THE object of the RELIGIOUS ENCYCLOPÆDIA is to give, in alphabetical order, a summary of the most important information on all branches and topics of theological learning,—exegetical, historical, biographical, doctrinal, and practical,—for the use of ministers, students, and intelligent laymen of all denominations. It will be completed in three volumes.

The ENCYCLOPÆDIA was suggested by the Real-Encyklopädie für protestantische Theologie und Kirche, edited by Drs. J. J. HERZOG, G. L. PLITT, and A. HAUCK (Leipzig, 1877 sqq.). This work, with which I have been familiar from its start, as one of the contributors, is universally acknowledged to be an invaluable thesaurus of solid information in all departments of biblical and ecclesiastical learning, under the responsible names of a large number of eminent German and other European scholars. The first edition, edited by Dr. Herzog alone, was begun in 1854, and completed in 1868, in twenty-two volumes. The second edition, thoroughly revised and partly rewritten, is now in course of publication, and will be completed in not less than fifteen volumes. A mere translation of this opus magnum would not answer the wants of the English and American reader.* While many articles are very long, and of comparatively little interest outside of Germany, the department of English and American church history and biography is, naturally, too limited. For instance, the art. Brüder des gemeinsamen Lebens has 82 pages; Eherecht, 35; Gnosis, 43; Jerusalem, 37; Liturgie, 36; Luther, 36; Mandäer, 17; Mani, 36; Melanchthon, 54. These articles are all very good; but a proportionate treatment of important English and American topics which are barely mentioned or altogether omitted, would require a much more voluminous encyclopædia than the original. In the present work few articles exceed four pages; but the reader is throughout referred to books where fuller information can be obtained.

My esteemed friend Dr. Herzog, and his editorial colleagues,—the late Dr. Plitt, who died Sept. 10, 1880, and Professor A. Hauck, who has taken his place, as also the publisher, Mr. H. Rost, who issued the German edition of my Church History—have kindly given me full liberty to make such use of their work in English as I may deem best. It is needless to say that I would not have undertaken the task without a previous honorable understanding with the German editors and publisher.

This ENCYCLOPÆDIA, therefore, is not a translation, but a condensed reproduction and adaptation of all the important German articles, with necessary additions, especially in the literature, and with a large number of new articles by the editors and special contributors. More than one-third of the work is original. Every article is credited to its author, except the majority of editorial articles, which are unsigned. An apology may be due the German authors for abridging their contributions, but we have studied to give all the essential facts. Dissenting opinions, or material additions, are included in brackets. The bibliography has been largely increased throughout, especially by English and American works. Living celebrities are excluded. Denominational articles have been assigned to scholars who represent their denomination in a liberal Christian spirit. On important topics of controversy both sides are given a hearing. It has been the desire of the editors to allow a wide latitude of opinion within the limits of evangelical Christianity.

All important encyclopædias besides that of Dr. Herzog, and a large number of books in different languages, have been carefully consulted, but never used without due acknowledgment. The assistant editors have devoted their whole time and strength to the work, in my library, and under my direction.

I have been fortunate in securing the hearty co-operation of a number of eminent American and English scholars of different denominations and schools of thought, who can speak with authority on the topics assigned them, and will largely increase the original value of this ENCYCLOPÆDIA.

AUTHORIZATION.

WE the undersigned, Editors and Publisher of the "Real-Encyklopädie für Prot. Theologie und Kirche," hereby authorize the Rev. Dr. Schaff of New York to make free use of this work for the preparation and publication, in the United States and in England, of a similar although much shorter work, under the title "A Religious Encyclopædia, based on the Real-Encyklopädie of Herzog, Plitt, and Hauck.

ERLANGEN und LEIPZIG, December, 1881.

◀ IN MEMORIAM. ▶

On the eve of the publication of the first volume of this Encyclopædia (October 31, 1882) I received the sad intelligence of Dr. Herzog's death. He fell asleep in peace in the 78th year of his useful life, leaving a widow, a daughter and a son (M. D. and Privat docent) to mourn his departure. I lose in him an esteemed and beloved friend and co-worker in the same field. I saw him first at Lausanne in 1841, again at Halle in 1854, and twice at Erlangen, and often corresponded with him about his Encyclopædia, for which he engaged me as a contributor from the beginning. The few days I spent under his hospitable roof in 1879 I count among the sunny memories of life. In his last letter he expressed great joy at the progress of the American reproduction and adaptation of his opus magnum, and a desire to see soon the first volume. Have, pia anima!

A suitable article will appear in the appendix to Vol. III (the letter H being already stereotyped). But it is due to Dr. Herzog's memory and the obligation of this work to his, that we should anticipate the order by a biographical sketch.—EDROR.

JOHANN JAKOB HERZOG, D. D., was born at Basel, Switzerland, September 12, 1805, and died at Erlangen, on Saturday, September 30, 1882. He pursued his university studies (1823-29) at Basel and Berlin. In 1835 he became professor of historical theology in the Academy at Lausanne (Canton de Vaud). In 1847 he was called to the University of Halle; in 1854 to Erlangen, as Professor of Reformed Theology and Church History. In 1877 he retired with a pension and devoted the remainder of his life to the editing of his Church History, and the new edition of the Theological Encyclopædia. He was twice invited to America—in 1873 to the Evangelical Alliance Conference in New York, and in 1880 to the Pan-Presbyterian Council in Philadelphia, and expressed his full sympathy with these movements, but could not attend.

He was an able, learned, sound and pacific theologian and a prolific writer. Among his books the following deserve particular mention: Johan Calvin, 1843; Das Leben Oekolampads und die Reformation der Kirche zu Basel, 1843, 2 vols.; Die Romanischen Waldenser, 1853; Abriss der gesammten Kirchengeschichte, 1876-82, 3 vols. The last work is translated into the Swedish, and a French and an Italian translation are in course of preparation. But the greatest services he rendered the church were in connection with the Real Encyclopædie für protestantische Theologie und Kirche, 1854-1868, 22 vols., with index vol. He was the sole editor of the first edition. In 1877 he began a new edition in connection with Professor G. L. Plitt, and, after the latter's death, in 1880, with Professor A. Hauck, of Erlangen. He lived to see ten volumes—probably more than half the work—through the press.

Dr. Herzog will always be held in honorable memory by his Religious Encyclopædia. He did not, it is true, originate the idea, for the Roman Catholic Kirchen Lexikon of Wetzer and Welte (1847-1856 12 vols.), was well-nigh finished ere his began, but he has the credit of beginning and carrying to its triumphant close a Protestant rival work, upon which many of the greatest Protestant scholars in Germany were engaged. To the first edition he himself contributed 429 articles, many of them of length, and all of them carefully and thoroughly done. The second edition was no reprint of the first, but a new work substantially, with new contributors to revise the articles of those deceased or write original articles, so that it throughout reflects the latest and highest evangelical scholarship of Germany. So pronounced is the quality of the Encyclopædia that it is authoritative, and so comprehensive is its grasp that for Germany, and particularly the Protestant part of it, it is not likely to be excelled in this generation. Scholars of all lands have paid their tribute of hearty praise to the work. It is safe to say that there is scarcely a theological library, pretending to be complete, which has not a set of Herzog—as the Encyclopædia is most commonly called. It is constantly referred to in recent theological works as an authority, and has been largely drawn from in similar works in French and English. The contributors to Smith's Biblical and Ecclesiastical Dictionaries were specially requested to make use of Herzog. Those who are engaged upon Encyclopædic labors will best appreciate the care and thought requisite for such a work, and will be foremost to thank Dr. Herzog for his invaluable services.

Personally, Dr. Herzog was universally esteemed and beloved. He treated his contributors with uniform courtesy and kindness. He united the modesty of a scholar with the simplicity of a child and the piety of a Christian. He was an anima candida, a Nathaniel without guile. His ecclesiastical relations were with the Reformed Church, but his sympathies extended to all who bore the name of Christ; and the regret occasioned by his death is not simply that over the departure of a champion of a particular phase of truth, but rather that over one who counted all followers of the Great Teacher his brethren, and was ready to put his learning at the service of the entire church. He was, however, spared to see many years, and to hear the plaudits of many lands, ere he was taken into the presence of his Lord.

A.

A and Ω, or ALPHA and OMEGA, the combination of the first and last letters of the Greek alphabet, is the phrase used three times by our Lord, in the Apocalypse, to set forth his eternity (Rev. i. 8, xxi. 6, xxii. 13). [The E. V. and the received text have it also in i. 11, where the best MSS. omit it.] The idea is much older. In the O. T., Isa. xlv. 6 (comp. xli. 4, xlili. 10), Jehovah calls himself "The first and the last," in contrast to the perishable idols. In both Testaments the phrase expresses the popular conception of eternity as endless duration, and at the same time the idea of divine causality; the Alpha looking back to the ἀρχή, the beginning, the creation; the Omega, to the τέλος, the end, the completion of the kingdom of God in Christ.

Tertullian (De Monog. c. 5) and Prudentius (Cathemer. hymn. IX., 10-12') use the figure. Marcus the Gnostic discovered that the numerical value of α and ω was equal to the numerical value of the individual letters composing $\omega\pi\tau\iota\sigma\tau\epsilon\rho\acute{\alpha}$ (dove); whence he inferred that Christ called himself α and ω with reference to the Holy Spirit, who descended on him at his baptism in the shape of a dove (Irenæus, Adv. Haeres. I., 14, 6; 15, 1; Tertullian, De Praescript. c. 50). This trifling was employed by Primasius in his commentary on the Apocalypse (Bibl. Patr. Max. X. p. 333) to prove that the Holy Ghost is of the same substance with the Father.

The combination of α and ω , by its simplicity and suggestiveness, commended itself as a symbol of Christian faith from the earliest times, and was used extensively on monuments of every description; sometimes alone, but more frequently in connection with the monogram of Christ in its various forms:

Sometimes the two letters, of which the ω is almost always of that uncial form which resembles the minuscular, are hung by chains from the arms of the cross. One of the oldest instances of the use of the letters is in the catacombs on the Island of Melos, and dates from the first part of the second century or the latter part of the first. (See Ross, Reisen auf den griech. Inseln des ägeischen Meeres, vol. III. p. 149.) The oldest coins on which it is used belong to Constance and Constantine, the sons of Constantine the Great. It is found upon rings and sigils, in pictures, illustrations, mosaics, reliefs, &c. Occasionally it is used by Protestants, e.g., on the front of the royal mortuary chapel at Charlottenburg, near Berlin, on the altar of the Matthaekirche in Berlin [in the Madison-square Presbyterian Church, New York, and in other American churches].

AA'RON (mountaineer, or, according to another root, enlightened), the first high priest of the Jews, eldest son of Amram and Jochebed, of the tribe of Levi, brother of Miriam and Moses, husband of Elisheba, and father of Nadab, Abihu, Eleazar, and Ithamar (Exod. vi. 20, 23); was the "prophet," or mouthpiece, of Moses (Exod. iv. 16), and associated with him in all the preparations for and the actual conduct of the exodus and the subsequent wandering. By divine command he and his sons were set apart for the priesthood, and accordingly were consecrated by Moses (Lev. viii.); and the choice of Aaron as high priest was afterwards miraculously confirmed by the budding rod (Num. xvii.). Aaron held the office for almost forty years; and it then passed to Eleazar, the older sons having died at the hand of God (Lev. x. 1, 2). The most prominent defect in his character was weakness. He reflected the mood of those about him, and never acted independently. Thus he yielded to the solicitations of the people at Sinai, during the absence of Moses, and made the golden calf (Exod. xxxii. 4). He joined Miriam in her jealous murmuring against Moses (Num. xii.), and subsequently Moses in his impatient disobedience of the divine command at Meribah (Num. xx. 10). For this latter sin he was kept out of the promised land (verse 24). He died on Mount Hor, at the age of a hundred and twenty-three years, in sight of all the people, who mourned sincerely over his death. See MOSES, PRIEST. FR. W. SCHULTZ.

AARON ben-Asher, or AARON bar-Moses, a Jewish rabbi, who in the eleventh century collected the various readings of the text of the O. T. from the manuscripts of the Western libraries, while Ben Nephthali made a similar collection from those of the Eastern libraries. These collections are the first Hebrew books in which the vowel-signs are given, and to their authors the honor of this invention is often ascribed. See BIBLE TEXT, O. T.

ABAD'DON (destruction), in the O. T. the kingdom of the dead, Hades, or Sheol (Job xxvi. 6; Prov. xv. 11). The rabbins used the word of the lowest part of hell. But in Rev. ix. 11 Abaddon is personified, and called the angel of the bottomless pit, and king of the infernal locusts. WOLF BAUDISSION.

AB'ANA (stony) and PHAR'PAR (swift), the "rivers of Damascus" (2 Kings v. 12), identified with the modern Barada and Awaj respectively. The Abana is the Amana of Cant. iv. 8, and probably the Greek Chrysorrhoas (golden stream). It rises in the Antilibanus, and runs through the city; while the Awaj rises in Hermon, and flows eight miles south of Damascus. But their direction is the same, from west to east, across the plain of Damascus; and both empty themselves into the so-called "Meadow Lakes," eighteen miles east of Damascus. The Abana is the chief cause of the extraordinary fertility and beauty of the plain of Damascus.

ABARBANEL. See ABRABANEL.

AB'ARIM (beyond, i.e. the Jordan), a mountain-range in the land of Moab, opposite Jericho (Num. xxvii. 12; Deut. xxxii. 49). Nebo, Peor, and Pisgah belong to the range. The range rises to a height of more than four thousand feet above the Dead Sea.

ABAUZIT, Firmin, b. at Uzès, Languedoc, France, Nov. 11, 1679; d. in Geneva, March 20, 1767; was educated in the latter city, and became public librarian there in 1727, having previously travelled and studied in Holland and England. Of his Œuvres Diverses (2 vols., Amsterdam, 1773), parts have been translated by E. Harwood, London, 1774, under the title, Miscellanies on Historical, Theological, and Critical Subjects.

AB'BA, the Aramaic word for "father," both Chaldee and Syriac. Christ and Paul applied it to God (Mark xiv. 36; Rom. viii. 15). Luther translated Abba, Father, by "dear Father."

ABBADIE, Jacques, b. at Nay, in Béarn, France, 1657; d. in London, 1727; studied in the flourishing reformed academies of Saumur and Sedan, and early showed extraordinary talent; on invitation from the Elector of Brandenburg was pastor of the French Reformed Congregation in Berlin, from 1680 to 1688; went with Marshal Schomberg to England, and became pastor of the French Reformed Congregation in London, in 1689. His La Vérité de la Religion Chrétienne, of which the two first volumes appeared 1684, and the third in 1689, was translated into English (London, 1694-98, 2 vols.) and also into German; and, though written by a "heretic," it became one of the standard apologetical works in the French literature. Of his other works, his L'Art de se Connaître, 1692, giving an outline of his moral system, attracted much attention, and was warmly defended by Malebranche.

ABBESS, also sometimes called Antistita or Majorissa, the superior of an abbey of nuns, was elected in the same manner as an abbot, and held nearly the same power. She could not excommunicate, however, or give the veil, or ordain; and thus she became, in a general way, more dependent of the episcopal authority than the abbot. That the Abbess of Lucia wore the title of Episcopa was an entirely exceptional case; but her right to be present at councils and synods was generally acknowledged in the Western Church. See MANSI: Coll. Con. Tom. I. Supp. pp. 519, 523, sq. LINGARD: Antiq. of the Anglo-Saxon Church, I. 139.

ABBEY, a religious house under the superintendence of an abbot or abbess. They were of two general classes, — royal abbeys, founded and endowed by kings, which rendered an account of their temporal administration to the king's officers; and episcopal abbeys, which were directly under the care of the bishops. Their jurisdiction was at first confined to the immediate lands and building in possession of the house; but subsequently they very much extended their sway, even ruling over cities, and issuing coin, and acting as courts of justice. The abbeys of England, a hundred and ninety in number, and possessing lands valued in that day at £2,850,000, were suppressed under Henry VIII., and their property confiscated. Similar was the fate of the French abbeys in the revolution of 1790. See CONVENT, MONASTERY, PRIORY.

ABBO of Fleury, b. near Orleans; d. Nov. 13, 1004. He was educated in the Abbey of Fleury; studied at Rheims and Paris; went in 985, on the invitation of Archbishop Oswald of York, to England, where, since the days of Alfred, studies and learning had sunk so low, that very few priests understood Latin; taught for two years in the school of Ramsery; was chosen Abbot of Fleury in 988, and brought the school of this place to a flourishing condition; so, on the whole, he occupies a prominent position in this barren time which followed after the bloom of the age of Charlemagne. In the synod of St. Denis, 995, he took the part of the monks against the bishops; and when the former aroused the people, and dispersed the latter, he wrote his Apologeticus in their defence. He was not a blind partisan, however, of the monks. He introduced severe reforms in the monasteries of Fleury, Marmonier, Mici, Saint-Père de Chartres, and Réole; and it was the monks who in the last-mentioned place roused the people against him, and caused the riot in which he was killed. His life, written by his pupil Aimon, is given by Mabillon: Act. Sanct. Ord. Bened. VI. 1; his Apologeticus and a number of very interesting letters by FR. PITHON: Codex Canonum, Paris, 1687. Many of his works, mathematical, astronomical, historical, and dialectical, still exist in manuscript. HUNDESHAGEN (HEIDEMANN).

ABBOT (Greek ἄββας, Latin Abbas, Italian Abate, French Abbé, German Abt, from the Chaldee or Aramaic form of the common Hebrew word for father) was introduced in the East, first as a general term of respect for any monk, and then as a special title for the superior of a monastery. As such it was afterwards replaced among the Greeks by other terms, as, for instance, Archimandrite; and in the West it was retained only by the order of the Benedictines and its branches, — the Cistercians, Bernhardines, Trappists, Grandmontanes, and Premonstratenses; while the Carmelites, Augustinians, Dominicans, and Servites used the titles of Præpositus or Prior Conventualis; the Franciscans, those of Custos or Guardianus; the Camaldulensians and Jesuits, those of Major and Rector, etc. In course of time the title was applied also to other clerical, though not monastical offices; and we find abbates castrenses, preachers appointed for army service, abbates curiæ palatii, etc. Another distinction, not of title only, but also of position, was that between abbates regulares, seculares, and laici. The abbas secularis was not a monk, but a member of the secular clergy, holding an abbey in commendam; that is, as a benefice, enjoying the honor of the title, and a certain amount of the revenues, but taking no part in the administration or jurisdiction. From this system of giving monasteries in commendam arose the abbates laici. They were not only not monks, but they did not even belong to the clerical order. They were simply laymen, in the beginning warriors, afterwards courtiers. In the time of Charles Martel it was determined to employ monastic revenues, at least temporarily, for the pressing needs of the warfare against the Saracens; and the noblemen who led the troops raised in this way thus became titular abbots. But the patriotic purpose was soon forgotten; and a practice grew up which finally, in the time of Louis XIV., became a public scandal.

The abbas regularis was elected by the monks, and from among themselves; only, in cases when a monastery seemed to present no fit subject, he was chosen from another congregation. Originally the right of nomination rested with the bishop of the diocese; but in the middle of the sixth century, during the reign of Justinian, this right was by law transferred to the monks throughout the Western Church, and the bishops retained only the right of institution. The system of commendation, however, and also other circumstances, gave both the bishop and the king manifold opportunities to interfere with the elections. Once elected and confirmed, the abbot held office for life, and could be deposed by the bishop only with the consent of his fellow-presbyters and abbots. With respect to discipline and jurisdiction, his power was almost absolute; and though the præpositi or priores nominated by himself, and the decani and centenarii elected by the monks, could exercise some influence, it became necessary for the councils to enact laws prohibiting abbots from blinding or mutilating their monks. In earlier times their power was somewhat checked by the episcopal authority; but, in the beginning of the twelfth century, the Councils of Rheims (1119) and of Rome (1122) entirely emancipated them from the episcopal jurisdiction, and placed them immediately under the pope. In secular things, however, especially with respect to the abbey property, their power was often very circumscribed; and, as they were unable to interfere in person with civil suits, it often happened that the advocatus ecclesiæ or æconomus or procurator usurped an exclusive authority over the administration of the revenues. There are, nevertheless, laws from a later date, prohibiting abbots from lending money on usury, limiting the number of their horses and attendants, etc.; and the frequent rumors of debauchery and intrigue were not confined to the abbates laici, but touched also the abbates regulares.

ABBOT, George, b. at Guildford, Oct. 19, 1562; d. at Croydon, Aug. 5, 1633; studied at Baliol College, Oxford; was chosen master of University College 1597, and appointed Bishop of Lichfield 1609, Bishop of London a month later, and Archbishop of Canterbury within the lapse of a year. In 1604 he was chosen one of the eight Oxford divines who were intrusted with the translation of the New Testament, excepting the Epistles; and in 1608 he accompanied the Earl of Dunbar to Scotland, to bring about a union between the churches of England and Scotland. In both cases he distinguished himself, but his rapid preferment was nevertheless due as much to his flattery of James I. as to his merit. He showed considerable firmness, however, when once seated in the archiepiscopal chair, both in his relation to the king and the court, and more especially to Laud: he was even suspended for a short time, having refused to license a sermon preached by Dr. Sibthorp, which stretched the royal prerogatives beyond their constitutional bounds. Of his numerous writings, his Geography, or a Brief Description of the Whole World, ran through many editions; and his Exposition on the Prophet Jonah (1600) was reprinted in 1845. A Life of him was published at Guildford in 1797.

ABBOT, Robert, b. at Guildford, 1560; d. at Salisbury, March 2, 1617; elder brother of the archbishop, was, like him, educated at Oxford, where he became Master of Baliol College, and professor-regius of divinity. In 1615 he was made Bishop of Salisbury. He was a learned man and a prolific writer, following his brother's policy, especially in his opposition to Laud; but most of his works, even his Mirror of Popish Subtilties (1594) and Antichristi Demonstratio (1603), have fallen into oblivion.

ABBOT, Robert, b. about 1588; d. about 1657; was at once vicar of Cranbrook, Kent, and minister of Southwick, Hampshire; but, when parliament decided against pluralities of ecclesiastical offices, he gave up the former benefice, though it was the larger. Afterwards he was made rector of St. Austin, Watling Street, London, where he died. Though a strong churchman, and much mixed up in controversies with the nonconformists, especially the Brownists, he stands as a remarkable specimen of the Puritan type of clergymen of his time: and his prose writings were very popular; as, for instance, his Milk for Babes; or, A Mother's Catechism for her Children, first published in 1646, and often reprinted.

ABBOTT, Jacob, a popular American author, b. at Hallowell, Me., Nov. 14, 1803; d. at Farmington, Me., Oct. 31, 1879. He was graduated at Bowdoin College in 1820; student of theology at Andover, Mass., 1822-24; tutor in Amherst College, 1824-25; professor of mathematics and philosophy, 1825-29; principal of the Mount Vernon School for Girls, in Boston, 1829-34; pastor of Eliot Congregational Church in Roxbury, 1834-36; and since then he devoted himself to literary work. He is mentioned here because of his "Young Christian Series," consisting of The Young Christian, 1832; The Corner-Stone, 1834; The Way to do Good; Hoary Head; and McDonner, — a series which has been extensively circulated. His numerous stories for children breathe a gentle Christian spirit, and convey valuable moral truths.

ABBREVIATORS are notaries, or secretaries, of the papal court, whose duty it is to prepare condensations or outlines of letters, bulls, and consistorial proceedings. Their number is fixed at seventy-two; of whom twelve are prelates, twenty-two are lower clergy, and the remainder may be laymen. Similarly named officers do the same for the acts of general synods. The office dates from Benedict XII., in the early part of the fourteenth century, and has been filled by distinguished men who held the rank of prelates. In 1466 Paul II. abolished it because it had been corrupted, but it was restored later on. Æneas Sylvius, afterwards Pius II., was "Abbreviator major" of the Council of Basel (1430).

ABBUNA, the special title of the metropolitan of Axum, or, as he is also styled, the Bishop of Abyssinia or Ethiopia. As twelve was the lowest canonical number of bishops for the establishment of a patriarchate, and the metropolitan of Axum was forbidden to have more than seven suffragan bishops, he was not a patriarch, but wore the above special title of Abbuna. He is nominated by the Coptic Patriarch of Alexandria.

ABDIAS. Under the title, Abdiæ, Babylonice primi episcopi, De Historia Certaminis Apostolici libri X. Julio Africano interprete, we have a collection of myths, legends, and traditions relating to the lives and works of the apostles, and pretending to be the Latin translation of the Greek translation of the Hebrew work of Abdias. An Abdias, however, Bishop of Babylon, and a disciple of the apostles, is not known to history; and the collection, drawn from various sources, canonical and non-canonical, catholic and heretical, is evidently a compilation from the eighth or ninth century.

WAGENMANN.

AB'DON (servile) 1. A Gersonite Levitical city in Asher identified with Abdeh, ten miles north-east from Accho.

2. Also the name of several Bible characters, of whom one was the eleventh judge of Israel (Judg. xii. 13-15).

ABECEDARIAN HYMNS are acrostic poems, in imitation of those in Hebrew, e.g., Ps. cxix., in which the several verses begin with the letters of the alphabet in regular order, and thus have the practical effect of aiding the memory. Augustine composed a hymn on this principle against the Donatists; and the Church employed also others, for all saw the importance of song as a means of religious instruction.

ABEEL, David, D.D., an eminent missionary, b. at New Brunswick, N.J., June 12, 1804; d. at Albany, N.Y., Sept. 4, 1846. He was graduated from the seminary of the Reformed (Dutch) Church in his native town, and in 1826 was licensed, and settled at Athens, N.Y.: but failing health compelled him to resign, and at length he went in 1829 as a chaplain of the Seaman's Friend Society to Canton; in that capacity he there remained a year, when he put himself, as had been at first proposed, under the American Board, by whose direction he visited Java and other Eastern countries in order that he might report their true condition. In 1833 he returned home to recruit his health, but on his journey through Europe embraced every opportunity to present the cause of foreign missions. In England he was instrumental in organizing a society for promoting female education in the East. He returned to China, February, 1839, and was the founder of the Amoy Mission, 1844; returned to America, 1845. He was an estimable man, and a sincere and devoted Christian. His gentle, refined manners made him welcome everywhere, and, joined to his practical wisdom, enabled him to wield a wide and consecrated influence.

'ABEL (breath). The second son of Adam and Eve, and, according to some, the twin-brother of Cain, who from envy killed him. Abel was a shepherd, Cain a farmer; and thus the two chief callings of the Hebrews were represented in the first family (Gen. iv. 1-8). Abel was the first "martyr," and hero of faith (Matt. xxiii. 35; Heb. xi. 4). In patristic theology the brothers are regarded as types; as, by Augustine, Abel is the representative of the regenerate or spiritual, Cain of the natural or corrupt, man.

'ABEL (meadow), as a prefix, enters into several Hebrew names of places: —

1. ABEL-BETH-MA'ACHAH (meadow of the house of oppression), also called ABEL-MA'IM (meadow of waters), and twice simply ABEL (2 Sam. xx. 14, 18), identified with Abil-el-Kumh, a ruin on a stream north of the waters of Merom, in the north of Palestine, near Damascus (2 Sam. xx. 14, 15; 1 Kings xv. 20; 2 Kings xv. 29).

2. 'ABEL-MEHO'LAH (meadow of the dance), a place in the Jordan Valley (Judg. vii. 22), interesting because Elisha lived there (1 Kings xix. 16). The identification is uncertain.

3. 'ABEL-MIZ'RAIM (meadow of Egypt). The name given by the Canaanites to the place, somewhere east of the Jordan, which was the scene of the final "mourning" of the Egyptians over Jacob (Gen. 1. 11).

4. 'ABEL-SHIT'TIM (meadow of the acacias), called Shittim (Num. xxv. 1), — the last halting-place of the Israelites (Num. xxxiii. 49).

5. "The great Abel" of 1 Sam. vi. 18, a copyist's error for "the great stone."

ABELARD, b. at Palais, a village of Brittany, in 1079; d. in the priory of St. Marcellus, near Chalons, April 21, 1142. He was the eldest son of a knight, the lord of the village. His Christian name was Pierre de Palais (Petrus Palatinus); but when he renounced his right of primogeniture, and gave up his claims on his parental inheritance in order to devote his whole life to studies, he assumed the name of Abelard, either from the French abeille, a bee, or from the French bail, — Latin, bajulus, — a tutor. His first teacher in philosophy was Roscellinus, who kept a school in Lokmenach, near Vannes, in Brittany, and was a decided Nominalist, declaring all universalia to be merely mental conceptions. His second teacher was William of Champeaux, who presided over the cathedral school of Paris, and was a decided Realist, declaring the universalia to be the very essence of all existence, and individuality only the product of incidental circumstances. Between these two extremes, whose bitter opposition to each other forms the moving power in the whole history of scholastic philosophy, Abelard attempted to occupy a position of his own. His positive views, however, such as they are developed in his Dialectica, Glossæ in Porphyrium, in Categorias, in Topica Boëthii, etc., are vague and even self-contradictory. In philosophy, as in theology, he is merely a critic; but his criticism is as bold as it is brilliant, and in many points it placed him far in advance of his age. He attacked William of Champeaux, and compelled him to alter his system, — a feat only to be compared with the gaining of a decisive battle. After this success, he opened a school of his own, — though he was still a very young man, — first at Melun, then at Corbeil, and finally at Paris. But William, though beaten, was still a powerful man. Abelard was compelled to leave Paris; and about 1113 he staid at Laon, where he studied theology under Anselm, a pupil of Anselm of Canterbury. Shortly after, however, he returned to Paris, William having retired; and now followed the most brilliant period of his life. He taught both theology and philosophy, and more than five thousand pupils gathered around his chair. Nearly all the great men of the age, both within and without the Church, heard Abelard. Celestine II. and Arnold of Brescia were both among his pupils; and his books "went across the sea and the Alps." But this brilliant career was suddenly checked by his relation to Heloise.

Heloise was a young girl of eighteen years, an illegitimate daughter of a canon, and living in the house of her uncle, the Canon Fulbert of Paris. She was very studious, and her further instruction was confided to Abelard. A passionate love sprang up between them; and they eloped to the house of Abelard's sister, where Heloise bore a son, Astralabius. In order to reconcile Fulbert, the two lovers were married; but, from a regard to the ecclesiastical career of Abelard, it was determined to keep the marriage secret. To this Fulbert would not consent; and when Abelard brought his wife to a Benedictine nunnery at Argenteuil, near Paris, Fulbert suspected an attempt to get rid of her by making her a nun, and sought revenge. One night he fell upon Abelard, and had him mutilated, thereby preventing him from ever holding any ecclesiastical office. Broken by shame and anguish, Abelard retired to the Monastery of St. Denys, and here he lived quietly for a couple of years (about 1118), teaching in a secluded place — the cella — built for the purpose. But his views of Dionysius Areopagita, the patron saint of the monastery and of France, brought him in conflict with the monks. He fled, but was compelled to return and recant; and though he afterwards was allowed to retreat into the wilderness of Nogent, in Champagne, where he built an oratory, — the so-called Paracletus, — he was still subject to the authority of the abbot of St. Denys. The original Paracletus was made of reeds and sedges; but so many pupils gathered around the celebrated teacher, that soon a building of stone could be erected. Abelard, however, felt miserable. One of his principal theological works, De Unitate et Trinitate Divina, was condemned by the Council of Soissons, 1121, and he lived in perpetual fear of persecution. He accepted the election as abbot of the Monastery of St. Gildasius at Ruys, in Brittany; but here he literally fell among a gang of ruffians. It was impossible for him to establish discipline. Twice the monks tried to poison him. Finally they attempted to strangle him, and he had to flee for his life. Meanwhile Heloise had moved to the Paracletus, the Monastery of Argenteuil having been closed in 1127: and here Abelard lived for some time; but his stay caused scandal, and he left. For several years — until the conflict with his great adversary, Bernard of Clairveaux, begins — the continuity of his life is lost to us. We only know that John of Salisbury heard him teach in the school on the hill of St. Geneveva, in Paris, in 1136, and that he wrote his autobiography, Historia Calamitatum, during these years.

As a theologian, Abelard was a disciple of Anselm of Canterbury; but being by nature a critic, while Anselm was a mystic, his dialectics drove him on every point beyond the pale of the established faith. The doctrine of the Trinity, which forms the centre of his theology, he always treats in connection with the doctrine of the divine attributes; and, in spite of all the precautions he takes, the Trinity becomes under his hands a mere divine attribute. Very characteristic for his attitude with respect to the Church and the tradition on which it rests is his work Sic et Non. It consists of quotations from the fathers, arranged in harmony with the loci theologici, but contradicting each other at every point, without any solution being offered. At the Council of Sens, 1140, Bernard presented a formal accusation of heresy; and Abelard left the council without defending himself, and appealed directly to the pope. But Bernard wrote himself to the pope, denouncing Arnold of Brescia as one of the champions of Abelard; and Innocent III., now decided against the latter, forbade him to write or teach any more, and ordered his writings to be burnt. By the friendly mediation of Peter Venerabilis, abbot of Clugny, he was allowed to spend the rest of his days in that place. He continued his studies, "read always, prayed frequently, and kept silent." He died (sixty-three years old) on a visit to St. Marcellus, and was buried in the Paracletus. Heloise died May 16, 1164, and her body was laid in the same coffin, beside that of Abelard. They now lie together in the famous tomb at Père-Lachaise, Paris.

LIT. — A complete edition of Abelard's works, philosophical, theological, poetical, and letters, was given by COUSIN, 2 vols., Paris, 1849 and 1859. In Migne's edition: Patrol, vol. 178, the Dialectica and the Sic et Non are lacking. Separately have been published: Epistolæ, by RICHARD RAWLINSON, London, 1718; Historia Calamitatum by ORELLI, Turin, 1841; Sic et Non by HENKE and LINDENKOHL, Marburg, 1851. ABELITES, or ABELONIANS, a sect mentioned by Augustine (De hor. c. 86), lived in the neighborhood of Hippo Regius, in Northern Africa, and consisted merely of country people, but had become extinct at the time when Augustine first heard of them. Their name they derived from Abel, whose example they pretended to follow. They took wives, but their marriages were never consummated. Each couple adopted a boy and a girl, who made a vow to marry each other in the same manner, and to whom they bequeathed their property. They were probably a branch of some older Gnostic sect. HERZOG.

ABELLI, Louis, b. at Vez, France, 1604; d. in Paris 1691; was made bishop of Rhodéz in 1664, but resigned in 1667, and retired to the Convent of St. Lazare. He wrote with great vehemence against the Jansenists: Tradition de l'Eglise touchant le Culte de la Vierge, 1652; Medulla Theologica; Vie de St. Vincent de Paul, etc.

ABEN-EZRA, one of the most celebrated Jewish scholars of the twelfth century, called Ebenare or Evenare by the schoolmen; b. at Toledo in 1088 or 1092; d. in 1167 at Calahorra, on the boundary of Navarre and Catalonia; emigrated from Toledo in 1138; visited Africa, Egypt, Palestine, Bagdad, and perhaps India; taught grammar and languages among the Italian Jews from 1140 to 1155; visited France and London; and settled, in 1160, in Navarre. As a poet, he was complete master of the metrical technics, both in Hebrew and Arabic; but he had no inspiration. As a philosopher, he belonged to the Neo-Platonic school; but he was without originality. But his commentaries on the Pentateuch (1152-53), on Isaiah (1154-55), on the Psalms, Daniel, etc., show a new method, in which grammar and history were made to play a much greater part than they had formerly done. See WOLF: Biblioth. Hebr. Tom. I. pp. 71-86; DE ROSSI: Dizion. storico degli autori Ebrei; ERSCH und GRUBER: Encyklopädie; GRAETZ: Geschichte der Juden, VI. p. 198 sq., and 440 sq. FR. W. SCHULTZ.

ABERCROMBIE, John, b. at Aberdeen Nov. 11, 1781; d. at Edinburgh Nov. 14, 1844; studied medicine at Edinburgh and London; settled in the former city as practical physician, and became in 1835 lord-rector of Marischal College, Aberdeen. In 1830 he published Enquiries concerning the Intellectual Powers, which in 1833 was followed by his Philosophy of the Moral Feelings. The object of these works is to show the important relation which subsists between the science of mind and the doctrines of revealed religion, and both of them ran through a great number of editions.

ABERNETHY, John, b. at Coleraine in Ireland 1680; d. in Dublin 1740; studied theology in Glasgow and Edinburgh, and became minister of the Presbyterian congregation of Antrim 1703, and of that of Wood Street, Dublin, 1717. His participation while in Antrim in the controversy between the Subscribers and the Non-Subscribers, and while in Dublin in that concerning the Test Act, showed him to be a century in advance of his age; and his Tracts were collected and reprinted in later times with considerable effect. A Life of him by DUCHAL is found in the collection of his Sermons. London, 1748-51; 4 vols.

ABI'ATHAR (father of abundance, i.e., liberal), the tenth high priest of the Jews, and fourth in descent from Eli, and the last priest of the house of Ithamar. In consequence of his support of Adonijah, he was deposed by Solomon (1 Kings ii. 27). This act put an end to the double high priesthood,—Abiathar in the party of David, Zadok in the party of Saul,—but also fulfilled the prophecy made to Eli (1 Sam. ii. 31).

ABGARUS, the name, or perhaps the title, of a series of toparchs reigning, during a period of three and a half centuries,—up to A. D. 217,—over Osroëne, the north-western part of Mesopotamia, with the capital of Edessa. Of the fifteenth of these toparchs Eusebius tells (Eccl. Hist. I. 13), that suffering terribly from diseases, and having heard of the miracles of Jesus, he sent a letter to him, professing belief in his Messiahship, and asking him to come to Edessa and help him. To this letter Jesus transmitted an answer, promising, that, since he could not come himself, he would, after his death, send one of his disciples to him. Both these letters Eusebius claims to have found in the archives of Edessa, and to have translated literally from the Syriac text; and he adds, from similar sources, that Thaddeus, one of the seventy, was sent by the apostle Thomas to Edessa, that he cured the king, and preached Christianity, etc. In the fifth century Moses Chorenensis repeats this story in his Hist. Arm. II. 30-33, and adds that Christ sent a portrait of himself to Abgar; that Abgar wrote about Christ to the Emperor Tiberius, to Nerses, King of Assyria, and Ardaches, King of Persia, etc. In the East the truth of these stories was never doubted, nor the genuineness of the letters; and even in the West, though a Roman synod of 494 declared the letters apocryphical (MANSI: Collect. Concil. VIII. 152), both Rome and Genoa still claim to be in possession of the original picture (W. GRIMM: Die Sage vom Ursprung des Christusbildes, Berlin, 1843); and the genuineness of the letters has been defended by WELTE in Tüb. theol. Quartalschrift, 1842, and by F. W. RINCK in Zeitschrift f. d. hist. Theologie, 1843. [See R. A. LIPSIVS: Die edessenische Abgar-Sage. Braunschweig, 1880.] K. SCHMIDT.

ABI'JAH (whose father is Jehovah). The name of several men and of one woman (the mother of Hezekiah, 2 Chron. xxix. 1) mentioned in the Bible. The only one of importance was the second king of Judah, called in Kings Abijah, who succeeded his father Rehoboam (B. C. 959). He only reigned a part of three years, and even in that short period fell from Jehovah to idol worship; nor was his promising attempt to recover the allegiance of the ten tribes followed up as it should have been, and the kingdom grasped firmly (2 Chron. xiii. 16, 20). Lust and idolatry were his ruin.

ABILENE (from Abila). The tetrarchy governed by Lysanias in the time of John the Baptist (Luke iii. 1). It was a small district of Cœle-Syria, upon the eastern slopes of Anti-Lebanon, north-west from Damascus. Abila the capital was on the Barada, and stood in a gorge called Suk Wady Barada, eighteen miles from Damascus. Joseph. Antiq. xviii. 6, 10, xx. 7, 1. B. J.

II. 11, 5. Tradition makes it the death-place of Abel, confounding Abel, a meadow, from which Abila comes, with Hebel, vanity.

ABIMELECH (father of the king). 1. The name of two Philistine kings at Gerar who had similar dealings with Abraham and Isaac and with their wives successively (Gen. xx., xxvi.). "Abimelech" was probably, like Pharaoh among the Egyptians, a title given to their kings.

2. A son of Gideon by his Shechemite concubine. He was proclaimed king by the Shechemites after he had slain his seventy brothers, but at the end of three years was killed by a piece of a millstone while storming Thebez (Judg. ix.).

AB'ISHAQ (source of error). The young Shunammite who nursed the aged David (1 Kings i. 1-4). Adonijah subsequently desired to marry her; but as this was virtually a usurpation, according to Oriental notions, Solomon put him to death (1 Kings ii. 13-25).

ABISHAI (father of a gift). The head of David's "thirty" (2 Sam. xxiii. 19), the eldest son of Zeruah, David's sister, and brother to Joab and Asabel (1 Chron. ii. 16); noted for bravery, and devotion to David. Coming with his brothers unto David while in the Cave of Adullam, he shared all his dangers, and once saved his life (2 Sam. xxi. 17). David appointed him commander of one of the divisions of his army, and he led it successfully against the Edomites (1 Chron. xix. 11), Ammonites, and Syrians (2 Sam. x. 10), against Absalom (2 Sam. xviii. 2), and against Sheba (2 Sam. xx. 6).

ABLON, a village on the left bank of the Seine, twelve miles from Paris, is noticeable as the first place of public worship conceded to the Protestants of Paris. The promulgation of the Edict of Nantes, May 2, 1598, caused great indignation among the Roman Catholics in France, and its execution in detail was accompanied with innumerable intrigues and subterfuges. Thus the Protestants of the capital could obtain no place of public worship within the city itself, but had to travel twelve miles to Ablon, generally by foot, because they were poor people, and often harassed by the railleries and insults of the surrounding Roman-Catholic population. In 1602 they petitioned the king to grant them a place nearer to the city, as, during the winter, forty children had died from being brought so long a distance for baptism; but not until 1606 was their petition granted, and Charenton St. Maurice conceded to them as a place of public Protestant worship. The toilsome and often dangerous "expeditions" to Ablon are often spoken of by Sully and Casaubon.

ABNER (father of light), a cousin of Saul, and commander of his army (1 Sam. xiv. 50 sq.). He proclaimed Ishbosheth, Saul's son, king after Saul's death, and succeeded in getting him recognized by all the tribes except Judah, which vigorously opposed and defeated him (2 Sam. ii. 17). Shortly after this defeat, Ishbosheth reproached Abner with aspiring to the throne because he had taken Rizpah, a concubine of Saul, into his harem (for so this act would be interpreted by Orientals); and Abner in anger abandoned Saul's house, and transferred his powerful assistance to David. Joab feared that David would appoint Abner in his stead commander-in-chief of the army: accordingly he denounced him as a spy, but, failing in this, he deadened his conscience by the plea of revenge for Abner's murder of his brother Asahel, and slew him. David mourned Abner's death, and apparently the people shared his grief (2 Sam. iii.). David solemnly laid the punishment of Joab's deed upon Solomon (1 Kings ii. 6). Abner's tomb is still shown in the courtyard of a house in Hebron.

ABRABANEL or ABARBANEL, Isaac, b. in Lisbon 1437, d. at Venice 1508, descended from a wealthy Jewish family which traced its pedigree back to King David, and distinguished both as statesman and author. He was the financier of Alphonso V. of Portugal, of Ferdinand and Isabella of Spain, of Ferdinand I. and Alphonso II. of Naples; and when in 1503 he moved from Monopoli, where he had lived in retirement since 1496, to Venice, he succeeded in effecting a reconciliation between that republic and Portugal. He wrote commentaries on the Pentateuch, the Prophets, etc., several of which have been translated from Hebrew into Latin. But his most celebrated work is his "Herald of Salvation," an elaborate representation of the Jewish doctrine of the Messiah, first printed in 1526, probably in Saloniki, then in 1644, in Amsterdam, and 1767 in Offenbach, and translated into Latin under the title of Præco Salutis by H. MAY, Francfort, 1712. In this book he gives free vent to his hatred of Christ and Christianity. See WOLF: *Biblioth. ABRAHAM (father of a multitude), originally named A'BRAM (father of elevation), the patriarch honored by Jew, Christian, and Mohammedan as the divinely appointed founder of the true religion. The leading trait in his character was faith in God: hence he is called "the Friend of God," and "the Father of the Faithful." He was the eldest son of Terah, and was born at Ur, a city of the Chaldees, identified with Mugheir on the western shore of the Euphrates, between Babylon and the Persian Gulf. He married Sarai, his half-sister, who was ten years younger than he. Our information about him is derived entirely from Gen. xi. 26, xxv. 10. Philo, Josephus, and other Jewish writers, add nothing reliable. The family was idolatrous: nevertheless it was under divine guidance that they took their journey into Canaan (Gen. xi. 31, xv. 7; Neh. ix. 7), but got no farther than Haran, where Terah died. There God appeared to Abram, and told him to leave Haran, and go to Canaan, where he would be the founder of a great nation. Abram, then seventy-five years old, obeyed, took his childless wife and his nephew Lot, their servants, — a company of some two thousand, — and all their substance, and journeyed to Sichem unto the oak-grove of Moreh. There again God appeared unto him, and promised to give the whole land unto his seed. The outbreak of a famine forced them into Egypt, where Abram greatly increased his possessions, but, to save Sarai from dishonor, denied that she was his wife. He returned to Canaan very rich, but his troubles began at this point. He showed his generosity in the peaceful separation from Lot, and in rescuing him from his enemies (Gen. xiii., xiv.). It was on his return he met that mysterious personage, Melchizedek. Year after year passed, and the faith of Abram in the fulfilment of God's promise that he should have a son was more and more tried, since Sarai remained barren; and yet theophany and sign had declared offspring to be certain. At Sarai's suggestion he took her maid Hagar, an Egyptian, as his concubine; and she bore him a son, Ishmael. He was then eighty-six years old. But Ishmael was not the promised son. At ninety-nine God appeared again to him, and solemnly renewed his promise, and changed his name from Abram to Abraham, and Sarai's (generous) to Sarah (princess). In token of the Lord's sincerity, the rite of circumcision was instituted; and, accordingly, Abraham and Ishmael and all the males of his household were circumcised. The declaration was made by an angel to Sarah, subsequently, who received it doubtfully. At this time the Lord revealed to Abraham the impending destruction of the cities of the plain. The intercession of Abraham (Gen. xviii. 23-33) is one of the most touching on record. But, inasmuch as there were not ten righteous persons in it, Sodom was destroyed. Very probably in consequence of the destruction of those cities, Abraham emigrated unto Gerar, upon the entrance south of Canaan, and there practised the same weak deception as in Egypt. Yet the Lord watched over Sarah; and Abimelech, the King of Gerar, administered to the patriarch a deserved rebuke. The Father of the Faithful does not appear in a very good light. Within a year, when Abraham was a hundred years old, and Sarah ninety years, at last the long-awaited son was born, and called Isaac (laughter). Jealousy between Sarah and Hagar compelled the dismissal of the latter. The plan of God required complete separation between the chosen seed and the world. The final trial to the faith of the patriarch was the severest, — the offering of Isaac (chap. xxii.). By this crowning act of faith Abraham had testified to his belief, not only in God's absolute ownership of all things, that God's commands must be obeyed at all hazards, and implicitly, but also that God's promises would be fulfilled, even though Isaac must be raised from the dead. From this time on, the life of Abraham was peaceful. Sarah died at the age of a hundred and twenty-seven years; and he buried her in the only piece of property he owned, — the Cave of Machpelah, at Hebron, — which he bought of Ephron, the Hittite. On the express solicitation of Abraham, Isaac took a wife from Abraham's kindred. Abraham, by a concubine, Keturah, was the father of six sons; but these were portioned off, and did not share with the Child of the Promise (Gen. xxv. 6). The eyes of the aged patriarch were gladdened by the light of Isaac's sons Esau and Jacob; and it was not until fifteen years after their birth that Abraham, being then a hundred and seventy-five years old, "was gathered to his people" (Gen. xxv. 7, 8). The Old Testament writers recorded no worthier life than his. The facts that to-day there is no more widely spread name, and none held in greater popular reverence, show how important is the sphere he fills in the world's history. Jew and Gentile claim him as ancestor, — the one of the body, the other of the spirit (Rom. iv. 16, 17; Heb. xi. 8 sqq.; Jas. ii. 21). See BEER: Leben Abraham's nach Auffassung der jüdischen Sage, Leipzig, 1859; H. J. TOMKINS: Studies on the Times of Abraham, London, 1878.

ABRAHAM'S BOSOM. "To lie in Abraham's bosom" was a Jewish phrase for felicity in paradise, because it implied nearness to the great Father of the Faithful (Luke xvi. 19-31).

ABRAHAM-A-SANCTA-CLARA, b. at Kreenheinstetten, in the Grand Duchy of Baden, June 2, 1644, d. in Vienna Dec. 1, 1709; the son of an inn-keeper, and baptized Ulrich Megerle, but educated first by the Jesuits of Ingolstadt, and then by the Benedictines of Salzburg; entered the order of the Barefoot Augustines in 1662, and, with a short exception, he resided from 1668 to his death in Vienna, where he preached in the Church of the Augustines, always to crowded audiences. He was an orator of the very first rank. His publications consist, besides Judas der Erzschem, of a series of sermons in four volumes, 1686-95, and Grammatica Religiosa, 1691, a representation of the moral system of the Roman-Catholic Church, mostly of pamphlets written upon some occasion; as, for instance, Die grosse Totenbruderschaft, 1680, when the plague reigned; Auf, Auf ihr Christen, 1683, when the Turks approached; Gack-Gack, 1684, for pilgrims, Etwas für Alle, 1698; Heilsames Gemisch-Gemisch, 1704, etc. These publications show that the author was neither a great writer nor a great theologian; but they also show that he was possessed of a peculiar off-hand and artless but captivating and almost irresistible eloquence, and a great wit. A complete edition of his works does not exist. See S. TH. G. VON KARAJAN: Abraham a Sancta Clara, Vienna, 1867; SCHERER: Vorträge und Aufsätze, Berlin, 1874; H. ABRAHAMITES. I. A branch of the Paulicians (which see). II. A deistic sect which arose in Bohemia in the latter part of the eighteenth century, professing the faith of Abraham before his circumcision, accepting the doctrines of one God and the immortality of the soul, and of the Scriptures, the Decalogue, and the Lord's Prayer. As their children were not allowed to be educated in the faith of the parents, the sect died out in the same generation in which it arose.

ABRAXAS is a word with a mystic meaning, arbitrarily formed by combining together those letters of the Greek alphabet, which, when considered according to their numerical value, and added together, give the sum of 365.¹ This word was first applied by the Gnostic Basilides as the name of the Supreme Being of the universe, the God of the 365 heavens, the Divine Source of the 365 emanations, of which Basilides pretended to know something. Now the name is generally given to every kind of symbolical representation of Gnostic ideas, such as were produced in great masses in the form of gems, or images engraved on metal, or inscriptions in Greek, Coptic, etc., on stones, metal tablets, etc., with and without pictorial additions, from the second down to the thirteenth century.

The character most frequently occurring in these representations, the Abraxas image proper, shows the head of a cock connected with two serpent tails as legs by means of a body in armor, a whip in one hand, and a shield in the other. According to scholars who have devoted themselves to the study of Gnostic archæology, this figure represents the totality of cosmic intellectual forces, watching over that which is pure in the world, and leading it triumphantly through life back into the source of all purity. Often this figure, the central symbol of Basilidian wisdom, is combined with other figures symbolizing other Gnostic ideas derived from Jewish, Egyptian, or Greek sources. Often, also, the symbolical representation is confined to a mere oval, formed by a serpent, and combined with some more or less unintelligible inscription.

The Abraxas literature is very heavy. The study, however, is of psychological rather than historical interest: the question what such symbols mean is of less interest than that how people ever came to think that such symbols could mean any thing. The subject was first taken up by JEAN CHIFLET: Macarii Abraxas seu de Gemmeis Basilidianis, Antw., 1657. It was then treated by CAPELLO: Prodromus Iconicus Sculptarum, Gemmarum, Venice, 1702; MONTFAUCON: L'Antiquité Expliquée, Paris, 1722; PASSERIO: Thesaurus Gemmarum, Florence, 1750; BELLERMANN: Die Gemmen der Alten mit dem Abraxasbilde, Berlin, 1817-19; WALSH: Ancient Coins, London, 1823; MATTER: Histoire de Gnosticisme, Paris, 1828.

ABSALOM (father of peace), third son of David, remarkable for his abundant hair and great personal beauty; murdered his brother Amnon in revenge of the latter's violation of Tamar, his sister (cf. 2 Sam. xiii., xiv. 32), and then fled to Talmai, King of Geshur, his mother's father, with whom he staid three years. By Joab's stratagem David was induced to recall his son, but it was two years thereafter before his father admitted him to his presence (2 Sam. xiv.). The re-instated son abused his father's generosity, and employed his pleasing arts to corrupt the people. When he thought himself sufficiently strong, he gathered his followers at Hebron, and there proclaimed himself king. David made no resistance at first, gave up Jerusalem; but at length the opposing forces met, and Absalom's army was defeated, and he, contrary to David's express order, was killed by Joab as he hung suspended by his head from an oak. The mourning of David is one of the most touching episodes in history (2 Sam. xvii. 33). It was during his brief period of glory that he reared his pillar in the king's dale to keep his name in remembrance (2 Sam. xviii. 18). The so-called "Absalom's tomb" in the Kedron valley was erected much later.

ABSALON, or AXEL, b. in the Island of Sealand 1128, d. in the Convent of Sorce, 1201; studied in Paris, and was appointed Bishop of Roskilde 1158, and Archbishop of Lund, that is, primate of the three Scandinavian countries, 1178. He was a great warrior; conquered the Island of Rügen, and established successful missionary stations among the Wends. He was also a patron of learning: on his instigation Saxo Grammaticus wrote his history of Denmark in elegant Latin.

ABSOLUTION. The canonists of the Latin Church distinguish five kinds of absolution: 1. Baptism, because it is "a washing in the laver of regeneration,"—a cleansing from sin; 2. The Eucharist; 3. The Word and Doctrine, the declaration of the terms on which reconciliation and salvation are granted to mankind; 4. Intercession and Prayer; 5. Reconciliation to the Church, which was given after canonical penance. The last is accompanied by an imposing service, being performed before the people gathered for worship, and immediately before the Eucharist. The person absolved had been guilty of some great sin; and if a priest was deposed, and if a layman was disqualified, although after absolution, he was admitted to the Lord's Supper. There is also absolution for the dead,—prayers for delivery of souls from purgatory pronounced after the celebration of mass for the deceased.

The Roman Church gives the power to absolve from sins to the priests as the ministers of Jesus Christ. The Greek Church makes account of the act of the priest. So while the former uses the indicative form of absolution,—“I absolve thee,”—the latter uses the deprecatory,—“Christ absolve thee.” The Church of England is now divided in opinion; but probably the dominant view is, that the so-called absolution is a mere authoritative statement that God will absolve all who repent. See CONFESSION.

ABSTINENCE differs from fasting, in that not all food, but some particular kind, mostly meat, is abstained from. The objects of abstinence have usually been marriage, flesh, or wine. The non-use of the latter has given the phrase “total abstinence,” which is a much more truthful description than “temperance” for what is aimed at. There is no virtue in abstinence; it is a negative thing: there is virtue in moderate use of the gifts of God. See FASTING.

ABUKARA. See THEODORUS ABUKARA.

ABULFARAJ (Bar Hebræus), b. at Malatia in Cappadocia, 1226; d. at Maragha in Adharbaidshan; the son of a Jewish physician, who had embraced Jacobitism; was appointed Bishop of Gubos in 1246, Bishop of Aleppo in 1247, and Maphrian, or Primate of the Jacobites in Chaldæa, Assyria, and Mesopotamia, in 1266. Of his numerous works have been published: Chronicon Syriacum, in Syriac and Latin, the Civil Chronicle by P. I. Bruns and G. W. Kirsch, Leipzig, 1788; and the Ecclesiastical Chronicle by J. B. Abbe-loos and Th. J. Lancy, Louvains, 1872; Historia compendiosa Dynastiarum, in Arabic and Latin,—an extract of the above work by E. Pocock, Oxford, 1663; a Syriac grammar, a liturgy, and several minor pieces in Wiseman: Horæ Syriacæ, and Bernstein: Chrestomathia Syriaca.

ABYSSINIAN CHURCH. Ethiopia was in antiquity a geographical name of rather vague signification, comprising Nubia, Sennaar, and Abyssinia. These lands, while they were Christian, formed the Ethiopian Church. At present Christianity is confined to the plateau and mountain-regions of Abyssinia; and thus the Abyssinian Church of our time represents the Ethiopian Church of antiquity.

Native tradition ascribes the name of the country and the foundation of the state to Ethiops, the son of Cush, the son of Ham, who settled in the old capital of Axum in the present Province of Tigre. After centuries of Paganism, the visit of the Queen of Sheba to Solomon led to the conversion of the people to Judaism. She bore a son to Solomon, Menilek, who was educated in Jerusalem by his father. When Menilek returned to Axum, he brought along with him, not only a number of Jewish priests, but also the ark, which was carried away from the Temple of Jerusalem, and deposited in the Ethiopian capital; and from that time, down to our day, Abyssinia has been ruled by a Solomonic dynasty; the succession having been broken only now and then by usurpers and conquerors. Of course, all this is mere fable. At the time of the introduction of Christianity, rank heathenism prevailed throughout the country; and the custom of circumcision, practised together with baptism, may have been introduced from Egypt. A Jewish immigration must, nevertheless, have taken place, as is proved by the presence in the country of a great number of Jews, the so-called Falashas; but the time, manner, and magnitude of this immigration, cannot be ascertained.

During the reign of Constantine the Great, about 330, Frumentius and Ædesius came incidentally to Ethiopia, and began to preach Christianity. Ædesius afterwards returned to Tyre; but Frumentius continued the work, went to Alexandria, where Athanasius occupied the patriarchal see, obtained missionary co-workers from him, and was himself consecrated bishop, and head of the Ethiopian Church, under the title of Abba Salâna, "father of peace," which title is still in use, together with the later one Abûna, "our father." Thus the Ethiopian Church was established in close relation to the Egyptian; and the Abyssinian Church of our time still stands as a branch of the Coptic. In the fifth and sixth centuries the Ethiopian mission received a new impulse by the immigration of a number of monks from Upper Egypt. They brought monasticism along with them, and the legends and worship of saints. Also the Ethiopian translation of the Bible seems to belong to this time, though a tradition ascribes the translation of the New Testament to Frumentius, and parts of the Old Testament are said to have been brought from Jerusalem by Menilek. [See further under Bible Versions A. VI. Ethiopic.] The Ethiopian Bible, however, has not exercised any great influence on the Christian growth of the people; for the Ethiopian language, a tongue of Shemitic origin, by the Abyssinians called Geez, that is, "original speech," was already at that time completely superseded by Amharic, a dialect which arose in the Southern Province of Amhara, and is much mixed up with African elements. At present Ethiopian is an entirely dead language, used only in the Church, and studied only by the priests; but most of them can only read it without understanding it. In the Abyssinian Church, Ethiopic plays the same part as Coptic in the Egyptian Church.

The close connection between the Abyssinian and Coptic churches is very apparent in the sphere of doctrines. Like the Coptic, the Abyssinian Church holds a purely monophysitic view of the person of Christ. But, while this question has been settled long ago for the whole rest of the Christian Church, here it is still debated under the form of a double or triple birth of Christ, and gives rise to violent controversies. Indeed, in spite of the spiritual barrenness and ecclesiastical petrification of the Abyssinian Church, these controversies have, nevertheless, caused such enmities, that both Theodorus and Joannes of Tigre have reaped considerable advantages from them in their plans against Shoa. Also the questions of the person and dignity of Mary, — whether she really bore God, or only was the mother of Jesus; whether she is entitled to the same worship as Christ, etc., — are eagerly debated, though it seems to be the general view that an almost divine worship is due to the Virgin; that she and the saints are indispensable mediators between Christ and man; that the saints, who died not for their own sins, died for the sins of others, etc.

The Abyssinian canon, called Semanja Ahâda, "eighty-one," because it consists of eighty-one sacred books, comprises, besides the sixty-five books of our canon, the Apocrypha, the Epistles of Clement, and the Synodus; that is, the decrees of the Apostolic Council of Jerusalem. See W. FELL: Canones Apostolorum Æthiopicæ, Lips., 1871. Only a very slight difference, however, is made between this canon and some other works of ecclesiastical literature, — the Didascalia or Apostolical Constitutions, the Haimanot-Abo, giving quotations from the councils and the Fathers, the writings of the Eastern Fathers, Athanasius, Cyril, and Chrysostom, and the Feltha-Nagast, the royal law-book. On the whole, the tradition of the Church has the same authority as the Scriptures. Of the councils, only those before the Council of Chalcedon (451) are recognized, because at Chalcedon the monophysite heresy was condemned. The Apostles' Creed is unknown: the Nicene is used. At the head of the Church stands the Abûna, who resides in Gondar. He is appointed by the Coptic patriarch of Cairo; and, according to a law from the twelfth century, no Abyssinian, but only a Copt, can become Abûna. He alone has the right to anoint the king, and to ordain priests and deacons. Both in secular and in ecclesiastical things he has a great power; and his favor or disfavor may be of importance to the king himself. The duties of the priests consist in celebrating divine service three or four times a day, purifying houses, utensils, and tools, etc. The priests, as well as the monks and the scholars, take the Lord's Supper every morning fasting. The deacons perform all the subordinate business, baking bread for the Lord's Supper, cleaning the church and the sacred vessels, etc. They dare not enter the Holy of holies, where stands the ark. The Deberas, the teachers, are not ordained, nor are the Alakas, to whom is intrusted the whole administrations of the Church. Beside the secular clergy stands the monastic clergy, under the head of the Eish'égé, who ranks next to the Abûna, and decides many ecclesiastical and theological questions in common with him. The number of monks and nuns living after the rule of Pachomius, is very great. The principal monasteries are those of Debra Damino (where nearly three hundred monks live together in small huts), Axum, Abba Garima, Waldubba, Debra Libanos, and St. Stephan. The church-buildings are exceedingly numerous in Abyssinia, generally small, low, circular structures, with a conical roof of thatch and four doors, one towards each of the cardinal points. An outer court surrounds the building, occupied during service by the laymen, and often serving at night as a place of refuge to forlorn travellers. The interior, dirty and neglected, but overloaded with frightfully bad pictures of the Virgin and the saints, the angels, and the Devil, is divided into two apartments,—the holy for the priests and deacons, and the Holy of holies, where stands the ark. This ark is the principal object in the whole church. Neither the deacons nor laymen dare touch it: if they do, the church and the adjacent cemetery become unclean, and must be purified. Service consists of singing of psalms, recitals of parts of the Bible and Liturgy, and prayers, especially to the Virgin and the wonder-working saints: it is undignified and unedifying. Of sacraments, the Church numbers two; but the language lacks the word, and with the word also the idea seems to have become lost. Beside the Christian Sunday, also the Jewish sabbath is kept: in all, one hundred and eighty holidays are celebrated. In the discipline, fasting plays a prominent part. There are in all two hundred fast-days; but they are not kept. For a small compensation, the priest undertakes to do penance for somebody else.

Not all the inhabitants of Abyssinia belong to the State Church or to Christianity. The Zalanés, a nomadic tribe, consider themselves to be Jews, and keep aloof from the Christians, though by travellers they are described as being really good Christians. The Chamantes are baptized, and have Christian priests; but in reality they are nearly Pagans, and celebrate many thoroughly Pagan rites. The real Jews, the Falashas, live along the northern shore of the great lake Tsanaa, in the neighborhood of Gondar and Shelga, where they pursue agriculture and trade. They are more industrious than the Christians, but also more ignorant, and spiritually more forlorn. The Mohammedans make about one-tenth of the whole population, and Mohammedanism is slowly but steadily progressing. In order to distinguish themselves from all non-Christians, the Christians receive at baptism a cord of blue silk or cotton, called mateb, which they always wear around the neck.

The first missionary work which the Western Church undertook in Abyssinia was the Jesuit mission of 1555, which labored there for nearly a century; but, as everywhere else, the missionary activity of the Jesuits was deeply mixed up with the politics of the country, and their sole purpose seems to have been to establish there the authority of the Roman-Catholic Church. At last they reached the goal. After a frightful massacre of the opposite party, King Sasneos declared the Roman-Catholic Church the Church of the State; but in 1640 the Jesuits, with their Roman archbishop, were compelled to leave the country, and the old religion with its old Church was re-established. With the new Abûna who followed after this Roman-Catholic interregnum, Peter Heyling, from Lübeck, a Protestant missionary, came into the country; but his great zeal led only to small result. The Anglican Missionary Society had more success in the first half of this century. The circumstance that a pious Abyssian monk, Abi-Ruch or Abreka, translated the whole Bible in the Amharic language (1808-18) gave the first occasion to this attempt. The British and Foreign Bible Society bought and printed the translation, and in 1830 the missionaries Gobat and Kugler were sent to Abyssinia. These men were succeeded in 1837 by Isenberg and Krapf; but the work was partly spoiled by the opposition of the native priests and the intrigues of some newly-arrived Roman-Catholic missionaries. In 1858 a Coptic priest who had frequented the school of a Protestant missionary in Alexandria, and favored the Protestant mission, became Abûna, and the St. Chrischona Society of Basel now sent a number of Protestant missionaries into the country. They labored with considerable success; but the disturbances of the reign of King Theodore overtook them, and almost destroyed their work. They were thrown into prison, and only released by the victory of the British. Since that time, no missionary attempt has been made in Abyssinia. See ABBÛNA.

M. LÜTTKE.
ACACIUS. I. Bishop of Cæsarea, a disciple and the successor of Eusebius, d. 363; one of the leaders of the Arian party, and as such deposed by the synods of Antioch (341) and Seleucia (359); fell out with the radical fraction of the party, and gathered a large number of followers. The Acacians, who, though denying the sameness, accepted the likeness of substance, between the Father and the Son, subscribed finally to the Nicene symbol. A fragment of his work against Marcellus of Ancyra is found in Epiphanius: Hær. 72, 5. 39.

II. Patriarch of Constantinople since 471; d. 488; persuaded the emperor Zeno to issue the Henotikon, by which was brought about a reconciliation with the Monophysites, but was for this very reason excommunicated by Felix, the Bishop of Rome, nunquam anathematis vinculis exuendus, whereby a schism was occasioned between the Eastern and the Western churches.

III. Bishop of Beroea, b. 422, d. 436, was one of Chrysostom's bitterest enemies, and was present at the council ad Quercum (403), which deposed him. In the controversy between Nestorius and Cyril he tried to mediate. Three of his letters—two to Alexander of Hierapolis, and one to Cyril—are given by BALUZIUS in Nov. Coll. Concil. c. XVII., XII., LV. IERZOG.

ACCEPTANTS is the name of that party which in the Jansenist controversy accepted the bull Unigenitus. See JANSENISM.

ACCESS. I. In the Liturgy of the Roman Church, a collection of prayers preparatory to the celebration of mass; in the Liturgy of the Church of England, a prayer falling between the consecration and the communion.

II. In canon law a form of electioneering; the minority changing their votes, and conferring them on the candidate of the majority by an accedo domino, in order to give him the number of votes necessary to election.

ACCOLTI, Peter, generally known as the Cardinal of Bologna, b. in Florence, 1497, d. there in 1549; was apostolical abbreviator under Leo X., and drew up the famous Bull of 1520 against Luther. Under Clement VII. he was made a cardinal; but under Paul III. he was arraigned for peculation, and imprisoned in San Angelo. He paid an enormous sum in order to be released, but left, nevertheless, a large fortune to his three children. Some poems by him are found in Carmina Ill. Poetarum Ital. Florence, 1562. Vol. I.

ACCOMMODATION, a theological term meaning in its broad sense an ethical notion, and, in its narrow, a certain exegetical method prevalent from the second half of the eighteenth century to the second quarter of the nineteenth. An accommodation in the theological sense is demanded by ethics whenever a person's circumstances, or the condition of his feelings, render him incompetent to understand the whole truth. God must lessen his pace if he would keep step with man. He must also keep back part of the truth while we are babes in Christ, or else dilute it to our weakness. This was the method of Christ (John xvi. 12) and of Paul (Heb. vi. 1). The gospel preached is, of course, always the same: the manner of presenting it differs; and the preacher has abundant opportunities to exercise his judgment in accommodating the truth to his hearers. The goal is the whole truth, the complete revelation. Consequently, by all appropriate means, by illustrations and examples, by arguments and explanations, he leads his flock to the fuller and fuller revelation of God, until, if he is faithful, he has taught his people knowledge. This is the moral accommodation, sanctioned by the highest practice, and confirmed by the widest experience. But there is an immoral kind: this is, not the gradual unfoldment, but the actual concealment, of the truth. The preacher, either by silence gives assent unto error, or else directly inparts what is wrong. Experience shows that great patience is requisite with young converts who come from heathenism into Christianity. They require lenient dealing, for they carry over into their new relations the faults of the former state. But the success of Christ and of Paul in similar positions to the missionary's to-day shows that the gradual growth of Christian knowledge will correct all errors.

A quite different matter is the accommodation of the material of preaching so as to get rid of or greatly lessen the supernatural element of Scripture. The easy-going rationalism of the last century declared that many things in the Bible were figurative, mere accommodations to human understanding. Thus Zachariä, in his Essay upon the Condescension of God toward Man, published in 1763, explains the epiphanies of the Old Testament, the covenants of the Old and New Testament, the incarnation, in short, all the facts of revelation, as "accommodations." And, the more Christianity lost its hold upon the theologians through this kind of talk, the more eager were their answers to the question, How many of the Bible statements are accommodations? Their voices are heard arguing the matter in the opening years of this century, but die away as the school of Strauss makes itself known. Its method is shorter, more decisive, and apparently more reverential. It says, "The facts you cannot accept because they are supernatural, you need not trouble yourselves about. We have discovered that the writings in which they are found are not genuine. Thus we have vindicated God from the charge of deceiving you, for he simply did not inspire the irrational statements." As we look at the throng who are rapidly retreating before the "critical school," we see that in general they are those who are desirous to do away with all biblical statements which clash with (their) reason, but at the same time do not want to attack directly the authority of Scripture. In this fashion they did away with the Messianic Prophecies,—these Jesus applied to himself merely to induce the Jews to believe in his Messiahship, although he did not himself (!); with the doctrine of angels and demons,—Jesus and the Bible-writers merely employed the current talk; the doctrine of the atonement,—a condescension to popular ideas in order to console the Jews for the loss of the sacrificial worship. It should be said, however, that not all the theologians were thus madly undermining the faith. Such men as Hauff (1788), Gess (1797), and others, fought against the theory as destructive of the Church, and it is now universally condemned. It is, however, an unquestionable fact that the Bible-writers use the popular speech in regard to natural objects; for they say, "the sun rises;" also the conduct of Paul in circumcising Timothy (Acts xvi. 1-3), and in taking the vow at Jerusalem (xxi. 17-26), was an accommodation. But this use of language, and this prudent, conciliatory conduct, did no injury: indeed, by these means the cause of truth was advanced. RUDOLF HOFMANN.

ACEPHALI, from the Greek a and κεφαλή, without head or chief, a term applied to certain ecclesiastical parties, as, for instance, to that which, at the Council of Ephesus, would follow neither Cyril nor John of Antioch; and to that which separated from the patriarch of Alexandria when he signed the Henotikon; and others.

ACHERY, Jean Luc d', b. at St. Quentin 1609; d. in Paris, April 29, 1685; was educated by the Benedictines; entered their order in 1632, and was appointed librarian at St. Germain des Prés, in Paris, 1640, the principal seat of the congregation of St. Maur, in which position he achieved his great work as a collector and editor of the Acta Sanctorum Ordinis S. Benedicti, 9 vols., Paris, 1668-1701, with prefaces and notes by Mabillon; Veterum aliquot Scriptorum Spicilegium, 13 vols., Paris, 1655-77, enlarged by Baluze, Martène, and La Barre in 1723; and Lanfranc's Opera Omnia, ACHTERFELDT, Johann Heinrich, b. at Wesel 1788; d. at Bonn 1864; ordained priest in 1813; was appointed professor of theology at Braunschweig in 1817, and at Bonn in 1826. After the death of Hermes, he was the head of the Hermesian school; and when the system of the school was condemned by the pope, and he refused to comply, he was discharged. Since 1832 he was the editor of the Zeitschrift für Philosophie und katholische Theologie, the organ of the Hermesian school.

ACOMETAE, from the Greek ἀκοίμητα, the "sleepless" or "unresting," an order of monks established in the East in the middle of the fifth century, and named from the circumstance that in its monasteries the members were divided into six choirs, which alternately kept up the work of prayer and praise without intermission day and night. Their principal seat was in Constantinople, in the celebrated monastery, Studium, so called after its founder Studias, a Roman noble. But also in the Western Church they found imitators; and in the beginning of the sixth century they were established in the Abbey of St. Maurice of Aganne in Valois, by the Burgundian king, Sigismund.

ACOLYTHS, from the Greek ἀκόλυθοι, "followers." The first of the four minor orders in the ancient Church originated in the beginning of the third century, but was, as a distinct order, confined to the Western Church, the name being applied in the Eastern to the order of sub-deacons. The duties of the acolyth consisted principally in lighting the tapers in the church, whence the name of accensorius, and attending the officiating priest with wine for the eucharist. See Concil. Carth. IV., a 298. can. 6. Originally the order of acolyth, like those of exorcist, reader, and doorkeeper, was considered a preliminary step to the sacred order of deacon; but in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries it became customary to confer all the four minor orders at once, and to release the thus ordained from the discharge of the duties of the office, for which lay-clerks were employed. The Council of Trent protested against this custom, but its canons were never enforced.

ACOSTA, Uriel or Gabriel, b. at Porto 1594; d. at Amsterdam 1647; belonged to a noble family of Jewish descent, but Christian confession, and was educated in the Roman-Catholic faith. In his twenty-fifth year, however, he held all the specifically Christian dogmas in doubt; and, as a conversion from Christianity to Judaism was an impossibility in Portugal, he fled to Amsterdam, where he was circumcised, and admitted to the synagogue. But he soon felt disappointed; and after the publication, in 1623, of his Examen de tradicoens Pharisæas conferidas con a ley escripta, he was excommunicated from the synagogue, and arraigned before the court as an atheist. He was condemned to imprisonment, fined, his book was burnt, and he remained for seven years under the ban of the synagogue, from which he was released only by doing or undergoing a humiliating penance: he was beaten in the synagogue and trampled upon at the door. He left an autobiography: Exemplar Vitæ Humanæ.

ACTA MARTYRUM and ACTA SANCTORUM are collections of biographies from the early Christian Church, the former recording the lives only of martyrs, properly speaking: the latter also of saints; that is, persons who, though they did not gain the crown of martyrdom, served the cause with heroic courage and self-denial.

The Acta Martyrum begin with the persecutions, the earliest being reports, in the forms of letters sent from one congregation to another, of the hardships suffered and the courage evinced. Thus the congregation of Smyrna announced the martyrdom of many of its members, and finally that of its old bishop, Polycarp, during the persecutions under Marcus Aurelius, 167, in a letter to Philadelphia in Lydia (Euseb. Hist. Eccl. IV., 15). The congregations of Lugdunum and Vienna communicated the hardships they suffered under the same emperor in 177, to the Christians of Asia and Phrygia (Ib. V. 1). Dionysius of Alexandria reported the history of the martyrs of the place to Fabian of Antioch (Ib. VI. 41, 42), etc. Of these reports, however, none survived the persecutions under Diocletian, his plan being to destroy all copies, not only of the Bible, but of any book dear to the Christians (Arnob. Adv. Nation. IV., 36; Euseb., Hist. Eccl., VIII. 2). Nevertheless, as soon as the persecutions ceased, and Christianity became victorious, in the reign of Constantine, the old lives of martyrs were re-written; and, as people looked upon these lives as the record of the heroic age of the Church, great zeal was bestowed upon the task. Eusebius wrote his report on the martyrs of Palestine as an appendix to the eighth book of his Hist. Eccl., and also a general history of the martyrs of the whole Church, which latter work he mentions himself, but which, at the end of the sixth century, could not be found, and seems to have been lost. After his time, the subject continued to be cultivated, and that in a twofold manner: first in a meagre form, simply for liturgical purposes, the so-called Calendaria; and then in a more elaborate form, for the purpose of edification, the so-called Passiones or Gesta martyrum.

Of catalogues of martyrs, Calendaria, made for some special church, and giving the names of the martyrs for the respective days of the calendar, several specimens are still extant. The Jesuit Ægidius Bucherius found one in Rome belonging to the Roman Church, and dating from the fourth century (RUINART: Act. Sincera. Mart., p. 541). The number of saints annotated is very small, however; the first part containing only twelve days commemorating Roman bishops, and the second twenty-five commemorating other martyrs. A Calendarium belonging to the Church of Carthage, and dating from the fifth century, was discovered by Mabillon, and numbers eighty-one days of commemoration. Such Calendaria as were destined for the use of some special church gave only the names of those martyrs who had suffered within the diocese or neighborhood of the church; but soon these Calendaria were combined, and formed into a real Martyrologium; that is, a catalogue of martyrs comprising the whole church. Such a Martyrologium, used in the Roman Church at the close of the sixth century, is described by Gregory I. (Epist. VIII., 19). It contains only the names of the martyrs arranged according to the days on which they were celebrated in the mass, and the day and place of the passion, without any further description; but for each day several saints from various countries and provinces are mentioned, and thereby the character of the Calendarium is changed into that of the Martyrologium.

The existence of the other kind of compilations, which, for the sake of edification, gave elaborate narratives and descriptions, we learn from the Council of Carthage, 397, which in its can. 47 (BRUNS: Concil. I., p. 133) grants that readings may be made not only from the Scriptures, but, on the days of commemorations, also from the Passiones Martyrum. A Council of Rome, 494 (MANSI: Concil. VIII., p. 149), showed more discrimination, and forbade the reading of the Acta Martyrum in the churches, because the names of the authors were not known, and because infidels, heretics, and idiotæ had brought much superfluous and improper matter into the texts. The leaders of the monks, however, recommended these books; as, for instance, Cassiodorus (De Inst. Div. Lit., c. 32) and Ferreolus of Uzès (Regul. c. 18), and even in Rome the critical cautiousness gradually passed away. In a letter in defence of the seventh synod (MANSI: Concil. VII., p. 800) Adrian I. tells us that not only the Bible, but also the Vitæ Patrum, as far as they were written by orthodox authors, were read in the Church.

Besides these two kinds of Acta Martyrum, the Calendarium for liturgical, and the Passiones for devotional purposes, there developed a new branch of ecclesiastical literature, the so-called Acta Sanctorum,—more or less reliable works by known authors, on men remarkable in the history of the Church, written principally for a purely literary purpose. Both the Greek and the Latin churches possess considerable collections of the kind. In the beginning, these Acta Sanctorum showed a meagre and statistical character similar to that of the Calendaria; but in the ninth century an entirely different treatment of the whole subject was introduced,—a treatment which paid no regard to historical truth, but transformed and invented facts in the most arbitrary manner. Thus began the era of the legend which treated religious subjects in exactly the same manner as the romance of the day treated worldly subjects; that is, as mere vehicles for the eccentricities and extravagancies of the imagination. A special encouragement this kind of writing found in the wish manifested almost by every country and every city to show an apostle, or at least an apostle-disciple, as founder of its church. Paris, with its St. Dionysius, led the way; and in Germany biographies were written of St. Eucharius, Valerius, and Maternus, who, on the command of St. Peter, went to the Rhine-regions to found the churches of Treves, Cologne, and Tongern. In many cases also doctrinal purposes came into play, and then the composition generally sinks into open fraud and lie. The biography of Suidbert, the apostle of the Bractereans (LEIBNITZ: Script. rer. Brunsvic. II. p. 222), gives a striking instance.

With the revival of the study of classical literature, criticism awakened, and the time of the legend was over. Only in a critical and historical form the history of the saints could vindicate itself, and collections edited with a regard to these new demands appeared in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. They were all excelled, however, by that of the Bollandists: Acta Sanctorum quotquot Toto Orbe coluntur, of which sixty-one volumes folio, with supplement, have appeared. Antwerp., 1643 sqq.—Paris, 1875. See BOLLANDISTS. Numerous collections have also been made for special purposes. Thus for the separate orders; MABILLON: *Act. Sanct. Ord. ACTS OF THE APOSTLES. The similarity of opening, of style, and of language satisfactorily demonstrate that the third Gospel and the Acts are by the same author. A tradition from the earliest times assigns them both to the physician Luke. For a time this unity of authorship was disputed by the Tübingen school, but to-day it is almost universally acknowledged.

It is unfortunate that the Acts should be so called, as the title does not describe the book, which deals almost exclusively with Peter and Paul,—with Peter for the first twelve chapters, with Paul after that. Dr. Plumptre would call it Origenes Ecclesie. The word acts is, however, used in the sense of "memoirs" or "biographies." The object of the work is to trace the history of the gospel from the ascension of Christ to the imprisonment of Paul in Rome, or from the beginning of the earthly kingdom of Christ in the capital of Judaism to the time when the Church took hold in the capital of the world. This will the more clearly appear when we analyze the book. It may be divided into three parts. I. (Chap. i. 4–viii. 2). The success of the gospel in Jerusalem. Pentecost with its miracle, a day of large ingathering. The new Christian community not separated from the surrounding Judaism, except in its belief in Jesus as the Messiah, characterized by a remarkable community of good and brotherly love. The ordination of deacons. The preaching of Stephen, which involves the early Church in conflict with her deadly foes. II. (Chap. viii. 3–xv. 33). Dispersion of the disciples consequent upon the persecution under Saul's leadership. The apostles remain together, and quietly continue their superintendence. Philip evangelizes Samaria. Saul the persecutor miraculously converted on the road to Damascus. Peter, cured of prejudice by a vision, preaches the gospel to the Pagan Cornelius and his friends. The gospel spread into Phenice, Cyprus, and Antioch. Barnabas sent to seek Saul. James the brother of John beheaded by Herod Agrippa I. Peter, arrested by the same, miraculously released. The first great missionary journey of Paul and Barnabas. The Apostolic Council of Jerusalem. Results: the Mosaic law not laid upon Gentile Christians, the conversion of the Gentiles perceived to be the intention of God. Thus the formation of Gentile Christianity was not the revolutionary and violent act of Paul, but the natural and irresistible consequence of the progress of the gospel, and as such is accepted by the mother-church in Jerusalem. III. (Chap. xv. 34-end). Paul and Barnabas propose to go upon another missionary journey, but differ and separate. Luke follows the fortunes of Paul only from this point. Paul traverses Galatia, Asia Minor, Macedonia, and Greece, on to Corinth, where he stays in each place visited, establishing a church, or at least collecting a nucleus for future work. After a flying visit to Antioch, Paul fixes for two years his residence in Ephesus. At last he goes to Jerusalem, although warned; is there arrested, taken as a prisoner to Cæsarea, thence after two years to Rome; almost shipwrecked on the way. Conference with the Jews there. Luke abruptly terminates his book by Paul's declaration that the gospel which the Jews rejected will be accepted by the Gentiles. The book's end in this fashion does not necessarily imply that another volume was in Luke's mind: rather are we to see the completion of his plan, which was to show to Theophilus, at the first instance, how ill founded were the insinuations and attacks of the Judaizers against Paul, how true were the liberal doctrines he had received, and that Paul was always in harmony with the other apostles of Christ and the majority of the primitive church. But this intention of the book is very different from thorough-going apology. There is no warrant for the opinion that there was in the apostolic Church a division into Pauline and Petrine parties; although it is true that there were Judaizers who opposed Paul, and that in Corinth there was strife. That Luke, while noting these, does not go into particulars, was because his object was different. But this is quite another thing from the theory held by the followers of Baur and Zeller, that the sole object of the Acts is to clear up difficulties, and heal disputes; and to this end all opposing facts are carefully omitted, e.g., the blaming of Peter at Antioch, related in Gal. ii.¹ If this were so, then the Acts is not history, but special pleading. The door is open to the wildest speculation as to the character of the facts omitted. Paul, as well as Peter, loses by such supposed suppression.

These ideas about the Acts are modern. The ancient Church had no doubt of its authenticity and genuineness and consequent canonicity. The sects which rejected it did so from dogmatic motives. And yet, although acknowledged, it was little used. Of this Chrysostom complains. This came from its position in the canon, between the Gospels and the Apostles, i.e., Epistles and Apocalypse. In the ancient and mediæval Church it was considered as the first chapter of church history; but at the Renaissance the lacunæ in the sequence of events were remarked, and that the history did not concern much else than Peter and Paul. Grotius considered it to be the parallel biographies of the two founders of Christianity. The free handling of the book may be said to have begun with Schneckenburger, professor at Bern, who in 1841 published his Ueber den Zweck der Apostelgeschichte, and advocated the theory that the author drew a parallel between Peter and Paul, matching every discourse and miracle of Peter in the first part by a discourse and miracle of Paul in the second part. Then came Baur and his school. With learning and ingenuity, but without proper fairness of mind, they attempted to show that Luke was an unreliable author, inasmuch as he was dominated by his dogmatic purpose, and therefore made artificial and arbitrary combinations, — made Peter talk like Paul, and Paul act like Peter; and so to the second century, when, as Baur thought, the work was written, the author presented a picture of unity and love, — a tale of the heroic age of Christianity, while the reality was quite different.

But two facts correct these errors. The first, that the third Gospel and the Acts are from the same author, and therefore his bias and character will be the same. If he showed himself in his Gospel to be fair-minded, the presumption is that he will be the same in the Acts. The second fact is more decisive. The author, so far from giving rein to his imagination, carefully investigated the sources before he began his history. Here, then, we have history well based and well matured. The accuracy of Luke descends to the minutest particular, as has been abundantly verified.²

A very remarkable, indeed unparalleled feature, of the Acts, is the use of the first person plural to denote the presence of the author. We can thus tell exactly when Luke began to travel with Paul, where he left him, and where he met him again. Thus the we begins xvi. 10, and ends v. 17, resumed xx. 5, and continued unto the end of the book. We can also detect in the narrative the vivacity and confidence of an eye-witness.

It were, of course, very desirable to have a twofold history of the planting of Christianity; but, in lack of this, we are able to test the reliability of Luke by the study of contemporary documents. The Apocalypse, the Epistle of James, and other Judæo-Christian documents prove that he reported correctly the state of things in Jerusalem; and the Epistles of Paul show how faithfully Luke presents the great apostle.

But, although faithful and reliable, the Acts can make no pretensions to completeness. The passing reference in 2 Cor. xi. 23-33 contains events not even hinted at in the Acts. The dispute at Antioch is not mentioned: there is nothing about Paul's sojourn in Arabia. These facts are not damaging to the historian: they only show that he wrote his book with discrimination; and some of these events have an importance in our eyes they would not have in his. His fragmentariness is therefore no argument against his credibility. The time and place of composition was probably Rome, A.D. 63. See LUKE.

ADALBERT, Archbishop of Hamburg-Bremen, 1045-1072; d. at Gosslar, March 16, 1072; a Saxon by birth, served for some time Henry III. as his chancellor, and was by him made archbishop. His idea was to form Germany, England, and Scandinavia into a great northern patriarchate, independent of Rome; and at the synod of Mainz (Mayence), 1049, he first presented his plan to the church. Neither Henry III. nor Leo IX. made any great opposition; but both died—the former in 1054, the latter in 1056—before any thing had been determined. During the minority of Henry IV., Adalbert, as the teacher and tutor of the young king, became the actual ruler of Germany, and once more his northern plans were taken up. But in 1066 his enemies succeeded in driving him away from the court, and he was even attacked within the boundaries of his own bishopric.

He was a severe and energetic man; and vehement strife arose between him and his wild, half-heathenish countrymen, especially, though, because he was a stiff representative of the Germano-Roman influence, and opposed to the Greek character and independent development of the Bohemian Church. Twice he left his see, and retired to the Monastery of St. Boniface in Rome, and twice he again returned to Prague. Finally, in 996, he went, with the support of the Duke of Poland, Boleslav Chrobry, as a missionary to the Prussians, but was killed by a Pagan priest before he had achieved any thing. His title as the Apostle of the Prussians is merely honorary.

ADALGAR, Archbishop of Hamburg-Bremen, 888-909, the successor of Rimbart, became involved in a long controversy with the Archbishop of Cologne, because, before the establishment of the metropolitan see of Hamburg-Bremen, the bishopric of Bremen had formed a suffragan see under the Archbishop of Cologne; and as now the see of Hamburg-Bremen increased much through the Scandinavian mission, and the establishment of the suffragan sees under it in Denmark and Sweden, the Archbishop of Cologne claimed his former supremacy over the bishopric of Bremen. The controversy was carried on with great violence, and not decided in the time of Adalgar; but an exhaustive representation of its course and significance is still wanting. ADALHARD, b. 751; d. June 2, 826; a grandson of Charles Martel, and cousin-german to Charlemagne; was expelled from the court, and sent to the Monastery of Corbie by the latter, but regained afterwards his confidence, and went in 796 to Italy, whose government he administered till 814, when Louis the Pious recalled him, and banished him to Hermontier, at the mouth of the Loire. In 821 he returned to Corbie, where he died. He founded Neu Corwey in Westphalia, established many schools, and did much to encourage studies. Of his works, the most important, De Ordine Palatii, is lost, though large extracts of it are given by Hincmar (Opp. Paris, 1645, II. 206-215). His Statuta Ant. Abbatie Corb., dated 822, is found in D'ARCHERY'S Spicileg., I. 586-592; and two letters, dated 801 and 814, in Epp. Carolinæ, IV. 417.

AD'AM means man, and is the name given by God himself to the first human beings (Gen. v. 2). The important place occupied by man, according to the biblical idea, is as the close, the appointed climax, of creation. Inanimate nature looked forward to man. To his creation God gave special care. It was sufficient for him to order the other creatures into being; but man was moulded by the divine fingers out of the dust of the earth, and so far forth he belonged to the created world: but into him God breathed the breath of life, and thus put him in an immeasurably higher place; for the possession of this breath made him the "image" of God. What this "image" was we learn from the Bible (Gen. i. 26, ii. 7): it was likeness to God in the government of the creatures and the possession of the same spirit. See IMAGE. God, the absolute personality, reflects himself in man, and therefore the latter becomes the lord of creation. Adam was the representative of the race,—humanity in person. Opposite to the species and genera of beasts, stood the single man. He was not a male, still less a wife-man: he was man. Out of him, as the progenitor of the race, Eve was taken. But we do not comprehend his true position until we look at him in relation to Christ, the second man, as we find it most clearly expressed in Rom. v. 12 sqq.; 1 Cor. xv. 21-22, 45-49. By his fall, sin and death entered into the world, although we had not personally any thing to do with it; and more, condemnation has come upon all through him. But from the second Adam has come just the opposite,—righteousness, justification, and life. Those who by sin are united to the first Adam reap all the consequences of such a union; similarly do those who by faith are united to the second Adam. Each is a representative head.

Adam lived to be nine hundred and thirty years old, and died the father of sons and daughters, although mention is made of only three sons (Gen. v. 4).

Materialism sees in man a mere product of nature. It is difficult to see how it makes place for self-consciousness. The unity of the race is also given up; and so logically Darwinism leads to belief in a plurality of race-stems. Theology, on the other hand, holds fast to the personality of man, but has, from the beginning of the science, wavered in regard to the position Adam occupied toward the race. The oldest Greek fathers are silent over this point. Irenæus is the first to touch it; and he maintains that the first sin was the sin of the race, since Adam was its head. Origen, on the other hand, held that man sinned because he had abused his liberty when in a pre-existent state. In Adam semi-nally were the bodies of all his descendants (Contra Celsum IV. cf. Kahnis, Dogmatik II. p. 107 sq.). Gregory Nazianzen and Gregory of Nyssa, and Chrysostom, deduce sin from the fall. Tertullian, Cyprian, Hilary, Ambrose, and Augustine represent the biblical stand-point. Pelagius saw in Adam only a bad example, which his descendants followed. Semi-Pelagianism similarly regarded the first sin as opening the flood-gates to iniquity; but Augustinianism upon this point has dominated the Church since it was formulated, — in Adam the race sinned.

[The two prominent orthodox views are: (1) The Augustinian, known as Realism, is, that there was a real though impersonal and unconscious participation of the whole human race in the fall of Adam, their natural head, who by his individual transgression vitiated the generic human nature, and transmitted it in this corrupt and guilty state to his descendants by ordinary generation. He sinned as an individual and as mankind. This view is taught by Anselm, Peter Lombard, Thomas Aquinas, Luther, Melancthon, and Calvin. (2) The Federal theory of the Dutch divines Cocceius and Witsius is, that the representation of mankind by Adam was vicarious and in virtue of a covenant. This is the theory of Turretin and the Princeton theologians. See IMPUTATION AND ORIGINAL SIN.

ADAM OF BREMEN (d. about 1076), the oldest historian of Northern Germany, is, according to general acceptance, the name of the author of the history of the Archbishops of Hamburg-Bremen to the death of Adalbert in 1072. From the work itself it appears that the name of the author begins with an A, that he came to Bremen in 1008, and was appointed first ecclesie matricularius, then canonicus, and that he wrote his work between 1072 and 1076. This work is the Gesta Hammenburgensis (Hamburgensis) Ecclesie Pontificum, quoted by Helmold, and by him ascribed to Magister Adam. ADAM OF ST. VICTOR, the greatest Latin poet of the middle age; b. in England or Brittany; entered about 1130 the abbey of St. Victor, Paris; d. there about 1192. His poetical works were called Sequences, and are remarkable for their melody, variety of metres, theological and biblical lore, sustained power of the imagination, sublimity of diction, and fervent piety. His faults are fondness for paronomasia, alliteration, and typical application of the Old Testament. The first complete edition of his poems was issued by L. Gautier (Paris, 1856-59, 2 vols.), who prefaced them by an exhaustive essay upon Adam's life and works. Rev. Digby S. Wrangham's translation, The Liturgical Poetry of Adam of St. Victor (London, 1881, 3 vols.), is the first complete one in English.

ADAMANNUS, or ADAMNANUS, b. at Drumhorne in Ireland, 624, of the same lineage as St. Columba; d. at Hy, Sept. 23, 704; was chosen abbot in 679; visited King Aldfrid of Northumbria in 688, and was, during this visit, converted by Ceolfrid, abbot of Jarron, to the Roman views of the tonsure and the celebration of Easter; tried in vain to introduce these views in Hy. Of his works are still extant, De Locis Sanctis, in MABILLON: Act. Sanct. III. part II. p. 502; and Vita S. Columbe, edited by William Reeves, Edin., 1876.

ADAMITES, or ADAMIANI, a sect which originated in Northern Africa during the second and third centuries, and meant to restore primitive innocence by introducing nudity of both the sexes into their worship (EPIPHANIUS: Hær., III. 458 sq.). The same custom, under the same name, appeared also in the fifteenth century, among the Beghards, or Brethren of the Free Spirit, in Bohemia; but the sect was relentlessly persecuted by the Hussite chief Zisca. It reappeared in 1781 and in 1849, after the proclamation of edicts of toleration, but was suppressed by the Austrian Government.

ADAMS, Thomas, a Puritan commentator and preacher. The time of his birth and death is unknown, and only a few scattered references of his life have come down to us. He was preaching in Bedfordshire in 1612, afterwards in various localities; was in 1653 a "decrepit and necessitous" old man, yet living in 1658. Southey called him "the prose Shakspeare of the Puritan theologians;" and a writer in the Encyclopædia Britannica (ninth edition) says of him, "His sermons place him in the van of the preachers of England. Jeremy Taylor does not surpass him in brilliance of fancies, nor Thomas Fuller in wit. His numerous works display great learning, and are unique in their abundance of stories, anecdotes, aphorisms, and puns." See Works, London, 1630, folio; Exposition of Second Peter, London, 1633, folio. Edited by Rev. James Sherman, London, 1839, reprint in Nichol's Commen- taries, 1862. Collected edition of his Works, with memoir, edited by Rev. Drs. Joseph Angus and Thomas Smith, London, 1862, 3 vols.

ADAMS, William, b. Colchester, Conn., Jan. 25, 1807; d. Orange Mountain, N.J., Tuesday, Aug. 31, 1880. He was prepared for college under his father, John Adams, LL.D., principal of Phillips Academy, Andover, and graduated with honors from Yale College, 1827, and at Andover Theological Seminary, 1830. He was pastor of the Congregational Society of Brighton, Mass., from February, 1831 to 1834, when he was called to the Broome-street (Central) Presbyterian Church of New-York city. His success here was remarkable. He gathered, in the course of his twenty years of service, a very large congregation, out of which was formed in 1853 the Madison-square Presbyterian Church, whose new edifice was opened in November, 1854. His church was one of the most influential in the city, and he was regarded as the leading Presbyterian pastor in the country. In 1873 he became president of the Union Theological Seminary, and professor of sacred rhetoric. He occupied this position with distinguished ability and success till his death. In 1852 he was chosen moderator of the New School General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, and was very active in bringing about the re-union of the New and Old School branches. He will be long remembered as a fervent, eloquent, and persuasive preacher of the Word; as a faithful, affectionate, and prudent pastor; as a dignified, learned, and efficient presiding officer, and as a Christian gentleman of the highest type. He had a remarkably symmetrical character. His personal appearance was commanding, and at once indicated him as a prince among men. "He was greater than any thing that he did." He wrote much for the religious press, and issued the following volumes: The Three Gardens, Eden, Gethsemane, and Paradise; or, Man's Ruin, Redemption, and Restoration (N.Y., 1856); an edition of Isaac Taylor's Spirit of Hebrew Poetry, with a biographical introduction (1861); Thanksgiving: Memories of the Day and Helps to the Habit (1865); In the World, and not of the World (1867); Conversations of Jesus Christ with Representative Men (1868). Perhaps the most admired single effort of his life was the Address of Welcome to the members of the conference of the Evangelical Alliance Oct. 2, 1873, a model of its kind. He was to perform a similar service at the General Council of the Reformed churches, which met in Philadelphia a few weeks after his death.

ADAMSON, Patrick, a Scottish prelate, b. in Perth, March 15, 1543; d. in St. Andrews, Feb. 19, 1592. He was made Archbishop of St. Andrews in October, 1576, although previously a strenuous opponent of prelacy, saying, "There were three sorts of bishops, — my lord-bishop, my lord's bishop, and the Lord's bishop. My lord-bishop was in the papistry; my lord's bishop is now, when my lord gets the benefice, and the bishop serves for nothing but to make his title sure; and the Lord's bishop is the true minister of God." His oppressive measures brought him endless trouble. He was excommunicated by a provincial synod, and only absolved on submission. At length, in 1588, his archiepiscopal revenues were withdrawn, and henceforward he lived on charity.

ADDAI, one of the seventy-two, who, according to a legend dating from the second half of the second century, was sent to King Abgar in Edessa, where he preached, baptized, and founded the first Christian congregation. See GEORGE PHILLIPS: The Doctrine of Addai, London, 1876, containing the Syriac text, with an English translation and notes. See ABGARUS.

ADDISON, Joseph, the essayist and hymn-writer, b. at Milston, May 1, 1672; d. at Holland House, London, June 17, 1719. He was a son of the Dean of Lichfield, a fellow of Magdalen College, Oxford, from 1699 to 1711, during which time, however, he travelled on the continent, and held various official appointments. He had intended to enter the Church; but his employment as a Whig writer altered his mind, and he rose to the distinction of Secretary of State for a brief period. In April, 1709, Steele started the Tatler; for this Addison wrote, but his fame is indissolubly linked with the Spectator. In the two, and their successor the Guardian, appeared the essays afterwards published together under the title, Evidences of the Christian Religion, London, 1790. He also wrote several excellent hymns. He presented to the age the rare picture of a Christian statesman. The best edition of his works is by Bishop Hurd, London, 1811, 6 vols. 8vo.

ADELBERT, or ALDEBERT, the powerful adversary of St. Boniface, and leader of a national party in the Church of the Frankish Empire, opposed to the introduction of the Roman constitution and the Romish hierarchy, and supported by the people, the native clergy, and Carloman. Boniface denounced him as a heretic, and seducer of the people, accused him of the grossest frauds, and brought him, in 744, before a synod in Soissons, which condemned him. This condemnation, however, raised such a storm of indignation, that the verdict remained a dead letter; but the next year Boniface sent the priest Deneard to Rome, to Pope Zacharias, with a formal accusation, and documents of evidence. A council was held in the Lateran, in October, 745; and Deneard appeared before it as prosecutor. Adelbert was not summoned, nor was any investigation instituted, as the protocols still extant evince; but he was, nevertheless, unanimously condemned as a new Simon Magus. This time too, however, the verdict seems to have been without effect; for two years later on, in January, 747, we hear Boniface and the pope speak of having Adelbert placed before a new council. Perhaps Carloman, in spite of his friendship with Boniface, still continued to shelter Adelbert. It is at all events a suggestive fact, that Boniface triumphed, and Adelbert vanished immediately after the abdication of Carloman, when Pepin became major domus alone.

ADEODATUS, Bishop of Rome from April, 672, to June, 676. Two letters of his are extant (MANSI: Concil., Tom. XI., p. 103).

ADIAPHORA (things indifferent). The idea of adiaphora, things indifferent to moral laws, originated with the Stoics. They found between virtue and vice a large field, both of objective conditions and subjective actions, which were neither good nor bad, but indifferent, mediâ, neutra, ἀδιαφορα; as, for instance, to have an equal or unequal number of hairs on the head, to raise the finger in this way or that, etc.

In the Bible the idea is indirectly rejected, though in a different way, by the Old and the New Testament. The Old Testament, which declares it as great a sin to worship God in an illegal form as to worship an idol, can, of course, not acknowledge the existence of any thing indifferent to the law; but, in accordance with its pedagogical character, it endeavors to answer this question in details, commanding and forbidding in each special case as it occurs in practical life. The New Testament gives no such prescriptions; but the idea of adiaphora is there absolutely excluded by the ideas of the kingdom of heaven, the perfection of man in Christ, the "Christ in me," though at the same time it gives complete liberty: "unto the pure all things are pure" (Tit. i. 15).

In the Roman Church, in the middle ages, the idea gradually acquired great practical importance. By the doctrines of opera supererogatoria, saints, etc., a distinction was established between that which was necessary for the Christian hero and that which was necessary for the ordinary Christian; and by this distinction the whole system of Christian morals was put out of tune. Theoretically the question was discussed by the Thomists (who accepted the doctrine of adiaphora in abstracto, but rejected it in concreto) and the Scotists, who thought that there existed a whole sphere in human life which had nothing at all to do with morality. Finally it found a most lamentable solution in the casuistry of the Jesuits.

The Reformation was in this point, as in so many others, simply a return to the stand-point of the New Testament. On account, however, of the character which the Reformation very early assumed in Germany, it is not to be wondered at that the first so-called adiaphoristic controversy should turn upon a point, not of morals, but of doctrine. Against the Augsburg Interim, which satisfied the Protestants as little as the Romanists, Melancthon, Bugenhagen, and others drew up the so-called Leipzig Interim (1548), in which several doctrinal and liturgical points were yielded as adiaphora. This roused the indignation of the extreme Lutherans, — Flacius, Westphal, and others; and a vehement controversy broke out, which, however, lost its importance by the peace of 1555 and the Formula Concordiæ.

The second adiaphoristic controversy, on the contrary, which forms a chapter of the history of pietism, touches the very centre of Christian ethics. Spener protested that "a Christian shall do nothing which he cannot do to the glory of God, in the name of Christ, and for the benefit of his fellow-Christian." There are consequently no adiaphora; and such things as dancing, playing cards, visiting theatres, etc., must be reputed as sin. The fanaticism with which Spener's disciples followed out this principle called forth an equally passionate re-action; but the controversy led to no result. The question may be said to be still under debate; though the true basis for its solution seems to have been found by the latest writers on evangelical morals, Rothe, Schmid, Martensen, etc. Somewhat after the example of Thomas Aquinas, the existence of adiaphora is here accepted in abstracto, but rejected in concreto; because the individuality, character, and mental state of a person, at every moment, necessitates a yes or no, for which he feels responsible in his conscience, even in cases and with respect to things which objectively lie outside of the moral law. ROBERT KÜBEL.

ADO, b. about 800, in the neighborhood of Sens; d. at Vienne, Dec. 16, 874; Archbishop of Vienne since 860; was considered one of the principal supports of the papal hierarchy in Southern France, and wrote a Martyrologium, edited by Dan. Georgi, Rome, 1745; and a Breviarium Chronicorum de six Mundi Etatibus (Basel, 1568; PERTZ: Monum. II., 315), from the creation to the middle of the ninth century, consisting mostly of extracts from known sources.

ADONAI (my Lord), a Hebrew name of God in the Old Testament. The Jews pronounced the tetragram Y H W H by giving to it the vowels of Adonai. The pronunciation Jehovah resulting is never heard among the Jews, and dates from the sixteenth century among the Christians. See JEHOVAH.

ADONI'JAH (my Lord is Jehovah). The fourth son of David by Hagith, born at Hebron, heir-presumptive after the death of his three elder brothers (2 Sam. iii. 4). For pushing his claims (1 Kings i.) when Solomon had been designated, he came near losing his life, but was pardoned (1 Kings i. 52), and might have lived in security, but for his asking the hand of Abishag: this being construed as a fresh attempt upon the throne, he was put to death (1 Kings ii. 25).

ADOPTION. 1. Biblical. The biblico-theological term for the act which restores the normal condition of the sinner to God is adoption: the persons adopted are called the "children," or "sons," of God. This idea is not original with the New Testament, but is found in the Old (Deut. xiv. 1), although the pious Israelite regarded himself rather as the servant than the son of God. In the New Testament, however, the idea is found very clearly expressed by John in his Gospel (i. 12) and in his first Epistle (iii. 1 sq.), where the term is not a mere figurative expression, but, in closest connection with his concept of the Christian life, is the designation of a mystical yet real fact. The child of God, through God's love (iii. 1), is operated upon by the Divine Spirit, and so raised out of his ungodly state into that of divine grace (iii. 6). Paul is equally clear, although he adopts a different mode of representation. The sinner is first pardoned, delivered from the bondage of sin, made a new creature (Eph. iv. 24) by the action of the Spirit (2 Cor. i. 22), and then he is called a son, or child, of God: he receives the assurance of adoption (Rom. viii. 15, 16); and, instead of fear, he has a great love of God as his Father in heaven, and follows God (Eph. v. 1), inspired by a hope which renders him patient in tribulation (Rom. viii. 17, 18). According, then, to John, the Christian life from its very beginning is the life of one who is born of God, is his child, while, according to Paul, the adoption takes place in the course of the Christian's upbuilding for eternity. In the rest of the New Testament, while the idea is found, it is not set forth with such doctrinal precision as demands particular attention.

2. Theological. The Church doctrine distinguishes the Johannean idea of "being born of God" as the starting-point of the new life, from the Pauline idea of "adoption" as its essential point. The first idea, theology calls regeneration. Our attention will therefore be limited to the second. In ascetic literature, adoption, the sonship of the believer, plays a very prominent part. The fathers regard adoption generally as a magical effect of baptism, and derive many illustrations of it from Roman jurisprudence. Thus Clement of Alexandria (Pæd. 1, 6). This became the doctrine of the Greek Church. [See The Orthodox Confession of the Eastern Church, Q. c. II. in Schaff's Creeds of Christendom, Vol. II. p. 376.] In the Roman-Catholic Church, on account of the prevailing semi-pelagian denial of the free grace of God and identification of justification and sanctification, the joyful state of sonship with God has not been clearly comprehended, suppressed, as its experience must be, by the wearisome self-denials and works of satisfaction and penance. Hence the Roman Church denies that the subject can be certain of his justification, and, consequently, of his being in a state of grace. Thus Council of Trent, Sess. 6, c. 9. [Schaff's Creeds of Christendom, Vol. II. pp. 98-9.] "No one can know, with a certainty of faith which cannot be subject to error, that he has obtained the grace of God." Inasmuch as baptism is regarded as imprinting the spiritual birth in the form of an indelible character, and as working, not alone the remission of original sin and actual guilt, however enormous, but a positive infusion of grace ex opere operato (through the act performed), it is further regarded as rendering the subject a child of God. Catechism of the Council of Trent [translated by Rev. J. Donovan, Baltimore, n. d., pp. 127, 130]. In the Protestant Church opinions have varied. The older Lutheran divines preferred to treat adoption in connection with baptism. Regeneration and adoption, as also justification, they taught, involve each other. Adoption follows justification. But, after pietism entered the Church, the Lutheran came nearer to the Reformed type, and the doctrine of regeneration underwent a material change: so that, from being regarded as only a form of justification, it was held that it not only precedes it, but, as the first effect of operating grace, takes its place. The Reformed theologians distinguish theoretically, though not practically, regeneration and adoption; and the latter is animatedly discussed, because much stress is laid upon personal assurance of salvation. The adoption of the Old Testament saints is taught. The Methodists (e. g., Wesley, Watson) teach the Reformed doctrine, putting particular value upon repentance and the inner testimony of conversion. One of the services Schleiermacher performed was to restore adoption, which had become synonymous with the firm hope of eternal life, unto its proper place. He said, "It is not possible for Christ to live in us, unless we are in the same relation to the Father, and consequently share in his sonship, which is the power, originating in him, to become the sons of God: and this includes the guaranty of sanctification; for it is the right of sonship to be brought up in the fullest household liberality; and the law of nature is, that the community of life develops in the child likeness to the father." For a recent carrying-out of Schleiermacher's ideas, see A. SCHWEIZER: Christliche Glaubenslehre, II. 2, p. 236 sq. It is undeniable that there are treasures upon this subject which lie as yet buried in the Scriptures. Theology should bring them out. GÜDER.

The Westminster Shorter Catechism defines adoption as the act of God's grace, whereby we are received into the number, and have a right to all the privileges, of the sons of God. Its position in the scheme of salvation, Calvinistically conceived, is brought out very clearly by Professor A. A. Hodge, in his Outlines of Theology, p. 516, revised edition, New York, 1879. "Regeneration is an act of God originating by a new creation a new spiritual life in the heart of the subject. The first and instant act of that new creature, consequent upon his regeneration, is faith, or a believing, trusting embrace of the person and work of Christ. Upon the exercise of faith by the regenerated subject, justification is the instant act of God, on the ground of that perfect righteousness which the sinner's faith has apprehended, declaring him to be free from all condemnation, and to have a legal right to the relations and benefits secured by the covenant which Christ has fulfilled in his behalf. Sanctification is the progressive growth towards the perfected maturity of that new life which was implanted in regeneration. Adoption presents the new creature in his new relation, his new relations entered upon with a congenial heart, and his new life developing in a congenial home, and surrounded with those relations which foster its growth, and crown it with blessedness. Justification is wholly forensic, and concerns only relations, immunities, and rights. Regeneration and sanctification are wholly spiritual and moral, and concern only inherent qualities and states. Adoption comprehends the complex condition of the believer as at once the subject of both." The Arminian view is expressed by Richard Watson, Theological Institutes, Part II., chap. 24 (New-York edition, p. 269). "Adoption is the second concomitant of justification, and is that act by which we who were alienated, enemies, disinherited, are made the sons of God, and heirs of his eternal glory. To this state belong freedom from a servile spirit, the special love of God our heavenly Father, a filial confidence in him, free access to him at all times and in all circumstances, the title to the heavenly inheritance, and the spirit of adoption, or the witness of the Holy Spirit to our adoption, which is the foundation of all the comfort we can derive from those privileges, as it is the only means by which we can know that they are ours . . . from it flows a comfortable persuasion or conviction of our present acceptance with God, and the hope of our future and eternal glory."

ADOPTIONISM, ADOPTIONISTS (Adoptiani, Adoptivi), a heresy and sect, which, in the latter part of the eighth century, produced considerable commotion in the Spanish and Frankish churches. A certain Migetius who preached in that part of Spain which was held by the Moors, and where the Christian Church consequently stood in a very loose connection with Rome, gave a very gross exposition of the doctrine of the holy Trinity; teaching that there were three persons bodily, and a triple manifestation in history, of the one God. Against him Elipandus, Archbishop of Toledo, wrote a letter vindicating the orthodox idea of the immanence of the Trinity, but at the same time establishing a very sharp distinction between the second person of the Trinity and the human nature of Christ. According to his divine nature, Elipandus said, Christ is the true son of God,—"I and the Father are one;" but, according to his human nature, he is only adopted by God, filius adoptivus,—"The Father is greater than I." This distinction, however, between the two natures in Christ, sounded in the ears of the time as a distinction in his very personality, and was by many considered a relapse into the Nestorian heresy. Its historical genesis is obscure. Some ascribe it to an influence from the surrounding Islamism; others find it in a colony of Eastern, perhaps Nestorian Christians who came to Spain with the Arabs, and whom Elipandus, in a letter to Felix, mentions as his good friends having the right faith; while Alcuin, in a letter to Leidrad, denounces them as the true fathers of adoptionism. Elipandus was attacked by Abbot Beatus of Libana, Bishop Etherius of Osma, and a majority of the Asturian clergy. A vehement controversy broke out, and it soon spread from Spain into France, through Felix, Bishop of Urgel, which, situated in the Pyrenees, belonged to the Frankish Empire, to the diocese of Narbonne. At the synod of Regensburg, 792, Felix defended the adoptionist view in the presence of Charlemagne. But the bishops condemned him; and he was sent to Rome, where Adrian I. kept him in prison till he drew up an orthodox confession, and took his bath upon it. As soon, however, as he had returned to Urgel, he repudiated the confession as made under compulsion, and fled into the domains of the Moors.

Elipandus, and those Spanish bishops who belonged to his party, now addressed a letter to the Frankish bishops and to Charlemagne himself; and the case was once more investigated by the synod of Francfort, 794. The result was four letters,—from the Germano-Frankish bishops, from the Italian bishops, from Adrian I., and from Charlemagne,—all condemning the adoptionist movement, and exhorting to concord and quiet. But the Adoptionists were very zealous in propagating their views, which spread rapidly among the masses. Also in the literary field the controversy grew hotter. In 798 Felix wrote a book, and sent it to Alcuin. It was answered both by Paulinus of Aquileia and Alcuin (Libellus adv. Felicis Hæres.), the latter of whom received a very rough rejoinder from Felix. The case began to look serious, and demand energetic measures. In 798 Leidrad of Lyon, Nebrid of Narbonne, and the Abbot Benedict of Aniane, visited personally the infected places in France and Spain, and preached against the heretics. In 799 Leo III. formally condemned Felix at a synod in Rome, and in 800 a disputation was arranged between Felix and Alcuin at the synod of Aix-la-Chapelle. Felix resisted for a long time, but at last he declared himself beaten, retracted, and wrote a circular letter to his friends, admonishing them to return to the Orthodox Church. This letter, the new work by Alcuin in seven books, and the preachings of Leidrad and Benedict, finally smoothed down the commotion, and the sect disappeared.

ADRAM'MELECH (Adar is king). 1. One of the gods of Sepharvaim worshipped by the Assyrians transplanted to Samaria (2 Kings xvii. 31). Children were sacrificed to it. The name appears to consist of Adar (אדר or אדר) "lordly;" Movers, die Phönizier, Bd. 1, 1841, p. 340, wrongly derives it from the Persian azar "fire", a designation of the god, and melek, Assyrian malik, "king," which is a frequent honorary epithet. It is uncertain whether any such god has, however, been yet read of upon the Assyrian monuments. But Atar, possibly the same as אדר, occurs in proper names, e.g., Atarilu, "Atar is God." See SCHRADER, Die assyrisch-babylon. Keilinschr., 1872, p. 148 sq. The name Adramelus also indicates a god Adar. It is very questionable whether Atar-samain, "Atar of the heavens," as a North Arabian god in Assyrian inscriptions, should be identified with Adar, as is done by Schrader; much more likely with Atargatis (Astarte), which see, whom Jeremiah apparently calls the "queen of heaven" (Jer. vii. 18).

2. Son and murderer of Sennacherib, King of Assyria (2 Kings xix. 37; Isa. xxxvii. 38), called Adramelus by Moses of Chorene (I. 23), and Ardremuzanes by Eusebius, after Polyhistor in the Armenian Chronicle (ed. Maj. p. 19).

ADRIAN is the name of six popes. — Adrian I. (Feb. 9, 772, to Dec. 25, 795) leaned from the very beginning of his reign towards the Frankish fraction in Rome, and addressed himself directly to Charlemagne for help, when Desiderius, king of the Longobards, invaded his territory. Charlemagne came to his rescue (773), defeated Desiderius, confirmed and increased the donation of Pepin; and a very cordial relation was established between the pope and the Frankish king. Adrian understood how to draw the huge mass of Charlemagne's empire nearer to Rome. He labored in unison with the king against the Adoptionists; his legates played a prominent part in all the many synods which were held under the presidency of the king; he succeeded in introducing the Gregorian chant, first in Metz, afterwards in other parts of the realm, etc. Nevertheless, in this whole relation, Charlemagne was the master. When the decrees of the Council of Nice of 787, re-establishing the worship of the saints, and sanctioned by the papal legates, were laid before him, he had them refuted by the Libri Carolini, and rejected by the synod of Francfort (794), and the pope could do nothing. His letters are found in JAFFÉ: Biblioth. Rerum German, vol. IV. — ADRIAN II. (Dec. 14, 867, to Nov. 25, 872) interfered repeatedly, but with very little success, in the affairs of the Frankish Empire. In the conflict between the emperor Louis II. and Charles the Bald, King of France, he sided with the former, and addressed a high-handed and threatening letter to the latter. But in the answer which was drawn up by Archbishop Hincmar of Rheims, the king coldly declined to pay any regard to the pope's interventions in secular matters. In 871 Bishop Hincmar of Laon was deposed by the synod of Duziacum, but appealed to the pope, who, on the authority of the Pseudo-Isidorean Decretals, claimed for himself the right of finally deciding the matter. Again Archbishop Hincmar of Rheims was charged with drawing up the answer; and the pope was informed that his interference in the affairs of the Gallican Church was unwarranted, that the Pseudo-Isidorean Decretals were the offspring of hell, etc. Adrian now understood that it was necessary to change front entirely, and declared that his former harsh letters had been wrong from him against his will during his illness; that they were probably falsified, etc. In the controversy between Photius, Patriarch of Constantinople, and the Emperor Basilius, Adrian interfered with more success. The Council of Constantinople (869) deposed Photius, and recognized the primacy of the Roman see. Nevertheless the emperor protested that Bulgaria belonged to the Constantinopolitan, not to the Roman patriarchate: a Greek archbishop was settled in the country; and the Roman priests and missionaries were expelled. Letters of Adrian II. are found in MANSI: Concil. XV. p. 819. — ADRIAN III. (March 1, 884, to July 8, 885) was the first pope who changed his name at his election, his true name being Agapetus. — ADRIAN IV. (Dec. 4, 1154, to Sept. 1, 1159) was a native of England (Nicholas Breakspeafe); began his ecclesiastical career as a servant in the monastery of St. Rufus near Avignon, became its abbot in 1137, and afterwards Cardinal-Bishop of Albano. Under him began the long and bitter contest between the popes and the House of Hohenstaufen, though the first transaction between Adrian and Frederick Barbarossa was very cordial. Arnold of Brescia preached at that time in the very city of Rome against the secular power of the pope, and made an attempt to reorganize the government of the city on its ancient model. Adrian protested, fled to Orvieto, and laid interdict on the city. The senate then compelled Arnold to leave Rome; and on his flight he fell into the hands of Frederick, who, after a successful campaign in Northern Italy, was slowly approaching Rome. A bargain was now struck between the pope and the king. Frederick delivered up Arnold, who was hanged and burnt, and Adrian crowned Frederick emperor. The peace was soon disturbed, however. Adrian addressed a letter to the emperor and the German bishop, which was understood to say that the German Empire was a fief of the papal crown. Frederick was in a rage, the bishops felt provoked, and Adrian did not succeed in explaining away the offensive expressions. When Frederick again visited Italy (1158), he convoked an assembly of Italian jurists to define his right and power according to Roman law. This assembly agreed that the present emperor had the same power as the ancient imperator, that is, "quod Principi placuit, legis habet vigorem." From this moment Frederick began to exercise his imperial authority very regardless of the pretensions of the pope; and Adrian was on the point of excommunicating him when he died at Agnani. The bulls and letters of Adrian IV. are found in MIGNÉ: Patrol. vol. 188, p. 1361 sq. — ADRIAN V. (July 12 to Aug. 18, 1276) was a native of Genoa, named Ottobuono de Fieschi, a nephew of Innocent IV., held as Archdeacon of Canterbury a synod in London (1268), which issued the thirty-six constitutions known as the Ottobone Constitutions. He was never consecrated. — ADRIAN VI. (Jan. 9, 1522, to Sept. 14, 1523), b. at Utrecht, 1459; the son of a poor mechanic; became professor of theology in the University of Louvain, and tutor to Charles V., who in 1516 sent him as his representative to Spain, where he was made Bishop of Tortosa, cardinal, and, after the death of Cardinal Ximenes (1517), regent. He was a pious and honest man, of strong moral principles; but his views of the German Reformation were utterly mistaken. He believed that the whole movement was nothing but a re-action against the corruptions of the Church; that the doctrines propounded by the Reformers were mere nonsense, which no sensible man could seriously entertain; that a reform of certain flagrant misuses in the Church would be a sufficient means to stay the commotion, etc. Thus he spoiled his case with his own party by the confessions he made and the reforms he promised; and, on the other side, he made the breach still wider by the outrageous manner in which he spoke of the Reformers, and in which he wanted to have them treated. In spite of his good intentions, he accomplished nothing. His adversaries laughed at him; his former pupil slighted him; his familiars hated him; his very household was bribed, from the confessor to the barber. The cardinals clamored around his death-bed to ascertain where he had concealed his money; and, when he died, a wreath was hung over the door of his physician with the inscription, "To the liberator of the Fatherland." ADULLAM (hiding-place). A royal city of the Canaanites (Gen. xxxviii. 1), allotted to Judah (Josh. xii. 15), fortified by Rehoboam (2 Chr. xi. 7), and made, later on, one of the abodes of royalty (Mic. i. 15), re-peopled by the Jews after captivity (Neh. xi. 30). It has been proposed to locate the cave of Adullam, so famous from its connection with David's early history, in the neighborhood of this city; but it is more usual to suppose it was in the neighborhood of Beth-lehem in the Wady Khureitun.

ADULTERY, illicit intercourse with a married woman, is in all primitive civilizations considered from a purely religious point of view. It is a sin, an offence against God. In course of time, however, as civilization progresses, the social aspect becomes more and more prominent. The sin becomes a crime, an offence against society. Then, again, having become a mere matter of civil legislation, adultery is first treated as a crime which it is the duty of society to punish, and then as an evil which it is the right of society to get rid of by the application of the most effective remedies. This course the history of the subject shows among the Hebrews, the Romans, the Germanic nations, in short, everywhere.

That the Hebrews at one time considered adultery from a purely religious point of view is evident, both from the admission of the trial by the bitter water, — the water of jealousy (Num. v. 11-31), the only instance of an ordeal in the Mosaic law, — and from the figurative language of the Old Testament, which over and over again represents idolatry under the image of adultery (Jer. iii. 8, 9; Ezek. xvi. 32, etc.). The stand-point, however, of the Mosaic law, is not religious, but social; though the religious spirit, which is the informing power in the whole system, is palpably present here, as at every other point. Adultery is a crime, an offence against society, a violation of the institution of marriage (the wife being the property of the husband), and a violation of the institution of inheritance (property belonging to the blood). The crime is punished with death (Lev. xx. 10): both the adulterer and the adulteress are stoned (Deut. xxii. 22). But here a distinction comes in. As it is the consequences involved in a certain act which constitutes this act a crime, and as the consequences of adultery, with respect to the institutions which they infringe upon, vary with the social position of the adulteress, justice demands that also the punishment shall vary. If the adulteress is only a slave, she is not stoned to death, but simply scourged with a leathern whip. The idea of sin, of an offence against God, is thus entirely left out of view. The stand-point is social. Jewish practice went still farther. First, adultery was punished more leniently on the man than on the woman: it became criminal only with women. Then the idea of crime was dropped altogether; and the disturbances which adultery caused in the institutions of marriage and inheritance were considered mere evils, for which a remedy was sought and found in the divorce. At the time of Christ, divorce seems to have been of frequent occurrence among the Jews. Roman society had arrived at exactly the same point when it became acquainted with Christianity. During the first two or three centuries of our era nothing was more common in Rome than a divorce. But a great change took place when Christianity became the religion of the State, although not by reason of any direct commandment.

Christ recognized adultery as a legitimate reason for divorce (Matt. v. 32). But in this instance, as always when in contact with real life, he gently pushed aside the shifting and fugitive forms of the surface, and applied his reform — the word that saves — to the very root of the matter. He condemned the evil passion and lustful look from which adultery springs (Matt. v. 27-32). Of adultery and divorce, the New Testament says very little: it speaks only of that in which all such details are summed up, — of chastity. Nevertheless, the impression which Christianity made upon man's mind, as it gradually took hold of the world, was so overwhelming, that it became impossible to look at any thing from any other point of view than a religious or specifically Christian one. As a new beginning, Christianity also has a period of primitive civilization. Once more adultery became a sin, an offence against God. Constantine defined it as sacrilege, and punished it with death. Canon law and early ecclesiastical discipline point in the same direction. The Council of Ancyra (314) refused the eucharist to the adulterer, even at the moment of death; and the Sixth Council of Orleans deposed every clerical who had committed adultery, and locked him up for life in a monastery. First in the beginning of the seventeenth century the subject again breaks loose from the religious ground, and becomes a matter purely of civil legislation. Compare the articles MARRIAGE and DIVORCE.

ADVENT is a preparation for the Feast of the Nativity, as Lent is a preparation for Easter: consequently no celebration of Advent could be instituted until the Feast of the Nativity was fixed; and this was not done in the Western Church until after the fourth century. The first traces of such an institution are found with Cæsarius of Arles (d. 542). Two sermons of his are still extant, in which he exhorts his congregation to go frequently to church, do good to the poor, etc., during the season of preparation for the great feast. Another evidence, from the same time, gives a decree by the Council of Lerida (524), ordering that no wedding shall take place during Advent, as little as during the fast before Easter. The ancient Church considered Advent a season of fast, exactly like Lent, during which all amusements ought to cease. The synod of Tours (567) decreed a daily fast for monks during Advent; and the synod of Maçon (581) ordered, that, from the day of St. Martin, laymen should fast at least twice a week. With respect to the duration of the season, no general agreement was ever arrived at. If a quadragesimal fast shall precede Christmas, as it precedes Easter, it must begin with the day of St. Martin (Nov. 11); and such, indeed, was the custom in France for a long time. Later on, however, the Fast of Advent was limited, and began with the day of St. Andrew (Nov. 30). At present the Roman and the Lutheran churches have only four Sundays in Advent; while the Greek has six, the season beginning with Nov. 15.

Besides being a preparation for Christmas, the season of Advent has another signification: it forms, since the sixth century, the beginning of the ecclesiastical year, which before that time began with Easter, both in the Orient and in the Occident. The occasion of the change was the circumstance that the ecclesiastical year of the Jews also begins with Easter. As the Reformed Church has no ecclesiastical year, properly speaking, it had no celebration of Advent either. The minister being at liberty to select his text, with reference only to the wants of the moment, may preach on the passion during Advent. In Germany, however, the Reformed churches have generally adopted the practice of the Lutheran Church, which retains the old texts from the Epistles and the Gospels, but repudiates the Advent fast, as, on the whole, it recognizes no ecclesiastically prescribed fast-days. The only Protestant Church, which, in harmony with the Roman Church, still retains the quatermber fast, is the Church of England.

ADVENTISTS, or the followers of William Miller, a fanatical student of prophecy, who put the second advent of Christ in the year 1843. The sect arose in New England in 1833, and once numbered, it is said, fifty thousand persons; but now, owing to the repeated failures to get the right date for the event, it has dwindled into much smaller proportions. The Seventh-Day Adventists, as they are now called, do not pretend to foretell the exact day of Christ's coming; but they keep the event continually before them. They practice immersion; believe in the annihilation of the wicked, and in the sleep of the soul from the hour of death to the day of judgment. They are scattered throughout the United States, and reported, on Nov. 7, 1879, to the General Conference held at Battle Creek, Mich., 144 ministers, 599 churches, and 14,141 members. The amount of moneys pledged to the Systematic Benevolence Fund was $51,714. They bear an excellent reputation. See MILLER, WILLIAM; MILLENARIANISM.

ADVOCATE OF THE CHURCH (Advocatus, or Defensor Ecclesie), an officer charged with the secular affairs of an ecclesiastical establishment, more especially with its defence, legal or armed. As soon as the Church became possessed of large estates, it necessarily became implicated in many proprietary relations which it was impossible for the clergy themselves to maintain, prevented as they were legally from pleading in a civil court, and morally from wearing arms. Under such circumstances it became necessary for a church or monastery to have a defender. The office originated in Africa, in the beginning of the fifth century; and among the Germanic nations it assumed a peculiar form on account of their peculiar juridical ideas. According to German views, only he could hold property, in the full sense of the word, who was a free man, capable of wearing arms, and, in case of necessity, able to defend his right by force. Persons who were free, but unable to wear arms, such as women, children, old and sick people, needed a representative under whose ward (mundium, mundibundium) they stood. To this category the clergy belonged; and though at first they refused to be considered and treated legally as minors, they finally accepted the situation, because it gave them safety against violent attacks, and exemption from many shocking details of German procedure. By a decree of 783, Charlemagne ordered that each church or monastery should choose a warden to act as its causidicus before the court, take oath in its name, have fugitive slaves and alienated property restored, command the soldiers sent by the establishment to the army, etc. Very often, however, this advocate of the Church developed into a tyrant, keeping the establishment in absolute submission, despoiling and plundering it. He usurped the whole power of administration, limited the authority of the bishop to the purely spiritual affairs, absorbed the tithes and all other revenues, and doled out to the clergy only a mean modicum. Innocent III., however, succeeded in checking the growing importance of this institution, and soon the office itself disappeared.

ÆGIDIUS, b. in Rome 1247; d. at Bourges 1316; descended from the family of the Colonnas; studied in Paris under Thomas Aquinas and Bonaventura; became tutor to Philip the Fair, for whom he wrote De Regimine Principum (printed in Rome, 1482); acquired great fame as a teacher of theology and philosophy in the University of Paris, and was styled Doctor fundatissimus, Theologorum princeps; Archbishop of Bourges, 1295. He was a very prolific writer, but only a few of his works have been printed: De Peccato Originali, Oxford, 1479; Quæstiones Metaphysicæ, Venice, 1501; Lucubrationes de Lombardi Sententiis, Basel, 1623.

ÆLFRIC is the name of two prominent prelates in the Anglo-Saxon Church, — one, Archbishop of Canterbury, 996–1006; the other, Archbishop of York, 1023–1051, — but whether the learned Benedictine Ælfric (grammaticus) is identical with one of these archbishops, or not, is a question as yet unsolved. As Alfred was the founder, so Ælfric was the model, of the Saxon prose. He wrote a Saxon grammar and glossary; and he translated into Saxon a number of homilies, the Heptateuch, etc. But of his personal life nothing is known but a few notices scattered about in his works. In his honor the Ælfric Society was formed in London, in 1842, for the purpose of publishing his works and those of other Saxons. For this society Benjamin Thorpe edited the homilies in 1844. The grammar and glossary were printed at Oxford in 1639 and 1698. See WHARTON: Anglica Sacra; WRIGHT: Biograph. Brit., 1842.

ÆNEAS of Gaza, a philosopher of the Neo-Platonic school; converted to Christianity; flourished in Alexandria about 487; and is the author of twenty-five letters, printed by Aldus in his Epist. Græc. Collectio, Ven., 1499, and of a dialogue, Theophrastus, edited by Boissonade, Paris, 1836, and translated into Latin by Ambrosius, Venice, 1513.

ÆNEAS, Bishop of Paris, 843–877, took part in the controversy between the Eastern and Western Churches occasioned by Photius, and wrote Liber adversus Græcos, found in D'ARCHERY: Spicileg. I., pp. 112–149.

ÆPINUS, JOHANNES, b. at Ziesar in Brandenburg, 1499; d. in Hamburg, May 13, 1533; became a pupil of Bugenhagen in Belbuck, 1517–21; studied afterwards in Wittenberg, under Luther and Melancthon, but was expelled from his native country on account of his ardent adherence to the doctrines of the Reformers, and found it even necessary to change his name (Hoeck); labored in the cause of the Reformation at Stralsund, 1524-28, and was appointed preacher to the Church of St. Petri in Hamburg, in 1529, and superintendent in 1532. By his comment on the Sixteenth Psalm he caused a very violent controversy concerning Christ's descensus ad inferos, which ended with the deposition and expulsion of his adversaries from Hamburg.

AERIUS, in 355 presbyter and director of the hospital for strangers, maimed and incapable, in Sebaste, Pontus; maintained, in accordance with apostolical tradition (Phil. i. 1), the equality between bishops and presbyters, and declared (appealing to 1 Cor. v. 7) against the retention of the paschal meal in the celebration of the Lord's Supper,—a custom prevalent in those regions. He also denied that prayers or offerings for the dead had any value, and rejected all fasts ordained by the Church. He gathered quite a number of followers, of both sexes, and in 360 he gave up his office. For some time his party, the Aërians, assembled in the open fields, in forests, and among the mountains; but, persecuted from all sides, it soon melted away.

AETIUS, b. in Antioch; d. in Constantinople 367; was successively "a slave, a travelling tinker, a goldsmith, a physician, a shoemaker, a theologian, and at last the apostle of a new Church," representing the widest-going section of the Arian party, and teaching that the Son was unlike the Father, ἀνόμοιος, of another substance, ἐξ ἑτέρας οὐσίας, created of nothing, ἐξ οὐκ ὄντων, wherefore his adherents were called Anomœans, Heterusiasts, or Exukontians. They were also called Eunomians, after Eunomius, the pupil and friend of Aetius.

AFFECTIONS vary with the individual, and also with the occasion. They are, however, largely a matter of self-control, and properly come under the cognizance of Christian ethics, as in the old systems. Viewed from a biblical stand-point it may be granted: 1. Affections are natural, proper, God has them, and is governed by them; therefore stoicism on the one hand, and the sickly piety of mystical pietism, are alike alien to the practical, healthy Christian. 2. No class of affections is per se sinful, and hence condemnatory. Christ ran the gamut. He was sorrowful (Matt. xxvi. 38), grieved (Luke xix. 41), agonized (Luke xxii. 44), compassionate (Matt. ix. 36), indignant (John ii. 14), joyful and delighted (Luke x. 21), and sometimes very strongly moved (Mark iii. 21). As the Master, so the disciples, showed affections. Paul and Peter, James and John, were men of like passions with ourselves. The New Testament speaks of a "zeal of God" (John ii. 17; Rom. x. 2), a "godly sorrow" (2 Cor. vii. 10); and distinguishes between allowed (Eph. iv. 26) and prohibited (Col. iii. 8) anger. 3. No Christian has the right to give rein unto his affections (1 Cor. vii. 30; Eph. iv. 26; 1 Pet. iv. 7, v. 8). More is demanded of the Christian than measured affections: he must be dominated by those affections issuing from a pure regard for the welfare of others, and the things of God as the examples of Christ and his apostles teach us (John ii. 17; Rom. ix. 2, xii. 15; 2 Cor. xi. 29); while all impure and lower affections are to be suppressed (Matt. v. 22-30, 33-47, x. 37). Looked at from this stand-point many affectional emotions may be unchristian, which yet have a religious appearance; e. g., the zeal of the Boanerges to call down fire from heaven as a punishment for the insult of some Samaritans to the Prophet of Galilee (Luke ix. 54-56), or like a pity which is merely general and wholly human, and yet would fain be reckoned divine (Matt. xvii. 22, 23). Christianity, by its moral discipline of the affections, may therefore, to some, appear a refined stoicism; but in reality it checks the spontaneous outgo of the affections, and turns them unto higher uses. [See JONATHAN EDWARDS: A Treatise concerning the Religious Affections.]

H. PARET (from first ed. of Herzog).

AFFRE, Denis Auguste, b. at St. Rome-de-Tarn, Sept. 27, 1793; d. in Paris, June 27, 1848; was ordained priest in 1816, and made Vicar-General of the diocese of Luçon in 1821, of Amiens in 1823, of Paris in 1834, and Archbishop of Paris in 1840. During the revolution of 1848 he was led by an anonymous letter to believe that he could restore peace by personally addressing the insurgents, and, with a green bough in his hand, he climbed a barricade in the Place de la Bastille; but he had hardly begun to speak, when he was struck by a musket-ball, and mortally wounded. He wrote several treatises on historical, educational, and religious subjects, and an Essai sur les Hieroglyphes Egyptiens, 1834, declaring the system of Champollion insufficient to explain the hieroglyphics.

AFRICANUS, Julius, a learned Christian from the latter part of the second and the first part of the third century; b. in Africa, perhaps of Lybian descent, but settled at Nicopolis in Palestine. Of his two great works,—the Pentabiblos, a world-chronicle from the creation to the time of the author, and the Cestus, a book on natural history,—only fragments have come down to us through Eusebius, Syncellus, and others. But two very interesting letters by him—one to Origen, on the authenticity of the History of Susannah; and another to Aristides, on the discrepancy between the two genealogies of Christ in Matthew and Luke—are extant in almost complete form. The first of these letters has been repeatedly edited and printed, as by LEO CASTRIUS, Salamanca, 1570, and by WETSTEIN, Basel, 1674.

AFRICA, the Church of, forms a separate chapter in the history of the Christian Church as an individual development determined by the peculiarities of race, climate, and other agencies. At the beginning of the Christian era, Africa was divided politically into four provinces,—Africa Proconsularis, Numidia, and the two Mauritania; and these four provinces formed ecclesiastically one diocese, in which Carthage gradually assumed the rank and dignity of a metropolitan see, especially during the occupancy of Cyprian. Other celebrated bishops' sees were Hippo, Ta-gaste, Madaurus, etc. The beginnings of Christianity in Africa are obscure; but, on account of the very lively intercommunication between Rome and this province, it was natural that the new religion should be carried thither very early, and, once introduced, it could not fail to produce an impression, either of passionate enthusiasm, or of fanatical hatred, on a popular mind so vigorous, so ardent, and so unsophisticated as the African. Nowhere the persecutions were more severe and cruel, and nowhere they were met with greater endurance and heroism. Witnesses are the Apologeticus of Tertullian, written during the persecution of Septimius Severus (203), and his epistle ad Scapulam, written during the persecution of Caracalla (211); the De Lapsis of Cyprian, written after the persecution of Decius (251); and the sublime example of Felix of Tabura (Tubzoca, Thibar) under the persecutions of Diocletian (313). It may be added that nowhere assumed heresies and sectarianism greater proportions and a more aggressive character. The Donatists actually fought, and that not in self-defence.

Compared with the Oriental churches, especially that of Alexandria, the African Church is realistic and practical. Its heresies, Montanism, Novatianism, Donatism, are moral rather than speculative; and the speculations of Tertullian, Cyprian, Augustine, are psychological rather than metaphysical. While the Gnostics tried to solve the great problems of the creation of the world and the origin of evil by the subtle and fantastic doctrine of emanation, Tertullian, the founder of Latin theology, retains the biblical ideas of a creation ex nihilo and a prince of evil in their simplest and most positive form; and, disdaining to apply any dialectical mediation to metaphysical contradictions, he defines his standpoint as a credo quia absurdum. While the Eastern churches, so to speak, exhausted themselves in the metaphysical exposition of the Trinitarian and Christological doctrines, Augustine, the greatest teacher of the Western Church, alighted on a question whose psychological import gave it an immediate practical bearing,—the question of free will and grace. After the death of Augustine, and the invasion of the Vandals (430), the African Church fell into decay; and the conquest of the country by the Saracens (698) completed its ruin. But through its two great teachers, Tertullian and Augustine, it has set its mark forever on the theology of Latin Christianity; and through its third great teacher, Cyprian, it has exercised a similar influence on the organization and policy of the Western Church. See the separate articles, and JULIUS LLOYD: The North African Church, London, 1880.

AGAPE, plr. AGAPÆ, from the Greek ἀγάπη, "love," feast of love, a custom in the primitive Church according to which all the members of a congregation, even the master and his slaves, met together at a common meal, celebrating the Eucharist, as brethren among brethren. It would not be difficult to find striking precedents for such an institution, both among the Jews and the Greeks and the Romans. In his letter to Trajan, Pliny classes it among the meetings of secret societies, so well known to the Romans of the empire. It is more probable, however, that it grew up directly from the simple and natural commemoration of the events of "the night in which the Lord was betrayed" (1 Cor. xi. 23). It is mentioned for the first time in the Epistle of Jude (12); and during the next three or four centuries it is often spoken of by the Fathers: Tertullian gives a vivid and touching description of it in his Apologeticus, c. 39.

Originally the character of the agapæ was strictly devotional: the feast culminated in the celebration of the Eucharist. At the same time, however, it was a social symbol of the equality and solidarity of the congregation. Here all gave and received the kiss of love; here communications from other congregations were read and answered, etc. As now the congregations grew larger, the social differences between the members began to make themselves felt, and the agapæ changed character. They became entertainments of the rich. In Alexandria "the psalms and hymns and spiritual songs" of old (Eph. v. 19; Col. iii. 16) were supplanted by performances on the lyre, the harp, and the flute, in spite of Clement's protest (Pædag. II. 4). In other places the rich retired altogether from the meetings, and the agapæ sank down into a kind of poorhouse institution (August. Contra Faustum, XX. 20). Again, in Northern Italy, Ambrose suppressed them altogether, because they gave rise to disorders, and propagated reminiscences from the Pagan parentalia.

Other circumstances contributed also to throw the agapæ out of use. The Third Council of Carthage (391) decreed that the Eucharist should be taken fasting, and thereby separated the celebration of the Eucharist from the agapæ. The synod of Laodicea, and again the Third Council of Carthage, and finally the Council in Trullo (692), forbade to hold the agapæ in the church-buildings, and bereft them thereby altogether of their devotional character. After the close of the fourth century they began gradually to disappear; and an attempt made by the Council of Gaugra (about 380) to restore them to their old position by anathematizing all who despised them, and kept away from them, was in vain.

AGAPETUS is the name of two popes.—1. AGAPETUS I., June 3, 533, to April 22, 536, pawned the holy vessels of the churches of Rome in order to procure money for a journey to Constantinople, ostensibly for the purpose of averting the war with which the Emperor Justinian threatened Theodohad, king of the Ostrogoths, but in reality intent upon attacking the monophysitic heresy represented in the Eastern Church by Anthimus, patriarch of Constantinople, the Empress Theodora, and a large party at the Byzantine court. In this he was completely successful. Anthimus was deposed, and Mennas put in his place. But Agapetus did not enjoy his triumph very long; he died during his visit to Constantinople. Five letters of his are found in MANSI: Concil. VIII.—2. AGAPETUS II., April, 946 to November, 955, owed his elevation to the intrigues of Alberic, in whose hands he remained a willing tool during his whole reign. In France Archbishop Artold of Rheims had been expelled from his see by Hugo of Vermandois, and the contest between the two prelates grew almost into a civil war. Agapetus sided first with the one party, then with the other, and had no influence on the final decision by the synod of Ingelheim (948), where Hugo was excommunicated, and Artold re-instated. As weak and vacillating was his policy in Germany. Having invited Otho I. to come to Rome and be crowned emperor, he became frightened when the king arrived at Pavia, and stretched his hands out towards his enemies.

AGATHA, St., whose death-day is celebrated by the Roman-Catholic Church on Feb. 5, belongs to that class of saints of which one does not know whether they ever have existed, or not. See Dr. FRANZ GÖRRES: Kritische Untersuchung über die licinianische Christenverfolgung, Jena, 1875. What the acts and biographies contain is such a mixture of legend and fable, that hardly the smallest particle of historical fact could be extracted from them. But although it is probable that St. Agatha never lived, her name has, nevertheless, played a conspicuous role, especially in Southern Italy and Sicily. In several places in Sicily she is still worshipped as the patron-saint against the eruptions of Mount Ætna; and the cities of Palermo and Catania still contest the honor of being her birthplace.

AGATHIAS, b. at Myrina in Æolis about 536; d. in Constantinople about 594; studied philosophy in Alexandria, and law in Constantinople; pleaded in the courts of the latter city; and wrote, besides some poetry, a history of the Byzantine Empire from 533 to 559, containing much interesting and reliable information about the character and religion of the various nations with which the Byzantine government had to deal. Best edition by NIEBUHR in Corpus Script. Hist. Byzant., with a Latin translation of Vulcanius.

AGATHO, pope from 678 to Jan. 10, 682, a Sicilian monk, succeeded Donus on the papal throne. On the sixth oecumenical council at Constantinople (680), he took a decided stand in the Monothelitic controversy, and carried his point, though his victory involved the anathematization of one of his infallible predecessors, Honorius. Eight letters of his are still extant, —two to the council and the emperor; MANSI, XI. pp. 234, 286; four granting privileges to Wearmouth Abbey, BEDE: *Hist. HERZOG.

AGE. Both Church and State require a certain age in those who do, or have done upon them, certain acts. Thus confirmation is not to be administered until "years of discretion" are reached. On the Continent, among Protestants, this is usually understood to be at fourteen; among Roman Catholics, as early as seven. Marriage-contracts are declared void by canon law if the parties are under seven; nor can they be married before the man is fourteen and the wife twelve, and not without the consent of their guardians ere they are twenty-one. State laws differ upon this point, varying from eighteen to twenty-five for the man, and fourteen to eighteen for the wife, as the ages of permissibility. The question of age enters into the matter of ordination. The Roman-Catholic Church has determined upon the following: For the lowest orders, the tonsure, etc., seven years; the diaconate, twenty-two; the priesthood, twenty-four; the episcopacy, thirty. The pope can, if he pleases, grant a dispensation to allow ordination at earlier ages, and allows the bishops to consecrate to the priesthood a year under twenty-four. Monastic vows cannot be assumed, according to the Council of Trent, before the sixteenth year, nor can a female enter an order before she be twelve; but the majority of orders demand a higher age. Thirty years is also the youngest age for an abbot, and forty for an abess or prioress.

AGELLIUS, or AGELLI, Antonio, b. at Sorrento 1532; d. at Acerno 1608; was a member of the institution of the scholastici, who had charge of the printing establishment of the Vatican; superintended the correction of the Vulgate and the Roman edition of the Septuagint; became Bishop of Acerno in 1593, and wrote commentaries on the Psalms, the Canticles, the Book of Lamentations, the Book of Proverbs, Habakkuk, etc. He also edited Cyril's Five Books against Nestorius, Rome, 1607, accompanied by a Latin translation.

AGENDA, German form AGENDE (Lat. "things to be done"), describes divine worship in general, and the Mass in particular. The oldest writers use it only in the plural. We meet with agenda diei, the office for the day; agenda mortuorum, the office for the dead; agenda matutina and vespertina, morning and evening prayers. Very naturally the word passed over from the service to the book which contained the forms. In 1287 Johannes de Janua uses agenda in the sense of the book of forms for baptism and benediction. The word in a different spelling, Agendé, is the ordinary Lutheran term for the Church services or liturgy; but in the Roman Church, since the sixteenth century, the word "Ritual" has been used. See LITURGY, MISSAL, RITUAL.

When Luther had broken with the Church of Rome, he found himself compelled to arrange a public service which should embody the ideas of the Reformation. The greatest difference touched the Lord's Supper. Luther began with forms for the Wittenberg Church (1524): but these books were quickly multiplied; the divided condition of the empire necessitated different books for each petty kingdom or duchy. Though quite different in contents, they are all distinguished from the Missal of the Roman Church by being written in the vernacular, although in some the Latin text was also printed. They retain the older ecclesiastical terms, and speak of ordination and confirmation, although the Episcopal office had been abolished. The oldest Agende is of the Duchy of Prussia (1525). As the religious development took these forms, — the strict Lutheran, the Calvinistic, and the Semi-Catholic, — each form had its distinctive liturgy. So things went on till the Thirty-Years' War, that period of dire confusion, destroyed all peaceful church life, and well-nigh the Church itself. When the distracted churches again could lift their heads, they arranged new forms (1650), which differed as much as ever; and yet all showed the new spirit which had arisen, — Pietism, that striving after greater devotion in worship and purity of life. The next century was a decided falling-off. Pietism gave place to Rationalism. The Iron Age was followed by the Leaden Age. But in the present century reform has been made, and the matter is under earnest discussion, and many are the printed specimens of revised liturgies. The new epoch began with the appearance of the New Prussian Agende, 1822. The desire is to unite the Lutheran and the Reformed churches in Prussia in one worship.

The Reformed churches have from the beginning manifested an equal interest in the order of worship; and Zwingli demanded, as Luther, the fullest liberty of choice. The movement followed a course similar to the Lutheran. From 1523 on appeared, one at a time, forms for the more important services, — baptism, marriage, Lord's Supper, etc., — composed by Zwingli or Leo Judæ. The name Agendé is rarely used. The Swiss liturgy is peculiar in the sacramental portions, in the announcement of the dead from the pulpit, and in the particular prayers for the different feasts. The Calvinistic or French liturgy follows that of Calvin, composed for the Genevan Church: it sometimes appears bound up with the New Testament.

AGIER, Pierre Jean, b. in Paris, Dec. 28, 1748; d. there Sept. 22, 1823; studied law, and held various high positions in the French courts, both during the Revolution and the reign of Napoleon and the Bourbons, but was, by his intimate connection with the Jansenists, early led into comprehensive theological studies. His principal work is Les Prophètes nouvellement traduits de l'hébreu avec des explications, et des notes critiques, 11 vols., 1820–1823. Among his other works are Le Jurisconsulte national, 1789; Vues sur la reformation des lois civiles, 1793; Traité sur le mariage, 2 vols., 1800; Psaumes, nouvellement traduits, 3 vols., 1809; Prophéties concernant Jésus-Christ et l'Eglise, 1819; Vues sur le second avènement de Jésus-Christ, 1818.

AGNES, St., is commemorated in the Roman Church on Jan. 21 and 28 (the Gelasian liturgy giving the former date, the Gregorian the latter, as her death-day), and in the Greek Church on Jan. 14 and 21 and on July 5. But the oldest documents, the Calendarium Romanum, the Calendarium Africanum, and the Gothic and Oriental Missale, agree in fixing Jan. 21 as her death-day; and to that day Bolland has assigned the acts of her martyrdom (Act. Sanct. Jan. p. 350–363). Also the year of her death is uncertain; but Ruinart has shown (Act. Mart. III., p. 82) that it cannot have occurred until about 304, and that the acts ascribed to Ambrosius, and, in the old editions, given among his works, are spurious. Her name is associated with a number of romantic and miraculous legends; but she was probably a veritable Christian maiden of Rome, who kept her chastity under severe trials, and suffered martyrdom by the sword in the Diocletian persecution. In mediæval art she is generally represented as followed by a lamb; and in her church in Rome two lambs, of whose wool the archiepiscopal palliums are made, are annually consecrated by the pope. Her name, however, is not derived from the Latin agnus, "a lamb," but from the Greek ἄγνη, "chaste."

AGNOETÆ (Ἀγνοηταί, from ἄγνοεω, "to be ignorant of") is the name of two sects.

I. The first was founded by Eunomius and Theophronius, in the latter part of the fourth century, and called by Socrates (Hist. Eu. V. 24) the Eunomio-Theophronians. They consisted of Arians, and maintained that God knew the past by memory, and the future by divination, and that his omniscience was limited to the present.

II. Of more importance was the second sect (founded in the sixth century by Themistius, deacon of Alexandria), sometimes called the Themistians, and consisting chiefly of the Severian fraction of the Monophysites. They maintained that Christ, according to his human soul, was, like one of us, limited in every respect, in knowledge too, and referred to Mark xiii. 32, "Of that day and that hour knoweth no man, no, not the angels which are in heaven, neither the Son, but the Father;" and to John xi. 34, the question of Christ concerning Lazarus, "Where have ye laid him?" The heresy was revived by the Adop-tionists in the eighth century.

AGNOSTICISM is a theory of the Unknowable, which assumes its most definite form in the denial of the possibility of any knowledge of God. This negative position is connected with a theory that we know only the phenomenal. It may be said to spring out of this theory as a logical deduction; though Agnosticism has been favored by those who do not hold the phenomenal theory of knowledge, but rest their doctrine that the Infinite and Absolute are unknowable, on the limitation of human intelligence, maintaining that the Infinite transcends the limits of our knowledge, and must, on that account, remain unknown, while the existence of the infinite God must be a matter of belief. There is thus considerable diversity as to the grounds on which Agnosticism finds favor; but the prevailing form of the theory is that resting upon the assertion of the exclusively phenomenal aspect of human knowledge.

Agnosticism is of modern growth, and may be traced to Kant's theory of knowledge. Kant's Critical Philosophy was an attempt to ascertain the conditions of knowledge by determining how much comes through experience, and how much is contributed by the mind, not as actual knowledge, but as necessary forms of knowing, thus determining the possibilities of our knowledge. Kant attributed all our knowledge to three distinct cognitive faculties, — the sensory, the understanding, and the reason. The sensory gives us the observations or perceptions of the phenomenal; the understanding gives the more advanced and elaborated knowledge, grouped under the categories or pure conceptions, — quantity, quality, relation, and modality; the reason gives us the ideas which are regulative of the whole system of our knowledge; and these are the soul, the universe, and God. In prosecuting his task Kant proceeded to show that there are certain a priori elements in all knowledge, whether given by the sensory, the understanding, or the reason. "All our knowledge begins with sense, proceeds thence to understanding, and ends with reason, beyond which nothing higher can be discovered in the human mind for elaborating the matter of intuition, and subjecting it to the highest unity of thought" (Critique of Pure Reason, Meiklejohn's Trans., p. 212. Transcendental Dialectic, Introduction, II. A.). "The matter of intuition" describes the successive impressions received through the sensory. This matter is worked up into systematized knowledge under the categories of the understanding, which power may therefore be described as "a faculty for the production of unity of phenomena by virtue of rules" (Ib. p. 214). When Kant speaks of our knowledge ending with reason, he means that reason, "the faculty of principles," supplies to the understanding principles for regulation of its procedure; and this is the highest reach of human intelligence. In this way Kant's theory of knowledge is, that all the matter of our knowledge is phenomenal, coming through the senses; all the form is supplied by the mind itself; and in this way it follows that space and time, the categories and the ideas,—the Soul, the Universe, and God,—are only regulative of mental procedure, and do not afford any knowledge of real existence. This latter conclusion is not a mere casual inference from the doctrine elaborated by Kant, but is formally announced, worked out in detail, and insisted upon. There is, indeed, an important and valuable corrective in Kant's philosophy, that is, his ethical system, with the categorical imperative,—the "thou shalt" of moral law,—carrying by implication the reality of the divine existence as the moral governor under whose sway all rational agents are placed. His theory of knowledge, however, remains essentially phenomenal; and thus the highest contributions of reason are held to be merely regulative of the procedure of the mind in methodizing the phenomena presented in our experience. They are inevitably illusive when we attempt to apply them as if they might be evidence of objective existence. If we turn to the highest faculty of our nature, that is, reason, it is so obviously the source of what it brings into experience, that "it does not borrow either from the senses or the understanding" (Ib. 212); but there is "a natural and unavoidable illusion, which rests upon subjective principles, and imposes these upon us as objective" (Ib. 211). From the structure of his theory, it becomes a necessity with Kant to insist upon this illusory action of reason; and he does it resolutely, as if it were a leading feature in his scheme. Thus he urges, that, in our reason, there exist fundamental rules and maxims "which have completely the appearance of objective principles" (Ib.). This illusion he declares it impossible to avoid, any more than we can help the appearance of the sea being higher at a distance than near the shore. His general position is indicated thus: "I accordingly maintain that transcendental ideas can never be maintained as constitutive ideas, that they cannot be conceptions of objects, and that, when thus considered, they assume a fallacious and dialectic character" (Appendix to Transc. Dialectic, Ib. p. 395). This rapid summary of Kant's doctrine may suffice to show how strenuously he denied that our idea of God is any guaranty for the reality of the divine existence. At the same time it will be remarked, that, according to him, the idea of God is illusory, just as, and not otherwise than, the idea of self is, and the idea of the universe. Standing in these relations, his theory that God is unknowable will be disposed of under the demands of practical life by the rejection of the suggestion that self and the universe are equally, and for the same reasons, unknowable. But the thorough-going rejection of Kant's Agnosticism is to be found only in the criticism of his theory of cognition, and the supplanting of it with a true theory of knowledge.

Hamilton and Mansel may be taken together, as, by their conjoint efforts, they present the next phase of Agnosticism. Sir William Hamilton, influenced rather by the general drift of Kant's thinking than by the actual structure of his theory, insisted that the Infinite must be "incognizable and inconceivable; its notion being only negative of the conditioned, which last can alone be positively known or conceived" (Discussions on Philosophy, p. 12). In the following manner he works out his view: "The mind can conceive, and consequently can know, only the limited and the conditionally limited. The unconditionally unlimited, or the Infinite, the unconditionally limited, or the Absolute, cannot positively be construed to the mind; they can be conceived only by a thinking away from, or abstraction of, those very conditions under which thought itself is realized: consequently the notion of the unconditioned is only negative,—negative of the conceivable itself" (Ib. p. 13). Pushing this representation to its utmost verge, he says, "The Infinite and Absolute are only names of two counter imbecilities of the human mind" (Ib. p. 21). His position as to the divine existence is brought into relation with his doctrine of ignorance, or negative conceptions thus: "We must believe in the infinity of God; but the infinite God cannot by us, in the present limitation of our faculties, be comprehended or conceived" (Lect. on Metaphysics, II. p. 374). This is not the Kantian doctrine; but it is still a theory of ignorance based on the recognized limits of human thought. It admits a belief, but denies a knowledge, being explicit on the limits of knowledge, but far from explicit on the limits of belief. On this account, Kant's doctrine on its purely intellectual side (omitting the ethical) has a consistency which does not appear in Hamilton's theory. The doctrine of Hamilton was accepted by Mansel, and used as a form of defence for theology. After the Edinburgh philosopher, he repeats, "The Infinite is merely a name for the absence of those conditions under which thought is possible" (Mansel's Limits of Religious Thought, p. 72). His apologetic aim appears in these words: "We learn that the provinces of reason and faith are not co-extensive; that it is a duty enjoined by reason itself to believe in that which we are unable to comprehend" (Ib. p. 96).

This, however, leaves unexplained the philosophic harmony of reason and faith; that is, the possibility of showing how our thoughts concerning God are to be harmonized with our belief in his existence. The whole range of this discussion has been brought under review by the present writer. (Philosophy of the Infinite.) The discussion involves a difference of words, which is of slight value, leading to debate as to the true Infinite; since there is and can be but one Infinite, — not within our thoughts, but above all, and beyond all. Its real interest lies in the theory of knowledge connected with the theory of belief, — a theory which must involve an answer to the question, "Can the infinite God reveal himself to finite intelligences? And this is a question for eternity as well as for time, since it is needless to introduce, in the language of Hamilton, "the present limitation of our faculties;" for the limitation must continue hereafter, as it is recognized in the present. That the finite cannot comprehend the Infinite is a position which can occasion no discussion; but, to those granting a belief in the infinitude of God, the question is, How far does such belief imply knowledge? Hamilton and Mansel both denied the possibility of knowledge, and from their own stand-point were upholders of Agnosticism.

From these two philosophers we find the doctrine pass over into the hands of a different school of thinkers. Those who trace all knowledge to experience naturally accepted a doctrine of Agnosticism as to Infinite and Absolute, and specially hailed it as coming from the opposite school of thought. To them it seemed as a surrender of the whole theory against which they contend, and a vindication of their favorite theory. Philosophers of the a priori school had been fabricating a weapon which could with great advantage be turned against themselves. Discussions on the relativity of human knowledge were eagerly taken up by sensationalists, under the lead of Hamilton's theory, as illustrated in J. S. Mill's Examination of Hamilton's Philosophy, p. 2. Mill was not hampered, as Hamilton was, with the admission that "we must believe in the infinity of God;" but he could state, "It is almost superfluous for me to say that I am entirely with Sir W. Hamilton." According to his theory of knowledge, Mill necessarily rejected the doctrine "that we have an intuitive knowledge of God," saying, "Whatever relates to God I hold to be matter of inference; I would add, of inference a posteriori" (Ib. p. 45). Mill's quarrel with Hamilton is, that he does not carry out his theory of ignorance with sufficient thoroughness, and does not rigidly treat absolute and infinite as "unmeaning abstractions" (Ib. p. 70).

Herbert Spencer as an Evolutionist began his system of philosophy with "The Unknowable," professedly "carrying a step farther the doctrine put into shape by Hamilton and Mansel," and giving his adhesion to a belief in "an Absolute that transcends not only human knowledge, but human conception" (Preface to First Principles). He enters upon the relations between religion and science; admitting that "religious ideas of one kind or other are almost, if not quite, universal" (Ib. p. 13), and that religion "expresses some eternal fact." Thus Herbert Spencer escapes the meshes of the Manichean theory, in which J. S. Mill was entangled. Treating of our forms of thought, he directs attention upon general "symbolic conceptions," such as we have of the earth. Such conceptions "are legitimate, provided, that, by some cumulative or indirect process of thought, . . . we can assure ourselves that they stand for actualities;" but without this all such conceptions "are altogether vicious and illusive, and in no way distinguishable from pure fictions" (Ib. p. 29). As to the origin of the universe, he seeks to show that the Atheistic, Pantheistic, and Theistic views are "verbally intelligible," but, when critically examined, "literally unthinkable" (Ib. 35). Nevertheless he allows "that we are obliged to suppose" that there is a First Cause, and "are driven by an inexorable logic" to the conclusion that he must be infinite and independent (Ib. 37, 38). Next he quotes from Mansel as proving that the Infinite and Absolute cannot be known, and then affirms "the omnipresence of something which passes comprehension," belief in which is "that belief which the most unsparing criticism of each (religious system) leaves unquestionable, or rather makes even clearer" (Ib. 45). "Here, then, is an ultimate religious truth of the highest possible certainty . . . that the Power which the universe manifests to us is utterly inscrutable" (Ib. 46). Thus is it admitted that the universe manifests a Power beyond and above itself, and at the same time it is maintained that this Power is inscrutable.

Agnosticism contemplated on its philosophic side is a professed exposition of the limits of human knowledge and thought, maintaining the impossibility of knowledge of the Infinite, in opposition to the theory of a restricted but true knowledge of the First Cause as infinite and absolute. Viewed from the theologic standpoint, it is by implication an exposition of limits of the Infinite, and restrictions on the Absolute, implying that God cannot reveal himself to created intelligence.

PSYCHOLOGICALLY. — Taken on its positive and philosophic side, Agnosticism is insufficient as a scheme of human knowledge. The phenomenal is not the limit of the knowable. The purely phenomenal aspect of our knowledge cannot be upheld either as to the universe, or self, or God. The outer universe is known to us by impressions made on the organism, and interpreted in intelligence; but what is thereby reached is not merely a knowledge of phenomena, but a knowledge of things; for it is impossible to combine and interpret phenomena of experience, without recognizing at once subjective experience and objective existence. And this is not a matter of inference or thought, but of knowledge. So is it as to the knowledge of self. It is given in experience, in every act of it, and is the knowledge of self as distinct from experience, and yet as possessing experience. In both cases knowledge is of more than the phenomenal. By another line of advance, knowledge is wider than the circle of experience. There is much known which never can be encompassed by experience, yet is recognized as explaining experience. The Infinite Being cannot be embraced in experience, cannot in this way be known. But there are truths not derived from experience, but daily implied in the interpretation of experience, which are self-evident truths, and not mere forms of thinking. Of these the law of causality is an example. This truth, that power exists adequate to the production of phenomena, is implied in all interpretation of experience and in all structure of science, and must carry us onward to knowledge of the First Cause, since knowledge of the effect is in some measure knowledge of the cause. A phenomenal theory of knowledge stands in conflict with all the sciences; while theology, by identity of rational data and method, is in harmony with them all.

ONTOLOGICALLY.—From the theological position, proceeding upon belief in the Divine existence as a certainty, admitted as such even by some upholders of Agnosticism, the theory is an exposition of alleged limits or restrictions applicable to the One Infinite and Absolute Being, and inconsistent as such. From the stand-point of theology,—taking finite existence as a reality, and personal existence as indubitable,—there is an inconsistency in supposing that God can create finite being, yet cannot make himself intelligible to an intelligent creation. Any difficulty which exists (there is a difficulty connected with the application of mere logical forms) applies as much to the creation of finite existence as distinct from the Self-existent One, as it applies to the knowledge through finite forms of the Infinite Being. If there be an intelligent creation and an intelligent Creator, he must assign to finite intelligence laws of intellectual action, guiding to certainty, so far as that is possible within the limits of the created intelligence, and specially to the harmony of all in the one great Source of all.

HENRY CALDERWOOD.

AGNUS DEI (Lat. "the Lamb of God"), an old Latin hymn, based on John i. 29: Agnus Dei, qui tollis peccata mundi, miserere nobis, early adapted to and incorporated with the liturgies, both of the Eastern and Western churches, and introduced into the Mass of the Roman Church by Sergius I. in 680.

The name is also applied to wax medallions, bearing the figure of a lamb, made from the remains of the paschal taper, consecrated by the pope, and by him presented to distinguished persons. These medallions were often enclosed in cases of costly workmanship, and carefully preserved, almost as if they were relics. One said to have belonged to Charlemagne is among the treasures of the Cathedral of Aix-la-Chapelle. The popes give them.

M. HEROLD.

AGOBARD, b. in Spain 779; d. at Saintonge 840; since 816 Archbishop of Lyons; the successor of Leidrad; belonged to that group of great men which grew up in France under the reviving and stimulating influence of Charlemagne. In theological respects he became known by his polemic against the Adoptionists and the Jews, by his liberal views of the doctrine of inspiration, by several works on liturgy, etc.; but he also attacked and refuted some of the most common superstitions of his time, such as the production of hail-and-thunder-storms by bad men, etc., and he wrote against one of the most hallowed customs of his age, the ordeals and judicial combats. His works were edited by PAPIRIUS MASSON, Paris, 1605; by BALLUGE, Paris, 1666; by GALLAND: Biblioth. Patr. XIII.; by MIGNE: Patrol. 104. [See LECKY: History of Rationalism, 1865; REUTER: Geschichte der Aufklärung im Mittelalter, 1875.] HUNDESHAGEN.

AGREDA, Maria de, b. 1602; d. May 24, 1665; superior, since 1627, of the Franciscan Convent of the Immaculate Conception, which her parents had founded on their estate at Agreda, Old Castile; and author of the Mistica Ciudad de Dios, Madrid, 1670,—a biography of the Virgin, whose romantic and fantastic contents gave so much the more offence since the Franciscans introduced the book as a divine revelation. In the Roman-Catholic Church there arose a sharp controversy, both as to whether the said nun was author of the book or not, and as to the contents of the book, which by the Sorbonne was declared to be scandalous and offensive, and which occasioned the Spanish and Portuguese inquisitions to forbid its reading. The pope, however, never saw fit to give a decision.

ZÖCKLER.

AGRICOLA, Johann, b. April 20, 1492, at Eisleben, whence he was often called Magister Islebius; d. in Berlin, Sept. 22, 1566. He studied in Wittenberg under Luther, and was in 1525 appointed director of the school of Eisleben, and preacher to St. Nicolai. He was a very successful preacher; but his aspiration was a chair in the University of Wittenberg, and when, in 1526, Melanchthon was preferred to him, his vanity was deeply wounded. The doctrinal difference between him and the other reformers, though not yet noticed, had also developed; and in 1532 he attacked the Articuli of Melanchthon. Dissatisfied with his position in Eisleben, he suddenly gave it up in 1536, and came to Wittenberg, where Luther took him and his family into his own house, and procured a pension for him from the elector. But the discrepancy between them, both in character and doctrine, was now too great; and in the following year Agricola directed an attack against Luther, and began the Antinomian controversy. Luther refuted him, and he retracted. New conflicts arose, however; and the new reconciliations proved too frail. In 1540 he fled to Berlin, where he was made preacher to the court, and afterwards superintendent of the Mark. He drew up the so-called Augsburg Interim, and labored much to have it adopted by all Protestant countries, thereby deepening still more the breach between himself and the reformers. Besides his theological works, Antinomia, Antinomine Theses, etc., he published a collection of German proverbs, Magdeburg, 1526. [GUSTAV KAWERAU: Johann Agricola von Eisleben, Berlin, 1881.]

G. PLITT.

AGRICULTURE AMONG THE HEBREWS.

Cain and Noah (Gen. iv. 2, ix. 21) were agriculturists, and thus at the very beginning of the race this pursuit was recognized. The patriarchs, although essentially nomads, now and then betrayed an inclination for a settled mode of life (cf. Gen. xx. 1 sq., xxvi. 6 sq.); but Isaac and Jacob raised no more than what was absolutely necessary to support life, and were not farmers in the ordinary sense of the term (Gen. xxvi. 12, xlii. 1). God, however, intended his people to cultivate the fertile valleys and plains of the Holy Land, and to this end arranged that the descendants of Jacob should for many years occupy the rich Goshen, and there be trained for their future; and thus the transition from the shepherd to the farmer life was easily made,—another evidence of God's wisdom and forethought. That the growing people of Israel carried out this intention is manifest from the fact that the hungry and thirsty tribes included in their retrospect of the attractions of Egypt a reference to Egypt's fertility (Num. xx. 5). The Mosaic legislation was pre-eminently adapted to agriculturists (cf. Michaelis, Mos. Recht, I. § 38 sq.); and it is well known that only the tribes of Simeon on the west, and of Reuben and Gad on the east bank of the Jordan, were nomadic. The other tribes had their fields and olive-yards, and jealously did Moses guard them. At the Year of Jubilee, the family property, even although another had bought it, reverted to its original owner (Lev. xxv. 23, 28).

Canaan was "a land flowing with milk and honey." Not only vineyards and orchards, but also fields covered with abundant harvests, gladdened the eyes with promised plenty. The cereals—wheat, barley, millet, and spelt, or, as others say, vetch (Vicia sativa), but not rye, which is unknown in southern countries—were raised. Beans and lentils, flax, cucumbers, cummin, and onions were extensively cultivated. From the earliest times there was flax (Josh. ii. 6; Prov. xxxi. 13; Hos. ii. 9); and the linen of the Hebrews enjoyed an excellent reputation. Mischna, babakam, 10. 9; Ketuboth, 5. 9; MOVERS: Phön. III. 1. p. 216 sq.

Canaan was a land full of water (Deut. viii. 7), and in this respect it is contrasted with Egypt (xi. 10-12). But the labor not put upon irrigation was required to build terraces, and thus agriculture was about as much laborious there as elsewhere. It is the neglect to terrace which is one chief reason of Palestine's present comparative sterility. Fertilizers were also used; such as burnt stubble (Isa. v. 24, xlvi. 14), the chaff of the threshing-floors, the excrements of cattle, and dung prepared with straw (Isa. xxv. 10; cf. 2 Kings ix. 37; Ps. lxxxiii. 10). The ploughing and harrowing were done with oxen (1 Kings xix. 19; Job i. 14; Amos vi. 12) or cows (Judg. xiv. 18); sometimes, also, with asses (Isa. xxx. 24, xxxii. 20), either singly or in pairs. The yoke used was a crosstree with two bows, to the upper side of which the pole was fastened by a cord. The animals were urged by a goad some six or eight feet long. The plough was merely a crooked stick having a wooden share shod with a triangular piece of iron. The land was generally ploughed every winter, spring, and summer. For harrowing, a board loaded with stones was employed, usually before, always after, the sowing (Job xxxix. 10; Isa. xxviii. 24).

The winter crops, particularly the pulse, were sown towards the beginning of November, just before the autumn or former rains; the barley, a fortnight later; and still later the wheat, which was cast in rows (Isa. xxviii. 25). In December the fields were green (John iv. 35). The sowing of the summer crops—millet, beans, also of barley—came in January and February, in time for the later rains of March and early April. Soon after began the harvest-labor, rendered dangerous by the sun's heat (2 Kings iv. 18 sq.). Barley, lentils, and vetch were first gathered. The wheat and the spelt were harvested about the same time; but of course the time was later in the high lands than in the lower, and that by from a fortnight to a month. The grain was cut by a sickle, pretty close to the head, bound, and heaped. Gleanings were left to the poor (Lev. xix. 9; Ruth ii. 2). The threshing-floors were generally round, about fifty feet in diameter, if possible placed on high ground, so that the wind might carry off the chaff. Cattle or asses were driven upon the grain, and so it was threshed out; or else a machine was employed. The common kind was a board three feet wide, six or eight feet long, and three inches thick. Holes were bored on the lower side, and stones fastened so as to project through the holes, thus acting as teeth. But there was another kind, which consisted of a heavy square frame with rollers, each of which was encircled by three or four iron rings serrated like the teeth of a saw (Isa. xxviii. 27). Smaller quantities of grain and tender cereals were beaten out by a stick (Ruth ii. 17; Isa. xxviii. 27). The winnowing was accomplished by a broad shovel, or by a wooden fork with bent tines. The grain was thrown against the wind, so that the chaff was blown away. Usually this was done from four p.m. until sunrise (Ruth iii. 2; cf. Jer. iv. 11; li. 2). The chaff and stubble were burnt (Isa. v. 24; Matt. iii. 12). Corn was sifted in a sieve (Amos ix. 9), and then collected in great heaps. So it remained until it could be put into holes or into barns.

The scarcity of grain in spring and autumn, the droughts, sirocco, the grasshoppers, and attacks of enemies, rendered the crop a matter of uncertainty, and decreased the yield. And yet the yield was considerable. Some cereals gave two crops a year. The joy of harvest was proverbial (Ps. ix. 3). Canaan was always able to supply the neighboring lands (1 Kings v. 11; Ezek. xxvii. 17; Ez. iii. 7; Acts xii. 20).

The law ruled agriculture as every thing else; for example, it was forbidden to plough with an ox and ass together, because clean and unclean animals must not be joined (Deut. xxii. 10); and diverse seeds must not be sown (Lev. xix. 19; Deut. xxii. 9). It was allowed to pluck the heads of ripened wheat while passing along the little path purposely made through the field (Deut. xxiii. 25; Matt. xii. 1; Luke vi. 1). The permission symbolized the beneficence of God, who feeds the hungry. The corners of the field, and gleanings, were always to be left at harvest-time (Lev. xix. 9; Deut. xxiv. 19). The ox who trod out the corn must not be muzzled (Deut. xxv. 4). The object of these latter regulations was to teach kindness toward God's creatures. We find upon the Egyptian monuments examples of similar laws. The first-fruits belonged to the Lord; the first three years' fruit of a young vineyard must not be gathered; the fruit of the fourth year belonged to Jehovah; and it was not until the fifth year that the owner could eat of it (Lev. xix. 23-25).

The three principal feasts of the Jews were connected with agriculture, and fitted to a people whose chief support was from their farms. On the day after the Passover Sabbath, the 16th Nisan, a sheaf of the first-fruits was brought. The conclusion of the seventh week after Passover was marked by the offering of two wave loaves, made out of the new flour of the year; while the fruit and vine harvest was celebrated by the Feast of Tabernacles (Lev. xxiii.). Every sabbath, and especially every sabbath-year and year of jubilee, by its abstinence from out-door labor, taught the Israelites God's sovereignty over their time and their land, and also that the highest good is not the product of earthly work and wealth.

AGRIPPA is the name of two members of the Herodian family.—Herod Agrippa I., a son of Aristobulus and Berenice, and grandson of Herod the Great and Mariamne, was educated in Rome together with Claudius, and obtained in 38, from Caligula, the territory of Philip—Batanæa, Trachonitis, and Auranitis—and the tetrarchy of Lysanias, with the title of king. In the following year he also received the tetrarchy of Antipas, Galilee, and Peræa, to which Claudius added Samaria and Judæa in 40. Thus he became king of the whole of Palestine, and reigned with great splendor, trying in every way to gain the favor of the Jews. The murder of James and the imprisonment of Peter (Acts xii. 1) had simply this purpose. His horrible death is described in exactly the same manner in Josephus: Ant. 19, 8, 2, and Acts xii. 23.

HEROD AGRIPPA II., in whose presence Paul declared his life, was a son of the preceding, but only seventeen years old when the father died. In 48 he obtained the principality of Chalcis, and the privilege of nominating the high priest, and superintending the temple of Jerusalem. In 52 he further obtained the tetrarchies of Philip and Lysanias, with the title of king. But the Jews never liked him; and, in the rebellion under Vespasian, he sided with the Romans, and fought by the side of Titus at the conquest of Jerusalem.

AGRIPPA, Heinrich Cornelius, b. at Cologne 1486; d. at Grenoble 1536; studied in Cologne, and Paris; spent then a couple of years (1507-8) in Spain; lectured in 1509 (in the University of Dôle, Franche-Comté), on Reuchlin's book, De Verbo Mirifico; served for some time Margaret of Austria, the Duchess of Parma, and regent of the Netherlands; went thence to England on some secret mission; returned to the Netherlands, but fell out with the monks; went to Cologne, and lectured on quæs- tiones quodlibetales; served for seven years in the imperial army in Italy (1511-1518), though at one time during this period he was sent to the Council of Pisa as a theologian, while at another he lectured on medicine, jurisprudence, and Hermes Trismegistus in Pavia and Turin; was appointed syndic at Metz in 1518, but was compelled to flee from the Inquisition; entered the service of the Duke of Savoy; practised medicine at Freiburg in 1523, became physician to the queen-mother of France, but was expelled, and fled to the Netherlands; was appointed historiographer to Charles V., and lived for some years under the protection of Archbishop Hermann of Cologne, but returned finally to France, where he died. As his life, so his books: he wrote about every thing. Of his two most celebrated works, the one, De Occulta Philosophia, written in 1509, but not printed until 1531, is a compilation from the Neo-Platonists and the Cabbala, and gives a plan of the world as a basis for the explication of the art of magic; while the other, De Vanitate Scientiarum (written in 1526, printed in 1526, and translated into various languages, into English in 1684), is a compilation from the Humanists and the Reformers, and gives a sceptical criticism, not only of all sciences and arts, but of life itself. But this contradiction is the character of the man. A devotee of the old church, he was always in opposition to its clergy; a champion of the spirit of the new time, he was utterly foreign to the Reformation. He was learned, but never became clear: he was active, but never in harmony with himself. A collected edition of his works was published at Lyons, 1600. See MORLEY: Life of Agrippa. London, 1856, 2 vols. C. WEIZSÄCKER.

AGUIRRE, Joseph Saenz d', b. March 24, 1630, at Logroño, Spain; d. in Rome, Aug. 19, 1699; entered the order of the Benedictines; became professor of theology in the University of Salamanca, Abbot of St. Vincenz, and secretary to the Inquisition, and was made cardinal in 1686 by Innocent XI., as a reward for his book, Defensio cathedræ Sancti Petri adversus Declarationes Cleri Gallici, 1682. He was a very prolific writer. The two most important of his works are, Collectio Maxima Conciliorum omnium Hispanicæ et novi orbis cum notis et dissertationibus. Rome, 1693, 4 vols.; 1753, 6 vols.; and Theologia S. Anselmi in 3 vols., but unfinished.

A'CUR. See PROVERBS.

A'HAB (father's brother). 1. The son of Omri, a king of the northern kingdom, called in the Assyrian cuneiform inscriptions Acha-abbre Sir'lai; i.e., Ahab of Israel. Through his wife Jezebel, the daughter of a Sidonian priest-king, he was led into the Baal worship, and allowed Jezebel to persecute the Jehovah prophets (1 Kings xviii. 4). Instead of these, Ahab maintained four hundred and fifty Baal, and his wife four hundred Ashera prophets (1 Kings xviii. 19). But that he was not successful in killing entirely the love for pure worship is manifest from the reception Elijah's efforts received, and particularly from the facts that such a man as Obadiah, who was the governor of Ahab's house, had one hundred Jehovah prophets hidden in a cave, and that Jehovah told Elijah that there were yet seven thousand who had not bowed the knees unto Baal (1 Kings xix. 18). Nevertheless Ahab inflicted incalculable injury upon Israel through his idolatry. In spite of Jehu and Hosea, the nation fell under a merited doom.

Ahab reigned brilliantly for twenty-two years, for in him the power of the northern kingdom culminated. He built cities, beautified Jezreel and made it his capital, erected an ivory palace (1 Kings xxii. 39), and several times waged successful war against Syria (1 Kings xx.). He entered into alliance with Jehoshaphat (1 Kings xxii.), as did later on Jehoram, Ahab's second son (2 Kings iii.). Ahab's daughter Athaliah married Jehoshaphat's son Jehoram (2 Kings viii. 18). But, although he thus exhibited shrewdness and energy, Ahab had not the ability to utilize his opportunities and advantages. Indecision and weakness characterized him. He trembled before Elijah, whom at first he denounced: he was moved by Micaiah's prophecy, although at first he pretended to be fearless. His action about the vineyard of Naboth was childish (1 Kings xxi.). His repentance was shallow: he was moved by impulses. And yet there was a gleam of virtue in him: he spared Benhadad his enemy (1 Kings xx. 33); and he had physical courage enough to stay upon the battle-field after his fatal wound (1 Kings xxii. 35). But upon him and all connected with him the curse of God rested. He dragged Israel and Judah into ruin.

2. A false prophet among the exiles in Babylon, who was roasted in the fire by Nebuchadrezzar (Jer. xxix. 21, 22). FR. W. SCHULTZ.

AHASUE'RUS (mighty man), the name of the king, not an epithet, mentioned in Esther, and identified with Xerxes, the son of Darius Hystaspes (B. C. 485-465), a Medo-Persian king, who is called upon the cuneiform inscriptions Khsy-ârshâ, or Khsay-ârshâ (see Benfey, The Cuneiform Inscriptions of Persia; Schrader, die Keilinschr. u. das alte Test. p. 245). The identification is complete: not simply are the names the same, but the characters described, especially the love of splendor and banqueting, the tyrannical disposition, the inconsiderateness and the intellectual dependence. For these as traits of Xerxes see Herod 7. 35, 37; 9. 10, 7; Justin. 2: 12; Strabo 14, also Spiegel, Eranische Alterthums-kunde II. p. 402 sq. The absence of Xerxes at the Greek war explains why Esther was not chosen until the seventh year of his reign, while Vashti was rejected in the third. The Ahasuerus of Ezra (iv. 6) is doubtless Xerxes, although Cambyses was formerly thought to be meant. But it is not definitely settled who the Ahasuerus of Daniel (ix. 1) is, but probably Astyages, the father of Darius the Mede, or the Cyaxares of Xenophon. Ahasuerus stands for Cyaxares in Tobit xiv. 15. FR. W. SCHULTZ.

AHAZ (possessor) was the son and successor of Jotham, and the eleventh king of Judah, ruling for sixteen years (B. C. 741-725). At the time of his accession he probably was not twenty (2 Kings xvi. 2), but twenty-five, as the LXX. and the Peshito translate (2 Chron. xxviii. 1); so that sixteen years later, his son Hezekiah might easily have been twenty-five years old (2 Kings xviii. 2). Ahaz was the weak and wicked successor of several excellent kings, and therefore could not keep what they had won. Pekah of Israel and Rezin of Syria, who had in the reign of Jotham become allies (2 Kings xv. 37), won back the East-Jordan territory, attacked Jerusalem, but could not take it. Rezin took Elath, however, and peopled it with Aramites. Pekah, on the other hand, slew in Judah one hundred and twenty thousand men, and carried two hundred thousand into captivity, but was compelled to give them up by the threat of a Jehovah prophet, Oded (2 Chron. xxviii. 9-51). While thus weakened, the Edomites and the Philistines fell upon him, and robbed him of territory (2 Chron. xxviii. 17, 18; cf. Isa. xiv. 28 sq.). Isaiah, who had just begun his prophetic career, told the king that Israel and Syria should occasion him no alarm, but that the Assyrians, to whom he paid hire, were his deadly enemies (Isa. vii. 2 sq.). And so it turned out. The Assyrians, who already had dealings with the northern kingdom, very gladly embraced this fresh opportunity to mingle themselves in the affairs of the western lands. Tiglath-pileser, King of Assyria, took the large moneys Ahaz sent, came into the Aramaic kingdom, and, as also the inscriptions show, slew Rezin, overran Israel, took several cities, and carried into captivity many from "Gilead, Galilee, and all the land of Naphtali" (2 Kings xv. 29, xvi. 9). But in return for these services Tiglath-pileser demanded and received all the treasure in the house of the Lord, and other moneys beside (2 Kings xvi. 17; 2 Chron. xxviii. 21), and then, according to the inscriptions, turned Ahaz into a vassal. It may well have been to secure the favor of his lord that Ahaz built the altar mentioned (2 Kings x. 10, 11). This was the beginning of Judah's dependence upon the great heathen powers (cf. Isa. lii. 4).

Keeping even pace with this dependence upon worldly might was the growth of superstition and idolatry. The prophet Isaiah has described this deterioration (ii. 6 sq., iii. 15 sq., viii. 19). Ahaz set up a Babylonian sun-dial, connected presumably with the sun-worship (Isa. xxxviii. 8), kept horses and chariot dedicated to the sun (2 Kings xxiii. 11), and built a so-called "upper chamber" upon the temple roof, in which he could worship "all the hosts of heaven" (2 Kings xxiii. 12). But he went even farther: sacrificed his own son to Moloch, and erected molten images for Baalim in the Valley of Hinnom (2 Kings xxiii. 12; 2 Chron. xxviii. 1-4). When he died, he was buried in the city, and not in the sepulchres of the kings of Israel (2 Chron. xxviii. 27); but this fact by itself proves nothing against him; for the same remark is made not only of the idolatrous Jehoram (2 Chron. xxi. 20), but of the better Joash (2 Chron. xxiv. 25) of Asa (2 Chron. xvi. 14), and even of Hezekiah (2 Chron. xxxii. 33). FR. W. SCHULTZ.

AHAZIA'H (whom Jehovah sustains). 1. The son and successor of Ahab, as King of Israel: he reigned two years (B. C. 897-896). Very few, but very bad, things are told of him. He did evil in the sight of the Lord. While ill from injuries received by a fall, he sought the help of Baalzebub. His messengers were met by Elijah, who sent them back with the prophecy of the king's death. Two companies of fifty, with their captains, sent to take Elijah, were destroyed by fire; but with the third, whose captain had treated him respectfully, he went, and in person repeated his prophecy. So Ahaziah died according to the words of the Lord (2 Kings i.). He was childless. The only event of importance recorded about him, is his commercial expedition to Tarshish in connection with Jehoshaphat of Judah. But his ships were destroyed (cf. 1 Kings xxii. 49; 2 Chron. xx. 36).

2. The son and successor of Jehoram, King of Judah, reigned only one year, B.C. 885 (2 Kings viii. 25-29; 2 Chron. xxii. 1-9), called Jehoahaz in 2 Chron. xxi. 17, and Azariah in 2 Chron. xxii. 6, either through mistake of the scribes, or because the names are the same. He allied himself with his uncle Jehoram, King of Israel. Israel rebelled under Jehu. The two kings met him in battle, and Jehu killed Jehoram. Ahaziah fled, was pursued and mortally wounded at the pass of Gur, but escaped, and died at Megiddo. In this way the two differing accounts of his death (2 Kings ix. 27 and 2 Chron. xxii. 9) can be reconciled.

FR. W. SCHULTZ.

AHIMELECH (brother of the king) was probably a son of Ahiah, and grandson of Ahitub, although often called his "son" (1 Sam. xxii. 9, 20), an Aaronite of the line of Ithamar, and therefore a successor of Eli in the priesthood at Nob. David, when fleeing from Saul, was fed by him upon the shew-bread, and furnished with Goliath's sword, for which he and eighty-four lower priests were slain by Saul at the instigation of Doeg the Edomite (1 Sam. xxii. 18).

AHITHOPHEL (brother of foolishness), a native of Giloh, and therefore styled the Gilonite in 2 Sam. xv. 12, the counsellor of David, highly valued because of his shrewdness and discretion. But, as the issue showed, he was not sincere in his attachment to David; for he offered to become Absalom's counsellor, under the mistaken idea that Absalom's rule would be permanent. But when he foresaw its downfall, and found his counsel slighted, he hanged himself, dreading David's revenge (2 Sam. xvii. 23).

AIDAN, b. in Ireland 605; d. at Lindisfarne, Aug. 31, 651; was educated in Iona, and went as missionary to Northumbria in 635. He took up his residence in the Island of Lindisfarne, where he founded a monastery of the Kuldee fashion and under Columba's rules. He could not speak the Saxon language when first he came to the country; but the king himself acted as interpreter; and his personal life, as well as that of his companions and pupils, made so deep an impression on the people that Northumbria was Christianized before he died. See BEDE: Hist. Eccle. III. c. 5 sq. THOMAS McLAUCHLAN: Early Scottish Church, Edinburgh, 1865; DANIEL DE VIXÈ: Irish Primitive Church, New York, 1870. I. H. A. EBRARD: Die iro-schottische Missionskirche, 1873.

AIGRADUS (Angradus or Ansgardus), a monk of Fontanelles, near Rouen; wrote, about 699, a life of St. Ansbert, Abbot of Fontanelles from 678 to 695, which, though interpolated by a later hand, is still of great value (Act. SS. Boll. Feb., II. pp. 347-356). He is also supposed to be the author of a fragment of a life of St. Lautbert, given anonymously by MABILLON, Acta SS. Ben. III. 2 p. 462-465.

AILLI, Pierre d' (Petrus de Alliaco), b. at Ailli-haut-clocher, in the department of Abbeville, 1350; d. in Avignon, Aug. 9, 1420; entered the University of Paris as a student of theology in the College of Navarre, 1372; wrote in 1375 his first book, a commentary on Petrus Lombardus (Questiones super libros sententiarum), which was published in 1440; and began to lecture on philosophy in the university, where he soon made the nominalism of Occam predominate. In 1380 he was made a doctor of theology; and his treatise at this occasion, as well as two other essays (De Legitimo Dominio and Utrum indoctus in jure divino possit juste prodesse in ecclesie regno, written at the same time, and published in Gerson. Oper. edition Dupin, Tom. I. pp. 641-644, 1706), show his theological stand-point. The Christian Church, he said, is founded on Christ, not on Peter; on the Bible, not on the canon law; and still more directly he enters into opposition to the Papists of his time by protesting that the pope is fallible in matters, both of faith and fact, and that the true representative of the Church is not the pope, but the œcumenical council. Nevertheless, in spite of these advanced views, he never transgresses the narrow boundaries of the mediæval Church. Dogmatically he defines faith as a knowledge of theological truths, and describes it as a magically infused inspiration; politically he considered the union of the Church as far more precious than its purity. In 1384, having in the mean time made a great impression by a series of sermons on St. Francis of Assisi (Tractatus et Sermones, Arg. 1490), he became director of the College of Navarre, where he had Gerson and Nicholas de Clemanges among his pupils; and in 1389, having two years previously gained great fame by his defence of the immaculate conception and the defeat of the Dominicans, he was made Chancellor of the University. Thus at the head of one of the most influential institutions in the Church, and possessed of a great fame as the "Eagle of France," the "Hammer of Heretics," his views of ecclesiastical affairs, more especially of the papal schism, became of great consequence, and he understood how to make them felt. After the death of Clement VII. (1394), Benedict XIII. was elected his successor; and it was due to Ailli's exertions that he was recognized by France. Nor did Benedict XIII. show himself ungrateful. In 1395 he made Ailli Bishop of Puy, and in 1397 Bishop of Cambray. Meanwhile the various negotiations made it perfectly plain to Ailli that a general council was the only effective remedy against the schism; and this view, while it estranged him somewhat from Benedict XIII., drew him nearer to John XXIII., who in 1411 made him a cardinal. His views at last prevailed. The Council of Constance deposed Gregory XII., John XXIII., and Benedict XIII.; and, though the Cardinal of Cambray was himself one of the candidates for the papal throne, he lived on very good terms with Pope Martin V., as whose legate he acted in Avignon. Besides being a very prolific writer on theological subjects, Ailli also wrote on geography; and his Imago Mundi (1410) has still interest as one of the sources from which Columbus drew his view of the possibility of a western passage from Spain to India. His astronomical writings occupy an intermediate position between astrological superstition and true science; but his propositions to the improvement of the calendar show comprehensive and sound views. There is a collected edition of his works, Douay, 1634; but it is not complete. See PAUL TSCHACKERT: Peter von Ailli, Gotha, 1877.

PAUL TSCHACKERT.

AILREDUS, b. 1109; d. 1166; a native of England, was educated in Scotland, entered the order of the Cistercians, became Abbot of Revesby, Lincolnshire, and wrote Historia de Vila et Miraculis S. Edwardi; Genealogia Regum Anglorum; De Bello Standardi; Historia de Sanctimoniali de Waltham; all in Twisden, Decem Scriptores, London, 1652; and Sermones de Tempore et Sanctis; Tractatus de puero Jesu duodecenni; Speculum caritatis, lib. III.; De Spirituali Amicitia, libri III., etc., edited by GIBBON, Douay, 1631; and in Bibl. Cister. V. and Bibl. Patrum, XXIII.

AIMOIN or AYMOIN, monk in St. Germain des Prés, near Paris, d. about 889; wrote a history of saints, of which the libri duo de S. Germani, episcopi Parisiensis miraculis have some historical value (see BÄHR: Geschichte der römischen Literatur in carolingischen Zeitalter, p. 242). Different from him is Aimoin, monk in Fleury, d. 1008, who, on the instance of Abbo of Fleury, his patron, wrote the Historia Francorum, libri IV., from 253 to 654. The work itself has no worth; but the continuation of it up to 727 is valuable (BOUQUET: Script. rer. Franc., III.).

AINSWORTH, Henry, b. at Pleasington, Lancashire, about 1560; d. in Amsterdam about 1623; was educated in the grammar-school of Blackburn; studied at Cambridge; adopted the platform of the Independents, such as represented by the Brownists; and was in 1593 driven away from his native country. For the rest of his life he lived in Amsterdam, at the beginning in great poverty, but afterwards, as teacher of the Brownist Church of that city, in better circumstances. He partook with great zeal in the controversies of the day, and wrote, for instance, A Defence of the Holy Scriptures against Smyth, 1609; but his great fame he acquired as a Hebrew scholar. His Annotationes to the Pentateuch, Psalms, and Canticles were collected in 1627, and repeatedly reprinted; latest edition, Edinburgh, 1843, 2 vols. See NEAL: History of the Puritans; WILSON: Dissenting Churches.

AIX-LA-CHAPELLE (German Aachen, Latin Aquis-Granum) received its name from its warm springs, whose medicinal qualities were very early recognized. The German name, Aachen, is not a corruption of aqua, but derived from the Old High German ach, aha, oh, "water." The latter part of the Latin name is supposed to have been derived from some proper name. The eastern tower of the city hall is still called the tower of Granus.

The city is first mentioned in a letter by Pepin, 754 (BALUZE: Regum Francorum, Capitularia II. p. 1391); but coins, inscriptions, baths, aqueducts, and other monuments, show that it was known to the Romans from the time of Cæsar. With the accession of the Carolingian dynasty it at once sprang into great eminence; and with the fall of that dynasty it, too, lost its importance. Charlemagne made it his residence, and built the Church of St. Mary—the only monument of Carolingian architecture still preserved complete—and a magnificent palace, which was connected with the church by a splendid colonnade. In this palace, or in the Church of St. Mary, sat the diet of Charlemagne, a mixed assembly of laymen and ecclesiastics summoned by the emperor to pronounce, both on secular and ecclesiastical and religious matters. Generally, however, the ecclesiastics separated when discussing ecclesiastic affairs, and formed a synod or council, Concilia Aquisgranensia, though not always assuming that name. We shall briefly enumerate these assemblies.

I. 789. Made an extract from the legislation of the elder councils of the Roman Empire, and made it obligatory, also, for the Frankish Empire. II. 797. Revoked, at least partially, the bloody laws which since 785 had been imposed on the conquered Saxons. III. 799. Against the Adoptians. IV. 801-803. The separation of the bishops, abbots, and secular knights into three benches or bodies; various laws concerning discipline. V. 809. On the procession of the Holy Ghost. VI. 818. The final enactment of the canons of the synods of Mentz, Rheims, Tours, Chalons-sur-Saone, and Arles. VII. 816. Regulations for the life of canonici. The rules of Chrodegang, which hitherto had been optional only, were now made obligatory, besides being much enlarged. VIII. 817. The reforms of Benedict of Aniane. IX. 819. Regulations for missi dominici. X. 825. Concerning the transference of the bones of St. Hubert from Liege to the Monastery of Andoin. XI. 831. The Empress Judith. XII. 836. The restoration of those estates which Pepin, King of Aquitania, had taken from the Church. XII. 837. About the election of abbots. XIII. 842. Mediation between Lothair, Louis the German, and Charles the Bald, which led to the treaty of Verdun, 843. XIV., 860, and XV., 862. Concerning the divorce between Lothair and Theutberga. XVI. 992. Concerning discipline. XVII. 1165. The canonization of Charlemagne.

From Otto I. (936) to Ferdinand I. (1558) were twenty-nine emperors crowned at Aix-la-Chapelle. See QUIX: Geschichte von Aachen.

