BLAURER (or Blarer, Blaarer), Ambrosius, b. at Constance, April 12, 1492; d. at Winterthur, Dec. 6, 1564; studied theology in Tübingen together with Melancthon; entered in 1515 the Benedictine Monastery of Alpirsbach, and was afterwards chosen its abbot; but, having embraced the Reformation, he left the monastery in 1521, began to preach the new doctrines in Constance in 1525, and married in 1533. From 1534 to 1538 he was active in introducing the Reformation in Württemberg, after which he again retired to Constance; but when, in 1548, the Interim was introduced in that city, he left for Winterthur. His stand-point was one between Luther and Zwingli. His character was mild and conciliatory. The works he left are mostly pamphlets and letters, both in Latin and German. His life has been written by THEODOR KEIM, Stuttgart, 1860, and by THEODOR PRESSEL, Stuttgart, 1861.

BLAYNEY, Benjamin, d. at Polshot, Wiltshire, Eng., Sept. 20, 1801; studied at Oxford; became professor of Hebrew in 1787, afterwards canon of Christ Church, and rector of Polshot, and published A Dissertation on Daniel's Seventy Weeks; The Sign-given to Ahaz, new translations of Jeremiah and Lamentations, and Zechariah. He edited the Oxford Bible, 1769; greatly improved the text by applying with more consistency the principle of denoting additions to the original text by Italics, and by substituting for obsolete words those in common use; he added seventy-six marginal references, and sixty-six annotations; but unhappily the misprints of his edition were many.

BLEEK, Friedrich, b. at Ahrensböök, Holstein, July 4, 1793; d. at Bonn, Feb. 27, 1859; studied theology at Kiel and Berlin; began to lecture on biblical exegesis in the latter place in 1818, and was appointed professor there in 1823, and at Bonn in 1829. His principal works are his Brief an die Hebräer, published in three parts (1828, 1836, and 1840), and his Beiträge zur Evangelien-Kritik, Berlin, 1846, containing the ablest and most decisive defence of the genuineness of the Gospel of John. After his death his lectures were published, among which are, Introduction to the Old Testament, edited by I. Bleek and Ad. Kamphausen, Berlin, 1860, and translated into English by Venables; and Introduction to the New Testament, edited by I. Bleek, Berlin, 1862, and translated into English by Urwick. [The fourth German edition of the former appeared in Berlin, 1878, edited by J. Wellhausen, and the third of the latter in 1875, edited by W. Mangold. In each case the editors have taken unwarrantable liberties with the text, making Bleek the advocate of the editors' "advanced" views.] His stand-point as a biblical critic is, at least with respect to the New Testament, very conservative; but his method is severe, and his impartiality impregnable. With an immense erudition he connected great talent for arrangement, and perfect clearness of expression. His Lectures upon the Apocalypse (1862, Eng. trans., 1874), the Colossians, Ephesians, and Philemon (1865), and Hebrews (1868), published in Berlin, carefully edited, and his Synoptische Erklärung der drei ersten Evangelien, edited by Holtzmann in Leipzig, 1862, 2 vols. are as yet untranslated.

AD. KAMPHAUSEN.

BLEMMYDES, or BLEMMIDA, a Greek monk from a Macedonian monastery, who, with great learning and ability, defended the Roman doctrine on the procession of the Holy Spirit from the Father and the Son in a disputation arranged at Nicæa by the Emperor Ducas Vatatzes (1222-55.) On the same subject he afterwards composed two essays, which are found in Leo Allatius' Græciæ Orthodoxæ Scriptores, pp. 1-60. Theodore Lascaris made him patriarch of Constantinople (in partibus, as the Latin Empire was established in Constantinople, and the Greek emperor resided at Nicæa); but he refused the honor, and remained in his monastery.

HERZOG.

BLOMFIELD, Charles James, b. at Bury St. Edmunds, Suffolk, Eng., May 29, 1786; d. in Fulham Palace, Aug. 5, 1857; was educated at Cambridge, and became Bishop of Chester in 1824, and of London in 1828, from which office he retired in 1856, after a vigorous and effective administration. He was an excellent Greek scholar; wrote a Greek grammar (1828); edited Æschylus, Callimachus, etc.; and contributed numerous critical papers on classical subjects to the periodicals. His theological writings comprise Five Lectures on John's Gospel (1823), Twelve Lectures on the Acts (1828), several collections of sermons, and a Manuel of Private and Family Prayers. See BIBER: Bishop Blomfield and his Times, 1857; and the excellent Memoir by his son, 1863.

BLONDEL, David, b. at Chalons-sur-Marne, 1591; d. at Amsterdam, April 6, 1655; was early appointed minister of the Reformed congregation of Houdan, near Paris, but received in 1645 a pension from the synod of Charenton, which enabled him to devote himself exclusively to literature, and moved in 1650 to Amsterdam as Vossius' successor in the chair of history. Most of his writings, of which a complete account is given by Nicéron (vol. viii. p. 48), are theologic-polemical, directed against Romanism, and are distinguished by immense learning, great acuteness, and a decided talent for combination. The most remarkable are: Pseudo-Isidorus et Torrianus Vapulantes, Geneva, 1628; De la primauté de l'Église, Geneva, 1641; Apologia pro Sententia Hieronymi de Episcopis et Presbyteris, Amsterdam, 1646; Famillier Éclaircissement (concerning Papess Johanna), Amsterdam, 1647; De jure plebis in regimine ecclesiastico, 1648.

BLOOD, Revenger of. There is a sense in man which declares that whoever intentionally takes another's life deserves to forfeit his own; and in all nations, ancient and modern, outside of civilization, the next of kin has felt called upon to avenge the death upon the murderer. The Mosaic law found this custom and adopted it, but restricted it, and put it upon religious grounds. In its conception such a murder was not a crime against society, but against God; and therefore the shed blood was a defilement, and the land could not be cleansed of the blood shed therein, but by the blood of him that shed it (Num. xxxv. 33). The failure to avenge was criminal. If the natural goh-ël had-dähm, the revenger of blood, did not, some one else must take his place. God himself is the great Avenger of blood (Ps. ix. 12).

But the law (Exod. xxi. 12-14; Num. xxxv. 9-34; Deut. xix. 1-13) put blood revenge under the following restrictions: 1. The blood revenge was only allowed for intentional killing. For those who accidentally caused the loss of life, there was appointed six Levitical cities, three on each side of the Jordan, called cities of refuge. Thither all slayers fled, and there the cases were investigated. If the man was a murderer, then the elders of his own city demanded his death; and the revenger of blood killed him, even though he sought the protection of the altar (Exod. xxi. 14). But, if the elders of his city decided the man was not a murderer, then he remained in the city of refuge until the death of the high priest under whom the deadly stroke was given. But, if the man left the city before, he was liable to be killed by the goh-ël. The rabbins said "the death of the high priest was expiatory." But how? Because his death set a limit to the imprisonment and risk of life on the part of the dweller in the city, and, so to say, sealed his repentance as sufficient. The true connection between the death of the high priest and the release of the involuntary man-slayers lies in the fact, that, with the incoming of a new high priest, a new period began.

2. There was no other expiation for the intentional killing than the blood of the murderer. No amount of money could buy exemption. The forgiveness of the murdered man before his death availed nought. The lex talionis was held to in the strongest fashion. Flight to a city of refuge was vain.

It is not possible to determine how long the blood-revenge in the Mosaic mode was observed. The parable of the wise woman of Tekoah alludes to it (2 Sam. xiv. 7); but ver. 8 seems to indicate that the king (David) had influence in restraining the operation of the law. Jehoshaphat established a court in Jerusalem to take cognizance of such cases (2 Chron. xix. 10); and, as the state increased in civilization, the primitive revenge would gradually give place to orderly proceedings in courts of law, and executions by the state.

BLOODY-SWEAT. Luke says, that, during Christ's agony in the garden, "his sweat was as it were great drops of blood falling down to the ground" (xxii. 44). This abnormal physical state is not unique. What is called diapedesis, sweating of blood, is a recognized, well-authenticated phenomenon. The power of passion to force the blood to the skin is seen in the blush of shame or anger. If the emotion be very great, a copious perspiration follows, and, in extreme cases, with the water there is blood. A well-attested case is that of Charles IX. of France. De Mezeray says, "During the last two weeks of his life (May, 1574) his constitution made strange efforts: He tossed and agitated himself continually, and his blood gushed from all the outlets of his body, even from the pores of his skin; so that on one occasion he was found bathed in a bloody sweat." See, for abundant proof, The Physical Cause of the Death of Christ, by William Stroud, M.D., London, 1847, pp. 85-88, Note III. pp. 379-389.

BLOUNT, Charles, b. at Upper Holloway, Middlesex, Eng., April 27, 1654; committed suicide, August, 1693; produced in 1679 a scandalous sensation by his Anima Mundi, whose vulgar scepticism gave general offence. In 1680 his translation of Philostratus' Life of Apollonius of Tyana, with its indirect attacks on Christianity, was suppressed. The most characteristic representation of his deistical stand-point is found in his Oracles of Reason, which, however, was not published until after his death. A collected edition of his works, together with a life of him, was published by GILDON, London, 1695. See DEISM.

BLUMHARDT, Christian Gottlieb, b. in Stuttgart, April 29, 1779; d. in Basel, Dec. 19, 1838; studied theology at Tübingen, and was in 1801 appointed secretary of the German Missionary Society in Basel, and in 1809 minister at Bürg, but returned in 1816 to Basel as director of the missionary school; in which position he remained till his death. Since 1816 he edited the Missionsmagazin, and since 1828 also the Heidenbote. From 1828 to 1837 he published five volumes of his Versuch einer allgemeinen Missionsgeschichte der Kirche Christi, reaching down to the time of the Reformation.

BLUNT, John James b. at Newcastle-under-Lyme, Staffordshire, 1794; d. at Cambridge, June 17, 1855; was educated at Cambridge; travelled in Italy and Sicily; became curate of Hadnet, Shropshire, 1821, rector of Great Oakley, Essex, in 1834, and professor of divinity at Cambridge in 1839. His Sketch of the Reformation in England, and Undersigned Coincidences in the Writings of the Old and New Testaments, have run through many editions: the latter work, in the vein of Paley's Horæ Paulinæ, is of much value, and has been extensively used. This indirect sort of proof has to thoughtful minds oftentimes more convincing force than the direct. He also published sermons, Lectures on the Early Fathers, etc., and contributed largely to periodicals.

BOARDMAN, Henry Augustus, D.D., a prominent Presbyterian minister and author, b. at Troy, Jan. 9, 1808; d. at Philadelphia, June 15, 1880. He was graduated with highest honors at Yale College in 1829; entered Princeton Theological Seminary in 1830; graduated in 1833; installed, Nov. 8, 1833, pastor of the Tenth Presbyterian Church of Philadelphia, and retained the position till his death, though in later years he had a colleague. He was moderator of the O.S. General Assembly in 1854. His publications were numerous: the chief are, The Scriptural Doctrine of Original Sin (1839), The Bible in the Counting-House (1853), and The Higher-Life Doctrine of Sanctification tried by the Word of God, all published in Philadelphia.

BOCHART, Samuel, b. at Rouen, 1599; d. at Caen, May 16, 1667; studied at Sedan and Saumur, also at Oxford and Leyden, and was appointed minister at Caen, where his conferences with the Jesuit Véron, in 1628, attracted much attention. In 1646 he published his Geographia Sacra, which procured for him an invitation from Queen Christina to come to Sweden, where, however, he did not stay long. In 1663 he published his other great work, Hierozoicon sive de Animalibus S. Scripturæ, 2 vols. fol.,—a biblical natural history which has still its worth, and which was republished, with notes by Rosenmüller, Leipzig, 1793. His collected works have been several times published (1675, 1692, 1712, etc.) at Leyden.

BOCKHOLD, Johann, the Prophet and King of the Anabaptist Kingdom at Münster (called also Bockelsohn, or Beuckelszoon, and John of Leyden), b. at Münster about 1509; put to death there Jan. 23 (?), 1536. He was the illegitimate son of a magistrate in the neighborhood by a servant. The only facts known of his early life are that he was educated at Leyden by relatives, learned the tailor's trade, travelled to England, and then to Portugal, and at last returned to Leyden, married, practised his trade, but at the same time kept an inn in the suburbs. From this time on his course is known. He was a favorite as an innkeeper by reason of his lively conversation; was a member of the Singer's Guild, a poet and an actor. Little by little he was drawn into the current setting against the Church. He imbibed heretical opinions, but was not confirmed in his views until his visit to Münster for the express purpose of hearing the "brave preachers." In autumn of the same year (1533) he made the acquaintance of Johannes Matthiesen, the Anabaptist, and as the result he came to Münster in January, 1534, as an "apostle" in the sect; but when, on his request, Matthiesen came thither, he retired to a subordinate position. At Easter (1534), Matthiesen was killed. Bockhold then again came to the front, and, on the strength of a pretended revelation, took not only Matthiesen's position, but his wife. He soon showed his extraordinary power. He revolutionized the city, set up the "kingdom of Zion," of which he was king, ["appointed ministers, coined money, introduced polygamy, married fifteen wives, lived in royal splendor and luxury; and for more than a year the city was the stage for the most frightful scenes of fanatical cruelty and sensual dissipation. In 1535 it was conquered by the neighboring princes, and again reduced to order. John was tortured to death by hot pincers; and his body was hung in a cage on the tower of St. Lambert's Church"]. Without education, intellectual or moral, Bockhold owed his influence to his dignified, pleasing person, and to the reckless daring which made him attempt any enterprise, however great. It is however true that he was unfitted to keep the control he seized. His character is a study: in it fanaticism and lust, conviction and hypocrisy, were mixed. In the hour of trial he showed no heroism, only the rage of a disappointed spirit. [He is the historical subject of Meyerbeer's opera, Le Prophète.] See ANABAPTISTS. BODY, Natural, Spiritual, and Mystical. The Greek word σῶμα (body) is used in these three relations. The difference between the first two is well brought out by Rev. Dr. Kling: "The expression 'natural [or rather, psychical] body' (σῶμα ψυχικόν) denotes, in general, an organization that corresponds to the soul (ψυχή); and the 'spiritual body' (σῶμα πνευματικόν), one that corresponds to the spirit (πνεῦμα). The soul is that by means of which our spiritual part is linked to a physical life,—a life of impulse and sensation, dependent for its nourishment upon a world of sense. The corporeity corresponding to this, and determined by it, is, precisely on this account, made dependent upon this outward world, and is affected by it, and by reason of it, it is exposed to all that is expressed by the words 'corruption,' 'dishonor,' and 'weakness,' of which death is the catastrophe. The nature of the spirit is, on the contrary, a free, supermundane life of light and love in God; and the spiritual body is an organization suited to its character, being lifted above all dependence on the outward world, and the consequences following from it, and displays itself in incorruption, glory, and power" (Lange's Comm. 1 Cor. xv. 44, Amer. ed. p. 338).

The Mystical Body is a phrase indicative of the Christian Church; for the union which subsists between Christ and his Church is as intimate as that between the members of our bodies, and at the same time is mystical,—to be believed rather than understood. We owe to Paul the origin of this significant designation. Cf. 1 Cor. xii. 27; Eph. i. 23, ii. 16, iv. 4, 12, 16, v. 23, 30; Col. i. 18, 24, ii. 19, iii. 15. He draws certain practical conclusions from the existence of this relationship, as that different members have different functions, and that there should be no schism in the body. The important questions, however, relate to the way in which admittance is obtained, and the means of growth with the body. It is evident that the terms of admittance into the external Church are easy; but to be really joined to him is a different matter. For this, living faith is requisite, and then from the Lord himself will come the means of growth.

BOEHME (often written in English Behmen), Jacob, b. at Alt-Seidenberg, in Upper-Lusatia, 1575; d. at Görlitz, in Silesia, Nov. 17, 1624; descended from a well-to-do peasant family; was apprenticed when fourteen years old to a shoemaker, and settled, after the usual wanderings, in 1599, as master of his profession, in Görlitz, where he married, and bought a house. Meanwhile the religious and philosophical instincts of his nature developed rapidly, without any influence from without; and in time this development ripened into a mystico-theosophical view of God and the world, which called for utterance. He began to put down his ideas in a desultory and unsystematic way; and the unfinished manuscript, Die Morgenröthe im Aufgang, began to circulate among his friends. It happened to fall under the notice of the official ecclesiastical authority of the place, Gregorius Richter, and greatly scandalized him. He was a full-blooded representative of the Orthodoxy of that time, with its hair-splitting barren subtleties, fit only for strife and condemnation, and utterly incapable of fostering a genuine religious life. A layman writing on religion was to him an impertinence which deserved rebuke; and when he wrote, as Boehme did, with the enthusiasm and authority of inspiration, it was a crime which deserved punishment. He put both the magistrates and the mob of the city against Boehme, and compelled him to stop writing, 1612. For five years Boehme kept his word, and wrote nothing; but then he began again, and in his remaining years he wrote about thirty works, smaller and greater. In 1623 two of these, Vom übersinnlichen Leben, and Von wahrer Busse, were published by one of his friends, and immediately the persecutions were renewed, Gregorius Richter at the head. The magistrates advised Boehme to leave the city. He went first to Dresden, but found no rest there, then to Silesia, but was there overtaken by a severe illness, and hastened home only to die. His works were then collected and published by his friends; most of them by Heinrich Betke, or Beets, a wealthy merchant of Amsterdam. By Abraham van Beyerland they were translated into Low

German. In England they attracted much attention. Three English translations have appeared, by I. Sparrow, Edward Taylor, and William Law, of which the last is the best, London, 1764, 2 vols. The first complete edition was given by I. G. Gichtel in 1682, the last, by Schiebler, Leipzig, 1831-46, 6 vols. Indeed, Boehme's fame may be said to have grown with every new generation; and through Franz von Baader, Oettinger, Claudius, Schelling, etc., he has exercised considerable influence on the theology of our own time.

BOËTHIUS, Anicius Manlius Severinus, b. in Rome, 480; beheaded at Pavia, 525; descended from a wealthy and influential Roman family; studied in Athens, and occupied for several years a very prominent position in the Roman world, equally revered by the people, and esteemed by the Ostrogothic king, Theodoric, the ruler of Italy. The decree of the Emperor Justin against the Arians was the first event which made Boëthius suspected; but Theodoric now banished him to Pavia, where he afterwards had him confined in a dungeon, and finally beheaded. By his translations of Aristotle's Analytica, Topica, Soph. Elench., and of the Isagoge of Porphyry, by his elaborate commentaries on these works, and by his own independent writings, Introductio ad Categoricas Syllogismos, De Syllogismo Categorico, De Syllogismo Hypothetico, De Divisione, De Definitione, etc., Boëthius became the connecting link between the logical and metaphysical science of antiquity and the scientific attempts of the middle ages; and a still greater influence he came to exercise on mediæval thought by his De Consolatione Philosophicæ and the various theological writings which were ascribed to him. The Consolatio Philosophicæ was written during the imprisonment of the author at Pavia; but though it is certain that Boëthius was a Christian, at least nominally, it never touches Christian ground: all the comfort it contains it owes to the optimism of the neo-platonic school and to the stoicism of Seneca. Nevertheless, during the middle ages this book was read with the greatest reverence by all Christendom. King Alfred translated it into Anglo-Saxon, which translation was edited by Rawlinson, Oxford, 1698; and Thomas Aquinas wrote a commentary on it. Having thus advanced from the position of a mere logician to that of a moralist, he finally reached that of a theologian. It is not probable that he has written any of the theological works ascribed to him; but the tradition is very old. He is mentioned by Alcuin as author of De Sancta Trinitate; by Hincmar of Rheims, as author of Utrum Pater et Filius et Spiritus Sanctus de Divinitate instantialiter prædicentur, etc. Collected editions of the works of Boëthius appeared at Venice, 1492; Basle, 1546 and 1570; and in Migne: Patrol., tom. 63 and 64. The theological works were published at Louvain, 1633. The Consolatio Philosophiæ was translated into English by Preston, 1695.

BOGATZKY, Karl Heinrich von, b. at Jan-kowe, in Lower Silesia, Sept. 7, 1690; d. at Halle, June 15, 1774; was educated as page at the ducal court of Weissenfels, but left it dissatisfied, and began in his twentieth year to study, first law at Jena, then, since 1715, theology at Halle. Among the pietists he found what he sought; and, after finishing his theological studies, he lived for several years among the nobility of Silesia, afterward, from 1740 to 1746, at the ducal court of Saalfeld, and finally at Halle, engaged in literary work of a devotional character. His Golden Treasury of the Children of God, translated into English, York, 1821, was first published at Breslau, 1718: the fifty-fifth edition was published in 1878. Also his Tägliches Hausbuch der Kinder Gottes, 2 vols., 1748, ran through many editions. Of his four hundred and eleven hymns, several obtained a place in the common hymn-books of the German people: they appeared collected in Übung der Gottseligkeit, Halle, 1749. His autobiography was edited by G. C. Knapp, Halle, 1801, and is very interesting for the study of the pietism of his days. See also LEDDERHOSE: Das Leben K. H. von Bogatzky, Heidelberg, 1846.

BOGERMANN, Jan, b. at Oplewert, Friesland, 1576; d. Sept. 11, 1637, at Franeker, where he was made professor of divinity (1633); took a very active part in the Arminian controversy; wrote Annotationes contra H. Grotium, and presided at the synod of Dort (1618). The translation of the Old Testament still in use in the Dutch churches, is, for the greatest part, his work. He translated Beza's tract on the punishment of Heretics, Van het Ketter Straffen, 1601.

BOGOMILES, a branch of the Cathari which developed in Thrace. Their name was formerly derived from Bog Milni, "God have mercy," or Bogomil, "Beloved by God;" but Shafforik, the great authority on Slavic antiquities, has found in some old Slavic record a Bulgarian bishop of the name Bogomil, who, in the middle of the tenth century, was the representative of the peculiar heresies of the sect, and this seems to give a better clew to the name. The mythology which the sect developed was very fantastic,—a mixture of Manicheism, Docetism, and wild fancy. But their views of morality and polity were exactly those of the other Cathari. They were decidedly anti-clerical. The Church, with its hierarchy, its worship of relics, images, and saints, etc., they considered the work of Satan. In the twelfth century they were very numerous in Philippopol and Constantinople. One of their leaders, Basil, was burnt in the latter city in 1118. They were repeatedly condemned, and at times severely persecuted; but they, nevertheless, lived on through the whole period of the middle ages. Their system of doctrines is completely expounded in EUTHYMIUS ZIGABANUS: Panoptia, edited by Gieseler, Göttingen, 1852. See RAZKI: Bogomili i Catareni, Agrani, 1869.

BOHEMIA. Christianity was introduced in Bohemia from Moravia in the latter part of the ninth century. A generation previously (845) some Czech noblemen were baptized at the court of Lewis the German, and Bohemia was put down as a Christian country belonging to the diocese of Ratisbon; but it was not until the baptism of the Bohemian duke, Borziway, and his wife Ludmilla, at the court of Swatopluk of Moravia, and the arrival of Methodius in Bohemia, that Christianity became firmly established in the country. A strong re-action took place under Borziway's son, Wratislaw, whose heathen spouse, Drahomira, had Ludmilla and other Christian members of the reigning family murdered. But when, under Boleslas II., the German influence became prevailing in the country, Christianity was again in the ascendancy, and a bishopric was founded in Prague (973). A century later on, all traces of Paganism disappeared. In 1092 the last sacred forests were felled, and the last heathen priests exiled.

Methodius, who was born and bred in the Greek Church, placed the Bohemian Church on an exclusively national basis. The native language was used in divine service; the Bible was read in the Slavic translation; the Lord's Supper was administered in both kinds; the Roman demand of the celibacy of the clergy was disregarded, etc. This original independence of Rome determined the whole character of the history of the Bohemian Church, which, indeed, is one continuous contest between a spontaneous development, national and independent, on the one side, and plots for centralization and absorption on the other. In Adalbert the Roman designs were completely foiled; in other cases they succeeded. The tragical fate which pursued Adalbert throughout life was his connection with Rome. Under Gregory VII., however (1073-85), the Roman liturgy and the Roman language became prevalent in the Bohemian Church.

During the fourteenth century the contest grew hotter and hotter, and in the beginning of the fifteenth the battle began. In 1346 the archbishopric of Prague was founded, and the metropolitan connection between Bohemia and the see of Mayence was dissolved; but thereby the German influence, which in this case was identical with the Roman influence, lost its firm hold on the country. In 1348 the University of Prague was founded, and in very short time it became one of the most brilliant centres of learning in Europe. But its most celebrated teachers, Conrad of Waldhausen, John Milic, Matthias of Janow, were the teachers of Hus. As the university consisted of four nations,—the Bohemian, Polish, Bavarian, and Saxon,—and each nation had a vote, the foreigners exercised a considerable influence on the direction of its affairs. But in 1408 the original statutes were altered, and the Bohemian nation obtained three votes. Irritated by this slight, the Bavarian and Saxon nations left, and founded the University of Leipzig; but thereby the national movement in Bohemia became only stronger. In 1412 the first partisans of Hus were burnt in Prague. In 1415 Hus himself was burnt at Constance. In 1420 the crusades against the Hussites began. But under Ziska and Procopius the Hussites beat the Germans time after time, and the Romanists came to understand that by force nothing could be done. Intrigue was then adopted, and it succeeded better. The Hussites themselves were divided into two parties, — the radicals and the moderates, the Taborites and the Calixtines. By granting the use of the cup in the Lord's Supper, the reading of the Bible in the Slavic translation, etc., the Council of Basel succeeded (1437) in effecting a reconciliation with the Calixtines, and thus the split between the Roman and the Bohemian Church was healed externally.

Internally, however, below the surface, the movement which had produced Hus continued its course. The Taborites disappeared; the Calixtines lost their individual stamp; but from the national depths arose the Bohemian Brethren, — a sect which Luther always treated with regard, and spoke of with respect, though at one time he called them a new order of monks only. At the time of the Reformation this sect formed the most prominent feature in the religious life of Bohemia; and through the Bohemian Brethren a lively intercommunication even sprang up between the Czechs and the Protestant leaders, both Luther and Calvin. But in 1526, by the extinction of the house of the Jagellons, Bohemia fell to the house of Austria, and the effects of this change were not slow in making themselves felt. Immediately after the battle of Mühlberg (April 24, 1547) Ferdinand I. sent the Jesuits into Bohemia to re-romanize the country. All evangelical parties — Lutherans, Calvinists, and Bohemian Brethren — were persecuted; and numbers of families were driven out of the country. Under Maximilian II. (1564-76) circumstances bettered: he was tolerant. But under Rudolph II. (1576-1612) the Jesuits again began the game. This time they lost, however. The Bohemian Brethren compelled Rudolph II. to sign a compact (July 9, 1609) by which their social position became legalized, and complete liberty of worship was granted to them. Under Matthias (1612-19) this compact was broken by the government, not openly and by force, but, as it behooved a tool of the Jesuits, on the sly, and by chicanery. The Brethren complained; the government prevaricated: in the course of the debate the Brethren threw the representatives of the government, Martinitz and Slawata, out of the window in Hradschin, May 23, 1618, and on the next day the Thirty-Years' War began.

The battle of the White Mountains (Nov. 8, 1620) made Ferdinand II. master of the country; and with a high hand he now carried through what his ancestor, Ferdinand I., had only attempted, — the re-romanization of Bohemia. By a series of decrees, beginning from June 20, 1621, were expelled, first the Calvinist ministers, then the preachers of the Bohemian Brethren, and finally the Lutheran ministers, Czech and German; and, the evangelical party having thus been deprived of their teachers and leaders, the conversion commenced. Of the Protestant nobility, those who had taken active part in the rebellion lost their estates, and were banished from the country, while the rest were forbidden to marry. This last measure, however, not being considered sufficiently effective, a decree of July 31, 1627, gave them the choice between abjuration or exile. They were allowed to sell their estates, but only to Roman Catholics. More than two hundred noble families left the country, destitute of every thing. As for the Protestant part of the city population, they were forbidden to engage in any kind of trade; they were fined when they abstained from any of the rites of the Roman Church; their marriages were considered and treated by the law as concubinage; their children were taken from them, and educated by the Roman priests; their poor and sick were expelled from the hospitals and asylums. Thirty thousand burgher families left the country. With respect to the peasantry, the case was rather delicate. What good would the country be to the Emperor or the Pope, if there were no peasants to till the soil? They could not be banished. But in this emergency Lichtenstein's dragoons proved of good use. The peasants were driven together in large crowds, and kept starving till they submitted. Sometimes mothers were tied to the door-post, and compelled to see their babies starving before their eyes. Sometimes all the inmates of a household were shut up in one room, and the cattle left starving, until the frantic howling of the animals drove the men crazy. Thus Protestant Bohemia was converted to the Roman Church. The treaty of Westphalia (1648) does not even mention the Protestants in Bohemia, for officially there were none. They had almost all gone (more than one-third of the whole population), and in their stead had come 1,130 Jesuits, who enjoyed a yearly revenue of thirty millions.

Protestantism was, nevertheless, not completely eradicated in Bohemia, as may be seen from the very severe measures of repression which from time to time were employed. As late as 1760, some men were condemned to death for having peddled Protestant tracts and pamphlets among the peasants; and, when Joseph II. issued his edict of toleration (Oct. 13, 1781), Protestant congregations were immediately formed in various places of the country. Generally speaking, however, Bohemia is still a Roman-Catholic country. While in the seventeenth century four-fifths of its population were evangelical, and one-fifth Roman-Catholic, only two per cent of its present population are evangelical: the rest is Roman-Catholic. The Roman Church comprises the archbishopric of Prague and the bishoprics of Leitmeritz, Königgrätz, and Budweis, with 5,226 churches and chapels, and 3,538 priests. The evangelical churches were organized by the law of Jan. 23, 1866. They are divided between the adherents of the Lutheran or Augsburg Confession, and those of the Reformed or Helvetic Confession. Both, however, are ruled by the Church Council in Vienna. At the Basel Conference of the Evangelical Alliance (Sept. 6, 1879), the case of some Bohemian Baptists, a sect not recognized by Austria, who had been disturbed particularly in their family worship, was presented, whereupon it was resolved that a committee be appointed to present the case to the emperor. This was done upon Nov. 6, 1879, and the persecution was stopped. BOHEMIAN BRETHREN, a sect which arose in Bohemia in the latter part of the fifteenth century, spread rapidly, and comprised one-fourth of the population in the latter part of the sixteenth century, but was suppressed or banished by the atrocious measures of Ferdinand II., and lived latent and in exile, until, in the eighteenth century, it was revived in Saxony by Count Zinzen-dorf, and became known once more under the name of the Moravian Brethren. The general outline of the history of the sect is perfectly clear, — its period of rise and organization under Gregor (1457-94), its period of expansion and consolidation under Lukas of Prague (1494-1528), the diversion towards Lutheranism under Augusta (1528-46), the diversion towards Calvinism (1546-80), and, finally, the period of the highest social success and the greatest literary achievements, not altogether unaccompanied by traces of inner dissolution. Its birth, however, its relation to Rokyczana and the Utraquists on the one side, and to the Waldenses on the other, is still somewhat obscure, though of late Bohemian scholars have thrown considerable light on these complicated questions.

The nucleus from which the sect developed formed the so-called Chelczicky Brethren, — a group of pious men in the county of Prachin, who gathered around Peter Chelczicky as their spiritual leader. Peter was a layman belonging to the lower nobility, but not without education; and his pamphlets against the Roman Church and clergy were sharp and stirring. Rokyczana, the leader of the Utraquists, and a man who had deeper and more radical ideas of reform than he was able to reconcile with his personal ambition, sent Gregor to the Chelczicky Brethren; and, when persecutions were raised against them, he procured them a place of refuge (1457) at Kunwald, near Senftenberg, whence, however, they soon were driven into the forests, and up among the mountains. The Chelczicky Brethren rejected the oath, the profession of the soldier, all rank and honor connected with an office, the right of any secular authority to punish, etc. They stood in absolute opposition to any kind of hierarchy. The doctrine of community of property they did not adopt; but they taught that the rich only administered his property for the good of the poor, and their positive goal was an approach to the congregational life of the primitive Church, and a realization in practical life of the words and example of Christ. At the Convention of Lhotka (1467) these tenets were solemnly adopted; and they continued to be the life-giving soul in the social and political body which gradually developed from the Chelczicky Brethren into the Unitas Fratrum, or the Bohemian Brethren.

The first seed of discord was sown in this field of general harmony by Procopius of Neuhaus; but it became a mere element of progress. Procopius was a scholar, and the other Brethren were plain country-people. The first bishop, Matthias of Kunwald, ordained by a Waldensian bishop, was a peasant; and on his death-bed (1474) Gregor solemnly warned the Brethren against "professors and magisters." As a scholar, Procopius held milder and broader views; and a conflict soon arose. The method adopted for the settling of the question was very characteristic. Lukas of Prague and some other Brethren went on a great journey through Greece and the Orient, with the purpose of discovering some model congregation whose organization could be immediately imitated. They found none; but they returned with their ideas so much enlarged, and their experience so much enriched, that on the synod of Reichenau (1494), where the questions of the difference of estates, the authority of civil and ecclesiastical powers, etc., were debated, the milder views became victorious. Thus Lukas stands as the second founder of the Unitas Fratrum. Once more he visited foreign countries, and for the same purpose; and this his journey to Italy and France was the cause and the occasion of that intimate literary intercourse which existed between the Bohemian Brethren and the Waldenses, and which has given rise to much misunderstanding. It is now proved beyond doubt that the famous Waldensian work, Ayczo es la causa del departiment de la gleysa Romana, is a translation of a Bohemian work on the Reasons for Secession from the Roman Church; and again that the equally famous Waldensian work, Anti-christ is founded on Ayczo es la causa.

The appearance of Luther caused, as might have been foretold, a great commotion in the Unitas Fratrum, and attempts of communication and connection were immediately made. They led to nothing, however. There was between the Bohemian Brethren and the German Reformers a radical difference, which could not be got over. By Speratus and Optatus, Luther was requested to give his opinion of the Brethren's doctrine of the Lord's Supper. Before answering, Luther asked for means of a closer examination; and Lukas sent him the tract on The Truth Victorious. In 1523 Luther answered by his Vom Anbeten des Sakraments des heiligen Leichnams Jesu Christi, and the answer was both friendly and cautious; but the rejoinder which Lukas gave was simply an elaborate exposition of the difference which separated them: essentially this difference was not doctrinal. What the Unitas Fratrum has contributed to the doctrinal development of Christianity is not of great interest; but with respect to the practical application of the Christian doctrines to the individual realization of the Christian ideal in actual life, to the congregational organization under the guidance of the Christian spirit, the Bohemian Brethren have hardly been excelled in the history of the Christian Church but by the apostolic age. Hence, while the purely doctrinal differences might have been smoothed over, the Lutheran justification by faith alone looked to the eyes of the Unitas Fratrum like an attack on their very principles. Somewhat easier to effect seemed a union with the Calvinists. The negotiations with Wittenberg were stopped just as the last trace of Crypto-Calvinism was wiped out there; and in aftertime, when the Bohemian Brethren were gradually absorbed by other Reformed denominations, it was with the Calvinists they easiest amalgamated.

These frequent intercommunications with other parties and foreign nations led to a very lively literary activity in the Unitas Fratrum. Young men were sent to foreign universities, especially to Tübingen, to study; collections of literary materials were made; libraries were founded, etc.; and soon the results of these exertions were felt, not only in the devotional and controversial writings of the day, but also in the fields of history, grammar, etc. The great monument of this activity is the Bohemian translation of the Bible, — the "Bible of Kralicz," thus called after its place of printing. There were earlier Bohemian translations, but they were made from the Vulgate. The Bible of Kralicz is the first made from the original, and it is a masterpiece. The New Testament, translated by Blahoslav, appeared in 1564; the Old, translated by a number of scholars, from 1579 to 1593. It cannot be denied, however, that this extraordinary literary activity was accompanied by a relaxation of discipline and by a gradual transformation of the very spirit. The old Unitas Fratrum kept aloof from all secular affairs which had no direct religious bearing. The Bohemian Brethren of the seventeenth century became a political party; and it was not the religious conflict alone which brought Ferdinand II. down upon the country, and opened the Thirty-Years' War.

