the Church."

2. A man of the tribe of Benjamin, second named of the seven sons of Bilhan, and the head of a family of warriors (1 Chron. 7:10).

3. An Israelite, one of the "sons of Harim," who divorced his foreign wife after the exile (Ezra 10:32), B. C. 456. He seems to be the same person who had assisted in rebuilding (Neh. 3:23) and purifying (Neh. 12:34) the walls of Jerusalem.

BEN'JAMITE (1 Sam. 9:21; 22:7; 2 Sam. 16:11, etc.), the patronymic title of the descendants of the patriarch BENJAMIN (q. v.).

BE'NO (Heb. בְּנוֹ, beh-no', his son) is given as the only son, or the first of the four sons, of Jaaziah the Levite, of the family of Merari, in 1 Chron. 24:26, 27.

BEN-O'NI (Heb. בְּנוֹ־רַחֵל, ben-o-nee', son of my pain), the name given by the dying Rachel to her youngest son, but afterward changed (Gen. 35:18) by his father to BENJAMIN (q. v.).

BEN-ZO'HETH (Heb. בְּנוֹ־זוּחֶת, ben-zo-khayth', son of Zoheth), a person named (1 Chron. 4:20) as the second son of Ishi, a descendant of Judah, or it may be that he was grandson of Ishi, being the son of Zoheth himself.

BE'ON (Heb. בְּעֹן, beh-on', perhaps an early error for MEON, q. v.), one of the places fit for pasturage (Num. 32:3, "a place for cattle"). It is more properly called Beth-baal-meon (Josh. 18:17), more briefly Baal-meon (Num. 32:38), and Beth-meon (Jer. 48:23).

BE'OR (Heb. בְּעוֹר, beh-ore', a torch).

1. The father of Bela, one of the kings of Edom (Gen. 36:32; 1 Chron. 1:43).

2. The father of Balaam, the prophet hired by Balak to curse the children of Israel (Num. 22:5), B. C. about 1170. In 2 Pet. 2:15 he is called Bosor.

BE'RA (Heb. בְּרַעַי, beh'-rah, gift, evil), king of Sodom at the time of the invasion of the five kings under Chedorlaomer, which was repelled by Abraham (Gen. 14:2, 17, 21), B. C. about 2250.

BER'ACHAH (Heb. בְּרַכָּה, ber-aw-kaw', a blessing).

1. One of the thirty Benjamite warriors who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron. 12:3).

2. A valley between Bethlehem and Hebron, not far from Engedi; noted as the place where Jehoshaphat overcame the Moabites and Ammonites (2 Chron. 20:26).

BERACHI'AH (1 Chron. 6:39). See BERECHIAH, 2.

BERAI'AH (Heb. בְּרַאיָה, ber-aw-yaw', created by Jehovah), next to the last named of the sons of Shimhi, and a chief Benjamite of Jerusalem (1 Chron. 8:21).

BERE'A (Gr. Βέροια, ber'-oy-ah), a Macedonian city at the foot of Mount Bermius, once a large and populous city, the residence of many Jews, whose character for careful criticism in the study of the Scriptures was commended by St. Paul (Acts 17:10-13). Berea is now known as Verria, a place of some fifteen thousand people.

BERECHI'AH (Heb. בְּרַכְיָהוּ, beh-rek-yaw'-hoo, blessed by Jehovah).

1. One of the sons (according to most authorities), or a brother (McC. and S., Cyc., s. v.), of Zerubbabel, of the royal line of Judah (1 Chron. 3:20), B. C. 536.

2. The son of Shimea and father of Asaph, the celebrated singer (1 Chron. 6:39, A. V., "Bera-chiah"; 15:17), B. C. 1000. He was one of the "doorkeepers for the ark" when it was removed from the house of Obed-edom (1 Chron. 15:23).

3. The son of Asa, and one of the Levites that dwelt in the villages of the Netophathites after the return from Babylon (1 Chron. 9:16), B. C. about 536.

4. The son of Meshillemoth, and one of the chiefs of Ephraim, who enforced the prophet Oded's prohibition of the enslavement of their Judaite captives by the warriors of the northern kingdom (2 Chron. 28:12), B. C. 741.

5. The son of Meshezabeel and father of Meshullam, who repaired a part of the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:4, 30). His granddaughter was married to Johanan, the son of Tobiah (Neh. 6:18).

6. The son of Iddo and father of Zechariah the prophet (Zech. 1:1, 7), B. C. before 520.

BE'RED (Heb. בְּרֵד, beh'-red, hail).

1. A son of Shuthelah and grandson of Ephraim

(1 Chron. 7:20), supposed by some to be identical with Becher (Num. 26:85).

2. A town in the S. of Palestine (Gen. 16:14), between which and Kadesh lay the well Lahai-roi; supposed by some to be at El-Khulasah, twelve miles from Beer-sheba.

BE'RI (Heb. בְּרִי, bay-ree', well, fountain), a son of Zophah, and a mighty warrior of the tribe of Asher (1 Chron. 7:36).

BERI'AH (Heb. בְּרִי'א, ber-ee'-aw, in evil, or son of evil).

1. The last named of the four sons of Asher, and father of Heber and Malchiel (Gen. 46:17; 1 Chron. 7:30). His descendants were called Beriites (Num. 26:44, 45).

2. A son of Ephraim, so named on account of the state of his father's house when he was born. Some of Ephraim's sons had been slain by men of Gath "because they came down to take away their cattle" (1 Chron. 7:23).

3. A Benjamite, and apparently son of Elpaal. He and his brother Shema were ancestors of the inhabitants of Aijalon, and expelled the people of Gath (1 Chron. 8:13). His nine sons are enumerated in vers. 14-16.

4. The last named of the four sons of Shimei, a Levite of the family of Gershom (1 Chron. 23:10, 11). His posterity was not numerous, and was reckoned with that of his brother Jeush.

BERITITES (Heb. בְּרִיתִים, hab-ber-ee-ee'), only mentioned in Num. 26:44, and the descendants of BERIAH (q. v.), son of Asher (Gen. 46:17; Num. 26:45).

BE'RITES (Heb. בְּרִי, bay-ree'), a people only mentioned in 2 Sam. 20:14, in the account of Joab's pursuit of Sheba, son of Bichri. Being mentioned in connection with Abel and Beth-machah they seem to have lived in northern Palestine. Thomson (Land and Book) places them at Biria, N. of Safed. Biria he identifies with the Beroth, a city of the upper Galilee, not far from Cadash, where, according to Josephus (Ant., v, i, 18), the northern Canaanite confederacy pitched camp against Joshua. The story is told in Josh. 11, where, however, the camp is located at the waters of Merom.

Klostermann, from the reading of the LXX (ol év χαρπῶ), thinks the true reading may have been "all the Bichrites."—W. H.

BE'RITH, the god (Judg. 9:46). See GODS, FALSE.

BERNI'CE (Gr. Βερνίκη), the eldest daughter of Agrippa I, by his wife Cypros; she was espoused to Marcus, the son of Alexander, and upon his death was married to her uncle Herod, king of Chalcis, by whom she had two sons (Josephus, Ant., xviii, 5, 4; xix, 5, 1). After the death of Herod she lived for some time with her own brother, Agrippa II, probably in incestuous intercourse. She was afterward married to Polemon, king of Cilicia, but soon deserted him and returned to her brother. With him she visited Festus on his appointment as procurator of Judea, when Paul defended himself before them all (Acts 25:13, 23; 26:30). She afterward became the mistress of Vespasian and his son Titus.

BERO'DACH-BAL'ADAN (Heb. בְּרִדְאֲחַזְבַּלְאֲדָן, ber-o-dak' bal-ad-awn'), the king of Babylon who sent friendly letters and a gift to Hezekiah upon hearing of his sickness (2 Kings 20:12). He is also called, in Isa. 39:1, MERODACH-BALADAN (q. v.).

BERCE'A. See BEREÄ.

BERO'THAH (Heb. בְּרוֹתַי, bay-ro-thaw', Ezek. 47:16), or BER'OTHAI (Heb. בְּרוֹתַי, bay-ro-thah'ee, cypress, 2 Sam. 8:8). Ezekiel mentions Berothah in connection with Hamath and Damascus, as forming the northern boundary of the promised land as restored in his vision. Keil (Com., in loc.) says: "Hamath is not the city of Hamath on the Orontes, . . . but the kingdom of Hamath, the southern boundary of which formed the northern boundary of Canaan, though it cannot be given with exactness." Harper (Bible and Mod. Dis., p. 245) identifies Berothai with Beirut.

BE'ROTHITE, an epithet of Naharai, Joab's armor-bearer (1 Chron. 11:39), probably as a native of BEEROOTH (q. v.).

BERYL. See MINERAL KINGDOM.

BE'SAI (Heb. בְּסַי, bes-ah'ee, subjugator, victory), one of the heads of the Nethinim, whose descendants returned from Babylon (Ezra 2:49; Neh. 7:52), B. C. 536.

BESODE'IAH (Heb. בְּסוֹדֵי'א, bes-o-deh-yaw', in the counsel of Jehovah), the father of Meshulam, which latter repaired "the old gate" of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:6), B. C. 445.

BESOM (Heb. מַטְאָאֵי, mat-at-ay', a broom, Isa. 14:23, "besom of destruction"). To sweep away, as with a broom, is a metaphor still frequent in the East for utter ruin. Jehovah treats Babylon as rubbish, and sweeps it away, destruction serving him as a broom. See GLOSSARY.

BE'SOR (Heb. בְּסוֹר, bes-ore', cold), a brook flowing into the Mediterranean, about five miles S. of Gaza. The place where two hundred of David's men remained while the other troops pursued the Amalekites (1 Sam. 30:9, 10, 21). The present Wady es Sheriah, according to some; others claim its location unknown.

BESTEAD. See GLOSSARY.

BESTOW. See GLOSSARY.

BE'TAH (Heb. בְּתַח, beh'-takh, confidence), called Tibhath (1 Chron. 18:8), a city of Syria-Zobah, captured by David (2 Sam. 8:8), and yielding much spoil of "brass." Probably a city on the eastern slope of Anti-Libanus.

BE'TEN (Heb. בְּתֵן, beh'-ten, belly), one of the cities on the border of the tribe of Asher (Josh. 19:25 only). Identified by some as the present el-Bahneh, a village with ruins five hours E. of Akka.

BETH (Heb. בֵּית, bah'-yith), the name of the second letter of the Hebrew alphabet, corresponding to our B. As an appellative, Beth is the most general word for house (Gen. 24:32; 33:17; Judg. 18:31; 1 Sam. 1:7). From this general use the transition was natural to a house in the sense of a family. Beth is frequently employed in combination with other words to form the names of places.

BETHAB'ARA (Gr. Βηθαβαρα, bay-thab-ar-ah, house of the ford), the place on the E. bank of the Jordan where John was baptizing (John 1:28); placed by Conder at the ford 'Abarah, just N. of Beisan. The R. V. reads, "in Bethany beyond Jordan." Many of the best Greek manuscripts have "Bethany" instead of "Bethabara." This is not the Bethany near Jerusalem.

BETH-A'NATH (Heb. בֵּית אֲנַת, bayth an-awth, house of response), a fortified city of Naphtali, named with Beth-shemesh (Josh. 19:38; Judg. 1:33), from neither of which the Canaanites were expelled, although made tributaries (Judg. 1:33).

BETH-A'NOTH (Heb. בֵּית אֲנוֹת, bayth an-oth, house of answers), a town in the mountains of Judah (Josh. 15:59).

BETH-AR'BEL (Heb. בֵּית אֲרֵבֶל, bayth ar-bale, house of God's ambush). In Hos. 10:14 we read of Ephraim, "All thy fortresses shall be spoiled, as SHALMAN (q. v.) spoiled Beth-arbel in the day of battle." "Beth-arbel is hardly the Arbela of Assyria—which became celebrated through the victory of Alexander—since the Israelites could scarcely have become so well acquainted with such a remote city, but in all probability the Arbela in Galilee Superior, a place in the tribe of Naphtali between Sephoris and Tiberias" (K. and D., Com.). Sayce locates it near Pella on the E. of Jordan, and thus in the line of Moabite invasion.

BETH-A'VEN (Heb. בֵּית אָוֶן, bayth aw'-ven, house of nothingness, i. e., idolatry), a place in the mountains of Benjamin (Josh. 7:2; 18:12; 1 Sam. 13:5), E. of Beth-el (Josh. 7:2), and between it and Michmash (1 Sam. 13:5).

The place mentioned in Hos. 4:15 is not the Bethany.

BETH'ANY (Gr. Βηθανία, bay-than-ee'-ah, house of dates).

1. A place on the E. of Jordan, the name of which is substituted in the R. V. for Bethabara (see John 1:28).

2. A village situated on the eastern slope of Mount Olivet, fifteen furlongs (about two miles) from Jerusalem. It is called also the house of misery on account of its lonely situation and the invalids who congregated there. It was the home of Lazarus, and associated with important events in Scripture history (Matt. 21:17; 26:6; Mark 11:11; 14:3; Luke 24:50; John 11:1; 12:1); called now Azariyeh, or Lazariyeh, "the place of Lazarus," consisting of about forty poor houses inhabited by Moslems.

BETH-AR'ABAH (Heb. בֵּית הָאֲרָבָה, bayth hav-ar-aw-baw, house of the desert), a town on the N. end of the Dead Sea, and one of six cities belonging to Judah on the N. border of the tribe (Josh. 15:6, 61). It was afterward included in the list of the towns of Benjamin (Josh. 18:22). It is called Arabah in Josh. 18:18.

BETH-A'RAM (Heb. בֵּית הָרָם, bayth hav-aw-ram, mountain house, or town of the height), a town of Gad, opposite Jericho, and three miles E. of Jordan (Josh. 13:27). Named Julius, or Livias, by Herod, after the wife of Augustus; and the present er Rameh.

same, but, as Amos 4:4 and 5:5 clearly show, a name which Hosea adopted from Amos 5:5 for Beth-el (the present Beitin) to show that Beth-el, the house of God, had become Beth-aven, the house of idols, through the setting up of the golden calf there (1 Kings 12:29).

BETH-AZMA'VETH (Heb. בֵּית אֲזַמְוֶת, bayth az-maw'-veth, house of Azmaveth), a village of Benjamin, the inhabitants of which, forty-two in number, returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon (Neh. 7:28; "Azmaveth," Neh. 12:29; Ezra 2:24).

BETH-BA'AL-ME'ON (Heb. בֵּית בְּעַל מְעֹן, bayth bah'-al mē-own, house of Bual-meon), one of the places assigned to Reuben in the plains E. of Jordan (Josh. 13:17), known formerly as Baal-meon (Num. 32:38) or Beon (32:5), to which the Beth was possibly a Hebrew prefix. It is identified with the present ruins of Myun, three quarters of an hour S. E. of Heshbon.

BETH-BA'RAH (Heb. בֵּית בָּרָה, bayth bav-raw, house of crossing), a chief ford of Jordan. Possibly the place of Jacob's crossing (Gen. 32:22), S. of the scene of Gideon's victory (Judg. 7:24), and where Jephtha slew the Ephraimites (Judg. 12:4). Not identified.

BETH-BIR'EI (Heb. בֵּית בִּרְעִי, bayth bir-ee, house of a creative one), a town of Simeon, inhabited by the descendants of Shimei (1 Chron. 4:31); the Beth-lebaath of Josh. 19:6, or simply Lebaath (Josh. 15:32). Not identified with any present locality.

BETH-CAR (Heb. בֵּית כָּר, bayth kar, sheep house), the place to which the Israelites pursued the Philistines from Mizpah (1 Sam. 7:6-12). From the unusual expression, "under Beth-car," it would seem that the place itself was on a height with a road at its foot. Its situation is not known.

BETH-DA'GON (Heb. בֵּית דָּגוֹן, bayth-daw-gohn, house of Dagon).

1. A city in the low country of Judah, about five miles from Lydda, near Philistia (Josh. 15:41).

2. A town near the S. E. border of Asher (Josh. 19:27).

BETH-DIBLATHA'IM (Heb. בֵּית דִּבְלַתְיָיִם, bayth dib-law-thal'-yim, house of two cakes of figs), a city of Moab denounced by Jeremiah (Jer. 48:22); called Almon-diblathaim (Num. 33:46) and Diblath (Ezek. 6:14).

BETH'-EL (Heb. בֵּית אֱלֹהִים, bayth-ale', house of God).

1. A town about twelve miles N. of Jerusalem, piet by people returning from Babylon (comp. Ezra 2:28 with Neh. 11:31).

Beth-el being, as laid down by Eusebius and Jerome, twelve miles from Jerusalem and on the right hand of the road to Shechem, corresponds precisely to the ruins which bear the name Beitin. It stands upon the point of a low rocky ridge, between two shallow wadies, which unite and fall into the Wady Suweinit toward the S. E.

2. Knobel suggests that this is a corrupt reading for Bethul or Bethuel (Josh. 19:4; 1 Chron. 4:30), in the tribe of Simeon.

BETH-EL, MOUNT OF, the southern range of mountains belonging to Beth-el (Josh. 16:1, 2). Beth-el is here distinguished from Luz because the reference is not to the town of Beth-el, but to the mountains, from which the boundary ran out to Luz.

BETH'-ELITE, a name by which Hiel, who rebuilt Jericho (1 Kings 16:34), was called, being a native of BETH-EL (q. v.) in Benjamin.

BETH-E'MEK (Heb. בֵּית הַמְּיָק, bayth haw-Ay-mek, house of the valley), a city of Asher, in the S. of the valley of Jiphthah-el (Josh. 19:27), not yet discovered.

BETHER (Heb. בְּתָר, bet'-ther, dissection, separation), a range of mountains named in Cant. 2:17, and perhaps the same as the "mountains of spices" (8:14).

BETHES'DA (Gr. Βηθεσδα, bay-thes-dah, house of mercy, or of the stream), a pool in Jerusalem near the sheep gate (Neh. 3:1; 12:39; John 5:2). Incorrectly identified with the modern Birket-Israil. Robinson identified it with the pool of the Virgin in the Kedron valley, as does Conder. Captain Warren thinks it the same as that pool near the N. W. corner of the Haram area, and in the convent of the Sisters of Zion.

Still another identification is with the half-filled water reservoir adjoining the Church of St. Anne, which the older writers call the piscina interior. In the time of the Crusades it was distinguished from Birket-Israil, called the sheep pool, and around it five porches were traced.

BETH-E'ZEL (Heb. בֵּית הָאֵזֶל, bayth haw-ay'-tsel, near house, Mic. 1:11). "Most likely the same as Azal (אָזַל, aw-sal', Zech. 14:5), a place in the neighborhood of Jerusalem, to the E. of the Mount of Olives, as Beth is frequently omitted in the names of places" (K. and D., Com., Micah).

BETH-GA'DER (Heb. בֵּית גַּדְרָה, bayth-gaw-dare', house of the wall), a place in the tribe of Judah, of which Hareph is named as "father" or founder (1 Chron. 2:51). Probably identical with GEDOR (q. v.) of Josh. 15:58.

BETH-GA'MUL (Heb. בֵּית גַּמּוּל, bayth gaw-mool', camel house), a city of Moab (Jer. 48:23).

originally Luz (Gen. 28:19). It was here that Abraham encamped (Gen. 12:8; 13:3), and the district is still pronounced as suitable for pasturage. It received the name of Beth-el, "house of God," because of its nearness to or being the very place where Jacob dreamed (28:10-22). Beth-el was assigned to the Benjamites, but they appear to have been either unable to take it or careless about doing so, as we find it taken by the children of Joseph (Judg. 1:22-26).

Being very close to the border of Ephraim, we are less surprised to find it in the kingdom of the Ten Tribes after the disruption of the kingdom. It seems to have been the place to which the ark was brought (Judg. 20:26-28). It was one of the three places which Samuel selected to hold court (1 Sam. 7:16), and Jeroboam chose Beth-el as one of the two places in which he set up golden calves (1 Kings 12:28-33). King Josiah removed all traces of idolatry, and restored the true worship of Jehovah (2 Kings 23:15-20). Bethel was occu-

"It is about forty-five miles S. E. of the Sea of Galilee, and although it has been deserted for centuries the massive houses look as though the inhabitants had just left them" (Osborn). Called now Um-el-Jemal, near Bozrah, one of the deserted cities of the Hauran. Orelli (Com., Jer.) declares the site unknown.

BETH-GIL'GAL (Heb. בֵּית הַגִּלְגָל, bayth hag-gil-gawl', house of Gilgal, Neh. 12:29), a place from which the sons of the singers gathered together for the celebration of the rebuilding of the walls of Jerusalem; doubtless the same as GILGAL (q. v.).

BETH-HAC' CEREM (Heb. בֵּית הַכֶּרֶם, bayth hak-kel'-rem, house of a vineyard), a beacon station near Tekoah, now Tekoa (Jer. 6:1); a lofty prominence, some forty feet high, S. E. of Beth-lehem, used for signaling upon occasions of invasion. Here the Crusaders established a strong fortress.

BETH-HAG'GAN (Heb. בֵּית הַגֵּן, bayth hog-gavn', house of the garden), a place by way of which King Ahaziah fled from Jehu (2 Kings 9:27, A. V., "garden house"). The "garden house" cannot have been in the royal gardens, but must have stood at some distance from the city of Jezreel, as Ahaziah went away by the road thither, and was not wounded till he reached the height of Gur, near Jibleam.

BETH-HA' RAN (Heb. בֵּית הַרֵן, bayth hav-roven', mountain house), a fenced city E. of Jordan, "built," i. e., restored and fortified, by the Gadites (Num. 32:36). No doubt the same as BETH-ARAM (q. v.).

BETH-HOG'LA (Josh. 15:6), or BETH-HOG'LAH (18:19; Heb. בֵּית הַחֹגְלָה, bayth khog-law', house of a partridge), a place on the border of Judah and of Benjamin, and belonging to the latter tribe (18:21).

BETH-HO'RON (Heb. בֵּית הַחֹרֹן, bayth khoron', house of the hollow or cavern), the name of two towns, an "upper" and a "nether" (Josh. 16:3, 5; 1 Chron. 7:24; 2 Chron. 8:5), on the road from Gibeon to Azekah (Josh. 10:10, 11) and the Philistine plain (1 Sam. 13:18). Beth-horon lay on the boundary line between Benjamin and Ephraim (Josh. 16:3, 5; 18:13, 14), was assigned to Ephraim, and given to the Kohathites (Josh. 21:22; 1 Chron. 6:68). It is said (1 Chron. 7:24) that Sherah built Beth-horon the nether, and the upper, and Uzzen-sherah. The building referred to was merely an enlarging and fortifying of these towns. Sherah was probably an heiress, who had received these places as her inheritance, and caused them to be enlarged by her family.

"These places still exist, and are called by Arabic names meaning 'upper' and 'lower.' They are separated by about half an hour's journey. The upper village is about four miles from Gibeon, the road always on the ascent. The descent begins from the upper to the lower village, and that road is one of the roughest and steepest in Palestine; it is still used as the road from the coast, and is a key to the country; it was afterward fortified by Solomon. Old tanks and massive foundations exist" (Harper, Bible and Mod. Dis., p. 159).

It was along this pass that Joshua drove the discomfited allies against whom he went out in defense of the Gibeonites (Josh. 10:10); and by the same route one of three companies of Philistine spoilers came against Israel (1 Sam. 13:18).

"The importance of the road upon which the two Beth-horons were situated, the main approach to the interior of the country from the hostile districts on both sides of Palestine, at once explains and justifies the frequent fortification of these towns at different periods of the history" (1 Kings 9:17; 2 Chron. 8:5; 1 Macc. 9:50; Judg. 4:4, 5).

BETH-JESH'IMOTH (Heb. בֵּית הַיְשִׁימוֹת, bayth kah-jesh-ee-mōth', house of deserts), a town in Moab, not far E. of the mouth of the Jordan (Num. 33:49, "Beth-jesimoth," Josh. 12:3; 13:20; Ezek. 25:9). Belonging to Sihon, king of the Amorites (Josh. 12:3).

BETH-JESTMOTH, another form of BETH-JESHIMOTH (q. v.).

BETH-LE-APH'RAH (Heb. בֵּית לַעֲפָרָה, bayth le-af-raw', house of dust; so in R. V., Mic. 1:10; "house of Apharah" in the A. V.), a place between Joppa and Gaza.

BETH-LEB'AOTH (Heb. בֵּית לְבָאוֹת, bayth leb-aw-ōth', house of lionesses), a town in the lot of Simeon (Josh. 19:6), in the extreme S. of Judah (15:32), where it is given as LEB'AOTH (q. v.).

BETH'-LEHEM (Heb. בֵּית לֶחֶם, bayth leh'-khem, house of bread; Gr. Βηθλεέμ, bayth-le-hem').

1. A town in Palestine, near which Jacob buried Rachel, then known as Ephrath (Gen. 35:19; 48:7). It is also called Beth-lehem Ephrath (Mic. 5:2), Beth-lehem-judah (1 Sam. 17:12), Bethlehem of Judea (Matt. 2:1), and the city of David (Luke 2:4; John 7:42). The old name lingered long after Israel occupied Palestine (Ruth 1:2; 4:11; 1 Sam. 17:12; Psa. 132:6; Mic. 5:2, etc.). "If the derivations of the lexicons are to be trusted, the name in its present shape appears to have been an attempt to translate the earlier Ephrath into Hebrew language and idiom, just as the Arabs have, in their turn, with a further slight change of meaning, converted it into Beit-lahm, 'house of flesh'" (McC. and S., Cyc., s. v.).

After the conquest Beth-lehem fell to Judah (Judg. 17:7; 1 Sam. 17:12; Ruth 1:1, 2); Izban of Beth-lehem judged Israel after Jephthah (Judg. 12:8); Elimelech, the husband of Naomi and father-in-law of Ruth, was a Beth-lehemite (Ruth 1:1, 2), as was also Boaz (2:1, 4, 11).

David was born in Beth-lehem, and here he was anointed as future king by Samuel (1 Sam. 16:1, sq.); here was the well from which David's three heroes brought him water (2 Sam. 23:15, sq.), thought to be the same wells still existing in the N. side of the village, and three in number; it was the birthplace of the Messiah (Matt. 2:1), and its male children were slain by order of Herod (2:16, comp. Jer. 31:15; Mic. 5:2). This Beth-lehem is about five miles S. of Jerusalem, and elevated two thousand five hundred and fifty feet above the sea level, or one hundred feet higher than Jerusalem itself.

2. A town in the portion of Zebulun, named only in connection with Idala (Josh. 19:15). Dr. Robinson locates it at Beit-lahm, about six miles W. of Nazareth, and lying between that town and the main road from Akka to Gaza.

BETH-LEHEMITE, an inhabitant of BETH-LEHEM (q. v.) in Judah (1 Sam. 16:1, 18; 17:58; 2 Sam. 21:19).

BETH-LEHEM-JU'DAH, a more distinctive title (Judg. 17:7, 8, 9; 19:1, etc.; Ruth 1:1, 2; 1 Sam. 17:12) of BETHLEHEM, 1 (q. v.).

BETH-MA'ACHAH (Heb. בֵּית מַאֲכָה, bayth mah-ak-aw', house of Maakah), a place to which Job went in pursuit of Sheba the son of Bichri (2 Sam. 20:14). It was quite close to Abela, BETH-PE'OR (Heb. בֵּית פְּעוֹר, bayth pē-ore', house, or temple, of Peor), a place in Moab E. of Jordan, abominable for its idolatry. It belonged to Reuben (Josh. 13:20; Deut. 3:29; 4:46). It was the last halting place of the children of Israel, and in the valley near by was that in which Moses rehearsed the law to Israel and was buried (Deut. 4:44-46; 34:6).

BETH'PHAGE (Gr. Βηθφαγή, bayth-fag-ay', house of unripe figs), on Mount Olives, and on the way from Jerusalem to Jericho, close to Bethany. A Sabbath day's journey from Jerusalem (Matt. 21:1; Mark 11:1; Luke 19:29). No trace of it now remains. It is not once mentioned in the Old Testament, though frequently in the Talmud.

BETH-PHE'LET (Neh. 11:26). See BETH-PALET.

so that the names of the places are connected in v. 15, and afterward as Abel-beth-maachah (1 Kings 15:20; 2 Kings 15:29); also called Abel-maim (2 Chron. 16:4).

BETH-MAR'CAOTH (Heb. בֵּית הַמְּרִקְבוֹת, bayth ham-mar-kaw-both', place of chariots), a town of Simeon, in the extreme S. of Judah, in which dwelt some of the descendants of Shimei (Josh. 19:5; 1 Chron. 4:31).

BETH-ME'ON (Heb. בֵּית מְעוֹן, bayth mē-own', house of habitation), a place in the tribe of Reuben (Jer. 48:23); elsewhere (Josh. 13:17) in the full form BETH-BAAL-MEON (q. v.).

BETH-NIM'RAH (Heb. בֵּית נִמְרָה, bayth nim-raw', house of the leopard), one of the towns "built," i. e., fortified, by the tribe of Gad (Num. 32:36); called simply NIMRAH (q. v.) in Num. 32:3.

BETH-PALET (Heb. בֵּית פֶּלֶט, bayth pel'-let, house of escape), a town in the S. of Judah (Josh. 15:27), assigned to Simeon, and inhabited after the captivity (Neh. 11:26, A. V., "Beth-phelet").

BETH-PAZ'ZEZ (Heb. בֵּית פַּזְעֵז, bayth pats-tsates', house of dispersion), a city of Issachar (Josh. 19:21). Site unknown.

BETH-RAPHA (Heb. בֵּית רָפָא, bayth raw-faw', house of Rapha, or giant), a name occurring in the genealogy of Judas as a son of Eshton (1 Chron. 4:12).

BETH-RE'HOB (Heb. בֵּית רְחוֹב, bayth rē-khobe', house of the street), a place near which was the valley where lay the town of Laish, or Dan (Judg. 18:28). This valley is the upper part of the Huleh lowland, through which the central source of the Jordan flows, and by which Laish-Dan, the present Tell el Kadi, stood. The Ammonites secured mercenary soldiers from Beth-rehob to fight against David (2 Sam. 10:6; Rehob, v. 8).

BETHSAIDA (Gr. Βηθσαϊδά, bayth-sahce-dah', house of fish).

1. A city in Galilee, on the W. coast of the Sea of Tiberias (John 1:44; 12:21). It was the native place of Peter, Andrew, and Philip, and a frequent resort of Jesus. Our Lord upbraided its inhabitants for not receiving his teachings (Luke 10:13). Dr. Robinson infers that Bethsaida was not far from Capernaum, as does also Edersheim. The latter says (Life and Times of Jesus, ii, 3, 4): "From the fact that Mark names Bethsaida, and John Capernaum, as the original destination of the boat, we would infer that Bethsaida was the fishing quarter of, or rather close to, Capernaum. . . . Further, it would explain how Peter and Andrew, who, according to John, were of Bethsaida, are described by Mark as having their home in Capernaum. . . . This also suggests that in a sense—as regarded the fishermen—the names were interchangeable, or, rather, that Bethsaida was the ‘Fisherton’ of Capernaum.”

Robinson identifies as its probable site ‘Ain et Tabighah, a small village in a little wady, with a copious stream bursting from an immense fountain.

2. Bethsaida of Gaulonitis, afterward called Julius. There is every presumptive evidence that the city in Gaulonitis, on the E. side of the sea, is that “in the desert place” where Christ fed the five thousand (Luke 9:10-17) and “healed them that had need of healing.” Here he also restored the blind man to sight (Mark 8:22-26), as it would be on the road to Caesarea Philippi, next visited by our Lord (v. 27).

It was originally a small town; but Philip the tetrarch, having raised it to the rank of city, called it Julius, after Julia, the daughter of the Emperor Augustus (Josephus, Ant., xviii, 2, 1). Philip died and was buried here. Some identify the locality with a spur of the mountains E. of the Jordan valley, called by the Arabs El Tel. Smith (Hist. Geog., p. 458) thinks that it is not necessary to accept more than one Bethsaida.

BETH-SHAN (Heb. בֵּית שָׁנַן, bayth shavn', 1 Sam. 31:10, 12; 2 Sam. 21:12), or BETH-SHE'AN (Heb. בֵּית שֵׁאֲנַן, bayth shē-awn', house of ease, security), a city on the road from Jerusalem to Damascus about fourteen miles from the lower end of Lake Gennesaret. At this place the corpse of Saul was exposed (Judg. 1:27; 1 Sam. 31:10). In the time of Samuel it furnished provision for the king's household (1 Kings 4:12). The tribes did not seem able to subdue the Canaanites here (Josh. 17:11, 16; Judg. 1:27; 1 Chron. 7:29). It was, however, at one time under the power of the Israelites, for in the flourishing days of Solomon it had to bear its part in contributing to the heavy expenses of the royal table (1 Kings 9:20, 21; 4:12). Conder (Palestine, App.) identifies it with the present Beisan.

BETH-SHEMESH (Heb. בֵּית שֵׁמֶשׁ, bayth shek'-mesh, house of the sun).

1. A sacerdotal city (Josh. 21:16; 1 Sam. 6:15; 1 Chron. 6:59) in the tribe of Dan, on the N. boundary of Judah (Josh. 15:10), toward Philistia (1 Sam. 6:9, 12). The expression “went down” (Josh. 21:16; 1 Sam. 6:21) seems to indicate that the town was lower than Kirjath-jearim; and there was a valley of cornfields attached to the place (1 Sam. 6:13). It was a “suburb city” (Josh. 21:16; 1 Chron. 6:59), and contributed to Solomon's expenses (1 Kings 4:9). In an engagement between Jehoash, king of Israel, and Amaziah, king of Judah, the latter was defeated and made prisoner (2 Kings 14:11, 13; 2 Chron. 25:21, 23). In the time of Ahaz the Philistines occupied it (2 Chron. 28:18), and to this place the ark was returned (1 Sam. 6:19). The number slain at Beth-shemesh for irreverently examining the holy shrine is recorded as fifty thousand and seventy. “In this statement of numbers we are not only struck by the fact that in the Hebrew the seventy stands before the fifty thousand, which is very unusual, but even more by the omission of the copula ו (vanu, and), which is altogether unparalleled. . . . We can come to no other conclusion than that the number fifty thousand is neither correct nor genuine, but a gloss which has crept into the text through some oversight” (K. and D., Com., in loc.). It was identical with Irshemesh (Josh. 19:41), and is probably preserved in the modern Ain-shems, on the N. W. slopes of the mountains of Judah. See SUPPLEMENT.

2. A city near the southern border of Issachar, between Mount Tabor and the Jordan (Josh. 19:22). Keil thinks this to be a Levitical city.

3. One of the “fenced cities” of Naphtali (Josh. 19:38; Judg. 1:33), from which and from Beth-anath the Canaanites were not driven out.

4. The name given by Jeremiah (43:13) to On (q. v.), the Egyptian city usually called Heliopolis.

BETH-SHEMITE, an inhabitant (1 Sam. 6:14, 18) of the BETH-SHEMESH (q. v.) in Judea.

BETH-SHIT'TAH (Heb. בֵּית שִׁטָּה, bayth shit-taw', house of the acacia), a town not far from the Jordan to which the Midianites fled from Gideon (Judg. 7:22).

BETH-TAPPUAH (Heb. בֵּית תַּפּוּאָה, bayth tap-poo'-akh, house of apples), a town about five miles W. of Hebron (Josh. 15:53), same as modern Teffuh. Another town in Judah was known by the simple name of TAPPUAH (q. v.).

BETHUEL (Heb. בְּתוּאֵל, beth-oo-ale', destroyed of God).

1. A southern city of Judah, sometimes called Bethul or Beth-el (1 Chron. 4:30; Josh. 19:4; 12:16; 1 Sam. 30:27). Named with Eltolad and Hormah.

2. The son of Nahor by Milcah; the nephew of Abraham, and father of Rebekah (Gen. 22:22, 23; 24:15, 24, 47). In ch. 25:20 and 28:5 he is called “Bethuel the Syrian.” In the narrative of Rebekah's marriage he is mentioned as saying, “The thing proceedeth from the Lord” (ch. 24:50), while her brother Laban takes the leading part in the transaction.

BETHUL (Heb. בְּתוּלָה, beth-ool', contraction for Bethuel), a town in the S. of Simeon, named with Eltolad and Hormah (Josh. 19:4).

BETH-ZUR (Heb. בֵּית צוּר, bayth tsoor', house of the rock), a town which fell to Judah, and situated in the mountain district (Josh. 15:58). From 1 Chron. 2:45 Beth-zur would seem to have been founded by the people of Maon. It was “built,” i. e., probably fortified, by Rehoboam (2 Chron. 11:7); and after the captivity the people of Beth-zur aided Nehemiah in rebuilding the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:16).

BET'ONIM (Heb. בֵּיתֹנִים, bet-o-neem', hollows), a town in the tribe of Gad (Josh. 13:26), probably the ruin of Batneh on Mount Gilead.

BETRAY (Gr. παραδίδομι, par-ad-id'-o-mee, to give into the hands of another), the term used of the act of Judas in delivering up our Lord to the Jews (Matt. 26:16; Mark 14:10; Luke 22:4, 6).

BETROTHAL. See MARRIAGE.

BEU'LAH (Heb. בְּעֻלָּה, beh-oo-law', married), figurative of Judea (Isa. 62:4), and then of the Church. "The Church in its relation to Jehovah is a weak but beloved woman, which has him for its Lord and husband" (54:5).

BEVERAGE. See DRINK.

BEWITCH. The rendering of two Greek words: (1) ἐξίστανμι, ex-is'-tay-mee, to throw out of position, used of Simon Magus, who bewitched, i. e., carried away with wonder, the people of Samaria (Acts 8:9); (2) βασκαίω, bas-kah'-ee-no, to mislead by pretense, to charm, fascinate (Gal. 3:1).

BEWRAY. See GLOSSARY.

BEYOND (Heb. אַחֲרַי, ah'-ber, the region or country beyond; Gr. πέραν, per'-an). The phrase "beyond Jordan" frequently occurs in Scripture. To ascertain its meaning we must take into account the situation of the writer. With Moses, writing upon its eastern bank, it usually signified the country W. of the river (Gen. 50:10, 11; Deut. 1:1, 5; 3:8, 20; 4:46), but with Joshua after he crossed the river it meant the reverse (Josh. 5:1; 12:7; 22:7). In Matt. 4:15 "beyond Jordan" designates, after the two lands already mentioned, a new land as the theater of the working of Jesus, viz., Perea.

BE'ZAI (Heb. בְּצַי, bay-tsal'ee, probably subjugator), the head of one of the families who returned from Babylon to the number of three hundred and twenty-four, including himself (Ezra 2:17; Neh. 7:23), B. C. 536. Either he or his family is probably referred to (Neh. 10:18) as sealing the covenant, B. C. 445.

BEZAL'EEL (Heb. בְּצַלְאֵל, bets-al-ale', in the shadow [protection] of God).

1. The artificer to whom was intrusted the design and construction of the tabernacle and its furniture in the wilderness. For this work he was specially chosen and inspired by Jehovah. With him was associated Aholiab, though Bezaleel appears to have been chief. He was the son of Uri, the son of Hur (Exod. 31:2-11; 35:30; 38:22), B. C. 1210. See SUPPLEMENT.

2. One of the sons of Pahath-moab, who divorced his foreign wife after the captivity (Ezra 10:30), B. C. 456.

BE'ZEK (Heb. בְּזֵק, beh'-zek, lightning).

1. The residence of ADONI-BEZEK (q. v.), and inhabited by Canaanites and Perizzites (Judg. 1:4, 5). It must have been in the mountains ("up") near Jerusalem, possibly on the eminence near Deir el-Ghafr, four and a half miles S. W. of Bethlehem.

2. The place of gathering where Saul numbered the forces of Judah and Israel before going to the relief of Jabesh-gilead (1 Sam. 11:8). It would seem to be at Khulal-Maleh, on the descent to Jordan, near Succoth.

BE'ZER (Heb. בְּצֵר, bel'-tser, ore).

1. The sixth named of the eleven sons of Zophah, of the descendants of Asher (1 Chron. 7:37).

2. A Reubenite city of refuge E. of Jordan (Deut. 4:23; Josh. 20:8, etc.).

BIBLE. 1. Name. The term by which the Christian sacred book is designated, usually called "The Holy Bible." The word is derived from the Gr. τὰ βιβλία (ta bib'-lee-ah, the books), and is chosen because the Bible embraces a number of distinct books, written in widely separated times and by different authors and in three different languages. The singular is used because of the essential unity of the many books, which together give us the gradual development of the divine scheme of redemption.

2. Divisions. The Bible is divided into two sets of books, called respectively the Old and the New Testament. The term Testament is borrowed from the Gr. διαθήκη (dee-ath-ay'-kay, covenant), and was chosen because it states the theme of the books, namely, the covenant of salvation which God has made with man.

The Old Testament is in the Hebrew language, and embraces the Hebrew canonical writings. It is made up of thirty-nine books. These are divided by the Hebrews into three distinct classes: (1) The Law (Torah), which comprises the five books of Moses—Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy. These are the very oldest of the biblical books. Portions of Genesis are fixed verbal traditions of times long prior to Abraham, and which were incorporated into the work which Moses prepared. These were also regarded by the Jews as the most authoritative. (2) The Prophets, according to the Hebrew classification, embraced the books of Joshua, Judges, 1 and 2 Samuel, 1 and 2 Kings, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Hosea, Joel, Amos, Obadiah, Jonah, Micah, Nahum, Habakkuk, Zephaniah, Haggai, Zechariah, Malachi. The historical books of this class were elevated to the high rank of "Prophets" partly because of their antiquity, but chiefly because of the belief that they were prepared by the prophets whose history is there recorded (Samuel, Nathan, Gad) or because the times themselves were so potently determined by their presence and influence. (3) The Hagiographa (the Sacred Scriptures). These were divided into three classes: (a) Psalms, Proverbs, Job; (b) The Canticles, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, and Esther; (c) Daniel, Ezra, Nehemiah, 1 and 2 Chronicles. The Christian Church has preferred to depart from the Hebrew classification, which gives a higher authority and sanctity to some of the books than to others; and, regarding all as equally inspired, has made the natural division of the Old Testament books into (1) The Historical, (2) The Poetical, (3) The Prophetical.

3. The Canon of Scripture is a phrase by which the catalogue of the authoritative sacred writings is designated. The idea of canonicity, or the right of a book to be regarded as Scripture, was determined by its unquestioned use in the Church by a competent authority, such as a prophet or an apostle, or one divinely appointed to command it.

The Jewish canon was finally fixed by Ezra and the "great synagogue." From that time to the present it has remained unaltered. The Christian Church accepted this ancient catalogue as canonical.

The New Testament canon, like that of the Old Testament, was a growth. The books were read by apostolic authority in the churches. After the death of the apostles every church sought to collect as many of the documents as possible which were known to have an inspired authorship. The consensus of Christian thought had fixed upon the catalogue of books now accepted as the only ones divinely authorized long before it was proclaimed by any Church council. The Council of Carthage (A. D. 397) formally ratified what the judgment and conscience of the Church had long accepted.

The argument for the canonicity of the books of the Bible may be summarized thus: (1) The unbroken continuity of the life and testimony of the Church, and the agreement of that testimony so early as the second half of the 2d century in remote countries of Europe, Asia, and Africa. (2) The books are constantly read in the assemblies of the faithful, so that they were familiar to the eyes and the ears of all; which would not only make it impossible to surreptitiously introduce any other than those known to be genuine, but would prevent any alteration of the original. (3) The quotations made of the sacred writings, and so acknowledged by the fathers of the Church, would restore them all if by any means the documents themselves were lost. (4) Heretics who lived on the border of the apostolic age bear abundant and explicit testimony to the authorship and contents of the documents. (5) The perfect agreement of its parts. (6) The literary peculiarities—its language, idioms, style, historical allusions—are all accordant with what its authors profess to have been. See CANON.

4. The Authorship and Contents of the several books of the Bible is a subject that has not commanded unanimity of opinion among the students of the sacred book. It is the purpose of this article to state the general conclusions of Christian scholarship concerning them.

The Pentateuch (Gr. πεντάτευχος, pen-tal'-yoo-khos, fivefold sc. book, the first five books) is ascribed to Moses. It is probable that he wrote the bulk of the work himself, but embodied in it ancient traditions, either written or oral, in their original form. The sudden change in literary style and the use of different words in speaking of God indicate that this was certainly the fact in Genesis. The occasional abruptness in the Exodus narrative suggests that this may possibly have been the fact in that book also. It is probable that certain fragments of Moses's work, which had been preserved by oral transmission, may at a later day have been incorporated by Joshua or Ezra into the original text.

Genesis (Gr. Γένεσις, ghen'-es-is, generation) is the name of the first book in the Bible. This is the oldest trustworthy history in the world, covering a period, according to the generally received chronology, of two thousand three hundred and sixty-nine years; and for this reason is of commanding interest. It treats of the beginnings—the beginning of time and of the world, the beginning of the human race and of history, the beginning of sin and its consequent death, the beginning of the redemption, the beginning of the Church, the beginning of the chosen nation.

Exodus (Gr. Ἔξοδος, ex'-od-os, exit) is the second book of the Pentateuch, and describes the great deliverance of Israel from the bondage in Egypt. It also by divine purpose images the redemption by blood of sin-enlaved souls and the character of their pilgrimage to the Canaan of spiritual rest and their heavenly home.

Leviticus is the third book of the Pentateuch, and is so called because it delineates the legislation concerning the priests and Levites—their character, their consecration, and their duties. It is the book of worship, describing the sacrifices, the feasts, and the fasts. It foreshadows the Gospel truth of the recovery of guilty man to holiness and God by blood.

Numbers is the fourth book of the Pentateuch, and is so called because of the two numberings of the people, at the beginning and at the end of the wilderness wanderings. It covers a period of thirty-eight years, and images the wretched loss a soul suffers by forfeiting the promise of God through unbelief and willful provocation.

Deuteronomy is the last book of the Pentateuch, and is so called because it is a restatement of the law (Gr. δεύτερος, dyoo'-ter-os, second; and νόμος, nom'-os, law). It is the farewell of Moses to his people at a time when they were about to enter upon the realization of their hopes and he was about to die. It is chiefly a review of the old law, with the addition of new ones relating to civil institutions. The poetic genius of Moses appears at its best in the sublime ode of ch. 32.

Joshua. This book is supposed to be a continuation of the Pentateuch. It bears the name of Joshua partly because he was the principal figure in the history of the Israelites, which is here recorded, and which covers the first twenty-five years of God's people in the promised land; and partly because of the traditional opinion that he was the author of the work. The probability is that most of the material was prepared by him (Josh. 24:26), but that the work was edited at a later date by some historian who added an account of events that did not occur during the life of Joshua, such as the capture of Hebron (15:13-19), the occupation of Jerusalem (15:63), and the death of the great leader (24:29, 33). The book is an account of the conquest of Canaan, and images the spiritual truth that faith possesses by making conquest of what God has already given.

Judges is the second (according to the Jewish classification) of the prophetic books of the Bible, and is so called because it is a history of a period in which Israel was guided by divinely directed men, who were called Judges. They were Othniel, Ehud, Shamgar, Deborah, Barak, Gideon, Abimelech, Tola, Jair, Jephthah, Ibzan, Elon, Abdon, Samson, Eli, and Samuel. Their rule covered a period of four hundred and fifty years. According to Jewish tradition, the book was written by Samuel, but modern scholarship acknowledges only chaps. 1-16 as probably from his pen. The others were added by later annalists, possibly Ezra or Nehemiah. It is a history of the apostasy of God's people by their willful neglect of the law, and images for all time the failure of God's people through affiliation with the unbelieving world.

Ruth was formerly a part of the Book of Judges, and the history it records belongs to the period of Deborah and Barak. Its authorship is unknown, though commonly assigned to Samuel. It is an exquisite epic idyl, and gives the history of a Moabitess who by the splendor of her devotion became an Israelite indeed, and one in the line of the Messiah.

First and Second Samuel, two historical books which in the Hebrew manuscripts were not divided. The division, however, is made in the LXX, and the Christian Church has adopted the form of the Greek translation. Its aim is to continue the history of the chosen people from the time of the Judges, and especially to record the transition from the rule of Judges to the government under kings. The author of the books is unknown, but they were probably not written till the time of Josiah.

First and Second Kings, historical books classified by the Jews among the prophetic. In the ancient Hebrew they were but one book; in the LXX and later Hebrew collections they are two. They are a continuation of the history of Israel from that of 1 and 2 Samuel. The author is unknown, but the common opinion is that they were compiled either by Jeremiah or Ezra from ancient annals.

First and Second Chronicles, two of the historical books of the Old Testament. In the ancient Hebrew they were but one book and were called "Diaries," which suggested to Jerome the name by which they are now called. In the Greek version they are called "Supplement," which suggests the purpose of their preparation, which was to supply additional information not given in the other works. Such especially are the genealogical tables which record the unbroken line of the chosen people for nearly three thousand five hundred years. Chronicles have more especial reference to the form and ministry of the religious worship as bearing upon its reestablishment after the return from Babylon. They were probably prepared from ancient annals by Ezra.

Ezra, written by Ezra, "the scribe," who went up from Babylon to Jerusalem with the second body of returned captives (7:27; 8:1). Its history is a continuation of the Chronicles, and records the events connected with the close of the Babylonian captivity.

Nehemiah, one of the historical books of the Old Testament. It is a compilation of documents written by several authors. The first and greater portion was written by Nehemiah himself, and the rest he gathered from various sources. The book was originally combined with that of Ezra, and was called Second Esdras. It is an account of events that occurred in Jerusalem during the twelve years of Nehemiah's government.

Esther, the last of the historical books of the Old Testament. It is an account of an event that occurred in the voluntary exile of the Jews under the Persian king Xerxes. The incident here recorded is supposed to have its historical position between the sixth and seventh chapters of Ezra. It is of special interest in that it explains the origin and import of the feast of Purim (see FESTIVALS), which remains to this day, authenticating the truth of the story. It was probably written by Mordecai, who figures in the history.

Job, a philosophic epic poem, in which is discussed the relation of human suffering to the providence of God. This poem, in strength of expression and loftiness of tone and breadth of conception, has never been surpassed, if, indeed, it has ever been equaled. It deals with the most difficult problems in the soul's history, and speaks of facts and laws of the physical universe which imply the highest level of intellectual culture the Hebrews ever reached. Its authorship is unknown. There are those who think that its archaic grandeur and vagueness and the utter absence of everything that is Jewish indicate that it was written before the time of Abraham, probably by Job himself. Some have named Job the Edomite (Gen. 10:29) as the author. Others argue from the identity of some of its expressions with those of Moses's poetical works that the great lawgiver wrote it. Others think that it was the product of that most intellectual period of Hebrew history, the time of Solomon, and that possibly it may have come from the genius of the wise king himself. Others think that it was written by some one living on the borders of the Idumæan desert during the monarchy prior to Amos the prophet. Whenever the poem may have been written, the person and history on which it is based belong to an age prior to the rise of the Hebrew cult. The absence of any allusion to the law or events of later history, the long life of Job and his practice of patriarchal forms of worship, compel an assent to the remote antiquity of the story on which the poem is based. But the modern and philosophical tone forbids the idea of the origin of the poem itself at that time. There are three views as to the historical accuracy of the history: (1) That it is entirely true. (2) That it is entirely imaginary. (3) That it is founded on a true history, which was recast to serve the purpose of the author in the unfolding of his theme. This latter view is the one most commonly held by Christian believers.

Psalms, the Hebrew Hymn Book, arranged expressly for use in the temple service. Its ancient name was not Psalms (songs set to music), but Praises or Praise Book. It received its present form about the middle of the 4th century prior to our era, by the temple board which had been appointed to edit the sacred books. These selections were made not to give the world a collection of choice poetry, but for use in public worship. There had been similar collections of sacred song made before. There were certainly four hymn books. The compilers combined these books which were already in common use, added a supplementary collection of new songs, cast the whole into a single book, and introduced it by their authority into the public worship. There are then in the book of the Psalms five books, every one of which has its distinctive character and closes with a doxology. (1) The first includes Psalms 1-41. It is the Davidic collection. Most of them were composed by him, and all breathe his spirit. Their characteristic feature is the outbursting of the soul's life. They are sacred lyrics that have never been equaled. (2) The second includes Psalms 42-72. This collection was made in the time of Solomon. It contains a few of David's psalms, but is remarkable for the large number written by the sons of Korah, who were musicians in the temple choir and singers of the finest artistic culture. It is this that gives character to the collection, viz., exquisite art. In daintiness of workmanship, and delicate sensibility of the niceties of meter, they rank with the very best of Greek verse. (3) The third book includes Psalms 73-89, and was arranged by the singers of Jehoshaphat's time, who made what may be called the Asaphic collection. Asaph was a Levite of practical talent whom David made leader of the choral service which he organized. Twelve of his psalms bear his name and give character to this collection. His style is didactic. His purpose is to teach. His poetry is versified doctrine. (4) The fourth book includes Psalms 90-106, and was prepared in the time of Hezekiah. Its style is liturgic, and was prepared specially to aid in the splendid ritual. (5) The fifth book includes Psalms 107-150, and was supplemental. In this collection is placed some of the sweet odes which from long use had become sacred and dear to the heart of the people. There is no poetry in all literature which so expresses and interprets the deepest emotions of the divine life, nor any so adapted to all climes and ages and so fitted to aid in praise, as the Hebrew Psalter.

Proverbs, a collection of wise sayings, or practical wisdom, which in the Hebrew original, as well as in the Greek and Latin versions, are called "The Proverbs of Solomon." It is certain, however, that the collection is not the work of a single hand. This appears (1) In the marked differences of the literary style of its several parts. (2) In the diverse social and political conditions implied. (3) In the direct statement in the opening of ch. 25 that what follows was added by the order of Hezekiah. It is, however, the general belief that the body of the book, from the beginning of ch. 10 to 22:16, is the work of the wise king. The other parts were subsequently added, and the original title was retained for the whole of the compilation.

Ecclesiastes. It is commonly thought that this book was written by Solomon near the close of his life, and is designed to show the wretched plight of a misspent life like his own. The probability, however, is that it was written by some wise Hebrew who presented his theme, The True Meaning of Life, through the personality of the wise but erring king. The literary form is a species of poetry called the Chokma, or Gnostic, in distinction from the lyric and the epic. The gnome is a compressed and polished sentence of wit or wisdom, akin to the proverb yet put in poetic form. The plan of the book is to present "The Quest of Life." It traverses the common but false views, all of which are shown to be "Vanity," and leads the reader to the true ideal, in which are consolation and satisfaction. The following analysis, made by Dr. Samuel Cox, is perhaps the best that has been suggested: Prologue, 1:1-11. Section First, The Quest in Wisdom and Pleasure, 1:12-2:26. Section Second, The Quest in Devotion to Business, 3-5:20. Section Third, The Quest in Wealth and the Golden Mean, 6-8:15. Section Fourth, The Quest Achieved, 8:16-12:7. Epilogue, 12:8-14

Song of Solomon, sometimes called Canticles. In the Hebrew idiom it is called the Song of Songs. Until very recent times it has commonly been attributed to the genius of Solomon. The poem is constructed in dramatic form, though the genius of the Hebrew history will not suffer us to believe that it was acted as in modern opera. For this reason some regard it as a lyric idyl or a marriage ode. But the poem has its characters, its scenery, its solos both treble and bass, which occasionally glide into duet and terminate in a chorus. Its principal character is Solomon, who seeks to win a pure virgin who has another lover. According to some, she is a daughter of Pharaoh, whom the king finally married. Others think she is a shepherdess of Palestine, whom the king wooed but who resists all his temptations and to the last remains true to her rustic lover. Some think that the shepherd lover is Solomon himself in disguise. The drama pictures the Church (the virgin) wooed by the world spirit (Solomon). Her faithfulness and final restoration was a powerful rebuke to the world spirit which characterized the kingdom of Israel at the time. There are those who think that the song was not a marriage ode at all, nor did it originate in Solomon's time, but that it is the cry of the faithful Church still remaining in the kingdom of the ten tribes when rent away from the house of David.

Isaiah, written by the prophet of that name, who lived in Palestine from B. C. 760-700, during the reigns of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah. In subject-matter, lofty, spiritual tone, and splendor of literary style it is unequalled by any of the prophets. It is a collection of the prophecies uttered at wide intervals of time, and evoked by widely varied occasions, from the time of the inauguration in B. C. 756 to the illness of Hezekiah, B. C. 712. This, in a measure, destroys the unity of the book, and provokes the question as to its origin from a single pen. Its chief themes are rebukes of the prevalent apostasy, warnings of approaching calamity, predictions of the Babylonian captivity and restoration, and the advent of the Messiah. The Messianic prophecies are: 1. The forerunner (40:3). 2. Christ's birth (7:14). 3. His family (11:10). 4. His name and kingdom (9:6-7). 5. His rejection by the Jews (8:14). 6. His acceptance by the Gentiles (49:6). 7. His miracles (35:5-6). Modern critics have denied the unity of Isaiah, affirming that the last twenty-seven chapters are strikingly unlike the others in literary style, that they are written from the standpoint of the Babylonian captivity, and that it is inconceivable that the name of Cyrus could have been spoken two hundred years before his birth. But to this it is replied that the title "The Vision of Isaiah," etc., has ever been applied to the whole book; that a second part has never been known to exist separately; that if separated those who joined them believed they were both from Isaiah's pen; that a second Isaiah is unknown in history; that so far from a fatal diversity of style there is a striking similarity of idea and expression in the two parts; that Christ and the apostles, who frequently quote the prophets, never once suggested the idea of two Isaiahs; that no other satisfactory explanation of the admitted relationship of the two Isaiahs can be given than that of identity.

Jeremiah. The prophecies of Jeremiah, who lived in the troubled times of Judah from B. C. 627-575. They relate mostly to events transpiring within the prophet's history, but foretell the abrogation of the law, the inauguration of a spiritual worship, the call of the Gentiles through the Gospel, and the final restoration of the Jews. The prophecies are not arranged in chronological order, but according to subjects, each particular theme being introduced by the formula "The word of the Lord came to Jeremiah." The following division is the one commonly received: 1. Introduction (1). 2. The roll written by Baruch (2-21). 3. Prophecies against the kings of Judah and false prophets (22-25). 4. The fall of Jerusalem (25-28). 5. Comfort for the exiles of Babylon (29-31). 6. History of the two years before the fall of Jerusalem (32-44). 7. Against foreign nations (45-51). 8. Supplementary narrative (52).

Lamentations, a collection of five separate poems written by Jeremiah. They are Hebrew elegies bewailing the desolation of Jerusalem. Each elegy is an acrostic, consisting of as many verses as there are Hebrew letters, the initial letter of the successive verses following the order of the alphabet. The peculiarity of the Hebrew elegiac poetry is lines of unusual length broken near the close, and ending with a short and rapid phrase suggesting that the weary thought would hurry to a conclusion. It produces a peculiar emotion, which characterizes this entire collection, viz., a great grief which will come to a sudden end. This is not the song of despair, but one of hope rising out of apparent abject desolation. The dull eyes are cleansed by tears, and out of great grief is the vision of the love of God, which is greater than our sorrow and which will heal the sin that occasioned it.

Ezekiel, the prophecies of Ezekiel. His history is somewhat obscure, but it is certain that he was contemporaneous with Jeremiah and Daniel, and was one of the captives in Babylon. The greater portion of the book was written in exile, and has special reference to it. It is naturally divided into five parts: 1. The preparation and call of the prophet (1-3). 2. The destruction of Jerusalem (4-24). 3. Foreign nations (25-32). 4. The new Israel (33-39). 5. The ideal theocracy (40-48).

Daniel. This book is not placed among the prophets in the Hebrew classification of the sacred books, for the reason that Daniel was not regarded a prophet in the strict sense of that spiritual order. It is classed among the Hagiographa. The book was universally ascribed to Daniel, and its authorship was never questioned till the 4th century of our era, when Porphyry affirmed that it appeared in the time of Antiochus Epiphanes. His statement affected Christian thought but slightly, and it was not till modern times that the ancient view was seriously questioned. The chief reasons for the new view are: (1) The two distinct languages in which the two parts of the book are written; the historical part being in Hebrew, and the prophetic part being in Aramaic, erroneously called Chaldee. But it was during the exile that many of the Jews became bilingual. Just why the two tongues were used does not appear. (2) "The contents of the book are irrational." This requires no reply, for it is simply a denial of facts which appear to be supernatural. The authenticity of the book is supported by (1) Its unquestioned canonicity till very recent times. (2) The literary style, such as the two tongues, the use of Persian words, the rhetorical rather than the impassioned poetical form, which usually characterized the prophetic utterances. (3) Its intimate acquaintance with the manners, customs, and religion of the Chaldean period. (4) Its indorsement by Christ (Matt. 24:15) and the apostles (1 Cor. 6:2 and 2 Thess. 2:3). No book of the Old Testament has exerted a wider influence on Christian thought than this one. It predicts the rise and course of the five great empires, the Babylonian, Persian, Grecian, Roman, and Christian. It depicts the advent of the Messiah and the effect of his human presence upon the whole future of the race.

Hosea, the first in the order of the twelve "Minor Prophets." The order, however, is not chronological. Hosea lived B. C. about 784-724, and his prophecies cover that period. The book consists of two unequal sections. The first section (1-3) is a narrative, and the second (4-14) is a series of passionate addresses, appeals, sarcasms, and denunciations evoked by the apostasy of his people.

Joel, written during the reign of Uzziah, B. C. about 800-780. It is a call to the priests and the people to awake to righteousness and thus avert an impending calamity, which is imaged as a drought and a plague of locusts. The actual woe that came was the Assyrian invasion. The style of the book is described as "uniting the strength of Micah with the tenderness of Jeremiah."

Amos, written by Amos near the close of the 8th century B. C. It consists of three sections, which received their present form toward the close of Jeroboam's reign. Each section starts from the same point, physical chastisements; follows the same development, the impenitence of the people, and reaches the same conclusion, the irrevocable Assyrian invasion.

Obadiah. The date of this prophecy is probably about B. C. 585. Nothing is known of its author beyond what appears in the book itself. There is a remarkable similarity of vers. 1-8 to Jer. 49:14, sq., which has evoked considerable discussion as to which was borrowed. The weight of criticism favors the originality of Obadiah. It is a prophecy against the Edomites, warning them not to rejoice over Israel's calamity, as their own doom is surely impending. The prophecy was partially fulfilled by Nebuchadnezzar and John Hyrcanus, but awaits its completion in the restoration of Israel.

Jonah. There are three views held by reverent students as to the character of this work: (1) That it is an allegory or popular Jewish tradition of a Babylonian myth. (2) That it has a historical basis, but that its present form is poetical and mythical. (3) That it is veritable history. The reasons for this third view are: (a) Its unquestioned historicity until recent times. (b) Its high moral tone. (c) The indorsement of Jesus. The book is simply an historical narrative, with the exception of the prayer or thanksgiving in ch. 2. Its date is B. C. about 820.

Micah, a book of remarkable strength, quoted by Zephaniah (3:3), Ezekiel (22:27), and Jesus (Matt. 10:35). It prophesies the ruin of both Judah and Israel. It was prepared about B. C. 720. It has three sections introduced by the formula "Hear ye:" 1. The judgment of Jehovah on Israel and Judah (1-3). 2. Judgment on Jerusalem (4, 5). 3. Jehovah's justification (6, 7).

Nahum. The date, the authorship, and the purport of this book are controverted. The weight of judgment, however, favors the view that it is of Galilean origin and is not, as some have supposed, the work of a Jewish captive in Nineveh; that it was spoken between the two invasions of Sennacherib, and that it is designed to console Israel by the prediction of the overthrow of Nineveh. It is divided into three sections: (1) A statement of the theme. (2) The calamity of Assyria. (3) The reasons therefor.

Habakkuk. B. C. 608 is an approximate date of this prophecy—a time when the destruction of the city was imminent, and which the author of the book suffered. He remained in the city while his countrymen were in exile. Foretelling the doom of the city, it bewails the suffering of the good in the ruin that comes upon the guilty, and appeals to God for a reply. The answer comes in a promise of the retribution of the destroyer. The literary merit of this book is of the highest order. Ewald calls it a Pindaric ode. It is a composition unrivaled for boldness of conception, sublimity of thought, and majesty of diction. The figures are all happily chosen and splendidly developed. It was used as a psalm and afterward incorporated in the temple service.

Zephaniah, a product of Josiah's reign (B. C. 642-611). It predicts the destruction of Judah because of its idolatry, calls the people to repentance, and promises the restoration of Israel and the destruction of her enemies.

Haggai, the first of the three of the postexile prophecies. It was spoken during the reign of Zerubbabel. The work of rebuilding the temple had been suspended for fourteen years through the edict of Artaxerxes, which had been obtained through charges made by the Samaritans, who were enraged at not being allowed to participate. When the interdiction was revoked the people manifested no disposition to resume the abandoned work. The object of this prophecy is to rouse the lethargic nation to the work. The style accords with the purpose—is vehement, pathetic, and at times threatening.

Zechariah. The author of this book was priest as well as prophet. He was born in Babylon and returned to Jerusalem with the exiles. He joined with Haggai in urging the people to zeal in rebuilding the temple. The book naturally divides into two sections. The first part (1-8) deals with the construction of the temple and its worship. The second part (9-14) treats of the destiny of the Jewish Church and the return of the Messiah.

Malachi, the last of the Old Testament prophecies. It belongs to the post-Babylonian period of Jewish history. The new temple was finished, and its services reestablished. Malachi prophesied B. C. 420, and his purpose was to warn the priests and people of the advent of the Messiah, which was near at hand. The style is described as that of a reasoner rather than that of a poet, and is distinguished by no remarkable literary characteristics.

5. Contents of New Testament. The canonical books of the New Testament are naturally divided into three classes: (1) Historical, including the four gospels and the Acts of the Apostles. (2) Didactic, embracing the epistles. (3) Prophetic, the Apocalypse. They are placed in their logical and not in their chronological order, viz.: History, doctrine and morals, prophecy.

The Gospels. There is but one Gospel (an old Saxon word corresponding in meaning with the Gr. εὐαγγέλιον, yo-ang-ghel'-ee-on, glad news), though told by four writers, known as evangelists. These four, while relating the story of Jesus and his mission in the world, give us four pictures of the divine Person as unlike as the face of the same man taken by the camera set at different viewpoints. The first and most striking difference appears between the first three evangelists and John. Matthew, Mark, and Luke give accounts that are easily harmonized. Hence they are called synoptists (σύνοπτις, the same view). John gives a view so unlike the others as to evoke the question whether it can be made to agree with the other three. A closer view reveals the fact that the synoptists themselves are very unlike in purpose and plan as well as in literary style. Thus we have four distinct phases of the one Gospel—as distinct as the images of the Apocalypse (4:6-8) which describe them. Matthew is the winged creature with the face of an ox; Mark, that of the lion; Luke, that of a man; John, that of an eagle.

Matthew, the first of the canonical gospels, supposed to be a reproduction in Greek of a document composed by Matthew in Hebrew, about the year A. D. 60 or 63, and which contained an account of the discourses of Jesus. The object of the book as stated in ch. 1:1 is to show that Jesus is the true Messiah. It was prepared especially for the Jews, and gives an argument from genealogy, prophecy, and doctrine that is peculiarly forceful to Jewish thought. It also exhibits this Messiah as rejected by the chosen nation, and the consequent disaster that will surely come upon the ancient Church.

Mark. The second canonical gospel was prepared about A. D. 64 by John Mark, son of Mary, whose home at Jerusalem was the center of the early Christian community. He probably wrote under the direction of Peter, whom he accompanied in his apostolic mission and whose discourses he reports. The gospel was designed especially for the Roman world, and exhibits Jesus as the royal One—the spiritual King of the world-wide empire.

Luke. The third canonical gospel was written by Luke, the companion of Paul, and probably on the suggestion and with the assistance of the great apostle. There is much in the work that indicates the influence of the apostle to the Gentiles. The material of the work was gathered during the two years of Paul's imprisonment at Cæsarea, A. D. 59-61, and the gospel was probably completed during the apostle's imprisonment in Rome, A. D. 63. Its destination was the Greek world, and its purpose was to exhibit the perfect man—the world's Redeemer.

The synoptical gospels are related to each other as all based upon the oral traditions of Jesus, but diverging in plan according to the aim of the several evangelists. The three have been characterized thus: Matthew is liturgical, Mark is anecdotal, and Luke is historical.

John. The fourth of the canonical gospels was written by the apostle John, near the close of his life, while he was in Asia Minor, in the midst of the churches founded by Paul. He wrote under the instigation of the apostle Andrew and the bishops of the churches, to supplement the story of Jesus as told by the synoptists. While his primary object was to clear up obscurities in the Gospel narrative, he also set himself to the overthrow of doctrinal errors that began to arise in Asia Minor respecting the person of Jesus. He presents the glory of Jesus as the eternal Son of God.

Acts, the fifth historical book of the New Testament. It was written by Luke as a continuation of the sacred history which he had already written. It is an account of the establishment of the Church, especially through the ministry of Peter and Paul. Why he who wrote so complete a history of our Lord has given such an incomplete and fragmentary account of the planting of the churches is a question that has not been satisfactorily answered. The purpose of this account was probably to give an illustration of the power of the Gospel. It was probably written in the city of Rome soon after Paul's second imprisonment there.

Romans. This epistle stands first in the order of the canon, not because of its priority in time, but because of the commanding character of its contents. It is an inspired doctrinal statement of the redemption scheme, and is confessedly the profoundest document in all sacred literature. It was written by Paul while at Corinth (A. D. 58-59) to the Christian Church in the city of Rome. Its aim was threefold: (1) Apologetic, seeking to prepare the way for the transfer of his mission to the world's capital. (2) Didactic, seeking to instruct the Roman Church in doctrine. (3) Polemic, combating the Judæo-Christianity which menaced the early Church. Its thesis is, Righteousness is not by the law, but by the grace of God through faith. It demonstrates the universality of guilt—Jews as well as Gentiles—and the consequent universal condemnation. It proves that the law had utterly failed to produce holiness. Nor was that its design. Its purpose was to exhibit the meaning of sin, and to show the need of a Saviour. The purpose of God from the first, as seen in Abraham and his posterity, was to recover the lost world by the method of grace. The faith remedy is made efficient by Christ's expiation. It produces the principle of sanctification, emancipates from the servility of the law, and gives a triumphant assurance of a complete and lasting salvation. Nor does the faith method impeach God's faithfulness in his election of the Jews, for his liberty cannot be limited. Israel failed because it rejected God's mode. There is still a remnant, the true Israel, and finally Israel will be restored.

First Corinthians, written to the church at Corinth by Paul while at Ephesus in the spring of A. D. 57. Its aim is to correct abuses of conduct which had arisen in the Church and which, while destroying its peace, threatened its very existence. It is of particular interest to the Church at all times, not merely for its historical information, but more especially because of the apostle's method of tracing every matter he handles back to its permanent principle. It thus discloses fundamental truth which is applicable to the conscience of all ages. There are four natural divisions of the epistle: 1. Ecclesiastical questions (1-4). 2. Moral questions (5-10). 3. Liturgical questions (11-14). 4. Doctrinal questions (15).

Second Corinthians. This epistle was evoked by a report that Titus brought to Paul concerning the effect of his first epistle. The report was in the main cheering. The Church had listened to the counsel of its founder, and was earnestly correcting its abuses. But, on the other hand, Judaizers were reinforced by those who came with what they claimed was "a higher authority." This epistle is characterized by conflicting emotions: (1) Joy for the correction of evils. (2) Indignation at the conduct of opponents.

Galatians, one of the four major epistles, and one which is superlatively characteristic of its author. It is largely autobiographical; and while it discusses the great doctrine of salvation by faith, the personal element interpenetrates the discussion in such a way as to make the reader feel his presence in almost every sentence. It was written in Macedonia A. D. 57 or 58, and was addressed to the church in Galatia. The Galatians were a peculiar race of Celtic blood, semi-barbarous, fickle, superstitious. They had embraced the Hebrew faith and afterward the Christian. Then they began to relapse into Judaism. The aim of this epistle is to call the backsliding people back to the Gospel of grace.

Ephesians, a circular letter destined to a number of churches in Asia Minor, which Tychicus was directed to visit in the course of a journey which took him to Colosse (6:21, 22, and Col. 4:7-9). It was written by Paul while a prisoner in Rome, A. D. 62. It is unlike most of his epistles in the absence of the spirit of controversy. It is the epistle of meditation, and is called by Coleridge "the divinest composition of man." It is described as "an epistolary treatise upon a holy church as accordant with God's eternal ideal through Christ, and humanly to be realized on earth." Its central thought is the mystical union of Christ and his Church.

Philippians, written by Paul while a prisoner in Rome, A. D. 62, in answer to expressions of sympathy, accompanied with a substantial gift, which Epaphroditus brought with him from the brethren at Philippi. This church was founded by Paul some eleven years before. It is thought that no church so commanded his love as this. The epistle is literally "a love letter," in which Paul pours out his innermost heart.

Colossians, written by Paul while a prisoner in Rome, A. D. 62, to a church in a decayed town in the heart of Phrygia—a church which the apostle did not found and which he never visited. But the tidings had reached him that that church was relapsing into Jewish ritualism and oriental mysticism. It was to save a people with spiritual aspirations from a fatal diverting of their purpose that this letter was written. Its theme is the sufficiency of Christ as the Head of all creation and the Church.

First and Second Thessalonians, two epistles written by Paul from Corinth; the first A. D. 49, and the other one year later. They are the earliest of all Paul's writings, and probably the first of the New Testament products. They are of peculiar interest to us because they image the substance of Paul's preaching in the early history of his ministry. One prominent item of his preaching was the second advent of Christ. These epistles are especially concerned with this doctrine. Here the apostle affirms: (1) Christ is surely coming. (2) The advent will be visible. (3) It will be sudden. (4) It is to be constantly expected. (5) The time is unknown. (6) It will be glorious.

First and Second Timothy, personal letters written by Paul to Timothy, his son in the Gospel. They are called "Pastoral" because they are counsels for a pastor or shepherd of a spiritual flock. The first was written at Rome soon after the apostle's release from his first imprisonment, A. D. 63. It was designed partly to instruct Timothy in the duties of the office with which he had been intrusted, partly to supply him with credentials to the churches, and partly to furnish through him guidance to the churches themselves. The second epistle was written at Rome just before the second trial of Paul, A. D. 66. Its design was to inform Timothy of the apostle's peril and to summon him to his side. It breathes a spirit of sublime resignation.

Titus, a personal letter written by Paul at Rome shortly after his release from his first imprisonment, A. D. 63, to Titus, who, by the apostle's appointment, was at the head of the church in Crete. Its aim is to help him in his difficult work, giving him particular instruction concerning the qualifications of church officers and members. The epistle closely resembles the First Epistle to Timothy, and is called "Pastoral."

Philemon, a personal letter written by Paul while a prisoner in Rome, A. D. 62. It relates to a purely private matter. Its aim is to bespeak a kindly welcome for a runaway slave, Onesimus, who had become a Christian and was persuaded to the unheard-of act of returning voluntarily to his owner, Philemon, who was also a Christian. In this epistle the apostle recognizes the fact that the Gospel does not release its subjects from civil laws. Onesimus was still a slave and deserved punishment for his desertion. But Paul in love takes this burden upon himself. Without attacking the institution of slavery, he teaches a spirit which moderates its harshness and will ultimately by peaceful process destroy it.

Hebrews, one of the three books of the New Testament especially addressed to the Jews, the other two being Matthew and James. There is an old tradition that it was originally written by Paul in the Hebrew language, and that it was afterward translated into the Greek by Luke. But the Pauline authorship is excluded by many considerations, both literary and historical. There are equally strong reasons against a Hebrew original. It may have been inspired by the great apostle, for it certainly contains his thought and spirit. But it was written by another hand, such as Luke or Barnabas or Apollos, and appeared just before the outbreak of the Jewish war, A. D. 64-67. In copiousness of vocabulary, in purity of style and vigor of statement, it is unequaled by any book of the New Testament. It aims to show that Christianity is the divine fulfillment of the sacred Levitical institutions. Its plan is outlined thus: The theme—The finality of Christianity (1:1-4). I. The superiority of the Son to angels (1:5-2:18). II. Moses and Jesus (3-4). III. Christ's high priesthood universal and sovereign (5-7). IV. The fulfillment of Christ's priestly work (7-10:18). V. Application of the truth discussed (10:19-12:29). VI. A personal epilogue (13).

James, an epistle written by James, the brother of Jesus and bishop of the church at Jerusalem. It was destined especially for Christians of the Jewish blood. It is remarkable for an entire absence of any allusion to any of the distinctive doctrines of Christianity, such as the incarnation, the atonement, the Holy Spirit, and regeneration. For this reason, and the fact of its seeming antagonism to the great doctrine of salvation by faith, Luther would remove it from the canon. But its place there is firm and its Christian spirit is unmistakable. Written to Jews, it shows the identity of the highest standard of Jewish piety with that of Christianity. The latter is not a mere sentiment—a faith without works, but a power that renews the entire life of those who believe.

First and Second Peter, written by Peter the apostle to Christians throughout Asia. The first was probably written from Babylon between A. D. 50 and 55. The second may have been written in Rome shortly before the author's death, A. D. 64. The purpose of both is to confirm the faith of the churches in the holiness of their Gospel and to strengthen them to meet their multiplying sorrows.

First, Second, and Third John, written by John the apostle while a resident in Ephesus, after the destruction of Jerusalem. The first was addressed to the Gentile churches in Asia Minor. The other two were personal letters. One was written to an elect lady eminent for her piety, or possibly, as some think, to the Church, which John calls in figure "the elect lady." The other was addressed to the well-beloved Gaius, who may possibly be the Gaius of Rom. 16:23 and 1 Cor. 1:14. The substance of all these epistles is the identification of love for Christ and each other with the spiritual life.

Jude, written by Jude, the brother of James the apostle, who is also named Thaddæus and Lebbæus. It was addressed to the Church at large, and was designed to combat an evil which had appeared in the Church and threatened its life. It is an appeal for the faith which was once delivered to the saints (v. 3).

Revelation, the only prophetic book of the New Testament; also called the Apocalypse. It is a vision of John the evangelist, which he had while an exile for the faith on the isle of Patmos, near the end of the 1st century of the Church. Like the Book of Job, the Apocalypse belongs to the epic class of poetry, but its action is more like that of drama, and for this reason scholars have called it "the Canticles of the New Testament." Its theme is the coming Christ. It begins with, "Grace be unto you . . . from him . . . which is to come" (1:4), and closes with the testimony of Christ, "Surely I come quickly," and the cry of the Church, "Even so, come, Lord Jesus" (22:20). It pictures the unfolding of the kingdom of God in the world until its final and complete triumph. Much of the prophecy is as yet unfulfilled, and many and varied are the efforts at interpretation. The general plan of the book, however, is simple: I. The state of the Church at the time of the prophecy (1-3). II. The preparation of the Church for the advent (4-19:10). III. The final triumph of the Church in the return of Christ (19:11-22:21).

6. Other Inspired Books. Not all of the genuinely inspired books appear in our collection. Reference is made in the Scriptures themselves to other books of a character like their own, but which are now lost. They are: 1. The prophecy of Enoch (Jude 14). 2. The book of the wars of the Lord (Num. 21:14). 3. The book of the just (Josh. 10:13 and 2 Sam. 1:18). 4. The book of the order of the kingdom (1 Sam. 10:25). 5. The books of Nathan and Gad (1 Chron. 29:29). 6. The books of Nathan, Ahijah, and Iddo (2 Chron. 9:29). 7. Solomon's parables, songs, etc. (1 Kings 4:32). 8. The acts of Solomon (1 Kings 11:41). 9. The book of Seriah (2 Chron. 12:15). 10. The book of Jehu (2 Chron. 20:34). 11. The book of Isaiah concerning King Uzziah (2 Chron. 26:22). 12. The words of the seers (2 Chron. 33:18). 13. The volume of Jeremiah burned by Jehudi (Jer. 36:23).

7. Apocrypha. A name given by Jerome to a number of books which in the LXX are placed among the books of the Bible, but which for evident reasons do not belong to the sacred canon. The term is also applied to certain writings of the New Testament times which claim to be inspired, but which are spurious. The Old Testament Apocrypha has an unquestioned historical and literary value, but has been rejected as an inspired book for the following reasons: (1) The entire absence of the elements which gave the genuine Scriptures their divine character, such as their prophetic power and their poetic religious feeling. (2) The presence of imaginative creations which it presents as historic truth; fictional and legendary literature. (3) A literary dishonesty, seen in the presentation of great names, such as Daniel, Solomon, and Jeremiah, as the authors of works which they could not have written, and in the insertion of formal documents as authentic which are certainly fictitious. (4) Historical anachronisms with which the books abound. They were all written either during the captivity or subsequent to it, and form the historical link between the Old Testament and the New. The Old Testament apocryphal books are:

First Esdras, a combination of different authors, of narratives relating to Zerubbabel.

Second Esdras, a book probably of Egyptian origin. It is a disquisition on the unsearchableness of God's providences and the signs of the last age.

Tobit, probably written in Babylon about B. C. 350. It is a sweet story of the influence of religion on home life and character.

Judith, an historical fiction, the origin of which is very uncertain. Its design is to revive the spirit of heroism among the crushed Jews.

Esther, the interpolated portions of the Hebrew book of Esther, added to the original in order to complete the narrative.

The Wisdom of Solomon purports to be the work of the wise king, and discusses the character of true wisdom and how to attain it. Its origin is obscure, but it is supposed to belong to B. C. 150-50.

Ecclesiastics, also called "The Wisdom of Jesus the Son of Sirach." It is believed to have been written in Hebrew, and is certainly filled with the Palestinian spirit. It is an exhortation to cheerfulness in depressing circumstances. It probably belongs to a time prior to the Maccabean period.

Baruch assumes to be written by a companion of Jeremiah, but the proof of its later origin is convincing, notwithstanding it is modeled on the plan of the ancient prophecy. It is entirely lacking in originality, and is a lamentation over Jerusalem with a prophecy of the final recovery of the city.

The Song of the Three Holy Children. It is a supplement to the story of the Hebrew worthies in Dan. 3.

Susanna purports to be an appendix to the Book of Daniel, and is founded on an event in his early career in Babylon.

Bel and the Dragon. Evidently written to complete the story of Daniel and the lions.

The Prayer of Manasses. There are internal evidences that it was written near the beginning of the Christian era. It purports to be the prayer of Manasses which was recorded in one of the sacred books now lost (2 Chron. 33:18).

First and Second Maccabees. Two of the four books of this name, which give the history of the struggle of the Jews against the civil and religious tyranny of the Syrian kings during the heroic period ending B. C. 135.

The apocryphal books of the New Testament, unlike those of the Old, have never commanded the faith of the Christian Church, excepting in a few and isolated instances. There are over one hundred of them, and it is doubtful whether one of them appeared before the 2d century of our era. Most of them betray a much later date. They are valuable as indicative of the growth of thought and the rise of heresy in the age just subsequent to that of the apostles. None of them ever received the sanction of any ecclesiastical council.—A. H. T.

BIBLE, ENGLISH. 1. Early Versions. There were portions of the Bible, and possibly the entire work, rendered into the English vernacular very early in the history of the language. Gildas states that "When the English martyrs gave up their lives in the 4th century all the copies of the Holy Scriptures which could be found were burned in the streets." Cranmer, Thomas More, and Foxe, with many others, bear testimony to the existence of "divers copies of the Holy Bible in the English tongue." The following are fragments of translations which are clearly traced: Cædmon's versifications of an English translation (689); St. Cuthbert's Evangelistarium, which is a Latin translation with an interlinear English (689); St. Aldhelm's translation; Eadfurth's translation (720); King Alfred's (901); Ælfric's (995). These, however, were all made from the Latin, and not from the original Hebrew. After the Conquest the language underwent a great change; the old English Bibles fell into disuse, until they were practically unknown, only a few fragments remaining.

2. Wyclif's Version. In the 14th century there was a demand which had been gathering strength for many years for an English version. This demand was met by two translations, made respectively by John Wyclif and Richard Purvey. Each carried on his work without the knowledge of the other. Wyclif's was completed in 1384, and Purvey's in 1388. The latter, however, was thought to be only a correction of the former and at one time was even published in the name of Wyclif. The Wyclif version is characterized by (1) The homely speech of the common people. In many instances the word children is rendered "brat;" father is "dad;" chariot is "cart." (2) The exact rendering of the English idiom for the ancient. Thus, Raca is "Fy" or "Pugh;" mamon is "richesse." (3) The literalness of the translation. The following is a specimen: "The disciplis scien to hym, Maister now the Jewis soughten for to stoone thee, and est goist thou thidir? Jheus answered whether ther ben not twelue ouris of the dai? If any man wandre in the night he stombliþ, for light is not in him. He seith these things and aftir these things he seith to hem Lazarus our freund slepþ but Y go to reise hym fro sleep Therfor hise disciplis seiden: Lord if he slepþ he schal be saaf."

3. Tyndale's Version. In 1526 William Tyndale made a translation of the New Testament from the original Greek. He afterward made a translation of the Pentateuch and other portions of the Old Testament. The whole was printed in Germany and imported into England. Tyndale's introduction and comments awakened intense opposition; and many copies of the work were publicly burned by the order of the Bishop of London. As in Wyclif's version, the language was the homely speech of the people. Many of his words have lost their old-time meaning, as is seen in the following rendering of Tit. 1:1: "Paul, the rascal of God and the villain of Jesus Christ." The aim of the translator was to render the simple sense of the original uninfluenced by theological thought. Thus, instead of "grace" he used the word "favor," "love" instead of "charity," "acknowledging" instead of "confessing," "elders" instead of "priests," "repentance" instead of "penance," "congregation" instead of "church."

4. Coverdale's Version. In 1535 Miles Coverdale completed and printed an English translation of the entire Bible. It was probably done under the influence of Cromwell and with the aid of many assistants. It was not with Coverdale, as it was with Tyndale, a work of love. He undertook it as a task imposed upon him and did it perfunctorily and mechanically. Nor was it a translation from the original, but mainly from the German and Latin. It shows a strong royal and ecclesiastical influence. It uses a variety of English equivalents for the same original. It bears the marks of haste and carelessness.

5. Matthew's Bible. This is the first "Authorized Version" of the Holy Bible in English. It is a fusion of the Tyndale and the Coverdale versions, and was printed in London by the king's license in 1537, by the publishers Grafton and Whitchurch. It bears the name of Thomas Matthew, which is undoubtedly a pseudonym. The real editor is John Rogers, the protomartyr. His notes and comments were far in advance of his time, and soon evoked a strong ecclesiastical opposition to this version.

6. Travener's Version. This version appeared in 1539, and was made necessary by the ecclesiastical opposition to the Matthew's Bible. It, however, is but an expurgated edition of this version.

7. Cranmer's Version was printed in 1539 with the sanction of Cranmer's name. The translation was made by a corps of scholars under the direction of the archbishop and his coadjutors. It was a large folio and illustrated with a picture supposed to be the work of Holbein. It had the license of the king, and was called "The Great Bible."

8. The Geneva Bible. This was a popular revision of "The Great Bible" made by Hebrew and Greek scholars who were refugees in Geneva. The cost of the other (about $30) made it inaccessible to the people. The purpose of the Geneva version was to give to England a household edition of the word of God. It was a small quarto with marginal notes, and was divided into chapters and verses. It at once became popular, and there are over two hundred editions of it.

9. The Bishops' Bible appeared in 1568, and was made on the suggestion of Archbishop Parker. He was assisted in his work by eight of his bishops and some of the scholars of the Church. It was elegantly printed, profusely illustrated, and ornamented with elaborate initial letters. From one of these, introducing the Epistle to the Hebrews, this version was popularly called "The Leda Bible." It never received the approval of the scholars, and its cost kept it from the possession of the people.

10. The Rheims and Douay Version. A translation was made by Martin, Allen, and Bristow, who were refugees in Rheims, where in 1582 they published the New Testament. The work was completed by the publication in 1609 of the Old Testament. This was done in Douay, which fact gives the name to the version. Altogether aside from its Romish viewpoint, it is the poorest rendering into English of any of the versions. The following are given as fair specimens of its literary style: "Purge the old leaven that you may be a new paste, as you are asymes."

"You are evacuated from Christ." In Gal. 5: 19 this version substitutes for "drunkenness," "ebrieties;" for "revelings," "comemations;" and for "long-suffering," "longanimity." In Heb. 9:23, for "the patterns of things in the heavens," the Douay has "the exemplars of the celestials." In Heb. 13:16, "To do good and to communicate forget not, for with such sacrifices God is well pleased," the Douay reads, "Beneficence and communication do not forget, for with such hosts God is promerited."

11. The Authorized Version. It is also known as the King James Bible, from James I, by whose authority and support it was undertaken and completed. It was begun in 1604 and finished in seven years. Forty-seven of the ablest scholars were selected to do the work, each taking a portion and all finally reviewing the whole. It was to correspond with the Bishops' Bible, excepting where the original Hebrew and Greek made it impossible. The excellence of the work done is attested by the simple fact that this version has held the heart of the English-speaking world for nearly three centuries, and that no subsequent version has been able to supplant it.

12. The Revised Version. There have been a number of attempts at revision of the A. V., but nothing of importance has been done until very recent times. In 1870 the convocation of Canterbury formally originated an inquiry which has resulted in a new version completed in 1885. This version was felt to be needed because of the change which two centuries have made in the meaning of many English words; because of the fuller knowledge we now have of the Hebrew and the Greek text; because of the confessed inaccuracy of many of the renderings in the A. V.; and because of the obscurities occasioned by the form of the English text where there is no distinction made between prose and poetry, and where the divisions into chapters and verses make unnatural and abrupt breaks in the inspired thought. The aim of the translators was to introduce as few alterations into the text of the A. V. as faithfulness to the truth would allow; and to make the language of such alterations conform to that of the rest of the book. The New Version has not yet won the heart of the English-speaking world, but is accepted as an able commentary on the text which since 1611 has been a sacred classic.

13. The American Standard Bible. The R. V. with such alterations as were recommended by the American branch of revisers, and which was not to be published till 1900.

14. The Polychrome Version. An entirely new translation made from the original text, under the direction of Professor Haupt, of Johns Hopkins University, and which aims to give a rendering on the basis of the most recent school of Higher Criticism.

15. Bible Chapters and Marginal References. (1) "The marginal or parallel references, as found in our ordinary English Bibles, are a matter of growth and of changes and selection. Their history is given in various works on the English Bible. It is told carefully and with succinctness in Scrivener's Authorized Edition of the English Bible: Its Subsequent Reprints and Modern Representatives. It is there said that 'more than half the references found in the edition of 1611 are derived from manuscript and printed copies of the Vulgate Latin Bible, and thus present to us the fruits of the researches of mediæval scholars and the traditional expositions of the Western Church.' Yet there were in that edition only about nine thousand of these references, whereas there are many times that number in ordinary reference Bibles to-day; and in Bagster's Treasury Bible, containing a page of references for every page of text, there are claimed to be five hundred thousand references. Many obviously erroneous references have been weeded out, but good and bad are still to be found in most reference Bibles; and they need watching, as do all the works of man" (Sunday School Times).

(2) Chapters. The numerical division of the Old and New Testament into chapters is by some ascribed to Lafrance, Archbishop of Canterbury; by others to Stephen Langton. Its authorship is usually assigned to the schoolmen, who, with Cardinal Hugh, of St. Cher, were the authors of the Concordance for the Latin Vulgate, about A. D. 1240. Yet Cardinal Humbert, A. D. 1059, cites Exodus, chaps. 12, 13. Whoever was the author, from this period the division of the several books into chapters was gradually adopted in the Latin and other versions.

BIBLE, LITERATURE OF. Aside from its sacred character, the Bible is a depository of literature of the highest order. The literary features of the Bible have been obscured by the absorbing interests of its doctrinal teachings, which have made the form in which they have been communicated seem insignificant. And they are almost entirely obliterated in the structure of the English text, where there is no visible distinction between prose and poetry, and where the divisions into chapter and verse abruptly break lines of thought and musical rhythm in the most unnatural places. But a knowledge of the literary form is needful to an understanding of the divine meanings. To turn poetry, stirring with elevated emotion and creative imagery, into accurate prose, as is done in our English Bible, is to make it state things of doubtful meaning, and sometimes of perplexing untruth. The ancient Hebrew, as is universally the fact in the speech of the infancy of history and thought, has somewhat of the poetic element even in its prose. Thus, for example, the story of creation as told in Genesis, which is the oldest literary fragment in the world, is really an epic, and must be read not as we read science, but as we read the intuitions of a creative spirit. So also the literary form of prophecy, exalted as it is by the lofty tone of the writer, passes out of prose into dramatic forms, as in Micah and Hosea, or into what has been termed rhapsody, as illustrated in Habakkuk and in the second portion of Isaiah. To interpret these as prose would be to create confusion worse confounded. The history and character of the literature of the Bible may be briefly summarized thus:

1. The Mosaic Literature is the product of the great lawgiver, who collated and edited the traditions of the people and wrote the history of his own period. This material was put in shape after the establishment of the kingdom gave leisure for literary study, and was finally edited after the exile by those who made annotations on many points of interest to their time which in the original were obscure. It includes primitive epics, such as the creation (Gen. 1-2:3), the temptation (Gen. 2:4-3:24), the flood (Gen. 6:9-9:17); epic history, such as the story of Abraham and Joseph; constitutional history, such as the exodus; genealogies and orations, such as frequently occur in Genesis and Numbers; lyrics, by which we mean poetry set to music and meant to be sung. In this period are folk-songs, such as the songs of the sword (Gen. 4:23, 24) and the well (Num. 21:17, 18); odes, which are distinguished from other lyrics by greater elaboration and artistic finish, such as the triumphal song of Moses (Exod. 15), and his parting song (Deut. 32); elegies, such as the song of bondage (Psa. 88), and the song of life (Psa. 40).

2. The Period of the Judges was one of anarchy and unrest, such as produces myths and ballads, but rarely elaborated and sustained literature. Its products in Israel are war songs, as that of Deborah (Judg. 5); fables, as Jotham's (Judg. 9); popular narrative of heroes, as Samson and Jephthah; idyls, as that of Ruth.

3. The Transition Period into stable government was marked by two strong elements of literature—the historical and the lyrical. There were appointed chroniclers to collate the ancient documents and write up the traditions of their people. Hence came the histories of Joshua and Judges. Under the genius of David sacred lyrics reached at a bound a height of excellence never attained since in any speech. David's psalms are unequaled in expressing and interpreting the deepest spiritual emotion of all time. Hebrew poetry, unlike that of the European literatures, is not in the meter or rhyme, but in the movement of thought likened to the swing of the pendulum to and fro, or like the tramp of an army marching in step. Its versification is the rhythmic cadence of parallel lines. In this respect it is more akin to the music of nature than our own. The most ancient song was made to accompany the dance.

Instances of this are seen in the movement of the hosts of Israel when they sang the song of Moses and Miriam, and in David's dancing when they brought the ark to Zion with song. The later poetry of the Greeks is more artistic, and makes the movement of sound, rather than of body, chord with the sentiment. David's lyrics are the outburst of nature.

4. The Augustan Period of Hebrew literature occurred during the reign of Solomon, when the kingdom was at the zenith of its power and a protracted peace with its consequent prosperity gave leisure for reflection. Under the genius of the wise king there grew up in his court a school of wisdom—poets, historians, scientists, philosophers. Out of this academy came the most brilliant products of the Hebrew mind. Among them are Job, a masterpiece of epic poetry; the Song of Solomon, either a dramatic ode or pure drama; Ecclesiastes, a superb specimen of gnomic verse; Proverbs, a collection of the sayings of wise men—short pithy sentences which compress the essence of wisdom; Psalms of the Korahitic character, remarkable for their artistic finish.

5. Period of the Kings. The characteristic feature of this is prophecy. All literatures have their diviners, but it is the peculiar glory of the biblical that it has its prophecy. The oracle relates to the present, and has reference to circumstances of private and national life. Prophecy, in addition to this, looks on to the end of history and relates to mankind as a whole. Its literary form is rich with: (1) History, as the Book of Jonah; (2) Discourse, as Isa. 1 and Ezek. 34; (3) Lyrics, as Isa. 47 and Ezek. 32; (4) Doom-songs, as Jer. 46-51; Ezek. 25-32; (5) Parables, as Ezek. 15 and Isa. 5:1-7; (6) Drama, as Micah and Hosea; (7) Elegy, as Lamentations; (8) The Psalms of this period are of a didactic and liturgic character. They are doctrine in verse or prepared especially for the use of the psalter and the music of worship.

6. The Post-exilic Period is noted for the effort that was made to collect and put in permanent form all the sacred literature; and for this reason is a good starting point for the study of the entire biblical collection. Its touch is felt in every part of the holy book. This period also added: (1) History, as Ezra, Nehemiah, and Esther; (2) Prophecy, as Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi; (3) Lyric, which are embraced in the fifth book of the Psalms. Here are beautiful specimens of the ballad style in "the songs of degree" (Psa. 120-134).

7. The New Testament Literature is unique. The gospels are not, strictly speaking, history nor biography, but testimonies. Luke does, in some measure, approach the dignity of history, but it is a report of facts gathered from eyewitnesses. This gives to the gospels a convincing force which mere history could not command. The epistolary literature, independent of its sacred theme, ranks among the highest of that form of letters. The Apocalypse deserves its place among the prophets. Careful students liken it to the Canticles. It is a dramatic presentation of the history of the Church in its struggle and final triumph.—A. H. T.

BIBLE, VERSIONS OF, the name given to the translations of the Bible into languages other than the original. Since the Protestant Reformation they have become very numerous, portions of the Holy Scriptures being rendered into almost every dialect in the world. Only the most important of the older versions are here named:

1. The Septuagint (LXX). This is the oldest translation of the Old Testament into the Greek language. It is so called from the seventy-two translators, or from the sanction it received from the seventy-two members of the Sanhedrin. The occasion of it was the decline of the Hebrew speech as the popular vernacular, and the common use of the Greek throughout the civilized world. It was commenced by Jews of Alexandria about B. C. 280, and was finished several years later. The marked literary inequality of its several parts indicate that they are the work of different minds. It came in the course of time to have an authority even higher than that of the original text. And there can be but little doubt that it is far more correct than the Hebrew we now have, which is not in its original form, but in the liturgical shape into which it was cast for purposes of worship by Jews of Tiberias about the 6th century of our era. The LXX was invariably quoted by the New Testament writers, and it was the text universally accepted by the Christian Church. There have been a number of later Greek versions designed to correct or better the LXX. They bear the names of the translators—Aquila, Theodotion, Symmachus. But they were never accepted by the Christian Church.

2. Peshito. The Syriac version of the Old Testament and the greater part of the New. The translation was made in the second part of our era from the original text. It corresponds with the LXX in such a degree as to suggest the fact that the present Hebrew text varies widely from the ancient and original one. There are later Syriac versions, notably the Syro-Hexaplar—translated from the LXX in the 7th century.

3. Vulgate. The current Latin version of the Bible, made by Jerome and completed A. D. 405. The New Testament is a revision of an older Latin version, called the Itala, the origin of which is unknown. The Old Testament is a translation from the Hebrew with the aid of the LXX. There are many editions of this version, but the one in current use is the Clementine (1593), so called from Pope Clement VIII, who authorized the final revision and proclaimed it the true text.

4. Coptic. The Coptic is a mixture of the ancient Egyptian and the Greek tongues. There are two versions in this tongue, known as the Memphitic and the Thebaic, belonging respectively to Lower and Upper Egypt. They were both made from the LXX and not from the Hebrew. Both were made in the 2d century, and neither gives the entire canon of Scripture.

There are other ancient versions, belonging to countries widely separated and made from the original at different times. With many verbal differences they are in wonderful agreement, and are a strong proof of the integrity of the text of the Holy Bible.—A. H. T. See VERSIONS.

BIBLIA PAUPERUM, Bible of the Poor.

1. The name given to a Picture Bible, printed before the invention of movable types, on wood blocks. It had forty leaves printed on one side, on which forty scenes from the life of our Lord were depicted, with some Old Testament events, accompanied with an illustrative text or sentence in Latin. It was not intended so much for the poor people as for the indigent friars, who were, doubtless, aided in their preaching by the pictures. The pictures in this book were copied in sculpture, paintings, and altar pieces. The stained-glass windows in Lambeth Chapel were copied from some of them.

2. A work of Bonaventura, in which Bible events are alphabetically arranged and accompanied with notes to aid preachers.

BIBLIOMANCY (Gr. βιβλιον, bib-lee'-on, Bible, and μαντεία, man-ti'-ah, divination), a kind of fortune-telling by means of the Bible, consisting of drawing texts of Scripture at random, from which inference was made of duty, future events, etc. It was introduced from paganism, which made a similar use of Homer, Virgil, and other writers. In the 12th century it was used for the detection of heretics and in the election of bishops. A sort of bibliomancy was in use among the Jews, which consisted in appealing to the very first words heard from anyone reading the Scriptures, and in regarding them as a voice from heaven.

BICH'RI (Heb. בִּכְרִי, bik-ree', youthful), a Benjamite, whose son Sheba stirred up a rebellion against David after the death of Absalom (2 Sam. 20:1, sq.), B. C. about 967.

BID'KAR (Heb. בִּדְקָר, bid-kar', assassin, or, according to Fürst, servant of the city), Jehu's captain and originally fellow-officer, who cast the body of Jehoram, the son of Ahab, into the field of Naboth after Jehu had slain him (2 Kings 9:25), B. C. 842.

BIER (Heb. מִטָּה, mit-taw', bed, 2 Sam. 3:31; Gr. σοφός, sor-os', open coffin, funeral couch, Luke 7:14). The original form of the term is "beere," from the Anglo-Saxon "beran," to bear. The bier is in fact a hand-barrow on which to carry a corpse to burial. In Europe it was usually covered by a "hearse," or wagon-shaped framework, for the support of the "pall." A combination of the two placed on wheels makes the modern hearse.

BIGAMY. See MARRIAGE.

BIG'THA (Heb. בִּגְתָה, big-thaw', perhaps garden), one of the seven chamberlains who had charge of the harem of Xerxes (Ahasuerus) and were commanded by him to bring in Queen Vashti to the banquet (Esth. 1:10), B. C. 519.

BIG'THAN, or BIG'THANA (Heb. בִּגְתָן, big-thawn', perhaps fortune-given), one of the chamberlains of Xerxes (Ahasuerus) who "kept the door." He conspired with Tereh against the life of the king, and being exposed by Mordecai was hanged with his fellow-conspirator (Esth. 2:21; 6:2), B. C. about 510.

BIG'VAI (Heb. בִּגְוֵי, big-vah'ee, husbandman).

1. The head of one of the families of Israelites who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra

2:2; Neh. 7:7), with a large number of retainers—two thousand and fifty-six, Ezra 2:14; two thousand and sixty-seven, Neh. 7:19, B. C. 536. At a later period seventy-two males of his family returned with Ezra (ch. 8:14), B. C. about 457.

2. One of the chiefs of the people who subscribed to the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. 10:16), B. C. 445. Perhaps the same with No. 1.

BIL'DAD (Heb. בִּלְדָד, bil-dad', son of contention), the Shubite, and the second of the three friends of Job who disputed with him as to his affliction and character (Job 2:11). In his first speech (ch. 8) he attributes the death of Job's children to their own transgression. In his second speech (ch. 18) he recapitulates his former assertions of the temporal calamities of the wicked, insinuating Job's wrongdoing. In his third speech (ch. 25), unable to answer Job's arguments, he takes refuge in a declaration of God's glory and man's nothingness. Finally, with Eliphaz and Zophar, he availed himself of the intercession of Job, in obedience to the divine command (ch. 42:9).

BIL'EAM (Heb. בִּלְעָם, bil-awm', foreigner), a town in the western half of the tribe of Manasseh, and given with its "suburbs" to the Kohathites (1 Chron. 6:70).

BIL'GAH (Heb. בִּלְגָה, bil-gaw', cheerfulness).

1. Head of the fifteenth course for the Temple service, as arranged by David (1 Chron. 24:14), B. C. about 989.

2. A priest who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel and Jeshua (Neh. 12:5, 18), B. C. 536. Perhaps the same as BILGAI, infra (Neh. 10:8).

BIL'GAI (Heb. בִּלְגַי, bil-gah'ee, signification same as above), one of the priests whose descendants were sealed with Nehemiah after the restoration (Neh. 10:8), B. C. 445. Probably the same as BILGAH, supra.

BIL'HAH (Heb. בִּלְהָה, bil-haw', faltering), the handmaid of Rachel, given to her by Laban (Gen. 29:29), and bestowed by her upon her husband, Jacob, that through her she might have children, B. C. about 1749. Bilhah thus became the mother of Dan and Naphtali (Gen. 30:3-8; 35:25; 46:25). Her stepson Reuben afterward lay with her (Gen. 35:22), and thus incurred his father's dying reproof (Gen. 49:4).

BIL'HAN (Heb. בִּלְחָן, bil-hawn', tender).

1. A Horite chief, son of Ezer, son of Seir, dwelling in Mount Seir, in the land of Edom (Gen. 36:27; 1 Chron. 1:42), B. C. about 1840.

2. A Benjamite, son of JEDIAEL (q. v.) and father of seven sons (1 Chron. 7:10), B. C. before 1444.

BILL (Heb. סֵפֶר, say'fer, writing) is a word meaning anything that is written, e. g., a "bill of divorcement" (Deut. 24:1, 3; Isa. 50:1; Jer. 3:8; Matt. 19:7, Gr. βιβλίον, bid-lee'on). The words in Job 31:35, "that mine adversary had written a book," would be better rendered, "that mine adversary had given me a bill of accusation" (i. e., of indictment). In Jer. 32:10-16, 44, "the evidence" (marg. "book") means a bill of purchase or sale. By "bill" (Gr. γράμμα, gram'mah, Luke 16:6, 7) a legal instrument is meant, which showed the amount of indebtedness, probably of tenants who paid rent in kind.

BIL'SHAN (Heb. בִּלְשָׁן, bil-shawn', son of the tongue, i. e., eloquent), the name of one of the princes of the Jews who returned to Jerusalem with Zerubbabel after the captivity (Ezra 2:2; Neh. 7:7), B. C. 536.

BIM'HAL (Heb. בִּמְחֹל, bim-hawl', son of circumcision, i. e., circumcised), a son of Japhlet and great-great-grandson of Asher (1 Chron. 7:33), B. C. about 1444.

BIND (Heb. שָׁרַף, kaw-shar'). In the command, "Thou shalt bind them for a sign upon thine hand," etc., (Deut. 6:8) the "words are figurative, and denote an undeviating observance of the divine commands; and their literal fulfillment could only be a praiseworthy custom or well-pleasing to God when resorted to as the means of keeping the commands of God constantly before the eye" (K. and D., Com., in loc.).

BINDING AND LOOSING. To bind and loose are found in the address of our Lord to Peter (Matt. 16:19). No other terms were in more constant use in rabbinic canon law than these. "The words are the literal translation of the Heb. אָסַר, aw-sar', to bind, in the sense of prohibiting; and הִיאֵר, hil-tee', to loose, in the sense of permitting."

"Binding and loosing" referred merely to things or acts, prohibiting or permitting them, declaring them lawful or unlawful. Thus the rabbis claimed both legislative and judicial power: by the first binding or loosing acts or things; by the second remitting or retaining, thus declaring a person free from or liable to punishment, compensation, or sacrifice. These two powers Jesus transferred, and that not in their pretension, but in their reality, to the apostles (Edersheim, Life and Times of Jesus, ii, 85).

BIN'EA (Heb. בִּנְיָה, and בִּנְיָהוּ, bin-aw', a gushing forth, fountain), a Benjamite, son of Moza and father of Rapha, of the descendants of King Saul (1 Chron. 8:37; 9:43), B. C. about 850.

BINNU'I (Heb. בְּנוּי, bin-noo'ee, a building).

1. A Levite whose son, Noadiah, was one of those that assisted in weighing the gold and silver designed for the divine service on the restoration from Babylon (Ezra 8:33), B. C. about 457.

2. One of the "sons" of Pahath-moab, who put away his strange wife on the return from Babylon (Ezra 10:30), B. C. 456.

3. Another Israelite, of the "sons" of Bani, who did the same (Ezra 10:38), B. C. 456.

4. A Levite, son of Henadad, who returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon (Neh. 12:8), B. C. 536. He also (if the same) assisted in repairing the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:24), B. C. 446, and joined in the covenant (Neh. 10:9), B. C. 410.

5. The head of one of the families of Israelites whose followers, to the number of six hundred and forty-eight, returned from Babylon (Neh. 7:15). In Ezra 2:10 he is called BANI (q. v.), and his retainers are numbered at six hundred and forty-two.

BIRD. See ANIMAL KINGDOM, FOOD, SACRIFICES.

BIR'SHA (Heb. בִּרְשָׁה, beer-shah', with wickedness), a king of Gomorrah, succored by Abraham in the invasion of Chedorlaomer (Gen. 14:2), B. C. about 2250.

BIRTH. See CHILD.

BIRTHDAY (Heb. יוֹם הַיְּהוּדִים, yome hool-leh-deth', Gen. 40:20; Gr. τὰ γενέσια, Matt. 14:6; Mark 6:21). The custom of observing birthdays was very ancient and widely extended. In Persia they were celebrated with peculiar honor and banquets, and in Egypt the king's birthday was observed with great pomp (Gen. 40:20). No reference is made in Scripture of the celebration of birthdays by the Jews themselves, although the language of Jeremiah (20:14, 15) would seem to indicate that such occasions were joyfully remembered. By most commentators the feasts mentioned in Job 1:13, 18, are thought to have been birthday festivals, but Delitzsch (Com., in loc.) believes them to have been gatherings each day in the home of one of the brothers. The feast commemorative of "Herod's birthday" (Matt. 14:6) may have been in honor of his birth or of his accession to the throne (Hos. 7:5). The later Jews regarded the celebration of birthdays as a part of idolatrous worship. In the early Church the term "birthdays" was applied to the festivals of martyrs, the days on which they suffered death in this world and were born to the glory and life of heaven.

BIRTHRIGHT (Heb. בְּכוֹרָה, bek-o-raw'; Gr. πρωτοτοκία, pro-tot-ok'-ee-ah, primogeniture), the right of the firstborn; that to which one is entitled by virtue of his birth. See FIRSTBORN.

BIR'ZAVITH (Heb. בִּרְזוּחַ, beer-zoth', holes), a name given in the genealogies of Asher (1 Chron. 7:31) as the son of Malchiel and great-grandson of Asher.

BISH'LAM (Heb. בִּשְׁלָם, bish-lavm', son of peace), apparently an officer of Artaxerxes in Palestine at the time of the return of Zerubbabel from captivity. He wrote to the king against the Jews who were rebuilding the temple (Ezra 4:7), B. C. 529.

BISHOP. See ELDER, p. 302.

BISHOPRIC (Gr. ἐπισκοπή, ep-is-kop-ay', oversight), the ministerial charge in the Church (Acts 1:20; 1 Tim. 3:1). In later times it is used to designate (1) the office and function of a bishop, and (2) the district over which he has jurisdiction.

BISHOPS' BIBLE. See BIBLE, ENGLISH, 9.

BIT (Heb. מֵלֶחֶם, meh'-theg, Psa. 32:9; Gr. χαλιμός, khal-ee-nos', James 3:3), elsewhere rendered BRIDLE (q. v.).

BITHI'AH (Heb. בִּיתְיָהוּ, bith-yaw', daughter of Jehovah), daughter of Pharaoh and wife of Mered, a descendant of Judah (1 Chron. 4:18). It is thought that her sons are mentioned (v. 17) in the clause beginning "and she bare," etc. As the Pharaohs contracted marriages with royal families alone, Mered was probably a person of some distinction; or Bithiah may have been an adopted daughter of Pharaoh. It may be supposed that she became the wife of Mered through captivity.

BITH'RON (Heb. בִּיתְרוֹן, bith-ron', the broken or divided place), a defile in the Arabah, or Jordan valley (2 Sam. 2:29), through which Abner and his men went after the death of Asahel.

BITHYN'IA (Gr. Βιθύνια, bee-thoo-nee'-ah), the N. W. province of Asia Minor. It is mountainous, thickly wooded, and fertile. It was conquered by the Romans 75 B. C. The letters of Pliny to the Emperor Trajan show that the presence of so many Christians in the province embarrassed him very much (1 Pet. 1:1). Paul was not permitted to enter Bithynia (Acts 16:7), being detained by the Spirit.

BITTER (Heb. some form of מָרָר, maw-rar'; Gr. πικρός, pik-ros'). Bitterness in Scripture is symbolical of affliction, misery, servitude (Exod. 1:14; Ruth 1:20; Prov. 5:4), of wickedness (Jer. 4:18). A time of mourning and lamentation is called a "bitter day" (Amos 8:10). Habakkuk (1:6) calls the Chaldeans "that bitter and swift nation" i. e., having a fierce disposition. The "gall of bitterness" describes a state of extreme wickedness (Acts 8:23), while a "root of bitterness" (Heb. 12:15) expresses a wicked, scandalous person, or any dangerous sin leading to apostasy. The "waters made bitter" (Rev. 8:11) is figurative of severe political or providential events.

BITTER HERBS. Because of the symbolical meaning of bitterness bitter herbs were commanded to be used in the celebration of the PASSOVER (q. v.) to recall the bondage of Egypt (Exod. 12:8; Num. 9:11). See VEGETABLE KINGDOM.

BITTERN. See SUPPLEMENT.

BITUMEN (A. V. "slime"). See MINERAL KINGDOM.

BIZJOTH'JAH (Heb. בִּזְיוֹתְיָהוּ, biz-yo-thē-yaw', contempt of Jehovah), one of the towns that fell to Judah (Josh. 15:28), probably the same with Baalath-beer (19:8). Site unknown.

BIZ'THA (Heb. בִּזְתָּה, biz-thaw'), one of the seven eunuchs of the harem of Xerxes (Ahasuerus) who were ordered to bring Vashti forth for exhibition (Esth. 1:10), B. C. about 521.

BLACK. See COLORS.

BLAINS. See DISEASES.

BLASPHEMY (Gr. βλασφημία, blas-fay-me'-ah) signifies the speaking evil of God (Heb. יָרָה שֵׁם יְהוָה, to curse the name of the Lord, Psa. 74:18; Isa. 52:5; Rom. 2:24). Sometimes, perhaps, "blasphemy" has been retained by our translators when the general meaning, "evil-speaking," or "calumny," might have been better (Col. 3:8). There are two great forms of blasphemy: (1) Attributing some evil to God, or denying him some good which we should attribute to him (Lev. 24:11; Rom. 2:24). (2) Giving the attributes of God to a creature—which form of blasphemy the Jews charged upon Jesus (Luke 5:21; Matt. 26:65; John 10:36). The Jews, from ancient times, have interpreted the command, Lev. 24:16, as prohibiting the utterance of the name Jehovah, reading for it Adonai or Elohim.

Punishment. Blasphemy, when committed in ignorance, i. e., through thoughtlessness and weakness of the flesh, might be atoned for; but if committed "with a high hand," i. e., in impious rebellion against Jehovah, was punished by stoning (Lev. 24:11-16).

New Testament. Blasphemy against the Holy Ghost (Matt. 12:31; Mark 3:29; Luke 12:10), also called the unpardonable sin, has caused extended discussion. The sin mentioned in the gospels would appear to have consisted in attributing to the power of Satan those unquestionable miracles which Jesus performed by "the finger of God," and by the power of the Holy Ghost. It is questionable whether it may be extended beyond this one limited and special sin (see SIN, THE UNPARDONABLE).

Among the early Christians three kinds of blasphemy were recognized: (1) Of apostates and lapsi (lapsed), whom the heathen persecutors had compelled not only to deny, but to curse Christ. (2) Of heretics and other profane Christians. (3) Blasphemy against the Holy Ghost.

BLASTING (Heb. שֶׁדֵי, shed-ay-faw', singeing). This and Heb. יָבֵשׁ (yay-raw-kone', to be yellowish, mildew) refer to two diseases which attack the grain: the former to the withering or burning of the ears, caused by the East wind (Gen. 41:6, 23, 27); the other to the effect produced by a warm wind in Arabia, by which the green ears are turned yellow, so that they bear no grains (K. and D., Com.). See MILDEW.

BLAS'TUS (Gr. Βλάστος, blas'-tos), the chamberlain of King Herod Agrippa who acted as mediator between the people of Tyre and Sidon and the king (Acts 12:20), A. D. 44.

BLEMISH (Heb. מוֹם, moom; Gr. μῶμος, mo'-mos). "As the spiritual nature of a man is reflected in his bodily form, only a faultless condition of body could correspond to the holiness of a priest." Consequently all men were excluded from the priesthood, and all animals from being offered as sacrifices, who had any blemish. These blemishes are described in Lev. 21:17-23; 22:19-25; Deut. 15:21. "A flat nose" may mean any mutilation, while "anything superfluous" would seem to indicate "beyond what is normal, an ill formed member." The rule concerning animals extended to imperfections, so that if an animal free from outward blemish was found, after being slain, internally defective it was not offered in sacrifice.

BLESS, BLESSING (Heb. בָּרַךְ, baw-rak'; Gr. εὐλογέω, yoo-log-eh'-o). Acts of blessing may be considered: (1) When God is said to bless men (Gen. 1:28; 22:17). God's blessing is accompanied with that virtue which renders his blessing effectual, and which is expressed by it. Since God is eternal and omnipresent, his omniscience and omnipotence cause his blessings to avail in the present life in respect to all things, and also in the life to come. (2) When men bless God (Psa. 103:1, 2; 145:1-3, etc.). This is when they ascribe to him those characteristics which are his, acknowledge his sovereignty, express gratitude for his mercies, etc. (3) Men bless their fellow-men when, as in ancient times, under the spirit of prophecy, they predicted blessings to come upon them. Thus Jacob blessed his sons (Gen. 49:1-28; Heb. 11:21), and Moses the children of Israel (Deut. 33:1-29). It was the duty and privilege of the priests to bless the people in the name of the Lord (see BENEDECTION). Further, men bless their fellow-men when they express good wishes and pray God in their behalf. (4) At meals. The psalmist says, "I will take the cup of salvation, and call upon the name of the Lord" (Psa. 116:13), an apparent reference to a custom among the Jews. A feast was made of a portion of their thank offerings when, among other rites, the master of the feast took a cup of wine, offering thanks to God for his mercies. The cup was then passed to all the guests, each drinking in his turn. At family feasts, and especially the Passover, both bread and wine were passed, and thanks offered to God for his mercies.

BLESSING, THE CUP OF, a name applied to the wine in the Lord's Supper (1 Cor. 10:16), probably because the same name was given to the cup of wine in the supper of the PASSOVER (q. v.).

BLINDNESS (see DISEASES) was sometimes inflicted for political or other purposes in the East (1 Sam. 11:2; Jer. 22:12). In common with other calamities blindness was supposed to be the result of transgressions in a previous state of existence. Thus the disciples of our Lord asked, "Who did sin, this man or his parents, that he was born blind?" (John 9:2).

Figurative. In Scripture blindness is a term frequently used to denote ignorance or a want of spiritual discernment (Isa. 6:10; 42:18, 19; Matt. 15:14). Thus "blindness of heart" is a lack of understanding resulting from evil passions (Mark 3:5, marg.; Rom. 11:25).

BLOOD (Heb. דָּם, dawm; Gr. αἷμα, hak'ee-mah). A peculiar sacredness attached to blood, because of the idea that prevailed of its unity with the soul. We find this distinctively stated (Gen. 9:4): "But flesh with the life thereof, which is the blood thereof," etc. "This identification of the blood with the soul, which prevailed in antiquity, appears at first to have no further foundation than that a sudden diminution of the quantity of blood in the body causes death. But this phenomenon itself has the deeper reason that all activity of the body depends on the quantity of the blood. The blood is actually the basis of the physical life; and, so far, the soul, as the principle of bodily life, is preeminently in the blood. We are to understand this only of the sensuous soul, not of the intelligent and thinking soul" (Delitzsch).

Arising from this principle the Scriptures record different directions respecting blood:

1. As Food. When permission was given Noah to partake of animal food (Gen. 9:4) the use of blood was strictly forbidden. In the Mosaic law this prohibition was repeated with emphasis, though generally in connection with sacrifices (Lev. 3:8; 7:26). "The prohibition of the use of blood has a twofold ground: blood has the soul in itself, and in accordance with the gracious ordinance of God it is the means of expiation for human souls, because of the soul contained in it.

The one ground is found in the nature of blood, and the other in its destination to a holy purpose, which, even apart from that other reason, withdraws it from a common use" (Delitzsch, Bib. Psychology, p. 283). Because of the blood the eating of bloody portions of flesh (Gen. 9:4), or of flesh with blood (Lev. 19:26; 1 Sam. 14:32), is also forbidden. The penalty was that the offender should be "cut off from the people," which seems to be death, but whether by the sword or by stoning is not known (Lev. 17:14). This prohibition was also made by the apostles and elders in the council at Jerusalem, and coupled with things offered to idols (Acts 15:29).

2. Sacrificial. A well-known rabbinical maxim, and recognized by the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews (9:22), was, "Without shedding of blood is no remission." The life is in the blood, as is often declared by Moses, and the life of the sacrifice was taken, and the blood offered to God, as a representative and substitute for the offerer (Lev. 17:11). See SACRIFICE.

3. Figurative. "Blood" is often used for life: "Whoso sheddeth man's blood" (Gen. 9:6); "His blood be upon us" (Matt. 27:25). "Blood" sometimes means race or nature; as, God "hath made of one blood all nations of men" (Acts 17:26). Sometimes it is used as a symbol of slaughter (Isa. 34:3; Ezek. 14:19). To "wash the feet in the blood of the wicked" (Psa. 58:10) is to gain a victory with great slaughter. To "build a town with blood" (Hab. 2:12) is by causing the death of the subjugated nations. Wine is called the blood of the grape (Gen. 49:11).

BLOOD AND WATER. See CRUCIFIXION.

BLOOD, AVENGER OR REVENGER OF (Heb. גֹּאֵל דָּמִים, go-ale' had-damim', literally, redeemer of blood). At the root of the enactments of the Mosaic penal code there lies the principle of strict but righteous retribution, the purpose being to extirpate evil and produce reverence for the righteous God. This principle, however, was not first introduced by the law of Moses. It is much older, and is found especially in the form of blood revenge among many ancient peoples. "Indeed, it appears almost everywhere where the state has not yet been formed or is still in the first stages of development, and consequently satisfaction for personal injury falls to private revenge, particularly family honor, as among the Arabs, ancient Greeks, Romans, Germans, and Russians, and to the present day among the Bedouins, Druses, Circassians, and other nations of the East" (Keil, Arch.).

"We have this custom of 'blood calling for blood' existing among the Arabs of to-day. . . . If a man is slain there can never be peace between the tribes again unless the man who killed him is slain by the avenger" (Harper, Bible and Mod. Dis., p. 52).

By this custom the life, first of all, but after it also the property of the family, as its means of subsistence, was to be protected by the nearest of kin, called a redeemer. The following directions were given by Moses: (1) The willful murderer was to be put to death, without permission of compensation, by the nearest of kin. (2) The law of retaliation was not to extend beyond the immediate offender (Deut. 24:16; 2 Kings 14:6; 2 Chron. 25:4, etc.). (3) If a man took the life of another without hatred, or without hostile intent, he was permitted to flee to a city of refuge (q. v.).

It is not known how long blood revenge was observed, although it would appear (2 Sam. 14:7, 8) that David had influence in restraining the operation of the law. Jehoshaphat established a court at Jerusalem to decide such cases (2 Chron. 19:10).

BLOOD, ISSUE OF. See DISEASES.

BLOODY SWEAT. In recording the scene in Gethsemane Luke says that our Lord's sweat "was as it were great drops of blood falling down to the ground" (22:44). These words are understood by many to express merely a comparison between the size and density of the drops of sweat and those of blood. But blood (αἷματος) only receives its due in being referred to the nature of the sweat, and we infer that the words imply a profusion of bloody sweat mingled with blood. "Phenomena of frequent occurrence demonstrate how immediately the blood, the seat of life, is under the influence of moral impressions. A feeling of shame causes the blood to rise to the face. Cases are known in which the blood, violently agitated by grief, ends by penetrating through the vessels which inclose it, and, driven outward, escapes with the sweat through the transpiratory glands" (Godet, Com., in loc.).

BLOT (Heb. מָחָה, mar-khaw', to rub over, to wipe). This word is used in the sense of to obliterate; therefore to blot out is to destroy or abolish. To blot out sin is to fully and finally forgive it (Isa. 44:22). To blot men out of God's book is to withdraw his providential favors and to cut them off untimely (Exod. 32:32; comp. Deut. 29:20; Psa. 69:28). When Moses says, in the above passage, "Blot me, I pray thee, out of thy book," we understand the written book as a metaphorical expression, alluding to the custom of making a list of all citizens so that privileges of citizenship might be accorded them. "To blot out of Jehovah's book, therefore, is to cut off from living fellowship with the living God . . . and to deliver over to death. As a true mediator of his people, Moses was ready to stake his own life for the deliverance of the nation if Jehovah would forgive the people their sin. These words were the strongest expression of devoted, self-sacrificing love" (K. and D., Com., in loc.).

The not blotting the name of the saints out of the book of life, etc. (Rev. 3:5), indicates their security and final vindication. A sinful act (Job 31:7) or reproach (Prov. 9:7) is termed a blot.

BLOW UP. See GLOSSARY.

BLUE. See COLORS.

BOANER'GES (Gr. Βοανεργής, bō-an-erg-es', sons of thunder), a surname given by Christ to James and John, probably on account of "their ardent temperament and bold eloquence as preachers" (Mark 3:17).

BOAR. See ANIMAL KINGDOM.

BOARD, the translation of several original words: .

1. Loo'-akh (Heb. לִיָּא, liya), a tablet (Exod. 27:8; 38:7; Cant. 8:9; Ezek. 27:5).

2. Keh'-resh (Heb. קַרְשׁ, qarsh), to split off (Exod. 26:15, sq.; 36:20, sq.).

3. Sed-ay-raw' (Heb. שֵׁטְרָה, shetarah), a row, set up in order (1 Kings 6:9).

4. Tsay-law' (Heb. צַלַּע, tsalal), literally, rib, so beam, etc. (1 Kings 6:15, 16).

5. San-ec' (Gr. σάνις), a plank of a vessel (Acts 27:44).

BOAT. 1. Ab-aw-raw' (Heb. עֲבָרָה, avarah), a crossing place, so ferry boat (2 Sam. 19:18).

2. Ploy-ar'-ee-on (Gr. πλοῖον, plonion), a little ship, a fishing smack (John 6:22, 23).

A Skin Boat.

3. Skaf'-ay (Gr. σκάφη, skaphi), dug out, a boat acting as tender to a larger vessel (Acts 27:16, 30, 32).

BO'AZ (Heb. בֹּעַז, bo'az, perhaps alacrity), a wealthy Beth-lehemite, kinsman to Elimelech, the husband of Naomi. When Naomi and Ruth returned from the country of Moab the latter received permission to glean in the fields of Boaz. He treated her generously, offering her much greater privileges than were usually accorded to gleaners. Finding that the kinsman of Ruth, who was more nearly related to her, would not marry her according to the "levirate law," Boaz voluntarily assumed its obligations. He married Ruth, and their union was blessed by the birth of Obed, the grandfather of David (Ruth 1-4), B. C. about 1070.

BOCH'ERU (Heb. בְּכֹרִי, bo-ker-oo', firstborn), one of the six sons of Azel, a descendant of King Saul (1 Chron. 8:38).

BO'CHIM (Heb. בְּכִיִּים, bo-keem', weepers), a place near Gilgal, called, as the name indicates, to remind of the tears shed by the unfaithful people of Israel upon God reproving them (Judg. 2:1, 5). It was W. of the Jordan, near the Dead Sea, and probably between Beth-el and Shiloh.

BODY, the translation of several Hebrew words and the Gr. sōma, so'-mah. It usually refers to the animal frame as distinguished from the man himself. It differs from sarz (σάρξ), which refers rather to the material or substance of the body. It is spoken of in the Scriptures as the temporary abode of the Spirit (2 Cor. 5:1; 2 Pet.

1:18, 14), the instrument of the soul (2 Cor. 5:10), and its members as the instruments of righteousness or iniquity (Rom. 6:13, 19).

Figuratively, used of a number of persons closely united into one society, a mystical body, the Church (Rom. 12:5; 1 Cor. 10:17; 12:13; Eph. 2:16, etc.). The body (sōma) is distinguished from the shadow (σκιά) (Col. 2:17). Thus the ceremonies of the law are figures and shadows realized in Christ and the Christian religion. Again, "the body of sin" (Rom. 6:6), called also "the body of this death" (Rom. 7:24), represents the condition of sin before conversion. The apostle speaks of a natural body in opposition to a spiritual body (1 Cor. 15:44). The body which is buried is natural (ψυχικόν) inasmuch as the power of the sensuous and perishable life (ψυχή) was its vital principle. The resurrection body will be spiritual (πνευματικόν) inasmuch as the spirit will be its life principle.

BODY OF HEAVEN. See GLOSSARY.

BO'HAN (Heb. בִּיהַן, bo'-han, a thumb), a Reubenite, in whose honor a stone was set up (or named), which afterward served as a boundary mark on the frontier of Judah and Benjamin (Josh. 15:6; 18:17).

BOIL. See DISEASES.

BOLLED. See GLOSSARY.

BOLSTER (Heb. מְרִישָׁה, mer-ah-ash-aw', at the head, 1 Sam. 19:13, 16; 26:7, 11, 16), elsewhere rendered PILLOW (q. v.).

BOLT. See LOCK.

BOND, the translation of several Hebrew and Greek words; an obligation of any kind (Num. 30:2, 4, 12). It is used to signify oppression, captivity, affliction (Psa. 116:16; Phil. 1:7). We read of the "bond of peace" (Eph. 4:3); and charity, because it completes the Christian character, is called the "bond of perfectness" (Col. 3:14). Bands or chains worn by prisoners were known as bonds (Acts 20:23; 25:14).

BONDAGE. See SERVICE.

BONDMAID, BONDMAN, BONDSERVANT. See SERVICE.

BONE. This word is used figuratively, as, "bone of my bones, and flesh of my flesh" (Gen. 2:23), "of his flesh and of his bones" (Eph. 5:30), to mean the same nature, and the being united in the nearest relation. Iniquities are said to be in men's bones when their bodies are polluted thereby (Job 20:11); and utter helplessness is represented by the "valley of dry bones" (Ezek. 37:1-14).

BONNET. See DRESS.

BOOK (Heb. סֵפֶר, say'-fer; Gr. βιβλος, bib'-los). The Hebrew word is much more comprehensive than our English book. It means anything written, as a bill of sale or purchase (Jer. 32, 12, sq.), a bill of accusation (Job 31:35), a bill of divorce (Deut. 24:1, 3), a letter (2 Sam. 11:

14), or a volume (Exod. 17:14; Deut. 28:58, etc.). Respecting the material, form, and making of books, see WRITING.

There are some expressions in Scripture which may be suitably noticed here:

1. "To eat a book" (Ezek. 2:9; 3:2; Rev. 10:9) is a figurative expression, meaning to master the contents of the book; to receive into one's innermost being the word of God.

2. "A sealed book" is one closed up from view (Rev. 5:1-3), or one whose contents were not understood by those reading it (Isa. 29:11). By a book "written within and on the back side" (Rev. 5:1) we understand a roll written on both sides.

3. "Book of the generation" means the genealogical records of a family or nation (Gen. 5:1; Matt. 1:1).

4. "Book of judgment" (Dan. 7:10), perhaps means books of accounts with servants; or, as among the Persians, records of official services rendered to the king, and the rewards given to those who performed them (Esth. 6:1-3). The "books" (Rev. 20:12) are referred to in justification of the sentence passed upon the wicked.

5. "The book of life" (Phil. 4:3), the "book of the living" (Psa. 69:28), an expression employed in accommodation to the image of the future life being a citizenship. "The figure of a heavenly register, in which the names of the elect are inscribed, is common in the Old Testament (Exod. 32:32, 33; Isa. 4:3; Dan. 12:1). This book is the type of the divine decree. But a name may be blotted out of it (Jer. 17:13, etc.); a fact which preserves human freedom" (Godet, Com., on Luke 10:20). Whedon (Com., same passage) says: "Our names are there recorded when we are justified by living faith. The retention of our names is conditional; i. e., our names may be blotted out by sin, and thus our citizenship be lost."

6. "Book of the wars of the Lord" (Num. 21:14) is thought by some to be an ancient document existing at the time of the writing of the Pentateuch, and quoted or alluded to by Moses. Another view is that it "is a collection of odes of the time of Moses himself, in celebration of the glorious acts of the Lord and of the Israelites" (K. and D., Com.). "Was this book a record of war songs sung over camp fires, just as the Bedouin do to-day? It seems most likely" (Harper, Bible and Modern Discoveries, p. 122). See ROLL, GLOSSARY.

BOOTH (Heb. סֹכֶת, sook-kam', hut, or lair; often translated "tabernacle," or "pavilion"), a shelter made of branches of trees and shrubs (Gen. 33:17), and serving as a protection against rain, frost, and heat. Such were also the temporary green shelters in which the Israelites celebrated (Lev. 23:42, 43) the FEAST OF TABERNACLES (q. v.).

BOOTY. See SPOIL.

BO'OZ, the Grecized form (Matt. 1:5) of the Beth-lehemite BOAZ (q. v.).

BORDER. 1. Generally (from Heb. גְּבוּל, gheb-ool'), a boundary line.

2. Mis-gheh'-reth (Heb. מִסְגַּרְתּוֹ, inclosing, Exod. 25:25, 27; 37:12, 14), the panel running around the table of showbread into which the upper ends of the legs were mortised. The term is employed of a similar panel on the pedestals of the Temple lavers (1 Kings 7:28-36; 2 Kings 16:17).

3. Kaw-nauf' (Heb. קַנְיָף, edge), the hem or fringe of a garment (Num. 15:38).

4. Tore (Heb. תָּרַף, a string), a row or string of pearls or golden beads for the head dress (Cant. 1:11).

BORN AGAIN, or BORN OF GOD. See REGENERATION.

BORROW, BORROWING, as a matter of law, etc. See LOAN.

We call attention to the much-debated act of the Israelites in "borrowing" from the Egyptians (Exod. 12:35). This was in pursuance of a divine command (Exod. 3:22; 11:2); and it suggests a difficulty, seeing that the Israelites did not intend to return to Egypt, or restore the borrowed articles. So considered the Israelites were guilty of an immoral act. The following are some of the attempts at explanation, briefly stated:

1. The Israelites borrowed, expecting to return in three days; but when Pharaoh refused to allow this Moses was instructed to demand the entire departure of Israel. After the smiting of the firstborn Israel was "thrust out," and had no opportunity of returning what they had borrowed.

2. After the borrowing the Egyptians made war upon the Israelites, and this breach of peace justified the latter in retaining the property as "contraband of war."

3. Ewald (Hist. of Israel, ii, 66) maintains that "since Israel could not return to Egypt, . . . and therefore was not bound to return the borrowed goods, the people kept them, and despoiled the Egyptians. It appears a piece of high retributive justice that those who had been oppressed in Egypt should now be forced to borrow from the Egyptians, and be obliged by Pharaoh's subsequent treachery to retain them, and thus be indemnified for their long oppression."

4. "The only meaning of shaw-al' (שָׁאַל) is to ask or beg; and the expression yash-ee-loom' (יָשַׁעְלוּ, Exod. 12:36), literally, 'they allowed them to ask,' i. e., the Egyptians received their petition with good will and granted their request. From the very first the Israelites asked without intending to restore, and the Egyptians granted their request without any hope of receiving back, because God had made their hearts favorably disposed toward the Israelites" (K. and D., Com., 3:22). This view appears to be taken by Josephus (Antiq., ii, 14, 6): "They also honored the Hebrews with gifts; some in order to secure their speedy departure, and others on account of neighborly intimacy with them." "It evidently refers to the custom, which is fresh now as always in the unchangeable East, of soliciting a gift on the eve of departure, or on the closing of any term of service of any sort whatsoever. That this was the custom in that day, as it is now, is indicated in many Bible references to the giving of gifts (Gen. 12:16; 33:10, 11; Judg. 3: 15-18, etc.); but more explicitly in the divine command to the Israelites themselves not to forget the backsheesh when they released a servant at the beginning of the sabbatical year (Deut. 15:13-15) (Trumbull, Kadesh-Barnea, p. 388).