AKIBA was the most prominent rabbi whom the Jewish people produced in the period between the destruction of Jerusalem (70) and the final dissolution of the rabbinical schools in Palestine (358). He excelled all his contemporaries in compass of knowledge and acuteness of interpretation, on the whole field of the Halacha (law-tradition), which he systematized and codified. He found a meaning in every word of the Thora, even in the particles and the manner in which the letters were written. Under Domitian he pleaded the case of his people in Rome. The later uprising under Hadrian was chiefly his work. By journeying to the most distant countries he collected among his exiled countrymen the necessary means, and it was he who represented Bar-Cochba to the people as the Messiah. He supported the revolutionary hero throughout with his whole influence; and when the rising, which had begun so successfully (132) suddenly and despicably collapsed, he was one of the martyrs. The flesh was torn from his bones by iron combs. In a definite literary form he has left nothing; but the Mishna and the literature of the Talmud and Midrach contain numerous definitions, interpretations, etc., which give a striking picture of the powerful man. See GRÄTZ: Geschichte der Juden, vol. IV., 1866; GASTFREUND: Biography of Akiba, Breslau, 1871 (in Hebrew); LEBRECHT: Bethel, die fragliche Stadt im hadrianisch-jüdischen Kriege, Berlin, 1877.

ALANUS. Under this name a considerable number of mediæval writings on theology and philosophy have come down to us. A complete list is given, Hist. litt. de la France, XVI., p. 421; see also Alani Opera, ed. C. de Visch, Antwerp, 1654. They consist of essays in verses, in rhyme or elegiac measure, on moral, philosophical, and devotional topics; allegorical commentaries to various parts of the Bible; sermons; a short Summa de arte prædicatoria; a Liber pœnitentialis, etc. But the question is, who was the author of these works. Generally they are ascribed to one of the schoolmen,—Alanus de Insulis, commonly known by the surname of Doctor universalis. Of his life only little is known, and this little is full of confusion. There were other writers of the name Alanus, especially one, Bishop of Auxerre; and another, Alanus de Padio. Oudin (Comment. de script. ecclês. T. II. p. 1338) maintains that Alanus de Insulis and Alanus de Auxerre are one and the same person, while Bulaeus (Hist. Acad. Paris, T. II. p. 432) distinguishes between them. The latter holds, however, that they were both natives of Lille, which fact again is contested by Cave (Hist. litt. script. ecclês. pp. 586, 624), and by the author of the Hist. littéraire de la France, T. XVI. p. 396. This much, however, is certain: Alanus was a native of Lille or Ryssel, Flanders, belonged to the order of the Cistercians, flourished in the twelfth century, and spent most of his life in England. He is the author of all the above works, with the exception of the Summa quadripartita, and perhaps the life of St. Bernard, which latter may belong to Alanus of Auxerre. The Summa quadripartita is evidently written in Southern France, and it is more likely that the author was the Alanus whose surname, de Padio, shows that he descended from Provence, than the Fleming Alanus, residing in England. Of Alanus de Padio we have a moral tract, found in manuscript at Avranches (RAVAISSON: Rapport sur les bibliothèques de l'Ouest de la France, Paris, 1841, p. 157), and another work, also in manuscript and variously titled: Oculus, Oraculum Scripture Sacre, Æquivoca, etc. (Hist. lit. de la France, I. c. p. 421). See DUPUY: Alain de Lille, 1859.

ALB, from the Latin alba, "white," is a long tunic, or vestment, of white linen, worn by the Roman priests during service, and differing from the surplice used in the Church of England by fitting closer, and being held together by a girdle. In the ancient church the newly-baptized were dressed in white garments (in albis) as a symbolical expression of the purity of their state; and these white garments were worn until Sunday after Easter, White-Sunday (Whitsunday). As early, however, as the fourth century, we find the alb mentioned as a special part of the ecclesiastical garment. See SMITH and CHEETHAM: Dictionary of Christ. Antiq.

ALBAN, St., the proto-martyr of England, was born at Verulam, Herfordshire; served seven years in the army of Diocletian; was converted to Christianity by a priest, Amphibolus, to whom he had extended hospitality; and was beheaded during the persecution of Diocletian, in 303. In the place where he suffered martyrdom a church was erected, which, having been destroyed by the Pagan Saxons, was restored in 793 by King Offa of Mercia. At the side of the church a monastery arose, and afterwards the city of St. Alban. But the very existence of this saint is doubtful: his name is not mentioned before Gildas (560) and Venantius Fortunatus (580). His life is given at length by BEDA: Hist. Eccl. bib. I., and in Acta Sanctorum, June IV., p. 146; other Vitæ and Acta, in verse and in prose, by POTTHAST, Bibl. p. 588.

ALBANENSES, a fraction of the sect of the Cathari, derived their name from Albania, and maintained, in opposition to the Bogomiles of Thracia and the Concorezenses of Bulgaria and Italy, an absolute dualism, by which good and evil were referred to two eternally opposite and equally potent principles. See the article on CATHARI.

ALBER, Erasmus. The date and place of his birth are unknown; and many points are unsettled in the course of his erratic life,—as a student in Wittenberg (1520), pastor of Spredlingen (1528), court-preacher to the Elector of Brandenburg, reformer of the Church of Hanau-Lichtenberg, pastor of Magdeburg, etc. He died May 5, 1553, as superintendent of Neu-Brandenburg. In Brandenburg he came incidentally across a copy of the Liber Conformitatum S. Francisci ad vitam Jesu Christi, by Bartholomæus Albicius; and against this book and some other legends he wrote, Der Barfüsser Münche Eulenspiegel und Alcoran, which was published anonymously, but with a preface by Luther, in Wittenberg, 1542, and afterwards translated into Latin, French, and Dutch.

ALBER, Matthæus, b. at Reutlingen, Dec. 4, 1495; d. at Blaubeuren, Dec. 2, 1570; studied at Freiburg and Tübingen, and received a call as second pastor to his native city, where he immediately began to preach the doctrines of the Reformers. The first pastor complained to the Abbot of Königsbronn and the Bishop of Constance; and the two prelates remonstrated with the magistrates of Reutlingen, the Swabian Union, and the Austrian Government in Stuttgart. Alber was, nevertheless, appointed first pastor by the magistrates; and when he was summoned before the bishop he did not only not appear, but, as if to make the breach with the Roman Church irreparable, he married. Reutlingen was now put under the ban, both by the pope and the emperor, but nobody cared; and Alber went on with his reforms: the mass was abolished, the images were removed, and the German language was introduced in the service. Dec. 13, 1524, he was summoned before the imperial court of Esslingen, and he went, accompanied by fifty citizens of Reutlingen; but, after two days' investigation and debate, the case was dropped. The dangers of the Anabaptist movement and the peasants' war he averted from Reutlingen; but, when the interim of 1548 was forced on the city, he was compelled to leave, and entered the service of Duke Ulrich of Württemberg, who first made him preacher at the principal church of Stuttgart, and afterwards Abbot of Blaubeuren. See JUL. HARTMANN: Matthæus Alber, Tübingen, 1863. WILKEN.

ALBERT OF RIGA, d. Jan. 17, 1229; is first mentioned as Canon of Bremen in 1189; took up the plan of Berthold, after his death in 1198, of conquering and christianizing Livonia, and went in 1200, at the head of a crusading army, from Lübeck across the Baltic. In 1201 he founded Riga, in 1202 the knightly order of the Brethren of the Sword; and though he experienced many troubles from the order, which wanted to become independent and operate on its own account, and from the Danes, who conquered Esthonia in 1219, he finally succeeded in establishing Christianity in the country. In 1255 Riga was made the metropolis of the Livonian and Prussian Church.

ALBERT THE GREAT (Albertus Magnus), b. at Lauingen, in Bavaria, 1193; d. in Cologne, Nov. 15, 1280. He studied at Padua and Bologna; entered the order of St. Dominic in 1223, and served as lector in the various convent-schools of his order in Germany, especially in Cologne, where he had Thomas Aquinas among his pupils. After a stay of three years in Paris (1245-48), he was made regens of the school of Cologne; and in 1254 the chapter of Worms chose him general of the Dominican order in Germany, in which capacity he traversed Germany on foot from end to end, visiting the monasteries, and enforcing discipline. In 1260 Alexander IV. made him Bishop of Regensburg; but this office was so little in harmony with his character and habits as a teacher and writer, that, after the lapse of two years, he was allowed to resign, and retired to his monastery in Cologne, where he spent the rest of his life, with the exception of a short visit to Paris, which he undertook when he was over eighty years old, in order to vindicate the orthodoxy of his late pupil, Thomas Aquinas. As an author he evinced a many-sidedness, which, in the learned world, procured for him the surname of doctor universalis; while his knowledge of natural science and its practical applications made him a sorcerer in popular estimation. His great exploit was the introduction of the complete system of Aristotle to the understanding of his age through a kind of loose reproductions (De Prædicamentis; Super Octo Libros Physicorum; Libri XIII. Metaphysicorum, etc.), not of the Greek originals, but of the Arabic versions and commentaries, richly interlarded with compilations from Plato, the Neo-Platonists, Avicenna, the Arabian philosophical and medical writer of the eleventh century, etc. By this scientific brokerage, which has yielded him many an undeserved compliment from modern scientists, he furnished the scholastic philosophy with means for its highest development. His theological works comprise: commentaries on various parts of the Bible; sermons; moral and ascetical treatises (Paradisus Animæ sive de Virtutibus); dogmatical expositions (Summa Theologiæ), etc.

Many of his works have been published separately. A collected edition was given by P. Jammy, Lyons, 1651, in twenty-one vols. fol. The best biography of him is found in Script. Ord. Prædicatorum, Paris, 1719, Tom. I., pp. 162-171. See POUCHET: Histoire des Sciences Naturelles au Moyen-âge ou Albert le Grand et son Époque, Paris, 1853; I. SIGHART: Albertus Magnus, sein Leben und seine Wissenschaft, Regensburg, 1857; O. D'ASSAILLY: Albert le Grand, Paris, 1870. REINHARD DE LIECHTY: Albert le Grand et S. Thomas d'Aquin. ALBERTI, Jean, b. March 6, 1698, at Assen, Holland; d. in Leyden, Aug. 13, 1762; was a minister at Harlem, became afterwards professor of the theology in Leyden, and wrote: Observationes philologicæ in sacros Novi Fœderis libros, Leyden, 1725; Glossarium græcum in sacros Novi Fœderis libros, Leyden, 1735. He also edited the first volume of Hesychius' Lexicon, afterward continued and completed by Ruhnenius, Leyden, 1766.

ALBERTI, Leander, b. at Bologna, Dec. 11, 1479; d. there in 1552; studied theology under Baviatero; entered the order of St. Dominic in 1495; was called to Rome in 1525 as assistant to the general of the order, and became afterwards inquisitor-general in Bologna. He wrote: De viris illustribus ordinis Prædicatorum, Bologna, 1517; also a Descrizione di tutta l'Italia, Bologna, 1550, afterwards republished, and a Historia di Bologna, Bologna, 1541, continued by Caccianemici.

ALBERTINI, Johann Baptist von, b. at Neuwied, Silesia, Feb. 17, 1769; d. at Berthelsdorf, near Herrnhut, Dec. 6, 1831; descended from a Swiss family of the Grisons, and was educated together with Schleiermacher, with whom he formed a very intimate friendship, at Nisky (1782-85) and at the theological seminary of Barby (1785-88). But while Schleiermacher turned to a penetrating study of philosophy, and attempted a reconciliation between the spirit of Christianity and the spirit of modern civilization, Albertini retained his Christian piety in that simple and childlike form in which it was gained in the Moravian congregation; and his thirst for knowledge found its gratification in the study of languages, mathematics, and botany. Thus he wrote, in connection with Schweinitz, a monograph on Fungi. From 1788 to 1810 he worked as teacher in the school of Nisky, from 1810 to 1821 as preacher and bishop in Nisky, Gnadenberg, and Gnadenfrei (Silesia); in 1821 he became a member, and in 1824 president, of the department for church and school, which position he occupied till his death. His works consist of Predigten, 1805; Geistliche Lieder, 1821; and Reden, 1832. Some of his spiritual lyrics are of rare beauty.

ALBIGENSES, a sect which from the beginning of the eleventh century spread rapidly and widely in Southern France, and maintained itself there till the middle of the thirteenth century; received its name from the city of Albi, Latin Albiga, the present capital of the department of Tarn, which was one of their principal seats. The name does not occur, however, until the time of the Albigensian crusade. Before that time the sect was spoken of as the Publicants, or Publicani, probably a corruption of the name of the Paulicians, which the crusaders had brought back to Western Europe, or as the Bos Homes, Latin, Boni Homines, French, Bons Hommes, which name they themselves gave to those among them who reached the highest state of perfection, the perfecti.

Of the doctrines of the Albigenses nothing is known with certainty. They have left no writings, confessional, apologetical, or polemical; and the representations which Roman-Catholic writers, their bitter enemies, have given of them, are highly exaggerated. It is evident, however, that they formed a branch of that broad stream of sectarianism and heresy which arose far away in Asia from the contact between Christianity and the Oriental religions, and which, by crossing the Balkan Peninsula, reached Western Europe. The first outflow from this source were the Manichæans, the next the Paulicians, the next the Cathari, who in the tenth and eleventh centuries were very strong in Bulgaria, Bosnia, and Dalmatia. Of the Cathari, the Bogomiles, Patoreni, Albigenses, etc., were only individual developments. In general they all held the same doctrines, dualism, docetism, etc.; the same moral tenets, an austere simplicity bordering on asceticism; the same organization, a division into two classes of credentes, or auditores, and perfecti; and the same policy, opposition to the Roman-Catholic Church. See the article CATHARI.

From Italy the movement reached Southern France in the beginning of the eleventh century; and here the soil was wonderfully well prepared for the new seed. The country was rich, flourishing, and independent; the people, gay, intellectual, and progressing; the Church, dull, stupid, and tyrannous; and the clergy, distinguished by nothing but superstition, ignorance, arbitrariness, violence, and vice. Under such circumstances the idea of a return to the purity and simplicity of the apostolical age could not fail to attract attention. The severe moral demands made impression, because the example of the preachers corresponded to their words. The doctrine of an absolute and original dualism naturally recommends itself to the understanding as the easiest solution of many a knotty problem. No wonder, then, that the people deserted the Roman-Catholic priests, and crowded around the Bos Homes. In a short time the Albigenses had congregations, with schools and charitable institutions of their own. Then they drove away the Roman-Catholic priests from the churches, took possession of the buildings, and elected their own priests and bishops. Finally the lords of the land, the great barons and counts, openly placed themselves at the head of the movement; and in 1167 the Albigenses held an Albigensian synod at Toulouse for the purpose of perfecting their organization. The Roman-Catholic Church, so far as it still could be said to exist in the country, had become an object of contempt and derision.

This state of affairs caused, of course, great alarm in Rome. As early as 1119 a council was convened at Toulouse; and the tenets of the Cathari, such as preached by the Bos Homes, were condemned. From time to time the condemnation was repeated by the councils of the Lateran (1139), of Rheims (1148), of Tours (1163), etc., but without any effect. Missions were sent out among the heretics. In 1147 St. Bernard of Clairveaux visited them; and his preaching was probably not altogether lost. In 1165 a disputation between the orthodox and the heretical bishops and priests was held at Lombers, near Albi; but no result was arrived at. In 1178 Cardinal Peter, with a great retinue of prelates and monks, tried, for the last time, persuasion; and in 1180 Cardinal Henry, for the first time, employed force. He preached a crusade against the Albigensian heretics. Troops were drawn together; some strong places were carried with the usual accompaniment of massacre and carnage; and then the case was again allowed to drag along, until at last Innocent III. succeeded in finishing it by employing measures which he is said to have repented bitterly of himself. In 1208 the papal legate, Pierre de Castelnau, was murdered; and the murder was ascribed to Count Raymond of Toulouse. A new crusade was preached, to be led by Arnold, Abbot of Citeaux, as papal legate, and Simon of Montfort, Earl of Leicester, as military chief; and behind this line stood the French king waiting for an opportunity to rob Count Raymond of his beautiful lands. The count humiliated himself as much as he possibly could: he paid a large sum into the papal treasury, was flagellated by the papal legate, and then took the cross against his own subjects. The first place which was taken was Beziers, a city of between twenty thousand and forty thousand inhabitants, and the capital of Count Roger, Raymond's nephew, who had openly espoused the cause of the heretics. When the general asked what to do with the inhabitants of the captured city, the papal legate answered, "Kill them all! God will know his own." In this manner the war was carried on for twenty years. Town after town was taken, pillaged, and burnt; of the inhabitants, the orthodox were chained together, and sent to the Mohammedan slave-markets, while the heretics were massacred and burnt. Nothing was left but a smoking waste. But, as the war went on, its purpose changed. Religious fanaticism had begun it: rapacity and ambition were going to end it. When Raymond was ready to hand over all his movable property to the pope, and all his land to the French king, peace was concluded in 1229; and, in order to purge the population, the Inquisition was established in Languedoc, and soon extinguished the sect.

ALBIZZI, Antonio, b. in Florence, Nov. 25, 1547; d. at Kempten, in Bavaria, July 17, 1626; was secretary to the Cardinal of Austria, but embraced Protestantism; left Italy, and resided afterwards in Augsburg, Insbrück, and Kempten. He wrote: Sermones in Matthæum, Augsburg, 1609; Principium Christianorum stemmata, 1612; De principis religionis Christianæ, 1612; Exercitationes theologiæ, Kempten, 1616.

ALBIZZI, Bartholomew (Bartholomeus Albicius Pisanus), b. at Rivano, Tuscany; entered the order of the Franciscans; became a celebrated preacher, and taught theology at Bologna, Padua, Siena, Florence, and Pisa, where he died Dec. 10, 1401. He is the author of the famous book, Liber conformitatum sancti Francisci cum Christo, which in 1399 was accepted with great applause by the chapter of his order, and during the following century published in various editions. A refutation by Vergerio, Discorsi sopra i fioretti di san Francisco, was put on the index, and its author declared a heretic. In 1542, however, Erasmus Alber published at Wittenberg his Der Barfüsser Mönch Eulenspiegel und Alcoran, and the following editions of the Liber conformitatum were then altered, both in contents and title: Liber Auricus, 1590; Antiquitates Franciscanæ, 1623, etc.

ALBO, Joseph, b. at Soria, in Old Castile, in the latter half of the fourteenth century; d. as rabbin at Montalvan, in 1428; was one of the Jewish representatives at the famous disputation held in 1412 before Benedict XIII. between Jerome de Sancta Fide and a number of Jewish theologians. In 1425 appeared his Sefer ha-ikkarim, a defence of the Jewish dogmatics as opposed to the Christian. The thirteen fundamental articles of Maimonides he reduced to three, God, Revelation, and Retribution; and while Maimonides maintained incommutability of the law, Albo acknowledges the possibility of a new divine revelation similar to that on Mount Sinai. Of this work, which has been frequently reprinted, Schlesinger has given a German translation, Francfort, 1844.

ALBRIGHT, Jacob, the founder of "the Evangelical Association of North America," b. near Pottstown, Montgomery County, Penn., May 1, 1759; d. May 8, 1808, at Mühlbach, Lebanon County, Penn. His parents were Pennsylvania Germans of the Lutheran Church, and in it he was himself trained. He was taught in the prevailing defective fashion the rudiments of education; but as he grew up he found his surroundings less and less congenial to his intellectual and spiritual life. After his marriage, he moved away some seventy miles, into Lancaster County, where was a more active population. Here he carried on a successful tile and brick business, and was on the road to wealth. In 1790 several of his children died in quick succession. The keenness of his grief and the faithful funeral addresses of the Rev. Anton Hautz, a German Reformed minister, roused him from his religious indifference, and led to his conversion. He found no one to understand his religious state among his German Lutheran neighbors; and prejudice kept him from going to the Methodists until he fell in with a Methodist lay-preacher, Adam Ridgel, who taught him the way of God more perfectly. Albright then desired to get others to share his joy, but met with opposition: so finally he turned to the Methodists, studied their church government, was pleased with it, joined them, and received an exhorter's license; but he then had no intention of becoming a minister. His mind brooded over the spiritual condition of his German brethren, and he prayed earnestly for their conversion. During a severe illness he became convinced that he was to undertake the work of reform, which he did October, 1796. He gave up secular interests, and devoted himself to preaching as an itinerant wherever he found hearers. Although opposed, he persevered, travelled at his own expense, bent only on doing good. He would have remained in the Methodist Church, but could not, because it at that time did not intend entering on the German field; and so as he was forced to give some kind of an organization to the little bodies of his converts; he separated himself and them from the Methodist Church, and so, entirely contrary to his plan, he became the founder of a new denomination called the "Evangelical Association." By 1800 he had organized three congregations. In 1803 a council was held, and an organization adopted, Methodist in general features, but independent of the Methodist-Episcopal Church. In 1807 the first conference was held. It was this body of laymen which unanimously elected and ordained Albright as their pastor and bishop, and declared the Bible to be their only rule of faith and practice. Albright was requested to compile articles of faith and a discipline for the guidance of the so-called "Albright people." Shortly after this conference Albright died. Bishop Yearke, who contributes the sketch of Albright in the Lives of the Leaders of the Church Universal (Amer. ed. by Rev. Dr. Maccracken, Phila.), thus describes his personal appearance: "He was nearly six feet high, had smooth black hair, a high clear forehead, small, deeply-set, piercing eyes, aquiline nose, mouth and chin well proportioned, a symmetrical form, a white complexion, the sanguine and choleric temperaments well combined." See EVANGELICAL ASSOCIATION.

ALCANTARA, ORDER OF. In 1212 Alfonso IX. of Castile laid siege to the city of Alcantara, in the Province of Estremadura, on the Tajo. In 1218 he conquered it from the Moors, and placed it under the defence of the Knights of Calatrava, who soon after transferred it to Nugno Fernandez, third grand-master of the order of San Julian de Paregro. This order was founded in 1156 against the Moors, by the brothers Suaro and Gomez Fernando Barrientos, while defending a frontier castle of the above name: it assumed the reformed rules of St. Benedict, and was confirmed in 1177 and 1183 by the popes Alexander III. and Lucius III. But after the conquest of Alcantara the knights adopted the name of that city, and ranged themselves under the grand-master of Calatrava. On the occasion, however, of a contested election of grand-master, the Knights of Alcantara separated from those of Calatrava, and Don Diego Sancte became their first grand-master. The thirty-eighth grand-master, Juan de Zuniga, was also the last. In 1495 he resigned the office, and became Archbishop of Seville; and, with the consent of Pope Alexander VI., King Ferdinand now united the grand-masterships of St. James, Calatrava, and Alcántara to the crown. In its days of prosperity the order possessed fifty commanderies; but in 1808 all its revenues were confiscated by King Joseph, and only parts of them restored in 1814 by King Ferdinand. In 1873 the order was altogether abolished, but re-established in 1874 by King Alfonso XII. For the elder history of the order see HELYOT: Histoire des Ordres monastiques, T. VI., pp. 53-65.

ALCIMUS, called also Jacimus (Joseph., Antiq. XII. 9, 7), the Hebrew form of the name, an apostate Jewish priest who attached himself to the Syrians from self-interest, and was created high priest by Demetrius (B.C. 162), and sent with a military escort, under the Syrian general Bacchides, unto Jerusalem. At first he was successful in deceiving many principal men into believing his peaceful intentions, but quickly revealed his bloodthirsty disposition. Judas and his party knew the truth about him, and opposed him so successfully, that he had only the simulacrum of priestly authority, and had to call upon the Syrian king for additional aid. Nicanor, who was then sent, was killed by Judas, Adar 13, 161 B.C. Bacchides was then sent, and he got him into the city; but Alcimus died suddenly just as he was about to pull down the walls of the temple in Jerusalem (Nisan B. C. 160). See 1 Macc. vii., ix. 54-56. ALCUIN (Ealwine, Alchwin, Alcuin, Latinized Flaccus Albinus), b. at York about 735; d. at Tours, May 19, 804; received a monastic education in the celebrated school of York, the representative of Irish learning on Anglo-Saxon ground, and became in 766 the master of the school himself. In 782, returning home from a journey to Rome, he met Charlemagne at Pavia, and was by him invited to assume the leadership of this palatial school, in which the sons of the most prominent Frankish noblemen were educated. He accepted the invitation, and was endowed with the abbeys of Bethlehem at Ferrières, and St. Lupus at Troyes, to which, in 796, was added that of St. Martin at Tours. Thus living at the court, giving instruction to the king himself, and superintending the schools of the whole realm, Alcuin became one of the most prominent members of that circle of great men, which, with Charlemagne as its centre, stood at the head of the whole civilizing movement of the age. Charlemagne employed him several times as a political negotiator, especially in transactions with England; but his proper place was as the ecclesiastical councillor of the king, and in this field his influence was decisive (see the articles on Libri Carolini and Adoptionism). Towards the close of his life he left the administration of the several monasteries under his authority to his pupils, and retired into monastic seclusion.

The ideal which forms the inspiration of Alcuin's whole life is that of a Christian state in which every thing is pervaded by a religious spirit, and regulated by the laws of the church; and he looked with admiration and awe to the realization of this ideal, which the energy and success of Charlemagne seemed to promise.

Theology he consequently considered as the principal element of education. His own theology is wholly positive, without originality, derived from the Fathers. He wrote both on dogmatics: De Fide Sanctæ et Individuæ Trinitatis; De Trinitate ad Fridigisum Questiones; Libellus de processione Spiritus Sancti, etc.; and on exegetics. In his exegetical writings the mystico-allegorical method predominates. Classical learning, however, must not be neglected for theology. Classical and ecclesiastical traditions belong together; and, by combining them, the Christian Church becomes the true guardian of civilization. The Christian state which Charlemagne is establishing shall be a new Athens, of a higher stamp, — an Athens in which Christ is the master of the academy, and the seven arts an introduction to the septuple fulness of the Holy Spirit. In the classical field, however, Alcuin himself was only a compiler. He wrote on grammar, rhetoric, and dialectic. He was a prolific poet, but the greatest success in the literary line he achieved by his letters. By Charlemagne's orders he revised the Latin Bible in 802, — a service for which we should be grateful, as he restored God's word to a state of comparative purity. See Latin Versions under BIBLE VERSIONS.

The sources to Alcuin's life are, his poem, De Pontificibus, his letters, and a vita written by an anonymous author, but based on communications of Sigulf, a pupil and companion of Alcuin. The best edition of his works is that by Froben, Ratisbon, 1777, 2 tom. fol. See also Migne, Patrol. Tom. C. and CI. The letters and historical poems have been published in Monumenta Alcuin., by DUEMMLER and WATTENBACH, Berlin, 1873. See F. LORENTZ: Alcuin's Leben, Halle, translated into English by SLEE; MONNIER: Alcuin et Charlemagne, 2d edition, Paris, 1863; K. WERNER: Alcuin und sein Jahrhundert, Paderborn, 1876. [A. ALDFRITH, King of Northumbria 685-705, a son of Aswin, was educated in Ireland, or perhaps at Iona, at all events within the pale of the Kuldee Kirk, but was by Wilfrid drawn over to Romanism. He continued, however, to entertain friendly relations with the Kuldee Kirk, with Adamnan, Aldhelm, etc.; and when Wilfrid, who was re-instated as bishop in 687, urged his claims on the estates of the Church, he displaced him once more in 692, and no reconciliation took place between them afterwards. See SMITH and WACE: Christ. Biog. I.

ALDHELM, b. in the middle of the seventh century; d. May 25, 709; belonged to the royal family of Wessex, and was educated by Maildulf, an Irish scholar who had founded a school at Maildulf Burgus (Malmesbury); studied at Canterbury; succeeded Maildulf at Malmesbury, and was made abbot of the place, and in 705 Bishop of Sherborn. He acquired a great celebrity as a scholar, being the first Englishman who cultivated the Latin language with success. Also practically he exercised a great influence, but his sympathy leaned decidedly towards Canterbury. His collected works have been edited by Dr. Giles, Oxford, 1844. The earliest biography of him is that by Fabricius, published in Act. SS. Boll. May

IV. p. 84: the best is that by William of Malmesbury in the fifth book of his Gesta Pontificum. See SMITH and WACE: Christ. Biog.

ALEANDER, Hieronymus, b. at Motta, Feb. 13, 1480; d. in Rome, Feb. 1, 1542; studied first medicine, then theology, and led a rather loose life in Venice, where he made the acquaintance of Aldus and Erasmus; became professor of Greek in the University of Paris, 1508; entered the service of the Prince-Bishop of Liege in 1515; was made librarian to the Vatican in 1516; and in 1520 sent as papal legate to Germany together with Caraccioli. At the diet of Worms he made a speech of three hours against Luther (Feb. 13, 1521), and it was he who drew up the act of the imperial ban. In 1524 he was made Archbishop of Brindisi, and in 1538 a cardinal.

ALEGAMBE, b. in Brussels 1592; d. in Rome 1652; entered the order of the Jesuits at Palermo in 1613; was made professor in theology at Gratz 1629; accompanied Ferdinand II. on his travels through Germany, France, Spain, Portugal, and Italy; returned to his chair in Gratz, and was finally made secretary to the general of the Jesuits in Rome, and placed at the head of the German department. Of his writings the most remarkable is his Bibliotheca Scriptorum Societatis Jesu, Antwerp, 1643. The work bears very distinct marks of the Jesuit spirit, — thus the Jansenists Marion and Servin are represented as heretics, — but at the same time it shows signs of a certain freedom of judgment. The author proves that various books against the royal power, the episcopacy, the Sorbonne, etc., were written by Jesuit authors, though the French Jesuits had tried hard to deny the authorship. A new augmented but not corrected edition of the work was given in Rome in 1675 by Sotuel. HERZOG.

ALEMANNI, The, according to Asinius Quadratus, the league between men of different descent; according to Grimm, the very best men. They made their first appearance in history under Caracalla, in the beginning of the third century, and were first mentioned by Dio Cassius. They were located between the Neckar and the Lake of Constance, and during the fourth century they made frequent and devastating raids into Gaul and Upper Italy. In the fifth century Alemannia was the name for the whole region from the Vosges to the Iller, and from the Lower Maine to the St. Gotthard; but, after the defeat at Zulpich (496), the northern part — the regions around the Neckar, Kocher, Jaxt, and Tauber — was incorporated with the Frankish Empire, and the southern and eastern parts, as far as the Lech, came under the patronage of the Ostro-Goths. After the death of Theodoric, however, and the dissolution of the Ostro-Gothic Empire, the whole Alemannia fell to the Franks. Again, after the dissolution of the Carolingian Empire, a duchy of Alemannia was formed; but towards the end of the eleventh century the name Alemannia gradually disappeared, and was supplanted by that of Suabia. The Alemanni, especially those located about the Lake of Zürich, worshipped Wuotan and the war-god Ziu. They had idols of metal, to which they brought sacrifices of beer. Agathias (582) mentions that they also worshipped trees, streams, hills, and glens.

Christianity was first introduced among the Alemanni about the year 300; but for a long time the number of converts was only small, and the majority of the people remained Pagan until the seventh century. The foundation, however, in the sixth century, of the bishoprics of Constance, Basel, and Strassburg, shows that Christianity already began to spread in the country. It was especially Irish missionaries who worked in this field. The first of them was Fridolin, who about 530 founded the Monastery of Säkingen on an island in the Rhine between Basel and Zurzach. A century later on, Columbanus and Gallus preached Christianity in Northern Switzerland, and the latter founded the Monastery of St. Gallen about 612. A Christian duke, Cunzo, is spoken of at this time as residing in Überlingen. An itinerant preacher, Pirmin, a Frank, exercised great influence, and founded the monasteries of Reichenau, Mirbach, Weissenburg, Mauersmünster, Schwarzach, Gengenbach, and Hornbach in 724 and the following years. The Alemannian law, dating from the period between 546 and 561, speaks of Christianity as the religion of the nation, and of the ecclesiastical hierarchy as an existing institution. ALESIIUS, Alexander, b. in Edinburgh, April 23, 1500; d. in Leipzig, March 17, 1565; while a canon at St. Andrews, in 1526, he was employed to bring Patrick Hamilton to recant, and attend him at the stake, but received so deep an impression, both of the martyr's arguments and of his ardent conviction, that he himself was converted to the reformed doctrines, and in 1530 he fled to Germany. After 1534 he was invited to England by Henry VIII., and made professor at Cambridge; but in 1540 he returned to Germany, where he spent the rest of his life as professor, first in Frankfort-on-the-Oder, afterwards in Leipzig, and in intimate connection with the Reformers, especially Melancthon. Besides commentaries on various parts of the Scriptures, he wrote: De necessitate et merito bonorum operum, 1560; De justificatione; De Sancta Trinitate; Responsio ad triginta et duos articulos theologorum Loveniensium. His original name was Alane. He assumed the other in exile.

ALEXANDER is the name of eight popes. — Alexander I. occupied the Roman see in the beginning of the second century, between Evaristus and Xistus I.; but the dates, both of his accession and of his death, are uncertain. Eusebius gives 103-114 in his Chronicle and 108-118 in his Hist. Eccl.; Codex Liberii gives 109-116, etc. According to the Liber Pontificalis and Acta Alexandri, he suffered martyrdom together with Eventias and Theodulus, and was buried on the Via Nomentana. — Alexander II. (Anselm of Lucca), Oct. 1, 1061–April 21, 1073, a native of Baggio in the Milanese, became, in the Monastery of Bec, acquainted with those ideas of reform which at that time spread from the Monastery of Cluny, and preached them in Northern Italy with so much effect, that he is generally considered the spiritual father of the so-called Pataria, — a popular movement directed against the depraved clergy, and their allies the arrogant city nobility. Even after his elevation to the episcopal chair of Lucca, he continued his connection with the Pataria, and was twice sent to Milan as papal legate in its affairs. But comp. H. PÄCH: Die Pataria in Mainland, Sondershausen, 1872, and KRÜGER: Die Pataria in Mainland, Breslau, 1874. After the death of Nicholas II., Anselm was elected pope through the influence of Hildebrand, and his reign shows plainly the spirit which ruled him. As the consent of the Empress Agnes and her minor son, Henry IV., had not been obtained, a synod of Basel elected Bishop Cadalus of Parma pope, under the name of Honorius II. (Oct. 28, 1061), and bloody battles were fought between the two popes outside the walls of Rome. Through the influence of Archbishop Hanno of Cologne, who held the young king and with him the regency, a general council was then convened at Mantua, and here Alexander was recognized, and Honorius excommunicated. But Hanno did not earn much thanks for what he had done. When (in 1068), on a journey to Rome, he made a visit to the excommunicated Cadalus on some secular errand, Alexander refused to see him until he presented himself before him in the garb of penitence and with naked feet. Still harsher the king was treated. In 1071 the Roman curia deposed Bishop Charles of Constance, though the king had invested him with ring and staff. In 1072 the same measure was taken against Archbishop Gottfried of Milan; and when Henry IV., nevertheless, had Gottfried consecrated, the pope put him in ban. Also in his relations to Philip I. of France, Robert Guiscard of Sicily, and William the Conqueror, of England, Alexander knew how to vindicate the papal authority. The idea of filling all the episcopal chairs of conquered England with Normans originated with him, and he raised Lanfranc of Bec to the archiepiscopal see of Canterbury, and made him primate of the Church of England. See R. BAXMANN: Die Politik der Päpste von Gregor I. bis Gregor VII., Elberfeld, 1869. — Alexander III. (Roland), Sept. 7, 1159–Aug. 30, 1181, a native of Siena, seems to have taught jus canonicum for some time at Bologna, and is the author of the so-called Summa Magistri Rolandi. In 1150 he was called to Rome by Eugene III., and made cardinal-deacon; and from 1153 he held the influential position as papal chancellor, placing himself at the head of the anti-imperial party among the cardinals, and advocating a close alliance with William of Sicily. After the death of Adrian IV. he received all the votes but three, which were cast for the cardinal-priester, Octavianus. The latter, however, succeeded in obtaining the assent of the clergy and the people, assumed the name of Victor IV., and thus the schism began, which lasted for nearly twenty years. The emperor, Frederick I., convened a council at Pavia, which confirmed the election of Victor IV. (Feb. 11, 1160), and placed Alexander III. under the ban; but Alexander, who had refused to be present at a council convened by an emperor, answered by excommunicating Frederick, March 24. But two years later (March 25, 1162) he was compelled to flee from Italy, and seek refuge in France, where Louis VII. gave him a safe residence in Sens, and a most liberal support. The death of Victor IV. (April 20, 1164) did not end the schism.

Reinald von Dassel immediately established a new anti-pope, Paschalis III., without paying any regard to the canonical forms of election; and, when Paschalis died (Sept. 20, 1168), the imperial party in Rome and the people chose Calixtus III. In 1165 Alexander III. made an attempt to establish himself in Italy, and entered Rome (Nov. 23). But in the following year the emperor arrived in Italy with a great army. Rome was taken by storm; Paschalis was re-established; and Alexander was again compelled to flee. Nevertheless, his authority was steadily increasing; and when, in 1167, the Lombardian cities formed a union against Frederick I., under the protectorate of Alexander III., the former showed himself willing to open negotiations. These failed, however, and the emperor once more marched an army into Italy; but this time he was so completely defeated in the battle of Legnano (May 29, 1176) that he had to submit to all the demands of the pope, and at the congress of Venice (Aug. 1, 1177) he not only recognized Alexander III., but conferred on him the præfecture of the city of Rome. A still greater triumph he gained over King Henry II. of England; for Becket was canonized, and the king compelled to submit to a humiliating penance. The culminating point of his success is the Lateran synod of 1179. Here the Catharists were excommunicated, and a crusade inaugurated against them; and here a change was made in the papal election, excluding the lower clergy and the people, and abolishing the emperor's right of confirmation. The sympathy of the Romans, however, Alexander III. never obtained. Though Calixtus III. formally abdicated (Aug. 29, 1178), and acknowledged Alexander, a new anti-pope, Innocent III., was elected. Alexander was driven out of Rome for the third time, and died at Civita Castellana, an exile. See H. REUTER: Geschichte Alex. III., Leipzig, 2d ed. entirely revised 1860–64, 3 vols. — Alexander IV. (Rinaldo de Conti), Dec. 12, 1254–May 25, 1261, was made a cardinal-deacon in 1227, and cardinal-bishop of Ostia in 1231, and succeeded Innocent IV. in the papal chair, adopting the policy of his predecessor and continuing the contest with the Hohenstaufens. On his death-bed Conrad IV. placed his son Conradin, heir to the Duchy of Suabia and the kingdoms of Jerusalem and Sicily, under the guardianship of the pope, hoping thereby to change his bitterest enemy into an ally. Innocent IV. accepted the guardianship with great promises, and (Jan. 23, 1255) Alexander IV. renewed these promises. He did not keep them, however. On Feb. 4, same year, he advised the Suabian nobles to desert their hereditary duke, Conradin, and espouse the cause of Alphonso of Castile. On March 25 he excommunicated Manfred, the uncle of Conradin, who had taken charge of the kingdom of Sicily in the name of his nephew; and on April 9 he concluded an alliance with Henry III. of England, bestowing on his son the heritage of Conradin, Sicily, and Apulia, as papal fiefs. At the death of William of Holland (Jan. 28, 1256) he forbade the Archbishops of Cologne, Mentz, and Treves, to place Conradin on the throne of his father; and, in the contest about the German crown which now arose between Alphonso of Castile and Richard of Cornwallis, he took the part of the latter in a most energetic manner. His interest in the English alliance, however, was merely pecuniary; for from England came the money which enabled him to carry on the war against Manfred. In August, 1258, on a rumor of the death of Conradin, Manfred himself assumed the crown of Sicily; and, after the victory of Montaperto and the conquest of Florence, he stood as the acknowledged head of the Ghibelline party. The pope renewed the excommunication against him Nov. 18, 1260; but, in spite of the reverses of Ezzelino da Romano, the Ghibellines were in the ascendancy; and shortly before his death Alexander experienced the humiliation to see Manfred elected into the Roman senate. The last year of his reign was also much troubled by the Flagellants, whose processions and preachings in Rome he suppressed. The council which he called at Viterbo, for the purpose of setting on foot a crusade against the Tartars, did not convene until after his death. — Alexander V. (Peter Philargi), June 26, 1409–May 3, 1410, an orphan-boy from Candia, educated in a Minorite monastery, entered afterwards the order, travelled in Italy, England, and France, acquired a name as a teacher of rhetoric in the University of Paris, received a notable appointment at the court of Duke John Galeazzo Visconti, and was made Archbishop of Milan in 1402, and cardinal-priest by Innocent VII. The Council of Pisa, convened for the purpose of ending the schism between Benedict XIII. and Gregory XII., elected him, then seventy years old, to the chair of St. Peter, having deposed the two rivalling popes. But the measures adopted by the council did not succeed. Benedict XIII. was still acknowledged by Spain, Portugal, and Scotland; Gregory XII., by Naples, Hungary, and parts of Germany; and Alexander V., by France, England, and parts of Germany; and the three popes reciprocally excommunicated and anathematized each other. — Alexander VI. (Rodrigo Lanzol), Aug. 11, 1492–Aug. 18, 1503, a native of Valencia, was adopted by his uncle, Calixtus III., into the family of the Borgia, made Bishop of Valencia, a cardinal-deacon, and vice-chancellor of the Roman curia. This remunerative position he prostituted to amass an enormous wealth, and his wealth he spent in the most appalling debaucheries. But his scandalous life did not impede his ecclesiastical promotion. He was made Cardinal Bishop of Porto, and after the death of Innocent VIII. he ascended the chair of St. Peter, having bought a majority of the votes. Nor did he change his life after becoming pope. His adultery with Julia Farnese, the wife of one of his nephews, and with his own daughter-in-law, the wife of Jofré, was notorious; and it was generally said, though never proved, that he had committed incest with his own daughter, Lucretia Borgia. In vain the secular powers remonstrated; in vain the more serious men censured: the former were eluded, the latter silenced. Alexander VI. knew only two motives of action, — the gratification of his sensual passions, and the elevation of his children to power and wealth. The latter motive finally concentrated itself upon his son, Cæsar

Borgia. He had been made Archbishop of Valencia in 1492, and cardinal in 1493; but he wished to leave the Church, and found a secular sovereignty, and he began the execution of his schemes by murdering his brother Juan, Duke of Gandia, June 14, 1497. In 1499 he married Charlotte d'Albret, a sister of the King of Navarre, and was made Duke of Valence; and while the father continued his intrigues at the courts of Naples, Spain, France, etc., — intrigues which, though they involved death and destruction to thousands of human beings, have no real interest, religious or political, — the son was busy in the Romagna, expelling the ruling families by open force, or exterminating them by assassination and poison. The immense property of the family of Colonna was confiscated, and immediately after the despoliation of the Colonnas that of the Orsinis began. The old Cardinal Orsini was compelled to drink poison. In 1501 the Romagna and the Marshes, these the two principal provinces of the papal dominion, were transformed into a domain of the Borgia family. As the aims became more daring, the means became more unscrupulous. The pope intrigued for the acquisition of Pisa, Lucca, and Siena from the emperor, and meditated the elevation of the Romagna into a kingdom, but was suddenly caught in his own trap. He intended to poison the rich Cardinal Adrian at a feast, in order to appropriate his enormous wealth; but Adrian bought the cook, and the poison was placed before the pope himself, who died from its effects. See GORDON: Life of Alexander VI., London, 1729; DOMENICO CERRI: Borgia ossia Alessandro VI. Papa e suoi Contemporanei, Turin, 1858; GREGOROVIVUS: Lucretia Borgia, Munich, 1870; V. REMEC: Papst Alexander VI. Eine Rechtfertigung, Linz, 1879. — Alexander VII. (Fabio Chigi), April 7, 1655–May 22, 1667, partook as papal legate in the negotiations of the peace of Westphalia, but declared that he would enter into no communication with heretics, and protested publicly against the validity of the treaties of Münster and Osnabrück. After his return from Germany he was made a cardinal and secretary of state, and it was due to his influence that Innocent X. condemned as heretical the five propositions extracted from Jansenius's Augustinus. He was completely under the sway of the Jesuits; and in their controversy with the Port Royal he first condemned all who asserted that the above five propositions could not be found in Jansenius's book, and then all who doubted the infallibility of the pope also with respect to historical or matter-of-fact questions. But such over-assertions are simply the products of weakness, and the waning vigor of the papacy became very apparent at several occasions under this pope. The French ambassador, Duke de Crequi, considered himself insulted on account of a brawl between his retinue and the Corsican guard of the pope, and left Rome. As sufficient satisfaction was not immediately given, Louis XIV. ordered the papal nuncio to leave Paris, occupied Avignon and Venaissin, and threatened with an invasion. In order to obtain peace the pope had to submit to very humiliating conditions. Also in Portugal his policy nearly proved fatal. In 1640 Portugal separated from Spain, and chose a king of its own, of the house of Braganza. But Innocent X. refused to recognize the new king and to confirm the bishops appointed by him. Alexander VII. continued this policy; and the result was, that King John IV. left the episcopal sees vacant, and employed the revenues for the army and other secular purposes. Indeed, he even meditated to separate altogether from Rome, and form a national church, in which the right of confirming the bishops should belong to the archbishop. This, however, was prevented by Clement IX.—Alexander VIII. (Pietro Ottoboni), Oct. 6, 1689—Feb. 1, 1691, under whom the relation to France so far improved that the king surrendered Avignon, and renounced his claims on the right of asylum for his ambassador. The real cause of the controversy was not removed, however. After long hesitation the pope pronounced invalid the four propositions agreed upon in 1682 by the king and clergy of France, and establishing the freedom of the Gallican Church, and absolved the French clergy from the oath which was made on the propositions.

ALEXANDER, patriarch of Alexandria 313—326. Under him the Arian controversy broke out in 319. Arius was condemned by a synod in Alexandria, in 320, at which a hundred bishops were present. When banished, he went to Palestine; and, as he was well received there, Alexander wrote first to certain bishops separately, then an encyclical letter to all the bishops of the church, setting forth the errors of Arius. The interference of the Emperor Constantine, though intended to still the rising storm, gave only occasion to more debate; and in 325 the first œcumenical council followed. Of Alexander's letters two have come down to us,—one having been preserved by Socrates (I. 6), and another by Theodoret (I. 4).

ALEXANDER, Archibald, D.D., LL.D., the first professor in the Princeton Theological Seminary, and one of the founders of Princeton theology; b. in Augusta (now Rockbridge) County, Va., April 17, 1772; d. at Princeton, N.J., Oct. 22, 1851. At ten years of age he was sent to the Liberty Hall Academy, of which the Rev. William Graham was principal, and where he had remarkable men for teachers; at sixteen he became a family tutor, but was converted in the "Great Revival" of 1789, studied theology, and after licensure went as missionary through the sparsely-settled portions of his native State, and eventually became pastor of two churches. From 1796 to 1801 he was president of Hampden-Sidney College. In 1807 he succeeded Dr. Milledoler in the Third Presbyterian Church of Philadelphia. In 1812 he was called by the General Assembly to that great work which has given him an undying reputation,—the organization of the Princeton Theological Seminary. For the first year he taught all the departments, then Rev. Dr. Miller joined him; and to them in common belongs the glory of establishing the school. Dr. Alexander was distinguished for practical common sense, profound knowledge of human nature, keen sympathies, and, above all, simple, earnest, Christ-like piety; which render the study of his life a pleasure, as the life itself was a joy and an inspiration. It is not too much to say that he gave tone to the Presbyterian Church in America, and the high-water mark to her piety. By his lectures upon theology he taught the teachers of the Church; and so to-day his influence is felt. In common with men of his class and day, he had a great horror of German theology as necessarily misleading. Dr. Alexander wrote many books, of which the principal are: Outlines of the Evidences of Christianity (1823, often reprinted); Canon of the O. and N. T. (1826); History of Log College (1846); and posthumously, Moral Science (1852): all these were published in Philadelphia. He prepared, also, the Bible Dictionary of the American Sunday-school Union (Philadelphia, 1831), an excellent little book, which served Christian families for a generation, although for purposes of instruction superseded by the new Bible Dictionary of the Union (Philadelphia, 1880). See his Memoir by his son, Rev. Dr. J. W. Alexander, N.Y., 1854.

ALEXANDER, James Waddell, D.D., b. in Virginia, March 13, 1804; d. in the same State, July 31, 1859. He was graduated at Princeton, 1820; was pastor in Virginia from 1824 to 1828; in Trenton, N.J., 1828 to 1832; professor of rhetoric and belles-lettres in the College of New Jersey, 1832 to 1844; became pastor of the Duane-street congregation, New York; again a professor, 1849, this time of ecclesiastical history and church government in Princeton Theological Seminary; but in 1851 he returned to New York as pastor of the Fifth-avenue Presbyterian Church, and until his death wielded a great influence. The charm about his preaching was its spirituality. He spoke as the ambassador of Christ. His zeal in Christian work was tireless, and to practical and not scholarly ends he addressed his writings; one of the best of these is his Plain Words to a Young Communicant, which has been of much help to young believers. Of great homiletical value is his Thoughts on Preaching, N.Y., 1861. He wrote also some of the best translations of German hymns, which first appeared in Schaff's Deutsche Kirchenfreund. Some of them, especially P. Gerhardt's passion hymn "O sacred Head now wounded," have passed into many hymn-books. See Forty Years' Familiar Letters of Rev. Dr. J. W. Alexander, edited by Rev. Dr. John Hall of Trenton. N.Y., 1860; 2 vols.

ALEXANDER, Joseph Addison, D.D., b. in Philadelphia, April 24, 1809; d. at Princeton, N.J., Jan. 23, 1860. He was the third son of Archibald Alexander; educated in Princeton, and was graduated there, from the College of New Jersey, with the highest honors, although only seventeen, 1826. He had already shown that taste for languages which distinguished him, and availed himself of a little leisure, after graduation, to carry forward his favorite studies. In connection with Professor Robert B. Patton, he taught a classical academy at Edge Hill, near Princeton, and bore the heavier part of the burden of preparing Professor Patton's first American edition of Donnegan's Greek Lexicon. In the fall of 1830 he became adjunct professor of ancient languages and literature in the College of New Jersey, but resigned in the spring of 1833, and went to Europe for a year of study in Germany. On his return, he became instructor in the Oriental languages and literature in Princeton Theological Seminary, although the formal acceptance of this chair, to which he had been elected in 1835, was not given until 1838. In 1852 he changed to the chair of church history, and 1858 to that of New Testament literature, which he held at the time of his death. He was a scholar of wide reading, of catholic tastes, and great industry. His mode of life was peculiar: a bachelor, he was incessantly occupied with, and wholly engrossed in, his work, and lived much to himself, took very little regular exercise, and by his abstracted ways won a reputation for eccentricity and hauteur; yet he was a man of tenderness, modesty, and piety. As a preacher, he was popular and brilliant, and to the inner circle who knew him there was no more charming friend. He was the most remarkable linguist America has produced. He read some thirty languages, and with many of these had a critical acquaintance, and could speak seven: he devoted himself chiefly to Hebrew. As a commentator, he followed Hengstenberg, but not slavishly, for he was a profound and genuine scholar; yet the everywhere present hand of his admired master may have somewhat altered his judgment, as it certainly detracted from the originality of his work. He published commentaries upon the Psalms, N. Y., 3 vols., 1850; Isaiah, N. Y., 2 vols., 1846-47, his masterpiece, best edition, edited by Rev. Dr. John Eadie of Glasgow, 1875. Professor Charles Hodge and he planned a series of popular commentaries upon the New Testament, of which he finished Mark, N. Y., 1858, and Acts, N. Y., 1856. Matthew was posthumously published, N. Y., 1860, besides two volumes of Sermons (N. Y., 1860), and Notes on New Testament Literature. His Biography was written by his nephew, H. C. ALEXANDER, N. Y., 1870, 2 vols.

ALEXANDER BALAS, according to his own account and that of his adherents, a natural son of Antiochus Epiphanes, but by his adversaries considered an impostor, landed at Ptolemais in 152 B. C., and conquered the Syrian throne after a two-years' contest with Demetrius Soter, who was defeated and killed in 150. In 147, however, Demetrius Nicator, a son of Demetrius Soter, raised a rebellion in Syria; and when the Egyptian king, Ptolemy, invaded the country, and declared himself in favor of Demetrius, Alexander was routed, and murdered at Abæ in Arabia, whither he had fled, 146. His relations to the Jews, especially to their leader, Jonathan, were very friendly, as appears both from the first Book of the Maccabees and from Josephus.

ALEXANDER JANNÆUS, king of the Jews, 104-78 B. C.; the third son of John Hyrcanus; opened his reign by putting to death one of his brothers, and received from his own subjects the surname "Thracides" (as cruel as a Thracian). Besides his wars with foreign provinces, with Ptolemy Lathyrus, with the Moabites and Ammonites, with Demetrius Eucærus, Aretas, etc., his reign was an almost uninterrupted series of internal revolts and massacres. He had to surround the altar with a screen of boards when he sacrificed, because the people assembled in the temple threw lemons at him; and, when he once asked them what he should do to win their goodwill, they simply answered, "Kill yourself." After his death, his widow Alexandra gave the Pharisees a considerable share in the government in order to preserve the throne for her two minor sons; and from this occurrence dates the political influence of the Pharisees. JOSEPH.: Antiq. xiii. 12-16.

ALEXANDER NEVSKI, b. at Vladimir 1218; d. Nov. 14, at Gorodetz 1263, a son of the grand duke Jaroslav; ascended the throne 1252, and governed so wisely, that, when he died, the Russian people inscribed him in their calendar as a saint. On the spot on the Neva where he gained one of his greatest victories, defeating the Swedes and the Teutonic knights, Peter the Great built one of the greatest and richest monasteries in Russia, bearing his name; and the day of his burial (Nov. 23) as well as the day on which his relics were transferred to the monastery, are consecrated by the Russian Church as his festivals. Of the great exertions of Innocent IV. to make him join the Roman Church he seems to have taken very little notice; but he was very anxious to procure toleration and respect for Christianity among the Mohammedan peoples of Central and Western Asia.

ALEXANDER OF HALES (Halensis or Alen-sis, also Halesius or Alesius) was educated in the Monastery of Hales, Gloucestershire, Eng., studied in the University of Paris, entered the order of the Franciscans in 1222, acquired a great fame as a teacher in theology, and died in Paris 1245. His Summa Universæ Theologiae, first printed at Venice (1475), was written on the instigation of Innocent IV., and received his approbation. It is not a commentary on the sentences of Lombardus, but an independent work, giving a triple series of authorities, — those who say yes, those who say no, and then the reconciliation or judgment, and choosing the authorities not only in the Bible and among the Fathers, but also among Greek, Latin, and Arab poets and philosophers, and among later theologians. It treats in its first part the doctrines of God and his attributes; in its second, those of creation and sin; in its third, those of redemption and atonement; and, in its fourth and last, those of the sacraments. Among the doctrines which have been specially developed, and, so to speak, fixed, by Alexander of Hales, are those of the thesaurus supererogationis perfectorum, of the character indelibilis of baptism, confirmation, and ordination, etc. See HAURÉAU: De la philosophie scolastique, Paris, 1850. I.; STÜCKEL, Geschichte d. Philosophie, Mainz, 1865, Bnd. II., pp. 317-326; UEBERWEG, Hist. of Philosophy, Vol. I., pp. 433, 434.

ALEXANDER THE GREAT, the famous king of Macedonia, and conqueror, b. B. C. 356; d. at Babylon B. C. 323; and was buried at Alexandria, which he had founded, B. C. 332. By his conquests he brought Europe and Asia into contact, made Greek the ruling language of civilization, and thus unconsciously prepared the way for the spiritual conquest of the gospel. His name does not occur in the canonical books, but in the Apocrypha, 1 Macc. i. 1-9; vi. 2, and figuratively is mentioned in Dan. ii. 39, where he is represented first as the belly of brass in Nebuchadnezzar's image; then, vii. 6, as a leopard with four wings; as a one-horned he-goat, viii. 5-7, to indicate his great strength, and the swiftness of his conquests; and finally is directly spoken of, though not by name, in xi. 3, 4. Alexander won his epithet "The Great" by an unparalleled career. From the time he succeeded his father Philip, B.C. 336, until his death, he was restlessly and resistlessly marching from place to place. He subdued Egypt on the west, and Syria, Palestine, Persia, and Babylonia on the east. He pushed his way across Asia as far as to the Punjab in India, and left a monument of his presence in that country in the shape of twelve altars of enormous size on the Hyphasis, of which remains exist. It is sad to record that this brilliant man died of fever caused by intemperance; and that the empire which he had gathered was divided at his death among his four generals. Josephus relates (Antiq. xi. 8, 5) that after the siege of Tyre Alexander visited Jerusalem, and was so much impressed with Daniel's prophecy concerning him, which he allowed had been fulfilled, that he granted the Jews everywhere the most important privileges. There is no mention of this incident in heathen historians.

ALEXANDRIA, founded in 322 B.C. by Alexander the Great, rose rapidly under the dynasty of the Ptolemies, and was, at the beginning of the Christian era, one of the first cities of the world, with a population of three hundred thousand freemen. In 80 B.C. Ptolemy Alexander bequeathed it to the Romans; but it did not become actually a Roman possession until 30 B.C., when it was taken by Augustus. He placed it directly under the imperial power; and it was governed by imperial prefects up to A.D. 196, when Severus restored its municipal freedom. Always turbulent, and ready for rebellion, it was treated with extreme harshness by some of the Cæsars; and from the beginning of the third century, when in 215 Caracalla put to death every youth in the city capable of bearing arms, it began to decline. Nevertheless, when (in 640) it was taken by the Arabs, Amru could write to the caliph Omar that he had conquered a city with four thousand palaces, four thousand baths, twelve thousand dealers in fresh oil, twelve thousand gardeners, forty thousand Jews paying tribute, and four hundred theatres. But greater disasters were in store for it from the hands of the pirates: its commerce was disturbed; the decline became decay. When Cairo was built (in 969), it lost its prestige. When the route to the East by the Cape of Good Hope (in 1497) was discovered, its commerce was completely ruined. At the beginning of this century it was a mere village; but is now a large and prosperous city of two hundred thousand inhabitants.

Commercial Importance. — The city stood on the narrow stretch of land which separates Lake Mareotis from the Mediterranean, twelve miles west of the Canopic mouth of the Nile. A mole one mile long connected the mainland with the Island of Pharos, where was the famous lighthouse. On both sides of this mole spacious harbors were built, and the westernmost of these harbors was by a canal connected with Lake Mareotis, which again, by another canal, was connected with the Canopic arm of the Nile. From these two harbors the corn of Egypt was exported; and for several centuries Rome and Constantinople depended on Alexandria for the principal element of their food. The exportation of breadstuffs, however, was only one branch of the business of the city. Alexandria was really the mistress of the commerce of the world, the common place of exchange for the products of Spain and India, Scythia and Ethiopia; and this, its cosmopolitan character, it showed in its population, in its very building. It consisted of three quarters, — Rhacotis, Brucheum, and the Jews' ward. In Rhacotis the Egyptians lived, and here was the famous Temple of Serapis. Brucheum was occupied by the Greeks; and here was the still more famous Museum, with the greatest library the antique world ever saw, numbering seven hundred thousand rolls or books, and representing the Latin, Greek, Egyptian, and Indian literatures. The Jews' ward was very populous. Jewish immigration to Egypt was frequent and of old date. Philo says that at his time there lived more than one million of Jews in the country. After the capture of Jerusalem, Ptolemy I. settled a numerous colony of Jews in Alexandria, and gave them equal rights with the Greeks. The Romans confirmed these privileges; and Augustus established a Jewish council to administer Jewish affairs under the authority of the imperial prefect. But, by closer acquaintance, the Jews became distasteful to the Greeks, and hateful to the Romans. Under Caligula, they lost their privileges; under Vespasian, their temple and synagogues were closed; in 415, when Cyril was patriarch, they were even expelled from the city.

Literary Character. — When, after the Macedonian conquest, the literary life of Greece was transferred to Alexandria, it had already lost its creative power, and become essentially critical. Instead of poetry, it produced grammars, rhetorics, archæology, and mythology; instead of philosophy, it produced mathematics, astronomy, medicine, and geography. But the physical and mathematical sciences are to philosophy exactly the same as the linguistic and historical sciences are to poetry, — a dissolvent. In the field of philosophy, however, there arose, from the peculiar circumstances under which life was led in Alexandria, a peculiar problem which, though critical to all appearances, could not be solved by criticism alone; and which, though forming a new phase in the history of philosophy, had to leave philosophy altogether in order to find its true solution. Here the idea of scientific knowledge as the highest state of the human mind met with the ideas of a divine revelation, without which all other spiritual gifts are poor; here the idea of imaginative reasoning as the highest energy of the human mind met with the idea of a prophetic inspiration, without which every mental exertion is blunted and blind; here Greek philosophy and Jewish religion, Roman positivism and Indian fantasticalness, the whole West and the whole East, met each other face to face, and every day; an explanation soon became necessary. One attempt to mediate between these contrasts was made from the Jewish side by Philo. His power of appreciating and assimilating Greek conceptions is admirable, but in his speculations that which is specifically Jewish is lost. The strict and unconditional submission to the revealed word evaporates into arbitrary allegorical explanations. Religion is gone. Another attempt was made from the Greek side by the Neo-Platonists. Their expositions of the relation between God and the world, the divine and the human, spirit and matter, are often ingenious, and sometimes, as for instance when Plotinus touches the idea of the beautiful, very striking. But in their speculations that which is specifically Greek is lost. The subtle but sober exactness of the inference runs astray in the wildest dreams and vagaries. Science is gone. Not until the problem reached that stream of Christian thought which during the first four centuries flowed with powerful current through the life of Alexandria, not until it presented itself to the mind of Athanasius as the very heart of the Christian faith, found it its true solution.

Ecclesiastical Influence.—Under such circumstances arose the catechetical school of Alexandria. The instruction which the Lord had ordered to be given in connection with baptism was in the first days of the Church always given before the sacrament, with the exception of the few cases in which infants were baptized together with their parents. There was, however, no special office, either of preacher or of teacher, in the primitive Church; though the increase of the congregations, the occurrence of heresies, and the more definite formulation of the Christian doctrines, soon made a regularly established teaching necessary. As a simple and natural consequence of circumstances, Christian teaching, very early and for the first time, assumed in Alexandria the form of a regular catechetical institution. The frequent conversion of educated pagans, even philosophers and scholars, and the rise of Gnosticism, made it necessary for the Alexandrian bishops to intrust the instruction of catechumens only to scholarly educated Christians. They often chose converted philosophers for the purpose; and the lectures and discussions of these teachers were heard not only by educated pagans, but also by Christians who wished to have a scholarly exposition of Christianity. Often several catechists taught at the same time. No pay was given for the instruction; but rich catechumens used to offer presents, which, however, many teachers declined to accept. The instruction was given in the house of the teacher, where the pupils, men and women, gathered from early morning to late in the night. The method of teaching was very various, generally adapted to the individual wants of the pupils, and often assuming the form of alternating questions and answers. The origin of the school is obscure. According to tradition, St. Mark the Evangelist was its founder. But the first of whom we know with certainty that he filled the office of a teacher in the school was Pantænus. He was followed by his pupil Clement, and in 202 Clement was succeeded by Origen. Although Origen was only eighteen years old, he soon raised the school to the highest point of its prosperity. In 232 he was expelled from the city, and founded another catechetical school in Cæsarea in Palestine; but the school of Alexandria still continued to flourish under the leadership of his pupils, Heraclas and Dionysius. After the time of Dionysius, the history of the school again becomes obscure. Arius is said to have taught in it. From 340 to 395 the blind Didymus was director. He was followed by Rhodon, and Rhodon by Philip from Sida. But having exhausted itself in the Origenistic, Nestorian, and Monophysitic controversies, the institution, once the representative of a brilliant and fruitful phase of the theological science, gradually sank down into a school for children.

The theological character of the teaching of this institution, a Platonizing speculation on the basis of an allegorical interpretation of the Bible, is a true mirror of the whole literary life of the city, full of errors, and rich in the sweetest fruits; skimming over every thing with shallow vanity, and touching the deepest chords of the human soul, but always stirring, always suggestive, greater in influence than in results. ALEXIANS, from their patron Alexius, or CELLITÆ, from cella, a tomb, was the name of an association of men formed in 1300 at Antwerp, for the purpose of nursing the sick, taking care of the poor, and burying their dead. The association was simply a branch of the BEGINI, or BEGHARDI, which see.

ALFORD, Henry, D.D., Dean of Canterbury, b. in London, Eng., Oct. 7, 1810; d. Jan. 12, 1871. He was one of the most variously accomplished clergymen of his day,—poet, preacher, painter, musician, biblical scholar, critic and philologist; and would unquestionably have been far more eminent in any one of these lines if he had not tried to excel in all. He was his father's only child, and his mother died at his birth. His father, a scholarly clergyman, took the utmost pains with his education, and was rewarded by his precocity. After the usual preparation, Alford entered Trinity College, Cambridge, October, 1827, where his career was successful. He was ordained deacon Oct. 26, 1833; elected a fellow of his college, Oct. 1, 1834, and priest, Nov. 6, 1834; married his cousin in the spring of 1835; and simultaneously became vicar of Wymeswold, Leicestershire. In 1839–40 he edited Dearden's Miscellany, a monthly magazine. He declined the bishopric of New Zealand in 1841, and that of New Brunswick in 1844. In 1842 he took the post of examiner in logic and moral and intellectual philosophy in the University of London. In September of 1853 he became incumbent of Quebec Chapel in London; in March, 1857, he was advanced by Lord Palmerston to the deanery of Canterbury. He was the founder and first editor of The Contemporary Review, 1866–70. The great work of his life was his edition of the Greek New Testament, 1849–61, 6th ed., revised and enlarged, 1868, which had the distinguished merit of introducing German learning (Olshausen, Stier, De Wette, Meyer, Tischendorf) to English readers. The amount of patient labor expended upon the four volumes of his work, as is evidenced by the improvements made in each successive edition, entitle him to the lasting gratitude of scholars, although it will be conceded that he was rather a compiler than an original commentator. His work maintains its popularity, and as a digest of German New Testament exegesis has permanent value.

Beside his Greek Testament, there was posthumously published in 1872 a revised version and explanatory commentary of Genesis and part of Exodus, portions of a projected commentary on the Old Testament. In 1868 appeared his New Testament for English Readers, 4 vols., 8vo; in 1869, a revision of the A. V. of the New Testament. He was largely instrumental in advancing the cause of Revision, and was one of the original members of the Revision Committee. Besides these exegetical and critical labors, Alford published the School of the Heart and Other Poems, 2 vols., 1835, the Abbot of Muchelnage, 1841, Psalms and Hymns, 1844, — poems which asserted his claim to be considered a genuine, though minor, religious poet; some of his hymns are likely to live, especially his "Ten thousand times ten thousand, In spotless raiment bright." His little book entitled The Queen's English, 2d ed., 1864, had the fortune to call forth a trenchant criticism from Mr. G. W. Moon, entitled The Dean's English. In addition to the volumes already mentioned, there came from his hand at various times volumes of sermons, lectures, essays, and reviews, translations from the Greek, and, in conjunction with his niece, a novel, Nelheron on Sea (1869). Dean Alford was a truly catholic man. On more than one occasion he publicly appeared in gatherings of Dissenters, and sat with them. This trait is not common in English deans. His private life was very lovely. He was an humble Christian, while enjoying a world-wide fame. See his Life and Letters, edited by his widow. London, 1872, 2 vols.

ALFRED THE GREAT, king of England, 871-901, was born in 849 at Wantage in Berkshire, the youngest son of Æthelwulf and Osburgha. Although it proved impossible to find among his countrymen one who could instruct him in Latin, he was, nevertheless, possessed of an elevated and distinct idea of what learning and civilization meant; and although his reign, with its intermittent contest with the Danes, contains many vicissitudes, he succeeded, nevertheless, in realizing his ideal of reform and progress. He remodelled the whole political and ecclesiastical organization of his realm; see Leges Ælfredi. He rebuilt the churches, monasteries, and schools, burnt down by the Danes, and founded new ones, such as the Monasteries of Athelney and Winchester, and the University of Oxford. He invited a number of learned men to his country, and provided for them, and, through the intimate connection which he maintained with Rome, he was able to procure books and form libraries. But of a still greater importance were his personal exertions to arouse among his countrymen a desire of knowledge and culture. He translated Boëthius: De consolazione philosophice, edited by I. S. Cordale, London, 1829; and Orosius, edited by Dr. Bosworth, Oxford, 1859. Both works are treated with great freedom, especially the latter. In some places something is left out, in others something is added. Among the most remarkable additions are a geographical and ethnological review of Germany and the adjacent Slavonic countries, and a similar review of Scandinavia and the Baltic countries from the reports of Ohthere and Wulfstán. Also the paraphrase of Beda's Historia eccles. gentis Anglorum, Cantabrig, 1722, is the work of Alfred. Of still greater importance is his translation of the Liber pastoralis curæ by Pope Gregory I., edited by H. Sweet, 1872, a book well calculated to influence the spirit of the Saxon clergy. The dialogues of Pope Gregory were not translated by Alfred, but under his supervision, by Werferhd, Bishop of Worcester; and the soliloquies of St. Augustine, as well as the collection of proverbs and the adaptation of the fables of Esop, belongs to a later period. William of Malmesbury tells us that Alfred began to translate the Psalms; but of the Anglo-Saxon Psalms, edited by Benjamin Thorpe in 1835, hardly any belong to the king. [Alfred was epileptic, yet incessant and most efficient in labor. Some recent English expositors (Jowett and Lightfoot) use this fact in corroboration of the theory that Paul's "thorn in the flesh" (2 Cor. xii. 7) was epilepsy. See SCHAFF'S Popular Commentary, Gaiatians, Excursus on Chap. IV., 13-15.]

ALGER OF LIEGE, or ALGER OF CLUGNY, also Alger Scholasticus, or Alger Magister, b. at Liege about 1055; d. at Clugny about 1131; was educated in the high school of Liege, — at that time the educational centre of the whole north-western Germany; was appointed deacon and scholasticus at the Church of St. Bartholomew about 1100, and afterwards canon at the Cathedral of S. Mariæ et S. Lamberti, but retired about 1121 to the Monastery of Clugny. The two most remarkable of his works are De sacramentis corporis et sanguinis Domini, libri III., which has been often reprinted, and occupies a prominent place in the development of the doctrine of transubstantiation; and Tractatus de misericordia et justitia, printed by Marline, Nov. anecdot. Tom. ALLAN (ALAN, ALLAN), William, b. in Lancashire in 1532; d. in Rome in 1594; entered the University of Oxford in 1547; studied at Oriel College; was made principal of St. Mary's Hall in Queen Mary's time, and Canon of York in 1558. Among those who hailed the return to Romanism, which took place with the accession of Mary, Allan was one of the most ardent; and when Mary died, and Elizabeth re-established the Reformed church-order, he left England. Concentrating all his energy and talent on the one idea, the maintenance of Romanism in England, he settled at Louvain; and soon this city became the centre whither all the Romanish emigrants from England gathered. In 1565 he returned secretly to England. He took up his residence in the vicinity of Oxford, and for three years his intrigues remained unnoticed; but in 1568 he had to flee for his life. He now founded a college at Douay for the education of English priests; and this institution was so well supported by France, Spain, and Rome, that it soon numbered a hundred and fifty students, and eight or ten professors. But as it stood in close connection with the Jesuits, and showed itself very hostile to Queen Elizabeth and the Anglican Church, it had to be removed to Rheims, where Allan was appointed canon. At the same time he was also active in literature, and published a number of pamphlets, apologetical and polemical, which, although without any real literary value, are striking for their hatred and recklessness. One of the most characteristic is his Admonition to the Nobility and People of England, printed in Antwerp, 1588, and distributed in England as a forerunner for the Spanish Armada. In England these pamphlets caused great indignation, even among the Romanists, and it was made treason for a subject of the English crown to correspond or entertain any kind of connection with Allan; but by Rome and Spain he was magnificently rewarded. Philip II. made him Archbishop of Mechlin, and he lived in Rome in princely style. He was one of the translators of the Rheims New Testament (1582). G. LECHLER.

ALLEGORICAL INTERPRETATION OF THE BIBLE assumes a double or threefold sense of the Scriptures,—an obvious literal sense, and a hidden spiritual or mystic sense, both of which were intended by the sacred writer. History is not merely history to the allegorist; indeed, the historic value of a passage is generally the least interesting fact about it: what is of most importance are the spiritual lessons it conveys. Thus the Book of Joshua has quite recently been treated, by a popular writer, as an allegory of the soul's conquest over sin and self. This style of biblical explanation finds a parallel in paganism. The Greek philosophers since Socrates, scandalized by the stories of their divinities, allegorically interpreted the poems of Hesiod and Homer. In a later period the Stoics, the Neo-Platonists, and the Gnostics were noted for their facility in finding in the ancient myths the truths of the philosophy of nature. But the allegorical interpretation of the Bible arose among the Alexandrian Jews who came in contact with Greek wisdom, and the attempt to reconcile the Mosaic revelation with the Greek philosophy. First Aristobulus (circa 160 B.C.) and the writers in the Apocrypha, and next, and principally, Philo (circa 40 B.C.), found all the philosophy in the Old Testament by their allegorical interpretation. Thus the four rivers of Paradise were Plato's four cardinal virtues; Adam was the lower, sensuous man; Abraham was the human soul progressing towards the knowledge of God; Sarah represented divine wisdom; Hagar, secular learning, etc. The Apostle Paul himself gives instances (1 Cor. x. 4; Gal. iii. 16; iv. 21-31) of the sacred allegory, although his use of it is so exceptional and so restrained that it does not countenance it as a method. But the difference between the allegorizing of Philo and Paul is very great. Philo put his Platonic ideas into Scripture: Paul drew out the deeper meaning of the same. Philo idealized, Paul spiritualized, Mosaism. The one left nothing in it but philosophy and myth: the other drew from it the gospel.

Into the early Christian Church allegorical interpretation came, and first, as was to be expected, from the Jews at Alexandria; for the Christians there were now interested, as the Jews had been, in reconciling their religion with Greek thought. Clement of Alexandria (circa 200) taught that the verbal sense is merely for elementary faith: the allegorical sense alone leads to the gnosis. But the chief allegorist of the Church is Origen (185-253), that fertile, but not well-balanced, writer. He taught a threefold sense of Scripture, corresponding to the three constituent elements in man,—body, soul, and spirit. Once introduced, the system more or less developed has maintained its hold on the Church. In the middle ages four senses were found in Scripture,—historical, allegorical, moral, and anagogical; e.g., Jerusalem is literally a city of Palestine, allegorically the Church, morally the believing soul, anagogically the heavenly Jerusalem. To this fourfold sense the present Roman-Catholic Church holds. The Reformers returned to the grammatical sense; and this may be said to constitute the basis of Protestant exegesis. Allegorical interpretation has its advocates to-day in Protestantism. Many sermonizers and popular expositors are allegorists. Many scholarly men have, in this idea, followed the Fathers. Bishop Wordsworth's is a prominent instance of a commentary written largely on this principle.

The system is so easily learnt, so specious in its promises, that it is no wonder that it attracts many. It seems to turn the Bible into a "fountain of living waters." Everywhere under its inspiration Christ is seen: the desert is gladdened by his presence, the wilderness is a flower-garden. Genealogical tables by mere interpretation of the names become rich deposits of spiritual truth. But the allegorical interpretation tampers with the Word of God. It substitutes human fancies for divine facts and truths. As Calvin, by general acknowledgment one of the ablest commentators, says, by the allegorists Scripture was tortured away from its true sense. They "concluded that the literal sense was too mean and poor, and that under the outward bark of the letter there lurked deeper mysteries, which cannot be extracted but by beating out allegories. God visited this profanation by a just judgment, when he suffered the pure meaning of Scripture to be buried under false interpretations. I acknowledge that Scripture is a most rich and inexhaustible fountain of all wisdom, but I deny that its fertility consists in the various meanings which any man at his pleasure may assign. Let us know, then, that the true meaning of Scripture is the natural and obvious meaning; and let us embrace and abide by it resolutely." This style of interpretation is not exposition, but imposition: the meaning is not read out, but read in. History, the grammar, and the dictionary are the proper aids in Bible study; not the subjective imagination. We must find out, under the guidance of the Spirit, what the holy men of old were by him moved to say.

The Swedenborgians have as a matter of revelation a modification of the allegorical method. Swedenborg laid it down that "all and every part of the Scripture, even to the most minute, not excepting the smallest jot or tittle, signify and involve spiritual and celestial things" (Arcana Cœlestia, I. No. 2). This deeper sense is in the literal as the soul is in the body, but was lost until revealed to Swedenborg. His allegorizing is arbitrary, fanciful, often ingenious, often absurd. Thus he considers the first chapter of Genesis to represent in its spiritual sense the regeneration of man, of which process the six days are the successive stages; Adam in Paradise is the primitive Church; the four rivers are goodness, knowledge, reason, and science, etc. His exegesis is critically worthless.

ALLEGORY is most closely allied in the domain of art to the symbol, in that of literature to the parable. But while in art the symbolical representation leads the mind by a natural and necessary association from the sign given to the idea intended, — as when, for instance, a lion rising on his forepaws symbolizes defiant courage, — in the allegory there is only a conventional and incidental connection between sign and idea, and the key to the meaning of an allegorical representation is generally found in its symbolical attributes, as, for instance, when a woman in Greek costume is recognized as America by means of the flag she holds in the hand. The difference in literature between the allegory and the parable is somewhat similar. The parable consists of two parts, — a plain narrative from real, practical, every-day life, to which is added a parallel from the spiritual or moral sphere; and the relation between these two parts is that of a striking and easily comprehended illustration of profound spiritual teaching. The allegory, on the contrary, consists only of a fictitious and fantastic narrative; but by means of subtle hints and allusions this narrative leads the reader to seek for a real and substantial meaning beneath the fanciful surface.

In Christian art, which is very rich in beautiful symbols, — the Cross, the Lamb, etc., — the allegory has always played a somewhat subordinate part; though in the earliest times, and on account of the social position of the congregation, it was of frequent occurrence, and in ingenious artificiality often approached the puzzle; as, for instance, where Christ was allegorically represented by the picture of a fish, because the Greek name of fish, ἰχθύς, is composed of the initial letters of the words Ἰησοῦς Χριστὸς Θεοῦ Υἱὸς Σωτήρ, "Jesus Christ, God's Son, the Saviour." In Christian literature it was often employed in books of devotion and moral teaching, and it has produced at least one lasting and very prominent work, — The Pilgrim's Progress; not to forget, that, introduced by Philo as a means of reconciling Judaism and Platonism, it was adopted by the theological school of Alexandria as the highest principle of biblical exegesis, and through Augustine transplanted to the Western Church, where it flourished during the Middle Ages.

CLEMENS PETERSEN.

ALLEGRI, Gregoria, b. in Rome about 1580; d. there Feb. 18, 1652; studied music under Nanini, and was made director of the papal choir by Urban VIII., 1629. He was one of the first who composed for stringed instruments. His most celebrated composition is a Miserere for two choirs, still performed each year during Holy Week in the Sixtine Chapel. It was forbidden, under penalty of excommunication, to give or take copies of this music. In 1771, however, Dr. Burney procured a copy, and published it in London; but it was soon discovered that the effect of the music depends upon a peculiar execution, of which the papal choir alone has the secret.

ALLEN, David Oliver, b. at Barre, Mass., 1804; d. at Lowell, Mass., July 17, 1863; was graduated from Amherst College in 1823; studied theology in the Seminary of Andover; went in 1827 as a missionary to India; returned thence in 1853; and published in 1856 a History of India.

ALLEN, John, b. in 1476; murdered July 28, 1534, at Artane, near Clontarf; was educated at Oxford; and by Archbishop Warham sent to Rome, where he staid nine years. On his return, he was appointed chaplain to Wolsey, whose policy he adopted; and in 1528 he was made Archbishop of Dublin. He wrote Epistola de Pallii Significatione and other minor pieces.

ALLEN, John, b. at Truro, Cornwall, 1771; d. June 17, 1839, at Hackney, near London, where for thirty years he kept a private school. He published in 1813 a translation of Calvin's Institutes of the Christian Religion, and in 1816 Modern Judaism.

ALLEN, William, D.D., b. at Pittsfield, Mass., Jan. 2, 1784; d. at Northampton, Mass., July 16, 1868; was graduated at Harvard College in 1802; studied theology; was licensed in 1804; and soon after appointed assistant librarian of Harvard College. He issued in 1809 an American Biographical and Historical Dictionary, the first work of the kind in America. His diligence in collecting materials, as well as the growth of the country, are evidenced by the increase of the book from seven hundred titles to eighteen hundred in the second edition, 1832, to seven thousand in the third edition, 1857. In 1810 he succeeded his father as pastor of the Pittsfield Congregational church. Became president of the university intended by the New Hampshire legislature to supplant Dartmouth College; this scheme failing, he afterwards became president of Bowdoin College in 1820, and retained the position until 1839. He removed to Northampton, where he carried on useful literary labors. He was the father-in-law of Professor Henry B. Smith, D.D., LL.D.; and in the memoir of the latter (N.Y., 1880) will be found some notice of him.

ALLENITES, the followers of Henry Allen, who, b. at Newport, R.I., June 14, 1748, d. in Nova Scotia, in 1784, began in 1774 to propagate his ideas by preaching and by publishing tracts. He held that all the souls of the human race were emanations from one great spirit; that they were all present in the Garden of Eden, and took actual part in the fall; that the human body and the whole material world did not exist before the fall, but were created to prevent the absolute destruction of the human race by the fall, etc. He made a considerable impression, especially in Nova Scotia, and gathered a number of zealous proselytes; but after his death his party gradually dwindled away.

ALLEY, William, b. about 1512 at Chipping Wycombe, Bucks, Eng.; d. at Exeter, April 15, 1570; was educated at Eton, Cambridge, and Oxford; and espoused the cause of the Reformation, but kept himself in retirement during the reign of Mary. Elizabeth made him reader in St. Paul's, and in 1560 Bishop of Exeter. He translated the Pentateuch for the Bishops' Bible, and wrote an exposition of 1 Peter in The Poor Man's Library.

ALLIANCE, EVANGELICAL. A voluntary association of evangelical Christians from different churches and countries, for the purpose of manifesting and promoting Christian union and religious liberty.

I. ORIGIN AND AIMS. — The Alliance owes its origin to a wide-spread and growing desire for a closer union among evangelical Protestants, both for the sake of union, and for a more successful conflict with infidelity on the one hand, and superstition on the other. This union is to be entirely free and voluntary, and to leave room for great variety within the limits of scriptural or evangelical belief. The object is, not to create union, but to acknowledge, exhibit, and strengthen that spiritual union which has always existed among true Christians as members of Christ's body, but which is sadly marred and obstructed by the many divisions and rivalries of Protestant denominations and sects. The Alliance aims not at an organic union, nor at a confederation of churches, but simply at a free Christian union of individual members from different churches who hold essentially the same faith; although such a union will naturally tend to bring gradually the churches themselves into closer fellowship and mutual recognition. It claims no official and legislative authority that might in any way interfere with the internal affairs of the denominational organizations, or the loyalty of its members to their particular communion. It relies solely on the moral power of truth and love.

The other object of the Alliance is the defence and promotion of religious freedom in that sense in which it is understood by the advanced sections of Protestantism, especially in Great Britain and the United States. It is freedom as distinct from mere toleration, freedom of conscience as a fundamental and inalienable right of every man, and freedom of worship which is the natural result of the former, and which the government is bound to protect. The Alliance is the only Christian organization which attends to this important interest, and comes to the aid of all who are persecuted for the sake of religion. By its unsectarian character and freedom from all political complications, it can accomplish and has accomplished a great deal for the relief of suffering brethren and the recognition of the sacred rights of conscience.

II. THE FOUNDING OF THE ALLIANCE. — After a number of preparatory meetings and conferences, the Alliance was founded in a remarkable and enthusiastic meeting held in Freemasons' Hall in London, Aug. 19-23, 1846. The meeting was composed of eight hundred Christians, — Episcopalians, Presbyterians, Independents, Methodists, Baptists, Lutherans, Reformed, Moravians, and others, — and included many of the most distinguished divines, preachers, and philanthropists from England, Scotland, Ireland, Germany, France, Switzerland, the United States, and other countries. Sir Culling Eardly, Bart., presided, and became the first president of the British branch. Eloquent addresses were delivered, fervent prayers offered, and nine doctrinal articles adopted; not, however, as a binding creed or confession, but simply as an expression of the essential consensus of evangelical Christians whom it seemed desirable to embrace in the Alliance.

III. THE DOCTRINAL BASIS. — The nine articles are as follows: —

"1. The divine inspiration, authority, and sufficiency of the Holy Scriptures.

"2. The right and duty of private judgment in the interpretation of the Holy Scriptures.

"3. The Unity of the Godhead, and the Trinity of the Persons therein.

"4. The utter depravity of human nature in consequence of the Fall.

"5. The incarnation of the Son of God, his work of atonement for the sins of mankind, and his mediatorial intercession and reign.

"6. The justification of the sinner by faith alone.

"7. The work of the Holy Spirit in the conversion and sanctification of the sinner.

"8. The immortality of the soul, the resurrection of the body, the judgment of the world by our Lord Jesus Christ, with the eternal blessedness of the righteous and the eternal punishment of the wicked.

"9. The divine institution of the Christian ministry, and the obligation and perpetuity of the ordinances of Baptism and the Lord's Supper."

Some regard this doctrinal statement as too liberal, others as too narrow (especially on account of Art. 9 which excludes the Quakers), while still others would have preferred no doctrinal basis, or only the Apostles' Creed, the simplest and most generally accepted of all creeds. Nevertheless it has answered a good purpose, and maintained the positive evangelical character of the Alliance. The American branch, at its organization (1867), adopted the nine London articles, with the following important explanatory and qualifying preamble: —

"Resolved, That in forming an Evangelical Alliance for the United States in co-operative union with other branches of the Alliance, we have no intention to give rise to a new denomination; or to effect an amalgamation of churches, except in the way of facilitating personal Christian intercourse and a mutual good understanding; or to interfere in any way whatever with the internal affairs of the various denominations; but simply to bring individual Christians into closer fellowship and co-operation, on the basis of the spiritual union which already exists in the vital relation of Christ to the members of his body in all ages and countries.

"Resolved, That in the same spirit we propose no new creed, but taking broad, historical, and evangelical catholic ground, we solemnly re-affirm and profess our faith in all the doctrines of the inspired word of God, and in the consensus of doctrines as held by all true Christians from the beginning. And we do more especially affirm our belief in the divine-human person and atoning work of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, as the only and sufficient source of salvation, as the heart and soul of Christianity, and as the centre of all true Christian union and fellowship.

"Resolved, That, with this explanation, and in the spirit of a just Christian liberality in regard to the minor differences of theological schools and religious denominations, we also adopt, as a summary of the consensus of the various evangelical Confessions of Faith, the Articles and Explanatory Statement set forth and agreed on by the Evangelical Alliance at its formation in London, 1846, and approved by the separate European organizations, which articles are as follows," etc.

IV. BRANCH ALLIANCES.—The Evangelical Alliance thus auspiciously organized soon spread throughout the Protestant world. Branch alliances were formed in Great Britain, Germany, France, Holland, Switzerland, Sweden, and even among the missionaries in Turkey and East India; more recently also in the United States, Canada, Italy, Australia, Brazil, Mexico, Egypt, and among the Protestant missionaries in Japan. There is no central organization with any controlling authority; and the General Alliance appears in active operation only from time to time when it meets in general conference, which has assumed the character of a Protestant œcumenical council, but differs from the œcumenical councils of the Greek and Roman Churches in claiming only moral and spiritual power. The various national branches are related to each other as members of a confederation with equal rights. The British organization, being the oldest and largest, and having a house (in London, No. 7 Adam Street, Strand), and salaried officers who devote their whole time to the work, has been heretofore the most influential; the Continental branches are more elastic, and confine themselves to occasional work; the American branch, which was organized at the Bible House, New York, in 1867 (a previous attempt having failed on account of the anti-slavery agitation before the Civil War), has in a short time become the most vigorous and popular; for in the United States, where all Christian sects are represented on a basis of equality before the law, there is also the greatest appreciation of religious freedom, the strongest desire for Christian union and co-operation, and the widest field for the realization of the idea of a universal Christian brotherhood on the basis of a free development of denominational peculiarities in dogma, discipline, and worship. We now give a brief summary of the history and results of the Alliance.

V. THE ANNUAL WEEK OF PRAYER.—This was originally proposed by the English and American missionaries in India, adopted by the Alliance, and has become an institution and means for promoting Christian union and the spread of the gospel at home and abroad. The first week of January is set aside for united prayer. A programme is issued several months before by the British organization, and sent to the branch Alliances for their revision and adoption. Each branch adapts it to the condition and wants of the country which it represents, and gives it a wide publicity. Some convenient church or hall is selected in those cities and villages which observe the custom, and the ministers and laity of different denominations unite in praying for the common objects of Christ's kingdom, with special reference to the conversion of the world. This week of prayer has become almost an institution (like the holy week), and is very generally observed in London, Paris, Berlin, Basle, Geneva, Rome, Cairo, Beirut, New York, and other large cities to the shores of the Pacific.

The following programme, issued by the American Branch for the year 1881, is given as a specimen:—

"January 2.—Theme: Christ the only hope of the lost world.

"Monday, 3.—Thanksgiving for the blessings, temporal and spiritual, of the past year, and prayer for their continuance.

"Tuesday, 4.—Humiliation and confession on account of individual, social, and national sins.

"Wednesday, 5.—Prayer for the Church of Christ, its unity and purity, its ministry, and for revivals of religion.

"Thursday, 6.—Christian education; prayer for the family, Sunday schools, and all educational institutions; for Young Men's Christian Associations, and for the press.

"Friday, 7.—Prayer for the prevalence of justice, humanity, and peace among all nations; for the suppression of intemperance and Sabbath desecration.

"Saturday, 8.—Prayer for Christian missions, and the conversion of the world to Christ.

"Sunday, 9.—Theme: On the Ministration of the Holy Spirit."

VI. CONFERENCES.—Another means of promoting the objects of the Alliance are national and international Conferences. The British organization holds a meeting annually in October in some city of England. The Irish and Scotch Branches do the same. The American Branch holds an American meeting every two years. The Continental and other branches meet less regularly. Far more important are the General Conferences which are convened at intervals of from four to six years according to circumstances. They have an international as well as interdenominational character, and may be called Protestant œcumenical councils, with this important difference, however, that they do not settle dogmas or canons of discipline, and have no legislative authority, but simply moral power. They are held in the great capitals, and arranged by the branch in whose bounds they meet, with the co-operation of all the sister branches. They last from seven to ten days, and are spent in prayer and praise, brotherly communion, and free discussions of the leading religious and social questions of the age. Christians from all countries, and speaking various languages, are brought together face to face to become personally acquainted, and to encourage each other in every good work.

Seven general Conferences have been held thus far, and others will be held from time to time as long as the Alliance has vitality and a mission to fulfil. The first general Conference took place in London in 1851, the year of the great exhibition of the works of industry of all nations in the British metropolis; the second in Paris, 1855; the third in Berlin, 1857; the fourth in Geneva, 1861; the fifth in Amsterdam, 1867; the sixth in New York, 1873; the seventh in Basle, Switzerland, 1879. These meetings were all well attended, and left a most favorable impression upon the delegates and the country in which they were held. See a brief history of the first five Conferences, by Rev. James Davis, in the report of the New York Conference of the Alliance. New York, 1873, pp. 189, sqq. The Conference held in New York Oct. 2-12, 1873, is regarded by many as the most enthusiastic, interesting, and useful religious meeting in the history of American Christianity. Three of the foreign delegates — the Rev. Professor César-Louis Prieron of Geneva, Rev. Antonio Carrasco of Spain, and Rev. Emile F. Cook of Paris — took passage in the "Ville du Havre," which was sunk at sea Nov. 22, 1873: the first two were drowned, the third died, Jan. 29, 1874, in consequence of his exposure. More than twenty thousand dollars (a hundred thousand francs) were raised for their families in New York alone. The seventh Conference in Basle was not so large and imposing, but in its way equally interesting and successful, and highly creditable to the liberality and hospitality of that venerable old city. The Alliance has been the parent of other Alliances of a denominational and ecclesiastical character, as the Pan-Anglican Synod, the Pan-Presbyterian Alliance, the Pan-Methodist Conference, which likewise hold occasional meetings, but do not supersede nor interfere with the Evangelical Alliance and its general conferences.

VII. RELIGIOUS LIBERTY. — The Alliance assumed from the beginning that freedom of conscience and Christian union, far from being inconsistent with each other, are one and inseparable; that freedom is the basis of union, and union the result and support of freedom; that a union without freedom is only a dead, mechanical uniformity; that true union implies variety and distinction, and a full recognition of the rights and peculiar gifts and mission of other members and branches of Christ's kingdom. The Roman Church maintains union at the expense of freedom, and, while advocating liberty of conscience and public worship for herself, denies it to all others in principle, and, where she has the power, in practice also. Since the formation of the Alliance, many cases of persecution more or less severe have occurred, especially in Southern Europe, under the operation of penal laws against religious dissenters; and the united efforts of the different branches of the Alliance, through the press and by deputations of influential public men, have had a considerable moral influence in bringing about those remarkable changes in favor of religious liberty which have taken place among the Latin races, especially in Italy, and even in Russia and Turkey, within the last twenty years. The Alliance successfully exerted its influence for the release of the Madiai family in Tuscany (1852), who were punished for the sole crime of reading the Bible and holding religious meetings; for the release of Matamoras, Carrasco, and their friends, who, during the reign of Queen Isabella in Spain, were thrown into prison and condemned to the galleys for the same innocent cause (1853). It aided in inducing the Sultan of Turkey to abolish the death-penalty for apostasy from Mohammedanism in his dominions after the Crimean War (1856). It interceded for the Methodists and Baptists in Sweden (1858), which has since abrogated the penal laws against Roman Catholics and Protestants not belonging to the Lutheran Confession. It sent in 1871 a large deputation, in which prominent citizens of the United States took a leading part, to Prince Gortschakoff and the Czar of Russia (then at Friedrichshafen) to plead for the oppressed Lutherans in the Baltic Provinces; and these have not been disturbed since that time. It sent a similar deputation to the embassy from Japan, when they visited the United States and the courts of Europe in 1872, to remonstrate against the persecution of Christians, mostly Roman Catholics, in that distant empire of the East; and the persecution has since ceased. It has not forgotten the Nestorians in Persia, who appealed to the Alliance for protection against the oppression of a Mohammedan government; and prepared a memorial to the Czar on the persecution of Baptists in the South of Russia (1874). At the seventh general Conference in Basle (1879), a deputation was appointed to wait on the Emperor of Austria in behalf of certain Christians in Bohemia, who were debarred the liberty of holding even family worship; and the request was granted by the special interposition of the emperor. The force of public opinion on the subject of freedom of conscience and religious worship, as expressed by the Alliance, has always found a respectful hearing, and must sooner or later be obeyed by every civilized government on the globe.

LIT. — The Proceedings of the London meeting of 1846, when the Alliance was organized, and the Proceedings and Addresses of the General Conferences at London, Paris, Berlin, Geneva, Amsterdam, New York, and Basle, were all published in English, and most of them also in French, German, and Dutch, in the cities where they were held, and may be had at the office of the British organization, 7 Adam Street, Strand. The most important are: Evangelical Alliance Conference, 1873, edited by Drs. Schaff and Prime, published by the Harpers, New York, 1874, 773 pp. double col. The American Committee distributed gratuitously six hundred copies of this stately volume among delegates and theological libraries in Europe and America. Siebente Hauptversammlung der Evang. Allianz gehalten in Basle, 1879, herausgeg. von Prof. Dr. Riggenschach, Basle (Bahnmaier), 1879, in 2 vols. of 1,054 pp. The same in English, under the title, The Religious Condition of Christendom described in a series of papers presented to the Seventh Gen. Conf. of the Ev. Alliance held in Basle, 1879, edited by Dr. J. Murray Mitchell, London (Hodder and Stoughton), 1880. To this should be added the report of the Deputation of the Basle Conference to the Emperor of Austria in behalf of religious liberty in Bohemia, published in German and French at Basle, 1880. The British branch publishes from time to time special papers. The American branch has issued from 1867 to 1880 fifteen documents, among them a report on the state of religion in the United States for the Conference in Amsterdam, by the late Professor Dr. Henry B. Smith (1867), a similar report prepared for the Conference in Basle by Dr. Schaff (1879), and a report on the Alliance Deputation to the Czar of Russia in behalf of religious liberty (1871). The Alliance has no special organ, but uses the various religious periodicals friendly to the cause in different countries. The British organization reports its proceedings every month in the Evangelical Christendom, published by William John Johnson, in London, Edinburgh, and Dublin. PHILIP SCHAFF.

ALLIANCE OF THE REFORMED CHURCHES (popularly called "Presbyterian Alliance"). A voluntary organization formed in London 1875; somewhat similar to that of the Evangelical Alliance, but confined to Reformed churches holding the Presbyterian system of government, and more churchly in the character of its representation. It realizes a desire strongly entertained by Calvin (letter to Cranmer, 1552) and Beza (conference at St. Germain, 1561), to heal the divisions among Protestants by the formation of some general council. Nothing came of their efforts, and the different Protestant churches rapidly became still farther separated.

The English-speaking portion of the Presbyterians had their home in Scotland where Knox's influence was paramount; and there the desire for a re-union of Reformed Christendom lingering in men's hearts, subsequently found expression in a variety of ways. The Second Book of Discipline of the Scottish Church (pub. 1578) speaks of an "Assembly representing the Universal Kirk of Christ, which may be properly called the General Assembly, or General Council of the whole Kirk of God;" while in Parlován's well-known collection of Scottish Church laws (1st ed. 1709) there is a section under the title, "Of a General Council of Protestants." During the eighteenth century a variety of controversies conducted too often with great bitterness alienated even the Presbyterian churches from each other till Presbyterian re-union seemed all but hopeless. In the early part of the present century, however, a kindlier spirit began to prevail, and churches that were doctrinally agreed drew together. In 1820 the Burgher and Anti-burgher churches united under the name of the United Secession Church. This has been followed by a large number of church unions in Scotland, Ireland, Canada, the United States, Australia, and elsewhere; while the watchword of even those churches that did not see their way to entering into organic union with any of their neighbors became "Co-operation without incorporation." The formation of the Evangelical Alliance (London, 1846) showing how there might be such co-operation without any surrender of denominational existence, the desire for some form of Presbyterian union gradually became general. At length in 1870 the Rev. Dr. McCosh of Princeton, N.J., gave a definite direction to this desire by advocating a General Presbyterian Alliance. In Scotland Dr. W. G. Blaikie was especially active in the same direction. In 1873 the first ecclesiastical action on the subject was taken by the General Assemblies of the Presbyterian Church in Ireland, and of that in the United States in simultaneously appointing committees to correspond with other churches. This led to the holding of a meeting in New York (Oct. 6, 1873) during the sessions of the Sixth General Conference of the Evangelical Alliance, at which a committee was appointed to bring the matter before the Presbyterian churches throughout the world and to obtain their concurrence and co-operation. This committee issued an address in which they distinctly stated that what was proposed was not that the churches "should merge their separate existence in one large organization; but that, retaining their self-government, they should meet with the other members of the Presbyterian family to consult for the good of the Church at large, and for the glory of God." The proposal met with such general approval that in July, 1875, a conference was held at the English Presbyterian College in London. At this meeting, which lasted four days, and where nearly one hundred delegates, representing many churches, attended, a constitution for the proposed Alliance was prepared, from whose basis we extract the following:—

"1. This Alliance shall be known as THE ALLIANCE OF THE REFORMED CHURCHES THROUGHOUT THE WORLD HOLDING THE PRESBYTERIAN SYSTEM.

"2. Any church organized on Presbyterian principles, which holds the supreme authority of the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments in matters of faith and morals, and whose creed is in harmony with the consensus of the Reformed Churches, shall be eligible for admission into the Alliance."

It was also proposed that there should be a triennial council of delegates, ministers, and elders, in equal numbers, to be appointed by the different churches in proportion to the number of their congregations; and that this council, while at liberty to consider all matters of common interest, should "not interfere with the existing creed or constitution of any church in the Alliance, or with its internal order or external relations."

The Alliance which was thus proposed, was one, not of individual Christians nor of individual Presbyterians, but of Presbyterian churches, and its constitution met with great favor. It furnished an opportunity for the different church organizations to come into close fraternal relations with each other while retaining their separate existence and independence; while the council, it was seen, might in some measure informally do duty for that "missing link" of a worldwide Presbyterian Church, a General Assembly. In 1876, therefore, almost every Presbyterian organization adopted the constitution, and appointed delegates, who—to the number of three hundred and thirty-three, and representing more than forty-nine separate churches, scattered through twenty-five different countries, and consisting of more than twenty thousand congregations—met in Edinburgh, July 3–10, 1877, and constituted the First General Council of the Reformed Alliance. The session lasted eight days, during which papers were read and discussed on The Harmony of the Reformed Confessions; The Fundamental Principles of Presbyterianism; The Eldership; Co-operation in Mission Work, and such like.

The Second General Council, composed of nearly three hundred delegates, was held in Philadelphia, Sept. 23 to Oct. 2, 1880, and was an occasion of great interest. Papers were read and discussed on many vital Christian doctrines, e.g., Inspiration; The Atonement; Future Retribution,—expressing on the whole strong adherence to the old doctrinal positions of the Reformed Churches, while important movements were initiated that look to a unifying and simplifying of the Reformed Creeds, and to co-operation by the whole Reformed Church in enterprises of a missionary and benevolent character. The Third General Council will be held in Belfast, Ireland, in 1884.

ALLIANCE, The Holy, was a league between Alexander of Russia, Francis I. of Austria, and Friedrich Wilhelm of Prussia, for the purpose of maintaining that peace and order which, after the fall of Napoleon I., the congress of Vienna had succeeded to establish. In its original intention the Holy Alliance no doubt was a Christian effort with pure and lofty aims, professing, as it did, to carry out the principles of the gospel of Jesus Christ in all relations between sovereign and subjects, and between sovereigns and sovereigns. In reality, however, the league became a most vicious instrument of suppression and re-action. The form of the instrument was due to Alexander, who at that period stood under the inspiration of Madame Krüdener: the use to which it was put was determined by Austrian traditions and the character of Prince Metternich.

ALLIX, Peter, b. at Alençon, 1641; d. at Salisbury, 1717; was educated in the Reformed theological seminary of Sedan; was minister in Normandy or Champagne, and afterwards at Charenton, but left France on the revocation of the edict of Nantes and went to England, where James II. allowed him to establish a French church for the numerous French fugitives. He received the degree of doctor both from Oxford and Cambridge, and in 1690 he was made canon at Salisbury. His numerous writings, in French, Latin, and English, are mostly polemical or apologetical. By his two works, Some Remarks upon the ecclesiastical history of the ancient churches of Piedmont, London, 1690, and, Remarks upon the ecclesiastical history of the ancient churches of the Albigenses, London, 1692, written against Bosuet, in order to show that the Albigenses were not dualists, but identical with the Waldenses, he contributed much to uphold this wrong view. A complete list of his works is found in Haag: La France protestante.

HERZOG.

ALLOCUTION, a diplomatical term, denoting an address from the pope to the assembled College of Cardinals. Generally these addresses treat of the relations between the Roman See and foreign governments; but, more especially, they are used as a means to explain the papal policy in cases in which the pope will not allow his action to be used as a precedent. Thus the allocution is, in reality, often a reservation, a protest.

ALL-SAINTS'-DAY. From Chrysostom, Hom.,

74, it appears that as early as the fourth century a festival was celebrated by the Eastern Church in honor of all the saints on the Sunday after Whitsuntide, which, consequently, was called "All-Saints' Sunday." In the Western Church such a festival was not known until later on. When, under Pope Boniface IV., 608-615, the Pantheon was fitted up for Christian worship, it was dedicated to the Virgin and all the saints; and its day of dedication, May 13, was annually celebrated as a festival for the saints. Another Festivitas Sanctorum, mentioned by Ado, Martyrol. Aquilej. ad Kal. Novemb., originated from the consecration by Pope Gregory III. of a church in honorem omnium Sanctorum; its day fell on Nov. 1. In 835, Pope Gregory IV. induced the Emperor Lewis to introduce an all-saints' festival in the Frankish Church to be celebrated on Nov. 1. In England the festival was introduced somewhat later, about 870, and usually called Allhallowmas. In the Anglican Church it is still celebrated, while in most other Reformed churches it has fallen into disuse. H. ALT.

ALL-SOULS' DAY, the day following All-Saints' Day, Nov. 2, is by the Roman Church consecrated to the memory of the dead and to prayer for the souls suffering in purgatory; but its celebration is a custom which has become general, rather than a definite institution. Since the days of Gregory the Great (d. 604), when the doctrine of purgatory became generally accepted, it was considered a sacred duty for all Christians to pray for the dead; and an incident contributed to mould this general duty into a fixed form. A pilgrim returning from Jerusalem reported that, on approaching Sicily, he had seen flames from purgatory bursting through the earth, and heard the wailings of the suffering souls. They implored him to go to the Monastery of Clugny, and beg the monks to have mercy on their woes, and by prayers and alms free them out of purgatory. From this time, 998, the pious abbot of Clugny, Odilo, considered it a duty for his monastery to celebrate every year the day after All-Saints' Day in commemoration of all deceased believers, which example soon spread to other monasteries. ALMAIN, Jacques, b. at Sens; d. in 1515; as professor of theology in the college of Navarre, drew up the reply of the faculty to the work of Cajetan on the superiority of the pope to a general council, and wrote De Auctoritate Ecclesiæ, etc., Paris, 1512; De Potestate Ecclesiastica, etc., Paris, 1517; and Moralia, Paris, 1525.

ALMEIDA, Emmanuel, b. at Viseu, Portugal, 1580; d. at Goa, 1646; entered the Order of the Jesuits, and worked for ten years as a missionary among the Ethiopians. Besides his Historical Letters, Rome, 1629, against Urreba, he left materials for the Ethiopian History, edited by BALTHASAR TELLER, Coimbra, 1660.

ALMERICIANS. See AMALRIC of BENA.

ALMONER (aumônier, eleemosynarius), an officer among the court clergy; occurs at the French court from the thirteenth century, and was originally employed to distribute the king's alms. Later on there were several almoners, and from the fifteenth century a grand almoner is mentioned. He stood at the head of the whole court-clergy, made propositions for the appointments to bishoprics and other benefices, and exercised a considerable influence. In the Revolution the office was abolished. In England the duty of the hereditary grand almoner consists in distributing the coronation medals among the spectators; and that of the lord high almoner, in distributing twice a year the Queen's bounty, that is, as many silver pennies as the Queen has years of age.

ALMS (from ἐλεημοσύνη, mercifulness). To give alms was a duty laid upon the Jews, who were also required to leave gleanings in the fields that the poor might be fed (Lev. xix. 9, 10, xxiii. 22; Deut. xv. 11, xxiv. 19, xxvi. 2-13; Ruth ii. 2). Every third year a tithe of the entire increase was to be divided among the Levite, the stranger, and the fatherless and the widow (Dent. xiv. 28, 29). Alms-giving was part of the Pharisaic practice, "to be seen of men" (Matt. vi. 2). In the temple there were thirteen boxes for this purpose (John viii. 20). The idea that there is merit in alms per se, has been always fruitful of ill. Men think by them to purchase salvation; but God asks, what is the motive? not, what is the amount? (2 Cor. viii. 12). The widow's two mites were more precious than the rich men's princely gifts. Alms-giving was early recognized as a condition of piety, and as a "fundamental law of Christian morality;" for unless there be benevolence, there can be no spiritual life; and mention is made in the Acts of collections for the poor as a bond of Christian unity (Acts xi. 29; Rom. xii. 13; Eph. iv. 28; 1 Tim. vi. 18; Heb. xiii. 16; 1 John iii. 17). It was the exhortation of the pillar apostles (Gal. ii. 10), and a special care of Paul (1 Cor. xvi. 1). Frequent are the exhortations of the fathers; and it became an integral part of the Church worship. The money went, before the fifth century, into the hand of the bishop, and was distributed by the deacons. But in the Western Church in the fifth century there was a fourfold division of them: 1, for the bishop; 2, for the clergy; 3, for the poor; 4, for the fabric and sustentation of the churches. See ALMONER.

ALOGI, or ALOCIANS, ἀλογοί, a branch of the Monarchians, flourished in Asia Minor, and received, according to Epiphanius, Hæres. 51, 3, their name from the fact that they denied the existence of the Logos, taught by St. John, and rejected both St. John's Gospel and probably also the Revelation. Theodotus the currier, who about 200 was excommunicated by the Roman bishop, belonged to this sect, according to Epiphanius, 54, 1. HERZOG.

ALOMBRADOS, Illuminati, Illuminés, a mystic sect, which originated in Spain in the first part of the sixteenth century, and appeared at the same time in the vicinity of Cordova and in Castile. The Inquisition, however, was prompt in its action. Among those suspected was Ignatius Loyola: twice he was called before the Inquisition and imprisoned. Also Juan d'Avila, Luis de Granada, Francis de Borgia, and others among the Spanish theologians, were examined. (Cf. McCrie, History of the Reformation in Spain.) The doctrines of the Alombrados, such as they are represented in the acts of the Inquisition, remind one sometimes of the Quakers on the one side, and on the other of the German Anabaptists Münzer, Schwenkfeld, etc. A report of Jan. 28, 1558, summarizes them in the following manner: I. Only the inward prayer is commanded by God and meritorious, while the external praying with the lips is a merely symbolical or sacramental action without any religious worth. II. The confessor who recommends such external, bodily exercises, shall not be obeyed. III. The true servant of God is above practices of this kind, nor is it necessary for him to do good works in the common sense of the word. IV. The violent movements, cramps, and faintings which accompany the inner devotion, are token of divine love and the grace of the Holy Spirit. V. In the state of perfection the secret of the Holy Trinity is revealed to us, even while here on earth, and all which we shall do or not do is communicated to us directly by the Holy Spirit, etc. (Llorente: History of the Inquisition). A still more complete record of the doctrines of the Alombrados is found with Malvasia: Catalogus omnium hæresium et conciliorum, Rome, 1661, Centur. XVI., pp. 269-274, from which it appears that they entertained antinomian maxims of a very doubtful character. This was more especially the case with a branch of the Alombrados discovered in 1575 in the neighborhood of Cordova, and founded by the Carmelin nun, Caterina de Jesus, and a certain Juan de Willelpando, from Teneriffa; and with another branch flourishing about 1623 in the dioceses of Sevilla and Granada. Both these sects were suppressed with great severity by the Inquisition, and many of their members perished at the stake. Closely allied to the Spanish Alombrados, and different from the German Illuminati of the eighteenth century, were the Illuminés of Northern France; the sect was founded in 1634 in Flanders and Piccardy by Antoine Bocquet and Abbé Guérin, pastor of St. George de Roye, after the latter of whom it was often called Guerinets. Another sect of French Illuminés flourished in Southern France in the beginning of the eighteenth century. They seem to have adopted several Masonic elements, and formed a transition from the Alombrados to the Illuminati. See J. H. ALOYSIUS OF GONZAGA, b. at Gonzaga near Mantua in 1568; d. in Rome in 1591; belonged to the princely family of Castiglione; distinguished from early youth by his piety and strong ascetic leaning, he became a Jesuit in 1587. He died by the plague, sacrificing himself in order to alleviate the sufferings of the poor. He was canonized by Benedict XIII. in 1726, and is commemorated in the Roman Church on June 21. HERZOG.

ALSTED, Johann Heinrich, b. in 1588; d. in 1638; was professor of philosophy and theology at Herborn; represented the Reformed Church of Nassau at the synod of Dortrecht (Dort), 1618, and became afterwards professor of philosophy and theology at Weissenburg, in Transylvania. He was a very prolific writer, and his works give a striking idea of the literary and scientific methods of his age. The most remarkable are his two great cyclopædias: (1) Cursus philosophici Encyclopædia, Herborn, 1620, of which one volume, consisting of 3,072 quarto pages, comprises, I. quatuor præcognita philosophica: archeologia, hexilogia, technologia, didactica; II. undecim scientiæ philos. theoreticæ; metaphysica, pneumatica, physica, arithmetica, geometria, cosmographia, uranoscopia, geographia, optica, musica, architectionica; III. quinque prudentiæ philos. practicæ; ethica, æconomica, politica, scholastica, historica; the other comprises "the seven liberal arts." (2) Encyclopædia septem tomis distincta, Herborn, 1630, containing, I. quatuor præcognita disciplinarum; II. philologia, i. e., lexica, grammatica, rhetorica, logica, oratoria, poetica; III. philosophia theoretica; IV. practica; V. tres facultates principes: theologia, juris-prudentia, medicina; VI. artes mechanicæ; VII. miscellaneous: one section is entitled tabacologia, or the "doctrine" of the use and abuse of tobacco. The various theological disciplines he treated in separate works: Theologia scholastica didactica, Han. 1618; Theologia polemica, 1620; Theologia casuum, 1621; Theologia prophetica, Theologia moralis, etc. He also wrote a Tractatus de mille annis, in which he fixes the beginning of the millennium at 1694, and a great work, De manducatione spirituali, etc.

ALEX. SCHWEIZER.

ALTAR, Hebrew. The first altar was probably no more than a heap of stones, or mound of earth; similarly the altar which Moses was commanded to build was to be made either of earth or stone; in the latter case it was expressly required to be rough, the use of a tool being regarded as polluting (Exod. xx. 24, 25). In the Jewish worship two altars were used. 1. The altar of burnt offering, or the brazen altar, which was seven feet and six inches square, and four feet and six inches high, and stood directly in front of the principal entrance of the Tabernacle. The casing was of shittim-wood overlaid with brass; the interior was hollow, and, when the tabernacle was stationary, this interior was probably filled up with earth or stones, upon which the victim was laid. At each corner there was a wooden projection covered with brass, called a "horn." The altar was required to be without steps (Exod. xx. 26), and was probably approached by an inclined plane of earth. The altar is described in Exod. xxvii. In the first temple the altar was of the same proportions, and occupied the same relative position, but it was much larger, being thirty feet square, and fifteen feet high. It was made entirely of brass plates, which covered a structure of earth or stone (2 Chron. iv. 1). In the third temple it was still larger, and more beautiful. 2. The altar of incense, or the golden altar, of the same wood, but overlaid with plates of pure gold, with a border of gold above, stood within the holy place, "before the vail that is by the ark of the testimony" (Exod. xxx. 6, lx. 5). It was eighteen inches square and three feet high. Upon this altar incense was burned every morning and evening. In the first temple it was made of cedar, overlaid with gold. Only incense might be put upon it, yet on the Day of Atonement it was stained by blood (Lev. xvi. 18, 19). The altar of incense is the only altar in heaven

(Rev. viii. 3, 4).

Christian. The New Testament has a double designation for the Christian's altar, namely, θυσιαστήριον, from θυσίαι, "to sacrifice," translated "the altar" (Heb. xiii. 10), and τράπεζα κυρίου, translated literally "the Lord's table" (1 Cor. x. 21), of which the first one is also applied to the Jewish altar of burnt-offerings in the Septuagint and the Gospels (Matt. v. 23, 24; Luke i. 11). Both names were afterwards used promiscuously by the Greek Fathers to the exclusion of other designations, such as βωμός and εσχάρα, which were applied to the heathen altars only. The Latin Fathers use ara and altare, and later on altarium, without making any such distinction.

The Christian altar combined from a very early date two ideas or offices together, — that of the celebration of the eucharist, and that of the worship of the martyrs. When, during the time of the persecutions, the eucharist was celebrated in the subterraneous cemeteries, the catacombs, the celebration took place on the slab covering the martyr's tomb, which tomb stood under an arch hewn into the living rock, the arcosolium, that is, the grave of the martyr served as an altar. Afterwards, when churches were built in the cemeteries, but above ground, the altar was placed just above the martyr's tomb, and an aperture was made so that the tomb could be seen. Still later, when churches were built also outside the cemeteries, the martyr's bones were transferred to the new place, and entombed or enshrined under the altar. This custom of the Church was by Felix I., 269-274, made a law in the Church, and spread throughout all Western countries, so that the martyr's tomb, the martyrium, confessio, testimonium, memoria, became a part of the altar itself. And so it is still in the Roman Church up to this very day. No altar can be raised without relics; and when a new church is consecrated, the consecratio altaris, the inclusio of the relics of the patron-saint of the building in the sepulcrum, is the principal point of the ceremony.

In the combination of these two offices, the construction, position, and ornamentation of the Christian altar find their explanation. The structure itself had the form either of a table or of a sarcophagus, and was first made of wood, afterwards of stone, but always highly ornamented, inlaid with gold, silver, pearls, and precious stones, or covered with cloths of velvet and silk, vestimenta altaris, costly embroidered, over which was spread, at the celebration of the eucharist, a fine white linen cloth, palla or palla corporalis or corporale, symbolizing the winding-sheet of Christ. Over the altar, and at times hiding it away from sight, rose the ciborium on four columns, between costly embroidered curtains. From the ninth century it became customary to place the shrine with the relics of the saint on the top of the altar, and as a decoration around this shrine developed the altar-piece with its wings, the retabulum. Later on, the shrine or reliquary was again placed under or in the altar, but the altar-piece was still retained, and in the period when Gothic art stood at its highest, when wood-carving was carried to perfection, and painting in oils newly invented, these altar-pieces were often wonderful works of art. Among the other accessories of the altar, the lights were not introduced until the twelfth century, and the vases with flowers still later. In the middle of the ninth, Leo IV. decreed: Super altare nihil ponatur nisi capsula et reliquie Sanctorum aut forte quatuor Evangelia et buxida cum corpore Domini ad viaticum infermorum ("on the altar nothing might be lawfully placed except the shrine containing relics, or perchance the codex of the Gospels, and the pyx or tabernacle in which the Lord's body was reserved for the last sacrament of the sick", [Migne, Patrol. cxv. 677]). Even the crucifix was not placed on the altar, but suspended above it.

Originally there was only one altar in each church, placed in the apsis which terminated the middle nave, and consecrated to the patron-saint of the building; but just the circumstance that the altar was connected with the worship of martyrs and saints gave rise to the introduction of several altars in the same church. In the Apostolic Constitutions the establishment of a new altar means the separation from the old bishop; for as yet the one altar bound the bishop and the congregation together into one body, by one faith. But, as other relics than those of the patron-saint were introduced into a church, special altars were raised and consecrated to them; and at these altars private mass was said at special occasions. Thus Paulinus, from Nola, described the church of the Holy Sepulchre, erected by Constantine in Jerusalem, as rich in "golden altars;" and Ambrose mentions several altars in the church of Milan. Also the portable altar, ara gestatoria, portatilia, motoria, viatica, itineraria, etc., was an outgrowth from the altar's office in the worship of saints. As mass could not be said at an altar not consecrated, and no altar could be consecrated without enclosing some relic, princes on their campaigns, missionaries on their voyages, high ecclesiastics, when travelling, carried with them a portable altar, a box of wood or metal, costly ornamented, and containing the relic, the hostie, and the communion cup.

It was, therefore, quite natural that the Reformation should take offence at the plurality of altars in the same church, as it completely abolished that part of the altar's office which stood in connection with the worship of saints. Wherever the Reformation became victorious, all the by-altars were generally broken down; and when in some cases, as for instance in the Church of St. Laurentius, in Nuremberg, they were left standing, they were bereft of all liturgical significance, and remained only as monuments. In Lutheran churches the chief altar was generally retained nearly in its original shape; the reliquary disappeared, but the altar-piece, the retabulum, remained. The Reformed churches generally went more radically to work. In Switzerland the altar was replaced by a plain communion-table; and in Holland and Scotland even this communion-table was not tolerated except when communion was actually celebrated.

M. MEURER.

ALTHAMER, Andreas, b. about 1500 in Brenz, Württemberg; studied in 1518-19 at the universities of Tübingen and Leipzig; was a teacher in Hall, Suabia, in 1521, and became minister in Gmünd in 1524. On account of the Peasant War he fled from Southern Germany, and came in 1525 to Wittenberg. Here he very soon became a disciple of the Reformers, attacking the Romanists in his Annotationes in Jacobi Epistolam, 1517, etc., and defending Luther in his De Sacramento Altaris, etc. He also assisted at the conferences of Berne in 1528. In 1526 he returned to the South as minister in Eltersdorf; in 1527 he became deacon to St. Sebaldus in Nuremberg, and in 1528 minister in Ansbach. About the latter part of his life nothing certain is known. A biography of him, containing several of his letters, was written by J. A. Ballenstadius, Wolfenbüttel, 1740.

ALTING, (1) Johann Heinrich, b. at Emden, Friesland, Feb. 17, 1583; d. at Groeningen, Aug. 25, 1644; studied at Groeningen and at Herborn under Piscator; travelled much; became in 1608 tutor to the Prince Palatine whom he accompanied to Sedan and to England, and was appointed professor of dogmatics at Heidelberg (Loci communes) in 1613, and in 1616 director of the seminary in Collegium Sapientiae. After the capture of Heidelberg in 1622 by Tilly, he fled to Holland, where in 1627 he was made professor of theology in Groeningen. He published nothing during his lifetime, but after his death his works were published by his son: Exegesis Augustanæ Confessionis, Amsterdam, 1652; Script. Heidelbergens., three vols., Amsterdam, 1662, containing, I. Locos Communes; II. Problemata theologica; III. Explicatio Catecheseos Palatinæ; Theologia historica, Amsterdam, 1664.—(2) His son, Jacob Alting, b. at Heidelberg, Dec. 27, 1618; d. at Groeningen, Aug. 20, 1679; studied Oriental languages, and succeeded Gomarus as professor in Hebrew at Groeningen, 1667. His works on Hebrew language and literature were published at Amsterdam in 1687, in five folio volumes, by Balthazer Becker.

ALYPIUS, Saint, b. at Tagaste, Numidia; was a pupil and friend of Augustine, with whom he went to Rome to study law. For some time he held a position in the imperial treasury; but in 385 he went with Augustine to Milan, was converted from Manichæism to the Catholic faith, and baptized by Ambrose on Easter-eve, 387. After returning to Africa, the two friends settled near Tagaste, and lived in seclusion until 391, when Augustine was chosen priest by the people of Hippo. Shortly after Alypius took charge of a monastery in Hippo, and in 394 he was elected bishop of Tagaste. He was present at the council of Carthage, 403 (see DONATISTS), and was one of the six Catholic representatives in the great conference convened by Honorius. When Augustine died in 430, he was still living, but nothing is known about the last days of his life. He is commemorated by the Roman Church on Aug. 15. See AUGUSTINE, Confession. VI., 7, 8, 9, 10, 12; IX., 6; and Epist., 22, 28, 188, 201; BUTLER: Lives of Saints, Aug. 15.

There is another St. Alypius, the Stylite, commemorated by the Greek Church on Nov. 26. He was born in Adrianople in the middle of the sixth century; and, in imitation of Simeon the Stylite, he ascended a pillar, and remained standing on its top during more than fifty years.

ALZOG, Johann Baptist, an eminent Roman-Catholic church historian, b. at Ohlau in Silesia, June 29, 1808; d. at Freiburg, Germany, March 1, 1878; educated at Brieg, Breslau, and Bonn, from 1830-33, he was a private tutor at Aachen; and on July 4, 1834, he was ordained a priest at Cologne; in the next year he received from the Münster Academy, as the result of a public disputation, the degree of Doctor in Theology; his thesis was on the principles of Roman-Catholic exegesis (Explicatio Catholicorum Systematis de Interpretatione Litterarum Sacrarum, Monasterii, 1835). Immediately thereafter he was chosen professor of church history and exegesis in the Theological Seminary in Posen, where he remained until 1844. During this time he materially aided his archbishop, Martin von Dunin, in the fight against the mixed marriages, and published his Handbuch der Universal-Kirchengeschichte (Mainz, 1841). In 1844 he was called to a similar position at Hildesheim; but at length his great desire to be a professor in a university was gratified by his call to Freiburg in 1853. From then until his death he led the quiet, active, useful life of a scholar. Nor was he without recognition by the secular authorities in the way of titles and medals; but what he valued most highly was the confidence manifested in him by his peers. In 1864 he attended the memorable congress of Roman-Catholic scholars held at Munich; and in 1869 he was summoned by the Pope to Rome to take part in the preparation for the Vatican Council. He died of apoplexy.

Alzog was not only respected by Roman Catholics, but also by Protestants. He was no narrow partisan, but a broad-minded student of history. Accordingly his works are deservedly popular in the best sense. In his Manual of General Church History, the tenth edition of which appeared in 1882, he endeavored to do for the Roman Catholics what Hase did for the Protestants,—present a brief yet full, readable, and reliable church history. It has been translated into French, Spanish, Italian, Portuguese, Bohemian, Polish, Armenian, finally into English by Messrs. Pabish and Byrne, Cincinnati, 1874, sqq., 3 vols. But the English translation skilfully removes the manly candor of Alzog, and turns him into the conventional Roman-Catholic apologist who sees no good in Protestantism and no bad in Romanism. The unfairness of this may be judged by the following extracts of a letter of Dr. Alzog, dated Freiburg, Sept. 15, 1868, to his Protestant fellow-historian, Dr. Schaff: "The correspondence with a colleague of the Protestant Church of such excellent spirit is to me of inestimable value. I shall soon give expression to my joy and gratitude by sending you a copy of the latest edition of my Compend of Church History, and of my Oratio apologetica de fuga of Gregory Nazianzen, now in the press. Your interesting and valuable communications from America give me new light, and induce me hereafter to pay greater attention to this part of church history, availing myself of your suggestions," etc.

Alzog wrote also Das katholische Gebet-Gesang- und Betrachtungsbuch, Mainz, 1849; Handbuch der Patrologie, Freiburg im Breisgau, 1866, 3d ed. 1876; Grundriss der universal Kirchengeschichte, Mainz, 1868 (an abridgment of his larger work); besides many special treatises.

AMALARIUS, deacon and then priest in Metz, and afterwards abbot of Hornbuch, near Metz; d. in 837; wrote about 820 a book, De officio ecclesiastico, or as he calls it himself, Liber officialis, which he dedicated to Lewis the Pious (Max. Bibl., T. XIV., p. 934, sqq.). The book is a curious instance of the allegorizing tendency. The author finds a symbolical meaning, even in the smallest details of the garment of the priest. Nevertheless it contains much information concerning the spirit and characters of the age. He also wrote a work, De ordine antiphonariorum or De ordine psalmodiarum (Max. Bibl., T. XIV.), in which he criticised Agobard's improvements of the church song; but Agobard not only refuted the censure, but went on and attacked Amalarius, Liber officialis (Liber Agobardi contra libros quatuor Am. abhatis). M. B., T. XIV., p. 325).

AM'ALEK (dweller in a valley) was the grandson of Esau (Gen. xxxvi. 16), but was not the founder of the Amalekites, because, according to Gen. xiv. 7, they existed before his birth.

AM'ALEKITES, "the first of the nations," as Balaam called them (Num. xxiv. 20), and the only one of the peoples outside of Canaan who were put under the ban of total extinction (Exod. xvii. 14). The reason of this cause was Amalek's cowardly attack upon Israel's rearguard, "even all that were feeble," while the host was faint and weary. The battle was, however, turned against them by the miracle of Moses' prayer (Exod. xvii. 8-16). The origin of the Amalekites is not known; but from the fact that in the time of the judges (Judg. xii. 15) there was a hilly district in Ephraim, called by this name, it is reasonable to conjecture that once they lived there, and that gradually they took up a nomadic mode of life, perhaps even before Abraham's emigration, until they had moved southwards and westwards into the wilderness between Palestine and Egypt, where they were found in Moses' time in alliance with the Amorites (Num. xiii. 29). But it is equally probable that the district took its name from some invasion of the Amalekites. Chedorlaomer and his allies smote their country (Gen. xiv. 7). In Moses' day they were the chief people of the Sinaitic peninsula. They come frequently into notice as the foes of Israel. When the people were discouraged by the report of the spies, they were discomfited by Amalek (Num. xiv. 45). Later the Amalekites were defeated by Ehud (Judg. iii. 13-30); Gideon (vii.); by Saul (1 Sam. xiv. 48, xv.). But Saul's failure, while he had the opportunity, to utterly destroy them, and especially his sparing their king Agag, brought upon him the Lord's curse (1 Sam. xxviii. 18), and strangely enough he met his death by an Amalekite (2 Sam. i. 8). David, even before he became king, set himself to the work of their extermination (1 Sam. xxvii. 8), and while at Ziklag conducted a terribly deadly attack upon them (1 Sam. xxx. 16), and subsequently as king (2 Sam. viii. 12.) At length, however, in the days of Hezekiah they were completely destroyed (1 Chron. iv. 43). FR. W. SCHULTZ.

AMALRIC OF BENA (French, Amaury), b. at Bena in the diocese of Chartres, in the middle of the twelfth century; taught theology and philosophy in the University of Paris, and enjoyed a great reputation as a subtle dialectician; but was accused of heresy in 1204, and called to Rome to defend himself before Innocent III. The pope decided against him; and, soon after his return to Paris, he died of grief. It was not, however, until after his death that the sect which he had founded was discovered; though in Paris itself not less than thirteen ecclesiastics belonged to it, and it numbered many members in the dioceses of Paris, Longres, Troyes, and Sens. In order to suppress the sect, a synod assembled in Paris in 1209. Amalric's doctrines were condemned, he himself excommunicated, his bones exhumed, and scattered over the fields. Nine ecclesiastics, and Wilhelm the goldsmith, one of the seven prophets of the sect, perished at the stake: the four other priests were imprisoned for life. The same synod condemned also a book by David of Dinant, the metaphysical works of Aristotle, several theological works in the vernacular tongue, etc. At the fourth council of the Lateran in 1215, Innocent III. confirmed the condemnation of Amalric's doctrines, which he characterized as mere craziness.

Only three propositions can with certainty be referred back to Amalric himself: the rest of his system is known to us only through his disciples. Nevertheless, as he founded the sect himself, and the sect was discovered immediately after his death, there can be no reasonable doubt that the doctrines of his disciples originated with him. The three above-mentioned propositions read: I. God is all; II. Every Christian must believe that he is a member of the body of Christ, and this belief is as necessary to salvation as faith in the birth and death of the Saviour; III. He who remains in love can commit no sin. These three propositions form the basis of the whole system, but are further developed by the doctrines ascribed to the sect. God, they said, re-revealed himself thrice, and each time more perfectly. With the incarnation in Abraham the epoch of the Father begins; with the incarnation in Mary, that of the Son; with the incarnation in the Almericians, that of the Holy Spirit. As now the Mosaic law was abolished by the coming of Christ, so the sacraments of the new dispensation are abolished by the coming of the Holy Spirit. The Almericians denied that the sacraments or any other act or regulation of the Church had any saving efficacy. They called the worship of saints idolatry; the Church, the Babylon of the Revelation; the pope, Antichrist; their own community, the only true medium through which the Spirit reveals himself: and this revelation takes the place of baptism, yea, it is the resurrection of the dead, the kingdom of heaven; no other can be expected, nor is there any hell outside of the consciousness of sin. Still more direct utterances of the latent pantheism of the system are found in propositions like these: God is the body of Christ; God has spoken in the same manner through Ovid as through Augustine; Christ was not God in any other sense than every man is, etc. Their doctrine of the impossibility of sin to believers, i. e., Almericians, was, according to contemporary records, a cover for manifold excesses, as it afterwards became among the Brethren of the Free Spirit. See PREGER: Geschichte der deutschen Mystik im Mittelalter, I. 167, 173. PREGER.

AMANDUS, missionary among the Franks in the reigns of Dagobert I. and Sigbert III.; bishop of Mästricht, and a zealous champion of the interests of Rome; was ordained priest at the tomb of St. Martin; and visited Rome, where St. Peter appeared to him in a vision, and summoned him to go and convert the pagan Franks. Laboring in the vicinity of Ghent, he obtained from Dagobert, about 626, a law making baptism compulsory: and he succeeded in converting the wealthy Alluwin, afterwards called Bavo, who furnished him with means to found two monasteries. Nevertheless the chief result of his labor was a conflict with the Iro-Scottish missionaries, who worked with great success in these regions; and Dagobert finally banished him. In 647 he was made bishop of Mästricht; but, unable to govern his clergy, he abdicated, and took up once more his missionary work on the Lower Danube, in Spain, and on the Scheldt, though nowhere with success. The date of his death varies between 661 and 684. According to Roman records, he did many miracles, and is styled the "Apostle of Belgium." See SMEDT: Vie de St. Amand, 1861; GOSSE: Essai sur St. Amand, 1866; EBRARD: Iroschottische Missionskirche, 1873.

AM'ASA (a burden), a son of Jether and Abigail, sister of David, and therefore David's nephew; commanded the army of Absalom; was completely defeated, but was nevertheless appointed by David Joab's successor; and eventually died by Joab's hand (2 Sam. xvii. 25, xviii. xix., xx. 10). See JOAB.

AMAZI'AH (whom Jehovah strengthens), son and successor of Joash as king of Judah, B. C. 838-809; slew Joash's murderers; defeated the Edomites; attacked Jehoash, king of Israel, and was defeated; Jerusalem was taken and pillaged. But he reigned for fifteen years after the death of Jehoash, and was at last murdered (2 Kings xiv.).

AMBO (Greek ἀμβων, from ἀναβαίνο, "to ascend," not from the Latin ambire, "to circumvent," or from ambo, "both"), denoted generally the platform, which, raised a few steps above the ground and surrounded with rails, cancelli, stretched from the altar-place, sanctuarium, presbyterium, to the west into the nave of the church, and, during service, was occupied by the lower clergy, especially the singers and readers. In a more special sense, the name was applied to a scaffolding erected at the northern and southern extremities of the railing of the sanctuarium, of a considerable elevation, provided with two flights of steps, and sustaining a desk from which the Scriptures were read and the formulæ solemnes were spoken. If there were two ambones, one on each side, that to the right of the altar was higher and more richly decorated, because it was destined for the reading of the Gospels; while the lower and plainer one to the left was destined for the reading of the Epistles. When there was only one ambo, it contained two desks, one, more elevated, for the Gospels, and another, lower, for the Epistles. The deacon preached from the ambo, while the bishop preached from his thronos behind the altar, or, if the church was too large, from the faldistorium before the altar. C. BROCKHAUS.

AMBROSE OF ALEXANDRIA, the friend of Origen, held some government office in the city of Alexandria; was perhaps a deacon in the Christian Church, and became a confessor during the persecution of Maximin, in 235. Origen calls him his "taskmaster," because he was the first to encourage him to become an author, and ever afterwards stimulated him to the undertaking of new works. He was rich, maintained seven stenographers and seven copyists at the disposal of his friend, and spared no expense, when Origen was making preparations for the Hexapha, to procure copies for him of the Septuagint and other Greek translations of the Old Testament. See EUSEB.: Hist. Eccles., VI. 18; EPIPHANIUS: Hæres., c. 64, 3; JEROME: De Viris Illust. c. 56.

AMBROSE (Latin form, AMBROSIVS), Saint, b. at Treves, 340; d. at Milan, April 3-4, 397; one of the great leaders and teachers of the Church. Belonging to a noble and rich Roman family, he was educated in Rome for the bar; and was, about 370, appointed consular prefect of Liguria and Emilia. He took up his residence at Milan; and when in 374, after the death of Auxentius, a fierce contest arose between the orthodox and the Arian party, concerning the election of the new bishop, he, as the first magistrate, repaired to the church to maintain order. While he was here addressing the crowd, a child suddenly cried out, "Ambrosius episcopus." The idea struck the multitude, and by an unanimous and urgent vote he was transferred from the judicial bench to the episcopal chair. He was as yet only a catechumen; but he was immediately baptized, and eight days afterward, Dec. 7, 374, he was consecrated bishop, having bequeathed all his property, money, and estates to the Church whose servant he had become.

As a leader of the Church, Ambrosius has done much more good than the three bishops who, during his time, occupied the papal chair, — Liberius, Damasus, and Siricius. He saw that the Roman state was hastening towards dissolution. The problem then became, to organize the Church so that it would outlast the destruction of the State, and be a saving ark to human society. For this purpose the Church must be one, and in concord with itself. Though not personally intolerant, Ambrosius opposed the spread of heresy in the church with all his might. In 379 he succeeded in establishing an orthodox bishop at Sirmium in spite of the efforts of the Arian empress Justina. In 385-6 he refused to deliver up a basilica in Milan to the empress for Arian worship. These contests with Arianism he has reported himself in his letters to Marcellina (Epp. 20 and 22), and to Valentinian II. (Ep. 21), and in his oration De Basilicis Tradendis. Also with the Roman monk, Jovianus, he had a sharp controversy (Ep. 42). The Church, however, should not only be one and authoritative: it should also be powerful. Paganism must find no support by the state. In the senate-hall in Rome stood an altar to Victory, on which all oaths were taken. Gratian had this altar removed, but in 384 it was restored. At the urgent demand of Ambrosius, Valentinian had it once more removed; but in 369 it was again restored; until, shortly before the death of Ambrosius, Theodosius had it removed forever (Epp. 17 and 18). On the other hand, the State, though interfering with paganism, must not interfere with the Church. In 389 the Christians burnt a synagoge at Calinicum, in Mesopotamia; and Theodosius ordered the synagoge to be rebuilt at the expense of the bishop of the place. In 370 the people of Thessalonica murdered, during a riot, the military governor; and Theodosius did not prevent the soldiers from retaliating with a fearful massacre. In both cases, Ambrosius addressed himself to the emperor, and in the latter he counselled him to make public penance in the Church of Milan (Ep. 51).

Also as a teacher of the Church, Ambrosius exercised a great and beneficial influence; and his writings, though not distinguished by any great originality, are rich in striking practical remarks. Of his dogmatical works the De Mysteriis reminds the reader of Cyril of Jerusalem, and the works De Fide and De Spiritu Sancto follow Basil very closely. Also his exegetical works are mostly founded on Basil; but they, as well as his sermons, are chiefly characterized by their practical tendency. Among his moral and ascetic works are, De Officiis Ministrorum, formed after Cicero, De Virginitate, De Viduis, De Virginitate, etc. The ascetic views of Ambrosius have often been misunderstood. He does not speak against marriage. He places marriage and virginity on a level with each other; but he recommends virginity and separation from the world as an easier and surer way to purity and holiness. In the field of liturgy Ambrosius introduced a comprehensive reform in the church-music (see the article on AMBROSIAN MUSIC), and gave the Church of Milan a new liturgy, which, if it had come down to us without any modifications from the Roman Missale, would have been the oldest liturgy in existence. From Ambrosius we also have a juridical work, Lex Dei sive Mosaicarum et Romanarum Legum Collatio.

Immediately after his death Ambrosius was interred in the Ambrosian basilica in Milan, under the altar, and between the martyrs Protasius and Gervasius. In 824 his bones were laid in a sarcophagus of porphyry by Archbishop Angilbert II.; and his sarcophagus was found Jan. 18, 1864, though not opened until Aug. 8, 1871 (BRAGHI: I tre Sepolcri Santambrosiani, Milan, 1864). The best editions of the works of Ambrose are: the Benedictine, Paris, 1686-90, often reprinted, e.g., in Migne, Patrol. Lat., XLV; and that by Ballerini, Milan, 1875, sqq. The sources of his life are, besides his own works, especially his letters, Augustine's Confessiones and De Civitat. Dei, while the Vita by Paulinus probably dates from the eighth century.

AMBROSE THE CAMALDULE, or AMBROSIUS CAMALDULENSIS, properly Traversari, b. at Portico, near Florence, in 1386; entered the order of the Camaldules in 1400; became the general of the order in 1431, and distinguished himself as reformer of his order, as legate and defender of Eugene IV. in Basel, Ferrara, and Florence, as leader of the negotiations for the union of the Greek and Roman Churches, and as a writer. He translated many Greek works into Latin, and wrote himself on history. His letters have considerable interest for the history of his time. S. AMBR. CAM.: Ejust. et Oration., ed. Cannetus, Florence, 1759, Tom. II.

AMBROSE, ISAAC, Puritan divine, author of Looking unto Jesus; b. 1603-4; d. 1664. He was educated at Oxford, and was vicar of Garstang, when the Act of Uniformity compelled him to leave his charge, and retire to Preston. "As a religious writer he has a vividness and freshness of imagination possessed by scarcely any of the Puritan Non-conformists. He is plaintive as Flavel, and as intense as Baxter. Many who have no love for Puritan doctrine, nor sympathy with Puritan experience, have appreciated the pathos and beauty of his writings, which have never been out of print from their original issue until now." His publications appeared in London, 1649-62; Looking unto Jesus, his most famous work, was published in 1658. There is an edition of his Complete Works, Dundee, 1759, fol.; and another, London, 1829, 8vo.

AMBROSIAN MUSIC. Before the reform which was introduced by Ambrose, the singing in the Christian churches of the West was performed by choirs, cantores, to which the congregations gave only short responses; and this singing consisted of a monotonous, unregulated, and artless recitation of the psalms and prayers, with only a slight raising of the voice. After the example of the Eastern, more especially the Syrian Church, Ambrose introduced measured time, regular rhythms, and varied melody in the singing of the Church of Milan, employing the Dorian, Phrygian, Lydian, and Mixo-Lydian keys of the musical system of the Greeks, and also the form of alternation, male and female choirs, single choirs, and the whole congregation taking up the melody successively. The effect of this new method of singing is described by Augustine as very sweet, and often moving the audience to tears: Confess. IX. 7, and X. 33. From Milan the reform spread rapidly; and, during the fifth and sixth centuries, the Ambrosian music was ruling throughout the West. But in course of time an artificial and profane manner crept in, which, towards the close of the sixth century, called forth the Gregorian reform; and thus the singing in the Church was once more confined to the choirs or the deans. As text Ambrose used the Greek and Latin hymns already existing, by Ephraim (d. 378), Hilary of Poitiers (d. 368), and others. They were generally divided into strophes, either with or without rhymes; and often they were distinguished by sublime simplicity. But Ambrose also composed a number of hymns himself, the so-called Ambrosian or Roman hymns, generally without rhymes, but well adapted to the melodies. About thirty such hymns have been ascribed to him, but only twelve with certainty, among which are, Deus creator omnium; O lux beata Trinitas; Veni redemptor gentium; Æterne rerum candidior, etc. The celebrated hymn Te Deum Laudamus, generally called Hymnus SS. Ambrosii et Augustini, is a translation in part, probably by Ambrose, of an older Greek hymn. Other hymn-writers were, Prudentius, Coelius, Sedulius (d. 459), Ennodius, bishop of Pavia (d. 521), Fortunatus (d. 600), etc.

See FORTLAGE: Gesänge christlicher Vorzeit, Berlin, 1844; SCHLOSSER: Die Kirche in ihren Liedern, Mentz, 1851; MONE: Die Hymnen des Mittelalters, 1853.

M. HEROLD.

AMBROSIASTER, or PSEUDO-AMBROSIUS, is the name now applied to the author of those Commentaria in XIII. Epistolas Beati Pauli, which are published among the works of Ambrose. The first who quoted these commentaries over the name of Ambrose was Hincmar of Rheims, about 870; then Ivo of Chartres, d. 1115; then Petrus Lombardus, d. 1164, etc. The first who doubted the authorship of Ambrose was Erasmus, 1527; and now all agree that they do not belong to him. The style is another, the treatment of the text is different, many views are in direct opposition to those of Ambrose, and the author's knowledge of Greek is very imperfect, while Ambrose was complete master of that language. Various other authors have been guessed at; but it is entirely in vain to ask who the author is, because the work cannot possibly be the product of one single man. The treatment of the several Epistles is wholly different: short and pithy in the Epistle to the Romans, lengthy and vague in the Epistle to the Philippians and Colossians. And, again, the text of Scripture from which is quoted, varies continually. While Ambrose always quotes from the Itala, the quotations of these commentaries are taken now from the Itala, now from the Vulgate, and sometimes from another version of the Itala than that used by Ambrose. The work is evidently a compilation, of which the oldest part dates from about 380, the commentary on 1 Tim. iii. 15 pointing directly to the time of Damasus; while the latest part dates from about 800, the commentary on Phil. ii. 9-11 containing an allusion to the Adoptionist controversy.

THEOD. PLITT.

AMEN (true, faithful) expresses an energetic affirmation and confirmation of the truth of a statement; accordingly a repetition of the word had the force of a superlative. In the Old Testament "amen" is the public assent to a sentence (Deut. xxvii. 15-26), and to a judge's charge (Num. v. 22); the solemn closing word to several books of the Psalms (Ps. xli. 13, lxxii. 19, lxxxix. 53, cvi. 48). It was frequently uttered by Christ, although the Authorized Version generally translates "verily," as in Matt. v. 18; Mark iii. 28; Luke iv. 24. Also by the apostles as an appropriate word (Rom. xvi. 24; Rev. xxii. 20, 21). Jesus calls himself the Amen (Rev. iii. 14). In the synagogue and in the early Christian Church it was customary to say "amen" to the prayers of the rabbin or pastor. To this day it is also usual in liturgical churches. See WEBER: Comm. in Amen Evangelicum, Jena, 1734.

AMERICAN AND FOREIGN CHRISTIAN UNION. This society, as its name denotes, is the Union of the "American Protestant Society," founded in 1843; the "Foreign Evangelical Society," instituted in 1839 as the expansion of the "French Association" of 1835; and the "Christian Alliance" of 1842. The A. and F. C. U. was organized May 10, 1849, to do in a more efficient way the work of the three societies named, which was to convert Roman Catholics, or to quote its constitution, "by missions, colportage, the press, and other appropriate agencies, to diffuse the principles of religious liberty, and a pure and evangelical Christianity, both at home and abroad, where a corrupted Christianity exists." The society was for a number of years very prosperous, and spread its influence over Europe, North and South America, and the adjacent islands. From 1849 to 1859 its yearly receipts averaged $60,000. But it was compelled gradually to contract its operations. It withdrew from France in 1866, from Italy and Europe, and other foreign stations generally, in 1873. Quite recently, however, it has begun work on an important scale for the evangelization of France (1880). The Christian World, its monthly organ, gives a summary of news about Roman-Catholicism, and the work done to evangelize the adherents of the Papal Church.

See the April number (1880) of The Christian World for a historical sketch of the thirty-years' work of the Union; and the June number of the same year, for the annual report.

AMES, William, b. at Norfolk, Eng., 1576; d. in Rotterdam, Nov. 14, 1633; educated in Christ's College, Cambridge; was appointed chaplain to the University, but being a rigid Puritan, and without hope of preferment in the Church of England, and having given great offence by a sermon on the irregularities of the students, he left his native country, settled at Leyden, and was by Sir Horatio Vere, commander of the English troops in the Netherlands, and a great patron of the Puritans, made preacher to the garrison in the Hague. He immediately entered into the Arminian controversy, and published De Arminii Sententia, 1613; Rescriptio Scholastica, 1616; and Coronis ad Collationem Hagensem, etc., 1618. Shortly after the opening of the Synod of Dort in 1618, Sir Horatio Vere was compelled by episcopalian intrigues to dismiss Ames; but the States gave him a pension to settle at Dort and assist the president of the synod, and in 1622 he was appointed professor of theology in the Academy of Franeker by the influence of Prince Maurice. In 1623 he published Medulla Theologica, and in 1630 De Conscientia, his two principal works, the former dogmatical, the latter ethical, and though on Protestant ground, and with a sound practical purpose, a continuation of the old scholastic science of casuistry. Of his other works, which, both in Latin and English, enjoyed a great reputation, especially in the Netherlands, are Puritanismus Anglicanus, 1610; Anti-Synodalia, 1629, against the Remonstrants; Bellarminus Enevertatus, against the Romanists; and A Fresh Suit against Ceremonies in God's Worship, 1633, which latter book made a Non-conformist out of Richard Baxter. Shortly before his death he removed to Rotterdam, as pastor of the English church of the Brownists (Independents), there. He had great influence, though an Englishman, upon Continental thought, and under his Latinized name, AMESIUS, is well known on the Continent to-day. A collected edition of his Latin works was published in five volumes at Amsterdam, 1658. See NEAL: History of Puritans, I.; BROOKS: Lives of Puritans, II.

AMLING, Wolfgang, b. at Mümmerstadt, Franconia, in 1542; d. at Zerbst, May 18, 1606; studied at the universities of Tübingen, Wittenberg, and Jena; was appointed rector of the school of Zerbst in 1566, minister at Koswig in 1573, and, shortly after, minister at St. Nicolai in Zerbst, and superintendent. He was vehemently opposed to the formula concordiæ, and stood at the head of the movement which led the population of Anhalt from Lutherism to Calvinism. His adherents were called the Amlingites. He wrote the Confessio Anhaltina.

AMMIANUS MARCELLINUS, a native of Antioch, pursued, while a youth, philosophical and rhetorical studies; entered the army under Constantius, accompanied Julian in the war against the Persians, and took part under his successors in the wars both of the Orient and the Occident; but retired afterwards to Rome, devoted himself to historical studies, and died there about 400. His Roman history, Rerum gestarum, libri XXXI., extended from Nerva, 96, to the death of Valens, 378; but the first thirteen of the thirty-one books are lost. The remainder, beginning with the year 353, is of great interest for the history of the Christian Church, as it gives much valuable information, not only of the general state of the Church, but of many important particulars: the character of Julian, his proceedings, etc. The best edition is that by Wagner in three volumes, Leipzig, 1808. An English translation was published by Philemon Holland, London, 1609. The question, whether Ammianus was a Christian or not, has often been mooted. Claud. Chifflet, De Ammiani M. vita, etc., Lovan., 1627, answers in the affirmative; Guil. Ad. Cart, Questiones Ammianæ, Berol., 1868, pp. 23-42, in the negative. The general opinion is, however, that he was not a Christian. Throughout his work he speaks of Christianity as an outsider, reporting and explaining; and the sympathy and appreciation he shows are the natural results of his religious standpoint,—a vague deism, to which a sublimated paganism and a Christianity deprived of every thing specifically Christian, may not appear to be irreconcilable. WÖLFFLIN.

AMMON, Christof Friedrich von, b. at Bayreuth, Jan. 16, 1766; d. in Dresden, May 21, 1850; studied at the University of Erlangen, and became professor of philosophy there in 1789, and of theology in 1790; moved in 1794 to Göttingen as professor of theology, preacher to the university, and director of the theological seminary; returned in 1804 to Erlangen, but went in 1813 to Dresden as preacher to the court, and member, afterwards vice-president, of the consistory. One of his earliest and also one of his principal works is: Entwurf einer rein biblischen Theologie, 1792, in which he treats the dogma of inspiration as a Jewish conceit, and makes common-sense the test of revealed truth. In 1794 followed Handbuch der christlichen Sittenlehre; in 1803, Summa theologica; and these works made their author one of the leaders, or at least one of the lights, of the rationalistic school. But in 1817 he completely surprised his readers by his Bittere Arznei für die Glaubensschwäche der Zeit, a defence of the famous Theses of Claus Harms. His engagement in Dresden had brought him in rather perplexing relations with the minister Einsiedel, who was influenced by the Moravian Brethren, and as Schleiermacher expresses it. "So lavers the boat, so winds the eel." But the revolution of 1830 compelled Einsiedel to retire; and in 1833 Ammon published Fortbildung des Christenthums zur Weltreligion, 4 vols.; the current had poured back to its old bed. In 1842 followed Leben Jesu; in 1849, Die wahre und falsche Orthodoxie, etc.; but these later works failed to attract any attention in the theological world.

AMMONITES. The descendants of Ammon, the incestuous son of the younger daughter of Lot, Ben-ammi, "my folkson," to indicate that he was born of no strange father (Gen. xix. 38). The name appears upon the Assyrian inscriptions, first under Shalmaneser II. (B.C. 858-823), last under Assur-haddon (B.C. 681-668), as bit Amman (house of Ammon). The Ammonites were one of the three peoples allied to the Israelites by blood and speech, which formed the barrier on the south-east to the wild tribes of the desert. By destroying the Zamzumim, they occupied land spreading from the Arnon River to the Jabbok and the Jordan. They were territorially, as well as by blood, related to the Moabites, and shared with them in fortunes. They appear together, as hiring Balaam (Deut. xiii. 4), and as possessors of the land above mentioned (Judg. xi. 12-18, 25). The Israelites drove out the Amorites, and the Ammonites occupied this territory (Num. xxi. 21-26), which, though small, was rich, as is evidenced by the plain of the vineyards (Judg. xi. 33), and the abundant harvests (2 Chron. xxvii. 5; Ezek. xvii. 17; cf. xxv. 4).

The Ammonites were the foes of Israel. In religion they were gross idolaters: their god was Molech or Milcom (1 Kings xi. 5, 7), which was substantially the same as Chemosh (Judg. xi. 24). For their conduct in joining Moab to hire Balaam they were excluded from the citizenship in Israel, but not from the spiritual privileges (Deut. xxiii. 2, 46; Neh. xiii. 2). Their attacks upon Israel were repulsed with great slaughter by Jephthah (Jud. xi. 33) and Saul (1 Sam. xi. 11, xiv. 47). David revenged upon them the insult offered to his ambassadors; their capital, Rabbah, was destroyed, and the people subjected (2 Sam. xii. 26-31). In Jehoshaphat's reign they and the Moabites rebelled; but so utter was their overthrow that it took three days to collect the spoil (2 Chron. xx.). They were obliged to pay tribute to Uzziah and to Jotham (2 Chron. xxvi. 8, xxvii. 5). They took advantage of the overthrow of Israel to take the cities of Gad (Jer. xlix. 1-6; Zeph. ii. 8, 9). They made common cause with the Chaldeans and Syrians against Jehoiaxim (2 Kings xxiv. 2), wherefore Jeremiah and Ezekiel in their prophecies declare against them (Jer. ix. 25 sq., xxv. 21, xxvii. 2; Ezek. xxi. 15 sq., xxv. 1-10); and after the destruction of Jerusalem their king Baalis employed Ishmael to murder Gedaliah, in order to hinder the reconstruction of the Jewish state (2 Kings xxv. 25; Jer. xl. 14). They opposed Nehemiah (Neh. iv. 7). Judas Maccabæus had to fight many battles with them till they were discomfited (1 Mac. v. 7). They shared with the Jews the change of masters, from Greek to Egyptian and to Syrian lords. An Hellenic colony, named Philadelphia, after Ptolemy Philadelphus, was made out of their capital city Rabbah. This city enjoyed great splendor for a while, and fell under the Romans as part of the province of Syria, B.C. 64. Justin Martyr (d. 166) mentions the Ammonites as in his day a numerous people. But afterwards they are lost to sight, becoming a part of the general Arab population. FR. W. SCHULTZ.

AMMONIUS of Alexandria, the teacher of Origen; who, about the middle of the third century, prepared a harmony of the Gospels, or a Diatesseron, in which he divided the Gospels into sections, to this day known as the Ammonian sections, and found indicated upon most MSS. See BIBLE TEXT, New Testament. A translation of this Diatesseron into Latin was made by Victor, Bishop of Capua (d. 544), and has often been reprinted, e.g., Mayence, 1524, and by Migne. Eusebius (H. E. vi. 19) mentions his work, The Harmony of Moses and Jesus, but this is entirely lost. See next below.

AMMONIUS, called Saccas (a sack), because in his youth he was a porter, and therefore carried sacks, lived in Alexandria in the second century, and became the founder of the Alexandrian school of philosophy. Plotinus and Longinus were among his disciples, but he wrote no books. Porphyry tells of him that he was born of Christian parents, but deserted Christianity; and when Eusebius (H. E. vi. 19) denies this statement, he seems to mistake Ammonius Saccas, the pagan eclectic, the reconciliator of Plato and Aristotle, for the Christian philosopher of the same name, who is mentioned above. See AMMONIUS.

AMOLO, or AMULO, educated in the school of Lyons under the tuition of Agobard, and, since 840, his successor in the archi-episcopal chair; d. 852; represents the strong hierarchical views of his time, but seems to have been entirely free from its credulity and superstition. A peculiar case of relic-worship and its effects was laid before him by Bishop Theutbold of Langres; and without hesitation, he designated it as a piece of fraud and avarice (M. Bibl., T. XIV., f. 324). He also wrote against the Jews, and against Gottschalk (M. Bibl., T. XIV., f. 332-336).

AMPHIBALUM, a word of Greek origin, but used only by Gallican writers, was the name of a peculiar kind of casula, without sleeves and with a hood, which the Gallican clergy of the eighth and ninth centuries wore in offices of holy ministration.

AM'ON (the hidden). 1. An Egyptian and also a Lybian and Ethiopic divinity, originally and particularly worshipped in Upper Egypt, and had his principal temple in Thebes (No-Amon, the dwelling of Amon) with a numerous and learned priesthood; here was also a famous oracle: both destroyed by Cambyses. The divinities of the nature-religions are related to light as the source of fruit and life. The Egyptians distinguished between Amon, as the original sun-power personified was called in Upper Egypt, but Ptah, in Lower Egypt, or Ra, the general name, and Osiris, the representative of the beneficent activity of the sun: i.e., they distinguished between the sun and the effects of the sun. But Amon was not allowed to stand alone. He was the head of the Theban triad, associated with Mut, i.e., the original material out of which he came and upon which his power was exerted, as mother and spouse, and with Chunsu. Under the name of Amon-Ra he eventually became the great god of all Egypt. He was addressed as "the King of all gods," as "the husband of his mother, his own father, and his own son," as "the beneficent and lovely, but also the invincible foe and destroyer of evil." The Greeks identified him with Zeus. In later times he occupied a higher place, and was worshipped as the all-filling and all-disposing divine Intelligence. As Amon Num, the binding one, i.e., day and night, in the Great Oasis and in the temple of Jupiter Amon, he was represented with a ram's head; but generally as a man clad in a linen tunic, gathered about the waist by a belt. In one hand he holds the symbol of life, in the other the staff of authority; and on his head is a cap with two high plumes. He was also worshipped as Amen-Ra-Ka mut-ef, "Amen-Ra, who is both male and female," or the generative principle. In the latter form he is accompanied by sacred trees, similar to the "groves" of the Old Testament; and thus he is connected with Baal.

2. The son and successor of Manasses, and king of Judah B.C. 643-641 (642-640), cf. 2 Kings xxi. 19-26; 2 Chron. xxxiii. 21-25. He was twenty years old when he began to reign, and he reigned two years. Zephaniah's prophecy contains a saddening picture of the times. Amon wearied himself to commit iniquity. He worshipped the host of heaven, revelling in the grossest idolatry. At last his own servants slew him, and with Josiah issued a better day for Judah.

3. A governor under Ahab, 1 Kings xxii. 26.

4. The name of an ancestor mentioned in Neh. vii. 59.

FR. W. SCHULTZ.

AM'ORITES (inhabitants of the high lands). The name distinguishes them from the Canaanites, "the inhabitants of the low lands," and the Perizzites, "the inhabitants of the flat lands." The Amorites (the word is, however, always singular in the Hebrew) were one of the chief Canaanitish tribes. The description of their size and strength given by Amos ii. 9, need not be taken literally, but was probably an echo of the spies' report (Num. xiii. 32, 33). At one time the Amorite territory took in "all Gilead and Bashan" (Deut. iii. 10), but it varied: thus in Abraham's time it was about the Dead Sea; shortly before the exodus, the Amorites crossed over the East Jordan country, and, when the Israelites invaded the land, they inhabited that fertile district bounded by the Arnon, the Jabbok, and the Jordan. They opposed the Israelites, but were defeated (Deut. ii. 36), and their territory divided between Reuben and Gad, and the half tribe Manasseh (Josh. xiii. 8 sq.). The Gideonites, inhabitants of an Amorite city, contrived, through fraud, to avert from themselves the doom which fell upon their clansmen (Josh. ix.). Joshua fought and defeated five Amorite kings (Josh. x. 5). They were so successfully exterminated as a tribe, that they never again were numerous and powerful, and are rarely mentioned.

AMORTIZATION. See MORTMAIN.

AM'OS (a bearer), the third of the minor prophets, originally a herdsman and farmer of Tekoa, a town twelve miles south-south-east from Jerusalem (vii. 10), and destitute of a prophetic education. Although thus a native of Judah, under divine inspiration he prophesied against the sins of the northern kingdom. The Fathers wrongly identified him with the father of Isaiah (Amoz), because his name in the LXX. is identical with that of Isaiah's father. Amos prophesied in the northern kingdom some time between 807 and 769, during the reigns of Uzziah in Judah (807-755) and Jeroboam II. in Israel (822-769), when Israel was at the very height of its splendor. His prophecies were apparently all given in one year, specified as "two years before the earthquake," a momentous but undatable event. His plain speaking led to the charge of conspiracy against the government, because he alienated the people; and therefore he was compelled to return to Judah (vii. 10-17). Nothing more is known of him.

The Book of Amos, after the opening verse, is divisible into three parts. I. chaps. i. 2-ii. 16. The judgments of God upon Damascus (vs. 3-5), Philistia (vs. 6-8), Tyre (vs. 9, 10), Edom (vs. 11, 12), Ammon (vs. 13-15), Moab (ii. 1-3), Judah (vs. 4, 5), Israel (vs. 6-16). II. chaps. iii.-vi. Three discourses upon Israel's wickedness. 1. chap. iii.; 2. chap. iv.; 3. chaps. v., vi. 3 is divisible into three parts. (a) v. 1-17, (b) 18-27, (c) chap. vi. In these discourses he sets forth in his usual rhetorical manner the moral and religious degeneracy of the people, their voluptuousness and banqueting (iv. 1, vi. 4-6, 8); their unchastity and viciousness (ii. 7), their righteousness and dishonesty (iii. 9, 10, iv. 1, v. 7, 11, 12, cf. ix. 4-6), their idolatry (v. 26), and especially the union of calf worship and the Jehovah cultus at Bethel, Gilgal, Dan and Beersheba (iv. 4, 5, v. 5, cf. viii. 14). Instead of this mere external worship of Jehovah, Amos called the people to a practical service in righteousness and goodness (v. 21-25). He considers it to be possible, but unlikely, that Israel will repent (cf. iv. 6 sq., v. 6, 14, 15), and therefore he sets forth the impending dangers (iii. 12, 14, 15, iv. 2, 3, v. 5, vi. 7, 8, 9, cf. vii. 3, 8, 11, 17, viii. 2, ix. 1). III. chaps. vii.-ix. This part contains the three successive threatening visions (vii. 1-3, 4-6, 7-9). These were made the basis of the complaint of Amaziah, the high priest at Bethel, to the king, Jeroboam II., and hence resulted his banishment (vs. 10-13). But before he goes he insists upon the reality of his call (vs. 14, 15), and foretells the sad fall of the high priest and his family (vs. 16, 17). Chaps. viii. and ix. contain two visions and their explanations. The first is of threatening contents, but the second (ix. 1-7) looks towards the concluding promise of salvation for a faithful remnant, and of the universal sway of religion and prosperity (vs. 8-15). The arrangement of the book is clear, and implies mature consideration, leading to the supposition that Amos wrote it after his return to Tekoa. The style of Amos is rhetorical; his figures, analogies, and similes are excellent, though at times surprising (cf. iii. 3-6, iv. 2, v. 7, viii. 11-14). The notion that Amos borrows his similes chiefly from his early mode of life, and thus betrays his extraction, is generally accepted, but hardly well founded when the variety of them is observed (see ii. 13, iii. 4, 5, 8, 12, vi. 12, viii. 8, ix. 5, and the visions of vii. 1 and viii. 1). On the other hand, the Hebrew of Amos is abnormal both in pronunciation and orthography. The book is quoted in the New Testament by Stephen in his defence before the Sanhedrin (Acts vii. 42, 43, see Amos v. 25-27), and by James (Acts xv. 16, see Amos ix. 11). Amos shows himself, and presumes his hearers, to have a good acquaintance with the Pentateuch. It has been conjectured that the book gives only an outline of his addresses.

AMPHILOCHIUS, Saint, a native of Cappadocia; was educated for the bar, and practised for some time as an advocate in Constantinople, but retired afterwards to Ozizala, near Nazianzus, where he led an ascetic life. In 375 he was elected bishop of Iconium, the metropolitan see of Lycaonia; in 381 he was present at the second oecumenical council of Constantinople, and in 388 he presided over a synod at Sida, Pamphylia, against the Messalians. He was ardently opposed to the Arians, and persuaded the emperor to forbid all public debate of the controversial points (Socrates: Hist. eccles. 7, 6). With Basil the Great and Gregory Nazianzen, he lived in very intimate intercourse, and it is from notices in their works we know what we know with certainty of him; his life, as given in Migne, Patr. Græc. xxxix. p. 14, being a mere monkish fiction. The year of his death is uncertain, but falls after 392, as in this year Jerome published his De Vir. Ill., in which Amphilocheus is mentioned (133) as still living. His day is given both in the Greek and Latin calendars as Nov. 23. Of the works ascribed to him, some are decidedly spurious; thus the legendary biography of Basil would not have been written by a friend and contemporary of him. Others are of doubtful authenticity. They have all been collected, together with fragments of works which are lost, and edited by CAMBERIS, Paris, 1644. Genuine is the Epistola Synodica in defence of the orthodox conception of the Holy Trinity (COTELIER: Mon. eccl. gr., T. II.; and THILO: Bib. pat. gr. dogmat., vol. II.).

AMSDORF, Nikolaus von, b. Dec. 3, 1483; d. May 14, 1565; studied theology in Wittenberg, and was appointed pastor in Magdeburg, 1524, bishop of Naumburg-Zeiz, 1541, and superintendent in Eisenach, 1548. He was one of Luther's staunchest adherents and most intimate friends, accompanied him to Worms, knew of his abduction to the Wartburg, received him in his house on his secret visits to Wittenberg, partook in the translation of the Bible, was consecrated bishop by him Jan. 20, 1542, and superintended the Jena edition of his works. He was a man of sharp but narrow understanding, somewhat harsh and unyielding, and in his polemics he often overleaped the goal. Thus in a controversy with Menius he was led to say, in a pamphlet reprinted in Baumgarten, Geschichte der Religionsparteien, 1172-78, that good works were detrimental to salvation. After the death of Luther he became completely estranged from Melancthon and the Wittenbergers. A biography by I. Meier is found in MEURER: Leben d. Ältesten d. luth. Kirche, vol. III.

AMULETS consist of gems or small bits of some natural object, — for instance, a root, or tickets of parchment or metal, — inscribed with some word or sentence of Holy Writ, or with some mystical sign, and are worn on a string generally around the neck, as a means of protection against witchery, ill-luck, etc. The word first occurs in Pliny, Nat. Hist. 29, 4, 19; 30, 15, 47; and is derived by some from the Latin amoliri, "to avert," by others, from the Arab hamalo, "to carry." The superstition was almost universal in ancient times, and especially among Eastern people. It arose naturally from the idea that human life is influenced by the stars, by spirits, etc.; and, where there is a belief in witchcraft, there must also be a belief in the remedy against it. Among the Jews amulets were much used, though the law forbade them, and the whole spirit of the Old Testament excludes the idea on which they rest. Nevertheless the Jews were firm believers in, and skilful makers of, amulets of all kinds, from the idolatrous earrings which Jacob hid under the oak at Shechem (Gen. xxxv. 4), to the cabalistic charms known as "David's shield" and "Solomon's seal." Also among the Christians the superstition crept in; and the Council of Trullo excommunicated the makers of amulets, and branded the whole custom as a heathen superstition, A. D. 692, can. 62. HEFFLE: Conciliengeschichte, vol. III. p. 308. See PHYLACTERIES.

AMYOT, Joseph, b. at Toulon, 1718; entered the order of the Jesuits, and went in 1750 as a missionary to China, where he labored forty-four years, and died in Peking, 1794. He wrote a life of Confucius, Paris, 1789, a Manchoo-Tartary-French dictionary, and a Manchoo-Tartary grammar, and gave much valuable and interesting information on Chinese customs, laws, religion, and history, in Lettres Edifiantes et Curieuses.

AMYRAUT, Moïse (Moses Amyraldus), b. at Bourgueil, 1596; d. at Saumur, 1664; descended from a distinguished family belonging to the Reformed Church, and studied jurisprudence at Poitiers, but was, by the reading of Calvin's Institutio, induced to devote himself to the study of the theology, and entered the academy of Saumur. Appointed professor here in 1633, together with Josué de la Place (Placcæus) and Louis Cappel (Cappellus), he soon brought the academy in a most flourishing condition, and students from foreign countries, especially from Switzerland, gathered to its halls. The teaching of the academy, however, was somewhat out of the common route, and, in dogmatic respects, the time was very irritable. It was believed, especially in Switzerland, that Amyraut's exposition of the doctrines of grace and predestination differed materially from the formulas of the Synod of Dort. His Traité de la Predestination, published in 1634, caused a great sensation, and was fiercely attacked by Pierre du Moulin (Molinæus), professor in the orthodox academy of Sedan, by André Rivet of Leyden, and others. Formally accused of heresy at the national synod of Alençon, 1637, and again in that of Charenton, 1644, he was both times acquitted; but the controversy was, nevertheless, kept up, especially by Friedrich Spanheim of Leyden, and he was accused and acquitted a third time, in the synod of Loudun, 1659. Though most of the prominent French divines, even Pierre du Moulin, in course of time, became reconciled to him, the Swiss students were recalled from Saumur, and the last symbolical work of the Reformed Church, the Formula Consensus, was drawn up against his views in Geneva, 1675. His works relating to this controversy, besides the above-mentioned, are the Echantillon de la Doctrine de Calvin sur la Predestination, 1637; De la Justification, 1638; De Provilentia Dei in Malo, 1638; Defensio I. Calvini Doctrinæ de Absolut. Reprob. Decreto, 1641; Dissertationes Theologicae Quatuor, 1645; Declaratio Fidei contra Errorem Arminian., 1646; Disputatio de Libero Arbitrio, 1647; and Specimen Animadver. in Exercit. de Gratia Univers., 1648 (1,856 pages!), directed especially against Spanheim. Among Amyraut's other works, are La Morale Chrétienne, 6 vols. 1652-60; Traité des Religions, 1631, translated into English, London, 1660, etc. A complete list is found in HAAG: La France Protestante, I., 72.

A. SCHWEIZER.

ANABAPTISTS (from the Greek ἀνα, "again," and βαπτίζω, "to baptize") is the name of a violent, mystical sect which, representing the deepest-going radicalism, broke away from the general reformatory movement of the sixteenth century, and soon became lost in fanaticism and excess. The general character is an absolute break with the existing order of things, ecclesiastical, political, and social. While the Reformers wished everywhere to respect the forms of real life, wanting only to correct, improve and develop, with the Bible as their guide, the Anabaptists rejected every thing they found established in Church or State, and proposed to create an entirely new order according to their own inspirations. But the special point from which they started was a rejection of infant-baptism, on the ground that an infant is unable to assume the responsibility of the sacrament. Questions concerning the proper administration of baptism had already, before this time, appeared in the history of the Christian Church. During the third and fourth centuries there were people who declared baptism invalid when performed by a heretic. In this form, however, the question soon died out, while, as a doubt with respect to the validity of infant-baptism, it reappeared every now and then during the middle ages. In the sixteenth century it then became the watchword of, and gave the name to, one of the wildest and fiercest sects ever bred within the pale of the Christian Church.

The sect originated in Zwickau in Saxony. Here Thomas Münzer gathered a great crowd, especially of mechanics, by his fanatical preaching, and, in conventicles, the members boasted of divine revelations, and spoke openly of the overthrow of the whole social order. Expelled from Zwickau, some of the adherents of Münzer attempted to get a foothold even in the very centre of the Reformation, in Wittenberg. Nikolaus Storch and two others appeared there as prophets (the so-called Zwickauer prophets) sent by God to preach the truth. Not to the letter, but to the spirit, should one listen; infant-baptism must be rejected, as only personal faith can save; God is now about to found a new holy congregation, etc. The powerful preaching of Luther, however, soon destroyed the impression they made; and Münzer now endeavored to realize his radical ideas in Mühlhausen, at that time a free city of the empire. A kind of peasants'-war, kindled by half-demagogical, half-theocratical tendencies, broke out and spread through a great part of Thuringia, till the massacre at Frankenhäusen put an end to the whole movement. The adherents of Münzer, however, did not practise re-baptism, and did not form a congregation; but they all wore the marks of a peculiarly sombre mysticism, speaking of the "bitter" Christ as the example to follow, and scolding Luther as an easy-going fraud.

Quite another character the sect exhibited in Switzerland. Several of Zwingle's co-workers, Wilhelm Reublin, Simon Stumpf, Ludwig Hetzer, Felix Manz, and Konrad Grebel, gradually separated from him and the congregation, and began to worship in private houses surrounded by crowds of excited mechanics. The apostolical congregation was the ideal of these conventicles, an ideal with which the state-establishment of Zwingle's church did not harmonize; and the formation of a congregation of true Christians in strict accordance with this ideal became an object most ardently pursued. Soon arose a doubt of the validity of infant-baptism: some parents refused to have their children baptized; the magistrate threatened with expulsion; and, just in this moment of excitement and anxiety, Jacob Blaurock, a former monk from Chur, asked Grebel, at one of the meetings, to give him the true Christian baptism. Blaurock then baptized others; and thus the first Anabaptist congregation was formed, re-baptization being the common bond between its members. The general character, however, of this whole movement, was peaceful, in spite of the prevailing excitement. Nobody thought of carrying out the new ideas by force. In striking contrast to the Münzer uproar, meekness and sufferings were here understood as the most essential elements of the Christian ideal. From Switzerland the movement spread to Southern Germany. Zealously propagated by its itinerant missionaries, it found, during the general excitement and fermentation of the times, ready acceptance, especially among the lower classes, though also among the higher. Augsburg, Nuremberg, and Nicholsburg in Moravia, became its centres.

Then began the persecution in autumn, 1527, both from the Roman-Catholic and Protestant side. Most of the leaders were killed, hundreds of the members were expelled, thrown into dungeons, and massacred. This persecution was followed by an inner transformation of the whole spirit of the movement. A few of Münzer's adherents who had escaped at Frankenhausen brought the ideas of a social revolution to the Anabaptists of Southern Germany; and, though at first rebuked, the fiendish spirit soon found foothold. Apocalyptic dreams, expectations of a divine judgment near at hand and full of revenge, and finally the ideas of establishing the kingdom of heaven by means of the sword, took hold of men's minds, and caused unspeakable confusion, and even great danger. Melchior Hoffmann appeared in Strassburg as the prophet of the Anabaptists, announcing the speedy establishment of the kingdom of New Zion. In Münster John of Leyden (Johann Bockhold, see title) gained supremacy, actually assumed the title of king, and led the population into the most frightful excesses. At many other places in Germany and Holland, great disturbances took place. The grapple with the secular power was short, however, and fearful revenge was taken. The movement was completely suppressed; and the few members who were left scattered about in various places were organized into small congregations by Menno Simons. ANACLETUS is the name of two popes.—Anacletus I. occupied the Roman see at the close of the first century; but the order of succession is uncertain, some sources ascribing the third place after Peter, others the fourth, to him. By later writers his life has been adorned with miracles, the building of the Church of St. Peter, martyrdom, etc.; while, on the other side, his very existence has been doubted: but there is no reason either for the one or for the other extreme.—Anacletus II. (Peter Leoni), Feb. 14, 1130–Jan. 25, 1138, descended from a wealthy Jewish family, and spent, successfully, his fortune on his ambition. After the death of Honorius II., one party declared for the cardinal-deacon Gregory (Innocent II.), and another for the cardinal-priest Peter Leoni (Anacletus II.); and by using his own enormous resources as well as the treasures of the Church for bribery, the latter succeeded in gaining over the lower clergy and the populace of Rome. Innocent II. was expelled from Rome, and fled to France; but by the powerful aid of Bernard of Clairveaux he was recognized by England, France, Germany, and Spain, while Anacletus II., though in possession of Rome and the papal dominion, was recognized only by the city of Milan and King Roger of Sicily. Lothar of Germany made two campaigns to Italy, 1133 and 1136, to unseat him; and the last time he was accompanied by Bernard, who succeeded in separating not only the city of Milan, but also many of the most prominent Roman families, from his party. Even with Roger negotiations were opened. But at this moment Anacletus II. died. R. ZÖPFEL.

ANAMMELECH, a divinity in whose worship, as in that of ADRAMMELECH, which see, the Sepharvites burnt their children (2 Kings xvii. 31). In the Assyrian inscriptions the name is Anu-malik, = King Anu. In the Babylonian-Assyrian pantheon, Anu occupied the first place in the first triad, Anu, Bel, Nisroch. It is not at present decided whether the gods of the first triad represent the powers of nature, as those of the other triads do. Perhaps they were heavenly or sun divinities; at all events, there is mention of the "wide heavens of the god Anu" (George Smith, Assyrian Discoveries, 1875, p. 399). Nor is the description of him upon the inscriptions as a "fish-god" against such a designation, because the heavenly divinities were also the marine, with many peoples, inasmuch as the heavens were thought to be a sea joining with the earthly ocean: thus the Hindoo divinity Varuna (= Θῆρα-νός) was a sea-god. Anu is represented as a man who bears a fish's head for a tiara, and along his back the fish's body. He is identical with the Oannes of Berosus, who, half-man and half-fish, at daybreak arose from the sea, and began his instruction of men in science and art, but at night returned to the sea; even as the sun was fancied to sail through the ocean at night as it sails through the heavens by day.

The female divinity corresponding to Anu was Anatuv. The name is found in the Old Testament towns Beth-anath (Josh. xix. 38; Judg. i. 33) or Beth-anoth (Josh. xv. 59), i.e., the "house of Anath;" also in the proper name Anath (Judg. iii. 31, v. 6). See SCHRÖDER: Phöniz. Sprache, 1869, pp. 124–127. The name appears as Ἀσθα upon Greek-Phœnician inscriptions. Upon Phœnician coins Anatuv is drawn as riding upon a

ANANIAS (the Greek form of Hananiah, whom Jehovah has graciously given). The name of three persons mentioned in the Acts. 1. The Jewish Christian of Jerusalem, who with his wife Sapphira was miraculously killed for lying unto God, in trying to conceal the real selling price of property nominally consecrated (Acts v. 1-11). 2. The Jewish Christian of Damascus who visited Saul in his blindness, and restored his sight, and baptized him (Acts ix. 10-18). 3. A Jewish high-priest, appointed by Herod of Chalcis, A.D. 48; sent to Rome to answer a charge of oppression preferred by the Samaritans, but was acquitted, and returned A.D. 52. Paul was tried before him, A.D. 58; and accused him before Felix and Festus. He was deposed, A.D. 59, and was murdered, A.D. 67. (JOSEPHUS: Antiq. xx. 5, 2; vi. 2; Jewish War, ii. 17, 9.)

ANAPHORA (Ἀναφορά, that which is lifted up, offering) corresponds in the Greek liturgy to the canon missæ in the Latin, and denotes that part of the eucharistic office which includes the consecration of the elements and the oblation. Books containing the whole celebration of the holy eucharist are also sometimes called Anaphoræ, as, for instance, that by Johannes, bishop of Bostra, Arabia; d. 650. See RENAUDOT: Collections of Oriental Liturgies, 1716, vol. II.

ANASTASIUS, whose true name was Astric, b. in France in 954; d. in Hungary, Sept. 10, 1044; entered the order of the Benedictines at Rouen, went to Rome; accompanied Adalbert to Prague; fled with him to Hungary, and was, by Duke Stephan, made abbot of St. Martin, and afterwards bishop of Colocza. Well acquainted with the papal court, he was sent, in 1000, to Rome, to procure the sanction of the ecclesiastical organization, which the duke had established in Hungary, and the elevation of the country into a kingdom. He was successful in his mission, and brought back a crown of gold, and a bull conferring on Stephan the title of the Apostle of Hungary, and acknowledging him as the head of the Hungarian Church.

ANASTASIUS SINAITA. It is a question whether, according to Nicephorus and his followers, there was only one of this name, or whether, according to some recent critics, there were several. According to Nicephorus, Anastasius lived as a hermit, on Mount Sinai; was elected bishop and patriarch of Antioch; was banished in 572, on account of his opposition to the doctrine of the incorruptibility of the body of Christ, and d. in 599. Among the works ascribed to him are: Anagogicæ contemplationes in divini officii Hexæmeron, lib. XI. (in Magna Bibl., Patr. Colon., Tom. VI., P. I.; Book XII. has been edited by Allix, London, 1864); and ὄνυός seu dux vice adversus Accephalos, ed. Gretser, Ingolstadt, 1806, in which the doctrine of the incorruptibility of the body of Christ is attacked. These works, however, are sometimes ascribed to another Sinaitic hermit of the same name, who, according to some, d. before 606, according to others after 678. There is still a third Anastasius Sinaita who succeeded the first, and was slain by the Jews in a riot in 609.

ANASTASIUS is the name of four popes, and one antipope. — Anastasius I., 398-402. Under Siricius, Rufinus of Aquileia had translated Origen's περί ἀρχῶν, and introduced the work in Rome; but Marcella, a friend of Jerome, now arraigned him before Anastasius, accusing him of introducing heresies; and the pope condemned the works of Origen, and broke off all ecclesiastical community with Rufinus, though the latter sent in a perfectly orthodox confession. — Anastasius II., Nov. 496-Nov. 498, a native of Rome, was very anxious to end the schism which the monophysitic controversy had caused between the Eastern and Western churches. The situation was this: in 482, the emperor Zeno issued the Henotikon which denied the authority of the synod of Chalcedon; and, two years later on, the pope, Felix II. (or III.) excommunicated the patriarch of Constantinople, Acacius, because he had sanctioned that decree. Anastasius II. now sent two bishops to the emperor with letters declaring himself willing to recognize the consecrations which Acacius had performed, on the condition that his name (Acacius) should not be mentioned in the prayers of the service; and at the same time Photinus, deacon of Thessalonica, arrived at Rome, and was very friendly received by the pope, though he held the views of Acacius, and consequently was a heretic in the eyes of Rome. The Liber Pontificalis states that, in this point, the clergy disagreed with the pope, and even withdrew their allegiance to his authority; and from Gratian, who, in a decree, designated Anastasius II. as "one thrown off by the Church," and down to the sixteenth century, he was considered a heretic by all ecclesiastical writers. — Anastasius III., 911-913, a native of Rome. — Anastasius IV., July 11, 1153-Dec. 3, 1153, remained in Rome as the vicar of Innocent II., when the latter fled to France. In his short reign he succeeded in ending a harassing controversy with Friedrich I., concerning the appointment to the archiepiscopal see of Magdeburg, by declaring himself convinced of the legality of the election of Bishop Wichmann of Naumburg, and allowing him, in an assembly of many prelates in the Church of St. Peter, to take the pallium with his own hands from the altar. A similar controversy in England he decided by conferring the pallium on Archbishop William of York, who had alternately been acknowledged and deposed by Innocent II., Cœlestine II., Lucius II., and Eugene III. — Anastasius, antipope to Benedict III., 854, was a cardinal presbyter, but was, on account of insubordination, excommunicated, Dec. 16, 850; anathematized, May 29, 853; and finally bereft of his sacerdotal functions. Nevertheless, when Leo IV. died, 855, and Benedict III. was elected pope, Anastasius succeeded in forming a party among the lower clergy, gained over to his side the imperial ambassador, penetrated into the Lateran Palace, seized Benedict, stripped him of the pontifical robe, ill-treated and imprisoned him. These proceedings, however, caused great indignation in Rome. Not only the higher clergy, but also the populace, sided with Benedict, who was liberated and consecrated Sept.

29, 856; and a council held in Rome deposed Anastasius.

ANASTASIUS, bishop of Laodicea, in Syria, b. in Alexandria about 280; acquired extensive knowledge of the liberal arts; travelled about 284 in Syria, and was ordained bishop-coadjutor by Theotecnus of Cæsarea, and, in 269, bishop of Laodicea. Of his work on the paschal question, a fragment has been preserved by Eusebius (Hist. eccles., VII. 32). The Latin translation of the entire work, Canon Paschalis, published by Agidius Bucherus, Amsterdam, 1634, has been proved spurious by Ideler (Handbuch der Chronologie). Some fragments of his mathematical works were published in Paris, in 1543.

ANASTASIUS was a presbyter of Antioch, and accompanied Nestorius to Constantinople in 428. He was a friend, or, as Theophanes calls him, the syncellus, that is, confidential secretary, of Nestorius; and it was he who caused the jealousy and rivalry which existed between the schools of Antioch and Alexandria to burst forth in open hostilities, by his attack on one of the favorite terms of the Alexandrian school, "Mary, the mother of God." In a sermon he said, "Let no one call Mary θεοτόκος. She was but a human being. It is impossible for God to be born of a human being." Proclus, the representative of the Alexandrian theology in Constantinople, and the unsuccessful competitor of Nestorius for the patriarchate, made a furious attack on Anastasius. Nestorius placed himself by the side of his friend, and the controversy began. It seems, however, from one of Cyril's letters (Epist. VIII.), that Anastasius in 430 made an attempt to reconcile Nestorius and Cyril. After the banishment of the former, he still labored for his cause in Constantinople. The date of his death is not known. See SMITH AND WACE: Christ. Biog., I. sub voce.

ANASTASIUS, patriarch of Constantinople, was a native of Alexandria, came to Constantinople as the apocrisiarius of bishop Dioscurus, and was, through his influence with the emperor, made patriarch in 449, after the deposition of Flavian by the Robber-synod. He presided over the synod of Chalcedon together with the Roman legates; and by the famous canon XXVIII. he obtained rank of patriarch and next the bishop of Rome, extension of his jurisdiction to the dioceses of Pontus, Asia, and Thrace, right to ordain bishops in barbaric countries, etc. On his accession to the patriarchal see, he had shown great adroitness in destroying every suspicion with respect to his orthodoxy; and he now proved himself equally dexterous in calming down the jealousy of Rome. He d. in 458. A letter by him to Leo I. is still extant (Com. T. IV., p. 905).

ANASTASIUS, abbot of St. Maria Trans-Tiberine in Rome, and librarian of the Vatican, was present at the Council of Constantinople, in 869, and translated its canons into Latin. He is also the author of an Historia ecclesiastica, mostly extracted from Nicephorus and Syncellus, and of the so-called Liber pontificalis (see title), a series of biographies of the popes, from Peter to Nicolas I. He d. in 886. See Migne, Patrol. Tom., 127, 8, 9.

ANATHEMA (ἀνάθεμα, in the Greek classics synonymous with ἀνάθημα, from ἀνὰθημι) denotes properly any thing laid up or suspended, and then any thing placed apart in the temples, and consecrated to the gods. In the New Testament ἀνάθεμα corresponds to the Hebrew דָּרַן, and is the proper term for excommunication (1 Cor. xvi. 22), implying an exclusion, not only from the sacraments and the congregation, but also from the grace of God, consequently a direct delivering-up of the person to Satan (1 Cor. v. 5), which last idea is prominent in Gal. i. 8, and Rom. ix. 3. The term, and the ideas connected with it, were adopted by the language and usage of the Church. The Council of Elvira, 303, can. 52, and the Council of Laodicea, 307, can. 29, apply it to offences against the Church; and the Council of Nicæa, 325, lays the anathema on any one who holds or teaches the Arian view of the relation between the Father and the Son. In later ecclesiastical practice this anathema was the heaviest form of excommunication, the excommunicatio major, as appears from the acts of numerous councils, especially from those of the Council of Trent.

ANATOLIUS, b. in Alexandria, about 230; d. about 282. He was the successor in 269 of Eusebius, bishop of Laodicea, in Syria Prima. Eusebius the historian (H. E., VII., 32) says that he attained the highest eminence in mathematics, philosophy, and rhetoric. He journeyed about 264 from Alexandria to Cæsarea in Palestine, and was there ordained, and made bishop-coadjutor of Theotecnus; but on passing through Laodicea he was constrained to become bishop there. Eusebius says, that, although he did not write much, he left a solid reputation for eloquence and erudition; and gives us an extract of Anatolius' work on the Paschal Festival. What purported to be a Latin version of this work was published by BUCHERIUS: Doct. Temp. Antw. 1633, but Ideler (Handb. der Chronologie, ii. 266) pronounces it a forgery. Fragments of a work upon mathematics have been published, Paris, 1543; and by FABRICIUS: Bibl. Greca, iii. 462.

ANATOLIUS, bishop of Constantinople, consecrated 449; d. 458, after being the "apocrisiarius" (see title) of Dioscurus, patriarch of Alexandria, at Constantinople. He found his new position by no means easy. He was more than once accused of heresy, of ambition, of injustice; but, notwithstanding, seems to have been innocent of the more serious charges. The Council of Chalcedon, held at his request in part, in its twenty-eighth canon decreed that equal dignity be ascribed to Constantinople as to Rome; because it was the New Rome, and the seat of government. HEFELE: Conciliengeschichte, 2d vol., p. 509. Anatolius crowned the Emperor Leo, the first performance of the ceremony (GIBBON: in loco). He is best known as the author of some very sweet hymns, particularly the one beginning "Fierce was the wild billow," which have been translated by John Mason Neale (Hymns of the East. Ch.). See Schaff's Church History, vol. III., pp. 583-585, where these hymns are reprinted.

ANCHIETA, José de, the Apostle of Brazil, b. at Laguna, 1533; d. at Revitibia, June 9, 1597; entered the Society of Jesus, 1550; went to Brazil as a missionary in 1553, and labored with great success among the Brazilian Indians, of whose language he gave an admirable grammar, 1595.

ANCHORITES or ANACHORITES (ἀναχωρεῖν, to retire, withdraw). From the Old Testament Elijah and Elisha may be taken as typical instances of anachoritism, and afterwards John the Baptist, who by Jerome is called princeps anachoretarum. Jerome also calls the Therapeutes of Egypt, who probably simply had taken up the example of the Essenes, a community of Christian monks (Catal., c. 11). Anchorites, properly speaking, were persons who retired from the world, and practised their devotional exercises in solitude in order to fight out the spiritual battle with so much the more prospect of success; the persecutions of the second and third centuries gave a special impulse to the movement. Anchorites were also called ἰσκηταί, ἀδελφαί, μονάζοντες, or philosophers, as many of them wore the philosopher's mantle, and lived according to the rules of Epictetus. They lived in caves, avoided all intercourse with their fellow-men, abstained as much as possible from food, spoke no word, but prayed in silence. One stood in a temple for years with his hands uplifted to heaven, never sleeping. Others stood motionless on high cliffs or tall columns (Stylites), in wind and snow. They were numerous, especially in Egypt, Syria, Pontus, and Thrace; and during the ecclesiastical controversies of the fourth and fifth centuries they sometimes appeared suddenly, in the very midst of the noise and bustle of the large cities, rebuking both the prince and the people; as, for instance, St. Anthony (ATHANAS.: Vita St. Anton., c. 46, 68). In 370, bishop Acacius of Beröa brought Julian Sabas to Antioch to employ his help against Arianism. At the same time Thraates stepped before the emperor, Valens, and warned him not to do any harm to the Church. In 476 the stylite Daniel went to Constantinople to defend orthodoxy against the emperor Basiliscus. In course of time it became customary for several anchorites to unite and form small communities (λαῖραι), the cells being built in a circle around a chapel; and thus the transition was made from anchorites to coenobites. St. Chariton is said to have built the first laura, about 340, at Pharan, near the Dead Sea; St. Euthymus the next, near Jerusalem, in the fifth century; then followed St. Sabas and St. Quiriakus, and in Egypt Antonius, Pachomius, Macarius, and others. Nevertheless, in spite of the rapid development of monastical institutions, anchorites still continued to occur. The Trullan Council of 692 ordered (can. 41), that a person who wished to become an anchorite, should first go through a kind of novitiate in a monastery. Charlemagne wished to have all anchorites sent to the monasteries. Nevertheless, they occurred even in Western Europe, at a very late date; and on Mount Athos there still live anchorites and hermits independently of the monastery proper. See J. CROPP: Origines et Cause Monachatus, Göttingen, 1863; ZÜCKLER: Kritische Geschichte der Askese, Frankfurt, 1863. ZÜCKLER.

ANCILLON, David, b. at Metz, March 17, 1617; d. in Berlin, Sept. 3, 1692; a great-grandson of president Ancillon, who, in the sixteenth century, preferred to resign his position at the head of one of the highest courts of France, rather than renounce his evangelical faith; a grandson of Georg Ancillon, one of the founders of the Reformed Church in Metz; and a son of Abraham Ancillon, an eminent lawyer. He was educated in the Jesuit college of his native city, but withstood all the attempts of his teachers to convert him to the Roman faith. He then studied theology at Geneva, and was appointed preacher at Meaux, in 1641, and at Metz in 1653. In 1657 a conference on the tradition of the Church was held between him and Dr. Bédaciar, the suffragan of the bishop of Metz; and, as a false report of this conference was spread by some monk, Ancillon published his celebrated Traité de la tradition, Sedan, 1657. In 1666, he wrote an apology of Luther, Zwingli, Calvin, and Beza. By the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, he was compelled to leave France, and settled first at Frankfort, then at Berlin, where the elector Friedrich Wilhelm appointed him preacher to the French congregation. The Vie de Farel which appeared at Amsterdam, 1691, under his name, is only a mutilated and bungling copy of a manuscript which he had not destined for publication. See CHARLES ANCILLON: Mélanges critiques et littéraires, Basel, 1698, 3 vols.

ANCILLON, Charles, son of the preceding, b. at Metz in 1659; d. in Berlin in 1715; was judge and director of the French colony in Brandenburg, and historiographer to Friedrich I. Of his writings the following have interest for the church historian: Reflexions Politiques, Cologne, 1685; Irrévocabilité de l'édit de Nantes, Amsterdam, 1688; Histoire de l'établissement des Français réfugiés dans les états de Brandebourg, Berlin, 1690.

ANCILLON, Jean Pierre Frédéric, great-grandson of David Ancillon, b. in Berlin, April 30, 1767; d. there April 10, 1837; studied theology, history, and philosophy; visited Geneva and Paris; was appointed teacher in the military academy of Berlin, and preacher to the French congregation; attracted much attention by his sermons; was made tutor to the crown prince in 1806, and in 1825, minister of state, which position he held to his death. In 1818 he published two volumes of sermons at Berlin. C. SCHMIDT.

ANDERSON, Lars (Laurentius Andreü), b. probably at Streugnäs, 1480; d. in the same place, April 29, 1552; was chancellor of the realm, and the most intimate councillor of the king from 1523 to 1540, and stood, together with Olans and Laurentius Petri, at the head of that movement which introduced the Reformation in Sweden, on the diet of Westeraas, 1527. He also partook with Olans Petri in the translation of the Bible into Swedish, of which the New Testament appeared in 1526, the whole in 1541. In 1540 he was accused of being cognizant of a conspiracy against the life of the king, and condemned to death. The king pardoned him, but he was dismissed from all his offices, and lived afterwards in retirement in Streugnäs. See SWEDEN.

ANDERSON, Rufus (D.D., LL.D.), for thirty-four years the corresponding secretary of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, b. Aug. 17, 1796, at North Yarmouth, Me.; d. May 30, 1880, at Boston, Mass. He was graduated at Bowdoin College, Me., where his uncle was the first president, in 1818; studied in Andover Theological Seminary 1819-1822. While in the senior class, he aided in conducting the correspondence of the Board, during the absence of Mr. Everts; and after graduation he was made assistant secretary, and in 1832 corresponding secretary, which position he held until 1866, when he resigned because he was convinced that seventy years form "a limit beyond which it would not be wise for him to remain in so arduous a position." He was then elected a member of the prudential committee; but failing health compelled his resignation, after nine more years of service. He visited officially a part of the Mediterranean missions, 1828-29, and another part, 1843-44; the India, 1854-55; and the Sandwich-Island missions, 1863. He was a prolific author upon his favorite theme of missions. Being requested by the Board to prepare a history of its operations, he wrote one on its work in the Sandwich Islands (1870), another on missions to India (1874), and two on the missions to the Oriental Churches (1872). But more than foreign missions claimed his attention. He was one of the founders of Mount Holyoke Seminary; was president for a number of years of the trustees of Bradford Academy; a member of the board of trust of Andover Seminary; was active in benevolence. "In every position and place the wisdom of his counsels seldom failed to command respect; his hopeful habit, resulting from a deeply settled trust in the promises and providence of God, carried with it an abiding power of inspiration."