BOLIVIA, a republic of South America, comprising an area of about 350,000 square miles, with 1,057,352 inhabitants (in 1858), of whom 245,000 are independent Indians, the rest a mixed race of Indians and whites. The Roman-Catholic Church is the Established Church of the country, with an exclusive privilege of public worship. There are no evangelical congregations in Bolivia. The Church comprises an archbishopric, La Plata, with residence at Chuquisaca, and three bishoprics, La Paz, Santa Cruz, and Cochabamba: the number of priests amounted in 1846 to 1,517. There are four seminaries at the episcopal residences. In 1826 the State confiscated and sold the estates of the Church, and assumed the obligation to maintain the church officers; but the State is bankrupt.

BOLLANDISTS is the name given to those Jesuits who carried on the Acta Sanctorum, — a vast collection of hagiology and martyrology but lately finished, intended to embrace the life of every saint in the Calendar. Héribert Rosweyd, professor in the Jesuit College of Douay (b. at Utrecht, Jan. 22, 1569; d. at Antwerp, Oct. 15, 1629), conceived in 1599 the plan of uniting all the legends of saints and martyrs in one work of eighteen folio volumes; but he lived to print only the beginning of his series, Vitæ Patrum (1615). By command of the order the continuation of the work was intrusted to Johann Bolland (b. at Tirlemont in Brabant, Aug. 13, 1596; d. at Antwerp, Sept. 12, 1665). Antwerp was made the headquarters of the enterprise, and, assisted by his eminent pupil Georg Henschen (1600–81), a vast correspondence was carried on with all Europe. Libraries and monasteries were ransacked for information about saints, and the result was an unparalleled collection of such material. The editors worked with fiery zeal. In 1634 printing was begun, and in 1643 two thick folios appeared, which contained the Calendar for January; in 1658 two others, with that for February. In 1660 the Jesuit Daniel Papebroeck (1628–1714) was added to the editorial staff. He consecrated his fortune to the prosecution of this work, and lived to see twenty-six volumes appear. On the suggestion of Pope Alexander VII., Henschen and Papebroeck made a journey through Germany, Italy, and France in search of materials. So well drilled was the staff, that the great undertaking went on, whoever died. The Bollandists, as this staff was called, suffered with the rest of their brethren in the dispersion of the order (1773). One of them was imprisoned for two years. However, they persevered in spite of many difficulties and renewals. The fifty-third folio volume appeared in 1794, containing Oct. 12 to 15 inclusive. The collection they made with such care was happily, to a great extent, preserved, — the printed works at the Hague, and the manuscript at Brussels. From 1837 the Belgian Government contributed six thousand francs annually, and so the work is at last finished in sixty-one volumes folio, with a supplement, Paris, 1875. LE BLANT: Acta Martyrum et leur sources, Paris, 1880.

BOLSEC, Jerome Hermes, author of two notorious biographies; a Parisian Carmelite monk of the sixteenth century, who, compelled to flee the city because of a sermon he preached, left his order, betook himself to Ferrara, studied medicine, and married. Converted to Protestantism, he went to Geneva, but soon after was imprisoned for publicly opposing Calvin's cardinal doctrine of predestination. He was released only to be banished, Dec. 23, 1551. Incautiously he continued his attacks in Bern, and therefore found a change of residence desirable. Went to Paris; but his opinions were condemned by a synod at Orléans (1563), and a recantation required. He refused; went to Lausanne as a physician; but, as the condition of residence there was his signing the Confession of Bern, he chose rather to leave, and return to France. Probably to no one's surprise, he went back shortly thereafter to the fold of the Roman-Catholic Church. He died at Lyons, 1585. He gave expression to his bitterness in his slanderous Histoire de la vie, mœurs, actes, doctrine, constance et mort de Jean Calvin, Paris, 1577; and Histoire de la vie, mœurs et déportemens de Th. Beze, Paris, 1578. The first work appeared in Cologne, in Latin, 1580, in German, 1581; last ed. in French, Lyons, 1875; the second, in Latin, Paris, 1585. The two works were reprinted, with a life of their author, at Geneva, in 1835.

BOLZANO, Bernhard, a Roman-Catholic theologian and philosopher, b. at Prague, Oct. 5, 1781; d. there Dec. 18, 1848. He early showed marked ability in mathematics and philosophy, and was appointed professor of the philosophy of religion in the university of his native city when twenty-four years old. He at that time was already in holy orders: consequently he was subjected to ecclesiastical censure when his views developed themselves in a course contrary to the ideas of the Church. The Prince Archbishop Salm-Salm, however, protected him, and for some time he escaped expulsion, and enjoyed great popularity. But in 1820 he was charged with complicity with the students in their revolutionary schemes, and compelled to resign his chair. He was also suspended from his priestly functions in consequence of certain alleged errors in his works. He lived by his pen from that time forth. His works are very numerous. Of most interest to us is the Lehrbuch der Religionswissenschaft, Sulzbach, 1837, 4 vols., which contains a philosophic representation of all the dogmas of the Roman-Catholic theology.

BONA, Giovanni, b. at Mondovi, Piedmont, Oct. 12, 1609; d. in Rome, Oct. 25, 1674; entered the order of the Feuillants, 1625, and was chosen general of the order in 1651, and made a cardinal in 1669. His two devotional tracts, Principia Vitæ Christianæ, and Manuductio ad Cælum, were frequently translated, and widely read. Of his scientific works his Rerum Liturgicarum Libri Duo is still of value. A collected edition of his works was given by P. SALA, in 4 vols., Turin, 1747, who also gave a collection of his letters, Turin, 1755, 1 vol.

BONALD, Louis Gabriel Ambroise, Vicomte de, b. at Monna, in the Rouergue, Oct. 2, 1754; d. there Nov. 23, 1840; emigrated in 1791, but returned in 1805; was made a peer of France in 1823, and retired into private life on the accession of Louis Philippe. Practically he was one of the leaders of the Ultramontane re-action after the Restoration, and theoretically he was one of the leaders of the theological school (de Maistre, Eckstein, Lamennais), which started from the maxim that revelation, and not observation, is the true principle of philosophy, and which ended with considering the crown, the mitre, the escutcheon, and the police-baton as sacred forms of divine revelation. His works, the most remarkable among which are, Théorie du pouvoir politique et religieux, Constance, 1796, Législation primitive, Paris, 1802, were collected in 10 vols., Paris, 1817-92.

BONAVENTURA, or Giovanni di Fidenza (Doctor Seraphicus), b. at Bagnarea in Tuscany, 1221; d. at Lyons, July 15, 1274; entered the order of the Franciscans in 1243; studied theology and philosophy in Paris, under Alexander of Hales and John of Rochelle; succeeded the latter in the Franciscan chair of theology in the University, 1253, and was chosen general of his order in 1256, and made cardinal-bishop of Alba in 1273. His last public act was a brilliant and most impressive speech, delivered to the Council of Lyons in May, 1274, for the union between the Eastern and Western Churches. He was canonized by Sixtus IV., in 1482.

Already, before he became its general, Bonaventura had had an opportunity to work for his order. In the great contest between the Sorbonne and the Mendicant orders (1254-60), occasioned by the attacks of Guillaume de St. Amour on the Dominicans, he wrote De Paupertate Christi, in which he, through a somewhat forced and sophistical argumentation, represents voluntary poverty as an element of moral perfection. Of his general views of monastic life he has given an exposition in his Determinationes Questionum circa Regulam Francisci. In his practical administration he was very mild, yet firm. As a teacher and author, he occupies one of the most prominent places in the history of mediæval theology; not so much, however, on account of any strongly pronounced originality, as on account of the comprehensiveness of his views, the ease and clearness of his reasoning, and a style in which are still lingering some traces of the great charm of his personality. His mystical and devotional writings—as, for instance, De Septem Litteribus Æternitatis—are almost imitations of Hugo de St. Victor. More independent are his dialectical writings. His Breviloquium (lasted. Freiburg, 1881) is considered one of the best expositions of Christian dogmatics which the middle ages produced.

LIT.—The works of Bonaventura were published by the order of Sixtus V. in 8 vols., Rome, 1588-96. His life is found in Act. Sancti Jul. III., and in the introduction to the above edition of his works. See also, A. HOLLENBERG: Studien zu Bonaventura, Berlin, 1862; P. BONIFACE is the name of nine popes.—Boniface I. (Dec. 28, 418-Sept. 4, 422) was elected the successor of Zosimus by a majority of the clergy; but Eulalius succeeded in obtaining the recognition of the Emperor Honorius. The emperor, however, acknowledging the flaw in the election of Eulalius, referred the matter to a council, and forbade the two rivals, in the mean time, to enter the city of Rome. But Eulalius disobeyed the order, which irritated the emperor to such a degree, that he expelled him by force, and recognized Boniface without awaiting the decision of the council. Afterwards, in a controversy with the Patriarch of Constantinople, Honorius again came to the support of Boniface; and, by his influence on the emperor Theodosius, the authority of the Roman see over Illyria was acknowledged. See Vita Bon. I., in MURATORI: Re. Ital. Script. III. p. 116; and CONSTANT: Epist. Rom. Pontif., Paris, 1721, p. 1007 sq., where his letters are found.—Boniface II. (Sept. 22, 530-October, 532), a Goth, obtained the election by bribery, which occasioned the Roman Senate to issue a decree that no election to the chair of St. Peter should be valid, if the person elected could be proved guilty of influencing the voters by promises. Boniface compelled the Roman clergy to give him the right of choosing his successor, and he designated Vigilius as such; but, as this privilege involved an infringement of the royal prerogatives, King Athalarich compelled Boniface to cancel the designation, to burn the document on which it was based, and to declare himself guilty of treason. See Vita Bon. II., in MURATORI: Re. Ital. Script. III. p. 127.—Boniface III. (Feb. 19, 607-Nov. 12, 607) was by Gregory the Great (who styled himself servus servorum dei) sent as apokrissarius to the court of Constantinople in July, 603, in order to compel the Constantinopolitan patriarch to renounce the title of episcopus universalis; and so intimate became his friendship with, and so strong his influence over, the mean and vicious Phokas, that the latter, in 607, was actually induced to transfer the title from the patriarch to the pope. See Vita Bonif. III., in MURATORI: Rei. Ital. Script. III. p. 135; PAULUS DIACONUS: De Gestis Longob. IV. 37; I. M. LORENZ; Examen Decreti Phoca, 1790. — Boniface IV. (Sept. 15, 608–May 25, 615) continued the alliance which his predecessor had concluded with Phokas, and received permission from him to transform the Pantheon, which Agrippa had built in Rome, and dedicated to Cybele and all the Olympian gods, into a Christian church, Sancta Maria Rotunda. After the overthrow of Phokas by Heraclius, he entertained friendly relations also with the latter, without taking umbrage of his monophysitic tendencies. See the letter of Columban in EBRARD: Die irö-spötlische Missionskirche, Gütersloh, 1873, p. 95. For his relations with the Anglo-Saxon Church, see BÉDA: Hist. Eccl. II. 4. His life is given in MURATORI: Rei. Ital. Script. III. p. 135. — Boniface V. (Dec. 24, 618–Oct. 25, 625) made Canterbury the metropolitan see of England. See Vita Bonif. V., in MURATORI: Rei. Ital. Script. III. p. 135; BÉDA: Hist. Eccl. II. 7, 8, 10, 11. — Boniface VI. (896) was raised to the papal throne by a mob, after the death of Formosus (though John VIII. had deprived him of his ecclesiastical offices, on account of his vicious life), but died fifteen days later. — Boniface VII. (974–985) began his reign by having Benedict VI. strangled in the Castle of S. Angelo, but fled himself shortly after with the papal treasury to Constantinople, where he lived nine years. After the death of Otho II., he returned to Rome, and had John XIV. poisoned in the same castle, but was himself murdered in the streets of Rome eleven months afterwards. FERRUCCI, in his Investigazioni su la Persona et il Pontificato di Bonif. VII., 1856, tries to whitewash this monstrum horrendum. — Boniface VIII. (Dec. 24, 1294–Oct. 11, 1303) entertained the most extravagant ideas of the papal office, as instituted by God to give judgment over kings and empires, to examine the persons elected kings, and reject them if found incapable, etc.; and these ideas he actually endeavored to realize, thereby involving himself in strife with all the princes of Christendom. In Germany he succeeded. Adolf of Nassau and Albrecht of Habsburg he treated as simple vassals; but Erik VIII. of Denmark took no notice of his demands; Wenzel II. of Bohemia openly defied them; and Edward I. of England laid them before Parliament, which met them with a spiteful protest. It was in the contest, however, with Philip IV. the Fair of France, that this question of the secular supremacy of the Pope was decided generally and forever. The relations between Boniface VIII. and Philip IV. were originally very friendly. The first case of discord, however, occurred already in 1295, when the French clergy complained of the taxes which Philip IV. levied on them, and the Pope addressed the King with the bull Clericis laicos, Feb. 25, 1296. The King answered by forbidding all exportation of gold and silver, coined or uncoined, from France; and as soon as the Pope felt the famine in his treasury, he submitted, and attempted to explain away the most offensive expressions in his bull. Again the relations became very friendly. But, during the great centennial festival of 1300, the Pope showed himself to the multitude one day in the pontifical robe, with the tiara, and another day in the imperial mantle, with the crown; and in the same year Pierre Dubois, royal advocate of France, published his Summaria brevis, developing how and by what means Constantinople, Spain, Italy, etc., could be brought under the French sceptre. There were aspirations of a universal empire on both sides, and a collision was unavoidable. The appearance of Bernard of Saisset, Bishop of Pamiers, at the French court, 1301, as papal legate, and urging the King to undertake a crusade, gave the occasion. The King had the bishop imprisoned. The Pope ordered the bishop released immediately, and summoned the bishops, abbots, and doctors of France to Rome to hold a council. The King released the bishop, but forbade the French clergy to go to Rome. Several went, nevertheless; and the result of this synod (opened Oct. 30, 1302) was the bull Unam sanctam, which, in a style never used by the papal curia, either before or after, sets forth the doctrine of the two swords, both intrusted to the Pope. The strife now assumed dimensions which made it of world-wide importance. The Pope, who resided at that time in Agnani, prepared himself to speak the anathema against Philip IV. in the church of the city on Sept. 8, 1303; when, on Sept. 7, Guillaume Nogaret of Toulouse, vice-chancellor to Philip IV., in connection with some members of the family of the Colonna, which had been expelled by Boniface VIII., and some members of the nobility of the Romagna, which had been bought by Philip IV., penetrated into the sleeping-room of the Pope, and made him a prisoner. He was soon after liberated by the citizens; but he returned to Rome a broken-hearted man, and died shortly after. On his order was issued the Liber Textus (see article on CANON LAW). See I. RUBÉUS: Bonif. VIII., Rome, 1651; L. TOSTI: Storia di Bonifazio VIII., Monte Casino, 1846; W. DRUMANN: Geschichte Bonifacius VIII., Königsberg, 1852; CHANTREL: Bonif. VIII., Paris, 1862. — Boniface IX. (Nov. 2, 1389–Oct. 1, 1404), a mean and greedy character, spent his reign in useless intrigues against the Popes of Avignon. See Vita Bonif. IX., in MURATORI: Rei. Ital. Script. III. p. 830; DU PUYS: Histoire du Schisme, 1378–1428, Paris, 1654; MAIMBOURG: Histoire du Grand Schisme d'Occident, Paris, 1678. f. ZÖPFEL.

BONIFACE (Winfred, the "Apostle of Germany"), b. at Kirton near Exeter, between 680 and 683; d. near Dokkum in Friesland, June 5, 754 or 755; a Saxon by birth; was educated in the monasteries of Adescanastre and Nhutscele, and had already acquired a name for learning and piety, when, in 716, he left his native country, and joined the missionary Willibrord in Friesland. Political circumstances, however, made missionary labor an impossibility in that field at that moment; and Boniface returned to England. But in 718 he again started for the Continent. This time he went to France, and thence to Rome; and with papal authorization he repaired in 719 to Germany. His first attempts as a missionary in Bavaria and in the Frankish dominions failed, and he once more joined Willibrord in Friesland. After the death of the latter, Boniface returned to Germany (722); and in the region between the Lahn and the Saale he finally succeeded in taking root, and forming for himself a basis of operation. From this moment to his death he labored with great success in Hesse, Bavaria, and, after the death of Charles Martel, also in the Frankish Empire. In 723 he was made a bishop; in 732, an archbishop. His last effort was a tour into Friesland, where a Pagan re-action had taken place after the death of Willibrord; and here he was killed while administering confirmation to those who had remained faithful. His work consisted, however, not so much in the preaching of Christianity as in the propagation of Romanism, which to him was identical with Christianity organized, and which, perhaps, was the best for that age. He labored mostly in countries which had already been Christianized by the Iro-Scottish missionaries; and the result of his labor was simply the establishment of the Roman hierarchy. He formed bishoprics, and secured bishops who were willing to administer their dioceses in submission to the Pope. To convert Pagans to Christianity was not his only or his chief office, but to drive away by force or intrigue the independent Christian missionaries, and replace them with Roman priests; and at the time of his death that part of Germany which had received Christianity was firmly connected with the Roman see.

LIT. — The works of Boniface, sermons, letters, etc., have been edited by I. A. GILES, London, 1844, 2 vols. His life was written by WILLIBALD (Pertz: Monum. II., 33); I. P. MÜLLER, Amsterdam, 1869; AUGUST WERNER, Leipzig, 1875. [G. PFAHLER: St. Bonifacius, Regensb., 1880; O. FISCHER: Bonifatius, Leipzig, 1881.] WERNER.

BONNIVARD, Franz, the "Prisoner of Chillon," b. 1493 at Seyssel on the Rhone; d. 1570 at Geneva. He was the younger son of a Savoy family which had an almost hereditary claim upon several benefices: so when he entered the Church he thought to hold them; but, through the intrigues of the Duke Charles of Savoy, he was deprived of all save the priory of St. Victor, whose dependencies, however, comprised a considerable part of the Genevan territory. This unexpected turn of fortune affected his life, and is the key to his career; for his hatred of the duke led him to fraternize with the young Genevan patriots who were resisting the duke's attempts to obtain control of that city. Bonnivard quickly became the leader of the movement, and was largely instrumental in bringing Geneva and Freiburg into alliance (1518). His devotion cost him for a time his priory. In 1519 the duke entered Geneva. Bonnivard fled, was betrayed by his travelling-companions, and imprisoned for twenty months. Nine years later he obtained from the duke a "safe-conduct," and set out on a visit to his aged parents at Seyssel. But the duke broke his word, arrested him at Lausanne (May 26, 1530), and imprisoned him in the Castle of Chillon, where for six years he pined. It is this imprisonment which Byron has immortalized in verse, more musical than truthful. The first two years were tolerable; but after a visit from the duke he was put in the dungeon now shown to visitors. It is only a local tradition that he was fastened to a pillar. In the spring of 1536 the Bernese took the castle, and freed him. During his incarceration the priory and Church of St. Victor had been razed, and the income of the estates applied to the city hospital. By the intervention of the Bernese, the original sum of twenty thalers, granted him by the city for the payment of his debts, was increased to eight hundred, which he received in addition to a pension of two hundred thalers. Bonnivard then married, in all four times, but not happily, nor had he children. His last wife was accused of adultery, confessed to the charge on the rack, was put in a sack, and drowned in the Rhone; while her paramour, a former monk, was beheaded. Bonnivard made the city of Geneva his heir on condition that it paid his debts; but his estate consisted only of his books, which formed the foundation of the city library.

Bonnivard's literary activity was the chief reason for the forbearance his contemporaries showed him; for his career was somewhat dishonorable, wavering, and time-serving. In 1517 he was entitled "poet-laureate;" and after his liberation he was commissioned by the magistracy to write a history of the republic of Geneva. This work, called Chroniques de Genève, ends with 1551, is interesting, full of anecdotes, but so marred by contradictions and exaggerations as to be unreliable, and probably did not suit his patrons. Strangely enough, his more important works were not printed until this century, although the autographs have always been in the city library. Those now printed are: Les Chroniques de Genève, Genève, 1831, 4 vols.; Advis et devis des langues (1563), Genève et Paris, 1849; Advis et devis de la source de l'idolâtrie et tyrannie papale, Genève, 1856 (with an historical introduction). BONNER, Edmund, b. at Hainley, Worcestershire, Eng., about 1495; d. as a prisoner in London, Sept. 5, 1569; was educated at Oxford, and received his first preferment from Cardinal Wolsey. After the death of Wolsey, however, he seemed to veer around towards the Reformation; was appointed chaplain to Henry VIII.; employed in various embassies to France, Germany, and the Pope; and made Bishop of London in 1540; but as soon as the King died, the reformatory zeal of the bishop slackened; he refused to take the oath of supremacy, and was committed to the Fleet. After his release he was twice reprimanded by the privy council for neglect in the cause of the Reformation, and finally committed to the Marshalsea, and deprived of his see, 1549. Restored by Queen Mary, he took his revenge. In the course of three years he condemned more than two hundred Protestants to the stake; and in many cases Cardinal Pole and other champions of the Roman Church had to interfere with his persecuting fury. Immediately after the accession of Elizabeth, however, he was again committed to the Marshalsea, and died in confinement. See Life and Defence of Bishop Bonner, London, 1842; MAITLAND: Essays on Subjects connected with the Reformation, London, 1849.

BONOSUS, Bishop of Sardica in the latter part of the fourth century; held that Mary, in her marriage with Joseph, had borne several children beside Jesus; for this opinion he was condemned by a synod of Illyrian bishops, and the condemnation was confirmed by the Bishop of Rome. He found adherents, however, who afterwards affiliated with the Photinians in the East and the Adoptians in the West. See C. W. F. WALCH: De Bonoso Hæretico, Göttingen, 1764.

BOOS, Martin, b. at Huttenried, Bavaria, Dec. 25, 1762; d. at Sayn, near Coblenz, Aug. 29, 1825; studied theology at the University of Dillingen, where an evangelical movement had been started by Sailer, Zimmer, and Weber. Without leaving the Roman Church, he began to preach justification by faith; and everywhere, in Bavaria, Austria, and Prussia, his preaching caused a religious revival, which the Roman clergy feared and hated. He was driven from place to place, hunted out of Bavaria by the Inquisition, banished from Austria by the emperor, and hardly left in peace in Düsseldorf and Sayn under the protection of a Protestant government. See I. GOSSNER: S. M. Boos, 1831, translated into English, London, 1836; BODEMANN: M. Boos, Bielefeld, 1854.

BOQUIN, Pierre, b. in Guienne in the beginning of the sixteenth century; studied in the University of Bourges; entered the order of the Carmelites, and was elected abbot; but, having become acquainted with the ideas of the Reformation, he abandoned the cowl, and left France; in 1541 visited Wittenberg; occupied for some time Calvin's chair in Strassburg; returned to Bourges, and lectured on Hebrew and exegesis in the university under the protection of the Queen of Navarre. Persecutions, however, compelled him to leave his native country a second time. In 1557 he was made professor in the University of Heidelberg, and in 1574 he moved to Lausanne, where he died in 1582. A list of his works, mostly consisting of polemics against the Romanists and the Lutherans, is found in HAAG: La France Protestante. See also MELCHIOR ADAM: Vitæ Theologorum Externorum.

BORA, Catharine von, b. at Bitterfeld in the county of Meissen, Jan. 29, 1499; d. at Torgau, Dec. 20, 1552. She was a nun in the monastery of Nimtzensch, near Grimma; but, with the cognizance of Luther, she fled from the monastery together with eight other nuns (April 4, 1523), and repaired to Wittenberg. June 13, 1525, she married Luther, to whom she bore six children. Luther first offered her to his friend Amsdorf; but she declined, her aspirations rising higher. He married, he said, for three reasons,—to please his father, to tease the Pope, and to vex the Devil. He lived in happy wedlock, and wrote many characteristic letters to his wife and children. After his death (1546) she continued to live in Wittenberg, often in troubles, and but sparingly supported by the Danish king, Christian III. See F. G. HOFMANN: Katharina von Bora, Leipzig, 1845, and the many lives of Luther. Among the many libels concerning Luther's marriage the principal one is EUSEBIUS ENGELHARD: Lucifer Wittenbergensis oder der Morgenstern von Wittenberg, Landsberg, 1747-49, 2 vols.

BORBORITES or BORBORIANS, from βορβορος ("dirt-eaters"), is the name of one of the most extravagant Gnostic sects, mentioned by EPIPHANIUS, Hæres. 26, and by AUGUSTINE, De Hæres.

BORDAS-DEMOULIN, Jean Baptiste, b. at Montagnac in the Dordogne, 1798; d. in Paris, 1859; was one of the leaders of the liberal Catholic party, which, by developing the principles of the old Gallicanism, tried to reconcile the Roman-Catholic Church and the demands of modern civilization. Besides his Mélanges philosophiques et religieux, his two principal works are Les Pouvoirs constitutifs de l'Eglise (1855), and Essay sur le Réforme catholique (1837). His Etudes de philosophie cartésienne was crowned by the French Academy; but he died in the poorhouse. See HUET: Vie et Œuvres de B. - D., Paris, 1860.

BORDELUMIAN SECT, one of the obscurest and weakest of the numerous unwholesome religious developments of the last century, comprised some fifteen or twenty persons in the town of Bordelum in Schleswig-Holstein, under the leadership of two Saxons, candidates of theology,—David Bähr and Borsenius. In 1739 the sect was complained against by the local pastors, and charged with holding that they were saints who had advanced upon Paul in Rom. vii. 24; that God had special care over them; that they decried the Church as the devil's house, despised the sacraments; that, as clean, they rejected marriage, and, like so many of these clean and pure persons,—indeed, this seems to have been Satan's bait,—lived in the greatest unchastity among themselves. For their mutual support they instituted a sort of community of goods. They were found guilty of these charges; and King Christian VI., by edict of June 11, 1739, suppressed the sect, and condemned the leaders to imprisonment; but they escaped. Borsenius married, and lived quietly; Bähr ventured back to Holstein, was arrested and imprisoned, very harshly treated, and died miserably in Bredstätt, 1743. The sect gave much local trouble. PAUL TSCHACKERT.

BOREL, ADAM, the founder of the Borelists; b. in Zealand, 1603; d. in Amsterdam, 1667; was pastor of a Reformed congregation, but resigned his office, and became the leader of a separatistic party, which acknowledged no other religious authority than the Scripture. His work, Ad Legem et Testimonium, attracted great attention. Here he developed that the written word of God, without any human commentary, was the sole means of awakening faith; that the Church had fallen completely away from the Lord; that the Christian ought to shun all connection with the Established Church, and confine himself to his private devotion, etc. Though violently attacked by Maresius and Hornbeck, he gathered quite a number of adherents,—the Borelists. See ARNOLD: Kirchen- und Ketzerhistorien, III. 6, p. 28. HERZOG.

BORROMEO, Carlo, b. Oct. 2, 1538, in the Castle of Arona, on the southern shore of Lago Maggiore; d. Nov. 3, 1584, in Milan; was, in harmony with the natural bent of his character, destined for the Church, and studied theology, philosophy, and canon law at Pavia. When his uncle, Pius IV., was elected pope in 1559, he was immediately called to Rome, and made cardinal-deacon, and Archbishop of Milan. After the death of his elder brother, however, in 1562, both the Pope and his other relatives wished him to relinquish the Church, and marry; but he refused. His whole ambition had become concentrated on the one idea of restoring the Church to its former dignity and power; and to the realization of this idea he devoted his whole life: he is the hero of the ecclesiastical re-action of the sixteenth century. When the Council of Trent decreed that the bishops should reside in their dioceses, he immediately repaired to Milan, preceded by the Jesuits and the Inquisition. Milan was not only the largest, but also the most difficult diocese of Italy, comprising fifteen suffragan bishoprics, twelve hundred and twenty churches, and a hundred and seventy monasteries, pervaded by all the most hideous corruptions of the Roman Church, and stirred up by the ideas of the Reformation penetrating into the country from Switzerland. But the young archbishop was equal to the task. In spite of the violent opposition which went so far as to attempt his life, he restored discipline in the Church, the monasteries, and the school; and the Reformers he pursued to the top of the Alps, never sparing even their lives. No wonder that the grateful Church has adopted him among its saints, especially as his personal life was stainlessly pure, and as rich in self-sacrifice as full of energy and activity. He was canonized in 1610 by Paul V.

LIT.—His Opera Omnia were published in Milan, 1747. His life was written in Latin by BASCAPÉ, Ingoldstadt, 1592, and DE VIT, Amsterdam, 1858; in German by SAILER, Augsburg, 1823, and DIERINGER, Cologne, 1846; in French by TOUON, Paris, 1751; and in Italian by GIUSSANO, Rome, 1610, and ARISTIDE SALA, Milan, 1857-61, 3 vols. The last-mentioned work is the principal one.

BENRATH.

BORROW, George, author of the Bible in Spain, b. at East Dereham, Norfolk, Eng., February, 1803; d. July 30, 1881. After receiving a good school-education, he was in 1818 articled to a solicitor in Norwich; but, following his natural bent, he abandoned the law for literature and philology, acquired several modern languages, including that of the English gypsies, did hack-work for London publishers, travelled, and so spent many years. From 1833 to 1839 he was in the service of the British and Foreign Bible Society, and labored as a colporteur in Russia and Spain. In the latter country he was twice imprisoned. At St. Petersburg he edited the New Testament in the Mandchu or Chinese-Tartar language, at Madrid, the New Testament in Spanish, and translated the Gospel of Luke into the Spanish-Gypsy language. Having returned to England, he issued Zancali, or An Account of the Gypsies in Spain, London, 1841, and in 1843, The Bible in Spain, or the Journeys, Adventures, and Imprisonments of an Englishman in an Attempt to circulate the Scriptures on the Peninsula. By the latter work he achieved a great reputation. The remainder of his life was devoted to literature, and to researches into the manners and speech of the gypsies in Europe. He was a popular and prolific writer.

BOSSUET, Jacques Bénigne, b. at Dijon, Sept. 27, 1627; d. in Paris, April 12, 1704; was educated in the Jesuit school of his native town, and made his theological studies in the Collège de Navarre in Paris; lived there for some time in retirement at St. Lazare before he removed to Metz, where he held a rich benefice, and developed a great activity in controversies with the Reformed churches; was made Bishop of Condom in 1669, but resigned this office, when, in 1670, he was appointed tutor to the Dauphin, with whom he staid till 1681, when he was made Bishop of Meaux. Bossuet first attracted attention as an orator by his sermons; and, so far as eloquence is an art, his Discours Funèbres must be ranked among the highest specimens of Christian eloquence, though they reflect the splendor and greatness of Louis Quatorze more vividly than the power and humility of the Gospel. As tutor to the Dauphin he wrote Traité de la connaissance de Dieu et de soi-même and Discours sur l'Histoire universelle, the latter of which is a strikingly original attempt to construct a Christian philosophy of history on the principle that the destinies of nations are controlled by Providence in the interest of the Roman-Catholic Church. Among his controversial writings against the Protestants, the two most remarkable are Exposition de la doctrine de l'Eglise catholique sur les matières de controverse (1671), and Histoire des Variations des Eglises protestantes (1688). The latter was very sharply criticised by Jurieu and Basnage, and involved its author in a long and vehement controversy. His fanaticism against the Reformation made him so blind that he characterized the revocation of the Edict of Nantes (1685) as "le plus bel usage de l'autorité." He was no ultramontanist, however. On the contrary, he presided in 1682 over the assembly of the French clergy which the King had convened in order to defend the royal prerogatives and the liberties of the Gallican Church against the claims of the Pope. Nor was he in the least tainted by mysticism. His attacks on Fénelon and the Quietists approached very near to persecution. His passion was cold; and his peculiar ideas of church-polity corresponded to, if they were not dictated by, Louis Quatorze's "L'état, c'est moi." The latest and best edition of his works appeared at Versailles, 1819 sqq., in 46 vols., edited by CARDINAL BEAUSSET, who also wrote his life. See also TABARAUD: Supplément aux Histories de Bossuet et de Fénelon, Paris, 1822; [H. L. SIDNEY LEAR: Bossuet and his Contemporaries, London, 1874. A translation of select sermons was published, 2d ed., London, 1801]. C. SCHMIDT.

BOST, Paul Ami Isaac David, one of the leaders of the Réveil in Switzerland and France, b. June 10, 1790, in Geneva; d. Dec. 14, 1874, in La Force. His father was a Moravian, pious and hard-working, served as chorister, and taught music; and piety and musical tastes were shown by the son. He studied theology in Geneva; but at that time the Bible was scarcely opened, so when he was ordained (1814) he had little heart for his profession. Shortly after, however, he was converted. For the greater part of his active life he was a missionary of the London Continental Society. He was of an active, restless disposition, but thus providentially spread the wider his flaming love for Christ. Many owed to him under God their conversion. He was no theologian; but as composer and poet he did superior service, and he has written some valuable works, among them, Histoire des frères de Bohême et de Moravie, Genève, 1831, 2 vols., particularly his Mé- es pouvant servir à l'histoire du réveil religieux, Genève, 1854, 1855, 2 vols. [See GUERS: Pré-réveil à Genève, 1871.] EDWARD BARDE.

BOSTON, Thomas, b. at Dunse, Berwickshire, Scotland, March 7, 1676; d. at Ettrick, May 20, 1707; was educated at the University of Edinburgh, and became minister of Simprin in 1699, and of Ettrick in 1707. He was a very voluminous writer, and has exercised great influence in Presbyterian churches in Scotland and England. The two works by which he is now best known are, The Crook in the Lot, a book for preachers, being the substance of several sermons; Human Nature in its Fourfold State of Primitivity, Entire Depravation, Begun Recovery, and Ultimate Happiness or Misery. The last was published in 1720. He left an autobiography, Memoirs, which appeared in 1776. A collected edition of his works was published in 12 vols., London, 1852.

BUJONOT, Elias, b. in Philadelphia May 2, 1782; d. at Burlington, N.J., Oct. 24, 1821; received a classical education, and studied law; was a member of Congress in 1782, and signed as one of the preliminaries of peace with Great Britain. He became a member of the Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions in 1812, and in 1816 was elected president of the American Bible Society, and devoted himself with great zeal and self-devotion to benevolent and philanthropical undertakings. He published: The Age of Revelation, Second Advent of the Messiah, 1815; and Travels in the West, or an Attempt to discover the lost Tribes of Israel, 1816.

BOURDALOUE, Louis, b. at Bourges, Aug. 20, 1632; d. in Paris, May 13, 1704; entered the Society of the Jesuits in 1648; was for some time a preacher in literature and rhetoric, then a preacher in the provinces, afterwards in Paris, and finally, after the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, in France, among the Protestants. As a preacher he was neither the magnificent oratory of Bossuet nor the sympathetic strain of Massillon: his strength is in the clearness of his argument, its cogency and its cogency. Many of his sermons have been translated into English, London, 1776.

One of the best recent editions is that of M. LAURAS: Bourdaloue, sa vie et ses sermons, Paris, 1881 (1,222 pages).

BOURIGNON, Antoinette, b. at Lille, Jan. 13, 1668; d. at Franeker, Oct. 30, 1680; grew up in a life of solitude and solitary because of her temper and physical deformities, spending her time in reading mystical and fantastical books; fled just before she was about to be married, and found refuge in a monastery near Cambrai, but was expelled on account of insubordination, and wandered about for the rest of her life in Flanders, France, and Northern Germany, gathering a following of restless enthusiasts around her, and engaged in the propagation of her views, which she thought the Church needed a thorough reformation. She held that there existed no more true Christians, that religious rites were superfluous, and true religion confined to an inner, mental process, etc. Her ideas found some adherents. Her works were edited (1679-86, 19 vols.), and her life written, by POIRET, Amsterdam, 1679, 2 vols. See Étude sur Ant. Bourignon, by M. E. S., Paris, 1876.

BOWER, Archibald, b. at Dundee, Jan. 17, 1686; d. in London, Sept. 3, 1766; was educated at Douay; went afterwards to Italy; became a Jesuit, and member of the Inquisition of Macerata. In 1726 he suddenly returned to England; became a member of the Established Church; was made librarian to the Queen in 1747, and occupied himself with literature. His principal work is his History of the Popes, 7 vols. 4to, London, 3d ed., 1750-66; which contains the most copious account of the Popes in the English language, but was very severely criticised on account of want of originality, and of the author's repeated changes of religion. Bishop DOUGLAS of Salisbury wrote against him, Bower and Tillemont compared, London, 1757.