BOS'CATH (2 Kings 22:1). See BOZKATH.

BOSOM (Heb. בֶּטֶן, khake, to inclose).

1. The bunched fold of the dress in front of the breast, into which idlers thrust the hand (Psa. 74:11), was used as a pocket or bag, in which bread, grain, and other kinds of food were carried (2 Kings 4:39; Hag. 2:12; Luke 6:38; Gr. κόλπος, kol'-pos). Shepherds thus carried lambs (Isa. 40:11).

2. The front of the body between the arms; hence to "lean on one's bosom" is to so recline at table as that the head covers the bosom, as it were, of the one next him (John 13:23). The expression "into Abraham's bosom" (Luke 16:22) means to obtain the seat next to Abraham, i. e., to be partaker of the same blessedness as Abraham. Christ "is in the bosom of the Father" (John 1:18), i. e., "He who is most intimately connected with the Father, and dearest to him."

BO'SOR (Gr. Βοσόρ, bos-or'), the Grecized form (2 Pet. 2:15) of Βεορ (q. v.), father of Balaam BOSS (Heb. בֶּטֶן, gab, something convex), the outstanding parts of a shield, and thus the thickest and strongest (Job 15:26). The word is sometimes rendered "back" (Psa. 129:3; Ezek. 10:12), "bodies," i. e., ramparts (Job 13:12), "nave," i. e., rim, of a wheel (1 Kings 7:33).

BOTCH. See DISEASES.

BOTTLE. 1. The Skin Bottle (Heb. בִּטְיָה, khay-meth, Gen. 21:14; Hos. 7:5; נֹאֵר, node, Judg. 4:19; Josh. 9:4, 13; נֶבֶל, neh'-bel, 1 Sam. 1:24; 10:3; 2 Sam. 16:1; אֹבֵה, obe, Job 32:19; Gr. ἀσκός, Matt. 9:17; Mark 2:22; Luke 5:37). The Skin Bottle.

Arabs, and wandering tribes generally, keep their water, milk, and liquids in leathern bottles. The animal is killed, its head and feet cut off, and the body drawn out without opening the belly. The openings at the feet and tail are sewed up, and the vessel filled and emptied at the neck. The Arabians tan their bottles with acacia bark. The fact of leathern bottles helps us to understand such passages as Josh. 9:4; Job 32:19. "A bottle in the smoke" (Psa. 119:83) may refer to the hanging of bottles in tents where the smoke has free access to them, rendering them hard and shriveled.

2. Vessels of Metal, Glass, or Earthen Ware (Heb. בִּטְיָה, bak-book', Jer. 19:1). Such vessels were in use among the Egyptians, Assyrians, and Greeks. Glass bottles of the 3d and 4th centuries B. C. have been found at Babylon by Mr. Layard. The Jews, probably, borrowed their manufacture of such ware from the Egyptians.

Earthen Bottles.

There are frequent indications of such bottles at a very early period. Jeremiah mentions the potter's earthen bottles and the dashing of them to pieces (Jer. 19:1-10; 13:12-14).

3. Figurative. "Bottle" is used as a poetical figure for the clouds: "Who can stay (empty) the bottles of heaven?" (Job 38:37.) "Put thou my tears into thy bottle" (Psa. 56:8). Thomson (Land, etc.) says: "We find allusions in old authors to the custom of collecting the tears of mourners and preserving them in bottles. These lachrymatories are still found in great numbers on opening ancient tombs." Others think it has reference to the custom of placing precious stones and other valuables in bottles, and has reference to the high valuation of our tears on the part of God.

BOTTOM. See GLOSSARY.

BOTTOMLESS PIT. See PIT.

BOUGH, the rendering of several words in the original. In Isa. 17:6 it stands as a representative of Heb. אֲמֵר, aw-meer', A. V. "uppermost bough." It is a word only used here, and is usually derived from an Arabic root signifying a general, or emir, and hence, in the present text, the higher or upper branches of a tree. Lee thinks that it denotes the sheath in which the fruit of the date-palm is enveloped. He translates thus: "Two or three berries in the head of the caul" (or pod, properly sheath), "four or five in its fissures."

BOUNTIFULNESS is generosity, liberality, or munificence in bestowing favors or gifts above what is due. In Prov. 22:9 the Heb. טוֹבָה, tobe, good, and in Isa. 32:5 Heb. שׂוֹפֵר, sho'-ah, rich, free, are translated "bountiful." גַּבְלוּ, gaw-mal', to deal bountifully with, is so rendered (Psa. 13. 6, etc.). In 2 Cor. 9:5, 6 εὐλογία, yoo-log-ee'-ah, good speech or blessing, is translated "bounty" and "bountifully," and in v. 11 ἀπλότης is rendered "bountifulness" (R. V. "liberality"). The word and its derivatives are used in the Bible to express the more than human forbearance and generosity with which God dispenses good to his creatures.

BOW, as a weapon. See ARMOR.

Figurative. The bow signifies judgments ready for offenders (Psa. 7:12); sometimes lying (Psa. 64:3; Jer. 9:3). "A deceitful bow" (Psa. 78:57; Hos. 7:16) represents unreliableness. "He bade them teach the use of the bow" (2 Sam. 1:18). Bow here means "a song to which the title Kesheth (Heb. קֶשֶׁת, bow) was given, not only because the bow is referred to (v. 22), but because it is a martial ode" (K. and D., Com., in loc.).

BOW IN THE CLOUD. See RAINBOW.

BOWELS, the translation of several Hebrew words and the Gr. σπλάγχνον, splanchnon, and often indicating the internal parts generally, the inner man, and also the heart. Thus the bowels are made the seat of tenderness and compassion (Gen. 48:30; Psa. 25:6, translated "tender mercies"; Phil. 1:8; Col. 3:12, etc.). "My bowels shall sound like an harp" (Isa. 16:11) is thus explained by K. and D. (Com.): "Just as the hand or plectrum touches the strings of the harp, so did the terrible things that he had heard Jehovah say concerning Moab touch the strings of his inward parts, and cause them to resound with notes of pain."

BOWING (mostly Heb. שָׁחוּ, shaw-khaw, to sink down, נָתַת, kaw-dad, to bow down, and the Gr. προσκυνέω, pros-koo-neh'-o), an attitude of respect and reverence from the earliest times. Thus Abraham "bowed himself to the people of the land" (Gen. 23:7); Jacob, when he met Esau, "bowed himself to the ground seven times" (Gen. 33:3); and the brethren of Joseph "bowed down their heads, and made obeisance" (Gen. 43:28). The orientals in the presence of kings and princes often prostrate themselves upon the earth. Such customs prevailed among the Hebrews (Exod. 4:31; 1 Kings 1:53; 2:19; 1 Sam. 24:8).

Bowing is frequently noticed in Scripture as an act of religious homage to idols (Josh. 23:7; 2 Kings 5:18; Judg. 2:19; Isa. 44:15, sq.), and also to God (Josh. 6:14; Psa. 22:29; 72:9; Mic. 6:6, etc.).

BOWL, the translation of several Hebrew words. We have no means of obtaining accurate information as to the material and precise form of these vessels. In the earliest times they were, doubtless, made of wood and shells of the larger kinds of nuts, and were used at meals for liquids, broth, or pottage (2 Kings 4:40). Modern Arabs are now content with a few wooden bowls, although those of the emirs are not infrequently made of copper and neatly tinned. Bowls with Hebrew inscriptions have been found at Babylon. See DISH.

BOWMAN (Heb. קֶשֶׁת, keh'-sheth, bow, and רָמָה, raw-maw, shoot, Jer. 4:29). See ARMOR.

BOWSHOT (Heb. קֶשֶׁת, keh'-sheth, bow, and מִתְּחִלָּה, taw-khaw, to stretch, Gen. 21:16). "In the distance as archers," i. e., as far as archers are accustomed to place the target (K. and D., Com.).

BOX (Heb. תֵּבָה, pak, 2 Kings 9:1, 3; Gr. ἀλάβαστρον, al-ab'-as-tro-n, Mark 14:3), a flask for holding oil or perfumery. The term "box" may have come into use because the flask was frequently inclosed in a box of wood or ivory.

BOX TREE. See VEGETABLE KINGDOM.

BOY (Heb. יָלֵד, yeh'-led, a young boy or child, Joel 3:3; Zech. 8:5; נַחֲרָר, nah'-ar, Gen. 25:27), a term used of those who are from the age of infancy to adolescence.

BO'ZEZ (Heb. בֹּזְזֵי, bo-tsates', shining). Between the passes through which Jonathan endeavored to cross over to go up to the post of the Philistines there was a sharp rock on this side, Bozez; and one upon the other, Senek (1 Sam. 14:4, 5). These rose up like pillars to a great height, and were probably the "hills" which Robinson saw to the left of the pass.

BOZ'KATH (Heb. בֹּזְכַת, bots-cath', swell of ground), a town "in the plain" of Judea, near Lachish and Eglon (Josh. 15:39), and the birthplace of Adaiah, maternal grandfather of King Josiah (2 Kings 22:1).

BOZ'RAH (Heb. בֹּזְרָה, bots-raw', inclosure, fortress).

1. A city of Edom, and residence of Jobab (Gen. 36:33; 1 Chron. 1:44). This is the Bozrah of Isa. 34:6; 63:1; Jer. 49:13, 22; Amos 1:12; Mic. 2:12. Dr. Thomson says the well-known passage in Isa. 63:1 is clear in its reference. "That place has been identified with el-Busaireh, or Little Busrah, as its name implies, in the mountainous district to the S. E. of the Dead Sea, and about eight miles S. of Tyfileh, the ancient Tophel."

2. A place in Moab (Jer. 48:24). Porter identifies it with Busrah, which lies in the open plain about sixty miles S. of Damascus. The vineyards are destroyed.

BRACELET, sometimes called armlet, because worn in such numbers as to reach from wrist to elbow, or because armlet may mean the ornament as worn by men only. Five Hebrew words are rendered "bracelet" in the A. V. Two of these may be set aside as not correctly translated: פָּרָתֵל, paw-theel', a band or cord, by which the signet ring was hung about the neck (Gen. 38:18, 25), קֶשֶׁת, khawkh, the hook or ring or clasp for fastening the garments of women (Exod. 35:22).

1. Shay-raw' (Heb. שָׁרָר, shay-raw'), chains, Isa. 8:19. "According to the Targum, these were chains worn upon the arm, or spangles upon the wrist, answering to the spangles upon the ankles" (K. and D., Com.). Bracelets of fine twisted gold are still common in Egypt. Dr. Strong (Cyc., s. v.) thinks this was a bracelet of chain work worn only by women.

2. Tsaw-meed' (Heb. מַעֲבִיד, ma-ebid), literally, a fastener, Gen. 24:22, 30, 47; Num. 31:50; Ezek. 16:11. This was worn by both men and women.

3. Ets-aw-daw' (Heb. אֶתְסָדָּא, ets-sada'), properly ankle chain, 2 Sam. 1:10, where reference is made to the royal armlet taken by the Amalekite from the arm of the dead Saul.

That men as well as women wore bracelets is seen in Cant. 5:14, which may be rendered, "His wrists are circlets of gold full set with topazes." The armlet was worn by princes as one of the insignia of royalty, and by other distinguished persons. Among the Romans bracelets were given as a reward of great proress. These ornaments were often made with the ends joined, and formed a complete circle. They varied in material and number according to the ability and fancy of the wearer. Among the wealthy they were mother-of-pearl, of fine flexible gold, and more commonly of silver. The poorer class used steel, horn, copper, beads, and other cheap material.

BRAMBLE. See VEGETABLE KINGDOM.

BRANCH, the rendering of a number of Hebrew and Greek words. In the Scriptures, as well as elsewhere, the family is spoken of as a tree, and the members thereof as branches. From this has arisen a number of figurative expressions:

1. A branch is used as a symbol of prosperity (Gen. 49:22; Job 8:16; Prov. 11:28; Ezek. 17:6), and also of adversity (Job 15:32; Psa. 80:11, 15; Isa. 25:5).

2. "An abominable branch" (Isa. 14:19) may mean a branch withered, or a useless sucker starting from the root. The sentence might better be rendered, "But thou art cast out without a grave, like an offensive (i. e., useless) branch."

3. "The highest branch" (Ezek. 17:3) is applied to Jehoiachin as king. "They put the branch to their nose" (Ezek. 8:17) is very obscure as to its meaning. By some the act was thought to be expressive of contempt, similar to "they turn up the nose with scorn." Others understand a reference to the hypocrisy of the Jews who carried branches in honor of Jehovah but held them to the nose in scorn, outward worship but secret contempt. It may be that the branch was of a tree dedicated to Baal, and carried by them in his honor. The saying appears to be a proverbial one, but the origin and meaning have not yet been satisfactorily explained.

4. Christ the Branch. A branch is the symbol of kings descended from royal ancestors; and, in conformity with this way of speaking, Christ, in respect of his human nature, is called "a root out of the stem of Jesse, and a branch . . . out of his roots" (Isa. 11:1; Jer. 23:5; Zech. 3:8; 6:12). Christians are called branches of Christ, the Vine, with reference to their union with him (John 15:5, 6).

BRAND, in Zech. 3:2 (Heb. 778, ood), means a wooden poker with which the fire is stirred; hence any burnt wood, a firebrand (also Amos 4:11; Isa. 7:4). In Judg. 15:5 (Heb. 772, lap-peed', in v. 4 "firebrand") it is a lamp or torch, and so rendered elsewhere.

BRASS. See MINERAL KINGDOM.

BRAVERY. See GLOSSARY.

BRAY. 1. Naw-hak' (Heb. 777), a loud, harsh cry of an ass when hungry (Job 6:5). It is used figuratively of the cry of persons when hungry (Job 30:7).

2. Kaw-thash' (Heb. 777), to pound as in a mortar (Prov. 27:22). Such a punishment is said to be still in use among the oriental nations.

BRAZEN. See MINERAL KINGDOM.

BRAZEN SEA. See LAVER.

BRAZEN SERPENT (Heb. 777, nek-kh'ash', nek-kh'ash', nek-kh'ash', serpent of copper). As the Israelites "journeyed from Mount Hor by the way of the Red Sea" they rebelled against God and against Moses. Punished by Jehovah with fiery serpents (q. v.), many of them died. At the command of God Moses made the figure of a serpent and set it upon a pole. Whoever of the bitten ones looked at it "lived," i. e., recovered from the serpent's bite (Num. 21:1-9). This brazen serpent afterward became an object of worship, under the name Nehushtan, and was destroyed by King Hezekiah (2 Kings 18:4).

Figurative. From the words of our Lord (John 3:14) most commentators have rightly inferred that the "brazen serpent" was intended as a type of Christ as the Redeemer of the world.

BREACH. See GLOSSARY.

BREAD (Heb. 777, lekh'-em; Gr. âpros, ar'-tos). The word "bread" in the Bible is used in a very wide sense, often occurring as our "food," as in the petition, "Give us this day our daily bread." In strictness it denotes baked food, especially loaves. Its earliest reference is found in Gen. 18:5, 6.

1. Material. The best bread was made of wheat, called "flour" or "meal" (Judg. 6:19; 1 Sam. 1:24; 1 Kings 4:22, etc.); and when sifted the "fine flour" (Gen. 18:6; Lev. 2:1). A coarser bread was made of barley (Judg. 7:18; John 6:9-13). Millet, spelt, beans, and lentils were also used (Ezek. 4:9-12).

2. Preparation. To make "leavened bread"

(Heb. מַצֵּה, khaw-mates', sour) the flour was mixed with water, kneaded on a small kneading trough, with leaven added. These kneading troughs may have been mere pieces of leather, such as are now used by the Arabs, although the expression "bound up in their clothes" (Exod. 12:34) favors the idea of a wooden bowl. The leavened mass was allowed time to rise (Matt. 13:33; Luke 13:21), sometimes a whole night (Hos. 7:6, "their baker sleepeth all the night"). When the time for making bread was short the leaven was omitted, and unleavened cakes were baked, as is customary among the Arabs (Gen. 18:6; 19:3; Exod. 12:39; 1 Sam. 28:24). Such cakes were called in Heb. מַצֵּה, mats-saw', sweetness.

Thin round cakes made of unleavened dough were baked on heated sand or flat stones (1 Kings 19:6), by hot ashes or coals put on them—"ash-cakes" (Gen. 19:3; Exod. 12:39, etc.). Such cakes are still the common bread of the Bedouins and poorer Orientals. On the outside it is, of course, black as coal, but tastes well.

Old bread is described in Josh. 9:5, 12, as crumbled (Heb. נֶקֶד, nik-kood', a crumb; A. V. "moldy"), a term also applied to a sort of easily crumbling biscuit (A. V. "cracknels").

"From flour there were besides many kinds of confectionery made: (a) Oven-baked, sometimes perforated cakes kneaded with oil, sometimes thin, flat cakes only smeared with oil; (b) pancakes made of flour and oil, and sometimes baked in the pan, sometimes boiled in the skillet in oil, which were also presented as meat offerings; (c) honey cakes (Exod. 16:31), raisin or grape cakes (Hos. 3:1; Cant. 2:5; 2 Sam. 6:19; 1 Chron. 16:3), and heart cakes, kneaded from dough, sodden in the pan and turned out soft, a kind of pudding (2 Sam. 13:6-9). . . . The various kinds of baked delicacies and cakes had, no doubt, become known to the Israelites in Egypt, where baking was carried to great perfection" (Keil, Arch., ii, 126).

3. Baking. When the dough was ready for baking it was divided into round cakes (literally, circles of bread; A. V. "loaves," Exod. 29:23; Judg. 8:5; 1 Sam. 10:3, etc.), not unlike flat stones in shape and appearance (Matt. 7:9; comp. 4:3), about a span in diameter and a finger's breadth in thickness. The baking was generally done by the wife (Gen. 18:6), daughter (2 Sam. 13:8), or a female servant (1 Sam. 8:13). As a trade, baking was carried on by men (Hos. 7:4, 6), often congregating, according to Eastern custom, in one quarter (Jer. 37:21, "bakers' street," Neh. 3:11; 12:38, "tower of the ovens;" A. V. "furnaces").

4. Egyptian Bread-making. The following account of early bread-making is very interesting: "She spread some handfuls of grain upon an oblong slab of stone, slightly hollowed on its upper surface, and proceeded to crush them with a smaller stone like a painter's muller, which she moistened from time to time. For an hour and more she labored with her arms, shoulders, loins, in fact, all her body; but an indifferent result followed from such great exertion. The flour, made to undergo several grindings in this rustic mortar, was coarse, uneven, mixed with bran or whole grains, which had escaped the pestle, and contaminated with dust and abraded particles of the stone. She kneaded it with a little water, blended with it, as a sort of yeast, a piece of stale dough of the day before, and made from the mass round cakes, about half an inch thick and some four inches in diameter, which she placed upon a flat flint, covering them with hot ashes. The bread, imperfectly raised, often badly cooked, borrowed, from the organic fuel under which it was buried, a special odor, and a taste to which strangers did not sufficiently accustom themselves. The impurities which it contained were sufficient in the long run to ruin the strongest teeth. Eating it was an action of grinding rather than chewing, and old men were not infrequently met with whose teeth had gradually been worn away to the level of the gums, like those of an aged ass or ox" (Maspero, Dawn of Civ., p. 320).

5. Figurative. The thin cakes already described were not cut but broken, hence the expression usual in Scripture of "breaking bread," to signify taking a meal (Lam. 4:4; Matt. 14:19; 15:36).

From our Lord's breaking bread at the institution of the Eucharist, the expression, "breaking of," or "to break bread," in the New Testament is used for the Lord's Supper (Matt. 26:26), and for the agape, or love feast (Acts 2:46).

"Bread of affliction" (Heb. לֶחֶם מַצֵּה, lekh'-em lakh'-ats). "To give to eat of the bread of affliction" (literally penury) signifies to put one on the low rations of a siege or imprisonment (1 Kings 22:27; Isa. 30:20).

"Bread of sorrows" (Heb. לֶחֶם עֵצְבוֹן, lekh'-em its-tsan-bone', literally, "bread of labors," Psa. 127:2) means food obtained by toil.

"Bread of tears" (Heb. לֶחֶם דִּמְעָה, lekh'-em dim-aw', Psa. 80:5) probably signifies a condition of great sorrow.

"Bread of wickedness" (Prov. 4:17) and "bread of deceit" (Prov. 20:17) denote not only living or estate obtained by fraud, but that to do evil is as much the portion of the wicked as to eat his bread.

"Cast thy bread upon the waters" (Eccles. 11:1) is doubtless an allusion to the custom of sowing seed by casting it from boats into the overflowing waters of the Nile, or in any marshy ground. From v. 1 it is evident that charity is inculcated, and that, while seemingly hopeless, it shall prove at last not to have been thrown away (Isa. 32:20).

"Bread of God" (Lev. 21:6, 8, 17, 21, 22; 22:25). "Not only are the daily burnt offerings and the burnt and sin offerings of the different feasts called 'food of Jehovah' ('my bread,' Num. 28:2), but the sacrifices generally are described as 'the food of God,' as food, i. e., which Israel produced and caused to ascend to its God in fire as a sweet-smelling savor" (K. and D., Com., Lev. 3:6-16).

BREAST (Heb. שֵׁד, shad, or שֵׁד, shode, to moisten, Job 24:9; Isa. 60:16; Lam. 4:3; חֶזֶה, khaw-zeh', the part seen, in frequent use; חֶדֶי, khad-ee', Dan. 2:32; also Gr. σπίθλος, stay'-thos, prominent). Among females of the East a full and swelling breast was considered a type of beauty (Cant. 8:10).

The waving of the breast of the animal offered in sacrifice (Lev. 7:30) is thought to be typical of offering the affections and service of the worshiper to God.

BREECHES. See PRIEST, DRESS OF.

BRETHREN. See BROTHER.

BRIBE, BRIBERY (Heb. בָּרִיבָה, ko'fer, redemption money).

1. A payment made by a man to redeem himself from capital punishment. The expression, "Of whose hand have I received any bribe to blind mine eyes therewith?" (1 Sam. 12:3), means, "Of whom have I taken anything to exempt from punishment one worthy of death?"

2. (Heb. שְׁחָדָה, sho'khad, gift.) A present to avert punishment (2 Kings 16:8; Prov. 6:35), or a bribe taken to pervert justice (1 Sam. 8:3; Ezek. 22:12, A. V. "gifts").

BRICK (Heb. לִבְנָה, leb-ay-naw', from לָבַן, to be white, from the whiteness of the clay out of which bricks were made; rendered "tile" in Ezek. 4:1). The earliest mention made of bricks in Scripture is in the account of the building of Babel (Gen. 11:3). In Exodus (ch. 5) we have the vivid description of the grievous hardship imposed upon the Israelites in making of bricks in Egypt.

1. Babylonian. The following account taken from Maspero (Dawn of Civilization, pp. 622, 623) will probably answer for all the countries of the East: "In the estimation of the Chaldean architects stone was a matter of secondary consideration. As it was necessary to bring it from a great distance and at considerable expense, they used it very sparingly, and then merely for lintels, thresholds, for hinges on which to hang their doors, for dressings in some of their state apartments, in cornices or sculptured friezes on the external walls of their buildings; and even then its employment suggested rather that of a band of embroidery carefully disposed on some garment to relieve the plainness of the material. Crude brick, burnt brick, enameled brick, but always and everywhere brick was the principal element in their construction. The soil of the marshes or of the plains, separated from the pebbles and foreign substances which it contained, mixed with grass or chopped straw, moistened with water, and assiduously trodden under foot, furnished the ancient builders with material of incredible tenacity. This was molded into thin, square brick, eight inches to a foot across and three or four inches thick, but rarely larger. They were stamped on the flat side, by means of an incised wooden block, with the name of the reigning sovereign, and were then dried in the sun. They were sometimes enameled with patterns of various colors." The Babylonian bricks were more commonly burned in kilns than those used at Nineveh, which are chiefly sun-dried like the Egyptian.

2. Egyptian. Egyptian bricks were not generally baked in kilns, but dried in the sun, although a brickkiln is mentioned by Jeremiah (43:9). Made of clay, they are, even without straw, as firm as when first put up in the reigns of Amunoph and Thothmes, whose names they bear.

When made of the Nile mud they required straw to keep them from falling apart, and when laid up in walls were secured by layers of sticks and reeds. In size they varied from 20 or 17 inches to 14 1/4 inches long, 8 3/4 inches to 6 1/2 inches wide, and 7 inches to 4 1/2 inches thick. See SUPPLEMENT.

An Egyptian Brick.

Brickmaking was regarded as an unhealthy and laborious occupation by the Egyptians, and was, therefore, imposed upon slaves. Very naturally, the Hebrews, when enslaved by the Pharaohs, were put to this work. The use of brick as building material was, doubtless, quite general, although their friable nature often insured early decay. We have illustrations of walls, temples, storehouses, and temples having been built of bricks. "About twelve miles from Ismailia, in Wady Tumilat, are the remains of a thick wall built of large bricks. Among other things found was a square area, inclosed by enormous brick walls, containing a space of about fifty-five thousand square yards. This space contained the ruins of a temple. . . . Then came strange buildings of thick walls of crude brick joined by thin layers of mortar. These were the undoubted storehouses or granaries in which the Pharaohs stored the provisions necessary for armies about to cross the desert. . . . Inscriptions found prove undoubtedly that these 'cities' were built by Rameses II—the Pharaoh of the oppression" (Harper, Bible and Mod. Dis., p. 75).

3. Jewish. The Jews learned the art of brick-making in Egypt, using almost the identical method. Even now in Palestine, says Major Conder, "the bricks are made in spring by bringing down water into ditches dug in the clay, when chopped straw is mixed with the mud; thence the soft mixture is carried in bowls to a row of wooden molds or frames, each about ten inches long by three inches across. These are laid out on flat ground, and are squeezed full, the clay being left to harden in the sun."

Mention is made of the brickkiln in the time of David (2 Sam. 12:31; comp. Nah. 3:14), and Isaiah complains (65:3) that the people built their altars of brick, instead of stone, as the law directed (Exod. 20:26).

BRIDAL GIFT. See MARRIAGE.

BRIDE, BRIDEGROOM. See MARRIAGE.

Figurative. The Church is alluded to (Rev. 21:9) as "the bride, the Lamb's wife." The meaning is that as the bridegroom rejoices over the bride, so the Lord shall forever rejoice in his people and his people in him. Christ himself is also called "the bridegroom" in the same sense (John 3:29).

The figure, under various and extended forms, is frequently used in the Old Testament to denote the union between Jehovah and the Jewish nation.

BRIDECHAMBER (Gr. νυμφών, noom-fohn'). See MARRIAGE.

BRIDEMAID, BRIDEMAN. See MARRIAGE.

BRIDGE. The only mention of a bridge in the canonical Scriptures is indirectly in the proper name GESHUR (q. v.), (Heb. גֶּשׁוּר, geshur, bridge). A bridge still exists at this place, called "Jacob's Bridge." Remains of bridges over the Jordan and other rivers of Syria still exist. The bridge connecting the temple with the upper city (Josephus, War, vi, 6, 2) was probably an arched viaduct.

BRIDLE (Heb. רֶסֶן, reh'-sen, a curb, halter, Job 30:11; 41:13; Isa. 30:28; מִרְהָג, meh'-theg, strictly the bit, as rendered in Psa. 32:9; מִדְּחֹסֶרֶם, makh-sohm', a muzzle, only in Psa. 39:1; Gr.

refractory slaves (see Isa. 37:29). Prisoners of war were similarly treated. One of the Assyrian sculptures represents prisoners with a ring in the lower lip, to which is attached a thin cord held by the king (2 Kings 19:28).

Figurative. The providence of God in leading men and nations away from the completion of their plans is symbolized by the "bride" and "hook" (2 Kings 19:28; Isa. 30:28; 37:29; Ezek. 29:4). The restraints of law and humanity are called a bridle, and to "let loose the bridle" (Job 30:11) is to act without reference to these.

BRIER. See VEGETABLE KINGDOM.

BRIGANDINE. See GLOSSARY.

BRIM. 1. The edge or brink of water (Josh. 3:15; Heb. קַיִץ, kav-tseh').

2. The upper edge or rim of a vessel (1 Kings 7:23, sq.; 2 Chron. 4:2, sq.; Heb. שֵׁפָר, saw-faw', lip; Gr. ἀνω, an'-o, top, John 2:7).

BRIMSTONE (Heb. בְּרִיתִי, gof-reeth', properly resin; Gr. θείον, thi'-on, flashing). The Hebrew word is connected with gopher (Heb. גֹּפֶרֶת, gopher), and probably meant the gum of that tree. It was thence transferred to all inflammable substances, especially sulphur (q. v.). The cities of the plain were destroyed by a storm of fire and brimstone (Gen. 19:24).

Figurative. Apparently with reference to Sodom, brimstone is often used in Scripture to denote punishment and destruction (Deut. 29:23; Job 18:15; Psa. 11:6; Isa. 30:33; Ezek. 38:22; Luke 17:29; Rev. 9:17, etc.).

BRINK, otherwise rendered BRIM (q. v.).

BROIDERED, the rendering of the Heb. רִיקְמָוּה, rik-maw', variegated work (Ezek. 16:10, sq.; 26:16; 27:7, 16, etc.). Once (Exod. 28:4) we have the Heb. בָּצֵבִים, tash-bates', checkered stuff. See EMBROIDERY.

The "broidered hair" of 1 Tim. 2:9 (Gr. πλεγμα, pleg'-mah, twist) refers to the fashionable manner of the Roman ladies of wearing the hair plaited and fixed with criping-pins (comp. 1 Pet. 3:3).

BROKEN-FOOTED, BROKEN-HANDED. See PRIEST, QUALIFICATIONS OF.

BROOK (Heb. generally נַחַל, nakh'-al; Gr. χείμαρος, khei'-marhos, a torrent).

1. A small stream, issuing from a subterranean spring and running through a deep valley, as the Arnon, Jabbok, Kidron, etc.

2. Winter streams arising from rains, but drying up in the summer (Job 6:15).

3. The torrent bed, even though it be without water; so that it is sometimes doubtful whether the bed or stream is meant. The word is sometimes rendered "river," as in the case of the χαλινός, khal-ee-nos', bit, James 3:2; Rev. 14:20). The word bridle is used for that portion of the harness by which the driver controls the horse, and consists of the headstall, bit, and reins (Psa. 32:9). The Assyrians ornamented their bridles to a high degree.

It was customary to fix a muzzle of leather on brook of Egypt, a small torrent in the southern border of Palestine (Num. 34:5; Josh. 15:4, 47).

Figurative. "My brethren have dealt deceitfully as a brook," etc. (Job 6:15), is an expression of the failure of friends to comfort and help.

BROTH (Heb. מַרְרָה, maw-rawk', soup, Judg. 6:19, 20; פֶּרֶץ, paw-rawk', to crumble), so-called from the fragments or crumbs of bread over which the liquid is poured. "Broth of abominable things" (Isa. 65:4) means "a decoction or broth made either of such kinds of flesh or such parts of the body as were forbidden by the law" (K. and D., Com., in loc.).

BROTHER (generally Heb. אָח, awkh; Gr. ἀδελφός, ad-el-fos').

1. Meanings. Brother is a word extensively and variously used in Scripture. (1) A brother in the natural sense, whether the child of the same father and mother (Gen. 42:4; 44:20; Luke 6:14), of the same father only (Gen. 42:15; 43:3; Judg. 9:21; Matt. 1:2; Luke 3:1, 19), or of the same mother only (Judg. 8:19). (2) A relative, kinsman, in any degree of blood, e. g., a nephew (Gen. 14:16; 29:12, 15) or a cousin (Matt. 12:46; John 7:3; Acts 1:14, etc.). (3) One of the same tribe (Num. 8:26; 18:7; 2 Kings 10:13; Neh. 3:1). (4) A fellow-countryman (Judg. 14:3; Exod. 2:11; 4:18; Matt. 5:47; Acts 3:22, etc.), or one of a kindred nation, e. g., the Edomites and Hebrews (Gen. 9:25; 16:12; 25:18; Num. 20:14). (5) An ally, confederate, spoken of allied nations as the Hebrews and Tyrians (Amos 1:9), or those of the same religion (Isa. 66:20; Acts 9:30; 1 Cor. 5:11; 11:2), probably the name by which the early converts were known until they were called "Christians" at Antioch (Acts 11:26). (6) A friend, associate, as of Job's friends (6:15; see also 19:13; Neh. 5:10, 14), of Solomon, whom Hiram calls his brother (1 Kings 9:18). (7) One of equal rank and dignity (Matt. 23:8). (8) One of the same nature, a fellow-man (Gen. 13:8; Matt. 5:22, sq.; Heb. 2:17). (9) It is applied in the Hebrew to inanimate things, as of the cherubim it is said, "their faces one to another" (Exod. 25:20; 37:9; literally, a man his brother). (10) Disciples, followers (Matt. 25:40; Heb. 2:11, 12).

2. Figurative. As likeness of disposition, habits, Job says (30:29), "I am a brother to dragons" (literally, jackals), i. e., I cry and howl like them. Among the Proverbs (18:9) is one which says, "He also that is slothful in his work is brother to him that is a great waster." The Jewish schools distinguish between a "brother" (i. e., an Israelite by blood) and "neighbor" (a proselyte). The Gospel extends both terms to all the world (1 Cor. 6:11; Luke 10:29, 30).

BROTHERLY KINDNESS (Gr. φιλαδελφία, fil-ad-el-fee-ah, 2 Pet. 1:7) is rendered "brotherly love" (Rom. 12:10; 1 Thess. 4:9; Heb. 13:1), "love of the brethren" (1 Pet. 1:22). It is affection for our brethren, in the broad meaning of which word the Scriptures include our neighbors by all mankind, not excluding our enemies. We are not required to bestow equal love upon all, or recognize all as possessing an equal claim to it. It does not make men blind to the qualities of their fellows. While it requires obedience to the golden rule, a special and warmer love for our brethren in Christ is enjoined. Brotherly love requires the best construction of a neighbor's conduct, effort, and sacrifice for others, and forgiveness of injuries. See CHARITY.

BROTHERLY LOVE. See BROTHERLY KINDNESS.

BROTHERS OF OUR LORD. In Matt. 13:55 "James, and Joses, and Simon, and Judas" are named as the brothers of Jesus, while sisters are mentioned in v. 56. The sense in which the terms "brothers and sisters" is to be taken has been a matter of great discussion, some contending that they are to be regarded in their literal sense, others in the more general sense of relations. Several theories in support of the latter view have been advanced:

1. That they were our Lord's first cousins, the sons of Alphæus (or Clopas) and Mary, the sister of the Virgin. Against this view it is urged that there is no mention anywhere of cousins or kinsmen of Jesus according to the flesh, although the term cousin (Gr. ἀνεψιός) is well known in New Testament vocabulary (Col. 4:10); also the more exact term "sister's son" (νιός ἀδελφῆς, Acts 23:16); also "kinsman" (συγγενής) occurs eleven times (Mark 6:4; Luke 1:36, 58; John 18:26; Acts 10:24; Rom. 9:3, etc.). Thus it seems strange that if the brothers of our Lord were merely cousins they were never called such.

Again, if his cousins only were meant, it would not be true that "neither did his brethren believe on him" (John 7:5, sq.), for in all probability three of the four (viz., James the Less, Simon, and Jude) were apostles.

2. That they were sons of Joseph by a former marriage with a certain Escha, or Salome, of the tribe of Judah. The only ground for its possibility is the apparent difference of age between Joseph and the Virgin.

3. That they were the offspring of a levirate marriage between Joseph and the wife of his deceased brother, Clopas. This, however, is a mere hypothesis.

The arguments for their being the full brothers of Jesus are numerous, and, taken collectively, are very strong. (1) The words "firstborn son" (Luke 2:7) appear to have been used with reference to later born children. (2) The declaration that Joseph "knew her not till she had brought forth her firstborn son" (Matt. 1:25) does not necessarily establish the perpetual virginity of Mary. We must remember that "the evangelist employed the term 'firstborn' as an historian, from the time when his gospel was composed, and consequently could not have used it had Jesus been present to his historical consciousness as the only son of Mary. But Jesus, according to Matthew (12:46, sq.; 13:55, sq.), had also brothers and sisters, among whom he was the firstborn" (Meyer, Com., on Matt. 1:25). (3) They are constantly spoken of with the Virgin Mary, and with no shadow of a hint that they were not her children. The mother is mentioned at the same time (Mark 3:31; Luke 8:19; John 2:12; Acts 1:14), just as in Matt. 13:55 the father and sisters are likewise mentioned along with him.

BROTHER'S WIFE (Heb. בְּרִיּוֹתָי, yeb-ay'-meth, Deut. 25:7; "sister-in-law," Ruth 1:15). See MARRIAGE, LEVIRATE.

BROW (Heb. מִצְחָא, may'-tsakh, clear, conspicuous), the forehead (Isa. 48:4); Gr. ὀφρύς, of-roos', brink, the edge of a hill (Luke 4:29).

BROWN (Heb. חֹרִים, khoom; literally, scorched), the term applied to dark-colored (black) sheep (Gen. 30:32-40). See COLORS.

BRUISED, the rendering of at least eleven Hebrew and Greek words, is used in Scripture in a figurative sense. Thus Satan is said to bruise the heel of Christ (Gen. 3:15), i. e., to afflict the humanity of Christ, and to bring suffering and persecution on his people. The serpent's poison is in his head, and a wound in that part is fatal. So Christ is said to bruise the head of Satan when he crushes his designs, despoils him of his power, and enables his people to rise superior to temptation (Rom. 16:20). Our Lord was bruised when he had inflicted upon him the punishment due to our sins (Isa. 53:5, 10). The king of Egypt is called a "bruised reed" (2 Kings 18:21), to mark his weakness and inability to help those trusting in him. Weak Christians are bruised reeds, which Christ will not break (Isa. 42:3; Luke 4:18).

BRUIT. See GLOSSARY.

BRUTISH (Heb. בָּוֶר, bau-ar', to consume by fire or eating), a term applied to one whose mental and moral perceptions are dulled by ignorance (Prov. 12:1), idolatry (Jer. 10:8, 14, 21, etc.). "The word must be explained from Psa. 92:6, 'brutish,' foolish, always bearing in mind that the Hebrew associated the idea of godlessness with folly, and that cruelty naturally follows in its train" (Keil, Com., on Ezek. 21:31).

BUCK. See ANIMAL KINGDOM (art. ROEBUCK).

BUCKET (Heb. דֹּלֵעַ, dol-ee', or דֹּלֵעָה, dol-ee'), a vessel with which to draw water (Isa. 40:15). In John 4:11 the Greek word ἀντλημα is used.

Figurative. Bucket is used (Num. 24:7) for abundance, as water is the leading source of prosperity in the burning East. The nation is personified as a man carrying two buckets overflowing with water.

BUCKLER. See ARMOR; GLOSSARY.

BUFFET (Gr. κολαφίζω, kol-af-id'-zo, to strike with the fist), rude maltreatment in general, whether in derision (Matt. 26:67; Mark 14:65), affliction (1 Cor. 4:11), opposition (2 Cor. 12:7), or punishment (1 Pet. 2:20).

BUILDING (Heb. בְּנָה, bau-naw', to build; Gr. οἰκοδομέω, oy-kod-om-el'-o). See ARCHITECTURE, HOUSE.

Figurative. "To build" is used with reference to children, and a numerous progeny (Ruth 4:11; 2 Sam. 7:27); and to the founding of a family. The Church is called a building (1 Cor. 3:9, etc.); and the resurrection body of the Christian is denominated a building in contrast to a tent, symbolical of this mortal body (1 Cor. 5:1).

BUK'KI (Heb. בֹּקֵי, book-kee', waster).

1. The son of Jogli, and chief of the tribe of Dan, appointed by Moses as one of the commission to divide the inheritance among the tribes (Num. 34:22), B. C. about 1170.

2. The son of Abihshua and father of Uzzi, being great-great-grandson of Aaron (1 Chron. 6:5, 51), B. C. after 1210.

BUKKI'AH (Heb. בֻּקֵי־אֵה, book-kee-yaw', wasted by Jehovah), a Kohathite Levite, of the sons of Heman, the leader of the sixth band, or course, in the temple music service. The band consisted of himself and eleven of his kindred (1 Chron. 25:4, 18), B. C. 1000.

BUL, the eighth ecclesiastical month of the Jewish year (1 Kings 6:38). See TIME.

BULL. See ANIMAL KINGDOM.

Figurative. In this sense bull represents powerful, fierce, and insolent enemies (Psa. 22:12; 68:30; Isa. 34:7).

BULLOCK. See ANIMAL KINGDOM.

BULRUSH. See VEGETABLE KINGDOM.

BULWARK, the rendering of several Hebrew words:

1. Khale (חַיִל), literally, strength (2 Kings 18:17; Isa. 26:1, an intrenchment; חַיִל־כַּיִל, khay-law', in Psa. 48:13).

2. Maw-tsore' (מַצֹּרֶת), literally, straitness (Deut. 20:20), probably a mound erected by besiegers. In Eccles. 9:14 the word is מַצֹּרֶת, maw-sode'.

3. Pin-naw' (פִּנְנָה), pinna, or turret (2 Chron. 28:15).

Bulwarks in Scripture appear to have been rural towers, answering the purpose of the modern bastion. They were usually erected at certain distances along the walls, generally at the corners, and upon them were placed the military engines. See FORTIFICATIONS.

BUN'NAH (Heb. בִּנְיָה, boo-naw', discretion), the second of the sons of Jeremiah, the grandson of Pharez, the son of Judah (1 Chron. 2:25).

BUNCH, the rendering of several Hebrew words, as a bunch of hyssop (Exod. 12:22), a bunch of raisins (2 Sam. 16:1), the bunch of a camel (Isa. 30:6).

BUNDLE (Heb. צֶרֶר, tsar-ore', parcel; Gr. δεσμή, des-may'; πληθος, play'-thos, fullness), anything bound together, as a "bundle of myrrh" (Cant. 1:13), of "grain" (Matt. 13:30), of "sticks" (Acts 28:3). It is also used of money in a purse (Gen. 42:35).

Figurative. The speech of Abigail to David (1 Sam. 25:29) may be rendered, as in R. V., "The soul of my lord shall be bound in the bundle of the living," and the words seem to refer to the safer preservation of the righteous on the earth. The metaphor is taken from the custom of binding up valuable things in a bundle to prevent injury.

BUN'NI. 1. (Heb. בְּנֵי, boon-nee', built.) One of the Levites who made public prayer and confession (Neh. 9:4), and joined Nehemiah in the solemn covenant after the return from Babylon (ch. 10:15), B. C. 445.

2. (Heb. בִּנְיָה, boo-nee', built.) A Levite whose descendant, Shemaiah, was made an overseer of the temple after the captivity (Neh. 11:15), B. C. before 445.

BURDEN (Heb. נִשְׁבֵּר, mas-saw', a lifting up). This word is often used in the familiar meaning of a load. It has also frequently the meaning of an oracle from God; sometimes as a denunciation of evil (Isa. 13:1; Nah. 1:1), and also merely as a message, whether joyous or afflictive (Zech. 9:1; 12:1; Mal. 1:1).

BURIAL. See DEAD, THE.

BURNING. See PUNISHMENTS, p. 912.

BURNING. "Burning instead of beauty" (Isa. 3:24, viz., inflammation). "In Arabia the application of the cey with a red-hot iron plays a very important part in the medical treatment of both man and beast. You meet with many men who have been burned not only on their legs and arms, hut in their faces as well" (Wetstein). Burning thus appears to have been used as a symbol for disfigurement, as the contrary of beauty.

BURNING BUSH. See BUSH.

BURNT OFFERING, SACRIFICE. See SACRIFICES.

BURY, BURYING PLACE. See DEAD, THE; TOMB.

BUSH (Heb. סִבְיָה, sen-eh', bramble; Gr. βάρως, bat'-os), the burning bush, in which Jehovah manifested himself to Moses at Horeb (Exod. 3:2, etc.; Deut. 33:16; Mark 12:26; Acts 7:30, 35). This was probably the bramble. See SUPPLEMENT.

Figurative. The thornbush, in contrast with the more noble and lofty trees (Judg. 9:15), represented the Israelites in their humiliation as a people despised by the world. The burning bush represents Israel as enduring the fire of affliction, the iron furnace of Egypt (Deut. 4:20); chastened but not consumed (K. and D., Com., in loc.).

Bishop Patrick interprets the symbol thus: "This fire might be intended to show that God would there meet with the Israelites, and give them his law in fire and lightning, and yet not consume them."

The word שִׁבְיָה, see'-akh, shoot, in Job 30:4, 7, means shrubs in general; נָחַל-הָלֹלֶה, nah-hal-ole', in Isa. 7:19, pastures. See VEGETABLE KINGDOM.

BUSHEL. See METROLOGY, II.

BUSYBODY (Gr. περίεργος, per-ee'-er-gos, working around, 1 Tim. 5:13; περιεργάζουαι, per-ee-er-gad'-zom-ah-ee, to be overbusy, 2 Thess. 3:11; ἀλλοτριεπισκόπος, al-lot-ree-ep-is'-kop-os, one who supervises others' affairs, 1 Pet. 4:15), a meddling person, emphatically condemned in the above passages.

BUTLER (Heb. מַשְׂקֵה, marsh-keh'), a cup-bearer, as the word is rendered 2 Chron. 9:4, and an officer of honor in the royal household of Egypt (Gen. 40:1, 13). It was his duty to fill and bear the drinking vessel to the king. Nehemiah was cupbearer to King Artaxerxes (Neh. 1:11; 2:1).

BUTTER (Heb. חֶמֶן, khem-aw', grown thick). Although always rendered butter in the A. V., critics usually agree that the Hebrew word means curdled milk. Indeed, it is doubtful whether butter is meant in any passage except Deut. 32:14, "butter of kine," and Prov. 30:33, "the churning of milk bringeth forth butter." The other passages will apply better to curdled milk than to butter. The ancient method of making butter was, probably, similar to that followed by the modern Bedouins. The milk is put into a skin, the tanned hide of a whole goat; this skin is hung up on a light frame or between two poles, and pushed steadily from side to side till the butter is ready. "When the butter has come, they take it out, boil or melt it, and then put it into bottles made of goats' skins. In winter it resembles candied honey; in summer it is mere oil" (Thomson, Land and Book, i, 393).

BUZ (Heb. בּוּז, booz, contempt).

1. The second son of Nahor and Milcah (Gen. 22:21), B. C. about 1872. Elihu the Buzite, one of Job's friends, was doubtless a descendant of this Buz (Job 32:2).

2. The father of Jahdo, of the tribe of Gad (1 Chron. 5:14).

3. One of three tribes of northern Arabia. In Jer. 25:23 the following are mentioned: "Dedan, and Tema, and Buz, and all that are in the utmost corners." Orelli (Com.) renders, "all with clipped temple" (comp. 9:26); and adds, "The meaning is, that they shaved the chief hair all round, leaving only a tuft in the middle."

BU'ZI (Heb. בּוּזִי, boo-zee', a Buzite), a priest, father of Ezekiel the prophet (Ezek. 1:3), B. C. before 595.

BUZITE (Heb. בּוּזִי, boo-zee'), a term indicating the ancestry of Elihu, only found in Job 32:2, 6, "Elihu the son of Barachel the Buzite;" to which v. 2 adds, "of the kindred of Ram." In Gen. 22:21 Buz is son of Nahor and uncle of Aram. If we identify this Aram, son of Kemuel, with the Ram of Job (32:2), as the Ram of Ruth (4:19) becomes Aram (Matt. 1:3, 4; Luke 3:33), and as the Syrians, who are Aramites (Heb. אַרְמֵיִם, ar-am-meem') in 2 Kings 8:28; 9:15, are אַרְמֵיִם, har-ram-meem', in 2 Chron. 22:5, we shall think of Elihu as a descendant of Nahor. If we take "of the kindred of Ram" in a more general sense as meaning Aramæan, the relationship might still hold good, since in Gen. 31:24 Laban, the grandson of Nahor, is "the Syrian." To be sure, this Aram is not the Aram afterward known as Syria, but Aram-naharaim, or Mesopotamia (see Gen. 24:10), which was the Aram of the Assyrian kings. Here was an Aramæan population from an early date, as the Assyrian accounts testify.

This probable descent of Elihu from Nahor has led some to locate the events recorded in Job in the northeast, where Nahor lived. But in Jer. 25:23 Buz is associated with Tema and Dedan; and Jer. 49:8 and Ezek. 25:13 pointedly connect Tema and Dedan with Edom.

Delitzsch (Par., 307) compares Buz with the Arabian Bazu. To Bazu Esar-haddon, in preparation for the Egyptian campaign of 671 B. C., marched through the desert a distance of one hundred and eighty double hours (Tiele, Bab.-Assyr. Geschichte, p. 337). The double hour's march is estimated by Geikie (Hours with Bible, v. 74) at seven English miles. If we think this too rapid a rate for an army traversing an inhospitable desert, at any rate three hundred and sixty hours' march will carry the Assyrians well into Arabia.

If we were to suppose that Elihu was an Aramæan by birth but resident in the Edomite part of Arabia, it might account for the manner in which he stood apart from the rest of the speakers.

The doubt whether to connect Buz with the northeast or the southeast is connected with a like uncertainty in regard to the land of Uz. The name Uz is given to a son of Aram (Gen. 10:23), and also to a son of Nahor (22:21, A. V. "Huz"). But it was also the name of a grandson of Seir (Gen. 36:28). In Jer. 25:20 the land of Uz is mentioned between Egypt and Philistia, and in Lam. 4:21 the daughter of Edom dwells in the land of Uz. Smith (Bib. Dict., s. v. "Uz") places the land of Uz east, or southeast, of Palestine, adjacent to the Edomites of Mount Seir; but Gesenius (Heb. Lex., 12th ed., s. v. "צִיץ"), locates it in the east and northeast, about Trachonitis and Damascus. The cause of this apparent location may be that the Aramæans, in migrating, like the Hebrews, to the south and west, carried their personal and local names with them to their new homes.—W. H.

BY, BY AND BY. See GLOSSARY.

BYWAYS (Heb. בְּרֵחִים, o'-rakh, way, and בְּרֵחִים עֲקוּבִים, ak-al-kal, crooked). It is recorded (Judg. 5:6) that "in the days of Shamgar, . . . the highways were unoccupied, and the travelers walked through byways." These byways were paths and circuitous routes which turned away from the high roads. They were resorted to in order to escape observation and for safety.

BYWORD, the rendering of the following Hebrew words: מִלְלָה, mil-leh, word, discourse (Job 30:9); מַשָּׁוֶל, maw-shawl, proverb (Psa. 44:14), and מֶשֶׁל, mesh-ol (Job 17:6); שֵׁנ־עֵנָו, shen-ee-nav, sharp, and so a taunt (Deut. 28:37; 1 Kings 9:7; 2 Chron. 7:20; Jer. 24:9).

C

CAB, a Hebrew measure. See METROLOGY, II.

CAB'BON (Heb. כַּבּוֹן, kab-bone', hilly), a place in the "plain" of Judah (Josh. 15:40); possibly the same with Machbenah (1 Chron. 2:49); probably the heap of ruins called Kubeibeh, or Kebeibeh, "which must some time have been a strong fortification, and have formed the key to the central mountains of Judah" (V. de Velde), and lie S. of Beit-jibrin, and two and a half hours E. of Ajlan (Robinson, Pal., ii, p. 394).

CABIN (Heb. חֲנוּת, khaw-nooth', vault), a cell. In the East the prison often consisted of a pit (dungeon), with vaulted cells around it for the separate confinement of prisoners (Jer. 37:16).

CAB'UL (Heb. קַבּוּל, kaw-bool', perhaps sterile, worthless).

1. A city on the E. border of Asher, at its N. side (Josh. 19:27), probably identical with the village of Kabul, four hours S. E. of Acre.

2. A district of Galilee, containing twenty "cities," which Solomon gave to Hiram, king of Tyre, in return for services rendered in building the temple. When Hiram saw them he was so displeased that he said, "What cities (i. e., What sort of) are these which thou hast given me, my brother? And he called them the land of Cabul unto this day" (1 Kings 9:10-13). These cities were occupied chiefly by a heathen population, and were, probably, in a very bad condition. Or it may have been that, as the Phœnicians were a seafaring people, Hiram would prefer to have had coast cities than those inland.

CÆ'SAR, a name taken by—or given to—all the Roman emperors after Julius Cæsar. It was a sort of title, like Pharaoh, and as such is usually applied to the emperors in the New Testament, as the sovereigns of Judea (John 19:15; Acts 17:7). It was to him that the Jews paid tribute (Matt. 22:17; Luke 23:2), and to him that such Jews as were cives Romani had the right of appeal (Acts 25:11); in which case, if their cause was a criminal one, they were sent to Rome (Acts 25:12, 21). The Cæsars mentioned in the New Testament are Augustus (Luke 2:1), Tiberius (Luke 3:1; 20:22), Claudius (Acts 11:28), Nero (Acts 25:8). See each name.

CÆSAR'ÆA (Gr. Καῖσάρεια, kahee-sar'-i-a, in honor of Cæsar).

1. Cæsarea Palæstina (i. e., "Cæsarea of Palestine")—so called to distinguish it from Cæsarea Philippi—or simply Cæsarea, was situated on the coast of Palestine on the great road from Tyre to Egypt, and about half way between Joppa and Dora (Josephus, War, i, 21, 5). The distance from Jerusalem is given by Josephus (Ant., xiii, 11, 2; War, i, 3, 5) as six hundred stadia; the actual distance in a direct line is forty-seven English miles. Philip stopped at Cæsarea at the close of his preaching tour (Acts 8:40). Paul, to avoid Grecians who wished to kill him, was taken to Cæsarea for embarkation to Tarsus (9:30). Here dwelt Cornelius the centurion, to whom Peter came and preached (10:1, sq.; 11:11), and to this city HEROD (q. v.) resorted after the miraculous deliverance of Peter from prison (12:19). Paul visited Cæsarea several times later (18:22; 21:3, 16), and was sent thither by the Roman commander at Jerusalem to be heard by Felix (23:23, 33; 25:1, sq.); and from Cæsarea he started on his journey to Rome (27:1).

2. Cæsarea Philippi (Gr. Καῖσάρεια, kahee-sar'-i-a; Φιλίπποι, fil'-ip-poy), a town in the northern part of Palestine, about one hundred and twenty miles from Jerusalem, fifty from Damascus, and thirty from Tyre, near the foot of Mount Hermon. It was first a Canaanite sanctuary for the worship of Baal; perhaps Baal-hermon (Judg. 3:3; 1 Chron. 5:23). It was called by the Greeks Paneas, because of its cavern, which reminded them of similar places dedicated to the worship of the god Pan. In 20 B. C. Herod the Great received the whole district from Augustus, and dedicated a temple to the emperor. Herod Philip enlarged it and called it Cæsarea Philippi, to distinguish it from his father's on the seacoast. It was the northern limit of Christ's travels in the Holy Land (Matt. 16:13; Mark 8:27). The site of Cæsarea is called Banias, a paltry village.

CAGE (Heb. כְּלִי, kel-oo'), a trap to catch birds (Jer. 5:27); also (Gr. φυλακή, foo-lak-ay', guarding), a prison (Rev. 18:2).

CALAPHAS (Gr. Καϊάφας, kah-ee-af'-as, perhaps from Chald. נֶפֶץ, kay-faw', depression), a surname, the original name being Joseph (Josephus, Ant., xviii, 2, 2); but, the surname becoming his ordinary and official designation, it was used for the name itself. Caiaphas was the high priest of the Jews in the reign of Tiberius Cæsar, at the no power to inflict the punishment of death, Christ was taken to Pilate, the Roman governor, that his execution might be duly ordered (Matt. 26:3, 57; John 18:13, 28). The bigoted fury of Caiaphas exhibited itself also against the first efforts of the apostles (Acts 4:6, sq.). What became of Caiaphas after his deposition is not known.

NOTE.—"Annas and Caiaphas being the high priests" (Luke 3:2). Some maintain that Annas and Caiaphas then discharged the functions of the high priesthood by turns; but this is not reconcilable with the statement of Josephus. Others think that Caiaphas is called high priest because he then actually exercised the functions of the office, and that Annas is so called because he formerly filled the situation. But it does not thus appear why, of those who held the priesthood before Caiaphas, Annas in particular should be named, and not others who had served the office more recently than Annas. Meyer (Com., in loc.) says: "Annas retained without very weighty influence (John 18:12, sq.), so that not only did he continue to be called by the name, but, more-beginning of our Lord's public ministry (Luke 3:2), and also at the time of his condemnation and crucifixion (Matt. 26:3, 57, etc.). He was appointed to this dignity through the curator, Valerius Gratus (probably A. U. C. 770-788 or 789, Meyer, Com., on Luke), and held it during the whole procuratorship of Pontius Pilate, but was deposed by the proconsul Vitellus, A. D. about 38. He was the son-in-law of Annas, with whom he is coupled by Luke (see NOTE). His wife was the daughter of Annas, or Ananus, who had formerly been high priest, and who still possessed great influence and control in sacerdotal matters. After the miracle of raising Lazarus from the dead Caiaphas advocated putting Jesus to death. His language on this occasion was prophetic, though not so designed: "Ye know nothing at all, nor consider that it is expedient for us, that one man should die for the people, and that the whole nation perish not" (John 11:49, 50). After Christ was arrested he was taken before Annas, who sent him to his son-in-law, Caiaphas, probably living in the same house. An effort was made to produce false testimony sufficient for his condemnation. This expedient failed; for, though two persons appeared to testify, they did not agree, and at last Caiaphas put our Saviour himself upon oath that he should say whether he was indeed the Christ, the Son of God, or not. The answer was, of course, in the affirmative, and was accompanied with a declaration of his divine power and majesty. The high priest pretended to be greatly grieved at what he considered the blasphemy of our Saviour's pretensions, and appealed to his enraged enemies to say if this was not enough. They answered at once that he deserved to die, but, as Caiaphas had over, he also partially discharged the functions of high priest." Edersheim (Life and Times of Jesus, 1, 264): "The conjunction of the two names of Annas and Caiaphas probably indicates that, although Annas was deprived of the pontificate, he still continued to preside over the Sanhedrin" (comp. Acts 4:6).

CAIN (Heb. קַיִן, kah'-yin, a lance).

1. The firstborn of the human race, and likewise the first murderer and fratricide, B. C. 4003 (?) His history is narrated in Gen. 4, and the facts are briefly these: (1) Sacrifice. Cain was the eldest son of Adam and Eve, and by occupation a tiller of the ground. Upon a time he and his brother offered a sacrifice to God, Cain of the fruit of the ground and Abel of the firstlings of his flock. Cain's temper and offering (being bloodless) were not acceptable, while Abel's received the divine approval. (2) Murder. At this Cain was angered, and, though remonstrated with by the Almighty, he fostered his revenge until it resulted in the murder of his brother. When God inquired of him as to the whereabouts of Abel he declared, "I know not," and sullenly inquired, "Am I my brother's keeper?" The Lord then told him that his crime was known, and pronounced a curse upon him and the ground which he should cultivate. Cain was to endure, also, the torments of conscience, in that the voice of his brother's blood would cry unto God from the ground. Fearful lest others should slay him for his crime, he pleaded with God, who assured him that vengeance sevenfold would be taken on anyone who should kill him. He also gave him "a sign," probably an assurance that his life should be spared. Cain became a fugitive, and journeyed into the land of Nod, where he built a city which he named after his son, Enoch. His descendants are named to the sixth generation, and appear to have reached an advanced stage of civilization, being noted for proficiency in music and the arts.

The New Testament references to Cain are Heb. 11:4, where it is recorded, "By faith Abel offered unto God a more excellent sacrifice than Cain;" 1 John 3:12; Jude 11.

2. A city of the low country of Judah (Josh. 15:57), possibly the same as Jukin, S. E. of Hebron.

CAINAN (Heb. קַיִנָּן, kay-nawn', fixed).

1. The son of Enos and great-grandson of Adam. He was born when his father was ninety years old, B. C. perhaps 3679. He lived seventy years, and begat Mahalaleel, after which he lived eight hundred and forty years (Gen. 5:9-14). His name is Anglicized Kenan in 1 Chron. 1:2.

2. The son of Arphaxad and father of Sala, according to Luke 3:35, 36, and usually called the second Cainan. He is nowhere found named in the Hebrew text, nor in any of the versions made from it, as the Samaritan, Chaldee, Syriac, Vulgate, etc. It is believed by many that the name was not originally in the text, even of Luke, but is an addition of careless transcribers from the Septuagint.

CAKE. See BREAD.

CALAH (Heb. כַּלְהַ, keh'-lakh, firm), one of the four cities named in Gen. 10:11, 12, which passage Sayce (Higher Crit., etc.) renders, "Out of that land he went forth into Assyria," etc. One of the most ancient of Assyrian cities, built by Shalmaneser I, B. C. 1300, and restored by Assurnatsir-pal, B. C. 883-858. "Calah lay a little further south (of Nineveh), at the junction of the Tigris and the Upper Zab, where the rubbish heaps of Nimrud conceal the ruins of its palace."

CALAMUS. See VEGETABLE KINGDOM.

CAL'COL, the fourth named of the five sons (or descendants) of Zerah (1 Chron. 2:6). Probably the same with CHALCOL (q. v.).

CALDRON, the rendering of several Hebrew words, all meaning a vessel for boiling flesh, either for domestic or ceremonial purposes (1 Sam. 2:14; 2 Chron. 35:13; Job 41:20; Jer. 52:18, 19; Ezek. 11:3, 7). Metallic vessels of this kind have been found in Egypt and Nimroud.

CAL'LEB (Heb. כַּלֵּב, kaw-labe', a dog).

1. The son of JEPHUNNEH (q. v.), the Kenezite, i. e., son of Kenaz (Keil), and chief of one of the families of Judah.

Personal History. (1) A spy. The first mention of Caleb was his appointment, at the age of forty years (Josh. 14:6, 7), as one of the twelve spies sent by Moses to explore Canaan (Num. 13:6, 17-25), B. C. 1209. (2) A faithful report, and results. On their return all the spies agreed respecting the preeminent goodness of the land, but differed in their advice to the people. While the ten others announced the inability of Israel to overcome the Canaanites, Caleb and Joshua spoke encouragingly. They admitted the strength and stature of the people, and the greatness of the walled cities, but were far from despairing. Caleb, stilling the people before Moses, exhorted them earnestly and boldly, "Let us go up at once and possess it; for we are well able to overcome it" (Num. 13:30). For this act of faithfulness, repeated the following day, Caleb and Joshua barely escaped being stoned by the people (Num. 14:10). Moses announced to the congregation, however, that they alone, of all the people over twenty years of age, should enter into the promised land, and in a plague that shortly followed the other spies died (Num. 14:26-38). A special promise was given to Caleb that he should enter the land which he had trodden upon, and that his seed should possess it (Num. 14:24). (3) In Canaan. We find no further mention of Caleb until about forty-five years after. The land was being divided, and he claimed the special inheritance promised by Moses as a reward of his fidelity. His claim was admitted, and Joshua added his blessing. Caleb, who at the age of eighty-five years was still as strong for war as when he was forty, drove out the Anakim from Hebron (Josh. 14:6-15; 15:14). He then attacked Debir, to the south of Hebron. This town must have been strong and very hard to conquer, for Caleb offered a prize to the conqueror, promising to give his daughter Achsah for a wife to anyone who should take it. Othniel, his younger brother (Keil, Com.), took the city and secured Achsah and a tract of land (Josh. 15:13-19). We have no further information respecting Caleb's life or death.

NOTE.—"There is no discrepancy between the accounts of the taking of Debir (Josh. 11:21, 22; 15:13-19). For the expulsion of its inhabitants by Joshua did not preclude the possibility of their returning when the Israelitish armies had withdrawn to the north" (Keil, Com.).

2. The last named of the three sons of Hezron (1 Chron. 2:18), of the descendants of Judah, in 1 Chron. 2:9, where he is called Chelubai. His sons by his first wife, Azubah, or JERIOTH (q. v.), were Jeshar, Shobab, and Ardon (v. 18). After her death he married Ephrath, by whom he had Hur (v. 19), and perhaps others (v. 50). He had also several children by his concubines, Ephah and Maachah (vers. 46, 48), B. C. about 1600.

3. The son of Hur and grandson of the preceding (1 Chron. 2:50). No further information is given respecting him, save a mention of his numerous posterity.

CALEB-EPH'RATAH (Heb. כַּלֵּב אֶפְרַתָּה, kaw-labe' ef'-raw'-thaw), only in 1 Chron. 2:24: "And after that Hezron was dead in Caleb-ephratah," etc. "The town or village in which Caleb dwelt with his wife Ephrath may have been called Caleb of Ephrathah, if Ephrath had brought this place as a dowry to Caleb (comp. Josh. 15:18). Ephrathah or Ephrath was the ancient name of Bethlehem, and with it the name Ephrath is connected, probably so called after her birthplace. If this supposition is well founded, then Caleb of Ephrathah would be the little town of Bethlehem" (Keil, Com.).

CALENDAR (Lat. calendarium, from calere, to call, because the priests called the people to notice that it was new moon), an ecclesiastical almanac, indicating the special days and seasons to be observed.

1. Chaldean. "Their years were vague years of three hundred and sixty days. The twelve equal months of which they were composed bore names which were borrowed, on the one hand, from events in civil life, such as 'Simanu,' from the making of brick, and 'Addaru,' from the sowing of seed, and, on the other, from mythological occurrences whose origin is still obscure, such as 'Nisanu,' from the altar of Ea, and 'Elul,' from a message of Ishtar. The adjustment of this year to astronomical demands was roughly carried out by the addition of a month every six years, which was called a second Adar, Elul, or Nisan, according to the place in which it was intercalated. The neglect of the hours and minutes in their calculation of the length of the year became with them, as with the Egyptians, a source of serious embarrassment, and we are still ignorant as to the means employed to meet the difficulty" (Maspero, Dawn of Civilization, p. 777).

2. Egyptian. "The first (astronomical) observatories established on the banks of the Nile seem to have belonged to the temples of the sun; the high priests of Râ . . . were actively employed from the earliest times in studying the configuration and preparing maps of the heavens. . . . In directing their eyes to the celestial sphere, Thot had at the same time revealed to men the art of measuring time, and the knowledge of the future. As he was the moon-god par excellence, he watched with jealous care over the divine eye which had been intrusted to him by Horus, and the thirty days, during which he was engaged in conducting it through all the phases of its nocturnal life, was reckoned as a month. Twelve of these months formed a year, a year of three hundred and sixty days, during which the earth witnessed the gradual beginning and ending of the circle of the seasons. The Nile rose, spread over the fields, sank again into its channel; the harvest followed the seedtime. These formed three distinct divisions of the year, each of equal duration. Thot made of them the three seasons, that of the waters, Shaît; that of vegetation, Pirût; of the harvest, Shômû, each composing four months, numbered one to four: the first, second, third, and fourth months of Shaît; the first, second, third, and fourth months of Pirût; the first, second, third, and fourth months of Shômû. The twelve months completed, a new year began, whose birth was heralded by the rising of Sothis in the early days of August. The first month of the Egyptian year thus coincided with the eighth of ours. Thot became its patron, and gave it his name, relegating each of the others to a special protecting divinity. . . . Official documents always designated the months by the ordinal number attached to them in each season, but the people gave them by preference the names of their tutelary deities, and these names, transcribed into Greek, and then into Arabic, are still used by the Christian inhabitants of Egypt, side by side with the Mussulman appellations. One patron for each month was, however, deemed not sufficient; each month was subdivided into three decades, over which presided as many decani, and the days themselves were assigned to genii appointed to protect them.

"The first year of three hundred and sixty days, regulated by the revolutions of the moon, did not long meet the needs of the Egyptian people; it did not correspond with the length of the solar year, for it fell short of it by five and a quarter days, and this deficit accumulating from twelvemonth to twelvemonth caused such a serious difference between the calendar reckoning and the natural seasons that it soon had to be corrected. They intercalated, therefore, after the twelfth month of each year and before the first day of the ensuing year, five epagomenal days, which they termed the 'five days over and above the year.'

"These days constituted, at the end of the 'gr' at year,' a 'little month,' which considerably lessened the difference between the solar and lunar computation, but did not entirely do away with it, and the six hours and a few minutes of which the Egyptians had not taken count gradually became the source of fresh perplexities. They at length amounted to a whole day, which needed to be added every four years to the regular three hundred and sixty days, a fact which was unfortunately overlooked. . . . The difficulty, at first only slight, increased with time, and ended by disturbing the harmony between the order of the calendar and that of natural phenomena. At the end of one hundred and twenty years the legal year had gained a whole month on the actual year, and the first of Thot anticipated the heliacal rising of Sothis by thirty days, instead of coinciding with it as it ought" (Maspero, ibid., p. 206, sq.).

3. Jewish. The Israelites divided their year according to natural phenomena exclusively, combining, therefore, the solar and lunar year. The months began with the new moon, but the first month was fixed (after the Exodus and by the necessities of the Passover) by the ripening of the earliest grain, viz., barley. The lunar month averaging twenty-nine and one half days, a year of twelve months of thirty and twenty-nine days alternately resulted; but this involved a variation of eleven and twenty-two days alternately in eighteen out of nineteen years. To reconcile this lunar year with the year of the seasons, a thirteenth month was inserted about once in three years. That the Jews had anciently calendars wherein were noted all the feasts, fasts, and days on which they celebrated any great event of their history is evident from Zecl. 8:19. Probably the oldest calendar is the Megillath Taanith ("volume of affliction"), said to have been drawn up in the time of John Hyrcanus, B.C. before 106. In the subjoined calendar it is assumed, as usual, that the first month of the Hebrew ecclesiastical year, Abib or Nisan, answers nearly to half March and half April; the earliest possible commencement of the lunar year being on our fifth of March. TAM'MUZ (Heb. תמוז, t a m - m o o z). Twenty-nine days; fourth of sacred, tenth of civil, year.	June-July.	fruits to Jerusalem (1 Kings 12:27). 25. Fast in memory of rabbins Simeon, Ishmael, and Chanina; feast in honor of judgment of Alexander the Great, in favor of Jews against Ishmaelites, who claimed Canaan. 27. Fast , Chanina being burned with books of law. 1. New moon. 14. Feast for abolition of a book of Sadducees and Bethusians, intended to subvert oral law and traditions. 17. Fast in memory of tables of law broken by Moses (Exod. 32:19); and taking of Jerusalem by Titus.	Hot season.	Wind usually N.W., also E., and khamseen from S. Air still and very clear; heat intense; heavy dews.	Wheat harvest on highest districts; various fruits ripe. Springs and vegetation generally dried up. Bedouins leave steppes for mountain pastures. Elsewhere, country parched, dry and hard—"a dreary waste of withered stalks and burned-up grass" ("stubble," A. V.).
AB (Heb. אב, awb , fruitful). Thirty days; fifth of sacred, eleventh of civil, year.	July-August.	1. New moon; fast for death of Aaron, commemorated by children of Jethuel, who furnished wood to temple after the captivity. 9. Fast in memory of God's declaration against murmurers entering Canaan (Num. 14:29-31). 18. Fast , because in the time of Abaz the evening lamp went out. 21. Feast when wood was stored in temple. 24. Feast in memory of law providing for sons and daughters alike inheriting estate of parents.		Wind E. Air still and very clear; heat intense; heavy dews.	Principal fruit month—grapes, figs, walnuts, olives, etc.; vintage begins (Lev. 23:5).
ELUL (Heb. אלול, el-ool , good for nothing). Twenty-nine days; sixth of sacred, twelfth of civil, year.	August-September.	1. New moon. 7. Feast for dedication of Jerusalem's walls by Nehemiah. 17. Fast , death of spies bringing ill report (Num. 14:26). 21. Feast , wood offering. 23. Feast in memory of wicked Israelites, who were punished with death. (Throughout the month the cornet is sounded to warn of approaching new civil year.)		Wind N. E. Heat still intense (2 Kings 4:18-20), much lightning, but rain rarely.	Vintage general; harvest of dourra and matze ; cotton and pomegranates ripen.
ETH'ANIM (Heb. אֶתְנַיִם, ay-thaw-neem , permanent), or TIS'RI. Thirty days; seventh of sacred, first of civil, year.	September-October.	1. New moon; New Year ; Feast of Trumpets (Lev. 23:24; Num. 29:1, 2). 3. Fast for murder of Gedaliah (2 Kings 25: 25; Jer. 41:2); high priest set apart for day of atonement.	Seed time, or earing.	Wind N. E. Dews very heavy. Former or early, i. e., autumnal, rains begin (Joel 2:23) to soften the ground (Deut. 11:14); nights frosty (Gen. 31:40).	Plowing and sowing begin as soon as ground is softened by the rain—in any weather as the time runs short (Prov. 20:4; Eccles. 11:4); cotton harvest.

4. Roman. The ancient Roman year consisted of twelve lunar months, of twenty-nine and thirty days alternately, making three hundred and fifty-four days; but a day was added to make the number odd, which was considered more fortunate, so that the year consisted of three hundred and fifty-five days. This was less than the solar year by ten days and a fraction. Numa is credited with attempting to square this lunar year of three hundred and fifty-five days with the solar of three hundred and sixty-five; but how he did it is not certainly known. The Decemviri, B. C. 450, probably introduced the system of adjustment afterward in use, viz., by inserting biennially an intercalary month of twenty-three days between February 24 and 25, and in the fourth year a month of twenty-two days between February 23 and 24. But this gave the year an average of three hundred and sixty-six and a quarter days, or one too many; and it was the business of the pontiffs to keep the calendar in order by regular intercalation. Their neglect produced great disorder.

The mischief was finally remedied by Julius Cæsar, with the assistance of the mathematician Sosigenes. To bring the calendar into correspondence with the seasons the year 46 B. C. was lengthened so as to consist of fifteen months, or four hundred and forty-five days, and the calendar known as the Julian was introduced January 1, 45 B. C. The use of the lunar year and the intercalary month was abolished, and the civil year was regulated entirely by the sun. Cæsar fixed this year to three hundred and sixty-five and a quarter days, which is correct within a few minutes. After this the ordinary year consisted of three hundred and sixty-five days, divided into twelve months, with the names still in use.

5. Gregorian. The method adopted by Cæsar answered a very good purpose for a short time, but after several centuries astronomers began to discover a discrepancy between the solar and the civil year. The addition of one day every fourth year would be correct if the solar year consisted of exactly three hundred and sixty-five and a quarter days, whereas it contains only three hundred and sixty-five days, five hours, forty-seven minutes, fifty-one and a half seconds. This makes the Julian year longer than the true solar year by about twelve minutes. In 1582 the Julian year was found to be about ten days behind the true time, the vernal equinox falling on the 11th instead of the 21st of March, its date at the Council of Nice, A. D. 325. Pope Gregory issued an edict causing the 5th of October to be called the 15th, thus suppressing ten days, and making the year 1582 to consist of only three hundred and fifty-five days; thus restoring the concurrence of the solar and civil year, and consequently the vernal equinox to the place it occupied in 325, viz., March 21. In order that this difference might not recur it was further ordained that every hundredth year (1800, 1900, etc.) should not be counted as a leap year, except every fourth hundredth, beginning with 2000. In this way the difference between the civil and solar year will not amount to a day in five thousand years. The pope was promptly obeyed in Spain, Portugal, and part of Italy. The change took place in France the same year by calling the 10th the 20th of December. Gradually all the Christian countries adopted this style, excepting Russia, which still adheres to the old style, and is twelve days behind the true time.

6. Ecclesiastical. Originally the ecclesiastical calendar was only an adaptation of Greek and Roman calendars, although Christian influence is seen in two calendars as early as the middle of the 4th century. This influence is shown in the setting of the Christian week side by side with the pagan, while the other, A. D. 448, contains Christian feast days and holidays, though as yet very few, viz., four festivals of Christ and six martyr days. The earliest known pure Christian calendar is of Gothic origin, from Thrace, in the 4th century. It is a fragment, merely thirty-eight days, but contains mention of seven saints.

Originally the martyrs were celebrated only where they suffered, and each Church had its own calendar, but in the Middle Ages the Roman calendar spread throughout the Western Church.

"From the 8th century combined calendars of saints and martyrs were made, and are found in great numbers. They are designed to suit all times, are supplied with means to ascertain the movable feasts, especially Easter."

The present Saints' Calendar of the Roman Catholic Church is very copious, and may be found more or less complete in its almanacs.

"The German Lutheran Church retained the Roman calendar (with the saints' days of that age) at the Reformation. An Evangelical Calendar for the use of the Evangelical Church of Germany is issued annually."

The calendar of the Church of England may be found in the large edition of the Prayer Book, and consists of nine columns, containing, 1. The golden number or cycle of the moon; 2. Days of the month in numerical order; 3. Dominical or Sunday letter; 4. Calends, nones, and ides; 5. Holy days of the Church, as also some festivals of the Roman Church, for convenience rather than reverence; 6-9. Portions of Scripture and of the Apocrypha, appointed for the daily lessons.

CALF (Heb. בָּקָר, ay'-ghel; Gr. μόσχος, mos'-khos; also בָּנֵי בָקָר, ben baw-kaw'r, son of the herd), the young of the ox species. The frequent mention in Scripture of calves is due to their common use in sacrifices. The "fatted calf" was considered by the Hebrews as the choicest of animal food. It was stall-fed, frequently with reference to a particular festival or extraordinary sacrifice (1 Sam. 28:24; Amos 6:4; Luke 15:23). The allusion in Jer. 34:18, 19 is to an ancient custom of ratifying a COVENANT (q. v.). See ANIMAL KINGDOM.

Figurative. The expression "calves of our lips" (Hos. 14:2), and "fruit of our lips" (Heb. 13:15) signify prayers or thanksgiving, young oxen being considered as the best animals for thank offerings.

CALF, GOLDEN (Heb. בָּקָר מִזְבֵּחַ, ay'-ghel, steer; mas-say-kaw', molten image), the idolatrous representation of a young bullock, set up at Mount Sinai (Exod. 32:2, sq.), and later by Jeroboam at Beth-el and Dan (1 Kings 12:28, sq.). Opinions differ as to which of the Egyptian gods this image was modeled after, some believing it to have been Apis, others Mnevis, while still others claim that it was an imitation of Typhon. See GODS, FALSE.

Much discussion has been caused by the declaration that Moses "took the calf which they had made, and burnt it with fire, and ground it to powder, and strewed it upon the water, and made the children of Israel drink of it" (Exod. 32:20).

It is objected that the malleability of gold would prevent its being pulverized, and that gravitation would forbid its floating on the water if pulverized. So difficult is it to answer these objections that many suppose a miracle the only way out of the difficulty. Mr. P. Du Bois, formerly Assistant Assayer of United States Mint, Philadelphia, declares neither position to be necessary. In the Sunday School Times, June 23, 1888, he mentions the two theories of the construction of the calf, viz., of solid gold and of a wooden frame covered with gold, and says: "I wish to add another theory—that the calf was a bronze ‘apis,’ or animal figure, covered with gold (see Isa. 40:18, 19). The admixture of small proportions of certain metals, notably lead, arsenic, antimony, and tin, will at once render gold refractory and more or less brittle. . . . Tin, in certain proportions, will render gold alloys not merely brittle, but as friable as glass. . . . If we accept the theory that the image was a solid gold casting, the tin, or tin-copper alloy, might have been in the original trinkets from which the mass was made. There was, without much doubt, a solder of gold, silver, and tin in that day. . . . If the theory of a bronze animal be resorted to . . . the bronze center would have easily fused with the gold exterior, and so made a thoroughly friable alloy. . . . The comminution once having been perfected, it is easily demonstrable that the powder, despite its specific gravity, would float in water.” See AARON, p. 1.

CALF, WORSHIP OF. See GODS, FALSE.

CALKER (Heb. בִּרְבֵּן, bel'-dek, gap, or leak; and פִּירָן, khan-zak', to stop), a repairer of the breach, as in 2 Kings 12:8; 22:5, but elsewhere used as now for one who stops the seams in a vessel (Ezek. 27:9, 27).

CALL, CALLING (Heb. usually קָוָה, kaw'-aw'; Gr. καλέω, kal-eh'-o, to call).

1. To Call for Help, hence, to pray. We first meet this expression in Gen. 4:26: “Then began men to call upon the name of the Lord” (see also Psa. 79:6; 105:1; Isa. 64:7; Jer. 10:25; Zeph. 3:9). In this sense of invoking God in prayer, with an acknowledgment of his attributes, confession of sins, etc., “call” is used in the New Testament (Acts 2:21; 7:59; 9:14; Rom. 10:12; 1 Cor. 1:2).

2. Divine Call. The word “call” is used in Scripture with the following significations: (1) In the sense of “to name,” “to designate” (Gen. 16:11; Deut. 25:8), and in the sense of “to be,” e. g., “His name shall be called Wonderful” (Isa. 9:6); i. e., he shall be wonderful, and so acknowledged. (2) In the designation of individuals to some special office or work, as the call of Bezaleel (Exod. 31:2), of judges, prophets, apostles, etc. (Isa. 22:20; Acts 13:2); of nations to certain functions, privileges, or punishments (Lam. 2:22; Isa. 5:26); particularly of Israel (Deut. 7:6–8; Isa. 41:9; 42:6; Hos. 11:1). (3) A condition of life, “Let every man abide in the same calling wherein he was called” (1 Cor. 7:20). (4) Call to salvation. “To call” signifies to invite to the blessings of the Gospel, to offer salvation through Christ. This calling is, we believe, universal, “for the divine purpose of redemption is just as universal as the need and capacity of redemption, so that the notion of a divine decree to pass by a portion of mankind, and to restore freedom only to the rest, is out of the question” (Dorner, Christian Doct., iv, 183; John 3:16; 2 Pet. 3:9). This call is of God’s free grace, and does not depend upon man’s works, condition, position, etc. (Rom. 8:28–30; 2 Tim. 1:9; 1 Thess. 4:7; Heb. 3:1; 1 Pet. 1:15, 16). The desire of God’s heart, as testified by his word (1 Tim. 2:4; 2 Pet. 3:9; Ezek. 33:11), is the salvation of all; so that the fault of men’s not obtaining salvation is not God’s, but their own (Matt. 23:27; Acts 13:46).

This call is extended to men through the preaching of the word (Rom. 10:14; 1 Cor. 1:21; Tit. 1:3), accompanied by the Holy Spirit. Calvinistic theologians distinguish between the external and the internal call. The former, they think, is addressed to all, elect and nonelect alike; the latter only to the elect, and is an effectual calling (see Westminster Shorter Catechism, ques. 31).

The true distinction lies not in the intrinsic nature of God’s call itself, but in the different acceptance by man. There is truly a rejected calling and an obeyed calling, and those who obey God’s call become permanently the called (Whedon). Those who are “predestinated” (“foreordained,” R. V.) to eternal life are such as, being called, were foreknown to comply with the call. Peter’s exhortation, “Brethren, give diligence to make your calling and election sure” (2 Pet. 1:10), is a warning against assuming that the salvation of any class is sure and requires no further care or labor on their part. That the “promise” is as extensive as the calling is evident from Acts 2:39.

CAL'NEH (Heb. כַּלְנֵה, kal-neh', fortress), the fourth named of Nimrod’s cities (Gen. 10:10); probably the Calno of Isa. 10:9, and the Canneh of Ezek. 27:23. These four cities were in the land of Shinar, i. e., of the province of Babylon, on the lower Euphrates and Tigris; and Calneh has been identified with Ctesiphon, now a great heap of ruins sixty miles N. E. of Babylon. The word is thought to mean the fort of the Ana, or Anu, one of the chief Babylonian gods. In the time of the prophet Amos Calneh appears to have constituted an independent principality (Amos 6:2), but in the 8th century B. C. became a prey to the Assyrians (Isa. 10:9). About one hundred and fifty years later Calneh was still a considerable town, as may be inferred from its being mentioned (Ezek. 27:23) among the places which traded with Tyre.

CAL'NO (Heb. כַּלְנֵה, kal-no', Isa. 10:9). See CALNEH.

CAL'VARY (Gr. κρανίον, kran-ee'-on, a skull, but having its English form from the translators having literally adopted the Latin word calvaria, a bare skull; the Greek is the interpretation of the Hebrew GOLGOTHA, q. v. Once, in Luke 23:33, the word occurs, the place where Christ was crucified, designated as the place of a skull (Golgotha), either because of the shape of the mound or elevation or because a place of execution. Some claim that Moriah and Calvary are identical. The removal of the city wall from time to time renders it difficult to locate the spot. It would probably be a prominent place near to the public highway, for the Romans selected such places for public executions. See SUPPLEMENT.

“From the 4th century to the present day the sites of Calvary and of the Holy Sepulcher have been shown within the precincts of the Crusading Cathedral, standing where Constantine’s Basilica was raised. The discovery of part of the ‘second wall’ in 1886 shows pretty clearly that the line which—guided by the rock levels—I drew in 1878, nearly coinciding with Dr. Robinson’s line, is correct, and that the traditional site was thus in the time of our Lord within the city walls. For the last half century this view has been very generally held, but there was no agreement as to the true site. I was enabled, however, through the help of Dr. Chaplin, the resident physician, to investigate the ancient Jewish tradition, still extant among the older resident Jews, which places the site of the 'House of Stoning,' or place of execution, at the remarkable knoll just outside of the Damascus Gate, north of the city. There are several reasons, which I have detailed in other publications, for thinking that this hillock is the probable site of Calvary" (Conder, Palestine, p. 30).

plied to those who superstitiously strive to avoid small faults and yet do not scruple to commit great sins. This is a reference to the custom of the Jews in "straining their wine," in order that there might be no possibility of swallowing with it any unclean animal, however minute (Lev. 11:42). This passage should be rendered, "Ye strain out the gnat," etc. Dr. Adam Clarke says that the "at" was substituted for "out" in the edition of 1611.

CAMEL'S HAIR (Gr. τρίχες, treekh'-es; καμήλου, kam'-ay'-loo). The long hair of the camel, which is somewhat woolly in texture, becomes, toward the close of spring, loose, and is easily Calvary.

CAMEL. For description of the camel, see ANIMAL KINGDOM.

Figurative. "It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle, than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God" (Matt. 19:24) is a proverbial expression to show how difficult it is for a rich man who has the many temptations of wealth to leave them for the sake of Christ. The objection is made that the metaphor of an animal passing through a needle's eye is a bad one, and that the Gr. κάμηλος, kam'-ay'-los, ought to be read κάμιλος, kam'-il-os, a cable, "as for a rope to pass," etc. There appears, however, to be no such Greek word as κάμιλος, a cable. "To render the word by a narrow gate, a narrow mountain pass, or anything but a needle is inadmissible" (Meyer, Com., in loc.).

"Ye blind guides, which strain at a gnat, and swallow a camel" (Matt. 23:24), is a proverb ap-pulled away in licks from the skin. The modern Arabs still weave it into a coarse sort of cloth for tent covers and coats for shepherds and camel drivers. Garments of this material were worn by John the Baptist in the wilderness (Matt. 3:4).

Figurative. It was an outward mark of that deadness to carnal enjoyment and mortification which marked John's mission as God's prophet in the apostasy of Israel. In this he imitated his great predecessor and type, Elijah (2 Kings 1:8), in a time of similar degeneracy (see Zech. 13:4).

CAMON (Heb. קַמּוֹן, kam-mone'), the place of Jair's (the judge) burial (Judg. 10:5). Josephus (Ant., v, 7, 6) states that Camon was a city of Gilead, while Eusebius and Jerome place it on the great road, six Roman miles N. of Legio, on the way to Ptolemais, which would be in the plain of Jezreel or Estraelon.

15:2; Num. 5:2) or personal uncleanness (Deut. 28:10-12); those defiled by contact with the dead, whether slain in battle or not, were excluded from the camp for seven days; captives remained for a while outside (Num. 31:19; Josh. 6:23); the ashes from the sacrifices were carried to an appointed place without the camp, where the entrails, skin, horns, etc., and all that was not offered in sacrifice, were burnt (Lev. 4:11, 12; 6:11; 8:17); the execution of criminals took place without the camp (Lev. 24:14; Num. 15:35, 36; Josh. 7:24), as did the burning of the young bullock for the sin offering (Lev. 4:12). A very important sanitary regulation is mentioned in Deut. 23:12-14. The encampment of the Israelites in the wilderness left its traces in their subsequent history. The temple, so late as the time of Hezekiah, was still the camp of Jehovah (2 Chron. 31:2, A. V., "the tents of the Lord;" comp. Psa. 78:28); and the multitudes who flocked to David were "a great host, like the host of God" (1 Chron. 12:22, literally, "a great camp, like the camp of God").

2. Military. We have no definite information concerning the military encampments of Israel in later times. Formed merely for the occasion, and as circumstances might admit, they could scarcely be brought under very precise or stringent regulations. They were pitched in any suitable or convenient situation that presented itself—sometimes on a height (1 Sam. 17:3; 28:4, etc.); near a spring or well (Judg. 7:1; 1 Sam. 29:1). The camp was surrounded by the rampart (Heb. מַחְצֵבֶת, mah-gaw-law', 1 Sam. 17:20; 26:5, 7), which some explain as an earthwork thrown up round the encampment, others as the barrier formed by the baggage wagons. We know that, in the case of a siege, the attacking army, if possible, surrounded the place attacked (1 Macc. 13:43), and drew about it a line of circumvallation (2 Kings 25:1), which was marked by a breastwork of earth (Isa. 62:10; Ezek. 21:22; comp. Job 19:12) for the double purpose of preventing the escape of the besieged and of protecting the besiegers from their sallies. To guard against attacks sentinels were posted (Judg. 7:20; 1 Macc. 12:27) round the camp, and the neglect of this precaution by Zebah and Zalmunna probably led to their capture by Gideon, and the ultimate defeat of their army (Judg. 7:19). The valley which separated the hostile camps was generally selected as the fighting ground (1 Sam. 4:2; 14:15; 2 Sam. 18:6), upon which the contest was decided, and hence the valleys of Palestine have played so conspicuous a part in its history (Josh. 8:13; Judg. 6:33; 2 Sam. 5:22; 8:13, etc.). When the fighting men went forth to the place selected for marshaling the forces (1 Sam. 17:20) a detachment was left to protect the camp and baggage (1 Sam. 17:22; 30:24). The beasts of burden were probably tethered to the tent pegs (2 Kings 7:10; Zech. 14:15).

CAMPFIRE. See VEGETABLE KINGDOM.

CANA (Gr. Kanā, kan-ah'), "Cana of Galilee," a name found in the gospel of John only, but in such references no clew is given as to its locality; supposed to be near Capernaum. Cana of Galilee is distinguished from Cana of Asher (Josh. 19:28, A. V. "Kana"). It was the birthplace of Nathanael (John 21:2), and honored as the scene of Christ's first recorded miracle (John 2:1, 11; 4:46). North of Nazareth lie the two sites which have at various times been regarded as representing Cana of Galilee. The one is the Christian village of Kefr Kenna, accepted before the Crusades as the true site; the other site is the ruin of Kānah, four or five miles farther N. The former site is adopted by Conder (Palestine, p. 96), while Robinson accepts the northern one.

CANAAN (Heb. כְּנָעַן, ken-ah'-an, perhaps low or submissive), the fourth son of Ham and grandson of Noah (Gen. 10:6; 1 Chron. 1:8). The transgression of his father (Gen. 9:22) gave occasion to Noah to pronounce a doom on the descendants of Canaan. Noah may have pronounced this curse either through inspiration or because of Canaan's following in his father's impiety. We do not suppose that it was in consequence of the transgression of Ham. See CANAANITES.

CANAANITE, SIMON THE (Matt. 10:4; Mark 3:18). See SIMON, 2.

CANAANITES (Heb. always collectively in singular, "the Canaanite," חַכְכְּנָעִי, hak-ken-ah-anee', by implication a pedlar), inhabitants of Canaan. In Gen. 10:6, 15-18, Canaan is the fourth son of Ham, and father of "Sidon his firstborn, and Heth, and the Jebusite, and the Amorite, and the Girgashite, and the Hivite, and the Arkite, and the Sinite, and the Arvadite, and the Zemarite, and the Hamathite."

1. Territory. The name "land of Canaan" everywhere covers all Palestine west of the Jordan. Its boundaries are given in detail (Num. 34:3-12), and the distinction between Canaan on the west of the Jordan and Gilead on the east appears in Num. 32:29, 30; comp. 33:51; 35:10-14; Josh. 5:10-12; 22:11, etc.; see also Acts 7:11; 13:19. In some places the name Canaan, when used alone, is believed to refer to Tyre or Phœnicia. Thus in the Hebrew and R. V. of Isa. 23:11 (A. V. "the merchant city;" comp. Matt. 15:21, 22). In Zeph. 2:5 Canaan is "the land of the Philistines" (comp. Josh. 13:3).

2. Canaanites. The term "Canaanites" signifies: (1) All the inhabitants of the land of Canaan (Gen. 10:19), where the limits of their territory are given, "from Sidon, as thou comest to Gerar, unto Gaza; as thou goest, unto Sodom, and Gomorrah, and Admah, and Zeboim, even unto Lasha." (2) A particular tribe inhabiting the lowlands along the Jordan and the Mediterranean Sea (Num. 13:29; comp. 14:25; see also Gen. 15:21; Exod. 3:8, 17, etc.). It is not easy to say in which of these two senses the name is used, since evidently any inhabitant of Canaan might be called Canaanite, as anyone living on the western continent is, in a general sense, an American, though the name Americans is specially applied to the people of the United States. (3) Canaanite signifies "merchant" in Job 41:6; Prov. 31:24; and the Hebrew of "whose traffickers," Isa. 23:8, is believed to be a plural of that which is rendered a Canaanite. This use of the word grew out of the commercial character of the peoples of Canaan, as the Syrians (Ezek. 27; Isa. 23:8, 11, 12).

3. History. Little is said of the history of the Canaanites, except as part of the general history of Palestine. Their country was given to Israel, and they were sentenced to destruction; but Canaanite valor and Israelite lack of faith prevented the sentence from being fully executed (Judg. 1:27-35).

4. Language. As far as we can judge from the history, the "language of Canaan" (Isa. 19:18) was the Hebrew, for which the patriarchs gave up their ancestral Aramaic (Gen. 31:47).

5. Civilization, etc. The Canaanites must have been highly civilized, and, as is natural and usual, we take Kirjath-sepher (Josh. 15:15; Judg. 1:11) to mean book-town (or city), not illiterate. Their commercial rank is shown by the use of the term "Canaanite" for "merchant." They were powerful and warlike, with fenced cities and iron chariots (Josh. 17:16, 19); and must have been energetic and industrious (Deut. 6:10, 11). But they were worshippers of Baal and Ashtaroth (Schaff-Herzog, Encyc., third ed., p. 380), superstitious and addicted to degrading vices (Lev. 18:27-30; Deut. 18:9-12). Divine mercy and justice had preserved this form of civilization till it had seen its best days and was ripe for the sickle (Gen. 15:16).

NOTE.—It has been usual for the past fifty years, following the theory put forth by Rosenmüller (in 1828), to derive Canaan (Heb. כְּנַעַן, ken-ah'-an) from כְּנָעַן, kaw-nah', to be low, and to define it as "lowland" (Num. 13:29). This tribe of lowlanders being large and important, it has been assumed that their name, Canaanites, was extended to the other nations of western Palestine. This derivation has been disputed by Stade, Pusey, and others (Prof. G. F. Moore, Proc. Am. Or. Soc., xv, p. lxviii), and is now regarded as doubtful. The claim that the inhabitants of Canaan are called Amorites in one document and Canaanites in another is examined by Dr. J. F. McCurdy (Hist., Propri., and the Mon., vol. 1, p. 161, §131, n. 1, and Appendix 4, p. 406). On the Canaanites in general, see McCurdy, 1, 137-161; and on their origin, §126, pp. 153, 154.

In this condition of uncertainty we have thought it safest not to attempt to decide vexed questions, but to develop the historic idea, according to the text (Gen. 10:15-19). This makes Canaan the name of an ancestor, which was transferred to the land occupied by his descendants, who were called Canaanites; collectively, though, this latter name was sometimes given to a large and important tribe in distinction from other tribes descended from Canaan, who had special names of their own.

The idea that Canaanite was originally a general name afterward sometimes used in a restricted sense, rather than a tribal name afterward extended, accords excellently with the fact that the Phœnicians on their coins called themselves כְּנַעַן, ken-ah'-an, Canaan, and so did the Carthaginians; and that the Greeks applied the name Xvā to Phœnicia.

It is not at all unlikely, however, that the resemblance between כְּנַעַן, ken-ah'-an, and כְּנָעַן, kaw-nah', to troughish, might attract the attention of dwellers in Canaan as it has of modern scholars; and they might use "Canaanite" as a convenient name for lowlands in distinction from the highland Amorites, without knowing or caring anything about profound philological inquiries or remote applications of the name. Dr. McCurdy (1, 154, §126), says: "The ancestors of Canaanites, Aramæans, and Babylonians alike are shown by the conclusive evidence of linguistic community and similarity of institutions to have once lived in close association as nomads in some portions of the ancient Semite realm. According to our best light their camping ground was northeast Arabia."—W. H.

CANDACE (Gr. Κανδάκη, kan-dak'-ay), the name of that queen of the Ethiopians whose high treasurer was converted to Christianity under the preaching of Philip the evangelist (Acts 8:27), A. D. 34. Candace was probably a distinctive title borne by successive queens, as Pharaoh, Ptolemy, etc. The country over which she ruled; the region in Upper Nubia called by the Greeks Meroë. See SUPPLEMENT.

CANDLE (Heb. נֵר, nare; Gr. λύχνος, lookh'-nos, a light), frequently used in Scripture, where lamp or light would be the more literal rendering. This is due to the general use of candles in England at the time of the translation of our present version of the Bible. See LAMP.

CANON OF SCRIPTURE, THE. This article is condensed from article in Smith's Dict.

1. Meaning of Term. The Gr. κανών, kan-ohn', properly a straight rod, or a carpenter's rule, came, by an easy transition, to mean a rule of ethics, art, or language. The ecclesiastical use of the word offers a complete parallel to the classical, the fathers using it in the sense of "the rule of faith," "the rule of the Church," "the rule of truth." As applied to Scripture it means "admitted by the rule," and not as "forming part of and giving the rule." The first direct application of the term canon to the Scriptures seems to be in the verses of Amphilochius (about 380 A. D.), where the word indicates the rule by which the contents of the Bible must be determined. The uncanonical books were described simply as "those without," or "those unanonized." The apocryphal books, which were supposed to occupy an intermediate position, were called "books read," or "ecclesiastical," though the latter title was also applied to the canonical Scriptures.

2. The Jewish Canon of the Old Testament. (1) Formation. According to the command of Moses the "book of the law" was "put by the side of the ark" (R. V., Deut. 31:26), but not in it (1 Kings 8:9; comp. Josephus, Ant., iii, 1, §7; v, 1, §17), and thus in the reign of Josiah Hilkiah is said to have "found the book of the law in the house of the Lord" (2 Kings 22:8; comp. 2 Chron. 34:14). This "book of the law" was further increased by the records of Joshua (Josh. 24:26), and probably by other writings (1 Sam. 10:25). At a subsequent time collections of proverbs were made (Prov. 25:1), and the later prophets (especially Jeremiah) were familiar with the writings of their predecessors. "The book of the Lord" is mentioned by Isaiah as a general collection of sacred teaching (34:16; comp. 29:18), at once familiar and authoritative; but it is unlikely that any definite collection either of "the psalms" or of "the prophets" existed before the captivity. At that time Zechariah speaks of "the law" and "the former prophets" as in some measure coordinate (Zech. 7:12); and Daniel refers to "the books" (Dan. 9:2) as already collected into a whole. Popular belief assigned to Ezra and "the great synagogue" the task of collecting and promulgating the Scriptures as a part of their work in organizing the Jewish Church. After the Maccabean persecution the Bible appears from that time as a whole, and it is of the utmost importance to notice that the collection was peculiar in character and circumscribed in contents.

(2) Contents. The first notice of the Old Testament consisting of distinct parts is in the prologue to the Greek translation of the Wisdom of Sirach (Ecclesiasticus), in which "the law, the prophets, and the remainder of the books" are mentioned as integral sections of a completed whole. A like threefold classification is used for describing the entire Old Testament (Luke 24:44; comp. Acts 28:23). The general contents of these three classes remain to be determined. Josephus (contra Apion, i, 8) gives twenty-two books: "five belong to Moses, the prophets in thirteen books, and four which contain hymns to God and precepts for the conduct of human life." The writings of the Old Testament completely confirm the testimony of Josephus. Coincidences of language show that the apostles were familiar with several of the apocryphal books; but they do not contain one authoritative or direct quotation from them, while, with the exception of Judges, Ecclesiastes, Canticles, Esther, Ezra, and Nehemiah, every other book in the Hebrew canon is used either for illustration or proof. Several of the early fathers describe the contents of the Hebrew canon in terms which generally agree with the results already obtained. The later Jewish catalogues throw little light upon the canon. They generally reckon twenty-two books, equal in number to the letters of the Hebrew alphabet, five of the Law, eight of the Prophets (Joshua, Judges and Ruth, 1 and 2 Samuel, 1 and 2 Kings, Isaiah, Jeremiah and Lamentations, Ezekiel, twelve Prophets), and nine of the Hagiographa. The last number was more commonly increased to eleven by the distinct enumeration of the books of Ruth and Lamentations ("the twenty-four books"). The Old Testament canon, as established in the time of Ezra, has remained unaltered to the present day.

3. The Christian Canon of the Old Testament. In proportion as the fathers were more or less absolutely dependent on the Septuagint for their knowledge of Old Testament Scriptures, they gradually lost in common practice the sense of the difference between the books of the Hebrew canon and the Apocrypha. The history of the Christian canon is to be sought from definite catalogues, and not from isolated quotations. But even this evidence is incomplete and unsatisfactory, few of the catalogues being really independent. They evidently fall into two great classes, Hebrew and Latin; and the former, again, exhibits three distinct varieties, which are to be traced to the three original sources from which the catalogues were derived. The first may be called the pure Hebrew canon, which is that of the Church of England. The second differs from this by the omission of the book of Esther. The third differs by the addition of Baruch, or "the letter." During the first four centuries this Hebrew canon is the only one which is distinctly recognized, and it is supported by the combined authority of those fathers whose critical judgment is entitled to the greatest weight. The real divergence as to the contents of the Old Testament canon is to be traced to Augustine, whose wavering and uncertain language on the point furnishes abundant materials for controversy. In a famous passage (De Doct. Christ., ii, 8 [18]) he enumerates the books which are contained in "the whole canon of Scripture," and includes among them the apocryphal books without any clear mark of distinction. The Council of Trent pronounced the enlarged canon, including the apocryphal books, to be deserving in all its parts of "equal veneration," and added a list of books to prevent the possibility of doubt. The Reformed Churches agreed in confirming the Hebrew canon of Jerome, and refused to allow any dogmatic authority to the apocryphal books; but the form in which this judgment was confirmed varied considerably in the different confessions. The English Church (Art. vi) appeals directly to the opinion of Jerome, and concedes to the apocryphal books, including 4 Esdras and the Prayer of Manasses, a use "for example of life and instruction of manners," but not for the establishment of doctrine.

4. Canon of the New Testament. While the Churches of the West are divided as to the position of the Old Testament Apocrypha, they have joined in ratifying one canon of the New Testament. (1) The apostles claim for their writings a public use (1 Thess. 5:27; Col. 4:16; Rev. 22:18) and an authoritative power (1 Tim. 4:1, etc.; 2 Thess. 2:6; Rev. 22:19), and Peter (2 Pet. 3:15, 16) places the epistles of Paul in significant connection with "the other Scriptures." (2) Apostolic fathers. In the writings of the apostolic fathers, A. D. 70-120, with the exception of the epistles of Jude, 2 Peter, and 2 and 3 John, with which no coincidences occur, and 1 and 2 Thessalonians, Colossians, Titus, and Philemon, with which the coincidences are very questionable, all the other epistles were clearly known, and used by them; but still they are not quoted with the formulas which preface citations from the Old Testament. (3) Apologists. The next period, 120-170 A. D.—the age of the apologists—carries the history of the formation of the canon one step further. The facts of the life of Christ acquired a fresh importance in controversy with Jew and Gentile. The oral tradition, which still remained in the former age, was dying away, and a variety of written documents claimed to occupy its place. Then it was that the canonical gospels were definitely separated from the mass of similar narratives in virtue of their outward claims, which had remained, as it were, in abeyance during the period of tradition. (4) From A. D. 170-350. The testimony of Iraneus, Clement of Alexandria, and Tertullian extends to the four gospels, Acts, 1 Peter, 1 John, thirteen epistles of St. Paul, and the Apocalypse; and, with the exception of the Apocalypse, no one of these books was ever afterward rejected or questioned till modern times.

(6) From A. D. 303-397. The persecution of Diocletian was directed in a great measure against the Christian writings, and some obtained protection by surrendering the sacred books. The Donatists may be regarded as maintaining in its strictest integrity the popular judgment in Africa on the contents of the canon of Scripture, and Augustine allows that they held in common with the Catholics the same "canonical Scriptures," and were alike "bound by the authority of both Testaments." The canon of the New Testament, as commonly received at present, was ratified by the third Council of Carthage (A. D. 397), and from that time was accepted throughout the Latin Church, though occasional doubts as to the Epistle to the Hebrews still remained. Meanwhile the Syrian churches still retained the canon of the Peshito. The churches of Asia Minor seem to have occupied a mean position as to the canon between the East and West. With the exception of the Apocalypse, they received generally all the books of the New Testament as contained in the African canon. (6) The Reformation. At the era of the Reformation the question of the New Testament canon became again a subject of great though partial interest. The hasty decree of the Council of Trent, which affirmed the authority of all the books commonly received, called out the opposition of controversialists, who quoted and enforced the early doubts. Erasmus denied the apostolic origin of the Epistle to the Hebrews, 2 Peter, and the Apocalypse, but left their canonical authority unquestioned. Luther set aside the Epistle to the Hebrews, St. Jude, St. James, and the Apocalypse, at the end of his version, and spoke of them and the remaining Antilegomena with varying degrees of disrespect, though he did not separate 2 Peter and 2 and 3 John from the other epistles. (7) Calvin. Calvin, while he denied the Pauline authorship of the Epistle to the Hebrews, and at least questioned the authenticity of 2 Peter, did not set aside their canonicity, and he notices the doubts as to St. James and St. Jude only to dismiss them. The language of the Articles of the Church of England with regard to the New Testament is remarkable. In the Articles of 1552 no list of the books of Scripture is given; but in the Elizabethan Articles (1562, 1571) a definition of Holy Scripture is given as "the canonical books of the Old and New Testament, of whose authority was never any doubt in the Church" (Art. vi). This definition is followed by an enumeration of the books of the Old Testament and of the Apocrypha; and then it is said summarily, without a detailed catalogue, "All the books of the New Testament, as they are commonly received, we do receive and account them for canonical." A distinction thus remains between the "canonical" books, and such "canonical books as have never been doubted in the Church;" and it seems impossible to avoid the conclusion that the framers of the Articles intended to leave a freedom of judgment on a point on which the greatest of the continental reformers, and even of Romish scholars, were divided.

CAPERNAUM (Gr. Καπερναούμ, kap-er-nah-oom'), a city of Galilee, frequently mentioned by the evangelists in connection with the life of our Lord. It was on the western shore of the "Sea of Galilee" (Matt. 4:13; comp. John 6:24), lower than Nazareth and Cana, from which the road to it was one of descent (John 2:12; Luke 4:31). It was of sufficient size to be always called a "city" (Matt. 9:1; Mark 1:33); had its own synagogue, in which our Lord frequently taught (John 6:59; Mark 1:21; Luke 4:31-38)—a synagogue built by the centurion of the detachment of Roman soldiers which appears to have been quartered in the place (Luke 7:1; Matt. 8:8). But besides the garrison there was also a customs station, where the dues were gathered both by stationary (Matt. 9:9; Mark 2:14; Luke 5:27) and by itinerant (Matt. 17:24) officers.

Capernaum was the residence of Jesus and his apostles, and the scene of many miracles and discourses. At Nazareth he was "brought up," but Capernaum was emphatically his "own city;" it was when he returned thither that he is said to have been "at home" (Mark 2:1). Here he chose the evangelist Matthew or Levi (Matt. 9:9). The brothers Simon Peter and Andrew belonged to Capernaum (Mark 1:29), and it is perhaps allowable to imagine that it was on the sea beach that they heard the quiet call which was to make them forsake all and follow him (Mark 1:16, 17; comp. 28). It was here that Christ worked the miracle on the centurion's servant (Matt. 8:5; Luke 7:1), on Simon's wife's mother (Matt. 8:14; Mark 1:30; Luke 4:38), the paralytic (Matt. 9:1; Mark 2:1; Luke 5:18), and the man afflicted with an unclean devil (Mark 1:32; Luke 4:33). At Capernaum occurred the incident of the child (Mark 9:33; Matt. 18:1; comp. 17:24); and in the synagogue there was spoken the wonderful discourse of John 6 (see v. 59).

The doom pronounced against Capernaum and the other unbelieving cities (Matt. 11:23) has been remarkably fulfilled. No ecclesiastical tradition even ventures to fix its site; and the contest between the rival claims of the two most probable spots is one of the warmest and most difficult to decide in sacred topography. "Capernaum has been assigned both to Tell-Hum, three miles S.W. of the issue of the Jordan, and Khan Minveh, on the northern edge of Gennesaret; but the evidence is greatly in favor of the latter site" (Smith, Hist. Geog., p. 456). See SUPPLEMENT.

CAPH'THORIM (1 Chron. 1:12). See CAPH'TORIM.

CAPH'TOR (Heb. כַּפְתֹּר, kaf-tore', chaplet; Deut. 2:23; Amos 9:7). The place of Caphtor may have been in Egypt. Jer. 47:4 leads some to think it an island, and regard it as identical with Crete. The weight of proof lies in favor of Upper Egypt, or the delta of the Nile. Ebers identifies Caphtor with the Phœnician colonies on the coast of the delta.

CAPHTORIM (Heb. כַּפְתֹרִים kaf-to-ree'), a people who drove the Avvim out of their possessions (Deut. 2:23), and from whom the Philistines were descended (Gen. 10:4; Jer. 47:4; Amos 9:7); called also Caphthorim.

CAPPADO'CIA (Gr. Καππαδοκία, kar-pad-ok-ee'-ah), a province in the eastern part of Asia Minor. Its boundaries were changed several times by the Roman emperors. In New Testament history it comprised Lesser Armenia. On the day of Pentecost it was represented at Jerusalem (Acts 2:9), and Peter refers to it (1 Pet. 1:1); hence its interest for the Bible reader.

CAPTAIN, the rendering of numerous Hebrew and several Greek words, some of which require special consideration:

1. Sar (Heb. שָׂר, Khil-ee'-ar-khos (Gr. χιλιάρχος), a purely military title (1 Sam. 22:2; 2 Sam. 23:19); also rendered "chief" (Gen. 40:2; 41:9), "prince" (Dan. 1:7), "ruler" (Judg. 9:30), "governor" (1 Kings 22:26). The "captain of the guard" (Acts 28:16) was the commander of the pretorian troops. The rank or power of an Israelitish captain was designated by the number of men under his command, as "captain of fifty," or "captain of a thousand;" and the commander of the whole army was called the "captain of the host." See ARMY, OFFICER.

2. Kaw-tseen' (Heb. קָצֵן) sometimes denotes a military (Josh. 10:24; Judg. 11:6, 11; Isa. 22:3), sometimes a civil, command (Isa. 1:10; 3:6); in Isaiah rendered "ruler."

3. Shaw-leesh' (Heb. שָׁלֵשׁ), properly a third man, or one of three. Some conclude from this that the term was applied to a higher order of soldiers, who fought from chariots, and so called because each chariot contained three soldiers, one of whom managed the horses while the others fought (Exod. 14:7; 2 Sam. 23:8, etc.). Keil thinks this explanation erroneous, and says that the meaning is a "royal aide-de-camp" (Com., 2 Sam. 23:8; Bib. Arch., ii, 385). Others hold to the opinion that the shaw-leesh' were third officers in rank after the king, or commanded a third part of the army.

4. The "captain of the temple" (Luke 22:4; Acts 4:1; 5:24) was not a military officer, but a priest who had command of the Levitical temple police, known in Jewish writers as "the man of the temple mount" (Edersheim, The Temple, p. 119). His duty was to visit the posts during the night and see that the sentries were doing their duty.

Figurative. God is called the "captain of our salvation" (Heb. 2:10; Gr. ἀρχηγός, ar-khay-gos'), because he is the author of his people's salvation, and their leader. Jehovah announces himself to Joshua (5:14) as the "captain of the host," i. e., the head and protector of his people (Dan. 8:11, rendered "prince").

CAPTIVE (Heb. שֶׁבִי, sheb-ee'; Gr. αἰχμαλωτός, aieekh-mal-o-tos'), one taken in war. Such persons were treated with great indignities and cruelty. Those who surrendered were led out with halters, as if for execution (1 Kings 20:32); the victors set their feet upon the necks of captured kings and nobles (Josh. 10:24); cut off their thumbs, toes, or ears (Judg. 1:7; 2 Sam. 4:12; Ezek. 23:25); put out their eyes (2 Kings 25:7). Captives were suspended by the hand (Lam. 5:12); made to lie down and be walked or driven over (Isa. 51:23); thrown among thorns, sawn asunder, beaten to pieces with thrashing machines, or had severe labor imposed upon them (Judg. 8:7; 2 Sam. 12:31; 1 Chron. 20:3). When a city was captured the men were usually put to death, the women and children sold as slaves (Isa. 47:3; 2 Chron. 28:8-15; Psa. 44:12; Mic. 1:11; Joel 3:3) or exposed to most cruel treatment (Nah. 3:5, 6; Zech. 14:2; Esth.

3:13; 2 Kings 8:12; Isa. 13:16, 18). Sometimes the people were transported (Jer. 20:5; 39:9, 10; 2 Kings 24:12-16) or made tributary (2 Sam. 8:6; 2 Kings 14:14).

CAPTIVITY (properly some form of שֶׁבִי, shaw-baw', to take captive; often expressed by other Hebrew words). This word may be taken in the strict sense of imprisonment, but in relation to the people of Israel it has come to mean expatriation. Captives and captivity are used in Scripture very much in the sense of exile, yet with the notion that this state of exile was compulsory, and that the persons thus exiled were in a dependent and oppressed condition. The violent removal of the entire population of a city or district is not an uncommon event in ancient history, and was much more humane than the selling of captives into slavery. Such deportation might arise from one of two motives—the desire of rapidly populating new cities, built for pride or policy, or to break up hostile organizations. In addition to the destruction of national existence such exile was made the more bitter from the sanctity attributed to special places and the local attachment to deity. Removal was thought to sever a people from the care and protection of their God; indeed, it implied the defeat of such deity.

The bondage of Israel in Egypt, and their subjugation at different times by the Philistines and other nations, are sometimes spoken of as captivities; and the Jews themselves reckon their national captivities as four—the Babylonian, Median, Grecian, and Roman. The general use of the term, however, is applied to the forcible deportation of the Jews under the Assyrian or Babylonian kings (Matt. 1:17).

1. Captivity of Israel. The removal of the ten tribes, though often spoken of as a single event, was a very complex process. The larger part of the people were carried away, not to Babylonia, but to Assyria. The period during which their removal was gradually effected was not less than one hundred and fifty years. There were two of these captivities: (1) In the reign of Pekah, king of Israel, Tiglath-pileser III carried away, B. C. 740, the trans-Jordanic tribes (1 Chron. 5:26) and the inhabitants of Galilee (2 Kings 15:29; comp. Isa. 9:1) to Assyria. (2) In the reign of Hoshea, king of Israel, Shalmaneser, king of Assyria, twice invaded (2 Kings 17:3, 5) the kingdom which remained, took Samaria, B. C. 721, after a siege of three years, and carried away Israel into Assyria. The captives were taken to distant cities, many of them not far from the Caspian Sea, and their places supplied by colonists from Babylon and Cuthah, etc. (2 Kings 17:24).

2. Captivity of Judah. (1) Date, etc. The carrying away of the people of Judah was not accomplished at once. Sennacherib, B. C. after 705, is stated to have carried into Assyria two hundred thousand captives from the Jewish cities which he took (2 Kings 18:13). Three distinct deportations are mentioned in 2 Kings 24:14 (including ten thousand persons) and 25:11, one in 2 Chron. 36:20, three in Jer. 52:28-30 (including four thousand six hundred persons), and one in Dan. 1:3. The two principal ones were: (1) When Jehoiachin with all his nobles, soldiers, and artificers were carried away; and (2) That which followed the destruction of Jerusalem and the capture of Zedekiah, B. C. 586. The three mentioned by Jeremiah may have been contributions from the more distinguished portions of the captives, and the captivity of certain selected "children" (Dan. 1:3), B. C. 607, may have occurred when Nebuchadnezzar was colleague of his father, Nabopolassar. (2) Condition of captives. The condition of the captives must have had many an element of bitterness. They were humiliated with the memory of defeat and present bondage; if faithful to Jehovah they were subject to bitter scorn and derision (Psa. 137:3-5); they were required to pay for their existence in heavy services and tributes; those of high-priestly, noble, or royal origin were treated with the utmost indignity (Isa. 48:28; 52:5). On the other hand, they were treated not as slaves, but as colonists. There was nothing to hinder a Jew from rising to the highest eminence in the state (Dan. 2:48), or holding the most confidential office near the person of the king (Neh. 1:11; Tob. 1:13, 22). The advice of Jeremiah (29:5, etc.) was generally followed. The exiles increased in numbers and in wealth. They observed the Mosaic law (Esth. 2:3; Tob. 14:9). They kept up distinctions of rank among themselves (Ezek. 20:1). Their genealogical tables were preserved, and they were at no loss to tell who was the rightful heir to David's throne. They had neither place nor time of national gathering, no temple; and they offered no sacrifice. But the rite of circumcision and their laws respecting food, etc., were observed; their priests were with them (Jer. 29:1); and possibly the practice of erecting synagogues in every city (Acts 15:21) was begun by the Jews in the Babylonian captivity. (3) Literature. The captivity had also a contemporaneous literature. Tobit presents a picture of the inner life of a family of Naphtali among the captives of Nineveh. Baruch, Mr. Layard thinks, was written by one whose eyes, like those of Ezekiel, were familiar with the gigantic forms of Assyrian sculpture. Several of the Psalms appear to express the sentiments of Jews who were either partakers or witnesses of the Assyrian captivity. But it is from the three great prophets, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and Daniel, that we learn most of the condition of the children of the captivity. (4) Duration. Jeremiah (25:12; 29:10) predicted that the captivity should last for seventy years, and this prediction has aroused much discussion. Ewald (Hist. of Israel, v, 73) says: "This, indeed, as the prophet most distinctly explained, was nothing but a round number, to signify a space of time reaching to the third generation, . . . and to indicate that only the smallest possible number of those then living would see the end of this (Chaldean) supremacy." Another explanation is given by McC. and S., Cyc.: "There seem, in fact, to be two, if not more, co-ordinate modes of computing the period in question, used by the sacred writers, one civil, and extending from the first invasion by Nebuchadnezzar to the decree of Cyrus, B. C. 606-538; and the other ecclesiastical, from the burning of the temple to its reconstruction, B. C. 588-517." The Babylonian captivity was brought to a close by the decree (Ezra 1:2) of Cyrus, B. C. 538, and the return of a portion of the nation under Sheshbazzar or Zerubbabel, B. C. 535; Ezra, B. C. 458, and Nehemiah, B. C. 445. The number who returned upon the decree of B. C. 538 was forty-two thousand three hundred and sixty, besides servants. Among them about thirty thousand are specified (comp. Ezra 2 and Neh. 7) as belonging to the tribes of Judah, Benjamin, and Levi. It has been inferred that the remaining twelve thousand belonged to the tribes of Israel (comp. Ezra 6:17). Those who were left in Assyria (Esth. 8:9, 11), and kept up their national distinctions, were known as THE DISPERSION (q. v.) (John 7:35; 1 Pet. 1:1; James 1:1). (5) The ten tribes. Of these little is known. (1) Some returned and mixed with the Jews (Luke 2:36; Phil. 3:5, etc.). (2) Some were left in Samaria, mingled with the Samaritans (Ezra 6:21; John 4:12), and became bitter enemies of the Jews. (3) Many remained in Assyria, and were recognized as an integral part of the dispersion (see Acts 2:9; 26:7). (4) Most, probably, apostatized in Assyria, adopted the usages and idolatry of the nations among whom they were planted, and became wholly swallowed up in them. (6) Cause and effects of captivity. The captivity in Babylon was the result that justly befell the covenant people from their becoming assimilated to heathen states. By accepting other gods they broke their covenant with Jehovah and placed themselves beyond his protection, which would be construed into indorsement of their conduct. "Repentance, and a return to the ancient, the everlasting, and the true God, from the delirium, the charms, and the seductions of the world, had indeed been for centuries the cry of the best prophets, ever growing in intensity" (Ewald, Hist. of Israel, v, 22, sq.). They now came to God in penitence and earnest prayer. The clearest proof of repentance is found in the establishment of four fast days, celebrated in four different months (Isa. 58:3, sq.; Zech. 7:5; 8:19). Thus the Jews who returned from captivity were remarkably free from the old sin of idolatry; and a great spiritual renovation, in accordance with the divine promise (Ezek. 36:24-28), was wrought in them. A new and deep reverence for at least the letter of the law and the institutions of Moses was probably the result of the religious services in the synagogue. The exile was also a period of change in the vernacular language of the Jews (see Neh. 8:8), and a new impulse of commercial enterprise and activity was developed.

3. Captivity under the Romans. (1) The fate of the Jews at the hands of the Romans far better deserves the name of captivity; for, after the massacre of many thousands, the captives were reduced to real bondage. Josephus tells us that one million one hundred thousand men fell in the siege of Jerusalem by Titus, and ninety-seven thousand were captured in the whole war. Those under seventeen were sold into private bondage; of the rest some were sent to the Egyptian mines, others into the provinces to be destroyed at the theaters by the sword and wild beasts (Wars, vi, 9, 3). (2) An equally dreadful destruction fell upon the remains of the nation, which had once more assembled in Judea, under the reign of Hadrian, and by these two wars the Jewish population must have been effectually extirpated from the Holy Land.

4. Figurative. "Children of the captivity" denotes those who were in captivity, or their posterity (Ezra 4:1). "The Lord turned the captivity of Job" (Job 42:10) means that he released him from his sufferings and restored him to prosperity. "He led captivity captive" (Isa. 49:24) is a figurative allusion to the victory of Christ over the enemies of himself and his kingdom.

CARBUNCLE. See MINERAL KINGDOM.

CAR/CAS (Heb. כַּרְכַּס, kar-kas', severe), the last named of the seven eunuchs who were commanded to bring Queen Vashti into the presence of King Ahasuerus at the royal feast (Esth. 1:10), B. C. about 478.

CARCASE (Heb. mostly נֶבֶלָה, neb-ay-law'; פֶּגֶר, peh'-gher), the dead body of man or beast (Josh. 8:29; Isa. 14:19; Heb. 3:17, etc.). According to the Mosaic law: (1) The dead body of a human being rendered unclean the tent (or house) in which the man had died, with any open vessels therein, for seven days. It was no less defiling to touch the dead. (2) Contact with the carcase of any animal rendered the one touching, carrying, or eating it unclean until evening (Lev. 11:39). For fuller particulars, see UNCLEANNESS; DEAD, THE.

CAR/CHEMISH (Heb. כַּרְכַּמִּישׁ, kar-kem-esh'), a city at the junction of the Chaboras and Euphrates—the later Circesium—mentioned (Isa. 10:9) as having been subdued by an Assyrian king. According to 2 Chron. 35:20, Necho had advanced with his ally, Josiah, against the Babylonians, on the Euphrates, to take Carchemish, but was defeated by Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon (Jer. 46:2). See SUPPLEMENT.

CARE, CARES (Gr. μέριμνα, mer'-im-nah). The Greek word has the sense of being drawn in different directions, and answers to our distraction. It is used in the sense of anxiety in 1 Pet. 5:7, where it is contrasted with μέλω, mel'-o, to be of interest to, and may be read, "Casting all your anxiety upon him; for he is interested in you" (comp. Psa. 55:23; Luke 8:14; 21:34). In Matt. 13:22; Mark 4:19, the "care of this world" is anxiety about things pertaining to this earthly life. Paul uses the same word, "care of all the churches" (2 Cor. 11:28).

CARE/AH, the father of Johanan (2 Kings 25:23); elsewhere KAREAH (q. v.).

CAREFULNESS is the rendering (Ezek. 12:18, 19) of the Heb. דְּבִירָה, deh-aw-gaw', trouble, and Gr. σπουδή, spoo-day', dispatch, diligence (2 Cor. 7:11). "Without carefulness" is the rendering of Gr. ἀνέπιμος, am-er'-im-nos (1 Cor. 7:32), without anxiety. See GLOSSARY.

CAR/MEL (Heb. כַּרְמֵל, kar-mel', a planted field, park, garden).

1. As a common noun, rendered "fruitful field" (Isa. 10:18; 29:17; 32:15, 16), "plentiful field" (Isa. 16:10; Jer. 48:33), "plentiful country" (Jer. 2:7). In 2 Kings 19:23; 2 Chron. 26:10, it is incorrectly rendered as a proper name, "Carmel" (R. V. "fruitful field").

2. A prominent headland of Palestine, bounding on the south the Bay of Acre, and running out almost into the Mediterranean, bearing about south-southeast for more than twelve miles, terminating suddenly by an eastern bluff. Its average height is one thousand five hundred feet. Carmel fell within the lot of the tribe of Asher (Josh. 19:26), which was extended as far south as Dor, probably to give the Asherites a share of the rich corn-growing plain of Sharon. The king of "Jokneam of Carmel" was one of the Canaanite chiefs who fell before the arms of Joshua (12:22). These are the earliest notices which we possess of the name. There is not in them a hint of any sanctity as attaching to the mount. But there seem to be grounds for believing that from very early times it was considered as a sacred spot. In later times we know that its reputation was not confined to Palestine.

That which has made Carmel most familiar is its connection with the history of Elijah and Elisha. Here Elijah brought back Israel to allegiance to Jehovah, and slew the prophets of the foreign and false god; here at his entreaty were consumed the successive "fifties" of the royal guard; but here, on the other hand, Elisha received the visit of the bereaved mother whose son he was soon to restore to her arms (2 Kings 4:25, etc.). There is good reason to believe that a later incident in the life of the same great prophet took place on Carmel. This was when he "caused fire to come down from heaven" and consume the two "fifties" of the guard which Ahaziah had dispatched to take him prisoner, for having stopped his messengers to Baalzebub the god of Ekron (2 Kings 1:9-15).

Carmel is still clothed with the same excellency of wood which supplied the prophets of Israel and Judah alike with one of their most favorite illustrations (Isa. 33:9; Mic. 7:14).

3. A town in the mountainous country of Mount Carmel, from the North.

Judah (Josh. 15:55), familiar to us as the residence of Nabal (1 Sam. 25:2, 5, 7, 40), and the native place of David's favorite wife, "Abigail the Carmelitess" (1 Sam. 27:3; 1 Chron. 3:1). This was doubtless the Carmel at which Saul set up "a place," literally "a hand," after his victory over Amalek (1 Sam. 15:12). And this Carmel, and not the northern mount, must have been the spot at which King Uzziab had his vineyards (2 Chron. 26:10). It is now called Kûrmûl, about seven miles from Hebron.

CAR'MELITE, the designation of Nabal (1 Sam. 30:5; 2 Sam. 2:2; 3:8) and his wife Abigail (1 Sam. 27:3; 1 Chron. 3:1, A. V. "Carmelitess"); also of HEZRAI (q. v.), one of David's warriors (2 Sam. 23:35), probably from being inhabitant of CARMEL (q. v.) in Judah.

CAR'MI (Heb. כַּרְמִי, kar-nee', vine-dresser).

1. The fourth son of Reuben (Gen. 46:9; Exod.

6:14), B. C. about 1640. His descendants were called Carmites (Num. 26:6).

2. The son of Hezron (Judah's grandson), and father of Hur (1 Chron. 4:1). He is elsewhere called Caleb (ch. 2:18), or Chelubai (2:9).

3. The son of Zabdi (of the tribe of Judah), and father of Achan, the traitor (Josh. 7:1; 1 Chron. 2:7), B. C. before 1170.

CAR'MITES, the patronymic of the descendants of CARMÍ (q. v.), the Reubenite (Num. 26:6).

CARNAL (from Gr. σάρξ, sarz, flesh), having the nature of flesh, i. e., under the control of the animal appetites (Rom. 7:14); governed by mere human nature, not by the Spirit of God (1 Cor. 3:1, 3, "fleshly"). It is mere human nature, the earthly nature of man apart from divine influence, and therefore prone to sin and opposed to God (Rom. 8:7; comp. Gal. 5:19, sq., where the works of "the flesh" are given).

Another sense is pertaining to the body, of things needed for the sustenance of the body (Rom. 15:27; 1 Cor. 9:11). The ceremonial parts of the Mosaic dispensation were carnal, relating to the bodies of men and beasts (Heb. 7:16; 9:10). The Christian's weapons are not carnal, i. e., not of human origin, not directed by human wisdom (2 Cor. 10:4).

CARPENTER (Heb. כַּוְנָן, khaw-rawsh', 2 Sam. 5:11; 1 Chron. 14:1; Isa. 44:13, etc.; Gr. τέκτων, tek'-tone, Matt. 13:55; Mark 6:3). A general term, including an artificer in stone and metal, as well as wood. See HANDICRAFTS.

CAR'PUS (Gr. Κάριος, kar'-pos, fruit), a Christian of Troas, with whom the apostle Paul states that he left a cloak (2 Tim. 4:13), probably when passing through Asia Minor for the last time before his martyrdom at Rome.

CARRIAGE. See GLOSSARY.

CARSHENA (Heb. כַּרְשֵׁנָא, kar-shen-aw'), the first named of the seven "princes" or chief emirs of the court of Xerxes (Ahasuerus), with whom he consulted as to what course he should pursue toward Vashti, who had refused to appear at the royal banquet (Esth. 1:14).

CART (Heb. עֲגָלוֹת, ag-aw-law', something revolving; sometimes rendered "chariot," Psa. 46:9; "wagon," Gen. 45:19, sq.; Num. 7:8, sq.), a two-wheeled vehicle, used for transporting persons (Gen. 45:19) or freight (1 Sam. 6:7, 8). They were drawn by cattle (2 Sam. 6:3), and are to be distinguished from the war chariots drawn by horses. The wheels were sometimes made of solid blocks of wood, sometimes with spokes, as represented on the monuments of Egypt and Nineveh.

Figurative. The expression, "Woe unto them that draw . . . sin as it were with a cart rope" (Isa. 5:18), is understood by some to refer to the binding of burdens upon carts, and so to the enslaving power of sin. Others use cart rope in the sense of a trace, and think that the metaphor is used to illustrate the heavy burdens which must be drawn by the sinner.

CARVE, CARVING. See HANDICRAFTS.

CASEMENT. See LATTICE, HOUSE.

CASIPHIA (Heb. כַּסְפִּיָּא, kaw-sif-yaw', silver), a "place" of the Persian empire where Levites settled during the captivity, and whence Iddo and others joined Ezra (Ezra 8:17). Its location is unknown.

CAS'LUHIM (Heb. כַּסְלוּחִים, kas-loo'-kheem), a Mizraite people or tribe (Gen. 10:14; 1 Chron. 1:12). The only clue we have as yet to the position of the Casluhim is their place in the list of the sons of Mizraim between the Pathrusim and the Capthorim, whence it is probable that they were seated in Upper Egypt. The LXX seems to identify them with the קַשְׁמֵנִים, khash-man-neem', of Psa. 68:31 (A. V. "princes").

CASSIA. See VEGETABLE KINGDOM.

CASTAWAY (Gr. ἀδόκιμος, ad-ok'-ee-mos, not approved), a metaphor derived from the athletic games, in which the apostle represents himself as being both herald and candidate as a contestant. Being examined, the candidate is rejected as unfit for the contest. In 1 Cor. 9:27 the term is used in the sense of an APOSTATE (q. v.). It is rendered "reprobate" (2 Tim. 3:8), "rejected" (Heb. 6:8).

CASTING. See HANDICRAFTS.

CASTLE. In addition to its meaning of fortress (1 Chron. 11:7), castles were, probably, towers used by the priests for observation, and for making known, through the sounding of trumpets, anything discovered at a distance (1 Chron. 6:54). The "castles," Gen. 25:16, may have been inclosures for flocks or cattle, watchtowers from which shepherds watched their flocks.

The "castle," Acts 21:34, refers to the quarters of the Roman soldiers in the fortress Antouia, adjacent to the temple.

CASTOR AND POL'LUX. The Dioscuri, i. e., sons of Jupiter; Castor being a horse tamer, Castor and Pollux.

and Pollux (Gr. Πόλυδευκῆς), the master of the art of boxing. They were the ideal types of bravery and dexterity in fight, and thus became the tutelary gods of warlike youth. They were supposed to lend their aid to the mariner, who, in case of a storm, prays to them, and vows to sacrifice a lamb to them as soon as the storm ceases. The ship in which Paul sailed from Malta had for its sign Castor and Pollux (Acts 28:11).

CATERPILLAR. See ANIMAL KINGDOM.

CATHOLIC EPISTLES. At the end of the Epistles stand seven—James, 1 and 2 Peter, 1, 2, 3 John, and Jude—which bear the name of catholic, or general. This title is inaccurate, for two of them, 2 and 3 John, are addressed to individuals; and two more to a designated circle of readers, James to "the twelve tribes which are in the dispersion," and 1 Peter to "the elect strangers of the dispersion," etc. The following explanations have been given of the term: (1) These epistles are "general letters of instruction, the name at first applied only to a part, but afterward including even those addressed to private persons;" (2) Because the different apostles were engaged in writing them; (3) Because of the catholic doctrine taught in them; (4) 1 Peter and 1 John, having from the beginning been received as authentic, obtained the distinction of being catholic, or universally accepted. As the others came to be thus received, they were called catholic.

CATTLE. See ANIMAL KINGDOM.

CAUL 1. (Heb. יֹתֶרֶת, yo-thel'-reth, properly, redundant.) "The popular name for a membrane investing the viscera" (Century Dict.). "The liver-net, or stomach-net, which commences at the division between the right and the left lobes of the liver, and stretches on the one side across the stomach, and on the other to the regions of the kidneys" (K. and D. Com., on Lev. 3:4). The caul, with the rest of the fat in the inside of the animal to be offered, and the two kidneys were burned upon the altar (Lev. 3:4, 5).

2. "The caul of their heart" (Heb. סֵגוֹרֶה, seg-oré', shut up, Hos. 13:8) is either the pericardium, membrane about the heart, or the breast, as inclosing the heart.

3. Among the ornaments worn by the women in Isaiah's day (Isa. 3:18) were cauls (Heb. שָׁבִיעַ, shaw-beecc', something interwoven). Of the many explanations of this term we give the following: (a) Network caps worn about the hair; (b) Plaited bands of gold or silver thread, worn below the hair-net, and reaching from one ear to the other. Sun-like balls which were worn about the neck (Arab. sumeisa, a little sun). See DRESS, p. 233.

CAUSEWAY (Heb. מַסְלֵלָה, mes-il-law'), the raised way which led from the lower city up to the temple site (1 Chron. 26:16, 18), which was afterward replaced by a bridge. In 2 Chron. 9:4 it is called an "ascent," and in 9:11 a "terrace."

CAVALRY. See ARMY, WAR.

CAVE (Heb. מְעוֹטָה, meh-aw-yaw'; חוֹר, or חוֹר, khore, a hole; once מְעוֹטָה, mekh-il-law', Isa. 2:19; Gr. σπήλαιον, spay'-lahi-yon, hiding place, John 11:38; ὀπή, op-ay', cave, in Heb. 11:38, and "place" of water, James 3:11). The chalky limestone of which the rocks of Syria and Palestine chiefly consist presents, as in the case in all limestone formations, a vast number of caverns and natural fissures, many of which have also been artificially enlarged and adapted to various purposes, both of shelter and defense. The most remarkable caves noticed in Scripture are: (1) That in which Lot dwelt after the destruction of Sodom (Gen. 19:30). (2) The cave of Machpelah (23:17). (3) Cave of Makkedah (Josh. 10:16). (4) Cave of Adullam (1 Sam. 22:1). (5) Cave of Engedi (24:3). (See under the several words.) (6) The cave in which Obadiah concealed the prophets (1 Kings 18:4), which was probably in the northern part of the country, where abundant caves fit for such a purpose might be pointed out. (7) Elijah's cave in Horeb (1 Kings 19:9), the locality of which cannot be determined. (8, 9) The rock sepulchers of Lazarus and of our Lord (John 11:38; Matt. 27:60).