ANDOVER THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY. In the year 1807 a plan was formed for the establishment of a theological seminary in Andover, Mass. The Seminary was to be connected with Phillips Academy, an institution founded at Andover in the year 1778. While the projectors of this theological seminary were maturing their plan, they heard of another and similar institution which was to be established at Newbury, Mass. It seemed undesirable that two such schools should be established in the neighborhood of each other, and therefore an attempt was made to unite the two. The union was effected after an arduous and prolonged struggle. The main controversy was between the "moderate Calvinists" so called, and the men who styled themselves "consistent Calvinists," and were generally denominated "Hopkinsians." The two parties united on the basis of a creed, which is like the Westminster Assembly's Catechism in substance, but is considerably different in form. The united seminary is under the immediate care of the trustees of Phillips Academy; is incorporated as a branch of the academy, but is under the general supervision of a board of visitors. The institution was formally opened for the reception of students on the 28th of September, 1808. A sermon was preached on the occasion by President Dwight of Yale College. The number of students who entered the seminary at its opening was thirty-six. The number who have been connected with it during all the seventy-two years of its existence is not far from three thousand. Of these a large proportion have been presidents and professors of colleges and theological seminaries; and an uncommonly large proportion have been missionaries to the heathen. The most conspicuous of the men who projected the seminary of the "moderate Calvinists" was Rev. Eliphalet Pearson, LL.D.; and the most conspicuous of those who projected the seminary of the "Hopkinsians" was Rev. Samuel Spring, D.D. The two men who were most influential in uniting the two parties were Dr. Pearson and Dr. Leonard Woods. Dr. Pearson was the first professor of sacred literature in the seminary. He remained in office only one year, but was a trustee of the seminary eighteen years, and of the academy forty-eight years. Dr. Woods was the first professor of Christian theology, and remained in office thirty-eight years. Rev. Edward Dorr Griffin, D.D., was the first professor of sacred rhetoric; Rev. James Murdock, D.D., the first professor of ecclesiastical history. Rev. Moses Stuart succeeded Dr. Pearson in the chair of sacred literature, remained in office thirty-eight years, and was succeeded by Dr. B. B. Edwards. Dr. Edward Robinson was professor extraordinary of sacred literature from 1830 to 1833. During these three years he gave instruction in the Hebrew department, to which a distinct professorship is now devoted. Other professors now deceased have been Rev. Ebenezer Porter, D.D., Rev. Ralph Emerson, D.D., and Rev. Thomas H. Skinner, D.D. Besides the five chairs of instruction already named, the institution has a professorship of elocution, also of the relations of Christianity to science, also of theology and homiletics in a special course. The most eminent contributors to the funds of the seminary have been Madam Phœbe Phillips, Hon. John Phillips, Samuel Abbot, Esq., Hon. William Bartlett, Hon. John Norris, Moses Brown, Esq., Lieut.-Gov. William Phillips, John Smith, Esq., Peter Smith, Esq., John Dove, Esq., Samuel A. Hitchcock, Esq., Frederic Jones, Esq., Henry Winkley, Esq., Madam Valeria G. Stone, and Miss Sophia Smith. The donations from each of these benefactors have ranged from fifteen thousand dollars to one hundred and sixty thousand dollars. The edifices belonging to the seminary are two dormitories, a chapel for morning prayers, lecture-rooms, etc., a chapel for sabbath worship, a library building containing thirty-eight thousand volumes, eight houses for the professors, etc. The institution is within an hour's distance by railroad from the most flourishing cities and towns of Eastern Massachusetts.

The history of Andover Theological Seminary — the oldest theological seminary in the land — has been identified with many religious and philanthropic movements of the day. The "American Education Society," the "American Tract Society," the "American Temperance Society," the plan of the oldest religious newspaper in America, had their origin on Andover Hill. The "Andover Press" has been noted in the religious community during the last seventy years. The works of Drs. Porter, Woods, and Appleton were printed here, as were the various editions of Professor Stuart's Hebrew Grammar and his Commentaries. Two other Hebrew grammars, one Hebrew lexicon, one Greek lexicon, three grammars of the New Testament Greek, two Greek harmonies of the Gospels, various commentaries of Ellicott, Henderson, Murphy, Lightfoot, Perowne, Hackett, on the Greek and Hebrew Scriptures, are from the Andover Press [see Catalogue (W. F. Draper) 1881]. As early as 1822 it issued Dr. Thomas Brown's Mental Philosophy in three octavo volumes; also his Essay on Cause and Effect. The "American Biblical Repository" was printed at Andover from 1831, the time of its commencement, until 1838. The "Bibliotheca Sacra" has been printed here from 1844 until the present time (1881). It is now in the thirty-eighth year of its existence. In 1851 it united with itself the "American Biblical Repository," and in view of this union may be said to have existed fifty years, and to embrace fifty octavo volumes. If the numbers of the "Biblical Repository," from 1843 to 1850, be taken into the account, the united periodical embraces fifty-seven octavo volumes.

The term "Andover Theology" has been in local or provincial use during the last seventy years. It originated from the fact that the "creed" which lies at the basis of the seminary includes various expressions which are distinctively Hopkinsian, and excludes various expressions which are distinctively Calvinistic; but, on the whole, adopts the substance of Calvinism as well as the substance of Hopkinsianism, and has satisfied the majority of the New-England Calvinists as well as the majority of the Hopkinsians. Some of the Calvinists would have preferred the catechism unmodified; some of the Hopkinsians would have preferred a larger modification of the catechism: on the whole, both parties were satisfied with the compromise. The "creed," representing the compromise, represents the "Andover Theology." EDWARDS A. PARK.

ANDRADA, Antonio d', b. at Villa de Oleiros, near Alentejo, Portugal, in 1580; d. at Goa, Aug. 20, 1633; entered the order of the Jesuits at Coimbra in 1596; went in 1601 as a missionary to India, and was appointed superior of the missions of Mongolia. Hence he made two journeys to Thibet, the first of which he has described in his Novo Descobrimto do Grão Catayo on dos Reynos de Thibet, Lisbon, 1626, translated into French in 1629.

ANDRADA (Diogo Payva d'Andrade), b. at Coimbra, Portugal, in 1528; d. in Lisbon, in 1575; was a member of the order of the Jesuits, and one of the Portuguese delegates to the Council of Trent. Martin Chemnitz's attack on the Jesuits, — Theologiæ Jesuitarum præcipua capita, 1562, — he answered by his Libri orthodoxarum expositionum de controversiæ religionis capitibus; but this book gave Chemnitz occasion to write his celebrated work, Examinis Concilii Tridentini opus integrum, 1565-73, to which Andradias made only a feeble reply in his Defensio Tridentinæ fidei Catholicæ. — His brother Thomas de Jesus, an Augustinian monk, was taken prisoner in the battle of Alcacer, Aug. 4, 1578, and confined in a dungeon to his death, April 17, 1582. While here he wrote in Portuguese his celebrated book, The Labors of Jesus, which was translated into Spanish, Italian, and French.

ANDREÆ, Jakob, b. at Waiblingen, Würtemberg, March 25, 1528; d. at Tübingen, Jan. 7, 1590; was educated at the expense of his native city in the Pædagogium of Stuttgart, and studied theology in Tübingen 1541-1546. On leaving the university he was made a deacon in Stuttgart; and during the occupation of the city by Spanish troops, in 1547, as a consequence of the Smalcald war, he was the only evangelical minister who was allowed to remain in the city: the rest were expelled. Returning to Tübingen in 1548, he was made chaplain to the hospital, and preached the Protestant faith in one of the aisles of the Collegiate Church, at the same time as an Interim-priest said mass in the choir. In 1553, he was appointed superintendent general at Göppingen, and in 1562 professor of theology, provost, and chancellor of the university of Tübingen. The activity which he developed in the cause of the Reformation, during the thirty-seven years he spent at Göppingen and Tübingen, was truly stupendous. He felt that there lay a great danger to the success of the Reformation in the division of the Protestant party into minor factions; and, though he was an ardent champion of Lutheranism pure and undefiled, he undertook to reconcile the various parties among the Lutherans, and unite them into one body. His first plan was to neutralize the differences by means of formulas so general that they could be accepted by all. Two years he spent in travelling, visiting every university, and conferring with every theologian of any consequence from Geneva to Copenhagen. But neither the Flacians nor the Philippists, the two extreme parties among the Lutherans, had full confidence in him; and on the convention of Zerbst, May, 1570, the attempt proved a failure. Andreæ, however, did not give up the plan: he only changed the method of its execution. He now proposed to unite all Lutheran congregations in Germany into a firm alliance by drawing a sharp line of distinction between them and the adherents of Zwingli and Calvin, and thus destroy the Philippists and every other individual shade of Lutheranism. In 1573 he sent a paper under the name of the Suabian Concordia, to the theologians of North Germany, for examination and criticism. May 28, 1576, a convention assembled at Torgau to compare and harmonize the Suabian Concordia with those answers to it which had come in, — the Suabian-Saxonian Concordia, and the Maulbron Formula. The result of this convention was the so-called Liber Torgenses; and then followed, May 19-28, 1580, three final conferences between Andreæ, Chemnitz, Selnekker, Chyträus, Musculus, and Körner. In June 25, 1580, the Formula Concordiæ appeared, and was accepted by all Lutheran governments as one of the symbolical books of the denomination. The works of Andreæ number more than a hundred and fifty, and belong to the most characteristic from the closing period of the Reformation. They consist of sermons and essays, polemical, dogmatical, and practical. Some of the most prominent are, Refutatio Criminalium Hosii, 1560; De duabus Naturis in Christo, 1565; Bericht von der Ubiquität, 1589; De Instau- ratione Stud. Theol., etc. A collected edition does not exist. See J. V. ANDREÆ: Fama Andreana, Strassburg, 1630, containing all the principal sources to his biography, among which is an autobiography, written in 1562, and a catalogus Scriptorum. WAGENMANN.

ANDREÆ, Johann Valentin, a grandson of Jacob Andreæ; b. at Herrenberg, Württemberg, Aug. 17, 1586; d. in Stuttgart, June 27, 1654; studied theology at the University of Tübingen, 1601-7; travelled from 1607-14 in Switzerland, France, and Italy, as tutor for some young noblemen, and was in the latter year appointed deacon at Vaihingen. In 1620 he moved to Calw as minister and superintendent, and in 1639 he became court-preacher, and member of the consistory of Stuttgart, from which offices he retired in 1647, on account of ill health. His numerous writings consist mostly of small pamphlets, generally written in Latin; and many of them are very rare, they having never been published in a collected edition: De Christiani Kosmozeni genitura, 1612; Turbo, 1615; Menippus sive inanitatium nostrarum speculum, 1618; Mythologia Christiana and Christianapolis, 1619; Apapraditus, 1631; Theophilus, 1649, etc. They contain, on the one side, a deep love of the Christian ideals, and a strong enthusiasm for their realization in practical life, and, on the other side, a humorous and sarcastic polemic against the dead scholasticism and barren dogmatism of the Lutheran theology of his time. See the article on ROSICRUCIANS; his Autobiography, edited in Latin by Rheinwald, 1849, and in German by Seybold, 1799; HOSSBACH: Andræ und sein Zeitalter, 1819. V. FR. OEHLER published translations of two of his works, Theophilus and Der christliche Bürger. Heilbronn, 1878, 2 vols.

ANDREÆ, Abraham, a native of Angermannland, Sweden, the son-in-law of Laurentius Petri; came in conflict with King John, who wished to restore the Roman-Catholic Church in Sweden, and was compelled to flee to Germany in 1580, but was elected Archbishop of Upsala by the Swedish clergy immediately after the death of King John (in 1593), and confirmed by King Sigismund. He afterwards aroused the suspicion of Duke Charles, regent of Sweden, who imprisoned him in the castle of Gripsholm, where he died in 1607. During his residence in Germany he partook in the theological controversies of the day, and wrote, among other works, Forum Adiphororum, Wittenberg, 1587.

ANDREAS CRETENSIS, b. at Damascus, spent some time in Jerusalem, so he is sometimes styled ἱεροσολυμίτης; was sent by Bishop Theodore of Jerusalem to the Sixth Council of Constantinople (680); was ordained a deacon there, and made guardian of orphans, and became finally Archbishop of Crete. His works, consisting of homilies, canons, and hymns (of which several became very celebrated, and are still sung in the Greek Church), were edited by COMBESIS, Paris, 1644; by GALLAND: Bibl. Patr. XIII., 689; and by MIGNE, Patrol. XCVII.

ANDREAS, Bishop of Cæsarea in Cappadocia, wrote towards the close of the fifth century a commentary on the Book of Revelation. Nothing more is known of his life. Of his work, a Latin translation by Peltanus was published at Ingolstadt, 1574, but the Greek text not until 1596, at Heidelberg, by Sylburg. It was afterwards several times printed together with the commentary by Arethas, which see. SMITH & WACE: Christ. Biogr. I.

ANDREAS OF CRAIN, a singular phenomenon among the predecessors of the Reformation, though, properly speaking, not one of them himself; was a Slavonian by birth; entered the order of the Dominicans, and was made Archbishop of Carniola by the emperor, Friedrich III.; in 1482 he repaired to Switzerland, and was very active to get a new general council convened at Basel. With letters of recommendation from Bern, he addressed himself to the magistrates of Basel, and after delivering a pompous speech in the cathedral, in which he did not conceal his animosity against Pope Sixtus IV., he nailed, on July 21, a formal arraignment of the pope on the doors of the cathedral, accompanying it with a demand for a general council. The pope excommunicated him, and put the city under the interdict; and finally Andreas was arrested by the local authorities, and placed in a prison, where, on Nov. 13, 1484, he was found strangled, he having probably committed suicide. His death was kept secret for some time. His corpse was put in a barrel, and thrown into the Rhine. His own secretary, Peter Numagen of Treves, considered him crazy (cerebro læsus). See Gesta Archiepiscopi Craymensis in J. H. HOTTINGER: Hist. Eccles., pp. 403-412.

ANDREWES, Lancelot, b. in London, 1565; d. at Winchester, Sept. 25, 1626; was educated in Pembroke Hall, Cambridge, of which he afterwards became master; was appointed chaplain to the queen, and Dean of Westminster, by Elizabeth, and by James, Bishop of Chichester in 1605, of Ely in 1609, and of Winchester in 1618. He was a man of great learning and fervent devotion, and enjoyed reputation, both as a theologian and as a preacher. He was a member of the Hampton Court Conference (1604), at which the present authorized version was proposed, and was appointed head of the first company of translators to whom were assigned the books of the Old Testament as far as 2 Kings. He published ninety-six sermons, of which an edition in five volumes was given in the Anglo-Catholic Library, Oxford, 1841-43; wrote Tortura Torti, 1609, against Bellarmine, who had attacked King James's Defence of the Rights of Kings; Preces Privatee (in Greek and Latin, translated by Dean Stanhope, London, 1826); The Pattern of Catechistical Doctrine (an exposition of the Ten Commandments), 3d ed., London, 1675, modern ed., Oxford, 1846, etc. See ISAACSON: Life of Bishop Andrewes (in Fuller's Abel Redevivus, ed. Nichols, London, 1867, 2 vols.); CASSAN: Lives of the Bishops of Winchester, London, 1826.

ANGARIAE. See FASTS.

ANGELA MERICI, also called Angela of Brescia, b. at Desenzano, on Lake Garda, March 21, 1470; d. at Brescia, Jan. 27, 1540; felt herself from early youth drawn towards a life of solitude and devotion, and entered a Franciscan convent, but returned afterwards to the world, and began to teach small children, in which she succeeded so well that she was called for the same purpose to Brescia, where she spent the rest of her life.

On Nov. 25, 1535, in the Church of St. Afra, in Brescia, she and eleven other maidens formed an association, under the patronage of St. Ursula, for the purpose of teaching small children, aiding the poor, and nursing the sick. It was originally not a strictly religious order (the members made no vows, did not live together, adopted no common dress, etc.); but it soon developed in that direction. On March 16, 1537, the number of members had increased to seventy-six, and Angela was elected superior. In 1544 the order was confirmed by Paul III. See URSULINES; Das Leben d. h. Angela Merici, Augsburg, 1811, and M. SINTZEL: Leben d. h. Angela; Regensburg, 1842.

ANGELIC ORDER, The, also called the Guastillines, was founded (in 1530) by the Countess Torelli of Guastalla, who at that time was twenty-five years old, and widow for the second time. The order was destined for maidens who should live in angelic purity (whence the name), and was confirmed in 1534 by Paul III., on the rules of St. Augustine. It was exempt from episcopal jurisdiction, but subordinate to the Barnabites of Milan, in which city it had its first house. In the beginning the nuns accompanied the Barnabites on their missions; but in spite of the coarse garment, the wooden cross on the bosom, the hempen string around the neck, to which was sometimes added a crown of thorn, the easy manners of the nuns gave offence, and in many places the order was dissolved. The cure for the scandals was found in giving up the joint missions, and secluding the nuns.

ANGELIS, Girolamo, b. at Castro Giovanni, Sicily, in 1567; d. in Japan, Dec. 4, 1623; entered the order of the Jesuits in 1585, and went in 1602 to Japan. When in 1614 the Jesuits were expelled from that country, Angelis remained, disguised in Japanese dress, and was not discovered until after the lapse of nine years, when he was imprisoned, and burnt alive. His Relazione del Regno di Yezo was published in Rome, 1625. He was canonized by Pope Pius IX.

ANGELS, Biblical. The commonest name in the Old Testament for these creatures who are represented, in prophetic vision and poetic fancy, as surrounding the throne of God, is "the sons of God," which brings out their near relationship to their Creator (Job i. 6, xxxviii. 7; Dan. iii. 25; Ps. xxix. 1, lxxxix. 6). They had other names, "the saints" (Job v. 1; Ps. lxxxix. 5, 7; Dan. viii. 13); in Jewish theology, "the family above" (cf. Eph. iii. 15); in the Septuagint, in several places, two of which are cited in the New Testament (Heb. i. 6, ii. 7), elohim, "gods:" nevertheless a sharp distinction is drawn between them and God, to whom they pray; but they are not prayed to by any creature. The Epistle to the Hebrews (i. 14) designates them "spirits;" but the Old Testament does not recognize any such epithet.

Before the exile they were not known by name, save those called in general cherubim and seraphim; but they properly form a class by themselves. Angels bore a human figure, and to paint them with wings is erroneous, but is derived from the false rendering of the Vulgate (cito volans) in Dan. ix. 21. The assertion that angels are mere personifications of natural powers is answered by saying that it is not God in nature, but God in history, whom they assist. And this idea dominates in every part of the Bible; and thus the further idea, that the salvation of man must be accomplished by some being, holy, and related to God, was instilled.

The so-called "angel of Jehovah" first appears Gen. xvi. 7, and often afterwards, but must be distinguished from the "angel of Jehovah" spoken of 2 Sam. xxiv. 16; 2 Kings xix. 35, who was evidently a creature; whereas the way in which the "angel of Jehovah" is spoken of in the other passages, as in the Pentateuch, Joshua, and Judges, raises a question in regard to his nature. A fair interpretation of Scripture does, however, compel the creature-view of this being; for, as he was the same who appeared in the visions of Zechariah (i. 12, iii. 1), he is plainly distinguished from Jehovah, and subordinated to him. And so the "angel of the covenant" (Mal. iii. 1) is not identical with the Lord, but is his messenger. This angel is called God's "presence" or face (Exod. xxxiii. 14); not, however, that dreadful face on which no one, not even Moses (Exod. xxxiii. 20) and Elijah (1 Kings xix. 13), could gaze, but rather an angel who revealed that face (Gen. xxxii. 30); who was called Jehovah and Elohim and Eli, i. e., God (Gen. xviii. 33, xxxii. 24 sq. cf. xxxi. 13), because God's "name" was in him (Exod. xxxiii. 21), but who yet is as little God as the angel who declared "I am Alpha and Omega" (Rev. xxii. 13), and yet rebuked John for worshipping him (xxii. 9). The angel of Jehovah calls himself the "Captain of the Lord's host" (Josh. v. 14, 15 cf. Exod. iii. 5).

In the term the "angel of the presence" (which can mean either the angel in whom Jehovah allows himself to be seen, or the angel who sees Jehovah's face) may be found the connecting link between the primitive simple conception of angels and the later idea of an heavenly hierarchy, i. e., a division not only according to quality, but according to rank. The post-exilian writings, both canonical and uncanonical, exhibit this altered view. Thus in Dan. vii. 10 we read: "Thousand thousands ministered unto him, and ten thousand times ten thousand stood before him." At their head were princes, of whom Michael, the protector of Israel, was chief (x. 13, 21, xii. 1), and at his side was Gabriel (viii. 16, ix. 21). Going into the region of fiction and mere earthly wisdom, we find that the later Jewish theology made seven archangels; chief of them were Michael, Gabriel, Raphael (Tob. iii. 17), and Uriel (Enoch and 2 Esd. iv. 1, 36). But here is an unquestionable derivation from the Persian doctrine of the seven Amesha Spenta; and in the Babylonian theology there are "great Lords" who adore the Divinity by prostrating themselves. See Schrader, Höllenfahrt der Istar, p. 100; Lenormant, Etudes accadiennes II. 1, p. 140. The latter explains the words "great lords" by "celestial archangels."

In Daniel we read of angels who are the protectors of particular peoples (cf. Sirach xvii. 17 also Ps. xxxiv. 7); in Tobit, of the archangel Raphael accompanying Tobias; in the Epistle of Jude (9), of Michael contending with Satan about the body of Moses: but the idea of guardian angels cannot be deduced from Scripture; for Matt. xviii. 10 is inconclusive, and Acts xiii. 15 gives only a popular opinion. The "morning stars" (i.e., the stars of the morning of creation) and the "sons of God" (i.e., angels) are classed together in Job xxxviii. 7. The phrase the "host of heaven" is applied both to the stars and to the angels (cf. Deut. xvii. 3; 1 Kings xxii. 19).

But, besides the good and favored, there are bad and cursed angels. Chief is Satan, who is mentioned, it is true, in only four canonical books of the Old Testament, 1 Chronicles, Job, Zechariah, and once in the Psalms (cix. 6), and in none with any reference to the fall, but strangely enough in heaven, among the sons of God. The serpent of Gen. iii. is identified with him by Paul (2 Cor. xi. 3), but not by Moses; nor is there any explanation of how he came to be there: the general impression simply is, that sin existed before the creation of man. According to the Hebrew conception, idolatry was demon worship (cf. 1 Cor. x. 20, 21), because the Hebrews called the idols a name corresponding to demon. Bad angels in the biblical sense are not always morally bad. Thus the spirit of madness which came over Saul is called an evil spirit (1 Sam. xix. 9); and evil angels are said to have plagued Egypt (Ps. lxxviii. 49). Job and Paul (2 Cor. xii. 7) both testify that God sends morally bad angels to test and torment the righteous, and morally good angels to punish the wicked.

Angels have played a prominent part in the world's providential history. They were the ministrators of the law, the heralds of the gospel, the servants of the saints (Heb. i. 14). Two of them led Lot and his daughters out of Sodom (Gen. xix. 17); many of them swarmed about the little city in which a prophet was (2 Kings vi. 17). They were commissioned to announce to a childless wife the birth of a son (Judg. xiii. 3 sq.), and, much more remarkable, to tell a virgin that she should be overshadowed by the power of the Highest, and be the mother of the Son of God (Luke i. 35). And if any would learn how different the Bible treatment of angels is from the fanciful and exaggerated ideas of the rabbins, consult such a book as Brecher's Transcendentale Magie im Talmud, 1850. — See CHERUB, and the art. Engel by Franz Delitzsch, in Riehm's Handwörterbuch des biblischen Altertums.

Art. ANGEL in Encyclopædia Britannica (9th ed.) by W. Robertson Smith, provoked much discussion and adverse criticism. The various treatises on biblical theology and theology in general may be consulted, especially that of Martensen.

ANGEL OF THE CHURCH (Rev. ii. 1 etc.) is the presiding elder of the city, an office which eventually developed into the episcopate. These officers, as rulers and teachers of their congregations, would naturally be the recipients of such messages as the Saviour should send. They are with propriety called "angels," "messengers," because by them the word of life is conveyed. The Roman-Catholic and Anglican view is, that these officers were really and fully bishops in the present sense of the term, and in proof is advanced (1) the analogy of Gal. i. 8, iv. 14; (2) their representative position toward the several churches; (3) the fact (?) that John appointed bishops in the cities of this very region; (4) the current interpretation of the term from very early times, as by Augustine (Ep. 43, c. 8, § 22 in Migne, tom. II., col. 170), Jerome and Ambrose. Other views, are that the angel of the church was (1) really an angel; (2) corresponded to the deputy of the synagogue; (3) figurative personifications of the churches themselves. See, for discussion of this interesting point, SCHAFF: Hist. Apost. Ch., pp. 537-541.

ANGELS AND ARCHANGELS IN CHRISTIAN ART. The earliest Christian representation of angels dates from before the fourth century: afterwards they were very common. On the various monuments which have been preserved, we see that these attributes were popularly given to them in early ages. 1. The human form, masculine (the sex of most dignity and power). 2. Wings, representing their ability to ascend or descend, or to move very swiftly. This representation is found in other religions, e.g., Assyrian, Egyptian, Greek, and Roman. 3. Clothing, before seventh century, white; later colored, red and blue. 4. The nimbus. 5. In the first eight centuries it was exceptional to portray angels with any thing in their hands: but archangels, later on, held swords and spears, and other angels often carried musical instruments. Four archangels are named Michael, Gabriel, Raphael, Uriel. See art. "Angels and Archangels" in SMITH and CHEETHAM: Dictionary of Christian Antiquities.

ANGILBERT, St., a Frank of noble extraction, was the friend and counsellor of Charlemagne, and was used by him in many difficult negotiations. By Bertha, the daughter of Charlemagne, he was father to Nithard and several other sons. In 790 he retired from public life to the Convent of Centule, the present St. Riquier, of which he became abbot in 794. He wrote a history of the abbey, and several poetical works, on account of which he was styled the Homer of his time. D. Feb. 18, 814. See Act. Sanct., Feb. 18.

ANGILRAM, Bishop of Metz, 768, arch-chaplain to Charlemagne, 784, since 787 styled archbishop (d. 791), has in some unaccountable manner got his name entangled with the Pseudo-Isidorian decretals, most codices of which contain a minor collection of statutes, consisting of seventy-one or seventy-two or eighty chapters relating to suits against clergymen, especially against bishops, and generally bearing the name of Capitula Angilramni. The introduction to these capitula tells, in some manuscripts, that Angilram presented them to Pope Adrian; in others, that the pope presented them to Angilram. But in either of these versions the story is very improbable. In the controversy between Hincmar of Rheims and Hincmar of Laon, the collection is quoted by both as Capitula Hadriani, not Angilramni, and in the earliest works on canon law, such as those by Burchard of Worms and Gratian, it bears the same name. It is most probable that Angilram has had nothing at all to do with these capitula, but that they were written by the author of the Pseudo-Isidorian decretals himself. See PSEUDO-ISIDOR DECRETALS; HINSCHIUS: Decretales Pseudo-Isid., Leipzig, 1863.

ANGLO-SAXONS, their Conversion to Christianity. When Christianity was introduced to England is unknown: certain it is that it took root among the old Britains in the second or third century, and that it was suppressed but not destroyed by the Anglo-Saxons, who invaded the island in the sixth century, and introduced by force their own worship of Odin. The British Christians were powerless to labor among their fierce and hated conquerors. They retreated before them; and where the light of the gospel had shone there were the lurid fires of superstition. To Gregory the Great belongs the credit, under God, of converting the Anglo-Saxons; for he sent out Augustine (d. 605: see title), the first Archbishop of Canterbury, who landed on the Isle of Thanet, 596, and in 597 restored to its original worship the old Christian Church of St. Salvador in Kent, by permission of Ethelbert the converted king. In 600 the bishopric of Rochester was founded. As in Kent, so in Essex, royal women played a prominent part. The king, who was a nephew of the King of Kent, after his baptism, granted to Mellitus, whom Augustine had nominated bishop, the old Diana temple in his capital, London, with a large plot of ground, for a Christian cathedral. The faith thus established remained in these places during the reigns of Pagan princes, although persecution drove out the bishops, and upset their altars. In Northumberland, Eadwin, induced by the entreaties of his Christian wife from Kent, and by the cajoleries and presents of Pope Boniface V., allowed Bishop Paulinus to carry on missionary labors. Meanwhile he studied the Christian system for himself, was at length converted, and solemnly renounced the Pagan gods, in the National Council, in the presence of his chieftains (627). St. Peters in York was chosen for the cathedral, and Paulinus the bishop. In East Anglia Sigedes (d. 635) introduced Christianity, to which he was converted in France. Oswald, King of Northumberland, in 635 introduced Christianity in its Scotch form, and made Lindisfern a bishopric (which did not come under Roman jurisdiction until 664). About the same time Pope Honorius sent Birinus to make himself a bishopric by earning it out of the Pagan English. Eynegil, King of Wessex, was baptized by him, and the Bishopric of Dorchester erected (635); then came Winchester (660) and Sherburne (703).

Fifty years were destined to pass ere heathenism was supplanted in the Southern Saxons. As yet Mercia held out for heathenism. Penda the king considered himself the invincible champion of Paganism, but his hour came. In the great battle at Leeds he was defeated and killed, and his kingdom thrown open to the gospel. As has been noticed, the conversion to Christianity was by the mass rather than by the individual. If the king went, his whole people followed: hence the baptisms were by thousands at a time. There seem to have been no compulsory measures, either to advance or to retard the new faith. While these conversions were going on, the Scotch missionaries came into Northumberland and Mercia, preaching the doctrine of Columba; but differences in the young church were averted by King Oswin's prompt calling of a synod at Streaneshalch (Sinus Phari, Whitby) in Yorkshire (664), which decided in favor of the Roman form of faith and worship. This settled the matter. England was a part of the Roman Universal Church: the pope was her spiritual head. Hitherto, as Kemble says, there had been churches in England; but henceforth there was only one. But Rome was not able to make the sturdy Anglo-Saxons her faithful sons in all things. Down to the Norman invasion Anglo-Saxon was the ecclesiastical language; the baptismal form was Anglo-Saxon; the Bible existed in Anglo-Saxon; and in the vulgar tongue homilies were circulated. Papal supremacy, canon law, ecclesiastical celibacy, was not recognized. On the other hand, the Anglo-Saxon kings and nobles vied with each other in building monasteries and abbeys; and the longing for holy quiet was found among this class as nowhere else. They also were fond of going upon long, toilsome pilgrimages, true to the Norse blood which flowed in their veins. To these days before the Norman Conquest, which so completely revolutionized the Church, and made it a limb of the body of Rome, without any independence, belongs the first foreign missionary enterprise of English Christianity. Bishop Wilfrid (d. 709, æt. seventy-six) has the high honor of being the first to set such work on foot; for he sent the gospel to Friesland. See AUGUSTINE (Archbishop of Canterbury) ENGLAND, CHURCH OF. C. SCHÖLL.

ANGLUS, Thomas, whose true name was Thomas White, but who also called himself Albus, Albius, Candidus, Bianchi, etc., was born in England in 1582, but spent most of his time on the Continent, as teacher in the Roman-Catholic seminaries for Englishmen in Lisbon, Douay, Paris, and Rome, and wrote against Descartes, the Molinists, the Jansenists, etc. Among his philosophical works are De Mundo, Paris, 1642; Institutiones Peripateticæ, Lyons, 1648; Institutiones Theologicæ, 1652. D. 1676.

ANICETUS, Bishop of Rome, succeeded Pius I., and occupied the papal chair from 157 to 168, according to Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. IV. 11, 19). About 160 Polycarp came to Rome, and one of the questions discussed by him and Anicetus was the difference between the Church of Rome and that of Asia Minor with respect to the celebration of Easter. No agreement was arrived at, but no discord ensued. Polycarp celebrated Easter in Rome according to the traditions of his Church (Eus. Hist. Eccl. IV. 24). Anastasius Bibliothecarius tells that Anicetus introduced the tonsure as a rule for all clergymen; and Isidorus Mercator gives a letter from him to that end, but the letter is evidently spurious. The Roman Church commemorates him as a saint on April 17.

ANIMALS. I. Regulations respecting Clean and Unclean.—1. For Food. According to the lists (Lev. xi. 1-31, 46; Deut. xiv. 1-19), the clean animals (i.e., those whose flesh could be eaten) were ruminant quadrupeds which parted the hoof, were cloven-footed, and chewed the cud; aquatic animals that had fins and scales; all birds except the nineteen species specified; only those flying insects, which, like the grasshopper, have two long legs for leaping. No vermin was clean, nor was the carcass of any clean animal, if it had died naturally, or been torn to death. Every thing was unclean that touched the unclean: so was the kid seethed in its mother's milk, the heathen sacrifices in all their parts. The object of this regulation was to separate the Hebrews from all peoples (Lev. xxii. 24-26), and daily remind them of their separation. But this was accomplished, not by the mere fact that they made the separation (because heathen nations did that), but by the strenuous prohibition of all that concerned idolatrous worship. We find, in natural aversion to certain kinds of animals, the rationale of this division of them into two classes, and of its wide spread. The Jew of the present day shows most prominently his aversion to swine's flesh. In this he is true to the traditions of his race, who, in the days of the Maccabees, died rather than defile themselves by eating the swine (1 Macc. i. 47, cf. ver. 63; 2 Macc. vi. 18, 19, vii. 1).

Christianity has abrogated these regulations, inasmuch as it sets forth cleanliness of heart as the desirable thing. So spake Jesus (Matt. xv. 11, 17-20). Peter by a vision was instructed in the essential cleanliness of all God's creatures (Acts x. 11-16). Paul expresses himself clearly upon this point (Rom. xiv. ; Col. ii. 16; Tit. i. 15; so Heb. xiii. 9). It was, however, a partial return to the old Jewish law when the apostolic council in Jerusalem put among the "necessary things" that the Gentile converts abstain "from blood and from things strangled," putting these on a par with "meats offered to idols," and with "fornication" (Acts xv.). Thus the council imposed the same things as the law for proselytes of the gate (cf. 1 Cor. viii. 1 sq., x. 19 sq.; Rev. ii. 14, 20, 24).

2. For Sacrifice. The general rule was, that only the clean animals could be offered: this dates back to the pre-Mosaic period (Gen. viii. 20). Asses, camels, and horses were not offered by the Hebrews. But only the tame among even the clean animals could be sacrificed: therefore, no animal of the chase. Doves might seem to be an exception; but they were so generally used as food by the poor, and were so easily caught, that they were not regarded as wild. Every animal offered must be without blemish (Lev. xxii. 20), at least seven days old (ver. 27; Exod. xxii. 30), because too young flesh is disgusting, and therefore unclean. Nor must it be too old: for bovines three years, for small cattle one, was usual (Exod. xxix. 38; Lev. ix. 3; Num. xxviii. 9; Lev. i. 5, "bullock," a young ox). What man would not eat, it was an insult to sacrifice.

3. The Moral Aspect. Animals shared in the consequences of the fall. Instead of being man's friend, many became his enemy, and in regard to all he was obliged to cultivate their friendship. The apostle Paul has been supposed by many to refer to a desire on the part of the brute creation for a restoration to their original condition, when he says that "the earnest expectation of the creation waiteth for the revealing of the sons of God. . . . For we know that the whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain together until now" (Rom. viii. 19, 22). To a like purpose has the beautiful description of Isaiah (xi. and lxxv. 25), of the docility and tameness of all animals in the day of the Messiah, been adduced.

But it is a question how far this idea of the participation of the animal kingdom in the Fall on the one hand and the Restoration on the other, should be pushed. Certainly the dominant scriptural conception is, that the dumb animals occupy a passive position in morals. They are acted upon, and do not act. Thus, in cases of unnatural lust, the beast was killed, as well as the human being. But the beast had done no wrong: it was its being used for such a purpose that rendered it unclean and by imputation guilty (Lev. xx. 15, 16). The law inculcated great kindness towards the lower animals. Man was placed at their head (Gen. i. 26, 28). It was declared to be like God to be humane (Prov. xii. 10, cf. 1 Cor. ix. 9). The same spirit showed itself in the order to give the beasts a weekly rest (Gen. xx. 10, xxiii. 12), and in the prohibition to muzzle the ox when he trod out the corn (Deut. xxv. 4). And how tender is this: "And whether it be cow or ewe, ye shall not kill it and her young both in one day" (Lev. xxii. 28). Ritualistic rather than moral considerations forbade the spanning of different species of animals (Deut. xxii. 10); but the two were combined in the law against castration (Lev. xxii. 24 "and this ye shall not do in your land." Heb. text).

II. The Emblematic Use of Animals in the Bible and the Church.—1. In the Old Testament, locusts were used as the symbol of the divine judgments. "Scorpion" was the name given to a kind of whip (1 Kings xii. 11). The cherubim were used in ornamentation of sacred places. Thus at divine command a pair were placed on the mercy-seat (Exod. xxv. 18 sq.) in the tabernacle, and a larger pair standing on the floor of the Holy of holies in Solomon's temple (1 Kings vi. 23). They were also blazoned on the doors, walls, curtains, etc., of the tabernacle and temple. They were composite figures of man, lion, ox, and eagle. See CHERUBIM. Besides them there were the twelve oxen which bore the brazen sea in the court of the temple (1 Kings vii. 25); also in prophetic vision animal shapes appeared (Ezek. i. 10, x. 4).

2. In the New Testament Peter uses a lion as the emblem of Satan (1 Pet. v. 8): on the other hand, a lion is the emblem of Christ (Rev. v. 5). The ass symbolizes peace (Matt. xxi. 5); the dove, innocence and the Holy Ghost; the swine, uncleanness and vulgarity (Matt. vii. 6; 2 Pet. ii. 22). But the emblematic use of beasts is much greater in the Revelation than in all the other books of the Bible combined. Constant mention is made of the four living creatures (iv. 6, etc.), who were from the fifth century considered as symbolizing the four evangelists. Christ is constantly called the Lamb; the Devil, the dragon (xii. 3, etc.). There are, besides, a beast who comes out of the bottomless pit (xi. 7), horses (vi. 2, etc.), locusts (ix. 3), birds (xix. 17), and frogs (xvi. 13).

3. The ecclesiastical use of animals was very great and varied. There was not only the lamb for Christ, but also dolphins, hens, pelicans, apes, and centaurs. The dragon appeared as, for instance, the opponent of St. George. The old Gothic churches exhibit these fanciful and really heathen designs. Bernard of Clairvaux raised his voice against them. In the catacombs one finds the drawing of a fish to symbolize Christ, because the initials of the title of Christ Ἰησοῦς Χριστὸς Θεοῦ Υἱὸς Σωτῆρ spell the Greek word for fish ΙΧΘΥΣ.

III. The Use of Emblematic Animals in Worship.

— 1. Among the Hebrews there are two spoken of. The brazen serpent which Moses made, which was at last destroyed by Hezekiah, because it was worshipped (2 Kings xviii. 4). The golden calf, a direct imitation of Egyptian worship, was not intended as a substitute for the Jehovah worship, but as an aid; but it became a snare to Israel in the wilderness before Sinai (Exod. xxxii.), and in the days of Jeroboam I. and his successors on the throne of Israel (1 Kings xii. 28). Among the neighboring people there was an idolatrous worship, and this the Hebrews copied. Thus at length they served heathen divinities under various animal forms, without the apology of a Jehovistic meaning. The Jews were falsely accused of worshipping an ass's head. Josephus c. Apion II. 7. See ASINARI.

But all the nations around Judah were led into this worship of animals. The Egyptians worshipped the crocodile, the cat, the wolf, the dog, the ape, the goat, the sheep, the beetle, and also the lion, and other animals. The Assyrians had the eagle-headed god Nisroch, and used very extensively drawings and figures of animals, but probably not idolatrously. So at all events it was with the Persians. They divided animals into two classes, religio-morally good or bad: e.g., the unicorn, the hen, the dog, the ox were holy to Ormuzd, who himself appeared sometimes as an eagle, sometimes as a hawk. The head of the unclean animals was the dragon, the emblem of Ahriman, the darkness. J. G. MÜLLER.

ANNA, St., the mother of the Holy Virgin, was, according to the tradition of the ancient church, a native of Bethlehem and a daughter of the priest Matthan. She had two sisters, both married in Bethlehem, of whom one was the mother of Elisabeth and the grandmother of John the Baptist. Anna married Joachim of the tribe of Juda. They settled at Nazareth, and their lives are told with great elaborateness in the Evangelium de Nativitate Mariæ and in Protevan-gelium Jacobi. According to another account, Joachim died soon after the birth of Maria, and Anna then married, first, Cleophas, to whom she bore Maria, the wife of Alphæus, and, next, Salome, the wife of Zebedæus. But Jerome and Augustine doubted these statements. In the Greek Church the worship of St. Anna originated in the fourth century, and traces of it are found in Gregory of Nyssa and Epiphanius (Hæres. 78, 79). It becomes prominent in the homilies of the monk Antiochus, in the Encomium of St. Joachim and St. Anna by Cosmas Vestitor, and especially with Johannes Damascenus in his De Fid. Orth., IV., 14, in his Orat. de Dormit. B. Mariæ, and in his Orat. I. and II. in Nativ. Mariæ. Greek hymns in her honor are preserved in Lambecius: Comm. de Biblioth. Vindob., I. III., p. 207, and Andreas Cretensis: Hymni Sacri. In 550 the emperor Justinian dedicated a church to her in Constantinople; and not only the day of her death (July 25), but also that of her wedding and of her conception (Sept. 9 and Dec. 9), are celebrated. In the Western Church, Pope Leo III. had in the eighth century the history of St. Joachim and St. Anna painted in the basilica of San Paolo; and in 1584 Pope Gregory XIII. ordered that a double mass should be said in honor of St. Anna in all churches on July 26. In Spain she became very popular, especially through the exertions of the Augustine nun Anna, a pupil of St. Theresa; also in Italy, where the Minorite monk, Innocent of Clusa, surnamed Annæus, wrought many miracles by the aid of St. Anna: indeed, in the seventeenth century an Italian writer, Imperialis, even applied to her the idea of an immaculate conception; but his doctrines were condemned by the pope. See Acta Sanctor. Vit. e. comment. Cuperi, Tom. VI., Jul., p. 233. ZÖCKLER.

ANNAS, whom Josephus calls Ἀνανῆς, one of the chiefs of the Jewish people at the time of the public ministry of Jesus (Luke iii. 2; John xviii. 13), was the son of Seth, and was high priest during the taking of the census by Quirinius (A. D. 6), but deposed by the procurator Valerius Gratus (Joseph. Antiq., 18. 2, 1 and 2). Afterwards he exercised great influence, for five of his sons were high priests. Annas, and Caiaphas his son-in-law, were contemporary chiefs, the former as president of the Sanhedrin, the latter as high priest. There is no difficulty in understanding Luke's term ἀρχιερεὺς (Luke iii. 2), which in itself is ambiguous, of the president of the Sanhedrin, for he regularly uses it in this sense in the Acts (Acts v. 21, 27, vii. 1, ix. 1, xx. 5, xxiii. 2, 4, xxiv. 1). The word only occurs once in the LXX. (Lev. iv. 3; the common term, like the Hebrew, being ὁ ἱερεὺς or ὁ ἱερεὺς μέγας), and is used by Josephus, as in the New Testament, of the head of the temple priests as well as of the not necessarily identical person, the president of the Sanhedrin; for Ezra is called (in 1 Esd. ix. 40) ὁ ἀρχιερεὺς. K. WIESELER.

ANNATS. See TAXES, ECCLESIASTICAL.

ANNIHILATIONISM denotes a theory according to which the everlasting punishment of the wicked consists in utter destruction, annihilation. The theory has never been adopted as part of any denominational creed; but individually its many subtle points, psychological and theological, have found very able advocates, such as RICHARD WHATELY: A View of the Scripture Revelations concerning a Future State, London, 1832; and HUDSON: Debt and Grace as related to the Doctrine of a Future State, Boston, 1857; and recently, perhaps its ablest expositor in Rev. Edward White, an English clergyman, whose Life in Christ (first edition, London, 1875; third edition, 1878) has not only sold largely, but made many converts.

ANNIVERSARIUS (sc. dies). From the second century it became usual in Christian congregations to celebrate the death-days of their martyrs with divine service. Also single families used to commemorate their departed members on their death-days. Thus the festivals of the martyrs and the saints originated, as also those anniversaries for departed members of the congregations which are still held in the Roman-Catholic Church, and consist in masses and alms. As only the rich can avail themselves of this custom, the All-Souls' Day has been instituted for the poor.

ANNI CLERI. Any loan raised for the erection of a church or parsonage must be paid by the succeeding parsons out of their benefices in fixed instalments. This method of payment is called anni cleri.

ANNULUS PISCATORIUS. To the official costume of a Roman-Catholic bishop belongs a ring, which designates his espousals to the church. Also the pope wears such a ring, and one with the device of St. Peter fishing. From the thirteenth century all papal briefs were sealed with red or green wax showing an impression of this device, and for this reason they were said to have been issued sub annulo piscatoris.

ANNUNCIADE is the name of two orders of nuns instituted in honor of the annunciation.—I. The first was founded at Bourges, in 1500, by Jeanne of Valois, the sister of Charles VIII. and the divorced wife of Louis XII. It was also called the Order of the Ten Virtues, with allusion to the ten festivals of the Holy Virgin kept by the Roman Church. At the time of its abolishment, under the Revolution, it numbered forty-five monasteries in France. It still flourishes in the Netherlands.—II. The second, also called the Order of the Cœlestines, was founded in Genoa by the widow Maria Victoria Fornari, and confirmed by Clement VIII. in 1604. Besides in Genoa and Rome, it has also monasteries in France.

ANNUNCIATION, Feast of the, is the ecclesiastical commemoration, upon March 25, of each year of the beginning of the incarnation of the word of God, when in Nazareth the angel Gabriel announced to the Virgin Mary the overshadowing of the Holy Ghost. It is uncertain when the Church began the general celebration of this event. There is a collect for the day in the Sacramentary of Gelasius (A.D. 492) and in that of Gregory the Great (A.D. 590), and a homily exists which was preached upon the day by Proclus, patriarch of Constantinople, in the first half of the fifth century. The Council of Toledo (A.D. 656) appointed the feast for Dec. 18, so that so joyful a feast might not come in Lent, nor so near the date of Christ's death. The Milan Church similarly put it in December, upon the fourth Advent Sunday. But March 25, nine full months before Christmas, is now the date universally assigned. The central figure in the feast is Mary, who humbly, wonderingly, rejoicingly yields herself to be the human mother of the Son of God.

ANNUS CARENTIÆ, the term during which a canon or other prebendary must renounce his revenues in favor of the pope, the bishop, or some ecclesiastical purpose. In some countries a certain per centum is annually paid to an ecclesiastical fund.

ANNUS CLAUSTRALIS, the first year in which a canon holds his benefice, and during which he is bound to be in residence.

ANNUS DECRETORIUS, the year 1624, which by the peace of Westphalia was taken as the basis for the division of German territory between the Roman-Catholic and the Protestant churches.

ANNUS DESERVITUS, or ANNUS GRATIÆ, denotes the term, different in different countries, during which the heirs of an ecclesiastic are entitled to enjoy his revenues after his death.

ANNUS LUCTUS, the year of mourning, in some countries an obstacle to marriage.

ANSEGIS, the abbreviated form of Ansegisil.—I. The elder Ansegis, b. in the latter part of the eighth century, d. at Fontanella, in the diocese of Rouen, July 20, 833; received his first instruction in a cloister-school in the diocese of Lyons; became a monk in the Monastery of Fontanella; and was made Abbot of St. Germain de Flay, in the diocese of Beauvais, in 807. Afterwards he was called to the court of Charlemagne in Aix-la-Chapelle, and made superintendent of all the emperor's architectural undertakings. Also Louis the Pious held him in great favor, and endowed him in 817 with the Abbey of Luxeuil, and in 823 with that of Fontanella, whither he finally withdrew, old and exhausted. In Fontanella he finished his collection of Frankish laws: Libri IV. Capitularium, which in 829 obtained official authority. Most of these capitularia we are able to compare with the original documents; and the comparison shows that Ansegis altered very little in the text,—quite different in this respect from Benedict of Mainz, who, twenty years later on, continued his work, and made arbitrary, not to say fraudulent, alterations. In the ninth century the work was translated into German, and up to the thirteenth century the German kings took an oath on the book as containing the rights of the realm. The best edition is that by Pertz in the first part of his Monumenta Germaniae Legum.—The younger Ansegis became Archbishop of Sens in 871, and was in 876 appointed papal vicar in Gaul and Germany, with right to convoke synods, and act as the representative of the pope in all affairs of the church. At the synod of Ponthion, however, a number of the Frankish bishops refused to acknowledge his authority, and we hear nothing of a real activity from his side as papal vicar. In 877 he seems to have lost the confidence of the pope, as in 878 another papal vicar was appointed. Ansegis died Nov. 25, 882. On his tombstone he is called Primus Gallorum Papa; and up to the fifteenth century the Archbishop of Sens was styled Gallie et Germanie Primas.

P. HINSCHIUS.

ANSELM OF CANTERBURY, b. in 1033, at Aosta in Piedmont; d. at Canterbury, April 21, 1109; the father of mediæval scholasticism, and one of the most eminent English prelates. He belonged to a rich family of old Lombard nobility, but felt himself so strongly drawn towards a life of study and contemplation, that, in spite of his father's protest, he entered the Monastery of Bec, in Normandy, where he studied under the tuition of his celebrated countryman, Lanfranc, and finally took holy orders. In 1063 he was chosen prior, and in 1078, abbot of Bec; and under his guidance and by his teaching the fame of the school of the place steadily increased. In 1093 he was appointed Archbishop of Canterbury; and, though he was a very mild and meek man, he had adopted the Gregorian views of the relation between Church and State, and followed them out in practice with unswerving consistency. Strife soon broke out between him and the king, William Rufus, who exiled him in 1097. Under William's successor, Henry I., he returned; but the strife soon broke out again. Once more he went into exile; and a reconciliation was not brought about until 1106, when the king renounced the right of investiture with ring and staff, and the archbishop consented to take the oath of allegiance for his feudal possessions.

In the history of theology Anselm stands as the father of orthodox scholasticism. He was called the second Augustine. Of the two theological tendencies at that time occupying the field,—the one more free and rational, represented by Berengarius; and the other confining itself more closely to the tradition of the church, and represented by Lanfranc,—he chose the latter; and he defines the object of scholastic theology to be the logical development and dialectical demonstration of the doctrines of the church such as they were handed down through the Fathers. The dogmas of the church are to him identical with revelation itself; and their truth surpasses the conceptions of reason so far, that it seems to him to be mere vanity to doubt a dogma on account of its unintelligibility. Credo ut intelligam, non quæro intelligere ut credam, is the principle on which he proceeds; and after him it has become the principle of all orthodox theology. As a metaphysician he was a Realist; and one of his earliest works, De Fide Trinitatis, was an attack on the Nominalist Roscellin's doctrine of the Holy Trinity. His two most celebrated works are Proslogium, written before 1078, and setting forth the ontological proof of the existence of God, and Cur Deus Homo, finished at Capua in 1098, and developing those views of atonement and satisfaction which still are held by orthodox divines. His Meditationes and Orationes are of an edifying and contemplative character rather than dialectical, but are often very impressive.

LIT.—Collected editions of Anselm's works have been given by JOHANNES PICARDUS, Colon., 1612, and more critically by G. GERBERON, Paris, 1675, which later edition has been reprinted in MIGNE: Patrolog. Tom., 158–59. [Separate editions of Cur Deus Homo were published in Berlin, 1857, and London, 1863. Translations of Cur Deus Homo and Proslogium are found in Bibliotheca Sacra, vols. VIII., IX., and XII.] His life was written by his pupil EADMER. See F. R. HASSE: Anselm von Canterbury, 2 vols., 1843–1852 [Abridged Translation by Rev. W. Turner, London, 1850]; CH. REMUSAT: Anselm de Cantorbéry, Paris, 1853; [Dean R. W. J. L. JACOBI.

ANSELM, Bishop of Havelberg, was sent in 1135, by Lothair II., as ambassador to the court of Constantinople; and here he held a conference with Nicetas, Archbishop of Nicomedia, on the principal points of controversy between the two churches. On his return, in 1145, he visited Rome; and on the suggestion of Pope Eugene III. he wrote down a report of the dispute. In the mean time a learned Greek bishop had come to Rome, sent by the emperor: and the defence which he delivered for the Greek liturgy seemed to have made some impression on the pope; at least, the pope deemed it right that some kind of an answer should be prepared, and for this purpose the above report was published. See D'ARCHERY: Spicilegium I., 161.

ANSELM, St., surnamed Baduarius, because he descended from the family of Badagio; b. in Milan, 1036; d. in Mantua, March 18, 1086; was a nephew of Pope Alexander II., whom he succeeded as Bishop of Lucca in 1061. He soon resigned, however, and retired to the Monastery of Cluny. Gregory VII. ordered him to return to his see; but, being a devoted friend of the pope, the adherents of the emperor expelled him, and he then lived at the court of the Countess Mathilda, until Leo IX. sent him as papal legate to Lombardy. In the conflict between Gregory VII. and Henry IV. he wrote a Defensio pro Gregorio VII. and a pamphlet, Contra Guibertum Anti-papam, which are found in Rouaberti Bibliotheca Pontificia IV. His biography was written by the BOLLANDISTS, March 18, and by ANDREA ROTA, Veron., 1733.

ANSELM OF LAON, or Laudinensis (Laon being his birthplace), studied under Anselm of Canterbury, in the Monastery of Bec; taught from 1076 scholastic theology in Paris, and contributed much to the rising prosperity of that university. Towards the close of the eleventh century he returned to his native city, where he was made archdeacon and scholasticus. In this position he became director of a theological school, which soon was much frequented. Abelard was for some time among his pupils. He was an enthusiastic teacher, and refused several times the episcopal dignity, in order to stay with his school; died 1117. His Glossa interlinearis, a commentary to the Vulgate, written in notes between the lines, formed for a long time, together with the Glossa ordinaria by Walafrid Strabo, the principal source of all exegetical knowledge. It was printed in Basel in 1502 and 1508, and in Antwerp in 1634.

ANSGAR (from Aasgejr or Osgejr, the modern Oscar, "God's spear"), the apostle of Scandinavia, b. Sept. 9, 801, near Corbie in the diocese of Amiens; d. in Bremen, Feb. 3, 865; was educated by Adalhard and Wala in the Monastery of Corbie; moved in 822 with a number of brother-monks to the newly founded Corvey in Westphalia, and accompanied King Harold Klak back to Jutland, in 826, as missionary among the Danes. In 831 the bishopric of Hamburg was founded, and Ansgar was appointed bishop; and in 864 this see was united with that of Bremen, and elevated to an archbishopric,—the metropolitan see of Scandinavia. Ansgar made also two journeys to Sweden; and though in 845 the heathen Danes swept down upon Hamburg, burnt the city, and drove away the missionaries, Christianity, nevertheless, got secure foothold in Denmark before Ansgar died. See RIMBERT: Vita Ansgaris in Pertz: Mon. II.; ADAM OF BREMEN: Gesta Hamb. Eccl. Pont., in PERTZ: Mon. VII.; TAPPEHORN: Leben d. hl. Ansgar, Münster, 1863; and the article DENMARK.

ANSO, a monk and (776-800) abbot of Lobbes, but not also a bishop, as his predecessors had been. In his day the monastery continued independent of the diocese of Liege; but in 889 it was annexed. Anso was a very worthy, zealous man, but no scholar: nevertheless, we owe to his industry while a monk the compilation from the sources of biographies of two of the abbot-bishops who preceded him at Lobbes, the "Vita S. Ursuari" (circa 689-713), which the Bollandists reprinted under April 18, II., also, by Mabillon, Acta Bened. III.; and, later, was re-written by Bishop Ratherius of Verona, and Abbot Folcuin of Lobbes; and the "Vita S. Ermini," or "Erminonis" (713-737), reprinted by the Bollandists under April 25, III., and by Mabillon.

See Histoire littér. de France, IV, 203, for the completest account of him. The Chronicle of Alberich confounds him with Ansegis of Fontanella (see title). MERKEL.

ANTERUS, Bishop of Rome (Nov. 21, 235-Jan. 3, 236), succeeded Pontianus, and suffered, according to one account, martyrdom. Eusebius (Hist. eccl. VI., 29) places him in the time of the Emperor Gordian.

ANTHOLOQUIUM, Ἀνθολόγιον, the name of one of the church-books of the Greek Church, containing the offices for the festivals of the Lord, the Virgin Mary, the principal saints, etc., having been much augmented by successive editors.

ANTHONY, St., the father of monasticism; b. in 251, in the village of Coma, in the neighborhood of Thebais, Egypt; d. in 356, in the mountain-deserts on the border of the Red Sea; belonged to an old and wealthy Coptic family, but gave away all his wealth to the poor, and began to lead an ascetic life in his native village, supporting himself by the labor of his hands. Soon, however, the temptations began; the irrepressible passions of human nature, and perhaps also the allurements of pride, trying to carry him back into the world which he had renounced. In order to conquer, he adopted a still severer manner of life, repairing to a cave, and mortifying his flesh by protracted fasts. But here the temptations reached their highest force. He experienced, Athanasius tells us, bodily ill-treatment from the demons, and was carried back unconscious to the village. Afterwards he lived for ten years in a ruin, then on Mount Colzin near the Red Sea; but, when he finally took up some practical work, this exercised a most beneficial influence on him and saved him. He became the spiritual leader of many ascetics, and the desert around him became peopled with hermits. From distant places men came to him asking his advice, or doing him homage; and it availed him nothing that he moved farther into the desert in order to escape these disturbances. During the persecution of Maximinus he went to Alexandria, and exhorted the Christians to be true to the end. Once more, during the Arian controversy, he visited the Egyptian metropolis, in order to defend orthodoxy; and both times his appearance in the busy world produced the profoundest impression. When he was dying, he ordered that the place of his burial should be kept secret, in order that no idolatrous honor should be shown to his earthly remains. His life was written in 365 by Athanasius, who had known him personally; and, shortly after, the work of Athanasius was translated into Latin by Evagrius, and introduced to the Western Church, where it gave monasticism, if not its first, at all events its most powerful impulse. The authenticity of this work, however, is doubted by H. WEINGARTEN: Der Ursprung des Mönchtums, Gotha, 1877.

ANTHONY, St., Order of. Towards the close of the eleventh century, there raged in France an epidemic (sacer morbus), which people commonly called the "fire of St. Anthony," because they expected aid against the evil from this saint. And when the only son of a rich nobleman, Gaston, in the Dauphiné, was taken ill by this disease (1095), the father went to the Church of S. Didier la Mothe, in which the relics of the saint were said to have been buried, and made a vow, that, if the son recovered, he would give all his wealth to the saint, to be spent in releasing those who suffered from the same disease. The son recovered, and the promise was redeemed. A hospital was built in which the sick were nursed; and the father as well as the son and eight friends devoted themselves to this service. In 1208 this brotherhood of laymen were allowed by Innocent III. to build a church; in 1228 Honorius III. permitted them to take monastic vows; and in 1297 Boniface VIII. confirmed them as regular canons under the rules of St. Augustine. They wore a black garment with a blue T, or the cross of St. Anthony; and when collecting alms they carried a small bell around their necks, thus announcing their arrival. People used to present them each year with a pig, which was consecrated to the saint of the order, probably with reference to the destruction of the herd of swine (Matt. viii. 30-32). The order spread in France, Germany, and Italy, and attained great wealth. The Abbot of St. Antoine, Vienne, was its grand-master. At the time of the Reformation it had degenerated, and the conduct of its members gave occasion to much satire. In the seventeenth century a reform was attempted, but failed. In 1774 the order was united with that of the Malthese, and with the latter it was finally dissolved.

ANTHONY DE DOMINIS (Marco Antonio de Dominis), b. between 1560 and 1570, in the dominion of the Republic of Venice; d. in Rome in 1674; was educated by the Jesuits; entered the order; taught philosophy in various places in Northern Italy; and was appointed Bishop of Segni, in the neighborhood of Rome, in 1596, and two years afterwards Archbishop of Spalatro, and Primate of Dalmatia and Croatia. Disagreeing with the pope, Paul V., concerning the interdict laid on the city of Venice in 1606, suspected of entertaining views somewhat similar to those of Paolo Sarpi, and hated by the Jesuits, from whose order he had been expelled, he went to Rome to defend himself. The Inquisition acquitted him, but did not declare him guiltless; and, provoked by this equivocation, he left Italy, and went to England, explaining in a Latin memoir, published in 1616, that it was the innovations and errors of the Roman popes which drove him out of "Babylon." In England, where he was very flatteringly received by James I., he was converted to Protestantism, joined the Church of England, and was made Dean of Windsor. This apostasy caused a great sensation, the more so, as Anthony now attacked the Roman Church, and various of its doctrines, in a series of learned and brilliant works. In the De Republica Ecclesiastica he denied the primacy of St. Peter and the papal see, and defended the Anglican view of the equality of the bishops with the pope. In his views of the relation between the pope and the various state-governments, he follows closely in the track of his countryman Sarpi, whose history of the Council of Trent he published in London, 1619. Suddenly, however, he left England, disappointed, as it would seem, at not being made Bishop of York; and in Brussels he returned to the Roman Church (1622), and addressed himself to the pope, begging to be forgiven. Having arrived at Rome, he was arraigned before the Inquisition, arrested, and compelled to recant; but he died before the final sentence was spoken (1624), according to which his books and his body were burnt, and their ashes strewn in the Tiber. See NEWLAND: Life of De Dominis, London, 1860.

ANTHONY OF PADUA, b. at Lisbon in 1195; d. at Padua in 1231; the most celebrated of the followers of St. Francis of Assisi; entered, when fifteen years old, the order of the Augustines, but joined afterwards the new order of St. Francis; settled for some time in a monastery near Bologna, and lived there under the severest practices of penitence; studied theology at Vercelli, and taught at Bologna, Toulouse, Montpellier, and Padua, but devoted himself later on exclusively to preaching, in which office he achieved such a success, that even the fishes, it is said, ascended from the waters to hear him. His works have been published as an appendix to those of St. Francis, by L. WADDING, Antwerp, 1623; and by HONOR: Medii ævi bibliotheca patristica, Tom. VI., Paris, 1880.

ANTHONY OF LEBRIJA (Antonius Nebrissen-sis), b. in 1442; d. in 1522; studied at various universities in Spain and Italy; was professor of classical literature, first in Salamanca, and then in Alcalá; assisted since 1508 in the edition of the Complutensian Bible Polyglot; described, as historiographer to Ferdinand and Isabella, two decades of their reign; and published, not un-molested by the Inquisition, but protected by the favor of Cardinal Ximenes, Quinquagena Loco- rum S. Scripturæ, non vulgariter enarratorum, 1520, besides other works.

ANTHROPOMORPHISM (anthropos, man, morphé, form) and ANTHROPOPATHISM (anthropos, man, pathos, passion). These terms designate those views of God which represent him as possessed of human attributes or human passions. Thus the Audians of the fourth and fifth centuries taught that all passages of the Bible which speak of God's hands, ears, eyes, etc., are to be interpreted literally: on the other hand, many philosophers call the conception of God as a personal spirit anthropomorphic. While the Scriptures, rightly interpreted, lend no support to either extreme view, they yet declare that we are made in the image of God, and that therefore He who made us is like us in every pure emotion, and is possessed of all our powers, but not in the same way or measure with ourselves.

ANTHROPOMORPHITES. See AUDIANS.

ANTICHRIST. The word occurs in the New Testament only in the Epistles of John; but the idea—an antitype to the Messiah, a worldly power working against the divine scheme of salvation, the last and greatest enemy which the Saviour of mankind has to defeat—is often referred to in the eschatological discourses of the Gospels (Matt. xxiv. 15 sqq.), in the Epistles of Paul (2 Thess. ii. 3), in Revelation (xvi., xvii.); and it has its roots in the Old Testament (Ezek. xxxviii., xxxix.; Dan. xi.). The idea is apocalyptic in its whole character,—dim, giving only one vague glimpse of what is to happen when the time has come, and yet full of warning, and, by its fitness for application, offering a clew to the meaning of the passing times. Daniel seems to apply it to Antiochus Epiphanes; the Revelation, to Nero.—if the interpretation of the cabalistic figure 666 is correct,—the Christians of the eighth century, to Mohammed; the Reformers, to the pope,—the idea involving the double element of hostility to Christ, and false teaching,—Hengstenberg and his school, to that combination of social radicalism and military despotism which characterized the government of Napoleon III.; Frederic Godet, H. Martensen, and others, to that merely negative liberalism, which, accompanied by an almost cynical sensualism, works in modern civilization as a most baneful agency of demoralization. KÄHLER.

ANTIDICOMARIANITES, or ANTIMARIANS, adversaries of Mary, the mother of the Lord, a sect which flourished in Arabia towards the end of the fourth century, and is specially treated by Epiphanius in the 78th heresy. They taught, that, after the birth of Christ, Mary had borne children to Joseph; and, by a lengthy argument communicated in the above place, Epiphanius endeavors to refute them. They did not separate from the Church, however, but must be considered simply as a re-action against the growing, and by monkish excitement fomented, Mariolatry of the times.

ANTILEGOMENA. See CANON.

ANTIMENSIMUM denotes in the Greek Church the cloth, which, at the beginning of the mass, was spread over the altar. The Greek as well as the Roman Church holds that mass cannot be celebrated except on a consecrated altar (comp. Gregor. Nyss. Opp. Tom. III., p. 369); and as such a consecration cannot be performed except by a bishop, no mass can be celebrated in those churches which as yet have received no episcopal consecration. From this circumstance originated the antimensium, which, in the Greek Church, corresponds to the altare portabile in the Latin. See ALTAR.

ANTINOMIANISM is an exaggeration of that antithesis between faith and works, the gospel and the law, on which the whole Pauline theology is based; faith (the gospel) being emphasized so strongly and one-sidedly, that works (the law) lose their legitimate position in the system of salvation, and assume the aspect of something intrinsically wrong and bad. The first traces of Antinomianism are found in the Gnostic systems, which often dropped the whole moral sphere of human life as something to which a truly spiritual man could and should be entirely indifferent. The opposite extreme is developed by the Roman Church, which ascribes a value to works, the mere actions, in their naked externality, the mechanical observation of the precepts and rites of the law, independently of sentiment, intention, conviction, etc. As a re-action against the Judaizing legalism of the Roman Church, in which the life-principle of the gospel had become entirely lost, the Reformation naturally came to lay much stress upon the faith (the gospel), in contradiction to the works (the law); and with some of Luther's co-workers, especially with Agricola, this tendency developed into rank Antinomianism. He would hear nothing about a moral condition for salvation: the only condition was faith,—faith pure and simple. The first troubles caused by this disagreement between the Reformers were smoothed over by a conference between Agricola and Melancthon at Torgau (1527); but in 1537 the former renewed his attacks, and went so far as to say that "all who had any thing to do with Moses would go to the devil, for Moses ought to be hanged." He was completely refuted by Luther, left Wittenberg, and lived quietly in Berlin until 1562, when a sermon by him on Luke vii. 37-49 again started the controversy. Agricola died in 1566, but others continued the strife for some time. Amsdorf declared that "good works were detrimental to salvation." After the establishment of the Formula Concordiæ (1577), the movement died out, however, in Germany; but Antinomian tendencies became visible, both among the Puritans under Cromwell, and among the Quietists (Madame Guyon). See AGRICOLA, HAWKER. Also FRANK: Theologie der Concordienformel, Erlangen, 1858. NEAL: History of the Puritans. G. PLITT.

ANTIOCH in Syria, the second capital of Christianity, and the third city of the Roman Empire in population (500,000), wealth, and commercial activity, was situated about three hundred miles north of Jerusalem, upon the left bank of the Orontes, and sixteen miles and a half from the Mediterranean. The city lay in a deep pass between the Lebanon and Taurus mountain-ranges. Its founder was Seleucus Nicator, who (B.C. 300) removed thither the inhabitants of Antigonía. In order to distinguish it from fifteen other Antiochs built by the same indefatigable city-builder, who in this way perpetuated his father's name, its common epithets were "Epidaphnes" (near Daphne, the notorious temple and grove), or "on the Orontes." It owed much of its splendor, which was particularly in streets and porticos, to Antiochus Epiphanes and Herod the Great; but all its rulers successively beautified it,—Roman emperor no less than Syrian king. Victorious Pompey made it the seat of the legate of Syria (B.C. 64), and a free city, which further increased its population and prosperity. A mixed multitude inhabited it; and Antioch quickly ranked next to Alexandria, and kept her place for centuries, and this notwithstanding the danger from earthquakes, which several times destroyed the city, and doubtless produced the superstition so common in the place. The most severe of those recorded was A.D. 526, when two hundred and fifty thousand persons are said to have been killed; there being an assembly of Christians at the time. But after each visitation in old times, the city rose, and, helped by its stored-up resources and the liberal donations of the emperors, it again became noted for its beauty. One remarkable feature was an avenue which traversed the city from east to west, a distance of about four miles, and which had two rows of columns forming a covered way on either hand, with an open granite-paved road between. Palaces of imperial and provincial dignities, mansions of wealthy merchants, houses of unpretending folk—all that luxury could suggest and money could buy, Antioch contained. The people were gay, pleasure-loving, and proud. The street-life was wonderfully varied. Every sense was pampered, though every sensibility was shocked. Dancing-women charmed by their grace; adventurers of all sorts amused by their mimicry, or amazed by their skill. There was also much culture, though, for the most part, misdirected. Philosophers, rhetoricians, and poets exposed their intellectual wares: but too often the first excused sin, the second glorified it; while in melodious verse the third class sang the praises of guilty love. Science, of a sort, existed: the stars were studied, principally for their supposed effect upon, or prophecy of, human destiny; animate nature was scanned, in order to find an answer to the questions of future weal or woe.

From its foundation, Jews formed a considerable fraction of its population. Seleucus Nicator put a colony there, and gave them equal privileges with the Greeks (Joseph. Ant., 12. 3. 1.; c. Apion. 2. 4). It is probable, however, that they held their Pagan neighbors in too great disdain to make much exertion to teach them any thing. Yet one of the first deacons was Nicolas, a proselyte of Antioch (A.D. 37), and he could not have been alone. But at the beginning of Christianity the city was put under its direct religious influence; for thither fled some of those whom persecution, after Stephen's death, drove from Jerusalem (Acts xi. 19, 20); and so important was the work there begun, that Barnabas was sent (A.D. 41) to look up Paul, and secure his aid, as a man of wider culture and deeper philosophic insight, in preaching the gospel to those subtle Greeks (Acts xi. 26). The soil was rich. The wisdom-loving multitude heard of the wisdom and love of God. They found refreshment in the gospel's pure water of salvation. Many, "bitter with weariness and sick with sin," listened with faith to the truth, and gladly escaped the defilement of their world through the protection of Christ. Between the mother-church and its daughter there was great intimacy, but by no means agreement: indeed, the first church council was occasioned by the difference between them in regard to the necessity of circumcision (Acts xv.). (See APOSTOLIC COUNCIL.) It was at Antioch that Paul so sternly rebuked Peter's inconsistent conduct (Gal. ii. 11). But for two most important things the world is the debtor to the gay capital,—the Christian name given by the witty populace to distinguish those whom the Jews called the "Nazarenes" from their Jewish kinsmen (see CHRISTIAN, origin of the name), and Christian missions; for from these proceeded Paul and Barnabas on their first missionary journey, and thither they returned (Acts xiii. 1, 4, xiv. 26). Their second tour began there likewise, though they did not go in company (Acts xv. 39, 40); and there ended Paul's second (xviii. 22), and his third began (xviii. 23). After the fall of Jerusalem, the Antiochian Church took the lead in Asia, and ranked with that of Rome, Constantinople, Alexandria, and Jerusalem, as the seat of a patriarch, when the patriarchates were formed in the fifth century. This position it still holds, not only in the Greek, but also in the Latin Church: indeed, in the latter communion there are two patriarchs, so called, for the Greek and Syrian Roman Catholics respectively; for, although they do not reside in the city, they wear the title of "Patriarch of Antioch." The most flourishing period of the Church of Antioch was in Chrysostom's day (b. there 347): then one-half the population, or a hundred thousand, professed the faith. From 252 to 380 ten church councils were there held, several very important, especially in relation to the Arian controversy; for it was a stronghold of the heretics.

From Chrysostom's day dates its decline: even then it was no longer as populous as formerly. In 387 it rebelled against an imperial tax because it was levied in a famine year: in punishment it was deprived of its metropolitan privileges. It never rallied from this blow, although Zeno and Justinian endeavored to restore prosperity. In 635 it fell under the Saracens, was retaken in 969, lost to the Turks 1084, taken by the Crusaders 1098; but since 1268 it has been ruled by the Mohammedans, and completely prostrated. Now it is a miserable, dirty town of six thousand inhabitants. Repeated earthquakes have rendered even the traces of the ancient walls a matter of doubt. Scarcely more than the name, Antakie, reminds the traveller of the once popular, populous, powerful Antioch. But, as the gospel is again taught there in its purity by Protestant missionaries, it has become a religious centre, and may once more send out missions to bless all Asia and the world.

SAMUEL M. JACKSON.

ANTIOCH, SCHOOL OF. This term does not denote an educational institution, like that of the catechetical school of Alexandria, but a theological tendency, which, from Antioch as its centre, spread through the whole Græco-Syrian Church. The presbyter and martyr Lucian (d. 311), who exercised a great influence as a teacher, and his colleague, the presbyter Dorotheus, are generally mentioned as the founders of this school; and the attempts which have been made to carry the date of its origin still farther back have invariably led into uncertainty. There is, however, if not a historical connection, at least a psychological affinity, between Lucian and Paul of Samosata, though the monarchianism of the latter stands on quite another ground than the later Christology of the Antiochian school. But both show, at least in a general way, a tendency to emphasize an absolute distinction between the divine and the human nature in Christ, in opposition to a mystical conception which confounded them; and both are characterized by a certain cool intellectuality, which shrank back from the mystery of the incarnation, and under other circumstances became Arianism. Arius himself, Eusebius of Nicomedia, and Asterius, were disciples of Lucian; and his name was frequently used by the Eusebians as a cover under which they carried out their attempts at mediation. That, however, which most strikingly characterizes Lucian, and truly made him the founder of a new school, is not so much his dogmatical standpoint, as his biblical criticism. In the field of biblical exegesis he started a new principle, directly opposed to the dogmatico-allegorical expositions of the school of Origen, and propagated by a number of able disciples. Arius taught for some time exegesis in the catechetical school of Alexandria, and commented upon the Gospels, the Psalms, and the Epistle to the Romans; but the fragments of his commentaries still extant are ascribed to Asterius. Of the Arian bishop Theodore of Heraclea, it is not known whether he ever received instruction from Lucian; but he belongs, at all events, to that group of men who made historical explanation the basis of exegesis. Of still greater importance is the Semi-Arian bishop Eusebius of Emesa. He was born, like Lucian, in the eastern part of Syria, in the neighborhood of Edessa; studied under Eusebius of Cæsarea, and his exegetical method exercised a decisive influence on Diodore. Also Eustathias of Antioch belongs to the school, not so much on account of his dogmatical standpoint—for he was a staunch adherent of the Council of Nicæa—as because of his exegetical works. His celebrated essay on the witch of Endor, De Engastrimytho, is directly opposed to the exegetical method of Origen. In a more special sense of the word, Diodore of Tarsus may be called the father of the Antiochian school. He was presbyter in Antiochia, and occupied a prominent position as a teacher. Chrysostom and Theodore of Mopsuestia were among his pupils, and the latter became the classical representative of the school. His theology is vigorous and original, a genuine offspring of the old Greek theology, in vital connection with its father, Origen, and emphasizing human freedom, in direct opposition to the Augustinianism of the Latin Church. Both Diodore and Theodore agree with the great Fathers of their time with respect to the Nicene Creed, and contend not only against Arianism, but also against Apollinarism. But, with respect to exegesis, Diodore declares that he prefers the historical to the allegorical; and Theodore pushes his hermeneutical principles still further towards a true grammatico-historical exposition. Also Theodore's brother Polychronius, first monk in the Monastery of St. Zebina, near Kyros, afterwards Bishop of Apamea (d. 430), deserves to be noticed. He was superior to his brother in knowledge of Hebrew and Syriac; and his commentary on Daniel, of which a large fragment has been given by Angelo Mai in Script. Vet. Nova Coll. 1., occupies a prominent place among the exegetical works of the school. See O. BARDENHEWER: Polychronius, Bruder Theodors von M., Freiburg i. Br. 1879. In a practical way, Chrysostom is, of course, the finest fruit which the school produced; but both he and Isidore of Pelusium make concessions to the allegorical method, or do not distinguish sharply between type and allegory. The last representative of the school was the learned and adroit but somewhat wavering Theodoret: his exegesis is, like his dogmatics, a compromise.

ANTIOCHUS is the name of twelve kings of Syria, of whom the following are of interest for sacred literature.—Antiochus II., with the surname θεός, which the Milesians gave him for freeing them from the tyrant Timarchus (261 to 246), was, after a war of eight years with the Egyptian king, Ptolemy II. (Philadelphus), compelled in 249 to accept peace on the conditions that he should divorce his wife and step-sister, Laodice, and marry Berenice, a daughter of Philadelphus. Two years after, Philadelphus died, and Antiochus now took back his first wife. She, however, had not forgotten the slight offered her by the divorce: she poisoned her husband, and had Berenice and her son decapitated. Berenice's brother, Ptolemy III. (Euergetes), hastened to Syria with an army, but came too late to save her. To this unfortunate marriage-connection between the dynasties of the South (Egypt) and the North (Syria) refers the passage in Daniel (xi. 6), and in a general way it is symbolized by the feet of the colossus, half of iron, and half of clay, but unable to stand firmly (Dan. ii. 33, 43).—Antiochus III., the Great (224 to 187), began war with Egypt in 218, but was completely defeated at Raphia, near Gaza, and saved from further loss only by the slovenliness of the Egyptian king, Ptolemy Philopator (Dan. xi. 11). He then turned towards the eastern frontiers of his realm, against Parthia and Bactria; penetrated into Northern India, and organized a formidable army, including a hundred and fifty Indian elephants. In 204 Philopator died; and the Egyptian crown now devolved on his son, Ptolemy V. (Epiphanes), a boy of five years. / This circumstance Antiochus meant to utilize. He conquered Cœle-Syria, Phœnicia, and Palestine, and gained a decisive victory, in 198, at Paneas in Cœle-Syria. Peace was then concluded; and he promised to give his daughter Cleopatra, who was engaged to Ptolemy Epiphanes, the three conquered provinces as a dowry; but the promise was not redeemed (Dan. xi. 13–17). He then invaded Asia Minor, and in 195 he crossed the Hellespont, and advanced into Europe. Here he encountered the Romans; but in 190 he was totally defeated at Magnesia by Scipio Asiaticus, and he obtained peace from Rome only on very severe conditions (Dan. xi. 18; 1 Macc. viii. 6). Retiring to his eastern provinces in order to raise money for the tribute he owed to Rome, he was slain in 187, while plundering the temple of Belus in Elymais.—Antiochus IV., Epiphanes (176 to 164), grasped the sceptre after the death of his brother, and retained it in spite of the just claims of his nephew (Dan. xi. 21). The most prominent trait of his character was an overweening pride (2 Macc. v. 21, ix. 8; Dan. vii. 8, xi. 20, xi. 36). He called himself θεός, and assumed the surname of the Olympian Zeus, Νικηφόρος. As a true Oriental despot he ordered that all his subjects should form one nation, with one god and one worship. This god should be the Olympian Zeus, whose worship was unknown to most of his subjects (Dan. xi. 36–39); but, as he wholly identified himself with this deity, it was, indeed, his own worship he ordered introduced (2 Macc. vi. 7). Among the Jews there was a party which favored Paganism in its Greek form, and this party found ready support with Antiochus (1 Macc. i. 11–15). In 175 the pious high priest Onias was overthrown by his brother Jesus, who changed his name to the Greek Jason, bought the office as high priest from Antiochus, and received permission to introduce Greek games at the temple, which caused the worship of Jehovah to be much neglected (2 Macc. iv. 7). Three years later on, Jason was overthrown by Menelaus, who made a higher bid for the office, and succeeded in retaining it by the foulest means: thus he slew Onias (2 Macc. iv. 23–50). Antiochus made four campaigns to Egypt, and had hope of entirely subjugating that country, when he suddenly was stopped in his victorious career by the Romans (168). In the interval between the first and the second Egyptian campaign he plundered the temple in Jerusalem (1 Macc. i. 20); and on his final return from Egypt he ordered that the worship of Jehovah, circumcision, the Sabbath, the distinction between clean and unclean, should be abolished; that the sacred books should be burnt, and altars raised, on which every one was to sacrifice to the Olympian Zeus, under penalty of death (1 Macc. i. 29; 2 Macc. v. 24). On Chisleu 15, 168, an altar was consecrated in the temple to the Olympian Zeus (2 Macc. vi. 2; 1 Macc. i. 54, Βόελυγμα ἐρημώσεως; comp. 1 Macc. i. 59 and iv. 38), and on Chisleu 25 the first burnt offering was presented. To this altar refer Dan. ix. 27, xi. 31, xii. 11: comp. also Matt. xxiv. 15. On Mount Gerizim the worship of Zeus Xenios was established (2 Macc. vi. 2). This last step had long been prepared by the Greek party among the Jews, and the bloody persecutions made many renegades. Many, however, remained true to their faith in spite of the most horrible tortures (1 Macc. i. 52-64; 2 Macc. vi., vii.). At the head of the faithful stood the priest Mattathias. At Modin, near Joppe, he struck down the Syrian captain before the idolatrous altar, and thus he ushered in the armed resistance of the Jews. Antiochus determined to put down all resistance; but, being in need of money (2 Macc. viii. 10), he divided his army into two parts, and went himself with the one-half to his eastern provinces for the purpose of collecting the tribute (1 Macc. iii. 34); while the other was placed under command of Lysias. Lysias, however, was completely defeated by Judas Maccabeus, and the Jews once more became masters of the temple. On Chisleu 25, 165, exactly three years after the presentation of the first Pagan sacrifice, the temple was purified with great solemnity, and it was determined that an annual feast should be celebrated in commemoration of the day (1 Macc. iv. 59), called "the Feast of the Dedication" (John x. 22). Meanwhile Antiochus met with very little success in the East. He attempted to plunder the rich temple of Nanæa in Elymais, but was repelled by the inhabitants, and died shortly after (164) at Tabæ, having just received the news from Judæa (1 Macc. vi. 4; Polyb. xxxi. 11; Jerome on Dan. xi.). In the Old Testament he is represented as the fiend of the Lord, of his people, and of his dispensation (Dan. xi. 21; 1 Macc. i. 10); in the New, as the prototype of Antichrist (Rev. xiii. 5). — Antiochus V., Eupator (164 to 162), a son of Antiochus Epiphanes, was a minor when his father died, and had been placed, during his father's absence in the East, under the tutorship of Lysias. The dying Epiphanes, however, had made Philippus tutor of his son, and regent of the whole realm; and, when Lysias heard of these dispositions, he immediately made peace with the Jews. The peace of Judæa was of short duration, however. The Greek party and the high priest Menelaus continued to incite the Syrian government against the faithful (1 Macc. vi. 21-27; 2 Macc. xiii. 3); and in 163 an army of a hundred thousand foot, twenty thousand horse, and many elephants, invaded the country. The fortress of Bethzura surrendered; Jerusalem was beleaguered and taken. But Antiochus now learnt that Philippus advanced from Persia with a great army. He immediately made peace with Judas Maccabeus, and turned against Philippus, not, though, until after destroying in a faithless manner the fortifications of Jerusalem (1 Macc. vi. 51, 52; 2 Macc. xiii. 23). Philippus he defeated; but in 162 Demetrius escaped from Rome, landed at Tripolis, and took possession of the throne of Syria almost without resistance. Antiochus and Lysias were decapitated (1 Macc. vii. 1-4; 2 Macc. xiv. 1). — Antiochus VI., Epiphanes Dionysius, was a son of Alexander Balas (see title), who in 146 was overthrown by Demetrius II. Though a mere child at the death of his father, he was raised to the throne by Tryphon. He gained the high priest Jonathan, and the brother of the high priest, Simon, over to his side (1 Macc. xi. 57-74, xii. 24-54); but Tryphon showed himself a traitor, and in 143 both Jonathan (1 Macc. xii. 39) and Antiochus (1 Macc. xiii. 41) were murdered. — Antiochus VII., Sidetes (from Sida in Pamphylia, where he was educated), was a brother of Demetrius II., who in 141 was taken prisoner in Parthia (1 Macc. xiv. 1-3), and obtained in 139 the crown of Syria (1 Macc. xv. 10). He won the high priest Simon for his side, and succeeded in shutting Tryphon up in Dora (1 Macc. xv. 10-14, 25, 26); but as Simon had conquered several towns belonging to Syria, and Antiochus demanded that he should give up these places, or pay a thousand talents in silver, war broke out between Syria and Judæa. After defeating Tryphon, Antiochus sent his general, Cendebeus, with an army, into Judæa; but he was defeated by Simon's son, John Hyrcanus (1 Macc. xv. 27-xvi. 10). In 136 Simon was murdered (1 Macc. xv. 14), and his murderer, Ptolemy, asked for help from Antiochus (1 Macc. xvi. 18). Antiochus then invaded Judæa, and pushed onwards victoriously to Jerusalem. It was the time of the feast of tabernacles; and so nobly did Antiochus behave during the celebration of the solemnity, that the Jews gave him the surname of Eusebes. Peace was concluded shortly after. The Jews retained free exercise of their religion, but were compelled to surrender their arms, and to pay a war indemnity. In 130 Antiochus began war with Arsaces, King of Parthia, but fell in the same year. K. WIESELER.

ANTIOCHUS IV., EPIPHANES, King of Commagene (A.D. 41-72), joined Titus during the siege of Jerusalem. His kingdom, with its capital of Samosata, was situated between Mount Taurus and the Euphrates, and belonged originally to the kingdom of Syria, but became independent during the contests between the last Seleucids. In 43 he was betrothed to Agrippa's daughter Drusilla; in 72 he was deposed for conspiracy with the Parthians.

ANTIOCHUS, b. at Medosaga, near Ancyra, in Galatia, was a monk in St. Saba, near Jerusalem, at the time when Chosroes took and sacked that city (614), and has given a description of the plundering of his monastery in the dedication of his work: Πανδέκτης τῆς ἀγίας γραφῆς, a series of a hundred and thirty homilies. See FABRICIUS: Bibl. Græc. lib. V. c. 34.

ANTIPHON, a form of singing by which a second voice or choir answers the first, was commonly used in the Jewish synagogue (Ez.

iii. 11; Ps. cvi. 48, cxlvii. 7; Matt. xxvi. 30), and thence early introduced in the Christian Church. Socrates (Hist. Eccl. 2: 8) says, Ignatius (116) employed it in Antioch. Basil (329-379), in one of his letters (Epist. 63 ad Neocas.), gives a description of this mode of singing, which is to-day in common use in all liturgical churches.

ANTIPOPE means a rival pope, one not elected in the proper canonical way, but resting his claims on intrigue or force. There has been quite a number of such antipopes. At one time (1048) there were four rival popes, namely, Sylvester III., Benedict IX., Gregory VI., and Clement II. But it has not always been easy to decide which of the rivals was the true pope; so in such cases the church has been divided by a schism. The longest schism broke out after the death of Gregory XI., and lasted for fifty years (1378-1429). As the rivalling popes always condemned and excommunicated each other, this chapter of the history of the Roman Church forms a somewhat peculiar introduction to the dogma of papal infallibility.

ANTITACTÆ. See GNOSTICISM.

ANTITRINITARIANISM is the general name for a number of very different views, which, however, all have this one quality in common, that they oppose the dogma of the Trinity. Such views occur in the earliest days of the Christian Church, even in the apostolic age; and, indeed, the doctrine of the Holy Trinity, such as it was formulated by the Council of Nicæa (325), in the Athanasian Creed, and such as it is still held by the orthodox side of Christendom, alike in the Greek, the Roman, and the Reformed churches, may be said to have developed gradually in steady contest with a rigid, narrow, and Judaistic Monotheism. Unable to grasp the innermost kernel of Christian dogmatics, — the idea of one God in three persons, — and fearful of falling into Pagan Polytheism, the Antitrinitarians of the Ante-Nicæan period tried to vindicate Monotheism, either by making the difference between the Father and the Son so great that Christ became a mere creature, a divine being, though not God, a man, though the best of all, etc., or by identifying the Father and the Son so closely, that the Son became nothing but the Father incarnated, crucified, etc. The first of these two Antitrinitarian types, the Monarchians, was represented in the apostolic age by Cerinthus and the Ebionites; in the second century, by Theodotus the Elder; in the third, by Theodotus the Younger, a banker in Rome, and Artemon; and it found its highest development in Paul of Samosata. Probably it is this influence, which, running through the Antiochian school of theology, at last burst forth in Arianism. The other type of Antitrinitarianism, the Patripassians, made its first appearance with Praxeas, in the time of Marcus Aurelius. Then followed Noëtus of Smyrna, and Beryllus of Bostra, and finally the type found a full representation in Sabellius, who left behind a great number of congregations and a wide-spread influence.

By the Nicæan Council, the dogma of the Holy Trinity was fixed, and for centuries the question was not mooted. But the schoolmen of the middle ages took it up once more, and, with the left wing of this army, embodying the rationalizing tendencies of the time, it became a favorite subject. The authority of the Roman Church, however, prevented any outburst of plain Antitrinitarianism; but it was easy to see whither the speculations of an Abelard, Almaric of Bena, David Dinanto, etc., would lead, if ever this authority became shaken; and the consequences obscurely involved in the syllogisms of the metaphysicians, and well concealed behind the barbarous terminology of the school, often came into open daylight through the sects, the Paulicians, the Catharists, etc. Contemporary with the Reformation, an Antitrinitarian movement actually begun, started, in some cases, by the Anabaptist whirlwind, as, for instance, with Denk, Hietzer, Joris of Delft, etc., but in others, growing up from the very same root as the Reformation itself; as, for instance, with Servetus. In both forms, however, the movement represents the Patripassian type. The Antitrinitarianism, both of Joris and of Servetus, is Sabellianism, more or less colored by the Pantheism of the schoolmen and the mystics. But when the influence and ideas of Servetus met with the Italian humanism, as in such men as Gribaldo and Gentilis, a transition was made from the Patripassian to the Monarchian type; and in Poland, whither the Italian professors and tutors brought the movement, the result became, under the hands of Faustus Socinus, what is now known under the name of Unitarianism. The deists of England, the positivists of France, the rationalists of Germany, all free-thinkers, from the spiritualists to the materialists, are by necessity Antitrinitarians; but the dogma of the Holy Trinity is seldom the point of Christian dogmatics which they attack. The Swedenborgians admit a Trinity in one person, but not of persons. See Böck: Historia Antitrinitariorum, Königsberg, 1774-84, 2 vols.; LANGE: Geschichte der Unitarier vor d. Nic. Synode, Leipzig, 1831; TRECHSEL: Die protestant. Antitrinitarier vor F. Socin, Heidelberg, 1839-44.

ANTON, Paul, b. at Hirschfeld, in Upper Lusatia, 1661; d. in Halle, 1730; studied theology in Leipzig; founded, together with Francke, the so-called Collegia Biblica; was in 1689 made superintendent of Rochlitz, in 1692 court-preacher in Eisenach, and in 1695 professor of theology at the University of Halle, where, together with Breithaupt and Francke, he became a leader of the Pietist movement. His lectures, Collegium Antitheticum, were edited in 1732 by Schwentzel. The Denkmal des Herrn Paul Anton, published soon after his death, contains an autobiography (to 1725) and Francke's Lectio Parænetica.

ANTONELLI, Giacomo, an Italian cardinal and statesman, b. April 2, 1806; d. in Rome, Nov. 7, 1876. He early achieved distinction, and in 1845 was made minister of finance to Gregory XVI. Pius IX., the next pope, made him a cardinal-deacon (June 12, 1847), papal secretary of foreign affairs (i.e., prime-minister) in 1849, and his chief political adviser, in which capacity he strenuously and persistently opposed every liberal measure. In January, 1868, he became dean of the order of cardinal-deacons. He had the mortification to see Victor Emmanuel enter Rome as King of Italy, Nov. 21, 1871. He left immense wealth, which he declared on his death-bed was derived entirely from his patrimony. He was certainly one of the ablest statesmen of his day; but his policy was bad. After his death, a suit involving his moral character was begun, to obtain his property, by the Countess Laura Lambertini, who claims to be his natural daughter, which is not yet (1880) decided.

ANTONIANS, an Antinomian sect of recent date; originated in Switzerland, in the canton of Berne, and received its name from its author, Anton Unternährer. Born at Schüpfheim, in the canton of Lucerne, Sept. 5, 1759; d. in the jail of the city of Lucerne, June 29, 1824, Unternährer was educated and confirmed in the Roman-Catholic Church, and began his career as a quack-doctor, in the country between Thun and Berne. In 1800 he moved to Amsoldingen, near Thun, and here he began to hold religious meetings, to preach, to issue books, etc.; and April 16, 1802, he appeared, with a great crowd of adherents, before the minister of Berne, announcing himself as the son of God, come to judge mankind, and more especially the magistrates of the city. The tumult was soon suppressed, and Unternährer was condemned to two years' imprisonment with hard labor; but on his release in 1804 he was received by his adherents with great enthusiasm, and the riots began again. It was proposed to shut him up in a lunatic-asylum, and for five years he was kept under arrest in Lucerne. He returned to the world more collected and more serious, but by no means cured, and in 1820 he was permanently locked up in the jail. His publications comprise about fifteen pamphlets: Gerichtsbüchlein, Buch der Erfüllung, Geheimniss der Liebe, etc. He taught that the primitive relation between God and man is exhausted by two single commandments, — one positive, to love and multiply; and one negative, not to eat of the tree of knowledge. But, tempted by Satan, man violated the Second Commandment; and the result was, that he attained a great wisdom, beginning with a distinction between good and evil, and ending in institutions innumerable, — state, church, court, school, etc.; which wisdom, however, is of satanic origin, and is the true curse of mankind. From this curse there is only one salvation, through the fulfilment of the First Commandment, to love and multiply; and for this purpose all restraints arising from such ideas as marriage, family, etc., must be thrown off. The principal seat of the sect was Amsoldingen, whence it spread into Gsteig, near Interlaken. Suppressed here in 1821, it re-appeared at Wohlen, near Berne, in 1830, under the leadership of Benedict Schori, and again at Gsteig, in 1838-40, under the leadership of Christian Michel, and severe measures were necessary to suppress the excesses. See S. ZIEGLER: Die Lehre der Antonianer. TRECHSEL.

ANTONINUS PIUS, Roman emperor from July 10, 138, to March 7, 161, continued the policy of Trajan towards the Christians, protecting them against the wild outbursts of Pagan fury, without according them a full legal recognition. Under his immediate successor, however, there arose within the church a tendency to glorify Antoninus, and make him an example of true liberality and goodness; and this tendency, so easily explainable under the circumstances, gradually developed a rich tradition, which, however, has no historical foundation. The Edictum ad Commune Asiæ (Euseb. Hist. Eccles. IV., 13) is evidently spurious; and though the existence of the edicts to the Larisseni, Thessalonians, and Athenians, in favor of the Christians (Euseb. Hist. Eccles. IV., 26, 10) cannot be doubted, there is no reason to consider them as any thing more than a simple injunction of the principles laid down by the legislation of Trajan.

ANTONINUS, St. (Antonio Pierozzi, also called de Forcigliani); b. in Florence 1389; d. there May 2, 1459; entered the Dominican order in 1404; became vicar-general of the order in Tuscany and Naples in 1436, and was elected Archbishop of Florence in 1446. In both of these offices he labored zealously to reform the monasteries under his authority, and won the esteem and love of all by his energy, and readiness for self-sacrifice during the plague (in 1448) and the earthquake (1453). By Adrian VI. he was canonized (1523). His principal works are: Summa theologica, treating the moral system much after Thomas Aquinas, first printed at Venice in 1477, afterwards often republished, and still valued in Italy as a text-book; Lettere di S. A., Florence, 1859, addressed to a distinguished lady, Diadota degli Adimari, and treating moral subjects with great earnestness; Summa confessionalis, or Summa confessionum, first printed at Mondovi in 1472; Summa historialis, or Chronicon ab orbe condito bipartitum, a world's chronicle, reaching down to the year of 1457, first printed in 1480, and afterwards augmented and altered by the Jesuit P. Maturus, Lyons, 1587. Collected editions of his works appeared at Venice in 1474 (4 vols. fol.) and at Florence in 1741 (8 vols.). See Acta S. T. Mai T. I., p. 310.

ANTONIO DE DOMINIS. See ANTHONY DE DOMINIS.

APHAR'SITES, one of the peoples with whom the Assyrians colonized Samaria (Ez. iv. 9), but otherwise utterly unknown.

APHARSATHCHITES, perhaps identical with the Apharsachites (cf. Ez. iv. 9, v. 6), probably the Paraitakenoi, a people on the Medo-Persian border, whom the conquering Assyrians had put in a strange land in order to make harmless, even as they did the Israelites. WOLF BAUDISSIN.

APHEK (strength), the name of several cities.

I. A city belonging to the tribe of Asher (Josh. xix. 30), but never conquered by the Israelites (Josh. xiii. 4); also called Aphik (Judg. i. 31); the classical Aphica, the present Afka, situated on Mount Lebanon, near the source of the River Adonis, and at one time famous for its Venus temple, which was destroyed by Constantine the Great.

II. A city in the tribe of Issachar, east of Shunem, on the slope of the Lesser Hermon, not far from Jezreel (1 Sam. xxix. 1). Here the Philistines encamped before the battle in which Saul lost his life, and here the Syrian king Benhadad II. fell into the hands of Ahab (1 Kings xx. 26).

III. A city near Mizpah, north-west of Jerusalem, where the Philistines encamped before the battle in which the sons of Eli were killed (1 Sam. iv. 1; comp. vii. 12), and perhaps identical with the royal city of the Canaanites (Josh. xii. 18).

IV. A city standing on the plateau east of the Sea of Galilee, probably the present Fik, or Wadi Fik.

APHRAATES, a Persian sage, who was martyred 345. Very little is known about him. He bore the ecclesiastical name James, and was a bishop and abbot of the Cloister of Mar Mattheus, upon Mount Elpheph, in the neighborhood of Mosul. His homilies were so highly esteemed, that they were translated from Syriac into Armenian before 500, although under the name of Bishop Jacob of Nisilis: under this name, Nicholas Antonelli (1756) issued the Armenian text, with a Latin paraphrase. The identification of the name is very recent. In 1869 W. Wright issued twenty-three Homilies of Aphraates, London. The first ten of these are in letter form, and dated 336, 337; the next twelve, joined in alphabetical order to the preceding, are dated 343, 344; and the last, August, 345. Aphraates is valuable, because his gospel citations are derived from Tatian's Diatessaron, on which Ephraem Syrus, his contemporary, had written a commentary; and thus he is a witness to a very early text. APION, b. in Oasis, of Egyptian descent; studied in Alexandria under Apollonius and Didymus; taught rhetoric in Rome under Caligula; and wrote works on Homer, the history of Egypt, etc., of which, however, only a few and rather insignificant fragments have come down to us. But he has become noted on account of his hatred to the Jews, which he proved both by writing directly against them, and by heading the famous Alexandrian embassy, whose object was to excite Caligula's suspicion against them. Philo headed the Jewish embassy, and Josephus wrote against Apion. On Apion's authority rests the story of Androclus and the lion, of the Jews worshipping an ass in the temple, etc.

APIS, the sacred bull worshipped by the Egyptians as a revelation of Osiris, from the eighteenth dynasty to the time of Julian II. The marks by which an Apis was recognized were a black-colored hide, a white spot on the forehead of a triangular shape, the hair arranged on the back in the form of an eagle, a twist of the lower membranes of the tongue in likeness with the shape of a scarabæus, etc. When these marks were discovered on a calf, the animal was carried with great solemnity to Memphis, and when the old Apis died a natural death (in which case it was carefully embalmed), or when it reached the age of twenty-five years (in which case it was secretly killed by the priests), the new Apis was installed in the temple as an incarnate god. The birth of an Apis was considered an occasion of popular joy, and the death an occasion of popular mourning. All the movements of an Apis were watched with the closest attention by the priests, and interpreted as involving oracles. See MARLETTE: Le Serapèum de Memphis, Paris, 1857.

APOCRISIARIUS. From the time of Constantine, when the great emperor stood at the head of the whole ecclesiastical constitution, it became, of course, of great importance to the patriarchs to maintain an uninterrupted connection with the imperial court. For this purpose they appointed ecclesiastical ambassadors (ἀποκρισάριοι, responsales, from ἀποκρίνωμαι, to respond), who resided in the metropolis, and through whom they addressed themselves to the emperor, and received his decisions. It was also the duty of the apocrisiarius to introduce the patriarch, or the bishops of the patriarchal diocese, to the court when they visited the metropolis. As long as Rome formed part of the eparchate, and remained dependent of the Greek crown, the pope maintained an apocrisiarius in Constantinople. See Du Cange, s.v.

APOCATASTASIS. See APOKATASTASIS.

APOCRYPHA OF THE OLD TESTAMENT.

The word apokryphos, "hidden," applied to writings, describes both such as are considered mystic or such as are of unknown origin, and those whose meaning or authorship is concealed. The apocryphal is, generally speaking, the obscure, both in purport and origin. The word is used in both senses in the patristic writings. In the first sense Clemens Alex. speaks of the apocryphal books of Zoroaster. Strom. I. 15, 69. So Origen distinguishes between the books in open use in the church and those "apocryphal" (cf. Matt. xxiii. 35; 2 Tim. iii. 8). Similarly the rabbins employed the Hebrew g'natz to designate those copies of the Holy Scriptures which were buried because they were no longer fit for public use. G'natz has also the meaning of uncanonical. In the second sense, of having an "unknown origin," the word naturally shifted into "false." So Irenæus, Tertullian, Augustine, and Jerome. The obscure origin is, of course, suspicious.

In the ancient church and in the middle age the designation "apocryphal" was almost never applied to those books we commonly describe as the Apocrypha. Jerome and a few isolated writers are the only ones who do so. (See Hugo a. St. Caro in DE WETTE-SCHRADER, Einleitung in d. A. T., p. 66.) The use of the word in this sense is Protestant. The first one to use it thus was Carlstadt (1483-1541) in his book, De Canonis Scripturis Libellus, Wittenbergæ, 1520 (see CREDNER: Zur Gesch. des Kanons, 1847, p. 291 sqq.). The first edition of the Bible, in which the uncanonical books of the Old Testament were styled "apocryphal," is the Frankfurt edition of 1534. (See PANZER: Gesch. d. deutsch. Bibelübersetzung, 1783, p. 294 sq.)

This article is upon not only those books called by Protestants "The Apocrypha," but also those pieces found in the Greek and Latin Bibles, but not in the Hebrew canon.

I. THE POSITION OF THE APOCRYPHA IN THE CANON. The Hebrew canon was settled before the Christian era: Josephus is the witness to this (c. Apion I. 8). He is the better witness, because he uses books which he allows are not in the Hebrew canon. The Greek Bible canon was broader, taking in many writings which are not in the Hebrew. The proof of this is the fact that the Christians quote such uncanonical books from the Septuagint. In the New Testament there is no term to distinguish the canonical from the uncanonical, which is the more remarkable as the writers habitually employ the LXX. See, for Paul, KAUTZSCH: De Veteris Testamenti Locis a Paulo Apostolo allegatis, 1869. It is important in this connection to bear in mind that in the New Testament only the Pentateuch, the Prophets, and the Psalms are frequently quoted: there are few references to the historical books, and no references to Canticles, Ecclesiastes, Esther, Ezra, and Nehemiah. And since the Apocrypha belong to these occasionally quoted books, we must not lay too much weight on the absence of express quotation; for there are passages in the New Testament which presuppose the Apocrypha. Thus cf. Jas. i. 19; Ecclus. v. 11; Heb. i. 3; Wis. vii. 26; Heb. iv. 12, 13; Wis. vii. 22-24; Rom. i. 20-32; Wis. xiii.-xv.

The Fathers generally made use of the Apocrypha, and that when there is not the form of a quotation; so that one can say that the church of the first three centuries made no essential difference between the writings of the Hebrew canon and the so-called Apocrypha. Melito of Sardis (fl. second century) and Origen (186-253) do make a distinction, as the result of learned investigations, but not such as to put the uncanonical writings out of use. Still the result of such a distinction as Origen made was to call attention to the fixed character of the Hebrew, as contrasted with the shifting Greek canon; and so in the fourth century there were a number of catalogues of sacred books which limited the canon to the Hebrew, and either did not mention the other books, or else put them into a secondary class. Thus Athanasius (296-373), Cyril of Jerusalem (315-386), Gregory Nazianzen (328-389), and Amphilochius (d. 395), made such catalogues. (See DE WETTE-SCHRADER, Eintl., in d. A. T., p. 55 sq.; KEIL, Eintl. in d. A. T. 3 Aufl. p. 652.) Epiphanius (310-402) is sometimes erroneously added to this list. But the only one in the ancient church who decidedly opposed the Apocrypha was Jerome, who was the best Hebrew scholar of the church. All these men, however, quote the Apocrypha as "Holy Scripture;" while Augustine (353-430) puts the apocryphal books among the Hebrew canonical books, and calls them all canonical, and so did the Councils of Hippo (393) and Carthage (397), held under his influence. And this may be said to be the position of the entire church, both East and West,—the Council of Trent having declared all but the two books of Esdras and the Prayer of Manasses to be canonical,—until the Reformation, and is the position of the Church of Rome to-day. So the Apocrypha appear in the Septuagint, the Vulgate, and all Roman-Catholic Bibles.

In the Protestant Church, as already remarked, Carlstadt was the first to draw the line firmly between the canonical and apocryphal books of the Old Testament. In the first complete edition of Luther's Bible (1534), the Apocrypha were sundered from the other books, and put as an appendix to the Old Testament, with the title "Apocrypha; that is, books which, although not contained in the Hebrew canon, are yet useful and good to read." The Apocrypha occupied a similar position in the Reformed Church, but a stricter sentence was passed upon them. In modern times, twice has an agitation been raised against them, each time begun in England (1825 and 1850); and the result has been a substantial increase in our information about them. But also, that whereas they were printed in all Protestant Bibles, and by the British and Foreign Bible Society, up to 1826, since then that Society has omitted them, and the American Bible Society has followed their example. See the works of DE WETTE, KEIL, and CREDNER, already quoted; also MOULINIE: Notice sur les livres apocryphes de l'ancien Testament en réponse à la question faut-il les supprimer? Genève, 1828; REUSS: Diss. polemica de libris V. T. apocryphis perperam plebi negatis, Strassb., 1829; R. STIER: Die Apokryphen, Vertheidigung ihres altergebrachten Anschlusses an die Bibel, Braunschweig, 1853; E. W. II. MANUSCRIPTS OF THE GREEK TEXT.—Comp. the Prolegomena, in the editions of the Septuagint by HOLMES-PARSONS and TISCHENDORF, and in FRITZSCHE's edition of the Apocrypha. The number of manuscripts is considerable; but they are mostly of a kind called "cursive," or "minuscule," because written in a small letter. The following nine are the only known uncial or majuscule manuscripts: 1. Cod. Vaticanus contains almost all the Bible (Tischendorf sets it in the fourth century; only the Books of the Maccabees are wanting from the Apocrypha); 2. Cod. Sinaiticus, fourth century; 3. Cod. Alexandrinus, fifth century; 4. Cod. Ephraemi, fifth century; 5. Cod. Venetus, eighth and ninth century; 6. Cod. Basilano-Vaticanus, ninth century; 7. Cod. Marchallianus, sixth or seventh century; 8. Cod. Cryptoferratensis, a palimpsest fragment of the Prophets, seventh century; 9. Palimpsest fragments of Wisdom and Sirach, sixth or seventh century.

III. OLD TRANSLATIONS. 1. Latin.—The old Latin and the Jerome translations must be distinguished.

a. The Jerome translation. Jerome, it is well known, started out with the intention of merely revising the old Latin translation by means of the Septuagint. But he eventually abandoned the effort, and translated directly from the original Hebrew. This, of course, led him to omit the Apocrypha. It is true, he did revise Tobit and Judith, but not as a part of his Bible work.

b. The old Latin. This contains the following books: apocryphal additions to Ezra, Esther, and Daniel, Baruch, Tobit, Judith, 1 and 2 Maccabees (of 2 Maccabees there appears to be no existing Latin translation), Sirach and Wisdom of Solomon. The last two exist in only one Latin translation.

2. Syriac. The vulgar Syriac or the Peshito and the Syriac-hexaplar translations are to be distinguished. The first is unevenly done; but the second, in which appears Wisdom and Sirach, is excellent throughout, and for the textual critic is on this account of great value.

IV. EDITIONS OF THE GREEK TEXT. — The principal editions of the Septuagint, which includes the Apocrypha, are, 1. The Complutensian Polyglott, in Complutensi universitate, 6 vols., 1514-1517; 2. The ALDINA: Sacræ Scripturæ Veteris Novæque omnia, Venice, 1518; 3. Vetus Testamentum Græce, ed. HOLMES and PARSONS, 5 vols., Oxford, 1798-1827; 4. TISCHENDORF: Vetus Testamentum Græce juxta LXX. Interpretes, Lips., 1st ed., 1850, 5th ed., 1875.

The best separate edition of the Apocrypha is by FRITZSCHE: Libri Apocryphi Veteris Testamenti Græce, Lips., 1871.

V. EXEGETICAL LITERATURE. — Comp. FABRICIUS: Bibliotheca Græca, ed. Harless III., 718-750; WINER: Endb. der Theol. Litteratur, 3d ed., I. 83 sq., 231 sq.; FRITZSCHE u. GRIMM, in their commentary mentioned below; FUERST: Bibliotheca Judaica, 3 vols., 1849-1863.

1. Translations. — Luther translated the Wisdom of Solomon, 1529, the rest of the books in 1533 and 34; when all were collected in his first complete edition of the Bible, 1534. Since then, DE WETTE, in 1858, and BUNSEN, in his Bibelwerk für die Gemeinde, in 1869, have published translations into German. The current English translation of the Apocrypha is that found in King James's version, revised by seven scholars from the previous versions. A complete Hebrew translation was issued by FRANKEL: Hagiographa Posteriora denominata Apocrypha, Lips., 1830.

2. Commentaries. — The most accessible of the older are ARNALD: Critical Commentary upon the Apocrypha (part of Patrick, Lowth, and Whitby Commentary on the Bible), London, 1744-52, fol., 2d ed., 1760, new ed. by Pitman, London, 1822, quarto, Philadelphia, U.S., 1846; CHARLES WILSON: The Books of the Apocrypha, with Crit. and Hist. Observations prefixed, Edin., 1801. By far the most important exegetical help to the study of the Apocrypha that has yet appeared is by O. F. FRITZSCHE and CHARLES W. GRIMM: Das Kurzfassste exeget. Handb. zu den Apokr., 6 vols., Leipzig, 1851-1860. The only American Commentary, but one fresh, able, and scholarly, with a full bibliography appended, is by E. C. BISSELL: Com. on Apoc., New York, 1880, vol. xv. of Am. ed. of Lange's Commentary.

3. Special Lexicons. — WAHL: Clavis Librorum V.T. Apoc. philologica, Lips., 1853.

4. Introductions. — EICHHORN: Einkl. in d. Apoc. Schrift. d. A. T., Leipzig 1795; and in all the Introductions to the Old Testament, as in those by Bertholdt, De Wette, Scholz (R.C.), and Keil.

VI. THE ORIGIN AND NATURE OF THE VARIOUS BOOKS OF THE APOCRYPHA. — 1. A.

The apocryphal Ezra, commonly called I. Esdras.

The title in the authorized version was first given to it in 1560 by the translators of the so-called Genevan version. But the Vulgate calls it "3d Esdras." In the Old Latin, Syriac, and Septuagint versions, it was called "1st Ezra." As a whole, the book is a pretty worthless compilation, identical in its chief contents with the canonical Ezra. This will appear by comparing:

Chap. i. = 2 Chr. xxxv. 6. The restoration of the temple-worship under Josiah (B.C. 639-609), and the history of the successors of Josiah until the destruction of the temple (588).

Chap. ii. 1-14 = Ez. i. Cyrus, in the first year of his reign (537), allows the return of the exiles, and gives them the vessels of the temple.

Chap. ii. 15-25 = Ez. iv. 7-24. In consequence of charges against the Jews, Artaxerxes (465-425) forbids the further building of the temple and the walls of Jerusalem.

Chap. iii. = Ez. v. 6. Zerubbabel wins the favor of Darius (521-485), and receives permission for the return of the exiles.

Chap. v. 7-70 = Ez. ii. 1-iv. 5. List of those who returned with Zerubbabel, activity of Zerubbabel, and interruption of the temple building from the time of Cyrus (536-529) to the second year of Darius (520).

Chaps. vi., vii. = Ez. v., vi. Recommencement and finishing of the temple in the sixth year of Darius (516).

Chaps. viii., ix. 36 = Ez. vii.-x. Return of Ezra, with a number of exiles, in the seventh year of Artaxerxes (458). Beginning of Ezra's activity.

Chap. ix. 37-55 = Neh. vii. 73-viii. 13. Ezra read the law.

From the canonical Ezra the apocryphal is distinguished by these four points: (1) The passage of the canonical Ez. iv. 7-24 is in the apocryphal Ezra much condensed, and improved in point of style; (2) The passage of the apocryphal Ez. iii.-v. 6 is from an unknown source; (3) 2 Chr. xxxv., xxxvi., is prefaced; (4) Neh. vii. 73-viii. 13 is added. Through the first two differences the confusion from which the canonical Ezra partly suffers is materially increased.

The sources are two: (1) The canonical Ezra according to the Septuagint, not the Hebrew; (2) the passage iii.-v. 6 is bodily introduced from some existing Greek work, and it flatly contradicts the rest of the book.

The purpose of the whole compilation has already been rightly expressed by Bertholdt (Einkl. III. 1011): "The author desired to present a history of the temple from the last days of the legal cultus to the building of the temple and the restoration of the worship, compiled from older works."

In regard to the age, it can only be said that Josephus made use of it. Antiq. Jud. xi. 1-5.

EWALD: Gesch. d. Volkes Israel., vol. IV., p. 163.

B. The Second Book of Esdras had for its original title "The Revelation of Ezra;" and it were well if it were retained, as it is appropriate. It was written originally in Greek. The common Latin translation, from which the English was made, contains two important interpolations. — i., ii., xv., xvi., — which are evidently of Christian origin, and are pervaded by an anti-Jewish spirit.

The original work (iii.-xiv.) consists of a series of angelic revelations and visions, in which Ezra is instructed in some of the great mysteries of the moral world, and assured of the final triumph of the righteous.

The time of composition is unsettled. Keil maintains it was written by a Hellenistic Jew of Palestine, about the end of the first Christian century, and early known to the Christians. The first witness to the existence of the book is Clemens Alex. Strom. III. 16. It is quoted with respect by Irenæus, Tertullian, and Ambrose, but with contempt by Jerome.

2. Additions to Esther. — In the Septuagint Esther the following pieces are inserted, and that so skilfully as to make no break in the narrative: (1) Before Esth. i. 1, the dream of Mordecai of the wonderful deliverance of his people; (2) after Esth. iii. 13, the edict of Artaxerxes, as he is called, to exterminate the Jews; (3) after Esth. iv. 17, the prayers of Mordecai and Esther for the preservation of their people; (4) instead of Esth. v. 1, 2, an account of the reception of Esther by the king; (5) instead of Esth. viii. 13, the second edict of Artaxerxes recalling the first; (6) after Esth. x. 3, Mordecai learns the meaning of his dream.

These additions are later than the Greek translation of Esther. Josephus is the first one to use them, Antiq. Jud. xi. 6, 4 sqq. The subscription, stating that in the fourth year of Ptolemy and Cleopatra, Dositheus and his son brought the book to Egypt, refers to the whole book, and does not therefore give any hint as to the age of the additions, especially since there were not less than four Ptolemies whose queens were named Cleopatra.

There are two Greek texts of Esther, — a revised and an unrevised.

3. Additions to Daniel. — a. The Prayer of Azarias and the Song of the Three Children in the Oven, inserted after Dan. iii. 23. b. The History of Susanna. In the Greek text this usually forms the first part of Daniel (although it also occurs after the twelfth chapter), because he is regarded as the son of Susanna, and her deliverer through his wisdom. c. The History of Bel and the Dragon: this forms an appendix to the book. b. and c. make no pretensions to be part of the original text. They were written in Greek. There is an interesting correspondence extant, between Julius Africanus and Origen, in regard to Susanna, the former attacking, and the latter defending, its genuineness. See separate ed. Julii Africani de Historia Susannæ Epistola ad Origenem et Origenis ad illum Re- sponsio. Ed. J. R. Weststenius, Basil. 1674. In Jerome's time the translation of Daniel, with the additions by Theodoton, had supplanted that of the LXX. (Hieron. Praef. in Vers. Danielis); but it was only a revision of the LXX.

LIT. — Special works. DELITZSCH: De Habacuci Prophetæ vita acque ætate (Lips. 1842), p. 23 sq., 105 sq. ROHLING: Das Buch des Propheten Daniel. Mainz, 1876.

4. The Prayer of Manasses. — Reference is made in 2 Chron. xxxiii. 12, 13, 18, to a prayer of Manasses, offered in captivity, and so this apocryphal book was suggested. It is usually inserted among the hymns after the Psalms, and is quoted in full in Constit. Apostol. II. 22, the oldest witness to its existence; although doubtless it is older, and Jewish, not Christian [and was written in Greek, in the first or second century B.C.].

5. Baruch. — This apocryphal book, bearing the name of the faithful friend and amanuensis of Jeremiah, is divisible into three parts: (1) Chap. i. 2-iii. 8 sets forth, that, in the fifth year after the destruction of Jerusalem by the Chaldees (588), the Jews in Babylon sent a deputation to Jerusalem with money for sacrifices, and requested that prayers might be offered for the life of Nebuchadnezzar and his son Belshazzar. They also confessed that their sufferings were the consequences of their sins. (2) Chap. iii. 9-iv. 4. Exhortation to Israel to return to the Source of all wisdom. (3) Chap. iv. 5-v. 9. Exhortation to the people to take fresh courage.

The time of its composition cannot be definitely settled. Since the book, in one place (i. 15-18) shows traces of Daniel (cf. Dan. ix. 7-10), it must be later than it. Most Protestant critics put Baruch in the later Maccabean time; but the book bears evidence that the author lived in stirring times, and may with more propriety be put into the time of Vespasian (emperor A.D. 69-79).

The question of the unity of authorship depends upon the language used. This was, probably, originally the Hebrew in the first part, and Greek in the last: so there were two authors.

6. The Letter of Jeremiah. — This appears in the Vulgate, and in Luther's Bible, and also in other editions, as an appendix to, or the sixth chapter of, the Book of Baruch. But originally it had nothing to do with the latter. It is addressed to the captives of Nebuchadnezzar, in Babylon, and is a well-written exhortation against the Babylonian gods. Its original is Greek. Of course Jeremiah was not its author; but it must be ancient, inasmuch as it is quoted in 2 Macc. ii. 1, 2.

7. Tobit. — In the Vulgate and in Luther's Bible, the name of the book and of the hero is Tobias; but in the Greek text that is the name of the son, while the father is Tobit, or Tobith. The story is briefly this: Tobit, an exile in Nineveh, is subjected to loss and persecution, although leading a very exemplary life (i. 1-iii. 6). At the same time a woman named Sara, the daughter of Raguel in Ecbatana, is very strangely plagued (iii. 7-15). Both these persons pray for help at the same time; and the angel Raphael is sent to them, who delivers them, and unites Sara and the son of Tobit, Tobias, in marriage (iii. 16-xii. 22), whereupon Tobit sings a psalm of praise. He lives to be a hundred and fifty-eight, and Tobias, to be a hundred and twenty-seven (xiii., xiv.). The whole forms an interesting didactic tale, which may have a true story as its basis, but surely is not true in its present form. The object is plainly to show the value and reward of serving God faithfully.

As to the time of composition, nothing definite can be said; but, since the original is Greek, it is probably about B. C. 200. Hitzig (Zeitschr. f. wissenschaftl. Theol., 1860., p. 250 sq.), upon insufficient grounds, puts it into the Post-Vespasian period, and thinks it was designed to comfort the Jews over the destruction of the temple.

The Chaldee version of Tobit is of late origin. Of the Greek text there are three recensions.

8. Judith.—The story of the book is briefly this: Holofernes, the general of Nebuchadnezzar, turns his victorious arms against the Jews, who resolve upon a desperate defence. Holofernes lays rigorous siege to the strong fortress Bethulia (i.-vii.). In their darkest hour, one of the besieged, a beautiful widow named Judith, voluntarily assumes their rescue by stratagem. She enters the hostile camp, wins the affection and confidence of Holofernes, and then, while sunk in a drunken stupor, she cuts off his head, and returns to the fortress with this trophy of victory. The besieged avail themselves of the confusion to make a destructive attack. The enemy are put to flight, and in this way the people are delivered; and Judith, amid the praises of her nation, and to a good old age (a hundred and five), lived to see the permanent effect of her daring deed.

Here, as in Tobit, we have no sober narrative, but a didactic fiction. Amazing liberties are taken with history. Nebuchadnezzar is called the King of Assyria, and the temple is said to have been rebuilt in his time. The object is to stir up the Jews during the distresses of the Maccabean time,—most probably the time of composition,—to maintain a confident resistance.

It was written originally in Hebrew. The Chaldee version which Jerome had before him was surely not the original. There are three recensions of the Greek text.

9. The Books of Maccabees.—The name Μακκαβαῖος was originally only the surname of Judas, the son of Mattathias (1 Macc. ii. 4); but it is not exactly determined what the name means. The common interpretation, "the hammer," is open to the objection that the sort of hammer described by the Hebrew word adduced is a little workman's hammer, and not the war or smith's. Professor Curtiss, in his brochure, "The Name Machabee," Leipzig, 1876, advocates the meaning "the extinguisher" (cf. Isa. xliii. 17), because Judas "quenched (extinguished) his foes as tow." The objections to this derivation are, that the use of such a picture by Isaiah does not prove it to be allowable to use as a symbolical name [and, moreover, it rests upon showing, that, in the original form of the name, Kaph was used instead of Koph, but that Jerome transliterated it by ch in his revision: however, it is not generally allowed that Jerome made a revision of 1 Maccabees on the basis of the Hebrew text. See full discussion of this point in Bissell's Com. on Apoc. (N.Y., 1880), p. 474]. Others have held the name was a combination of the initial letters of the sentence "who among the gods is like unto Thee, Jehovah?" (Exod. xv. 11), which is supposed to have been inscribed upon the banners of the patriots; or, again, of the initials of the simply descriptive title "Mattathias, a priest, the son of Johanan." These latter explanations are far fetched. From Judas, at all events, the name came to be applied to the whole family and party. [Dr. Delitzsch considers the name a contraction of mah k'abee, "what is comparable to my father?" Curtiss: The Name Machabee, p. 23.]

A. The First Book of Maccabees relates the fortunes of the Jews from the accession of Antiochus Epiphanes (B. C. 175) to the death of the high priest Simon (B. C. 135), the period during which, under Judas, who raised the rallying standard, and was chief until his death (B. C. 160), the Jews waged war against their Syrian lords, and under Judas' brother Jonathan (B. C. 160-143), who was recognized as prince and high priest, kept up the struggle, though less actively, and under the third brother, Simon (B. C. 143-135), also high priest, achieved their independence.

The book is reliable history, drawn from trustworthy sources, and can be with confidence set down in the first decade of the first century B. C. The date is thus exactly determined, because the author was, on the one hand, acquainted with the chronicle of the deeds of John Hyrcanus (B. C. 135-105), and, on the other, ignorant of the conquests of Pompey in Palestine (B. C. 64). It was written originally in Hebrew.

B. The Second Book of Maccabees runs in time a little before and then parallel with the First book, inasmuch as it extends from the last part of the reign of Seleucus IV. Philopator (or about B.C. 180) to the victory of Judas Maccabæus over Nicanor (B.C. 161 or 160), and furnishes a sort of legendary commentary upon it. It is untrustworthy; has far more a religious than an historic interest. The original is Greek. The book is professedly an extract from a history of the Maccabæan struggle, in five books, written by Jason of Cyrene. But he is otherwise entirely unknown. In regard to the time, we can only say it was before the destruction of the temple. Josephus does not use either Jason or his epitomizer. The first express citation occurs in Clemens Alex. Strom. V., p. 595, ed. Sylb.

C. The Third Book of Maccabees can lay no claim to be at all connected with the Maccabees, because it relates altogether to an earlier period. It and the remaining books of the Maccabees are not found in the Vulgate, nor in the English Apocrypha. The story is this: Ptolemy IV. Philopator (B.C. 222-205), after his victory at Raphia (B.C. 217), made a visit to Jerusalem, and attempted to enter the Holy of Holies, but was unable to do so, because, in answer to the high priest's prayer, he fell down paralyzed. In revenge, on his return to Alexandria he persecuted the Jews there. But his attempts at their destruction were wondrously frustrated, and at last he became their friend and benefactor. The book resembles Esther, but only to show its inferiority.

The style is bombastic and involved. Although the book bears the print of unreliability, still it rests partly upon a basis of fact; for Josephus relates of another Ptolemy — Ptolemy VII. Physcon (c. Apion ii. 5) — an incident similar to that recorded of Ptolemy IV. in regard to the use of elephants to trample down the Jews, and also says that the Alexandrian Jews celebrate the deliverance by a yearly feast. The attempted entrance of the temple may have been made by Ptolemy IV., and tradition set also to his account the first incident.

The time of the book is conjectured by EWALD (Gesch. de Volkes Israel, IV., p. 611) and HAUSRATH (Neutestamentliche Zeitgeschichte, 2 Aufl. II., p. 262) to have been written in the time of Caligula (A.D. 37-41); but this is mere conjecture. We can only say it was written at a late date; for the author was acquainted with the apocryphal additions to Daniel (cf. vi. 6). The first mention of the book is Canones Apos. 85. The abrupt beginning indicates that a part has been lost.

[D. The Fourth Book of Maccabees describes the martyrdom of Eleazer and of the seven brothers (cf. 2 Macc. vi. 18-vii. 41); but, as the second title of the book, On the Supreme Sovereignty of Reason, indicates, the history is a mere illustration of that theme. The book is the product of an Alexandrian Jew who had imbibed stoical notions. The Fathers attributed it to Josephus; but it is not his, although it well may have dated from his times. It has no historical value; but the style, though rhetorical, is correct and vigorous, and truly Greek, which is the original language. It abounds in words peculiar to the book. TISCHENDORF published fragments of it in vol. VI. of his Monumenta Sacra Inedita, Leipzig, 1869.

LIT. — GRIMM: Exeget. Handbuch. Dr. COTTON has published an English translation of it and the fifth book in his edition of The Five Books of the Maccabees, Oxford, 1832.

E. The Fifth Book of Maccabees. It is printed in Arabic, in the Paris and London Polyglotts, and contains a history of the Jews from the attempt of Heliodorus (cf. 2 Macc. iii.) to the birth of our Lord. The author based his work upon I. and II. Maccabees and Josephus, but displays ignorance, and perverts the statements of others. He must have lived after the fall of Jerusalem, and probably outside of Palestine. The original was probably Hebrew. See article by Professor B. F. WESTCOTT in Smith's Dictionary of the Bible, Amer. ed., vol. II., p. 1726.]

10. Ecclesiasticus, or The Wisdom of Jesus, the Son of Sirach. — The apocryphal counterpart to the Book of Proverbs, and, like it, of wide range and earnest spirit, proving the author to have been a moralist of exceptional training. It is well worthy of repeated reading. The form of the book is poetical. It has no perceptible plan.

The Greek text, which alone has come down to us, is announced by itself to be a translation from the Hebrew; but, even if it were not so stated, it must be so regarded, and one very slavishly and not faultlessly made. In the Talmud there are quotations from it (cf. ZUNZ: Die gottesdienstl. Vorträge der Juden, p. 101 sq. DELITZSCH: Zur Gesch. der jüd. Poesie, p. 204 sq. DUKES: Rabbinische Blumenlese, p. 67 sq.). Jerome says he saw a copy of the Hebrew text. The book in his day was commonly called "Ecclesiasticus," as it is to-day.

The author calls himself "Jesus, the Son of Sirach of Jerusalem;" and the translator was his grandson, who, in his thirty-eighth year, came to Egypt, during the reign of Euergetes, i.e., the thirty-eighth year of Euergetes. This gives us a date for the book, because the first of the two Ptolemies who bore the name Euergetes reigned only twenty-five years. But the second, who was named in full Ptolemy VII. Physcon Euergetes II., reigned from B.C. 170 in conjunction with his brother, and from B.C. 145 alone; but he counted his reign from B.C. 170: consequently it was B.C. 132 when the grandson of Sirach came to Egypt; and the book itself may well have been written B.C. 190-170, which was about the time of the death of Simon II. (see Josephus, Antiq. XII. 4, 10), whom it eulogizes.

The first Christian writer to quote the book is Clemens Alexandrinus.

11. The Wisdom of Solomon is an animated hymn in praise of Wisdom, who in the beginning sat with God on his throne (ix. 4), and was by him when the world was made (ix. 9), resting upon the ideas about Wisdom made familiar to us by the Book of Proverbs (viii., ix.) and Job (xxviii. 12 sq.).

The author of the book was a Jewish philosopher of the Philo order,—the union of Jewish faith and Greek philosophy. It is true the book pretends to be from Solomon (viii. 10 sq., ix. 7 sq.); and one modern (Roman-Catholic) theologian, Schmid, can be quoted in behalf of this view. Philo was considered by many, e.g., Luther, to be the author; but it is more probable that it was written between the time of Ecclesiasticus and Philo (B.C. 150-50). It is expressly quoted first by Irenæus. It was originally written in Greek.

APOCRYPHA OF THE NEW TESTAMENT. The relation between canonical and apocryphal writings is quite another with respect to the New Testament than with respect to the Old. The apocryphal books of the Old Testament aim simply at a continuation of the sacred history, and pursue this aim in an honest manner, though without divine authority. The apocryphal writings, on the contrary, relating to the New Testament, purpose directly to substitute spurious sources for genuine. They are very numerous; and the second of the four groups into which they naturally fall—I. Gospels; II. Acts of Apostles; III. Epistles from Apostles; and IV. Revelations—exercised at one time great influence on the church, and was considered the most dangerous source of heresy. Of course, not all of these writings were composed for directly heretical purposes. Many of them, no doubt, originated from much more innocent causes, as a mere pious fraud. But from the very oldest time a suspicion of heresy clung to them all, and contributed much to finally throw the whole literature into the shade. When the canon of the New Testament was fixed, and the apocryphal books thereby became exiled, they ceased to be read; and in the middle ages, even their names were forgotten. Nevertheless, although the books themselves were delivered up to contempt and oblivion, not so with their contents. From their fables sprung a sacred legend, which was kept alive in the congregation during the middle ages,—an ecclesiastical tradition, which the church often utilized in the development of its dogmas. Indeed, the origin of numerous dogmas and usages and traditions dates back to these apocryphal writings; and it was consequently of as much interest to the Evangelical Church to subject this whole literature to a thorough investigation as it was to the Roman Church to keep the whole matter in convenient obscurity. The first collection of apocryphal writings relating to the New Testament was given by MICH. NEANDER, Basel, 1564: a more comprehensive one, made by J. A. FABRICIUS, Hamburg, followed in 1703; then came J. C. THILO'S Codex Apocryphus, N.T., Lips., 1832, still incomplete, but of considerable critical value; and finally the whole literature was gathered, sifted, and published by TISCHENDORF, Acta Apostolorum Apocrypha, Lips., 1851, and Evangelia Apocrypha, Lips., 1853, ed. alt., 1876. [See the English translations by B. HARRIS COWPER, London, 1867, and by WALKER, in the "Ante-Nicene Library," Edinburgh, 1870.]

I. Apocryphal Gospels.—About fifty apocryphal Gospels are still extant, or at least known to us. Some have come down to our time entire, others only in fragments; and of a few we possess nothing but the names. The method employed in these compositions is always the same, whether the author intended simply to collect and arrange what was floating in the general tradition, or whether he intended to produce a definite dogmatical effect. Rarely he threw himself on his own invention; but generally he elaborated what was only hinted at in the canonical Gospels, or transcribed words of Jesus into actions, or described the literal fulfilment of some Jewish expectation concerning the Messiah, or repeated the wonders of the Old Testament in an enhanced form, etc. The work done, he took care to conceal his own name, and inscribed his book with the name of some apostle or disciple, in order to give it authority. We mention first those seven apocryphal Gospels which exist entire, and then those of which we possess only fragments. See RUD. HOFMANN: Das Leben Jesu nach den Apokryphen, Leipzig, 1851. G. BRUNET: Les évangiles apocryphes, Paris, 1863. M. NICOLAS: Études sur les évangiles apocryphes, Paris, 1866. R. REINSCH: Die Pseudo-Evangelien von Jesu und Maria's Kindheit in d. romanischen u. germanischen Literatur, Halle, 1879.

1. Protevangelium Jacobi—ascribed to James, the brother of the Lord—comprises in twenty-five chapters the period from the announcement of the birth of Mary to the massacre of the innocents. It is very old, was widely circulated, and shows traces of Ebionitic origin. Fragments of a Syrian codex are given by WRIGHT: Contributions to the Apocryphal Literature of the N.T., collected and edited from Syrian MSS. in the British Museum, London, 1865.

2. Evangelium Pseudo-Matthæi sive Liber de Ortu Beate Mariæ et Infantie Salvatoris — beginning with the announcement of the birth of Mary, and closing with the youth of Jesus — seems to be of Latin origin, and to have been drawn from the Protevangl. and the Evangel. Thomæ.

3. Evangelium de Nativitate Mariæ contains in ten chapters the history of Mary before the birth of Jesus.

4. Historia Josephi Fabri Lignarii — first published in Arabic, with a Latin translation by Georg Wallin, Leipzig, 1722 — contains the whole biography of Joseph in thirty-two chapters, and gives an elaborate description of his death. As it is evidently written in glorification of Joseph, and destined for recital on the day of his festival, and as the worship of Joseph originated among the Coptic monophysites, the origin of the work is probably Coptic, and not Arabic.

5. Evangelium Thomæ — next to the Protevangl., the oldest among the apocryphal Gospels — was, in the middle of the second century, in use among the Gnostics, more especially among those Gnostics who held docetic views of the person of Christ. Wright published a Syrian codex in London, 1875.

6. Evangelium Infantie Arabicum — first published in Arabic, and with a Latin translation, by H. Sike, 1697 — comprises in fifty-five chapters the period from the birth of Jesus to his twelfth year, and consists mostly of stories from his residence in Egypt. The first nine chapters follow very closely the Protevangl.; the last twenty chapters, the Evangel. Thomæ: but the intermediate part seems to rest on some national tradition, which explains the favor it has found among the Arabs, and the circumstance that several of its details have been incorporated with the Koran. The whole work has an Oriental character. Oriental demonology and magic come everywhere to the surface, and many points cannot be understood without some knowledge of Oriental science and the religion of Zoroaster. The Arabic text, however, is hardly the primitive one, but probably a translation from a Syrian text.

7. Evangelium Nicodemi consists of two separate works, — Gesta Pilati and Descensus Christi ad Inferos, — which were joined together at an early date, though the combination did not receive the name it now bears until after the time of Charlemagne. The former of these two works is of some importance for the explanation and further elucidation of the canonical Gospels; while the latter is of very little interest. In connection with these two works, Tischendorf gives some other apocryphal fabrications, which together form a group by themselves: namely, Epistola Pilati, a letter from Pilate to the emperor, containing a report on the resurrection of Christ; Epistola Pontii Pilati, another letter by him, in which he excuses the unjustness of his verdict by the impossibility of resisting the prevailing excitement; Anaphora Pilati, a report on the trial, execution, death, and resurrection of Jesus; Paradosis Pilati, a report of the examination of Pilate before the emperor, his condemnation and execution; Mors Pilati, Narratio Josephi Arimatensis, and Vindicta Salvatoris. See TISCHENDORF: Pilati circa Christum Judicio quid lucis in Actis Pilati, Lips., 1855; LIPSIVS: Die Pilatus-Acten, Kiel, 1871.

8. Evangelium secundum Ægyptios was used by the Encratites and Sabellians. 9. Evangelium Æternum, the work of a Minorite of the thirteenth century, and condemned by Alexander IV. 10. Evangelium Apellis, probably a mutilation of one of the canonical Gospels. 11. Evangelium Duodecim Apostolorum. 12. Evangelium Barnabæ. 13. Evangelium Bartholomæi. 14. Evangelium Basilidis. 15. Evangelium Cerinthi seems to have been the Gospel according to Matthew arbitrarily remodelled, and in this mutilated shape accepted by the Carpocratians. 16. Evangelium Ebionitarum. 17. Evangelium Eve. 18. Evangelium secundum Hebræos, one of the oldest apocryphal productions, written in Chaldee with Hebrew letters, used by the Nazarenes, and translated into Greek and Latin by Jerome. [See E. B. NICHOLSON: The Gospel according to the Hebrews, London, 1879.] 19. Evangelium Jacobi Majoris, found in Spain in 1595, and condemned by Innocent XI. in 1682. 20. Joannis de Transitu Mariæ, not given by Tischendorf. 21. Evangelium Judee Ischariotæ, used by the Cainites. 22. Evangelium Leucii. 23. Evangelium Luciani and Evangelium Hesychii. 24. Evangelia Manicheorum, comprising (a) Evangelium Thomæ, different from the above-mentioned, (b) Evangelium Vivum, (c) Evangelium Philippi, and (d) Evangelium Abde. 25. Evangelium Marcionis, a mutilation of the Gospel according to Luke, by the founder of the famous anti-Jewish sect. 26. Mariæ Interrogationes, Majores et Minores, two works of improper contents, used by some Gnostics. 27. Evangelium Matthiæ. 28. Narratio de Legali Christi Sacerdotio. 29. Evangelium Perfectionis, used by the Basilidians and other Gnostics. 30. Evangelium Petri was in use in the congregation of Rhossus in Cilicia towards the close of the second century. 31. Evangelium Philippi. 32. Evangelium Simonitarum, or, as it was called by themselves, Liber Quatuor Angelorum et Cardinum Mundi. 33. Evangelium secundum Syros, probably identical with the Evangelium secundum Hebræos. 34. Evangelium Tatiani, a compilation from the four canonical Gospels. 35. Evangelium Thaddæi. 36. Evangelium Valentini is probably the same as the Evangelium Veritatis, which was used by the Valentinians, and differed widely from the canonical Gospels.

II. Apocryphal Acts of the Apostles. — The origin of this kind of writings is about the same as that of the apocryphal Gospels, though the heretical tendency is generally more prominent. For this reason they were much feared in the early church, and we meet with frequent complaints of people who manufactured such "Acts." Especially one Lucius (or Leucius) Chorus, a Manichean, seems to have been very active; but of his productions none is now extant, at least not in the original shape. These works are often transcriptions of transcriptions; and sometimes the version which has come down to us shows a decided Romanizing or popish tendency. Thus the Historia Apostolica Pseudo-Abdias, Libri X., ascribed to Abdias (Bishop of Babylon, and the first bishop consecrated by the apostles themselves), is simply a compilation from earlier heretical writings. According to tradition, the work was originally written in Hebrew by Abdias, and then translated into Latin by Julius Africanus. But it shows a complete ignorance of the time in which it is said to have been written, and can hardly be dated further back than the seventh century. The comprehensive collection of Tischendorf contains:—

1. Acta Petri et Pauli, which in their general contents agree with the De Mirificis Rebus et Actibus Beatorum Petri et Pauli, ascribed to Marcellus, the disciple of Peter, and published by Fabricius (Cod. Apoc., p. 632), as also with the work ascribed to the Roman bishop Linus, and published in Bibl. Patr., Colon., 1618, I., p. 70; while the Historia Apostolica de S. Petro and de S. Paule by Abdias, are very different. 2. Acta Pauli et Thecla, ascribed by Tertullian (De Baptism. 17) to an Asiatic presbyter of the first half of the second century. [See CARL SCHLAU: Die Acten des Paulus und der Thecla u. die ältere Thecla-Legende, Leipzig, 1877.] 3. Acta Barnabæ, of a later date. 4. Acta Philippi. 5. Acta Philippi in Hellade. 6. Acta Andreae, of a very early date. 7. Acta Andreae et Matthiae in Urbe Anthropophagarum, of which the Anglo-Saxon poem Andreas and Elene, Cassel, 1840, by Jacob Grimm, is a paraphrase. 8. Acta et Martyrium Matthiae, a continuation of the preceding. 9. Acta Thomæ, belong to the earliest times. 10. Consummatio Thomæ. 11. Martyrium Bartholomæi. 12. Acta Thaddæi. Whether the old tradition of King Abgarus of Edessa, his correspondence with Christ, the portrait of the Lord sent to him, etc., arose from this work, or whether, perhaps, it rests on the tradition, is questionable. 13. Acta Joannis, of a very old date, and held in great esteem by the Manichæans and certain Gnostics. [See TH. ZAHN: Acta Johannis unter Benutzung v. C. v. Tischendorfs Nachlass bearbeitet. Erlangen, 1880.]

III. Apocryphal Epistles.—The Epistola Abgari ad Christum and Epistola Christi ad Abgarum are given by Eusebius (Hist. Eccles., I., 13), who pretends to have seen the original documents in the archives of Edessa, and in a somewhat modified form in the Acta Thaddæi. [See R. A. LIPSUS: Die edessenische Abgar-sage kritisch untersucht. Braunschweig, 1880.] Also other Scripta Christi are known to tradition; but they are so evidently mythical as to lose all interest. They are given complete by Fabricius in Cod. Apoc. N. T., I., 303-321; III., 439, 511 sq. Several letters from the Virgin Mary are mentioned,—one to Ignatius, the pupil of John; another to the Messanenses; and a third to the Florentines (FABRICIUS: Cod. Apoc. N. T., I., 834, 844, 851). But they all belong to a very late time. Of the two letters from Peter to James, the first one was placed as an introduction to the Recognit. Clement., and its authenticity falls with that of the body of the work; the second is found in FABRICIUS: Cod. Apoc. N. T., I., 907. From Col. iv. 16 we learn that Paul wrote a letter to the Laodiceans, which is lost; and it is not to be wondered at that this lost letter soon found an apocryphal substitute. But it is questionable whether the text which has come down to us, and is first found in Latin in Pseudo-Anselm, in Col. iv. 16, is identical with that mentioned by the Fathers. The letter was incorporated in the German Bible-translations before Luther.—The correspondence between Paul and Seneca, consisting of six letters from Paul, and eight from Seneca, is first mentioned by Jerome, who accepts it as genuine (Catal. Script. Eccles. 12); while Augustine doubts its genuineness (Ep. 153; De Civ. Dei, 6, 10). In the middle ages these letters found great favor, and were incorporated with the editions of Seneca's works; and Faber Stapuleus even ventured to place them among the Paulinian Epistles of the canon, Paris, 1512. The whole correspondence, however, is nothing but a piece of fiction, based on a conjectural conception of Acts xviii. 12. [See F. W. FARRAR: Seekers after God, London, 1869. J. B. LIGHTFOOT: Epistle to the Philippians, London, 1873.]—In a similar manner the passage from 1 Cor. v. 9, where Paul speaks of an earlier letter which has been lost, caused the fabrication of a third letter from Paul to the Corinthians. FABRICIUS: Cod. Apoc. N. T., I., 926.—Finally the Epistola S. Joannis Apostoli ad Hydropicum, is in the apocryphal work of Prochorus: Narrat. de S. Joanne, cap. 34.

IV. Apocryphal Revelations.—Although we know the names of quite a number of apocryphal apocalypses, we possess the texts, or fragments of the texts, of only a few. There is an Apocalypsis Joannis, different from the canonical, and published by Tischendorf. The apocalypse which Cerinthus used was referred back to St. John, but differed in essential points from that contained in the New Testament, as Cerinthus claimed to have received revelations himself. Another "Revelation of St. John," discovered in Spain in 1595, is said to have been translated into Spanish by St. Cæcilius, a disciple of James the Elder, though at that time there existed no Spanish language. One Apocalypsis Petri is mentioned very early, as used by the heretic Theodotus; another is quoted in the twelfth century by Jacobus de Vitriaco, and is identical with the Liber Perfectionis, discovered in 1821 by Alexander Nicoll. One Apocalypsis Pauli, occasioned by 2 Cor. xii. 2-4, is mentioned by Epiphanius as being used by the Cajanes; another, used by the monks of the fourth century, is, according to Du Pin, still in use among the Copts. A Syrian text of this work, discovered among the Nestorians, was published, together with an English translation, in 1866, by Cowper. The Coptic text of an apocryphal work entitled Revelationes Bartholemæi, was published, together with a French translation, by Dulaurier, Paris, 1835. Some fragments of an Apocalypsis Mariæ are given by Tischendorf. An Apocalypsis Thomæ and an Apocalypsis Stephani are mentioned by Gelasius. RUD. HOFMANN.

APOKATASTASIS. The term describes the doctrine of the return of all sinful and condemned creatures unto the favor of God, the moral life in God, and heavenly felicity, and is derived from Acts iii. 21 (Greek text), "restitution." The first Christian writer known to advocate the doctrine as deduced from the Scriptures was Origen (185-253). He held that unrepentant souls after death were punished, but also were instructed by spirits who stood nearer God, and so — some sooner, some later, but all at last — will be led in sorrow and repentance unto God. He planted himself upon the Bible. Christ's rule must be universal, and God must be all in all (Ps. cx. 1; 1 Cor. xv. 27 sq.). The saying of Jesus, that the sin against the Holy Ghost was not forgiven in the impending æon, does not stand in the way, because, after the next æon, there are many others in which it could be forgiven. Origen considered this teaching esoteric, and calculated to do harm, if spread among the masses. A similar doctrine, it is claimed by some, was taught previously by Clement: but he merely asserted, that, in the next world, there is an operation of salvation upon lost souls; but how far it effected a change he does not say. These teachers advocated the dogma as part of a theory of the constitution of God, man, and his soul. In God, goodness was above justice. The human will was not fixed, either in good or bad. Sin was rather darkness and weakness, and therefore could be banished by the entering light of God. See Origen, De Princip., I., 6. 2; II., 3. 1. 3; III., 6. 1 sq. Hom. XVIII. in John. Hom. XIX. in Jeremiah. Contra Celsum, VI., 26. See E. R. Redepenning's edition of De Principiis, Lipsiæ, 1836, which contains Hieron. ad Avit.

Similar ideas in regard to the divine goodness, human freedom, and sin, led to the advocacy of the Apokatastasis by Gregory of Nazianzen (328-389), although not openly, Gregory of Nyssa (332-398) very publicly, Didymus of Alexandria (308-395); by theologians of the Antiochian school, Diodorus of Tarsus (fl. 375), and Theodore of Mopsuestia (350-429), even Chrysostom, as appears in his comments upon 1 Cor. xv. 28.

In the West the doctrine had no prominent advocates. Augustine (353-430) declared against it. The doctrines of Origen were condemned by the Council of Constantinople (543). Afterwards the Apokatastasis was advocated by such men as the Monophysite monk Bar Sudauli in the sixth century; but it rose to far greater prominence in later times, when Johannes Scotus Erigena (d. about 884), drawing from the pseudo-Dionysius the Areopagite and Maximus, from Origen and Gregory of Nyssa, incorporated it into his theology. He taught that God is the substance of all things, and all things at last return to God: accordingly, the Apokatastasis is only a part of the universal process by which all individuality is extinguished. But the theory did not prevail. See Christlieb, Scotus Erigena, Gotha, 1860. The mystics, Eckart (1260-1327), Suso (1300-1365), and others, did not advocate it: on the other hand, the "Brethren and Sisters of the Free Spirit" (thirteenth century) did, and that fanatically.

We are thus brought down to the Reformation. Johann Denk (d. 1527) taught that even the devil would be saved; and he spread the notion among the Anabaptists. (See Bullinger, Der Widertufferen ursprung, Buch 2, Kap. 5; Menius, der Geist der Widertäufer in the Wittenb. ed. of Luther's Werke, II., 293; Uhlhorn, U. Rhegius, p. 122; Baum, Capito u. Bulzer, p. 385.) Denk, although well acquainted with Origen, did not draw exclusively from him, but grounded himself upon Bible studies, conducted in the spirit of the Reformation, citing Rom. v. 18, xi. 32; 1 Cor. xv. 22 sq.; Eph. i. 10; Col. i. 20; 1 Tim. ii. 4; Ps. lxxvii. 8 sq. The chief reformers, however, held unanimously to the church view; and the Augsburg and other confessions of faith declare strongly for an eternal hell.

Towards the end of the seventeenth century the doctrine of the Apokatastasis again appears, and ever since, it has found numerous advocates. The earliest were Jane Leade of London (1623-1704), J. W. Petersen (1649-1727), and the "Philadelphian Society," which Mrs. Leade founded. With them the theory was established not only upon the Bible, but upon personal revelations. It is noteworthy that Jacob Boehme (1575-1624), who influenced them, did not teach this belief. The author of the "Berleburger Bibel" shared their belief; but the most prominent advocate was F. C. Oetinger, the famous Pietist. He read the writings of Mrs. Leade and of the Philadelphians, and wove this tenet into his theological system, depending chiefly upon 1 Cor. xv. and Eph. i. 9-11. J. A. Bengel (1687-1752), the father of modern exegesis, believed it, but thought it dangerous to teach. The modern Dunkers, a Baptist sect in Pennsylvania and Ohio, are supposed to hold this view, derived from Petersen and the Berleburger Bibel.

The Rationalists of Germany since the second half of the former century commonly, and supernaturalists frequently, have, upon various grounds, advocated the return of all souls unto God. Schleiermacher was pronounced in its favor. He maintained that the sensitiveness of the conscience of the damned was a sign that they might be better in the next life than in this, and, quite characteristically also, that it would make an inexplicable "dissonance" in God's universe, if a portion of God's creatures were debarred forever from participation in the redemption of Christ. But his principal arguments were derived from his doctrine of the will and of the method of the operation of the atonement.

In England and America the opposition to the doctrine of the absolute eternity of future punishment has led to the formation of a denomination called the UNIVERSALISTS, which see.

An unprejudiced critic cannot find support for the Apokatastasis in the sayings of Christ or of the apostles, save Paul. Indeed, Matt. xii. 32, xxv. 41, xxvi. 24, Mark ix. 48, xiv. 31, are directly opposed to it. At the same time Rom. v. 18 sq., xi. 32, 1 Cor. xv. 22, have to be read in a different sense from that which lies on the surface, in order to avoid the conclusion that Paul taught it.

Rothe and Martensen, among recent theologians, have brought out the inner, dogmatic, and ethical objections. Thus Rothe, in opposition to Schleiermacher, declares that an Apokatastasis contradicts the self-determining will-power of acceptance of salvation, without which there can be no ethical value in the process; for, if the man is free to accept, he is equally free to refuse. Martensen lays stress upon the conflict between God's sovereignty and human freedom, and, along with the belief in God's intention to save everybody, admits the possibility of an endless damnation.

J. KÖSTLIN.

APOLINARIS, or APOLINARIUS, Claudius, Bishop of Hierapolis in Phrygia, a contemporary of Melitios; flourished in the reign of Marcus Aurelius (161-180), and occupied a prominent position as an apologist of Christianity, and opponent to Montanism. He was a very prolific writer, and Eusebius and Photius mention several works by him, especially his Apology addressed to the emperor; but only a few fragments of a work on the Passover have been preserved in the Chron. Paschale ed. Dindorf, I., p. 13. The catenæ contains numerous fragments marked Ἀπολινάριου; but they have never been carefully examined, and it is probable that most of them belong to Apollinaris from Laodicea.

APOLLINARIANISM, the doctrine of APOLLINARIUS THE YOUNGER, Bishop of Laodicea in Syria (d. 390), the son of Apollinaris the Elder, of Alexandria, who taught grammar and rhetoric, first at Berytus, and afterwards in Laodicea, and became a presbyter in the latter city. When the Emperor Julian forbade the Christians to read the Greek literature, he undertook to indemnify them as best he could, and gave, among other works of the same kind, a poetical paraphrase in Homeric verses of the historical books of the Old Testament. The son, who was also a teacher of rhetoric, and afterwards (335) a lector in Laodicea, but who surpassed the father both in talent and learning, began his literary career in a similar way, but later on concentrated himself on Christian theology. He wrote commentaries on various portions of the Bible, a defence of Christianity against Porphyry, a defence of the Nicene Creed against Eunomius and Marcellus, etc.; and these works brought him in close connection with the representatives of the Orthodox Church, such as Athanasius and others. He was made Bishop of Laodicea, and for a long time he was considered one of the chief supports of the Nicene symbol, when gradually his christological theory, originally aiming simply at a refutation of Arianism, began to develop into open heresy. On the basis of the Nicene Creed, there had grown up a view according to which complete divinity and complete humanity were united in Christ; he being at once a perfect God and a perfect man. But to Apollinaris this idea seemed wholly untenable and self-contradictory, whether approached from an ontological, or psychological, or dogmatical point of view. Two different substances, he reasoned, each complete and perfect in all its attributes, can never unite into one. A complete God and a complete man can never melt together in one person. The idea of an ἀνθρωποθεός is a monstrosity on a level with such mythological creations as the minotaurs, etc. Furthermore, the idea of such a union in Christ, between perfect divinity and perfect humanity, at once destroys the whole idea of atonement. Where there is complete humanity, there is sin; and if sin is thought of as a potentiality in the nature of Christ, he is disqualified for the work of atonement. As perfect divinity and perfect humanity cannot possibly unite in one person, the humanity of Christ, if considered complete, must have moved mechanically beside his divinity, and it is only the man in Christ who has suffered, been crucified, and died; but "the death of a man does not kill death." The solution which Apollinaris offered of this difficulty consisted in limiting the humanity of Christ to a body and an animal soul inhabited by the divine Logos. These doctrines made a great sensation, partly because they pointed to certain weak points in the orthodox confession, partly because they fell in with the general drift of public opinion; and they caused the Church considerable embarrassment on account of the prominent position of their author. The Council of Alexandria (362) condemned them. Athanasius wrote against them in 371. But neither in the one nor in the other case was the name of Apollinaris mentioned. In 375, however, he separated from the Church, and began to form a sect; and in the same year he was condemned by the synod of Rome under Damasus, which condemnation was repeated by the second oecumenical council (381). Several imperial decrees (388, 397, 428) were issued against his adherents, the Apollinarians, or Apollinarists, of whom some returned to the Catholic Church, while others joined the Monophysites. Of his works only fragments are extant. See BAUR: Dreieinigkeit, I.; DORNER: Geschichte der Lehre von Christi Person; SCHAFF: History of the Christian Church, III., 708.

HERZOG.

APOLLONIA, St., suffered martyrdom at an advanced age, in Alexandria, during the Decian persecution (249). She was seized, together with other Christians, and received such violent blows upon her jaws, that she lost all her teeth. The Pagans then lit the pyre, and demanded that she should curse Christ. She hesitated for a moment, and then she suddenly leaped into the fire. During the middle ages she was worshipped as the patroness against the toothache. She is commemorated in the Roman Church on Feb. 9.

APOLLONIUS OF TYANA, b., probably in the same year as Christ, at Tyana in Cappadocia, and educated at Ægæ in Cilicia, where he studied medicine in the temple of Æsculapius, and became acquainted with the various philosophical schools; was an ardent adherent of the New-Pythagorean system, which, since the close of the second century B.C., had spread rapidly from Alexandria, both among the Greeks and the Romans. In his fortieth year he began to travel, and visited first Bardanes, king of Parthia, then the Indian gymnosophists, with whom he found great sympathy, and, at a later period, also the Egyptian wise men. After his return from India he developed a great activity as a moral and religious reformer in Asia Minor, Greece, Italy, and Spain, converting individuals, and forming congregations. He stood in connection with many of the most prominent men in Rome, and was personally acquainted with Vespasian and Titus. Under Domitian, however, he was thrown into prison, but only for a short time (94). The last years of his life he spent in the temple of Olympia, surrounded by a great crowd of disciples, who imitated his ascetic manner of life; and from here he disappeared in some unknown way during the reign of Nerva, nearly one hundred years old. His life was written by Philostratus, on the instance of Julia Domna, the wife of Sep-timius Severus, but not published until after her death (217). The latest edition is that by Westermann, Paris, 1849. The object of this work is evidently to give a representation of the ideal New-Pythagorean philosopher; and although the chronological details are correct, and in accordance with other historical facts, this object is pursued with such an unsparing profusion of mysteries and miracles, that it becomes wholly impossible to separate the real Apollonius from the fancy picture by Philostratus. That the biography was written as a direct parallel to the gospel narrative of Christ can hardly be maintained; but it was often employed as a weapon against Christianity, both in ancient and modern days. See the English translation by Charles Blount, 1680; the French translation by Castellan, 1774; BAUR: Apollonius und Christus, Tüb., 1832; A. CHASSANG: Le Merveilleux dans l'Antiquité, Paris, 1862 [J. H. NEWMAN: Historical Sketches, II., 1872; C. L. NIELSEN: Apollonius fra Tyana, Kjøbenhavn (Copenhagen), 1879; C. H. PETERSCH: Apollonius von Tyana, Berlin, 1879.] IWAN MÜLLER.

APOLLONIUS is the name of two men active in the Christian Church in the second century. The one was an ecclesiastical author, and lived, as it seems, in Asia Minor. He wrote a work against the Montanists while Montanus and both his prophetesses were still alive. The other enjoyed a great reputation among the Roman Christians on account of his scientific and philosophical accomplishments, and because he delivered an eloquent apology for the Christians before the senate, which cost him his life. He suffered martyrdom under Commodus before 186.

APOL'LOS (probably a contraction from Apollonius, belonging to Apollo), one of the most efficient workers in the early church, noted for his eloquence and learning (Acts xviii. 24). He was born of Jewish parents at Alexandria, Egypt, and became one of John's disciples; but at Ephesus, in A. D. 54, he met Aquila and Priscilla, who instructed him in the gospel (Acts xviii. 26), and ever afterwards was an enthusiastic and successful preacher in Achaia and at Corinth. Paul's First Epistle (A. D. 57) to the latter city mentions him as unhappily the favorite of a faction. There is no doubt that such a state of things was very painful to Apollos, who refrained from visiting the church while thus distracted. The last mention of Apollos is Tit. iii. 13, and shows Paul's affectionate interest.

Many scholars to-day incline to regard Apollos as the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews, — a work for which his abundant learning and great eloquence fitted him; but the designation is incapable of proof.

APOLOGETICS and APOLOGY. Apologetics is a theological discipline; the apology, a practical utterance of religious life. Apologetics originated from a scientific demand, and aspires at systematic form, encompassing Christianity as a whole, and defending it as the principle of truth. The apology changes its contents and its method in accordance with the outward circumstances which call it forth, confining itself to those points which in each individual case have been attacked. Thus the difference between apologetics and apology may be put down provisionally as one between theory and practice; and as theory always comes after practice, and experience always precedes science, it may be found easiest to explain the relation of apologetics and apology, and fix the position of the former in the theological system, in the course of an historical representation of the subject.

I. Apologies directed against adversaries outside of Christianity. — Up to the time of Constantine the church had to battle for its existence, and this circumstance gave the whole period an apologetical character. The first written apologies, dating from the times immediately after the apostles, are political defences addressed to Roman authorities, such as those by Aristides, Quadratus, Melito of Sardis, Claudius Apollinaris, Justin Martyr, and Athenagoras. Also Tertullian's Apologeticus and Ad Scapulam belong to this class. The general object of these works is, with reference to Paganism, to defend the Christians against accusations of atheism, debaucheries, treason, etc., and, with reference to Judaism, to prove by evidence from the prophets that Jesus was the Messiah, and that righteousness cannot be attained through the law, but only by faith in Christ. But through the whole series of works we see how the original juridical form of the apology gradually grew into the theological, and how the defence by degrees became an attack on the blindness and stubbornness of Judaism, on the folly and vanity of Paganism, etc. During the third and fourth centuries the Christian apology developed still further, and its problems widened as it felt itself established on scientific ground. Its object was now, not so much to prove the piety of the Christians as to prove the truth of Christianity; and here a characteristic difference is discovered between the Greek and Latin apologist. The former is a philosopher; and logical reasoning, with proper application of the ideas of Socrates and Plato, is the weapon by which he contends for the truth of the Christian doctrines: the latter is a jurist, and in the principles of the Roman law he finds the arms with which he fights for the inalienable rights of the individual. Clement of Alexandria institutes with superior calmness and impartiality a comparison between the religious ideas of Paganism and Christianity. Origen proves in a more polemical tone, but with admirable acuteness and stupendous erudition, the trustworthiness of the Gospels, the divinity of the miracles, and the intrinsic reasonableness of the Christian doctrines; while Tertullian appears as the legal defender of Christianity, and pleads his cause with cutting sharpness and sarcasm. In the series of Latin apologists follow Minutius Felix, Cyprian, Arnobius, and Lactantius; in that of the Greek, Methodius and Apollinaris of Laodicea.

Its point of culmination the ancient apology reached in the period from Constantine the Great to the middle of the fifth century, when, freed from any pressure from without, the church obtained the leisure necessary to purely scientific pursuits. In his two works, Adv. Gentes and De Incarnatione, Athanasius made the first successful attempt to vindicate Christianity by proceeding from its very centre, the doctrine of redemption, and to refute its adversaries by a genetical demonstration of their errors. From his time the apophoristical and casual character of the apology disappears, and a scientific treatment according to principles becomes more and more prominent. Although the attacks of Julian gave rise to a number of works simply adapted to the special occasion, the systematic development of the apology was, nevertheless, continued by Eusebius of Cæsarea, and Augustine. In order to silence the reproach frequently made against Christianity, that it was the cause of the decay of the Roman Empire, Augustine combined in his De Civitate Dei the speculation and historical demonstration of his predecessors, constructed the whole politico-religious defence of Christianity on the basis of a contrast between the kingdom of heaven and the kingdom of this world, and interpreted the downfall of the Roman Empire as the fulfilment of a divine judgment in favor of Christianity. His disciple Orosius took the same ground, and the systematic form of the apology was cultivated also by Cyril of Alexandria and Theodoret of Cyprus.

After the downfall of the ancient world, during the first half of the middle ages, the Talmudic Judaism and the appearance of Islamism still occasioned some apologetical activity. Against the former wrote Agobard of Lyons, De Insolentia Judæorum, 822; against both, Raimund Martius, Pugio Fidei adv. Mauros et Judæos, 1278; also the Dialogus inter Philosophum, Judæum et Christianum, by Abelard, may be mentioned here.

II. Apologies directed against adversaries within the Church. Although the apology always contained more or less polemics against heresies, up to the second half of the middle ages it was, nevertheless, chiefly occupied with adversaries outside of the church; but from this time it became more and more necessary for it to vindicate the divine basis of the Christian faith also before the reasoning spirit of the Christian Church. The scholastic elaboration of the Christian dogmatics was hardly completed, when the whole building was shaken by the question of the relation between science and faith, reason and revelation, and thereby the apology was compelled to assume an entirely new position. The Summa Cathol. Fidei con. Gentiles, by Thomas Aquinas, was the first attempt to give an apologetic theory of the Revelation in its relation to reason; but it was not until after the fifteenth century, when the revival of the classical studies by the Humanists in Italy turned the sway of Aristotelian forms of reasoning into an enthusiasm for Pagan ideas, poetical and philosophical, that the split between theology and philosophy became fully apparent, and with it the new adversary intra muros, — the Pagan in Christian clothes. With steady reference to these fratres in Platone, Marsilius Ficinus tried to christianize Platonism, and platonize Christianity, in his De Reliq. Christiana; and by their historical researches, Picius of Mirandola, John Reuchlin, and others, brought Christianity in close contact with the Jewish Cabbala; while Savonarola, in prophetic spirit, and with practical tendencies of the deepest earnestness, attacked the irreligious frivolity of his age in his Triumphus Crucis. One of the most important apologists, however, of the whole period before the Reformation, was the Spaniard, Louis Vives, whose De Verit. Fidei Christ., 1543, was also directed against the Pagan tendencies of his time. Immediately after the Reformation we meet with Philipp de Mornays: La Vérité de la Religion Chrétienne, 1579, and the much more important work by Hugo Grotius: De Verit. Relig. Christ., 1627. In the works by Abbadie: La Vérité de la Relig. Chrét., 1684, Limborch: De Verit. Rel. Christ. Collatio cum Erud. Judæo, 1687, and Huet: Demonstratio Evang., 1679, some regard is already paid to the deism and naturalism now looming up above the horizon. The most prominent work of an apologetical character from the period between the sixteenth and the eighteenth centuries is Pascal's Pensées sur la Religion, 1669. Though its form is apophoristic throughout, it gives some of the deepest hints of the true nature and method of apology.

During the second half of the seventeenth and the whole of the eighteenth century, deism and naturalism reigned widely in England, France, and Germany; and in all three countries the doctrine that natural religion forms the true kernel of all revelation — on the basis of which assertion, first the necessity and value, next the truth and possibility, of a supernatural revelation, were attacked — called forth a rich apologetical activity. England produced an enormous number of apologetical works. Some of these apologists, however, were not free from deism themselves; they endeavored to find a ground common to them and their adversaries; they yielded too much to the principle of their opponents (Locke, Whitby, Clarke, Foster, and others); they often sacrificed the kernel in order to save the shell (Burnet, Robinson, Archibald Campbell, Williamson, and others). Others, however, assumed a decidedly polemical attitude, and developed with great thoroughness and industry the historical evidences of Christianity, — the miracles (Leland, Pearce, Adams, especially George Campbell against Hume), the resurrection of Christ (Ditton, Sherlock, West), and the prophecies (Edward and Samuel Chandler, Sydenham, Newton, Hurd). Noticeable are also Robert Boyle, who founded an apologetical prize, — an institution which soon was imitated in other countries, for instance, in Holland, — Richard Baxter, Cudworth, Skelton, Stillingfleet (Origines sacre, 1662, and Vindication of the Doctrine of Trinity, 1697), Richard Bentley (against Collins), Warburton (The Divine Legation of Moses, 1738), Waterland, Watson, Stackhouse, Conybeare, Addison (Essay on the Truth of the Christ. Religion). Lardner (The Credibility of the Gospel History, 12 vols., 1741) showed with great thoroughness and minuteness the trustworthiness of the New Testament history and its authors. A still greater influence was exercised by Butler's book, The Analogy of Religion to the Constitution and Course of Nature, 1736, a work of great originality, which holds its own to this day, remarkable for thoroughly refuting objections without mentioning the name of a single objector, and Paley's View of the Evidences of Christianity, 1794, and Natural Theology, 1802, which still belong to the standard works of English theology. Generally, however, the necessity and demonstrability of the biblical revelation formed the somewhat narrow ground occupied by the English apologists. They considered Christian truth a set of doctrines rather than a new and divine principle of life. [See Rev. JOHN HUNTER, D.D.: Religious Thought in England, from the Reformation to the End of the Last Century, London, 1870-74, 3 vols. 8vo. For a legible and accessible reprint of the more famous works produced by the deistic controversy, see Christian Literature, London, 1867 (Bohn). The volume contains: Watson's "Apology for Christianity" and "Apology for the Bible;" Paley's "Evidences of Christianity," and "Horæ Paulinæ;" Jency's "View of the Internal Evidence of the Christian Religion;" Leslie's "Truth of Christianity Demonstrated," "Short and Easy Method with the Deists," and "Short and Easy Method with the Jews;" Chandler's "Plain Reasons for being a Christian;" Lyttleton's "Observations on the Conversion of St. Paul;" Cambell's "Dissertation on Miracles;" Sherlock's "Trial of the Witnesses, with the Sequel to the Trial;" West on the "Resurrection." In France during the eighteenth century, frivolous latitudinarianism, materialism, and atheism followed in the track of the deistical enlightenment. The contest against Voltaire, Rousseau, and the encyclopedists, was carried on among the Roman Catholics by Le Vassor, Denyse, Houteville, d'Aguesseau, Bergier. (Traité historique et dogmatique de la vraie Religion, 12 vols., 1780), and Chateaubriand, whose Génie du Christianisme, 1803, made a great impression by emphasizing the æsthetic side of Christianity; and among the Protestants by Jacquilot (against Boyle), J. A. Turretin (Cogitat. et Dissertat. Theol., 1737, and Traité de la vérité de la rel. chrét.), and Bonnet (La palingénésie philosophique, 1764), who, from his peculiar stand-point of natural philosophy, undertook to reconcile the belief in miracles with the scientific conception of the laws of nature.

In Germany, as in England, the apologetic literature of the eighteenth century showed a double character, influenced in the former country by rationalism, as in the latter by deism. Rationalistic latitudinarians defended only the reasonableness and high morality of Christianity against open deniers; while the orthodox supranaturalists vindicated the revelation, with its miracles and mysteries, as divine truth against both the naturalists and the rationalists. In his celebrated Theodice (1710) against Boyle, Leibnitz maintained the complete harmony between reason and true religion; and in the same direction followed Pfaff, Mosheim, A. F. W. Sack, Euler (Rettung der gött. Offbg., 1747), Jerusalem (Betrachtungen über die vornehmsten Wahrheiten der Rel., 1768), Nösselt (Vertheidigung der Wahrheit und Göttlichkeit der christ. Rel., 5th ed., 1783), Haller (Briefe über d. wichtigsten Wahrh. d. Offbg., 3d ed., 1779, and Briefe über einige Einwürfe noch lebender Freigeister, 1775). Lilienthal, Die gute Sache der göttl. Offbg., 16 vols., 1750-82, occupies a prominent place on account of his thorough historical investigations; also Less: Beweis d. Wahrheit d. christ. Rel., 5th ed., 1785, and M. Fr.

Roos: Beweis dass die ganze Bibel von Gott eingegeben, 1791. After the appearance, however, of the Wolfenbüttel Fragments in 1777, and during the ascendancy of Lessing's principle of the transformation of revealed truth into reasoned truth, the contest grew considerably hotter; but that which was offered by the rationalists (Döderlein, Semler, Seiler, and others) was much inferior to Kleuker's Neue Prüfung und Erklärung der vorzögl. Beweise für die Wahrheit und den göttlichen Ursprung des Christenthums, 1787, and Untersuchung der Gründe für die Ächtheit und Glaubwürdigkeit der Urkunden des Christenthums, 5 vols., 1793. These works, like Köppen's Die Bibel ein Werk der göttlichen Weisheit, 1787, 3d ed., 1837, represent Christianity as a divine plan in history.

III. Apologetics proper. — Most of the above-mentioned works owe their origin to some practical demand, rather than to any purely scientific interest. But, from the beginning of the nineteenth century, a desire grew up to gather together all that was permanent and fundamental among the various apologetical materials, and form it into an organic system, an independent science. Kant's and Fichte's criticism of Revelation, and their attempt to confine religion entirely within the limits of pure reason and practical volition, made it more and more necessary to subject the ideas of religion and revelation to a deeper research, and place the whole question of the necessity, possibility, and reality of a revelation on an entirely new basis. The name "apologetics" was first introduced by Planck, Einleitung in die Theol. Wissenschaft, 1794; but for a long time the definition of this new science, and its position in the theological system, continued uncertain, and a matter of dispute. Tzschirner made it a part of historical theology; Planck, of exegetical theology. The first attempts at a positive representation are also somewhat vacillating in their general character; as, for instance, P. E. Müller: Kristelig. Apologetik, Copenhagen, 1810; J. S. Franke: Entwurf einer Apologetik d. christl. Relig., 1817; Stein: Apologetik des Christenthums als Wissenschaft dargestellt, 1824. In his Kurze Darstellung d. theolog. Studiums, 1810, 2d edition, 1830, Schleiermacher places apologetics in the philosophical division of the theological system; and this was the character which it assumed in the hands of Sack, 1829, Stendel, 1830, Von Drey, 1838, Staudenmaier, 1840, Dieringer, 1841, Fleck, 1847. Its relations to the philosophy and history of religion were unmistakable. The philosophy of religion treats of the idea of religion, and constructs its system, without any reference to the Christian religion; while the object of apologetics is to demonstrate the idea of Christianity as the absolute truth. The history of religion represents all religions according to their own profession, without any partiality; while the object of apologetics is to prove the absoluteness of the Christian religion from the insufficiency of the non-Christian religions. Not so clear, however, is the relation between apologetics and dogmatics; though of late the former has generally been treated as a more or less independent introduction to the latter, as, for instance, by Delitzsch, Baumstark, and Ebrard [and by J. A. DORNER: System der christlichen Glaubenslehre, Berlin, 1879, vol. i.]. See, besides the above-mentioned works on apologetics, Heubner: Apologetik in Ersch and Gruber's "Encycl." I., Section IV., 451; Tholuck: Vermischte Schriften, I., 149; Hirzel: Über die christliche Apologetik, 1843; Zöckler: Beweis des Glaubens, 1867, p. 3 et sq.; Sieffert: Apolog. Fundamentierung d. christl. Glaubenswissenschaft, 1871.

IV. Recent Apologies.—The criticism of the school of Tübingen, the works of Strauss, Renan, and others, and the materialistic tendency of the whole course of modern natural philosophy, combining into one general attack on Christianity, have in our time called forth a great number of apologetical works of every description, of which we shall mention the most prominent. STIRM: Apologie d. Christenthums, 2d ed., 1856; ULLMANN: *Wesen d. APOSTASY (ἀποστασία, apostasia, "revolt") comprised, when the doctrine first was formed in the Church, both the apostasia perfidie (revolt against the faith), the apostasia inobedientie (revolt against authority) and the apostasia irregularitatis (revolt against the rules). A precise distinction between the two last forms of apostasy was never established, however; and at present the apostasia inobedientie is identical with apostasia a monachatu (revolt against the monastic vow), and the apostasia irregularitatis with apostasia a clericatu (revolt against the clerical vow). Neither of these forms is possible outside of the Roman-Catholic Church; while the apostasia a fide or perfidie is known also to Protestant churches.

Apostasia a monachatu takes place when a regular member of an ecclesiastical order leaves his monastery and its rules without due permission from his superior, and returns to the world either as ecclesiastic or as layman. Apostasia a clericatu, which can be committed only by ecclesiastics of the higher grades, is an unpermitted return to the world of some such ecclesiastic: apostates of this kind were Talleyrand, Rouge, etc. Both forms of apostasy were by the Council of Chalcedon belaid with anathema, to which later ecclesiastical legislation has added loss of all privileges of order and estate, excommunication, and infamy. All bishops were required to seize and imprison criminals of this kind when found in their dioceses. Apostates from monastic vows were delivered up to the superior of their order, to be punished in accordance with the peculiar laws and usages of the order: apostates from the priesthood were detained in prison until they returned to obedience. Neither of these forms of apostasy is punished by the state.

Apostasia a fide means secession from the Christian congregation, and disowning of the name of Christ. It is allied to heresy and schism, involves both these crimes, and has always been considered a higher grade of them. The passages of Scripture on which the legal treatment of this form of apostasy is based are, Heb. iii. 12, vi. 4-9, x. 16-29; 2 Pet. ii. 15-21; 2 John ix. 11; Luke xii. 9. In the ancient church, during the epoch of persecution, this crime was, of course, much more frequently met with than now: but the ancient church made a distinction, and called only such as seceded voluntarily apostates; while those who fell from weakness, or were compelled by force, were classified as libellatici, sacrificati, traditores, etc. All were excommunicated; and at first the church refused to grant absolution, either altogether, or till the hour of death; but afterwards this severity decreased, and the excommunicated were received into the church once more on condition of repentance and penance. This is still the actual state of the case. The decree of Boniface VIII., identifying apostasy to Judaism with heresy, has been of special importance, as it has been extended also to other cases of apostasy, and its principle has been adopted by the state. Apostates to Islamism, the so-called renegades, are still treated by the Roman Church from this point of view. To apostates to modern atheism, however, the principle cannot be applied, as such apostates generally make no public confession, which is necessary to prove the crime.

Under the first Christian emperors, the Roman state considered apostasy as a civil crime, to be punished with confiscation of property, loss of Testimentifactio, inability to serve as a witness, infamy, etc.: see Tit. Theodos. Cod. de apostat. (16, 7) tit. Just. Cod. ead. (1, 7) I. 1, 7. Th. C. de Judeis (16, 8); comp. Platner, Quaest. de Jure Crimin. Romano, Marburg, 1842, pp. 265-267. During the middle ages the German Empire had no occasion to make laws against apostasy: it adopted the above-mentioned ecclesiastical view, and considered apostasy a qualified heresy. The German criminal codes of the early middle ages know no penalties for apostasy, and the criminal code of Charles V. (1532) abolished also the penalties for heresy.

With respect to the Protestant churches it is in the very nature of the idea of a state-church, indeed, of a church in general, that it cannot remain altogether indifferent to apostasy. It must take notice of the fact in some way or other; but of course it cannot employ the aid of the state. See LINDE: Staatskirche, Gewissensfreiheit und religiöse Vereine, Mainz, 1845, p. 17; AMTHOR: De Apostasia Liber Singularis, Coburg, 1833; GEORG FEJÉR: Jus Ecclesiae Catholicae adversus Apostatas, Pest., 1847.

APOSTLE. This name, "sent of God," was given in the Old Testament to the organs of the divine revelation (Num. xvi. 28; Isa. vi. 8; Jer. xxvi. 5); and so in the New Testament, not only to Jesus, as frequently in John (cf. Heb. iii. 1), but to John the Baptist (John i. 6), and to those whom Jesus sent forth (cf. Luke xi. 49; Matt. xxiii. 34, 37). This is surely the derivation of the word "apostle;" and that it came into such universal and early use is good evidence that it was the name given by Jesus to the Twelve (Luke vi. 13). To the apostles Jesus gave a special training. They were particularly to be witnesses of his resurrection. Their number was twelve, because there were twelve tribes; and after the death of Judas, the disciples filled the break by an election (Acts i. 15 sq.). The apostles made their nation's capital the centre of their work; and, as the church grew, they remained its head, and staid in the city after the disciples were dispersed (Acts viii. 1), continuing, however, when necessary, to make excursions into the neighborhood (cf. viii. 14 sq., ix. 32 sq.). Their number received the addition of another, Paul, whose call to the apostolate was precisely as good as theirs, and whom they eventually recognized as every way fitted to work among the Uncircumcised as they were among the Circumcised (Acts ix. 1; Gal. ii. 11 sq.). The different spheres of labor being thus recognized, there was no clashing and no jealousy. It may well be that Paul and Peter could not work together in the same place; but that there was a dissension between them is unproven and improbable. The Tübingen school has overstrained the difference between the two leading apostles.

Tradition assigns to each apostle a specific part of the then known world: accordingly there is a festival of "the Dispersion of the Apostles," celebrated July 15; but there is no proof that this was the case. This much is true: Peter and John, as is proven by their letters, left the centres of Judaism, and labored, like Paul, amid heathen populations, and, it would seem, among the heathens themselves. [The signs of an apostle were (1) Witness of the Resurrection (Acts i. 21, 22); (2) Commission from Christ himself (Luke vi. 13; Gal. i. 1); (3) Inspiration (John xvi. 13); (4) Miraculous powers (Acts ii. 43; Heb. ii. 4). The word "apostle" is also used in a wider sense of a gospel herald (2 Cor. viii. 23; Phil. ii. 25).] K. SCHMIDT.

APOSTLES' CREED, The (Symbolum Apostolicum), can, in its present form, be traced back with certainty to the beginning of the sixth or the end of the fifth century. The text, Latin and Greek, first occurs in a manuscript from the eighth or ninth century of the Psalterium Græcum et Romanum, erroneously ascribed to Gregory the Great. But it is evident from the pseudo-Augustinian sermons, that this very text was used in the churches of Gaul about the year 500. As now no trace of it can be found before this time, while various other creeds deviating more or less from it can be proved to have been in common use, the year 500 may be put down approximatively as the date of its origin. Singular it is, however, that a formula of so late a date should have obtained the epithet "apostolical;" and of the meaning of this epithet there can be no doubt, as the legend telling how the apostles made the creed, by adding each one separate sentence, is contemporary with the creed itself. Hence it would seem probable that there must have been in the Roman Church an earlier creed, which, when superseded by what is now known as the Apostles' Creed, transferred its dignity, name, and legend to its successor. And so there was. The conjecture fits the known facts. Between 250 and 480 the Church of Rome used a shorter symbol, or creed, which was held in the highest esteem, in which no alterations were tolerated, and which was considered the common work of the twelve apostles brought to Rome by Peter. The Greek text of this older and shorter Roman symbol first occurs in Marcellus of Ancyra (336-341), the Latin in Rufinus (390). It must be noticed, that, while with the younger and longer Roman symbol the Greek version evidently is a translation of the Latin, in the older and shorter, the Latin is certainly a translation of the Greek. See both texts in Schaff's Creeds, Vol. II., pp. 47 sq. Ambrosius speaks of this creed, and seems to have known the legend of its origin; though Rufinus, who wrote later, did not know it. Also Jerome, Coelestine I. (422-431), Sixtus III. (431-440), and Leo I. (440-461) allude to the apostolical origin of the symbol; and so highly did Ambrosius prize it, that he ascribed a greater authority to it than to any work of any single apostle. The questions then arise, Whence did this older, shorter, Roman symbol come? and in what relation did it stand to the younger and longer?

With respect to the first question, the very circumstance that the Latin version is a translation of the Greek points towards an Eastern source; but there is nothing to show that the said Greek text ever has been actually used by any Greek church. Generally there is a great difference between the creeds of the Western Church and those of the Eastern Church, both internally and externally. All the creeds of the Western Church have, if not their root, at least their type, in the old, short Roman symbol. They have all an historical character. New facts are added in some local creed to make the symbol more fully representative of the Christian faith; but nothing pertaining to the original type is ever left out. The Eastern Church, which knew nothing of a creed made by the apostles themselves, felt more free about the matter. All Oriental creeds are pre-eminently dogmatical; and changes were made simply to suit circumstances, for polemical purposes, in order to crush dogmatical heresies. Important historical facts are left out, and anti-Gnostic, anti-Monarchian, anti-Arian definitions take their place. Thus the Oriental creeds are in a state of steady transition up to the moment when the Nicæno-Constantinopolitan Creed is established, and a rigid conservatism adopted. Nevertheless, in this stream of shifting shapes, the presence of something typical is very strongly felt, and though this type cannot be bodily caught, and palpably traced out, its resemblance to the old, short Roman symbol, cannot be mistaken. But at this point all further demonstration becomes impossible. The common source of these two types is a matter of pure construction. Only it may be asserted that the starting-point cannot have been the common work of the twelve apostles, or the work of any single apostle. In that case, the history of the creeds during the second and third centuries would have been another than that it has been.

With respect to the second question, it seems probable that it was the adoption by the Church of Rome of the Nicæno-Constantinopolitan Creed which mediated the transition from the older to the younger Roman symbol. The rule of the Ostrogoths in Italy brought the Church of Rome in dangerous proximity to Arianism, and, in order to emphasize its attitude with respect to this heresy, the church felt compelled to adopt a more explicit, so to speak polemically formed, symbol. Then, again, when this necessity ceased to press on the church, and a return to a simpler creed became possible, the old symbol had grown dim in men's memory; while the new stood fresh and vigorous, recommending itself with its noble simplicity, its easy completeness, and the great favor it had already won in the churches of Gaul.

ADOLF HARNACK.

APOSTOLIC BROTHERS, or APOSTOLICS, is the name of a sect which was founded in Upper Italy, in the latter half of the thirteenth century, by Gerhard Sagarelli, a native of Alzano, in the dominion of Parma. It arose as a natural re-action against the ostentatious and vainglorious splendor of the Roman Church, and its principal tenet was a literal imitation of the life and apparel of the first followers of Christ. At first Sagarelli made only a very slight impression, and found only very few adherents. But the interference of the Bishop of Parma (in 1280), the decrees of Honorius IV. (in 1286), suppressing all religious associations not sanctioned by the pope, the ex-communication of Sagarelli by the synod of Würzburg (1287) finally attracted attention to him. The number of his adherents increased, and his attacks on the worldliness of the church grew bolder. In 1294 he was seized, and compelled to recant; and in 1300 he was burnt for having relapsed. A man of much greater gifts, Dolcino, now took the lead of the sect; and by his enthusiasm and apocalyptic prophecies he attracted great numbers of followers. Against the troops which were sent to arrest him, he defended himself by force; but in 1307 he was defeated and burnt. Still the sect did not yet succumb. In 1310 it was condemned by a synod of Treves; in 1311 it appeared in the neighborhood of Spoleto, in 1320 in Toulouse; in 1368 it was condemned by a synod of Lavaux; and in 1374 this condemnation was repeated by a synod of Narbonne. In France and Germany the sect often united with the Fratricelles and Beghards. See DOLCINO.

APOSTOLICAL CANONS. Under the title Canones qui dicuntur Apostolorum, an appendix is in many codices, though not in all, added to the eighth book of the Apostolical Constitutions, giving sometimes fifty, sometimes eighty-five, rules concerning ecclesiastical discipline. As far as their contents are concerned, these rules have been drawn partly from Holy Writ and the tradition of the church, partly from the decrees of the synods (Antioch, Neo-Cæsarea, Nicæa, and Laodicæa), and partly from the Apostolical Constitutions, a letter from St. Basil (370), etc. The author of this collection is unknown. It was made in Syria, and probably gradually, though within the fifth century, as Dionysius Exiguus incorporated the shorter version in his collection, and, fifty years later on, Johannes Scholasticus, the longer one in his. The Council of Trullo (692), which repudiated the Apostolical Constitutions, recognized the Apostolical Canons, and after that time they always form part of the Greek collections of canon law. In the Western Church, only the first fifty canons, that is the shorter version, were recognized; but to these the popes often appeal: John II., in a letter to Cæsarius of Arles; Zacharias, in a letter to Pepin, etc. The work was first published by Merlin, Paris, 1524, but after that time often in collections of canon law. They are found also in Uetzen's Constitutiones Apostolicæ (1853), pp. 236-253 (85 canons in Greek). See the article Apostolical Canons, in SMITH and CHEETHAM:

Dictionary of Christian Antiquities, and our article, APOSTOLICAL CONSTITUTIONS.

APOSTOLICAL CHURCH DIRECTORY, a collection of prescripts and instructions belonging to the beginning of the third century, and extant in several Ethiopian and Arabian manuscripts, but only in one Greek. In many points this collection presents a remarkable conformity to the seventh and eighth books of the Apostolical Constitutions and to the Epistle of Barnabas; but it is, nevertheless, independent of both. It consists of thirty-five articles, and contains moral instructions ascribed to John, and ecclesiastical prescripts ascribed to the other apostles, and treating of bishops, elders, deacons, widows, the duties of laymen, and the question whether women should be allowed an active participation in divine service. The whole ends with an admonition by Peter to follow these instructions. The collection was first published in a Latin translation of the Ethiopian text by Hiob Ludolf: Commentarius in Historiam Æthiopicam. The Greek text, accompanied by a German translation, has been given by BICKELL in his Geschichte des Kirchenrechts, Giessen, 1843.

APOSTOLICAL CONSTITUTIONS is the name of a collection of ecclesiastical prescripts in eight books, in which three independent works have been combined. I. The first six books were probably originally written in Greek, in the diocese of Ephesus. They give in the loose form of a continuous speech, and in a very diffuse style, a multitude of doctrinal, liturgical, and moral instructions. The author is unknown; but he has evidently drawn from the longer version of the Epistles of Ignatius. The Greek original is lost; but a Syrian translation is still extant in several manuscripts; and a transcription of the work, made in the beginning of the third century, exists in Greek, Arab, Ethiopian, and Coptic versions. II. The seventh book treats in a very much more concise style of the different paths which lead to life or to death, and—to judge from the contents, which may be characterized as a transition from Sabellianism to Arianism—it belongs to the fourth century, though before the Council of Nicæa. It ends with some liturgical rules and formularies. Chaps. i.-xviii. conform often to the Epistle of Barnabas. In the Orient it is not known. III. The eighth book, probably originally a ritual for bishops, and according to its contents older than the Council of Nicæa, is found in various collections, both Oriental and Greek. The style is peculiar, the form is that of ordinances; the apostles command. It, too, contains, a number of liturgical formularies. Chap. iv., on Ordination, bears in many codices the special title, "The Constitutions of the Holy Apostles concerning Ordination by Hippolytus;" and also other collections of apostolical traditions, Ethiopian and Arabian, are ascribed to this man. With respect to the work as a whole, it is noteworthy, however, that the three divisions sometimes give three contradictory instructions, as, for instance, on the question of tithes (ii. 25, 28; vii. 29; viii. 30).

The Apostolical Constitutions were never recognized by the Western Church, and were hardly known in Western Europe before the sixteenth century. In the Eastern Church, opinions were divided about the worth and dignity of the work, until the Council of Trullo (692) decided the question by rejecting the book. It was first published by Turrianus (Venice, 1563); afterward by Cotelerius, in his Patres Apostolici (Paris, 1672), and by Ültzen, Constitutiones Apostolicæ (Schwerin and Rostock, 1853), De Lagarde, Dilascalia Apost. Syriacæ (Lips., 1854), Græcæ (1862). The Ethiopic version was edited and translated into English by Thomas Pell Platt (1834); the Coptic, by Henry Tattam (1848), both for the Oriental Translation Fund.

APOSTOLIC COUNCIL AT JERUSALEM, A.D. 50. In Acts xv. there is an account of a meeting of the apostles and elders to decide whether circumcision and the Mosaic law were binding upon the Gentile converts. The occasion of the council was the representation of certain men who came down to Antioch from Judæa, that it was necessary to salvation to be circumcised. The question arose whether this was also the sentiment of the parent church in Jerusalem. If so, then, the practice and preaching of Paul and Barnabas flatly contradicted it, and the easiest way to find out was to send a delegation to Jerusalem, who should confer with the brethren there. This was done. By common consent this council is the most important in the entire history of the church, and therefore demands special consideration. It not only furnished the basis for the evangelical work of the early church, but also was a field upon which the opposing parties could meet. Within this century it has also been the target for rationalistic attack, and the object of vigorous defence. Thus central and crucial in primitive times and to-day has been the first council of the Christian Church.

1. The Council and the Speeches.—The narrative informs us that the leaders, and the great majority of the congregation, were liberal in their views; but the opposition of some Pharisaical members in the private preliminary meeting which seems to have been held (vers. 4, 5) was so vigorous as to compel the apostles to bring the matter before the whole body; and thus the decree had the full force of the sanction of the entire church (vers. 7, 22). This final unity proves that the Jerusalem Church was accustomed to the view Peter held to in his speech, "We believe that we shall be saved through the grace of the Lord Jesus, in like manner as they" (ver. 11). The men who had come to Antioch were condemned (ver. 24).

The chief speakers at the council were representative men,—Peter, the apostle to the circumcision, but cured of bigotry; Paul, the apostle to the uncircumcision, whom a miracle had convinced of the truth, and experience had taught how to apply it; Barnabas, the companion of Paul, and, under his influence, a representative of the great body of the present clergy, not investigators, but happy and able followers; James, the just man, walking in all the commandments and ordinances of the law blameless. The speeches matched the characters. Peter (vers. 7-11) fell back upon his experience ten or twelve years before in the house of Cornelius, and argued from that premise, that inasmuch as God had put no difference between Jew and Gentile, receiving them both through faith, they (the Jews) could not refuse them (the Gentiles) all the rites of their religion, or tell them that circumcision and Mosaism were necessary to salvation. Paul and Barnabas (ver. 12) spoke of the attendance of miracles upon their work. James (vers. 13-21), as presiding officer and head of the Jerusalem Church, authoritatively summed up the debate. He showed that it was entirely in accordance with prophecy, that the "lawless" Gentiles stood near the Jews in the church. And he counselled them not to act contrary to the declared will of God, who knew all his work; i.e., how to manage the world, from the beginning, and who had put the conversion of the Gentiles into his plan. On the contrary, he advocated following the plain indications of Providence, and ridding the Gentiles of any obligation to keep the law, merely calling attention to certain necessary things. The counsel of James was not a command, and yet it carried so much weight, that the letter which the council sent to the Antiochian Christians by two delegates who returned with Paul and Barnabas, followed exactly the line of remark and prohibition he proposed, and probably was dictated by him.

2. The Letter of the Council.—The following is an analysis of it. The salutation showed how the several classes in the council were consulted, and had agreed. The Jerusalem Church denied emphatically that the causers of the trouble were authorized to speak in their name, or that they expressed their sentiments. They indorsed Barnabas and Paul, and sent delegates to repeat their commendation orally. They claimed the co-operation of the Holy Spirit in the decrees, as in the general tenor of their remarks. The decrees: abstention from (1) meats offered to idols; (2) blood; (3) things strangled (as fowls and other animals caught in snares); (4) fornication. The closing salutation, like the opening one, was Greek, not Hebrew, indicating the complexion of the council.

The decrees deserve more detailed study. They are most likely exactly the prohibitions laid upon so-called Proselytes of the Gate, which, according to Jewish tradition, were among those laid upon Noah and his descendants; mark, before circumcision, and before Moses. We find, however, that they are contained in Lev. xvii. and xviii. The design of the decrees was to shut off all objectionable heathen customs, so that the Gentile Christians might escape defilement. (1) The first prohibition was called for by the permeation of the social life by Paganism. That part of the animal which was not burnt as a sacrifice was used by the sacrificer as food, or else sold. The effect of the prohibition was, therefore, to debar the Gentile believer from all festivities, surely from all feasting; for the eating of such idol-offered food was universal. (2)

"Blood" was forbidden, because "the life of the flesh is in the blood" (Lev. xvii. 11). It was a very common article of food among the ancients. (3) So particular were the Jews in regard to the slaying of their food, that they would employ only a Jewish butcher; and the same spirit is shown now. Consequently the council laid upon the Gentile converts a similar obligation. (4) The fourth prohibition was directed against that sin, which, in the then heathen world, was regarded as natural and permissible, and committed without shame. It is, however, perhaps probable that "fornication" in this passage may include unlawful marriages within the forbidden degrees of kindred (Lev. xvii. 18). We thus see, that, although the council may have considered its decrees very moderate and light, yet really it called upon the Gentile to live a different style of life, and to raise matters of perfect indifference into matters of conscience. And it is noteworthy that while, in regard to fornication, the present Church of Christ is in unison with the Primitive Church, in regard to the other decrees the Eastern or Greek Church in the second Trullan Council (692) re-enacted the law against eating blood and things strangled, and still retains it; but the Latin Church very properly has gradually let this prohibition drop. The decrees found a ready reception, and exerted a great influence (cf. xv. 31, xvi. 4, xxi. 25). They established a code of manners which protected the weak Christian, and distinguished all believers from the heathen.

3. The Effects of the Council. — The immediate effect was to greatly cheer the Gentile converts. They breathed more freely. The Judaizers were similarly depressed. But the council did not settle all points; for it yet left open to a Jewish Christian to put aside his Mosaism, while at the same time James and others were in favor of retaining it. Consequently the liberal Jew could quote the spirit of the letter; the strict Jew, the text of it. Peter in Antioch acted not so much with the decrees of the council as with himself, his speech and behavior. We can trace the influence of the first and greatest of the church councils in the healthier tone, and greater moral earnestness, with which, in the First Epistle to the Corinthians (v., vi. 8-10) and in the Apocalypse (ii. 14, 20), fornication and idolatry are spoken of; and the sentiments therein expressed are evidently not unusual, but the voice of the church. In regard to the eating of blood, the information is slight; but it can be said, that, in the second half of the second century, it was abhorred in the church. See Tertullian, Apologetica c. 9; Clement, Hom. VII. 4, 8; Recogn. IV. 36.

There has been a suspicion that the Acts vindicated an altogether too prominent position for the Jerusalem Church in the council. But examination shows that there was no authority exerted upon the Gentile converts which did not coincide with their convictions. So Paul could heartily defend the position there taken.

4. The Accounts given in Acts xv. and Gal. ii. 1-10. — An event of so much importance, we should expect, would be mentioned again in the New Testament; and, indeed, a reference (disputed) has been found in Paul's Epistle to the Galatians (ii. 1-10). But there are evident differences, although they can be reconciled. The points of dissimilarity are, (1) The visit to Jerusalem is the third mentioned in the Acts, after Saul's conversion; in Galatians it is apparently the second. (2) The Acts relate a public meeting of the entire church. Galatians refers to a private meeting between Paul and the principal ("pillar") apostles; but he hints also at a public meeting, when he says that he laid his Gospel before the brethren of Jerusalem, i. e., the entire congregation, and also "privately," or apart, before the pillar-apostles. (3) The council in Jerusalem was summoned at the request of the Antiochian Church. Paul, in Galatians, says he went up by "revelation." (4) In Galatians the circumcision(?) of Titus is mentioned: there is nothing said about it in the Acts. (5) The Acts give the text of a letter; there is no reference to it in Galatians, — actions rather than words are mentioned, — and the only exhortation given was "to remember the poor."