BOWRING, Sir John, b. at Exeter, Oct. 17, 1792; d. Nov. 22, 1872. He distinguished himself as statesman, translator, and original author in prose and poetry: he is here mentioned for his hymns. He issued "Matins and Vespers, with Hymns and Devotional Pieces," 1823 (4th ed. 1851); "Hymns, as a Sequel to the Matins," 1825. His best known hymns probably are, "In the Cross of Christ I glory," and "We cannot always trace the way" (the latter has been erroneously credited to another).

BOY-BISHOP, a boy who figured in one of the mummeries so common in the middle ages. He was a cathedral-choir boy elected by his fellows on St. Nicholas' Day, Dec. 6: arrayed in episcopal robes, with mitre and crosier, and followed by his companions as priests, he made his entry into the cathedral; and, except the offering of mass, he discharged episcopal functions. He held this mock office until Innocents' Day, Dec. 28. If he died before the close of his term, he was buried in his robes. This absurd travesty was enacted in many parts of Europe. The returning sense of the Church was, however, shown by the sixteenth canon, fourth part of the decisions of the Council of Paris, 1212 (see Heftel Conciliengeschichte, 5th vol. p. 776), peremptorily forbidding them; but this was of merely national and temporary effect, for the practice continued. In 1542 Henry VIII. of England abolished the festival; but it was revived under Queen Mary, and so late as 1556 English boy-bishops are mentioned.

BOYLE and the BOYLE LECTURES. Robert Boyle, son of Richard Boyle, Earl of Cork, was born at Lismore Castle, in Ireland, Jan. 25, 1627, and educated at Eton. From 1638 to 1644 he lived at Geneva, studying natural science; and after his return he first settled on his estate, Stalbridge, then, since 1654, at Oxford, and finally, since 1668, in London, where he died Dec. 30, 1691. He was never married, and never held an office. His great mental gifts and his large fortune he devoted to the study of natural science and to labor for the kingdom of heaven. As a scientist he holds a very high rank; and he was one of the founders of the Royal Society (1662), which, indeed, grew out of that association of scholars to which he belonged while residing at Stalbridge. As a religionist, he wrote a number of theological essays, defrayed the expenses of the Irish translation of the New Testament, of the Malay translation of the Gospels and the Acts, of Pococke's Arabic translation of Grotius's De Veritate, etc., and instituted the Boyle Lectures, — eight sermons to be preached annually, by some one elected for the purpose, against Paganism, Judaism, Mohammedanism, Deism, and Atheism. Some of England's most prominent theologians have successively assumed the task, and thus a valuable body of apologetic literature has been produced. A selection of such sermons was given in 4 vols., by Gilbert Burnett, in 1737. A collected edition of Boyle's own works, with a life of him by BIRCH, was published in 6 vols. in London, 1772. See LECTURES.

BOYSE, or BOIS, John, b. at Nettlestead, Suffolk, Eng., Jan. 3, 1560; d. at Boxworth, Jan. 14, 1643; was so precocious that he could read the Bible in Hebrew when he was five years old; was fellow at Cambridge, where he specially cultivated Greek; became rector of Boxworth in 1583, and prebendary of Ely, 1615. He was appointed one of the translators of the authorized version, and was one of the company upon the Apocrypha. When it was finished, he joined, at their own urgent request, the company at work upon the section from Chronicles to Canticles, and was one of the delegates engaged in the final revision. He was one of the greatest scholars of his day in the Oriental languages. He assisted Sir Henry Savile in his edition of Chrysostom, Eton, 1613, 8 vols. folio, the first good edition. He left many manuscripts, but only one work has been published: Veteris interpretis cum Beza, aliisque recentioribus collatio in IV. Evangelii et Apostolorum Actis, London, 1655.

BRADFORD, John, b. at Manchester in the first decade of the sixteenth century; began to study law in the Temple, 1547, but went next year to Cambridge; studied theology, and was appointed chaplain to Edward VI. in 1552. On the accession of Mary, he was discharged, and committed to the Tower. In 1554 he was arraigned before Gardiner, Bonner, and others, and convicted of heresy; and June 1, 1555, he was burnt at Smithfield. His writings have been republished by the Parker Society, edited by Townsend, Cambridge, 1848. There is a Memoir of him by STEVENS, London, 1832.

BRADSHAW, William, a Puritan divine, b. at Market-Bosworth, Leicestershire, 1571; d. at Newhall, 1618. He was educated at Emmanuel College, Cambridge; obtained a fellowship at Sidney Sussex College, Cambridge; took orders, and in 1601 settled at Chatham in Kent; but, refusing to sign the Thirty-nine Articles, he was soon suspended, and obliged to remove. He at last was chosen lecturer of Christ Church, Newgate Street, London, but again got himself into trouble by his opposition to "ceremonies," and retired to his native county. He wrote: A Treatise of Divine Worship. Tending to prove that the Ceremonies imposed upon the Ministers of the Gospell in England, in present controuersie, are in their use unlawfull (1604); A Treatise on the Nature and Use of Things Indifferent [i.e., ceremonies] (1605); English Puritanisme. Containeing: The maine Opinions of the rigidest sort of those that are called Puritanes in the Realme of England (1605). This important work is given in outline in Neal, Harper's ed., vol. i.

pp. 248 sq. It was translated into Latin by William Ames, and republished in Frankfort, 1610. See DEXTER: Congregationalism as seen in its Literature, Bibliographical Appendix.

BRADWARDINE, Thomas (doctor profundus), b. 1290, probably at Hortfield, Cheshire; d. in London, Aug. 26, 1349; studied theology, philosophy, mathematics, and astronomy in Merton College, Oxford; became one of the proctors of the university in 1325; followed Edward III. as his confessor, since 1338, in his campaigns in France, and was chosen Archbishop of Canterbury, and consecrated at Avignon a few weeks before his death. His great work, De Causa Dei, more philosophical and metaphysical than theological in its character, was edited by Sir Henry Savile, London, 1618. Several of his mathematical works were published at Venice 1495, and again 1580. See G. LECHLER: Wicklif, I. pp. 234 sqq. [English translation by Peter Lorimer, D.D., London, 1878, 2 vols., vol. i. pp. 88-96.] G. LECHLER.

BRADY, Nicholas, b. at Bandon, Ireland, Oct. 28, 1659; d. at Richmond May 20, 1726; was educated at Christ Church, Oxford, and Trinity College, Dublin; settled, after the Revolution, in London; became minister of St. Catharine Cree and lecturer of St. Michael's in Wood Street, afterwards rector of Clapham, and finally of Richmond, and the chaplain of King William. He published (1726) a translation of the Aeneid in four volumes, a tragedy, "The Innocent Impostor," three volumes of sermons (1695-1724), and, in conjunction with Tate, a metrical translation of the Psalms, London, 1695, now ordinarily printed in the English Book of Common Prayer. See TATE, Nahum.

BRAHMA. See BRAHMANISM.

BRAHMANISM¹ is the term for the religion and practices originated and elaborated by the Brahmans, who are the highest of the four great classes, or castes, into which the Hindu people are divided, — the Brahmanas ("priests"), Kshatriyas ("soldiers"), Vaisyas ("agriculturists"), and Sudras ("servants"). Like other religions, Brahmanism has its sacred books and their official interpreters. The oldest portions of this collection are the Vedas ("knowledge"), or Sruti ("that which is directly heard or revealed"). The Vedas are divided again into Mantra ("the instrument of conveying thought"), prayer and praise, embodied in texts and metrical hymns; Brahmana, or ritualistic precept and illustration written in prose; and Upanishad, mystical or secret doctrine appended to the aforesaid Brahmana, written in prose and occasional verse, and "the only part of the Veda much studied and appealed to by educated Hindus in the present day."

There are four Samhitas, or collections of Mantra; viz., the Rigveda (upon which the others are based), the Samaveda, the Yajurveda, and the Atharvaveda. The word Veda is applied to that unwritten knowledge which came like breath from Brahman: hence the Veda is often called Brahman, a word variously interpreted, — "the universally diffused essence," or "the spirit of devotion," or "divine spiritual knowledge." The ymns of the Vedas embrace the earliest known hymns of the Aryan settlers of India. Dr. Monier Williams thinks they were probably composed by succession of poets, at different dates between 1000 and 1000 B.C. The oldest are found in the Rigveda: they number one thousand and seven-hundred, and express a nature-worship the purest known. The latest are those of the Atharvaveda, principally used as incantations for calling down and driving away curses. The Vedas, as a collection, are not easy or pleasant reading; but they throw light upon the quality of mind and the environment of our Aryan ancestors. They prove that the Aryan was a worshipper of nature, but had not learned to distinguish between the different objects of his worship: hence he gave them the generic name deva ("the shining ones"). "In the primitive worship of the manifold phenomena of nature it is not so much their physical aspect that impresses the human heart, as the moral and intellectual forces which are supposed to move and animate them." The primitive conception best seen in the Rigveda is gradually tarnished, taking on in the later hymns a more sensuous and anthropomorphic character. Epithets applied to the same divinity come at last separate divinities; until at a later period, after centuries of speculation, a theistic conception was arrived at, and this divine essence bore various names, such as Atma ("soul"), Kama ("desire"), Brahman ("devotion, prayer"). Metaphysical and theological speculations completely possessed the minds of the Brahmanas and the Upanishads; the compromise between polytheism and monotheism resulted in the composite pantheistic system which makes Prajapati ("lord of creations") the personal creator of the world, the manifestation of the impersonal Brahma, the universal, self-existent soul; and this is the characteristic dogma of the Brahmanical period. The Brahmanas, the second division of each Veda, were composed as a guide to the Brahmanical sacrifices. They developed the ritual. The latest dates perhaps from the seventh century B.C. They contain some very remarkable ideas; that "the gods were merely mortals till they were extorted immortality from the Supreme Being by sacrifices and austerities;" that the "lord of creatures offered himself a sacrifice for the benefit of the world;" that human sacrifices, although known, were so strongly repugnant to the Brahmins, that they legislated against them in favor of animal sacrifices. Thousands of animals were killed every day, until in disgust the people turned from the endless succession of bloody rites. The Upanishads, the third division of each Veda, which present the underlying doctrine, are philosophical. "There is one real Being in the universe, which Being also constitutes the universal soul." They are not earlier than 600 B.C., and they show the working of the Aryan mind upon religious and philosophic problems. They are more systematic than the earlier writings, and contain many original ideas and striking passages. The Upanishads, as enjoined by the Vedas, rests upon two ideas of the efficacy of prayer and of the efficacy of prayer. Prayer was especially emphasized: the Sanskrit word for the officiating priest was brah-

man ("one who prays"). The Pantheon of the early Hindus was thus developed. In the beginning was Brahma, sole and self-existent. He willed to create various creatures out of his own substance. Accordingly, by meditation, he produced the waters; into them he put a seed, which developed a golden egg; and from that egg he was born. But, as the people did not abandon their worship of the old gods to take up with any such abstraction, the priests, with singular tact, incorporated the most popular of these divinities with Brahma, and so the triad was formed,—Brahma ("the creator of all things"), Vishnu ("the preserver," who underwent ten avatars, or incarnations, to deliver the people from the tyranny of as many wicked princes), and Siva ("the destroyer"). Here was no trinity, for there was no unity, but a triad,—three co-ordinate male deities. To them three female deities were respectively consorts,—Vach or Saravati ("the goddess of speech or learning"), Sri or Lakshmi ("beauty, fortune"), and Uma or Parvati ("the daughter of Himavat," the god of the Himalaya mountains). The problem, what to do with the discarded gods of the Hindu pantheon, was solved by relegating them to the domain of Indra ("sky"), an intermediate sphere, into which men also can enter at death, if they have been obedient. The retinue of Indra consists of the Gandharvas ("genii") and their wives, the Apsaras, lovely nymphs whom the gods often select to tempt the pious devotee. The messenger between the gods and men is Narada, who sprang from the forehead of Brahma. The god of love is Kamadeva, or "the bodiless," so called because he was reduced to ashes by an angry glance from Siva, whom he had endeavored to make fall in love with Parvati, while at his (Siva's) devotions. The gods in this heaven of Indra resemble men in their liability to be reborn in a lower state, and also, therefore, in longing for emancipation from such a dread.

The peculiar institution which has given Indian life its distinctive flavor is caste. Professor Egge-ling states that "there can be no doubt that the Hindus do not feel, and perhaps never have felt, their class restrictions as being in any way burdensome, or still less a disgrace to them, and that even the lowest man looks upon his caste as a privilege as high as that of the Brahman." It is the opinion of the Brahmins that there is only one original caste now extant, viz., their own; all the others having resulted from successive intermixtures. The Brahman occupies his position for three reasons,—his assumed sanctity, his intellectual superiority, and his learning; for in the popular estimation he is not only a sharer in divinity, but acquainted with the sacred books, the Vedas, and also the Shastras and the Puranas, which are modern works, composed for the express purpose of promoting the worship of some particular deity. Mr. Sherring, in his Hindu Tribes and Castes, thus describes the Brahman's appearance: "Light of complexion, his forehead ample, his countenance of striking significance, his lips thin, and mouth expressive, his eyes quick and sharp, his fingers long, his carriage noble and almost sublime, the true Brahman, uncontaminated by European influence and manners, with his intense self-consciousness, with the proud conviction of superiority depicted in every muscle of his face, and manifest in every movement of his body, is a wonderful specimen of humanity, walking on God's earth."

Caste is later than the oldest Veda, for in the Rigveda it is unknown. The word means "color," and points to the contrast in color between the aboriginal Sudras and the conquerors, the Aryas. As among the latter only the priestly class held themselves aloof from marriage with the Sudras, therefore only this class kept the strain pure. In course of time the other castes were formed, distinguished, not now by color, but by occupation. The Kshatriyas are the governing and military class; the Vaisyas are the farmer and merchant class; the Sudras are the servants, particularly of the Brahmans, who take particular pains to keep them ignorant of both the theory and practice of religion. Between the Brahmans and the Kshatriyas there was a sharp and long contest; but, when the former were victorious, they riveted their chains upon the obedience of all lower castes by making themselves indispensable to the performance of any rite. They also framed laws which made any injury done to them a serious affair; while they might almost with impunity maltreat those of the lower castes. The three upper castes are styled the "Twice-born," because their sons are initiated into the study of the Veda, the management of the sacred fire and of the purifying rites, by a singular ceremony, — the rite of conducting a boy to a spiritual teacher, connected with which is the investiture with the sacred cord, ordinarily worn over the left shoulder and under the right arm, and varying in material according to the class of the wearer. In the case of girls there is no such rite, nor is there any such instruction. Marriage is, however, for them accepted as an equivalent. It is just in this matter of marriage that the caste system does most mischief; for it is forbidden by Hindu laws for a man to marry into a caste above his own, while it is allowable to marry in any or all those below, if he has already a wife of his own caste. If, however, he marries a Sudra, and has children by her, they are not admitted into the privileges of the "Twice-born."

But great social and religious changes are taking place in India. "It is satisfactory to know," says Dr. Williams, "that although it is too true that caste is still the very life and soul of Hinduism, and although this very caste is not without certain good points and advantages, yet some of its most vexatious rules are gradually giving way under the pressure of steam, electricity, and European influence. Many years ago, a Brahman who accidentally touched leather would have had to choose between public expiation, or degradation, and expulsion from caste; whereas in 1870 a Uriya Brahman held the post of sub-inspector of police in Puri itself, under the very shadow of Jagannath, although a leather belt formed part of his uniform." Again: no caste but the Brahman's pretends to fulfil the round of duties which lead to the supreme bliss, which is absorption into the one eternal soul, complete deliverance from the circle of births by which other souls are punished and purified. This round is divided into four stages: (1) Religious student, when the youth is studying the Vedas, and supports himself by begging from door to door; (2) Householder, for marriage is obligatory, else there would be no son to perform funeral-rites; (3) Anchorite, reached when the man is a grandfather, then he goes forth alone, or with his wife, to spend his time in the study of the profounder portions of the Vedas, living in the open air upon fruit, and trying to kill every worldly desire; (4) Religious mendicant, now he begs his food in the evening, lives in solitude, and meditates upon the divinity. In these days few Brahmans even are found earnest enough to go this round.

A decided change for the better is in the treatment of widows. Hindu law does not allow the remarriage of widows, and yet their treatment is outrageous. They are kept in complete seclusion, the object of scorn, abuse, and barbarous neglect; stripped of their jewels, clad in the coarsest garb, compelled to perform the most menial duties, and to eat the poorest food, avoided and despised as though they were criminals. So miserable is their condition, that it is not wonderful they should have preferred death to life, and therefore should have performed suttee, or voluntary immolation (which really is a comparatively modern institution; for the passage in the Rigveda quoted in its defence is really an exhortation to the widow to return home, and resume her usual life), burning themselves upon the pyre of their husbands. But tyrannical custom is no longer so formidable. The British Government thirty years ago succeeded in prohibiting suttee, and now, in most parts of India where the idea of widow-marriages was but lately repugnant, and considered tantamount to apostasy from the ancestral religion, and the first step towards denationalization, they are becoming common. This is especially true of Bombay, Bengal, and in the Panjáb.

It remains to speak of certain peculiar objects of Hindu worship, and of two great religious movements which have greatly affected Brahmanism. Three animals are most sacred, — the cow, the serpent, and the monkey. The first "typifies the all-yielding earth." There is a so-called "cow of plenty," of which images are sold in the bazaars, and everywhere revered. The serpent is the emblem of immortality, and especially associated with Siva. There is supposed to be a race of half-divine serpents existing in the nether regions. Monkeys "are inviolable, and never under any circumstances to be molested. Swarms of them are encouraged to infest the vicinity of temples and consecrated buildings, where they subsist upon the food offered them by pious worshippers." Plants are also sacred, and are worshipped. Thus the Tulsi plant is sacred to Vishnu, the Vilva to Siva, the Pipal to Brahma: it is invested with the sacred thread. Certain stones have religious value. Indeed, the pantheism of the Hindu philosophy puts God into every thing; so that there is not an object in earth or heaven which he is not prepared to worship. We are not surprised, therefore, to find sacred places. They are of all sizes, from Benares, the Hindu's Jerusalem or Mecca, down to mere hamlets. Rivers, too, come in for their share of adoration. Stately rivers like the Ganges naturally hold the first place. Bathing in them cleanses from the foulest sins. It is extremely meritorious to trace their course on foot, — a work of no small amount of labor. It takes six years to make such a pilgrimage of the Ganges.

Brahmanism has encountered one formidable check,—Buddhism. This new religion sprang up in India itself. It seemed likely to gain the mastery; but after a time it became so corrupt, that it no longer attracted the people; and when the support of the powerful kings who had protected it was withdrawn, it fell. According to the uncertain traditions which have come down to us, its suppression was accompanied with bloodshed. By the eleventh Christian century it had died out in India. Yet it was purer in its morality, and freer in its polity, than Brahmanism. It accepted the caste system, yet proclaimed the equality of all men in point of religious privilege. Nor have all traces of its existence vanished. "The humanizing spirit of its doctrines left a deep impress on the Hindu mind," and it also led to the doubtful institution of monasticism. The convents are called maths, and their superiors mahants. They are quite numerous in all parts of India. A qualified Buddhism exists at the present day in the important sect of the Jains. They reject the Vedas, yet retain belief in the Hindu gods. They pay great respect unto holy men who have, by conquering all worldly desire, raised themselves to divine perfection.

BRAHMO SOMAJ (worshipping-assembly) OF INDIA is the Theistic Church of India, which in its present position and power to the Babu Keshub Chunder Sen. The movement originated with the Rajah Ram Mohun Roy (b. Bombay, 1772; d. Bristol, Eng., 1833), who, on Jan. 23, 1830, organized in Calcutta the Brahmiya Somaj (Society of Brahmins). He held that if the oldest sacred books, particularly the Upanishads (the philosophical treatises), of the Vedas, were correctly interpreted, would be found to teach monotheism; and so, basing himself upon the primitive faith, he boldly dissuaded his landsmen from idolatry. But the sect made little progress until, in 1842, it was joined by Debendra Nath Tagore, who re-formed it, and led it unto success. He adopted European plans of propagandism, started a journal, published sectarian treatises, appointed teachers, and so succeeded in awakening wide-spread interest, leading to the formation of branch Somajes in different parts of Bengal. The idea of an authoritative revelation in the Vedas, which Roy had defended, was formally given up. In 1858 Keshub Chunder Sen joined the sect, and quickly showed himself to be a reformer. Roy was better versed in Christian than in Hindu theology. Tagore was conservative, and clung to the ancestral faith, although he was a radical in some lines. Sen developed an eclectic theology, very largely biblical, at least in the two principal doctrines of the Fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man. After a time, it became evident that the two parties in the Somaj must separate; and in February, 1865, a large number of the younger Brahmos left the Calcutta Somaj, and in November, 1866, they organized themselves into the "Brahmo Somaj of India;" while the conservative portion is called the "Adi (original) Brahmo Somaj." The three propositions announced by Sen, and which precipitated the disruption, were,—

- "1. That the external signs of caste distinctions, such as the Brahminical thread, should not be used. [See BRAHMANISM.]
- "2. That none but Brahmos of sufficient ability and good moral character, who lived consistently with their profession, should be allowed to conduct the services of the Somaj.
- "3. That nothing should be said in the Somaj expressive of hatred or contempt for other religions."

Under Sen, the Somaj was a grand spiritual force; for he is a man of extraordinary fervor and piety. He laid down the following Precepts of Practical Devotion (condensed):—

1. Pray unto God every day, and worship the Only Perfect, Infinite, Omnipresent, Omnipotent, Omniscient, All-merciful, and All-holy One.
 - (a) Carefully cut off all connection with every manner of idolatrous ceremony and festival.
2. Knowing God to be the common Father, thou shalt love every man as thy brother, and every woman as thy sister.
 - (b) Do not bear any emblem of idolatry.
 - (c) Do not join any ceremony, or encourage any movement, which upholds the distinction of caste.
- (3) Be truthful. (4) Be good unto others. (5) Deal justly. (6) Be forgiving. (7) Govern all thy passions, and keep them under restraint. (8) Faithfully perform thy domestic duties.

The movement is towards the Christian conception of doctrine and life. But, although reverencing Christ, they are essentially Unitarians. They have been well called the "Protestants" of India; for they protest against pantheism, polytheism, idolatry, caste, and the speculations which infidel English science spreads. Many of their adherents come from the government schools. They have churches in various parts of India.

In 1872 the "Native Marriage Act" was passed, which legalized marriages by Brahmic rites, required that the bridegroom should be at least eighteen, and the bride fourteen years old, and made bigamy a penal offence for any one marrying under the Act. This Act marked a wonderful progress in enlightened views. Greatly to the consternation of the Brahmō Somaj, Keshub Chunder Sen, who had been the prime mover in agitating for the Act, and who was so generally revered, was the first to countenance a wilful departure from his own principles; for in 1878 he married his eldest daughter, aged thirteen, to the minor rajah of Kuch Behar, aged sixteen, and, furthermore, with Hindu marriage-rites. The marriage evoked great opposition on account of its un-Brahmic character; and a split, in consequence, took place in the Brahmō Somaj, and at the present day (1881) the adherents of Keshub Chunder Sen are a decided minority. It was a grievous disappointment to his followers to find the leader of the Brahmō Somaj ready to sacrifice principle to personal interest. Since 1878 Sen has certainly acted very strangely, issuing blasphemous proclamations, and showing a desire to approach the Hindu idolatry, which he once so emphatically and manfully renounced. Nevertheless the movement which he so powerfully aided makes daily progress, which shows that it has life independent of the great leader. The sect has a hundred and thirty small churches scattered over the country, and celebrated in 1880 its semi-centennial with pride and gratitude. The normal type of a Brahmō church embraces these features:—

Religious.

- (1) Congregational worship at least once a week.
- (2) Religious festivals on special occasions.
- (3) Strictly Brahmic ceremonies at births, marriages, and deaths.
- (4) A religious conversation-class for zealous members.
- (5) A theistic library.
- (6) Diffusion of principles by mission-tours, tracts, and a periodical.

Philanthropic.

- (1) Charitable donations to the poor and disabled.
- (2) Dispensaries for the sick.
- (3) Societies for the discouragement of intemperance, premature marriages, and other evils.

Educational.

- (1) Instruction of women by various methods.
- (2) Schools for boys and girls.
- (3) Night-schools for working-men.

The movement seems adapted to promote education and virtue, the vanguard of the Christian Host.

SAMUEL M. JACKSON.

BRAINERD, David, a celebrated missionary to the Indians; b. at Haddam, Conn., April 20, 1718; d. at Northampton, Oct. 9, 1747. His father, Hezekiah Brainerd, was a member of the King's Council for that colony: his mother, Dorothy, was the daughter of Rev. Jeremiah Hobart, and, by a previous marriage, the mother of Jeremiah Mason, grandfather of the great lawyer of that name. At the age of fourteen he was left an orphan. He was a thoughtful boy, inclined to melancholy, and full of religious feeling. His account of the spiritual struggles that preceded his conversion is very striking. In 1739 he entered Yale College, where he stood first in his class. In February, 1742, he was expelled, very unjustly, as he and his friends always felt. It was the time of "The Great Awakening." He was in sympathy with the "New Lights," as those who followed Whitefield and Tennent were called; and an indiscreet remark, to the effect that one of the tutors "had no more grace than that chair," having been overheard, and reported to the rector, occasioned his expulsion. Later he made a very manly acknowledgment of his error, and asked to be allowed to take his degree; but, in spite of the intercession of Jonathan Edwards and others, his request was refused. This caused so much indignation among his friends as to have led, it is said, to the founding of Princeton College. In July, 1742, he was licensed to preach, and in April, 1743, began to labor as a missionary at Kaunameek, an Indian village between Stockbridge and Albany. He lived in a little cabin built by himself, and lodged upon a bundle of straw. His food was chiefly boiled corn, hasty-pudding, and samp. Here he continued for a year. Declining repeated calls to churches at home, in June, 1744, he was ordained at Newark, N.J., as a missionary of the Scottish "Society for Propagating Christian Knowledge," to the Indians at the forks of the Delaware, near the present town of Easton, Penn. In June, 1745, he started a mission at Crossweeksung, near Freehold, N.J. Here his success was wonderful; and here, with the exception of a journey through the forest to the Indians on the Susquehanna, he toiled until the spring of 1747, when, in consequence of the hardships he had endured, his health broke down, and he was advised to seek relief by travel in New England. In July he returned from Boston to Northampton, where, in the home of Jonathan Edwards, and nursed by Jerusha, the young daughter of the great theologian, to whom he was engaged,—herself a youthful saint,—this eminent servant of God passed his last days. He entered into rest Oct. 9, 1747, in the thirtieth year of his age. Brainerd's career was very brief, and in visible results it was far surpassed by that of David Zeisberger, not to mention other Moravian missionaries among the Indians. His great work was the priceless example of his piety, zeal, and self-devotion. Herein, since the days of the apostles, none have surpassed him. And his uncommon intellectual gifts, his fine personal qualities, his melancholy and his early death, as well as his remarkable holiness and evangelistic labors, have conspired to invest his memory with a peculiar halo. The story of his life has been a potent force in the modern missionary era. It is related of Henry Martyn, that, "perusing the life of David Brainerd, his soul was filled with a holy emulation of that extraordinary man; and, after deep consideration and fervent prayer, he was at length fixed in a resolution to imitate his example." Brainerd was a representative man, formed both by nature and grace to leave a lasting impression upon the piety of the Church. He is the missionary saint of New England. BRAINERD, John, a brother of David, b. at Haddam, Conn., Feb. 28, 1720, and d. at Deerfield, N.J., March, 1781. He was graduated at Yale College in 1746, and in 1747 took his brother's place as missionary to the Indians. He also labored as a home missionary among the whites. From 1754 to his death he was a trustee of the College of New Jersey. He was a modest, meek man, and a devoted servant of Christ. The Life of John Brainerd, by Rev. T. BRAINERD, Phila., 1865. G. L. BRAINERD, Thomas, D.D., a Presbyterian divine, b. at Leyden, N.Y., June 17, 1804; d. at Scranton, Penn., Aug. 22, 1866. His father, Jesse Brainerd, was a great-grandson of James Brainerd, brother of Hezekiah, the father of David and John, the missionaries. He was converted under the preaching of the Rev. Charles G. Finney, while a student of law at Rome. Before completing his legal studies, he decided to prepare for the ministry. After three years in the theological seminary at Andover, he became in 1831 pastor of the Fourth Presbyterian Church in Cincinnati. In March, 1837, he was installed over the Pine-street Church in Philadelphia, where he spent the rest of his days. Dr. Brainerd was a bosom-friend of Lyman Beecher and Albert Barnes. He was a man of superior gifts, genial, whole-souled, and full of zeal for God. His appointment by the New-School General Assembly at St. Louis, in 1866, as chairman of its committee of conference on re-union, shows the high esteem in which he was held by that branch of the Presbyterian Church. Dr. Brainerd was an effective writer for the religious press, and the author of a valuable Life of John Brainerd. During the war he was distinguished for his patriotic ardor and services. Life of Rev. Thomas Brainerd, D.D., Phila., by M. Brainerd, 1870. G. L. P.

BRAMHALL, John, b. at Pontefract, Yorkshire, Eng., in 1593; d. in Dublin, June, 1663; was educated at Cambridge; became chaplain to the Archbishop of York in 1623; went to Ireland in 1633, and was made Bishop of Londonderry in 1634; lived in exile during the Revolution, but returned to Ireland after the Restoration; and was made Archbishop of Armagh in 1661. Of his writings, among which his controversies with Molière and with Hobbes are the most remarkable, a collected edition in one volume folio was published in Dublin, 1677, and republished in 2 vols., Oxford, 1842-45, accompanied with a sketch of his life.

BRANDT, Gerard, b. in Amsterdam, July 25, 1608; d. there Dec. 11, 1685; was first pastor of the Remonstrant Church in Nieukoop, then, since 1640, at Hoorn, and finally, since 1667, in Amsterdam. He wrote a History of the Reformation in the Low Countries (4 vols., 1671-1704), translated into English by Chamberlayne, London, 1702-23, 4 vols. fol., and lives of Barneveldt, etc.

BRANT, Sebastian, b. at Strassburg, 1457; d. there 1521; studied law and literature at Basel; was made syndicus of his native city in 1501.

He was a very prolific writer, both on law and belles-lettres, and is the author of the famous satirical poem Das Narrenschiff, 1494, translated into Latin, French, and English, often imitated, and used as text for comments and moral reflections. BARCLAY'S Ship of Fools, 1509, is a free imitation. WATSON gave an abridged prose translation in 1517. BRAY, Thomas, D.D., b. at Marton, in Shropshire, 1656; d. in London, Feb. 15, 1730. He took his degree of M.A. at Oxford, 1693; founded the "Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts," 1698; and was from March 1700 to 1701 in Maryland, U.S.A., as commissary for organizing Episcopal churches, being sent out by Bishop Compton. In 1706 he became rector of St. Botolph, Aldgate, London. He was a faithful pastor, particularly interested in the improvement of the people by parochial libraries. His principal publications were Catechetical Lectures, which induced Bishop Compton to appoint him his commissary; Bibliotheca parochialis, vol. I. (all written), 1697, 2d ed., 1707, a manual for the clergy; Papal Usurpation and Tyranny, ancient and modern, 1712 (published anonymously). A Memoir of him was published in London, 1848, by the "Bray Associates."

BRAZIL. The Roman-Catholic Church, introduced by the Portuguese when they took possession of the country in 1500, and propagated among the natives, first by Franciscans, and, since 1549, by Jesuits, is the Church of the State, and comprises, besides the Archbishopric of Bahia, 11 bishoprics and 1,333 parishes. But the Church is completely dependent upon the State: it has no property of its own. Its officials are paid, and very poorly paid, by the State. The bishops and even the priests are appointed by the emperor. The monasteries, of which there are ninety-one, are rapidly closing, as, by a law of 1860, they are forbidden to receive novices. Other confessions are tolerated, and are now allowed to have public worship, but not to build churches with spires and bells. Of late many favors have been granted to the Protestants. The German immigration, which began in 1824, has become quite important, and most of the immigrants are Protestants. For many years these Protestants lived without any proper ministerial care, choosing some laymen to act as ministers (Schnapps-pfarrer), and consecrate their marriages. But since the arrival of Dr. Borchard in 1864, and by the active support of the Comité für die protestantischen Deutschen in Südbrasilien, formed at Barmen, and the mission-house of Basel, the religious life of the Protestant congregations has much improved. The Presbyterian Church (North) has recently established a mission in Brazil. See the reports of the Committee of Barmen, especially No. V.

Brazil was a colony of Portugal up to 1822, when its independence was declared. The constitution of 1824, still in force, states that "the Roman-Catholic religion will continue to be the religion of the State; but all sects will be tolerated, provided that they should hold worship in special buildings put up for the purpose, without the external form of churches." The constitution also determines that no bulls or apostolic constitutions shall be published and promulgated in the empire by the Roman-Catholic authorities without the placet of the sovereign. The appointment of the bishops by the Pope is also subject to the approval of the government. The liberty of the press is guaranteed, except as to denying the existence of God and the immortality of the soul. Brazil is a Roman-Catholic province, with one archbishop (in Bahia), who is the primate, and ten bishops. The clergy are mostly Portuguese and Italian, and they exert but little influence on the government and people.

There are a good number of Protestant churches in Brazil, principally in Rio de Janeiro, São Paulo, and Rio Grande do Sul. Several foreign missionary societies have missions in the empire, and there are half a dozen native Protestant ministers.

In 1873 there was a serious conflict between the State and the Established Church. The young and intelligent Bishop of Pernambuco tried to enforce some of the injunctions of the Papal Syllabus of 1864, among them those against the Freemasons, some of whom he expelled from a certain brotherhood. The question was submitted to the government; but the bishop disobeyed orders, and was then tried by the Supreme Court, and condemned to prison. His colleague of Tará was also tried for a similar offence, and equally condemned. Later on, however, both were released; and the question of how far the Roman-Catholic Church itself is free in Brazil is precisely where it was before 1873. The fact is, that the constitution fails to satisfy either the Protestants or the Roman-Catholics. See FLETCHER and KIDDER: Brazil, 9th ed., Boston, 1878.

BRECKENRIDGE, John, b. at Cabell's Dale, Ky., July 4, 1797; d. near Lexington, Ky., Aug. 4, 1841; studied in the Theological Seminary of Princeton, and was chaplain to the House of Representatives, 1822-23; pastor of a Presbyterian Church, Lexington, Ky., 1823-26; secretary of the Board of Education of the Presbyterian Church in Philadelphia, 1831-36; professor of theology at Princeton, 1836-38; secretary of the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions, 1838-40. At the time of his death he was president-elect of Oglethorpe University, Georgia. He published his famous discussion with Bishop Hughes of New York under the title, Roman-Catholic Controversy, Philadelphia, 1836, and some minor controversial essays.

BRECKENRIDGE, Robert Jefferson, D.D., LL.D., an eminent Presbyterian minister; b. at Cabell's Dale, Ky., March 8, 1800; d. at Danville, Ky., Dec. 27, 1871; a graduate of Union College, New York, in 1819. He practised law in Kentucky for eight years (1823-31), and meanwhile was several times in the State Legislature; but, convinced of his duty, he turned from law to theology, and in 1832 he became pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of Baltimore, and rapidly made his mark as a preacher. In 1845 he accepted the presidency of Jefferson College, but in 1847 returned to the pastorate, and from that date unto 1853 discharged the double duty of minister to the First Presbyterian Church in Lexington, and superintendent of public instruction for the State. In 1853 he entered the chair of theology in Danville Seminary, Kentucky, and held it until death. Like his brother John, he interested himself in the Roman-Catholic controversy, and attacked the Roman Church without mercy as "the great apostasy," and enemy of progress and religious liberty. The public-school system of Kentucky is largely his creation. During the civil war he defended the Union cause. During his residence in Baltimore he edited the Literary and Religious Magazine and the Spirit of the Nineteenth Century; but his principal work is upon The Knowledge of God, Objectively and Subjectively considered, 2 vols., N.Y., 1857, 1859. Dr. Breckenridge was the author of the Act and Testimony (1834), complaining of the prevalence of doctrinal errors, the relaxation of discipline, and the violation of church order, which played such an important part in the disruption of the Presbyterian Church. He was a staunch Old-School Presbyterian theologian, and opposed the re-union of the two branches of the Presbyterian Church, which took place in 1869.