Caves were used as habitations (Num. 24:21; Cant. 2:14; Jer. 49:16; Obad. 3), as places of refuge (Judg. 6:2; 1 Sam. 14:11), as prisons (Isa. 24:22; Zech. 9:11). See DWELLING.

CEDAR. See VEGETABLE KINGDOM.

CEDRON (John 18:1). See KIDRON.

CEILED, or CEILING, the rendering of three Hebrew words: (1) כַּוֵּף, khaw-faw', to veil or incase (2 Chron. 3:5, "He ceiled the greater house with fir-tree"). (2) סָפַן, saw-fan', to cover, as, "It is ceiled with cedar" (Jer. 22:14). Houses thus finished were called "ceiled houses" (Hag. 1:4). The ceiling itself was spoken of as סָפַן, sip-poon' (1 Kings 6:15). (8) In Ezek. 41:16 the word rendered "ceiled" is שַׁוּף, shaw-kheef', cut thin, a board used for that purpose.

The above descriptions and those of Josephus show that the ceilings of the temple and the palaces of the Jewish kings were formed of cedar planks, applied to the beams, probably with sunken panels, edged and ornamented with gold, carved and painted (Jer. 22:14).

CELLAR (Heb. אֵיזַר, o-tawr', something laid up), an underground vault for storage of wine and oil (1 Chron. 27:27, 28). The word is also used to denote the treasury of the temple (1 Kings 7:51) and of the king (14:26). See HOUSE.

CEN'CHREA (Gr. Κενχρεαί, keng-khreh-a'hee, millet), the eastern harbor of Corinth, the modern name of which is still Kenchreæ, although the vulgar name is Kikries. It is about nine miles from Corinth. Paul once sailed from this port (Acts 18:18). He also makes reference in Rom. 16:1 to the church established there.

CENSER (Heb. מִקְטָרִית, makh-taw', a firepan; מִקְטָרִית, mik-teh'-reth, from מִקְטָר, mik-tawr', incense), the vessel upon which the incense was burned in the sanctuary, and which was appointed to be set every morning on the altar of incense when the priest went in to trim the lamps, and again when he lighted them at even (Exod. 30:7, 8). Yearly, on the day of atonement, the high priest entered the holy of holies, bearing the censer, and threw upon the burning coals it contained the incense, holding the censer in his hand while the incense burned (Lev. 16:12, 13).

No description is given of the censer, and therefore we are left in doubt as to its form and appearance. The probability is that, inasmuch as all fire upon which incense was burned was taken from the "brazen altar," every censer had a handle by which it could be carried. They are mentioned among the vessels of the tabernacle, which were to be wrapped up in proper coverings when the order was given to march (Num. 4:14); and from Lev. 10:1; Num. 16:6, 17, in which each ministering priest is spoken of as having his censer, it would seem that they existed in considerable numbers.

As to material, the censers were probably made of copper ("brazen"); and from the fact that the censers of the rebels were used as plates to cover the altar (Num. 16:38, 39) it would seem that they were simply square copper sheets, folded at the corners like the modern sheet-iron pan. Solomon prepared "censers of pure gold" for the temple (1 Kings 7:50; 2 Chron. 4:22). In Rev. 5:8; 8:3, 5, the angel is represented with a golden censer. See SUPPLEMENT.

The word θυμιαστήριον, thoo-mee-as-tay'-ree-on, place of fumigation, rendered "censer" in Heb. 9:4, as a thing belonging to the tabernacle, probably means the "altar of incense."

CENSUS. This term does not occur in the A. V., although found in the original (Matt. 17:25; κῆνος, kane'-sos, A. V. "tribute"). The act is, however, referred to in the Heb. מִסְפָּר, mif-kawd', or מִסְפָּרִים, pek-ood-daw', numbering; and the Gr. ἀπογραφὴ, ap-og-raf-ay', enrollment.

1. Old Testament. According to the law of Moses (Exod. 30:12-14) every male Israelite of twenty years old and upward was enrolled in the army and was to pay half a shekel as atonement money. The following instances of a census being taken are given in the Old Testament: (1) Under the express direction of God (Exod. 38:26), in the third or fourth month after the Exodus during the encampment at Sinai, chiefly for the purpose of raising money for the tabernacle. The numbers then taken amounted to 603,550 men. (2) In the second month of the second year after the Exodus (Num. 1:2, 3). This census was taken for a double purpose: (a) To ascertain the number of fighting men from the age of twenty to fifty. (b) To ascertain the amount of the redemption offering due on account of all the firstborn, both of persons and cattle. The Levites, whose numbers amounted to 22,000, were taken in lieu of the firstborn males of the rest of Israel, whose numbers were 22,273, and for the surplus of 273 a money payment of thirteen hundred and sixty-five shekels, or five shekels each, was made to Aaron and his sons (Num. 3:39, 51). (3) Thirty-eight years afterward, previous to the entrance into Canaan, when the total number, excepting the Levites, amounted to 601,730 males, showing a decrease of 1,870 (Num. 26:51). (4) In the reign of David the men of Israel above twenty years of age were 800,000, and of Judah 500,000, total 1,300,000. The book of Chronicles gives the numbers of Israel 1,100,000, and of Judah 470,000, total 1,570,000, but informs us that Levi and Benjamin were not numbered (1 Chron. 21:6; 27:24). The time of this census belongs undoubtedly to the closing years of David's reign. The wrong of this census is thought by some to have consisted in the omission to collect the atonement money (see above), but the following explanation seems the correct one: "The true kernel of David's sin was to be found, no doubt, in self-exaltation, inasmuch as he sought for the strength and glory of his kingdom in the number of the people and their readiness for war" (K. and D., Com., 2 Sam. 24:1-9). (5) The census of David was completed by Solomon by causing the foreigners and remnants of the conquered nations resident within Palestine to be numbered. Their number amounted to 153,600 (1 Kings 5:15; 2 Chron. 2:17, 18), and they were employed in forced labor on his great architectural works (Josh. 9:27; 1 Kings 9:20, 21; 1 Chron. 22:2). The numbers in the armies under the several kings between Solomon and the captivity assist us in estimating the population at the various times referred to. The census taken of those who returned with Zerubbabel was to settle the inheritances in Palestine and to ascertain the family genealogies. The number was 42,360 (Ezra 2:64).

2. New Testament. St. Luke, in his account of the "taxing," says a decree went out from Augustus that all the world should be taxed, and in the Acts alludes to a disturbance raised by Judas of Galilee in the days of the "taxing" (Luke 2:1; Acts 5:37). The Roman census under the republic consisted, so far as the present purpose is concerned, in an enrollment of persons and property by tribes and households.

CENTURION (Gr. κεντυρίων, ken-too-ree'-ohn in Mark; elsewhere ἐκατόνταρχος, hek-at-on'-tar-khos, or ἐκατοντάρχης, hek-at-on-tar'-khace), the captains of the sixty centuriae (companies of one hundred men) in the Roman legion. The centurion carried a staff of vinewood as his badge of office. There were various degrees of rank among the centurions according as they belonged to the three divisions of the triaris, principes, and hastati, and led the first or second centuria of one of the thirty manipuli. The first centurion of whom mention is made in Scripture is the one who in our Lord's early ministry sent a request that he would recover his dying servant (Matt. 8:5-10). The other is Cornelius, an early convert to Christianity (Acts 10:1). Others are mentioned (Luke 7:2, 6; also in Acts). See ARMY.

CE'PHAS (Gr. Κηφᾶς, kay-fas', a rock), a surname which Christ bestowed upon Simon Peter (John 1:42; 1 Cor. 1:12, sq.).

CHAFF. Most generally "chaff" is the rendering of the Heb. מֶטֶס, metes, the refuse of winnowed grain, consisting of husks and broken straw. In the East it was the custom to burn chaff, lest, with the changing wind, it might be blown again among the grain (Job 21:18; Psa. 1:4; 35:5; Isa. 17:13; 29:5; 41:15; Hos. 13:3; Zeph. 2:2).

In Isaiah (5:24; 33:11) the word rendered "chaff" is חֲשֵׁשׁ, khano-shash', and means dry grass, hay. It only occurs in the above passages.

Tel'-ben (Heb. תֵּל בֶּנִי), rendered "chaff" in Jer 23:28, is elsewhere (Exod. 5:7, 10, sq.) translated "straw." The "stubble" mentioned in Job (21:18) is cut straw.

In Daniel (2:35) the Chaldee word עֵר, oor, occurs.

Figurative. From its being the lighter and, comparatively speaking, worthless portion of the grain, chaff is used in Scripture as an emblem of that which is, in doctrine or morals, of a similar nature; of false teaching (Jer. 28:28); evildoers, who must come to naught (Psa. 1:4; Isa. 33:11; Matt. 3:12).

CHAIN, the rendering of several Hebrew and Greek words. From very ancient times chains have been used, as at present, both for ornament, bondage, and badges of office.

1. Badge of Office. Instances of such are the golden chain on Joseph's neck (Gen. 41:42; Heb. רַב־בֵּדֶל, raw-beed', literally, collar) and the one promised to Daniel (Dan. 5:7; Heb. הַמְּנַיִךְ, ham-oo-nayk', necklace). In Egypt it was one of the insignia of a judge, who wore an image of truth attached to it; it was also worn by the prime minister. In Persia it was considered not only a mark of royal favor, but a token of investiture. In Ezek. 16:11 the chain is mentioned as the symbol of sovereignty.

2. Ornamental. Chains for ornamental purposes were worn by men, as well as women, in many countries, both of Europe and Asia, and probably this was the case among the Hebrews (Prov. 1:9; Heb. קַרְנָיִם, aw-nawk'). In addition to necklaces of pearls, corals, etc., other chains were worn (Judith 10:4), hanging down as far as the waist or even lower. Mention is made of "stepping chains" (Isa. 3:20; Heb. תְּשֻׁבֹתֵי, tseh-aw-doth', rendered "ornaments of the legs"), which were attached to ankle-rings to shorten the step and give it elegance. The "chains" (v. 19) were earrings.

3. Chains were used for the confinement of prisoners in a manner similar to our handcuffs (Judg. 16:21; 2 Sam. 3:34; Jer. 39:7; Heb. נְהָשֶׁת, nekh-o'-sheth, sometimes rendered "fetters"). The Romans frequently fastened the prisoner with a light chain to the soldier guarding him, as was the case with Paul (Acts 28:20; Eph. 6:20; 2 Tim. 1:16); and when the utmost security was desired two chains were used (Acts 12:6). The prophet Isaiah speaks (40:19) of silver chains in connection with idols, which may have been for ornament or to fasten them to their shrines.

4. Figurative. Chains are used as a symbol of oppression or punishment (Lam. 3:7; Psa. 149:8; Ezek. 7:23, etc.).

Pride is termed a chain which holds men in its power (Psa. 73:6).

CHALCEDONY. See MINERAL KINGDOM.

CHAL'COL (Heb. כַּלְכֹּל, kal-kole', perhaps sustenance), one of the four sons of Mahol, who were famous for their wisdom before the time of Solomon (1 Kings 4:31), B. C. before 960. In 1 Chron. 2:6, where the name is Anglicized Calcol, he and his brothers are given as the sons of Zerah, of the tribe of Judah.

CHALDE'A. See CHALDEANS, 1.

CHALDE'ANS, or CHAL'DEES. The word Chaldean is used in three meanings, of which the first is the original meaning, the second is merely an extension of the original, and the third is a tropical or secondary meaning. These three meanings are here discussed in their natural order of development:

1. The Chaldeans were originally a people inhabiting a small extent of land in Babylonia. Their territory lay on the south and east of the city of Babylon, which city was located in the territory known in early inscriptions as Kavadunyash. This little country of Chaldea was bounded on the south and east by the small countries of Bit-yakin and Tambim, the latter being the district on the upper border of the Persian Gulf. The origin of the word Chaldean is entirely unknown. It has been proposed to derive it from the Babylonian word Kashadu, to conquer; hence, the conquerors. To this view Sayce and Pinches are attached. The derivation is linguistically possible, but is otherwise improbable. It is, indeed, always precarious to find any etymological meaning for the name of a people. We are also not certainly informed about the origin or racial connection of the Chaldeans. We find them settled in the very heart of a country chiefly inhabited by Semites, and it is altogether probable that they also are Semites; and as they spoke a Semitic language this fact may be regarded as confirmatory.

The ancient Chaldeans are not mentioned in the Babylonian inscriptions at all. In the Assyrian inscriptions they are first mentioned in the inscriptions of Asshur-nazir-pal (885-860 B. C.), though their existence as a people stretches far beyond that comparatively late date. Indeed, there is some reason to believe that they had a share in the ruling power in Babylonia as far back as 1100 B. C. However that may be, we find these Chaldeans playing an important role in Babylonia from the 8th century onward. In this period also we get our chief knowledge of them through the Assyrian inscriptions. When Tiglath-pileser III (745-727 B. C.) became king of Assyria he early coveted the prize of Babylonia that he might also call himself king of Babylon, and add to his titles and honors the glory which was always attached to the kingship over the ancient culture land of Babylonia. (This reign is in other points important for biblical history; see TIGLATH-PILESER.) At this time Nabonassar (747-734 B. C.) was king of Babylon. He was constantly disturbed by the encroachments of the half nomadic Aramæan tribes, and also more especially by the movements of the more civilized Chaldeans who now possessed the rule in two or three small states in the center and south of Babylonia. Nabonassar was probably friendly to Assyria and would be glad of Assyrian help in dealing with the troublesome Aramæans and Chaldeans. In September, 745, Tiglath-pileser III invaded Babylonia. He overcame the Aramæans, and established his southern boundary against them. In pursuit of southern Aramæan tribes he followed the river Tigris all the way to the gulf, and established two cities at strategic points. By these operations he prepared the way for the conquest of the Chaldeans and the setting up of Assyrian rule in Babylon. In 731 Ukinzer, who came from one of the Chaldean states, made himself king of Babylon, but was deposed in 728 by Tiglath-pileser III, who himself ascended the throne of Babylon and ruled until 726 under the name of Pul (see PUL). He was succeeded by Ulual, under which name ruled Shalmaneser IV of Assyria (726-722), who was in turn succeeded by Merodach-baladan. This king was and remained one of Assyria's bitterest and most successful enemies. He was a Chaldean. On New Year's Day, 721 B. C., he began to reign in Babylon. Sargon was now king of Assyria, and hastened southward to attack him. The battle was fought at Durilu, and the Assyrians were not victorious. Merodach-baladan continued as king until 709, when he was overcome by Sargon, and the latter became king of Babylon (709-705), as well as of Assyria. After the end of Sargon's life his son Sennacherib was not able at once to take up control in Babylonia, and the canon of Ptolemy represents the period 704-703 B. C. as an interregnum. The period immediately after this was apparently a period of confusion. Our ordinary sources do not enable us to understand fully the state of affairs, for they are self-contradictory. In 702 ruled Merodach-baladan, son of Baladan, who sent an embassy to Hezekiah (2 Kings 20:12; Isa. 29:1) (see MERODACH-BALADAN). After him ruled successively Belebus, Asshur-nadinshum, son of Sennacherib, and Nergal-ushezib, though of this period also there are doubts, because our sources are again doubtful. The land of Babylonia was now wholly possessed by the Assyrians, and Chaldean influence was at a low ebb. It had, however, not died. It would soon burst into a new and more brilliant life. With this, the Assyrian period in Babylonia, ends the first period of the Chaldeans. In the first meaning of the word the Chaldean are a people inhabiting a very small district in central Babylonia, out of which some of their chief men made their way into Babylon itself and got the rule there.

2. In its second meaning the word Chaldean is applied, not to the small homeland of the Chaldean people, but to all Babylonia. The kings who ruled in Babylon are not called kings of Babylonia, but rather kings of Chaldea. The territory thus called Chaldea was about four hundred miles in length, and its average breadth was about one hundred miles. In order to understand this strange extension of meaning for the word Chaldean it will be necessary to examine the history of Babylonia from the Assyrian period onward for a space. In Assyria, after the death of Esarhaddon, all real force had gone out of the people. Assyria was grand and imposing as a world power, but it had no longer power to conquer and expand. Asshur-bani-pal (668-625 B. C.), who next ruled in Assyria, was devoted to the arts of peace and added scarcely anything to the military prestige of the empire. The end of the Assyrian state was approaching. That thrilling and joyous fact was known long before to the prophets of the Hebrew people. It was now becoming known in Egypt, in Media, and in Chaldea. The Chaldean people had been resting and gaining power for a time. They would be ready for action and leadership when the hour should strike. When the end of Asshur-bani-pal's reign was come the head of the garrison in Babylon was a Chaldean, whose name was Nabopolassar. Some think that he was connected collaterally with the old native line of Babylonian kings. He was, in any event, ready to seize the moment and convert to his own gain the weakness of Assyria. He was at once proclaimed king in Babylon (625), and became thereby the founder of the magnificent Chaldean empire, which was to be the greatest Semitic empire of antiquity. Not satisfied with the achievement of the throne in Babylon, he prepared to cooperate with the Medes in their invasion of Assyria with the purpose of overthrowing and destroying the city of Nineveh. His son Nebuchadnezzar was sent with an army against Nineveh, and with Median help Nineveh was taken in the year 607-606 B. C. In the next year Nabopolassar died, and his son Nebuchadnezzar became the head of the new world-power. Nebuchadnezzar reigned 605-561 B. C., and no reign, before or after, equaled his in grandeur (see NEBUCHADNEZZAR). He was succeeded by his son Evil-merodach (561-560 B. C.) (see EVIL-MERODACH), who was murdered by his brother-in-law Nergal-sharezer (560-558 B. C.), the chief seer in one of the temples. The next king, Labashi-Marduk (called by Ptolemy Laborasoarchad), reigned but three months, and was succeeded by the usurper Nabonidus, in whose reign the Chaldean empire came to an end (538 B. C.). The Chaldeans had done marvelous things. That so small a land as Chaldea should produce a conquering race sufficient in power to overcome and rule in mighty empires is one of the marvels of history.

3. The third meaning of the word Chaldean is astrologers. In this sense the word is used in the book of Daniel (2:2, 10; 4:7, etc.). Curtius, Strabo, and Diodorus use the word in the same meaning. The origin of this usage is easily understood. The Chaldeans, from 625 B. C. onward, held complete sway in Babylonia. The city of Babylon was their capital city. But Babylon was from time immemorial the very center of intellectual life in all western Asia. This intellectual activity was much employed in the study of the stars, both scientifically and as a means of divining. Astronomy and astrology were much sought after in the land. Hence Babylon became famous as the home of magicians and sorcerers. As the Chaldeans held Babylon it was perfectly natural that they should give their name to the sorcerers, or astrologers, who had made the city famous.—R. W. R.

CHALLENGE. See GLOSSARY.

CHAMBER, as an apartment of a house (q.v.).

Figurative. The term "chamber" is used metaphorically in the Psalms (104:3, 13) for the heavens.

The expression, "Enter into my chambers," etc. (Isa. 26:20), is figurative of earnest prayer.

The "chambers of the south" (Job 9:9) are the constellations, or, perhaps, in a more general sense, the regions of the southern sky.

"Chambers of imagery" (Heb. "image apartments," Ezek. 8:12) is used by the prophet to denote the vision which he had of the idolatrous practices of the Jews in Jerusalem. "Image chambers" is the term applied to the rooms or closets in the houses of the people, in which idolatrous images were set up and secretly worshipped.

CHAMBERING (Gr. κοίτη, koy'-tay), a word occurring only in Rom. 13:18, where it signifies lewd and licentious conduct.

CHAMBERLAIN (Heb. צַרְפָּדִים, saw-reece', castrated, sometimes translated "EUNUCH," q. v.), an officer confidentially employed about the person of the sovereign, as Potiphar (Gen. 39:1). This officer was introduced into the court by Solomon (1 Kings 4:6; 16:9, "steward;" 18:3, "governor"). His duty seems at first to have been the superintendence of the palace and royal etiquette. Later this post became one of special and increasing influence, including the right of introduction to the king. He thus became the chief minister.

Erastus, the "chamberlain" of the city of Corinth, was one of those whose salutations to the Roman Christians are given (Rom. 16:23; Gr. οικονομος, oy-kon-om'-os). The office was apparently that of public treasurer or arcarius. The arcarii were inferior magistrates having charge of the public chest, and were under the authority of the Senate.

Blastus, Herod's chamberlain (Acts 12:20; Gr. κοιτων, koy-tone') was the chief valet de chambre of the king, and by reason of his office had great influence with Herod.

CHAMELEON. See ANIMAL KINGDOM.

CHAMOIS. See ANIMAL KINGDOM.

CHAMPAIGN (Heb. צַרְבָּדִים, ar-aw-baw', a desert), an open or uninhabited district (Deut. 11:30). See ARABAH.

CHAMPION (Heb. גִּבּוֹר, ghib-bore', 1 Sam. 17:51; elsewhere "mighty man"). The Hebrew phrase, rendered "champion" in 1 Sam. 17:4, 23, literally is a man between the two, a go-between, a challenger. So Goliath went between the armies of the Hebrews and Philistines, as the champion of the latter.

CHA'NAAN (Gr. Χαναάν, khan-ah-an'), another form (Acts 7:11; 13:19) of CANAAN (q. v.).

CHANCE. The use of this word in Scripture has the sense of to meet unexpectedly (Deut. 22:6; 2 Sam. 1:6), an occurrence for which there seems to be no explanation (1 Sam. 6:9), a coincidence (Luke 10:31), opportunity (Eccles. 9:11), example (1 Cor. 15:37). See GLOSSARY.

CHANCELLOR (Heb. בֵּית־דִּין, beh-ale'-teh-ame', lord of judgment), the Chaldee title of the Persian governor of Samaria (Ezra 4:8, 9, 17).

CHANELBONE, CHANGEABLE. See GLOSSARY.

CHANGE OF RAIMENT. See DRESS.

CHANNEL. 1. The rendering (Isa. 27:12) of SHIBBOLETH (q. v.).

2. The bed of the sea, or of a river (Psa. 18:15; Isa. 8:7; Heb. אֵפֶס, aw-feek', valley).

CHAOS, a term not used in Scripture, but in frequent use to designate the unformed mass of primeval matter mentioned in Gen. 1:2. It comes from the Greek (χῶς, khal'-os, immeasurable space), and is used by Hesiod for the unfathomable gulf which was supposed to be the first of existing things. Some cosmogonies, as the Phœnician, retain the biblical terms descriptive of chaos, but changed into personal existences; e. g., the Hebrew term בְּהוּ, bo'-hoo, emptiness, is transformed into Baau, the producing principle. According to Greek mythology, from Chaos arose the Earth, Tartarus, and Love, also Erebus and Night. Ovid describes chaos as a confused mass, containing the elements of all things which were formed out of it. The great majority of the cosmogonies, however, are atheistic, ascribing creation to inherent ability in matter, or to a blind necessity; while the Scriptures make it the act of God.

CHAPEL (Heb. מִקְדָּשׁ, mik-dawsh', holy place) occurs only in Amos 7:13, where Beth-el is called "the king's chapel" by the high priest of the golden calf. The meaning appears to be that Beth-el was the royal capital, the principal seat of worship established by the king.

CHAPTER, CAPITAL, in modern architecture, the upper, ornamental part of a column. In Exod. 36:38; 38:17, 19, 28 (Heb. רֹאשׁ, roshe') it refers to the capitals on the pillars of the tabernacle and its court. Once (2 Chron. 3:15) the Heb. צֶמֶת, tsel'-feth, to encircle, is so rendered; elsewhere (1 Kings, 2 Chron., and Jer. 52:22) the term is the rendering of the Heb. כֹּתֵלֶיךָ, kothel'-reth, and refers to the capitals of the temple pillars.

CHAPMAN, CHAPT. See GLOSSARY.

CHAR'ASHIM (Heb. חַרְשֵׁי, khar-aw-sheem, craftsmen). The "valley of Charashim" (1 Chron. 4:14) was inhabited by craftsmen, and is called "valley of craftsmen" (Neh. 11:35); not far from Jerusalem.

CHAR'CHEMISH (2 Chron. 35:20). See CARCHEMISH.

CHARGER. 1. The rendering of the Heb. קַעֲזָיִם, keh-aw-raw', literally, a deep dish; the silver dishes presented by the tribal chiefs (Num. 7) for the service of the tabernacle. The word is elsewhere translated "dish" (Exod. 25:29; 37:16; Num. 4:7). They weighed one hundred and thirty shekels each.

2. The "chargers" mentioned in Ezra 1:9 (Heb. אֲגָרִיטִים, ag-ar-tawil'), thirty of gold and one thousand of silver, are supposed, by some, to have been basins for holding the blood of the sacrifices; by others, baskets for the first fruits.

3. The "charger" (Matt. 14:8, 11; Mark 6:25, 28; Gr. πίναξ, pin'-ax) upon which Herodias bore the head of John the Baptist was probably a large platter, and the word is so rendered in Luke 11:39, sq.

In short, the word was properly a general term, indicating what bore or was loaded with any weight; hence, a saddle horse is still called a charger.

CHARGES, CHARGE. See GLOSSARY.

CHARIOT, the rendering of several Hebrew words and one Greek word, the indiscriminate use of which renders it difficult to know which kind of vehicle is meant. The same words are employed in speaking of chariots of war, state chariots, and even of wagons. The earliest mention of chariots in Scripture is where Joseph, as a mark of distinction, rode in Pharaoh's second chariot (Gen. 41:43); and later when he went in his own chariot to meet his father (46:29). Chariots also accompanied the funeral procession of Jacob, as a guard of honor (50:9). We next find them used for a warlike purpose (Exod. 14:7), when Pharaoh pursued the Israelites with six hundred chariots.

1. Egyptian. From the Egyptian monuments we are able to form a very correct idea of the chariots of that nation. They were all similar in form, having but two wheels, except in one obscure instance, furnished on the right side with cases for bows and spears and arrows. The framework, wheels, pole, and yoke were of wood, with the wheels sometimes tipped with iron, and the axletrees ending with a scythe-like projection. The binding of the framework, as well as the harness, were of rawhide or tanned leather; while the floor was often made of rope network, to give a more springy footing to the occupants. The chariot was open behind, and here the charioteer entered.

From the Egyptian sculptures it would seem that an Egyptian army was composed exclusively of infantry and chariots. Chariots were manned sometimes with three men, the warrior, the shield-bearer, and the charioteer; sometimes with two, the warrior and his charioteer; sometimes with only one person. The presumption is that the horsemen and riders (Exod. 14:9; 15:1) were riders in the chariots; and the "captains" (14:7) were chariot-warriors, literally, "third" men, probably selected for their valor.

2. Assyrian. From the sculptures we learn that the Assyrian chariot resembled the Egyptian in all material points.

3. Canaan. The Canaanites had iron chariots (Josh. 17:18), "not scythe chariots, for these were introduced by Cyrus, but simply chariots tipped with iron" (K. and D., Com., in loc.). Of these it is recorded that Jabin, king of Canaan, had nine hundred (Judg. 4:3). The number of chariots which the Philistines had in the time of Saul, viz., thirty thousand (1 Sam. 13:5), appears excessive, the probability being that there is a mistake by the copyist, so that it would be more correct to read three thousand. David took from Hadadezer, king of Zobah, one thousand chariots

(2 Sam. 8:4), and later seven hundred from the Syrians (10:18), who, in order to recover their ground, collected from various countries thirty-two thousand (1 Chron. 19:6, 7).

4. Hebrew. Hitherto the Israelites had few chariots, partly on account of the mountainous nature of the country, partly owing to the prohibition against their multiplying horses. Solomon raised and maintained a force of one thousand four hundred chariots (1 Kings 10:26) by taxation on certain cities. The chariots and the horses were imported chiefly from Egypt (1 Kings 10:29).

5. New Testament. In the New Testament the only mention made of a chariot, except in Rev. 9:9, is in the case of the Ethiopian eunuch of Queen Candace (Acts 8:28, sq.).

6. Figurative. Chariots are frequently alluded to as symbols of power (Psa. 20:7; 104:3; Jer. 51:21; Zech. 6:1, 2); hosts or armies (2 Kings 6:17; Psa. 68:17). Elijah, by his courage, faith, and power with God, was "the chariot of Israel, and the horsemen thereof" (2 Kings 2:12). "Chariot" is likewise used poetically in Scripture to designate the rapid agencies of God in nature (Psa. 68:17; 104:3; Isa. 66:15; Hab. 3:8). "Chariot of the cherubim" (1 Chron. 28:18) probably means the cherubim as the chariot upon which God enters or is throned (see CHERUBIM, 3). "Chariot cities" (2 Chron. 1:14) were the depots and stables erected by Solomon on the frontiers of his kingdom, such as Beth-marcaboth, "the house of chariots" (Josh. 19:5), and Hazor-susah, "the village of horses" (1 Kings 10:28). Solomon had one thousand four hundred chariots. "Chariot of fire, and horses of fire" (2 Kings 2:11) signifies some bright effulgence which, in the eyes of the spectators, resembled those objects. "Chariot man" (2 Chron. 18:33) is another name for "driver of chariot" (1 Kings 22:34). "Chariots of the sun" are mentioned (2 Kings 23:11) as being burned by Josiah. Horses and chariots were dedicated to the sun by its worshipers, under the supposition that that divinity was drawn in a chariot by horses. The rabbins inform us that the king and nobles rode in these chariots when they went forth to greet the morning sun. "The chariot of Israel" was an expression applied by Elisha to Elijah (2 Kings 2:12). The meaning is thought to be that, as earthly kingdoms are dependent for their defense and glory upon warlike preparations, a single prophet has done more for the preservation and prosperity of Israel than all her chariots and horsemen.

CHARITY (Gr. ἀγάπη, ag-ah'-pay; R. V. "love"). The only word in the Bible translated charity means love. It is affection, tender and passionate attachment, a sentiment of our nature excited by qualities in a person or thing which command our affection; a virtue of such efficacy that it is said to be the fulfilling of the law. Its absence invalidates all claim to the Christian name. It is the antithesis of selfishness. Luther calls it "the shortest and longest divinity." It is active, and dissatisfied if not blessing others. Christian love is piety, the greatest boon which God can give, for "God is love." "In it all human duty is summed up" (Matt. 22:37-40; Rom. 13:8; 1 Cor. 13:13).

Charity, in modern speech, has other meanings: First, that sentiment which prompts us to think and speak well of others, judge their acts kindly, and make them happy; second, generosity to the poor; third, that which is thus given; and fourth, a benevolent foundation. See BROTHERLY KINDNESS, LOVE.

CHARM, CHARMER, CHARMING. See MAGIC, p. 670.

CHAR'AN (Acts 7:2, 4). See HARAN.

CHASE. See HUNTING.

CHASTE, CHASTITY (Gr. ἀγνός, hag-nos'; ἀγνότης, hag-not'-ace, dedicated, hence, holy, clean), in scriptural sense: (1) Freedom from impure thoughts, imaginations, or desires (Phil. 4:8; 1 Tim. 5:22, "pure;" 1 Pet. 3:2); spoken of God (1 John 3:3; James 3:17). (2) Pure from illicit sexual intercourse (2 Cor. 11:2; Tit. 2:5).

CHASTEN. See CHASTISEMENT.

CHASTISEMENT. The same Hebrew and Greek words are translated chastise, chasten, correct, nurture, and instruct. They contain the meaning sometimes of reproof with just displeasure, involving the infliction of pain visited upon the transgressor for his reformation.

1. Yaw-sar' (Heb. יָסַר, yasar), the primary meaning of which is to instruct, is the word in Deut. 8:5; 21:18; Psa. 6:1; 38:1; 94:12; 118:18; Prov. 19:18, where the translation is chasten; also in Lev. 26:28; Deut. 22:18; 1 Kings 12:11, 14; 2 Chron. 10:11, 14; Jer. 31:18, and Hos. 7:12, where the translation is chastise.

2. Yaw-kakh' (Heb. יָכַח, yakhach), to convict, 2 Sam. 7:14; Job 33:19, rendered chasten. This and the preceding word are translated correct, e. g., Psa. 39:11; Job 5:17, et al.

3. Aw-naw' (Heb. עָנָה, anah), to humble oneself, Dan. 10:12 is translated "to chasten thyself."

4. In the New Testament we have only paideúō, pahee-dyoo'-o, to instruct, train, chastise, and its derived substantive, paideia, pahee-di'-ah (Luke 23:16, 22; Heb. 12:5, 7, 8, 11). It is nurture in Eph. 6:4; instruction in 2 Tim. 2:25; 3:16; learn in Acts 7:22; 1 Tim. 1:20; and teach in Acts 22:8 and Tit. 2:12.

In Lev. 26:28 the meaning is to punish in just wrath. In Isa. 58:5, "The chastisement of our peace was upon him." The word means that suffering of the Son of God by which our reconciliation was effected.

CHE'BAR (Heb. כְּבַר, keb-awr', length), a river in the "land of the Chaldeans" (Ezek. 1:3), on the banks of which some of the Jews were located at the time of the captivity, and where Ezekiel saw his earlier visions (Ezek. 1:1; 3:15, 23, etc.). It is commonly regarded as identical with the Habor, or river of Gozan, to which some portion of the Israelites were removed by the Assyrians (2 Kings 17:6). But this is a mere conjecture. Chebar is a name which might properly be given to any great stream. A likely conjecture identifies it with Nahr Malcha, or Royal Canal of Nebuchadnezzar.

CHECK. See GLOSSARY.

CHECKER WORK (Heb. שֵׁבַקְיָה, seb-aw-kaw', network), supposed to be latticework, forming a balustrade upon the capitals of the columns in the temple (1 Kings 7:17; "network" in v. 18).

CHEDORLA'OMER (Heb. כְּדֹרְלֹאֵמֶר, ked-or-law-o'-mer), a king of Elam who conquered a portion of Palestine about the Dead Sea, which afterward rebelled. Fourteen years after the conquest he again invaded the territory, accompanied by Arioch, king of Ellasar; Amraphel, king of Shinar; and Tidal, king of Goim. On this expedition he took the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah and carried off a great store of plunder and many captives, including Lot. He was pursued by Abraham to Hobab, north of Damascus, completely routed, and all his goods and captives retaken. The name Chedorlaomer really divides into two parts, and the Babylonian form of it is Kudur-Lagamar (man or worshiper of the god Lagamar, an Elamite deity). Both portions of the name were found in the inscriptions of the Assyrian king, Asshur-bani-pal, 668-625 B. C., who made a raid into Elam and recovered some Babylonian property which had been taken by the Elamites centuries before. Recently Mr. Pinches has found in the British Museum a broken tablet of Hammurabi, 2287-2233 B. C. (?), on which the name of Chedorlaomer is found. This discovery ends all doubt as to the name as well as the historical character of Chedorlaomer. Many other Babylonian discoveries show the entire historical probability of such an invasion at this time from Babylonia into Palestine. Indeed, in the days of Sargon I, about 3800 B. C., such invasions had already begun. See AMRAPHEL, ARIOCH, ELAM, and TIDAL; also SUPPLEMENT.

CHEEK (Heb. לֶחֶךְ, lekh-ee'). Smiting on the cheek was considered in itself a great insult (Job 16:10; Lam. 3:30; Mic. 5:1; Luke 6:29). "Thou hast smitten all mine enemies upon the cheek bone" (Psa. 3:7) is figurative of utter destruction of those enemies. The cheek bone denotes the bone in which the teeth are placed, and to break that is to disarm the animal. "He hath the cheek teeth of a great lion" (Joel 1:6) refers to the hinder teeth, or grinders. See GLOSSARY.

CHEESE, the rendering of several Hebrew terms, as חֶלְלֵי הַחֶלֶב, khaw-re-tsay' he-khaw-lawb', slices, or segments, of cheese (1 Sam. 17:18); שֶׁפֶת בָּקָר, sheph-owth' baw-kaw', according to the Chaldee and the rabbins, cheese of cows (2 Sam. 17:29); גֶּבֻהַ, ghib-ee-naw' (Job 10:10), coagulated milk. Among the regulations regarding food in the Mishna was that no cheese made by foreigners should be eaten, for fear that it might be derived from the milk of an animal which had been offered to idols.

CHE'LAL (Heb. כְּלָל, kel-awl', completion), one of the "sons" of Puhath-moab, who divorced his Gentile wife after the return from Babylon (Ezra 10:30), B. C. 456.

CHEL'LUH (Heb. כְּלוּהַי, kel-oo-hah'ee, completed), one of the "sons" of Bani, who divorced his Gentile wife after the return from captivity (Ezra 10:35), B. C. 456.

CHE'LUB (Heb. כְּלוּב, kel-ool', a cage).

1. The brother of Shuah and father of Mehir, of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 4:11).
2. The father of Ezri, who was David's chief gardener (1 Chron. 27:26). B. C. after 1000.

CHELU'BAI (Heb. כְּלוּבַי, kel-oo-bah'ee), one of the sons of Hezron (1 Chron. 2:9); elsewhere in the same chapter (vers. 18, 42) called CALEB (q. v.).

CHEM'ARIM (Heb. כְּמָרִים, kem-aw-ree'm', ascetics, Zeph. 1:4; elsewhere, 2 Kings 23:5, "idolatrous priests," and Hos. 10:5, "priests"), the priests appointed by the kings of Judah for the worship of the high places and the idolatrous worship of Jehovah.

CHE'MOSH, the leading deity of the Moabites. See GODS, FALSE.

CHENA'ANAH (Heb. כְּנַעְנָה, ken-ah-an-aw', perhaps low).

1. The fourth named of the seven "sons" of Bilhan, a Benjamite and mighty warrior, appar-

the people after Ezra had read to them the book of the law (Neh. 9:4), B. C. 445.

CHENANI'AH (Heb. כְּנַנְיָהּ, ken-an-yaw', established by Jehovah), chief of the Levites who, as master of song (1 Chron. 15:22), conducted the grand musical services when the ark was removed from the house of Obed-edom to Jerusalem (15:27). He was of the family of Izharites, and was appointed over the inspectors of the building of the temple (26:29), B. C. about 1000.

CHE'PHAR-HAAM'MONAI (Heb. כְּפָרֵי הַיַּעֲבֹנִי, kef-ar' haw-am-mo-nee', village of the Ammonites), a place mentioned among the towns of Benjamin (Josh. 18:24). No trace of it has yet been discovered.

CHEPHI'RAH (Heb. כְּפִירָה, kef-ce-raw', village, hamlet), one of the Gibeonite towns of Benjamin (Josh. 18:26); now Kefireh, about eleven miles from Jerusalem. Joshua made a league with its people (Josh. 9:17). It was occupied after the captivity by a remnant of Benjamin (Ezra 2:25; Neh. 7:29).

CHER'AN (Heb. כְּרָן, ker-awn', derivation uncertain), the last named of the four sons of Dishon, the Horite "duke" descended from Seir (Gen. 36:26; 1 Chron. 1:41).

CHER'ETHIM (Ezek. 25:16), the regular plural of Cherethite. See CHERETHITES, No. 1.

CHER'ETHITES (Heb. כְּרֵתִים, ker-ay-thee').

1. "Those tribes of the Philistines who dwelt in the southwest of Canaan (1 Sam. 30:14), and treated by Ezekiel (25:16, 'Cherethim') and Zephaniah (2:5) as synonymous with Philistines" (K. and D., Com.). The LXX and Syriac rendered the words in these passages by Cretans, from which it is conjectured that the PHILISTINES (q. v.) sprang from Crete.
2. "The Cherethites and the Pelethites," a collective term for David's life-guards (2 Sam. 8:18; 15:18; 20:7, 23; 1 Kings 1:38, 44; 1 Chron. 18:17). The words are adjectives in form, but with a substantive meaning, and were used to indicate a certain rank, literally, the executioners and runners. At a later date they were called "the captains and the guard" (2 Kings 11:4, 19; comp. 1 Kings 14:27). The effort to identify the Cherethites with No. 1 has failed.

CHER'ITH (Heb. כְּרִית, ker-eeth', a cutting, or gorge) is a brook, dry in summer, but flowing as a torrent in winter, at the bottom of what travelers say is one of the wildest ravines in the country. Such a place as the prophet Elijah, fleeing from his enemies, might have selected as a hiding place (1 Kings 17:3, 5). "The traditional site of the brook is now the Wady Kelt, a wild glen which runs into the Jordan valley; but the Bible ently, in the time of David (1 Chron. 7:10), B. C. about 1000.

2. The father of the false prophet Zedekiah, which latter opposed Micahiah and encouraged Ahab (1 Kings 22:11, 24; 2 Chron. 18:10, 23), B. C. before 890.

CHEN'ANI (Heb. כְּנַנְיָהּ, ken-aw-nee', planted), one of the Levites who conducted the devotions of ting, or gorge) is a brook, dry in summer, but flowing as a torrent in winter, at the bottom of what travelers say is one of the wildest ravines in the country. Such a place as the prophet Elijah, fleeing from his enemies, might have selected as a hiding place (1 Kings 17:3, 5). "The traditional site of the brook is now the Wady Kelt, a wild glen which runs into the Jordan valley; but the Bible expression, 'facing' or 'before' Jordan, would seem to imply that it was east of that river, and therefore in Elijah's own native country of Gilead. Wady Yabis, opposite Beth-shean, may be the place" (Harper, Bible and Mod. Dis., p. 299).

CHE'RUB (Heb. כְּרוּב, ker-oob'), an Israelite of doubtful extraction, who accompanied Zerubabel to Judea (Ezra 2:59; Neh. 7:61).

CHERUB (Heb. כְּרוּב, ker-oob'), CHERUBIM (Heb. כְּרוּבִים, ker-oo-beem'; Gr. χερουβίμ, ker-oo-beem').

1. Scripture Mention. Cherubim are mentioned: (a) At the expulsion of our first parents from Eden (Gen. 3:24), when their office was "to keep the way of the tree of life," i. e., to render it impossible for man to return to paradise and eat of the tree of life. In this account there is no mention of their nature or form. (b) We next read of them in connection with the furnishing of the tabernacle (Exod. 25:18, sq.), where directions are given to place two golden cherubim upon the top of the ark of the covenant. They were to be of "beaten work," i. e., beaten with the hammer and rounded, and not solid. They were fastened to the mercy seat (lid of the ark), and, facing each other, stretched out their wings so as to form a screen over the mercy seat. They were called the "cherubim of glory" (Heb. 9:5). Cherubim were also woven into or embroidered upon the inward curtain of the tabernacle (Exod. 26:1, sq.) and the veil (Exod. 26:31). (c) The two cherubim placed by Solomon in the holy of holies (1 Kings 6:23, sq.; 2 Chron. 3:7-14) were made of olive wood, overlaid with gold. They had bodies ten cubits high, and stood upon their feet, like men. The length of their wings was five cubits. They stood with "their faces inward," i. e., toward the holy place, the outward wing of each cherub touching the wall and the tip of the other wings touching each other. (d) Other references are as follows: "He rode upon a cherub, and did fly" (2 Sam. 22:11; Psa. 18:10); the vision of four cherubim (A. V. "living creatures") seen by Ezekiel (1:5, sq.; 10:1, sq.), and that of the "four beasts" in Rev. 4:6, sq. (Gr. ζῷα, dzo'-ah, living creature).

2. Form. From the above descriptions and references it is impossible to arrive at certainty respecting various particulars of the cherubim, and it is difficult to say whether this silence may have arisen from the fact that these figures were familiar to the Israelites, or whether it was intended to leave the matter in indefiniteness. A line of similarity runs throughout the whole Bible with regard to them, with slight modifications in their structure, due, perhaps, to the fact that the idea they were intended to express had become clearer as time ran on. Turning to the cherubim of Solomon, we find that they "stood upon their feet" (2 Chron. 3:13), thus leading us to believe that they had a human and not a bestial form. This is confirmed by reading the accounts in Ezekiel, who says: "This was their appearance; they had the likeness of a man" (1:5); and, "There appeared in the cherubim the form of a man's hand under their wings" (10:8). Of the four living creatures mentioned in the Apocalypse it is said that "the third . . . had a face as a man" (4:7), seeming to imply that the human figure was characteristic of them all, but that it, in addition to the figure, had also the face of a man. Whatever else, therefore, may have been associated with them, this much is clear, that the human element predominated in their form. But they were marked by characteristics taken from other spheres of creaturely existence. Thus alike in the tabernacle, in the temple, and in the visions of Ezekiel and St. John, they had wings. In Ezekiel and the Apocalypse they are said to have had not only the face of a man, but the faces of a lion, an ox, and an eagle. Ezekiel speaks of them as in possession of all the four faces (1:6-10); St. John apportions one only of the four to each (Rev. 4:7), while in the case of the cherubim both of the temple and the tabernacle no intimation is given that they possess more than one face, in all probability the human. Perhaps, however, the animal faces were latent in the cherubim of the tabernacle, and capable of development.

3. Cherubim and the Throne. An important question relative to the cherubim has reference to their position as regards the throne of God. Are they the bearers of that throne, or simply near it? Some Old Testament expressions appear to favor the former theory. Thus we read: "Thou that sitteth upon the cherubim, shine forth" (Psa. 80:1), and, "He sitteth enthroned upon the cherubim, the earth is moved" (Psa. 99:1). These and similar passages must be taken figuratively, for in the books of Moses it is the mercy seat that is God's throne (Lev. 16:2; Num. 7:89). He is again and again spoken of as the "Lord of hosts that dwelleth between the cherubim" (1 Sam. 4:4; 2 Sam. 6:2). Similarly St. John speaks of them as being "in the midst of the throne and round about the throne" (Rev. 4:6). These figures appear to have been suggested by the position of the cherubim upon the ark of the covenant, and to suggest the idea of close proximity to the throne of Jehovah in service and worship. See SUPPLEMENT.

4. Meaning. It is evident that they do not represent attributes of the Almighty, for this would be in direct contradiction to the commandment, "Thou shalt not make . . . any likeness of anything," etc. (Exod. 20:4). Again, they are represented as worshiping, and have ascribed to them creaturely position and ministerial character. The three leading theories are the mythical, real, symbolical: (1) Mythical. According to the mythical theory the cherubim was an imitation of the Egyptian sphinx or of those composite animal forms belonging to Central Asia, and to be met with, above all, upon the Assyrian and Babylonian monuments. (2) Real. This theory takes the cherubim to be supramundane spiritual essences, spiritual beings of a higher order than the angels. In support of this theory it is argued that "God would not have placed symbols, the pure creation of the Hebrew fancy, at the gate of paradise" (Kliefoth). The comparison made between the king of Tyre and a cherub (Ezek. 28:14) is thought to be intelligible only on the assumption that the prophet conceived of the cherub as a supramundane and spiritual being. "Again, in the vision (Rev. 4) the four ζῶα are not animal existences representing the material creation or the animal kingdom, but spiritual beings that surround the throne of God" (Keil, Arch., p. 115).

(3) Symbolical. Those holding this theory believe that cherubim are symbolical figures, ideal conceptions, which have no corresponding representatives among actual living things. The important question then is, What do they represent? Dr. J. Strong (Tabernacle, p. 82) says: "We venture to expound them as cosmical emblems of the divine attributes, or, as modern science (somewhat atheistically, we fear) styles them, 'the laws of nature.' They are the creative and providential functions of God, exercised in behalf of his human subjects. . . . The four faces are the main index of their typical significance; the human denotes intelligence, the leonine strength, the bovine perseverance, and the aquiline rapidity; so that we have the complete picture of an omniscient, omnipotent, uniform, and ubiquitous maintenance and superintendence of the external fortunes and affairs of the body of true worshippers, i. e., the Church of all time." Dr. Milligan (in an article in Bible Educator, vol. iii, p. 295) says: "Thus, therefore, we reach the meaning and purport of the cherubim. They are an emblem of man, associated on the one hand with the inanimate, on the other with animated creation, all brought into the immediate presence of God, all placed close around his throne, and either filling or stretching forth to fill the holy of holies with their presence." Fairbairn (Imp. Dict., ii, 11) concludes thus: "They (cherubim) were ideal representatives of humanity in the highest and holiest places—representatives, not of what it actually is, but of what it was destined to become when the purpose of God in its behalf is accomplished. . . . God manifested as dwelling between the cherubim is God appearing in a state of blessed nearness to men," etc. Perhaps, as has been suggested, they are sometimes spoken of as mythical, and at other times as real.

CHES'ALON (Heb. כֶּסֶלֹן, kes-aw-lone', strength, fortress), one of the landmarks on the west part of the north boundary of Judah (Josh. 15:10). Eusebius and Jerome differ as to its situation, but agree that it was a very large village near Jerusalem. Robinson (Bib. Res., p. 154) identifies it with the present Kesla.

CHE'SED (Heb. כֶּסֶד, keh'-sed, doubtful signification), the fourth named of the sons of Nahor (Abraham's brother) by Milcah (Gen. 22:22), B. C. about 2200.

CHE'SIL (Heb. כֶּסֶל, kes-cel', ungodly, fleshly), a town in the south of Judah (Josh. 15:30), identical with Bethul and Bethuel (Josh. 19:4; 1 Chron. 4:80; "Beth-el," 1 Sam. 30:27).

CHEST, the rendering of two distinct Hebrew terms: (1) אֲרוֹן, or אֲרֹן, aw-ron', invariably used for the ark of the covenant, and, with two exceptions, for that only. These exceptions are (a) the "coffin" in which the bones of Joseph were carried to Palestine (Gen. 50:26), and (b) the "chest" in which Jehoiada, the priest, collected the offerings for temple repairs (2 Kings 12:9, 10; 2 Chron.

24:8-11). (2) חֲצָיִם, ghen-aw-zem', used only in the plural, rendered "chests" (Ezek. 27:24) and "treasures" (Esth. 3:9; 4:7).

CHESTNUT. See VEGETABLE KINGDOM.

CHESUL'LOTH (Heb. כֶּסֶלֹת, kes-ool-lōth', fattened), a town of Issachar (Josh. 19:18), probably identical with Chisloth-tabor (v. 12). It is thought that modern Iksal marks the ancient site.

CHE'ZIB (Heb. כֶּזִיב, kez-eeb', deceitful), a town in which Judah was when Shelah, his third son, was born (Gen. 38:5); probably the same as Achzib.

CHICKEN (Gr. voσiov, nos-see'-on, Esdras 1:30; Matt. 23:37). See ANIMAL KINGDOM.

CHIDE. See GLOSSARY.

CHIDON (Heb. כִּידוֹן, kee-dohn', a spear), thought by some to be an Israelite to whom belonged the thrashing floor where the accident to the ark, on its journey to Jerusalem, took place, as well as the death of Uzzah (1 Chron. 13:9). It is more probable that it was the name of the place.

CHIEF, the rendering of a large number of Hebrew and Greek words, frequently in connection with official terms, as "CHIEF BUTLER" (q. v.), "Chief Captain" (see ARMY), "Chief of the Fathers" (see FATHER), "Chief of the Levites" (see LEVITES), "Chief Musician" (see MUSIC), "CHIEF PORTER" (q. v.), "Chief Priests" (see PRIEST), "Chief Rulers" (see SYNAGOGUE).

CHIEF OF THREE (Heb. רֹאשׁ הַשְּׁלֹשָׁה, roshē hash-shaw-lee-shee', the official title of ADINO (q. v.), the Ezrite (2 Sam. 23:8, A. V. "chief among the captains;," marg. "head of the three").

CHIEFS OF ASIA. See ASLARCH.

CHILD, CHILDREN (Heb. properly יָלֵד, yeh'-led; Gr. τέκνον, tek'-non, something born). This term is often used in Scripture with considerable latitude; thus the descendants of a man, however remote, are called his sons or children. For other uses, see below.

1. Desire for. It is of children that the house, the family, is built (Gen. 16:2; 30:3, marg. "built by her"). The conception and bearing of children was a matter of longing and joy among the Israelites, especially to the women (Gen. 24:60; 30:1; 1 Sam. 1:11). On the ground of the twofold blessing connected with creation and the covenant promise (Gen. 1:28; 12:2, 7; 13:16) a numerous group of children was considered as a special gift of God's grace (Deut. 28:4; Psa. 113:9; 128:3, sq.; Prov. 17:6; Eccles. 6:3), and sterility in marriage was thought to be a divine punishment (Gen. 16:2; 30:23; 1 Sam. 1:6, sq.; Isa. 47:9).

2. Infants. At childbirth women were helped by nurses, midwives, even in the time of the patriarchs (Gen. 35:17; 38:28; Exod. 1:15), although women in the East often give birth so easily as not to need this help. The newborn child, after having the navel cord cut, was bathed in water, rubbed with salt, and wrapped in swaddling clothes (Ezek. 16:4). As a rule, it was nursed and tended by the mother herself (Gen. 21:7; 1 Sam. 1:23; 1 Kings 3:21; Cant. 8:1), excepting in case of weakness or death or in princely families (2 Kings 11:2; comp. Exod. 2:9). After eight days boys were circumcised (see CIRCUMCISION), and got their names from some remarkable circumstance connected with their birth (Gen. 25:25, sq.; 35:18; 38:29) or according to the mother's hopes or wishes (Gen. 4:25; 29:32, sq.; 1 Sam. 1:20), but in later times from some relative (Luke 1:61). Forty days after its birth, in the case of a boy, and eighty in the case of a girl, the mother had to offer a sacrifice of purification in the temple (Lev. 12:1-8), to present the male first-born to Jehovah, and to redeem it with five shekels of silver (Num. 18:15, sq.; comp. with 4:47, and Lev. 27:5). The weaning of the child did not occur, in some cases, till it was two or three years of age (2 Macc. 7:27), and was celebrated with festivities (Gen. 21:8), and on special occasions was accompanied with the offering of a sacrifice (1 Sam. 1:23, 24).

3. Training. Both boys and girls, in their earlier years, were under the training of their mother (Prov. 31:1; 2 Tim. 1:5; 3:15), the daughters, no doubt, remaining so until their marriage. At the age of five years, probably, the boys were trained by their fathers, or in well-to-do families placed under the care of special tutors (Num. 11:12; Isa. 49:23; 2 Kings 10:1, 5; Gal. 3:24). This instruction was not only in reading and writing, but also in the Law, its commandments and doctrines, and the deeds and revelations of Jehovah to his people (Exod. 12:26; 13:8, 14; Deut. 4:10; 6:7, 20, sq.; 11:19; Prov. 6:20). Schools were not set up till a comparatively late time, and only in the larger cities. Gamaliel is said to have been the first who instituted schools for boys in cities.

4. Children and the Law. In the Decalogue reverence for parents is made a condition of children's prosperity (Exod. 20:12; Lev. 19:3; Deut. 5:16). If a child cursed his parents he was under the divine curse (Deut. 27:16), and was to be put to death equally with him who did violence to them (Exod. 21:15, 17; Lev. 20:9; comp. Prov. 20:20; Matt. 15:4). Drunkenness, gluttony, and the like, persevered in against a father's warning, were punished by the elders of the city with stoning (Deut. 21:18-21).

Thus while the Law secured to the parents full authority over their children, it provided also against the abuse of full parental power. The father was not to deprive his firstborn of his rights of primogeniture in favor, for example, of a younger son by a second and more loved wife (Deut. 21:15-17). He could render nugatory a vow made by his daughter, but he must do so immediately upon hearing it; otherwise he could not prevent its fulfillment (Num. 30:4, 5). He had power to marry his daughters, and even to sell them into concubinage, but not to a foreign people (Exod. 21:7, sq.).

Children seem to have often been taken as bondsmen by creditors for debts contracted by the fathers (2 Kings 4:1; Isa. 50:1; Neh. 5:5). Children who were slaves by birth are called in Scripture "those born in the house" (Gen.

14:14; 15:3; 17:23), "sons of handmaids" (Psa. 86:16; 116:16).

5. Illegitimate. Such children had no legal inheritance (Gen. 21:10; Gal. 4:30); they did not receive the training of legitimate sons (Heb. 12:8, "chastisement;" Gr. paideia, education); were excluded from the congregation (Deut. 23:2); and were despised by their brethren (Judg. 11:2).

6. Figurative. In the Scriptures, children, like sons or daughters, are used figuratively (a) to express a state of ignorance and of intellectual darkness (Matt. 11:16; 1 Cor. 13:11; 14:20; Eph. 4:14; Heb. 5:13); (b) of persons who are distinguished, whether for good or evil, by some particular quality or power. Thus the expression "children of light" (Luke 16:8) is applied to those who have a knowledge of God through Christ; the "children of obedience" (1 Pet. 1:14) are those submitting themselves readily to the will of God. The more immediate disciples of Jesus, who hailed him as the Bridegroom of his Church, are called "children of the bridechamber" (Matt. 9:15). On the other hand, we have such expressions as "child of hell" (Matt. 23:15), "children of the wicked one" (Matt. 13:38), "children of this world" (Luke 16:8).

CHILD BEARING (Gr. τεκνογονία, tek-nog-on-ee'-ah). As a part of the curse coming to our first parent, on account of sin, it was said to her, "In sorrow thou shalt bring forth children" (Gen. 3:16). Commenting on this, Delitzsch says: "That the woman should bear children was the original will of God; but it was a punishment that henceforth she was to bear them in sorrow, i. e., with pains which threatened her own life as well as that of the child." The punishment consisted in an enfeebling of nature, in consequence of sin. The language of the apostle, "Notwithstanding she shall be saved in childbearing, if they continue in faith and charity," etc. (1 Tim. 2:15), implies that a patient endurance of this penalty shall contribute to woman's spiritual benefit.

CHILDBIRTH. See CHILD, 2.

CHILDREN OF GOD. See ADOPTION.

CHILDREN OF ISRAEL. See ISRAEL.

CHIL'EAB (Heb. כִּילְעָב, kil-awb', restraint of the father), the second son of David, by Abigail, the widow of Nabal, the Carmelite (2 Sam. 3:3), B. C. about 1000. He is called Daniel in the parallel passage (1 Chron. 3:1).

CHIL'ION (Heb. כִּילְיוֹן, kil-yone', pinning), the younger son of Elimelech and Naomi, and husband of Orpah, Ruth's sister; he died childless in the land of Moab (Ruth 1:2, 5; 4:9), B. C. about 1100.

CHIL'MAD (Heb. כִּילְמָד, kil-mawd'), a place or country mentioned in conjunction with Sheba and Asshur (Ezek. 27:23). The only name bearing any similarity to it is Charmande, a town near the Euphrates between the Mascas and the Babylonian frontier; but it is highly improbable that this place was of sufficient importance to rank with Sheba and Asshur.

CHIM'HAM (Heb. כִּימְחָם, kim-ham', pinning, longing), a follower and, according to Josephus (Ant., vii, 11, 4), a son of Barzillai, the Gileadite.

Upon David's restoration after Absalom's rebellion, Chimham returned from beyond Jordan with him, and received marked favors at his hand, which were first offered to Barzillai, but declined on account of old age (2 Sam. 19:37-40), B. C. 973. David probably bestowed upon him a possession at or near Bethlehem, on which, in later times, was an inn called after him (Jer. 41:17).

CHIMNEY (Heb. אֶרְבָּה, ar-oob-baw', lattice).

The expression "as the smoke out of the chimney" (Hos. 13:3) should be rendered "smoke out of the window," i. e., "window-lattice," as the houses were without chimneys. The same word is elsewhere translated "WINDOW." See HOUSE.

CHIN'NERETH (Heb. כִּנְנֶרֶת, kin-neh'-reth, harp-shaped), or CHIN'NEROTH (Heb. כִּנְנֹת, kin-ner-oth'; 1 Kings 15:20, "Cinneroth").

1. A fortified city in the tribe of Naphtali (Josh. 19:35 only), of which no trace is found in later writers, and no remains by travelers. By St. Jerome Chinnereth was identified with the later Tiberias. On the temple walls of Karnak, at Thebes, Thothmes III (B. C. 1600) gives a list of Canaanitish towns submitting to him, among which Chinnereth is found.

2. Sea of Chinnereth (Num. 34:11; Josh. 13:27), the inland sea, which is most familiarly known to us as the "lake of Gennesaret." This is evident from the mode in which it is mentioned as being at the end of Jordan opposite to the "Sea of the Arabah," i. e., the Dead Sea; as having the Arabah or Ghor below it, etc. (Deut. 3:17; Josh. 11:2; 12:3). In the two latter of these passages it is in a plural form, Chinneroth. It seems likely that Cinnereth was an ancient Canaanite name existing long prior to the Israelite conquest.

CHI'OS (Gr. Χίος, khee'-os), an island in the Grecian Archipelago, about five miles from the mainland; now Scio. It was once noted for wine. Paul anchored there (Acts 20:15).

CHIS'LEU (Heb. כִּסְלֵו, kis-lave'), the name adopted from the Babylonians, after the captivity, by the Jews for the third civil or ninth ecclesiastical month (Neh. 1:1; Zech. 7:1). See CALENDAR, TIME.

CHIS'LON (Heb. כִּסְלוֹן, kis-lone', hopeful), the father of Elidad, who, as one of the chiefs of Benjamin, was selected on the part of that tribe to divide Canaan (Num. 34:21), B. C. before 1170.

CHIS'LOTH-TA'BOR (Heb. כִּסְלוֹת תַּבּוֹר, kis-loth' taw-bore', flanks of Tabor), a place near Tabor (Josh. 19:12), and probably the same as Chesulloth (v. 18).

CHIT'TIM, KIT'TIM (Heb. כִּתִּי, kit-tee'; כִּתִּיעַ, kit-tee-ee', an islander). "A name of large signification (such as our Levant), applied to the islands and coasts of the Mediterranean in a loose way without fixing the particular part, though particular and different parts of the whole are probably in most cases to be understood" (Pict. Bib. on Ezek. 27:6). According to Josephus (Ant., i, 6, § 1) it is an ancestral name. "Chethimus possessed the island Chethima; it is now called Cyprus." By the Greeks the name was retained for the city Citium, a Phœnician colony of unknown antiquity on the southern coast, while "by the Hebrews all islands and most of the sea-coasts are called Chethim." Modern scholars hold that the name was extended first from Citium to all Cyprus, and afterward to the coasts and islands, especially of Greece, though sometimes it was carried as far as Italy. In Maccabees, Chittim is Macedonia. The Vulgate in Numbers and the Vulgate and the Chaldee Targum in 1 Chron. 1:7 have "Italy," and in Ezek. 27:6 the Targum has "Apulia."

Among the Phœnicians כִּתִּיעַ, kit-tee', meant Cyprians. Among the Hebrews we may perhaps say that the writers who showed most interest in and acquaintance with the maritime operations of Tyre, as Isaiah (see ch. 23), Jeremiah (25:22; 47:4), and Ezekiel (chs. 26, 27, 28), used almost entirely the longer and more accurate form כִּתִּיעַ, kit-tee-yeem', as Isa. 23:1, ketlibh (but in 23:12 it is כִּתִּי, kit-teem'); Jer. 2:10; Ezek. 27:6, כִּתִּיעַ, geri, כִּתִּיעַ; כִּתִּיעַ, while authors more remote in space or time have the shorter form כִּתִּי (Gen. 10:4; Num. 24:24; 1 Chron. 1:7; Dan. 12:30).

The name Chittim, being once given to these regions, might continue as a geographical term without regard to changes in population; but the association of Chittim in Gen. 10:4 with Javan and Elishah points to Greeks and Carians rather than to Phœnicians. If in Gen. 10:4 we read Rodanim, as in 1 Chron. 1:7, instead of Dodanim, we may with plausibility liken Javan, Elishah, Kittim, and Rodanim to Ionia, Elis, Citium, and Rhodes.

Cyprus was visited by Sargon I, whose date at present "is given as about 3800 B. C.," the older estimate being about 2100 B. C. It paid tribute to Thothmes III in the 16th century B. C.; seven of its kings sent ambassadors to Sargon II, 709 B. C., who erected a monolith at Citium; ten of its kings sent envoys to Esar-haddon at the close of the war against Abdimilkuti and Sanduarri, 676 B. C. "Their names have quite generally a Greek sound" (Tiele, Bab.-Assyr. Gesch., 330, 346).—W. H.

CHI'UN (Heb. כִּיּוֹן, kee-yoon', statue), in Amos 5:26 we read, "But ye have borne the tabernacle of your Moloch and Chiun your images, the star of your god, which ye made to yourself." This was changed in the Septuagint so as to read, "Ye took up the tabernacle of Moloch, and the star of your god Remphan," etc., from which Stephen quoted (Acts 7:43). From this it has been supposed that the Kium of Amos has been read by the Greek translator Revan or Raiphau, and that this was an Egyptian name for Saturn. But such authorities as Gesenius, Hengstenberg, Keil, and others have come to the conclusion that the Chiun of the prophet was not the name of a god at all, but that it should be rendered statue or image. See GODS, FALSE.

CHLOE (Gr. Χλόη, khlō'-ay, verdure), a female Christian mentioned in 1 Cor. 1:11, some of whose household had informed the apostle Paul of divisions in the Corinthian Church. Whether she was a resident of Corinth or not we have no means of knowing.

CHOLER. See GLOSSARY.

CHOR-A'SHAN (Heb. כּוֹר אֶשְׁחָן, kore aw-shawn', smoking furnace). According to another reading it ought to be Bor-ashan. It was a place named (1 Sam. 30:30) as the scene of David's hunting exploits; also probably identical with Ashan of Simeon (Josh. 15:42; 19:7).

CHORA'ZIN (Gr. Χοραζίν, chor-ad-zin', uncertain derivation), one of the cities of Galilee in which Christ did some of his mighty works; and doomed for neglecting his teachings (Matt. 11:21; Luke 10:13). Major Conder (Palestine, p. 100) is of the opinion that the name survives in Kerázeh.

CHOSEN (Heb. from בָּחַר, bav-khar'; Gr. ἐκλεκτός, ek-lek-tos'), singled out from others for some special service or station. "Chosen" warriors are such as are picked out as being most skillful or best adapted to some service (Exod. 15:4; Judg. 20:16). The Israelites were a "chosen" people, God having set them apart to receive his word and maintain his worship (Psa. 105:43; Deut. 7:6, 7). Jerusalem was "chosen" as the seat of the temple (1 Kings 11:13). Christ was chosen ("elect," Isa. 42:1) of God to be the Saviour of men. The apostles were "chosen before of God" to be witnesses of the resurrection (Acts 10:41). The declaration, "Many are called, but few chosen," means that the invitation is extended to many but that only few profit thereby so as to be finally accepted (Matt. 20:16; 22:14). This is understood by some to mean that few so live as to receive special honor. See ELECTION.

CHOZE'BA (Heb. חֹזֵבָא, ko-zeb-aw', deceitful), a city in the lowlands of Judah, "the men" of which are named among the descendants of Shelah (1 Chron. 4:22), the same as Chezib and Achzib (Gen. 38:5; Josh. 15:44).

CHRISM. See ANOINTING.

CHRIST (Gr. Χριστός, khris-tos', anointed), the official title of our Saviour (occurring first in 2 Esdras 7:29, and constantly in the New Testament), as having been consecrated by his baptism and the descent of the Holy Spirit as our Prophet, Priest, and King. See JESUS.

CHRIST, ASCENSION OF. See ASCENSION.

CHRIST, MONOGRAM OF. In the Roman catacombs and elsewhere is to be found a monogram consisting of the first two Greek letters of the name of Christ, X and P (our R), combined in various ways: $\text{X}\rho$, $\text{P}\chi$, $\text{P}\rho$. These letters were sometimes combined with Alpha (A) and Omega (Ω) in the form $\text{X}\rho\omega$, or suspended by chains from a transverse bar, thus: $\text{X}\rho\omega$. The date of its origin is uncertain, but it was widely known as early as A. D. 312, when Constantine applied it to coins and military standards. See SYMBOLISM.

CHRIST, OFFICES OF. See JESUS.

CHRIST, PERSON OF. See KENOSIS.

CHRIST, RESURRECTION OF. See RESURRECTION.

CHRISTENING, the ceremony of BAPTISM (q. v.), because: (a) Some hold that the person receiving that sacrament becomes thereby a member of Christ. (b) Baptism fixes the Christian or christened name of the child.

CHRISTIAN (Gr. Χριστιανός, khris-teo-an-os', follower of Christ), the name given to those who believe that Jesus is the Messiah; a member of the Christian Church. This name was first applied to the followers of Jesus at Antioch (Acts 11:26); but whether it was given to them by others or assumed by themselves is not stated. It was probably applied by the Gentiles. It was early adopted by the Christians (1 Pet. 4:16). There is nothing to prove that the name was at first a title of ridicule, although Agrippa probably used it in derision (Acts 26:28).

CHRISTMAS (Christ's Mass, or Festival), the annual festival held by the Christian Church in memory of the birth of Christ. It begins with the evening of December 24 (called Christmas Eve), and continues until Epiphany (January 6), the whole period being called Christmastide. It is more particularly observed on December 25, which is called Christmas Day, or simply Christmas.

As to whether our Lord's birth really occurred on December 25 ancient authorities are not agreed. Clement of Alexandria says that some place it on April 20, others on May 20, while Epiphanius states that in Egypt Jesus was believed to have been born on January 6. For a long time the Greeks had no special feast corresponding to Christmas Day. Chrysostom, in a Christmas sermon, A. D. 386, says: "It is not ten years since this day was clearly known to us, but it has been known from the beginning to those who dwell in the West." The whole Western Church unanimously agreed upon this date, and the Eastern Church adopted it without much contradiction.

Observance. As mentioned above, the whole period from Nativity to Epiphany was consecrated. The four Sundays preceding Christmas were incorporated with the cycle, under the title of the Advent, as a preparation for the festival. On Christmas Day, in the Roman Catholic Church, three masses were celebrated, viz., at midnight, dawn, and in the daytime, a custom still observed in collegiate and cathedral churches. "A mystical explanation of the three masses is given, and they are supposed to figure the three births of our Lord: of his Father before all ages, of the Blessed Virgin, and in the hearts of the faithful" (Cath. Dict., s. v.).

Several non-Christian elements have crept into the observance of Christmas. The use of lighted tapers reminds us of the Jewish feast of purification. The giving of presents was a Roman custom; while the yule tree and the yule log are remnants of old Teutonic nature worship. Gradually the festival sank into mere revelry. In England an abbot of misrule was chosen in every large household; in Scotland an abbot of unreason, who was master of the house during the festival. The custom was forbidden by an act of Parliament in 1555; and the reformation brought in a refinement in the celebration of Christmas by emphasizing its Christian elements.

CHRISTS, FALSE (Gr. ψευδοχριστοι, psuedokhris-toi), those who falsely claim to be the Messiah, and against whom our Lord warned his disciples (Matt. 24:24; Mark 13:22). About twenty-four such persons have had more or less prominence.

CHRONICLES. 1. First and Second Chronicles, the official records in the kingdoms of Judah and Israel. See BIBLE.

2. Other "Chronicles." It is manifest that the books of Chronicles and Ezra, though put into their present form by one hand, contain in fact extracts from the writings of many different writers, which were extant at the time the compilation was made. For the full account of the reign of David the compiler made copious extracts from the books of Samuel the seer, Nathan the prophet, and Gad the seer (1 Chron. 29:29). For the reign of Solomon he copied from "the book of Nathan," from "the prophecy of Ahijah the Shilonite," and from "the visions of Iddo the seer" (2 Chron. 9:29). Another work of Iddo, "the story (or interpretation, Midrash) of the prophet Iddo," supplied an account of the acts and the ways and sayings of King Abijah (13:22); while yet another book of Iddo concerning genealogies, with the book of the prophet Shemaiah, contained the acts of King Rehoboam (12:15). For later times the "book of the kings of Israel and Judah" is repeatedly cited (2 Chron. 25:26; 27:7; 32:32; 33:18, etc.), and "the sayings of the seers," or rather of Chozai (33:19, A. V. "seers"); and for the reigns of Uziah and Hezekiah "the vision of the prophet Isaiiah" (26:22; 32:32). Besides the above-named works there was also the public national record mentioned in Neh. 12:23. These "chronicles of David" are probably the same as those above referred to, written by Samuel, Nathan, and Gad. From this time the affairs of each king's reign were regularly recorded in a book (1 Kings 14:29; 15:7, etc.); and it was doubtless from this common source that the passages in the books of Samuel and Kings identical with the books of Chronicles were derived (Smith, Bib. Dict., s. v.).

CHRONOLOGY, NEW TESTAMENT. Chronology is the scientific measurement of time according to the revolutions of the heavenly bodies, when it is said to be astronomical, or, according to particular events occurring among men on earth, when it is called historical.

1. Difficulties of Chronology. The Chronology of the New Testament relates alike to the dates when the several books of which it is composed were written, and to the historicity of the facts recorded in their contents. Thus the origin of the Christian era is involved. But the modern chronologist is confronted with no inconsiderable difficulty at the very outset to fix the exact date of the nativity of Jesus Christ, as the founder of Christianity, which synchronizes with the beginning of the Christian era. This is due to the fact that he is compelled to base his computation on dateless documents written in a remote antiquity. For neither sacred nor profane authors in those times were at all accustomed to record historical facts under distinct dates. All demands were satisfied when known occurrences were referred to definite periods, as within a certain generation, or under a specific dynasty, or within the reign of a given ruler already familiar to the contemporaries addressed; for our modern method of historical notation according to the calendar was something altogether unknown to the ancients. A fine illustration of the ancient method is furnished in the third gospel, wherein a chronological minute is made of the beginning of the Baptist's ministry, compacting away and synchronizing in a single sentence the names of the ruling Cæsar at Rome, the several political rulers of Palestine under that emperor, the territories over which they presided, and even the high priests of the Jewish church at Jerusalem (Luke 3:1, 2). Now it does not follow that because such documents were dateless they were unhistorical, or in any sense to be discredited. Rather, as such was the universal custom of the times with historians, a departure from that method would at once justify a suspicion against an ancient document as unauthentic and incredible. See SUPPLEMENT.

2. Basis of Computation. The argument relies upon three capital facts: (a) The star of the ancient wise men, a scientific conclusion; (b) the death of Herod the Great, with special reference to an eclipse of the moon; and (c) the enrollment of the Jewish population at the birth of Christ, by the Roman Quirinius. The scholarly Dr. Edward Robinson states: "The present Christian era, which was fixed by the abbot Dionysius Exiguus in the 6th century, assumes the year of the Christian era as coincident with the year 754 from the building of Rome. Our era begins in any case more than four years too late; i. e., from four to five years at least after the actual birth of Christ. This era was first used in historical works by the Venerable Bede early in the 8th century, and was not long after introduced in public transactions by the French kings Pepin and Charlemagne" (Greek Harmony of the Gospels).

Dionysius Exiguus did not give origin to the Christian era, he merely computed it. Considering the data then at his command, his work is as remarkable for its difficulty as for its measure of success. However, the common consensus of eminent biblicists is that he erred in his conclusion by at least four years: that the beginning of the Christian era should properly have been dated at A. U. 750 instead of 754, which would have been coincident with B. C. 4 of our present chronology. There are several scientific and historical data now to be considered as determinative of the time of the nativity of Jesus Christ, upon which the Christian era is based.

(1) Star of the Wise Men. Matthew alone notes the passage of the Magi, who had crossed the deserts of the East, guided by the presence of a strange star to the feet of the infant Jesus. They ask of Herod, "Where is he that is born King of the Jews? for we have seen his star in the east, and are come to worship him." The appearance of a star was the predicted sign of the Messiah's birth as made by Balaam, the Moses of the Midianites. It reads: "There shall come a Star out of Jacob, and a Scepter shall rise out of Israel. . . . Out of Jacob shall come he that shall have dominion" (Num. 24:17, 19).

In reference to the star of the Magi Dr. Schaff remarks: "The Saviour was not without a witness among the heathen. Wise men from the East—i. e., Persian Magi, of the Zend religion, in which the idea of a Zoziosh, or redeemer, was clearly known—guided miraculously by a star or meteor created for the purpose, came and sought out the Saviour to pay him homage" (Smith, Bib. Dict., vol. ii, p. 1849, Hackett's ed.).

(1) Jewish intimations. (a) With reference to Balaam's prediction, the Jewish rabbis wrote in their Talmud: "When the Messiah shall be revealed there shall rise up in the east a star flaming with six colors" (R. Frey, Messiah, p. 137). "The star shall shine forth from the east, and this is the star of the Messiah. It shall shine forth from the east for fifteen days, and if it be prolonged it will be for the good of Israel" (Edersheim, Jesus of Nazareth, vol. i, p. 212).

(b) Those Jews who are still looking for their Messiah to come confidently expect a star to appear as the sign of his advent. So it was also in the early centuries of Christianity; and this explains why that celebrated messianic imposter succeeded so well in the reign of Hadrian, A. D. 132-135, who assumed the name Bar-Kokheba, i. e., "the son of a star," and issued coins bearing a star in allusion to Balaam's prediction. In his open rebellion against the Romans he found a large following of the Jews, but when made a prisoner he promised that if his captors killed him he would prove his Messiahship by rising from the dead. The Romans took him at his word and cut off his head. As he did not rise as he had promised, the Jews became disgusted and named him Bar-Kozibar, i. e., "the son of a lie!" (see Schaff's Hist. Christ. Church, vol. i, p. 402.) (c) Dr. Schaff also mentions the learned rabbi named Abaranel, or Abrabanel, as authority for the tradition of the Jews, "There was a conspicuous conjunction of planets . . . three years before the birth of Moses, in the sign Pisces," and that another "would occur before the Messiah's birth." This was fifty years before Kepler published his discovery of the conjunction of the planets Jupiter, Saturn, and Mars, in the sign Pisces, at the birth of Jesus. Kepler's discovery has since been verified by other eminent astronomers, "including Schubert, of Petersburg; Charles Pritchard, of London, honorable secretary of the Royal Astronomical Society; and Ideler and Encke, of Berlin." "Dean Alford accepts this view. . . . The mathematical calculation of Wieseler, placing the date of the appearance of the star at A. U. 750 is coincident with B. C. 4, the time of the corrected chronology of the nativity." "It is pronounced by Pritchard to be 'as certain as any celestial phenomenon of ancient date.'" "If we accept the results of these calculations of astronomers, we are brought to within two years of the nativity, viz., between A. U. 748 [B. C. 6] (Kepler), and 750 [B. C. 4] (Wieseler). The differences arise, of course, from the uncertainty of the time of the departure and length of the journey of the Magi" (Hist., i, 115, 116, 119).

(2) Chinese notations. Dr. Edersheim mentions the astronomical tables of the Chinese as being honored by Humboldt, which contains an account of this star; and that "Pingré and others have designated it as a comet," whose appearance was coincident with the visit of the Magi, which would "seem to go before (them) in the direction of, and stand over, Bethlehem." "And here the subject must, in the present state of information, be left" (see Jesus the Messiah, i, 213).

(2) Death of Herod the Great. He was sometimes known as Herod I. The first gospel relates that "Jesus was born in Bethlehem of Judea, in the days of Herod the king" (Matt. 2: 1; comp. Luke 1:5). Josephus, the celebrated Jewish priest and historian, born A. D. 37, affirms in both his historical works that Herod died in Jericho, in the valley of the Jordan, A. U. 750, or B. C. 4. It is known that his death occurred just before the Jewish Passover, on the 13th of March. This writer further remarks that on "that very night there was an eclipse of the moon" (Antiquities, book xvii, ch. xvii, 6, § 4; War, i, ch. i, 33, § 8). The fact of the eclipse is conspicuous for the reason that it is the only one mentioned by this writer, and that this circumstance furnishes a certain astronomical datum for determining the nativity, since Herod was then alive and "sought the young child's life."

When the Magi inquired of Herod respecting him "born King of the Jews," it filled him with consternation. "Herod the king . . . was troubled, and all Jerusalem with him." Fearing that the royal infant would be his supplanter, he "sent forth and slew all the male infants (ἀποστειλάς ἀνείλε πάντας τοὺς παῖδας, masc. plur.) from two years old and under." Joseph meanwhile had fled with the holy family into Egypt, "until the death of Herod," when an angel directed him to return to the land of Israel, "for they were dead who sought the young child's life." Now, Josephus relates that Herod, just five days before he died, slew his own son Antipater, which reveals his horrible character. This fact seems to have been confused with the account of the massacre of the infant children at Bethlehem when the report reached the emperor at Rome. Thereupon Macrobius states that Augustus Cæsar, recalling Herod's Jewish hatred of swine, said, "It is better to be Herod's hog than to be his son." ("Melius est Herodis porcum esse quam filium") (Saturnalia Convivia, ii, 4).

It is obvious that Jesus was born at least several months before the death of Herod; that the slaying of the innocents occurred between the birth of our Lord and the death of Herod; and withal, the moon's eclipse on that "very night" of his death renders it scientifically certain and ascertainable by mathematical calculation that Herod departed this life on March 13, A. U. 750, which is identical with the year B. C. 4, the year assumed as that of the nativity.

(3) Enrollment of Cyrenius* (Quirinius). Another chronological datum for determining the year of Christ's birth is furnished by the third gospel:

"Now it came to pass in those days, there went out a decree from Cæsar Augustus, that all the world should be enrolled. This was the first enrollment made when Quirinius was governor of Syria. And all went to enroll themselves, every one to his own city. And Joseph also went up from Galilee, out of the city of Nazareth, into Judea, to the city of David, which is called Bethlehem, because he was of the house and family of David; to enroll himself with Mary. . . . And she brought forth her firstborn son" (Luke 2: 1-7).

(1) Method of registration. This was a Roman registration conducted by the Jewish method. Every person was required to resort to his own tribal territory in order to be entered in the registry. By this simple but most significant circumstance Joseph and Mary left their residence in Galilee and came to their ancestral Bethlehem, in the territory of Judah, where Jesus was born; and Micah's prediction of the Messiah's birth was circumstantially realized: "Thou, Bethlehem Ephrathah . . . out of thee shall one come forth unto me who is to be ruler in Israel" (Mic. 5:2).

A headtax was imposed upon all men and women between the ages of fourteen and sixty-five (Schaff). Dr. Edersheim says: "In consequence of the decree of Cæsar Augustus, Herod [the Great] directed a general registration to be made after the Jewish rather than the Roman manner. . . . All country people were to be registered in their own city; meaning thereby the town to which the village or place where they were born was attached. In so doing the house or lineage of each was marked. According to the Jewish mode of registration the people would have to be enrolled according to tribes, families, or clans, and the house of their fathers. . . . In the case of Joseph and Mary, whose descent from David was not only known, but where, for the sake of the unborn Messiah, it was most important that this should be distinctly noted, it is natural that in accordance with Jewish law they should go to Bethlehem" (Jesus the Messiah, i, 182, 183).

(2) The two registrations. There has been in the past an interesting question: How could Cyrenius conduct an enrollment of the Jews at the birth of Christ, B. C. 4, when it is a known fact that he was appointed governor of Syria and made a registry ten years later, viz., in A. D. 6? The answer is that Cyrenius was twice appointed to this service. In the first instance it was a census of the population, taken with a view of replacing their tribute to the empire in produce by a headtax in money; and in the second it was a registration of their property. The census occurred B. C. 4 to A. D. 1. It was begun by Sentius Saturninus, governor of Syria, in A. U. 749, or B. C. 5, was then continued by Quintilius Varus until B. C. 4, and concluded by Cyrenius from the year B. C. 4 to A. D. 1, the time of the nativity. Luke expressly says, "This was the first enrollment." The second enrollment by Cyrenius occurred A. D. 10-14, according to the correct chronology.

Now, Luke makes historical notation of both enrollments in a way that indicates a perfect understanding of them on the part of his contemporaries. He refers to the first as a principal fact connecting it with the birth of Jesus; he refers to the second enrollment incidentally, in narrating what Gamaliel said in defense of the apostles before the Sanhedrin. In recounting different rebellions against the Romans in that country, Gamaliel said, "After this man rose up Judas of Galilee in the days of the enrollment" (comp. Luke 2:1-3 and Acts 5:37). It is of this registration that Josephus says: "Under his administration (Cyrenius's as procurator of Judea) it was that a certain Galileean whose name was Judas prevailed with his countrymen to revolt" (War, ii, 8, 1); "I mean that Judas who caused the people to revolt when Cyrenius came to take an account of the estates of the Jews" (Ant., xx, 5, 2).

The latest word touching these enrollments is that given by the eminent Augustus W. Zumpt, the classical scholar and archæologist of Berlin, whose recent researches have secured us "full historical probability, and whose conclusion of the date of the birth of Christ at the time of the census taken B. C. 4 by Cyrenius is indorsed by the scholarly Mommsen, and accords with the view of Ideler, Bergmann, Browne, Ussher, and Sanclemente" (Schaff).

(3) Patriotic references. These have their evidential value, coming from those who were so near in the succession of the apostles, and corroborating the historical character in the common understanding of their contemporaries respecting the census taken by Cyrenius at the time of the nativity. Manifold strength is added to these references in that they appeal directly to the registries of the Roman government for the truth of what they say. Justin Martyr (born A. D. 105) says: "Now there is a village in the land of the Jews, thirty-five stadia from Jerusalem, in which Christ was born, as you can ascertain also from the registries of the taxing under Quirinius [Cyrenius] your first procurator in Judea" (First Apology, ch. 34). Now, as Justin was defending the Christians from persecutions by the government, nothing could have been more unfortunate and fatal to his claim if the appeal to the public registries was false; but nothing could be stronger in evidence if the appeal was verified by the registration. This remark applies alike to Tertullian, of Carthage (born A. D. 160), who was a highly gifted lawyer, and who, writing with a different design from a different country, refers to the same enrollment, and the same period, when he says: "There is historical proof that at this very time a census had been taken in Judea by Sentius

*Cyrenius is his name derived from the Greek, Κυρήνιος, and Quirinius his proper Roman name.

CHRONOLOGY, NEW TESTAMENT

Saturninus, which might have satisfied their inquiry respecting the family and descent of Christ" (Marcion, iv, ch. 19).*

(4) Accounts of historians. Dr. Schaff cites with approval several high authorities as historians on this subject. He says: "Cassiodorus and Suidas expressly assert the fact of a general census, and add several particulars which are not derived from Luke; e. g., Suidas says that Augustus elected twenty commissioners of high character and sent them to all parts of the empire to collect statistics of the population. . . . Hence Huschke, Wieseler, Zumpt, Plumptre, and McClellan accept their testimony as historically correct. . . . Wieseler quotes also John Malala, the historian of Antioch, as saying . . . that 'Augustus in the thirtieth year and tenth month of his reign [i. e., B. C. 5 or 6] issued a decree for a general registration throughout the empire.' Julius Cæsar had begun a measurement of the whole empire, and Augustus completed it" (Hist. Christ. Church, vol. i, pp. 124, 125, note 4).

(5) Affirmation of an enemy. It is greatly to our advantage in the investigation of the truth of the gospels to cite the testimony of a conspicuous adversary of Christianity who lived in the early centuries of the era, touching this census taken by Cyrenius at the time of the nativity—Julian, born 331, a Roman emperor, known as "the Apostate," because, having been brought up a Christian, he repudiated this religion when he came to the throne. When in possession of all the archives of the empire he wrote against the Christians as one so conscious of the certainty of his source of information that he adopts a defiant tone, especially in reference to the enrollment of Joseph and Mary at Bethlehem, as mentioned by Luke. There is absolutely no known record of evidence that Jesus was "enrolled as one of Cæsar's subjects," unless it was at the time which Julian affirms. He says: "Jesus, whom you celebrate, was one of Cæsar's subjects. If you dispute it, I will prove it. . . . For yourselves allow that he was enrolled with his father and mother in the time of Cyrenius." "But Jesus having persuaded a few among you, and those the worst of men, has now been celebrated about three hundred years, having done nothing in his lifetime worthy of remembrance, unless anyone thinks it a mighty matter to heal lame and blind people, and exorcise demons in the villages of Bethsaida and Bethany" (Lardner's Works, vii, 626, 627).

*Franciscus Junius is quoted as authority for the historical statement that "the agent through whom Saturninus carried out the census in Judea was the governor Cyrenius, according to Luke, ch. 2" (Schaff).

(6) Monumental inscription. A monument has been unearthed at Rome between the Villa Hadriani and the Via Tiburtina. The name of him to whom the monument was dedicated is obliterated. Bergmann, Mommsen, and Merivale refer it to Cyrenius. Then it reads: "Quirinius as proconsul obtained Asia as his province. As legate of the deified Augustus a second time, he governed Syria and Phœnicia" (see Schaff's Hist. Christ. Church, i, 122, 123).

(7) Christ's confirmation. There is a direct implication of Christ's loyalty, as "one of Cæsar's subjects," to "the powers that be," as on the notable occasion when he met the Jews with the answer, "Render unto Cæsar the things which are Cæsar's" (Matt. 22:15-22). This wonderfully wise reply which silenced his adversaries is a record which is exactly accordant with the witness of the emperor, who as the head of the imperial government had in his possession, for reference, all the registrations of the Jews. Julian said: "Jesus whom you celebrate was one of Cæsar's subjects. If you dispute it I will prove it by and by; but it may as well be done now. For you yourselves allow that he was enrolled with his father and mother in the time of Cyrenius." This is an independent and complete confirmation of Matthew.

These, then, are the three principal arguments respecting the birth of Jesus, and therefore dating properly the Christian era at least four years earlier, viz.: (a) That based upon the science of astronomy relating to the Star of the Magi, as developed by Kepler and improved by other astronomers; (b) the death of Herod the Great, dated by the eclipse of the moon; and (c) the argument based on history due to the researches of Zumpt in regard to the date of Cyrenius's registration of the Jews. Respecting this census, in distinction from a later registration by the same person as indicated by Luke, the patristic appeals made by Justin and Tertullian to the documents in the possession of the government; the assumption of fact in the declaration by the Emperor Julian, who directly connects Christ with the census-taking of Cyrenius and his parents' registration; the confirmatory testimony of the secular historians Cassiodorus, Suidas, and John Malala, of Antioch, to a universal registration throughout the world; the monumental reference at Rome to the same transaction of Cyrenius; and Christ's own conduct in holding himself to be "a subject of Cæsar" by paying the usual imperial tribute to the receivers, are all so many facts corroborating the statement of Luke as historical, and fixing the proper date of the Christian era at least four years earlier than for our present current chronology.

CHRONOLOGY, OLD TESTAMENT.

1. Definition. Biblical chronology is a branch of historical chronology, which is distinguished from mathematical or astronomical chronology by its being occupied not with divisions of time in the abstract (see TIME), but with the relations of actual events in the order of time as they have occurred in human history. It takes for granted the divisions and terms of mathematical chronology, such as day, week, month, year, cycle, and uses them for its own purposes. The exact point of time at which any event occurs is its date. But the date itself is a relative term, and always means the interval of time between the event and some fixed point in human history, arbitrarily chosen as the starting place or the goal in the process of measurement. Such a chief point of reference is an era. If we were dealing with the chronology of universal history we should have to consider quite a number of such eras, as they have been devised by various peoples in various ages. In biblical chronology, however, we need only to refer to the single great era of the birth of the Christ. This event is, moreover, such a great dividing point between the ancient and the modern world, between the Old and the New Testament ages, that we may treat of the chronology of the Old Testament separately from that of the New.

The subject falls into two great divisions—the ascertainment of the time at which the events occurred, and the arrangement of the dates thus obtained into a chronological system. Practically, however, the one branch of the subject runs into the other, and it will be our simplest plan to find out what data the Bible itself furnishes, how they are to be used, what are our sources of information outside of the Bible, and what the results obtainable by combining all our items of knowledge.

We may notice at the outset that we have to do here with a department of biblical introduction, not with the criticism or explanation of the text itself. Biblical chronology is not concerned at all with the teaching of the Bible, not even with facts of Bible history. It is rather a species of applied arithmetic. When we have to deal with numbers there is no question of opinion involved, and none properly admissible. The separate statements of the Bible as to the time of the occurrence of events are, of course, matters of textual criticism, but when the sense is once ascertained they pass beyond this region into that of pure numerical calculation, precisely like the data obtainable from the Assyrian monuments and other outside sources. This caution is necessary, because, as we shall see, there are great difficulties in the adjustment of the biblical numbers, and the whole subject is often treated as though the truth of Revelation were itself to be staked upon the correctness of some time-honored system of biblical chronology.

2. Old Testament Data. We should properly begin by inquiring what chronological data are furnished by the Old Testament itself. We may summarize the state of the case as follows:

(1) Early chronology incomplete. The ancient Hebrews did not arrive at a definite method of noting time till near the close of their independent political history. In fact, no nation of great antiquity except the Babylonians and Assyrians were in the habit of noting the time of events regularly and by system. In this matter they were most nearly approached by the Egyptians. That a people should be chronologers in any real sense two conditions are necessary: First, there should be among them a class of professional and business men who are familiar with numeration, calculation, and measurement on a large scale. Among the Babylonians this condition was very early fulfilled, because they had already taken the first steps in science, especially in computation and epistles some years later. This view "is advocated or accepted by Neander, Lücke, Bleek, Ewald, DeWette, Baur, Hilgenfeld, Reuss, Düsterdieck, Weiss, Renan, Aubé, Stuart, Davidson, Cowles, Bishop Lightfoot, Westcott, and Schaff." The great majority of older commentators, and among the recent ones Elliott, Alford, Hengstenberg, Ewald, Lange, Hofmann, Godet, Lee, etc., favor the traditional date, as the external evidence indicates, which is after Domitian's death in A. D. 96. John is said to have died a natural death in the reign of Trajan, about A. D. 98 (see Schaff, Hist. Christ. Church, 1, pp. 423, 834).—S. L. B.

mensuration, and also had manifold and widespread mechanical and business interests, which required the application of such technical knowledge. Second, there must needs be some large institution or institutions whose history and annals were so extensive and complicated as to need careful and systematic recording. The Babylonians had such institutions in their city states of vast antiquity, and also in their colossal temples, which were centers of varied business and social activity, apart from their functions in matters of religion. The ancient Hebrews, as a nomadic people, whose civic and religious institutions were not permanently settled till the monarchy had been well established, were devoid of such incentives to chronological reckoning and registration.

(2) Old Testament writers. Accordingly, we find that when the Old Testament writers and compilers came to indicate periods or intervals of time in the days before the kingdom they employed methods which necessarily yielded only very general results. Thus (a) for the ages before Moses they made the head of a family group or clan stand for his descendants composing such a community till a new community of the same kind branched off from it. Thus we have an explanation of the apparently enormously long lives of the antediluvians. In the old Semitic languages it was a very common usage to denote such a family or kin by the name of its ancestral head, and the very designation of such a community was the term "a life" (hayy). (b) In the genealogical tables, which were formerly taken seriously as the basis of an exact biblical chronology, omissions of greater or less extent were made, the only object being to give the line of descent, with some indication of the duration of the most important families. Hence the sum of the numbers there given does not necessarily give the total length of antediluvian time. (c) In the period that intervened till the final establishment of the kingdom round numbers were regularly employed. The constant occurrence of the number forty is the most striking case in point. It is evident that here also it is useless to attempt anything like exact computation of long intervals of time, or an accurate ascertainment of dates, except by a sure synchronism with some event whose time is fixed by independent evidence. Thus, when we profess to be able to give the approximate date of Abraham or of the Exodus, we do so by combination with contemporaneous events in Babylonia or Egypt, whose dates are known from the monuments.

(3) Causes of more correct chronology. The main causes that promoted an exact system of time-reckoning among the Hebrews were the recording of the annals of the kingdom and the influence of Babylonian and Assyrian methods. It was not till after the division of the kingdom that a strict record was kept. We find in the books of the Kings a regular series of synchronisms between the regents of the two kingdoms of Israel and Judah. These, however, though of great help to us, are not always reliable, for the obvious reason that they were a matter of calculation, while the lengths of the reigns were a matter of contemporary record. On this account, and also because there seems to be a good deal of textual corruption in the numbers of the Old Testament generally, uncertainty still prevails with regard to the time of accession and decease, and the number of the regnal years, of several of the kings of Israel and Judah. For example, the data with regard to the time of the accession of Hezekiah of Judah are so inconsistent that no less than three separate dates (727, 720, 715 B. C.) are assignable to it, according as we rely upon one source of information or another in the second book of the Kings. As will be seen, however, it is possible, with the aid of the Assyrian monuments, to make out an almost exact tabulation of the years of the kings from the time of David (c. 1000 B. C.) onward.

(4) Dating by reigns of kings. In the method of reckoning or the chronological system of the ancient Hebrews we remark the absence of a definite principle. In the royal annals it became the custom to indicate the time of an event by saying that it took place in such or such a year of the reign of the king. This, on the whole, was a good system, though in times of anarchy and frequent changes of dynasty the notation was apt to be confused. In the later books from Jeremiah onward frequent references are also made to the years of the kings of Babylon or Persia, and these are of very great value. Apart from this imperfect system no fixed era was employed any more than among most other ancient peoples. Even two hundred years after the division of the kingdom we find a primitive method employed by Amos, who dates his prophecy with reference to a famous earthquake in the days of Uzziah. The great epochs of national history, such as the Exodus and the foundation of Solomon's temple, are referred to also (1 Kings 6:1), but not consistently or permanently employed. This does not prejudice the results obtained from the biblical data, except in so far as the lack of a definite term of comparison and measurement has deprived us of a means of verification, which in the chronology of some later nations has been found to be of the highest value.

(5) Usher's chronology. The system of biblical chronology which goes under the name of Archbishop Usher has kept its ground not because of its correctness, but because something of the kind is needed, and it is more elaborate and plausible than its rivals. It, like other systems less in vogue, depends upon the correctness of the numbers given in the received Hebrew text, besides assuming that there are no breaks or omissions in the genealogical lists. We thus are told that from the Creation to the Flood one thousand six hundred and fifty-six years elapsed. But the Septuagint version makes the same summation to be two thousand two hundred and forty-two years, while the Samaritan gives us but one thousand three hundred and seven. It is probable that the Hebrew numbers are, on the whole, more correct, but no one can be sure that they are uniformly so. Another period we may take as stretching as far as the Exodus, which, according to Usher, on the same numerical basis, occurred in the year of the world 2513, or B. C. 1491. Choosing, for convenience, a date in the history of the divided monarchy of Israel, we find that, according to the same authority, the death of Ahab, of the northern kingdom, took place in 897 B. C. The fall of Samaria is put by Usher at 719 B. C. The correct dates of these events we shall indicate and demonstrate presently. Meantime these outstanding citations may be sufficient to show the character of the results obtainable by using the current numbers of the received Hebrew text.

3. Other Sources of Information. It will now be in place to indicate the character of the information obtainable from other sources, which we may use as a check upon the system just described.

(1) Canon of Ptolemy. Apart from the scanty information obtained from Greek historians, the main dependence of inquirers for the time from the middle of the 8th century B. C. onward was the famous "Canon of Ptolemy," a list of the rulers of Babylon from Nabonassar, 747 B. C., to Darius III of Persia, 335 B. C. These dates are subject to control from various sources, and by comparing them with the biblical numbers a fairly correct exhibit could be made of the chronology of the later history of the kingdom of Judah and of the Jewish state under the Persian domination. As above remarked, a much more exact system of time notation was observed by biblical writers during these later days.

(2) The monuments. But the whole science of biblical chronology has been revolutionized by the disclosures of the monuments of Egypt and Assyria and Babylonia, particularly of the last two countries. In Babylonia, whose civilization is the oldest in the world, and where the divisions of time based on astronomical observation first became current, the notation of years was made in connection with the temple feasts. Thus they became a matter of regular record, so that very long intervals of time could be calculated with accuracy. It is from this source, for example, that we learn indirectly the date of Abraham. One of the oldest cities of Babylonia was the biblical Erech, the seat of the worship of Ishtar (Astarte). In 645 B. C. Asshur-bani-pal, king of Assyria, in his conquest of Elam, brought back to Erech from Susa (Shushan), the capital of Elam, a statue of Ishtar which had been carried away by the Elamites one thousand six hundred and thirty-five years before. Thus we have 2280 B. C. as the date of a great invasion of Babylonia by the Elamites. Now in Gen. 14 there is an account of the subjugation of southern Palestine by a number of eastern princes under the lead of Elam. Abraham repelled these invaders. There was no general occupation of Babylonia by the Elamites that we know of other than this in the 23d century B. C. We may allow from twenty to thirty years from 2280 till Abraham's victory, which is thus fixed at about the year 2250 B. C.

Among the Assyrians a still more systematic method was in vogue. Each year was named after its presiding magistrate (limu), and was so referred to perpetually. Lists of these names made out in order have been preserved more or less complete, and some of the lists have important events of the years noted along with the names. Thus it is possible to make out an unbroken reference table from 893 to 666 B. C. The reigning king takes his turn as one of these magistrates, and thus we stand on firm ground throughout, by connecting with the Canon of Ptolemy. An eclipse of the sun mentioned for the month Sivan of the year that would correspond to 763 B. C. has been proved by astronomical calculation to have occurred on June 15 of that year, a fact which guarantees the correctness of the system.

4. Dates Established. If a series of synchronisms can be found at points of contact between the history of Israel and Assyria, we can obtain also a sure foundation for the chronology of Israel. An opportunity is afforded by a statement in an inscription of Shalmaneser II (860-825 B. C.), that in 854 Ahab of Israel was in alliance with Ben-hadad II of Damascus against himself. Such a rare event seems to be provided for by the peace of Aphek, which apparently took place the year before (1 Kings 20:34), i. e., the year corresponding to 855. In the third year thereafter war was resumed between Ahab and Ben-hadad (1 Kings 22:1), and the former was slain at the battle of Ramoth-gilead. We therefore set down 853 as the date of the death of Ahab. Confirmatory of this is the statement that Jehu of Israel offered homage to Shalmaneser in 842, the twelfth year thereafter, i. e., naturally at the beginning of his reign over Israel (comp. 2 Kings 9:29 and 8:26). Passing over other points, we observe that the fall of Samaria, synchronous with the accession of Sargon of Assyria, is fixed at the end of 722 B. C. It has already been mentioned that, according to Usher's system, the death of Ahab occurred in 897 and the fall of Samaria in 719.

To go further back to a very important event, the Exodus from Egypt, we have seen that it occurred, according to Usher's system, in 1491 B. C. That this date is wrong by nearly, if not quite, three centuries is easily proved. By a concurrence of various kinds of testimony, native Egyptian, Assyrian and Babylonian, and astronomical, we can date with approximate correctness the famous eighteenth and nineteenth Egyptian dynasty. The limits are from about 1580 to about 1210. During nearly the whole of that period, and certainly from 1520 to 1210, Palestine was practically a province of Egypt, and such an event as its occupation by Israel was out of the question. The Exodus must therefore have taken place about the end of the 13th or the beginning of the 12th century B. C. The recent discovery of an allusion to the people of Israel in Palestine in the reign of Meneptah (about 1250 B. C.) cannot be connected with the historic occupation of that country, but only with the possible resettlement or survival there of a fragment of the Hebrew race.

From such data as those above set forth we construct our best available chronological framework of the Old Testament history. For details see the article HISTORY.—J. F. McC.

CHRYSOLITE, CHRYSOPRASE. See MINERAL KINGDOM.

CHUB (Heb. כִּיב, koob, only Ezek. 30:5), a nation in alliance with Egypt, and probably near

It. The latest edition of Gesenius's Heb. Lex. proposes to read לוֹב, loob, a singular form of לוֹבִיִּים, loo-beem' (Libyans), which elsewhere occurs only in the plural. Some propose לוֹב, noob (Nubia), as the Arabic version has Noobeh. At least one Hebrew manuscript has לוֹבִי, keh-noob', with which we may compare the Egyptian Ceneb, or Gheneb, used by Thothmes III in a collective sense for the nations south of Egypt. But these emendations are only conjectures.—W. H.

CHUN (Heb. כּוּן, koon, founding, 1 Chron. 18: 8), a city of Hadarezer, king of Syria, in Aram-zobah, on the highway to the Euphrates, and plundered by David for brass and copper wherewith to build the temple. Called Berothai (2 Sam. 8:8). Probably the same as Berothah (Ezek. 47:16).

CHURCH. 1. The Term, General Use. The word church is used to express various meanings, the most common of which are: (1) The entire body composed of those who are savingly related to Christ. (2) The aggregate of all the ecclesiastical communion professing faith in Christ. (3) A particular Christian denomination. (4) A single organized Christian congregation. (5) A building dedicated for Christian worship. It is essential to keep this large variety of meanings clearly in mind to prevent confusion of thought and discussion upon this subject.

2. New Testament. The New Testament word translated Church is the Gr. ἐκκλησία, ek-klay-see'-ah, called out, i. e., "the called," "the elect." The fundamental meaning of the term thus appears to be the whole company of true believers—those called out from the world into the spiritual communion of which Christ is the head. We find, however, narrower and lower meanings attached to the word. It refers sometimes to the company of believers in a single province or city, or those meeting in a particular place of worship. It is applied even to bodies of professed believers who have largely departed from true faith and practice, though in such cases the title is no longer appropriate, except as a reminder of what they once were, or as only a name or convenient designation, the significance of which in such cases is wholly lost. The connection must determine in every case the sense in which the term is employed.

3. The Idea of the Church. From the foregoing it is plain that, according to the New Testament Scripture, the Church, in the deepest and truest sense of the term, is the entire number of the saved, whether upon the earth or in heaven, united in one spiritual household by salvation through Christ. It embraces thus both "the Church militant" and "the Church triumphant." The Church upon earth is not, therefore, when viewed strictly, a visible ecclesiastical organization, or all of them taken together; for such organizations have commonly, to say the least, embraced some who are not true believers, and the forms and methods of these organizations are marked by much that is merely human and correspondingly imperfect. These organizations are called Churches largely by way of accommodation. They are worthy of the designation only in proportion as they represent the spirit and purpose of Christ, who is the Head of the true Church. And yet Churches, in the sense of outward organization, are necessary. It is often said, "The Churches are not Christianity;" but, true as this is, it is also true that Christianity necessarily results in Churches. The ideas, experiences, and purposes that Christians hold in common must lead to this result. And, besides this, Christianity operates practically upon the world chiefly through the Churches. Thus it appears that, while the Churches are not identical with the Church, they are nevertheless its more or less perfect representations, and its more or less helpful and necessary adjuncts and instrumentalities. And, further, it should be said, that Christ contemplated and in some measure arranged for the formation of Churches. The apostles specially authorized to carry forward his work labored not only to lead men to a saving knowledge of Christ, but were active also in establishing Churches. The form of these organizations, however, has been a subject of much contention (see EPISCOPACY, PRESBYTERIANISM, CONGREGATIONALISM). But it is clear from the New Testament Scriptures that the Churches, as visible institutions, along with all their human elements, may, and are required to, contain a divine element which gives to them great dignity and importance and power. These considerations prepare us to appreciate justly the conflicting views as to the true idea of the Church. The Roman Catholic view (held also by the Greek Church and High Church Episcopalians) is that the Church is a visible organization, the form of which is divinely ordered, however much these parties differ as to which is the true Church. The Protestant doctrine, on the other hand, lays principal stress upon the personal relation of Christians to Christ as constituting them members of the true Church; while at the same time the importance of the outward organizations is duly regarded. The distinction between the visible and the invisible Church is a proper distinction rescued and made emphatic by Protestantism.

4. Roman Catholic and Protestant Statements. The authoritative utterances of Romanists and of Protestants illustrate this difference of view. For example, the Catechism of Trent (Roman Catholic) says: "The Church is one, because, as the apostle says, there is 'one Lord, one faith, one baptism;' but more especially because it has one invisible ruler, Christ, and one visible, viz., the occupant for the time being of the chair of St. Peter at Rome." Luther's Larger Catechism says: "I believe that there is upon earth a certain community of saints, composed solely of holy persons, under one Head, collected together by the Spirit; of one faith and one mind; endowed with manifold gifts, but united in love and without sects and divisions." The Church of England (Art. xix) says: "A congregation of faithful men, in which the pure word of God is preached, and the sacraments duly administered according to Christ's ordinance, in all those things that of necessity are requisite to the same." This is also the definition given by the Methodist Episcopal Church. These quotations might be greatly multiplied; but enough is given to show the main line of divergence and the position and trend of Protestant doctrine upon this subject.

5. The Relation of the Church to the Kingdom of God. The relation of the Church to the kingdom of God is a point often involved in confusion through inexact use of terms. As a visible institution the Church is not that kingdom, but at the most, as Van Oosterzee describes it, "the training school of the kingdom of God." We are permitted to think only of the invisible Church as identical with the kingdom to which Christ referred so frequently; though even then it should be remembered that "the kingdom of God" has often a much broader meaning than his gracious government of his saints. "His kingdom ruleth over all."

6. Unity of the Church. Christ prayed that his followers "may all be one." But that he meant by this, or that he even contemplated, the formation of one outward organization that should embrace all Christians in external unity is an idea that has no support in Scripture. The opposite is implied in his words, "My kingdom is not of this world." Unity is an attribute of the invisible Church. All Christians are bound together in "the unity of the Spirit," having "one Lord, one faith, one baptism, one God and Father of all" (Eph. 4:3-6). The evils of sectarianism, and false ideas as to what constitutes the true Church, have led to the desire for what in recent times has been misnamed Church unity, viz., uniformity, or oneness of outward organization. But however desirable it is that denominational rivalries and sectarian strife shall cease, and whatever advantage would be likely to come with larger cooperation of Christian bodies, still it is believed by many that the formation of one all-embracing ecclesiastical establishment would be fraught with great perils and lead to great harm.

7. The Ethics of the Church. As visible institutions Churches must exercise government over their members. What rules of conduct they may properly impose and enforce is, however, a question of great importance. If the Church is, as Roman Catholics hold, infallible, because divinely inspired, then all that the Church may require is of divine obligation. If the Churches, as some seem to hold, are merely voluntary human societies formed for Christian purposes, then such rules as from a human standpoint may seem appropriate are binding upon those who enter and remain in their communion; though at the same time the obligation of entering or remaining becomes, to say the least, greatly reduced. But if, according to the Protestant theory, the Churches are divine-human institutions, and not infallible, the rules of conduct must be in accordance with the teachings of the infallible word. The ethical standard of the visible Church must be simply that of the Holy Scriptures, otherwise the true idea of the Church is lost sight of and the Church assumes either too much or too little. Only by adhering to the word of God as the "rule of faith and practice" can the Churches save themselves from the two extremes: on the one hand, that of unduly magnifying the authority of the visible Church, or, on the other, that of laying aside its highest claim to recognition and obedience.

8. Literature. Works on Systematic Theology, chapters treating of Ecclesiology, or the Doctrine of the Church. Of special value: Van Oosterzee's Christian Dogmatics, Watson's Theological Institutes, Dorner's System of Christian Doctrine, Pope's Compendium of Christian Theology. CHURL (Heb. כְּזֵב, kee-lah'ee, withholding, Isa. 32:5, 7), a fraudulent person, a deceiver.

CHURLISH (the rendering of the Heb. קָשָׁה, kaw-sheh', severe), a word descriptive of a coarse, ill-natured fellow (1 Sam. 26:3); probably the same in meaning as "hard" (Matt. 25:24).

CHURNING (Heb. צָרַץ, meets, squeezing, Prov. 30:33), signifies the act of pressing, rendered in the same verse "wringing" and "forcing," and agrees with the ancient method of making butter.

CHU'SHAN-RISHATHA'IM (Heb. כּוּשָׁן רִישַׁתַּיִם, koo-shan' rish-aw-thah'-yim), a king of Mesopotamia who oppressed the Israelites for eight years; the form in some English Bibles of CUSHAN-RISHATHAIM (q. v.).

CHU'ZA (Gr. Χουζᾶς, khoo-d-zas', possession), the "steward" of Herod (Antipas), whose wife, JOANNA (q. v.), having been cured by our Lord either of possession by an evil spirit or of a disease, became attached to that body of women who accompanied him on his journeyings (Luke 8:3).

CIELED, CIELING. See CEILED.

CILICIA (Gr. Κιλικία, kil-ik-ee'-ah), the southeasterly province of Asia Minor, and upon the Mediterranean Sea, with Tarsus, the birthplace of St. Paul, its capital. A Roman province, B. C. 67. The Jews of Cilicia had a synagogue at Jerusalem (Acts 6:9). It was famous for its goats' hair. Paul learned his trade of tentmaking here, and visited it soon after his conversion (Gal. 1:21; Acts 9:30). Cicero was once consul of it. Its climate was luxurious and attracted Greek residents (Acts 15:41; Acts 21:39).

CINNAMON. See VEGETABLE KINGDOM.

CIN'NERETH, another form of CHINNE-RETH (q. v.).

CIRCLE (Heb. קוֹרָה, khooq). "It is he that sitteth upon the circle of the earth" (Isa. 40:22). The same word is applied (Job 22:14, rendered "circuit") to the heavens, which the ancients supposed to be a hollow sphere. The figure then is of Jehovah sitting or walking upon the heavens, which were thought to arch over the earth.

CIRCUIT. (1) In 1 Sam. 7:16 (Heb. סָבַב, saw-bab', to revolve), a regular tour of inspection; in Eccles. 1:6, the periodical direction of the winds, which in the East are quite regular in their seasons. (2) In Job' 22:14 the Hebrew word is קוֹרָה, khooq, CIRCLE (q. v.). (3) The act of going round (Heb. הִסְבִּיב, tek-oo-faw', revolution), the apparent diurnal revolution of the sun around the earth (Psa. 19:6), the completion of a year (Exod.

34:22; 2 Chron. 24:23, rendered "end of the year"), or of the term of pregnancy (1 Sam. 1:20, rendered "the time was come about").

CIRCUMCISION (Heb. מִלּוּאָה, moo-law'; Gr. περιτομή, per-il-om-ay', a cutting around).

1. The Ceremony of circumcision consisted in cutting away the foreskin, i. e., the hood or fold of skin containing the penis. This is generally done by means of a sharp knife, but in more primitive times sharp stones were used (Exod. 4:25; Josh. 5:2, "knives of flint"). As a rule this act was performed by the father (Gen. 17:23), although it might be done by any Israelite, and, if necessary, women as well (Exod. 4:25), but never by a Gentile. In later times the operation was, in the case of adults, performed by a doctor. The Jews of the present day intrust it to a mohel (Heb. מוֹהֵל) appointed especially for the purpose. In later times the naming of the child accompanied the act of circumcision (Luke 1:59).

2. History. After God had made a covenant with Abraham (Gen. 15) he commanded that, as a token of the covenant, every male should be circumcised; not merely the children and bodily descendants of Abraham, but also those born in his house and purchased slaves, and that in the case of children on the eighth day after birth. Every one not so circumcised was to be "cut off from his people" as having "broken the covenant" (Gen. 17:10-14).

Circumcision was formally enacted as a legal institute by Moses (Lev. 12:3; John 7:22, 23), and was made to apply, not only to one's own children, but to slaves, home-born or purchased; to foreigners before they could partake of the pass-over or become Jewish citizens (Exod. 12:48).

During the wilderness journey circumcision fell into disuse. This neglect is most satisfactorily explained as follows: The nation, while bearing the punishment of disobedience in its wanderings, was regarded as under temporary rejection by God, and was therefore prohibited from using the sign of the covenant.

As the Lord had only promised his assistance on condition that the law given by Moses was faithfully observed, it became the duty of Joshua, upon entering Canaan, to perform the rite of circumcision upon the generation that had been born in the wilderness. This was done, immediately upon crossing the Jordan, at or near Gilgal (Josh. 5:2, sq.).

From this time circumcision became the pride of Israel, they looking with contempt upon all those people not observing it (Judg. 14:3; 15:18; 1 Sam. 14:6; Isa. 52:1, etc.). It became a rite so distinctive of them that their oppressors tried to prevent their observing it, an attempt to which they refused submission (1 Macc. 1:48, 50, 60, 62).

The process of restoring a circumcised person to his natural condition by a surgical operation was sometimes undergone from a desire to assimilate themselves to the heathen around them, or that they might not be known as Jews when they appeared naked in the games. Against having recourse to this practice, from an excessive anti-Judaistic tendency, St. Paul cautions the Corinthians (1 Cor. 7:18, 19). The attitude which Christianity, at its introduction, assumed toward circumcision was one of absolute hostility so far as the necessity of the rite to salvation or its possession of any religious or moral worth were concerned (Acts 15:5; Gal. 5:2).

3. Pagan. Circumcision was practiced by the Edomites, Moabites, Ammonites, and Egyptians, but among the last only by the priests and those who wanted to be initiated into the sacred mysteries. The practice has also been found to exist among the Ethiopians, Colchians, Congo Negroes, and many savage tribes in the heart of Africa; also among American Indian tribes, e. g., the Salivas, the Guamos, the Octamotos on the Orinoco, among the inhabitants of Yucatan and of Mexico, and the Fiji Islanders. See SUPPLEMENT.

4. Significance. With respect to the symbolical significance of circumcision, it is said to have originated in phallus worship, but if so this would have no bearing on the Israelite view of the rite. It was practiced, say some, because of its medical advantages, as the warding off of disease through ease in cleanliness, or that it served to increase the generative powers, but these can hardly be received as proper explanations, for whole nations not practicing circumcision appear as healthy and fruitful. Nor can the rite be brought into connection with the idea of sacrifice, "the consecration of a part of the body for the whole," or even "as an act of emasculation in honor of the Deity, that has gradually dwindled down to the mere cutting away of the foreskin."

We must rather look for the significance of this rite in the fact that the corruption of sin usually manifests itself with peculiar energy in the sexual life, and that the sanctification of the life was symbolized by the purifying of the organ by which life is reproduced. But, as spiritual purity was demanded of the chosen people of God, circumcision became the external token of the covenant between God and his people. It secured to the one subjected to it all the rights of the covenant, participation in all its material and spiritual benefits; while, on the other hand, he was bound to fulfill all the covenant obligations. It had not, however, a sacramental nature; it was not a vehicle through which to convey the sanctifying influences of God to his people, but was simply a token of admission to the covenant of grace with God.

The circumcision of the child on the eighth day seems to have been founded on the significance that attached to the number seven, so far as that number denotes a period of time. On the eighth day, when a new cycle of life began, the child entered into covenant with God, into a new world, into the kingdom of God. Again, it was not until the eighth day that the child was supposed to possess an independent existence.

5. Figurative. Circumcision was used as a symbol of purity of heart (Deut. 10:16; 30:6; comp. Lev. 26:41; Jer. 4:4; 9:25; Ezek. 44:7). "Who am of uncircumcised lips" (Exod. 6:12). By this figure Moses would seem to imply that he was unskilled in public address, as the Jews were wont to consider circumcision a perfecting of one's powers. Circumcision is also figurative of a readiness to hear and obey (Jer. 6:10). Christians are the true spiritual circumcision, i. e., the spiritual Israel (Phil. 3:3; Col. 2:11).

CIS, a Grecized form (Acts 13:21) of the name of KISH (q. v.), the father of King Saul.

CISTERN (Heb. בֹּרָא, or בְּרֵר, bore, a dug place), a receptacle for holding water (Prov. 5:15; Eccles. 12:6; Isa. 36:16; Jer. 2:13). Sometimes these were dug around a spring to retain the water coming therefrom. Those which generally bore the name of cisterns were covered reservoirs, dug out of the earth or rock, into which, in the rainy seasons, the rain or a flowing stream was conducted for storage. The absence of rain during the summer months (May to September) makes it necessary to collect and preserve the water, which falls in abundance during the remainder of the year. These cisterns were usually large pits, but sometimes extensive vaults, open only by a small mouth. The mouth was closed with a large flat stone, over which sand was spread to prevent easy discovery (Cant. 4:12, "sealed fountains"). Mud would naturally accumulate at the bottom of these cisterns, so that anyone falling therein would be likely to perish (Jer. 38:6; Psa. 40:2).

In cities, the chief dependence for water being upon cisterns, they were carefully made, either hewn out of the rock or constructed of masonry.

Empty cisterns were sometimes used as prisons; thus Joseph was cast into a pit (Gen. 37:22; Heb. בֹּרָא, bore), and Jeremiah was also thrown into one (Jer. 38:6). Thomson says (Land and Book) that dry cisterns are used in Palestine as granaries.

Figurative. (a) The breaking of the wheel at the cistern, used to draw up the bucket, is used (Eccles. 12:6) as an image of the dissolution of the bodily powers. (b) To "drink waters out of thine own cistern" (Prov. 5:15) means to confine one's self to pleasures legitimately his own. (c) "Broken cisterns" (Jer. 2:13) as tanks not only without feeding springs, but unable to even retain the water flowing into them, are symbols of all earthly, as compared with heavenly, means of satisfying man's highest needs.

CITIES. See CITY.

CITIES OF REFUGE (Heb. עָרֵי הַמִּיקָטָה, ay-ray ham-mik-lavt). When the Israelites had come into the land of Canaan they were to choose towns conveniently situated as "cities of refuge," to which the manslayer who had killed a person by accident might flee. Three of these cities were located on each side of the Jordan (six in all). Those on the west of the Jordan were: Kedesh in Galilee (1 Chron. 6:76); Shechem in Mount Ephraim (Josh. 21:21; 1 Chron. 6:67); Hebron in Judah (Josh. 21:11; 2 Sam. 5:5; 1 Chron. 6:55); on the east of Jordan were Bezer, in the plain of Moab (Deut. 4:43; Josh. 20:8); Ramoth-gilead, in the tribe of Gad (Deut. 4:43; Josh. 21:38; 1 Kings 22:3); and Golan, in Bashan, in the half tribe of Manasseh (Deut. 4:43; Josh. 21:27; 1 Chron. 6:71). They were also Levitical cities. See LEVITIC.

Regulations. The following were the regulations respecting the asylum offered by the cities of refuge: The AVENGER OF BLOOD (q. v.) was allowed to kill the manslayer if he overtook him before reaching the city (Num. 35:19). The fugitive before he could avail himself of the shelter must undergo a solemn trial, and prove to the congregation that the killing was accidental (Num. 35:12, 24); if acquitted of intentional killing he must remain within the city or its suburbs until the death of the high priest, and if found outside its limits might be put to death by the avenger of blood (Num. 35:25, sq.).

According to the rabbins, in order to aid the fugitive it was the business of the Sanhedrin to keep the roads leading to the cities of refuge in the best possible repair. No hills were left, every river was bridged, and the road itself was to be at least thirty-two cubits broad. At every turn were guide posts bearing the word Refuge; and two students of the law were appointed to accompany the fleeing man, to pacify, if possible, the avenger, should he overtake the fugitive.

CITIES OF THE PLAIN (Gen. 13:12; 19:29). These cities were five in number: Sodom, Gomorrah, Admah, Zeboim, and Bela or Zoar. "They lay on the floor of the Jordan valley, after the name of which they were called cities of the Kikkar (Heb. כִּיקָר, kik-kaur, 'circle'), but exactly where we cannot tell. There is a much-debated but insoluble question whether the narratives in Genesis intend to place the cities to the north or to the south of the Dead Sea. For the northern site there are these arguments: that Abraham and Lot looked upon the cities from near Beth-el (Gen. 13:3-10); that the name of Jordan is not applicable to the south end of the Dead Sea; that the presence of five cities there is impossible; that the expedition of the four kings, as it swept north from Kadesh-barnea, attacked Hazezon-tamar, which is probably En-gedi, before it reached the Vale of Siddim, and encountered the King of Sodom and his allies; that the name Gomorrah perhaps exists in Tubk 'Amriyeh, near 'Ain el Feshkah, and that the name of Zoar has been recovered in Tell Shāghūr. See SUPPLEMENT.

"But, on the other hand, at the south end of the Dead Sea there lay throughout Roman and mediæval times a city called Zoara by the Greeks, and Zughar by the Arabs, which was identified by all as the Zoar of Lot. Jebel Usdum is the uncontested representative of Sodom. . . . The name Kikkar may surely have been extended to the south of the Dead Sea, just as to-day the Ghôr is continued for a few miles to the south of Jebel Usdum; Jewish and Arab traditions fix on the south; and, finally, the natural conditions are more suitable there than on the north to the descriptions of the region both before and after the catastrophe, for there is still sufficient water and verdure on the eastern side of the Ghôr to suggest a Garden of the Lord, while the shallow bay and long marshes may, better than the ground at the north end of the sea, hide the secret of the overwhelmed cities" (Smith, Hist. Geog., p. 505, sq.).

CITIES, UNDERGROUND. See EDREI.

CITIZENSHIP (Gr. polureia, pol-ee-ti'-ah, Acts 22:28, "freedom"), the rights and privileges of a native or adopted citizen as distinguished from a foreigner.

1. Hebrew. As the covenant people, and according to the Mosaic constitution (which was framed on a basis of religious rather than of political privileges and distinctions), the idea of the commonwealth (Eph. 2:12) was merged into that of the CONGREGATION (q. v.).

2. Roman (Lat. civitas). In the fullest sense citizenship included the right of voting, of being elected to a magistracy, of appeal to the people, of contracting a legal marriage, of holding property in the Roman community. "As a rule, the Jewish communities in Roman cities are to be regarded in the light of private associations of settlers, which were recognized by the state and on which certain rights were conferred, but the members of which did not enjoy the rights of citizenship" (Schurer, Jewish People, ii, 270, sq.). Still there were quite a large number of towns in which the Jews enjoyed the rights of citizenship, as enumerated above. Individual Jews also had the rights of citizenship conferred upon them, as Paul (Acts 21:39), who, however, claimed it from being freeborn (22:28).

CITY (Heb. עִיר, eer, poetical קִרְיָה, kir-yaw', watched), in the most ancient times the only distinction between village and city was that an assemblage of houses and buildings surrounded by a wall was reckoned a city, and without such surroundings a village (Lev. 25:29-31; 1 Sam. 6:18; Ezek. 38:11).

Later, cities became distinguished by a large number of houses, as well as by the size, solidity, and magnificence of the buildings. "Cities and their villages" are commonly mentioned in the apportionment of the land to the tribes of Israel (Josh. 13:23, 28; 15:32, 36, 41, etc.), from which we infer that some villages belonged to and were dependent upon the cities. Naturally, with increased population and extension, villages and towns developed into cities, e. g., Hazar-addar (Num. 34:4), perhaps Hezron and Adar (Josh. 15:8); the two places being, probably, near together and growing into one. This may account for the fact that many places are designated now cities, now villages, as Bethlehem (John 7:42, "town;" Luke 2:4, "city").

The earliest notice in Scripture of city-building is of Enoch by Cain (Gen. 4:17). After the confusion of tongues the descendants of Nimrod founded Babel, Erech, etc., in the land of Shinar; and Asshur built Nineveh, Rehoboth, etc. (Gen. 10:10-12, 19). The earliest description of a city, properly so called, is that of Sodom (Gen. 19:1-22), but cities existed in very early times on the sites of Jerusalem, Hebron, and Damascus; and it seems plain that the Canaanite, who was "in the land" before the coming of Abraham, had already built cities. We read that the Israelites during their sojourn in Egypt were employed in building or fortifying the "treasure cities" of Pithom and Raamses (Exod. 1:11).

Hebrew Cities. The cities of Palestine were, judging from the large number mentioned in Joshua, relatively small, like most cities of very ancient times. They were, probably, like oriental cities of to-day, built with narrow, crooked streets (Eccles. 12:4; Cant. 3:2), with many squares near the gates, where markets and courts were held

(Gen. 23:10; Ruth 4:1; Matt. 6:5, etc.). Few of the streets were paved, although, according to Josephus (Ant., viii, 7), Solomon had the roads leading to Jerusalem laid with black stone. More certain are the statements that Herod the Great paved the main street in Antioch, and Herod Agrippa III Jerusalem with white stones. Many cities were surrounded with high walls, having strong gates and brazen or iron bars (Deut. 3:5; 1 Kings 4:13), and provided with watchtowers (2 Sam. 18:24, sq.).

Later, especially under the kings, many places, particularly frontier towns and chief cities, and above all, Jerusalem, were strengthened by the erection of thick walls with battlements (2 Chron. 26:6, sq.; Zeph. 1:16), and high towers raised partly over the gates (2 Sam. 18:24; 2 Kings 9:17), partly at the corners of the walls (2 Chron. 14:7; 32:5). Ditch and rampart were provided for the outside of the walls (2 Sam. 20:15; Isa. 26:1; 1 Kings 21:23).

Government. The government of Jewish cities was vested in a council of elders with judges (Deut. 16:18), who were required to be priests. Under the kings we find mention of a "governor" (1 Kings 22:26; 2 Chron. 18:25). After the captivity Ezra made similar arrangements for the appointment of judges (Ezra 7:25). See CITIZENSHIP.

CITY, FENCED (Heb. מְצוּרָה, mets-oo-raw', a rampart), a fortified city. See CITY, FORTRESS.

CITY, HOLY, another name of Jerusalem (Neh. 11:1; Dan. 9:24), probably from the feeling that the sacredness of the temple extended in some measure over the city. It is so distinguished in the East to the present day.

CITY, LEVITICAL. See LEVITICAL CITIES.

CITY OF DAVID, a portion of southern Jerusalem, including Mount Zion, where the fortress of the Jebusites stood. This fortress was reduced by David, who built a new palace and city, named after him (1 Chron. 11:5).

Bethlehem, the native town of David, is also called, from that circumstance, the city of David (Luke 2:11).

CITY OF GOD, a name given to Jerusalem (Psa. 46:4; comp. 48:1, 8), the appropriateness of which is evident from Deut. 12:5: "The place which the Lord your God shall choose out of all your tribes to put his name there, even unto his habitation shall ye seek, and thither thou shalt come."

CITY OF PALM TREES. See IR-HATTE-MARIM.

CITY OF SALT. See IR-HAMMELAH.

CITY, SACERDOTAL. See PRIEST.

CITY, TREASURE (Heb. עִיר מִסְכָּנָה, eer mis-ken-aw', city of provisions, called "city of store," 1 Kings 9:19). Two such cities, PITHOM and RAAMSSES (q. v.), were built by the Israelites while in Egypt (Exod. 1:11), in which the produce of the land was housed. The Jewish kings had similar places of public deposit (2 Chron. 8:4, 6:16:4; 17:2).

CLAUDA (Gr. Κλαυδα, klaw'-day), a small island near the southwest shore of Crete. Pliny calls it Gaudos. Ptolemy calls it Klaudos. Now called Gozzo. It embraces about thirty families. Paul passed this island on his voyage to Rome (Acts 27:16).

CLAU'DIA (Gr. Κλαυδία, klōw-dee'-ah, feminine of Claudius), a Christian female mentioned in 2 Tim. 4:21, as saluting Timotheus. By some she is thought to have been the daughter of the British king Cogidunus, and the wife of Pudens (mentioned in the same verse), and sent to Rome to be educated; that there she was the protégée of Pomponia (wife of the late commander in Britain, Aulus Plautius), and became a convert to Christianity. On the other hand, it may be said that this attempt at identification rests on no other foundation than the identity of the names of the parties, which, in the case of names so common as Pudens and Claudia, may be nothing more than a mere accidental coincidence (Conybeare and Howson's St. Paul, ii, 484, note; M'C. and S., Cyc., s. v.).

CLAU'DIUS (Gr. Κλαύδιος, klōw'-dee-os, perhaps from claudius, lame).

1. The fourth Roman emperor (excluding Julius Cæsar), who succeeded Caligula, January 25, A. D. 41. (1) Early life. He was the son of Drusus and Antonia, and was born August 1, B. C. 10, at Lyons, in Gaul. Losing his father in infancy, he was left to the care and society of domestics, and despised by his imperial relatives. Notwithstanding the weakness of intellect resulting from this neglect, he devoted himself to literary pursuits, and was the author of several treatises. On the murder of Caligula he hid himself through fear of a similar fate, but was found by a soldier, who saluted him as emperor. (2) As emperor. He was taken, almost by force, to the popular assembly, and constituted emperor chiefly by the pretorian guards, under the promise of a largess to each soldier. According to Josephus, the throne was, in a great measure, finally secured to him through the address and solicitation of Herod Agrippa. This obligation he returned by great favors to that personage, enlarging his territory, and appointing his brother Herod to the kingdom of Chalcis (Josephus, Ant., xix, 5, 1), giving to this latter also, after his brother's death, the presidency over the temple at Jerusalem (Josephus, Ant., xx, 1, 3). The Jews were generally treated by him with indulgence, especially those in Asia and Egypt (Ant., xix, 5, 2, 3; xx, 1, 2), although those in Palestine seem to have, at times, suffered much oppression at the hands of his governors. About the middle of his reign those who abode at Rome were all banished (Acts 18:2), A. D. probably 49. The conduct of Claudius during his government, in so far as it was not under the influence of his wives and freedmen, was mild and popular, and he made several beneficial enactments. Having married his niece, Agrippina, she prevailed upon him to set aside his own son, Britannicus, in favor of her son, Nero, by a former marriage; but discovering that he regretted this step she poisoned him, A. D. 54.

2. Claudius Lysias (Acts 23:26). See LYSIAS.

CLAVE. See GLOSSARY.

CLAW (Heb. פָּרְסוֹף, par-saw'), the sharp, hooked end of the foot of a bird (Dan. 4:33) or animal (Deut. 14:6); the hoof solid or split.

Figurative. The expression "tear their claws in pieces" (Zech. 11:16) means to seize upon and eat the last morsel of flesh or fat.

CLAY. See MINERAL KINGDOM.

CLEAN, CLEANNESS, the rendering of several Hebrew and Greek words, having the primary meaning of freedom from dirt or filth, and then of moral purity. Generally, however, they signify freedom from ceremonial defilement. See PURIFICATION, PURITY, UNCLEANNES.

CLEFT, the rendering of several Hebrew words.

1. A space or opening made by cleavage, as a fissure in a building (Amos 6:11; Isa. 22:9, "breaches"); crevice in a rock (Isa. 2:21; Cant. 2:14; Jer. 49:16).

2. The split in the hoof of an animal (Deut. 14:6).

CLEMENT (Gr. Κλήμης, klay'-mace, merciful), a person (apparently a Christian of Philippi) mentioned by Paul (Phil. 4:3) as one whose name was in the book of life. This Clement was, by the ancient Church, identified with the bishop of Rome of the same name.

CLE'OPAS (Gr. Κλεόπας, kleh-op'-as, contraction of Gr. Κλεόπατρος, of a renowned father), one of the two disciples who were going to Emmaus on the day of the resurrection, when Jesus drew near and conversed with them (Luke 24:18). He questioned them as to the subject of their conversation, chided them for their ignorance and unbelief, and expounded to them the Scriptures which foretold his sufferings and glory. Arriving at Emmaus, they secured his presence at the evening meal, during which he was made known to them. They hastened back to Jerusalem and acquainted the disciples with what they had seen and heard. Cleopas must not be confounded with CLEOPHAS (q. v.), or rather Clopas, of John 19:25.

CLE'OPHAS, or rather CLOPAS (Gr. Κλωπᾶς, klo-pas'), the husband of MARY (q. v.), the sister of Christ's mother (John 19:25); probably a Grecized form of ALPHEUS (q. v.).

CLERK (Acts 19:35). See TOWN CLERK.

CLOAK, an article of DRESS (q. v.), as a covering or veil, p. 281.

Figurative. That which conceals, and so, a pretext or excuse (John 15:22; 1 Pet. 2:16).

CLOSET (Heb. כִּוְרֵי, khoop-pau', canopy), a bridal couch with curtains (Joel 2:16; "chamber," Psa. 19:5). The same word is still employed by the Jews for the canopy under which the marriage ceremony is performed.

In the New Testament the word (Gr. ταμειον, tam-i'-on) is used in the sense of a place of privacy; any quiet room in one's home, as opposed to the synagogues and the streets (Matt. 6:6; Luke 12:3).

CLOTH, CLOTHES, CLOTHING. See DRESS.

CLOTHES, RENDING OF. See REND.

CLOUD (Heb. principally עָב, awb, and נֶבֶל, aw-nawn'; Gr. νεφέλη, nef-el'-ay). The allusions to clouds in Scripture, as well as their use in symbolical language, can only be understood when we remember the nature of the climate, where there is hardly a trace of cloud from the beginning of May to the close of September. During this season clouds so seldom appear and rains so seldom fall as to seem phenomenal, as was the case with the harvest rain invoked by Samuel (1 Sam. 12:17, 18) and the little cloud, not larger than a man's hand, which Elijah declared to be sure promise of rain (1 Kings 18:44).