In view of these dissimilarities it has been common with "liberal" theologians, especially of the "Baur" school, to throw discredit upon the fifteenth chapter of Acts, to regard it as written to reconcile the Petrine and Pauline parties, but not as history. But this view is being abandoned, at least in part, even by liberal critics, as Weizsäcker, Keim, and Schenkel, who have come to the conclusion that the difference between Peter and Paul was not nearly as great as Baur had represented it. Schenkel confesses himself now convinced that the Acts is contemporary and reliable (Das Christusbild der Apostel, Leipzig, 1879, p. xi.). Keim (Aus dem Urchristenthum, Zürich, 1878, p. 89) says, that, although the book is defective, it yet supplements Paul, and tells the story of active and sympathetic co-operation with Paul. A closer study of the two passages serves to bring out their harmony, and does away with the necessity of Paley's suggestion that in Galatians we have mention of a visit to Jerusalem, not elsewhere recorded. 1. There are five visits of Paul to Jerusalem mentioned in the Acts. In identifying that of Galatians (ii. 1-10), the first (ix. 26) and the last (xxi. 15) must evidently be left out; but the second (xi. 30, xii. 25) and the fourth (xviii. 22) have found advocates. But against the first identification "there are the facts (1) that it is not easy to place fourteen years between the visit of chap. ix. 27, and that of chap. xi. 30; (2) the visit of chap. xi. 30 appears in the history as confined to the single object of carrying relief to the suffering poor of the church at Jerusalem; (3) the question as to enforcing circumcision had not then been raised after its apparent settlement in the case of Cornelius; (4) had the agreement referred to in Galatians (ii. 9) preceded the council, it would assuredly have been appealed to in the course of the debate at the council. Against the second there are the facts (1) that the interval would in that case have been more than fourteen years; and (2) that it was not likely that the question should have been raised again after the decision of the council" (Plumptre on Acts xv. 2, in Bp. Ellicott's New Testament Commentary for English Readers). We decide, therefore, that the attendance of Paul on the council was his third visit. Paul does not say, "I went up the second time."

but "I went up again." The absence of reference to it in Galatians is explained by the fact that there he is stating how much intercourse he had had with the chief apostles, and as, on this visit, he probably did not see them, he omits all mention of it. Hence there is no discrepancy between Acts xv. and Gal. ii. in regard to time. Nor is there any insuperable difficulty in regard to the contents of the two accounts. (1) In both, the matters of consultation are circumcision and the Mosaic law; and the origin of the consultation was in each case the effort of the Judaizers. (2) In both, the practice of the apostle was confirmed. (3) In both, Peter appears as the equal of Paul. (4) In both, the Pauline principles are triumphant. (5) It was evidently impossible for Paul to carry on his argument for his apostolic position, and yet be silent about this most important council; for it was in it that his claim was fullest recognized. Further, that Paul ascribes his journey to revelation proves the coincidence between outward events and the Spirit's action. The Antiochian Church sent him; but God prompted him to go. Paul deals with the private, inner history of the council; the Acts, with the public. Hence the Acts are silent about Titus, as they are about the giving to Paul of the right hand of fellowship.

5. The Apostolic Council at Jerusalem and Church Government.—Each form, Episcopal, Presbyterian, Congregational, appeals to this council for support. But, while it may be freely granted that there was some particular order then used, it does not follow that the order was of binding force. As far as we can gather, there were regularly appointed delegates from Antioch, a called meeting of the apostles and elders, a further meeting of the church, a presiding officer (James, not Peter), and a letter, which was official in the sense that it received the indorsement of the Jerusalem Church. This letter contained directions which were thought to be inspired. It is easy to see elements of the three great methods of church government in such a council, and at the same time to be able to prove that no one method is entirely favored by it. About the only things it does prove are, that there was no supremacy of Peter, that it was considered a good thing to refer perplexing questions to the mother-church, and that in the council all—apostles, elders, and brethren—took part. Not, therefore, as furnishing a norm, but as demonstrating the essential unity of the church, is the council a delightful feature of the primitive-church history. Its so-called "decrees" have passed out of sight as the division of the church into circumcised and uncircumcised converts ceased; but the yoke of Mosaism it broke has never been remade.

APOSTOLIC FATHERS (Patres Apostolici), a term applied in a wider sense to all immediate pupils of the apostles, and in a narrower sense to those only who have left written testimonies. They fall into two groups; namely, disciples of Paul, BARNABAS, CLEMENS ROMANUS, and HERMAS; and disciples of John, IGNATIUS, POLYCARP, and PAPIAS. DIONYSIUS AREOPAGITA (see title), who is sometimes also reckoned among the Apostolic Fathers as a convert of Paul, belongs to a much later age. The Apostolic Fathers are valuable for the contrast they present to the New-Testament writers. They move in the element of living tradition, and make reference to the oral preaching of the apostles; but by their language they plainly show that the difference between them and the apostles is one of kind, not of degree. The pious, and in the main excellent Clemens Romanus, Ignatius, with his morbid, feverish longing after martyrdom, Polycarp, with his remarkable echoes of the New Testament, Barnabas, allegorical and tedious, Hermas, ingenious though strained, not to mention the others,—these are a great contrast to Paul, Peter, John, James, Jude, and the evangelists. That the Apostolic Fathers were truly pious men, that they had learned much about Christ, does not free them from the charge of mediocrity, and starts the inquiry, Did they differ from the New-Testament writers simply as talent differs from genius, or did they differ as uninspired from inspired men? The unprejudiced judgment leads to the conclusion that the New Testament came from God; the Patrum Apostolicorum Opera, from men. See separate articles on the writers mentioned.

LIT.—Editions. The best editions of this whole body of literature are those by J. B. COTELERIUS, Paris, 1672, which was the first collection re-edited with notes by J. CLERICUS (Le Clerc), Antwerp, 1698, 2d ed., 1724; RICHARD RUSSEL, London, 1746; GUIL. JACOBSON, Oxford, 1838, 4th ed., 1863; C. J. HEFLE, Tübingen, 1839, 5th ed. by FUNK, 1878; DRESSER, Leipzig, 1857, 3d ed. by GEBHARDT, HARNACK, and ZAHN, 1876. The last edition is the best and fullest. LIGHTFOOT's promised edition, so far, embraces only S. Clement of Rome, London, 1869, and an appendix, containing Bryennios' newly recovered portions of the Epistles of Clement, 1877.—Translations. There are good translations of the Apostolic Fathers by Archbishop WAKE, London, 1693, often reprinted, latest edition, carefully revised, Oxford, 1861; by ROBERTS, DONALDSON, and CROMBIE as vol. I. of the "Ante-Nicene Christian Library," Edinburgh, 1867; and by C. H. HOOLE, London, 1872. A good German translation is that of H. SCHOLZ, Gütersloh, 1865.—Dissertations. Besides the Prolegomena to the editions named above see MÖHLER (R. C.): Patrologie, ed. Reitmayr, Mainz, 1840; A. APOSTOLIC KING, an honorary title of the kings of Hungary, given originally to Stephen, the first Christian King of Hungary, by Pope Silvester II. (999-1003), on account of his zeal for the propagation of the faith; renewed and confirmed to Maria Theresa, for the Austro-Hungarian royal family, by a brief of Clemens XIII., Aug. 25, 1758; abolished in 1848, but resumed in 1852.

APOTACTICI (Renunciants), also called Apostolici, an ascetic sect which arose in Phrygia, Cilicia, and Pamphylia in the third century, and held tenets similar to those of the Encratites, Marcionites, etc. They renounced marriage, private property, etc., and pretended to follow apostolical advice on these points.

APPEALS to the pope, in his quality of primate of the Roman-Catholic Church, were not formally recognized as a legal instrument in the administration of justices, until the year of 343, by the Council of Sardica. It was there agreed that a bishop who had been condemned by a synod had a right to appeal to the Roman patriarch, who, in such a case, should either confirm the verdict, or appoint new judges. In the course of half a century, this decree of the council grew, in Rome, into the assumption, that, in all important cases, an appeal from the verdict of a bishop could be made to the pope, not only by another bishop, but by any one aggrieved; and this view was not only repeated, but even carried further, by the Pseudo-Isidorean decretals. They state, that not only can all cases be brought before the papal court by bishops, but causæ majores cannot be decided in any other court; that not only can appeals to the pope be made by bishops, and in causis majoribus, but by any one aggrieved, and in any kind of cases, etc. In the twelfth century, when the pope had arrogated the right to decide, immediately or through his legates, in all cases arising under the episcopal courts, it became generally understood that an appeal could be made even from the secular courts to the church, that is, finally to the Roman curia; and, though Alexander III. acknowledged that such an appeal was not strictly according to rule, Innocent III. declared that it was the duty of the church to fight against every kind of sin, consequently, also, against the lack of justice in the secular courts. From this time, appeals to the pope became more and more frequent; and the part they played in Rome is very vividly described by Bernard of Clairveaux in his De Consideratione.

The first instance in England of an appeal to Rome occurred in the time of King Stephen, in the case of Henry of Blois, Bishop of Winchester; and although the Constitutions of Clarendon declared, "If appeals arise, they ought to proceed from the archdeacon to the bishop, from the bishop to the archbishop, and, lastly, to the king (if the archbishop fail in doing justice), so that the controversy be ended in the archbishop's court by a precept from the king, and so that it go no further without the king's consent," and similar prohibitions were enforced now and then, appeals to Rome continued to occur until the time of Henry VIII. In Germany the first reaction against this papal usurpation appeared in the "Golden Bull," which forbade appeals to Rome from a civil court. Next the Concordatum Constant of 1418, and the decree of the thirty-first sitting of the Council of Basel, determined that appeals to the pope should not be decided in Rome by the curia, but by judices in partibus, chosen first by the provincial or diocesan synods, and afterwards, when this institution had fallen into decay, by the bishops and chapters. This was a death-blow to the appeals to the pope; and even before the reforms of Joseph II., all German governments, Roman-Catholic as well as Protestant, had forbidden such appeals.

Appeals from the pope to a general council were forbidden by Pius II. by a bull of Jan. 18, 1459

MEJER.

APPELLANTS is the name of that party, which, in the controversy between the Jansenists and the Jesuits, rejected the bull Unigenitus, and appealed to a general council. See JANSENISM.

APPLETON, Jesse, b. at Brunswick, Me., Nov. 12, 1819; was graduated from Dartmouth College in 1792, and chosen president of Bowdoin College in 1807. The Works of Jesse Appleton, consisting of sermons, lectures, etc., were published at Andover in 2 vols., in 1836, with memoir.

APPROBATION OF BOOKS is a measure which the Roman-Catholic Church employs, in connection with the censure, in order to direct the course of literature in the interest of pure doctrines. The fifth council of the Lateran (1512) decided, that, under penalty of a fine or of ex-communication, no theological book should be published without having previously obtained the approbation of the bishop of the diocese in which it was destined to appear; and this decision was incorporated with the decrees of the Council of Trent (Trident. res. 4). It is still valid, and, for regular members of the ecclesiastical orders, it is further extended, so that not only theological works, but any kind of literary productions, must have the approbation of the superior before they can be published. The Protestant churches have no institutions of the kind; though in earlier times, when the censure was in use, the censorship for theological books was often vested in the consistory of the Established Church.

APSE, or APSIDIS, the semicircular or semi-octagonal enclosure with which the choir of the Christian church generally terminates. The ground-plan of this enclosure is an arc, on the chord of which the altar is raised, while the bishop's throne is placed in the centre, up against the wall, with rows of benches for the clergy on both sides, sometimes one row above the other (apsides gradate). In the Roman basilica, or hall of justice, which in numerous cases was actually turned into a Christian church with very slight modifications, while its ground-plan formed the starting-point for all Christian church architecture, the exterior form of the building was perfectly rectangular; and the apse, with its seats for the magistrate and the officers of the court, was formed internally. There are still churches extant on this plan, and they are the oldest; such as the Sta. Croce in Gerusalemme in Rome, and several others in Africa and Asia Minor, all from the third century. In churches from the fifth century, such as St. Apollinare in Classe at Ravenna, etc., the apse has generally become visible also in the exterior form; and not only the choir, but also the aisles, terminate in apses. In St. Sophia in Constantinople, and in churches built after that model, also the transepts are provided with apses; and, in some few cases in Germany, the choir has apses at both ends, such as the Church of Reichenau on the Lake of Constance.

AQUAVIVA, Claudius, b. Sept. 14, 1543; d. Jan. 31, 1615; joined the order of the Jesuits in 1567, and became its general in 1580. Under his rule, the order flourished in spite of the great difficulties and troubles which overtook it; but he was prudent enough to silence Molino, when the controversy with the Dominicans became too hot, and to silence Mariana, whose doctrine of the allowableness of the murder of tyrants produced the deepest indignation. He wrote sixteen letters, which are incorporated with the constitutions of the order, and a book. Industria ad Curandas Animæ Morbos, Venice, 1606. The Ratio Studiorum and Directorium Exercitorum St. Ignatii were compiled and published after his order, and under his superintendence.

AQUILA (eagle) AND PRISCILLA (from Prisca, ancient). A married couple who did most excellent service in spreading the gospel by materially aiding Paul, and in teaching Apollos (Acts xviii. 2, 18, 26). Aquila was a Jew of Pontus. The pair were driven out of Rome in consequence of the order of Claudius, and came to Corinth (A.D. 52). When Paul met them in that city, they were still Jews; but as the result of his conversation and instruction, since Aquila and he carried on the same trade, they were converted. They accompanied Paul to Ephesus, and held a regular service in their house (1 Cor. xvi. 19). It was then, probably, that they risked themselves in the manner alluded to in Romans (xvi. 4); thence they went to Rome, and held similar services (Rom. xvi. 3, 5). At the time of the Neroian persecution they had moved to Ephesus (2 Tim. iv. 10). Nothing more is known of them.

AQUILA, born at Sinope in Pontus, in the beginning of the second century A.D.; became a proselyte to Judaism, and gave a new translation of the Old Testament into Greek, which was reproduced by Origen in the third column of the Hexapla, and highly valued by the Jews on account of its literalness, though, for that very reason, it often became unintelligible to readers who had no knowledge of Hebrew. The fragments of this work still extant are most fully given in Montfaucon's edition of the Hexapla, Paris, 1714, and Field's Origenis Hexaplorum quæ supersunt, Oxford, 1867 sq. See BIBLE VERSIONS. A number of details relating to Aquila's life, and first given by Epiphanius (De Pond. et Mens. 14, 15), seem to have no foundation. Emanuel Deutsch (Literary Remains, N. Y., 1874, pp. 344 sqq.) identifies Aquila with Onkelos, the author of a Targum. The steps are, 1. Onkelos is the same as Akilas, because the incidents related of him are the same: a Greek quotation from Onkelos, the Chaldee translator is in reality found in, and quoted from, Akilas, the Greek translator. 2. Akilas and Aquila are the same; born in the same time and place, and have precisely similar life-courses.

AQUILA, Johannes Kaspar, b. at Augsburg, Aug. 7, 1488; d. at Saalfeld, Nov. 12, 1560; studied theology at Wittenberg and Leipzig, and became camp-preacher to Sickingen in 1515, and pastor of Jenga in 1516, but joined Luther immediately in 1517; married, and was thrown into the dungeon of Dillingen by the order of the Bishop of Augsburg, and released only on the instance of Queen Isabella of Denmark, a sister of Charles V. Repairing to Wittenberg in 1521, he was first tutor to the sons of Sickingen, and afterwards minister at Saalfeld. He aided Luther in translating the Old Testament; wrote with such a vehemence against the Interim, that Charles V. put a price of five thousand guilders on his head; and partook with great zeal in the theological controversies of the day, though most of his writings are only essays and pamphlets. See G. A. FR. GENSLER: Vita M. J. C. Aquilæ, Jenæ, 1816.

AQUILEIA, a town of Northern Italy, fifteen miles north-east of Venice, traces back the origin of its church to St. Mark, and occupied during the earlier middle ages a conspicuous place in history as the rival of Rome. In 381 the Bishop of Aquileia assumed metropolitan rights over the churches of Venice, Istria, Carniola, Carinthia, Friuli, and Styria; and in 557 the metropolitan took the title of patriarch. In his contest with the pope, the patriarch leaned first against the Lombard king, afterwards against the German emperor. In 1752 the patriarchate was divided into the two archbishoprics of Goritz and Udine.

Aquileia is noticeable, therefore, as the seat of a patriarch, as the place of several synods, and as the cradle of a peculiar creed.

Several other Italian bishops beside the Bishop of Rome, namely, those of Milan, Ravenna, and Aquileia, labored from the earliest time to assume patriarchal powers; and they partly succeeded. But the Bishops of Milan and Ravenna were so hard pressed by the Arian Longobards during the decade from 570 to 580, that they preferred to enter into closer communication with Rome; and only the Archbishop of Aquileia, who since 568 resided in the Island of Grado, continued obstinately to resist any attempt at a union. Pope Honorius I. (625-638) felt compelled to consecrate the Bishop of Aquileia Patriarch of Grado, simply to keep up the appearance of supremacy. In 1451 the patriarchal see was removed to Venice; but this gave rise to perpetual conflicts between Austria and Venice, both claiming the right of electing the patriarch. Finally Pope Benedict XIV. abolished the Patriarchate of Aquileia altogether in 1751, and established the rather insignificant Patriarchate of Udine for the Venetian possessions in Friuli, and an apostolic vicariate at Aquileia for Austria. Venice, however, was not satisfied with the papal arrangement; and, on the suggestion of Austria, two archbishoprics — of Udine and Goritz — were established.

The first synod of Aquileia was convened in 381 to decide whether or not Palladius, Bishop of Illyria, was justly accused of Arianism. Thirty-two bishops from Italy, Gaul, and Africa, were present on Sept. 3. The Eastern bishops had been invited, but did not appear. Valerian, Bishop of Aquileia, presided; but the true leader of the investigation was Ambrose of Milan; and Palladius, as well as his presbyter Secundinus, was found guilty and deposed. The second synod of Aquileia (1698) concerned the Three-Chapter controversy. The bishops declared against the condemnation of the Three Chapters; but their decision never obtained authority in the church — on the contrary, they were themselves considered schismatics. In 1409 Gregory XII. held a synod at Udine in the diocese of Aquileia, and anathematized both his rivals, Benedict and Alexander V.; but just at the same time the Council of Pisa declared for Alexander V. Other synods were held 1305, 1311, and 1339. See THREE CHAPTERS.

The above-mentioned peculiar creed of the Church of Aquileia has the words, invisibili et impassibili added to the formula, credo in Deo patre omnipotente, which was probably intended for a decisive testimony against the Patripassians. It also contains the formula, descendit ad inferna, and has a hujus before carnis resurrectionem. SCHAFF: Creeeds of Christendom, II., p. 49. ZÖCKLER.

AQUINAS. See THOMAS AQUINAS.

ARABIA (אַרְבִּיָּא, prairie) does not in the Bible denote the whole peninsula between the Red Sea and the Persian Gulf, but only the northern part, contiguous to Palestine (Isa. xxi. 13; Jer. xxv. 24; Ezek. xxvii. 21); and in the same manner "the Arabian" (Isa. xiii. 20; Jer. iii. 2) does not denote the Arab in general, but only an inhabitant of the northern prairies and deserts. Only in the later books of the Old Testament, as, for instance, in 2 Chron. xxi. 16, where "the Arabians" are spoken of together with the Æthiopians, or in Neh. ii. 19, vi. 1, and in the New Testament (Acts iii. 11; Gal. i. 17, iv. 25) the name seems to have obtained a more general signification. Other designations employed by the Hebrews, such as "the people of the East," and "the land of the people of the East" (Gen. xxix. 1; Judg. vi. 3, 33, vii. 11, viii. 10; Job i. 3; Isa. xi. 14), must be limited in the same way.

Arabia comprises an area of about one million square miles, with about eight million inhabitants. Though it connects two continents with each other, it occupies a very isolated position, partly on account of the inhospitableness of its coasts, partly on account of the huge desert, which, to the north, separated the Arabs even from their nearest kinsmen, — the Hebrews, the Syrians, the Chaldeans, and the Assyrians. From this country, however, so peculiarly shut up within itself, there broke forth at one time one of the most powerful impulses which the history of mankind ever received; and, long before that period, it attracts the attention of the student of the Bible on account of the conspicuous part it played in the history of Israel.

The ancient geographers distinguished between Arabia Petraea, Arabia Deserta, and Arabia Felix. Arabia Petraea, situated between the Mediterranean to the north, the Red Sea to the south (here forming the peninsula of Sinai), the desert of Sur to the west, and the Arabah to the east, received its name from Petra, the capital of Idumæa. It is a desolate mountain region, with huge masses of granite, porphyry, basalt, and limestone piled up in fantastic heaps, and with very few fertile valleys. It may have been more productive in the times of Moses; but, without a special providence, it can at no time have sustained such a multitude as spoken of in the Pentateuch. Especially the plateau of Azazimat, bordering immediately on Canaan, is an inhospitable wilderness, sparingly populated, difficult of access, enclosed north and south by ranges of wild cliffs, and descending abruptly to the east into the Arabah. The principal chain of the whole group runs parallel with the western arm of the Red Sea, but turns eastward, farther to the south, and approaches the eastern arm by a number of bald ridges. The direction of this chain must have determined the course of the wanderings of Israel through the wilderness. It was followed along its western slope, where are found the Wady Ghurundel, Mukatteb, and the beautiful and fertile Wady Feiran (the Pharan of the Bible). It was then doubled to the south, where are the sand-waste of Ramleh, the Wady er-Rahah and esh-Sheikh. South of Wady Feiran rises the Jebel Serbal, high and striking, which, though against the tradition, is by some considered as the Mount of the Law. Farther to the east appears Mount Sinai, with its three imposing ridges, of which the central one bears the name of Horeb.

Arabia Deserta, to which the prophets refer when they speak of the return of the exiles as a wandering through the wilderness (Hos. ii. 16; Isa. xxxv. 1, xl. 3, xlix. 9, etc.), is, by the Arabs themselves, called simply el-Badie, "the desert," whence the name of its inhabitants, a few tribes of roving nomads, — the Bedawin or Bedouins. The peculiar atmospheric deceptions which occur in these regions, the mirages of cool lakes in the midst of the burning sand-waste, are alluded to in Isaiah (xxxv. 7); and its poisonous wind, Samum, which hurls desolation at every thing living it meets, is alluded to in Ps. xi. 6. Arabia Felix consists of a large central plateau, surrounded on all sides by deserts, and very little known, and a belt of mountain-ranges and Alp regions all along the coast, containing some of the most beautiful and most fertile spots on the globe. Here are, on the west coast, Hejaz and Yemen; on the south coast Hadramaut, Mahrah, and Gharrah; and, on the east coast, Oman.

The population is essentially Shemitic, though the southern part of the country contains Cushitic elements. Of the Cushitic tribes mentioned in Gen. x. 7, only the first one, Sheba, belongs exclusively to Africa; already the second one, Havilah, belongs without doubt to Asia (Gen. xxv. 18); and the last ones, Sabtah, Raamah, and Sabtecha, refer still more plainly to Southern Arabia. Sabtah reminds one of Sabota, the capital of the Chatramotites in Hadramaut, the centre of the frankincense trade. Raamah, mentioned in Ezek. xxvii. 22, together with Sheba, as a place from which drugs, diamonds, and gold were sent to Tyre, is probably Regma, or Regama, an Arabian port on the Persian Gulf. Among the Shemites it was the descendants of Joctan, the brother of Peleg, who took possession of Yemen and the rest of Southern Arabia. The Ishmaelitic tribes, descending from Abraham and Hagar, the Egyptian woman, — Nebajoth, Kedar, Dumah, and Massa, — came later; but their place of settlement has not been ascertained. The tribe of Tema (mentioned in Isa. xxi. 14; Jer. xxv. 23; Job. vi. 19) settled between Petra and Medina; and that of Jetur (the Ituræans), across Arabia Deserta from Egypt to the Gulf of Persia (Gen. xxv. 12 sqq.). The other tribes, descending from Abraham and Ketura (the Midianites and their kindred), were settled in the western parts, among the Joctanites. This report of a difference between the northern and southern Arabians with respect to descent is supported by the existence of marked differences between them in history and language, in physical features, and moral habits. In habits, features, and language, the Southern Arabians resemble the Ethiopians. The language which in ancient times was spoken in Southern Arabia was the Himyaritic, as has been proved from numerous monuments discovered in Yemen. But the Himyaritic occupies an intermediate position between the Ethiopian and the tongue spoken in Central Arabia. By the spread of Mohammedanism the Himyaritic dialect lost ground. Nevertheless, it is still spoken in various districts of Southern Arabia; and this, its modern development (the Etkili), bears a strong likeness to the modern development of the Ethiopian.

The principal seat of South-Arabian civilization was the kingdom of Sheba with the capital of Mariaba, or Mareb. Thence came the queen to visit Solomon (1 Kings x. 1-13), and thither belong most of the Himyaritic inscriptions, as probably, also, the praises for wisdom bestowed upon the children of the East (1 Kings iv. 30). The Bible, especially the prophets, speaks of the Sabæans as a distant but far-reaching, rich, and enterprising people, which brought gold and diamonds, incense, cassia, and slaves to the northern countries from India and Africa (Jer. vi. 20; Ezek. xxvii. 22; Ps. lxxii. 15; Isa. lx. 6; Joel. iv. 8). But, besides this peaceable city population, the kingdom of Sheba also contained a country or desert population of another temper, and these Bedouins appear in connection with the Joctanites and the Keturæans. In the beginning of the third century of our era the city of Mareb was destroyed by an inundation, and several tribes then emigrated to the north, where they founded the kingdoms of Hira on the Euphrates, and of Gassan in the Hauran Mountains.

Of the two chief tribes of Ishmael, Nebajoth and Kedar, the latter plays by far the most prominent part in the records of the Old Testament. The Kedarenes are mentioned in Solomon's Song i. 5, as living in black tents; in Isa. xlii. 11, Jer. xlix. 31, as settled in open villages; in Ezek. xxvii. 21, as pursuing trade; in Isa. xxi. 16, 17, Jer. xlix. 28, as good archers withstanding the attacks of the Assyrians and Chaldeans. Ac-

ording to the annals of Assurbanipal, and in fulfilment of the predictions of the prophets (Isa. xxi. 11; Jer. xxv. 23, xlix. 28), they were subjugated by the Assyrians. In the period immediately after Alexander the Great they disappear as an independent tribe; but at the same time the Nebajoth or Nabatæans, who are mentioned in the Old Testament only as related to the Edomites (Gen. xxviii. 9, xxxvi. 3), gain ascendancy. They not only held a great portion of Arabia Proper, for instance Aila, but they also came into possession of the land of the Idumæans with the capital Petra, and pushed onwards into the region east of the Jordan and the Syrian desert, as far as the Hauran Mountains (1 Macc. v. 25, ix. 35), and Damascus (Joseph. Ant. xiii. 15, 2), thus ruling over all the lands between the Red Sea and the Euphrates. Their relations with the Jews now became of consequence. While the Arab prince Emalchuel entertained friendly relations with the Syrians (1 Macc. xi. 39), and Arabs entered the Syrian army as mercenaries (1 Macc. v. 39; 2 Macc. xii. 10), so that the Maccabæans had to take the field against them (1 Macc. xii. 31), the Nabatæans are repeatedly mentioned as friends and allies of the Jews (1 Macc. v. 25, ix. 35). They had kings of their own, among whom was Aretas, the father-in-law of Herod Antipas. He waged war, both against his son-in-law and the Romans, and occupied at one time Damascus (2 Cor. xi. 32). At the beginning of our era, however, the Nabatæans distinguished themselves, not only in warfare, but also in the arts of peace, as shown by the ruins of Petra, by coins, inscriptions, etc. Their empire was destroyed under Trajan.

Among the Keturæan tribes, only the Midianites are of any interest in antiquity. They appear in the history of Joseph as merchants (Gen. xxxvii. 28, 36). In the times of Moses they showed themselves friendly to Israel in the Sinaitic peninsula (Exod. ii. 15, iii. 1; Num. x. 29), but hostile in the region of Moab, where, however, the Israelites defeated them (Num. xxxi. Comp. Num. xxii. 4, xxv. 6, 14-18). In the times of the judges they pressed heavily upon Israel in connection with other Arab tribes, but were repulsed by Gilead (Judg. 6-8. Comp. Isa. ix. 3, x. 26; Hab. iii. 7; Ps. lxxxv. 10). Of any great development of power in those regions which belonged to the Keturæan tribes, nothing is heard until much later in the Christian era, when just in these lands Mohammed succeeded in raising the name of Arabia to a splendor and magnificence which it had not before attained.

Of the religion of the ancient Arabs very little is known with certainty. It is probable, however, that there existed with respect to religion the same difference between north and south as with respect to language and character; and it seems that the northern Arabians really maintained for some time their religious connection with Abraham and the Jews. Both the native historians and cuneiform inscriptions from the seventh and eighth centuries B.C. testify to the existence of a very old Allah-worship; and the tradition that Abraham and Ishmael were the founders of the national sanctuary, the Kaaba, points in the same direction. In later times, however, monotheism was all but lost among the Arabs. In the southern part of the country, the sun, Samas, or Sabis (feminine), and the moon, Alkamah (masculine), were worshipped together with the star of Venus, Athar, and other stars. In Northern Arabia, Orotal and Alilat, identified by Herodotus with Dionysos and Urania, were worshipped. At various times and in various places, polytheism even sank down into fetichism. Objects which, on account of form or qualities created admiration, came to be considered, not only as receptacles of divine powers, but as specimens of the divine essence, as gods. There may at all times have been persons among the Arabs who stood above such notions; but the popular level from which Mohammedanism arose was, as might be expected, very low.

ARABIANS, or ARABICI, a Christian sect, arose in the beginning of the third century in Arabia, in the times of Septimius Severus. They were a kind of Christian materialists, and held, according to Eusebius (Hist. Eccles., VI., 37), that the soul dies with the body, but shall be resurrected along with it. This doctrine grew up from the view, frequently met with in antiquity, that consciousness could not exist without a body. Origen refuted them in a synod held in 246, and generally known as the Council of Arabia.

A'RAD (place of fugitives), a royal city of the Canaanites (Num. xxi. 1, xxxiii. 40; Josh. xii. 14), situated on the south-western border of the desert of Judah (Judg. i. 16), about twenty miles south of Hebron, on a hill, now called Tell Arad, still covered with ruins.

A'RAM, such as it occurs in the Old Testament, comprises all those peoples which inhabited Syria and Mesopotamia, north to the Taurus, east to the Tigris; but, as these peoples never formed a political unit, the name is not used collectively, but only with reference to some particular tribe or region or state. Thus the Old Testament distinguishes between I. Aram Naharaim, Aram between the two rivers, the land between the Euphrates and the Tigris, still called the island (Gen. xxiv. 10; Deut. xxiii. 4; Judg. iii. 8; Ps. lx. title); II. Aram Dammesek, in the north-eastern part of Palestine, often called simply Aram because it was the tribe best known, and of most importance to Israel (2 Sam. viii. 5; Isa. vii. 8, xvii. 3; Am. i. 5); III. Aram Zobah, at the times of Saul and David the most powerful realm in Syria, not far from Damascus and Hamath (1 Sam. xiv. 47; 2 Sam. viii. 3); IV. Aram Beth-Rehob, in the northern part of Galilee (2 Sam. x. 6); V. Aram Maachah (1 Chron. xix. 6; Gen. xxii. 24); and VI. Geshur (2 Sam. xv. 8).

The spread of the Aramæans over these vast regions was, of course, gradual; and the point from which they started is generally determined by Amos i. 5 and ix. 7 (comp. 2 Kings xvi. 9; Isa. xxii. 6), where it is said that Jehovah once led Aram out from Kir, and that he once shall send the inhabitants of Damascus back again to that place. Some understand Kir to be the region around the River Kur, which runs between the Black and the Caspian Seas, and enters the latter after joining the Araxes; others find the place at Kyrrhos, north of Haleb, or seek it somewhere in Mesopotamia. Moses Chorenensis mentions Aram among the ancestors of the Armenian people; but Aram has as little to do with Armenia as with Homer's Ereimi or Arimi. The Greeks called the Aramæans Syrians, which is an abbreviation of Assyrians. Those Greeks who were settled along the southern coast of the Black Sea first applied the name to their Cappadocian neighbors who were Assyrian subjects. Thence it was extended to the whole bulk of the population of the Assyrian Empire, and thus it became synonymous with Aramæan. Afterwards the Christian Aramæans adopted the name Syrian because among the Jews Aramæan meant heathen. The country comprised by the name Aram, any of which Damascus formed a prominent part, was conquered by the Assyrians under Tiglath Pileser, and made a province. Afterwards it stood under the Babylonian-Chaldæan, and then under the Persian rule, until, after the death of Alexander the Great, it was formed into an independent empire, Syria, under the Seleucide. Pompey made it subject to Rome 64 B.C. The religion of the old Aramæans was akin to the Assyro-Babylonian worship of nature. See the articles on ASTARTE, BAAL, and TAMMU. From their Aramæan kinsmen the Israelites adopted the Teraphim.

The Aramaic language is a member of the Shemitic family; but, as if influenced by the climate, it is poorer in vowels, and rougher, than any of the other members; and because the Aramæans lived surrounded by non-Shemitic peoples, and were often and for long periods subjected to foreign conquerors, it became a mixed and corrupt tongue. Compared with the sister-tongues,—the rich, sonorous, and elegant Arabic, and the pithy though somewhat provincial Hebrew,—it is a commonplace dialect. It falls into two branches, a north-eastern and south-western; of which the first one, originally spoken in Mesopotamia, afterwards developed into the Syriac language, and produced a rich literature, not only of Christian theology, but also of history and philosophy. The most flourishing period of the history of this branch tends from the fourth to the seventh century; in the eighth and ninth the Syriac was overtaken by the Arabic; and in the thirteenth it disappeared (see SYRIA). The other branch bears, since the days of Jerome, the name of the Chaldee language, though the old Chaldeans, or Babylonians, never spoke Aramaic (see BABELONIA). The Hebrew Bible calls this branch the "Aramaic" (Dan. ii. 4; 2 Kings xviii. 26). In the time of the kings it was understood in Jerusalem, if not by people in general, at least by all educated persons; and it was the business-language throughout the Assyrian realm. The Persian Government afterwards issued its edicts, so far as they concerned the provinces of Western Asia, in the Aramaic tongue. After the exile, this tongue gradually became the popular language of Palestine, not only of Galilee and Samaria, but also of Judæa. Christ and the apostles spoke it, as may be seen from several words and phrases occurring in the New Testament. The only specimens of this dialect which have come down to us are sections of the Books of Daniel (ii. 4-vii. 28) and of Ezra (iv. 8-vi. 18, vii. 12-26), and the Chaldean paraphrase of the Old Testament, the so-called Targums; but of these specimens the first mentioned show so strong a coloring of Hebrew, that many linguists have been inclined to consider the Chaldee dialect a mere mixture of Hebrew and Syriac.

ARARAT (holy land or high land) occurs in the Bible, only as the name of the country, which, in the Assyrian inscription, is called Urarti, in classical literature Armenia, and by the native inhabitants Haik. Afterwards the name was transferred from the country which chiefly consists of a high plateau along the middle course of the River Araxes, to the mountain-range on its southern frontier, and more especially to the two commanding peaks of this range,—the Greater and Lesser Ararat. The former, called by the natives Massis, or Varaz-Baris, by the Persians Kūhi-Nuh, the "Mountain of Noah," is a cone 17,750 feet high, and with the top covered with a silver cap of perpetual snow. Here, on the southern slope, the native traditions place the spot where Noah's ark rested, and the messenger-dove brought back an olive-leaf; while a Syrian tradition, supported by the Assyrian inscriptions, points to a peak farther to the south, in the mountains of Kurdistan.

ARATOR, a Christian poet from the middle of the sixth century, was a native of Liguria, and educated by Archbishop Laurentius of Milan, and the poet Ennodius; studied law, and entered the civil service of the Gothic Government, first as comes domesticorum, then as comes privatorum; but, when war broke out between the East Roman and Ostrogothic Empire, he retired from political life, and Pope Vigilius made him a sub-deacon in Rome. While here he wrote his great didactic epic: De Actibus Apostolorum, Libr. II., dedicated to Vigilius, and recited in four consecutive days to an applauding crowd in the Church of St.

Petrus ad vincula, in 544. The theological tendencies of this poem mirror very truthfully the reigning tendencies of the time,—the superiority of Peter over Paul, the first traces of the worship of Mary, saints, relics, etc.: its æsthetic merits, however, are rather small. It still exists in numerous manuscripts, and has often been published: Basileæ, 1537, and in MIGNÉ, with a complete commentary Patrol. Curs. vol. 68. See MAYOR: Bibliographical Clew to Latin Literature, London, 1875.

ARCANI DISCIPLINA, a term applied to the practice, general in the ancient church, of excluding all the uninitiated from certain parts of the divine service, and maintaining a studied reticence, when speaking in public, about certain sacred objects and proceedings. This practice arose naturally, not to say necessarily, from the existing circumstances. In Christianity itself there is no exclusiveness, no reserve; and when, in the time of Justin, divine service was still, as a general rule, celebrated in complete seclusion, the reason was simply that Christianity was an "unrecognized religion," and as such exposed to the fury and persecutions of the Pagans. When these circumstances changed, the practice itself disappeared. More especially the arcani disciplina may be said to have been born and lived and died together with the catechumenate. They originated at the same time and from the same causes; and when the institution of the catechumenate was abolished as superfluous, because the whole society had become Christian, the custom of an arcani disciplina was abandoned as unnecessary for the very same reason.

As long as the catechumenate existed, the catechumens, or any one else uninitiated who might have been present at the sermon, were shown out by the deacon when the sermon was over, and the so-called missa fideium began. First, after two years of preparation, the catechumens were admitted among the competentes and electi; and at this stage the religious teaching, properly speaking, began. But it was a condition well understood, and definitely set forth, that the catechumen should speak to no one of the creed which was orally confided to him; and all teaching concerning the holy rites was generally postponed till after baptism, or the first eucharist. Indeed, so strictly was this fides silentii kept, that people hesitated to communicate the text of the creed in historical works (Sozom. I., 2), or spoke of the elements of the eucharist only in a general way, and through hints (Ibid. 85). Epiphanius, in his Ancoratus (57), refrains from giving the formulas of the consecration; and Theodoret shows the same reserve with respect to baptism in his Divin. Decret. Epit. c. 18. Again and again Chrysostom suddenly breaks off with "the initiated know," or Augustine, with "the faithful know," when intentionally refraining from speaking plainly of certain subjects. Even Innocent I. hesitates to write in detail about the unction in a private letter ad Decentium; and on tombstones, for instance, all kinds of symbolical devices and metaphorical phrases were applied. But after the sixth century all this changed. No ecclesiastical writer mentions either the catechumenate, or the arcani disciplina any more. Isidorus Hispalensis (d.

636) gives a description of the divine service, without noticing any difference between a missa catechumenorum and a missa fidelium.

ARCHÆOLOGY, Biblical, a discipline which has been very variously defined, some authors (Dionysius Halicarnassus, Josephus, Jahn, etc.) incorporating with it the whole history of the Hebrew nation, and the whole geography of the Holy Land, others (De Wette, Gesenius, Hagenbach, etc.) excluding one or both of these elements from it; while finally others have confined it to purely artistic monuments. We would propose a middle course. Leaving out biblical history, properly so called, we define biblical archaeology as a representation of the physical, geographical, statistical, economical, and social conditions of that nation which produced the Bible. Of the antiquities of other nations which came in contact with the Hebrews, either on account of race relationship, such as the Aramæans, Arabs, Canaanites, Philistines, etc., or through some political combination, such as the Egyptians, Assyrians, Chaldæans, Persians, Greeks, and Romans, we admit only that which has a direct bearing on some scriptural passage. Thus defined, biblical archaeology is a most important aid, not only to the expounder, but also to every reader, of the Bible.

The sources of this science comprise: I. Antique monuments and buildings, plastic representations, inscriptions, and coins. To this group belong not only the ruins and architectural monuments from an ante-Mohammedan period in Palestine itself, which, although recent investigations and excavations have brought several to light, are not very numerous, but also the temples and palaces of Egypt, Assyria, Babylonia, Persia, Phœnicia, and Syria, with their plastic and pictorial representations, yield valuable instruction. The pertinent inscriptions are found collected in the Corpus Inscriptt. Græcar.: vol. III. (1853), p. 211; Corpus Inscriptt. Latin. ed.; MOMMSEN, vol. III. (1873); LE BAS ET WADINGTON: Inscriptions Grecques et Latines, tom. III., 1870; DE VOGUÉ: Syrie Centrale, Paris, 1868; WETZSTEIN: Ausgewählte griech. und latin. Inscripten, in Abhand. d. Berliner Akad., 1863. The literature concerning the sarcophagus of Eshmunazar (Phœnician), the tablet of Marseilles (Punic), and the stone of Mesa (Moabitic), will be found under the respective heads. The coins have been examined by Eckhel, Mionnet, Bertheau, Cavedoni, De Saulcy, Levy, and Madden (see article on Money). II. Among the written sources the Bible occupies the first place, though a careful discrimination is necessary between the various epochs in which the various books were written. Also the writings of Philo and Josephus give excellent information with regard to their own times; but, for the older periods, they must be used with caution. The Talmud, Targums, and the Rabbins form a "rich but not clear source." The older portions of them are of great value for the explanation of the New Testament. See MEUSCHEN: N. T. ex Talmude Illustratum, 1736; LIGHTFOOT: Horæ hebr. et talm. in N. T., Cantabr., 1658; SCHÖTTGEN: Horæ hebr. et talm. in N. T., 1733 et 1742; WETZSTEIN: Annot. in N. T., 1757. Several Greek and Roman authors, such as Herodotus, Xenophon, Polybius, Diodorus Siculus, Strabo, Plutarch, Appian, Pliny, Tacitus, and Justin contain important notices, but cannot be used without the most careful criticism. Among Oriental writers the Arabic geographers and natural philosophers are of great value, such as Istachri, Edrisi, Ibn Hautal, Abulfeda, Yakut, Abdollatiph, Avicenna, and others; also the religious books of the Arabs and Parsees, and the older poets and historians, are of interest. Of still greater importance are the numerous travellers' sketches from the Orient, old and new, which will be enumerated in the article on Palestine. We mention here only two works, giving extracts from older travels, and applying them immediately to peculiar passages of the Bible. E. F. C. ROSENMÜLLER: Das alte und neue Morgenland, 6 vols., Leipzig, 1818, an enlarged translation of BURDER'S Oriental Customs, London, 1802, 5th ed., 1816, 2 vols.; and TH. HARMAR: Beobachtungen über d. Orient aus Reisebeschreibungen, ed. J. E. Faber, Hamburg, 1772, and Clarke, London, 1876, 4 vols.

Of the separate branches of biblical archaeology we mention first biblical geography and natural history, including the views of the Hebrews of the universe and the earth, and their knowledge of geography and ethnology. For more detailed information on this point we refer to the special articles, and mention here only the principal works on natural history according to the Bible. J. J. ARCHÆOLOGY, Ecclesiastical, is a branch of church history; but its boundaries have not yet been finally fixed, either with respect to the extension of time, or with respect to the amount of material, which it ought to encompass. Some, as for instance Waich, confine it to the three first centuries; while others, as for instance Rosenkranz and Piper, want to continue it up to our time. In the latter case its name has sometimes been altered; thus Pellicia calls his work Christ. Ecclesie Politia. Again: some place the boundary-line at the twelfth (Augusti) or the fifteenth century (Baumgarten); while others, following the example of Joseph Bingham, place it at the death of Gregory the Great (604). The limitations of the material vary in a similar way. Formerly almost every thing was admitted; and the subject-matter was arranged, rather arbitrarily, after the fashion of Terentius Varro. It was Rosenkranz and Schleiermacher who first brought system into the limitation and arrangement of the materials. In his Encyclopædie der theol. Wissenschaften, Rosenkranz confines the domain of ecclesiastical archaeology to the Christian cultus; while Schleiermacher, in his Darstellung des theol. Studiums, also admits what we might call Christian customs. To these two titles most modern writers have added a third one, ecclesiastical constitution; and thus the whole discipline falls into three divisions. I. Ecclesiastical constitution, comprising the development of general priesthood into a distinction between clergy and laymen; the hierarchy of ecclesiastical offices, etc. II. Christian cultus, comprising, first, ecclesiastical actions, such as sermon, prayer, song, administration of the sacraments, etc.; next, ecclesiastical times, such as festivals, etc.; and, finally, ecclesiastical places, church architecture, religious art, etc. III. The settled customs of Christian life, marriage and burial ceremonies, etc. The last of these three divisions is still very incompletely developed; while the second, on account of the immense treasures of Christian art, has become an independent discipline, and the name "church antiquities" or "ecclesiastical archaeology," like that of "classical archaeology," is often confined to the art monuments.

Previous to the Reformation, there now and then appeared works which touched archaeological subjects, such as Durandus (d. 1294), Rationales Divinorum Officiorum; but it was the Reformation which first occasioned a critical treatment of church antiquities. The two great works on church history—the Magdeburg Centuries (Protestant) and Annales Baronii (Roman Catholic)—contain the archaeological summaries or surveys, and from their time ecclesiastical archaeology was treated as a separate discipline. Among Protestant writers we mention JOSEPH BINGHAM: Origines Ecclesiasticæ, or the Antiquities of the Christian Church, London, 1708-22; AUGUSTI: Denkwürdigkeiten d. christ. Archæologie, 1816-31; RHEINWALD: Kirchl. Archæologie; GUERICKE: Lehrbuch d. christ.-kirchl. Archæologie, 1847 [SMITH and CHEETHAM: Dictionary of Christian Antiquities, 1875, 2 vols.]. ARCHBISHOP. See BISHOP.

ARCHDEACONS and ARCHPRESBYTERS occur very early in the dioceses as helpers, and, under certain circumstances, as representatives, of the bishops; the archdeacon standing at the head of the secular clergy in all questions of government and administration, and the archpresbyter heading the priests in matters of cult.

The origin of the office of the archpresbyter is not clear. The name, ἀρχιπρεσβύτερος (Sozom. Hist. eccl. VIII. 12), or προτοπρεσβύτερος (Socrat. Hist. eccl. VI. 9), seems originally to have been given in the Greek Church to the oldest presbyter of the diocese as a matter of course; but by degrees, as a definite distinction became established between the episcopate and the presbyterate, we find, that, towards the close of the fourth century, the senior presbyter came to occupy an intermediate position between the bishop and the presbyters. In Western Europe, especially in Germany, the office developed in a somewhat different way. Here the episcopal dioceses, corresponding to the old missionary fields, were much larger, and so were the parishes into which the dioceses were divided, and which often followed the boundary-line of some political subdivision. Each parish had its church, often erected on the site of some ancient Pagan temple; but besides these parochial churches (ecclesie baptismales, plebes, tituli majores), in which full service was performed every Sunday, with baptism, burial, etc., each parish had a number of minor churches (oratoria, capelle, tituli minores), often connected with a castle, and in which only sermons were delivered, and prayers held, but no full service performed. In course of time these oratoria, capelle, tituli minores, became parish-churches themselves, with full service; but the original parochial church, whose incumbent now assumed the title of archipresbyter, or decanus ruralis, continued, nevertheless, to exercise some kind of supervision and superintendence over them.

Archdeacons occur as superior officers in the administration and jurisdiction of the episcopal diocese as early as the pontificate of Leo the Great. In the eighth century they were regular priests, and superior to the rural deacons. In the ninth century in France, and, somewhat later in Germany, the dioceses were divided, and each bishop had several archdeacons under him. With the development of the chapter-houses the powers of the archdeacons were much increased, as the archdeaconates were generally held by the provost of the cathedral and the canons; but from this circumstance arose also a conflict between the archdeacon and the bishop. Originally the archdeacon was only the coadjutor or representative of the bishop in the exercise of the episcopal jurisdiction; but, in the beginning of the thirteenth century, he is called judex ordinarius, and, but for the obstinate resistance of the bishops, he would probably have usurped the whole episcopal power of jurisdiction. He had also the right to hold visitations, to examine the candidates for ordination, to appoint and relegate the archpresbyters, etc. During the thirteenth century several councils (Tours, 1239; Liege, 1287; Mainz, 1310, etc.) tried to circumscribe the powers of the archdeacons in favor of the bishops, and very complicated questions of competence arose every now and then. But the Council of Trent finally settled the conflict. The archdeacons lost their right of visitation, of jurisdiction in criminal cases and cases of marriage, etc., and gradually the office lost its importance, or assumed other forms. In the Roman curia, the archdeacon became the cardinal-camerlengo, as the archpresbyter had become the cardinal-vicar; while in other episcopal curias, for instance in Germany, the office disappeared altogether, and its business was transferred to the vicar-general. In the Church of England there are seventy-one archdeacons appointed by the bishops, and acting as a kind of vice-bishop, with right of visitation, suspension, ex-communication, etc. See PERTSCH: Ursprung der Drakonien, Hildesheim, 1743; CRUPPS: Law relating to the Church and Clergy, 1859.

ARCHELA'US (ruler of the people), a son of Herod the Great by the Samaritan Malthaké; brought up at Rome with his uterine and older brother, Herod Antipas; succeeded, according to his father's will, on the latter's death (B.C. 4), although not without opposition on the part of Antipas, to the government of Judæa and Samaria, with the title of ethnarch, not king as he is called by Josephus (Antiq. XVIII. 4. 3) and Matthew (ii. 22). He was so cruel, that, in the tenth year of his reign, he was deposed by Augustus, who had originally given him his government, and banished to Vienne in Gaul, on complaint of the most prominent Jews and Samaritans, A.D. 6. He died there. Josephus also relates that he magnificently rebuilt the palace at Jericho, and built a village, called after him Archelais. He was twice married, first to Mariamne, whom he divorced in order to marry Glaphyra, the former wife of his brother Alexander, to whom she had borne children, and thus this second marriage was illegal. See JOSEPHUS Antiq. XVII. 13.

AR'CHEVITES, the name of a people transplanted by the Assyrians into the depopulated Samaria (Ez. iv. 9). They were inhabitants of Erech and its neighborhood, mentioned (in Gen. x. 10) as belonging to the kingdom of Nimrod. Erech has been identified in the ruins of Warka on the left bank of the Euphrates, eighty-two miles south-east from Babylon, a former seat of power, and apparently the necropolis of the Assyrian kings, judging from the number of clay coffins and royal inscriptions. In the cuneiform inscriptions the place is named Arku. The Greeks called it Orchoë.

ARCHICAPPELLANUS (apocrisiarius, palatii cætos, abbas regii oratorii, etc.) was the highest dignitary in the church of the ancient Frankish Empire. To the royal court, still ambulant, and changing its residence from place to place, he belonged a number of clerical persons, at the head of whom stood the archicapellan. His office was to report to the king on all ecclesiastical affairs; and as the Frankish Church of that time, in vindication of its independence of Rome, sought and found its centre in the royal power, the archicapellan became naturally the most influential and powerful of the Frankish prelates. Soon his office extended also to secular affairs. He became chief of the chancery, and the senior cancellarius became his subordinate. His office was generally filled by an archbishop, after the division of the empire it was even connected with a certain see, — for Germany with Mainz, for Gaul with Treves, for Italy with logne. See HINCMAR: De ordine palatii, c. 13, 16, 19, 20, 32; and the article on ELEEMOSYNARIUM.

ARCHIMANDRITE (ἀρχὸν τῆς μὲνδρας, from μὲνδρα, fold, being generally applied to a monastic association as consisting of the sheep of Christ) was the name given since the fifth century to the head of a monastery by the Greek Christians, and generally used in the Eastern Church, though it also occurs in the Western. In old times it was sometimes applied, both by Greek and Latin Christians, to all prelates, regardless of their respective rank.

ARCHITECTURE, Hebrew. The notices which the Bible gives of Hebrew architecture are very few, and so are the architectural remains from biblical times found in Palestine. The common house was that generally met with throughout the whole Orient, built of baked or sun-dried brick, sometimes of hewn stones (Isa. ix. 10), cemented by lime (Isa. xxvii. 9) or gypsum, and often plastered (Lev. xiv. 41; Ezek. xiii. 10; Matt. xxiii. 27). The beams and the roofing were made of sycamore, sometimes of olive or cedar-wood (Isa. ix. 10; Jer. xxii. 14). In palaces, columns and colonnades were of frequent occurrence (Judg. iii. 23). Larger houses consisted of several stories, and were built in a square, around a roomy court-yard, which contained the well and the fountain (2 Sam. xi. 2, xvii. 18). Sometimes such houses had a front court, from which people entered into the inner court through a door, or ascended to the upper stories or to the roof by stairs (Mark xiv. 68; Luke xvi. 20; John xviii. 16; Acts x. 17). The roof was flat, only a little inclined to let off the rain-water, and provided with a breastwork (Deut. xxii. 8). It was used for various domestic purposes,—for recreation and sleep, for lonely meditations and religious exercises, and in cases when somebody wished everybody to see and hear what he said or did (2 Sam. xi. 2; 1 Sam. ix. 25; Acts x. 9; 2 Sam. xvi. 22; Matt. x. 27; Isa. xxii. 1). Stairs led up to it, both from the street and from the interior of the house. With the roof communicated the so-called upper room, which was used as a place of retirement, a kind of house-chapel (2 Sam. xviii. 33; 2 Kings xxiii. 12; Acts i. 13, xx. 8), or as a spare-room for guests (2 Kings iv. 10). It was cool (Judg. iii. 20), and here the corpse was laid out before burial (Act. ix. 37, 39). The walls were generally wainscoted, the panels being sometimes inlaid with ivory (1 Kings xxii. 39; Jer. xxii. 14). Light was admitted through latticed windows (Judg. v. 23). The doors were shut by wooden bars, and the posts were adorned with proverbs (Deut. vi. 9). Rich people had rooms for the summer, and rooms for the winter, the latter provided with a hearth (Jer. xxxvi. 22; Amos iii. 15). The back rooms were destined for the women, and could be entered by none but the master of the house.

A Hebrew architecture, in the proper sense of the word, did not arise, however, until the times of the kings. But, immediately after the conquest of Zion, David began to rebuild and fortify the city, and to erect a palace for himself. Still greater and more brilliant were the undertakings of his son Solomon. He enlarged and strengthened the city-wall and the Castle of Millo (1 Kings iii. 1, ix. 15, 24, xi. 27), erected fortresses and palaces also outside of the capital (1 Kings ix. 15–19), and built a costly aqueduct by which excellent drinking-water was led from the region of Etam, south-west of Bethlehem, to Jerusalem. His two most magnificent buildings, however, were the temple and the palace. It took seven years and a half to build the former (1 Kings vi. 38), besides three years to gather and prepare the materials, during which time a hundred and eighty-three thousand Jews and strangers were employed. The contractors and superintendents were Phœnicians. The cedar and cypress wood, and probably also the stone, was brought from Lebanon, floated down to Joppa, and thence hauled to Jerusalem. On Mount Moriah enormous substructures had to be raised, in which huge stones were used, thirty feet long, seven feet and a half thick, and hewn in a manner not met with outside of Phœnicia and Syria. These truly cyclopean walls have partially withstood the vicissitudes of thirty centuries, while the temple itself has wholly disappeared. The building of the royal palace took thirteen years (1 Kings vii. 1). It stood on the north-eastern side of Mount Zion, west of the temple, and consisted of two large courts connected by a passage-yard (2 Kings xx. 4). In the centre of the front court stood the House of the Forest of Lebanon, two hundred feet long, one hundred feet broad, and sixty feet high, consisting of three stories, and forming an interior court-yard, surrounded by open galleries, which rested on four rows of columns of cedar-wood. A flight of stairs led to the passage-yard, with a hall one hundred feet long and sixty feet broad, resting on columns, where stood the magnificent throne (1 Kings x. 18). In the back court was the palace proper, with the harem, etc. A wall of three rows of huge hewn stones, with a battlement of cedar beams, surrounded the whole structure. The interior decorations consisted exclusively of foliage ornaments, whose character, though very different from what elsewhere occurs in antique art, is tolerably well known from ancient Hebrew tombs.

From the circumstance that both under David, and still more under Solomon, every architectural undertaking was executed by the aid of King Hiram of Tyre and his Phœnician artisans (1 Kings v. 9; Joseph. Ant. 8, 5, 3), it has been generally inferred that Hebrew architecture was a mere repetition of Phœnician architecture. Nevertheless, in the description of the palace, not only the general impression, but a number of details, remind most decidedly of the palaces of the valley of the Nile, and, with respect to the temple, the model was the tabernacle, and in the details foreign influence can have made itself felt only so far as it was compatible with the Jewish idea of God. In Hebrew architecture, when it stood at its highest, in the time of the kings, both Egyptian and Assyrian influences have asserted themselves beside the Phœnician. After the time of the Maccabees, especially under the Herodian dynasty, Greek taste and Greek style became prevailing. All the magnificent structures from that time — gymnasiums, baths, theatres, palaces, and colonnades — were Greek, and so was, to a great extent, the new temple built by Herod (Joseph. Ant. 15, 8, 1; 15, 9, 4; 6; 15, 10, 3). See TABERNACLE, TEMPLE.

ARCHITECTURE, Christian, does not denote a special chapter of the history of architecture. Taken into the service of the Christian Church, and adapting itself to the liturgical demands of Christian worship, architecture burst into a new bloom, and produced some of its grandest fruits; but it received this new spirit, and acted upon this new impulse, without deserting its old, already established norms, without any sudden breach in its onward development.

The gospel was preached in the synagogues of the cities (Acts xiv. 1, xvii. 1, xviii. 4, xviii. 19, xix. 9); but as soon as a congregation was formed, and a peculiar worship began to develop, the Christians separated from the synagogue, and held their gatherings in private houses (Acts ii. 46, xx. 9; Rom. xvi. 5; 1 Cor. xvi. 19). In the times of persecution every place might become a place of worship,—the field, the desert, the ship, the inn, the jail, and the tomb (Euseb. Hist. Eccl. V. 22). For a long period the catacombs of Rome were the church of the Roman congregation, the place of their teaching and their worship. Independent church-buildings, that is, buildings erected or set apart for the divine service of the congregations, existed in the third century; but the slight and frail character of these structures is proved by the circumstance, that, during the persecution of Diocletian, the famous Church of Nicomedia was destroyed and levelled to the ground by the Prætorian guard in the course of a few hours (Lactant. De Mortib. Persecut., c. 12).

Not until the time of Constantine did Christian architecture become an art; and so slight were its pretensions to originality, so closely did it adapt itself to the artistic forms already existing, that it appeared at once in two entirely different styles, I. The Basilican, and, II. The Byzantine, corresponding to the two principal types of national civilization,—the Roman and the Greek. Between these two styles there is very little similarity; for in neither of them is there, in their first productions, any thing strikingly and pronouncedly Christian. The Byzantine was the more magnificent and brilliant of the two. But it soon became stationary, and even degenerated; while the Basilican developed two new and grand phases, III. The Romanesque, and, IV. The Gothic style.

I. The Basilican style sprung from the Roman basilica, which was not only imitated, but in many cases actually taken possession of, and, with few and slight alterations, used as a Christian church. The style became prevalent throughout the Western countries, and lasted till the beginning of the eleventh century. Under the reign of Constantine, and partly by his support, several magnificent structures were erected in this style, both in the East and in the West, such as the Basilica of Tyre, built (313-22) by Bishop Paulinus, the Church of St. Mary in Bethlehem (328-36), the Church of the Holy Sepulchre in Jerusalem, consisting of a basilica and a rotunda, the Church of the Vatican (336), that of the Lateran, etc. As specimens still existing and in good repair may be mentioned, S. Paolo fuori le mura, S. Agnese fuori le mura, S. Clemente in Rome, S. Apollinare in Classe in Ravenna, etc.

The Roman basilica, an imitation of the Greek βασιλική σόα, thus called because the second archon, the ἄρχων βασιλεύς, held his court there, was a rectangular structure of two stories, presenting a bare wall to the street, and forming in the interior a large hall surrounded by columns and galleries. In the front was an open court, atrium, narthex; in the rear a semicircular addition covered with a vault, hemicyclium, tribuna. The main hall was used by the Romans as a kind of bourse, or exchange: in the tribuna sat the court,—the judge, the lawyers, the witnesses, etc.

The changes which it was necessary to make in order to transform this structure from an exchange to a church were not many. The atrium was enlarged, and provided with a fountain. Here assembled the catechumens and the penitents; but when the church ceased to have catechumens, and public penance was abolished, the atrium disappeared altogether. From the atrium, the interior hall—the place of the baptized, the faithful, the true congregation—was entered through three, or five, or even seven doors, according as the hall was divided in three, or five, or seven aisles. Three was the common number. Two parallel rows of columns divided the hall into three aisles, of which the middle one, the nave proper, generally was double as broad and double as high as the side-aisles, and enclosed on account of its additional height by a solid wall resting on the columns, and on arches spanning from column to column, and pierced towards the roof by a row of windows. The hemicyclium, or tribuna, now became the sacarium, or sanctuarium, the place of the clergy, elevated a few steps above the nave, and separated from it by a railing. Here stood in the centre the altar, on both sides; in front, the ambons, or pulpits; in the middle, behind the altar, the bishop's throne, and all along the wall the seats for the clergy.

The exterior effect of the basilica was, no doubt, heavy and cold; but the interior must have made an impression of great magnificence, though perfect harmony may have been wanting. The doors were of carved wood or gilt bronze, and provided with hangings of costly stuffs embroidered with gold and silver. The columns were of the finest marble, sometimes of porphyry, taken from the old Pagan temples; the seats, of marble and bronze, or of wood inlaid with ivory and precious stones, taken from the baths and the theatres. The roof was of wood, gilt or painted; and the heaviness of the masonry was relieved by exquisite pictures in mosaic. Originally these pictures were used simply as a method of teaching, as a means by which to impress the principal facts of the Christian faith upon the minds of the congregation; but in course of time they were employed for purely æsthetical purposes.

II. The Byzantine style originated, according to some art-historians, from the Roman mausoleum, according to others, from a Persian influence, most probably from both. The cupola, which is the most prominent feature in Byzantine church-architecture, was frequently used in Roman tombs; and the transition from a Pagan mausoleum erected in honor of some hero, to the Christian church raised as a mausoleum over the remains of a martyr, seems both easy and natural. But in the Roman tombs the cupola was always placed on a circular substructure, and it was in Persia that the problem was first solved of placing the cupola on a square substructure by forming an octagon in the interior of the square by means of a huge pillar in each angle. This Persian form of dome-building—the combination of the cupola and the square—the Eastern Church adopted; and in this ground-plan it found its spirit expressed, its wants satisfied. The structure became higher and loftier; and, by the opportunity it afforded to place galleries on lower columns between the pillars, it at once acquired a more picturesque and imaginative appearance, and met the want, so peremptory in the East, of full separation between the sexes. In the Roman basilica, with its atrium for the catechumens and penitents, its nave for the congregation, its apsis, or sanctuarium, for the officiating clergy, we recognize the Western Church, with its craving for clear and definite organization, for policy. In the Byzantine dome, in which the light and broad aisles have been transformed into narrow and dark corridors, in which the atrium, and even the apsis, with the altar, have shrunk into insignificance, in which the whole construction is concentrated on the free central space, where a dim light floats far aloft under the cupola, we recognize the Eastern Church, with its craving for dreamy and subtle speculation, for theology.

Several fine specimens of the style were produced in the reign of Constantine, such as the so-called Dominium Aureum in Antioch (331); the Church of the Holy Sepulchre in Jerusalem, which, as above mentioned, combined a basilica with a rotunda; the Church of the Apostles in Constantinople; the Church of the Ascension on Mount Olivet, etc. But its point of culmination it did not reach until in the sixth century, under the reign of Justinian. The two masterpieces of the style are St. Vitale in Ravenna (526-47) and St. Sophia in Constantinople (532-57). The latter is probably the grandest monument of Christian art, covering an area of seventy thousand square feet. The bulk of the building forms nearly a square, two hundred and thirty-five feet the one way, and two hundred and fifty feet the other. The central dome—a hundred and seven feet in diameter, and forty-six feet high—rises a hundred and eighty feet from the floor; east and west it rests, not on pillars with piers, but on two semi-domes of the same dimensions, and thus a central space, two hundred feet long and a hundred feet broad, is left entirely free and unencumbered. The costliness of the materials—gold and silver, ivory and precious stones, porphyry and marble—corresponded to the grandeur of the dimensions; and when the building was finished, Justinian burst out, "I have eclipsed thee, O Solomon!" Since 1453 St. Sophia has been used by the Turks as a common mosque.

A latter development of the Byzantine style shows a substitution of the Greek cross for the square substructure, and a multiplication of the cupolas,—one at the end of each arm, and one over the crossing. The Church of St. Mark in Venice (1043-71) is the most prominent example. A still further complication was reached by combining the Greek cross with the square. The number of cupolas was then increased to nine,—one at the end of each arm, one over the crossing, and one in each corner of the square; and various fantastic, almost grotesque forms were attempted. Many examples are found in Russia. In Western Europe the style penetrated only as far as the Hungarian frontier, with the exception of some places in Northern Italy; but in Eastern Europe and Western Asia it was and is generally prevailing.

LIT.—Descriptions of individual churches are found in EUSEBIUS: Vita Constantini, III., 50; IV., 30, 58, and in a poem by PAULUS SILENTIARIUS on St. Sophia, in Script. Hist. Byzant.; TEXIER et P. PULLAN: Architecture Byzantine, 1854; SELZENBERG: Altchristliche Baudenkmale von Konstantinopel.

III. The Romanesque style was simply a development from the basilican by adaptation of various Byzantine motives, especially the round arch. It dates as a definite style from the beginning of the eleventh century, and produced a number of fine buildings in Upper Italy and in the valleys of the Rhine and the Rhone. It was, nevertheless, only a transition style; and during the thirteenth century it disappeared, its true and perfect ideal having been found in the Gothic style.

Under the rule of the Romanesque, both the ground-plan and the interior and exterior arrangement of the old basilica were materially changed. The most important of these changes was the introduction of transepts, or the adaptation of the cruciform plan with fixed mathematical proportions. In the old basilica, all proportions had been completely arbitrary; but in the cruciform plan the proportions became fixed, as the cross was invariably produced by repeating the square, chosen as unit, three times to the west, and one time respectively to the north, east, and south. The establishment of chapters, or the connection between the church and the monastery, made an extension of the choir necessary. The introduction of side-altars produced a number of apses, especially at the termination of the transepts and the aisles. The development of the vault over the martyr's bones into a complete crypt caused the choir to be raised considerably above the floor of the nave. In the Cathedral of Brandenburg, a flight of twenty-two stairs led from the latter to the former. The atrium disappeared; and the cantharus was moved inside the door, where it became the font with holy water. A belfry was raised,—first one, and as an independent building, then two, and connected with the western termination of the main building,—where, instead of the atrium, a front façade was formed, with an elaborate portal and window, etc.

Of still greater consequence were the changes which the introduction of the round arch caused in the construction of the building. When the flat wooden ceiling was discarded, the barrel-vault was first tried, as the easiest to build; but, as the barrel-vault pressed with equal force on every point of the side-walls, it was necessary to give these an enormous strength. Then the cross-vault was adopted, in which the pressure is concentrated on those four points in which the ribs touch the side-walls. These four points it became necessary to strengthen with additional masonry; while the intervening portions of the wall could be made thinner and lighter without weakening the structure. Thus the dead sameness of the wall was broken, and the formation of pillars began. Also the cross-vaulting—looking like a softly undulating cloth, fastened to the points of abutment, and along the ribs, but raised as if by an upward breeze—made a much stronger impression of life and animation than the flat wooden ceiling; and, compared with the old Basilican style, the Romanesque was a decided progress, though it generally makes a somewhat heavy, and not fully harmonious impression.

IV. The Gothic style realized all the aspirations of the Romanesque. Retaining the ground-plan and general arrangement such as they had been fixed by the Romanesque style, the Gothic seized upon the new principle of construction introduced, but only feebly developed, by the Romanesque,—the arch,—and carried it out to its last consequences and to its highest perfection, producing buildings which are marvels of audacity, and marvels of beauty.

The difference between the Romanesque and the Gothic style arises from the substitution by the latter of the pointed arch for the round. To whom the invention of the pointed arch belongs is not known; but true lancet arches were much used in Asia by the Saracens at the time of the first crusade, and it is probable that it was the crusaders who brought this novelty back to Europe, as we find it introduced almost simultaneously in France, England, Germany, Spain, and Italy. The most palpable advantage which the pointed arch has above the semicircular is, that it makes it as easy to vault an oblong as a square place by allowing arches of different span to enter into the same system. They need only to be constructed on different radii in order to be carried to the same height. But still greater consequences were involved in the principle. The pressure of the pointed arch is, of course, more perpendicular than that of the semicircular. The side-thrust is smaller. Thus it becomes easier with the pointed arch to gather the whole pressure of the vault in a few single points, and to break up completely the flat stretch of wall, folding it into clustered columns, and giving each shaft at the sustaining point its own part of the vault to carry. Thereby all the lines of the construction assume an upward tendency, which wholly obliterates the idea of a mechanical contrivance, and actually produces the impression of organic growth. It is the great triumph of the Gothic style that it alone, among all styles, has been able to give the aspect of movement to stationary forms, the illusion of life to dead masses.

The style arose in the twelfth century, culminated in the thirteenth, degenerated by excesses (such as the Flamboyant in France, and the Perpendicular in England) in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, and finally gave way to the Renaissance. The earliest fully-developed example is the Cathedral of St. Denis, consecrated in 1144; and in Northern France the style reached its highest perfection in the cathedrals of Notre Dame in Paris (1163-1312), Chartres (1195-1260), Rheims (begun in 1212), Amiens (1220-88), etc. Also in England it produced a number of exceedingly fine buildings, such as the Cathedral of Canterbury (1174), Westminster Abbey in London (1245-69), the cathedrals of Salisbury (1220-58), Exeter (1327-69), etc. But the difference between Gothic architecture in France and in England, though a difference of national taste only, not of artistic principle, is, nevertheless, very pronounced, and strikes the beholder at the very first glance: the English cathedral is long and low, stately and solemn; the French is short and high, airy and spirited. In Germany, Spain, and Italy the Gothic style developed less originality, though in the first-mentioned country it produced two magnificent buildings,—the Church of St. Stephen in Vienna, and the Cathedral of Cologne.

V. The Renaissance style, which in the course of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries completely superseded the Gothic, has sometimes been designated as a return to Paganism. It was, in all events, a return to the classical forms. It began as eclecticism. The round arch, the cupola, the column in its classical proportions and significance, etc., were once more resorted to; but it ended in merely copying antique temples; the ern cities by means of a most minute imitation. Between these two points, the Renaissance period has a very varied history, of great interest to the architect proper, but not so very impressive to the student of Christianity and its influence on the world. Its chief monument is the Church of St. Peter in Rome, commenced in 1506 by Bramante, continued by Raphael (1514-20), Peruzzi (1520-46), Michelangelo (1546-64), Carlo Maderno (1605-29), and finished by Bernini in 1666.

Like the Romanesque, the Renaissance style bore the character of being a transition, with the difference, however, that it did not lead to anything. In modern times church-building generally a more or less strict adaptation of some older style, without any distinct ideas of its own. Sometimes it is a mixing-together of all styles, sometimes a renunciation of style altogether. The latter is especially the case in America. A great number of churches is built here; but though some of them are very costly and more or less magnificent structures, most of them are constructed merely with regard to convenience and comfort.

ARCHONTICI, a sect of the fourth century, composed a peculiar kind of works which they called revelations (see PSEUDEPIGRAPHS OF THE O. T.), in one of which, "The Symphony," they treated of the seven heavens, each of which had a ruler, ἀρχων, of its own. Of these rulers, whose mother was a certain Thotina, they said that they fed on human souls, and could not exist without such food. The ruler of the seventh heaven they called Zabaoth (Σαβαώθ); and the devil, who was identical with the god of the Jews, was one of his sons. They rejected baptism; but some of them used to sprinkle the head of the dead with water or oil, thereby intending to make them invisible, and raise them above the reach of the heavenly powers. The sect was started by Peter of Capharbaricha, near Jerusalem, and, especially under the vigorous preaching of his disciples, spread among rich and prominent people. Its doctrines, Gnostic in general, were afterwards carried into the Greater and Lesser Armenia. See BAUR: Die christliche Gnosis, Tübingen, 1835. The source of all our knowledge is Epiphanius, Her. xl. Later writers merely copy him.

ARCIMBOLDI, Giovanni Angelo, b. in Milan in the latter part of the fifteenth century, d. there in 1555, studied law, obtained an appointment in the service of the Roman curia, became protomarius et referendarius apostolicus for all financial matters concerning the erection of the Church of St. Peter, and was in 1514 made commissary-general for the sale of indulgences in Northern Germany and Scandinavia. In Denmark he staid two years, and realized immense profits by selling "forgiveness for all kind of crimes, restitution to the state of innocence and purity at the time of baptism, and free entrance through the gates of heaven." But when, in order to achieve a similar success in Sweden, he tried to ingratiate himself with the Swedish grandees by betraying to them the plans of the Danish king, all the property he had amassed in Denmark, consisting of money, jewelry, iron, butter, and eggs, was confiscated. He had to flee for his life, and a formal accusation of treachery was raised against him in Rome. The pope, however, acquitted or forgave him, as the Danish king proved himself favorable to the Reformation, and Arcimboldi afterwards served Charles V., was made Bishop of Novara in 1525, and Archbishop of Milan in 1550. In literary history he acquired a name by his discovery of the five first books of the Annales of Tacitus in the library of the Monastery of New-Corvey.

ARCOSOLIUM, from arcus, an "arch," and solum, a "throne," a "bath-tub," a "coffin," denotes a peculiar tomb-arrangement found in the Roman catacombs, and employed at the graves of martyrs and other eminent persons. The arrangement is this: an arch is hewn into the living rock, and under this arch the sarcophagus is placed, or the niche is closed by masonry to the height of a common table, and the tomb thus formed covered by a loose slab. Often the background of the niche is painted, or ornamented in various other ways.

AR'ETAS. 1. A contemporary of the Jewish high priests Jason and Menelaus, and of the King of Syria, Antiochus Epiphanes, B.C. 170 (2 Macc. v. 8).

2. The King of Arabia, Nabatæa, and father-in-law of Herod Antipas; but, when the latter divorced himself from his (Aretas') daughter to make way for Herodias, Aretas revenged the insult by arms, and completely defeated the army of Herod Antipas. Antipas complained to his patron, the Emperor Tiberius, who commissioned Tellius, Governor of Syria, to attack Aretas. But the death of Tiberius prevented him. The new emperor, he thought, might not desire to continue the feuds of his predecessor. The interesting point in this history is, that to Aretas, having now the good graces of the Romans, Caligula restored the government of Damascus, and thus the accuracy of Paul is fully sustained. It was while Aretas was king, that the governor of that city, incited by the Jewish priests, desired to apprehend Paul. This was A.D. 38 or 39. Mionnet, Descript. de medailles antiques, tom. V., p. 285, mentions a coin from Damascus with the name of Aretas upon it, which is to be set down as probably from A.D. 37 or 38.

ARETIUS, Benedictus, a native of Bätterkinden, in the canton of Bern, Switzerland, studied at Marburg, and was appointed professor of theology in 1563, in Bern, where he died in 1574. His principal work — Theologia Problemata, Geneva, 1579, republished in 1617 — was highly valued, and found many imitators. His Examen Theologicum is also a useful book, and run through six editions in fourteen years. His commentary on the New Testament, published in 1580, was republished in 1616, and his commentary on the Pentateuch and the Psalms in 1618. He also gave a commentary to Pindar, and a description of the flora of Stockhorn and Riesen. See MELCH. ADAM: Vitæ Theolog.

ARGENTINE REPUBLIC, The, extending between the Andes to the west and the Atlantic to the east, between Patagonia to the south and Bolivia to the north, was discovered by Juan Diaz de Solis in 1516, occupied by the Spaniards in the following decades, and organized as a part of the viceroyalty of Peru. In 1778 a separate viceroyalty was established, with Buenos Ayres as its capital, and comprising Bolivia, Paraguay, Uruguay, and the states of the Rio de la Plata. In 1810, after the dethronement of the Bourbon dynasty in Spain, a revolution broke out in this group of colonial lands, which ended, in 1842, with the formal recognition of their independence by the mother-country. But at the same time an internal war began between the several members of the group, which finally resulted in the establishment of so many independent republics.

With the Spaniards the Roman-Catholic Church came into the country; and it is still the church of the state, having five bishoprics, — Buenos Ayres, Cordova, Salta, Sarana, and Cuyo. The liberal ideas, however, which, since 1813, have reigned in the government, and prevailed in the people, have considerably modified the position of the Roman Church. Most of the convents have been suppressed, and their property confiscated; and the government has assumed the administration of the tithes, applying one part of them for educational purposes. In 1825 religious toleration was established, and in 1834 mixed marriages were recognized.

As long as the mission was in the hands of the Jesuits (1586-1767), great results were effected. Large numbers of Indians were reclaimed from the savage state, and led into the paths of a Christian and civilized life. They were induced to settle in villages around the missionary stations; they were taught agriculture and trade; they received the first elements of education; and on every occasion they showed a most remarkable docility towards their teachers. But, after the expulsion of the Jesuits, the Roman Catholic Church—now represented by the Dominican and Franciscan orders—became indolent, greedy, and tyrannous. It lost its hold on the hearts of the people; and thousands of Indians relapsed into heathenism and savagery.

Protestant missionaries first came to the country in 1835, and several flourishing stations have been established, especially by the Methodists. A special aid in their work the Protestant missionaries have found in the circumstance that of late a great number of Protestant settlers have emigrated to the country. See the Report of the Miss. Soc. of the Meth. Ep. Church for 1879, New York, 1880.

ARIANISM, so called from its leader—Arius (Ἀρειός), a presbyter of Alexandria (d. 336), see ARIUS—is one of the most powerful and tenacious christological heresies in the history of ancient Christianity. It was during a part of the fourth century the ruling creed in the Eastern Church, though under constant vigorous protest of the orthodox party. It was also at first the creed of most of the barbarian Teutonic races, before they were converted to Catholicity.

I. History of Arianism. The roots of the Arian conflict lie deep in the differences of the ante-Nicene doctrine of the Logos, especially in the contradictory elements of Origen's Christology, which was claimed by both parties. Origen, on the one hand, attributed to Christ eternity and other divine attributes, which lead to the Nicene doctrine of the identity of substance (homo-ousia); but, on the other hand, in his zeal for the personal distinctions in the Godhead, he taught with equal emphasis a separate essence and the subordination of the Son to the Father, calling him "a secondary God," without the article, while the Father is "the God." He taught the eternal generation of the Son from the will of the Father, but represented it as the communication of a secondary divine substance. Athanasius laid stress on the first, Arius on the second element in the Christology of Origen.

(1) History of Arianism from 318 to the Council of Nicæa (325).—The controversy broke out at Alexandria, A. D. 318. According to the account of Socrates, Alexander, the bishop of Alexandria, gave the first impulse by insisting, in a meeting, on the eternity of the Son; whereupon Arius openly opposed, and charged him with Sabellianism. He reasoned thus: "If the Father begat the Son, he must be older than the Son, and there was a time when the Son was not; from this it further follows, that the Son has his substance (hypostasis) from nothing." The accounts of Sozomenus and Epiphanius differ in this, that they date the conflict from discussions among the presbyters and laymen, and Sozomenus represents Alexander as at first wavering between the two opinions. In 321 Alexander convened a council of about a hundred Egyptian and Lybian bishops at Alexandria, which excommunicated Arius and his followers for their open denial of the true deity of Christ. But Arius spread his views all the more zealously in an entertaining half-poetic work, Thalia (the Banquet), of which only fragments remain in Athanasius. He found powerful friends in Eusebius of Nicomedia, Eusebius of Cæsarea (the famous church historian), and other bishops, who either shared his view, or at least considered it innocent. In a short time the whole Eastern Church was turned into a metaphysical battle-field. The Emperor Constantine was at first inclined to look upon the controversy as a mere logomachy, and never understood its deeper import. But, for political considerations, he called, at the suggestion of some bishops, the first œcumenical synod of the church, to settle the Arian controversy, together with the question of the time of celebrating Easter, and the Meletian schism in Egypt.

(2) The Council of Nicæa (325).—The first œcumenical council, held at Nicæa, Bithynia (now a miserable Turkish village, — Is-nik), consisting of three hundred and eighteen bishops (about one-sixth of all the bishops of the Græco-Roman Empire), resulted in the formal condemnation of Arius, and the adoption of the "Nicene Creed," so called, which affirms in unequivocal terms the doctrine of the eternal deity of Christ in these words: "(We believe) in one Lord Jesus Christ, the only Son of God, begotten of the Father [the only begotten, of the essence of the Father, God of God], Light of Light, very God of very God, begotten, not made, being of one substance with the Father, by whom all things were made [in heaven and on earth]; who for us men, and for our salvation, came down and was incarnate, and was made man; he suffered, and the third day he rose again, and ascended into heaven; from thence he cometh to judge the quick and the dead." The passages enclosed in brackets were omitted or changed in the so-called Constantinopolitan Creed (381). To the original Nicene Creed is added the following anathema: "And those who say: there was a time when he (the Son) was not; and: he was made out of nothing, or out of another substance or thing, or the Son of God is created, or changeable, or alterable;—they are condemned by the holy catholic and apostolic Church." This anathema was likewise omitted in that form of the Nicene Creed which is usually, though incorrectly, traced to the Constantinopolitan synod of 381, and which since the Council of Chalcedon in 451 entirely superseded the original Nicene Creed of 325. (See below.)

The creed was signed by nearly all the bishops, Hosius at the head, even by Eusebius of Cæsarea, who, before and afterwards, occupied a middle position between Athanasius and Arius.

This is the first instance of such signing of a doctrinal symbol. Eusebius of Nicomedia and Theognis of Nicæa signed the creed, but not the condemnatory formula appended, and for this they were deposed, and banished for a short time.

Only two Egyptian bishops — Theonas and Secundus — persistently refused to sign, and were banished, with Arius, to Illyria. This is the first example of the civil punishment of heresy, and opened the long and dark era of persecutions for all departures from the catholic or orthodox faith. The books of Arius were burnt, and his followers branded as enemies of Christianity. The Nicene Creed has outlived all the subsequent storms, and, in the improved form given to it at Constantinople in 381, it remains to this day the most generally received creed of Christendom, and, if we omit the later Latin insertion, Filioque, a bond of union between the Greek, the Roman, and the orthodox Protestant churches.

(3) From the Council of Nicæa (325) to the Council of Constantinople (381).— After the Nicene Council an Arian and semi-Arian reaction took place, and acquired for a time the ascendancy in the Roman Empire. Arianism now entered the stage of its political power. This was a period of the greatest excitement in Church and State: Council was held against council; creed was set up against creed; anathema was hurled against anathema. "The highways," says the impartial heathen historian, Ammianus Marcellinus, "were covered with galloping bishops." The churches, the theatres, the hippodromes, the feasts, the markets, the streets, the baths, and the shops of Constantinople and other large cities, were filled with dogmatic disputes. In intolerance and violence the Arians even exceeded the orthodox. The interference of emperors and their court only poured oil on the flame, and heightened the bitterness of contest by adding confiscation and exile to the spiritual punishment of synodical excommunication. The unflinching leader of the orthodox party was Athanasius, a pure and sublime character, who had figured at the Council of Nicæa as a youthful archdeacon, in company with Bishop Alexander of Alexandria, and after his death became his successor (328), but was again and again deposed by imperial despotism, and spent twenty years in exile. He sacrificed every thing to his conviction, and had the courage to face the empire in arms ("Athanasius contra mundum"). He was a man of one idea and one passion, — the eternal divinity of Christ, — which he rightly considered as the cornerstone of the Christian system. The politico-ecclesiastical leader of the Arian party was Eusebius of Nicomedia (not to be confounded with the historian), afterwards Bishop of Constantinople, who baptized Constantine on his death-bed. Constantine was turned favorably to Arius, he recalled him from exile, and ordered him to be solemnly restored to the communion of the Catholic Church at Constantinople; but, on the day preceding his intended restoration, the heretic died suddenly (336). See ARIUS. In the year following, Constantine himself died, and his son Constantine II. recalled Athanasius from his first exile, into which his father had sent him. But in the East, where Constantius, the second son of Constantine the Great, ruled, Arianism prevailed, and was maintained with fanatical zeal by the court, and by Eusebius of Nicomedia, now transferred to Constantinople (since 338). Athanasius was deposed a second time, and took refuge with Julius of Rome (340), who, with the great body of the Western Church, sided with the Nicene Creed, and gloried in Athanasius as a martyr of the Christian truth.

It is unnecessary to follow the varying fortunes of the two parties, and the history of councils, which neutralized one another, without materially advancing the points in dispute. The most important are the Synod of Antioch, A.D. 341, which set forth an orthodox creed, but deposed Athanasius; the orthodox Council of Sardica, A.D. 343 (not 347, as formerly supposed; see Hefele, Conciliengeschichte, I., 515 sqq.); and the Arian counter-synod of Philippopolis; the councils of Sirmium, 351; Arles, 353; Milan, 355; the second council at Sirmium, 357; the third, 358; at Antioch, 358; at Ancyra, 358; at Constantinople, 360. Aided by Constantius, Arianism, under the modified form represented by the term homo-ousion (similar in essence, as distinct from the Nicene homo-ousion and the strictly Arian hetero-ousion) gained the power in the empire; and even the papal chair in Rome was for a while desecrated by heresy during the Arian interregnum of Felix II. But the death of Constantius in 361, the indifference of his successor, Julian the Apostate, to all theological disputes, the toleration of Jovian (d. 364), and especially the internal dissensions of the Arians, prepared the way for a new triumph of orthodoxy. The Eusebians, or semi-Arians, taught that the Son was similar in substance (homoiousios) to the Father; while the Aëtians (from Aëtius, a deacon of Antioch) and the Eunomians (from Eunomius, Bishop of Cyzicus in Mysia) taught that he was of a different substance (heteroousios), and unlike (anomoios) to the Father (hence the names Hetero-ousiasts and Anomoeans). A number of synods and creeds of compromise were devoted to the healing of these dissensions, but without permanent effect.

On the other hand, the defenders of the Nicene Creed, Athanasius, and, after his death (373), the three Cappadocian bishops, — Basil the Great, Gregory of Nazianzum, and Gregory of Nyssa, — triumphantly vindicated the Catholic doctrine against all the arguments of the opposition. When Gregory of Nazianzum was called to Constantinople in 379, there was but one small congregation in the city which had not become Arian; but his able and eloquent sermons on the deity of Christ, which won him the title of the "Theologian," contributed powerfully to the resurrection of the Catholic faith; and two years afterwards he presided over the second œcumenical council. The rising influence of monasticism, especially in Egypt, was bound up with the cause of Athanasius; and the more conservative portion of the semi-Arians gradually approached the orthodox in spite of the persecutions of the violent Arian emperor, Valens.

(4) The final triumph of the Nicene orthodoxy under Theodosius the Great (381).— This emperor was a Spaniard by birth, and reared in the Nicene faith. During his long and powerful reign (379-395) he completed externally the spiritual and intellectual victory of orthodoxy already achieved. He convened the second œcumenical council at Constantinople (381), which consisted of only one hundred and fifty bishops, and was presided over successively by Meletius, Gregory of Nazianzum, and Nectarius of Constantinople. The council condemned the Pneumatomachian heresy, which denied the divinity of the Holy Spirit, and virtually completed the orthodox dogma of the Holy Trinity. The Nicene Creed now in common use (with the exception of the Latin clause Filioque which is of much later date, and rejected by the Greek Church) is usually traced to this synod of Constantinople, but existed at an earlier date: it is found in the Ancoratus of Epiphanius, A.D. 373, and derived by him from a still older source, namely the baptismal creed of the Church of Jerusalem. It is not in the original acts of the Council of Constantinople, but was afterwards incorporated in them. Dr. Hort derives it mainly from Cyril of Jerusalem, about 362-364. See his Dissertations quoted below, and the art. NICENE CREED.

The emperor gave legal effect to the doctrinal decisions and disciplinary canons, and in July, 381, he enacted a law that all church-property should be given up to those who believed in the equal divinity of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit. Arianism, after forty years' reign, was forcibly driven out of all the churches of Constantinople, and generally forbidden throughout the empire. We meet the last traces of it in Constantinople under the Emperor Anastasius (491-518).

After Theodosius, Arianism ceased to exist as an organized moving force in theology and church-history; but it re-appeared from time to time as an isolated theological opinion, especially in England. Emlyn, Whiston, Whitby, Samuel Clarke, Lardner, and many who are ranked among Socinians and Unitarians, held Arian sentiments; but Milton and Isaac Newton, though approaching the Arian view on the relation of the Son to the Father, differed widely from Arianism in spirit and aim.

(5) Arianism among the Barbarians.—The church legislation of Theodosius was confined, of course, to the limits of the Roman Empire. Beyond it, among the barbarians of the West, who had received Christianity in the form of Arianism during the reign of the Emperor Valens, it maintained itself for two centuries longer, though more as a matter of accident than choice and conviction. The Ostrogoths remained Arians till 553; the Visigoths, till the Synod of Toledo in 589; the Suevi in Spain, till 560; the Vandals, who conquered North Africa in 429, and furiously persecuted the Catholics, till 530, when they were expelled by Belisarius; the Burgundians, till their incorporation in the Frank Empire (in 534); the Longobards in Italy, till the middle of the seventh century. Alaric, the first conqueror of Rome, Genseric, the conqueror of North Africa, Theodoric the Great, King of Italy, and hero of the Nibelungenlied, were Arians; and the first Teutonic translation of the Scriptures, of which important fragments remain, came from the Arian or semi-Arian missionary Ulfilas.

II. The Creed of Arianism.—The Father alone is God: he alone is unbegotten, eternal, wise, good, unchangeable. He is separated by an infinite chasm from man. God cannot create the world directly, but only through an agent; the Logos, who is himself created for the purpose of creating the world. The Son of God is pre-existent, "before time and before the world," and "before all creatures." He is a middle being between God and the world, the perfect image of the Father, the executor of his thoughts, yea, even the Creator of the world. In a secondary or metaphorical sense he may be called "God." But, on the other hand, Christ is himself a "creature,"—the first creature of God, through whom the Father called other creatures into existence. He is "made," not of "the essence" of the Father, but "out of nothing," by "the will" of the Father, before all conceivable time, yet in time: he is therefore not eternal, and there "was a time when he was not." Neither is he unchangeable, but subject to the vicissitudes of a created being. With the limitation of Christ's duration is necessarily connected a limitation of his power, wisdom, and knowledge. It was expressly asserted by the Arians that the Son does not perfectly know the Father, and therefore cannot perfectly reveal him. He is essentially different from the Father (heterousios, in opposition to the orthodox formula, homoousios, co-equal, and the semi-Arian homoiouosios, similar, in essence). Aëtius and Eunomius afterwards more strongly expressed this by calling him unlike the Father (anomoios).

As to the humanity of Christ, Arius ascribed to him only a human body with an animal soul, not a rational soul. He anticipated Appollinarius, who substituted the divine Logos for the human reason, but from the opposite motive,—of saving the unity of the divine personality of Christ.

The subsequent development of Arianism by Aëtius and Eunomius brought out no new features, except many inconsistencies and contradictions, and the negative and downward tendency of christological error. The controversy degenerated into a heartless and barren metaphysical war. The eighteen or more creeds which Arianism and semi-Arianism produced between the first and the second œcumenical councils (325-381) are leaves without blossoms, and branches without fruit.

The Arians supported their doctrine from those passages of the Bible which seem to place Christ on a par with the creature (Prov. viii. 22-25; Acts ii. 36; Col. i. 15), or which ascribe to the incarnate Christ (not the pre-existent Logos) in his state of humiliation lack of knowledge, weariness, sorrow, and other changing affections and states of mind (Luke ii. 52; Mark xiii. 32; Heb. v. 8, 9; John xii. 27, 28; Matt. xxvi. 39), or which teach some kind of subordination of the Son to the Father (especially John xiv. 28: "The Father is greater than I," which refers, not to the essential nature, but to the state of humiliation). Arius was forced to admit, in his first letter to Eusebius of Nicomedia, that Christ was called God (even πλήρης θεός μονογενής, "the full, only-begotten God," according to the famous disputed reading for μονογενής υἱός, "only-begotten Son," in John i. 18. See on this the first Dissertation of Professor Hort, Lond., 1876). But he reduced this expression to the idea of a subordinate, secondary, created divinity. The dogmatic and philosophical arguments were chiefly negative and rationalistic, amounting to this: The Nicene view of the essential deity of Christ is unreasonable, inconsistent with monotheism, with the dignity and absoluteness of the Father, and of necessity leads to Sabellianism, or the Gnostic dreams of emanation.

On the other hand, Arianism was refuted by an array of scriptural passages, which teach directly or indirectly the divinity of Christ, and his essential equality with the Father. The conception of a created Creator, who existed before the world, and yet himself began to exist, was shown to be self-contradictory and untenable. There can be no middle being between Creator and creature; no time before the world, as time is itself a part of the world, or the form under which it exists successively; nor can the unchangeableness of the Father, on which Arius laid great stress, be maintained, except on the ground of the eternity of his Fatherhood, which, of course, implies the eternity of the Sonship. Athanasius charges Arianism with dualism, and even polytheism, and with destroying the whole doctrine of salvation. For if the Son is a creature, man still remains separated, as before, from God: no creature can redeem other creatures, and unite them with God. If Christ is not divine, much less can we be partakers of the divine nature, and in any real sense children of God.

The Arian system is a refined form of Paganism, and substitutes a created demigod for the eternal uncreated Logos. It lowers Christianity to a merely relative value. It separates God and the world by an impassable gulf, and makes a real reconciliation and atonement impossible. It represented the Erastian principle of the Byzantine Empire, and associated itself with the secular political power, without which it soon lost its vitality. Its logical tendency is downward to Socinianism, Unitarianism, and Rationalism, until the untenable conception of a secondary God, who originated before the world, out of nothing, gives way to the idea of Christ as a mere man. The cause of Christian civilization was bound up with the defeat of Arianism, and the triumph of the Nicene doctrine of the Holy Trinity.

LIT.—(1) The sources of the early history of Arianism are: (a) on the orthodox side, the church-histories of RUFINUS, SOCRATES, SOZOMEN, and THEODORET, and most of the Fathers of the fourth century, especially the dogmatic and polemic works of ATHANASIUS (his Orationes against the Arians, etc., all in Tom. I., pars I. and II. of the Bened. ed. of ATHAN. Opera), BASIL (*Adv. ARIAS MONTANUS, Benedictus, b. at Fresconal de la Sierra, in Estremadura, in 1527; d. in Sevilla, in 1598; studied in the University of Alcalá; entered the Benedictine order; went to Antwerp, and edited the so-called Antwerp Polyglot, or "Biblia Regia," or "Biblia Plautiana," which appeared in eight volumes from 1568 to 1573. After his return to Spain he was made librarian at the Escorial, and prior of the Convent of St. Jago, but was much annoyed by the Jesuits, who accused him of heresy, and had to make several journeys to Rome in order to clear himself of their calumnies.

ARIMATHE'A (heights), a town in Judæa, the birthplace of Joseph, in whose sepulchre the body of Jesus was laid (Matt. xxvii. 57; Mark xv. 43; Luke xxiii. 51; John xix. 38). Some identify it with Ramah, the birthplace of Samuel, and this, again, with the modern Ramleh, situated in the plain of Sharon, eight miles south-east of Joppa, and twenty-four miles north-west of Jerusalem; but the latter part of this identification is now generally discredited. See RAMAH.

ARISTARCHUS, the fellow-laborer of Paul; was a native of Thessalonica, and accompanied the apostle on his last journey to Jerusalem from Troas (Acts xix. 29, xx. 4); shared his imprisonment at Cæsarea (Col. iv. 10), and accompanied him on the perilous sea-voyage to Rome (Acts xxvii. 2), but seems to have left him very soon after their arrival thither (2 Tim. iv. 11). According to tradition, he was Bishop of Thessalonica or Apamæa, and suffered martyrdom under Nero in Rome.

ARISTEAS, a high officer at the Egyptian court; was sent by Ptolemy Philadelphus with an embassy and rich gifts to Jerusalem to procure an authentic copy of the Old Testament for the Alexandrian Library, and brought back with him not only the copy, but also seventy learned Jews, who translated it into Greek. This account of the origin of the Septuagint, often mentioned, and generally accepted both by Jewish and Christian writers of the three or four next centuries, is based upon a reputed letter from Aristeas to his brother, printed at Basel, 1561, at Oxford, 1692; in Gallandius: Biblioth. Patrum, II., 771, translated into English by Lewis, London, 1715; and is discredited by scholars.

ARISTIDES, by profession a teacher of rhetoric and philosophy, but by faith a Christian, presented, about 133, an apology for the Christians to the Emperor Hadrian. The work itself is now lost, except a fragment discovered in Venice in 1878. It was of a philosophical character, highly valued in the church, and used by Justinus. See Sancti ARISTIDIS Philosophi Atheniensis Sermones duo, Venetiis, 1878; BAUNARD: Découverte d'un fragment de l'Apologie de S. Aristidie d'Athènes, traduit de l'arménien, Arras, 1879 (15 pp.); A. HARNACK: Griech Apologeten, Leipzig, 1882.

ARISTOBULUS, a Jewish priest residing in Egypt during the reign of Ptolemy VI. (Philometer), and spoken of in 2 Macc. i. 9 as a man of influence in the Jewish community, and as the "teacher" of the king. He is by some identified with the peripatetic philosopher Aristobulus, who dedicated to Ptolemy VI. (Philometer) an allegorical exposition of the Pentateuch, in which he tried to show that the doctrines of the peripatetic school were derived from the Old Testament. Of the work itself, some fragments have been preserved by Clement of Alexandria and Eusebius.

ARISTOBULUS is the name of several noticeable persons in the last period of Jewish history. — I. Aristobulus, a son of John Hyrcanus, assumed the power and also the title of king after the death of his father (107 B.C.), though by the will of the latter the government was intrusted to his mother. He had both his mother and his brothers murdered in order to secure the spoils of the usurpation, but died himself soon after (106), stricken with terror and remorse. — II. Aristobulus, a younger son of Alexander Jannæus and Alexandra, compelled his elder brother, Hyrcanus, to renounce the crown and high priesthood in his favor (70 B.C.). Hyrcanus, however, repented of the renunciation, and fled to Arabia Petræa, whose king, Aretas, invaded Judæa, and besieged Jerusalem (65 B.C.). Aristobulus succeeded in driving him out of Judæa by the aid of the Romans, but was less successful in dealing with his powerful ally. Pompey finally took Jerusalem, and carried Aristobulus a prisoner to Rome. He escaped, returned to Judæa, and begun a war against the Romans, but was defeated by Gabinius, the lieutenant of Pompey, and sent to Rome a second time as a prisoner. In 49, however, Julius Cæsar set him free, and sent him back to Judæa to work in his interest against Pompey; but he died on the journey, poisoned by Pompey's spies. — III. Aristobulus, a son of Herod the Great and Mariamne, was educated in Rome, together with his brother Alexander, in the house of Pollio, and afterwards married to his cousin, Berenice, a daughter of Salome. Having become suspicious in the eyes of their father, the two brothers led a very precarious life at home, and twice called upon the defence of foreigners, — first of Augustus, and afterwards of King Archelaus of Cappadocia, the father-in-law of Alexander, — yet finally they both fell victims to their father's cruelty. They were strangled at Sebaste 6 B.C. — IV. Aristobulus the Younger, a son of the preceding, was educated in Rome, together with Claudius, whose favorite he was. He remained all his life in private station. — V. Aristobulus, a son of Herod, King of Chalcis, and a great-grandson of Herod the Great; was made king of Armenia Minor in 55 A.D., of Armenia Major in 61, and of Chalcis in 52. He was married to Salome, a daughter of Herodias.

ARISTOTLE, b. at Stagira in Thrace 384 B.C.; d. at Chalcis 322; became the pupil of Plato in 367, and remained with him for twenty years; lived after the death of Plato, in 347, three years at the court of Hermias in Mysia, and seven years at the court of Philip of Macedon, where he became the tutor of Alexander the Great; opened his school in the Lyceum shortly after the accession of Alexander, and taught there for twelve years, but retired to Chalcis after the death of Alexander, when the anti-Macedonian party got the ascendancy in Athens.

The philosophy of Aristotle is a strongly pronounced dualism: matter and form, God and the world, are distinct though inseparable existences. The harmony of this duality is an equally pronounced Pantheism: God is an act rather than a will, a process and not a person. But the dualism of Aristotle is not materialistic: the form, God, is the principal constituent; and his Pantheism is absolutely monotheistic, directly opposed to every form of polytheism. Therefore it might be inferred that he would not fail to win at least some sympathy in the Christian Church; and so while some of the Fathers attack him vehemently, as, for instance, Irenæus, and others, such as Justinus Martyr, pass him by in silence, there are those among them, as, for instance, Clement of Alexandria, who consider him a precursor of Christ, holding the truth such as it could be held before Christ came. Then, when the dialectical elaboration of the Christian dogmas began, his great labors on logic were by no means neglected. The heretics used them in the fourth and fifth centuries, and the Catholics followed the example in the sixth and seventh.

In the Latin Church Aristotle was introduced by Boëthius and Cassiodorus. The study of him received a powerful impulse from the Jewish and Arabic doctors, who translated his works into Syriac and Arabic; and the anxiety which the Roman Church felt with respect to his metaphysical works, and which led to their condemnation, and exclusion from the universities, disappeared after the time of Albertus Magnus and Thomas Aquinas. The Renaissance, which brought the works of Aristotle to the West in the original Greek text, developed an Aristotelian and a Platonic school; but when the Renaissance grew into the Reformation, and the splendid edifice which had been built up on Plato and Aristotle — the mediæval scholasticism — tumbled down, Aristotle, lost at once and forever his influence on Christian theology. See SCHOLASTICISM.

ARIUS (Ἀρειός), one of the most famous heretics; b. about 256, in Libya (according to others, in Alexandria); d. 336, at Constantinople. He was educated by Lucian, presbyter in Antioch, and held a prominent position as presbyter in the Church of Alexandria when the Arian controversy with Bishop Alexander began (about 318) concerning the eternal deity of Christ and his equality with the Father (homoousia), which he denied, holding that Christ was of a different essence, and a creature of the Father, though created before the world. He is described as a tall, lean man, with a downcast brow, very austere habits, considerable learning, and a smooth, winning address, but quarrelsome disposition. The silence of his enemies conclusively proves that his general moral character was irreproachable (like that of Nestorius and Pelagius); and, if it had not been for his heresy, he would have been highly esteemed. His enemies said that the real cause of his opposition to Alexander was a personal grudge, because he was not himself elected bishop; but the subordination views which he had imbibed in the Antiochian school are sufficient to explain the direction of his development and the course of his life. Condemned by the synod of Alexandria (320), he left the city; but he was kindly received both by Eusebius of Cæsarea and Eusebius of Nicomedia, and it was evident that not a few of the Asiatic churches favored his ideas. A reconciliation was brought about between him and Alexander; but hardly had he returned to Alexandria before the strife broke out again, and with still greater violence. A letter from Constantine, addressed to Alexander and Arius, and carried to Alexandria by Hosius of Cordova, availed nothing: the whole Christian world rang with the contest. But, in spite of his many and powerful friends, Arius was defeated at the Council of Nicæa (325), and banished to Illyria. Soon, however, a re-action in his favor set in. The Eusebian party espoused his cause more openly, and through Constantia, the sister of the emperor, he got access to the court. He was formally recalled from banishment; and all the chiefs of the Eusebian party were assembled in Constantinople to receive him back into the bosom of the church, when he suddenly died the day before the solemnity (336), at the age of over eighty years, at a time and in a manner that seemed to the orthodox party to be a direct interposition of Providence, and a condemnation of his doctrine; while his friends attributed the death to poison. Athanasius relates the fact in a letter to Serapion, on the authority of a priest, Macarius of Constantinople (De Morte Arii, Opera, ed. Bened. tom. I., pp. I., 340), and ventures to interpret Providence in the uncharitable style of his age, yet not without some reluctance of his better Christian feeling. Epiphanius (Hær. 68, c. 7) compares his death to that of Judas the traitor. Socrates (Hist. Eccl. I., 38) gives the following account: "Going out of the imperial palace, attended by a crowd of Eusebian partisans like guards, Arius paraded proudly through the midst of the city, attracting the notice of all the people. On approaching the place called Constantine's Forum, where the column of porphyry is erected, a terror, arising from the consciousness of his wickedness, seized him, accompanied by a violent relaxation of the bowels. He therefore inquired whether there was a convenient place near, and, being directed to the back of Constantine's Forum, he hastened thither. Soon after, a faintness came over him, and, together with the evacuations, his bowels protruded, followed by a copious hemorrhage, and the descent of the smaller intestines. Moreover, portions of his spleen and liver were carried off in the effusion of blood, so that he almost immediately died." Sozomen (H. E., II., 30) gives a similar account, and adds, that, for a long period, everybody avoided with horror the spot on which Arius died, until a rich Arian bought the place of the public, and built a house on the site, that there might be no perpetual memorial of his death.

His principal work, called Θάλεια, The Banquet, which he wrote during his stay with Eusebius at Nicomedia, was a defence of his doctrine in an entertaining popular form, half poetry, half prose; but, with the exception of a few fragments in the tracts of Athanasius, it is lost. A letter of his to Eusebius of Nicomedia, and one to Alexander of Alexandria, are still extant. (See Fabricius, Biblioth. Gr., VIII., p. 309.) His doctrine on the divinity of Christ and his relation to the Father has given him a notoriety far outstripping his talents and learning. Neander (Ch. H., IV., 685) ascribes to him an acute but contracted intellect without the intuitive faculty. See ARIANISM and ATHANASIUS.

LIT. — The chief sources on the life and character of Arius are, besides the fragments of his own works, the writings of ATHANASIUS, the 68th and 69th Hereses of EPIPHANIUS, the church histories of SOCRATES, SOZOMEN, THEODORET, and PHILOSTORGIUS. See also the works quoted under ARIANISM, and Schaff's art. ARIUS in SMITH and WACE I., 162 sq.

ARK OF THE COVENANT. This was a chest, made in the Wilderness by express divine command, three feet nine inches in length, two feet three inches in width and height, made of shittim-wood, and covered with gold plates within and without, encircled near the top by a border or crown of gold, and covered by a lid of solid gold, which was called the "mercy-seat." On each end of the "mercy-seat" was placed the golden image of a cherub (see CHERUBIM), facing inward, and bending down the ark. Two gold rings were attached to the body of the ark on each side, through which passed the staves or poles, made also of shittim-wood, and overlaid with gold: these were used in carrying the ark from place to place, and were never taken out. The ark was so called because in it were the two tables of the law, of the covenant between God and Israel (Exod. xxv. 10 sq.).

The cherubim upon it indicated the place where God revealed himself, made his presence felt among the Israelites: consequently the Holy of holies, in which was the ark, was the dwelling of God. This being so, we see the propriety of covering the ark, of keeping it behind curtains, so that only the high priest saw it, and of intrusting it to the care of a particular Levitical family, the Kohathites. The high priest could only see it when surrounded by clouds of incense.

The contents of the ark were the two tables of the law, the pot of manna, and Aaron's rod that budded (Heb. ix. 4; cf. Deut. xxxi. 26; Exod. xvi. 33; Num. xvii. 8). It is probable that the two last were lost while the ark was among the Philistines; for, when Solomon brought the ark into the temple, there was nothing in it save the two tables of stone.

From the time of Joshua until that of Eli, the ark was at Shiloh in the tabernacle, except once it was brought to Bethel (Judg. xx. 26, 27; "house of God" in the authorized version should be Bethel). For seven months it was among the Philistines in Eli's time, and when returned was lodged at Kirjath-jearim (1 Sam. v. 6, vii. 1); here it remained until David's day, when, after an interruption, it was put under a new tent (2 Sam. vi.). Solomon put it in the temple (2 Chron. v. 2-10). Manasseh displaced it by a carved image; but Josiah restored it (2 Chron. xxxiii. 7, xxxv. 3). It was probably burnt up in the destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar; and in the tractate Yoma (see ATONEMENT, DAY OF) it is said that there was a stone in the Holy of holies on the spot where the ark should have stood; and on this stone the postexilic high priests set the censer. VOLCK.

ARK'ITE, The, the designation (in Gen. x. 17; 1 Cor. i. 15) of one of the families in Canaan. The town was called Arka, and to-day its ruins bear the same name. They are upon the sea-coast twelve miles north of Tripoli, at the foot of Mount Lebanon. See Robinson's Bib. Researches (1842), III. pp. 579-581. Renan, Mission de Phénice (1864), pp. 115, 124. Under the emperors it was called Cæsarea Libani, and was an important place. It contained a temple dedicated to Alexander the Great, and there Alexander Severus was born, A.D. 205. It was a famous stronghold in the days of the crusades; besieged vainly for two months, in 1099, by Raimond of Toulouse, but taken by William of Sartanges. In 1202 it was destroyed by an earthquake. See the travels of Shaw, who was there in 1722 (2d ed. 1757); Burkhardt, 1812; (Reisen, ed. Gesenius, 1823, pp. 271 sq., 520 sq.), Robinson and Smith, 1852 (Later Researches, 1857, pp. 754-759). WOLF BAUDISSIN.

ARMENIA, extending from the Black to the Caspian Sea, and from the Caucasus to the Taurus, and divided by the Euphrates into Greater Armenia to the east, and Lesser Armenia to the west, is the most elevated portion of Western Asia. Here the Old Testament locates Paradise (Gen. ii. 10); and for a second time this country became the cradle of the human race, when the ark of Noah rested on Mount Ararat (Gen. viii. 4), to which event the names of several places refer, such as Erevau, "appearance," the spot where Noah first discovered land; Akorri "he plants the vine," the place where Noah first planted the vine, situated on Mount Ararat, but utterly destroyed by an earthquake in 1840; Marand "the place of the mother," with the tomb of Noah's wife; Arrnojothn "at the feet of Noah," where Noah is buried, etc. In Scripture, the country is mentioned under various names, which, however, seem to apply to various parts of it. Thus it is probable that Ararat (Gen. viii. 4; 2 Kings xix. 37; Isa. xxxvii. 38; Jer. li. 27) indicates the eastern part, the dominion of the most ancient rulers: the natives use this name only for one of the fifteen provinces of Greater Armenia, and the celebrated mountains they call Masis. Farther to the west, immediately to the Euphrates, and south-east of Cappadocia, lay Togarmah (Gen. x. 3; 1 Chron. i. 6; Ezek. xxvii. 14, xxxviii. 6); and still farther to the west, in Northern Phrygia, Ashkenaz (Gen. x. 3; Jer. li. 27). The Greeks and Romans knew the country only under the name of Armenia, which they derived from Armenus, or Armenius, who is sometimes represented as one of the companions of Jason; but the natives themselves, though they know this name, and derive it from Aramenak or Armenak, the son of Haik, or from Aram, the sixth ruler after Haik, never use it. They call themselves Haikh, after the great-grandson of Japhet, or Torgomians, after the father of Haik; and they trace their history back to Noah, curiously blending mythical lore with biblical records. Subject to the supremacy successively of Assyria, Babylonia, Media, and Persia, the country was conquered by Alexander the Great, and after his death governed alternately by Macedonian and Seleucidian governors, until, in the middle of the second century B.C., the Parthian king, Arsaces the Great, succeeded in establishing his brother as its king. The dynasty of the Arsacidæ reigned till the beginning of the fifth century A.D., when it became extinct, and then the Byzantine emperors and the Persians fought for centuries about the possession of the country, until, in the middle of the ninth century, peace and national independence were once more restored by the Pagratid dynasty, descending from a Jewish family to which the Armenians apply the promise of the Lord to Abraham (Gen. xvii. 16). After the downfall of the Pagratid dynasty (1045), another branch of the same family, the Rubenians or Rhupenians, held sway over the country; but, after the invasion in 1375 by the Mamelukes, the nation became scattered, and the country divided: at present Russia, Turkey, and Persia hold each one part of it.

Armenian Church.—It is now impossible to decide how much truth there may be in the somewhat mythical stories of the correspondence between Christ and Abgarus, and the missionary activity and martyrdom of Thaddæus, Bartholomew, Simon of Cana, and Judas Lebbaeus; but it is certain that Christianity was introduced very early in Armenia. Unmistakable traces of it may be found in the second century; and in the fourth the country became a Christian kingdom, the first Christian state. Grigor or Gregory, the Illuminator, is the apostle of Armenia. Supported by King Tiridates, he christianized the whole country. Greek and Syrian priests were invited, churches were built, bishoprics were formed, and he himself was consecrated primate or patriarch of Armenia by Leontius, Archbishop of Cæsarea. For a long time the patriarchate remained in his family. Nerses the Great was his grandson. In 364 Nerses convened a synod at Ashtistat, which regulated marriages between relatives, limited the excessive mourning over the dead, and founded the first monasteries, the first asylums for widows, orphans, and the sick, and the first caravansaries for travellers; and in 366 another synod, at Walarshapat, defined the power of the patriarch, or catholicos,—as he now was called,—and decreed, that, in the future, he should be elected and consecrated by the Armenian bishops themselves, and not by the Archbishop of Cæsarea. Under Sahak, the son and successor of Nerses, the Bible was translated, the breviary, the ritual, and the liturgy were composed, and the calendar was arranged. The final arrangement, however, of the Armenian calendar such as it is still in use did not take place until 551, at a synod convened in Dwin by the catholicos Moses II.: a new era was then established, beginning on July 11, 552, so that our year of 1881 corresponds to the Armenian year of 1329. At the close of the sixth century a violent controversy arose, which occasioned a breach between the Greek and the Armenian Church, and much party-division within the Armenian Church itself. The Council of Chalcedon (451) having taken place during the frightful persecutions of the Christians by Yezdegerd II., its decrees had never become fully known in Armenia; and in 491, at a synod in Walarshapat, the Armenian bishops signed the Henotikon of the Emperor Zeno, which implied a condemnation of the Council of Chalcedon. A century afterwards Kyrion, catholicos of Georgia, and a man well versed in the Greek, Armenian, and Persian languages and literatures, accepted the Council of Chalcedon; but when Abraham, the catholicos of Armenia, who had consecrated him, heard this, he remonstrated with him, demanded that he should retract, and finally put him under the ban. Kyrion complained to the Emperor Mauritius; and in 597 a council was convened in Constantinople, but no agreement was arrived at. One part of the Armenian Church continued to reject the Council of Chalcedon, and separated completely from the Greek Church; and of the other part, which accepted the Council of Chalcedon, only one fraction could be incorporated with the Greek Church, while the rest split into many minor divisions. Great exertions were afterwards made, both from the Greek and Armenian side, to bring about a reconciliation. In 1166 the emperor, Manuel Comnenus, and Michael, the patriarch of Constantinople, sent the Greek theologian, Theorianus, to Armenia; and a long disputation took place, not altogether without results. In 1179 a synod of Hromkla, at which three hundred and thirty-three Armenian bishops and a great number of priests and monks were present, declared itself prepared to adopt the Greek views on several important points of doctrine. But at the same time an intercommunication had sprung up between the Armenian Church and the Roman see, and the jealousy and intrigues of the Greeks and Romans soon frustrated every attempt at reconciliation. Grigor Pahlavuni was the first Armenian catholicos who entered into closer relations with the papal see. He was present, on the invitation of Pope Innocent II., at the synod of Antiochia (1141), and accompanied afterwards the papal legate to Jerusalem. The pope sent him the staff and the veil, the symbols of the patriarchal dignity; and an opportunity to give all these compliments a practical bearing soon offered itself. Leon II., the Armenian ruler of Cilicia, wished to obtain the royal crown from the Latins, and addressed himself to Pope Coelestine III. and Emperor Henry VI. concerning the matter. Both the pope and the emperor were willing to grant him the favor on the conditions that he would celebrate the religious festivals on the same days as the Roman Church, and hear the mass in the church, and together with the congregation. But, the closer the relation became between the Armenian and the Roman churches, the more exasperated the Greeks felt. They broke off all official connection with the Armenians, though they continued to cause much confusion by their intrigues. The attempt of Johannes of Kherrni, in 1330, to reorganize the whole Armenian Church after the Roman model, at one sweep, proved, of course, a miserable failure; but the measures which the popes adopted for the same purpose proved more successful, because they were more cautious. Pius IV. gave the Armenians a church in Rome, in 1562, and established an Armenian printing-press from which the Psalms were issued in 1567, and, later on, also other works. Gregory XIV. even thought of founding a school in Rome for the education of young Armenians, but he died before he could realize the plan. Such an institution, however, was successfully established in 1717, when the Mekhitarists (which see) settled in the Island of S. Lazzaro at Venice. There are between seventy-five and one hundred thousand Armenians now belonging to the Roman Church.

A reformatory movement in an evangelical direction has also been started. The Armenian Bible was published in 1813 by the British and Foreign Bible Society, and in 1817 by the Russian Bible Society; and in 1831 the American Board of Foreign Missions established a Protestant mission among the Armenians, which has worked with considerable success, not only in Turkey and Asia Minor, but also in Armenia Proper. Armenian Literature.—Thé Armenian literature is wholly Christian, and pre-eminently theological. Only by Moses Chorenensis some extracts from Pagan Armenian writers and some old popular songs have been preserved; and history is the only field, beside theology, in which Armenian literature has produced any thing great. Its golden era falls in the fifth century, and is inaugurated by the labors of Mesrob and Sahak. Up to that time the Armenian language was written with Greek or Syrian or Persian characters; but this means of reducing Armenian speech to writing proved utterly insufficient, and a great impediment to literary progress. Mesrob has the honor of having invented, or at least completed and introduced, the Armenian alphabet now used. It was first applied to the translation of the Bible. Sahak translated the Old Testament; Mesrob, the New; but as all Greek books had been destroyed, and were forbidden by the Persians, the translation was made from the Syrian version, and not from the original text. Twice, however, men were sent to Edessa, Alexandria, Athens, and Constantinople, to study the Greek language, and examine authentic copies of the Holy Scriptures; and the result of these great exertions was a truly admirable translation. The first printed edition of the Armenian Bible, given by Bishop Oscon, Amsterdam, 1666, is from a codex interpolated from the Vulgate. A critical edition was not given until 1805, by the Mekhitarists. In spite of the unfavorable state of political and social affairs in Armenia during this epoch, more than six hundred Greek and Syrian works were translated within the first forty years after the translation of the Bible; and as in many cases the original works have perished, while the translations have been preserved, the great importance of this whole literary activity is apparent. Among works which in this way have come down to us are several books by Philo Alexandrinus, on Providence, on Reason, commentaries, etc.; the Chronicle of Eusebius, nearly complete; the Epistles of Ignatius, translated from a Syrian version; fifteen Homilies by Severianus; the exegetical writings of Ephraim Syrus, previously completely unknown, on the historical books of the Old Testament, the synoptical Gospels, the parables of Jesus, and the fourteen Pauline epistles; the Hexahemeron of Basil the Great; the Catechesis of Cyril of Jerusalem; several homilies by Chrysostom, etc.

The period, however, was not characterized by translations only. Several of the disciples of Mesrob and Sahak left original works. Esnik wrote four books against heretics, printed at Venice in 1826, and translated into French by Le Vaillant de Florival, Paris, 1853. A biography of Mesrob by Koriun, homilies by Mambres, and various writings by the philosopher David, have been published; and the works of Moses Chorenensis, published in Venice in 1842, and again in 1864, have acquired a wide celebrity: his history of Armenia has been translated into Latin, French, Italian, and Russian. Another flourishing period falls in the twelfth century during the reign of the dynasty of the Rubenians. Nerses Klajensis and Nerses Lambronensis belong to this period; also Ignatius, whose commentary to the Gospel of St. Luke appeared in Constantinople, 1735 and 1824; Sargis Shnorhali, whose commentary to the catholic epistles was published in Constantinople in 1743, and again in 1826; Matthew of Edessa, whose history, comprising the period from 952 to 1132, and continued by Gregory the Priest to 1163, contains many interesting notices concerning the crusades; Samuel Aniensis, the chronologist, Michael Syrus, whose history has been edited with a French translation by V. Langlois, Paris, 1864, Mekhitar Kosh, of whom a hundred and ninety fables appeared at Venice, 1780 and 1812. A most powerful impulse the Armenian literature received in the eighteenth century by the foundation of the Mekhitarist monastery in Venice, from whose press the treasures of the Armenian literature were spread over Europe, and new works, explaining and completing the old, were added. The Armenian liturgy was published in 1826, the breviary in 1845, the ritual in 1831.

Armenians, Protestant. It was not the intention of the American missionaries to found a separate Protestant church. The report made by Messrs. Smith and Dwight of the character of the church and the people was so favorable, that it was believed that missionaries would be favorably received by them, and that the church might be reformed and spiritualized without any disruption. This hope was cherished for many years by the missionaries; but, as their influence increased among the people, the hierarchy of the church took alarm, and commenced persecuting those who adopted evangelical views. As the constitution of the Turkish Empire gave to the patriarch the right to fine and imprison his people, and as his ex-communication made them outlaws without civil rights, he was able to persecute them even to the death. This persecution became at last so violent and widely extended, that the missionaries reluctantly took measures to form a separate Protestant church. This could only be done by decree of the Sultan; but this was at last obtained through the influence of Lord Stratford, the English ambassador. This charter of the Protestant community recognizes no particular form of Protestantism, and stipulates that the Vakil, or official representative, must be a layman; but, as the missionaries were mostly from non-episcopal churches, most of the Protestants of Turkey have adopted similar views.

The spirit of the Armenian Church is now very different from what it was when this disruption took place. There is a general recognition of the fact that the church needs reform, and a new development of spiritual life. The Bible, which was translated by the American missionaries into the modern language, has been generally circulated and read. Great progress has been made in education, and great changes have taken place in the hierarchy of the church. Friendly relations exist between the Protestants and the old church, and it would not be strange if the separate organization were finally given up as the whole church becomes evangelical.

The whole number of Armenians is about three millions, of whom two-thirds are in Turkey; but the Catholicos, or head of the church, resides in Russia.

The American missionaries commenced their work in Turkey among the Armenians in 1831. The Protestant community was constituted in 1850. It has now some seventy-five churches, five thousand communicants, and twenty-five thousand adherents. There are three theological schools, two colleges,—in addition to Robert College of Constantinople,—which is not connected with the mission, but is a fruit of it,—fifteen boarding-schools for girls, and primary schools in all the Protestant communities.—See Rev. Dr. ANDERSON'S Hist. of Miss. of the A. B. C. F. M. to the Oriental Churches, Boston, 1872, 2 vols. G. WASHBURN (of Constantinople).

ARMINIANISM, Historical. It should not be considered an isolated and merely incidental phenomenon in the history of the Reformed Church. That revival of the Augustinian doctrines of predestination and grace which characterizes the Reformation in general developed within the pale of the Reformed Church into a somewhat one-sided and particularistic view of an unconditional election by which the universality of the divine grace seemed to become lost; and it is as a re-action against this view that Arminianism arose naturally and necessarily. In the University of Leyden a contest gradually grew up, not so much between the dogmatics of Zwingli and that of Calvin, as between a biblico-psychological tendency and a stiff dogmatism; the former represented by the mild but somewhat vague catechism of Heidelberg, the latter by the acute but somewhat rigid Confessio Belgica. In this contest Jacobus Arminius is the great champion, if not the originator, of the view of a conditional election, the opposition against the reigning tradition, the re-action.

ARMINIUS (Harmensen) JACOBUS, b. in 1560 at Oudewater an der Yssel (whence Veterequinas), d. at Leyden, Oct. 19, 1609; studied (1575-82) at the University of Leyden under Lambert Danäus, who made him an ardent disciple of Petrus Ramus, the declared enemy of the Aristotelian philosophy, and afterwards (1582-87) at the University of Geneva, under Theodore Beza, at that time considered the best expounder of the dogmatics of Calvin. He also visited Padua and Rome, and was in 1588 appointed preacher in Amsterdam. In this city the writings of Dirik Volkaerts zoon Koornheert had caused considerable commotion. Though a layman only, he had openly attacked the Reformed Church, more especially Calvin's doctrines of predestination. A disputation was arranged, and Koornheert, not convinced, refused to retract, and was declared a heretic. The board of supervisors now invited Arminius to refute Koornheert's writings, and as at the same time a controversy had broken out between the Supralapsarians and Infralapsarians, Lydius of Franeker also was anxious that he should come to the support of the pure faith,—the views of Beza. But, while pondering the question, Arminius felt himself more and more strongly drawn in the opposite direction, and the public noticed the change. A sermon he delivered on Rom. vii. 14 occasioned an accusation for Pelagianism. This time he stilled the alarm by declaring that he would teach nothing which was against the catechism of Heidelberg and the confession of the Church of the Netherlands. But another sermon on Rom. ix. caused new troubles. New investigations were instituted, new disputations took place; but the only result was, that Arminius felt more and more convinced that the Calvinistic dogmatics were mistaken with respect to predestination and grace. In spite, however, of his suspected orthodoxy, he was called to a chair in the University of Leyden after the death of Junius, in 1603; and a preliminary parley with his future colleague, Gomarus, led to a satisfactory result. But in 1604 he fell out with Gomarus on the question of predestination, and the controversy soon grew very hot. In order to bring about a reconciliation, a general synod was spoken of in 1606, and a formal disputation was held in 1608. But no result was arrived at, and in the mean time Arminius died. He was a learned and able divine, of a meek, Christian spirit. "Condemned by others," Grotius said, "he condemned none."

After his death, however, his ideas continued to spread; and, while spreading in the masses, they began to undergo an internal development. Originally Arminianism simply meant the assertion of universal grace and conditional election; but gradually it came to denote a much more comprehensive tendency of liberality, both in religion and morals. Thus the Gomarists considered the symbolical books as the absolute norm for the explanation of Scripture; while the Arminians vindicated a complete exegetical freedom, and would be bound by the symbolical books, only so far as they agreed with Scripture. The movement rapidly took hold of the people; and in 1610 the Arminians presented a Remonstrantia (whence the name "Remonstrants"), consisting of five articles, to the estates of Holland and West Friesland. The first of these articles reads: "By an eternal and inscrutable decree, before the foundation of the world, God ordained to save in Christ, because of Christ, and through Christ, from out of the human race, which is fallen and subject to sin, those who by the grace of the Holy Spirit believe in His Son, and who, by the same grace, persevere unto the end in that faith and the obedience of that faith," etc. The second article says that Jesus Christ, the Saviour of the world, died for all and each one, etc.;

the third, that man of himself and by the power of his free will cannot do or think any thing good, etc.; the fourth, that the grace of God, though not irresistible, is the beginning, the progress, and the perfection, of every thing a good man does or thinks, etc.; and the fifth, that those who are grafted into Christ, and partake of his vivifying spirit, have the means by which to fight against Satan, sin, the world, and their own flesh, and to obtain victory by the aid of the grace of the Holy Spirit, etc.

Against this Remonstrantia the Gomarists presented a Contra-Remonstrantia; but it was drawn up in much less moderate expressions, and the negotiations which were attempted only made the controversy more bitter. In 1614 the Estates of Holland forbade all discussion, and commanded peace and patience; but the Gomarists set themselves against the civil authorities, and the political parties became involved. Oldenbarneveldt (John of Barneveldt, 1547-1619), at the head of the Republicans, favored the Remonstrants; and Maurice of Orange, at the head of the Monarchists, favored the Contra-Remonstrants.

In order to stop these disturbances, which became more and more violent, the famous synod of Dort was convened (Nov. 13, 1618-May 9, 1619). Bogermann, an ardent adversary of the Remonstrants, presided; and the assembly at once constituted itself accuser and judge. The five articles were condemned: the Catechism of Heidelberg and the Confessio Belgica were sanctioned. About two hundred Remonstrant ministers were deposed, and such among them as would not consent to keep silent were banished. (The execution of Oldenbarneveldt, however, and the imprisonment of Grotius, had principally political reasons.) Most of the deposed ministers gathered in Amsterdam; and from there they sent forth a defence, very adroitly drawn up, in which they refuted the charge of conspiracy against the prince-stadtholder. This defence, and also the very acts of the synod, published in 1620, made a favorable impression on the government; and when, in 1625, Prince Henry succeeded his brother Maurice as stadtholder, the Remonstrants obtained, first, toleration, and then (in 1630) liberty to live in any town or place in Holland, and to build churches and schools. In 1621 and 1622 Simon Episcopius, the ablest dogmatical writer among the Remonstrants, published in Dutch and Latin a Confessio in twenty-five chapters, which gave a clear and succinct statement of their faith; and the Censura of this Confessio issued by four professors of Leyden, was ably met with the Apologia of the same author. Singularly enough, however, as soon as the persecutions ceased, and the party could settle down in peace and quietness, its number began to decrease.

For their organization the Arminians are indebted to Uytenbogaert. The constitution is very simple. A synod composed of all the preachers, — at present twenty-one, — the professors of the seminary, and delegates from the congregations, exercises the highest authority. It assembles every year, alternately in Amsterdam and Rotterdam. The current business is managed by a committee of five members. Generally speaking, however, the Arminians form a theological party, rather than a religious sect. They call themselves members of the Reformed Church. Their seminary in Amsterdam has had many eminent theologians among its professors — Episcopius, Curcellæus, Limborch, Le Clerc, not to speak of the philosopher Grotius; but the congregational bond is somewhat loose. From the Arminians properly speaking, the Quinquarticulares must be distinguished, a branch of anti-trinitarian Remonstrants. Heterodox parties, such as the Socinians, have often found it easy to amalgamate with the Arminians, and their inclination towards Semi-Pelagianism has now and then given them a direction towards Romanism.

LIT. — The writings of Arminius were collected and published at Leyden, 1629. English translation in 3 vols. The preferable edition is London 1825, 1828, and 1875 (vols. 1 and 2 by James Nichols, vol. 3 by William Nichols), American edition, Auburn and Buffalo, 1853, 3 vols. (vol. 1 translated by W. R. Bagnall). His life was written by Caspar Brandt: Historia Vitæ I. Arminii, Amsterdam, 1724, and by Bangs: Life of Arminius, New York, 1843.

The history of Arminianism has been written by Uytenbogaert: Kerckleijche Historiæ, Amsterdam, 1647; by Gerhard Brandt: Historiæ Reformationis Belgicæ, Amsterdam, 1671-1704, trans. Chamberlayne, London 1720, vols. 4; Limborch: Relatio Historica, etc., appended to his Theologia Christiana, 1714.

ARMINIANISM, the (Five) Articles of. The five articles constituted the positive part of the Remonstrance drawn up by Uytenbogaert, signed by forty-six ministers, which was presented to the States-General of Holland and West Friesland in 1610 by the party of Arminius (1560-1609). The Calvinists issued a Counter-Remonstrance: hence the party names, Remonstrants, Counter-Remonstrants. On account of the number of Articles discussed, the controversy arising has been called the quinquarticular. The Remonstrance is first negative, stating the five Calvinistic Propositions in order to reject them, and then positive, stating the five Arminian Articles, as follows: —

ARTICLE I. — That God, by an eternal, unchangeable purpose in Jesus Christ, his Son, before the foundation of the world, hath determined, out of the fallen, sinful race of men, to save in Christ, for Christ's sake, and through Christ, those who, through the grace of the Holy Ghost, shall believe on this Son Jesus, and shall persevere in this faith and obedience of faith, through this grace, even to the end, on the other hand, to leave the incorrigible unbelieving in sin and under wrath, and to condemn them as alienate from Christ, according to the voice of the gospel in John iii. 36: "He that believeth the Son hath everlasting life; and he that believeth not the Son shall not see life; but the wrath of God abideth on him," and according to other passages of Scripture also.

ART. II. — That, agreeably thereto, Jesus Christ, the Saviour of the world, died for all men and every man, so that he has obtained for them all, by his death on the cross, redemption, and the forgiveness of sins; yet that no one actually enjoys this givenness of sins, except the believer, according to the word of the Gospel of John iii. 16: "God so loved the world that he gave his only-begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life;" and in the First Epistle of John ii. 2: "And he is the propitiation for our sins; and not for ours only, but also for the sins of the whole world."

ART. III. — That man has not saving grace of himself, nor of the energy of his free-will, inasmuch as he, in the state of apostasy and sin, can of and by himself neither think, will, nor do any thing that is truly good (such as saving faith eminently is); but that it is needful that he be born again of God in Christ, through his Holy Spirit, and renewed in understanding, inclination, or will, and all his powers, in order that he may rightly understand, think, will, and effect what is truly good, according to the word of Christ, John xv. 5: "Without me ye can do nothing."

ART. IV. — That this grace of God is the beginning, continuance, and accomplishment of all good, even to this extent, that the regenerate man himself, without prevention or assisting awakening, following, and co-operative grace, can neither think, will, nor do good, nor withstand any temptations to evil; so that all good deeds or movements that can be conceived must be ascribed to the grace of God in Christ. But, as respects the mode of the operation of this grace, it is not irresistible, inasmuch as it is written concerning many that they have resisted the Holy Ghost, — Acts vii., and elsewhere in many places.

ART. V. — That those who are incorporated into Christ by a true faith, and have thereby become partakers of his life-giving spirit, have thereby full power to strive against Satan, sin, the world, and their own flesh, and to win the victory, it being well understood that it is ever through the assisting grace of the Holy Ghost; and that Jesus Christ assists them through his spirit in all temptations, extends to them his hand; and if only they are ready for the conflict, and desire his help, and are not inactive, keeps them from falling, so that they, by no craft or power of Satan, can be misled, nor plucked out of Christ's hands, according to the word of Christ, John x. 28: "Neither shall any man pluck them out of my hand." But whether they are capable, through negligence, of forsaking again the first beginnings of their life in Christ, of again returning to this present evil world, of turning away from the holy doctrine which was delivered them, of losing a good conscience, of becoming devoid of grace, that must be more particularly determined out of the Holy Scriptures before we ourselves can teach it with the full persuasion of our minds.

These Articles, thus set forth and taught, the Remonstrants deem agreeable to the word of God, tending to edification, and, as regards this argument, sufficient for salvation, so that it is not necessary or edifying to rise higher, or to descend deeper. See SCHAFF: Creeeds of Christendom, vol. iii. pp. 545-49; cf. Vol. i. § 65, p. 508 sq.

ARMINIANISM (Wesleyan). — Doctrinal Methodism claims to adhere to original Arminianism as set forth by Arminius himself, and developed by Episcopius, Limborch, and others, without the freethinking tendency taken on by the intermediate English Arminianism, symptoms of which had appeared in some of the early Remonstrants, such as Grotius and Curcellæus. John Wesley, the founder of Methodism, was of Arminian stock; his father Samuel, in common with many of the Anglican divines, inclining strongly against Calvinism (see Tyerman's Life of Samuel Wesley, p. 144); and "the Holy Club" at Oxford contained both these elements, the Wesleys ultimately separating, on this ground alone, from Whitefield, who became the father of the Welsh or Calvinistic branch of Methodism. The Wesleys throughout the British Empire, and the Methodists in America, are universally Arminians; and whatever may be their differences in church organization, social sentiments, or practical views of evangelical economy, or even their individual opinions on minor points of theological dogma, they heartily concur in opposition to the essential Calvinian doctrine of God's absolute predestination concerning men's everlasting destiny. This they all regard as incompatible with divine equity and human freedom. It will suffice here to show briefly the relations of this cardinal theme to the great redemptive scheme as conceived by all the followers of Wesley, both in this country and abroad. This will be their best discrimination and vindication from Pelagianism on the one side, and Augustinianism on the other. On all the essential points of vital Christianity, such as the Trinity, human depravity, the atonement, the necessity of regeneration and personal holiness, of course they do not differ from other evangelical denominations.

1. Wesleyanism, or Methodist Arminianism, while maintaining God's supremacy as strenuously as Calvin himself, makes a radical distinction between the desires and the purposes of God, precisely as it does between the wishes and the determinations of man. The divine foreknowledge is regarded as logically preceding the divine volitions, and not as an inference resulting from them. Hence, when God resolves, it is in view of all the contingencies and circumstances of the case, and his prescience is simply intuitional. What he knows, — whether as to the past, the present, or the future, — although absolutely certain, is not necessitated by that cognition. He not only knows that it has taken, or is taking, or will take, place, but also that it might have been or could be otherwise. This is considered a fundamental difference between the Arminian and the Calvinian conception of God.

2. As a corollary from the foregoing distinction, Wesleyans hold, that while God absolutely — or if any prefer to say arbitrarily — determines natural (i. e., physical) events, he has not done so with occurrences belonging to the moral sphere, but has left these contingent upon the volitions of his rational creatures within certain limits. This forms, in their view, the basis of human probation and free-will.

3. Especially they believe, that while man is born with corrupt moral affections, and therefore is of himself unable either to love or to serve God acceptably, yet by virtue of the universal atonement of Christ, and the general distribution of the Holy Spirit, such gracious aid is supernaturally afforded to every man as is sufficient to enable him to overcome the bias of his depraved affections, and the weakness or perverseness of his will; so that, if he chooses, he may, through the appointed means, lay hold upon the salvation of the gospel. Just at this pivotal point occurs the practical or anthropological, in distinction from the theoretical or theological, difference between Wesleyan Arminianism and Calvinism, whether of the old or the new school. In a last analysis the precise element or force which turns the scale in favor of a new life, or otherwise, is believed by Wesleyans to be the will of the subject himself, acting freely under its own impulses, in view of, but not constrained by, motives, and yet stimulated and guided by divine light and grace. Without an original and continued influence from God, the will would never move in the right direction; yet this influence is never coercive, however powerful or effectual it may be. God's Spirit is therefore held to be the efficient agent which renews the moral nature of the subject upon the decisive act of acquiescence, as soon as it is accompanied by a positive element of acceptance, which latter is saving faith. The man does not save himself, but only consents to be saved of God, and rests upon Christ for that purpose. The penitence and faith involved in this are indeed potentially the gift of God; but their actual use and exercise are the conscious, voluntary, and personal act of the man himself. Wesleyans conceive this to be the accurate and consistent account of conversion or regeneration, involving, in due balance and just responsibility, the human and the divine co-operation. They think it relieves them from the overwhelming divine influence which Augustinianism seems to them to introduce, and at the same time from the charge of humanitarianism justly brought against Pelagianism, New Divinity, etc. With any modern or moderate Calvinists who may accept this statement or explanation of the phenomena, they have, of course, no controversy on this central point of experimental Christianity.

4. Wesleyan Methodists, as we have shown, believe that conversion is the result of conscious faith, and that it involves a conscious change in the feelings. They therefore universally maintain that it is the privilege of every child of God to know his gracious state. Further, they believe that sound experience, no less than Scripture, warrants the expectation of a special divine inward testimony to the fact of the changed relation towards God; and this they call "the witness of the Spirit" to the adoption. This is held to be a distinct but concomitant assurance in addition to the consciousness spoken of above, and also different from a rational conclusion derived by the person himself from his own altered demeanor.

5. Methodist Arminians, without exception, argue, from the foregoing doctrine of free grace, that it is likewise full, i. e., able to remove entirely the innate depravity of the human heart during the present life. This, of course, they qualify by the obvious liabilities to relapse, and by the imperfections inseparable from the present state of probation; and they differ, to some extent, among themselves, as to whether the act or process of entire purification is instantaneous or progressive, and whether it takes place immediately upon conversion, or subsequently; but they all unite in insisting upon the entire sanctification of believers as necessary prior to death, and possible indefinitely before that event. This sanctification they hold to be the joint product of divine grace and the subject's watchfulness, faith, and obedience.

6. Finally, holding the above views of the fearful power of the human will to accept or reject salvation, Wesleyans, without exception, believe that it equally extends to the retention or loss of the divine pardon, peace, and purity, at any period during probation. They therefore reject the doctrine of the impossibility of lapsing utterly and finally from grace, and believe that any may, and that many actually do, lose their state of acceptance, and their love of holy things, and ultimately perish. They do not maintain that any one is competent to keep himself in a condition of holiness, any more than to attain it unaided at first, but that the same gracious assistance is vouchsafed to the child of God throughout his earthly career, on precisely the same terms of acceptance and co-operation.

LIT. — This is very copious: we name only the most important works. The earliest, and still the best and most generally recognized authority of Wesleyan or Methodist Arminianism is FLETCHER: Checks to Antinomianism (originally published Lond., 1771 sq., as separate pamphlets in answer to Toplady, and often reprinted collectively in England and America), a remarkable specimen of clear, calm, and cogent controversy. WESLEY: Sermons (contained in his Works, often printed) is next in importance as a standard; but these are necessarily discursive and diffuse. The whole subject is typically treated, in connection with general theology, in the three great text-books of Methodist divinity hitherto published, namely, RICHARD WATSON: Institutes (Lond. 1822-28, often reprinted in one or two vols. in England and America); WILLIAM B. POPE: Christian Theology (Lond., 1875-77, revised ed. Lond. and N.Y., 1879 sq., 3 vols.); and MINN RAYMOND: Systematic Theology (Cincinnati, 1877, 3 vols.). JAMES STRONG.

ARMY. The Hebrew army consisted originally of infantry only (Num. xi. 21; 1 Sam. iv. 1 xv. 4), though it had to fight against people using cavalry (Josh. xi. 9; Judg. iv. 3, 1 1 Sam. x. 18) and chariots of iron (Josh. xv. 16; Judg. i. 19, iv. 3, v. 22; 1 Sam. xiii. 5). This and other circumstances determined Solomon to organize a division of cavalry, which distributed throughout the towns of the country (1 Kings ix. 19, x. 26), and which his successors often re-enforced with Egyptian mercenaries (1 xxxi. 1, xxxvi. 9; 2 Kings xviii. 24). Every citizen was bound to serve from his twentieth to his fiftieth year (Num. i. 3, xxvi. 2; 2 Chron. xxv. 5); but under certain circumstances exemptions were admitted. When a war broke out each tribe furnished a proportional number of armed men (Num. xxxi. 4; Josh. vii. 3; Judg. xx. 10). When an enemy suddenly invaded the country, the nation rose en masse, called out by the sound of the trumpet, or informed, either by signals erected on the mountains, or by messengers sent through the land (Judg. iii. 27, 24; Jer. iv. 5; Ezek. vii. 14; Judg. vi. 3). The host was divided into bodies of a thousand, a hundred, and fifty, each of which had a captain of its own (Num. xxxi. 14; Judg. xx. 1 Sam. viii. 12; 2 Kings i. 9, xi. 4; 2 Chron. x. 5). The general-in-chief and the captains of divisions formed the council of war (1 Chron. xiii. 1). The soldiers wore no uniform, and were to maintain themselves, though a commissary is mentioned already in Judg. xx. 10. The arms were those commonly used by Eastern nations in antiquity, — the shield of wood, covered with leather, fastened to the shoulder-strap during the march (2 Sam. i. 21; Isa. xxi. 5), and the helmet under some kind of covering (Isa. xxii. 6); helmet of brass (1 Sam. xvii. 5; 1 Macc. vi. 36); the coat of mail, protecting the chest and the stomach (1 Sam. xvii. 5; 2 Chron. xxvi. 14); the sword, with double edges, borne in a scabbard on the left side (1 Sam. xvii. 39; 2 Sam. xx. 8; Ezek. xxi. 3; 1 Chron. xxi. 27; Judg. iii. 16; Prov. v. 4); the spear of wood, tipped with a point of brass (2 Sam. xxi. 16; Josh. viii. 18, 26); the bow, of wood or brass, carried in a cover of leather (Gen. xxi. 20; 1 Sam. xxxi. 3; 2 Sam. xxii. 35; Ps. xviii. 34; Hab. iii. 9, etc.). The numerical force of the Hebrew army often reached very high figures, which, however, need cause no wonder, as the question is of a rising of the whole nation en masse.

During the reign of Saul the first traces occur of a standing army, — a force of three thousand men, levied from all the tribes, and completed by volunteers (1 Sam. xiii. 2, xiv. 52, xxiv. 2). David followed the example, and organized a national army, which was able to place a division of twenty-four thousand men fit for active service in the field every month (1 Chron. xvii. 1 sqq.). Under his successors the institution became a necessity, as the Hebrews every now and then found themselves implicated in the wars of their powerful neighbors (1 Kings iv. 26; 2 Chron. xvii. 14; 2 Kings xi. 4; 2 Chron. xxv. 5, xxvi. 11; 2 Kings i. 9). After the exile, under the Maccabees the army was completely re-organized, and bodies of foreign troops were enlisted. Under Herod the Great, nearly the whole army consisted of mercenaries; and its organization, armament, and tactics were those of the Roman legions. Of the method of carrying on war originally employed by the Hebrews, there exist only some aphoristic notices. Before entering upon a campaign, the divine will was consulted (Judg. xx. 27; 1 Sam. xiv. 37, xxiii. 2; 1 Kings xxii. 6; 2 Chron. xviii. 4). When the army arrived in the presence of the enemy, a sacrifice was ordered (1 Sam. vii. 9, xiii. 9); a priest, or the general-in-chief, harangued the soldiers (Deut. xx. 2; 2 Chron. xx. 20); the trumpet gave the signal for attack (Num. x. 9; 2 Chron. xiii. 12), and the attack was made with yelling and noise (1 Sam. xvii. 52; Isa. xlii. 13; Amos i. 14; Jer. l. 42; Ezek. xxi. 22). The combat took place man to man; but complex movements, surprises, circumventions, etc., were effected (Judg. vii. 16; Josh. viii. 2-12; 1 Sam. xv. 5; 2 Sam. v. 23). Prisoners were treated with great harshness. The dead were pillaged (1 Sam. xxxi. 8; 2 Macc. viii. 27); the living were killed (Judg. ix. 45; 2 Sam. xii. 31; 2 Chron. xxv. 12), or mutilated (Judg. i. 6; 1 Sam. xi. 2), or reduced to slavery. Women and children were not spared (2 Kings xv. 16, viii. 12; Isa. xiii. 16; Amos i. 13; Hos. x. 14, xiii. 16; Nahum iii. 10; 2 Macc. v. 13). The conquered cities were often burnt or destroyed (Judg. ix. 45; 1 Macc. v. 28, x. 84). The Pagan sanctuaries were always destroyed (1 Macc. v. 68). Victory was celebrated with cries of joy, and triumphal songs and dances (Judg. v.; 1 Sam. xviii. 6; 2 Sam. xxii.; Judg. xvi. 2; 1 Macc. iv. 24). Conquered arms were deposited in the temple (2 Kings xi. 10; 1 Chron. x. 10).

ARNAUD, Henri, b. in 1641, at La Torre in Piedmont; d. in 1721, at Schönberg, in Würtemberg; placed himself at the head of those Vaudois, who, because they had embraced the reformed faith, were expelled from their homes by Victor Amadæus of Savoy, and led them back to their native valleys, defeating a French-Savoyan army which was sent against them. Political circumstances: the influence of William of Orange, and a breach with France, compelled Victor Amadæus to give his assent to their return; but, when a change in politics brought about a new alliance with France, he again drove them away from the country, and Arnaud accompanied them in their exile as their spiritual leader, and remained with them in Schönberg as their pastor, in spite of the brilliant offers he received from England. His Histoire de la glorieuse Rentrée des Vaudois dans leurs Vallées was published in 1710, and translated into English by H. D. Ackland, London, 1827. K. H. KLAIBER: Henri Arnaud. Nach den Quellen, Stuttgart, 1880.

ARNAULD, Angélique (Mère Angélique de St. Jean), b. Nov. 24, 1624; d. Jan. 29, 1684; was educated at Port-Royal by her aunt, Marie Angélique de Ste. Magdeleine; took the veil in 1644; became subprioress in 1653, and abbess in 1678; and was the leader and principal support of the nuns of Port-Royal during the controversy between the Jansenists and the Jesuits, from the time when, in 1661, they refused to sign the Formulary of Alexander VII., and were scattered by the police, till 1669, when the Peace-edict of Clement IX. again freed them from police surveillance. Among other works she wrote Mémoires pour servir à l'histoire de Port-Royal, published in three volumes by Barbeau de la Bruyère, Utrecht, 1742. See JANSENISM. FRANCES MARTIN: Angélique Arnauld, Abbess of Port-Royal, London, 1873.

ARNAULD, Antoine, b. in Paris, Feb. 8, 1612; d. in Brussels, Aug. 8, 1694; was educated at Calvi and Lisieux, and began to study law, his father being a famous member of that profession, but afterwards changed jurisprudence for theology; studied under Lescot, the confessor of Richelieu; entered the Sorbonne in 1634; and took his degree as doctor, and was ordained priest in 1641. In 1643 he published his De la Fréquente Communion, and with this book began his life-long contest with the Jesuits. It was sanctioned by many bishops and doctors of the Sorbonne; and the whole result of the intrigues and machinations of the Jesuits was the censure by the pope of one sentence in the preface. But in 1644 Arnaud entered into the controversy concerning the Augustinus of Jansen by his first and second Apologie de Jansenius. In 1655 he published his two letters, of which the second contains the famous distinction between a decision de jure and de facto; and in 1656 he was expelled from the Sorbonne, and deprived of his doctorate. The Peace-edict of Clemens IX. (1668) made his social position safe once more; and from 1669 to 1674 he published his Grande Perpétuité de la Foi de l'Eglise as a defence of Jansenism against the accusation that it led to Calvinism. But in 1669 he also published the first volume of his Morale Pratique des Jésuites, of which the eighth and last volume was published in 1694; and this work again brought the hatred of the Jesuits into full flame. In 1679 he was compelled to leave France, and settled in 1682 in Brussels, steadily pursued by the Jesuits. Here he wrote Des Vraies et des Fausses Idées (1683) and Reflexions Philosophiques et Théologiques (1685) against Malebranche. When he died, he was buried in secret, and only his heart was sent to Port-Royal to be interred. His collected works were published in forty-five volumes, in Paris and Lausanne, 1775-83. See JANSENISM.

ARNAULD, Henri, b. in Paris in 1597; d. at Angers, June 8, 1694; a brother of Antoine; was first an advocate, but embraced the ecclesiastical profession, and became successively Abbot of St. Nicholas, Bishop of Toul, and Bishop of Angers. He was a staunch Jansenist, and very active in the practical affairs of the State and the Church. He left a work, Négotiations à la Cour de Rome, which was published in five volumes in 1748.

ARNAULD, Jacqueline Marie (Marie Angélique de Ste. Magdeleine), b. Sept. 8, 1591; d. Aug. 6, 1661. She was the second daughter of the famous advocate Antoine Arnauld, and sister of the preceding. By her father's influence she was nominated Abbess of Port-Royal when only eleven years old. At first she discharged her duties with increasing dislike as she was better able to appreciate her position; but in 1608 she was converted, reformed her life, performed a severe penance, and wrought a revolution in the convent. She was subsequently Abbess of Maubuisson 1618-23, of Port-Royal 1623-26, then of Port-Royal de Paris, as the new house of the community was called. She resigned her position, and spent the rest of life in pious labor at different posts. See FRANCIS MARTIN: Angélique Arnauld, London, 1873.

ARNAULD D'ANDILLY, Robert, b. in Paris in 1588; d. there Sept. 27, 1674; the eldest brother of Antoine; held various positions in the government and at the court, but retired in 1640 to Port-Royal, and devoted himself to literary pursuits. His Saints Pères du Désert was translated into English: Lives of the Fathers of the Desert, London, 1757, 2 vols.

ARNDT, Johann, b. at Ballenstädt, Anhalt, Dec. 27, 1555; d. at Celle, Hanover, May 11, 1621, studied theology at Helmstedt, Wittenberg, Strassburg, and Basel; and was appointed minister at Badeborn, a village of Anhalt, in 1581, but was discharged in 1590 by Duke Johann Georg, who leaned towards Calvinism, and demanded the abolition of images and of the exorcism. In the same year, however, he was appointed minister at Quedlinburg; in 1599 he moved to Brunswick as pastor of St. Martin; and in 1611 he was called to Celle as court-preacher. Of his celebrated work, Vom wahren Christenthum, the first part was published in 1605, the three others in 1609. It made immediately a deep impression. Edition followed edition. Translations were made into Latin and into all European languages; into English by A. W. Boehm, 1712, and by William Jaques, 1815, the first part having been translated as early as 1646. Few books of devotion have equalled its popularity; but at the same time it also excited much opposition and bitter criticism. The delay in the publication of the three last parts was due to the opposition of his colleagues and superiors in Brunswick. Combining an influence from Tauler and the other mediæval mystics with a decided practical tendency, it was indeed a precursor of the later pietism, and came, naturally enough, in conflict with the Lutheran orthodoxy in its lifeless, scholastic form. Of his other writings, his Paradiesgürtlein voller christlichen Tugenden, 1612, also became very popular. English translation, "The Garden of Paradise," London, 1716. The first collected edition of his works was given by Rambach, 1734, 3 vols. A revised edition of the "True Christianity" mentioned above appeared, Philadelphia, 1868. See FRD. ARNDT: Johann Arndt, Berlin, 1838.

ARNO, b. in the diocese of Freising, in whose official records he occurs as deacon and presbyter up to the year of 779; d. as the first Archbishop of Salzburg, Jan. 24, 821; made the acquaintance of Alcuin while Abbot of Elnon, in Hainault, between 779 and 785, and was in the latter year made Bishop of Salzburg by Duke Tassilo of Bavaria. His attempt to interfere between Tassilo and Charlemagne failed; in 788 Bavaria was incorporated with the Frankish Empire. But Arno gained the favor and confidence of the new ruler, and Charlemagne confirmed the Church of Salzburg in the possession of all its estates on which Arno made a report to him: Congestum (Indiculus) Arnonis, ed. by Keinz, Munich, 1869. After the close of the war with the Avars, all the conquered lands were placed under the spiritual authority of the see of Salzburg; and, on April 20, 798, Arno was consecrated Archbishop of Salzburg, and metropolitan of Bavaria, by the pope himself. In the literary circle of the Frankish court he bore the name of Aquila ("eagle," the Latin translation of his name, Arn=Ar=eagle), and enjoyed great respect. He was present when the Emperor Charlemagne made his will. See Alcuin's letters to Arno in the Monumenta Alcuiniana, edd. Wattenbach et Duemmler, Berol., 1873.

ARNOBIUS was a teacher of rhetoric at Sicca, in the Roman province of Africa, and had taught and written much against Christianity, when, frightened by a dream, he was converted, and embraced the Christian faith. The Bishop of Sicca, however, felt suspicious, and refused to admit him into the church; and then he wrote (about 303), and probably on the demand of the bishop, his Adversus nationes libri VII. On this work Jerome has passed a very severe judgment (epist. 46); and it must be conceded that the author commits mistakes, and shows a rather limited knowledge of Christianity. Thus he says that the soul is not created by God, and not immortal, according to its nature; and his conception of atonement is very vague, Christ's office being simply to make God known by his teachings and his miracles. Nevertheless the book is not without a certain genuine warmth, and its attacks on Paganism are vigorous and hitting. It was edited by ORELLI, Zürich, 1816; by HILDEBRANDT, Halle, 1844; and by REIFFERSCHIED, Wien, 1875; the last edition being by far the best. P. R. ARNOBIUS the Younger was a priest of Gaul; a Semi-Pelagian, who wrote a commentary on the Psalms, found in Max. Bibl. tom. VIII. See TEUFFEL: Geschichte der römischen Litteratur, 3d ed., 1875, pp. 923 sqq.

ARNOLD OF BRESCIA, b. at Brescia in the beginning of the twelfth century; d. in Rome 1155; first appears in the humble position of a lector in the church of his native city; studied afterwards in Paris under Abelard, and became one of his most ardent adherents; attracted, on his return to Brescia, general attention by the austere purity of his life and the fire of his eloquence, and developed by degrees into an enthusiastic ecclesiastical reformer. His reforms were all of a practical character. To the doctrines of the Roman Church he seems to have offered very little opposition. But comparing the first Christian congregation, the church of the apostles, with the church of his own time, he felt scandalized at the difference. The root of the evil he found in the wealth of the church. All the vices and all the worldliness of the clergy he ascribed to their riches. The first reform he demanded was, that, like the apostles, the priests should hold no property, but content themselves with the voluntary offerings of the faithful. How these ideas originated with Arnold has been differently explained; but there is no reason to seek the origin outside of his own moral consciousness. He was a gifted man, upright and fervent. The frightful corruption of the church naturally struck him, and in the Bible itself he found the corrective. In Brescia and its neighborhood his preaching made a deep impression, and caused considerable commotion. Finally Bishop Manfred laid the case before the synod convened at the Lateran in 1139, and Arnold was banished from Brescia, and forbidden to preach. He went to France, where at that moment the controversy between Abelard and St. Bernard was at its height. With great zeal Arnold espoused the cause of his teacher, but thereby he only provoked the wrath of St. Bernard. The synod of Sens condemned both him and Abelard; and the pope, confirming the verdict, ordered the Archbishops of Rheims and Sens to imprison the two heretics. Arnold fled to Switzerland in 1140, and found protection in the diocese of Constance by Bishop Herrmann. But St. Bernard continued to pursue him, and urged the Bishop of Constance to expel or imprison him. He fled again; and this time he found refuge with the papal legate, Cardinal Guido a Castellis, a friend of Abelard. But even here he was not safe. The Abbot of Clairvaux was irreconcilable, and the legate dared not defy him. Meanwhile Innocent II. died, and Arnold determined to return to Italy. During his absence from Italy, perpetual contests had taken place in Rome between the pope and the people; and it is probable that Arnold's ideas were known in Rome, though he himself had never been there. After 1145, however, he began to preach publicly in Rome, and with great effect. For his religious ideas the Romans had no sense; but the practical consequences of these ideas, their influence on social life, fired the enthusiasm of the light-minded populace. Then, again, the enthusiasm of the audience re-acted on the preacher. He himself forgot the religious starting-point, and, inspired by the remembrance of the grandeur of old Rome, he became a political reformer. Rome should stand free, independent of the pope and the emperor, ruled by no single man, but by the senate and the people; and, when thus the old liberty was restored, the old greatness would follow. The people became much excited; and in 1155 a new constitution was framed, and Adrian IV. was demanded to sanction it. The pope refused, and withdrew to Orvieto. Shortly after, he laid the interdict on the city, and put Arnold under the ban; and as Frederick Barbarossa at the same moment approached the city at the head of a great army, a panic caught the inhabitants: Arnold was expelled, and the pope returned. For some time Arnold found shelter with the nobility of the Campania, but was afterwards surrendered to Frederick Barbarossa, who misjudging his most powerful ally in a contest with the papal see, and eager to buy the imperial crown at any price, surrendered him to the pope; and by the pope he was hanged, burnt, and his ashes thrown into the Tiber.

ARNOLD, Gottfried, b. at Annaberg, Saxony, Sept. 5, 1666; d. at Perleberg, Prussia, May, 1714; studied theology at Wittenberg, but received by far the strongest spiritual influence from the works of Spener; acted for some time as a tutor in a noble family, and was in 1697 appointed professor of history in Giessen, but resigned this position in the next year, and lived in retirement at Quedlinburg, till, in 1704, he became minister and ecclesiastical inspector at Werben, whence he moved in 1707 to Perleberg. His great work, Unparteiische Kirchen- und Ketzer-Historie, of which the two first volumes appeared in 1699, the two last in 1700, made an epoch in the study of church-history. The principle on which this book rests — that none, either individual or sect, shall be condemned because the church of his time has condemned him — has been generally accepted, though the author himself often went too far in its application. The polemical bent of his mind, and his pietistical view of Christianity, often made him partial to heretics, and exposed him to very severe attacks from the orthodox party. Of his other works — fifty-three in number, and some of considerable size — many are still in use among the German Pietists; as, for instance, Die erste Liebe, edit. by Lämmert, Stuttgart, 1844; Die Verkörperung Jesu Christi in der Seele, 1704; Wahre Abbildung des inwendigen Christenthums, 1709, etc. See Arnolds gedoppelter Lebenslauf, Leipzig, 1716; DRIBELIUS: Gottfried Arnold, Berlin, 1873.

ARNOLD, Nicolaus, b. at Lissa (Lesna), Poland, Dec. 17, 1618; d. at Franecker, Holland, Oct. 15, 1680; received his first instruction from Amos Comenius; went in 1635 to Dantzic, where he studied philosophy and rhetoric; then in 1641 to Franecker, where he studied theology under Maccovius (Maccovsky) and the famous Coccejus; visited the academies of Groeningen, Leyden, and Utrecht; travelled in England; and was appointed minister at Beetgum in 1645, and professor of theology at Franecker in 1651. He edited the works of Maccovius. His own works are mostly polemical. Against Socinianism: Religio Socinana seu Catechesis Racoviana major publicis dissp. refutata, 1654; Atheismus Socinianus, 1659. Against Romanism: Apologia Auresii contra Erbermannum. Against the prophecies of Comenius, concerning the millennium: Discursus theol. contra Comenii protensan lucem intenebris, 1660.

ARNOLD, Thomas, b. at West Cowes, in the Isle of Wight, June 13, 1795; d. at Rugby, June 12, 1842; was educated at Warminster and Winchester; entered the University of Oxford in 1811; became a fellow of Oriol College in 1815; was ordained a deacon in 1818, and settled in 1819 at Laleham, where he established a preparatory school for young men who wished to frequent the universities. In 1828 he was ordained priest, and appointed head master of the school at Rugby; and in 1841 he was made regius-professor of modern history at Oxford, but he delivered only one course of lectures. His influence was due more to his character as a man than to any particular talent. His proper field was education, and the chief element of his educational method was religion. His religious views have made themselves felt far beyond the school, both in the literature and in the church. He was a strong adversary of the Oxford Tractarian movement, and became the founder of the Broad-Church party, which, though not very numerous, comprises some of the greatest English preachers and writers. His ideas of the Christian Church, and its relation to the State, are fully expressed in the two pamphlets: Church Reform, 1833, and Fragment on the Church, which latter is directed against the Tractarians. Among his other religious writings are five volumes of Sermons. His historical works comprise, beside an annotated edition of Thucydides, the History of Rome, 3 vols., London, 1840-43, unfinished; History of the Later Roman Commonwealth, 2 vols., London, 1849; Lectures on Modern History, London, 1843. See STANLEY: The Life and Correspondence of Thomas Arnold, 1846.

ARNOLDI, Bartholemæus, b. at Usingen 1463; d. at Erfurt 1532; an Augustine monk, professor, first of philosophy, then of theology, at Erfurt, and the teacher of Luther. Ardently opposed to Humanism, he was, nevertheless, eager for a purification of the scholastical theology; but when this purification, in the hands of Luther, became a thoroughgoing religious reform, Arnoldi recoiled, and after 1521 he became an active and open adversary of the reformatory movement. A list of his works is found in HÖHN's Chronologia Provincie Rheno-Suevicæ Ordinis Fr. Eremitarum, p. 166.

ARNOLDISTS, a sect which maintained the ideas of Arnold of Brescia for half a century after his death, but became lost, in the beginning of the twelfth century, among other factions hostile to the church and the clergy, and at that period very numerous in Northern Italy. The Arnoldists are first mentioned when condemned by Pope Lucius III. at the Council of Verona, 1184 (Mansi XXII., 476). A short time after (about 1190), Bonacursus speaks of them in an oration delivered at Milan against the Catharers. It is not improbable, that at the time of Bonacursus, about thirty years after the death of Arnold, there were opponents to the clerical hierarchy who still used the name of the great reformer, and called themselves his disciples; but it is doubtful whether such was the case at a later period, though the name of Arnoldists still continues to occur, as, for instance, in the laws of Frederick II. against heretics from 1224 (Mansi XXIII., 586). At that time no other trace is found of a distinct sect calling itself Arnoldists. It seems most probable, therefore, that the emperor took the name, like several others, from the decrees of Lucius III., and cited them only to be sure to condemn all heretical parties, without any exception. From Frederick's laws the name then went over in the bulls of later popes, and the works of various writers against heresy; but the sect was extinct before the beginning of the thirteenth century. C. SCHMIDT.

ARNON, the present Wady el Mojeb, a river which once formed the boundary between Moab and the Amorites (Num. xxi. 13, 26; Deut. iii. 8), and afterwards between Moab and the Israelites (Josh. xii. 1); enters the Dead Sea from the east, after a course of fifty miles through a mouth ninety feet wide, and from four to ten feet deep. The banks of the river are in many places, especially in its western course, very high, precipitous, and wild, presenting many ruins of forts, bridges, etc. The river itself is full in winter, but dry during summer.

ARNOT, William, D.D., an eminent and popular Scotch divine; b. in 1808 in Perthshire, Scotland; d. in Edinburgh, June 3, 1875. He was ordained in 1839, and subsequently joined the Free-Church movement (1843). In 1873 he was a delegate to the meeting of the Evangelical Alliance in New York, and won great popularity as a preacher and lecturer by his sturdy good sense, fervor, and earnestness. His writings are much read: they abound in apt illustrations. The best known of them are: Laws from Heaven for Life on Earth: Illustrations of the Book of Proverbs, London, 1869; The Parables of our Lord, London, 1870; Life of James Hamilton, London, 1870.

ARNULPH, Bishop of Lisieux, accompanied Louis VII. to the Holy Land in 1147, on the second crusade; went to England in 1160 as the legate of Alexander III. to restore harmony between Henry II. and Thomas Becket; retired afterwards to the Abbey of St. Victor at Paris, and died there Aug. 31, 1182. Some poems and essays by him are found in the Biblioth. Sacr.; but of much more interest for the history and character of his age are his letters, edited by TURNEBUS, Paris, 1585, and by J. A. GILES, Oxford, 1844.

ARNULPHUS, St. (more correctly ARNULFUS), b. about 582, near Nancy; d. Aug. 16, 641; distinguished while young, both as warrior and statesman, and in 611 or 612 made Bishop of Metz. In this position he exercised considerable influence on the government of the Frankish Empire, enjoying at the same time the friendship of Pipin the Elder, and the confidence of the Austrasian nobility. But in 627 he abdicated, and retired into the wilderness of the Vosges, where he lived as a hermit, and acquired the fame of a saint. His remains rest in the church in Metz named after him. Through his son Ansegis, who married Pipin's daughter Begga, he became the ancestor of the Carolingian dynasty. There is an older vita of him (MABILLON: Acta SS. II., 150) and a more recent one (BOLLANDISTS: Acta SS., July IV., 435); but the former is by far the most reliable.

ARPHAX'AD. The names in the table in Gen. x. being those, not of individuals, but of tribes or lands, Arphaxad (Gen. x. 22, 24, xi. 10) means the district called Arrapachitis by the Greeks. To-day the name is preserved in Aghbak and Albakh, by which the Armenians and Kurds designate the mountain-land east of Gordyena. In the chapter cited above, the course of the sons of Shem is described by the names as from south to north, then west, and finally southeast to the Euphrates again; for this is the order, Elam, Asshur, Arphaxad, Lud, and Aram.

In regard to the etymology of the name, there has been much discussion. The interpretations, "the border of the Chaldeans," "the stronghold of the Chaldeans," are open to objection because of the erroneous conception of the word, as a union of Hebrew and Arabic. It is better to interpret "dispersion," and to read in the word that the Hebrew race, whose remote ancestor is called Arphaxad in this chapter, had originally its seat in Arrapachitis, and from there pressed first to Mesopotamia, then over the Euphrates to Canaan and Arabia. It is confirmatory of this view that the progenitors of the Hebrews are said to have come from Ur of the Chaldees (Gen. xi. 22 sq.). See KNOBEL: Die Völkertafel der Genesis. Giessen, 1850. SPIEGEL.

ARROWSMITH, John, b. March 29, 1602, near Newcastle-on-the-Tyne; d. February, 1658 (9). He was educated at Cambridge, where he became fellow of Catherine Hall, subsequently a preacher at Lynn, in the county of Norfolk, was called from thence to take part in the Westminster Assembly. Robert Baillie describes him as "a man with a glass eye in place of that which was put out by an arrow, a learned divine, on whom the Assembly put the writing against the Antinomians." He was on the committee to draw up a confession of faith, and preached thrice before Parliament, the sermons being published: The Covenant Averring Sword Brandished (Lev. xxvi. 25), London, 1643, 4to, pp. 28; England's Ebenezer (1 Sam. vii. 12), London, 1645, 4to, pp. 84; A great Wonder in Heaven; or, a lively Picture of the Militant Church, drawn by a Divine Penman (Rev. xii. 1, 2), London, 1647, 4to, pp. 44. In 1644 he was appointed by Parliament master of St. Johns College, Cambridge, and subsequently became master of Trinity College, and Professor of Divinity in the University, resigning the professorship in 1655, but retaining the mastership until his death. Whilst at Cambridge he published Tactica Sacra, sive de Milite Spirituali Pugnante, Vincente, et Triumphante Dissertatio, Cantab., 1657, 4to, pp. 863, containing also three Orationes Anti-Weigelianæ. After his death there were published: Armillæ Catechetica, A Chain of Principles; or, an orderly Concatenation of Theological Aphorisms and Exercitations, wherein the chief Heads of Christian Religion are asserted and improved, Cambridge, 1659, 4to, pp. 490; an unfinished work designed to form a complete body of divinity in thirty aphorisms, only six of which were completed, covering for the most part the ground of the first twenty questions of the Larger Westminster Catechism, in essentially the same order; also Theanthropos, or God-Man, London, 1660, 4to, pp. 311, an exposition of the Gospel of John i. 1-18, discussing the divinity and humanity of Christ, and maintaining the catholic doctrine against all heresies. C. A. BRIGGS.

ARSENIUS, deacon in Rome, was recommended by Bishop Damasus to Theodosius the Great, on account of his learning and piety, and obtained the position as tutor to Arcadius, 383. The emperor held him in such esteem, that he compelled the son to receive his instruction standing, while the tutor was sitting; but Arcadius felt provoked, and is said to have attempted the life of his tutor. At all events, Arsenius renounced his place at the court (394), and retired into the wilderness of Scetis, in Egypt, where he lived as a hermit till his ninety-fifth, or, according to others, till his one hundred and twentieth year. He is commemorated in the Greek Church on May 8; in the Roman, on July 19. He is called the Great, and is one of the most famous of all the Egyptian monks. About him many stories are told. One of his sayings is worth remembering, "Often have I been sorry for having spoken, never for having been silent." See Acta SS. on the later date; SMITH and WACE: Dict. of Christ. Biography.

ARSENIUS, a monk of Nicæa; lived for some time as a hermit on Mount Athos, and became finally patriarch of Constantinople. Theodore Lascaris II., Emperor of Nicæa, intrusted his son to his guardianship; but, after his death (1259), Michael Palæologus usurped the throne, and put out the eyes of young Lascaris. Arsenius excommunicated the usurper, and refused to re-admit him to the church, unless he restored the throne to the legitimate heir. But a council convened in Constantinople in 1262 deposed and banished Arsenius, and he died in one of the islands of the Propontis in 1267. Although his successor Joseph remitted the sentence of excommunication, there was a party in the Greek Church which considered these proceedings irregular, and in 1312 Arsenius was declared a saint.

ARTAXERX'ES (great warrior). The honorary title of Persian kings. Two are so called in the Old Testament. 1. Pseudo-Smerdis the Magian, the pretended son of Cyrus, and brother of Cambyses, who seized the throne B.C. 522, and was murdered after eight months (Ez. iv. 7-24). 2. Ez. vii. 7 and Neh. ii. 1 both speak of a second Artaxerxes, who is generally regarded as identical with Artaxerxes Longimanus, son of Xerxes, who reigned B.C. 464-425. Therefore Ezra's journey can be set down in B.C. 457, and Nehemiah's B.C. 444. FR. W. SCHULTZ.

ARTEMON, or ARTEMAS, the founder of an anti-trinitarian sect, the Artemonites, taught in Rome in the beginning of the third century, and asserted that Christ was a mere man, though superior to any of the prophets, and that the doctrine of his divinity was a mere invention, and a relapse into Pagan polytheism. His views were afterwards adopted and further developed by Paul of Samosata; but all we know about Artemon himself depends upon a few notices by Eusebius, Epiphanius, Theodoret, and Photius.

ARTICLES OF FAITH, the particular points of doctrine, which together make up the sum of Christian belief. The great majority of churches draw them up, and require a public assent to them by their ministers and church officers, while to the laity they are explained, and from them a general assent is expected. The word thus is synonymous with CREED, which see.

ARTICLES OF RELIGION, English, Thirty-Nine, the Reformation Creed of the Church of England and her daughters in the Colonies and in the United States. They differ from the lengthy confessions of the sixteenth century in form, but agree with them in spirit. The Ten Articles of 1536, and the Six Articles of 1539, under the reign of Henry VIII., prepared the way for a brief statement of the doctrinal controversies. But the Six Articles were a step backwards, by imposing upon all Englishmen a belief in transubstantiation, clerical celibacy, and auricular confession. They were therefore called the "bloody Articles," and "a whip with six strings." King Henry VIII. never was a Protestant, except in opposing the pope, preferring to be a pope himself in his own dominion; but he did the dirty work of the English Reformation by destroying the foreign power of the papacy, and its domestic stronghold, monasticism. The positive Reformation was first fairly introduced during the reign of his son and successor, Edward VI. (1547-53), under the lead of Archbishop Cranmer. He at first entertained the noble but premature project of framing an evangelical catholic creed, in which all the Reformed churches could agree in opposition to the Church of Rome, then holding the Council of Trent, and invited the surviving Continental reformers — Melancthon, Calvin, and Bullinger — to London for the purpose. Calvin was willing to cross ten seas for such a work of Christian union, and so replied to Cranmer in 1552. (See the correspondence in Cranmer's Works, Parker Soc. ed., vol. II., pp. 430-433). But political events prevented the conference, and the formulation of the doctrinal consensus of the Reformed churches. Failing in this scheme, Cranmer framed, with the aid of his fellow-reformers, — Ridley and Latimer, the royal chaplains, and the foreign divines, Bucer, Peter Martyr, and John à Lasco, whom he had drawn to England, — the Forty-two Articles of Religion for the English Reformed Church. After passing through several revisions, they were completed in November, 1552, and published in 1553 by "royal authority" and with the approval of convocation. The re-establishment of the papacy under the short but bloody reign of Mary (1553-58) set them aside, together with the Edwardine Book of Common Prayer. Under Elizabeth (1558-1603) the Articles were revised and permanently restored. They were reduced to thirty-nine, and brought into that shape and form which they have retained ever since in the Church of England. The Latin edition was prepared under the supervision of Archbishop Parker, with the aid of Bishop Cox of Ely (one of the Marian exiles) and Bishop Guest of Rochester, approved by convocation, and published by the royal press, 1563. The English edition, which is of equal authority, though slightly differing from the Latin, was adopted by convocation in 1571, and issued under the editorial care of Bishop Jewel of Salisbury, 1571. They were made binding on all ministers and teachers of religion, and students in the universities; but subscription was not always enforced with equal rigor, and bitterly complained of by the Nonconformists, who had scrupulous objections to the political articles. The Act of Uniformity under Charles II. imposed greater stringency than ever; but the Toleration Act of William and Mary gave some relief by exempting dissenting ministers from subscribing Arts. XXXIV. to XXXVI. and a portion of Art. XXVII. Subsequent attempts to relax or abolish subscription resulted at last in the University Tests Act of 1871, which exempts all students and graduates in the universities of Oxford, Cambridge, and Durham, except divinity students, fellows, professors, and heads of colleges, from subscription, and throws these institutions open to Dissenters.

The Thirty-nine Articles are among the most important doctrinal formulas of the Reformation period. They cover nearly all the heads of the Christian faith, especially those which were then under dispute with the Roman Catholics. They affirm (1) the old orthodox doctrines of the Trinity and incarnation; (2) the Augustinian views on free-will, total depravity, divine grace, faith, good works, election; and (3) the Protestant doctrines on the church, and the sacraments of baptism and the Lord's Supper. They are borrowed, in part, from Lutheran standards; namely, the Augsburg Confession of Melancthon (1530) and the Württemberg Confession of Brennius (1552); but on the sacraments, especially the much-disputed doctrine of the real presence in the Eucharist, they follow the Swiss reformers, Bullinger and Calvin. In the political sections they are purely English, and teach the Erastian doctrine of the spiritual as well as temporal supremacy of the sovereign as the supreme governor of the Church of England. They have, therefore, an eclectic and comprehensive character, which distinguishes the Anglican Church from the Lutheran and the strictly Calvinistic churches of the Continent and Scotland, and from the dissenting denominations of England. They have often been interpreted and misinterpreted in the interest of particular schools and parties; while all claim them as favoring themselves. They must be understood in their plain grammatical sense; and, when this is doubtful, the Prayer-Book, the two books of Homilies, the Catechism, and the private writings of the English reformers and the Elizabethan divines, must be called to aid. The doctrinal decisions in the Gorham, Bennet, and other recent controversies, favor great latitude in their interpretation.

The Protestant-Episcopal Church in the United States, after effecting an independent organization and episcopate in consequence of the American Revolution, formally adopted the Thirty-nine Articles of the mother-church at the General Convention held in Trenton, N.J., Sept. 12, 1801, but with sundry alterations and omissions in the political articles (Arts. XXI. and XXXVII.), which the separation of Church and State made necessary, and which are real improvements. The only doctrinal difference is the omission of all allusion to the Athanasian Creed (Art. VIII.), which is also excluded from the American editions of the Prayer-Book. By this omission the Episcopal Church in the United States has escaped the agitation of the English Church on that creed, whose damnatory clauses make it quite unsuitable for public worship.

The thirty-five Articles of Religion of the Reformed Episcopal Church in America, adopted by the Third General Council, Chicago, May 18, 1875, are based upon the Thirty-nine Articles; similarly are the twenty-five Methodist Articles of Religion drawn up by John Wesley for the American Methodists in 1784. Both are given in SCHAFF: Creeks of Christendom, vol. III., pp. 807 sq., 814 sq.

ARTICLES OF RELIGION, Irish. These articles are one hundred and four in number; were probably composed by the learned Archbishop James Ussher, then professor of divinity in Dublin, and adopted by the convocation of the Irish Episcopal Church at its first meeting (1615), and approved by the viceroy in the same year. They are important as proving the decided Calvinism of the Irish Church at that time, and still more so as the connecting link between the Thirty-nine Articles and the Westminster Confession, and as the chief source of the latter, "as is evident from the general order, the headings of chapters and subdivisions, and the almost literal agreement of language in the statement of several of the most important doctrines." By a decree of the convocation, the teaching of any doctrine contrary to these articles was forbidden. But the Irish convocation of 1635 formally adopted the Thirty-nine Articles, and quietly ignored the others. Archbishop Ussher required subscription to both articles. Eventually, however, the Irish articles were lost sight of, and no mention was made of them, when, in the beginning of this century, the United Church of England and Ireland was organized. See SCHAFF: The Creeks of Christendom, vol. I., pp. 662-665; vol. III., 526-544.

ARTICLES OF RELIGION, the Lambeth. They are a Calvinistic appendix to the Thirty-nine Articles, composed by Dr. William Whitaker (d. 1595), the regius-professor of divinity at Cambridge, have never had full symbolical authority, but are of great historical interest as proof of the Calvinistic bent of the English theologians at the close of the sixteenth century. The University of Cambridge was at this period the scene of a fierce discussion upon predestination, which, for settlement, was finally referred to the Archbishop of Canterbury, who held a consultation with Dr. Whitaker and Dr. Tyndal, Dean of Ely, representatives of the university, and a number of other learned divines, and as a result we have the so-called Lambeth Articles, adopted Nov. 20, 1595. They are nine in number, strongly Calvinistic, although Whitaker's original language was slightly softened. Queen Elizabeth was offended at the calling of the synod without her permission; and the archbishop was obliged to suppress the articles. Dr. Reynolds at the Hampton Court Conference of January, 1604, requested the addition of these articles to the Thirty-nine Articles. See SCHAFF: the Creeks of Christendom, vol. I., pp. 658-662; vol. III., pp. 522-525.

ARÜNDEL, Thomas, Lord Chancellor and Archbishop of Canterbury, b. at Arundel Castle 1353; d. at Canterbury, Feb. 20, 1413. He was the second son of the Earl of Arundel and Warren. Twice he held the position of lord chancellor, 1386-89, 1391-96. He was made Bishop of Ely 1374, Archbishop of York 1388, of Canterbury, January, 1396,—the first instance of a translation from York to Canterbury. In 1397 he, his brother the Earl of Arundel, and the Duke of Gloucester, were impeached on a charge of high treason, and banished. He went to Rome, where he was kindly received, and nominated Archbishop of St. Andrews. He plotted against Richard II., crowned Henry IV., and was by him restored to his see. He entered heartily into the persecution of the Lollards, and made himself especially conspicuous in the prosecution of Lord Cobham on the charge of heresy. He procured a prohibition of the vernacular translation of the Scriptures. He was a zealous, shrewd, farsighted prelate, and spent himself and his riches in the service of the church. See COBHAM, LOLLARDS.

A'SA (healing) was the son and successor of Abijam on the throne of Judah for forty-one years,—B.C. 955-914 (1 Kings xv. 8-24). The first part of his reign was religiously and politically active and blessed: the latter part, although successful, lacked the divine blessing. He tried to uproot idolatry, and deposed his grandmother Maachah, who was queen-mother, because she had an idol in a grove. He made use of the peace he enjoyed to fortify and build several cities, and to augment and drill his army. Accordingly he was able to defeat Zerah, the Ethiopian king who invaded Judah at the head of one million men and three hundred chariots. The battle was fought at Mareshah, and was one of the most important in Jewish history (2 Chron.

xiv.). He caused his people, at the suggestion of the prophet Azariah, to renew their vows to God at a great festival (2 Chron. xv.). This revival of Jahvism causing many to come from Israel to the Holy City, Baasha, King of Israel, built Ramah, on the frontier, to prevent them. Asa made a league with Benhadad, King of Syria, who, in violation of his compact with Baasha, attacked the King of Israel, and compelled him to stop fortifying Ramah (1 Kings xv. 16-22; 2 Chron. xvi. 1-6). But, for thus deserting the Lord, the prophet Hanani was sent to rebuke Asa; which obedience cost the prophet his liberty for a time. Asa died of a disease in his feet (perhaps gout) [the severity of the disease may be accepted as an extenuating circumstance for his occasional acts of tyranny], and showed, not only in his sufferings, but in his previous life, too much reliance upon human aid. He was buried with great pomp (2 Chron. xvi. 14).

ASAPH (collector). Three of the name are mentioned in the Old Testament; but only one is at all prominent: he was a Levite, the chief leader of the temple service, and the author of twelve psalms (Ps. l. and lxxiii. to lxxxiii. inclusive), and was honored by the title "seer" (2 Chron. xxix. 30). His descendants inherited his gift and his position; but perhaps "the sons of Asaph" means a school of musicians.

ASBURY, Francis, b. Aug. 20, 1745, at Handsworth, Staffordshire, Eng.; d. March 31, 1816, at Spottsylvania, Va.; became an itinerant Methodist minister in 1767; sent by Wesley in 1771 to America as a missionary, and was in 1772 appointed Wesley's "general assistant in America," with power of supervising all the Methodist preachers and societies of America, but in a year was superseded by Thomas Rankin, who, however, returned to England on the outbreak of hostilities, while Asbury remained from choice. During the war, like other non-jurors, he suffered some persecution arising from misunderstanding; but, when it was seen that he was patriotic, he resumed his extensive labors unmolested. At the close of the war the Methodists were organized into an independent church, according to Wesley's scheme. Asbury was elected bishop, and ordained by Dr. Coke, Dec. 25, 1784. No better selection could have been made. A man who did not know what fear was when in the course of duty; a man of rugged frame, who never knew weariness; a man of keen wit and uncommon shrewdness; a man of strict private life, and a stern disciplinarian,—such was Asbury. He gave dignity to his office. In labors he was even more abundant than he had been before, although he had seemed energy itself. He was wonderfully active. Deficient in early education, he made up for it as far as possible by careful economy of time, and incessant study, and acquired considerable knowledge. He was also far-sighted, and a good organizer. A vivid picture of his life and success is given by the simple statement of Bishop Janes in his Life of Asbury: "In his unparalleled itinerant career he preached about sixteen thousand five hundred sermons, or at least one a day, and travelled about two hundred and seventy thousand miles, or six thousand a year, presiding in no less than two hundred and twenty-four annual conferences, and ordaining more than four thousand preachers." When he came to America, the Methodists numbered ten preachers and six hundred members: when he died, after forty-five years of work, they had six hundred and ninety-five preachers and 214,235 members. What hath God wrought!

Asbury remained single; his zeal to do all he could, rather than his views, preventing him from matrimony. His salary was sixty-four dollars a year. His generosity tempted him beyond his means. ASCETICISM as a principle of conduct is not, strictly speaking, of Christian origin. It was found with the Essenes among the Jews, among the Hindoos and Buddhists, with the Pythagoreans and Stoics among the Greeks, and it was introduced into Christianity through contact with the Alexandrian school of philosophy. In the two first centuries, when the Christian Church still was, in the truest sense of the word, an ecclesia militans, fighting by day and by night for its very existence, Christianity itself was a danger and a suffering, a continuous sacrifice and self-denial, and is justly represented by Clement of Alexandria as an ἀσκησις (Strom. IV. 22). But gradually, as Christianity spread among the masses, it was compelled to amalgamate with very various secular interests, and so as the Christian Church became a settled institution, with more or less of social security and political guaranty, a distinction arose between that seriousness which ought to characterize all Christian life, and a certain austerity which claimed to represent a higher stand-point. In the earliest Christian sects this distinction is very apparent. All the various forms of Gnosticism adopted asceticism as the true principle of conduct,—the disciples of Saturninus and Basilides, of Cerdo and Marcion, etc. Matter was in itself something evil; and to escape this contamination, to make one's self independent of nature, to shut up every door through which the world enters into converse with the human soul, was the great problem of holiness. But Gnosticism was the first sour and unripe fruit of the contact between Christianity and the Alexandrian philosophy. And again, when in the third century, through the example of Anthony, Paul, Ammon, and others, asceticism was made the basis of a whole new order of Christian life, it may have been the Decian persecution which started the movement; but it was the teaching of the Alexandrian school which directed and organized it; and to that source must be traced back the doctrine of a double moral principle, one obligatory to all,—that of controlling the passions; and one available only for the select few,—that of extirpating the passions,—a doctrine which received a striking development in the history of monasticism. See ZÖCKLER: Kritische Geschichte der Askese, Frankfurt, 1863; and the articles on MONASTICISM, and ETHICS in this Dictionary.

ASH/DOD (stronghold, castle), the Azotus of the New Testament (Acts viii. 40). The present village of Esdud was one of the five chief cities of the Philistines (Josh. xiii. 3; 1 Sam. vi. 17), situated midway between Gaza and Joppa, three miles from the Mediterranean. It was allotted to Judah (Josh. xv. 46), and was taken by Uziah (2 Chron. xxvi. 6); but the Israelites never came into permanent possession of it. It was a great and splendid city, the chief seat of the Dagon-worship; and its location on the road from Egypt to Syria, and near the frontier of Judæa, made it a point of great strategical importance. It was taken by Tartan, besieged for twenty-nine years by Psammetichus, and destroyed by the Maccabees. Philip preached there (Acts viii. 40).

ASH'IMA, one of the divinities worshipped by the Hamathites, i. e., the inhabitants of the kingdom of Hamath, whose capital, originally called Hamath, but later Epiphania, was on the Orontes, north from Antilebanon. These people were transported into Samaria by the Assyrians to replete that depopulated district. The god has not yet been identified. ASH'KELON (migration), one of the five principal cities of the Philistines, was taken by Judah (Judg. i. 18), but not permanently held. It was afterwards conquered twice by Jonathan the Maccabee (1 Macc. x. 86, xi. 60). It had a Temple of Derketo, a goddess with a fish-tail: the temple stood in the centre of a large pond, and traces of this pond are still visible. It was the birthplace of Herod the Great, and afterwards the residence of his sister Salome. During the crusades it was captured and destroyed several times, and now it is in ruins; but the ruins, ten miles north of Gaza, still bear witness to its former greatness.

ASHTORETH. See ASTARTE.

ASH-WEDNESDAY (dies cineris et cilicii) is the first day of Lent, the first of those forty days of fast, which already in the ancient church were kept before Easter in memory of Moses (Exod. xxiv. 18) and Elijah (1 Kings xix. 8), and more especially in memory of the forty days during which our Lord fasted in the desert. The name is not simply a general allusion to the penance in sackcloth and ashes of which the prophets of the Old Testament speak, but refers more directly to a peculiar rite in the Roman Church. The palm-branches consecrated in the church on Palm-Sunday the year previously are burnt to ashes, and the ashes gathered in a vessel, and placed on the altar, before the beginning of the mass. The priest, dressed in a violet pluviate, the color of ecclesiastical mourning, prays that God will send one of his angels to consecrate the ashes, in order that they may become a remedium salubre to all penitents. After sprinkling the ashes thrice with holy water, and striking them thrice with the perfumed clouds from the censer, the officiating priest kneels down, and strews silently ashes on his head. Finally the congregation approach the altar, and kneel down, while the priest strews ashes on their head with the words: Memento homo, quia pulvis es et in pulverem revertaris ("remember man, that thou art dust and unto dust thou shalt return"). Generally, however, the ashes are not actually strewn on the heads, only the sign of the cross is made on the forehead; in Paris by a fine brush. In Protestant churches the Lent sermons generally begin on Ash-Wednesday, but a special service is performed only in the Church of England.

ASINARII, originally a nickname given to the Jews, because they were said to worship an ass, but afterwards also applied to the Christians, of whom the same story was told. It is possible that the Jews were the first to shift the reproach from themselves on to the Christians. Tertullian (Apolog. c. 16; Ad Nat. I. 14) tells of a man, a former Jew, who was hostile to the Christians, that he exhibited in Carthage a picture superscribed, Deus christianorum ovocoinτης and representing this god with ass-ears, a hoof on the one foot, a book in the hand, and dressed in a toga. From about the same time is the mock-crucifix discovered in 1858 in the ruins of the pædagogium for the imperial pages on the southern declivity of the Palatine. It was scratched on the wall with a stylus, evidently by some page, in derision of some Christian comrade, and represents a man with the head of an ass hanging on a cross, and to the left another figure in an attitude of worship, the whole explained by the superscription: Ἀλεξάνδρου σέβετε θεόν. The character of the letters shows that it dates from the beginning of the third century.

ASMODE'US (demon of desire), a demon who is first mentioned in the Book of Tobit as being led through his love for Sara, the daughter of Raguel at Ecbatana, to murder her seven successive husbands upon the wedding-night. But Tobias, under the direction of Raphael, married Sara, and drove away the demon by burning in the bride-chamber the heart and liver of a fish he caught in the Tigris. When Asmodeus smelled the fumes, "he fled into the uttermost parts of Egypt, and the angel (Raphael) bound him" (Tob. iii. 8, viii. 3).

This demon is Parsi in origin, and is to be identified with Æshma, of which the same things are told. In the Talmud, Asmodeus has insight into secrets, Æshma is the source of all knowledge; the latter is a head of the Dævas; Asmodeus is a king of the demons. A Talmudic tale relates that Asmodeus once drove Solomon out of his kingdom, but Solomon at length forced him to work for him in building the temple.

ASS. An animal indispensable in the East. It is so frequently referred to in the Bible, that the quotation of texts is superfluous; but its principal uses deserve mention. (1) For riding, the she-ass, which was also valued for its milk, was particularly liked; and of colors the white was preferred. No saddle was used, but a mere cloth or mantle; and the driver went alongside or behind the beast. (2) For carrying burdens of every kind. (3) For ploughing. (4) For grinding. Asses do not appear to have been used by the Hebrews, after Solomon's day, for warlike purposes: consequently the Messiah, as the Prince of peace, is represented as riding upon an ass.

The ass was an unclean animal: nevertheless, perhaps because so useful to man, its first-born was to be redeemed with a lamb, or else its neck broken (Exod. xiii. 13, xxxiv. 20). The Egyptians dedicated the ass to Seth-Typhon, the god of war and of strangers, and probably in this way the stupid charge which Josephus is at such pains to refute (c. Apion, II. 7), that the Jews worshipped an ass's head, may have arisen. RÜETSCHL.

ASS, The Feast of the, like the Feast of Fools, the performance of mysteries, and many minor points in the Roman-Catholic ritual and liturgy, originated in perfect good faith, and was employed by the priests as means by which to explain the contents of sacred history, and impress its events upon the sloven imagination of people who received no religious instruction, either at home or in any school, and who could not read. The festum asinorum was in great favor in Northern France, and celebrated in various manners in the various cities. In Rouen the celebration took place shortly before Christmas, and consisted in the representation of a little drama, in whose principal scene Balaam's ass (a priest concealed between the legs of an ass) appeared before the altar of the cathedral, and predicted the early coming of Christ. In Beauvais the celebration took place on Jan. 14, and consisted in a procession, which had reference to the flight of Joseph and Mary to Egypt. In the fifteenth century these feasts were forbidden, because they had become a scandal. When the mass was said, the priest brayed thrice, like an ass, instead of saying, "Ite, missa est;" and the whole congregation answered with "Hin-han," instead of Deo gratias. Such scurrilities could, of course, not be tolerated from the moment they ceased to be necessary.

ASSEBURG, Rosamunde Juliane von, b. in November, 1672, at Eigenstedt, near Magdeburg; received, according to her own statement, divine revelations and glorious visions while only seven years old. She saw the Saviour himself in various apparitions, and heard him speak of his sufferings and of the future of his kingdom, etc. In Magdeburg and neighborhood she produced a deep impression; and the sensation soon spread when she became acquainted with Petersen, the chiliast, at that time superintendent at Lüneburg. He invited her to his house, and in a pamphlet — Die Species facti von dem adeligen Fräulein Rosamunda Juliana von der Asseburg; also containing an essay: Ob Gott nach der Auf-fahrt Christi nicht mehr heutiges Tages durch göttliche Erscheinung den Menschenkindern sich offenbaren wollte und sich dessen ganz begeben habe? — he addressed in 1691 all the foremost theologians of Germany, asking them whether they accepted the revelations of Miss Asseburg as divine inspirations or not. Some answered in favor, others were violently opposed. Spener was too cautious to express any opinion. Meanwhile her name became known in France, England, and Denmark; and the court of Hanover seemed to regard her with favor. The magistrates, however, and the preachers of Lüneburg, took another view of the case; and, in accordance with a verdict of the theological faculty at Helmstädt, Petersen was deposed in 1692, and banished from the country. Miss Asseburg accompanied him, and lived afterwards in the house of a pious old countess; but she rapidly lost her prestige, and sank into oblivion. The date of her death is unknown. Leibnitz defended her moral and religious character; and, with respect to her visions, he compared her to Brigitta, Hildegard, Mechtildis, and other virgins among the saints of the middle ages. See Petersen's Autobiography, 2d edition, 1719.

ASSEMANI is the name of a Maronite family of which three members became celebrated in the eighteenth century by opening up to European students the Oriental literatures, especially that of Syria. — I. Joseph Simon Assemani, b. on Mount Lebanon in 1687; d. in Rome, Jan. 31, 1768; was educated in the Maronite college of Rome; received while yet a very young man a position in the library of the Vatican; was sent by Clement XI. to the East (1715-17) to collect manuscripts; visited Cairo, the monasteries of the Nitrian Desert, Damascus, Aleppo, etc., and brought great literary treasures back to Rome; made a second journey to the East (1735-38), and was made custodian of the library. When he died he left a great number of works in manuscript (more than one hundred volumes), partly continuations of earlier publications, partly new literary enterprises; but a large part of his work was destroyed by a fire which broke out in the apartments adjacent to the library, Aug. 30, 1768. His principal works are: 1. Bibliotheca orientalis Clementino-Vaticana, 3 vols. fol., Rome, 1719-28, forming the first part only of a larger work destined to comprise four parts. Considerable preparations, however, were made for the seven volumes forming the second part, and treating of the Syrian and Arabian translations of the Bible, the religious books of the Syrians, the Syrian and Arabian councils, etc. 2. Ephr. Syri Opera, Græce, Syriace, Latine in VI. tomes (Rom., 1732-46). (Only the first three tomes.) 3. Rudimenta lingue Arabica, Rome, 1732. 4. Abrah. Echhellensis: Chronicon orientale, printed in Scriptores Historie Byzantine T. XVII. 5. Chronicon Siculum (827-963), after an Arabian manuscript, printed in Carusii Bibliotheca Historica Regni Siciliae, T. I. 6. Kalendaria ecclesie universæ, of which only the first six volumes appeared (Rome, 1755), treating of the Slavica Ecclesia sive Græco-Moscha. The six following volumes, treating the Syrian, Armenian, Egyptian, Æthiopian, Greek, and Roman saints, were partly prepared, but were burnt. 7. De sacris imaginibus et reliquiis, destined to comprise five volumes. Part of the manuscript were saved; and extracts from it were given by Jo. Bottarius, Rome, 1776. For a complete list of his works, published or in manuscript, see ANGEL. MAI: Scriptorum Veterum Nova Collectio e Vaticanis Codd. Edita, T. III., P. II., p. 166. — Joseph Aloysius Assemani, brother of the preceding, was professor of Oriental languages in Rome, and died there Feb. 9, 1782. His two principal works are: 1. Codex liturgicus Ecclesie universæ, 13 vols., Rome, 1749-66, unfinished. 2. Comment. de Catholicis s. Patriarchis Chaldeorum et Nestorianorum, 1775. — Stephan Evadius Assemani, a cousin of the two preceding, held rich benefices in Italy, was titulary archbishop of Apamæa in Syria, member of the Royal Society of London, etc. He worked, together with Joseph Simon, on the edition of Ephraem Syrus, and on a catalogue of all the manuscripts of the Vatican library. Of the latter work three volumes were printed, and eighty pages of the fourth; but they were all burnt in 1768. He also gave a catalogue of all the Oriental manuscripts in the Medicæan, Laurentian, and Palatine libraries, Florence, 1742; and edited Acta SS. Martyrum orientalium, qui in Perside passi sunt, etc., Florence, 1748, 2 vols., Syriac, with Latin translation. The first part gives the history of all the martyrs who suffered during the reign of Sapor, Varanes, etc.

ASSEMBLY, General (the name comes from Heb. xii. 23), the highest court of the Presbyterian church. See PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH.