BRECKLING, Friedrich, b. at Handewitt in Schleswig, 1629; d. in the Hague, 1711; studied theology at various German universities, and read with great avidity the works of Tauler and other mystics; was appointed a chaplain in the Danish army in 1657, and pastor of Handewitt in 1659, but was deposed in 1660 on account of his violent attacks on the officials of the Danish Church; fled to Holland, and was made pastor of Zwoll, but was deposed also here, and from a similar reason (1665), after which he lived in retirement in Amsterdam and the Hague. He stood in connection with all the revivalists and religious enthusiasts of his time, also with the Pietists, and was himself very busily engaged as a writer, though without making any impression. A list of his works and a life have been given by JOH. MÖLLER, in his Cimbria Litterata, III. p. 72. Also ADELUNG has written a life of him in his Geschichte d. menschlichen Thorheit, 4, p. 16.

BREITHAUP, Joachim Justus, b. at Nordheim, February, 1658; d. at Kloster Bergen, March 16, 1732; studied theology at Helmstedt and Kiel; and lived for some time in Francfort, together with Spener, whose plans of regenerating the Protestant Church he fully adopted; was in 1685 appointed court-preacher to the Duke of Meiningen; 1687, professor of theology at Erfurt; and 1691, professor of theology at Halle, where, together with Francke and Anton, he gave the whole theological study its peculiar character and tendency. In 1705 he was made superintendent-general of Magdeburg, and in 1709 Abbot of Kloster Bergen, in which positions he had an opportunity to carry out his principles in practice. Besides a number of minor writings, he published Institutiones Theologicae, Halle, 1694, 2 vols., much extended, 1732, 3 vols., and Theses Credendorum et Agendorum Fundamentales, Halle, 1700. See G. A. FRANCKE: Das gesegnete Gedächtniss des seligen Breithaupt, Halle, 1736, fol. DRYANDER.

BREITINGER, Johann Jacob, b. at Zürich, April 19, 1575; d. there April 1, 1645; studied theology at Franeker, Heidelberg, and Basel; was appointed minister of St. Peter's Church in Zürich in 1613; represented the church of Zürich at the synod of Dort; and exercised on all the

of his native city an authority equal to that of Zwingli and Bullinger. His writings are mostly of a practical character. His life was written by J. C. MÖRIKOFER, Zürich, 1874.

BREMEN. Charlemagne founded here a bishopric in 787, under the metropolitan authority of the Archbishop of Cologne. But when, in 850, Hamburg was burnt down by the heathen Danes, the archiepiscopal see of that city, with its metropolitan authority over all the Scandinavian countries, was removed to Bremen, which occasioned protracted and vehement controversies between the archbishops of Cologne. Though in the Scandinavian countries were formed independent metropolitan provinces, under the Archbishop of Lund, and though the city of Bremen threw off its feudal allegiance to the Archbishop in 1284, and became a free city, and member of the Hanseatic League, the Archbishop of Bremen still continued to be one of the most powerful prelates of Germany. In the course of the Reformation was introduced (1522-27) without causing any great trouble; during the Smalcaldian War the city sustained a long siege with great heroism. But in the latter part of the sixteenth century heavy disturbances arose from the conflict between Lutheranism and Calvinism. In 1562 all Lutherans were expelled from the city. Hamburg, Lübeck, and the other members of the Hansa, interfered, and declared that they would have no dealings with the heretical city. In 1568 the Lutherans were allowed to return, though under certain restrictions. At present the majority of the inhabitants, 67,533, are Lutherans; 21,127 are Reformed; 4,164, Roman-Catholics; 245, other confessions; and 498, Jews.

RENZ, Johann, b. at Weil, Württemberg, Sept. 24, 1499; d. at Stuttgart, Sept. 11, 1570; studied at Heidelberg; and was ordained priest in 1522 by the Bishop of Spire, and appointed pastor at the free city of Hall in Suabia, 1522. The appearance of Luther had made a deep impression on him, and gradually he espoused all the ideas of the Reformation. In 1523 he ceased to receive the mass; and in the next year he not only abandoned the new ideas, but re-organized the church of Hall on the basis of them. He was eminently successful, resisting the insurrection of the peasants with the same firmness as the inmates of the Roman priests. But with the Smalcaldian War his days of trouble began. In 1525 Hall was taken by the imperial troops, and he had to flee. He found refuge with Duke Ulrich of Württemberg; and, having been appointed minister of the Collegiate Church of Stuttgart in 1553, he established the Reformation in that country, distinguishing himself equally as a pastor, organizer, and administrator. In the course of the controversies of the time he took an active part, especially in that concerning the Lord's Supper, in which he placed himself on the side of Luther, and wrote the famous Syngramma in 1525. The only collected edition of his works is unfinished, Tübingen, 1576-90, 8 vols. His life was written by HARTMANN and JÄGER, Stuttgart, 1840-42, 2 vols., and by JULIUS HARTMANN, in Väter d. luth. Kirche, vol. VI., Leipzig, 1862. See PRESSEL, Anecdota Brentianae, 1868.

BRETHREN OF THE COMMON LIFE (Fratres communis vitae; Fratres devoti; Fratres bonae voluntatis; Fratres collationarii), a free Christian association which flourished in the transition period between the middle ages and the Reformation. It was formed, not in direct opposition to the Church, but simply as a kind of supplement, as an organ of the true evangelical spirit which had become nearly lost in the elaborate system of doctrines and rites. It nowise protested against the world-encompassing aspirations of the Church; but it strove within this splendid organization to realize the simple and severe ideas of the apostolic age. Its principal impulse was mysticism, but a mysticism free of all pantheistic and antinomistic tendencies: all its ends were sober, practical, and moral. The association was founded by Gerhard Groot (1340-84), whose life has been written by Thomas à Kempis. Awakened to full consciousness of the seriousness of human life, he wandered about for some time in the diocese of Utrecht as a lay-preacher, until the jealousy of the priests, and especially of the mendicant monks, prevented him from pursuing this line of work. A visit to the priory of Johann Ruysbroek opened another avenue to him. Having returned to his native city, Deventer, he gathered a number of young men, who, under his leadership, engaged to aid each other in leading a Christian life, to occupy themselves by studying the Bible, and copying useful books, to help other people directly and indirectly in their struggle for Christian perfection, etc. The common labor led to a common purse, the common purse to full community of life, and thus the first brother-house was formed at Deventer. After the death of Groot, Florentius (1350-1400), whose life has also been written by Thomas à Kempis, became the leader of the association. He founded a monastery for regular canons at Vindesen, another at St. Agnetenberg, near Zwolle; and the association began to spread very rapidly. During the course of the fifteenth century, nearly every larger town between the ocean and Merseburg, and between the Baltic and the frontiers of Suabia, contained one or more such brother or sister houses. The community of property, occupation, station, etc., which ruled in these houses, did not depend upon a vow such as in the monasteries. It was entirely voluntary, the free expression of love. Generally twenty brethren or sisters lived together, and formed a family. Peculiar offices were those of the Scriptuarius, Librarius, Magister Novitiorum, Infirmarius, and Hospitarius. At the head of the house stood the rector, chosen by the members; and all houses found their common centre in the great father-house of Deventer. With respect to the external world, the principal office of the association was education, both directly by schools and teaching of children, and indirectly by preaching, lecturing, and the diffusion of good books. School education had hitherto been confided to the mendicant orders, but very poorly performed by them. In this field the Brethren of the Common Life actually worked a revolution. Nevertheless, during the course of the sixteenth century the association lost its significance and its importance in this respect as in many others. After the Reformation, schools were founded by the State, and put much more powerfully in operation. The printing-press made the copying of books completely superfluous, a waste of time. The sermon had become a prominent part of divine service; and preaching in the vernacular tongue was now part of the office of every clergyman, etc. Thus the very purposes for which the association had been formed were now fulfilled; and after producing many great men, such as Thomas à Kempis, Busch, Lange, Hegius, etc., and leaving behind itself a venerable memory, it gradually disappeared.

BRETHREN OF THE FREE SPIRIT, a sect which flourished in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, and forms one of the most remarkable instances of heresy during the middle ages, on account of the Pantheism they taught, and the practical inferences they drew from their theory. Their doctrines may be learned from the letters of the Archbishop of Cologne (1306) and the Bishop of Strassburg (1317), and from the edicts of Clement V. (1311) and John XXII. (1330); which documents are found in Mosheim, De Beghards, Leipzig, 1790. The principal points of their theory were: all that is God; man is God, and there is no difference between God and man. A separation, however, between God and man is caused by sin; but the union may be re-established through the consciousness of its possibility and necessity. In this state man cannot sin any more. All he does is good, as he is above all differences. Of the Church and the moral law he has no more need. Virtue is something subordinate, something relative, etc. The origin of the sect is obscure, though generally ascribed to the influence of Amalrich of Bena, condemned in Paris, 1210. In 1212 Ortlieb taught at Strassburg that man should ab exterioribus abstinere et sequi responsa Spiritus intra se. In 1216 similar principles were preached in Switzerland. In 1230 they appeared at Lyons, mixed up with the doctrines of the Waldenses. In the middle of the thirteenth century they occurred in Cologne and Suabia; and in the fourteenth century they spread over the regions of the Rhine, Holland, and Northern France. The sect called itself Brethren of the Free, or of the New, Spirit; but also other names occur, as, for instance, Turlipins in Paris, Hominnes Intelligentiæ in Brussels, etc. In Germany they were often confounded with the Beghards. They were vigorously pursued, both by the popes and the Inquisition; but the sect was still alive in the middle of the fifteenth century. BRETSCHNEIDER, Karl Gottlieb, b. at Gersdorf, Saxony, Feb. 11, 1776; d. at Gotha, Jan. 22, 1848; studied theology at Leipsic, and was appointed minister at Schneeberg in 1807, superintendent at Annaberg in 1808, and superintendent-general at Gotha in 1816. He was a very prolific writer, contributed frequently to various periodicals, took active part in controversies, and wrote independent works, both on exegesis and dogmatics. His principal works are: Lexicon manuale Græcæ latinum in libros N. T., Leipzig, 1829; Systematische Entwicklung aller in der Dogmatik vorkommenden Begriffe, 1805; and Handbuch der Dogmatik, 1814, which ran through many editions. They represent the stand-point of the so-called rational supernaturalism, — a rather untenable ground, intermediate between rationalism and supranaturalism. But, though destitute of genuine religious life and speculative talent, they are distinguished by clearness of arrangement, and acuteness in the definitions. His autobiography was published by his son, Gotha, 1851, and attracted much attention. [Parts of it have been translated into English for the Bibliotheca Sacra.] HAGENBACH.

BREVIARY (Breviarium) denotes an office-book of the Roman-Catholic Church which contains the offices for the canonical hours (see title), in distinction to the missal, which contains those of the mass. The name has been variously explained. Most probably it means the abbreviation of the "missale plenarium," and was originally compiled for the direction of the choir. The word itself is certainly very old; for it was in common use when Micrologus, i.e., Ivo, Bishop of Chartres (1125), wrote his De ecclesiasticis observationibus. The breviary was a growth. It consists of the Psalms, arranged for a weekly reading or singing. These form the foundation, and come first in order of time; next antiphons before and after the Psalms; readings from the Scriptures, the Fathers, the lives of saints and martyrs; and, finally, hymns, which were introduced in the face of great opposition, especially in Rome. Gregory VII. (1073-85) reduced this growth to reasonable limits; and the Breviary now in common use, dating from Pius V. (1566-72), is the repeated revision of his work. In former times, besides the Roman Breviary and the monastic, which followed that made by Benedict in the sixth century, and which differ very much from the secular kind, the Ambrosian, now confined to Milan, and the Mozarabic, now used only in Toledo, were widely used. From an unaccepted revision made in 1536 by Cardinal Quignon for Clement VII., the Morning and Evening Prayers of the English Prayer-Book were condensed.

The use of the Breviary at the eight canonical hours being impracticable to any other than a "religious" (monk or nun), the secular clergy are allowed to group hours, and say them at the most convenient time. But monks and nuns are enjoined by the Council of Trent to repeat the Breviary as it stands. Many of the readings about the saints are absurd. Hence there arose in France a strong revisionary spirit, really coming from Port Royal, which carried a great reform. The original intention to read the entire Psalter once a week was again carried out; for the multiplication of saints upon the calendar had pushed the Psalter aside, and the whole service was much simplified. But, under the leadership of the Count de Montalembert, a movement was suc-essfully carried on against this Revised Breviary, and it has been suppressed in every place except Lyons.

Breviaries have appendices of miscellaneous character, — prayers to the Virgin Mary, for the dead, etc.; but the bulk of the volume is subdivided into four parts, — (1) the Psalterium (the Psalter); (2) the Proprium de Tempore (the Proper of the season), containing those portions of the offices which vary with the season; (3) the Proprium Sanctorum (Proper of the Saints), the corresponding portions for the saints' festivals; (4) the Commune Sanctorum (Common of the Saints), or such festivals which possess no particular form of prayer.

In the Greek Church there is a Breviary Ἐρολόγιον (Horologium), which contains prayers for the canonical hours, a complete calendar (Menologium), and different liturgical appendices.

In the Lutheran and Episcopal Churches modifications and translations of the Breviary Romanum are now in use.

BREWSTER, William, the "Elder of Plymouth;" b. at Scrooby, Eng., in 1566; d. at Plymouth, April 16, 1644; the son of a gentleman of property and position. Educated at Cambridge University, he entered the public service at twenty-one, and went with William Davison, "that excellent and unlucky secretary" of Queen Elizabeth, on a mission to the Netherlands as confidential private secretary. On the disgrace of his chief, he returned to Scrooby. Here was the starting-point of the Pilgrim Fathers. In the manor house, his father's residence, the "Protestant Non-conformists" gathered. Of this church Brewster was ruling elder, and John Robinson teacher. In 1607 the little band, after repeated malignant persecution, was compelled to emigrate, and went to Amsterdam, where they staid a year, and then to Leyden. "Mr. Brewster, who had been reduced almost to poverty by his charities and munificent aid to his struggling brethren, earned his living by giving lessons in English, having composed a grammar, according to the Latin model, for the use of his pupils. He also set up a printing establishment, and published many controversial works" (Motley: John of Barneveldt, II. 188). But in 1620 a portion of the congregation sailed for New England, and landed Nov. 21. Brewster was their spiritual head; but, not being ordained, he never administered the sacraments, although he preached regularly on the Lord's Day.

BRICOMNET, Guillaume, b. in Paris, 1470; d. at Aimans, near Montereau-sur-Yonne, Jan. 25, 1544; was a son of Cardinal Bricomnet, Archbishop of Narbonne; and was made Bishop of Lodève in 1504, and of Méaux in 1516. He was possessed of a good classical education, and was twice sent as ambassador to the papal court; but a mystic by natural disposition, a pupil of Lefèvre d'Étaples, and a friend of Marguerite d'Angoulême, he soon came in a difficult position with respect to the Roman Church. He was a friend of reforms, and compelled the clergy of his diocese to reside in the places where they were appointed. He chose Lefèvre for his vicar-general, and invited Farrel, and others who had been engaged in disseminating the ideas of the Reformation, to come to Méaux, and preach. The result was the formation of a Protestant colony at Méaux. But Bricomnet's ideas of reform fell very far short of a breach with the Roman Church; and, when the opposition to the Reformation became serious, he was compelled to allow, and even to employ, very harsh measures against his own work. Of his correspondence with Marguerite d'Angoulême parts have been published by Génin, in Lettres de Marguerite d'Angoulême, Paris, 1841, and Nouvelles Lettres de la Reine de Navarre, Paris, 1842.

BRIDAINE, Jacques, b. at Chuselan, March 21, 1701; d. at Roquemare, Sept. 22, 1767; was educated in the Jesuit College in Avignon, and in the seminary of La Congrégation des Missions royales de Saint-Charles de la Croix; visited as a missionary preacher almost every city and town of Southern and Central France; came to Paris in 1744, and produced everywhere a deep impression by his sermons, which are sombre and vehement, but full of genius and sincerity. They appeared at Avignon in 1823, in five volumes. His life was written by CARRON, Le Modèle des Prêtres, Paris, 1804.

BRIDGE, William, Puritan divine, b. 1600; d. at Great Yarmouth, March 12, 1670; he was a fellow of Emmanuel College, Cambridge; preached at Norwich; was silenced by Bishop Wren for nonconformity (1637), afterwards excommunicated; but when the writ de excommunicato capiendo came out against him, he withdrew to Holland, and became pastor to the English Church at Rotterdam, where Jeremiah Burroughs was preacher. In 1642 he returned to England; was a member of the Westminster Assembly; after a time was chosen minister of Great Yarmouth, but ejected 1662. He was a Congregationalist (Independent), a Calvinist, a learned man, and had a library rich in the fathers and the schoolmen, of which he made diligent use. Neal says also, that "he was a good preacher, a candid and charitable man, and did much good by his ministry." Bridge published Babylon's Downfall, a sermon, London, 1641; also a collected edition of his works, 4 vols. 4to, 1649; and, as conclusive proof of the esteem in which he is still held, there appeared a new, and, for the first time, complete edition of his Works, London, 1845, 5 vols. 8vo: the Works are mostly sermons. See Neal's History of the Puritans, vol. ii. p. 270 (Harper's ed.).

BRIDGET, St. (Brigida), the "Mary of the Irish," d. in 523, was the daughter of a certain Duptach, and born at Fochart Muirthemne, Leinster. In her fourteenth year she took the veil in the Monastery of Meath; obtained a great fame for holiness; founded the monasteries of Kildare, Hay in Counaught, Cliagh in Munster, etc.; and was buried at Kildare, where a perpetual fire was lit in her honor, and kept up until 1220, when the bishop of the place forbade the superstition. This fire of St. Brigida, as well as many other traits in her life, such as described by Ultan, Aileran, Cogitosus, Chilianus, Laurentius of Dunelm, and in the Act. Sanct., February, pp. 99-183, indicates that the old Pagan worship of the goddess Ceridwen, the Ceres of the Kelts, who had her principal temple at Kildare, was continued in the worship of St. Bridget. BRIDGEWATER TREATISES. By his death (Feb. 11, 1829) Francis Henry, Earl of Bridgewater, left eight thousand pounds to the Royal Society, to be paid to one or several authors, selected by the president, for writing a treatise "On the Power, Wisdom, and Goodness of God, as manifested in the Creation." The following eight authors were selected, and their treatises published (1833-40): (1) Thomas Chalmers: The Adaptation of External Nature to the Moral and Intellectual Condition of Man, (2) John Kidd: The Adaptation of External Nature to the Physical Condition of Man, (3) William Whewell: Astronomy and General Physics considered with reference to Natural Theology, (4) Charles Bell: The Hand, its Mechanism and Vital Endowments as evincing Design, (5) Peter Mark Roget: Animal and Vegetable Physiology considered with reference to Natural Theology, (6) William Buckland: Geology and Mineralogy considered with reference to Natural Theology, (7) William Kirby: The Habits and Instincts of Animals with reference to Natural Theology, (8) William Prout: Chemistry, Meteorology, and the Function of Digestion considered with reference to Natural Theology

BRIEFS, BULLS, and BULLARIUM, Papal. The word "bull" is from the Latin bulia, which literally means "any object made round by swelling up;" hence a drop, and so used of the "drop" of metal which bore the seal attached to a document; and at last the word came to stand for the document itself. "Brief" is from the later Latin breve, a short catalogue, or summary. A papal bull of the present day is an open letter, written in Latin, in angular Gothic letters, upon rough yellow parchment. The string which holds the seal is, in forma gratiosa (a bull of grace; i.e., when the bull is a blessing), of red and yellow silk; in forma rigorosa (a bull of justice; i.e., when it is a curse), of hemp. On the seal, which is of lead, are stamped on the obverse side the heads of Peter and Paul, and above S. PE. and S. PA. (Peter on the left: this fact has not escaped the notice of antipapists, and has puzzled the papists to explain); on the reverse the name of the Pope. The bull begins with the name of the Pope, but not often the number of the name; e.g., Leo, not Leo XIII. Then follow "episcopus, servus servorum Dei," and the formula "ad perpetuam rei memoriam," or the salutation "in Domino salutem et apostolicam benedictionem." At the end come the date and place. The bulls are not usually signed by the Pope, but by the writer of the bull; or, if it is a consistorial bull (i.e., issued after consultation with the consistory of cardinals), it is signed by all the cardinals consulted. The bulls are named from the words with which they begin, as the Jews call the books of the Bible. Thus "In coena Domini" (at the Lord's Supper), the bull of excommunication of all heretics, which is the product of centuries, although now disused; "Unigenitus" (only-begotten), issued by Clement XI. in 1713, against the Moral Reflections upon the New Testament, by Quesnel; "Ineffabilis Deus" (ineffable God), issued by Pius IX. (1854), declaring the dogma of the immaculate conception of Mary; "Eterni Patris" (of the Eternal Father), the bull issued in 1868, which convened the Vatican Council of 1869 and 1870. Bulla blanca is a bull issued by a pope before he is enthroned, the seal of which is blank. Briefs are open or closed letters, of equal authority, but are not in so solemn a form. They are written on paper, in a running hand, and by the papal secretary, sealed with red wax, and impressed with the seal of the fisherman, or Peter in a boat, and the name and number of the Pope. The distinction between briefs and bulls is not much older than the fifteenth century. As both these documents are liable to be forged, various official precautions are taken. Bullarium is a collection of briefs and bulls. The oldest of such collections is the Bullae diversorum Pontificum a Joanne XXII ad Julium III. ex bibliotheca Ludovici Gomes, Rome, 1550; but it contains only fifty documents. The first comprehensive collection is the Magnum Bullarium Romanum, made by Cherubini on the order of Sixtus V., and containing all briefs and bulls from Leo I. up to 1585. Among the later continuations of this work the most prominent are, Bullarium Magnum Romanum a Leone M. usque ad Benedictum XIV., Luxembourg, 1727-58, 19 vols. fol., and the contemporary collections by Cocquelines, Rome, 1733-48, 14 vols. fol. The latest continuation is that by Tomasetti, Turin, 1857-72, 24 vols. There are also bullariums for single countries, separate orders, etc.

BRIGHAM, Charles Henry, a Unitarian author and professor, b. in Boston, Mass., July 27, 1820; d. at Brooklyn, N.Y., Feb. 19, 1879. After graduation at Harvard University, he was pastor of the Unitarian Church of Taunton from 1844 to 1865, when he went to his second charge, at Ann Harbor, Mich. In 1866 he was appointed non-resident professor of ecclesiastical history in the theological school at Meadville, Penn. Mr. Brigham was a prominent member of the American Oriental and Philological Societies, also of the American Association for the Advancement of Science; was a prolific writer for his denominational press, and periodicals of high grade, e.g., North-American Review and the Révue des Deux Mondes (Paris), but left little of permanent value. BRIGHTMAN, Thomas, b. in 1556 at Notting-ham; d. Aug. 24, 1607. He was educated at Queens College, Cambridge, and became rector of the church at Hawnes, in Bedfordshire, in or about 1592. He was one of the fathers of Presbyterianism in England; as Thomas Cartwright

"The bright star in the Church of God." subscribed the Presbyterian Books of Discipline. His principal work was Apocalypsis Apocata, Frankfort, 1609, and Heidelberg, 1612; in English with the title A Revelation of the Revelation, Amsterdam, 1615, and Leyden, 1616, frequent subsequent editions. Few books have been published at so many different places, in so many different editions, and so widely.

He opened up a new path in the exposition of the Apocalypse by making two distinct millenniums: the first, from Constantine until 1300, in this corresponding with the common Orthodox view; second, from 1300 to 2300, which was a new feature, by which he was enabled to find a place for the future conversion of the Jews, and a more glorious condition of the Church on earth, which he illustrates by a symbolical interpretation of Rev. and xxii. Brightman was one of the most influential of the Puritans; and his views greatly influenced their interpretation of the Apocalypse, and found supporters throughout the seventeenth century. He also published commentaries on the Psalms of Songs and Daniel, and discussed various questions in dispute between the Puritans and the Catholics. His works were collected and published in London, 1644, 4to.

BRILL, Jacob, b. Jan. 21, 1639, at Leyden; d. Jan. 28, 1700; was a pupil of Pontiaan van Breda, and as such deposed from his office as minister of Phillipsburg, 1683. Between 1665 and 1699 he published about forty works of a moral-devotional character, which were much valued but spiritualizing Christ to such a degree that the historical Christ almost disappeared, and the sacrifice on the cross became a mere symbol of a sacrifice which shall take place in us, he got lost in a mystical pantheism, far away from Christianity. See POIRET: Bib. Mystic. 1708 (which contains a eulogy of Brill); and JOHN DERMOOT: De hervormde Kerk in Nederland, Breda, 1824, vol. III.

BRITTINIANS, a class of Augustinian eremites, named from Brittoni in Ancona, their first settlement. Their rule was confirmed by Gregory IX. (1241).

BRÜND, Jesper Rasmussen, b. at Kjøge, Zealand, Aug. 5, 1585; d. in Copenhagen, April 17, 1652; studied theology and philosophy in Copenhagen, Leyden, and Franeker; became professor in the University of Copenhagen in 1610, afterwards tutor to the crown-Prince and in 1639 Bishop of Zealand. He represents the stiff Orthodoxy of his time, with its intolerance and its intolerance; but he was a man of superior intellect, of great accomplishments as a scholar, and without personal ambition. His principal dogmatical work, Universæ Theologie 1633, was often reprinted, both in Denmark and Germany; and his controversy with the Jesuits on the occasion of the conversion of Christian William of Brandenburg to the Roman Catholicism attracted wide-spread attention. He also published a number of practical devotional works, some of which are still used in the Danish Church.

BRIDLEY, Thomas, an English mystic, b. in London, 1629; d. 1691. He held a fellowship in the University until 1660, when he, as a nonconformist, refused to accept the Anglican Liturgy. But he had become a follower of Jacob Boehme the mystic (see title), and with John Portage and Johanna Leade had founded the Philadelphian Society (see title); and when he left Oxford, he came to Portage, and lived with him many years. Bromley went further than Boehme: he rejected the Church, and also marriage, which he held was an inferior condition, not bearable by a saint. But with Bromley and his friends, the latter tenet was not connected with unchastity: on the contrary, they insisted upon perfect purity of life. Bromley was active in propagating his opinions, and was an estimable man. His works were published, in second edition, at Frankfort and Leipzig, 1719-32, 2 vols. The best of them are, The Way to the Sabbath of Rest, XCIV. Ecangelical Epistles to his Good Friends, and The Journey of the Children of Israel.

BROOKS, Elbridge Gerry, D.D., an able and beloved minister of the Universalist Church; b. at Dover, N.H., July 29, 1816; d. at Philadelphia, April 8, 1878. He was licensed at Portsmouth, N.H., June 16, 1836; was pastor in West Amesbury, Mass., Oct. 19, 1837 to June, 1838; in East Cambridge, Mass., 1838 to 1845; in Lowell, Mass. (First Universalist Church) for a year; in Bath, Me., from November, 1846 to 1850; in Lynn, Mass. (First Universalist Church), 1850 to 1859; in New-York City (Church of our Saviour), 1859 to 1867; in 1867 general agent of the board of trustees of the General Convention; Dec. 13, 1868, installed pastor of the Church of the Messiah, Philadelphia. He was the author of Our New Departure (1874), and of Universalism in Life and Doctrine, and its Superiority as a Practical Power. In July, 1867, he received the degree of D.D. from Tufts College.

Dr. Brooks was a born leader and reformer, eloquent, untiring, courageous, and full of resources, as is evidenced by his advocacy of the Maine liquor law, the cause of the Union, and, within his denominational lines, of the modified theology of existing Universalism, — the doctrine of remedial punishment in the future world, in contrast to the older theory in that body which denied all punishment after death. To his energy and tact the body in no small degree owes its present organization. See E. S. BROOKS: The Life-Work of Elbridge Gerry Brooks, Boston, 1881, from which the above sketch has been derived.

BRORSON, Hans Adolf, b. at Randrup, near Ribe in Jutland, June 20, 1694; d. in Ribe, June 3, 1764; studied theology in Copenhagen, and was successively minister in Randrup, Tonder, and Ribe, till in 1741 he became bishop of the diocese of Ribe. To him the Danish Church is indebted for about one-third of its hymns. He was strongly influenced by the German pietism, and so are his hymns, many of which are adaptations. But the unsound elements of this influence were counterbalanced by a natural affinity for the popular song, its cheerfulness, its naïveté, its melodiousness; and most of his hymns are still living in the congregations. A collected and critical edition was given by P. A. Arland, Copenhagen, 1867.

BROUGHTON, Hugh, a distinguished Hebrew scholar, b. at Oldbury, Salop, 1549; d. in London, Aug. 4, 1612. His earliest patron was Bernard Gilpin (see title), who met him accidentally, educated him at his parish school, and sent him to Cambridge, where he became fellow of Christ College; but afterwards he went to London, and enjoyed great reputation as a preacher. His Hebrew and Greek learning was remarkable in an age characterized by its attainments in these tongues. He translated the prophetic books into Greek, and the Apocalypse into Hebrew, and desired to translate the whole New Testament into Hebrew, believing that it would have forwarded the conversion of the Jews. While his learning and ability were unquestioned, his unhappy temper prevented his advancement. Dr. John Lightfoot edited his literary remains under the title, The works of the great Albionean divine, renowned in many nations for rare skill in Salem's and Athen's tongues, and familiar acquaintance with all Rabbinical learning, Mr. HUGH BROUGHTON. Collected in one volume, and digested into four tomes. Folio, London, 1692.

BROUSSON, Claude, b. at Nîmes, 1647; executed at Montpellier, Nov 4, 1698; practised as a lawyer at Castres, Castelnaudary, and Toulouse, and employed his talent with great courage and self-sacrifice to defend his co-religionists of the Reformed Church against the steadily-increasing injustice with which they were treated. At last he was compelled to flee; and June 26, 1684, he was condemned to death, which sentence was executed July 3 in effigie. Meanwhile he visited Berlin and Holland, to bring about a coalition between the Protestant princes against Louis XIV.; but, not satisfied with what could be done in this way, he returned in 1689 to France, and wandered about in the Cevennes, "preaching in the desert," admonishing and exhorting his brethren, though a price was put on his head, and he was hunted by the government officials like a beast of prey. In 1693 he went to Holland, and staid fourteen months in the Hague as preacher to the congregation of French exiles; but in 1695 he again entered France through Sedan, and visited most of the Reformed congregations north of Loire, finally escaping through Franche-comté into Switzerland. Once more, in 1697, he visited France, but was caught at Oléron, and sentenced to be broken on the wheel. Among his works, of which a list is given in La France Protestante, III, p. 36, the most prominent are: Etat des Réformés de France, La Haye, 1685; La Manne Mystique du Desert, Amsterdam, 1695; Lettres Pastorales, 1697. His life was written by BOREL, Nîmes, 1852, in French, and in English by BAYNES: The Evangelist of the Desert, London, 1853. THEODOR SCHOTT.

BROWN, John, b. at Carpow, Perthshire, Scotland, 1722; d. at Haddington, 1787; acquired his education under great difficulties, and became minister of the Burgher branch of the Secession Church of Haddington, and professor of theology to the Associate Synod. He published many popular and valuable works, as a Dictionary of the Bible, London, 1769, 2 vols., often reprinted, revised Lond., 1868; the Self-interpreting Bible, London, 1773, often reprinted; Compendious History of the British Churches, new edition, edited by Rev. Thomas Brown, Edin., 1823; and, most widely circulated of all, A Short Catechism, taught in homes and Sunday schools to this day, and very admirable for its simple piety.

BROWN, John, grandson of the preceding, b. at Whitburn, Linlithgowshire, Scotland, July 12, 1784; d. in Edinburgh, Oct. 13, 1858; studied at Glasgow University and at the divinity school of the Burgher branch of the Secession Church, and was ordained minister of the Burgher congregation of Biggar. In 1822 he moved to Edinburgh, where he took charge, first of the Rose-street Church, and afterwards of the Broughton-place Church. In 1835 he was also appointed professor of theology to the United Associate Synod. He was a great pulpit-orator, and a voluminous writer. The most prominent of his works are: Expository Discourses on First Peter, 1848; Exposition of the Discourses and Sayings of our Lord, 1850; The Resurrection of Life, 1851; Exposition of the Epistle to the Galatians, 1853, etc. See JOHN CAIRNS: Memoirs of John Brown, D.D., London, 1860.

BROWN, John Newton, D.D., a Baptist minister and editor, b. New London, Conn., June 29, 1803; d. at Germantown, Penn., May 15, 1868. After graduating head of his class at Madison College, New York, in 1823, he entered the Baptist ministry, and preached at several places in New England. In 1835, while at Exeter, N.H., he issued his Encyclopædia of Religious Knowledge (1 vol. small 4to, Brattleborough), a good specimen of a pious, uncritical, useful compilation from various approved works, such as Calmet's Dictionary of the Bible, Buck's Theological Dictionary, and Evans's Sketch of Religious Denominations. This encyclopædia, it is true, is far behind the times: even the revised edition, by Rev. G. P. Tyler (1858), reprinted Philadelphia, 1866, cannot now be used. In matter and illustration it belongs to a former generation, yet Dr. Brown deserves great credit for having so ably carried through in that early day a work of such magnitude and instructiveness. From 1838 to 1845 he was professor of theology and church-history in the New Hampton Theological Institution, New Hampshire; from 1845 to 1849 a pastor in Virginia; then editorial secretary of the American Baptist Publishing Society, and of their journals, The Christian Chronicle and The National Baptist. The New Hampshire (Baptist) Confession was prepared and revised (1852) by him.

BROWNE, Robert, the founder of the BROWNEISTS, and thus the spiritual father of Congregationalism. His life and principles have been for the first time intelligently and authoritatively stated by Henry Martyn Dexter, in his Congregationalism as seen in its Literature, New York, 1880; and we present his account in a very condensed form. Robert Browne was born at Tolethorp, Rutlandshire, Eng., about 1550; d. between 1631 and 1633, at Northampton. His father was a gentleman, a relative of Lord Burghley; his mother, a daughter of a baronet. He was educated, and in all probability took the regular degrees, at Corpus Christi College, Cambridge; and in 1571 became domestic chaplain to the Duke of Norfolk, who quickly was called upon to take his part in refusing to obey a citation to answer before the ecclesiastical commissioners a charge of disseminating seditious doctrines. At some time after this, Browne taught school, probably at Southwark, for three years; but after 1578 he re-entered the university to study theology. He had no license to preach, yet he preached quently and powerfully. When his brother obtained for him the necessary license, he not only refused to receive it, but publicly harangued against the calling and authorizing of preachers by bishops." Discouraged by the failure to excite much interest in Cambridge, inhibited from preaching, and recovered from a severe illness, he went to Norwich, where he kept on preaching "seditious" doctrines, and in 1581 was condemned against by the Bishop of Norwich, but protected by his kinsman Lord Burghley. Here, among his disciples, now found it so uncomfortable that they fled to Middelberg in Zeland, to seek refuge amid strangers peace and liberty of worship. There is no direct evidence that Browne was attached to the Dutch element of Norwich, as is commonly stated; nor is it probable that he ever joined Cartwright's English Church at Middelberg. For two years he remained in Middelberg; and there his three treatises, which were probably intended to form one volume, were successively printed, and thence sent for distribution to England. They are entitled: 1. "A Treatise which Sheweth the life and manners of all true Christians, and howe unlike they are unto the Papistes, and Heathen folke. Also the points and partes of all Diuinitie, that is of the true will and worde of God, are declared in their seuerall Definitions and Diuisions in order as followeth" (pp. 111); 2. "A Treatise of the 23 of Mattheue, both for an order of preaching and handling the Scriptures, and also touching the Popishe disorders, and ungodly communion of all false Christians, and especiallie the wicked Preachers and hirelings" (pp. 44); 3. "A Treatise of reformation without tarying of conscience, and of the wickednesse of those Preachers which will not reforme till the Magistrate commaunde or compell them" (pp. 18). These were all in quarto, and printed by Richard Painter [Printer], whose charges were met, it is probably by Robert Harrison, one of Browne's early converts. But in Middelberg the very principles held to led to continual discussion and division of sentiments among themselves; and in November, 1583, Browne, with four or five families, came to Scotland; and Thursday, Jan. 9, he arrived in Edinburgh, and at once commenced the circulation of his peculiar doctrines. His held opinion of separation from all kirks and excommunication was not rigorously used against open offenders not repenting. They would not admit witnesses [i.e., sponsors] in baptism; and sundry other opinions they had." When were the charges against them, when, on the following Tuesday, Browne was summoned to the session of the Kirk of Edinburgh. He was for a few days imprisoned; but unhindered, and covertly encouraged, by the secular authorities, he travelled over Scotland. Soon he returned to England, and endured a lengthened imprisonment with its attendant circumstances of mental and bodily suffering; was again befriended by Lord Burghley; removed to Northampton (1586), where he was excommunicated for disobeying the citation of Peterborough's citation to trial for his offensive teachings. Now he came to a determination to join the Church of England. On Nov. 21, 1586, he was elected to the rectory of the grammar-school at St. Olaves, Southwark; and in order to enter upon the position he bound himself not only to abstain from preaching his "seditious" doctrines, but to live as a member of the Church of England, so far as his conduct was concerned. His good behavior so mollified the popular feeling against him, that in September, 1591, he was installed rector of Achurch-cum-Thorpe, a very small living (for in the next century the parish contained only eighteen families) given him by Lord Burghley. Here the fiery, eloquent, determined Robert Browne lived for forty years. But in what condition? Dr. Dexter explains the cessation of Browne's activity, and his long residence in the little parish, on the supposition of his mental incapacity, which may at times have amounted to real insanity. It was for a mad blow at a constable he died in prison. [It is easy to understand how Fuller (Church History, V. 69) could say that Browne did not preach in his (Browne's) church: he could not. Many other slanders are likewise refuted by supposing him to be weak-minded. This account of Browne differs radically from the ordinary story, which is found in Neal's History of the Puritans, in Fuller's Church History of Britain, and in books based upon them.]