Clouds are referred to as showing forth the power and wisdom of God in their formation (Psa. 135:6, 7; 147:8; Prov. 8:28, etc.), and causing them to hold and dispense rain (Job 37:10, sq.; Prov. 3:20). They are called the "clouds of heaven" (Dan. 7:13; Matt. 24:30), "windows of heaven" (Gen. 7:11; Isa. 24:18), "bottles of heaven" (Job 38:37), "chambers" of God (Psa. 104:3, 13), "dust of God's feet" (Nah. 1:3).

Man's ignorance is illustrated by his inability to number the clouds (Job 38:37), to account for their spreading (36:29), the disposing and balancing of them (37:15, 16), to cause them to rain (38:34), or stay them (38:37).

Figurative. Living much in the open air, and being of a poetical nature, the people of the East would naturally make clouds figurative of many things. Thus clouds are the symbol of armies and multitudes of people (Isa. 60:8; Jer. 4:13; Heb. 12:1). The sudden disappearance of threatening clouds from the sky is a figure for the blotting out of transgressions (Isa. 44:22). A day of clouds is taken for a season of calamity and of God's judgment (Lam. 2:1; Ezek. 30:3; 34:12; Joel 2:2). Naturally the cloud is a symbol of transitoriness (Job 30:15; Hos. 6:4). The "cloud without rain" is the proverb for the man of promise without performance (Isa. 18:4; 25:5; Jude 12; comp. Prov. 25:14). False teachers are compared to "clouds that are carried with a tempest" (2 Pet. 2:17). A wise ruler is said to be as the "light of . . . a morning without clouds" (2 Sam. 23:4), while the favor of a king is compared to "a cloud of the latter rain, refreshing and fertilizing the earth" (Prov. 16:15). "Clouds returning after the rain" is figurative of the infirmities of old age; i. e., as after a rain one expects sunshine, so after pains one longs for comfort. As clouds in hot countries veil the oppressive glories of the sun, they are used to symbolize the divine presence, which they entirely or in part conceal (Exod. 16:10; 33:9; Num. 11:25; Job 22:14; Psa. 18:11, 12; Isa. 19:1). See PILLAR OF CLOUD, SHEKINAH.

CLOUD, PILLAR OF. See PILLAR.

CLOUT. 1. The word taw-law' (Heb. נֶבֶל, Josh. 9:5), properly means to cover, i. e., to patch, and denotes that the sandals of the Gibeonites were mended, as if they had become old and worn during their journey. The primary sense of the word seems to have been a blow, as a "clout on the head." It was then applied to a bit of material clapped on, or hastily applied to mend a tear, a patch.

2. The "cast clouts" (Heb. שֵׁבִיבֹתַי, seh-khaw-baw', Jer. 38:11, 12) were old, torn clothes or rags put under the prophet's arms to prevent the cords cutting into the flesh while he was being drawn out of the dungeon.

CNIDUS (Gr. Κνίδος, knee'-dos), a town at the extreme southwest of Asia Minor, upon land jutting out between the islands of Rhodes and Coos (Acts 21:1). Venus was worshipped there. Paul sailed by this place (Acts 27:7).

COAL. Two Hebrew words are rendered "coal" or "coals":

1. One (קַיִלִּים, peh-khawm', black) would seem to be applied to coals not yet lighted. It occurs three times—twice when the smith working with the coals is mentioned (Isa. 44:12; 54:16), and in Proverbs (26:21, "as coals are to burning coals"), where unlighted coals must be meant.

It has been disputed whether the Hebrews had mineral coal or merely charcoal. There is strong reason, however, that the former was used in ancient times. The mountains of Lebanon contain seams of coal which have been worked in recent times, and were, probably, not neglected by the Phœnicians. Charcoal was the "coal" in common use; thus coals of juniper or broom are mentioned (Psa. 120:4).

2. The other word (רִיטִים, gah-kkeh'-leth, kindling) signifies an ignited or live coal, and is of frequent occurrence (2 Sam. 14:7; Job 41:21; Psa. 18:8; Isa. 44:19; Ezek. 24:11, etc.); often with the addition of "burning" or of "fire" (Lev. 16:12; 2 Sam. 22:13, etc.).

The term "live coal" (Heb. רִיטִים, rits-paw', Isa. 6:6) appears to have been a hot stone used for baking upon (see 1 Kings 19:6, "a cake baked on the coals," Heb. רִיטִים, reh'-tsef). In the expression "their visage is blacker than a coal" (Lam. 4:8) coal simply means blackness (R. V. "darker than blackness").

In the New Testament "fire of coals" (John 18:18) was probably of charcoal, on a chafing dish, used in the East for the sake of warmth. See FUEL.

Figurative. The expression, "They shall quench my coal which is left" (2 Sam. 14:7), refers to the burning coal with which one kindles a fire, and is obviously a metaphor for extinguishing one's family.

"Coals of fire" (2 Sam. 22:9, 13; Psa. 18:8, 12, etc.) is by some thought to be a figure for lightnings proceeding from God. "The flame of red-hot coals pours out of him as out of a glowing furnace. This description is based entirely upon Exod. 19:18, where the Lord comes down upon Sinai in smoke and fire" (K. and D., Com., on Samuel).

"Thou shalt heap coals of fire upon his head" (Prov. 25:22; Rom. 12:20) represents the shame and confusion which men feel when their evil is requited by good.

In Cant. 8:6 it is said, "Jealousy is cruel as the grave: the coals thereof are coals of fire, which hath a most vehement flame." In Hab. 3:5 "burning coals" seem to mean fevers.

COAST, an inaccurate rendering of several terms, meaning border, except in the expression "sea coast." See GLOSSARY.

COAT. See DRESS.

COAT OF MAIL. See ARMOR.

COCK, THE, is a Christian symbol on tombs of the resurrection, the herald of life after the night of death. It is also a symbol of vigilance. See ANIMAL KINGDOM.

COCKATRICE. See ANIMAL KINGDOM.

COCKCROWING (Gr. ἀλεκτοροφωνία, al-ek-tor-of-o-nee'-ah). The habit of the cock in the East of crowing during the night at regular times gave rise to the expression "cockcrowing" to indicate a definite portion of time (Mark 13:35). The Romans called the last watch of the night, the break of day, about three o'clock, gallicinium; and the Hebrews designated the cockcrowing period by words signifying "the singing of the cock." Among the Hebrews we find no mention of the flight of the hours of the night except the crowing of the cock. See TIME.

COCKLE. See VEGETABLE KINGDOM.

COFFER (Heb. אֲרֹן, ar-gaw'el, suspended), the small chest which the Philistines placed upon the cart with the ark (1 Sam. 6:8, 11, 15), and in which they deposited the golden mice and emerods that formed their trespass offering.

COFFIN (Heb. אֲרוֹן, aw-rone', Gen. 50:26, "and he was put in a coffin in Egypt"), undoubtedly a mummy chest made of sycamore wood, which was deposited in a room, according to Egyptian custom, and carried away with Israel at the Exodus. See DEAD, BURIAL OF.

The same Hebrew word is rendered "chest" (2 Kings 12:10), and very frequently "ARK" (q. v.).

COGITATION (Heb. רַחֲיוֹנָה, rah-yone', Dan. 7:28, elsewhere rendered simply "thought.")

COIN. See METROLOGY, IV.

COL-HO'ZEH (Heb. כּוֹלְחֹזֵה, kol-kho-zeh', every seer), a descendant of Judah, being the son of Hazaiah, and father of one Baruch (Neh. 11:5), B. C. before 445. He had also a son named Shalum, who repaired part of the wall of Jerusalem after the captivity (Neh. 3:15).

COLLAR. 1. Any aperture. In Job 30:18 (Heb. פֶּלֶח, pelch), the opening by means of which the shirt was put on. The meaning of this passage seems to be that Job was so wasted by disease that his garments were not at all sustained by his person, but hung loosely from his neck.

2. A peculiar kind of pendant (Judg. 8:26; Heb. נֶט־עֵי-סָוּף, net-ee-saw', rendered "chains" in Isa. 3:19), probably pearl-shaped EARRINGS (q. v.).

COLLECTION. 1. Joash ordered a collection (Heb. מַסֵּאֲוֶה, mas-ayth') for the repairing of the temple (2 Chron. 24:6, 9). A chest was placed by the high priest at the entrance of the temple to receive the same. By making a distinction between this money and that given for the use of the priests a special appeal was made to the liberality of the people.

2. In the early age of the Christian Church the Christians of Palestine suffered greatly from poverty, probably due to ostracism. Paul made appeals to the Gentile Christians for aid (Acts 24:17; Rom. 15:25, 26; 2 Cor. 8 and 9; Gal. 2:10), recommending collections (Gr. logia, log-ee'-ah) to be taken for this purpose on the "first day of the week" (1 Cor. 16:1-3).

COLLEGE (Heb. מִשְׁנֵה, mish-neh', repetition, 2 Kings 22:14), the residence of the prophetess HULDAH (q. v.). The word Mishneh should be taken as a proper name, and as meaning a district or suburb of the city. The same term is used in Zeph. 1:10, and rendered "second," where the different quarters of Jerusalem are spoken of (see Neh. 11:9, in the original "upon the city second," i. e., over the second part of the city). Keil thinks the Mishneh to have been the "lower city" on the hill Akra.

COLLOPS (Heb. פֶּמְוֹד, pee-maw', to be plump), the thick flakes of fat flesh upon the haunches of a stall-fed ox, used as the symbol of irreligious prosperity (Job 15:27). See GLOSSARY.

COLONY. The city of Philippi was gifted by Cæsar Augustus with the privileges of a colony (colonia). Antioch in Pisidia and Alexandria Troas both possessed the same character, but Philippi is the first case to which Scripture (Acts 16:12) calls our attention to this distinction. When the Romans conquered a town they planted a body of their own citizens therein, as a kind of garrison, usually to the number of three hundred. These constituted a "colony of Roman citizens" (Lat. colonia civium Romanorum), a sort of little Rome. Such a colony was free from taxes and military duty, its position as an outpost being regarded as an equivalent. It had its own constitution (a copy of the Roman), and elected its own senate and other officers of state. To this constitution the original inhabitants had to submit (Seiffert, Dict. Class. Ant., s. v.).

COLOR (Acts 27:30), pretense.

COLORS. "The color sense, i. e., the distinction of color impressions in sensation, perception, and nomenclature, follows the same law as all human development—the law of progress from coarse to fine." Magnus declares that this development follows the order of the prismatic colors, from the positive reddish yellow to the delicate blue-violet. The Jews had not reached such an advanced state of art that we should expect a wide acquaintance with colors. There are not, therefore, many colors mentioned in Scripture, and these may be arranged in two classes—those applied to natural objects, and artificial mixtures employed in DYEING (q. v.) or PAINTING (q. v.).

1. Natural. (1) White. This term embraces the relatively as well as the absolutely white. In the full sense of the word the rays of the sun and those proceeding from a body raised to white heat are white, because all the colors of the spectrum are united in them. But even the daylight is not absolutely colorless, and the direct light of the sun seems yellowish, or, to speak poetically, golden. We are, therefore, prepared for a varied use of the term "white." Thus Matthew (17:2) writes, "His raiment was as white as the light;" and our Lord said, "The fields are already white to the harvest" (John 4:35); the ripening ears are white as distinguished from the green blade. The most common term is law-bawn' (Heb. לָבָן), which is applied to such objects as milk (Gen. 49:12), manna (Exod. 16:31), snow (Isa. 1:18), horses (Zech. 1:8), raiment (Eccles. 9:8); and a cognate word expresses the color of the moon (Isa. 24:23). Tsakh (Heb. צַח, sunny), dazzling white, is applied to the complexion (Cant. 5:10); khiv-vaur' (Heb. חִוּי), a term of a later age, to snow (Dan. 7:9 only), and to the paleness of shame (Isa. 29:22); seeb (Heb. שֵׁב, aged), to the hair alone. Another class of terms arises from the textures of a naturally white color. These were, without doubt, primarily applied to the material; but the idea of color is also prominent, particularly in the description of the curtains of the tabernacle (Exod. 26:1) and the priests' vestments (Exod. 28:6). (2) Black. Black and white are the extremest contrasts in Scripture, the former being where light and its colors have vanished. But then, as now, the term is used relatively, and includes the dark hues which approach black. The shades of this color are expressed in the terms shaw-khore' (Heb. שָׁחֹר, dusky), applied to the hair (Lev. 13:31; Cant. 5:11); the complexion (Cant. 1:5), particularly when affected with disease (Job 30:30); horses (Zech. 6:2, 6); khoom (Heb. חוּם, literally, scorched, A. V. "brown," Gen. 30:32), applied to sheep; the word expresses the color produced by influence of the sun's rays; kaw-dar' (Heb. קָדַר, literally, to be dirty), applied to a complexion blackened by sorrow or disease (Job 30:30), mourner's robes (Jer. 8:21; 14:2), a clouded sky (1 Kings 18:45), night (Mic. 3:6; Jer. 4:28; Joel 2:10; 3:15), a turbid brook (whence possibly kinron), particularly when rendered so by melted snow (Job 6:16). (3) Red. Av-dome' (Heb. אָדָם) is applied to blood (2 Kings 3:22), a garment sprinkled with blood (Isa. 63:2), a heifer (Num. 19:2), pottage made of lentils (Gen. 25:30), a horse (Zech. 1:8; 6:2), wine (Prov. 23:31), the complexion (Gen. 25:25; Cant. 5:10; Lam. 4:7, A. V. "ruddy"). Ad-am-dawn' (Heb. אָדָמָה, reddish) is applied to a leprous spot (Lev. 13:19; 14:37). Saw-rook' (Heb. סָוּרֹק, literally, fox-colored, bay) is applied to a horse (A. V. "speckled," Zech. 1:8), and to a species of vine bearing a purple grape (Isa. 5:2; 16:18). This color was symbolical of bloodshed (Zech. 6:2; Rev. 6:4; 12:3). (4) Yellow seems to have been regarded as a shade of green, for the same term greenish is applied to gold (Heb. יָרֵק, yer-ak-rak', Psa. 68:13, "yellow"), and to the leprous spot (Lev. 13:49). (5) Green, though frequently used, seldom refers to color. The Hebrew terms are rah-an-awn' (Heb. רָחַו, vigorous and flourishing (Job 15:32; Psa. 37:35; 52:8; Hos. 14:8); also used of that which is fresh, as oil (Psa. 92:10); and yaw-rawk' (Heb. יָרוֹק, ye-rah-ek'), having the radical signification of putting forth, sprouting, and is used indiscriminately for all food products of the earth (Gen. 1:30; 9:3; Exod. 10:15; Isa. 15:6). Sometimes it is used for the sickly yellowish hue of mildewed grain (see MILDEW), and also for the entire absence of color produced by fear (Jer. 30:6, "paleness"). "Green" is wrongly used in the A. V. for white (Gen. 30:37; Esth. 1:6), young (Lev. 2:14; 23:14), moist (Judg. 16:7, 8), sappy (Job 8:16), and unripe (Cant. 2:13).

2. Artificial. Dyeing, although known at an early period (Gen. 38:28; Exod. 26:1), is not noticed as a profession in the Bible; and the Jews were probably indebted to the Egyptians and Phœnicians for their dyes and the method of applying them. These dyes were purple (light and dark, the latter being the "blue" of the A. V.) and crimson; vermilion was introduced later. (1) Purple (Heb. אַרְגָּמָן, ar-gaw-mawn'). This color was obtained from a species of shellfish, the murex trunculus. "The dye taken from these shellfish is not their blood, but the slimy secretion of a gland which they have in common with all snails. This secretion is not at first red or violet, but whitish. When exposed, however, to the sunlight it begins to color like a photographic surface, and, passing through shades of yellow and green, settles into the purple color, which is a combination of red and violet light; and this mixed color, having sometimes more of a blue, sometimes more of a red hue, is ineffaceable. Purple was a monopoly of the Phœnicians. They, not only on their own but on other coasts, discovered shellfish yielding purple; but the oldest site of the purple trade was Tyre itself. At the present day, in the neighborhood of the miserable ruined village which bears the name of Tyre, there are found traces of these purple dye-works, which were celebrated far into the Christian era. Purple was still costly in the time of the Roman supremacy. A mantle of the best purple of Tyre, such as the luxurious habits of the empire required, cost ten thousand sesterces, i. e., over five hundred dollars" (Delitzsch, Iris, p. 65, sq.). Robes of a purple color were worn by kings (Judg. 8:26) and by the highest officers, civil and religious. They were also worn by the wealthy and luxurious (Jer. 10:9; Ezek. 27:7; Luke 16:19; Rev. 17:4; 18:16).

(2) Blue (Heb. תְּכֵלֶת, tek-ay'-leth). This dye was procured from a species of shellfish found on the coast of Phœnicia, and called by modern naturalists Helix Ianthina. The tint is best explained by the statements of Josephus (Ant., iii, 7, §7) and Philo that it was emblematic of the sky, in which case it represents, not the light blue of our northern climate, but the deep dark hue of the eastern sky. The A. V. has rightly described the tint in Esth. 1:6 (margin) as violet. This color was used in the same way as purple. Princes and nobles (Ezek. 23:6; Eccles. 40:4) and the idols of Babylon (Jer. 10:9) were clothed in robes of this color; the ribbon and fringe of the Hebrew dress were to be of this color (Num. 15:38). (3) Red or Crimson (Isa. 1:18; Jer. 4:30, etc.). This color is expressed in Hebrew by several different terms: Shaw'-nee (Heb. שָׁוֵי, Gen. 38:28-30), to-lah'-ath shaw'-nee (Heb. שָׁוֵי אֶתְחַלֵּה, Exod. 26:4), or to-lah'-ath simply (Isa. 1:18);

kar-mel' (כַּרְמִיל, A. V. "crimson," 2 Chron. 2:7, 14; 3:14) was introduced at a late period, probably from Armenia, to express the same color. The first term expresses the brilliancy of the color, the second the worm or grub whence the dye was procured. This was a small insect of the size of a pea, which draws its nourishment from plants of the oak and other kinds by piercing them. The tint produced was crimson rather than scarlet. The only natural object to which it is applied in Scripture is the lips, which are compared to a scarlet thread (Cant. 4:3). Robes of this color were worn by the luxurious (2 Sam. 1:24; Prov. 31:21; Jer. 4:30; Lam. 4:5; Rev. 17:4). This color was among the Greeks and Romans the proper color for the military cloak; and so it is a scarlet cloak which, according to Matthew, is put on the Saviour by the soldiers in Pilate's judgment hall. Mark and John say "purple," for the language of the people did not distinguish the two kinds of red. (4) Vermilion (Heb. טָשֵׁת, shaw-shar). This was a pigment used in fresco paintings, either for drawing figures of idols on the walls of temples (Ezek. 23:14), for coloring the idols themselves (Wisd. 13:14), or for decorating the walls and beams of houses (Jer. 22:14). Vermilion was a favorite color among the Assyrians, as is still attested by the sculptures of Nimroud and Khorsabad.

3. Sacred, or Sacerdotal. Purple, blue, scarlet, and white were the four colors prescribed by Moses. Of four colors were the ten curtains of the tabernacle, the veil, the curtain which hung at the entrance of the holy place, and the entrance into the court; the ephod, the girdle, and the breastplate of the high priest. Of three colors, viz., blue, purple, and scarlet, were the pomegranates which adorned the robe of the ephod. Of one color, white, were his under robe and miter; of blue were the fifty loops of the curtain, the cord by which the breastplate was fastened to the ephod, and that by which the diadem was attached to the miter. Of one color also, sometimes blue, sometimes purple, were the coverings of the sacred furniture of the tabernacle when it was carried from place to place; and of one color, white, were the clothes of the ordinary priests, with, probably, the exception of the particolored girdle.

4. Figurative. (1) White has a direct significance because light is white. White denotes purity, or, what is nearly the same, holiness. The priests were clothed in white as servants of the Holy One and as examples in holiness. White was also the ground color of the veil which divided the sanctuary, of the curtains, of the attire of the high priest. Garments of salvation are certainly garments of light (Psa. 27:1, "The Lord is my light and my salvation;" comp. Rev. 19:8). White was also the sign of festivity (Eccl. 9:8) and triumph (Zech. 6:3; Rev. 6:2). As the color of light (comp. Matt. 17:2) white was the symbol of glory and majesty (Dan. 7:9; Ezek. 9:3, sq.; Matt. 28:3; John 20:12; Acts 10:30). (2) Black, as the opposite of white or light, denotes mourning, affliction, calamity, and death (Jer. 14:2; Lam. 4:8; 5:10). It was also the sign of humiliation (Mal. 3:14, literally, "in black") and the omen of evil (Zech. 6:2; Rev. 6:5). (3) "Red is the color of fire, and therefore of life: the blood is red because life is a fiery process. But red, as contrasted with white, is the color of selfish, covetous, passionate life." Sin is called red inasmuch as it is a burning heat which consumes man (Isa. 1:18). Red (crimson), as representing blood, designates the life principle of man and beast (Gen. 9:4-6) and the essential element of atonement (Isa. 63:2; Heb. 9:22). (4) Green was the emblem of freshness, vigor, and prosperity (Psa. 92:14, A. V. "flourishing;" 37:35, marg., "green"). (5) Blue. The purple blue, or hyacinth, points to heaven, and was the symbol of revelation. Among the Hebrews it was the Jehovah color, the symbol of the revealed God (comp. Exod. 24:10; Ezek. 1:26). Delitzsch says: "Blue denotes the softened divine majesty condescending to man in grace" (Iris, p. 48). It also represented reward. (6) Purple, as the dress of kings, was associated with royalty and majesty (Judg. 8:26; Esth. 8:15; Cant. 3:10; 7:5; Dan. 5:7, 16, 29, A. V. "scarlet").

COLOS'Æ, or COLOS'Æ (Gr. Κολοσσαί, kol-os-sah'ee, correction), a city of mercantile importance on the Lycus, in Phrygia, about twelve miles above Laodicea. The most competent commentators think that the Christian church there was founded by Epaphras (Col. 1:2, 7; 4:12), and believe Col. 2:1 to prove that Paul had not been there previous to writing the epistle. The city was destroyed by earthquake in the ninth year of Nero and rebuilt. The modern town Chonas is at the ruins.

COMFORT (Heb. נַחַם, naw-kham', to comfort, give forth sighs; Gr. παρακαλέω, par-ak-ah-el'-o, to call alongside, help). Our English word is from Lat. comfortare (con fortis), to strengthen much, and means to ease, encourage, inspirit, enliven. See COMFORTLESS, in GLOSSARY.

As pertaining to the life of believers it is the consolation and support which result from the gracious work of the indwelling Comforter, making clear to him his part in the great redemption, assuring him of the Saviour's love, and imparting peace and joy. It is not at all times the measure of piety or grace. The Greek noun is often translated CONSOLATION (q. v.) in the New Testament.

COMFORTER, THE. See HOLY GHOST.

COMING OF CHRIST (Gr. παρουσία, par-oo-see'-ah, a being present), our Lord's first appearance in the flesh (1 John 5:20; 2 John 7), or future appearance at the last day. See MILLENNIUM.

Figurative. Christ is said to come when his Gospel is introduced in any place by his ministers (John 15:22; Eph. 2:17), when his Church is visibly or powerfully established in the world (Matt. 16:28), when he bestows upon believers his Spirit (John 14:18, 23, 28), when he executes judgment upon wicked communities (2 Thess. 2:8), and when his providence calls us away by death (Matt. 24:42).

COMMANDMENTS, THE TEN. See DECALOGUE.

COMMERCE. The interchange of products, goods, property of any kind must have been nearly coeval with the history of men. When Cain built a city, however insignificant it may have been, he would, in all likelihood, have need of articles which he himself did not manufacture. The musical instruments made by Jubal and his descendants and the handiwork of Tubal-cain in "brass and iron" (Gen. 4:21, 22) indicate purchasing thereof. Certainly, the construction of so large a vessel as the ark necessitated such a great quantity and variety of material as would require exchange, either in the way of barter or money.

It is clear that international trade must have existed and affected to some extent the pastoral nomad races, for we find that Abraham was rich, not only in cattle, but in silver, gold, and plate and ornaments (Gen. 13:2; 24:22, 53), which metals must, in all probability, have been brought from other countries.

1. Egypt held a prominent position from early times among trading nations, although her commerce has generally been thought to have been carried on by foreigners. Maspero writes (Dawn of Civilization, p. 392): "The Egyptians willingly left their own towns in pursuit of fortune or adventure, and the sea did not inspire them with fear or religious horror. . . . They succeeded in making lengthy voyages, and in transporting troops into the enemy's territory from the mouths of the Nile to the southern coast of Syria. Inveterate prejudice alone could prevent us from admitting that the Egyptians of the Memphite period went to the ports of Asia by sea. They imported cedar from Lebanon and pine from Cilicia, amber from the shores of the Baltic, and, perhaps by the same route, the tin used to alloy copper for making bronze. Caravans plied between Egypt and the lands of Chaldean civilization, crossing Syria and Mesopotamia, perhaps even by the shortest route, as far as Ur and Babylon." We read of such a caravan (Ishmaelite), laden with spices, which carried Joseph into Egypt (Gen. 39:1). Egyptian traders sailed the Red Sea as far south as the Straits of Bab-el-Mandeb, but they preferred to carry on this southern trade by caravans, bringing back asses and slaves. In return for these imports Egypt exported large quantities of grain, especially in the times of scarcity. See EGYPT.

2. Tyre, etc. Intercourse with Tyre does not appear to have taken place till a later period. At the same period it is clear that trade was carried on between Babylon and the Syrian cities, and also that gold and silver ornaments were common among the Syrian and Arabian races (Num. 31:50; Josh. 7:21; Judg. 5:30; 8:24; Job 6:19).

The Arabians availed themselves at an early period of their advantageous position between the two opulent countries of India and Egypt, and obtained the monopoly of a very profitable carrying trade between them.

Sidon, supplied with cedar from its neighboring mountains, built many ships, and exported the produce of the adjoining country and the various articles of their own manufacture. The PHŒNICIANS (q. v.), whose principal seaport was Sidon, were regarded as the inventors of commerce, ship-building, etc. When the Canaanites were expelled from their territories they gradually established colonies in Cyprus and several islands of the Ægean Sea, penetrated to the Black Sea, and spread along the shores of Sicily, Sardinia, Gaul, Spain, and Africa, which rose to more or less importance. The rising prosperity of Tyre soon eclipsed the ancient and flourishing commercial city of Sidon. About 600 B. C. her commercial greatness reached its zenith, and is graphically described by Ezekiel (ch. 27).

3. Israel. It was not until the time of Solomon that Israel took prominence as a commercial nation. A combination of favorable relations invited the nation to pursue commerce with zeal, and the broad extent of the possessions of Israel at that time made it possible to develop traffic alike by sea and by land. Solomon organized an extensive trade with foreign countries. He imported linen yarn, horses, and chariots from Egypt (1 Kings 10:22-29). It was by Phœnicians that the cedar and other timber for his great architectural works was brought by sea to Joppa, while Solomon found the provisions necessary for the workmen in Mount Lebanon (1 Kings 5:6, 9; 2 Chron. 2:16). For any distant navigation, however, Solomon was obliged to depend upon the Phœnicians, as they were the only nation at that time having the ability and inclination for it. Phœnician sailors were at first the teachers of the Israelites; they aided them in building and manning the tall ships destined for distant voyages. They were built in Ezion-geber, the harbor of Elath, probably on the very spot where Akaba now stands. The cargo brought back each time from the three years' voyage was gold, silver, ivory, red sandalwood, apes, and peacocks, probably also nard and aloe (1 Kings 10:11, 22).

To increase the land traffic he had small cities built in advantageous localities in which goods of all sorts were suitably stored (1 Kings 9:18, 19; 2 Chron. 8:4, 6). "The main road for the land traffic between Egypt and the interior of Asia must have been the great highway leading past Gaza, and further west of Jerusalem to the northern Jordan and Damascus. Here it was joined by the road from the Phœnician cities, and continued as far as Thapsacus, on the Euphrates. This was entirely in the dominions of the king; and here, under the peaceful banner of a great and powerful monarchy, commerce could flourish as it never did before" (Ewald, Hist. of Israel, iii, p. 260, sq.).

After Solomon's death the maritime trade declined, and an attempt made by Jehoshaphat to revive it proved unsuccessful (1 Kings 22:48, 49). We know, however, that Phœnicia was supplied from Judea with wheat, honey, oil, and balm (1 Kings 5:11; Ezek. 27:17; Acts 12:20), while Tyrian dealers brought fish and other merchandise to Jerusalem at the time of the return from captivity (Neh. 13:16), as well as timber for the rebuilding of the temple, which then, as in Solomon's time, was brought by sea to Joppa (Ezra 3:7). Oil was exported to Egypt (Hos. 12:1), and fine linen and ornamental girdles of domestic manufacture were sold to the merchants (Prov. 31:24).

Although the successive invasions of Palestine, with the accompanying exactions upon the inhabitants, must have impoverished the country from time to time (1 Kings 14:26, sq.; 15:18; 2 Kings 12:18; 14:18; 16:8; 18:15, 16, etc.), it is also clear from the denunciations of the prophets that much wealth existed and much foreign merchandise was imported. From the language of Ezekiel Jerusalem appears to have been the rival of Tyre, and through its port, Joppa, to have carried on trade with foreign countries (Isa. 2:6, 16; 3:11, 23; Ezek. 26:2; Hos. 12:7; Jonah 1:3).

The Babylonish captivity taught the Jews to put up with an unsettled and wandering existence, and to travel in any direction whither gain or necessity summoned them. They, under the passion for trade, migrated from Babylon into Greek cities; and in Asia Minor, then rapidly becoming Greek, numbers of Judeans were to be met with in almost every part, but especially in the wealthy and, in most respects, independent commercial cities on the west coast. They settled in large numbers in Egypt, and spread along the northern coast of Africa, carrying with them their inherent love of trade.

Simon the Maccabee protected commerce, and established Joppa a free port, which soon became the resort of all the ships of trade on the Mediterranean. It was also promoted by the Asmoneans, and encouraged by Herod. The trade of Israel, both domestic and foreign, was greatly promoted by the festivals, which brought large numbers of persons to Jerusalem and caused great outlay for sacrifices and incense (1 Kings 8:63).

COMMON (Gr. κοινός, koy-nos', belonging to several, Acts 10:14), used by the Jews (like the Heb. כּוֹל, khole), in opposition to that which is hallowed (Gr. ἅγιος, hag'-ee-os). They also applied it to that which is impure, whether naturally or legally (Mark 7:2; Rom. 14:14). Finally, it was used of meats forbidden, or such as had been partaken of by idolaters.

COMMONWEALTH (Gr. πολιτεία, pol-ee-ti'-ah, a state), spoken of the theocratic or divine commonwealth (Eph. 2:12); elsewhere, "freedom" (Acts 22:28, R. V. "citizenship").

COMMUNICATE. See GLOSSARY.

COMMUNION. See LORD'S SUPPER.

COMMUNION OF SAINTS, a part of Article iii of the Apostles' Creed: "I believe in the Holy Catholic Church, the communion of saints." The phrase is not found in the creeds of the Greek Church; and in the West we find it first in Faustus, Bishop of Reji, South Gaul, A. D. about 455. Among the views held are:

1. Roman Catholic. "The communion of saints consists in the union which binds together the members of the Church on earth, and connects the Church on earth with the Church suffering in purgatory and triumphant in heaven. The faithful on earth have communion with each other because they partake of the same sacraments, are under one head, and assist each other by their prayers and good works. . . . They communicate with the souls in purgatory by praying for them, . . . with the blessed in heaven by obtaining their prayers" (Cath. Dict., s. v.).

2. Protestant. The Churches of the Reformation rejected these views, although Protestant definitions vary somewhat. (a) Luther declared the Church was the body of believers, who, by faith, were saints; hence the phrase was exegetical of the "Holy Church." So also the Reformed Church, at first in its symbols, the First Helvetic and the Scotch Confession of 1560. (b) Calvin understood it as a peculiarity of the Church. "It excellently expresses the character of the Church; as though it had been said that the saints are united in the fellowship of Christ on this condition, that whatever benefits God bestows upon them they should mutually communicate to each other." He is followed in the Geneva and Heidelberg Catechisms, and in the Westminster Catechism, which says: "All saints . . . being united to one another in love, they have communion in each other's gifts and graces, and are obliged to the performance of such duties, public and private, as do conduce to their mutual good, both in the inward and outward man." (c) Pearson and Leighton agree substantially in stating that Christians have communion with the Father (1 John 1:3; 2 Pet. 1:4), with Christ (1 John 1:3; John 17:23), with the Holy Ghost (Phil. 2:1; 2 Cor. 13:14), with angels (Heb. 1:14; Luke 16:10; Matt. 17:10), with all saints on earth as the living members of Christ (John 1:7; Col. 2:19), and that they form one family with the saints who are in glory (Heb. 12:22, 23).

COMMUNITY OF GOODS. The following picture of the early Church is given in Acts: "And all that believed were together, and had all things common," etc. (2:44, 45); "And the multitude of them that believed were of one heart and of one soul: neither said any of them that ought of the things which he possessed was his own; but they had all things common," etc. (4:32-34). From this we are not at liberty to assume in general "a distinguished beneficence, liberality, and mutual rendering of help," or "a prevailing willingness to place private property at the disposal of the Church;" but "a real community of goods" in the early Church at Jerusalem. In order the better to understand this community of goods the following characteristics must be noted: (1) It took place only in Jerusalem, and probably because of the poverty of the church in that city. There is no trace of it in any other church; on the contrary, the rich and poor continued to live side by side (1 Cor. 16:2; 2 Cor. 9:5-7; 1 Tim. 6:17; James 5:1, sq.). (2) This community of goods was not ordained as a legal necessity, such as was practiced by the ESSENES (q. v.). It was all left to the free will of the owners (Acts 5:3, 4), where the sin of Ananias was shown to be his pretending to give more than he really had done. (3) "It was a continuation and extension of that community of goods which subsisted in the case of Jesus himself and his disciples, the wants of all being defrayed from a common purse;" an earnest striving to carry out to the letter such commands as we find in Luke 12:33. "Every age has witnessed an attempt to revive the Jerusalem dream of a life where should exist no distinctions of 'order,' and class, and where literally all things should be possessed in common; but every such attempt has failed. The estimate of Paul and his brother apostles was the true one: they judged rightly when they declined to interfere with the established order of things among civilized peoples, or to recognize in any way a state of society which, however beautiful in theory, in practice would effectually bar all progress, and which would result only in confusion and misery" (Rev. H. D. M. Spence, Bib. Ed., iii, 267).

COMPASS (Heb. usually כֶּבֶד, saw-bab', to revolve), used in the A. V. as a noun, as to "fetch a compass" (Num. 34:5; Josh. 15:3, etc.; Acts 28:13, Gr. περιέρχουμαι, to go around).

COMPASSION. See MERCY.

COMPEL, the rendering in the A. V. (Matt. 5:41; 27:32; Mark 15:21) of the technical Greek term ang-ar-yew'-o (ἀγγαρεύω), literally, "to employ a courier." These couriers had authority to press into their service, in case of need, horses, vessels, even men they met. In Luke 14:23 the Greek word (ἀναγκάζω, an-ang-kad'-zo) has the milder sense of urge. See GLOSSARY.

COMPREHEND. See GLOSSARY.

CONANIAH (Heb. כֹּהֵן נָחִיָּאֵה, ko-nan-yaw'-hoo, Jah has sustained).

1. A Levite, ruler of the offerings and tithes in the time of Hezekiah (2 Chron. 31:12, 13, A. V. "Cononiah").

2. One who made large offerings for the paschal sacrifices as renewed by Josiah (2 Chron. 35:9).

CONCISION (Gr. κατατομή, kat-at-om-ay', cutting down, mutilation), a contemptuous term used by Paul (Phil. 3:2) to denote the zealous advocates of circumcision; as though he would say, "Keep your eye on that boasted circumcision, or, to call it by its true name, 'concision,' or 'mutilation.'" In Gal. 5:12 he speaks more pointedly: "I would they (the same class of Judaizing teachers) were even cut off" (Gr. ἀποκόψονται), i. e., make themselves eunuchs.

CONCLUDE. See GLOSSARY.

CONCUBINE (Heb. פְּדִיָּה, pee-leh'-ghesh, derivation uncertain), a secondary or inferior wife.

1. Roman and Greek. Among the Romans it was only at a comparatively late period that concubinage acquired any kind of legal sanction, and the concubine came to be substituted for the mistress. Among the Greeks, however, the distinction between wife and concubine was early established, the former being for the begetting of legitimate children and taking charge of the affairs of the house, the other for performing daily ministrations about the person.

2. Hebrew. Concubinage early came into general practice, for we read (Gen. 22:24) of Bethuel, the father of Rebekah, having not only his wife Milcah, but also a concubine, Reumah, who bore him four children. Indeed, concubinage substantially appeared when Abraham took Hagar as a sort of wife, by whom Sarah hoped he would have children—to be reckoned, in some sense, as her own, and to take rank as proper members of the family (Gen. 16:1, sq.). In the next generation of the chosen family we find no mention of a state of concubinage; Isaac seems to have had no partner to his bed but Rebekah, and no children but Esau and Jacob. But the evil reappears in the next generation in an aggravated form; Esau multiplying wives at pleasure, and Jacob taking first two wives and then two concubines.

Nor was the practice ever wholly discontinued among the Israelites, for we see that the following men had concubines, viz., Eliphaz (Gen. 36:12), Gideon (Judg. 8:31), Saul (2 Sam. 3:7), David (2 Sam. 5:13), Solomon (1 Kings 11:3), Rehoboam (2 Chron. 11:21), Abijah (2 Chron. 13:21). Indeed, in process of time concubinage appears to have degenerated into a regular custom among the Jews, and the institutions of Moses were directed to prevent excess and abuse by wholesome laws and regulations (Exod. 21:7-9; Deut. 21:10-14). The unfaithfulness of a concubine was considered as criminal (2 Sam. 3:7, 8), and was punished with scourging (Lev. 19:20). In Judg. 19 the possessor of a concubine was called her "husband," her father is called the "father-in-law," and he the "son-in-law," showing how nearly the concubine approached to the wife.

Sometimes, to avoid debauchery, a female slave would be given to the son, and was then considered as one of the children of the house, and retained her rights as concubine even after the marriage of the son (Exod. 21:9, 10).

Christianity restores the sacred institution of marriage to its original character, and concubinage is ranked with fornication and adultery (Matt. 19:5; 1 Cor. 7:2). Still the practice of concubinage yielded only in the slowest and most gradual manner even to our Lord's explicit teachings. Long after the establishment of Christianity the state recognized concubinage as contradistinguished from marriage, though not in coexistence with it; and even as late as the Council of Toledo, A. D. 400, communion was allowed to persons living therein, while it excluded polygamists. For centuries concubinage was quite common among clergy and laity, being at first denied to the clergy, but only with general effect, about the period of the Reformation. It still exists in some countries, particularly Germany, under the title of left-handed, or morganatic marriage, in allusion to the manner of its being contracted, viz., by the man giving the woman his left hand instead of the right. This is a real marriage, though without the usual solemnity, and the parties are bound to live together, though the woman cannot take her husband's name and title.

CONCUPISCENCE (Gr. ἐπιθυμία, ep-ee-thoo-mee'-ah, a longing, Rom. 7:8; Col. 3:5), evil desire, generally in the sense of indwelling sin.

CONDEMNATION (Heb. רָשָׁע, raw-shah', to make or declare wrong [in law]; Gr. κρίμα, kree'-mah, judgment pronounced). The Greek word is translated judgment and (often wrongly) damnation. Condemnation signifies the declaring an evildoer to be guilty; the punishment inflicted (1 Cor. 11:32, 34); testimony by good example against malefactors (Matt. 12:41, 42). We use the word with the lighter meaning of censure, disapproval, blame, etc.

CONDUIT (Heb. תְּלֵלָה, teh-aw-law, a channel, "watercourse," Job 38:25; "trench," 1 Kings 18:32-38). The aqueduct made by Hezekiah to convey the water from the upper pool of Gihon into the western part of Jerusalem (2 Kings 18:17; 20:20; Isa. 7:3; 36:2). It seems to have been at first an open trench, but closed with masonry at the approach of the Assyrians. The aqueduct, though much injured, and not serviceable for water beyond Bethlehem, still exists; the water is conveyed from about two miles S. of Bethlehem, crossing the valley of Hinnom on a bridge of nine arches.

CONEY. See ANIMAL KINGDOM.

CONFECTION (Heb. קֶרֶךְ, ro'-kakh, Exod. 30:35), the perfume (v. 37) made by the temple apothecary.

CONFECTIONARY (Heb. קֶרֶךְ, raw-kakh, 1 Sam. 8:13), a female perfumer.

CONFERENCE (Gr. προσανατιθῆμι, pros-an-at-ih'-ay-mee, to communicate), the bringing together of individual opinions, to discuss; hence applied to any religious discussion (Gal. 2:6).

CONFESSION (Heb. from יָדָה, yaw-daw', literally, to use, i. e., extend the hand) is used in the Old Testament in the sense of acknowledging one's sin (Lev. 5:5; Job 40:14; Psa. 32:5). In the prayer of Solomon at the dedication of the temple he uses the expression "confess thy name" (1 Kings 8:33, 35; 2 Chron. 6:24, 26), doubtless meaning the acknowledgment of Jehovah as the one against whom the Israelites might sin, and the justice of punishment meted out by him.

The Greek word rendered "confession" is ὁμολογία, hom-ol-og-eh'-o, literally, to say the same thing, i. e., not to deny, and so to admit or declare one's self guilty of what he is accused. It is also used in the sense of a profession, implying the yielding or change of one's conviction (John 12:42; Acts 23:8; Rom. 10:9, 10; 1 Tim. 6:13, etc.).

CONFUSION. See GLOSSARY.

CONFUSION OF TONGUES. See BABEL; TONGUES, CONFUSION OF.

CONGREGATION (Heb. קְהִלָּה, ay-daw', or מוֹעֵד, mo-ade'; Gr. συναγωγή, soon-ag-o-gayf).

1. The Hebrew People in its collective capacity under its peculiar aspect as a holy community, held together by religious rather than political bonds. Sometimes it is used in a broad sense as inclusive of foreign settlers (Exod. 12:19); but more properly, as exclusively appropriate to the Hebrew element of the population (Num. 15:15). Every circumcised Hebrew was a member of the congregation, and took part in its proceedings, probably from the time that he bore arms. It is important, however, to observe that he acquired no political rights in his individual capacity, but only as a member of a house; for the basis of the Hebrew polity was the house, whence was formed in an ascending scale the family or collection of houses, the tribe or collection of families, and the congregation or collection of tribes.

2. The Comitia, or Legislative Assemblies. (1) Composition. The persons composing the Comitia were judges, heads of families, genealogists (Heb. שְׂרָפִים, sho-ter-ehm'), elders, and the princes of the tribes. These representatives formed the congregation. Comp. Exod. 12:3, "the congregation of Israel;" v. 21, "the elders of Israel;" further, Deut. 31:28, where we read, "the elders of your tribes and your officers;" and in v. 30, "the whole congregation of Israel." Thus both expressions are in every case identical, and congregation or assembly of Israel means the people of Israel present in their representatives.

(2) Meetings. The Comitia were convened by the judge or ruler, for the time being, and, in case of his absence, by the high priest (Josh. 23:1, 2; Num. 10:2-4; Judg. 20:27, 28). The place of assembling appears to have been at the door of the tabernacle (Num. 10:3; 1 Sam. 10:17); although some other place, commonly of some celebrity, was selected (Josh. 24:1; 1 Sam. 11:14, 15; 1 Kings 12:1). While in the wilderness the summons was given by blowing the holy trumpets; the blowing of one trumpet being the signal for a select convention, composed merely of the heads of the clans or associated families, and of the princes of the tribes; the blowing of two trumpets, the signal for convening the great assembly, composed not only of the above, but also of the elders, judges, and genealogists, and, in some instances, of the whole body of the people (Num. 10:2-4). When Israel was settled in Palestine notification of the assembly was sent by messengers.

(3) Powers, etc. In the congregation the rights of sovereignty were exercised, such as declaring war (Judg. 20:1, 11-14), making peace (Judg. 21:13-20), and concluding treaties (Josh. 9:15-21). Civil rulers and generals, and eventually kings, were chosen (1 Sam. 10:17; 2 Sam. 5:1; 1 Kings 12:20). The congregation acted without instructions from the people, on their own authority, and according to their own views; still they were in the habit of proposing to the people their decisions for ratification (1 Sam. 11:14, 15; comp. Josh. 8:33). When Jehovah was chosen as the special king of the Hebrews it was by the people themselves, all of whom, as well as their rulers, took the oath of obedience, even the women and children (Exod. 24:3-8; Deut. 29:9-14).

In the later periods of Jewish history the congregation was represented by the SANHEDRIN (q. v.); and the term ΣΥΝΑΓΟΓΗ (q. v.), applied in the Septuagint exclusively to the congregation, was transferred to the place of meeting. In Acts 13:43, however, it is used in a modern sense of an assembly (Keil, Bib. Arch., ii, 315; Jahn, Bib. Arch.).

CONGREGATION, MOUNT OF (Heb. מוֹעֵד הָרִים, har mo-ade'), supposed by some to refer to Mount Moriah as the site of the temple (Isa. 14:13), but Zion was neither a northern point of the earth, nor was it situated on the north of Jerusalem. "The prophet makes the king of Babylon speak after the general notion of his people, who placed the seat of the Deity on the summit of the northern mountains, which were lost in the clouds" (Delitzsch, Com.).

CONSCIENCE (Lat. conscientia, consciousness; Gr. συνείδησις, soon-i'-day-sis), the consciousness that a proposed act is or is not conformable to one's ideal of right, and manifesting itself in the feeling of obligation or duty. Conscience is not so much a distinct faculty of the mind, like perception, memory, etc., as an exercise of the judgment and the power of feeling, as employed with reference to moral truth. It implies moral sense "to discern both good and evil" (Heb. 5:14), and a feeling, more or less strong, of responsibility. Thus it will appear to be wrong to name conscience "the voice of God," although this is true, that the testimony of conscience certainly rests on a divine foundation, a divine law in man, the existence of which, its claims and judgments, are removed from his subjective control.

If a man knows his doing to be in harmony with this law his conscience is good (Acts 23:1; 1 Tim. 1:5, 19; Heb. 13:18; 1 Pet. 3:16, 21), pure (1 Tim. 3:9; 2 Tim. 1:3), void of offense (Gr. ἀποσκευος). If his doing be evil, so also is his conscience, inasmuch as it is consciousness of such evil (Heb. 10:22); it is defiled (Gr. μεμασμένη, Tit. 1:15; 1 Cor. 8:7) when it is stained by evil deeds; or seared with a hot iron (1 Tim. 4:2) when it is branded with its evil deeds, or cauterized, i. e., made insensible to all feeling.

Paul lays down the law that a man should follow his own conscience, even though it be weak; otherwise moral personality would be destroyed (1 Cor. 8:10, sq.; 10:29, sq.). See GLOSSARY.

CONSECRATION, the rendering of several Hebrew and Greek words. It is the act of setting apart any thing or person to the worship or service of God.

1. The Law of Moses ordained that the first-born, both of man and beast, should be consecrated to Jehovah; also that all the race of Abraham was in a peculiar manner consecrated to his worship, while the tribe of Levi and family of Aaron were more immediately consecrated to the service of God (Exod. 13:2; Num. 3:12; 1 Pet. 2:9). There were also consecrations, voluntary and of temporary or abiding nature (see Vow). Thus Hannah devoted her son Samuel to a lifetime service in the tabernacle (1 Sam. 1:11); and David and Solomon appointed the Nethinim to a similar service in the temple (Ezra 8:20). The Hebrews sometimes devoted to the Lord their fields and cattle, spoils taken in war (Lev. 27:28, 29), vessels (Josh. 6:19), profits (Mic. 4:13), individuals (Num. 6:2-13; 1 Sam. 1:11; Luke 1:15), and nations (Exod. 19:6).

2. In the New Testament all Christians are consecrated persons. They are not only "a holy nation," but also "a royal priesthood" (1 Pet. 2:9). The New Testament also recognizes special consecrations, as to the work of the Christian ministry, or to some particular service connected therewith (Acts 13:2, 3; 1 Cor. 12:28). See ORDINATION.

3. Modern Use. The uses of the term in modern times correspond in the main to the fundamental Scripture ideas. Thus in ecclesiastical phraseology it denotes the setting apart of a church for the purpose of worship, or the setting apart of a person to an office of the Christian ministry. The broadest and most important application is that which refers to the dedication of one's self to God, to be his possession and devoted to his service. Persons thus dedicating themselves are sanctified by the Spirit, and thus become in the true sense "consecrated." The Holy Ghost is both the seal and power of consecration. See SANCTIFICATION.

CONTAIN. See GLOSSARY.

CONTENTION (Heb. רִיב, maw-dohn', strife; רִיב, reeb, pleading; Gr. ἐρις, er'-is, strife), immoderate strife or struggle in words to obtain an end, angry debate, discordant discussion, wrangling controversy, altercation, partisanship, putting one's self forward, factiousness (Prov. 13:10; 17:14; 18:6; Hab. 1:3; Acts 15:3, etc.; Rom. 2:18; see also Phil. 2:3; James 3:14, 16; in the plural, 2 Cor. 12:20; Gal. 5:20). Contention is also the rendering of Gr. ἐπιθεία, er-ith-i'-ah, from a verb meaning, "to work for hire," hence a mean, sordid fellow.

CONTENTMENT (Gr. ἀντάρκεια, ow-tar'-ki-ah). The word means "sufficiency," and is so rendered in 2 Cor. 9:8. It is that disposition of mind, through grace, in which one is independent of outward circumstances (Phil. 4:11; 1 Tim. 6:6, 8), so as not to be moved by envy (James 3:16), anxiety (Matt. 6:25, 34), and repining (1 Cor. 10:10).

CONTRACT. See COVENANT.

CONTRITION (Heb. דָּוָה, daw-kaw', bruised; our English word is from Lat. contritus), penitence, humiliation, and grief for having sinned. The contrite soul is symbolized in the "bruised reed" (Matt. 12:20), which the Saviour "will not break." Contrition is the antecedent to pardon (Psa. 34:18; 51:17; Isa. 66:2). Daw-kaw' is the word (Isa. 53:5, 10) rendered, "He was bruised for our iniquities;" "It pleased the Lord to bruise him." Roman Catholic theology names perfect repentance "contrition," and imperfect repentance "attrition."

CONVERSATION. See GLOSSARY.

CONVERSION (Gr. ἐπιστροφή, ep-is-trof-ay', Acts 15:3, rendered "conversion," literally, turning toward), a term denoting, in its theological use, the "turning" of a soul from sin unto God. The verb (ἐπιστρέφω) is sometimes rendered in the New Testament "to convert," sometimes simply "to turn." In its active sense it represents the action of one who is instrumental in "turning" or "converting" others (Luke 1:16; Acts 26:18; James 5:19, 21); intransitively, the action of men in their own conversion, i. e., the action of men empowered by divine grace to "turn" from sin "toward" God (Acts 3:19, R. V.).

The Hebrew terms of the Old Testament have a similar significance and use (Psa. 19:7; 51:13; Jer. 31:18; Ezek. 33:11). There is a measure of freedom in the Scripture use of these terms that should put us on our guard against attempts at too rigid definition. But in a general way it may be said that conversion in the Scriptures has a more exact and restricted meaning than is ascribed to it in common religious phraseology. Conversion is not justification, or regeneration, or assurance of reconciliation, however closely these blessings may be connected with true conversion. Like repentance and faith, both involved in conversion, conversion is an act of man which he is enabled to perform by divine grace.

Justification and regeneration are acts of God, which he invariably accomplishes for those who are converted, i. e., for those who, with repentance and faith, "turn" away from sin "toward" him (Acts 3:19). For a full and discriminating statement of the doctrine of conversion, see Pope, Comp. Christian Doc., iii, 367-371. See REPENTANCE.

CONVICTION (Gr. ἐλέγχο, el-eng'-kho, to convict, reprove, John 8:46, A. V. "convinceth." The R. V. changes the rendering to "convicteth." In 1 Cor. 14:24, A. V. "convinced" is in R. V. "reproved;" in Tit. 1:9 "convince" is changed to "convict," etc.). The meaning of conviction as a law term is being found guilty. In common language it means being persuaded or convinced. In theology it means being condemned at the bar of one's own conscience as a sinner in view of the law of God. It is the antecedent to repentance, and is often accompanied by a painful sense of exposure to God's wrath. It is the work of the Holy Spirit, showing the heinousness of sin and the soul's exposure to divine wrath. The means of conviction are various: Gospel truth, the law read or heard, reflection, affliction, calamity, etc. It often comes suddenly, and may be stifled, as it surely is, if not heeded.

CONVINCE. See GLOSSARY.

CONVOCACTION (Heb. מִקְרָא, mik-raw'), a holy assembly, i. e., a meeting of the people for the worship of Jehovah (Exod. 12:16, etc.). The following occasions were to be held as convocations: The Sabbaths (Lev. 23:2, 3); the Passover, the first and the last day (Exod. 12:16; Lev. 23:7, 8; Num. 28:18, 25); the Pentecost, Feast of Weeks (Lev. 23:21; Num. 28:26); the Feast of Trumpets (Lev. 23:24; Num. 29:1); the Feast of Tabernacles, first and last day (Lev. 23:35, 36; Num. 29:12); the one great Fest, the annual Day of Atonement (Lev. 23:27; Num. 29:7).

One great feature of the convocation was that no work was to be done upon these days, except what was necessary for the preparation of food; on the Sabbath even this was prohibited (Exod. 35:2, 3).

COOK, COOKING. See Food.

CO'OS (Gr. Κῶς, koce), a small island, formerly called Meropis, in the Ægean Sea (Acts 21:1), the birthplace of Hippocrates, celebrated for wines and beautiful stuffs. It is now called Stanchio, and has a population of about eight thousand. Paul spent the night on the island when on his voyage to Judea from Miletus.

COPING (Heb. פֶּה, tay'-fakh, a handbreadth), Coping.

the corbels, i. e., projecting stones on which the ends of timbers are laid (1 Kings 7:9).

COPPER. See MINERAL KINGDOM.

COPPERSMITH (Gr. χαλκίαις, khalk-yooce', a brazier), a worker in any kind of metals; probably Alexander was so called (2 Tim. 4:14) because copper was in such common use. See HANDICRAFTS.

COR. See METROLOGY, II, 1, (6).

CORAL. See MINERAL KINGDOM.

CORBAN (Gr. κορβάν, kor-ban', an offering), a name common to any sacred gift; the term in general use to denote sacrifice, its equivalent (Exod. 28:38) being holy gifts. All things or persons consecrated (or vowed) for religious purposes became corban and fell to the sanctuary. The Pharisees taught that as soon as a person had said to his father or mother, "Be it (or, It is) corban (i. e., devoted) whatever of mine shall profit thee" (Mark 7:11), he thereby consecrated all to God and was relieved from using it for his parents. This Jesus declared to be contradictory of the command which taught children to honor their parents. See Vows.

CORD, the rendering of several Hebrew words, the most comprehensive of which is כֶּבֶל, kheh'-bel, from the root meaning to twist, hence the English cable. The term cord includes in its meaning rope, twine, thread, thongs, etc.

1. The Material of which cord was made varied according to the strength required. Wilkinson says that flax was used for making ropes, string, and various kinds of twine; for large ropes, however, of ordinary quality and for common purposes, the fibers of the date tree were employed, as at the present day. The strongest rope was probably made of strips of camel hide, still used by the Bedouins for drawing water. Other materials are mentioned, as reeds, rushes, osier, etc.

2. Uses. The following uses of cord are mentioned: (1) For fastening a tent (Exod. 35:18; 39:40; Isa. 54:2). (2) For leading or binding animals, as a halter or rein (Psa. 118:27; Hos. 11:4). (3) For yoking them either to a cart (Isa. 5:18) or a plow (Job 39:10, A. V. "band"). (4) For binding prisoners (Judg. 15:13; Psa. 2:3; 129:4; Ezek. 3:25). (5) For bowstrings (Psa. 11:2) made of catgut; such are spoken of in Judg. 16:7 (A. V. "green withs," but more properly fresh or moist bowstrings). (6) For the ropes or "tacklings" of a vessel (Isa. 33:23). (7) For measuring ground (2 Sam. 8:2; Psa. 78:55; Amos 7:17; Zech. 2:1); hence cord or line became an expression for an inheritance (Josh. 17:14; 19:9; Psa. 16:6; Ezek. 47:13), and even for any defined district (Deut. 3:4). (8) For fishing and snaring. (9) For attaching articles of dress, as the "wreathen chains," which were rather twisted cords, worn by the high priests (Exod. 28:14, 22, 24; 39:15, 17). (10) For fastening awnings (Esth. 1:6). (11) For attaching to a plummet. (12) For drawing water out of a well or raising heavy weights (Josh. 2:15; Jer. 38:6, 13).

3. Figurative. (1) To gird one's self with a cord was a token of sorrow and humiliation (1 Kings 20:31-33; Job 36:8). (2) To stretch out a cord over or about a city signifies to destroy it (Isa. 34:11; Lam. 2:8). Probably the meaning is that God brings about destruction with the same rigid exactness as that with which a builder carries out his well-considered plan. (3) Tent cords furnish several metaphors of stability (Isa. 33:20, "neither shall any of the cords thereof be broken," and Jer. 10:20, "all my cords are broken," signifying disaster). (4) "The cords of one's sins" (Prov. 5:22) are the consequences of wrongdoing. (5) As the tent supplied a favorite image of the human body, the cords which held it in its place represented the principle of life (Job 4:21; Eccles. 12:6). The "silver cord" (Eccles. 12:6) is supposed to be the spinal marrow, and is thought to refer to the silk and silver cord by which lamps were suspended, and the breaking of which allowed the lamp to be dashed to pieces. (6) A "threefold cord," i. e., one of three strands, is the symbol of union, the combination of many (Eccles. 4:12). (7) "I drew them with cords of a man" (Hos. 11:4) is an expression signifying that God had employed humane methods, such as men employed when inducing others, as, for instance, a father guiding a child, who is learning to walk, with leading strings.

CORE, a mode of Grecizing (Jude 11) the name KORAH (q. v.).

CORIANDEE. See VEGETABLE KINGDOM.

CORINTH (Gr. Κόρινθος, kor'-in-thos, ornament, beauty).

1. Physical Description. A Grecian city upon an isthmus between the gulfs of Lepanto and Ægina, connecting the Peloponnesus and the mainland, forty miles W. of Athens. It had two harbors, Cenchreæ on the east and Lechæum on the west. Its citadel, called Acrocorinthus, was built upon the rock two thousand feet above the level of the sea.

2. History. It had a mixed population of Romans, Greeks, and Jews. It was wealthy, luxurious, immoral, and vicious. In 146 B. C. the Romans destroyed it. Julius Cæsar restored it, 46 B. C. Gallio, brother of Seneca, was proconsul when Paul first visited it. Upon the second visit Paul wrote his Epistle to the Romans, probably 58 A. D. The Gentile element prevailed in the Christian Church in Corinth. In 1462 the Turks gained possession of it and held it till the Greek revolution. Its former glory has entirely passed away. A miserable village called Gortho exists amid the ancient ruins. Paul's visit to Corinth is narrated in Acts 18. His Epistles to the Corinthians form an index of the moral character of the people. CORN. See GLOSSARY.

CORNE'LIUS (Gr. Κορνήλιος, kor-nay'-lee-os).

1. Family. He was probably of the Cornelii, a noble and distinguished family at Rome. He is described (Acts 10:2) as "a devout man, and one that feared God with all his house," etc. He was a centurion of the Italian band stationed at Cæsarea.

2. Relation to Judaism. Some think him a proselyte of the gate (q. v.), who, having renounced idolatry, and worshipping the true God, submitted to the seven (supposed) precepts of Noah, frequented the synagogue, and offered sacrifices by the hands of the priests, but, not having received circumcision, was not reckoned among the Jews. Of the truth of this there is no positive evidence. Yet Cornelius appears to have been in that class of persons described by Bishop Tomline, consisting of Gentiles who had so far benefited by their contact with the Jewish people as to have become convinced that theirs was the true religion. They, consequently, worshipped the true God, were acquainted with the Scriptures of the Old Testament, and observed several Jewish customs, as, for instance, their hours of prayer or anything else that did not involve an act of special profession.

3. Sends for Peter. While in prayer an angel appeared to him and declared that his "prayers and alms had come up for a memorial before God," and directed him to send to Joppa for Peter. The messengers were received and hospitably entertained by Peter, who had been prepared by the revelations of the noonday vision. Arriving at the house of Cornelius, Peter proceeded to explain his vision, when the Holy Ghost fell upon the Gentiles present, and they were "baptized in the name of the Lord" (Acts 10:1-8), A. D. 45. Cornelius thus became the first fruit of the Gentile world to Christ, and was publicly recognized as such. According to Jerome, he built a Christian church at Caesarea, but later tradition makes him bishop of Scamandrios (Scamandria?) and ascribes to him the working of a great miracle.

CORNER, the rendering of several Hebrew and Greek words:

1. Pin-naw' (Heb. פִּנָּה, pinnacle), an angle, as the corner of a house (Job 1:19), a street (Prov. 7:8), roof (Prov. 21:9), etc.

2. Pay-aw' (Heb. פִּי, mouth, hence side, the extreme part), the side of anything, as the points of the compass, sometimes rendered "quarter," "side;" districts of a country (Neh. 9:22), in the plural meaning the whole land (Num. 24:17); the extreme part of anything, as of a field (Lev. 19:9), of the table of showbread (Exod. 25:26), of a divan (Amos 3:12, in which passage its use is obscure, some understanding it to mean the post of honor, others the most convenient place for repose, still others as meaning only a small portion, implying poverty). The "corners of the head and beard" (Lev. 19:27; 21:5) were the places where the hair of the beard meets that of the head, which the Jews were forbidden to cut (see HAIR).

3. Kaw-nawf' (Heb. קַוְנָף, edge), used in Isa. 11:12; 30:20; Ezek. 7:2, to express the "four corners of the earth," or the whole land.

4. Kaw-thafe' (Heb. קַוְתָּף, shoulder), the border or side of a building (1 Kings 6:8; 7:30), the sea (Num. 34:11), city or country (Josh. 15:8, 10, etc.).

5. Mak-tso'-ah (Heb. מַקְצוֹאֵה, angle), spoken of the external extremities of the tabernacle (Exod. 27:2, 4; 36:29), the internal ones of a court (Ezek. 41:22).

6. Pah'-am (Heb. פֶּה אֵמ, step), a term applied to the extremities (perhaps feet) of the ark and laver (Exod. 25:12; 1 Kings 7:30).

7. Tsay-law' (Heb. צַיִל, rib, or side), the corners of each side of the altar of incense (Exod. 30:4; 37:27).

8. Kaw-tsaw' (Heb. קָצַע, cut off, end). Used as No. 7.

9. Zaw-veeth' (Heb. צַיִת, angle), the corners of an altar (Zech. 9:15); the corner columns of a palace, representing female figures (Psa. 144:12).

10. The Greek word γωνία, go-nee'-ah, may mean the corner of a street, forming a square (Matt. 6:5), or a dark recess used for secrecy (Acts 26:26). The "corners" of the sheet in Peter's vision (Acts 10:11; 11:5) is the rendering of another word, meaning the "beginning."

The "corner" of the field was not allowed to be wholly reaped (Lev. 19:9), but was to be left to the gleaner by the poor. See REAPING.

For the "head of the corner," see CORNER STONE.

CORNER GATE. This gate was at the northwest corner of Jerusalem (2 Kings 14:13; 2 Chron. 25:23). See JERUSALEM.

CORNER STONE (Heb. פִּנָּה שֹׂהַן, ek'-ben pin'-nav, Job 38:6; Isa. 28:16; Gr. κεφαλὴ γωνίας, kef-al-ay' go-nee'-as), the stone at the corner of two walls and uniting them; specifically, the stone built into one corner of the foundation of an edifice as the actual or nominal starting point of a building. From a comparison of passages we find mention of "a stone for foundations" (Isa. 28:16), "a stone for a corner" (Jer. 51:26, from which it would appear that corner stones were placed in different positions as regards elevation). The expressions "the head of the corner" (Psa. 118:22) and the "headstone" (Zech. 4:7) seem to warrant the conclusion that the "corner stone" is a term equally applicable to the chief stone at the top and that in the foundation.

Figurative. The phrase "corner stone" is sometimes used to denote any principal person, as the princes of Egypt (Isa. 19:13, margin). Christ is called the "corner stone" in reference to his being the foundation of the Christian faith (Eph. 2:20) and the importance and conspicuousness of the place he occupies (Matt. 21:42; 1 Pet. 2:6).

CORNET. See MUSIC, INSTRUMENTAL.

CORRECTION (Heb. יָסַר, yaw-sar', to instruct, chastise; קָחַקַח, yaw-kakh', to manifest, reason with, reprove). In "He that chastiseth the heathen, shall not be correct?" (Psa. 94:10) both Hebrew words are used in the above order. The man is styled happy whom God thus correcteth (Job 5:17). The Scriptures are for correction (2 Tim. 3:16). In the Bible the word has the same double meaning as in other English literature, viz., to reform, rectify, free from errors, and to chastise or punish; the act of correcting.

CORRUPTION, the rendering of several Hebrew and Greek words, signifying (1) The decay of the body (Job 17:14; Psa. 16:10, etc.). (2) The blemishes which rendered an animal unfit for sacrifice (Lev. 22:25). (3) The demoralization of heart and life through sin (Gen. 6:12; Deut. 9:12), resulting in those sinful habits and practices which defile and ruin men (Rom. 8:21; 2 Pet. 2:12, 19). (4) Everlasting ruin (Gal. 6:8).

CORRUPTION, MOUNT OF, a hill near Jerusalem, where Solomon established high places for the worship of Ashtoreth, Chemosh, and Milcom, afterward overthrown by Josiah (2 Kings 23:13). Tradition locates it at the eminence immediately south of the Mount of Olives.

CO'SAM (Gr. Κωσάμ, ko-sam', a diviner), the son of Elmodan and father of Addi, in the line of Joseph, the husband of Mary (Luke 3:28).

COTES (Heb. only in the plural, אָוֵרוֹת, av-ay-roth', stalls), pens or inclosures for flocks (2 Chron. 32:28).

COTTAGE. (1) A hut made of boughs (Isa. 1:8; Heb. סֹוֹקָא, sook-kaw'), for the purpose of temporary shelter. Being of slight structure, when the fruits were gathered they were either taken down or blown down by the winds of winter (Job 27:18, "booth"). (2) Another Hebrew word (מֶלֶעוֹנָא, mel-oo-naw') occurs in Isa. 24:20, "The earth . . . shall be removed like a cottage;" better, swing to and fro like a hammock. It would seem to have been a swinging bed suspended from the trees or an even frailer structure than No. 1 (rendered "lodge," Isa. 1:8). (3) The cottages mentioned in Zephaniah (2:6; Heb. כִּרְרוֹת, ke-roth', literally, diggings) are thought by some to mean wells, but probably were excavations made by the shepherds as a protection against the sun.

COUCH. See BED.

COUCHING PLACE (Heb. מַרְבָּץ, mar-bates'), a resting place for flocks (Ezek. 25:5), an expression showing the utter ruin of Ammon.

COULTER (Heb. רֹחַץ, ayth, 1 Sam. 13:20, 21), according to Isa. 2:4, Mic. 4:3, and Joel 3:10, is an iron instrument used in agriculture, the majority of the ancient versions rendering it plowshare.

COUNCIL. In the Old Testament council is the rendering of the Heb. רֵיבֻץ, rig-maw', literally, a heap (Psa. 68:27), a throng or company of persons. Two Greek words are thus rendered in the New Testament:

1. A consultation of persons (Matt. 12:14, συμβουλιον, soom-boo'-lee-on). In Acts 25:12 reference is made to a board of assessors or advisors, with whom the governors of the provinces took counsel before rendering judgment (Grimm, Greek Lex., s. v.).

2. Any assembly for the purpose of deliberating or adjudicating (συνέδριον, soon-ed'-ree-on, a sitting together). Among the Jews these councils were: (1) The Sanhedrin. (2) The lesser courts (Matt. 10:17; Mark 13:9), of which there were two at Jerusalem and one in each town of Palestine. See LAW, ADMINISTRATION OF.

COUNCIL, APOSTOLICAL. See APOSTOLICAL COUNCIL.

COUNSELOR (usually Heb. יָוֹעֵץ, yaw-ats').

In general, an adviser upon any matter (Prov. 11:14; 15:22; 2 Chron. 25:16, etc.), especially the king's state adviser (2 Sam. 15:12; Ezra 7:28; 1 Chron. 27:33, etc.), and one of the chief men of the government (Job 3:14; 12:17; Isa. 1:26; 3:3, etc.). In Mark 15:43 and Luke 23:50 the word probably designates a member of the Sanhedrin.

COUNTERVAIL (Esth. 7:4). See GLOSSARY.

COUPLING (Heb. קָוָה, khaw-bar', to join), of curtains (Exod. 26:4, 5, 10; 28:27; 36:11, etc.), and wooden beams for fastening a building (2 Chron. 34:11).

COURAGE, COURAGEOUS (Heb. לֵבָב, lay-bawb', heart, Dan. 11:25; רוּחַ, roo'-akh, breath, life, spirit, Josh. 2:11; אֲוָתִים, aw-mats', to be alert, strong, Deut. 31:6, 7, etc.; קָוָה, khaw-zak', to seize, Josh. 23:6; 2 Sam. 10:12; 13:28; 2 Chron. 15:8, etc.; Gr. θάρσος, thar'-sos, courage, cheer, Acts 28:15). Courage is that condition of mind into which fear does not enter; which enables us to face difficulties and dangers with firmness and fearlessness.

COURSE. This word is used in Scripture in the sense of advance, progress (2 Thess. 3:1), race, a career (2 Tim. 4:7), path, direction (Psa. 82:5), running as of a horse (Jer. 8:6; 23:10).

COURSE OF PRIESTS AND LEVITES (Heb. מִשְׁמֶרֶת, makh-al-o'-keth; Gr. ἐφημερία, ef-ay-mer-ee'-ah, lusting for a day). The number of the priests and Levites had so increased that David divided them into twenty-four classes or orders, with a president at the head of each class. The order in which each of these classes was to take its turn was determined by lot, a new one being appointed every week, their duties beginning with one Sabbath and ending on the next (2 Kings 11:9; 2 Chron. 23:8; see also 1 Chron. 24:1, where the twenty-four orders are enumerated; and 27:1, sq.). See LEVITES, PRIESTS.

COURT (Heb. חֲצוֹן, khaw-tsare'), an open inclosure; applied in Scripture mostly to the inclosures of the tabernacle and TEMPLE (q. v.). It also means a yard of a prison (Neh. 3:25; Jer. 32:2), of a private house (2 Sam. 17:18), and of a palace (2 Kings 20:4; Esth. 1:5, etc.).

"Court for owls" (Isa. 34:13) is rendered by Delitzsch (Com., in loc.) "pasture for ostriches." He says that the Hebrew word corresponds to the Arabic for green, a green field, and takes it in the sense of a grassy place, such as is frequented by ostriches. In Amos (7:13) the Heb. בַּיִת, bah-yith, a house, is rendered "court."

In the New Testament the Gr. αὐλή, aw-lay', designates an open court (Rev. 11:2), while "kings' courts" is the rendering of the Greek word βασιλειον, a palace. See HOUSE.

COURTS, JUDICIAL. See LAW, ADMINISTRATION OF.

COUSIN, the rendering of the Gr. συγγενής (soong-ghen-ace'), a blood relative or "kinsman," as elsewhere translated.

COVENANT (Heb. בְּרִית, ber-eeth', cutting), the term applied to various transactions between God and man, and man and his fellow-man. It is also rendered "league" (Josh. 9:6, 7, 11, etc.; Judg. 2:2; 2 Sam. 3:12, 13, 21; 5:3; 1 Kings 5:12, etc.), "confederacy" (Obad. 7). In the New Testament the word διαθήκη, dee-ath-ay'-kay, dis-position or will respecting a person or thing, is used; sometimes it is translated "TESTAMENT" (q. v.), at other times "covenant."

1. Application of the Term. (1) Properly, of a compact between man and man; applied between tribes or nations (1 Sam. 11:1; Josh. 9:6, 15), or between individuals (Gen. 21:27), in which each party bound himself to fulfill certain conditions, and was promised certain advantages. In making covenants God was solemnly invoked as a witness (Gen. 31:50), whence the expression "a covenant of Jehovah" (1 Sam. 20:8; comp. Jer. 34:18, 19; Ezek. 17:19), and an oath was sworn (Gen. 21:31). Accordingly, a breach of covenant was regarded as a heinous sin (Ezek. 17:12-20). The marriage compact is called "the covenant of God" (Prov. 2:17). As a witness to the covenant a gift was presented (Gen. 21:30), or a heap of stones set up (Gen. 31:52). (2) Improperly, of a covenant between God and man. As man is not in the position of an independent covenanting party, such a covenant is not strictly a mutual compact, but a promise on the part of God to arrange his providences for the welfare of those who should render him obedience.

2. Covenants Mentioned. The following covenants are mentioned in Scripture: (1) The covenant with Noah, in which God assured Noah that judgment would not again come to men in the form of a flood; and that the recurrence of the seasons and of day and night should not cease (Gen. 9; Jer. 33:20). (2) The covenant with Abraham. The condition of this covenant was that Abraham was to leave all his country, kindred, and father's house, and to follow the Lord into the land which he would show him. The promise was a fourfold blessing: (1) Increase into a numerous people; (2) Material and spiritual prosperity—"I will bless thee;" (3) The exaltation of Abraham's name—"make thy name great;" (4) Abraham was not only to be blessed by God, but to be a blessing to others (Gen. 12:1-3). Later this covenant was renewed, and Abraham was promised a son and numerous posterity (Gen. 15). About fourteen years after the making of the covenant it was renewed, with a change of his name and the establishment of circumcision, which was to be the sign of accepting and ratifying the covenant (Gen. 17). (3) The covenant with Israel. This took place at Sinai, when the people had intimated their acceptance of the words of the covenant as found in the Ten Commandments (Exod. 34:28; 24:3), and promised to keep the same. Their obedience to the commands of the law was to be rewarded by God's constant care of Israel, temporal prosperity, victory over enemies, and the pouring out of his Spirit (Exod. 23:20, sq.). The seal of this covenant was to be circumcision, and was called "Jehovah's covenant" (Deut. 4:13). It was renewed at different periods of Jewish history (Deut. 29; Josh. 24; 2 Chron. chaps. 15, 23, 29, 34; Ezra 10; Neh. chaps. 9, 10). (4) Covenant with David. This was in reality but another and more specific form of the covenant with Abraham, and had for its main object to mark with greater exactness the line through which the blessing promised in the Abrahamic covenant was to find accomplishment. The seed-royal thenceforth was to be in the house of David (2 Sam. 7:12; 22:51), and, especially in connection with the One who was to be preeminently the child of promise in that house, all good, first to Israel, and then to all nations, should be realized (Psa. 2 and 22; Isa. 9:6, 7, etc.).

In adaptation to human thought such covenants were said to be confirmed by an oath (Deut. 4:31; Psa. 89:3).

3. Ceremonies. "Covenants were not only concluded with an oath (Gen. 26:28; 31:53; Josh. 9:15; 2 Kings 11:4), but, after an ancient Chaldean custom, confirmed by slaughtering and cutting a victim into two halves, between which the parties passed, to intimate that if either of them broke the covenant it would fare with him as with the slain and divided beast (Gen. 15:9, sq.; Jer. 34:18, sq.). Moreover, the covenanting parties were wont to have a common meal (Gen. 26:30, sq.; 31:54; comp. 2 Sam. 3:20 with v. 12), or at least to partake of salt (some grains of it)" (Keil, Bib. Arch., ii, 382). See COVENANT OF SALT.

Among the Medes, Lydians, Armenians, Arabs, Scythians, and other nations the parties to a treaty were wont to draw blood from their veins and to drink or lick it. This custom was unknown to the Israelites.

According to the Mosaic ritual, the blood of the victim was divided into halves; one half was sprinkled upon the altar, and the other upon the people (Exod. 24:6, sq.). The meaning of this seems to be that, in the sprinkling of the blood upon the altar, the people were introduced into gracious fellowship with God and atonement made for their sin. Through the sprinkling of the blood upon the people Israel was formally consecrated to the position of God's covenant people.

COVENANT OF SALT (Heb. כֶּלֶח מֶלַח, ber-eelh' meh'-lakh). Covenanting parties were accustomed to partake of salt, to make the covenant a covenant of salt (Num. 18:19; 2 Chron. 13:5), i. e., inviolably sure. The meaning appears to have been that the salt, with its power to strengthen food and keep it from decay, symbolized the unbending truthfulness of that self-surrender to the Lord embodied in the sacrifice, by which all impurity and hypocrisy were repelled.

COVENANT, THE NEW. In the New Testament we read of only two covenants—the new and the old, the former brought in and established by Christ, and the latter in consequence ceasing to exist. The old, i. e., the covenant of law, with all its outward institutions and ritualistic services, is regarded as old because its full and formal ratification took place before the other. In germ the new covenant (or that of grace) existed from the first; and partial exhibitions of it have been given all along the world's history. It was involved in the promise of recovery at the fall.

COVERING THE HEAD in prayer (1 Cor. 11:4-6). "The Jewish men prayed with the head covered, nay, even with a veil before the face. Greek usage required that the head should be bare on sacred occasions; and this commended itself to Paul as so entirely in accordance with the divinely appointed position of man (v. 3) that for the man to cover his head seemed to him to cast dishonor on that position. His head ought to show to all (and its being uncovered is the sign of this) that no man, but, on the contrary, Christ, and through him God himself, is Head (Lord) of the man. . . . A woman, when praying, was to honor her head by having a sign upon it of the authority of her husband, which was done by having it covered; otherwise she dishonored her head by dressing, not like a married wife, from whose headdress one can see that her husband is her head, but like a loose woman, with whose shorn head the uncovered one is on a par" (Meyer, Com., in loc.). The above command does not refer to private or family prayer.

COVERT FOR THE SABBATH. See SABBATH, COVERT FOR.

COVETOUSNESS (Heb. חַמְצוֹן, chaw-ma'f, to desire; בָּצֵעַ, beh'-tsah, dishonest gain; Gr. πλεονεξία, pleh-on-ex-ee'-ah, the wish to have more), an inordinate desire for what one has not, which has its basis in discontentment with what one has. It has an element of lawlessness, and is sinful because contrary to the command, "Be content with such things as ye have" (Heb. 13:5), because it leads to "trust in uncertain riches," to love of the world, to forgetfulness of God, and is idolatry (Col. 3:5), setting up wealth instead of God. It ranks with the worst sins (Mark 7:22; Rom. 1:29). Our Lord especially warns against it (Luke 12:15), as does St. Paul (Eph. 5:3, etc.). A man may be covetous, eager to obtain money, and not avaricious or penurious, i. e., unwilling to part with money, or sordid and niggardly, i. e., mean in his dealings. He may or may not be miserly.

The verb is also used in a good sense (1 Cor. 12:31).

COW. See ANIMAL KINGDOM.

COZ (Heb. קֹז, koz, a thorn), the father of Anub and others of the posterity of Judah (1 Chron. 4:8), where, however, his own parentage is not stated, unless he be a son or brother of Ashur (in v. 5), B. C. before 1300.

COZ'BI (Heb. קֹזִבִי, koz-bee', false), the daughter of Zur, a Midianitish prince. While in the act of committing lewdness with Zimri, an Israelitish chief, she was slain by Phinehas, who thrust a javelin through them both (Num. 25:15, 18), B. C. about 1170.

CRACKLING (Heb. קֹל, kole, voice, i. e., noise). "The crackling of thorns under a pot" (Eccles. 7:6) is a proverbial expression for a roaring but quickly extinguished fire.

CRACKNEL (Heb. plural נִקְרוּדִים, nik-kood-deem'), a kind of biscuit baked hard and punctured with holes, such as the wife of Jeroboam sent to the prophet Ahijah (1 Kings 14:3). The original word, in nearly the same form, is rendered "moldy" in Josh. 9:5, 12.

CRAFT, CRAFTSMAN. See HANDICRAFT.

CRAFTINESS, CRAFTY (Heb. עָרָם, avram', to be bare, cunning, subtilty; Gr. πανουργία, pan-oorg-ee'-ah, adroitness, unscrupulousness) are terms used in the Bible as applied to the sly, subtle, wily, deceitful, and fraudulent (Job 5:12, 13; Psa. 83:3; Luke 20:23; 1 Cor. 3:19; 2 Cor. 4:2; 12:16, etc.).

CRANE. See ANIMAL KINGDOM.

CREATION, the work of God in bringing into existence the universe, including both the material and the spiritual worlds; in a more restricted sense, the bringing into existence and into its present condition the earth and the system to which it belongs.

1. Christian View. According to Christian doctrine, God alone is eternal. The system or systems of the material universe, as well as matter itself, also spiritual beings, except God, had a beginning. They were absolutely created, made "out of nothing," by the power of the almighty will. The first sentence of the Apostles' Creed is to be taken in its broadest and deepest sense, "I believe in God the Father Almighty, Maker of heaven and earth."

2. Biblical. The record of the creation in Genesis relates principally in its details to the creation of the earth, or the system to which the earth belongs, and to the creation of man. The first words of the record, however, at least suggest a still broader conception. Taking the account as a whole, we have revealed a succession of creative acts, constituting together one great process of creation. And whatever interpretations have been given as to the various stages of this process, or the "days" of creation, or of other particulars, the fact of chief import remains unclouded—that to God is ascribed the work of bringing into existence, by the free exercise of his creative power, the world and all orders of beings that are therein. This is the uniform teaching of the Old Testament Scriptures (Psa. 33:6; Isa. 45:18; Jer. 10:12, etc.). The doctrine of the New Testament upon this subject is not merely a repetition, but in some respects a development or further unfolding, of that contained in the Old. Thus, with greater explicitness the existence of superhuman intelligence is attributed in the New Testament Scriptures to divine creative power. As the heavenly and spiritual world comes more clearly into view in the New Testament, along with this comes more clearly the declaration that all spiritual beings, outside of God, owe their origin to him. Also, that creative "Word of the Lord," upon which such stress is laid in the Old Testament, in the New Testament is identified with Christ. The second person of the Trinity is revealed as the one most directly connected with the work of creation. In him creation has its explanation and its end (see John 1:3; 1 Cor. 8:6; Eph. 3:9-11; Heb. 1:2; 2:10; Col. 1:16).

3. Antichristian Views. It is requisite to distinguish clearly between Christian doctrine upon this subject and antichristian opposing theories. Particularly should be noted: (1) Materialism, which assumes the eternal existence of matter and regards matter as the fundamental principle of all things. This doctrine is atheistic. (2) Pantheism, which identifies the works of God, or the universe which God has created, with God himself—a form of speculation which often exercised a powerful charm over a certain class of minds, but which is, like materialism, essentially immoral. (3) Emanationism, which regards the things created, not as really creations produced by the free exercise of divine power, but as emanating or flowing forth from God as a stream issues from its fountain. This view regards God as merely passive. Logically, creation would be without beginning or end. No room is left for design in creation, to say nothing of other objections equally serious. (4) Evolution, a theory which, in its rigid materialistic form, has been taught so as to deny the Christian doctrine of creation. Abridged and modified forms of the theory, however, are held by many Christian scientists and theologians. Evolution becomes antichristian only when it seeks to explain the world and the existing order of things without recognizing the creative power and work of God. This it has often attempted, though in vain.

4. Importance of Doctrine. True doctrine upon this subject is both theoretically and practically of fundamental importance: (1) In relation to God, whose eternal greatness and majesty can be felt by us only when we conceive of him as "before all worlds" and the Creator of all. (2) Here, first of all, true religion establishes its claim upon us; for He who has created us and all things may rightfully require our worship and service. (3) In the creation we find also a true revelation, and he who recognizes this must admit the possibility and even the probability of more particular revelations. The objection to miracles in connection with revelation vanishes when one begins by accepting the miracle of creation. (4) This doctrine underlies all true repose of faith; for only when we apprehend the broad and wholesome teaching of the Scriptures upon this subject can we fully commit ourselves unto God "as unto a faithful Creator."

5. Literature. See works upon systematic theology, particularly Van Oosterzee's Christian Dogmatics, Pope's Compendium of Christian Theology, Hodge's Systematic Theology, Tayler Lewis's Six Days of Creation, Hugh Miller's Testimony of the Rocks, Janet's Final Causes.—E. McC.

CREATURE (Heb. נְשָׁמָה, neh'-fesh, a breathing creature; Gr. κτίσις, ktis'-is, a making, thing made; κτίσμα, ktis'-mah, formation).

1. In Old Testament use "creature" is a general term for any animal (Gen. 1:21, 24, etc.).

2. In New Testament: (1) A term for the whole creation or for any created object, e. g., "Every creature of God is good" (1 Tim. 4:4); "Nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature" (Rom. 8:39, etc.). (2) Humanity individually or collectively. "Preach the Gospel to every creature" (Mark 16:15); "The creature was made subject," etc. (Rom. 8:20, 21). See GLOSSARY.

CREATURE, LIVING (Ezek. 1:5, sq.; 10:15, 17, 20). See CHERUBIM.

CREDITOR. See DEBT, LOAN.

CREED (credere, to believe), a statement of articles of belief which are fundamental and have been disputed. In the early Eastern Church a summary of this sort was called the lesson (Gr. μάθημα), because the catechumens were required to learn it; also σύμβολον (symbolon), a mark, token, or badge, as a seal ring—the proof of orthodoxy, whereby each Church may know its own members; also κανών (Gr. κανών), the rule, viz., of faith.

The first object of creeds was to distinguish the Church from the world, from Jews and pagans. The earliest formularies contained simply the leading doctrines and facts of the Christian religion. The second object was to distinguish between persons professing the Christian faith, i. e., those who retained the apostolic doctrine, and those who had departed therefrom and fallen into errors on important points. The Apostles' Creed is of the first class, the Nicene and Athanasian of the second.

The Apostles' Creed is an early summary of the Christian faith, in which all Christian Churches, Greek, Roman, and Protestant, agree. By many writers of the Church of Rome it is held to have been written by the apostles themselves, but it is now generally admitted that, in its present form at least, it is not of earlier date than the fourth century.

The Athanasian Creed was supposed to have been drawn up by Athanasius, in the fourth century. But it so plainly rejects the errors of the Nestorians, Eutychians, and Monothelites, that it must have been written after the promulgation of these heresies.

The Nicene Creed was adopted at the Council of Nice, A. D. 325, and enlarged at the second Council of Constantinople, A. D. 381, by which the faith of the Church respecting the person of Christ was set forth in opposition to certain errors, especially Arianism. The Nicene Creed is held to be of authority in the Greek and Roman Churches, and is admitted by most Protestant Churches.

CREEK (Gr. κόλπος, kol'-pos, bosom), an inlet from the sea, e. g., St. Paul's Bay, island of MALTA (q. v.), where the apostle was wrecked (Acts 27:39).

CREeping THING (Heb. שֵׂרָפִים, sheh'-rets, an active mass of minute animals; or, Heb. רִמְמִשׁ, reh'-mes, creeping), a term used in Scripture (Gen. 1:24; 6:7, etc.) to designate both reptiles, insects, aquatic creatures, and the smaller mammalia.

CRES'GENS (Gr. Κρήσκη, krace'-kace, growing), an assistant of the apostle Paul, who left Rome for Galatia (2 Tim. 4:10). Of him nothing further is known; the accounts of his having been a preacher in Galatia, and having founded the Church in Vienna, are mere legendary glosses on this passage (Ellicott, Com., in loco.).

CRE'TANS. See CRETE.

CRETE (Gr. Κρήτη, kray'-tay, carnal, fleshly), called now Candia, a large island in the Mediterranean, about one hundred and fifty miles in length and from six to thirty-five wide. It lies midway between Syria and Malta. Anciently it possessed its hundred cities. It is mountainous, and its famous peak is Mount Ida. The vessel, carrying PAUL (q. v.) on his way to Rome, sailed along the southern coast of the island, where it was overtaken by a storm (Acts 27:7-21). The Cretes (Acts 2:11; "Cretians," Tit. 1:12, A. V.) are now called Cretans. It seems likely that a very early acquaintance existed between the Cretans and the Jews; and the special mention of the Cretans among those attending the great Pentecost (Acts 2:11) is just what we should expect. The Cretans had a name in ancient times for being good sailors; also for skill in archery and expertness in ambushing. Hence they were frequently engaged as light-armed troops by other nations.

The ancient notions of their character fully agree with the quotation which Paul produces from "one of their own poets" (Tit. 1:12): "The Cretans are always liars, evil beasts, slow bellies" (literally, idle gluttons). The classics abound with allusions to the untruthfulness of the Cretans; and it was so frequently applied to them that Kray-tide'-ein (Κρητιτεύω), "to act the Cretan," was a synonym for play the liar. See SUPPLEMENT.

CRIB (Heb. מַגֵּרֶת, ay-boocel, manger, or stall), a stall (Prov 14:4), or simply a manger to eat out of (Job 39:9; Isa. 1:3).

CRIMSON. See COLORS, 2, (3).

CRISPING PIN (Heb. חֶרֶט, khaw-reet', pocket, Isa. 3:22), properly a pouch for holding money, generally carried by men in the girdle, or in a purse (q. v.); rendered "bag" in 2 Kings 5:23.

CRISPUS (Gr. Κρίσπος, kris'-pos, curled), chief of the Jewish synagogue at Corinth (Acts 18:8), converted and baptized by the apostle Paul (1 Cor. 1:14). According to tradition, he became afterward bishop of Ægina.

CROOKBACKED (Heb. קָרַבַּנָּה, gib-bane', to be arched, or contracted). A humpback (Lev. 21:20, 21) was one of the blemishes which unfitted a priest for the sacred service of the sanctuary.

CROP (Heb. מִרְיָהוּ, moor-aw', conspicuous), this part of the bird, with its feathers, was cast among the ashes at the side of the altar, and not burned with the rest of the fowl (Lev. 1:16). See SACRIFICE.

CROSS (Gr. σταυρός, stōw-ros', a stake; Lat. crux).

1. Form. The cross which was used as an instrument of death (see CRUCIFIXION) was either a plain vertical stake to which the victim was fastened, with the hands tied or nailed above the head, or such a stake provided with a crossbar, to which the victim was fastened with the arms outstretched. Of this latter kind three varieties were known, so that there were four forms of the cross: (1) Simple (Lat. simplex), |; (2) St. Andrew's (decussata), X; (3) St. Anthony's (commissa), T; (4) The Latin (inmissa), †.

Other forms have been invented, and used as emblems, e. g., the Greek cross, consisting of four equally long arms, †; double cross, ††, whose upper bar refers to the inscription by Pilate on the cross of Jesus; and the triple, †††, of which the first is used by the pope, the second by the Raskolniks.

In addition to the transverse bar there was sometimes a peg, or other projection, upon which the body of the sufferer rested, to prevent its weight from tearing away the hands.

2. Emblem. That the cross was widely known in pre-Christian times as an emblem has been clearly shown by independent investigators. Indeed, it was a well-known heathen sign. "In the British Museum there is the statue of Samsi Vul, king of Assyria, B. C. 825; on his breast he wears this ✕. The vestments of the priests of Horus, the Egyptian god of light, are marked †. At Thebes, in the tombs of the kings, royal cows are represented plowing, a calf playing in front. Each animal has a † marked in several places on it. M. Rassam has found buildings at Nineveh marked with the Maltese cross. Osiris, as well as Jupiter Ammon, had for a monogram a †. The cross is found marked on Phœnician monuments B. C. 1600" (Harper, Bib. and Mod. Dis., p. 104).

In Christian times the cross, from being in itself the most vile and repulsive of objects, became in the minds of believers the symbol of all that is holy and precious. As Christ is the "wisdom of God and the power of God" unto salvation, it is but natural that those who experience the power of this salvation should glory in the cross. The exact time of its adoption as a Christian emblem is unknown. In the pre-Constantine period the sign of the cross seems to have been quite generally recognized by primitive Christians. They appear to have contemplated it only as a symbol, without any miraculous energy, and associated it with that which was hopeful and joyous. On the tombstones of the early Christians the cross was the emblem of victory and hope. It was only after superstition took the place of true spiritual devotion that the figure of the cross was used or borne about as a sacred charm.

In the latter part of the 3d century people signed the cross in token of safety, and laid stress on figures of it as a preservative against both spiritual and natural evil. This superstitious feeling was stimulated by the discovery of what was held to be the real cross upon which our Lord suffered. The empress Helena, mother of Constantine, about A. D. 326, visited Palestine, and was shown three crosses by a Jew. In order to know which was the genuine one, Macarius, bishop of Jerusalem, suggested that they be tested by their power of working miracles. One only being reported as possessing this quality, it was declared to be the real cross.

3. As Signature. As early as the 6th century it had become the custom to place three crosses (†††) near the signature of important documents, these having the value of an oath on the part of the signer. Priests added it to their signatures, and bishops, as a sign of the dignity of their office, placed it before their signatures. Crosses were used in diplomatic documents as early as the 5th century. By tradition the cross is now used as a signature by those unable to write.

4. Figurative. The cross is used in Scripture, in a general way, for what is painful and mortifying to the flesh (Matt. 16:24). After the resurrection of our Lord the cross is spoken of as the representative of his whole sufferings from his birth to his death (Eph. 2:16; Heb. 12:2), and for the whole doctrines of the Gospel (1 Cor. 1:18; Gal. 6:14); while the opposers of the Gospel were spoken of as enemies of the cross (Phil. 3:18). "The cross of Christ" (1 Cor. 1:17) represents that Christ was crucified for man, and thereby procured his salvation.

CROW. See ANIMAL KINGDOM.

CROWN. 1. Origin. This ornament, which is both ancient and universal, probably originated from the fillets used to prevent the hair from being disheveled by the wind. Such fillets are still common, and they may be seen on the sculptures of Persepolis, Nineveh, and Egypt; they gradually developed into turbans, which by the addition of ornamental or precious materials assumed the dignity of miters or crowns. The use of them as ornaments probably was suggested by the natural custom of encircling the head with flowers in token of joy and triumph (Wisd. 2:8; Judith 15:13).

2. Bible Use. Several words in Scripture are rendered "crown:"

(1) Neh'-zer (Heb. נֶזֶר, literally, something set apart, consecration; hence consecrated hair, as of a Nazarite) is supposed to mean a diadem. It was applied to the plate of gold in front of the high priest's miter (Exod. 29:6; 39:30); also to the diadem which Saul wore in battle, and which was brought to David (2 Sam. 1:10), and that which was used at the coronation of Joash (2 Kings 11:12). The crown was in universal use by priests, and in religious services. "A striped headdress and cue," or "a short wig, on which a band was fastened, ornamented with an asp, the symbol of royalty," was used by the kings of Egypt in religious ceremonies (Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt., iii, 354, fig. 13). The crown worn by the kings of Assyria was "a high miter . . . frequently adorned with flowers, etc., and arranged in bands of linen or silk. Originally there was only one band, but afterward there were two, and the ornaments were richer" (Layard, ii, 320).

(2) At-aw-raw' (Heb. עֲטָוֶה, circlet; Gr. στέφανος, stef'-an-os), a more general word for crown, and used for crowns and head ornaments of various sorts. When applied to the crowns of kings it appears to denote the state crown as distinguished from the diadem, as, probably, the crown taken by David from the king of Ammon at Rabbah, and used as the state crown of Judah (2 Sam. 12:30). As to the shape of the Hebrew state-crown we can form an idea only by reference to ancient crowns. The diadem of two or three fillets may have signified dominion over two or three countries. In Rev. 12:3; 13:1; 19:12, allusion is made to "many crowns" worn in token of extended dominion.

(3) Keh'-ther (Heb. כִּתְרוֹת, chaplet), the name given (Esth. 1:11; 2:17; 6:8) to the ancient Persian crown, which was, doubtless, the high cap or tiara so often mentioned by Greek historians.

(4) Other Hebrew terms rendered "crown" are zare (זֶרֶן), a wreath or border of gold around the edge of the ark of the covenant (Exod. 25:11, etc.); and kod-kode' (קֹדֶקֶד), the crown of the human head (Gen. 49:26, etc.). The Greek word στέμμα, sten'-mah, is used only once in the New Testament (Acts 14:13) for the "garlands" used with victims.

3. Figurative. The crown was a symbol of victory and reward, victors being crowned in the Grecian games. These crowns were usually made of leaves, which soon began to wither. In opposition to these is the incorruptible crown (1 Cor. 9:25; 2 Tim. 2:5), a crown of life (James 1:12; 1 Pet. 5:4; Rev. 2:10). The meaning of the crown of thorns placed on the head of Jesus (Matt. 27:29) was to insult him under the character of the king of the Jews. The crown is also used as an emblem of an exalted state (Prov. 12:4; 17:6; Isa. 28:5; Phil. 4:1, etc.).

CROWN OF THORNS (Gr. στέφανον ἐξ ἄκανθῶν). The Roman soldiers made a crown out of some thorny plant, and crowned our Lord in mockery (Matt. 27:29). "The object was not to cause suffering, but to excite ridicule; so that while we cannot altogether dissociate the idea of something painful from this crown of thorns we must not conceive of it as covered with prickles, which were intentionally thrust into the flesh. It is impossible to determine what species of thorn it was" (Meyer, Com., in loc.). See THORN.

CRUCIFIXION. 1. History. This form of punishment was in use among the Egyptians (Gen. 40:19), the Carthaginians, the Persians (Esth. 7:10), the Assyrians, Scythians, Indians, Germans, and from the earliest times among the Greeks and Romans. After the conquest of Tyros Alexander the Great ordered two thousand Tyrians to be crucified as punishment for the resistance which that city made. Crucifixion was abolished by Constantine, probably toward the end of his reign, owing, doubtless, to his increasing reverence for the cross. Punishment by the cross was confined to slaves or to malefactors of the worst class. Exemption from it was the privilege of Roman citizenship.

2. Among the Jews. Whether this mode of execution was known to the ancient Jews is a matter of dispute. The Hebrew words said to allude to crucifixion are taw-law' (תַּלְוָה) and yaw-kah' (עֲקָרָה), generally rendered in the A. V. "to hang" (Num. 25:4; Deut. 21:22; 2 Sam. 18:10). The Jewish account of the matter is that the exposure of the body tied to a stake by the hands took place after death. The placing of the head on an upright pole has been called crucifixion. Crucifixion after death was not rare, the victim being first killed in mercy. The Jews probably borrowed this punishment from the Romans.

Among the Jews, as well as among the Romans, crucifixion was considered the most horrible form of death; and to a Jew it would seem the more horrible from the curse, "He that is hanged is accursed of God" (Deut. 21:23). Our Lord was condemned to it by the popular cry of the Jews (Matt. 27:23) on the charge of sedition against Cæsar (Luke 23:21-23).

3. Process. Crucifixion was preceded by scourging with thongs, to which were sometimes added nails, pieces of bone, etc., to heighten the pain, often so intense as to cause death. In our Lord's case, however, this infliction seems neither to have been the legal scourging after sentence nor yet the examination by torture (Acts 22:24), but rather a scourging before the sentence to excite pity and procure immunity from further punishment (Luke 23:22; John 19:1). The criminal carried his own cross, or a part of it, in which case another was compelled to share the burden (Luke 23:26). The place of execution was outside the city (1 Kings 21:13; Acts 7:58; Heb. 13:12); arrived there, the condemned was stripped of his clothes, which became the perquisite of the soldiers (Matt. 27:35); and the cross having been previously erected he was drawn up and made fast to it with cords or nails, although sometimes he was fastened to the cross, which was afterward raised. The feet of the victim were generally three or four feet from the earth. Before the nailing or binding took place a medicated cup was given out of kindness to confuse the senses and deaden the pangs of the sufferer (Prov. 31:6), usually of "wine mingled with myrrh," because myrrh was soporific. Our Lord refused it that his senses might be clear (Matt. 27:34; Mark 15:23).

If the nailing was the most painful mode in the first instance the other was more so in the end, for the sufferer was left to die of sheer exhaustion, and when simply bound with thongs it might take days to accomplish the process; for usually a strong pin projected out of the central stem, on which the body of the sufferer rested. Instances are on record of persons surviving for nine days. Owing to the lingering character of this death our Lord was watched, according to custom, by a party of four soldiers (John 19:23), with their centurion (Matt. 27:66), to prevent the person being taken down and resuscitated. Fracture of the legs was resorted to by the Jews to hasten death (John 19:31). This was done to the two thieves crucified with Jesus, but not to him, for the soldiers found that he was dead already (John 19:32-34). The unusual rapidity of our Lord's death was due to the depth of his previous agonies, or may be sufficiently accounted for simply from peculiarities of constitution. Pilate expressly satisfied himself as to the actual death by questioning the centurion (Mark 15:44). In most cases the body was suffered to rot on the cross by the action of the sun and rain or to be devoured by birds and beasts. Sepulture was generally, therefore, forbidden, but in consequence of Deut. 21:22, 23 an express national exception was made in favor of the Jews (Matt. 27:58).

CRUSE, the rendering of three Hebrew words :

1. Tsap-pakh'-ath (צַפְפָּחִית, literally, spread out), usually thought to be a flask, but more likely a shallow cup for holding water (1 Sam. 26:11, 12, 16; 1 Kings 19:6) or oil (1 Kings 17:12, 14, 16). "In a similar case in the present day this would be a globular vessel of blue porous clay, about nine inches diameter, with a neck of about three inches long, a small handle below the neck, and opposite the handle a straight spout, with an orifice about the size of a straw, through which the water is drunk or sucked" (Smith, Bib. Dict., s. v.).

2. Bak-book' (בַּקְבֹּקֶב, so called from the gurgling sound in emptying (1 Kings 14:3), an "earthen bottle" (Jer. 19:1, 10).

3. Tsel-o-kheeth' (צֶלְוֶהֶת, probably a flat metal saucer of the form still common in the East. It occurs in 2 Chron. 35:13, "pans;" and other words from the same root are found in 2 Kings 2:20, "cruse," and 2 Kings 21:13, "dish."

CUP, the rendering mostly in the Old Testament of the Heb. כּוּץ, kooce; in the New Testament of the Gr. ποτήριον, pot-ay'-ree-on.

1. Egyptian. These were very varied in form, the paintings upon the tombs representing many of elegant design, while others are deficient in both form and proportion. Many were of gold and silver (Gen. 44:2; comp. Num. 7:84), some being richly studded with precious stones, inlaid with vitrified substances in brilliant colors, and even enameled. They were also made of hard stones, pottery, glass, and porcelain.

2. Assyrian. Cups and vases among the Assyrians were even more varied in form and design than among the Egyptians. The materials employed were about the same—the precious metals, copper, bronze, glass, and pottery, both glazed and unglazed. Some of their drinking cups terminate in the head of a lion, with a handle. Other festal cups are more like bowls in form and fluted.

3. Hebrew. The cups of the Jews, whether of metal or earthenware, were probably borrowed from Egypt or from the Phœnicians, who were celebrated in that branch of workmanship. In Solomon's time all his drinking vessels were of gold (1 Kings 10:21). The cups mentioned in the New Testament were often, no doubt, made after Greek and Roman models.

In Isaiah (22:24) the word translated "cup" is ag-gawi' (Heb. אֲגַוִי, literally, a trough for washing garments), and signifies a laver, or basin (so rendered in Exod. 24:6, and "goblet," Cant. 7:2). The cups in 1 Chron. 28:17 were broad bowls for libation, improperly rendered "covers" (Exod. 25:29; 37:16; Num. 4:7).

4. Cup of Divination. The use of such cups was a practice common to Syria and Egypt as early as the time of the patriarch Jacob. Otherwise the question, "Is not this it in which my lord drinketh, and whereby indeed he divineth?" (Gen. 44:5) would have lost half its force with the brethren of Joseph. "Among the Egyptians this sort of divination consisted in pouring clean water into a goblet, and then looking into the water for representations of future events; or in pouring water into a goblet or dish, dropping in pieces of gold or silver, also precious stones, and then observing and interpreting the appearance of the water. Melted wax was also poured into the water, and the will of the gods interpreted by the variously shaped figures formed in this way. But we cannot infer with certainty from this that Joseph actually adopted this superstitious practice. The intention of the statement may simply have been to represent the goblet as a sacred vessel and Joseph as acquainted with the most sacred things" (K. and D., Com., in loc.).

5. Figurative. "Cup" is employed in both Testaments in some curious metaphorical phrases: "The portion of the cup" is a general expression for the condition of life, prosperous or miserable (Psa. 11:6; 16:5; 23:5).

A "cup" is also the natural type of sensual allurement (Prov. 23:31; Jer. 51:7; Rev. 17:4; 18:6). Babylon is termed a "golden cup" to express its splendor and opulence.

"Cup of consolation" (Jer. 16:7). It was the oriental custom for friends to send viands and wine (the cup of consolation) to console relatives in mourning feasts (comp. 2 Sam. 3:35; Prov. 31:6).

"Cup of salvation" (Psa. 116:13) is probably the drink offering lifted in thanksgiving to God (Num. 15:5; 28:7).

"Cup of blessing" (1 Cor. 10:16; called the "cup of the Lord," v. 21), i. e., the cup over which the blessing is spoken, when the wine contained in it is expressly consecrated by prayer to the sacred use of the Lord's Supper. It is called in Jewish writings, just as by Paul, "the cup of blessing," and is supposed to refer to the third cup of wine drunk at the passover feast, over which a special blessing was spoken. In 1 Cor. 10:21 it is contrasted with the "cup of devils," i. e., the cup drunk at heathen feasts.

The "cup of trembling," literally, "cup of reeling, intoxication" (Isa. 51:17, 22; Zech. 12:2). "cup of astonishment and desolation" (Ezek. 23:33), "cup of fury" (Isa. 51:17, 22; Jer. 25:15), "cup of indignation" (Rev. 14:10) are figures representing the effects of Jehovah's wrath upon the wicked. God is represented as the master of a banquet, dealing madness and stupor of vengeance to guilty guests. There is in the prophets no more frequent or terrific image, and it is repeated with pathetic force in the language of our Lord's agony (Matt. 26:39, 42; John 18:11).

CUPBEARER (Heb. מַשְׂכֵּה, mash-keh'), that officer of the household who tasted the wine and passed it to those at the table. He was often chosen for his personal beauty and attractions, and in ancient oriental courts was always a person of rank and importance. From the confidential nature of his duties and his frequent access to the royal presence, he possessed great influence. The chief cupbearer or butler to the king of Egypt was the means of raising Joseph to his high position (Gen. 41:9). Rabshakeh appears from his name to have filled a like office in the Assyrian court (2 Kings 18:17). Nehemiah was cupbearer to Artaxerxes Longimanus, king of Persia (Neh. 1:11; 2:1). Cupbearers are mentioned among the attendants of Solomon (1 Kings 10:5; 2 Chron. 9:4).

CURE. See DISEASES.

CURIOUS ARTS (Gr. τὰ περίεργα, tah per- ee'-er-gah, officious, meddling), magic, spoken of the black art as practiced by the Ephesian conjurers (Acts 19:19). The allusion is doubtless to the Ephesian spells, i. e., charms, consisting of letters or monograms written on parchment and worn like amulets. See MAGIC.

CURIOUSLY. See GLOSSARY.

CURSE, the rendering of several Hebrew and Greek words. Many instances are recorded of cursing in the Scripture. Thus God cursed the serpent which had seduced Eve (Gen. 3:14); Cain, who slew his brother (4:11). He promised Abraham to curse those who should curse him. These divine maledictions are not merely imprecations, nor the expressions of impotent wishes; but they carry their effects with them, and are attended with all the miseries they denounce or foretell. Curses delivered against individuals by holy men (Gen. 9:25; 49:7; Deut. 27:15; Josh. 6:26) are not the expressions of revenge, passion, or impatience; they are predictions, and, therefore, not such as God condemns.

The Mosaic law forbade the cursing of father or mother (Exod. 21:17) on pain of death, of the prince of his people (22:28), of one that is deaf (Lev. 19:14) or perhaps absent so that he could not hear. Blasphemy, or cursing God, was a capital crime (Lev. 24:10, 11). See ANATHEMA.

Oriental Cupbearer.

CURTAINS, the rendering in the A. V. of three Hebrew terms:

1. Yer-ee-av' (יְרֵיעָוֹת, tremulous), the ten "curtains" of fine linen, and also the eleven of goats' hair which covered the tabernacle (Exod. 26:1-13; 36:8-17). The charge of these curtains and of the other textile fabrics of the tabernacle was laid on the Gershonites (Num. 4:25). Having this definite meaning, the word became a synonym for the tabernacle (2 Sam. 7:2). Sometimes it means the sides of a tent (Isa. 54:2; Jer. 4:20; 10:20).

2. Maw-savok' (מַוְסָוֹק, veil), the "hanging" for the doorway of the tabernacle (Exod. 26:36, etc.), and also for the gate of the court round the tabernacle (Exod. 27:16, etc.). See TABERNACLE.

3. Doke (דֹּקָה, fineness) occurs in the expression, "stretcheth out the heavens as a curtain" (Isa. 40:22), and appears to have been a fabric such as is used by rich orientals for a screen over their courts in summer.

CUSH (Heb. כּוּשׁ, koosh).

1. A son (probably the eldest) of Ham. In the genealogy of Noah's children it is said, "Cush begat Nimrod" (Gen. 10:8; 1 Chron. 1:10). A number of his descendants are also mentioned.

2. A Benjamite, mentioned in the title of Psa. 7, respecting whom nothing more is known than that the psalm is there said to have been composed "concerning his words" (or affairs), B. C. 1000. He appears to have been an enemy of David and seeking an opportunity of injuring him, but to have been unsuccessful (v. 15).

3. Land of. "The name of Cush was derived from Egypt. To the Egyptians Kash denoted the districts south of the First Cataract, inhabited for the most part by races of a Nubian origin. . . . Kash was the Ethiopia of the classical geographers, and in the tablets of Tel-el-Amarna it is called Ka'si. In the later Assyrian inscriptions the name is written Ku'si, and it is this form of the name which we find in the Old Testament. In the Old Testament, however, the name has a much wider signification than it had either in Egypt or in Assyria. It embraces not only the African Kash of the Egyptian monuments, but also the southern coasts of Arabia" (Sayce, Higher Crit., p. 132).

CU'SHAN (Heb. כּוּשָׁן, koo-shawn'), if the name of a person (Hab. 3:7), is perhaps the same as CUSHAN-RISHATHA'IM (q. v.), king of Mesopotamia (Judg. 3:8, 10). Gesenius considers Cushman but another form of Cush, by which he understands Ethiopia.

CU'SHAN-RISHATHA'IM (Heb. כּוּשָׁן רִישַׁתַּיִם, koo-shan' rish-aw-thah'-yim, A. V. "Chushan") was a king of Mesopotamia who oppressed Israel during the period of the Judges eight years (Judg. 3:8). The country to which Cushman-rishathaim belonged is, by the Old Testament, probably located between the two rivers Euphrates and Chaboras. It was inhabited by Aramaean tribes at the period of the judges in Israel. At that time neither Assyria nor Babylonia was strong enough to gain and hold complete dominion over these tribes. It is, therefore, easy to understand how he, dignified with the title of king, could make incursions into the rich country of Israel and plunder it.

No inscriptions written by these tribes have yet been found, and the name Cushman-rishathaim has not been discovered in any of the inscriptions, either of the Babylonians or of the Assyrians. It is probable that the name has been Hebraized. We therefore have no knowledge of the king's name or personality beyond the indications in the book of Judges.—R. W. R.

CU'SHI (Heb. כּוּשִׁי, koo-shee', Cushite, or Ethiopian).

1. The messenger sent by Joab to announce to David the success of the battle against Absalom, and the death of the young prince (2 Sam. 18:21-23, 31, 32), B. C. about 970.

2. The father of Shelemiah, and great-grandfather of Jehudi, which last was sent by the Jewish magnates to invite Baruch to read his roll to them (Jer. 36:14), B. C. before 604.

3. The son of Gedaliah and father of the prophet Zephaniah (Zeph. 1:1), B. C. before 620.

CUSHION. See BED.

CUSTOM (Heb. חֹמֶשׁ, hal-awk', way tax, Ezra 4:13, 20; 7:24; Gr. τέλος, tel'-os, tax, 1 Macc. 11:35; Matt. 17:25; Rom. 13:7). See TAX.

CUSTOM, RECEIPT OF (Gr. τελώνιον, tel-o'-nee-on), a term signifying toll-house (Matt. 9:9; Mark 2:14; Luke 5:27).

CUTHA, or CUTH (Heb. כּוּתָּה, kooth, or כּוּתִיָּה, koo-thaw'), name of a city of Babylonia mentioned twice only in the Old Testament. In one passage (2 Kings 17:30) it is connected with the worship of the god Nergal; in the other (2 Kings 17:24) it is mentioned along with Babylon and other cities as furnishing the people who were deported and settled in Samaria. The city of Cutha was located a short distance eastward of Babylon, where the village of Tell-Ibrahim now marks its former site. It was one of the most important cities of ancient Babylonia. In the opinion of some it was the capital city of an ancient kingdom which existed before the city of Babylon had risen to power in the country. However that may be, the city continued to be a center of power through the Assyrian period, and many Assyrian kings halted there to pay tribute of worship at the shrine of its great god Nergal, whose temple, known by the name of E-shid-lam, has been found in the ruins at Tell-Ibrahim. After the taking of Samaria by the Assyrians Sargon, king of Assyria, transported inhabitants from Avva, Babylon, Hamath, and Sepharvaim to Samaria, to take the place of those who had been removed into captivity. These people became known as Samaritans in later times, and a long enmity existed between them and the Jews. Among them the people of Cutha must have been prominent either because of numbers or of ability, for the new settlers were long called Cutheans. The history of Cutha shows periods of power and of decay. Sennacherib, king of Assyria, who destroyed Babylon, claims to have conquered Cutha in one of his great campaigns; and Nebuchadnezzar in a later day rebuilt and otherwise restored and beautified its temple. Cutha had two rivers or canals, and therefore probably possessed some commercial importance.—R. W. R.

CUTTING OFF from the people. See EX-COMMUNICATION.

CUTTINGS (in the flesh), expressed by seh-ret (Heb. שֶׁרֶת, Lev. 19:28), saw-reh'-teth (שֶׁרֶתֶת, incision, Lev. 21:5), and gud-go'-daw (גִּדְּוֹדָה, a cut, Jer. 48:37). Unnatural disfigurement of the body was prohibited by Moses, and seems to refer to the scratching of the arms, head, and face, common in times of mourning among the people of the East. The law gave the further prohibition,

"Nor print any marks upon you" (Lev. 19:28); i. e., tattooing, a custom very common among the savage tribes, and still met with in Arabia. "This prohibition had no reference to idolatrous usages, but was intended to inculcate upon the Israelites a proper reverence for God's creation" (K. and D., Com., in loc.).

Other authorities think that the prohibition refers to the superstitions and practices of heathenism. The priests of Baal cut themselves with knives to propitiate the god "after their manner" (1 Kings 18:28). Herodotus says the Carians, who resided in Europe, cut their foreheads with knives at festivals of Isis; in this respect exceeding the Egyptians, who beat themselves on these occasions (Herod. ii, 61). Lucian, speaking of the Syrian priestly attendants of this mock deity, says that, using violent gestures, they cut their arms and tongues with swords. Tattooing indicated allegiance to a deity, in the same manner as soldiers and slaves bore tattooed marks to indicate allegiance or adscription. This is evidently alluded to in the Revelation of St. John (13:16; 17:5; 19:20), and, though in a contrary direction, by Ezekiel (9:4), by St. Paul (Gal. 6:17), in the Revelation (7:3), and perhaps by Isaiah (44:5) and Zechariah (13:6) (Smith, Bib. Dict., s. v.). See MARK.

CYPRUS (Gr. Κύπρος, koo'-pros), a large island in the Mediterranean off the coast of Syria. Its length is about one hundred and forty-eight miles, and its width from five to fifty miles. It was once inhabited by the Phoenicians. In 477 B. C. the Greeks controlled it. In 58 B. C. it fell to the Romans. On the death of Alexander the Great it had been incorporated with Egypt. It was an imperial province in 27 B. C. The first New Testament notice of Cyprus is in Acts 4:36, where it is mentioned as the native place of Barnabas. It appears prominently in connection with the early spread of Christianity (Acts 11:19, 20). Paul and Barnabas visited it A. D. 44. It was Paul's first missionary field (Acts 13:4-13). The Kittim of Gen. 10:4 and the Chittim of Isa. 23:1 were primarily the inhabitants of Citium, and then of the whole island. In 1878, by the terms of the "conditional convention," Cyprus was conveyed by Turkey to Great Britain, the sultan retaining sovereignty and receiving annual payments of money in place of its revenues, and in 1887 the island was ceded to Great Britain.

CYRENE (Gr. Κυρήνη, koo-ray'-nai), a city founded by the Greeks, upon a beautiful tableland one thousand eight hundred feet above the sea level. It was the capital of the district of Cyrenaica in Africa. It was a Greek city, but contained many Jews. Cyrene was represented in Jerusalem at the Pentecost (Acts 2:10). Simon, one of its people, helped Jesus bear his cross (Matt. 27:32). Cyrenian Jews had a synagogue at Jerusalem (Acts 6:9). It was destroyed in the 4th century by Saracens. It is waste and occupied now by wild beasts and Bedouins.

CYRENIAN (Gr. Κυρηναίος, koo-ray-nah'-yos, of Cyrene, Matt. 27:32; Acts 11:20), a native of Cyrene (A. V.), or Cyrenaica, in Africa (Mark 15:21, etc.).

CYRENIUS (whose full name was PUBLIUS SULPICIUS QUIRINUS) was the second of that name mentioned in Roman history, and was consul with M. Valerius Messala. Some years after, A. D. 6, he was made governor of Syria, and made there and in Judea a census, or ἀπογραφή. He was a favorite with Tiberius, and on his death, A. D. 21, he was buried with public honors by the senate at the request of the emperor. The census above named seems, in Luke 2:2, to be identified with one which took place at the time of the birth of Christ, when Sentius Saturninus was governor of Syria. Hence has arisen considerable difficulty, which has been variously solved, either by supposing some corruption in the text of St. Luke, or by giving some unusual sense to his words. But A. W. Zumpt, of Berlin, has shown it to be probable that Quirinus was twice governor of Syria, and, by very striking and satisfactory arguments, fixes the time of his governorship at from B. C. 4 to A. D. 1; the second A. D. 6-10.

CYRUS (Heb. כִּרְשֻׁ, ko'-resh, Babyl. Kurash, old Persian Kurush; Gr. Κύρος, koo'-ros; Lat. Cyrus), the founder of the Persian empire, holds an important place both in biblical prophecy (Isa. 41:25; 44:28; 45:1-13) and history (Ezra 1:1-8; 4:3-5; 2 Chron. 36:22, sq.; Dan. 1:21; 10:1).

Cyrus.

To understand the part which he played in the history of Israel, and of the ancient world generally, we should keep in view some important facts of a general character:

1. Condition of Western Asia. When Cyrus appeared a complete political, social, and religious revolution was impending in western Asia. The region with which the Bible chiefly concerns itself had been controlled for thousands of years by the Semitic race, who had given to the world the elements of civilization, and were still to rule it by its conquering religions. The center of power and influence for the whole country from the mountains of Media to the Mediterranean, and from Mount Taurus to the Arabian desert, had always been in the East, in Babylonia or Assyria. The Chaldean dynasty in Babylon, which during the previous half century had been at the head of the empire founded by Nebuchadnezzar, was now rapidly declining.

2. Israel and Babylon. The political fortunes of Israel had, in the critical periods of its history, depended upon this eastern power, Assyria or Babylonia. By the former the northern kingdom of Israel had been destroyed, by the latter Judah and Jerusalem had been led away captive. The remnant of Israel, the hope of the world, was now still in bondage, and its fondly cherished hope of release seemed little likely to be fulfilled.

3. The Iranians. For about two centuries before this era a new people had been very gradually but surely coming into power in the mountainous region to the east of the Tigris. These were the Iranians, an offshoot of the Aryan race. After the main body of the Asiatic Aryans had descended into India the Iranians remained for many centuries in Baktria, on the slopes of the Hindu-Kush Mountains. Thence they moved in two divisions westward, the one settling in Media, the other in the region to the northeast of the Persian Gulf, called "Persis." The latter, the Persians, came later than the former, the Medians, and by a different route. They had at first but a small territory, which, however, just before the birth of Cyrus they had augmented by taking possession of Elam.

4. Records of Cyrus. For information about Cyrus we naturally look to the Greek historians and to the native annalists of Babylon and Persia. His fame among the Greeks was so great that they retailed no end of stories about his life and death, and so great was his influence in the world that they resorted to the supernatural to adequately explain it. Nearly all that they tell of his infancy and youth, and much relating to his mature years, is legendary or mythical. It is now possible, however, by the aid of the cuneiform inscriptions, to make out at least an outline story of his life.

5. Cyrus as Prince of Persis. Cyrus was born about 590 B. C. He was a descendant of Achaemenes, the founder of the royal line of Persia. His father was the first Cambyses, and he himself was the grandson of the first Cyrus. The annexation, about 596, of Elam, or Aushan, to the north of Persis with its capital, Susa (Shushan), was the event which gave the Persians independent standing among Eastern peoples. This was eleven years after the fall of the Assyrian empire, and the Medes, who had the principal share in that catastrophe, soon extended their dominion southward, so that when Cyrus came to his small hereditary dominions, about 558 B. C., they had been for some time in vassalage to the kindred Iranian monarchy of the north.

6. He Conquers Media. Astyages was then king of Media, about 550 B. C., and Cyrus attempted to throw off his yoke. Astyages marched against him, but his troops revolted and delivered him up to Cyrus, who spared his life and gave him a princely residence for the rest of his days. The whole Median dominion then fell to Cyrus. It had been extended already far to the west, and his possessions soon reached to the river Halys, halfway across Asia Minor.

7. War with Lydia. War with the powerful and ambitious Croesus of Lydia was inevitable. It terminated with the taking of Sardis in 547. An important result of this conquest was the subjection of the Greek cities and colonies on the coast land and islands of Asia Minor. The administration of this and other subject districts Cyrus left to carefully chosen viceroys. His dominions were still farther extended over the kindred Iranian tribes to the eastward, so that they stretched from the Ægean Sea beyond the farthest limits of modern Persia.

8. Condition of Babylonia. The Semitic lowlands were still held precariously by the Chaldean monarchy. Nabonidus, the last native king of Babylon, who came to the throne in 555 B. C., was an inefficient ruler who spent his time in antiquarian research, while his subjects were neglected. In the East the inactivity of a monarch means suffering and oppression among his people. The prosperity of the subjects of Cyrus excited the envy of the Babylonians, and they soon became ready for a change of masters. Soon after the subjection of Lydia northern Mesopotamia, from the Euphrates to the Tigris, submitted to Cyrus. But it was not till 538 that he felt himself justified in invading Babylonia proper.

9. Fall of Babylon. The invasion was accompanied by revolts in Babylonia itself. Early in Tammuz (June) a battle was fought in favor of Cyrus, not far from Bagdad. On the 14th the city of Sippar, twenty-four miles N. of Babylon, was taken without a blow being struck. Two days later Babylon itself was entered by Gobryas, the general of Cyrus, at the head of his troops. No resistance was offered, and Nabonidus was taken prisoner. On the 3d of Machesvan (October) Cyrus himself entered the city and finally settled its affairs, proclaiming universal peace.

10. His Later Actions. He personally directed the policy of the newly won kingdom, but did not make Babylon his chief residence. The concerns of his great empire demanded his attention in many regions and local centers. It would appear that his eastern provinces, the least civilized of all, had most of his immediate care. He lived nine years after the surrender of Babylon. Conflicting stories are told of his latest deeds. He probably died at Pasargada, the capital of his native Persis, near which a tomb still remains with a column inscribed, "I am Cyrus the king, the Achæmenidean."

11. His Character and Achievements. Cyrus was one of the greatest men of any age. His genius for pacification and government was much more remarkable than his rare military talent. With an Asiatic career rivaling that of Alexander of Macedon, he was morally far greater than his imitator, though without any of the early advantages of the son of Philip and the pupil of Aristotle. His personal qualities are illustrated by his having won the hearts of many peoples speaking many strange tongues and professing many diversereligious. His administrative measures attest his statesmanship no less than his goodness. His liberation of the Hebrew exiles was the most far-reaching beneficent measure ever devised by a heathen monarch, and, along with the main tenor and purpose of his life, vindicates his prophetic title, "The anointed of Jehovah."

12. Cyrus and the Jewish Restoration. The liberation of the Hebrew exiles is not directly mentioned in the inscriptions of Cyrus which have been so far brought to light. But his chronicler states that he "proclaimed peace to all Babylonia" immediately after his entrance into the capital, and, doubtless, the famous manifesto quoted in Ezra 1:2-4 was included among the proclamations. In considering the part played by Cyrus in the revival of Israel under Persian auspices we must keep in mind:

(1) The prophecies concerning Cyrus. Among these we should not restrict ourselves simply to those passages which directly refer to Cyrus. In a certain sense the whole of the second part of Isaiah (chaps. 40-66) is conditioned upon his achievements, since it is concerned with the return of Israel from captivity, which he was the means of accomplishing. We have, however, in the passages cited at the head of this article distinct and highly suggestive statements about Cyrus and his services to the cause of Jehovah. In Isa. 41:25, the remarkable announcement is made: "I have raised [roused] up one from the north, and he is come; from the rising of the sun one that calleth upon my name." This enlarges upon 41:2, "Who hath raised up one from the east?" The fulfillment is seen in the fact that while Cyrus came originally from the east of Babylonia, his advance upon that country was made from the north. Both of these related passages predict his unparalleled career of conquest, while 41:2 also asserts that the cause of "righteousness" is the motive of the whole career of the God-chosen man, or, in the prophet's own words, of him "whom righteousness beckons to follow him." In 44:28 Cyrus is introduced in connection with the promised rebuilding of Jerusalem and the temple. In carrying out this work he is to act as the "shepherd" of Jehovah, i. e., as the ruler and guardian of the people of Jehovah, all whose pleasure he is to perform. In 45:1 he is called Jehovah's "anointed," i. e., he was appointed to the kingly office by Jehovah and endowed with the gifts for such a function. In the following context irresistible might is attributed to him through the help and presence of the God of Israel, uninterrupted and complete success are to attend him, and he is to fall heir to the accumulated treasures of the ancient Babylonian empire (45:1-3). All this is to be achieved that Cyrus, and all the nations to whom Jehovah had hitherto been an unknown God, should learn his name and his character, and these very surnames of shepherd and anointed had been given him for the sake of Jehovah's people (45:3-6). Further, the character of the restoration is set forth as a deliverance by Cyrus free and voluntary (45:13).

(2) The spirit and policy of Cyrus. To understand how Cyrus changed the face of western Asia, and particularly how he brought Israel to its own again, we need to take a backward glance over the history of Babylonia and Assyria. The Semitic conception of government, exemplified in the domination of the Semites, was that of absolute monarchy, without any properly delegated power. All the officials of the empire, whether in the central city or in the dependent states, were mere creatures of the king, who himself was the vicegerent of the gods. Moreover, the whole population was regarded as tributaries and servants of this central authority. Hence obedience and service were the functions of every subject of the great king. How the subject should serve his own community, or even the state at large, it did not occur to an Assyrian ruler to inquire. The peoples of the vassal states and conquered communities were thus virtually held as slaves, and if they refused homage and tribute they were compelled, at the point of the sword, to contribute larger revenues. If they again refused their constructive rebellion was punished with the loss of home and country. Thus was instituted the terrible system of deportation, whose object was to break down the national spirit; for this had no right to assert itself as against the sovereignty of the king and the gods. Thus Samaria finally lost its independent existence. Thus, also, Judah and Jerusalem were apparently obliterated forever. In the lands whither the exiles were deported they were helpless before the king, and their obedience was unquestioned. This was the case even under the Chaldean regime of Nebuchadrezzar, who improved upon the old Assyrian system so far that he sought to utilize the talents and skill of the exiles rather than to crush out their manhood. Cyrus had a different conception of government. He knew that the contentment of the subject was the essential condition of national prosperity, and that to secure such contentment a large measure of local freedom was necessary. Hence he encouraged the national aspirations of the peoples whom he found enthralled under the yoke of Babylon. How this love of freedom and righteousness was providentially used for the emancipation of the Hebrews we have seen declared in the prophecies that have been just cited.

(3) Cyrus and the returning exiles. This motive of Cyrus is shown in his proclamation recorded in Ezra 1:2-4, the preface of which (1:1) states that Jehovah stirred up his spirit to accomplish the restoration of his people. In the manifesto itself Cyrus says that Jehovah charged him to build his house at Jerusalem, and this, the chief object of the new settlement, he commends to the Hebrews everywhere in his dominions. Besides he restored the sacred vessels of the temple which had been carried away by Nebuchadrezzar (1:7), furnished supplies, protection, and an escort to the expedition, and made grants of timber and provisions to the builders of the temple (3:7). That the enterprise was interrupted, even during the reign of Cyrus (4:3-5), was doubtless due to the absence of the king in his eastern provinces during the later years of his reign. What he could do for Israel that he did, and that, from the human standpoint, was practically everything. Without Cyrus the hope of Israel and of the world would have been quenched in the darkness of Babylonian bondage (Isa. 42:22; 49:9; 51:14).—J. F. McC.

DAB'AREH (Josh. 21:28). This name is incorrectly spelt in the A. V., and should be DABERATH (q. v.).

DAB'BASHETH (Heb. דַּבְּשֶׁתַּי, dab-bek'-sheth, hump), a town on the border of Zebulun (Josh. 19:11). Its location has not been positively identified.

DAB'ERATH (Heb. דַּבְּרַת, daw-ber-ath', pasture), a Levitical town of Issachar (Josh. 19:12; 1 Chron. 6:72; Dabareh, Josh. 21:28). It lay at the western foot of Mount Tabor. The present insignificant village of Deburich.

DAGGER (Heb. דָּגֵר, kheh'-reb), any sharp instrument, especially a weapon of war (Judg. 3:16, 21, 22). See ARMOR.

DAGON. See GODS, FALSE.

DAILY occurs in the A. V. as the rendering of the Gr. ἐπιούσιος, ep-ee-oo'-see-os, necessary (Matt. 6:11; Luke 11:3), so that the phrase really means the bread of our necessity, i. e., necessary for us.

DAILY OFFERING or SACRIFICE. See SACRIFICE.

DALAI'AH (1 Chron. 3:24), the same name elsewhere more correctly Anglicized DELAIAH, 1 (q. v.).

DALE, THE KING'S (Heb. דַּלְמָה, ay'-mek, depression), the name of a valley not far from Jerusalem and in the valley of Jehoshaphat, where Absalom built a family monument (Gen. 14:17; 2 Sam. 18:18). It is also called the "vale of Shaveh."

DALMANU'THA (Gr. Δαλμανουθά, dal-man-oo-thah'), a place on the west coast of the Sea of Galilee, into parts of which Christ was said to have gone ("Magdala," Matt. 15:39). Dalmanutha itself is mentioned only in Mark 8:10. The place is identified with a village called Ain-el-Barideh—the "cold fountain." The village proper is called el-Mejdel, possibly the "Migdal-el" of Josh. 19:38.

DALMA'TIA (Gr. Δαλματία, dal-mat-ee'-ah), a district east of the Adriatic, being a Roman province; a place visited by Titus (2 Tim. 4:10). According to Rom. 15:19 Paul himself had once preached there, the place being referred to as Illyricum.

DAL'PHON (Heb. דַּלְפֹּן, dal-fone'), the second of the ten sons of Haman, killed by the Jews on the thirteenth of Adar (Esth. 9:7), B. C. about 509.

DAM (Heb. דָּם, ame). The Mosaic code had several regulations respecting treatment of parents, even among animals. Thus the young animal was to be with its mother seven days after birth before it could be sacrificed (Exod. 22:30; Lev. 22:27); a lamb was not to be scathed in its mother's milk (Exod. 23:19); a mother bird was not to be taken with her young (Deut. 22:6, 7).

DAMAGES, remuneration or restitution prescribed in case of offense against the person, property, or name of another. See LAW.

DAM'ARIS (Gr. Δάμαρις, dam'-ar-is, gentle), an Athenian woman converted to Christianity by Paul's preaching (Acts 17:34). Chrysostom and others believed her to have been the wife of Dionysius the Areopagite, but apparently for no other reason than that she is mentioned with him in this passage.

DAMASCENES' (Gr. Δαμασκηνός, dam-askay-nos'), inhabitants of Damascus (2 Cor. 11:32).

DAMASCUS (Heb. דַּמָּשֶׁק, dam-meh'-sek; דַּרְמָשֶׁק, dar-meh'-sek; once, 2 Kings 16:10, דַּוְמָשֶׁק, doo-meh'-sek; Gr. Δαμασκός, dam-as-kos'), said to be the oldest city in the East.

1. Situation. Damascus lies about seventy miles from the seaboard, upon the east of Anti-Lebanon, and close to the foot of the hills, in the valley of the Abana, a great plain about twenty-three hundred feet above the sea and thirty miles by ten in extent. This plain is called the Ghutah, and is shot all over by the cool, rapid waters of the Abana, which do equal service in bringing life and in carrying away corruption. It is very fertile, abounding in gardens, orchards, and meadows. It is to Abana that Damascus chiefly owes her importance and stability. Another important factor is that the city lies on the border of the desert, and that she is situated on the natural highway from the east to the west. Three great roads go forth from her—west, south, and east. The western, or southwestern, road travels by Galilee to the Levant and the Nile. The southern, which leaves the city by the "Gates of God," takes the pilgrims to Mecca. The eastern is the road to Bagdad.

2. History. Josephus (Ant., i, 6) says that Damascus was founded by Uz, son of Aram. It is first mentioned in Scripture in connection with Abraham (Gen. 14:15), whose steward was a native of the place (15:2). We may gather from the name of this person, as well as from the statement of Josephus, which connects the city with the Aramaeans, that it was a Semitic settlement.

In the time of David "the Syrians of Damascus came to succor Hadadezer king of Zobah," with whom David was at war (2 Sam. 8:5; 1 Chron. 18:5); but the Syrians were defeated, and David became master of the whole territory, garrisoning it with Israelites (2 Sam. 8:6). In the reign of Solomon REZON (q. v.) became master of Damascus (1 Kings 11:23-25). The family of Hadad appears to have recovered the throne, as we find Ben-hadad in league with Baasha of Israel against Asa (1 Kings 15:19; 2 Chron. 16:3), and after in league with Asa against Baasha (1 Kings 15:20). The defeat and death of Ahab at Ramoth-gilead (1 Kings 22:15-37) enabled the Syrians of Damascus to resume the offensive. Their bands ravaged Israel during Jehoram's reign and laid siege to Samaria.

Hazael, the servant of Ben-hadad, murdered the king (2 Kings 8:15), and was soon after defeated by the Assyrians. He and his son waged successful war against Israel and Judah, but Joash defeated the Syrians thrice and recovered the cities of Israel (2 Kings 13:3, 22-25). Jeroboam II (B. C. about 783) is said to have recovered Damascus (2 Kings 14:28). Later (B. C. about 735) Rezin, king of Damascus, and Pekah, king of Israel, laid unsuccessful siege to Jerusalem (2 Kings 16:6), but Elath—built by Azariah in Syrian territory—having been taken by Rezin, Ahaz sought the aid of Tiglath-pileser (2 Kings 16:7, 8). Rezin

In Rom. 14:23, "He that doubteth is damned if he eat," i. e., is condemned by conscience and by God because he is not satisfied that he is right in so doing. See PUNISHMENT, EVERLASTING.

DAN (Heb. דָּן, dawn, judge), the fifth son of Jacob and the first of Bilhah, Rachel's maid (Gen. 30:6), B. C. perhaps about 1640.

1. Personal History. Of the patriarch himself no incident is preserved. By the blessing of was slain, the kingdom of Damascus brought to an end, the city destroyed, and its inhabitants carried captive into Assyria (v. 9; comp. Amos 1:5). It was long before Damascus recovered from this serious blow. We do not know at what time Damascus was rebuilt; but Strabo says that it was the most famous place in Syria during the Persian period. At the time of the Gospel history and of the apostle Paul it formed a part of the kingdom of Aretas (2 Cor. 11:32), an Arabian prince, who held his kingdom under the Romans.