ASSYRIA first designated the land and kingdom, whose capital, Asshur — thus called from the principal god there worshipped, Asshur, "the good god" — stood on the western bank of the Tigris, a few miles south of Mosul, at the present Kaleh Sherghat. The name was retained when, later on, the kingdom expanded north to Armenia, east to Media, south to the Little Zab, west towards the Euphrates, comprising an area corresponding to the classical Aturia or Adiabene, though the royal residence was now moved farther to the north, and a new capital, Nineveh, was built on the eastern bank of the Tigris, opposite Mosul, in the angle formed by the Tigris and the Great Zab. Still later on, when this kingdom grew into one of the greatest empires which antiquity ever saw, comprising the whole region between the Tigris and the Mediterranean, the Armenian Mountains, and the Persian Gulf, the name was retained, only abridged into "Syria" by the classical writers. This vagueness in the application of the name is still further increased by the peculiar relations which existed between Assyria and Babylonia. Neither geographically nor historically can the two countries be wholly distinguished from each other. They were inhabited by the same people, a branch of the Semitic race (Gen. x. 22); and in both countries this people spoke the same language, held the same religion, developed the same science and art, etc., only with the difference, that, in all these respects, Babylonia appears to be the mother-country. Politically they also generally belonged together, Assyria being a Babylonian province at one time, and Babylonia an Assyrian province at another. But this latter difference was often overlooked, as, for instance, when Nebuchadnezzar, King of Babylon, is called King of Assyria (2 Kings xxiii. 29).

The Bible and the classical historiographers, Herodotus, Diodorus, Dio Cassius, and Ammianus Marcellinus, who, partially at least, based their reports on older writers, — the Greek Ctesias and the native Berosus, — were for a long time the only sources from which any knowledge could be drawn concerning the history of this country and the civilization of this people. But the knowledge thus derived was scanty, and full of irreconcilable contradictions. But in 1843 Botta and Layard succeeded in uncovering a series of Assyrian palaces at Kouyunjik and Khorsabad; and here, scattered among the ruins, was found a multitude of tablets of a greenish gypsum, covered all over with cuneiform inscriptions. By means of these inscriptions it became possible, not only to prove the general correctness of the notices which the Bible contains, and the utter untrustworthiness of the stories which many of the classical historiographers give, but also to form a tolerably full outline of this interesting chapter in the history of mankind. What Ctesias tells about the founding of Nineveh by Ninus and Semiramis, etc., is mere fable, and so is his story about a first destruction of Nineveh (about 800 B.C.), when Sardanapalus burnt up himself, his harem, his treasures, and his palace in one huge pile. Ninus and Semiramis are characters in the great mythical epic of Assyria, and have no more reality than Apollo and Diana. What the Bible tells (Gen. x. 11) about the colonization of Assyria by emigrants from Babylonia is true, and the date of this emigration can be approximately fixed. As the succession of Assyrian kings is given in the inscriptions up to the year of 1450 B.C., and Assyrian kings are spoken of before that time, it seems warrantable to place the date of the founding of Asshur in the twentieth century B.C. From the ninth century B.C. to the destruction of Nineveh and the downfall of the Assyrian Empire, the succession is complete in all its details; and the connection between this succession of kings and the absolute chronology is made with certainty by means of the eclipse of June 15, 763 B.C. The names of this succession are, Tiglath-Adar II., 889-884; Assur-natsir-pal, 883-859; Shalmaneser II., 858-824; Samas-Rimmon, 823-811; Rimmon-nirari, 810-782; Shalmaneser III., 781-772; Assur-dan-il, 771-754; Assur-nirari, 753-746; Tiglath-Pileser (probably Pul) II., 745-728; Shalmaneser IV., 727-723; Sargon, 722-706; Sennacherib, 705-682; Esarhaddon, 681-669; Assur-bani-pal (Sardanapalus), 668-626; Assur-ebil-ili, 625. . . .

This period of Assyrian history, from 900 to 650 B.C., is not only the best known, but also the culminating point of power and success. Assur-natsir-pal, the builder of the magnificent Northwest Palace at Calah, made Tyre, Sidon, Byblus, and Aradus tributary. Rimmon-nirari subdued the whole "west land," including Phœnicia, Philistæa, Edom, and the land of the house of Omri; that is, Northern Israel. Tiglath-Pileser II. pushed forward to Gaza on the Egyptian frontier. Sargon defeated the Egyptians in the great battle of Raphia. Sennacherib's campaign failed; but Esarhaddon conquered all Egypt, penetrated into Nubia, and styled himself, "King of the Kings of Egypt and Cush." Under Assur-bani-pal, an Oriental despot in the true sense of the word, magnificent, sensual, and cruel, the empire extended from Media and Persia to the Mediterranean, and from Armenia to the Arabian Desert; but signs of decay already began to show, or rather signs of the impossibility of keeping together so vast a complex of lands by devices of government so imperfect as those as yet invented. A general rising took place. Sammughes, the brother of Assur-bani-pal, and viceroy in Babylonia, who headed the revolt in this part of the realm, was captured and burnt. The tribes of Northern Arabia — Kedar, Zobah, Nabathæa, etc. — were again subdued. But Egypt, under the guidance of Psammetichus, recovered its independence. Under Assur-ebilili the revolt was repeated: Nineveh was taken by Cyaxares of Media and Nabopolassar of Babylonia, and the Assyrian Empire came to an end, 625 B.C.

The Assyrian Government was, like that of the other great Oriental monarchies, an absolute and untempered despotism, organized on a crude military plan, and centring in the harem. One of the principal officers of the realm was the Rabsaris, the commander of the eunuchs (2 Kings xviii. 17); and the eunuchs themselves, this institution so characteristic for an Oriental court, were at once the government, the science, and the art of the people. Foreign countries, when conquered, were generally left in the state in which they were found. The king became a vassal, and paid tribute; but no closer relation sprang up between the two peoples. If the king revolted, and was defeated, he was burnt, and his soldiers were massacred. If the whole people partook in the revolt, they were transferred in a body from their native soil, and settled in some distant region. If the revolt succeeded, the victor became at once the ruler of the whole realm, the "great king." In the relation between Assyria and Israel we find many of these features of crude and awkward political art strikingly manifested.

In his western campaigns Assur-natsir-pal overran Palestine; and Shalmaneser II. compelled Jehu, the tenth king of Israel, to pay tribute, and recognize the supremacy of Assyria. Rimmon-nirari again exacted tribute from the "land of Omri;" and Tiglath-Pileser II. found opportunity to interfere still more effectively in its affairs. He received tribute from Menahem, King of Israel (2 Kings xv. 19), and afterwards also from Ahaz, King of Judah (2 Kings xvi. 7), whom he supported against Pekah, the son of Menahem, and King of Israel, and Rezin, King of Damascus. The kingdom of Damascus was destroyed; and, after the death of Pekah, Tiglath-Pileser II. placed Hoshea as his vassal on the throne of Israel. So heavily, however, pressed the Assyrian tribute on Israel, that Hoshea made an alliance with the Egyptian king, So (2 Kings xvii. 4), to throw off the Assyrian yoke. Shalmaneser IV. then invaded Israel, and besieged the capital, Samaria, which was taken by his successor, Sargon, who carried away Hoshea and a great number of his subjects into captivity; while foreign settlers from the East came, and took possession of the land of Israel. Also the kingdom of Judah paid tribute to Sargon; and, in spite of Sennacherib's unfortunate campaign against Judah and Egypt, Judah remained tributary to Assyria till the latter part of the reign of Assur-bani-pal.

In science and art the Assyrians were, as above mentioned, merely the pupils and imitators of the Babylonians. Their office was to spread rather than to produce; and it is their great merit to have brought the results of Babylonian science—as, for instance, the sexagesimal division of time—into common use in Western Asia, whence it reached Europe. They were, however, not altogether without originality. The circumstance that they had stone, plenty and of good quality, while the Babylonians were absolutely confined to the use of brick, gave their architecture and sculpture a strong impulse; and there was something in their national character which contributed still more to give their architecture a peculiar development. The Babylonians were priests, and built temples: the Assyrians were soldiers, and built palaces. It is now also generally acknowledged that the Assyrians, and not the Egyptians, were the first teachers of the Greeks, both in architecture and sculpture. Less originality can be ascribed to the Assyrian literature. The great institutions for learning and education existed in Babylonia, at Erech and Borsippa; and for many centuries all literary activity in Assyria seems to have consisted in copying and re-editing Babylonian works. There were, nevertheless, royal libraries in all the great cities,—Assur, Calah, Nineveh, etc.,—in which the books, clay-tablets with cuneiform inscriptions, were kept in perfect order, and stood at the disposal of the students; and the literary remains from the reign of Assur-bani-pal are of the highest interest, consisting of grammars, dictionaries, primers of all kinds, historical records, and state papers. Of poetry some hymns have been discovered strongly resembling the Psalms, not only in form, but also in tone; and two epic poems,—the Deluge, and the Descent of Istar into Hades,—which seem to have formed parts of a greater epic poem. But these have evidently been merely copied from Babylonian sources.

Also with respect to religion, some individual traits developed in Assyria. The Assyro-Babylonian religion was a star-worship of non-Semitic origin, into which a genuinely Shemitic element was introduced,—a principle of dualism based on the natural difference of sex. Thus, beside the god Anu stands the goddess Anab; beside Bel, Bilit, etc. But while in Babylonia, El, "god" (whence Babel or Bab-ilu, the "gate of god"), stands at the head of the whole mythological system, this position is in Assyria occupied by Assur, or Asshur, the "good god;" and while, among the other gods, Sin, the moon-god, Merodach, Nebo, and Bel, are most zealously worshipped in Babylonia, the Assyrians show a preference for Adar, the god of fire and war, and Istar, Astarte, the goddess of hunting and battle. Similar differences existed probably also with respect to the lowest sphere of the religious system,—the field of spirits; but they have not yet been recognized. See, for further information, the articles on BABYLONIA, CHALDÆA, CUNEIFORM INSCRIPTIONS, DELUGE, NINEVEH, SEMITIC RACE, etc.

ASTARTE and ASH'ERAH. 1. Astarte. The Greek and Latin name for the principal Phœnician female divinity (called in Hebrew Ashtoreth, and very frequently in plural form Ashtaroth), the correlative of Baal, the principal male divinity. She is called the goddess of the Sidonians (1 Kings xi. 5), but was worshipped also by the Philistines, even in the time of Abraham, as is shown by the name of the city Ash'teroth-Karna'im. Afterward, in the days of Saul, we read of a Philistine temple in her honor (1 Sam. xxxi. 10). Solomon introduced her worship into Jerusalem (1 Kings xi. 5); and the bamoth, or artificial mounds surmounted by altars ("high places"), he had built, were not destroyed until Josiah's day (2 Kings xxiii. 13). When the plural form Ashtaroth, cf. Baalim, is employed, it indicates, as Gesenius holds, the statues of Ashtoreth and Baal. In the Phœnician inscriptions the goddess is called Ashtart: hence the Greek Astarte. The name entered into the composition of proper names. The Island of Tyre was sacred to her. Her worship spread through all the Phœnician colonies. Hiram, the contemporary of Solomon, built sanctuaries to her and Baal-Melkart. The Phœnicians regarded her as the revealer of Baal. The Philistines apparently regarded her as the goddess of war, for they put the arms of the fallen Saul in her temple.

Astarte was not originally a Phœnician, but an old Babylonian goddess, where she was called, according to the cuneiform inscriptions, Istar. It is a mooted point whether she was not derived from an older Turanian people. Istar (plural Istarât), as a Babylonian goddess, is sometimes the general name for female divinities, sometimes the name of a particular goddess. In the library of King Assur-bani-pal (seventh century B.C.) are mythological tales about Istar, both as the dispenser of life and fruitfulness,—so that on one occasion, when she went into the underworld, procreation and birth ceased upon the earth,—and as a war-goddess, carrying quiver and bow. See Smith's Chaldean Account of Genesis (revis. ed., N.Y., 1881), p. 243.

According to the astrological inscriptions, Istar was Venus; but such identification was of comparatively recent date. By far the older is that which puts Istar side by side with Ilu, and regards them as moon and sun respectively: these two were the chief divinities of Ancient Arabia. Istar appears in connection with Thammuz and with the Græco-Phœnician Adonis. It is indeed true that Sin is called the moon-god upon the Assyrian inscriptions; but he was either a local god originally, or else, when men recognized the importance of the moon as a divider of time and as a cause of certain events, they represented it by a male divinity, rather than by a female. Sin was the father of Istar; and so Istar, instead of being paired with the sun-god, was later on represented as the Venus-star, guiding the sun.

Astarte was the οὐρανίη Ἀφροδίτη of Ascalon, and the "Cælestis" of Carthage, identified with Juno by the Latins. She was also the "Queen of Heaven," to whom the women made moon-shaped cakes, and poured libations (Jer. vii. 18, xlv. 17). The rites of Aphrodite came to the Greeks from the Phœnicians.

The prototype of the deus Venus, the bearded Aphrodite of Cyprus, is found in an androgynous Istar. The prohibition (Deut. xxii. 5) against the sexes wearing each other's clothes, probably originated in the prescribed exchange in the worship of this Venus.

2. Asherah. There was a goddess of this name, because we read of images or idols of Asherah (1 Kings xv. 13; 2 Kings xxi. 7; 2 Chron. xv. 16), vessels and tents for Asherah (2 Kings xxiii. 4, 7), and prophets of Asherah (1 Kings xviii. 19). On the other hand, it is true that many passages require the rendering "statue" or "sanctuary," e.g. Exod. xxxiv. 13; Judg. vi. 25; Isa. xvii. 8. [The authorized version uniformly translates Asherah by "grove."] The Asherah was evidently made of wood.

The service of Asherah was early introduced into Israel (cf. Judg. iii. 7), and maintained itself throughout their history in both the Northern and Southern kingdoms (1 Kings xiv. 15; 2 Kings xxi. 3, 7). It was by preference carried on under green trees upon high hills (2 Kings xvii. 10; Jer. xvii. 2). Asherah was worshipped at one altar with Baal, since the two are named together (see texts quoted). The image of Asherah was by the side of the altar of Baal (Judg. vi. 25). In her service were sodomites and devotee prostitutes (Gen. xxxviii. 21; Deut. xxiii. 18; 1 Kings xiv. 24; Job xxxvi. 14; Hos. iv. 14); but we know no particulars of her sensual rites; for the word "honor" used to describe her idol (1 Kings xv. 13; 2 Chron. xv. 16, see marg.), does not necessarily mean phallus; but in general we know that the Phœnician and Syrian female divinities were worshipped licentiously.

It is not as yet determined whether Asherah was only another name for Astarte. But the idea so generally adopted since Movers, that Astarte was the virgin and destruction-bringing goddess of war, while Asherah was the sensual and procreative goddess of love, is scarcely well founded; since, as shown above, Astarte herself has these two qualities. But it is not at present possible satisfactorily to distinguish between the gods and goddesses.

ASTERIUS. In the ancient Greek Church, there were two men of this name. 1. The one, an Arian, was the pupil of that Lucianus, presbyter of Antiochia, who, together with Dorotheus, is generally mentioned as the founder of the school of Antiochia. During the lifetime of Arius he was one of the most important authors writing in defence of Arianism. He died about 330. 2. Different from him is Asterius, Bishop of Amasea in Pontus, d. about 410. His sermons were spoken of with praise at the second synod of Nicæa. Several ascribed to him are still extant. COMBEFIS gives eleven in the first tome of his Auctuarium Novum, besides extracts from ten others, made by Photius, and an eulogy of Stephanus, the first martyr, which up to that time had been generally ascribed to Proclus, patriarch of Constantinople. Eight homilies, given by CORÉLIER in his Monumenta Eccl. Gr., are by him ascribed to Asterius of Amasea, but by AUDIN and DUPIN to Asterius the Arian.

ASTROLOGY (the science of the stars) consisted of two departments, natural and judicial astrology: the former referred only to the natural sphere of phenomena, the latter, only to the moral. The former was a science, or developed into the science of astronomy. The latter was an illusion, but retained its hold on men's minds up to the dawn of modern science. Astrology, in the latter sense of the word, ascribed to the stars a subtle and mysterious influence on the human will, consequently on the destiny of man, and pretended to be able to trace out this influence, and predict its result, by inferences drawn from the relative positions of the stars in a given moment. It was much cultivated by the Chaldees, and from them it spread into the Greek and Roman world. At the time of the first emperors, the Chaldæan astrologers belonged to the most feared and most flattered persons in Roman society. The Barbarians, so called, who overran the Roman Empire, took a great fancy to this occult science; and during the dark ages the sounder and stronger minds among the Christian clergy found it very hard to oppose this kind of sorcery and magic. The superstition was not completely destroyed until the elaboration of the Copernican system, when it gradually receded into the nurseries.

ASTRONOMY never developed among the ancient Israelites into a real science. They never attained to a distinction between comets, planets, and fixed stars. Their studies were confined to such observations as the shepherd would make while leading his flock. Nevertheless, the distinction between the sun and the moon and the other stars was very old, and so was the division of time after the course of the moon. The arrival of the new moon was saluted by sound of trumpets, and celebrated with sacrificial feasts (Num. x. 10, xxviii. 11-15, xxix. 1; Ezek. xlvi. 6; 1 Chron. xxiii. 31; 2 Chron. ii. 4, viii. 13). The whole complex of stars was called the "host of heaven" (Isa. xl. 26; Jer. xxxiii. 22); but quite a number of single stars were distinguished; such as "the morning star;" the planet Venus (Isa. xiv. 12; Rev. ii. 28); "the seven stars," the Pleiades (Job ix. 9, xxxviii. 31; Amos v. 8); "Orion," poetically represented as a giant bound by chains to the firmament of heaven (Job ix. 9, xxxviii. 31); "Arcturus," the Great Bear (Job ix. 9); "the Crooked Serpent;" the Dragon (Job xxvi. 13); and "Castor and Pollux," the Twins (Acts xxviii. 11).

ASTRUC, Jean, b. at Sauve in Languedoc, March 19, 1684; d. in Paris, May 5, 1766; studied medicine at Montpellier, and was professor of anatomy, first in Toulouse, then in Montpellier, and finally in Paris. In 1753, in his seventieth year, he published his Conjectures sur les Memoirs originaux dont il parait que Moïse s'est servi pour composer le livre de la Genèse, Brussels and Paris, in which, for the first time, those views are set forth according to which Genesis was not written by Moses, but formed by combining a number of older documents. Astruc was a pious man, and very anxious with respect to the effect which his book might have. Two years later on he published Sur l'Immortalité, l'Immaterialité, et la Liberté de l'Âme, Paris.

ASYLUM (ἀσυλον, i.e., inviolable) means, in Greek antiquities, a place in which not only force becomes powerless, but even the law grows silent, a refuge, an escape. Among all people the awe of the holy made it an offence, or even a crime, to use force in a place consecrated to the Divinity and divine worship; and far back into antiquity the beneficial influence may be seen of the protection which such consecrated places offered against the prevailing arbitrariness and violence. The Mosaic law provides "cities of refuge" (Exod. xxi. 13; Deut. xix. 7-10, see title), and with both the Greeks and the Romans, their temples and altars formed inviolable asylums, not only to the persecuted, but even to the criminal.

In the Christian world the right of asylum was extended from the altar and the temple to all ecclesiastical buildings. Various imperial constitutions regulated the details of this privilege (Cod. Theodos. Lib. IX., Tit. XLV.; Cod. Justinian, Lib. I., Tit. XII.). In 431 Theodosius II. ordered that not only the altar and the nave of the church should be considered sacred, but also the atrium, the garden, the baths, and the cells; and when, in 466, Leo I. confirmed these constitutions, he added that the steward and the advocate of the church (see title) should subject every person who demanded protection to a close examination, and act upon the evidence thus obtained. The privilege, however, gave rise to many misuses. Already in 392 Theodosius the Great excluded debtors to the state from the privilege; and Justinian added (Novella, XVII., c. 7) murderers, adulterers, and people who had committed rape.

The church has always considered it a special duty to protect any one who asked for its aid. The Council of Sardica (347) established this maxim; and in 441 the synod of Orange ordered that fugitives should not be surrendered. The synod of Orleans (511) conferred the privilege to the bishop's residence, and extended the asylum for thirty paces from the building, the so-called triginta ecclesiastici passus.

In England the right of asylum was recognized by the laws of Alfred; and no considerable change took place in the matter until 1487; when a bull of Innocent VIII. declared that thieves, robbers, and murderers who tried to continue their criminal life under the shelter of the asylum, should immediately be given up to the king's officers. In 1534 an act of Parliament excluded people accused of treason from the benefit of the privilege, and, when the Reformation was established under Elizabeth, the privilege itself was lost to the church. In Germany various crimes, such as highway robbery, conspiracy, etc., excluded from the asylum; and new crimes were added to the list in course of time, as, for instance, in 1418 by Martin V., and in 1504 by Julius III. The privilege, however, was not entirely abolished until the last part of the eighteenth century. In France the privilege began to be limited by Francis the First, by the edict of 1539: Ordon. sur le fait de la justice. During the Revolution it was abolished. See WALLON: Droit d'Asyle, Paris, 1837. H. F. JACOBSON.

ATARGATIS. This Syrian goddess is not mentioned in the Bible; but in 2 Macc. xii. 26 her temple at Karnion, the same place as Ashtaroth Karnaim (Gen. xiv. 5), is spoken of. She was the Syrian form of Astarte. The Greek and Roman writers represent her as a fish-goddess, the cause of the seas' fruitfulness. From this idea came "Aphrodité Anadyoméne" (Venus rising from the sea). According to Ctesias, Semiramis, a celebrated queen of Assyria (fl. 1250 B.C.), was the daughter of Derketo (Atargatis) by a beautiful youth, under the influence of Aphrodite. Overcome by shame at her conduct, the goddess destroyed the youth, set her daughter in a desert, where she was fed by doves, and threw herself into the sea by Ascalon, and was changed, all except the face, into a fish; and in this shape she was pictured. Fish and doves thus became holy to the Syrians, and were not eaten. Ascalon and Hierapolis were the chief seats of her worship. Lucian speaks of her in his book De Syria dea, calls her, however, Heré, and says she combined traits of Athene, Aphrodite, Selene, Rhea, Artemis, Nemesis, and the Moirais (the three Fates). He describes her as decked with gold and many precious stones, girded like Aphrodite, sitting upon a lion; near her is Zeus, upon a bull. In one hand she holds a sceptre, in the other a spindle; upon her head, surrounded by rays, she wears a tower; one of the jewels on her forehead illumines the temple at night through its radiance. Twice a year water was brought from distant places, and poured into a chasm in the temple; because, as Lucian says, according to tradition, the waters of the deluge were drained away through that opening. About her temple were oxen, horses, eagles, bears, and lions, sacred to the goddess. A fish-pond, upon which was a floating altar for the worship of the fish, was near the temple. Her rites shared the impurity of the Oriental nature-religions. See ASTARTE for further information, and to literature there given add TITLE: *Ägyptische en mesopotamische Godsdiene, 1872. ATHANASIUS, the "Father of Orthodoxy," b. in Alexandria of Christian parents, 298 or 299; d. there May 2 or 3, 373; received the common-school education of his time; studied the Greek philosophers and poets; was made a deacon by Bishop Alexander, whose amanuensis he became, and played a most prominent part, at the Council of Nice, in the definition of the creed named after that council. After the death of Alexander, Athanasius was chosen his successor (June 8, 328), and was received with enthusiasm by a large majority of the congregation, but fiercely opposed by the adherents of Arius and the remnants of the Meletian party. At the instance of Eusebius of Nicomedia, the emperor demanded the re-admission of Arius into the Church; but Athanasius refused, and immediately the storm broke out. He was summoned before the emperor, at that time residing in Nicomedia, and accused of conspiracy; and only, after long and wearisome exertions, he succeeded in proving his innocence. But, immediately after his return, new accusations were raised against him. It was said that he had killed a Meletian bishop, Arsenius, and used his bones for magic. The emperor commissioned a relative of his, the censor Dalmatius of Antiochia, to investigate the case, and a synod was convened at Cæsarea (334). But Athanasius refused to appear; and, as he was able to prove that Arsenius was still alive, the emperor ordered the investigation to be discontinued. Eusebius, however, succeeded in changing the emperor's mind; and an imperial letter ordered Athanasius to appear at the synod of Tyre, 335. Athanasius felt obliged to obey; and July 11, 335, he set out for Tyre, accompanied by fifty bishops. Arrived at Tyre, he soon understood the temper of the assembly, and repaired to Constantinople, where he landed Oct. 30, 335. He succeeded in convincing the emperor of the partiality of the synod; and the bishops, who in the mean time had moved the convention from Tyre to Jerusalem, were called to Constantinople to vindicate themselves. A new accusation, however, raised against Athanasius by the two Eusebiuses, that he had threatened to stop the exportation of corn from Egypt to Constantinople, wrought so well on the emperor's mind, that, without being admitted to a hearing, Athanasius was banished to Treves Nov. 16, 335.

Constantine died May 23, 337; and in the fall of 338 Athanasius returned to Alexandria. He entered the city in triumph; but the opposition and intrigues immediately began again, and his adversaries this time went so far as to accuse him of having sold, and employed for his own personal purposes, that corn which the late emperor had destined for the widows of Libya and Egypt. A synod of bishops from Egypt, Libya, and the Pentapolis, declared in his favor; but, as Constantius stood entirely under the influence of the two Eusebiuses, he had to go into exile a second time (March 19, 340), while Gregorius, a bishop of the Eusebian party, took possession of his see by military force. Athanasius went to Rome, where he was well received by Bishop Julius; thence to Gaul (in 343) to confer with Hosius, whom he accompanied to Sardica. The Easter of 344 he celebrated at Naissus in Dacia; that of 345, at Aquileia, with Constans, who warmly supported his cause. Meanwhile a prospect of his returning to Alexandria was opened up by the death of Gregorius, June 26, 345. The see was not filled; and the following year Athanasius repaired to Antioch, where he was well received by Constantius. Over Jerusalem he returned to Alexandria, and entered the city Oct. 21, 346. After the death of Constans, however (in January, 350), his position again became unsafe; and the end of a long series of intrigues and machinations was, that the dux Syrianus and the imperial notary Hilarius formally demanded his expulsion from the city, and broke into the Church of St. Theona during service, in the night between Feb. 8 and 9. Athanasius fled, and a great massacre ensued. In Lent, 357, Georgius from Cappadocia was appointed his successor; and his adherents were discharged, and replaced with Arians. During this his third exile (356 to 361) he found refuge among the monks and hermits of the Egyptian deserts; but at times he also lived concealed in or by Alexandria, and by his writings he continued to exercise great influence on the congregation. Immediately after the death of Constantius, a revolt broke out in Alexandria. Georgius the bishop and the comes Dracontius were seized by the mob, and killed; and their bodies were dragged through the streets, and burnt. The edict of Julian concerning the exiled bishops allowed Athanasius to return to Alexandria in February, 362; but Oct. 25, 362, a special edict banished him for the fourth time. He lingered in various parts of Egypt and the Thebais until he heard of the death of Julian (June 26, 363). He then repaired to Antiochia, was kindly received by Jovian, and returned to Alexandria Feb. 20, 364. Once more he was in danger. An edict of Valens, May 5, 365, reversed the edict of Julian concerning the exiled bishops; and Oct. 5, 365, the prefect Flavianus broke into the Church of St. Dionysius, and compelled Athanasius to flee. Valens, however, found it hazardous to deal with the great and populous city in this way; and, though he continued to persecute the orthodox in other places, his notary Basidas brought, Feb. 1, 366, a special permission for Athanasius to return, and he was left in peace for the remainder of his life.

The greatness of Athanasius is his unswerving fidelity to the idea of his life, his constant adhesion to the dogma of homo-ousion as the only full and satisfactory expression of the godhead of the Son. In the ancient church the whole metaphysical construction of Christianity leads to this point, and from it starts the whole speculative development of the Trinity and the Christology. To Athanasius this dogma was the only true foundation for the absoluteness of the Christian religion. The redemption and salvation of man demand that God has not only revealed himself to man through Christ, but has become man in Christ, has been incarnated. Against the Arian doctrine, that the Son is a creation out of nothing, foreign to the divine substance, not eternal, and not divine, he fought heroically and with all the weapons available. With equal vigor and equal consistency he opposed the older emanatory views of God, which made the world not simply the creation of God, but an element of the divine substance, and God not simply the Ruler of the universe, but an agency involved in the world-process. To this point, the dogmatical centre of Christianity, most of his writings refer. Some of them have an historical character: Apologia contra Arianos, written between 346 and 350; Epist. Encycl. ad Ep. Aeg. et Lib.; Apol. ad Imperat. Const.; Apol. de Fuga sua; Hist. Arianorum ad Monachos; Ep. ad Serap. de Morte Arii, all written after his flight in 356; De Synodis Arim. et Seleuc., written in 359, but containing some later additions. Others have a more dogmatical or polemical character: Orationes IV. adv. Arianos (356); De Decretis Nic. Synod.; De Sententia Dionysii; Expositio Fidei, etc. His exegetical writings, Ep. ad Marcellinum in Interpretationem Psalmorum and Expositiones in Psalmos, are of less interest. More especially referring to the doctrine of the Holy Spirit are the four epistles Ad Serapionem, written during his stay in the deserts; and, to Christology, the epistles Ad Epictetum, Adelphium, Maxim. Philos., as well as the two works Contra Apollinarium and De Incarnatione Dei Verbi, whose genuineness, however, is very doubtful. Of a more general character, or referring to other points of the Christian system, are his two earliest works: Contra Gentes and De Incarnatione; the celebrated Vita S. Antonii; and a number of letters, among which are the so-called Festal-Letters, preserved in a Syriac version. Collected editions of his works have been given by B. DE MONTFAUCON, Paris, 1693, two vols. fol. (the Benedictine edition), to which some additions have been made in Nov. Coll. Patr. f. II.; by GUSTINIANI, Patav., 1777; and by MIGNE in Script. Gr. f. 25-28. The dogmatical works have been edited by THILO: Bibl. Patr. Gr. Dogm. I., Lips., 1853.

ATHANASIAN CREED, The (also called Symbolum Quicumque, after its first word), consists, according to its plan, of two parts, each ending with a damnatory clause. The first part (§§ 1-26) treats of the Holy Trinity, and comprises the doctrine of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit; the second (§§ 27-39) treats of the incarnation of Christ and his work of atonement. The doctrine of the Holy Trinity is given in short and pointed sentences; and the influence of Augustine is apparent. In the second part the influence of the christological controversies (Nestorius and Eutyches) is equally apparent, though no direct polemics is noticeable. The whole creed seems to belong to a time when all controversies concerning these two points had been settled, and the settlement universally accepted as truth not to be controverted any more. It is also characteristic, that both in the introduction, and towards the close, the false view is propounded, that adherence to the formulas of a creed is necessary in order to be saved. — From the latter part of the eighth century Athanasius was generally held throughout the Western Church to be the author of this creed; and its use as the proper doctrinal symbol spread wider and wider, especially on the northern side of the Alps. In the monasteries the monks sung it every day at the prime. The Greeks, on the contrary, who did not become acquainted with it until about the year 1000, rejected it immediately, because it teaches the double procession of the Spirit; and, as they have persisted in rejecting it, it is erroneous to call the symbol œumenical. The first who in the Western Church attacked the authorship of Athanasius was Gerhard Joh. Voss (1642); and it is now generally acknowledged that Athanasius cannot be the author, though great uncertainty prevails with respect to the real author, his date and place. The first certain trace of the symbol is found with Cæsarius of Arles (503-543). He quotes passages from it, and appeals to it as something settled and acknowledged, which circumstance shows that it must have been generally accepted in Southern Gaul towards the close of the sixth century. [But the sermon which contains these passages is probably not the composition of Cæsarius at all. It is found, improperly, among those of Augustine (Migne's ed., Opp. v. ser. 244, p. 1147); and Gieseler says (vol. ii. p. 74) the reference of it to Cæsarius of Arles is a "mere conjecture." Some scholars maintain that Hilary of Arles (420-431) is the author of the creed; but it is of much later date, see below.] Most critics and historians have sought for the author there, though none has succeeded in producing sufficient evidence. G. PLITT.

In the Church of England this creed must be sung thirteen times a year. The damnatory clauses naturally awaken most scruples of conscience. In 1865 a great controversy arose over these clauses; but, although the royal commission were predominantly in favor of removing the compulsion to say it, the obligation yet remains. The controversy, however, produced a prolific literature; and the interesting point was brought out, that there is no certain trace of the creed higher than the eighth century. The rediscovered Utrecht Psalter, which was exhibited in the British Museum in 1873, is the earliest manuscript which contains it; but, according to the best scholars, it is not earlier than the ninth century. The second part of the creed, containing a summary of the Chalcedonian Christology, has been found separately, as a fragment of a sermon on the incarnation, at Treves, in a manuscript from the middle of the eighth century, now known as the Colbertine manuscript, in Paris. It was first published consecutively by Professor Swainson, 1871. The fact that Athanasius spent some time in Treves may possibly have given rise to the tradition that the great champion of the orthodox doctrine of the Trinity composed the whole. The Episcopal Church of the United States struck this creed out of their revised Prayer-Book (1785). See SCHAFF: Creeks of Christendom, vol. i. pp. 34 sqq., where the literature is given, to which add OMMANEY: Early History of the Athanasian Creed, London, 1880.

ATHEISM in the strict sense of the word is a denial of the existence of God. Originally the word, as formed and applied by the Greeks, meant simply a denial of a certain conception, viz., the Greek conception of God; and it was one of the gravest accusations raised by the Pagans against the Christians, that they were atheists, because they denied the existence of those gods which the State recognized. This mistake we find repeated over and over again in history. Romanists consider Protestants atheists, because they refuse to worship Mary as "the mother of God," and to recognize the divine office of the saints. Whenever an idol has fallen before a higher and more spiritual conception of the divine, the idolaters have never failed to cry, "Atheist!" But this mistake is also made in the opposite direction, when various systems of pantheism and positivism are denounced as atheistic, though they do not deny the existence of God, but simply reject that conception of him which has been developed by the Christian theology, or decline to make the question the subject of discussion. It begins, however, to be recognized, that any positive conception of a spiritual cause, though ever so feeble and unripe, is, nevertheless, always one step away from atheism, and a tendency has sprung up to designate every such conception by a name of its own; while the name of atheism is restricted to that state of mind, which, wholly negative, and utterly incapable of any kind of positive construction, must confine itself to a pure, abstract denial, — a state of mind which appears to be the result of complete moral indifference, of moral death. In this, the strict sense of the word, atheism is, of course, of rare occurrence in history, and generally confined to unscientific reporters of what is going on in the field of science; though through this channel it has sometimes penetrated far into social life, and reigned there for a while, half in the form of a fashion and half in the form of a disease, as, for instance, during the last three decades of the eighteenth century. But it is a striking remark of Plutarch (Adv. Colotem XXXI., in Moralia, vol. VI., p. 265, ed. Tauchnitz), and one which holds good this very day: "There has never been a state of atheists. You may travel over the world, and you may find cities without walls, without king, without saint, without theatre or gymnasium; but you will never find a city without God, without prayer, without oracle, without sacrifice. Sooner may a city stand without foundation than a state without belief in the gods. This is the bond of all society and the pillar of all legislation." The intermediate stages, however, between atheism and theism, — such as deism, pantheism, positivism, materialism, etc., — are of much greater importance, and have been the characteristic marks of whole ages, just as they are the characteristic marks of whole sciences. See JOHN CAIRNS: Unbelief in the Eighteenth Century, Edinburgh, 1881.

ATHENAGORAS. Under the titles Ἀθηναγόρου Ἀθηναίου πρεσβεία περὶ χριστιανῶν (a defence of the Christians by the Christian philosopher Athenagoras of Athens) and . . . περὶ ἀναστάσεως νεκρῶν (of the resurrection of the dead), two works have come down to us, whose author is entirely unknown to the tradition of the church. Eusebius, Jerome, and their immediate successors, do not mention him; and, as the survey which Eusebius gives of the apologetical literature of the second century is very elaborate, his silence with respect to Athenagoras could not fail to attract attention. Very early the existence of an apologist of that name was doubted, and the work was ascribed to Justin. This supposition, however, is from internal reasons untenable. The first testimony, and the only one from the third century, of the existence of the apology and the name of its author, is a quotation by Methodius (Epiph. Hæres. 64, c. 21). Some notices by an unknown scribe (Cod. Barocc. 142, fol. 216), quoting from Philippus Sidetes, from the beginning of the fifth century, state that Athenagoras was director of the catechetical school of Alexandria, lived at the time of Hadrian and Antoninus, and was, like Celsus, occupied with searching the Scriptures for arguments against Christianity, when he was suddenly converted; but most of these notices are palpably erroneous. In spite, however, of the entire absence of a tradition, and the close resemblance to the apology of Justin, the date of the work must be placed somewhere in the second century. It is addressed to the emperors Marcus Aurelius and Lucius Aurelius Commodus, and various passages indicate the period between 176 and 178. The treatise on the resurrection, which contains nothing specifically Christian, first appeared in Latin, Venice, 1498, then in Greek, Louvain, 1541. The apology, together with the treatise, first appeared from the press of H. Stephanus, 1557. The principal editions are those by DECHAIR, Oxford, 1706; PRUDENTIUS MARANUS, Paris, 1742; and OTTO in Corp. Apol., T., VIII., Jena, 1857. There are English translations of the Treatise by RICHARD PORDER, London, 1573, and of the Apology by DAVID HUMPHREYS, London, 1714. The Du vray et parfait Amour, écrit en Grec par Athénagoras, traduit par M. Funée Seign. de Génillé, Paris, 1599, is a forgery.

ATHENS. See GREECE.

ATHOS. Of the three peninsulas jutting out into the Ægean from Chalcis, the easternmost ends in the celebrated promontory of Athos. The peninsula is connected with the mainland only by a narrow isthmus, rises rather abruptly from the sea, reaches in the marble peak of Mount Athos a height of six thousand four hundred feet, and is cut in every direction by deep ravines and narrow defiles, and covered all over with dense forest. Since Xerxes dug the canal through the isthmus, numerous classical remembrances gathered around the place, and in the Christian era it became famous as the seat of one of the most celebrated monastic institutions. The origin of this institution, ascribed to the Holy Virgin herself, is wholly legendary. Some historical notices tracing it back to the time of Constantine may contain some truth; but the first reliable account we possess dates from the reign of the Emperor Basilius Macedo, who, by a decree of 885, assumed the protectorate over the hermits of the mountain. According to the Golden Bull, there must have been monastic organizations settled in the peninsula in 924; and in 963 the Abbey of Laura, the eldest of the now existing monasteries, was built by the Emperor Nicephorus Phocas. The Ivoron and the Vatopädi were built in 980; and the constitution issued in 1046 by Constantinus Monomachas mentions one hundred and eighty establishments with seven hundred monks. In the beginning of the twelfth century Mount Athos was at its highest, both as a seat of learning and as a focus of influence. That curious connection between the court and the monastery which characterizes Byzantine history was fully established, and the monks mixed in the most singular manner with politics. But the crusades brought stormy days. The place was sacked several times; and, in spite of their pride of orthodoxy, the Greek monks had to submit to the authority of the Roman pope in order to secure his protection. Though treated with the greatest regard by the popes, who confirmed all their privileges, and spoke of them as a celestial army, the monks of Mount Athos seized the very first opportunity (1313) to throw off their allegiance to the pope; and the Abbey of Amalfitones, founded by the Latin Church, never prospered. From the beginning, however, of the fourteenth century, Mount Athos commenced to decline; and when the Turks conquered Constantinople (in 1453), the monks threw themselves with singular subserviency on the mercy of the Mussulmans, without asking for the aid of Western Europe. They succeeded, however, in maintaining themselves in comparative independence on their territory by paying an annual tribute (five hundred thousand piastres, or, according to others, only seventy thousand) to the sultan. At present there are twenty, or, according to another account, twenty-one monastic establishments on the peninsula, of which seven are of Slavic and the rest of Greek origin. The Laura, Ivoron, Vatopädi, and Russico occupy the first rank, both with respect to size, splendor, riches, and celebrity. The town of Karyäs, with the Monastery of Protaton, stands in the centre of the country. Most of the other monasteries are situated along the coast, and provided each with a small port or harbor for the accommodation of fishing and coasting vessels. These ports are generally fortified, and so are the monasteries themselves, being surrounded with high walls. All the establishments are dedicated to the Holy Virgin, each referring to some special point of her life. The government is very different. Some of the monasteries are governed by abbots (hegumenos), whose power is absolute; in others all the affairs of the establishment are settled at general meetings of the members. This democratic form of government seems to be of very old date among the Athos monks, and is applied to all general affairs common to all the establishments, which are settled by delegates from the various monasteries meeting at Karyäs. The number of inhabitants, of course, varies from time to time: at present it comprises about six thousand ecclesiastics and a few laymen. Not all the monks, however, called by the Greek name calogeri, "good old men," live together in the monasteries. Some of them inhabit huts in the neighborhood, where they practise the severest asceticism; others lead a complete hermit-life in cells in the forests; and some are always travelling about in pursuit of trade, in which activity they are said to evince as much zeal as talent. The principal sources of income, however, are the contributions from the Danubian principalities and from Russia: the proceeds of the garden cultivation, handicraft, and trade, would be insufficient to the maintenance of the establishment. The days when Mount Athos was a seat of learning have passed by long ago. Among the present monks, there are a few who understand a little Old-Greek, and know something about the traditions of the place; but that is about all. The archives and libraries are in complete disorder.

ATONEMENT. I. The Word.—1. The etymology and usage of the English word, (1) Supposed to be derived from "at-one-ment," and its primary signification, "reconciliation;" (2) At present universally used in the sense of "expiation," "satisfaction for an offence," "propitiation," "price of redemption."

2. In the authorized version the word occurs only once in the New Testament (Rom. v. 11), and there is the translation of καταλλαγή, "reconciliation." In the Old Testament it occurs frequently as the translation of רָפָּא, "to cover with sacrificial blood," and hence to "expiate," to "appease," to "purge away," to "ransom."

3. The biblical equivalents of the word. In the Old Testament, רָפָּא to make an atonement (Exod. xxx. 15, 16). קָפָּר a ransom (Exod. xxx. 12), a satisfaction (Num. xxxv. 31, 32). מִצְרִיפִים an atonement (Exod. xxx. 10; Lev. xxiii. 27).

In the New Testament, (1) As it respects sin ἁμαρτία, to expiate, to make propitiation for (1 John ii. 2, iv. 10; Heb. ii. 17; Rom. iii. 25). (2) As it respects the sinner, ἀγοράζειν, to redeem by blood (1 Cor. vi. 20; Rev. v. 9); ἐξαγοράζειν, to redeem from the curse of the law (Gal. iii. 13); λυτροῦν, to release for a ransom, middle voice, to ransom (1 Pet. i. 18; Heb. ix. 12), Christ saves us by being our λύτρον, or ransom.

II. The Doctrine.—1. The Patristic Doctrine.—The Fathers, alike those who immediately followed the apostles, and those who flourished before and after the Council of Nice (A.D. 325), adhered to the sacrificial language of the Old Testament and to the terms used by the apostles in the New Testament; yet they failed to express their views definitely, or to maintain them consistently. It is, however, certain, that, more or less clearly, they always held the doctrine of expiation and satisfaction subsequently held by the whole church (Polycarpus, Ad Philipp., l. 8. Clemens Romanus, Ad Corinthios, 7. 32. Athanasius, De Incarnatione, c. VII. See Outram, Dis. 1, ch. 17); while together with this, and often disguising the more biblical view, there prevailed from the time of Origen (d. 254) to that of Anselm (d. 1109), and especially emphasized by Irenæus, and taught even by Augustine, a belief that Christ was offered to Satan as a ransom in the behalf of men, in whom he had acquired rights of conquest. This they derived from such passages as Col. ii. 15 and Heb. ii. 14.

2. The Anselmic Doctrine.—The view which had been implicitly received by the Fathers was first scientifically defined by Anselm (d. 1109), Archbishop of Canterbury, in his epoch-making book, Cur Deus Homo? He taught that sin is debt (guilt); that, under the government of God, it is absolutely necessary that this debt should be paid, i.e., that the penalty incurred by the guilt of sin should be suffered; that this necessity has its ground in the infinite perfections of the divine nature; that this penalty must be inflicted upon the sinner in person, unless a substitute can be found having all legal qualifications for his office. This was alone realized in Jesus Christ, a divine person embracing a human nature. The best of the schoolmen, such as Bonaventura, Alexander Hales, Albertus Magnus, and Thomas Aquinas, agreed with Anselm, except that, while holding the moral necessity for an atonement, they insisted that God possessed power to forgive sin by mere will, as involved in the metaphysical notion of omnipotence.

Abelard (d. 1142) resolved the moral perfections of God into benevolence and the liberty of indifference. He held that sin could be abolished, and the sinner received into favor, by the simple volition of God. Duns Scotus (d. 1308) denied that sin is an infinite evil, or that the sacrifice of Christ has an infinite value, and held that "tantum valet omne creatum oblatum, pro quanto acceptat Deus illud, et non plus." Hence God accepted (acceptatio) by a sovereign act the work of Christ as a sufficient compensation to his law, instead of the condign punishment of sinners.

The "Reformers before the Reformation," e.g., Wycliffe (d. 1384) and John Wessel (d. 1489) and the ancient Waldenses, held the strict Anselmic doctrine. This has subsequently been adopted in the creeds of the entire Christian Church. Dec. Conc. Trent., sess. 6, ch. 7. "Jesus Christ, who when we were enemies merited justification for us by his most sacred passion on the tree, and satisfied God the Father for us." Cat. Rom. II. 5, 63; Hase, "Libri Symbolici," p. 684 (Form. of Concord.); Heidelberg Cat., ques. 60; Second Helvetic Conf., ch. 15; Galic Conf., art. 18; Belgic Conf., art. 22; Westminster Conf., ch. 8, § 5; Thirty-nine Articles of the Ch. of England, Arts. 28 and 31.

3. The Moral Influence Theory was taught by Abelard, and has since, in various forms, been taught by Socinus, and such Trinitarians as Maurice, Jowett, Bushnell, etc.

According to Abelard, benevolence is the only divine attribute concerned in human redemption. Christ died for the twofold purpose of subduing the rebellion, and removing the guilty fears of men by the transcendent exhibition of divine love.

Socinus adopted this view, and emphasized the additional purpose of the death of Christ as the necessary prerequisite to his resurrection, whereby he brought light and immortality to light (Rac. Cat., p. 265).

Frederick Denison Maurice, in his Theological Essays, London, 1853, and elsewhere, taught that the sufferings and death of Christ were the only complete sacrifice or self-surrender of the spirit and body to God ever accomplished, designed "to illustrate the principle of self-sacrifice as due from all God's intelligent creatures to Him who made them."

Horace Bushnell, in his Vicarious Sacrifice, N. Y., 1866, taught that Christ suffered with us through sympathy and fellowship, the result of which was to give him a moral power over men, spiritually quicken them, and moulding them by his love and example.

McLeod Campbell, in his Nature of the Atonement, London, 1856, taught that Christ has by his sympathy, at once with us and with the righteous law we have broken, so identified himself with us as sinners, that he has offered up to God a perfect confession and adequate repentance of our sins. This repentance meets all the demands of law, which, according to Maurice, are repentance or punishment. This appears to occupy the middle ground between the "moral" and the "satisfaction" theories.

4. The Governmental Theory of the Atonement was first propounded by Hugo Grotius (d. 1645), a great lawyer, in his work against the Socinians: Defensio Fidei Catholicae de Satisfactione Christi. He taught that the law under which man is held is, including precept and penalty, a positive product of the divine will. The right to relax its demands at will belongs to God's prerogative as moral governor. But since the gratuitous remission of the penalty in the case of some sinners would weaken the motives restraining from disobedience the subjects of the divine government in general, by affording an example of impunity, the benevolence of God requires, that, as a precondition of the forgiveness of any sinners, he should furnish such an example of suffering in Christ as will exhibit his determination that sin shall not escape with impunity. This view has been represented subsequently by the Supernaturalists of the last age in Germany, as Stäudlin, Flatt, and Storr, and, in America, by Jonathan Edwards, jun., Smalley, Maxey, Emons, Park, and others.

The Remonstrants, or Arminians, of the seventeenth century in Holland, held substantially the same ground, while they adhered more closely to the use of biblical language and metaphors. Limborch, Apol. Thes. 3. 21, 6. "The death of Christ is called a sacrifice for sin; but sacrifices are not payment of debts, nor are they full satisfactions for sins; but a gratuitous remission is granted when they are offered."

All these various theories which have been propounded in the different schools of Protestant theologians have, in like manner, been advocated in the various schools of Catholic theologians. See OXENHAM: The Catholic Doctrine of the Atonement, London, 1869. 3d ed. 1881.

5. The Mystical Theory, which exists in various forms, may be generally stated thus: The reconciliation effected by Christ is brought about by the mysterious union of God and man, accomplished by his incarnation. This was held by the Platonizing Fathers, by followers of Scotus Erigena during the middle ages, by Osiander and Schwenkfeld at the Reformation, and the disciples of Schleiermacher among modern German theologians.

ATONEMENT, Day of. The directions for its observance are found, Lev. xvi., xxiii. 26-32. Num. xxix. 7-11. On this day the most important acts of the Mosaic cultus were performed for sacrifices were offered as an atonement, and only for the people, but also for the holy place, "because of the uncleanness of the children of Israel, and because of their transgressions in all their sins" (Lev. xvi. 16). Even the "holy place" was rendered unholy by its position in the midst of sinners. It is evident that the acceptance of this expiation rested upon the idea that the people were in covenant relations with Jehovah; and hence it was not made for flagrant crimes, but only for what in the Epistle to the Hebrews are called "errors" (ix. 7, cf. v. 2).

The time of this service was the tenth day of the seventh month (Tisri, i.e., October). The day was significant. It was the tenth day, to indicate the completeness of the atonement; it was the seventh month, because the month closed the festival half of the Mosaic year, and thus in a sense formed its sabbath; it was the tenth day of Tisri, because, said the rabbins, on that day Adam sinned and repented, Abraham was circumcised, and Moses came down from the mount, and made atonement for the sin of the golden calf. The day thus set apart was strictly and solemnly kept; on it, and on it alone, was there a fast enjoined; all work was forbidden on penalty of excommunication; it was a sabbath (Lev. xvi. 29-31, xxiii. 27-29) ("afflict your souls" means fasting in addition to repentance and humiliation).

The ritual of the day was the following, as detailed in Lev. xvi. The high priest must first bathe his entire body (the ordinary washing of hands and feet before sacrificing would not suffice); and then dressed in pure white linen, as prescribed, without his ornaments, — how can man appear before God except in simplicity? and how more appropriately dressed than in white linen, the symbol of holiness? — he placed his own bullock before the entrance of the tabernacle as a sin offering for himself and his house, remembering himself and his first, because he and his must be clean when he enters the presence of Jehovah. He then took the two goats furnished by the congregation, and cast lots upon them, — one lot for Jehovah, and the other for Azazel. [Oehler considers it settled that Azazel was the name of a bad spirit living in the wilderness; but see art. AZAZEL in this cyclopaedia.] The order of the rites is, (1) The sacrifice by the high priest of his own bullock as a sin offering for the priests; (2) He takes a censer full of live coals from off the altar of burnt offering, and two handfuls of "sweet incense beaten small," and, according to tradition, without looking round, he goes into the Holy of holies; there he puts the incense upon the fire, and the ascending smoke is a symbol of prayer, and hence a protection; (3) Leaving the censer yet smoking (in post-exilian times he set it on the stone in the Holy of holies: see ARK OF THE COVENANT), he goes out backwards, says tradition, and fetches the blood of the slain bullock, which he sprinkles with his finger on the east side of the mercy-seat, and seven times upon the floor in front of it; this completes the atonement for the priests; (4) He now begins the same thing for the people. The high priest kills the goat of the sin offering, that is for the people; and (5) Bringing the blood within the veil, sprinkles it as before. This ends the expiatory rites in the Holy of Holies. Now come (6) similar rites in the Tent of Meeting, where he sprinkled the blood of the bullock and of the goat before the altar of incense, and streaked the horns of the altar (Exod. xxx. 10). Meanwhile the high priest was all alone in the court of the holy places, because the presence of another would be a defilement; (7) The atonement for the altar of burnt offerings was made in similar fashion by sprinkling and besmearing with blood; (8) Then followed that singular ceremony of sending the living goat of the two into the wilderness. We read, "When he hath made an end of reconciling the holy place, and the tabernacle of the congregation, and the altar, he shall bring the live goat, and lay both his hands upon its head, and confess over it all the sins of the people." The form of confession, according to the Mishna, was "O Lord, thy people, the house of Israel, have transgressed, they have rebelled, they have sinned before thee. I beseech thee now absolve their transgressions, their rebellion, and their sin, that they have sinned against thee, as it is written in the law of Moses thy servant, that on this day he shall make 'an atonement for you to cleanse you from all your sins, and ye shall be clean'" (Yoma xi. 2). A "fit" man appointed, says tradition, the year before, led the goat away into a district from which there was no return-path. But nothing is said about any injury inflicted upon the goat. It was apparently sufficient to prevent the goat from returning; the idea being, that thus the sins did not return, but God had cast them behind his back. The man who had led the goat could not re-enter the camp until he had washed his clothes and himself.

The high priest then took off his linen garments, washed himself, put on his usual dress, came out of the tent, offered his burnt offering and the burnt offering of the people, and burnt the fat of the sin offering upon the altar. This closed the day's imposing service. And the bullock and goat for the sin offering were carried forth and burnt entire; and he who burnt them must wash his clothes and himself ere he could re-enter the camp. Tradition, for and against which there is nothing decisive, adds, that, after the evening sacrifice, the high priest put on his white linen garments, and returned into the Holy of Holies to fetch out the censer and the bowl.

The meaning of this service is briefly this: the atonement for the people, their priests, and their holy things, is accomplished by blood, for without its shedding there is no remission; and upon this day especially was the idea of reconciliation through blood brought out. There was also a fuller acknowledgment of human weakness and sinfulness than was made by the ordinary sacrifices. The Day of Atonement thus taught the same lesson, only much more impressively, with every sacrifice, — man is a sinner, imperatively needs pardon, can ask for it, and will get it if he rightly asks by shedding blood. The day also looked forward to a far greater day, when the victim should be no bullock nor he-goat, but the blameless Son of God, and the altar of sacrifice should not be of brass, but of wood, — a cross, rude and gory; but the sacrifice itself would atone for the sins of the whole world.

Reference has already been made to the tractate Yoma. In it are elaborate directions for the day; and although they are preliminary, complementary, and supplementary to the Bible, they yet are valuable as exhibiting the usages of the second temple. One point not at all mentioned in the Pentateuch is dwelt on at length,—the preparation of the high priest for the day. He must live for the seven days before the fast in a room of the temple, and go through a daily rehearsal of every rite under the direction of one of the oldest of the Sanhedrin, for fear he should introduce some Sadducean innovation. On the evening of the day he took a solemn oath that he would not in any wise depart from his instructions. He was not permitted to sleep the night before the day, but read, or was read to, out of the Scriptures. In regard to the day itself, there are additional rites and explanations how to perform those prescribed. For instance, the high priest, in his usual dress, offered the morning and evening sacrifices. In each of the three formulæ of confession used, two over the bullock and over the goat, the sacred name was uttered three times; and, as it was used in casting the lot, it was heard ten times. Each time it was spoken, the people and priests prostrated themselves, crying out, "Blessed be his glorious name for ever!" In the second temple's Holy of Holies there was no ark of the covenant; and consequently the high priest was instructed to sprinkle the blood once upwards, and seven times downwards. The stretch from Jerusalem to the wilderness was divided into ten sections: at each was a hut in which was food and water for the refreshment of the man who drove the goat, who was conducted from station to station by appointed guards. The distance was twelve Roman miles. The end of the stretch was a precipice, over which the goat was thrust backwards, and thus killed. Along the route, at distances, on heights, watchers were placed; and thus the arrival of the goat was announced in Jerusalem. As soon as he knew it, the high priest read Lev. xvi. and xxiii. 16 sq., and offered certain prayers. During the reading, the flesh of the offerings was burnt as prescribed. In order that there might be no failure of the rites, a substitute to the high priest was sworn in the day before the Day of Atonement.

It is characteristic of the mingling of superstition and degenerate reverence of later times, that after the ceremonies the high priest made a feast to his friends, who congratulated him on getting through the day alive! The maidens, in white, danced and sang songs in the gardens below Mount Zion, and the young men went there to select their wives. But religious feasting had always closed the day.

Since the destruction of Jerusalem, the Day of Atonement has, of course, not been observed with imposing ceremonial; but yet it is kept up. In place of the sin offering, there is the expiatory prayer, in which there are many beautiful passages. A very curious ceremony is practised among strict Jews. On the day previous to the Day of Atonement, each man takes a cock, and each woman a hen, and, swinging it three times about the head, they each exclaim, May this cock (hen) be my substitute, my atonement! This cock (hen) shall go to death that I may go into the life of the blessed with all Israel. Amen." The fowls are then killed, and given to the poor, or else kept, and their value given.

ATRIUM, in the church-architecture of the earlier centuries, denoted an open space in front of the entrance to the church, surrounded by porticos, and provided with a fountain, or at least a large vessel containing water. Here the penitents who were not allowed to enter the church assembled, and begged the faithful to pray for them.

ATTERBURY, Francis, b. at Milton-Keynes, Bucks, England, March 6, 1662; d. in Paris, Feb. 15, 1732; was educated in Christ Church College, Oxford, where he took his degree in 1687. His brilliant success as a controversialist, and his powerful eloquence in the pulpit, soon attracted attention to him; and he was made a chaplain to William and Mary in 1692, Dean of Carlisle in 1704, Dean of Christ Church in 1712, and Bishop of Rochester in 1713. Having been coldly received as a Tory by George I., he took his place in the foremost ranks of the opposition, refused in 1715 to sign the paper in which the bishops declared their attachment to the House of Brunswick, and began in 1717 to correspond directly with the Pretender, and carried on his intrigues so skillfully that his most intimate friends did not suspect them. But in 1722 his guilt was manifested: he was committed to the Tower, and by an act of Parliament banished for life in March, 1723, and all British subjects forbidden to hold communication with him except by the royal permission. He went to the Continent, and lived most of the time in Paris, in more or less constant correspondence with the Pretender, for whose sake he had suffered so much. He was buried in Westminster Abbey, but no inscription marks the grave. He was a man of a restless and pugnacious character, and of great surface-talent: he had perfect taste, but no conviction, great wit and power of combination, but no learning. He was always wrong; but the mass, which is caught by its prejudices and dragged along by its passions, always declared him right. Confusion was the result of his work. He left four volumes of Sermons, London, 1740, four volumes of Correspondence, London, 1783–87, and a number of controversial pamphlets. See STACKHOUSE. Memoirs of Atterbury, 1727, and article in Encyclopædia Britannica, written by Lord Macaulay.

ATTICUS, b. at Sebaste, in Armenia; repaired early to Constantinople; was made a presbyter; partook, as one of the leaders, in the conspiracy against Chrysostom, and testified against him in the synod at the Oak. Chrysostom was expelled June 10, 404. His successor, the old Arsacius, died Nov. 5, 405, and, after four months of intrigue, Atticus, was elected Patriarch of Constantinople in March, 406, which position he held till his death (Oct. 10, 426). For a long time he refused to place the name of Chrysostom on the diptychs of the church, but at last he was frightened into submission by the public indignation. Four letters of his are still extant, of which one to Cyril, given by Nicephorus (VII. 25), is very characteristic.

ATTO, or HATTO, Bishop of Vercelli, Piedmont, d. about 960; left a number of works, interesting as belonging to the darkest period of the history of the Western Church. They are: I. Statuta Ecclesie Vercellensis, mostly consisting of extracts from older collections, but important to a correct understanding of the state of ecclesiastical affairs at that time. II. De Pressuris Ecclesiasticis, complaining that ecclesiastics are summoned before secular courts; that princes exercise influence on the election of bishops; that the revenues of vacant episcopal sees are seized by the State, etc. III. Polypticus (πολυπτυχος, from its variegated contents) consists of an enumeration of virtues and vices. IV. A commentary to the Epistles of Paul, mostly composed of extracts from Jerome and other Fathers. V. Letters and sermons. Some of these works were incorporated by D'ARCHERY in his Spicilegium, T. VIII. A collected edition was given by BURANTI DEL SIGNORE, Vercelli, 1768, 2 vols., fol. In manuscript Atto's works are found in the library of the Vatican and in the archives of Vercelli.

AUBERLEN, Karl August, b. at Fellbach, near Stuttgart, Nov. 19, 1824; d. at Basel, May 2, 1864; studied in the Seminary of Blaubeuren (1837-41), and theology at the University of Tübingen (1841-44); travelled in 1846-47 through Germany, Belgium, and Holland, and became in 1849 "repent" in theology at the University of Tübingen, and in 1851 professor of theology in Basel. As a young man he was much attracted by the Goethe-Hegel views of life, and very enthusiastic for the criticism of Baur; but the influence of Richard Rothe, who wrote the preface to his first book, afterwards brought him in a more direct and intimate connection with biblical Christianity, and he finally settled down as a member of the old Württemberg circle of theologians.—Bengel, Oetinger, Roos, etc. He published his first work, Die Theosophie Oetingers, Tübingen, 1847, when he was only twenty-three years of age. Then followed, Der Prophet Daniel und die Offenbarung Johannis, Basel, 1854, translated into English, "The Prophecies of Daniel and the Revelation," by Adolph Saphir, Edinburgh, 1856: it is not a commentary, but a sketch of the philosophy of history according to the Bible, and exercised a deep and wide-spread influence. A second or revised ed. of the German appeared in 1857. In 1861 he published the first volume of Die göttliche Offenbarung, an apologetical work, translated into English by Professor Hackett in Bibliotheca Sacra, 1865. A volume of sermons appeared in 1845; a volume of lectures on the Christian faith in 1861.

AUBERTIN, Edme, b. at Chalons-sur-Marne, 1596; d. in Paris, April 15, 1652; was appointed minister to the reformed congregation of Chartres 1618, and of Paris 1627, and published L'Eucharistie de l'ancienne Eglise (2d ed., Geneva, 1633), which attracted much attention, and caused a great deal of controversy.

AUBIGNÉ, Théodore-Agrippa d'; b. near Pons, in Saintonge, Feb. 8, 1552; d. in Geneva, May 9, 1630; grew up under very strong impressions of the persecutions to which the Huguenots were exposed. His first tutor, Jean Cottin, was burnt at Rouen for heresy; his second tutor, Jean Morel, had a brother burnt for the same reason. On the scaffold on which several Protestants had been decapitated, the old D'Aubigné made the son swear that he would hate Romanism as long as he lived, etc. When fifteen years old, he entered a Huguenot regiment, and fought with great distinction in the wars which ended with accession to the throne of Henry IV. After the abjuration of the king, D'Aubigné retired to his estates in Saintonge, and devoted himself to literary work; but, after the death of Henry IV., his position became more and more difficult, and in 1620 he was compelled to leave the country, and seek refuge in Geneva. His two principal works are: Les Tragiques, an epic poem in nine thousand verses, first published in 1616, entirely forgotten during the eighteenth century, but recently republished in three editions, — 1857, 1872, and 1876; and L'Histoire Universelle, treating in prose the same subject as Les Tragiques does in verse; namely, the history of his time from 1550 to 1610. The latter work has had the same fate as the former. Not much read in the days of its publication, and afterwards entirely overlooked, it is now reckoned among the valuable and interesting fruits of French history. AUBURN THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY. This school for the education of candidates for the ministry of the Presbyterian Church is in Auburn, N. Y., midway between Albany and Buffalo, and was established by the Synod of Geneva in the year 1819, and chartered by the Legislature of the State the 14th of April of the year following. The Act of Incorporation contains the proviso that "no student of any Christian denomination shall be excluded from a participation in the privileges of the institution on the ground of his religious persuasion." The seat of the seminary was fixed at Auburn in consequence of a liberal contribution by the citizens towards its endowment. A finely situated piece of ground, including some ten acres, was furnished, which, by the growth of the city, has now become quite central. Upon this ground there was erected in the years 1820 and 1821 the original seminary building, afterwards enlarged at a cost of about forty thousand dollars. It included a chapel and lecture-rooms, and dormitories for sixty or seventy students. It was, however, much below the standard of architectural beauty and convenience now desired in public edifices for similar purposes. These defects were remedied by the erection, in the years 1874 and 1875, of MORGAN HALL, the beautiful and complete building now used. It is five stories in height, two hundred and sixteen feet long by forty-five wide, faces east and west, and provides accommodation for seventy-six students, each having a parlor and bedroom. The whole building is heated by steam, and supplied with gas and water. The lower floor is arranged for a refectory, at which the students board in commons, making arrangements for themselves, by association in a club. The cost of this hall was about a hundred thousand dollars, of which three-fourths was the donation of Col. Edwin B. Morgan of Aurora. Col. Morgan also furnished one half the cost of the DODGE AND MORGAN LIBRARY on the opposite side of the seminary quadrangle; the other half having been previously offered by the Hon. William E. Dodge of New York city. The entire cost of this building, which is one of the finest for its purpose in the country, and is shelved for sixty thousand volumes, was forty thousand dollars.

Students. — The first class of students was graduated from the seminary in 1824. The total of graduates down to the present time (1880) is about eleven hundred. The students engage in evangelistic labors during their course of study, so far as possible; while the cultivation of their own religious life is carefully provided for by weekly meetings for prayer and exhortation, both in common and by the separate classes. Worship is conducted every evening in the chapel, and every lecture or recitation is opened with prayer. The classes in the seminary are senior, middle, and junior; and the course of instruction extends over three years.

Government of the Seminary. — The Auburn Theological Seminary is regarded as the property of the Presbyterian Church. Its financial administration is vested in a body of trustees, who hold the real and personal estate under the provisions of the charter. These trustees are elected by the "commissioners," who compose the co-ordinate body administering the affairs of the seminary. This chamber consists of a representation of two clergymen and one layman from each of the presbyteries constituting the synods of Albany, Central New York, Geneva, and Western New York. These presbyteries are at present nineteen in number; and the board of commissioners therefore consists of fifty-seven members. The commissioners appoint the professors, and, with the concurrence of the trustees, make all necessary appropriations of funds. Each commissioner holds office for three years; one going out, and the presbytery supplying his place by a new election, each year. A body of "examiners," composed of the senior commissioners of each presbytery, attend at the annual examination of the classes at the end of the seminary year in May.

Departments. — The board of instruction in the seminary at present consists of five professors in the several departments of Christian theology, church history and government, biblical criticism, study of the Hebrew language and literature, and the chair of sacred rhetoric and pastoral theology. Each professor, on his inauguration, delivers an address, and subscribes the following pledge: "In presence of the omniscient and heart-searching God I do solemnly and sincerely affirm and declare that I believe the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments to be the word of God, and the only infallible rule of faith and practice; that I do receive and adopt the confession of faith and the catechisms of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America as containing the system of doctrines taught in the Holy Scriptures; that I do approve of the government and discipline of the Presbyterian Church as prescribed in the 'form of government' and 'discipline' of the Presbyterian Church in these United States; and I do solemnly promise to maintain with zeal and fidelity the truths of the gospel, and to be diligent and faithful in all such duties as may devolve upon me as a professor in this seminary, according to the best of my abilities." This pledge indicates unmistakably that the founders of this institution were heartily and unreservedly Calvinistic in doctrine, and Presbyterian in their views of the church. The first corps of professors was drawn from New Jersey, and consisted of divines warmly in sympathy with the seminary at Princeton. Their successors ever since have belonged to the school of the most thoroughly developed evangelical theology. No leaven of Pelagianism or Arminianism has ever found its way into this school.

This statement is rendered necessary by the misconception, somewhat prevalent at one time, that Auburn Seminary was founded in the interest of a loose subscription to the confession of faith, and was designed to be the organ of what was known as the "New-School" type of doctrine. Nothing can be a more emphatic disproof of this idea than the contents of the famous "AUBURN DECLARATION." SAMUEL MILES HOPKINS.

AUBURN DECLARATION. The "Excising Acts," so called, by which the churches within the bounds of the synods of Utica, Geneva, and Genesee, and the Western Reserve, were declared to be "neither in form nor in fact a part of the Presbyterian Church," were passed by the General Assembly in May of the year 1837. On the 17th of August following, a convention of representatives from all the presbyteries in these synods assembled in Auburn to justify themselves against the charges of unsoundness in the faith, and set forth the views in theology they actually held. It consisted of about two hundred leading divines, and a number of distinguished laymen. Of this convention, the Rev. Dr. James Richards, professor of theology in Auburn Seminary, was, with eminent fitness, made president. As the basis for the "Excising Acts," a paper had been presented to the General Assembly containing a list of sixteen heresies alleged to be held by the "New-School" churches. The first of them was this, "that God would have been glad to prevent the existence of sin in our world, but was not able without destroying the moral agency of man; or that, for aught that appears in the Bible, sin is incidental to any wise, moral system." The divines of the Auburn Convention disavowed for themselves and their churches the "heresy" charged, and replied as follows: "We believe that God permitted the introduction of sin, not because he was unable to prevent it consistently with the moral freedom of his creatures, but for wise and benevolent reasons which he has not revealed." In replying to the other charges of heresy, the Auburn Convention pronounced fully in the sense of the Westminster Symbols. With a perhaps unconscious Supralapsarianism, they put the doctrine of election first in order, and ranged all the other facts in the process of redemption after it: so the arrangement suggests that it was the primary purpose of God to save a definite number of men out of a race to be thereafter created; that in pursuance of this purpose man was formed, the fall decreed, and an atonement provided sufficient to meet the case of that predestined number, and no others. No affirmation of the universality of the atonement is found among these sixteen propositions. Original sin, total depravity, vicarious atonement, Christ's intercession for the elect previous to their conversion, absolute dependence upon irresistible divine grace for the renewal of the heart, instantaneous regeneration, etc., all these dogmas are emphatically affirmed. "All who are saved are indebted from first to last to the grace and Spirit of God." "The reason why God does not save all" (the thirteenth proposition affirms) "is not that he wants the power to do it, but that in his wisdom he does not see fit to exert that power further than he actually does." In short, the Auburn Declaration, contrary to the popular belief on the subject, rises well up to the highest-water mark of the Calvinistic theology.

This declaration, it is true, has no symbolical force in Western New York or any other part of the Presbyterian Church. No one is required to subscribe it as a test of his soundness in the faith; but at the same time, having been adopted under circumstances so peculiar, and at so critical a time in the history of these churches, it had the effect of pledging them irreversibly to a loyal adherence to the Westminster Confession. It consolidated the excised portion of the church, invigorated its Presbyterianism, made it jealous of any deviation from doctrinal purity, and placed it in a position to challenge before the highest courts of the country any impeachment of its ecclesiastical standing. From that time there has been no part of the church purer in doctrine, or stricter in government and discipline, than that which in 1837 was abruptly rejected as being neither in form nor in fact a part of the Presbyterian Church. AUDIANS, or ANTHROPOMORPHITES, a Christian sect founded by Audius of Mesopotamia in the fourth century. He appeared first as a moral reformer, and attacked the clergy in his sermons. Having thus awakened their hostility, he finally left the church, with his adherents, and had himself (illegitimately) consecrated bishop. He was then banished to Scythia, but continued to labor there for Christianity, according to his conceptions, to his death, in 372. The heresy of his views consisted in anthropomorphism, which he supported by quotations from the Old Testament, especially Gen. i. 26. The sect disappeared in the fifth century. Different from this sect were the Egyptian monks, who opposed Origen; though they, too, held anthropomorphic views.

AUDIANTIA EPISCOPALIS is the term of the Justinian code for a peculiar arbitral, and for a time, in the fullest sense, even a judicial right given to bishops in civil, not criminal affairs, from the time of the apostles to the middle ages. The instructions of Paul (1 Cor. vi. 1 sq.) and of Christ (Matt. xviii. 15-18) naturally led the early church, in its constitutional development, to take cases before presbyters, and, later, bishops, for arbitration, instead of into the courts. By Justin's time this had become a custom (cf. Junth, De originibus et progressu episcopalis judicii in causis civilibus laicorum usque ad Justinianum. Berolin., 1832, p. 123); and so when, under Constantine, the State recognized the Church, two regulations were issued on this matter. The first (in 321) allowed the parties at any stage of the proceedings to transfer the case to the decision of the bishop (XVII. Const. quas Jac. Sismondus — divulgavit, ed. Hänel. Bonn, 1844). The second (in 331) ordered that not only should the episcopal sentence be obeyed by all temporal magistrates, and be considered conclusive, but that also either party could bring the case before the spiritual authority. The latter extraordinary privilege Arcadius and Honorius in 398 abolished, and reduced the court to ordinary limits again; and in this form, confirmed by Valentinian III. (452), it has passed into the Justinian Code, and in the Orient, at a later day, came into greater prominence and authority. In the West, long before Constantine, the Audientia Episcopalis was familiar, even to the heretical though Christian barbarians. See DOVE: De jurisdictionis ecclesiasticæ apud Germanos Gallosque progressu. Berolin. 1855.

AUDIN, Vincent, b. at Lyons 1793; d. in Paris, Feb. 21, 1851; studied first theology in the seminary of Argentière, afterwards law, but devoted himself finally to literature, and wrote: Histoire de la Saint-Barthelemy, 1826; Histoire de Luther, 1839, 3 vols.; Histoire de Calvin, 2 vols., 1841; Histoire de Henri VIII., 1847; and Histoire de Léon X., 1851.

AUGER, Edmond, b. in La Brie, France, 1530; d. on a voyage to Rome, 1591; entered the Society of Jesu in 1562; became confessor to Henry III. in 1575, and wrote the celebrated Catechisme Français. See his Life by Bailly, Paris, 1652, and by Dorigny, Lyons, 1716, reprinted Avignon, 1828.

AUGSBURG, Confession of. Jan. 21, 1530, the Emperor Charles V. issued letters from Bologna, inviting the German diet to meet in Augsburg April 8, for the purpose of discussing and deciding various important questions,—the war with the Turks, the religious dissensions, etc. As soon as the letter, which was written in very moderate and conciliatory terms, came to hand (March 11), the Elector of Saxony, the head of the Protestant party, on the advice of his chancellor, Dr. Brück, summoned the principal Protestant theologians—Luther, Melancthon, Jonas, etc.—to meet him at Torgau, and charged them with the preparation of a statement of the Protestant faith, to be laid before the emperor at the diet. Melancthon drew up the document on the basis of earlier labors of a similar kind by Luther, and it received the unconditional assent of the latter. It was then signed, not only by the Elector of Saxony, but also by the Margrave of Brandenburg, the Duke of Lüneburg, the Landgrave of Hesse, the Prince of Anhalt, and the magistrates of Nuremberg and Reutlingen, and it was agreed to lay it before the diet as the common confession of the Protestant party. The emperor first demanded that the document should be presented to him in an informal way; but the princes declared that they would not part with it without having it read aloud in the diet. Next the emperor called the session in which the solemnity should take place, not in the large town-hall in which the diet used to meet, but in the small chapel of the archiepiscopal palace, to exclude the public as far as possible. Finally he asked to have it read in Latin; but the elector answered, "We are here on German ground;" and June 25, in the afternoon, it was read aloud to the diet by Dr. Bayer, in German, and so slowly and distinctly that people who had crowded together heard every word. The impression was very deep, even on the Romanists. The original copies of the Confession in Latin and German are lost.

The emperor now ordered the Roman theologians present — Eck, Wimpina, Cochläus, etc. — to prepare a "confutation;" but the first draught he rejected as utterly ineffective, and the answer to the Confession of the Protestants was not read in the diet until Sept. 3. A majority immediately declared that the Protestants had been completely confuted, and they were commanded to conform to the Roman views, which, of course, they declined to do. Meanwhile Melanchthon prepared the "Apology of the Confession," (see below) which Dr. Brück presented to the emperor Sept. 22, but which the emperor refused to receive. It was then printed and published, both in Latin and German, as was also the Confession. It must be noticed, however, that the Confession was not immediately established among the Lutherans as a symbolical book. On the contrary, Melanchthon continued to make changes in it, and thus arose an editio variata and an editio invariata. At the disputation of Worms (1541) Eck called attention to this fact, and in 1561 Flacius denounced the editio variata as altogether too favorable to the Calvinistic views. It is the editio invariata which was taken as basis for the Formula Concordiæ, and which has become the chief symbolical book of the Lutheran Church.

AUGSBURG CONFESSION, Apology of the, prepared by Melanchthon at the instance of the Lutherans as a refutation of the Roman confutation of the Augsburg Confession, read in the diet, Sept. 3, 1530. The Apology was presented to the diet, although not signed by the Lutheran princes, through Chancellor Brück, Sept. 22, but refused. On the 23d Melanchthon left Augsburg, re-wrote the document on his journey, and finished and published it, together with a very free German translation by Justus Jonas, assisted by Melanchthon, at Wittenberg, April, 1531. The original draught has no authority; but the Latin text constitutes a symbolical book of the Lutheran Church. It is seven times as large as the Confession, and greatly superior to it in point of style and learning. It greatly strengthened the confidence of scholars in Protestantism. Its chief value to-day is as an authoritative commentary upon the Augsburg Confession. The books mentioned above all contain an account of it.

AUGSBURG, Interim of. After the Smalkaldian war, Charles V. once more thought of re-establishing religious unity in Germany; and at the diet of Augsburg (1547) it was agreed that a provisional arrangement should be made until the Council of Trent had completed its work. The plan to this provisional arrangement, the Interim, was prepared by Pflug, Bishop of Naumburg, Michel Helding, and Agricola, but was rejected, both by the pope and by the Protestant princes. Nevertheless, after being revised and altered by some Spanish monks, it became a law of the empire (May 15, 1548), and was introduced by force of arms. Of the Protestant princes, only Joachim of Brandenburg and Ludwig of the Palatinate accepted it: the others met it with energetic opposition.

AUGSBURG, The Peace of, was concluded Sept. 25, 1555, and settled the religious question of Germany. The principle of this arrangement was the famous maxim, Cujus regio, hujus religio; that is, the sovereign had the choice between the Augsburg Confession and the Roman Church; and as he chose, all his subjects had to choose. There was no freedom of conscience, but a kind of freedom of territory. People were allowed to move from one state in which their religion was not the religion of the sovereign to another in which it was. Though this arrangement was a most miserable compromise, it was, nevertheless, a great defeat of the policy of Charles V., who had labored all his life to restore the religious unity of the empire; and he was not present in person at the negotiations, but had transferred all his powers to his brother, King Ferdinand.

AUGUSTI, Johann Christian Wilhelm, b. at Eschenberga, in the Duchy of Saxe-Coburg, Oct. 27, 1772; d. at Coblenz, April 28, 1841; studied theology at Jena, and became professor in Oriental literature there in 1803, professor of theology in Breslau 1812, in Bonn 1819, and director of the Consistory of Coblenz in 1828. He was a very active man and a very prolific writer. Among his works are, Denkwürdigkeiten aus der christlichen Archeologie, 12 vols., Leipzig, 1817-31; Lehrbuch d. christl. Dogmengeschichte, Leipzig, 1825; Einleitung in d. alt. Testament, Leipzig, 1827. The most generally used of his works is Handbuch der christlichen Archäologie, Leipzig, 1836-36, 3 vols. He also assisted De Wette in translating the Bible into German (1809-14).

AUGUSTINE, St., Bishop of Hippo. See AUGUSTINUS.

AUGUSTINE, or AUSTIN, St., the first Archbishop of Canterbury: nothing is known of his early life. In 596, when he was the abbot of the monastery of St. Andrew at Rome, Gregory the Great (590-604), who for many years had taken deep interest in the English, sent him at the head of forty of his monks to England to convert the Anglo-Saxons. They met so many obstacles on their way to the coast, that they returned, and asked to be excused. But Gregory sent them again; and at last they landed at Ebbe's Fleet, on the Isle of Thanet. Ethelbert, the Saxon king, had married a Christian, Bertha, a daughter of Charibert, King of Paris, twenty years before; and thus the way was providentially opened. Ethelbert was baptized (597), and his tribe was Christianized. Augustine went to Arles, whose metropolitan consecrated him the first Archbishop of Canterbury. A deputation he sent to tell Gregory the good news returned laden with presents, and bearing the pallium, which made Augustine independent of the bishops of France. Gregory's dream of converting the entire island to the Roman Church was not realized. The British bishops of Cornwall and Wales refused to obey the Roman bishop. But, though unsuccessful in a measure, much had been accomplished when, in 604 or 605, Augustine died. He was afterwards canonized on the ground of a reputed miracle, — curing a Saxon of his blindness.

AUGUSTINE, Sister (Amalie von Lasaulz), b. at Coblenz, Oct. 19, 1815; d. in the Hospital of Vallendar, Jan. 28, 1872; entered the mother-house of the Sisters of Charity at Nancy in 1838, but felt herself drawn towards an active life of charity, mercy, and self-sacrifice, rather than towards the monotonous devotion of the monastery, and labored from 1842 to 1849 in the hospital of Aix-la-Chapelle, from 1849 to 1871 as superioress of the Hospital of St. John at Bonn. In the Schleswig-Holstein and Austro-Prussian wars of 1864 and 1866 she distinguished herself by her great talent of organization; and her strong personality and sound judgment, no less than her deep and genuine piety, brought her in connection with many prominent men. But she was unable to accept the new dogmas of the "Immaculate Conception" and the "Infallibility of the Pope;" and her church, which considers absolute submission to its doctrinal decisions as essential, called her a heretic. In 1871 she was deposed, and transferred to Vallendar; and, when she died, the usual burial-rites were denied to her remains. AUGUSTINIAN MONKS AND NUNS. After receiving baptism, Augustine and some friends of his retired to the neighborhood of Tagaste for the purpose of leading a purely spiritual life. Evodius, Alypius, and Severus came with him from Italy: they were joined by Profuturus, Fortunatus, Possidius, Urbanus, Bonifacius, and Peregrinus. The community was formed in 388; and the rich donations of Bishop Valerius of Hippo, and, still more, the accession of Augustine to the episcopal chair, soon made it very flourishing. In the beginning, the Gospels served as the only rule. The one hundred and ninth and two hundred and eleventh Epistles of Augustine (Bened. edit.), dating from the year 423, give only the rules for the nuns of Hippo. When and where the so-called rules of Augustine originated is uncertain; but they belong, at any rate, not to him. Similar communities were often formed in Italy, such as the John-Bonites, the Hermits of Tuscany, the Britinians, etc., of which especially the last-mentioned distinguished themselves by a high degree of austerity. These communities were united by Innocent IV., who, by a bull of Jan. 17, 1244, gave them the rules of St. Augustine. Alexander IV. was very anxious to further consolidate the union. Lanfranc Septala of Milan was made general of the order; and four provincials, respectively for Italy, Spain, France, and Germany, were appointed. By a bull of April 13, 1256, the whole organization was sanctioned. After this time the order spread rapidly. In the beginning of the fifteenth century it numbered forty-two provinces, besides the vicarates of India and Moravia, two thousand monasteries, and thirty thousand monks. In 1567 Pius V. gave it the same rank and privileges as the mendicant orders.

The Augustinian nuns formed their first community at Hippo, under Perpetua, the sister of Augustine. An outline of their rule is given in the two hundred and eleventh letter of Augustine. An Augustinian nunnery was founded at Venice in 1177 by Alexander III., which the Princess Julia, a daughter of the Emperor Frederick I., entered as its first abbess. The celebrated Nunnery of Tournoy was founded in 1424 by Pierre de Champion.

By degrees, as the order spread and grew rich, laxity and corruption crept in; and, as a re-action, independent congregations were formed at Illiceto and Carbonaria towards the close of the fourteenth century, at Perouse and in the Lombardy in the beginning of the fifteenth century, in Saxony in 1492, etc. At attempt at a radical reform was made in Portugal by Thomas à Jesu, who died in 1582. The result was the formation of the congregation of the Barefooted Augustinians. Their rules were first introduced in the Monastery of Talavera. Their organization was finally completed, and confirmed by Gregory XV. in 1622. They spread much in Japan, the Philippines, Peru, etc. In Spain every province had a hermitage, to which those who wished to live as anchorites could retire, and find perfect solitude and seclusion. Johann Staupitz, well known in connection with Luther, became vicar-general of the order in Germany in 1515; but it was just Luther's appearance; which in Germany brought the order in speedy decadence. In the nineteenth century a great number of the monasteries of the order have been secularized; in 1850, however, there were still about one hundred left in Italy and in France.

AUGUSTINUS, Aurelius, Bishop of Hippo-Regius. Sketch of his Life—He was the son of Patricius, a heathen, and Monica, a most devoted Christian, at Tagaste (Tajelt), in Numidia, Nov. 13, 353, and died at Hippo, North Africa, Aug. 28, 430. To Monica he owed his warm, loving nature; and by her prayers he was converted. His early life was unsettled. After learning the rudiments in his native place, his ambitious father, delighted with his progress, sent him, in his sixteenth year, to Carthage, where he studied for three years. The now lost Hortensius of Cicero awoke his love of truth; and he began to study the Bible, but soon gave it up because its style displeased him. From this time until his conversion he restlessly strove to attain the highest good, but failed, although he found for a time satisfaction in various schools of thought. Manichæism first allured him; and from 373 to 383 he was one of the auditors, or catechumens, in that sect. But the immorality of the electi, who were supposed to be saints, and the perceived shallowness of the system, drove him for a while into scepticism, from which, however, Neo-Platonism saved him. Meanwhile he taught rhetoric in Tagaste and in Carthage—where he published his first work, The Fit and the Fair, in 380—and in Rome. As a teacher he was not successful in maintaining order, nor in making money; yet the ability he evinced induced Symmachus, the Prefect of Rome, to send him to Milan in answer to a request for a professor of rhetoric. There he heard Ambrose; and there, too, he was converted (September, 386), at the age of thirty-three, and was baptized at Milan Easter Eve, April 25, 387. On the journey homeward Monica died, at Ostia; and the sorrow thereby caused is renewed to each reader of the Confessions. Disposing of his property, he began in Tagaste an ascetic life; but in 391 he was elected priest to the church of Hippo-Regius, and in 395 became the colleague of Bishop Valerius, and shortly after full bishop. If the romance of his life was in the early period, the value of it was in the later. From his diocese a relentless war was waged upon every heresy. Manichæans and Donatists, Pelagians and Semi-Pelagians, fell under his blows; and the writings he produced amid the heat of these controversies have made him immortal, and have tempered the theology of all after-time. But his two most celebrated and interesting works are the Confessions—in which he reviewed his life up to the time of his conversion so humbly, so honestly, so wonderingly, that the book is a religious classic as well as the most reliable autobiography—and the City of God, in which he showed that the Church of Christ is the survivor of the wreck of Rome, and thus sent comfort to those, who, with Jerome, mournfully exclaimed, "Who is safe when Rome falls?" The closing years of Augustine's life were troubled. He saw the Vandals overrunning North Africa, and was compelled to lead in the desperate defence of Hippo. But God mercifully took him away ere the city fell, and spared him so great a grief. In the beginning of the sixteenth century his remains were carried from Hippo to Sardinia; in the beginning of the eighteenth century Liutprand, King of the Lombards, interred them in the Church of St. Peter in Pavia, where they remained until Oct. 12, 1841, when the Bishop of Pavia formally gave them over to the Bishop of Algiers, who carried them to Hippo, which was near the present Bona, and buried them there within a memorial chapel, Oct. 30, 1841.

Augustine is himself the source of all our knowledge of his sinful life before his conversion. He joined a dissolute company of youths when he was sixteen (Conf. II., 4, 9); and before he was nineteen he was the father of a son, Adeodatus (God-given), by his mistress (IV., 2, 2). For twelve years they lived together, mutually faithful; and he says his heart was "racked, and wounded, and bleeding," when he sent her back to Africa, because she stood in the way of his marriage (Conf. VI., 15, 25, cf. 14, 23). But his betrothed lacked two years of the marriageable age; and Augustine, finding the delay unbearable, took another mistress, and kept up this new connection until, in his thirty-third year, the hand of Christ finally lifted him above the temptations of the flesh, and the light of the gospel illumined his heart. The Church may in a sense rejoice that Augustine was the servant of sin; for he was able to strengthen his brethren after his conversion as he could not have done had he not known from long and bitter experience, that he who sinneth against God wrongeth his own soul. But in judging him we must bear in mind that he was at the time a heathen, and comparatively innocent, according to heathen standards of morality. After his conversion, he not only renounced all illegitimate intercourse, but devoted himself to a single life, for the sake of the kingdom of God, and never broke his vow.

Augustine is one of the doctors of the Universal Church. He is, perhaps, the most prominent leader in the development of doctrine, and to many the successor of the apostles. Luther and Calvin, in the doctrines of sin and grace, are essentially Augustinian. The Protestant emulates the Romanist in paying him honor. But, though a fountain of sweet water, he gave out bitter water too; for many of the errors of Rome, her deference to human authority, her doctrines of the church, tradition, baptismal regeneration, and the right of persecution, can be either traced directly to him, or deduced from his writings. He was pre-eminently a preacher; was in the habit of composing rapidly; and so, if many of his works were very deliberately written, many more were not, and the necessity of making up his mind quickly may have weakened his judgment. Although he was not a scholar like Jerome, for he knew little Greek and no Hebrew, he had a deeper spiritual insight into the Scriptures than any other of the Fathers. Genius, more than learning, gave him light. With all his defects, he claims the reverence of the world. Never was a man more determined and fearless in the defence of the truth; never breathed a purer, nobler spirit. The pride of the mother in her converted son is the pride of Christendom in the devotion of his splendid intellect and marvellous executive ability to the service of Christ. To understand Augustine is to understand all the preceding history of philosophy and theology, and at the same time the sources of subsequent progress. Thus he is the dividing line between the Church of the persecution and the Church of the empire. He ended the old, and began the new period of her development.

Bibliography.—Augustine's writings may be divided into—(a) Autobiographical: Confessions, Retractions, and Letters; (b) Polemical: treatises against the Manichæans, the Donatists, and Pelagians and Semi-Pelagians; (c) Dogmatical: Enchiridion, and other doctrinal treatises; (d) Exegetical: Commentaries upon large portions of the Bible; (e) Practical: sermons and ethical treatises.

Editions of Augustine's Works.—For list see BRUNET: Manuel du Libraire, Paris, 1860-65, 5 vols. (vol. I., col. 557-567). The best edition for all practical purposes is the Benedictine, Paris, 1670-1700, 11 vols. folio; reprinted by Gaume fratres, Paris, 1836-39, 11 vols. 8vo.; and by Migne, Paris, 1841, 10 vols. 8vo.; 2d ed., 1863, 11 vols. His most important works and his letters are translated in the Augustinian Library, edited by the Rev. Marcus Dods, M. A., and published by Messrs. T. and T. Clark, Edinburgh, 1872-76, 15 vols. 8vo. His Confessions, revised from a former translation, and edited by Rev. Dr. Pusey, and many of his sermons and homilies, are translated in the Library of the Fathers, Oxford, 1839-55, 12 vols. 8vo. (The two series supplement one another.) Dr. Shedd has reissued, with an introduction, an old English translation of the Confessions, Andover, 1860.

Biographies.—The Confessions constitute Augustine's autobiography down to his return to Africa (388), while the Retractions (427) review his entire literary life. But his pupil, Possidius, about 432, gave to the world the first Vita Sancti Augustini, published by the Benedictines (Tom. x., Appendix, pp. 257-280), along with their own (Tom. xi., pp. 1-492, in Migne, Tom. I., pp. 66-578). G. MORINGO: Vie de Saint-Augustin, Paris, 1553; RIVIVS: Vita Sancti Augustini, Antwerp, 1646; TILLEMONT: Mémoires Ecclésiastiques, Paris, vol. xiii. 1702; P. Augustine's Theology. Augustine closed the discussion upon the Trinity and Christology, and opened it upon Anthropology, a new path. This was characteristic, for he viewed religion practically rather than theoretically.

(1) Theology Proper.—He taught not only an economic, but an immanent Trinity, and endeavored to show the necessity of personal freedom to the construction of the divine self-consciousness and self-love (complacency). Self-consciousness could only arise when the image of the memoria was stamped by the voluntas upon the intellectus. The Father was the memoria, the Son the intellectus, the Holy Spirit the voluntas, which bound them together; but because these three are three modes of existence, having the same contents, the same essence in different forms, in them exists the essence of God, in whose triune nature there is no conflict, but complete consciousness and perfect equality. Thus the idea of the Trinity was for the first time clarified. Subordinationism was ruled out. Each person had an equally important part.

(2) Christology.—Christ is the mediator between God and man and deus et homo, but not a proper deus-homo, because, according to his views, an entire union is possible only at the cost of one nature or the other. Both natures, he thinks, stand by themselves, or only speak together in the Person. The human nature assumed as much divinity as possible, but did not give up its humanity. A complete revelation of the Word is impossible, because the divine cannot appear completely in the human. His formulae were decisive for Leo, also for Chalcedon (451), and of great weight for all subsequent investigations.

(3) Doctrine of the Eucharist. — It is the meal through which the recipient is incorporated into the body of Christ, — the church, — and so into Christ. The sacrifice offered up in the Supper was the self-sacrifice of the corpus, the church. It cannot be proved that he taught the doctrine of the "Real Presence;" since he did not allow omnipresence to the body of Christ, understanding the expression figuratively of the church.

(4) Doctrine of Sin. — Seeking to exclude both Manichæan and Pelagian one-sidedness, he accented man's inability through sin, and contracted as much as possible man's liberty. Evil is privation, negation, and a weakening of all spiritual power, particularly of the will: good is positive, and the effect of God's activity. He only allows so much liberty of choice as is absolutely necessary to free God from the charge of the authorship of evil. At the fall, man made a bad choice, and the consequences are hereditary. Yet man has the capacity of salvation, since the natura is not itself bad, only impaired; the intelligence is sunk in ignorantia, and the will in infirmitas. In Adam the race had a sort of pre-existence; and thus, when he fell, all fell. Sin is a permanent tendency in man, fundamentally wrong, a turning-aside from God. This opposes the Pelagian idea of an equilibrium, — the ability to turn in either direction. Sin in the genus is shared by every individual. Punishment and guilt are therefore hereditary. The former was the necessary and natural consequence of sin, and at the same time the exhibition of the divine righteousness: its ground was guilt. Yet God angers not, for he is unchangeable. He simply orders that sinful man as the weaker shall, according to the laws of Nature, come under the power of the Devil as the stronger. This captivity is as hereditary as sin, and so the race has been since the fall a massa perditionis.

(5) Doctrine of Grace. — Grace exists only in the activity of God upon the will and intelligence, giving them a new direction. Grace inspires the subject directly, but only in the line of his natural ability. Redemption is deliverance from the power and authority of the Devil, death, and sin. Christ paid a ransom to the Devil, and wrought complete deliverance from punishment, and at the same time from the infirmity of intellect and will. Thus he brings into prominence the activity of God among men, especially in the impartation of love and knowledge. But this conception of justification is quite different from the Reformers'; viz., deliverance from guilt, by which access is opened unto God. He lays no such stress upon guilt in its immediate relation to God, because he does not make enough of personality. He makes salvation depend upon the action of God upon the powers of the soul. Therefore the relation of justification to sanctification is of secondary importance, and the main thing is to determine how far the human and divine powers respectively operate in conversion.

(6) Doctrine of Faith. — He teaches a double sort of faith, one both mystic and historic, existing at the same time. The former sort is the effect of the power of God upon the intellect: the latter is called forth by contemplating the work of Christ.

(7) Doctrine of Love. — Love rests alone upon the inspiration of God. It is the enlightenment of faith, and a purely divine work. It is the source of every good deed. Union with God depends upon it. It cannot be entirely free from fear, for salvation depends upon it. The feeling of separation from God is not entirely overcome, and justification itself is a growth. Hence we must strive to love in order to be holy, to be fully united to God, and share in his love. The uncertainty of salvation is an incentive.

(8) Doctrine of Predestination. — God determines who shall belong to the elect, and who shall not. The elect are chosen that they may receive his grace: for in consequence of the fall all have forfeited this favor, and no claim can be made by any upon it; but God is willing to bestow it upon some. No one can tell whether he is of the number or not. On Christ, as the First-Elect, all depends. This is according to the predestined plan. In God's eyes the predestined one is a filius pacis before his actual conversion. The plan of God embraces all events. The doctrine of predestination includes the idea of its historical application, which is effected by external causes. And because the ordinances of religion, etc., are external causes, therefore we should despair of none, but labor on the supposition of their predestination. The non-predestinated are justly rejected because they refuse the very means employed for their recovery; and, when we bear in mind the damning nature of sin, their condemnation has no element of injustice in it.

(9) Doctrine of the Church. — Just as there was a double sort of faith, so the conception of the Church is double. On the practical side, it is the objective institution for salvation; while, on the mystical side, it is the community of the predestinated. The visible Church has good and bad elements. He commonly, however, views the Church in its eternal aspects. Out of it there is no salvation, because in it alone are the Holy Spirit and the means of grace. Ordination infallibly imparts the Spirit: therefore the priest is distinguished from the layman as one who can mediate the grace of God, and offer the eucharist. The individual is linked, not only to the whole body, but also to the priest as the representative of the body. In like manner the validity of baptism is independent of the baptizer. Heretics and schismatics can baptize, but only as one uses stolen goods; for baptism has its blessing only in the Church. Preaching and the Lord's Supper are also similarly dependent for their blessing upon the Church. Membership in the visible Church is a condition of salvation, and unbaptized infants are damned. The Church through her priests shares in the divine Spirit and complete holiness. Thus Augustine teaches essentially the Roman Catholic idea of the Church.

Augustine's Ethics. He lays little stress upon nature and science, property, marriage, the family, and the state: in short, he regards all earthly things as comparatively worthless. On the other hand, he regards the cloister life as the very summit of piety. But this is only one side of his ethics. God's worldly activity is concentrated in the visible Church. The ethical sphere, which belongs to the transient, and is eaten into by sin, can only be purified by the Church. Marriage, the foundation of the family, must be a sacrament, so that it may receive the consecration of the Church. To give property to the Church is a meritorious work. Science must be kept in the right way by the Church. The State can be looked at as a morally worthy institution only when placed at the disposal of the Church.

It is erroneous to credit Augustine with the ideas causative of the Reformation. The emphasis upon the moral personality, from whence alone was possible the demand for liberty of conscience; the emphasis upon guilt and the consciousness of guilt; the striving after immediate certainty of salvation; the central position of the doctrine of justification, and the clear distinction between the legal and the evangelical stand-points,—all these are wanting in him. [But his anti-Pelagian writings and his doctrines of sin and grace had a very marked influence upon the reformers, who esteemed him above all other fathers.]

He must, however, be credited with recognizing, as no one before had done, the world-conquering might of Christianity. Discarding the old notion that the world moved in æons, Augustine looked beyond the present, and saw adown the long gallery of time the grand consummation, when the many kingdoms of the world shall become the one kingdom of our Lord and of his Christ; and the Eternal City, fully established, is not heathen Rome, but the "City of God," the New Jerusalem!

AUGUST DORNER.

AURELIAN, Roman emperor 270-275, was, according to an old tradition in the church, the author of the ninth of those ten great persecutions generally spoken of by Christian writers. This tradition, however, seems to rest on a misunderstanding. In his church history (VII., 30), to which all later accounts can be referred as to their source, Eusebius says only, that, towards the close of his reign, the emperor changed his views of the Christians, and was about to act upon this change when he died. He speaks neither of the actual issue of an edict, nor of its execution, but simply of a purpose, a plan; and this corresponds better to the character of the man and to the given situation. Aurelian was a soldier, and much occupied with military affairs during his reign; and though he was much devoted to his parental faith, even to its superstitions, Christianity held, since the time of Gallienus, a publicly guaranteed position in the state, which makes even the plan of a general persecution rather improbable.

AURELIUS, Marcus. See MARCUS AURELIUS.
AURICULAR CONFESSION (Lat. auricula, the external ear), confession into the ear of a priest in private, enjoined by Leo the Great (440-461) as a substitute for public confession. The twenty-first canon of the Fourth Lateran Council (1215), under Innocent III., makes it obligatory every year upon all Catholics, on pain of excommunication, and consequently the loss of Christian burial. See CONFESSION.

AURIFABER, Johann (Vinariensis), b. in 1519, probably in the county of Mansfeld; d. at Erfurt, Nov. 18, 1575; studied theology in Wittenberg, and became Luther's famulus, and afterwards court-preacher in Weimar, and minister in Erfurt. He partook with great zeal in the theological controversies of his time, but became most widely known as an editor of Luther's works. He was one of the superintendents of the Jena edition (1555-58), and published two volumes of Luther's German works (1564-65), two volumes of Luther's Latin letters in 1556 and 1565, and Tischreden oder Colloquia Dr. Martin Luthers in 1566.

AUSTRALASIA. This name is etymologically equivalent to Southern Asia; but correct usage limits it to the Continent of Australia, the Island of Tasmania, the Islands of New Zealand, and the small islands near each of the colonies. The mainland is bounded on the north by Torres Straits, the Gulf of Carpentaria, and the Indian Ocean; on the east by the South Pacific; on the south by Bass Strait, which separates it from Tasmania; and on the west by the Indian Ocean. It is situated to the south-east of Asia, between the parallels of 10° and 39° south latitude, and in east longitude between the meridians of 113° and 154°. Its greatest length is about twenty-four hundred miles: its greatest breadth is nearly two thousand miles. It has a coast line of 7,750 miles in length. The area is three million square miles, or nearly six times as large as India, or four-fifths the size of Europe, or almost half that of South America.

Position of the Colonies.—The whole of the eastern part of the Australian Continent consists of three colonies,—Queensland, in the north, with Brisbane as its capital; New South Wales, south of Queensland, having Sydney for capital; Victoria, south-west of New South Wales, Melbourne being the metropolis. To the west lies South Australia, stretching from ocean to ocean, the northern part of which is now known as the Northern Territory. The capital of South Australia is Adelaide. The whole of the western part is occupied by Western Australia: capital, Perth. Tasmania is one hundred and twenty miles south of Victoria, across Bass Strait, and is surrounded by the South Pacific Ocean: Hobart Town (called since 1880 Hobart) is the capital. The islands of New Zealand are to the south-east of the Australian Continent, twelve hundred miles distant, Wellington being the capital.

General Features.—The exact date of the discovery of Australia is doubtful. In 1606 Dutch sailors explored the north and west coasts. In 1642 Abel Tasman discovered Tasmania and New Zealand. Capt. Cook's well-known explorations began in 1770. The first settlement was that of New South Wales, in 1783, from which nearly all the neighboring colonies were planted. Tasmania, or Van Dieman's Land, was settled in 1803; Western Australia, or Swan River, in 1829; Queensland, or Moreton Bay, in 1825; Victoria, then known as Port Philip, in 1834; South Australia, 1836; New Zealand, 1838. The precise number of aboriginal inhabitants in early times is not known. They have been fast disappearing before the advance of civilization: indeed, the Tasmanians are now extinct. The Maories of New Zealand are much superior mentally and physically to the native races of the neighboring colonies. The general characteristics of the continent and islands are now pretty well ascertained. The districts near the coast and the settled parts inland are fertile, but large tracts of the interior are unfit for occupation. Navigable channels are comparatively few; and the alternation of rainy and rainless periods, of flood and drought, is destructive. In these respects New Zealand and Tasmania are more favorably situated. The seasons are the reverse of those in Europe and America, June being midwinter. The hot winds and dust in summer are trying on the continent, but during the greater part of the year the climate is genial and healthy. The mean temperature ranges from 70° in Queensland to 51° in Tasmania. The kangaroo and the opossum are the best known of the numerous marsupials of Australia. Snakes are plentiful, and sharks abound along the coast. Each colony is a sort of distinct province, having a governor and Houses of Parliament of its own, on the model of the British Constitution. Wool is the grand staple product, mining and agricultural interests probably ranking next. In 1788 the first settlement consisted of about a thousand persons; in 1859 the population, including Tasmania and New Zealand, was about a million; in 1877, two million and a half. It is now, at the beginning of 1881, probably about three millions. In railway, telegraph, and postal arrangements, Australia has rapidly advanced; and there are three lines of subsidized mail-steamer between the colonies and Great Britain. The social condition of the people compares not unfavorably with that of England and America. In regard to education the colonies are thoroughly impressed with their responsibilities. The public-school system is generally unsectarian, free, and compulsory; while the higher training is admirably provided for by numerous colleges and well-equipped universities. There is no Established Church; and State aid to religion is now almost wholly abolished. New South Wales ceased to grant it in 1863; Victoria, 1869. The Episcopalians are the most numerous body: the Roman Catholics rank next. The proportion of places of worship of the various sects to the population is remarkable, considering the recent settlement of the colonies.

Special Characteristics of the Several Colonies. — In the following descriptive details the statistics of each colony are from the latest available official returns. In the absence of a uniform census for the whole group, the figures represent, as the reader will easily note, a more recent date in some cases than in others.

New South Wales, the mother-colony, originally comprised all of the continent east of the 135th meridian; but the formation into separate colonies of South Australia in 1836, of Victoria in 1851, and of Queensland in 1859, has reduced it to a more moderate size. Its area is now given at 323,437 square miles, being about three times that of Great Britain and Ireland. The coast district, which is a strip of varying width, extending back to the Dividing Range, or Blue Mountains, is the chief agricultural, as the interior is the chief pastoral, land of the colony. The loftiest mountains are Kosciusko (7,308 feet), Seaview (6,000 feet), Ben Lomond (5,000 feet), and Oxley's Peak (4,500 feet). Among the immense level tracts of the interior are the Liverpool and Monaro plains. The great rivers are the Murray, the Murrumbidgee, the Darling, and the Lachlan. On June 30, 1879, the population of New South Wales was estimated at 712,019; that of Sydney and suburbs amounted to 200,000. The other important towns are Maitland, Goulburn, and Bathurst.

Miscellaneous Religious Intelligence. — Rev. Richard Johnson, Church of England, the first clergyman in Australia, arrived 1788. The Rt. Rev. W. G. Broughton was installed first bishop of Australia June 2, 1836. The present (1881) Metropolitan of Australia, who is Bishop of Sydney, is Rev. Dr. Frederick Barker. The first Presbyterian Church was opened in 1809. The first Wesleyan class-meeting was held in 1812; the first minister, Rev. Samuel Leigh, arrived 1815. The first Congregational minister, Rev. Mr. Cover, arrived 1798. The first Baptist chapel, founded by Rev. J. Saunders, was opened in 1835. The returns of the principal religious sects for 1878 are as follows: —

RELIGION.	Ministers.	Places of Worship.	Average Attendance.
Episcopalians . . .	207	410	65,388
Presbyterians . . .	83	149	20,142
Wesleyans	89	269	32,683
Congregationalists . .	37	43	6,909
Baptists	14	18	2,550
Roman Catholics . . .	164	273	60,769

Victoria. — Till 1851 this colony was part of New South Wales, from which it is separated by the River Murray. Its area is about 88,198 square miles, a little less than that of Great Britain. A range of mountains divides it into two unequal parts, the highest peaks rising to six thousand and seven thousand feet. It has no large rivers; the Gipps-Land streams and the Yarra-Yarra being the only ones of importance. The climate of Victoria is healthy and agreeable: the average temperature is nine degrees higher than in London. Although one of the youngest, Victoria is one of the most important, of the colonies: commercially it is probably next to India among British dependencies. In 1835 the white population was fourteen; in June, 1879, it was 887,434, Melbourne and suburbs numbering 260,678. Ballarat and Sandhurst are the other principal cities. Capt. Cook was the first European who visited the country, April 19, 1770. The first settlement was made in 1788. The native population was at that time about 5,000; but in 1851 it had sunk to 2,093; in 1875, to 1,553. It seems that the natives were completely incapable of a rapid civilizatory development. The religious returns of 1878 showed the chief denominations as follows:—

RELIGION.	Ministers.	Churches, Chapels, Etc.	Attendance.
Episcopalians . . .	161	485	43,154
Presbyterians . . .	156	677	65,740
Wesleyans . . .	140	823	92,930
Independents . . .	48	93	8,395
Baptists . . .	40	78	9,255
Roman Catholics . . .	94	454	61,902

Queensland, formerly known as Moreton Bay, occupies the north-east part of the continent of Australia, comprising 669,520 square miles, or fully three times the area of France. Unlike most of the other colonies, it is well-watered; some of the rivers being broad and navigable. The soil is favorable for the cultivation of tropical productions, such as sugar, coffee, tobacco, olives, rice, maize, spices, and arrowroot. Gold, copper, tin, and coal are the chief minerals. The climate resembles that of Madeira: it is very warm, except on the large table-lands, where it is more moderate. The winters are delightful. The population of Queensland on Dec. 31, 1878, was estimated at 210,510; that of Brisbane being 35,000. The other chief towns are Ipswich, Maryborough, and Rockhampton. The leading sects were thus represented in 1876: Episcopalians, 61,962 adherents; Presbyterians, 18,947; Methodists, 11,065; Lutherans, 12,174; Roman Catholics, 43,147.

South Australia.—The area of this colony is now estimated at 903,690 square miles. It has much variety, both of soil and climate, and considerable mineral wealth in copper, lead, and iron. The population at the end of 1878 was 262,000, Adelaide containing 60,000. The number of churches and chapels that year was 708, with accommodation for over 137,000 persons. The census of 1876 gave the principal denominations as follows: Episcopalians, 56,100; Presbyterians, 14,651; Wesleyans, 36,040; Lutherans, 17,129; Baptists, 10,460; Congregationalists, 8,720; Roman Catholics, 32,668.

Western Australia is the largest of these colonies, being estimated at 978,299 square miles. The climate is one of the finest and most salubrious in the world: its mortality has averaged only about one per cent. At the end of 1878 the population numbered 28,166. Perth and Fremantle are the chief towns, the former containing 7,120 inhabitants. Fully a half of the people of the colony were returned as Episcopalians, more than a fourth Roman Catholics, and about five per cent Wesleyans, the other sects being poorly represented. About the end of 1879 the first Presbyterian minister of the colony came out from Scotland.

Tasmania, formerly called Van Dieman's Land, is situated between 40° 33' and 43° 39' south latitude, and 144° 39' and 148° 23' east longitude. Comprising 26,215 square miles, it is nearly equal in size to Scotland. It is more English in its aspect than any other colony of the Australian group. "The interior especially is delightful; and here are united, so to speak, the climate of Italy, the beauty of the Apennines, and the fertility of England." The mineral treasures, especially gold and tin, are now being more vigorously developed than formerly. On Dec. 31, 1879, the population was estimated at 109,947, Hobart containing 22,500. Launceston, in the north, with 12,000 inhabitants, is a centre of mineral, pastoral, and agricultural prosperity. According to the last official returns, in 1870, the principal denominations stood thus: Episcopalians, 53,047; Presbyterians, 9,064; Wesleyans, 7,187; Independents, 3,931; Roman Catholics, 22,091. No other Australian colony has gone through so many and so various vicissitudes as Tasmania. It was discovered Nov. 24, 1642, by Abel Janssen Tasman, the Dutch explorer, and by him called Van Diemen's Land, in honor of the Dutch governor of the East Indies. But it was not settled until 1803, when Gov. Ring of Sydney sent Lieut. Bowen thither with three soldiers, and ten male and six female convicts. Tasmania thus became a settlement of convicts, a colony of criminals; and its history shows the marks of its origin. Robbery, murder, and fights, not only with the natives, but with escaped convicts, bushrangers, and among the colonists themselves, were for many years the order of the day. In 1825 it was separated from New South Wales, and organized as an independent colony; but in 1842 it had still 20,000 convicts living, besides 59,000 free settlers. And how far it still is from having outgrown the disadvantages of its birth may be inferred from the fact, that in 1870 there were 55,939 persons in the colony who could read and write, 13,945 who could only read, and 29,444 who could neither read nor write.

New Zealand.—The group of North, Middle, and Stewart's Islands, of which this colony consists, are almost equal in size to Great Britain and Ireland. The country is of volcanic origin, chains of mountains running from north to south. The climate is, on the whole, free from extremes of heat and cold, and is remarkably healthy. New Zealand is rich in minerals. The grains, grasses, fruits, and vegetables of Great Britain, are successfully cultivated. Marsupials and snakes, common in the other colonies, are not found here. By the census of March, 1878, the population was 414,412, exclusive of the Maories, numbering about 43,000. Various kinds of grain and fruit have been introduced, and succeed exceedingly well. Different species of animals—sheep, cattle, horses, deer, etc.—have also been introduced, and not only thrive well, but even seem to improve. The islands were first visited by Cook in 1770, but the connection with the civilized world is now frequent and rapid. An active mission is carried on among the Maories, but, as it would seem, not with much success. According to the last ecclesiastical returns, which were made in 1874, the numbers were as follows:—

RELIGION.	Churches.	Seats.	Attendance.
Episcopalians . . .	172	30,783	19,916
Presbyterians . . .	125	30,188	18,541
Wesleyans . . .	105	18,885	12,723
Roman Catholics . . .	86	19,045	10,967

AUSTRIA contains, according to the last census (of 1869) a population of 35,634,858, of which two-thirds, or nearly 24,000,000, belong to the Roman-Catholic Church, 3,941,796 to the Greek-Catholic, 3,050,830 to the Non-United Greek, 1,518,262 to the Lutheran, 2,255,113 to the Calvinist, 55,079 to the Unitarian, and 10,133 to the Armenian; 1,375,861 are Jews. The Catholic Church, including the Greek and Armenian Catholics, has sixteen archbishops, forty-seven suffragan bishops, two vicar bishops, one military bishop, and nine hundred and fifty convents, with eighty-five hundred monks, and fifty-seven hundred nuns, — in all about thirty-four thousand ecclesiastics. The Non-United Greek Church has a patriarch in Karlowitz, an archbishop in Hermanstadt, eleven bishops, about four thousand priests, and forty convents, with three hundred monks. The Protestant churches have eighteen superintendencies.

The introduction of Christianity, and the history of the Christian Church, in the various parts of the empire, will be spoken of in the articles on BOHEMIA, HUNGARY, MORAVIA, and POLAND. We speak here only of the church-history of the Archduchy of Austria, and of the general ecclesiastical policy of the empire.

The Archduchy of Austria, inhabited by the Taurisci, a Celtic tribe, belonged partly to Pannonia, partly to Noricum, both provinces of the Roman Empire since the time of Augustus. Hither Christianity was brought by the Roman soldiers and citizens, — from the East, by St. Victorinus (d. in the persecution of Diocletian), and from the West, by St. Severinus (d. 482). Lore was the oldest episcopal see. Afterwards the country was overrun by various barbaric tribes, — Goths, Huns, Lombards, etc.; and in the time of Charlemagne the Avari were settled to the east of the Enns, and the Bajuvarii to the west. The Avari were converted to Christianity by missionaries from the Frankish Church; and the countship which Charlemagne founded here, and which forms the political nucleus of the Archduchy of Austria, was placed under the ecclesiastical authority of the Archbishop of Salzburg. Influences, however, of the Eastern Church, made themselves felt through Moravia; and during the whole period of the middle ages the Austrian Church seems to have maintained a somewhat free attitude towards Rome. At the close of this period, Turcianus preached against indulgences; the monk Jacob, against relics; Theobaldus, against the life led by the priests. Also was the Reformation at first very successful here. Paul Speratus preached openly Luther's views in Vienna; the books of the reformers circulated freely; nearly three-fourths of the population accepted the new doctrines; the monasteries stood empty; and in 1560 the Emperor Ferdinand II. had to place the mendicant friars under the protection of the police. But the government was strongly Roman Catholic; and the unfortunate dissensions between the Protestants themselves, which, between the Phillipists and the Flacians, degenerated into unseemly quarrels and fanatical enmity, gave the Jesuits a welcome opportunity. The Emperor Rudolph (1576–1612) was their pupil and their tool. Though, at his accession to the throne, he confirmed the constitutional religious liberty of the country, nevertheless, very soon after, he discharged all officials who held the Protestant faith, abolished the evangelical service in all towns and villages belonging to the imperial domains, forbade religious gatherings without special authorization, and charged Bishop Khlesl with the organization of a complete anti-reformation. The peasants revolted in 1594, and the revolt was not put down until 1597; but then a committee was sent all through the country to expel the evangelical ministers, and force the Roman priests on the congregations. Under Ferdinand III. (1619–57) the work was completed. The estates refused to swear fealty to him, unless he granted religious liberty; but Ferdinand let loose a swarm of Cossacks on the country, and then the estates took the oath. But when he next ordered that the whole population should at once return to the Roman faith, and all Protestant ministers and schoolmasters leave the country within a week, the peasants rose en masse, and formed in a few days an army of thirty-eight thousand men. They were defeated, however, and the order was executed with great harshness. The peace of Westphalia (1648) altered nothing with respect to Austria; and in 1652 ten Jesuits were commissioned to travel through the country, almost in the quality of an Inquisition. Seventy-three families among the nobility still adhered to the Protestant faith, but they hardly dared to speak to each other about religion. Nevertheless, the evangelical spirit, once awakened, could not die out altogether: it lived on in secret. When, in the reign of Charles VI. (1711–40), permission was granted to all Protestants to emigrate, twelve hundred persons at once demanded to go. The government was surprised, and tried to prevaricate; but the people were inflexible, and in 1735 they were transferred to Transylvania. The result of this violent suppression of a sincere and orderly movement towards freedom and truth has been, that, in Austria, the Roman-Catholic Church is altogether without influence, while religious indifference, superciliousness, and frivolity prevail in all classes of society.

In spite of the fanaticism, however, with which the government tried to suppress the Reformation wherever it could, it was very jealous of its own freedom, and maintained quite an independent attitude with respect both to the pope and the clergy. During the reign of Maria Theresa (1740–80), especially after 1765, when Joseph II. succeeded his father, Francis I., Maria Theresa's husband, as Emperor of Germany, the influence of the clergy was curtailed in every way. Their power of holding councils was abrogated; public education was made a mere government affair; the relation between the religious orders and their generals residing in Rome was dissolved, and the orders placed under the authority of the bishops; numerous festivals were abolished, etc. When Joseph II. became sole regent (1780–90), the reforms were carried still further: the connection between the pope and the Roman-Catholic Church within the Austrian dominions was almost severed, and the functions of the church itself were reduced to a minimum. Many monasteries were suppressed; the Latin language was abolished in the administration of the sacraments; the tithes were turned into the treasury of the state; the priests were placed on an equal footing with other government officials, etc. Oct. 31, 1781, the celebrated edict of toleration was issued. Protestants obtained full citizens' right throughout the Austrian dominions, were admissible to the highest offices, and received freedom of worship, even in the Archduchy of Austria, where a superintendency was organized under the head of an evangelical consistory in Vienna, and a seminary for evangelical theology founded in the same city. Though many of Joseph's reforms were revoked by his immediate successors, and though ultramontane tendencies became more and more visible during the first half of the nineteenth century, the Roman Church in Austria was still kept in a position subordinate to the State, up to 1855. The dangerous political concessions which in 1848 made the Austrian monarchy tremble in its very foundation brought forward the idea to seek a support for the throne, not only in the army and the police, but also and pre-eminently in the Roman Church; and Aug. 18, 1855, Francis Joseph I. signed a concordat with the pope, by which the whole ecclesiastical legislation of Joseph II. was swept away, the Roman Church established in the empire as a state in the state, and its connection with the pope thoroughly cemented. Shortly after, a re-organization of the Protestant churches was promised, and in Hungary this re-organization was promptly carried out. But in the German and Slavic parts of the empire it was long delayed; and when at last it came, in the form of a provisional constitution (April 8, 1861), it proved unsatisfactory.

The partiality shown to the Roman-Catholic Church is too flagrant. Only a Roman priest can keep a valid register of births and deaths. When a Roman-Catholic wishes to embrace Protestantism he must for six months separate himself from all intercourse with Protestants, and devote himself exclusively to the teaching of a Roman-Catholic priest; while a Protestant who wishes to embrace Romanism needs only to go to the nearest priest, and deliver himself up. In Austria Proper the Protestants are not allowed to have churches with music and bells, but only chapels without entrance from the streets, etc. Many of these petty annoyances with which the priest still hopes to fight the pastor, the Protestants have now succeeded in freeing themselves from, but, characteristically enough, only by attacking them one by one, and by going directly to the emperor himself.

See ENGLISH BIBLE VERSIONS.

AUTO-DA-FÉ, Spanish for actus fidei, "act of faith," signified the public enunciation of the judgments of the Inquisition over heretics and non-Christians, and was also called sermo publicus, or generalis de fide, because connected with a sermon on the Catholic faith. The act commonly took place on a Sunday. At sunrise, the victims, with the hair shaved off, and variously dressed, according to the different degrees of punishment, were led in a solemn procession, with the banners of the Inquisition at the head, to some public place or church. When the secular authorities whose duty it was to be present had sworn to stand by the Inquisition, and execute its orders, the sermon on the faith was delivered, and then the judgments against the dead and the living were pronounced. Next the relapsers, and those who refused to recant, were expelled from the church, and given over to the secular authorities for punishment, and then the procession again began to move. The bones of the dead who were condemned were carried on sleighs to the place of execution. Those who were condemned to death rode on asses, between armed men, and wore coats and caps, called in Spanish sanbenito, painted over with devils and flames. Not only the mob and the monks, but also the magistrates, and sometimes even the king and the court, were present at the spectacle. There were, however, differences in the solemnization of auto-da-fés in Southern France, in Spain, in Italy, and in the Portuguese colonies in India. From the middle of the eighteenth century the auto-da-fés disappeared, and the verdicts of the Inquisition were executed in private.

AUTPERTUS, Ambrosius, b. in Southern France early in the eighth century; lived at the Carolingian court as orator, but retired to the Monastery of St. Vincent, on the Voltorno, in Southern Italy, and died there in 778 or 779, as abbot. He wrote commentaries on the Psalms, the Song of Songs, and the Apocalypse, of which the last, given in Bib. Patr. Max., tom. XIII., is his principal work.

AVÉ MARIA, or HAIL, MARY, the angelic salutation, the words with which the angel Gabriel saluted the Virgin (Luke i. 28), as rendered by the Vulgate, and afterwards the name of a peculiar form of prayer authorized by the Roman Church for the invocation of St. Mary. The prayer consists of a scriptural part, — the words of the angel, "Hail, Mary, full of grace; the Lord is with thee;" and the words of Elisabeth, "Blessed art thou among women, and blessed is the fruit of thy womb," — and a precatory part: "Holy Mary, mother of God, pray for us sinners now, and at the hour of our death." The first part occurs in the Liber Antiphonianus, attributed to Gregory the Great, but did not become a fixed formula until the end of the eleventh century; and the constitution of Bishop Odo of Paris (1196) is the first instance in which this formula is authorized to be taught together with the formulas of the Creed and the Lord's Prayer. The precatory part was added in the fifteenth century, and was authorized in the breviary of Pius V., in 1568.

AVIGNON, the capital of the department of Vaucluse, situated on the Rhone, formed in the middle ages, together with the adjacent districts, a countship belonging to Provence. Queen Johanna I. of Sicily, born a countess of Provence, sold the countship of Avignon in 1348 to Pope Clement VI. for eighty thousand guilders. In 1662 Louis XIV. seized the city in order to avenge a slight which Pope Alexander VII. had shown his ambassador, but gave it back again in 1663. In 1791 the countship of Avignon, as well as that of Venaissin, which King Philippe had bequeathed to the pope in 1273, were incorporated with France. From 1305 to 1377 the papal residence was changed from Rome to Avignon. Seven popes resided there, — Clement V., John XXII., Benedict XII., Clement VI., Innocent VI., Urban V., and Gregory XI.; and during this period, the so-called "Babylonian Captivity" of the popes, Avignon was one of the gayest and most corrupt cities in the world. Petrarch, who staid there for some time, called it the third Babylon.

AVIS, The Order of, originated from the nova militia, an association of knights, which King Alfonso I. of Portugal founded in 1145, to fight against the Moors who still held the southern part of the country. In 1166 Johannes Civita, Abbot of Citeaux, gave this association an ecclesiastical organization, and in 1204 Innocent III. confirmed the rules of the order. Also the name changed. In 1166 the nova militia conquered Evora. King Alfonso presented the city to the knights, who now assumed the name of "Brethren of St. Maria of Evora;" and when, in 1211, King Alfonso II. presented the city of Avis to the order, its name was finally fixed as "The Order of Avis." In the thirteenth century the order became a dependent of the Spanish order of Calatrava, but in the beginning of the fifteenth century it once more became independent. In 1789 it was transformed into an order of military merit, and the ecclesiastical vows were abolished, that of chastity having been dropped already earlier.

AVITUS, Alcimus Ecdidius, descended from a distinguished Romano-Gallic family, and died in 525 as Bishop of Vienne, Burgundy. At the conference between the Catholic and Arian theologians in 499, he was the principal representative of the former party, and gained the confidence of the Burgundian king, Gundobold, which was of so much the greater consequence as the Burgundians were Arians. Later on, Sigismund, the son and successor of Gundobold, was converted to Catholicism by the influence of Avitus; and many, though not all, of his subjects followed his example. Avitus also presided at the synod of Epaon in 517, which regulated the ecclesiastical relations of Burgundy. But, besides being thus very active in many practical affairs, he was also a prolific writer. Eighty of his letters are still extant, addressed to the Frankish and Burgundian kings, to the bishops of Gaul, of Milan, Constantinople, and Jerusalem, etc. Of his poetical productions is extant, De Mundi Principio, a large didactic epic in five books. See EBERT: Gesch. der christl. lat. Litt. p. 377 sqq. Collected editions of the works of Avitus have been given by Sirmond, in Mar. Bibl., T. IX., p. 603, and by Galland: Bibl. Tat., T. X., p. 761; BINDING: Gesch. des Burgundischen Reichs, Leipzig, 1868, p. 168 sqq.

AWAKENING is the term descriptive of the beginning of conversion as a divine work, because in Scripture parlance the unrepentant sinner is "asleep" (Eph. v. 14). According to the mental and moral condition of the sinner will be the outward form of the awakening, — either sudden or slow, vehement or quiet. It must, however, be acknowledged that a genuine Christian life is quite conceivable without any "awakening" at all; for many grow up in unbroken fellowship with God, and enter into conscious faith, and love and joy, not, it is true, without conviction of their lost condition, and repentance of sins, but without any perceptible beginning of a Christian experience. It is to be borne in mind that the "awakening" in any case is only a beginning; the awakened one is not yet converted, regenerated, only on the way to conversion: hence it is possible for such persons to fall asleep again, as has frequently been the case. This truth explains the wholesale falling-away which usually follows a great revival. The machinery of revivals produces many converts who are awakened, but who never get any farther. But, when God speaks, the soul hears and obeys. Those who are the subjects of his grace walk through life the exponents of righteousness. See REVIVALS, SPENER. [See ROBERT KÜBEL: Gesammelte Vorträge: über christliche Nüchternheit, Barmen, 1877.] KLING (Herzog, ed. I.) AYLMER, John, b. at Norfolk, Eng., 1521;

d. in London, June 3, 1594; was educated at Cambridge; became the tutor of Lady Jane Grey, and was made Archdeacon of Stow in 1553. During the reign of Mary he retired to Zürich; by Elizabeth he was made Archdeacon of Lincoln in 1562, and Bishop of London in 1576. He was a firm but somewhat narrow-minded man, and opposed the Puritans with the same harshness as the Romanists. Against Knox he wrote, An Harboure for faithfull and trewe Subjects, etc., 1559.

AZAZEL. This word is a transliteration of the Hebrew term translated in the authorized version (Lev. xvi. 8 sq.) "scapegoat;" but the correct interpretation is much debated. Some consider azazel as the name of a region, "the desert," or of a person, the opposite to Jahveh, either a spirit, a demon, or Satan himself. The last interpretation has met with great favor; but against it may be urged that nowhere else in the Pentateuch is Satan mentioned, and the fact renders it all the more unlikely that he should be mentioned here by a name he never has in the Bible. It is therefore decidedly better to regard azazel as impersonal, and interpret Lev. xvi. 8: "and Aaron shall cast lots upon the two goats; one lot for Jahveh, and the other lot for Azazel, i. e., for 'going very far away.'" According to the Talmudic tractate, Yoma, the high priest, knew by a sort of telegraphic communication between Jerusalem and the wilderness, — the waving of cloths by set watchers, at regular distances, — whether and when the goat arrived in the wilderness, as was necessary, for the other sacrifices were not to be offered until it arrived there (Lev. xvi. 23, 24). See ATONEMENT, DAY OF. WILHELM VOLCK.

AZYMITES (from à negative, and ζύμη, leaven), the epithet given to the adherents of the Latin Church by those of the Greek Church, because the former use unleavened bread in the Lord's Supper. In reply the Latins called the Greeks Fermentarii. The first one to attack the Latin Church upon this question was Michael Caerularius, Patriarch of Constantinople (1051), accusing her of heresy upon this point. The Latins have made it a grievous sin to use leavened bread in the Eucharist, yet they have not presumed to damn the Greeks: so far from doing so, they declared in the council of Florence (1439), that transubstantiation took place just the same, whether the bread were leavened or not. See CÄRULARIUS, MICHAEL.

BAADER, Franz Xavier, b. in Munich, 1765; d. there May 23, 1841; studied, first medicine, and afterwards mineralogy; travelled in England 1792-96; was appointed, first councillor, and afterwards director, of the mining department in Munich; and became in 1826 professor of philosophy and speculative theology in the university of the same city, in which position he exercised considerable influence. He was a theosophist rather than a theologian; and the aphoristic and paradoxical form in which he presented his mystical speculations often makes it difficult to understand him. But he was an original thinker, of great suggestiveness; and, though a Roman Catholic, he maintained a very independent position with respect to the papacy, which he considered a very equivocal institution, not essential to the church. His collected works, edited by several of his adherents (Hoffmann, Hamberger, Emil von Schaden, Lutterbeck, etc.), appeared in 16 vols. at Leipzig, 1850-60. A writer in the "Encycl. Brit." (9th ed. vol. III. 175) calls him "the greatest speculative theologian of modern Catholicism."

BA'AL and BEL. I. BAAL, frequently mentioned in the Old Testament as the god of the idolatrous Israelites, as he was of the Canaanites (Phœnicians, Philistines, and Edomites). And, as the Phœnicians naturally carried their religion with them wherever they went, the name of Baal was very widely spread. See PHœNICIANS.

1. The name means "lord," or "possessor," and, when used in a special sense, "head of the wife." This meaning it shares with the other Shemitic divinities, for they all set forth the idea of power, and thus differ in conception from the Aryan divinities; and also in that, apparently, these Shemitic gods were originally one god, who took different names according to the localities in which he was worshipped, and so, in course of time, arose separate divinities.

2. The use of the name. — Baal was the commonest name for god among the Phœnicians, and everywhere designated the highest god, or the highest worshipped in any particular place. So, also, it is used as a description, e.g., "Melkart, the Baal of Tyre." In the Old Testament is frequently the plural, "Baalim;" meaning either in general "the idols," or the Baals collectively, which had their especial seats in different localities.

Baal is, without doubt, a sun-god, and a male divinity par excellence. He is very frequently called Baal Chamman; and Chamman, "hot," is applied to the sun in Hebrew. So, also, Baalbek was called by the Greeks Heliopolis (city of the sun). It is also noticeable that the Greeks and Romans identified Melkart, the Baal of Tyre, with Herakles (Hercules), the sun-god. At Beth-Shemesh (the sun-temple) was there an altar to Baal: and it does not militate against this identification when Baal and the sun are distinguished as separate divinities (2 Kings xxiii. 5); for Apollo was originally a sun-god, but afterwards was distinguished from the sun.

In the Shemitic divinities the beneficent and the destructive powers were united: so in Baal we find such names as Hannibal, "gracious is Baal," Asdrubal, "Baal helps." On the other hand, Baal is set forth as a destructive god, whose wrath must be placated; and so there were sacrifices of children (Jer. xix. 5, xxxii. 35) to which many classical writers testify, although they call Baal Saturn, or Kronos. No distinction is to be made between Moloch and Baal, as if the one were destructive, while the other was beneficent. See MOLOCH.

3. Different Baals. — a. Baal-Berith (lord of the covenant), worshipped by the Shechemites, the protector of the "covenant" formed between men (Judg. viii. 33, ix. 4).

b. Baal-Peor (lord of Peor), a god of the Moabites or Midianites, so called because worshipped upon Mount Peor (Num. xxiii. 28, xxv. 3). The common interpretation, which insists upon obscene rites in the worship of Baal-Peor, is altogether aside from the plain text. Not the prostitution of female devotees who yielded up their virtue in discharge of a religious duty, but fornication and idolatry, are spoken of.

c. Baal-Zebub (lord of the fly). See BEELZEBUB.

d. Baal-Gad (lord of fortune), a place near Hermon (Josh. xi. 17, xii. 7, xiii. 5.)

e. Baal-Meon (lord of the habitation), a town where was a temple: in full form, the name is the Temple of Baal-Meon, Beth-Baal-Meon (Josh. xiii. 17), contracted into Baal-Meon (Num. xxxii. 38; 1 Chron. v. 8), and thus the name of a Moabite city (Ezek. xxv. 9), called also Beth-Meon (Jer. xlvi. 23), Beon (Num. xxxii. 3); now Ma'in, nine miles south-east of Heshbon. It was assigned to Reuben.

f. Baal-Zephon (Exod. xiv. 2; Num. xxxiii. 7), a camping-ground for the Israelites, on the Red Sea, where there was a Baal imported thither from the north.

g. Baal-Tamar (lord of the palm), a place near Gibeah (Judg. xx. 33). The palm, tamar, by its height, spread, and perpetual greenness, would be a good symbol of Baal, the fruitful-making sun.

h. and i. The Palmyra inscriptions speak of two further forms of Baal, the divinities Aglibol and Malachbel. They are named and pictured together, and represented the sun and the moon; for on one monument Aglibol has a half-moon over her shoulder, while Malachbel is borne up by an eagle, and has a crown of sun-rays. In the name Aglibol we have a mingling of the word for a young steer and Baal, reminding us of the classic tales of Zeus, in the shape of a steer carrying off Europa.

4. The Baal-Cultus in Israel. It is unquestionable, that, in the earliest times, the Hebrews called their god Baal. In proof, these names, in Saul's family compounded with Baal, as Esh-baal (Ishboshesh), and Merib-baal (Mephiboshesh) (1 Chron. viii. 33, 34), may be quoted.

The worship of Baal was known to the Hebrews while in the desert, and many were induced to adopt it by the Moabitish women (Num. xxv.); and this worship, in the time of the Judges, became their besetting sin, so that vigorous, though only partially successful, efforts were made to eradicate it (Judg. ii. 11, 13, iii. 7, vi. 25 sq., x. 6; 1 Sam. vii. 4, xii. 10). Then came the reformation under Saul and David; a relapse followed under Solomon; and at length Ahab, King of Israel, influenced by Jezebel, introduced the worship of the Zidonian Baal, and advanced this idolatrous worship to the exclusion of the Jehovah cultus (1 Kings xvi. 31 sq., xix. 10). And it had so strong a hold upon the affections of the people that it was not until Jehu, by stratagem, put a large number of Baal-worshippers to death, that this hold was loosened; only temporarily, however, for the people returned to it not long after (2 Kings x. 18-23, xvii. 16). In Judah there was likewise inveterate Baal-worship, although not so much favored by the reigning house. Ahaz practised it (2 Kings xv. 3; 2 Chron. xxviii. 2); Hezekiah repressed it (2 Kings xviii. 4); but Manasseh continued it (2 Kings xxi. 3). He, however, was the last king to do so.

Baal was worshipped by animal sacrifices (1 Kings xviii. 23; 2 Kings x. 24), with incense (Jer. vii. 9, xi. 13, xxxii. 29), and by kissing his images (1 Kings xix. 18). His pillars or images were made of stone or of wood (2 Kings x. 26, 27), and even of silver and gold (Hos. ii. 8, margin). It was usual for Baal to be found in conjunction with Asherah, or Astarte (Phœnician, Baalath, cf. the Assyrian-Babylonian pair, Bel and Beltis, or Bil and Bilish), upon heights, either natural or artificial, where were their altars (Judg. vi. 25; 2 Chron. xxxiv. 4; Jer. xix. 5, xxxii. 35). See ASTARTE. Near by stood the sun-images (2 Chron. xxxiv. 4). The attempt to get nearer God by climbing a hill accounts for the practice of offering incense to Baal upon the roofs of houses (Jer. xxxii. 29, cf. 2 Kings xxiii. 12). We read of Baal temples in Samaria (1 Kings xvi. 32; 2 Kings x. 21), and in Jerusalem (2 Kings xi. 18), of Baal priests and prophets, and of bloody rites (1 Kings xviii. 19, 28).

II. BEL (Assyrian, Bil; Greek and Latin, Bel) is called, in the authorized text and on the Assyrian inscriptions, one of the greatest gods of the Babylonians (Isa. xlvi. 1; Jer. l. 2, li. 44), and probably he was the chief. He was called "The Exalted One, the Light of the gods, Father of gods, Lord of lands, Ruler of all." Whether he represented a natural force has not been as yet certainly determined; but it is probable he was a sun-god. Later on he was identified with the god of the planet Jupiter (Marduk), and so called the star Jupiter. But this comparatively recent form of Bel gave rise to the distinction Bel minor, or the younger Bel, and Bel priscus, or the old Bel; and when transferred to Greece and Rome, for their names for the planets are Babylonish in origin, they became Bel Jupiter and Bel Saturn. This planetary interpretation was, however, at first quite secondary; yet a similar difference between cognate divinities has been found in many religions, for it rested upon the conception of a concealed and a revealed god. The highest god was so transcendent, that he was quite invisible; but between him and mortals there was a revealer who shared the divine nature, but was not identical with the supreme god.

BAALBEK (bäl'bek), a city of Cœle-Syria, celebrated for its magnificence in the first centuries of the Christian era, and famous ever since for its ruins. Here Baal as the sun-god was worshipped, and in later times, at all events, Venus; for the immorality of the place was notorious. Baalbek is situated on a plain near the foot of the Anti-Lebanus range, about forty miles northwest of Damascus, and thirty-eight hundred feet above sea-level. It is known in history under the Greek name Heliopolis, "city of the sun;" but Baalbek was the earlier name. Curiously enough in Egypt there was a Heliopolis, which was also called On. Hence the plausible supposition that these two places were of common origin. In proof, the saying of the author of De Dea Syria, that in the great temple of Heliopolis an antique idol was worshipped which had been brought from Egypt, is quoted, and also the statement of Macrobius in his Saturnalia, that the statue of Jupiter Heliopolitanus came from Egypt. It was only after it was made a Roman colony, under the name Colonia Julia Augusta Felix Heliopolitana, that Baalbek became a place of first-class importance. Up to that time it was in obscurity. It cannot be identified satisfactorily with any Bible locality. It is mentioned by Josephus (Antiq. xiv. 3, 2), Pliny (Nat. Hist. v. 22), and Ptolemy; and coins of the city have been found of almost all the emperors from Nerva to Gallienus.

The magnificent ruins which now arrest the traveller's attention, and excite his wonder, are proof of the lavish expenditure of the emperors of the second and third centuries. We are able, by coins, to reconstruct partly the two temples as they once stood. The Great Temple, one of the wonders of the Old World, designed apparently as a pantheon, and built, it is probable, by Antoninus Pius (A. D. 150), is now almost entirely destroyed. Only six columns yet stand. It was built upon the site of another temple; and in the west wall of its platform are the three famous blocks of stone, placed side by side, and twenty feet from the ground, measuring respectively sixty-four feet, sixty-three feet eight inches, and sixty-three feet, and are thirteen feet in height. In the quarry in the neighborhood there is a stone cut out, but not yet separated from the rock, which is seventy-one feet long, fourteen feet high, and thirteen wide, and weighs probably about fifteen hundred tons. The presence of the three stones mentioned gave the temple the name Trilithon or "Three-Stone Temple." Slightly to the north of the Great Temple is the Temple of the Sun, which is remarkably well preserved. The columns are forty-five feet high, including the Corinthian capitals, and the circumference of each nineteen feet. The temple is entered through an exquisitely carved doorway. The central stone of the architrave having subsided since 1659, it lately became necessary to prop it, to the detriment of its appearance. At the west end of the cella was the raised sanctuary, where the altar stood during the Christian period. Farther east there is a very small but very beautiful circular temple, consisting of a semi-circular cella surrounded by eight Corinthian columns. It was formerly a Greek chapel, but is now falling to decay.

In the early Christian centuries, Baalbek was one of the most flourishing seats of Pagan worship; and the Christian writers draw strange pictures of the morality of the place. In 297 Gelasius was martyred there. The story is curious. He was a comic actor; and one day, in the course of a public mockery of Christian rites, he was jestingly baptized. But, when he came forth from the bath, he said solemnly, "I am a Christian, for I have seen in the bath an awful and majestic spectacle; and for Christ's sake I am ready to die." The people, in rage, stoned him; and the magistrate, in order to spare him further suffering, had him beheaded. See Smith and Wace: Dict. Christ. Biog., s. v. The Emperor Constantine, according to Sozomen, issued a rescript against the licentious rites of the people, and founded a basilica among them; but, on the accession of Julian, the Pagan population broke out into violent persecution, and the city became so notorious for its hostility to Christianity, that Christians were banished thither from Alexandria as a special punishment. Theodosius the Great is said to have turned "the Temple of Balanius, the Trilithon," into a Christian Church (Encycl. Brit. sub voco). Later on, bishops of Heliopolis are mentioned. The city was captured by Abre Ubeida on his march from Damascus to Hums. Since then it has declined. It has often changed masters, and war has left its indelible marks. The present unsightly town is a great contrast to the city of the past. Earthquakes have done much to reduce to ruins the magnificent temples reared at such cost.

The ruins of Baalbek have been often described; but one of the best, if not the best, works on the subject is still WOOD and DAWKINS: Ruins of Baalbek, London, 1757. See also ROBINSON: Later Biblical Researches, Boston, 1852, pp. 505-527; Mrs. BURTON: Unexplored Syria, London; and the Handbooks of Syria by Porter (5th ed.) and Bädcker (2d Ger. ed. 1881).

BA'ASHA (valor), son of Ahijah, of the tribe of Issachar, third king of Israel, by the slaughter of Nadab and all his family (1 Kings xv. 27), thus unintentionally fulfilling Ahijah's prophecy (1 Kings xiv. 10). Although of common origin, he made a warlike and brave king, but increased the demoralization of his kingdom by persisting in the way of Jeroboam. Jehu prophesied against him, but without effect. While engaged in fortifying Ramah, in order to prevent any intercourse between Judah and Israel, Baasha was attacked by Benhadad, King of Syria, who had been incited by Asa, King of Judah, and compelled to stop building. See ASA. Baasha reigned probably for a long time after this; for in all he ruled twenty-four years (B.C. 955-932), and was buried in Tirzah. Upon his son and successor, Elah, the prophecy of Jehu was fulfilled (1 Kings xvi. 12, 13). KÜETSCHL.

BABA. See MISHNA.

BABYLON, the metropolis of the Babylonian Empire, was built on both sides of the Euphrates, on the spot where the present Hillah stands. The records of the Old Testament (Gen. x. 10) ascribe the foundation of Babel, Erech, Accad, and Calneh, to Nimrod the Hamite (Cushite); and this agrees with the inscriptions found in the ruins, according to which Uru (the Chaldæan Ur, Gen. xi. 28), Arku (the present Warka, the biblical Erech), Babilu (the Babel of the Bible), etc., were cities of non-Shemitic origin. The Old Testament (Gen. xi. 9) brings the name Babel in connection with the confusion of tongues, and the dispersion of the race into nations, and derives it from the Hebrew בבל "confusions." The inscriptions, however, give another etymology, explaining Bab-Il as the "gates of El," or simply "God's gates." The existence of the city as the centre of the Chaldæan and a pro-Chaldæan, Accadian civilization, can be traced back to about three thousand years B.C.

The whole city, enlarged and completed by Nabopolassar and Nebuchadnezzar, formed a square with a circumference, according to Ctesias, of three hundred and sixty stadia (about fifty-six miles), or, according to Herodotus, of four hundred and eighty stadia (about seventy-five miles), a difference which perhaps arose from the latter including the suburb Borsippa. A wall enclosed this city, according to Herodotus, twenty yards high and fifty yards broad, so that two chariots, each harnessed with four horses abreast, could easily pass each other between the battlements. It was built of brick and asphaltum, mounted with two hundred and fifty towers, and surrounded by a deep and broad ditch filled with water from the Euphrates. One hundred gates, with posts, leaves, and sills of brass, led into the city. All along the Euphrates high embankments protected the city against inundation; and gates of brass, and flights of steps of masonry, led down to the river. The two parts of the city were connected by a bridge, built by Nebuchadnezzar, resting on stone pillars, and provided with a pathway of cedar-wood and palm-beams, which was removed during night. The whole area was laid out in minor squares by straight streets one hundred and fifty feet broad, and lined with houses of three or four stories; but the interior part seems to have been occupied by gardens and orchards. This "the praise of the whole earth" (Jer. li. 41), "the glory of kingdoms, the beauty of the Chaldees' excellency" (Isa. xiii. 19), was, by its magnitude, splendor, riches, luxury, art, and science, the centre of Western Asia; but it was also a seat of boundless debauchery and vice (Isa. xiv. 11, xlvi. 1; Jer. li. 39; Dan. v. 1 sqq.).

The ruins of the western part of the city are by far not so imposing as those of the eastern part, consisting of the three huge mounds, — Al-kasr, Tell Amrân, and Babil. According to inscriptions found in the mound, Al-kasr represents the palace built by Nebuchadnezzar. The mound forms a square seven hundred yards in circumference, and consists of loose bricks, tiles, and fragments of stone. Remnants of solid walls, with traces of architectural ornamentation, are met with in the middle of the mound: in the northern part the great lion was found, of black basalt, called by the Arabs the "idol," or the "elephant." At a distance of seven hundred metres south of Al-kasr, rises the hill Tell Amrân, thus called from a chapel or tomb erected on its top in honor of Amrân, the son of Ali. The mound forms an irregular trapeze four hundred metres broad, and its two parallel sides respectively five hundred and three hundred metres long. Of solid wall, there are here no traces. The surface consists of sand and rubbish, but it is evident that the place has been used for a long time as a burial-ground. The mound is generally thought to represent the famous "hanging-gardens," — a construction of terraces four hundred feet long, four hundred feet broad, and so high that it overlooked the towers of the palace. The most imposing part, however, of the ruins is Babil, a mound one hundred and eighty metres long, seventy metres broad, and forty metres high. Walls and other traces of architectural construction are here easily distinguishable; and it can hardly be doubted that this mound represents a Temple of Belus, identical with that temple which is mentioned in an inscription of Tiglath-Pileser IV., one hundred years before Nebuchadnezzar, and was dedicated to Bel Merodach, but different from that which, situated on the western bank of the Euphrates, at Borsippa, generally goes under the name of the "Tower of Babel," and which was dedicated to Bel-Nebo.

On the western bank of the river, are the ruins of the second royal palace, opposite the hills of Tell Amrân, and two miles farther to the north, at the old Borsippa, the much more interesting ruins of the above-mentioned Temple of Bel-Nebo. This temple formed, so to speak, an artificial mountain of brick. The ground upon which it stood was laid out as a square, two stadia on each side, and surrounded with a wall. In the centre of this ground, stood a square building of brick and asphaltum, six hundred feet on each side; and from this basis arose the tower, pyramidally, six hundred feet high. Stairs, with landings and resting-places, led, on the outside of the building, to the uppermost story, which contained a golden altar and a magnificently prepared base for the god, but no statuary. The lowest story, however, contained statuary representing the god sitting on a golden throne, behind a golden altar, on which one thousand pounds of incense were burnt every year, on the day of his festival. An inscription, which exists in two copies, tells that Nebuchadnezzar found this building partly unfinished, partly in decay, but restored and completed it. It seems to date back from an extremely old age; and when local tradition identifies the present mound of ruins, the Birs Nimrod, with the Tower of Babel (Gen. x. 10), most Assyriologists seem willing to accept the tradition. After the fall of the Babylonian Empire the building gradually fell into decay. Xerxes broke down the uppermost story, and carried away all the ornaments. Alexander the Great thought of restoring the building; and ten thousand laborers were employed for two months in carrying off the accumulated rubbish. But with his death the work stopped. At present the mound of ruins has only half the height the building itself had. The upper stories have tumbled down, and covered the lower with their débris. Several indications show that fire has played a part in the destruction.

The city was first conquered by Cyrus in 538 B.C., and then again in 518, after a revolt, by Darius Hystaspis, who filled up the ditch, and lowered the walls to half their original height. Xerxes plundered, not only the Temple of Belus, but also the palaces; and the restoration which Alexander the Great promised was baffled by his death. But the severest blow, the city received from the building of a new royal residence in its neighborhood, — Seleucia. From that moment it began to decay. It became a sort of quarry. Seleucia, Ktesiphon, Kufa, and even Bagdad, were built of bricks taken from Babylon. At present the site of the city is a place of unspeakable desolation, just as the prophets said it should be (Isa. xiii. 19, xiv. 4; Jer. li. 37).

BABYLONIA is the name which the Greeks and the Romans gave to the "land of the Chaldeans" (Jer. xxiv. 5, xxv. 12; Ezek. xii. 13), generally called Shinar in the Old Testament (Gen. x. 10, xi. 2, xiv. 1), thereby denoting the region along the lower course of the Euphrates and the Tigris, from the point where they approach each other to their mouth in the Persian Gulf, and from Elam on the east, to Arabia on the west. This region forms a vast plain, consisting of a fat, brown soil of extraordinary fertility; and in olden time the natural productiveness of the land was still further increased by excellent cultivation. Immense hydraulic works were erected in order to regulate the inundations of the two rivers, and utilize their waters. The current of the Euphrates is calm and regular, but that of the Tigris is wild and violent; and here huge embankments, immense reservoirs, and long canals were necessary. Besides agriculture, the teeming population was also successfully engaged in manufactures and commerce. Carpets, woollen and linen fabrics, articles of glass and bronze, etc., were produced; and these products were rapidly exchanged for those of Arabia, Ethiopia, and India. The country was rich. In a later period the Persian Empire drew one-third of its revenues from this province alone.

The inhabitants of this country, the bearers of this civilization, were not a pure race. The population consisted, indeed, of two layers: one, the Accadians, reminding, in many respects, of the Turco-Tartaric or Uralo-Altaic race; and another, the Chaldæan, belonging surely to the Shemitic race. About the former, the Accadians, the original inhabitants of Shinar, the cuneiform inscriptions give a considerable amount of information, — about their language, which was strongly agglutinative; their literature, hymns, and epics, which the Chaldæans translated and imitated; their science and art, astronomy, and architecture, which the Chaldæans adopted and developed; in short, their whole historical position. They built cities which became centres of government and enterprise. Of four of these cities ruins are still extant; namely, Uru, the Ur of the Chaldæans of the Bible (Gen. xi. 28), situated farthest to the south on the right bank of the Euphrates, in latitude 31° north, and represented by the ruins of Mugheir; Larsam, a little more to the north, on the left bank of the Euphrates, represented by the ruins of Senkereh; Arku, still farther to the north, the present Warka, the biblical Erech (Gen. x. 10), the Greek Orchē; and finally Babilu, Babylon, the Babel of the Bible. Other cities, not yet identified by their ruins, are mentioned in the inscriptions and in the Bible, such as Accad, Kutha, Sepharvaim, and Nepur. That these cities were not founded by the Shemites is proved by the non-Shemitic inscriptions found in their ruins; and this agrees with the Bible, which ascribes the foundation of Babel, Erech, Accad, and Calneh to Nimrod the Hamite (Cushite) (Gen. x. 10). In the beginning, and for a long time, these towns were rivals of each other; now one, now another, of them carrying the day. A king from this first period of historical time is spoken of as very powerful. He was the ruler of Ur, and his name is generally read Uruk. A whole series of inscriptions relate to him. Another, named Kudurmabuk, from the same period, was King of Larsam. He is probably identical with the Kudurnanchunti, of whom the inscriptions of Assurbanipal says that he ruled over Babylonia 1635 years before Sennacherib, that is about 2280 years B.C. To an Elamitic, that is purely Turanian dynasty, belonged, probably, also the biblical Chedorlaomer (Gen. xiv.). The union of these minor kingdoms into one great empire took place in the middle of the sixteenth century, and was effected by Hammurabi. He was probably a Cassite from Elam, and King of Babylon; but thence he overran the whole region down to the Persian Gulf, conquered Ur, Larsam, Accad, and Karrak, and styled himself king of Sumir and Accad, and the four nations. He made Babylon the capital of his empire, and increased the magnificence of the worship of Bel, who now became the principal god in the religious system of Babylonia. He also built and restored other temples, palaces, and cities, and dug one of the greatest canals, Hammurabinubus-nisi, which passed through the Babylonian territory.

The Shemites reached the country from Arabia, and settled first in and about Ur, but spread rapidly to the north, steadily fighting with the Accadians, but finally gaining the ascendancy. Nevertheless, although the Chaldæans gradually became the ruling race, the civilization which they developed they adopted from the Accadians. From them they borrowed, not only the art of writing, the cuneiform alphabet, but the very literature. The Shemite Sargon, King of Agané, who in the seventeenth century B.C. conquered Erech, took great pains to have the sacred books of the Accadians translated. Thus there exists a whole series of lyric and epic poems, both in the vernacular Accadian tongue and in the Shemitic translation. The Chaldæan account of the deluge is a translation from the Accadian. It forms part of a great epic cycle: "The Adventures of Izdhubar," which was to the Babylonians what Homer was to the Greeks, — their Bible; and it was from the Ur of the Chaldees that the Israelites carried away with them those religious traditions on which modern life rests; just as it is from this very same source, but through the Greeks and Romans, that modern civilization has obtained its first scientific and artistic tradition. There also exist very minute astronomical notations in the Accadian language, which show that in this field, too, the Chaldæans were borrowers before they became producers; and a table of laws, the oldest in the world, the moral bearing of whose tenets points as directly to an Uralo-Altaic origin as the agglutinative character of the language in which it is written; for here, as in all Uralo-Altaic laws, a greater importance is ascribed to the mother than to the father in the relation of parentage. The double character of the Babylonian people, arising from the two elements of which it consisted, the Accadian and the Chaldæan, was openly acknowledged by the title which the Babylonian kings assumed after the union of the minor kingdoms, — "King of Sumir and Accad;" Sumir probably being identical with Shinar.

The intimate intercourse between Assyria and Babylonia begins during the reign of Tiglath-Pileser II. (745-728 B.C.). He made two campaigns to Babylonia (745 and 731), and succeeded in subjugating the country; but twice Merodach-Baladan of Beth-Iakin rebelled (721 and 710), and not until he was utterly defeated in the latter year by Sargon could a real union between the two countries be accomplished. Sargon (727-707) assumed the title of "King of Babylonia," and ruled the country personally. So did also Essarhaddon (681-669): he even resided in Babylon, whither he carried Manasseh, King of Judah, as a captive (2 Chron. xxxiii. 11; Ez. iv. 2). Generally, however, the Assyrian kings governed Babylonia by viceroys, and this gave occasion to frequent revolts. Thus Assurbanipal (668-626) made his brother Samulsumukin viceroy of Babylonia; and Samulsumukin rebelled, was defeated, and killed. But under Assurbanipal's successor, Assur-ebil-ili, the revolt succeeded. The Babylonian viceroy, Nabopalsar, in connection with the Median king, Cyaxaras, attacked Assyria. Nineveh fell in 605, and Babylon became the centre of a great empire under Nabopalsar and his son Nebuchadnezzar (604-561). After the death, however, of Nebuchadnezzar, the power of Babylonia immediately began to decline, and in 538 it was conquered by Cyrus, and made a province of the Persian Empire. See NABOPALASAR, NEBUCHADNEZZAR.

The fall, however, of Assyria and Babylonia, the passing of the empire from the Shemitic to the Aryan race with Cyrus, was a great gain to mankind. Though the earliest religious, scientific, and artistic traditions of our present civilization were cradled in Babylonia, the Babylonian religion, when fully developed, was, nevertheless, a mean and base idolatry, which intellectually prevented all true insight into natural phenomena, and stopped all scientific and artistic progress at a short goal, while morally it left the passions without rule and guidance, and rather encouraged sensuality and debauchery. The Babylonian gods were originally local deities. Bel and his consort, Belit or Mylitta, were originally the gods of Nipur. Hence they were transplanted to Babel; and, when Babylon became the capital of the empire, Bel became the supreme or central deity of the religious system. Sin, the moon-god, was the god of Ur, one of the oldest centres of Babylonian civilization, and was always held in higher esteem by the Babylonians than Shamas, the sun-god. Anu, the god of the heavens, and his consort, Nana, were worshipped at Erech; Hea, god of the sea and the infernal regions, and his consort, Darkina, at Eridu, etc. When all these cities were gathered into one empire, the gods were gathered into one system; a certain rank was ascribed to each of them, and a genealogy was invented. Mystical and fanciful astronomical, or rather astrological, relations were connected with their names; and a mythology was elaborated, half poetical romance, and half scientific symbolization. But when this mythology lost its hold on its devotees, no philosophy arose to take its place, and after a short career Babylonian civilization became an abomination and a curse. BACCALAUREUS (Bachelor), an academical title first introduced in the University of Paris in the thirteenth century, by Pope Gregory IX., and given to such students as had successfully gone through the first examination, but not yet acquired the rights and rank of an independent master, or doctor. The etymology of the word is doubtful; some deriving it from baccalaurea, a "laurel-berry," others from bacculus and laurea, a "laurel-twig," and others again from baccalarii (bas chevalier), denoting a lower class of knights, whose estates did not allow them to take military service in an independent manner, with a retinue of their own.

BACCANARISTS, an ecclesiastical order, thus called after its founder, Baccanari, who after the temporary dissolution of the Society of the Jesuits, in 1773, by this means attempted to restore the order under a new name and in another form. Though favored by Pope Pius VI., the Baccanarists never prospered. In 1814 they entered the re-established order of the Jesuits. See JESUITS.

BACH, Johann Sebastian, b. at Eisenach, March 21, 1685; d. at Leipzig, July 28, 1750; belonged to a family which through several generations had distinguished itself by musical talent, but lost his parents very early, and had, from his fourteenth year, to provide for his own education. Nevertheless, in 1703 he was appointed court-musician in Weimar; and in 1723, then one of the most celebrated musicians of the time, he was made cantor and director of church music at Leipzig. His celebrity he owed mostly to his skill as an organist and pianist. His compositions, which form the foundation for what, in the history of music, is called the German school, were not thought much of during his lifetime. They consist chiefly of church-music, oratorios, masses, etc., for organ and orchestra, for instruments as well as for the human voice; and after his death the manuscripts were divided among his sons, and remained unnoticed till the time of Mendelssohn. His life has been written by his son, Philipp Emanuel Bach; by I. N. Farkel, 1802; and by Ph. Spitta, not yet finished.

BACON, Roger, b. at Ilchester, in Somersetshire, in 1214; d. at Oxford 1294. His family were in good circumstances, but were much crippled during the reign of Henry III. He studied at Oxford; took orders (1233), and went to Paris, took there the degree of doctor of theology, and, because of his brilliant talents, was called doctor mirabilis. In 1250 he was again at Oxford; and then, acting under the advice of his patron, Robert Grosseteste (Capito), he entered the Franciscan order, — the great mistake of his life. His fame spread rapidly; but the rumor of sorcery spread with it, and in 1257 Bonaventura, the general of his order, forbade his lectures, ordered him to go to Paris, where he passed ten years in imprisonment, until released by Clement IV. in 1268. He returned to Oxford and to study; but at the end of another decade he was in prison again, for his opinions' sake, and there he remained until about 1292. He was released only to die. He closed his literary labors with a compendium of theology.

Bacon was one of the stars of the first magnitude. He had an eminently practical mind, and was much fonder of natural science than of metaphysical subtleties. His misfortune was to have been born some centuries too soon; although in many respects he shared the opinions of his time, and is therefore not altogether entitled to the extravagant praise and glory nowadays showered upon him. His popular reputation rests upon his inventions and useful arts. He not only improved the calendar, and in this connection expressed opinions which Copernicus later justified, but studied perspective, and, according to traditions now discredited (see art. "Roger Bacon," in Encycl. Brit. 9th ed.), made burning-glasses, a telescope, and gunpowder. His bondage to the state of knowledge of the time is proven by his leaning toward astrology and alchemy; and this knowledge brought him in great trouble, as it was the custom of the day to attribute unusual skill in chemistry or mechanics to the devil. The true greatness of Bacon appears in his marvellous breadth of learning. He trod the whole circle. And withal he was a devout though by no means a blind Roman Catholic; for, while humbly submitting to the pope, he protested, in the name of religion, against the corruptions of his time, and, when setting forth the Bible as the highest authority in matters of religion, lamented that it was so little known. He set the practical before him, and made experience the touchstone of truth. His recommendation, especially to missionaries, to study ethnology and geography, is a case in point.

Roger Bacon fell into obloquy while living, and into oblivion when dead. Many centuries elapsed before he was at all recognized at his proper worth, and even to-day there is no complete edition of his works. This is greatly to be lamented, inasmuch as until there is there can be no satisfactory study of him. His principal works are, Opus Majus, Opus Minus, Opus Tertium, three large treatises written in prison, amidst great embarrassments, and forwarded by request, secretly, to Clement IV. The Opus Majus was published by Samuel Jebb, London, 1733. The Opus Tertium was published by J. S. Brewer, London, 1860. Of less account is Epistola de secretis operibus artis et naturæ et de nullitate magia, Hamburg, 1618.

BACON, Francis, b. in London, Jan. 22, 1561; d. at Highgate, April 9, 1626. He was a son of Sir Nicholas Bacon; was educated at Cambridge, and was for a time in the diplomatic service. In 1580 he began his legal career, and passed rapidly through its earlier stages. He sat for a number of years in Parliament. In 1607 he became solicitor-general, and at length was made lord-chancellor. Before the Parliament of 1621 he was accused of taking bribes. Judgment was pronounced against him. He was deposed and degraded. The rest of his life was passed in retirement. Pope unjustly called him "the wisest, brightest, meanest, of mankind."

The philosophy of Bacon is contained chiefly in the various parts of his principal work, Instauratio Magna, of which the second book, Novum Organum, is the most important. His philosophy is a method rather than a system; but the influence of this method in the development of British thought can hardly be over-estimated. As Luther was the reformer of religion, so Bacon was the reformer of philosophy. Luther had claimed that the Scripture was to be interpreted by private judgment, not by authority. The problem of Bacon was to suggest a method of interpreting nature. The old method afforded no fruits. It "flies from the senses and particulars" to the most general laws, and then applies deduction. This is the "anticipation of nature." To it Bacon opposes the "interpretation of nature." Nature is to be interpreted, not by the use of the deductive syllogism, but by the induction of facts, by a gradual ascent from facts, through intermediate laws called "axioms," to the forms of nature. Before beginning this induction, the inquirer is to free his mind from certain false notions or tendencies which distort the truth. These are called Idols, and are of four kinds: Idols of the Tribe, which are common to the race; Idols of the Cave which are peculiar to the individual; Idols of the Market-place, coming from the misuse of language; and Idols of the Theatre, which result from an abuse of authority. The end of induction is the discovery of forms, the ways in which natural phenomena occur, the causes from which they proceed. Nature is not to be interpreted by a search after final causes. "Nature to be commanded must be obeyed." Philosophy will then be fruitful. Faith is shown by works. Philosophy is to be known by fruits.

In the application of this method in the physical and moral world, Bacon himself accomplished but little. His system of morals, if system it may be called, is to be gathered from the seventh and eighth books of his De Augmentis, and from his Essays. Moral action means action of the human will. The will is governed by reason. Its spur is the passions. The moral object of the will is the good. Bacon, like the ancient moralists, failed to distinguish between the good and the right. He finds fault with the Greek and Roman thinkers for disputing about the chief good. It is a question of religion, not of ethics. His moral doctrine has reference exclusively to this world. Duty is only that which one owes to the community. Duty to God is an affair of religion. The cultivation of the will in the direction of the good is accomplished by the formation of a habit. For this Bacon lays down certain precepts. No general rules can be made for moral action under all circumstances. The characters of men differ as their bodies differ.

Bacon separates distinctly religion and philosophy. The one is not incompatible with the other; for "a little philosophy inclineth man's mind to atheism, but depth in philosophy bringeth men's minds about to religion." Bacon has been sometimes regarded as a defender of unbelief, because he opposed the search after final causes in the interpretation of nature. But it is one thing to discourage the search after final causes in science, it is another thing to deny the existence of final causes. "I had rather believe," he says, "all the fables in the Legend and the Talmud and the Alcoran than that this universal frame is without a mind" (Essay on Atheism). The object of scientific inquiry should be the "form," not the final cause.

While philosophy is not atheistic, it does not inform religion. Tertullian, Pascal, and Bacon agree in proclaiming the separation of the two domains. Tertullian and Pascal do it to save religion from rationalism: Bacon does it to save philosophy from the "Idols." Credo quia absurdum is expressed in the following words: "But that faith which was accounted to Abraham for righteousness was of such a nature that Sarah laughed at it, who therein was an image of natural reason. The more discordant therefore, and incredible, the divine mystery is, the more honor is shown to God in believing it, and the nobler is the victory of faith" (De Aug., Bk. IX.). Religion comes, therefore, not from the light of nature, but from that of revelation. "First he breathed light upon the face of the matter, or chaos, then he breathed light into the face of man, and still he breatheth and inspireth light into the face of his chosen" (Essay on Truth). One may employ reason to separate revealed from natural truth, and to draw inferences from the former; but we must not go to excess by inquiring too curiously into divine mysteries, nor attach the same authority to inferences as to principles. If Bacon was an atheist, as some claim, his writings are certainly not atheistic. He must, in that case, have been a hypocrite in order to be a flatterer, and, if a flatterer, a most foolish one. Yet the inductive method has given natural theology the facts which point most significantly to God.

BACON, Leonard, D.D., LL.D., b. in Detroit, Mich., Feb. 19, 1802; d. in New Haven, Conn., Dec. 24, 1881. He graduated at Yale College in 1820; studied theology at Andover; became pastor of the First Church in New Haven in 1825; resigned his active work as pastor, and became pastor emeritus in 1866; was instructor in Revealed Theology in the Yale Theological School from 1866 to 1871, and lecturer on Church Polity and American Church History from 1871 to his death. He was a leading founder, and one of the first editors, of The Independent and of The New-Englander. He published the Life and Select Works of Richard Baxter (1830), Thirteen Historical Discourses on the Completion of Two Hundred Years from the Beginning of the First Church in New Haven (1839), Essays on Slavery (1846), Genesis of the New-England Churches (1874), and other books. He was a very prolific contributor, upon theological, ecclesiastical, and political topics, to the periodical press. He took a very prominent part in the antislavery reform. In the Congregational denomination he was long honored as an able and influential leader. His extraordinary ability as a public speaker on subjects of social and political reform, and before ecclesiastical bodies, was universally recognized. His conversational powers were equally remarkable. His biography is in course of preparation (1882) by his daughters. GEORGE F. FISHER.

BADER, Johannes, b. in the latter part of the fifteenth century; d. at Landau, August (10-15), 1545; was tutor to Duke Ludwig II. of Zweibrücken, and after 1518 minister at Landau.

After the diet of Worms (1521) he became a staunch adherent of the Reformation, which he successfully introduced in the city of Landau and its neighborhood. In 1526 he published his Gespräch-Büchlein, which is the first Protestant catechism; and in 1544 appeared his Katechismus, in which he gives a fuller exposition of the doctrine of the Lord's Supper, somewhat nearer to the views of Zwingli and Butzer than to those of Luther. He also wrote against the Anabaptists. A curious incident in his life is his defence (Von der Gans—De Anser, Strassburg, 1526), appended to a sermon on the Lord's Supper, against the accusation of having given the Lord's Supper to a goose: one of his communicants bore the name Gans, "goose."

BADGERS' SKINS are mentioned in the authorized version (e.g. Exod. xxvi. 14; Ezek. xvi. 10) as one of the coverings of the tabernacle, and as the sandals of a fine lady; but the word, from its analogy to the Arabic for seal, is now usually so translated. The badger is very rare in Arabia, if, indeed, it be known.

BAHRDT, Karl Friedrich, b. at Bischofswerda, Saxony, Aug. 25, 1741; d. near Halle, April 23, 1792; is a disgusting but striking instance of the vulgar rationalism of the eighteenth century; gifted, but destitute of truth; working hard, but never seriously engaged; always hunting after fame, but steadily sinking deeper and deeper into shame. He began his career in 1761 as a lecturer on biblical exegesis in the University of Leipzig, and preacher to the Church of St. Peter, and in 1766 he was made extraordinary professor in biblical philology. He was at this time orthodox, and gave a transcript of Crugott's Der Christ in der Einsamkeit, which, like his sermons, found much favor; but in 1768 he received a secret consilium abeundi, on account of scandals in his private life, and thus ended the period of his orthodoxy. From 1768 to 1779 he wandered about as professor of biblical archæology in Erfurt, professor of theology in Giessen, director of a philanthropicum at Marschlinz in the Grisons, superintendent-general and first preacher at Dürkheim, etc.; always dismissed from his position, after the lapse of a year or two, on account of public or private scandal, and always appointed again to another position by some mistaken Mæcenas; always rising higher and higher towards the great goal of rationalism,—the moral perfection of the race,—and always sinking lower and lower personally in dissoluteness and filth. His chief work from this period of galloping rationalism is Neueste Offenbarungen Gottes in Briefen und Erzählungen,—a kind of expurgated Bible, but which scandalized all people of seriousness and taste, even those who were indifferent to Christianity. In 1779 he arrived at Halle, a fugitive, and found refuge under the rule of Friedrich II. In Halle he lectured on Hebrew grammar, metaphysics, morals, Juvenal, etc., and had at times about nine hundred hearers; but his success drove him into rank infidelity. He discarded every vestige still left in him of positive religion, and wrote a System der moralischen Religion. Meanwhile his strength began to give way; and the religious reaction which arose in Prussia after the death of Friedrich II. overtook him. He determined to take the affair more practically, and opened a wine-shop in the neighborhood of Halle, wrote smutty novels for the circulating libraries, founded a secret society which the police had under surveillance, tried to ridicule the religious edict of 1788 by a farce on the stage, etc. The Prussian Government, however, did not appreciate his practices. He spent a year in the dungeons of Magdeburg; and shortly after his release he fell ill, and died from the use of mercury. None of his works are worth reading; but the essay on him by G. FRANK, in Raumer's "Historische Taschenbücher," 1866, pp. 203-370, is instructive. See also LEYSER: *K. F. BAILLET, Adrian, b. at Neuville, near Beauvais, June 13, 1649; d. in Paris, Jan. 21, 1706; was educated in the Seminary of Beauvais; took orders in 1676, and obtained a small vicarage; but was in 1680 appointed librarian to Lamoignon, secretary to the Parliament of Paris. Among his many works are: Les Vies des Saints, 3 vols., fol., 1701, reprinted in 1704 and 1708; Vie de Descartes, 1692; Jugements des Savants; Histoire de Hollande, a continuation of Grotius, etc.

BAILLIE, Robert, b. at Glasgow, April 30, 1602; died there July, 1662; studied theology; was made professor of divinity at Glasgow in 1642, and principal of the University in 1661, and took an active part in all the church controversies of his time. His Letters and Journals, edited by Laing, in 3 vols., Edinburgh, 1841-42, and provided with a notice of his writings and a description of his life, are of great historical interest. To him we owe the graphic descriptions of the famous Westminster Assembly of Divines, to which body he was sent as one of the five Scotch clergymen in 1643, and sat in it for three years. See SCHAFF'S Creeeds of Christendom, vol. I., pp. 727, 746 sq.

BAIRD, Robert, D.D., b. in Fayette County, Pennsylvania, Oct. 6, 1798; d. in New York, March 15, 1863; was educated in the Theological Seminary of Princeton, licensed to preach by the presbytery of New Brunswick in 1822, ordained in 1828, and devoted his life most zealously to the cause of Protestantism, education, and temperance, residing in Europe from 1835 to 1843, and acting, after his return, as corresponding secretary of the Foreign Evangelical Society and the American and Foreign Christian Union. Besides other works, he wrote Histoire des Sociétés de Tempérance des Etats-Unis d'Amerique, Paris, 1836, and Religion in America, Glasgow, 1842, New York, 1856, both of which were translated into most European languages. Dr. Baird was an accomplished linguist, a pleasant speaker, and full of faith and charity. He was privileged to enter into king's palaces, but he entered as readily the houses of the poor. He exerted himself particularly to spread the gospel in Roman-Catholic countries. His life was written by his son, H. M. Baird, D.D., New York, 1866.

BAJUS (DE BAY), Michel, b. at Melin in Hainaut, 1513; d. at Louvain, Sept. 15, 1589; was educated in the University of Louvain, where he took the degree of doctor in theology in 1550, and remained connected with that institution for his whole life, — first as professor since 1551, and then as chancellor since 1575. That self-contradiction which had secretly developed within the Roman-Catholic Church during the middle ages, the Church vindicating Augustine as the highest theological authority theoretically, while practically it abandoned the fundamental doctrines of his system, and approached Semi-Pelagianism, was by Bajus brought into broad daylight. He clung with sincerity to Augustine's doctrines of sin and grace, and consequently he could not avoid coming into sharp opposition to the ruling tendency of the Church. A bitter controversy arose between him and his colleagues in the university. By the Church the whole affair was cautiously hushed up and smoothed over, treated as a mere matter of the school, on account of the dangerous proximity of the Reformation. But, in spite of all precautions, the question soon revived in the polemics between the Dominicans and the Jesuits (de auxiliis gratiæ), and it finally burst forth in full flame in the Jansenist controversy. When, in 1551, four of the Louvain professors went away to the council of Trent, Bajus was directed to step in and fill the vacancy; and when, shortly after, one of them died, he obtained his chair. As soon as the three others came home, they felt that a foreign influence had been at work, and in 1560 they effected a condemnation by the Sorbonne of eighteen propositions extracted from the lectures of Bajus. Bajus complained, and prepared for defence. But the Archbishop of Mechlin, Cardinal Granvelle, at once stopped the controversy, and commanded both parties to keep silent. In 1563, however, Bajus published a series of dogmatical tracts: De Libero Arbitrio; De Justitia; De Justificatione, etc.; in 1564 another series followed: De Meritis Operum; De Prima Hominis Justitia; De Virtutibus Impiorum, etc.; in 1566 all these tracts were collected in Opuscula Omnia; and now his adversaries, the Louvain professors at the head, and the Franciscan monks in the rear, could not be kept quiet any more. In December, 1567, the papal bull (Ex omnibus afflictionibus) was issued, and the faculty of Louvain was demanded to subscribe to the condemnation of the seventy-six propositions therein enumerated. The bull was a diplomatical masterpiece. Bajus's name was not mentioned; and in the formula of condemnation a comma was left out, — the famous Comma Pianum, — which directly reverses the meaning when placed before or after a certain word. Bajus, however, took the bull in good faith, sent an apology to the pope, showed that some of the propositions were not his, others not his alone, but also Augustine's, etc.; and when a papal brief of May 13, 1569, still sustained the bull, he submitted and subscribed. It was feared, however, that, under a new pope, he would try to have the bull reversed; and under Gregory XIII. (1579) there was consequently issued a confirmation of it, which was to be followed up by a new subscription. Also Bajus's relations to the Reformation through St. Aldegonde, and his views of the episcopal authority, of the papal infallibility, etc., were very liberal, and spread widely in the Netherlands and Northern France. His collected works were published at Cologne, 2 vols., 1696, by QUESNEL and GERBERON. See BAKER, Daniel, b. at Midway, Ga., Aug. 17, 1791; d. at Austin, Dec. 10, 1857; was educated in the Theological Seminary of Princeton, and ordained in 1818; was pastor in Washington, D.C., from 1822 to 1828; travelled then for several years as a revivalist preacher through the Southern States, and settled finally in Texas, where he founded Austin College, whose first president he was. He published A Plain and Scriptural View of Baptism, two series of Revival Sermons, etc. His son published Memoirs of Daniel Baker, Philadelphia, 1859.

BAKING, BREAD. While, as a rule, the indispensable work of baking fell to the women, and at least one virgin princess did not consider it beneath her (2 Sam. xiii. 8), and every house had baking facilities, yet there were public bakers in the cities (Hos. vii. 4, 6); and in Jerusalem they gave the name to a street (Jer. xxxvii. 21). There were also court bakers (Gen. xl. 1; 1 Sam. viii. 13). The best bread was made from wheat, the poorest from barley. The dough was made in wooden troughs, and leavened (Matt. xiii. 33). Unleavened bread was also used, as to-day in Palestine, and made in large paper-thin sheets: it is, however, probable that the loaves of the leavened and much thicker bread were yet thin enough to be "broken;" for we do not read in the Bible of "cutting" bread (Lam. iv. 4; Matt. xxvi. 26). The term "bread" is often used for food or provisions in general.

Baking is a very rapid process in the East. The mode to-day, and presumably the ancient mode was the same, is to press by means of a damp cloth a lump of dough, spread out thin, against the inner sides of a stone or metal jar about three feet high, which had been heated inwardly with wood, or dried grass and flower-stalks: in a minute the piece is baked. Heated stones and ashes (when the bread is put in pans) are also used to spread the cakes upon. But there were and are also regular ovens. The fuel was wood (Isa. xlv. 15); although in times of need camels', cattle's, and even human dung, were used (Ezek. iv. 12, 15). The Hebrews sometimes added oil to the ordinary bread (1 Kings xvii. 12). A cake made of flour twice kneaded, and probably fried in fat, seems to be meant in 2 Sam. xiii. 6, 8, 10.

ORELLI.

BALAAM (devourer) was a Jehovah prophet who lived in Pethor, a city of Northern Mesopotamia, not far from the Euphrates. The interesting episode in his life is related at length in Num. xxiii. 5-xxiv. 25: reference is made to him in Num. xxxi. 8, 16; 2 Pet. ii. 15, 16; Jude 11; Rev. ii. 14. The story is briefly this: Balak, King of the Moabites, finding himself unable to oppose Israel in battle, called upon Balaam, who had a great reputation in the East as a sorcerer and prophet, and who withal was a worshipper of the God of the Israelites, to curse them, thinking that the curse of a fellow-worshipper would be more efficacious than that of a heathen. On receiving the invitation, Balaam consulted Jehovah, and being refused permission he declined to go. A second and more imposing deputation of Moab and Midian, with promises of wealth and dignity, excited the cupidity of Balaam, who again consulted Jehovah, and this time was granted permission to go, with the distinct understanding that he was to say the words, and none other, that Jehovah would put into his mouth. He gladly went, dreaming of future glory, apparently not perceiving that the condition of the divine permission rendered such dreaming vain. On the journey the angel of Jehovah opposed his path, and it was then the ass spake; showing herself to be a more willing servant of Jehovah than her master. Balaam and Balak met, and the former told the king very plainly that he had no power to say any thing except what God put into his mouth. Balak was both surprised and increasingly indignant to hear the famous prophet, whom he had been at so much pains to bring to curse Israel, bless them in exalted and inspired words. Never did the divine afflatus act so grandly. For the first two times Balaam kept up the form of the heathen auguries; but the last time, perceiving how the divine mind worked, he abandoned incantations and lonely watchings, and yielded himself up unto Jehovah, and, in a strain of eloquence never excelled, he described the future of Israel. Balak quite naturally dismissed him in anger; and the dishonored, ruined prophet went back towards Pethor, but on his way stopped among the Midianites, and out of sheer desperation, desiring to regain popularity, counselled the seduction of the Israelites unto the worship of Baal-Peor by means of the Moabite and Midianite women, shrewdly judging that idolatry would quickest destroy them. See BAAL. Thus Num. xxiv. 25 and xxxi. 8 are reconciled. In the war which ensued, Balaam was killed; and thus the curtain drops upon a strange life, but one of great instructiveness. Balaam is used in the New Testament as the type of those who love the wages of unrighteousness, and tempt unto sin. Very aptly Hengstenberg compares him to Simon Magus (Acts viii. 9-24).

That there are difficulties connected with the narrative is no reason for rejecting it. It is too strange not to be true, and too fitting to the time to be the product of any other age. Balaam was a bad man, though a true prophet. He had no sincere convictions of the superiority of Jehovah. He followed him because it suited his interests. Thus "a man may be full of the knowledge of God, and yet utterly destitute of the grace of God."

BALDE, Jacob, b. Jan. 4, 1604, at Eusisheim, Alsace; d. Aug. 9, 1668, at Neuburg, in the Bavarian palatinate; was educated in the University of Ingolstadt; entered the order of the Jesuits in 1624; became court-preacher and Bavarian historiographer in Munich, 1640, confessor and court-preacher to the count-palatine, Philipp Wilhelm; and acquired a great fame as a poet, not in his native tongue, — for singularly enough his German poetry is piteously poor, — but in Latin, as an imitator of Horace, Virgil, etc. He wrote odes, satires, and epics, of a romantic, humorous, and religious character. His Ode Parthenæ to the Virgin were separately published in 1648. His Urania Victrix (1657), describing the contest between the Christian soul and the temptation of the five senses, impressed Pope Alexander VII. so much that he sent the author a golden medal. A collected edition of his works appeared at Cologne, 1660, and a more complete one at Munich, 1729. Minor selections have often been made; for instance, by Orelli, 1805. See GEORG WESTERMAYER: Jacobus Balde, sein Leben u. seine Werke, München, 1868.

BALDWIN, Thomas, d. at Acre, Nov. 20, 1191; was born at Exeter, in humble circumstances, but received a good education, and was archdeacon of Exeter when he entered the Cistercian monastery of Ford, in Devonshire, whose abbot he afterwards became; was made Bishop of Worcester in 1180, and Archbishop of Canterbury in 1184; crowned Richard I. in 1189, and accompanied him in 1190 to the Holy Land. Some treatises by him have been published by Bertrand Tissier in Script. Bibl. Cisterciensis, V., 1662.

BALE, John, b. at Cove, Suffolk, Nov. 21, 1495; d. at Canterbury, November, 1563; was educated in the Carmelite monastery of Norwich, and at Jesus College, Oxford, but embraced the Reformation, and had to seek refuge in Flanders; returned under Edward VI. and was made Bishop of Ossory, in Ireland, 1552, but fled to the Continent after the accession of Mary, and lived for some years at Basle; returned under Elizabeth, and was made prebendary of the Church of Canterbury in 1560. His principal work is Illustrium Majoris Britannæ Scriptorum Catalogus, first published in 1548, then considerably enlarged in 1557-59; but he also became noted as a writer of Miracle-plays, in which he violently attacked the Roman Church. His play Kynge Johan has been published by the Camden Society (1838); and the Parker Society has published a selection of his works (1849).

BALL, John, b. at Cassington, near Woodstock, in Oxfordshire, October, 1585; d. Oct. 20, 1640. He was educated at Brazen-nose College and St. Mary's Hall, Oxford, and in 1610 was ordained, and became minister at Whitmore, near Newcastle, where he remained until his death. He was a zealous and faithful Puritan, one of the fathers of Presbyterianism in England, and, as Baxter says, "deserving as high esteem and honor as the best bishop in England." He issued a Small Catechism containing the Principles of Religion, which reached an eighteenth impression in 1637; and also a larger Catechism, entitled A short Treatise, containing all the principal Grounds of Christian Religion, which reached a tenth impression in 1635. These were published anonymously, and highly esteemed and widely used, and were among those consulted by the Westminster divines. He also published "A Treatise of Faith," divided into two parts: the first showing the Nature, and the second the Life of Faith," London, 1631 (3d edition, corrected and enlarged 1657, 4to, pp. 428, with an introduction by Richard Sibbs), an exceedingly valuable and complete discussion. His chief work was published after his death by his friend Simeon Ashe, with an introduction signed by five Westminster divines, entitled A Treatise of the Cove- nant of Grace, London, 1645. This is of great importance as exhibiting that view of the covenants which found expression in the Westminster symbols. According to Thomas Blake, "his purpose was to speak on this subject of the covenant, all that he had to say in all the whole body of divinity. That which he hath left behind gives us a taste of it." In this he anticipated Cocceius and the Dutch Federal Theology, as indeed his view of the covenants is somewhat different from theirs. Simeon Ashe also issued several other works of Ball of a practical and controversial character.

C. A. BRIGGS.

BALANCHE, Pierre Simon, b. in Lyons, Aug. 4, 1776; d. in Paris, Aug. 7, 1847; was an intimate member of that circle which formed around Chateaubriand and Madame Récamier, and belonged to the theocratic school of philosophers which arose in France during the restoration. His Palingénésie Sociale, 1830, is an attempt to construct the philosophy of history on the basis of the Christian revelation. The same idea is also set forth in his Vision d'Hébal, 1841, and Essai sur les Institutions, 1818. See SAINT-ÉLME: Portraits Contemporains II.; J. J. AMPÈRE: Balanche, 1848.

BALLE, Nicolai Edinger, b. in the Island of Lolland, Denmark, Oct. 12, 1744; d. in Copenhagen, Oct. 19, 1816; was appointed professor of theology in the University of Copenhagen, 1772, and Bishop of Sealand, 1782, and retired from public life in 1808. He wrote the primer, after which all children in Denmark, from 1794 to 1856, were taught Christianity; but the book was not a good one. Compared with the New Testament, which it professed to summarize in systematic form, it was singularly out of tune, and so was the man himself with respect to the time whose spiritual leader he was set to be. A pietist by heart and education, he was a rationalist by study and intellect; and placed between two generations, — of which the one had been commanded to go to church twice every Sunday, under penalty of a money-fine or bodily punishment; while the other proposed to shut up the churches, and use them as public warehouses, — he misunderstood them both, and only added to the confusion. In Copenhagen he began a course of Bible-readings in his church in order to stem the flood of rationalism; but he had to stop because he could not prevent loafers from playing cards in the pews. Out in the country he employed the force of the police to introduce his primer among the pietistical peasants, and children were actually taken away from their parents in order to be educated in what the government considered the only true Christianity. Personally, however he was a pious, kind-hearted, and well-meaning man.

CLEMENS PETERSEN.

BALLERINI, two brothers from Verona, — Pietro, b. Sept. 7, 1698, and Cirolamo, b. Jan. 29, 1702, — who, educated in the school of the Jesuits, and afterwards ordained priests, became celebrated by their joint labors on church-history and canon law. They edited the Sermones S. Xenonis, 1739, the Summa S. Antonini, 1740, the Opera Ratherii, 1756, the Opera Leonis Magni, 1755-57, etc. Pietro also took active part in the controversies of his time, and wrote De Potestate Ecclesiastica Pontificum et Conciliorum, 1765, and Liber de Vi- ac Ratione Primatus Pontificum, 1766. Pietro died in 1769; Girolamo several years afterwards. A complete list of their works is found in MAZZUCHELLI: Gli Scrittori d'Italia II., 178-185 up to 1758, and in Verona Illustrata II., 169 up to 1771.

BALLOU, Hosea, b. at Richmond, N.H., April 30, 1771; d. at Boston, June 7, 1852; was the son of a poor Baptist minister, and struggled hard for an education; began to preach in 1792, but embraced Universalism and Unitarianism; settled at Dana, Mass., in 1794, but removed in 1802 to Barnard, Vt.; in 1807 to Portsmouth, N.H.; in 1815 to Salem, Mass.; and in 1817 to Boston, where he took charge of the Second Universalist Society. He founded the Universalist Magazine in 1819, and in 1831 the Universalist Expositor. He also wrote Notes on the Parables, 1804; Treatise on the Atonement, 1807; The Doctrine of Future Retribution, 1846, and several volumes of sermons. — Hosea Ballou, jun., nephew of the preceding, b. at Halifax, Vt., Oct. 18, 1796; d. at Somerville, Mass., May 27, 1861; was successively pastor of Stafford, Roxbury, and Medford, and from 1853 president of Tufts College at Medford, Mass. He edited the Universalist Expositor, and Universalist Quarterly, and wrote The Ancient History of Universalism, 1829.

BALM in the Old Testament is supposed to be the resin of the terebinth or turpentine tree, which flows out spontaneously or through cuttings. It is exceedingly odoriferous, and greatly esteemed in the East for its healing properties. Gilead was especially noted for it (Jer. viii. 22, xvi. 11, cf. Gen. xxxvii. 25). But this is not the genuine balsam. The latter is known as balsam, incense, myrrh, bdellium, according to its different forms. The chief variety (Amyris Gilead. L.) is mostly thornless, has large triple leaves, numerous blossoms, and small, round-stone fruit. Myrrh, native to the south coast of Arabia, has short, thorny branches, and small triple leaves.

Josephus and Greek and Roman writers have much to say about balm. The former relates that the Queen of Sheba (1 Kings x. 10) brought from Arabia the first balsam-root to Solomon. On the other hand, Greek and Arabic authors affirm that the genuine balsam does not exist outside of Palestine. Certain it is that the gardens of Jericho produced the finest kind; so that Pompey brought it from there to Rome, and the Romans derived revenue from it. Cleopatra imported it thence into Egypt, and planted it in the famous gardens of Matara, between Bilbeis and Cairo.

FR. W. SCHULTZ.

BALMES, Jaime Lucio, an eminent Spanish politico-religious writer, b. at Vich, Catalonia, Aug. 28, 1810; d. there July 9, 1848. His parents were poor; but he was able to get a good education, — first in his native town, and then in the University of Cervera, whither he went in 1826, and where he took the different degrees. He was ordained, and in 1832 became an assistant professor. In 1835 he was made a doctor, in 1837 professor of mathematics. During these years Spain was rent by the strife between Maria Christina and Don Carlos. Balmes watched keenly the struggle, and while engaged in teaching, or literary work, still kept his eye upon the changes of the time. In 1840 he published a catechism, which had a large circulation. In 1842 he became associate editor of the Civilizacion, a literary journal, in which he had the coveted opportunity to express his political views. From February, 1844, to Dec. 31, 1846, he carried on the Pensamiento de la Nacion, and endeavored to repress the revolutionary spirit of his people, and advocate very strenuously the novel project of a marriage between the queen and the son of Don Carlos as the best way of ending the troubles; and when the queen was otherwise disposed of, he discontinued his journal, although it was lucrative. He still sought, however, the education of his people in what he conceived to be a sound philosophy. He hailed the advent of Pope Pius IX., and wrote a brilliant work (Pio IX., Madrid and Paris, 1847) in his praise: it was the last work he published. His principal works are two: (1) Filosofia fundamental, Barcelona, 1846, 4 vols.; translated into French, 1852, 3 vols.; into English, by H. F. Brownson, New York, 1857, 2 vols.; (2) El Protestantismo comparado con el Catolicismo en sus relaciones con la civilizacion Europea, Madrid, 1848, 3 vols. 8vo.; English translation from the French by Hanford and Kershaw, Protestantism and Catholicity compared in their effects on the Civilization of Europe, London, 1849; American reprint, translation revised, 2d ed., Baltimore, 1851. This latter famous book (see A. DE BLANCHE-RAFFIN: Jacques Balmes, sa vie et ses ouvrages, Paris, 1850) is an audacious attempt to show, by a review of modern civilization, in opposition to Guizot, that the influence of Catholicity has been vastly superior to that of Protestantism. The arguments are, of course, in the main, weak; but the book has accomplished its object, — it has retarded the Protestant cause in Spain.

BALSAMON, Theodore, d. towards the end of the twelfth century, deacon and librarian at the Church of St. Sophia, Constantinople; wrote, besides other works which have not been printed, a complete commentary on the Nomocanon and the Syntagma of Photius (1166-77), in which he tries to decide how far the civil laws mentioned in the Nomocanon are authoritative or not. The commentary on the Nomocanon was first printed in Paris in 1615, edited by Christof Justellus, and again in 1620 in Bibliotheca Juris Canonici by Voellus and Justellus. The Commentary on the Syntagma is found in Beveridge: Synodican I. See MORREUIL: Histoire du Droit Byzantin, Paris, 1846, III.

BALTUS, Jean Francois, b. at Metz, June 8, 1667; d. at Rheims, March 19, 1743; entered the order of the Jesuits in 1682, and distinguished himself by a number of literary and theological works, of which the most noticeable are, Reponse à l'Histoire des Oracles de M. Fontenelle, Strasburg, 1707, in which he maintains against Fontenelle that the ancient oracles were not mere frauds, but utterances under demoniacal influence; and Défense des Saints Pères accusés de Platonisme, Paris, 1711, in which he vindicates the originality of the Fathers and their complete independence of the ancient philosophy.

BALUZE, Etienne, b. at Tulle, Limousin, Dec. 24, 1630; d. in Paris, July 28, 1718; was educated in the Jesuit College of Toulouse, and devoted himself from youth to the collection and critical arrangement of historical documents; received the tonsure, and became in 1656 the co-laborer of Peter de Marca, Archbishop of Toulouse, afterwards of Paris, with whom he staid till his death in 1662; enjoyed the patronage of the Archbishop of Auch, and Le Tellier, the chancellor; was librarian to Colbert from 1667 to 1670, and obtained then a chair in canon law at the College Royal in Paris, of which institution he afterwards became director, but was discharged from this office, and even banished from the city in 1710, and not recalled until 1713. The cause of this trouble—very heavy to a man of eighty—was his Histoire Généalogique de la Maison d'Auvergne, which he wrote at the request of the Cardinal Bouillon, and which appeared in 1708 without giving offence. But in 1710 the cardinal fell in disgrace and fled the country; and it was now discovered that the book of Baluze might be used in support of claims which the house of Bouillon made on certain possessions in France. The first work of Baluze was his Antifrizonius, a criticism of Frizon's Gallia Purpurata. Of the works in whose execution he was associated with De Marca the Dissertationes de Concordia Sacerdotii et Imperii, 1663, is the most important. Of his editions of older authors, that of Salvian and Vincent of Lerins appeared in 1663; that of Lupus of Ferrières, in 1664; that of Agobard, Amulo, Leidrad, and Florus Diaconus, in 1666, etc. Of his great collections of historical documents the Capitularia Regum Francorum appeared in 1677; the Epistole Innocentii III., in 1682; the Nova Collectio Conciliorum, 1683. Of his more independent works the Vitæ Paparum Avenionensium appeared in 1693, and his Miscellaneous Libri Septem in 1677, 1679, 1680, 1683, 1700, 1713, and 1715. His last work was an edition of Cyprian, which he left unfinished, but which was completed by Maran.

LIT. — A complete list of the works of Baluze is found in Chiviac's edition of the Capitularia, Paris, 1780, I., 62–66. His life, written by himself, is found in Martin's Bibliotheca Baluziana, Paris, 1719. See VITRAC: Éloge de Baluze, Limoges, 1779.

BAMBAS, Neophytos, d. in Athens, 1855; was born in the Island of Chios; studied in Paris, and worked as professor of philosophy and rhetoric, first in the University of Corfu, then in that of Athens. He wrote manuals of ethics, rhetoric, and grammar; and, in connection with Nicholaides and Lowndes, he translated the Bible into modern Greek.

BAMPTON LECTURES, a series of eight lectures or sermons to be delivered annually at the University of Oxford, "to confirm and establish the Christian faith, and to confute all heretics and schismatics." They were instituted by John Bampton, Canon of Salisbury (b. 1689; d. 1751), who left his estate for that purpose. The lecturer must at least be a master of arts from Oxford or Cambridge. He is chosen by the heads of colleges, and no one can be chosen a second time. The lectures began in 1780, and the volumes containing them form a valuable body of apologetical literature. See LECTURES.

BAN denoted, in the civil law of the old German Empire, a declaration of outlawry, and was in the twelfth century adopted by the church as the common name for a declaration of excommunication. See EXCOMMUNICATION.

BANCROFT, Richard, b. at Farnworth, Lancashire, 1544; d. in Lambeth Palace, London, Nov. 2, 1610; was educated in the University of Cambridge, and became Bishop of London in 1597, and Archbishop of Canterbury in 1605. He was a High-Churchman, asserting that the episcopal authority is based upon a divine right, and most violently opposed to the Puritans, whom he often attacked in his sermons. As president of the Convocation, he presented for adoption the Book of Canons now in force, and as archbishop he was "the chief overseer" of the authorized version of the Bible, which he had opposed at the Hampton Court Conference (1604). His literary remains are unimportant.

BANGORIAN CONTROVERSY. See HOADLEY, Bishop of Bangor.

BANNEZ, Dominico, b. at Valladolid, 1527; d. at Medina del Campo, 1604; entered the order of the Dominicans in 1544; lectured on theology in Valladolid, Alcalá, and Avila; became the confessor of St. Theresa, and contributed, as an ardent disciple of Thomas Aquinas, very much to the condemnation of the works of Molina. Among other works he has also written a commentary on the Summa Theologica of St. Thomas.

BANNS (plur. of ban), a public announcement in church, during service, of an intended marriage, seem to have originated very early as a custom in the Christian community, since to it Tertullian repeatedly alludes. In the English Church they became a legal enactment in 1200, when the synod of Westminster decreed that "no marriage shall be contracted without banns thrice published in the church." So also in the Lutheran churches of Europe. The Council of the Lateran, 1215, established them as law for the whole Latin Church.

BAPHOMET ("Baptism of Metis"), a peculiar kind of figures carved in stone or wood, with two faces, one male and one female, and surrounded by serpents. Of their symbolical meaning nothing definite is known, though they played a conspicuous part in the process of the Templars, to whose insignia they belonged. See VON NELL: Baphometische Actenstücke, Vienna, 1819.