The followers of Browne are known as Brownists, a term of reproach. Our knowledge of the early history of the sect is derived from Robert Browne himself, who published in 1584 A True and Short Declaration, Both of the Gathering and Joyning together of certaine Persons: and also of the Lamentable Breach and Disuision which fell amongst them (4to, pp. 24),—a treatise which answers its name, is true on the face of it, and certainly short. But Browne's change, and the bad stories about his later life, made those who shared his earlier views disclaim all connection with him; and so, although to him is due, in Dr. Dexter's opinion, the founding of Congregationalism, the denomination in England and America slights his claim. But the man merits better treatment. He was not "an ambitious bigot in his earlier, and a contemptible sneak in later years." His voluntary association for a long period with that estimable minister and eminent Christian, the Rev. Richard Greenham of Dry Drayton, the modesty and charity with which the True and Short Declaration is written, the works already cited, and a few others, may be put in evidence to prove his character, the sincerity of his purpose, and its nobility. The movement he started was not solely to effect a change of form of church polity: its spring was his deep disgust and shame at the laxity and corruption of the Church of England, which tolerated the indiscriminate mixture of good and bad in the throng to partake of the Lord's Supper. It was because the bishops tolerated this state of things, that he declared they were not Christ's ministers; and because the Presbyterian Puritans refused to cut themselves loose from connection with such a system, and looked forward to a State Church on Genevan principles, he would not remain with them. His independency was therefore not from policy, but from piety. In a church so corrupt as that of England, he maintained, the true Christian could not stay. Nor was there any hope of reform for the Church from the civil power, neither any obligation to wait for prince or magistrate. He denied the ecclesiastical authority of the magistrate, and so was the first to set forth the correct doctrine of the relation of the civil and religious powers. He further declared, that any company of believers thus separated from the corrupt State Church formed of themselves a true Church, amenable only to Christ's control, and quite competent to govern themselves according to their own decisions, under the promised guidance of his Spirit. The officers of such a church were, as deduced from the New Testament, a Pastor, a Teacher of Doctrine, one or more Elders, one or more Relievers (deacons) and one or more Widows. The Lord's Supper is to be the sweet and sacred bond of union in the Church, and care must be taken to keep out all unworthy members. [The practical result of this "care" was an inquisition which broke up his church at Middelberg.] He further completed his system by deciding that the relations between the various independent churches should be sisterly, admitting of no control, but inviting unto mutual love and kindness in speech and deed.

But the times were not ripe for such splendid theorizing, although it was not God's design to let the world forget it. Robert Browne died, his name smothered by his proper friends, and jeeringly repeated by his enemies; but he lives, the real founder of Congregationalism, and his works are the acknowledged quiver whence the defenders of his polity have drawn their sharpest arrows. The miserable, crazy dotard who died in Northampton jail had been the enthusiastic, impetuous preacher, and the man of genius, who conceived and advocated the freest type of church government. We bring out to the light once more, that we may honor, the man whose later years God shrouded in gloom, but whose years of health and vigor were freely dedicated unto the service of Christ and his Church.

BROWNE, Sir Thomas, b. in London, 1605; d. at Norwich, 1682; studied medicine; travelled on the Continent, and settled as a practitioner at Norwich in 1636. His Religio Medici was first published in 1642, and attracted immediately a great attention, though its peculiar blending of deep religious feeling and sceptical views is not easy to follow. "It is the confession of faith of a mind keen and sceptical in some aspects, but on the whole deeply imbued with the sense of the mysteriousness of true religion, and willing to yield itself up without reserve to the requirements of faith." In 1646 appeared the Treatise on Vulgar Errors, in 1647 the Hydriothopia, or Urnburial, and in 1658 the Garden of Cyprus. His Christian Morals was not published until 1716. The best edition of his work is that by Simon Wilkin, in 4 vols., 1836, containing his letters and Johnson's biography, reprinted by Bohn, London, 1851, 3 vols.

BROWNLEE, William C., b. at Torfoot, Lanarkshire, Scotland, 1784; d. in New York, Feb. 10, 1860; studied in the University of Glasgow; emigrated to America in 1808, and was in 1826 chosen minister of the Collegiate Reformed Dutch Church in New York, and distinguished himself by his opposition to Romanism. He published: Inquiry into the Principles of Quakers,

New York, 1824; The Roman-Catholic Controversy, Phila., 1834; Lights and Shadows of Christian Life, New York, 1837; Popery an Enemy to Civil and Religious Liberty, 4th ed., New York, 1839; Romanism in the Light of Prophecy and History, New York, 1854. From 1826 to 1830 he was editor of Magazine of the Reformed Dutch Church. This career of eminent usefulness was suddenly ended by a paralytic stroke in 1848, which effectually laid him aside from all sustained mental labor, although he gradually regained some of his lost power. He was made a pastor-emeritus.

BROWNSON, Orestes Augustus, LL.D., b. at Stockbridge, Vt., Sept. 16, 1803; d. April 16, 1876; was for many years an able opponent of Protestantism, and an unqualified but conscientious defender of Romanism. His education was defective. His religious career was sinuous. He was originally a Baptist, joined the Presbyterian Church at Ballston, N.Y., in 1823; but in 1825 he became a Universalist preacher, and in 1832 a Unitarian preacher. He plunged into French and German literature, philosophy, and theology, and came out a Socialist, after the type of Robert Owen. While in this way, he organized in Boston, in 1836, the "Society of Christian Union and Progress," and ministered to it, until, in 1843, he avowed infidel doctrines in his book, New Views of Christianity, Society, and the Church. In 1844 he made his final change. He had gone from Bible Christianity to infidelity: he went to the opposite extreme, and joined the Roman-Catholic Church. Having exhausted all possibilities, he never left it, and established, in 1844, Brownson's Quarterly Review, which he edited until his death, and in which he taught the strongest Ultramontaniam with energy and enthusiasm. He had a rare faculty for defending the most extreme views, and making them plausible. He wrote nearly the entire contents of his Review.

BRUEGGLERS, a sect founded in 1746 in the village of Bruegglen, in the canton of Bern, Switzerland, by two brothers, Christian and Hieronymus Kohler. During a religious excitement which at that time prevailed in the neighborhood, the two brothers, who had hitherto led a very dissolute life, and were sorely in want of means to gratify their vanity and sensuality, suddenly appeared as divine prophets, began to preach and exhort, and soon gathered a number of followers. They professed to stand in direct communication with God the Father, and to know every thing he knew. By virtue of this foreknowledge they announced that the world should perish, and the day of judgment come, on next Christmas Eve; and this event, which frightened people out of their senses, was only averted by the intercession of the two brothers. The basis of their moral system was the doctrine that the whole external part of man, the flesh of human nature, is under the dominion of Satan; and consequently Satan, and not man, is responsible for what is done in the flesh. The effects of such doctrines soon became apparent in the wildest excesses; and the two brothers were banished from the country (1750). The disorders continued, however, as the brothers every now and then returned secretly to Bruegglen. In 1752 they were caught; and the process instituted against them now revealed the whole abomination of their conduct. Hi-

BRUNO, b. 925; d. Oct. 11, 965; a son of Henry the Fowler, and brother to Otho I.; was from infancy destined for the Church, and educated in the cathedral school of Utrecht, and was made Archbishop of Cologne in 953. He took a very active part in the political affairs of his brother, always working for peace; while in the history of the Church he stands as a representative of that school-education which was started by Charlemagne, and in the tenth century developed in a peculiar way by the Iro-Scottish monks.
His life was written by Ruotger in 966, and in the thirteenth century by the monks of St. Pan-toleon in Cologne, where he lies buried. See

ALBRECHT VOGEL.
BRUNO, the "Apostle of the Prussians," also called Bonifacius, b. 970; d. Feb. 14, 1009; was related to the Saxon dynasty, but destined for the Church, and educated in Magdeburg; accompanied Otho III. to Italy in 996, and was here won over by Adelbert of Prague to those extreme ideas of asceticism which from Greece invaded the Western Church; became monk, and set out in 1004 as a missionary, first to Poland, then to Hungary and Russia, and finally among the Prussians, among whom he suffered martyrdom. The materials for his life have been critically sifted by VOIGT, in his Geschichte Preussens, I. p. 280, and by PERTZ, in his introductory to Vita S. Adelberti.

BRUNO, Giordano, b. at Nola in Campania about 1550; d. in Rome, Feb. 9, 1600; entered the Dominican order; but the study of natural philosophy, and of the works of Nicolaus Cusa-naus and Raimundus Lullus, gradually placed him in such an opposition to the Roman Church that he was compelled to flee from his monastery, and leave Italy. In 1580 he settled at Geneva. He was not a Protestant, however. He was a Pan-theist; and many of the moral principles he adopted and defended are of a very doubtful character. But his criticism of the superstition of the Roman Church and the futility of the scholastic system was deep and striking; and the effect of his lectures, delivered at Geneva, Paris, Oxford, Wittenberg, Prague, and Frankfort, and of his numerous writings, was very keenly felt, and deeply resented. In 1592 he had the audacity to return to Italy, and began to lecture at Padua, and afterwards at Venice. But he was seized by the Inquisition, and placed before its tribunal in Rome. Every means was employed to compel him to recant; and, when he absolutely refused, he was condemned for heresy, and handed over to the secular authorities to be punished citra sanguinis effusionem. He was burnt. His Italian works were published at Leipsic, 1830;
the Latin, at Stuttgart, 1834. See CH. BAR-THOLEMES: J. Bruno, Paris, 1846; F. J. CLE-MENS: Bruno und Nicol. von Cusa, Leipzig, 1847.

BRUNSWICK. Of the population of the grand duchy of Brunswick, 300,196 are Lutheran, 7,030
Roman Catholic, 2,793 Reformed, and 1,174 Jews.
The Reformed have a church and a pastor in the city of Brunswick, and form, together with the congregations of Celle, Hanover, Bückeburg, Göttingen, and Münden, the Reformed Synod of Lower Saxony. The Roman Catholics have three churches, respectively in Helmstedt, Brunswick, and Wolfenbüttel, and belong to the diocese of Hildesheim in Hanover. The Lutheran Church, established in the city of Brunswick in 1528, and in the country in 1568, is the Church of the State, comprising two hundred and sixty congregations, and administered by a consistory, seven superintendent-generals, and thirty-three superintendents. The confession on which all ecclesiastics of the Established Church must take oath, the Corpus Doctrinae Julium, does not contain the Formula Concordiæ. The census quoted above is that of December, 1871.

BRYANT, Jacob, a learned though whimsical writer, b. at Plymouth, 1715; d. near Windsor, Nov. 14, 1804. He was educated at Eton and Cambridge, where he took B.A., 1740, M.A., fellow of King's College, 1744; became tutor, and then, later, secretary, to the Duke of Marlborough, 1756. From the duke he received a lucrative appointment in the ordnance, which, as he never married, amply supported him, and was assigned two rooms at Blenheim, with permission to enter at any time the magnificent library there. The passion of his life was the cause of his death; for when eighty-nine years of age, in attempting to get a book down from a shelf by means of a chair, his foot slipped, his leg was grazed, mortification set in, and he died. He published: Observations and Inquiries, Cambridge, 1767 (in this volume he defends the reading Euroclydon instead of Euro Aquilo, proposed by Bochart, Bentley, and others; and also Melite as a different island from Malta. On both points modern scholarship pronounces him wrong; although in regard to the former point the decisive verdict was given only recently by the Codex Sinaiticus); A New System, or Analysis of Ancient Mythology, London, 1774-76, 3 vols.; 2d ed., 1st vol. 1775; 3d ed., with Account of the Author, Index, 41 plates, London, 1807, 6 vols. 8vo.—a work of great learning upon the plan of substantiating the Bible by a study of the traditional remains of all nations, but now utterly worthless; Vindiciæ Flavianaæ, London, 1777 (a vindication of the testimony given by Josephus concerning our Saviour Jesus Christ); Treatise on the Authenticity of the Scriptures, London, 1792, prepared at request of the Dowager Lady Pembroke, 3d ed., 1810; Dissertations upon some Passages in Scripture, London, 1803. Besides these volumes, he issued several of a more purely archeological interest. His great fondness for paradox, and his other eccentricities, rob his writings of a great part of their value.

BUCHANAN, Claudius, b. at Cambuslang, near Glasgow, March 12, 1766; d. at Broxbourne, Herts, Feb. 9, 1815; studied at Cambridge; went to the East Indies in 1796 as one of the company's chaplains; was appointed professor of the classical languages and literatures in the College of Fort William, Bengal, in 1800, and returned to England in 1808. He published: Expediency of an Ecclesiastical Establishment for India, 1805;

Christian Researches in Asia, 1811; Colonial Ecclesiastical Establishments, 1813, etc. There is a Life of him by HUGH PEARSON, London, 1819, 2 vols.

BUCHANAN, George, b. at Killearn, Stirlingshire, Scotland, 1506; d. in Edinburgh, Sept. 28, 1582; studied in Paris, 1520-22, at St. Andrew's, 1522-25, and again in Paris, whence he returned to Scotland in 1537. Having adopted Protestant views, his first literary undertakings were two Latin satires on the monks, Somnium and Franciscanus, which caused such indignation among the Romanists, that he was compelled to leave the country, 1539. During his exile he taught in Paris, Bordeaux, Coimbra, etc.; and to this period belong his Latin translations of Medea and Alceste, and his two Latin tragedies, Jephthes and Baptistes. Returned to Scotland in 1560, he was appointed tutor to Queen Mary in 1562, principal of St. Leonard's College, St. Andrew's, 1566, and tutor to James VI. in 1570. During this last period of his life he wrote his Latin translation of the Psalms, his De Jure Regni apud Scotos (condemned in 1584, and burnt in 1693), and Rerum Scotticarum Historia, his principal work. His life was written by Dr. IRVING, 1817.

BUCK, Charles, the never-to-be-forgotten author of the Theological Dictionary, a work which has sold enormously in Great Britain and America, has appeared in many shapes, under different editors, and yet is so admirably composed that it cannot become entirely antiquated. Mr. Buck was born in 1771; labored in the ministry of the Independents of England until his death, in 1815. His Dictionary appeared London, 1802, 2 vols. 8vo.; in 1821, 1 vol. 8vo.; edited and much improved by Rev. Dr. Henderson, London, 1847; 1 vol. 8vo., pp. 788, Philadelphia, U.S.A., 1869. Another work, of less value, but of great popularity, was, Anecdotes, Religious, Moral, and Entertaining, London, 1799; 6th ed., corrected, 1815; 10th ed., 1842.

BUCKMINSTER, Joseph, b. at Rutland, Mass., Oct. 14, 1751; d. at Portsmouth, N.H., June 10, 1812; studied at Yale College, and was ordained minister of the North Church in Portsmouth in 1779. He published a memoir of Dr. McClintock, and some sermons. His son, Joseph Stevens Buckminster, b. in Portsmouth, May 26, 1784; d. in Boston, June 9, 1812; studied at Harvard College; took charge of the Brattle-street Church in Boston in 1805; and was appointed professor of biblical criticism at Harvard College in 1811. He published a volume of sermons, which was reprinted in London. See Memoirs of the Buckminsters, Father and Son, by Mrs. LEE, Boston, 1851.

BUDDEUS, Johann Franz, b. at Anclam, Pomerania, June 25, 1667; d. at Jena, Nov. 19, 1729; studied at Greifswald, and became professor of philosophy at Wittemberg in 1687, and at Jena in 1689; professor of Greek and Latin at Coburg in 1692; professor of moral philosophy at Halle in 1693; and professor of theology at Jena in 1705. He was a man of genuine piety and immense learning; and he exercised a precious influence, both by the conciliatory position he occupied among the various theological and philosophical schools, and by the clearness and ease with which in his writings he handled enormous masses of materials. The most prominent among his works

, Elementa Philosophiæ Practicæ, 1697; Institutes Theologiæ Moralis, 1711, which, executed under the influence of Spenser, caused the casuistic elements to disappear altogether from the most constant treatment of Christian morals; also Isagoge Historica ad Theologiam Universam, 1717, is remarkable.

E. SCHWARZ.

BUDDHISM,¹ the religion of five hundred millions of our race, is the system of religious truth thought originally by Gautama (or Gotama), the son of Mayadevi, the queen of Suddhodana, king of Kapilavastu, a place about one hundred miles north-east of Benares. He was b. probably B.C. 563 or 556, in the garden of Lumbini, and d. at Kushinagara, B.C. 483 or 477. The story of his life in its simplest form is as follows: One day Mayadevi, while dreaming, saw Buddha descend from heaven in the form of a white elephant, surrounded by a myriad of heavenly beings, and enter her womb. The incident was interpreted by Brahmins who had been summoned by the king for the purpose, as prophesying that the future king would either be a world-emperor of unparalleled beauty of character, or else, if he renounced temporal dominion, a Buddha, the savior of the world. When the time of her confinement drew near, Mayadevi started for her parents' house; and on the way, under a pipal-tree (Ficus religiosa), a child was born. She hastened back again, but she was, however, to die. The boy was named Siddharta ("he by whom all ends are accomplished"). His father, Mahaprajapati, who was also the king's wife, a childless woman, brought him up secretly. He was early married to his cousin, the daughter of the rajah of Koli. But after a while the splendors and pleasures of his daily life failed to satisfy him. He became conscious of a higher destiny than that of an earthly prince; and in his twenty-ninth year he suddenly broke away from all his associations, and took up an ascetic life. He first studied under two famous teachers, Arada and Rudraka; but, unsatisfied, he went into the jungle, and there for six years, accompanied by five disciples, lived so austere that he was wasted to a shadow. But when almost dead he perceived his mistake, and at once took to food. This course of religious development had been all along desperately opposed by the demon of desire, whose temptations had led us of those to which Christ was subjected; but he lastly conquered, and set forth to ameliorate the world. He regathered his five disciples, and his renunciation of asceticism had driven them away, and began to publish abroad the deep truths his meditations had revealed, and in his first discourse propounded "the four sublime truths"—pain, the eternal fact presented to consciousness throughout the universe; its origin in which leads to action, and consequent merit and merit; its prevention through the way, the path promulgated by Buddha, or the eightfold path of right belief, feelings, speech, actions, means of livelihood, endeavor, memory, and meditation). He was then in his thirty-sixth year, possessed of perfect intelligence of a Buddha. He lived forty-four years thereafter, travelling about; and when he died his body was burned with imperial obsequies, and his ashes sent to eight kingdoms, each of which built a monument over its portion.

Gautama, or, as he is commonly called, Sakya Muni ("the Sakya sage"), like Socrates and Jesus, proclaimed his doctrines orally, and wrote nothing: at least nothing has been preserved. But after his death five hundred of his disciples held a council, and each recited what he had heard, and then the whole assembly repeated aloud what had been thus gathered up. By a second and third council the teachings of Gautama were formulated; but it is not proved that any written statement of them is earlier than B.C. 100-88. It is yet unsettled whether the original language was Sanscrit or Pali, probably the latter.

Present Buddhism is a development of the primitive faith, which had three objects, — morality, asceticism, and nirvana. The cardinal tenets are the four truths already stated. It is open to any thing, even to a worm, to become a Buddha, provided this high office is kept steadily in view through the long succession of births. In the past there have been many Buddhas, and in the future there will be as many. When at last one by his self-negation and virtue has become a potential Buddha (Bodhisattwa), he awaits in heaven his final change, — his birth as a man, — for then he is perfected. He is born either a male Brahman, or a Kshatriya (Gautama's caste); gains intelligence under the bodhi tree at Gaya; and begins his preaching in the deer-park at Benares, and preaches precisely the same doctrines as all his predecessors. Gautama's Buddhahood was for five thousand years. Then he will enter nirvana, and the next Buddha, Maitreya, will appear, and restore to all its influence the old doctrine.

The Buddhists divide all being into the five classes: (1) Buddhas; (2) Bodhisattwas (future Buddhas); (3) Pratyeka-buddhas (individual Buddhas, who have attained to perfect knowledge, but have sought it only for themselves, while the Buddha attains knowledge in order that he may impart it); (4) Aryas (the saints who have begun to tread the road to nirvana), who are divided into four classes, called "paths," each of which is subdivided into those who are nearing the end of their "path," and those who have ended it. The first path is called conversion, or "entering upon the stream;" while in it the aspirant "becomes free successively from the delusion of self, from doubt as to Buddha and his doctrines, and from the belief in the efficacy of rites and ceremonies." The second path is that of those who will only return once to this world; the third is that of those who will never return to this world; and the fourth that of the Worthy Ones, the Arhats, who are entirely free from all sin, and able to know every thing, to see every thing, and to go everywhere, in any form. There is but one change more, — nirvana. What is nirvana? Extinction. Annihilation is really all that awaits the Arhat, according to the philosophic writings of the Buddhists, as interpreted by many scholars. But Mr. Rhys Davids puts an entirely different construction upon nirvana, which he grants does mean "extinction," but not the extinction of a soul. He says, "It is the extinction of that sinful, grasping condition of mind and heart which would otherwise be the cause of renewed individual existence." In a word it is "holiness," "perfect peace, goodness, and wisdom" (Buddhism, pp. 111, 2). (5) Prithagjanas, the ordinary disciples who content themselves with ordinary duties, and do not aspire to the transcendental perfections of the Aryas. These are, of course, the vast majority.

The five above-mentioned gradations, however, mostly belong to the unseen world. The visible Buddhist communion has necessarily other divisions. The Buddhist "church" is called Sangha; and the tri-ratna, or "three precious things,"—Buddha, the law, and the assembly (sangha),—are continually mentioned in Buddhist formulas and books; but the present hierarchy is not primitive, but developed. The sangha is composed of "religious mendicants" (bhikshus), who, after a novitiate, take vows of chastity and poverty,—vows, however, which are not irrevocable at the present day, nor, apparently, at any previous time. Buddha from the first discouraged all painful asceticism, so prevalent in Brahminism, but laid great stress on a mendicant and celibate life. In contradistinction to the devotees', the duties of the laity are included in the three formulas of "taking" refuge ("I take refuge in Buddha, in his doctrine, and in his community"), and the "five prohibitions," i.e., against the sins of murder, theft, unchastity, lying, and the use of intoxicating drinks. The morality of Buddhism is its brightest side. The purity and benevolence of Buddhist books supply the want of poetry, for they are usually of little literary merit, and strongly excite the interest of the reader.

As Buddhism does not recognize the idea of God, it has properly no worship or sacrifices, and originally no religious ceremonies; but as it spread, a cultus arose. The images and relics of Buddha himself and the other holy personages of the legends were worshipped; and the ceremonies consisted of offerings of flowers and perfumes with music, and the recital of hymns and prayers. Formulas of prayer have also come into use, although the idea of a being who answers prayer is utterly foreign to the system. The prayers are supposed to produce their effect by a kind of magical efficacy. Hence the praying-machines of Tibet and Mongolia are logical consequences. The religious communities assemble for prayer three times a day; i.e., morning, noon, and evening. They publicly confess their sins on the days of the new and full moon; and the laity also attend for confession, and to listen to the reading of some sacred text. Besides these days, there are several other fast-days in the month. The end of the Buddhist system is nirvana, or extinction. In theory this is really what awaits the faithful disciple, according to his creed; but it can hardly be disputed that the great mass of Buddhist believers in every age have given to nirvana a vague meaning of future happiness.

Buddhism began to decline in India in the seventh century, and was extinct in the sixteenth. But previously it had blessed with its light the nations around. Like Christianity, it propagated itself by preaching and quiet missionary labors; and so it spread to China, where it is one of the three co-ordinate religions. (See LIT. below.) From China it has spread into Corea and Japan. Indirectly it has influenced the West. Gnosticism and Manichæism were unions of Buddhism with Christianity; and so it made itself known in a perverted way to the Western World. Stray references are found in Clemens Alexandrinus (Strom. i. 15) and Jerome (Adv. Jorinianum, i. 42). Some suppose that the halo around the head of Christ and his saints was borrowed from the Buddhist pictures of Buddha and his principal disciples, in which it is found. Rightly to estimate this Buddhist influence on the world, we must remember that it sprang up in India. Nearly all its tenets were based on the immemorial belief of the Hindu mind. It was the moral teaching of Buddha, and his proclamation that the highest religious truth was open to all castes alike, which formed the special features of his system. All else he only borrowed or modified from the Brahmans whom he opposed. There were, in truth, only three creative national intellects in the ancient world,—the Hebrew, the Greek, and the Hindu; and Buddhism is that product of the Hindu mind, which, for good or for evil, has most widely influenced mankind.

In Tibet, Buddhism has developed itself into a hierarchy, and acquired temporal power under the name of Lamaism. The form of ecclesiastical government and service bears striking resemblance to the Roman-Catholic. The Spirit of the Buddhas is believed to be present in the chutuktus, who occupy a position similar to that of cardinal, and to be especially incarnate in the Dalai Lama, the infallible Head of the Church, the Buddhist Pope, who is also the sole temporal sovereign of Tibet. See T. W. Rhys Davids, Buddhism, pp. 248-250, for account of the service in Lhasa Cathedral.

Reformed Buddhism is a recent development in China and Japan. It plainly shows the influence of Christianity upon thoughtful Orientals who yet are not converted. In China the sects of Reformed Buddhists are numerous; but they generally agree in rejecting polytheism, and in worshipping some one divinity; e.g., the goddess of mercy. One sect calls itself (Salvation) Without Works. In Japan more advance has been made. The sect assumes the title of Shinsin, or the true religion. In Kioto they have a college, which is Western in its arrangements and curriculum. Their creed is, "Rejecting all religious austerities and other action, giving up all idea of self-power, we rely upon Amita (Infinite) Buddha with the whole heart for our salvation in the future life, which is the most important thing; believing, that, at the moment of putting our faith in Amita Buddha, our salvation is settled. From that moment invocation of his name is observed, to express thankfulness and gratitude for Buddha's mercy. Moreover, being thankful for the reception of his doctrine from the founder and succeeding priests, we must also keep the laws, which are fixed for our duty during our whole life." The striking resemblances to Christianity are: 1. Worship is rendered to one Buddha, to the exclusion of all others; 2. This one Buddha bears the title of Amita, the "Boundless," or Infinite; 3. The worshipper renounces all personal merit, and puts faith in nothing but the mercy of Amita; 4. The soul is brought into a state of salvation by the act of faith; 5. Though salvation is thenceforward assured, the believer oes not abandon the conflict with sin; but growth in holiness is the result, not the cause, of salvation. Thus Reformed Buddhism has made an immense and radical advance upon the original faith, which had no God, no prayer, no cheer, only austerities, and at last annihilation. Truly the leaven of the Gospel is working.

JACKSON: Buddha (Budaëus), Guillaume, b. in 1467; d. in 1514; librarian to Francis I., and a man of influence; was secretly in favor of an ecclesiastical reform, but afraid of an open rupture with the pope. His De Asse, Paris, 1514, contains many sarcasms on the clergy and the Pope; and his De Transitu Hellenismi ad Christianismum maintains that true wisdom is not to be found in Pagan literatures, but only in the practice of the precepts of Christ. By his will he forbade the ceremonies of the Roman ritual to be performed at his burial as mere imitations of heathen customs.

BUDINGTON, William Ives, D.D., a beloved and able Congregational minister, b. April 21, 1815, at New Haven, Conn.; d. in Brooklyn, Nov. 29, 1879. He graduated at Yale College in 1834; studied theology in the New-Haven and Andover Seminaries, graduating from the last in 1839; and from April 22, 1840, to 1855, he was pastor of the First Church, Charlestown. On April 22 of that year he began his services in the Clinton-avenue Congregational Church, Brooklyn, N.Y. In 1845 he published his History of the First Church, Charlestown, Mass. He was a frequent contributor to the press, and issued a variety of sermons, etc. He enjoyed the esteem and confidence of his congregation not only, but of his denomination and the Christian public in high degree.

BUGENHAGEN, Johann, b. at Wollin, Pomerania, June 24, 1485; d. at Wittenberg, April 20, 1558; studied at Greifswald, and was in 1504 appointed rector of the school of Treptow, which he soon brought into a very flourishing state. The writings of Erasmus and the Humanists had early led him to understand that an ecclesiastical reform was a necessity; but it was Luther's book De Captivitate Babylonica which revealed the truth to him. In 1521 he went to Wittenberg; and in 1522 he was appointed minister at the collegiate church of that city, in which position he remained for the rest of his life. He possessed a very extraordinary talent of organization. Without causing any great disturbances, he established the Reformation in Brunswick, Hamburg, and Lübeck; and the church constitutions which he gave these cities became the norm and rule for many others. In 1537 he went to Copenhagen, where he staid to 1542, re-organizing the whole Danish Church and the University of Copenhagen. Among his works are a history of Pomerania written in Latin in 1518, but not printed until 1728; Historie d. Leidens und d. Auferstehung Jesu Christi, 1530, often reprinted, and a commentary on the Psalms, which Luther valued very highly. His life has been written by JÄNCKENS, Rostock, 1757; ENGELKEN, Berlin, 1817; ZIETZ, Leipzig, 1834; MEURER, Leipzig, 1862; VOGT, Elberfeld, 1867.

BULGARIA. Some fifteen hundred years ago, there existed a Bulgarian kingdom on the banks of the Volga. Whence these Bulgarians came, who they were, and why they were called by this name, cannot be certainly known; but there is reason to believe that they were of Finnish origin. About 680 A.D. a portion of the Bulgarians left the Volga, crossed the Danube, and, under the leadership of the Kral Asparuch, occupied the country as far as the Balkans. The Slavic tribes who occupied this region submitted to their conqueror; but, as has often happened in these national migrations, the native element proved to be the stronger. The Bulgarian language disappeared; and the people were amalgamated into a single nation, retaining the name of the conquerors, and but little else.

This new Bulgarian nation was converted to Christianity about the year 860 by two Slavic apostles, Cyril the theologian, and Methodius the painter, natives of Salonica. It was the skill of the painter who pictured the Day of Judgment, rather than the arguments of the theologian, which converted King Boris, and through him the nation. The capital of the kingdom at that time was Preslava near Shumla. There is no connected history of the Bulgarian kingdom or church; but many important facts may be gleaned from Byzantine history and Slavic writers. They owe their alphabet and their Bible to Cyril and Methodius. They were engaged in constant wars with the Greeks, often defeated them, especially in 811, when King Krum defeated and killed the Emperor Nicephorus; in 913, when Simeon, the greatest of Bulgarian kings, besieged Constantinople; and in 1186, when King Assen re-established the kingdom, after it had been subjugated for a hundred and seventy years. In 1205 Ivan, or Calo-John as he is known in Europe, allied himself with the Greeks against the Latins, defeated and killed Baldwin, Emperor of Constantinople, and Boniface, King of Salonica. The last of the Bulgarian kings was Ivan Shishman, who was finally conquered by the Turks in 1393, and his kingdom annexed to the Ottoman Empire. In 1878, after the Russo-Turkish war, Bulgaria beyond the Balkans was constituted a semi-independent principality, and Bulgaria south of the Balkans, a semi-independent province called Eastern Roumelia.

The ecclesiastical history of these centuries may be told in a few words. King Boris, after his conversion, negotiated with Rome and Constantinople. He got the best of advice from Pope Nicolaus I., which may still be seen in his letter preserved at Rome (See MANSI: Com. Coll. XV. pp. 401-434); but he finally accepted an archbishop from Constantinople. In the early part of the tenth century, there was a Bulgarian Patriarch at Preslava, independent of Constantinople. King Samuel transferred the Patriarch to Ochrida. The Emperor Basil, surnamed the "Slayer of Bulgarians," conquered them in 1019; and for a hundred and seventy years they were under the Patriarch of Constantinople. When King Assen re-established the kingdom, he recognized the Pope, and received a Latin archbishop at Tirmova. The Church again became independent, under King Ivan, early in the thirteenth century; and at the time of the Turkish conquest the Patriarch was again located at Ochrida, where he continued until 1777, when the Patriarch of Constantinople succeeded, by intrigues with the Turks, in securing the abolition of this see, annexing it to his own jurisdiction.

Immediately after the Crimean War, the Bulgarians began to agitate the question of their ecclesiastical independence; the Greeks having done every thing in their power to destroy the Bulgarian nationality, and to Hellenize the people. The Roman Catholics took advantage of this agitation to intrigue for a return to Rome. In 1860 they won over a Bulgarian priest, one Joseph Sokolski, took him to Rome, and with great ceremony and display consecrated him a Patriarch of Bulgaria. He returned to Constantinople under French protection, but soon after suddenly disappeared, and has since resided in Russia. The movement was a total failure, the only Catholics in Bulgaria being descendants of the old Paulicians.

American missionaries went to Bulgaria in 1858, and immediately commenced translating the Bible into the modern language. It has had an immense circulation among the people. They also established schools, and sought in every way to enlighten the people. They had no little influence in helping on the rapid development of the nation; and, although but few have left the Bulgarian Church to call themselves Protestants, the missionaries are on the best of terms with the people, and the whole tendency of the Church is toward reform. The missionaries represent the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, and the Methodist-Episcopal Church of America. There are now a hundred Bulgarian students in Robert College at Constantinople.

After a long conflict with the Greek Patriarch of Constantinople, after having driven the Greek bishops out of the country, and lived for ten years without bishops, the Bulgarians at last, in 1870, secured a firman from the Sultan, establishing a national Bulgarian Church under an Exarch, who was to be nominally subordinate to the Patriarch, but practically independent. The Greek Patriarch then excommunicated the Exarch and the whole Bulgarian nation, declaring them schismatics from the orthodox Church. This excommunication has never been withdrawn; but it has not been recognized by other branches of the Orthodox Church, in Russia, Greece, etc. The Bulgarian Exarch still resides in Constantinople, and exercises authority over Bulgaria, Eastern Roumelia, and the Bulgarians in Macedonia. In Macedonia there is still a painful conflict of authority between him and the Patriarch, owing to the fact that the firman given by the Sultan has never been fully executed. All things considered, this Bulgarian Church is the most promising and most progressive of the orthodox churches of the East.

BULGARIS, Eugène, b. in Corfu, 1716; d. in St. Petersburg, June 10, 1806; studied at Janina and Padua; taught in the schools of Janina, Mount Athos, and Constantinople; but went in 1763 to Germany in order to escape from the persecutions of the orthodox party in the Greek Church, and was in 1776 called to Russia by Catherine II., and made Archbishop of Cherson. The most remarkable of his writings are, besides a handbook of logic, still used in the Greek colleges, a Book against the Latins, Constantinople, 1796, new ed. 1848, and a History of the Apostolic Age, Leipzig, 1805. His life was written by A. P. VRETOS, Athens, 1860.