The mention of Damascus in the New Testament is in connection with the conversion and ministry of PAUL (q. v.).

DAMMIM. See EPHES-DAMMIM, PAS-DAMMIM. DAMNATION (rendering of several Greek terms, denoting judgment, destruction, etc.), a word used to denote the final loss of the soul, but not to be always so understood. Thus, in 2 Pet. 2:1, the expression "damnable heresies" (Gr. αἰρέσεις ἀπολείας) means destructive opinions; "they that resist shall receive to themselves damnation" (Rom. 13:2), evidently condemnation, i. e., from the rulers. Again, in 1 Cor. 11:29, the damnation resulting from "eating and drinking unworthily" is condemnation (so rendered in v. 34). Just what it is to which the offender may be condemned lies with God. Some suppose temporal judgments from God and the censure of wise and good men.

Jacob on his deathbed it was settled that Dan and his other sons by handmaids should be legally entitled to a portion of the family inheritance.

2. Tribe of Dan. (1) Numbers. Only one son is attributed to Dan (Gen. 46:23), but it may be observed that "Hushim" is a plural form, as if the name, not of an individual, but of a family. At the exodus the tribe of Dan numbered sixty-two thousand seven hundred warriors (Num. 1:39), and at the second census sixty-four thousand four hundred, holding their rank as second. (2) Position in camp. Dan's position in the journey was on the north of the tabernacle, with Asher and Naphtali. The standard of the tribe was of white and red, and the crest upon it an eagle, the great foe to serpents, which had been chosen by the leader instead of a serpent, because Jacob had compared Dan to a serpent. Ahiezer substituted the eagle, the destroyer of serpents, as he shrank from carrying an adder upon his flag. (3) Prominent persons. One who played a prominent part in the wanderings was "Aholiab, the son of Ahisamach, of the tribe of Dan" (Exod. 31:6, et seq.). Samson was also a Danite (Judg. 13:2, sq.). (4) Territory. Dan was the last of the tribes to receive his portion, which was the smallest of the twelve. It had, however, great natural advantages, was very fertile, and had also a line of seacoast, which seems to have led them to engage in fishing and commerce, for in the war of Sisera and Barak Dan remained in ships (Judg. 5:17). It included the cities of Joppa, Lydda, and Ekron. (5) Capture of Laish. Crowded by the Amorites from the rich lowlands up into the mountains, the Danites turned their attention to territory in the north of Palestine. A force of six hundred men was sent, who captured and burned Laish, afterward rebuilding it and naming it Dan (Judg. 18:14-29). This city, with others, was laid waste by Ben-hadad (1 Kings 15:20; 2 Chron. 16:4), and this is the last mention of the place. It is now called Tell el Kady ("mound of the judge").

DAN, CAMP OF (Judg. 13:25; 18:12, A. V. "Mahaneh-dan"), the name given to the district in which the Danites pitched before emigrating northward; or perhaps the location of some Danite families which remained.

DAN, CITY OF. 1. Formerly Laish, but taken by the Danites and called DAN (q. v.).

2. There is a reference in Ezek. 27:19 in the A. V. to "Dan also" (Heb. דַּן), but the R. V. has it correctly "Vedan," which has been thought to be Aden in Arabia, once the chief trading port of Arabia before the rise of Mochar.

"DAN EVEN TO BE'ER-SHE'BA." Dan being the northern boundary of Canaan, and Beer-sheba its most southerly town, this proverbial saying expressed the extreme length of the land (Judg. 20:1; 1 Sam. 3:20, etc.).

DANCE. This act is usually denoted in Hebrew by some form of khool (חָוַל, to twist), probably referring to the whirling motions of the sacred dances of the Orient (Judg. 21:21, 23; Psa. 30:11; 1 Sam. 18:6). The word khaw-gag' (חָוַג) means moving in a circle (1 Sam. 30:16), while raw-kad' (רָקַד, 1 Chron. 15:29, "Michal . . . saw David dancing and playing") means to skip or leap for joy. Similar in meaning is kaw-rar' (קָרַר, 2 Sam. 6:14, 16). In the New Testament "dance" is the rendering of khor-os' (χορός, "an inclosure for dancing," Luke 15:25), and or-khen'-om-ahce (ὀρχήνομα, literally, to leap, Matt. 11:17, etc.).

1. Among the Egyptians the dance consisted mostly of a succession of figures, in which the performers endeavored to exhibit a great variety of gesture. Men and women danced at the same time or in separate parties, but the latter were generally preferred from their superior grace and elegance. Some danced to slow airs, adapted to the style of their movement—the attitudes they assumed frequently partook of a grace not unworthy of the Greeks—and others preferred a lively step, regulated by an appropriate tune. Graceful attitudes and gesticulation were the general style of their dance, but, as in other countries, the taste of the performance varied according to the rank of the person by whom they were employed, or their own skill; and the dance at the house of a priest differed from that among the uncouth peasantry or the lower classes of townsmen.

It was not customary for the upper orders of Egyptians to indulge in this amusement, either in public or private assemblies, and none appear to have practiced it but the lower ranks of society and those who gained their livelihood by attending festive meetings.

The dresses of the female dancers were light and of the finest texture, showing by their transparent quality the form and movement of the limbs. They generally consisted of a loose-flowing robe, reaching to the ankles, occasionally fastened tight at the waist, and round the hips was a small narrow girdle, adorned with beads or ornaments of various colors. Slaves were taught dancing as well as music; and in the houses of the rich, besides their other occupations, that of dancing to entertain the family or a party of friends was required of them; and free Egyptians also gained a livelihood by their performances. The dances of the lower orders generally had a tendency toward a species of pantomime; and the rude peasantry were more delighted with ludicrous and extravagant dexterity than with gestures which displayed elegance and grace. The Egyptians also danced at the temples in honor of the gods, and in some processions, as they approached the precincts of the sacred courts.

2. The Greeks, though they employed women who practiced music and dancing to entertain the guests, looked upon the dance as a recreation in which all classes might indulge, and an accomplishment becoming a gentleman; and it was also a Jewish custom for young ladies to dance at private entertainments (Matt. 14:6), as it is at Damascus and other Eastern towns.

3. The Romans, on the contrary, were far from considering it worthy of a man of rank or of a sensible person; and Cicero says: "No man who is sober dances, unless he is out of his mind, either when alone or in any decent society, for dancing is the companion of wanton conviviality, dissoluteness, and luxury." Nor did the Greeks indulge in it to excess; and effeminate dances or extraordinary gesticulation were deemed indecent in men of character and wisdom.

4. Hebrew. Among the Jews dancing was always a favorite social pastime among girls and women (Jer. 31:4), imitated by children playing on the street (Job 21:11; Matt. 11:17; Luke 7:32), and was engaged in by female companies in honor of national joys, especially of victories (1 Sam. 18:6) and religious festivities (Exod. 15:20; Judg. 21:21). On such occasions, at least in more ancient times, men also testified the joy of their hearts by dancing (2 Sam. 6:5, 14). A religious meaning belonged also to the torch dance, which arose later, by men in the temple on the first evening of the Feast of Tabernacles. The dances probably consisted only of circular movements, with artless rythmical steps and lively gesticulations, the women beating cymbals and triangles (Judg. 11:34). When at national festivities other instruments were played (Psa. 68:25; 150:4). Of public female dancers, as are frequently found in the modern East, there is not a trace to be found in Old Testament times. Such dancing as that of Herodias's daughter before men at a voluptuous banquet (Matt. 14:6; Mark 6:22, sq.) was first introduced among the Jews through the influence of corrupt Greek customs.

The Jewish dance was performed by the sexes separately. There is no evidence from sacred history that the diversion was promiscuously enjoyed, except it might be at the erection of the deified calf, when, in imitation of the Egyptian festival of Apis, all classes of the Hebrews intermingled in the frantic revelry. In the sacred dances, although both sexes seem to have frequently borne a part in the procession or chorus, they remained in distinct and separate companies (Psa. 68:25; Jer. 31:18). The dances of the virgins at Shiloh were certainly part of a religious festivity (Judg. 21:19-23).

A form of religious dancing sometimes made part of the public worship of the early Christians. The custom was borrowed from the Jews, in whose solemn processions choirs of young men and maidens, moving in time with solemn music, always bore a part. It must not be supposed that the "religious dances" had any similarity to modern amusements. They were rather processions, in which all who took part marched in time with the hymns which they sung. The custom was very early laid aside, probably because it might have led to the adoption of such objectionable dances as were employed in honor of the pagan deities. Prohibitions of dancing as an amusement abound in the Church fathers and in the decrees of the councils (Keil, Arch., ii, 282; Wilkinson, Ancient Egyptians, i, 133-140).

5. Figurative. Dancing in the Scriptures is symbolical of joy in contrast with mourning (Psa. 30:11, etc.). See GLOSSARY.

DANGER. See GLOSSARY.

DANIEL (Heb. דָּנִיֵּאל, daw-nee-yale', God is my judge).

1. The Son of David, the second by Abigail, the Carmelitess (1 Chron. 3:1). In the parallel passage, 2 Sam. 3:3, he is called Chileab.

2. The celebrated prophet and minister at the court of Babylon, whose life and prophecies are contained in the book bearing his name. Nothing is known of his parentage or family, but he appears to have been of royal or noble descent (Dan. 1:3) and to have possessed considerable personal endowments (Dan. 1:4). (1) Early life. He was taken to Babylon while yet a boy, together with three other Hebrew youths of rank—Hananiah, Mishael, and Azariah—at the first deportation of the people of Judah in the fourth year of Jehoiakim (B. C. 604). (2) Enters the king's service. He and his companions were obliged to enter the service of the royal court of Babylon, on which occasion he received the Chaldean name of Belshazzar, according to the Eastern custom when a change takes place in one's condition of life, and more especially if his personal liberty is thereby affected (comp. 2 Kings 23:34; 24:17). Daniel, like Joseph, gained the favor of his guardian, and was allowed by him to carry out his wise intention of abstaining from unclean food and idolatrous ceremonies (1:8-16). His prudent conduct and absolute refusal to comply with such customs were crowned with the divine blessing and had the most important results. Another reason of a sanitary nature may also be assigned for this temperance, as it is probable he was at this time undergoing the curative process after emascution in accordance with the barbarous custom of oriental courts. (3) Interprets dreams. After three years of discipline Daniel was presented to the king, and shortly after he had an opportunity of exercising his peculiar gift (1:17) of interpreting dreams—not only recalling the forgotten vision of the king, but also revealing its meaning (2:14, sq.). As a reward he was made "ruler over the whole province of Babylon" and "chief of the governors over all the wise men of Babylon" (2:48). Later he interpreted another of Nebuchadnezzar's dreams to the effect that he was to lose for a time his throne, but to be again restored to it after his humiliation had been completed (Dan. 4). (4) In retirement. Under the unworthy successors of Nebuchadnezzar Daniel appears to have occupied an inferior position (Dan. 8:27) and no longer to have been "master of the magicians" (4:8, 9), probably living at Susa (8:2). In the first year of King Belshazzar (7:1), B. C. about 555, he was both alarmed and comforted by a remarkable vision (ch. 7), followed by one two years later (ch. 8), which disclosed to him the future course of events and the ultimate fate of the most powerful empires of the world, but in particular their relations to the kingdom of God and its development to the great consummation. (5) Restored to office. He interpreted the handwriting on the wall which disturbed the feast of Belshazzar (5:10-28), and, notwithstanding his bold denunciation of the king, the latter appointed him the "third ruler of the kingdom" (5:29). After the fall of Babylon Darius ascended the throne and made Daniel the first of the "three presidents" of the empire (6:2). In deep humiliation and prostration of spirit he then prayed to the Almighty in the name of his people for forgiveness of their sins and for the divine mercy in their behalf; and the answering promises which he received far exceeded the tenor of his prayer, for the visions of the seer were extended to the end of Judaism (ch. 9). (6) Persecution. His elevation to the highest post of honor and the scrupulous discharge of his official duty aroused the envy and jealousy of his colleagues, who conspired against him. They persuaded the monarch to pass a decree forbidding anyone for thirty days to offer prayer to any person save the king. For his disobedience the prophet was thrown into a den of lions, but was miraculously saved and again raised to the highest posts of honor (ch. 6). (7) Patriotism. He lived to enjoy the happiness of seeing his people restored to their own land, and though his advanced age would not allow him to be among those who returned to Palestine, yet did he never for a moment cease to occupy his mind and heart with his people and their concerns (10:12). At the accession of Cyrus he still retained his prosperity (1:21; 6:28). (8) Visions. In the third year of Cyrus he had a series of visions, in which he was informed of the minutest details respecting the future history and sufferings of his nation to a period of their true redemption through Christ, as also a consolatory notice to himself to proceed calmly and peaceably to the end of his days, and then await patiently the resurrection of the dead (chaps. 10-12). It is not worth while to mention here the various fables respecting the later life and death of Daniel, as all accounts are vague and confused. See SUPPLEMENT.

Character. In the prophecies of Ezekiel mention is made of Daniel as a pattern of righteousness (14:14, 20) and wisdom (28:3), and, since Daniel was still young at that time (B. C. 594-588), some have thought that another prophet must be referred to. But Daniel was conspicuous for purity and knowledge at a very early age (Dan. 1:4, 17, 20), and he was probably over thirty years of age at the time of Ezekiel's prophecy.

3. A priest of the family of Ithamar who returned from the exile with Ezra (Ezra 8:2), B. C. about 457. He is probably the same with the priest Daniel who joined in the covenant drawn up by Nehemiah (Neh. 10:6), B. C. 445.

DAN'IEL, BOOK OF. See BIBLE, BOOKS OF.

DANTE (Judg. 13:2; 18:1, 11; 1 Chron. 12:35), one of the tribe of DAN (q. v.).

DAN-JA'AN (Heb. דָּן יַעֲן, dawn yah'-an, 2 Sam. 24:6). The LXX. and the Vulgate read "Dan in the woods." Opinions differ as to whether this is identical with Dan or Laish, or the ancient site called Danian in the mountains above Khan en-Nakura, south of Tyre, or a place near Gilead.

DAN'NAH (Heb. דָּן נָח, dan-naw', murmuring), a city in the mountains of Judah, about eight miles from Hebron (Josh. 15:49).

DARA (Heb. דָּרָא, daw-rah'), a contracted or corrupt form (1 Chron. 2:6) of the name DARDA (q. v.).

DARDA (Heb. דָּרְדָּי, dar-dah', pearl of knowledge), a son of Mahal, one of the four men of great fame for their wisdom, but surpassed by Solomon (1 Kings 4:31), B. C. before 960. In 1 Chron. 2:6, however, the same four names occur again as "sons of Zerah," of the tribe of Judah, with the slight difference that Darda appears as Dara. Although the identity of these persons with those in 1 Kings 4 has been much debated, they are doubtless the same.

DARIUS (Gr. Δαρειός, hence the Roman and modern form of the name; Old Persian Dārayava'ush; Heb. דָּרְיָוֶשׁ). This name is borne by three personages in the Old Testament.

1. Darius Hystaspes (Ezra 4:5, 24; 5:5-7; 6:1, 12, 15; Hag. 1:1; 2:10; Zech. 1:1, 7; 7:1), the restorer of the Persian empire founded by Cyrus the Great (see CYRUS). Cyrus was succeeded in 529 B. C. by his son Cambyses, who possessed his father's adventurous spirit without his commanding genius. He added first Phœnicia and Cyprus, and afterward Egypt, to the new empire, but failed in attempting to carry out impracticable schemes of conquest in North Africa and Ethiopia. Encouraged by these disasters to Cambyses a pretender seized the throne, claiming that he was Smerdis, the deceased younger son of Cyrus, who had not long survived his father's death. Cambyses, despairing of success against the usurper, put an end to his own life while on his homeward march. The impostor, after a reign of a few months, was dethroned by Darius, the son of Hystaspes, in 521 B. C., who headed an insurrection of the nobles against him. Darius was apparently the rightful heir to the throne, being descended, collaterally with Cyrus, from the ancient royal line of Persis. The reign of Darius belongs more to general than to Bible history; but as he had great influence on the history of the world, as well as upon the fortunes of the Jews, we must notice the leading stages of his career. For our information we are indebted not only to the Greek historians, but to his own inscriptions, written in the Old Persian cuneiform alphabet, whose decipherment also gave the key to the more ancient and complex Assyrian and Babylonian system of ideograms and syllable signs.

(1) Period of revolt. The genius for universal rule possessed by Cyrus, his power of conciliation his generosity and tolerance, had kept his heterogeneous empire in peace and contentment for seventeen years after the submission of the Lydians and Greeks of Asia Minor and nine years after the capture of Babylon. But during the reign of Cambyses discontent and misrule prepared the way for open revolt, which at the accession of Darius was carried on in all parts of his dominions. To name the disaffected districts would simply be to enumerate the provinces of the empire, or, more summarily, the countries of which it was originally composed. Persia proper, Susiana (Elam), Media, Babylonia, Assyria, Armenia, Parthia, Hyrcania, with less known regions to the east, revolted successively or concurrently, while the governors of Asia Minor and Egypt quietly assumed their independence. But the energy and military skill of Darius everywhere prevailed, and the whole formidable uprising was quelled after six years' work of stern repression, so that by 515 B. C. the sole authority of Persia was recognized in all the lands that had been subdued by Cyrus and Cambyses. (2) Period of reorganization. Cyrus had made it his policy to interfere as little as possible with the modes of government followed by his several subject states. For example, in many countries the native kings were confirmed and encouraged in their autonomous administration upon the payment of a reasonable tribute, and in the smaller states native governors looked after the royal revenues and at the same time ruled their people in accordance with traditional methods. This whole system was changed by Darius, who abolished the local kingdoms and principalities, divided the whole empire into "satrapies," each satrap being a Persian official with supreme authority in civil affairs, and a division of the imperial army to support him and maintain the government against all outside attacks. Judges were also appointed with fixed circuits, and a system of posts was established, with royal roads extending everywhere for the transmission of dispatches and rescripts to and from the capital cities of Susa or Persepolis. Notice that this governmental system was an advance on the old Assyrian despotism, in that the sovereign ruled by delegated power, while still falling short of the representative systems that had their origin in the Greek republics. What is of particular importance to Bible readers is the application of the system to Palestine. There the returning exiles expected to found an autonomous principedom, but under

Darius there was erected instead the Persian province of Judah, with imperial supervision over matters civil and religious. (3) Period of foreign conquests. Not content with the empire that fell to him by succession, Darius planned and carried out vast schemes of foreign conquest. The most important of these were the acquisition, about 512 B. C., of northwestern India, and the subjection, about 508 B. C., of the coast land between the Bosphorus and the Grecians tate of Thessaly. By the former the navigation of the lower Indus was controlled and the trade of India opened up by way of the Persian Gulf, with an enormous increase of the imperial revenue. The expedition which accomplished the latter result crossed the Bosphorus, conquered maritime Thrace and Macedonia and the adjacent territory of the warlike Scythians to the north, whose inroads were a continual menace to the Asiatic provinces. Thus the Persian dominions now extended from the Caucasus to the borders of northern Greece and "from India even unto Ethiopia." (Esth. 1:1). (4) Period of the Grecian wars. These, as is well known, were precipitated by disturbances among the Greeks of the Asiatic coast. The revolt of the subject cities, in 501 B. C., was supported for a time by the European states of Athens and Eretria. It lasted till 494 B. C., and after its complete suppression steps were immediately taken by Darius for vengeance upon the foreigners. The first great expedition by land and sea, in 493, did not quite reach its destination, and the second by sea, in 490, was frustrated by the world-famous defeat at Marathon. These expeditions were led by generals of Darius, and he made plans for a third which he was to command in person. A revolt in Egypt, in 487, and his own death, in 486, put an end to the designs. He was succeeded by his son Xerxes, the Ahasuerus of the Book of Esther, whose mother was a daughter of Cyrus the Great. (5) Darius and the Jews. The exiles who returned under the protection of Cyrus (537 B. C.), having begun their political and religious life at Jerusalem, were thwarted in their efforts to rebuild the temple by the Samaritans and other adversaries, who accused them of intrigue and sedition against the Persian government. Cyrus, being occupied with his eastern wars, did not take upon himself to interfere for the prosecution of the work. His successor, Cambyses, had little sympathy with his struggling subjects. Thus the restoration of the sanctuary, so essential in all ways to the progress of the little nation, was delayed for seventeen years (Ezra 4:24). The accession of Darius gave new hope to the leaders of the Jews. In 520 B. C. the prophets Haggai and Zechariah stirred up the people to renewed efforts, and under their inspiration Zerubbabel, the civil leader of the colony, set earnestly to work (Ezra 5:1, 2). An appeal to Darius by Tattenai, the satrap of Syria (Ezra 5:3-17), embodying a memorial from the leaders of the Jews, resulted in the confirmation of their contention that their proceedings were not only lawful, but actually carried on under royal authority. Darius gave orders that search should be made, with the result that in Ecbatana the edict of Cyrus was found containing all that the Jews had claimed (Ezra 6:1-5). Darius therefore made a new proclamation insisting that no obstacle should be put in the way of the people of Jerusalem; that the building of the temple should be forwarded; that interference with the work should be a capital offense, and that contributions should be made in money and goods from the king's local revenues toward the expenses of the restoration (Ezra 6:6-12). Accordingly the satrap and his officers with all diligence carried out the orders of Darius (6:13, sq.), with the result that the temple was finished and dedicated in the sixth year of Darius (516 B. C.).

2. Darius the Mede (Dan. 5:31; 9:1; 11:1) is written, by the mistake of a scribe, for Gobryas, the general of Cyrus who took Babylon in July, 538 B. C. (see CYRUS). For four months, until the entry of Cyrus, he acted as governor of Babylon, though he was never king. He was also a "Mede," not a Persian in the strict sense, since the inscriptions call him "Gubaru of Gutium," this country being the home of an ancient people (the "Goyim" of Gen. 14:1) living on the western slope of the mountains of Media, northeast of Babylonia. It is impossible to make any other identification. Cyrus himself became king of Babylon after the occupation, so that there is no room for any other hypothetical monarch. As to Darius Hystaspes (see above), he did not become king of either Babylon or Persia till 521 B. C., eight years after the death of Cyrus. He was also in one sense a "Mede," but was descended from the ancient royal line of the Persians. See SUPPLEMENT.

3. Darius the Persian (Neh. 12:22). This was Darius Codomannus, the last king of Persia (B. C. 336-330), whose empire was destroyed by Alexander the Great. He was a contemporary of the high priest Jaddua, who is referred to in the same verse. Thus the Bible brings before us nearly all the notable kings of Persia, from first to last. —J. F. McC.

DARKNESS (Heb. חֹשֶׁךְ , kho-shek', the dark; Gr. $\sigma\kappa\omicron\tau\omicron\varsigma$, skot'-os), in the physical sense, is specially noticed, on three occasions, in the Scriptures:

1. At the period of creation, when darkness, it is said, "was on the face of the deep," the dispelling of which, by the introduction of light, was the commencement of that generative process by which order and life were brought out of primeval chaos (Gen. 1:2-4).

2. The plague of darkness in Egypt (Exod. 10:21), "darkness that might be felt." See PLAGUES OF EGYPT.

3. The awful moment of our Lord's crucifixion, when "from the sixth hour there was darkness over all the land unto the ninth hour" (Matt. 27:45). Some, chiefly ancient writers, have insisted upon rendering "over all the earth," and account for it by an eclipse of the sun. But an eclipse of the sun could not be visible to the whole world, and, moreover, there could not have been an eclipse, for it was the time of full moon, when the moon could not come between the sun and the earth. The darkness would, therefore, seem to have been confined to Palestine, and may have been caused by an extraordinary and preternatural obstruction of the light of the sun by the sulphurous vapors accompanying the earthquake which then occurred.

The "thick darkness where God was" (Exod. 20:21) was doubtless the "thick darkness" in which "the Lord said he would dwell" (1 Kings 8:12), and has reference to the cloud upon the mercy seat. "Cloud and darkness are round about him" (Psa. 97:2) refers to the inscrutability of the divine nature and working. The darkness connected with the coming of the Lord (Isa. 13:9, 10; Joel 2:31; Matt. 24:29, etc.) has reference to the judgments attendant on his advent.

Figurative. Darkness is used as symbolical of ignorance and spiritual blindness (Isa. 9:2; John 1:5; 1 John 2:8, etc.). With respect to the gloom associated with darkness it becomes significant of sorrow and distress; hence, "the day of darkness" is the time of calamity and trouble (Joel 2:2). Isa. 8:22; 9:2; 13:10, etc., refer to the unlighted streets of Eastern countries, and indicate the despair and wretchedness of the lost. Darkness affording a covering for the performance of evil, "the works of darkness" (Eph. 5:11) is employed to designate the more flagrant exhibitions of unrighteousness. Darkness is used to represent the state of the dead (Job 10:21; 18:18).

DAR'KON (Heb. דַּרְקוֹן, dar-kone', derivation uncertain), one whose "children," or descendants, were among the "servants of Solomon" who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:56; Neh. 7:58), B. C. about 458.

DARLING (Heb. דַּרְלִיךְ, yaw-kheed'; united, only, hence beloved; Psa. 22:20; 35:17), one's self. See GLOSSARY.

DART, the rendering of several Hebrew and Greek words, meaning an arrow or light spear. The Hebrews are supposed to have discharged the arrow while on fire, to which allusion may be made in Deut. 32:23, 42; Psa. 7:13; 120:4; Zech. 9:14; Eph. 6:16. See ARMOR.

DA'THAN (Heb. דַּתָּן, daw-thawn', of a spring, or well), a Reubenite chieftain, son of Eliab, who joined the conspiracy of Korah, the Levite, and, with his accomplices, was swallowed up by an earthquake (Num. 16:1, sq.; 26:9; Deut. 11:6; Psa. 106:17), B. C. about 1190.

DAUGHTER (Heb. בַּת, bath, feminine of בֵּן, bane, son; Gr. θυγάτηρ, thoo-gal'-air) is used in Scripture, like son, with some latitude. In addition to its usual and proper sense of daughter, born or adopted, it is used to designate a step-sister, niece, or any female descendant (Gen. 20:12; 24:48; Num. 25:1; Deut. 23:17). More generally still it is used of the female branch of a family, or female portion of community, as "the daughters of Moab," of "the Philistines," "of Aaron" (Num. 25:1; 2 Sam. 1:20; Luke 1:5). Small towns were called daughters of neighboring large mother cities, as "Heshbon and all her daughters" (Num. 21:25, marg.); so Tyre is called the daughter of Zidon (Isa. 23:12).

Cities were commonly personified as women, and so, naturally, had the designation given to them of daughters of the country to which they belonged, as "daughter of Zion," "daughter of Jerusalem" (Isa. 37:22, etc.). The condition of daughters, that is, of young women, in the East, their employments, duties, etc., may be gathered from various parts of the Scriptures, and seems to have borne but little resemblance to that of young women of respectable parentage among ourselves. Rebekah drew and fetched water; Rachel kept sheep, as did the daughters of Jethro, though he was a priest, or a prince, of Midian. They superintended and performed domestic services for the family. Tamar, though a king's daughter, baked bread; and the same of others.

DAUGHTER-IN-LAW (Heb. כַּלְיָהּ, kal-law'; Gr. νύμφη, noom'-fay), means, literally, a bride, and is applied to a son's wife.

DA'VID.—1. Name and Family. (Heb. דָּוִד, daw-veed', affectionate, or beloved). The second king of Israel. See SUPPLEMENT.

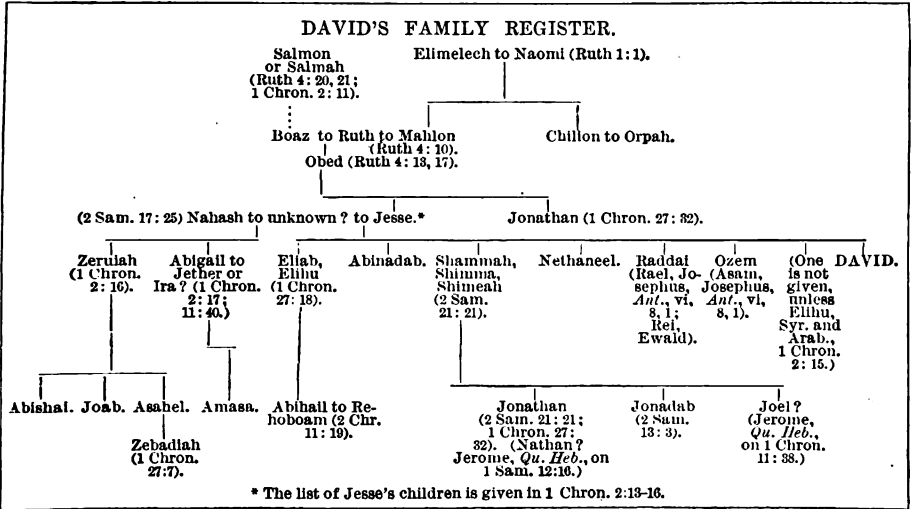

From the subjoined register we learn several facts of importance. David's father, Jesse, was partly of Moabitish origin, being the grandson of Boaz and Ruth. His mother's name is unknown, and "all we know of her character is derived from two brief allusions to her in the poetry of her son, from which we may gather that she was a godly woman, whose devotion to God's service David commemorates as at once a token of God's favor to himself and a stimulus to him to consecrate himself to God (Psa. 86:16; 116:16)" (Kitto). David, born in Beth-lehem (1 Sam. 16:1; 2 Sam. 5:4), B. C. 1030, was the youngest of seven sons (or eight if we admit Elihu, mentioned in the Syriac and Arabic Versions). His sisters were Zeruiah and Abigail, though they are not expressly called the daughters of Jesse; and Abigail (2 Sam. 17:25) is called the daughter of NAHASH (q. v.). As the youngest of the family he may have possibly received the name, which first appears in him, of David, the Darling. Perhaps for this same reason he was never intimate with his brethren. The familiarity which he lost with his brothers he gained with his nephews, the three sons of his sister Zeruiah, and the one son of his sister Abigail.

2. Early History. (1) As shepherd. By his elder brothers David seems to have been held in small esteem, and to him was allotted the humble office of tending the flocks. While thus occupied he beguiled the time with music, and as a minstrel gained considerable renown (1 Sam. 16:18). One incident alone of his solitary shepherd life has come down to us—his conflict with the lion and the bear in defense of his father's flocks (17:34-36). (2) Anointed as Saul's successor. After the rejection of Saul the Lord commanded Samuel to go to Beth-lehem and anoint one of the sons of Jesse as king. He therefore took a heifer, went to Beth-lehem, and summoned Jesse and his sons to the sacrifice. The heifer was killed, and the party were waiting to begin the feast. As the sons appeared before Samuel, beginning with the eldest, he was restrained by divine intimation from choosing them. Seven had thus passed by, and Samuel said unto Jesse, "Are here all thy children?" Jesse replied, "There remaineth yet the youngest, and, behold, he keepeth the sheep." In obedience to the command of the prophet David was sent for. Soon there entered a youth, ruddy, and withal of a beautiful countenance and goodly to look to. "And the Lord said, Arise, anoint dismay of his countrymen—hears the reward proposed by the king—is introduced to Saul—undertakes the combat. Rejecting Saul's armor, which he finds too cumbersome, he takes only his shepherd's staff, a satchel (in which he places five smooth stones from a brook), and a sling. A colloquy takes place between the two combatants, after the manner of ancient warfare, and the giant advances. David, placing a stone in his sling, sends it whizzing to its mark in the forehead him; for this is he. Then Samuel took the horn of oil, and anointed him in the midst of his brethren: and the Spirit of the Lord came upon David from that day forward." It is not probable that Samuel said anything at that time about the meaning and object of the anointing, but possibly before leaving communicated all to David and Jesse (16:1-13), B. C. about 1013.

3. His Relations with Saul. (1) Introduction. With the rejection of Saul on the part of God the Spirit of Jehovah departed from him, and an evil spirit from Jehovah troubled him. When Saul's attendants noticed the mental ailments of the king they advised him to let the evil spirit be charmed away by music, and recommended David as minstrel. David appeared at court, and "when the evil spirit from God was upon Saul, David took his harp and played; so Saul was refreshed and was well, and the evil spirit departed from him" (1 Sam. 16:14-23). (2) Slays Goliath. After Saul's condition improved David probably returned to Beth-lehem. While the armies of the Philistines and of Israel are encamped in "the terebinth" valley Goliath, a Philistine of gigantic stature and clothed in complete armor, insults the comparatively defenseless Israelites, among whom the king alone appears to be well armed (17:38; comp. 13:20). No one can be found to take up the challenge. At this juncture David appears in the camp, sent by Jesse with food for his brethren. He hears the challenge, now made for the fortieth time—sees the of his opponent, who falls with his face to the ground. Rushing forward he takes the sword of Goliath and cuts off his head (17:1-51). Two trophies long remained of the battle—one, the huge sword of the Philistine, which was hung up behind the ephod of the tabernacle at Nob (21:9); the other the head of Goliath, which David took to Jerusalem (17:54). (3) In Saul's family. When David went forth to meet the Philistine Saul inquired of Abner about him. Abner professed ignorance, and David was, therefore, upon his return, brought before Saul and questioned. He gave the name of his father and, in all probability, further information respecting himself and family, as the words of ch. 18:1 seem to indicate a protracted conversation. "And Saul took him that day, and would let him go no more home to his father's house" (17:55-18:2). (4) Jonathan's friendship. It was at this interview that Jonathan found his heart drawn toward David, and, in the graphic language of Scripture, "his soul was knit with the soul of David, and Jonathan loved him as his own soul." He soon made known his love, and the two young men entered into a covenant of friendship, which was in the highest degree honorable to both, and which, in the case of Jonathan, calls forth our admiration and regard. As a sign and pledge of his friendship Jonathan gave David his clothes and armor (18:1-4). This seems to have been a very common custom in ancient times (compare the exchange of armor made by Glaucus and Diomedes Homer's Iliad, vi, 230). (5) Saul's jealousy. David conducted himself with great prudence, and Saul placed him above the men of war, and made him one of their commanders. Probably some days, if not weeks, after David's victory over Goliath the Israelites returned from pursuing and plundering the Philistines. Then "the women came out of all the cities of Israel, singing and dancing to meet King Saul, with tabrets, with joy, and with instruments of music. And the women answered one another as they played, and said, Saul hath slain his thousands, and David his ten thousands." These words aroused the jealousy of Saul, who eyed David askance and plotted his destruction (18:5-9). He attempted to take David's life with a javelin, but failed (vers. 10, 11). Afraid of David, because the Lord was with him, Saul removed him from his immediate presence by appointing him a captain over a thousand.

Scene of David's Wanderings.

But David behaved so wisely that all Israel and Judah came to love him as a leader, which fact only increased Saul's animosity (vers. 12-16). Although he had promised to give his daughter (Merab) to the slayer of Goliath, he now offered her to David only on condition of future service, hoping for his destruction at the hands of the Philistines. Even then he broke his promise and gave his daughter to Adriel, the Meholathite (vers. 17-19). Learning of David's love for Michal, "Saul said, I will give him her, that she may be a snare to him." The condition was that David should slay a hundred Philistines, with the hope that he would fall in the attempt. David slew two hundred of the enemy, and received Michal for his wife (v. 20, sq.). Saul still followed up his persecution, but David had two faithful friends at court—Jonathan and Michal. Warned by the one of Saul's purpose to kill him, and assisted by the other, he escaped by night (19:1-18) and became a fugitive.

4. A Fugitive. David saw Jonathan no more except by stealth. Michal was given in marriage to another (Phaltiel), and was not restored to David until after Saul's death. (1) With Samuel. David fled to Samuel at Ramah, and reported to him all that Saul had done. He, doubtless, sought advice from the prophet, and desired to strengthen himself by intercourse with him for the troubles that still awaited him. He and Samuel went and dwelt in Nainoth. Saul, learning of David's whereabouts, sent messengers to take him; but the three companies, as soon as they came into the presence of the prophets, were completely disarmed, they themselves prophesying. Saul afterward went to Ramah and made inquiry at Sechu for Samuel and David. The Spirit of the Lord came upon him, and he went prophesying to Nainoth (1 Sam. 19:19, sq.). (2) Consults Jonathan. David fled to Ramah, and a secret interview with Jonathan confirmed the alarm already excited by Saul's endeavor to seize him there, and he now determined to leave his native country and take refuge at the court of his enemy. He and Jonathan renewed their covenant of friendship, and his friend dismissed him in peace (ch. 20).

(3) Visits Nob. David repaired to Nob, the seat of the tabernacle, partly to obtain food and weapons, and partly to have an interview with the high priest. On the pretext of a secret mission from Saul he gained an answer from the oracle, some of the consecrated bread, and the sword of Goliath (21: 1-9). (4) Flees to Gath. David, for fear of Saul, repaired to Achish, king of Gath, but it being made known to the king that he was the slayer of Goliath, David feigned madness. The king thereupon dismissed him from his presence, and David became an outlaw (21:10-15).

5. As an Outlaw. (1) In Adullam. He repaired to the cave of Adullam, which he made his headquarters. There came to him here his brethren and his father's house, together with others (who were in distress or had creditors, or were dissatisfied with the government of Saul), until they numbered about four hundred men (1 Sam. 22:1, 2). (2) In the hold. His next move was to a stronghold, either the mountain afterward called Herodium, close to Adullam, or the fastness called by Josephus Masada, the Grecized form of the Hebrew word Matzed (1 Sam. 22:4, 5; 1 Chron. 12:16), in the neighborhood of Engedi. While there he had located his aged parents, for the sake of greater security, beyond the Jordan, with their ancestral kinsmen of Moab (1 Sam. 22:3, 4). In so doing he was probably influenced by his remembrance of the fact that Naomi and her family had found in that land a place of sojourn, and that Ruth, his ancestress, was herself a Moabitesse. The neighboring king, Nahash, of Ammon, also treated him kindly (2 Sam. 10:2). Here occurred the daring exploit of the three heroes who faced death to procure water from the well of Bethlehem, and David's chivalrous answer (1 Chron. 11:16-19; 2 Sam. 23:14-17). He was joined here by two separate bands: one, a little body of eleven fierce Gadite mountaineers, who swam the Jordan in flood time to reach him (1 Chron. 12:8-15); the other a detachment of men from Judah and Benjamin under his nephew Amasai, who henceforth attached himself to David's fortunes (1 Chron. 12:16-18). (3) In Keilah. At the warning of God he fled into the forest of Hareth (somewhere in the hills of Judah), and then again fell in with the Philistines, and again, apparently advised by God (1 Sam. 23:4), he made a descent on their foraging parties and relieved Keilah, in which he took up his abode. While there, now for the first time in a fortified town of his own, he was joined by a new and most important ally—Abiathar, the last survivor of the house of Ithamar. By this time the four hundred who had joined him at Adullam (22:2) had swelled to six hundred (23:1-13). (4) In Ziph and Maon. The situation of David was now changed by the appearance of Saul himself on the scene. Apparently the danger was too great for the little army to keep together. They escaped from Keilah, and dispersed "whithersoever they could go," among the fastnesses of Judah. Henceforth it becomes difficult to follow his movements with exactness, partly from ignorance of the localities, partly because the same event seems to be twice narrated. But thus much we discern: He is in the wilderness of Ziph. While here he was visited by Jonathan, who encouraged him and renewed the covenant between them (23:16-18). Once (or twice) the Ziphites betray his movements to Saul (23:19; 26:1). From thence Saul literally hunts him like a partridge, the treacherous Ziphites beating the bushes before him, and three thousand men stationed to catch even the print of his footsteps on the hills (23:14, 22; 24:11; 26:2, 20). David finds himself driven to the extreme south of Judah, in the wilderness of Maon. On two, if not three, occasions the pursuer and pursued catch sight of each other (23:25-29; 24:1-22; ch. 26). Of the first of these escapes the memory was long preserved in the name of the "Rock of Divisions," given to the cliff down one side of which David climbed while Saul was surrounding the hill on the other side (23:25-29), when he was suddenly called away by the cry of a Philistine invasion. On another occasion Saul, while seeking David in the wilderness of En-gedi, entered a cave for a natural necessity, not knowing that David and his men were concealed there. David cut off the skirt of Saul's long robe. He made the deed known, and expostulated with the king for his treatment of him, whereupon reconciliation and mutual forgiveness followed (24:1, sq.). The third was in the wilderness farther south. David penetrated into the camp by night, and carried off the cruse of water and the well-known royal spear of Saul (26:7, 11, 12). The interview that followed was the last between David and Saul. (5) David and Nabal. While he was in the wilderness of Maon occurred David's adventure with Nabal, instructive as showing his mode of carrying on the freebooter's life, and his marriage with Abigail (25:2-42). His marriage with Ahinoam, from Jezreel, also in the same neighborhood (Josh. 15:55, 56), seems to have taken place a short time before (1 Sam. 25:43; 27:3; 2 Sam. 3:2).

6. Service under Achish. Wearyed with his wandering life, he at last crosses the Philistine frontier, not, as before, in the capacity of a fugitive, but the chief of a powerful band—his six hundred men now grown into an organized force, with their wives and families around them (1 Sam. 27:3, 4). (1) Receives Ziklag. After the manner of Eastern potentates, Achish gave him, for his support, a city—Ziklag, on the frontier of Philistia (27:6). There we meet with the first note of time in David's life. He was settled there for a year and four months (27:7), and his increasing importance is indicated by the fact that a body of Benjaminite archers and slingers, twenty-two of whom are specially named, joined him from the very tribe of his rival (1 Chron. 12:1-7). During his stay he may possibly have acquired the knowledge of military organization and weapons of war (1 Sam. 13:19-23), in which the Philistines surpassed the Israelites, and in which he excelled all the preceding rulers of Israel. David could not enjoy the protection of Achish without rendering him service. So he fell upon the tribes of the southern desert of Shur, toward the confines of Egypt, the Geshurites, the Gezrites, and the Amalekites, and exhibited their spoil to Achish as having been won in the south of Judah, and from the allied tribes of the Jerahmeelites and the Kenites (27:8-10). But the confidence of Achish was not shared by his Philistine nobles, and David was not obliged to go up with them against Saul (29:3, sq.). He found that during his absence the Amalekites had smitten Ziklag, burned it down, and carried off the women and children. (2) Ziklag retaken. David and his followers were greatly distressed, and David was in danger of being stoned. The excitement was calmed by Abiathar, who directed them to pursue the Amalekites, with the promise of success. Guided by a straggler (an Egyptian slave of one of the Amalekites), and assisted by some of the chiefs of the Manassites (1 Chron. 12:19-21), he fell upon the enemy, who were feasting in all the disorder of security, and slaughtered them for a whole night and day, only four hundred of the whole tribe escaping. They not only recovered their loss, but obtained also a great booty in cattle from the enemy. David divided the spoil among his six hundred, giving an equal share to those remaining with the baggage with those who went to the fight. From his own share David sent gifts to requite the friendly inhabitants of the scene of his wanderings (1 Sam. 30:1-31). (3) Saul's death. Two days after this victory an Amalekite arrived with the news of the fatal defeat of Saul at Gilboa. The reception of the tidings of the death of his rival and of his friend, the solemn mourning, the execution of the bearer of the message (who declared himself the slayer of Saul), the pathetic lamentation that followed, well close the second period of David's life (2 Sam. 1:1-27), B. C. about 1000.

7. King of Judah. After the death of Saul the surviving members of his house took refuge on the east of Jordan, while David, at the command of God, removed, with his band and all his family, to Hebron. Here the men of Judah came to him and anointed him king over their tribe. David was now (B. C. about 1000) about thirty years of age, and he reigned in Hebron seven years and six months (2 Sam. 5:4, 5). Thence he sent a message to the men of Jabesh-gilead to thank them for the honor which had been paid to Saul's remains, and to announce his accession to the throne. For five years, probably, the dominion of the house of Saul, whose seat was now at Mahanaim, did not extend to the west of Jordan, and consequently David would be the only Israelite potentate among the western tribes. (1) Marriages Maacah. He then strengthened himself by a marriage with Maacah, daughter of Talmai, king of Geshur (3:3). From Abigail he seems to have received a large private fortune. Concerning his other wives we know nothing in particular, only it is mentioned that he had six sons by six different mothers in Hebron. Abner gradually brought Israel under the dominion of Ish-bosheth, and then endeavored to conquer Judah. (2) Civil war. The war was begun by Abner's advance upon Gibeon, where he was met by the forces of Judah under Joab, the son of David's sister Zeruiah. In the battle that ensued the men of Israel were routed, and Asahel, a brother of Joab, slain by Abner, whom he was pursuing (2:12, sq.). A quarrel between Abner and Ish-bosheth decided the former to bring the kingdom over to David, who required, as a preliminary proof of sincerity, the restoration of his wife Michal. After giving her back Abner proceeded to win the elders of Israel over to David, but Joab, fearing that he would be displaced by Abner, seized a favorable opportunity of murdering him. David called upon God to witness that he was guiltless of Abner's blood, obliged Joab to join in the universal mourning, and himself followed the bier (3:6, sq.). The feeble Ish-bosheth, left helpless by the loss of Abner, fell a victim to the conspiracy of two of his captains. David took vengeance on the murderers, and buried Ish-bosheth in Abner's tomb at Hebron (ch. 4).

8. King of all Israel. The throne, so long waiting for him, was now vacant, and the united voice of the people at once called him to occupy it (B. C. about 992); and for the third time David was anointed king (see NOTE). A festival of three days celebrated the joyful event (2 Sam. 5:3; 1 Chron. 12:38, 39). David's little band had now swelled into "a great host, like the host of God" (1 Chron. 12:22), and its command was given to his nephew Joab (2 Sam. 2:28). The Levitical tribe, formerly represented by the solitary fugitive Abiathar, now came in strength, represented by the head of the rival branch of Eleazar, the high priest, the aged Jehoiada, and his youthful and warlike kinsman Zadok (1 Chron. 12:27, 28; 27:5). The kingdom at first was a constitutional one; for it is stated, "David made a league with the elders of Israel in Hebron before Jehovah; and they anointed David king over Israel" (2 Sam. 5:3). Two things first made themselves apparent at Hebron, and affected for ill all the rest of his career. The first was the formation of a harem, according to the usage of oriental kings. To the two wives of his wandering life he had now added four, and, including Michal five. There were born to him in Hebron six sons one of whom was Absalom (2 Sam. 2:2; 3:2-5, 15). The second was the increasing power of his kinsmen and chief officers, which the king strove in vain to restrain within the limits of right (2 Sam. 3:31-36). (1) Jerusalem taken. David resolved to remove the seat of government from the remote Hebron nearer to the center of the country, and his choice fell upon Jerusalem, the strong city of the Jebusites, situated on a rocky height, two thousand six hundred feet above the level of the sea. The lower city had been taken in the time of Joshua, but the upper city had hitherto defied all attacks. David offered as a reward to the successful scaler of the precipice the highest place in the army. Joab was the successful warrior, and henceforward continued captain of the host (1 Chron. 11:6). The royal residence was instantly fixed there, fortifications were added by the king and by Joab, and it was known by the special name of the "City of David" (2 Sam. 5:9; 1 Chron. 11:7). The neighboring nations were partly enraged and partly awe-struck. The Philistines made two ineffectual attacks on the new king (2 Sam. 5:17-25), and a retribution of their former victories took place by the capture and conflagration of their own idols (2 Sam. 5:21; 1 Chron. 14:12). Tyre, now for the first time appearing in the sacred history, allied herself with Israel; and Hiram sent cedar wood for the building of the new capital (2 Sam. 5:11), especially for the palace of David himself (7:2). (2) The ark removed to Jerusalem. David had now the long-desired opportunity of bringing the ark from its obscurity at Kirjath-jearim, where it had remained since its restoration by the Philistines (1 Sam. 6:21). Thither David went with thirty thousand men, chosen from all the tribes, and transported the ark. A temporary halt (owing to the death of Uzzah) detained it at the house of Obed-edom (2 Sam. 6; 1 Chron. 13), from which, after three months, it was again moved forth with great state to Jerusalem. David prepared for its final transport and reception with great care. It was carried by the Levites upon their shoulders, escorted by David and his chief warriors, with the elders of Israel. David danced in the sacred procession, and gave his soul up to joy as the ark passed to its rest in the hill of Zion. Sacrifices were offered, and, amid the sound of music and the shouts of the people, the ark was placed in the new tabernacle that David had built for it. It was the greatest day of David's life. One incident only tarnished its splendor—the reproach of Michal, his wife, as he was finally entering his palace to carry to his own household the benediction which he had already pronounced on his people. His act of severity toward her was an additional mark of the stress which he himself laid on the solemnity (2 Sam. 6:20-23; 1 Chron. 15:29; for this occasion were probably written Psalm 24, 68, and 101; also 1 Chron. 16:7-36), B. C. 932. Arrangements were made by David for the whole order of divine worship according to the law of Moses. Asaph and his brethren were appointed to minister in the daily service before the ark. The office of chief doorkeeper was committed to Obed-edom, in whose house the ark had rested.

it one of the great objects of his reign to gather means and material for this important undertaking. (4) Mephibosheth. When David had taken up his abode in Jerusalem he inquired whether there yet survived any of Saul's descendants to whom he might show kindness. Through Ziba, an old steward of Saul's, he learned of Mephibosheth, a son of Jonathian. He sent for Mephibosheth, returned him Saul's family possessions, and gave him a place at the king's table (2 Sam. 9:13). (5) Wars. His own throne and the service of God's sanctuary being thus established, David advanced to the final subjugation of the enemies of Israel. Within ten years from the capture of Jerusalem he had reduced to a state of permanent subjection the Philistines on the west (2 Sam

Zadok and the priests were charged with the daily and other sacrifices at the tabernacle, which remained at Gibeon (1 Chron. 16:37-39). (3) David's resolve to build a temple. After this event the king, contrasting his cedar palace with the curtains of the tabernacle, was desirous of building a temple for the ark. He communicated his desire to the prophet Nathan, who, without waiting to consult God, replied: "Do all that is in thine heart; for God is with thee." But the word of God came to Nathan that same night telling him that David was not to build a house for God to dwell in; that he had been a man of war; that God would first establish his house, and that his son should build the temple (2 Sam. 7; 1 Chron. 17). Encouraged by the divine approbation, and by the promises given him, David henceforth made

8:1; 1 Chron. 18:1), the Moabites on the east (2 Sam. 8:2; 1 Chron. 18:2), the Syrians on the north-east, as far as Euphrates (2 Sam. 8:3, sq.), the Edomites (v. 14) on the south; and the Ammonites, who had broken their ancient alliance, and made one grand resistance to the advance of the empire (10:1-19; 12:26-31). These last three wars were entangled with each other. The last and crowning point was the siege of Rabbah. (6) Three years' famine. About this time a three years' famine terrified Israel, which induced David to inquire of the Lord the cause of this judgment. The Lord replied, "It is for Saul, and for his bloody house, because he slew the Gibeonites." Nothing further is known about the fact itself. The Gibeonites were sent for, and upon their requisition David gave up to them two sons of

Rizpah, a concubine of Saul, and five sons of Merab, whom she had borne to Adriel. These were slain, and their bodies, left uncared for, were watched over by Rizpah. Word was brought to David, who had the bones of these crucified men, together with those of Saul and Jonathan, which were brought from Jabesh, honorably deposited in the family tomb at Zelah, in the tribe of Benjamin. It is probable that this was the time when David spared Mephibosheth, in order to fulfill his where he remained three years, after which he was recalled to Jerusalem, but dwelt in his own house "two full years, and saw not the king's face." After this he sent for Joab, and through his mediation was admitted into his father's presence (ch. 14). Absalom soon began to aspire to the throne, and, under pretense of wanting to fulfill a vow, he gained permission to go to Hebron, where he strengthened his conspiracy. Hearing of Absalom's conduct, David fled from Jerusalem covenant with Jonathan (21:1-14). (7) David's adultery. The notion of the East, in ancient and modern times, has been that a well-filled harem is essential to the splendor of a princely court. This opened a dangerous precipice in David's way, and led to a most grievous fall. Walking upon the roof of his house, he saw a woman washing herself. The beauty of the woman excited David's lust, and he inquired of his servants who she was. "Bath-sheba, the daughter of Eliam, the wife of Uriah the Hittite," was the reply. Notwithstanding she was the wife of another, David sent for her, and she appears voluntarily to have acceded to his sinful purpose. In order to cover up his sin, and secure Bath-sheba for his wife, David sent Uriah into battle under circumstances that caused his death, and thus added murder to his other crime. The clouds from this time gathered over David's fortunes, and henceforward "the sword never departed from his house" (12:10). There followed the outrage of his daughter, Tamar, by his eldest son, Ammon, and the murder of the latter by the servants of Absalom (11:1-13:29). (8) Absalom's rebellion. Absalom fled and went to Talmai, the son of Ammihud, king of Geshur, (15:13, sq.), and passed over Jordan, B. C. about 974. Mahanaim was the capital of David's exile, as it had been of the exiled house of Saul (17:24; comp. 2:8, 12). His forces were arranged under the three great military officers who remained faithful to his fortunes—Joab, captain of the host; Abishai, captain of "the mighty men;" and Ittai, who seems to have taken the place of Benaiah as captain of the guard (18:2). On Absalom's side was David's nephew, Amasa (17:25). The final battle was fought in the "forest of Ephraim," which terminated in the accident leading to the death of Absalom (18:1-33). The return was marked at every stage by rejoicing and amnesty (2 Sam. 19:16-40; 1 Kings 2:7); and Judah was first reconciled. The embers of the insurrection still smoldering (2 Sam. 19:41-43) in David's hereditary enemies of the tribe of Benjamin were trampled out by the mixture of boldness and sagacity in Joab, now, after the murder of Amasa, once more in his old position (ch. 20), and David again reigned in peace at Jerusalem. (9) Three days' pestilence. This calamity visited Jerusalem at the warning of the prophet Gad. The occasion which led to this warning was the census of the people taken by Joab at the king's orders (2 Sam. 24:1-9; 1 Chron. 21:1-7; 27:23, 24). Joab's repugnance to the measure was such that he refused to number Levi and Benjamin (1 Chron. 21:6). The king also scrupled to number those who were under twenty years of age (27:23), and the final result was never recorded in the "Chronicles of King David" (v. 24). Outside the walls of Jerusalem, Araunah, or Ornan, a wealthy Jebusite, perhaps even the ancient king of Jebus (2 Sam. 24:23), possessed a thrashing floor (1 Chron. 21:20). At this spot an awful vision appeared, such as is described in the later days of Jerusalem, of the angel of the Lord stretching out a drawn sword between earth and sky over the devoted city. The scene of such an apparition at such a moment was at once marked out for a sanctuary. David demanded, and Araunah willingly granted, the site; the altar was erected on the rock of the thrashing floor; the place was called by the name of "Moriah" (2 Chron. 3:1); and for the first time a holy place, sanctified by the vision of the divine Presence, was recognized in Jerusalem. It was this spot that afterward became the altar of the temple, and therefore the center of the national worship. (10) Adonijah's conspiracy. Adonijah, one of David's elder sons, feared that the influence of Bath-sheba might gain the kingdom for her own son, Solomon, and declared himself to be the successor to his father. (11) Solomon made king. The plot was stifled, and Solomon's inauguration took place under his father's auspices (1 Kings 1:1-53). By this time David's infirmities had grown upon him. The warmth of his exhausted frame was attempted to be restored by the introduction of the young Shunammite, Abishag (1:1; 2:17). His last song is preserved—a striking union of the ideal of a just ruler which he had placed before him, and of the difficulties which he had felt in realizing it (2 Sam. 23:1-7). His last words, as recorded, to his successor, are general exhortations to his duty, combined with warnings against Joab and Shimei, and charges to remember the children of Barzillai (1 Kings 2:1-9). (12) Death. He died at the age of seventy (2 Sam. 5:4), and "was buried in the city of David" (1 Kings 2:10, 11), B. C. about 960. After the return from the captivity "the sepulchers of David" were still pointed out "between Shiloh and the house of the mighty men," or "the guardhouse" (Neh. 3:16). His tomb, which became the general sepulcher of the kings of Judah, was pointed out in the latest times of the Jewish people. The edifice shown as such from the Crusades to the present day is on the southern hill of modern Jerusalem, commonly called Mount Zion, under the so-called "Cœnaculum," but it cannot be identified with the tomb of David, which was emphatically within the walls (Smith).

Perhaps the best way to understand the family of David will be to study the table on page 253, in which are given his wives, children, and grandchildren, so far as known. The royal line was carried on through a union of the children of Solomon and Absalom (1 Kings 15:2).

9. Character. "If we proceed to put together, in its most general features, the whole picture of David which results from all these historical testimonies, we find the very foundations of his character to be laid in a peculiarly firm and unshaken trust in Jehovah, and the brightest and most spiritual views of the creation and government of the world, together with a constant, tender, and sensitive awe of the Holy One in Israel, a simple, pure striving never to be untrue to him, and the strongest efforts to return to him all the more loyally after errors and transgressions. . . . His mouth continually overflows with heartfelt praise of Jehovah, and his actions are ever redolent of the nobility inspired by a real and living fear of him (for the errors by which he is carried away stand out prominently just because of their rarity). . . . In the clear daylight of Israel's ancient history David furnishes the most brilliant example of the noble elevation of character produced by the old religion" (Ewald, Hist. of Israel, vol. iii, pp. 57, 58).

NOTE.—1 Sam. 13:14. "How," ask some, "could a man after God's own heart have murdered Uriah, and seduced Bath-sheba, and tortured the Ammonites?" An extract from one who is not a too-indulgent critic of sacred characters expresses at once the common sense and the religious lesson of the whole matter. "David, the Hebrew king, had fallen into sins enough—blackest crimes—there was no want of sin. And, thereupon, the unbelievers sneer, and ask, 'Is this your man according to God's heart?' The sneer, I must say, seems to me but a shallow one. What are faults, what are the outward details of a life, if the inner secret of it, the remorse, the temptations, the often-baffled, never-ended struggle of it, be forgotten? All earnest souls will ever discern in it [David's life] the faithful struggle of an earnest human soul toward what is good and best. Struggle often baffled—sore baffled—driven as into entire wreck, yet a struggle never ended, ever with tears, repentance, true unconquerable purpose, begun anew" (Carlyle, Heroes and Hero-worship, 1, 277). 1 Sam. 16:18; 17:42, 56. There seems a contradiction between these two passages, the one representing David as a "mighty, valiant man, and a man of war," the others as "a youth, a stripling." The first description of David "does not presuppose he had already fought bravely in war, but may be perfectly explained from what David himself afterward affirmed respecting his conflicts with lions and bears (17:34, 35). The courage and strength which he then displayed furnished sufficient proofs of heroism for anyone to discern in him the future warrior" (Keil, Com.). 1 Sam. 17:55, sq. How can we reconcile Saul and Abner's ignorance of David, who had been musician and armorbearer to Saul? (16:14, sq.) Keil and Delitzsch (Com.) explain as follows: "The question put by Saul does not presuppose an actual want of acquaintance with the person of David and the name of his father, but only ignorance of the social condition of David's family, with which both Abner and Saul may hitherto have failed to make themselves more fully acquainted." Some explain by saying that after David played before Saul he returned to his home (which appears to be the fact, 18:2), and that his appearance had so changed as to make recognition impossible (Thomson, Land and Book, ii, 366, American ed.). 2 Sam. 5:3. The three anointings of David need give no trouble. The first (1 Sam. 16:13) was a private, prophetic anointing; by the second (2 Sam. 2:4) he was publicly recognized as king over Judah; by the third (2 Sam. 5:3), as king over both Judah and Israel. 2 Sam. 5:6-9. Some see a discrepancy between the fact of the capture of "the stronghold of Zion" and the taking of Goliath's head to Jerusalem (1 Sam. 17:54). Ewald (Hist. of Israel, iii, p. 72) answers, that clearly David did not carry the head to Jerusalem till afterward, when he was king. Keil (Com. on 1 Sam. 17:54) explains that the assertion made by some, that Jerusalem was not yet in possession of the Israelites, rests upon a confusion between the citadel of Jebus upon Zion, which was still in the hands of the Jebusites, and the city of Jerusalem, in which Israelites had dwelt for a long time (Josh. 15:63; Judg. 1:8). 2 Sam. 6:20. The proud daughter of Saul was offended at the fact that the king had on this occasion let himself down to the level of the people. She taunts him with having stripped himself, because while dancing and playing he wore somewhat lighter garments (such as the ordinary priestly garb) instead of the heavy royal mantle (Ewald, Hist. of Israel, iii, p. 127). 2 Sam. 2:41 tells us that God moved David against Israel to say, "Go, number Israel and Judah." In 1 Chron. 21: it is alleged that Satan stood up against Israel, and provoked David to number the people. But the meaning is that God permitted Satan thus to move David in order that through his act an opportunity might arise for the punishment of Israel's sin. The command of David was not sinful in itself, but became so from the spirit of pride and vainglory out of which it originated, and which was shared with him by the people over whom he ruled (Taylor, David, p. 371).

DAVID, CITY OF. 1. The name given by David to the castle of Zion, which he took from the Jebusites, and in which he lived (1 Chron. 11:7). It was on the southwest side of JERUSALEM (q. v.). See also SUPPLEMENT.

2. Bethlehem was called the city of David (Luke 2:4, 11), being the birthplace of the king.

DAY OF ATONEMENT. See FESTIVALS, p. 362.

DAY OF CHRIST, also called "his day," "that day," "the day of the Lord," is the time of the coming again of our Lord. The day of Christ "is the horizon of the entire New Testament, the period of his most decisive manifestation in a glorious revelation of himself which could not be, and is never, predicted of any but a divine person" (1 Cor. 1:8; Phil. 1:6, 10; 2 Thess. 2:2) (Pope, Christ. Theol., iii, 388, sq.).

DAY'S JOURNEY. See METROLOGY, I.

DAYSMAN (Heb. יָוֹךְ, yaw-kakh', to set right), an umpire or arbitrator (Job 9:33), is an old English word derived from day, in the specific sense of a day fixed for a trial. The meaning seems to be that of some one to compose our differences, and the laying on of whose hand expresses power to adjudicate between the two persons. There might be one on a level with Job, the one party; but Job knew of none on a level with the Almighty, the other party (1 Sam. 2:25). Such a mediator we have in Jesus Christ (1 Tim. 2:5). See GLOSSARY.

DAYSPRING (Heb. שֶׁטַח, shakh'-ar, Job 38:12; Gr. ἀνατολή, an-at-ol-ay', Luke 1:78), the first streak of daylight, the dawn; and so the early revelation of God in Christ to the soul.

DAYSTAR (Gr. φωσφόρος, foce-fo'-os, light-bearing, Lat. Lucifer), the planet Venus, the morning star (2 Pet. 1:19). The meaning of the passage is that the prophets were like a lamp, but Christ himself is at least the light of dawn, heralded by the "morning star" (Rev. 2:28; 22:16).

DEACON (Gr. δάκκος, dee-ak'-on-os, of uncertain origin), one who executes the commands of another, a servant.

1. In a general sense the term is applied to the "servant" of a king (Matt. 22:13); ministers (Rom. 13:4; literally, "deacons of God," i. e., those through whom God carries on his administration on earth); Paul and other apostles (1 Cor. 3:5; 2 Cor. 6:3; 1 Thess. 3:2). As teachers of the Christian religion are called "deacons of Christ" in 2 Cor. 11:23; Col. 1:7; 1 Tim. 4:6, Christ is called the "minister (literally, deacon, Rom. 15:8) of the circumcision," as devoting himself to the salvation of the Jews. In addition to this general use of the word it was given a more specific meaning:

2. Officer of the Church. (1) Origin. In the New Testament deacons, or helpers, appear first in the church at Jerusalem. The Hellenistic Christians complained that their widows were neglected in favor of the Hebrew Christians "in the daily ministration" (Acts 6:1). This was a natural consequence of the rapid growth of the society, and of the apostles having more than they could properly attend to. Upon the recommendation of the apostles "seven men of honest report, full of the Holy Ghost and wisdom," were selected and set apart by prayer and laying on of hands. To deacons primarily was assigned the duty of ministering to the poor, and the oversight of temporal affairs of the Christian societies, yet retaining, as in the case of Stephen and Philip, the right to teach and baptize. The qualifications for this office, as enumerated by Paul (1 Tim. 3:8, sq.), were of a nature to fit them for mingling with the Church in most familiar relations, to ascertain and relieve the wants of the poorer members with delicacy, and freedom from temptation to avaricious greed. On offering themselves for their work deacons were to be subject to a strict scrutiny (1 Tim. 3:10). (2) In the early Church. A difference of opinion respecting the function of deacons prevailed in the early Church. Some contended that no spiritual function had been assigned them (Council Constantinople, Can. 18), whereas Ignatius styles them "ministers of the mysteries of Christ." Tertullian classes them with bishops and presbyters as guides and leaders to the laity. They evidently occupied the position of assistants to the higher clergy, exercising the spiritual functions or not, according to the sentiment of the age or wish of those whom they assisted. The deacons, also called Levites, received a different ordination from the presbyters, both as to form and the power it conferred; for in the ordination of a presbyter the presbyters who were present were required to join in the imposition of hands with the bishop, but the ordination of a deacon might be performed by the bishop alone. Duties. The duties of the deacon were: 1. To assist the bishop and presbyter in the service of the sanctuary; especially to care for utensils, etc., of the holy table. 2. In the administration of the Eucharist, to hand the elements to the people, but not to consecrate the elements. 3. To administer the baptism. 4. To receive the offerings of the people. 5. Sometimes, as the bishop's special delegates, to give to the penitents the solemn imposition of hands, the sign of reconciliation. 6. To teach and catechise the catechumens. 7. In the absence of bishop and presbyter to suspend the inferior clergy. In addition there were many minor duties. Deacons often stood in close relations with the bishop, and not infrequently looked upon ordination to the presbyterates as a degradation. The number of deacons varied with the wants of the individual church. The qualifications of a deacon were the same that were required in bishops and presbyters (1 Tim. 3:1, sq.). (3) In the modern Church deacons are found as a distinct order of the clergy in the Roman Catholic, Church of England, Episcopal, Methodist Episcopal, German Protestant Churches. In the main their duties are the same, and consist in helping the clergy in higher orders. In the Presbyterian and Congregational Churches they are laymen, who care for the poor, attend to the temporal affairs of the Church, and act as spiritual helpers to the minister (see Schaff, Hist. Christ. Ch., i, p. 135; Hurst, Hist. Christ. Ch., p. 25; McC. and S., Cyc.).

DEACONESSES, or female helpers, had the care of the poor and the sick among the women of the Church. This office was the most needful on account of the rigid separation of the sexes in that day. Paul mentions Phebe as a deaconess of the church of Cenchrea; and it seems probable that Tryphena, Tryphosa, and Persis, whom he commends for the labor in the Lord were deaconesses (Rom. 16:1, 12).

1. In the Early Church the apostolical constitution distinguished "deaconesses" from "widows" and "virgins," and prescribed their duties. The office of deaconess in the Eastern Church continued down to the 12th century. It was frequently occupied by the widows of clergymen or the wives of bishops, who were obliged to demit the married state before entering upon their sacred office.

2. Qualifications. Piety, discretion, and experience were in any case the indispensable prerequisites in candidates. During the first two centuries the Church more carefully heeded the advice of Paul that the deaconess should have been the wife of one husband, also that the Church should admit to this office only those who had been thoroughly tested by previous trusts, having used hospitality to strangers, washed the saints' feet, relieved the afflicted, diligently followed every good work, etc. (1 Tim. 5:10); but at a later period there was more laxity, and younger and inexperienced women were admitted.

3. Ordination. The question of their ordination has been much debated. They were inducted into their office by the imposition of hands. Of this there is abundant proof. This would not necessarily imply the right to fulfill the sacred functions of the ministry.

4. Duties. The need of such helpers arose from the customs and usages of the ancient world, which forbade the intimate association of the sexes in public assemblies. They were to instruct the female catechumens, to assist in the baptism of women, to anoint with holy oil, to minister to the confessors who were languishing in prison, to care for the women who were in sickness or distress, and sometimes act as doorkeepers in the churches. It is plain that the deaconesses had other duties than those of keepers of the entrances of the church appointed for women, or even as assistants in baptism or instructors of candidates; they were employed in those works of charity and relief where heathen public opinion would not permit the presence of the deacons.

DEAD, BAPTISM FOR THE. See BAPTISM.

DEAD, THE. 1. Egyptian. The great care of the Egyptians was directed to their condition after death. They expected to be received into the company of that being who represented divine goodness if pronounced worthy at the great judgment day; and to be called by his name was the fulfillment of all their wishes. The dead were all equal in rank—king and peasant, the numblest and the hero. Virtue was the ground of admission into the land of the blessed, and reunion with the deity of which he was an emanation, receiving the holy name of Osiris. His body was so bound up as to resemble the mysterious ruler of Amenti (Hades); it bore some of the emblems peculiar to him; and bread, of a form which belonged exclusively to the gods, was given to the deceased in token of his having assumed the character of that deity. Services. These were performed by the priests (of the grade who wore the leopard skin) at the expense of the family. If the sons or relations were of the priestly order they could officiate, and the members of the family had permission to be present. The ceremonies consisted of a sacrifice (incense and libation being also presented) and a prayer. These continued at intervals as long as the family paid for them. The body after EMBALMING (q. v.) was frequently kept in the house, sometimes for months, in order to gratify the feeling of having those who were beloved in life as near as possible after death. The mummy was kept in a movable wooden closet, drawn on a sledge to and from the altar, before which frequent ceremonies were observed. It was during this interval the feasts were held in honor of the dead. Sometimes the mummy was kept in the house because the family were not possessed of a catacomb or they were denied the rites of burial on account of accusations brought against or debt contracted by the dead or his sons. This was considered a great disgrace, only to be removed by the payment of the debt, liberal donations in the service of religion, or the influential prayers of the priests. The form of the ritual read by the priest in pronouncing the acquittal of the dead is preserved in the tombs usually at the entrance passage. In this ritual the deceased is made to enumerate all the sins forbidden by the Egyptian law and to assert his innocence of each, persons of every rank being subjected to this ordeal. Every large city, as Thebes, Memphis, and some others, had its lake, at which the ceremonies were practiced. The Egyptians did not permit the extremes of degradation of the dead that the Jews sometimes allowed; the body of a malefactor, though excluded from the necropolis, was not refused to his friends for burial (Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt., ii, 357 sq.). See SUPPLEMENT.

2. Hebrew. Immediately when life departed it was the office of a friend or son to close the eyes of the dead (Gen. 46:4) and to kiss the face (Gen. 50:1). The body was washed, wrapped in a linen cloth (Matt. 27:59, etc.), or the limbs separately wound with strips of linen (John 11:44), placed in a coffin (Luke 7:14), and if not buried immediately it was laid out in an upper room (2 Kings 4:21; Acts 9:37). (1) The embalming of the dead took place after the Egyptian fashion in the case of Jacob and Joseph (Gen. 50:2, 26), but only imitated by the rich or distinguished so far that they anointed the dead with costly oil (John 12:7) and wound them in linen with spices, especially myrrh and aloes (John 19:39, 40). (2) The burning of bodies occurred to secure them from mutilation (1 Sam. 31:12), in which case the bones were afterward buried (v. 13); or

In times of war, where the multitude of deaths made burial impossible (Amos 6:10); finally, as a punishment inflicted on great criminals (Lev. 20:14; 21:9). The "making of a burning," usual when kings were buried (2 Chron. 16:14; 21:19; Jer. 34:5), was a consuming of sweet-scented substances in honor of the dead. On high state occasions the vessels, bed, and furniture used by the deceased were burnt also. Such was probably the "great burning" made for Asa. If a king was unpopular or died disgraced (2 Chron. 21:19) this was not observed.

(3) Funeral and burial.

Oriental Funeral.

To remain unburied was considered the greatest indignity which could befall the dead (1 Kings 13:22; 16:4; Jer. 7:33, etc.) because the corpse soon became the prey of wild beasts (2 Kings 9:35). The law ordered that criminals should be buried on the day of execution (Deut. 21:23; comp. Josh. 8:29).

The speedy burial of the dead did not prevail in ancient times (Gen. 23:2), but arose when the law made dead bodies a cause of uncleanness (Num. 19:11, sq.; comp. Acts 5:6, 10).

To bury the dead was a special work of affection (Tobit 1:21; 2:8) and an imperative duty of sons toward their parents (Gen. 25:9; 35:29; Matt. 8:21), and next devolved upon relatives and friends (Tobit 14:16). The body was carried to the grave in a coffin, often uncovered, on a bier borne by men, with a retinue of relatives and friends (2 Sam. 3:31; Luke 7:12-14; Acts 5:6, 10), while those prominent because of position, virtue, or good deeds were followed by a vast multitude (Gen. 50:7, 14; 1 Sam. 25:1; 2 Chron. 32:33).

The custom seems to have prevailed, as early as our Lord's life on earth, of having funeral orations at the grave. Even at the funeral of a pauper women chanted the lament, "Alas, the lion; alas, the hero!" or similar words, while great rabbis were wont to bespeak for themselves a warm funeral oration. After the funeral a meal was given (2 Sam. 3:35; Hos. 9:4; Ezek. 24:17, 24), which later became scenes of luxurious display (Josephus, War, ii, 11). See EMBALMING, MOURNING, TOMB.

The word rendered "dead" (Job 26:5; Psa. 88:10; Prov. 2:18; 9:18; 21:16; Isa. 14:9; 26:14, 19) is rav-faw' (Heb. נֶפֶּט), the relaxed, i. e., those who are bodiless in the state after death.

DEAD SEA, THE. 1. Name. In Scripture it is called the Salt Sea (Gen. 14:3; Num. 34:12, etc.), the Sea of the Plain or Arabah (Deut. 3:17; 4:49, etc.), East Sea (Ezek. 47:18; Joel 2:20; Zech. 14:8, A. V. "former"). The name Dead Sea has been applied to it since the 2d century, and it was also called the Asphalt Sea by early writers. See SUPPLEMENT.

2. Location, etc. The Dead Sea lies in the southern end of the Jordan valley, occupying the fifty-three deepest miles, with an average breadth of nine to ten miles. The surface is twelve hundred and ninety feet below the level of the Mediterranean, but the bottom is as deep again, soundings having been taken of thirteen hundred feet in the northeast corner, under the hills of Moab; thence the bed shelves rapidly, till the whole southern end of the sea is only from eight to fourteen feet in depth. These figures vary from year to year, and after a very rainy season the sea will be as much as fifteen feet deeper, and at the southern end more than a mile longer. It is fed by the Jordan and four or five smaller streams, which pour into it six million tons of water a day. It has no outlet, but is relieved by evaporation, often so great as to form very heavy clouds. To this evaporation is due the bitterness of the sea. The streams which feed it are unusually saline, flowing through nitrous soil and fed by sulphurous springs. Chemicals, too, have been found in the waters of the sea, probably introduced by hot springs in the sea bottom. Along the shores are deposits of sulphur and petroleum springs, while the surrounding strata are rich in bituminous matter. At the southeast end a ridge of rock salt, three hundred feet high, runs for five miles, and the bed of the sea appears to be covered with salt crystals. "To all these solid ingredients, precipitated and concentrated by the constant evaporation, the Dead Sea owes its extreme bitterness and buoyancy. While the water of the ocean contains from four to six per cent of solids in solution, the Dead Sea holds from twenty-four to twenty-six per cent. The water is very nauseous to the taste and oily to the touch, leaving upon the skin, when it dries, a thick crust of salt. But it is very brilliant. Its buoyancy is so great that it is difficult to sink the limbs deep enough for swimming."

"Its shore is a low beach of gravel, varied by marl or salt marsh. Twice on the west side the mountain cliffs come down to the water's edge, and on the east coast there is a curious peninsula, El-Lisan (or the Tongue), though the shape is more that of a spurred boot. Ancient beaches of the sea are visible all round it, steep banks from five to fifty feet of stained and greasy marl, very friable, with heaps of rubbish at their feet, and crowned with nothing but their own bare, crumpling brows. Behind these terraces of marl the mountains rise precipitous and barren on either coast. To the east the long range of Moab, at a height of two thousand five hundred to three thousand feet above the shore, is broken only by the great valley of the Arnon. . . . On the west coast the hills touch the water at two points, but elsewhere leave between themselves and the sea the shore already described, sometimes one hundred yards in breadth, sometimes one and a half miles. From behind the highest terrace of marl the hills rise precipitously from two thousand to two thousand five hundred feet."

The prophet Ezekiel (47:1-12) gives a wonderful vision of a stream of water issuing from the temple, and with increasing volume sweeping the lower orders of living things, as animals and plants, denotes the extinction of vital functions, so that their renewal is impossible. With reference to human beings the term is variously defined according to the view held of human nature and life. The answer to the question, "What is death?" depends upon the answer given in the first place to the question, "What is man?" See IMMORTALITY.

Scripture Doctrine. The general teaching of the Scriptures is that man is not only a physical, but also a spiritual being; accordingly death is not the end of human existence, but a change of place or conditions in which conscious existence continues. (1) The doctrine of the future life is less emphatically taught in the Old Testament than in the New. The Old Testament Scriptures, however, frequently refer to death in terms hardown to the Dead Sea and healing its bitter waters, "teaching that there is nothing too sunken, too useless, too doomed, but by the grace of God it may be redeemed, lifted, and made rich with life" (Smith, Hist. Geog., pp. 499-512).

DEAF (Heb. שָׁמֵן, khay-rashé'; Gr. κωφός, kofos, blunted). Moses protected the deaf by a special statute, "Thou shalt not curse the deaf" (Lev. 19:14). This was because the deaf could not hear, and were therefore unable to defend themselves.

Figurative. Deafness is symbolical of inattentiveness or inability (Isa. 29:18; 35:5; Matt. 11:8, etc.).

DEAL. See METROLOGY, p. 718.

DEARTH (Heb. רָעָב, raw-awb', hunger; Gr. λιμός, lee-mos', scarcity), a scarcity of provisions, resulting from failure of rain (1 Kings 17:1), the plague of locusts (Psa. 78:46), or the lack of properly farming the land (Ruth 1:1). See FAMINE.

DEATH. A term which, in its application to monious with that doctrine (Eccles. 12:7; 2 Sam. 12:23; Psa. 73:24; Job 14:14; Isa. 28:12). (2) In the New Testament this dark subject receives special illumination. In many cases essentially the same forms of representation are employed. Death is "a departure," a "being absent from the body," an "unclothing," a "sleep;" but with all is the clear and strong announcement of "life and immortality brought to light through the Gospel" (2 Cor. 5:1-4; John 11:13; 2 Tim. 1:10; 4:6-7, etc.). (3) Death as a human experience, according to the Scriptures, is the result and punishment of sin. "The wages of sin is death." And though the word is often used in a spiritual sense, to denote the ruin wrought in man's spiritual nature by sin, yet in the ordinary physical sense of the word death is declared to have come upon the human race in consequence of sin. No such declaration is made as to the death of lower creatures (Gen. 2:17; 3:19; Rom. 5:12; 6:23; James 1:15). (4) A principal part of Christ's redemptive work is the abolishment of death. This is seen in part in man's present state, in the salvation which Christ effects from sin, which is "the sting of death," and in the taking away of the fear of death from true believers. The complete work of Christ in this respect will appear in the resurrection (2 Tim. 1:10; 1 Cor. 15:22, 57; Heb. 2:14, 15). (5) Man and lower creatures. (1) The Scriptures make a deep distinction between the death of human beings and that of irrational creatures. For the latter it is the natural end of their existence; for the former it is an unnatural experience to which they are reduced because of sin, which is also unnatural. Man was not created to die. (2) The Scriptures nowhere affirm that death did not prevail over the lower creatures before the fall of man. Thus upon this point there is no conflict between the Scriptures and geology. (3) It does not follow, because man was created immortal, that his permanent abiding place was to be this world. The Old Testament Scriptures give two examples of men, Enoch and Elijah, who passed into the other world, but "did not see death." (See Martensen's Christ. Dogm., Watson's Institutes, Pope's Compend. Christ. Theol., Laidlaw's Bible Doctrine Concerning Man).—E. McC.

DEBATE. In addition to the usual meaning of friendly discussion, debate means quarrel, strife; thus, "Ye fast for strife and debate" (Isa. 58:4, R. V. "contention," Heb. מִסְתַּבֵּר, mats-tsaw'). Among evils of the Gentiles given in the Epistle to the Romans (1:29) Paul includes debate; the rendering of Gr. epic, er'-is, wrangling, strife (A. V.). See GLOSSARY.

DEB'IR (Heb. דְּבִיר, deb-eer', sanctuary, place of the oracle).

1. A city in the south of Judah near Hebron, called earlier by the name KIRJATH-SEPHER (q. v.), or Kirjath-sannah (Josh. 15:15, 49; Judg. 1:11). Joshua conquered it from the Anakim (Josh. 10:38, 39; 11:21; 12:13; 15:49). Othniel, the younger brother of Caleb, won the hand of Achsah by leading an attack against Debir (Judg. 1:13; 3:9). Debir is thought to be the same as modern Edh-Dhaheriyeh, "the well on the ridge," south of Hebron.

2. There was another Debir in Gad (Josh. 13:26), not far from Mahanaim, and possibly the same as Lo-debar (2 Sam. 17:27).

3. Also a place called Debir near the valley of Achor, between Jerusalem and Jericho (Josh. 15:7).

4. (Heb. דְּבִיר, deb-eer'), the king of Eglon, in the low country of Judah; one of the five Canaanitish princes who joined the confederacy of Adonizedeck, of Jerusalem, and who were defeated, confined in a cave, and at length hanged by Joshua (Josh. 10:3-23), B. C. after 1170.

DEB'ORAH (Heb. דְּבוֹרָה, deb-o-row', a bee).

1. The nurse of Rebekah (Gen. 35:8), whom she accompanied from the house of Bethuel (24:59). She is only mentioned by name on the occasion of her burial under the oak tree of Beth-el, named in her honor Allon-bachuth (oak of weeping, 35:8).

2. A prophetess, "the wife of Lapidoth," who judged Israel (Judg. 4:4) in connection with Barak, B. C. about 1120. (1) Israel under Jabin. After the death of Ehud the children of Israel fell away from the Lord, and were given into the hands of "Jabin, king of the Canaanites, who reigned in Hazor." He oppressed them severely for twenty years. (2) Delivered by Deborah. At this time Deborah, "the prophetess," dwelt under a palm tree (which bore her name) between Ramah and Beth-el, in Mount Ephraim, and hither the people came to her for judgment. She sent an inspired message to BARAK (q. v.), bidding him assemble ten thousand men of Naphtali and Zebulun at Mount Tabor, for Jehovah would draw Sisera (Jabin's general) and his host to meet him at the river Kishon, and deliver them into his hand. Barak agreed, but only on the condition that Deborah would accompany him. Deborah consented, but assured him that the prize of victory, viz., the defeat of the hostile general, should be taken out of his hand, for Jehovah would sell Sisera into the hand of a woman (Jael). "And the Lord discomfited Sisera, and all his chariots, and all his host, with the edge of the sword before Barak." Sisera, taking refuge in the tent of Heber the Kenite, was slain by his wife, Jael. This success was followed up until Jabin was overthrown, and the land had rest forty years. (3) Song. The victory was celebrated by "The Song of Deborah and Barak," usually regarded as the composition of Deborah (ch. 5), and which even critics of the most skeptical tendency so admit. "One cannot read this remarkable song without coming to the conclusion that the rugged and unformed age of the judges, as we are accustomed to regard it, was animated by a spirit that was far from being merely warlike; and that, under the rough exterior presented to us in the stories of the heroes there were lofty conceptions of God's character and a feeling of consecration on the part of those who led the nation" (Robertson, Early Religion of Israel, p. 18).

DEBT. 1. The rendering of several Hebrew and Greek words, with the general meaning of something due. In the Mosaic law the duty of aiding the poor was strongly emphasized (Deut. 15:7, sq.; comp. Psa. 37:26; Matt. 5:42), but all loans to fellow-Israelites were to be without interest (Deut. 15:2), and usury was looked upon with deepest contempt (Prov. 28:8; Ezek. 18:8, 13, 17, etc.). In any case of debt the creditor was expected to manifest the utmost consideration for the debtor, as a brother Israelite. Written notes of obligation (Deut. 15:2) were, at least after the period of exile, regularly in vogue (Josephus, Ant., xvi, 10, 8; War, ii, 17, 6). The "bonds" mentioned in the parable (Luke 16:6, sq.) may have been written on wax-covered tablets, or parchment, from which the numbers might easily be effaced. Of these "bonds" there were two kinds. The most formal, shetar, was not signed by the debtor, but only by the witnesses, who wrote their names (or marks) immediately below the lines of the document to prevent fraud. Generally it was further attested by the Sanhedrin of three, and contained the names of creditor and debtor, the amount owing, and the date, together with a clause attaching the property of the debtor. In fact, it was a kind of mortgage. When the debt was paid the legal obligation was simply returned to the debtor; if paid in part, either a new bond was written or a receipt given. The bond mentioned in the parable was different, being merely an acknowledgment of debt for purchases made, and was signed only by the debtor, witnesses being dispensed with.

2. Regulations Respecting Debtors. The creditor might secure what was due him by means of a mortgage, pledge, or bondsman. (1) If a pledge was to be taken for a debt the creditor was not allowed to enter the debtor's house and take what he pleased, but was to wait without (Deut. 24:10, 11; comp. Job 22:6; 24:7-9). (2) A mill or millstone, or an upper garment received as a pledge was not to be kept over night. These appear to be only examples of those things which the debtor could not, without great inconvenience, dispense with (Exod. 22:26, 27; Deut. 24:6, 12). (3) A debt could not be exacted during the Sabbath year (Deut. 15:1-15), but at other times the creditor might seize, first, the hereditary land, to be held until the year of jubilee; or, secondly, the debtor's house, which could be sold in perpetuity, unless redeemed within a year (Lev. 25:25-33). Thirdly, the debtor might be sold, with wife and children, as hired servants (not slaves) until the jubilee (Lev. 25:39-41). (4) A person becoming bondsman or surety was liable in the same way as the original debtor (Prov. 11:15; 17:13).

DECALOGUE (Gr. Δεκάλογος, dek-al'-og-os).

1. Name. Decalogue is the name by which the Greek fathers designated "the Ten Commandments," which were written by God on tables of stone and given to Moses on Mount Sinai. In Hebrew the name is "ten words" (דְּבָרִים עֲשָׂרִים, hnd-deh-baw-ream' as-eh'-reth, Exod. 34:28; Deut. 4:13; 10:4). It is also called "the moral law," "the tables of testimony" (Exod. 34:29), "the tables of the covenant" (Deut. 9:9), and "the covenant" (Deut. 4:13). In the New Testament it is called "the commandments" (ἐντολαί, en-to-la'hee, Matt. 19:17, sq.; Rom. 13:9; 1 Tim. 1:9, 10, et al.).

2. Versions. There are two versions of the Decalogue given in the Pentateuch. The first is contained in Exod. 20, and the second in Deut. 5. These are substantially and almost verbally identical, excepting that the reasons given for the observance of the fourth commandment are not the same. In Exodus the reason is based on our obligations to God as the Creator (Gen. 2:3). In Deuteronomy the reason assigned is our duty to others and the memory of the bondage in Egypt. This variation has led many to the belief that the original law was simply "Remember the Sabbath day, to keep it holy." It may, however, be the fact that the form as it stands in Exodus is the divine original, but that Moses in reviewing the law just before his adieu to his people adds a fresh and fuller significance which the history of Israel suggested.

3. Nature. The Decalogue is a statement of the terms of the covenant which God made with his chosen people; and in this respect is to be distinguished from the elaborate system of law known as the Mosaic. The vast legal system of Israel, civil, criminal, judicial, and ecclesiastical, was framed after the covenant law, not with a view of expanding it, but to enforce it. As Fairbain suggests, its chief object was to secure through the instrumentality of the magistrate, that if the proper love should fail to influence the hearts and lives of the people, still the right should be maintained. The elaborate system was designed as an educator, to lead the people into the great principles of life embodied in the Decalogue and afterward exhibited in Christ. It was only a temporary expedient to achieve a given end, while the Decalogue is a statement of principles to continue for all time.

This unique place of the Decalogue is seen in the circumstance of its delivery. While all the rest of the law was given by God through the lips of Moses, this was spoken by God himself, and with an awful display of splendor and solemnity never before witnessed (Exod. 19). It appears also that angels were active in the promulgation of the law (Deut. 33:2, 3; Psa. 68:18; Acts 7:53; Gal. 3:19; Heb. 2:2). In addition to that these laws were written by God's own finger, and on durable tables of stone (Deut. 9:1). In the symbolism of the East the stone signified the perpetuity of the law written upon it. Written on both sides, it meant the completeness of the code.

Still another fact marks the unique place of the Decalogue. The tables of stone were put in the most sacred place in the world. In the tabernacle, in the "holy of holies," in the ark of the covenant. Thus they were plainly recognized as containing in themselves the sum and substance of what was held to be strictly required by the covenant.

4. Contents. That the Decalogue contains the essential principles of the moral law, and is therefore of permanent obligation, is affirmed in the New Testament. Jesus held it up as the perfect code. When the young man asked him the way of attaining eternal life, Jesus quoted from the Decalogue and told him to obey it and live (Mark 10:19; Luke 18:18-20). And again, after assenting to the two features of the Decalogue as the very essence of the law, he said, "This do, and thou shalt live" (Mark 12:28; Luke 10:28).

In his dispute with the Pharisees the chief point at issue was this: They exalted the minor law, the ceremonial observance, and threw the duties inculcated in the Ten Commandments in the background; he brought the Decalogue forward and gave it its true place. So did the apostles (Rom. 13:9). In the protracted discussion concerning the law, all Paul's examples are taken from these tables, or what they clearly forbade or required.

5. Source. The foundation and source of the moral law is God's character. "I am the Lord thy God, which brought thee out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of bondage," is the way the Decalogue is introduced. The Hebrew name here used (Everlasting Eternal Almighty) intimates that the principles of law have their standing in the character of God. "I am . . . thou shalt." That is the connection. And it is that that makes the moral law so awful in its unchangeable majesty. It is law because God is. It cannot be changed without changing the character of Jehovah himself. Right is what it is, because God is what he is, and therefore is as unchangeable as God.

The fact that God has placed the law of his own character on man is proof that man is capable of the divine. Expressing as it does man's true nature, to vary from its requirements is to fall below the dignity of true manhood. In this sense the Decalogue is, as the reformers taught, identical with the "eternal law of nature."

6. Prohibitory. The Decalogue is a series of prohibitions. The negative form is due to the shocking depravity of those to whom it was addressed. A prohibition means a disposition to do the thing prohibited. If men were not inclined to worship something other than God the first commandment would not be needed. If there was no murder in men's hearts the sixth commandment would not be required. And so of all the laws. Paul says, "The law was added because of transgressions." The law is put in the negative form for another reason, viz., the law can only restrain the act. It cannot implant the positive virtue. Statutory law may restrain and regulate actions. It cannot transform the sinful heart. It is of necessity negative.

7. Divisions. The Ten Commandments are not numbered in the sacred text, and the Church has been divided as to how the division should be made. There are three general modes of division attempted: (1) That which the reformed churches have adopted, and which is called the Philonic division. It makes Exod. 20:2, 3 the first commandment, vers. 4-6 the second, and v. 7 the third. This division is supported by the following reasons: (a) It is made on the principle that polytheism and idolatry are identical. (b) There are three ways of dishonoring God—in denying his unity, his spirituality, and his deity. (c) It divides the two tables into three and seven laws; three having a mystical reference to God, and seven to the Church. (d) It obviates the need of making the unnatural division of the commandment against covetousness into two. (2) The second division is called the Augustinian, and unites vers. 3-6 into one commandment; and divides the commandment concerning covetousness into two. By this method the Roman Church supported the legitimacy of sacred images which were not worshiped. (3) The third, or the Talmudic division, makes Exod. 20:2 the first commandment, and vers. 3-6 the second.

8. Order. The order in which these laws were written on the two tables of stone is not a matter of grave consideration. If the division were equal, as many think, then the law concerning honor to parents is exalted to a high rank, associated as it is with our duty to honor God. But even without a numerical equality of the two tables the division is philosophical. Our duties to God come first—his being, his worship, his name, and his day. Then come our duties to our fellow-men. They have their beginning in the home. Then they reach out beyond the home circle to all mankind, having regard, first, for our neighbor's life; second, to his wife; third, to his property; fourth, to his position. Finally, the tenth commandment touches the spring of all moral completeness, the desire of the heart. It is really the intent of the heart that determines the moral character of the act. It cannot be reached by human legislation. It exposes to the conscience the utter failure of an act that might otherwise be blameless. It was this law that brought Paul with all his righteousness under sentence of condemnation (Rom. 7:7).

The two tables are summarized in the two great laws, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy strength, and with all thy mind; and thy neighbor as thyself."—A. H. T.

DECAPOLIS (Gr. Δεκάπολις, dek-ap'-ol-is, ten cities), a district containing ten cities in the north-eastern part of Galilee, near the Sea of Galilee (Matt. 4:25; Mark 5:20; 7:31).

The cities were Scythopolis, Hippos, Gadara, Pella, Philadelphia, Gerasa, Dion, Canatha, Raphana, and Damascus. Damascus is the only one now entitled to the name of city. They were built originally by the followers of Alexander the Great, and rebuilt by the Romans in B. C. 65, by whom they had certain privileges conferred upon them.

DECISION, VALLEY OF, a figurative name (Joel 3:14) for the valley of JEHOSEPHAT (q. v.). The prophet gives in this passage a description of the nations streaming into the valley of judgment; following it with that of the appearance of Jehovah upon Zion in the terrible glory of the judge of the world, and as a refuge of his people.

DECREE, the rendering of a number of Hebrew and Greek words, sometimes translated "law," "edict." The enactments of kings in the East were proclaimed publicly by criers (Jer. 34: 8, 9; Jonah 3:5-7) who are designated in Dan. 3: 4; 5:29, by the term karoza, the herald. Messengers, sent for that purpose, carried them to distant provinces, towns, and cities (1 Sam. 11:7; Ezra 1: 1; Amos 4:5), and they were publicly announced at the gate of the city, or other public place. In Jerusalem they were announced in the temple, where large numbers of people assembled, for which reason the prophets often uttered their prophecies there.

DE'DAN (Heb. דַּדָּן, ded-awn', meaning doubtful).

1. A son of Raamah, son of Cush (Gen. 10:7; 1 Chron. 1:9).

2. A son of Jokshan, son of Abraham and Keturah (Gen. 25:3; 1 Chron. 1:32). The usual opinion respecting these founders of tribes is that they first settled among the sons of Cush, wherever these latter may be placed; the second, on the Syrian borders, about the territory of Edom. But Gesenius and Winer have suggested that the name may apply to one tribe; and this may be adopted as probable on the supposition that the descendants of the Keturahite Dedan intermarried with those of the Cushite Dedan, whom the writer places, presumptively, on the borders of the Persian Gulf. The theory of this mixed descent gains weight from the fact that in each case the brother of Dedan is named Sheba. The passages in the Bible in which Dedan is mentioned (besides the genealogies above referred to) are contained

In the prophecies of Isaiah (21:13), Jeremiah (25:23; 49:8), and Ezekiel (25:13; 27:15, 20; 38:13), and are in every case obscure. The probable inferences from these mentions of Dedan are: (1) That Dedan, son of Raamah, settled on the shores of the Persian Gulf, and his descendants became caravan merchants between that coast and Palestine. (2) That Jokshan, or a son of Jokshan, by intermarriage with the Cushite Dedan, formed a tribe of the same name, which appears to have had its chief settlement in the borders of Idumea, and perhaps to have led a pastoral life. A native indication of the name is presumed to exist in the island of Dadan, on the borders of the gulf (Smith).

DEDANIM. See DEDAN.

DEDICATE (Heb. קָדַשׁ, khaw-nak', to initiate; קָדַשׁ, kaw-dash', to pronounce clean), a religious service whereby anything is dedicated or consecrated to the service of God; as the dedication of the tabernacle for Moses (Exod. 40; Num. 7); the altar (Num. 7:84, 88); the temple, by Solomon (1 Kings 8); the temple, by the returned exiles (Ezra 6:16, 17); the temple built by Herod (Josephus, Ant., xv, 11, 6) (see TEMPLE). Dedicatory solemnities were observed with respect to cities, walls, gates, and private houses (Deut. 20:5; Psa. 30, title; Neh. 12:27). The custom still lingers in the dedication of churches, "opening" of roads, bridges, etc.

DEDICATION, FEAST OF. See FESTIVALS, p. 367.

DEEP. See LAND.

DEEP, the rendering of several Hebrew and Greek words, used to denote: (1) The grave or abyss (Rom. 10:7; Luke 8:31); (2) The deepest part of the sea (Psa. 69:15; 107:24, 26); Chaos, existing at creation (Gen. 1:2); (4) Hell, the place of punishment (Luke 8:31; Rev. 9:1; 11:7).

DEFILE, the rendering of several Hebrew and Greek words, generally meaning uncleanness, in a figurative or ceremonial sense. Many blemishes of person and conduct were, under the Mosaic law, esteemed as defilements. Under the Gospel moral defilement is specially emphasized (Matt. 15:18; Rom. 1:24). See UNCLEANNESS.

DEGREE (Heb. מַעְלָה, mah-al-aw', a step). This term is used of a group of Levites "of the second degree" (1 Chron. 15:18) in the sense of rank or order of enumeration. David, in the expression, "Thou hast regarded me according to the estate of a man of high degree" (1 Chron. 17:17), seems to mean, "Thou hast visited me in reference to my elevation." In Psa. 62:9 "degree" is evidently used in the sense of condition or rank, as also in Luke 1:52 and James 1:9 (Gr. ταπεινός, tap-i-nos, depressed, humiliated). In 1 Tim. 3:13 (Gr. βαθμός, bath-mos) the meaning is position (or "standing," R. V.). In reference to degree as applied to measurement, see DIAL.

DEGREES, SONG OF (Heb. שִׁיר הַמַּעְלָה, sheer ham-mah-al-loth', song of steps), a title given to each of the fifteen psalms from 120 to 134 inclusive. Four of them are attributed to David, one is ascribed to the pen of Solomon, and the other ten give no indication of their author.

The opinion held by Rosenmüller, Herder, and others is that some of the psalms were written before the Babylonish captivity, some by exiles returning to Palestine, and a few at a later date; but that all were incorporated into one collection because they had one and the same character. With respect to the term rendered in the A. V. "degrees," a great diversity of opinion prevails among biblical critics. According to some it refers to the melody to which the psalm was to be chanted. Others, including Gesenius, derive the word from the poetical composition of the song and from the circumstance that the concluding words of the preceding sentence are often repeated at the commencement of the next verse (comp. 121:4, 5, and 124:1, 2 and 3, 4).

A good instance of the "step" style is found in Psa. 121: "I will lift mine eyes unto the hills, from whence cometh my help. My help cometh from the Lord, which made heaven and earth."

Aben-Ezra quotes an ancient authority, which maintains that the degrees allude to the fifteen steps which, in the temple of Jerusalem, led from the court of the women to that of the men, and on each of which steps one of the fifteen songs of degrees was chanted. The generally accredited opinion, however, is that they were pilgrim songs sung by the people as they went up to Jerusalem.

DEHA'VITES (Heb. דְּהַאֲוִי, deh-haw-yay', or דְּהַאֲוִי, deh-haw-vay', Ezra 4:9 only; R. V. "Dehaites"), one of the tribes transported by the king of Assyria to "the cities of Samaria" at the time of the captivity of Israel, B. C. 721. As they are named in connection with the Susanchites, or Susianans, and the Elamites they may be the widely diffused Aryan Dai, or Dahi, mentioned by Herodotus i, 125, among the nomadic tribes of Persia (Δάοι, Μάρδοι, Δροπικοί, Σαγάρτιοι) (Smith, Bib. Dict., s. v.).

If Dai were transported by the Assyrians to Samaria it must have been a small detached section of the tribe analogous to the Hitrites of southern Palestine. The Δάοι of Herodotus, the Dahæ of Pliny and Virgil, were a warlike and "numerous nomad tribe who wandered over the steppes to the east of the Caspian. Strabo has grouped them with the Sacæ and Massagetæ as the great Scythian tribes of inner Asia to the north of Bactriana." In the time of Alexander and later they were found about the rivers Oxus and Jaxartes. The name also appears in the vicinity of the Sea of Azof and of the river Danube. But all these places are far beyond the horizon of Assyria, nor can we find that the Assyrians ever mention such a race. On the whole, we incline to regard the identification as an interesting suggestion rather than an established fact.—W. H.

DEHORT. See GLOSSARY.

DE'KAR (Heb. דְּקָר, deh'-ker, stab), the father of Solomon's purveyor in the second royal district, lying in the western part of the hill country of Judah and Benjamin, Shaalvim and Beth-shemesh (1 Kings 4:9), B. C. before 960.

DELAI'AH (Heb. דְּלַיָּה, del-aw-yaw', freed by Jehovah).

1. One of the sons of Elioenai, a descendant of the royal line from Zerubbabel (1 Chron. 3:24), where the name is Anglicized Dalaiah. He probably belongs to the tenth generation before Christ (see Strong's Harmony of the Gospels, p. 17), B. C. about 300.

2. The head of the twenty-third division of the priestly order in the arrangement by David (1 Chron. 24:18), B. C. about 960.

3. "Children of Delaiah" were among those that returned to Zerubbabel from certain parts of the Assyrian dominions, but who had lost the genealogical records (Ezra 2:60; Neh. 7:62), B. C. 536.

4. The son of Mehetabel and father of the Shemaiah who advised Nehemiah to escape into the temple from the threats of Sanballat (Neh. 6:10), B. C. 445.

5. A son of Shemaiah and one of the princes to whom Jeremiah's first roll of prophecy was read (Jer. 36:12). He afterward vainly interceded with the king (Jehoiakim) to spare the roll from the flames (v. 25), B. C. 606.

DELICATE. See GLOSSARY.

DELI'LAH (Heb. דִּלְיָלָה, del-ee-law', languishing, lustful), a courtesan who dwelt in the valley of Sorek, beloved by Samson (Judg. 16:4-18), B. C. about 1060. Samson was inveigled by her into revealing the secret of his strength and the means by which he might be overcome. To this she was bribed by the lords of the Philistines, who gave her the large sum of eleven hundred pieces of silver for her services. She was probably a Philistine, and one who used her personal charms for political ends.

DELUGE. See FLOOD.

DE'MAS (Gr. Δημάς, day-mas'), a companion of St. Paul (called by him his fellow-laborer in Philem. 24; see also Col. 4:14) during his first imprisonment at Rome. At a later period (2 Tim. 4:10) we find him mentioned as having deserted the apostle through love of this present world, and gone to Thessalonica, A. D. 66.

DEME'TRIUS (Gr. Δημήτριος, day-may'-tree-os).

1. A silversmith of Ephesus, who made "silver shrines for Diana" (Acts 19:24), i. e., probably, silver models of the temple or of its chapel, in which, perhaps, a little image of the goddess was placed. These, it seems, were purchased by foreigners, who either could not perform their devotions at the temple itself, or who, after having done so, carried them away as memorials or for purposes of worship. Demetrius, becoming alarmed at the progress of the Gospel under the preaching of Paul, assembled his fellow-craftsmen, and excited a tumult by haranguing them on the danger that threatened the worship of Diana, and, consequently, the profits of their craft. The tumult was quieted by the tact and boldness of the town-clerk, and Paul departed for Macedonia, A. D. (perhaps autumn) 55.

2. A Christian mentioned with commendation in 3 John 12, A. D. about 90. Further than this nothing is known of him.

DEMON (Gr. δαίμων, dah'-ee-mohn, and its derivative δαίμωνιον, dahce-mon'-ee-on). Once in the New Testament (Acts 17:18, A. V. "gods") used for deity, but usually inferior spiritual beings, angels who "kept not their first estate" (Matt. 25:41; Rev. 12:7, 9); the ministers of the devil (Luke 4:35; 9:1, 42; John 10:21, etc.). Satan is called the "prince of the devils" (Matt. 9:34; 12:24; Mark 3:22; Luke 11:15; Gr. ἀρχοντι τῶν δαιμονίων). Demons are said to enter into (the body of) one to vex him with diseases (Luke 8:30, 32, sq.; Matt. 9:33; 17:18; Luke 4:35, 41, etc.). A person was thought to be possessed by a demon when he suffered from some exceptionally severe disease (Luke 4:33; 8:27); or acted and spoke as though mad (Matt. 11:18; Luke 7:33; John 7:20, etc.). According to a Jewish opinion which passed over to the Christians, demons are the gods of the Gentiles and the authors of idolatry. Paul, teaching that the gods of the Gentiles are a fiction (1 Cor. 8:10, sq.), makes the real existences answering to the heathen conceptions of the gods to be demons, to whom he says they really sacrifice (1 Cor. 10:20); according to 1 Tim. 4:1 pernicious errors are disseminated by demons. They are represented as "reserved in everlasting chains under darkness unto the judgment of the great day" (Jude 6; comp. 2 Pet. 2:4).

DEMONIAC (Gr. δαιμονίωμα, dahce-mon-id'-zom-ahce, to be under the power of a demon, rendered "possessed with a devil"), a term frequently used in New Testament of one under the influence of a demon. The verb "to be demonized" occurs, in one form or another, seven times in Matthew, four times in Mark, once in Luke, and once in John.

1. Nature. By some, demoniacs are thought to have been "persons afflicted with especially severe diseases, either bodily or mental (such as paralysis, blindness, deafness, loss of speech, epilepsy, melancholy, insanity, etc.), whose bodies, in the opinion of the Jews, demons had entered." But the evidence seems to us sufficient to accept the theory of actual possession by spirits. "The demonized were incapable of separating their own consciousness and ideas from the influence of the demon, their own identity being merged, and to that extent lost, in that of their tormentors. In this respect the demonized state was also kindred to madness" (Edersheim, Life of Jesus, i, p. 608).

(1) The evangelists constantly distinguish between demoniacal possession and all forms of mere disease, although sometimes occurring together. Thus, he "cast out the spirits . . . and healed all that were sick" (Matt. 8:16); they "brought unto him all sick people . . . and those which were possessed with devils, and those which were lunatic" (4:24); "they brought unto him all that were diseased, and them that were possessed with devils" (Mark 1:32; comp. verse 34). Here "lunatics" are specially distinguished from demoniacs. Matthew (9:32, 33) keeps the possession distinct from the dumbness with which he was also afflicted. Jesus called his disciples "together, and gave them power and authority over all devils, and to cure diseases" (Luke 9:1; comp. Matt. 10:1). In Mark 6:13 "they cast out many devils, and anointed with oil many that were sick, and healed them" (see Mark 3:15; Luke 6:17, 18).

(2) The evangelists constantly assert that the actions and utterances in demoniacal possessions were those of the evil spirits. The demons are the actual agents in the cases. Such statements are many: "The unclean spirits cried, saying," etc. (Mark 3:11); "the devils besought him" (Matt. 8:31); "when the unclean spirit had torn him, and cried with a loud voice, he came out of him" (Mark 1:26; Luke 4:35). Similar in their tenor are Mark 9:20-26; Luke 9:42; 8:2; Acts 5:16. (3) Not mere disease. Some of the facts recorded are not compatible with any theory of mere disease, bodily or mental. One of these insuperable facts is found in the case recorded by three evangelists (Matt. 8; Mark 5; Luke 8), where the devils asked and received from Christ permission to pass from the demoniac into the herd of swine, and are declared to have done so, with the results there set forth. Again, there is the habitual assertion of Christ's divinity by these spirits and our Lord's recognition of the fact, while as yet not only the people, but the disciples did not know and characterize him, e. g., "I know thee who thou art, the Holy One of God" (Mark 1:24; Luke 4:34); "What have we to do with thee, Jesus, thou Son of God?" (Matt. 8:29; comp. Luke 4:41; Mark 3:11). That this was a genuine recognition, so understood by our Saviour, appears in this same passage; for "he straitly charged them that they should not make him known." Mark says (1:34) he "suffered not the devils to speak, because they knew him;" and Luke (4:41), "he rebuking them suffered them not to speak: for they knew that he was Christ." Epilepsy, lunacy, insanity, do not meet these several facts. Alford calls attention to a sort of double consciousness indicated in some of these cases, the utterance seeming to come now from the man and not from the evil spirit. In Acts 19:13-17 we find a distinction between "the evil spirit" who said, "Jesus I know, and Paul I know; but who are ye?" and "the man in whom the evil spirit was," who leaped on the sons of Sceva and overcame them. (4) Jesus and demoniacs. Jesus treated cases of demoniacal possession as realities. "He is not only described as 'charging,' 'rebuking,' 'commanding,' and 'casting out' the unclean spirits, but his direct addresses to them are recorded. Thus (Mark 5:8-12; Matt. 8:29-32), 'he [Jesus] said unto him, Come out of the man, thou unclean spirit. And he asked him, What is thy name? And he [the unclean spirit] answered, My name is Legion: for we are many. . . . And all the devils besought him, saying, If thou cast us out, suffer us to go away into the herd of swine. And he said unto them, Go.' Again (Mark 1:25; Luke 4:34), he directly addressed the unclean spirit: 'Hold thy peace, and come out of him.' Was this all a show and a pretense on his part? He went further yet, for he deliberately argued with the Jews on the assumption of the reality of demoniacal possession, affirming that his casting out devils by the Spirit of God proved that the kingdom of God had come unto them (Matt. 12:23-27; Luke 11:17-23). Questioned as to their inability to cast out an evil spirit Jesus replied, 'This kind can come forth by nothing, but by prayer and fasting' (Mark 9:29). When the seventy returned and said to him with joy, 'Lord, even the devils are subject to us through thy name,' his answer was to the same effect: 'I beheld Satan as lightning fall from heaven.' We are further informed (Mark 3:14, 15) that in the solemn act of calling and appointing the apostles 'he ordained twelve, that they should be with him, and that he might send them forth to preach, and to cast out devils.' Was he trifling with his chosen messengers?' (President Bartlett, in Independent, February 14, 1889.)

2. Cure. "The New Testament furnishes the fullest details as to the manner in which demoniacs were set free. This was always the same. It consisted neither in magical means nor formulas of exorcism, but always in the word of power which Jesus spake or intrusted to his disciples, and which the demons always obeyed. In one respect those who were demonized exhibited the same phenomenon: they all owned the power of Jesus" (Edersheim, Life of Jesus, i, p. 480, sq.).

DEN. The rendering of one Greek and several Hebrew words, meaning a lair of wild beasts (Job 37:8; Psa. 10:9; 104:22; Isa. 32:14); a hole of a venomous reptile (Isa. 11:8); a fissure in the rocks, caves used for hiding (Judg. 6:2; Heb. 11:38; Rev. 6:15), or resort for thieves (Matt. 21:13; Mark 11:17; Luke 19:46). For "Den of Lions" see DANIEL.

DENARIUS. See METROLOGY, IV.

DENIAL. 1. Heb. שָׁקַר, kaw-khash', to be untrue, disown (Josh. 24:27; Prov. 30:9).

2. Gr. ἀρνησασθαι, ap-ar-neh'-om-ah-ee, to affirm that one has no acquaintance or connection with another; of Peter denying Christ (Matt. 26:34, sq., 75; Mark 14:30, sq., 72; Luke 22:34, 61); to deny one's self, to lose sight of one's self and one's own interests (Matt. 16:24; Mark 8:34; Luke 9:23).

3. Gr. ἀρνεσθαι, ar-neh'-om-ah-ee, to deny an assertion (Mark 14:70) or event (Acts 4:16); to deny with accusative of the person is used of followers of Jesus who, for fear of death or persecution, deny that Jesus is their master and desert his cause (Matt. 10:33; Luke 12:9; 2 Tim. 2:12); and, on the other hand, of Jesus denying that one is his follower (Matt. 10:33; 2 Tim. 2:12). "Denying" God and Christ is used of those who, by cherishing and disseminating pernicious doctrines and immorality, are adjudged to have apostatized from God and Christ (2 Pet. 2:1; 1 John 2:22, 23; Jude 4). "Denying ungodliness and worldly lusts" (Tit. 2:12) is to abjure, renounce.

Self-denial, in the scriptural sense, is the renouncing of all those pleasures, profits, views, connections, or practices that are prejudicial to the true interests of the soul. The understanding must be so far denied as to lean upon it in preference to divine instruction (Prov. 3:5, 6); the will must be denied so far as it opposes the will of God (Eph. 5:17); the affections when they become inordinate (Col. 3:5); the physical nature must be denied when opposed to righteousness (Rom. 6:12, 13); position (Heb. 11:24-26), pecuniary gain (Matt. 4:20-22), friends and relatives (Gen. 12:1) must be renounced if they stand in the way of religion and usefulness. One's own righteousness must be relinquished, so as not to depend upon it (Phil. 3:8, 9); even life itself must be laid down if called for in the cause of Christ (Matt. 16:24, 25).

DENIAL OF CHRIST. See PETER.

DENOUNCE. See GLOSSARY.

DEPOSIT. See PROPERTY, OFFENSES AGAINST.

DEPRAVITY. In theology the term depravity denotes the sinfulness of man's nature. See SIN, ORIGINAL.

DEPTH. See DEEP.

DEPUTY. the rendering of several words:

1. Nits-tsawb' (Heb. נִיטְסָאָב, appointed), a prefect; one set over others. This word is rendered "officer," or chief of the commissariat appointed by Solomon (1 Kings 4:5, etc.).

2. Peh-khaw' (Heb. פֶּחְכָּו, Esth. 8:9; 9:3; R. V. "governor"), the Persian prefect "on this side" (i. e., west of) the Euphrates; modern form, pasha.

3. Anth-oo'-pat-os (Gr. ἀνθιπάτος, in lieu of any one), a proconsul. The emperor Augustus divided the Roman provinces into senatorial and imperial. The former were presided over by proconsuls appointed by the senate; the latter were administered by legates of the emperor, sometimes called propretors (Acts 13:7, 8, 12; 18:12). GLOSSARY.

DERBE (Gr. Δέρβη, der'-bay), a small town at the foot of Mount Taurus, about sixteen miles east of Lystra. Paul and Barnabas gained many converts here; possibly among them was Gaius (Acts 14:6, 20; 20:4). Paul passed through the place on his second missionary journey (16:1).

DESCRY. See GLOSSARY.

DESERT is scarcely distinguished in ordinary language from wilderness, and in the English Bible the terms are used indiscriminately. In one place we find a Hebrew term treated as a proper name, and in another translated as a common name.

1. Mid-bawr' (Heb. מִדְבָּר, pasture; Exod. 3:1; 5:1, etc.), usually rendered "wilderness" (Gen. 14:6, etc.), and applied to the country between Palestine and Egypt, including Sinai (Num. 9:5). When used with the article midbauer denotes the wilderness of Arabia (1 Kings 9:18). Such pasture land in the East is very often an extensive plain or steppe, which during the drought and heat of summer becomes utterly parched and bare; so that the transition from pasture land to desert was quite easy and natural. That the word comprehends both meanings, see Psa. 65:13; Joel 2:22. But in many, and indeed the greater number of passages, the ideal of sterility is the prominent one (Gen. 14:6; 16:7; Deut. 11:24, etc.). In the poetical books "desert" is found as the translation of midbauer (Deut. 32:10; Job 24:5; Isa. 21:1; Jer. 25:24).

2. Ar-aw-baw' (Heb. אֲרָבָה, sterility; rendered "desert" in Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel; elsewhere usually "plain"). While this term primarily meant plain, it was not in the sense of pasture, but rather that of hollow or level ground, and especially the level of the Jordan valley, extending to the Red Sea (Deut. 1:1; 2:8; Josh. 12:1; hence also "sea of the Arabah" or "desert," Deut. 4:49; viz., the Dead Sea). In the East wide, extended plains are liable to drought and consequent barrenness; hence the Hebrew language describes a plain, a desert, and an unfruitful waste by the same word.

3. Yesh-ee-mone' (Heb. יְשִׁעִימוֹן, desolation; rendered "wilderness," Deut. 32:10; Psa. 68:7; "solitary," Psa. 107:4) is used with the definite article apparently to denote the waste tract on both sides of the Dead Sea. In such cases it is treated as a proper name in the A. V.; thus "the top of Pisgah, which looketh toward Jeshimon" (Num. 21:20). This term expresses a greater extent of uncultivated country than the others (1 Sam. 23:19, 24; Isa. 43:19, 20).

4. Khor-baw' (Heb. חֲרוֹבָה, desolation) is generally applied to what has been made desolate by man or neglect (Ezra 9:9; Psa. 109:10; Dan. 9:12). The only passage where it expresses a natural waste or "wilderness" is Isa. 48:21, where it refers to Sinai. It is rendered "desert" only in Psa. 102:6; Isa. 48:21; Ezek. 13:4. The Greek word in the New Testament (ἐρημος, er'-ay-mos) has the general meaning of solitary, uninhabited, and is sometimes rendered "wilderness."

Figurative. "Desert" or wilderness is used in Scripture as the symbol of temptation, solitude, and persecution (Isa. 27:10; 33:9); of nations ignorant or neglectful of God (32:16; 35:1); of Israel when they had forsaken God (40:3). The desert was supposed to be inhabited by evil spirits, or at least occasionally visited by them (Matt. 12:43; Luke 11:24).

DESIRE. See GLOSSARY.

DESIRE OF ALL NATIONS (literally, the delight or costly of all the nations) is an expression (Hag. 2:7) understood by most of the earlier commentators as a title of the Messiah. Khem-daw' (Heb. חֶמְדָּאֵם, desire) is the valuable possessions of the heathen, their gold and silver (v. 8), and the thought is that the shaking will be followed by this result, or produce this effect, that all that is valuable will come to fill the temple with glory.

DESOLATION, ABOMINATION OF. See ABOMINATION.

DESPITE, DESPITEFUL. See GLOSSARY.

DESTROYER (Heb. מַשְׁחֵחַת, mash-kheeth', an exterminator, Exod. 12:23), the agent employed in the slaying of the firstborn (Heb. 11:28; Gr. ὁ ἀλοθρῆναυ, hō hol-oth-rysoo'-on), the angel or messenger of God (2 Sam. 24:15, 16; 2 Kings 19:35; Psa. 78:49; Acts 12:23).

DESTRUCTION (Heb. אֲבֵדוֹן, ab-ad-done', a perishing, Job 26:6; 31:12; Psa. 88:11; Prov. 15:11) means a place of destruction, abyss, and is nearly equivalent to SHEOL (q. v.).

DESTRUCTION, CITY OF. See ON.

DEUEL (Heb. דְּעֻיָּל, deh-oo-ale', known of God), father of Eliasaph, the "captain" of the tribe of Gad at the time of the numbering of the people at Sinai (Num. 1:14; 7:42, 47; 10:20), B. C. about 1209. The same man is mentioned again (2:14), but here the name appears as Renel, owing to an interchange of the two very similar Hebrew letters, ד and ר.

DEVIL (Gr. διάβολος, dee-ab'-ol-os, accuser).

1. One who slanders another for the purpose of injury, a calumniator, e. g., a gossip monger (1 Tim. 3:11; 2 Tim. 3:3; Tit. 2:3).

2. "Devil" is the rendering of the Heb. שָׂטָן, sau-er', hairy (Lev. 17:7), a "goat," or "satyr" (Isa. 13:21; 34:14). These were supposed to be spirits that inhabited the desert, and whose pernicious influence was sought to be averted by sacrifice. The Israelites brought this superstition and the idolatry to which it gave rise from Egypt, where goats were worshiped as gods. These were the gods whom the Israelites worshiped in Egypt (Josh. 24:14; Ezek. 20:7; 23:3, 8, 9, etc.).

3. In Deut. 32:17; Psa. 106:37, the term rendered "devil" is shade (Heb. שָׂדֵי, demon), and means an idol; since the Jews regarded idols as demons that caused themselves to be worshiped by men.

4. "The Scriptures associate with the evil in humanity an empire which is not human, but which has invaded humanity, and as the prince of this empire they point to a created but lofty spirit, who has fallen from God and man, and has power to show this enmity in action." See SATAN.

DEVOTED THING. See ANATHEMA.

DEVOTION. See GLOSSARY.

DEW (Heb. טַל, tal). "The dews of Syrian nights are excessive; on many mornings it looks as if there had been heavy rains, and this is the sole slackening of the drought which the land feels from May till October" (Smith, Hist. Geog., p. 65) (Judg. 6:38; Cant. 5:2; Dan. 4:15, sq.). This partial refreshment of the ground is of great value, and would alone explain all the oriental references to the effect of dew. Thus it is coupled as a blessing with rain, or mentioned as a source of fertility (Gen. 27:28; Deut. 33:13; Zech. 8:12), and its withdrawal is considered a curse (2 Sam. 1:21; 1 Kings 17:1; Hag. 1:10).

Figurative. Dew in the Scriptures is a symbol of the beneficent power of God, which quickens, revives, and invigorates the objects of nature when they have been parched by the burning heat of the sun (Prov. 19:12; Hos. 14:5). The silent, irresistible, and rapid descent of dew is used to symbolize the sudden onset of an enemy (2 Sam. 17:12). "The dew of thy youth" (Psa. 110:3) is thought to be a figure of abiding youthful vigor. Dew is a token of exposure in the night (Cant. 5:2; Dan. 4:15, etc.); the symbol of something evanescent (Hos. 6:4; 13:3); and, from its noiseless descent and refreshing influence, the emblem of brotherly love and harmony (Psa. 133:3).

DIADEM. The rendering in the A. V. of several Hebrew words:

1. Tsaw-nee' (שָׂמֶרֶת, something wound about the head), spoken of the turban of men (Job 29:14), of women (Isa. 3:23, "hood"), of the high priest (Zech. 3:5), and the tiara of a king (Isa. 62:3).

2. Tsef-ee-raw' (צִפְרֵיָה, circlet, Isa. 28:5), a royal tiara.

3. Mits-nel'-feth (מִצְנֶפֶת, Ezek. 21:26) does not mean the royal diadem, like tsaw-nee', but the tiara of the high priest, as it does in every instance in the Pentateuch, from which Ezekiel has taken the word.

The difference in Greek between diadem (διάδημα) and crown (στέφανος) is carefully observed. The latter is a crown in the sense of a chaplet, wreath, or garland; the "badge of victory in the games, of civic worth, of military valor, of nuptial joy, of festal gladness." Diadem is a crown as the badge of royalty.

What the "diadem" of the Jews was we know not. That of other nations of antiquity was a fillet of silk, two inches broad, bound around the head and tied behind, the invention of which is attributed to Liber. Its color was generally white; sometimes, however, it was blue, like that of Darius, and it was sown with pearls or other gems (Zech. 9:16; comp. Mal. 3:17).

DIAL (דָּלָל, mah-al-aw', step), for the measurement of time, erected by Ahaz (2 Kings 20:11; Isa. 38:8), and called the "steps of Ahaz." As mah-al-aw' may signify either one of a flight of steps or degree, we might suppose the reference to be a dial plate with a gnomon indicator; but, in the first place, the expression points to an actual succession of steps, that is to say, to an obelisk upon a square or circular elevation ascended by steps, which threw the shadow of its highest point at noon upon the highest steps, and in the morning and evening upon the lowest, either on the one side or the other, so that the obelisk itself served as a gnomon. The step dial of Ahaz may have consisted of twenty steps or more, which measured the time of day by half hours, or even quarters. If the sign was given an hour before sunset the shadow, by going back ten steps of half an hour each, would return to the point at which it stood at twelve o'clock. When it is stated that "the sun returned," this does not mean the sun in the heaven, but the sun upon the sundial, upon which the illumined surface moved upward as the shadow retreated, for when the shadow moved back the sun moved back as well. The event is intended to be represented as a miracle, and a miracle it really was (Delitzsch, Com., on Isa. 38:7, 8).

DIAMOND. See MINERAL KINGDOM.

DIANA. See GODS, FALSE.

DIB'LAIM (Heb. דִּבְלַיִם, dib-lah'-yim, cakes [of dried figs?]), the name of the father of Gomer, the wife of Hosea (Hos. 1:3), B. C. about 750.

DIB'LATH, properly DIB'LAH (Heb. דִּבְלָה, dib-law'), a place named only in Ezek. 6:14, as if situated at one of the extremities of the land of Israel. It is natural to infer that Diblah was in the north. The only name in the north at all like it is Riblah, and the letters D and R are so much alike in Hebrew and so frequently interchanged, owing to the carelessness of copyists, that there is a strong probability that Riblah is the right reading.

DY'BON (Heb. דִּיבּוֹן, or דִּיבּוֹן, dee-bone', pinning).

1. A town on the east side of Jordan, in the rich pastoral country, which was taken possession of and rebuilt by the children of Gad (Num. 32:3, 34). From this circumstance it possibly received the name of Dibon-gad. Its first mention is in the ancient fragment of poetry (Num. 21:30), and from this it appears to have belonged originally to the Moabites. We find Dibon counted to Reuben in the lists of Joshua (13:9, 17). In the time of Isaiah and Jeremiah, however, it was again in possession of Moab (Isa. 15:2; Jer. 48:18, 22; comp. 24). In the same denunciations of Isaiah it appears, probably, under the name of Dimon. In modern times the name Dhibān has been discovered by Seetzen, Irby and Mangles, and Burckhardt as attached to extensive ruins on the Roman road, about three miles N. of the Arnon (Wady Modjeb).

Dr. Tristram (Land of Moab, pp. 132, 133) says: "Dibon is a twin city upon the two adjacent knolls, the ruins covering not only the top, but the sides to their base."

2. One of the towns which was reinhabited by the men of Judah after the return from captivity (Neh. 11:25). From its mention with Jekabzeel, Moladah, and other towns of the south there can be no doubt that it is identical with DIMONAH (q. v.).

DIBON-GAD, one of the halting places of the Israelites (Num. 33:45, 46). It was, no doubt, the same place which is generally called DIBON, 1.

DIB'RI (Heb. דִּבְרֵי, dib-ree', perhaps eloquent), a Danite, father of Shelomith, a woman whose son was stoned to death by command of Moses for blaspheming the name of the Lord (Lev. 24:11), B. C. 1209.

DIDRACHM. See METROLOGY, IV.

DIDYMUS (Gr. Δίδυμος, did'-oo-mos, twin), a surname (John 11:16, etc.) of the apostle Thomas.

DIE THE DEATH. See GLOSSARY.

DLET (Heb. דִּלְתָי, ar-oo-khaw', the term applied to the daily allowance apportioned by Evil-merodach, king of Babylon, to his royal captive, Jehoiachin, king of Judah (Jer. 52:34). Respecting the general use of the word see Food.

DIGNITIES (Gr. plural of δόξα, dox'-ah, glory), persons higher in honor (2 Pet. 2:10; Jude 8), probably angels as being spiritual beings of pre-eminent dignity.

DIK'LAH (Heb. דִּיקְלָה, dik-law', perhaps a palm tree), the name of a son of Joktan (Gen. 10:27; 1 Chron. 1:21). His descendants probably settled in Yemen and occupied a portion of it a little to the east of the Hejaz.

DIL'EAN (Heb. דִּילְעָנָה, dil-amm'), a town in the low country of Judah (Josh. 15:38). Identification uncertain.

DILIGENCE, DILIGENTLY. See GLOSSARY.

DILL, marginal and correct rendering (Matt. 23:23) of Gr. ἀνίθον, an'-ay-thon, translated in the text "anise." See VEGETABLE KINGDOM.

DIM'NAH (Heb. דִּמְנָה, dim-naw', dunghill), a Levitical city in Zebulun (Josh. 21:35). In 1 Chron. 6:77 Rimmon is substituted for it.

DIMON, THE WATERS OF (Heb. דִּימוֹן, dee-mone'), some stream on the east of the Dead Sea, in the land of Moab, against which Isaiah is here uttering denunciations (Isa. 15:9). Gesenius conjectures that the two names Dimon and Dibon are the same.

DIMON'NAH (Heb. דִּימוֹן־נָחַ, dee-mo-naw'), a city in the south of Judah (Josh. 15:22), perhaps the same as Dibon in Neh. 11:25.

DINAH (Heb. דִּינָה, dee-naw', justice), the daughter of Jacob by Leah (Gen. 30:21), and full sister of Simeon and Levi. While Jacob dwelt in Shechem Dinah was seduced by Shechem, the son of Hamor, the chief of the country. She was probably at this time about thirteen or fifteen years of age, the ordinary period of marriage in the East. Shechem proposed to make the usual reparation by paying a sum to the father and marrying her (Deut. 22:28, 29), but Jacob declined to negotiate until he had made known the facts to his sons and advised with them. Hamor proposed a fusion of the two peoples by the establishment of intermarriage and commerce. The sons, bent upon revenge, demanded, as a condition of the proposed union, the circumcision of the Shechemites. They assented, and on the third day, when the people were disabled, Simeon and Levi slew them all and took away their sister (Gen. 34). Dinah probably continued unmarried and went with her father into Egypt (46:15), B. C. about 1640.

DINAITE (Heb. דִּינָיִי, dee-nah'ee), a name given to a part of the colonists placed in Samaria after it was taken by the Assyrians (Ezra 4:9). "They remained under the dominion of Persia, and took part with their fellow-colonists in opposition to the Jews under Artaxerxes, but nothing more is known of them" (Smith, Bib. Dict., s. v.).

This is the usual understanding. Hoffmann, however, regards it as an official title, "judges" (דִּינָיִי, "judges," Ezra 7:25).

DINE, DINNER. See EATING, FOOD.

DINHABAH (Heb. דִּינְחָבָה, din-haw-baw', robbers' den), a city of Bela, king of Edom (Gen. 36:32; 1 Chron. 1:43). Location uncertain.

DIONYSIUS THE AREOPAGITE (Gr. Διονύσιος, dee-on-oo'-see-os, reveller, Acts 17:19-34), an eminent Athenian converted to Christianity by the preaching of Paul on Mars' Hill. Nothing further is related of him in the New Testament, but Suidas recounts that he was an Athenian by birth and eminent for his literary attainments; that he studied first at Athens and afterward at Heliopolis, in Egypt. The name of Dionysius has become important in Church history from certain writings formerly believed to be his, but now known to be spurious and designated as the Pseudo-Dionysian writings (McC. and S., Cyc., s. v.).

DIOTREPES (Gr. Διοτρεπής, dee-ot-ref-ace', love-nourished), a person condemned by the apostle John in his third epistle. Desiring pre-eminence, he refused to see the letter sent by John, thereby declining to submit to his directions or acknowledge his authority. He circulated malicious slanders against the apostle and exercised an arbitrary and pernicious influence in the Church (3 John 9, 10).

DISALLOW. See GLOSSARY, VOW.

DISCERNING OF SPIRITS, a spiritual gift enjoyed by certain in the apostolic age. This enabled its possessor to judge from what spirits the utterances they heard proceeded, whether the Holy Ghost, human or demonic spirits; thus preserving the Church from misled influences (1 Cor. 12:10; comp. 1 Cor. 14:29; 1 John 4:1).

DISCIPLE. 1. This term occurs once in the Old Testament, as the rendering of Heb. לַמְדֵי, lim-mood', one instructed, Isa. 8:16; rendered "learned" in 50:4, "taught" in 54:13.

2. In the New Testament it is the rendering of the Gr. μαθητής, math-ay-tace', learner, and occurs frequently. The meaning is one who professes to have learned certain principles from another and maintains them on that other's authority. It is applied principally to the followers of Jesus (Matt. 5:1; 8:21, etc.); sometimes to those of John the Baptist (Matt. 9:14) and of the Pharisees (Matt. 22:16). It is used in a special manner to indicate the twelve (Matt. 10:1; 11:1; 20:17).

DISEASES.

In treating this subject we call attention to the several diseases mentioned in Scripture, and to their treatment. Under the latter we introduce medicine, physician, remedies, etc.:

AGUE (Heb. קַדַּחִים, kad-dakh'-ath, Lev. 26:16, R. V. "fever"). This is doubtless generic for all the fevers of the land. They are intermittent, remittent, typhoid, typhus, besides the febrile states accompanying the various inflammations and the exanthemata. Malarial fevers are the most characteristic. They prevail especially in late summer and early autumn. In the swamps of the Hûleh and the irrigated gardens about the cities very malignant types of these fevers attack those who sleep in the foci of infection and those who work in the poisonous atmosphere. Not infrequently patients die in the second or third paroxysm of such fevers. When they do not die from the violence of the poison they often drag on through weary months of constantly recurring attacks and suffer from congestion or abscess of the liver or spleen and other internal disorders.

BLAINS and BOILS (Heb. אֲבִצְעוֹת, ab-ah-boo-aw'; ; שֶׁחַחִים, shekh-em', Exod. 9:9, 10). These are of several kinds: (1) Simple boils, which may be single or come out in large numbers and successive crops (Job 2:7), causing much suffering and some danger to the patient. They consist in a core, which is a gangrenous bit of skin and subcutaneous tissue, surrounded by an angry, inflamed, and suppurating nodule, which finally bursts and lets out the core, after which the seat of the boil heals, leaving a permanent scar. (2) Carbuncles. These are very large boils, with a number of openings, leading to a considerable mass of dead cellular tissue and giving exit to the discharge of the same. Such was probably Hezekiah's boil (2 Kings 20:7; Isa. 38:21). (3) Malignant pustules. These are due to infection from animals having splenic fever. The virus is carried by insects or in wool or hides or otherwise, and produces a black spot where it enters, surrounded by a dark livid purplish or dusky red zone, with vesicles and a hard area of skin infiltrated with anthrax bacilli. If the focus of the disease be not destroyed the blood is rapidly poisoned and the patient dies. (4) Probably all skin diseases in which there is suppuration in and beneath the cutis would have been included in the generic designation boils.

BLEMISH (Lev. 21:18-21, the rendering of several Hebrew words), any deformity or spot. Such disqualified their possessor from becoming a priest.

BLINDNESS (Heb. יָרֵבֶּ, iv-vaw-ron', Deut. 28:28, etc.). Eye affections are among the most common of all the diseases of Bible lands. Ophthalmia and other destructive diseases prevail to a frightful extent in Egypt. Among the lower classes it is, perhaps, the exception to see both eyes perfect. A very large proportion of the population has lost one eye, and the number of totally blind is excessive. While the ravages of eye diseases are not so frightful in Palestine and Syria they are sufficiently so to illustrate the very frequent (more than sixty times) references to blindness in the Bible. The causes are the heat, sunlight, dust, and, most of all, the uncleanly habits of the people, all of which favor the spread of diseases, which often in a single day destroy the eye.

BOILS. See BLAINS.

BOTCH (Heb. שֶׁחַחִים, shekh-eeen', burning, Deut. 28:27, 35, R. V. "boil"), another rendering of the word elsewhere translated "boil."

BROKEN-HANDED, BROKEN-FOOTED (Lev. 21:19), a disqualification for the priesthood. Clubfoot and clubhand would also disqualify.

BRUISES (Isa. 1:6; Jer. 30:12; Nah. 3:19, several Hebrew words), familiar accidents, often far more serious than would be supposed from their external marks.

CANKER (2 Tim. 2:17, A. V. marg., R. V. "gangrene;" Gr. γάγγραινα, gang'-grah-ee nah). The terrible disease, cancer, for which no remedy exists but the knife, is quite prevalent in the East, especially the form of it known as epithelioma. The sufferer from all forms of cancer has more or less acute pain, and ultimately ulceration, and, exhausted by bleeding or suppuration, at length dies worn out with its unspeakable agony. But this rendering, although it would suit the requisitions of the passage, is not the true one. See GANGRENE.

CHILDBEARING (Gen. 3:16; 1 Tim. 2:15). The only helpers to women in this condition are the ignorant midwives. Many valuable lives are lost through their incompetence and mismanagement. See CHILD, 2.

CROOKBACKED (Heb. גִּבְבָּנִים, gib-bane', arched, Lev. 21:20). In the East it is quite common to see young girls carrying children on their shoulders, or perched on their hips. Many of these fall and experience irreparable injuries to their spines. Scrofulous disease of the spine is also very common and often results in angular curvature. The specimens of deformity of this class, which are to be seen by every wayside in Syria and Palestine, are lamentable. Those afflicted with such deformities were not allowed in the temple service.

DROPSY (Gr. ἰδρωπικός, hoo-dro-pik-os', watery, Luke 14:2). This is a symptom of a number of diseases, mostly of the heart, liver, kidneys, and brain, causing collections of water in the cavities of the body, or on its surface, or in the limbs. It is curable only if the disease causing it is amenable to treatment.