BAPTISM. (A Pedobaptist View.) Meaning and Use of Terms. — Βαπτισμ is a derivative, modifying the meaning of its root, βάπτω. Βάπτω means: (1) To do a definite act, to dip; (2) To effect a definite change of condition, to dye; (3) To effect a thorough change of condition by assimilating quality or influence, without color, to temper, to steep, to imbue. Thus Βάπτω tempers iron by water or oil, Sophocles, Ajax 651, 653 (Scholium); steeps with dew, Dan. iv. 30. v. 21, Septuagint; steeps with poison, Strabo, Geography, XVI., 1117; imbues with gall, Bentley, Epigrams, p. 156; imbues with Caesarism, Marcus Aurelius A. Meditations, VI., 25; imbues with integrity, III., 6; imbues with thoughts, V., 17; imbues with Judaism, Epictetus, Enchiridion, XI., 9. These changes of condition in number and diversity, specialized by the characteristic of the agency, are noticeable, especially because βάπτω, burdened by two meanings, does not follow out this third meaning, but turns it over for development to its derivative, βαπτίζω.

1. Classic Baptism. — βαπτίζω means thoroughly to change condition by characteristic assimilating quality or influence, controlling (like its root) any act or method to this end. Thus ships and crews sunk by destructive storm or beak of hostile ship are destructively baptized. An altar ceremonially cleansed by water poured or sprinkled on it is ceremonially baptized. Convivialists drinking intoxicating wine are drunkenly baptized. And a man drinking a soporific draught is baptized, thoroughly changed in condition, conformably with this soporific characteristic. For proof in detail of these positions, see the author's Classic Baptism.

2. Judaic Baptism. — This is a thorough change of condition from ceremonial defilement to ceremonial purity. Heifer-ashes mixed with spring water had such legal cleansing power. As the touch of a grave defiled the whole body, so a drop of this sprinkled ashes purified the whole body. Josephus, Jew. Antiq., IV., 4; Philo, De Sacrificantiis; Cyril of Alex., In Isaiam, III., 129; Heb. ix. 13. When long and familiar use drops the defining agency, βαπτίζω, absorbing its idea, expresses definite condition, as in Sirach xxxiv. 30; Judith xii. 7; Mark vii. 4; Luke xi. 38; Heb. ix. 11. In such and such like cases, βαπτίζω means to purify ceremonially. See, for evidence, the author's Judaic Baptism.

3. Baptism of Inspiration. — This is "one baptism," — a thorough change of spiritual condition, assimilating the soul to the characteristic quality of the divine baptizer. Its elements are repentance and faith: its results are remission and regeneration. It is grounded in the personal baptism of Jesus, covenanting to "fulfil all righteousness" (Matt. iii. 15), and to endure sacrificial death (Mark x. 38). It is effected by the Holy Ghost (Matt. iii. 11). It is received by all who enter into the kingdom of God (John iii. 3; 1 Cor. xii. 13). Its final issue is baptism "into the Name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost," — subjection, reconciliation, and affiliation with the living God.

(1) The baptism of John preached (Matt. iii. 2; Luke iii. 3; Acts xiii. 24) was this "one baptism" in swelling bud; the Holy Ghost and Lamb of God within it, not yet unfolded. (2) The baptism of John administered was this "one baptism" in symbol, "making manifest Jesus, the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world" (John i. 29, 31; Matt. iii. 11; Acts xix. 4). (3) The baptism of Christianity is John's baptism unfolded, revealing the Lamb of God slain and the Holy Ghost sent (Acts ii. 23, 33, 38, iii. 19, xi. 15-18). (4) The symbol-baptism of Christianity is the perpetuation of the symbolism of the baptism John "preached," and of the "one baptism" of inspiration (John i. 29-33, iii. 22, iv. 2; Acts x. 47).

βαπτίζω εις expresses the ideal (Cremer, Bib. Theo. Lex., s.v.) passing into a spiritual element, εις μετάνοιαν, εις ἄφεσιν (John), εις Χριστόν, εις τὸν θεόν (Christianity), by which the baptized are thoroughly changed in condition, being

βαπτίζω ἐν is never associated with the ideal element of baptism. Acts x. 48 is no exception (see Codex Sinaiticus). The phrase expresses locality and agency: it cannot express passing into: with ἐν ποταμῷ (Mark i. 5) it means the place where, within the banks of the river, not within the water (Iliad, XVIII., 521). No person in the New Testament is shown, by word or fact, to be under water in the administration of baptism. Sprinkling being used by inspiration to apply the blood of the type lamb of the flock, and to express the reception of the antitype blood of the Lamb of God (1 Pet. i. 2), we have divine authority to apply the water, symbol of this antitype blood, by sprinkling; and no other essentially diverse way is authorized. For minute detail and evidence, see the author's Johannic and Christian Baptism.

4. Patristic Baptism is claimed to be, and in fact is, the same in nature with the "one baptism" of inspiration. It has the same elements, — repentance, faith, remission, regeneration; the same ground basis, — the redemptive work of the incarnate Son of God; the same divine agent, — the Holy Spirit; the same ultimate end, — reconciliation with God the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. It departs, in its accomplishment, from inspiration, in that "baptized" water is made co-efficient with the Holy Spirit to this end (Cyprian, see Tertullian, Migne's edition, III., 1082); also in the abandonment of the symbol-baptism of inspiration; and, further, in the introduction of a symbol-burial with Jesus in the rock sepulchre, by covering the baptized in water. This "burial" has been mistaken for the baptism. The mistake is as great and absolute as the mistaking of θάπτω for βαπτίζω. These early Christian writers make καλύπτω, καταβαίνω, καταδύω, and such like words, interchangeable with θάπτω, but never with βαπτίζω. On the other hand, they make καθαρίζω, ἁγιάζω, λοῦω, and such like words, equivalent and interchangeable with βαπτίζω, but never with θάπτω. This symbol-burial is derived from Rom. vi. 4, where there is no confusion of θάπτω and βαπτίζω. The originators of symbol-burial (not symbol-baptism) never confounded Paul's "burial in the rock" with Paul's "baptism into the death of Christ" on the cross. Such supreme error was reserved for to-day. They repudiate it: 1. Because they claim their baptism to be spiritual, a baptism of the soul by the Holy Spirit, and "baptized" water imbued with the Holy Spirit; 2. Because they omit this symbol-burial "almost daily" in baptizing the sick, yet declare the baptism "perfect;" 3. Because they abundantly cite "images of baptism" which have no "covering;" 4. Because they declare baptisms by blood, tears, fire, sword, touch, to be glorious and perfect "baptisms" — not burials; 5. Because they deny that "simple" water can, by any covering, effect their baptism; 6. Because their baptizing water was "baptized" (purified, sanctified), "that it might be able, by its own baptism," to baptize (take away sin); 7. Because long usage in relations with remission and regeneration had given to βαπτίζω (not θάπτω) the meaning, to cleanse from sin, to regenerate. These reasons are solidified by the following definition of Basil the Great, Moralia III., 736: "What is the purport and power of the (Christian) baptism?" "Thoroughly to change the baptized as to mind, speech, and act, so as to become, conformably with the power bestowed, such as is that of which he was born." There is no "burial" in this definition. Thorough changes of condition, multitudinous in number, diversified in nature, executed by every variety of act, specialized by the baptizing agency, are present everywhere in Classic, Judaic, Inspired, and Patristic baptisms. Minute details and full evidence in the author's Patristic Baptism.

BAPTISM. (The Baptist View.)—The rite ordained by Jesus Christ (Matt. xxviii. 19) for public confession of God, Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, and for initiation into the fellowship of his disciples. Dorner, Theology, 1880, § 28.

The Act.—The examples of baptism in the New Testament occur in rivers (Matt. iii. 6; Mark i. 5), or pools (Acts viii. 36; John iii. 23). Jesus himself was baptized in the Jordan (Matt. iii. 16; Mark i. 9). Baptism is referred to as a "burial" (Rom. vi. 4; Col. ii. 12), and by Peter is called the antitype of the flood (1 Pet. iii. 21).

The authorities on philology, on the archæology and history of Christian churches, are unanimous in asserting that the baptism of the New Testament and of the early ages of Christianity was a dipping, a submersion of the candidate in water. All philologists and lexicographers of the Greek language give "immersion," "submersion," or cognate terms, as the constant signification of the noun or verb. The archæologists Augusti, DeRossi, Garucci, Martigny, De Vogué, etc., tell us that the monumental remains in Asia, Africa, and Europe, prove that immersion was the act of baptism. Historians, and those who treat of the early liturgies, unite in the same testimony. See Wall, Hist. Infant Bapt. (vol. 1, p. 570), Oxford, 1862; Höfing, Sacr. d. Taufe (vol. 1, p. 46). There is not a dissenting voice in all the literature of the Christian church for twelve hundred years. Only in case of great sickness was any other act allowed, and then only as a quasi-baptism.

The many ancient baptisteries now remaining in Asia, Africa, and Europe, were built and used for the purpose of immersion. The Oriental churches, Greek, Russian, Armenian, Nestorian, Coptic, and others, have always practised immersion, and allow nothing else for baptism, Gass, Symbolik der griechischen Kirche, 1872, pp. 242, 243. The western churches also preserved the baptism of the New Testament for thirteen hundred years and then gradually introduced pouring or sprinkling, Mabillon, Museum Ital. (1724), vol. 1, p. 106; Daniel, Codex Liturgicus (1847-53), vol. 1, p. 179 ff.; Wetzer and Welte, Kirchen-Lex. Art. "Taufe." Luther sought, against the tendency of the times, to restore immersion (Opera Lat. 3: 394; Werke 21: 17, 139, 22: 163, 293, etc., Erlangen edit.). The rubric, in Luther's Taufbüchlein of 1523 and 1527, to immerse ("tauche es," [Daniel, vol. 2, p. 199, note with quotations from Luther's works]) the candidate, was retained in many of the Agenda of the Lutheran churches during the sixteenth century, Höfing, Sacr. d. Taufe (vol. 1, p. 53, vol. 2, p. 56, 64), just as the rubric "to dip" is still retained in the baptismal service of the English and American Episcopal churches. Calvin was the first to assert that immersion was of no importance; "whether the person who is baptized be wholly immersed, and whether thrice or once, or whether water be only poured or sprinkled upon him, is of no importance: churches ought to be left at liberty in this respect to act according to the difference of countries. The very word baptize, however, signifies to immerse; and it is certain that immersion was the practice of the ancient church" (Instit., Bk. IV., ch. 15, sect. 19).

All western churches, except the Baptist, have accepted sprinkling.

The Recipients.—Among the last teachings and precepts of the Saviour to his apostles were these: "That repentance and remission of sins should be preached in his name among all nations, beginning at Jerusalem. And ye are witnesses of these things" (Luke xxiv. 47, 48). "Go ye and preach the gospel to every creature. He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved" (Mark xvi. 15, 16). "Go ye therefore and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost; teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you" (Matt. xxviii. 19, 20).

According to these words, the apostles were to "preach repentance and remission of sins in his name," to "teach all nations," to "baptize them," and to "teach them to observe all things whatsoever" Jesus had commanded them.

The examples given in the New Testament of baptisms by the apostles show us how they understood and obeyed these precepts. They baptized those who "repented" and "received their word" (Acts ii. 38, 41); those who "believed" (Acts viii. 12, 38, ix. 18, x. 47, 48, xvi. 15, 33, xviii. 8, xix. 5).

The mental states the apostles predicate of the baptized are those of believers only. They have died to sin, and been made alive to God to walk in newness of life (Rom. vi. 4); they drink of one spirit (1 Cor. xiii. 13); they "are all the children of God by faith in Christ Jesus. For as many of you as have been baptized into Christ Jesus have put on Christ" (Gal. iii. 27); they were "raised to life with Christ through the faith of the operation of God" (Col. ii. 12). And by Peter baptism is said to be, "not the putting-away of the filth of the flesh, but the answer" (earnest seeking, requirement) "of a good conscience toward God" (1 Pet. iii. 21).

The designations of the churches by Paul lead to the same conclusion. The churches are addressed as those who are "sanctified," "called," "holy," who "call upon the name of Christ" (1 Cor. i. 2; 2 Cor. i. 1); "saints, believers" (Eph. i. 1, 22, 23); "once alienated, and enemies in their minds," but "now reconciled" (Col. i. 21); they brought forth a "work of faith, and labor of love, and patience of hope" (1 Thess. i. 1; 2 Thess. i. 1, 3).

But in the second and third century after the apostolic age, the mystic power of regeneration was by many ascribed to baptism. It was imagined that none could be saved without baptism, and gradually the baptism of infants was introduced. The growth of this new custom was very slow. Many of the most eminent Christians of the fourth century did not baptize their infants. Gregory of Nazianzum in Cappadocia (b. A.D. 330), the son of a bishop, and his mother the saintly Nonna, was not baptized till he was converted at thirty years of age. Basil the Great, also of Cappadocia (b. A.D. 329), whose mother was the pious Emmelia, was not baptized till he was converted, when about thirty years old. Chrysostom of Antioch in Syria (b. A.D. 347), whose mother Anthusa was one of the noblest Christian women, was not baptized till he was converted. And the son of the holy Monica, Augustine of Numidia, was not baptized till he was converted at the age of thirty-two. Here were four of the most eminent Christians of the fourth century, who prayed for their infants both before and after their birth, who did not have them baptized. No plausible theory has yet been found to harmonize these facts with the assumed institution of infant-baptism by Christ. To the present time it has been found "difficult, if not impossible, to give a definition of the sacraments in their great leading fundamental aspects, which would at the same time apply to and include the special case of the baptism of infants" (W. Cunningham, Reformers and Theology of Reformation, p. 250). This "difficulty, if not impossibility," arises from the contradiction between infant-baptism and the fundamental doctrines of the gospel, — election, regeneration, justification by faith, — as well as from the absence of precept or example for infant-baptism in the New Testament.

Symbolism. — The passages referring to the symbolism of baptism are, "Know ye not, that so many of us as were baptized into Jesus Christ were baptized into his death? Therefore we are buried with him by baptism into death; that like as Christ was raised up from the dead by the glory of the Father, even so we also should walk in newness of life" (Rom. vi. 3, 4, comp. vers. 2, 5-11); "buried with him in baptism, wherein also ye are risen with him through the faith of the operation of God, who raised him from the dead" (Col. ii. 12); "for as many of you as have been baptized into Christ Jesus have put on Christ" (Gal. iii. 27).

Besides the public confession of God, three in one, Father, Son, and Holy Spirit (Matt. xxviii. 19), baptism is a symbol of "putting on Christ" (Gal. iii. 27, comp. Rom. xiii. 14); of union, through faith, with Christ in his death and resurrection (Rom. vi. 3, 4; 1 Cor. xii. 13; Col. ii. 12); that is, those who were "dead in sins," having received forgiveness, have died with Christ to sin, and have been made "alive by God through Christ" to "walk in newness of life" (Rom. vi. 3-11; Col. ii. 12, 13).

H. OSGOOD.

BAPTISM. I. Considered Biblically. The New-Testament Idea. — We do not find in the New Testament any concise, dogmatic statement in regard to baptism: we have only allusions to the rite, and remarks in connection with descriptions of its performance; and the difficulty in interpreting the former (e.g. John iii. 5; Eph. v. 26; Tit. iii. 5) is increased, because in them baptism manifestly stands as a symbol for the cleansing and quickening power of the word and doctrine.

Inasmuch as Jewish proselyte-baptism is much later than Christianity, we must search for the prototype of Christian baptism in the illustrations of the Old-Testament economy (Lev. xiv. 7; Num. xxxi. 19 sqq.), in the purifying Jordan-washing (2 Kings v. 10), and in the prophetic expressions, e.g., Isa. i. 16; Zech. xiii. 1; particularly Ezek. xxxvi. 25-30 [and, according to some, in Essenic washings]. Resting upon these passages, John [see JOHN THE BAPTIST] and the disciples of Jesus baptized in the Jordan. The two baptisms were manifestly the same while our Lord was upon the earth; but that after his resurrection our Lord coupled water-baptism with the baptism of the Holy Spirit, of which John had prophesied (Matt. xxviii. 18-20; Mark xvi. 16), and that the two went together in the early church, is proved from Acts ii. 38, x. 44 sqq., xix. 1 sqq. The outpouring of the Spirit consequent upon the laying-on of the apostles' hands expressed the thought that the blessing of baptism comes from the Lord of the Church; for such an action was an accompaniment to prayer. The Spirit had already been active in the recipient's heart; for it was expressly declared impossible to believe without the Spirit's aid (1 Cor. xii. 13). Baptism is rather the initiatory rite into the Christian Church, the Body of Christ (Acts ii. 41, v. 14). It gives the seal to all previous spiritual experiences, and is the promise of growth with the Body of Christ, of which the baptized is an integral part; for, in the language of Paul, he that had "put on Christ" was not only in a personal, but in an integral relation to him as a member of his Body, so that the Church is one man in Christ Jesus (Gal. iii. 27, 28). But we are not in the least justified in drawing the conclusion that baptism is necessary to salvation.

Baptism is a highly symbolical act. The washing of the body symbolizes the cleansing from sin, spoken of as forgiveness (Acts ii. 38, cf. xxii. 16, and 1 Cor. vi. 11), as a cleansing by the word (Eph. v. 26), as the restoration of a good conscience (Heb. x. 22, 23). The power, however, to effect these changes, lies not in the water, but in God. It also symbolizes the burial with Christ (Rom. vi. 3, 4; Col. ii. 12), by reason of which the recipient is bound to die unto sin. The same idea is brought out in the analogy between baptism and the circumcision of Christ: the "putting-off of the body of the flesh" (Col. ii. 11). It has also been considered by some a symbol of regeneration (John iii. 5; Tit. iii. 5). There is no trace of infant-baptism in the New Testament. See BAPTISM OF INFANTS. All attempts to deduce it from the words of institution, or from such passages as 1 Cor. i. 16, must be given up as arbitrary. Indeed, 1 Cor. vii. 14 ("For the unbelieving husband is sanctified in the wife, and the unbelieving wife is sanctified in the brother: else were your children unclean; but now they are holy,") rules out decisively all such deductions; for, if pedobaptism were taught by Paul, he would have linked the salvation of the children with their baptism, and not with the faith of their parents. At the same time the passage brings out the justifying ground for pedobaptism; viz., the parental faith. — Baptism was administered in running water.

II. Considered in its Relation to Johannic Baptism. — The speculative question involved, has greatly interested the theologians. The opinion of antiquity on this point is well summarized by Bellarmine in his De Sacramento Baptismi, Lib. I., Cap. XIX.-XXII. (ed. Romæ, 1838, tom. III., pp. 260-269), and amounts to this: (1) The baptism of John was not, like the Christian, a sacrament; for, although there was water, there was no invocation of the Trinity. (2) It had neither the power nor the efficiency of Christian baptism, because it was without the co-operation of the Holy Spirit. (3) In order to be saved, it was necessary for those who were baptized by John to receive Christian baptism.

On the other hand, the Lutheran and Reformed Confessions asserted the perfect identity of the two forms of baptism, principally on the ground that John had preached the fundamental truths of the gospel. So Luther (Erlangen Ausgabe, vol. 19, p. 169); Chemnitz (Exam. Conc. Trident. de Bapt. can. 1); Gerhard (Loci Theolog., vol. IX., ed. Cotta, pp. 101-103). Zwingli (tom. III. 234) characteristically says, "They were both alike, the one as little efficacious [i.e., as a mere water-washing] as the other." And Calvin (Instit. IV., cap. 15, § 7, 8) saw in the office of the Baptist nothing different from that of the apostles, and so he attributed to John the same baptism. The Socinians and the Arminians took the Roman-Catholic position, which is doubtless correct on scriptural grounds alone, and agrees with the confession of the Baptist (Matt. iii. 11), the statement of Christ himself as to the relation of the same to the kingdom (Matt. xi. 11), and with the apostolic ideas that Christ gave a new spirit to mankind, that it dwells in his Church, and that the object of baptism is the reception into the communion of this spirit.

III. Considered Practically. (1) The Right to Baptize, and Lay Baptism. — There is no evidence that in apostolic times the right to administer baptism was confined to any particular office. The deacon Philip (Acts viii. 38) and the apostle Paul (1 Cor. i. 14-16) baptized; but the latter does not seem to have considered it part of his duty. Probably the disciples baptized the first converts in a place, and then let them baptize the others. Still it may well have been, that, even in these times, baptism was usually administered by the chief officer of the congregation. Tertullian, while granting in the abstract the right to the laity on the ground that what all received in common might be dispensed by all in common, nevertheless demands, in the interests of ecclesiastical order and unity, that the exercise of this right, except in cases of necessity, be restricted to the ecclesiastics, ordinarily to the bishop (De Bapt. 17). To the same effect speaks Jerome (contra Luciferianos, 4). Cyprian is the first of the fathers to claim baptism as the absolute prerogative of the bishop as the successor of the apostles and of the bearer of the keys (Epist. 73, 7); the Apostolical Constitutions also (III. 10) claim baptism for the priestly office exclusively. The early church custom gave to bishops, and then to presbyters and deacons commissioned by them, the right to baptize, but allowed it to the laity only in extreme cases. The schoolmen, particularly Thomas Aquinas, modified this teaching by extending the right to priests. The Roman Church in the Catechism of the Council of Trent (or Roman Catechism), P. II., c. II., qv. 23, teaches that priests and bishops have equal right in the matter: deacons also can baptize on commission of the bishop, and in case of need anybody, — man or woman, Christians or Jews, orthodox or heretics. Thus the present church is more liberal than some of her founders; for Tertullian denies the right to women, as the Apostolical Constitutions (III. 9) do; and it appears from Epiphanius (Hæc. 42, 4), that it was looked upon as an heretical practice. Augustine believed that baptism by a Jew or a heathen would not, even if valid, be of equal efficacy to baptism by a Catholic or heretic (De Bapt. VII. 53, §§ 101, 102). Self-baptism was not valid. But baptism given in sport, if the proper words be used, is regarded as valid by Rome.

The two Protestant Confessions differ upon the question of lay-baptism. Luther asserted that baptism was necessary to salvation; so he granted to laity the right to baptize in case of need, but inconsistently, that unbaptized infants were not lost, if their failure to be baptized did not arise from either guilt, or contempt of the divine command. The Reformed rejected his doctrine, and restricted the right to the clergy.

(2) The Subjects of Baptism. — Church Councils have decided these are: First, only the living. The practice of baptizing the dead had sprung up among the later Montanists. Second, only those who were born. The question is discussed by Augustine, whether infants in the womb were fit subjects of baptism, and answered negatively (Ep. 187, cap. 10, § 32 sqq.). The scholastic theology allows the baptism of partially born children, even where there is an abnormal presentation; although, in the latter case, Thomas Aquinas taught, that, if the child survived, it should receive the hypothetical baptism spoken of below (Summa Theologica, Pars Tertia, Q. LXVIII., art. 11). Abortive and abnormal births are not to be baptized. Grown persons who are insane are to be baptized, if they shall ever desire it.

As the general condition of baptism, there must be the unforced decision and the personal desire of the candidate: in the case of infants of Christian parents, the agreement of parents or guardians is accepted instead. It is true that force has been used by Roman missionaries, and has been defended by councils but its use is exceptional, and contrary to the principles of the church. (Roman Catechism, P. II., c. II., qu. 37.) All those grown person who followed a "disreputable or godless calling," as, for instance, Pagan actors, artists who maintained Paganism, astrologers, etc., so long as they continued in these occupations, could not be catechumens, much less baptized.

(3) The Baptismal Formula. — This is given in its complete form in Matt. xxviii. 19; but since, in the Acts and in the Pauline Epistles, the phrase baptizing "in the name of Christ" occurs, the question naturally arose whether it was allowable to use any shorter formula, — whether to do so was a later apostolic custom. Various opinions have been expressed; but the Roman Catechism expresses the general opinion when it denies sufficiency to any other than the trine formula. The Roman Church formula is, "Ego te baptizo in nomine Patris et Filii et Spiritus Sancti." The Roman Catechism (P. II., c. II., qu. 13) thus explains: The minister ("I baptize") of the Sacrament, the person to be baptized ("thee"), and the principal efficient cause of baptism, are contained in the formula; for baptism is the work, not of the Son alone, but of the three Persons of the blessed Trinity. By saying "in the name," not "names," we distinctly declare that in the Trinity there is but one nature and Godhead. Similar is the use and the explanation of Evangelical Protestantism. In the Greek Church the formula is, βαπτίζεται ὁ δοῦλος τοῦ Θεοῦ ὁ δέινα εἰς τὸ ὄνομα τοῦ Πατρὸς — Ἀμὴν — καὶ τοῦ Υἱοῦ — Ἀμὴν — καὶ τοῦ ἁγίου Πνεύματος — Ἀμὴν — νῦν καὶ αἰεὶ εἰς τοὺς αἰῶνας τῶν αἰώνων. Ἀμὴν. (Let this servant of God N. be baptized in the name of the Father — Amen — and of the Son — Amen — and of the Holy Ghost — Amen — now and ever, world without end. Amen.) In the Syrian liturgy of the Antiochian and Jerusalem churches the same appears with many interpolations. In the Roman Church the priest is instructed to say over a person of whose previous baptism doubt exists, "I do not re-baptize thee; but, if thou hast not been as yet baptized, I baptize thee," etc. (Hypothetical Baptism.)

(4) Baptism by Immersion, Affusion (Pouring), and Aspersio (Sprinkling). — In the primitive church, baptism was by immersion except in the case of the sick (clinic baptism), who were baptized by pouring or sprinkling. These latter were often regarded as not properly baptized, either because they had not completed their catechuminate, or the symbolism of the rite was not fully observed, or because of the small amount of water necessarily used. [The 12th Canon of the Council of Neo-Cæsarea (314-325) is: "Whoever has received clinic baptism (through his own fault) cannot become a priest, because he professed his faith under pressure (fear of death), and not from deliberate choice, unless he greatly excel afterwards in zeal and faith, or there is a deficiency of other eligible men." Hefele, Conciliengeschichte Vol. I. § 17, 1st ed.] In 816 the Council of Calcuth (Chelsea in England) forbade the priests to pour water upon the infants' heads, but ordered to immerse them [Hefele, Vol. IV. § 416]; the Council of Nemours (1284) limited sprinkling to cases of necessity; and Thomas Aquinas (Summa Theologica P. III. qu. LXVI.; De Baptismo. art. vii.) says, although it may be safer to baptize by immersion, yet sprinkling and pouring are also allowable. The Council of Ravenna (1311) was the first to allow a choice between sprinkling and immersion (11th Can. Hefele, Vol VI § 699); but at an earlier date, 1287, the canons of the Council of the Liege bishop John prescribe the way in which the sprinkling of children should be performed. The practice first came into common use at the end of the thirteenth century, and was favored by the growing rarity of adult baptism. It is the present practice of the Roman Church; but in the Greek Church immersion is insisted on as essential. Luther sided with the immersionists, described the baptismal act as an immersion, and derived Taufe (German for "baptism") from tief ("deep"), because what one baptized, he sank tief in the water. Calvin declared the whole question of the mode of baptism a matter of indifference (Inst. IV. c. 15, § 19). Baptism in the early church was a triple immersion. Various explanations were given: some referred it to apostolic custom. Thomas Aquinas calls it a sin to immerse only once (l.c. qu. LXVI. art. viii.). The Roman ritual enjoins the trine affusion (pouring) on the head, as do the Lutheran Kirchenordnungen. Some prescribe the simple dip or pouring; others, expressly declare that in the Trinity there is but one nature and Godhead. Similar is the use and the explanation of Evangelical Protestantism. (5) The Time of Baptism. — Tertullian maintained all times were alike; but still very early the church determined upon the period between Easter and Whitsunday, when the so-called "Solemn Baptism" was administered. These times were chosen with especial reference to the catechumens; but, as infant baptism gained in favor, indifference as to the time increased. Complaints were heard, and remedies suggested, in the church councils; e.g., the second Council of Macon, Oct. 23, 1585, in its third canon decreed, on the strength of the statement that only two or three were presented for baptism at Easter, that, except in necessary cases, baptisms must take place on Easter (Hefele, Vol. IV. § 286). Thomas Aquinas lays down the following principles (l. c. qu. LXVIII. art. 3), which are adopted in the Roman Catechism (qu. 31, 34-36): infants are to be baptized soon after birth, because they are liable to die, and also are at that age incapable of instruction; but adults should not be baptized before they are thoroughly indoctrinated, and can wait for "solemn baptism." If, when they are fully prepared, there is danger in delay, there is no reason to wait until the Easter season. As a matter of fact, one finds in Rome and in cathedrals on Easter eve, no baptisms except occasionally a Jew's. In the Greek Church there is no longer any set time.

(6) Sponsors were probably unknown before the existence of infant baptism: with them also came in a special liturgy. Originally the parents themselves took the usual vows; but the council of Mainz (Mayence), 813, can. 55, forbade them; and the Roman Catechism (qu. 28) defends the present practice on the singular ground that the difference between the spiritual and the bodily education of the child may be all the sharper emphasized. The Roman Church has detailed with great minuteness the duties of sponsors, and described in varied phrases their position. So close is supposed to be the relationship between the sponsors and those whom they have brought to baptism, that they are not permitted to marry. If they should marry, the church declares the bond dissolved. Nor can the baptizer and baptized marry. Sponsors are mentioned in the fourth century in connection with adults at baptism; and they were necessary, because of the inability of the clergy to keep watch of all who applied for baptism, and see that their walk corresponded with their profession. And even catechumens would need sponsors, if, by sudden sickness, they were deprived of speech or consciousness.

Deacons, deaconesses, widows, consecrated virgins, were favorite classes from which to choose sponsors. Priests, monks, and nuns were forbidden to serve. In the beginning each baptized one had a sponsor of the same sex; but soon several were common, notwithstanding conciliar action. The Roman Catechism (qu. 29) allows no more than two of opposite sexes. At Avignon (1337) it was declared that the expensive presents expected of sponsors was the reason why many infants were unbaptized: therefore the council forbade to give more than a white dress and a wax candle.

The choice of sponsors in those Protestant churches where they exist is guided by similar principles, and they discharge similar duties to those in the Roman Church. There are, however, some curiosities in the way of legislation. Thus, in Pomerania, Calvinists were classed with heretics as ineligible to sponsorship. In Saxony there was a fine of a hundred gulden for having more than three sponsors. In Coburg an ordinance was passed in 1626, that, where it was customary to have three sponsors, a bastard should have only one; but where, on the other hand, one was customary, the bastard should have three.

(7) The Ritual of Baptism.—In the early church, preparation preceded baptism. This consisted of prayer, instruction, and, above all, in the humiliation of the soul before God, of which fasting was the characteristic expression; and in this fasting and praying the congregation shared: so Justin, Apol. I., 61. Tertullian, De Bapt., c. xx., says, "They who are about to enter baptism ought to pray with repeated prayers, fasts, and bendings of the knee, and vigils all the night through, and with confession of all bygone sins." The catechumenate was later divided into classes. 1. The Rudes; i.e., those who had been designated as Christians by the sign of the cross; 2. The Catechumens proper, both the Audientes (hearers) and Genusflectentes (kneelers); 3. The Competentes (those prepared for baptism). Persons were received into the catechumenate by prayer and the solemn laying-on of hands. The catechumens of the first class were allowed only to hear the sermons and the Scripture-reading. See CATECHETICS. The ceremony of baptism included: 1. The giving-in of the names of the catechumen (occasionally one dropped the Pagan name, and took one distinctively Christian); 2. The renunciation of the devil, his pomp, and all his angels (the person stood facing the west,—the place of darkness); 3. Exorcism, accompanied by breathing upon the baptismal waters (insufflation); 4. The opening of the ears and the nose by the priest's touching them with his spittal (cf. Mark viii. 23); 5. The anointing with consecrated oil; 6. The devout repetition of the Apostles' Creed and the Lord's Prayer by the officiating priest, followed by a brief explanation of the same, a recitation of the beginnings of the four Gospels, and also of a comparison between the four evangelists and the cherubim of Ezek. i. 10; 7. The responsive recitation by the catechumen of the Creed and the Lord's Prayer.

The baptism itself consisted in (1) [The entire disrobing of the catechumen, see Smith and Cheetham, Dict. Chr. Antiq., p. 160]; (2) The threefold immersion; (3) The tasting of a mixture of milk and honey (because the baptized are like new-born children of God), see Tertullian, De corona 3; (4) The anointing with oil (chrism); (5) The laying-on of the hands (imposition); (6) Dressing in white clothing, which was worn a week, and binding of a piece of white linen around the head (the chrismale), intended to retain the "chrism" upon the head during the week. In the Orient the loins of the neophytes were girded (cf. Luke xii. 35), and the head crowned, as a symbol of the royal priesthood. In the Occident they were given a lighted candle.¹

The entire baptismal service, with its exorcism, renunciations, and symbolical acts, had an unmistakable reference to the heathen cultus, which the Christians regarded as the work of demons, and implied that the neophyte had finally broken with Paganism. Two very important and most closely connected features in the development of the baptismal liturgy deserve mention: first, a union of the originally sharply distinguished catechuminate and baptismal rites became unavoidable in the case of the sick, who, dying, desired baptism; and second, that children, by reason of original sin, were looked upon as "heathens." To them the united catechuminate and baptismal rites were applied, exactly as if they had been heathens, only, of course, since the infant children could not answer the questions, nor promise to perform the duties of the new relation, the god-parents answered for them. In this way the baptismal service for infants and adults was almost exactly the same. The baptism of infants in the Roman Church is in this mode: (1) The water to be used, having been consecrated with the oil of mystic unction at the festivals of Easter and Pentecost, is put in the font; the sponsor presents the infant to the priest, and answers the set questions; (2) The exorcism, which consists of words and prayers; (3) Salt is put into the child's mouth to indicate that he shall be protected against the corruption of sin, shall experience a relish for good works, and shall be nurtured with the food of divine wisdom; (4) He is signed with the cross upon the forehead, eyes, breast, shoulders, and ears, to indicate that his senses are opened by baptism to comprehend the things of God; (5) His nose and ears are touched with spittle (cf. John ix. 6 sqq.) because baptism enlightens the understanding to the truth; (6) The Devil and his works are renounced by the infant through his sponsor; (7) He is next anointed on the breast with the oil of the catechumens, that he may receive the true faith, and between the shoulders, that he may engage actively in good works; (8) The Christian faith is professed by the sponsors; (9) He is asked time in the year when the rite was administered; namely, between Easter and Pentecost. There was but one personage who could administer it,—the presiding officer of the community, the bishop, as the chief presbyter was called after the first century. There was but one hour for the ceremony: it was midnight. The torches flared through the dark hall as the troops of converts flocked in. The baptistery consisted of an inner and an outer chamber. In the outer chamber stood the candidates for baptism, stripped to their shirts; and turning to the west, as the region of sunset, they stretched forth their hands through the dimly-lit chamber, as in a defiant attitude, towards the Evil Spirit of Darkness, and, speaking to him by name, said, "I renounce thee, Satan, and all thy works, and all thy pomp, and all thy service." Then they turned, like a regiment, facing right around to the east, and repeated, in a form more or less long, the belief in the Father, the Son, and the Spirit, which has grown up into the so-called Apostles' Creed in the West, and the so-called Nicene Creed in the East. They then advanced into the inner chamber. Before them yawned the deep pool or reservoir, and, standing by, the deacon or deaconess, as the case might be, to arrange that all should be done with decency. The whole troop undressed completely, as if for a bath, and stood up naked before the bishop, who put to each the questions, to which the answer was returned in a loud and distinct voice, as of those who knew what they had undertaken. They then plunged into the water. Both before and after the immersion, their bare limbs were rubbed with oil from head to foot; they were then clothed in white gowns, and received, as token of the kindly feeling of their new brotherhood, the kiss of peace, and a taste of honey and milk; and they expressed their new faith by using for the first time the Lord's Prayer."—Christian Institutions (N.Y., 1881), pp. 4, 6.]

whether he wishes to be baptized, and then immediately follows baptism; (10) His head is anointed with chrism in order to mark him as a member of the Body of Christ; (11) The child receives a white cloth (sudariolum), an adult a white robe; (12) A lighted candle is put into his hand, for a Christian must be a light; and finally (13) he receives the name of some saint. See Roman Catechism, qu. 62-72. Zwingli and Luther characteristically treated the Roman ritual: the former rejected it, while the latter adopted it. The present Lutheran Church retains it in a much modified form.

IV. Considered Theologically. (1) The Patristic Doctrine of Baptism. (a) The General Teaching.—Great emphasis was early laid upon baptism. It was the condition of salvation; it gave pardon of sin, and imparted righteousness: so even in the Epistle of Barnabas (cap. 11) and the Shepherd of Hermas (I. vis. III. cap. 3). The Fathers generally speak of it with rhetorical and allegorical exuberance; and many are the phrases used to set its virtues forth, although at the same time they contributed to its theological development. It was common to call Christ the Fish (ἰχθύς), because the letters of the Greek word for fish were the initial letters of the phrase "Jesus Christ the Son of God, the Saviour." (Ἰησοῦς Χριστὸς Θεοῦ Υἱὸς Σωτήρ.) See ALLEGORY. Hence we find Tertullian saying, "But we little fishes, after the example of our ἰχθύς, Jesus Christ, are born in water; nor have we safety in any other way than by permanently abiding in the water" (De Bapt., cap. 1.). Justin Martyr sets opposite to the natural birth by ordinary generation the regeneration by water in baptism (Apol. I., cap. 61). Three effects are attributed to baptism: 1. The forgiveness of all existing sins; 2. The impartation of the Holy Spirit and all his gifts and graces; 3. Immortal life. The more sensitive the mind of the church was to the symbolical representation of baptism, and the more indistinct the line between shadow and substance, the more, of course, did the symbolism of the rite, and its reference to the death and resurrection of Christ, favor the rhetorical representations so commonly given of it. But one finds more than rhetoric in the Fathers on this subject. 1. Many strive to distinguish sharper between the sign and the operating power, and to place them in a freer relationship. So Gregory Nazianzen (Or. 40, cf. Ullmann, Gregor von Nazianz, p. 461). 2. The ethical idea of baptism shows itself in the emphasis laid upon faith as the indispensable condition of the blessing on the rite. So Tertullian (De Pœnit., cap. 6), Gregory of Nyssa (De Scop. Christi, p. 299), Gregory of Nazianzum (Or. 40, Ullmann, p. 461), and Jerome, who very plainly says (Enarr. in Ps. 77), "He who has not received baptism with a full faith has received water, not the Spirit." 3. The Greek Fathers regard baptism as the commencement, and not as the completion, of regeneration. So Origen (Hom. in Luc. XXI.).—However correct may have been the views of the leaders of the church, it is certain that the church-members entertained very erroneous notions. They ascribed to baptism a magical efficacy, and particularly the cleansing from sin, entirely irrespective of the religious state of the recipient: indeed, from the beginning of the fourth century the sad custom too widely prevailed of postponing baptism as long as possible, even to the death-hour, so that the recipient might continue his lax life, and by this one act get rid of all the past sins, and enter heaven perfectly pure. The Fathers condemn the custom. Thus Gregory of Nazianzum, in Or. 40; and Gregory of Nyssa has a special sermon against it. But other motives for delaying baptism were in operation, — dread of the trials of a professed Christian life, the stern discipline of the church toward the lapsed, the wish to be baptized at some particular time, etc., and, of a higher character, the fear of losing the grace of baptism, and the desire to be better prepared. — Baptism was considered indispensable to salvation; but there were two classes of persons whose will was taken for the deed, — martyrs who died for the faith (later teachers distinguished the Catholics from the heretics), and those catechumens who died suddenly.

Infant baptism came in quite naturally as the consequent of the belief in the necessity of baptism. Justin Martyr's phrase (I. Apol., c. 15), "Many who have been disciples of Christ from childhood," is not indeed to be interpreted as proving the practice in his day, but rather the existence of the catechumenate. On the other hand, the saying of Irenæus, "He came to save all who through him are born again to God, infants, children, boys, youths, and old men" (Adv. Hær., II. 22, 4), when compared with III. 17, 1, where he calls baptism "regeneration," does plainly imply it; because, if it were not by their baptism, how could they be regenerated? Tertullian's unfavorable judgment of infant baptism proves its existence and wide spread (De Bapt., 18). Further proof is afforded by Cyprian's Epistle to Fidus (Ep., 64). The argumentative force of Origen's appeal to apostolic tradition on behalf of infant baptism (Ep. ad Rom., lib. V. Opera IV. 565) is greatly weakened by the fact that the church of that time undoubtedly derived not only the doctrine, but the very ritual, of baptism from apostolic times. The grounds for infant baptism were diverse. Origen regarded baptism as cleansing the defilement of birth (in Luc. Evang. Hom., XV.), and as pardoning the sins of the children in the pre-existent state (in Levit. Hom., VIII.). Other Oriental fathers refer the principal effects of baptism to the after-life; while some maintain that baptism cleansed from original sin. See Gregory Nazianzen, who divides the unbaptized dead into three classes, — those who refused baptism, the severely punished; those who delayed baptism, the lightly punished; unbaptized infants, the unpunished, yet who are excluded from Paradise (Or. 40, Ullmann, p. 476), Isidor of Pelusium (Lib. III., Ep. 105), and Theodoret (Hæret. Fabul., c. V. 18). In the Latin Church the effect of baptism was held to be rather retroactive: it forgave previous sin, — in infants, original sin.

(b) Augustine's Views. — The opinions of Augustine, so important in the history of doctrine, are found principally in his writings against the Donatists, particularly in his seven books on baptism (compare BAPTISM BY HERETICS), in which he affirms the validity of heretical baptism; and in his writings against the Pelagians, in which he discusses the relation of baptism to original sin. His position is not the same in the two controversies; and we can mark the time of his change by the important letter to Boniface (Ep. 98), if it was, as the Benedictines affirm, really written in 408.

His stand-point is the symbolical; for he distinguishes sharply between the sacrament and its contents (res sacramenti), and allows that they do not necessarily go together: at the same time he was far from denying that the sacramental grace to the believer was not real, and at a later time advanced to the assertion, that, without baptism and the Lord's Supper, no one could be saved (De Peccat. Merit. et Remiss., I. 24, § 34). Between these two sides of Augustine's teaching, there is no substantial contradiction. His fundamental idea of baptism was derived from his idea of the Catholic Church, which was the body of Christ, in which alone could there be any communion of saints, and therefore out of which there was no salvation. The entrance into the church and incorporation with the body of Christ was effected externally by baptism, internally through the Spirit's working by faith. On both factors rests regeneration (De Peccat. Merit. et Remiss., III. 4, §§ 7, 8). The water of baptism, in its cleansing effect on the body, is the sacrament only: the reality, corresponding to the emblem, is the spiritual sanctification; and its effect, regeneration. Baptism is therefore, in totality, the sacrament of regeneration. Regeneration can only be effected by the Holy Spirit. Its negative side is the renovation from the "corruption of the old man," which consists substantially in the forgiveness of sins (De Bapt., I. 11, § 16), which the Holy Spirit must first of all give, because he can dwell only in a clean heart. Baptism is therefore the "sacrament of the remission of sins" (V. 21, § 29), provided it be administered in the Catholic Church. Augustine first taught that only actual sins were forgiven, but later, also original sin; and this has been claimed to be the great effect of baptism. But forgiving original sin altered the complexion of all other sins. Thus concupiscence in the unbaptized is a sin, in the baptized a sickness; and the approach to cure is daily closer, until in heaven the cure is complete (De Nupt. et Concup., I. 25, § 28; cap. 26, § 29). In his earlier period he taught there could be baptism without conversion, and vice versa, and salvation in either case, if the first case was that of a babe, and the second that of a believing catechumen. In his later period he receded from this position, and made baptism absolutely necessary to salvation (Ep. 185, cap. 11, § 50), except in the case of martyrs (De Civit. Dei, lib. XIII. cap. 7.) — Baptism, however, does not help the unconverted, nor one who has received heretical or schismatical baptism when he might have had the Catholic. See BAPTISM BY HERETICS.

From his earlier stand-point, when baptism was not considered as pardoning original sin, nor was the absence of baptism damnatory, Augustine defended infant baptism, on the ground that the infants received first the sacrament of regeneration, and then conversion, if their Christian education was faithful; and maintained that parents or sponsors assumed the responsibility of the infant's Christian education, and also in such a sense answered the baptismal questions in the place of the child, that, if it should die, their answers would be received as the child's confession before God. From his later stand-point he maintained that there was at the same time a substitutive faith of the Church, by which the band of original sin is broken, the Holy Spirit implanted in the unconscious babe, and regeneration wrought before conversion (Ep. 98). The idea of the passive receptivity of the child was Augustine's most pregnant contribution to the Church. It is not only the root of the opus operatum doctrine of Rome, but rules the present theory of infant-baptism in the Lutheran Church. In regard to unbaptized infants, he says expressly, "It may therefore be correctly affirmed, that such infant as quit the body without being baptized will be involved in condemnation, but of the mildest character" (De Peccatorum Meritis et Remissione et de Baptismo Parvulorum, I. 16, § 21).

(2) The Later Roman Catholic Doctrine. — Augustine having laid the foundation of the Roman conception of baptism, it only remained for the schoolmen to build upon it, and for the Council of Trent and the Roman Catechism to adopt the theory thus developed without further question. The schoolmen distinguish between the material and the form of baptism. Thomas Aquinas says it is not the water, but the application of the water, which constitutes baptism (Summa, P. III. qu. 66, art. 1, Resp.), and similarly the Roman Catechism (P. II. c. ii. qu. 6) and Bellarmine (De Bapt., c. 1). The material of baptism is the water; because water symbolizes the cleansing from sin, and by its clearness the receptivity of faith to divine light. Again: through the plunging into water is symbolized the resurrection of Christ: at the same time the universal prevalence of water renders possible the universal performance of this necessary rite. It is allowable to mix the water with foreign substances, but not in such quantity as to substantially alter its character. The form of baptism lies in the formula. The material and form and their application are the necessities of baptism: all the rest is intended merely to deepen the impression. Baptism was instituted by Christ; but to the question when, different answers were given. All were agreed, however, that from Christ baptism received its power to impart grace.

In regard to the effect of baptism, Augustine's views were embraced and emphasized. Thus they taught that it impresses an indelible character upon the soul, and justifies, or rather, in Protestant speech, regenerates: all sin, original and actual, and all the guilt of sin, is washed away: concupiscence (sensuality) is either entirely removed or greatly lessened (so, in the latter sense, the Tridentine Council, Sess. V. decreto de peccato orig., cap. 5). On the positive side, baptism incorporated the recipient with Christ, and gave all the gifts and graces for the new life. See SACRAMENTS. The last effect was to open heaven. The subjective condition for baptism is, according to Thomas Aquinas, the desire to receive the rite; and the blessing is in proportion to the desire.

But the most important part of Thomas's teaching relates to the character which baptism impresses. He borrowed the idea from Augustine, but carried it out much farther, and made it much more a feature of his system. The external washing is only the emblem of the internal cleansing, which imparts the spiritual character to baptism, and which, in its stead, is the emblem of the last effect of baptism, viz., the renewing grace. The character as such is no new disposition: it is simply a sign stamped upon the soul, by which the soul is indicated as a member of Christ's body. But since the sacraments are not merely emblems of internal gracious effects, but are effectual signs, causes of the same (see SACRAMENTS), so is the character they make itself the active cause, the energetic principle, of the grace; so that it draws the latter after it as its necessary effect. Baptism puts the baptized in such a relation to Christ that they receive directly the stream of his grace. But Thomas's subtle discussion of the character imparted by baptism was without influence upon later Catholicism. The Roman Catechism touches upon this doctrine of baptismal character merely as showing that it renders baptism unrepeatable; and yet it was to the founder of mediæval theology the pivot on which the whole theological development of baptism turned. The schoolmen taught the necessity of baptism to salvation, but they held that the desire might be accepted in place of the actual use of water. Thomas distinguishes three kinds of baptism, — of water, of blood, and of fire; i. e., of the Holy Spirit or penitence (Qu. 66, art. 11, 12).

This whole theory needed considerable alteration before it would fit in with infant baptism. Infants could not exercise any faith, nor show any desire after the rite, nor experience any essential change of feeling. Thomas, however, recalled the Augustinian idea, — the babes believe not through their own act, but through the faith of the Church in which they are baptized, namely, by the power of the Holy Spirit, who gives to the Church her unity, and in her makes an equal distribution of spiritual goods, so that infants share in the faith of the Church; but only in potentiality, there was as yet no exertion of spiritual power. The teachings of the later church is thus summarized by Bellarmine. (1) Infants have no actual faith; (2) Nor spiritual manifestations; (3) They are justified absolutely without faith; (4) *The habitus*¹ of faith, love, and hope, is imparted to them; (5) They practically believe, partly because baptism is itself an actual confession of faith, and partly because of the vicarious faith of others (De Bapt., c. 11).

(3) The Protestant Doctrine of Baptism. (a) The Teaching of the Reformers. 1. The Lutherans. — Three stages in Luther's baptismal teaching can be traced. In the first stage Luther followed the Augustinian teaching, and distinguished between the sign and what the sign signified, and in the middle put faith, which realizes in men the meaning of the sign. The sign is the immersion; the meaning, the new birth. Faith makes real this spiritual baptism, whose effects continue all one's life through. In the second stage (e.g., Die babylonische Gefangenschaft, 1520) Luther considered baptism a sign and seal which God added to his word and promise in order to strengthen and comfort. The chief thing in baptism is the divine promise. He who believes it, and is baptized, will be saved: all salvation depends upon it, only we must exercise our faith after we are baptized. So long as the baptized maintain their faith, they cannot be lost, though they grievously sin. In the third stage he taught that to the sign and word were added the command and ordinance of God, according to which the former were given together in such a manner, that the water of baptism is converted into a divine element (Erlangen Ausgabe, vol. 16, p. 63 sqq.). As he says in his Catechism of 1529, "It is the water comprehended in God's command, and connected with God's command." Melancthon considered baptism a perpetual witness that the forgiveness of sins and the renewing of the Holy Ghost belong especially to the baptized. The operating cause of this condition is faith (Loci Comm., "De Bapt.," Corp. Ref., XXI. 853). Butzer distinguishes sharply between the water and the spirit baptism (Comment. on Matt. c. 31). Luther's latest opinion does not appear in the Confessions, except in the German original of the Schmalkald Articles. The Augsburg Confession represents Melancthon's standpoint (art. 9). The Reformers contended that the "concupiscence" remaining after the original sin had been pardoned in baptism was really sin.

The Protestant teaching had for its starting-point its objection to the Roman opus operatum theory of baptism, and therefore the emphasis it laid upon faith. An objection to this position would seem to lie in infant-baptism. Luther saw this, and had recourse at first to the theory that the child believed through the faith of others (von der babylonischen Gefangenschaft); but later Lutherans find in his third stage of development, when the baptismal water was to him not simply water, but connected with Christ's blood, the reply to the objection.

2. The Reformed, because of their principles, had from the beginning a far easier course of theological development into light and truth. Starting with the idea that God has not conditioned salvation upon any external work or ceremony whatsoever, Zwingli attributed no sanctifying power to baptism per se, only to faith, and that God alone can give. Baptism, therefore, is not necessary to salvation. It can neither give the Holy Spirit, nor cleanse the soul, nor forgive original sin, nor regenerate, nor finally can it strengthen faith. What, then, is baptism? It is an initiatory sign by which one is marked out as a follower of Christ, and obligated to live for God. But baptism cannot help one a particle to this end: faith alone can (Schuler and Schulthess' ed., II., vom Tauf).

Calvin held Zwingli's principles, but brought them nearer the Lutheran conception. According to him, baptism is the initiatory sign by which we are received into the communion of the visible church in order that we, implanted in Christ, may belong to the children of God. As the Lord's Supper, so baptism is a confession of our desire to be counted among the people of God; but the condition of the gracious effect of baptism is faith. Like Zwingli, he justified infant baptism by the analogy of circumcision, in place of which it comes. Each only sealed the covenant of grace in which the children already stood by reason of their parents' position, and whose privileges they inherited. As further arguments he appealed to Christ's declaration concerning the children, "of such is the kingdom of heaven" (Matt. xix. 14), and also to the reasonably supposed presence of children in the families whom the apostles baptized. To the objection that children could not be regenerated, because they could not know Christ, Calvin replied that only elect infants could be; but in regard to them it was at least supposable that they had a spark of divine light, and upon no other than the condition of regeneration could any one enter the kingdom. None of the elect die before they are regenerated, nor are unbaptized elect infants excluded from heaven. Baptism is therefore very far from being necessary to salvation.

[(b) The Representation of Baptism in the Church Creeds. Lutheran.—The Augsburg Confession (1530), Art. IX.:—

"Baptism is necessary to salvation, by [it] the grace of God is offered; and children are to be baptized, who by baptism, being offered to God, are received into God's favor."

Reformed.—The First Helvetic Confession (1536), Art. XXII.:—

"Baptism is, according to the institution of Christ, a laver of regeneration, which the Lord offers and exhibits to his elect in a visible sign, through the ministry of the church. We baptize our children because it would not be right to deprive of the communion of God's people those who are born through us into the people of God, whereto they are through the divine word called, and are, so far as man can judge, members of God's elect.

The Second Helvetic Confession (1566), Cap. XX. (summary):—

Baptism is instituted by Christ. There is only one baptism in the church: it lasts for life, and is a perpetual seal of our adoption. To be baptized in the name of Christ is to be enrolled, initiated, and received into the covenant, into the family and the inheritance of the sons of God, that, cleansed from our sins by the blood of Christ, we may lead a new and innocent life. We are internally regenerated by the Holy Ghost; but we receive publicly the seal of these blessings by baptism, in which the grace of God inwardly and invisibly cleanses the soul, and we confess our faith, and pledge obedience to God. Children of believers should be baptized; for to children belongs the kingdom of God, and they are in covenant with God: why, then, should not the sign of the covenant be given to them?

The French Confession of Faith (1559), Art. XXXV.:—

"Baptism is given us as a pledge of our adoption; for by it we are grafted into the body of Christ, so as to be washed and cleansed by his blood, and then renewed in purity of life by his holy spirit. The gain it symbolizes reaches over our whole lives and to our death, so that we have a lasting witness that Jesus Christ will always be our justification and sanctification. Nevertheless, although it is a sacrament of faith and penitence, yet as God receives little children into the church with their fathers, we say upon the authority of Jesus Christ, that the children of believing parents should be baptized."

The Belgic Confession (1561) revised and approved by the Synod of Dort (1619), Art. XXXIV. (summary):—

Baptism is the substitute for circumcision: by it we are received into the church of God. As water washeth away the filth of the body when poured upon it, as is seen on the body of the baptized when sprinkled upon him, so doth the blood of Christ, by the power of the Holy Ghost, internally sprinkle the soul, cleanse it from its sins, and regenerate us from children of wrath unto children of God. Not that this is effected by the external water, but by the sprinkling of the precious blood of the Son of God. Baptism avails us through the whole course of our life. Infants of believers ought to be baptized, and sealed with the sign of the covenant. Christ shed his blood no less for the washing of the children of the faithful than for adult persons; and therefore they ought to receive the sign and sacrament of that which Christ hath done for them. Moreover, what circumcision was to the Jews, that baptism is to our children. And for this reason Paul calls baptism the circumcision of Christ.

The Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England (1571), Art. XXVII. :—

"Baptism is not only a sign of profession, and mark of difference, whereby Christian men are discerned from others that be not christened, but it is also a sign of regeneration, or new birth, whereby, as by an instrument, they that receive baptism rightly are grafted into the church; the promises of the forgiveness of sin, and of our adoption to be the sons of God by the Holy Ghost, are visibly signed and sealed; faith is confirmed, and grace increased, by virtue of prayer unto God. The baptism of young children is in any wise to be retained in the church, as most agreeable with the institution of Christ."

The Westminster Confession of Faith (1647), Cap. XXVIII. :—

"Baptism is a sacrament of the New Testament, ordained by Jesus Christ, not only for the solemn admission of the party baptized into the visible church, but also to be unto him a sign and seal of the covenant of grace, of his ingrafting into Christ, of regeneration, of remission of sins, and of his giving up unto God, through Jesus Christ, to walk in newness of life. By the right use of this ordinance, the grace promised is not only offered, but really exhibited and conferred by the Holy Ghost, to such (whether of age, or infants) as that grace belongeth unto, according to the counsel of God's own will, in his appointed time."

(c) Later Protestant Teaching.—During the fifty years before Schleiermacher, the rationalists and the supernaturalists in Germany alike regarded baptism as only a significant way of admitting one into the church. His vigorous treatment of the subject caused a change in sacramental views generally. (See SACRAMENTS.) He put it down (Der christliche Glaube, §137) as his first proposition that baptism administered in accordance with the original institution confers salvation in reference to the divine grace in regeneration at the same time with the rights of citizenship in the Christian Church; which amounted to saying that salvation was wrought by baptism not immediately, but mediately, inasmuch as by it the reception into the church is completed. He held to infant baptism, because he believed that faith might follow baptism; but in this case the baptism was an incomplete rite, and required the public profession of confirmation as the consequent of instruction in the Christian faith. Infant baptism is therefore proper, but not necessary (L.c. §138).

[The question, What is faith? is vital in this discussion; for all Protestant theologians agree that the connection between the sign and the thing signified is an internal one, and made by faith, in opposition to Augustine's view, that they were connected in an external way. By baptism one entered into the visible church. But what is this faith? Is it one "which begins and ends in the individual act of faith at work in the person who is baptized? or is it a much wider thing, with a more universal significance?" Neither Luther nor Calvin fairly met the problem; but it may be safely presumed that they would give an affirmative answer to the first or second question respectively. The Lutheran and the Reformed theologians have followed the path marked out by their great teachers. Thus Kahnis of Leipzig says, Baptism is the sacrament of regeneration; but what it imparts is rather the power of regeneration, which is only of efficacy when the faith supposed by baptism is really present. Baptism with regeneration, when saving faith is present, works the forgiveness of sins, sonship to God, membership in the kingdom of God upon earth, and participation in eternal life. Who these genuine members of the kingdom are, God alone knows: as far as man can see, all the baptized are included. As no man can be born more than once, so no one can be re-born twice. Baptism, therefore, is not to be repeated. If one by sin loses the grace of baptism, there remains repentance, by which the lapsed is recovered. Since no one can enter the kingdom of God who is not re-born of water and spirit, it follows that baptism is necessary to salvation; yet not that only the baptized are saved, for the Word has saving efficacy, and those who, without fault of their own, fail of baptism, do not for that reason fail of salvation. Infant baptism, accordingly, finds its justification besides, on the scriptural grounds, in the substitution of the faith of the sponsors for the infant's faith, the will of the parents, and the preparation of the Christian family surroundings (Die Lutherische Dogmatik, Leipzig, 1868, vol. iii., pp. 479-481). Heinrich Schmid of Erlangen says, "We have in baptism, not merely water, and not common water, but also the word of God. But there is super-added to this a higher efficacy than exists in mere natural water; and it is this, which, by means of the water, effects saving grace." His statements in other respects agree with Kahnis. (The Doctrinal Theology of the Evangelical Lutheran Church, p. 554. English Translation by Hay and Jacobs. Philadelphia, 1876.)

The Reformed theologians follow Calvin. They regard baptism as "a sign and seal" of church-membership, as circumcision was in the case of Abraham (comp. Rom. iv. 11). Baptism does not produce conversion or regeneration, but presupposes and recognizes it. Children of Christian parents are baptized because of their descent from believing parents: adults are baptized if they profess repentance, and faith in Christ; in other words, because they are converted. Infant baptism is so far incomplete as it lacks Christian instruction and personal conversion: it must therefore be supplemented by instruction, and completed by a personal profession of faith, and union with the church. Among modern teachers, Heinrich Heppe, who presents the typical German Reformed theology, defines baptism thus: "Baptism is the ordinance instituted by Christ, whereby God seals to the elect their connection with the covenant of grace, and obliges them as participants in the covenant to lead a holy life." "The candidates of baptism are all those who belong to the covenant of grace; i.e., all who confess Christ, and are considered by the Church as belonging thereto. But since the promises extend to the children of believers, these should be baptized, precisely as the Israelitish children were circumcised; on the other hand, the children of those who do not belong to the Church may not be baptized ere they are instructed in the faith, and have been converted" (Die Dogmatik der evangelisch-reformirten Kirche. Loc. XXV., De baptismo, pp. 443, 5, Elberfeld, 1861). Ebrard says, "Through baptism we are buried in Christ's reconciling death in order to rise with him in his resurrection. Baptism is a visible act to which the Lord has connected an invisible act (regeneration), and the completed, final justification, with the beginning of sanctification, if the recipient is prepared by repentance." Ebrard calls infant baptism a "modified baptism," a virtual contradiction to the original design of baptism, because the infant is not yet regenerated, only ingrafted in the visible Church, and in the midst of mediate and immediate blessing and protecting influences, yet an actual baptism (Christliche Dogmatik, Königsgberg, 1852, vol. ii., pp. 587, 588, 621). Van Oosterzee thus defines baptism: "Baptism, the means of incorporation into his Church, ordained by Christ himself, is at the same time the sign and seal of the forgiveness of, and purification from, sins promised by the gospel to every believer, and, as such, an ordinance of inestimable value." "It is a holy symbolical act, in the name and by the command of the glorified Lord of the Church, by which every one who receives it in faith is set apart from the unbelieving world, is received into the Christian communion, is assured of the saving promises of the gospel respecting forgiveness of and purifying from sin, and is pledged to a new life in holiness and brotherly love" (Christian Dogmatics, English Translation, § 138, vol. 2, pp. 747, 752). The general Reformed doctrine is thus summarized by Hodge: "(1) Baptism is a divine ordinance; (2) It is a means of grace to believers; (3) It is a sign and seal of the covenant of grace; (4) It was intended to be of perpetual obligation, in the sense that all not baptized in infancy are required to submit to baptism as the divinely appointed way of publicly professing their faith in Christ, and their allegiance to him as their God and Saviour; and that all such professors of the true religion are bound to present their children for baptism as the divinely appointed way of consecrating them to God; (5) That God, on his part, promises to grant the benefits signified in baptism to all adults who receive that sacrament in the exercise of faith, and to all infants, who, when they arrive at maturity, remain faithful to the vows made in their name when they were baptized" (Systematic Theology, vol. iii., pp. 581, 582). The Reformed theory of baptism rests upon the theory that the church is an ethical unit, and existed before the individual believer. Therefore infant baptism is allowable; for the relation the parents or sponsors bear to the church determines the position of the infant, who by birth comes within the covenant. Those who reject infant baptism reject also this theory of the church; to them it is an organized body of individuals, each of whom has professed to put forth a personal Christian faith. (See BAPTISTS.)

The society of Friends (Quakers) reject water baptism and the Lord's Supper as a participation of bread and wine, and regard such rites as a relapse into the religion of forms and shadows. They believe, however, in the inward substance or invisible grace of the sacraments; viz., the baptism of the Spirit and fire, and the vital communion with Christ by faith.

Baptism with the Holy Ghost and Fire is a figurative expression used (Matt. iii. 11; Luke iii. 16) for the outpouring of the Holy Spirit upon believers, as upon the Day of Pentecost, and at other times in the history of the church.

Baptism for the Dead. The only allusion to this evidently common ceremony occurs in 1 Cor. xv. 29. The simplest explanation is Meyer's: a living Christian was baptized for an unbaptized dead Christian, who, it was believed, was thereby accounted baptized, and was received into bliss. Although discountenanced in the early church, it was kept up by heretics, such as the Cerinthians and Marcionites, and is practised at the present day by the Mormons. Paul's allusion to it is not to be construed as an approval of it.]

Baptism by Heretics, and the Ensuing Controversies. The question of the validity of heretical baptism, which came up very early, was answered outside of Rome in the negative. A controversy on the subject arose in 255 between Cyprian, Bishop of Carthage (210-258), and Stephen, Bishop of Rome (d. 257). Stephen took the Roman view, that the heretics were only fallen Christians, and received them into the church by the mere laying-on of hands. Cyprian took the contrary view, in which Firmilian of Cæsarea (d. 269) coincided. Stephen excluded from church-fellowship those who denied his position. So that when the news of the Carthaginian synod (255), over which Cyprian had presided, reached Rome, Stephen was very angry, and called Cyprian a pseudo-Christian, a pseudo-apostle, and a trickster. Cyprian wrote Stephen a conciliatory letter, but in vain. Another synod was held in Carthage (Sept. 1, 556): the genuineness of heretical baptism was denied with vehemence; the arrogance of Stephen, who set himself up for the "bishop of bishops," was becomingly rebuked. The correspondence with Firmilian revealed the unanimity of opinion in Asia and Africa upon this subject in opposition to Rome. The breach between Cyprian and Stephen was never healed. The latter died a martyr in the Valerian persecution, 257: his successor, Sixtus, was on friendly terms with Cyprian, and both were martyred in 258. The letters of Stephen in this controversy are unhappily lost: those of Cyprian are numbered 69-75. See particularly 72, 73, and 74. As far as can be made out, Stephen defended his position on the ground of the Roman tradition, the independent objectivity of baptism, whose efficacy was conditioned by the faith and disposition of the recipient (Ep. 73, 4), and finally because the heretics baptized in the name of Jesus or of the Trinity (Ep. 75, 9). All that was required was, that the former heretics should become penitents, because heretical baptism conferred forgiveness of sins and regeneration (75, 8). As it was evident that the Roman view had the practical effect of greatly facilitating the return of heretics (74, 1), Cyprian is at pains to show that the rigorous African practice did not deter them (73, 24). The representatives of the anti-Roman view made the connection between the church and baptism most close. As there was only one church, there could be only one baptism: consequently heretical baptism was no baptism. Again: the efficacy of baptism rests upon the priestly character of the legitimate priesthood; but heretics are without such priests. The treatment of returning heretics corresponded to these ideas. If they had already received Catholic baptism, they were received by the laying-on of hands; if baptized out of the church, they were rebaptized; if they had been Catholic or heretical priests, they were put among the laity. The councils of Nicea 325 (can. 8 and 19), Laodicea, 363 (can. 7, 8), Constantinople, 381 (can. 7), and of Trullo, 692 (can. 95), distinguished between heretical baptism as to their validity; while Athanasius, Cyril of Jerusalem, and Basil the Great, rejected such baptism altogether. The controversy broke out again when the Donatists (see title) rejected Catholic baptism, and rebaptized their Catholic converts.

It was left to Augustine to say the last decisive word in this long debate. In his writings against the Donatists, especially in De Baptismo, he lays down the foundation principle, that the objectivity of the sacrament renders it efficacious quite independent of the administrator, so long as the disposition of the recipient is right. From this position he proved: 1. Baptism conferred an indelible character; leaving the church did not destroy it; 2. Although out of the church there was no salvation, it did not follow that heretical baptism was null, but that such baptism can be of no profit so long as the man remained outside of the church; 3. The heretic's baptism is therefore on the same footing as that of a mere formalist; and if the latter, on his conversion, is not baptized again, but received by the laying-on of hands, so it should be with the former. Augustine settled the question. Heretical baptism was recognized, and since then the Catholic Church has practically left the matter untouched.

The question came up again when Protestantism began to form its theology. Both Lutherans and Reformed, however, came to the conclusion that every baptism in the name of the Trinity was valid, and efficacious to the believing soul. To the further question, whether baptism may not, in extremity, be administered by a minister not of one's own confession, the Lutherans replied affirmatively, because they made baptism a necessary ordinance; while the Reformed, who took different ground, wavered. The practice to-day is to have a Protestant minister in all cases, and usually the pastor of one's own congregation. See BAPTISM, IV. (3).

BAPTISM OF INFANTS. A very large section of Protestant Christendom, especially in the United States, either publicly or privately dissents from the practice of infant baptism. The Baptists, and their sympathizers in Pedobaptist denominations, ground their dissent (1) upon the absence of a command of Christ, or of any account of apostolic procedure which expressly favors the practice; (2) They hold infant baptism to be a violation of the very idea of baptism; since it presupposes conversion, and a credible profession of faith, which cannot be expected from infants.

To these arguments it is replied, (1) The general command to baptize all nations may naturally be interpreted to include the baptism of infants; and the mention of the baptism of the three thousand on the Day of Pentecost (Acts ii. 41), and of five households (Acts x. 48, xvi. 15, 33; 1 Cor. i. 16, xvi. 15, where the presence of children in some is far more probable than their absence in all), joined to the reiterated assertion that the promise of the remission of sins and of the Holy Spirit was to the believers and their children (Acts ii. 38, cf. iii. 25), make out a strong probability, to say the least, that infants were baptized by the apostles. (2) Christ's treatment of children whom he blessed, and pronounced to be members of the kingdom of heaven. Why, then, should they not also be fit to bear the sign and seal of such membership? All baptism is in idea an infant baptism, and requires us to begin life anew in a truly childlike spirit, without which no one can enter the kingdom of God. (3) The analogy of circumcision which began with adult Abraham, and then extended to all his male children. Baptism is the initiatory rite of introduction into the Christian Church, and the sign and seal of the new covenant, as circumcision was the sign and seal of the old covenant (Rom. iv. 11). The blessing of the old covenant was to the seed as well as to the parents; and the blessing of the new covenant cannot be less comprehensive. Infant baptism rests upon the organic relation of Christian parents and children (1 Cor. vii. 14). It is a constant testimony to the living faith of the church, which descends, not as an heirloom, but as a vital force, from parent to child.

No time can be assigned to the beginning of the practice of infant baptism. If it had been an innovation, it would have created a revolution, or at all events provoked a violent protest. But it gained ground gradually from the very beginning, as Christianity took hold of family life and training. Origen speaks of it as apostolic, and was himself baptized in infancy (about 180); but much earlier though less unequivocal testimony is borne by Irenæus (born, probably, between 120 and 130), who was a disciple of Polycarp, one of John's disciples, and who therefore was surely an excellent witness of apostolic usage. He says, "He (Christ) came to save, through means of himself, all who through him are born again (regenerated) to God, infants, and children, and boys, and youths, and old men." Adv. Hær. ii. 22, 4 (Stieren's edition). The phrase "born again to God" refers plainly to baptism: in Irenæus' usage (cf. i. 21, 1) baptism is "being born again to God," and (iii. 17, 1) baptism is "the power of regeneration unto God." Clemens Alexandrinus (in the second century), in his book Pædagogus (Tutor), lib. iii. c. 11, speaking of proper designs for seals, mentions the representation of fishing as recalling "the apostle and the children drawn out of the water:" the latter phrase, refers to baptism. The opponents of the practice make much use of Tertullian (close of the second century). In his De Baptismo, c. 18, he counsels delay of baptism, particularly in the case of infants. But, when the passage is investigated, it is found that his motive is not the impropriety, but the inexpediency, of infant baptism, on the ground that it involved the great risk of forfeiting forever the remission of sins in the case of a relapse. The very argument proves not only the existence, but the prevailing practice, of infant baptism. He does not even hint at its being a post-apostolic innovation. Hence his opposition is due to his peculiar theory of the magical effect of baptism in washing away the guilt of past sins, but is by no means anti-Pedobaptist. (For Eng. trans. of the passage see "Ante-Nicene Library," Tertullian, vol. i. p. 253; orig. text, De Baptismo, c. 18, Oehler's edition, vol. i. p. 638.)

It must be admitted that adult baptism was the rule, infant baptism the exception, in the apostolic age, and continued to be till the church was fairly established in the Roman Empire. Augustine, Gregory Nazianzen, and Chrysostom had Christian mothers, but were not baptized till they were converted in early manhood; and Constantine the Great put off his baptism till his death-bed. Adult baptism always comes first in every missionary church, which begins with preaching the gospel to responsible adults, and then lays hold of the children. Infant baptism has no meaning without Christian family life and the guaranty of Christian education.

Hence the church has always insisted on catechetical instruction, and most churches practise confirmation as a subjective supplement to infant baptism. Compulsory infant baptism was unknown in the ante-Nicene age: it is a profanation of the sacrament, and one of the evils of the union of Church and State, against which Baptists have a right to protest.

PHILIP SCHAFF.

BAPTISTERIES, buildings erected exclusively for the administration of baptism, were not known until the fourth century. In the primitive church, the river or the brook, the lake or the pond, served the purpose. During the persecutions, wells and springs found in the catacombs were used, as may be inferred from the ornaments employed around and above them; but when Christianity became the religion of the state, under Constantine the Great, separate buildings were found necessary, and were erected in the neighborhood of the church, and often connected with it by a covered gallery. These buildings were often very large, so large, indeed, that synods and councils could be held within their walls. The reason was, that they also served as schoolrooms for the catechumens; and as the sacrament of baptism was administered only twice or thrice a year, at Easter and Pentecost and Epiphany, and only at the episcopal church, the cathedral, the ecclesia baptismalis, the numbers of catechumens could often be very great. The centre of the whole structure formed the baptismal basin (piscina), circular, octagonal, or sometimes, in allusion to Rom. vi. 4, in the form of a grave, of stone (1 Cor. x. 1), and descended into by three steps. Around this basin arose the building, circular or octagonal, and covered with a cupola, which rested either on the walls or on pillars and columns within the walls. Connected with this main building were generally, to the one side a fore-hall, the schoolroom, and to the other side an apsis, with an altar dedicated to John the Baptist, at which the catechumens received the eucharist immediately after baptism. Gradually, however, as infant baptism became the rule in the church, and the sacrament was administered by aspersion instead of by immersion, and the right of administering it was extended to all churches and over the whole year, there was less and less use for any separate buildings. After the ninth century, no more baptisteries were built. The baptismal basin was transformed into the baptismal font; and the font was moved into the church itself, and placed in a separate chapel, or part of the building, generally near the entrance, to the left.

BAPTISTS. (The Regular or Calvinistic Baptists.)—A body of Christians comprising about one-fourth of the Protestants of the United States, and numbering in Great Britain, in 1880, a membership of 282,658; on the continent of Europe, 44,292; in Asia, 42,072; in Africa, 3,603; in Australasia, 7,918.

BELIEF.—The first Confession of the Baptists in England, A.D. 1644, antedated the Westminster Confession: When the Westminster Confession was published, it was found to agree, for substance of doctrine, in most points, with the earlier Baptist Confession; and in 1689 the General Assembly of Baptists, following the example of the Independents (Savoy, 1658), adopted that Confession, with some omissions and changes. This Confession was also adopted by the Philadelphia Association in the eighteenth century, and is still the statement of doctrine most highly regarded by the Baptists in the United States.

The essential distinction between the belief of Baptists and that of other bodies of Christians is found in their view of the constitution of the visible church. Holding the supreme authority of the Holy Scriptures, and the doctrines of God's choice of his people, of regeneration as the sovereign work of the Holy Spirit, and of justification by faith alone, they believe that the churches mentioned in the New Testament were formed in closest accord with those doctrines; they believe the New Testament gives us examples of, and commands us to receive as candidates for membership in the churches, only those who give credible evidence of their faith in Jesus as their Saviour. Hence the Baptists accept as candidates for baptism only those who are professed believers in Jesus.

They believe immersion in water is the baptism enjoined in the New Testament. In this view they are in accord with the Greek and all Oriental churches, with the practice of the Occidental churches till A.D. 1300, and with the present liturgies of the English and American Episcopal churches.

They regard baptism as a prerequisite to the Lord's Supper.

CHURCH GOVERNMENT.— Their churches—"bodies of baptized believers, with pastors and deacons, covenanted together for religious worship and religious work"—are independent of all other human control, and supreme in the government of their own affairs. For the increase of love, for consultation, and the furtherance of missions at home and abroad, these churches, by their delegates, unite in councils and associations; but these councils have no power beyond advice, or withdrawing the hand of fellowship from an offender.

Without an authoritative creed, and with no ecclesiastical government beyond that of each church over its own members, the Baptists in the United States maintain a very close agreement in doctrine, which is best represented by the (modified) Westminster Confession.

HISTORY. Baptists in Europe.— The early Baptists of the continent of Europe held the same evangelical truths, and the same view of the church, as the later Baptists of England and America; but they differed from these latter in many other points. The Baptists appeared first in Switzerland, about A.D. 1523, where they were persecuted by Zwingli and the Romanists. They are found in the following years, 1525-30, with large churches fully organized, in Southern Germany, Tyrol, and in Middle Germany. In all these places persecution made their lives bitter. Moravia promised a home of greater freedom; and thither many Baptists migrated, only to find their hopes deceived.

After 1534 they were numerous in Northern Germany, Holland, Belgium, and the Walloon provinces. They increased, even during Alva's rule in the Low Countries, and developed a wonderful missionary zeal. But from the middle of the seventeenth century their numbers have decreased with their zeal, until, at the present, they comprise a very small portion of the population in Holland.

Baptists in England.— During the reigns of Elizabeth and James, a large number of Baptists fled from Holland and Germany to England. What influence they exerted in spreading their views in England, is not known. We only learn of their presence by the persecutions they endured. The first Baptist churches in England from which we have a statement of their views are those of A.D. 1644. Their principles were adopted by many, and churches rapidly multiplied. Under Cromwell, Baptists were found in the army, in Parliament, and in the Council of State. With the return of Charles II., the Baptists, with all other dissenters, suffered from the strong hand of violence. During the eighteenth century many of their churches shrivelled under the influence of hyper-Calvinism; but a new era of more faithful gospel-preaching, and of zealous missionary work, began in the latter part of the century under the lead of men like Carey and Andrew Fuller, and this has continued to the present time.

Baptists in America.— In America the earliest Baptists were found in the Massachusetts Colony, but were driven out. Some went to Rhode Island, and others to New York and Virginia. In 1770, so far as is known, the Baptists numbered 77 churches with about 5,000 members in the colonies. In 1880 they report 26,060 churches, 16,596 ministers, 2,296,327 total membership, being an increase of 163,283 over 1879.

MISSIONS.— The American Baptist Missionary Union (Boston, Mass.) is the society through which the Baptists of the Northern States carry on their foreign missionary work. The Union has in Asia five missions, as follows: Burmah, with 11 stations, 88 missionaries, 448 native preachers, 443 churches, 1,314 baptisms last year, 21,594 members; Assam, 6 stations, 17 missionaries, 49 native preachers, 13 churches, 170 baptisms, 1,331 members; Teloogeois (India), 7 stations, 21 missionaries, 77 native preachers, 11 churches, 1,547 baptisms, 15,660 members; China, 4 stations, 24 missionaries, 37 native preachers, 16 churches, 140 baptisms, 1,426 members; Japan, 2 stations, 12 missionaries, 5 native preachers, 2 churches, 20 baptisms, 76 members. Total in Asia, 162 missionaries, 616 native preachers, 475 churches, 3,101 baptisms, 40,087 members.

In Europe five missions, carried on by native preachers, but aided and directed by the Union. Sweden, 150 preachers, 298 churches, 3,272 baptisms, 18,851 members; Germany, 270 preachers, 121 churches, 1,897 baptisms, 25,497 members; France, 12 preachers, 9 churches, 44 baptisms, 726 members; Spain, 3 preachers, 4 churches, 14 baptisms, 140 members; Greece, 1 preacher, 1 church, 1 baptism, 7 members. Total in Europe, 436 preachers, 433 churches, 5,228 baptisms, 45,221 members. Total in Asia and Europe, 162 missionaries, 1,052 native preachers, 908 churches, 8,419 baptisms, 85,308 members. The appropriations for foreign missionary work in 1880-81 were $280,000.

The Foreign Mission Board of the Southern Baptist Convention maintains missions in China, Africa, Italy, and South America, with 33 missionaries, and also native assistants. Income, $15,543.67.

The Home Mission Board of the Southern Baptist Convention sustains 34 missionaries in the States and Territories. Income, $20,624.30.

The American Baptist Home Missionary Society (New York) sustained in 1879-80, 281 missionaries in the States and Territories, 8 academies for freedmen, with 1,191 pupils. Income, $213,821.

The American Baptist Publication Society, Philadelphia, issued during 1879-80, 364,635-025, 18mo pages. Its publications number 1,288. Income, $349,564.46.

The educational institutions of the Baptists comprise 3 theological seminaries with 432 students, 31 colleges with 4,609 students, and 47 academies with 5,522 students. The buildings and endowments of all these institutions are valued at $14,068,054.

The periodicals, weekly, monthly, quarterly, sustained by the Baptists in America, number 68.

We have not enumerated among the "regular" Baptists the Free-Will Baptists, with 74,851 members; the Seventh-Day Baptists, with 8,548 members; the Dunkers, with 50,000 members; the Disciples, or Campbellites, with 350,000 members; Anti-Mission Baptists, with 40,000 members; Wine-brennarians, with 30,000 members. BARAB'BAS (son of Abba), the name of a malefactor whom the Jewish mob, at the instigation of the priests, demanded that Pontius Pilate should release instead of Jesus of Nazareth (Matt. xxvii. 16 sq., cf. Acts iii. 14). According to an old tradition, Barabbas' proper name was Jesus. Some manuscripts and many ancient versions have the name Jesus before that of Barabbas. Thus the Armenian version reads: "whom will ye that I release unto you?—Jesus Barabbas, or Jesus which is called Christ?" (Matt. xxvii. 17.) According to Jerome, the Gospel of the Hebrews had the same reading. But the majority of New Testament textual scholars are agreed in rejecting it. Lange and others favor the old view that Barabbas was a pseudo-messiah. Barabbas is a common name in the Talmud.

BARACA, Friedrich, D. D., a Roman-Catholic missionary, b. in Carniola, a crown land of the Austrian Empire, 1797; d. Jan. 19, 1868. He came to America in 1831, devoted his life to the Indians of the Lake Superior region, and was made Bishop of Sault St. Mary and Marquette. He published a Grammar of the Olchipwe Language in 1851, and a Dictionary of the same in 1853.

BAR'AK (lightning), son of Abinoam, was the fourth judge of Israel. He marched with Deborah against Sisera, chief of the army of Jabin, King of Canaan, and, meeting him by the torrent stream of Kishon, achieved a complete victory, and broke his people's yoke of bondage, which had galled them twenty years. A forty-years' peace followed.

BARBARA, St., suffered martyrdom, according to Baronius, in Nicomedia, under Maximinus (235-238); according to Assemani, at Heliopolis in Egypt, under Galerius (306). Having been converted, she endeavored to convert her father: but he denounced her; and, as no torture could move her to deny Christ, she was sentenced to death, and decapitated by her own father. Her feast falls on Dec. 4, and in Roman-Catholic countries she is considered a special guaranty against fire, storms, etc.

BARBARIAN in the New Testament (Acts xxviii. 2, 4; Rom. i. 14) means one not a Greek, without referring to civilization: this is in accordance with classic usage. In 1 Cor. xiv. 11 it means one speaking in a foreign, unintelligible tongue. This is its primitive meaning. It by no means implies savagery.

BARBAULD, Anna Letitia, b. at Kibworth, Leicestershire, June 20, 1743; married the Rev. Rochemont Barbauld, May, 1774; d. March 9, 1825. She was the daughter of the Rev. John Aikin, D. D., a teacher, and was highly educated. Her husband was a Unitarian, who taught a school and preached in Suffolk. Assisted by her brother in 1773, she published her first volume of "Poems;" and four editions were sold in one year. In the same year appeared "Miscellaneous Pieces in Prose," by J. and A. L. Aikin; in 1775 her "Hymns in Prose," and "Early Lessons" (written for her pupils), and "Devotional Pieces compiled from the Psalms of David." Her later writings are of a general and critical character, including political pamphlets, editions of Aken-side, Collins, and of essayists and novelists. Perhaps her best-known hymn begins, "How blest the righteous when he dies!" See The Works of A. L. Barbauld, with a Memoir," by Lucy Aikin (her niece), London, 1826, 2 vols.; and the recent Memoirs by A. L. Le Breton and G. A. Ellis, 1874.

BARBEYRAC, Jean, b. at Beziers, Languedoc, March 15, 1674; d. at Groeningen, March 3, 1744; fled with his parents into Switzerland, after the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, 1685; was educated at Lausanne and Geneva; studied at the University of Frankfort-on-the-Oder; became a teacher in the College of the Reformed Congregation at Berlin, 1697; and was in 1710 appointed professor of law and history in the Academy of Lausanne, and in 1716 in the University of Groningen. He translated several works of Puffendorf and Grotius from Latin into French, and accompanied them with notes and additions, which attracted much attention. Besides a number of other essays, he also wrote a Traité du Jeu, 1709, and a Traité de la Morale des Pères de l'Eglise, 1728. He was a moderate Calvinist, and refused to sign the Helvetic Formula Consensus, which disapproved of the doctrines of Amyraut and the other Saumur theologians.

BARBIER, Josué, a Protestant pastor of Livron, whom the Bishop of Valence allured back into the bosom of the Roman Church by a pension of six hundred livres, and who became noted by his coarse libels against his former co-religionists: La Ministriographie Huguenote, 1618; and Les Miraculeux Effets de la Sacrée Main des Roys de France, 1621.

BARCKHAUSEN-VOLKMANN CONTROVERSY. In 1712 Paul Volkman, rector of the Joachimsthal Gymnasium in Berlin, and custos at the Royal Library, published his Theses Theologicae, a complete representation of the Reformed dogmatics, in which he maintained the doctrines of universal grace and conditional election. Thereby he stirred up within the German Reformed Church that question of predestination and grace which has arisen and been debated in every national branch of the Reformed Church. In 1714 Heinrich Barckhausen, a teacher in the same gymnasium, answered by an Amica Collatio Doctrinae de Gratia, which he published under the pseudonyme of Pacificus Verinus, and in which he vindicated these doctrines of particular grace and unconditional election. With Volkman sided Holzfuss, Jablonsky, Jeremias Sterky, etc.; with Barckhausen, Philip Nande, etc. Barckhausen wrote two more pamphlets in the controversy, both anonymous, Mauritii Neodorpü Calvinus Orthodoxus and Abgenöthigte Ehr- und Lehr-Rettung der reformirten Kirchen; and the controversy began to grow hot, when, in 1719, the Prussian king, Friedrich Wilhelm I., stepped in, and by a royal edict commanded both parties to keep silent.

BARCLAY, Alexander, b. about 1476, probably of Scotch descent; d. at Croydon in 1552; was educated at one of the English universities; travelled much on the Continent, and was made chaplain in the collegiate church at Ottery St. Mary in Devonshire. Afterwards he became a monk in the Benedictine Monastery of Ely; and, after the suppression of the monasteries, he was vicar of Much-Badew in Essex, of Wokey in Somersetshire, and rector of All-Saints in Lombard Street. He is the author of the Ship of Fools, first printed in 1500, partly a translation, partly an imitation, of Sebastian Brandt's Das Narren Schiff. A list of his other writings is found in the introduction to Jamieson's edition of the Ship of Fools, Edinburgh, 1874.

BARCLAY, Robert, b. at Gordonstown, Scotland, Dec. 23, 1648; d. Oct. 13, 1690, at Ury; descended from an old Scottish family, and received a very careful education from his father, Col. David Barclay, of war celebrity in Germany and Sweden. For his further development he went to Paris; but while there he was won over to the Roman Church by one of his maternal uncles; and it cost his father, who in the mean time had joined the Quakers, much trouble to disentangle all these religious and moral complications. He succeeded, however; and Robert Barclay became the most prominent, indeed the only remarkable, theologian the Quakers have produced. His chief work, Theologia Vera Christiana Apologia, gives a systematic representation of that mystical spiritualism on which Quakerism is based. It was first published in 1676, translated into English in 1678, into German in 1684, and into French in 1702, and called forth a great number of controversial writings by Anton Reiser, Barthold Holzfuss, Ben. Figken, William Baier, etc. Barclay's collected works were published two years after his death, by William Penn. See [JOSEPH BESSE: Collection of the Sufferings of the People called Quakers, for the Testimony of a Good Conscience, London, 1753, 2 vols. fol.; S. M. BAR-COCHEBA (son of the star), the name assumed by a certain Simeon, who pretended to be the Messiah, and headed an insurrection in Palestine in A.D. 131 or 132, against the Emperor Hadrian. Nothing is known of his origin, or even of his real name. He purposely wrapped himself in mystery the better to play his rôle. But he never would have been able to succeed at all, had it not been for the confidence reposed in him by Rabbi Akiba (which see), the most influential and remarkable Jew of his day. He claimed to have been born on the day of the destruction of Jerusalem (because a wide-spread rumor set that time for the birth of the Messiah); claimed also the fulfilment of Balaam's prophecy (Num. xxiv. 17), hence his name; and by his boasts and temerity, his promises and tact, he gathered a large number about him, overcame the Roman general in Judæa, J. Annius Rufus, and took Jerusalem. He had coins struck to celebrate his successes. But his triumph was short-lived. Julius Severus, at Hadrian's order, attacked him, and by prudent stratagems succeeded in penning up the insurgents in Jerusalem, and then took the city, although at heavy loss, and razed it; and on it eventually Aelia Capitolina was built. Bar-cocheba and his followers fled to Bethar, a stronghold near Jerusalem, and for three years maintained themselves. But in the year 135 Bethar yielded to the Romans. Bar-cocheba fell in the battle, and his head was carried into the Roman camp. Rabbi Akiba and other rabbis, who were accused of inciting the rebellion, were, it is said, flayed alive. The Talmud, recognizing the deception practised, changed the name of the leader into Bar-Coziba (son of the lie), and called his coins "rebel money."

It is said Bar-cocheba put to death all Christians who would not join his standard. Indeed, in every respect, in speech and action, he was one of the false Christs our Lord prophesied should arise (Mark xiii. 21, 22), and by his very defects set forth more prominently the virtues of the Perfect One, the Hope of Israel, the Lord's Anointed.

BARDESANES, a Gnostic heresiarch, who lived at Edessa in Mesopotamia in the latter part of the second century, about 170. He was a disciple of Valentinius, and as none of his writings have come down to us — with the exception of a fragment of his book on fate, which has been preserved by Eusebius, and may be found translated in Cureton's Spicilegium Syriacum, London, 1855 — his system can be understood only as a variation of that of his master and of Gnosticism in general. But he seems to have been a great poet; and his hundred and fifty Syriac hymns became so popular, that Ephraim Syrus, when he afterwards wrote his orthodox hymns to take their place, was compelled to use Bardesanes' tunes. See GNOSTICISM.

BARLAAM, b. at Seminara in Calabria, towards the close of the thirteenth century. He was of Greek descent, but educated in the Roman Church, and entered the order of St. Basil. For his further studies, however, he went to Thessalonica, at that period a great seat of learning, and having made himself proficient not only in theology, but also in philosophy and mathematics, he went to Constantinople (1327), where he joined the Greek Church, was made Abbot of St. Salvador, and engaged in a virulent polemic against Rome: Contra Primatum Pape, etc. In 1339 the Emperor Andronicus III. sent him on a diplomatical errand to Pope Benedict XII., at Avignon, to whom he presented himself, well recommended both by Philippe of France and Robert of Sicily. The real purpose of his mission was to procure the support of Western Europe against the Turks; but the ostensible object he labored for was the union between the Greek and Latin churches. Cunningly concealing the thoughts he worked for under the thoughts he spoke about, he delivered two elaborate speeches before the Pope, which belong to the most characteristic documents of the whole series of union-negotiations: but he failed, nevertheless, to produce the right impression; his mission remained without result. After returning to Greece, he began his attacks on the Hesychast or Quietist party among the monks of Mount Athos, which he wound up with a formal accusation of heresy. A synod, presided over by the emperor and the patriarch, was convened in the Church of St. Sophia, in Constantinople, 1341; and the Hesychasts were so ably defended by their leader, Palamas, that Barlaam hurriedly left the city, and betook himself to Italy. Here he returned to the Roman Church, was made Bishop of Gieraci in the Neapolitan, and wrote as virulently against the Greek Church as formerly against the Latin. He died 1348.

LIT. — Most of his works have remained unprinted; but some of them, for instance the above-mentioned speeches, are found in Reynolds's continuation of Baronius's Annales, and others in H. Canisius: Lectiones Antiq., IV. A complete list is given by Leo Allatius in his De Ecclesie Occid. et Or. Consensione, II., 17. Parts of his life are fully described by the Greek historians Catakuzen and Necephorus Gregoras.

BARLETTA, a Dominican monk from the latter part of the fifteenth century; b. at Barletta in the Neapolitan; enjoyed an almost unparalleled popularity as a preacher, especially in the cities of Northern Italy. His sermons, which were first published at Brescia, 1497, and afterwards often, gave rise to the adage, Nescit prædicare qui nescit barlettare. They are characterized by a blending of humor and pathos, which, though sometimes approaching buffoonery and affectation, explains the great power of the man.

BAR'NABAS (son of Prophecy; or Ezhortation), a Levite named Joses, of the Island of Cyprus, living in Jerusalem when the church was founded, and one of the first converts. By the Christians he was called Barnabas, because of his ability to administer counsel and cheer. He proved the sincerity and depth of his Christian zeal by voluntarily selling his Cyprian property, and laying the money at the apostles' feet (Acts iv. 36, 37). He quickly took a leading position in the early church. Incited, probably, by a friendship previously formed when both were Jews, he used his influence to commend the converted and yet suspected Saul to the Jerusalem Church, and thus publicly indorsed the strange story the apostle told (ix. 27). The fitness of Barnabas to deal wisely with young converts is strikingly illustrated by his commission to inspect the "revival" at Antioch; and the confidence he reposed in Saul is manifested by his journey to Tarsus in search of him. The two men labored together successfully for many months in Antioch (xi. 22-26, xiv. 28). Barnabas and Saul were then sent down to Jerusalem with contributions for the poor saints there (ver. 30, B.C. 44). This is the first joining of the two names. They returned from Jerusalem with John (Mark xii. 25); and, ordered by the Holy Ghost, these three went on a missionary journey. At Perga, John left them, and returned to Jerusalem; but Paul and Barnabas kept on their way (xiii. 2-5, 13). The dignified bearing of Barnabas, and the readier speech of Paul, led to the supposition of the Lystrans, that the former was Zeus (Jupiter), and the latter Hermes (Mercury). On coming back to Antioch, they were involved in a controversy with the Judaizers, and went to the Apostolic Council at Jerusalem (which see), where the matter was settled. An unhappy dissension soon after parted the pair (A.D. 50), and Barnabas is not further mentioned in the Acts (xv.); but from Gal. ii. 13 we learn a little more about him, and see his weakness under the taunts of the Judaizers; and from 1 Cor. ix. 6 we gather that he was still at his missionary labors in the spring of A.D. 57. Legends begin when authentic history ends. Barnabas is brought to Rome and Alexandria. The Clementine Recognitions (I., 7) make him preach in Rome during Christ's lifetime. Indeed, according to Clement of Alexandria (Strom. II., 20), he was one of the seventy disciples. Not older than the third century is the tradition of the later activity and martyrdom of Barnabas in Cyprus. There is a worthless work by a Cyprian of the fifth century, "Acta et Passio Barnabæ in Cypro" (see ΑΠΟΚΡΥΦΑ to the New Testament), and a eulogy by a Cyprian monk, Alexander, not earlier than the fifth century, which relate his acts. Under the Emperor Zeno (474-491), according to the last-quoted work, the body of Barnabas was found at Cyprus. But the Cyprian Church had already claimed him as its founder in order to rid itself of the supremacy of the Antiochian bishop; and so did the Milan Church, thereby to cut itself off from Rome. These traditions therefore go for little.

In this connection, the question whether Barnabas was an apostle is important, and may be answered by saying he was not, in the strict sense, and yet is so styled (Acts xiv. 14); and in the broader sense of messenger he was amply entitled to the epithet. See APOSTLE.

Writings attributed to Barnabas.—Tertullian and other African writers ascribe the Epistle to the Hebrews to him. This may well have been the Roman tradition (Tertullian usually follows it), since in Rome, the epistle, probably, had its first readers. But of more interest is the tradition which sets down to him an Epistle in twenty-one chapters, which is contained complete in the Codex Sinaiticus, and of which Bryennios in 1875 discovered a complete Greek manuscript in the Library of the Most Holy Sepulchre at Constantinople; but he has not yet published it. The epistle was accepted as genuine by the old Greek Church, although not as canonical. Clemens Alexandrinus (160-202) cites it, as do Origen and the Apostolical Constitutions. Eusebius threw doubt upon its canonicity, but regarded it as authentic; yet it gradually faded out of view. The opinion to-day is, that Barnabas was not the author. The epistle was probably written in Alexandria, at the beginning of the second century, and by a Gentile Christian. In no other writing of that early time is the separation of the Gentile Christians from the patriotic Jews so clearly brought out. The Jewish interpretation of the Bible is declared to be false, and the Old Testament regulations are allegorized. "Two points are especially insisted upon: 1st, Judaism in its outward and fleshly form had never been commended by the Almighty to man; 2d, God's covenant never belonged to the Jews at all." That the author had read Paul is manifest; whether he knew our present Gospels is not so sure: 2 Esd. and Enoch are quoted. The doctrines of Paul are fully and truly reproduced. The epistle has been often published. See GERHARDT, HARNACK, U. ZAHN: Patrum Apostolicorum Opera, Leipzig, 1876.

BARNABITES, a religious order founded at Milan in 1530 by three priests, Zaccharia, Ferrari, and Morigia, acting under the influence of the religious movement at that time passing through Italy. In 1533 the order was confirmed by Clement VII.; and in 1535 it was exempted from the episcopal authority, and placed immediately under the papal chair. Its first name was the Regular Clerks of St. Paul, after the oratory in which its re-unions were held; but, after obtaining the Church of St. Barnabas, its members are generally called the Barnabites. To the three monastic vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience, the order adds a fourth,—never to seek any kind of ecclesiastical preferment. Preaching and teaching are its two great aims.

BARNARD, John, b. at Boston, Nov. 6, 1681; d. at Marblehead, Jan. 24, 1770; was educated at Harvard College; accompanied the expedition to Port Royal as chaplain, in 1707; and was appointed minister in 1716, at Marblehead, where he developed a great activity, both for the moral and material welfare of his flock. He published a version of the Psalms, and some sermons, which show an incipient deviation from Calvinism.

BARNES, Albert, b. at Rome, N.Y., Dec. 1, 1798, d. in Philadelphia, Penn., Dec. 24, 1870; has a prominent place in the religious history of America, as an active cause of the separation in the Presbyterian Church, as the leader of the New School party, and as the author of a series of commentaries or Notes upon the entire New Testament and upon a few books of the Old, which has had an enormous and merited circulation in America and Great Britain. It is said that more than a million copies of his Notes on the New Testament have been sold. Few men equalled Mr. Barnes in presenting in brief compass the results of patient study. Loyalty to truth, fearlessness in its defence, earnestness, decision, and a childlike piety, gave him a commanding position. He was graduated at Hamilton College, New York, in 1820; then took a four-years' course at the Theological Seminary, Princeton, N.J.; and was ordained and installed pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Morristown, N.J., Feb. 8, 1825; thence he was called to the First Presbyterian Church in Philadelphia, and was installed June 25, 1830. In 1867 he resigned, and was elected pastor emeritus. Mr. Barnes was the servant, and at the same time the leader, of his age. He has left a lasting impress upon four movements, which, although he did not originate, he directed. He preached total abstinence into wide favor; the abolition of slavery, until freedom rendered such preaching an anachronism; the Sunday-school cause, and in its behalf compiled his Notes; and, finally, the doctrine of unlimited atonement, and the distinctive teachings of the New-School Branch of the Presbyterian Church. See PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH. Although circumstances put him forward as the advocate of the New-School Branch, he did not desire the prominence, nor love the strife; yet he defended what he deemed the truth whenever assailed. He was no enthusiast or fanatic, but simply and evidently a truth-loving, earnest, conscientious man of God. And it may be claimed with justice, that, as he was unhappily a cause of the division of his denomination, so he happily was a means of uniting it again. The first volume of his Notes Explanatory and Practical, which was on the Gospels, is dated Philadelphia, Aug. 25, 1832; and his last volume, which was on the Psalms, February, 1868. Besides these, he published The Atonement, Phila., 1859; Way of Salvation, Phila., 1863; Evidences of Christianity in the Nineteenth Century, N.Y., 1868; and Life at Threescore and Ten, N.Y., 1871.

BARO or BARON, Pierre, b. at Etampes, 1534; d. in London, April 17, 1599; studied law at Bourges, and began in 1557 to plead in the court of the Parliament of Paris, but retired in 1560 to Geneva, where he studied theology, and was ordained by Calvin himself. In 1572 he left France, and settled in Cambridge, where he was made professor in divinity: but he soon fell out with the rigid Calvinists; and a sermon he preached on the Lambeth Articles gave so much offence, that he was compelled to renounce his chair in the university, and retire to London. Among his works are, In Ionam Prophetam Prolectiones, London, 1579; Summa Trium de Prædestinatione Sententiarum, 1573, translated in Nichols's "Life of Arminius," I. 9.

BARONIUS, Cæsar, b. at Sora in Naples, Oct. 31, 1538; d. in Rome, June 30, 1607. This most learned and laborious historian of the Roman Church was educated at Veroli; began to study theology and jurisprudence at Naples; moved in 1557 to Rome; entered the Congregation of the Oratory newly founded by Filippo de Neri, was thereby led to the study of church-history in its very sources; began in 1577 preparations for his great work, Annales Ecclesiastici, which first appeared in Rome, in 12 vols. folio, 1588-1607; was made librarian to the Vatican, and cardinal in 1596, and came twice — after the death of Clement VIII., and again after that of Leo XI. — very near being elected pope. The Annales Ecclesiastici were written in opposition to the "Magdeburg Centuries" of Flacius and other Lutheran historians. They contain no open polemics, however. The great attention which the "Magdeburg Centuries" attracted made it necessary to furnish a positive refutation. Baronius undertook the task, with the help of the Vatican Library, and performed it in a way that makes his Annals still a storehouse of learning. He died at last from sheer exhaustion. The Annals were published at Antwerp, 1610, in XII. Tom. folio, and by Mansi, Lucca, 38 vols., 1738-59, in which Pag'i's critical remarks are printed in notes below the text. The latest and best edition was begun by A. Theiner at Bar-le-Duc, 1864, sqq. Thirty volumes had appeared up to 1877. The form of the work is that of a chronicle; the facts being gathered together under each year, without any regard to their internal connection. Several writers have tried to continue Baronius's work after his death; but only the labors of Raynaldus, Rome, 9 vols., 1646-63, Laderchi, Rome, 3 vols., 1728-37, and Theiner, Rome, 3 vols, 1856, bringing the chronicle down to the year of 1586, have succeeded in gaining permanency.

LIT. — Lives of Baronius were written by BARNABEUS, Rome, 1641, and ALBERICUS, Rome, 1759, the latter giving also his letters (3 vols.). See DU PIN: Nouvelle Bibliothèque des Auteurs Ecclesiastiques, XVII., 1; BAUR: Epochen der kirchlichen Geschichtsschreibung, p. 72, Tübingen, 1852.

H. REUTER.

BARROW, Isaac, b. in London, October, 1630; d. there May 4, 1677; studied at the University of Cambridge; travelled for several years in France, Italy, and the East; was ordained and made professor of Greek in the University of Cambridge immediately after his return in 1660; became professor of mathematics in 1662, but resigned in 1669 in favor of his famous pupil, Newton, and devoted himself exclusively to theology; and in 1672 he was appointed master of Trinity College, Cambridge, and in 1675 was chosen vice-chancellor of the university. A collected edition of his theological works — sermons, a Treatise on the Pope's Supremacy, an Exposition of the Creed, etc. — appeared in London, 1828, 3 vols., and was reprinted in New York, 1846. A still better edition was published at Cambridge, 1859, 8 vols. His sermons are very elaborate and exhaustive, but ponderous in style.

BARROWE, Henry, a Congregational martyr, hanged April 6, 1593; came of good family; was called to the bar 1576, and for a time led a wild life, but was converted, and in some way was attracted to John Greenwood (see title), by whom he was interested in church reform. Both these men were influenced by Robert Browne (see title) in the direction of Independency. When Greenwood was arrested, Barrowe went to see him, and was illegally arrested Nov. 19, 1586. He was repeatedly examined by the ecclesiastical authorities, and passed the remainder of his life in the Fleet Prison. Together with Greenwood, he composed several books and tracts, and alone wrote an important work entitled A Brief Discovery of the False Church, London, 1590. The final trial of Greenwood and Barrowe was at the Old Bailey, March 23, 1593. His alleged offences were, (1) that he had written and published the Queen's Majesty to be unbaptized; (2) That the state was wholly corrupted, so that none that feared God could live at peace therein; and (3) that all the people in the land were infidels. To these charges he answered, that (1) he had defended the Queen's baptism, though popish; (2) He meant by "corruption" the falsity of the estate of the Established Church, and contained "no evil mind toward the state, laws, or judges;" and (3) by the term "infidels" he meant men destitute of the true faith; and, so far from condemning the whole nation, he had "reverend estimation of sundry, and good hope of many hundred thousands in the land," though he utterly disliked the system of church government then in force. They were condemned; and, after two reprieves, they were hanged on April 6. Dr. Dexter, in his Congregationalism as seen in its Literature, New York, 1880 (pp. 211-245), gives a minute account of the various examinations Barrowe underwent, and also of the difference between Barrowism and Brownism.

BARRUEL, Augustin, b. 1741; d. Oct. 5, 1820; was professor in the Jesuit College of Toulouse when the order was suppressed; went to Austria and Italy; returned to France in 1774; wrote with more bitterness than weight against the infidelity of the age in L'Année Littéraire and Journal Ecclesiastique; published the Helvetiennes, a more systematic confutation, in 1785; fled in 1792 to England, where he published Histoire du Clergé de France pendant la Révolution (1794), Mémoire sur Jacobinisme (1797), L'Évangile et le Clergé (1800); returned in the latter year to France, and published in 1803 Du Pape et ses Droits, which gave the Ultramontanes occasion to say that he had sold himself to Napoleon.

BARSUMAS, archimandrite, or abbot, of a Syrian monastery; d. 458; was a friend of Eutyches, and defended him at the Robbers' Synod at Ephesus (449), at the head of a thousand rough and turbulent Syrian monks. He took personally part in the riot which caused the death of the aged Flavian, Patriarch of Constantinople; but, when he presented himself at the Council of Chalcedon (451), he was refused admittance. He continued, however, to work for Eutychianism.

BARSUMAS, Bishop of Nisibis 435-489, was, together with his adherents, banished from Edessa on account of Nestorianism; re-organized the fugitive church under Persian protection, and founded at Nisibis a theological school, which became celebrated, both for its exegetical labors in the spirit of Theodore of Mopsuestia, and for its missionaries, who spread Nestorianism over many points of Eastern Asia. In Persia, Nestorianism was for a long time the only form of Christianity tolerated.

BARTH, Christian Gottlob, b. in Stuttgart, July 31, 1799; d. at Calw, Nov. 12, 1862; studied theology at Tübingen, 1817-21; became pastor at Möttlingen in 1824, but retired in 1838 to Calw, and devoted himself entirely to the missionary cause. He founded the missionary society of Würtemberg, and brought it in active co-operation with Basel and all the great missionary societies of the Christian world. He wrote some of the best German missionary hymns. He edited the Calwer Missionsblatt, and a great number of works of practical Christianity, mostly designed for children and youths: Biblische Geschichten; Kirchengeschichte; Jugendblätter, a monthly; Handbuch der Bibelklärung; Kindermissionsblätter; some of which met with an almost unparalleled success. K. WERNER: G. Barth, Calw, 1865-69, 3 vols. See the article of H. GUNDEK in Herzog.

BARTHOLOMÆUS DE MARTYRIBUS, b. in Lisbon, 1514; d. at Viana, 1590; received his surname from the Church De Martyribus, in which he was baptized; entered the order of the Dominicans in 1528; was for nearly twenty years a teacher of theology and philosophy; and became in 1558 Archbishop of Braga, but was in 1582 allowed by Pope Gregory XIII. to resign his office, and retire to the convent of Viana. He was an enthusiastic and energetic reformer. As archbishop, he carried through the severest reforms, not only in his palace, but also in his diocese; and in the Council of Trent he spoke of the necessary reforms of the cardinals. He founded the first theological seminary in Portugal, and hospitals for the sick and the poor. He wrote Compendium Vitæ Spirituális; Stimulus Pastorum, etc. His collected works appeared in Rome in 2 vols. fol., 1727, edited by Malachias d'Inguimbert. His life was written by DE SACY, Paris, 1663.

BARTHOLMESS, Christian Jean Guillaume, b. at Geisselbronn, in Alsace, Feb. 26, 1815; d. at Strassburg, Aug. 31, 1856; studied at Pfortzheim and Strassburg; lived for several years as a tutor in a private family in Paris, and was in 1853 appointed professor in the Protestant seminary in Strassburg. He wrote, among other works, Histoire Critique des Doctrines Religieuses de la Philosophie Moderne, 2 vols., 1855.

BARTHOLOMEW (son of Talmai), one of the twelve apostles (Matt. x. 3; Mark iii. 18; Luke vi. 14; Acts i. 13), but no account in New Testament is given of his work. Eusebius and Jerome relate that Pantænus, a Christian missionary of the second century, found in India the Gospel of Matthew written in Hebrew, which had been left there by Bartholomew. The apostle is said to have preached in other parts of Asia, and at last to have been flayed alive, and then crucified, head downwards, at Albanopolis in Armenia. His corpse was miraculously conveyed to the island of Lipari, near the northern coast of Sicily, from there to Benevento in Southern Italy, and in A.D. 983 to Rome. St. Bartholomew's Day is celebrated Aug. 24 (25 in Rome). Bartholomew is almost certainly identical with Nathanael. The proof of this: (1) Philip and Nathanael are associated together by John, even as Philip and Bartholomew are in the parallel passages of the Synoptics; (2) Bartholomew is not mentioned in John's list of the twelve (xxi. 2), but Nathanael is; while the Synoptics do not mention Nathanael in their lists, but do Bartholomew. It is therefore likely that he had two names, as so many others did. In John's Gospel our Lord extols Nathanael as "an Israelite indeed, in whom is no guile" (i. 47).

BARTHOLOMEW'S DAY, The Massacre of St., Aug. 24, 1572. On Aug. 18 the wedding took place in Paris of Henri of Béarn, King of Navarre, the head of the Huguenot party, and Margaret of Valois, a sister to Charles IX., and daughter of Catherine de Medici. On this occasion a great number of Huguenot noblemen had assembled in Paris, and the impression which they made on the court and the populace seems to have been one of mingled hatred and fear. An incident added to the general threatening state of the situation. By a freak of his fickle mind, Charles IX. seemed to have thrown himself into the arms of Admiral Coligny, and prepared to make front against the dowager-queen, his mother, the Duke of Anjou, his brother, and the party of the Guises. In view of this danger, the idea of Catherine, which she had often hinted at to her two sons, and repeatedly intimated to the papal legate and the ambassador of Philip II., — namely, to kill all the Huguenots, — suddenly ripened. At three o'clock in the morning of Aug. 24 Admiral Coligny was murdered in his house, and his body was thrown out of the window. He had been wounded on Friday, Aug. 22, and was sick in bed. Then the tocsin of Saint-Germain-l'Auxerrois was sounded, and the general massacre began. The retinue of the bridegroom, lodged in the Louvre, was slain in the courtyard. All over the city, the houses of the Huguenots were ransacked and pillaged and fired, and the inmates were drawn down into the street to be slaughtered. Those who attempted to flee were pursued, and hunted like game. The king stood himself, and fired from a window in the palace. Between five and six thousand persons were thus killed in Paris; and by royal order the same scenes were enacted in all the great cities of France, — Orleans, Bourges, Troyes, Lyons, Rouen, and Toulouse. In all, about thirty thousand persons were murdered. As soon as the news was received in Rome, the cannons of St. Angelo were fired, a solemn Te Deum was sung, and the Pope struck a medal bearing on the one side his own portrait, and on the other a picture rudely representing the massacre. Roman-Catholic writers defend the Pope on the ground of ignorance; but it took, at all events, some time to make the medals. See COLIGNY, HUGUENOTS.

BARTHOLOMITES. — I. In 1307 some Basilian monks from Armenia fled from their native country on account of persecutions, and settled in Genoa, where they bought a house, and the next year erected a church dedicated to St. Bartholomew. They were joined by other members of their order; and Clement V. authorized them to celebrate divine service according to their rites. Gradually, however, they left their rules, and became incorporated with other orders. In 1650 Innocent X. suppressed the order altogether. — II. A congregation of secular priests, founded by Bartholomeus Holzhauser in Salzburg (1613–58) for the purpose of preaching and teaching. Innocent XI. confirmed their constitution in 1680; and they spread rapidly in Germany, Switzerland, Hungary, and Poland. The Emperor Leopold, ordered that they should always be preferred to vacant benefices in his hereditary possessions. A peculiarity of their constitution was that they never worked alone, but always two and two together. In spite of the zeal with which the order started into life, it became extinct in the eighteenth century.

BARTOLI, Daniel, b. at Ferrara, 1608; d. in Rome, 1685; entered the Society of Jesus in 1623; was a distinguished preacher and teacher of rhetoric, and wrote, besides other works, the history of his order, Istoria della Compagnia di Gesu, in 6 vols. fol., Rome, 1653–73, of which especially the parts containing the history of the society in Asia are replete with curious information. His collected works were published in 12 vols. by Marietti, Turin, 1825.

BARTON, Elizabeth, a servant-girl at an inn at Aldington, Kent, acquired a reputation in the neighborhood as a prophetess; and just as the excitement produced throughout all England by the attempts of Henry VIII. to obtain a divorce from Catherine was at its highest, the "Holy Maid of Kent," as Elizabeth was generally called, had some visions which plainly revealed the divine displeasure at the royal plans. The party of the queen, especially the clergy, was not slow in utilizing this incident. The chapel of Aldington witnessed very strange scenes, and the Holy Maid became an important argument. But in 1533 the king brought Elizabeth and her chief supporters, among whom were five priests, before Parliament. They were examined, and sentenced to death; and Elizabeth was beheaded at Tyburn, April 21, 1534.

BA'RUCH (blessed), the son of Neriah, friend and faithful companion of the prophet Jeremiah, whose secretary (amanuensis) he was (Jer. xxxii. 12, xxxvi. 4, 17 sq., 27, 32, xiv. 1 sq.), and whose sufferings he shared. See JEREMIAH. Baruch was accused by the princes, after Nebuchadnezzar's capture of Jerusalem, of influencing Jeremiah in favor of the Chaldeans (Jer. xliii. 3); accordingly he was thrown into prison, whence he was released at Jeremiah's request (Joseph. Antiq. x. 9, 1). He accompanied Jeremiah into Egypt (Jer. xliii. 6). Nothing further is known about his fate.

BARZIL'LAI (of iron, i. e., strong) of Rogelim, in the land of Gilead, gave timely material aid to King David when he was flying from Absalom; and on David's victorious return he refused the offer of official position the thankful king made him, and recommended his son Chimham in his stead (2 Sam. xvii. 27–29, xix. 33, 37, 40). David remembered the family of Barzillai upon his death-bed (1 Kings ii. 7), and charged Solomon to provide for them.

BASCOM, Henry Bidleman, b. at Hancock, N. Y., May 27, 1796; d. at Louisville, Ky., Sept. 8, 1850; began to preach in 1813; was appointed chaplain to Congress in 1823, president of Madison College, Pennsylvania, 1827, professor of morals in Augusta College, 1832, president of Transylvania University, 1842, and bishop of the Methodist-Episcopal Church South in 1850. He edited the Quarterly Review of the Methodist-Episcopal Church from 1846 to 1850; published two volumes of sermons, 1849–50, and lectures on "Infidelity," "Moral Science," etc. His collected works appeared at Nashville, 1856, in four volumes. His life was written by Dr. Henkle, Nashville, 1854.

BASEDOW, Johannes Bernhard, b. in Hamburg, Sept. 11, 1723; d. at Magdeburg July 25, 1790; studied theology at Leipzig; was tutor to a noble family in Holstein, 1749–53; professor at the Academy of Sorö in Denmark, 1753–61, and professor at the gymnasium in Altona, 1761–68. While in Altona, he published a number of theological works, — Philalethia, Theoretisches System der gesunden Vernunft, Versuch einer freimüthigen Dogmatik, etc., — which belong among the flattest and coarsest, but also among the most amusing, specimens of German rationalism. By Rousseau's Emile he was drawn away from theology, and in 1768 he set out to become the Columbus of pedagogy, and though in this field, too, he gave ample evidence that he was personally a mere charlatan, he had some good ideas, and gave the first impulse to a most necessary educational reform. The character, however, of flat and coarse rationalism, never left him, and marred his pedagogical system in all its details.

BASEL, Confession of. The Confession of Basel was first formulated by Œcolampadius as part of a speech with which he opened the synod of Basel in September, 1531. After his death it was further elaborated by Myconius, and promulgated Jan. 21, 1534, when all citizens were summoned to meet in the guildhouses, and hear it, and declare whether they were prepared to accept it, and stake honor, property, and body on its defence. It is simple and moderate, occupying an intermediate position between Luther and Zwingli. The first Helvetic Confession is often called the Second Confession of Basel, because it was written in, not for, Basel. See SCHAFF: Creeks of Christendom, vol. I. 385 sqq.

BASEL, Council of, Aug. 27, 1431–May 7, 1449. The Pope and the papal curia had succeeded in transferring the Council of Constance to Siena, and dissolved the assembly before it got fairly to work. In spite of this disappointment, the demand for a new council convened outside of Italy became louder and louder, especially at the courts and in the universities; and political troubles finally determined Martin V. to issue a bull convoking an ecumenical council at Basel. He died shortly after: but his successor, Eugene IV., was compelled to confirm the bull; and Aug. 27, 1431, the council was opened by Johannes Polemar and Johannes of Ragusa. So little confidence, however, had people in the sincerity of the papal government, that only a very small number of prelates accepted the invitation; and it was not until Cardinal Cesarini had arrived, accompanied by Nicolaus Cusanus, and the Roman king, Sigismund, sent a protector in the name of the realm, that the interest became serious and general. The order of business on which the assembly agreed Sept. 26, 1431, was good. The old grouping of the members according to nationality was discarded; and four committees were formed, on matters of faith, political affairs, ecclesiastical reforms, and general business. These committees discussed separately; and the agreement of three of them was necessary to bring a question before a general session, over which Cardinal Cesarini presided, and make it a decree of the council. As soon, however, as the assembly was fairly constituted, and began to work, the papal government felt that it was a power, and a hostile power. The Pope was afraid, and Dec. 18, 1431, he sent a bull to Cardinal Cesarini dissolving the assembly. The Council protested, declaring that the Pope had no power to do such a thing. April 29, 1432, the Pope and his cardinals were invited to come to the council. Sept. 6, when they had not come, a process was instituted against them for contumacy; and the deposition of Eugene IV. would probably have followed very quickly, but for the mediation of the Emperor Sigismund, who had arrived at Basel on Oct. 11.

The three great questions which the Council had to solve were the Bohemian heresy, the ecclesiastical reform, and the reconciliation between the Greek and the Roman churches. Jan. 4, 1433, Procopius, Rokyczana, etc., rode into Basel; and their proud and fierce mien overawed not only the council, but the city itself. By the unexpected affability and blandness of the cardinals, a kind of reconciliation was brought about. The use of the cup in the celebration of the Lord's Supper was granted. With respect to the question of ecclesiastical reform, the cardinals were not so ready to make concessions. But it must not be overlooked, that the measures which the Council proposed June, 1435, were dictated by hatred to the curia, rather than by enthusiasm for the church. The concubinate of the priests, the abuses which prevailed in the monasteries, the abolition of the frivolous dramatic representations in the churches, and other questions of a purely moral bearing, were evidently not treated with the same zeal as those relating to the financial and political position of the Pope and the curia, — the Peter's pence, the pallium-money, the tax on the papal confirmation of ecclesiastical promotion, the judicial authority of the Pope, etc. The Pope, the cardinals, and the whole army of officials which lived in Rome on revenues derived in this way, felt their very existence threatened, and offered the most determined resistance. Finally the question of the union of the Greek and Roman Church brought about a complete breach. John Palæologus had addressed himself to both the Pope and to the Council, and both wished to treat the case separately and independently. Political interests of considerable importance were mixed up with the question; and the passions at last grew so hot, that in the session of March 7, 1437, the fathers of the council were prevented from coming to blows only by the interference of the burghers of the city. Cardinal Cesarini and the whole papal party now left the assembly, which from this moment fell under the sway of Cardinal Louis d'Allemand, Archbishop of Arles, — one of Rome's bitterest enemies, — and became more and more democratic and tumultuous.

In July, 1437, the process against Eugene IV. was re-opened. Jan. 24, 1438, he was suspended, and June 25, 1439, he was deposed. Nov. 5, same year, his successor was elected, Felix V., who took up his residence at Lausanne. The difficulty, however, was to enforce these acts. Eugene IV., who designated the Fathers assembled at Basel as a band belonging to Satan, convened a counter-council at Ferrara, at which the Emperor and the Patriarch of Constantinople were present. In France, the synod of Bourges (1438) incorporated the decrees of the Council of Basel with the laws of the kingdom, the so-called pragmatic sanction; but the King himself, Charles VII., still acknowledged Eugene IV. as the true successor of Peter. Germany followed in the same track, though without binding itself by any formal acknowledgment of either the Council of Basel or Eugene IV. Felix V. was not recognized by any but the Swiss, and the Duke of Bavaria. His overtures to Friedrich III. entirely failed. In course of time it became apparent that the contest between the Council and the Pope would be decided by Germany; and Eugene IV. proved to be a better diplomat than the Fathers at Basel. He bribed the chancellor of the empire, Schlick, and the secretary, Æneas Sylvius, and on Feb. 7, 1447, Germany declared for Eugene. Rome was victorious. Felix V. resigned; and, when Eugene IV. shortly after died, the Council recognized his successor Nicolas V., and decreed its own dissolution, April 25, 1449, thereby making it almost evident that a reform of the church in the way of peaceable development was an impossibility.

BASHAN (the fruitful), the country of the Rephaim, giants (Gen. xiv. 5), and of Og the Amorite, who opposed Israel, but was defeated and slain (Num. xxi. 33, xxxii. 33).

History. — It was the northern part of the East Jordan country; and it extended from "the border of Gilead" (i.e., the Jabbok) on the south, to Mount Hermon on the north, and from the Arabah, or Jordan Valley, on the west, to Salchah and the borders of the Geshurites and the Maacathites on the east. It was assigned to the half-tribe of Manasseh together with half of Gilead. The cities are described by Moses as "fenced with high walls, gates, and bars" (Deut. iii. 5). The land seems to have been thickly populated and highly cultivated. In Jehu's time Hazael robbed Israel of their East Jordan possessions (2 Kings x. 33); but in Jeroboam II.'s time they were regained (2 Kings xiv. 25). Pul and Tiglath-pileser successively overran the country, and the latter carried its inhabitants, with those of West Jordanic Israel, into captivity (2 Kings xv. 19, 29). From this time, Syrian and Arabian tribes have populated Bashan. In the confusion consequent upon the death of Alexander the Great, Bashan, or, as it is almost always called in Hebrew, the Bashan, suffered severely; for its possession was an object of continual contest. "Idumæan princes, Nabathean kings, Arab chiefs, ruled in their turn." It was divided into four provinces, — Gaulanitis (Jaulan), Auranitis (Hauran), Trachonitis (Lejah), and Batanæa (Bashan). Augustus gave the three last provinces to Herod the Great about B.C. 20 (Joseph., Antiq. xv. 10, 1), and they passed to his son Philip; later Herod Agrippa II. received from Claudius this territory, and Abilene beside (Antiq. xx. 7, 1). A new era opened for the country, when, about the second Christian century, the region of Yemen (South Arabia) being overpeopled, several tribes sent out colonies to the Bashan. These were welcomed by the Romans, because they were orderly and sedentary; and they formed a barrier against robber tribes. It is said that these colonists were Christians. But after the first colonists (Seli-hides) came others, also Christians (Jefnides or Ghassanides); and the latter dispossessed the former, and for nearly five centuries were the ruling race; but at length, not being properly supported by the Greeks, they succumbed to the horde of Mohammedan Arabs in the year 637. The former prosperity has never returned.

The Land. — Its productiveness was remarkable, and is mentioned frequently in the Old Testament (Ps. xxii. 12, ii. 13; Jer. l. 19). The western part to-day retains its fertility. On the east rise the beautiful Hauran Mountains to a height of six thousand feet. The soil of the western part is chalky; and the evergreen oaks, figs, and pistacio-trees, and the luxuriant grass, continue to attest its richness. In the Hauran the soil is basalt and lava, but equally rich. The climate of the table-land of the Hauran, lying upwards of two thousand feet above sea-level, is very healthy; and in the afternoon the heat is tempered by a refreshing west wind. The semi-transparent wheat is here said to yield eighty-fold, and barley a hundred; but drought or locusts occasionally destroy the crop. Rye, barley, and oats frequently are found growing wild; but they are quite different from the cultivated varieties. No trees grow on the table-land. There are no meadows. The cattle are fed on barley. — [The Hauran in the wider sense is now bounded on the north by the Wady-el-Ajrm, belonging to Damascus, and on the south by the Belka and the steppe of Hamad. Toward the north-east, and beyond the "Meadow Lakes," extends a remarkable district, consisting of a series of extinct craters, in the centre of which is the Safa, a long and broad lava range, with the ruins of the "White Castle." To the south and east of this lies the Harras, an undulating plain entirely covered with fragments of lava, — a dreary wilderness.] Ancient Bashan had two capital cities, Astaroth or Ashteroth, Karnaim, and Edrei (Gen. xiv. 5; Num. xxi. 33; Deut. i. 4, etc.). Edrei has been identified with Der'at, which is even now well filled and walled (during the Christian period it was the seat of a bishop); and Ashtaroth with Busroh, the Bostra of the Latins.

The Antiquities and Modern Inhabitants. — It is when we contemplate Bashan as a land of ruins, and study these remains, that the unique character of this land comes out. There are houses, not improbably many centuries old, uninhabited, and yet as perfect as when made. There every thing is of stone: doors, gates, windows, stairs, galleries, cupboards, benches, even candlesticks, — all are stone. The reason for this curious state of things is the entire absence of wood. Nor are these buildings all defective in taste. On the contrary, many of the buildings are really fine; e.g., at Kanawat there are many sculptures and beautiful houses, and above all a little (ruined) temple, standing on an eminence in the middle of a small valley, and surrounded by vegetation. But besides it there is a theatre, a tower, and other public and private buildings. Ruins lie scattered in every direction, attesting the present distress and the former grandeur. Many travellers would visit this interesting region, if it were not for the perpetual feuds of the different tribes, which renders travelling unsafe. For several centuries, the Druses have colonized the Hauran Mountains, so that the district is sometimes called the Druse Mountains.

BASIL, a physician, was placed in the episcopal chair of Ancyra by the Eusebian party, 336, and vindicated himself in the see, though his ordination was annulled by the Council of Sardica, 347. He was the head of the Semi-arian party, and defended the views of the party against both the Eudoxians and the Acacians, but was finally deposed by the Arians in 360. His book against Marcellus, as well as another work by him, De Virginitate, have been lost.

BASIL, Bishop of Seleucia in Isauria, voted in the Eutychiean controversy against Eutyches at the synod of Constantinople (448), but for him, at the Robbers' synod of Ephesus (449), and was, on account of this inconsistency, deposed by the synod of Chalcedon (451), but was re-instated when he declared that he had voted under compulsion at Ephesus. Forty homilies by him, and a work on St. Thecla (probably spurious), are extant, and have been printed at Heidelberg, 1596 and 1605, and in Paris, 1622.

BASIL THE GREAT, b. at Cæsarea in Cappadocia, about 330, d. there Jan. 1, 379, stands between his older friend, Gregory Nazianzen, and his younger brother, Gregory of Nyssa, as the central leaflet of that Cappadocian triple-clover which marks the final completion and consolidation of the theology of the Greek Church. He grew up at Annesi, an estate belonging to the family, situated on the River Iris in Pontus. Afterwards he studied philosophy and rhetoric under Libanius in Constantinople, and under Himerius in Athens, in company with Gregory Nazianzen and Emperor Julian. The alternative which at that period presented itself to every strong and sincere mind in the higher walks of life, the choice between Greek philosophy, with its aesthetic splendor, with its opportunities for a brilliant career, with its utter insufficiency for a hungering soul, and Christian asceticism, with its daily combats, and a victory which nobody saw, with its perpetual misery, and a peace and power which found only a little private praise, but no public recognition,—this dilemma, on which the Emperor Julian wrecked his life, seems to have solved itself very quickly for Basil. He admired Libanius, and he admired Antonius; but he never seems to have hesitated in choosing the latter. In 357 he left Athens, and staid for some time at Annesi, where his widowed mother and his elder sister, Macrina, lived a life of severe asceticism. At this period he probably received the Christian baptism. He then set out on a visit to the most famous hermits of Syria, Palestine, and Egypt; and on his return home he divided his property among the poor, retired to a wild mountain tract on the Iris, opposite Annesi, formed a little community of hermits, and gave this community its rules of life. The organization of monasticism had already begun in these regions, under the leadership of Eustathius of Sebaste, a friend of Basil; but here, as in so many other points, the latter showed himself a man who held all the instincts of his age living in his own bosom. His rules were so exactly that which was wanted, that eventually they alone reigned throughout the Greek Church. As yet his interest for dogmatic questions seems to have been slumbering. He was present in Constantinople in 360, and heard the debates between Eustathius and Eunomius; but he listened only. Gradually, however, he emerged from that great middle party, to which he originally belonged, the Homoiousians, standing midway between Arianism and Orthodoxy; and it afterwards became his great task to draw this great but somewhat inert mass over to the Orthodox side. In 364 he was called to active participation in the work of the Church, and ordained presbyter of Cæsarea by Bishop Eusebius; and so great was his practical talent, that in a very short time he became the real leader of the whole congregation. After the death of Eusebius (370), he was elected bishop, though not without opposition. The first great task which devolved upon him was the suppression of Arianism. On his procession through Asia Minor, the Emperor Valens enforced Arianism wherever he came. When he arrived in Cappadocia, however, Basil made such an impression upon him, that not only was no violence attempted, but the bishop was allowed to remain unmolested in his office. The second great problem of his life was the reconciliation between the Greek and Roman churches. Many agencies had been at work in producing the breach; and fresh elements of discord were added every day. Just now it was the question of the procession of the Holy Spirit, concerning which Basil wrote one of his principal works, De Spiritu Sancta Amphiloichium. Nor did he live to see the question settled. At the same time he had his hands full with controversies nearer at home, especially with Eunomius, against whom he wrote his celebrated Libri adversus Eunomium V. His position was so difficult, that when, in one of the last years of his life, he went to visit his brother Petrus, in the neighborhood of Neo-cæsarea in Pontus, the residence of Atarbius, the whole city was in commotion on account of his presence.

LIT.—The works of Basil, dogmatical, exegetical, liturgical, ascetic, and a number of very interesting letters, were first printed in Basel, 1532. The best edition is that by J. Garnier, Paris, 1721–30, 3 vols. folio, reprinted by Migne. With respect to his life, see the eulogies by Gregory Nazianzen, Gregory of Nyssa, and Ephraim Syrus; A. BASILIANS. What Benedict of Nursia afterwards became for the Western Church, Basil was for the Eastern Church,—the organizer of the monastic life. Monasticism was well known in Asia Minor at the time of Basil; in Pontus and Cappadocia it had been introduced by Eustathius of Sebaste; but in the form of cenobitism it was entirely unknown. This progress in its development it owed entirely to Basil. He understood that most of the graces of Christianity are impossible in a solitary life; for "whose feet wilt thou wash, whom wilt thou serve, how canst thou be the last of all, when thou art alone?" Going out from this principle, he founded in the middle of the fourth century the first monastic community on the Iris in Pontus, opposite his home, Annesi. The rules which he gave this community connected active industry and devotional exercises in regular successions, day and night,—one meal a day, consisting of bread and water; very little sleep during the hours before midnight; prayers and singing, morning, noon, and evening; work in the field during forenoon and afternoon, etc. These rules were further developed and completed by his ascetical writings. The institution prospered; and similar institutions sprang up, in extremely short time, in other places of Pontus and Cappadocia, whence they spread far into Western Europe. After the separation between the Eastern and Western churches, Basil's rules became almost the exclusive regulation of monastic life in the Eastern Church; so that a "Basilian" simply means a monk of the Greek Church. In the Western Church the rules of Basil were afterwards completely superseded by those of Benedict of Nursia. Nevertheless, Basilian monasteries, acknowledging the supremacy of the Pope, are still lingering in Sicily and in the Slavonian countries.

BASILICA. See ARCHITECTURE, CHRISTIAN.

BASILIDES, a famous Gnostic who lived in Egypt in the first half of the second century (d. between 125 and 130), and to whom we are indebted for the oldest testimony to the Gospel of John. He quoted the passages, "The true light, which enlighteneth every man, was coming into the world," and "My hour is not yet come." See Abbot, Authorship of the Fourth Gospel, pp. 83-87. Of his works, and those of his son and pupil Isidorus, only a few extracts have come down to us in the Philosophoumena of Hippolytus, VII., 14 sq., and in the disputations between Archelaus of Kaskar and Mani, written in Egypt in the beginning of the fourth century (ZACAGNUS: Collect. Monument. Veter.). Of his system there are two contradictory accounts, — one by Irenæus, Adv. Hær., I. 24, and Epiphanius, Hær. 21; and another by Hippolytus and Clemens Alexandrinus in his Stromata. The former bases the system on a dualistic principle, — even on a very strongly pronounced Persian-looking dualism: the latter describes it as monistic, with a preponderance of Greek, more especially Stoic elements, and with a tint of pantheism. The latter agrees best with the fragments, and is the generally accepted one; though the former corresponds well with the sect such as it lived on in Egypt until the fifth century, with its frivolous morals, its inclination to magic, its Abraxas-symbols, etc. See the article GnosticisM, and BAUR: Die christliche Gnosis, Tübingen, 1831; JAKOBI: Basilides, Berlin, 1832; UHLHORN: System d. Basilides, 1855; P. HOFSTEDE DE GROOT: Basilides, Leipzig, 1868. See GnosticisM.

BASNAGE, Benjamin, b. at Carentan, 1580; d. 1652; pastor at Carentan, Normandy; played a conspicuous part in the synods of Charenton (1631), Alençon (1637), etc., and exercised a considerable influence on the Protestant Church of France. Among other polemical tracts he wrote, De l'État visible et invisible de l'Église, La Rochelle, 1612, against the doctrine of a purgatory. — Jacques Basnage, b. at Rouen, 1653; d. at the Hague, Dec. 22, 1723; studied theology at Saumur, Geneva, and Sedan; was pastor at Rouen; retired in 1685 to Holland, and was pastor first at Rotterdam, and then, since 1709, at the Hague. He was a powerful preacher, and published, when in 1720 a Protestant rising was feared in France, a most impressive admonition to his co-religionists, Instruction Pastorale, to keep quiet, and avoid all disturbances. Still greater fame he acquired as a diplomat. He sat in the conference of Gertruydenberg; and when, in 1716, the Regent of France, the Duke of Orléans, sent Abbé Dubois to Holland to negotiate the triple alliance, he instructed him to seek and follow the advice of Basnage. To the after-world, however, he is principally known as a scholar and an author. His writings are partly historical, partly polemical. He was historiographer of Holland, and wrote, Annales des Provinces-Unies, 2 vols. fol., the Hague, 1719-26, an excellent work. But his principal works in this line are: Histoire de la Religion des Église Réformées, Rotterdam, 1690; Histoire de l'Église depuis J. C. jusqu'à présent, Rotterdam, 1699; Histoire des Juifs depuis J. C. jusqu'à présent, Rotterdam, 1706. Noticeable among his polemical writings are, Examen des Méthodes . . . du Clergé de France, Cologne, 1682; Réponse à M. l'Évêque de Meaux, Cologne, 1686; directed against Bossuet. — Samuel Basnage, b. at Bayeux, 1638; d. as pastor at Zütphen, 1721; was first pastor at Bayeux, but fled in 1685 to Holland. His Exercitationes Historico-Critice de Rebus Sacris et Ecclesiasticis, Utrecht (1692), is a spirited criticism of the Annals of Baronius from 35, at which year Casaubon stopped, to 44. He also wrote other historical and moral works. He was the grandson of Benjamin Basnage.

BASTHOLM, Christian, b. in Copenhagen, Nov. 2, 1740; d. there Jan. 25, 1819; was court-preacher, confessor to the king, the most admired orator of his time, and the most striking instance of rationalism in the history of the Danish Church; gifted, versatile, superficial, the rage of the day, and a scarecrow for afterdays. He rose and fell with the times. In 1775 he published a Sacred Rhetoric, which was translated into German, and by Joseph II. introduced as a text-book in all Austrian seminaries, and in which he gave very minute advice with respect to the raising of the eyes, the folding of the hands, etc., and especially warned preachers against chewing tobacco, because it might cause them "to spit in their hearers' faces." In 1785 he published a Liturgical Improvement, which occasioned an endless and bitter controversy in Denmark, and in which he proposed to make the service elegant, diversified, and interesting, "like concerts and balls." In 1795 he published a Short Address to Clergymen, in which he exhorted them to study natural history and political economy, and to preach about poultry-farming, stall-feeding, fruit-raising, etc. In 1805 he retired into private life, studied natural science and stoical philosophy, and died wholly forgotten. CLEMENS PETERSEN.

BATES, William, b. in 1625; d. in 1699; studied at the University of Cambridge, and was appointed chaplain to Charles II., though he was a member of the Conference of Savoy for reviewing the liturgy, and was engaged in the drawing-up of the exceptions to the Book of Common Prayer. He afterwards became minister of St. Dunstan's in the West, but lost the benefice for nonconformity. He wrote, Select Lives of Illustrious and Pious Persons; Harmony of the Divine Attributes, etc. His collected works, with a memoir by Farmer, appeared in 4 vols. in London, 1815.

BATH. 1. Among Hebrews. — Bathing in the Orient is a necessity, because of the heat and the dust, and the likelihood of skin-diseases, and was almost daily practised by the Jews. It was enjoined by the Mosaic law in certain cases of Levitical uncleanness (Lev. xiv. 8, xv. 5, xvii. 6, xxii. 6; Num. xix. 19; Deut. xxiii. 11), and thus incorporated with religion as among the ancient Egyptians and modern Mohammedans. Bathing was required of the priests; and the high priest at his installation, and particularly upon the Day of Atonement (which see), was obliged to bathe before each act of expiation (Lev. xvi. 4). The rabbins increased the number to ten.

Bathing after mourning, indicative of removing a defilement, is referred to in the case of Ruth (iii. 3) and David (2 Sam. xii. 20); as part of the toilet (Ezek. xxiii. 40); as usual after birth (Ezek. xvi. 4). The Hebrews bathed not only in running water (Lev. xv. 13; 2 Kings v. 10), but also in open basins in the courtyards of private houses (2 Sam. xi. 2), and, in a later day, in public baths introduced under foreign influence (Josephus, Antiq. xix. 7, 5). There were bath-rooms in the later temple for the priests' use. Besides, there were hot baths near Tiberias (Josephus, Antiq. xviii. 2, 3), near Gadera, and at Callirhoe, east of the Dead Sea (Josephus, Bell. Jud. i. 33, 5). In New-Testament times there is mention of the Jerusalem baths, Bethesda and Siloam (John v. 2, ix. 7). According to the Mishna (Pesach. ii. 7), Hebrew women sometimes used bran in the bath, or to rub themselves dry with it. Even so the modern Arab, when he cannot get water, uses sand. [In John xiii. 10 there is reference to the practice of bathing.] V. ORELLI.

In every considerable town there was a public bath. The Talmud gives us particulars of their construction and use. There were large bathing-rooms, usually darkened a little, with tubes for conveying the warm water, basins, broad stones to stand upon while cooling off, etc. The water-basins were heated underneath; and inasmuch as there was danger from the water becoming too hot, or from the floor being burned through, it was customary to offer a prayer before stepping in. The bathers, at times women, had bathing-dresses, different kinds of soaps, combs, etc. They inhaled the steam, swallowed a little of the warm water, then had cold water poured over them, or plunged into cold water, drank a mixture of wine, oil, and water, and finally were anointed with oil and perfumes. The bathing-hour was not earlier than ten A.M. A chaste behavior was enjoined. The bath is enthusiastically praised in the Talmud. It is declared that the reason why there were no lepers in Babylon was because the inhabitants bathed in the Euphrates. The greatest rabbins, rather than not bathe, frequented the heathen baths; and when once Rabbi Gamaliel was asked why he went to the bath of Aphrodite, he replied, "The goddess is for the ornament of the bath, but not the bath for the glory of the goddess." HAMBURGER: Real-Encyclopädie des Judenthums, Ab. 1 (1874).

2. Among Christians. — The public baths, which all classes frequented, and to which the early Christians before their conversion went as a matter of course, were so commonly places of such shamelessness, — both sexes bathed together oftentimes, — that it is no wonder that the faithful church-fathers raised their voices against their abuses. Justice requires it to be said that many of the heathen protested against this shameful corruption, some of the emperors took precautions against it, and in the great public baths of Rome the two sexes did not mingle. Still it is noteworthy, that though there was public censure, e.g., of women, particularly of virgins, who were immodest in the bath, there was no formal, ecclesiastical prohibition of the public baths. On the contrary, the Apostle John, according to Irenæus (Adv. Hæc., III. 3, 4), frequented them; so did Tertullian (Apol., c. 42), the rigorous ascetic; and so did Augustine; and he says he went there to calm himself after his excessive grief over his mother's death, because he had heard that the bath drives sorrow out of the heart: and hence the Greeks called it balanion, as if from ballein anian, to cast out sorrow, a false though popular etymology (Confess., ix. 12). But, although not forbidden, the use of them was remitted during public calamities, penance, Lent, and for the first week after baptism.

From the time of Constantine it was usual to build baths near the basilicas, partly for the use of the clergy, and partly for other ecclesiastical purposes. In the fiscal accounts of the popes, an entry concerning the repair or the erection of such baths often appears. KRAUS: Real-Encyclopädie der christlichen Alterthümer, art. Bäder.

BATH-KOL (daughter of the voice, i.e., echo). A Talmudic term for a supposed divine revelation. The true idea of it is, that it was the echo of a heavenly voice. Instances of it are given in the Talmud. Not only was it the utterance of a single word, but sometimes of a sentence, as when "Once in a gathering, a Bath-Kol said, 'There is a man among you who is worthy to have the Divine Majesty rest upon him; but the times are not worthy.' All eyes were turned upon the aged Hillel, the holy and modest scholar of Ezra."

The rabbins felt keenly the great difference between their times and those of the prophets. In one place we read, "Our rabbins have related, that, since the death of Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi, the Holy Ghost has been taken from Israel. Nevertheless, the Bath-Kol remains." But it was not asserted that no Bath-Kol came before the second temple. One rabbi attributes it to Daniel; another, to Hagar, and Manoah and his wife. Indeed, it may be said generally that the mysterious voices heard at different times by the Bible characters were, unless they were prophets, Bath-Kol. The same term may designate the voices mentioned in the Gospels (Matt. iii. 17-xvii. 5; John xii. 28); but the Peshito errs when it refers Acts xii. 22 and Heb. iii. 15 to this source.

The Bath-Kol was (1) The first result of reflection upon the prophecies of the Old Testament, grown up upon the soil of the Old Testament, causing a sense of desertion by the Lord, and a deep longing for the return of the Shechinah; (2) It was designed to prepare the people for the remarkable voices during the last times of the second temple, which, equally with the miracles of Jesus and his apostles, pointed out the Messiah and his kingdom, until the obdurate and devoted city, immediately before its capture and destruction, was dumfounded by the cry which issued from the temple: "Let us go from hence" (Josephus, War. VI. 5, 3).

BAUMGARTEN, Siegmund Jacob, b. at Wollmirstädt, Saxony, March 14, 1706; d. at Halle, July 4, 1757; studied theology in the University of Halle, and became professor of theology there 1780. He was an excellent teacher, and read generally to three hundred or four hundred hearers. He was also an industrious writer, and published voluminous works on exegesis, hermeneutics, morals, dogmatics, and history. By adopting the formal scheme of the philosophy of Wolff, and applying it to the theological ideas in which he was educated, he came to form a transition from the pietism of Spener and Francke to the modern rationalism. His life was written by his enthusiastic disciple, Semler (2 vols. Halle, 1781, 1782).

BAUMGARTEN-CRUSIUS, Ludwig Friedrich Otto, b. at Merseburg, July 31, 1788; d. at Jena, May 31, 1843; studied theology and philology at Leipzig, and became professor of theology at Jena in 1812. His principal works are Einleitung in das Studium d. Dogmatik, Leipzig, 1820; Lehrbuch d. christ. Dogmengeschichte, Jena, 1832; Compendium d. Dogmengeschichte, Leipzig, 1840, finished by Hase, 1846; Theologische Auslegung der Johanneischen Schriften, Jena, 1843-45, 2 vols.

BAUR, Ferdinand Christian, b. at Schmiden, near Cannstatt, June 21, 1792; d. at Tübingen, Dec. 2, 1860. He was educated at the Seminary of Blaubeuren and at the University of Tübingen; became professor of Latin and Greek (1817) in the former, and in 1826 professor of church history at Tübingen. He soon gathered a large audience around his chair, and filled them with admiration by his genius, learning, and enthusiasm as a teacher. A Hegelian himself, he applied Hegel's method of dialectical development, by mediation between two opposites, to church history and the growth of the New Testament, and thus founded the famous "Tübingen School" of theology, which revolutionized the church history of the apostolic and post-apostolic times. He must be ranked alongside of Neander and Gieseler as a church historian of the first rank, independent, original, profound, and scholarly. He had a rare talent for critical combination, and the grasp of a giant in handling historical problems. He was, however, deficient in well-balanced judgment; and so, while tireless in his investigations and bold in his theories, he over-valued tendencies, and under-valued persons and facts. He ruthlessly attacked the optimistic opinion of the apostolic church, and attempted to show, that so far from being peaceful, quiet, loving, and united, it was torn by opposing factions, — the friends of Peter and those of Paul. He thus resolved its rich spiritual life of faith and love into a purely speculative process of conflicting tendencies, a keen rivalry between the Petrine and Pauline parties, and supposed that the war stopped by the compromise the ancient Catholic Church. According to his theory, he regarded the Acts as a document of this compromise, in which the points of opposition are obscured; and, further, he unhesitatingly rejected all those Epistles of the New Testament in which he could not find traces of such a (supposed) conflict. It must be acknowledged, that by his keen, critical analysis he fully brought to light the profound intellectual fermentation of the primitive church, but failed to describe the exact state of the case, because he eliminated the supernatural and miraculous elements. Yet, as an earnest and honest skeptic, he had to confess at last a psychological miracle in the conversion of Paul, and to bow before the greater miracle of the resurrection of Christ, without which the former is an inexplicable enigma. His critical researches and speculations gave a powerful stimulus to New-Testament historical studies, and resulted in vastly increased knowledge. The studies of those times by a critical and impartial method dates from Baur. But while he acknowledged only four Epistles of Paul (Romans, the two Corinthians, Galatians), and the Revelation, to be genuine products of the apostolic age, his followers have been compelled, by the use against them of their own weapons, to yield point after point; so that now they grant the authority and genuineness of ten of Paul's Epistles, and take their stand only at the so-called Pastoral Epistles. Baur owed his success partly to his clear, logical, pointed style. His literary activity was very great. His works fall into three groups; showing a movement from the history of doctrines to biblical criticism, and again from biblical criticism to general church history. To the first group belong, Geschichte des Manichäismus, 1831; Geschichte der christlichen Gnosis, 1835; Die christliche Lehre von der Versöhnung, 1838; Die Lehre von der Dreieinigkeit u. Menschwerdung Gottes, 1841-43; 3 vols.; Lehrbuch der christlichen Dogmengeschichte, 1847, 2d ed., 1858; Vorlesungen über Dogmengeschichte, published by his son, 1865-67, 3 vols.; also the three essays upon Apollonius von Tyana, 1832, Sokrates u. Christus, 1837, and Seneca u. Paulus, 1858, collected and edited by E. Zeller, 1875.

To the second group belong, Die sogenannten Pastoralbriefe des Apostels Paulus, 1835; Paulus der Apostel Jesu Christi, 1845; translated, Paul, His Life and Works, London, 1873-75; Kritische Untersuchungen über die kanonischen Evangelien, 1847; and a great number of minor essays in the Tübingen-Zeitschrift für Theologie, among which are the famous ones on the "Christ-party in Corinth," 1831, and on the "Gospel of Marcion," 1846.

To the third group belong, Das Christenthum u. die christliche Kirche in den 3 ersten Jahrhunderten, 1853; translated, Christianity and the Church in the First Three Centuries, London, 1878-79, 2 vols.; Die christliche Kirche vom 4 bis 6 Jahrhundert, 1859; Die christliche Kirche des Mittelalters, 1861; Kirchengeschichte der neueren Zeit, 1863; new edition of his Geschichte der christlichen Kirche, Tübingen u. Leipzig, 1873-77, 5 vols. Noticeable among his polemical writings are his masterly vindication of Protestantism (Gegensatz des Katholicismus u. Protestantismus, 1834, 2d, 1836) against Möhler's Symbolik; his Sendschreiben an Dr. K. Hase, 1855; and Die Tübingen Schule u. ihre Stellung zur Gegenwart, 1859. For the character and bearing of this activity, see the article TÜBINGEN, SCHOOL OF. For biography and criticism, see Worte der Erinnerung an Ferdinand Christian von Baur, Tübingen, 1861, which contains Landerer's Rede before the University of Tübingen.

BAUSSET, Louis François de, b. at Pondichéry, Dec. 14, 1748; d. in Paris, June 21, 1824; studied in the Seminary of St. Sulpice; was appointed Bishop of Alais, 1784; emigrated in 1791, but returned in 1792 to Paris, and supported himself, after a short imprisonment, by literary labor. In 1806 he was made canon of St. Denys, and in 1815, after the second return of Louis XVIII., director of the council of the University of Paris, peer of France, and cardinal, 1817. He wrote a Histoire de Fénelon, 1808, 3 vols., new ed., 1850, 4 vols., and a Histoire de Bossuet, 1815, 4 vols, 2d ed., 1819, of which especially the former met with much success.

BAUTAIN, Louis, author of The Art of Extempore-Speaking, b. at Paris in 1796; d. 1867. He was taught philosophy at the College of Strassburg, but was suspended in 1825 because of his too liberal views, and in 1828 entered the priesthood, and rose rapidly, notwithstanding his independent ways and words. In 1838 he became professor of philosophy in the University of Strassburg, afterwards vicar-general at Paris and Bordeaux, professor of theology at the Sorbonne, and superior of the house (congregation) of Juilly. He is known in America by the work quoted above, which was the product of his experience. His preaching was sober, earnest, and edifying. He was good rather than brilliant, and deserved respect for his piety and virtue. He was the author of many works, mainly of a philosophical nature.

BAVARIA was not fully Christianized until the middle of the eighth century, though Christianity was very early brought from Italy to the Roman colonies along the Danube. In 304 St. Afra suffered martyrdom at Augsburg, belonging to the Roman province of Rætia. There must consequently have been a Christian congregation in that place at that time; and at the same time there was a flourishing missionary station at Lorch, belonging to the Roman province of Noricum. Nevertheless, more than one hundred years later on, St. Valentine was driven out of Passau by the Pagans, and St. Severin found heathens making their sacrifices at Kuhl, near Salzburg. Alani, Alemanni, Heruli, etc., moved to and fro in the country, and some of them were Pagans, while others were Arians. Gradually, however, Catholic Christianity gained the ascendancy, and at the death of Boniface the Catholic Church was firmly established in the country, having seven Episcopal sees, — Passau, Freising, Würzburg, Regensburg, Augsburg, Eichstädt, and Neuburg, belonging to the archiepiscopal see of Salzburg.

In the beginning, the Reformation made considerable progress throughout the country; but after the Diet of Worms, 1521, the Duke William, under the influence of Dr. Eck, adopted a most hostile line of policy. March 5, 1522, an ordinance was issued forbidding anybody to abandon the faith of his ancestors under the severest penalties; and as conversions continued to take place, and the bishops seemed to be rather lukewarm, Dr. Eck repaired to Rome to procure for the ducal government a greater judicial authority with respect to heretics. The bishops protested, but the power was granted; and from that moment the Dukes of Bavaria became the mainstays of the Roman Church in Germany. Every one who went to hear an evangelical preacher was arrested and fined. The more stubborn were severely punished. In Landsberg nine persons were burnt, and in München twenty-nine were drowned, for heresy in 1526. Duke Maximilian I. formed the Catholic League at München in 1609; and the peace of Westphalia (1648) made no concessions to the Protestants in Bavaria. In 1549 the Jesuits were called into the country; and they reigned supremely up to the close of the eighteenth century, when the Elector Maximilian Joseph II., or rather, his minister, Montgelas, expelled them. The acquisition of new territories — the margraviates of Baireuth and Anspach, the free cities of Nuremberg, Augsburg, etc., all of which were thoroughly Protestant — made a new line of policy necessary; and by the constitution of 1818, Protestants acquired equal rights with Roman Catholics.

According to the census of 1875, the kingdom had 5,022,390 inhabitants, of whom 3,573,142 were Roman Catholics, 1,392,120 Protestants, 51,335 Jews, and 5,793 belonging to other denominations. The Roman-Catholic Church has two archbishoprics (München-Freisig and Bamberg), and six bishoprics (Augsburg, Passau, Regensburg, Eichstädt, Würzburg, and Spire), and 2,756 parishes. With each cathedral a theological seminary is connected, and there are theological faculties in München and Würzburg. The number of monastic institutions is very great; namely, 595, of which 95 for monks, with 1,233 brethren, and 500 for nuns, with 5,031 sisters. In May, 1877, the Old-Catholics numbered 3,716 independent men in thirty-four congregations; but the number was afterwards decreased. The Protestant Church is governed by consistories, under a supreme consistory in München. It has a theological faculty in Erlangen, and numbers 1,036 parishes.

BAXTER, Richard, "the chief of English Protestant schoolmen," b. at Rowton, Shropshire, Nov. 12, 1615; d. in London, Dec. 8, 1691. Although too poor in early life to be liberally educated, he was able by great diligence, notwithstanding his feeble health, to acquire extensive learning; and so, while not an accurate scholar, he was able to maintain himself against all comers in that age of vast erudition. Under the Puritan influence of home, he developed toward God; and, after a brief experience of court-ways, he determined to enter the ministry of the Church of England. Accordingly he was ordained by the Bishop of Worcester; and, after two years' faithful and fruitful service, he was called (1640) by a happy providence to Kidderminster, which was destined to be to all time associated with his name. He found the place a desert, and left it a garden. There, with unflagging zeal, he labored for the advancement of the Redeemer's kingdom, and with great success. When he came, it had a bad reputation for ignorance and vice; by the blessing of God he made it a model of all virtue. When the Civil War broke out (1642), Baxter was placed in an awkward position. He was a member of the Presbyterian party in the Church, but not in sympathy with the Revolution: indeed, his avowed object in preaching to the soldiers was to bring them back to the King and Church. For safety's sake he withdrew from Kidderminster to Gloucester, and then to Coventry, where he remained for two years, preaching regularly to the garrison and the citizens. He then (1645) became chaplain to the regiment of Whalley, the cousin of Cromwell. But in February, 1647, he finally left the army, because of a severe illness, and returned to Kidderminster. His thoughts, by his sufferings no less than by his recent experiences (for he had just come from that wonderful army which discussed theology from morning to night), were turned toward the future rest; and then it was he outlined his most popular work, The Saints' Everlasting Rest, which he published, London, 1650. From 1647 to 1660 he remained quiet; but his pastoral labors were faithful and fruitful, and his publications numerous. Blessed truly was that people to whom he ministered. It is sufficient description of his manner and methods to say he was himself the reformed pastor he has described and commended. He welcomed the return of monarchy; and, in order to remove general doubts and fears, he spread far and wide the letters addressed to him by the French pastors, Daillé, Drelincourt, and Raimond Gaches, who gave Charles a certificate of Protestantism. The King showed his gratitude by appointing Baxter one of his chaplains. Upon Sept. 10, 1662, he married Margaret, daughter of Francis Charlton, Esq., of Shropshire, a young lady of wealth and station, many years his junior, who made him a most excellent wife, and with womanly fidelity stood by his side through all his troubles. She died June 14, 1681, and he has recorded his tender appreciation of this noble woman in his Breviate of the Life of Mrs. Margaret Baxter (1681). He had need of comfort, inasmuch as the Act of Uniformity that year (1662) drove him, in company with two thousand nonconformist ministers, out of position. A cruel blow to him. In 1661 he had taken part in the Savoy Conference (so called from its being held in the Savoy Palace of the Bishop of London), between the bishops and nonconformist divines, which had for its nominal purpose a revision of the Liturgy, and to this body had submitted his Revised Liturgy. Besides, the royalist desire to win him back to the Church had been shown by Lord Clarendon's offer of the bishopric of Hereford. Encouraged by the friendly aspect of affairs, he had stately preached in London. But, after the Uniformity Act, he was compelled to leave all his positions, even his beloved Kidderminster, and to pass laborious and fearful days at Acton, where he was intimate with Sir Matthew Hale, and at Totteridge, near London. His life for the next twenty-five years was a series of sorrows, aggravated by his feeble health. For preaching he was more than once arrested, his library sold, himself put under bonds for good behavior. But nothing could daunt him. He preached whenever he had opportunity, and found in God a pavilion safe from the strife of tongues. He used the press to give wider currency to his wise and tender words; published in 1669 his trumpet Call to the Unconverted, of which twenty thousand copies were sold the first year, and which has been translated into most of the literary languages of the world;¹ in 1673, the Christian Directory, in 1674, the Poor Man's Family Book; in 1683, the Cure for Melancholy; in 1685, A Paraphrase on the New Testament. This latter work brought him into his greatest trouble. On charge of sedition he was committed to the King's Bench Prison, and tried in May, 1685, before the notorious Chief Justice Jeffreys, who sentenced him to pay five hundred marks ($1,610, a large sum in those days), and until it was paid to lie in prison, and to be bound to his good behavior for seven years. He endured eighteen months' imprisonment; but through the exertions of Lord Powis, a Roman-Catholic nobleman, the fine was remitted; and he was pardoned, and released in November, 1686. His last days were his best. His evening-time was light. Delivered from fear of persecution after King William III. entered England (1688), thoroughly respected for his courage, and, above all, for his godliness, he preached when he was able, and continued his publications. When he died, Nonconformist England mourned her chief; Episcopal England, one of her saints.

Character.—Baxter was one of those rare men who have to die in order truly to live. He was in advance of his day. He was an advocate of Christian union at a time of the fiercest partisanship, of Christian liberality at a time of the stiffest creeds, of Christian philanthropy at a time of the narrowest sympathies. Our enthusiasm for him, our respect for his courage, rises as we contemplate the miserable state of his age and country. Cavaliers, licentious, Roundheads, bigoted—and yet these were the conflicting parties. He could join neither, because his great mind perceived the good points of each side, and the bad as well. He was a born reconciliator, but in his case the middle way was by no means the safest. He was sneered at, insulted, mistrusted, and persecuted by both parties. No one could understand how Churchmanship and Dissent could exist in the same individual. But the understanding denied his age has come to us. On the twenty-eighth day of July, 1875, a statue representing him in a preaching attitude was erected at Kidderminster, and upon it this inscription: "Between the years 1641 and 1660 this town was the scene of the labors of Richard Baxter, renowned equally for his Christian learning and his pastoral fidelity. In a stormy and divided age he advocated unity and comprehension, pointing the way to everlasting rest. Churchmen and Nonconformists united to raise this memorial A.D. 1875." Dean Stanley of Westminster, and Dr. John Stoughton, Independent, of New College, London, representatives of the old opposing parties, made the addresses. Dean Stanley (see pamphlet, London, 1875) very eloquently put Baxter's present position and acknowledged worth, when he said, "It is a proof of his (Baxter's) real greatness and eminence that the nobler memories of his character have survived the distasteful and acrimonious elements with which he was encompassed. The admiration of the best spirits of his own and future times have prevailed over the violence of petty faction, this legacy was for "superstitious uses" (i.e., according to English law at the time, for the propagation of a faith not approved by the State), and therefore void. — Strover: Relations of Civil Law to Church Polity, N. Y., 1875, p. 97.

and over his own contentious self. Sir Matthew Hale's unfailing regard; Bishop Burnet's grateful acknowledgment; Ussher, when he entreated him to write the Call to the Unconverted; Eliot, the Apostle to the Indians, when he translated that book next after the Bible,—all these now turn out to be more correct judges, more proficient seers, than the narrow partisans who saw in him a mere butt for scorn or slander, or a mere combatant of an opposite school."

Writings. Poetry.—Baxter was the author of a metrical version of the Psalms, published 1692, and two volumes of poetry. He wrote the hymn beginning, "Lord, it belongs not to my care." He wrote also Latin poetry. His Poetical Fragments: Heart Employment with God and Itself: The Concordant Discord of a Broken-healed Heart, is dated, "London, at the Door of Eternity; Richard Baxter, Aug. 7, 1681." The death of his beloved wife was the occasion of its publication. Baxter invented a plan of making hymns either in long or common metre, by retaining or omitting certain designated words. Prose.—Robert Boyle, quoted in Allibone, vol. 1, p. 143, enables us to compare him with others when he says, "The works of Lightfoot extend to thirteen volumes; Jeremy Taylor's, to fifteen; Dr. Owen's, to twenty-eight; [but] Baxter's, if printed in a uniform edition, would not be comprised in less than sixty volumes." Orme enumerates one hundred and sixty-eight treatises. It must be confessed that he is exceedingly diffuse, and therefore tedious. His Saints' Everlasting Rest, and Call to the Unconverted are probably known to most persons merely by title; and indeed the former is only readable in an abridgment of an abridgment. His other books cannot be said to be read nowadays at all; although his Gildas Salvianus, the Reformed Pastor, and his Reasons for the Christian Religion, are excellent, and indeed invaluable. Perhaps as great a service as any he performed was to bring to light that golden sentence of the obscure German, Rupertus Moldenius, "In necessary things, Unity; in doubtful things, Liberty; in all things, Charity." Two testimonies, remarkable in themselves and in their source, deserve quotation (see Allibone, vol. 1, p. 143). Dr. Barrow declared "his practical writings were never mended, and his controversial ones seldom confuted;" Bishop Wilkins said, "he cultivated every subject he handled; and, if he had lived in the primitive time, he had been one of the Fathers of the Church. It was enough for one age to produce such a person." He was a preacher, a pastor, a teacher, a theologian (see next section), a master in all fields.

Theology.—His chief work was his Methodus theologiae Christianae (1681), a Latin work of nine hundred folio pages: to this his Christian Directory (1678) was the practical part. In theology Baxter was as independent as he was in church polity. Characteristically he was an eclectic. He held to Calvinism, but not in its extreme form. He sought to find a common resting-place for Calvinist and Arminian, Episcopalian and Presbyterian, Protestant and Romanist,—a platform upon which they could all stand. He taught that all who from their hearts confessed that Christ was Lord belonged to the true catholic Church, which is composed of the believers in every Christian denomination. It is difficult, as Orme confesses, to get a clear notion of what he really believes, because his works contain few definitions, and are, besides, so diffuse. But, speaking generally, he taught, that common grace was given to all, which, however, needed special grace to render it effectual to salvation; that election and reprobation are not equally to be ascribed to God, who elects, but is not chargeable with the sin which causes the reprobation; that Christ died for all, therefore the widest invitation can be given, but not equally for all. He taught the Calvinistic theology upon the perseverance of the saints and the will. Those who sympathized with him have been called Baxterians.

LIT.—His numerous controversial and theological writings have never been reprinted, and are now very scarce. His Practical Works have been published in 23 vols., edited by Rev. William Orme, London, 1830. Another edition appeared in 4 vols., London, 1854. Select Practical Writings, with a life of the author, by Leonard Bacon, 2 vols., New Haven, 1844. The best source of information about Baxter is his autobiography down to 1684, which was published by Matthew Sylvester in 1696 under the title Reliquiae Baxterianae; or, Mr. Richard Baxter's Narrative of the Most Memorable Passages of his Life and Times. The Rev. Dr. Edmund Calamy, who was Matthew Sylvester's assistant at Blackfriars, issued an abridgment of it in 1702, and continued his life down to his death, and added as a second volume an account of other ejected ministers. In the second edition (1713) of his Continuation of the account, he refutes a number of accusations made against Baxter. Neander wrote a sketch entitled Richard Baxter, ein Mann der wahrhaft rechten Mitte, welche das Evangelium allein zu offenbaren u. zu verleihen vermag., Berlin, 1833; V. GERLACH: Richard Baxter nach seinem Leben u. Wirken, Berlin, 1836. A Life is prefixed to the complete edition of The Saints' Everlasting Rest, N. Y., 1855. BAYLE, Pierre, b. Nov. 18, 1647, at Carlat, in the department of Ariège, France; d. Dec. 28, 1706; belonged to a Protestant family, but was converted to Romanism while studying at the Jesuit college in Toulouse, 1669. His Romanism lasted only seventeen months, however. He abjured, and fled to Switzerland, where he lived several years at Geneva as a private tutor. He afterwards removed to Rouen, thence to Paris, and was in 1675 appointed professor of philosophy in the Academy of Sedan. When the academy was suppressed by royal order in 1681, he received a chair in philosophy in Rotterdam; but from this position he was discharged in 1693, after which time he lived as a private citizen, engaged in literary occupation. It was Jurieu who procured his first appointment in Sedan, and it was also Jurieu who procured his final dismissal in Rotterdam. His Letters sur les Comètes, 1682, ridiculing the superstition which the court of 1680 had called forth, but also touching, though very cautiously, on the belief in miracles, was the first cause of irritation between them. Shortly after, followed Critique Générale de l'Histoire du Calvinisme, par M. Mambourg, which Jurieu attacked. But the cause of the final breach and of Bayle's dismissal was a pamphlet, Avis Important aux Réfugiés, 1690, which Jurieu ascribed to Bayle, but which Bayle denied to have written. In 1695 appeared the first volume of his Dictionnaire Critique, which has exercised considerable influence on European civilization, and is still a book of living value, famous for its curious learning, marred by its skepticism; 4th ed., Amsterdam, 1720, 4 vols. folio; best ed., Paris, 1820-24, 16 vols. 8vo. Also his Nouvelles de la Républiques des Lettres, which he founded in 1684, and continued to 1687, was an important phenomenon in the literary life of the time.

LIT. — His Œuvres Diverses, 4 vols. folio, were edited by DES MAIZEAUX, The Hague, 1727-31; his letters, 3 vols., appeared at Rotterdam, 1714; his life was written by LA MONNOYE, Amsterdam, 1716, and by L. FEUERBACH, Augsburg, 1838. His dictionary has been translated into English; best ed., London, 1734-37, 5 vols. folio.

BAYLEY, James Roosevelt, D.D., Roman-Catholic Archbishop of Baltimore, U.S.A.; b. in New-York City, Aug. 23, 1814; d. in Baltimore, Oct. 3, 1877. His aunt, Mother Seton, was the founder of the order of Sisters of Charity in America; but he was originally a Protestant, a graduate of Trinity College, Hartford, Conn., and for a time an Episcopal minister. After his change, he studied theology in Paris and Rome, and was ordained a priest in 1842. Returning to America, he was professor of belles-lettres in St. John's College, Fordham, and then its president for one year (1845-46). In 1853 the bishopric of Newark, N.J., was conferred upon him, and in 1872 the high dignity of Archbishop of Baltimore, and Primate of America.

BAYLY, Lewis, Bishop of Bangor in Wales; b. at Caermarthen, about 1565; educated at Oxford; became minister of Evesham in Worcestershire in 1611; consecrated as bishop in 1616; d. 1632. He will always be remembered as the author of The Practice of Piety, directing a Christian how to walk that he may please God, one of the most popular religious works ever written. It reached its fifty-first edition in 1714. It is also noteworthy as one of the two volumes which constituted the dowry of Bunyan's wife, the other being Arthur Dent's Plain Man's Pathway to Heaven.

BDELL'UM is a transparent, powerfully and pleasantly odoriferous, wax-like resin, from a sort of palm which was native to Arabia, India, Media, Babylonia, and Bactriana. This explanation of a debated word is more satisfactory than that favored by many rabbins, and even by Gesenius, — pearl. The word "bdellium" occurs only twice in the Bible, — once as a product of the land of Havilah (Gen. ii. 12), and again as a description of the appearance of manna (Num. xi. 7). It must, therefore, have been familiar to the Jews; but it is questionable whether pearls were. It is likely, therefore, to have been a gummy-resinous substance; and the circumstance that maldelon, one of the names for bdellium, which surely is such a substance, is linguistically one with bedolah (bdellium), is a strong proof of the correctness of the interpretation. Lassen (Ind. Althumskunde) considers it moscus, others crystal, or beryl. See SPRENGER: Die alte Geogr. Arab. § 59. RÜRTSCHI.

BEARD, The. The Jews, like the present Orientals, were proud of their beards; therefore they let them grow; while the Egyptians cut them off, but on high festival days wore false beards, — private individuals, a beard scarcely two inches long; a king, one of considerable length, square at the bottom. The figures of gods were distinguished by their beards turning up at the end. The Jews also retained the hair on the sides of the face between the ear and the eye, and this had a religious meaning (Jer. ix. 26, xxv. 23, xlix. 32). In these verses "utmost corners" should be shaven cheeks. Incidental mention of barbers is made in Ezek. v. 1. It was an unbearable insult for any one to cut off or mutilate another's beard (2 Sam. x. 4 sq.; Isa. vii. 20); but in times of deep sorrow the beard and the hair of the head were plucked out (Ez. ix. 3; Isa. xv. 2, l. 6; Jer. xli. 5), or allowed to be unkempt (2 Sam. xix. 24), or covered, like the lepers', in sign one must not speak (Ezek. xxiv. 17, 22).

The practice of the Christian clergy in ancient times in respect of wearing beards was in conformity with the general custom. Long hair and baldness by shaving being alike in ill repute as unseemly peculiarities, the clergy were required to observe a becoming moderation between either extreme. In the later Roman Church, the clergy always shave the beard, and often the head, at least in part. See particularly the interesting article on Beards in Encycl. Brit., Vol. III., and books upon Eastern customs.

BEARD, Richard, D.D., an eminent divine of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church; b. in Sumner County, Tenn., Nov. 27, 1799; d. at Lebanon, Tenn., Nov. 6, 1880. He was licensed, and began preaching in 1820. After several years, he became a professor, first in Cumberland College, Princeton, Ky., and then in Sharon College, Sharon, Miss. From 1842 to 1854 he was president of Cumberland College; but, when the Cumberland Presbyterian Church established a chair of systematic theology in Cumberland University at Lebanon, Tenn., 1854, he was so evidently the man for the position, that it came naturally to him. He was repeatedly made moderator of the General Assembly. The position he occupied in the esteem of his brethren was the best proof of his exalted character. Besides numerous and valuable contributions to the periodical literature of his church, he issued two works of permanent importance, — his Lectures on Theology, Nashville, 1870, 3 vols.; and Why am I a Cumberland Presbyterian? Nashville, 1874.

BEATIFIC VISION, or the direct and unhindered vision of God. It is part of the reserved blessedness of the redeemed (1 Cor. xiii. 12; 1 John iii. 2; Rev. xxii. 3, 4). Our conception of its nature must necessarily be very vague, but our belief in its existence is founded upon Scripture and reason. The only question concerns its time. This has been much disputed. The Greek Church and many Protestants, especially Lutherans and Calvinists, put the vision after the judgment day. So Dr. Hodge, Systematic Theology, vol. iii., p. 860. But the Council of Florence (1439) condemned this view in the following words: "We determine that the souls of those who have remained pure and spotless after baptism, and of those whose sins after baptism have been pardoned, either in this life or the next, are immediately received into heaven, and behold plainly the Triune God as he is." To the same intent speaks the Constitution of Benedict XII. (1334-42) in the previous century. So the Council of Trent, in the decree concerning the "Invocation, Veneration, and Relics of Saints," speaks of the saints as enjoying "eternal happiness" in heaven (Sess. xxiv. Dec. 3, 1563. See Schaff's Creeeds, vol. ii., p. 200). It is, however, reasonable to suppose that this glorious sight, this wondrous knowledge, is first revealed in heaven, and that only intimations of it are known in the intermediate state. Of it Dr. Hodge says, "The incomprehensible blessedness of heaven shall arise from the vision of God. The vision is beatific. It beatifies: it transforms the soul into the divine image, transfusing into it the divine life, so that it is filled with the fulness of God. This vision of God is in the face of Jesus Christ, in whom dwells the plenitude of the divine glory bodily. God is seen in fashion as a man, and it is this manifestation of God in the person of Christ that is inconceivably and intolerably ravishing" (Systematic Theology, as above). The question of Bernard of Cluny is asked again:—

"Say, O dear country of my heart! shall these thy joys be mine?
Shall I, in that my precious home, behold the light divine?
God's o'erflowing gift obtain?—
Or is my hope, my faith, in vain?"

BEATIFICATION, a lower degree of, and a preliminary step to, canonization, declaring a person blessed after death, though not deciding whether he is a saint or not, and granting to him certain religious honors short of worship. Originally beatification was a simple episcopal prerogative, and the ceremony could be performed in any church; but Urban VIII. reserved the right for the papal see, and Alexander VII. forbade the ceremony to be performed in any other place but the basilica of the Vatican. See CANONIZATION.

BEATON, David, b. in 1494; a younger son of John Beaton of Balfour, in the county of Fife; d. at St. Andrews, May 29, 1546; was educated at the universities of St. Andrews and Glasgow; studied canon law in Paris, and was made Abbot of Arbroath in 1523, lord privy seal in 1528, Bishop of St. Andrews in 1537, cardinal in 1538, Chancellor of Scotland, and legate a latere, in 1543. In the political contest between the French and English party, he sided with the former, and fought with energy and courage for the independence of Scotland against the plans of Henry VIII. In the religious contest between the Romanists and the Reformers, he took as decidedly the part of the hierarchy, and did not scruple to use intrigue and force when argument and persuasion failed. The persecution of George Wishart is an instance: he was seized, imprisoned in the Castle of St. Andrews, tried in the cathedral before the cardinal and a court of priests, sentenced to death, and burnt, without the aid of the civil power. But a nemesis soon overtook the cardinal. A conspiracy was formed against him by a number of the Reform party, and he was murdered one morning in his bed-chamber. See CHARLES ROGERS: Life of George Wishart, Edinburgh, 1876.

BEATTIE, James, b. at Laurencekirk, Scotland, Oct. 25, 1735; d. at Aberdeen, Aug. 18, 1803; studied at Marishal College, Aberdeen, and became professor of philosophy at that institution in 1760. He wrote an Essay on Truth against Hume, which was very successful (1770); also Dissertations Moral and Critical (1783); Evidences of the Christian Religion (1786), etc.; and some poetry, especially The Minstrel (1774), a poem of much merit, by which he is best known. His life was written by Sir William Forbes, 3 vols., 1807.

BEAUSOBRE, Isaac de, b. at Niort, in the department of Deux-Sèvres, France, March 8, 1659; d. in Berlin, June 6, 1738; descended from a Protestant family; studied theology at Saumur; was made pastor at Châtillon-sur-Indre in 1683; fled to Holland in 1685; became chaplain to the Princess of Anhalt in 1686, and pastor of the French congregation in Berlin in 1695. Together with Lenfant he gave a French translation of the New Testament, which appeared at Amsterdam, 1718. He also wrote Histoire de Manichée et du manichéisme, 2 vols., Amsterdam, 1734; Histoire de la Réformation, 4 vols., 1785-86, and other works.

BEBENBURG, Lupold, d. 1363 as Bishop of Bamberg; descended from a noble Frankish family; studied canon law at Bologna, and placed himself, in the controversy between Ludwig the Bavarian and the Pope, on the side of the former. His De Juribus Regni et Imperii Romanorum, first printed at Strassburg (1508), edited by Jakob Wimpfeling, is remarkable, also, on account of its method,—discussing the subject by means of historical facts rather than abstract ideas and Aristotelian politics.

BEC, Abbey of, situated in the diocese of Rouen, was founded in 1040 by St. Herluin, and became, while Lanfranc and Anselm were teachers in its school, one of the most famous centres of learning. Among its pupils were Pope Alexander II., Guitmond, Yves de Chartres, Gilbert and Miles Crespin (who wrote the lives of its first abbots), and Robert de Thoringy, who commenced its chronicle, which was afterwards continued by anonymous writers. About 1100 the abbey was exempted from the episcopal authority.

BECAN, Martin, b. in Flanders, 1550; d. in Vienna, April 23, 1624; entered the Society of Jesus; taught philosophy and theology in the colleges of his order; became confessor to the emperor, Ferdinand II., and distinguished himself by the fury with which he labored against the Reformation. In his Controversia Anglicana de Potestate Regis et Pontificis, Mentz, 1612, he defended the morality of assassinating a heretic king, and in his Questiones de Fide Hæreticis Servanda, Mentz, 1609, he declared that no promise or oath given to a heretic was binding. Rome condemned the former proposition, but not the latter.

BECK, Johann Tobias, b. at Balingen in Württemberg, Feb. 22, 1804; d. at Tübingen, Dec. 28, 1878. The facts of his outward life are few: he studied at Tübingen from 1822 to 1826; left the university to become pastor of Waldtheim; in 1829 he rose to be "Stadt-Pfarrer" (city pastor) of Mergentheim; but in 1836 he left the pastorate, and entered the professorate, first as professor extraordinary at Basel, and then as professor ordinary at Tübingen from 1843 till his death. Baur and he were for many years fellow professors, but they belonged to different schools; and in more senses than one, Beck lived after Baur died; for, in opposition to Baur, he led his pupils into the study of the Bible upon simple, positive principles. He had little respect for the learned but sceptical and really shallow theories of the higher critics. The very titles of his books show how intense was his ardor for positive Bible-Christianity. He was the best modern representative of the Wurtemberg School of Bengel and Oetinger. By plain, homely ways, by a kind heart, and manly independence, he won respect, confidence, and affection. He wrote, Einleitung in das System der christlichen Lehre, Stuttgart 1838, 2d ed. 1870; Die Geburt des christlichen Lebens, Basel, 1839; Die christliche Lehrwissenschaft nach der biblischen Urkunden, Bnd. I., Stuttgart, 1841; Die christliche Menschenliebe (continuation of the Geburt d. christ. Lebens), Basel, 1842; Umriss der biblischen Seelenlehre, Stuttgart, 1843, 3d ed., 1877; English Translation, Outlines of Biblical Psychology, Edinburgh, 1877; Christliche Reden, Stuttgart, 1834-70 (6 Sammlungen); Leitfaden der christlichen Glaubenslehre, 2d ed., Stuttgart, 1869; Christliche Liebeslehre, Stuttgart, 1872; Erklärung der zwei Briefe Pauli an Timotheus, ed. by J. Lindenmeyer, Gütersloh, 1879.

BECKET, Thomas, Archbishop of Canterbury; b. in London, Dec. 21, 1118; d. in Canterbury, Dec. 29, 1170. The writing of his name A Becket, as if he were of noble birth, is inaccurate, and now discarded.

Life.—His father, Gilbert Becket, was from Rouen; his mother, Roesa or Matilda, from Caen. But, though thus Norman in parentage, he was a thorough Englishman, full of national and local patriotism. His father, a baron of the city of London, gave his son an excellent education, with the canons of Merton Abbey, in London schools, and afterwards in Paris. There is no proof that he ever went to Oxford. His father's friend, Richer of Laigle, — one of the great barons of England, — took an interest in the boy; and, in his castle of Pevensey, Becket was introduced to the sports of hunting and hawking, in which he became such a proficient. On his return from Paris, he was employed under the sheriffs of London, and so made acquainted with political business. But preferment was to be expected in the case of so brilliant a scholar; and when common friends from the other side of the Channel had recommended him to the notice of Theobald, Archbishop of Canterbury, who, however, was probably already acquainted with Becket's father, he was immediately taken into his service (1142), sent to Bologna and Auxerre to study civil and canon law, and quickly made archdeacon of the see, and Provost of Beverley. While in this double capacity, Becket showed his loyalty to the Church, and his political tact, by cleverly solving the difficulty connected with the succession to the crown of England. Securing it to Henry, while not sacrificing papal interests, he made two secret journeys to Rome, and thwarted an effort to win over the Pope to the side of Eustace, the son of Stephen. When Henry II. came to the throne, he made Becket his chancellor (1155), on the recommendation of Theobald; and the ecclesiastic was immediately forgotten in the statesman. The key to the mystery of Becket's character, his apparent fickleness, is his complete devotion to the office he held, involving a constant study how best to magnify it. Accordingly, when a chancellor, he served his king with the utmost fidelity. He surrounded himself with the outward state befitting so exalted a station, because he had the wit to see that it would give him the more power. While chancellor, he headed the chivalry of England in the war of Toulouse, and there certainly acted little like an ecclesiastic; for he joined in their bloody work. But to him belongs the chief credit of bringing England back from utter lawlessness to as strict an administration of the law as the state of England in the twelfth century allowed. Sufficient emphasis has not been laid upon this fact. He was one of the greatest chancellors England ever had. It was an evil day for him and for his fame when he accepted the Archbishopric of Canterbury. He left an office he was fitted for, for one he was not; and he was, alas! one of those men who show their strong side in prosperity, and their weak in adversity. But being elected in 1162, by the Chapter of Canterbury, on the King's command, archbishop, he gave up his pomp and worldliness, and began at once a life of austerities, and at the same time appeared as the champion of the Church against the State; so that he contended with Henry, his patron and friend. Yet this was not fickleness, but principle: he was loyal to his master. Once it was the King, now it was the Pope: once it was the State, now it was the Church. But because Becket was really an arrogant churchman, and opposed to popular progress, his career from our standpoint is discreditable. He fought against the Constitutions of Clarendon, Jan. 25, 1164, which subjected clerks (clergy) guilty of crime to the ordinary civil tribunals, put ecclesiastical dignities at the royal disposal, prevented all appeals to Rome, and made Henry the virtual head of the Church. To these, however, under pressure, he set his seal; but as he had been led to suppose the King would have been satisfied with a merely verbal assent, — a very different thing in the morality of his age, — when compelled to affix his seal, he felt himself entrapped, and guilty of a great sin. The Pope absolved him, and he proceeded to anathematize the Constitutions with energy. In so doing he had great popular sympathy. To be sure, the Constitutions were not novelties; yet they appeared so in the novel form of statutes. They were really most beneficent, helpful in raising England out of barbarism into civilization; and Henry was right in urging them. But, as they undoubtedly detracted from the papal and ecclesiastical power, Becket from his stand-point was also right. The battle thereafter waged incessantly between king and prelate, disastrously for the latter. An assembly of the people was held at Northampton. Becket was cited to appear before it to answer the suit of John the Marshal, who had charged him with injustice, and had the case removed from the archbishop's to the king's court. Thus to himself the Clarendon Constitutions, which sanctioned such proceedings, were applied; but it surely was unworthy of the king, after having gotten him in his power on one pretext, to raise a charge of malfeasance in office so long a time after his connection with the chancellorship had ceased. This was a mean trick. Becket denied the authority of the council over him, appealed to the Pope, refused to make any explanation, fled in disguise, and after hiding in England, at last, with two companions, crossed the Channel from Sandwich to Gravelines, Nov. 2, 1164. He hastened to Sens, where the Pope (Alexander III.) then was, whither, also, the King's legates were bending their steps. The Pope favored, Louis VII. of France kindly received him, and he retired to the Cistercian monastery of Contigny, where he passed the next two years. The Pope acted cautiously in the matter, because Henry had shown a disposition to favor the anti-pope, Pascal III. But, when the Archbishop of York officiated at the coronation of Henry's son without the Pope's permission, the latter took decided measures, and threatened excommunication if the King did not make peace with Becket. This he did July 22, 1170, at Freteval in Vendome. The first act of the reinstated archbishop was to excommunicate all his enemies, — the Archbishop of York, and the bishops who had taken part in the coronation, or who favored the Clarendon Constitutions. Becket returned to England, and was warmly received. His friends were many. The excommunicated prelates fled to Normandy, where Henry was: their arrival created a great sensation. The King is said to have exclaimed, "By God's eyes! if all are excommunicated who were concerned in the coronation, I am excommunicated also. Is this varlet that I loaded with kindness, that came first to court to me on a lame mule, to insult me and my children, and to take my crown from me? What cowards have I about me, that no one will deliver me from this low-born priest!" Four of Henry's knights — Reginald Fitzurse, Hugh de Morville, William de Tracy, and Richard de Breton — really or affectedly understood the King's words literally; and, making a hasty journey to Canterbury, they murdered him coolly, brutally, in Canterbury Cathedral. Becket made no attempt at resistance: indeed, he courted martyrdom.

Death and Consequences. — The murder of Becket has been considered merely a deserved fate, a piece of rude yet even-handed justice; and by others a veritable martyrdom. But Becket was far from being a saint. He was abusive in his speech, haughty in his manner, arrogant in his claims: yet, however deeply he had insulted his sovereign, he was no traitor; and, because this was the ostensible ground for the murder, the act was foul, cowardly, only excusable from the turbulence of the time. — On the very night of the murder, the miracles which made the shrine of Thomas Becket so famous began. People from all parts of England made pilgrimages to his tomb: one such is immortalized in Chaucer's Canterbury Tales. He was called "saint" long before he was formally canonized, which was two years afterwards. The news of the murder greatly affected Henry, and he took rigorous and indeed humiliating measures to remove the popular impression that he was directly responsible for it. One of the most remarkable scenes in history was enacted in Canterbury Cathedral when Henry II. of England, dressed in a hair shirt, laid his head upon Thomas's tomb, and was whipped by the monks and clergy present. But he stooped to conquer. He was a more powerful king after this penance.

Character. — Thomas Becket is a fine study. He came at a time when the country was ripe for progress; and, while chancellor, he hastened the good work; but in his later years he tried to stem the tide. The interest of his life for most persons begins when he leaves the pomp of the chancellor for the asceticism of the archbishop. It was of deliberate purpose that he entered into opposition to the King. He dreamed of showing a devotion to the Catholic Church equal to that of his great predecessor Anselm; but alas! he had not the same genius, self-control, and tact. Anselm and Henry I. contended for supremacy, but the friendship between them was not broken. Becket contended so hotly, that he was in open feud with his sovereign. Becket was the first Ultramontane of his day, bent upon the upholding of papal privileges, more eager than the Pope about them. Curiously enough, he disappointed his two patrons, Theobald (because as chancellor he seemed to forget the Church), and Henry (because as archbishop he seemed to forget the State). Yet, in serving these two causes so faithfully, he was not inconsistent with that guiding principle already mentioned, — to be faithful to his master. But this principle surely led to great changes of outward conduct, and hence to insinuations of hypocrisy. Unfortunately, the archiepiscopal throne was not fitted to him; and hence he discharged its duties in a strained fashion, like a man who conscientiously is acting conscientiously a part. It is also important, in weighing his character as archbishop, to bear in mind that Thomas died for the rights of his own church, — for the right of the Archbishop of Canterbury, and none other, to crown the King of England, but that the struggle began upon quite a different point, viz., the question of the exemption of the clergy from temporal jurisdiction.

LIT. — Original sources, the letters and contemporary biographies of Becket are printed in Materials for the History of Thomas Becket, Archbishop of Canterbury, edited by JAMES CRAIGIE ROBERTSON, Canon of Canterbury; published, under the direction of the Master of the Rolls, 1875 sqq., 5th vol. 1881. This publication supersedes the ill-arranged collection of Dr. J. A. GILES in 8 vols., Oxford, 1845-46.

BEDE, or Baeda, The Venerable (Beda Venerabilis), b. 674; d. May 26, 735; was from his seventh year educated in the Monastery of Wearmouth; moved afterwards to that of Jarrow, where he was ordained deacon in his nineteenth, and presbyter in his thirtieth, year, and remained there for the rest of his life, dividing his time between devotional exercises and studies, teaching, and writing. What we know of his life we owe to notices scattered throughout his own works, especially Hist. Eccl., V. 24, and to a letter on his death by one of his pupils, Cuthbert. What the later vite contain is nothing but worthless fancies. See GEHLE: Disputatio de Ven. Bed., Leyden, 1838; K. WERNER: Beda d. Ehrwürdige, Vienna, 1875; and the prefaces and introductions to the editions of Bede's works by Stevenson and Giles. A popular account is given in the series, Fathers for English Readers, by G. F. Browne, London, n. d.

The works of Bede range over the whole field of knowledge occupied at his time, — exegesis, grammar, metrics, physics, astronomy, chronology, history, and biography. At the end of his Hist. Eccl. he gives himself a list of his works; but much has become lost, much has been replaced by spurious matter, and much is still left in manuscript. The earlier editions of his collected works — Paris, 1544; Basle, 1563; Cologne, 1612 — are completely uncritical; and even the latest, by Giles, London, 1843 (12 vols. 8vo), and in Patrol. Cursus, Paris, 1850 (xc-xcv), are unsatisfactory. Of the historical works, however, good editions have been given by Smith (1722) and Stevenson (1838). On their time all these works exercised a great influence. They were copied over and over again: they were found in every library of Europe. Bede, the humble monk, living in seclusion in a small English cloister, was indeed the teacher of the whole civilized world.

That group of Bede's works which has the least interest comprises his poems, of which the Liber Epigrammatum is lost, and the Liber Hymnorum spurious, so that the Vita Cudberti and a few minor poems are the only specimens left; his books De Orthographia, De Metrica Arte, in which he attempts to prove the superiority of the metaphorical language of the Bible over that of the Greeks; and De Natura Rerum, a compendium of astronomy and geography, establishing a reconciliation of the cosmogony of the Bible with that of the classical mythology. Much more interest has the second group, the exegetical; though, of the twenty-five which Bede himself mentions, the commentaries on Isaiah, Daniel, the minor prophets, Ezra and Nehemiah, are lost; and those on the Kings, Job, Genesis, the Pentateuch, and the Acts, are spurious. In these commentaries the allegorical explanation has completely superseded the grammatica-historical, and one of the chief demands of the method is a full quotation of the views of the Fathers.

Those works which have contributed most to Bede's fame are his historical writings, more especially his Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Britonum. It was finished in 731, and gives the political and ecclesiastical history of England, from Julius Cæsar down to the date of its completion. The introduction, treating the period before the conversion of the Anglo-Saxons, is a mere compilation from Orosius, Gildas, Prosper Æquit., the Vita S. Germani, etc.; but the real body of the work, treating the period from 596 to 731, is an independent and conscientious study of documents and other historical sources, and has made Bede the father of ecclesiastical history in the English language. It was translated from Latin into Saxon by King Alfred. Another work, De Ratione Temporum, is a complete chronology, to which is added the De Ætibus Seculi Six, an outline of the world's history, inspired by Augustine (Sermo 259 in oct. pasch.). The martyrologies ascribed to Bede are probably spurious.

BEDELL, William, b. Sept. 29, 1571, at Black-Notley, Essex, Eng.; d. Feb. 7, 1642. He was a scholar, and afterwards a fellow of Emmanuel College, Cambridge. His first charge was at St. Edmund's-Bury, Suffolk; but after a year's service he went to Venice (1604) as chaplain to Sir Henry Wotton, where he made the acquaintance of Father Paolo Sarpi, who intrusted to his care the manuscript of his History of the Council of Trent. In 1612 he returned to St. Edmund's-Bury, and there married Mrs. Leah Maw, the widow of the recorder of the town, who "had five small children, and but a small estate." Afterwards, since "the very great (Bury) congregation found a great defect in his voice," he removed to Great Horningshearth, and in 1627 he was appointed "provost of the College of the Holy and Undivided Trinity, near Dublin, in Ireland." Here he was very efficient. Without his knowledge, he was made, in 1629, bishop of the united dioceses of Kilmore and Ardagh; but, consistently with his views on episcopal plurality, he gave up the latter see. His position was quite trying, owing to opposition; but among the people he enjoyed great esteem, and he reformed many abuses. He also had the Book of Common Prayer and the Bible translated into Irish. When the Irish rebellion of Oct. 23, 1641, broke out, his home was a refuge for the neighboring English; but he was kept there a sort of prisoner by the insurgents, until Christmas, when Edmund O'Reilly arrested him, and conveyed the whole family to Loughwater Castle, where, however, they were well treated. After the Christmas holidays, he was released, and went to live with the Rev. Dennis Sheridan, and there he died. He wrote a large treatise on the questions, "Where was our religion before Luther?" and, "What became of our ancestors who died in Popery?" His Life, with the Letters between Waddesworth and Bedell, was published by Bishop Burnet, London, 1685; by Dr. W. J. Monck Mason, London, 1843; also his Life, by his Son, edited by J. E. B. Mayor, Cambridge, 1871.

BEECHER, Lyman, b. at New Haven, Oct. 12, 1775; d. at Brooklyn, Jan. 10, 1863; was educated at Yale College; ordained pastor of East Hampton, L.I., in Sept. 5, 1799; removed in 1810 to Litchfield, Conn., and thence, in 1826, to Boston; was chosen president, and professor of theology of Lane Theological Seminary, Cincinnati, in 1832; returned in 1852 to Boston, and spent the last days of his life in Brooklyn. He was pre-eminent as a preacher for an uncommon union of imagination, fervor, and logic. At the same time he was a profound student of theology, of which he was professor for twenty years. Yet his results were never presented in scholastic and technical forms, but in the language of real life. He developed a theology to be preached for the conversion and sanctification of men, and for the regeneration of human society. His theological system is most fully developed in his Views of Theology, the Faith once delivered to the Saints, and his Reply to a Review of it, and in The Bible a Code of Laws. In the great theological and ecclesiastical controversy that shook New England, and divided the Presbyterian Church, he took a prominent part. [He was a man of originality and great force of character, foremost and fervid in denouncing duelling, intemperance, and every form of immorality. His Six Sermons on Intemperance exerted a world-wide influence. His ministry was eminently blessed to the conversion of souls, and has been continued by his children, of whom Edward, Charles, Henry Ward, Thomas K., Catharine, Harriet (Mrs. Stowe), have attained great prominence in their respective lines of work.] His Autobiography and Correspondence, edited by Charles Beecher, appeared in 2 vols., in New York, 1864-65, and his Works, in 3 vols., Boston, 1852.

BEE-CULTURE AMONG THE HEBREWS.

There are and have always been many wild bees in Palestine, which hive in crevices of rocks, old trees, and the like (Deut. xxxii. 13; Judg. xiv. 8; 1 Sam. xiv. 25 sqq.; cf. Herod. 5, 14). Because their sting is painful and dangerous, hostile armies are compared to them (Deut. i. 44; Ps. cxviii. 12; Isa. vii. 18; cf. Homer's Iliad, 2, 87 sqq.). There were also domestic bees, which were handled by the bee-keepers, and obeyed the customary hissing and whistling (cf. the Commentaries on Isa. v. 26; Zech. x. 8). According to Philo, some of the Essenes devoted themselves to bee-culture (Mang. ed., II. p. 633, Bohm's trans. vol. iv. p. 220); and this industry is also mentioned in the Talmud. Honey is frequently mentioned in the Bible as a favorite article of food (2 Sam. xvii. 29; Ps. xix. 11; Prov. xxiv. 13, xxv. 16 sqq.; Cant. v. 1; Ezek. xvi. 13; Luke xxiv. 42). "Flowing with milk and honey" was the phrase descriptive of a rich land (Exod. iii. 8; Isa. vii. 15; Jer. xi. 5; Ezek. xx. 6); also "a land of oil, olive, and honey" (Deut. viii. 8; 2 Kings xviii. 32). We find honey introduced in similes (Prov. v. 3, xviii. 24; Cant. iv. 11); and Deborah, which means "bee," was a favorite female name. דבש, d'vash, usually rendered "honey," occasionally means rather "debs;" i.e., the sirup made of boiled grape-must, and which is an important article of commerce in the East (Gen. xliii. 11; Ezek. xxvii. 17.) Honey might not be used in meat-offerings (Lev. ii. 11 sq.), not because bees were unclean, for a tithe of honey was on one occasion paid to the priests (2 Chron. xxxi. 5), but either because it so quickly soured, or else because it emitted an offensive odor when burnt. See LINGERKE: Canaan; [THOMSON: Land and Book; KITTO: Physical History of Palestine; ROBINSON: Later Biblical Researches, TRISTRAM: Land of Israel]. RÜETSCHI.

BEEL'ZEBUB (properly, in all the New-Testament passages,—Matt. x. 25, xii. 24, 27; Mark iii. 22; Luke xi. 15, 18, 19,—Beelzebub), the name of the prince of the demons; i.e., of Satan, and means "the Baal, master of the house." Our Lord, in Matt. x. 25, plays upon the word. But we are justified in tracing Beelzebub to the much older name Baal Zebub, which is found in the Old Testament as that of an idol.

1. Baal Zebub was honored in Ekron, where he had a temple and an oracle (2 Kings i. 3). The name means "lord of flies." In classical mythology, there was a god who protected from flies. It is related that Hercules banished the flies from Olympus by erecting a shrine to Zeus Apomuios (Averter of flies); and the Romans called Hercules Apomuios. A similar deity is mentioned in different places; the excuse for such worship being the plague flies cause in those warm countries.

The name "lord of flies" compels us to consider him the god of the sender of, as well as the protector from, flies; and, further, as Baal Zebub is identical with the sun-god, we may conjecture his name came from the fact that flies are most numerous in midsummer, when the sun is warmest. And that he had an oracle is to be explained by a substitution of effect for cause. Flies come obedient to certain atmospheric conditions; and so the god was considered to have caused these conditions, and so at length his control would be extended to other events, and accordingly he was consulted. See BAAL. [More probably because flies were believed, at all events by the Babylonians, to reveal the future. See Lenormant, La Divination, p. 95.]