BULL, George, b. at Wells, Somersetshire, Eng., March 25, 1634; d. Feb. 28, 1710; studied at Oxford; was Rector of St. George's, near Bristol, then Rector of Suddington, Gloucestershire, Archdeacon of Llandaff, and finally, since 1705, Bishop of St. David's. His Harmonia Apostolica (1670) is an attempt to show that Paul and James were fully agreed with respect to the doctrine of justification. His Defensio Fidei Nicenae (1685) is a most learned and elaborate attempt to show that the orthodox doctrine of the Trinity existed fully developed in the Christian Church before the Council of Nice. The best edition of his collected works is that by Burton, Oxford, 1827, in 7 vols. in 8, containing the Life, by Nelson.

BULLINGER, Heinrich, b. at Bremgarten in the canton of Aargau, July 18, 1504; d. at Zürich, Sept. 17, 1575. He was educated in the school of Emmerich; studied at Cologne, and was by the "Sentences" of Peter Lombard led to the writings of Augustine and Chrysostom, and by the works of the Fathers to the Bible itself. Thus prepared, he received a deep impression of the writings of Luther and Melancthon, and by Zwingli he was completely won for the cause of the Reformation. Appointed teacher in the cloister school of Cappel in 1522, he lectured on Melancthon's Loci Communes, and in 1528 he accompanied Zwingli to the disputation of Bern. In 1529 he was chosen pastor of his native city, and in the same year he married. After the battle of Cappel, however (Oct. 11, 1531), in which Zwingli fell, he was compelled to leave Bremgarten. He went to Zürich; and Dec. 9, 1531, he was chosen chief pastor of Zürich, in the stead of Zwingli. With great energy and mildness he filled this difficult office, and contributed much to establish the Reformation in Switzerland. In the controversy concerning the Lord's Supper he wrote with great dignity against Luther, and Butzer's attempts at reconciliation found very little favor with him. More happily ended the dissension between him and Calvin, which resulted in the Consensus Tigurinus, an agreement on the doctrine of the sacraments. The Second Helvetic Confession, drawn up by Bullinger in 1566, is the most elaborate Reformed creed, and was adopted in Switzerland, Hungary, Bohemia, and other churches. His writings are very numerous, and were highly esteemed in England during the reign of Elizabeth. The catalogue of the city library of Zürich mentions about a hundred. But they have never been collected. They consist of commentaries on the Bible, sermons, polemics against the Lutherans, the Anabaptists, etc., and dogmatical expositions, De Gratia Dei iustificante, De Scripturæ Sanctæ Autoritate, etc. Many of his sermons have been translated into English: One Hundred Sermons on the Apocalypse, 1561; Twenty-six Sermons on Jeremiah, 1583; Five Decades of Sermons (1587), reprinted in 4 vols. (1840). His life was written by CARL PESTAZZI, 1858, and ROGET CHRISTOFFEL, 1875. See also G. R. ZIMMERMANN, Die züricher Kirche und ihre Antistes, Zürich, 1877.

JUSTUS HEER.

BUNGENER, Felix, the author of the History of the Council of Trent, b. at Marseilles, 1814; d. Geneva, June 14, 1874. He took his degree at Strassburg; was ordained in Geneva; pursued the sacred calling for five years, but finally abandoned for teaching and literature. From 1853 to the year of his death he edited an annual chronicle, Étrennes religieuses, particularly devoted to the history of the attack on the Genevan Protestants by their two foes, ultramontanism and science, "falsely so called." In 1863 he wrote his poetic Trois jours de la mort d'un père, which proved the existence of a tenderer heart than he is credited with by many. He was indeed a man of rare moral as well as intellectual qualities. The works by which he is best known are the historical romances, Un Sermon sous Louis XIV., 1843 ("The Preacher and the King," Boston, n.d.), — this gave him a great reputation, Les trois sermons sous Louis XV., 1849, 3 vols. ("The Priest and the Huguenot," Boston, n.d., 2 vols.), and, above all, the history, Histoire du concile de Trente, 1847, 2 vols. ("History of the Council of Trent," N. Y., 1855). In 1853 he conceived the idea of writing a series which should oppose Rome successively to the Bible, moral philosophy, and history. In 1859 he issued the first volume, Rome et la Bible; in 1861, Rome et le cœur humaine. The calling of the Vatican Council interrupted the series, and led him to write, in 1870, Pape et Concile au XIXe siècle ("Rome and the Council in the Nineteenth Century," Edinburgh, 1870). Besides these works he wrote Voltaire et son siècle (2 vols. 1851); Julien, ou la fin d'un siècle (4 vols. 1854); Christ et le siècle (1856); and on Calvin (1863), Lincoln (1865), Saint Paul (1867). A volume of Sermons was published after his death (1875). He aided by solid, lasting compositions, the cause of Protestantism, so dear to his heart. His writings were very numerous: many remain still unpublished. See Felix Bungener, by JEAN GABEREL, in Étrennes religieuses for 1875.

BUNSEN, Christian Karl Josias, b. at Korbach, in the principality of Waldeck, Aug. 25, 1791; d. at Bonn, Nov. 28, 1860. He studied theology and philology in Marburg and Göttingen, 1808-13; was by his acquaintance with Niebuhr and Silvestre de Sacy led to the study of ancient history and Oriental languages, and was preparing for a journey to the East, when, in 1818, he settled in Rome, first as secretary to the Prussian embassy, then as chargé d'affaires since 1823, and since 1827 as minister resident. In 1839 he was sent as minister to Bern, and in 1841 to London, where he remained till 1854. The rest of his life he spent as a private citizen, mostly residing at Heidelberg, and devoting himself to literary pursuits, — philology, history, and theology. Among his historical works are Die Basiliken des christlichen Roms, Munich, 1843, and Ägyptens Stelle in der Weltgeschichte, Hamburg, 1844-57, 6 vols., of which work is a shorter but much improved English edition, Egypt's Place in Universal History, with notes and additions by S. Birch, London, 1847-67. Also some of his theological writings have an historical character, such as Ignatius von Antiochien und seine Zeit, Hamburg, 1847, and Hippolytus and his Age, London, 1852, 2 vols., which, together with his Analecta Ante-Nicæna, and Outlines of the Philosophy of Universal History, form his great work, Christianity and Mankind, London, 1854, 7 vols. A directly polemical character have his Die Verfassung der Kirche der Zukunft (1845) and Die Zeichen der Zeit (1855), both translated into English under the titles, The Church of the Future, and The Signs of the Times, the latter of which involved him in a sharp controversy with Stahl and Hengstenberg. As the positive complement to his polemical and critical writings may be considered his Vollständiges Bibelwerk für die Gemeinde, 9 vols., 1858, finished by H. Holtzmann in 1870. His Memoirs, containing parts of his private correspondence, were published in 1868 by his widow. His correspondence with Humboldt appeared in 1869, and parts of his correspondence with Friedrich Wilhelm IV. in 1873. [Baron von Bunsen was a Christian nobleman of comprehensive culture, broad views, and great personal attraction. His hospitable home at the Capitol at Rome and at Carlton Terrace in London, was the centre of literary celebrities from all countries. He was an interpreter of German thought to England, and an intimate friend of Thomas Arnold, Archdeacon Hare, and Professor Maurice. He helped to establish the Anglo-Prussian bishopric at Jerusalem, as a basis of a larger union between the German evangelical and the Anglican churches. Like his royal patron and friend, Frederic William IV. of Prussia, he had a romantic turn of mind, and engaged in fanciful schemes. He entertained many questionable opinions; but his heart was fixed on Christ as his divine Saviour, and he died in that faith. His wife was one of the noblest and most cultured English ladies of the age, and her memoir of her husband is an abiding monument to both.]

ADOLF KAMPHAUSEN.

BUNTING, Jabez, a very influential name in the English Wesleyan Church, b. at Manchester, May 13, 1779; d. June 16, 1858. Educated very carefully in his native town, and naturally of superior mental gifts, a man of great sagacity and power of administration, from the time of his becoming a member of conference (1799) he steadily rose in the estimation of his brethren and the Church at large. For fifty-seven years he served his denomination. From 1834 to his death he was president of the newly-established Wesleyan Theological Institution, which has done much to elevate the standard of Wesleyan ministerial culture; was four times president of the conference, and for eighteen years secretary of the Wesleyan Missionary Society, to whose success he so largely contributed. Through him the lay element was brought out in the management of the Church. In every position Dr. Bunting was eminent. His word was law. But he used his influence for no personal ends, and withal kept his heart pure and humble. Posthumous Sermons, 2 vols., 1861. See Memoir by his son, 1859, first volume (all published).

BUNYAN, John, the "Immortal Dreamer of Bedford Jail," b. in 1628 at Elstow, one mile from Bedford, Eng.; d. in London, Aug. 31, 1688. He was a tinker, like his father before him, brought up to attend the National Church, but was, according to his own confession, which must, however, be received with caution, in youth given to lying and swearing, although he was never drunk, perfectly chaste, and in truth greatly superior to his class. For a few months in 1645 he was in the army, it is uncertain upon which side, and was present at the siege of Leicester. A year after his return to Elstow, he married. He was then about twenty years old. But with the setting up of his home began his mental troubles. He became a prey to melancholy upon religion; and the wildest delusions seized his fertile brain. His wife brought him as her only portion two books which she inherited from her father, — Bishop Lewis Baily's The Practice of Piety, and Arthur Dent's The Plain Man's Pathway to Heaven, which was an allegory, first published in 1622, — and in herself a living embodiment of the Puritanical teaching. Such contact produced at the beginning a great though painful impression upon him.

He gave up reluctantly but conscientiously, one after another, the innocent amusements of dancing, tipcat, ringing the village church-bells, and reading the life of Sir Bevis of Southampton, a semi-Oriental and absurd romance very popular in his day. But he thus became a Pharisee, maintaining a strict conversation, indeed, without having a heart in the business. God was, however, fitting him in a wonderful way for the immortal book he was to write; and so he passed from formalism to faith by the "straight way" of an excited, tender conscience. He was morbidly sensitive to sin; he was tormented by dread of reprobation; he was tempted to commit the unpardonable sin; he thought his day of grace was ended. But amid this spiritual darkness he prospered in business. The best evidence of this is, that in 1653 his name appears among thirty-six appended to an address sent up from Bedfordshire to Cromwell, approving the dismissal of the Long Parliament, and recommending the country magistrates as fit persons to serve in the Assembly which was to take its place; which proves that he must have been at least a householder, and a person of consideration.

In the mercy of God, morning at length dawned upon the soul of the tinker. He was converted, not by any means instantaneously, for the measured steps of his Godward progress can be distinctly traced, but slowly and thoughtfully. The pious women of Bedford whose talk upon the "new birth" arrested his attention one day as he was passing carelessly along; the godly John Gifford, himself a reformed reprobate; the Baptist minister in Bedford, to whom the pious women introduced him, — these were the most prominent of the human agents in the change. At length, however, in 1653, John Bunyan was baptized in the Ouse, and began the public life of a Baptist, or rather of a Christian. As was to be expected, very soon thereafter he became a Baptist preacher, if a denominational name should be given to one who was so catholic, and about whom the least distinctive thing is his pedobaptist views. No such preacher to the uneducated English masses was to be found anywhere. He was a man of one book, but that book was the Bible. He had had intimate acquaintance with it since childhood. All the days of his wandering had been rendered uneasy by his recollection of the Bible curses upon the ungodly. He had had a spiritual experience of an exceptional character. He had run the gamut of soul music: over his soul, as over the keys of an organ, the Master Hand had passed, and from the deepest bass to the highest treble his soul had gone. His theology was Calvinistic. He preached the fall with its fatal consequences, free will, election, reprobation, an eternal heaven and hell.

He began to preach while a deacon in Mr. Gifford's Church, in 1655; but so extraordinary was his popularity, that in 1657 he devoted his whole time to the work. Unknown to him, his taking up preaching as his regular profession was a link in the chain of wonderful providences by which this "Jerusalem sinner" was to be trained to produce the Pilgrim's Progress. In 1660 the Act of Uniformity, compelling attendance upon the National Church, was revived. No distinction was made among Dissenters. The harmless Baptists and Quakers were equally under the ban with the fiery Independents and bigoted Presbyterians. The Bedford Baptists refused obedience; and Bunyan, for the odious sin of secretly continuing his ministry, was arrested, and committed to prison by the magistrates, who, however, were friendly to him, and would have spared him, had the law allowed. There he passed the next twelve years of his life. Tradition, without probability, puts him in the smallest of the three prisons of Bedford.

To many persons it seems wholly unnecessary for him to have been imprisoned at all; and the extraordinary opportunities given him to escape by a little casuistry show the unwillingness of all parties to keep so eminent a saint in durance vile. But as Bunyan stoutly refused to attend the National Church, or to give up preaching, his case was hopeless. To such a man the separation from his family was very painful. Two years before his arrest his wife had died, leaving him with four small children, one of whom, Mary, was blind, and therefore the object of peculiar affection. Within a year he had married a second time, and to a young woman of piety and courage. By her a pardon for him was sought through the friendly intervention of the high sheriff in consequence of a jail-delivery in honor of the coronation of Charles II., April 23, 1661. But, though Sir Matthew Hale took a kindly interest in her and her cause, the law had to be obeyed, and a pardon was refused so obstinate an offender as Bunyan. At first his imprisonment was merely nominal. He was allowed to go where he pleased; but he used his liberty to resume preaching, and so he was put into strict confinement. He was not formally tried: if he had been, he would have been transported. It was, therefore, not the cruelty of his jailers, but his own conscience, which made his imprisonment so long. "It might have ended at any time," says Mr. Froude, whose treatment of this point is admirable, "if he would have promised to confine his addresses to a private circle." We should not without evidence yield to the popular notion that those twelve years were a bitter struggle against poverty and disease, in a damp and dreary cell, with his poor wife sadly in need, and his children lacking food. No imprisonment is agreeable; and Bunyan counted it a great affliction to be debarred from ministerial labor. But as he was an influential, much respected man, had many friends, and was, so far as we can judge, in (comparatively) good circumstances, it is inconceivable that he endured any unusual suffering. Besides, would the Baptists have allowed their most distinguished preacher to starve? We see, therefore, in Bunyan's twelve years' imprisonment proof of his constancy, patience, and courage, and a wise Providence. His library consisted of the Bible, Concordance, and Foxe's Book of Martyrs. He used the enforced leisure in reading and writing (the Pilgrim's Progress was then begun, without thought of publication), and also in making tags of boot-laces, thus doing something to support his family. But toward the close of the twelve years more liberty was given him. In 1670 we read of his preaching in the woods. In 1671 he became an elder, and on Dec. 12 of that year, pastor of the Bedford Baptist Chapel. Curiously, he was liberated by those who had no interest in him, nor sympathy with his views. Charles II., with the ultimate design of removing disabilities from Roman Catholics, issued the Declaration of Indulgence (1672), which annulled the penal acts against Dissenters; and so upon May 8 he was released, and the next day his license as pastor of the chapel was issued. Out of gratitude to Charles II., he published soon after a Discourse upon Antichrist, in which he innocently credits the King with the most honorable and pious intentions, and urges loyalty upon his countrymen. This treatise was afterwards used against him. The closing years of his life were laborious and honored. He preached annually in the Baptist churches of London; but he retained his charge at Bedford. His domestic life was pleasant; although he mourned the loss of his blind daughter, who had died while he was in prison. He seems also to have been most of the time in good health. His death was brought about by being chilled in a rain-storm on his return from effecting the reconciliation between a father and son. The exact date of this event is unknown, probably Aug. 31, 1688.

Character. — John Bunyan was one of the noblest of the many noble Puritans. He spent his life in devotion to the highest ideals of duty, and his death fitly followed a sacrifice of self. His early surroundings and occupation explain, if not excuse, the sins he charges himself with, and excite our wonder that he never committed the grosser sins of drunkenness and unclastity, which were probably sadly common in his class. A chaste and sober tinker was a great rarity. And the instances of the holiest men humbling themselves as sinners in the presence of an angry and perfect God, and confessing themselves miracles of saving grace, are so numerous and natural, that we do not wonder that Bunyan accused himself of so many sins. The terrible mental trials Bunyan passed through before he found peace were due more to the artificial notions of his day in regard to sin, and to his own active mind, than to any work of the Spirit. But, as we look back upon his life, we see the rude, profane youth, under the tuition of the Spirit in the hard school of experience, developed into the saintly man before whose inspired vision the Heavenly City stood revealed. Out of obscurity God lifted him into prominence; so that when he died he was mourned, not only as the most gifted minister in his denomination (his zeal had won him the soubriquet "Bishop Bunyan"), but as one of England's worthies, one of the pillars of the Church.

Writings. — The one book which God ordained John Bunyan should write was the Pilgrim's Progress. For it his life was a preparation; and because the experiences therein recorded are genuine has the book become a world classic. Every one can see himself, at least in some phase, faithfully mirrored in the Pilgrim. Two opinions, from critics of far different orders of mind, deserve quotation. Coleridge says, "I know of no book — the Bible excepted, as above all comparison — which I, according to my judgment and experience, could so safely recommend as teaching and enforcing the whole saving truth according to the mind that was in Christ Jesus, as the Pilgrim's Progress. It is, in my conviction, incomparably the best Summa Theologicæ Evangelicæ ever produced by a writer not miraculously inspired." In his famous essay upon Bunyan, Macaulay pays this tribute to his genius: "That wonderful book, while it obtains admiration from the most fastidious critics, is loved by those who are too simple to admire it. In every nursery the Pilgrim's Progress is a greater favorite than Jack the Giant-Killer. Every reader knows the straight and narrow path as well as he knows a road in which he has gone backward and forward a hundred times. This is the highest miracle of genius, — that things which are not should be as though they were; that the imaginations of one mind should become the personal recollections of another. And this miracle the tinker has wrought. . . . The style of Bunyan is delightful to every reader, and invaluable as a study to every person who wishes to obtain a wide command over the English language. There is no book in our literature on which we would so readily stake the fame of the old unpolluted English language, no book which shows so well how rich that language is in its own proper wealth, and how little it has improved by all that it has borrowed. . . . Though there were many clever men in England during the latter half of the seventeenth century, there were only two great creative minds. One of these produced the Paradise Lost; the other, the Pilgrim's Progress." But, besides the Pilgrim, two other compositions claim attention, — the Life of Mr. Badman (published 1680), told in a dialogue between Mr. Wiseman and Mr. Attentive, a very interesting story of a thorough rascal; and the Holy War (1682), an allegory which would surely have been regarded as incomparable, were it not for the Pilgrim's Progress. Bunyan published, besides, a number of sermons, controversial tracts, spiritualized Scripture passages, and even verses. In regard to the latter, while he cannot be called a poet of great merit, he yet pleases by his simplicity and directness. Some of these writings, notably much of the Pilgrim's Progress, were composed while he was in prison.

Bibliography. — There are several editions of his complete works. The first complete edition was published in 1692, 2 vols. folio; the latest and best, edited with elaborate notes, a Memoir, etc., by George Offor, London, 1853, 3 vols. royal 8vo. The biography of Bunyan is best read in his own language in Grace Abounding to the Chief of Sinners. But Burder (1786), Hawker (1822), Southey (1839), Philip (1839), and Offor (1856), have elaborated lives of the great nonconformist in connection with editions of the Pilgrim's Progress. Southey dissents from the common representation of Bunyan as an awful sinner, believing that the language Bunyan employs is that of religious enthusiasm. The last, and in some respects the best, brief biography is by Mr. J. A. Froude, London and N. Y., 1880.

The Pilgrim's Progress. — In the Lenox Library of New-York City there is a noteworthy, indeed unique, collection of editions of the Pilgrim's Progress. In 1879, under the care of Dr. S. Austin Allibone, was printed, not published, under the title Contributions to a Catalogue of the Lenox Library, No. IV., Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress, Etc., a neatly-arranged list of this collection, with interesting bibliographical notes. The First Part contains a long and valuable "Note on the Early Editions of the Pilgrim's Progress." It is now settled that the first edition appeared in 1678. Only two copies are known to exist, — one in the R. S. Holford Collection in England, and the other in the Lenox Library in New-York City, which is far richer in editions of the Pilgrim's Progress than any other library. The Lenox Library has two hundred and fifty-eight editions of this book in English, and seventy-four of it in foreign languages; thus attesting the enormous circulation of the book, which has been translated (usually immediately after the Bible) into almost every literary language. — The first edition is in foolscap 8vo, 232 pages; prefixed is The Author's Apology For his Book, 8 pages (un-numbered). It has no portrait or cuts. The second edition, "with Additions," appeared the same year, in 12mo; and the third edition, with the final additions to the text of the First Part, the next year (1679), also in 12mo. — The Second Part was not published until 1684, and then separately: the First Part was then in the ninth edition. The two Parts do not seem to have been combined in one volume until 1728. — There was a so-called Third Part (London, 1693), author unknown, which was denounced upon the titlepage of the authorized (Pounder's) edition to be an Impostor (sic), but which was often reprinted, and sometimes bound up with the First and Second (there is an edition so late as 1852, Routledge & Co., London); but it is not much known in America. It has often been noticed that the Pilgrim's Progress was for many years the household treasure of the lowly alone; but at length it became the delight of the upper classes. This gradual spread sufficiently accounts for the comparative meanness of the editions in illustration and binding. With sincere gratification it is therefore recorded that at last the book appears in a worthy make-up: The Pilgrim's Progress. With One Hundred Illustrations by Frederick Barnard and Others, London, Strahan & Co., 4to, 1880. Edition de Luxe, on Dutch paper, with proofs of the illustrations on Japanese paper. Only five hundred copies printed. There is also a cheap edition, with the same illustrations upon ordinary but excellent paper. The illustrations are uniformly good, many of them worthy of the highest praise.

SAMUEL M. JACKSON.

BURGES, Cornelius, b. in Somersetshire (date undetermined); d. June 9, 1665. He was educated at Oxford in Wadham and other colleges; became vicar of Watford in Hartfordshire in 1613, also rector of St. Magnus Church in London, holding the two charges at the same time, and was, on the accession of Charles I., appointed one of the chaplains in ordinary. He took both degrees of divinity in 1627. He was appointed a member of the Westminster Assembly in 1643. July 8 he was chosen by them assessor with Dr. White, and generally occupied the chair on account of the illness of Dr. Twisse. He was chairman of the first of the three grand committees of the Assembly, and one of the most energetic members of the body, being active especially in the discussion of Church Government and the Directory for Worship. He was energetic in political as well as ecclesiastical affairs. His chief works are: A chain of Graces drawn out at length for Reformation of Manners, London, 1622; The Fire of the Sanctuary newly discovered or a complete Tract of Zeal, London, 1625; and Baptismal Regeneration of Elect Infants, Oxon., 1629. In the latter he maintains "It is most agreeable to the Institution of Christ that all elect infants that are baptized (unless in some extraordinary cases) do, ordinarily, receive, from Christ, the Spirit in Baptism, for their first solemn initiation into Christ, and for their future actual renovation, in God's good time, if they live to yeares of discretion, and enjoy the ordinary means of grace appointed of God to this end." He delivered a large number of sermons before Parliament and other civil bodies, which were published from time to time. He is credited also with the paper subscribed by the London ministers, entitled A Vindication of the ministers of the Gospel in and about London from the unjust Aspersions cast upon their former proceedings for the Parliament, as if they had promoted the Bringing of the King to Capital Punishment, London, 1648. He was an able and pious man, who was much abused subsequently by the Bishops' party.

C. A. BRIGGS.

BURGESS, Anthony, a Nonconformist clergyman, educated at St. John's College, Cambridge, and a fellow of Emmanuel College; held in 1635 a living of Sutton-Coldfield, Warwickshire; was member of the Westminster Assembly of Divines; ejected at the Restoration, lived afterwards in retirement at Tamworth. His principal works are: Vindiciæ Legis, London (1646); True Doctrine of Justification (1655); CXLV. Sermons on John xvii. (1656); Spiritual Refinings, delivered in 161 sermons (2d ed., 1658); Doctrine of Original Sin (1659).

BURGESS, Daniel, Dissenting divine, b. at Waltham, Middlesex, 1645; d. January, 1712-13. He was graduated at Oxford; in 1667 went to Waltham as master of a school at Charleville, in 1675 minister, took charge of a congregation in Aldersgate Street, Covent Garden, London, afterwards in Carey Street. He was for a time tutor of Henry St. John (Lord Bolingbroke). He was eminent for wit. He issued Man's Whole Duty, London, 1690, and other sermons.

BURGESS, George, b. at Providence, R.I., April 31, 1809; d. on the passage home from the West Indies, April 23, 1866; was educated in his own University; studied in Göttingen, Bonn, and Berlin; was made rector of Christ Church, Hartford, Conn., in 1834, and the first Episcopal Bishop of the diocese of Maine in 1847, where his memory is still cherished. He published a translation of the Psalms in English verse, New York, 1812; Pages of the Ecclesiastical History of New England, Boston, 1847; The Last Enemy, Phil., 1850; Sermons; Last Journal, with Introduction by Rev. A. Lee, N.Y.; The Gospel of Luke, with Commentary, N.Y., 1880. See Memoir by his Brother, A. Burgess, Phila., 1869.

BURGUNDIANS, The, when first known to history, towards the close of the third century, settled in the regions between the Oder and the Vistula. In the middle of the fourth century they had moved westwards, and stood on the banks of the Main; and when, in 406, Stilicho retreated the Roman legions from the Rhine in order to protect Italy against the West-Goths, the Burgundians pushed onwards, and occupied the regions between Mayence and Strassburg. Amalgamating with other Germanic tribes, they formed in the beginning of the fifth century a powerful kingdom between the Rhine and the Rhone, which lasted till the middle of the sixth century, and produced the Gombettes, the famous Burgundian law-book, one of the most interesting and important monuments of ancient Germanic civilization. In their many dealings with the Romans the Burgundians early became acquainted with Christianity; but in the fifth century they appear to have lapsed into Arianism. Their king, Gundobad, held in 499 a great disputation between the Catholic and the Arian priests. Avitus offered a miracle in proof of the truth of the Catholic faith; but the Arians declined to accept any testimony of that kind, and the conference ended without any practical result. But in 516 Gundobad died; and in 517 his son and successor, Sigismund, who belonged to the Catholic Church, convened a council at Epaon, and quietly, without encountering any serious resistance, established the Catholic doctrines and rites among his subjects. All sources referring to the Burgundian nation and kingdom have been collected by SCHÖPFLIN in his Commentationes Historice et Criticæ, Bas., 1741. ALBRECHT VOGEL.

BURIAL. I. AMONG THE ANCIENT HEBREWS. — When life had fled, the relatives kissed the body, and closed the eyes (Gen. xlv. 4, l. 1): it was then washed (Acts ix. 37), and wrapped in numerous folds of linen (Matt. xxvii. 59), or in grave-clothes (John xi. 44), between which were laid odoriferous spices, myrrh, aloes, etc. (John xix. 39 sq.). It may well have been that a portion of the great amount (one hundred pounds weight) brought for the burial of Jesus was intended to be burnt in his honor, and another portion to form a "bed of spices;" for Joseph and Nicodemus were both wealthy, and their respect for Jesus was great. At all events, we find such a use of spices in the case of Asa (2 Chron. xvi. 14). Fallen warriors were buried with their weapons (Ezek. xxxii. 27). Since, according to the law (Num. xix. 11 sq.), it was defilement to touch the dead, it was customary to bury as soon after death as possible, usually on the same day (Acts v. 5 sq.). The climate also necessitated speedy burial. A longer period than a day must, however, have elapsed between the death of Sarah and her burial (Gen. xxiii. 2, 19). The body was borne upon a bier in an open coffin, accompanied by the relatives and friends, and a procession varying in number according to circumstances (2 Sam. iii. 31; Luke vii. 12), among whom were, of course, those most intimate with the deceased, as his sons, spouse, disciples, who were obligated to pay the last respects (Gen. xxv. 9; Judg. xvi. 31; Mark vi. 29). It was customary to hire mourning women and pipers as soon as the person died; and these, sitting among the mourners, by their shrill cries, eulogistic dirges, affected grief, and plaintive strains, kept up the grief of the really afflicted to the agonizing point, and continued their services while the body was carried through the streets (Jer. ix. 17 sq.; Matt. ix. 23; Mark v. 38). In later times there were funeral feasts, sometimes of great extravagance (Joseph.

War, II. 1, 1, cf. Tob. iv. 17; Ep. Jer. 32). The passages sometimes quoted as showing the earlier Hebrews to have had this custom (2 Sam. iii. 35; Jer. xvi. 5 sq.; Ezek. xxiv. 17; Hos. ix. 4) are not to the point, because they refer to the return of the mourner to his usual food after his sorrow has abated. On the contrary, the relatives and friends sent the needed food into the house of mourning (Deut. xxvi. 14, cf. 2 Sam. iii. 35). The mourning time lasted seven days (Gen. 1. 10; 1 Sam. xxxi. 13), but in extraordinary cases thirty days (Num. xx. 29; Deut. xxxiv. 8), and was characterized by fasting, tearing in the garments a little slit in front, wearing sackcloth, scattering ashes and dust, shaving the beard, and such like actions (Gen. xxxvii. 34; 2 Sam. iii. 31, xiii. 31; Ezek. xxiv. 17 sq.; Amos viii. 10). But the heathen customs of cutting the flesh, and shaving the fore part of the head and the eyebrows, were forbidden (Lev. xix. 28; Deut. xiv. 1).

The Jews buried, and did not burn, their dead. It is true there is mention of burning; but it was either as a punishment for an infamous crime (Lev. xx. 14, xxi. 9), or else rendered necessary; as in a pestilence, when there was neither time nor people enough (Amos vi. 10), or in a war, when the work of disposing of the dead must be done quickly (1 Sam. xxxi. 12). Nothing was considered as so dishonorable and horrible as to have to lie unburied, the prey of dogs, hyenas, and vultures; and hence the threat was enough to make the stoutest quail (1 Kings xiii. 22, xiv. 11; Jer. xvi. 4; Ezek. xxix. 5). It was a pious duty to bury the dead, and a meritorious act, the later Jews thought (cf. Tob. i. 17, ii. 3 sq.). It was obligatory according to the law (Deut. xxi. 23) to bury even those capitally punished before sunset (Josh. viii. 29, x. 27; Matt. xxvii. 58; John xix. 31; cf. Josephus, War, IV. 5, 2). One of the most picturesque scenes in all literature is the faithful watch of Rizpah, the concubine of Saul, over the seven slain sons of Saul; for, "from the beginning of harvest until water dropped out of heaven (six months), she suffered neither the birds of the air to rest on them by day, nor the beasts of the field by night" (2 Sam. xxi. 10).

The burial-places were outside the towns and cities, as they ought always to be (Luke vii. 12; John xi. 30). Kings and prophets (1 Sam. xxv. 1) alone had an intramural grave. The sepulchres were either natural or artificial caves in groves or gardens (Gen. xxiii. 17; 1 Kings ii. 34; 2 Kings xxi. 18, 26; John xix. 41). They were, it would seem, occasionally perpendicular (Luke xi. 44), though probably generally horizontal, and were closed by a door or a large stone (Matt. xxvii. 60; John xi. 38) as a protection against injury from man or beasts. The whole country is full of rock tombs.

These rock tombs were chambers excavated "in the face of a precipitous rock, and their entrances were sometimes at an apparently inaccessible height from the ground. Where no such slopes were available, a shaft was sunk in the rock, and the tomb excavated in the side of the shaft, in which a staircase descended. The tomb-chambers are quadrangular in shape; and a series of them sometimes extends into the rock for a considerable distance. Dr. Tobler has conveniently classed these tombs as follows: (1) sunken tombs, hollowed in the rock like modern graves, and then closed with a slab of stone; (2) shaft tombs, consisting of openings five to six feet long and a foot and a half square, usually hewn horizontally in the rock, and often provided with a gutter in the floor, into which the body was pushed, probably with its feet foremost; (3) shelf tombs, or those containing shelves or benches for the reception of the dead, about two feet from the ground, and generally with vaulted roofs; (4) niche tombs, hewn laterally in the face of the rock, about two feet and a half from the ground, of the length of the body, and about a foot and a half square."—BÄDEKER'S Palestine and Syria, p. 116.

Sarcophagi were used only by the rich, and were decorated with flowers and leaves. (Many of them are to-day used in Syria as fountain-troughs.) But the usual way was to bury without coffins. Not only kings and distinguished persons, but whoever was able, had their own hereditary family tombs (Gen. xxiii. 6 sq.), and it was looked upon as a misfortune not to be buried with one's kin; and therefore, when possible, the dead were taken thither (Gen. xlvii. 29, l. 5; 2 Sam. xix. 37; 1 Kings xiii. 22). For the poor, for pilgrims and such like, and even for those in better circumstances, cemeteries became in after-times necessities (2 Kings xxiii. 6; Jer. xxvi. 23). The "Potter's Field," as we call such a place, may have gotten its original name from the holes out of which the clay had been dug being used for burying-places. Over the graves, monuments were occasionally built (Gen. xxxv. 20; 2 Sam. xviii. 18). Upon the graves of obnoxious persons in insult stones were thrown,—a custom still maintained in the East (Josh. vii. 26, viii. 29). In the post-exilian days those tombs which could not be easily recognized from a distance as such were "whited" (Matt. xxiii. 27) every spring, after the rains, before the passover, to warn passers-by of defilement through a touch of the same. The sepulchres of the prophets were sought out and decorated (Matt. xxiii. 27, 29). The tombs were believed to be tenanted by demons (Matt. viii. 28), and were also used for superstitious purposes (Isa. viii. 19, lxxv. 4).

The tombs constitute a remarkable feature among the curiosities of modern Jerusalem. They are found all around the city. But unhappily the tombs of the kings, so often referred to in the Kings and Chronicles, have not been found as yet. The tombs so called were probably built by Queen Helena of Adiabene (Joseph. Antiq. XX. 4, 3). Every time a king, because of leprosy, as Uzziah (2 Chron. xxvi. 23), or of an unworthy life (2 Chron. xxi. 20, xxiv. 25, xxviii. 27), or at his own request, was buried somewhere else, was particularly noticed. Jehoiada, the high priest in Joash's day, was buried "among the kings" because he had done good in Israel (2 Chron. xxiv. 16).

II. AMONG THE CHRISTIANS.—The conviction that the bodies of those who died in the Lord were still united to Christ led to great care and reverence in handling the dead; and the Emperor Julian acknowledged that this fact was one reason for the success of Christianity. While the Romans burnt their dead, the Christians always buried them, and the African Christians very generally embalmed. Eusebius relates how the persecutors of the Church thought to injure her yet more by burning the bodies of those whom they had put to death.

The burial-place was originally, in accordance with Jewish and Roman law, outside of the city. And at Rome, Naples, and Milan, the Christians availed themselves of the nature of the soil to dig passages under the earth for burial purposes; and thence the catacombs. But when Christianity became the religion of the empire, the Christians could bury where they pleased, and quite naturally chose to lie as near as possible to saints or martyrs. Hence the burials in the churches dedicated to such worthies were frequent, and multiplied so greatly, leading, perhaps, to indecorous rivalry, that Gratian, Valentinian, and Theodosius, in A.D. 386, forbade them. Notwithstanding, they continued, and were rebuked by the Church, as in the 18th canon of the Second Council of Braga (in Portugal), A.D. 563, which expressly ordered that bodies must not be buried inside the churches, but outside, by the church-walls. (See Hefele's Conciliengeschichte, vol. 3, p. 17.) Inside the church, however, there was a place, somewhat removed from the altar, reserved for the interment of bishops, abbots, priests, and lay persons distinguished for sanctity. Others might be buried in the court before the chief entrance and other entrances, and in the corners of the church-walls. But the desire to be buried in "the holy ground" was too strong for councils and canon laws. Cloister churches often won the privilege of interment within them for those who were not monks; and family vaults were erected in churches. The regulations upon this subject, though numerous, seem to have been largely futile. The law of Germany forbids such burials, but that of England grants them on permission of the incumbent.