DWARF. Dwarfs were not allowed in the priesthood (Lev. 21:20).

EMERODS (Heb. עֲפָלָה, o'-fel, tumor, Deut. 28:27, etc.), a painful disease, especially promoted by the sedentary habits of the orientals, and hence very common there. Although amenable to the advanced skill of the West, the popular medicine of the East has no cure for it. It was, therefore, a very terrible visitation (1 Sam. 5:6, 9, 12; 6:4, 5, 11).

FLAT NOSE (Heb. קְרָחַת, khaw-ram', to be blunt, Lev. 21:18), a disqualification for the priesthood.

FLUX (Gr. δυσεντερία, doos-en-ter-ee'-ah). The "bloody flux" (Acts 28:8) was, no doubt, dysentery. This disease is very common in the East, and often fatal, not merely by its own violence, but by the abscess of the liver which it frequently causes. It is supposed that the disease of the bowels (2 Chron. 21:15, 19) with which Jehoram was smitten was the advanced state of this disease, causing an invagination and proclentia.

GANGRENE (R. V., 2 Tim. 2:17, for A. V. "canker"), mortification of any part of the body. The reference is probably to the variety known as senile gangrene. This disease begins at the end of a toe or finger, as a blackish spot, which gradually spreads over the rest of the toe, then to the other toes, and the foot, and leg, until at last the patient dies of blood poisoning. Even early and free amputation generally fails to save life, as the disease is in the constitution, and reappears in the stump. This course of the destructive process corresponds well with that of profane and vain babblings which (v. 16) "increase" (R. V. "proceed further") unto more ungodliness. See CANKER.

HALT (Gr. χωλός, kho-los', limping, Luke 14:21; John 5:3), lame, whether from rigidity, or amputation, or deformity.

IMPOTENT (John 5:3), a general term for disabled.

INFIRMITY, a word used in the A. V. in three senses: (1) Impurity (Lev. 12:2, R. V. "impurity"). (2) Deformity (Luke 13:11). (3) A general term for disability (John 5:5; 1 Tim. 5:23). Besides these senses it is used figuratively for mental and spiritual weaknesses (Rom. 8:26, etc.).

INFLAMMATION, a general and well-understood term (Lev. 13:28; Deut. 28:22).

ISSUE, a word used medically in three senses: (1) Offspring (Gen. 48:6). (2) A flowing of blood (Lev. 12:7; Matt. 9:20, etc.). (3) Other discharges (Lev. 15:2). These discharges rendered their victim unclean.

ITCH (Heb. קִצְוֹן, kheh'-res, Deut. 28:27). It is probable that the word translated "itch" in this passage refers to some other tormenting skin disease, as eczema or prurigo, while that translated A. V. "scab," R. V. "scurvy" (Heb. garabh, Arab. jarab), is the true itch. Jarab is the classical name of this disease, and used for it also in common speech to this day (see SCURVY). Itch is a skin disease produced by the entrance of a parasitic insect into the substance of the skin. It causes intolerable itching, and the scratching produces deep furrows and excoriations. If left to itself it is interminable. Although curable by proper medical treatment, this was probably unknown to the Hebrews.

LAMENESS, impairment or loss of power in walking. It was a barrier to the priestly office (Lev. 21:18).

LEPROSY (Heb. טַרְסָנָא, tsaw-rah'-ath). Much confusion has arisen in the interpretation of the scriptural allusions to leprosy, from the fact that this word is used in English for a disease, elephantiasis Græcorum, wholly different in its symptoms, course, and termination from the Levitical and New Testament leprosy. The former is a constitutional, incurable, hereditary, more or less contagious disease, which sometimes begins with numbness of the extremities, with or without pain. There are dusky and livid swellings, and distortions of the hands and feet; nodules are formed in various parts of the body; ulcers open on the soles of the feet or at the ball of the heel. These extend to the bones, which become carious, and, as the ulceration spreads, the patient becomes more or less crippled. Tubercles are produced on the face, and folds of skin are raised on the forehead and cheeks, which give the so-called leonine expression to the countenance. Fever sets in, and ultimately the patient, often after a long and miserable life, succumbs. This disease may be the "boil" (A. V., Deut. 28:35, R. V. "boil") "in the knees and legs," and "from the sole of the foot to the crown of the head."

The biblical leprosy is a whiteness (Exod. 4:6) which disfigured its victim, but did not disable him. Naaman was able to exercise the functions of general of the Syrian army, although a leper. Both Old Testament and New Testament lepers went about everywhere. Leprosy is described in Leviticus as a white spot, spreading or disappearing, sometimes with a reddish base, or as raw spots. A victim of this superficial, scaly disease (lepra, or psoriasis) was unclean only as long as the affection was partial. Once the whole body was covered he was clean, and could enter the temple (Lev. 13:12, 17).

The allusion to a boil (Lev. 13:18-28), with inflamed margins and whitened hairs, may refer to an Aleppo burton, ending at its margin in a psoriasis, or a lupoid affection, which spreads for some distance around. This is quite common in the East. Levitical leprosy is self-terminable (Lev. 13:46). Elephantiasis Græcorum is neither curable, nor does it wear itself out.

The secret of the ceremonial uncleanness of persons with the various forms of tetter, eczema, lepra simplex, psoriasis, etc., is the piebald and mottled appearance, not the disease, for, as before said, a man wholly covered with the eruption was clean. When the lepers were cured by Christ the cure was called cleansing (Matt. 10:8; 11:5; Luke 7:22; 17:14). The victims were neither lame nor deformed. They were never brought on beds. The Mosaic law was full of prohibitions in regard to that which was not simple and uniform. A mottled or piebald animal could not be offered. A priest could not wear a patched or many-colored garment. Fungous growths on walls, mildew on clothes, were accounted leprosy, and made the tainted objects unclean. In this case surely it was the mottled blotched appearance that was objected to. The aim of the law was to inculcate by object lessons purity, simplicity, unity. When these objects were attained by uniformity in the eruption, even of leprosy, all over the body of the patient, he ceased to be ceremonially a leper. This disposes at once of the idea that scriptural lepers were isolated hygienically, as the victims of elephantiasis Græcorum are, lest they should infect others. For when perfectly leprosy they were free to go where they would. (See, for a complete elaboration of this argument, Sunday School Teacher, London, May, 1880, pp. 183-188.)

LUNACY (Matt. 4:24; 17:15). See MADNESS.

MADNESS (Heb. מַדְוֶה, shig-gaw-one', raving, Deut. 28:28). Madmen are twice mentioned (1 Sam. 21:15; Prov. 26:18). Insanity is much more rare in the East than in the West. This is doubtless due to the freedom from the strain which so severely tests the endurance of the more active minds of the Japhetic stock. Little or no treatment is used. It is considered a merit to feed and clothe the insane if needy.

MAIMED (Luke 14:21), a general term for severely injured.

MURRAIN (Heb. דֶּבֶר, deh'-ber, pestilence). We have no means of knowing what the epidemic was which constituted the fifth plague (Exod. 9:1-6). It may have been splenic fever, which sometimes prevails extensively.

PALSY (Gr. παραλυτικός, par-al-oo-tee-kos', loosened). Paralysis comes from several causes: (1) Inflammation of the brain or spinal cord. This in the East is specially common in infancy, and in many cases leads to partial paralysis, as of the shoulder, arm, one or both legs, and sometimes the nerve of speech or hearing, or both. (2) Injuries of the spinal column. These are more apt to occur in adult life. (3) Pressure from curvature of the spine, or from tumors or other cause. (4) Apoplexy. The paralysis from the latter cause is sometimes cured. That from the others is incurable. The cases brought to our Saviour were undoubtedly of the incurable sort, and probably involved at least the lower limbs.

PESTILENCE (Heb. דֶּבֶר, dsh'-ber; Gr. λοιμός, loy-mos', plague), a general term for diseases which attack large numbers of persons at the same time. They are not known to be due to organic germs. We have no means of knowing what particular pestilences from time to time scourged the Israelites.

SCAB (Heb. for מַדְוֶה, saw-fakh', Lev. 13:2, 6, 7; 14:56). The same root appears in the form of a verb (Isa. 3:17), sippah, to afflict with a scab. Both refer to the crust which forms on a skin eruption. Such are common in many skin diseases and do not indicate any particular kind. Many diseases of the scalp produce them and cause the hair at the same time to fall out. This is regarded as a special calamity for women (Isa. 3:17). The term yallepheth (Lev. 21:20; 22:22), A. V. "scabbed," refers to some crustaceous disease of the skin of animals. The disease of horses, in which there is a scabby, eczematous state of the pastern, known in English as "scratches," is called jarab (itch) in Arabic.

SCALL (Lev. 13:30, 35; 14:54), a somewhat general term for eruptions.

SCURVY (R. V., Deut. 28:27, for A. V. "scab"). We have given our reasons under Itch for preferring the rendering itch for the Heb. garabh here, instead of for herex, as in A. V., R. V. We do not see any reason to render it with R. V. "scurvy." Nor do we think the rendering of the same word (Lev. 21:20; 22:22), A. V., R. V., "scurvy" any better. Itch is its proper rendering. This would remove scurvy from the list of diseases mentioned in Scriptures.

SORES (Isa. 1:6; Luke 16:20; Rev. 16:11), a general term for ulcers.

WEN (Heb. יָבֵל, yab-bale'), a cyst containing sebaceous and other matters, spoken of only in connection with animals intended for sacrifice (Lev. 22:22), but also common in men.

WITHERED (Heb. יָבֵשׁ, yaw-bashe'). The Nazarite's skin is spoken of as withered (Lam. 4:8), i. e., wrinkled and dry. A "withered hand" (Matt. 12:10, etc.; comp. 1 Kings 13:4-6) is one in which the muscles, and often the bones themselves, are shrunken, owing to loss of nerve power or stiffening of joints. Not infrequently the limb is much shorter, as well as more slender, than natural. When resulting from anything but recent disease it is incurable.

WOUNDS are frequently alluded to. The binding up and pouring in oil and wine (Luke 10:34) was as good antiseptic treatment as was then known.

WORMS. The worms which ate Herod (Acts 12:23) may have been maggots bred in some gangrenous sore.

TREATMENT OF DISEASES.

The Hebrews were greatly inferior to their powerful neighbors of Egypt, Assyria, and Greece in scientific culture. We have no allusion in the Old Testament to scientific schools, and it is improbable that such existed. There were schools for the education of religious teachers, but we have no reason to believe that anything was taught in them except the Hebrew language itself and the various branches of canon law and interpretation. While their neighbors were evolving and cultivating mathematics, astronomy, history, logic, metaphysics, law, and medicine, and their learned men were committing to inscribed bricks, stone, papyrus rolls, and books full treatises on all that they knew, the ancient Hebrews have not left us a single fragment of literature or science except the canonical Scriptures and the Apocrypha. Only by the most laborious search can we find in these Scriptures hints as to the scientific belief and practice which the Hebrews may have derived from their residence in Egypt and intercourse with their more enlightened and progressive rivals. The Talmud, the function of which was to gather up all that tradition had transmitted, and expound it by all that the ingenuity of its astute authors could furnish, does nothing to change our judgment that the Hebrews had little or no notion of the movement of the human mind which was taking place in other lands.

We have no reason to suppose that medicine affords any exception to the general state of the sciences among the Hebrews. It is exceedingly difficult to establish from the Bible the existence of such a science or of a proper order of medical practitioners in the earlier stages of Hebrew history. The allusions to the offices of the midwives (Gen. 35:17; 38:27-30; Exod. 1:15) give us no reason to suppose that they were an educated class, or had any knowledge of the art of accouchement greater than is possessed by their successors in Syria at the present day. There is nowhere in Scripture an intimation that a physician assisted at a confinement. The simple operation of circumcision was probably performed by heads of families or their dependents (Gen. 17:10-14; 34:24), or even women (Exod. 4:25). The law provided that one who injured another should "pay for the loss of his time and cause him to be thoroughly healed" (Exod. 21:19). But this "causing to be healed" does not state nor necessarily imply a physician. Physicians embalmed Jacob (Gen. 50:2), but they were Egyptians, not Hebrews. Job mentions physicians (13:4). Even so late as the time of Joram (850 B. C.), although he returned to Jezreel to be healed of wounds and sickness (2 Kings 8:29), no mention is made of doctors. It is uncertain whether Asa's physicians (2 Chron. 16:12, 915 B. C.) were natives or foreigners. The poetical allusion (Jer. 8:22, B. C. 626) is in the form of a question, "Is there no balm in Gilead? is there no physician there?" While it implies that physicians were then recognized as a guild, it does not make it certain that they were more than users of balsams and ointments for wounds. A few passages in Proverbs and one in Ecclesiastes have been quoted to prove that Solomon was versed in medicine (Prov. 3:8; 12:18; 17:22; 20:30; 29:1; Eccles. 3:3); but such an interpretation is quite fanciful. The allusions to diseases and remedies also tend to show that the conceptions of medicine were crude and popular. Of the diseases and deformities mentioned in the Hexateuch we know ague, blains, boils, botch, bruises, crookback, dwarf, emeroths, flat nose, haltness, infirmity, inflammation, issue, itch, lameness, madness, wen, wound. Yet the most cursory glance at these terms shows that they are popular, not scientific. The "running issue" (Lev. 15:2, R. V. "issue out of his flesh"), "scab" (Deut. 28:27, R. V. "scurvy"), "scall" (Lev. 13:30), "leprosy" (Lev. 13:15), both of persons and things, "pestilence" (Exod. 5:3, etc.), "murrein" (Exod. 9:3), are uncertain. Of the treatment of these, except ceremonial and sacerdotal, we have not the faintest hint. The few remedies mentioned are evidently popular ones, as mandrakes, balm; or ingredients in unguents used for sacred purposes, not for healing, as calamus, cassia, cinnamon, myrrh, galbanum, onycha, stacte, frankincense; or condiments, as coriander.

Thus for the period of Hebrew history to the end of the Old Testament the Scripture reveals hardly a trace of medical science or art. This seems remarkable, considering the long residence of Israel in Egypt, where medicine was well established and cultivated to a high degree of excellence for those days. The Egyptians, owing to the practice of embalming, were well acquainted with human anatomy, as well as with that of the domestic animals. They also had a system of pathology and a considerable materia medica. They cultivated medicine to the point of dividing it into specialties as in modern times. But the Israelites in Egypt were a race of illiterate slaves, and there is no reason to believe that any of them except Moses carried away any of the learning of Egypt. Although a considerable number of hygienic precepts exist in the Mosaic law, as circumcision, burying of excrements, etc. (Deut. 23:13), it is a strained interpretation to refer them to the medical knowledge or skill of the lawgiver. There was a tendency in all serious sickness to fall back on the religious ritual, and ultimately on the divine providence (Exod. 15:26; Psa. 103:3; 147:3; Isa. 30:26; Jer. 17:14; 30:17). When Asa "sought not to the Lord, but to the physicians" (2 Chron. 16:12), the record speaks reproachfully. It is impossible to tell whether his diseased and swollen feet were dropsical or elephantiasical.

In the time of Christ the Jews had become enlightened by contact with Egypt, Babylon, Greece, and Rome. They certainly cultivated philosophy, law, and medicine. In the New Testament are mentioned dropsy, canker (cancer, or better gangrene), bloody flux (dysentery), palsy, and lunacy. Physicians were a regular profession (Matt. 9:12; Mark 2:17; Luke 4:23; 5:31). Luke was the "beloved physician" (Col. 4:14). Physicians were numerous (Mark 5:26; Luke 8:43). They doubtless practiced according to the system then in vogue in the Greek and Roman world. But the vast number of the unrelieved stands out on every page of the gospels and gives to the ministry of Christ its peculiar hold on the people. A brief survey of the methods of treatment followed in the East, wherever the influence of western science and art have not transformed them, will give a graphic impression of the state of medicine in biblical times.

The thing which most strikes a stranger in the management of the sick in the East is the gathering of friends from far and near in the sick chamber. It is evident that this was the custom in our Saviour's time. There seem to have been numerous witnesses to every miracle of healing, and the fame of his power was thus the more speedily and widely spread.

Fever is treated by bloodletting, often very zopious. Barbers are accustomed to perform this simple operation, as they were in Europe until recent times. Indiscriminate bloodletting has only disappeared from modern medicine within the last forty years. But in the East it continues to be considered the sheet anchor of the healing art. Where blood is not taken from a vein large numbers of leeches are applied, and the flow of blood is favored by poultices. Scarifying is also practiced with great vigor, and the skin over an inflamed part is often scored with hundreds of cross-hatches. Inflammations are also treated with poultices, hot fomentations, or cold applications, often with snow. When the inflamed part has suppurated it is lanced, often by a barber or an uneducated quack. Tents made of a roll of rag or paper are introduced to favor the flow of matter. Chronic inflammations are treated by scarification, liniments, but especially by firing with a hot iron. Immense scars, caused by this heroic treatment, often gridiron the abdomen and chest and the neighborhood of the large joints. Setons, issues, and blisters are also freely employed, especially in the treatment of eye diseases and internal inflammations.

Mineral springs, especially the thermal ones at Callirhoë, M'Kes, and Tiberias, have a great reputation in the treatment of chronic rheumatism, gout, skin diseases, and rigidity of joints. Even the Bedouins resort to these springs. Anah was noted for finding "the hot springs (Gen. 36:24, R. V.; not, as in A. V., 'mules') in the wilderness." Such a name would give a man a reputation among the nomads to-day. The hot-air bath at Abu-Rabâh, northeast of Hems, is much visited by the Arabs. The ruins of an immense khân surround the blowhole of the bath.

Diarrhœas and dysenteries are little understood and little treated by the people. In a case of diarrhœa arising from an overloaded stomach they rightly administer emetics and cathartics. They have a very imperfect idea of the diet suitable to these cases.

Acute chest diseases, as pneumonia and pleurisy, are treated by sangrado methods. Consumption, fortunately not so common as in Europe and America, they do not understand. They have an exaggerated idea of its contagiousness. They give asses' milk as diet in many cases of this fell disease.

Eye diseases are treated in a barbarous fashion. For granular lids they scarify the conjunctiva and rub into it a variety of powders, among which oxide of antimony is one of the most used. They use solutions of silver nitrate and crystals of copper sulphate. There are a considerable number of Moorish and Persian eye doctors who couch cataracts. This operation, which they do cleverly enough, is, however, only a temporary benefit. The eyes are always subsequently lost. For ingrowing eyelashes they remove a segment of the lid and sew the wound. The operation is seldom of much benefit and often ruins the eyes.

Most barbers draw teeth, but they often break them off at the crown. They cannot extract the stumps. Much misery is caused in this way.

There are a considerable number of stonecutters, who go from place to place performing a very antiquated operation. They relieve a large number of cases, but many patients die in their hands, and even when they live are often the victims of the bungling which has left them with an incurable fistula.

Tumors are beyond the anatomical knowledge and operative skill of the native quacks. Few of these practitioners can reduce a strangulated hernia. None of them can operate on it with the knife.

Fractures occur so frequently in sheep and goats that shepherds and goatherds learn to put them up. In using this art on the human subject, however, they are apt to forget the difference between the sinewy limb of a goat and the fleshy one of a man, and apply their bandages too tight, and so cause gangrene and sometimes death. It is customary to stiffen the bandages with which a fracture is put up with a paste made of flour and eggs.

The native charlatans frequently succeed in arresting the bleeding from wounds by pressure. They have inherited the idea of dressing wounds with balsams, and some of them sew wounds in a rude sort. They understand and use a number of astringent powders and solutions. They compound a considerable variety of ointments and have great faith in them.

The "birthstool" (R. V., Exod. 1:16) is still used by the native midwives. It is carried from house to house as needed. It is superfluous to say that it often carries infection with it. The midwives have no idea of operative assistance and are of no use in any emergency. The native doctors are not called in such cases. Nevertheless the mortality of oriental women in childbirth is not relatively large, their physical conformation being such as to favor them at this crisis.

Insanity is not treated medically. If lunatics are violent they are chained, and sometimes brutally used. But they are generally left at large, as in scriptural times. Epilepsy is usually not treated, and its victims roam about the streets, and many of them make their living by real or feigned attacks in public places, as in our Saviour's day.

The materia medica of the native doctors has, of course, been greatly enriched in our day by the science of the West. But the quacks still employ many exploded remedies, the knowledge of which has come down to them by tradition or through the writings of Avicenna or others of the Arabian physicians. These are the survival of the remedies in use among the Greeks and Romans, with what was added in the Middle Ages.

Their surgical instruments are few. A razor is the instrument used by the stonecutters, the scarifiers, and a lancet the instrument for bleeding and opening of abscesses. A flint knife (Exod. 4:25) is the nearest approach to a surgical instrument alluded to in Scripture.

The following animal and vegetable substances used in medicine are alluded to under their several headings in the articles on ANIMAL KINGDOM and VEGETABLE KINGDOM: Anise, balm, calamus, cassia, cinnamon, cummin, dill, galbanum, gall, hyssop, leech, mandrake, mint, myrrh, stacte, wine.—G. E. Post.

DISH, the rendering in the A. V. of several Hebrew and Greek terms:

1. Say'-fel (לַפֶּזֶל, low), probably a shallow pan (a "dish" of butter, curdled milk, Judg. 5:25; "bowl" of water, Judg. 6:38).

2. Tsal-lakh'-ath (רַחֲלָאֵת, something to pour into), probably a platter (2 Kings 21:13).

3. Keh-aw-raw' (קִרְיָרָה, something deep), the gold "dishes" of the tabernacle (Exod. 25:29; 37:16; Num. 4:7; "charger" in Num. 7).

4. Troob'-lee-on (Gr. τριβλίον, Matt. 26:23; Mark 14:20), probably the same as No. 3.

In ancient Egypt and Judea each person broke off a small piece of bread, dipped it into the dish, and conveyed it to the mouth with a small portion of the contents of the dish. To partake of the same dish was to show special friendliness and intimacy.

DI'SHAN (Heb. דִּישָׁן, dee-shawn', another form of Dishon, antelope), the name of the youngest son of Seir, the Horite, father of Uz and Aran, and head of one of the original tribes of Idumea (Gen. 36:21, 28, 30; 1 Chron. 1:38, 42).

DI'SHON (Heb. דִּישׁוֹן, dee-shone', antelope), the name of two descendants of Seir, the Horite.

1. Seir's fifth son, and head of one of the original Idumean tribes (Gen. 36:21, 30; 1 Chron. 1:38).

2. Seir's grandson, the only son of Anah, and brother of Aholibamah, Esau's second wife (Gen. 36:25; 1 Chron. 1:41).

DISHONESTY. See GLOSSARY.

DISPENSATION (Gr. οἰκονομία, oy-kon-om-ee'-ah, management of household; hence English economy).

1. Divine dispensations are generally understood to be the methods or schemes by which God provides for man's salvation. These have varied in different ages, being adapted by the wisdom and goodness of God to the circumstances of men. The different dispensations are known as the Patriarchal, Mosaic or Jewish, and Christian. It must be remembered that through these dispensations the virtue of the one covenant of grace flowed (Eph. 1:10; 3:2).

2. The word is used by Paul to indicate the office (duty) intrusted to him by God of proclaiming the Gospel (1 Cor. 9:17; Col. 1:25).

3. Those acts of God which affect men, either in mercy or judgment, are called dispensations of PROVIDENCE (q. v.).

DISPERSION OF IS'RAEL (Gr. διασπορά, dee-as-por-ah'; rendered "dispersed," John 7:35; "scattered," James 1:1; 1 Pet. 1:1). Jewish communities settled in almost all the countries of the civilized world, remaining, on the one hand, in constant communication with the mother country, and, on the other, in active intercourse with the non-Jewish world.

1. Causes of the dispersion. These were of different kinds: The deportation by the Assyrian and Babylonian conquerors of large masses of the nation into their eastern provinces; the carrying to Rome by Pompey of hundreds of Jewish captives. Of greater importance, however, were the voluntary emigrations of Jewish settlers during the Græco-Roman period to the countries bordering on Palestine, and to all the chief towns of the civilized world, for the sake chiefly of trade. The Diadochoi (successors of Alexander the Great), in order to build up their several kingdoms, offered to immigrants citizenship and many other privileges. Attracted by these circumstances, and perhaps influenced by adverse events at home, large numbers of Jews were induced to settle in Syria, Egypt, and Asia Minor, as well as in all the more important parts and commercial cities of the Mediterranean Sea.

2. Extent. That the dispersion became very widespread we have strong and varied evidence. The Roman Senate dispatched a circular (139-138 B. C.) in favor of the Jews to the kings of Egypt, Syria, Pergamos, Cappadocia, and Parthia, and to a great number of provinces, towns, and islands of the Mediterranean Sea (1 Macc. 15:16-24). It may hence be safely inferred that there was already a greater or less number of Jews in all these lands. See also the list of countries from which Jews had come to Jerusalem (Acts 2:9-11).

In Mesopotamia, Media, and Babylonia lived the descendants of the members of the ten tribes and of the kingdom of Judah carried thither by the Assyrians and Chaldeans. The "ten tribes" never returned at all from captivity, nor must the return of the tribes of Judah and Benjamin be conceived of as complete. These eastern Jewish settlements may also have been increased by voluntary additions, and the Jews in the provinces were numbered by millions (Josephus, Ant., xi, 5, 2).

Josephus names Syria as the country in which was the largest percentage of Jewish inhabitants, and its capital, Antioch, was specially distinguished in this respect. In Damascus, according to Josephus, ten thousand (or according to another passage, eighteen thousand) Jews were said to have been assassinated during the war. Agrippa is authority for the statement that Jews had settled in Bithynia and in the uttermost corners of Pontus, which is confirmed by the Jewish inscriptions in the Greek language found in the Crimea. The entire history of the apostle Paul shows how widely the Jews had settled all over Asia Minor.

The most important with regard to the history of civilization was the Jewish colony in Egypt, and especially in Alexandria. Long before the time of Alexander the Great, Jewish immigrants were found there. In the time of Jeremiah many Jews went to Egypt for fear of the Chaldees (Jer. 41:17,18), in opposition to the warning of the prophet (chaps. 42, 43), and settled in various parts of the country (44:1). Nebuchadnezzar appears, during his invasion of Egypt, to have carried to Babylon a considerable number of Jews from Alexandria.

The Jewish dispersion penetrated from Egypt to the westward, and was numerously represented in Cyrenaica. That it reached Greece is evident from the fact that Paul found synagogues in Thessalonica, Berea, Athens, and Corinth (Acts 17:1, 10, 17; 18:4, 7). Jews were also found in almost all the islands of the Grecian Archipelago and the Mediterranean Sea, and in some of these in large numbers.

In Rome there was a Jewish community numbering thousands, first appearing in that city during the time of the Maccabees. Judas Maccabeus sent an embassy to obtain assurances of its friendship and assistance (1 Macc. 8:17-32); another was sent by Jonathan (12:1-4), and a third by Simon (B. C. 140-139), which effected an actual offensive and defensive alliance with the Romans (1 Macc. 14:24; 15:15-24).

But the settlement of Jews at Rome dates only from the time of Pompey, who after his conquest of Jerusalem (B. C. 63) took numerous Jewish prisoners of war with him to Rome. Sold as slaves, many of them were afterward given their liberty, and, granted Roman citizenship, formed a colony beyond the Tiber. They were expelled from Rome under Tiberius, and again by Claudius. But the Jews soon returned and, although looked down upon by the Romans, increased in wealth and numbers.

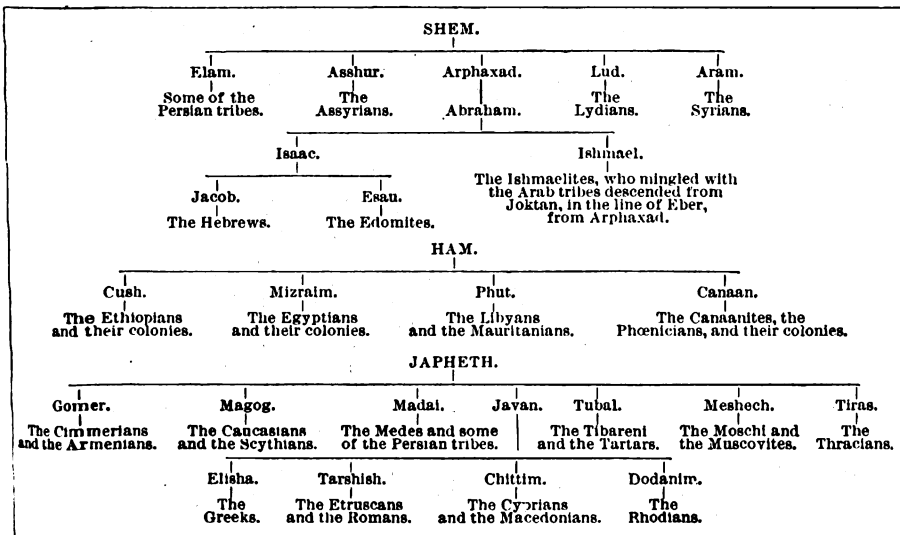

3. Jewish Communities in the dispersion. Of course there was only one way in which the scattered Israelites could maintain their native religion and usages, viz., by organizing themselves into independent communities; and that as a rule they were in the habit of doing, the nature of the organization varying according to time and place. Information respecting this feature of the dispersion in the East, Asia Minor, and Syria is very meager. In Alexandria and Cyrene they formed an independent municipal community within or coordinate with the rest of the city. A very important light is thrown upon the constitution of communities of the dispersion by a Jewish inscription found in Berenice, in Cyrenaica (probably B. C. 13), from which we find that the Jews of Berenice formed a distinct community, with nine archons at its head. With regard to the constitution of the Jewish communities of Rome and of Italy generally we are most thoroughly informed through the large number of Jewish epitaphs found in the cemeteries of Rome and Venosa. From these inscriptions we gather that the Jews living in Rome were divided into a large number of separate and independently organized communities, each having its own synagogue, gerousia (assembly of elders), and public officials. Two important privileges were allowed them: the right of administering their own funds and jurisdiction over their own members. Rome also granted them exemption from military service. In the older cities of Asia Minor, Syria, and Phœnicia there were instances in which individual Jews had the rights of citizenship conferred upon them, e. g., Paul (Acts 21:39). But as a rule the Jewish communities are to be considered as private associations of settlers. These had the right to claim the protection of the laws and enjoy the comforts and immunities of life.

4. Religious Life. Constant contact could not fail to have its effect upon the Jews in their development. The cultured Jews were not only Jews, but Greeks also, in respect to language, education, and habits; and yet in the depths of their hearts they were Jews, and felt themselves in all essentials to be in unison with their brethren in Palestine. One of the principal means employed for preserving and upholding the faith of their fathers was the SYNAGOGUE (q. v.).

There was also a temple at Leontopolis, with a regular Jewish temple service (B. C. 160-A. D. 73). See TEMPLE. Collections were regularly received in every town, and at particular seasons forwarded to Jerusalem. The language employed in the religious services appears to have been usually Greek.

DISPERSION OF MANKIND, the result of confusion of tongues at Babel (Gen. 11:6-9). In Gen. 10:5, 20, 31, we are told that the posterity of Noah were divided in their lands, every one according to his tongue, family, and nation; so that their distribution was undoubtedly conducted under the ordinary laws of colonization. The tenth chapter of Genesis presents an account of the principal descendants of Noah, followed by the description of that event which led to the division of race into many nations with different languages. The table on the preceding page shows the principal tribes that have been identified. See SUPPLEMENT.

DISPOSITION. See GLOSSARY.

DISPUTE. See GLOSSARY.

DIVERS, DIVERSE (Heb. כִּילֵּאֵה, kil-ah'-yim, of two sorts). The Jews were forbidden to bring together different kinds of materials, animals, or products, such as: (1) Weaving garments of two kinds of stuff, particularly of wool and linen; (2) sowing a field with mixed seed; (3) yoking an ox and an ass together; (4) breeding together animals of different species, e. g., to procure mules (Lev. 19:19; Deut. 22:9-11). The enactment concerning cloth would probably be better understood if we knew the exact meaning of Heb. שָׂהַת־נָזֵז, shah-at-naze', rendered "linen and woolen" (Lev. 19:19), and "garment of divers sorts" (Deut. 22:11). Perhaps the best explanation is woolen and linen carded together.

DIVERT. See GLOSSARY.

DIVINATION (Heb. כִּהֵמ, keh'-sem, lot, or some kindred term).

1. Of the many instances mentioned in Scripture some must be taken in a good sense, as through them Jehovah made known his will. They were: (1) Cleromancy, or lot, used by the Hebrews in matters of extreme importance, and always with solemnity and religious preparation (Josh. 7:13). See LOT. (2) Oneiromancy, DIVINATION BY DREAMS (q. v.). (3) The URIM AND THUMMIM (q. v.), which seems to have the same relation to true divination that the TERAPHIM (q. v.) had in the idolatrous system. (4) Phonomancy, i. e., direct vocal communication, such as God vouchsafed to Moses (Deut. 34:10); accompanied by the rod serpent (Exod. 4:3); leprous hand (v. 6); burning bush (3:2); plagues (chaps. 7-12); and the cloud (16:10, 11). At other times there was no visible phenomenon (Deut. 4:15; 1 Kings 19:12, 13, 15). God also communed with men from the MERCY SEAT (q. v.) and by the voice of angels. (5) Through his prophets God revealed his will (2 Kings 13:17; Jer. 51:63, 64). See PROPHECY.

2. The pretended art of foretelling the future, or discovering that which is obscure, by supernatural or magical means, is treated under MAGIC.

DIVORCE, DIVORCEMENT (Heb. כִּרְיָהוּת, ker-ee-thooth'; Gr. ἀποστάσις, ap-os-tas'-ee-on, a cutting, separating).

1. Jewish Law. A legal separation between man and wife, by means of a formal process of some sort. As the ordinances respecting marriage have in view the hallowing of that relation, so also was the Mosaic regulation in respect of divorce (Deut. 24:1-4). From this we learn that a man, finding in his wife something shameful or offensive, dismissed her from his house with a writ of divorcement. (1) Temporary expedient. Divorce, giving a writ, and causes of divorce seem to have been accepted by Moses by hereditary usage, and allowed because of the people's hardness of heart (Matt. 19:7, 8). The question of divorce was entirely at the will of the husband; the wife, not possessing equal privileges with the husband, had no right of divorce. The action of Salome and others was done in defiance of law, and in imitation of Roman licentiousness. (2) Ground of divorce. There have been many interpretations of the expression "some uncleanness," given as the ground of divorce. It occurs also in Deut. 23:14 of things which profane the camp of Israel; and denotes something shameful or offensive. Adultery, to which some of the rabbins would restrict the expression, is not to be thought of, because this was to be punished with death. It is necessary, therefore, to understand by the phrase in question something besides adultery, something perhaps tending in that direction, something fitted to raise not unreasonable jealousy or distrust in the mind of the husband, and destroy the prospect of true conjugal affection and harmony between him and his wife. Still a good deal was left to the discretion, and it might be the foolish caprice of the husband; and so far from justifying it, on abstract principles of rectitude, our Lord rather admitted its imperfection, and threw upon the defective moral condition of the people the blame of a legislation so unsatisfactory in itself, and so evidently liable to abuse. (3) Regulations. But the giving "a bill (or rather 'book') of divorcement" (comp. Isa. 50:1; Jer. 3:8) would in ancient times require the intervention of a Levite, not only to secure the formal correctness of the instrument, but because the art of writing was then generally unknown. This would bring the matter under the cognizance of legal authority, and tend to check the rash exercise of the right by the husband. To guard against thoughtless and hasty divorce, the law provided that if a man dismissed his wife, and she became the wife of another man, he must not again take her to wife, not even if the second husband had divorced her, or even if he had died. "The remarrying of a divorced woman is to be regarded as a pollution, or on the same level with fornication, and the law condemns the reunion of such a divorced one with her first husband as 'an abomination before Jehovah,' because thereby fornication is carried still further, and marriage is degraded to the mere satisfaction of sexual passion" (Keil, Bibl. Arch., ii, 173-175).

2. Christian Law. The teachings of Jesus upon the subject of divorce are found in Matt. 5:31, 32; 19:3-10; Mark 10:2-12, and Luke 16:18. Briefly they are: (1) The liberty given to a man by the Mosaic law to put away his wife (Deut. 24:1, sq.) was because of the hardness of the Jewish heart. (2) He who divorces his wife, except for fornication, and marries another, commits adultery (Matt. 19:9); and he who thus puts her away leads her to commit the same crime (Matt. 5:32). (3) He who marries a divorced woman commits adultery, and the woman who puts away her husband and marries another man (Mark 10:12) incurs the same kind of guilt. This last refers to the custom among the Greeks and Romans, viz., that the wife might also be the divorcing party. In Matt. 19:9 is given the one exception in favor of divorce, viz., fornication, i. e., adultery; because adultery destroys what, according to its original institution by God, constitutes the very essence of marriage, the union of two in one flesh (vers. 5, 6).

DIZ'AHAB (Heb. דִּזְאָהָב, dee zav-havb', gold-en, region of gold), a place in the wilderness of Sinai, not far from the Red Sea. It has been identified with Mersa Dahab, or Mina Dahab, i. e., "gold-harbor." Gold was most likely found there (Deut. 1:1).

DOCTOR (Gr. διδάσκαλος, did-as'-kal-os, a teacher, Luke 2:46; 5:17; Acts 5:34). The Jewish teachers, at least some of them, had private lecture rooms, but also taught in public. Their method was the same as prevailed among the Greeks; any disciple being allowed to ask questions, to which the teacher gave reply. They did not have any official position, and received no salary other than voluntary gifts from their disciples, and were chiefly of the sect of the Pharisees. See LAWYER, RABBI.

DOCTRINE. 1. Leh'-kakh (Heb. לֵקַח, something received), instruction (Deut. 32:2; Job 11:4; Prov. 4:2; Isa. 29:24).

2. Mo-say-raw' (Heb. מוֹסַר, correction, chastisement). "But they are altogether brutish and foolish: the stock is a doctrine of vanities" (Jer. 10:8) is thus rendered by Orelli (Com., in loc.): "And at a stroke they shall become simpletons and fools; the vanities are chastised, wood is this." He then adds: "When their worshipers are convicted of folly and stand confounded, this is also a chastising of the idols, which are degraded from their arrogant height to what they really are, viz., wood."

3. Shem-oo-aw' (Heb. שְׁמוֹעָה, something heard, and so an announcement), proclamation, preaching (Isa. 28:9).

4. Generally in the New Testament doctrine is from Gr. διδάσκα, did-as'-ko, to teach (Matt. 7:28; Mark 1:22, 27; Luke 4:32, etc.), but once (Heb. 6:1) it is the rendering of Gr. λόγος, log'-os, something spoken, instruction.

DOD'DAI (Heb. דֹּדַי, do-dah'ee, probably another form for Dodo), an Ahohite, who commanded the contingent for the second month under David (1 Chron. 27:4); probably the same as Dodo (q. v.).

DOD'ANIM (Heb. דֹּדָנִים, do-daw-neem', Gen. 10:4; 1 Chron. 1:7, marg. of A. V. "Rodanim"), a family or race descended from Javan, the son of Japheth. The weight of authority is in favor of the former name. Dodanim is regarded as identical with Dardani. The Dardani were found in historical times in Illyricum and Troy; the former district was regarded as their original seat. They were probably a semi-Pelagic race, and are grouped with the Chittim in the genealogical table, as more closely related to them than to the other branches of the Pelagic race. Kalisch identifies Dodanim with the Daunians, who occupied the coast of Apulia (Smith, Dict.).

DOD'AVAH (Heb. דֹּדָוָה, do-daw-vaw'-hoo, beloved of Jehovah), a man of Mareshah, in Judah, and father of the Eliezer who predicted the wreck of Jehoshaphat's fleet auxiliary to Ahaziah (2 Chron. 20:37), B. C. 874.

DODO (Heb. דֹּדוֹ, do-do', amatory).

1. A descendant of Issachar, father of Puah, and grandfather of the judge Tola (Judg. 10:1), B. C. after 1100.

2. An Ahohite, father of Eleazar, one of David's three mighty men (2 Sam. 23:9; 1 Chron. 11:12), B. C. before 1000. He seems to be the same with the Dodai mentioned in 1 Chron. 27:4 as commander of the second division of the royal troops under David.

3. A Beth-lehemite, and father of Elhanan, one of David's thirty heroes (2 Sam. 23:24; 1 Chron. 11:26), B. C. before 1000.

DO'EG (Heb. דֹּעַג, do-ayg', fearful), an Edomite, and chief of Saul's herdsmen ("keeper of the king's mules," Josephus, Ant., vi, 12, 1). He was at Nob when Ahimelech gave David assistance by furnishing him with the sword of Goliath and the showbread (1 Sam. 21:7). Of this he informed the king, and, when others refused to obey his command, slew Ahimelech and his priests to the number of eighty-five persons (1 Sam. 22:9-19), B. C. about 1000. This "act called forth one of David's most severe imprecative prayers (Psa. 52), of which divine and human justice seem alike to have required the fulfillment."

DOG. See ANIMAL KINGDOM.

Figurative. 1. In Bible times, as now, troops of hungry and half-wild dogs roamed about the fields and the streets feeding upon dead bodies and other offal (1 Kings 14:11; 16:4; 21:19, 23; 2 Kings 9:10, 36; Jer. 15:3, etc.), and thus became objects of dislike. Thus fierce and cruel enemies were styled dogs (Psa. 22:16, 20; Jer. 15:3).

2. The dog being an unclean animal, the terms "dog," "dead dog," "dog's head," were used as terms of reproach, or of humiliation if speaking of one's self (1 Sam. 24:14; 2 Sam. 3:8; 9:8; 2 Kings 8:13).

3. In the East "dog" is used for impure and profane persons, and was used by the Jews respecting the Gentiles (Matt. 15:26).

4. False apostles are called "dogs" on account of impurity and love of gain (Phil. 3:2).

5. Those who are shut out of the kingdom of heaven are also called "dogs" (Rev. 22:15), on account of their vileness.

DOLEFUL CREATURES. See ANIMAL KINGDOM.

DOOR, the opening for ingress and egress, an essential part of a tent or house.

Figurative. "I will give the valley of Achor for a door of hope" (Hos. 2:15) refers, doubtless, to the defeat of Israel through the sin of ACHAN (q. v.), the encouragement given by Jehovah, and Joshua's uninterrupted success (Josh. 7:1, sq.).

An "open door" is used by Paul (1 Cor. 16:9; 2 Cor. 2:12; Col. 4:3) as a symbol of the favorable opportunity for apostolic work. Our Lord speaks of himself as "the door" (John 10:9), and John of a "door opened in heaven" (Rev. 4:1).

DOORKEEPER (Heb. שׁוֹרֵר, sho-are'; Gr. θυρωρός, thoo-ro-ros). "Doorkeepers for the ark are named (1 Chron. 15:23, 24), whose duty was thought to be to guard the door of the tabernacle, so as to prevent anyone from coming carelessly to the ark." Persons were appointed to keep the street door of houses, and these were sometimes women (John 18:16; Acts 12:13).

"Doorkeeper" in Psa. 84:10 (marg. "to sit at the threshold") does not convey the right meaning of the original. It means one "at the threshold," either a beggar asking alms, or a passer-by merely looking in.

DOORPOST, the rendering of Heb. סֹף, saf (Ezek. 41:16), for THRESHOLD (q. v.). Moses enjoined upon the Israelites that they should write the divine commands "upon the posts of thy house and thy gates" (Deut. 6:9; Heb. מְזוֹזָו, mez-oo-zaw). These words were figurative, and are expected to be understood spiritually. Placing inscriptions about the door of the house was an ancient Egyptian custom, and was evidently followed by the Israelites in very early times. Portions of the law were either carved or inscribed upon the doorposts, or else written upon parchment and inclosed in a cylinder or reed, and fixed on the right hand doorpost of every room in the house.

DOPH'KAH (Heb. דּוֹפְקָה, dof-kaw', a knock), one of the encampments of Israel in the desert, their eighth station (Num. 33:12, 13). It was located between Rephidim and the Red Sea; there is no satisfactory identification.

DOR (Heb. דּוֹר, dore, dwelling), an ancient city of the Canaanites (Josh. 11:2; 12:23). Its people were tributary to King Solomon (Judg. 1:27; 1 Kings 4:11). It was a Phœnician settlement on the coast of Syria, and is identified with Tantura, about eight miles N. of Casarea.

DOR'CAS (Gr. Δορκάς, dor-kas', gazelle), a charitable and pious Christian woman of Joppa, whom Peter restored to life (Acts 9:36-41). The sacred writer mentions her as "a certain disciple named Tabitha, which by interpretation is called Dorcas," the reason of which probably is that she was a Hellenistic Jewess, and was called Dorcas by the Greeks, while to the Jews she was known by the name of TABITHA (q. v.).

NOTE. See GLOSSARY.

DO'THAN (Heb. דּוֹתָן, do'-thawn, two wells; Young says "double feast"), an upland plain on the caravan route from Syria to Egypt, about eleven miles N. of Samaria, and noted for its excellent pasturage; the scene of Joseph's forced slavery, and also of Elisha's vision of the mountain full of horses and chariots (Gen. 37:17; 2 Kings 6:13). One of the two wells found there now has the name of "the pit of Joseph" (Jubb Yusuf). It was "the usual sort of pit or pond dug even now by Arabs and shepherds to get rain water, with sloping sides, perhaps ten feet deep."

DOUBLE, the rendering of several Hebrew and Greek words, has many meanings. Thus the BREASTPLATE (q. v.) was to be made of two thicknesses of cloth (Exod. 39:9). "Double money," the same value as before, with an equal value added thereto (Gen. 43:12, 15). "She hath received of the Lord's hand double for all of her sins" (Isa. 40:2) does not mean twice as much as she deserved, but ample punishment through her twofold captivity, the Assyrian and Roman. "For your shame ye shall have double" (Isa. 61:7) refers to the double possession of land, not only that which they had inherited, but extended far beyond their former borders. See INHERITANCE.

Double heart, double tongue, double mind are opposed to one that is simple, unequivocal, sincere (James 1:8; 4:8).

DOUBT is that state of mind in which it hesitates between two contradictory conclusions. It may have some degree of belief, checked by a consciousness of ignorance. In this case it is provisional, waiting for more light. The New Testament gives several instances of this as worthy to be reasoned with.

Absolute disbelief is the belief of the opposite of that which faith holds.

DOUGH (Heb. עֵצָה, baw-tsake', swelling from fermentation, Exod. 12:34, 39; Jer. 7:18, etc.; עֵרֵסָה, ar-ee-saw', meal). Mention is made of Israel carrying their dough with them, before it was leavened, when they left Egypt (Exod. 12:34). Dough was sometimes baked with or without leaven. See BREAD.

DOVE COT. "When traveling in the north of Syria many years ago I noticed in certain villages tall square buildings without roofs, whose walls were pierced inside by numberless pigeon-holes. In these nestled and bred thousands of these birds. Their foraging excursions extended many miles in every direction, and it is curious to notice them returning to their 'windows' like bees to their hives or like clouds pouring over a sharp ridge into the deep valley below (see Isa. 60:8). I have never seen them in Palestine" (Thomson, Land and Book).

DOVE'S DUNG. See ANIMAL KINGDOM.

DOVES and TURTLEDOVES were the only birds that could be offered in sacrifice, being usually selected by the poor (Gen. 15:9; Lev. 5:7; 12:6; Luke 2:24); and to supply the demand for them dealers in these birds sat about the precincts of the temple (Matt. 21:12, etc.). See ANIMAL KINGDOM.

Figurative. The dove was the harbinger of reconciliation with God (Gen. 8:8, 10), and has since been the emblem of peace. It is also a noted symbol of tender and devoted affection (Cant. 1:15; 2:14, etc.), and likewise of mourning (Isa. 38:14; 59:11).

The dove symbolizes the Holy Spirit which descended upon our Saviour at his baptism, visibly with that peculiar hovering motion which distinguishes the descent of a dove (Matt. 3:16; Mark 1:10; Luke 3:22; John 1:32).

DOWRY (Heb. מֹהָר, mo'-har, price paid for a wife, Gen. 34:12; Exod. 22:17; 1 Sam. 18:25; זֶהְבָּה, zeh'-bed, a gift, Gen. 30:20). In arranging for marriage, as soon as paternal consent was obtained, the suitor gave the bride a betrothal or bridal gift, as well as presents to her parents and brothers. In more ancient times the bride received a portion only in exceptional cases (Josh. 15:18 sq.; 1 Kings 9:16). The opinion that the Israelites were required to buy their wives from the parents or relatives seems to be unfounded. The mo'-har in the Old Testament was not "purchase money," but the bridal gift which the bridegroom, after receiving the bride's assent, gave to her, not to the parents or kinsfolk. See MARRIAGE.

DOXOLOGIES (Gr. δοξολογία, dox-ol-og-ee'-a, giving glory), ascriptions of glory or praise to God.

1. Scriptural. These abound in the Psalms (e. g., 96:6; 112:1; 118:1), and were used in the synagogue. The apostles very naturally used them (Rom. 11:36; Eph. 3:21; 1 Tim. 1:17). We have also examples of celestial doxologies (Rev. 5:13; 19:1). The song of the angels in Luke 2:14 is a doxology. As to the doxology in Matt. 6:13, see Lord's Prayer.

2. Liturgical. Three doxologies of special note have been used in church worship from a very early time: (1) The Lesser Doxology, or Gloria Patri, originally in the form, "Glory be to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost," to which was added later, "world without end," and still later brought to its present form: "Glory be to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost, as it was in the beginning, is now, and ever shall be, world without end. Amen." (2) The Greater Doxology, or Gloria in Excelsis, called also the ANGELIC HYMN (q. v.). (3) The Trisagion, as old as the 2d century, beginning, "Therefore, with angels and archangels, and with all the company of heaven, we laud and magnify thy glorious name."

DRAG (Heb. מִקְמֶלֶת, mik-mel'-reth) is mentioned as being the object of worship by fishermen (Hab. 1:15, 16). It was a large fishing net, the lower part of which, when sunk, touches the bottom, while the upper part floats on the top of the water.

DRAGON. See ANIMAL KINGDOM.
In the New Testament "dragon" (Gr. δράκων) is only found in Rev. 12:3, sq.; 13:2, 4, 11; 16:13; 20:2, and is used figuratively of Satan. The reason of this scriptural symbol is to be sought not only in the union of gigantic power with craft and malignity, of which the serpent is the natural emblem, but in the record of the serpent's agency in the temptation (Gen. 3).

In Christian art the dragon is the emblem of sin in general and idolatry in particular, having usually the form of a gigantic winged crocodile.

DRAGON WELL (Heb. מַעְיַן הַיַּרְדֵּן, ane hat-tan-neen'), probably the fountain of Gihon, on the west side of Jerusalem (Neh. 2:13).

DRAM. See METROLOGY, IV.

DRAUGHT (Gr. ἀφειδρών, af-ee'-rone'), a privy, sink; found only in Matt. 15:17; Mark 7:19. See DUNG, GLOSSARY.

DRAUGHT HOUSE (Heb. מַכְחֹרֵת, makh-ar-aw-aw', literally, easing one's self), a privy or sink. Jehu, in contempt of Baal, ordered his temple to be destroyed and the place turned into a receptacle for offal or ordure (2 Kings 10:27).

DRAWER OF WATER (Heb. שֹׁאֵב מַיִם, sho-ayb', drawer, mah'-yim, water). In the East water is often carried from the rivers or wells by persons who make it their trade, carrying water in goatskins slung on their backs, with the neck brought around under the arm to serve as a mouth. It was a hard and servile employment (Deut. 29:11), to which the Gibeonites were condemned (Josh. 9:21, 23).

DREAM (Heb. חֶלֶם, khal-ome'; Gr. ὄναρ, on'-ar). "The dream is a domain of experience, having an intellectual, ethical, and spiritual significance. Living in an earthly body, we have, as the background of our being, a dim region, out of which our thinking labors forth to the daylight, and in which much goes forward, especially in the condition of sleep, of which we can only come to a knowledge by looking back afterward. Experience confirms to us the assertion of Scripture (Psa. 127:2) that God giveth to his beloved in sleep. Not only many poetical and musical inventions, but, moreover, many scientific solutions and spiritual perceptions, have been conceived and born from the life of genius awakened in sleep.

"Another significant aspect of dreaming is the ethical. In the dream one's true nature manifests itself, breaking through the pressure of external relations and the simulation of the waking life. From the selfishness of the soul, its selfish impulses, its restlessness stimulated by selfishness, are formed in the heart all kinds of sinful images, of which the man is ashamed when he awakens, and on account of which remorse sometimes disturbs the dreamer. The Scriptures appear to hold the man responsible, if not for dreaming, at least for the character of the dream (Lev. 15:16; Deut. 23:10).

"A third significant aspect of dreams is the spiritual: they may become the means of a direct and special intercourse of God with man. The witness of conscience may make itself objective and expand within the dream-life into perceptible transactions between God and man. Thus God warned Abimelech (Gen. 20) and Laban (31:24) in a dream, and the wife of Pilate warned her husband against being concerned in the death of the Just One." The conviction of the sinfulness and nothingness of man is related by Eliphaz as realized in a dream (Job 4:12-21).

The special will of God is often revealed to men through dreams, of which the Scriptures mention many. Such are the dreams of Jacob in Beth-el (Gen. 28:12) and in Haran (Gen. 31:10-13), the dream of Solomon in Gibeon (1 Kings 3:5), the dreams of Joseph the husband of Mary (Matt. 1:20), the night visions of Paul (Acts 16:9; 18:9; 23:11; 27:23). From 1 Sam. 28:6 we infer that God did at times answer sincere inquirers. Concerning the future the dreams of Nebuchadnezzar and Daniel are examples.

"Waking visions probably are to be distinguished from those prophetic dream visions, which the seer, whether by day (Ezek. 8:1; Dan. 10:7; Acts 7:55; 10:9-16) or by night (comp. Acts 16:9; 18:9), receives in a waking state."

The dreams of Joseph in his father's house (Gen. 37:5-11), which, as became plain to him subsequently (42:9), figuratively predicted to him his future eminence over the house of Jacob, the dreams of the chief butler and the chief baker of Pharaoh (Gen. 40), the dream of the soldier in the Midianitish camp in the time of Gideon (Judg. 7:13), are illustrations of dreams of presentiment.

According to Num. 12:6, dreams and visions (q. v.) are the two forms of the prophetic revelations of God. Too much reliance is not to be placed upon dreams (Eccles. 5:7).

"A good dream" was one of the three things—viz., a good king, a fruitful year, and a good dream—popularly regarded as marks of divine favor; and so general was the belief in the significance that it passed into this popular saying: "If anyone sleeps seven days without dreaming call him wicked" (as being unremembered by God) (see Delitzsch, Biblical Psychology, p. 324, sq.).

Interpretation of Dreams. Because the dream was looked upon as a communication from the gods there arose those who professed ability to interpret the same (see MAGIC). These were not to be listened to if they taught anything contrary to the law (Deut. 13:1, sq.; Jer. 27:9, etc.). Instances are given of God's aiding men to understand dreams and the divine lessons taught thereby, e. g., Joseph (Gen. 40:5, sq.; 41:7-32), Daniel (Dan. 2:19, sq.; 4:8).

DREDGE. See GLOSSARY.

DREGS. 1. The rendering of the Heb. שֵׁבֶר, sheh'-mer, Psa. 75:8, elsewhere lees of wine. As the wine was strained when about to be used, so the psalmist uses the figure of the strained wine being a portion of the righteous, while the wicked shall drink the dregs.

2. Heb. כּוּבֵבַי, koob-bah'-ath, goblet, Isa. 51:17, 22, and rendered "dregs of the cup of my fury," but better, "the goblet of his fury."

DRESS. In treating of this subject we call attention to: (1) Materials, color, and ornamentation; (2) Garments, forms, names, etc.; (3) Usages relating thereto.

1. Materials, etc. The first mention that occurs in Scripture of clothing is of the simple garments made by Adam and Eve from fig leaves (Gen. 3:7), which were followed by those made of the skin of animals (3:21). Skins were not wholly disused at later periods; the "mantle" worn by Elijah appears to have been the skin of a sheep or some other animal with the wool left on. It was characteristic of a prophet's office from its mean appearance (Zech. 13:4; comp. Matt. 7:15). Pelisses of sheepskin still form an ordinary article of dress in the East. The art of weaving hair was known to the Hebrews at an early period (Exod. 26:7; 35:6); the sackcloth used by mourners was of this material. John the Baptist's robe was of camel's hair (Matt. 3:4). Wool, we may presume, was introduced at a very early period, the flocks of the pastoral families being kept partly for their wool (Gen. 38:12); it was at all times largely employed, particularly for the outer garments (Lev. 13:47; Deut. 22:11, etc.). Flax was no doubt used in the earliest times to make linen garments. Of silk there is no mention at a very early period, unless it be in Ezekiel (16:10, 13).

White was esteemed the most appropriate color for cotton cloth, and purple for others.

Ornamentation was secured by (1) weaving with previously dyed threads (Exod. 35:25); (2) gold thread; (3) introduction of figures, either woven into the stuff or applied by needlework. Robes decorated with gold (Psa. 45:13), and at a later period with silver thread (comp. Acts 12:21), were worn by royal personages; other kinds of embroidered robes were worn by the wealthy both of Tyre (Ezek. 16:13) and Palestine (Judg. 5:30; Psa. 45:14). The art does not appear to have been maintained among the Hebrews; the Babylonians and other Eastern nations (Josh. 7:21; Ezek. 27:24), as well as the Egyptians (v. 7), excelled in it. Nor does the art of dyeing appear to have been followed up in Palestine; dyed robes were imported from foreign countries (Zeph. 1:8), particularly from Phoenicia, and were not much used on account of their expensiveness; purple (Prov. 31:22; Luke 16:19) and scarlet (2 Sam. 1:24) were occasionally worn by the wealthy. The surrounding nations were more lavish in their use of them; the wealthy Tyrians (Ezek. 27:7), the Midianitish kings (Judg. 8:26), the Assyrian nobles (Ezek. 23:6), and Persian officers (Esth. 8:16) are all represented in purple.

2. Garments. From the simple loin cloth, or apron, dress gradually developed in amount and character according to climate, and condition and taste of the wearer. Regarding the clothing of the patriarchs and ancient Israelites we have no exact information, but it was unquestionably very simple. It was not limited to what was indispensable to cover nakedness, for we read of various forms of clothing (Gen. 24:53; 37:3) and costly garments of byssus (Gen. 41:42; 45:22).

The making of clothes among the Israelites was always the business of the housewives, in which women of rank equally took part (1 Sam. 2:19; Prov. 31:22, sq.; Acts 9:39).

While the costume of men and women was very similar, there was an easily recognizable distinction between the male and female attire of the Israelites, and accordingly the Mosaic law forbids men to wear women's clothes, and vice versa (Deut. 22:5).

(1) The dress of men. Among the Israelites these were: (1) Tunic (Heb. כֵּתָנִית, keth-o'-neth, Exod. 28:4, 39; 29:5; 2 Sam. 15:32; Gr. χιτών, khee-tone', Matt. 5:40; Mark 6:9; Luke 3:11; 6:29, etc.; A. V. in each case "coat"). This was the most simple of all the garments worn, corresponding to an ordinary shirt or nightgown. It was probably made of two pieces sewn together at the sides, or else formed of one piece, with a place cut for the head to pass through. It afforded so slight a covering that persons who had on nothing else were called naked (1 Sam. 19:24; 2 Sam. 6:20; John 21:7). Another kind reached to the wrists and ankles: It was in either case fastened around the loins with a girdle (q. v.), and the fold formed by the overlapping of the robe served as an inner pocket. Such a garment was worn by the priests (q. v.), and probably by Joseph (Gen. 37:3, 23) and Tamar (2 Sam. 13:18). (2) The Outer Tunic (Heb. מְעִיל, meh-eel'), a looser and a longer sort of a tunic, reaching to near the ankles; open at the top so as to be drawn over the head, and having holes for the insertion of the arms.

As an article of ordinary dress it was worn by kings (1 Sam. 24:4), prophets (1 Sam. 28:14), nobles (Job 1:20), and youths (1 Sam. 2:19). It may, however, be doubted whether the term is used in its specific sense in these passages, and not rather for any robe that chanced to be worn over the keth-o'-neth (1). Where two tunics are mentioned (Luke 3:11) as being worn at the same time, the second would be a meh-eel'; travelers generally wore two, but the practice was forbidden to the disciples (Matt. 10:10; Luke 9:3).

(3) Mantle or Cloak (Heb. מִטְלָה, sim-law', and other terms), a piece of cloth nearly square, a sort of blanket or plaid. In pleasant weather it was more conveniently worn over the shoulders than being wrapped around the body. While it answered the purpose of a cloak, it was so large that burdens, if necessary, might be carried in it (Exod. 12:34; 2 Kings 4:39). The poor wrapped themselves up wholly in this garment at night, spread their leathern girdle upon a rock, and rested their head upon it, as is customary to this day in Asia. Moses, therefore, enacted as a law what had been a custom, that the upper garment, when given as a pledge, should not be retained overnight (Exod. 22:25, 26; Deut. 24:13; Job 22:6; 24:7). In the time of Christ the creditors did not take the upper garment or cloak, which it was not lawful for them to retain, but the coat or tunic, which agrees with the representation of Jesus (Matt. 5:40). There having occurred an instance of the violation of the Sabbath (Num. 15:32-41), Moses commanded that there should be a fringe upon the four corners of this garment, together with a blue cord or ribband, to remind the people of the heavenly origin of his statutes (Matt. 9:20; Luke 8:44). See HEM. The prophet's mantle was, probably, as a rule, a simple sheepskin with the wool turned outward. (4) Breeches or Drawers (Heb. מִכְשָׁיִם, mik-navee', hiding), a garment worn under the tunic for the fuller covering of the person. These trousers were worn by the priests, but do not appear to have been in general use among the Hebrews. See PRIEST, DRESS OF. (5) Girdle (the rendering of one Greek and several Hebrew words). The tunic when it was not girdled impeded the person who wore it in walking. Those, consequently, who perhaps at home were ungirded went forth girded (2 Kings 4:29; 9:1; Isa. 5:27; Jer. 1:17; John 21:7; Acts 12:8). There were formerly, and are to this day, two sorts of girdles in Asia: a common one of leather, six inches broad, and furnished with clasps, with which it is fastened around the body (2 Kings 1:8; Matt. 3:4; Mark 1:6); the other a valuable one of flax or cotton, sometimes, indeed, of silk or of some embroidered fabric, a handbreadth broad, and supplied with clasps by which it was fastened over the forepart of the body (Jer. 13:1). The girdle was bound around the loins, whence the expressions, "The girdle of the loins" and "gird up your loins" (1 Kings 18:46; Isa. 11:5; Jer. 1:17). The Arabians carry a knife or a poniard in the girdle. This was the custom among the Hebrews (1 Sam. 25:13; 2 Sam. 20:8-10), a fact which admits of confirmation from the ruins of Persepolis. The girdle also answers the purpose of a pouch, to carry money and other necessary things (2 Sam. 18:11; Matt. 10:9; Mark 6:8). (6) Cap or Turban. The words for headdress which occur in the Old Testament (Heb. תְּכֵינֶת, tsaw-neet', Job 29:14, "diadem;" פְּתִילֵי, peh-ayr', Isa. 61:3, A. V. "beauty;" 61:10, A. V. "ornaments") belong to for the feet were sandals (Heb. נַעֲלָיִים, nah-al-aw'; Gr. ὑπόδημα, hoop-od-ay-mah, bound under the feet), of leather and fastened with thongs. They were taken off upon entering a room or a holy place (Exod. 3:5; Josh. 5:15), while the poor and mourners went barefoot (2 Sam. 15:30; Isa. 20:2; Ezek. 24:17, 23). Men of rank had these sandals put on, taken off, and carried after them by slaves (Matt. 3:11; Mark 1:7; John 1:27).

(2) The dress of women. The difference between the dress of men and women was small, consisting chiefly in the fineness of the materials and the length of the garment. The dress of the hair in the two sexes was different, and another mark of distinction was that women wore a veil.

(1) Tunic. Women wore the tunic as an under dress (Cant. 5:3), but it was probably wider, longer, and of finer material; the well-to-do wore also shirts (Heb. שָׂרְיָן, saw-deen', wrapper, Isa. 3:23, "fine linen"), and a kind of second tunic (male, 2), provided with sleeves and reaching to the ankles. (2) Girdle. This was frequently of fine woven stuff (Prov. 31:24) and studded with precious stones, and was worn lower down on the loins and more loosely than by men. (3) Headdress. (a) Veil. That of the lower class of Israelitish women is unknown, but the veil was regarded from ancient times by women of character as indispensable. Various kinds are mentioned: "The oldest kind seems to the dress of men of rank. Mig-baw-aw' (Heb. כִּנְיֹתָיִם, bonnet) is used only of the priest's cap. Israelites, as a rule, seem not to have worn any cap, but to have confined their hair with a band or wrapped a cloth—generally known by us as a turban—around the head, as is still done in Arabia. See DIADEM, MITER. (7) Ephod. The ephod (q. v.) and the meh-el' (2), according to the Mosaic law, were appropriately garments of the high priest (q. v.), but were sometimes worn by other illustrious men (1 Sam. 18:4; 2 Sam. 6:14; Job 29:14; Ezek. 26:16). (8) Sandals, Shoes. The covering was called raw-deed' (Heb. רָוֵדֵד, spreading, Cant. 5:7; Isa. 3:23)." The rah-al-aw' (Heb. רַחֲלָאוּ, fluttering, Isa. 3:19) are veils flowing down from the head over the temples, hence waving with the action of walking, which were so adjusted to the eyes as to be seen through. Many understand tsam-maw' (Heb. צַמְמוֹ, to fasten on; "locks," Cant. 4:1, 3; 6:7; Isa. 47:2; R. V. "veil") to be a veil; and that of one covering breast, throat, and chin, such as is still worn in Syria and Egypt. (b) The mit-pakh'-ath (Heb. מִתְּפָאֶת, Ruth 3:15; rendered "wimple" in Isa. 3:22), a sort of shawl or broad garment, and probably similar to the mantle (or cloak) worn by men. "As the cloaks worn by the ancients were so full that one part was thrown upon the shoulder and another gathered up under the arm, Ruth, by holding a certain part, could receive into her bosom the corn which Boaz gave her" (Edersheim, Sketches Jewish Life). (c) The kerchief (Heb. כִּרְפֹּת, mis-paw-khaw', spread out, Ezek. 13:18, 21) is understood by some as a close-fitting cap; but others think it to have been a long veil or headdress. "The Eastern women bind on their other ornaments with a rich embroidered handkerchief, which is described by some travelers as completing the headdress and falling without order upon the hair behind." In patriarchal times wives (Gen. 12:14) and young women (24:15, sq.) went about, especially when engaged in their household duties, without veils; and yet in so early times the betrothed veiled herself in the presence of the bridegroom (24:65), and lewd women veiled themselves (38:15). (4) Sandal. Sandals consisted merely of soles strapped to the feet, but ladies wore also costly slippers, often made of sealskin (Ezek. 16:10, A. V. "badgers' skin," R. V. "sealskin"), probably also of colored leather. Ladies of rank appear to have paid great attention to the beauty of their sandals (Cant. 7:1). They were embroidered or adorned with gems, and so arranged that the pressure of the foot emitted a delicate perfume. (5) Stomacher (Heb. פֶּתֶח־עֵל, peth-eeg-eel'), a term of doubtful origin, but probably a gay holiday dress (Isa. 3:23). The garments of females were terminated by an ample border of fringe, which concealed the feet (Isa. 47:2; Jer. 13:22).

(3) Luxurious articles of dress. In addition to the essential and common articles of dress already mentioned a great many more of an ornamental kind were in use, especially among women of luxurious habits. In rebuking the women of Jerusalem Isaiah (3:16, sq.) mentions a number of these articles of luxurious dress. There is doubt as to the precise meaning of some of the words employed in the description, and little comparatively can now be known of the exact shape and form of several of the articles mentioned. They are: (a) Tinkling ornaments, rings of gold, silver, or ivory, worn round the ankles, which made a tinkling sound as the wearer walked. See ANKLETS. (b) Cuuls. These were probably headbands or frontlets, i. e., plaited bands of gold or silver thread worn below the hair net and reaching from ear to ear. (c) Round tires (Heb. טֵירָן, sah-har-one', a round pendant; "crescents," R. V.) the new moon being a symbol of increasing good fortune, and as such the most approved charm against the evil eye; fastened round the neck and hanging down upon the breast (Judg. 8:21).

(d) Chains (Heb. כַּוְנֵי־פָּה, net-ee-faw'), earrings (R. V. "pendants"). (e) Bracelets (q. v.). According to the Targum, these were chains worn upon the arm, or spangles upon the wrist, answering to the spangles upon the ankles. (f) Mufflers, i. e., fluttering veils (q. v. above). (g) Bonnets (Heb. כִּתְמוֹת־פֶּה, peh-ayr', embellishment, R. V. "head tires") are only mentioned in other parts of Scripture as worn by men. (h) Ornaments of the legs (R. V. "ankle chains"), a chain worn to shorten and give elegance to the step. See ANKLETS. (i) Headbands (Heb. קִישׁוֹר, kish-shoor'), sashes, and so rendered in R. V. (k) Tablets (Heb. בִּשְׁמַלְיָהוּ, neh'-fesh, breath), smelling bottles (R. V. "perfume boxes"). (l) Earrings (Heb. כַּוְנֵי־אֶזְנוֹ, lakh'-ash, whisper), an amulet (R. V.), i. e., gems or metal plates with an inscription upon them, worn as protection as well as ornament. See EARRINGS. (m) Rings, both ear and nose. See RINGS. (n) Changeable suits (Heb. מַחְלָא־אֶזְנוֹ, makh-al-aw-tsaw'), gala dresses, not usually worn, but taken off when at home. (o) Maniles, the second tunic. See above. (p) Wimples, the broad cloth wrapped round the body, such as Ruth wore (Ruth 3:15). See VEIL (R. V. "shawl"). (q) Crisping pins (Heb. כַּוְנֵי־רֵיחַ, khaw-reef', cut out, R. V. "satchel"), pockets for holding money (2 Kings 5:23, "bags"), which was generally carried by men in the girdle or in a purse. (r) Glasses (R. V. "hand mirrors," q. v.). (s) Fine linen (Heb. לְבָשׁוֹת־עֵץ־זָרָע, saw-deen', to envelope), veils or coverings of the finest linen, Sindu cloth. (t) Hoods, i. e., head-dress. (u) Veils (q. v.), probably delicate veil-like mantles thrown over the rest of the clothes.

Of course, garments varied greatly in material and ornamentation, according to ability and taste. Being often changed during marriage and other festive occasions, they were called garments of change. Kings and men of rank had always a large wardrobe of these, partly for their own use (Prov. 31:21; Job 27:16; Luke 15:22), partly to give away as presents (Gen. 45:22; 1 Sam. 18:4; 2 Kings 5:5; 10:22; Esth. 4:4; 6:8, 11).

(4) Dress of foreign nations mentioned in the Bible. That of the Persians is described in Dan. 3:21 in terms which have been variously understood, but which may be identified in the following manner: (1) The sar-bal' (כִּתְמוֹת־בִּשְׁמַלְיָהוּ, A. V. "coat"), underclothing, worn next the person; (2) Pat-teesh' (כִּתְמוֹת־פֶּה, A. V. "hosen"), probably the outer tunic; (3) Kar-bel-aw' (כִּתְמוֹת־כֶּתֶם, A. V. "hats"), mantle; while (4) the "other garments" (לְבָשׁוֹת־אֲחֵרִים, leb-oosh') may mean coverings for the head and feet. In addition to these terms we have notice of a robe of state of fine linen (Heb. בִּשְׁמַלְיָהוּ־טָהוֹר, tak-reek'), so called from its ample dimensions (Esth. 8:15). References to Roman or Greek dress are few.

3. Customs Relating to Dress. "The length of the dress rendered it inconvenient for active exercise; hence the outer garments were either left in the house by a person working close by (Matt. 24:18) or were thrown off when the occasion arose (Mark 10:50; John 13:4; Acts 7:58), or, if this was not possible, as in the case of a person traveling, they were girded up (1 Kings 18:46; 2 Kings 4:29; 9:1; 1 Pet. 1:13). On entering a house the upper garment was probably laid aside and resumed on going out (Acts 12:8). In a sitting posture the garments concealed the feet; this was held to be an act of reverence (Isa. 6:2). The number of suits possessed by the Hebrews was considerable; a single suit consisted of an under and upper garment. The presentation of a robe in many instances amounted to installation or investiture (Gen. 41:42; Esth. 8:15; Isa. 22:21); on the other hand, taking it away amounted to dismissal from office (2 Macc. 4:38). The production of the best robe was a mark of special honor in a household (Luke 15:22). The number of robes thus received or kept in store for presents was very large, and formed one of the main elements of wealth in the East (Job 27:16; Matt. 6:19; James 5:2); so that to have clothing—to be wealthy and powerful (Isa. 3:6, 7)" (Smith, Bib. Dict., s. v.; Jahn, Keil).

DRESS is used in Scripture in the following senses: (1) To till the soil (Heb. בָּרַךְ, aw-bad', to serve, Gen. 2:15; Deut. 28:39; Gr. γεωργέω, ghe-ore-gheh'-o, Heb. 6:7). (2) Preparation of food (Heb. עָשָׂה, aw-saw', to make, Gen. 18:7, 8; 1 Sam. 25:18; 2 Sam. 12:4; 13:5, 7, etc.). (3) Trimming lamps (Heb. יָשַׁב, yaw-tab', make right, Exod. 30:7).

DRINK. As a drink water took the first place, although milk was also extensively used, but considered as food (q. v.). For the better quenching of thirst the common people used a sour drink (Ruth 2:14), a sort of vinegar mixed with oil, perhaps also sour wine. The well-to-do drank wine, probably mixed with water, and often also spiced; also a stronger intoxicating drink, either date wine or Egyptian barley wine. See WINE.

Figurative. To "drink waters out of thine own cistern" (Prov. 5:15) is to enjoy the lawful pleasures of marriage. To "drink blood" (Ezek. 39:18) is to be satiated with slaughter. To "drink water by measure" (Ezek. 4:11) denotes scarcity and desolation.

DRINK, STRONG (Heb. שַׁי־קַוֵּר, shay-kawr', intoxicant; Gr. σίκερα, sik'-er-ah), any intoxicating beverage. The Hebrews seem to have used wine (q. v.) of pomegranates (Cant. 8:2) and other fruits. In Num. 28:7 strong drink is clearly used as an equivalent to wine. "The following beverages were known to the Jews: (1) Beer, which was largely consumed in Egypt under the name of zythus, and was thence introduced into Palestine. It was made of barley; certain herbs, such as lupin and skirrett, were used as substitutes for hops. (2) Cider, which is noticed in the Mishna as apple wine. (3) Honey wine, of which there were two sorts—one consisting of a mixture of wine, honey, and pepper; the other a decoction of the juice of the grape, termed débash (honey) by the Hebrews, and dibs by the modern Syrians. (4) Date wine, which was also manufactured in Egypt. It was made by mashing the fruit in water in certain proportions. (5) Various other fruits and vegetables are enumerated by Pliny as supplying materials for factitious or homemade wine, such as figs, millet, the carob fruit, etc. It is not improbable that the Hebrews applied raisins to this purpose in the simple manner followed by the Arabians, viz., by putting them in jars of water and burying them in the ground until fermentation takes place" (Smith, Bib. Dict., s. v.).

DRINK OFFERING. See SACRIFICIAL OFFERING.

DROMEDARY. See ANIMAL KINGDOM.

DROPSY. See DISEASES.

DROSS (Heb. דֹּרֵס, seeg, refuse), the impurities separated from silver, etc., by the process of melting (Prov. 25:4; 26:23); also the base metal itself prior to smelting (Isa. 1:22, 25; Ezek. 22: 18, 19).

Figurative. Dross is used to represent the wicked (Psa. 119:119; Prov. 26:23), sin (Isa. 1:25), and Israel (Ezek. 22: 18, 19).

DROUGHT, the rendering of a number of Hebrew words. In Palestine from May till October there is little if any rain, and consequently this is the season of drought. The copious dews nourish only the more robust plants, and as the season advances the grass withers, unless watered by rivulets or the labor of man. It is the drought of summer (Gen. 31:40; Psa. 32:4); the parched ground cracks; the heaven seems like brass and the earth as iron (Deut. 28:23); prairie and forest fires are not uncommon (Isa. 5:24; 9:18, etc.).

DROWN (Gr. καταπονίζω, kat-ap-on-tid'-zo). Drowning was not a Jewish method of capital punishment, nor was it a practice in Galilee, but belonged to the Greeks, Romans, Syrians, and Phœnicians (Matt. 18:6).

DRUM. See Music, p. 764.

DRUNK, DRUNKARD (Heb. some form of שָׁוֵי, shaw-kar', to be tipsy; שָׁוֵי, shaw-thaw', to imbibe; רָוַו, raw-vaw', to fill; סָוַו, saw-baw', to drink to excess; Gr. μεθύω, meth-oo'-o). Noah, who was probably ignorant of the fiery nature of wine, affords us the first instance of intoxication (Gen. 9:21).

That the excessive use of strong drink was not uncommon among the Jews may be inferred from the striking figures furnished by its use and effect, and also from the various prohibitions and penalties (Psa. 107:27; Isa. 5:11; 24:20; 49:26; 51:17-22; Hab. 2:15, 16). The sin of drunkenness is strongly condemned in the Scriptures (Rom. 13:18; 1 Cor. 5:11; 6:10; Eph. 5:18; 1 Thess. 5:7, 8).

Figurative. Men are represented as drunk with sorrow, afflictions, and God's wrath (Isa. 63: 6; Jer. 51:57; Ezek. 23:33); also those under the power of superstition, idolatry, and delusion, because they do not use their reason (Jer. 51:7; Rev. 17:2). Drunkenness sometimes denotes abundance, satiety (Deut. 32:42; Isa. 49:26). "To add drunkenness to thirst" (Deut. 29:19; R. V. "to destroy the moist with the dry") is a proverbial expression, meaning the destruction of one and all.

DRUSIL'LA (Gr. Δροσυλλα, droo'-sil-lah), youngest daughter of Herod Agrippa I, by his wife Cypros, and sister of Herod II, was only six years old when her father died in A. D. 44 (Josephus, Ant., xix, 9, 1; xx, 7, 1, 2). She was early promised in marriage to Epiphanes, son of Antiochus, but the match was broken off in consequence of his refusing to perform his promise of conforming to the Jewish religion. She was married to Azizus, king of Edessa, but afterward was induced by Felix, procurator of Judea, to leave Azizus, and become his wife. In Acts 24: 24 she is mentioned in such a manner that she may be naturally supposed to have been present when Paul preached before Felix in A. D. 57.

DUKE (Lat. dux, a leader) is the translation of two Hebrew terms: (1) Al-loof' (אֶלְלוּף, friend), the distinguishing title of Edomite and Horite phylarchs, i. e., head of a tribe or nation (Gen. 36:15-43; Exod. 15:15; 1 Chron. 1:51, 54). Al-loof' is used rarely of Jews (Zech. 9:7; 12:5, 6, "governor"), and once of chiefs in general (Jer. 13:21, "captain"). (2) Nes-eeh' (נֶסֶעֵךְ, a prince, being anointed), dukes of Sihon (Josh. 13:21), "properly vassals of Sihon, princes created by the communication or pouring in of power" (K. and D., Com., in loc.). It is rendered "princes" (Psa. 83:11; Ezek. 32:30; Dan. 11:8) and "principal men" (Mic. 5:5).

DULCIMER. See Music, p. 767.

DUMAH (Heb. דוּמָה, doo-maw', silence).

1. A son of Ishmael, most probably the founder of an Ishmaelite tribe of Arabia, and so giving name to the principal place or district inhabited by that tribe (Gen. 25:14; 1 Chron. 1:30; Isa. 21:11).

2. A town in Judah (Josh. 15:52), the same as Daumeh, about ten miles S. W. of Hebron.

3. The region occupied by the Ishmaelites in Arabia (Gen. 25:14; 1 Chron. 1:30), retained in the modern Dumal el Jeudel.

4. Figurative. As used in Isa. 21:11, Dumah seems to be symbolical, meaning deep, utter "silence," and therefore the land of the dead (Psa. 94:17; 115:17).

DUMB (Heb. בְּלֵשָׁה, il-lame', speechless; דוּמָה, doo-maw', Hab. 2:19; Gr. κωφός, ko-fos', blinded, as to tongue, i. e., unable to speak, or as to ear, i. e., deaf). Dumbness has the following significations: (1) Inability to speak by reason of natural infirmity (Exod. 4:11; Matt. 15:30; Luke 1:20, etc.). (2) By reason of want of knowing what to say or how to say it (Prov. 31:8); unwillingness to speak (Psa. 39:2, 9).

DUNG, the rendering of several Hebrew and Greek words. In the case of sacrifices the dung was burned outside the camp (Exod. 29:14; Lev. 4:11; 8:17; Num. 19:5); hence the extreme opprobrium of the threat in Mal. 2:3. Particular directions were laid down in the law to enforce cleanliness with regard to human ordure (Deut. 23:12, sq.); it was the grossest insult to turn a man's house into a receptacle for it (2 Kings 10:27, "draught-house;" Ezra 6:11; Dan. 2:5; 3:29, "dung-hill," A. V.); public establishments of that nature are still found in the large towns of the East. The use of this substance among the Jews was twofold: (1) as manure (q. v.), and (2) as fuel (q. v.).

DUNG GATE (Neh. 2:13, "dung port;" 3:13, 14; 12:31), a gate of ancient Jerusalem, located at the southwest angle of Mount Zion (J. Strong, Harmony). It was doubtless so called because of the piles of sweepings and garbage in the valley of Tophet below.

DUNGEON. See PRISON.

DUNGHILL, the rendering of three Hebrew words and one Greek, and meaning: (1) A heap of manure (Isa. 25:10; Luke 14:35). (2) Privy (2 Kings 10:27, "draughthouse;" Dan. 2:5).

Figurative. To sit upon a dung heap denoted the deepest degradation and ignominy (1 Sam. 2:8; Psa. 112:7; Lam. 4:5).

DU'RA (Heb. דוּרָא, duo-raw', the circle), a plain in the province of Babylon in which Nebuchadnezzar set up a golden image (Dan. 3:1). It is supposed that the site of the image is identified in one of the mounds discovered in the territory.

DURE. See GLOSSARY.

DUST (usually Heb. עָפָר, aw-fawr', powdered). In the countries suffering from severe droughts the soil is often converted into dust, which, agitated by violent winds, brings terrific and desolating storms. Among the punishments against the Hebrews, in the event of forsaking Jehovah, was that, instead of rain, dust and ashes should fall from heaven (Deut. 28:24).

Figurative. To put dust on the head was the sign of the deepest grief (Josh. 7:6); sitting in the dust denotes degradation (Isa. 47:1); the "mouth in the dust" (Lam. 3:29) symbolizes suppliant and humble submission. Dust may mean the grave (Job 7:21), death itself (Gen. 3:19; Psa. 22:15), a numerous people (Num. 23:10), or low condition (1 Sam. 2:8; Nah. 3:18). The shaking off the dust is a sign of merited contempt with which the people rejecting the truth are reduced to the level of the Gentiles (Matt. 10:14; Acts 13:51). To "lick the dust" signifies the most abject submission (Psa. 72:9). To "cast dust" at anyone (2 Sam. 16:13) may signify contempt, or, as some think, to demand justice (Acts 22:23). See MOURNING.

DUTY (Heb. דָּוָר, daw-bawr', a matter, 2 Chron. 8:14; Ezra 3:4) means the task of each day. The other use of the word is that which a man owes to his wife or his deceased brother's widow (Deut. 25:5, 7; Heb. עֲנָנָה, o-nam', cohabitation). In the New Testament the word is the rendering of the Greek ὀφείλω, of-i-eh'-o, to be under obligation (Luke 17:10; Rom. 15:27), and signifies that which ought to be done.

Duty implies obligation. Such is the constitution of the human mind that no sooner do we perceive a given course to be right than we recognize also a certain obligation resting on us to pursue that course. Duties vary according to one's relations. Thus a man has duties to himself, the family, the state, and God. As his supremest relation is to God, and as God's commands are always right, therefore man's chief obligation is to God (1 Cor. 10:31).

DWARF (Heb. קָנַן, dak, beaten small, as in Lev. 16:12), an incorrect rendering for a lean or emaciated person (Lev. 21:20). Such a person was included among those who could not serve in the sanctuary. See BLEMISH.

DWELL. It has been thought, both from Scripture and profane writers, that the first dwellings of men were caves; that these were followed by tents, and then by houses (Gen. 4:17, 20). See HOUSE, TENT.

Figurative. God "dwelling in light" is said in respect to his independent possession of his own glorious attributes (1 Tim. 6:16; 1 John 1:7); he dwells in heaven in respect to his more immediate presence there (Psa. 123:1); Christ dwelt (tabernacled) upon earth during his incarnation. To dwell has the sense of permanent residence. "God shall enlarge Japheth, and he shall dwell in the tents of Shem" (Gen. 9:27).

"To dwell under one's vine and fig tree" (1 Kings 4:25) is to enjoy the possession of a home in one's own right. God dwells in the Church (Eph. 3:17-19) through the Holy Spirit (1 Cor. 3:16; 2 Tim. 1:14); and believers are exhorted to "let the word of God dwell in them richly" (Col. 3:16; Psa. 119:11).

"Dwell deep," literally, "make deep for dwelling" (Jer. 49:8), seems to refer to a custom still common in Eastern countries of seeking refuge from danger in the recesses of rocks and caverns, etc.

DWELLING, the rendering of a number of Hebrew and Greek words. Human dwellings have varied from the earliest day to the present—caves, booths, tents, houses, and palaces—according to the character of the country, mode of living, and occupation, as well as the degree of culture.

DYE (Heb. כְּחָלִי, khaw-mates', dazzling). The Egyptians were acquainted with the effect of acids on color, and submitted the cloth they dyed to one of the same processes adopted by our modern manufactories. We may suppose some general notions of chemistry, or at least of chemical agency, were known to the Egyptians.

Their colors were principally blue, red, green, black, yellow, and white. The red was an earthy bole; the yellow an iron ocher; the green was a mixture of a little ocher with a pulverulent glass, made by vitrifying the oxides of copper and iron with sand and soda; the blue was a glass of like composition without the ocherous addition; the black was bone or ivory black; and the white a very pure chalk. They were mixed with water, and apparently a little gum to render them tenacious and adhesive. They had few mixed colors, though purple, pink, orange, and brown are met with, and frequently on papyrus. The Israelites evidently learned the art of dyeing from the Egyptians (Exod. 26:1; 28:5-8). See COLORS, HANDICRAFTS.

DYED ATTIRE (Ezek. 23:15; Heb. תְּבוּלִים, teb-oo-lem'). This seems to refer to variegated headbands or turbans.

EAGLE. See ANIMAL KINGDOM.

Figurative. Of great and powerful kings (Ezek. 17:3; Hos. 8:1); of the renovating and quickening influences of the Spirit in the godly, referring to the eagle's increase of vigor after the period of moulting (Psa. 103:5; Isa. 40:31); of God's strong and loving care of his church (Exod. 19:4; Deut. 32:11); the melting away of riches is symbolized by the swiftness of the eagle's flight (Prov. 23:5), also the rapidity of the movement of armies (Deut. 28:49; Jer. 4:13; 48:40), and the swiftness of man's days (Job 9:26); the height and security of its dwelling symbolizes the fancied but fatal security of the wicked (Jer. 49:16; Obad. 4). "Enlarge thy baldness as the eagle" (Mic. 1:16) is "a reference to the bearded vulture, or more probably the carrion vulture, which has the front of the head completely bald and only a few hairs at the back of the head. The words cannot possibly be understood as referring to the yearly moulting of the eagle itself" (K. and D., Com., in loco).

EAR. (Heb. אָזן, o'-zen), the organ of hearing. We learn from Scripture that blood was put upon the right ear of the priests at their consecration (Exod. 29:20; Lev. 8:23), and of the healed leper in his cleansing (Lev. 14:14); that they were often adorned with rings (see EARRING), and that servants who refused to leave their masters were fastened to the door by an awl bored through the ear as a mark of perpetual servitude (Exod. 21:6; Deut. 15:17).

Figurative. "To uncover the ear" (1 Sam. 20:2, margin) is to reveal; to have the "ear heavy" (Isa. 6:10) or "uncircumcised" (Jer. 6:10) is to be inattentive and disobedient; the regard of Jehovah to the prayer of his people is expressed thus: "His ears are open to their cry" (Psa. 34:15).

EAR, EARRING. See GLOSSARY.

EARNEST (Gr. ἀρραβών, ar-hrab-ohn', pledge), money which in purchase is given as a pledge that the full amount will subsequently be paid. The Hebrew word (אַרְבֻּנֹן, ar-av-bone') was used generally for pledge (Gen. 38:17), surety (Prov. 17:18), and hostage (2 Kings 14:14). The noun earnest occurs three times in the New Testament (2 Cor. 1:22; 5:5; Eph. 1:14), and the meaning of the passages appears to be that the Holy Spirit is in the heart as an earnest money given for a guarantee of a future possession, the pledge of complete salvation. The gift of the Holy Spirit, comprising as it does "the power of the world to come" (Heb. 6:5), is both a foretaste and a pledge of future blessedness (Meyer, Com., on 2 Cor. 1:22; Grimm, Dict., s. v.). See GLOSSARY.

EARRING. 1. Egyptian, etc. The earrings usually worn by Egyptian ladies were large, round, single hoops of gold, from one inch and a half to two inches and one third in diameter, and frequently of a still greater size, or made of six rings soldered together; sometimes an asp, whose body was of gold set with precious stones, was worn by persons of rank as a fashionable caprice; but it is probable that this emblem of majesty was usually confined to members of the royal family. Earrings of other forms have been found at Thebes, but their date is uncertain, and it is difficult to say if they are of an ancient Egyptian age or of Greek introduction. Of these the most remarkable are a dragon and another of fancy shape, which is not inelegant. Some few were of silver, and plain hoops, like those made of gold already noticed, but less massive, being of the thickness of an ordinary ring. At one end was a small opening, into which the curved extremity of the other caught after it had been passed through the ear. Others were in the form of simple studs. The ancient Assyrians, both men and women, wore earrings of exquisite shape and finish; and those on the later monuments are generally in the form of a cross.

2. Hebrew. (1) Av-ghcel' (Heb. אָבְחַעַל, round). The ring formed in the shape of a hoop (Num. 31:50; Ezek. 16:12). (2) Neh'-zem (Heb. נְהֵזֶם). Used both as a nosing and an earring, and differing little if any in form. It certainly means an earring in Gen. 35:4, but a nose jewel in Gen. 24:47; Prov. 11:22; Isa. 3:21; while its meaning is doubtful in Judg. 8:24, 25; Job 42:11. (3) Lakh'-ash (Heb. לַחֲאֵשׁ, whispering). This word, rendered in the A. V. "earrings" (Isa. 3:20), is given "amulets" in the R. V. This latter more correctly represents the Hebrew word (meaning incantations), and these were gems or metal charms with an inscription upon them, which were worn for protection as well as ornament. On this account they were surrendered along with the idols by Jacob's household (Gen. 35:4). Chardin describes earrings, with talismanic figures and characters on them, as still existing in the East. Jewels were sometimes attached to the rings. The size of the earrings still worn in eastern countries far exceeds what is usual among ourselves; hence they formed a handsome present (Job 42:11) or offering to the service of God (Num. 31:50). Earrings were worn by both sexes (Exod. 32:2).

EARTH. The rendering of several Hebrew and Greek words. (See MINERAL KINGDOM.)

1. Ad-aw-maw' (Heb. אֲדָמָה), soil or ground, as in Gen. 9:20, where "husbandman" is literally man of the ground. The earth supplied the elementary substance of which man's body was formed (Gen. 2:7). According to the law, earth or rough stones were the material out of which altars were to be raised (Exod. 20:24); thought by some to symbolize the elevation of man to God. Others think it teaches that the earth, which has been involved in the curse of sin, is to be renewed and glorified by the gracious hand of God. Naaman's request for two mules' burden of earth (2 Kings 5:17) was based on the belief that Jehovah, like heathen deities, was a local god, and could be worshipped acceptably only on his own soil.

2. Eh'-rets (Heb. עֲרֵצִים). K. and D. (Com., on Gen. 2:5) thus distinguish between field (Heb. שָׂדֵה, saw-deh') and earth. "Saw-deh' is not the widespread plain of the earth, the broad expanse of land, but a field of arable land, which forms only a part of the earth or ground." The term is applied in a more or less extended sense: (1) To the whole world (Gen. 1:1); (2) to land as opposed to sea (Gen. 1:10); (3) to a country (Gen. 21:32); (4) to a plot of ground (Gen. 23:15); (5) to the ground on which a man stands (Gen. 33:3); (6) to "the inhabitants of the earth" (Gen. 6:11; 11:1); (7) to heathen countries, as distinguished from Israel, especially during the theocracy (2 Kings 18:25; 2 Chron. 13:9, etc.); (8) in a spiritual sense it is employed in contrast with heaven, to denote things carnal (John 3:31; Col. 3:2, 5).

EARTHEN VESSEL, or EARTHENWARE. See POT, POTTER.

EARTHQUAKE (Heb. רָעַד, rah'-ash, vibration; Gr. σεισμός, seis-mos), a tremulous motion or shaking of the earth caused by the violent action of subterraneous heat and vapors. That Palestine has been subject both to volcanic agency and to occasional earthquakes there can be no doubt. The recorded instances, however, are but few; the most remarkable occurred in the reign of Uzziah (Amos 1:1; Zech. 14:5), which Josephus connected with the sacrifice and consequent punishment of that monarch (2 Chron. 26:16, sq.). Of the extent of that earthquake, of the precise localities affected by it, or of the desolations it may have produced—of anything, in short, but the general alarm and consternation occasioned by it, we know absolutely nothing. From Zech. 14:4, 5 we are led to infer that a great convulsion took place at this time in the Mount of Olives, the mountain being split so as to leave a valley between its summits. Earthquakes are mentioned in connection with the crucifixion (Matt. 27:51-54), the resurrection (Matt. 28:2), and the imprisonment of Paul and Silas (Acts 16:26). These, like that recorded in connection with the death of Korah (Num. 16:32), and with Elijah's visit to Mount Horeb (1 Kings 19:11), would seem to have been miraculous rather than natural phenomena. Josephus (Ant., xv, 52) gives an account of an earthquake which devastated Judea (B. C. 31).

Figurative. Earthquakes are symbolical of the judgments of God (Isa. 24:20; 29:6; Jer. 4:24; Rev. 8:5); of the overthrow of nations (Hag. 2:6, 22; Rev. 6:12, 13, 16, 17, 19).

EAST. The following terms are thus rendered in the English Bible:

1. Kel'-dem (Heb. קֶדֶם, what is in front) means that which is before or in front of a person, and was applied to the east from the custom of turning in that direction when describing the points of the compass (Gen. 13:14; 28:14; Job 23:8, 9; Ezek. 47:18, sq.). Kel'-dem is used geographically for a spot or country immediately before another in an easterly direction (Gen. 2:8; 3:24; 13:11); and as a proper name, eastward, into the land of Kedem (Gen. 25:6). See SUPPLEMENT.

2. Miz-raukh' (Heb. מִצְרָח, rising), the place of the sun's rising, and used when the east is only distinguished from the west (Josh. 11:3; Psa. 50:1; 103:12; Zech. 8:7), or from some other one quarter (Dan. 8:9; 11:44, etc.).

3. Mo-tsaw' (Heb. מִצְרָיִם, Psa. 75:6), a going forth, as of the sun.

4. An-at-ol-ay' (Gr. ἀνατολή, rising), generally used in the plural and without the article, meaning "eastern regions." In Matt. 2:2, 9, it is used in the singular, which would seem to suggest the following rendering: "For we have seen his star in its rising."

"The East" is the name given by the ancient Hebrews to a certain region, including the countries to the east and north of Palestine (Isa. 11:14; Jer. 49:28, etc.).

Figurative. East was symbolical of an extreme point, e. g., "As far as the east is from the west" (Psa. 103:12).

EAST, CHILDREN OF THE (Heb. בְּנֵי-אֶרֶץ, ben-ay'-keh'-dem), an appellation given to a people or to peoples living east of Palestine (Judg. 6:3, 33; 7:12; 8:10; 1 Kings 4:30, etc.).

EAST GATE, the potter's gate, or the gate leading to the potter's field (Jer. 19:2). See JERUSALEM.

EAST SEA. The Dead Sea was called the East Sea (Joel 2:20; Ezek. 47:18); while the Mediterranean Sea was called the West Sea (Num. 34:6).

EAST WIND (Heb. קָוֶד, kaw-deem', east). See WINDS.

EASTER (Gr. πάσχα, pas'-kha, from Heb. פֶּסַח, peh'-sakh), the Passover, and so translated in every passage excepting "intending after Easter to bring him forth to the people" (Acts 12:4). In the earlier English versions Easter had been frequently used as the translation of πάσχα. At the last revision Passover was substituted in all passages but this. See PASSOVER.

The word Easter is of Saxon origin, Eastra, the goddess of spring, in whose honor sacrifices were offered about Passover time each year.

1. Festival of our Lord's resurrection. A festival observed in commemoration of our Lord's resurrection. Although not of apostolic institution, the observance of Easter was early introduced into the Church. When Polycarp went to Rome (A. D. 160) he found two modes prevalent of celebrating Easter, each claiming apostolic precedent. Tertullian seems to recognize the celebration, and Apostolic Constitutions represent it as quite general in the Church. Easter was the central point of the paschal season, which very early extended over a period of fifteen days.

"The first week was called the 'Passover of the cross,' and the second the 'Passover of the resurrection.' The first was usually kept as a strict fast, from midnight of the previous Sunday (Palm Sunday) till cockcrow on Easter morn. On Good Friday the kiss of peace was prohibited; the ornaments of the altar were removed, the lights extinguished; no chanting was allowed in the procession; there was no consecration of the eucharist; the collect was mostly intercessory. As the Eastern morn drew near the signs of sorrow and mourning were laid aside, the lamps and tapers were lighted, and a scene of darkness and mourning was succeeded by one of splendor and gladness. Prayer, supplication, the singing of psalms and hymns, the reading of appropriate Scripture lessons, and homilies from the clergy occupied the hours of the evening and night. The Easter Sunday, from Easter eve to the evening of Easter day, was one continuous celebration of the resurrection. The Scripture readings included the entire resurrection history; the joy of the people was unrestrained; all labor was suspended. After the recognition of Christianity by the empire prisoners were often released, debtors forgiven, and slaves manumitted. The entire week was thus considered a season of uninterrupted rejoicing. By degrees the fast preparatory to Easter Sunday was lengthened, until, probably about the time of Constantine, it reached forty days (Quadragesima, Lent). The rejoicings were also continued through the whole period of fifty days (Quinquagesima) from Easter to the day of Pentecost (Whitsunday)" (Bennett, Christ. Archaeol., p. 455).

2. Controversies. Very early there was much controversy as to the proper time of celebrating the Lord's resurrection, and consequently of the related events of the eucharist and crucifixion. "Probably this controversy may be ultimately traced to the diversity of opinion in the churches of Jewish and Gentile origin respecting the obligations of the Mosaic institutions. One party, the Christians of Asia Minor and a few others, adhered strictly to the tradition respecting the time of celebrating the Passover by Christ and his apostles just before the crucifixion. Hence they uniformly observed the Christian Passover on the fourteenth day of the month Nisan, which was the first month of the sacred year of the Jews. This was observed as a fast. In the evening of the same day, Roman time, but at the beginning of the fifteenth Nisan, Jewish time, they partook of the communion, to commemorate the last paschal supper of Christ. The beginning of the festival might fall upon any day of the week; only it had a fixed date, the fourteenth Nisan, and this day regulated the entire Easter festival. A second party, of which the Roman Church was the leader, celebrated the crucifixion of Christ on Friday, the day of the week on which it actually occurred. The Sunday following was observed as Easter, or the day of resurrection. They extended the fast from Friday till Easter day, and did not celebrate the eucharist before the festival of the resurrection. By this arrangement the anniversary of the death of Christ always fell upon Friday, and that of the resurrection on Sunday; yet the feast was not fixed, as in the other case, but movable. Hence the Christian Sunday, or the day of resurrection, and not the Jewish paschal day, regulated the Easter festival" (Bennett, Christ. Archaeol., p. 452).

The ceremony in the Church of the Holy Sepulcher, Jerusalem, of the Holy Fire at the Greek Easter is very remarkable. At a certain point in the celebration "a light is seen to glimmer through a hole in the mausoleum, the great bells roll out a solemn peal, while the whole multitude sends forth a loud roar of relief after the suppressed excitement. The fire is supposed to come from heaven, and the actual presence of the Holy Ghost is expected. The fire is caught by the nearest pilgrims and passed to others, and so rapidly that in less than five minutes the whole church was covered by a sea of fire. Half an hour afterward the church was empty, and the fire on its way to kindle lamps in many a distant church" (Major Wilson, Bib. Ed., iv, p. 285).

EATING. See FOOD, HOSPITALITY.

Figurative. "To eat" is spoken metaphorically of meditating upon and assimilating the word of God (Jer. 15:16; Ezek. 3:1; Rev. 10:9); familiar intercourse (Luke 13:26; comp. Tit. 1:16). "To eat the spoil of enemies" (Deut. 20:14) is to make use of it for one's own maintenance. "Eating and drinking" signifies enjoying one's self (Eccles. 5:18), or to live in the ordinary way as distinguished from asceticism (Matt. 11:18; comp. Acts 10:41).

E'BAL (Heb. עֵבָל, ay-bawl', to be bare, a stone).

1. A various reading (1 Chron. 1:22) for OBAL (q. v.).

2. One of the sons of Shobal, son of Seir, the Horite, of Idumea (Gen. 36:23; 1 Chron. 1:40).

3. One of two mountains separated by the valley of Shechem. Ebal is two thousand seven hundred feet above the sea. The opposite mountain, Gerizim, is two thousand six hundred feet above the sea. The modern name of Ebal is Sitti Salamigah, so called after a Mohammedan female saint. Ebal is the mountain from the top of which were pronounced the blessings, and from Gerizim the cursings, of Israel (Deut. 11:29; Josh. 8:30-35). Conder considers that upon the top of this mount may be the site of Joshua's altar. The base of Mount Ebal has many sepulchral excavations.

E'BED (Heb. עֶבֶד, eh'-bed, servant).

1. The father of GAAL (q. v.), who headed the insurrection at Shechem against Abimelech (Judg. 9:26-35), B. C. about 1100.

2. Son of Jonathan, and head of the descendants of Adin who returned (to the number of fifty males) from the captivity (Ezra 8:6), B. C. about 457.

E'BED-ME'LECH (Heb. עֶבֶד-מֶלֶךְ, eh'-bed-meh'-lek, servant of a king), probably an official title equal to king's slave, i. e., minister, an Ethiopian at the court of Zedekiah, king of Judah, who was instrumental in saving the prophet Jeremiah from the dungeon and famine (Jer. 38:7-13). For his humanity he was promised deliverance when the city should fall into the enemy's hands (Jer. 39:15-18), B. C. 589. He is there styled a eunuch, and he probably had charge of the king's harem, an office which would give him free private access to the king.

EB'EN-E'ZER (Heb. אֶבֶן-עֶזֶר, eh'-ben hav-ay'-zer, stone of the help), a stone set up by Samuel after a signal defeat of the Philistines, as a memorial of the "help" received on the occasion from Jehovah (1 Sam. 7:12). Its position is carefully defined as between Mizpeh and Shen. Neither of these points, however, has been identified with any certainty—the latter not at all.

EBER (Heb. עֵבֶר, ay'-ber, beyond).

1. The son of Salah and father of Peleg, being the third postdiluvian patriarch after Shem (Gen. 10:24; 11:14; 1 Chron. 1:18, 25). He is claimed as the founder of the Hebrew race (Gen. 10:21; Num. 24:24). In Luke 3:35 his name is Anglicized Heber.

2. The oldest of the three sons of Elpaal, the Benjamite, and one of those who rebuilt Ono and Lod, with their suburbs (1 Chron. 8:12; B. C. 535).

3. The head of the priestly family of Amok, in the time of the return from exile under Zerubbabel (Neh. 12:20; B. C. 535).

EBI'ASAPH (Heb. עִבְיָאֵסָפִי, eb-yaw-savf', gatherer), the son of Elkanah and father of Assir, in the genealogy of the Kohathite Levites (1 Chron. 6:23). In v. 37 he is called a son of Korah, from a comparison of which circumstance with Exod. 6:24 most interpreters have identified him with ABIASAPH (q. v.) of the latter passage; but (unless we there understand, not three sons of Korah to be meant, but only three in regular descent) the pedigrees of the two cannot be made to tally without violence. From 1 Chron. 9:19 it appears he had a son named Kore. In 1 Chron. 26:1 his name is abbreviated to Asaph.

EBONY. See VEGETABLE KINGDOM.

EBRONAH (Heb. עֵבְרוֹנָה, eb-ro-naw', passage), the thirtieth station of the Israelites on their way from Egypt to Canaan (Num. 33:34, 35). Since it "lay near Ezion-gaber on the west, as they left Jotbathah, it was probably in the plain Ki'a en-Nabb, immediately opposite the pass of the same name at the head of the Elamitic branch of the Red Sea."

ECCLES'IASTES. See BIBLE, BOOKS OF.

ECLIPSE OF THE SUN. No historical notice of an eclipse occurs in the Bible, but there are passages in the prophets which contain manifest allusion to this phenomenon (Joel 2:10, 31; 3:15; Amos 8:9; Mic. 3:6; Zech. 14:6). Some of these notices probably refer to eclipses that occurred about the time of the respective compositions; thus the date of Amos coincides with a total eclipse, which occurred February 9, B. C. 784, and was visible at Jerusalem shortly after noon; that of Micah with the eclipse of June 5, B. C. 716. A passing notice in Jer. 15:9 coincides in date with the eclipse of September 30, B. C. 610, so well known from Herodotus's account (i, 74, 103). The darkness that overspread the world at the crucifixion cannot with reason be attributed to an eclipse, as the moon was at the full at the time of the Passover.

ED (Heb. אֵד, ayd, a witness), a word inserted in the A. V. of Josh. 22:34, apparently on the authority of a few manuscripts, and also of the Syriac and Arabic versions, but not existing in the generally received Hebrew text.

E'DAR (Heb. אֵדָר, ay'-der, a flock), the place where Jacob first halted after the burial of Rachel (Gen. 35:21).

E'DEN. 1. (Heb. עֵדֶן, ay'-den). The real origin of the name probably is found in the Assyrian idinu (from Accadian edin), "plain." But Eden has generally been supposed to mean "delights" (LXX τρυφή; Vulg. voluptas). The earliest home of man; the dwelling place of our first parents, the exact location of which has always been a matter of conjecture (Gen. 2:8, 10, 15; 3:23, 24, etc.). It is distinctly referred to in Scripture, and has been a matter of tradition among almost all nations, it being the "golden age" of the Greeks.

Its location was "eastward" from the writer of the sacred account. Probably somewhere along the course of the rivers Tigris and Euphrates, and in the "land of Shinar," or Babylonia. It was a most fertile locality. "A region where streams abound, where they divide and reunite, where alone in the Mesopotamian tract can be found the phenomenon of a single river parting into four arms, each of which is or has been a river of consequence."

"The garden and its mystical tree were known to the inhabitants of Chaldea in pre-Semitic days. The garden stood hard by Eridu, 'the good city' as it was called by Sumerian founders" (Sayce, Higher Crit. and Mon.).

2. One of the markets which supplied Tyre with richly embroidered stuffs (Isa. 37:12; Ezek. 27:23). It is not to be sought for in the present village on the eastern slope of Lebanon, but it is the paradise (παράδεισος) of the Greeks, which Robinson imagines that he has found in Old Jusieh, not far from Ribleh. It is called "house of Eden" (Amos 1:5).

3. Son of Joah, and one of the Gershonite Levites who assisted in the reformation of public worship under Hezekiah (2 Chron. 29:12; B. C. after 719). He is probably the same Levite appointed by Hezekiah as one of those who were to superintend the distribution of the freewill offerings (2 Chron. 31:15).

E'DER (Heb. אֵדָר, ay'-der, a flock).

1. A city of southern Judah, on the Idumean border (Josh. 15:21), perhaps the same as EDAR (q. v.).

2. The second of the three "sons" (descendants) of Mushi appointed to Levitical offices in the time of David (1 Chron. 23:23; 24:30), B. C. after 1000.

EDIFICATION (Gr. οἰκοδομή, oi-kod-om-ay', building) means building up. A building is therefore called an edifice. Accordingly, the work of confirming believers in the faith of the Gospel and adding to their knowledge and graces is appropriately expressed by this term. Christians are said in the New Testament to be edified by understanding spiritual truth (1 Cor. 14:3-5), by the work of "apostles, prophets, evangelists, pastors, and teachers" (Eph. 4:11, 12), and by good speech (4:29).

The means to be used for one's upbuilding are the study and hearing of God's word, prayer, use of the sacraments, meditation, self-examination, and Christian work of every kind. It is our duty to edify each other (1 Thess. 5:11) by the exhibition of every grace of life and conversation.

The term is also applied to believers as "living stones" build up into a habitation for the Lord, constituting the great spiritual temple of God (Eph. 2:20-22; 1 Pet. 2:5).

EDIFY. See GLOSSARY.

EDOM (Heb. עֲדוֹם, ed-ome', red).

1. The name given to ESAU (q. v.) after he bartered his birthright for a mess of red pottage (Gen. 25:30).

2. Edom stands also collectively for the EDOMITES (q. v.), as well as for their country, called also ΙΔΥΜΑΙΑ.

EDOMITES (Heb. עֲדוֹמִים, ed-o-mee'), the descendants of Esau, who settled in the south of Palestine, and at a later period came into conflict with the Israelites (Deut. 23:7; Num. 20:14, sq.); frequently called merely Edom (Num. 24:18; Josh. 15:1; 2 Sam. 8:14, etc.).

1. Country. Edom, or Idumæa, was situated at the southeast border of Palestine (Judg. 11:17; Num. 34:3), and was properly called the land or mountain of Seir (Gen. 36:8; 32:3; Josh. 24:4; Ezek. 35:3, 7, 15). The country lay along the route pursued by the Israelites from Sinai to Kadesh-barnea, and thence back again to Elath (Deut. 1:2; 2:1-8), i. e., along the east side of the great valley of Arabah. On the north of Edom lay the territory of Moab, the boundary appearing to have been the "brook Zered" (2:13, 14, 18), probably the modern Wady-el-ahsy. "As yet, the precise limits of ancient Edom, westward, cannot be designated with confidence. . . . When the Azazimeh, or Muqrâh, mountain track shall have been carefully explored, such natural features may be there shown for the marking of the western border of Edom" (Trumbull, Kadesh-barnea, p. 99, sq.). See SUPPLEMENT.

The physical geography of Edom is somewhat peculiar. Along the western base of the mountain range are low calcareous hills. These are succeeded by lofty masses of igneous rock, chiefly porphyry, over which lies red and variegated sandstone in irregular ridges and abrupt cliffs, with deep ravines between. The latter strata give the mountains their most striking features and remarkable colors. The average elevation of the summit is about two thousand feet above the sea. Along the eastern side runs an almost unbroken limestone ridge, a thousand feet or more higher than the other. This ridge sinks down with an easy slope into the plateau of the Arabian desert. While Edom is thus wild, rugged, and almost inaccessible, the deep glens and flat terraces along the mountain sides are covered with rich soil, from which trees, shrubs, and flowers now spring up luxuriantly.

2. The Edomites were descendants of Esau, or Edom, who expelled the original inhabitants, the HORITES (Deut. 2:12), whose rulers were sheikhs (Gen. 36:29, 30). A statement made in Gen. 36:31 serves to fix the period of the dynasty of the eight kings. They "reigned in the land of Edom before there reigned any king over the children of Israel;" i. e., before the time of Moses, who may be regarded as the first virtual king of Israel (comp. Deut. 33:5; Exod. 18:16-19). It would also appear that these kings were elective. The princes (A. V. "dukes") of the Edomites are named in

Gen. 36:40-43, and were probably petty chiefs or sheikhs of their several clans.

3. History. "Esau's bitter hatred to his brother Jacob for fraudulently obtaining his blessing appears to have been inherited by his latest posterity. The Edomites perpetually refused to permit the Israelites to pass through their land (Num. 20:18-21). For a period of four hundred years we hear no more of the Edomites. They were then attacked and defeated by Saul (1 Sam. 14:47). Some forty years later David overthrew their army in the 'Valley of Salt,' and his general, Joab, following up the victory, destroyed nearly the whole male population (1 Kings 11:15, 16), and placed Jewish garrisons in all the strongholds of Edom (2 Sam. 8:13, 14). Hadad, a member of the royal family of Edom, made his escape with a few followers to Egypt, where he was kindly received by Pharaoh. After the death of David he returned and tried to excite his countrymen to rebellion against Israel, but failing in the attempt he went on to Syria, where he became one of Solomon's greatest enemies (1 Kings 11:14-23). In the reign of Jehoshaphat (B. C. 875) the Edomites attempted to invade Israel in conjunction with Ammon and Moab, but were miraculously destroyed in the valley of Berachah (2 Chron. 20:22). A few years later they revolted against Jehoram, elected a king, and for half a century retained their independence (21:8). They were then attacked by Amaziah, and Sela their great stronghold was captured (2 Kings 14:7; 2 Chron. 25:11, 12). Yet the Israelites were never able again completely to subdue them (28:17). When Nebuchadnezzar besieged Jerusalem the Edomites joined him, and took an active part in the plunder of the city and slaughter of the Jews. Their cruelty at that time seems to be specially referred to in the 137th Psalm. It was on account of these acts of cruelty committed upon the Jews in the day of their calamity that the Edomites were so fearfully denounced by the later prophets (Isa. 34:5-8; 63:1-4; Jer. 49:17; Lam. 4:21; Ezek. 25:13, 14; Amos 1:11, 12; Obad. 8, 10, sq.). On the conquest of Judah, the Edomites, probably in reward for their services during the war, were permitted to settle in southern Palestine, and the whole plateau between it and Egypt; but they were about the same time driven out of Edom proper by the Nabatheans. For more than four centuries they continued to prosper. But during the warlike rule of the Maccabees they were again completely subdued, and even forced to conform to Jewish laws and rites and submit to the government of Jewish prefects. The Edomites were now incorporated with the Jewish nation, and the whole province was often termed by Greek and Roman writers Idumæa. Immediately before the siege of Jerusalem by Titus, twenty thousand Idumæans were admitted to the Holy City, which they filled with robbery and bloodshed. From this time the Edomites, as a separate people, disappear from the page of history. Little is known of their religion; but that little shows them to have been idolaters (2 Chron. 25:14, 15, 20). Josephus refers to both the idols and priests of the Idumæans" (Smith, Bib. Dict., s. v.). See Trumbull, Kadesh-barnea; Smith, Hist. Geog., etc.

ED'REI (Heb. עֲדְרַי, ed-reh'-ee, mighty).

1. A fortified town of northern Palestine, situated near Kedesh and Hazor (Josh. 19:37), site not known.

2. One of the metropolitan towns of Bashan beyond Jordan (Josh. 12:4, 5; 13:12; Deut. 3:19), and the place where King Og was defeated by the Israelites (Num. 21:33-35; Deut. 1:4; 3:1-3). It afterward fell to eastern Manasseh (Josh. 18:31; Num. 32:33).

"Its present name, Ed-Dera'ah; first discovered by Consul Wetzstein in 1860, explored and mapped since by Schumacher in 1886. Accounts of this wonderful city have been given by others. I will condense the accounts. It is a subterranean city. There is a small court, twenty-six feet long, eight feet three inches wide, with steps leading down into it, which has been built as an approach to the actual entrance of the caves. Then come large basaltic slabs, then a passage twenty feet long, four feet wide, which slopes down to a large room, which is shut off by a stone door so this underground city could be guarded.

"Columns ten feet high support the roof of the chambers into which you now enter. These columns are of later period, but there are other supports built out of the basaltic rock. Then come dark and winding passages—a broad street, which had dwellings on both sides of it, whose height and width left nothing to be desired. The temperature was mild, no difficulty in breathing; several cross streets, with holes in the ceiling for air; a marketplace, a broad street with numerous shops in the walls; then into a side street, and a great hall, with a ceiling of a single slab of jasper, perfectly smooth and of immense size. Airholes are frequent, going up to the surface of the ground about sixty feet. Cisterns are frequent in the floors. Tunnels partly blocked, too small for anyone now to creep through, are found. The two travelers from whom I have quoted believe that a far greater city exists than the portion they explored.

"This remarkable subterranean city was presumably hollowed out to receive the population of the upper town in times of danger, and the people were thus prepared to stand a siege on the part of the enemy for as long as their magazines were filled with food, their stables with cattle, and the cisterns with water.

"If, however, the enemy had found out how to cut off their supply of air by covering up the airholes the besieged would have had to surrender or perish. The average depth of the city from the surface of the ground is about seventy feet" (Harper, Bib. and Mod. Dis., pp. 127-129).

EDUCATION. Although nothing is more carefully inculcated in the law than the duty of parents to teach their children its precepts and principles (Exod. 12:26; 13:8, 14; Deut. 4:5, 9, 10; 6:2, 7, 20, etc.), yet there is little trace among the Hebrews in earlier times of education in any other subject. Exceptions to this statement may perhaps be found in the instances of Moses himself, who was brought up in all Egyptian learning (Acts 7:22); of the writer of the book of Job, who was evidently well versed in natural history and in the astronomy of the day (Job 38:31; chaps. 39, 40, 41); of Daniel and his companions in captivity (Dan. 1:4, 17); and, above all, in the intellectual gifts and acquirements of Solomon, which were even more renowned than his political greatness (1 Kings 4:29, 34; 10:1-9; 2 Chron. 9:1-8). In later times the prophecies and comments on them, as well as on the earlier Scriptures, together with other subjects, were studied. Parents were required to teach their children some trade. See CHILDREN, FATHER, SCHOOLS.

EFFECT. See GLOSSARY.

EFFECTUAL CALLING. See CALL.

EFFECTUAL PRAYER. In James 5:16 the A. V. has "the effectual fervent (Gr. ἐνεργουμένη) prayer of a righteous man availeth much." The participle here has not the force of an adjective, but gives the reason why the prayer of a righteous man has outward success. The R. V. renders appropriately, "the supplication of a righteous man availeth much in its working."

EGG (Heb. בֵּיצָה, bay-tsaw', from root meaning white). The passage in Deut. 22:6 prohibits the taking of a sitting bird from its eggs or young. Eggs are mentioned as deserted (Isa. 10:14); of the cockatrice (59:6). Egg is contrasted with a scorpion (q. v.) as an article of food (Lukel1:12). Eggs were extensively used as food (q. v.).

Figurative. "The white of an egg" is used (Job 6:6, "the juice of purslain," R. V. margin) as a symbol of something insipid.

EG'LAH (Heb. אֶגְלָה, eg-law', heifer), one of David's wives during his reign in Hebron and the mother of his son Ithream (2 Sam. 3:5; 1 Chron. 3:3), B. C. about 1000. The clause appended to Eglah's name, viz., "David's wife," is not added to show that Eglah was David's principal wife, which would necessitate the conclusion drawn by the rabbins that Michal was the wife intended (Keil, Com.).

EG'LAIM (Isa. 15:8). See EN-EGLAIM.

EG'LON (Heb. אֶגְלוֹן, eg-lawn', calflike), a Moabite king. (1) Subdues the Israelites. When Israel forsook the Lord again, the Lord strengthened Eglon against them. The king allied himself with the Ammonites and the Amalekites, invaded the land, and took "the city of palm trees," i. e., Jericho (B. C. perhaps 1100). Sixty years had passed since Jericho had been destroyed by Joshua. During that time the Israelites had rebuilt the ruined city, but they had not fortified it on account of the curse pronounced by Joshua upon anyone who should restore it as a fortress; so that the Moabites could easily conquer it, and, using it as a base, reduce the Israelites to servitude. Here Eglon built a palace (Josephus, Ant., v. 4, 1, sq.), which he occupied at least in the summer months (Judg. 3:20). (2) His death. After the Israelites had served him eighteen years the Lord raised up a deliverer in the person of EHUD (q. v.), a Benjamite. He was deputed to carry a present to the king, and after he had done so retired with his attendants. Returning to the king, whom he found in his summer parlor, he informed him that he had a secret message from God. Eglon dismissed his attendants and rose to receive the divine message with reverence, when Ehud plunged a dagger into the body of the king, whose obesity was such that the weapon was buried to the handle, and Ehud could not draw it out again. Ehud locked the door of the room, went out through the porch, and escaped to Seirath, in Mount Ephraim. Through delicacy the servants waited for a long time before they opened the door, when they found Ehud dead upon the floor (Judg. 3:12-26).

EGYPT (Heb. מִצְרַיִם, Gr. ἡ Αἴγυπτος, whence the modern Kopt through the Arabic Qibt).

1. The Territory. The Hebrew Misraim and the Greco-Roman Aegyptus have always included the same range of territory, viz., the region stretching northward from the first cataract of the Nile at Assouan (Syene), 24° north latitude, to the Mediterranean at 31° 30', eastward from the Nile to the Red Sea, and westward to the unknown desert. Practically, however, Egypt was limited to the district immediately watered and fertilized by the Nile and its affluents within these northern and southern limits. The popular division into Upper and Lower Egypt has been maintained from the earliest times. "Lower Egypt," the main portion, was always confined to the Delta, the fan-shaped region beginning at the modern Cairo and spreading out to the Mediterranean, where it extends from Alexandria on the west to Port Said on the east. "Upper Egypt" is now often used of Egypt proper, and "Lower Egypt" is often employed to include Nubia or Ethiopia (the Cush of the Bible), which reaches southward to Berber, above the Fifth Cataract. But this usage, while legitimate for modern Egypt, is quite erroneous when applied to the ancient country. The distance from the most northerly deposit of the Nile on the Mediterranean coast line southward to Assouan is five hundred and forty miles, but the winding course of the river makes the actual length of historical Egypt over six hundred miles. The widest spread of the Delta along the coast is one hundred and fifty miles, while it is scarcely one hundred miles from Cairo to the sea. Southward the inhabited land, measured by the inundations of the river, varies from three to ten miles in breadth. This strip of territory really marks the valley of the Nile, being the deposit of black mud formed by the river during many thousands of years. The bed of the Nile, however, follows the course of a mighty fracture made in the limestone rock of the country, toward the end of the tertiary period, by the rise of the present elevated land to the east of the river. This great fault or cleft received the water of the Nile. But the channel was nearly filled up in various ways by bowlders and gravel before the Nile mud was deposited in any great quantity. In the upper fifty miles of the valley between Assiout and Assouan the river follows its original channel through granite rocks, which here replace the northern limestone and make the first great cataract at Assouan. The black earth of the Nile valley, as distinguished from the red of the surrounding deserts, is thought to have given to the country the name by which it has always been known to the native race—Qemet, from Qem, "black."

2. The Inhabitants. As in Babylonia, so in Egypt, the problem of the original settlement is not yet fully solved. In both the presence of a Semitic element is certain. But while in Babylonia it predominated physically and intellectually it is difficult to prove as much for the earliest people of Egypt. It is hardly conclusive to say that no other race than the Semitic could have furnished the mental and moral impulses that started the Egyptian civilization. Yet the Semites were the only great civiliziers of the early Eastern world, and their influence in the rise of Egyptian culture may be reasonably suspected till a race of better pretensions shall be proven to have played a larger part. The points of contact between the Semites and the Egyptians that are surest are linguistic and particularly grammatical resemblances. For example, the languages of both races have nearly the same set of pronominal suffixes, the same endings for genders, and most of their numerals alike. They have also in common the use of a construct state, as well as several analogies in verb inflections. More fundamental still is the practical identity of the consonantal systems, including the peculiar Semitic gutturals. Less conclusive is the absence of a representation of the vowels in Semitic and Egyptian writing, for, as a matter of fact, the Semitic phonetic system which most resembles the hieroglyphic alphabets, viz., the Babylonian cuneiform, does indicate the vowels uniformly. Thus, as far as writing is concerned, we are thrown back upon a questionable relationship of the original ideographic systems. The vocabularies also are disappointing, since they show very few resemblances. Grammatical analogies are, however, the surest test of relationship, and point to a kinship more radical than that which is indicated by vocables alone. A proof of the Semitic derivation of the Egyptian culture has been sought in certain common features of the respective religions, and also in resemblances in ancient architecture. These analogies are not clear or numerous enough to throw light upon the earliest affinities of either race.

Besides this Semitic element, thus surely but remotely indicated, there is also a non-Semitic factor, presumably African, in the Egyptian race. No monumental purely Egyptian faces are Semitic in their general type of feature. On the other hand they are not Negro or Negroid, and we are driven to the negative conclusion that the missing components are to be sought among some of the vanished races of northern Africa. An attempt has, indeed, been made by Hommel to conjure with the mysterious name "Sumerian," and to show that both people and civilization are a product of a supposed pre-Semitic civilization in Babylonia. But the data are very far from sufficient. The Sumerians themselves are somewhat shadowy and elusive.

What has been said refers to the historical Egyptians, from about the fourth dynasty onward. But there are traces of human habitation as far back as the Pleistocene epoch, and of actual sculptured figures at least two types are apparent, pointing to the presence of other races before the historic age. Petrie regards it as possible that two races, which he calls the "large-eyed" and the "aquiline," preceded successively the later ruling people. The so-called "new race," whose discovery in 1895 has created such interest among Egyptologists, are not taken into account here, since they seem to have come in between the sixth and the tenth dynasties. As a remarkably diverging type they, however, deserve mention. They were apparently an invading people, who drove out the inhabitants from a large section of country in Upper Egypt. They knew nothing of writing, and were inferior to the ruling race of Egypt, and indeed to most ancient peoples, in all kinds of art except that of shaping flints and in pottery. They also worked in copper. Characteristic was their mode of burial, so different from that of the historic Egyptians, as they interred their dead in square grave pits, with the head to the south facing westward. The best opinion as to the origin of this people points to a Libyan source.

None of these racial types are Negro or Negroid, and for the presumably Semitic element in the Egyptian civilization we must look to Asia. A good deal of evidence indicates southwest Arabia, the Punt of the Bible, as the probable starting point of these immigrants. On the sculptured monuments there is, it is said, but one race represented whose face resembles the typical Egyptian—that of "Pun" or Punt. The first dynasty ruled at Abydos, and if the Asiatics had come by the Isthmus of Suez from northern Arabia their settlements would have been made in Lower rather than in Upper Egypt. To claim with Petrie that these people of Pun were connected with the historic Punic or Phœnician race is perhaps premature. The principal accessions of outsiders made to the population during historical times will be mentioned in the following brief abstract of the story of Egypt.

3. Chronology. As an introduction to the history the chronology of Egypt requires special mention. Unlike their contemporaries of Babylonia, the ancient Egyptians were not careful and accurate time measurers, and the chief source of information on this subject are ancient lists of kings, with more or less definite notation of time in connection with them. The current division of historical time is that of Manetho, an Egyptian priest, who wrote in Greek about 250 B. C., and whose work has been preserved in summaries or references by Josephus, Africanus, and Eusebius. He made out thirty-one dynasties of kings, with the length of each dynasty in years. A supplement and correction of his catalogue is afforded by monumental lists in temples or tombs or on papyri. These do not give the regnal years. Annals of the reigns of kings inscribed in temples or in tombs give very important data for determining the time of the recorded events. In spite of these helps there is not even an approximate agreement among scholars as to the probable duration of the earlier dynasties. Consequently also the total length of Egyptian history, in the strict sense of that term, is still a matter of conjecture. A table of "minimal dates" compiled by E. Meyer, and based upon the least numbers that can possibly be assumed, makes the first dynasty to have begun in 3180 B. C. Petrie, on the other hand, estimates four thousand seven hundred and seventy-seven years, though he makes no claim for approximate accuracy before 3410 B. C., about which time he thinks the sixth dynasty began. Perhaps we are justified in saying that the beginning of Egyptian history was not far either way from 4000 B. C. Back to the 16th century B. C. a reasonable degree of accuracy has been gained. Modern astronomical calculations fortunately aid in fixing important epochs. Their chief basis must be briefly referred to here. It is the so-called "Sothic period," named from "Sothis," the native name of the star Sirius. The Egyptians, not having had a leap year, lost one day in every four of their calendar years. In other words, the year began one day earlier every four years. Hence at the end of 1460-1461 years the circle of the year's retrogression would have been completed, and the new year would start exactly at the same season as at the beginning of the period, i. e., when the sun was in the same apparent position as at the opening of the era. This great period began and ended with the time when Sirius rose heliacally, or at the same time with the sun, on the same day of the current year. Such heliacal risings of Sirius are sometimes noted on the monuments, since they coincided with the annual inundation of the Nile. Upon this basis Malher has calculated the time of Thothmes III, the most powerful of the Egyptian kings, at 1503-1449 B. C., and other reigns have also been fixed as far as the interpretation of the memorials can be relied on to furnish the needed data.

4. History. Assuming it to be probable that the ruling race of Egypt came from the lower Red Sea region (Punt), we yet find it impossible to trace the earliest development of its civilization. It is apparently to this stage that we must refer the native mythical list of ten kings of This (near Abydos), in Upper Egypt, who reigned three hundred and fifty years, and the preceding thirty demigods, who covered a period of three thousand six hundred and fifty years, which, along with still earlier gods extending over thirteen thousand eight hundred and seventy years, seem to have been suggested by the traditions of a long-vanished past and the gradual transition from the unknown or obscure to the more familiar conditions of human life and action. It is unanimously agreed by ancient authorities that the first historic dynasty began with King Menes. Neither the names nor any authenticated remains of this ruler or of his successors of the first two dynasties have been discovered, but certain royal tombs supposed to belong to the period have been found at Abydos. Our knowledge, properly speaking, begins with the third dynasty; but some idea may be gained of the reality of antecedent history from the fact that kings of this dynasty were already working the copper mines of Sinai—an enterprise which implies travel, conquest, business relations, manufacture, a military system, and well-settled government. Already the political center had been transferred to Lower Egypt, at Memphis, an achievement credited by tradition to King Menes. In the fourth dynasty the civilization of Egypt seems to come before us as a finished product. The antecedent period is thus summarized by Petrie: "For a few centuries before the fourth dynasty (or from about 4500 B. C.) the dynastic Egyptians had been filtering into the Nile valley through the Koser road; they had early pushed down to Memphis, and got a footing there. Various rulers had arisen in different districts, who were remembered mainly by tradition. About a century before the fourth dynasty they consolidated their power: tools of copper were introduced, workmen were organized, and they began to use stone architecture, which was a novelty, all previous work having been in wood. The traditional tales about these kings were written down as stories, such as the Westcar papyrus. Lastly, in the nineteenth dynasty, these floating tales and traditional accounts were collected, and a continuous list of kings made out from them, all in consecutive order."

The fourth dynasty is that of the greatest of the pyramids, of which the largest is well known as that of Cheops (Chufu), the second of the line. According to Manetho, he reigned sixty-three years; his successor, Chephren, sixty-six years; and his successor, Mykerinus, sixty-three years. Each of the two latter was also the builder of an immense pyramid, the example having been set by Sneferu, the founder of this dynasty. The pyramid of Cheops is the greatest stone building ever erected. According to the reasonable account of Herodotus, it required the labor of one hundred thousand men for three months of each year for twenty years, the work being done when other employment was impossible, namely, during the season of the inundation of the Nile. From the fact that no preceding or succeeding monarch constructed so magnificent a pyramid we infer that its builder was an unrivaled architectural genius, an assumption confirmed by the marvelous exactness of the colossal workmanship. But the great pyramid of Chephren must also be mentioned, as well as his granite temple near by and his splendid diorite statue, the finest specimen of early Egyptian art. The Sphinx also is by many assigned to this dynasty. Of this dynasty we have only to add here that a great part of its enterprise was devoted to reclaiming by drainage the marshy land of the Delta. This task, indeed, represents much of the progressive activity of all the early dynasties.

The fifth dynasty was little distinguished. The sixth was, on the whole, aggressive and prosperous, though clouded with misfortune at the close. Its memorials, both written and artistic, are found all through Egypt, with records of expeditions to Nubia and northwest Arabia. Invasions from the latter quarter seem to have been frequent, since Pepi I, the third king of this dynasty, is credited with having subdued the restless Bedouins in five successive campaigns, in which he employed levies of subject Nubians. Of the dynasties from the seventh to the tenth we know little directly. We observe, however, that the rulers of Memphis were unable to retain that city as their capital and transferred their residence to Heracleopolis, south of the Fayum. The antecedent pressure must have come from Asia, and there is good evidence that an Asiatic kingdom or province was actually formed in the Delta during this obscure period. On the other hand, the kings who had their seat in Heracleopolis were unable to maintain themselves against the princes of Thebes, to whom the local rulers for the most part gave their allegiance. Both centers of influence must have also been greatly disturbed by the settlement of the "new race" which, as above stated, probably entered Upper Egypt during this transitional era.

With the tenth dynasty the "Old Kingdom" came to an end. The "Middle Kingdom," which lasted from the eleventh to the thirteenth, or, including the Hyksos domination, to the seventeenth, showed in the earlier stages remarkable vigor and enterprise. The period is first signalized by the predominance of Thebes, which was now the acknowledged capital in place of Memphis. Until the twelfth dynasty none had arisen which could compare in fame and power with the monumental fourth. Now, however, the great aim of the monarchy was not only internal development but foreign conquest as well. Monuments of this dynasty are found everywhere, even as far up the Nile as the Second Cataract. The complete conquest of Nubia was now effected, with a great increase of wealth in gold, slaves, and fighting men. The Delta also was for a time reclaimed, and statues of the Theban kings there found attest the expulsion of the foreigners. During the thirteenth dynasty decentralizing influences reasserted themselves, and while there was abundance of energy in various parts of the country there was no common governing power.

It is from this time that we must date the steady influx of the Asiatics, which resulted finally in the rule of the "Bedouin Princes," or Hyksos, as Manetho terms them. Their origin is not yet surely made out, but they were at least mainly of the Semitic family, consisting of various nomadic tribes from northern Arabia, Palestine, and Syria. It has been conjectured that the Elamitic conquest of Babylonia, which took place about the same period as their occupation of Egypt, may have led to the movement westward. It is far more probable that it was caused by the Babylonian occupation of Syria and Palestine, which, as we can infer from the El Amarna tablets, lasted for many centuries, and, as we know from other cuneiform records, began before the Elamitic régime in Babylonia. It was in the eastern part of the Delta, at Zoan and Avaris, that the strangers had their headquarters, whence at length they made their authority felt throughout Egypt proper. A marked result of their sway was the introduction of Semitic words into the language of the Egyptians and of Semitic gods into their worship. It is difficult to know whether Thebes ever submitted to them. If so, its subjugation was not permanent. Long resistance on the part of Upper Egypt gradually changed into aggression, with the result that at the close of the seventeenth dynasty the Hyksos were finally expelled from the country. The Asiatic occupation, however, exercised an influence upon the policy and history of Egypt until the latest times.

With the eighteenth dynasty (about 1587-1400 B. C.) begins the "New Kingdom," Thebes being again the capital. Egypt now attains to the summit of its power. The former possessions in Nubia and the Delta were recovered, and new dominions added both to the south and to the north. Extension in the latter direction is of most importance for Bible study. It was found that the only sure means of excluding the troublesome Asiatics was to occupy their territory. Hence the retreating Hyksos were followed across the Isthmus, and campaigns in western Asia became the order of the day. Two of the greatest conquerors of the time were Thothmes I, the third ruler of the dynasty, and Thothmes III, the sixth of the line. The latter extended his sway as far as the Euphrates, and even received tribute from beyond the river. In his first twenty years he led fifteen campaigns in Asia. The rising kingdom of Assyria sent to him propitiatory presents. These repeated expeditions were necessary to repress revolts, but the remainder of his long reign (1503-1449 B. C.) was mainly devoted to the arts of peace. He was the most powerful of all the Pharaohs. It was really a new Egypt which he ruled. Horses and chariots had changed the methods of war and created a new profession. Asiatic wives, gods, and customs became fashionable. The closest relations were maintained with all of western Asia. Wealth and luxury increased enormously. The official class grew at the expense of the tillers of the soil. The priesthood was the greatest permanent gainer. The temples and their ministers soon became all-powerful, and as the successors of Thothmes had little of his ability or energy they succumbed to the growing power of the hierarchy. At length the fourth king after Thothmes, usually known as Amenophis IV, son of a king of the same name, tired of the priestly yoke. In part or indirectly influenced by his Asiatic parentage, he determined to found a new and simpler religion—the sole worship of the sun's disc, or Aton. For this purpose he chose a new capital, on the site of the modern Tell el Amarna, half way between Thebes and Memphis. All other worship was proscribed but that of the solar deity and its life-giving rays. The attempt was unsuccessful. The age was not ripe for either a philosophic or a monotheistic religion. The forces of materialism triumphed after the death of this wonderful king (about 1370 B. C.). A few years later the dynasty itself came to an end, with Thebes once more the capital.