2. Beelzebub was early identified with Baal Zebub; and, as was so often the case, turned into a bad demon, in accordance with the later Jewish ideas. Since Lightfoot (Horæ Heb. in loco), it has been common to say that the name of the demon Beelzebub was purposely made out of Beelzebub, in order to express contempt and horror; i.e., "lord of dung," instead of "lord of flies." But, inasmuch as such a name for Satan does not occur outside of the New Testament, it is better to seek its derivation in the old Ekronic worship, which might, in the New-Testament times, have still existed. Beelzebub may therefore be looked upon as precisely the same name as Beelzebub, except that the last syllable was softened, and therefore as having the same meaning. But why did such a god become the head of the demons? Because the fly is an unclean and annoying thing; and so the connection of Baal with the flies showed that he was in a sense the most unclean god, and therefore worthy of the greatest contempt. The rabbins, according to Selden, said, that, while flies came in clouds about the heathen sacrifices, they never approached the Hebrew. See Literature, under BAAL. WOLF BAUDISSIN.

BE'ER (well). 1. Name of a station of the Israelites upon the desert, to the north of Moab (Num. xxi. 16, 18); perhaps identical with Beer-elim, "the well of the heroes" (Isa. xv. 8). 2. The place in Judah to which Jotham fled from Abimelech (Judg. ix. 21).

BE'EROTH (the wells), one of the four Hivite cities to make a treaty with Joshua (Josh. ix. 17), now called el-Bireh; the first resting-place upon the route from Jerusalem to Nablûs, and therefore not unlikely, as tradition says, the place where Mary discovered that the child Jesus was not "in the company" (Luke ii. 44).

BE'ER-SHE'BA (well of seven or of the oath) was situated at the entrance of the desert, and at the extreme limit of the land of Judah; hence the expression "all Israel from Dan to Beer-sheba." It is named thirty-three times in the Bible, only in the Old Testament. It has been a centre of religious interest from the earliest times. There Abraham lived (Gen. xxi. 33): indeed, by his transaction with Abimelech (25-33) the name was given. From there went Abraham to sacrifice Isaac (xxii. 1, cf. 19). Isaac lived there (xxvii. 33). After the conquest it formed part of Judah. Elijah fled thither (1 Kings xix. 3). It was a seat of idolatrous worship (Amos v. 5, 8, 14). In the time of Eusebius and Jerome it was a large village or town fortified by the Romans. It was, in the middle ages, the seat of a bishopric attached to Jerusalem. It then faded out of notice, but in the fourteenth century was rediscovered, but as a ruin. To-day it bears the name Bir-el-Seba, interpreted by the Arabs, "the well of the lion," and has two large, fine wells, surrounded by troughs used for watering flocks and herds, — so patriarchal is the manner of life of the surrounding nomads.

BEGHARDS and BEGUINES. In the latter part of the twelfth century, associations of women were formed in several cities of the Netherlands, living together in a common house, and leading a pious life, under the superintendence of a magistra, and according to certain simple rules, but making no vows. Such women were called Beghinae or Beguitæ. The origin of these associations was owing to that tending towards a life of contemplation, seclusion, and self-sacrifice, which prevailed throughout the twelfth and thirteenth century; but no doubt the crusades also played a part, depriving many wives of their husbands, and preventing many virgins from marrying. The origin of the name is very doubtful, some deriving it from Lambert le Begue, a priest who lived at Liege about 1180, and is said to have been the founder of these associations; others, from an Alsatian word, beggar, "to beg;" others, again, from St. Begga, the daughter of Pepin of Lauden, and the supposed patron saint of the associations. The form Beguitæ was originally a nickname, probably derived from the term Bei Gott, much used by the members.

In the beginning of the thirteenth century similar associations of men were formed: one existed at Louvain, in 1220. The members of these associations were called Begini, or Beghardi. In 1300 such an association was formed at Antwerp, for the purpose of taking care of the poor, nursing the sick, and burying the dead. Its members were often called Alexians, after their patron saint Alexius; or Cellitæ, from cella, "a grave." The people also called them Lollards, from lollen "to sing" or "to pray."

As these associations came in connection with the mendicant orders, and their members began to wander through the countries begging, heresies crept in; and from the middle of the thirteenth, and more especially in the fourteenth century, the name Beghard became synonymous with heretic; in Germany, with the "Brethren of the Free Spirit;" in France and Italy, with the "Fratricelli." Popes and bishops persecuted them. In France and the regions along the Rhine they were often burnt. At the Council of Vienna (1311) Clement V. issued two bulls suppressing both the Beghards and the Beguines. John XXII., however, confined the effect of the bulls to the heretical members of the associations: the Beguines he protected, both in the Netherlands and in Italy. Nevertheless, in the fifteenth century, the associations came into ill repute everywhere, on account of the frivolous lives their members led; and their numbers decreased. At present there are only a few beguinagie left in Belgium, and they are nearly empty.

BEKKER, Balthasar, b. in West Friesland, March 30, 1634; d. there June 11, 1698; was pastor at Franeker, and afterwards, since 1679, in Amsterdam, but was dismissed 1692. Already his De vaste Spysen der Volmaakten ("Strong Food for the Perfect"), 1676, gave offence, and roused a suspicion of Socinianism. In 1680 followed Ondersoek van de Betekenige der Kometen, ridiculing the superstitious fears which the comet of that year called forth, and made a still greater sensation and greater scandal. But finally his Die betoverde Weereld (1691), in which he denied the existence of sorcery, magic, possessions by the Devil, and of the Devil himself, caused the consistory of Amsterdam to institute a formal process against him, and he was deposed.

BELGIC CONFESSION, The, was written in French in 1561 by Guido de Brès (1540-67), aided by Adrien de Saravia (professor of theology in Leyden, afterwards in Cambridge, where he died 1613), II. Modetus (for some time chaplain of William of Orange), and G. Wingen. It was revised by Francis Junius of Bourges (1545-1602), a student of Calvin's, pastor of a Walloon congregation at Antwerp, and afterwards professor of theology at Leyden, who abridged the sixteenth article, and sent a copy to Geneva and other churches for approval. It was probably printed in 1562, or at all events in 1566, and afterwards translated into Dutch, German, and Latin. It was presented to Philip II. in 1562, with the vain hope of securing toleration. It was formally adopted by synods at Antwerp (1566), Wesel (1568), Emden (1571), Dort (1574), Middleburg (1581), again by the great synod of Dort, April 29, 1619. But inasmuch as the Arminians had demanded partial changes, and the text had become corrupt, the synod of Dort submitted the French, Latin, and Dutch texts to a careful revision. Since that time the Belgic Confession, together with the Heidelberg Catechism, has been the recognized symbol of the Reformed Churches in Holland and Belgium, and of the Reformed (Dutch) Church in America.

The Belgic Confession contains thirty-seven articles, and follows the order of the Gallican Confession, but is less polemical and full and elaborate, especially on the Trinity, the Incarnation, the Church, and the Sacraments. It is, upon the whole, the best symbolical statement of the Calvinistic system of doctrine, with the exception of the Westminster Confession.

The French text must be considered as the original. Of the first edition of 1561 or 1562 no copies are known. The synod of Antwerp, in September, 1580, ordered a precise parchment copy of the revised text of Junius to be made for its archives, which copy had to be signed by every new minister. This manuscript has always been regarded in the Belgic churches as the authentic document. The first Latin translation was made from Junius' text by Beza, or under his direction, for the Harmonia Confessionum, Geneva, 1581. The same passed into the first edition of the Corpus et Syntagma Confessionum, Geneva, 1612. A second Latin translation was prepared by Festus Hommius for the synod of Dort, 1618, revised and approved 1619; and from it was made the excellent English translation in use in the Reformed (Dutch) Church in America. It appeared in Greek 1623, 1653, and 1660, at Utrecht.

BELGIUM. The introduction of Christianity in those territories which in 1830 were formed into the kingdom of Belgium, is obscure: at the time of Constantine, however, several episcopal sees had been established here. The salient points in the history of the Belgic Church before the Reformation are: the brilliant part which the Belgic knights played in the first crusades; the rise of such sects as the Beghards and Beguines, the Lollards, and the Fratres Communis Vitæ, Brethren of the Common Life (see titles); and the appearance of Ruysbroeck and Erasmus. The first trace of an open sympathy with Luther was found in an Augustine monastery in Antwerp, whose prior, Jacob Spreng, was carried a prisoner to Brussels in 1521, and compelled to retract. In 1522 the whole monastery was broken up; and in 1523 two of its monks, Henri Voes and Jean Esch, were burnt in Brussels. But in spite of very harsh edicts, — Worms, 1521, Malines, 1526, Brussels, 1529, 1531, etc., — preventing the introduction and sale of Protestant writings, pursuing and punishing Protestant preachers, etc., the Reformation spread, especially among the lower and middle classes. Marguerite of Savoy was not a fanatic, and Maria of Hungary was even suspected of favoring the movement. The excesses, however, of the Anabaptists, and the extravagances of the Brethren of the Free Spirit, hurt the Protestant cause even in the eyes of its friends, and justified the government in applying more effective means of resistance. By an ordinance of April 20, 1550, Charles V. introduced the Spanish Inquisition in the provinces; and, although the opposition was so unanimous and decided that the name of the institution had to be altered, the institution itself was actually established and put in operation by Philip II. Nevertheless, the Belgic Confession (see title) was published in 1562, sent to Philip II. in 1563, and accepted by the synod of Antwerp 1566. In 1567 the Duke of Alva arrived, and the immediate result was absolute suppression on the one side, open rebellion on the other. Alva's successor, however, Alexander of Parma, succeeded by the treaty of Arras (May 17, 1579) in separating the southern provinces from the northern, and in reconciling them with Spain; and from this moment Belgium became the scene of a most violent Roman-Catholic re-action. When Joseph II. published his edict of toleration, Oct. 13, 1781, the whole people arose, inflamed by the Jesuits and the priests, and a revolution was about to break out again, but this time against, and not for, religious freedom. Again, in 1815, when the southern and northern provinces had been united into one kingdom, the Roman Catholics of Belgium, fearing the contact with Protestant Holland, used every kind of intrigue, from the most insidious seductions in the royal cabinets, to the grossest play upon popular passions in the streets, in order to bring about a separation. In 1830 they succeeded.

According to the census of 1846, the last which paid any regard to the difference of confession, there were, out of 4,337,196 inhabitants, only 10,323 non-catholics. Since that time, the population has increased to 5,403,006; but the proportion between the various confessions has not changed. There are hardly more than 10,000 Protestants and 1,000 Jews in the country. At the head of the Roman-Catholic Church stands the Archbishop of Malines, and by his side five bishops, — of Liège, Namur, Tournay, Ghent, and Bruges. But the archbishop is only an administrative centre. The bishops stand immediately under the Pope, and their power is very great. They have the right of all ecclesiastical appointments in their dioceses, and all officials are ad nutum amavibiles. The church has six theological seminaries and a theological faculty in the University of Louvain: in the three other universities — Ghent, Liège, and Brussels — there are no theological faculties. The Protestants are organized into ten congregations, with fourteen ministers, and governed by a synod, which assembles every year. According to the constitution of 1830, the Church is wholly independent of the State. Every denomination has the right of public worship, but education has been until lately completely controlled by the Roman-Catholic priests and the Jesuits. The emancipation of the school has for several years been the burning question of Belgian politics, the cause of cabinet crises, and riots in the streets; and the victory of the liberal party is by no means assured, although recently great strides have been taken in this direction.

BELIAL (worthlessness), correct form Beliar, is given once in the New Testament (2 Cor. vi. 15) as the name of Satan (the Peshito has "Satan"). But in the Old Testament, Belial never has this meaning: there it is an appellation, "worthlessness," "destructiveness," almost always in connection with a word setting forth the person or thing whose worthlessness or wickedness is spoken of; as, "man of Belial," most frequently, "son of Belial," "men of Belial," "daughter of Belial," further, "thoughts of Belial," etc.; and the adjunct is occasionally omitted, as in 2 Sam. xxiii. 6; Job xxxiv. 18; Nah. i. 15; when the word means the "bad," the "destroyer," the "wicked." The etymology of the word is bl'ee, "without," and yah-al, "profit," either from yah-al, "to get on in the world" (only in the Hiphil, "useful"), or, better, from alah, to "ascend: therefore it means, to be "worthless." Although thus originally not a proper name, but an appellation, in the later Jewish and Christian literature it passed over into a name for Satan, not as the "worthless," but as the "destroyer." BELKNAP, Jeremy, b. at Boston, June 4, 1744; d. there, June 20, 1798; was educated in Harvard College, and ordained pastor of the Congregational society of Dover, N.H., 1767, and removed in 1787 to Boston. He was one of the founders of the Massachusetts Historical Society, and wrote, beside a number of sermons and Dissertations upon the Character and Resurrection of Christ, 1795, a History of New Hampshire, 3 vols., 1784-92, and American Biography, 2 vols., 1794-98.

BELLAMY, Joseph, was born in New Cheshire, Conn., Feb. 20, 1719. He died at Bethlem [Bethlehem], Conn., March 6, 1790, in the seventy-second year of his age, and the fiftieth of his ministry in that place.

In his boyhood he was remarkable for his love of study, and his proficiency in it. When only sixteen years of age, he was graduated at Yale College. His religious zeal, his taste and temperament, were signs of his call to enter the ministerial office. In part he pursued his theological studies with Jonathan Edwards at Northampton, Mass. When he was about the age of eighteen years, he was approbated as a preacher by the New Haven Association; and on the 2d of April, 1740, soon after he had entered his twenty-first year, he was ordained as pastor of the church at Bethlem. Between 1740 and 1744 "the great awakening" was in progress throughout New England. Young Bellamy threw his whole soul into this work; itinerated as an evangelist among the churches; in two years preached four hundred and fifty-eight times in two hundred and thirteen places. Many thought him to be, on the whole, equal to Whitefield in his power over a thoughtful audience. The sources of his power lay in his majestic presence, his expressive voice, his vivid imagination, his deep and earnest feeling, his dramatic style of thought and speech, his logical as well as rhetorical skill, his clear apprehension of divine truth, his pungent appeals to the conscience of his hearers, his fervid and honest piety. The impression that he was domineering arose, in part, from his commanding manner. The impression that he was harsh and rough arose, in part, from the fact that he was frank and outspoken. He was a character, and the faults commonly ascribed to him were a natural result of his marked individuality. He struggled against them. In despite of them he retained a well-nigh unbounded influence over those who knew him. In ecclesiastical councils his words were prized as eminently judicious. His judgment was honored by such literary men as presidents Burr, Davies, Finley, Wheelock; such ministers as Rodgers, Blair, Brainerd, Davenport, Tennent. He and Hopkins and Edwards were united in a triumvirate. In 1754 he was called, not unanimously, to become the pastor of the first, then the only, Presbyterian church in New-York City. The Consociation refused to dismiss him. The call was afterwards renewed, and again declined.

He is said to have been the first American pastor who established a "school of the prophets" in his own house (Bibliotheca Sacra, vol. XXXVIII. pp. 372, 373). As a theological teacher he was noted for his skill in detecting sophistry, his thorough acquaintance with the distinctive principles of Calvinism, the pithy and sententious criticisms which he passed upon his pupils. Among these pupils were Dr. Jonathan Edwards, Dr. John Smalley, Dr. Samuel Spring of Newburyport, Dr. Ephraim Judson, Dr. Levi Hart, Dr. Joseph Eckley of the Old South Church, Boston. Upon men like these the depth and earnestness of his religious character made a profound impression. Pupils who were not candidates for the ministry were also sent to him. Among these was Aaron Burr, the future Vice-President of the United States, and the son of Bellamy's life-long friend Aaron Burr, president of Nassau Hall. The pupils who were committed to his care remembered him with gratitude for his wit, which was pregnant with wisdom. A volume of laconics might have been collected from his conversations with them.

The published writings of Bellamy fail to give an adequate idea of his eloquence in the pulpit. They develop, however, his keen insight into human nature, his skill in unravelling the intricacies of spurious religion, his fidelity to his conscience, his zeal for the purity of the Church. They are mainly devoted to the defence of Calvinism against Antinomianism on the one hand, and Arminianism on the other; also to the delineation of true piety as distinguished from fanaticism on the one hand, and latitudinarianism on the other. Some of his writings were reprinted in Great Britain, and received high commendation from such men as Andrew Fuller and John Ryland. Through the influence of Dr. John Erskine and the Earl of Buchan, two of Bellamy's warm admirers in Scotland, he received in 1768 the degree of Doctor of Divinity from the University of Aberdeen. Some of his writings have passed through several editions, and in 1811 were collected and republished in New York. The edition consists of three octavo volumes (pp. 540, 544, 546), and is prefaced by Dr. Noah Benedict's sermon, and an appendix to the same, delivered at the funeral of Bellamy. A highly emphatic recommendation is prefixed to the edition by Drs. Rodgers and Miller of New York, Dr. Trumbull of North Haven, Dr. Morse of Charlestown, Dr. Backus of Bethlehem, Dr. Wilson of Philadelphia, Dr. Griffin, and Professors Woods and Stuart of Andover, the Rev. Asahel Hooker of Goshen, Conn., and the Rev. James Richards of Newark. In 1850 another edition of Bellamy's collected works was published in Boston by the Doctrinal Tract and Book Society. It consists of two octavo volumes (pp. 613, 731), and is introduced with a memoir by Rev. Tryon Edwards, D.D. See also Sprague's Annals, vol. i.

EDWARDS A. PARK.

BELLARMINE, Robert Franz Romulus, b. at Montepulciano, Tuscany, Oct. 4, 1542; d. in Rome, Sept. 17, 1621; a nephew of Pope Marcellus II.; entered the Society of Jesus in 1560; went in 1569 to Louvain, where he studied under Bajus; returned in 1576 to Rome, and was made professor of controversial theology in the Collegium Romanum; became rector of this institution in 1592, cardinal in 1599, and Archbishop of Capua in 1602. His principal work, the result of his labor in the Collegium Romanum, is his Disputationes de Controversiis Christianæ Fidei, Rome, 1581-93. It occupies in the field of dogmatics the same place as the Annales of Baronius in the field of history; and, like that work, it is a fruit of those great exertions which the Roman Church made in the latter part of the sixteenth century to define and defend itself against the Reformation. Vol. I. treats of the word of God, of Christ, and of the Pope; vol. II., of councils and the church; vol. III., of the sacraments; and vol. IV., of grace and free-will, and justification by good works. But it was especially his views of the temporal power of the Pope which gave offence. This power, he considers, is indirect,—the Pope cannot depose a king in the same simple manner as he can a bishop,—but it is nevertheless absolute; and in a conflict between the Pope and a king, or a body of national laws, etc., the latter ought to give way. Several times he had occasion to apply these views to real life, developing and defending them. Against Paolo Sarpi, the spokesman of the senate of Venice in its controversy with Paul V., he wrote three tracts in Italian and Latin; against James I. of England he wrote two, ridiculing with elegant irony the Latin of the royal theologian; against William Barclay he wrote, Tractatus de Potestate Summi Pontificis in Rebus Temporalibus; but this book was forbidden in France, and caused great exasperation in the Gallican Church. Bellarmine's views have been revived, however, in the nineteenth century, by Pius IX., and seem at present to form the foundation for the papal policy.

Lit.—The best edition of Bellarmine's collected works is that of Cologne, 7 vols. fol., 1620. The Disputationes were reprinted at Rome, 1832-40, in 4 vols. 4to. His life was written by Jacob Fuligatti, Rome, 1624, Daniel Bartoli, Rome, 1677, and Nicole Frizon, Nancy, 1708; but the best source is his autobiography, printed 1761, at Ferrara, together with the votes of the cardinals in the case of his beatification. The book is extremely rare. The autobiography was produced by the Jesuits from Bellarmine's posthumous papers, as an argument in favor of his beatification. But the piece made just the opposite impression; and the Jesuits have, since that time, been very anxious to prevent its publication, and especially to destroy the above-mentioned volume. There is, however, a copy of it in the public library of Zürich.

II. THIERSCH.

BELLS are an invention of the Christian Church. They were unknown to the Jews and the Pagans, and they are not used by the Mohammedans. Small, globular, closed bells, tintinnabula, were used by the Hebrews (Exod. xxviii. 33), the Greeks, and the Romans, on clothes, in the baths, at sacrifices, etc.; but the invention of our church-bells is generally ascribed to Bishop Paulinus of Nola in Campania, who died in 431. Also their Latin name nola or campana (campanum), the latter of which is still living in the Italian language, is generally derived from him. But this derivation seems to be a mistake; for in the writings of Paulinus, though several, even elaborate descriptions of churches are given, no mention is ever made of bells. Further, tintinnabula were called nolæ long before the time of Paulinus; and campana refers most probably to the aes campanum, a metal spoken of by Pliny, from which bells were first made. The German name Glocke, from the old high German clocchôn ("knock") was adopted in mediæval Latin under the forms cloqua, clocca, or cloccum, whence the French cloche and the English "clock."

The first bell was probably simply an enlarged tintinnabulum; and it is thus called by Polydorus Vergilius, who ascribes its first use to Pope Sabianus, the successor of Gregory I. It was introduced to replace the cursor ("runner") and the tuba ("trumpet") in calling together the faithful to service. Its use soon became general. In the seventh century we meet it in France. It was the bells of St. Stephan's Church in Orléans, which in 610 caused a panic in the army of King Clothair. In the eighth century bells became common throughout the realm of Charlemagne. The campanum optimum, or great bell for the Cathedral of Aix-la-Chapelle, was made by Tancho, a monk of St. Gall, and a famous bell-founder. In the ninth century bells were brought to the East. Duke Ursus of Venice sent twelve great bells as a present to the Byzantine emperor (Michael, or Basilus), and the emperor erected a belfry for them at the Church of St. Sophia. In the East, however, their general introduction was checked by the spread of Islam; the Mohammedans contemplating them with a kind of dread, and forbidding even the Christians to use them.

In the Western Church the bells, like all other church-furniture, were consecrated, or, as it was called, baptized, before taken into use. The bell was washed with water, then oil was poured upon it, and under chants and prayers the priest made the sign of the cross over it. There is a capitulary of Charlemagne, from 787, which expressly forbids the baptism of clocæ, but it is probable that clocæ there refers only to tintinnabula, or such bells as were in every-day use. In the tenth century it also became customary to give the bell a name. In 968 Pope John XIII.

consecrated the great bell of the Church of the Lateran, and gave it his own name, Ioannes.

BELSHAM, Thomas, b. at Bedford, Eng., April 15, 1750; d. at Hampstead, Nov. 11, 1829; was educated at the Dissenting Academy of Daventry, and became afterwards head of this institution, but left it in 1789, having adopted Unitarian views; was head of the Unitarian College of Hackney during the short period of its existence; and became minister to the Essex-street chapel in London in 1805. The most prominent of his works are: Review of American Unitarianism, 1815; Evidences of Christianity, London, 1822, 2 vols.; and The Epistles of Paul the Apostle, translated, with exposition and notes, London, 1822, 2 vols. A Life of him, together with his letters, was published by J. Williams, London, 1833. The death of Dr Priestley left him the leading Unitarian in England. The "Unitarian Society for promoting Christian Knowledge and the Practice of Virtue" was his suggestion. He had an important share in the Improved Version of the New Testament upon the Basis of Archbishop Newcome's New Translation, with Notes Critical and Explanatory, London, 1808.

BELSHAZ'ZAR (may Bel protect the King), the first-born son of Nabonidus (the usurper of the Babylonian throne) and a daughter of Nebuchadnezzar, and thus his dynasty had a color of legitimacy. In consequence of his maternal descent, Belshazzar could be called the son, i.e. descendant, of Nebuchadnezzar (Dan. v. 2, 11 sq.). But, even if his mother had not been the daughter of Nebuchadnezzar, he might still be styled as above, just as Sargon spoke of the preceding Assyrian kings as his ancestors (see G. Rawlinson, The Five Great Monarchies, 3d ed., London, 1876, II. p. 139 sq.; Schrader, Keilinschriften u. A. T., Giessen, 1876, p. 254 sq.), and as, in 2 Chron. xi. 14, the successors of Jeroboam I. are called his sons, although in fact they belonged to other dynasties. Belshazzar, the crown-prince and joint-king, was nominated by his father regent of Babylon, and to him was confided the defence of the city against Cyrus. How he kept his trust let Daniel's wonderfully graphic account testify (Dan. v.). When Babylon fell, he was killed: his father, however, who had been defeated by Cyrus at Borsippa, after the capture of Babylon, was banished to Carmania, but there made ruler. The narrative of Daniel in regard to Belshazzar has been abundantly verified by Sir Henry Rawlinson's decipherment of several cuneiform inscriptions. One passage reads, "Me Nabu-nahid (Nabonidus), King of Babylon, from sin against thy great divinity, do thou save me, and health and long days numerous do thou multiply. And of Bel-sar-uzur (Belshazzar), my eldest son, the delight of my heart, in the worship of thy great divinity, his heart do thou establish, and may he not consort with sinners." — This identification renders intelligible the otherwise strange promise of Belshazzar's to make the interpreter of the writing on the wall the third ruler in the kingdom. We now know that Belshazzar was the second, and so he would place the interpreter next to himself. — The writing on the wall must have appeared in startling contrast to the cuneiform inscriptions already upon it, which set forth the praises of the gods and the victories of the kings.

See the books quoted, also Pusey on Daniel, Oxford, 1868; J. Ménaut's Babylon et la Chaldée, Paris, 1875.

A. KÖHLER.

BEMA (βῆμα, βῆμα) means in classical literature an elevated platform of a semicircular shape, destined to carry the sella currules, or throne of some magisterial official. Hence it became a fit name for that part of the Christian church formed by the apsis, where stood the throne of the bishop and the seats of lower clergy. In this signification it occurs in the fifty-sixth canon of the synod of Laodicea, which forbids the clergy to enter the bema and sit down before the arrival of the bishop. There is, however, also a more restricted sense of the word, in which it signifies any kind of elevated seat or place, such as the cathedra, the pulpit, etc., and in which it is synonymous with ambo.

BENA'IAH (whom Jehovah built), the name of several Israelites. The most important of them is the son of Jehoiada, the chief priest (1 Chron. xxvii. 5), and a Levite, though born in Kabzeel, a city in the south of Judah (Josh. xv. 21). He was the captain of David's body-guard, the Cherethites and Pelethites (2 Sam. viii. 18; 1 Kings i. 38), and in this capacity carried over his allegiance to Solomon, and executed the royal sentence upon Adonijah and Joab (1 Kings ii. 25, 30, 34), and thus eventually became Joab's successor. In the catalogue of David's mighty men he is mentioned; and three of his exploits are recorded in justification of his rank, which was between the first three of the Gibeonites, or "mighty men," and the thirty "valiant men of the armies." These three exploits were: (1) he slew two sons of Ariel, a distinguished Moabite, or of the king of Moab; (2) he slew a lion which had fallen into a pit in time of snow; (3) he slew an Egyptian giant, who, according to the additions in the Septuagint, carried a spear so huge that it seemed like a tree thrown across a ravine; but he forced it from his hand, and killed the giant with his own weapon. Benaiah was captain of the host for the third month (1 Chron. xxvii. 5), and his course consisted of twelve divisions of twenty-four hundred men each. In 1 Chron. xxvii. 34 we read, "After Ahithophel, was Jehoiada, the son of Benaiah," as counsellor of the king. It is probable that the names are transposed, and that Benaiah himself, and not his son, occupied this dignified position after the death of Ahithophel.

The other men of the same name are: 1. One of the thirty mighty men, an Ephraimite, captain of the eleventh monthly course (2 Sam. xxiii. 30); 2. One of the "princes" of the families of Simeon (1 Chron. iv. 36); 3. A Levite in David's time, who was musical (1 Chron. xv. 18, 20, xvi. 5); 4. A priest who blew the trumpet before the ark in David's time (1 Chron. xv. 24, xvi. 6); 5. A descendant of Asaph (2 Chron. xx. 14); 6. A Levite, who in Hezekiah's time was an overseer of offerings (2 Chron. xxxi. 13); 7. The father of Pelatiah, "a prince of the people" in the time of Ezekiel (Ezek. xi. 1, 13); 8. Two [or four] contemporaries of Ezra who had foreign wives (Ez. x. 25, 30-35, 43).

BENEDICITE, the alternative to the Te Deum in the Book of Common Prayer. These two are the only portions of the kind in the book, which are not of canonical Scripture origin. The Benedicite is, however, really an expansion of the Hundred and Forty-eighth Psalm, and is otherwise called the "Song of the Three Holy Children," and is found among the Old-Testament Apocrypha, as part of the Greek addition to Daniel, inserted between the twenty-third and twenty-fourth verses of the third chapter. It was used as a hymn in the later Jewish Church, and very early adopted for use in the public service of the Christian Church. Chrysostom calls it "that admirable and marvellous song, which, from that day to this, hath been sung everywhere throughout the world, and shall yet be sung in future generations." See PROCTOR: History of the Book of Common Prayer (11th ed., 1874), p. 225 sq.

BENEDICT is the name of one schismatic and fourteen regular popes. — Benedict I., June 3, 574–July 30, 578; a native of Rome; was elected immediately after the death of his predecessor, John III., July 13, 573, but could not be consecrated until a year after, as, on account of the invasion of the Lombards, the imperial confirmation of the election had great difficulty in reaching Rome from Constantinople. The letter to the Spanish bishop David, ascribed to him, has been proved spurious by Pagi (ad ann. 577 not. 2). His life is found in Muratori, Rer. Ital. Scr., III. p. 133. See, also, Paulus Diaconus, De Gestis Longob., II., 10, III., 11. — Benedict II., June 26, 684–March 7, 685, had also to wait a whole year after his election before the imperial confirmation arrived, and the consecration could take place, but procured from the Emperor, Constantine Pogonatus, an ordinance, according to which the Pope, for the future, could be consecrated immediately after his election, without waiting for the imperial confirmation. He was very zealous to have the sixth ecumenical council, which had condemned the Monothelites and their champion, Pope Honorius, accepted by the Spanish Church, and succeeded at the synod of Toledo, 684. His life is found in Muratori, Rer. Ital. Script., III. p. 145. For his relation to Wilfrid, Bishop of York, see Vita Wilfridi, by Eddius Stephanus. — Benedict III., Sept. 29, 855–April 7, 858, was regularly elected, when the representatives of Ludwig II. and Lothar raised the cardinal-presbyter, Anastasius, as anti-pope, and imprisoned Benedict in the Lateran Palace. The people, however, proved faithful to their candidate. The emissaries of the two emperors gave up the intrigue: Anastasius was expelled, and Benedict installed. The introduction of the Peter's pence in England, and the foundation of the Anglican school in Rome, were due to the visit of King Æthelwulf and his son Alfred to Rome during the reign of Benedict. His vigorous policy in all relations with the Frankish and Byzantine empires was probably the work of his famous successor, Nicholas I. See, besides his life in Muratori: Rer. Ital. Script., III. p. 247; Prudentii Trecentis Annales, and Hincmari Remensis Annales in Mon. German. Script., I., and Epistola Nicolai I., in Mansi: Concil. Collet., XV. p. 159. — Benedict IV., 900–903, recognized Formosus, whom John VIII. had anathematized as an usurper, as a duly elected Roman pontiff. See Watterich, Pont. Rom. Vitæ, I. p. 659. — Benedict V. In order to sustain Leo VIII. against

John XII., the Emperor Otho I. was marching with a great army against Rome; but, before he reached the city, John XII. died (May 14, 964), and Benedict V. was elected in his place. When the emperor arrived before the city, however, the people surrendered Benedict. A formal process was instituted against him. He was deposed, and carried captive to Germany, where he lived at the court of Archbishop Adeldag of Hamburg till his death, July 5, 966. See WATTERICH: Pontif. Rom. Vitæ, I. p. 45; LIUTPRANDUS: De Ottonis Rebus in Urbe Roma Gestis; ADAM OF BREMEN: Gest. Ham. Eccl. Pontif. — Benedict VI., Jan. 19, 973–July, 974, was elected immediately after the death of John XIII. (Sept. 6, 972), but not consecrated until the Emperor Otho's confirmation of the election arrived. Soon after the death of Otho I., the affairs of the empire fell into disorder. Crescentius de Theodora and the deacon Boniface arose against Benedict, and threw him into prison, where he was strangled. His life is found in WATTERICH: Pontif. Rom. Vitæ, I. p. 65; MURATORI: Rer. Ital. Script., III. 2, p. 332; ECCARD: Corp. Hist. Med. Ævi., Leipzig, 1723, II. p. 1640. — Benedict VII., October, 974–October, 983, began his reign by anathematizing Boniface VII., and showed himself very submissive to the emperor, Otho II., and very partial to the Monastery of Clugny, whose plans of ecclesiastical reforms he adopted. See WATTERICH: Pontif. Rom. Vitæ, I. p. 66 and 686. — Benedict VIII., May, 1012–April 7, 1024, gained the support of Henry II., though the anti-pope Gregory, defeated in battle, and expelled from Rome, sought refuge at the German court; crowned Henry II. and his spouse Kunigunde at Rome in 1014, and obtained from him a renunciation of the right, held by the Othones, to confirm the election of a pope; defeated, by the aid of Pisa and Genoa, the Saracen chief Mogeid, when he invaded Italy, and expelled him from Sardinia; worked in unison with Henry II. for the general introduction of the reform-plans of Clugny, though without fully satisfying the Cluniacenses themselves. See WATTERICH: Pontif. Rom. Vitæ, I. pp. 69, 700; AMORI: Storia dei Muselmanni in Sicilia, Florence, 1858, vol. III.; SADÉE: Die Stellung Kaiser Heinr. II. zur Kirche, Jena, 1877. — Benedict IX., January, 1033–July 16, 1048; a son of Count Alberic of Tusculum, a nephew of Benedict VIII. and John XIX.; was only ten years old, when, by the intrigues and violence of his father, he was elevated to the papal chair, but exasperated the Romans to such a degree by his scandalous life, that a rebellion broke out in 1044, and Sylvester III. was elected in his stead. He succeeded in expelling Sylvester; but, doubting whether he would be able to maintain himself against the Romans, he sold his dignity for one thousand pounds silver to Gregory VI. Henry III. now convened a synod at Sutri, Dec. 20, 1046, in which Sylvester III. and Gregory VI. and Benedict IX. were deposed, and Clement II. was made pope. But Clement II. died Oct. 9, 1047; and before the new pope, Damasus II., could come into possession of the chair, Benedict IX. succeeded in returning once more to Rome. He was soon expelled, however, and compelled to retire to Tusculum. When and where he died is not known. See Annales Romani (M. G. S. V., p. 468); TH. MITTLER: De Schismate in Eccl. Rom. sub Bened. IX., Turici, 1835. — Benedict X., April 5, 1058–April, 1059, was elevated to the papal chair by the Roman nobility, the counts of Tusculum, Galeria, and Monticelli, after the death of Stephan X., but resigned immediately after the return of Hildebrand from Germany, and was kept in close confinement for the rest of his life. See WATTERICH: Pontif. Rom. Vita, I. pp. 203–219, 738. — Benedict XI., Oct. 22, 1303–July 7, 1304, was able, by his noble and mild proceedings, to reconcile the kings of France and Sicily, and even the family of Colonna, but was poisoned just as he was prepared for an energetic stroke at the participants in the fray of Anagni. See MURATORI: Rer. Ital. Script., III. p. 672, IX. pp. 746, 1010, XI. p. 1224, XIII. p. 398; L. GAUTIER: Benedict XI., Paris, 1863. — Benedict XII., Dec. 20, 1334–April 25, 1342, remained in Avignon in spite of the urgent entreaties of the Romans to return to their city. Also Barlaam, and the approaches of the Byzantine court, he received somewhat coldly, knowing that the religious question was only used as a cover to their political interest. His dependence on the French court twice prevented him from coming to an understanding with Lewis the Bavarian: the result of which was, that Lewis emancipated himself altogether, and even assumed the imperial title without soliciting the confirmation of the pope. See BALUZIUS: Vitæ Paparum Avenionensium, I. p. 197–243; MURATORI: Rer. Ital. Script., III. 2, p. 527; CARL MÜLLER: Der Kampf Ludwig des Baiern mit der römischen Curie, Tübingen, 1880. II. — Benedict XIII., a (Peter de Luna), Sept. 28, 1394–Nov. 17, 1424, took, in the schisms between Urban VI. and Clement VII., the side of the latter, and was unanimously elected his successor on the condition that he should do every thing in his power to heal the schism. The remedy proposed was that both the rival popes, Boniface IX. in Rome, and Benedict XIII. in Avignon, should resign; but neither of them was willing to do so. The schism continued; France, Spain, and Scotland adhering to Benedict XIII., Italy and Germany to Boniface IX. Twice, however, France withdrew its obedience, — Sept. 1, 1398, when Benedict XIII. was shut up in his palace in Avignon, and for some time kept there as a prisoner; and May, 1408, when he fled from Avignon, and took up his residence at Peniscola, — an estate belonging to his family in Aragon. Twice he was formally deposed and condemned, — by the Council of Pisa, 1409, and by that of Constance, 1417; but on the rock of Peniscola he still continued to declare, "Here is the only true Church." See BALUZIUS: Vit. Pap. Arion., I. p. 562; DU PUY: Histoire du Schisme, 1378–1428, Paris, 1654; MAIMBOURG: Histoire de Grand Schisme d'Occident, Paris, 1678. — Benedict XIII., b (of the house of Orsini-Gravina), May 29, 1727–Feb. 21, 1730, was a learned and pious man, but somewhat weak in his relations with the temporal powers, and completely in the hands of his minister, Cardinal Coscia, who by Clement XII. was deprived of his ecclesiastical dignity, and condemned to ten years' imprisonment. He distinguished himself as an author; and his collected works appeared in Rome, 1728, 3 vols. fol. See A. BORGIA: Benedicti XIII. Vita, Rome, 1752. — Benedict XIV. (Prospero Lambertini), Aug. 17, 1740–May 4, 1758; b. at Bologna, 1675; Bishop of Ancona, 1727; cardinal, 1728; Archbishop of Bologna, 1731; distinguished himself as an author, both before his elevation to the papal chair (De Servorum Dei Beatificatione), and after (De Synodo Diocesano). In his foreign policy he was willing to make great concessions, even against the advice of his college of cardinals, as shown by the concordats he concluded with Naples, Sardinia, and Spain. But, as a spiritual ruler of the Church, he often showed considerable firmness, especially in his relations to the Jesuits. Twice he administered very severe rebukes to the society for the frivolous manner in which it carried out the mission in China and on the coast of Malabar, accommodating Christianity to the most scandalous Pagan rites in order to secure purely commercial relations with the natives. He understood that the society had — to use a mild expression — become an anachronism; and, shortly before his death, he charged the patriarch of Lissabon, Cardinal Saldanha, with a thoroughgoing reform of the order, so far as Portugal was concerned. But his successor revoked the bull. With the Protestants his relations were kindly, as was shown by many small traits. He was the first pope who gave the ruler of Prussia the title of "king," the curia having hitherto always styled him "Margrave of Brandenburg." Benedict's collected works appeared in Rome, in 12 vols. 4to, 1747. For his life, see SANDINI: Vitæ Pontif. Roman., Ferrara, 1763, II.; GUARNACCI: Vitæ Rom. Pontif., II., Vie du Benedeti XIV., Paris, 1783.

BENEDICT OF NURSIA, b. in 480, at Nursia, in the province of Valeria; d. March 21, 523, at Monte Casino; was educated in Rome, but fled from the city in 494, only fourteen years old, disgusted at the worldliness and confusion, both of the students and the studies, and retired first to Enfide (the old Anfidena, the present Alfidena), and then farther east, among the mountains, to Subiaco, in order to perfect himself in holiness by a life of seclusion and devotion. At Subiaco he met with a monk, Romanus, who encouraged him in his purpose, and aided him in carrying it out. He took up his abode at the bottom of a dismal cavern; and here he spent the time in holy contemplations, and fighting the temptations of the flesh, provided with food by Romanus, who, by means of a rope, lowered down to him daily a part of his own scanty ration. After the lapse of three years (in 497) he was discovered by some shepherds, who first shrank back from him as from a wild animal, but soon recognized the signs of a holy life in the apparition, and prostrated themselves before him. Others were attracted. Gradually he was drawn out of this utter seclusion; and in 510 the monks of the Monastery of Vicovaro chose him their abbot. At this time he seems to have abandoned the austere asceticism which he originally professed; for he allowed his monks to drink wine. But the unconditional obedience he demanded, and the strict regularity which he enforced in the hourly alteration of devotional practices and manual labor, exasperated them; and they tried to poison him.

He left the monastery, and returned to the cavern; but the world's eye was once set upon him, as upon a light lit in the darkness. Much people gathered around him, — delicate youths of rich families, old roughs from the Gothic hordes, — to obtain his guidance to a holy life. He organized minor communities of twelve monks under an abbot, and established twelve such cenobies in the neighborhood of Subiaco, constituting himself supreme abbot. But new troubles arose. Though monastic life was still a wild-growing plant, without any clearly defined mission, without any thoroughly developed organization, and consequently liable to fall into the most singular aberrations, it was, nevertheless, to all men's eyes, the highest expression of the religious cravings of the age. To enter a monastery was considered the only true conversio, to live in a monastery, the only true religio. Hence arose a bitter jealousy from the side of the secular clergy towards the monks. A priest from the neighborhood of Subiaco, Florentius, actually tried to poison Benedict; and, when this failed, he attempted to seduce the monks by sensual temptations. Benedict then determined to leave the place; and in 528 he led his little army into Campania, to Monte Casino, where he transformed an old Apollo temple, with its adjacent grove, into a Christian oratory in the centre of a circle of cenobies. In 529 he promulgated his famous rules, which were destined to be, through many centuries, the rules of all the monasteries of the Western Church. The monastery of Monte Casino grew rapidly, and was soon able to send out colonies. In 580 it was destroyed by the Lombards, the monks fleeing to Rome, and it was not rebuilt until 720; but in the mean time (in 633) a French monk, Aigulf, dug up the bones of Benedict, and carried them to France, where they were deposited in a monastery near Fleury, — a circumstance, which, however, does not prevent the present monks of Monte Casino to exhibit the bones of the founder of their order, together with a bull of Urban II., condemning all who doubt the genuineness of the exhibit. See BENEDICTINES.

LIT. — The only literary monument which Benedict has left of himself is his rules, often printed and commented upon, best by ED. MARTENE: Commentarius in Regulam S. P. Benedicti, Paris, 1690: the other works which have been ascribed to him, and which may be found in Bibliotheca Patrum Marima, Lyons, 1677, tom. IX. p. 640, are spurious. His life has been written by MEGE: Vie de St. Benoist, Paris, 1696; by the BOLLANDISTS: Act. Sanct. March, tom. III. p. 274-357; and by MABILLON in Act. Sanct., A. S. B., I p. 3, and Ann. Ord., S. B., I. p. 1-177; but these accounts are only fanciful expansions of the life given by Gregory the Great, in his Dial. II., which itself is overloaded with the miracles and legends. BENEDICT OF ANIANE, b. in Languedoc, 750; d. at Suda, Feb. 12, 821; of Gothic descent; the son of a count of Magelone; was educated at the court of Charlemagne, whom he accompanied on his campaign to Italy in 774, but having on this occasion saved his brother from drowning while crossing the Ticino, he made a vow to renounce the world, changed his name Witiza for that of Benedict, retired to the Monastery of St. Sequanus in the diocese of Langres, and became a monk. Destined by nature to greatness in whatsoever sphere his life might enter, he embraced monasticism with an ardor very rare in that time, and adopted the practice of the most rigid asceticism. But his self-sacrifice and self-torture produced no other impression than that of spite and contempt, and he gradually came to understand that to become something great in the order of life which he had chosen meant to elevate and purify this very order itself. He did not recoil from the task, however. In 779 he left the Monastery of St. Sequanus, and founded a model monastery on one of the paternal estates in Languedoc, on the River Aniane. His talent for organization and government proved to be very extraordinary. He simply revived and enforced the rules of his great ideal, Benedict of Nursia; but his activity was soon felt as a great blessing, not only by his own monks, but by all the monastic institutions of the country, and he became one of the most intimate advisers of Lewis the Pious, Charlemagne's son, King of Aquitania. Together with Alcuin he partook in the negotiations with the Adoptionists, and thus he came into personal contact with Charlemagne himself. His dreams approached their realization. His idea was to make the monastic order an active member of the social organism, a constituent element of civilized life, the bearer of the science and learning of the church; but, in the carrying-out of this idea, he had to contend, not only with the abject condition of the order itself, but also with the whole institution of canonici, which already seemed to have assumed these functions, and even with an opposing party, represented by Adalhar and Wala. Nevertheless, when Lewis the Pious ascended the throne, Benedict found the way open for his plans. He was called to found and preside over the Monastery of Juda, near Aix-la-Chapelle, in order to be in steady and close connection with the court. He was made superintendent-general of all the monasteries of the realm; and in the great council of Aix-la-Chapelle (817) he succeeded in giving the monasteries a well-defined position in the state, at the same time introducing great reforms in their interior organization. See BENEDICTINES.

LIT. — Of Benedict's writings, those against the Adoptionists may be found in BALUZE: Miscellanea, V. p. 1-62. Those concerning monasticism have been edited: Codex Regularum by HOLSTENIUS, Paris, 1663; and Concordia Regularum by HUGO MENARD, Paris, 1638. His life, written by ARDO, has been edited by BOLLANDUS, in Act. Sanct., Feb. 2, and by MABILLON, in Act. Sanct., O. S. B., I. ALBRECHT VOGEL.

BENEDICTINE EDITORS, EDITIONS OF THE FATHERS, AND OTHER WORKS. The editors embrace such scholars as Mabillon, Montfauçon, Sainte-Marthe, D'Achery, Martene, Durand, Rivet, Carpentier, Tassin, and Pitra. The following is a complete list of these highly esteemed and now very costly works. 1. Barnabas (Menard), 4to, 1642; 2. Lanfranc (D'Achery), fol., 1648; 3. Bernard (Mabillon), 2 vols. fol., 1667; 4. Anselm (Gerberon), fol., 1675; 5. Augustine (Delfan and others), 11 vols. fol., 1679-1700; 6. Cassiodorus (Garet), 2 vols. fol., 1679;

7. Ambrose (Du Frische and Le Nourri), 2 vols., 1686-90; 8. Hilary (Constant), fol., 1693; 9. Jerome (Martianus and others), 5 vols. fol., 1693-1706; 10. Athanasius (Montfaucon), 3 vols. fol., 1698; 11. Gregory of Tours (Ruinart), fol., 1699; 12. Gregory the Great (De Sainte-Marthe), 4 vols. fol., 1703; 13. Hildebert (Beaugendre), fol., 1708; 14. Irenæus (Massuet), fol., 1710; 15. Lucius Cæcilius (Le Nourri). Svo. 1710; 16. Chrysostom (Montfaucon), 13 vols. fol., 1718-38; 17. Cyril of Jerusalem (Toultée and Maran), fol., 1720; 18. Basil (Garnier and Maran), 3 vols. fol., 1721-30; 19. Cyprian (Maran), fol., 1726; 20. Justin Martyr (Maran), fol., 1742; 21. Origen (De la Rue), 4 vols. fol., 1733-59; 22. Gregory Nazianzen (Clemencet), 1st vol. fol., 1778; 2d vol., 1842.

Besides editions of the Fathers, these scholars produced such works as Art de vérifier les dates (1783-87, 3 vols. fol.); Acta Sanctorum Ord. S. Benedicti (1688-1702, 9 vols. fol.); Annales Ordinis S. Benedicti (1713-39, 6 vols. fol.); Thesaurus Novus Anecdotorum (1717, 5 vols. fol.); Veterum Scriptorum et Monumentorum Amplissima Collection (1724-33, 9 vols. fol.); Spicilegium Solesmense (10 vols. 4to). BENEDICTINES. When Benedict of Nursia (see title) composed his rules of monastic life (529), he had probably no idea of the influence they were destined to exercise. He, like the whole age in which he lived, considered the monastery a place of refuge, a stepping-stone towards holiness, but only for the individual: that it might have a social mission, and become one of the most powerful organs of the Church, he did not realize. That tendency, however, towards compact unity, which is so characteristic for the Church of Rome, had already at that time grown so strong, that monasticism could not develop further without assuming the appearance of uniformity. At the same time as Benedict many other persons were eager to establish order and regularity in this field, — Cassiodorus, Equitius, and Eugippius in Italy; Casarius and Aurelianus of Arles in France; Isidorus of Hispalis in Spain. But only Benedict succeeded. His rules were the wisest, the mildest, the most moderate; and they found in Gregory the Great a most enthusiastic support. He introduced them in Italy, Sicily, and England. In 543 Maurus brought them to France. In the seventh century they spread in Spain; in the eighth century Boniface, himself a Benedictine, established them in Germany.

In the eighth century the Benedictine monastery passed through a very severe crisis, from which it was rescued only by the energy of Benedict of Aniane (see title). It was from its very origin an aristocratic institution. Its inmates belonged to the highest classes of society: to the slave and the serf its doors were closed. In course of time it had grown immensely rich. The noble families which sent their sons to live within its walls bequeathed great estates to it; and under the hands of the monks these estates became very prosperous, and yielded great revenues. The consequence was, that gradually the very character of the institution changed. Each monastery being a law unto itself, without responsibility before any central authority, the rules were modified and remodelled, until a wide entrance stood open for all kinds of worldly interests and passions. In the best monasteries the monks lived like canonici, in the worst, like robbers and rioters. To this danger from within, came another from without. The riches of the monasteries began to tempt the neighboring lords, and abbeys were often given as fiefs to laymen. It was Benedict of Aniane, who, in the Council of Aix-la-Chapelle (817), at once secured the social position of the monasteries of the Frankish Empire, and carried out a moral reform by enforcing the original rules. In the tenth century similar reforms were introduced by Archbishop Frederick of Mentz, Archbishop Adalbera of Rheims, Archbishop Dunstan of Canterbury, and others.

The lack of central organization, which had become very apparent during this same period, was remedied by the formation of the so-called congregations. Several independent monasteries united to guard in common over the strict maintenance of the rules within the pale of the congregation; and several of these congregations, as, for instance, that of Clugny, labored with great success, and exercised considerable influence on the general life of the Church. The period of prosperity was short, however. Other monastic orders arose, especially the mendicant orders, and threw the Benedictines into the shade. The attempts at reform and re-organization made by Clement V. and Benedict XII. failed. The effects of the Reformation and of the jealousy of the Jesuits were very detrimental to the order. Nevertheless, it rose once more. In the seventeenth century it became the representative of the science of the Roman Church. The congregation of St. Maur has rendered great services to the science of history: but the political reforms of Joseph II., the French Revolution, and the civil wars in Spain, have almost killed the order; and Austria is now the only country in which it shows any vigor.

BENEDICTION is, in the Roman Church, a sacred though not sacramental act, by which the grace of God is implored in behalf of some person or thing, and which consists in the making of the sign of the cross, in aspersion of holy water, etc., together with the recitation of some prescribed formula. Of such formulas there are innumerable collections, — libri benedictionales, benedictionalia almost every diocese having a collection of its own. In the Evangelical Church there is no act which really resembles the benediction of the Roman Church.

BENEFICE, in ecclesiastical language beneficium ecclesiasticum, comprises both the officium or ministerium with its duties, and the compensation for their fulfilment, the stipendium or prebenda, and is thereby distinguished from the commendatio, which is an enjoyment of ecclesiastical revenues without corresponding duties, and from the pensio, which is an enjoyment of a part of an ecclesiastical revenue as compensation for duties fulfilled. In the primitive church there were no benefices. All the property of a church was lumped together in one mass, and administered by the bishop: the revenues were divided between the bishop and the clergy, the church and the poor. In course of time, however, as each episcopal church grew into a diocese, and each diocese became completely divided up in parishes, it was natural that the great donations of real estate which had been made to the church were partitioned out, and a suitable measure allotted to each parish church for the maintenance of its minister. Instances of such a development occur as early as the sixth century, and with the eleventh the development was about completed. As all secular property was based on a system of fief, so all ecclesiastical property was based on a system of benefices; and between the two systems there were no other differences than those naturally arising from the differences between the Church and the State, their character and their purpose. The appointment to a benefice, the provisio or institutio canonica, comprised the selection of a fit candidate (designatio), and the conferring of the benefice to the candidate, the collatio, convenio or institutio proper. With beneficia majora the selection of the candidate often took place by election, as, for instance, by the chapters; or by nomination, as, for instance, by the king; and then followed the papal confirmatio or institutio. With beneficia minora the selection often consisted in a simple presentatio patroni, after which followed the episcopal admissio. The conditions for a valid appointment were, that the benefice was vacant, that the candidate was a fit person, that no simony took place, that the candidate held no other benefice, etc., — conditions which seem to have been dictated by simple common sense, but which the Roman Church often disregarded in the most offensive manner.

BENEZET, Anthony, b. at St. Quentin, France, Jan. 31, 1713; d. at Philadelphia, May 3, 1781; belonged to a Huguenot family which in 1715 was driven from France by Romish persecution; removed to London, joined the Quakers, and came to Philadelphia in 1731. Educated in a mercantile house, and prosperous in business, Anthony left this career in 1740, and became head of the Friends' English School in Philadelphia. For the rest of his life he was engaged in teaching; always eager to alleviate sufferings wherever he met them, but more especially passionately opposed to slavery, against which many of his writings are directed: A Caution to Great Britain and her Colonies, 1767; Historical Account of Guinea, 1772; Observations on the Indian Natives of this Continent, 1784, etc. There is a memoir of him by Roberts Vaux, New York, 1817.

BENEVOLENCE, BENEFICENCE. The former is the love of mankind in general, accompanied with a desire to promote their happiness, and is distinguished from the latter, which is the practice, while benevolence is the desire, of doing good. Benevolence must be universal, reaching to every man without exception, but beneficence cannot be so universal, for it is necessarily confined by several considerations; such as our knowledge of objects and their different circumstances, as well as our own abilities, and opportunities of exercising them. The duties of benevolence include those we owe to men, purely on the ground of their being of the same species as ourselves, those we owe to our country, those we owe to families and individuals, and those we owe to God. The objects of our benevolence are likewise all those who are in the sphere of our influence and action, without respect of party or sect. Benevolence is called disinterested when unmixed with thought of personal advantage. The means of beneficence are communication of temporal supplies (Gal. vi. 6), prayer (Jas. v. 16), sympathy (Rom. xii. 15), Christian communion (Col. iii. 16). See Buck's Theological Dictionary.

BENGEL, Johann Albrecht, b. at Winnenden, Württemberg, June 24, 1687; d. at Stuttgart, Nov. 2, 1751; studied theology at Tübingen, and was appointed professor at the seminary of Denkendorf in 1713; prelate of Herbrechtingen in 1741; and prelate of Alpirsbach, with residence in Stuttgart, in 1749. With his firm faith in the full inspiration and absolute authority of the Bible, he felt very much perplexed at the great number of variations in the text of the New Testament, and with characteristic humility and perseverance he immediately went to work investigating the matter. He procured all the editions, manuscripts and translations, he could; and in 1734 he published his text and an Apparatus Criticus, which indeed became the starting-point for the whole modern text-criticism of the New Testament. His famous canon was, The more difficult reading is to be preferred. This critical work was followed by an exegetical one, Gnomon Novi Testamenti, Tübingen, 1742, which has been often reprinted in Latin, and translated into German by C. F. Werner, 1853; and into English, in "Clarke's Library," Edinburgh, 1857, 1858; and by Lewis and Vincent, Philadelphia, 1860, 1861; and remains unto this day a treasure-house of exposition delivered in sentences whose point, clearness, brevity, and wondrous depth of meaning, render them not only worthy of patient study, but a part of the mental stores of the attentive student. It was the fruit of twenty years of labor; and it has been said of it, that it "condenses more matter into a line than can be extracted from the pages of other writers." His principles of interpretation are stated in his Essay on the Right Way of Handling Divine Subjects. Briefly it was to "put nothing into the Scriptures, but to draw every thing from them, and suffer nothing to remain hidden that is really in them." To this end he proceeded, in strict conformity to grammatical rules, but untrammelled by dogmatical or symbolical considerations, to study the New Testament. In theology he was a moderate Lutheran, but much more a Christian anxious to hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches. He united profound reverence for the Bible with an acuteness which let nothing escape him. In 1740 appeared his Exposition of the Apocalypse (last German ed., 1858), translated by John Robertson, London, 1757; in 1741 his Ordo Temporum. In both these works he fixes the beginning of the millennium in 1836. His apocalyptic calculations were of course doomed to disappointment. His Life was written by his son as an introduction to the Gnomon, and is found in the translations mentioned above, by J. Ch. F. BURK, his great-grandson, Stuttgart, 1831; translated by Walker, London, 1837; and best, with new materials, by OSKAR WÄCHTER: J. A. Bengel's Lebensabriss, Stuttgart, 1865; also the article on Bengel by J. Ch. F. BURK in Herzog, 2d ed.

BEN-HA'DAD (son, i.e., worshipper, of Hadad, the sun), the religious name of three Syrian kings. 1. The son of Tabrimon came to the succor of Asa, King of Judah, against Baasha, King of Israel (1 Kings xvi. 18). See BAASHA.

2. The son of the preceding was at war with Ahab and Jehoram, kings of Israel, and was once badly defeated, but escaped by fraud and stratagem (1 Kings xx.). Later on, Ben-hadad besieged Jehoram in Samaria, and so straitly, that famine compelled mothers to eat their own children. By divine intervention the Syrian host was dispersed, and plenty regained (2 Kings vi. 8-vii. 20). Hazael's assassination of Ben-hadad occurred the next year (viii. 15). Three successful campaigns against Ben-hadad II. are mentioned upon the tablets of the Assyrian king, Shalmaneser II. (B.C. 858-823), undertaken in the sixth, eleventh, and fourteenth years of the latter monarch. Thoroughly in agreement with the Bible, Shalmaneser says, that, at the time of the first expedition, the Syrian king was in league with "Achabbu," i.e., Ahab of Israel (cf. 1 Kings xx. 34); and it is safe to conjecture, with Schrader (Riehm, Hwb. Bb. Alt. p. 164), that the misfortunes of Ben-hadad in subsequent campaigns alienated the allies; for we find Israel in open revolt from her Syrian lord.

3. The son of Hazael was called Ben-hadad. He was the master of Israel; but Jehoahaz, in answer to prayer, received the promise of deliverance. The "Savior" was his son Jehoash (2 Kings xii. 5, cf. v. 25). The prophet Amos (i. 4) declares that a fire should devour the palaces of Ben-hadad III.

Schrader, in Riehm, calls attention to the Assyrian form of the name, Bin-hidri, i.e., Ben-hadar, the exact form preserved in the Septuagint, which is therefore nearer right than the Hebrew.

BENJAMIN OF TUDELA, a Spanish rabbi, b. in Navarre; d. in 1175. After many years of travel (1160-73) in Europe and the East, visiting Constantinople, Egypt, Palestine, Assyria, Persia, penetrating to the frontiers of China, he published his Itinerary in Hebrew, under the title Mazaloth ("peregrinations"). The work swarms with errors, geographical, chronological, and of every kind, raising almost the presumption that the author never was in the places he attempts to describe. The work has passed through many editions, and been translated into several languages. It first was printed by Soncini, at Constantinople (1543, 8vo), reprinted in Antwerp in 1575, with a Latin translation by Arias Montanus. Later editions are those of Constantin L'Empereur (Brunet says the Hebrew text used was inaccurate), Lyon, 1633, in Latin; of Barratier, Amsterdam, 1734, 2 vols. in French; and, best of all, that of Asher, in English, London and Berlin, 1840, 2 vols. The first volume contains the text; the second, the notes and numerous essays. See, also, the edition of Lelewel, Bruxelles, 1852.

BENNETT, James, D.D., a preacher and scholarly writer of the Congregationalists of England; b. in London, May 22, 1774; d. in London, Dec. 4, 1862; studied at Gosport, under Dr. Bogue; settled at Romsey Hants, in 1796, and ordained there April, 1797. Whilst here, he published Memoirs of Risdon Darracott, and together with David Bogue, D.D., The History of Dissenters from the Revolution, 1688, to the Year 1808, 2d ed., London, 1833, 2 vols. In 1813 became theological tutor of the Rotherham Independent College, and pastor of the adjoining church. Here he published Life of Dr Bogue, and Lectures on the History of Christ, 2d ed., 1828. In 1828 he was called to the pastorate of the ancient church at Silver Street, London, which afterwards removed to the new chapel in Falcon Square. He attracted great attention by his Lectures on Infidelity, 3d ed., 1847, at the close of which he was accustomed to invite infidels to public controversy. His later works are, The Preaching of Christ, Justification as Revealed in Scripture, in opposition to the Council of Trent, and Mr. Newman's Lectures, 1840, Lectures on the Acts of the Apostles, 1846, and the Congregational Lecture on The Theology of the Early Christian Church, 1840. He published also a large amount of miscellaneous works in the form of letters, articles, sermons, etc. His son is the celebrated London physician, Sir J. Risdon Bennett. LLEWELYN D. BEVAN.

BENNO, St., b. near Goslar, Hanover, 1010; d. at Meissen, June 16, 1106; was educated in a monastery at Hildesheim, where he took holy orders in 1028, and was ordained deacon in 1035, and priest in 1040; was appointed teacher in the cathedral school of Goslar in 1051, and wrote, while there, De Dictamine and Expositiones supra Evangelia Dominicalia, which are still extant; and became Bishop of Meissen in 1067. By Henry IV. he was twice imprisoned (in 1075 and in 1078), suspected of secretly encouraging the Saxon insurrection; and in 1085 he was even deposed for having declared himself in favor of Hermann; but in 1088 he was again re-instated in his office on the recommendation of Clement III. He was a rather insignificant character, weak and vacillating in all great questions; but he held the Gregorian views in all church matters; and in 1523 Adrian VI. found it opportune to canonize him, which occasioned a sharp attack from Luther. His remains are deposited in Munich, and he is the patron saint of Bavaria. See Ossilegium S. Bennonis, Munich, 1765, by C. F. SEXSARTH, and Apologia Bennoniana, Munich, 1773, by A. CRAMMER.

BENOIT, René, b. 1521, at Angers; d. in Paris, 1608; accompanied Mary Stuart to Scotland as her confessor; was after his return appointed pastor to the Church of St. Eustache in Paris, and played a conspicuous part in the controversies of the Ligue, as one of the leaders of the opposition to the Guises and the Ultramontanes. In 1566 he published a translation of the Bible, which, however, was not much more than a reprint of the Geneva translation. It was condemned by the faculty; and when (in 1588) Henry IV. made him professor of theology in the Colleges de Navarre, he was compelled to subscribe the condemnation of himself. Still more he exasperated the Ultramontanes by his Catholic Apology, in which he tried to prove that the King did not forfeit his right to the throne by professing the Protestant faith. When, as a reward, the King afterwards made him Bishop of Troyes, the Pope refused the confirmation, and in 1604 he had to renounce the office.

BENOIT, Elie, b. in Paris, Jan. 20, 1640; d. at Delft, Nov. 15, 1728; studied philosophy in Paris, and theology at Montauban; was appointed minister at Alençon in 1665; fled in 1684, after the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, to Holland, and became minister to the Walloon congregation in Delft. He wrote several controversial tracts, books of edification, etc.; but his principal work is his Histoire de l'Édit de Nantes, 5 vols., Delft, 1693-95, which, written with great accuracy, and giving a number of documents, is one of the best sources of the history of the Protestant Church in France.

BENTHAM, Thomas, b. at Sherburn, Yorkshire, Eng., 1513; d. at Lichfield, Feb. 21, 1578; was educated at Oxford; embraced the Reformation; left the country on the accession of Mary, and lived for some years at Zürich and Basel, but returned before her death to take charge of a Reformed congregation in London, and was made Bishop of Lichfield and Coventry in 1559. He translated the Psalms, Ezekiel, and Daniel, in the "Bishops' Bible."

BENTLEY, Richard, b. at Oulton, Yorkshire, Jan. 27, 1662; d. at Cambridge, July 14, 1742; was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge; ordained deacon in 1690; nominated to the Boyle lectureship in 1692; appointed master of Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1699, Archdeacon of Ely in 1700, and professor regius in divinity at Cambridge in 1717. Besides his eminent merits as a critical philologist, he exercised a great influence on the theology and the religious views of his time, especially by his Confutation of Atheism, or Eight Sermons preached at Boyle's Lectures, London, 1698, translated into Latin, French, and German, and Remarks upon a late Discourse of Free-thinking, London, 1713, which actually silenced the atheists, and drove them into deism. After great and laborious preparations, comparing editions, manuscripts, etc., he published in 1717 Proposals for printing a New Edition of the Greek Testament. He anticipated the principle of Lachmann, and intended to substitute for the Textus Receptus the oldest attainable text of the Nicene or ante-Nicene age; but this plan met with so much opposition from the side of the theologians, that he was compelled to give it up. His collected works were published in London, 1836, 3 vols., edited by A. Dyce; his Correspondence, in 1842, 2 vols., edited by Wordsworth. His life was written by Bishop Monk in 1830, 2d ed., London, 1833, 2 vols., and by Jacob Mähly, Richard Bentley, Leipzig, 1868.

BEOWULF, the oldest epic poem in any Germanic tongue, recounts, in 3,184 double lines of Anglo-Saxon alliterative verse, the exploits and death of the hero Beowulf. He is represented as leaving his home in the country of the Geats, upon hearing of the murders perpetrated by a fiendish monster named Grendel, at the court of the Danish king, Hrothgar, and proceeding thither with fourteen chosen companions for the purpose of encountering and slaying the destroyer. He succeeded in this undertaking, and also in despatching Grendel's mother, who appeared as the avenger of her son. In his old age, after having reigned for many years over his kinsmen the Geats, he was slain in combat with a dragon. His body was consumed, and a mound was reared upon a lofty promontory to commemorate his name. The poem naturally falls into four great divisions; viz., (a) Beowulf's fight with Grendel, (b) his fight with Grendel's mother, (c) his return, (d) his death. Certain episodic passages, and others which clearly imply an acquaintance with the Scriptures, must be regarded as later additions. Example of the latter are vers. 107-114, 178-188, 1724-1781, etc. The origin of the poem must be sought in heathen times, and among the Teutonic tribes of northern Denmark and southern Sweden. Though its nucleus is evidently mythical, it contains an admixture of historic fact. The Hygelac of vers. 2355-2367 and other passages has been identified with the Chochilaicus of Gregory of Tours, and his expedition with one that took place in the second decade of the sixth century.

Our recension of the poem probably dates from the beginning of the eighth century, though the single manuscript in which it is contained (Vitelius A. XV. of the British Museum) belongs to the tenth century.

LIT. — Among the best editions are those of Kemble, London, 1835; Thorpe, Oxford, 1855; Grein, in his Bibl. der angels. Poesie, Göttingen, 1857-64; and Heyne, 4th ed., Paderborn, 1879. Extracts in the original are contained in the Anglo-Saxon Readers of March, N.Y., 1870, and Sweet, Oxford, 1879. There are English translations by Kemble, London, 1837; Wackerbarth, London, 1849; Thorpe, in his edition, Oxford, 1855; Arnold, in his edition, London, 1876; and Lumsden, London, 1881. BERCÆANS, or BARCLAYITES, a sect founded by John Barclay, 1734-1798, and still represented by a few congregations in Scotland. Claiming to imitate the ancient Bercæans (Acts xvii. 11), they reject all human authority, and acknowledge only the Scriptures as the rule of conduct.

BERENGARIUS OF TOURS, b. at Tours, in the beginning of the eleventh century; d. in the adjacent Island of St. Cosme, 1088; a representative of that craving for spiritual independence which every now and then comes to the surface all through the history of the middle ages, and which in its latent, often unwilling, opposition to the authority of the Church, sometimes approaches very near to the principles of modern rationalism; was a pupil of Bishop Fulbert of Chartres, and became in 1040 director of the cathedral school in Tours. By his talent as a teacher, and by his learning, both in the fathers (especially Gregory the Great and Augustine) and in the classical literature, from which he had acquired a freer method of reasoning and a clearer expression for his thoughts, he soon brought the school into a flourishing condition: pupils gathered around him from every quarter. But his studies in the Bible and the fathers had led him to the conclusion that the view of the Lord's Supper generally accepted throughout the Church since the time of Paschasius Radbertus was wrong, that, indeed, the whole doctrine of transubstantiation was an inepta recordia vulgi. He taught that in the Lord's Supper it was necessary to distinguish, with Augustine, between the symbols, sacramentum, and the thing symbolized, res sacramenti; and though at first he seems to have been somewhat cautious in divulging his conviction on this point, rumors of his heterodoxy gradually oozed out. In 1046, and again in 1048, Adelman, scholasticus at Liège, and a friend of his, addressed some anxious queries to him in private letters. In 1049 Bishop Hughes of Langres attacked him publicly in a book; and in 1050 he himself wrote a letter to Lanfranc, at that time the greatest teacher of the Church, reproaching him because he still held the views of Paschasius, and thereby made Scotus a heretic. Lanfranc received the letter in Rome, and immediately laid the case before a synod, which condemned Berengarius without a hearing, nay, without a summons. This injustice was too glaring, however; and a new synod was convoked to Vercelli, Sept. 1, same year. But when Berengarius went to Paris to obtain the permission of the King, his abbot, to go abroad to the synod, the King, Henry I., thought it a good opportunity to get hold of his canon's property, and threw him in a dungeon. He was condemned by the synod of Vercelli, and rescued from the King's clutch only by the powerful aid of his friends, — Count Gaufrid of Anjou, and Bishop Eusebius Bruno of Angers. Henry I., vexed at having missed an opportunity of rapine, now convoked a synod at Paris, which also condemned the wealthy heretic; but, under the protection of Gaufrid and Eusebius Bruno, Berengarius sat quietly in Tours, though the fanaticism and hatred of his adversaries surged higher and higher around him every hour. When, in 1054, Cardinal Hildebrand arrived in France as papal legate, he tried to bring the matter to an issue; and Berengarius succeeded in satisfying the synod of Tours. But only for a moment was the uproar stilled. In 1059 he was again summoned before a synod in Rome; and here he was met with such an outburst of fury, that, stunned by fright, he fell upon his face, and retracted. Thereby he saved his life; but the weakness of that moment he never forgot, and hardly had he returned to Tours before he trampled upon his own retraction, and began to teach and preach his original ideas with increased vigor and bitterness. Synod after synod condemned him; but he continued disregarding the verdicts, until at last Gregory VII., who seems to have felt kindly towards him, but was vexed because this controversy threatened to interfere with his reform-plans, compelled him, at a synod in Rome (1078), to retract a second time, and to keep silent for the rest of his life. He retired to the Island of St. Cosme, where he lived in deep solitude.

BERGIER, Nicolas Sylvestre, b. at Darnay, in Lorraine, Dec. 31, 1718; d. in Paris, April 19, 1790; attracted attention, while still a teacher in the college at Besançon, by some essays on philology and mythology, but abandoned afterwards this line of study, and devoted himself to Christian apologetics, and polemics against the Encyclopedists. In 1765 he published Le Déisme réfuté par lui-même, and in 1768 the Certitude des preuves du christianisme, which achieved a great success, and occasioned Voltaire, who wrote against it, to temper his tone, and be a little more careful about his facts. In 1769 followed Apologie de la Religion chrétienne against Holbach, and in 1771 Examen du matérialisme. He also wrote a Dictionnaire théologique, which formed part of the Encyclopédie méthodique, but has several times been separately edited, latest, Paris, 1868, 6 vols. As a reward for his great services, he was made a canon of Nôtre Dame in Paris, and confessor to the courts of the king.

BERGIUS, Johannes, b. at Stettin, 1587; d. at Frankfort-on-the-Oder, 1658; studied theology at Heidelberg and Strassburg; visited England, France, and the Netherlands; and was in 1616 appointed professor of theology in the University of Frankfort, whose faculty professed the Reformed faith. He represented Brandenburg at the Leipzig conference (1631) and at the Thorn colloquium (1642), but declined to be present at the synod of Dort, as his stand-point was unicorism rather than Calvinism. His ideas of the universality of the divine grace he developed in his Der Wille Gottes von aller Menschens Seligkeit, 1653. In his controversies with the Lutherans he was very moderate. On the members of the house of Brandenburg he exercised great influence.

BERKELEY, George, the author of the Minute Philosopher; b. at Kilerin, or Drysert Castle, in the county of Kilkenny, Ireland, March 12, 1685; d. suddenly, at Oxford, Jan. 14, 1743. He was educated at Trinity College, Dublin, and obtained a fellowship in 1707. He lived there in an "atmosphere charged with the elements of re-action against traditional scholasticism;" and his Common-Place Book shows how his mind worked under its stimulus. Very early in life he was possessed by the idea, which he subsequently in various forms worked out, that no existence is conceivable and therefore possible, which is not either conscious spirit, or the ideas (i.e., objects) of which such spirit is conscious. "Existing things consist of ideas or objects perceived or willed; while perception and volition are inconceivable and impossible, save as the operations of mind or spirit. No object exists apart from the mind: mind is therefore the deepest reality; it is the prius, both in thought and existence, if for the moment we assume the popular distinction between the two." From this theory he never wavered: with it already developed he appeared as an author. In 1707 he issued two short tracts upon mathematics; in 1709 the New Theory of Vision, — an examination of visual consciousness to prove that it really affords no ground for belief in the reality of the objects apparently seen. In 1710 appeared his Principles of Human Knowledge, in which his theory received complete exposition. Meanwhile Berkeley had taken orders, and 1711 he preached his Discourse on Passive Obedience, in which he worked a "theological utilitarianism." In 1713 he left the university, went up to London, formed many desirable acquaintances, and gained a most enviable reputation for learning, humility, and piety, which was strengthened by the appearance of his Dialogues between Hylas and Philonous (1713),—a work of great literary beauty and skill. The next seven years were spent, for the most part, on the Continent. In 1722 he was appointed Dean of Dromore; in 1724, Dean of Derry, the "best preferment" in Ireland. In August, 1728, he married, and in September sailed for America, to carry out his darling project of establishing a college in the Bermuda Islands, with the aim of extending Christianity and civilization in America. He was led to believe that government took great interest in his plans, for which he had voluntarily made great personal sacrifices and great exertions. He landed at Newport, R.I.; but three years of waiting for the promised aid convinced him of the vanity of his hopes. He returned to London, and published in 1732 Alciphron, or, the Minute Philosopher, the fruit of his studies in America. The book is a powerful refutation of the free thinking then so popular and fashionable: it is probably the most famous of his works. In 1734 he was raised to the bishopric of Cloyne, Ireland. In 1744 he wrote the curious philosophico-medical work, Philosophical Reflexions and Inquiries concerning the Virtues of Tur-water. In the second edition, printed the same year, the title Siris, and the words 'a chain of,' were prefixed to the original title. Professor Fraser calls it "the profoundest English philosophical work of the last century." In 1752 Berkeley went to Oxford to live, to end his days in wished-for retirement, and there he died.

Bishop Berkeley was certainly one of the purest and sincerest Christians in history. While in the world, he was not of it. And he has peculiar claim upon the attention of Americans, because of his long residence on his farm near Newport. While there, he greatly endeared himself to all, and is yet remembered. Trinity Church in Newport, a fine old wooden structure in which he sometimes preached, still stands; as does the house, three miles from Newport, which he built and lived in, and named "Whitehall," in honor of an English palace. About a mile from the house is the rocky shore; and a horizontal cleft in the rocks is still pointed out as a retreat to which Berkeley went to meditate, and to which, also, he was wont to take his friends. In Alciphron, Berkeley has given permanent record of his life at Newport; and not a little of the charm of that work is due to this fact. While there, he made at least one convert, the Rev. Dr. Samuel Johnson, first president of Columbia College, New York, who published in his Elementa Philosophica an exposition of Berkeley's teaching. Jonathan Edwards is also claimed as a Berkeleyian. And Berkeley did more: he left his impress on here and there a speculative mind in Rhode Island, and a speculative tendency has always characterized its gifted men. Another strong claim upon us is because it was he, who, inspired by the prospect of planting arts and learning in America, uttered the prophetic verse:—

"Westward the course of empire takes its way;
The four first acts already past,
A fifth shall close the drama with the day:
Time's noblest offspring is the last."

The quotations made above are from Mr. Adlamson's article in the Encycl. Brit., 9th ed.

LIT.—The classical edition, superseding all others, of Berkeley's Complete Works, is that by Professor A. C. FRASER, Oxford, 1871, 4 vols. (the fourth volume contains Life, Letters, and Dissertation on his Philosophy). Professor FRASER and Professor T. H. GREEN have each furnished a volume on Berkeley to the series of Philosophic Classics for English Readers and English Philosophers respectively.

Essays.—COLLYNS SIMON: Universal Immaterialism (1847); the same: Nature and Elements of the External World (1862); FRIEDRICH: Ueber Berkeley's Idealismus.

Adverse Reviews of his Theory of Vision.—BATLEY: Review of Berkeley's Theory of Vision (1812); ABBOTT: Sight and Touch (1864); MONCK: Space and Vision. Modern editions of separate works have appeared, e.g., The Principles of Human Knowledge, with Prolegomena and Annotations, by Professor KRAUTH (a meritorious and learned compilation, presenting a valuable epitome of what has been said about Berkeley).

BERLEBURG BIBLE, The, was an annotated Bible with a new translation (German) as its basis, in which it was attempted to explain the Scriptures according to the teachings of the Mystics. The execution of the work is very unequal; and the spirit is sometimes rather sectarian than Christian, as when, with bitterness, opposing views are attacked. But, on the whole, it must be granted that the "Bible" contributed to quicken the spiritual life of its readers.

The work was comprised in eight folio volumes, issued 1726-42. The translation was made under the direction of M. Haug, and shows, particularly in the Old Testament, a shocking absence of grammatical knowledge, of literary taste, and of poetic sense. The commentary was in a sense an anthology, inasmuch as it presented choice extracts from mystical writers, all the way from Origen down to Madame Guyon and Mrs. Leade. But a great part was the work of otherwise totally obscure persons, who somewhat plaintively described themselves as "pastors persecuted for the sake of heterodoxy."

This pretentious work was written by the mystical school, who were the degenerate descendants of the Pietists,—the fruit of the re-action from the dry and formal orthodoxy of the seventeenth century. It was a sort of continuation of the Marburger Bible of 1712, edited by Horch; but it was no improvement. Count Casimir of Sain-Witgenstein-Berleburg was its patron. It cannot be said to be happy in its idea or execution. Three senses of the Word were taught,—the literal, the moral, and the secret or prophetic. To interpret the latter, the commentators boasted of the possession of the spirit who originally wrote the words. Their central doctrine was the regeneration. They taught that men could perfectly keep the commandments of God, and receive into themselves in such a manner the righteousness of Christ, that the primitive human nature is thereby restored. Of course, their conception both of sin and of redemption was heterodox.

The work never reached a second edition, and copies are now scarce. Curiously enough, in addition to the canonical books, they gave a number of apocryphal writings, both on the Old and the New Testament, and also extracts from Josephus and the Fathers. C. WEIZSÄCKER.

BERN, The Disputation of, occupies a prominent place among the many disputations, conferences, and colloquia which were held in Germany during the period of the Reformation, because it arrived at a practical result. For a long time the Reformation made only slow progress in Bern: both the character of the people and the manner of their life made them less susceptible to new ideas. But, as soon as an evangelical party was formed, the jealousy and arrogance of the Roman Church immediately began to cause trouble. According to the usages of those days, a reconciliation was attempted by means of a disputation; and May 21, 1526, such a disputation was opened in Basel before a large and brilliant assembly. Faber, Eck, Murner of Luzern, spoke on the Roman side; Œcolampadius, on the evangelical. But the defeat of the latter party was a foregone conclusion, and the evangelical cause might have been completely lost in Bern, had not the Roman Church, by the violent and domineering manner in which it used its victory, called forth a re-action, which, in less than two years, proved fatal to her cause. A new disputation was opened at Bern, Jan. 7, 1528, and lasted to Jan. 26. The Roman dignitaries and celebrities who had been invited declined to be present. On the side of the evangelical, spoke, besides Kolb and Haller, preachers of Bern, Capito, and Œcolampadius. The assembly was very numerous; and ten doctrinal points of purely evangelical bearing were agreed upon, and subscribed to by most of the clergymen present. Feb. 7, 1528, the Reformation Edict was issued. The mass was abolished, the images were removed from the churches, the episcopal power was annulled, etc., and the Reformation was established without the least violence or disturbance.

LIT. — The acts of the disputation were published at Zürich, 1528, and again in 1608 and 1701. FISCHER: Geschichte der Disputation und Reformation in Bern, Bern, 1828. See the "Ten Theses of Bern," in SCHAFF: Creeds, vol. III. pp. 208 sqq.

BERN, Synod of. By this title, the first reformed synod there held (in 1532), together with all the acts it passed, is meant. The synod numbered two hundred and twenty of the clergy of the country, and lasted from the 9th to the 13th of January inclusive, with Capito as its principal figure. They formed a Pastor's Manual and a Church Directory, distinguished, even among the monuments of the Reformation, for its apostolic force and unction, warmth and sincerity, homely simplicity and practical wisdom. The Acts of the Synod were officially printed at Basel, 1532, under the title "Berne Synodus-Ornung wie sich pfarrer und prediger zu Statt und Land Bern, in leer und leben, halten sollen, mit wyterem bericht von Christo, und den Sacramenten, beschlossen im Synodo daselbst versamlet, am IX. tag Jannarii An. MDXXXII.;" again officially reprinted 1728 and 1775; privately, with original and modernized text, by Lauener, Basel, 1830. F. TRECHSEL.

BERNARD OF CLAIRVAUX, b. 1091, at Fontaines, near Dijon, Burgundy; d. at Clairvaux, Aug. 20, 1153; canonized by Alexander III., 1173; was the third son of a noble and wealthy family, and received a complete training in all knightly accomplishments, but felt himself so strongly drawn toward things holy, that, in spite of the remonstrances of his family, he retired in 1113 to the Monastery of Cîteaux (Cisterium), and became a monk. Though the Monastery of Cîteaux (founded in 1098 by Stephan Harding) was renowned for the severity and strictness of its rules, Bernard, nevertheless, produced a strong impression in the circles into which he had entered, by the austerity of his ascetic practices, and by the passionate energy with which he concentrated his whole life on the one thing needful. When, in 1115, the monastery proved too small for the number of persons asking for admission, — Bernard, for instance, came in company with thirty others whom he had converted from the world, — and it was found necessary to send out a colony and found a new monastery, Bernard was placed at the head of the emigrants. They settled in the wild and barren gorge of Clairvaux (Clara Vallis); and it cost an incredible amount of perseverance, hard labor, and self-sacrifice, to build a house in this inhospitable region. But the monastery prospered wonderfully, and its abbot soon became famous. He was severe, almost austere, but he was not hard: to all he showed a kindness of heart and a suavity of manners which charmed and consoled. He was humble and meek; but he was not diffident: on one thing he was so sure, that his conviction made him a commander, and a harbor of refuge to every one who felt weak, or doubtful, or tempted. He was young, and singularly inexperienced; but he had that magical intuition into characters and circumstances which comes from perfect sincerity of heart, and furnishes the best aid to any one who is sick, and the best remedy to any thing which is wrong. So great was the confidence he enjoyed, that in 1128 he was called upon to draw up the rules for the order of the Templars.

In the schism which broke out after the death of Honorius II., Bernard immediately and resolutely took the side of Innocent II.; and the enormous energy which he developed in the case decided both the course and the issue of the contest. At the synod of Estampes he induced the French clergy to recognize Innocent. The recognition by Louis VI. of France, Henry I. of England, and Lothair of Germany, followed soon after, and was, partly at least, also the result of his exertions. Lothair he even persuaded to give up some of the claims which he based on the concordat of Worms, and to make a campaign to Italy to expel Anaclet II. While Innocent staid in France, Bernard accompanied him from place to place, and preached to the people in his behalf, with an eloquence whose effect often approached the miraculous. In France he bore down every trace of opposition; and in Italy too, whither he went twice (in 1133 and 1136), his presence was more effective than that of the armies of Lothair. Shortly after the ending of the schism, the controversy with Abelard began. Abelard was a rationalist; Bernard, a mystic: Abelard held that the doctrines of Christianity ought to pass through the sifting of reason, in order to become a fit subject of faith; while Bernard demanded that they should be embraced at once by faith, through an act of the will. With Abelard, faith meant reasoned conviction: with Bernard, intellect meant enthusiastic contemplation. Between those two men a conflict was unavoidable. But at the synod of Sens (1140), where Abelard expected to meet Bernard as his counterpart in a disputation, Bernard appeared as his accuser. Abelard refused to defend himself, and appealed to the Pope; but Bernard frustrated the appeal, and Abelard was in reality condemned unheard. Peter Venerabilis, however, the great Abbot of Clugny, with whom Abelard spent the last years of his life, afterwards brought about a personal reconciliation between the two antagonists. Perhaps the greatest, or, at all events, the most striking, exploit which Bernard performed, was the preaching of the second crusade, 1146. He roused the people of France and Germany to a pitch of enthusiasm hardly surpassed by that which produced the first crusade; but the result corresponded very poorly to the preparations, and he felt himself somewhat embarrassed at the complete failure. Very remarkable, also, was his activity in South-western France (1147-49), among the heretics of Albi and Toulouse, though he was not completely successful in this case, either. He met there with a state of mind which somewhat resembled his own, and the miraculous in his personal influence became somewhat weakened by this circumstance.

The works of Bernard comprise a number of sermons, especially on the Canticles; a number of mystic theosophic treatises, De Diligendo Deo, De Gradibus Humilitatis et Superbiæ, etc.: five books, De Consideratione ad Eugenium III., one of his most characteristic writings; a poem in hexameter; and a series of hymns, still living both in the Roman Catholic and in the Reformed churches (the most famous is the familiar, "O sacred head now wounded," which was translated into German by Gerhardt); and four hundred and nineteen letters of the greatest historical and psychological interest. His style is generally strained, artificial, and cumbersome; but his thoughts have often the same power as hunger or thirst. They absorb the whole man whom they beset, and throw him with passionate decision in one direction. The best edition of his works is that by MABILLON, Paris, 1667, 2 vols. folio, afterwards often reprinted, as in Migne, 1854, 4 vols. 8vo. This edition contains his life written by his friend and disciple Godfrey.

LIT.—Bernard's life was written thrice in the twelfth century,—by William of Thierry, Gaufredes of Clairvaux, and Alanus ab Insulis. Of modern biographies the most remarkable are Neander: Der heil. Bernhard, 3d ed., 1854-58, translated from the first edition by Matilda Wrench, London, 1843; and MORISON: Life and Times of St. Bernard, London, 1863.

BERNARD OF MENTONE, b. at Annecy, in Savoy, 923; d. at Novara, May 28, 1008; received an excellent education as the only child of rich and noble parents, but determined very early to renounce the world, and retired to a monastery of Aosta, took holy orders, and was afterwards appointed archdeacon. In Aosta, as well as in his home, he often witnessed the unspeakable misery to which pilgrims were subjected when crossing the Alps. A hospice had been erected in one of the passes in the ninth century; but it had been destroyed, and the passes were now held by gangs of robbers. In 973 Abbot Majolus of Clugny, when returning home from Italy across Mons Jovis (Mont Joux), was captured by such a gang, and compelled to pay an enormous ransom (see Pertz: Mon. Germ. VI. 651, VII. 54). Bernard himself took part in the military expedition against the robbers; and on the highest and most dangerous spot of the pass, surrounded on all sides with perpetual snow and ice, he founded a great and magnificent hospice, and peopled it with Augustinian monks. Afterwards he added another but minor hospice in the pass of Columna Jovis (Colona Jov); and both these hospices have been maintained to our day, having the name of their founder,—the Greater and Lesser St. Bernard. Bernard was canonized by Innocent XI. in 1681. His life is given in Act. Sanct., June 15, vol. III., p. 547-564. See also L. BURGNER: Leben und Werken d. h. Bernhard, Luzern, 1856, and, with respect to the history of the hospice, Le Conservateur Suisse, Tom. V., pp. 231-280.

BERNARD, Archbishop of Toledo, and Primate of Spain; the chief promoter of the Gregorian system of the Papacy in Spain; b. at Agen in France; d. in Spain, 1125; for a time was a soldier, then turned a Benedictine monk; promoted to Abbot of the Sahaguna Monastery in Castile, 1080, and rendered Gregory VII. such help in his reforms that he loaded him with favors. King Alfonso VI. nominated him Archbishop of Toledo as a reward of his services in taking that city from the Moors; and, when he went to Rome (1087) to receive the pallium, Pope Urban II. named him Primate of the Spanish Church. He renewed with redoubled vigor his efforts to reform the Church according to the Gregorian plan, but by so doing raised a storm of opposition: nevertheless he persevered. Among his reforms was the introduction of the Roman Liturgy in place of the Mozarabic. As an indication of his warlike character may be mentioned his raising an army which he intended to command upon a crusade into Palestine; but Pope Paschal II. forbade him and all Spaniards, under penalty of the ban, from engaging in such an enterprise. Four of his sermons are given in Bernardi Claravall. opera V., Paris, 1719. Cf. ASCHBACH: Geschichte der Almoraviden. IERZOG.

BERNARD (Bernardus) DE BOTONO, b. in Parma, about the beginning of the thirteenth century; studied law at Bologna; became professor and canon there; went to Rome, and occupied for many years a prominent position at the papal court, but returned to lecture in Bologna; d. 1266. He is famous as the author of the so-called Glossa ordinaria to the Decretals of Gregory IX., issued probably 1240. MEJER.

BERNARD, Claude, called the "Poor Priest;" one of the most godly men of the Roman-Catholic Church during the seventeenth century, showing in his whole life what energy the romantic character can develop when deeply affected by religion; b. in Dijon, 1588; d. 1641. The son of a jurist, he studied law himself, and for a time led a licentious life, but was converted by a vision of his departed father. He became a priest, and made Paris his residence, where he exercised an extraordinary self-denial and philanthropy; gave away all he had to the poor, including an inheritance of four hundred thousand francs; spent his whole time in preaching, and visiting the poor and sick, not shrinking from the most disgusting diseases. He was a man greatly beloved and a saint, canonized, not by the Pope, but by the people. Of the sketches of his life, see especially that by L'empereur.

BERNARD OF CLUNY (not to be confounded with his namesake and contemporary of Clairvaux); b., about the middle of the twelfth century; of English parents, at Morlaix in Brittany; d. at Cluny. Nothing of his life is known, yet his memory is imperishable. He was the author of De Contemptu Mundi, a Latin poem of nearly three thousand lines, dedicated to his abbot, Peter the Venerable, d. 1156, general of the Benedictine order. It is a bitter satire upon the corruptions of the age, but opens with a description of the peace and glory of heaven; and this part of the poem is so exquisite, that it excites universal admiration. The earliest publication of the poem is by Matthias Flacius, in a volume of other poems calling for a reformation of ecclesiastical abuses, Basel, 1557, and five or six times since. Dr. Trench has issued ninety-six lines of it in his Sacred Latin Poetry. These extracts have been freely reproduced by the Rev. John Mason Neale (The Rhythm of Bernard de Morlaix, Monk of Cluny, on the Celestial Country, London, 1858, 3d ed., 1861); and portions of this English reproduction have passed into general use in our hymn-books as the most popular of hymns about heaven. They are, Brief Life is here our Portion (Ilic brece vivitur), For thee, O dear, dear Country! (O bona patria), and Jerusalem the Golden! (Urbs Syon urea). See them all in Schaff's Christ in Song (New York, 1868, London, 1869). The metre of the original poem is very strange: the lines are dactylic hexameters, with the iambic (sometimes a trissyllabic or dactylic) and tailed rhyme, each line being broken up in three equal parts, — a most difficult metre, which only a special grace and inspiration enabled the author, as he believed, to master. The following arrangement of the first two lines will make this intelligible: —

Eccē! minacīter || imminet arbīter || ille supremus!"

Besides Neale's free translation, there are the more literal versions of portions, by Dr. ABRAHAM COLES (N.Y., 1866), S. W. DUFFIELD (N.Y., 1867), who has attempted to reproduce the original, and D. T. MORGAN (Hymns and other Poetry of the Latin Church, London, 1880), who presents a spirited version of Urbs Syon Inclita (The Heavenly Zion).

It is worth noting that Bernard cites the case of the Biddenden Maids of Kent, l. 1013 sq., as a proof that the last days had come. See Flacius' ed., Basel, 1557, p. 283. The "Maids" were Mary and Elizabeth Chulkhurst, born at Biddenden in 1100. They were joined together by the shoulders and hips, and lived to the age of thirty-four. See BREWER: The Reader's Handbook of Allusions, etc., sub "Biddenden Maids."

BERNARDIN OF SIENNA, St., b. at Massa, 1380; d. at Aquila, May 30, 1444; entered the order of the Franciscans in 1402, and became the most famous preacher of his time, often addressing audiences of thirty thousand, and impressing people so powerfully, that the men burnt their cards and dice, the women their frivolous finery. He refused the bishoprics of Siena, Ferrara, and Urbino successively. His sermons were, like most sermons of the Franciscans, moral rather than religious. A number of them have been translated into Latin, and published in a collective edition, Paris, 1639, and Venice, 1745. He was canonized in 1450 by Nicholas V. See BERTHAUMIER: Hist. de Saint Bernardin, Paris, 1862.

BERNICE, often, but less accurately, BERENICE (victorious), was the eldest daughter of Herod Agrippa I.; betrothed at a tender age to Mark, the son of Alexander Lysimachus, the alabarch, or chief officer of the Jews, in Alexandria; but, as he died ere the marriage was consummated, she became the wife of her uncle, Herod, King of Chalcis (Joseph. Antiq. XIX. 5, 1), by whom she had two sons, Bernicianus (or Bernicianus) and Hyrcanus (Antiq. XX. 5, 2; War. II. 11, 6). Her husband died when she was but twenty years old (A. D. 48), and she went to live with her brother, Agrippa II. Rumor declared their intimacy to be criminal. She met the charge by inducing Polemon, the King of Cilicia, to be circumcised, and to marry her. Josephus thought her wealth was the main attraction. At all events, the union did not last long, and again she lived in the palace of her brother (Antiq. XX. 7, 3), with whom she visited Festus, and thus heard Paul's defence (Acts xxv. 23, xxvi. 30), A. D. 60. The bruit of their relations reached Rome, and Juvenal alludes to it (Sat. VI. 156-160). Her courage enabled her, at the risk of her own life, while in Jerusalem performing a vow, to supplicate the Roman procurator Florus to spare the poor Jews (War. II. 15, 1). She united with her brother in the attempt to dissuade the Jews from war (War. II. 16, 5). During the war she espoused the Roman side, and was the mistress of Vespasian, and then of his son Titus. She followed the latter to Rome, after the capture of Jerusalem; and so infatuated was he with her, that it is said that he desired to make her his wife, but the clamor the rumor raised obliged him to dismiss her. In A. D. 79, when Titus became sole emperor, she visited Rome again, although she was then fifty years old, to try to regain her old position; but Titus was wary, and paid her no attentions. See Tacitus, Hist. II. 81; Suetonius, Titus 7; Dio. Cass. LXVI. 15, 18. Of her later history we know nothing. Quintilian speaks (Inst. Orat. iv. 1) of having pleaded her cause on some occasion not otherwise alluded to, on which she herself sat as judge (Nolde, Hist. Idem, p. 403 sq.). Another undated fact about her is a souvenir of her visit to Athens, in the shape of the inscription upon a column, "Julia Berenice, the great Queen. To Julia, daughter of King Agrippa" (Corp. Inscript. græc. n. 361).

Bernice reminds us of Cleopatra. Both had extraordinary beauty, firm wills, and loose characters. Both were very ambitious, and fertile in resources; and both scrupled not to use their charms to gain their ends.

BERNO, d. 1048; was monk in a Benedictine monastery at Prüms, near Treves, when Henry II. made him Abbot of Reichenau in Lake Constance, 1008; accompanied Henry II. to Rome in 1014, and brought back a number of musical improvements, which he introduced in Germany; brought the school and library of Reichenau to a very flourishing condition, and built the Church of St. Mary; wrote, among other works, a Vita S. Udalrici, published, together with a German translation from the thirteenth century, at Munich in 1844; a Vita S. Meginradi, found in MABIL-LON: Ann. Ord. Berno, sæc. IV.; and musical treatises published in GERBERT: Script. Eccl. de Musica, II.

BERQUIN, Louis de, b. at Passy, about 1490; d. in Paris, April 17, 1529; studied law, and bore the reputation of being a very strict and conscientious member of the Roman Church, when a controversy with Du Chene, member of the Sorbonne, led him into the investigation of Luther's writings and the great reformatory questions of the day. But Luther's writings had been forbidden by the Parliament of Paris; and when some of them were found in Berquin's study he was imprisoned (Aug. 1, 1523), and released only by the mediation of Louise of Savoy. He now retired to his estates in Artois; but he did not desist from his investigations, nor conceal the result of them. He translated the Enchiridion of Erasmus, with notes, and wrote several polemical tracts. On the instance of the Bishop of Amiens, he was again imprisoned (Jan. 10, 1526), and a formal process of heresy was instituted against him. This time, too, he was saved, but only by the interference of the King himself. His friends advised him to leave the country, or at least to keep silent; but this he considered to be against his conscience. He directly attacked the Sorbonne, its members and its tenets; and now his doom was sealed. Imprisoned for the third time (in the beginning of March, 1529), he was sentenced (April 16) to have his tongue pierced by a hot iron, and to remain in prison for the rest of his life. He appealed to the King; but this irritated his judges to such a degree, that by a second sentence they condemned him to be burned alive; and the sentence was immediately executed in the Grève-place, April 22, 1529. He was the first Protestant martyr in France.

BERRUYER, Joseph Isaac, b. at Rouen, 1681; d. in Paris, 1758; was a Jesuit, and became famous by his Histoire du peuple de Dieu, a kind of transcription or paraphrase of the Bible, of which the first part, the Old Testament, appeared in seven volumes, 1728; the second, the Gospels, in four volumes, 1753; and the third, the Epistles, in 1758, after the death of the author. The first part is an obscene romance, full of indecent descriptions; the third is a scandalous absurdity, drawing the Christian doctrines—for instance, that of the Trinity—down into scurrility; the second is a transition from the one to the other. When the first part appeared, the bishops of France protested; and a party within the order itself compelled the general to command a new and expurgated edition. When the second part appeared, the protest of the French Church was repeated with increased energy; and the Pope put the book on the Index, repeatedly condemning it as an abominable offence. Nevertheless, the Jesuits published the third part, had the book translated into foreign languages, and reprint it every now and then.

BERTHIER, Guillaume Francois, b. at Issoudan, in the Department of Indre, April 7, 1704; d. at Bourges, Dec. 15, 1782; was a Jesuit; continued the Histoire de l'Eglise Gallicane of Brunoy down to 1529; edited for some time the Journal de Trevoux. was appointed tutor to the children of the Dauphin after the suppression of his order, but banished from the country in 1764. His Œuvres Spirituelles were published in five volumes, in Paris, 1811.

BERTHOLD THE FRANCISCAN (Frater Perholtus), b. at Ratisbon about 1220; d. there Dec. 14, 1272; entered the order of the Franciscans; was ordained priest, and started in 1252 on a tour as itinerant preacher, through Bavaria, Alsace, Switzerland, Austria, Bohemia, Moravia, and Silesia, gathering immense crowds wherever he came, and addressing people, both in the churches and in the open field. A selection of his sermons was first published in Berlin, 1824, edited by C. F. KLING; a complete edition appeared in Vienna, 1862, by F. PREIFFER; a translation into New High-German, by F. GÜBEL, 1850. Berthold was strongly opposed to the frivolous preachers of indulgence, and to the false confidence in the power of the saints.

BERTHOLD OF CHIEMSEE, b. at Salzburg, 1465; d. at Saalfelden, July 19, 1543; was made Bishop of Chiemsee in 1508, but resigned in 1525. He was probably author of the Onus Ecclesie, which appeared anonymously at Landshut in 1524, and gives a trenchant description of the corruption of the Roman Church, both in head and in members. In his retirement he wrote the Teutsche Theology, which appeared (1528) in Munich, and (1531), in Latin translation, at Augsburg. It is a scholastic development of the doctrinal system of the Roman Church, held polemically against the reformatory movement, but able and original. The book, in German, with dictionary, and a life of the author, was republished at Munich in 1852, edited by W. REITHMEIER.

BERTHOLD, Leonhard, b. at Emskirchen, Bavaria, May 8, 1774; d. at Erlangen, March 22, 1822; studied theology and Oriental philology in the University of Erlangen, where he was appointed extraordinary professor of philosophy in 1805, and full professor of theology in 1806, in consequence of his important work upon Daniel, Erlangen, 1806–1808, 2 vols. His principal work is, Historisch-kritische Einleitung in die sammtlichen kanonischen u. apocryphischen Schriften des A. und N. Testaments, Erlangen, 1812–19, 6 vols. Of less interest is his Einleitung in d. theol. Wissenschaft, 2 vols., 1821–22; and of still less, his Handbuch d. Dogmengeschichte, 2 vols., 1822–23. As a teacher, however, and as editor of the Kritische

Journal der neuesten theol. Litteratur, one of the principal organs of the rationalistic party, his activity was stimulating in many ways.

BERTHOLD, Apostle of Livonia, formerly Abbot of the Cistercian Monastery of Lokkum; was in 1196 consecrated, by the Archbishop of Bremen, bishop, and the successor of Meinhard, the first missionary and bishop of the Livonians. He pursued a different policy from his predecessors; for he sought not only to convert, but also to subjugate, the heathen. For this purpose he raised in Lower Germany a crusading army, embarked at Lübeck, and sailed to the mouth of the Düna. There he gave battle to the Letts, gained a victory, but was killed July 24, 1198. (See ALBERT OF RIGA.) WINTER: Die Cistercienser des nordöstlichen Deutschlands, Gotha, 1868.

BÉRULLE, Pierre de, b. near Troyes, Feb. 4, 1575; d. in Paris suddenly, while celebrating mass, Oct. 2, 1629, was educated by the Jesuits, and an intimate friend of François de Sales; enjoyed the confidence of Louis XIII., and was well received in court-circles, especially among ladies; introduced the Spanish order of St. Thérèse, and founded, in spite of the opposition of the Jesuits, the Congregation of the Oratory; was used in many important diplomatic negotiations, and made a cardinal in 1627. A common rumor said that he was poisoned by Richelieu. His works were collected by P. BOURGOING, in 2 vols., 1644, new ed., 1856. His life has been written by HABERT DE CERISI, 1646, TABARAUD, 1818, and NOURISSON, 1856.

BERYLLUS, Bishop of Bostra in Arabia, in the middle of the third century; entertained certain heretical views concerning the person of Christ, but was brought back to the Orthodox faith by Origen. His views are known to us only from one passage in Eusebius, Hist. Eccl., VI. 33 (he is mentioned VI. 20); and very different conceptions of them have been advanced by Schleiermacher, Neander, Dorner, Baur, Nitzsch, etc.

BESCHITZI, Elijah, d. in 1491, at Adrianople, where he was born, and where, in 1460, he succeeded his father as chief of the Karaite Jews. He left an unfinished work, Aderet Elijahou (mantle of Elijah), which was completed in 1497 by his brother-in-law, Caleb Afendopulo, and published at Constantinople in 1531 by his grandson, and which is held in the greatest esteem by all Karaites, because it is based on thorough knowledge of the whole earlier Karaite literature, which is now mostly lost. There is an edition of this work by FIRKOWITZ, Eupatoria, 1835.

BESSARION, b. at Trebizond, 1395; d. at Ravenna, Nov. 19, 1472; was educated in Constantinople, where he studied under Chrysokokkes; entered the order of the Basilians in 1423, and continued his studies in Peloponnesus, under Gemistus Pletho; was made Archbishop of Nicæa in 1437, and accompanied, in the following year, the emperor, John VII. Palæologus, on his voyage to Italy to solicit the aid of Western Europe against the Turks. The condition for this aid seemed to be a reconciliation between the Greek and Roman churches; and at the councils of Ferrara and Florence such a reconciliation was actually brought about, chiefly through the exertions of Bessarion. But the effect was quite the opposite of what had been expected, and Bessarion remained in Italy. He was made a cardinal, and continued to labor for his unhappy fatherland, and in a certain respect he also became a mediator between Greece and Rome. He gathered a large circle of scholars, Greek and Latin, in his palace; encouraged with profuse liberality the study of the antique literatures; collected a great library, which he bequeathed to Venice, and which was the first public library in Europe; translated Greek authors into Latin, and wrote himself in Latin: in short, he was one of the chief leaders in the movement called the Renaissance. His works, among which the Contra Calumniatorem Platonis is the most celebrated, have never been collected, and remain mostly unprinted. See FABRICIUS: Bib. græca X. p. 401, XI. p. 680; H. VAST: Le Cardinal Bessarion, Paris, 1879.

BESSEL, Gottfried, b. Sept. 5, 1672, at Buchheim, near Mayence; d. at Gottweich, near Vienna, in 1749; studied at Würzburg and Salzburg; entered the order of the Benedictines in 1693; was ordained priest in 1696, and was by the Archbishop of Mayence used in various diplomatic negotiations. In 1707 he converted the Princess Elizabeth Christine of Brunswick to Romanism, and in 1710 her grandfather, Duke Anton Ulrich, on which occasion he published anonymously his Quinquaginta . . . Motiva or, in German, Fünfzig Bedenken, which attracted some attention. In 1714 he was made Abbot of the Monastery of Gottweich, and in 1732 he began the publication of his Chronicon Godwicense, which, however, was never finished.

BETH-AB'ARA (house of the ford) is, according to the received text since Origen, the name of the place upon the Jordan where John baptized (John i. 28). But the most ancient manuscripts read Bethany; and this is the reading adopted by the New Testament revisers, and is correct. As Canon Westcott says, "Bethabara is a mere correction, made as early as the second century, for Bethany, which was probably an obscure village in Perea, and not to be confounded with Bethany on the Mount of Olives." Bible Com. in loco. Origen could not find any such place upon that river, and decided for the present reading; and all the Fathers followed him. In Judg. vii. 24 there is a Beth-barah; but this was situated on the right bank, and not, like Bethabara, upon the left bank of the Jordan, below Bethsan. Lieut. Conder proposes to identify Beth-abara with Abarah, a leading ford of the Jordan on the road to Gilead.

BETH'ANY (house of misery), because of its lonely situation, and because lepers, popularly called the "poor," sought asylum there; others, house of dates, a village situated on the eastern slope of Mount Olivet, to the left of the road leading from Jerusalem to Jericho, fifteen furlongs from the former city (about two miles), and ever memorable for its associations with Jesus (Matt. xxi. 17; Mark xi. 11, 12; John xi.) It is now called, from the miracle, et-Azriyeh, "place of Lazarus." Simon the leper also lived here (Mark xiv. 3); and from here our Lord ascended (Luke xxiv. 50). "It is now a poor mountain hamlet of forty rude stone houses inhabited by Moslems."

BETH'EL (house of God), a place twelve miles north of Jerusalem, now called Beitin, but originally Luz, the residence of a Canaanitish king (Josh. viii. 9 sq., xii. 16; Judg. i. 23, 26), and associated with the patriarchs (Gen. xiii. 3, xxviii. 17-19, xxxv. 3). Joshua assigned the town to Benjamin as its frontier town towards Ephraim (Josh. xviii. 13, 22). It formed part of the Northern Kingdom; and Jeroboam made it the chief seat of the calf-worship (1 Kings xii. 28-33, xiii. 1). The reason of its selection was probably its sacred character from patriarchal times, and the presence there of the ark and the tabernacle for so long a time (see marg. Judg. xx. 18, 26, 31, xxi. 2; cf. 1 Sam. x. 3). In manifestation of Jehovah's anger at this desecration, the prophet Hosea calls it Beth-aven (house of nothingness, or idols); and Amos (v. 5) solemnly warns the people against entering the town. After the captivity it was again inhabited by the Benjamites (Neh. xi. 31). In the time of the Maccabees it was fortified by Bacchides, the general of Demetrius, the usurper of the kingdom of Syria (Joseph., Antiq. XIII. 1, 3). It is not named in the New Testament; but Josephus tells us it was taken by Vespasian (War. IV. 9, 9). It is now a miserable village of about four hundred inhabitants standing amid ruins which cover about four acres. (Bädeker).

BETHES'DA (house of mercy, or of the flowing water), a pool in Jerusalem near the sheep-gate (Neh. iii. 1, 32, xii. 39; John v. 2). Tradition incorrectly identifies it with the modern Birket-Israil, which is an empty reservoir within the city, three hundred and sixty feet long, one hundred and twenty feet wide, and eighty feet deep, half filled with rubbish. But it is a problem where Bethesda really was. The guide in these identifications should be the statement of Nehemiah, that the sheep-gate was near, and on the north, or more probably north-east, side of the temple. Robinson identified it with the intermittent Pool of the Virgin, in the Kedron Valley, which answers one of the conditions of John's narrative; but it is much too small, and does not yield sufficient space for the five porches. Capt. Warren identifies it with the double pool under the Convent of the Sisters of Zion, near the north-west corner of the Haram enclosure. In corroboration is the mention by Eusebius of two pools lying in juxtaposition, of which one was the sheep-pool. But a better identification is with the half-filled water reservoir adjoining the Church of St. Anne, which the older writers call the "piscina interior." In the time of the Crusades it was distinguished from Birket Israil, called the Sheep-pool; and around it five porches were traced. This is in all probability the same as the "piscina natatoria" (swimming-basin) in Itiner. Antonini Placentini of the sixth century.

This identification may be perhaps to-day considered certain. That it preserved its curative properties is proven by the votive tablet found in the Church of St. Anne, which dates from the end of the first or the beginning of the second century. The giver was Pompeia Lucilia, possibly some great lady who repaired the porches ruined during the siege. Perhaps she was the daughter of Lucilius Bassus, Roman legate in Palestine after the capture of Jerusalem (Josephus, War. VII. 6, 1 and 4).

The name Bethesda in original form and meaning is uncertain. The common interpretation is given above; but on the ground of the usage of the second component, Delitzsch proposed "house of the portico," and Canon Westcott, "house of the olive" (Bible Commentary in loco).

See article in Riehm's Handwörterbuch des biblischen Altertums, and in Lichtenberger's Encyclopédie des Sciences Religieuses.

BETH-HO'RON (house of the hollow), the name of two places, the "Upper" and the "Nether" Beth-horon (Josh. xvi. 5, 3), about three miles apart, on the opposite sides of a ravine or steep pass, now distinguished in like manner, and called Beit Ur et-Tahla and El Foka. The Upper is admirably situated upon the top of a mountain spur; but the Nether was more important. Both are now uninhabited. The towns lay upon the boundary line between Benjamin and Ephraim, and were counted with the latter (Josh. xxi. 22). They were upon the road from Gibeon to Azekah and the Philistine Plain. Through the pass between them fled the Amorites after the battle of Gibeon (Josh. x. 10 sq.). Solomon fortified both villages (1 Kings ix. 17; 2 Chr. viii. 5). Judas Maccabæus fought two battles there (1 Macc. iii. 16 sq., vii. 39 sq.), and there was the army of Cestius Gallus surrounded, and almost entirely destroyed (Joseph., War. II. 19, 8). In the days of Eusebius and Jerome the two Beth-horons were small villages. From their time the places appear to have been unnoticed until 1801; then again, until Dr. Robinson visited them in 1838, and afterwards described them, they are not mentioned.

BETH'LEHEM (house of bread), the modern Beitlahm, the name of two towns spoken of in the Bible. 1. A town in Zebulun (Josh. xix. 15), now a poor village, six miles west of Nazareth.

2. Bethlehem-Judah, as it is called in Judg. xvii. 7, 9, xix. 1, 2, 18, and Bethlehem-Ephrath in Micah v. 2, to distinguish it from the preceding. Ephrath, or Ephrathah (the fruitful) (Gen. xxxv. 19, xlvi. 7; Ruth iv. 11; Ps. cxxxii. 6), was, perhaps, not originally the name of the city, but a description of the locality in which it lay, and one which answers now; for the modern like the ancient Bethlehem is built upon a hill, and all about it are ridges of terraced vineyards, and gardens with evergreen olives, and luxuriant fig-trees. The wine of Bethlehem is considered better than that of Jerusalem. The women rival their Christian sisters of Nazareth. Here is an air of industry, thrift, and comfort, which are very rare in the East. The inhabitants (about five thousand) are almost all Christians, the Mohammedan quarter having been destroyed in 1834.

It is worthy of notice, that, in 1 Chron. ii. 19, an Ephrath appears as the wife of Caleb, and mother of Hur, whose son Salma founded Bethlehem (vers. 51, 54). But Salmah (Ruth iv. 20, marg.), or Salmun (ver. 21), was the father of Boaz. Hur was also the grandfather of Bezaleel, who superintended the work of the tabernacle; and, since trades are singularly fixed in the East, it may well be that the father of David, as the Targum of Jonathan relates, was a "weaver of the veils of the sanctuary;" and thus the town of Bethlehem was connected in memory with the heroic Caleb, with Bezaleel the builder of the tabernacle, and with David the poet-king.

But the "little" city had no lack of memories. Here, long before Caleb's day, had Rachel brought forth Benoni, and yielded up her life for her child. On the spot where she died, Jacob erected a pillar; and a little white Mohammedan mosque reminds every passer-by of the touching incident of patriarchal life (Gen. xxxv. 16-20, xlviii. 7). Here, in the days of the Judges, was the scene of the charming idyl of Ruth. Here David was born. For a draught from the well at its gate he longed on one occasion, but would not take it when the three heroes broke through the ranks of the Philistines and brought it to him, because it was, in his estimation, "the blood of men" (1 Chron. xi. 15-19). Rehoboam fortified Bethlehem (2 Chron. xi. 6). Mention is made of the khan, or caravanerai of Chimham, close to Bethlehem, as a resting-place or starting-point for travellers on the way to Egypt, which gives rise to the very probable supposition that Chimham, the son of Barzillai, received from David, as a recognition of his father's fidelity and self-sacrifice, a possession, perhaps a Davidic family property, upon which he built a khan. "Children of Bethlehem" returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon (Ez. ii. 21; Neh. vii. 26).

But all these facts and incidents connected with Bethlehem are of little moment, compared with the one transcendent event which there took place. "Hic de virgine Maria Jesus Christus natus est" (Here Jesus Christ was born of the Virgin Mary.)

Tradition pointed out, even in Justin Martyr's day, in the middle of the second century, a cave in which the Lord of life saw light; and it is every way likely that for once tradition and fact coincide. Over the spot, Constantine, or rather Helena his mother, erected a basilika (A. D. 327), the oldest church in Christendom, which still stands as part of the present Church of the Nativity, or of St. Mary. Here Jerome lived for thirty years, and made his so-called Vulgate translation of the Bible, and died (419). The church escaped destruction by the Moslems, it is said by a miracle, 1010; and here Baldwin was crowned king, 1101; and in 1110 Bethlehem was raised to the rank of an episcopal see. The church was thoroughly restored, and munificently decorated, by the Byzantine Emperor Manuel Comnenos (1143-80). The church was covered with lead. In 1482 the roof was repaired, Edward IV. of England giving the lead. But toward the end of the eighteenth century the Turks turned the lead roof to account by making bullets out of it. During the present century the roof has been again repaired.

The present church, like the Church of the Holy Sepulchre in Jerusalem, is singularly comprehensive of "holy places." It is entered through the Latin Monastery, which looks like a mediæval fortress. (The Greeks and Armenians have monasteries in contiguous buildings.) In the crypt beneath it is shown, in the "Chapel of the Nativity," the place where Christ was born.

Opposite, and three steps down, is the Chapel of the Manger, in which there is a marble manger. The original (?) wooden one was taken by Pope Sixtus V. to Rome, and set up in the Church of Santa Maria Maggiore. In the same extensive crypt are other chapels, called after different events or persons, the most interesting of which is the Chapel of St. Jerome, the cell in which the great scholar lived and worked. See TOBLER: Bethlehem in Palestina, St. Gallen ũ. Bern, 1849; [ROBINSON: Researches; SCHAFF: Through Bible Lands, 1879.] FR. W. SCHULTZ.

BETHLEHEMITES is the name of two orders of monks. I. The origin of the first is very obscure. It was established at Cambridge in 1257: its members wore a red star on the breast, symbolizing the star which led the wise men to Bethlehem. II. The founder of the second order was a Franciscan monk, Pierre de Bethencourt; b. in 1619; d. in 1667. It was confirmed by Innocent XI. in 1687. Its principal seat is Guatemala, and it numbers in Central America about forty houses. Its members follow the rule of St. Augustine, and wear around the neck a medallion with a representation of the birth of Christ in Bethlehem. To attend the sick is the main object of the order.

BETH'PHAGÈ (house of figs), a place near Bethany upon the Mount of Olives. Tradition locates it half way between the summit of the Mount and Bethany; but more probably it was on the road from Bethany to Jerusalem, and at the spot where the holy city first becomes visible to one coming from the east.

BETHPHANY, a primitive name for the festival best known in the West as the Epiphany.

BETHSAI'DA (house of fish), the appropriate name of two places upon the shore of Galilee's lake.

1. Bethsaida of Galilee, the birthplace of Andrew, Peter, and Philip (John i. 44 sq., xii. 21), the scene of many a miracle of Christ (Matt. xi. 21; Luke x. 13), was upon the west shore in or by the "land of Gennesaret," i. e., the plain of Ghuzeir, not far from Capernaum (Mark vi. 45, cf. ver. 53; John vi. 17, 24). But the nearer identification depends upon that of CAPERNAUM (which see), and that is a vexed question.

2. Bethsaida Julias, often mentioned by Josephus (Antiq. XVIII. 2, 1), known to Pliny, in Lower Gaulonitis, just where the Jordan empties itself into the lake. Originally a village, Philip the tetrarch enlarged it into a city, and named it Julias, in honor of Julia, the daughter of Augustus, and wife of Tiberius. In its neighborhood the feeding of the five thousand took place (Luke ix. 10).

Some scholars, e. g., Dr. W. M. Thomson, declare that the two Bethsaidas were really only the east and west parts of one city, which was built upon the Jordan at the place it enters the lake now called Abu Zany.

BETH-SHE'AN (house of quiet), BETH'SHAN, or BETH'SAN, was situated in the territory of Manasseh (Josh. xvii. 11), and commanded the entrance of the Valley of Jezreel where it opens into the Jordan Valley. It is on the road from Jerusalem to Damascus, and is about three miles from the Jordan. It remained in the hands of the Canaanites until the time of David; there the corpse of Saul was exhibited (Judg. i. 27; 1 Sam. xxxi. 10). Under Solomon it formed part of one of the twelve commissariat districts (1 Kings iv. 12). The Greeks called it Nyssa, or Nysa, in honor of Dionysus (Bacchus), probably because of its wine; but it was more generally called Scythopolis, the city of the Scythians (Jud. iii. 10; 2 Macc. xii. 29 sq.), because, in the second half of the seventh century B.C., the country was invaded by the Scythians on their way to Egypt, and a few of them settled in Bethshean. This circumstance explains how the city was considered non-Jewish and unholy (2 Macc. xii. 30; Joseph., War, II. 18, 1, 3, 4; Life, 6). It belonged to the Decapolis, and it was here that Alexander Jannæus made the alliance with Cleopatra (Joseph., Antiq. XVIII. 13, 2). Scythopolis became an episcopal see. It is now called Beisan, and contains many interesting ruins of temples, a large theatre, a Roman arch; and about it are many ancient tombs.

BETH-SHEMESH (house of the sun). 1. The same as Irshemesh, "city of the sun," and Mount Heres "mountain of the sun" (Josh. xix. 41; Judg. i. 35), a sacerdotal city near Kirjath-jearim, and about fourteen miles from Jerusalem. It is noted as the place to which the ark was returned, and at which Jehoash, King of Israel, defeated and took prisoner Amaziah, King of Judah (2 Kings xiv. 11). Under Ahaz the Philistines occupied it and other towns in the locality (2 Chron. xxviii. 18). Upon its site to-day is the ruined village of Ain Shems, "fountain of the sun," which is evidently constructed of ancient materials.

2, 3. There were two other places of this name: one was in the tribe of Issachar (Josh. xix. 22); the other was Phœnician in origin (Josh. xix. 38; Judg. i. 33), and belonged to Naphtali, but was not occupied by that tribe.

Beth-shemesh is the name Jeremiah gives to Heliopolis, or On in Egypt (Jer. xliii. 13). The meaning is identical.

BETH'ULIA (virgin of Jehovah) was the centre of the events recorded in the apocryphal Book of Judith, but is not elsewhere mentioned. Its situation is very minutely described, — among the mountains of Ephraim, south of the Valley of Jezreel, and near Dothaim (Dothan), and on a mountain which overlooked the plain of Esdraelon, and commanded the passes from that plain to the hill-country of Manasseh. Strange as it may seem, it has not been identified, although many attempts have been made. If the place is not an imaginary one, as may well be, it is probably an altered name.

BETHUNE, George Washington, b. in New York city, March 18, 1805; d. in Florence, Italy, April 27, 1862. He was graduated from Dickinson College, Carlisle, Penn., 1823; entered the Princeton Theological Seminary; was married 1825; licensed by the Second Presbytery of New York, July 11, 1826; was missionary to the colored people and sailors at Savannah, Ga., for a year, — a post for which his perfect familiarity with nautical phrases, and his great love of human nature, eminently fitted him. He then began his regular ministry, and was, in succession, pastor of the following churches in the Reformed (Dutch) denomination: Rhinebeck, 1827–30; Utica, 1830–34; First Church, Philadelphia, 1834–37; Third Church, organized by him, 1837–49; Central Church, Brooklyn, 1849–50; Church on the Heights, organized for him, 1850–59; associate minister in Twenty-first Street Church, New York, 1859–62. He was in his day one of the most eloquent preachers and public speakers in the country; but he was, besides, a scholar, a theologian, and a poet. He was a very lovable man. His publications were numerous. His most valued are: Early Lost, Early Saved, with original poem, Phil., 1846; The British Female Poets, with biographical and critical notices, Phil., 1848; Lays of Love and Faith, Phil., 1848; Memoirs of Mrs. Joanna Bethune, N.Y., 1857; Expository Lectures on the Heidelberg Catechism, N.Y., 1864. He also edited with rare skill and con amore, for he was an enthusiastic fisherman, Walton's Complete Angler, N.Y., 1847, new ed. 1880, 2 vols.

See Memoirs of Rev. George W. Bethune, D.D., by Rev. A. R. Van Nest, D.D., N.Y., 1867.

BETH'-ZUR (house of the rock), in the mountains of Judah, now a ruined village. Beitsur, four miles north of Hebron, was fortified by Rehoboam, and once the "strongest place in all Judæa" (Joseph., Antiq. XIII. 5, 6). As such, it played an important part in the wars of the Maccabees (1 Macc. iv. 29, vi. 32–47, xi. 65 sqq.). According to an unlikely tradition, reported by Eusebius and Jerome, the eunuch of Queen Candace was baptized by Philip at Ain ed-Dirweh, — a spring near Beth-zur (Acts viii. 26–39).

BETKIUS, Joachim, b. Oct. 8, 1601, in Berlin; d. Dec. 12, 1663, at Linum, near Fehrbellin, where he was pastor for more than thirty years. He was a Pietist before Pietism yet existed. The cause of the religious misery of his age in Germany he ascribes to the ministers. Among his works are: Christianismus Ethnicus, Berlin, 1633; Sacerdotium, 1640; Antichristentum, Amsterdam, 1650; Excidium Germaniæ, Amsterdam, 1666.

BEVERIDGE, William, b. at Barrow in 1638; d. at Westminster, March 5, 1708; was educated at Cambridge; became Archdeacon of Colchester in 1681, and Bishop of St. Asaph in 1704. In church-history he made himself a deserved reputation by his Institutionum Chronologicarum Libri Duo, London, 1669; and in canon law, by the edition and interpretation of its sources, Συνοδικον sive Pandectæ Canonum S. Apost. et Concil., Oxford, 1672. His collected works, including his Private Thoughts upon Religion, and Doctrine of the Church of England, were published in 9 vols., London, 1824, and, more complete, in 12 vols., Oxford, 1844–48. He has been styled "the great reviver and restorer of primitive piety." He was very learned, earnest, and devout, and justly esteemed.

BEZA, Theodore (originally de Bésze), the friend and biographer of Calvin; b. in Vezelai Castle in Burgundy, where his father was governor, June 24, 1519; d. in Geneva, Oct. 15, 1605. When only three years old, his uncle, Nicholas de Beza, a counsellor of the Parliament of France, took him to Paris, but in December, 1528, sent him to Orléans, to be educated by Melchior Wolmar, the Greek teacher of Calvin, a Suabian scholar of eminence, and a Protestant withal. With Wolmar he lived until 1534, when the latter returned to Germany. From May, 1535, to August, 1539, he was a student of law at the University of Orléans; but, when he had received the degree of licentiate in law, he began his practice in Paris. Not being fond of the law, but devoted to poetry, rarely gifted, a poet and a scholar, of high social position, abundantly supplied with money,—for, although not in orders, he enjoyed the income of two benefices, with the prospect before him of being the heir of his other uncle, Claudius, the Abbot of Froimont,—it was natural that he should yield to the seductions of the gay capital, and live among his social equals, the wits, the scholars, and the beauties of Paris. Proof is lacking that Beza was ever grossly immoral. He was probably more frivolous than criminal. Even his impure relations with Claude Desnoz were not so reprehensible as they have been represented; for he was faithful to her, and at last fulfilled his promise to marry her. In 1548 he published his Juvenilia, a collection of Latin poems, and thereby won the reputation of being the best Latin poet of his day. But in that year he had a severe sickness, which sobered him. The instructions of the pious Wolmar influenced him thus late; and at length he resolved to leave his sinful life, give up his benefices, and go to Geneva. This he did. By advice of Calvin he publicly professed the Protestant faith, and married his mistress. In November, 1549, he was appointed professor of Greek in the Academy of Lausanne; but he did not confine his energies to that department. He revived the sacred dramas of the middle ages, and wrote (1550) a highly successful one, called Abraham's Sacrifice, in which he cleverly contrasted Roman-Catholicism with Protestantism. He aided Calvin in his commentaries upon Paul's Epistles and the Epistle to the Hebrews; defended the burning of Servetus; attempted to unite Swiss and German Protestants in protesting against the French persecution of the Waldenses in Piedmont, but failed, owing to untimely disputes about the Lord's Supper, and got more blame than praise for his attempt. In the fall of 1558 he removed to Geneva, to be professor in the academy there. He was also from this time the coadjutor of Calvin. His career was brilliant. In 1560 he issued his completed metrical translation of the Psalter, upon which he had been engaged for a number of years. He finished the work of Clement Marot, who had translated fifty. The reception of this work was most enthusiastic. It may be said, indeed, that the French Reformed Church dates from its first use. In 1561, in the Abbey of Poissy, near Paris, upon the 9th of September, Beza stood in the presence of a brilliant assembly of nobles and clergy, presided over by the young King, Charles IX. With learning, with eloquence, with spiritual fervor, he pleaded for his beloved Protestantism. Whatever may have been the hopes of the different debaters, the debate did no good, except that it established Beza as the head of the Reformed Church. Calvin died May 27, 1564. Beza naturally furnished his biography, and with great reluctance, as far as he could, took his place. Like him, he was the soul of the educational and ecclesiastical affairs; but he relaxed somewhat the governmental rigor. His thorough-going defence of Calvin's view of the Lord's Supper brought him into conflict with the Lutherans, as at Mömpelgard (1585), in debate with Andrea; and with Zwinglians, as in debate with Bullinger and Ramus (1571).

In 1588 his beloved but childless wife died; and he married, in order to have the care he needed, a widow, Catharine del Piano. Up to his sixty-fifth year he was singularly free from sickness, notwithstanding his incessant labors; but the last twenty years of his life were one long struggle against disease. Gradually he gave his attention to fewer and fewer objects, though much of his old fire was left him still; for he replied in a vigorous satire to the story, circulated industriously by the Roman-Catholics, that he had recanted upon his death-bed. He resigned all his official positions in 1600, and breathed out his noble, devoted Christian life five years later.

The literary labors of Beza were long-continued and fruitful. In addition to those already mentioned, he wrote, omitting very many minor publications, 1. Epistola magistri Benedicti Passavantii, Paris, 1551 (a satire, written in macaronic verse, directed against President, afterward Abbot Lizet, a violent persecutor). 2. De hæreticis a civili magistratu puniendis, Geneva, 1554 (a defence of the burning of Servetus). 3. Annotationes in Novum Testamentum, Parisii, 1556, fol. 4. Novum Testamentum Domini nostri Jesu Christi latine jam olim e veteri interprete, nunc denuo a Th. Beza versum cum eiusdem annotationibus, in quibus ratio interpretationis redditur, Geneva, 1556, fol. (a faithful and elegant translation). 5. Confessio christianæ fidei et eiusdem collatio cum papisticis hæresibus, Geneva, 1560. This masterly defence of the Reformed faith appeared originally in French. It was translated into English, London, 1563 and 1565. 6. Vie de I. Calvin, Geneva, 1563 or 1564. But his most valuable work was, 7. Iesu Christi D. N. Novum testamentum sive novum fœdus, cuius græco textui respondent interpretationes duæ, una, vetus, altera, nova, Theodori Bezae, diligenter ab eo recognita. Eiusdem Th. Bezae annotationes, quas iidem in hac secunda editione recognovit et accessione non parva locupletavit. Indices etiam duo, theologis (præsertim Hebraicæ, Græcæ et Latine lingue studiosis) multum profuturi adiecti sunt. [Genevæ,] Anno 1565., Henr. Stephanus. Beza had received, from the library of the elder Robert Stephens, a copy of the New Testament, to which was added readings from several more manuscripts than the father had used in his third edition (1550). In Beza's second edition (1582), called, however, upon the titlepage, tertia editio, much help was derived from the uncial manuscripts, Codex D. Gosp. and Acts (Codex Bezae, Græco-Latinus, now in the library of the University of Cambridge, to which Beza presented it in 1581), and Codex Claramontanus, of the Pauline Epistles, now in Paris [see BIBLE-TEXT, New Testament], from the Peshito, and a Latin translation of the Arabic version. The third edition appeared in 1589, also under the date 1588; and the fourth (1598), which differs little from the third, is less accurate, and was reprinted in Cambridge, 1642. The counting of the above edition is confused by Beza's improper reckoning of his Latin edition of 1557 (the titlepage gives 1556, the last page, 1557) as his first edition, which, as it does not contain the Greek text, it certainly was not. The latter editions of Beza were the main basis of the authorized English version, not only because they were the latest and the best, but also because Beza, the surviving patriarch of the Reformers, exerted by his Latin version and exegetical notes a marked influence upon the King James' translators, as he had previously upon the Genevan (1557 and 1560). The Histoire ecclésiastique des Eglises réformées, Antwerp, 1580, is falsely attributed to him.

BIBLE. The older Protestant theologians, under the title Affectiones Scripturæ Sacræ, put together the particular attributes of the Bible as the inspired rule of faith and practice. a. The primary attributes, such as come directly from the divine origin and canonicity of the Scriptures: 1. Divine authority, in opposition to the Socinians, who underrated the Old Testament, and to the Roman Church, which grounds the authority of the Scriptures upon the Church. This attribute itself is partly an authority to bind men to believe what it teaches, and partly the final appeal in germane questions. The Scriptures had divine authority as the highest law and the supreme court. 2. Sufficiency. The Bible contains all that is requisite for Christian faith and life, and for the attainment of heaven. 3. Perspicuity, in opposition to Roman-Catholic notions of vagueness and obscurity, and Arminian and Socinian denial of the necessity of the Spirit's aid to understand the Bible. Clearness was, indeed, only predicated of the Bible as a whole: portions were allowed to be obscure; e.g., the Revelation, and parts of Ezekiel and Daniel. It was necessary to believe only the "saving truths;" and to these the historical portions of the Bible and the dogmatics of the schools did not belong. Nor was it asserted that every saving truth could be instantly grasped. There were truths only the regenerate could understand, and they not without prayer and divine aid, a knowledge of the language, and a mature and unprejudiced mind. 4. To the Scriptures was attributed a power of Self-interpretation: Scripture interprets Scripture. See HERMENEUTICS. 5. Divine efficacy, as against the Quakers and others who saw in the Scripture only "dead letters." The Truth of Scripture is usually reckoned in the first class; but this attribute is so bound up with that of inspiration, that it does not require to be enumerated separately. b. The secondary attributes of Holy Scripture, or such as come indirectly from the same sources: 1. Necessity. A revelation, if made, must be contained in writing. Neither an "inner light" nor simple tradition will afford sufficient surety. 2. Integrity. Nothing necessary to the canon has been lost: the lost books were either uninspired, or designed simply for local use. 3. Uncorrupted text. The Hebrew of the Old Testament, and the Greek of the New Testament, have come down to us as written. 4. Accessibility. The Bible is adapted to the reading of all ages, classes, and sexes.

The modern Protestant theologians have modified the definition of these predicates; yet they express substantially the mind of evangelical Christendom. H. PARET (RUD. KÖGEL).

BIBLE CHRISTIANS, or BRYANITES, a sect closely resembling the Methodists, from whom they differ merely in having a more popular form of church-government, consisting of equal numbers of ministers and laymen, in rejecting the title "Reverend," on the ground that it introduces distinctions in the body of Christ, and in giving women the fullest liberty to preach. But in doctrine and practice they are like the Methodists. In the United States there is only one congregation, which is in Philadelphia, and calls Rev. William Cowherd, who left the ministry of the Church of England in 1800, its founder. In England, in 1876, they numbered 368 chapels and 14,352 members, with 65 preachers and 957 local preachers; in Canada, 135 chapels, 46 preachers, and 4,986 members; in Australia, 100 chapels, 34 preachers, 147 local preachers, and 2,045 members. All these claim to be the spiritual children of Rev. William Bryan of Cornwall, who left the Wesleys in 1815. Hence the name sometimes given to them.

BIBLES, PICTURED, and BIBLICAL PICTURES. Pictured Bibles have existed from the dawn of printing. Indeed, long before, in the earliest Christian days, miniatures were painted with loving care by holy hands upon the Bible parchment-rolls; for just as the ancients had illustrated Homers and Virgils, so the Christians had illustrated Bibles. The great number of these little pictures thus made, and the great beauty of many of them, attest the skill, the industry, and the piety of the makers. An instance of great interest is Codex Σ (which see under BIBLE TEXT, NEW TESTAMENT). But the cost of these pictures excluded the people from possessing them, or even seeing them. When, however, woodcuts were invented, and the printing-press set up, the people could share in whatever profit these pictures afforded. Long before the Reformation, Martin Schön in Kolmar issued a book of the life and sufferings of Jesus, with excellent cuts. The Bible printed in 1477 by Anton Sorg and Zainer, in Augsburg, had woodcuts. Towards the close of the century there were more popular editions, with pictures from the Passion of our Lord, the Apocalypse (already a favorite theme for the artist), and the Canticles, besides the so-called Bible of the Poor (Biblia Pauperum),—brief biblical selections, with simple, rude woodcuts. The sixteenth-century artists put their powers at the service of the Bible, and to the present time their work remains unequalled. Albrecht Dürer (1498, 1507-13), L. Cranach (1509), Hans Scheufelen (1508), and other masters, illustrated different portions of Scripture. The Reformers made use of the same help in their work. Cuts derived from the Coburger Bible (Nürnberg, 1483), adorned the Apocalypse in even the first edition of Luther's New Testament. The Romanists followed. The Episcopal vicar, J. Beringer, in 1526-27 printed Luther's New Testament, with a few changes, but with the addition of sixty-five cuts, as did Emser in 1527, under the patronage of Duke George, much to Luther's anger, that such unwashed hands should touch his work. In 1534 Luther's Old Testament, illustrated, and the New with additional illustrations, appeared in Wittenberg. Christophorus Walther, the corrector for the press of Hans Lufft, declared that the pictures were partly of Luther's designing; and Melancthon wrote to Stigel (Sept. 26, 1544), that he sometimes busied himself with designs for Bible pictures, which he gave over to the finishing touches of Lucas Cranach, — so high was the estimation of the Reformers for pictorial effects. The Roman-Catholic improved version of Dietsberger (1534) had many woodcuts. Indeed, it was not possible in those days to get the Bible without them. The high-water mark in this line was reached in the Bible printed by Hans Kraft in Wittenberg (1572, 1574, 1576, and 1584). Besides these illustrated Scriptures, there were collections of Bible-pictures. Thus Graff issued a Bible-history (1536-53). But the best work was produced by Hans Holbein, whose inimitable Pictures from the Old Testament appeared with a Latin text in Lyons, 1538, 1543, 1547, with an English text, 1549, and with a French text, 1550. Many other similar Bible-histories followed in this century. Particularly worthy of mention is Feyerabend's (1571), a manual which sets forth the weightiest topics of biblical history and archæology by means of two hundred small woodcuts, with Latin verses attached. The letterpress was furnished by Pastor Heinrich Peter Rebenstock, and the illustrations by Jost Ammann of Zürich. Similar works were published in France and the Netherlands: Vita J. Christi, Antwerp, 1537; Figures du Vieux Testament par Tournes, Lyons, 1559; Quadrins historiques de la Bibel par Claude Paradin, 1553, which appeared also with Spanish and Italian letterpress.

Wood-engraving, the glory of the sixteenth century, did not flourish in the next centuries: the copper-plate, more pretending, less "popular," took its place. In 1607 Bodalocchio and Lanfranco issued the Raffael Bible, so called because it contained the fifty-two famous pictures, mostly from the Old Testament, with which that greatest of painters had decorated the loggia of the Vatican. In a very much lower scale of artistic merit, but much more widely circulated, and really more useful, were the Icones Biblicæ and Historiæ Sacræ (Matthæus Merian, Frankfurt, 1625-27, and, later, in German and Dutch), veritable treasures in many evangelical households of those countries. Other nations were quite as prolific as the Germans. In the eighteenth century, books of the class were multiplied. Hübner's Biblische Historien, 1714, with unspeakably bad pictures, was a prize for the youth of three generations. Another popular work was the Augsburg Histories from the Bible, Illustrated, in five parts, by Johann Ulr. Kraus (1700) often reprinted. The Dutchmen, Danckers (1700), Tafereelen (1740), and Pet. Schots (1749); the Frenchmen, Basnage (1705) and Martin (1724); the Englishmen, Clarke (1739), and Fleetwood, whose Compendious History of the Old and New Testament (1706) was illustrated with a hundred and twenty copper-plates and ran through seven editions, — and many others in these lands, issued compilations and original works upon Bible themes, with illustrations of more or less merit. In the first year of the present century there was begun in London The Holy Bible, with engravings from pictures and designs by the most eminent artists. This great work was in seven elephant folios in classic "style," but full of the modern romantic mannerisms and affectations. Such faults are glaring enough in copper and steel: in wood-engraving they are unbearable. Instead of the simple strength of the woodcut, these presented caricatures, unnatural, theatrical; and the matter was made worse when German booksellers printed the engravings from casts, e.g., the horrible cheap cuts which the Calwer Union used for the Bible histories of Dr. Barth; although in their one hundredth edition more worthy engravings were substituted. The recent effort after so-called realism has led to productions such as Brown's Self-Interpreting Bible (London and New York), with views of Bible cities and landscapes, or the German Hildburghäuser, Pracht Haushibel, published in 1830, of which a million copies have been sold. These books are in the main showy and inartistic; but of late years true art has paid deserved homage to the Word; and Olivier (1834), Oberbeck (1841), Cotta (1850), now Brockhaus, have issued illustrated Bibles which were praiseworthy. At last Julius Schnorr of Korolsfeld, a masterhand, published his drawings under the title The Bible in (240) Pictures. The publisher subsequently issued an abridgment. But there is needed a Bible for the people which shall be, like the Reformation Bibles, a true house-book, a family inheritance, loved by old and young. [Bida's beautiful illustrations to the New Testament, and Doré's (1866) on the entire Bible, deserve emphatic approval. Schaff's Popular Com. on the N. T. is richly illustrated with Bible scenes from photographs.] H. MERZ.

BIBLE-READING BY THE LAITY, AND BIBLE PROHIBITION. 1. In the Roman-Catholic Church. Upon this point, as upon so many others, the Roman-Catholic Church is agitated by conflicting opinions; but she does not allow these differences publicly to appear. Her conduct at different times has also varied. But it is a matter of complete demonstration, that the greatest of the Fathers upon whom she so fondly rests, such as Augustine, Jerome, and Gregory I., not only allowed, but commended, the reading and the study of the Scriptures; and, further, that, from the beginning, the Scriptures have been circulated in the vernacular of many nations. (See BIBLE VERSIONS.) In the middle ages, among the Romanic and Germanic peoples, there was for a long period no talk of prohibiting the reading of the Bible; although it is true the Church did not trouble herself to translate and circulate it, and looked upon the gradual spread of ignorance of Latin with great complacency, because it narrowed to extinction the circle of Bible-readers. But the growth of the Papacy was death to the study of the Bible. Gregory VII. (Hildebrand), in pious strain wrote to Duke Wrateslaw of Bohemia, in 1080, that God was pleased to allow the Holy Word to remain in some localities unknown (i.e., where Latin was not understood) in order to save the people from error.

Unhappily the appeal made to the Bible by the Cathari, Albigenses, and Waldenses, — sects of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, which strove to reform abuses, — only served to deepen the conviction of many, that the Bible was a dangerous book, because its unrestricted reading started heresies among the people. And therefore various councils, no doubt sincerely, as that of Tarazona (1234), endeavored to check its spread. And when attempts were made to spread vernacular translations of it, many were scandalized; and the Council of Oxford (1408) ordered that no one should make such a translation without the consent of his bishop and of the provincial synod. In the same spirit, Berthold, the Archbishop of Mainz (Mayence), in 1468 issued an edict against the printing of any sort of religious book in German, giving, among other reasons, the singular one, that the German language was unadapted to convey correctly religious ideas, and therefore they would be profaned.

Notwithstanding prohibitions, the editions of German and other vernacular Bibles greatly increased. When Luther's translation came out, and was so eagerly caught up, the Roman Church was compelled to take some action concerning it. Erasmus and prominent ecclesiastics had warmly recommended the reading of the Bible. But the shrewd ones among the Roman clergy saw that this advice must be rebuked by the highest authority. One of the results, therefore, of the Council of Trent (1545-63), was a regulation in regard to reading the Bible. According to Rule III. of the Ten Rules concerning Prohibited Books, the reading of versions of the Old Testament made by heretics is allowed to pious and learned men, provided they have the permission of their bishop; but no one was allowed to read an heretical version of the New Testament. Rule IV. states, that, inasmuch as the reading of the Bible in the vernacular is in general more full of danger than of use, it can be allowed only to those who are too well grounded in the faith to be shaken, and who, for that reason, have the permission of their pastors or confessors. Such reading, moreover, is to be only of approved translations, and even them booksellers cannot sell, save upon permission of the bishop. What a sad contrast to Protestantism!

The rise of Jansenism (see title) in the seventeenth century, and especially the appearance, under its encouragements, of the French New Testament of Quesnel (Paris, 1699), which had moral reflections under each verse, and was professedly intended to popularize the reading of the Bible, caused the renewal, with increased stringency, of the rules already quoted. Even that sweet spirit Fénelon considered Bible-reading dangerous to the laity. Pope Clement XI., in the famous bull Unigenitus (Sept. 8, 1713), anathematized Quesnel's version, and by so doing caused a great commotion: indeed, things came to such a pass, that the bull itself was ridiculed upon the streets of Paris. In consequence of this reception of Tridentine ideas, a milder course was adopted. But in the next century the great spread of Bibles, due to the Bible societies, awakened the solicitude of Rome. Pius VII. (1816), Leo XII. (1824), Gregory XVI. (1832), and Pius IX., tried to check the circulation of the Protestant versions, but did not forbid the reading of the Bible. Rome is no friend to education in any direction, and especially not in the Bible, because she knows full well that her distinctive doctrines are not based upon the Word, but contradict it. And so, while here and there are defenders of Bible-reading, the Church cannot consistently advocate the spread of the Bible. Strangely enough, Semler and Lessing, and other Protestant rationalists, have taken similar ground against allowing the laity to read the Bible. See ARNAULD: De la lecture de l'écriture; HAGELMEYER: Geschichte des Bibelverbots, Ulm, 1783; A. J. ONYMUS: Entwurf zu einer Geschichte des Bibelwesens, Würzburg, 1786; VAN ESS: Ueber das notwendigen u. nützliche Bibelwesen, Leipzig, 1808.

HERZOG.

2. In the Greek Church. In the Turkish Empire, as early as Cyril Lucar (d. 1638), the question of circulating the Scriptures was agitated; but the Confession of Dositheus (Q. 1) answers it in the negative as far as the common people are concerned. See Schaff's CREEDS OF CHRISTENDOM, vol. II. p. 433. In consequence, the New Greek (Romaic) translation, which was made about that time, had a very limited spread. Protestant versions have been more kindly received; and in 1817 the Patriarch of Constantinople allowed the printing and free circulation of such a New Testament, but stopped the Old Testament, because it was from the Hebrew, and not conformed strictly to the Septuagint. The unwise attempt to brave this prohibition resulted, in 1836, in the condemnation of the entire Bible as uncanonical. In Greece opinion is divided. In Russia the Czar Alexander I., in 1813, as is well known, favored the establishment of a Bible Society in St. Petersburg (see BIBLE SOCIETIES); but his successor, Nicholas I., suppressed the society in 1826, and allowed only the old Slavonic version (see under BIBLE VERSIONS) to be circulated. This was a practical prohibition of the Bible, because that version can be read by comparatively few. At no time has there been in the Greek Church the same opposition to Bible-reading as in the Roman Church; and this is particularly the case in Russia, where, at the present day, there are large sects which display considerable scriptural knowledge. Since 1869, the British and Foreign Bible Society have been able to do something. [It has, according to the seventy-sixth report (1880), agencies in St. Petersburg, Moscow, Odessa, Charkoff, Tiflis, and elsewhere. The one at Odessa was formed in 1868, and had, up to 1880, disseminated 842,560 copies: the one at St. Petersburg, formed in 1828, had disseminated 2,636,783. During the war with Turkey, in 1877, the New Testament was widely circulated in the Russian army. The holy synod allows the sale of the Scriptures only in the authorized Russian version.] GASS.

BIBLE SOCIETIES. I. British and Foreign Bible Society.—It was founded in London, March 7, 1804. Other societies had been organized previously, which partly or wholly made their object the distribution of the Bible. The principal of these were: 1. The Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge (c. 1698). Its objects were the erection of free schools, the spread of the Bible and the Prayer-Book, and religious tracts, also the support of foreign missions, especially in India. It published the Bible in English, Welsh, Manx, and Arabic. 2. The Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts (1701), with similar objects in special reference to the American Colonies. 3. The Scottish Society for Propagating Christian Knowledge (1709), whose field included the Highlands, the Scottish islands, and part of North America, supplying them with evangelists, Bibles, and edifying books in Gaelic. 4. The Society for Promoting Religious Knowledge among the Poor (1750) also distributed Bibles and religious books. 5. The Bible Society, later called The Naval and Military Bible Society (1780), which worked exclusively among the soldiers and sailors. 6. The Society for the Support and Encouragement of Sunday Schools (1785) distributed gratuitously Bible and other books in Sunday schools. Nor was Ireland behindhand. 7. The Association for Discouraging Vice, and Promoting the Knowledge and Practice of the Christian Religion, established in Dublin in 1792, did a similar work among the poor Irish. 8. A French Bible Society was founded in London in the same year (1792), for publishing the Bible in French; but the times did not favor the enterprise, and so the money collected for this purpose was applied to other things. But the desire for such a society among the French Protestants was very great, more especially, because no Protestant Bible had been printed in France since 1678.

Although these facilities existed, yet the demand far exceeded the supply. Particularly was this the case in Wales, where the Rev. Thomas Charles of Bala in Marionethshire had been preaching for twenty years as an itinerant minister. This devoted man everywhere awakened a keen interest in the Bible; but many were compelled to walk long distances before they could get a copy; while in London, in December, 1802, the thought came to Charles, Why not found a Bible society for Wales? He imparted this idea to his friend Tarn, who introduced him to the executive committee of the London Tract Society, before whom Charles gave a moving account of the famine for the word of God among his own people. His speech made a deep impression, particularly upon a Baptist minister, Joseph Hughes, one of the secretaries of the Tract Society. "Certainly," said he, "such a society might be formed; and, if for Wales, why not for the Kingdom and for the world?" Joseph Hughes had given utterance to the idea of a Bible society for the world. The next step was to awaken interest, and find out the extent of the destitution at home and abroad. In the last direction the Rev. C. F. A. Steinkopf, pastor of the German Lutheran Church in the Savoy (in the Strand, London), was particularly useful. A public meeting was held March 7, 1804, at the London Tavern (on the call of Mr. Hughes): three hundred persons attended it. Among the various denominations represented were Quakers, who were considered to be despisers of the Bible, and who kept themselves aloof from the other denominations, and did not join with them in any work, save that of the abolition of slavery. But it was quickly evident the Bible society presented common ground upon which all sects and parties could stand. Dissenters met Churchmen, and in their interest in the common work forgot, for a time, their different interpretation of the same book. But the latter were not at once ready to join the movement. The first of the Church clergy present to favor the enterprise was the Rev. John Owen, who was impressed by the address of the Rev. Mr. Steinkopf upon the Bible destitution on the Continent. And his example found imitators. The roughly drawn-up by-laws were adopted. An executive committee of thirty-six laymen, fifteen from the Church of England, fifteen dissenters, six foreigners residing in or near London, was chosen, and seven hundred pounds subscribed. The committee then chose as secretaries the Rev. Messrs. Joseph Hughes (Baptist) and Josiah Pratt (Church of England); and after a few weeks the Rev. John Owen was made another secretary, and then the Rev. C. F. A. Steinkopf, secretary for the foreign lands, on nomination of Lord Teignmouth, a former governor-general of India. The Bishop of London, Dr. Porteus, was elected President. Besides the Bishop of London, the Bishops of Durham, Exeter, and St. Davids, and many other influential persons, such as Wilberforce and Granville Sharpe, famous for their work against slavery, joined the movement.

The constitution of the society soon was definitely made, and the society started upon its career. As at present organized, the business of the society is conducted by the committee mentioned above. Besides the president, there are vice-presidents, a treasurer, and secretaries. The members pay an annual fee of one guinea, and can buy Bibles at a discount. In order to excite wider interest, and facilitate the distribution of the Bible, auxiliary and branch societies are formed, which pay in their collections into the common fund, and receive their Bibles at a discount. In connection with these are associations which collect smaller sums, and provide the poor with Bibles on the payment of a very low weekly charge. In 1814 associations of women were formed: now there are those of sailors, soldiers, and even of children.

The society began its career by first meeting the wants of Wales. Twenty thousand Welsh Bibles and five thousand Testaments were printed. Providentially but a short time before, the art of stereotyping had been invented. When, in 1806, the first wondrousful of Bibles came into Wales, it was received like the ark of the covenant; and the people, with shouts of great joy, dragged it into the city. In the Highlands of Scotland the society distributed the Bible in an improved Gaelic translation. The society also turned its attention to the Irish, to the asylums; in short it started out to supply Great Britain with Bibles printed without note or comment, and it has nobly accomplished its design. But it has not forgotten that it is a foreign as well as British Bible Society. It has sent its agents everywhere; it has excited a world-wide interest in the word of God, and now, especially in mission-fields, is supplying the pure water of life unto millions of thirsty souls. (See below.)

II. Bible Societies upon the Continent of Europe. When the British and Foreign Bible Society began operations, Europe was convulsed by war; and so, although the demand for the Bible was in a measure supplied, not so much was done as would otherwise have been. Europe had her own Bible societies: Germany in particular was well supplied. 1. The Canstein Bible Institute was founded in 1710 by the Freiherr von Canstein (see title), and has been very active in circulating Bibles in several languages. 2. The destitution in Austria excited the merchant Kiesling in Nürnberg, and led to the organization of the Nürnberg (Nuremberg) Bible Society on May 10, 1804. The British and Foreign Bible Society contributed stereotype plates of the German Bible. The Basel friends to the Bible cause joined in the movement, and after two years (1806) it was shifted to the latter city, and called the Basel Bible Society. [They report (1880) an issue of 684,313 copies.] 3. It might be supposed that the Bible would be rarely found in the Roman-Catholic portion of Germany; nor would any expression of regret over the fact be expected. All the more, therefore, was the astonishment when a Roman-Catholic priest in South Germany wrote a letter expressing great joy over the founding of the British and Foreign Bible Society, and assuring them that many priests of his acquaintance desired their people to read the Bible. As a practical exposition of this desire, Dr. Wittmann founded in 1805 the Roman-Catholic Regensburg (Ratisbon) Bible Society. Dr. Wittmann himself translated the New Testament into German. The priest Gossner in Munich, and Leander van Ess (see title), the celebrated Benedictine monk, and professor-extraordinary at the University of Marburg, also furnished translations, which were printed by the society, and zealously spread. The Freiherr von Wessenberg and Bishop Sailer gave the work their cordial support. But Rome viewed the society with dislike; and a Papal bull forbade the circulation of the Scriptures in one of their districts (Gnesen), and in the spring of 1817 suppressed the society. It had, previous to that date, printed almost a half million of Testaments. Gossner, who persisted, in spite of the bull, to circulate the Scriptures, was driven out of Munich. Van Ess, however, kept on his Bible-work, although he resigned his positions in 1822; and, under the patronage of the British and Foreign Bible Society, pushed on his translation of the Bible, and at last published a complete Bible in German in 1840. 4. The Berlin Bible Society was founded Feb. 11, 1806. It owes its origin to the Moravian preacher Jänicke, who had presented to the British and Foreign Bible Society the great scarcity of Bohemian Bibles. The latter society contributed a large quantity of Bibles and Testaments in Bohemian, Polish, and Lithuanian (since a branch had been established in 1810 in Königsberg). The Berlin Society in August, 1814, was converted into the Prussian Bible Society, and set before itself the circulation of the Scriptures throughout the Kingdom. It now has many branches, and is doing noble work. [Total issues (1880) 4,601,796 copies.]

The most of the societies were founded after 1812, and at the incitement of Messrs. Steinkopf and Pinkerton, who repeatedly visited the Continent. In this way was started, 5, the Württemberg Bible Society in February, 1813, which became one of the most flourishing in Germany. [Total issue (1880) 1,463,801.] Others, in Hannover, Saxony, and the smaller German states, followed; and so in Hungary in 1811, but it was suppressed by a Papal bull.

6. Nor did Switzerland lag behind. After the transfer of the Nürnberg Society to Basel, a great activity was excited. Steinkopf's tour through Switzerland in 1812 awoke great enthusiasm; and Bible societies sprang up everywhere. 7. In 1816, at Latour a Bible Society for the Waldensians was established. [Issue last reported 4,238.]

8. The United Netherlands Bible Society was founded in 1815 [issue reported (1878) 1,386,181]. A Bible society for sailors was also started.

[9. In France the movement was begun by the London French Bible Society formed in 1792; but the breaking-out of the Revolution effectually checked it. An edition of the New Testament was printed in Paris in 1802 by another English society; but the recommencement of hostilities in 1804 again prevented the Bible's circulation. The reaction in the year 1815 found the Protestants in France ready for bolder work on their own account, and so in 1818 the Protestant Bible Society of Paris was established [issue reported (1881) 624,488]. The subsidies generously granted by the British and Foreign were withdrawn at the close of the sixth year, because of difference of views in regard to the Apocrypha. In 1826 the British and Foreign voted to exclude from their liberality all those societies which persisted in printing those books. The French society thought to cut the knot by printing Bibles with and without them. The success of this society has also been conditioned by internal strifes; for there are two parties, one contending, that instead of the so-called revision of Ostervald, which is confessedly inaccurate, the text be that of Perret-Gentil for the Old Testament, and, for the New Testament, the Geneva version and that of Arnaud. The result of the internal strife was the formation, in 1864, of the Bible Society of France, which persists in printing the old version, and rejecting the Apocrypha [issues reported (1877), 267,047]. — O. DOUEN, in Encyclopédie des Sciences Religieuses, vol. 11. pp. 284-286.]

10. In the Northlands the work of the British and Foreign Bible Society was quite strangely opened up: Messrs. J. Paterson and Ebenezer Henderson (Scotchmen) went to Copenhagen, there to embark as missionaries to Tranquebar [a town in Hindostan, then a Danish possession]. The plan fell through; but they met Thorkelin, who turned their attention to the need of Bibles among the Icelanders. There were only fifty Bibles in a population of fifty thousand. The two Scotchmen laid the matter before the British and Foreign Bible Society, which promised to defray half the expenses of five thousand Testaments. The printing was begun in 1806 at Fühnen; but the war between Denmark and England abruptly ended it. But in 1812 Henderson received permission to remain in Copenhagen in order to complete the printing of the whole Icelandic Bible, and notwithstanding the war, to correspond with England, — an instance of very marked confidence. On Aug. 8, 1814, the Danish Bible Society was founded [issues reported (1876), 346,026]; in 1815 that of Iceland [issues reported, 10,445].

11. In 1831 the Evangelical Bible Society in Russia was established with the aim of circulating the Bible, without notes, among all Protestants dwelling within the limits of the Russian Empire. Its support comes in the main from Germans [issues reported (1881), 945,683]. In Sweden the Bible Society dates from 1814 [issues reported (1880) 921,747]; in Norway from 1816 [issues reported (1880) 248,924]; in Russia from Jan. 19, 1813; but it was suppressed in 1826 by the emperor, up to which time the British and Foreign had aided it to the extent of £16,833. [Privately formed in 1863, on May 2, 1869, the Society for the Dissemination of the Holy Scriptures in Russia was founded, and honored by the imperial sanction. The rules of the society are: 1. To disseminate only Scriptures sanctioned by the Holy Synod; 2. To sell bound Scriptures as largely as possible, but also to distribute gratuitously, or at reduced prices, where the occasion demanded. It makes free use of the colportage, and in this way the Bible finds its way into the remotest villages of the empire. Up to 1881, 668,103 copies of the Scripture had been distributed, and the work is carried on. It depends mainly upon voluntary subscriptions. See Bible Society Record, October, 1880, and BIBLE READING, The Greek Church].

In Southern Europe we find the Malta Bible Society (1817), the Ionia Bible Society in Corfu (1819) [issues reported, 7,377]. In India the Bible is translated into the various dialects; and the Bible Society of Calcutta (1811) [issues reported (1880) 1,706,615] of Bombay (1813) [issues reported (1880) 441,675], of Madras (1820) [issues reported (1880) 2,871,792], and so of other places of Asia, attests the interest in this great and blessed work.

As has already been abundantly evidenced, it is impossible to treat separately the British and Foreign Bible Society and those already named; for the latter have been in such large measure adjuncts of the former, that their interests are identified. It is fitting, therefore, to close this account of the Bible-work abroad by a return to the great society. Its work has not been carried on without hinderances and difficulties: some of these were inevitable, such as those connected with making translations in as yet unprinted or even unwritten tongues; but others came from the sinful heart of bigotry and prejudice. The High-Church party in the Established Church opposed the Bible Society, because, forsooth, it interfered with their pet, the Society for the Promotion of Christian Knowledge. Others thought it dangerous to put the Bible, without note or comment, into the hands of the laity, and especially of the heathen. Indeed, it was prophesied, that, if this were done, there would be an end of British rule in India: hence the governors-general for many years opposed the society. But more ridiculous complaints were made: such men as Bishop Marsh fain would bind the Bible with the Book of Common Prayer, and thus maintain the purity of the Christian faith. But God did not suffer this grand society, which gave outward expression to his thought of Christian unity, to be overthrown by any attacks. The most serious trouble, however, came in connection with the Apocrypha; and the fight lasted from 1825 to 1827, and well nigh split the society. At first the Bible printed for the Canstein Society contained the Apocrypha; but in 1811 attention was called to this fact, and the committee determined to exclude it. After much agitation, in which

Dr. Andrew Thomson of Edinburgh, and the Edinburgh Society, were leaders in opposition to the Apocrypha, in regard to which they used very hard language, it was resolved, May 3, 1827, that the fundamental law of the society be fully and distinctly recognized as excluding the circulation of the Apocrypha; and therefore no person or society spreading the Apocrypha could hereafter receive any pecuniary aid from the society. The consequence was, that the societies upon the Continent, where the Apocrypha was universally used, and of which the British Society had founded over fifty, separated themselves from the parent society. Strangely enough the Edinburgh and most of the Scotch societies, though it would seem they had won, themselves seceded. The society then established agencies in various parts of the Continent. See АПОКРИФА. The refusal of the society in 1831 to alter its constitution so as to exclude non-Trinitarians, and to withdraw from circulation in France, Spain, and Portugal, Bibles translated from the Vulgate, led to the formation of the Trinitarian Bible Society, which, however, is of exceedingly limited operation. The Forty-ninth Annual Report (1880) shows that during the year it received £2,038, 9s., and circulated 37,949 Bibles, Testaments, and portions. Colporters work for it in France, Russia, and Italy.

The present work of the British and Foreign Bible Society is carried on through auxiliary and branch societies, gradually formed in every district of the United Kingdom and in the colonies; agents, who at home and abroad investigate local requirements, and supply information for the guidance of the committee; dépôts for the sale of the Bible in almost every town in England and in many places abroad; colporters, to some extent in England, and very largely on the Continent and in India; and, lastly, by grants to societies, especially to those of a missionary or philanthropic nature, also in aid of Bible translations. [The Seventy-seventh Annual Report was presented May 4, 1881. During the year the receipts were £209,519, and the issues 2,846,029; or, from the beginning, 91,014,448. Its president is the Earl of Shaftesbury.]

III. Bible Societies of the United States of America. (1) The American Bible Society was suggested by the success of the British and Foreign Bible Society, and was the union of many existing organizations. In 1777, during the Revolutionary War, Congress were memorialized to print thirty thousand copies of the Bible in order to supply the demand. But, owing to the want of type and paper, they could not be printed, and hence the Committee on Commerce was empowered to import twenty thousand copies from Holland, Scotland, or elsewhere, at the expense of Congress. In consequence of the embargo, this scheme could not be carried out; and in 1782, on another memorial, a committee reported, recommending a Bible printed by Robert Aitken in Philadelphia. But Bibles were not in those times printed in sufficient quantity, nor at low enough prices, for the poor. In 1808 the first organization for the supply of the Bible was formed in Philadelphia. The idea was quickly taken up everywhere; so, that in June, 1816, a hundred and twenty-eight Bible societies were reported. The credit of the idea of uniting these societies into one seems due to the Rev. Samuel J. Mills, who reported the spiritual destitution of the West and South-west in 1815; but the first one to take active measures in such a direction was the Hon. Elias Boudinot, president of the New Jersey Bible Society, who in Jan. 1, 1816, made the first public communication in favor of a national Bible movement. The New York Bible Society was the first to follow it by formal action. Mr. Boudinot issued a circular dated Jan. 17, 1816, and appointed Wednesday, May 8, 1816, and New York, as the time and place for holding the convention. Accordingly sixty delegates, representing twenty-eight Bible societies of various sections of our country, and of various denominations (Congregational, Presbyterian, Protestant-Episcopal, Methodist-Episcopal, Reformed Dutch, Baptist, and the Society of Friends), met, and adopted a constitution, and elected the officers and board of managers. Mr. Boudinot was appropriately made the first president.

The list of presidents since then is as follows: Hon. Elias Boudinot, 1816-21; Hon. John Jay, 1821-28; Hon. Richard Varick, 1828-31; Hon. John Cotton Smith, 1831-46; Hon. Theodore Frelinghuysen, 1846-62; Hon. Luther Bradish, 1862-64; James Lenox, 1864-71; William H. Allen, 1872-80; S. Wells Williams, 1881. The Sixty-fifth Annual Report was presented May 12, 1881. The total receipts were $606,484. The number of volumes of the Scripture printed at the Bible House, New York, was 1,085,696; thus divided,—Bibles, 324,746; New Testaments, 648,980; portions, 111,770; volumes for the blind, 200; besides 275,983 printed abroad for the society; or, during the sixty-five years of its existence, 38,882,811.

The society is conducted by a board of managers, composed of thirty-six laymen, of whom one-fourth go out of office every year, but are re-eligible, and so, as a matter of fact, they remain. Every clergyman who is a life-member of the society, if he be not entitled to receive any salary, emolument, or compensation for services from the society, is entitled to meet and vote with the board of managers, and be possessed of the same powers as a manager himself. The officers consist of a president, about thirty vice-presidents, three secretaries, a treasurer, an assistant treasurer, and a general agent. In connection with the main societies there are auxiliaries, which collect money, carry on local Bible distribution and promote interest in the Bible cause. The number of such auxiliaries in 1880 was about two thousand.

The history of the American Bible Society is not a record of unbroken peaceable labor. Two serious storms have imperilled its existence. The first of these troubles arose in 1835, when it was learned that Dr. Judson and his coadjutors had published, at the expense of the society, in their Burmese translation of the New Testament, a translation instead of a transliteration of the Greek words baptismos, baptizo, rendering them by immersion and to immerse. After long consideration of the matter, the managers Resolved, "That in appropriating money for the translating, printing, or distributing of the Sacred Scriptures in foreign languages, the managers feel at liberty to encourage only such versions as conform in the principle of their translation to the common English version, at least so far as that all the religious denominations represented in this society can consistently use and circulate said versions in their several schools and communities." This resolution was communicated to the several missionary boards receiving appropriations from the society, with the request, that, in applying for aid, they would state that the versions they proposed to circulate were in accordance with the resolution. Many of the Baptists took offence at this resolution. A controversy ensued, and the practical effect was the formation of a rival Bible society. See below American and Foreign Bible Society.

The second trouble spoken of came from an entirely different source. In 1847 the attention of the board of managers was called to the discrepancies found in different editions of the English Bible in respect to the use of Italic words, capital letters, and the article a or an; and the Committee on Versions were instructed to undertake a careful collation. Their final report was made May 1, 1851, and in it they stated, that, in collating five standard copies of English and American imprint with the original edition of 1611, nearly twenty-four thousand variations were recorded, solely in the text and punctuation, not one of which marred the integrity of the text, or affected any doctrine or precept of the Bible. The standard determined upon by the committee at first met with the unanimous approval of the board of managers and the public. All the new editions were conformed to it, and for several years these Bibles were circulated without the slightest objection. The fact was, the changes in the text introduced by the committee were very few and slight; their great object being to secure uniformity, and not to touch the original version, except in cases of evident inadvertence or inconsistency, open and manifest to all. A few proper names were conformed to the Old Testament spelling, as Judah for Juda, Sinai for Sina, Zion for Sion, Noah for Noe, seraphim for seraphims, etc. As Dr. Charles Hodge said, "Not one reader in a thousand would notice the alterations, unless they were pointed out." Other alterations consisted in changing the chapter-headings, so as to make them a little more descriptive, or, as in the Song of Solomon, less of a comment. For a time all went well; but in the fall of 1856 the Rev. A. C. Coxe, then of Baltimore, now Bishop of Western New York, questioned the right of the society to make these alterations, and in January, 1857, published a pamphlet, in which he charged the society with having made twenty-four thousand changes in the version of 1816. This to his excited mind proved that the demon of rationalism, "exorcised from its German haunts," had governed the society. The pamphlet did its work. It stirred up great excitement. The Old School Assembly of 1857 debated the matter, and instructed its board of publication to print a Bible. Dr. Hodge wrote an article on the subject in The Princeton Review, July, 1857. So great was the opposition excited, that the board of managers were compelled to bow before the storm. Among the soberest men the question was merely one of constitutional authority, — had the society the power to introduce changes from the Bible of 1611? It was finally decided it had not. Accordingly on Jan. 28, 1858, the board "Resolved, That this Society's present standard English Bible be referred to the standing committee on versions for examination; and in all cases where the same differs in the text or its accessories from the Bibles previously published by the society, the committee are directed to correct the same by conforming it to previous editions printed by this society, or by the authorized British presses, reference being also had to the original edition of the translators printed in 1611; and to report such corrections to this board, to the end that a new edition, thus perfected, may be adopted as the standard edition of the society." The committee reported in 1859 and 1860; and from this "standard edition" all English Bibles are now printed. The relation of the Bible Society to the Revised Version is at present (1881) much discussed. The constitution of the Society would have to be altered before it could publish any other English Bible than King James' Version (art. I.); and it would not be expedient to do so before public opinion decides in favor of the Revised Version.

(2) American and Foreign Bible Society. This is a Baptist society. It was organized in Philadelphia (April, 1836) by those Baptists, headed by the Rev. S. H. Cone, D.D., a former secretary of the American Bible Society, who felt themselves aggrieved by the resolution quoted above. Dr. Cone was made president. The society was declared to be "founded upon the principle that the originals in the Hebrew and Greek are the only authentic standards of the Sacred Scriptures, and that aid for the translating, printing, or distributing of them in foreign languages, should be afforded to such versions only as are conformed as nearly as possible to the original text; it being understood that no words are to be transferred which are susceptible of being literally translated." The constitution declares (Art. II.) "that, in the distribution of the Scriptures in the English language, the commonly received version shall be used until otherwise directed by the Society." See Annual Reports. The society is similar in organization and management to the American Bible Society. The annual meetings are held in New-York City. The Forty-third Annual Report was presented May 13, 1880. The balance in treasury May 1, 1879, was $5,023.14. The receipts of the year from individual and church offerings were $5,002.62; from estates and other sources were $2,923.08; total receipts, $7,925.70. The society supports several native Bible readers and distributors among the Telugus of India and the freedmen of the South.

(3) American Bible Union was organized in 1850 by those members of the American and Foreign Bible Society who demanded that the principle of circulating "such versions only as are conformed as nearly as possible to the original text" should be applied to the English version; i.e., that version should itself be revised. The object of the Union is "to procure and circulate the most faithful versions of the Sacred Scriptures, in all languages, throughout the world." The first appropriation by the Union was toward the Karen version in 1851. The Twenty-eighth Annual Report was presented Nov. 14, 1877. The receipts for the year were $16,299.93. Since then the Union has not made any report. It has secured, however, the continued labors of the Rev. Dr. T. J. Conant, the most competent scholar for this purpose in the country, to continue his revision labors, so fruitful in the past. The Union turned its attention chiefly toward a revision of the English Scriptures. In 1856 it published the revised Book of Job; in 1865, the completed revised New Testament; in 1868, Genesis; in 1869, the Psalms; in 1871, Proverbs; in January, 1878, Joshua, Judges, and Ruth. First and Second Samuel, First and Second Kings, and First and Second Chronicles, are ready in manuscript. It has also prepared an Italian, Spanish, Chinese (colloquial for Ningpo), Siamese, and Sgau-Karen New Testament. The Union disclaims very vigorously the epithet sectarian; but it is believed, that, if the English version had used immerse and its cognates for baptize and its cognates, there would have been no such Union. At the same time, the revisions of the Union are among the best individual revisions ever made. S. M. JACKSON.

BIBLE TEXT. I. Old Testament. The ordinary Hebrew text, the Massoretic, is the result of the alterations and other additions made within a certain period by Jewish scholars. But, concerning the time and the principles of these changes, there was in the seventeenth century great difference of opinion among Christian (mainly Protestant) Hebrew scholars. On the one side stood the Buxtorfs (father and son) and their party, who held, in the interest of the then prevalent views of inspiration, to the absolute completeness and infallibility, and hence exclusive value, of the Massoretic text; and, further, attributed that text to Ezra and the Men of the Great Synagogue (Sopherim), who, under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit, cleansed the text of all accumulated error, added the vowel-points, the accents, and other punctuation-marks, thus settling the reading and pronunciation; also made the right division into verses, paragraphs, and books; and, finally, they held, that, by the care of God, the text thus made has been kept from all error, and presents to-day the veritable words of God. On the other side was the party of Johannes Morinus and Ludovicus Cappellus, who, in the interest of pure historicity, combated these opinions, maintained with equal learning the later age of the Massoretic text, and sought to vindicate value and usefulness for the old versions and other critical helps. They fell into many errors in respect to the details of the history of the text; but their general view was supported by irresistible arguments, and is now universally adopted. This view, instead of deriving the existing text from any gathering of inspired men in Ezra's time, assigns it to a much later date and quite different men, and, instead of absolute, claims for it only a relative, completeness, and a higher value than other forms of the text. A glance at the history of the text will show how this agreement has been brought about.

1. Concerning the oldest or ante-canonical history of the text of the Old-Testament writings, we have almost no positive information, and only few indirect hints. The books were probably written upon skins, perhaps also on linen; indeed, as paper was used from very early times in Egypt, it is possible that it was used by the Bible-writers; parchment appears to have been later. The roll was the usual form (Ps. xl. 7; Jer. xxxvi. 14; Ezek. ii. 9; Zech. v. 1). The original character was the old Hebrew, which was almost identical with the old Phœnician and Moabite, and which was used after the exile. Specimens of this are preserved in the inscriptions on cut stones of the eighth or seventh century B.C., in the coins of the Asmonæans and those belonging to the time of the Jewish-Roman war, and, in somewhat different form, in Samaritan writings. The inaccurate division of words in later texts proves, that, in the earlier, the words were not divided by particular marks or spaces; yet it is not thereby proven that the words were not divided at all. It is, however, possible, in analogy to the primitive Arabic, that the verses were somehow indicated; but it is certain, that, in this early day, the manuscripts were without vowel-points and accents. While the language lived, this occasioned no trouble.

We possess no details concerning the way in which the text was multiplied and preserved; but, inasmuch as the writings did not then have, in the popular estimation, the character they afterwards had, it is likely that they were less carefully handled, and that the same amount of pains was not taken in copying them. This statement rests upon the fact that those parts of the Old Testament which we possess in double forms vary between themselves in ways that indicate a corruption of the text, going back to ante-canonical times; i.e., when copies were neither made nor corrected so laboriously.

2. The second period in the history of the text extends from the Exile to the rise of the Massoretes. The canon was completed slowly, not all at once, through the exertion of Ezra, Nehemiah, and the Men of the Great Synagogue, although we may properly date the formation of a part of the canon, especially the law, from him, and extend the period down to the close of the Talmud, at the end of the fifth century A.D. It was the period of the determination of the penmanship and text, the pronunciation and division: in short, in a traditional verbal form, the major part of the Massorah was collected.

(a) A change of an external kind was the development of a sacred handwriting, under the influence of the Aramaic characters, the so-called square or Babylonian-Aramaic ("Assyrian") character. Jewish tradition, which is clearly wrong, attributed the square character to Ezra, described it as the change from the Hebrew to the Aramaic mode of writing, and asserted that the old Hebrew character was left to the Samaritans. A study of Assyrian, Persian, and Cilician seals and coins, and of the Aramaic manuscripts from the third to the first century B.C., and of the Palmyrene inscriptions from the first to the third century A.D., has enabled us to trace the development of the present Hebrew alphabet through a thousand years, back to 800 B.C.

Ezra, therefore, may have influenced the use of the Aramaic alphabet; but the square character was not formed in his day, nor for centuries afterwards; nor was the Aramaic alphabet then used outside of the narrow circle of doctors of the law. Matt. v. 18 is commonly quoted in proof of the completion of the present Hebrew alphabet in the first century; but the recently-studied Palestinian inscriptions for the century before and after the destruction of Jerusalem give clearer evidence. The Talmud lays down minute rules on this subject, and therefore the writing of the manuscripts scarcely varies a particle through centuries.

(b) As soon as the Scriptures obtained canonical authority, and were used in divine service, the variations between the manuscripts would be observed, and the necessity of having one standard text would be apparent. The preparation of such a text began with the Law, and that among the Jews in Babylon; but the other two divisions of the canon (the Prophets and the Hagiographa) were probably not reached in this period, as they were never held in as high esteem. In the oldest critical sources, in the Samaritan Pentateuch and in the Septuagint, we have evidence, from the end of the fifth century before, to the second after Christ, to show that the widest-spread and most approved manuscripts differed verbally a good deal. And these variations are not to be set down to the charge of carelessness or wilfulness on the part of the Hellenistic Jews and Samaritans, as was the old opinion, but are explained by the less weight then put upon exact uniformity of the text, and the existence of the mistakes in current copies. And when the Septuagint and the Samaritan Pentateuch agree in good readings, and still oftener in bad ones, against the Massoretic text, we are to conclude that these readings were spread by many copies current among the Palestine Jews, and are therefore not to look upon them as offensive or thoroughly unreliable. But after the destruction of Jerusalem, when Judaism was held under the authority of the rabbins, it became possible to prepare a uniform standard text, although this idea was not realized until many generations had worked upon it. But the progress toward it can be proved. The Greek versions of Aquila and Theodotion, made in the second century, have fewer variations from the Massoretic text than those which preceded them; and the Targums to the Law and the Prophets, made in Babylon in the third and fourth centuries, have still less. (The supposition is groundless that the later Jews corrected their text according to the Targums.) Still nearer the Massoretic text is Origen's. The Talmud itself bears witness, by its biblical quotations agreeing with the Massoretic text, that the consonantal text was practically finished before the Talmudic era closed.

We are not able to say upon what principles the work was done; but the way in which they have preserved the individuality of the several authors is remarkable, and enables us to deny that these critics would, on dogmatic grounds, intentionally alter a passage (cf. such verses as Ps. xxii. 18; Isa. xix. 18, liii. 9). We know nothing concerning the number or quality of the manuscripts used, and can readily believe that if for any book the manuscripts were few or inferior, and yet they agreed in a faulty reading, that that faulty reading would be adopted and thus fixed. Notwithstanding, we confidently assert that the men, not always, but in general, have chosen the correct reading; and so the text as a whole is, although not absolutely correct, the best and the most reliable. It lay, however, entirely out of the power of such critics, owing to the want of the apparatus, to correct textual errors and variations in the current manuscripts; and therefore it is undeniable that errors may have remained in their text, and the errors thus left would be perpetuated. The critical apparatus of the time is fragmentarily concealed in the later Massorah, but cannot be separated from the other matter. The Talmud allows a little insight into the critical efforts of the time. Thus in one place it says that the Sopherim ("the Men of the Great Synagogue") had removed in five places a falsely introduced v'; in another, that in eighteen places they had preserved the correct text. Component parts of the critico-exegetical apparatus of the older time were the three sorts of Keri, well known to the Talmudists, and by them deduced from primitive tradition,—K'ri v'lo K'thibh, "read, but not written; K'thibh v'lo K'ri, "written, but not read;" and K'ri w'k'thibh, "read and written." The three kinds of K'ri have, it is true, for the most part, only exegetical value; e.g., they give the usual instead of the unusual grammatical forms, show where one must understand or omit a word, or where the reader should use an euphemistic expression for the coarse one in the text: they are therefore scholia upon the text. But many of these K'ris are really various readings, resting upon comparison of manuscripts, as the oldest versions prove, and therefore are veritable fragments of the critical apparatus at the disposal of the old Jewish rabbins.

(c) The development of the pronunciation, orthography, and verse and paragraph making, of the text, kept equal pace with its settlement. From its original composition down to the close of the Talmud, it was unvocalized and unpunctuated. The old versions (particularly the Greek) and Josephus, depart so widely from the Massoretic text, that they settle this point. If only one differed, it were explicable; but they all differ in ways that could not happen if the present spelling were in use. Origen printed a text differing in pronunciation from the Massoretic. Jerome knew nothing about vowel-signs, not even the diacritical point over the shin. The Talmud, and so, at the present day, the public or holy manuscripts of the Jews, present an unpointed text. The pronunciation was not variable, however, but developing steadily towards the present system. Of course time was required to bring it into vogue; but before the end of the period it was so firmly established, that Jerome's pronunciation differed very little from the Massoretic, and he was so sure of its correctness, that he appeals to it against the text of the Versions; and the Talmud gives it throughout correctly. Before the Massoretic, there was the pronunciation, not yet written, but handed down by word of mouth, although some scholars may have used signs in their books to help their memory.

Closely connected and mutually dependent were the pronunciation and the division of words. The latter was finished in this period. The Samaritan Pentateuch, in which each word is separated from its neighbor by a punctuation-mark; the Septuagint, which, indeed, does depart frequently in its division from the Massoretic text, but only in the case of words which might be written closer together without any loss of legibility; the Targums, which have the same word-divisions as the Massoretic; and, again, the "final letters" of the square character,—these are cumulative proof of the correctness of the above statement.

The third step—the division into verses—was also taken in this period. The study of the text, the custom of reading the Law and the Prophetic books in the synagogue, would make some such division imperative. In the Talmud it appears to be already completed. Often the number of verses in particular books or paragraphs is given, and it nearly agrees with the Massoretic. The division into lines in the poetical books was perhaps original, certainly very early; but, when the Massoretic introduced the accents, poetry was written close, like prose. This verse-division and counting was taught in the schools; but no rules are given for it, nor did any punctuation-marks indicate it.

Earlier than the division into verses is that into sections of larger or smaller length, because these were more necessary for the understanding of the Scriptures, and their reading in divine worship. Perhaps some of them were in the original text. The sections of the Law were at least pre-Talmudic; for in the Mishna, and frequently in the Gemara, they are mentioned, and in the latter they are traced to Mosaic origin, and exist in synagogue-rolls. They were indicated by spacing,—the larger sections, by leaving the remainder of the line at their close unfilled, the next section beginning with a new line, on which account they were called "open" sections: the smaller sections were separated from each other only by a small space, and were therefore called "closed."

For the divisions of the whole canon, and the arrangement of the books, see article CANON.

Extraordinary pains were taken before the Massoretic to perpetuate in its purity the text thus divided and vocalized. We find in the Talmud regulations for the mode of writing not only the ordinary, but the so-called "extraordinary," characters, which denoted the middle letter of a book, or served some purpose now unknown, or which were only by accident in the text.

3. The third period of the textual history of the Old Testament is the Massoretic, usually reckoned as extending from the sixth until the eleventh century, when the Jewish scholars removed from the East to North Africa and Spain. This period embraces the age of the Massoretic proper, and has for the Bible-text the same importance as the Talmudic period had for the Law. The word massora means "tradition," and exactly describes the work done. All the traditional marks and divisions of the sacred text, all the recognized though unrecorded helps to its understanding, the pronunciation which had been handed down,—these were recorded by the Massoretic in a fixed and official form. There were two chief schools working, however, together, — the Babylonian and Palestinian (at Tiberias). We readily understand their origin. They met the growing demand after accuracy. (See MASSORA.) They depended upon the existent materials, and built upon them. But a great part of their product was new.

(a) They took the "textus receptus" just as it stood, but in places made a few changes, and at all events gave it its settled form by minute attention to the writing of the consonants. They also appended critical notes upon the text, in part derived from the Talmudic period, but in part new, especially the "grammatical conjectures," showing that where, according to the grammar and the genius of the language, one should expect another reading, nevertheless the text should stand. Finally the great majority of the K'ris date from the Massorettes.

(b) The Massorettes fixed the reading of the text by the introduction of the vowel-signs, the accents, and the signs which affect the reading of the consonants (daghesh lene and forte, mappik, raphé, and the diacritical point). And the pronunciation they thus brought about was not an invention, but the purest tradition. A striking proof is the unanimity of the Babylonian and Palestinian schools working independently. The systems were different (that of the latter was more complicated, although destined to gain and keep the ascendancy), yet the result was substantially the same. The former was fully developed about the middle of the eighth century; the latter, in the seventh century. From the eleventh century the Jews have pretended that their pronunciation was primitive.

(c) The divisions of the text into verses and paragraphs made in the former period were retained, and only slightly modified. At the beginning of this period the end of the verses was marked by the Soph Pasuk (סוף פסוק), and, when the accents were introduced, by Silluk besides. The old sections (divisions for public reading) were also retained; but in addition there were introduced some fifty-three or fifty-four large sections of the Pentateuch (Parshiyoth) for sabbath public reading, and the Haphtaroth, sections from the prophets.

(d) But even these efforts could not entirely remove variations. Hence, before the end of this period, the doctors either attempted to find out by an elaborate comparison the correct punctuation, and fix it, or marked the important variations in the punctuation, or added a caution to each apparently wrong and yet correct punctuation. The mass of notes which the Massorettes added to the text relate to these matters. The notes in two famous codices, and remarks of rabbins, were frequently cited as authoritative. By the Babylonian school, the Codex ben Naphtali, by the Palestinian, the Codex ben Asher, was appealed to, and comparisons drawn between them.

(e) As the Talmudists had already shown their superstitious regard for the text by counting its letters, and deciding which was the middle verse of the Bible, how often a certain word occurred, etc., the Massorettes, of course, wrote down this information, and sacredly preserved it.

But their inventions of the pronunciation and punctuation were gains which quickly were shared by all; and to-day, outside of the synagogue-rolls, all Hebrew is read by means of them. See MASSORA.

4. Since the Massorettes closed their labors, the history of the Hebrew text is the recital of the efforts made to hold fast to and perpetuate the Massoretic text. The manuscripts may be divided into two classes, — the public or holy, and the private or common. The first are synagogue-rolls, and have been prepared so carefully, and watched so closely, that the possibility of variation and error is reduced to a minimum. But they contain only the Pentateuch, or also the five Megilloth (Canticles, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Esther) and the Haphtaroth, contain the text of the Massorettes, without their additions, and are, for the most part, of recent origin, although antique in form, being written upon leather or parchment. The private manuscripts are written upon the same material, but also upon paper, in book-form, with the Massoretic additions, vowel-points, etc., — complete, the so-called Greater Massora, or, abridged, the Less. As a general thing, the consonantal text, the points, the K'ris, and other additions, frequently including translations and rabbinical commentary, are written by different hands. It is often difficult, and indeed impossible, to determine the date and nationality of a manuscript; but none of the manuscripts now known are really very old. The oldest authentic date is A.D. 916 for the Prophet Codex, and A.D. 1009 for an entire Hebrew Bible, both of which are preserved in the Imperial Library of St. Petersburg.

The oldest are generally the more accurate. The number of errors which crept in awakened solicitude, and led to well-directed efforts to get a pure text. In this line the labors of Meir ha Levi of Toledo (d. 1244) upon the Pentateuch text are renowned. But the art of printing opened a way of escape from copyists' errors, and very early it was taken. The first book to appear was a Psalter, in 1477, the first complete Bible at Soncino in 1488. Luther's Old Testament was translated from the edition of this Bible, which appeared at Brescia in 1494. The first edition of the Bomberg Rabbinical Bible and the Bomberg hand-editions contain substantially the same text. The second independent edition derived from manuscripts is that in the Complutensian Polyglot (1514-17). The text is vocalized, but not accented. The third important recension is the second edition of the Bomberg Rabbinical Bible, cura R. Jacob ben Chajim, Venet., 1525-26, corrected according to the Massora, which, indeed, it contains. This contains the various readings collected by Aaron ben Asher. It was frequently republished in the sixteenth century. The edition of Jos. Athias, cum præf. Jo. Leusdenii, 1661, rested upon some very old manuscripts, and, with improvements, was re-issued in 1705 by Van der Hooght; and this edition has remained the standard. The most recent attempt at a revised text is that of S. Baer and Fr. Delitzsch, who have issued separately the Books of Genesis, Job, the Psalms, Proverbs, Isaiah, the minor Prophets, 1861-80. II. The New Testament. 1. History of the Written Text. The autographs of the New Testament very early disappeared, owing to the action of constant use upon the perishable papyrus; for this appears to have been the material (2 John ver. 12). If they were really not in the handwriting of the apostles, but in that of their amanuenses, as we know Paul's Epistles generally were (Rom. xvi. 22; 2 Thess. iii. 17), then it is the easier to account for the phenomenon. The papyrus rolls preserved to the present day were never much used: indeed, the most of them have been found in sarcophagi, and so, of course, were never used at all. The ink was lampblack mixed with gum dissolved in water; copperas (sulphate of iron) being sometimes added. The pens were of reed (calamus). The writing was entirely in uncials (capitals), with no separation of the words (except rarely to indicate the beginning of a new paragraph), no breathings, accents, or distinction of initial letters, and few, if any, marks of punctuation. The evangelists may have denominated their compositions "Gospels," although Justin regularly speaks of the "Memoirs by the Apostles;" but all addition to the name is later, and presupposes a collection of the Gospels. In the case of the Epistles the brief address, e.g., To the Romans, was probably added by the original sender, and other marks of genuineness given (cf. 2 Thess. iii. 17). The Muratorian Fragment (second half of the second century) calls our Acts and Apocalypse by these names, and so proves the early use of these designations. The designation "Catholic (General) Epistle" is first met with at the close of the second century (Apollonius in Euseb., Hist. v. 18, § 5, where the First Epistle of John is probably meant). The application and limiting of the term to the whole of our present collection is of later date; for even in the third and fourth century it was customary to give this term to ecclesiastical epistles, like that of Barnabas, or those of Dionysius of Corinth, which were not specially addressed.

The external history of the New-Testament text for a thousand years prior to the invention of printing can be traced by means of manuscripts. Before the formal close of the canon (end of fourth century) there were probably few single manuscripts of the entire New Testament. [Of the thousand known manuscripts of the New Testament, only about thirty include all the books.] Some of those of the fourth and fifth century now preserved contain not only the Greek Old Testament (α A B C), but also writings which, though not canonical, were read in churches, and studied by catechumens. Thus attached to the Codex Sinaiticus (α) were the Epistle of Barnabas and the Shepherd of Hermas; to the Codex Alexandrinus (A), two "epistles" ascribed to Clement of Rome [the second spurious, and not an epistle, but a homily], and the so-called Psalterium Salomonis. The four Gospels were most frequently copied, the Pauline Epistles oftener than the Catholic Epistles or the Acts, least often the Apocalypse. The Gospels were usually arranged in our present order, then came the Pauline Epistles, the Acts, and the Catholic Epistles: the Apocalypse always last. The arrangement of the Epistles differed:

indeed, there was no model. [On the various arrangements, see particularly Credner's Geschichte des N. T. Kanon, herausg. von Volkmar (1860), p. 393 ff. and Gregory's Prolegomena to Tischendorf's 8th ed. of the Gr. Test. pp. 131 sqq. De librorum ordine.]

The use of parchment or vellum prevailed from the fourth to the eleventh century; then came in cotton, and afterwards linen paper (cf. Wattenbach, Das Schriftwesen im Mittelalter, 2te Aufl. pp. 114 sq.). The growing scarcity of parchment led to the re-use of the old skins, the former writing being erased or washed off; and unfortunately it oftener happened that it was a biblical manuscript which was thus turned into a patristic one than the reverse. Such manuscripts are termed Codices palimpsesti or rescripti. In many cases, by the use of chemicals, the original text has been recovered in modern times. The most famous New-Testament palimpsest is the Codex Ephraemi, of the fifth century, re-written upon in the twelfth. As papyrus disappeared from use, the book form was generally substituted for the rolls, in manuscripts written on parchment or paper. The books were mostly made up of quaternions, i.e., quires of four sheets, doubled so as to make sixteen pages, less frequently of five, though later quires of six sheets were common. The division of the page into columns was at first retained, two being the usual number (e.g., Cod. Alex.); but in many manuscripts (e.g., Cod. Ephraemi) the lines run across the page. Exceptionally, α has four columns, B three. From the seventh and eighth centuries the present accents were more or less used, but very arbitrarily and irregularly. The uncials gradually changed their earlier simple round or square forms, and from the tenth century yielded to the cursives. The earliest punctuation was by means of a blank space and a simple point. Euthalius, a deacon in Alexandria, in the year 458 published an edition of the Epistles of Paul, and soon after of the Acts and Catholic Epistles, written stichometrically, i.e., in single lines containing only so many words as could be read, consistently with the sense, at a single inspiration. This mode of writing was used long before in copying the poetical books of the Old Testament. It involved, however, a great waste of parchment, so that, in manuscripts of the New Testament, it was superseded after a few centuries by punctuation-marks.

[Divisions of the text were early made for various purposes. In the third century Ammonius of Alexandria prepared a Harmony of the Gospels, taking the text of Matthew as the basis, and placing by its side in parallel columns the similar passages in the other Gospels. This of course destroyed the continuity of their narrative. Eusebius of Caesarea, in the early part of the fourth century, availing himself of the work of Ammonius, devised a method of comparing the parallel passages not open to this objection. He divided the text of each Gospel into sections, the length of which, varying greatly (in John xix. 6 there are three, and in twenty-four other instances two, in a single verse), was determined solely by their relation of parallelism or similarity to passages in one or more of the other Gospels, or by their having no parallel. These sections (often erroneously ascribed to Ammonius) were then numbered consecutively in the margin of the Gospel in black ink; Matthew having 355, Mark 233 (not 236), Luke 342, and John 232. They were distributed by Eusebius into ten tables or canons, prefixed to the Gospels, and containing the sections corresponding in —

- I. Matthew, Mark, Luke, John, 71.
- II. Matthew, Mark, Luke, 111.
- III. Matthew, Luke, John, 22.
- IV. Matthew, Mark, John, 26.
- V. Matthew, Luke, 82.
- VI. Matthew, Mark, 47.
- VII. Matthew, John, 7.
- VIII. Luke, Mark, 14.
- IX. Luke, John, 21.
- X. Sections peculiar to Matthew 62, Mark 21, Luke 71, John 97.

Under the number of each section in the margin of the several Gospels was written in red ink the number of the canon or table to which it belonged. On turning to its place in this table, the number of the corresponding section or sections in the other Gospels stands with it, so that the parallel passages may readily be found. For example, the first verse of Matt. iv. forms the fifteenth Eusebian section; the number two under this takes us to the second canon or table, where it appears that section fifteen in Matthew corresponds to six in Mark, and fifteen in Luke; i.e., to Mark i. 12, and Luke iv. 1. In some manuscripts the parallel sections are indicated at the bottom of the page. They thus correspond to our marginal references. See Eusebius, Epist. ad Carpianum; Burgon, The Last Twelve Verses of S. Mark (1871), p. 295 ff.

Wholly different in character and purpose from the Eusebian sections, and probably older, is a division of the Gospels into chapters, called τίτλοι, also κεφάλαια majora (in Latin manuscripts, breves), found in most manuscripts from the Alexandrine and the Ephraem (A, C) of the fifth century onwards. Of these chapters Matthew contains 68, Mark 48, Luke 83, John 18. The numbers by which they are designated in the margin of manuscripts refer to the titles describing their contents at the top or bottom of the page, or in a list prefixed to each Gospel, or often in both places. A certain portion at the beginning of each Gospel is not numbered; for example, the first chapter in Matthew corresponds with our chap. ii. 1-15, and is entitled Περὶ τῶν μάγων ("Concerning the Magi"). There is a similar division in the Acts and Epistles, to which Euthalius (cir. A.D. 458), though not its inventor, gave wide currency by his stichometric edition of these books. The Apocalypse was divided by Andreas, Bishop of Cæsarea in Cappadocia (cir. A.D. 500), into twenty-four λόγοι, or chapters, and each of these chapters into three κεφάλαια, or sections, the former number answering to the twenty-four elders spoken of in the book (Rev. iv. 4); the latter suggested by the threefold division of human nature into body, soul, and spirit (comp. 1 Thess. v. 23), as the author himself tells us.

In the Vatican manuscript (B), there is a division of the Gospels into much shorter chapters (Matt. 170, Mark 62, Luke 152, John 80), very judiciously made. This has been found in only one other manuscript, the Codex Zacynthius (Ξ).

In the Acts and Epistles the Vatican manuscript has a twofold division into chapters, — one very ancient, the other later, but both different from the Euthalian. In the older division, the Pauline Epistles are treated as one book. (For further details see Tischendorf, N.T. Vat. 1867, p. xxx.; Scrivener, Introd., 2d ed., p. 52.) Other ancient divisions of the New Testament into chapters were more or less widely current, especially in Latin and Syriac manuscripts.

The subscriptions at the end of the Pauline Epistles in many manuscripts are generally ascribed to Euthalius. At least six of these are untrustworthy (1 Cor., Gal., 1 and 2 Thess., 1 Tim., Tit.).

The division of the Bible into our present chapters has been generally attributed to Cardinal Hugo de Sancto Caro (Hugues de St. Cher), a Dominican monk (d. A.D. 1263) who used it for his great concordance of the Latin Vulgate. But there appear to be much better grounds for ascribing it to Stephen Langton, Archbishop of Canterbury (d. 1228). (See Dr. C. R. Gregory's Prolegomena to the eighth critical edition of Tischendorf's N.T. Gr.) It is found only in very late Greek manuscripts. The division of the New Testament into our present verses was made by Robert Stephens (Estienne, Stephanus) in his N.T. Gr. et Lat., printed at Geneva, in 1551. An earlier division of the New Testament into verses about three times as long, by Sanctes Pagninus, in his Latin translation of the Bible (Lyons, 1528), did not find favor. The whole Bible was first divided into our present verses in Robert Stephens's edition of the Latin Vulgate in 1555 (not 1548, or 1545, or 1558, as stated by many writers). The first English New Testament so divided was Whittingham's translation, Geneva, 1557; the first English Bible, the Genevan version of 1560.