Funeral rites have always varied according to time and taste. Among the early Christians they were the direct antitheses to the Pagan customs, which symbolized defeat and sorrow; while the Christian spoke of victory and joy. The Pagans buried by night, because they regarded a funeral as a thing of evil omen to look upon; the Christians by day, although they retained the lighted tapers of the Pagan mode. The Pagans carried the funereal cypress, and marched in silence; while the Christians had palm and olive branches, and sang joyful strains as they went, and often sent clouds of incense toward heaven, and strewed flowers in the way. Some of the Fathers — such as Cyprian (de Mortal. § 20), who says that black garments should not be taken upon us here for the sake of the dead, who are clothed in white; and Augustine (de Consol. Mort. II. cap. 5), who sees the case of David changing his behavior when Bathsheba's adulterous child was dead as a reason for Christians looking upon death as a triumph — endeavored to alter the dress of mourners from melancholy to joyful robes; but doubtless the natural feeling had its way, and sad hearts desired sad clothing. It was customary to give appropriate addresses, either in the church at the grave, and at the latter, at least as early as the fourth century, to celebrate the Eucharist. The body was lowered face upwards, feet toward the east. ["Prayers for the dead were offered when it became customary at the grave to commend the souls of the deceased to God."] In the Roman-Catholic Church there are regular prayers for the dead, and joined to them absolution and mass. On the third, seventh, thirtieth (or fortieth) day after the death, and also on the anniversary of the event, masses are said. The Protestant Church has cast aside all such superstitions and extra, if not anti-scriptural, services.

According to canon law, the burial ordinarily takes place in the churchyard of the parish in which the deceased received the sacrament, or where his ancestors are buried, either in the common cemetery, or in the family plot or vault. But yet the canon law allows every one not a minor to choose another place of interment. For minors a parent must choose. It is to be understood that the chosen place is in every case consecrated: particularly desirable is it that it should be a place in which mass was frequently celebrated. Protestant State churches follow pretty much the same rules. In the Roman, according to statute, if it can be proved that the choice of a burial-place was unduly influenced by the priest in favor of his own church, he (the priest) falls under the ban of the Church, and only the Pope can release him from it (c. 1. de sepulturis in VI. Clem. 3 in fine. de pœnis V. 8).

The buying of a burial-place is denounced as simony; but free gifts were allowed. Hence arose the so-called "surplice fees," to which the pastor of the deceased is entitled in case the body is buried out of the parish. But no fees are exacted when a stranger dies in the parish, and is carried elsewhere. The amount of the fees depends upon circumstances; e.g., whether the funeral is with the ringing of bells (sepultura solennis), or without it (sepultura minus solennis).

A church-funeral is refused in general to all non-believers, and, in the Roman-Catholic Church, to all unbaptized infants, who are to be buried in a particular (unblessed) part of the churchyard, without any liturgy. The following persons were, according to the Council of Trent, also excluded from the rites: the excommunicated, suicides (in doubtful cases these were buried in silence), those who fell in tournament or duel, usurers, robbers, incendiaries, those guilty of sacrilege, those who had not once in the year confessed, or received the sacrament, open blasphemers, those condemned, apostates, schismatics, and heretics.

BURIDAN, Jean, b. at Bethune in Artois towards the end of the thirteenth century; d. after 1358; was a pupil of W. Occam, and taught for some time with great success in the University of Paris, but retired afterwards to Germany, driven away by the Realists, and taught in Vienna. With him the very foundation of scholasticism — the implicit confidence in the unity of faith and knowledge, of religion and philosophy — began to shake. He developed Occam's nominalism until the conflict between dogma and metaphysics, between religious and philosophical truth, became apparent. But it is not known whether he himself, or some of his adversaries, first invented the famous fable of the ass starving between two bundles of hay, and first applied it as a fit representation of the psychological state of his scepticism. His works were published in Paris, 1500, 1516, 1518, and at Oxford, 1637, 1640, 1641. See HAURÉAU: Philos. Scolast., II. p. 483.

BURKITT, William, b. at Hitcham, Suffolk, Eng., July 25, 1650; d. at Dedham, Essex, October, 1703; studied at Cambridge, and became rector of Milden, Suffolk, in 1671, and vicar of Dedham in 1692. His Expository Notes on the New Testament, London, 1739, ran through many editions, and are still reprinted, e.g., N.Y., 1865. These Notes are rich in practical suggestions, and bear a very remarkable similarity to those of Matthew Henry.

BURMAH, Independent, a kingdom situated in South-east Asia, bordering upon Bengal. Area, a hundred and ninety thousand square miles; population, four million; capital, Mandalay. The territory was much reduced by British conquest in 1825 and 1852. The government is a pure despotism; the king dispensing torture, imprisonment, or death, according to his sovereign discretion, held in check only by fear of insurrection. Such a thing as even-handed justice is unknown. Society is in a continually shifting state, owing to the absence of hereditary honors, the absolute power of the king to raise or depose, and the necessity of continual bribery to avoid punishment. Women have more apparent liberty than in many parts of the East; for they are not shut up, but appear openly in society, and have free access in their own name to courts of law, where, if ill treatment is proved, divorce is readily obtained. In other respects, however, they are exposed to the most degrading treatment. They are sold for a time to strangers; and the practice is not considered shameful, nor the female in any respect dishonored. They are seldom unfaithful to their new master, and are generally of industrious and domestic habits, and not addicted to vice. The Burmese are Buddhists; but there are some Mohammedans in the country who have mosques at the capital, and a few Christians. Foreigners enjoy religious toleration; but attempts to convert the natives to any foreign faith are looked upon as an interference with their allegiance.

British Burmah, the country acquired by the British in 1825 and 1852. Education has not made much progress under the English plan of public instruction; but the people have a widespread system of primary education of their own in the monastic schools. See art. Burmah in Encyclopædia Britannica, 9th ed., vol. IV., whence the above information has been taken.

The human credit of introducing Christianity into Burmah belongs to the Rev. Adoniram Judson (see title), the able, indefatigable Baptist missionary, who in 1813 began his labors at Rangoon. The early trials and sufferings of this man of God were the condition of ultimate success. The Baptists have the field in British Burmah to-day, and their mission has been most remarkably successful. In 1879 the condition of the mission in the districts of Rangoon, Maulmain, and Toungoo is thus reported: 33 missionaries, 100 ordained native ministers, 300 helpers, about 270 schools, 12 institutions for higher education, 440 congregations (of which 80 are ministered to by ordained native preachers), 20,811 communicants, and about 70,000 native Christians, 1,309 baptisms during 1879. See CHRISTLIEB: Protestant Foreign Missions, Boston, 1980, p. 161. The Bible in Burmese was published by Judson in 1840. See art. KARENS.

BURMANN, Franz, b. at Leyden, 1632; d. Nov. 12, 1679, at Utrecht, where he was professor of the theology since 1662. His principal work is Synopsis Theologiae, which appeared in 1671, and attempts a dialectical reconciliation between the doctrines of Cocceius and those of the orthodox Reformed Church. He also wrote several devotional works in Dutch.

BURN, Richard, a philanthropist, b. at Winton, Westmoreland, Eng., 1720; d. Nov. 20, 1785, at Orton, where he was rector since 1740, and justice of the peace. The combination of these two offices occasioned him to write his Justice of the Peace and Parish Officer, London, 1755, 2 vols., which was several times reprinted. Also his Ecclesiastical Law, London, 1760, 2 vols., attracted much attention, and was afterwards enlarged. In 1764 he published A History of the Poor Law, and, in 1776, Observations on the Bill proposed in Parliament for erecting County Workhouses.

BURNET, Gilbert, b. in Edinburgh, Sept. 18, 1643; d. at Salisbury, March 17, 1715; was educated at Aberdeen; travelled in France and Holland; was ordained minister of Saltoun in 1665; became professor of divinity at Glasgow in 1669; removed in 1673 to London, and was made preacher at the Rolls Chapel, and lecturer at St. Clement's, and became one of the most popular preachers in town, but was dismissed in 1684 for his intimacy with Lord Russell, whom he attended on the scaffold. After the accession of James II. in 1685, he left England, visited France and Italy, and settled in the Hague, where he took a very active part in the execution of the plans of the Prince of Orange. In 1688 he returned to England with William II., and was shortly after (1689) made Bishop of Salisbury. His two principal and invaluable works are: History of the Reformation of the Church of England, of which the first volume appeared in 1681, the second in 1683, the third in 1715, and of which there is a recent, and the best, edition in 7 vols., by Pocock, 1865; and History of his own Time, published in a somewhat mutilated form by his son after his death (first volume, 1724; second, 1734), but re-edited and rendered complete by Dr. Routh, Oxford, 1833, 6 vols. Beside these two works, Burnet wrote a great number of historical, polemical, and devotional books, among which are: The Life of William Bellett, 1685; Exposition of the Thirty-nine Articles, 1699, which incurred the censure of the Lower House of Convocation; Memoirs of the Dukes of Hamilton, London, 1673; History of James II., published, with additional notes, in Oxford, 1852, etc.

BURNET, Thomas, b. at Croft in Yorkshire,

g., about 1635; d. in London, Sept. 27, 1715; low of Christ's College, Cambridge, 1657; mas- of the Charter House, 1685; was the author several works which have theological bearings. e—the famous Telluris Theoria Sacra, or Sacred History of the Earth, a brilliant, but, for scientific purposes, utterly worthless, work—appeared in Latin, London, 1681, in an English translation, folio, 1684–89, and was very popular, running through several editions; another, Archæologia Philosophicæ: sive Doctrina antiqua de Rerum Originibus (1692), in which he maintains the allegorical interpretation of the fall of man, and which cost him his position as clerk of the closet King William III., and marred his hope of advancement; another—a posthumous publication, Statu Mortuorum et Resurgentium Tractatus, 8—defended the doctrine of the middle state, millennium, and the limited duration of future punishment. See HEATHCOTE: Life of Thomas Burnett, D.D., London, 1759.

BURNETT PRIZES, The, two theological prizes, of at least twelve hundred pounds and four hundred pounds, instituted by a rich merchant of Aberdeen, of the name Burnett, 1729–84, to be awarded every fortieth year to the two best treatises on the evidences of the existence of God. The prizes were distributed for the first time in 1809, and for the second time in 1855, when they were taken by Rev. Robert Anchor Thompson, Christian Theism, and Rev. Dr. John Talloch, Christian Theism, respectively. The judges are the ministers of the Established Church in Aberdeen, and the principal and professors of King's and Marischal Colleges, Aberdeen, besides the three persons appointed by the trustees of the testator.

BURNS, William Chalmers, a famous Scotch missionary to China, b. at Dun, Scotland, April 15; d. at Port of Nieu-chwang, China, April 1838. His parents were persons of marked piety. His father, a Presbyterian minister, was the very model of a Christian pastor; his mother was an angel of sunshine; both were exceedingly pious. He was thus blessed with an early happy home, amid whose advantageous surroundings he began his education without interruption of the career before him, but rather to be a farmer. When thirteen years old, his father took him to his home in Aberdeen, and he remained in the grammar-school there, taught by Rev. Dr. James Melvin, a thorough scholar. After leaving the school he passed to the university, Glasgow (1831), determined to be a lawyer; but, to the surprise and delight of his parents, he changed with a change of heart, and became a minister. He re-entered the University of Aberdeen, and, as he was now a true Christian, he became a more faithful student, and attained by his success the mathematical scholarship, then the highest attainable distinction in the university. He took his degree in 1834, proceeded to Glasgow to study theology, was licensed by the presbytery of Glasgow, March 27, 1839, and for a year preached stately for Mr. McCheyne during his absence in Palestine; but on his return he became an evangelist, and held revival meetings, with extraordinary success, not only throughout Scotland, but in England, Ireland, and Canada (1844–46). But, although greatly interested in this peculiar work, Mr. Burns was a missionary at heart, and only waited the Master's hint to go. At last the intimation was plainly given; and, having been ordained as a missionary by the same presbytery of the English Presbyterian Church which had sent out Morrison (see title), he sailed June 9, 1847, to take charge of their mission in China. To the astonishment of his home friends, he began to speak in Chinese within two months of his arrival, having diligently studied the language while on the voyage. He made himself, indeed, in a very short time, as much a Chinaman as practicable, dressing and living after their mode, simply because he thought in this way the most advantageously to labor. He lived in Hong-Kong, Canton, Amoy, Shanghai, Peking, and Nieu-chwang. In 1853, while at Amoy, he printed his translation into Chinese of the first part of Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress. He afterwards issued the second part with cuts, which represented the persons of the immortal allegory as Chinamen. It was his lot to sow the seed for future harvests, and yet not altogether to be without the joy of the reapers. His linguistic ability, common sense, indomitable purpose, godly conversation, and, withal, great kindness of manner, won for him universal respect and confidence. It has been remarked, that if he had staid longer in some one district of country, instead of pursuing so desultory a course of labor, he might have been more useful; but he was so close a student of his Master's will, that these frequent removals were probably really divinely ordered. Mr. Burns never married, and so was much freer in his movements. When it is asked what he did, the answer must be, "He lived." He was one of those rare men who are rather an "influence than an agency." "Reckoned by the number of conversions under his direct preaching, the results are small. Measured by the effect of his personal influence, the results are great. From the nature of his work, that of pioneer, he could not expect to reap the fruits himself." But everybody in China knew him, and long will it be before the consecrating power of his holy life ceases to be felt. The mention of his name to-day to one who has lived there brings a smile and a word of praise. See the delightful Memoir of this remarkable man by Rev. Islay Burns, D.D., 6th ed., New York, 1871.

BURNS, James Drummond, a Presbyterian minister and Christian poet, b. at Edinburgh, Feb. 18, 1823; d. at Mentone, Nov. 27, 1864. Educated at the University of Edinburgh, he began pastoral labors in 1845 in the Free Church, Dunblane, Scotland, failed in health, and compelled to go to Madeira (1847), where he preached for nearly six years, and then settled in Hampstead. He married in 1859. In 1856 he issued his first volume of poetry, The Vision of Prophecy, and other Poems. His religious poems, scarcely known among us, are in England much admired. A few of his hymns have found their way into American collections.

See HAMILTON: Memoir and Remains of the Rev. James D. Burns, M.A., 2d ed., London, 1869. The volume contains many poems and hymns, besides sermons, etc.

BURRITT, Elihu, "the learned blacksmith," a Christian philanthropist and remarkable linguist,

b. in New Britain, Conn., Dec. 8, 1810; d. there March 6, 1879. His father was a farmer-mechanic, once a common type in New England; and it was at the forge that Burritt studied, first mathematics, and then languages, in which he won unexpected success. He taught an academy for a year, to the detriment of his health, and so went into business, in which he had varied fortunes. Meanwhile he kept adding to his linguistic stores. In Worcester (1837) he went back to his forge for his support. His fame as a linguist had spread; and in 1841 he was asked to lecture, and proved himself eminently qualified for the work, through his command of a vigorous, racy style, great natural eloquence, and kindling enthusiasm. Henceforward he was prominent before the public as lecturer, orator, editor, and philanthropist. Antislavery, peace, temperance, self-cultivation, — these were the objects of his lifelong advocacy. Mr. Burritt never married, and, for the better accomplishment of his plans, spent the greater part of his life in England. In 1847 he first developed the idea of the ocean penny postage, i. e., a penny to be added to the inland rate of any letter. This proposition excited great interest. He was very active in organizing the first Peace Congress, which was held in Paris in 1849, and in promoting similar gatherings. He took a prominent place in "The National Compensated Emancipation Company," which was organized at Cleveland, O., in August, 1856; and into this cause he threw himself with his accustomed energy. From 1865 to 1869 he was consular agent of the United States at Birmingham, Eng. The latter part of his life was quietly spent at New Britain.

Mr. Burritt's popular reputation among us rested upon his knowledge of a great number of languages, some forty indeed; but he served his generation to the measure of his ability in many ways, and few public-spirited men have been privileged to see so many of their plans realized. Slavery met its death-blow in the civil war; the international postal card was an actual ocean penny postage; the Geneva Congress of 1865 helped efficiently the cause of peace; the treaty of Washington (December, 1871) was a striking proof of the benefit of arbitration; and the total-abstinence cause was never in such favor as now.

Mr. Burritt published in 1848 Sparks from the Anvil; in 1853, Olive-Leaves, a series of brief essays on philanthropic topics, which have had an extensive circulation in several languages; in 1854, Thoughts on Things at Home and Abroad; in 1865, A Walk from John o'Groat's to Land's End; in 1869, Lectures and Speeches; in 1876, A Sanskrit Handbook for the Fireside; in 1878, Chips from many Blocks. See CHARLES NORTHEND: Life and Labors of Elihu Burritt.

BURROUGHES, Jeremiah, an eminent Puritan, b. 1599; d. Nov. 14, 1646. He was educated at Cambridge, but was obliged to leave the university on account of nonconformity; was assistant at Bury St. Edmunds, then rector of Titshall; but, under the pressure of Laud's persecution, he left the kingdom (1638), and settled as teacher of the Church in Rotterdam. He "afterwards became a famous preacher to two of the largest congregations about London, viz., Stepney and Cripplegate." He was a distinguished Independent. His great work, exhibiting his learning and piety, was An Exposition of Hosea: In Divers Lectures, London, 1643-51, 4 vols. folio, reprint, London, 1863, 8vo.

BURROUGHS, George, was imprisoned in Boston, May 8, 1692; brought to trial for witchcraft, Aug. 3, and executed Aug. 19. The date and place of his birth are unknown; but he was ordained pastor of Salem in 1680, resigned the position in 1685, and lived at Falmouth (now Portland), Me., until the destruction of that place by the Indians in 1690.

BURTON, Asa, b. at Preston (now Griswold), Conn., Aug. 25, 1752; d. at Thetford, Vt., May 1, 1836, having been ordained pastor there in 1779; published Essays on some of the First Principles of Metaphysics, Ethics, and Theology, 1824.

BURTON, Edward, b. at Shrewsbury, Eng., Feb. 13, 1794; d. at Oxford, Jan. 19, 1836; became professor of divinity in the University of Oxford in 1829, and published: Inquiry into the Heresies of the Apostolic Age, 1829; Testimonies of the Anti-Nicene Fathers to the Divinity of Christ, 1826; Testimonies of the Anti-Nicene Fathers to the Doctrine of the Trinity, and the Divinity of the Holy Ghost, 1831; Lectures on the Ecclesiastical History of the First Three Centuries, 1833; a Greek New Testament with English notes (a meritorious work), Oxford, 1831, 2 vols., subsequent editions in 1 vol. His Works have been collected and published, with a memoir, Oxford, 5 vols.

BURTON, Robert, b. at Lindley, Feb. 8, 1576; d. at Oxford, Jan. 25, 1639. He studied at Oxford, entered the Church, and became rector of Segrave, 1636. He was a good mathematician, a thorough classical scholar, an omnivorous reader, and a merry companion. His famous Anatomy of Melancholy appeared in 1621, and has been plagiarized by many a wit besides Laurence Sterne. The character of the book has been thus felicitously and humorously described by Taine in his History of English Literature, Bk. ii., c. 1: "He (Burton) read on for thirty years, put an encyclopædia into his head, and now, to amuse and relieve himself, takes a folio of blank paper, twenty lines of a poet, a dozen lines of a treatise on agriculture, a folio column of heraldry, the patience, the record of the fever-fits of hypochondria, the history of the particle que, a scrap of metaphysics, — this is what passes through his brain in a quarter of an hour. It is a carnival of ideas and phrases — Greek, Latin, German, French, Italian, philosophical, geometrical, medical, poetical, astrological, pedagogic — heaped one on the other, an enormous medley, a prodigious mass of jumbled quotations, jostling thoughts, with the vivacity and the transport of a feast of unreason. . . . He is never-ending. Words, phrases, overflow, are heaped up, repeated, and flow on, carrying the reader along, deafened, wearied, half drowned, unable to touch ground in the deluge. Burton is inexhaustible. There are no ideas which he does not iterate under fifty forms. When he has expended his own, he pours out upon us other men's, — the classics, the rarest authors, known only by savants, authors rarer still, known only to the learned. He borrows from all. Underneath these deep caverns of erudition and science there is one blacker and more unknown than all the others, filled with forgot-n authors, with crack-jaw names, — Besler of urenburg, Adricomius, Linschoten, Brocarde redenbachius. Amidst all these antediluvian onsters bristling with Latin terminations, he is his ease. He sports with them, laughs, skips om one to the other, drives them all at once.

 e is like old Proteus, the bold runner, who in e hour, with his team of hippopotami, makes e circuit of the ocean." Burton's Philosophaster
 d Poemata were published by the Roxburghie ub, London, 1862.

BUSCH, Johannes, b. at Zwolle, 1399; d. at alta, 1479; was educated in the flourishing school his native city, and entered the neighboring onastery of Windesheim in 1416; was made a non in 1419, and a presbyter in 1424, and was ointed sub-prior of Wittenburg in 1435, and or of Sulta in 1440. He wrote a life of Jo-nnes of Kempen, the brother of Thomas, a ronicon Windesimense, edited by Herib. Rosydus, Antwerp, 1628, and four books, De Re- formatione Monasteriorum Quorundam Saxonie, ublished in Script. Brunsvic. II., p. 476 sqq.
 t the principal work of his life was the practireform which he carried out in the monasteries Holland, Friesland, Hanover, Lower Saxony, d Westphalia, on the basis of the maxims of the ethren of the Common Life. In connection with abbots of Minden and Bursfeld, he founded Congregation of Bursfeld, for the purpose of orcing the monastical vows and rules in their ginal purity, and at his death seventy-five mon-eries had entered the congregation. See KARL

BUSENBAUM, Hermann, b. at Nottelen, West-alia, 1600; d. at Münster, Jan. 31, 1668; ended the order of the Jesuits in 1619; taught ology in Cologne, and was appointed rector of College of Hildesheim, and finally confessor the prince-bishop of Münster. His Medulla theologie Moralis, which first appeared in 1645, often republished, and introduced in most ols of the order; but in the eighteenth cen-it was twice condemned to be burnt by the iaments of Paris and Toulouse, on account he views it propagated concerning murder ecially of a king); and in the troubles which took the Jesuits under Choiseul it played a picious part.

BUSH, George, Bible commentator, b. at Nort, Vt., June 17, 1796; d. at Rochester, N. Y., 19, 1858. He was educated at Dartmouth ege and Princeton Theological Seminary, and ined (1824) pastor of a Presbyterian church ndianapolis. He resigned in 1829, and in became professor of Hebrew at the Univer-of the City of New York. He began in 1840 ublication of his Notes, which covered the ateach, Joshua, and Judges, and have been y circulated. A new edition appeared Bos-1870, 6 vols. Mr. Spurgeon (Commenting Commentaries, Eng. ed., p. 49) accuses him oss plagiarism in his Notes on Genesis, but s his independence and value in the other es. Mr. Bush showed a marked leaning ds mystical speculations, embraced Swedenanism (1845), and ardently defended its . Besides the Notes, he published a He-Grammar, 1835, 2d ed., 1838; Anastasis, or the Doctrine of the Resurrection of the Body, 1845, and edited the Anglo-American New Church Re- pository. See FERNALD: Memoirs and Reminis-

BUSHNELL, Horace, one of the great spiritual forces of the century, b. at Litchfield, Conn., April 14, 1802; d. in Hartford, Conn., Feb. 17, 1876. He was graduated at Yale College in 1827, and after a brief experience of school-teaching, and ten months of most valuable editorial work upon the Journal of Commerce in New York, he entered the New-Haven Law School. When he had finished a half-year there, he accepted a tutorship at Yale College; and so he taught and studied for two years. He was ready to be admitted to the bar; but in the winter of 1831 he was converted, and exchanged law for theology.
 He resigned his tutorship, and in the autumn entered the Divinity School of Yale College. In February, 1833, he went as temporary supply to the North (now Park) Congregational Church of Hartford, Conn., but May 22 was ordained its pastor. In September, 1839, he delivered an address on "Revelation" before the Society of Inquiry at Andover, Mass.; and in it he broached a heresy upon the Trinity, and thus began his troubled life as a religious teacher. In the spring of 1840
 he declined the presidency of Middlebury College.
 In 1845 he visited Europe, and was gone a year.
 Previously, as well as subsequently, he was interested in the Christian Alliance, an anti-Romanist organization, and published pamphlets and sermons, and made addresses, in its behalf. His book on Christian Nurture (1846) "emphasized the organic life of the family." Meanwhile he had been full of anxious longing for a higher Christian life; and in February, 1848, all at once — "not as something reasoned out, but as an inspiration, a revelation from the mind of God himself" — there came to him the knowledge of the true way, and this conception he embodied in his work God in Christ. He addressed the Harvard Divinity School (Unitarian) in July, 1848, on the Atonement; delivered the Concio ad Cle- rum at Yale College in August on the Divinity of Christ, and spoke at Andover in September on Dogma and Spirit. These addresses, with an introductory Dissertation on Language as related to Thought, made up the volume God in Christ, published in February, 1849, which was the occasion of his trial for heresy. The charges against him were "his contemptuous denial of any Trinity beyond the blankest Sabellianism, and his charging those who held to a proper tri-personality in the Godhead with being heretics; that he reduced it to a mere instrumental revelation of God, in terms sometimes suggestive of its manifesting Him by a sort of pantheistic evolution, in which the so-called persons are merely the dramatis personæ for dramatizing God to us." It must be confessed, that by his independent, bold, and original language, he laid himself open to just such charges, however erroneous they may seem to-day, when his books are read in sober quiet and by a later generation. Such expressions in his God in Christ as — "Conceive Him (God) now as creating the worlds, or creating worlds, if you please, from eternity. In so doing, He only represents, expresses, or outwardly produces Himself. He bodies out His own thoughts. What we call the creation is in another view a revelation only of God,—his first revelation; and it is in this view that the Word, or Logos, elsewhere called Christ, or the Son of God, is represented as the creator of the worlds" (p. 146); and "They (the Trinity) are instrumentally three" . . . "if God has been eternally revealed, or revealing himself, to created minds, it is likely always to have been, and always to be, as the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost"—certainly do not have the orthodox ring. In June, 1849, his book was placed on the docket of business by the Hartford Central Association; and a committee of five then appointed reported at a special meeting held in September, upon its alleged errors. Three of the committee deemed its errors not fundamental; and this was the ultimate verdict of the association after Dr. Bushnell had made his defence before them, and he was therefore not presented for trial. This action did not settle the matter. On complaint of the Association of Fairfield West it came up before the General Association of Connecticut, meeting at Litchfield in June, 1850; but that body refused to interfere. Efforts made to influence the Hartford Central likewise failed. In April, 1851, his Christ in Theology appeared. The same attempt to bring him up for trial was made, and as vainly. The General Association at Danbury in June, 1852, again declared it "was not a legislative or judicial body," and would not summon him before them. The private position of Dr. Bushnell's church had long been very unpleasant, owing to the alleged heresy of the pastor; and accordingly it was unanimously voted on Sunday evening, June 27, 1852, to withdraw from the North Consociation of Hartford County, and henceforth to be a true Congregational Church, whose minister was amenable to no external authority. This action was taken without the advice or instigation of the pastor. During 1855 and 1856 he was compelled by his health to take a leave of absence, and travelled in the South and Far West. He took an active part in the establishment of the University of California, and was offered the presidency. Into the revival of religion which immediately followed the financial crisis of the fall of 1857, Dr. Bushnell entered heartily, and for the first time preached extemporaneously. But the excitement and extra labor told upon him; and he was obliged to insist upon the acceptance of his resignation in April, and spoke his parting words July, 1859. Thus terminated a pastorate of twenty-six years, often interrupted towards its close, but still a quarter-century of love and labor among one people. He gave them his freshest, ripest thought; he filled them with enthusiasm for the things of Christ; he taught them knowledge. After this time he took no other charge, but began his "ministry at large." And how useful a ministry! His it was to cheer during the war by his great hopefulness; his it was to impress the city of his residence with the stamp of his spirit; his it was to write books, tainted, indeed, by what is styled heresy, but instinct with heavenly piety and the noblest thought. In 1866 appeared his much-debated book, The Vicarious Sacrifice, grounded in Principles of Universal Obligation. In this he sets forth that "moral theory" of the atonement which is always associated with his name. The volume had been long preparing. It taught that "Christ's object is the healing of souls. He is to be God's moral power in working such a soul-cure. His life and sacrifice are what he does to become this saving power." Late in the spring of 1874 appeared his last work, Forgiveness and Law, which modifies somewhat the Vicarious Sacrifice, of which it is now published as the second volume. It is worthy of note, that, at the time of his death, he was writing upon Inspiration; its Modes and Uses; but he finished only a few chapters. Dr. Bushnell was not only a theologian, but also a public-spirited citizen, alive to all about him. The city of Hartford owes to him her Bushnell Park, and indirectly the present site of the Capitol; for by his advocacy the park was made, and by his opposition the original site was not used, but another and better bought.

His chief published works are: Christian Nurture (1847); God in Christ (1849, new ed., 1877); Christ in Theology (1851); Sermons for the New Life (1858); Nature and the Supernatural (1858); Work and Play (1864); Christ and his Salvation (1864); The Vicarious Sacrifice, grounded in Principles of Universal Obligation (1866); Moral Uses of Dark Things (1869); Woman Suffrage, the Reform against Nature (1869); Sermons on Living Subjects (1872); Forgiveness and Law (1874). A new edition of his select works in 8 vols. appeared, N. Y., 1876-77, and in 1881 three volumes of his miscellanies entitled Work and Play; Moral Uses of Dark Things; and Building Eras in Religion, the last not previously published in book form. See Life and Letters of Horace Bushnell (edited by his daughter), N. Y., 1880. SAMUEL M. JACKSON.

BUTLER, Joseph, Bishop of Durham; author of the famous Analogy; b. at Wantage, near Oxford in Berkshire, Eng., May 18, 1692; d. at Bath, Tuesday, June 16, 1752. He was the youngest of eight children. His father, Thomas Butler, a retired linen-draper, and a staunch Presbyterian, intended him for the ministry of his church; but after he had been educated, first at the school of the Rev. Philip Barton of the Established Church at Wantage, and then at the Dissenting Academy of that remarkable man Samuel Jones, at Gloucester (later removed to Tewksbury), his mind underwent a change, and he signified his preference for the ministry of the Established Church. His father generously consented, and sent him to Oriel College, Oxford, March 17, 1714. He was ordained deacon, Oct. 26, and priest, Dec. 21, 1718, and that year was appointed preacher at the Chapel of the Rolls, i. e., the chapel in the Rolls Court, Chancery Lane, London, the place used for keeping records in chancery,—a position of more honor than emolument, which he owed to the kind offices of Dr. Samuel Clarke and Mr. Talbot his friend, son of Bishop Talbot of Salisbury. The audience consisted, in the main, of lawyers: hence Butler's published Sermons at the Rolls are abstruse, and totally unadapted to a popular audience. In 1721 he was appointed by Bishop Talbot to the living of Houghton, but was transferred by the same in 1725 to the wealthy rectory of Stanhope, and in 1726 he resigned his preachingship. Seven years were passed in seclusion and study. This was providentially beneficent: he was preparing himself for his great work. But that his friends seemed it a great loss to the world that so profound a thinker should hide his light for so long time is shown by the answer the Archbishop of York made to the question of Queen Caroline, "Is Mr. Butler dead?"—"No, madam; but he is tried." It is not therefore surprising that in 1733 Butler was appointed chaplain of the lord chancellor, in 1736 a prebend of Rochester, and later in the same year clerk of the closet to the queen,—an office which required him to spend every evening from seven to nine with the queen in devotional exercises and theological discussion. At the court he found a brilliant circle of talents and beauty; but he bore himself not only as a philosopher, but pre-eminently as a Christian, and maintained a reputation for piety. It was while there, incited thereto by the conversation he heard at court, that he issued his Analogy, which was dedicated to the queen. On the death of his royal patroness, he was appointed by the king to the bishopric of Bristol, the poorest see in the kingdom, worth only four hundred pounds per annum. Butler felt the appointment as a slight. In 1740 the king made him dean of St. Paul's, and in 1746 clerk of the closet to the king. When the king came to know Butler, he found him exceptionally adapted to any post, however important: accordingly he offered him in 1747 the bishopric of Exeter; but Butler declined, saying that "it was too late for him to try to support a falling church." In 1750 he was transferred to the see of Durham, the richest in England; but he lived there only twenty months in his new position.

Character.—Butler was of a serious and decided disposition; and this inherent bent was strengthened when he saw how deeply the infidel spirit held the brightest minds of his day, and how little was done to improve the morals of the community; yet for himself he lived close to God, unsettled by doubts. He was a very plain man, simple, even abstemious, in his personal habits, but lavish almost to a fault upon his family. He discharged the duties of his various offices conscientiously; though one so shy, sensible, modest, and retiring, must have been naturally unfitted for the highest success as a pastor. He never married. But it was as a writer, more than as a man, that Butler made himself felt; and to this day he is esteemed as not only one of the most distinguished of English authors on religion and ethics, but also as, on the whole, the man of greatest intellectual power in the Church of England during the eighteenth century. It may be, indeed, a question whether the Analogy and Thoughts always possess the reputation it has enjoyed for nearly a hundred and fifty years; but the fact that it has lost popularity, not because of discovered weakness in its contents, but only because of the shift in the grounds of belief, is sufficient proof of the commanding genius of its author. See Bishop Butler and the Deist, in Last Essays on Church and Religion, by Matthew Arnold, London, 1877.

Writings.—When twenty-one years old, while at the academy in Tewksbury, he addressed a series of anonymous letters to the Rev. Dr. Samuel Clarke, upon some of the positions assumed in the latter's celebrated Demonstration of the Existence and Attributes of God (Boyle Lectures, 1704; pub. 1705). To these Dr. Clarke replied, and published the correspondence in subsequent editions of his book. This shows the estimate early put upon Butler by those competent to appreciate him. 1. The first publication of his own was the Fifteen Sermons preached at the Rolls Chapel, London, 1726. The book made no sensation. It took three years to sell the first edition, but it has had a steady sale ever since. In 1749 the fourth edition appeared, enlarged by the addition of Six Sermons on Public Occasions. It has long been a text-book upon moral philosophy, as at the University of Oxford; and the first three sermons of the volume, On Human Nature, have been accepted as a precious legacy of the eighteenth century to all time. They were epoch-making, for they mark a decided advance in ethics in these two points: (1) the distinction between self-love and the particular desires, upon which, however, it is dependent; and (2) the proved co-existence of self-love and disinterested benevolence, and the discussion of their relations. Butler also emphasizes conscience, the "principle of reflection," which takes a view of motives, approves or disapproves them, impels to or restrains from action. 2. The Analogy of Religion, Natural and Revealed, to the Constitution and Course of Nature, London, 1736 (4to, Messrs. Knapton). Butler had been often engaged in controversy with the wits of Queen Caroline's philosophical tea-parties; but such unsatisfactory fragmentary discussion was the occasion of his bringing out at that time the results of twenty years' continuous thinking as a final and complete answer to the "loose kind of deism" then prevalent. The style of the book is very concise; it could hardly be otherwise, for what a man has been formulating through many years he will express concisely; but it is not obscure. The book demands and repays attentive study. Very briefly put, the argument is this: He begins with the premises of the existence of God, the known course of nature, and the necessary limitation of our knowledge. He thus takes the ground of the deists whom he would convince. He then argues, that, inasmuch as the difficulties in Scripture are not different from those which we find in the operations of nature, we should not only reject all arguments against the Scriptures which are founded upon these difficulties, but also infer that probably both proceed from the same author. The book has thus a narrow scope: it is in no sense a philosophy of religion; it seeks rather to remove objections to it. It is very remarkable that the book contains no quotations, and very few references: at the same time he meets fairly a host of objections which were commonly brought against Christianity; and this fact, and not its originality, has given it lasting fame. Butler was an omnivorous reader, and no one could accuse him of ignorance. The Analogy did a noble work for his generation. It rendered Christianity less despicable to its foes, and more reasonable to its friends: nor has it ceased to be serviceable. It has long been a text-book in our colleges, and may retain its place still longer. But even if it ceases to be thus used, it will always be a quarry from which apologetics can derive arguments, a discipline by which mental strength can be increased. To the Analogy are usually appended two dissertations, Of Personal Identity, and Of the Nature of Virtue. 3. The only charge of Bishop Butler which has come down to us is one to the Durham clergy, On the Use and Importance of External Religion. It was this charge, together with his erection of a plain cross in his Episcopal chapel at Bristol, which gave color to the rumor that Butler died a secret Roman Catholic. So low was the tone of piety in his day, and yet so blind was the prejudice against Romanism, that attention to the details of public worship smacked of superstition, and to set up a cross was to be a Papist! The calumny against Butler is beneath criticism.