A great discovery has made clear to us the Asiatic relations of the latter half of this dynasty. At El Amarna were found in 1887 over three hundred letters, in cuneiform characters, from Babylonia, Assyria, northern Mesopotamia (Mitanni), Syria, and Palestine. From the two countries last named native governors, appointed by the Egyptian court, describe the precarious condition of their garrisons during the reigns of Amenophis III and IV. Local uprisings, treachery, and sedition of the officials, and the approach of the Hittites from the North, are the chief sources of danger. Among the familiar localities from which such letters were written were Tyre, Beirut, Accho, Gaza, Askalon, and Jerusalem. Sidon, Joppa, and Lachish are also referred to.

The no less famous nineteenth dynasty had not only to rehabilitate Egypt internally, but also to reestablish its power in Asia. The Hittites, now a strong confederacy, occupied Syria and threatened Palestine. Seti I, the third king of the line, after much marching, reconnoitering, and fighting, was fain to treat with the Hittite king. They agreed that the Egyptians might rule as far as Lebanon, and the Hittites from thence northward. Seti then successfully devoted himself to the upbuilding of his country internally. His successor, Rameses II (1347-1281), spent the first twenty-one of the sixty-seven years of his reign in desperate conflicts with the Hittites, which left him pretty much where he began, the division of the whole coast-land being virtually the same as that arranged by his father. The treaty with the Hittite prince, Chetta-sira, is very elaborate, and was long faithfully observed. Contented with the possession of Palestine, Rameses spent the rest of his life in strengthening and beautifying his kingdom and glorifying himself monumentally. To carry out his architectural designs he, like his great predecessors, made use of the conquered border populations. Among others were the Hebrew people, who had settled on the east of the Delta during the régime of the Hyksos and had prospered under their protection. After their overthrow and the beginning of the Asiatic invasions the lot of the Hebrews was naturally grievous. Rameses in particular pressed them hard with his rigorous system of forced labor. Pithom and Rameses were two of the military stations they helped to construct. These familiar names help us to follow the foreign policy of this dynasty as it sought to make sure of its hold upon northern Arabia and Palestine. There was, indeed, now little danger of direct aggression from that quarter. The real rival of Egypt was Assyria, the successor of Babylonia as the arbiter of western Asia, and it was still at a distance.

Far more serious trouble threatened from the western side. The Libyans, from whom the Egyptian armies had long been recruited, were preparing to make Egypt their own camping ground. Meneptha, the son and successor of Rameses II, found his reckoning with them the most serious business of his reign. With them were allied roving pirates from various parts of the Mediterranean, who had already wrought much destruction on the Syrian and Phœnician coast, and were destined to play a part in the fates of more historic peoples. The combination was defeated and Egypt saved for the time. In Palestine Meneptha held a more or less insecure dominion. Among the peoples whom he claims to have subdued in that region Israel finds a place—the only mention of the name, so far as is yet known, on the Egyptian monuments. Yet, as we shall see, it is very doubtful whether the Hebrew "Exodus" had yet taken place. The closing years of this dynasty were marked by confusion and anarchy. For a brief time a Syrian resident occupied the throne as one among many claimants.

Finally something like order was effected by Rameses III (1220-1190), the founder with his father of the twentieth dynasty. In the earlier years of his reign he had to repel renewed attacks from the Libyans, and a more formidable incursion of the maritime barbarians, who came not only directly by sea, but also by land through Syria and Palestine. They were defeated near the very border of Egypt

Their inroads and devastations broke up the remnants of the Hittite empire in Syria and made the Egyptians more insecure than ever in Palestine. Yet that country was not given up entirely till the time of the feeble successors of Rameses III, who bore his name without its traditional power or renown.

The twenty-first dynasty consisted of princes of Tanis (Zoan), who for a time reigned concurrently with a line of priestly usurpers. It was the latter who had put an end to the rule of the house of Rameses. But their régime in Thebes, as well as the Tanite princes, disappeared before the Libyan dynasty. The "New Kingdom" now gave place to foreign domination, which lasted from the twenty-second to the twenty-fifth dynasty. The founder of this new order was Sheshonk (Shishak), who had been commander of the army. It was he who gave shelter and his sister-in-law in marriage to Jeroboam as a fugitive from Solomon. But in the reigns of Jeroboam and Rehoboam he made a raid upon the two kingdoms of Israel. The unimportance of its results suggests the general character of Egyptian invasions of Asia. Though Jerusalem was occupied and plundered, the Egyptians soon disappeared. An unsuccessful raid against Judah was made by his third successor, Osorkon II ("Zerah," 2 Chron. 14:9, sq.). The following dynasty has an obscure history, but in its time the Ethiopians began the invasions which resulted in their sovereignty over the whole of Egypt. They first established themselves in Thebes and then gradually pushed northward. The end of the Libyan régime found twenty independent princes in the Delta. These were subdued after a stubborn resistance, but Pianchi, the Ethiopian king, wisely left them their petty realms on condition of vassalage. Hence the twenty-third and twenty-fourth dynasties are still named after native kings. But the twenty-fifth, under Sabako, the grandson of Pianchi, is titularly Ethiopian (728-646 B. C.).

The princes of the Delta, accordingly, followed the lead of Ethiopia, though sometimes seeming to act an independent part. Thus one of them, named Seva ("So," 2 Kings 17:4), allied himself with Hoshea of Israel and the Philistines of Gaza against Assyria. The fall of Samaria at the end of 722 B. C., and the defeat of the other allies by Sargon at Raphia in 720, frustrated the ambitious enterprise. In these and subsequent movements against Asia the inspiring motive came from the Ethiopian overlords, who now for a whole century cherished the design of restoring Egyptian ascendancy in Palestine and Syria. The result of the present attempt was, however, that Egypt narrowly escaped an Assyrian invasion. Sabataka, the son of Sabako, in 715 B. C., paid tribute directly to Sargon to save his territory from being overrun by the irresistible Assyrians.

A better chance for Egypt seemed to offer itself to the next Ethiopian monarch, Tirhaka (702-662 B. C.). Sargon died in 705, and the lately subjugated states from Babylonia to the Mediterranean revolted against his son Sennacherib. When the Assyrian king came upon Palestine in 701 Tirhaka marched to the relief of Hezekiah of Judah, but was defeated at Elteke. His government at home was, however, fairly prosperous. Thus he remained a constant obstacle to Assyria in the establishment of its great empire until Esar-haddon, the son of Sennacherib, carried the war into Africa. In 670 he annexed the country as far as Thebes and appointed as his governors, directly responsible to himself, the former Egyptian viceroys. Tirhaka fled to Ethiopia, but soon returned and started a rebellion. Esar-haddon died while on his way to put it down, and the task was left to his son, Assurbanipal. The governors assured him of their loyalty to Assyria. But the permanent submission of Egypt was a different matter. Necho I, of Sais, the most powerful of the princes of the Delta, and other chiefs united with Tirhaka. The uprising was repressed with great severity. Tirhaka again fled southward, and died soon thereafter. Necho was pardoned and held the Delta faithfully for the Assyrians. Urdaman, the nephew of Tirhaka, continued the war of independence. After some successes he had to retreat upon Thebes, which was taken, and met with a cruel fate at the hands of the Assyrians (comp. Nah. 3:8-10). A final defeat in Nubia itself brought the Ethiopian rule in Egypt to an end.

But the son of Necho, Psammetichus I, with the help of troops sent by Gyges, king of Lydia, rebelled in the name of ancient Egyptian independence, and by 645 B. C. Assurbanipal was obliged to relinquish the kingdom of the Nile. It had been an Assyrian dependency for a quarter of a century. Psammetichus was the founder of the twenty-sixth dynasty, under which the power of Egypt greatly revived. It was his policy and that of his successor, Necho II (610-594 B. C.), to favor the influx of Greek settlers and develop a great maritime commerce. The decline of Assyria encouraged the hope of a new Asiatic empire. Just before the fall of Nineveh, in 608 B. C., Necho struck into Palestine and Syria. Josiah of Judah, who intercepted his march, was defeated and slain at Megiddo, and his kingdom came under Egyptian control. Syria was then soon subdued by Necho. But the whole country had to be given up after his defeat at Carchemish, on the Euphrates (604 B. C.), by Nebuchadnezzar, the young Chaldean prince, who had already borne a hand in the capture of Nineveh.

Western Asia was now divided between the Chaldeans and their allies the Medes. Yet Egyptian intrigues were not yet at an end. It was partly through promises of Egyptian help that Jehoiakim of Judah, once an Egyptian vassal, and the last king, Zedekiah, were induced to revolt against Babylon. The two captivities of Judah were the result. Hophra, grandson of Necho II, was pharaoh at the time of the fall of Jerusalem (586 B. C.). Some time thereafter, during his reign, his kingdom was overrun by Nebuchadnezzar (comp. Jer. 46:13, sq.), but not long occupied by him. Imperial expansion was not the first aim of the Chaldean as it had been of the Assyrian empire. Generally, however, Egypt prospered until after the rise of Persia under Cyrus. In his time Amasis (Ahmes II) was on the throne of the Pharaohs. To check the progress of Cyrus he made a league with Croesus, king of Lydia, and Nabonidus, the last king of Babylon. Cyrus conquered Lydia before the allies could well combine their forces, and by his capture of Babylon in 538 even Egypt was at his mercy. His eastern affairs alone prevented its subjugation.

Cambyses, the son of Cyrus, undertook this task in 525. The conquered Egyptians were harshly treated by the cruel successor of the humane Cyrus. The Persian régime thus established lasted for more than a hundred years (525-414 B. C.). Cambyses conquered not only Egypt but Ethiopia. His rule was insanely tyrannical but brief. Darius Hystaspes (521-486) tried with success to administer Egypt on the old historical and religious lines. A revolt, encouraged by the Greek victory at Marathon, was suppressed by his son Xerxes (486-466). Still another revolt, lasting two years, was put down in 462 under Artaxerxes I. Prosperity attended the Persian rule thereafter till the final revolt in the reign of Darius II, in 414, made Egypt once more independent. By the aid of Greek generals and soldiers it maintained itself, under three nominal dynasties (twenty-eighth to thirtieth), against the repeated efforts of the later Persian kings to reinstate it. Then the vigorous Artaxerxes III (Ochus) subdued it after a desperate struggle (about 349 B. C.) waged against Nectanebus II, the last of the Pharaohs. The brief rule of Ochus was barbarous and cruel. It and the few years of Darius Codomannus are reckoned the thirty-first dynasty, which came to an end when Alexander of Macedon, after his final defeat of Darius (331), came over into Egypt. With the founding of Alexandria he founded also that Hellenic civilization which tolerated and at length superseded the old Egyptian culture. Hence, when Egypt again became independent, under the Ptolemies (323), not only the spirit but the very form of ancient Egypt was changed forever.

5. Religion. Just as there is a large tract of primitive Egyptian history that is beyond our ken, so the religion of Egypt is in its early stages very obscure. It is also mysterious all through the dynastic ages. The little that can be said here must therefore be confined to what is proved or probable. The basis of the popular religion is, as elsewhere, partly animistic and partly mythological. The former element is relatively much stronger than in the purely Semitic religions. That is to say, the worship of spirits—of men, animals, and plants—had practically more sway than had the personification of the powers of nature, as in myths of the sun-god, of darkness, clouds, or rain. Hence the persuasion of the persistence of the spirit life of men, or the doctrine of immortality, early took deep hold of the people of Egypt and gave character to their religion everywhere and always, no matter which of the multifarious cults were locally observed. An historical illustration of the decline of myth worship will help to make this distinction plain. Among the greatest of the deities were Ra, the chief solar divinity, and Osiris, the god and judge of the dead. The worship of the former tended always to become more speculative and subjective, and therefore less popular. It will be remembered that Amenophis IV made a special form of this cult, the adoration of Aten, or the solar disc, the state religion, and proscribed all others. His ill success brought about the depreciation of Ra worship generally, so that he became at last merely the local deity of On, the "Sun City" (Heliopolis).

From the point of view of historical development we observe that the polytheism of Egypt—originally to a great extent a "polydemonism"—arose from the combination of numberless local cults. This in its turn was due to the political alliance and ultimate union of the nomes or districts into which the country was very early divided. We must necessarily go further back of these elementary political divisions, and see in each of the surviving divinities a tribal deity, which in many cases was doubtless the totem of a family or clan. At the other extreme we see how Ptah, the deity of Memphis, became the great national deity with the rise of that city, and a like honor was conferred later upon Amon as the god of Thebes ("No-Amon"). It is also interesting to observe how the various leading deities are ranged about one or the other of the two imperial gods, Ra and Osiris, the one giving and controlling life, the other ruling the world of the dead. Along with these four, though standing alone on account of his unique character, was Hapi, the god of the Nile, whose worship was naturally the expression of gratitude. For other deities, some of them the result of speculation rather than of traditional worship, the reader must consult special works, though he will find there little agreement as to the attributes and mutual relations of even such familiar divinities as Horus, Hathor, Neit, Isis, and Set.

The rampant animism of the religion is shown in the prevailing notions as to human existence. Besides the soul, the spirit, and the shadow of the man, there was the most important of all, his ka, or double. This counterpart of each individual was held to survive with him after death as long as the body was incorrupt. Hence the need and practice of embalming the dead. The forms under which the various divinities were worshiped were chosen, we may presume, partly as emblems, partly as survivals of primitive totem superstition, and partly because certain sacred objects, beneficent or maleficent, needed propitiation. Interesting from these points of view is the adoration of a large number of animals, and their association with one or another of the ruling deities. For the religious literature, and especially the great pyramid texts of the fifth and sixth dynasties and "the Book of the Dead," reference must be made to the special works, where also the subjects of general literature and art may be studied.

6. Relations with Israel. The historical points of contact between Egypt and Asia, and especially the people of Palestine, have been noticed in the foregoing sketch. It will be necessary here merely to make some general remarks. We make two great periods: (1) The time before the Exodus. Egypt, as well as Babylonia, had much to do in preparing a home-land for the people of Israel, whose successful occupation of Canaan depended upon their being able to cope with the Canaanites. Had these remained an independent people they could not have been subdued by Israel. But Palestine was for six centuries (about 2300-1700 B. C.) occupied by Babylonians, and during three later centuries (about 1500-1200 B. C.) it was practically a province of Egypt. The Hebrews of the Exodus entered Canaan after the retirement of the Egyptians and found its formidable people disunited and without political aptitude or cohesion, largely on account of their long dependence upon foreigners. Again Egypt was the nursery of Israel during the childhood of the nation. The Hebrews, to be sure, led there a sort of parasitic existence. Yet they were brought thither "to save many people alive." Nor was their Egyptian history one of mere unprogressive living. It was here that the family group developed into clans and tribes, ready to take their part in the forming of the nation in a better and more suitable home. Here also some of the great events occurred which never ceased to influence the national life and spirit. (2) The time after the Exodus. With the calling of Israel "out of Egypt" (Hos. 14:1) all close relations between the two peoples ceased. Egypt never again received any great number of Israelites. It was sometimes a resort of political refugees, none numerous of whom were the survivors of the fall of Jerusalem, who dreaded, in spite of the exhortations of Jeremiah, to remain in Canaan under Babylonian protection (2 Kings 25:26; Jer. 41:17-44:30). The Egyptian control of Palestine antedated the Exodus, and, though occasional efforts were made thereafter to subdue the country, none met with success till six hundred years later, in the days of Pharaoh Necho. Egypt was always a secondary political power in Asia. Its long occupation of Palestine and Syria were only possible during the interval between the Babylonian and the Assyrian supremacy, when these two powers were busy contending with one another. During the history of Israel in Canaan Egypt played normally the part of an intriguer against Assyria and the Chaldeans, seducing Israel to revolt with promises of help, and leaving it in the lurch when the time came for action. Hence the biting sarcasm of the nickname given to Egypt by Isaiah (30:7), "the do-nothing blusterer." Its only achievement of consequence in Asia during these six hundred years, the conquest by Necho, was made when Assyria was moribund and the Chaldeans had not yet come to power.

Even less than the political was the religious influence of Egypt upon Israel. The two races had little in common fundamentally, Egypt being outside the historic Semitic realm. The Hebrews accordingly were in no wise impressed by what they saw in Egypt before the Exodus, and thereafter they had little inducement to copy its customs in any sphere. No usage or ceremony or belief mentioned in the Bible as being practiced or professed by Israel can be clearly traced to an Egyptian source. On the other hand, Assyria, and especially Babylonia, along with the Canaanitic peoples, greatly affected the popular worship of Israel.

Accordingly, while the indirect testimony of the Egyptian monuments to the truth of the Bible narratives is very great, it is not surprising that they have furnished so little direct illustration.

The little that seems to be specially applicable only tends, so far, to increase the difficulty of interpreting the monuments as an aid to the understanding of the Old Testament. Their only mention of "Israel"—the statement by Meheptah, alluded to above—is as yet a puzzle. If made before the Exodus, how did "Israel" happen to be then in Canaan? If made after the Exodus, why does the Bible say nothing of the successive attempts made by Egypt to reconquer Canaan in the days of Meheptah and his successors? In striking contrast with the indefiniteness and incoherence of the Egyptian records, those of Assyria and Babylonia furnish an almost complete historical commentary upon the outlines of the Old Testament story, from the Creation to the close of the Exile, besides furnishing the basis of biblical and oriental chronology. Yet Egypt plays a large and important part in the complete record of Revelation, and a clear understanding of its fascinating history, its religion, and its national character is indispensable to every student of the Bible. See SUPPLEMENT.—J. F. McC.

E'HI (Heb. אֶחִי, ay-khee', brotherly), one of the "sons" of Benjamin (Gen. 46:21). He is probably the grandson called AHIRAM (q. v.) in Num. 26:38. In the parallel passage (1 Chron. 8:6) he seems to be called EHUD (q. v.).

E'HUD (Heb. אֶחָד, ay-hood', union).

1. A descendant of Benjamin, progenitor of one of the clans of Geba that removed to Manahath (1 Chron. 8:6). He seems to be the same as Ahiram (Num. 26:38), and if so Ahiham is probably the right name, as the family were called Ahiramites. In 1 Chron. 8:1 the same person seems to be called Aharah, and perhaps also Ahoah in v. 4; Ahiah, v. 7; and Aher, 1 Chron. 7:12.

2. The third named of the seven sons of Bilhan, the son of Jediael and grandson of the patriarch Jacob (1 Chron. 7:10), B. C. about 1640.

3. A judge of Israel, the son (descendant) of Gera, a Benjamite. The name Gera was hereditary among the Benjamites (Gen. 46:21; 2 Sam. 16:5; 1 Chron. 8:3, 5).

Personal History. Ehud was the second judge of Israel, or rather of that part of Israel which he delivered from the Moabites. (1) Israel under Moab. Israel having lapsed into idolatry, the Lord strengthened Eglon, the king of Moab, against them. With the assistance of the Ammonites and the Amalekites he invaded the land and took Jericho (Judg. 3:12, 13) and held Israel under tribute eighteen years (B. C. perhaps 1100-1082).

(2) Ehud slays Eglon. Deputed by the children of Israel, Ehud brought a present (probably tribute) to Eglon. He departed with those who bore the gift, but, turning again at "the quarries (margin, graven images) that were by Gilgal," he presented himself before the king in his summer parlor. He secured the dismissal of the attendants by declaring that he had a "secret errand" unto Eglon. When they were alone "Ehud said, I have a message from God unto thee," and the king rose to receive it with reverence. Immediately Ehud, who was left-handed, drew a dagger from his right thigh and plunged it so deeply into Eglon's abdomen that the fat closed upon the hilt and Ehud could not withdraw it. Leaving the room, he locked the door and fled by way of the quarries into Seirath. (3) Overcomes Moab. Ehud now summoned the Israelites to Seirath, in the mountains of Ephraim. First taking the fords of Jordan, he fell upon the Moabites, defeating them with a loss of ten thousand of their best men. And so the land had rest for eighty years (Judg. 3:15-30).

NOTE.—“The conduct of Ehud must be judged according to the spirit of those times, when it was thought allowable to adopt any means of destroying the enemy of one's nation. The treacherous assassination of the hostile king is not to be regarded as an act of the Spirit of God, and therefore is not set before us as an example.” Beyond his commission as deliverer of Israel we do not suppose that God gave Ehud any special commands, but left him to the choice of such measures and plans of conquest as his own judgment and skill might devise.

E'KER (Heb. עֵקֶר, ay'-ker, transplanted, foreigner, Lev. 25:47), the youngest of the three sons of Ram, the grandson of Hezron (1 Chron. 2:27).

EK'RON (Heb. עֵקְרוֹן, ek-rone', extermination), a city of the Philistines, about eleven miles from Gath. It belonged successively to Judah (Josh. 13:3) and Dan (Josh. 19:43) and to the Philistines (1 Sam. 5:10). Here the ark was carried (1 Sam. 5:10, 6:1-8). The fly god was worshipped here (2 Kings 1:2). Robinson found its site at Akir, ten miles N. E. of Ashdod.

EK'RONITE (Josh. 13:3; 1 Sam. 5:10), an inhabitant of the Philistine city of EKRON (q. v.).

EL (Heb. אֱל, ale, mighty, especially the Almighty), God, either Jehovah or a false god; sometimes a hero or magistrate. It occurs as a prefix (and suffix) to several Hebrew words, e. g., El-Beth-el.

EL'ADAH (Heb. אֱלֵאדָה, el-aw-daw', God has decked), one of the sons (rather than later descendants, as the text seems to state) of Ephraim (1 Chron. 7:20); perhaps the same as ELEAD (q. v.) of v. 21, since several of the names (see TAHATH) in the list appear to be repeated.

ELAH (Heb. אֵלָה, ay-law', oak, any large vergreen).

1. One of the Edomitish “dukes,” or chieftains, in Mount Seir (Gen. 36:41; 1 Chron. 1:52).

2. The father of Shimci, one of Solomon's purveyors (1 Kings 4:18), B. C. after 960.

3. The son and successor of Baasha, king of Israel (1 Kings 16:8-10). He reigned for only parts of two years (B. C. 888-886), and was then killed while drunk by Zimri, in the house of his steward, Arza (in Tirzah), who was probably a confederate in the plot. He was the last king of Baasha's line, and by this catastrophe the predictions of the prophet Jehu (1 Kings 16:1-4) were accomplished.

4. The father of Hoshea, last king of Israel (2 Kings 15:30; 17:1), B. C. before 730.

5. One of the three sons of Caleb, the son of Jephunneh (1 Chron. 4:15), B. C. about 1210. This passage ends with the words “even (or and) Kenaz,” showing that a name had been dropped out before it (Keil, Com.).

6. The son of Uzzi, and one of the Benjamite heads of families who were taken into captivity (1 Chron. 9:8), or rather, perhaps, returned from it and dwelt in Jerusalem, B. C. 536.

7. Vale of Elah. Located eleven miles S. W. from Jerusalem, the scene of Goliath's death at the hands of David (1 Sam. 17:2; 21:9). Geikie speaks of a terebinth tree at this place, fifty-five feet in height and seventeen feet in circumference, with foliage wide enough to cast shade in extent seventy-five feet. It is the modern Wady es-Sunt, or valley of the acacia tree. Its entrance from the Philistine plain is commanded by the famous Tell-es-Sāfiyeh.

E'LAM (Heb. אֱלָם, ay-lawm', hidden).

1. The first named of the sons of Shem (Gen. 10:22; 1 Chron. 1:17). His descendants probably settled in that part of Persia which was afterward frequently called by this name.

2. A chief man of the tribe of Benjamin, one of the sons of Shashak, resident at Jerusalem at the captivity or on the return (1 Chron. 8:24), B. C. 536.

3. A Korhite Levite, fifth son of Meshelemiah, who was one of the porters of the tabernacle in the time of David (1 Chron. 26:3), B. C. 1000.

4. The progenitor of a family who returned with Zerubbabel (B. C. 536) to the number of twelve hundred and fifty-four (Ezra 2:7; Neh. 7:12). A further detachment of seventy-one men came with Ezra (Ezra 8:7). It was, probably, one of this family, Shechaniah, son of Jehiel who encouraged Ezra in his efforts against the indiscriminate marriages of the people (Ezra 10:2), and six of the “sons of Elam” accordingly put away their foreign wives (Ezra 10:26).

5. In the same lists is a second Elam, whose sons, to the same number as in the former case, returned with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:31; Neh. 7:34), and which, for the sake of distinction, is called “the other Elam.” “The coincidence of numbers is curious, and also suspicious, as arguing an accidental repetition of the foregoing name” (Smith, Dict., s. v.).

6. One of the chiefs of the people who signed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. 10:14), B. C. 445.

7. One of the priests who accompanied Nehemiah and took part in the dedication of the new wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 12:42), B. C. 445.

8. The name of a country inhabited by the descendants of Shem (Gen. 14:1-9; Isa. 11:11). The name corresponds to the Elymais of the Greek and Roman writers. It comprehended Susiana, now Khusistan. The seat of an ancient monarchy, the rival of Chaldea, powerful in the days of Abraham (Gen. 14:1-9). “The doom of the country came with Nebuchadnezzar. After the fall of Babylon they were incorporated with the Persian, then with the Syro-Macedonian, and finally with the Parthian Empire. A remarkable confirmation of Scripture is a record of the Assyrian Asshur-banipal (B. C. 668-626), recently deciphered: ‘In my fifth expedition to Elam I directed the march. . . . I overwhelmed Elam through its extent. I cut off the head of Teummam, their wicked king, who devised evil. Beyond number I slew his soldiers; alive in hand I captured his fighting men’” (Schaff-Herzog, Cyc.).

E'LAMITES (Ezra 4:9; Acts 2:9), the original inhabitants of the country called Elam; they were descendants of Shem, and perhaps received their name from an actual man, Elam (Gen. 10:22).

EL'ASAH (Heb. אֱלֹאֶשָׁא, el-aw-saw', God has made).

1. One of the sons of Pashur, a priest, who renounced his Gentile wife, whom he had married during the captivity or after (Ezra 10:22), B. C. 457.

2. The son of Shaphan, one of the two men who were sent on a mission by King Zedekiah to Nebuchadnezzar at Babylon. They at the same time took charge of the letter of Jeremiah the prophet to the captives in Babylon (Jer. 29:3), B. C. about 593.

E'LATH (Heb. אֵילָתַי, ay-lath', a grove), or E'LOTH (Heb. אֵילוֹתַי, ay-lōth', a grove), a town of Edom, usually mentioned together with Ezion-geber, and situated at the head of the Gulf of Akabah. It would seem to have been a more ancient, at least more notable place, than Ezion-geber, from its being used to indicate the location of the latter. It first occurs in the account of the wanderings (Deut. 2:8), and in later times must have come under the rule of David in his conquest of the land of Edom (2 Sam. 8:14). We find the place named again in connection with Solomon's navy (1 Kings 9:26; comp. 2 Chron. 8:17). It was apparently included in the revolt of Edom against Joram recorded in 2 Kings 8:20; but it was taken by Azariah (14:22). After this, however, "Rezin, king of Syria, recovered Elath, and drove out the Jews from Elath, and the Syrians came to Elath, and dwelt there to this day" (16:6). From this time the place is not mentioned until the Roman period, during which it became a frontier town of the south and the residence of a Christian bishop.

EL-BETH'-EL (Heb. אֵל בֵּית־אֵל, ale-bayth-ale', the God of Beth-el), the name given by Jacob to the altar which he erected at Beth-el on his return from Laban (Gen. 35:7). It was built in memory of God's appearance to him in the vision of the "ladder" (Gen. 28:12, sq.; 35:7).

EL'DAAH (Heb. אֵל־דָּאָה, el-daw-aw', God of knowledge), the last named of the five sons of Midian, Abraham's son by Keturah (Gen. 25:4; 1 Chron. 1:33), B. C. after 2,000.

EL'DAD (Heb. אֵל־דָּד, el-dawd', God has loved), one of the seventy elders appointed to assist Moses in the administration of justice, B. C. 1210. These elders were assembled before the door of the tabernacle and received the spirit of prophecy from God (Num. 11:24, 25). Eldad is mentioned along with Medad, another elder, as having received the same gift, although for some reason they were not with the other elders, but remained in the camp. A young man brought word to Moses that these two persons were prophesying in the camp, and Joshua entreated Moses to forbid them. But Moses replied: "Enviest thou for my sake? Would God that all the Lord's people were prophets, and that the Lord would put his Spirit upon them!" (Num. 11:26-29). The mode of prophesying, in the case of Eldad and Medad, was probably the extempore production of hymns chanted forth to the people. Compare the case of Saul (1 Sam. 10:11).

ELDER (Heb. זָקֵן, zaw-kane', old; Gr. πρεσβύτερος, older; Eng. presbyter). In early times books were scarce, and the aged of the tribes were the depositories of the traditions of bygone generations. The old men, moreover, had most experience and were the heads of large families, over whom they exercised supreme authority. Great reverence was paid to the aged among the Hebrews and other nations (Lev. 19:32; Deut. 32:7; Job 12:12; Prov. 16:31). Identifying old age with matured wisdom, knowledge, and experience, and as a reward for a virtuous and godly life, the aged were from time immemorial chosen to fill the official positions in the community. The name elder came to be used as the designation for the office itself.

1. In the Old Testament the term elder is applied to various offices; to Eliezer, who is described as the "eldest servant" (R. V. elder, i. e., major-domo, Gen. 24:2); the officers of Pharaoh's household (Gen. 50:7), and David's head servants (2 Sam. 12:17). "The ancients of Gebal" (Ezek. 27:9) are understood to be the master workmen. The elders of Egypt (Gen. 50:7) were probably the state officers, and the term as denoting a political office applied not only to the Hebrews and Egyptians, but also to the Moabites and Midianites (Num. 22:7). "According to patriarchal custom the fathers, standing by the right of birth (primogeniture) at the head of the several tribes and divisions of tribes, regulated the relations of the tribes and clans, punished offenses and crimes, and administered law and equity. Thus from the heads of tribes, clans, and families proceeded the elders, who, even before the time of Moses, formed the superiors of the people. For Moses and Aaron, on their arrival in Egypt, gathered the elders of Israel to announce to the people their divine commission to lead them out of the bondage of Egypt (Exod. 3:16, 18; 4:29)." They accompanied Moses in his first interview with Pharaoh (Exod. 3:18); through them Moses gave his communications and commands to the people (Exod. 19:7; Deut. 31:9); they were his immediate attendants in all the great transactions in the wilderness (Exod. 17:5); seventy of them accompanied Moses to Sinai (Exod. 24:1), when they were called nobles. Seventy of them were also appointed to bear the burden of government with Moses (Num. 11:16, 17). As in the legislation of Moses certain things were committed to the charge of the elders of each particular city (Deut. 19:12; 21:3, etc.), it was clearly implied that the people, on their settlement in Canaan, were expected to appoint persons ("elders"), who would see that divine regulations were executed in the several districts (see Josh. 20:4; Judg. 8:16; Ruth 4:2, etc.). In the Psalms and the prophets elders are spoken of as a distinct class, with an official character, and occupying a somewhat separate position (Psa. 107:32; Lam. 2:10; Ezek. 14:1, etc.). After the return from the Exile the office rose into higher significance and fuller organization. With every synagogue (q. v.) there was connected a government of elders, varying in numbers according to the population attached to it. The rulers of the synagogue and the elders of the people were substantially one, and a certain number of those elders belonged to the SANHEDRIN (q. v.).

2. In the New Testament they were associated sometimes with the chief priests (Matt. 21:23), sometimes with the chief priests and scribes (Matt. 16:21), or the council (Matt. 26:59), always taking an active part in the management of public affairs. Luke speaks of the whole order by the collective term of eldership (Gr. πρεσβυτεριον, pres-boo-ter'-ee-on, Luke 22:66; Acts 22:5). There is no specific account given of the origin of the eldership in the apostolic Church. We find officers called indifferently elders or presbyters and bishops (Gr. ἐπισκοπος, ep-is'-kop-os, superintendent). This office pertained to local congregations and was extended as the churches multiplied, and was distinguished from that of deacon. Elders first came into prominence on the scattering abroad of the disciples and the withdrawing of the apostles from Jerusalem, following the death of Stephen. They were associated with James to give direction to the affairs of the church, and appear to have been a well-known and established class of officials (Acts 11:30), and come into greater prominence in association with the apostles (Acts 15:2). With the "brethren" they constituted the council at Jerusalem to which was referred the circumcision, and united with the apostles and the church in sending delegates to Antioch and other churches, who should convey the decision of the council (Acts 15:22, 23). When Paul visits Jerusalem for the last time he betakes himself to James, the president, where he finds all the elders assembled (Acts 21:18, sq.). The "elders" of the New Testament Church were the "pastors" (Eph. 4:11), "bishops or overseers" (Acts 20:28, etc.), "leaders" and "rulers" (Heb. 13:7; 1 Thess. 5:12, etc.) of the flock. They were also the regular teachers of the congregation, whose duty it was to expound the Scriptures and administer the sacraments (1 Tim. 3:2; Tit. 1:9). The Jewish Christians, following the pattern of the synagogue as well as of political administration of cities, which was vested in a senate or college, readily adopted the presbytery. Consequently we meet it everywhere in the plural, and as a corporation at Jerusalem (Acts 11:30; 15:4, 6, 23; 21:18), at Ephesus (20:17, 28), at Philippi (Ph. 1:1), at the ordination of Timothy (1 Tim. 4:14, etc.

"The essential identity of presbyters and bishops in the apostolic age is a matter of well nigh absolute historic demonstration. The same officers of the church of Ephesus are alternately called presbyters and bishops. Paul sends greetings to the bishops and deacons of Philippi, but omits the presbyters because they were included in the first term, as also the plural indicates. In the pastoral epistles, when Paul intends to give the qualifications for all church officers he again mentions two, bishops and deacons, but the term presbyters afterward for bishops. Peter urges the presbyters to 'tend the flock of God, and to fulfill the office of bishops,' with disinterested devotion and without lording it over the charge allotted them. The interchange of terms continued in use to the close of the 1st century, as is evident from the epistle of Clement of Rome (about A. D. 95), and still lingered toward the close of the second" (Schaff, Hist. Christ. Church). The reason of the use of two terms for persons having the same essential functions has given rise to much discussion.

Two general suggestions have been made: (1) The term presbyter has been claimed to be of Jewish derivation, and to have been used at first only by Jewish-Christian congregations. In communities where a Christian church had sprung from the bosom of a local synagogue, and was therefore chiefly under the control of Jewish tradition and thought, the term presbyter, which was the name of the governing body of the synagogue, would be naturally transferred to officers of similar function in the Christian societies. It is likewise true that the term "bishop" is used to designate one of like official duty in the churches of almost exclusively Gentile origin. (2) A second theory is that the bishop of the Christian Church was analogous in office and function to that of the president of the heathen fraternities or clubs. To administer the funds of these organizations became a matter of primary importance, and the officer charged with this duty was termed an episcopus.

The peculiar environment of the first Christian believers compelled like provision for the exercise of systematic charities. Most of the early disciples were of the poorer class, and many more, upon profession of the Christian faith, became outcasts from their families and homes.

3. In the Modern Church. (1) In the Roman Catholic Church, the Church of England, and the Protestant Episcopal Church "priest" is generally used instead of "presbyter" or "elders," to designate the second order in the ministry (the three orders being bishops, priests, and deacons). (2) In the Methodist Episcopal Church only two orders of ministers are recognized, elders and deacons, the bishop being chosen (primus inter pares) as superintendent. (3) Among Congregationalist and all Churches having the presbyterian form of government the two orders of elders and deacons are recognized. Among Presbyterians there are two classes of elders, viz., teaching elders (pastors) and ruling elders (laymen).

E'LEAD (Heb. עֲלֵאד, el-aw'd', God has applauded), a descendant of Ephraim (1 Chron. 7:21), but whether through SHUTHLEAH (q. v.), or a son of the patriarch (the second Shuthelah being taken as a repetition of the first, and Ezer and Elead as his brothers), is not determined.

ELEA'LEH (Heb. עֲלֵאֵלֵה, el-aw-lay', God has ascended), a town of the Amorites, in the country east of the Jordan, in the tribe of Reuben (Num. 32:3-37). Prophetic threats were uttered against it (Isa. 15:4; 16:9; Jer. 48:34). The present El-Al, about a mile N. from Heshbon.

ELE'ASAH (Heb. עֲלֵאשָׁא, el-aw-saw'), more properly ELASAH (q. v.).

1. The son of Helez, one of the descendants of Judah, of the family of Hezron (1 Chron. 2:39).

2. Son of Rapha, or Rephaiah, a descendant of Saul through Jonathan and Merib-baal, or Mephibosheth (1 Chron. 8:37; 9:43), B. C. after 1080.

ELEAZAR (Heb. אֵלֵאָזָר, el-aw-zawr', God is helper), a common name among the Hebrews.

1. The high priest. The third son of Aaron by Elisheba, daughter of Amminadab (Exod. 6:23; 28:1). He married a daughter of Putiel, who bore him Phinehas (6:25), B. C. before 1210. (1) Succeeds to priesthood. After the death of Nadab and Abihu without children (Lev. 10:1; Num. 3:4), Eleazar was appointed chief over the principal Levites, to have the oversight of those who had charge of the sanctuary (Num. 3:32). After the destruction of Korah and his company, Eleazar gathered up their censers out of the fire to make plates for a covering of the altar of burnt offering (16:37-39). With his brother Ithamar he ministered as a priest during their father's lifetime.

(2) As high priest. Immediately before the death of Aaron Moses went with them both unto Mount Hor, where he invested Eleazar with the sacred garments, as the successor of Aaron in the office of high priest (Num. 20:25-29), B. C. about 1170. One of his first duties was, in conjunction with Moses, to superintend the census of the people (26:1-4). He also assisted at the inauguration of Joshua (27:18-23) and at the division of the spoil taken from the Midianites (31:21). After the conquest of Canaan he took part in the division of the land (Josh. 14:1). The time of his death is not mentioned in Scripture. Josephus says that it took place about the same time as Joshua's, twenty-five years after the death of Moses. The high priesthood is said to have remained in the family of Eleazar until the time of Eli, into whose family, for some reason unknown, it passed until it was restored to the family of Eleazar in the person of Zadok (1 Sam. 2:27; 1 Chron. 6:8; 24:3; 1 Kings 2:27) (Smith, s. v.).

2. An inhabitant of Kirjath-jearim, who was set apart by his fellow-townsmen to attend upon the ark while it remained in the house of his father, Abinadab, after it had been returned to the Hebrews by the Philistines (1 Sam. 7:1, 2); B. C. before 1030. It is not stated that Eleazar was a Levite; but this is very probable, because otherwise they would hardly have consecrated him to be the keeper of the ark, but would have chosen a Levite for the purpose.

3. The son of Dodo the Ahohite, that is, possibly, a descendant of Ahoah, of the tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron. 8:4), one of the three most eminent of David's thirty-seven heroes, who "fought till his hand was weary" in maintaining with David and the other two a daring stand after "the men of Israel had gone away." He was also one of the same three when they broke through the Philistine host to gratify David's longing for a drink of water from the well of his native Bethlehem (2 Sam. 23:9, 17; 1 Chron. 11:12), B. C. about 970.

4. A Levite, son of Mahli, and grandson of Merari (B. C. after 1210). He is mentioned as having had only daughters, who were married by their "brethren," i. e., cousins (1 Chron. 23:21, 22; 24:28).

5. The son of Phineas, and associated with the priests and Levites in taking charge of the sacred treasure and vessels restored to Jerusalem after the Exile (Ezra 8:33), B. C. about 457. It is not definitely stated, however, whether he was a priest or even a Levite.

6. One of the descendants of Parosh, an Israelite (i. e., layman) who, on returning from Babylon, denounced the Gentile wife whom he had married. (Ezra 10:25), B. C. 456.

7. One of those who encompassed the walls of Jerusalem on their completion (Neh. 12:42), B. C. 445. He is probably the same with No. 5.

8. The son of Eliud, in the genealogy of Jesus Christ (Matt. 1:15).

ELECT (Heb. בָּחַר, baw-kheer', chosen, and so rendered in 2 Sam. 21:6), used to denote those selected by God for special office, work, honor, etc. (Isa. 42:1; 45:4; 65:9, 22). The term was sometimes applied in the Early Church (1) to the whole body of baptized Christians; (2) to the highest class of catechumens *elect*ed to baptism; (3) and to the newly baptized, as especially admitted to the full privileges of the profession.

ELECTION (Gr. ἐκλογή, ek-log-ay', choice, a picking out).

1. Bible Meaning. This word in the Scriptures has three distinct applications. (1) To the divine choice of nations or communities for the possession of special privileges with reference to the performance of special services. Thus the Jews were "a chosen nation," "the elect." Thus also in the New Testament bodies of Christian people, or churches, are called "the elect." (2) The divine choice of individuals to a particular office or work. Thus Cyrus was elected of God to bring about the rebuilding of the temple. Thus the twelve were chosen to be apostles, and Paul to be the apostle to the Gentiles. (3) The divine choice of individuals to be the children of God, and therefore heirs of heaven.

It is with regard to election in this third sense that theological controversies have been frequent and at times most fierce. Calvinists hold that the election of individuals to salvation is absolute, unconditional, by virtue of an eternal divine decree. Arminians regard election as conditional upon repentance and faith. The decree of God is that all who truly repent of their sins and believe on the Lord Jesus Christ shall be saved. But every responsible person determines for himself whether or not he will repent and believe. Sufficient grace is bestowed upon everyone to enable him to make the right decision.

2. The Calvinistic View. The Westminster Confession, the standard of the Church of Scotland, and of the various Presbyterian Churches of Europe and America, contains the following statement: "God from all eternity did by the most wise and holy counsel of his own will freely and unchangeably ordain whatsoever comes to pass; yet so as thereby neither is God the author of sin, nor is violence offered to the will of the creatures, nor is the liberty or contingency of second causes taken away, but rather established. Although God knows whatsoever may or can come to pass upon all supposed conditions, yet hath he not decreed anything because he foresaw its future, or as that which would come to pass upon such conditions. By the decree of God, for the manifestation of his glory some men and angels are predestinated unto everlasting life and others foreordained to everlasting death. These angels and men, thus predestinated and foreordained are particularly and unchangeably designed, and their number is so certain and definite that it cannot be either increased or diminished. Those of mankind that are predestinated unto life, God, before the foundation of the world was laid, according to his eternal and immutable purpose, and the secret counsel and good pleasure of his will, hath chosen in Christ unto everlasting glory, out of his mere free grace and love, without any foresight of faith, or good works, or perseverance in either of them, or any other thing in the creature, as conditions or causes moving him thereto; and all to the praise of his glorious grace. As God hath appointed the elect unto glory, so hath he, by the eternal and most free purpose of his will, foreordained all the means thereunto. Therefore, they who are elected, being fallen in Adam, are redeemed by Christ, are effectually called unto faith in Christ, by his Spirit working in due season; are justified, adopted, sanctified, and kept by his power through faith unto salvation. Neither are any other redeemed by Christ, effectually called, justified, adopted, sanctified, and saved, but the elect only. The rest of mankind God was pleased, according to the unsearchable counsel of his own will, whereby he extendeth or withholdeth mercy, as he pleaseth, for the glory of his sovereign power over his creatures, to pass by, and to ordain them to dishonor and wrath for their sin, to the praise of his glorious justice."

In support of this doctrine it is argued by Calvinistic theologians: (1) That according to the Scriptures election is not of works but of grace; and that it is not of works means that it is not what a man does that determines whether he is to be one of the elect or not. For the descendants of Adam this life is not a probation. They stood their probation in Adam, and do not stand each one for himself. (2) That the sovereignty of God in electing men to salvation is shown by the fact that repentance and faith are gifts from God. These fruits of his Spirit are the consequences and signs of election and not its conditions. (3) The salvation which is of grace must be of grace throughout. The element of works or human merit must not be introduced at any point in the plan. And this would be the case if repentance and faith were the conditions of election. (4) That the system of doctrine called Calvinistic, Augustinian, Pauline, should not be thus designated. That though taught clearly by Paul, particularly in Rom. 8:9, it was taught also by others of the writers of sacred scripture, and by Christ himself. Reference is made to Matt. 11:25, 26; Luke 4:25-27; 8:10; John 6:37, 39, et al. (5) That the sovereignty of God as evidenced in dispensing saving grace is illustrated also in his establishing the temporal conditions of mankind. Some are born and reared in the surroundings of civilization, others of barbarism. And precisely so some are blessed with the light of the Gospel, while others, dwelling in pagan lands, are deprived of that light, and consequently are not saved.

This system of strict Calvinism above outlined has received various modifications by theologians of the Calvinistic school. The General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America, May, 1903, adopted the following: "We believe that all who die in infancy, and all others given by the Father to the Son who are beyond the reach of the outward means of grace, are regenerated and saved by Christ through the Spirit, who works when and where and how he pleases."

3. The Arminian View. The Arminian view of election has been in recent years more generally accepted than formerly, even among denominations whose teachings have been Calvinistic or indefinite upon this point. This view grounds itself, in opposition to Calvinism, upon the universality of the Atonement and the graciously restored freedom of the human will. Election, accordingly, is not absolute but conditional, contingent upon the proper acceptance of such gifts of grace as God by his Spirit and providence puts within the reach of men. Inasmuch as this subject involves the character and method of the divine government and the destiny of the entire race, it should be said: (1) That according to the Arminian doctrine the purpose of God to redeem mankind was bound up with his purpose to create. The Lamb of God was "slain from the foundation of the world." God would not have permitted a race of sinners to come into existence without provision to save sinners. Such provision must not be for only a part but for the whole of the fallen race. To suppose the contrary is opposed to the divine perfections. To doom to eternal death any number of mankind who were born in sin and without sufficient remedy would be unjust. (2) The benefits of the Atonement are universal and in part unconditional. They are unconditional with respect to those who, through no fault of their own, are in such a mental or moral condition as to make it impossible for them either to accept or reject Christ. A prominent Church emphasizes the doctrine that "All children, by virtue of the unconditional benefits of the Atonement, are members of the kingdom of God." This principle extends to others besides children, both in heathen and Christian lands. God alone is competent to judge of the extent to which, in varying degrees, human beings are responsible, and therefore of the extent to which the unconditional benefits of the Atonement may be applied. (3) The purpose or decree of God is to save all who do not, actually or implicitly, willfully reject the saving offices of the Lord Jesus Christ. Among those who have not heard the Gospel may exist "the spirit of faith and the purpose of righteousness." Thus virtually even those who have no knowledge of the historic Christ determine whether or not they will be saved through Christ. They to whom the Gospel is preached have higher advantages and more definite responsibilities. To them repentance toward God and faith in the Lord Jesus Christ are the conditions of salvation. (4) Upon all men God bestows some measure of his grace, restoring to the depraved will freedom sufficient to enable them to accept Christ and be saved. Thus, in opposition to Calvinists, Arminians assert that not only was Adam, but also his depraved descendants are in a state of probation.

In behalf of this doctrine it is argued: (1) That the whole trend of the Scriptures is to declare the real responsibility of men, and their actual power to choose between life and death. (2) That the Scriptures explicitly teach that it is the will of God that all men should be saved. Only those perish who wickedly resist his will (1 Tim. 2:4; 4:10; John 5:40; Acts 7:51, et al.). (3) The Scriptures declare the universality of Christ's Atonement, and in some degree the universality of its benefits (Heb. 2:9; John 1:29; 3:16, 17; 1 Cor. 15:22; Rom. 6:18, 19), and many other passages. (4) The doctrine of unconditional election necessarily implies that of unconditional reprobation; and that is to charge God with cruelty. (5) That unconditional election necessarily implies also the determinate number of the elect, a point which Calvinists hold, though they admit that they have for it no explicit teaching of Scripture. To the contrary, the Scriptures not only generally but particularly teach that the number of the elect can be increased or diminished. This is the purport of all those passages in which sinners are exhorted to repent, or believers warned against becoming apostate, or to "make" their "calling and election sure" (Matt. 24:4, 13; 2 Pet. 1:11, et al.). (6) That the Scriptures never speak of impenitent and unbelieving men as elect, as in some cases it would be proper to do if election were antecedent to repentance and faith, and not conditioned thereby. (7) That the whole theory of unconditional election is of the same tendency with fatalism. (8) That the logic of unconditional election is opposed to true evangelism. (9) That the essential features of the Arminian doctrine of election belong to the primitive and truly historic doctrine of the Church. Augustine was the first prominent teacher of unconditional election, and he, regardless of the logical inconsistency, granted that reprobation is not unconditional. This doctrine of Augustine was first formally accepted by the Church in A. D. 529, in the Canons of the Council of Orange, approved by Pope Boniface II. The prominence of unconditional election in the theology of Protestantism is due largely to the influence and work of John Calvin, who, at the age of twenty-five, wrote his Institutes, in which he not only set forth the Augustinian doctrine of unconditional election, but also carried it out to its logical conclusion, unconditional reprobation. In reviving and developing the doctrine of Arminius, John Wesley and his followers have been influential in a large degree in calling back the thought of the Christian world to the faith taught in the Scriptures and held by the whole Christian Church during the first four centuries of its history.

The limits of this article do not permit an examination of the contested passages of Scripture. For this, recourse must be had by the general reader to works of systematic theology and to the commentaries. EL'-ELOHE-IS'RAEL (Heb. אֱלֹהֵי יִשְׂרָאֵל, God, ale el-o-hay' yis-rav-ale', the mighty God of Israel). Jacob called by this name an altar pitched before Shechem (Gen. 33:20) in accordance with his vow (28:21) to give glory to the "God of Israel."

ELEMENTS (Gr. στοιχεῖον, stoy-khi'-on, orderly), the component parts of the physical universe. "The elements shall melt with fervent heat" (2 Pet. 3:10, 12), i. e., reduced to as confused a chaos as that from which it was first created.

Figurative. The term is used figuratively of the elementary parts of religion (Heb. 5:12, "first principles"), the elements of religious training, or the ceremonial precepts common alike to the worship of the Jews and Gentiles (Gal. 4:3, 9); the ceremonial requirements, especially of Jewish tradition (Col. 2:8, 20). In Galatians and Colossians the word is rendered "rudiments." These types, "weak" and "beggarly," were suited to a condition of comparative childhood, in which appeals must be made to the senses. See GLOSSARY.

E'LEPH (Heb. עֵלֶף, eh'-lef, yoking), one of the towns allotted to Benjamin and mentioned in the second group of fourteen towns (Josh. 18:28). "Robinson (ii, p. 139) is, no doubt, correct in supposing it to be the present Neby Samvil (i. e., prophet Samuel), two hours N. W. of Jerusalem" (K. and D., Com.).

ELEPHANT. See ANIMAL KINGDOM.

ELHA'NAN (Heb. אֱלְחָנָן, el-khan-nan', God is gracious).

1. A distinguished warrior in the time of King David, who performed a memorable exploit against the Philistines, though in what that exploit exactly consisted and who the hero himself was it is not easy to determine (B. C. about 989). 2 Sam. 21:19 says that he was the "son of Jaare Oregim, the Bethlehemite," and that he "slew Goliath, the Gittite, the staff of whose spear was like a weaver's beam." In the A. V. the words "the brother of" are inserted to bring the passage into agreement with 1 Chron. 20:5, which states that "Elhanan, son of Jair [or Joar], slew Lahmi, the brother of Goliath, the Gittite, the staff of whose spear," etc. Of these two statements the latter is probably the more correct.

2. The name Elhanan also occurs as that of "the son of Dodo" (2 Sam. 23:24; 1 Chron. 11:26), where he is given as one of "the thirty of David's guard." Perhaps his father had both names. "This Elhanan is not the same as the one mentioned above" (Keil, Com.).

ELI.—1. Name and Family. (Heb. אֵילִי, ay-lee', ascend, summit.) Eli was descended from Aaron through Ithamar (Lev. 10:1, 2, 12), as appears from the fact that Abiathar, who was certainly a lineal descendant of Eli (1 Kings 2:27), had a son, Ahimelech, who is expressly stated to have been "of the sons of Ithamar" (1 Chron. 24:3; comp. 2 Sam. 8:17).

2. Personal History. (1) High priest. Eli is generally supposed to have been the first of the line of Ithamar who held the office of high priest (Josephus, Ant., v, 11, 2). How the office ever came into the younger branch of the house of Aaron we are not informed, but it is very evident that it was no unauthorized usurpation on the part of Eli (1 Sam. 2:27-30). (2) Judge. Eli also acted as judge of Israel, being the immediate predecessor of Samuel (1 Sam. 7:6, 15-17), the last of the judges. He was also the first judge who was of priestly descent, and is said to have judged Israel forty years (4:18). (3) His sons. His sons, Hophni and Phineas, conducted themselves so outrageously that they excited deep disgust among the people and rendered the services of the temple odious in their eyes (1 Sam. 2:12-17, 22). Of this misconduct Eli was aware, but contented himself with mild and ineffectual remonstrances (2:23, 24) where his station required severe and vigorous action (3:13). (4) Prophetic warnings. A prophet was sent to announce the destruction of the house of Eli, as a sign of which both his sons should be slain in one day; a faithful priest should be raised up in his place, and those who remained of Eli's house should come crouching to him with the prayer to be put into one of the priest's offices to earn a morsel of bread (1 Sam. 2:27-36). Another warning was sent to Eli by the mouth of the youthful Samuel (3:11-18). (5) Death. At last the Israelites rose against the Philistines, but were defeated near Eben-ezer. They then took the ark of the covenant into the camp, hoping thereby to secure the help of God; but in a succeeding engagement they suffered a still greater defeat, in which Eli's sons were slain. When tidings were brought to Eli that Israel was defeated—that his sons were slain, that the ark of God was taken—"he fell from off the seat backward by the side of the gate, and his neck brake, and he died: for he was an old man, ninety-eight years, and heavy" (1 Sam. 4), B. C. about 1050. The final judgment upon Eli's house was accomplished when Solomon removed Abiathar from his office and restored the line of Eleazar in the person of Zadok (1 Kings 2:27).

3. Character. The recorded history of Eli presents to us the character of Eli in three different aspects: (1) The devoted high priest. He takes particular interest in Hannah when he understands her sorrows and bestows upon her his priestly benediction (1 Sam. 1:17; 2:20). He recognizes the divine message and bows in humble submission to the prophecy of his downfall (3:8, 18) and shows his profound devotion to God by his anxiety for the ark and his sudden fall and death at the tidings of its capture. We can find in him no indication of hypocrisy or lack of faith in God. (2) As judge. The fact that he judged Israel seems to prove that his administration was, on the whole, careful and just. But his partiality appears when his own sons are the offenders. (3) As father. Eli let his paternal love run away with his judgment; his fondness for his sons restrained him from the exercise of proper parental authority.

E'LIAB (Heb. אֱלִיָּאב, el-ee-awv', God is father).

1. A son of Helon and the captain of the tribe of Zebulun who assisted Moses in numbering the people (Num. 1:9; 2:7; 10:16), B. C. 1209. He is mentioned (7:24-29) as presenting the offering of his tribe at the dedication of the tabernacle.

2. A Reubenite, son of Pallu (or Phallu), whose family was one of the principal in the tribe, and father or progenitor of Dothan and Abiram, the leaders in the revolt against Moses (Num. 16:1, 12; 26:8, 9; Deut. 11:6), B. C. 1190. Eliab had another son, Nemuel (Num. 26:9).

3. The eldest brother of David (1 Chron. 2:13) and first of the sons of Jesse who was presented to Samuel when he came to Bethlehem to anoint a king (1 Sam. 16:6), B. C. about 1013. Eliab, with his two next younger brethren, was in the army of Saul when threatened by Goliath; and it was he who made the contemptuous inquiry, with which he sought to screen his own cowardice, when David proposed to fight the Philistine, "With whom hast thou left those few sheep in the wilderness?" (17:28). His daughter Abigail married her second cousin, Rehoboam, and bore him three children (2 Chron. 11:18, 19). Eliab is supposed to be the same with Elihu, "of the brethren of David" (1 Chron. 27:18).

4. An ancestor of Samuel the prophet, being a Kohathite Levite, son of Nahath and father of Jeroham (1 Chron. 6:27). In the other statements of the genealogy this name appears to be given as Elihu (1 Sam. 1:1) and Eliel (1 Chron. 6:34).

5. A valiant man of the Gadites, who joined David in the stronghold in the wilderness (1 Chron. 12:9).

6. A Levite, who was one of the second rank of those appointed to conduct the music of the sanctuary in the time of David and whose part was to play on the psaltery. He also served as "porter," i. e., a doorkeeper (1 Chron. 15:18, 20; 16:5), B. C. about 986.

ELI'ADA (Heb. אֱלִיאָדָה, el-yaw-daw', God is knowing).

1. One of the youngest sons of David, born at Jerusalem, the child (as it would seem) of one of his wives, and not of a concubine (2 Sam. 5:16; 1 Chron. 3:8, 9), B. C. after 1000. In 1 Chron. 14:7 the name appears in the form Beiliada (whom the master has known). As to the difficulty of David's using a name which contained בַּעַל (Baal) for one of its elements it is, at least, very doubtful whether that word, which literally means master, husband, had in David's time acquired the bad sense which Baal worship in Israel afterward imparted to it (Kitto, s. v.).

2. The father of Regon, who fled from the service of Hadadzezer, king of Zobah, and became a captain of Syrian marauders who annoyed Solomon during his reign (1 Kings 11:23), B. C. after 960. The name is Anglicized Eliadah.

3. A Benjamite and mighty man of war, who led two hundred thousand archers of his tribe to the army of Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. 17:17), B. C. 875.

ELI'ADAH (1 Kings 11:23), a less correct mode of Anglicizing the name ELIADA (No. 2, supra).

ELI'AH (Heb. אֱלִיָּהוּ, ay-lee-yaw', whose God is Jehovah), a less correct mode of Anglicizing the name Elijah.

1. One of the "sons of Jerpham," and head of a Benjamite family resident at Jerusalem (1 Chron. 8:27).

2. One of the "sons of Elam," who divorced his Gentile wife on returning from the exile (Ezra 10:20), B. C. 456.

ELIAHBA (Heb. אֱלִיָּהָבָא, el-yakh-baw', God will hide), a Shaalbonite, one of David's thirty chief warriors (2 Sam. 23:32; 1 Chron. 11:33), B. C. about 1000.

ELIAKIM (Heb. אֱלִיָּאִים, el-yaw-keem', God of raising).

1. Son of Hilkiah and prefect of the palace of King Hezekiah (2 Kings 18:18; 19:2). (1) History. He succeeded Shebna in this office after the latter had been ejected from it as a punishment for his pride (Isa. 22:15-20), B. C. after 719. He was one of the three persons sent by Hezekiah to receive the message of the invading Assyrians (2 Kings 18:18; Isa. 36:3, 11, 22) and afterward to report it to Isaiah. (2) Character. Eliakim was a good man, as appears by the title emphatically applied to him by God, "My servant Eliakim" (Isa. 22:20), and as was shown by his conduct on the occasion of Sennacherib's invasion (2 Kings 18; 19:1-5), and also in the discharge of the duties of his high station, in which he acted as a "father to the inhabitants of Jerusalem and to the house of Judah" (Isa. 22:21).

NOTE.—The office that Eliakim held has long been a subject of perplexity to commentators. The ancients, including the LXX and Jerome, understood it of the priestly office. But it is certain, from the description of the office in Isa. 22, and especially from the expression in v. 22, "The key of the house of David will I lay upon his shoulder," that it was the king's house, and not the house of God, of which Eliakim was made prefect (Smith, Dict., s. v.; Deltzsch, Com.). Most commentators agree that Isa. 22:25 does not apply to him, but to Shebna. Deltzsch, however, says: "Eliakim himself is also brought down at last by the greatness of his power on account of the nepotism to which he has given way."

2. The original name of JEHOIAKIM (q. v.), king of Judah (2 Kings 23:34; 2 Chron. 36:4).

3. A priest in the days of Nehemiah, who assisted at the dedication of the new wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 12:41), B. C. 445.

4. Son of Abiud and father of Azor, of the posterity of Zerubbabel (Matt. 1:13). He is probably identical with Shechaniah (1 Chron. 3:21).

5. The son of Melea and father of Jonan, in the genealogy of Christ (Luke 3:30), probably the grandson of Nathan, of the private line of David's descent, B. C. considerably after 1000.

ELIAM (Heb. אֱלִיאָם, el-ee-awm', God of the people).

1. The father of Bath-sheba, the wife of Uriah and afterward of David (2 Sam. 11:3). In the list of 1 Chron. 3:5 the names of both father and daughter are altered, the former to Ammiel and the latter to Bath-shua.

2. Son of Ahithophel, the Gilonite, one of David's "thirty" warriors (2 Sam. 23:34), B. C. about 1000. The name is omitted in the list of 1 Chron. 11, but is now probably discernible as "Ahijah the Pelonite." The ancient Jewish tradition, preserved by Jerome, is that the two Eliams are one and the same person (Smith, Dict.).

ELIAS, the Grecized form in which the name of Elijah is given in the A. V. of the Apocrypha and New Testament.

ELIASAPH (Heb. אֱלִיאָשָׁף, el-yaw-sawf', God has added).

1. The son of Deuel (or Reuel), head of the tribe of Gad at the time of the census in the wilderness of Sinai (Num. 1:14; 2:14; 7:42, 47; 10:20), B. C. 1209.

2. The son of Lael, and chief of the family of Gershonite Levites (Num. 3:24), B. C. 1209.

ELIASHIB (Heb. אֱלִישִׁיב, el-yaw-sheeb', God will restore), a common name of Israelites, especially in the latter period of the Old Testament history.

1. A son of Elioenai, one of the latest descendants of the royal family of Judah (1 Chron. 8:24).

2. A priest in the time of King David, head of the eleventh "course" in the order of the "governors" of the sanctuary (1 Chron. 24:12), B. C. about 989.

3. A Levitical singer who repudiated his Gentile wife after the exile (Ezra 10:24), B. C. 556.

4. An Israelite of the lineage of Zattu, who did the same (Ezra 10:27), B. C. 456.

5. An Israelite of the lineage of Bani, who did the same (Ezra 10:36), B. C. 456.

6. The high priest of the Jews in the time of Nehemiah (B. C. 445). With the assistance of his fellow-priests he rebuilt the eastern city wall adjoining the temple (Neh. 3:1). His own mansion was, doubtless, situated in the same vicinity (3:20, 21). Eliashib was related in some way to Tobiah the Ammonite, for whom he prepared an anteroom in the temple, a desecration which excited the pious indignation of Nehemiah (13:4, 7). One of the grandsons of Eliashib had also married the daughter of Sanballat the Horonite (13:28). There seems to be no reason to doubt that the same Eliashib is referred to in Ezra 10:6, as the father of Johanan, with whom Ezra consulted concerning the transgression of the people in taking Gentile wives. He is evidently the same with the son of Joiakim mentioned in the succession of high priests (Neh. 12:10, 22).

ELIATHAH (Heb. אֱלִיָּאֵתָא, el-ee'-aw-thaw, God of consent), the eighth named of the fourteen sons of the Levite Heman, and musician in the time of David (1 Chron. 25:4). With twelve of his sons and brethren he had the twentieth division of the temple service (25:27), B. C. about 970.

ELI'DAD (Heb. אֱלִיעֲדָד, el-ee-dawd', God of his love), son of Chislon, and a chief of the tribe of Benjamin who represented his tribe among the commissioners appointed to divide the promised land (Num. 34:21), B. C. 1170.

ELIEL (Heb. אֱלִיעֵל, el-ee-ale', God of gods).

1. One of the heads of the tribe of Manasseh, on the east of Jordan; a mighty man (1 Chron. 5:24).

2. The son of Toah and father of Jeroham, ancestors of Heman, the singer and Levite (1 Chron. 6:34); probably identical with the Eliab of v. 27, and of the Elihu of 1 Sam. 1:1.

3. One of the descendants of Shimhi, and head of a Benjamite family in Jerusalem (1 Chron. 8:20).

4. One of the descendants of Shashak, and also head of a Benjamite family in Jerusalem (1 Chron. 8:22).

5. "The Mahavite," and one of David's distinguished warriors (1 Chron. 11:46), B. C. 991.

6. Another of the same guard, but without any express designation (1 Chron. 11:47).

7. One of the Gadite heroes who came across Jordan and joined David in his stronghold in the wilderness (1 Chron. 12:11); possibly the same with No. 5 or 6, B. C. about 1000.

8. One of the eighty Hebronite Levites who assisted David in the removal of the ark to Jerusalem (1 Chron. 15:9, 11), B. C. about 982.

9. One of the Levites appointed by Hezekiah to have charge of the offerings and tithes dedicated in the temple (2 Chron. 31:13), B. C. about 719.

ELIE'NAI (Heb. אֵלִיעֶזֶר, el-ee-ay-nah'ee, toward Jehovah are my eyes), a descendant of Shimhi, and a chief of one of the Benjamite families resident at Jerusalem (1 Chron. 8:20).

ELIE'ZER (Heb. אֵלִיעֶזֶר, el-ee-eh'-zer, God of help).

1. "Eliezer of Damascus" mentioned in Gen. 15:2, 3, apparently as a house-born domestic and steward of Abraham, and hence likely, in the absence of direct issue, to become the patriarch's heir, B. C. about 2250. The common notion is that Eliezer was Abraham's house-born slave, adopted as his heir, and meanwhile his chief servant, and the same who was afterward sent into Mesopotamia to seek a wife for Isaac. "This last point we may dismiss with the remark that there is not the least evidence that 'the elder servant of his house' (Gen. 24:2) was the same with Eliezer" (Kitto).

NOTE.—Much difficulty has arisen from the seeming contradiction in the two expressions "Eliezer of Damascus," and "one born in my house" (Gen. 15:2, 3). The question arises how could Eliezer have been a house-born slave, seeing that Abraham's household was never in Damascus. The answer is: the expression "the steward of my house," literally translated is, "the son of possession of my house," and is exactly the same as the phrase in v. 3, "the son of my house (A. V. 'one born in my house') is my heir." This removes every objection to Eliezer's being of Damascus, and leaves it more probable that he was not a servant at all, but a near relative, perhaps nearer than Lot. Some, indeed, identify Eliezer with Lot, which would afford an excellent explanation if Scripture afforded sufficient grounds for it (Kell, Com.; Kitto).

2. The second of the two sons of Moses and Zipporah, born during the exile in Midian, to whom his father gave this name, "because," said he, "the God of my fathers was my help, that delivered me from the sword of Pharaoh" (Exod. 18:4; 1 Chron. 23:15), B. C. before 1210. He remained with his mother and brother, Gershon, in the care of Jethro, his grandfather, when Moses returned to Egypt (Exod. 4:18), having been sent back by Moses (18:2). Jethro brought back Zipporah and her two sons to Moses in the wilderness after the exodus from Egypt (ch. 18). Eliezer had one son, Rehabiah, from whom sprang a numerous posterity (1 Chron. 23:17; 26:25, 26). Shelomith, in the reigns of Saul and David (v. 28), who had the care of all the treasures of things dedicated to God, was descended from Eliezer in the sixth generation if the genealogy in 1 Chron. 26:25 is complete.

3. A son of Becher and grandson of Benjamin (1 Chron. 7:8), B. C. after 1640.

4. One of the priests who blew with trumpets before the ark when it was brought to Jerusalem (1 Chron. 15:24), B. C. about 982.

5. Son of Zichri, and ruler of the Reubenites in the reign of David (1 Chron. 27:16).

6. A prophet (son of Dodavah, of Mareshah) who foretold to JEHOSHAPHAT (q. v.) that the fleet which he had fitted out in partnership with Ahaziah should be wrecked (2 Chron. 20:37), B. C. after 875.

7. A chief of the Jews during the exile, sent by Ezra, with others, from Ahava to Casiphia, to induce some Levites and Nethinim to join the party returning to Jerusalem (Ezra 8:16), B. C. 457.

8, 9, 10. A priest (descendant of Jeshua, a Levite, and an Israelite (of the lineage of Harim), who divorced their Gentile wives after the exile (Ezra 10:18, 23, 31), B. C. 456.

11. Son of Jorim and father of Jose, of the private lineage of David prior to Salathiel (Luke 3:29), B. C. before 588.

ELIHOE'NAI (Heb. אֵלִיהוֹנָי, el-ye-ho-ay-nah'ee, toward Jehovah are my eyes), son of Zeriahah, of the "sons of Pahath-moab," who returned with two hundred males from the exile (Ezra 8:4), B. C. 457.

ELIHO'REPH (Heb. אֵלִיחֹרֶפֶת, el-ee-kho'-ref, God of autumn), son of Shisha, and appointed, with his brother Ahiah, royal scribe by Solomon (1 Kings 4:3), B. C. 959.

ELI'HU (Heb. אֵלִיחֻ, el-ee-hoo', my God is he).

1. The son of Tohu and grandfather of Elkannah, Samuel's father (1 Sam. 1:1). In the statements of the genealogy of Samuel in 1 Chron. 6, the name ELIEL (q. v.) occurs in the same position—son of Toah and father of Jeroham (6:34); and also Eliab (6:27), father of Jeroham and grandson of Zophai. The general opinion is that Elihu is the original name, and the two latter forms but copyists' variations of it.

2. One of the captains of Manasseh (1 Chron. 12:20) who followed David to Ziklag on the eve of the battle of Gilboa, and who assisted him against the Amalekites (1 Sam. 30), B. C. about 1001.

3. One of the very able-bodied members of the family of Obed-edom (a grandson by Shemaiah, who were appointed porters of the temple under David (1 Chron. 26:7), B. C. after 1000. Terms are applied to all these doorkeepers which appear to indicate that they were not only "strong men," as in the A. V., but also fighting men (see vers. 6, 7, 8, 12, in which the Hebrew words for army and warriors, or heroes, occur).

4. A chief of the tribe of Judah, said to be "of the brethren of David" (1 Chron. 27:18), and hence supposed by some to have been his eldest brother, Eliab (1 Sam. 16:6), B. C. 1000.

5. One of Job's friends. He is described as "the son of Barachel, a Buzite, of the kindred of Ram"

(Job 32:2). This is usually understood to imply that he was descended from Buz, the son of Abraham's brother Nahor. For his part in the remarkable discussion, see Job.

ELIJAH (Heb. אֵלִיָּהוּ, ay-lee-yaw', or אֵלִיָּהוּ, ay-lee-yaw'-hoo, my God is Jehovah).

1. The Prophet. Elijah came from Tishbeh in Gilead, a district which shared deeply in the miseries of the kingdom of the Ten Tribes. Nothing is known concerning his family or birth.

Personal History. The better to understand his history let us briefly consider the condition of affairs when Elijah made his appearance. Ahab had taken for wife Jezebel, a Canaanite woman, daughter of Eth-baal. Of a weak and yielding character, he allowed Jezebel to establish the Phœnician worship on a grand scale—priests and prophets of Baal were appointed in crowds—the prophets of Jehovah were persecuted and slain, or only escaped by being hid in caves. It seemed as if the last remnants of true religion were about to perish. Jezebel had also induced Ahab to issue orders for the violent death of all the prophets of Jehovah who, since the expulsion of the Levites, had been the only firm support of the ancient religion (see 1 Kings 18:4, 13, 22; 19:10, 14; 2 Kings 9:7). (1) Appears before Ahab. Elijah suddenly appears before Ahab and proclaims the vengeance of Jehovah for the apostasy of the king. "As the Lord God of Israel liveth, before whom I stand," whose constant servant I am, "there shall not be dew nor rain these years, but according to my word." This was probably the conclusion of a warning, given to the king, of the consequences of his iniquitous course (B. C. 873). Warned by God, he went and (2) Hid by Cherith, perhaps the present Wady Kelt. Here he remained, supported by ravens, until the brook dried up. Then another refuge was provided for him (3) At Zarephath. "The word of the Lord came unto him, saying, Arise, get thee to Zarephath . . . and dwell there." At the gate of the city he met the woman who was to sustain him, herself on the verge of starvation. Obedient to his request to prepare him food, she is rewarded by the miracle of the prolonging of the meal and oil, and the restoration of her son to life after his sudden death (1 Kings 17). (4) Second appearance before Ahab. For three years and six months there had been no rain (James 5:17). At last the full horrors of famine, caused by the failure of the crops, descended on Samaria. Elijah, returning to Israel, found Ahab yet alive and unreformed, Jezebel still mad upon her idols, and the prophets of Baal still deceiving the people. Elijah first presents himself (1 Kings 18) to

Obadiah, the principal servant of Ahab and a true servant of God. He requests him to announce his return to Ahab; and Obadiah, his fears having been removed by the prophet, consents. The conversation between Ahab and Elijah, when they met soon after, began with the question of the king, "Art thou he that troubleth Israel?" Elijah answers, unhesitatingly, "I have not troubled Israel; but thou and thy father's house, in that ye have forsaken the commandments of the Lord, and thou hast followed Baalim."

Eastern End of Mount Carmel.

He then challenges him to exercise his authority in summoning an assembly to Mount Carmel that the controversy between them might be decided. (5) On Carmel. Whatever were his secret purposes, Ahab accepted this proposal, and the people also consented. Fire was the element over which Baal was supposed to preside. Elijah proposes (wishing to give them every advantage) that, two bullocks being slain, and laid each upon a separate altar, the one for Baal, the other for Jehovah, whichever should be consumed by fire must proclaim whose the children of Israel were, and whom it was their duty to serve. There are few more sublime stories in history than this. On the one hand the servant of Jehovah, attended by his one servant, with his wild, shaggy hair, his scanty garb, and sheepskin cloak, but with calm dignity of demeanor and the minutest regularity of procedure. On the other hand the prophets of Baal and Ashtaroth—doubtless in all the splendor of their vestments (2 Kings 10:22), with the wild din of their "vain repetitions" and the maddened fury of their disappointed hopes—and the silent people surrounding all: these form a picture which brightens into fresh distinctness every time we consider it. The Baalites are allowed to make trial first. All day long these false prophets cried to Baal, they leaped upon the altar, and mingled their blood with that of the sacrifice—but all is in vain, for at the time of the evening sacrifice the altar was still cold and the bullock lay stark thereon—"there was neither voice, nor any to answer, nor any that regarded." Then Elijah repaired the broken altar of Jehovah, and having laid thereon his bullock and drenched both altar and sacrifice with water until the trench about it was filled, he prayed, "Lord God of Abraham, Isaac, and of Israel, let it be known this day that thou art God in Israel, and that I am thy servant, and that I have done all these things at thy word." The answer was all that could be desired, for "the fire of the Lord fell, and consumed the burnt sacrifice, and the wood, and the stones, and the dust, and licked up the water that was in the trench." The people acknowledged the presence of God, exclaiming with one voice, "The Lord, he is God; the Lord, he is God." By his direction the juggling priests are slain, and Ahab informed that he might take refreshment, for God will send the desired rain. (6) Prays for rain. Elijah prays, God hears and answers; a little cloud arises, and, diffusing itself gradually over the entire face of the heavens, empties its refreshing waters upon the whole land of Israel. Ahab rides to Jezreel, a distance of at least sixteen miles, the prophet running before the chariot, but going no farther than "the entrance" of the city (1 Kings 18). (7) Flees from Jezebel. The prophets of Baal were destroyed; Ahab was cowed; but Jezebel remained undaunted. She made a vow against the life of the prophet, who, attended by his servant—according to Jewish tradition the boy of Zarephath—took refuge in flight. The first stage in his journey was "Beer-sheba, which belongeth to Judah." Leaving his servant in the town he set out alone into the wilderness (1 Kings 19:1-4). (8) Under the juniper tree. The labors, anxieties, and excitement of the last few days had proved too much even for that iron frame and that stern resolution. His spirit is quite broken, and, sitting beneath a juniper tree, he wishes for death. "It is enough; now, O Lord, take away my life; for I am not better than my fathers." But sleep and food, miraculously furnished, refreshed the weary prophet, and he went forward, in the strength of that food, a journey of forty days to Mount Horeb. (9) At Horeb. Having rested in a cave one night the voice of the Lord came to him in the morning, asking, "What doest thou here, Elijah?" And then he again unburdens his soul and tells his grief: "I have been very jealous for Jehovah, but Israel has forsaken thy covenant; I stand alone, and my life is sought." He is directed to stand outside the cave, and "the Lord passed by" in all the terror of his most appalling manifestations. The fierce wind tore the solid mountains and shivered the granite cliffs of Sinai; the earthquake crash reverberated through the defiles of those naked valleys; the fire burnt in the incessant blaze of Eastern lightning. Like these, in their degree had been Elijah's own mode of procedure;

but the conviction is now forced upon him that in none of these is Jehovah to be known. Then came the whisper of "the still small voice." Elijah knew the call, and, stepping forward, hid his face in his mantle and waited for the divine communication. Three commands were laid upon him—to anoint Hazael king over Syria; Jehu, the son of Nimshi, king over Israel; and Elisha, the son of Shaphat, to be his own successor. Of these three commands the first two were reserved for Elisha to accomplish; the last one was executed by Elijah himself (19:9-18). (10) Finds Elisha. The prophet soon found Elisha at his native place, Abel-meholah. Elisha was plowing at the time, and Elijah, without uttering a word, cast his mantle, the well-known sheepskin cloak, upon him, as if by that familiar action (which was also a symbol of official investiture) claiming him for his son. The call was accepted, and then began that long period of service and intercourse which continued until Elijah's removal (19:19-21). (11) Reproves Ahab and Jezebel. For about six years we find no notice in the sacred history of Elijah, till God sent him once again to pronounce sore judgment upon Ahab and Jezebel for the murder of the unoffending NAOTH (q. v.). Just as Ahab was about to take possession of the vineyard he is met by Elijah, who utters the terrible curse (1 Kings 21:19-25), B. C. 869. Ahab, assuming penitence, and afterward proving his sincerity, was rewarded by a temporary arrest of judgment; but it took effect upon his wicked consort and children to the very letter. (12) Elijah and King Ahaziah. Ahaziah had succeeded Ahab, his father, upon his death, and in the second year of his reign met with a serious accident. Fearing a fatal result, he sent to Ekron to learn at the shrine of Baal of the issue of his illness. But the angel of the Lord told Elijah to go forth and meet the messengers of the king. Questioned by Ahaziah as to the reason of their early return the messengers told him of their meeting the prophet and his prediction. From their description of him Ahaziah recognized Elijah, the man of God. Enraged he sent a captain with fifty men to take Elijah. He was sitting on the top of "the mount," probably of Carmel. The officer addressed the prophet by the title most frequently applied to him, "Thou man of God, the king hath said, Come down. And Elijah answered and said, If I be a man of God, let fire come down from heaven, and consume thee and thy fifty. And there came down fire from heaven, and consumed him and his fifty." A second company shared the same fate. The altered tone of the leader of the third party, and the assurance of God that his servant need not fear, brought Elijah down. But the king gained nothing. The message before delivered was repeated to his face, and the king shortly after died. This was Elijah's last interview with the house of Ahab, and his last recorded appearance in person against the Baal worshippers (2 Kings 1:2-17), B. C. 852. (13) Warns Jehoram. Jehoram, king of Judah, had married the daughter of Ahab, and walked "in the ways of the kings of Israel, as did the house of Ahab." Elijah sent him a letter denouncing his evil doings and predicting his death (2 Chron. 21:12-15). This is the only communication with the southern kingdom of which any record remains. (14) Closing scenes. The faithful prophet's warfare is now accomplished, and God will translate him in a special manner to heaven. Conscious of this he determines to spend his last moments in imparting divine instruction to, and pronouncing his last benediction upon, the students in the colleges of Beth-el and Jericho. It was at Gilgal—probably not the ancient place of Joshua and Samuel, but another of the same name still surviving on the western edge of the hills of Ephraim—that the prophet received the divine intimation that his departure was at hand. Here he requested Elisha, his constant companion, to tarry while he goes on an errand of Jehovah. Perhaps the request was made because of the return of his old love for solitude, perhaps he desired to spare his friend the pain of too sudden a parting, or, it may be, he desired to test the affection of the latter. But Elisha would not give up his master, and they went together to Beth-el. The sons of the prophets, apparently acquainted with what was about to happen, inquired of Elisha if he knew of his impending loss. His answer shows how fully he was aware of it. "Yea, I know it; hold ye your peace." Again Elijah attempts to escape to Jericho, and again Elisha protests that he will not be separated from him. Under the plea of going to Jordan Elijah again requested Elisha to tarry, but still with no success, and the two set off together toward the river. Fifty men of the sons of the prophets ascend the heights behind the town to watch what happens. Reaching the river, Elijah rolls up his mantle as a staff, strikes the waters, which divide, and they two go over on dry ground. What follows is best told in the simple words of the narrative: "And it came to pass, when they were gone over, that Elijah said unto Elisha, Ask what I shall do for thee, before I be taken away from thee. And Elisha said, I pray thee, let a double portion of thy spirit be upon me. And he said, Thou hast asked a hard thing: nevertheless, if thou see me when I am taken from thee, it shall be so unto thee; but if not, it shall not be so. And it came to pass, as they still went on, and talked, that, behold, there appeared a chariot of fire, and horses of fire, and parted them both asunder; and Elijah went up by a whirlwind into heaven." Elisha, at the wonderful sight, cried out, like a bereaved child, "My father, my father, the chariot of Israel, and the horsemen thereof!" The mantle of his master had, however, fallen upon Elisha, as a pledge that the office and spirit of the former were now his own (2 Kings 2:1-18).

Character. Elijah's character is one of moral sublimity. His faith in God seemed to know no limit nor questioning. His zeal for Jehovah was an all-absorbing motive of his life, so that he justly said, "I have been very jealous for the Lord God of hosts." No danger nor duty was too severe to shake his confidence—no labor too great for his Lord. His courage was undaunted, even in the presence of royalty or famine. His obedience was simple and unquestioning as a child's. Tender of soul, he could sympathize with the widow when she lost her child, or weep over the sad condition of his deluded countrymen. Stern in principle, he was, in his opposition to sin, as fierce as the fire that more than once answered his command. He was by nature a recluse, only appearing before men to deliver his message from God, and enforce it by a miracle, and then disappearing from sight again.

NOTE.—(1) The ravens. Much ingenuity has been devoted to explaining away the obvious meaning of Elijah's ravens (1 Kings 17:4, sq.). Michaelis supposes that the brook Cherith was a place where ravens were wont to congregate, and that Elijah took from their nests morning and evening the food which they brought to their young. Others have explained עֵרְבִים, orebim, to mean Arabians; others, the inhabitants of Orbo, or Oreb; and some have thought that the word might mean merchants, from עָרָב, to traffic. The text, however, plainly records a miracle (Whedon, Com., in loco). (2) Elijah's mocking. Some have objected that Elijah's mockery of Baa's prophets was not in accordance with the spirit of Scripture—"not rendering railing for railing, but, contrarywise, blessing" (1 Pet. 3:9). "In the case of Elijah ridicule was a fit weapon for exposing the folly and absurdity of idol worship. The prophet employed it with terrible effect" (Haley, Dis.). (3) Letter to Jehoram. This letter has been considered as a great difficulty, on the ground that Elijah's removal must have taken place before the death of Jehoshaphat, and, therefore, before the accession of Jehoram to the throne of Judah. That Jehoram began to reign during the lifetime of his father, Jehoshaphat, is stated in 2 Kings 8:16. He probably ascended the throne as viceroy or associate some years before the death of his father.

2. A priest of "the sons of Harim," who divorced his Gentile wife on returning from the exile (Ezra 10:21), B. C. 456.

ELIKA (Heb. אֱלִיקָא, el-ee-kaw', God his rejecter), a Harodite, and one of David's thirty-seven distinguished warriors (2 Sam. 23:25), B. C. about 1000.

E'LIM (Heb. אַיִלִּים, ay-lee'm', trees), second station in the desert of Israel (Exod. 15:27; Num. 33:9), where they encamped for a month (Exod. 16:1). Here were "twelve wells (R. V. 'springs') of water and threescore and ten palm trees." The present Wady Gharandel.

ELIM'ELECH (Heb. אֱלִיםֵלֶךְ, el-ee-meh'-lek, God his king), a man of the tribe of Judah who dwelt in Bethlehem-Ephratah in the days of the judges, B. C. probably before 1070. In consequence of a great dearth in the land he went with his wife, Naomi, and his two sons, Mahlon and Chilion, to dwell in Moab, where he and his two sons died (Ruth 1:2, 3; 2:1, 3; 4:3, 9).

ELIOE'NAI (Heb. אֱלִיֹּהֵנַי, el-yo-ay-nah'ee, a contracted form of the name Elihoenai).

1. The eldest son of Neariah, son of Shemaiah, of the descendants of Zerubbabel (1 Chron. 3:23, 24).

2. A prince of the Simeonites (1 Chron. 4:36).

3. The fourth son of Becher, son of Benjamin (1 Chron. 7:8).

4. Seventh son of Meshelemiah, one of the Korhite porters (doorkeepers) of the temple (1 Chron. 26:3), B. C. about 960.

5. A priest of the sons of Pashur, who, at the instigation of Ezra, put away his Gentile wife and offered a ram for a trespass offering (Ezra 10:22), B. C. 456. He is, perhaps, the same mentioned in Neh. 12:41 as one of the priests who accompanied Nehemiah with trumpets at the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem, B. C. 445.

6. An Israelite (singer) of the sons of Zattu, who likewise divorced his Gentile wife after the exile (Ezra 10:27), B. C. 456.

ELIPHAL (Heb. אֱלִיפָל, el-ee-fawl', God his judge), son of Hur, and one of David's mighty men (1 Chron. 11:35), B. C. about 1000. See ELIPH-ELET (3).

ELIPH'ALET, a less correct mode of Anglicizing (2 Sam. 5:16; 1 Chron. 14:7) the name ELIHELET (q. v.).

ELIPHAZ (Heb. אֱלִיפָז, el-ee-faz', God of gold).

1. A son of Esau by Adah, his first wife, and father of several Edomitish tribes (Gen. 36:4, 10, 11, 16; 1 Chron. 1:35, 36).

2. One of the three friends who came to condole with Job in his affliction. They had agreed to meet together for this purpose, but, overpowered by feeling at the condition of their friend they sat down in silence for seven days (Job 2:11). Eliphaz is called "the Temanite," and was probably of Teman, in Idumea. As Eliphaz, the son of Esau, had a son named Teman, from whom the place took its name, there is reason to conclude that this Eliphaz was a descendant of the former Eliphaz (Kitto). He is the first speaker among the friends and probably the eldest among them. He begins his orations with delicacy and conducts his part of the controversy with considerable address (chaps. 4, 5, 15, 22). On him falls the main burden of the argument that God's retribution in this world is perfect and certain, and that, consequently, suffering must be a proof of previous sin. The great truth brought out by him is the unapproachable majesty and purity of God (4:12-21; 15:12-16). But still, with the other two friends, he is condemned because they had "not spoken of God the thing that is right" (42:7). "In order that they may only maintain the justice of God they have condemned Job against their better knowledge and conscience" (Delitzsch). On sacrifice and intercession of Job all three are pardoned.

ELIPH'ELEH (Heb. אֱלִיפְּלֵי, el-ee-fe-lay'-hoo, whom God makes distinguished), a Merarite Levite, one of the gatekeepers appointed by David to play on the harp "on the Sheminith" on the occasion of bringing up the ark to the city of David (1 Chron. 15:18, 21), B. C. about 982.

ELIPH'ELET (Heb. אֱלִיפְּלֵט, el-ee-feh'-let, God of deliverance).

1. The third of the nine sons of David, born at Jerusalem, exclusive of those by Bath-sheba (1 Chron. 3:6; 14:5), in which latter passage the name is written Elpalet, B. C. about 989.

2. The ninth of the same (1 Chron. 3:8; 14:7; 2 Sam. 5:16), in which two latter passages the name is Anglicized Eliphalet. It is believed that there were not two sons of this name, but that one is merely a transcriber's repetition. The two are certainly omitted in Samuel, but, on the other hand, they are inserted in two separate lists in Chronicles, and in both cases the number of the sons is summed up at the close of the list.

3. One of David's distinguished warriors, styled "the son of Ahasbai, the son of the Maachathite" (2 Sam. 23:34), but, by some error and abbreviation, ELIPHAL (q. v.), son of Ur, in 1 Chron. 11:35.

4. The third of the three sons of Eshek, of the posterity of Benjamin, and a descendant of King Saul through Jonathan (1 Chron. 8:39).

5. One of the three sons of Adonikam, who returned from Babylon with his brothers and sixty males (Ezra 8:13), B. C. 457.

6. A descendant of Hashum, who divorced his Gentile wife after the exile (Ezra 10:33), B. C. 456.

ELIS'ABETH (Gr. Ἐλισάβετ, el-ee-sab'-et, from Heb. אֱלִישֶׁבַת, el-ee-sheh'-bah, God her oath), wife of Zacharias and mother of John the Baptist.

She was a descendant of Aaron, and of her and her husband this exalted character is given by the evangelist: "They were both righteous before God, walking in all the commandments and ordinances of the Lord blameless" (Luke 1:5, 6). They remained childless until well advanced in years, when an angel foretold to Zacharias the birth of John, and Zacharias, returning home, Elisabeth conceived (1:7-24). During five months she concealed the favor God had granted her; but the angel Gabriel discovered to the Virgin Mary this miraculous conception as an assurance of the birth of the Messiah by herself (1:24-38). Mary visited her cousin Elisabeth, and they exchanged congratulations and praised God together, Mary abiding with her for three months (1:39-56). When her child was circumcised she named him John. Upon her friends objecting that none of her kindred had that name an appeal was made to Zacharias. He wrote upon a tablet, "His name is John," and immediately speech was restored to him (1:58-64), B. C. 6.

ELISEUS, the Grecized form of the name Elisha in the New Testament (Luke 4:27).

ELI'SHA.—1. Name and Family. (Heb. אֵלִישָׁא, el-ee-shaw', God his salvation.) The son of Shaphat, of Abel-meholah (in or near the valley of Jordan).

2. Personal History. (1) Call. Elisha, a husbandman, was plowing with a number of companions, himself with the twelfth plow (Thomson, Land and Book). Elijah, on his way from Horeb to Damascus, found Elisha, and threw upon his shoulders his mantle—a token of investiture with the prophet's office and of adoption as a son. Elisha accepted the call, and delaying only long enough to kiss his father and mother and give a farewell feast to his people "arose and went after Elijah and ministered unto him" (1 Kings 19:19-21), B. C. about 856. (2) Elijah's ascension. We hear no more of Elisha until he accompanied his master to the other side of Jordan, witnessed there his ascension, and with his fallen mantle parted the waters and was welcomed by the sons of the prophets as the successor of Elijah (2 Kings 2:1-16), B. C. 846. (3) At Jericho. After this he dwelt at Jericho (2 Kings 2:18). The town had lately been rebuilt by Hiel (1 Kings 16:34), and was the residence of a body of the "sons of the prophets" (2 Kings 2:5). While there he was waited upon by the citizens of the place, who complained to him of the foulness of its waters. He remedied the evil by casting salt into the water at its source, in the name of Jehovah (2:19-22). (4) Mocked. Leaving Jericho he went to Beth-el, and upon nearing the latter place was met by a number of children (youths? Whedon's Com.), who mockingly cried, "Go up, thou baldhead." This dishonor to God through his prophet was sternly rebuked by Elisha, and "two she-bears came out of the woods and tore forty-two of them. And he went from thence to Mount Carmel, and from thence he returned to Samaria" (2 Kings 2:23-25). Objection has been made to the severity of the punishment visited upon the mocking children. "It is not said that they were actually slain (the expression is וַיִּדְרֹסוּ, to rend, which is peculiarly applicable to the claws of the bear). It is by no means certain that all of them were killed" (McClintock and Strong, s. v.). Kitto thinks that these children had been instigated by their idolatrous parents to mock Elisha, and that by this judgment the people of Beth-el were to know that to dishonor God's prophets was to dishonor him. (5) Assists Jehoram. Jehoram, king of Israel, and the kings of Judah and Edom were united in a campaign against Moab, endeavoring to suppress a revolt that occurred shortly after the death of Ahab. A difficulty arose from the lack of water. Elisha, being appealed to, requested a minstrel to be brought, and at the sound of the music the hand of Jehovah came upon him. He ordered pits to be dug to hold the abundant supply of water which he prophesied would be given them. The water which preserved their lives became the source of destruction to their enemies, for the next morning "the sun shone upon the water, and the Moabites saw the water on the other side as red as blood: and they said, This is blood: the kings are surely slain, and they have smitten one another: now therefore, Moab, to the spoil. And when they came to the camp of Israel, the Israelites rose up and smote the Moabites, so that they fled before them: but they went forward smiting the Moabites, even in their country" (2 Kings 3:4-24). (6) Widow's oil. A widow of one of the sons of the prophets was in debt and her two sons about to be taken from her and sold by her creditors, as by law they had power to do (Lev. 25:39) and in her extremity she implored the prophet's assistance. Inquiring into her circumstances he learned that she had nothing but a pot of oil. This Elisha caused (in his absence, 2 Kings 4:5) to multiply until the widow had filled with it all the vessels she could borrow, and thus procured the means of payment (4:7). No place or date of the miracle is mentioned. (7) Elisha and the Shunammite. On his way between Carmel and the Jordan valley Elisha calls at Shunem. Here he is hospitably entertained by a rich and godly woman. Desiring to have him more than an occasional guest a chamber was prepared for his use. This room, called the Aliyah (the upper chamber), is the most desirable of the house, being retired and well fitted up. Elisha, grateful for the kindness shown him, asked of the woman if she would have him seek a favor for her of the king or captain of the host. She declined the prophet's offer, saying, "I dwell among mine own people." Gehazi, Elisha's servant, reminded him of the Shunammite's childless condition, and a son was promised her, which in due time was born (2 Kings 4:8-17). When the child was large enough he went out to his father in the field. While there he was (probably) sunstruck, and soon died. The mother laid the dead child upon the prophet's bed, and hastening to the prophet in Carmel she made him acquainted with her loss, and Gehazi is sent before to lay Elisha's staff upon the face of the child. The child's life not returning Elisha shut himself up with the dead boy and, praying to God, "stretched himself upon the child; and the flesh of the child waxed warm" (4:18-37). (8) Elisha at Gilgal. It was a time of famine, and the food of the prophets must consist of any herbs that can be found. The great caldron is put on at the command of Elisha, and one of the company brought in his blanket full of such wild vegetables as he had collected and emptied it into the pottage. But no sooner have they begun their meal than the taste betrays the presence of some obnoxious herb, and they cry out, "O, thou man of God, there is death in the pot." In this case the cure was effected by meal which Elisha cast into the caldron (2 Kings 4:38-41). Probably at the same time and place occurred the next miracle. A man from Baal-shalisha brought to Elisha a present of the first fruits, which, under the law (Num. 18:8, 12; Deut. 18:3, 4), were the perquisites of the ministers of the sanctuary—twenty loaves of new barley and full ears of corn in the husk (perhaps new garden grain). This, by the word of Jehovah, was rendered more than sufficient for a hundred men (2 Kings 4:42-44). (9) Naaman cured. Naaman, the chief captain of the army of Syria, was afflicted with leprosy, and that in its most malignant form, the white variety (2 Kings 5:1, 27). Naaman, hearing of Elisha, informed the king, who sent him with a letter to the king of Israel. "And now," so ran Ben-hadad's letter, "when this letter is come unto thee, behold, I have therewith sent Naaman my servant to thee, that thou mayest recover him of his leprosy." Accompanying the letter were very rich presents of gold, silver, and raiment. The king of Israel saw only one thing in the transaction, viz., a desire on the part of Ben-hadad to pick a quarrel with him. The prophet, hearing of the matter, sent word to the king, "Let him come to me, and he shall know that there is a prophet in Israel." So Naaman stood with his retinue before Elisha's house. Elisha sent a messenger to the general with the simple instruction to bathe seven times in Jordan. Naaman is enraged at the independent behavior of the prophet and the simplicity of the prescription, but, persuaded by his servants, obeyed Elisha, and was healed of his leprosy. Returning he appears in the presence of the prophet, acknowledges the power of God, and entreats Elisha to accept the present he had brought from Damascus. This Elisha firmly refuses and dismisses him in peace (6:1-27). (10) Ax raised. The home of the prophets becoming too small it was resolved to build nearer the Jordan. While one was felling a tree the ax head flew off and fell into the water. Appeal is made to Elisha: "And he cut down a stick, and cast it in thither: and the iron did swim," and was recovered (6:1-7). (11) Thwarts the Syrians. The Syrians warred against Israel, but their plans, however secret, were known to Elisha, who disclosed them to the king of Israel, and by his warnings saved the king, "not once nor twice" only. The king of Syria, learning that Elisha the prophet told of his plans, sent a detachment of men to take him. They came by night and surrounded Dothan, where Elisha resided. His servant was the first to discover the danger, and made it known to his master. At his request the eyes of the young man were opened to behold the spiritual guards which protected them. In answer to Elisha's prayer the Syrians were blinded, and Elisha offers to lead them to the place and person they sought. He conducted them to Samaria, where their blindness was removed and they found themselves in the presence of the king and his troops. The king, eager to destroy them, asked, "My father, shall I smite them? shall I smite them?" Elisha's object was gained when he showed the Syrians the futility of their attempts against him, and he, therefore, refused the king permission to slay them, and having fed them sent them away to their master (2 Kings 6:8-23). "Was the deception (6:19) practiced toward the Syrians justifiable? Various answers have been given. Keil and Rawlinson apparently regard Elisha's statement simply in the light of a 'stratagem of war.' Thenius says: 'There is no untruth in the words of Elisha; for his home was not in Dothan, where he was only residing temporarily, but in Samaria; and the words "to the man" may well mean to his house.' Some regard the prophet's language as mere irony" (Haley's Alleged Dis.). (12) Famine in Syria. Ben-hadad, the king of Syria, now laid siege to Samaria, and its inhabitants were driven to great straits by reason of famine. Roused by an encounter with an incident more ghastly than all, Jehoram, the king (Josephus, Ant., ix, 4, 4) vented, for some reason, his wrath upon Elisha; and, with an oath, he said, "God do so and more also to me if the head of Elisha, the son of Shaphat, shall stand on him this day." An emissary started to execute the sentence, but Elisha, warned of the danger, told those present not to admit him, assuring them that the king was hastening ("to stay the result of his rash exclamation," interprets Josephus, Ant., ix, 4, 4). To the king Elisha promised that within twenty-four hours food should be plenty. The next day the Syrian camp was found deserted. The night before God caused the Syrians to hear the noise of horses and chariots; and, believing that Jehoram had hired against them the kings of the Hittites and the king of Egypt, had fled in the utmost panic and confusion. Thus did God, according to the words of Elisha, deliver Samaria. Another prediction was accomplished; for the distrustful lord that doubted the word of Elisha was trampled to death by the famished people rushing through the gates of the city to the forsaken tents of the Syrians (2 Kings 6:24-7:20). (13) Shunammite's property restored. Elisha, aware of the famine which God was about to bring upon the land, had advised his friend, the Shunammite, of it that she might provide for her safety. She left Shunem for the land of the Philistines, and there remained during the dearth. At the end of the seven years she returned and found her house and land appropriated by some other person. When she was come to the king to ask redress he was listening to a recital by Gehazi of the great things that Elisha had done, the crowning feat of all being that which he was then actually relating—the restoration to life of the boy of Shunem. The woman was instantly recognized by Gehazi. "My lord, O king, this is the woman, and this is her son, whom Elisha restored to life." The king immediately ordered her land to be restored, with the value of its produce during her absence (2 Kings 8:1-6). (14) Elisha at Damascus. We next find Elisha at Damascus, whither he went to "anoint Hazael to be king over Syria." Ben-hadad was prostrate with his last illness, and sent Hazael, with a princely present to inquire of Elisha, "Shall I recover of this disease?" The answer of Elisha, though ambiguous, contained the unmistakable conclusion, "The Lord hath showed me that he shall surely die." The prophet fixed his earnest gaze upon Hazael and burst into tears. Inquired of as to the cause of his grief Elisha told him that he should be king and bring great evil upon the children of Israel. Hazael returned and told the king that the prophet had predicted his recovery. That was the last day of Ben-hadad's life, for on the morrow he was smothered, and Hazael reigned in his stead (2 Kings 8:7-15). (15) Jehu anointed. While Hazael was warring against the combined force of the kings of Israel and Judah (2 Kings 8:28) Elisha sent one of the "sons of the prophets" to anoint Jehu, the son of Jehoshaphat, king over Israel and prophesy concerning the fearful overthrow of the house of Ahab (9:1, sq.). (16) Death. We next find Elisha upon his death-bed. Here he is visited by Joash, the grandson of Jehu, who came to weep over the departure of the great and good prophet. The king is told that he will smite Syria but thrice, whereas if he had shown more energy in smiting the ground with the arrows he should have completely destroyed his foe (2 Kings 13:14-19). (17) In his tomb. The power of the prophet does not end with his death, for even in his tomb he restores the dead to life. A funeral was going on in the cemetery which contained the sepulcher of Elisha. Seeing a band of Moabites near by, the friends of the dead man hastily put him into the tomb of the prophet. The mere touch of his hallowed remains had power, for the man "revived, and stood up on his feet" (2 Kings 13:20, 21), B. C. about 783.

3. Character. Elisha presents a very striking contrast to his master, Elijah, who was a true Bedouin child of the desert. Elisha, on the other hand, was a civilized man, preferring the companionship of men, dwelling in cities, and often in close connection with kings. Elijah was a man whose mission was to accuse of sin or bring judgment upon men because of it. Elisha, while defending the ancient religion, comes as the healer, and so his miracles were those of restoring to life, increasing the widow's oil, making pure the bitter waters. There is tender sympathy for friends, tears for his country's prospective woes. And yet there is firmness in maintaining the right, sternness of judgment, and seeming forgetfulness of self. "In spite of all the seductions to which he was abundantly exposed through the great consideration in which he was held he retained at every period of his life the true prophetic simplicity and purity and contempt for worldly wealth and advantages" (Ewald's History of Israel, iv, p. 83).

ELI'SHAH (Heb. אֱלִישָׁה, el-ee-shaw', unknown), the oldest of the four sons of Javan (Gen. 10:4; 1 Chron. 1:7). He seems to have given name to "the isles of Elishah," which are described as exporting fabrics of purple and scarlet to the markets of Tyre (Ezek. 27:7). If the descendants of Javan peopled Greece we may expect to find Elishah in some province of that country. The circumstance of the purple suits the Peloponnesus; for the fish affording the purple dye were caught at the mouth of the Eurotas, and the purple of Laconia was very celebrated. The name seems kindred to Elis, which, in the wider sense, was applied to the whole Peloponnesus; and some identify Elishah with Hellas.

ELISH'AMA (Heb. אֱלִישָׁמָא, el-ee-shaw-maw', God of hearing).

1. The son of Ammihud, and "captain" of the tribe of Ephraim at the Exode (Num. 1:10; 2:18; 7:48, 53; 10:22), B. C. 1209. From the genealogy in 1 Chron. 7:26 we find that he was the grandfather of Joshua.

2. The second of the nine sons of David born at Jerusalem, exclusive of those by Bath-sheba (1 Chron. 3:6), called in the parallel passages (2 Sam. 5:15; 1 Chron. 14:5) by apparently the more proper name ELISHUA (q. v.).

3. The seventh of the same series of sons (1 Chron. 3:8; 14:7). According to Samuel (2 Sam. 5:14-16) there were only eleven sons born to David after his establishment in Jerusalem, and Elishama is eleventh of the series, B. C. after 1000.

4. An Israelite of the family of David, father of Nethaniah, and grandfather of Ishmael, who slew Gedaliah, the ruler appointed by Nebuchadnezzar over the people that were left in Judea (2 Kings 25:25; Jer. 41:1), B. C. before 588.

5. An Israelite of the tribe of Judah and son of Jekamiah. In the Jewish tradition preserved by Jerome (Qu. Hebr. on 1 Chron. 2:41) he appears to be identified with No. 4.

6. One of the two priests sent with the Levites by Jehoshaphat to teach the law through the cities of Judah (2 Chron. 17:8), B. C. after 875.

7. A royal scribe, in whose chamber the roll of Jeremiah was read to him and other magnates and afterward deposited for a time (Jer. 36:12, 20, 21), B. C. about 604.

ELISH'APHAT (Heb. אֱלִישָׁפָת, el-ee-shaw-faw', God of judgment), son of Zichri. One of the captains of hundreds by whose aid Jehoiada, the priest, placed Joash on the throne of Judah and overthrew Athaliah, the usurper (2 Chron. 23:1, sq.), B. C. 836.

ELISH'EBA (Heb. אֱלִישֶׁבַע, el-ee-sheh'-bah, God of the oath, i. e., worshiper of God), daughter of Aminadab and sister of Nahshon, the captain of the Hebrew host (Num. 2:3). She became the wife of Aaron, and hence the mother of the priestly family (Exod. 6:23), B. C. about 1210.

ELISH'UA (Heb. אֱלִישׁוּא, el-ee-shoo'-ah, God of supplication), one of the sons of David born at Jerusalem (2 Sam. 5:15; 1 Chron. 14:5), called ELISHAMA (q. v.) in the parallel passage (1 Chron. 3:6), B. C. after 1000.

ELI'UD (Gr. Ἐλιούδ, el-ee-ood', God of majesty), son of Achim and father of Eleazar, being the fifth in ascent in Christ's paternal genealogy (Matt. 1:14, 15), B. C. about 200 (McC. and S., Cyc.).

ELIZ'APHAN (Heb. אֱלִיזָפָן, el-ee-tsaw-faw', God of treasure).

1. The second son of Uzziel, and chief of the Kohathite Levites at the Exode (Num. 3:30; Exod. 6:22), B. C. 1210. He, with his elder brother, Mishael, was directed by Moses to carry away the corpses of their sacrilegious cousins, Nadab and Abihu (Lev. 10:4). In Exodus and Leviticus the name is contracted into Elzaphan. His family took part in the ceremony of bringing the ark to Jerusalem in the time of David (1 Chron. 15:8) and were represented in the revival under Hezekiah (2 Chron. 29:13).

2. Son of Parnach and prince of the tribe of Zebulun, appointed to assist Moses in the division of the land of Canaan (Num. 34:25).

ELI'ZUR (Heb. אֱלִיזוּר, el-ee-tsoor', God his rock), son of Shedur and prince of the tribe of Reuben at the Exode (Num. 1:5; 2:10; 7:30, 35; 10:18), B. C. 1210.

EL'KANAH, or ELKA'NAH (Heb. אֱלְקָנָה, el-kaw-naw', whom God created), the name of several men, all apparently Levites. There is much difficulty and uncertainty in the discrimination of the various individuals who bear this name.

1. The second son of Korah, according to Exod. 6:24, where his brothers are represented as being Assir and Abiasaph. But in 1 Chron. 6:22, 23, Assir, Elkanah, and Eliasaph are mentioned in the same order, not as the three sons of Korah, but as son, grandson, and great-grandson, respectively; and this seems to be correct.

2. Son of Shaul, or Joel, being the father of Amasai, and ninth in descent from Kohath, the son of Levi (1 Chron. 6:25, 36).

3. Son of Ahimoth, or Mahath, being father of Zuph, or Zophai, and great-grandson of the one immediately preceding (1 Chron. 6:26, 35).

4. Another Kohathite Levite, in the line of Heman, the singer. He was the son of Jeroham and father of Samuel (1 Chron. 6:27, 28, 33, 34), B. C. about 1106. He is described (1 Sam. 1:1, sq.) as living at Ramathaim-zophim, in Mount Ephraim, otherwise called Ramah; as having two wives, Hannah and Peninnah, with no children by the former till the birth of Samuel in answer to the prayer of Hannah. We learn also that he lived in the time of Eli, the high priest; that he was a pious man, going up yearly to Shiloh to worship and sacrifice (1:3). After the birth of Samuel Elkanah and Hannah continued to live at Ramah, and had three sons and two daughters (2:21). Elkanah, the Levite, is called an Ephraimite because, so far as his civil standing was concerned, he belonged to the tribe of Ephraim, the Levites being reckoned as belonging to those tribes in the midst of which they lived.

5. The father of one Asa, and head of a Levitical family resident in the "villages of the Netophathites" (1 Chron. 9:16), B. C. long before 536.

6. A man of the family of Korhites, who joined David while he was at Ziklag (1 Chron. 12:6), B. C. about 1002. He probably resided in the tribe of Benjamin, which included four Levitical cities. Perhaps he was the same person who was one of the two doorkeepers for the ark when it was brought to Jerusalem (15:23), B. C. about 982.

7. The chief officer in the household of Ahaz, king of Judah, slain by Zichri, the Ephraimite, when Pekah invaded Judah (2 Chron. 28:7), B. C. about 735.

EL'KOSH (Heb. אֶלְקוֹשׁ, el-kosh', uncertain derivation), the birthplace of the prophet Nahum; whence he is called "the Elkoshite" (Nah. 1:1). Two Jewish traditions assign widely different localities to Elkosh. In the time of Jerome it was believed to exist in a small village of Galilee, called to the present day Helcesæi (or Helceseï, Elcese), which belief is more credible than the one which identifies Elkosh with a village on the eastern side of the Tigris, northwest of Khorsabad. This place, Alkush, is a Christian village, where the tomb of the prophet is shown in the form of a simple plaster box of modern style.

EL'KOSHITE. See ELKOSH.

EL'LASAR (Heb. אֶלְלָסָר, el-law-saw'r), a city of Babylonia, mentioned twice in Genesis (14:1, 9). Ellasar was located in Southern Babylonia, between Ur and Erech, on the left bank of the great canal Shat-en-Nil. The site of the city is now marked by the little mound called by the natives Senkereh. In an early period Ellasar played an important rôle in Babylonia. It was the center in southern Babylonia of the worship of the sun (called in Babylonian Shamash), as Sippar was in northern Babylonia the chief place of the same worship. The Babylonian form of the city's name was Larsa, and in later times it was known to the Greeks as Larissa. Its origin is entirely unknown to us, but its holy character and its religious leadership point to a high antiquity. About 2400 B. C. Ellasar was filling an influential place in Babylonia. It had then the leadership in southern Babylonia, and the kings of Larsa were at the same time kings of Sumer and Akkad. Of the dynasty which then ruled in Ellasar we know the names of only two kings, Nur-Ramman and Sin-iddina, the latter of whom built an important canal which connected the Shatt-en-Nil with the river Tigris. Shortly after this time Ellasar was conquered by an invasion from Elam, and the Elamite king Kudur-Mabug, at that time a great conqueror even in the West, became possessed of the city. He did not, however, reside in the conquered city, but was there represented by his son, Eri-Aku, who is also known in the Babylonian inscriptions by the name of Rim-Sin. This is no other than Arioch of Gen. 14:1. He was later conquered by Hammurabi, king of Babylon, who annexed the whole territory to the newly founded Babylonian empire. (See also AMRAPHEL and CHEDORLAOMER.) The most important building in the city seems to have been the temple of the sun, called E-barra. Upon it building and restoration were successively carried on by Ur-Bau and Dungi (see Ur), Sin-iddina, Hammurabi, Nebuchadnezzar, and Nabonidus. The mound has not yet been completely excavated, but brief examinations have led to the discovery of some interesting tablets. Among them was found a tablet giving a list of square and cube roots. It is safe to predict that Ellasar will yet yield up some historical material by which its brilliant though comparatively brief career will become known. —R. W. R.

ELM. See VEGETABLE KINGDOM.

ELMODAM (Gr. Ἐλμοδάμ, el-mo-dam), son of Er and father of Cosam, one of the ancestors of Christ in the private line of David (Luke 3:28). He is not mentioned in the Old Testament.

ELNA'AM (Heb. עֵלְנָאָם, el-nah'-am, God his delight), father of Zeribai and Joshaviah, two of David's distinguished warriors (1 Chron. 11:46), B. C. about 1000. "In the Septuagint the second warrior is said to be the son of the first, and Elnaam is given himself as a member of the guard."

ELNA'THAN (Heb. עֵלְנָתָן, el-naw-thaw'n', God the giver).

1. An inhabitant of Jerusalem, whose daughter, Nehushta, was the mother of Jehoiachin, king of Judah (2 Kings 24:8), B. C. before 597. He was, perhaps, the same with the son of Achbor sent by Jehoiakim to bring the prophet Urijah from Egypt (Jer. 26:22), and in whose presence the roll of Jeremiah was read, for the preservation of which he interceded with the king (Jer. 36:12, 25).

2, 3, 4. Three of the Israelites of position and understanding sent by Ezra to invite the priests and Levites to accompany him to Jerusalem (Ezra 8:16), B. C. 457.

ELO'HIM (Heb. plural אֱלֹהִים, el-o-heem'; singular אֱלֹהִים, el-o'-ah, mighty), a term sometimes used in the ordinary sense of gods, whether true or false (Exod. 12:12; 35:2, 4, etc.), including Jehovah (Psa. 76:8; Exod. 18:11, etc.). Dr. W. Henry Green (in Hom. Mag., Sept., 1898, p. 257, sq.) thus summarizes the principles regulating the use of Elohim and Jehovah in the Old Testament: "1. Jehovah represents God in his special relation to the chosen people, as revealing himself to them, their guardian and object of their worship; Elohim represents God in his relation to the world at large, as Creator, providential ruler in the affairs of men, and controlling the operations of nature. 2. Elohim is used when Gentiles speak or are spoken to or spoken about, unless there is a specific reference to Jehovah, the God of the chosen people. 3. Elohim is used when God is contrasted with me or things, or when the sense requires a common rather than a proper noun."

ELO'I (Gr. ἐλωι, el-o-ee', for Syriac אֱלֹהִי), an exclamation quoted by our Saviour (Mark 15:34) on the cross from Psa. 22:1, and meaning "My God."

ELON (Heb. אֵילָן, or אֵילִן, oak).

1. A Hittite, father of Bashemath (Gen. 26:34), or Adah (Gen. 36:2), wife of Esau.

2. The second of the three sons of Zebulun (Gen. 46:14) and head of the family of Elonites (Num. 26:26).

3. An Israelite of the tribe of Zebulun, and judge for ten years (Judg. 12:11, 12).

4. One of the towns in the border of the tribe of Dan (Josh. 19:43), doubtless the same with Elon-beth-hanan (1 Kings 4:9). Its site has not been identified.

ELON-BETH-HA'NAN. The same as ELON, 4.

ELONITE, the patronymic applied to the descendants of ELON (q. v.), the son of Zebulun.

ELOTH (Heb. אֵילֹת, ay-loth'), another form (1 Kings 9:26, etc.) of the city of ELATH (q. v.).

ELPA'AL (Heb. עֵלְפָאֵל, el-pah'-al, God his wages), the second of the two sons of Shaharaim by his wife Hushim, and progenitor of a numerous progeny. He was a Benjamite (1 Chron. 8:11, 12, 18).

ELPA'LET, a contracted form (1 Chron. 14:5) of the name ELIPHALET (q. v.).

EL-PARAN (Heb. אֵיל פָּרָן, ale-paw-raw'n', oak of Paran), "the one oasis which is in mid-desert, on the great highway across the wilderness of Paran, known in later times as 'Qala' at Nukhl, . . . more commonly 'Castle Nakhl,' 'Castle of the Palm'" (Trumbull, Kadesh-barnea, p. 37). It was at "El-paran, which is by the wilderness," that Chedorlaomer halted before starting northward into Canaan (Gen. 14:5, 6). Ishmael dwelt in the wilderness of Paran, after he and his mother were expelled through the influence of Sarah (21:21).

EL'TEKEH (Heb. אֵלְתֵּכֶה, el-te-kay', God is its fear), a city of refuge in the tribe of Dan (Josh. 19:44; 21:23). "Alteku, the Eltekeh of Josh. 19:44, cannot be where the P. E. F. Red. Map (1891) makes it, at Beit-likea, far up Ajalon; for how could an Egyptian and Assyrian army have met there? but was near Ekron, on the road to Egypt. Here Kh. Lezka is the only modern name like it" (Smith, Hist. Geog., p. 236).

EL'TEKON (Heb. אֵלְתֵּקוֹן, el-te-kone', God is straight), one of the towns of the tribe of Judah, in the mountain district (Josh. 15:59); not identified.

ELTO'LAD (Heb. אֵלְתוֹלָד, el-to-lad', God is generator), one of the cities in the south of Judah (Josh. 15:30) allotted to Simeon (Josh. 19:4), and in possession of that tribe until the time of David (1 Chron. 4:29); not identified.

EL'LUL, the sixth month of the ecclesiastical, and twelfth of the civil year of the Jews: See CALENDAR, TIME.

ELU'ZAI (Heb. אֵלּוּזַי, el-oo-zah'ee, God is defensive), one of the Benjamite warriors who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron. 12:5), B. C. a little before 1000.

ELYMAS (Gr. Ἐλύμας, el-oo'-mas, derived from the Arabic Aliman, a wise man), a Jew named Bar-jesus, who had attached himself to the proconsul of Cyprus, Sergius Paulus, when Paul visited the island (Acts 13:6, sq.). Upon his endeavoring to dissuade the proconsul from embracing the Christian faith he was struck with miraculous blindness by the apostle (A. D. 44).

EL'ZABAD (Heb. אֵלְזָבָד, el-zaw-bad', God has given).

1. The ninth of the eleven Gadite heroes who joined David in the wilderness fastness of Judah (1 Chron. 12:12), B. C. before 1000.

2. One of the sons of Shemaiah, the son of Obed-edom, the Levite. He served as a porter to the "house of Jehovah" under David (1 Chron. 26:7), B. C. after 1000.

EL'ZAPHAN, a contracted form (Exod. 6:22; Lev. 10:4) of the name ELIZAPHAN (q. v.).

EMBALM (Heb. כָּהוֹן, khaw-nat', to spice), the process of preserving a corpse by means of spices (Gen. 50:2, 3, 26).

1. Egyptian. It is supposed that the Egyptians preserved the body to keep it in a fit state to receive the soul which once inhabited it. "The soul of the dead depended for its future career and fortunes upon those of the body. Every advance made in the process of decomposition robbed the soul of some part of itself; its consciousness gradually faded until nothing was left but a vague and hollow form that vanished altogether when the corpse had entirely disappeared. Artificial means were sought to secure at will that incorruptibility of the human larva without which the persistence of the soul was but a useless prolongation of the death agony; and these a god was supposed to have discovered—Anubis the jackal, lord of sepulture" (Maspero, Dawn of Civ., p. 112).

There were three methods of embalming, the choice of which depended upon the rank and wealth of the deceased person; the first is said to

"For those who chose the middle kind on account of the expense they prepared the body as follows: They fill syringes with oil of cedar and inject this into the abdomen, without making an incision or removing the bowels, and taking care that the liquid shall not escape they keep it in salt during the specified number of days. The cedar oil is then taken out, and such is its strength that it brings with it the bowels and all the inside in a state of dissolution. The natron also dissolves the flesh, so that nothing remains but the skin and bones. This process being over they restore the body without any further operation.

"The third kind of embalming is only adopted for the poor. In this they merely cleanse the body by an injection of symnae and salt it during seventy days, after which it is returned to the friends who brought it."

The processes of embalming, which would have instructed them in anatomy, were not intrusted to doctors; the horror was so great with which anyone was regarded who mutilated the human form that the "paraschite," on whom devolved the duty of making the necessary incisions in the dead, became the object of universal execration. As soon as he had finished his task the assistants assailed him, throwing stones at him with such violence that he had to run for his life.

2. Hebrew. The embalming of the dead took place after the Egyptian fashion in the case of Joseph and Jacob (Gen. 50:2, 26). It was usual, however, among the Israelites, but only imitated by the rich or distinguished so far that they anointed the bodies of their loved dead with costly oil (John 12:7) and wound them in linen with aromatic have cost about twelve hundred and fifty dollars, the second three hundred dollars, and the third extremely cheap. The process of embalming is thus described by Herodotus:

"In preparing the body according to the first method they commence by extracting the brain from the nostrils with a curved iron probe, partly cleansing the head by these means and partly by pouring in certain drugs; then making an incision in the side with a sharp Ethiopian stone they draw out the intestines through the aperture. Having cleansed and washed them with palm wine they cover them with pounded aromatics, and afterward, filling the cavity with powder of pure myrrh, cassia, and other fragrant substances, frankincense excepted, they sew it up again. This being done they salted the body, keeping it in natron during seventy days, to which period they are strictly confined. When the seventy days are over they wash the body and wrap it up entirely in bands of fine linen smeared on the outside with gum, which the Egyptians generally used instead of glue. The relations then take away the body, and have a wooden case made in the form of a man, in which they deposit it, and when fastened they keep it in a room in their house, placing it upright against the wall. This is the most costly mode of embalming.

spices (John 19:39, sq.) (Wilkinson, Ancient Egypt, ii, 216, 383, sq.; Maspero, Dawn of Civ., p. 112; Winer, Realwörterbuch, art. "Einbalsamieren").

In the Christian Church it was an early custom to honor the bodies of martyrs at least with embalming; and, according to an intimation of Tertullian, it appears to have been generally adopted by Christians in burying their dead. A principal ingredient was myrrh, which, with gold and frankincense, was supposed to have a mystic meaning—gold as a gift to a king, frankincense to a god, and myrrh to a man that must die and be buried. This spice was used for the reason that Christians were often compelled to bury their dead in their places of worship, and the embalming would tend to keep them from corruption.

EMBROIDER (Heb. שֵׁבֵט, shaw-bats', to interweave, Exod. 28:39), EMBROIDERER (Heb. מְשֵׁבֵט, raw-kam', Exod. 35:25; 38:23). An equivalent expression is used—needlework—and so as to imply that not plain sewing, but ornamental work was intended (Exod. 26:36; Judg. 5:30; Psa. 45:14). In Exodus the embroiderer is contrasted with the "cunning workman" (Heb. חָשֵׁב, khaw-shab'). The word khaw-shab' involves the idea of invention or designing patterns, while needlework (Heb. רִיקְמָוּ, rik-maw') expresses the idea of texture as well as variegated color.

Assyrian Embroidered Garment.

It was in Egypt that the Israelites first learned the art of embroidery, and it would appear that certain families had risen to distinction in the arts of weaving and embroidery, especially in the tribes of Judah and Dan (Exod. 35:30, 35; 1 Chron. 4:21).

In later times the Babylonians were most noted of all the Asiatic nations for the weaving of cloth E'MIMS, R. V. Emim (Heb. אַי־מִיִּם, ay-meem', terrors), the giant aborigines dispossessed by Moab. In Gen. 14:5-7, with which comp. Deut. 2:10-12, 20-23, we find all the region east of the Jordan once occupied by a series of races mostly described as giants—the Rephaim in Bashan, the Zamzummim dispossessed by the Ammonites (Deut. 2:20, 21); possibly the same with the Zuzim of Gen. 14:5, the Emim by the Moabites, and the Horim by the Edomites.

The Emim may have belonged to the aggregation of nations sometimes called Turanian. If so we may compare their name, Emim, with aima, "tribe" or "horde," which appears with little change in several languages, as the Tunguse, aiman; Buriat, aimah; Mongol, aimak; Livonian, aim (Smith, Bib. Dict., 2d ed., s. v. "Emim.")—W. H.

EMMAN'UEL (Gr. Ἐμμανουήλ, em-man-oo-ale', God with us; i. q. saviour), a name given to Christ by Matthew (1:23) after Isa. 7:14. According to orthodox interpretation the name denotes the same as θεάνθρωπος, than'thropos, and has reference to the personal union of the human nature and the divine in Christ (Thayer-Grimm, Greek-English Lex., s. v.).

EM'MAUS (Gr. Ἐμμαούς, em-mah-ooce', hot baths), a town seven and a half miles from Jerusalem (threescore furlongs), the scene of Christ's revelation of himself after his resurrection (Luke 24:13). Its real site is disputed, however. A number of places are held, by tradition and otherwise, to be the original site of Emmaus. Among them are Amwás, or Emmaus-Nicopolis, Kubeibet, Khamesa, Beit Mizzeh, Kolonieh.

EN- (Heb. אֵן, ayn, fountain), a prefix to many names of places in Hebrew from there being a living spring in the vicinity.

E'NAM (Heb. אֵן־נָמ, ay-nawm', double fountain); one of the cities of Judah in the Shefelah or lowland (Josh. 15:34). From its mention with towns which are known to have been near Timnath this is very probably the place in the doorway (A. V. "an open place") of which Tamar sat before her interview with her father-in-law (Gen. 38:14).

E'NAN (Heb. עֵינָן, ay-nawn', having eyes), the father of Ahira, who was "prince" of the tribe of Naphtali at the time of the numbering of Israel in the desert of Sinai (Num. 1:15; 2:29; 7:78, 83; 10:27), B. C. 1210.

1. Law-teem' (Heb. לְחַיִּים, or le-haw-teem', Heb. לְחַיִּים, Exod. 7:11, 22; 8:7), secret arts, such as imposed on the credulity of Pharaoh. See MAGIC.
2. Lekh-aw-sheem' (Heb. לְחַשְׁתִּים, whispers) is mentioned in Eccles. 10:11, and is a word especially used in the charming of serpents (Jer. 8:17, rendered "charmed").
3. Naw-khash' (Heb. נִחַשׁ, to hiss), the auguries sought by Baalim (Num. 24:1), supposed to allude generally to ophiomancy (divination by serpents).
4. Kheh'-ber (Heb. קְהַר, society, spell, Isa. 47:9, 12), binding by incantations, and means generally the process of acquiring power over a distant object or person.

These methods of imposture were forbidden in Scripture (Lev. 19:26; Isa. 47:9, etc.), but to eradicate the tendency seemed almost impossible (2 Kings 17:17; 2 Chron. 33:6) and it still flourished in the Christian era (Acts 13:6, 8; 8:8-11; Gal. 5:20; Rev. 9:21). See MAGIC.

ENDAMAGE. See GLOSSARY.

EN'-DOR (Heb. עֵינֵי דֹרַי, ane-dore', fountain of Dor), a town about four miles from the foot of Mount Tabor. At present a "wretched hamlet" on the north shoulder of Little Hermon. The numerous caves in the hillsides suggest a fit dwelling place for such persons as the witch to whom SAUL (q. v.) resorted (1 Sam. 28:7). See also Josh. 17:11; Psa. 83:10.

E'NEAS. See ÆNEAS.

EN-EG'LAIM (Heb. עֵינֵי עֲגָלַיִם, ane eg-lah'-yim, fountain of two calves), a place mentioned by Ezekiel (47:10) in the vision of holy waters, but which has not been found. Jerome says, "Engalim is at the beginning of the Dead Sea, where the Jordan enters it," and from this statement it has been conjectured that it is to be found in Ain el-Feshkhah, a spring at the north end of the coast.

EN-GAN'NIM (Heb. עֵינֵי גַנִּים, ane gan-neem', fountain of gardens).

1. A city in Issachar (Josh. 19:21; "Anem," 1 Chron. 6:73) allotted to the Levites (Josh. 21:29), fifteen miles S. of Mount Tabor; the scene of Ahaziah's escape from Jehu (2 Kings 9:27, "garden house"); identified with modern Jenin, a large town of four thousand inhabitants.

2. A town in Judah (Josh. 15:34); location unknown.

EN-GE'DI (Heb. עֵינֵי גְדִי, ane geh'-dee, fountain of the kid).

1. A town, called also the city of palm trees (Gen. 14:7; 2 Chron. 20:2). It was situated about thirty miles S. E. from Jerusalem, on the edge of the wilderness and on the west shore of the Dead Sea. It is full of rocks and caves (1 Sam. 23:29; Ezek. 47:10). The source of the fountain from which it derives its name is on the mountain side about six hundred feet above the sea.

It is called now 'Ain Jidy (spring of the kid). Smith (Hist. Geog., p. 269, s. q.) describes it as a place of wonderful fertility, as most suitable for refuge, though with insignificant caves. None of them was large enough to have been the scene of such a story as 1 Sam. 24. The strongholds of David (23:29; 24:22) must have lain by the water, and the cave is described below them.

It was immediately after an assault upon the "Amorites, that dwelt in Hazezon-tamar," that the five Mesopotamian kings were attacked by the rulers of the plain of Sodom (Gen. 14:7; comp. 2 Chron. 20:2). Saul was told that David was in the "wilderness of En-gedi;" and he took "three thousand men and went to seek David and his men upon the rocks of the wild goats" (1 Sam. 24:1-4). At a later period En-gedi was the gathering place of the Moabites and Ammonites who went up against Jerusalem and fell in the valley of Bera-chah (2 Chron. 20:2). The vineyards of En-gedi were celebrated by Solomon (Cant. 1:14); its balsam by Josephus, and its palms by Pliny.

2. The "wilderness of En-gedi" (1 Sam. 24:1) is doubtless the wild region west of the Dead Sea, which must be traveled to reach its shores.

ENGINE, a term applied in Scripture exclusively to military affairs. See ARMOR; GLOSSARY.

ENGRAVE (Heb. פָּתַח, paw-thakh', to open), to carve or grave on wood, gems, or stone; as also khaw-rawsh' (Heb. חָרַשׁ, Exod. 28:11; 35:35; 38:23). See HANDICRAFTS, JEWELRY.

EN-HAD'DAH (Heb. עֵינֵי חַדְדָּה, ane khad-daw'), a city on the border of Issachar (Josh. 19:21); according to Knobel either the place by Gilboa called Judeidah, or else Beit-kad, near Gilboa.

EN-HAK'KORE (Heb. עֵינֵי חַקְוֵרָה, ane hak-ko-ray', fountain of the crier), a spring which burst forth at the cry of Samson (Judg. 15:19). It has been identified with Ayun Kara, near Zoreah.

EN-HA'ZOR (Heb. עֵינֵי חַצוֹר, ane khaw-tsore', fountain of a village), one of the fenced cities in the inheritance of Naphtali, distinct from Hazor (Josh. 19:37). It has not yet been identified.

ENLARGE. See GLOSSARY.

ENLIGHTEN (Heb. אָרַר, ore, illumination in every sense) means to give evidence of returning strength (1 Sam. 14:27, 29; Job 33:30).

Figurative. It is used in this sense in Psa. 18:28 (Heb. נִשְׁפָּט, naw-gáh'), and in Eph. 1:18; Heb. 6:4 (Gr. φωτίζω, fo-tid'-zo).

EN-MISHPAT (Heb. מִשְׁפָּט, ane mish-paw', fountain of judgment), the earlier name (Gen. 14:7) for KADESH (q. v.).

ENMITY (Heb. אֵיבָוָה, ay-baw'; Gr. ἐχθρα, ekh'-thrah), deep-rooted hatred, irreconcilable hostility. God established perpetual enmity, not only between the serpent and the woman, but also between the human and the serpent race (Gen. 3:15). Friendship with the world (i. e., the corrupt part of it) is declared to be "enmity with God" (James 4:4), as being at variance with his plans for the promotion of righteousness (see 1 John 2:15, 16); so also the carnal mind is enmity against God (Rom. 8:7, 8), opposed to his nature and will. The ceremonial law is called "enmity" (Eph. 2:15, 16), probably to the hostility between Jew and Gentile, due to Judaical limitations and antagonisms, and more especially the alienation of both Jew and Gentile from God.

ENOCH (Heb. חֵנוֹךְ, khan-oké', initiated), the name of two men, two others having their name given as HANOCH (q. v.).

1. The eldest son of Cain, who called the city which he built after his name (Gen. 4:17, 18).

2. The son of Jared (Gen. 5:18) and father of Methuselah (5:21, sq.; Luke 3:37). After the birth of Methuselah, in his sixty-fifth year, he lived three hundred years. From his name, "the Inaugurator" Ewald (History of Israel, i, p. 266) concludes that he "was a good spirit, who was invoked on any new or difficult undertaking;" and, from the period of three hundred and sixty-five years assigned to his life, that "he became the god of the new year." Though this conjecture has very little probability the number may have been not without influence on the later traditions which assigned to Enoch the discovery of the science of astronomy (McC. and S., Cyc.). After the birth of Methuselah it is said (Gen. 5:22-24) that Enoch "walked with God three hundred years, and was not; for God took him." As a reward of his sanctity he was transported into heaven without dying, and thus the doctrine of immortality was plainly taught under the old dispensation. In the Epistle to the Hebrews (11:5) the spring and issue of Enoch's life are clearly marked. Jude (vers. 14, 15) quotes from a prophecy of Enoch, but whether he derived his quotation from tradition or from writing is uncertain. The voice of early ecclesiastical tradition is almost unanimous in regarding Enoch and Elijah as "the two witnesses" (Rev. 11:3).

3. The first city mentioned in Scripture (Gen. 4:17), built by Cain, east of Eden and in the land of Nod.

ENOS (Heb. אֵנוֹשׁ, en-ósh', a man), the son of Seth and grandson of Adam (Gen. 5:6-11; Luke 3:38). He lived nine hundred and five years, and is remarkable on account of a singular expression used respecting him in Gen. 4:26, "Then began men to call upon the name of the Lord." Two explanations are given of this passage. One is the marginal reading, "Then began men to call themselves by the name of the Lord," in order, it would seem, to distinguish themselves from those who were already idolaters and were termed children of men; the other, "Then men profanely called on the name of the Lord," intimating that at that period idolatry began to be practiced among men (McC. and S., Cyc.). In 1 Chron. 1:1 the name is Anglicized Enosh.

ENOSH, a more correct way of Anglicizing (1 Chron. 1:1) the name Enos (q. v.).

"ENQUIRE OF THE LORD" is a phrase often met with in early Scripture history. Rebekah is represented as going "to enquire of the Lord" (Gen. 25:22). During Jethro's visit to Moses we find the lawgiver vindicating his judicial office in these words, "Because the people come unto me to enquire of the Lord," etc. (Exod. 18:15, 16). In the tribal war against the Benjamites "the children of Israel enquired diligently of the Lord" (Judg. 20:27). We read also of this being done in the times of Saul, David, and Samuel (1 Sam. 9:9; 10:22; 2 Sam. 2:1; 5:19, 23; 1 Chron. 14:10, 14). This longing of humanity for some material representation of divine direction and decision was responded to by Jehovah, who in different ways made known his counsel and guidance to those who "enquired" of him. This was done through the pillar of cloud, the shechinah, the urim and the thummim, and prophecy.

EN-RIMMON (Heb. רִמּוֹן, ane rim-mone', fountain of a pomegranate), a place occupied by the descendants of Judah after the exile (Neh. 11:29), apparently the same with "Ain and Rimmon" (Josh. 15:32). It seems probable that they were so close together that in the course of time they grew into one.

EN-RO'GEL (Heb. רֹגֵל, ane ro-galé', fountain of the treaders), the "foot fountain," also called the "fullers' fountain." Here the fullers cleansed their garments by treading them in the water of the spring (Joel 15:7; 18:16; 2 Sam. 17:17; 1 Kings 1:9). Thomson speaks of this as the well of Job, "Bir Eyub," or the well of Jeremiah, and just below the junction of the valley of Hinnom and that of Jehoshaphat, about five hundred and fifty feet lower than the top of Mount Zion. "But it has been proved to be the spring called by the natives 'the mother of steps' and by Christians the Virgin's Well" (Harper, Bible and Mod. Dis.). Conder (Palestine, p. 26) identifies En-rogel with the Virgin's Well, and thinks it the same as Bethesda. See SUPPLEMENT.

ENSAMPLE. See EXAMPLE.

EN-SHE'MESH (Heb. שֶׁמֶשׁ, ane sheh'-mesh, fountain of the sun), a landmark between Judah and Benjamin (Josh. 15:7; 18:17), east of the Mount of Olives; said to be the only spring on the way to Jericho, now called Ain-Haud, or "well of the apostles."