Another ancient division of the New-Testament text remains to be noticed, — the lessons, or lectiones (ἀναγνώσεις, ἀναγνώσματα, περικοπῆαι), from the Gospels on the one hand, and the Acts and Epistles on the other, read in the public services of the church. The history of these is obscure, and they varied much at different periods and in different regions. The lessons for the Sundays and chief festivals of the year seem to have been the earliest; next were added lessons for the Saturdays, and finally for every day in the week, with special commemoration of saints and martyrs. Euthalius marked in the Acts 16 of these ἀναγνώσματα; in the Catholic Epistles, 10; in the Pauline Epistles, 31; in all, 57. He was not, probably, as many have supposed, their inventor. The system of lessons which ultimately prevailed in the Greek Church appears in our Evangelistaries and Lectionaries (more properly Praxapostoli), containing the lessons from the Gospels and the Acts and Epistles respectively. The ordinary manuscripts of the Greek Testament were often adapted for church service by marking the beginning and end of each lesson, with a note in the margin of the time or occasion for reading it, and by prefixing to them a Synaxarion, or table of the lessons in their order; sometimes also a Menologion, or calendar of the immovable festivals and the saints' days, with their appropriate lessons. — E. A.]

Turning to the internal history of the New-Testament text, it is evident that its original perfect purity was early lost. The quotations of the latter half of the second century contain readings which agree with later texts, but are not apostolic. Irenæus alludes (Adv. her. V. 30, § 1) to the difference between the copies; and Origen, early in the third century, expressly declares that matters were growing worse (in Matt. tom. xv. 14), as is proved by the quotations of the Fathers of the third and fourth centuries. From this time onward we have the manuscript text of each century, the writings of the Fathers, the various Oriental and Occidental versions, all testifying to varieties of reading for almost every verse, which undoubtedly occasioned many more or less important departures from the sense of the original text. How came this? The early Church did not know any thing of that anxious clinging to the letter which characterizes the scientific rigor and the piety of modern times, and therefore was not so bent upon preserving the exact words. Moreover, the first copies were made rather for private than for public use: copyists were careless, often wrote from dictation, and were liable to misunderstand. Attempted improvements of the text in grammar and style; proposed corrections in history and geography; efforts to harmonize the quotations in the New Testament with the Greek of the Septuagint, but especially to harmonize the Gospels; the writing-out of abbreviations; incorporation of marginal notes in the text; the embellishing of the Gospel narratives with stories drawn from non-apostolic though trustworthy sources, e.g., John vii. 53 to viii. 11, and Mark xvi. 9 to end, — it is to these causes that we must attribute the very numerous "readings," or textual variations. It is true that the copyists were sometimes learned men; but perhaps their zeal in making corrections may have obscured the true text as much as the ignorance of the unlearned. The copies, indeed, came under the eye of an official reviser; but he may have sometimes exceeded his functions, and done more harm than good by his changes.

Attempts were made by learned Fathers to get the pure text; and three men of the third century — Origen, the Egyptian Bishop Hesychius, and the Presbyter Lucian of Antioch — deserve mention for their devotion to this object. The two last undertook a sort of recension of the New Testament (see Jerome, Epist. ad Damasum); but we do not know exactly what they did, and their influence was small. In regard to Origen, while he did not make a formal recension of the New-Testament text, his critical work was of the highest importance. Notwithstanding these diversities, there were, as early as the fourth and fifth centuries, affinities between manuscripts prepared in the same district, which seem to betray certain tendencies, as is proved by the Fathers, the versions, and the Greek manuscripts themselves. This somewhat justifies us in speaking of an Oriental and Occidental, or, more correctly, an Alexandrian or Egyptian, and a Latin, as also of an Asiatic or Greek, and a Byzantine or Constantinopolitan text. According to this theory, the Alexandrian was used by those Jewish Christians of the East who already used the Septuagint; particularly was this text preserved and spread by the learned Alexandrian school. The Latin text characterizes not only the manuscripts prepared by Latins, but the Greek manuscripts they used. The Asiatic manuscripts were used chiefly by native Greeks in Greece, or in the Asiatic provinces having intercourse with Greece. The Byzantine manuscripts belonged to the Church of that empire. The latter alone had a certain official uniformity, and were, in the latter centuries, almost the only manuscripts circulated in the empire. This class of manuscripts is also the only one perfectly represented in existing documents, and is the result of the gradual mixture of older recensions under the predominance of the Asiatic or Greek. Each of these recensions is more or less altered and corrupted; so that it is often more difficult to assign a particular reading to its proper class than to find out the original. Finally, the differences and relationships are by far most strongly marked in the Gospels, least so in the Apocalypse, and again are more distinct in the Pauline Epistles and the Acts than in the Catholic Epistles. (See TISCHENDORF, Nov. Test. Græce. Editio Academica VIII., Lips., 1875, p. xxiv. seqq.)

NOTICE OF THE UNCIAL MSS. OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.

N: Codex Sinaiticus, found by Tischendorf (1844 and 1859) in the Convent of St. Catharine at the foot of Mount Sinai, now preserved in St. Petersburg. Forty-three leaves of the Old-Testament portion of the manuscript, known as the Codex Friderico-Augustanus, are in the Library of the Leipzig University. Besides twenty-six books of the Old Testament, of which five form the Codex Friderico-Augustanus, the manuscript contains the ENTIRE NEW TESTAMENT WITHOUT THE LEAST BREAK, the Epistle of Barnabas, and the first third of the Shepherd of Hermas. The Alexandrian copyist has frequently shown his imperfect knowledge of Greek, and his haste. The license in handling the text, common in the first three centuries, is greater than in B A C, though much less than in D. Nevertheless, the superiority of the Codex Sinaiticus to all other New-Testament manuscripts, with the single exception of B, is fully proved by the numerous places in which its reading has the support of the oldest quotations, or the most ancient versions. The text is in four columns, which is a unique arrangement. The Pauline Epistles, among which is Hebrews after 2 Thessalonians, come directly after the Gospels; the Acts and the Catholic Epistles, and the Apocalypse, follow. The date of the Codex is the fourth century. It has a special value from the fact, that, owing to the corrections it received in the sixth and seventh centuries and later, its pages represent, after a fashion, the history of the changes in the New-Testament text. The Codex was published (1862) in FACSIMILE type from the Leipzig press, in four folio volumes, at the expense of the Emperor of Russia, Alexander II. The edition was limited to three hundred copies. The New-Testament part was published separately in a critical edition by Tischendorf, N. T. SINAITICUM CUM EPISTULA BARNABÆ ET FRAGMENTIS PASTORIS, etc., Lips., 1863, 4to, and in a more popular form in 1865, N. T. GRÆCÆ SINAITICO CODICE . . . VATICANA ITEMQUE ELZEVIRIANA LECTIO NOTATA, 8vo. See also Scrivener, A FULL COLLATION OF THE CODÆX SINAITICUS WITH THE RECEIVED TEXT OF THE N. T., 2d ed., Cambridge and London, 1867.

A: Codex Alexandrinus, now in the British Museum, presented in 1628 by Cyril Lucar, Patriarch of Constantinople (formerly of Alexandria) to Charles I. After the Old Testament, the New Testament begins with Matt. xxv. 6, and contains the whole, excepting John vi. 50-viii. 52, and 2 Cor. in 13-iii. 6. It has been printed in facsimile type by C. G. Woide in 1786, and in usual type by B. H. Cowper in 1800, who corrects a few mistakes of Woide, and commits a few himself. The date, according to Tischendorf, is about the middle of the fifth century. [A photograph of the Codex is in course of publication by the Trustees of the British Museum, of which the New Testament and Clementine Epistles appeared in 1879 at London.]

B: Codex Vaticanus, No. 1209, in the Vatican Library. The manuscript contains, besides the Old Testament, the entire New Testament, with the exception of Heb. ix. 14 to end, 1st and 2d Timothy, Titus, Philemon, and the Apocalypse. Sepulveda (1491-1572) in 1533, writing to Erasmus, mentions it; but it is likely that Erasmus had heard of it in 1521 (Scrivener, INTROD. p. 99). The first real collation of the manuscript, made in 1669 by Bartolucci, then librarian of the Vatican, exists only in manuscript in the Paris Library. The collation made for Richard Bentley by an Italian named Alteo was published by Ford in his APPEND. COD. ALEX. in 1799. Birch's appeared in 1788-1801. Hug (1810) first appreciated its age and value. After many attempts on the part of Protestant scholars, including Tischendorf's fourteen days' use at three hours daily, and the pitiable inaccuracy of the long-awaited edition by Cardinal Mai (1857), Vercellone and Cozza issued an edition of the entire Codex, of which the New Testament is vol. V. (1868). The Codex is as old as N.

B (2): Codex Vaticanus 2066 (eighth century), formerly Basilian Codex 106, in the library of the Basilian monks in Rome. First imperfectly edited by Tischendorf (MON. SACR. INED., 1846), and carefully in 1869, after a fresh collation made in 1866 (APPENDIX N. T. VATICANI, Lips., 1869, 4to, pp. 1-20). Tregelles designates the manuscript by the letter Q.

C: Codex Ephraemi (fifth century) now No. 9 in the great library at Paris; in the sixth, and again in the ninth century, altered in many places. In the twelfth century the original writing was washed off to make room for the Greek text of several ascetic works of Ephraem Syrus (d. 373). Pierre Allix, at about the close of the seventeenth century, noticed the traces of the old writing under the later characters. Weistain in 1710 collated the New-Testament part so far as it was legible. In 1834 and 1835 the librarian, Carl Hase, revised the original writing by the application of the Giobertine tincture (prussiate of potash). Tischendorf, after great labor, brought out in 1849 an edition of the New-Testament part of the manuscript, and in 1846, of the Old-Testament fragments, representing the manuscript line for line, but in ordinary type (capitals). The Codex contains portions of the Old Testament on sixty-four leaves, and five-eighths of the New Testament.

D (1): Codex Bezae (about A. D. 550), now in the University Library at Cambridge, a present in 1581 from Theodore Beza. It contains, with few lacunae, the Greek and Latin text of the Gospels and the Acts stichometrically written, perhaps in Gaul. Edited by Kipling in 1793, but in a far better manner by Scrivener (BEZÆ COD. CANTAB.) in 1864. No known manuscript has so many and so remarkable interpolations. It has a special affinity with the Old Latin version and the Curetonian Syriac.

D (2): Codex Claromontanus of the Pauline Epistles, including Hebrews (second half of sixth century). Beza found it in the Monastery of Clermont, hence the name; now in the Paris Library. Contains the Greek and Latin text written stichometrically. It was retouched at different times, and exhibits especially two periods of the text. The Latin text represents the oldest version,—that of the second century. It was collated by Tregelles in 1849 and 1850, and edited by Tischendorf in 1852.

E (1): Codex Basileensis A. N. III. 12 (A. D. 750), in Basel, a nearly complete manuscript of the Four Gospels, collated by Tregelles (1846), also by Tischendorf and Müller (1843).

E (2): Codex Laudianus (end of sixth century), in the Bodleian Library at Oxford, a present from Archbishop Laud in 636; was brought to England in 668; Bede (d. 735) used it when writing his Expositio Retractata of the Acts. It contains an almost complete Greek-Latin text of the Acts. Edited in 1716 by Hearne, and in 1870 by Tischendorf.

E (3): Codex Sangermanensis, a Greek-Latin manuscript of the Pauline Epistles (end of ninth century), now in St. Petersburg, the Greek text being a clumsy copy of the Codex Claromont. Of no critical value except for the Latin text.

F (1): Codex Boreellii of the Four Evangelists, but defective (ninth century), now in Utrecht University. See, for full description, Jod. Heringa: DISPUTATIO DE CODICE BOREELLIANO, ed. H. E. Vinke, 1843.

F (2): Codex Augiensis of the Pauline Epistles (close of ninth century), Greek and Latin text, and Hebrews only in Latin; named from the Monastery of Reichenau (AUGIA DIVES or MAIOR) in Switzerland; bought by Richard Bentley at Heidelberg, and bequeathed by his nephew (1787) to Trinity College, Cambridge. The Latin is not a translation of the Greek. Collated by Tischendorf 1842, Tregelles 1845, and carefully edited by Scrivener 1859. [See G (3).]

F^a: Designates those passages of the Gospels, Acts, and Pauline Epistles, which were written in the margin of the Codex Octavech in Paris, dating from the beginning of the seventh century. Printed by Tischendorf in 1846 (MON. SACR. INED.).

G (1): Codex Harleianus of the Gospels (tenth century), with many breaks; brought by Andrew Erasmus Seidel from the East in the seventeenth century. Now in the British Museum. Collated by Weistain, Tischendorf, and Tregelles.

G (2): A St. Petersburg fragment of the Acts (ii. 46-iii. 8) (seventh century), brought by Tischendorf from the East in 1850. It has a few rare and valuable readings. [See L (2).]

G^b: Codex Vaticanus 9671, formerly Cryptoferratensis (of Grotta Ferrata), of the ninth century, or earlier, containing fragments of Acts vii., xvii., xviii. Edited by Cozza, SACRORUM BIBLIORUM VETUST. FRAGMENTA, Pars 3, Roma, 1877.

G (3): Codex Boernerianus of the Pauline Epistles (ninth century), now in Royal Library of Dresden, with Greek and Latin text; Hebrews and some forty verses besides are wanting. The Greek text is taken from the same original from which the COD. AUGIENSIS was copied. The Latin text differs widely from the Vulgate. Edited by Matthæi in 1791, collated by Tregelles and Tischendorf. [See under A.]

H (1): Codex Seidelii of the Gospels (tenth century), beginning Matt. xv. 30, and defective in all the Gospels. Now in the Public Library of Hamburg. Collated by Tregelles, 1850, and examined in 1854 by Tischendorf.

H (2): Codex Mutinensis of Acts (ninth century), lacks about seven chapters. Now at Modena. Carefully collated by Tischendorf (1843) and Tregelles (1845).

H (3): Codex Coislinianus (sixth century), fragments of the Pauline Epistles in twenty-nine leaves, all found in the BINDING of manuscripts at or from the Monastery of St. Athanasius at Mount Athos. Twelve of these leaves are in the National Library at Paris; and two formerly there are now at St. Petersburg. These fourteen leaves, containing fragments of 1 Corinthians, Galatians, 1 Timothy, Titus, and Hebrews, were published by Moutaouon in 1716, in his BIBLIOTHECA COISLINIANA. Two more leaves at Moscow (Bibl. S. Syn. 61), containing parts of Heb. x., were first described and collated by Matthæi (1784), and have been edited in facsimile by Sabas (SPECIM. PALÆOGR., Moscow, 1863). They are designated as N^c in Tischendorf's GREEK TESTAMENT, seventh edition (1859). Four more leaves, belonging to Archbishop Porfiri and the Archimandrite Antony, are cited by Tischendorf in his last critical edition on 2 Cor. iv. 4-6; Col. iii. 5-8; 1 Thess. ii. 9-13, iv. 6-10. Still more recently nine new leaves have been discovered at Mount Athos. Their text, containing parts of 2 Corinthians and Galatians, has been published by Duchesne in the ARCHIVES DES MISSIONS SCIENT. ET LIT., 3^e sér., tom. iii. p. 420 ff., Paris, 1876.

I: Codex Tischendorffianus II., at St. Petersburg, designates a manuscript in which, under later Georgian writing, there are twenty-eight palimpsest leaves of seven different codices, containing fragments of the New Testament, as follows:—1^a, of John xi., xii., xv., xvi., xix. 1^b, of 1 Cor. xv., xvi.; Tit. 1.; Acts xxviii. 1^c, of Matt. xiv., xv., xvi., xvii.; Mark ix., xiv. 1^d, of Matt. xvii.-xix. 1^e, of Acts ii., xvi. 1^f, of Acts xviii. 1^g, of Luke vii., xv. 1^h, of the sixth; 1ⁱ, of the seventh. The text of 1^a-3^a-4^a has a close affinity with N A B C D L. Published by Tischendorf in his MON. SACR. INED. N. C., vol. i. (1855).

I^b (formerly N^b, beginning of fifth century), four palimpsest leaves in the British Museum, containing, under two layers of Syriac writing, fragments of seventeen verses of John xiii. and xvi. Deciphered by Tischendorf and Tregelles, and published by the former in his MON. SACR. INED. N. C., vol. ii. (1857).—E. A.]

K (1): Codex Cyprius of the Gospels, complete (middle or end of ninth century); now in Paris. Collated by Tischendorf (1842) and Tregelles (1849 and 1850).

K (2): Codex Mosquensis of the Catholic and Pauline Epistles (ninth century); brought from Mount Athos to Moscow. Lacks a part of Romans and 1 Corinthians. Collated by Matthæi.

L (1): Codex Regius of the Gospels (eighth century), now in Paris, almost complete. Closely related to N and B and the text of Origen. Published by Tischendorf in his MON. SACR. INED., 1846.

L (2): Codex Angelicus or Passionei of the Acts and Catholic Epistles (formerly G), and of the Pauline (formerly I) (ninth century), now in the Angelica Library of the Augustinian monks at Rome. Contains Acts vii. 10 to Heb. xiii. 10. Collated by Tischendorf (1843) and Tregelles (1845).

M (1): Codex Campianus of the Gospels, complete (end of ninth century), now in Paris. Copied and used by Tischendorf (1849).

M (2): Codex Ruber of the Pauline Epistles (ninth century). Two folio leaves at Hamburg (Heb. i. 7-in. 3, xii. 20-xiii. 25), and two at London (1 Cor. v. 62-2 Cor. i. 15; 2 Cor. x. 13-xii. 5). Written in red. Edited by Tischendorf in ANECDOT. SACR. ET PROF., 1855, and, with a few corrections, 1861.

N (1): Codex Purpureus (end of the sixth century), a beautiful Gospel manuscript written on the thinnest vellum, dyed purple, with silver letters (the abbreviations ΘΥ, ΚΥ, etc., in gold; four leaves in London, two in Vienna, six in the Vatican, and thirty-three in the Monastery of St. John in Patmos. Tischendorf used in his eighth edition of the New Testament the readings of the thirty-three Patmos leaves transcribed by John Sakkelion, containing Mark vi. 63-rn. 23, with some gaps. These have since been published by Duchesne in the ARCHIVES DES MISSIONS SCIENTIFIQUES, 3^e sér., tom. iii. (1876).

N (2): Two leaves (ninth century), containing Gal. v. 12-vi. 4 and Heb. v. 8-vi. 10. Brought by Tischendorf to St. Petersburg.

N^b: The manuscript now marked by Tischendorf I^b.

O (1): Eight leaves (ninth century), containing a part of John i. and xx., with scholia. Now in Moscow (S. Syn. 120). Edited by Matthæi (1785), and, after him, by Tregelles, COD. ZACXYNTIUS (1867), Appendix.

O (2): Two leaves (sixth century), containing 2 Cor. i. 20-ii. 12. Brought from the East to St. Petersburg by Tischendorf in 1859.

On Oe Ol Oe Ot: Psalters or other manuscripts, containing some or all of the hymns of Luke's Gospel (i. 46 ff., 68 ff., ii. 29 ff.). O^a is at Wolfenbüttel (ed. Tischendorf, ANECD.

SACR. ET PROF., 1855). Ob at Oxford. Oc at Verona, the Greek text in Roman letters (ed. Bianchini, 1740). Od at Zürich, on purple vellum in silver letters (ed. Tischendorf, MON. SACR. INED. N. C. vol. iv.). Oe and Of at St. Gall and St. Petersburg (collated by Tischendorf). Oe is of the sixth century; Oe, of the seventh; Oab et, of the ninth.

Ob: of the Pauline Epistles, a leaf (sixth century), which imperfectly presents Eph. iv. 1-18. Collated by Tischendorf at Moscow in 1868.

P (1): Codex Guelpherbytanus I. (sixth century), a palimpsest with two hiatus; the text is particularly good in the Apocalypse. Belongs to Archbishop Porfiri of St. Petersburg. Edited by Tischendorf, MON. SACR. INED. N. C., vol. vi., 1869.

P (2): Codex Porfirianus of the Acts, Epistles, and Apocalypse (ninth century), a palimpsest with two hiatus; the text is particularly good in the Apocalypse. Belongs to Archbishop Porfiri of St. Petersburg. Edited by Tischendorf, MON. SACR. INED. N. C., vols. v. and vi., 1865 and 1869.

Q (1): Codex Guelpherbytanus II. (fifth century), a palimpsest containing fragments (247 verses) of Luke and John; now at Wolfenbüttel. Edited by Tischendorf in MON. SACR. INED. N. C., vol. iii., 1860.

R: Codex Nitriensis (sixth century), a fragmentary palimpsest of Luke from a monastery in the Nitrian Desert; now in the British Museum. Collated by Tregelles (1864), and ed. by Tischendorf (MON. SACR. INED. N. C., vol. ii., 1857).

[R (2): A palimpsest leaf at Grotta Ferrata (seventh cent. f.), containing 2 Cor. xi. 1-9; publ. by Cozza, Rome, 1867.]

S: Codex Vaticanus 354 (A. D. 949), a complete manuscript of the Gospels. Collated by Tischendorf for the eighth edition of his Greek Testament.

T: Codex Borgianus I. (fifth century), now in the College of the Propaganda in Rome, fragments of Luke xii., xiii., and John vi.-viii., the Greek text accompanied by a Sahidic version. The fragments of John were published by Giorgi in 1789. Those of Luke were first collated by B. H. Alford.

T^{wo}: Fragments of Luke xii. 16-xiii. 32, John viii. 23-32, formerly owned by Woide, and published by Ford in his APPEND. COD. ALEX. (1799). Similar to the preceding, but shown by Lightfoot to belong to a different manuscript.

T^h: Fragments of the first four chapters of John (sixth century), now at St. Petersburg.

T^h: A fragment of Matthew (xiv. 19-xv. 8), resembling the above.

T^d: Fragments of a Greek-Sahidic Evangelistary (seventh century) found by Tischendorf (1866) among the Borgian manuscripts at Rome. Contains Matt. xvi. 13-20; Mark i. 3-8, xii. 36-37; John xix. 23-27, xx. 30-31.

T^e: A bit of an Evangelistary, of about the sixth century, from Upper Egypt, now in the Library of the University of Cambridge, England. It contains Matt. iii. 13-16. Readings given in the Postscript to Tregelles's Greek Testament, p. 1070.—E. A.]

U: Codex Nuntianus (end of ninth or beginning of tenth century), now in Library of St. Mark, Venice. Contains the Gospels complete. Collated by Tischendorf and Tregelles.

V: Codex Mosquensis of the Gospels to John vii. 39 (ninth century), almost complete. Written at Mount Athos. Matthei collated and described it in 1779.

W^a and W^b: The former designates two leaves, with fragments of Luke ix., x., in the National Library at Paris, probably of the eighth century. Edited by Tischendorf in his MON. SACR. INED., 1846. The latter is a palimpsest of fourteen leaves found by Tischendorf at Naples, and fully deciphered by him in 1866.

W: Three leaves (ninth century), containing Mark ii. 8-16, Luke i. 20-32, 64-79; now at St. Gall. Edited by Tischendorf, MON. SACR. INED., N. C., vol. iii. (1860).

W^d: Fragments of Mark vii., viii., &c. (ninth century), found in the BINDING of a volume in the Library of Trinity College, Cambridge. The readings are remarkable.

W^e: A fragment containing John to 9-14, discovered in 1865 in the Library of Christ Church College at Oxford. Closely resembles O, and is perhaps a part of the same manuscript. Alford calls it Frag. Ath. b; and his Frag. Ath. a, containing John ii. 17-iii. 8, found by P. E. Pusey in the cover of a manuscript at Mount Athos, probably belongs to the same Code.

Wⁱ: So we may designate a palimpsest leaf (ninth century), containing Mark v. 16-46, found by Mr. Vansittart in Cod. 192 of the Acts (see Scrivener, INTROD., 2d ed. p. 147).

X: Codex Monacensis of the Gospels, fragmentary (end of ninth or beginning of tenth century). Now in the Munich University Library. Collated by Tischendorf and Tregelles.

Y: Codex Barberini of the Gospel of John, fragmentary (eighth century). Now in the Library of the Prince Barberini at Rome. Tischendorf published it in MON. SACR. INED., 1846.

Z: Codex Dublinensis rescriptus (sixth century), one of the chief palimpsests extant; with numerous fragments from Matthew. Now in Trinity College, Dublin. Barrett published a faulty facsimile (1801); Tregelles supplemented his edition in 1863; and it has lately been re-edited with great care by T. K. Abbott, PAR PALIMPSESTORUM DUBLINENSIS, London, 1880.

Γ: Codex Tischendorffianus IV., brought by Tischendorf from the East, and bought of him for the Bodleian Library,

Oxford, in 1855. In 1859 he brought from the same monastery ninety-nine more leaves, unfortunately in St. Petersburg, which, with those at Oxford, make a nearly complete copy of the Gospels. [The subscription at the end of the Gospel of John gives an indication which may belong to the year 844, 889, 934, or 979. Tischendorf favors the first; Gardthausen (PALÆOGR., p. 404 f.), the last of these dates.]

Δ: Codex Sangallensis of the Gospels (ninth century), complete (lacking one leaf), with a Latin interlinear translation, somewhat conformed to the Vulgate. Published in facsimile by Rettig in 1836. It was originally a part of the same manuscript as G (3), written, probably, by Irish monks in the Monastery of St. Gall, Switzerland.

Θ: Codex Tischendorffianus I. (seventh century), now in the Leipzig University Library, containing fragments of Matt. xiii., xiv., xv. Found by Tischendorf in the East in 1844, and published in his MON. SACR. INED., 1846. A few lines of Matt. xii. were also discovered in 1863, and published in his MON. SACR. INED., N. C., vol. ii. (1867).

Θ^h: Six leaves (sixth or seventh century), fragments of Matt. xvii., xviii., and Mark iv., v. Brought by Tischendorf to St. Petersburg in 1859.

Θ^e: Two folio leaves (sixth century), with Matt. xxi. 19-24, and John xviii. 29-35. Tischendorf brought the first, and Archbishop Porfiri the second, to St. Petersburg.

Θ^l: A fragment (eighth century) of Luke xi. 37-45. Brought to St. Petersburg by Tischendorf.

Θ^c: A fragment (sixth century) of Matt. xxvi. 2-7, 9.

Θ^f: Fragments (sixth century) of Matt. xxvi., xxvii., and Mark i., ii.

Θ^z: A fragment (sixth century) of John (vi. 13-24), similar to O (2).

Θ^h: Græco-Arabic fragments (ninth century) of Matt. xiv. and xv., which, together with Θ c i g, belong to the collection of Archbishop Porfiri, in St. Petersburg.

Α: Codex Tischendorffianus III. (ninth century), Luke and John complete, with occasional scholia in uncials on the margin, partly of a critical kind. Now in the Bodleian Library, Oxford; collated by Tischendorf (who brought it from the East) and Tregelles. The portion of this manuscript containing Matthew and Mark is written in CURSIVE characters, and was brought by Tischendorf to St. Petersburg in 1859.

Ξ: Codex Zacynthius (eighth century), a palimpsest containing Luke i. 1-vi. 33, with some gaps; brought from the Island of Zante, and presented in 1821 to the British and Foreign Bible Society, London; deciphered and published by Tregelles in 1867. The text, which is very valuable, is surrounded by a commentary.

Η: Codex Petropoliensis of the Gospels (ninth century), complete, excepting seventy-seven verses. Brought to St. Petersburg by Tischendorf from Smyrna.

Σ: Codex Rossanensis (sixth century), containing Matt. i. 1-Mark xvi. 14, and belonging to the chapter of the Cathedral Church at Rossano, is written on very fine purple vellum in silver letters, with the three first lines in both columns, at the beginning of each Gospel, in gold. It is adorned with eighteen remarkable pictures in water-colors, representing scenes in the gospel history, with forty figures of the prophets of the Old Testament. Its initials bear a striking resemblance to those of the celebrated Vienna purple manuscript of Genesis. It numbers a hundred and eighteen leaves, some of which have been much injured by dampness. It originally contained the four Gospels. The text, as well as the writing, resembles that of Codex N of the Gospels. The writing is still more similar to that of the Zürich Psalter (seventh century) (published by Tischendorf in his MON. SACR. INED. N. C., vol. iv.), but may be a little older. This precious relic was discovered in the spring of 1879, at Rossano in Calabria (Southern Italy), by Dr. Gebhardt of Göttingen and Professor Harneck of Gießen, who have published a full description of it, with two facsimiles of the writing and outline sketches of the miniatures, in an elegant quarto entitled, EVANGELIUM COD. GRÆC. PURPUREUS ROSSANENSIS, Leipzig, 1880. Its text seems to hold a position about midway between that of the older uncials and those of the ninth and tenth centuries, agreeing most remarkably with N, often with Δ Π, or with D and the Old Latin, against the mass of later manuscripts.—E. A.]

Besides the UNCIAL, there are over six hundred CURSIVE manuscripts of the Gospels, varying in date from the ninth to the sixteenth centuries; above three hundred Evangelistaries, of which about sixty are uncials, the majority of these, however, written between the tenth and twelfth centuries; more than two hundred manuscripts of the Acts and Catholic Epistles; nearly three hundred manuscripts of the Pauline Epistles; over a hundred cursive manuscripts of the Apocalypse; and eighty Lectionaries (Praxapostoli), with readings from the Acts and the Epistles, but none older than the tenth century. The following is a list of some of the most valuable cursives:—

1: The Gospels, Codex Basil., A. N. IV. 2 (tenth century); collated by Weistein, recently by G. L. Roth and Tregelles.

13: The Acts and Catholic Epistles, identical with No. 38 of the Gospels.

17: The Pauline Epistles, identical with No. 33 of the Gospels.

31: The Acts and Catholic Epistles, identical with No. 69 of the Gospels.

33: The Gospels (Acts 13, Paul 17), Cod. Colbert. 2844 (eleventh century). Collated by Griesbach, and laboriously by Tregelles in 1850.

37: The Pauline Epistles, identical with No. 69 of the Gospels.

47: The Pauline Epistles, Cod. Bodl. Roe 16 (eleventh or twelfth century). Collated by Tregelles.

51: Acts and Catholic Epistles, Cod. Tischendorf. in the British Museum, dated April 20, 1044. Collated by Tischendorf, who discovered it, Tregelles, and Scrivener. Formerly called 104, i.e., londinensis Tischendorffanus.

59: The Gospels (Acts 31, Paul 37), Cod. Leicestrensis (eleventh century), collated by Tregelles (1852) and Scrivener (1856). This manuscript, together with 13, 124, 346, of the Gospels, are regarded as derived from an uncial archetype resembling codex D.

96: Apocalypse, Cod. Parham. 17 (twelfth or thirteenth century), collated by Scrivener.

[The number of uncial manuscripts of the New Testament, ranging in date from the fourth to the tenth century, is seventy-seven. (In this reckoning, six Psalters, containing the hymns, Luke i. 46-55, 68-79, ii. 29-32, and designated by Tischendorf as O^ab^cd^ef, are not counted; nor are the Church Lesson-Books—Evangelistaries and Praxapostoli—included.) About half of these seventy-seven manuscripts, however, are mere fragments, containing but a few verses, or at most a few chapters. They may be arranged as follows, with reference to their probable date:—

Cent. IV., 2: N with the whole New Testament; B, Gospels, Acts, Catholic Epistles, and Pauline Epistles (mutilated).

Cent. V., 10: New Testament, A C; Gosp., Q | I 1.3 I^b T T^{woi} (or T^a); mere fragments, P²; Paul, Q.

Cent. VI., 20: Gosp. and Acts, D; Gosp., N P R Z x (perhaps seventh century) | I 1.7 T^b T^c T^e e^c e^e e^f e^g; Acts, E; Paul, D | H | O O^b.

Cent. VIII., 8: Gosp., E L | z | W^a W^b Y e^d; Apoc., B.

Cent. IX., 25: Gosp., K M | F V X Γ Δ A Π | O W^c W^d W^e W^f e^b; Acts, Epp., Apoc., P; Acts, Epp., L; Cath. and Paul. Epp., K; Acts, G^b H; Paul, E F G | M N.

Cent. X., 4: Gosp., S U | G H.

The mark | is here used to separate complete from imperfect manuscripts, or the larger fragments from those containing less than two hundred verses.

In reference to the contents of the uncials, we may observe that only one, N, comprises the whole New Testament: only five others contain more than half of it; viz., A B C D of the Gospels and Acts, and P of the Acts, Epistles, and Apocalypse. They are distributed, according to the principal divisions of the New Testament, as follows:—

Of the Gospels there are 55. (a) Complete, or nearly so, 10: N B K M S U | E L Δ Π; (b) containing the larger part, 10: A C D Γ | F G H V X A; (c) considerable portions, but less than half, 7: N P Q R Z x z (Matt., Mark); (d) less than two hundred verses, 28: T^b W^b Y | F^a I 1.3.4.7 I^b O T^{woi} T^c d^e W^a c^d e^f e^g a^b d^e f^g h.

Acts, 16. (a) Complete, or nearly so, 4: N A B | E; (b) larger part, 5: C D H L P; (c) small fragments, 6: F^a I 2.5 G G^b.

Catholic Epistles, 7. (a) Complete, 5: N A B K L; (b) larger part, 2: C P.

Pauline Epistles, 20. (a) Complete, or nearly so, 3: N | D L; (b) larger part, 8: A B C E F G K P; (c) fragments, 9: H M | F^a I² N O O^b Q R (or O^c).

Apocalypse, 5. (a) Complete, 3: N A B; (b) larger part, 2: P | C.

In reference to the character of their text, Tischendorf classifies the uncials as follows: in the Gospels the oldest form of the text, predominantly Alexandrine in its coloring, is found, though with many differences, in N A B C D I 1.3.4.7 I^b L P Q R T^a b^c X Z Δ Θ^c Θ^e Ξ; next to these stand F^a N O | Σ | W^a b^c Y Θ^a b^e f. A later form of the text, in which the Asiatic coloring prevails, is presented by E F G H K M S U V T Δ Π Θ^h, among which E K M T A Π Θ^h incline most toward the first class. For the Acts and Catholic Epistles, N A B C give the oldest text, to which, in the Acts, D I approach, and, less closely, E G; also, in the Catholic Epistles (except 1 Pet.), P; while in the Acts, H L P [G^b], and, in the Catholic Epistles, K L, come nearest to the later form of the text. In the Pauline Epistles the oldest text is represented by N A B C H I² O Q [R], with the Græco-Latin manuscripts, D F G; M P approach this; while K L N stand nearest to the more recent text. The text of the Apocalypse appears in its oldest form in N A C, to which P comes nearer than B.

Tregelles exhibits the "genealogy of the text" and affinities of the manuscripts in the Gospels in the following form:—

WESTERN.	ALEXANDRINE.	BYZANTINE.
D	B N Z
	C L ≡ 1.33	A
	P Q T R I N	K M H
	X Δ 69	E F G S U, etc.

Westcott and Hort attach a superlative value to B.—The same manuscript may differ in character in different parts of the New Testament: thus, A is not so excellent in the Gospels as elsewhere; Δ is specially good in the Gospel of Mark; N and D agree most closely in the Gospel of John; the cursive 1 is remarkably valuable in the Gospels, but not so in the rest of the New Testament.—E. A.]

[2. History of the Printed Text.—For more than half a century after the invention of printing, the original text of the New Testament remained unpublished. The credit of first printing it belongs to Cardinal XIMENES DE CISNEROS, Archbishop of Toledo, who made it tom. V. of his great Polyglot Bible, printed at Alcalá, in Spain (Latin Complutum, hence the name Complutensian Polyglot), in 6 vols. folio (1514-17). The manuscripts depended upon were comparatively modern and of inferior value. Though the volume is dated June 10, 1514, the New Testament was not published before 1521 or 1522, and thus was preceded by the Greek-Latin New Testament of 1516, published by Froben of Basel, and edited by ERASMUS. He used as the basis of his text in the Gospels an inferior Basel manuscript of the fifteenth century (cod. 2), and one of the thirteenth or fourteenth century in the Acts and Epistles (cod. 2). With these he collated more or less carefully one other manuscript of the Gospels (cod. 1), two in the Acts and Catholic Epistles (codd. 1 and 4), and three in the Pauline Epistles (codd. 1, 4, 7). The oldest of these (cod. 1, tenth century) has a good text in the Gospels; but Erasmus made very little use of it: the others are comparatively modern, and poor. For the Revelation he had only a single manuscript of the twelfth century, wanting the last six verses, which he translated into Greek from the Latin Vulgate. In various other places in the Revelation he followed the readings of the Vulgate in opposition to the Greek, as he did in a few cases elsewhere. The result of the whole is, that in more than twenty places the Greek of the textus receptus, which is derived ultimately in the main from the fourth edition of Erasmus, is supported by the authority of no known Greek manuscript whatever. The first edition of Erasmus was sped through the press with headlong haste ("præcipitatum fuit verius quam editum," as Erasmus himself says) in order that the publisher, Froben, might get the start of the Complutensian. It consequently swarms with errors. A more correct edition was issued in 1519: Mill observed about four hundred changes in the text. For this and later editions, one additional manuscript (cod. 3) was used in the Gospels, Acts, and Epistles. In the third edition (1522) the changes were much fewer; but it is noted for the introduction of 1 John v. 7 from the Codex Montfortianus (sixteenth century). In the fourth edition (1527) the text was altered and improved in many places, particularly in the Revelation, from the Complutensian Polyglot. That of the fifth (1535) and last (Erasmus died in 1536) hardly differs from the fourth.—The next editions which call for notice are those of the great printer and scholar, ROBERT STEPHENS (Estienne, Stephanus), published at Paris in 1546, 1549 (the beautiful "O mirificam" editions, in 16mo), 1550 (a magnificent folio, editio regia), and Geneva, 1551 (16mo), in the last of which our present division into verses was first introduced into the Greek text. (The first edition of the whole Bible which contains this verse-division was Robert Stephens's edition of the Latin Vulgate in 1555, not 1548 as is often erroneously stated.) His Greek Testament of 1550, notwithstanding its array of various readings in the margin from fifteen manuscripts and the Complutensian Polyglot, is mainly founded on the fourth or fifth edition of Erasmus: Scrivener has noted a hundred and nineteen places in which he differs from all of his manuscripts. The text of the edition of 1551 varies but slightly from that of 1550.—The four folio editions of THEODORE BEZA (1519-1605), Geneva (1565-82-88 or 89, and 1598), as well as his five 8vo editions (1565-67-80-90, 1604), follow, for the most part, Stephens's editions of 1550 or 1551, with changes here and there, many of which are not improvements. Stephens's edition of 1550 is commonly spoken of in England as the textus receptus; but on the Continent the first ELZEVR edition, printed at Leyden in 1624, has generally received that designation. The expression is borrowed from the preface to the second Elzevir edition (1633), in which we find the words, "Textum ergo habes, nunc ab omnibus receptum." The text of the seven Elzevir editions (1624-33-41, Leyden; 1636-62-70-78, Amsterdam), among which there are a few slight differences, is made up almost wholly from Beza's smaller editions of 1565 and 1580 (Reuss): its editor is unknown. The textus receptus, slavishly followed, with slight diversities, in hundreds of editions, and substantially represented in all the principal modern Protestant translations prior to the present century, thus resolves itself essentially into that of the last edition of Erasmus, framed from a few modern and inferior manuscripts and the Complutensian Polyglot, in the infancy of biblical criticism.

The editions which follow from 1657 to 1830, with the exception of that of GRIESBACH, are mainly important, as regards the text, for their accumulation of critical materials. In WALTON'S POLYGLOT (London, 1657), Stephens's Greek text of 1550 was accompanied by the Vulgate, Peshito Syriac, Ethiopic, Arabic, and in parts of the New Testament, other ancient versions, with a critical apparatus including the readings of Codex A, D (1), D (2), Stephens's margin, and eleven cursive manuscripts collated by or for Archbishop Ussher. In Bishop FELL'S edition (Oxford, 1675), who reprinted substantially the Elzevir text, other authorities, including readings of the Coptic and Gothic versions, are given in the notes, though the titlepage, "ex plus 100 MSS. codicibus," is very misleading.—The edition of JOHN MILL (1645-1707), Oxford, 1707, fol. (improved and enlarged by Küster, Amsterdam and Leipzig, also Rotterdam, 1710), the work of thirty years, marks an epoch in the history of textual criticism by its vast additions to the store of critical material through the collation of new manuscripts, the collection of readings from the ancient versions, and especially from the quotations found in the writings of the Christian Fathers, and by its very learned and valuable Prolegomena. Mill gave his judgment on many readings in his notes and Prolegomena, but did not venture to form a text of his own, reprinting Stephens's text of 1550 without intentional variation.—The projected edition of the Greek Testament and Latin Vulgate in parallel columns, by the illustrious critic, RICHARD BENTLEY, deserves a brief notice. Proposals for printing were issued in 1720, and a large amount of materials collected at great expense, including a collation of Codex B (published by Ford in 1799); but the work was never completed. It was to have been founded on the oldest Greek and Latin manuscripts, compared with the principal ancient versions and the quotations in the Fathers of the first five centuries. See A. A. Ellis, Bentley's Critica Sacra, 1862.—JOHN ALBERT BENGEL'S (1687-1752) edition, Tübingen, 1734, 4to, while it had the advantage of some new manuscripts, was specially valuable for its discussions and illustrations of the principles of criticism, and its classification of manuscripts; but, except in the Apocalypse, he did not dare to introduce into his text any reading, even though he believed it unquestionably genuine, which had not previously appeared in some printed edition. His judgment of the value of different readings was, however, given in the margin.—The magnificent edition of JOHN JAMES WETSTEIN (1693-1754), 2 vols. fol., Amsterdam, 1751-52, the work of forty years, greatly enlarged the store of critical material by extensive collation of manuscripts and researches into the quotations of the Fathers, and by his description of this material in very valuable and copious Prolegomena, reprinted, with additions by Semler, Halle, 1764. He gives also the readings of the chief printed editions which preceded him, and describes them fully. He introduced the present method of denoting the uncial manuscripts by Roman capitals, and the cursives and lectionaries by Arabic figures. Besides the critical matter, his edition is a thesaurus of quotations from ancient Greek and Latin and rabbinical authors, illustrating the phraseology of the New Testament, or containing passages more or less parallel in sentiment. Bishop Marsh calls it "the invaluable book." His publisher insisted on his reprinting the textus receptus (substantially that of the Elzevirs); but he gives his critical judgment in the margin and the notes. — Other editions to be briefly mentioned are those of F. C. ALTER, Vienna, 1786–87, giving the readings of twenty-two Vienna manuscripts and of four manuscripts of the Slavonic version; of ANDREW BIRCH, Quatuor Evangelia Græce, Copenhagen, 1788, 4to, and Varie Lectiones, 1798, 1800, 1801, exhibiting the readings of many manuscripts collated in the libraries of Italy, Spain, and Germany, by himself and others; and of C. F. MATTHÆI, Nov. Test. Gr. et Latine (Vulg.), Riga, 1782–88, in 12 vols. 8vo, also Nov. Test. Græce, Wittenberg, etc., 1803–07, in 3 vols. 8vo, for which over a hundred manuscripts were used, mostly from the Library of the Holy Synod at Moscow. Matthæi was a careful collator, but a very poor critic; and his manuscripts generally were of inferior quality.

The first edition of JOHN JAMES GRIESBACH (1745–1812) had been published in 1774–75 (the first three Gospels in synopsis); but we need consider only the second, Halle, 1796–1806, 2 vols. 8vo, in which, though not wholly freed from the fetters of the textus receptus, he first made really good use of the materials gathered by his predecessors, and augmented by his own collections. A manual edition was issued at Leipzig in 1805[–06], the text of which, differing somewhat from that of the larger edition, expresses his later critical judgment. Following in the track of Bengel and Semler, Griesbach sought to simplify the process of criticism by classifying his manuscripts and other authorities. He made three classes or recensions, — the Alexandrian, the Western, and the Constantinopolitan or Byzantine, — to the latter of which the mass of later and inferior manuscripts belongs. Though his system is not now accepted in its details, much truth lay at the bottom of it. His principles of criticism were sound; and in his application of them he displayed rare skill and tact. In 1827 a third edition of the first volume of his Greek Testament was published, with important additions, under the editorship of Dr. DAVID SCHULZ. Griesbach's Symbolæ critica (Halle, 1785–93), and Commentarius criticus (on Matthew and Mark), part i., ii., with Meletemata critica (prefixed to part ii.), Jena, 1798–1811, are still valuable. — A number of manual editions founded on that of Griesbach, but inclining more to the "received text," as those of H. A. SCHOTT (Leipz., 1805–13–25–39), with a good Latin translation; G. C. KNAPP (Halle, 1797, 1813–24–29–40), with a useful Commentatio isagogica, or Introduction, and carefully punctuated and divided; J. A. H. TITTMANN (ster. Leipz., 1820, 1828, 1860; 1824, 1831, 8vo), AUG. HAHN (Leipz., 1840, 1841, revised ed. 1861), reprinted at N.Y., 1842, by Dr. Edward Robinson; K. G. W. THEILE (ster. Leipz., 1844, 11th ed. 1875, by O. von Geb-hardt), with the variations of the chief modern editors, parallel passages, etc.; also S. T. BLOOMFIELD'S Gr. Test. with English Notes (London, 1832, 9th ed., 1855, 2 vols. 8vo), mark no progress in criticism beyond Griesbach, but rather a retrograde movement. — The same is true of the large edition of the Catholic scholar, J. M. A. SCHOLZ (Leipzig, 1830–36, 2 vols. 4to), whose extensive travels and researches in libraries enabled him to add a very large number of new manuscripts (according to Scrivener, 616) to the list of those previously known. But of these, only thirteen were collated entire; a few others in the greater part; many in only a few chapters; many more simply inspected, or only enrolled in the list. He was a poor critic, and as an editor and collator incredibly careless. He divided his manuscripts into two classes or recensions, — the Alexandrian and the Constantinopolitan, giving the preference to the latter. But in applying his system he was happily inconsistent, particularly in his second volume, and at a later period of his life (1845) abandoned it. His edition met with no favor from intelligent scholars; but in England, where biblical criticism was at its lowest ebb, it was welcomed and praised by many, and its text reprinted.

A new period in the history of textual criticism was inaugurated by the appearance (Berlin, 1831) of a small edition of the Greek Testament by the distinguished classical scholar CHARLES LACHMANN (1793–1851), followed by a larger edition in which the authorities for the Greek text were supplied by Philip Buttmann, with the Latin Vulgate in the lower margin critically edited from Codd. Fuldensis, Amiatinus, and other manuscripts (Berlin, 1842–50, 2 vols. 8vo). Lachmann's aim in these editions was not to reproduce the original text according to his best judgment (for this he deemed conjectural criticism to be necessary in some cases), but to present as far as possible on purely documentary evidence the text current in the Eastern churches in the fourth century, as a basis for criticism. He paid no attention to the textus receptus, and used no cursive manuscripts, but founded his text wholly on ancient authorities, viz., Codd. A B C D P Q T and Z of the Gospels, A B C D E (2) in the Acts and Catholic Epistles, A B C D (2) G H in the Pauline Epistles, and A B C in the Apocalypse, with the Latin Vulgate, and Codd. a (Vercellensis, fourth century), b (Veronensis, fifth century), and c (Colbertinus, eleventh century) of the Old Latin, for the Gospels, besides the Latin versions of the Græco-Latin manuscripts in the above list, viz., D, D (2), E (2), G (2), also of E (3): of the Fathers he used Irenæus, Origen, Cyprian, Hilary of Poitiers, Lucifer of Cagliari, and in the Apocalypse, Primasius. His attempted task was not fully accomplished, partly because the text of some of the most important manuscripts which he used (B C P Q, and the Latin Codex Amiatinus) had been but very imperfectly collated or edited, partly because the range of his authorities was too narrow, and partly because he was sometimes, apparently at least, inconsistent in the application of his principles. But he was the first to found a text wholly on ancient evidence (Griesbach disregarded what he deemed unimportant variations from the received text); and his editions, to which his eminent reputation as a critic gave wide currency, especially in Germany, did much toward breaking down the superstitious reverence for the textus receptus which had long prevailed. — We come now to the editions of TISCHENDORF and TREGELLES, of whom biographical notices will be found under their names. Through their combined labors we have a solid basis for a completely critical edition of the Greek Testament in the accurate knowledge, not possessed before, of all our manuscripts of the oldest class (not including lectionaries), comprising many newly discovered, among them the Sinaitic of the fourth century. Tischendorf (1815–74) spent about eight years of his life in travels in search of manuscripts, for which he visited the East three times (in 1844, 1853, and 1859), or in collating with extreme care, or transcribing and preparing for publication, the most important of those in the various libraries of Europe which were before known, but had not been published or thoroughly examined. The following uncial Greek manuscripts (see the list above) were discovered by Tischendorf: $\aleph G (2) \Pi^{1.2.3.4.5.6.7} N (2) O^a O (2) T^b d \Gamma \Theta^a b c d \Lambda \Pi = 21$; — first used by him: $F^a I^b N O^b c d e f O^b (2) P (2) Q (2) R R (2) T^a c W^b c d e G^c f g h = 23$; — published: $\aleph B B (2) C D (2) E (2) F^a \Pi^{1.2.3.4.5.6.7} I^b L M (2) N$ in part, $O^a P P (2) Q R W^a c Y \Theta^a = 27$; — transcribed: $H (3) M O \Pi = 4$; — collated: $E F (2) G H H (2) K L (2) O^b (2) S U X \Gamma \Lambda = 13$. (See Dr. C. R. Gregory's Prolegomena to Tischendorf's N. T. Gr. ed. 8va, p. 31.) His editions of the texts of biblical manuscripts (including some of the Septuagint) comprise no less than seventeen large quarto and five folio volumes, not including the Anecdota Sacra et Profana (1855, new edition 1861), or the Notitia editionis Cod. Sinaitici (1860), two quarto volumes containing descriptions or collations of many new manuscripts; and many of his collations, or copies of manuscripts, remain unpublished. The titles of his various writings, most of them relating to biblical criticism, fill twelve octavo pages of Gregory's Prolegomena. His principal editions of the Greek Testament are those published at Leipzig in 1841 [1840], promising as a first essay, but of no special importance except for the refutation, in the Prolegomena, of Scholz's theory of recensions; 1849, in which the critical apparatus was much enlarged, and the text settled on the basis of ancient authority, generally with good judgment; 1859 [1855–58], 2 vols., reckoned as "editio septima critica maior," in which very large additions were made to the critical apparatus, not only from manuscripts, Greek and Latin, but from the quotations in the writings of the Christian Fathers; and the evidence was for the first time fully stated, both for and against the readings adopted. In the first volume, Tischendorf, influenced perhaps by Scrivener, showed a tendency to allow greater weight to the later uncials and cursives than he had done in his edition of 1849; but he soon found that he was on the wrong track; and on the whole, if we include orthographical changes, his edition of 1859 differs more widely from the "received text" than that of 1849. Its publication was immediately followed by Tischendorf's third journey to the East, and the discovery of the great Sinai manuscript, together with the acquisition of much other new critical material.

After the publication of the Codex Sinaiticus in 1862, in a magnificent edition in four volumes folio, in facsimile type, with twenty-one plates of actual facsimiles, at the expense of the Russian Government, the edition being limited to three hundred copies, he issued in 1863, in 4to, his Novum Testamentum Sinaiticum, in ordinary type, but representing the manuscript line for line, with full Prolegomena, and his N. T. Gr. ex Sinaitico Codice, Vaticana itemque Elzeviriana lectione notata, in 1865, 8vo, with a supplement of additions and corrections in 1870. After some other publications, particularly the second edition of his Synopsis evangelica in 1864, in which the Sinai manuscript was first used, he undertook his last great critical edition of the Greek New Testament, which was issued in eleven parts from October 1864 to 1872, forming two large volumes, 8vo, Nov. Test. Græce, editio octava critica maior, Lipsiæ, 1869–72, but without the Prolegomena. This edition far surpassed all that had preceded it in the richness of its critical apparatus, and, as compared with that of 1859, rests much more on the authority of the oldest manuscripts, particularly the Sinaitic. The preparation of the Prolegomena was prevented by a stroke of apoplexy (May 5, 1873), followed by paralysis, which ultimately caused his death (Dec. 7, 1874). After long delays, it was intrusted to an American scholar residing in Leipzig, Dr. C. R. Gregory; and the volume is now (July, 1881) passing through the press. Besides those mentioned above, the most important publications of Tischendorf pertaining to the textual criticism of the New Testament are: Codex Ephraemi Syri rescriptus, 1843, 4to (Old Testament part, 1845); Monumenta sacra inedita, 1846, 4to; Evangelium Palatinum ineditum, 1847, 4to; Codex Amiatinus (Vulg.), 1850, new ed. 1854; Codex Claromontanus, 1852, 4to; Mon. sacr. inedit. Nova Collectio, Vols. I.–VI., IX., 1855–70 (Vols. VII. and VIII. will probably be published hereafter by Gebhardt and Gregory), 4to; Novum Testamentum Vaticanum, 1867, and Appendix N. T. Vat., containing B (2), 1869, 4to; compare Responsa ad calumnias Romanas, 1870, 8vo, also Appendix codicum celeberrimorum Sin., Vat., Alex., 1867, 4to; Die Sinaibibel, ihre Entdeckung, Herausgabe und Erwerbung, 1871, large 8vo. His Novum Testamentum triglotum, Græce, Latine, Germanice, Lipsiæ, 1854, 2d ed., 1865, is a convenient book, the three parts of which were also issued separately, and in various combinations. The Greek is his own text, with the variations of the textus receptus; the Latin, the Vulgate, critically revised from the oldest manuscripts, with the variations of the Clementine edition; the German the genuine text of Luther, though in modern orthography. Tischendorf also issued many manual editions of the Greek Testament, the three latest in his lifetime being published in 1873 by Tauchnitz, Brockhaus (to match his edition of the Septuagint), and Mendelssohn (Editio academica septima) respectively. His large editions of 1859 and 1869–72 were issued with the critical apparatus greatly abridged, but giving the chief authorities for all the important various readings, with the titles Editio septima critica minor (1859), and Ed. octava critica minor (1872–77). The latter still waits (1881) for the Prolegomena. For the more important of his numerous other works, see the article TISCHEN-

DORF.—SAMUEL PRIDEAUX TREGELLES (pron. Tre-ghe'l'ès), b. Jan. 30, 1813; d. April 24, 1875; ranks next to Tischendorf among scholars of the present century in the importance of his critical labors, and in single-hearted devotion to his chosen task. His first essay in the department of textual criticism was The Book of Revelation in Greek, edited from Ancient Authorities, with a New English Version and Various Readings, London, 1844. In 1848 he issued his Prospectus for a critical edition of the Greek Testament, the text of which was to be founded solely on the authority of the oldest Greek manuscripts, the ancient versions down to the seventh century, and the citations of early ecclesiastical writers, including Eusebius. No account was made of the "received text," or of the great mass of cursive manuscripts. Completeness and accuracy in the exhibition of the evidence of the witnesses used were especially aimed at. Like Tischendorf, Tregelles visited (in 1845-46, 1849-50, and 1862) the principal libraries in Europe for the purpose of collating manuscripts the text of which had not before been published. For the Gospels he collated twelve uncials, E G H I^b K M R U X Z F A, and the cursives 1, 33, 69; for the Acts H (2) L (2) and 13, 31, 61; for the Pauline Epistles D (2) F (2) L (2) M (2), 17, 37, 47; and the cursives 1 and 14 for the Apocalypse. In many cases Tregelles compared his collations with those of Tischendorf, and settled the differences by a re-examination of the manuscript. In 1861 he edited the Codex Zacynthius (Ξ), republishing in an Appendix the fragments of O. His edition of The Greek New Testament, edited from Ancient Authorities, with their Various Readings in full, and the Latin Version of Jerome, was issued in London in seven successive Parts: I. Matthew, Mark, 1857; II. Luke, John, 1861; III. Acts and Catholic Epistles, 1865; IV. Romans to 2 Thessalonians [iii. 3], 1869; V. Hebrews [with 2 Thess. iii. 3-18] to Philemon, 1870; VI. Revelation, 1872. Part VII., Prolegomena and Addenda and Corrigenda, appeared in 1879, four years after his death, edited by Dr. Hort and A. W. Streane. A stroke of paralysis soon after Part II. was completed long delayed the publication of the Third Part. A severer stroke, when he was revising the concluding chapters of the Book of Revelation, disabled him from further labor, so that it was necessary for friends to aid him in the issue of this portion of the work. His text of Jerome was founded on the Codex Amiatinus, which he had personally collated, the variations of the Clementine edition being given in the margin. Though Tregelles added far less than Tischendorf to our store of critical material, he did more to establish correct principles of criticism, and his various writings had a wide and most beneficial influence in England. Besides many articles in Kitto's Journal of Sacred Literature, he published in 1854 An Account of the Printed Text of the Greek New Testament, with Remarks on its Revision upon Critical Principles, and in 1856 Introduction to the Textual Criticism of the New Testament, forming part of Vol. IV. of the tenth and later editions of Horne's Introduction, etc. This volume was also issued separately, and, in the eleventh edition of Horne's Introduction (1861), appeared with "Additions" and a "Postscript."

Both of these works are of great value.—HENRY ALFORD (1810-71), Dean of Canterbury, in his Greek Testament (vol. i., London, 1849, 6th ed., 1868; vol. iv., 1861, 4th ed., 1871), gave a critically revised text, with a digest of various readings. The work was greatly improved as regards the text (especially of vol. i.) in the later editions, in which he adopted substantially the principles of Tischendorf and Tregelles, giving more weight, however, to internal considerations.—The first volume of the long-expected edition of the Greek Testament by Dr. B. F. WESTCOTT and Dr. F. J. A. HORT was published in England, May, 1881, in the same month with the revised New Testament, and reprinted from duplicate plates in New York with an Introduction by Dr. Schaff. The second volume, containing the authors' Introduction and Appendix, followed soon after. This edition is not accompanied with any critical apparatus: it has rather been the object of the authors, by a careful study of the materials furnished by their predecessors, augmented somewhat, however, by their own researches, to trace the history of the text as far as possible, to distinguish its different types, and determine their relations and their comparative value, to investigate the special characteristics of the most important documents and groups of documents, and, finally, to apply the principles of criticism which result from these studies to the determination of the original text. They have been more or less steadily engaged in this task for about twenty-eight years; and though their view of the genealogical relations of the chief ancient texts has not failed to excite strong opposition in certain quarters, it can hardly be doubted that their work is the most important contribution to the scientific criticism of the New-Testament text which has yet been made. They distinguish four principal types of text: the Western, characterized by a tendency to paraphrase or to modify the form of expression, and also to interpolate from parallel passages or from extraneous sources, represented especially by D and the Old Latin versions, also in part by the Curetoman Syriac; the neutral, represented by B and largely by \aleph , preserving best the original form; the Alexandrian, much purer than the Western, but betraying a tendency to polish the language; and the Syrian, the latest form, a mixed text, borrowing from all, and aiming to be easy, smooth, and complete. They regard B as pre-eminent above all other manuscripts for the purity of its text; the readings of \aleph and B combined as generally deserving acceptance as genuine, their ancestries having "diverged from a point near the autographs;" and they attach great weight to every combination of B with another primary Greek manuscript, as L C T D Ξ A Z 33, and in Mark Δ .

A very convenient edition for representing the variations of the principal modern editors from the "received text" is Scrivener's Nov. Test. textus Stephanici A.D. 1550. Accedunt variae lectiones editionum Bezae, Elzeviri, Lachmanni, Tregellesii. Ed. auct. et emend. Cantabr. et Lond., 1877, 16mo. Dr. Gregory's Prolegomena to Tischendorf's eighth critical edition give a collation of the texts of Tischendorf, Tregelles, and Westcott and Hort. Dr. Scrivener and Archdeacon Palmer of Oxford have lately published (1881) editions of the Greek Testament indicating in different ways the Greek text followed in the revised version of the New Testament.

The most complete works on the history of printed editions of the Greek Testament are Le Long's Bibliotheca sacra, edited by Masch, vol. i. (Hakæ, 1778, 4to), pp. 187-424, and Reuss's Bibliotheca Novi Testamenti Græci, Brunsvigæ, 1872, 8vo. — E. A.]

[3. Principles of Textual Criticism. — It is impossible, within the limits here allowed, to state and illustrate the principles of criticism applicable to the text of the Greek Testament. A few hints may, however, be given. The object, of course, is to ascertain which, among two or more variations of the text presented by our manuscripts or other authorities, is the original. No kind of evidence, external or internal, is to be neglected. The problem is to be solved by a process of reasoning upon probabilities; and we have to consider, in every case, what hypothesis will best explain all the phenomena. This fact is sometimes partially stated under the form of the rule that that reading is to be accepted as genuine which will best explain the origin of the other variations. This is an important rule; but we have to consider, not merely the nature of the variations, but the number, independence, and character of the witnesses that support them. The process of criticism is not a mechanical one. Our authorities must be weighed, not counted. One good, very early manuscript may be worth more than a thousand copies derived from a late and corrupted archetype. Again: though the presumption is in favor of the oldest manuscripts, mere antiquity cannot prove the excellence of a copy.

One of the essential prerequisites to intelligent criticism is a thorough study of the occasions of error in manuscripts. This involves a knowledge of paleography and of the history of pronunciation. The similarity of certain letters or abbreviations in their older forms gave occasion to errors which can be only thus explained; and in the corruption of the Greek language, vowels and diphthongs originally distinct in sound (ϵ , α ; ι , ϵ , η , α , ν , υ) were pronounced alike (itacism). It involves also a study of the tendencies and habits of transcribers. Many manuscripts, in the alterations they have received from later hands, illustrate the manner in which the text was corrupted. Among the maxims resulting from such a study, in connection with the consideration of external testimony, are these: (1) The more difficult reading is to be preferred; Bengel's great rule. This applies to those variations which are to be ascribed to design. Transcribers would not intentionally substitute a harsh, ungrammatical, unusual, Hebraistic expression, one that caused a difficulty of any kind, for an easier one. (2) The shorter reading is to be preferred; Porson's "surest canon of criticism." The tendency of scribes was almost always to add, rather than to omit. They did not like to have their copies regarded as incomplete. It was common to insert in the margin of manuscripts, or between the lines, glosses, or explanations of unusual or difficult expressions, also words or clauses which served to supplement the language of one Gospel from the parallel or similar passages in another, or to complete abridged quotations of the Old Testament from the fuller text of the Septuagint. Words accidentally omitted were also placed in the margin, or interlined. A transcriber might thus easily mistake these glosses, or supplements, of his predecessor for accidental omissions, and transfer them to his text. This rule does not apply to cases where an omission can be satisfactorily explained by homœoteleuton ($\delta\mu\omega\iota\sigma\tau\acute{\epsilon}\lambda\epsilon\upsilon\tau\omicron\nu$); that is, cases where two successive sentences or parts of sentences have a like ending. The scribe copies the first of these, then his eye glances to the like ending of the second, and he thinks that that is what he has just copied, and omits unconsciously the intervening words. — Another prerequisite to successful criticism is a careful study of the principal documents, and groups or classes of documents, in connection with the history of the text, so far as it can be traced, in order to determine by a process of "comparative criticism" their peculiar characteristics, their weak points and their strong points, and the relative antiquity and value of their texts. This process includes the ancient versions, and the quotations in the writings of the principal Christian Fathers. It cannot be here detailed. Griesbach did good work in this direction, and it has been the special study of Westcott and Hort. We are thus enabled to weigh the external evidence in particular cases with some approach to accuracy. — E. A.]

[4. Results of the Textual Criticism of the New Testament. — The host of "various readings" which an examination of ancient manuscripts, versions, and quotations, has brought to light, perhaps a hundred and fifty thousand in number, alarms some simple-minded people. Analysis at once dispels the alarm. It is seen that a very large proportion of these readings, say nineteen-twentieths, are of no authority, no one can suppose them to be genuine; and nineteen-twentieths of the remainder are of no importance as affecting the sense. Of how much, or rather, of how little, importance, for the most part, the remainder are, can readily be seen by comparing the revised version of the New Testament (with its marginal notes) with the text of the common version, or by an examination of the various readings of the chief modern editors in Scrivener's Greek Testament referred to above. The great number of various readings is simply the result of the extraordinary richness of our critical resources. Westcott and Hort remark with entire truth, that "in the variety and fulness of the evidence on which it rests, the text of the New Testament stands absolutely and unapproachably alone among ancient prose-writings." (Greek Test., vol. i. p. 561). — E. A.]

[LIT. — Besides what have already been mentioned, the most important contributions to our knowledge of manuscripts of the New Testament in the present century have been made by F. H. A. SCRIVENER, in his Full and Exact Collation of about Twenty MSS. of the Gospels, Cambridge, 1853, and Full Collation of about Fifty MSS. of the Greek Testament, with a Crit. Introduction, appended to his edition of the Codex Augiensis, 1859. Works of smaller importance in this department have been published by Dermout, Rinck (Lucubratio critica, 1830), Reiche, Von Muralt, Dobbin (Cod. Montfortianus, 1854), Delitzsch, Handschriftliche Funde (1861-62), on Cod. 1 of the Apoca-lype, the long-lost manuscript of Erasmus; also by the Catholic Cozza, and Ferrar and Abbott.

On the textual criticism of the New Testament generally, besides the Introductions to the New Testament by Michaelis, translated with valuable notes by Marsh (3d ed., 1818), Hug, De Wette, Bleek, and Reuss (Geschichte der heiligen Schriften N. T., 5te Ausg., 1874), may be mentioned the special treatises by J. Scott Porter (1848), S. Davidson (1852), Tregelles (1856), and Scrivener, Plain Introd. to the Criticism of the N. T., Cambridge and London, 1861, 2d ed., 1874. Scrivener represents a more conservative school of criticism than Tischendorf, Tregelles, and Westcott and Hort, though in his different writings he has steadily approached them. Smaller works are: William Milligan and Alexander Roberts, The Words of the N. T., as altered by Transmission and ascertained by Criticism, Edinb., 1873; Scrivener's Six Lectures on the Text of the N. T., 1875; C. E. Hammond, Outlines of Textual Criticism applied to the N. T., 3d ed., 1880; and E. C. Mitchell, The Critical Handbook, Andover, also London, 1880. — For applied criticism, the notes of Meyer and his collaborators on the New Testament, those of Wieseler on Galatians, Volkmar on Mark, and particularly Weiss on Matthew and Mark, and Westcott on John, also Lightfoot on Galatians, Philipians, and especially Colossians and Philemon, are worthy of attention. The Rev. T. S. Green's Course of Developed Criticism on Passages of the N. T. affected by Various Readings, London [1856], displays good judgment. Reiche's Commentarius criticus, 3 tom., Göttingen, 1853-62, 4to, is heavy, but not weighty. — Among elaborate critical monographs on important passages, the following may be mentioned: J. W. Burgon, The last Twelve Verses of the Gospel according to S. Mark vindicated . . . and established, Oxford, 1871 (comp. an art. by Dr. J. A. Broadus in the Baptist Quarterly for July, 1869); Ezra Abbot on John i. 18, in the Bibliotheca Sacra for October, 1861, and the Unitarian Review for June, 1875; Professor James Drummond on the same passage, in the Theol. Rev. for October, 1871 (comp. April, 1876); F. J. A. Hort, Two Dissertations, 1. On ποιογενής Θεός in Scripture and Tradition, etc., Cambr. and Lond., 1876; Ezra Abbot on Acts xx. 28, in the Bibl. Sacra for April, 1876; A. W. Tyler on 1 Cor. xiii., in the Bibl. Sacra for January and July, 1873; William Hayes Ward on 1 Tim. iii. 16, in the Bibl. Sacra for January, 1865; and William Orme's Memoir of the Controversy respecting 1 John v. 7, Lond., 1830, new ed., with notes and an appendix by Ezra Abbot, New York, 1866. — E. A.]

BIBLE VERSIONS, or TRANSLATIONS OF THE BIBLE. As regards the Old Testament, the extinction of the Hebrew as a spoken language, and, as regards the New Testament, the introduction of Christianity among non-Greek-speaking peoples (for in the earliest day Christians read the entire Bible in Greek), rendered translations necessities. These translations are called "versions." They may be classified as immediate, i.e., directly from the original text, and mediate, or derived from other translations. The oldest of the first class are older than the oldest existing manuscripts of the Bible, and are therefore of great value to the Bible critic in determining the text, and to the exegete in tracing the history of doctrine; for translation is more or less commentary.

Ancient Versions. A. VERSIONS OF THE OLD TESTAMENT.¹ I. GREEK. — (1) The first in importance, and the oldest complete version in any language, is the Alexandrian, known as the Septuagint (commonly designated by LXX.), because, according to the worthless tradition (cf. KURZ: Aristeæ epistula ad Philocratem, Bern, 1872), the translation of the Law was made on the Island of Pharos, near Alexandria, Egypt, by 70 (72) Jews, who brought the Hebrew manuscript from Palestine by request of Ptolemy Philadelphus, who was gathering a library. (See ARISTEAS.) The story is told at great length by Josephus (Ant. 12, 2). The truth about its origin is, that Alexandria became, after the Dispersion, a centre of Jewish population, and eventually of religion; but, as time went on, the Jews, under Greek influences, lost command of Hebrew, and therefore required a translation of their sacred books into Greek. The men who met this want differed very much in knowledge and skill, were of an indeterminate number, and of different periods, beginning with the time of Ptolemy Philadelphus (B.C. 280), and continuing until B.C. 150. The Pentateuch was first translated. Previously there had been Targums (see II. CHALDEE); and it is likely, that, upon the margin of the Hebrew manuscripts, difficult words and sentences were translated, and that these were used in the final complete work. The translation of the remainder of the canon was less necessary, and was more a piece of literary work. The translators were chiefly of Egyptian, and particularly Alexandrian, birth and training, and therefore strongly Hellenistic. It must be confessed that we are much in the dark in regard to the comparative value of the parts and of the texts of the Septuagint; yet certain things have been clearly made out. The most attention has been given to the version of the Pentateuch. See H. G. J. THIERSCH: De Pent. Al. libri III., Erlang., 1841, and FRANKEL: Ueber den Einfluss der palästin. Exegese auf die alex. Hermeneutik, Leipzig, 1851. It surely is not the work of one man, nor made at one time. On the whole, it is successful (Numbers, and the close of Exodus from xxxvi. 9, are exceptions), though not literal (cf. P. de Lagarde's edition of Genesis, Leipzig, 1868, which contains the text of the Roman edition of 1586, with a rich critical apparatus). The Septuagint Pentateuch in more than a thousand places agrees with the Samaritan [see Samaritan Pentateuch in this article passim], where the latter differs from the Massoretic text; but again it agrees with the Hebrew in opposition to the Samaritan, and the Hebrew is incontestably the original text. On Isaiah, see GESENIUS' commentary, and [Dr. ANTON SCHOLZ: Die alexandrinische Uebersetzung des Buches Iesaias, Würzburg, 1880 (47 pp.)]. On Jeremiah, for proof that the translator must have used a text differing very much from our present text, see MOVERS: De utriusque recens. vatic. Jer. indole, etc., Hamb., 1834. The Church, from ancient times, used, in place of the Septuagint of Daniel, the more exact version of Theodotion. The long-lost Septuagint version was discovered in the Chisian Library at Rome by Simon de Magistris (1772). [See the edition of J. COZZA, Rom., 1877. On the Minor Prophets, cf. VOLLERS: Das Dodekapropheton der Alexandriner, Berlin, 1880 sqq.]; on Amos, J. S. VATER, Halle, 1810; on Nahum, STUDER, and L. REINKE: Zur Kritik der älteren Versionen des Pr. Nahum, Münster, 1867; on Jonah, EICHORN: Allg. Bibl. d. bibl. Litter.; on Hosea, the same. The translators of Proverbs and Job show themselves very well acquainted with Greek, but handle the original in a very free and arbitrary manner. Proverbs was evidently translated from a text which varied from our present Hebrew text: cf. P. DE LAGARDE: Anmerkungen zur griech. Uebersetzung der Proverbien, Leipzig, 1863. On Job, G. G. II. BICKELL: De indole ac ratione vers. Al. in interpretando l. Jobi, Marb., 1862. On Esther, cf. FRITZSCHE's edition, and his excellent Libri apocryphi V. T., Lips., 1871. But in the Septuagint were not alone canonical books; for, as the work of translating continued, additions were made from other sources, Greek and Hebrew, either lengthy passages or whole books. Such additions are called Apocrypha, and were acknowledged by their inserters not to belong to the canon, which comprised, according to the Hebrew notation and arrangement, twenty-two books. See CANON, APOCRYPHA. These interpolations were allowable, from their standpoint, because the Septuagint was regarded as a private undertaking. We do not know their date, only that in Theodotion's time (second century A.D.) they were all added, and the version passed into universal use in the Christian Church, with no distinction between its contents; apocryphal and canonical books being held in equal esteem.

The discovery was quickly made that the Septuagint was not always accurate; and this fact was particularly unpleasant when the Jews quoted from the Hebrew against the Christian disputants, who, through ignorance, were obliged to rely upon the Septuagint. Moreover, the text itself was corrupt and degenerating, since there was no ecclesiastical guard about it. In this emergency, Origen prepared his great Hexapla (sixfold), which contained a corrected text, and thus guided the Christian apologist, and at the same time showed the amount of the Septuagint's inaccuracy. His work was this: he arranged in six parallel columns the Hebrew text in Hebrew, the same in Greek characters, the versions of Aquila, Symmachus, and Theodotion, and a text of the Septuagint, partly corrected by a comparison of manuscripts, partly emended by recourse to the Hebrew. The variations of several less important versions were also noted. The Hexapla was too large to be circulated as a whole; but the revised Septuagint was published in separate transcripts, and, known as the Hexaplar text, quite displaced the older text. But by their omission of his critical signs to distinguish his improvements from the original Septuagint, and by mixing the texts in juxtaposition, the scribes increased the corruption he had hoped to prevent. See FREDERICK FIELD: Origenis Hexaplorum quæ supersunt, Oxon., 1867-74, 2 T. [P. DE LAGARDE: Veteris Testamenti ab Origene recensiti fragmenta apud Syros servata quinque, Göttingen, 1880.]

The Printed Text of the Septuagint. — There are four principal texts: (1) that of the Biblia Polyglotta Complutensis (1514-17), a poor text; several unknown manuscripts were used; often reprinted, e.g., Paris Polyglot (1629). (2) The Aldine, Venice, 1518; manuscripts unknown; resembles (1); often reprinted. (3) The Sistine, patronized by Pope Sixtus V., Rome, 1587; follows the Codex Vaticanus, but not exactly, supplying omissions from other manuscripts, cost much labor, and is the best text; reprinted in WALTON'S Polyglot (1657), and with various readings of more than three hundred manuscripts, by Rob. Holmes and Jac. Parsons, Ox., 1798-1827, 5 vols. fol.; lastly by TISCHENDORF, with various readings, 1850, [best ed. VI., 1880, 2 tomi, with Nestle's collation of the Vatican and Sinaitic texts, which is of great value, and can be obtained separately: NESTLE: Veteris Testamenti Græci codices Vaticanus et Sinaiticus, Lips., 1880]. (4) That of the Codex Alexandrinus, published by J. E. GRAEVE, Oxon., 1707-19, in facsimile by Baber, 1816-28, in improved form by Fr. Field, Oxon., 1859. The Codex Sinaiticus was published in facsimile by Tischendorf in 1862, but not in a generally accessible form. The Codex Vaticanus was published in full by C. Vercellone, Gius. Cozza, and G. Sergio, Rome, 1868-72, 5 vols. fol. The Septuagint has not been studied as it should be, although ample materials in a scattered form exist. There is only the clumsiest attempt at a special lexicon. The chief works, the Thesaurus by BIEL (1779-80) and SCHLEUSNER (1820), make little advance upon the very useful concordances of KIRCHER (1607) and TROMMIUS (1718). But CH. ABR. WAHL, by his Clavis Librorum V. T. apocryph., Lips., 1853, does advance in a limited sphere.

Great is the historical significance of the Septuagint. It was the first attempt at a translation upon so large a scale. This explains and excuses its errors. Greek and Hebrew are very dissimilar; and, as the translators knew more about the former than the latter, they failed to present the deeper and truer sense of the Scriptures, and therefore misled the Christian Church, which used their labors. But the Septuagint is of the highest importance for the criticism and history of Hebrew text. It tells us the hermenaeutical standpoint of the Hellenists. Their translation is not a rendering of the present Massoretic text in many places; probably because their Hebrew text was differently punctuated, or varied, or seemed to vary, in its consonants, and also because their hermeneutical principles were very free. Then the Septuagint is not a literal translation. Finally, the influence of the Septuagint upon the language of the Jews was very great. As it was the first attempt of the Hellenists to transfer their hereditary possessions (religion and history) into a new language and mode of thought, so it furnished at the same time a model. The idiom of the Septuagint became the idiom of the New Testament in more fully developed form, and thus that of early Christianity, whose writers cannot be thoroughly understood without a familiar knowledge of the Septuagint, which they so largely quote. Most of the direct quotations of the Old Testament are apparently from it, and thus its study is indispensable to an exegete.

2. Other Greek Versions.—(1) Aquila, a Jewish proselyte of Pontus, a contemporary of Hadrian (about A.D. 130), prepared a literal translation for the benefit of Jews contending with Christians, which was so successful, that it was used by Jews and Christians. It was slavishly literal; and, in his endeavor to present a word-for-word rendering of the Hebrew into the Greek, he goes to the extent of the boldest word-coining and grammatical absurdities. The Ebionites probably used it; although Irenæus, adv. hæres., ed. Migne, III. 21, ed. Grabe, III. 24, does not necessarily prove this. Jerome speaks of a second more literal version. Only fragments of it now remain in Origen's Hexapla. Cf. HODY: de Bibliorum textibus originalibus, Versionibus Græcis et Latina Vulgata, libri IV., Oxon., 1705, fol., pp. 570-578.

(2) Theodotion, a Jewish proselyte of Ephesus (Irenæus, adv. hæres. ed. Migne, III. 21), revised, before A.D. 160, rather than translated, the Septuagint, deriving his alterations in part from Aquila, and partly from the original text; which, however, he did not thoroughly understand, and so occasionally transliterated the Hebrew he could not translate. Origen used him in his Hexapla; and the Church substituted his version of the Book of Daniel for the Seventy's. Cf. HODY, as above, pp. 579-585.

(3) Symmachus, a Samaritan Ebionite (fl. A.D. 193-211), made a version distinguished for clearness and elegance, but paraphrastic and occasionally arbitrary. Cf. HODY, as above, pp. 585-589. (4-6) Besides those named, three others are cited by Origen in his Hexapla, which are called the Quinta, Sexta, and Septima, the authors and ages being unknown. Probably the two first extended only to detached books of the Old Testament, and the last only to the Psalms. They are rather paraphrases than translations. (7) The Versio Veneta, a very late Greek translation of several Old-Testament books, now in the Library of St. Mark's in Venice. The manuscript is not earlier than the fourteenth or fifteenth century. It is of little value, except as a literary curiosity. It follows the Massoretic recension. See O. GEBHARDT: Græcus Venetus, Lips., 1875.

II. CHALDEE.—These versions are called "Targums" (translation, or interpretation), and were rendered necessary by the loss of Hebrew while in Babylonia (cf. Neh. viii. 8). They were at first, and for many years, oral. As might be expected, they are usually paraphrases, in which the ideas of the translator are more followed than those of the original writer. No one of those now existing extends over the whole Old Testament, although together they do, with the exception of Ezra and Nehemiah. The two oldest are that of (1) Onkelos, on the Law, and that of (2) Jonathan ben Uziel, on the Earlier and Later Prophets. (1) Onkelos probably lived about A.D. 70, as he was the friend of Gamaliel. His interpretation is generally correct: it follows the text closely, and is free from the fabulous additions which mar other Targums. His Targum was first published in Bologna (1482, fol.), with Hebrew text and Rashi's commentary; also in Buxtorf's Rabbinical Bible (1619). A recent and much emended edition dates Wilna, 1852. The Targum of (2) Jonathan ben Uziel, who, according to tradition, was the disciple of Hillel; but the Targum is younger than Onkelos', and more paraphrastic and less simple. The first edition dates Leiria, 1494; but it is found also in the great Rabbinical Bibles, and in the Antwerp, Paris, and London Polyglots. [The Targums of Onkelos and Pseudo-Jonathan on the Pentateuch have been translated into English by J. W. ETHERIDGE, Lond., 1862-65, 2 vols.]

Besides these two, which date from before the third century, there were other Targums of importance, particularly two on the Pentateuch,—one complete, attributed, but falsely, to the same (3) Jonathan mentioned above; the other only in fragments, called the (4) Jerushalmi. The first is based upon Onkelos, but departs far more from the Hebrew into the region of pious fiction. It is a modern work, not earlier than the middle of the seventh century. The Jerushalmi is earlier, dependent upon Onkelos', which it corrects in places, but was never designed to be complete. Both are reprinted in Walton's (the London) Polyglot. [S. GRONEMANN: Die Jonathan'sche Pentateuch-Uebersetzung in ihrem Verhältnisse zur Halacha, Leipzig, 1879.]

(5) Targums of "Joseph the Blind" on the Hagiographa. Tradition, wrongly as usual, assigns these Targums to a person so named, who lived in the fourth century; but critical study has put their date in the eleventh century. The work separates into three parts: Targums 1. On the Psalms, Job, Proverbs; 2. On Song of Solomon, Ruth, Lamentation, Esther, and Ecclesiastes; 3. Chronicles and Daniel. The (1) are nearly contemporaneous, and from the same land, probably Syria. The work on Proverbs is the best, following the Hebrew as closely as possible. The similarity of this Targum to the Syriac version is extraordinary. Some suppose it was in truth copied from it, while others, with perhaps greater likelihood, contend for its independence. [Deutsch, in Smith's Dictionary of the Bible, vol. IV. p. 3421, maintains, with Frankel, that the true explanation is, that "the Seventy is the common source of both versions, but in such a manner that the Aramaic (Chaldee) has also made use of the Hebrew and the Greek; of the latter, however, through the Syriac medium."] The Targums on Psalms and Job are mere fragments, more or less close to the Hebrew. 2. The Targums on this class are not mentioned before the twelfth century. The freedom of a version can go no farther than it does in them. They are, in fact, mere commentaries. 3. No Targum on Daniel was for a long time believed to exist; but Munk found one in the Imperial (National) Library at Paris. It was written after the first crusade, or the twelfth century. See Notice sur Saadia, Paris, 1838. The Targum on Chronicles was also long unknown. The first edition appeared under the title Paraphrasis Chaldaica libr. Chronicorum, cura M. F. BECKII, 2 tom. Aug. Vind. (Augsburg), 1680-83, 4to.

There is also extant a Targum on the apocryphal pieces of Esther. See J. B. DE ROSSI: Specimen variarum lectionum sacri textus et Chaldaica Estheris additamenta, Rom., 1780; ed. 2. cura J. F. Schnurrer, Tübingen, 1783. VOLCK.

III. SYRIAC.—1. The oldest and most important version is the Peshito (the correct or simple), because confined to the text, in contrast to the allegorical and mystical paraphrases. The first reliable historical reference to the version is its use by Ephraem the Syrian (d. 373) in the fourth century; but even then it was old, for Ephraem defines in his commentaries many of its words which were no longer understood by his countrymen. Hence it is no improbable conjecture which assigns the version to the second century. It is made from the Hebrew, probably by Jewish Christians, and includes the Old-Testament canon, without the apocryphal additions, which were translated later; is accurate and close. The version of the New Testament seems to have been made afterwards. The Old Testament was published first in the Paris Polyglot (1645), and then in Walton's (1657), and, in critical and improved edition, by the British and Foreign Bible Society (in 1823), under care of Samuel Lee, Professor of Arabic at Cambridge. There is wanting a truly critical complete edition. ARNOLD.

In the sixth century the Peshito was universally received by Syrian Christians, even while the controversy raged between the Monophysites and Nestorians, and so is at the present day. 2. The version of Bishop Paul of Tella (a city of Mesopotamia), made in 616 sq., at the suggestion of the Monophysite patriarch Athanasius, was based upon the Hexaplar Greek text. It is closely literal, and thus is important in the critical study of Origen's work. Dr. ANTONIO MARIA CERTANI of the Ambrosian Library at Milan has published Codex syro-hexaplaris Ambrosianus, 1874 sqq. The so-called Versio Karkaphensis, or Montana, is neither an independent version nor a recension of the Peshito, but a Massoretic work upon the Old and New Testaments, and upon the chiefest Orthodox Greek Fathers whose works had been translated into Syriac. Cf. PAULIN MARTIN: Tradition Karkaphienne, ou la Massore chez les Syriens, Paris, 1870. The so-called Figurata owes its origin to a writing or printing error, and the ensuing false interpretation. Abulfaraj (Bar Hebraeus) in the thirteenth century says (Abul-Pharagii hist. dynastiarum, ed. Ed. Pocock, Oxon., 1663, p. 100), according to Pocock's translation, "The Syrians have two versions, — Simplex, which was translated from the Hebrew into Syriac in the time of Addai the Apostle, or, as some say, in the time of Solomon, the son of David, and Hiram, and the Figurata, according to the Septuagint text, translated from Greek into Syriac." The words underscored should read, and of Hiram, King of Tyre, and the Septuagint. By "the Septuagint" is meant the version of Paul of Tella. Several others are reported. Jacob, Bishop of Edessa (d. 712), made a recension of the Peshito, according to the Syro-Hexaplar text. Fragments have been published; e.g., in Ceriani's Monumenta sacra et prof. V. 1, 1868. The Nestorian patriarch Mar Abbas (d. 552) is said to have made a translation from the Greek. Simeon, Abbot of the Convent of St. Licinius, and Polycarp, the author of the Philoxenian New Testament, are said each to have made a version of the Psalms from the Greek.

IV. SAMARITAN.—Besides a recension, the Samaritans had a translation of the Pentateuch in their peculiar dialect. AD. BRÜLL: Das Samaritan. Targum zum Pentateuch, Frankfurt-a-M., 1875, issued the first complete edition of it. It is not earlier than the second century B.C., although the date and author are uncertain. It follows closely the Samaritan text, but occasionally contains apparent interpolations from the Targum of Onkelos. Cf. SAMUEL KOHN: Zur Sprache, Literatur und Dogmatik der Samaritaner, Leipzig, 1876.

V. EGYPTIAN versions sprang into being in the third century, or at the beginning of the fourth, in answer to the demand of the growing African Church. They were of all the various dialects, founded upon the Septuagint (except Daniel, which was from Theodotion's), and are of indeterminate age and seniority. Portions of these versions have been published, especially the Pentateuch and the Psalms. O. F. FRITZSCHE.

VI. LATIN. Cf. PETRUS SABATIER: Bibliorum sacrorum latinæ versiones antiquæ, seu vetus ital., etc., Rheims, 1743-49. Also the Speculum Augustini in the Spicilegium Romanum, tom. IX. 1. Vetus Latina, or Old Latin, was made from the Septuagint in North Africa some time in the second century; for it is quoted by the earliest of the Latin Fathers, and was widely circulated. It is throughout a verbal version, made simultaneously by several men, in the deteriorated Latin of the period, with its mixture of colloquial and provincial words and phrases, i.e., in the speech of the common people. When introduced into Italy, where Greek was understood, and a higher culture common, its provincial rudeness gave offence, and so a revision was demanded. Thus arose the Itala, or the Italian version of the Old Testament. We have Augustine's testimony that a translation of the New Testament was undertaken by any one who knew sufficient Greek. There existed then more than one Latin version of the Bible; and perhaps Britain, Gaul, and Spain had each a national version. But in Africa the Old Latin was the only one current. It was there jealously guarded and kept in use after Jerome's version was elsewhere received. See ZIEGLER: Die lat. Bibelübersetzungen vor Hieronymus und die Itala des Augustinus, München, 1879; U. ROBERT: Pentateuchi e codice Lugdunensi versio Latina antiquissima ("antérieure à saint Jerome"), Paris, 1881.

2. The Vulgate.—Cf. LEANDER VAN ESS: Pragmatisch-kritische Geschichte der Vulgata, Tübingen, 1824; KAULEN: Geschichte der Vulgata, Mainz, 1868; RÖNSCH: Itala u. Vulgata, Marburg (2d ed.), 1875; ZIEGLER: Italafragmente, München, 1876.

The term "Vulgate," that is "Vulgata editio," the current text of the Bible, was originally applied in the Church to the Septuagint. In this sense the word is used by Jerome, who, however, also applied it to the Old Latin version, which was made from the Septuagint. But there does not appear to be any instance in the age of Jerome of the application of the term to the Latin version of the Old Testament without regard to its derivation from the Septuagint, or to that of the New Testament. "Vulgata editio," meaning a corrupt text, also stands in contrast to the true Hexaplar text of the Septuagint. The Latin Fathers habitually refer to Jerome's version as "our version." But the Council of Trent (1545-53) described it as "vetus et vulgata editio," and hence the term "Vulgate" is used to-day exclusively of it.

The Latin texts in current use had been corrupted by frequent copying. There was urgent need of a thorough revision. At this crisis God raised up a man to do the work. SOPHRONIUS EUSEBIUS HIERONYMUS, commonly called JEROME (331-420), the most learned scholar, not only of his day, but of many centuries, amply prepared, linguistically through his acquaintance with Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, and morally and spiritually by his earnestness and piety, was requested in 383 by Damasus, Bishop of Rome (366 to 384), to do this almost imperative work. Nothing more at first was contemplated than a revision of the current Latin New Testament by means of the Greek original. The Gospels were taken up, all interpolations removed, and gross errors corrected. We do not know whether he went through the New Testament in this way; but it is probable. Bishop Damasus asked him to revise the Psalms. He made two revisions: the first (383) by the use of the common text of the Septuagint (this is the Roman Psalter, because introduced by Damasus into ecclesiastical use in Rome); the second (387) by the use of the Hexaplar text (this is the Gallican Psalter, because introduced primarily into Gaul by Gregory of Tours, then into Germany, England, and Spain, and eventually made by Pius V., in 1566, the successor of the Roman). He then designed and carried out a revision of the entire Old Testament according to the Hexaplar text, of which, however, there has come down to us only the Book of Job. But the more he compared the Greek texts with the Hebrew original, for Jewish friends secretly supplied him with manuscripts from a synagogue (he had meanwhile taken up his abode in Bethlehem), the more desirable did a new version from the Hebrew appear. He knew full well how prejudice and fanaticism would put obstacles in the way; but solicited by friends, although without any ecclesiastical sanction, he made a beginning with Samuel and Kings in 392 (prefixed by the famous Prologus galeatus, giving an account of the Hebrew Canon), and completed his translation in 404. Portions of it, such as the writings of Solomon, Ester, Judith, and Tobit, were done in great haste, and there are errors, which, with more care, he would not have made; but, "as a monument of ancient linguistic power, this translation of the Old Testament stands unrivalled and unique."

Although Jerome's version was used by some as soon as finished, it spread very gradually, was, indeed, "received with a loud outcry of reproach;" and it took centuries for it to become the ecclesiastical translation of the Occident. No ecclesiastic as such, no church court, befriended it: it won its way upon its merits, and in the ninth century its victory was complete. As time went on, its text deteriorated. Owing to his eyes and general health, Jerome had originally employed scribes to write it: therefore the first copy was probably not free from errors; and each successive copy increased the evil. The old and the new version being in use side by side led to a mixture of both texts. CASSIODORUS, in the sixth century, was the first to attempt a revision; but this private work could not stem the tide of corruption. So evidently bad was the case, that Charlemagne ordered ALCUIN (735-804), the most learned man of his day, and his trusted friend, in the year 802, to revise the Latin text. This Alcuin did, not by reference to the Hebrew and Greek, but to older and more correct Latin manuscripts, and presented a very good text, which, under Charlemagne's patronage, obtained wide currency, and long resisted decay. But in the lapse of years, other revisions were required, and were made by LANFRANC of Canterbury (1089), STEPHANUS II., Abbot of Cîteaux (about 1109), and Cardinal NICOLAUS (about 1150). In the thirteenth century so-called "Correctoria biblica" were drawn up, in which varieties of reading were discussed. But, although in the monasteries the older and more reliable texts were preserved, they were not used in the preparation of a pure text. [See Di un codice critico della Bibbia Vulgata, trascritto nel secolo XII., Palermo, 1880.]

But a better day awaited the Vulgate. Printing was invented, and the first book sent out by the press was the Latin Bible. No book was more frequently printed. The text was the ordinary. Cardinal XIMENEZ (1437-1517), in his Complutensian Polyglot (1502-17), made the first serious attempt to revise the text. ROBERT STEPHENS (1503-59) in 1528 and 1540 made important corrections by collation of manuscripts. But there was felt a necessity for an authorized edition. This the Council of Trent demanded (1546), and it was undertaken by Pope SIXTUS V. (1521-90), and issued 1590. The text was declared by the Papal Constitution Aeternus ille, to be "true, lawful, authentic, and unquestioned in all public and private discussion, reading, preaching, and explanation." The printing of any other text was forbidden, under penalty of excommunication. But many changes had been made; and many typographical errors, though none serious, had passed uncorrected. Besides the usual prejudice against any change, personal feeling was aroused. At the head of the movement against the revision stood Bellarmine (1542-1621), the famous Jesuit. Sixtus V. had put his Controversie upon the index, and therefore his hatred was excited. Here was also an opportunity to link his name with the great Catholic work, the Authentic Vulgate. Swayed by hate and ambition, he labored to undo the work of Sixtus. He lyingly told Gregory XIV. that Sixtus had himself ordered the edition to be recalled. He proposed that its errors should be at once corrected, and in the preface the lying statement made that they came about through the carelessness of printers. Gregory died in 1591, and his successor, Innocent IX., in the same year. It was not, therefore, until the beginning of 1592 that Bellarmine realized his hopes. The new pope, CLEMENT VIII. (d. 1605), issued a decree (Feb. 13), interdicting the Sixtine, and ordering the purchase, at the expense of the papal treasury, of all copies. In consequence, copies of this edition are very rare. The new or Clementine edition appeared in 1592, with a temperate and modest preface by Bellarmine, who candidly allowed that the text was not perfect, but claimed it was more correct than any yet given. The two editions were similar in external appearance, and the second bore the name of Sixtus upon the titlepage. On the history of the Authentic Vulgate, cf. THOMAS JAMES: Bellum papale s. concordia discors Sixti V. et Clementis VIII. circa Hieronymianam edit., London, 1600; several reprints, latest, 1841.

Even while the Clementine edition was fresh from the press, there was talk of revising it, and several revisions have, indeed, been made; but the presence of an official text has checked the study of the manuscripts, and hindered the printing of various readings. The "epoch-making work in the study of the Vulgate" is C. VERCELLONE: Variae Lectiones Vulg. Lat. Bibliorum, Rome, tom. i. (1860), tom. ii. (unfinished), part 1, (1862), part 2, (1864). The oldest and best manuscript of the Latin Bible is the Codex Amiatinus, now in the Bibl. Laurentiana at Florence, which dates from 541, and contains the entire Bible, except Baruch. The New Testament part has been edited by Tischendorf, 1850, 1854. The Clementine text of the Vulgate of the Old Testament was published at Leipzig, 1873, large 8vo, with the various readings of the Codex Amiatinus throughout. The edition was begun by Th. Heyse, and completed by Tischendorf. The best edition of the simple Clementine Vulgate is that of Carlo Verellone, Rome, 1861, 4to.

[The present Vulgate, Canon Westcott reminds us, contains elements which belong to every period and form of the Latin version,—(1) Unrevised Old Latin (Wisdom, Ecclesiasticus, 1 and 2 Maccabees, Baruch). (2) Old Latin revised from the Septuagint (Psalter). (3) Jerome's free translation from the original text (Judith, Tobit). (4) Jerome's translation from the original (Old Testament, except Psalter). (5) Old Latin revised from Greek manuscripts (Gospels). (6) Old Latin cursorily revised (the remainder of the New Testament). See art. Vulgate in Smith's Dict. of the Bible, Amer. ed., vol. IV. p. 3466.]

3. Modern Latin Versions.—For convenience we here group a few modern translations of the Old Testament into Latin from the Hebrew. The Reformers worked in this line, particularly Zwingle and Ecolampadius, who together translated the poetical and prophetic books. But a Roman-Catholic scholar, the learned Dominican SANCTES PAGNINUS (1470-1541), was the first to publish (in 1528) a complete Latin Bible, which won him great applause. A corrected edition of the Old Testament of this translation, along with Beza's Latin New Testament, was issued by Robert Stephens in 1557. In 1572 appeared, as an appendix to the Antwerp Polyglot, a Latin interlinear to the Bible, which, in the Old Testament, was substantially the Pagninus version, corrected by Arias Montanus, and, in the New Testament, the Vulgate. Under the direction of Cardinal THOMAS DE VIO CAJETAN (1469-1534), another interlinear of the greater part of the Old Testament, and all the New Testament save the Apocalypse, was prepared by Jewish and Christian scholars; but the Old-Testament parts were not issued in collected edition until 1639. The New Testament appeared 1530. The version was verbal, and in rather barbarous Latin. SEBASTIAN MÜNSTER (1489-1552) issued (in 1534-35, 2d ed. 1546) a literal, faithful version of the Old Testament, with explanatory remarks. LEO JUDA (1482-1542) had almost finished a Latin version of the Old Testament, upon which he had been engaged many years, at the time of his death. At his request some friends continued it; and it was issued in splendid form by Froschower, Zürich, 1543, folio. SEBASTIAN CASTELLIO (1515-63), in 1551, 1555, and 1556, sent forth an elegant and accurate Latin version of the Old Testament. The version made by IMMANUEL TREMELLIUS (1510-80), a born Jew, assisted by his son-in-law FRANCISCUS JUNIUS (1545-1602), which appeared in 2 tom., 1579, received great praise. The New Testament appeared in reprint in England by Middleton, 1580. The translation of the Old Testament published by J. PISCATOR (1546-1625) was in the main only a revision of Tremellius'. SEBASTIAN SCHMID (1617-96), a very useful exegete, spent forty years upon a Latin translation of the entire Bible, and did not live to see it out of the press (1696, 2d ed. 1708). JOHANNES COCCEJUS (1603-69), the Dutch theologian, issued an almost entire translation in connection with his commentaries; and JEAN LE CLERC (1657-1736), the versatile Genevan, an independent able one, in parts, with a commentary (1693-1731). From the learned and acute priest of the oratory, CHARLES FRANÇOIS HOUBIGANT (1686-1783), appeared, Paris, 1753, the Biblia Hebraica cum notis crit. et vers. lat. ad notas crit. facta, 4 tom., the Hebrew text unpointed (since he held the points to be, not only useless, but dangerous), and the translation very careful. J. A. DATHE (1731-91) made a conservative translation of the Old Testament, which appeared at intervals, 1773-89. Besides, there have been versions of separate books, of greater or less excellence.

Turning to the separate Latin versions of the New Testament, the earliest, most successful, and influential, is that by ERASMUS (1467-1536), made in five months, but though hastily made, as was his custom, so excellent, that it has been reprinted more than two hundred times. Five editions appeared in his lifetime (1516, 1519, 1522, 1527, 1535). THEODORE BEZA (1519-1605) followed. His first edition appeared 1556 (1557); the other personally conducted editions were 1565, 1588 (1589), 1598; but the work has been published more than a hundred times. The best edition is Cantabrig., 1642. Three new translations are yet to be mentioned,—those of H. A. SCHOTT, very handy, much used, Lips., 1805, 1811, 1825, 1839; F. A. AD. NÄBE, Lips., 1831; and AD. GÖSCHEN, Lips., 1832. But the time for such work is past: it is an anachronism. The duty of the hour is to spread the living Word in living languages. O. F. FRITZSCHE.

VII. ETHIOPIC.—In the ancient language of the Axumite kingdom, commonly called, since the sixteenth century, the Ethiopic, but by the natives the Geez, there exists a version of the Bible, which has always been the only authorized one among all the tribes of Abyssinian Christians, as well as among the Jewish Falshas, and which yet maintains its ancient authority, and is read in the service, although the Ethiopic long ago ceased to be spoken. We have, however, no reliable information in regard to the exact time or manner of its origin; but it is certain that it was made from the Alexandrian recension of the Greek Bible in the early days of Christianity in Abyssinia, or from the fourth to the sixth century, and it is not only the oldest monument, but also the foundation, of the whole Ethiopic literature. It is very faithful; being, for the most part, a verbal rendering of the Greek, and yet readable and fluent, and in the Old Testament often hits the ideas and the words of the Hebrew in a surprising manner. But this varies, of course; and the translators were not learned men, nor even perfectly at home in Greek, as is evident when rare words and technical terms had to be translated, so that upon their shoulders lies a burden of error which cannot be laid to defective manuscripts, nor to the poverty of Ethiopic. Copying had the inevitable deteriorating effect upon their work; although it appears that errors from this source were comparatively few before the last three or four centuries, and that the majority of the variations are intentional, the result of an effort to remove archaisms, and render the diction more idiomatic. Thus, in many manuscripts, the four Gospels, the portion most read, have undergone such a change, that they read like a paraphrase rather than a translation, or like a new translation instead of the old. Those portions less read are in purer condition. The tradition which ascribes the version to Frumentius is of little value.

The uncertainty of the text led to early attempts at revision; the easier to effect because the Abyssinian pilgrims brought home with them Bibles in other languages, so there could be comparison of texts. In the books of the Ethiopic version already published [see Literature at end of this section] three texts can be distinguished: (1) The original translation, more or less corrupted, very rare in the manuscripts; (2) A text enlarged and altered from the Greek, the commonest in the manuscripts; (3) A text corrected by the Hebrew original, found in later manuscripts. Critical care and caution are therefore requisite to restore the original Ethiopic text. Since this Bible is one of the oldest daughters of the LXX., it has great critical importance, and has preserved peculiarities and originalities. Thus it had at first a different, peculiar, and partly original division of the separate books. The Occidental "chapters" were introduced at a later day into Abyssinia, under European influences. It included the Apocrypha, except the Maccabees, which were either not translated, or very quickly lost, and several pseudographs (see title), and put them upon perfect equality with the canonical writings; and in this way the number of books is given as eighty-one,—forty-six for the Old Testament, thirty-five for the New; but in particulars the counting varies very much.

LIT.—LUDOLF: Hist. eth., III. 4, and Comm., pp. 295-298; the Prolegomena to WALTON'S Polyglot, No. 15; LE LONG: Biblioth. sacra, ed. A. G. Masch, 1778, tom. II. pp. 140-157. Of Ethiopic texts, LAURENCE issued in 1819 the Ascensio Jesaia, and the Apocalypse of Ezra in 1820, at Oxford. DILLMANN has edited the Octateuch, 1853; the four books of the Kings, 1861-71; Enoch, 1851; Liber Jubilaeorum, 1859. The first portions of the Ethiopic Scriptures that appeared in print were the Psalms and the Song of Solomon, edited by John Potken, Rome, 1513. The New Testament was first printed in Rome, 1548-49, reprinted in Walton's Polyglot, 1657, and a Latin translation of the version made by Professor Bode, published at Brunswick, 1752-55, 2 vols. 4to. Mr. Thomas Pell Platt edited for the British and Foreign Bible Society an Ethiopic New Testament, London, 1830. This edition, it is true, is better printed than the Roman, but is equally marred by many errors, and the absence of an old manuscript text, so that it is critically worthless. A. DILLMANN.

VIII. GOTHIC.—This version was the work of ULPHILAS or VULFILA (311-381), Bishop of the West Goths, a "holy and spotless priest of the Lord," written in an alphabet he constructed for this purpose out of Greek, Latin, and Runic characters, and embraced the entire Bible, with the exception of the four books of the Kings, omitted because of their warlike, and, as he thought, dangerous spirit against idols. Much of the New Testament, but very little of the Old Testament, has come down to us. Ulphilas was an Arian; but there is no trace of his heresy in the version, which is faithful, and so skilful, that even the finer shades of the original are happily brought out. The version is from the Greek text, and has, therefore, critical weight. As it now exists, there are traces of Latin-text influences; but these were probably of later origin, when the manuscripts were copied in Italy during the reign of the Goths. The recently debated question, whether Ulphilas was the author of the entire translation, must be answered affirmatively in regard to the New Testament, but left unanswered in the Old; for we know too little about it. Cf. E. BERNHARDT: Krit. Unters. über die goth. Bibelübersetzung, Elberfeld, 1864-69, 2 vols; O. OHRLOFF: Die Bruchstücke vom A. T. der goth. Bibelübers. kritisch untersucht, Halle 1876. And on Ulphilas cf. G. WAITZ: Ueber das Leben und die Lehre des Ulf., Hannover, 1840; W. BESSELL: Ueber das Leben des Ulfilas und die Bekehrung der Gothen zum Christenthum, Göttingen, 1860. Cf. also W. KRAFFT, Kirchengeschichte der germ. Völker, Berlin, 1854.

[In the fifth century the East Goths governed Italy, and the West, Spain, where they ruled until the eighth century. In this way the version was very widely spread. Tregelles, indeed, says it must have been the vernacular translation of a large portion of Europe.] But eventually it was entirely lost sight of for centuries, until, in the latter part of the sixteenth century, Ant. Morillon reported having seen at Werden in Westphalia a Gothic codex, from which he copied the Lord's Prayer. This was probably the Codex Argenteus, taken by the Swedes at the siege of Prague (1648), and which now is the most precious treasure of the University of Upsala. It is a superb manuscript, containing fragments of the Gospels, and dates from the fifth century, first edited by Fr. JUNIUS, Dordr., 1665, 2 vols. The best editions of all the fragments [for the exact list, see Davidson's Art. Gothic Version, in Kitto's Cyc. of Bib. Lit., 3d ed., ii. 873 sq.] are by H. C. v. der Gabelentz and J. Loebe, Lips., 1836(43)-46; by Fr. Ludw. Stamm, 7th ed., revised by Moritz Heyne, Paderborn, 1878; and by E. Bernhardt, Halle, 1875. The Gospel of Mark has recently been edited with a grammatical apparatus by R. Müller and H. Hoeppe: Ulfilas Evangelium Marci, Berlin, 1881. O. F. FRITZSCHE.

IX. ARMENIAN.—It was made from manuscripts brought from the Council of Ephesus (431) by Mesrob (d. 441: his name is spelled in six different ways), the inventor of the national alphabet, with the assistance of several of his pupils. See MESROB. The Old Testament was from the Septuagint (Daniel, as usual, from Theodotion), word for word; the New Testament from the Greek. The first printed edition of the Armenian Bible is that of Bishop Uschan (both the bishopric and the name are doubted), Amsterdam, 1666; but it is untrustworthy, the text having been in many instances conformed to the Vulgate against all known manuscripts. The best edition founded on manuscripts is by Zohrab, New Testament, 1789, Biblia, 1805. Cf. NEUMANN, Gesch. der arm. Lit., 1836.

X. GEORGIAN.—Made from the Septuagint, in the sixth century, in the literary language and ecclesiastical alphabet (Kuzuri); of little present critical value, because of its corrupt state. First printed in Moscow, 1743, fol., since widely circulated by the St. Petersburg Bible Society in both the ecclesiastical and civil character.

XI. OLD SLAVONIC.—Made in the ninth century from the Septuagint, by Methodius and Cyril of Thessalonica. The oldest manuscript of the whole Bible dates 1499, the first printed Bible 1581; but of the New Testament there is an Evangelistary dated 1056, and the Gospels of the same period at Rheims, on which the kings of France used to take their coronation oath; also Glagolitic manuscript of the Gospels, of about the same date, now at St. Petersburg; see V. Jagić, Quatuor Evv. Codex Glagoliticus, Berlin, 1879.

XII. ARABIC.—There are many manuscripts containing translations of portions of the Old Testament now stored away in libraries. We consider only those which are printed or are reliably described. They may be classified into the immediate, direct from the original text, and the mediate, from other versions. 1. Immediate. (a) The version, often a paraphrase, of Rabbi Saadia ha-Gaon (d. 942), more renowned as grammarian. The Pentateuch was published at Constantinople, 1546. Lately P. de Lagarde, in his Materialien zur Kritik u. Geschichte des Pentateuchs, Leipzig, 1867, published Genesis and Exodus from a Leyden manuscript. Saadia's Isaiah, Hosea, Job, and Psalms have also appeared.

(b) Joshua and a fragment of Kings are in the Paris and Walton's Polyglot, made by a Jew of the tenth or eleventh century. (c) Arabs Erpenii, a manuscript of the Pentateuch (in Hebrew letters), literally translated, made by an African Jew in the thirteenth century. (d) Genesis, the Psalms, and Daniel, by Saadia ben Levi Asnekoth, a Jew of Morocco, from the Massoretic text; manuscript now in British Museum. (e) A translation of Hosea and Joel. (f) The Pentateuch of Abu Sa'id, a Samaritan of the eleventh or twelfth century, from the Samaritan text of the Pentateuch, influenced by the Hebrew and the Saadia and the Samaritan version. Samuel Kohn (Zur Sprache, Literatur, u. Dogmatik der Samaritaner, Leipz., 1876, pp. 134 sq.) maintains just the opposite, that the version of Abu Sa'id gave Arabisms to the Samaritan. 2. Mediate. (1) Those which are made from the Peshito. (a) A version of Judges, Ruth, Samuel, Kings, and Nehemiah, found in the London and Paris Polyglots. The version of Job was published by P. de Lagarde, in 1876, in his Psalterium Job Proverbia Arabice. (b) Translations of the Psalms. (c) Fragments of the Pentateuch. (2) Those from the Hexaplar Syriac text. Cf. W. G. FR. COMES DE BAUDISSIN: Translationis antiquæ ar. lib. Jobi quæ supersunt ex apographo cod. Mus. Brit. nunc pr. ed. atque ill., Lips., 1870, and the Leviticus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy published by LAGARDE in his Materialien I. (3) Those from the Septuagint. (a) The versions in the Polyglots of the books not specified above. (b) Several Psalters described by Döderlein (Repertor. II. 176-178, IV. 57-96). (c) Specimens of a Pentateuch from the Alexandrian recension of the Septuagint. (4) Those from the Coptic are very numerous, generally are side by side with the Coptic text; of no importance except for the Coptic. (5) Those made or interpolated from the Vulgate are also of no account.

XIII. PERSIAN.—In the fourth volume of the London Polyglot, there is a Persian translation of the Pentateuch, which was made in the first half of the sixteenth century in Constantinople by the Rabbi Jacob Ben Joseph, surnamed Tawosi, or Tusi, i.e., according to the usual interpretation, from Tus, a city of Persia, which possessed a celebrated Jewish academy; but, according to Kohut, it is a proper name, meaning peacock. Cf. ALEX. KOHUT: Krit. Beleuchtung der pers. Pentateuch-Uebersetzung, Leipzig u. Heidelberg, 1871. The version is very literal, after the manner of Aquila; euphemistic, avoids anthropomorphic and anthropopathic terms, and is influenced by older versions, especially by Onkelos and Saadia.

B. VERSIONS OF THE NEW TESTAMENT. This section is supplementary, and refers only to the New Testament: for the Old Testament and entire Bible, see A. In addition to the literature already given in the note at the beginning of this article, two works deserve mention,—REUSS: Geschichte der heil. Schriften N. T., 5th ed., Braunschweig, 1874; and SCRIVENER: A Plain Introduction to the Criticism of the N. T., 2d ed., Cambridge, 1874.

I. SYRIAC.—Cf. ANDR. MÜLLER: De Syriacis lib. ss. verss., and Symbolæ Syrr., Berol, 1673; also in Opusc. Orient., Francof., 1695; GLOO-

RIDLEY: De Syrr. N. T. versionum indole atque usu, 1761; G. C. STORR: Observ. super N. T. versionibus Syrr., Tüb. 1772; FR. UHLEMANN: De versionum N. T. Syrr. critico usu, Berlin, 1850 (Schul-programm des Friedrich Wilh. Gymnasium). 1. The Peshito. See A III. [The New Testament omits the Apocalypse and four Catholic Epistles (2d Peter, 2d and 3d John, and Jude). See J. W. ETHERIDGE: The Apostolical Acts and Epistles from the Ancient Syriac, London, 1849; J. MURDOCK: Syriac New Testament, N.Y., 1851.] 2. The Philoxenian or Harclean was made by Polycarp, Rural Bishop for Mar Philoxenus, Monophysite Bishop of Mabung (Hierapolis), directly from the Greek: the Gospels were finished A.D. 508. In 616 Thomas of Harkel (Heraclea) corrected the translation by the help of three approved and accurate Greek manuscripts in the Monastery of the Antonians at Alexandria, and added a critical apparatus, and, after the manner of Origen, also asterisks and obeli. This revision is the one now generally found in manuscripts. It is so close to the Greek that it is probably the most servile version of Scripture ever made; indeed, so close as to be in places quite unintelligible without the Greek. It includes the portions of the New Testament omitted from the Peshito; although it is a question whether the Apocalypse, edited by L. de Dieu, Leyden, 1627, and often considered a part of the Philoxenian, although usually used to complete the Peshito, really belongs to it. But at all events the Catholic Epistles and Apocalypse are not the work of Thomas of Harkel; cf. BICKELL: Conspectus rei Syrorum literariæ, Monast. 1871. The whole Harclean version was edited by J. WHITE, Gospels, 2 vols., 1778, Acts and Epistles, 2 vols., 1799, 1803; and later by BERNSTEIN: Das heil. Evang. des Johannes Syr. in harklens. Übers., Leipzig, 1853, and the same; De Charklensi N. T. translatione syriaca, Vratisl., 1837, 2d ed., 1854. 3. The Curetonian Syriac. William Cureton, D.D., Canon of Westminster discovered in 1847, printed in 1848, and published in London, 1858, Remains of a very ancient recension of the Four Gospels in Syriac, which manuscript was brought (1842) from a monastery in the Nitrian Desert, near Cairo, Egypt, and is now in the British Museum. The manuscript is from the middle of the fifth century; but whether the version itself is older than the Peshito is a question. Cf. HERMANSEN: Disp. de cod. evr. syr. a Curetono typis descr., Haun., 1859. Dr. Cureton entertained the idea that he had discovered in these Syriac fragments a text of Matthew's Gospel, which, to a great extent, preserves exactly the genuine words of our Lord as they had been written by the apostle in his original Hebrew Gospel; but this view was accepted only by its author. Upon this point cf. GILDEMEISTER: De evangelis in arabicum e simpliciter syriaca translatis, Bonn, 1865. 4. The Jerusalem Syriac, so called because the language of the principal manuscript known, an Evangelistary, which was discovered in the Vatican by Adler, and described in his N. T. Versiones Syriacæ, Copenhagen, 1789, is less Syriac than Chaldee, much like that of the Jerusalem Targum. It is made directly from the Greek; dates from the sixth century; and was probably used but in a few remote churches of Lebanon or Galilee, as it is not mentioned by any Syriac author. Count Francis Miniscalchi Erizzo has given us a complete and scholarly edition of it in two quarto volumes: Evangeliarium Hierosolymitanum, ex Codice Vaticano Palæstino deprompsit, edidit, Latine vertit, Prolegomenis ac Glossario adornavit, Verona, 1861-64. Recently discovered fragments of this version are contained in LAUD: Anecdota Syriaca T. IV. Lugd. B., 1875, p. 103 sq.

II. EGYPTIAN, or COPTIC. — [The section contributed by Canon (now Bishop) Lightfoot to Scrivener's Introduction to the Criticism of the New Testament, 2d ed., 1874, pp. 319-357, is here presented in a very brief form. The New Testament, or parts of it, appeared in the two principal dialects of Upper and Lower Egypt, the Thebaic and Memphitic respectively, probably before the close of the second century. This is the more likely since it was the exception to find a native Egyptian bishop or monk in the early centuries who could speak Greek. Surely before 270 the Scriptures had been translated into Egyptian; for Anthony (251-356), who could only speak his native tongue, was in his youth powerfully affected by the Gospels which he heard read in church. The Memphitic or Bahiric version was not included in the Polyglots, but was first published by David Wilkins, in Oxford, 1716, from manuscripts in the Bodleian Library, with a Latin translation, N. T. Ægyptium vulgo Copticum, etc. But although great praise is due to this pioneer, two defects seriously impair the work. (1) The text is not constructed on any consistent or trustworthy principles. (2) The translation is often inaccurate. Schwartz, in Berlin (1846, 1847), issued the Gospels, and P. Boetticher [alias P. de Lagarde], in Halle (1852), the Acts and Epistles; but the first editor had much too scanty materials, and the second gives no translation or collation with the Greek, rendering his book absolutely useless to any other than Egyptian scholars. The Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge published (1847-52) a magnificent edition of the whole New Testament in Memphitic, under the editorship of Henry Tattam; but, as the edition contains no various readings, it is quite useless for critical purposes. The Memphitic New Testament did not contain the Apocalypse: this gives a hint as to its date. The earlier Alexandrian writers, Clement and Origen, in the first part of the third century, and the later Alexandrian Church from the close of the third century onward, quote the Apocalypse without hesitation as the work of John; but about the middle of that century doubts were widely expressed, as by Dionysius of Alexandria (d. 265), and the difficulty may have been powerful enough to cause its exclusion from the Egyptian canon. The order of the books of the New Testament is (1) Gospels, (2) Pauline Epistles, (3) Catholic Epistles, (4) Acts. The version is for the most part faithful; and Egyptian is so largely Greek in vocabulary that it is fairly adequate for the purpose. The version may, therefore, generally be consulted, even for minute variations in the text: in this respect it is perhaps the most important of all the versions for the textual critic. It preserves the best text as current among the Alexandrian Fathers, free from the corruptions which prevailed so widely in the copies of the second century.

The Sahidic or Thebaic version has not attracted attention until comparatively recent times. The pioneer scholar was C. G. Woide, who in 1778 announced his intention to publish from Oxford manuscripts the fragments of the Thebaic New Testament; but he did not live to finish his work (d. May, 1790), and H. Ford, professor of Arabic at Oxford, completed and issued it: Appendix ad Editionem N. T. Græci e Codice MS. Alexandrino a C. G. Woide descripti, in qua continentur Fragmenta N. T. juxta interpretationem Dialecti Superioris Ægypti quæ Thebaïlica vel Sahidica appellatur, etc., Oxoniæ, 1799. This work lays biblical scholars under heavy obligations; but, although some additions have been published since, there is greatly needed a complete collection of all the fragments of the Thebaic New Testament. The version is rougher and less faithful than the Memphitic, like it in the arrangement of the books and in the omission of the Apocalypse, but entirely independent of it in text and interpretation, and stands second in textual value.

The Bashmuric or Elearchian version, without independent value, a mere adaptation of the Thebaic, and only useful where the Thebaic is wanting, was made not later than the end of the third or beginning of the fourth century. The word "Bashmur" means the "girdled (by the Nile) country," and was applied to Elearchia, the country of the Bucoli, a fierce and turbulent race of horsemen who lived in the Delta. They were almost exterminated in 839, the remnant of the race being transported to Bagdad. They must have had a complete version of the Bible; but only the merest fragments have come down to us. They are published by Engelbreth: Fragmenta Bashmurico-Coptica Veteris et Novi Testamenti, Havnix (Copenhagen), 1811.]

III. PERSIAN. — The Christians of Western Persia belonging to the Syrian Church used the Peshito in early times; yet there are known two translations of the four Gospels into Persic, — one from the Peshito, in Walton's Polyglot, with a Latin translation by Samuel Clarke, afterwards reprinted with corrections and a learned preface by Bode, Helmstadt, 1750-51: the other is made from the Greek, published, London, 1657; edited by Abraham Wheelocke. There are older Persian versions (parts of both Testaments) still unpublished.

IV. ARABIC. — There is no version earlier than 719, nor is any of critical value. 1. Immediate. (a) The Gospels most commonly printed, first in Rome, 1590, found in the London and Paris Polyglots; latest edition by P. de Lagarde, Leipzig, 1864. (b) By another translator the remainder of the New Testament in the Paris and London Polyglots. (c) The New Testament ed. by Erpenius, Leyden, 1616; reprinted London, 1829. 2. Mediate. From the Peshito, as in "Cod. Tischendorf;" of the Acts, the Pauline and Catholic Epistles, except the four Antilegomena of the latter. 3. The Arabic translation of the New Testament in the Roman Bible of the Propaganda, Rome, 1671, altered from the Vulgate, and that of the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, London, 1727, altered from the Greek, were both designed for circulation in the East, and are of no critical value. See P. DE LAGARDE: Die vier Evang. arab. O. F. FRITZSCHE.

[V. ANGLO-SAXON. — There was apparently no version of the Scriptures in this language before 706, when Adhelm, the first Bishop of Sherborne, translated the Psalms, followed by Egbert or Eadfrid, Bishop of Lindisfarne, with parts of the Gospels, and by Bede (d. 735), with the Gospel of John. Other Saxon translations are: in ninth century by King Alfred (d. 900), the Psalms; in tenth century by Ælfric, the Pentateuch, Joshua, Job, Judith, part of Kings, Esther, and Maccabees. The version was made from the Vulgate. The entire Anglo-Saxon version has never been published; but Spelman edited the Psalms, London, 1640; and Benjamin Thorpe in 1835 issued Libri Psalmorum Versio antiqua Latina cum Paraphrasi Anglo-Saxonica (probably Adhelm's), and in 1842 The Anglo-Saxon Version of the Holy Gospels, reprinted in New York, 1846. Joseph Bosworth edited The Gothic and Anglo-Saxon Gospels in Parallel Columns with the Versions of Wycliffe and Tyndale, arranged with preface and notes, London, 1865. The fact that such a small part of the Bible has been published is the stranger because manuscripts are so numerous. Before the prose translation of any part, Caedmon, a monk in the Abbey of Streonshalh in Northumbria, composed a poetical version of parts of the Bible, 664. See THORPE: Caedmon's Metrical Paraphrase of Parts of the Holy Scripture, Anglo-Saxon with English translation, notes, and a verbal index, London, 1832.]

[Modern Versions. — For account of the important German and English versions see special articles: our space admits of only the briefest mention of the principal others.

1. FRENCH. — Lefèvre d'Étaples made the first Protestant version published, Antwerp, 1530; but that of Pierre-Robert Olivetan, founded upon his, published 1535 at Serrieres, near Neuchâtel, at the expense of the Waldenses, as corrected by Calvin his cousin, is the nearest approach to a national version. Calvin recognized Olivetan's imperfections, and, in the preface to the edition of 1561, expressed the wish that some competent scholar would devote half a dozen years to the translation of the Bible. It is greatly to be regretted that Calvin did not do this work himself. His wish, however, was essentially met when La Compagnie des Pasteurs de Genève deputed the task to certain of their members, among whom was Beza, and in 1588 issued the anxiously awaited version. Put forth under such authority, and a manifest improvement upon its predecessor, it has kept the field unto this day, although it is only a revision of Olivetan. The Bibles of Martin (Amsterdam, 1707) and Ostervald (Amsterdam, 1724) are substantially the 1588 version, and only valuable for their notes. The attempts hitherto made to supersede the sadly defective Olivetan have been unsuccessful; but in 1874 Rev. Dr. Louis Segond published at Geneva (2d ed., 1877, at Nancy; 3d ed., 1879, at Geneva) a new translation of the Old Testament from the Hebrew text, and in 1879 a new translation of the New Testament from the Greek. His work has been accepted by the University press, Oxford, England, and, as a note on the fly-leaf states, been printed in a first edition of fifty thousand copies. This version is regarded as a decided improvement upon all others, and as worthy of national official use. The Oxford edition is beautifully printed, — the prose portions in paragraphs, with marginal numbers to indicate the verses; the poetical in verse form. There are also occasional brief notes, mostly geographical and philological, interesting prefaces, remarques, an abridged history of the Jews to connect the Testaments, and maps, indexes of quotations in the New Testament and to the notes. The book is a pleasure to eye and mind. Never has the Bible appeared in a cheap form more honoring.

2. DUTCH. — Portions of the Bible appeared in the opening years of the century; but the first complete edition of the Scriptures was issued at Antwerp in 1526, by Jacob van Liesveldt, in two folio volumes. The subsequent edition having cost the printer his head, the work was the more valued, and held its own until 1556, when Van Utenhove's version began to supplant it, and is to-day still sold, being highly esteemed by the Lutherans. Neither of these versions was immediate. The first was founded upon Luther's Bible, so far as it had then appeared, and a Cologne Bible of the previous century; the second, upon the complete Luther's Bible, compared with Olivetan's (French); and both failed to present the best Dutch. A version which should be immediate, accurate, scholarly, yet popular in the best sense, was therefore loudly demanded; but, owing to the troubles in Holland, — although in 1571 the Provincial Synod at Embden ordered it, — it was 1637 when the version appeared. The steps which led to the happy issue may thus be described. Discussion and synodical action, 1571-92. Philippe van Marnix de St. Aldegonde, who had long been occupied with a version of his own, appointed (1593) to superintend the work. With him were to be associated five ministers, appointed by the different provincial synods. They were to meet at Leyden, and have their expenses paid by the State; but the death of the brilliant and beloved St. Aldegonde, in December, 1598, ended their meetings. In 1599 work re-began. Owing, however, to the small amount of time the revisers could give to it, and also to the doctrinal differences developed with Gomar and Arminius and their adherents, it went very slowly; and at the death of Helmichius, in 1608, the work stopped. Forty years had thus passed away: nothing was done; but the ground was cleared for action, inasmuch as the principles of the proposed translation were decided. The famous Synod of Dort (1618) elected three translators and fourteen revisers, two from each of the seven provinces; instructed the translators to begin within three months after the rising of the synod, send their work to the States-General, and then to each of the revisers; and, when the revision was finished, to hold a joint meeting to determine the final form of the version. The Apocrypha was to be placed at the end of the New Testament, with a distinct title and pagination. This action of the synod had to be brought before the States-General for approval, in order that the necessary monies might be allowed, and the ministers chosen released from parochial service. It was 1624 before this petition could be presented, and 1626 before the company got fairly at work. They met in Leyden. It was at the outset believed that four years would suffice; but, owing to real difficulties and unexpected hindrances, the translation took eleven years. At last, in 1637, the Bible appeared in two editions, one with, one without, references and marginal readings. So hearty was its reception, that in fifteen years it had won unanimous popular and ecclesiastical sanction. It is, indeed, one of the best of existing versions; perhaps, in points, it excels them all. It is immediate, although quite evidently our authorized version influenced the translators more or less. In many cases its felicity is remarkable. In Holland it is called the States' Bible, to distinguish it from the Synod's Bible. This latter Bible, which, up to the present time, has only appeared in the New Testament, is the result of the criticism of the century, and the immense growth of knowledge. In 1854 the General Synod appointed a committee of fourteen to revise the old translation, and at length, in 1867, the revision appeared. Its reception has been far from enthusiastic. This has led to an indefinite postponement of the Old-Testament part.]

3. ITALIAN. — There were Bible translations into Italian before the invention of printing; but the earliest printed Italian Bible is that of Nicolò di Malherbi (or Malermi), published in Venice, 1471. In the same year another Bible appeared; but it is known only by title. Nicolò was a Venetian abbot of the order of Camadoli. He speaks in his preface about former Italian translations, criticises their freedom, and declares his fidelity to the Vulgate. Nicolò's Italian is not the choice speech which had then been developed. The next version was that of the Florentine Antonio Bruccioli, made from the original texts; New Testament, 1530; Psalms, 1531; Bible, 1532, Venice. In the preface the translator waxes indignant at all prohibitions of the Bible, and every hindrance to its widest spread among the people. His work, however, seems to have been scarcely circulated in Italy outside of Venice, and was indeed put in the first class of prohibited books; still, many editions appeared. With Bruccioli the Roman-Catholic activity in the field of Bible versions practically ceased; although translations of the New Testament were issued by the Dominican Zaccaria in 1532, and by Giglio in 1551, both at Venice. These books are extremely rare.

With the expulsion of Bruccioli's version a new era of Bible study began. The liberty to read the Scriptures, denied by Romanistic Italy, was enjoyed in Geneva; and there this version of the Old Testament, slightly revised, was reprinted in connection with the New Testament of the Florentine Massimo Teofilo (first printed Lyons, 1551), revised by Gallars and Beza; and so the first complete Italian Protestant Bible appeared in Geneva, 1562, for the benefit of the congregation of Italian fugitives. But this Bible was put into speedy disuse by the appearance of the Bible of Giovanni Diodati, Geneva, 1607, made directly from the original texts, in the Lucchese dialect, and therefore adapted for circulation among the peasants. This is the version commonly taken up by Bible societies, and used in Italy to-day. In 1776 the Archbishop of Florence, Anton Martini, issued in Turin a translation of the whole Bible from the Vulgate, which the British and Foreign Bible Society adopted, published the New Testament, 1813, Bible, 1821, and now circulate in Italy. For the famous story of the persecution of the Madiari in Florence, because they used the Bible, see title. Southern and Eastern Italy, up to this time, appear to stand outside of Bible influences.

4. SPANISH. — The first printed New Testament is by Francisco de Enzinas (Dryander, see title); appeared in Antwerp, 1543; now circulated by the British and Foreign Bible Society. Another New Testament was that of Juan Perez, Venice, 1556. The first Bible was from Cassiodoro Reyna, Basel, 1569; revised by Cypr. de Valera, Amsterdam, 1602; New Testament, separately, 1625. The Old Testament was repeatedly rendered into Spanish during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, by Jews in the Netherlands and in Ferrara. But of all these translations the fact is that they did not circulate in Spain. In 1794 Phil. Scio de S. Miguel, a Spanish ecclesiastic, issued at Madrid a translation with a commentary. The British and Foreign Bible Society have, since 1828, circulated the Spanish text. It is made, of course, from the Vulgate. See Borrow's "The Bible in Spain."

5. PORTUGUESE. — The version of J. Ferreira d'Almeida, a convert from Rome (New Testament, Amsterdam, 1712; Pentateuch and historical books, 1719), is that now printed by the British and Foreign Bible Society; although there was printed at Lisbon, 1784, a version made by Anton Pereira de Figueiredo, the first upon native soil. REUSS.

6. SCANDINAVIAN. — Some parts of the Old Testament were translated into Danish in the fourteenth century, and published by Molbeck, Copenhagen (1828); but the Danish translation of the Bible is the work of the Reformation. Prepared by several scholars, it bore the name of Christiern Pedersen, and was published in 1550. It was afterwards often revised. The edition now used is the work of a committee of revision, appointed in 1815: it appeared in 1824. There are two independent translations: one by I. C. Lindberg, much used in the Grundtvigian circles; and one by Chr. Kalkar, of missionary reputation. The Danish Bible was used in Norway up to the separation of the two kingdoms in 1814. After that time, minor improvements, mostly of purely linguistic import, have been made in the Norwegian Bible, and in 1871 a committee was appointed to make a thorough revision.

A Swedish translation from the fourteenth century is spoken of as having been undertaken at the instance of St. Birgitta, but has not come down to us. In Sweden, as in Denmark, it was the Reformation which translated the Bible. The complete Swedish version appeared in 1541, the New Testament by Laurentius Andree (1526), the Old Testament by Laurentius and Olaus Petri (1534). Often revised, the edition now in general use dates back to the beginning of the eighteenth century.

The Icelandic translation was made by Oddur

Gotshalkson: the New Testament appeared at Copenhagen in 1540, the whole Bible at Holum in 1584. The edition now in use is a revision by Thorlak Skuleson (1644). CLEMENS PETERSEN.

Missionary Translations. — The Bible has been translated by Protestant missionaries into all the literary languages of the world, and into many which had never previously been written; but these translations are evidently of no critical value whatever, although made, in most cases, from the original tongues. Probably the most faithful and finished of all these versions is that into Arabic. It was begun by Eli Smith, D.D., in 1847, aided by Cornelius V. A. Van Dyck, M.D. D.D., who continued the work after Dr. Smith's death, and brought the labors of sixteen years to a happy conclusion.

The printing and electrotyping of this Bible is regarded as the greatest typographical performance of the American Bible Society, and the book itself opens the truth to the Mohammedan world. The first plate was electrotyped March 15, 1866. The types perfectly transcribe the best Arabic caligraphy, according to a mode designed by Dr. Eli Smith, and executed by Mr. Homan Hollock of the Syrian Mission.

BIBLIANDER (Buchmann), Theodore, b. at Bischofzell, Thurgau, about 1507; d. of the plague, at Zürich, Nov. 26, 1564; was a teacher in the school of Myconius, and professor of theology and Oriental philology in the University of Zürich after the death of Zwingli, but was dismissed in 1560 on account of his open opposition to the Calvinistic doctrine of predestination, propagated with great success in the city since 1556 by Peter Martyr Vermilius. He gave a Latin translation of the Koran, and many valuable contributions to the history of Mohammedanism. Most of his writings, however, have never been printed.

BIBLIA PAUPERUM (the Bible of the Poor) is the name given to one of the earliest "block books" printed before the use of movable type. It consists of a series of forty leaves, printed on one side, so as to make twenty when pasted together, on which forty scenes from the history of our Lord are depicted: underneath are inscriptions in the abbreviated Latin of the period. The title given above is probably misleading. It was not intended for the poor people so much as for the poor friars who went about preaching, and would, no doubt, derive help in the composition of their sermons from the pictures. Besides, they could be shown with advantage to their audiences.

BIBLICAL PHILOLOGY concerns itself with the original text of the Old and New Testaments and the old versions, the study of Hebrew and the cognate languages and dialects, of the Greek of the Septuagint, the Apocrypha, and New Testament. See HEBREW LANGUAGE; HELLENIC DIALECT.

BIBLICAL THEOLOGY, in the sense of a study of the word of God, in contrast to dogmatics, or the deductions and speculations of men, and therefore without reference to ecclesiastical formulæ and creeds, manifestly is of comparatively recent development; for, so long as the Church and the Bible were believed to be in unison, there was no demand for it. The Fathers were presumed for many centuries to have conserved and developed the apostolic teaching. The mediæval theologians went upon the assumption that the Fathers were infallible, and studied them, and therefore accepted the traditional patristic scriptural proofs upon all points, instead of working up the subjects for themselves. It was not, therefore, until the Reformation called attention to the discrepancy between the Bible in tradition and the Bible itself, that biblical theology began. [Unfortunately in the seventeenth century a new scholasticism replaced the old, and individual Bible-writers, and even some who were not, were minutely studied. Thus the theology of Job (1687), of Jeremiah (1696), even that of Elizabeth (1706), was treated with minute care.] The beginnings of the science were naturally unsystematic and wavering. Seb. Schmidt, in his Collegium biblic. in quo dicta V. et N. T. iuxta seriem locorum comm. Theol. explicantur, Strassburg, 1671, led the way, and he had many followers. But these works were little more than collections of proof-texts conveniently arranged for the theological lecturer. The first one to bring the term "Bible theology" into use was Haymann, who introduced it in its present sense in his work, Versuch einer bibl. Theol. in Tabellen (1708), which ran through four editions, the last being printed 1758. Pietism loosened the connection between the Bible and dogmatics, because it emphasized the importance of the former as a means of grace, and infallible source of knowledge. The result is seen in Büsching's Diss. exhibens epitomen Theol. e solis lit. sacr. concinnatæ (1756) and Gedanken von der Beschaffenheit und dem Vorzuge der bibl. dogm. Theologie vor der scholastischen, Berlin, 1758. Then came Bengel, the acute verbal critic, and his school, who worked upon the principle that the Bible does not contradict the Church, but accompanies it, and has superior authority. Semler, in 1764, in his Hist. u. krit. Sammlungen über die sog. Beweisstellen in der Dogm., Halle, 1764-68, 2 parts, and more particularly his followers, showed the great difference between the cut-and-dried theology of the schools and the teaching of the New Testament. This led the defenders of the former to show their substantial agreement by an unprejudiced study of the Bible. So did Zachariæ, Biblishe Theologie, oder Untersuchung d. bibl. Grundes d. vornehmsten theol. Lehren, Göttingen, 1772, and Storr, Doctr. christ. pars theor. e sacr. libris repetita, Stuttgart, 1793. The Neologians, on the other hand, prejudiced against every doctrine not part of natural religion, began to press for a purely historical treatment of the Bible (so Gabler, De iusto discrimine Theologiæ bibl. et dogm. regundis que recte utriusque finibus, Altorf, 1787), and thus prepared the way for a rationalistic history of religion, written by such men as Ammon, Entwickel. einer reinen bibl. Theol., Erlangen, 1792. The increased attention given to Oriental studies, and the rise of the study of comparative religion, yielded fruit in the subsequent works upon biblical theology, as Kaiser's, which attempted to educe a purely "rational" religion out of the Bible. With Schleiermacher a new direction was given to the study, and in some respects an unfortunate one. The Old Testament was sundered from the New, and attention directed to the latter. Then came up the study of individual authors, particularly of Paul and John. Neander led the way in a new departure, — the unity of the Gospels in spite of their differences. Cf. C. F. Schmid, 1st ed. Stuttgart, 1853, excelled by Weiss, Lehrb., 1868, 3d ed. Berlin, 1880. Then came Ferdinand Christian Baur, the head of the Tübingen school (see title), and his followers, who have attempted in their works to split the Primitive Church into parties, e.g., Paulus, Stuttgart, 1846, Das Christenthum u. d. Kirche d. erst. Jahrhunderts, Tübingen, 1853; Schwegler, Nachapost. Zeitalter, Tübingen, 1846; Pfeiderer, Paulinismus, Leipzig, 1873; and Köstlin, Lehrbegriff d. Ev. u. d. Briefe Johannis, Berlin, 1843. The life of Jesus was also studied as never before, and very valuable results obtained. In fact, the persons and the events of the New Testament have had an amount of patient study and a wealth of learning bestowed upon them, which makes them the most thoroughly known phenomena in history. Under such influences sprang up the study of the New Testament times as such (Hausrath), and of the immediate surroundings of our Lord's life (Schürer), and thus the way was prepared for the history of primitive Christian literature and theology as the first step in the study of church history.

But the claims of the Old Testament have not been completely ignored. Indeed, the aphorism is gaining ground, that, in order to understand the New, it is necessary to study the Old. So has A. Ritschl, in his Entstehung d. altkath. Kirche, 2te Aufl. Bonn, 1857, maintained, as a rebuke to the Tübingen school. Hengstenberg, in his Christologie (1829), advocated the necessarily close connection between the two Testaments, and repudiated, upon the ground of his conception of revelation, a biblical theology that made too much account of strict historical sequence, or, in other words, that refused to see the Old Testament in the New, and the New in the Old. Oehler developed the same idea, maintaining that nothing was ended in the Old Testament, nothing was quite new in the New Testament. See his Prolegomena z. bibl. Theol. d. A. T., Stuttgart, 1845, and Theol. d. A. T., Tübingen, 1873. Hermann Schultz likewise advocates this view in his Alltestamentliche Theologie, new edition, Frankfurt, 1878.

And it is manifestly the correct view. In this way a lack in Protestant theology is filled; for the Bible studied in this thorough-going fashion becomes in the most comprehensive sense the source and test of theology. But let it not be supposed that it is easy thus to handle the Scriptures, although it appear to be so. Many preliminary questions have to be answered. Is Judaism a preparation for, or a mere predecessor of, Christianity? What is the primitive religion? Is the Bible literature, or revelation? What is the connection between the Bible and the aftertime? How much is comprehended in Bible theology? Does it include, for instance, Bible history? When these points are settled, and the study begun in earnest, other questions arise. The order, subjects, and methods of work, must be determined. The books themselves are to be examined, and in this way important contributions will be made to the discussion of canonicity.

The relation of biblical to dogmatic theology, and to the other branches of Christian learning, is an interesting point. It would seem to be necessary to restrict biblical theology to the subject immediately in hand. Hence, while a study of the people among whom the doctrines arose is necessary in order to determine the need and condition of revelation, it can have nothing to do with the long struggles in the Christian Church over doctrinal points. The Bible must be made the source. All that throws light upon it should be used. The more the theologian knows about outside matters, of course the better for him; but it should be his endeavor to master the text, and whatever explains the text of the sacred volume whose contents he desires to formulate, and whose truths he desires to defend. Compare the books quoted in this article, and also EWALD: Lehre der Bibel von Gott, Leipzig, 1870-75, 4 vols.; WEISS: Lehrbuch der biblischen Theologie des Neuen Testaments [3d ed., Berlin, 1880]; HITZIG: Vorlesungen über biblische Theologie u. Messianische Weissagungen, Karlsruhe, 1880. M. KÄHLER.

BIBLICISTS, BIBLICAL DOCTORS, those were called, who, during the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, demonstrated religious truths by the Scriptures and by the authority of the Fathers, in contrast to the scholastics, who abandoned Scripture and tradition in order to give full rein to their fancy and philosophy; and in this way the famous, interminable hair-splitting subtleties arose. The most of these latter sort of doctors were Dominican and Franciscan monks, who in as much as their orders held no property, had no libraries, and were, moreover, required to lead unsettled and vagrant lives, had little opportunity for the study of the books, and therefore naturally taught out of their own heads. Some of the biblical doctors were scholars, and produced valuable works; but the majority of them were servile imitators of their predecessors, and by their method tended to bring the Scriptures into disrepute.

PÉRENNÈS: Dictionnaire de bibliographie catholique, Montrouge, 1858-60, 4 vols., part of Migne's "Encyclopédie théol." Journals devoted to the record and criticism of current theological literature are, Zeitschrift für die gesammte lutherische Theologie u. Kirche, Leipzig; Theologische Literaturzeitung (edited by Harnack and Schürer), Leipzig; Theologische Literaturblatt (Roman-Catholic, edited by Reusch), Bonn; in French, Bibliographie catholique, Paris. Twice a year Vandenhöck and Ruprecht of Göttingen have, since 1848, published Bibliotheca Theologica (edited by W. Müldener). In 1870, 1875, and 1880, Hinrichs of Leipzig published catalogues (edited by Baldamus) of German theological works, Protestant and Roman Catholic separately, for the five years 1865-69, 1870-74, and 1875-79. These bibliographical works are alphabetical according to the author's name. Works arranged according to subjects are, M. LIPENIUS: Bibliotheca realis Theologica, Francof., 1685, 2 vols. (voluminous, but inexact); DANZ: Universal-Wörterbuch der theologischen, kirchen- u. religionsgeschichtlichen Literatur, Leipzig, 1837-43, supplement, 1843 (it unfortunately lacks a table of authors).

2. BIBLIOGRAPHY IN THE ORDER OF AUTHORS. — The Fathers and ecclesiastical authors of the past have been catalogued in the elaborate works of Possevin, Cave, Du Pin and his continuator Goujet, Ceillier, Oudin, and in the less voluminous works of Trithème, Miræus, Bellarmin (continued by Labbe and Du Saussay), and Olearius. These volumes contain a great deal of information of a literary character. The bibliographies of modern writers are those of ENSLIN: Bibliotheca theologica, 2d ed., Stuttgart, 1833, carrying the list down to 1831; continued down to 1862 by ZUCHOLD: Bibliotheca theologica, Göttingen, 1864, 2 vols.; for Roman-Catholic literature, M. Schmalhofer, publisher: Bücherkunde der kath. theol. Literatur bis 1836, Augsb., 1837, supplement entitled Handbüchlein d. neuesten Literatur des Katholizismus, Schaffhausen, 1840-44. The Thesaurus librorum rei catholice, Würzburg, 1848-50, 2 vols. with supplement, embraces all the Roman-Catholic authors arranged topically and alphabetically. DARLING: Cyclopædia bibliotheca, London, 1854, 2 vols., is for the most part the catalogue of a simple library, — that collected by Mr. Darling, consisting of thirty thousand volumes. (The catalogue is extremely valuable for English theological authors, but much less so for those of other countries, except the old and standard writers. One feature of it is its detailed list of the contents of all the great collections, like Migne, of collected writers, e.g., Orme's edition of Baxter, and of lecture courses.)

3. CATALOGUES OF PARTICULAR LIBRARIES. — JO. FABRICIUS: Historia Bibliothecæ Fabricianæ, Wolfenbüttel, 1717-24, 6 vols. (Fabricius having died ere it was finished, it lacks a general table of contents); J. F. REIMANN: Catalogus bibliothecæ theologicæ systematico-criticæ, Hildeslæ, 1731, supplement, 1747; MICH. LILIENTHAL: Biblisches-Exegetische Bibliothek, Königsberg, 1740; Theologische Bibliothek, 1741; Fortgesetzte Theologische Bibliothek, 1744 (in all 3 vols.); S. J. BAUMGARTEN: Nachrichten von einer hallischen Bibliothek, Halle, 1748-51, 8 vols.; Nachrichten von merkwürdigen Büchern, 1752-58, 12 vols. (these two works of Baumgarten, remarkable especially for the precious collection of Bibles which is described, and for the exactitude of the bibliographical information they contain, are grouped together by a very convenient table, which refers to all the twenty volumes); J. M. FRANKE: Catalogus Bibliothecæ Bunaviane, Lips., 1750-56, 7 vols. (unhappily unfinished, valuable for its detailed information and systematic classification of the valuable library, now at Dresden, which is particularly rich in ecclesiastical history and biography); C. G. G. THEILE: Thesaurus literaturæ theologicæ academicæ, Lips., 1840 (unfinished); O. FIEBIG: Corpus dissertationum theologiarum, Lips., 1847 (catalogues of large and excellent collections of theological theses and dissertations).

II. Exegetical Theology. 1. EXEGESIS IN GENERAL. — J. LELONG: Bibliotheca sacra, nov. ed., Paris, 1723, 2 vols. (a vast repertory of biblical works: the first volume contains a catalogue of editions of the Bible in different languages; the second an alphabetical list of authors who have written upon the Bible, with their works, followed by a systematic table of the last: in spite of errors and omissions, the book is still useful); E. F. K. ROSENMÜLLER: Handbuch für die Literatur der biblischen Kritik u. Exegese, Göttingen, 1797-1800, 4 vols. (this excellent work, unhappily unfinished, embraces only the introduction and criticism, the indispensable editions of the original text, hermeneutics, the ancient versions, and, among the modern, those in the Romance languages); G. W. MEYER: Geschichte der Schrifterklärung seit der Wiederherstellung der Wissenschaften, Göttingen, 1802-1809, 5 vols. (a useful work from the number of its bibliographical references). Besides these one may profitably consult CALMET: La Bibliothèque sacrée, prefixed to his "Dictionnaire de la Bible," Paris, 1722 (often reprinted and translated, e.g., as revised by Rev. Dr. Edward Robinson, Boston, 1852); and W. ORME: Bibliotheca Biblica (a select list of books on sacred literature, with notices, etc.), Edinburgh, 1824; T. H. HORNE: Manual of Biblical Bibliography, London, 1839; also in the second and fourth volumes of his Introduction as edited by Ayre and Tregelles, 14th ed., London, 1877, 4 vols.; DIESTEL: Geschichte d. Alt. Test. in der christlichen Kirche, Jena, 1869. EWALD, in his Jahrbücher der bibl. Wissenschaften, Göttingen, 1848-65, 12 vols., took notice of almost all the works relating even remotely to biblical exegesis which were published within this time.

2. EDITIONS OF THE BIBLE. — A. G. MASCH: Bibliotheca Sacra, Halle, 1778-90, two parts in six volumes (a reprint and continuation of J. Lelong's work mentioned above, but not carried out further than the record of the editions of the original text and versions in the Oriental, Greek, and Latin languages). The record of Hebrew Bibles was completed by G. B. DE ROSSI: De ignotis nonnullis antiquissimis hebr. textus editionibus ac critico earum usu, Erlangen, 1782. There are elaborate catalogues of different collections of Bibles, as that of S. J. BAUMGARTEN cited above; that of the Duke of Brunswick, made by G. L. O. KNOCH: Bibliotheca biblica, Brunsw., 1752; that of GOEZE: Verzeichniss seiner Sammlung merkwürdiger Bibeln, Halle, 1777, Fortsetzung, Hamb., 1778; at Stuttgart, by J. LORCK: Die Bibelgeschichte, Copenhagen u. Leipzig, 1779-83, 2 vols.; at Parma, by G. B. DE ROSSI, in the first and fifth volumes of his Varie Lectiones V. T., Parma, 1784-98, 5 vols.; of the Duke of Sussex, by T. J. PETTIGREW: Bibliotheca Sussexiana, London, 1827-39, 3 vols. For the editions of the Hebrew Bible, see the monographs of DE ROSSI; for those of the Greek New Testament, the best work is REUSS: Bibliotheca Novi Test. Græci, Braunschweig, 1872; for the German versions, J. G. PALM: Historie d. deutsch. Bibelübers. Luther's, herausgeg. mit Anmerk. v. J. M. Goeze, Halle, 1772, and De codicibus V. et N. T. quibus b. Luther, in conficienda interpretatione germ. usus est, liber hist., Hamb., 1735; H. E. BINDSEIL: Verzeichniss der Original-Ausgaben der lutherischen Uebersetzung, Halle, 1841; for the Dutch version Is. LE LONG: Boek-zaal der nederduytsche bybels, geopent, in een histor. Verhand. van de overzettinge der h. Schr. in de nederduytsche taale, Amsterdam, 1732, new title, Hoorn, 1764; for the Swedish, J. A. SCHINMEYER: Vers. e. vollst. Gesch. d. schwed. Bibelübersetzungen, Flensb., 1777; for the English, J. LEWIS: A Complete History of the Several Translations of the Bible and the New Testament into English, both in manuscript and in print, and the most remarkable editions of them since the invention of printing, 3d ed., London, 1818 (originally printed with the author's edition of Wiclif's New Testament, 1731, and separately, 1739); H. COTTON: A list of editions of the Bible and parts thereof in English, from the year 1505 to 1820, Oxford, 1821, 2d ed., enlarged, 1852; CHRISTOPHER ANDERSON: The Annals of the English Bible, London, 1845, 2 vols., new ed. 1862, abridged and continued by S. Irenæus Prime, N.Y., 1856; B. F. WESTCOTT: History of the English Bible, London, 1868; J. H. BLUNT: A Plain Account of the English Bible from the earliest times of its translation to the present day, N.Y., 1870; J. EADIE: The English Bible, London, 1876, 2 vols.; W. T. MOULTON: History of the English Bible, London, Paris, and New York, n.d. (1878); J. STROUGHTON: Our English Bible, London, 1878. For Bibles published in America, E. B. O'CALLAGHAN: A List of Editions of the Holy Scripture and Parts thereof printed in America previous to 1860, with Introduction and Bibliographical Notes, Albany, 1861. Finally, for Bibles in the Romance languages, and especially the French Bible, see the profound researches of REUSS in Herzog's Real-Encyclopädie, art. Romanische Bibelübersetzungen.

3. COMMENTARIES. — J. F. MAYER: Bibliotheca biblica, Frankf., 1709, continued by C. Arnd, Rostock, 1713, and L. MÜLLER under the pseudonyme of Theoph. Alethäus: Ausführlicher Bericht von den Commentariis, Leipzig, 1719-44, 8 vols., form a series which carries the information down to 1744. M. LILIENTHAL: Biblischer

Archivarius des A. T., Königsburg, 1746, N. T., 1745 (indicates under each chapter and verse the authors who have exegetically or homiletically explained it); J. F. WILDESHAUSEN: Bibliotheca disputationum in V. et N. T., Hamburg, 1710, and C. H. SCHEDELIG under similar title, Hamb., 1736, 1737, 3 vols., have followed the same plan in respect of the isolated exegetical dissertations; J. DARLING: Cyclopaedia Bibliographica. Subjects; Holy Scriptures, London, 1859 (indicates the dissertations and sermons founded upon the different verses of the Bible, especially of English divines); finally SPURGEON: Commenting and commentaries, London and New York, 1876 (a catalogue of commentaries in the English language, with spicy remarks; an excellent and useful compilation). Touching the department of exegesis, W. F. HEZEL: Versuch einer Geschichte der bibl. Kritik des Alt. Test., Halle, 1780; J. C. WOLF: Historia Lexicorum hebraicorum, Wittemb., 1705; W. Danz, Jena, 1834. For the study of the middle age, the indispensable work is, A. POTTHAST, Bibliotheca historica mediæ ævi, Berlin, 1862, supplement, 1868. Very valuable is CHEVALIER, Repertoire des sources histor. du moyen âge (now in course of publication). There is lacking a general bibliographical manual upon the Reformation; but the catalogues of different collections offer abundant materials. — H. VON DER HARDT: Antiqua literarum monumenta Reformationis ætatem illustrantia, Brunsw., 1690-93, 3 vols.; J. A. FABRICIUS: Centifolium lutheranum, Hamb., 1728-30, 2 vols.; G. SCHWETSCHKE: Ausstellung meist origineller Druckschriften zur Erläuter. d. Reformationsgeschichte, Halle, 1841; A. KUCZYNSKI: Thesaurus libellorum historiam Reformationis illustrantium, Leipzig, 1870-74. For the reformation in Spain, see ED. BÖHMER: Bibliotheca Wiffeniana, Strasb., 1874. For a very serviceable list of the sources and more important works on the Reformation, see GEORGE P. FISHER: History of the Reformation, New York, 1873, Appendix II. Bibliographies of different religious orders have been prepared. The more important are: upon the Benedictines, by Ziegelbauer and François, and, specially for the congregation of St. Maur, Pez, Lecerf, and Tassin; for the Dominicans, by Quétif and Echard; for the Franciscans, by Wadding, his continuator Sbaralea, and J. a S. Antonio; for the Jesuits, besides the old works of Ribadeneira, Alegambe, and Southwell, consult A. CARAYON: Bibliographie historique de la Comp. de Jésus, Paris, 1864; and the remarkable work of the brothers DE BACKER: Bibliothèque des écrivains de la Comp. de Jésus, new edition, Liège et Louvain, 1869-76, 3 vols. fol. Certain religious sects have furnished good bibliographical monographs: thus, for the Socinians, C. SAND: Bibliotheca Anti-Trinitariorum, Freistad, 1684; for the Arminians, A. VAN CATTENBURGH: Bibliotheca scriptorum Remonstrantium, Amsterdam, 1728; and, most recent, H. C. ROGGE: Catalogus der Pamfletten-Verzameling van de Boekerij der Remonstrantsche Kerk te Amsterdam, Amst., 1861-65, in 3 parts (an excellent work, and much more complete than its title would indicate). Jansenism was very fertile in publications; but there is lacking a complete catalogue. See Catalogue des livres impr. de la Biblioth. der roi; Théologie, Paris, 1739-43, 3 vols. (fulfils its object admirably, but its scope is narrow). It is to be regretted that Abbé GUETTÉE, Histoire littéraire de Port Royal, Paris, 1868, was not published beyond the first volume. The first volume of J. LELONG, Bibliothèque hist. de la France (new ed., by Fevret de Fontette, Paris, 1768-78, 5 vols.), and vol. V. of the Catalogue de l'hist. de France de la Bibliothèque impériale (Paris, 1855-70, 10 vols. in quarto), are taken up with ecclesiastical history. For the Swiss religious affairs, see vol. III. of G. E. VON HALLER: Bibliothek der Schweizer-Geschichte, Bern, 1785-88, 7 vols.; and the Archiv für die schw. Reformations-Geschichte herausgeg. von dem Pius-Verein, vol. I., Soloth., 1868, and vol. III., Freib., 1875.

IV. For catalogues of Oriental, especially Hebrew, literature, J. T. ZENKER: Bibliotheca orientalis, Leipzig, 1846-61, 2 vols.; C. H. HERRMANN: Bibliotheca orientalis et linguistica, Halle, 1870 (contains German works published between 1850 and 1868); Die Zeitschrift der Deutschen morgenländischen Gesellschaft, Leipzig, 1847 sqq.; GOSCHE: Wissenschaftlicher Jahresbericht über die morgenländischen Studien, 1859-61, Leipzig, 1868, and 1862-67, Heft 1, Leipzig, 1871; C. FRIEDERICI: Bibliotheca Orientalis, London, 1877 sqq. (a yearly full list of books, papers, serials, and essays published during the preceding year in England and the Colonies, Germany, and France, on the history, languages, religions, antiquities, and literature of the East; an excellent publication). Concerning the Jews there is an inexhaustible mine of bibliographical information of all sorts, J. C. WOLF: Bibliotheca hebræa, Hamb., 1715-33, 4 vols. 4to; the supplement, by H. F. KÖCHER, Nova bibliotheca hebraica (Jena, 1783-84, 2 vols.), is far from having the same value; M. STEINSCHNEIDER: Catalogus librorum hebræorum in Bibliotheca Bodleiana, Berlin, 1852-60, 2 vols. 4to (a very superior work, and, in spite of its title, a complete Hebrew bibliography); G. B. DE ROSSI: Annales hebræo-typographici, Parma, 1795-99, 2 vols. 4to; Bibliotheca judaica anti-christiana, Parma, 1800. For more complete directions where to find works in the different branches of theology, see WALCZ: Bibliotheca theologica, Jena, 1757-65; STRUVE: Bibliotheca historia litteraria, new ed. by Jugler, Jena, 1754-63; NAMUR: Bibliographie paléographico-diplomatique-bibliographique, Liège, 1838; especially PETZOLDT: Bibliotheca bibliographica, Leipzig, 1866; DE SMEDT: Introd. gener. ad histor. eccl., Gand, 1876; BRUNET: Manuel du Libraire, Paris, 1860-65, 6 vols.; ALLIBONE: Dictionary of Authors, Phila., 1863-70, 3 vols.; MALCOM: Theological Index, Phila., 1870; O. BIBLIOMANCY, or sortes biblicæ, is the term used to describe a superstitious use of the Bible, which consists in opening it haphazard, and considering the first verse the eye rests upon, or entering a church, and marking the first words of Scripture read, as a divine indication of duty, or prophecy of future good or ill. Many are the stories told of wonderful answers to prayers, and warnings and encouragements thus given. Some eminent Christians, such as John Bunyan and John Wesley, have fallen victims to this delusion. It cannot be denied that it may please God to make use of his own Word to comfort saints or startle sinners, by such chance readings; but it can be denied most emphatically that he intended his book to be so used. He would have us free from all reliance upon the printed or written letters, but, instead, to trust to the Spirit, who will direct us just as carefully as he did the writers of the Bible.

Bibliomancy, it is to be feared, is not dead. Too much respect is paid to the mere ipsissima verba of the authorized version, which is quoted as settling every thing, even when it is notoriously inaccurate. It seems such an easy and natural thing that God should direct us by causing us to read one of the many precious promises of his Word, that it is no wonder simple-minded folk, and many deeply pious, nay, and sinful persons, should go to the Bible for supernatural guidance. The immortal story of Augustine's conversion, and the familiar story of the remarkable conversion of William Cowper, not to speak of other religious anecdotes, contain mention of such a use of the Bible as probably has encouraged bibliomancy, far as it was from the practice or commendation of these persons. The inveteracy of the folly is shown by its continuance in the Church, both East and West, notwithstanding the decrees of councils. It came direct from Paganism; for in like manner had the Pagans used Homer and Virgil. In the middle ages a new use was found for it in the detection of heretics: the opened Bible would, they thought, give an answer either for or against the accused. A similar mode was at one time employed in Great Britain to root out witchcraft. The suspected old woman was taken to the village church, and weighed against the big church Bible. If she weighed more than it, she was declared innocent; but alas for her whom the Bible outweighed!

BICKELL, Johann Wilhelm, b. at Marburg, Nov. 2, 1799; d. at Cassel, Jan. 23, 1848; studied law at Marburg and Göttingen; was appointed professor of jurisprudence at Marburg in 1824; and became president of the supreme court of Hesse-Cassel in 1841, and minister of state in 1846. He wrote Über die Entstehung des Corpus Juris Canonici, 1825; Über die Reform der Protest. Kirchenverfassung, 1831; and Über die Verpflichtung der evangel. Geistlichen auf d. symbolischen Schriften, Cassel, 1831, 2d ed. 1840; Geschichte des Kirchenrechts, Giessen, 1843, 1849.

BICKERSTETH, Edward, b. at Kirkby Lonsdale, Westmoreland, Eng., March 19, 1786; d. at Watton, Hertfordshire, Feb. 28, 1850; studied law, and began to practise at Norwich, but felt himself strongly drawn to theology; received full orders in 1815, and was in the same year appointed secretary to the Missionary Society, and in 1830 rector of Watton. A collected edition of his works, of which the most prominent are, A Help to the Study of the Scriptures, Guide to the Prophecies, etc., appeared in 1853, in London, in 16 vols. He edited the Christian Family Library, 50 vols. He was a leader of the "Evangelicals," and one of the founders of the Evangelical Alliance. See Memoir by Rev. T. H. Birks, London, 1851, in 2 vols.

BIDDING-PRAYERS (corruption of "Bidding of Prayers") are formal "biddings," or exhortations, to pray,—a very early custom. A form yet in use in the Church of England before sermons which are not preceded by divine service, such as university sermons, and also before the morning sermon in cathedral churches, dates substantially from mediæval times. Before the Reformation, the prayer before sermon was called the bidding of the beads; beads meaning both "things counted" and "prayers." The preacher successively named the subjects of their devotion. After the Reformation the practice continued, but the subjects were changed. The text of the bidding-prayer mentioned above is given in full in PROCTER: A History of the Book of Common Prayer, 11th ed., London, 1874, p. 172.

BIDDLE, John, b. in 1615 at Wotton-under-Edge, Gloucestershire; d. in a London jail, Sept. 22, 1662; was educated at Oxford, and appointed master of the free school of Gloucester in 1641. Suspected of heresy, he was called before the Parliament, and committed to custody, December, 1643, in which he remained for five years, while the assembly of divines at Westminster discussed his views. The book which he published in defence of himself, Twelve Arguments, etc. (1647), was burnt by the hangman; and the two tracts, Confession of Faith and Testimonies, etc. (1648), were suppressed by the government. The Act of Oblivion (1654) gave him full freedom once more; and his adherents, called Biddelians, or Socinians, or Unitarians, began to form a congregation. But his translation of the Life of Socinus, and various Socinian books, again exasperated his adversaries. He was put on trial a second time (1655), and only rescued from death by Cromwell's sending him away in banishment to the Scilly Islands. After the lapse of three years he was quietly released; but after the Restoration he was again imprisoned, and fined, and died in the jail. He was one of the founders of Unitarianism, and a man of learning, blameless life, and great piety. See TOULMIN: Life and Character of Biddle, London, 1789.

BIEL, Gabriel, b. at Speyer; d. at Tübingen, 1495; studied at Heidelberg; preached in the Church of St. Marten in Mayence; Provost of Urach in Württemberg; and since 1484 professor of theology and philosophy in the newly founded University of Tübingen. He is often styled the "last of the schoolmen;" and he is, indeed, one of the last noticeable representatives of the ecclesiastical science of the middle ages. He was a nominalist; denied the infallibility of the Pope, defined the absolution as declaratory and not judicial, and occupied generally the same ground as the Councils of Constance and Basel. He wrote Epitome et Collectorium ex Occamo, Tübingen, 1495; Expositio Canonis, Basel, 1499; a number of sermons, etc. See G. PLITT: Gabriel Biel als Prediger, Erlangen, 1879.

BILLICAN, Theobald (Diepold Gerlach), b. at Billigheim, in the Palatinate, towards the end of the fifteenth century; d. at Marburg, Aug. 8, 1544; studied theology at Heidelberg, and began to lecture there, but was so deeply impressed by Luther that he aroused suspicion, and in 1522 he left, and accepted an appointment as preacher at Nördlingen. Here he opened a way for the Reformation; but, while the congregation gradually became thoroughly Protestant, it seems as if its pastor gradually sank back into Romanism. In the controversy about the Lord's Supper he first held with Zwingli, Von der Mess, 1524; then drew nearer to Luther, Renovatio Ecclesie, 1525, and Epistola de verbis Cænæ; and finally, in 1528, made a completely Roman-Catholic confession before the faculty of Heidelberg. He never left the Roman Church; and in the years between 1528 and 1536 it appears that Dr. Eck exercised considerable influence on him. But, on the other hand, he never came to rest in the Roman Church, and in this indecision his life was wasted. In 1535 he left Nördlingen, and lectured, first at Heidelberg, and then at Marburg, on law and rhetoric. There is no biography of him. See CHR. MAYER: Die Stadt Nördlingen, 1877, pp. 217-245. BERNHARD RIGGENBACH.

BILNEY, Thomas, b. in Norfolk, Eng., 1500; was educated at Cambridge; embraced the Reformation, and preached with great success, but was arrested Nov. 25, 1527, and persuaded to recant Dec. 7, 1529. He soon repented the recantation; and in 1531 he again began to preach, but was immediately arrested; and, as he absolutely refused to recant a second time, he was condemned for heresy, and burnt at Norwich, Aug. 19, 1531.

BILSON, Thomas, b. at Winchester, 1536; d. there June 18, 1616; was educated at Oxford; and became Bishop of Worcester in 1596, and of Winchester in 1597. He was in the Hampton Court Conference (1604), at which the new translation of the Bible was proposed. He wrote True Difference between Christian Subjection and unchristian Rebellion, 1585; Perpetual Government of Christ his Church, 1593, new ed., Oxford, 1842; Survey of the Sufferings of Christ for the Redemption of Man, 1604.

BINGHAM, Joseph, b. in 1668 at Wakefield, Yorkshire; d. Aug. 17, 1723, at Havant, near Portsmouth; studied at Oxford, and became a fellow of University College, but left on account of a disagreeable sensation he made by a sermon on the Trinity, and was appointed rector, first of Headbourn-Worthy, near Winchester, and then, in 1712, at Havant. His great archaeological work, Origines Ecclesiasticæ, or the Antiquities of the Christian Church, which has not yet been superseded by any of its successors, first appeared in English, London, 1708-22, in 8 vols., and was afterwards often reprinted: best edition is that by Pitman, revised by Rev. Richard Bingham, great-great-grandson of the author, Oxford, 1855, 10 vols., giving the quotations in full, a life of the author, and other of his works. A cheap edition for the use of students was published in London in 2 vols., 1852. By J. H. Grischow (Grischovius) the work was translated into Latin, and published in Halle, 1724-38, in 10 vols. A German translation, made in the interest of the Roman Church, was published at Augsburg, 1788-96, in 4 vols.

BINNEY, Thomas, one of the leading nonconformist ministers of England; b. at Newcastle-on-Tyne, April, 1798; d. at Clapton, Feb. 24, 1874. He spent seven years in a bookseller's employ in his native town, where he first attracted attention by a poem published in one of the local papers. He first received private and academic training in the north of England, and then entered the theological college at Wymondley, Herts. After a brief ministry at Bedford, he was settled, in 1824, over the Congregational Church called St. James's Chapel, Newport, in the Isle of Wight. Here he wrote his well-known hymn, "Eternal Light! Eternal Light!" and published the Life of Stephen Morell, and a volume entitled The Practical Power of Faith, London (n.d.), being an exposition of a portion of the eleventh chapter of the Epistle to the Hebrews. In 1829 he was called to the King's Weigh-House Chapel in Eastcheap, an independent church, which dated back to 1662, the period of the ejection of the nonconformists. In 1833 the foundation of the new chapel on Fish-street hill was laid by Mr. Binney; and the address delivered by him upon that occasion led to a bitter and prolonged controversy with State churchmen, in the course of which he published the once famous pamphlets, "What and Who Says it?" "Strike, but Hear," "Two Letters by Fiat Justitia." For a long while Mr. Binney was erroneously thought by members of the Establishment to be a dissenter of peculiarly narrow and bigoted views; but before his death he not only gained the foremost position among the nonconformists, but obtained for his broad and catholic spirit an affectionate and appreciative regard from many of the most distinguished dignitaries of the Church of England. His preaching rapidly secured a wide popularity, which continued during his long ministry. He chiefly attracted young men and the business men of the city of London. He was also closely connected with the most important philanthropic and religious movements of his time, especially in connection with missionary labors in the colonies, of the society for which he was one of the founders. He visited America in 1845 (when he received the degree of D.D.), and Australia in 1857-59. The degree of LL.D. was also conferred upon him by the University of Aberdeen. He published many of his sermons and lectures. His best-known works are The Service of Song in the House of the Lord, which exercised a great influence in the development of a richer and more musical service in nonconformist churches; Dissent not Schism; The Christian Ministry not a Priesthood; The Life of Sir Thomas Powell Buxton; Lights and Shadows of Church Life in Australia; From Seventeen to Thirty, a book for young men; St. Paul, His Life and Ministry; Money, a Popular Exposition (n.d.); Micah, the Bread Maker (1867); First Series of Sermons (1869); his most widely sold work is, Is it possible to make the best of both worlds? He retired from the pastorate in 1869, and occupied the chair of homiletic and pastoral theology at New College, London, until his death. Mr. Binney's magnificent presence, vigorous intellect, ardent affections, direct style, and highly effective manner, combined with large-hearted sympathies, sufficiently explain the wide and long-continued influence which he exerted upon his generation. See A Memorial of the late Rev. Thomas Binney, LL.D., edited by the Rev. JOHN STROUGHTON, D.D., London, 1874; Second Series of his Sermons, edited with sketch by Rev. Dr. ALLEN, London, 1875; Pulpit Memorials by EDWARD WHITE.

LLEWELYN D. BEVAN.

BIRCH, Thomas, b. in London, Nov. 23, 1705; d. there Jan. 9, 1766; was ordained priest in 1731, though he had enjoyed no university education; and became Vicar of Ulting, Essex, in 1734, rector of St. Margaret's, London, in 1746, and rector of Depden, Essex, 1761. He developed a very great literary activity, especially historical and biographical; edited the General Dictionary, Historical and Critical, 10 vols. fol., 1734-41; Thurloe's State Papers, 7 vols., 1742, etc.; wrote biographies of Tillotson, Boyle, etc.; and was one of the secretaries of the Royal Society since 1752.

BIRGITTA (Brigitta, Bridget), St., b. at Finstad in Upland, Sweden, in 1302 or 1303; d. in Rome, July 23, 1373; was, both on her father's and mother's side, related to the royal family of Sweden, and was very early married to Ulf Gudmarsson, a wealthy nobleman in a high social position, to whom she bore eight children. She was of a poetical and enthusiastic nature. In the home she grew up among very strong religious impressions. Her husband was a pious man; and twice the couple made pilgrimages together, to St. Olaf in Throuhjem, Norway, and to St. Jacob in Compostella, Spain. Nevertheless, in spite of the exalted state of her mind, producing visions in which she believed as in divine revelations, both as a housewife and in her office at the court she distinguished herself by the noble common sense of her judgment and the calm repose of her will. After the death of her husband (1344) she retired into a monastery, devoting herself to ascetic practices and religious studies; but from her cell she continued to exercise a great influence, considered by many as a true prophetess, by others as a witch. It was her wish to found an order; and this idea fell in with the plan of the King to build a monastery at Wadstena, on the border of Lake Wettern. In 1349 she went to Rome to obtain the Pope's confirmation of a set of rules, Regule Sancti Salvatoris, which she declared that the Lord had revealed to her. In Rome she lived as she had lived in Sweden; her authority increasing, like her fame, year by year. She addressed the kings and princes on the most important affairs, and she was listened to. The clergy, even the popes at Avignon, whom she was not sparing in denouncing, treated her with the greatest regard. In 1367 Urban V. confirmed the rules; and in 1370 the order of the Birgittines, or Brigittines, was established. In the same year Birgitta made a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, and shortly after her return to Rome she died. Her remains were brought back to Sweden, and deposited at Wadstena. By Boniface IX. she was canonized Oct. 7, 1391, and the bull was confirmed by John XXIII. (1409) and by Martin V. (1415). Under her name there exists a work, Revelationes, originally written in Swedish, but translated into Latin under her own superintendence. The work has often been printed in Rome; but the best edition is that of Lübeck, 1492.

LIT.—FRED. HAMMERICH: Die heilige Birgitta, Copenhagen, 1863. AL. MICHELSEN.

BIRGITTINES, or BRIGITTINES, The Order of the, was founded on the rules of St. Birgitta in 1370, and comprised both monks and nuns, living together in the same monastery, though in absolute separation. The monastery of Wadstena, on the border of Lake Wettern, Sweden, the first establishment of the order, was designed to hold sixty nuns and seventeen monks, besides a number of lay sisters and brethren. According to the rules, the hours of the day were divided between manual labor, studies, especially translation of good books into Swedish, and devotional exercises. The rules of silence were very severe, but the rules of fasting were mild. From Wadstena the order spread to all European countries: at one time it numbered seventy-four establishments. But in the fifteenth century it fell into decay, and with the Reformation it almost disappeared.

BISHOP. 1. IN THE BIBLE AND THE FATHERS. As usually employed, bishop is the designation of the spiritual head of a diocese (speculator, superintendens); but in the Septuagint ἐπίσκοπος, of which "bishop" is the translation, is used of public officers civil and religious (cf. Num. iv. 16, xxxi. 14), and in the latter sense in the Greek New Testament and later ecclesiastical writers

(cf. Acts i. 20; Ps. cix. 8). In the same way the Bible writers employ πρεσβύτερος, "elder" (Num. xi. 16; Jer. xix. 1; Matt. xxviii. 11, 12; Mark viii. 31, etc.). No distinction is made between the words, for they both have the same meaning (cf. Acts xx. 17, 28; Tit. i. 5 sq.): a "presbuteros" occupied precisely the same position as an "episcopus" (Phil. i. 1; 1 Tim. iii. 1-8); hence the apostles John and Peter call themselves "presbuteroi," and "sumpresbuteroi" (2 John 1; 3 John 1; 1 Pet. v. 1). The identity of the two offices comes out in the First Epistle of Clement to the Corinthians, in which he uses the two words indiscriminately. In chapter forty-two he exhorts the Corinthians to submit themselves to the presbyters (υποτάγητε τοῖς πρεσβυτέροις), for the apostles had made their earliest converts bishops and deacons (εἰς ἐπισκόπους καὶ διακόνους καθέστανον); in one section he calls the same persons "presbyters" and "bishops." In chapter forty-four he says it would be a sin to depose from the episcopate (τὴν δόξα τῆς ἐπισκοπῆς) those who have done well, and in the next sentence eulogizes faithful presbyters (πρεσβύτεροι). In chapter forty-seven he speaks of the dignity of presbytership. No demonstration could be plainer. Other titles for the holders of the office of oversight in the church were, in apostolic days, προεστῶτες or προιστάμενοι (those standing before, representatives, 1 Thess. v. 12; 1 Tim. v. 17; Rom. xii. 8), ἡγούμενοι (leaders, Heb. xiii. 7, 17, 24; Clemens, First Epistle to the Corinthians i. 21), and ποιμένες (shepherds, Eph. iv. 11; Acts xx. 28; 1 Pet. v. 1, etc.). It is indubitable that very early a distinction was made between presbyter and bishop, but it is by no means clear when or how this change came in. [The Epistles of Ignatius are full of Episcopacy as the embodiment of Christ's presence in the Church.] Roman-Catholic writers are bound by the decision of the Council of Trent (Sess. XXIII. cap. IV., et can. VII. de sacramento ordinis: "Bishops, being the successors of the apostles, are placed by the Holy Spirit to govern the Church of God, and to be superior to their presbyters [priests];" "If any one affirms that bishops are not superior to presbyters [priests], let him be anathema"), and accordingly have endeavored to explain away the evident identity. Anglican writers of the High-Church school approach the Roman idea. See literature in HASE: Kirchengeschichte; ROTHE: Die Anfänge der christlichen Kirche u. ihrer Verfassung, Wittenberg, 1837; BAUR: Ueber den Ursprung des Episcopats in der christlichen Kirche, Tübingen, 1838; BUNSEN: Ignatius von Antiochien u. seine Zeit, Hamburg, 1847; RITSCHL: Die Entstehung der altkatholischen Kirche, Bonn, 1850, 2d ed., 1857.

The Roman-Catholic view is, that the distinction between the offices is primitive, although at first the names were not so sharply defined: the apostles had a general episcopal supervision of the congregations, while the elders whom they had ordained had the local oversight. But, as the number of the congregations greatly increased, the apostles could no longer pretend to supervise districts, so they ordained certain chosen assistants, whom they at the same time named their successors, to be overseers of each large gathering of Christians, as that in a city and neighborhood. Such pre-eminently were the angels of the seven churches mentioned in the Apocalypse (i. 20, ii. 1 sqq.). But the New Testament has not a word to say about any apostolic appointment of successors with full powers; nor does it contain a trace of any distinction between the office of bishop and elder; nor is the interpretation given above supported or supportable: but, on the contrary, after the canon closed, the episcopoi and the presbyteroi remained identical. Clemens Romanus (d. 100) is not the only witness to this state of things. The "Pastor of Hermas" (Vis. 3, 5, circa 140), and the Epistle of Polycarp (d. circa 164) to the Philippians, indicate the same. [The "Pastor" is not decisive. The passage quoted reads, "Hear now about the stones which are in the building . . . they are the apostles (ἀπόστολοι) and bishops (ἐπίσκοποι) and doctors (διδάσκαλοι, teaching elders) and ministers (διάκονοι, deacons): these walked in the grace of God, and oversaw, and taught and ministered holly and humbly to the Church." Hefele, Patrum Apostolicorum Opera, p. 334, appends the note: "These are distinct hierarchical orders," and that seems to be the only inference. Nor can Polycarp in his Epistle, c. V., be emphatically quoted; for although it is true that he exhorts the young men to be "subject to the presbyters and deacons as unto God and Christ," and omits mention of bishops, yet from his silence little can be made.] The first distinct separation we find in Ignatius of Antioch (d. 107 or 116), whose epistles, however, are, just in these ecclesiastical matters, strongly interpolated. [The shorter Greek recension is considered genuine by the best critics.] On the other hand, Irenæus (d. 202), Adv. Hæc. III. 2. 3, unmistakably recognizes the original identity of the two offices. Particularly noticeable are the expressions of Ambrosiaster (Hilary the deacon, about 380), in commenting on 1 Tim. iii. 10, Eph. iv. 11; and Jerome (d. 420), Epist. c. I., ad Evangelium; of Gratian's decree, c. 24, dist. XCIII., comm. ad Tit. i. 7, and Decree c. 5, dist. XCV. ("The apostle clearly teaches that presbyters are the same persons as bishops: moreover, as to the fact that one was afterwards elected to be placed over the rest, this was done as a remedy for schism, lest any one, by attracting to himself adherents, should break the unity of the Church of Christ." "A presbyter is the same person as a bishop. And before party-passions arose in religion, from the instigation of the devil, the churches were governed by a board of presbyters. But when some began to think that those whom they had baptized belonged to them, and not to Christ, it was decreed in the whole world that one of the presbyters elected to the office should be placed over the rest. . . . Therefore as the presbyters know that they are subject to him who may have been placed over them from ecclesiastical usage, so let the bishops know that they are higher in rank than the presbyters, more from usage than from a principle of the Lord's appointment, and that they ought to rule the Church in common.") The defenders of de jure divino episcopacy claim for this early period the later distinction of ordo and jurisdictio. So Denzinger, Kritik d. Vorl. d. Prof. Thiersch über Katholizismus u. Protestantismus, Würzburg, 1847; and Hergenröther, De Catholicæ Ecclesiæ primordiis recentiorum Protes- tantium Systemata expendantur, Ratisbonæ, 1851. The non-episcopal writers of the Evangelical Church (e.g., Ziegler, Geschichte der kirchlichen Verfassungsformen, Leipzig, 1798, p. 7 sq.; Neander, Church History, vol. i. pp. 190-200) assume that the college of presbyters must necessarily have had a director, a primus inter pares, who alone bore the previously common name of "bishops" when his office was made permanent. At first the position would be given to the oldest, then to the ablest, who was specially ordained thereto. Substantially the same explanation is given by those writers who emphasize the divided condition of the Christian communities, particularly in large cities where the Christians formed several congregations (ἐκκλησίαι κατ' οἴκους), and maintain that union would be naturally promoted by electing one of the presbyters to the headship. Rothe started the unprovable theory, that the episcopacy was of apostolic origin, the result of the deliberations of the survivors some time after A.D. 70, and therefore part of the original constitution of the Church, but a merely human and temporary design. Bunsen gave to episcopacy a Johannine origin,—a date after the death of Paul (about 70), and a gradual spread. See his Hippolytus and his Age, London, 1852; Christianity and Mankind, London, 1852. [So Rothe (Anfänge der christl. Kirche) and Thiersch (Gesch. des apost. Zeitalters).]

[The Church of England tolerates several opposing views of the origin of the episcopate, which will be found stated under EPISCOPACY. The High-Anglican or Anglo-Catholic view is correctly given by the late Rev. Arthur West Haddan, in Smith and Cheetham's Dictionary of Christian Antiquities, vol. 1, art. "Bishop:" "Bishop, first an appellative, and then an interchangeable, title of the πρεσβύτεροι (presbyters), who ministered to the several churches under the apostles; but from the earliest years of the second century, and from St. Ignatius onwards, the distinctive name, adopted as such in every language used by Christians, Eastern as well as Western, of the single president of a diocese, who came in the room of the apostles, having presbyters, deacons, and laity under him, and possessing exclusive power of ordination, and primarily of confirmation, with primary authority in the administration of the sacraments and of discipline." Mr. Haddan enumerates fully the titles by which the "bishops" have been called, grants that some of them were applied also to presbyters, but finds the actual institution implied and recorded in the New Testament: 1. In the position of James in Jerusalem (Acts xii. 7, xv. 13, xxi. 18; Gal. ii. 9), "affirmed also by all antiquity to have been bishop of Jerusalem;" 2. In Paul's appointment of Timothy at Ephesus, and Titus in Crete, to be "bishops," i.e., to ordain (1 Tim. iii. 13; Tit. i. 5) and rule both in church worship (1 Tim. ii. 1-12) and over all church-members, including presbyters (1 Tim. v. 1-22; Tit. i. 5, ii.), and probably to confirm (1 Tim. v. 22) in the apostle's stead (1 Tim. i. 3; Tit. i. 5); 3. In the angels of the churches, who were real individual persons (see Angel of the Church sub voce ANGEL). He further finds confirmation to the hypothesis in Clemens Romanus, ad. Cor. i. 44 (already quoted on the other side), in St. Jerome's Catal. Scripti. Eccl. ix. ("Last of all John, at the request of the bishops of Asia, wrote his Gospel"), and other Fathers; in the fact that "bishops in the later sense are actually found in every church whatsoever from the moment that any evidence exists at all, and that such evidence exists, either simply to an actual bishop at the time, or more commonly to such a bishop as in succession to a line of predecessors traced up to apostles, and with no intimation of such episcopate being any thing else but the original, appointed, and unbroken order." The establishment of the episcopate cannot be attributed to a general movement: some churches early, others later, put their government in a board of elders (presbyters); it depended upon how soon they fell into the line of development from separate congregations to the one Church. That out of the elders one would be chosen to preside, was natural, and is proven by the Fathers to have taken place before the middle of the second century. Hence in the largest communions, as in Jerusalem, Antioch, Rome, the institution would first be established. In Asia Minor and Syria the general name "episcopus" was applied in these early times to this representative. Very early, to some of these episcopi were assigned the appointment and ordination of the new elders: but there seems to have been no rule about it; e.g., in Egypt, up to the first quarter of the third century, the presbyteries ordained without episcopal supervision. But with the development of the Church in doctrine and constitution, the separation of presbyter and bishop was established. The process was hastened by the opposition of Gnosticism and other heresies: the bishops became the centres of authority, the representatives of apostolic teaching. By the fourth century the present order was firmly settled. The bishops themselves were originally elected by the neighboring bishops, and the clergy and laity of the diocese, but later on by the chapter of the cathedral, with the assent of the sovereign. [See the arts. "Bishop" and "Priest," in Smith and Cheetham: Dict. Christ. Antiq., and the books therein mentioned. Also the important works, G. A. 2. IN THE ROMAN-CATHOLIC CHURCH. The bishop must be of legitimate birth, thirty years old, recognized for learning and morality. The choice is nominally made by the Pope, through the curia, although practically through the chapter (electio canonica); or, when the person is to be transferred from one bishopric to another, through their postulation, or by the nomination of the temporal ruler. Then follow the papal examination through the papal legate; if favorable, a second (formal) examination by the college of cardinals upon the receipt of the report; the investiture with full rights; the consecration, within three months, by a bishop commissioned by the Pope, and two other bishops or prelates, in the cathedral of the new bishop. The candidate takes the old oath of allegiance to the Pope (essentially that prescribed by Hildebrand), subscribes the professio fidei, is anointed, solemnly enthroned, and dismisses the congregation with his blessing. Consecration precedes the oath of civil allegiance. The episcopal rights and powers are derived partly from his consecration, partly from his jurisdiction, partly from his dignity. 1. Jura ordinis. He shares all the rights of the presbyters, but, besides, has as jura reservata, propria, pontificalia (1) ordination, (2) confirmation, (3) chrism, (4) consecration of res sacrae, (5) benediction of abbots and abbesses, (6) anointing of kings. 2. Jura jurisdictionis. In the broad sense these embrace the entire ecclesiastical authority of the bishop: in the narrow, the lex jurisdictionis (as the oversight, rule, and executive power) is distinguished from the lex diacesana, the right to the various church-taxes. As the bishop exercises all these rights jure proprio, he is called "judex ordinarius;" but many others has he in consequence of papal bestowment. See FACULTIES. 3. Jura status et dignitatis. The bishop takes precedence of all the clergy, directly after the cardinals of the Roman Curia, and is addressed, as they are, "Reverendissimus," "sanctissimus," "beatissimus," "right reverend," "your episcopal Grace." His temporal rank is settled by special enactment, with his particular insignia and robes. To these rights correspond duties; in chief, the cure of souls, and oversight of the diocese. Each bishop, by his consecration oath, is bound at regular intervals to give a personal report in Rome of his diocese, which report must be repeated in writing. — Assistants of the bishops. Such are the archdeacons, archpresbyters, chapters, consistories, generalvicars, etc. (See separate titles.) Cf. THOMAS-SIN: Vetus ac nova ecclesiae disciplina, P. I. lib. I. c. 1. 2. 50-60; BARBOSA: De officio et potestate episcopi, Lugdun. 1698; JOH. HELFERT: Von den Rechten u. Pflichten der Bischöfe u. Pfarrer, dann deren beiderseitigen Gehilfen u. Stellvertreter, Prag., 1832. For later literature, HINSCHIUS: Kirchenrecht.

3. IN THE CHURCHES OF THE REFORMATION. The churches of the Reformation have no bishops in the Roman sense, although the question at that time was rather the reform of the office than its abolition. The Lutheran Church in Germany is not governed by bishops, although the general superintendents are sometimes so called, but by consistories. In some parts of Germany the title "bishop" is given to a civil officer. [In Sweden and Denmark the episcopal office was retained, but without the jure divino theory. The Church of England admits different theories of the origin and authority of the episcopate and episcopal succession. The Methodist and Moravian episcopate is merely a matter of convenience, and has a missionary character.]

4. ARCHBISHOP (Archiepiscopus, Metropolitanus) is the spiritual chief of a church province (archbishopric, metropolitan diocese). The office followed naturally from the bishopric; and the dependence of the city bishops, who exercised authority over the adjacent country congregations, upon the metropolitans (see titles), was recognized by the Council of Nicea, 325. Among the metropolitans, again, some were pre-eminent, and were called archiepiskopos, and, after 450, patriarches; but subsequently every bishop having metropolitans under him was called an archbishop.

The office is one of varying power: much depends upon the under-bishops, who are styled suffragans. The archbishop calls synods, presides at them, and publishes their acts. In addition to his own diocese, he visits those of his bishops, and requires reports from them. He receives the pallium directly from the Pope. The archiepiscopal dignity is retained with similar powers in the Episcopal Church of Great Britain, but not in the United States. MEJER (JACOBSON).

BISHOPRIC, the jurisdiction of a bishop. It was formed out of the congregations which clustered around the parent church in those early days of a growing yet persecuted Christianity. Each congregation was a parish: the associated parishes formed the bishopric. These terms are still in use in the Oriental Church. In the Occidental Church, in the ninth century, the term diacesis was applied to bishopric, and parochia to the individual churches. In Frankish Gaul the diocese often corresponded with the pagus major; and the phrases terminus, territorium civitatis, pagus, were used of the bishop's jurisdiction. The bishops resided in the larger cities, as was ordered. In Germany the dioceses, comprising several provinces, were larger than those in Gaul, which took in only one. The setting up and alteration of bishoprics have been, since the fourth century, the affair of the metropolitans and the provincial synods. Every year the Annuario Pontifico contains an official review of the bishoprics of the Romish Church.

BISHOPS' BOOK, THE, or The Institution of a Christian Man, contains an exposition of the Apostles' Creed, the Seven Sacraments, the Ten Commandments, the Lord's Prayer, and the Doctrine of Justification, and was compiled in 1537 by a commission of ministers and bishops of the Church of England.

BISHOP, Nathan, an eminent Christian philanthropist, b. Aug. 12, 1808, at Vernon, Oneida County, N. Y.; d. at Saratoga, Aug. 7, 1880. His parents were New-England people, who moved from Connecticut to Central New York when that was called the "Far West." His father, Elnathan Bishop, was a farmer; a justice of the peace, and at one time represented his neighborhood in the New-York Legislature. His mother was a woman of rare excellence, of a strong mind, and great executive ability. The family was large. His home was the abode of piety, intelligence, and industry. He was an ambitious boy, caring little for amusements, and choosing to give all his spare time to study.

At eighteen years of age he entered the academy at Hamilton, Madison County, N. Y. During his course there, and subsequently in Brown University, Providence, R. I., he supported himself. He was graduated at twenty-nine years of age (in 1837), so mature a scholar that he was immediately elected a tutor in the university. At the close of his first year in this position, he was chosen superintendent of public schools in Providence. "Previous to this," says Dr. H. L. Wayland, "the common schools were of very low order, and it is due very largely to the labors of Mr. Bishop that the schools of that city now rank with the first of the country." In this position he spent thirteen years. Mr. Bishop was elected a trustee of Brown University in 1842, and in 1854 a member of the Board of Fellows. His marked success in the Providence schools led to his being called to the position of superintendent of public schools in Boston in 1851. In this office he spent six years with signal success: during these years he aided largely in planning several of those model schoolhouses for which Boston is celebrated.

While in Boston he received from Harvard the degree of LL.D. When nearly fifty years of age, Mr. Bishop removed to New-York City; soon after he became a member of the Sabbath Committee, and an active manager of the American Bible Society. He identified himself with the work of the church and sabbath school, teaching a large Bible-class of young men. He took great interest in the work of city missions. When the war of the Rebellion burst upon the country, there came a cry from the army for help, religious consolation, nursing and comforts for the sick; and the Christian Commission was formed. Mr. Bishop gladly gave to the work of the New-York Branch his whole time and energy till the close of the war. He was appointed by President Grant one of the ten Indian commissioners; and it was in pursuance of the work of visiting the wild tribes in 1869 that he contracted the malarial disease which eleven years afterwards caused his death. He was for several years a member of the State Board of Charities, a member and a delegate of the Evangelical Alliance to the Czar of Russia in behalf of religious liberty in the Baltic Provinces, a member of the advisory boards of the New-York Orphan Asylum, the Ladies' Christian Union, and the Baptist Home for the Aged. He was one of the original board of trustees of Vassar College, and for the first seven years chairman of the executive committee. He was an earnest worker for foreign and home missions, and served the American Baptist Home-Mission Society as its secretary for two years gratuitously during a time of financial depression.

He delighted to give and work for the education and elevation of the ignorant and degraded. The eight schools established in the Southern States by the American Baptist Home-Mission Society, for the education of preachers and teachers among the freedmen, elicited his warmest sympathy. To them he gave the benefit of his long experience in the management of schools, and building of schoolhouses. He was chairman of the finance committee of the American Bible Revision Committee till his death, and contributed largely to its expenses. He was a man of catholic spirit, of large benevolence, calm judgment, a wise adviser, a consistent Christian, in active sympathy with every good cause. P. SCHAFF.

BITHYNIA, a north-west province of Asia Minor, conquered by the Romans B.C. 75. After different administrative changes, Augustus raised it into a proconsularship B.C. 27. Trajan combined it with Pontus under the younger Pliny A.D. 103-105. Under the Byzantine emperors it was again divided. Nicomedia and Nicæa were its chief cities. It is mountainous, thickly wooded, and fertile. Paul was not suffered to enter it (Acts xvi. 7); but 1 Pet. i. 1 testifies to the presence of Christians there in Paul's day, and Pliny was embarrassed by their number.

BLACKFRIARS, a name given to the monks of the Dominican orders on account of the color of their garment.

BLAIR, Hugh, b. at Edinburgh, April 7, 1718; d. there Dec. 27, 1800; studied theology in the university of his native city, and was appointed minister of Collesie, in Fifeshire, in 1742, and of the High Church of Edinburgh in 1758. The first volume of his Sermons was published in 1777: four others followed. The moral bearing of these sermons, happily contrasting with the metaphysical tone of the preaching of that time, procured for them a great success (they were translated into German, French, Slavonian, etc.); but in true evangelical spirit our time finds them wanting. As professor of rhetoric at the university, which position he held from 1762 to 1783, he published lectures on Rhetoric and Belles-Lettres, 1783, 3 vols., of which lectures, twenty-nine treat of the eloquence of the pulpit. HERZOG.

BLAIR, James, b. in Scotland about 1660; d. at Williamsburg, Va., Aug. 1, 1743; came to Virginia as a missionary in 1685; was appointed commissary in 1689; founded the William and Mary College in 1693, and was its first president. From 1711 to his death he was rector of Williamsburg. In 1742 he published Sermons and Discourses, 4 vols.

BLAIR, Robert, b. at Edinburgh, 1699; appointed minister of Athelstaneford, Jan. 5, 1731, and d. there Feb. 4, 1746. He is known as the author of The Grave, a solemn religious poem, published 1743, beautifully and strikingly illustrated by William Blake, 1808, and still read. The poem is very melancholy, defective in rhythm, yet vigorous and interesting.

BLAIR, Samuel, b. in Ireland, June 14, 1712; d. at Londonderry, Penn., July 5, 1751; came early to America; was educated at Tennent's Academy at Neshaminy, and was ordained pastor in Shrewsbury, N.J., 1734; removed to Pennsylvania in 1740, and established a theological seminary at Fogg's Manor, Chester County. In 1744 he published A Narrative of a Revival of Religion in Several Parts of Pennsylvania. A volume of his writings was published in Philadelphia in 1754.

BLANDRATA, Georg, b. at Saluzzo, 1515; studied medicine, and lived for several years in Poland and Transylvania, as body-physician to the queen of Sigismund I. and the widow of John Zapolya, but returned afterwards to Italy, and practised at Pavia. The influence, however, of the Reformation had reached him, and some incautious utterances made him suspected by the Jesuits. He fled, and settled in Geneva. There his anti-Roman tendencies rapidly developed, but also his anti-trinitarian ideas. Calvin's Responsum ad Questiones G. Blandratae (1559) did not satisfy him; and Calvin turned against him with great bitterness. He went to Poland, and lived at the court of Prince Radziwil; but Calvin pursued him thither, and in 1563 he went to Transylvania, where he enjoyed great honors under John Sigismund and Stephen Bathori. In 1566 he defended his anti-trinitarian views against the Reformed theologians in a great disputation, in the presence of the court, and came out victorious. The latter part of his life is very obscure. He died after 1585, killed, it is said, by his own nephew. See MALACARNE: Commentario delle Opere di G. B., Padua, 1814. C. SCHMIDT.

BLASPHEMY, technically the speaking evil of God; but etymologically it may mean any species of calumny and detraction. The Mosaic law punished with death by stoning any one, Israelite or stranger, who took the sacred name in vain (Lev. xxiv. 16); but those who spoke against foreign divinities were not punished (verse 15; Exod. xxii. 28). The Jews fell into two peculiar and absurd errors of interpretation of the law upon this subject. From Exod. xxiii. 13, "Make no mention of the name of other gods, neither let it be heard out of thy mouth," they supposed they were bound to nickname the heathen gods: hence their use of "Bosheth" for Baal, "Beth-aven" for Bethel, "Beelzebub" for Beelzebub. From Lev. xxiv. 16 they deduced the notion that the mere utterance of the word "Jehovah" was prohibited: so the true pronunciation has been lost. The Jews of the New Testament regarded as blasphemy the attribution to man of any divine quality (Matt. ix. 3, xxvi. 65; John x. 36). The Christian writers consider as blasphemy the refusal to honor Christ (Matt. xxvii. 39; Mark xv. 29; Acts xviii. 6, xxvi. 11) or God (Rom. ii. 24).

The blasphemy against the Holy Ghost (Matt. xii. 31; Mark iii. 29; Luke xii. 10) is the unpardonable sin. It implies a state of final and hopeless impenitence, and is committed by those who have again and again wilfully resisted the influences and warnings of the Holy Ghost, and have made themselves incapable of repentance, and consequently of pardon.

The Ancient Church called those blasphematici who fell away during persecution, those who taught heresies, those who, in the heat of passion, spoke irreverently of God and Christ: indeed, at last the term was applied to those who spoke against the Virgin Mary. In the Middle Ages the punishment was severe. The guilty one must stand for seven consecutive Sundays at the porch of the church, without cloak or shoes, fasting, and might besides be fined and imprisoned. Sometimes the tongues of blasphemers were cut out, or pierced by hot irons. Sometimes the punishment was death. In modern times the penalty has been very much lighter. In the interests of morality and religion, it were surely desirable if all those who take God's name impiously upon their lips were made to feel the heavy hand of the State.

BLASTARES, Matthäus, a monk of the order of St. Basil, wrote in 1335 a compilation of civil and ecclesiastical laws: Syntagma Alfabeticum Rerum Omnium quæ in Sacris Canonibus Comprehenduntur, based on Justinian and Photius, and in the form of a juridical dictionary. The work, which was much used by the clergy of the Eastern Church, is found in BEVEREGIUS: Synodicon, T. II. P. II.