ENSIGN, the rendering of three Hebrew words, also translated BANNER and STANDARD. "The distinction between these three Hebrew terms is sufficiently marked by their respective uses. Neither of them, however, expresses the idea which 'standard' conveys to our minds, viz., a flag. The standards in use among the Hebrews probably resembled those of the Egyptians and

Assyrians—a figure or device of some kind elevated on a pole. (1) Nace (Heb. נֶסֶף). The notices of the nace or 'ensign' are most frequent; it consisted of some well-understood signal which was exhibited on the top of a pole from a bare mountain top (Isa. 13:2; 18:3). What the nature

Figurative. "It was customary to give a defeated party a banner as a token of protection, and it was regarded as the surest pledge of fidelity. God's lifting or setting up an ensign (Isa. 11:12) is a most expressive figure, and imports a peculiar presence, protection, and aid in leading and directing his people in the execution of his righteous will, and giving them comfort and peace in his service" (McC. & S., Cyc., s. v.). See GLOSSARY.

ENSUE. See GLOSSARY.

EN-TAP'PUAH (Heb. עֵינַן תַּפְּוּאָה, ane tap-poo'-akh, fountain of Tappuah), a spring near the city of TAPPUAH (q. v.), put for that place in Josh. 17:7 (comp. v. 8).

ENTREAT. See GLOSSARY.

ENVY (Heb. כִּנְיָן, kin-aw'; Gr. φθόνος, phthon'-os) is (1) that discontented and mortified feeling which arises in the selfish heart in view of the superiority of another, nearly tantamount to jealousy (Psa. 37:1; 73:3; Prov. 24:1, 19; Phil. 1:15, etc.). (2) That malignant passion which sees in another qualities which it covets and hates their possessor (Prov. 27:4; Matt. 27:18; Rom. 1:29, etc.).

Envy is ill will, malice, spite (James 3:14). It is accompanied by every "evil work" (v. 16). It always desires and often strives to degrade others, not so much because it aspires after elevaof the signal was we have no means of stating. The important point to be observed is that the nace was an occasional signal and not a military standard. (2) The term deh'-gel (Heb. דֶּה־גֵּל) is used to describe the standards which were given to each of the four divisions of the Israelite army at the time of the Exodus (Num. 1:52; 2:2, sq.; 10:14, sq.). The character of the Hebrew military standards is quite a matter of conjecture; they probably resembled the Egyptian, which consisted of a sacred emblem, such as an animal, a boat, or the king's name" (Smith, Bib. Dict., s. v.). (3) Oth (Heb. אוֹת), the standard of each tribe (Num. 2:2, sq.), different from the deh'-gel, the banner of three tribes together.

tion as because it delights in obscuring those who are more deserving. It is one of the most odious and detestable of vices.

EPÆNETUS (Gr. Ἐπαίνετος, ep-a'hee-net-os, praised), a Christian at Rome, greeted by St. Paul in Rom. 16:5 and designated as his beloved and the first fruit of Asia unto Christ.

EP'APHRAS (Gr. Ἐπαφράς, ep-af-ras', probably a contraction of Epaphroditus), an eminent teacher in the Church at Colossæ, denominated by Paul "his dear fellow-servant" and "a faithful minister of Christ" (Col. 1:7; 4:12), A. D. 62. It has been inferred from Col. 1:7 ("As ye also learned of Epaphras") that he was the founder of the Colossian Church. Lardner thinks that the expression respecting Epaphras in Col. 4:12, ὁ ἐξ ὑμῶν (one of you), is quite inconsistent with the supposition of his being the founder of the Church since the same phrase is applied to Onesimus, a recent convert. The words are probably intended to identify these individuals as fellow-townsmen of the Colossians. He was at this time with Paul in Rome, and is afterward mentioned in the Epistle to Philemon (ver. 23), where Paul calls him "my fellow-prisoner." The martyrologies make Epaphras to have been the first bishop of Colossæ and to have suffered martyrdom there.

EPAPHRODITUS (Gr. Ἐπαφρόδιτος, ep-af-rod'-ee-tos, belonging to Aphrodite, or Venus), a messenger of the church of Philippi to the apostle Paul during his imprisonment at Rome, intrusted with their contributions for his support (Phil. 2: 25; 4:18). Paul seems to have held him in high appreciation, calling him his brother, companion in labor, and fellow-soldier. While in Rome he

3. One of the sons of Jahdai, probably a descendant of one of the sons of the foregoing (1 Chron. 2:47).

EPHAAH (Heb. אֶפְאָה, ay-faw'), a measure for grain. See METROLOGY, II.

E'PHAI (Heb. עֵפְאִי, o-fah'ee, birdlike), a Ne-tophathite, whose sons were among the "captains of the forces" left in Judah after the deportation to Babylon, and who submitted themselves to Gedaliah, the Babylonian governor (Jer. 40:8). They warned Gedaliah of the plots against him, but were disbelieved by him (vers. 13-16), and probably were massacred with him by Ishmael (41:2, 3), B. C. 588.

E'PIHER (Heb. אֶפְיֵר, ay'-fer, gazelle).

1. The second named of the sons of Midian (Gen. 25:4; 1 Chron. 1:33), Abraham's son by Keturah.
2. An Israelite of the tribe of Judah, apparently contracted a dangerous illness, brought on by his ministering to the apostle (2:30). On his return to Philippi he was the bearer of the epistle to the Church there. Grotius and some other critics conjecture that Epaphroditus was the same as Epaphras mentioned in the Epistle to the Colossians. But though the latter name may be a contraction of the former the fact that Epaphras was most probably in prison at the time sufficiently marks the distinction of the persons (Kitto).

Temple of Diana, at Ephesus (restoration).

E'PHAAH (Heb. אֶפְאָה, ay-faw', gloom).

1. The first named of the five sons of Midian (Gen. 25:4; 1 Chron. 1:33). His descendants formed one of the tribes of the desert connected with the Midianites, Shebaïtes, and Ishmaelites (Isa. 60:6, 7), and had its seat on the east coast of the Eulanic Gulf.

2. A concubine of Caleb, the son of Hezron, of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 2:46).

of the family of Caleb, the son of Jephunneh (1 Chron. 4:17).

3. The head of one of the families of Manasseh east, who were carried away by Tilgath-pilneser (1 Chron. 5:21-26), B. C. before 727.

E'PHES-DAM'MIM (Heb. אֶפְסַיִם דְּמַיִם, eh'-fes dam-meem', boundary of blood, 1 Sam. 17:1), called Pas-dammim (1 Chron. 11:13). The sanguinary contests between Israel and the Philistines gave it its name. The modern Beit Fased ("house of bleeding").

EPHESIANS. See EPHEsus.

EPHESIANS, EPISTLE TO. See BIBLE, BOOKS OF.

EPH'ESUS (Gr. Ἐφεσος, ef'-es-os), the capital of proconsular Asia, and an opulent city on the western coast of Asia Minor, located on the banks of the Cayster and about forty miles S. E. of Smyrna. Its harbor was ample.

1. History. It was colonized as early as the 11th century B. C. by Androclus, the son of the Athenian king, Codrus. The Persians, Macedonians, and the Romans each put it under subjection. In 262 A. D. it was destroyed by the Goths, and afterward never rose to its former glory.

2. Religion. The Ephesians worshiped the Asiatic goddess Diana (see GODS, FALSE), whose temple, one of the seven wonders of the world, made the city famous. The people, after the temple was destroyed by fire (B. C. 356), immediately rebuilt it. It is said that some of the magnificent columns are incorporated in the Church of St. Sophia.

There were many Jews in the city who were more or less influenced by Christianity (Acts 2:9; 6:9). Timothy was the bishop of the Church founded by St. Paul. To this Church Paul ad-drawn one of his epistles. According to Eusebius St. John spent his last years in Ephesus. John opposed the doctrines of Nestorius, and Paul opposed the idolatry of those who made or worshiped shrines or practiced magic (19:13, sq.). His opposition resulted in a serious riot.

Several important councils were held in Ephesus, among which was the third ecumenical council (June 22–August 31, A. D. 431). A small Turkish town to-day represents the once noted city, which is called Ayasuluk. See SUPPLEMENT.

EPH'LAL (Heb. עֶפְרַיִם, ef-lawl', judge), the son of Zabad, a descendant of Judah of the lineage of Sheshan (1 Chron. 2:37).

EPHOD (Heb. עֶפְדִּים, ay-fode', an ephod), the father of Haniel, the prince of the tribe of Manasseh, who was one of those appointed to divide the land among the tribes of Israel (Num. 34:23), B. C. before 1170.

EPHOD (Heb. עֶפְדִּים, ay-fode', a girdle), the official garment prescribed for the high priest (q. v.), but afterward worn by ordinary priests (1 Sam. 22:18). Samuel wore a garment of this sort even when a boy (2:18) because he was set apart to a lifelong service before the Lord. David was girded with a white ephod when he brought the ark to Jerusalem (2 Sam. 6:14). Attention is called to some much disputed instances of the use of the term ephod:

1. In Isaiah (30:22) the Hebrew is rendered "the ornament of thy molten images of gold." Here it is evident that the word does not imply the image itself, but a part of it, answering to "covering" in the same verse.

2. Gideon's ephod. In Judg. 8:27 is the following: "And Gideon made an ephod, and put it in his city, even in Ophrah," etc. Some, and among them Ewald, think that this was an image set up for worship. Ewald calls it (Hist. of Israel, ii, p. 388) a "gilded household god, which, doubtless only in compliance with the custom of the time, he is said to have made out of the gold taken in the spoil, which was voluntarily cast into a general's mantle spread out to receive it. . . . It was at least Jehovah whom he and his followers worshiped in this image." According to Robertson (Early Religion of Israel, pp. 230–239), the ephod was not an image representing the national God of Israel, but "the dress of the priest; and as the priest wearing it gave forth utterances for the guidance of the people the superstition of the time may have supposed that from such a magnificent ephod, kept by a man like Gideon, who still desired that Jehovah should directly rule over Israel (8:23), guidance would be given in cases of difficulty."

3. Micah's ephod. In the story of Micah we read (Judg. chaps. 17, 18) that "the man Micah had an house of gods, and made an ephod, and teraphim, and consecrated one of his sons, who became his priest." Here also the ephod probably is nothing else than the priest's dress; and for the want of a better priest Micah set apart his son to wear the ephod and perform the priestly functions.

EPH'PHATHA (Gr. ἐφφαθῆ, ef-futh-ah', be thou opened), i. e., receive power of hearing, the ears of the deaf and the eyes of the blind being considered as closed (Mark 7:34).

EPHRAIM (Heb. עֶפְרַיִם, ef-rah'yim, fruitful), the second son of Joseph by Asenath, the daughter of Poti-pherah (Gen. 46:20), born during the seven years of plenty, B. C. about 1650.

1. Personal History. The first incident in Ephraim's history is the blessing of his grandfather, Jacob. Contrary to the intention of Joseph Ephraim was preferred to Manasseh by Jacob, and upon him was conferred the birthright blessing (Gen. 48:17–19). Before Joseph's death Ephraim's family had reached the third generation (50:23), and it may have been about this time that the affray mentioned in 1 Chron. 7:21 occurred, when some of his sons were killed and when Ephraim named a son Beriah to perpetuate the memory of the disaster which had fallen on his house.

2. The Tribe of Ephraim. (1) Numbers. At the census in the wilderness of Sinai (Num. 1:32, 33; 2:19) its numbers were forty thousand five hundred, ranking tenth, and had decreased to thirty-two thousand five hundred at the second census, ranking eleventh. (2) Position. During the march through the wilderness the position of the sons of Joseph and Benjamin was on the west of the tabernacle (Num. 2:18–24), and the prince of Ephraim was Elishama, the son of Ammihud (1:10). According to rabbinical authority the standard of Ephraim was a golden flag, on which the head of a calf was depicted. The representative of Ephraim among the spies was the great hero, "Oshea, the son of Nun," whose name was changed by Moses to the more distinguished form (Joshua) in which it is familiar to us. (3) Territory. The boundaries of Ephraim are given in Josh. 16 (comp. 1 Chron. 7:28, 29). We are not able to trace this boundary line very exactly. But Ephraim occupied the very center of Palestine, embracing an area about forty miles in length from east to west and from six to twenty-five in breadth from north to south. It extended from the Mediterranean to the Jordan, having on the north the half tribe of Manasseh and on the south Benjamin and Dan (Josh. 16:5, etc.; 18:7, etc.; 1 Chron. 7:28, 29). The tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh were not at first contented with the size of their allotted portions, and were told by Joshua to go boldly and expel the inhabitants of the adjacent mountain and woodland country and occupy it (Josh. 17:14–18). (4) Subsequent history. "The tabernacle was set up in Ephraim at Shiloh" (Josh. 18:1). By this circumstance the influence of the tribe was increased, and we find it bearing itself haughtily. We have an example of this in their remonstrance to Gideon after his first victory, which that leader deemed prudent to pacify by a flattering answer (Judg. 7:24, 25; 8:1–3). With Jephthah they were still more incensed because, as they said, he had not solicited their aid. Jephthah boldly attacked and defeated them (12:1–6). At first the Ephraimites did not submit to the authority of David (2 Sam. 2:8, 9), and though, after the death of Ish-bosheth, a large body of them went to Hebron to join David and that monarch could speak of Ephraim as the strength of his head, yet the jealousy against Judah sometimes broke out (1 Chron. 12:30; Psa. 60:7; 2 Sam. 19:40-43). David had his ruler in Ephraim (1 Chron. 27:20) and Solomon his commissariat officer (1 Kings 4:8). Still the spirit and weight of the tribe were so great that Rehoboam found it necessary to repair to Shechem, a city within its borders, for his inauguration (1 Kings 12:1). And then, on his foolish refusal of their demands, the ten tribes revolted, and established a different mode of worship (ch. 12). After this Ephraim was the main support of the northern kingdom, which came to be designated by its name, and the reunion of which with Judah was the hope of the prophets as the fulfillment of Israel's glory (Isa. 7:2; 11:13; Ezek. 37:15-22). After the captivity "children of Ephraim" dwelt in Jerusalem (1 Chron. 9:3; comp. Neh. 11).

EPHRAIM, CITY OF. In the wilderness was the town mentioned (John 11:54). It lay northeast of Jerusalem. Christ found refuge there when threatened with violence by the priests in consequence of raising Lazarus from the dead. Identified as et Taiyibeh.

EPHRAIM, GATE OF. This was one of the gates of Jerusalem, on the north side of the city (2 Kings 14:13; 2 Chron. 25:23).

EPHRAIM, MOUNT OF, called also by other names, as "mountains of Israel" (Josh. 11:21) and "mountains of Samaria" (Jer. 31:5, 6; Amos 3:9). Joshua's burial place was among these mountains, at Timnath-heres, on the north side of the hill Gaash (Judg. 2:9). The earliest name given to the central range of mountains in Samaria was Mount Ephraim, just as the whole table land of Judah was called Mount Judah.

EPHRAIM, WOOD OF. When David's army had advanced into the field against Israel (those who followed Absalom) a battle was fought "in the wood of Ephraim" (2 Sam. 18:6). All the circumstances connected with the battle indicate that it took place east of Jordan: Absalom had encamped in Gilead, and it is not stated that he had recrossed the Jordan; verse 3 ("that thou succor us out of the city") presupposes that the battle took place near Mahanaim; and after the victory the army returned to Mahanaim.

EPHRAIMITE, a descendant of the patriarch Ephraim (Josh. 16:10; Judg. 12:4, 5, 6); also rendered EPHRATHITE (q. v.). The narrative in Judges seems to indicate that the Ephraimites had a peculiar accent, or patois, similar to that which in later times caused "the speech" of the Galileans to betray them at Jerusalem (Matt. 26:73).

EPHRAIN (Heb. יִרְמֵה, ef-rone'), a city of Israel, which with its dependent hamlets Abijah and the army of Judah captured from Jeroboam (2 Chron. 13:19). C. V. Raumer and others identify Ephron or Ephrain both with Ophrah of Benjamin, which, it is conjectured, was situated near or in Taiyibeh, to the east of Beth-el, and with the city of Ephraim (Keil, Com., in loc.).

EPH'RATAH, or EPH'RATH (Heb. יְרֵמֶה, ef-raw'-thaw, fruitfulness, fruitful).

1. The second wife of Caleb, the son of Ezron, mother of Hur (1 Chron. 2:19) and grandmother of Caleb, the spy (ver. 50; 4:4), B. C. probably 1260.

2. The ancient name of Beth-lehem in Judah (Gen. 35:16, 19; 48:7), both which passages distinctly prove that it was called Ephrath or Ephrath in Jacob's time. The meaning of the passage, "Lo, we heard of it at Ephrath" (Psa. 132:6), is much disputed. The most obvious reference is to Beth-lehem, which is elsewhere known by that name.

EPH'RATHITE (Heb. יְרֵמֶה, ef-rawth-ee')

1. An inhabitant of Bethlehem (Ruth 1:2).

2. An Ephraimite (1 Sam. 1:1; 1 Kings 11:26).

EPH'RON (Heb. יְרֵמֶה, ef-rone', perhaps faunlike).

1. The son of Zohar, a Hittite; the owner of a field which lay facing Mamre, or Hebron, and of the cave contained therein, which Abraham bought from him for four hundred shekels of silver (Gen. 23:8-17; 25:9; 49:29, 30; 50:13), B. C. perhaps about 2200. By Josephus (Ant., i, 14) the name is Ephraim, and the purchase money forty shekels.

2. A mountain the "cities" of which formed one of the landmarks on the north boundary of the tribe of Judah (Josh. 15:9). It was probably the steep and lofty mountain ridge on the west side of the Terebinth valley (Wady Beit Hanina).

EPICUR'E'ANS, THE, (Gr. Ἐπικουρεῖος, ep-ee-koo'-ri-os), derived their name from Epicurus (342-271 B. C.), a philosopher of Attic descent, whose "Garden" at Athens rivaled in popularity the "Porch" and the "Academy." The doctrines of Epicurus found wide acceptance in Asia Minor and Alexandria, and they gained a brilliant advocate at Rome in Lucretius (95-50 B. C.). The object of Epicurus was to find in philosophy a practical guide to happiness. True pleasure and not absolute truth was the end at which he aimed; experience and not reason the test on which he relied. It is obvious that a system thus framed would degenerate by a natural descent into mere materialism; and in this form Epicurism was the popular philosophy at the beginning of the Christian era (comp. Diog., L. x, 5, 9). When St. Paul addressed "Epicureans and Stoics" (Acts 17:18) at Athens the philosophy of life was practically reduced to the teaching of those two antagonistic schools (Smith).

EPISTLE (Gr. ἐπιστολή, ep-is-to-lay', a written message), the term employed to designate twenty-one out of twenty-seven of the writings of the New Testament, while Luke and the Acts are both prefaced by an epistle to Theophilus, a friend of the evangelist. They are known as Paul's Epistles and the Catholic or General Epistles.

1. Paul's Epistles number fourteen (if we include Hebrews), arranged in the New Testament not in the order of time as to their composition, but rather according to the rank of the places to which they were sent. It is not known by whom they were thus arranged. His letters were, as a rule, written by an amanuensis under his dictation, after which he added a few words in his own hand at the close. The epistles to Timothy and Titus are called pastoral epistles, from their being pastoral instructions from a pastor to a pastor.

2. The Catholic or General Epistles were so called because they were not addressed to any particular church or individual, but to Christians in general. Of these three were written by John, two by Peter, and one each by James and Jude. This division is strictly accurate, for 1 Peter and 2 and 3 John, although addressed to particular persons, have little in them that is properly local and personal. See BIBLE, BOOKS OF.

EPISTLES, SPURIOUS. Many of these are lost, but several are extant, of which the following are the principal:

1. The Epistle of Paul to the Laodiceans. Marcion received as genuine an "Epistle of Paul to the Laodiceans," early in the 2d century, but it is doubtful whether it is the one now extant in the Latin language. The original epistle was probably a forgery founded on Col. 4:16, "And when this epistle is read among you, cause that it be read also in the church of the Laodiceans, and that ye likewise read the epistle from Laodicea." Some have endeavored to identify it with a genuine epistle; Grotius thinks it to be the Epistle to the Ephesians; Theophylact that it is 1 Timothy; others hold it to be 1 John, Philemon, etc.

2. Third Epistle of Paul to the Corinthians. Calvin, Louis Cappell, and others think that Paul wrote many other epistles besides those now known, basing their opinion on 1 Cor. 5:9. There is still extant, in the Armenian language, an epistle from the Corinthians to Paul, together with the apostle's reply. This epistle is quoted as Paul's by St. Gregory the Illuminator in the 3d century.

3. The Epistle of Peter to James is a very ancient forgery. Origen says that it was not to be reckoned among the ecclesiastical books, and that it was not written by Peter or any other inspired person. It is thought to be a forgery of some Ebonite in the beginning of the 2d century.

4. The Epistles of Paul and Seneca consist of eight long letters from the philosopher Seneca to the apostle Paul, with six from the latter to Seneca. Their antiquity is doubted. They are mentioned by St. Jerome and Augustine, and are generally rejected as spurious.

5. The Epistle of Lentulus to the Roman Senate, giving a description of the person of Christ, and some pretended epistles of the Virgin Mary, are generally rejected. See BIBLE.

EPOCH, a point of time distinguished by some remarkable event, and from which succeeding years are numbered. See ERA.

EQUAL. See GLOSSARY.

ER (Heb. עֵר, ayr, watchful).

1. The eldest son of the patriarch Judah by Bath-shuah (daughter of Shuah), a Canaanitess (Gen. 38:2, 3), B. C. about 1640. "Er was wicked in the sight of the Lord; and the Lord slew him" (ver. 7; Num. 26:19). It does not appear what the nature of his sin was; but, from his Canaanitish birth on his mother's side, it was probably connected with the abominable idolatries of Canaan (Smith).

2. The son of Shelah and grandson of Judah (1 Chron. 4:21).

3. The son of Jose and father of Elmodam, in the ancestry of Joseph, the husband of Mary (Luke 3:28).

ERA, a period during which years are numbered and dates are reckoned from some historical event.

1. Jewish. The ancient Jews used several eras in their computations: 1. From Gen. 7:11 and 8:13 it appears that they reckoned from the lives of the patriarchs or other illustrious persons; 2. From their Exode from Egypt (Exod. 19:1; Num. 1:1; 33:38); 3. From the building of the temple (1 Kings 9:10; 2 Chron. 8:1), and the reigns of the kings of Judah and Israel; 4. From the Babylonian captivity (Ezek. 1:1; 33:21; 40:1), and the dedication of the second temple; 5. Era of the Seleucidae, dating from the occupation of Babylon by Seleucus Nicator (312 B. C.); 6. From the time when their princes began to reign (1 Kings 15:1; Isa. 36:1; Jer. 1:2, 3; also Matt. 2:1; Luke 1:5; 3:1); 7. Since the compilation of the Talmud the Jews have reckoned their years from the creation of the world, which they fix at B. C. 3761.

2. Ancient Heathen. 1. The First Olympiad placed in the year of the world 3228, and B. C. 776; 2. The taking of Troy by the Greeks, year of the world 2820 and B. C. 1884; 3. The voyage undertaken for the possession of the golden fleece, year of the world 2760; 4. Foundation of Rome (A. U. C.), B. C. 753; 5. Era of Nabonassar, B. C. 747; 6. Era of Alexander the Great, or his last victory over Darius, B. C. 330; 7. Julian Era, dating from the reform of the calendar by Julius Cæsar, B. C. 45, Jan. 1; 8. Era of Diocletian, being the beginning of the first Egyptian year after the accession of that emperor, A. D. 284, August 29; 9. Among the Mohammedans, the Hegira, A. D. 622; 10. Among the modern Persians, the Era of Yezdegird III, A. D. 632, June 16.

3. Christian. For a long time the Christians had no era of their own, but followed those in common use in the different countries: In the western part of the Roman empire the Consular Era was used until the 6th century after Christ. The Era of Diocletian, called by the Christians the "Era of Martyrs" (Æra Martyrum) because of persecutions in his reign, still used by the Abyssinians and Copts. The Era of the Armenians, when the Armenians, at the council of Tiben, separated from the main body of the Eastern Church by rejecting the council of Chalcedon, A. D. 552. The Era of Constantinople, or Byzantine Era, begins with the creation of the world, which it fixes at B. C. 5508. The Vulgar or Christian Era, beginning with the birth of Christ, is the ordinary count of years in the Christian countries. This era was invented in the 6th century by Dionysius Exiguus, who supposed that Christ was born December 25, A. D. 1, a date now universally considered to be at least three years too late. For several centuries the year was begun on March 25, the day of annunciation. In the 11th century the Dionysian Era was adopted by the popes, and has since been in universal use in the Western Church. See CHRONOLOGY.

ERAN (Heb. עֵרָן, ay-ravn', watchful), son of Shuthelah (eldest son of Ephraim) and head of the family of the Eranites (Num. 26:36).

ERANITES, descendants of Eran (Num. 26:36).

ERASTUS (Gr. Ἐραστός, er'-as-tos, beloved), a Corinthian and one of Paul's disciples, whose salutations he sends from Corinth to the Church at Rome as those of "the chamberlain of the city" (Rom. 16:23). The word so rendered (οικονόμος, Ulg. arcarius) denotes the city treasurer (or steward), an officer of great dignity in ancient times (Josephus, Ant., vii, 8, 2); so that the conversion of such a man to the faith of the Gospel was a proof of the wonderful success of the apostle's labors in that city. We find Erastus with Paul at Ephesus as one of his attendants or deacons, whence he was sent along with Timothy into Macedonia, while the apostle himself remained in Asia (Acts 19:22). They were both with the apostle at Corinth when he wrote, as above, from that city to the Romans; at a subsequent period Erastus was still at Corinth (2 Tim. 4:20), which would seem to have been the usual place of his abode.

ERECH (Heb. עֲרַח, ek'-rek, length, or Moon-town), a city of Nimrod (Gen. 10:10) lying on the left bank of the Euphrates. The burying place of the Assyrian kings. It is not said that Nimrod built this and other cities in the plain of Shinar, but that he established his power over them, which indicates their antiquity, they having been of another and earlier period.

ERI (Heb. עֲרִי, ay-ree', watching), the fifth son of the patriarch Gad (Gen. 46:16) and ancestor of the Erites (Num. 26:16).

ERITE, a patronymic designation (Num. 26:16) of the descendants of the Gadite ERI (q. v.).

ERR. See GLOSSARY.

ESA'IAS (Gr. Ἡσαίας, hay-sah-ee'as), the Grecized form of Isaiah, constantly used in the New Testament.

ESAR-HADDON (Heb. אֶסַר-חַדְדֹן, ay-sar'-khad-dohn', gift of fire), one of the greatest monarchs and most successful warriors of Assyria, son of Sennacherib, whom he succeeded on the Assyrian throne; reigned 681-668 B. C. The name of Esar-haddon is in Assyrian Asshur-akhi-iddin, i. e., "Asshur has given a brother;" he was therefore probably the second son born to Sennacherib.

1. Sources of Information. Of his reign we now have abundant historical material, from which the chief events in their proper order, as well as the general policy of the kingdom, may be readily ascertained. His chief inscriptions consist of a prism with more than three hundred lines of text, now in the British Museum; several broken duplicates of the same; a beautiful black basalt block; a number of small tablets now badly broken, and a large stone stele found at Singali, in Northern Syria. The last named is in the Royal Museum at Berlin. These texts have been copied and published by Budge, Harper, Schrader, Winckler, Rogers, and others; from their work the following sketch of his reign is made out.

2. Coming to Throne. When Sennacherib died at Nineveh Esar-haddon was in command of an Assyrian army in Western Armenia. Though he was not the eldest son, and therefore not legally his father's successor, he was the favorite son, and his father had provided by will that he should be the next king of Assyria. He well knew that his succession would be contended, and opposed even by arms. He therefore set out for Nineveh by forced marches. On his way he was met by his brother's army, which he promptly defeated, and was thus able to ascend the throne without serious opposition.

3. Rebuilds Babylon. The attention of Esar-haddon, after his ascension to the throne, was first directed to Babylonia. His father Sennacherib had attempted to end the long series of difficulties with Babylonia by utterly destroying the queenly city (see SENNACHERIB). This had been an unhappy blunder. The city was indeed gone, but its rebellious inhabitants still lived and were only embittered in their opposition to the Assyrian supremacy. Esar-haddon rebuilt the royal city in yet greater magnificence than before, and returned the gods and images which had been removed by his father. This master stroke of policy knit to him the hearts of the people of Babylonia, and made possible a unifying of the empire before the beginning of further conquest and imperial extension.

4. Western Campaign. In the fourth year of his reign Esar-haddon turned his attention to the west. He marched into Phœnicia and captured the wealthy commercial city of Sidon and executed its king, Abdi-Milkuti. He built another city near by, peopled it with captives, and set a governor of Assyrian origin over it. By this move he designed to place in Assyrian hands the commerce which had been controlled by the Phœnicians in Sidon. The plan failed at this time and the commerce went to Tyre, another Phœnician city. Though not successful in his commercial plans, the military results of the campaign were great. All Palestine submitted to him and sent presents. He enumerates ten kings of Cyprus and twelve kings of Syria and Palestine who paid tribute to him. Among the latter appears Manasseh, king of Judah.

5. Repelling Invasions. In 678 the great empire was itself seriously threatened, and Esar-haddon was compelled to change his offensive tactics into defensive. He had designs upon Egypt, but was compelled to withdraw his troops and prepare to defend even Assyria itself. A vast horde of barbarians from southern Russia had crossed the Caucasus Mountains, and passed over the territory of Armenia. They are known to us as the Cimmericians, and are by many considered to be the people known in the Old Testament under the name of Gomer (Gen. 10:2). Their leader was Teuspa, a Mannæan chief. Esar-haddon drove back the invaders from Assyria and diverted them into Asia Minor. In reality the movement of this people was not an organized invasion of Assyria for purposes of conquest, but rather a migration of people seeking new homes. They settled in Asia Minor and there built up kingdoms which later became a menace to Assyria. But they gave no further trouble in the reign of Esar-haddon.

6. Arabian Campaign. Immediately after these troubles Esar-haddon's empire was similarly threatened on the south by the nomad tribes of Arabia. He organized afresh his now veteran troops and plunged into the heart of Arabia. No such feat had ever before been attempted. He had to cross trackless wastes and waterless deserts. The Arabians felt secure in their almost isolated country, and the unconquered men of the desert believed they could ravage when and where they chose. Their fancied security was madness. Esar-haddon appeared among them and drove them before him with savage slaughter. The march was phenomenal. Its results may even yet be considered remarkable when it is remembered that Turkey is not now able to control these same Arabs. They also, like the Cimmerians, gave no further trouble to Assyria.

7. Against Egypt. With all dangers from the Cimmerians and the Arabians set aside, and with a clear course through Syria made possible by the reduction of Sidon and the submission of all the kings and petty princes of Palestine, Esar-haddon was now free to undertake afresh his campaigns against the land of Egypt. In 673 he invaded the land and fought a battle on the 5th of the month Adar. From this brief campaign no results of consequence were achieved. In 670 he again invaded Egypt, and this time with resistless force. The first battle was fought on the 3d day of Tammuz (June-July) at Ishupri and was an Assyrian victory. The Assyrians pushed on into the land and again met the Egyptians in battle on the 16th of the same month, and were again victorious. The last stand of the Egyptians was made on the 18th, and on the 22d Memphis fell into the hands of the Assyrians. The king of Egypt at this time was Tirhakah, an Ethiopian in origin, who had been an ally of King Hezekiah, of Judah, in the campaign of defense against Sennacherib (2 Kings 19:9; see art. SENNACHERIB). Tirhakah fled to his old home, but his harem with his sons and nephews were captured. Memphis was plundered and destroyed that the Egyptians might not have a place for rallying and a base of supplies. Without further successful resistance Esar-haddon marched the whole length of Egypt to the Nubian border, plundering, subduing, and destroying. From the temples alone he caused fifty-five royal statues to be transported to Assyria, and magnificent trophies they were. Egypt was then divided into twenty-two provinces, over each of which a native-born Egyptian was set as ruler. These were, however, intended to be mere puppets in the hands of the Assyrian officers who were nominally under their control. The chief cities in each province were renamed with Assyrian words. The completeness of the overthrow is also signified by the adoption of Assyrian names by Egyptians, among whom Necho, king of Sais, is a conspicuous example. He had his sons provided with Assyrian and not native names. After this Esar-haddon adopted the title of "king of Egypt," which no previous Assyrian king had ever borne.

8. Death. He was, however, not left in undisturbed possession of his vast kingdom. There were internal troubles, and further uprisings in Egypt which necessitated another invasion of the Nile country. This was his last expedition. He died while engaged in it, on the 10th day of Marcheswan (October-November), 668 B. C. He seems to have foreseen his death, either because he was old or in ill-health, for before starting on this journey he had a great royal assembly in Nineveh, where he named his son Asshurbanipal as his successor and his son Shamashshumukin as king of Babylon, subject to Asshurbanipal.

Esar-haddon was scarcely less famous as a builder than as a warrior. His rebuilding of Babylon has already been mentioned. Besides this he erected a magnificent palace at Nineveh. The site was used for a palace before his time, but the new building far surpassed the old. The kings of Palestine, Syria, Cyprus, as well as the subordinate princes along the upper Euphrates, all were forced to send to it contributions of wood and stone. The approaches to it were decorated by colossal winged bulls, and the exterior as well as the interior was beautifully adorned by rare and even precious stones. He also erected temples in various parts of his dominion, notably in Accad as well as in Assyria proper.

Esar-haddon was certainly one of the greatest kings of Assyria. The virtues and energies of the Sargonides were well represented in him. No king of Assyria had carried so far the borders of the empire. His legacy to his son was an undivided, relatively peaceful, and almost resistless empire—the first power of the world.

LITERATURE.—Smith, George, History of Assyria, revised by A. H. Sayce, London, 1895; Winckler, Geschichte Babyloniens und Assyriens, Leipzig, 1892.—R. W. R.

ES'AU.—1. Name and Family. (Heb. עֵשָׂו, ay-sauv', hairy, Gen. 25:25.) His surname, Edom, was given him from the red pottage (25:30). The eldest son of Isaac by Rebekah, and twin brother of Jacob.

2. Personal History. We have no account of the early life of Esau beyond an incident or two connected with his birth (Gen. 25:22-26), B. C. about 2173. As he grew up Esau became "a cunning hunter, a man of the field." He was, in fact, a thorough "son of the desert," who delighted to roam free as the wind of heaven, and who was impatient at the restraints of civilized or settled life. Still his father loved him, and none the less for the savory venison the son brought to him (25:28). (1) Sells his birthright. Coming in one day from the chase hungry and longing for food he saw Jacob enjoying a dish of pottage. He prayed Jacob to share his meal with him. Jacob set a price upon the food, even the birthright of his brother. This was, indeed, a large demand, for the birthright secured to its possessor immunities and privileges of high value—the headship of the tribe, both spiritual and temporal, and the possession of the great bulk of the family property, and carried with it the covenant blessing (Gen. 27:28, 29, 36; Heb. 12:16, 17). Urged by hunger, however, Esau acceded to Jacob's demands, secured the food, and "despised his birthright" (Gen. 25:29-34). (2) Marries. At the age of forty years Esau married two wives in close succession. These were both Canaanites, and, on account of their origin, were not acceptable to Isaac and Rebekah. The latter was especially grieved. "I am weary," she said (Gen. 27:46) "of my life because of the daughters of Heth." (1) His first wife was Adah, the daughter of Elon the Hittite (36:2), called Bashemath in 26:34. (2) His second wife was Aholibamah, the daughter of Anah, as all the accounts agree, except that in 26:34, where by some error or variation of names she is called Judith, the daughter of Beeri the Hittite. (3) Esau's third wife, taken from his own kindred, was Bashemath (otherwise called Mahalath, 28:9), sister of Nebajoth and daughter of Ishmael (36:3). (3) Loses his father's blessing. When Isaac was grown old and feeble he wished, in the consciousness of approaching death, to give his blessing to his elder son. Without regard to the words which were spoken by God with reference to the children before their birth, and without taking any notice of Esau's frivolous barter of his birthright and his ungodly connection with Canaanites, Isaac maintained his preference for Esau. He commanded him to hunt game and prepare him a savory dish that he might eat and bless him. Rebekah sought to frustrate this plan, desiring to secure the inheritance for Jacob. Jacob successfully simulated Esau and secured the desired blessing, but had scarcely done so when Esau returned. When told that his brother had secured the prize he cried out, "Bless me, even me also, O my father!" Urging this entreaty again and again, even with tears, Isaac at length said to him: "Behold thy dwelling shall be the fatness of the earth, and of the dew of heaven from above; and by thy sword shalt thou live, and shalt serve thy brother: and it shall come to pass when thou shalt have the dominion, that thou shalt break his yoke from off thy neck." Thus deprived forever of his birthright by virtue of the irrevocable blessing, Esau hated his brother and vowed vengeance. But he said to himself, "The days of mourning for my father are at hand; then will I slay my brother Jacob." When Esau heard that his father had commanded Jacob to take a wife of the daughters of his kinsman Laban he also resolved to try whether by a new alliance he could propitiate his parents. He accordingly married his cousin Mahalath, the daughter of Ishmael (Gen. 28:6-9). (4) Removes to Mount Seir. Esau probably removed soon after this to Mount Seir, still retaining, however, some interest in his father's property in southern Palestine. It is probable that his own habits and the idolatrous practices of his wives and rising family continued to excite and even increase the anger of his parents; and that he, consequently, considered it more prudent to remove his household to a distance (Gen. 32:3). (5) Reconciled to Jacob. Esau was residing at Mount Seir when Jacob returned from Padan-aram, and Jacob, fearing lest Esau should desire to take revenge for former injuries, sent messengers in order, if possible, to appease his wrath. In reply to his conciliatory message Esau came to meet him with four hundred armed men. "Jacob was greatly afraid and distressed." What must have been his surprise, when they neared each other, to see Esau running with extended arms to greet and embrace him! Esau "fell on his neck and kissed him, and they wept." Jacob had prepared a present for Esau, which the latter at first refused to take, but afterward accepted. Esau's offer to march with Jacob as a guard was declined, and Esau returned to Mount Seir (Gen. 32:3-33:16). (6) Later history. It does not appear that the two brothers met again until the death of their father. Mutual interest and fear constrained them to act honestly, and even generously, toward each other at this solemn interview. They united in laying the body of Isaac in the cave of Machpelah (Gen. 35:29). Then "Esau took all his cattle, and all his substance, which he had got in the land of Canaan"—such, doubtless, as his father, with Jacob's consent, had assigned to him—"and went into the country from the face of his brother Jacob" (36:6). Esau is once more presented to us (36:43) in a genealogical table, in which a long line of illustrious descendants is referred to "Esau, the father of the Edomites."

3. Character. "Esau, the shaggy red-haired huntsman, the man of the field, with his arrows, his quiver, and his bow, coming in weary from the chase, caught, as with the levity and eagerness of a child, by the sight of the lentil soup—'Feed me, I pray thee, with the "red, red" pottage"—yet so full of generous impulse, so affectionate toward his aged father, so forgiving toward his brother, so open-handed, so chivalrous: who has not at times felt his heart warm toward the poor, rejected Esau and been tempted to join with him as he cries with 'a great and exceeding bitter cry,' 'Bless me, even me also, O my father?' In the Jewish history what a foreshadowing of the future! We may even venture to trace in the wayward chieftain of Edom the likeness of the fickle, uncertain Edomite, now allied, now hostile to the seed of promise. 'A turbulent and unruly race,' so Josephus describes the Idumeans of his day; 'always hovering on the verge of revolution, always rejoicing in changes, roused to arms by the slightest motion of flattery, rushing to battle as if they were going to a feast'" (Stanley).

NOTE.—(1) Esau a profane person. "The apostle in Hebrews (12:16) mentions Esau as a "profane person." This probably means that Esau was a sensualist, who, for a moment's gratification, sold his birthright. He is, therefore, marked as the pattern of those who sacrifice eternity for the pleasure of an hour. "The justice of this judgment appears from considering what the birthright was which he sold at such a price. Esau was, by right of birth, the head of the family, its prophet, priest, and king; and no man can renounce such privileges, except as a sacrifice required by God, without despising God, who gave them. But more than this, he was the head of the chosen family; on him devolved the blessing of Abraham, that 'in his seed all the families of the earth should be blessed'; and, in despising his birthright, he put himself out of the sacred family, and so became a "profane person"'" (Smith, Old Testament History). (2) No place for repentance. We do not suppose that Esau sought a change of heart and mind in himself, and that a careful seeking with tears, and yet did not find a place for it. What Esau did seek—the thing which he manifestly did labor after—was a change of mind in Isaac so that he should confer temporary blessings on him, which Isaac, in a degree, did; but no change of mind took place in reference to the spiritual blessing.

ESCHATOLOGY, from Gr. ἔσχατος, es'-khat-os, applied to time, "last." Hence this is the term employed to designate that department of theology which treats of the events and realities of the last times, principally the second coming of Christ, the resurrection of the dead, the final judgment, and the consummation of all things. Death and the intermediate state do not belong strictly to this department, though closely related to it.

Every form of religion that has attained to any degree of development has its eschatological doctrine. Of Christian eschatology, to which we confine our attention, it is important to observe:

1. The Christian doctrine of the Last Times or Last Things is and must be exclusively scriptural. Science and philosophy can avail us nothing here. Of these great things of the future we can have at present no knowledge, except from the infallible word of God. And we depend chiefly upon the predictions of Christ and his apostles.

2. The knowledge thus given is clear only upon certain points of vital interest. Many matters to which we may turn with eager inquiry are purposely left in deepest obscurity. What has been well named "the disciplinary reserve of prophecy" is found here in large measure.

Thus while Christ declared plainly and more than once his purpose to come again to judge the world, and the apostles frequently reiterated his predictions, the time of his coming is left beyond all human calculation. Likewise, it is impossible to ascertain from the Scriptures the precise order of events that must precede his coming (see Matt. 24; 25:31-46; Acts 1:7; 17:31; 2 Pet. 3:10-13, et al.). Also the resurrection of the dead is plainly taught; but the character of the resurrection body is the subject of much fruitless speculation. Heaven and hell are to be the future and eternal portions respectively of the righteous and the wicked; but most questions of detail are left unanswered. And thus with regard to all the separate topics belonging to this part of Christian doctrine. Thus, as has been well said, 'prophetic theology can hardly be dogmatic.'

3. The truly reverent and proper way of dealing with eschatological questions is that which, on the one hand, accepts and recognizes the great importance of such revelations concerning the future as God has seen fit to give us, and, on the other hand, refrains from the endeavor to supplement these revelations by fanciful conjecture or imagination.

For fuller discussion see CHRIST, COMING OF; RESURRECTION; JUDGMENT, FINAL; END OF THE WORLD; HEAVEN; HELL; MILLENNIUM.

ESCHEW. See GLOSSARY.

ESDRAELON, PLAIN OF (Gr. Ἐσδρηλών, es-dray-lón', Judith 1:8; 7:3), was that which united the Jordan valley with the maritime plain, along the Mediterranean, and separated the mountain ranges of Carmel and Samaria from those of Galilee. Its western portion was known as the PLAIN OF MEGIDDO (q. v.), while its eastern slope was called the VALE OF JEZREEL (q. v.). Two things are worthy of special notice in the plain of Esdraelon: its wonderful richness and its desolation. If we except the eastern branches, there is not a single inhabited village on its whole surface and not one sixth of its surface is cultivated.

It is dotted with places of great historic and sacred interest, which are treated under their several names. On the east we have Endor, Nain, and Shunem, ranged around the base of the "hill of Moreh;" Beth-shean, in the center of the plain where the "valley of Jezreel" opens toward Jordan; Gilboa, with the "well of Harod" and the ruins of Jezreel at its western base. On the south are En-gannim, Taanach, and Megiddo. On the west apex, on the overhanging brow of Carmel, is the scene of Elijah's sacrifice; while close by runs the Kishon, on whose banks the false prophets of Baal were slain. On the north are Nazareth and Tabor. The modern Syrians call Esdraelon Merj ibn-'Amer, "the Plain of the Son of 'Amer'" (Smith, Hist. Geog., chap. 19; McC. and S., Cyc.). See SUPPLEMENT.

E'SEK (Heb. עֵשֶׂק, ay-sek', contention), one of three wells dug by Isaac's herdsmen in Gerar, and so named because the herdsmen of Gerar disputed concerning its possession (Gen. 26:20).

ESH'BAAL, or ESH-BA'AL (Heb. עֵשְׁבַאֵל, esh-bah'al, man of Baal), the fourth son of King Saul (1 Chron. 8:33; 9:39). He is doubtless the same person as Ish-bosheth (1 Sam. 31:2, comp. with 2 Sam. 2:8), since it was the practice to change the obnoxious name of Baal into Bosheth or Besheth, as in the case of Jerubbesheth for Jerubbaal and (in this very genealogy) of Mephibosheth for Meribbaal.

ESH'BAN (Heb. עֵשְׁבָן, esh-bawn', vigorous), the second named of the four sons of Dishon, the Horite (Gen. 36:26; 1 Chron. 1:41).

ESH'COL (Heb. עֵשְׁכֹל, esh-kole', a bunch, cluster).

1. A young Amorish chieftain, who, with his brothers, Aner and Mamre, being in alliance with Abraham, joined him in the recovery of Lot from the hands of Chedorlaomer and his confederates (Gen. 14:13, 24), B. C. about 2250.

2. The valley in the neighborhood of Hebron, in which the spies found large grapes (Num. 13:23, 24). The valley probably took its name from the distinguished Amorite above mentioned.

ESH'EAN (Heb. עֵשְׁעָן, esh-awn', support), the third named of a group of nine towns in the country round Hebron in Judah (Josh. 15:52). As the LXX reading is Σομά, So-mah', Knobel conjectures that Eshean is a corrupt reading for Shema (1 Chron. 2:43) and connects it with the ruins of Simia, south of Daumeh (K. and D., Com.).

E'SHEK (Heb. עֵשֶׂק, ay-shek', oppression), a brother of Azel, a Benjamite, one of the late descendants of King Saul; the father of Ulam, the founder of a large and noted family of archers (1 Chron. 8:39).

ESH'KALONITE (Heb. עֵשְׁקָלוֹנִי, esh-kel-onee'), the patril designation (Josh. 13:3) of an inhabitant of ASHKELON (q. v.).

ESH'TAOL (Heb. עֵשְׁתָּאֹל, esh-taw-ole'), a town in the northern part of the hilly region, at first assigned to Judah (Josh. 15:33), but afterward to Dan (18:41). Samson was born at or near Eshtaol (Judg. 13:24, 25; 16:31). From Eshtaol and the neighboring Zorah the Danites started on their expedition to secure more territory at Laish (18: 2, sq.). Its location has not been fixed.

ESH'TAULITE (Heb. עֲשְׂתָאֻלִּיתַיִם, esh-taw-oo-lee'), an inhabitant of Eshtal, and who at a later period, with the Zareathites, belonged to the families of Kirjath-jearim (1 Chron. 2:53).

ESHTEMO'A (Heb. עֲשְׂתֵמֹהַ, esh-tem-o'-ah, obedience), or ESHTEMOH (Heb. עֲשְׂתֵמֹהַ, esh-tem-o', Josh. 15:50), a mountain town of Judah, and afterward ceded to the priests (Josh. 21:14; 1 Chron. 4:17, 19). David, when at Ziklag, sent of his spoil to the elders of Eshtemoa (1 Sam.

the formal execution of the marriage contract at Sinai. The promise of God to betroth Israel (Hos. 2:19, 20) is very significant. He was to renew his covenant, not as a man remarries a divorced wife, but as one espouses a maid; the past is forgiven, and Jehovah makes a new covenant with his Church, such as is made with a spotless virgin. The apostle Paul refers (2 Cor. 11:2, "I have espoused you to one husband") to the custom of having a marriage friend through whom the betrothal was completed, i. e., who drew up the writings, settled the agreements, gave the presents, etc.

ES'ROM (Gr. Ἑσρώμ, es-rome'), a Grecized form (Matt. 1:3; Luke 3:33) of the name of ΗΞ-Valley of Eschol.

30:28), and Ishbah is mentioned (1 Chron. 4:17) as its "father," i. e., lord. It is the present Semua, a village south of Hebron, with considerable ruins dating from ancient times.

ESH'TON (Heb. עֲשְׂתוֹן, esh-tone', restful), a son of Mehir and grandson of Chelub, of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 4:11, 12).

ES'LI (Gr. Ἑσλί, es-lee', son of Nagge (Naggai) and father of Naum, of the maternal ancestry of Christ after the exile (Luke 3:25). He is probably the same with Elioenai, the son of Neariah and father of Johanan (1 Chron. 3:23, 24).

ESPOUSAL, the mutual agreement between parties to marry. See MARRIAGE.

Figurative. This custom is alluded to figuratively, as between God and his people (Jer. 2:2), where the espousal refers to the time between Israel's betrothal at the Exodus from Egypt and RON (q. v.), the grandson of Judah (1 Chron. 2:5).

ESSENCE, THE DIVINE. Essence (from Latin verb esse, to be) signifies that which a person or thing is in himself or itself, apart from all that is accidental. Substance is a term of equivalent meaning. These terms are held by some to be more appropriate in philosophy than in theology. The Scriptures, it is truly said, contain no such abstract terms as essence and substance. At the same time it must be admitted that some of the names under which God has revealed himself, as Elohim and Jehovah, refer directly to the eternal divine essence. At all events theology has often made large use of these terms in its attempts to arrive at the proper and scriptural conception of God. The principal points in dispute have been, first, as to what extent, if any, the divine essence can be known to us; and, secondly, as to the relation existing between the attributes of God and his essence. The view best substantiated is that the attributes of God are not merely subjective conceptions, based upon certain only relatively true Scripture revelations, but that the attributes made known to us through the Scriptures are manifestations of what God is in himself. They are the living realization of his essence. Accordingly, while the divine essence is incomprehensible, we have nevertheless some measure of true knowledge of God, knowledge that relates to his very essence. (See GOD, ATTRIBUTES OF.) For full and discriminating discussion see DORNER, System of Christian Doctrine, vol. i, pp. 187-206; POPE, Compendium of Christian Doctrine, vol. i, pp. 246-252; VAN OOSTERZEE, Christian Dogmatics, vol. i, pp. 234-238; HODGE, Systematic Theology, vol. i, pp. 366-370.—E. ESSENES, a Jewish religious community, though differing in many respects from traditional Judaism.

1. Name. This is of Semitic origin, though but very little has with any certainty been ascertained respecting it. Some have found it in the word for "physicians" (Heb. נָסִיךְ, av-say-yaw'), but the Essenes were never called "physicians," but only servants of God. The derivation advocated by Ewald, Hitzig, Lucius, and others from pious (Heb. נָסִיף, khas-ay') is that which is most suitable.

2. Origin. The origin of the Essenes is as obscure as their name. Josephus first mentions them (Ant., xiii, 5, 9) in the time of Jonathan the Maccabee (about 150 B. C.), and speaks expressly of one Judas an Essene (105-104 B. C.). This would place the origin of the order in the 2d century before Christ. It is questionable whether they proceeded simply from Judaism or whether foreign and especially Hellenistic elements had not also an influence in their origin.

3. Organization. Their whole community was strictly organized as a single body, at the head of which were presidents (Gr. ἐπιμεληται), to whom the members were bound to unconditional obedience. One wishing to enter the order received three badges—a pickax, an apron, and a white garment. After a year's probation he was admitted to the lustrations. Another probation of two years followed, when he was allowed to participate in the common meals and to become a full member after first taking a fearful oath, in which he bound himself to absolute openness to his brethren and secrecy concerning the doctrines of the order to non-members. Only adults were admitted as members, but children were received for instruction in the principles of Essenism. Josephus says that the Essenes were divided into four classes according to the time of their entrance, the children being the first class, those in the two stages of the novitiate the second and third class, and the members proper the fourth class.

4. Discipline. Transgressions of members were tried by a court, and sentence was never pronounced by the votes of less than one hundred. What was once decided by that number was unalterable.

Excommunication was equivalent to a slow death, since an Essene could not take food prepared by strangers for fear of pollution. The strongest tie by which the members were united was the absolute community of goods. "It is a law among them that those who come to them must let what they have be common to the whole order. They also have stewards appointed to take care of their common affairs. They choose fitting persons as receivers of revenues and of the produce of the earth, and priests for the preparation of the bread and food." There was one purse for all, and common expenses, common clothes, and common food at common meals. The needy of the order, as the sick and the aged, were cared for at the common expense, and special officers were appointed in every town to care for the wants of the traveling brethren. The daily labor of the members was strictly regulated. After prayer they were dismissed to their work by the presidents. They reassembled for purifying ablutions and the common meal, after which they went to work again, to reassemble for the evening meal. Although their chief employment was agriculture they carried on crafts of every kind; but trading was forbidden (as leading to covetousness), and also the making of weapons or any utensils that might injure man.

5. Ethics, Manners, and Customs. Philo competes with Josephus in sounding the praises of the Essenes. According to these authorities their life was abstemious, simple, and unpretending. They condemned sensual desires as sinful, abstained from wedlock, but chose other people's children while they were pliable and fit for learning; they only took food and drink till they had had enough, contenting themselves with the same dish day by day, and rejecting great expense as harmful to mind and body; they did not cast away clothes and shoes until they were utterly useless, and only sought to acquire what was needed for the wants of life.

In addition to the general features of simplicity and moderation mentioned above we call attention to the following special points: (1) There was no slave among them, but all were free, mutually working for each other. (2) Swearing was forbidden as worse than perjury; "for that which does not deserve belief without an appeal to God is already condemned." (3) They forbade anointing with oil, regarding a rough exterior as praiseworthy. (4) Bathing in cold water was compulsory before each meal, after performing the functions of nature, or coming in contact with a member of a lower class of the order. (5) They considered white raiment as seemly for all occasions. (6) Great modesty was inculcated. In performing natural functions they dug with the pickax—which each member received—a hole one foot deep, covered themselves with a mantle (not to offend the brightness of God), relieved themselves into the hole, and threw in again the earth. In bathing they bound an apron about their loins; they avoided spitting forward or to the right hand. (7) They sent gifts of incense to the temple, but offered no animal sacrifices because they esteemed their own sacrifices more valuable. (8) The chief peculiarity of the Essenes was their common meals, which bore the character of sacrificial feasts. The food was prepared by priests, with the observance, probably, of certain rites of purification; for an Essene was not permitted to partake of any other food than this. The opinion that the Essenes abstained from flesh and wine is not supported by the older authorities.

6. Theology, etc. The Essenes held fundamentally the Jewish view of the world, entertaining an absolute belief in Providence, which they held in common with the Pharisees. "Next to God the name of Moses the lawgiver is with them an object of the greatest reverence, and whoever blasphemes it is punished with death." In their worship the Holy Scriptures were read and explained. The Sabbath was so strictly observed that they did not on that day remove a vessel or even perform the functions of nature; and they seem to have kept to the priesthood of the house of Aaron.

They must have highly estimated their angelology as their novices had to swear carefully to preserve the names of the angels. Concerning their doctrine of the soul and of its immortality Josephus writes: "They taught that bodies are perishable, but souls immortal, and that the latter dwell originally in the subtlest ether, but being debased by sensual pleasures united themselves with bodies as with prisons; but when they are freed from the fetters of sense they will joyfully soar on high as if delivered from long bondage. To the good (souls) is appointed a life beyond the ocean, where they are troubled by neither rain nor snow nor heat, but where the gentle zephyr is ever blowing. . . . But to the bad (souls) is appointed a dark, cold region full of unceasing torment."

A strange phenomenon presented on Jewish soil is the peculiar conduct of the Essenes with respect to the sun. To this they turned while praying, in opposition to the Jewish custom of looking toward the temple. From this and other customs it would appear that they were in real earnest in their religious estimation of the sun.

In conclusion we may observe that "Essenism is merely Pharisaism in the superlative degree." It was, however, influenced by foreign systems of theology and philosophy, of which four have been proposed, viz., Buddhism, Parseeism, Syrian heathenism, and Pythagoreanism.

The Essenes disappeared from history after the destruction of Jerusalem. Though not directly mentioned in Scripture they may be referred to in Matt. 19:11, 12; Col. 2:8, 18, 23. See Josephus, Antiquities, xviii, 1, 5; Wars, ii, 8, 2, sq.; Schurer, Jewish People, div. ii, vol. ii, 190, sq.; Edersheim, Life and Times of the Messiah, ii, 329, sq.

ESTATE. See GLOSSARY.

ESTHER, the Jewish maiden chosen to be queen by Ahasuerus.

1. Name and Family. (Persian Ἔσθη, estare.) Esther was the new and probably Persian name given on her introduction to the royal harem. Her proper Hebrew name was HADASSAH (q. v.). As to the signification of Esther, it is "Istar," the name of the great Babylonian goddess. Gesenius quotes from the second Targum on Esther: "She was called Esther from the name of the star Venus, which in Greek is Aster (i. e., ἀστήρ, Eng.

star)." Esther was the daughter of Abihail, a Benjamite and uncle of Mordecai (Esth. 2:15). Her ancestor, Kish, had been among the captives led away from Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar.

2. Personal History. Left an orphan, Esther was brought up by her cousin Mordecai, who held an office at Shushan in the palace (Esth. 2:5-7).

(1) Chosen queen. Ahasuerus having divorced his wife because she refused to comply with his drunken commands, search was made for the most beautiful maiden to be her successor. Those selected were placed in the custody of "Hegai, keeper of the women." The final choice among them remained with the king himself. That choice fell upon Esther, "for the king loved Esther above all the women, and she obtained grace and favor in his sight more than all the virgins; so that he set the royal crown upon her head, and made her queen instead of Vashti" (Esth. 2:8-17), B. C. about 478. (2) Saves her people. Esther, in obedience to Mordecai, had not made known her parentage and race (Esth. 2:10). But Haman, the Agagite, angry with Mordecai because he did not do him reverence, represented to the king that the Jews scattered through his empire were a pernicious nation. The king gave Haman full power to kill them all and seize their property (ch. 3). Upon being informed of this by Mordecai, Esther, who seemed herself to be included in the doom of extermination, resolved to plead for her people. She decided to present herself unbidden to the king, which was not according to law (4:16). She did so and, obtaining favor in his sight, made known her request. It was that the king and Haman would that day attend a banquet which she had prepared. At the banquet the king renewed his willingness to grant Esther any request she might make. She extended an invitation to both for the morrow, and promised then to reveal her wishes (ch. 5). The next day Esther pleaded for her people and denounced Haman. The laws of the empire would not allow the king to recall a decree once uttered; but the Jews were authorized to stand upon their defense and this, with the known change in the intentions of the court, averted the worst consequences of the decree. The Jews established a yearly feast in memory of their deliverance called Purim, which is observed to this day (9:20, sq.).

3. Character. "The character of Esther, as she appears in the Bible, is that of a woman of deep piety, faith, courage, patriotism, and caution, combined with resolution; a dutiful daughter to her adopted father, docile and obedient to his counsels, and anxious to share the king's favor with him for the good of the Jewish people. That she was a virtuous woman, and, as far as her situation made it possible, a good wife to the king, her continued influence over him for so long a time warrants us to infer. There must have been a singular charm in her aspect and manners since she obtained favor in the sight of all that looked upon her (Esth. 2:15)." (McC. & S., Cyc.)

NOTE.—The arguments against the genuineness of the story of Esther are: (1) The narrative implies that Vashti and Esther were the legitimate wives of "the great king" (Esth. 1:19; 2:4). The only wife of Xerxes, however, known to history was Amestris, married to him before the third year of his reign and who continued queen after his death. To this it is replied that the disgrace of Vashti may have been only temporary, and she was afterward restored to her queenship; or that Vashti and Esther were secondary wives, the latter certainly being selected from the king's harem. The title "queen" may have been used as a special honor in indicating the favor Esther had obtained with the king. (2) The king could not legally, and therefore it is supposed would not marry a wife not belonging to one of the seven great Persian families. "The marriage of Ahasuerus with a Jewess, even if we regard it as a marriage in the fullest sense, would not be more illegal or more abhorrent to Persian notions than Cambyses's marriage with his full sister. It is, therefore, just as likely to have taken place. If, on the other hand, it was a marriage of the secondary kind the law with respect to the king's wives being taken from the seven great families would not apply to it." (Rawlinson, Historical Illustrations of the Old Testament).

ETAM (Heb. עֵתָם, ay-tawm', hawk ground).

1. "Rock Etam" was the place to which Samson retired after his slaughter of the Philistines (Judg. 15:8, 11). It is a conspicuous rock, situated near a village of the same name, mentioned (1 Chron. 4:32) along with Ain Rimmon and other Simeonitish towns, and is to be sought for on the border of the Negeb and of the mountains of Judah, near Khuweilifeh.

2. A city of Judah fortified by Rehoboam (2 Chron. 11:6), probably, from its position in the list, near Bethlehem and Tekoah. The Talmudists locate here the sources of the water from which Solomon's gardens and pleasure grounds were fed; from which it has been inferred that the site was identical with that of Solomon's Pools at el-Euruk, near Bethlehem. Probably it is the same Etam mentioned in 1 Chron. 4:3.

ETERNAL. The general rendering in the A. V. of the Heb. עָדָם, o-lawm'; the Gr. αἰών, ahce-ohn', age, or αἰώνιος, ahce-o'-nee-os, perpetual, and occasionally קֶדֶם, keh'-dem, early, of yore. Both o-lawm' and ahce-ohn' are properly represented by "eternal," inasmuch as they usually refer to indefinite time, past or future.

1. O-lawm', which means to hide, strictly designates the occult time of the past, "time out of mind," or time immemorial (Psa. 25:6; Jer. 6:16; 18:15; Job 22:15; Amos 9:11, etc.). Prospectively it denotes an indefinite time to come, forever, i. e., relatively as an individual life (Exod. 21:6; Deut. 15:17; 1 Sam. 27:12, etc.); of a race (1 Sam. 2:30; 13:13; 2 Sam. 7:16, etc.); of the present constitution of the universe (Psa. 78:69; 104:5; Eccles. 1:4, etc.); or absolutely (Gen. 17:7, 8; Exod. 12:14; Jer. 51:39; Eccles. 12:5, etc.). It is also employed poetically of a "good long period" (Isa. 30:8).

2. Ahce-ohn' corresponds remarkably with the Heb. o-lawm' in nearly all of its meanings. Its derivation is from a verb meaning to breathe, blow, and denotes that which causes life. Its adjective form has for its general import enduring, lasting, with the following uses in the New Testament: forever (John 6:51, 58; 14:16; Heb. 5:6; 6:20, etc.); unto the ages, i. e., as long as the time shall be (Rom. 1:25; 9:5; 11:36); from the ages, i. e., from eternity (Col. 1:26; Eph. 3:9); before time was, i. e., before the foundation of the world (1 Cor. 2:7). In poetical and popular usages from the ages means from of old (Luke 1:70; Acts 3:21), from the most ancient times. Elsewhere of the future it is used in an unlimited sense, endless (2 Cor. 4:18; 5:1; Luke 16:9; Heb. 9:12; 13:20, etc.), especially of the happy future of the righteous, as "life everlasting" (Matt. 19:16, 29; 25:46), and often of the miserable fate of the wicked (Mark 3:29; Matt. 18:8, etc.).

ETERNAL LIFE. See LIFE.

ETERNITY, an essential attribute of God. It is the infinitude of God in relation to duration, as his omnipresence is his infinitude in relation to space. His existence is without beginning and will never end. The thought of this divine attribute is necessarily included in that of God's absolutely independent existence. The eternity of God is declared in many places in the Scriptures. See Psa. 90:2; 102:26-28; Isa. 57:15; 44:6; 1 Tim. 6:16; 2 Pet. 3:8; Rev. 1:4, et al.

ETHAM (Heb. עֵתָם, ay-thawm'), a place to the east of the present Suez Canal, on the border of the desert, where Israel made its second station after leaving Egypt (Exod. 13:20; Num. 33:6). At this point the Israelites were ordered to change their route (Exod. 14:2). See SUPPLEMENT.

ETHAN (Heb. יְתָן, ay-thawm', perpetuity).

1. One of the four persons ("Ethan the Ezrahite, and Heman, and Chalcol, and Darda") who were so renowned for their sagacity that it is mentioned to the honor of Solomon that his wisdom excelled theirs (1 Kings 4:31). Ethan is distinguished as "the Ezrahite" from the others who are called "sons of Mahol," unless the word Mahol be taken for "sons of music, dancing," etc., in which case it would apply to Ethan as well as to the others. In 1 Chron. 2:6 they are all given as "sons of Zerah." In the title to Psalm 89 an "Ethan the Ezrahite" is named as the author.

2. Son of Zimma and father of Adaiah, in the ancestry of the Levite Asaph (1 Chron. 6:42). In v. 21 he seems to be called Joah, the father of Iddo.

3. Son of Kishi, or Kushaiah, a Levite of the family of Merari. He was appointed one of the leaders of the temple music by David (as singer, 1 Chron. 6:44, or player on cymbals, chap. 15:17, 19), B. C. about 960. In the latter passages he is associated with Heman and Asaph, the heads of two other families of Levites; and, inasmuch as in other passages of these books (1 Chron. 25:1, 6) the names are given as Asaph, Heman, and Jeduthun, it has been conjectured that this last and Ethan were identical. There is at least great probability that Ethan the singer was the same person as Ethan the Ezrahite (see No. 1), whose name stands at the head of Psalm 89, for it is a very unlikely coincidence that there should be two persons named Heman and Ethan so closely connected in two different tribes and walks of life.

ETHANIM, another name for the month TISRI (q. v.). See TIME.

ETHBAAL (Heb. עֵתְבַאֵל, eth-bah'-al, with Baal), a king of Sidon, father of Jezebel, the wife of Ahab (1 Kings 16:31), B. C. before 875. According to Josephus (Ant., viii, 18, 1 and 2), Ethbaal is called Ithobalus by Menander, who also says that he was a priest of Astarte, and, having put the king, Phelus, to death, assumed the scepter of Tyre and Sidon, lived sixty-eight years, and reigned thirty-two. We see here the reason why Jezebel, the daughter of a priest of Astarte, was so zealous a promoter of idolatry. In the account of Senacherib's campaign against the Hittites he says: "The power of the weapons of Assur, my lord, overwhelmed the cities of Great Sidon, Little Sidon, . . . and they submitted unto me. Ethbaal (Tubahlu) I set on the royal throne over them, and I laid upon him annual tribute and gifts to my sovereignty, never to be discontinued" (Sayce, Higher Criticism, pp. 428, 429).

ETHER (Heb. אֶתֶר, el'-ther, abundance), one of a group of nine cities in the plain of Judah (Josh. 15:42), but eventually assigned to Simeon (19:7). Perhaps it is now represented by the ruins of Attarah (Robinson, iii, App.).

ETHIOPIA (Heb. בְּרִשׁ, koosh, country of burnt faces), lying to south of Egypt, corresponding to what is now called the Soudan, i. e., the country of the blacks. It was known to the Hebrews (Isa. 18:1; 45:14; Zeph. 3:10). The name Cush (A. V. "Ethiopia") is found in the Egyptian Keesh, evidently applied to the same territory. In one passage in the description of the garden of Eden an Asiatic Cush or Ethiopia must be intended (Gen. 2:13). In all other passages the words Ethiopia and the Ethiopians—with one possible exception, "the Arabians that were near the Ethiopians" (2 Chron. 21:16), which may refer to Arabians opposite Ethiopia—may be safely considered to mean an African country and people or peoples (Kitto). The languages of Ethiopia are as various as the tribes. In Ps. 68:31, Isa. 45:14, and probably Zeph. 3:10, the calling of Ethiopia to the service of the true God is foretold. The case of the Ethiopian eunuch (Acts 8:27-39) indicates the spread of the old dispensation influence in that country and the introduction of the new. See CANDACE, SUPPLEMENT.

ETHIOPIAN (Num. 12:1; 2 Chron. 14:9; Jer. 13:23; 38:7, 10, 12), an inhabitant of ETHIOPIA (q. v.), or Cush; used of Zerah and Ebed-melech.

ETHIOPIAN EUNUCH, chief officer of Candace, the Ethiopian queen, who was converted to Christianity through the instrumentality of Philip, the evangelist (Acts 8:27). He is described as a power-wielding eunuch, i. e., chief treasurer. In the East eunuchs were taken not only to be overseers of the harem, but also generally to fill the most important posts of the court and the closet; and the very fact is that he was actually a eunuch. Tradition calls the Ethiopian Judich and Judich, and makes him without historical proof, but not improbably, the first preacher of the Gospel among his countrymen. See CANDACE, EUNUCH.

ETHIOPIAN WOMAN. Zipporah, the wife of Moses, is so described (Num. 12:1); elsewhere called the daughter of a Midianite (Exod. 2:21; comp. v. 16). Reference is probably made here to the Arabian Ethiopia. Ewald and Keil and Delitzsch think that allusion is made to another wife whom Moses married after the death of Zipporah (q. v.).

ETH'NAN (Heb. אֶתְנַן, eth-nawn', a gift), a descendant of Judah, one of the sons of Helah, the wife of Ashur (1 Chron. 4:7).

ETH'NI (Heb. אֶתְנִי, eth-nee', munificent), the son of Zerah and father of Malchiah, a Levite of the family of Gershon (1 Chron. 6:41).

EUBULUS (Gr. Εὐβούλος, yoo'-boo'-los, good in counsel), a Christian at Rome whose greeting Paul sent to Timothy during his last imprisonment (2 Tim. 4:21), A. D. 66.

EUCHARIST (Gr. εὐχαριστία, giving of thanks), one of the names of the LORD'S SUPPER (q. v.).

EU'NICE (Gr. Εὐνίκη, yoo-nee'-kay, good victory), the mother of Timothy and the wife of a Greek (Acts 16:1; 2 Tim. 1:5), A. D. before 66. In both passages reference is made to her faith.

EUNUCH (Gr. εὐνοῦχος, yoo-noo'-khos; Heb. סָרִיס, sar-reece'). The Greek word means literally "bed keeper," i. e., one who has charge of beds and bedchambers. The original Hebrew word clearly implies the incapacity which mutilation involves. Castration, according to Josephus (Ant., lv, 8, 40), was not practiced by the Jews upon either man or animals; and the law (Deut. 23:1; comp. Lev. 22:24) is repugnant to this treatment of any Israelite. It was a barbarous custom of the East thus to treat captives (Herod., iii, 49; vi, 32), not only of tender age, but, it should seem, when past puberty. The "officer" Potiphar (Gen. 37:36; 39:1, marg. "eunuch") was an Egyptian, married, and the "captain of the guard;" and in the Assyrian monuments a eunuch often appears, sometimes armed and in a warlike capacity, or as a scribe, noting the number of heads and amount of spoil, as receiving the prisoners, and even as officiating in religious ceremonies. The origination of the practice is ascribed to Semiramis, and is no doubt as early, or nearly so, as Eastern despotism itself. The complete assimilation of the kingdom of Israel, and latterly of Judah, to the neighboring models of despotism, is traceable in the rank and prominence of eunuchs (2 Kings 8:6; 9:32; 23:11; 25:19; Isa. 56:3, 4; Jer. 29:2; 34:19; 38:7; 41:16; 52:25). They mostly appear in one of two relations, either military as "set over the men of war," greater trustworthiness possibly counterbalancing inferior courage and military vigor, or associated, as we mostly recognize them, with women and children. We find the Assyrian Rabaris, or chief eunuch (2 Kings 18:17) employed together with other high officials as ambassador. Some think that Daniel and his companions were thus treated (2 Kings 20:17, 18; Isa. 39:7; comp. Dan. 1:3, 7) (Smith, Bib. Dict.). The court of Herod had its eunuchs (Josephus, Ant., xvi, 8, 1; xv, 7, 4), as had also that of Queen Candace (Acts 8:27). We must remember that both the Hebrew and Greek terms were sometimes applied to those filling important posts, without regard to corporeal mutilation.

Figurative. The term is employed figuratively by our Lord (Matt. 19:12) with reference to the power, whether possessed as a natural disposition or acquired as a property of grace, of maintaining an attitude of indifference toward the solicitations of fleshly desires.

EUODIAS (Gr. Εὐοδία, yoo-od-ee'-ah, a good journey), a female member of the Church at Philippi, who seems to have been at variance with another female member named Syntyche (A. D. 58-60.) Paul describes them as women who had "labored much with him in the Gospel," and implores them to be of one mind (Phil. 4:2, 3).

EUPHRATES (Heb. פְּרָאֵת, per-awth', to break forth; Gr. Εὐφράτης, yoo-frat'-ace). The river rises in the mountains of Armenia Major and flows through Assyria, Syria, Mesopotamia, and the city of Babylon, from seventeen hundred to eighteen hundred miles into the Persian Gulf. It receives the water of the Tigris and other small tributaries like the Chebar. It is navigable for small vessels for twelve hundred miles from its mouth. It floods like the Nile, becoming swollen, in the months of March, April, and May, by the melting of the snows. The Euphrates carries vast amounts of sediment into the gulf, so that it is said to encroach in its deposit upon that body at the rate of a mile in seventy years. Pliny and other writers tell marvelous stories of islands, a hundred miles and more out to sea, which have become part of the mainland in this way. It was the natural boundary of empire, so that to cross the Euphrates was to cross the Rubicon. It was the western boundary of Mesopotamia, dividing it from the "Land Hatti," which included all between the Euphrates and the Mediterranean. Babylon lay upon this, as Nineveh did upon the Tigris River. It flowed by other ancient cities, as Charchemish (2 Chron. 35:20) and Sippara, Agade, Borsippa, and Ur. It served, like the Nile, to irrigate the country by means of artificial canals, making, according to Xenophon, the desert to become a garden of fertility. It is referred to under various names in Scripture (Gen. 2:14; 15:18; Deut. 1:7; 11:24; Josh. 1:4; 2 Sam. 8:3; 2 Kings 23:29; 24:7; 1 Chron. 5:9; 18:3; 2 Chron. 35:20; Jer. 13:4, sq.; 51:63). It is sometimes called the "flood."

EUROCLYDON (Gr. Εὐροκλῦδων, yoo-rok-loo'-dohn, east and wave, an east waver), the gale of wind in the Adriatic Gulf which off the south coast of Crete seized the ship in which Paul was finally wrecked on the coast of Malta (Acts 27:14). This gale is particularly described, and its circumstances admit of abundant illustration from experience of modern seamen in the Levant. As to the direction of the wind we quote: "The wind came down from the island and drove the vessel off the island; whence it is evident that it could not have been southerly. If we consider further that the wind struck the vessel when she was not far from Cape Matala (Acts 27:14), that it drove her toward Clauda (v. 16), which is an island twenty miles to the S. W. of that point, and that the sailors feared lest it should drive them into the Syrtis, on the African coast (ver. 17), an inspection of the chart will suffice to show us that the point from which the storm came must have been N. E., or rather to the E. of N. E., and thus we may safely speak of it as coming from the E. N. E." (Conybeare and Howson, Life and Epistles of St. Paul, ii, 326).

EU'TYCHUS (Gr. Εὐτυχος, yoo'-too-khos, good fortune), a young man of Troas who attended the preaching of Paul. The services were held in the third story of the house, the sermon long, lasting until midnight, and the air heated by the large company and the many lamps. Under these circumstances Eutyclus was overcome with sleep and fell from the window near which he was sitting into the court below, "and was taken up dead." Paul went down, and extending himself upon the body embraced it, like the prophets of old (1 Kings 17:21; 2 Kings 4:34). He then comforted his friends, "Trouble not yourselves; for his life is in him." Before Paul departed in the morning they brought the young man to him alive and well (Acts 20:5-12). Bloomfield (New Testament) proves that the narrative forbids us for a moment to entertain the view of those critics who suppose that animation was merely suspended.

EVANGELIST (Gr. εὐαγγελιστής, yoo-ang-gheh-is-tace', one announcing good news). In a general sense anyone who proclaims the mercy and grace of God, especially as unfolded in the Gospel; therefore preeminently to Christ, and the apostles whom he commissioned to preach the truth and establish his kingdom. It came, however, to be employed in the early Church as the designation of a special class, as in the following enumeration: "And he (Christ) gave some, apostles; and some, prophets; and some, evangelists; and some, pastors and teachers" (Eph. 4:11). This passage, accordingly, would lead us to think of them as standing between the two other groups—sent forth as missionary preachers of the Gospel by the first, and as such preparing the way for the labors of the second. The same inference would seem to follow the occurrence of the word as applied to Philip (Acts 21:8). It follows from what has been said that the calling of the evangelist is the proclamation of the glad tidings to those who have not known them, rather than the instruction and pastoral care of those who have believed and been baptized. It follows also that the name denotes a work rather than an order. The evangelist might or might not be a bishop-elder or a deacon. The apostles, so far as they evangelized (Acts 8:25; 14:7; 1 Cor. 1:17), might claim the title, though there were many evangelists who were not apostles (Smith, Bib. Dict., s. v.). In later liturgical language, the reader of the Gospel for the day: See GLOSSARY.

EVE (Heb. חַוָּה, khav-vaw', life giver), the name given by Adam to the first woman, his wife (Gen. 3:20). It is supposed that she was created on the sixth day, after Adam had reviewed the animals. The naming of the animals led to this result, that there was not found a helpmeet for man. Then God caused a deep sleep to fall upon the man, and took one of his ribs and fashioned it into a woman, and brought her unto Adam (Gen. 2:18-22). Through the subtlety of the serpent Eve was beguiled into a violation of the one commandment imposed upon her and Adam. She took of the fruit of the forbidden tree and gave to her husband. Her punishment was an increase of sorrow and pregnancy (8:16). "That the woman should bear children was the original will of God; but it was a punishment that henceforth she was to bear them in sorrow, i. e., with pains which threatened her own life as well as that of the child" (Delitzsch). Three sons of Eve are named—Cain (4:1), Abel (v. 2), and Seth (5:3)—though the fact of other children is recorded (5:4).

EVI (Heb. עִוִּי, ev-ee', desirous), one of the five kings of the Midianites slain by the Israelites in the war arising out of the idolatry of Baal-peor, induced by the suggestion of Balaam (Num. 31:8), and whose lands were afterward allotted to Reuben (Josh. 13:21), B. C. 1170.

EVIDENCE, the rendering in the A. V. of the Heb. סֵפֶר, say'fer, book (as usually rendered), or writing; hence a document of title, i. q., a deed (Jer. 32:10, 11, 12, etc.), and of the Gr. ἔλεγχος, (el-eng-khos, proof, Heb. 11:1, R. V. "proving").

EVIL is the comprehensive term under which are included all disturbances of the divinely appointed harmony of the universe. Christian doctrine, in accordance with the Scriptures, carefully distinguishes between physical and moral evil.

1. Physical Evil, or, as it is often called, natural evil, is disorder in the physical world. Such physical causes as militate against physical well-being are therefore called evils. That such evils are, to some extent at least, the effect or penalty of sin is a clear teaching of Scripture (Gen. 3:10-12, 8:16-19). To what extent physical sufferings are the necessary means to greater good is, however, a great question.

2. Moral Evil, or sin, is disorder in the moral world. It is the failure of rational and free beings to conform in character and conduct to the will of God. This is the greatest evil (see Rom. 1:18-32). How the existence of evil is compatible with the goodness of God is the question of THEODICY (q. v.). For discussion of moral evil see SIN.

EVILDOER, one who is bad; from the Heb. עָוֹן, raw-ah', to break, and so to render worthless (Psa. 37:1; 119:115; Isa. 1:4, etc.). The Greek word (κακοποιός, kak-op-oy-os') is identical with the English "Doer of evil" (1 Pet. 2:12, 14; 3:16; 4:15).

EVIL-FAVOREDNESS, the general term for such blemish, scurvy, wound, etc., as rendered an animal unfit for sacrifice (Deut. 17:1; comp. Lev. 22:22-24). See GLOSSARY.

EVIL-MERODACH (Heb. מֶרְדָּךְ אֵוִיל, ev-ee' mer-o-dak', soldier of Merodach), name of a king of Babylon mentioned twice in the Old Testament (2 Kings 25:27, and Jer. 52:31). The name, in the Babylonian language, is written Amel-Marduk; i. e., man (or servant) of the god Marduk, or Merodach. Evil-merodach was the son and successor of Nebuchadnezzar and reigned 561-559 B. C. Of his reign we have but meager details. According to Berosus and the canon of Ptolemy he was slain by his sister's husband, Neriglissar, who then made himself king in his stead. Josephus, in this probably following Berosus, makes him odious because of debauchery and cruelty. The Old Testament narrates a kindly and high-spirited act of his doing. In the first year of his reign he released from prison Jehoiachin, king of Judah, who had been thirty-seven years in confinement, "spake kindly unto him," and gave him a portion of his table for the rest of his life, honoring him above the other vassal kings who were at Babylon. No historical inscriptions of his have come down to us, but recently a few business tablets dated in his reign have been found.—R. W. R.

EWES, the rendering in the A. V. of several Hebrew words for the female sheep. See ANIMAL KINGDOM.

EXACTOR (Heb. גִּבַּשׁ, naw-gas', to drive, tax, tyrannize, Isa. 60:17), a word used to signify a driver (taskmaster, Exod. 3:7; Job 3:18; Isa. 9:3), or simply a driver of animals (Job 39:7); hence, exactor of debt (or tribute, Dan. 11:20; Zech. 9:8); hence, with oriental ideas of tyranny, a ruler (Isa. 3:12; 14:2; Zech. 10:4). In the passage, Isa. 60:17, it seems to mean magistracy, and we may read "righteousness shall be a substitute for the police force in every form" (Delitzsch, Com.).

EXACTRESS. See GLOSSARY.

EXAMPLE. 1. The rendering in the A. V. of several Greek words: (1) In Matt. 1:19, paradigmatid'zo (παράδειγματιζω, to show alongside the public), is to expose to infamy; (2) Digh-mah (δείγμα, Jude 7) and hoop-od'igye-mah (ὑπόδειγμα, John 13:15; Heb. 4:11; 8:5; 9:23; James 5:10; 2 Pet. 2:6) mean a specimen, an exhibit, with the idea of imitation; (3) Hoop-og-ram-mos' (ὑπογραμμός, an underwriting, 1 Pet. 2:21) is a copy for imitation; (4) Too-pos (τύπος, scar, 1 Cor. 10:16) is something struck, and so a die, resemblance.

2. In a moral sense example is either taken for a type, instance, or precedent for our admonition, or for a pattern for our imitation. Good examples have a peculiar power above mere precepts to dispose us to the practice of virtue and holiness, in that: (1) They most clearly express to us the nature of our duties in their subjects and sensible effects; (2) Precepts instruct us in what things our duties are, but examples assure us of their possibility; (3) Examples, as incentives, urge us to imitation.

3. Jesus Christ our Lord gave a divine-human and perfect example—the only legislator who ever did or ever could make his own life his code of laws. The obligation we are under to imitate this example arises from duty, relationship, engagement, interest, and gratitude. "Yet his was not in all respects a perfect example. His divine-human excellence is in some sense too high—we cannot attain unto it. Therefore neither does the Lord, nor do his apostles after him, exhibit his life as at all points the directory of ours. In some details of duty he could not set us a pattern; for them we must go to men subject to like passions as we are. He became the author of eternal salvation, not to those who copy him in the process—he never passed through the process—but to all them that obey him. He gives the ideal and the sum of the blessed result; the way to it we know, and he is himself the way, but we do not see the print of his footsteps on the path from the far country back again to holiness. Whenever his example is spoken of it is in affecting connection with humility, patience, self-sacrifice for others, and utter abandonment of the world. But he did not reach those heavenly affections as we must reach them. They were his divine condescension brought down from above and translated into human forms; in us they are the hard-won triumphs of his Spirit overcoming their opposites. Hence, to sum up, the principle of our duty is his obedience in love, the strength of our virtue is his Spirit, and the summum bonum of our blessedness is his peace. In him we see the whole law reflected in its highest purity; by his character we interpret it, and all our obedience is the silent imitation of himself. His excellence is divine and human, to be adored and imitated. As God he commands, and as man shows us how to obey. The lawgiver gives us both the pattern and the strength to copy" (Pope, Christ. Theol., iii, 156).

EXCEED, EXCELLENCE. See GLOSSARY.

EXCHANGER (Gr. τραπέζιτης, trap-ed-zee'-tace, Matt. 25:27), a broker or banker, i. e., one who exchanges money for a fee, and loans out to others for a rate of interest. See GLOSSARY.

EXCOMMUNICATION, "a cutting off, deprivation of communion, or the privileges of intercourse; specifically, the formal exclusion of a person from religious communion and privileges" (Cent. Dict., s. v.).

1. Jewish. Many scholars have, after the example of Elias Levita in his Tishbi, distinguished three different kinds of excommunication: נדר, nid-doo'-i; חרים, khay'-rem; and שמיטה, sham-math-thaw'. But the first and third are used synonymously in the Talmud, and only the distinction between two kinds has been handed down: the temporary exclusion (נדר) and the permanent ban (חרים), "THE ANATHEMA" (q. v.). The former of these (נדר), the ban of the synagogue, was among the later Jews, the excommunication or exclusion of a Jew, usually for heresy or alleged blasphemy, from the synagogue and the congregation, or from familiar intercourse with the Jews. This was a modification of the anathema, and owes its origin to Ezra 10:8, where we find that the Cherem (anathema) excluded the man from the congregation and anathematized his goods and chattels, but did not consist in putting him to death. This ecclesiastical ban was pronounced for twenty-four different offenses, all of which Maimonides picked out from the Talmud. In the event of the offender showing signs of penitence it might be revoked. The excommunicated person was prohibited the use of bath, razor, and the convivial table, and no one was allowed to approach him within four cubits' distance. The term of punishment was thirty days, and it was extended to a second and third thirty days, if necessary. If still contumacious the offender was subjected to the second and severer excommunication, the Cherem.

In the New Testament Jewish excommunication is brought before us in the case of the blind man (John 9:22), being exclusion from the synagogue, i. e., the nid-doo'-i. Some think that our Lord (in Luke 6:22) referred specially to three forms of Jewish excommunication.

2. Christian. Excommunication in the Christian Church is not merely founded on the natural rights possessed by all societies nor in imitation of the Jews. It was instituted by our Lord (Matt. 18:15-18), and consisted in the breaking off of all further Christian, brotherly fellowship with one who is hopelessly obdurate. We find the apostle Paul claiming the right to exercise discipline over his converts (2 Cor. 1:23; 13:10), and that formal excommunication on the part of the Church was practiced and commanded by him (1 Cor. 5:11; 1 Tim. 1:20; Tit. 3:10). The formula of delivering or handing over to Satan (1 Cor. 5:5; 1 Tim. 1:20) admits of difference of interpretation. Some interpret it as being merely a symbol for excommunication, which involves "exclusion from all Christian fellowship, and consequently banishment to the society of those among whom Satan dwelt, and from which the offender had publicly severed himself" (Dr. David Brown in Schaff's Popular Com., iii, p. 180). Dr. Alfred Plummer (Pastoral Epistles, p. 74, sq.) says that "this handing over to Satan was an apostolic act—a supernatural infliction of bodily infirmity, or disease, or death, as a penalty for grievous sin. It is scarcely doubtful that St. Paul delivered Hymenæus and Alexander to Satan, in order that Satan might have power to afflict their bodies, with a view to their spiritual amelioration."

3. Nature of Excommunication. We thus find excommunication consisted (1) in separation from the communion of the church; (2) having as its object the good of the sufferer (1 Cor. 5:5) and protection of sound members (2 Tim. 3:17); (3) that it was wielded by the highest ecclesiastical officer (1 Cor. 5:3; Tit. 3:10), promulgated by the congregation to which the offender belonged (1 Cor. 5:4), and in spite of any opposition on the part of a minority (2 Cor. 2:6); (4) that it was for an indefinite duration or for a period; (5) that its duration might be abridged at the discretion and by the indulgence of the person imposing the penalty (v. 8); (6) that penitence was the condition of restoration (v. 7); (7) that the sentence was publicly reversed (v. 10) as it was publicly promulgated (v. 10).

EXECUTION. See PUNISHMENTS.

EXECUTIONER. The Hebrew word describes, in the first instance, the office of executioner, and, secondarily, the general duties of the bodyguard of a monarch. Thus Potiphar was "captain of the executioners" (Gen. 37:36; margin). That the "captain of the guard" himself occasionally performed the duty of an executioner appears from 1 Kings 2:25, 34. Nevertheless the post was one of high dignity. The Gr. σπεκουλάτωρ, spek-oo-lat'-ore (Mark 6:27), is borrowed from the Lat. speculator; originally a military spy or scout, but under the emperors transferred to the bodyguard.

EXERCISE, BODILY (Gr. σωματική γυμνασία, so-mat-ee-kay' goom-nas-ee'-ah), exercise or training of the body, i. e., gymnastics (1 Tim. 4:8). The apostle appears to disparage, not the athletic discipline, but rather that ascetic mortification of the fleshly appetites and even innocent affections (comp. 1 Tim. 4:3; Col. 2:23) characteristic of some Jewish fanatics, especially the ESSENES (q. v.).

EXHORTATION (Gr. παράκλησις, par-ak'-lay-sis, literally a calling near, invitation) appears to have been recognized in the apostolic Church as a special supernatural or prophetic function (Rom. 12:8), probably a subordinate exercise of the general faculty of teaching (1 Cor. 14:3). It has been defined as "the act of presenting such motives before a person as may excite him to the performance of duty." The Scriptures enjoin ministers to exhort men, i. e., to rouse them to duty by proposing suitable motives (Isa. 58:1; Rom. 12:8; 1 Tim. 6:2; Heb. 3:13); and it was also the constant practice of prophets (Isa. 1:17; Jer. 4:14; Ezek. 37), apostles (Acts 11:23), and of Christ himself (Luke 3:18) (McC. and S., Cyc., s. v.).

EXILE (Heb. אָזַל, gaw-law', to denude, 2 Sam. 15:19; אָזַל, tsaw-aw', to tip over in order to spill, figuratively to depopulate, Isa. 51:14), a transported captive. See CAPTIVITY.

EXODUS, THE, the great deliverance extended to the Israelites when "the Lord did bring the children of Israel out of the land of Egypt" (Exod. 12:51), "with a mighty hand and with an outstretched arm" (Deut. 26:8).

1. Preparatory History. The Scripture narrative of the Exodus begins with the death of Joseph, the rapid multiplication of the Israelites, and the coming to the throne of "a new king which knew not Joseph" (Exod. 1:6-8). Brugsch Bey finds in a papyrus the report of a high official of the passage of some Edomites (Bedouin) "into the land of Thuku (Succoth) to feed themselves and their herds on the possessions of Pharaoh. This sort of immigration alarmed Pharaoh," lest they (the Israelites) "join also unto our enemies, and so fight against us" (Exod. 1:10). He therefore placed them under taskmasters "to afflict them with their burdens. And they built treasure cities, Pithom and Raames" (v. 11). These cities have been shown, the one by name, the other from inscriptions, to have been founded by Rameses II, the Pharaoh of the oppression.

The story continues with an account of the still more rapid increase of the Israelites; the destruction of the male children; the birth, education, and flight of Moses; his call to act as deliverer; the plagues and resistance of the Pharaoh of the Exodus (probably Menepthah). At last the time of their departure is very near, and they are told to ask gifts of their neighbors to aid them in their extreme poverty (Exod. 11:1-3; 12:35, 36). The PASSOVER (q. v.) was instituted; the firstborn of Egypt were slain, and, overcome by the calamities sent upon him, Pharaoh yielded to all that was demanded of him, and urged the Israelites to depart, as did also the Egyptians, "for they said, We be all dead men."

2. Departure. Thus driven out, the Israelites, to the number of six hundred thousand men, and families took their departure, attended by a mixed multitude, and flocks and herds, even very much cattle. Being "thrust out," they had no time to prepare suitable provisions, and therefore baked unleavened bread, which they brought out of Egypt (Exod. 12:1-39). The time of the Exodus was the 15th of Abib, which was to be to them henceforth the beginning of the year. The date of the Exodus as fixed by Usher (B. C. 1490) is wrong by nearly if not quite three centuries. From 1520 to 1210 Palestine was practically a province of Egypt, and such an event as its occupation by Israel was out of the question. The Exodus must therefore have taken place about the end of the 13th or the beginning of the 14th century, probably about 1210 (see CHRONOLOGY).

3. Route. We are informed that God led the people, "not through the way of the land of the Philistines, lest the people repent when they see war" (Exod. 13:17). The Philistines would, in all probability, have opposed the entrance of the Israelites into Canaan. "But God led the people about, through the way of the wilderness of the Red Sea" (v. 18).

Leaving Rameses (Num. 33:5) in Goshen they encamped at Succoth, after a march of twelve or fifteen miles (Exod. 12:37). This is identified by Brugsch as Thuku, or Thuket, southeast of Rameses. From Succoth they journeyed to "Etham, in the edge of the wilderness" (Exod. 13:20), probably at or near the southern end of the Bitter Lakes. They were now near the fortress of Zar, which protected Egypt from incursions from the desert. The next stage of the journey is minutely described. God commanded Israel to "turn and encamp before Pi-hahiroth, between Migdol and the sea over against Baal-zephon: before it ye shall encamp by the sea" (14:2). The reason assigned for this movement is that "Pharaoh will say of the children of Israel, They are entangled in the land, the wilderness has shut them in" (v. 3); i. e., "When they looked out upon the desert which lay beyond the fertile fields of Egypt their hearts failed them, and they turned back" (Sayce, Higher Crit. and Monuments, p. 253); or "They have lost their way, they are wandering in confusion, the desert has shut them in; and in his obduracy Pharaoh would resolve to go after them with his army, and bring them under his sway again" (K. and D., Com., in loc.).

Much depends now upon the location of Pi-hahiroth. Harper (Bible and Modern Discoveries, p. 84) locates it upon the shore of Lake Timsah, near the present Ismailia, and Baal-zephon upon Mount Muksheih. He says "that Egyptian records show how at that time the sea extended to that place," and that "the sea had retreated owing to the elevation of the land." This would make Lake Timsah the place of crossing. Mr. Sayce (p. 260) says: "This theory would remove a great many difficulties, but there is one argument against it so serious as to prevent its acceptance. A canal already existed in the reign of Menepthah which united the Gulf of Suez with the Nile, not far from the modern Zagazig, and allowed ships to pass from the Mediterranean to the Red Sea. This canal, after being choked with sand, was reopened by Darius, who caused steles of granite to be erected at intervals along its banks, recording the construction of the work. One of the steles stood about five miles only to the north of Suez, where the fragments of it can still be seen. The canal, therefore, must have followed the line of the present Freshwater Canal, not only as far as the Bitter Lakes, but also as far as Suez. It is therefore evident that the canal of Darius and the Pharaohs did not join the sea until it reached the modern town of Suez; in other words, the distribution of land and water in the time of the nineteenth dynasty must have been the same as it is to-day."

"If we locate Pi-hahiroth a little to the northwest of Suez (Ajrud), about four hours' journey, then we have a plain nearly ten miles long and about as many broad stretching from Ajrud to the sea to the west of Suez, and from the foot of Atâkah to the arm of the sea on the north of Suez" (K. and D., Com.). Dr. J. Strong (Cyc., s. v.) places Pi-hahiroth at the southeast of Mount Atâkah, upon which he locates Migdol, while Baal-zephon he thinks to be on Mount Deraj, to the south of Atâkah. The march of the Israelites would then be by a detour of Mount Atâkah, and through Wâdy Tuwârik (Pi-hahiroth). The pass which leads to Suez between Atâkah and the sea is very narrow and could easily be stopped by the Egyptians. In this plain (of Baideah) Pharaoh had the Israelites hemmed in on all sides. This, then, according to all appearance, is the spot where the passage to the sea was effected.

4. Passage of the Sea. Pharaoh thought that, hemmed in by the sea, the Israelites would be at his mercy, and with his chariot guard—six hundred chosen chariots—pursued after them, overtaking them encamped by the sea. Alarmed at the appearance of the Egyptians, the Israelites murmured at Moses, saying: "It had been better for us to have served the Egyptians than that we should die in the wilderness." Moses encouraged the frightened multitude, and gave them the command from Jehovah that they "go forward." Then, also, Moses received word of the miracle by which the Lord was to deliver his people, viz., the dividing of the waters. Here a very extraordinary event occurs: "The angel of God, which went before the camp of Israel, removed and went behind them," and the pillar of cloud was now in the rear, showing its bright face to them but darkness to the Egyptians. The time had come for Jehovah to work the decisive miracle for Israel's deliverance. "Moses stretched out his hand over the sea; and the Lord caused the sea to go back by a strong east wind all that night, and made the sea dry land," upon which the children of Israel passed over. It was during the night that the Israelites crossed, and the Egyptians followed. "In the morning watch the Lord looked unto the host of the Egyptians through the pillar of fire and of the cloud, and troubled the host of the Egyptians." They turned to flee, but the returning waters overwhelmed them, and all of them perished." Thus the Lord saved Israel that day out of the hand of the Egyptians: and Israel saw the Egyptians dead upon the seashore" (Exod. 14).

5. From the Red Sea to Sinai. Having reached the eastern shore, perhaps a little to the north of the Springs of Moses ('Ayân Musa), there Miriam and the other women sang their triumphal song (Exod. 15:1-21). (1) Taking up their march, they traveled three days without finding water, and came to Marah, the water of which was bitter. The people murmured, and in response to the prayer of Moses God showed him a tree which, cast into the waters, made them sweet (Exod. 15: 23-25). (2) Elim was the next place of encampment, where were twelve wells of water (R. V. "springs," 15:27), generally admitted to be Wâdy Gharandel, and lying about half a day's journey southeast from Marah. A short march, but in the East such movements are largely regulated by the water supply. (3) Leaving Elim they encamped at the Red Sea (Num. 33:10) before coming to the desert of Sin. Their route to the sea was, probably, by way of the plain of El-Gargah, the Wâdy Useit, and down Wâdy Taiyibeh. Some critics, wishing to throw doubts upon the Bible narrative, sneer at the ignorance of Moses in taking this route. "But why did Moses take the lower route? For the best of all reasons. The main route (which the Bible shows he did not take) leads to Wâdy Nasb, Serabit-el-Khâdim, and Maghara. What if he did? Why, there were the well-known mines, colonized and worked by Egyptians, held by garrisons of soldiers, with strong positions and passes! And so Moses, 'skilled in all the learning of the Egyptians,' evades this mining country—turns the flank of it, so to speak—and, leading the host to the Red Sea, puts a mountain barrier between the coward host and the Egyptian garrisons and miners!" (Harper, p. 98). (4) The Israelites removed from the Red Sea and encamped next in the Wilderness of Sin, on the 15th of the second month after their departure from Egypt (Exod. 16:1). Sin is identified as the plain El-Markhâ, about sixteen miles long and four to five miles broad. Here they met with scanty supplies; but bread and flesh were both miraculously supplied, the former by manna (q. v.) and the latter by quails (Exod. 16:13-15). (5) Dophkah and Atush are the next camps mentioned, of which there is no satisfactory identification. (6) Turning inland they came to Rephidim, probably the Wâdy Fierân. Here they found no water, and the people murmured against Moses for having brought them out of Egypt to perish with thirst in the wilderness. Moses was directed to smite with his rod the rock in Horeb, and water would come out. The elders were to be eyewitnesses of the miracle that they might bear their testimony to it before the unbelieving people. From this behavior of the unbelieving nation the place received the names Masrah ("temptation") and Meribah ("murmuring"). (7) In the third month after their departure from Egypt the Israelites, proceeding from Rephidim, arrived at Sinai (Exod. 19:1, 2). Their most probable route appears to have been by way of Wâdy Feirân and Wâdy Sheikl. The various encampments of Israel from their leaving Egypt until they reached Canaan are given in Exod. 12:37; ch. 19; Num. 10:21, 33; Deut. 1:2. See WILDERNESS; also SUPPLEMENT.

EXPECT. See GLOSSARY.

EXPEDIENCY, EXPEDIENT (Gr. συμ-πέριω, soom-fer'-o, to advantage), "the principle of doing what is deemed most practicable or serviceable under the circumstances." A rule of expediency often referred to is that laid down by St. Paul: "Wherefore, if meat make my brother to offend, I will eat no flesh while the world standeth, lest I make my brother to offend" (1 Cor. 8:13). The occasion of this declaration was his writing to the Corinthians respecting the Christian's attitude toward flesh offered up to idols (q. v.). This would give offense to some scrupulous consciences, while others, like St. Paul, might make light of the matter, so far as personal feeling was concerned. "It is impossible to state more strongly than does the apostle the obligation to refrain from indulging in things indifferent when the use of them is an occasion of sin to others. Yet it is never to be forgotten that this, by its very nature, is a principle the application of which must be left to every man's conscience in the sight of God. No rule of conduct founded on expediency can be enforced by church discipline. It was right in Paul to refuse to eat flesh for fear of causing others to offend, but he could not justly be subjected to censure had he seen fit to eat. The same principle is illustrated in reference to circumcision. The apostle utterly refused to circumcise Titus, and yet he circumcised Timothy, in both cases acting wisely and conscientiously. Whenever a thing is right or wrong, according to circumstances, every man must have the right to judge of those circumstances. Otherwise he is judge of another man's conscience, a new rule of duty is introduced, and the catalogue of adiaphora (i. e., things indifferent or nonessential), which has existed in every system of ethics from the beginning, is simply abolished" (T. W. Chambers, D.D., in Meyer's Com. on 1 Cor. 8).

EXPERIENCE (Heb. נִסְיוֹן, naw-khash', to observe diligently, Gen. 30:27; רָאָה, rav-aw', to see, Eccles. 1:16; δοκιμή, dok-ee-may', proof, testing, Rom. 5:4; 2 Cor. 9:13. R. V. changes experience to probation in its only place in New Testament, Rom. 5:4; an experiment, in 2 Cor. 9:13, to proving). We speak of our knowledge of sins forgiven and the favor of God enjoyed as our Christian experience. It means the practical trial of an acquaintance with the work of God in man which results in the consciousness of salvation. Thus experience is the personal trial of anything and the consequent knowledge of it.

EXPIATION, in the theological sense, denotes the end accomplished by certain divinely appointed sacrifices in respect to freeing the sinner from the punishment of his sins. The sacrifices recognized as expiatory are the sin offerings of the Old Testament dispensation (see OFFERINGS; SACRIFICE), and, preeminently, the offering which Christ made of himself for the sins of the world (see ATONEMENT).

The above definition is made somewhat general for the purpose of including both of the theories which accept expiation in any real sense.

1. The Calvinistic or Satisfaction theory teaches that the sacrifice of Christ was expiatory in the sense that Christ suffered vicariously the punishment of the sins of the elect. The expiation thus is absolute in behalf of the limited number for whom it is made. For the non-elect, or reprobate, there is no expiation. See ELECTION.

2. The Arminian theory of expiation holds that the sacrificial sufferings of Christ were not of the nature of punishment, but were a divinely appointed, though conditional, substitute for the punishment of the sins of all mankind. The sacrifice of Christ is expiatory in the sense that all who truly repent of their sins and believe on Christ have, on account of that sacrifice, their guilt canceled, the punishment of their sins remitted.

The two theories are alike in regarding Christ's sacrifice as the objective ground of forgiveness.

3. The third prominent theory of the atonement, the moral influence theory, admits of no necessity for sacrificial expiation and denies the expiatory character of sacrifices.

4. Thus two principal questions exist: First, as to the fact of expiation by sacrifice, and, second, as to the sense in which the sacrifices are to be regarded as expiatory.

With regard to the first of these questions it should be noted:

(1) The idea of expiation, or of seeking reconciliation with Deity, through sacrifices is a common feature of most if not all forms of religion. It is a fair supposition that, despite all the false conceptions held in connection with the idea, some measure of important truth lies at the bottom.

(2) Among the sacrifices appointed of God under the Old Testament dispensation there were sacrifices the purpose of which was clearly expiatory. Not only the simple and most natural understanding of such sacrifices, but also the divine teaching concerning them, was that they stood in important relation to the forgiveness of sins (see Lev. 17:11). Preeminent among these were the sacrifices on the great annual day of atonement. See SACRIFICES; OFFERINGS; ATONEMENT, DAY OF.

It is not, however, to be understood that the blood of beasts of itself had expiatory value and effect, or that the offerings in a mechanical or commercial way wrought reconciliation (see Psa. 50; Isa. 1; Amos 5:22). It was only because of divine grace that these sacrifices availed for reconciliation. The sacrifices were not only appointed of God, but were also provided by him (Lev. 17:11; Psa. 50:10).

(3) In the New Testament dispensation, of which the Old was predictive and for which it was preparatory, the sacrifice which Christ offered of himself is conspicuously set before us as the ground of the forgiveness of sins. Christ is "the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world." He is the "Lamb slain from the foundation of the world." It was Christ's own declaration that his blood was shed "for the remission of sins." See also John 3:14, 15; Col. 1:14, 20; Heb. 9:13, 14; Heb. 10:1-12, and many other passages.

As to the second question, in what sense are the sacrifices to be regarded as expiatory? it is chiefly to be borne in mind:

(4) That in the very nature of things punishment is not transferable—only the guilty can be punished. The innocent may suffer in behalf of the guilty. There may then be vicarious sacrifice, or substitute for punishment. But there can be no vicarious punishment.

(5) With this conception of sacrificial expiation the teachings of Scripture correspond. In the Old Testament the effect of sacrifice in obtaining forgiveness was not absolute, but conditional upon the state of the sinner's heart. "The sacrifices of God are a broken spirit" (Psa. 51:16, 19). The sacrifices of blood are acceptable and efficacious only when the one who offers them penitently and believingly turns toward God.

This would not be the case if the penalty of sin were actually borne by the object sacrificed. But such is the case when the yielding up of life in sacrifice is the divinely appointed but conditional substitute for punishment. In the New Testament Christ is never represented as being punished instead of sinners. But he is frequently represented as suffering death in their stead, yet in such a sense as that the expiation wrought by his death avails for them only upon condition of true repentance and faith. This is the whole trend of New Testament doctrine, as well as the explicit teaching of many passages.

As to the necessity of expiation, whence it arises, see ATONEMENT.

EXPRESS. See GLOSSARY.

EYE (Heb. עַיִן, ah'-yin; Gr. ὄφθαλμός, of-thal-mos) is used as the symbol of a large number of objects and ideas, as: (1) A fountain frequently; (2) Color (Num. 11:7, in the Hebrew; see margin); (3) The face or surface (Exod. 10:5, 15; Num. 22:5, 11, as "the face, i. e., eye of the land"); the expression "between the eyes" means the forehead (Exod. 13:9, 16); (4) In Cant. 4:9 "eye" seems to be used poetically for look; (5) "Eye" (Prov. 23:31, A. V. "color") is applied to the beads or bubbles of wine when poured out; (6) "Before the eyes" (Gen. 23:11, 18; Exod. 4:30) means in one's presence; "in the eyes" (Gen. 19:8) of any one means according to his judgment or opinion; "to set the eyes" (Gen. 44:21; Job 24:23; Jer. 39:12) upon anyone is to regard with favor, but may also be used in a bad sense (Amos 9:8); (7) Many of the passions, such as envy, pride, pity, etc., being expressed by the eye, such phrases as the following occur: "Evil eye" (Matt. 20:15, i. e., envious); "bountiful eye" (Prov. 22:9); "wanton eyes" (Isa. 3:16); "eyes full of adultery" (2 Pet. 2:14); "the lust of the eyes" (1 John 2:16); "the desire of the eyes" (Ezek. 24:16) denotes whatever is a great delight; (8) "To keep as the apple (pupil) of the eye" (Deut. 32:10; Zech. 2:8) is to preserve with special care; "as the eyes of servants look unto the hand of their master" (Psa. 123:2) is an expression which seems to indicate that masters, especially in the presence of strangers, communicated with their servants by certain motions of their hands.

EYES, BLINDING OF. See PUNISHMENTS.

EYES, COVERING OF THE (Gen. 20:16),

a phrase of much disputed significance, understood by some to mean that Abimelech advised Sarah and her women, while in or near towns, to conform to the general custom of wearing veils (q. v.). Another view is the following: "By the 'covering of the eyes' we are not to understand a veil, which Sarah was to procure for a thousand shekels, but it is a figurative expression for an atoning gift, . . . so that he may forget a wrong done, and explained by the analogy of the phrase he covereth the faces of the judges, i. e., he bribes them (Job 9:24)" (K. and D., Com., in loc.).

EYES, PAINTING THE, or rather the eyelids, is an ancient original practice which was known to the Hebrews, and is occasionally mentioned in Scripture. Jezebel is spoken of as "painting her eyes" (A. V. "face") before presenting herself in public (2 Kings 9:30); and the painting of the eyes is mentioned among the other things by which women thought to win admiration (Jer. 4:30, A. V. "renting the face;" Ezek. 23:40). "The paint prepared from antimony ore, when pounded, yields a black powder with a me-talic brilliancy; it was laid upon the eyebrows and eyelashes either in a dry state as a black powder, or moistened generally with oil and made into an ointment, which is applied with a fine smooth eye pencil of the thickness of an ordinary goose quill, made either of wood, metal, or ivory. The way to use it was to hold the central portion of the pencil horizontally between the eyelids, and then draw it out between them, twisting it around all the while, so that the edges of the eyelids were blackened all round; and the object was to heighten the splendor of the southern eye and give it, so to speak, a more deeply glowing fire, and to impart a youthful appearance to the whole of the eyelashes even in extreme old age. Rosellini found jars with eye paint of this kind in the early Egyptian graves" (K. and D., Com., 2 Kings 9:30).

EYESALVE (Gr. κολλήριον, kol-loo'-ree-on, diminutive of κολλῦρα, kol-loo'-ra, coarse bread of cylindrical shape), a preparation shaped like a kolloora, composed of various materials and used as a remedy for tender eyelids (Rev. 3:18).

E'ZAR, a less correct mode of Anglicizing (1 Chron. 1:38) the name EZER (q. v.).

EZ'BAI (Heb. עֲבַי, ez-bah'ee, hysoplike), the father of Naarai, one of David's mighty men (1 Chron. 11:37), B. C. after 1000.

EZ'BON (Heb. עֲבֹן, ets-bone', uncertain derivation).

1. The fourth son of the patriarch Gad (Gen. 46:16), called also (Num. 26:16) Ozni.

2. The first named of the sons of Bela, the son of Benjamin (1 Chron. 7:7).

EZEKI'AS, a Grecized form (Matt. 1:9, 10) of the name of King HEZEKIAH (q. v.).

EZE'KIEL, one of the four greater prophets.

1. Name and Family. (Heb. עֶזְקִיָּאל, yekh-ek-kale', God will strengthen). The son of a priest named Buzi.

2. Personal History. Ezekiel was taken captive in the captivity of Jehoiachin, eleven years before the destruction of Jerusalem (2 Kings 24:12-15). He was a member of a community of Jewish exiles who settled on the banks of the Chebar, a "river" or stream of Babylonia. It was by this river, "in the land of the Chaldeans," that God's message first reached him (Ezek. 1:3). His call took place "in the fifth year of King Jehoiachin's captivity (1:2, B. C. 592), in the thirtieth year, in the fourth month." It now seems generally agreed that it was the thirtieth year from the new era of Nabopolassar, father of NEBUCHADNEZZAR (q. v.). We learn from an incidental allusion (24:18)—the only reference which he makes to his personal history—that he was married and had a house (8:1) in his place of exile, and lost his wife by a sudden and unforeseen stroke. He lived in the highest consideration among his companions in exile, and their elders consulted him on all occasions (8:1; 11:25; 14:1; 20:1, etc.). The last date he mentions is the twenty-seventh year of the captivity (29:17), so that his mission extended over twenty-two years. He is said to have been murdered in Babylon by some Jewish prince whom he had convicted of idolatry, and to have been buried in the tomb of Shem and Arphaxad, on the banks of the Euphrates.

3. Character. He is distinguished by his firm and inflexible energy of will and character, and we also observe a devoted adherence to the rites and ceremonies of his national religion. Ezekiel is no cosmopolite, but displays everywhere the peculiar tendencies of a Hebrew educated under Levitical training. We may also note in Ezekiel the absorbed recognition of his high calling, which enabled him cheerfully to endure any privation or misery, if thereby he could give any warning or lesson to his people (ch. 4; 24:15, 16, etc.), whom he so ardently loved (9:8; 11:13).

EZE'KIEL, BOOK OF. See BIBLE, BOOKS OF.

E'ZEL (Heb. עֶזֶל, eh'-zel, separation; see 1 Sam. 20:19), the memorial stones, or place of the meeting and parting of David and Jonathan. The margin of the A. V. has "that showed the way;" the margin of the R. V. has "this mound."

E'ZEM (1 Chron. 4:29). See AZEM.

E'ZER (Heb. עֶזֶר, ay'-zer or עֶזְרָא, eh'-zer, help).

1. The father of Hushab, one of the posterity of Hur, of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 4:4).

2. A son (or descendant) of Ephraim, who, with Elead, was slain by the aboriginal inhabitants of Gath "because they came down to take away their cattle" (1 Chron. 7:21).

3. The first named of the Gadite champions who went to David at Ziklag (1 Chron. 12:9), B. C. after 1000.

4. The son of Jeshua, the ruler of Mizpah, who repaired part of the city walls near the armory (Neh. 3:19), B. C. 445.

5. One of the priests who assisted in the dedication of the walls of Jerusalem under Nehemiah (Neh. 12:42), B. C. 445.

6. (Heb. עֶזְרָא, ay'-tser, treasure.) One of the sons of Seir, and native princes of Mount Hor (Gen. 36:21, 27, 30; 1 Chron. 1:42, 38), in which last verse the name is Anglicized "Ezar."

E'ZION-GA'BER or E'ZION-GE'BER

(Heb. עֶזְרָא, ets-yone' gheh'-ber, giant's backbone), a port on the coast of the gulf of Akabah, which Solomon used once for a navy station (1 Kings 9:26). It is mentioned as the last station of Israel before coming to the Wilderness of Sin (Num. 33:35; Deut. 2:8). Once a large and populous town (2 Kings 16:6). The peculiar headland jutting out into the sea here gives to it its name. Called Ezion-Gaber (Num. 33:35, 36; Deut. 2:8; 2 Chron. 20:36).

EZ'NITE (Heb. עֶזְנִי, ay'-tsen, sharp, spear), apparently the patronymic of ADINO (q. v.) given (2 Sam. 23:8) as chief among David's captains. Concerning this doubtful rendering Luther expresses the following opinion: "We believe the text to have been corrupted by a writer, probably from some book in an unknown character and bad writing, so that over should be substituted for adino, and ha-zenib for eth hanitho;" that is to say, the reading in the Chronicles (1 Chron. 11:11), "he swung his spear," should be adopted (K. and D., Com.).

EZ'RA (Heb. עֶזְרָא, ez-raw', help). 1. The priest who led the second expedition of Jews back from Babylonian exile into Palestine, and the author of the book bearing his name (see the last four chapters, in which he speaks in the first person).

Family. Ezra was a lineal descendant of Phineas, the grandson of Aaron (Ezra 7:1-5), being a son of Seraiah, who was the grandson of Hilkiah, high priest in the reign of Josiah. He is described as "a ready scribe in the law of Moses" (v. 6); "a scribe of the words of the commandments of the Lord, and of the statutes of Israel" (v. 11); "Ezra the priest, a scribe of the law of the God of heaven" (v. 12).

History. (1) Appointed leader. Ezra's priestly extraction acted as a powerful lever for directing his vigorous efforts specifically to the promotion of religion and learning among his people. It is recorded (Ezra 7:10) that Ezra "had prepared his heart to seek the law of the Lord, and to do it, and to teach in Israel statutes and judgments." Living in Babylon he gained the favor of King Artaxerxes, and obtained from him a commission to go up to Jerusalem (B. C. about 459). The king's commission invited all the Israelites, priests, and Levites in the whole empire, who so wished, to accompany Ezra. Of these a list amounting to one thousand seven hundred and fifty-four is given (ch. 8); and these, doubtless, form part of the full list of the returned captives contained in Nehemiah (ch. 7), and in duplicate (Ezra 2). Ezra was allowed to take with him a large freewill offering of gold and silver, and silver vessels, contributed by the Jews, by the king himself, and by his counselors. He was also empowered to draw upon the king's treasures beyond the river for any further supplies required; and all priests, Levites, and other ministers of the temple were exempted from taxation. Ezra received authority to appoint magistrates and judges in Judea, with power of life and death over all offenders (7:11-28). His credentials were indorsed by the seven principal members of the royal council (v. 14).

(2) Preparations. Ezra assembled the Jews who accompanied him on the banks of the river Ahava, where they halted three days in tents. As mentioned above, the number was about one thousand five hundred, and included several of high-priestly and Davidic descent. Upon inspection he found that they had not a single Levite among them, and sent a deputation to Casiphia, where many of them lived, and succeeded in inducing thirty-eight Levites and two hundred and twenty servants of the temple to join their expedition (8:15-20). The valuable offerings to the temple he placed in the custody of twelve of the most distinguished priests and Levites; but such was his trust in God and his lofty courage, that he refrained from asking a royal escort (v. 22). After fasting and other pious exercises (vers. 21-23), the company started on their journey on the twelfth day of the first month (in the spring) of the seventh year of Artaxerxes I. (3) At Jerusalem. They reached Jerusalem without accident at the beginning of the fifth month (7:8). Three days after their arrival the treasures were weighed and delivered to the proper custodians, burnt sacrifices were offered by the returned exiles, and the king's commissions were delivered to viceroys and governors (8:32-36). In accordance with the royal decree, Ezra was now to be firmly established in Jerusalem as chief judge; empowered to settle everything relating to the religion of the Jews, and the life which was regulated by it. Ezra soon found, to his great distress, that the people of Jerusalem had paid no regard to the law forbidding the marriage of Israelites with heathen. Overwhelmed by his emotion, he sank to the ground, utterly unstrung and weeping bitterly. Men of tender conscience gathered around him, and all remained in mourning until the hour of the evening sacrifice, when Ezra poured out his soul in prayer (9:1-15). By this time a great congregation had gathered about Ezra, and "wept very sore." At length Shechaniah declared the guilt of the people and their wish to comply fully with the law. A general assembly was called to meet in Jerusalem within three days to decide what course should be pursued. "They assembled on the twentieth day of the ninth month amid a great storm of rain, and having confessed their sin, they proceeded to the remedy with order and deliberation. All the strange wives were put away, including even those who had borne children, by the beginning of the new year (ch. 10).

(4) Later history. Whether Ezra remained after the events recorded above, occupying about eight months, or returned to Babylon, is not known. It is conjectured by some that Ezra remained governor until superseded by Nehemiah; others think that he continued his labors in conjunction with Nehemiah. Our next mention of him is in connection with Nehemiah, after the completion of the walls of Jerusalem. The functions he executed under Nehemiah's government were purely of a priestly and ecclesiastical character; such as reading and interpreting the law of Moses to the people, praying for the congregation, assisting in the dedication of the walls, and proclaiming the religious reformation effected by Nehemiah (Neh. 8:9; 12:26). In the sealing of the covenant (10:1, sq.), Ezra perhaps sealed under the patronymic Serniah or Azariah (v. 2). As Ezra is not mentioned after Nehemiah's departure for Babylon, and as everything fell into confusion in Nehemiah's absence, it is not unlikely that Ezra had again returned to Babylon before Nehemiah.

(5) Character. Ezra had a profound love for the word of God, and "prepared his heart to seek the law of the Lord, and to do it, and to teach in Israel statutes and judgments" (Ezra 7:10); he was a man of excellent judgment (7:25), of large conscientiousness (9:3, sq.), which led him deeply to deplore sin and to strenuously oppose it. So great was his sense of dependence upon God that every step he took was marked by some devout acknowledgment of the divine help, "according to the good hand of God upon him" (7:6, 9, 27, 28; 8:22, 31). See BIBLE BOOKS OF.

2. A descendant of Judah, the father of several sons. His own parentage is not given (1 Chron. 4:17).

3. The head of one of the twenty-two courses of priests which returned from captivity with Zerubbabel and Jeshua (Neh. 12:1), B. C. 536. The same name appears in v. 13, where it is stated that his son, Meshullam, was chief of his family in the time of the high priest Joiakim (see v. 12); also in v. 33, as one of the chief Israelites who formed the first division that made the circuit of the walls of Jerusalem when rebuilt, B. C. 445.

EZRAHITE (Heb. עֲזָרָהִיט, ez-raw-khee'), the patronymic of the Levites Heman and Ethan (1 Kings 4:31; titles of Psa. 88, 89). Their Levitical descent is not at variance with the epithet Ezrahite (or Ezrahchite), for they were incorporated into the Judean family of Zerach. Thus the Levite (Judg. 17:7) is spoken of as belonging to the family of Judah because he dwelt in Bethlehem of Judah.

EZ'RI (Heb. עֲזָרִי, helpful), ez-ree', son of Chelub, superintendent for King Dae' of those "who did the work of the field for tillage of the ground" (1 Chron. 27:26), B. C. after 1000.

EZ'RITE. See ABI-EZRITE.

F

FABLE (Gr. μῦθος, moo'-thos, myth), a fictitious story employed for the purpose of enforcing some truth or precept. Neander, Life of Christ, thus distinguishes between the parable and fable: "The parable is distinguished from the fable by this, that, in the latter qualities or acts of a higher class of beings may be attributed to a lower, e. g., those of men to brutes; while in the former the lower sphere is kept perfectly distinct from that which it seems to illustrate. The beings and powers thus introduced always follow the law of their nature, but their acts, according to this law, are used to figure those of a higher race." Of the fable, as thus distinguished from the parable, we have but two examples in the Bible, (1) That of the trees choosing their king, addressed by Jotham to the men of Shechem (Judg. 9:8-15); (2) that of the cedar of Lebanon and the thistle, as the answer of Jehoash to the challenge of Amaziah (2 Kings 14:9).

In the New Testament fable is used for invention, falsehood (2 Pet. 1:16). "The fictions of the Jewish theosophists and Gnostics, especially concerning the emanations and orders of the æons, i. e., spirits of the air, are called myths" (A. V. Fables; 1 Tim. 1:4; 4:7; 2 Tim. 4:4; Tit. 1:14).

FACE. There is nothing peculiar in the use of this word in Scripture, except with reference to God. Applied to God, it denotes his presence. In such phrases as "Seeing the face of the Lord," "The face of the Lord is set against them that do evil," "The cry came before the face of the Lord," it is evidently all one with God's manifested presence. The declaration made by Jehovah to Moses, "there shall no man see me, and live" (Exod. 33:20), seems to contradict the joyful assertion of Jacob, "I have seen God face to face, and my life is preserved" (Gen. 32:30). The apparent discrepancy is to be explained by the different respects in which the expression is used in the two cases. The face of God, as involving the full blaze of his manifested glory, no mortal can see and live; but when veiled and appearing with the softened radiance of the human countenance, revived and quickened life is the natural result. The word is also used in the sense of favor (Psa. 44:3; 67:1; Dan. 9:17), and signifies also anger, justice, severity (Gen. 16:6, 8; Exod. 2:15; Rev. 6:16), it being natural for men to express these feelings in their countenances. "To set one's face" denotes to fully determine and resolve, and "to fall on the face" is an attitude of fear and reverence. To see one "face to face" is to enjoy a direct, clear sight of him, and not a reflection in a mirror.

FACES, BREAD OF, is the showbread (q. v.), which was always in the presence of God.

FAIN. See GLOSSARY.

FAIR, the rendering of several Hebrew and Greek words. In the East exposure to the sun makes a great difference in the complexion of women. Those of high condition carefully avoid such exposure, and retain their fairness, which becomes a distinguishing mark of quality as well as an enhancement of beauty (Gen. 12:11-13; Cant. 1:15, 16). See GLOSSARY.

FAIR HAVENS (Gr. καλοί λιμένες, kal-oy' lee-men'-es, good harbors), a harbor in the island of Crete (Acts 27:8), "near the city of Lasea, which, as Smith has shown conclusively, is the small bay, two leagues E. of Cape Matala, still bearing the same name (in the modern Greek dialect, Λιμενώνας καλοῖς") (Ramsey, St. Paul, p. 321).

FAIRS (Heb. עֲבָרִים, iz-zeh-bow-neem', Ezek. 27:12-27). This word is only found in Ezekiel, and does not mean fairs, but wares, as the R. V. renders it, and as the A. V. has it in v. 33. The essential meaning of the Hebrew seems to be an exchange, or equivalent, alluding to the frequency of barter in ancient trade.

FAITH (Gr. πίστις, pis'-tis), belief, trust—especially in a higher power. The fundamental idea in Scripture is steadfastness, faithfulness.

1. Scripture Use of Word. The word is used in the Scriptures, (1) Most frequently in a subjective sense, denoting a moral and spiritual quality of individuals, by virtue of which men are held in relations of confidence in God and fidelity to him. (2) In an objective sense, meaning the body of truth, moral and religious, which God has revealed—that which men believe. Examples of this use of the word are not numerous, though they occur occasionally, as in Phil. 1:27; 1 Tim. 1:19; 6:20, 21; Jude 3, 20.

The word occurs but twice in our English version of the Old Testament, the idea being expressed by other terms, as "trust," etc.

This article is confined in the further discussion to faith in the sense first named. The following points are of chief importance:

2. Philosophical. Faith, viewed philosophically, must be regarded as lying at the basis of all knowledge. Anselm's famous utterance, "Crede ut intelligas," "Believe that you may know," expresses the truth in contrast with the words of Abelard, "Intellige ut credas," "Know that you may believe." Truths perceived intuitively imply faith in the intuitions. Truths or facts arrived at by logical processes, or processes of reasoning, are held to be known because, first of all, we have confidence in the laws of the human mind. Our knowledge obtained through the senses has underneath it faith in the senses. To this extent Gæthe spoke wisely when he said, "I believe in the five senses." A large part of knowledge rests upon human testimony, and of course this involves faith in the testimony.

The distinction between matters of faith and matters of knowledge must not be drawn too rigidly, inasmuch as all matters of knowledge are in some measure matters also of faith. The distinction, when properly made, recognizes chiefly the different objects to which our convictions relate, and the different methods by which we arrive at these convictions. The convictions themselves may be as strong in the one case as in the other.

3. Theological. Faith in the theological sense contains two elements recognized in the Scriptures. There is an element that is intellectual; also an element, of even deeper importance, that is moral. Faith is not simply the assent of the intellect to revealed truth; it is the practical submission of the entire man to the guidance and control of such truth. "The devils believe and tremble."

Indispensable as is the assent of the intellect, that alone does not constitute the faith upon which the Scriptures lay such emphasis. The essential idea is rather that of fidelity, faithfulness, steadfastness. Or, as has been well said, "Faith, in its essential temper, is that elevation of soul by which it aspires to the good, the true, and the divine." In illustration may be cited particularly John 3:18-21; Rom. 2:7; 4:5; Heb. ch. 11; James 2:14-26.

4. Intellectual. Viewed more particularly with reference to its intellectual aspect, faith is properly defined as the conviction of the reality of the truths and facts which God has revealed, such conviction resting solely upon the testimony of God.

These truths and facts are to a large extent beyond the reach of the ordinary human processes of acquiring knowledge. Still they are of the utmost importance in relation to human life and salvation. God has therefore revealed them. And they who accept them must do so upon the trustworthiness of the divine testimony. This testimony is contained in the Holy Scriptures. It is impressed moreover by the special sanction of the Holy Spirit. (See John 3:11, 31-33; 16:8-11; 1 John 6:10, 11, and many other places.)

5. Results of Faith. They who receive the divine testimony and yield to it cordial and full assent become partakers of heavenly knowledge. Their knowledge comes by faith, yet none the less is it knowledge. The Scriptures, it is true, recognize the difference between walking by faith and walking by sight, and thus the difference between the objects and methods of sense-perception and those of faith. Also the difference is noted between the acquisition of human learning and philosophy and the contents of the divine revelation. But still the Scriptures represent true believers as persons who "know the things that are freely given . . . of God." Christ said to his disciples, "Unto you it is given to know the mysteries of the kingdom of God" (Luke 8:10; see also John 8:31, 32; 1 Cor. 1:5, 6, 21-30; 2:9-16; Eph. 1:17; 1 Tim. 2:4).

6. Reason and Faith. The relation of reason to faith is that of subordination, and yet not that of opposition. The truths of revelation are in many cases above reason, though not against it. Such truths were revealed because reason could not discover them. They are therefore to be accepted, though the reason cannot demonstrate them. But this inability of reason to discover or to demonstrate is one thing; irrationality, as involving absurdity, or contradiction of the intuitions of the intellect or conscience, or contradiction of well-established truth, is another.

Reason has its justly recognized and appropriate function in examining and weighing the evidences of revelation; also in interpreting or determining the force of the terms in which the revelation is given. But when the reality and meaning of revelation are thus reached reason has done its work, and it remains for faith to accept the contents of the revelation, whatever they may be.

It should be said, however, that the evidence of the saving truth of revelation, most convincing for many, is not that which appeals directly to reason. Many lack ability or opportunity to investigate the rational evidences of Christianity. But to them with all others the announcement of the truth comes attended by the ministration or direct testimony of the Holy Spirit. They are thus made to feel that they ought to repent and believe the Gospel. If they yield to this conviction they obtain forgiveness of their sins and become new creatures in Christ Jesus. The Spirit bears witness to their acceptance with God. And thus in the experience of salvation they have indubitable proof of the reality of revelation. In all this reason is subordinate to faith, but by no means opposed to it (1 Cor. 1:21-31; John 16:8-11; Rom. 8:14-17; 1 John 5:9-11).

7. Condition of Salvation. As has been assumed in the foregoing, faith is the condition of salvation. It is not the procuring cause, but the condition, or instrumental cause. It is frequently associated in the Scriptures with repentance; and thus the conditions of salvation, as commonly stated in Protestant doctrine, are repentance and faith. But in reality true faith and true repentance are not separate or to be distinguished too rigidly from each other. Faith is fundamental. Repentance implies faith. Faith is not real saving faith unless it includes repentance. (See REPENTANCE.) Saving faith may therefore be properly defined, for those who have the light of the Gospel, as such belief in the Lord Jesus Christ as leads one to submit completely to the authority of Christ, and to put complete and exclusive trust in him for salvation. (See John 3:14-16, and many other places.)

Faith, which is the condition of salvation, is also, in an important measure, one of the results of salvation. In the justified and regenerated soul faith is deepened and developed by the influence of the Holy Spirit. In its essential quality faith is unchanged, but it acquires greater steadiness; and as the word of God is studied and its contents spiritually apprehended faith becomes broader and richer in the truths and facts which it grasps.

Thus in its beginning and completion faith is one of the fruits of the Spirit (Gal. 5:22).

For fuller discussion see works of Systematic Theology, particularly Dorner's Christian Dogmatics.—E. McC.

FAITH, RULE OF. In the early Church the summary of doctrines taught to catechumens, and to which they were obliged to subscribe before baptism. It was afterward applied to the Apostles' Creed. In modern theology it denotes the true source of our knowledge of Christian truth.

1. Protestant Doctrine. One of the chief doctrinal elements of the Reformation was the sufficiency of the Scriptures for faith and salvation. Thus the Methodist Episcopal Church teaches:

"The Holy Scriptures contain all things necessary to salvation; so that whatsoever is not read therein, nor may be proved thereby, is not to be required of any man that it should be believed as an article of faith, or be thought requisite or necessary to salvation" (Meth. Dis., v, 5).

2. Roman Catholic teaching is: "The Church is the ordinary and the infallible means by which we know what the truths are which God has revealed. The testimony of the Church is the rule by which we can distinguish between true and false doctrine. . . . A person must believe that the Church cannot err, and that whatever it teaches is infallibly true" (Cath. Dict., s. v.).

FAITH, THE CHRISTIAN. "To those who receive the light, in the sense of not refusing it, revelation is one whole, and all its glorious system of truth is received and surely believed. To them it is both objectively and subjectively THE FAITH; and, inasmuch as Christianity has brought it in all fullness into the world, it is to them the CHRISTIAN FAITH. This phrase has therefore a larger meaning. It signifies that it is not their philosophy simply, the glory of their reason, the tradition they have derived from their fathers, but the rich inheritance which the Holy Spirit has given to that one supreme faculty of their souls, the faith which is the evidence of things not seen. It is a body of truth which, as reason did not give it, so reason cannot take it away. It is a region in which they walk by faith, which their faith habitually visits, in which their faith lives, and moves, and has its being" (Pope, Compend. Christian Theol., p. 45).

FAITHFULNESS (Heb. אֱמוּנָה, em-oo-naw', faithfulness, stability), an attribute ascribed to God in many places, especially in the Psalms (36: 5; 89:2 sq.; Isa. 11:5, etc.), which exhibits his character as worthy of the love and confidence of man, and assures us that he will certainly fulfill his promises, as well as execute his threats against sin. It covers "temporal blessings (1 Tim. 4:8; Psa. 84:11; Isa. 33:16); spiritual blessings (1 Cor. 1:9); support in temptation (1 Cor. 10:13) and persecution (1 Pet. 4:12, 13; Isa. 41:10); sanctifying afflictions (Heb. 12:4-12); directing in difficulties (2 Chron. 32:22; Psa. 32:8); enabling to persevere (Jer. 32:40), and bringing to glory (1 John 2:25)."

Faithfulness is also predicated of men: "He was a faithful man" (Hebrew trustworthy, Neh. 7:2); "who then is that faithful (trusty) and wise steward?" (Luke 12:42, etc.) "The Faithful" was the general and favorite name in the early Church to denote baptized persons.

FAITHLESS. See GLOSSARY.

FALCON. See ANIMAL KINGDOM.

FALL OF MAN, a term of theology which is not found in the Scriptures, though the essential fact is a matter of Scripture record and of clear though not frequent reference. The particular account is in Gen. 3. The most explicit New Testament references are Rom. 5:12-21; 1 Cor. 15: 21, 22, 45-47; 2 Cor. 11:3.

The character of the primitive record in Genesis has been the subject of much discussion. Some have contended that the account is purely literal; others, that it is figurative, poetic, or allegorical; still others, rationalistic or semirationalistic, relegate the whole matter to the realm of the mythical. This last view, of course, cannot be consistently held by anyone who accepts the Scriptures as of divine authority.

It must be admitted that the account leaves room for many questions both as to its form and its meaning in relation to incidental details. But still the great, underlying, essential facts are sufficiently clear, especially when the account is taken in connection with other Scriptures. They are as follows:

1. Bible Doctrine. 1. The fall of our first parents was an epoch or turning point in the moral history of the race. It was in itself an epoch of great and sad significance and of far-reaching results.

2. Man at his creation was in a state of moral purity. In connection with his freedom there was of necessity the possibility of sin. But still there was no evil tendency in his nature. God pronounced him, with other objects of his creation, "good." He was made in the image and likeness of God.

3. As a moral being man was placed by God in a state of probation. His freedom was to be exercised and tested by his being under divine law. Of every tree in the garden he might freely eat, except the tree of knowledge of good and evil. At one point there must be restraint, self-denial for the sake of obedience. "He could not have the whole world and save his own soul."

4. The temptation to disobedience came from an evil source outside himself. In Genesis only the serpent is mentioned. In the New Testament the tempter is identified as Satan, who may have employed the serpent as his instrument (2 Cor. 11:3, 14; Rom. 16:20; Rev. 12:9).

5. The temptation came in the form of an appeal to both man's intellect and to the senses. The forbidden fruit was presented as "good for food" and "to be desired to make one wise." Thus the allurements were in the direction of sensual gratification and intellectual pride.

6. At the beginning of the sin lay unbelief. The tempted ones doubted or disbelieved God and believed the tempter. And thus, under the strong desire awakened by the temptation, they disobeyed the divine command.

7. By this act of disobedience "sin entered into the world and death by sin." Shame and alienation from God were the first visible consequences. The image of God, which contained among its features "righteousness and true holiness," was marred and broken, though not completely lost. (See IMAGE OF GOD.) Expulsion from Eden followed. The ground was cursed on account of sin. Sorrow and toil and struggle with the evil in human nature became the lot of mankind.

2. Theological Views. As to the theological treatment of this topic it should be particularly noted:

(1) Rationalistic. A favorite view of rationalistic or evolutionist theologians is that the fall was a necessary incident in man's moral development. The fall is sometimes, therefore, spoken of as "a fall upward." It was a step forward from the savage or animal state to the practical knowledge of good and evil, and thus, through the experience of sin, toward the goal of developed moral purity. But this view ignores the essential evil of sin. It makes sin only an imperfect or disguised good, and is, for that reason and others, opposed to the plain teaching of Scripture.