Editions.—The Complete Edition of Butler is in 2 vols. 8vo, Oxford, 1844. Edward Steere, LL.D., of University College, London, issued Some Remains (hitherto unpublished) of Joseph Butler, LL.D., some time Lord Bishop of Durham, London, 1853, which have been reprinted by Professor Passmore in his edition of Bishop Butler's Ethical Discourses, Philadelphia, 1855. The Sermons and the Analogy have often been edited. They are readily accessible to all. There are so many editions, that selection is difficult. We have used Professor Passmore's edition of the former, which is recommended by its long and full biographical preface, the large size of the type in the body of the volume, and the appendix mentioned above; and the Rev. Dr. Howard Malcom's edition of the Analogy, which has good notes and the usual apparatus of introduction, analysis, index, etc. See also W. LUCAS COLLINS: Butler, London, 1881. SAMUEL M. BUTLER, Alban, b. at Northampton, Eng., 1710; d. at St. Omer, May 15, 1773; was educated at Douay; labored for some time in the Roman-Catholic mission in Staffordshire; held several positions as tutor, and became finally president of the English College of St. Omer. His Lives of the Saints, the product of thirty years' labor, was first published in 1745, in 5 vols.; also in 2 vols., Baltimore, 1844. It is a compendious and popular reproduction of the Acta Sanctorum. His own Life was written by his nephew, Charles Butler.

BUTLER, Charles, b. in London, 1750; d. there June 2, 1832; was educated at Douay, and practised law in London. Of his numerous writings the most prominent are: Horæ Biblica, 1797; Book of the Roman-Catholic Church, 1826; Reminiscences, 1821-27; Lives of Bossuet, Fénelon, Alban Butler, his uncle, etc. A selection of his works was published in 5 vols., London, 1817.

BUTLER, William Archer, b. at Amerville, Ireland, 1814; d. in Dublin, July 5, 1848; studied at the University of Dublin, and was made professor of moral philosophy in 1837. His Letters on Development of Christian Doctrine, in reply to J. H. Newman's Essay, were first published in the Irish Ecclesiastical Journal, 1845, and reprinted in book form in Dublin, 1850. His Sermons were published in 2 vols., 1849-50, with a Memoir by Woodward. His Lectures on the History of Ancient Philosophy were edited by W. Hepworth Thompson, and appeared in 2 vols., 1856. His Letters on Romanism appeared Cambridge, 1858. Very lately there has been a revival of interest in his valuable works. A second edition of his lectures, in one volume, appeared in London, 1874. His sermons and his lectures were reprinted in New York, 1879. Butler was a brilliant and profound thinker. He died early, never having had time to give his works a final finish; and therefore it is all the more remarkable that his hurried compositions should have such power.

BUTTLAR, Eva von, b. at Eschwege, Hesse, 1670; d. in Altona after 1717; received a loose and godless education; married in 1687 a French dancing-master at Eisenach, and glided gradually from the frivolities of a court life into the most hideous aberrations of religious excitement. She left her husband, and with her seducer, the theologian Winter, and her victim, the young physician Appenfeller, constituted, as she blasphemously claimed (1698), the Holy Trinity. She formed in 1702 a "Christian and Philadelphian Society" at Allendorf in Hesse, and became the head of one of those abominable conventicles into which the Collegia Pietatis of the Pietists sometimes degenerated. Expelled from Allendorf, the society sought refuge at Usingen, in the Wittgenstein domain; but here they were brought into court, and escaped sentence only by flight. Having embraced Romanism at Cologne, they settled at Pymont in the county of Lippe, and here their scandals reached the point of culmination. They were convicted of the most unnatural excesses of blasphemy and licentiousness. Winter was condemned to death; Appenfeller and Eva, to flogging and perpetual exile: but once more they escaped. They assembled again at Wetzlar, and finally in Altona, where the traces of them finally disappear. See M. GOEBEL: Geschichte des christlichen Lebens in der rhein.-westphäl. evang. Kirche, Coblenz, 1852, II. pp. 728-809, where all sources to the history of this peculiar phenomenon are given. FRANZ DIBELIUS (M. GOEBEL).

BUTZER, or BUCER (Bucerus), Martin, b. 1491 at Schlettstadt, Alsace; d. at Cambridge, Feb. 28, 1551; was educated in the Latin school of Udenheim, and conceived a great passion for learning and study; but, having no other means than the Church or the monastery afforded to pursue this object, he entered in 1506 the Dominican order. By the favor of his prior he was sent to the University of Heidelberg; and here he heard Luther's disputation, April 26, 1518, which made a powerful impression on him. He felt the decisive difference between Erasmus and Luther, and hesitated not a moment in making his choice. But the tendency of his studies and sympathies was soon discovered, and persecution began. In 1521 he sought refuge with Franz von Sickingen; and in the same year he obtained a papal dispensation from his monastical vow, and was transferred to the secular clergy. In 1522 Franz von Sickingen made him pastor of Landstuhl; and he married a nun, thus breaking absolutely and forever with the Roman Church. The desperate circumstances, however, of Franz von Sickingen, did not allow Butzer to remain in Landstuhl. In 1523 he went to Strassburg; and in 1524 he was appointed minister of the Church of St. Aurelian, in which position he labored for twenty-five years, prominent not only among the Reformers of Alsace, but among the leaders of the whole movement in Switzerland and Germany. On the question of the Lord's Supper he stood nearer to Zwingli and the Swiss formers than to Luther; but the great object of his life was to effect a reconciliation, or at least to prevent an open breach. But in this he succeeded only partially. The Conference of Marburg, Oct. 1, 1529, failed so far as a final formula concordie was not arrived at; but it had some influence on Luther's conceptions, or at least on his temper. Butzer saw it, and went on with his work, which finally resulted in the "Wittenberger Konkordie," drawn up by Melancthon at the conference in Wittenberg, 1536. The closeness with which Butzer opposed the introduction of the Interim in Strassburg caused his dismissal in 1549. He went to England on the invitation of Cranmer, and was made professor of theology in the University of Cambridge. He edited Cranmer in the preparation of the Articles of Religion, and the Book of Common Prayer. His works, a collected edition was begun at Basel in 1577; but only the first volume appeared, containing, besides a life of him, most of what he wrote in England, whence its name, opus Anglicanus. BUXTORF is the name of a family which through four generations held the professorship of Hebrew in the University of Basel, and contributed much to make this study a useful and important branch of Protestant theology. — I. Johannes Buxtorf, b. at Camen in Westphalia, 1564; d. at Basel, Sept. 13, 1629; studied at Marburg, Herborn, Basel, Zürich, and Geneva, under Piscator, Grynaeus, Bullinger, and Beza, and was in 1591 appointed professor of Hebrew at Basel. Of all Protestant theologians, he was regarded as the most comprehensive and accurate knowledge of rabbinical literature; and he applied his knowledge of Jewish traditions and Jewish customs with great acuteness to the interpretation of the books of the Old Testament. Not only did he make it more easy to learn Hebrew, but, by his staunch defence of the Masoretic text, he rendered Protestant theology a great service, as the Romanists claimed superiority in accuracy and reliability for the Greek translation and the Vulgate. His principal works are: Manuale Hebraicum et Chaldaicum (1602); Synagoga Judaica, published in German (1603), then in Latin (1607); Lexicon Hebraicum et Chaldaicum (1607); De Veteribus Hebraicis (1613); Biblia Hebraica Paraphr. Chald. et Commentariis Rabinorum, vols. (1618-19); Tiberias sive Commentarius Mathematicus (1620). A complete list of his works given in Athenae Rauricae, Basel, 1778, p. 447. (45 pp.). There have been lately published editions of two of Buxtorf's works, which were originally finished by his son, and published at Basel, 1632 and 1639 respectively: Concordantiarum Bibliorum Hebraicæ et Chaldaicæ, ed. Bern. Berlin, 1863, 4to; Lexicon Chaldaicum Talmudicum et Rabbinicum, ed. Ph. B. Fischer, Leipzig, 1866-74, 2 vols. 4to. — II. Johannes Buxtorf, of the preceding, b. at Basel, Aug. 13, 1599; d. there Aug. 17, 1664; studied under his father, at Heidelberg, Dort, and Geneva; and was appointed professor of Hebrew at Basel in 1630. He came his office to defend the views which his father had propounded, attacked as they were by Cappellus; and in this protracted and often bitter controversy he wrote, De Litterarum Hebr. Genuina Antiquitate (1643); De Punctorum Origine (1648); Anticritica (1653), etc. The influence he exercised is noticeable in the Formula Consensus Helvetica, whose second canon is directly pointed against Cappellus. A complete list of his works is found in Athenae Rauricae, pp. 47 and 448. — III. Johann Jakob Buxtorf, son of the preceding, b. at Basel, Sept. 4, 1645; d. there April 1, 1704; was appointed assistant to his father in June, 1664; visited in the following years Holland and England, and assumed the full responsibility of his professorship in 1669. He has given improved editions of the Tiberias and the Synagoga Judaica of his grandfather, but wrote nothing himself. — IV. Johann Buxtorf, nephew of the preceding, b. at Basel, Jan. 8, 1663; d. there 1732; was first preacher at the Mark near Basel, and succeeded his uncle in 1704. His principal work is Catalecta Philologico-Theologica cum Mantissa Epistolar. Viror. Claror. ad J. Buxtorfum Scriptorum, 1707. A complete list of his works is given in Athenae Rauricae, p. 454. BYBLUS, an alteration, from the Greek epoch, of ancient name Gebal (which survives in the modern Jubeil), Guba-lu upon the cuneiform inscriptions. It was celebrated for its temple of Baaltis, and the birth and worship of Adonis. Thus it had a sacred character, and pilgrimages were made to it. Movers maintains that the Gibletes were not pure Phœnicians, but rather a mixed population, in which the Hebrew element predominated. And it is true that the inscriptions discovered have a more Hebraic style than the ordinary Phœnician. The Bible speaks of the Gibletes as famous stone-cutters (1 Kings v. 18) and calkers (Ezek. xxvii. 9). Very recently a stele from the temple of Byblus has been discovered, translated, and published by M. DE VOGÜÉ: Stèle de Yehaumelek, Paris, 1875.

BYFIELD, Nicholas, b. in Warwickshire in 1579; d. 1622. He was educated at Exeter College, Oxford; and was for seven years pastor of St. Peter's Church at Chester, when (1615) he became vicar of Isleworth in Middlesex, where he remained until his death. William Gouge describes him as "a man of a profound judgment, strong memory, sharp wit, quick invention, and unwearied industry." His works were numerous, and greatly esteemed. His Marrow of the Oracles of God, London, 1620, containing six treatises previously published apart, reached an eleventh edition in 1640. The Principles or the Pattern of Wholesome Words, dedicated in 1618, reached a sixth edition in 1637, and is a valuable compend of divinity. His expository sermons on the Epistle to the Colossians were published, London, 1615, and several series on the First Epistle of Peter at various times, finally collected and enlarged in a Commentary upon the Whole First Epistle of St. Peter, London, 1637. The Rule of Faith, or an Exposition of the Apostles' Creed, was issued by his son Adoniram, after his death, London, 1626, and is an able and instructive work. He must be numbered among the Presbyterian fathers in England. C. A. BRIGGS.

BYFIELD, Adoniram, was son of Nicholas By-field, date of birth unknown; d. in 1660. He was educated at Emmanuel College, Cambridge, and chosen chaplain to a regiment of Parliament's army in 1642. In 1643 he was appointed one of the scribes of the Westminster Assembly. The manuscript minutes of that body, now in the Williams Library, Grafton Street, London, are probably in his handwriting. He also edited, by authority of Parliament, the various papers in the controversy between the Westminster Assembly and the Dissenting Brethren, published London, 1648, including Reasons presented by the Dissenting Brethren against Certain Propositions concerning Presbyterian Government, The Answer of Assembly of Divines, Papers for Accumulation, and The Papers and Answers of the Dissenting Brethren and the Com. of the Assembly of Divines. He became rector of Fulham in Middlesex, and subsequently minister of Collingborn-Ducis in Wiltshire.

C. A. BRIGGS.

BYNÆUS, Anthony, b. at Utrecht, Aug. 6, 1634; d. at Deventer, Nov. 8, 1698; was one of the most eminent Oriental scholars of his time, and wrote De Calceis Hebræorum, Dort, 1682; Explicatio Hist. Evang. de Nativitate Christi, Dort, 1688; De Morte Jesu Christi, 1689.

C.

CAB (hollow), a Hebrew measure, one-third of an omer, variously estimated, perhaps best as three and one-third liquid pints, two and five-sixths dry pints.

CABALA, the title of the system of Jewish theosophy, denotes primarily "reception," then "a doctrine received by oral tradition." The term is thus in itself nearly equivalent to "transmission," or "tradition." Thus we read in Pirke Aboth I. 1, "Moses received the law on Mount Sinai, and transmitted it to Joshua." By this indefinite title we are reminded, that among the Jews, as throughout the greater part of the East, human knowledge, whether historical or scientific, rested principally on a sort of succession; and the best claim for its reception was an unbroken chain of traditionary evidence. Hence the care with which Judaism established the succession of the custodians of truth, from Moses, through Joshua and the so-called elders, to the prophets, thence, through Ezra and the so-called Great Synagogue, to the teachers of later times, subdividing at length into the various schools or periods of particular sages and their followers. While, therefore, the truth was gradually exhibited in the writings of the Law, the Prophets, and the Talmud, the Cabala indicates the verbal exposition of these, orally transmitted along with the Scriptures, and not generally known to the people, but containing a deeper or more thoroughly initiated mode of instruction. In this manner the word "cabala" ultimately became the expression of a particular theologico-philosophical system, that arose and established itself in the bosom of Judaism, yet in a measure independent of, or rather supplementary to it, which finally received more general signification through some Christian thinkers. As all instruction in Judaism was principally verbal, and founded on memory, this philosophical instruction became ultimately a mystery, at least in the view of posterity: hence the history of the Cabala or of Jewish metaphysics is still a matter of scientific controversy; and both are entitled to a hearing,—those who ascribe it a high antiquity, or those who regard it as a product of the middle ages. It is true that the Talmud (treatise Chagiga passim) speaks of a doctrine which was communicated to only a few selected persons; but what this doctrine was are at loss to know. The only works which with any propriety claim to embody the earliest views of this theosophy are the following:—(1) a third cabalistic treatise entitled the Sepher Yetsira, edited at Amsterdam, 1651, and ascribed to certain Rabbi Nechonja ben Hakana of the second century, has long ago been generally regarded as fictitious, although a cabalistic work of the title is already mentioned in the fourteenth century:—

The first of these works is the Sepher Yetsira, the "Book of Creation," often printed and dated: thus by Steph. Rittangel, Amst., 1642, and a Latin translation and commentary; by J.

F. Meyer, with a German translation and commentary, Leipzig, 1830 [by J. Kalisch, with a poor English translation, New York, 1877]. Tradition ascribes it to Rabbi Akiba (d. 120). It is a short treatise, in oracular sentences, the language of which, more obscure in import than in form, resembles the Hebrew of the Mishna. As the Gemara already mentions a book under a like title, which was commented upon by R. Saadja of Fayum in the tenth century, its antiquity was traced back to that period. The other work is the famous "Book of Splendor," or Sepher Hazzohar (so called from Dan. xii. 3), first printed at Cremona and Mantua, 1559, and often since [latest at Brody, 3 vols., 1873]. Tradition ascribes it to a contemporary of Rabbi Akiba, namely, Rabbi Simeon ben Yochai. Incredulous criticism has declared it to be a production of the thirteenth century, the time of its first appearance in the history of literature, and ascribed it to a Spanish Jew, Moses of Leon. A more considerate disquisition recommends a middle way, tracing back its doctrines in the main features to Rabbi Simeon of the second century, and its completion in the East in the eighth century; whilst it became known in the West at a later period.

In general the Sohar seems to be a commentary on the Pentateuch. Interspersed throughout it, either as parts of the text with special titles, or in separate columns with distinct superscriptions, are the following pieces, known under special names: Siphra Detziutha, or "The Book of Secrets;" Idra Rabba, or "The Great Assembly;" and Idra Sula, or "The Small Assembly."

In examining these original documents of the Cabala we must be careful not to interchange the contents of both; for, although they have the same idea underlying their system, yet they must be distinguished as for their matter and method. The book Yetsira opens with the enumeration of the thirty-two ways of wisdom, or the thirty-two attributes of divine mind, as they are demonstrated in the founding of the universe. The book shows why there are just thirty-two of these. By an analysis of this number it seeks to exhibit, in a peculiar method of theosophical arithmetic, on the assumption that figures are the signs of existence and thought, the doctrine that God is the author of all things, the universe being a development of original entity, and existence being but thought become concrete: in short, that instead of the heathenish or popular Jewish conception of the world as outward, or co-existent with Deity, it is co-equal in birth, having been brought out of nothing by God, thus establishing a Pantheistic system of emanation, of which, principally because it is not anywhere designated by name, one would think the writer was not himself quite conscious. The following sketch will illustrate the curious proof of this argumentation: the number 32 is the sum of 10 (the number of digits) and 22 (the number of the letters of the Hebrew alphabet), this latter being afterwards further resolved into $3 + 7 + 12$. The first chapter treats of the decade and its elements, which are called figures in contradistinction from the 22 letters. This decade is the sign-manual of the universe. The existence of divinity in the abstract is really ignored, though not formally denied. Thus the number 1 is its spirit as an active principle, in which all worlds and beings are yet enclosed; 2 is the spirit from spirit, i.e., the active principle in so far as it has beforehand decided on creating; 3 is water; 4, fire, these two being the ideal foundations of the material and spiritual worlds respectively; while the six remaining figures, 5-10, are regarded severally as the signs-manual of height, depth, east, west, north, and south, forming the six letters, sides of the cube, and representing the idea of form in its geometrical perfection.

We see, however, that this alone establishes nothing real, but merely expounds the idea of possibility or actuality, at the same time establishing the virtualiter as existing in God, the foundation of all things. The actual entities are therefore introduced in the subsequent chapters under the twenty-two letters. The connection between the two series is evidently the Word, which, in the first Sefhira (number) is yet identical in voice and action with the spirit; but afterwards these elements, separating as creator and substance, together produce the worlds, the materials of which are represented by the letters, since these, by their manifold combinations, name and describe all that exists. Next, three letters are abstracted from the twenty-two as the three mothers; i.e., the universal relations of principle, contrary principle, and balance, or in nature, fire, water, air; in the world, the heavens, the earth, air; in the seasons, heat, cold, mild temperature; in humanity, the spirit, the body, the soul; in the body, the head, body, breast; in the moral organization, guilt, innocence, law, etc. These are followed by seven doubles, i.e., the relations of things which are subject to change (opposition without balance), as life and death, happiness and misery, wisdom and insanity, riches and poverty, beauty and ugliness, mastery and servitude, fruitfulness and barrenness. At the same time these seven also designate the material world; namely, the six ends (sides of the cube) and the palace of holiness in the middle (the immanent deity) which supports it; also the seven planets, the seven heavenly spheres, the seven days of the week, the seven weeks (from Passover to Pentecost), the seven portals of the soul (i.e., the eyes, ears, nose, mouth), etc. This theory further has express reference to the fact, that from the combination of the letters results, with mathematical certainty, a quantity of words so great that the mind cannot enumerate them; thus, from two letters, two words; from three, six; from four, twenty-four, etc., or, in other words, that the letters, whether spoken as results of breath, or written as elements of words, are the ideal foundation of all things. Finally, the twelve single letters show the relations of things so far as they can be apprehended in a universal category. Their geometrical representative is the regular twelve-sided polygon, such as that of which the horizon consists. Their representation in the world gives the twelve signs of the zodiac and the twelve months of the lunar year; in human beings, the twelve parts of the body and twelve faculties of the mind (these being very arbitrarily determined). They are so organized by God as to form at once a province, and yet be ready for battle, i.e., they are as well fitted for harmonious as for dissentious action.

Different from the system as exhibited in the book Yetzira is that of the Sohar, because the more difficult, since it not only speculates concerning the cosmos, but also concerning the essence of God and the relations of men: in other words, it treats also on theology, cosmogony, and anthropology. Starting from the idea of the Supreme Being as boundless in his nature, — which necessarily implies that he is an absolute unity and inscrutable, and that there is nothing without him, — God is called En Soph, i.e., "endless," "boundless." In this boundlessness God cannot be comprehended by the intellect, nor described in words; for there is nothing which can grasp and depict him to us, and as such he is in a certain sense not existent, because, as far as our minds are concerned, that which is perfectly incomprehensible does not exist. To make his existence perceptible, and to render himself comprehensible, the En Soph made his existence known in the creation of the world by means of attributes, or ten Sephiroth, or intelligences, emanating from the boundless one, and which, in their totality, represent and are called the Primordial or Archetypal Man. This figurative presentation, which is also called the cabalistic tree, is as follows:—

|------------------|----------------|--------------|
| | 1. Crown. | 2. Wisdom. |
| 3. Intelligence. | | 4. Love. |
| 5. Justice. | 6. Beauty. | |
| 8. Splendor. | 9. Foundation. | 7. Firmness. |
| | 10. Kingdom. | |

The first Sephira is denominated the Crown, and is expressed in the Bible by the divine name Ehejeh, or "I am." It is also called the Aged, or the Long Face [Macroprosopon]. From the first Sephira proceeded a masculine or active potency designated Wisdom, represented in the Bible by Jeh, and an opposite, i.e., a feminine or passive potency, denominated Intelligence, represented by the name Jehovah. These two opposite potencies are joined together by the first potency, and thus yield the first triad of the Sephiroth. From the junction of the foregoing opposites emanated again the masculine or active potency denominated Mercy or Love, represented by El; and from this again emanated the feminine or passive potency Justice, represented in the divine name Eloha. From this again emanated the uniting potency Beauty, represented by the divine name Elohim. We have thus the second trinity of the Sephiroth.

The medium of union of the second trinity, i.e., Beauty, or the sixth Sephira, beamed forth the masculine or active potency Firmness, corresponding to the divine name Jehovah Sabaoth, and this, again, gave rise to the feminine or passive potency Splendor, answering the divine name Elohe Sabaoth; from it, again, emanated Foundation, or the El Chai, thus yielding the third trinity of Sephiroth. From the ninth Sephira emanated the tenth, called Kingdom, represented by the divine name

Adonai, and also called Shechinah. These ten Sephiroth, also called the World of Emanations, gave birth to three worlds in the following order: 1. The World of Creation, or the Briatic World and the Throne, which is the abode of pure spirits, and where the angel Metatron reigns; 2. The World of Formation, or the Yetziratic World, the habitation of the angels. 3. The third world is called the World of Action and the World of Matter, which emanated from the preceding world, the ten Sephiroth of which are made up of the grosser elements of all the former three worlds. They represent in the first three degrees the Tohu, Vabohu, and Darkness, whereupon follow seven infernal halls, the prince of which is Samaël ("angel of poison or of death"). He has a wife called the Harlot; but they are both generally represented as united in the one name of the Beast. As to the nature and destiny of man, according to these metaphysical ideas, according to his soul and body, he represents the universe, the body being merely a garment of the soul. Like God, man has a unity and a trinity, the latter represented by the spirit, soul, and cruder spirit. The first represents the intellectual world; the second, the sensuous world; the third, the material world. As to the souls, they are pre-existent, and are, without an exception, destined to inhabit human bodies, and pursue their course upon earth for a certain period of probation. Hence all souls are subject to transmigration, till at last they return to God to be united in the Palace of Love with him by a loving kiss.

The most famous Cabalists are Moses ben Nachman, author of Faith and Hope; Jose of Castile, author of Gates of Light; Moses of Corva, author of the Garden of Pomegranates; Isaac Luria, author of the Book of Metempsychosis; Hajim Vital, who wrote the Tree of Life, Chr. Knorr von Rosenroth has collected most of these and other writings in his Kabbala denudata, Sulzch. 1677, sq. 3 vols.

In the hands of the younger disciples of the Cabalists, the secret knowledge was not only applied in its philosophical bearing, but also, and more rather, under two new aspects not previously mentioned; namely, the practical application and the hermeneutical method. Passing over the latter, which amounts to saying that a true Cabalist must also be a sorcerer, we come now to the former, because of more interest to the theologian. The principle of the mystic interpretation is very simple and not peculiar to the Cabalistic schools, but may be seen from church-history, and even in the history of Greek literature. We find it in Philo, in the New Testament, in the writings of the Fathers, in the Talmud, and in the Sohar; the more the latter departs from the spirit of the sacred text, the more had it to be brought to support by distortions of its meaning. For operation, there are no known rules except the exigencies of the case and the capacity of the mystic interpreter. In the mean time, the Jews have already, by the arbitrary character of their alphabet, arrived at all manner of subtleties, of which we have already isolated examples in earlier writings, but which were especially established in virtuosity in post-Soharic times. Thus we have 1. The Gematria, i.e., the art of discovering the hidden sense of the text by means of the numerical equivalents of the letters; 2. The Notarikon, i.e., the art of forming a new word from each letter of the word; 3. The Temura, the anagram, of two kinds. The simple is a mere transposition of the letters of a word: the more ingenious kind is that by which, according to certain established rules, each letter of the alphabet acquires the signification of another; as Aleph that of Tau, Beth that of Shin, etc.; or, again, letters may be read forward and backward, or the first letter of the alphabet is connected with the twelfth, the second with the thirteenth, etc.

Among Christians the Cabala was cultivated as early as in the thirteenth century. Raymond Lully is the first who proves himself at home in this branch of science. Besides, we must mention John Picus di Mirandola and John Reuchlin, not to speak of such converted Jews as Paul Ricci, physician to Emperor Maximilian, and Juda ben Isaak Abrabanel (Leo Hebräus), son of the famous commentator, and author of Dialoghi de amore, and others, who initiated many Christian scholars into this theosophy.

[The literature on the Cabala is very large, and conveniently arranged in Fürst: Bibliotheca Judaica, vol. III. pp. 329-335, Leipzig, 1863. In the French language we have AD. FRANCK: La Kabbale, ou la philosophie religieuse des hébreux, Paris, 1813 (translated into German by Ad. Jellinek, Die Kabbala, oder die Religionsphilosophie der Hebräer, Leipzig, 1844); the art. Cabale in Lichtenberger's Encyclopédie des Sciences Religieuses, Paris, 1878, vol. II. pp. 497 sq.; and S. MUNK: Mélanges de Philosophie Juive et Arabe, pp. 461-511. A short survey on the Cabala is also given by GUGENOT DES MOUSSEAUX, in his work, Le Juif, pp. 509 sq., Paris, 1869. In the English language may be consulted, besides the arts. in Kitto, and McClintock's and Strong's Cyclops. on the Cabala, and the art. by B. CABASILAS is the name of two prominent bishops of Thessalonica during the fourteenth century. Thessalonica was at that time, next to Constantinople, the most important see of the Byzantine Church, and the principal object of the contest between the Eastern and Western Church. Both the Cabasilas were decidedly anti-Roman; and for this reason the writings of the elder, Nilus, who occupied the see about 1340, were entirely unknown in Western Europe until the Reformers called attention to them. His De Primatu Papæ was edited by M. Flacius Illyricus, Frankfort, 1555. The younger, Nicolaus Cabasilas, occupied the see about 1354, succeeding Pasamas. He was originally a monk; and in the Hesychast controversy he took the side of the monks of Athos against Barlaam and Nicephorus Gregoras. He wrote rhetorical, liturgical, and dogmatical works, also polemics against Rome, most of which, however, have remained unprinted. But his principal work is Life in Christ (Περὶ τῆς ἐν Χριστῷ ζωῆς). It was much read and often copied in earlier times. A Latin translation by Jacob Pontanus was published at Ingolstadt in 1604. A critical edition of the Greek text has recently been given by Gass. The book is interesting as a striking instance of that mysticism which grew up in the Eastern Church parallel with but independent of the mysticism of the Western Church. See GASS: Die Mystik des Nikolaus Kabasilas vom Leben in Christo, Greisswald, 1849.

CABRAL, François, b. at Caviltã, Portugal, 1528; d. at Goa, April 16, 1609; entered the Society of Jesus; labored as a missionary in India, Japan, and China; baptized in 1575 the King of Bungo, who had previously been visited by Francis Xavier, and was in 1571 appointed director of the House of the Professed at Goa.

CÆCILIA, St., suffered martyrdom, according to an old legend, in 230, under Alexander Severus. According to a legend which dates from the fourteenth century, she sang hymns, and accompanied herself on the organ, immediately before her death; and this circumstance has made her the patroness of church-music. Her festival falls on Nov. 22. See BUTLER: Lives of Saints, Nov. 22.

CÆDMON, the first Christian poet of England, was a monk of the Abbey of Streaneshaleh in Northumbria, who lived in the seventh century. It is related of him by Bede (Eccl. Hist. iv. 24), that, before taking upon himself the monastic vows, he was on one occasion at a feast where all were in turn called upon to sing. Feeling his inability to comply, he left the hall, and betook himself to rest in the stable, where he was that night to watch the animals. In his sleep he became aware of a person who stood over him, and commanded him to sing of the creation, which he thereupon was enabled to do, repeating verses which he had never heard. On awaking, he remembered the poetry of his dream, and proceeded to add much more of the same purport. Being brought before the Abbess Hilda, he related his vision, and, at the request of the learned men there present, translated certain passages of Scripture, which they repeated to him, into excellent verse. Thereupon he was received into the monastery, and instructed in the biblical histories, large portions of which he subsequently versified. Among these were the creation of the world, the origin of man, and the whole history of Genesis; the departure of the children of Israel out of Egypt, and their entrance into the land of promise; the incarnation, passion, resurrection, and ascension of Christ; the coming of the Holy Ghost; and the preaching of the apostles. His death took place about the year 680, and the manner of it was in complete accord with his devout and tranquil life.

The poems which have been attributed to Cædmon were first published in 1655 by Francis Junius, from a manuscript now in the possession of the Bodleian Library. They are known as the Genesis, Exodus, Daniel, and Christ and Satan. At present it is generally conceded that only the first of these poems has any claim to be considered as the production of Cædmon, and even this has been transmitted to us in an interpolated and considerably modified form.

Cædmon's alliterative paraphrase is bold and vigorous; and in sublimity he is surpassed by no writer in the language, except, perhaps, Milton. The striking resemblance between parts of the Genesis and of Paradise Lost has been pointed out by D'Israeli, Amenities of Literature, I., 32-44.

CÆRULARIUS, Michael, Patriarch of Constantinople 1043-59, made complete the breach between the Greek and the Latin churches, which had been so well prepared by Photius. The strife was at rest since the days of the Patriarch Sisinnius (d. 999), when Michael, in connection with the Bulgarian metropolitan, Leo of Achrida, arbitrarily abolished the Latin liturgy in use in some Bulgarian churches and monasteries, and, by a letter to the Bishop of Trani in Apulia, formally declared war against the Roman Church (Canisius: Lectio. Antiqua, edited by Basnage, III. p. 281). The complaints were the old ones, — the use in the Latin Church of unleavened bread in the Lord's Supper, the omission of the Hallelujah during the fast, the introduction of the word Filioque in the creed, etc.; but the tone was more violent than ever. The Emperor Constantine Monomachus was very much displeased with the letter; and when Pope Leo IX. sent his ambassadors to Constantinople to attempt to settle the questions, the emperor received them very graciously. But Michael defended his views very cunningly (Canisius, p. 283); the emperor began to waver; and the papal ambassadors departed abruptly from the city, leaving on the altar of the Church of St. Sophia a formal bull of excommunication (Canisius, p. 308). Michael maintained himself, both under Constantine and under Theodora; and though the Emperor Isaac Comnenus, in 1059, banished him from his see, the schism between the Greek and Latin churches was, nevertheless, unremediably effected. Besides some letters given by Canisius, there also exist some decretals of MICHAEL: De Episcoporum

Judiciis, De Nuptiis in Septimo Gradu non Contrahendis, etc., given by COTELERIUS: Patres Apostol., I. p. 87. [See also the elaborate work of PICHLER: Geschichte der kirchlichen Trennung zwischen dem Orient u. Occident, München, 1864, 2 vols. (vol. i. pp. 255 sqq.)] GASS.

CÆSARE'A and CÆSARE'A PHILIP'PI. Two cities of Palestine mentioned in the New Testament, and which are to be distinguished from one another. 1. Cæsarea, originally called Strato's Tower, later, Cæsarea Palestina, or Palestina, lay on the Mediterranean, between Joppa and Dora, and owed its celebrity and name, in honor of Augustus, to Herod the Great, who spent vast sums of money in its adornment, and provided it with an extensive and secure harbor B.C. 10 (Josephus: Antiq., XVI. 5, 1; War, I. 21, 5-8). Vespasian was declared emperor there, and made it a Roman colony, and released it from capitation and ground taxes. There lived Cornelius and Philip the Evangelist (Acts x. 1, viii. 40, xxi. 8), there died Herod Agrippa (Acts xii. 19, 23), Paul visited and spent two years in prison (Acts ix. 30, xviii. 22, xxi. 8, xxiii. 23, xxiv. 27). The contest between the heathen and Jewish inhabitants of the place in regard to their equal right to the privileges belonging to citizens was the beginning of the Jewish war, which resulted in the destruction of Jerusalem (Josephus: Antiq., XX. 8, 7). After the latter event, Cæsarea became the chief city of Palestine, and the seat of a bishopric, to which Jerusalem was subordinate until the Council of Chalcedon (453) raised Jerusalem into a patriarchate, spiritual lord of Cæsarea. Among its bishops, Eusebius the historian is best known. Councils were held there 196, 381, and 357. During the crusades, Cæsarea was taken by Baldwin (1101), retaken and destroyed by Saladin (1187), retaken by the Christians, rebuilt, again devastated, and finally destroyed by the Sultan Baibar, and in this condition remains to-day. The modern name is Kaisariyeh.

2. Cæsarea Philippi (probably the Old-Testament "Baal gad"), the Greek Paneas, from Panion, the sanctuary of Pan, now called Banias, is a town at the base of Mount Hermon, forty-five miles south-west of Damascus. Beautified by Philip the Tetrarch, he gave it his name, along with Cæsar's. Our Lord visited it; and in its neighborhood the memorable confession of Peter was made, and Christ was transfigured (Matt. xvi. 16 ff., xvii. 1, 2). Ancient tradition made it the home of the woman called Berenice, who had the issue of blood (Matt. ix. 20-22). Herod Agrippa II. called it Neronias, to flatter Nero (Josephus, Antiq., XX. 9, 4). Titus compelled captive Jews, after the fall of Jerusalem, to fight one another in the games he instituted there (War, VII. 2 and 3). The place has had a somewhat similar history to Cæsarea Palestina. It has been the seat of a bishopric, taken and retaken during the crusades; it then dropped out of sight until 1806, when Burckhardt visited it. The present population is about fifty families. Two remarkable objects of interest are in the immediate neighborhood, — the cave, the Grotto of Pan, from whence flows one of the sources of the Jordan (Herod the Great built a marble temple by it); and the old and strong ruined castle, which commands a view of the whole country round, and is the finest ruin of its kind in Palestine. Stanley calls Banias, on account of its situation and the picturesque views it commands, a "Syrian Tivoli."

CÆSARIUS OF ARLES (Arelatensis), b. at Châlons-sur-Marne (Cabilonum) in the latter part of the fifth century; d. at Arles, Aug. 27, 513; was educated in the celebrated monastery of Lerins (Lorinum), and succeeded in 502 his relative Anonius in the episcopal chair of Arles. As a bishop he introduced many good reforms; tried to make the sermon a more effective part of the service; compelled the congregation to join in the singing, instead of whispering and gossiping; ordered that no one should be ordained a deacon till he had read the Bible four times through, etc. In the dogmatical controversies of the day he also participated; and at the synod of Arausio, the present Orange (529), he defended the doctrines of Augustine against the Semipelagians. But his book, De Gratia et Libero Arbitrio, has not come down to us. Perhaps the greatest influence he exercised by his Regulæ Duæ, altera ad Monachos, altera ad Virgines, which were often adopted by founders of monastic institutions before the rules of Benedict came into general use. Baluze edited sixteen of his sermons, Paris, 1649; the rest, forty-six, is given in Max. Bibl. Patr., VIII. His life is found in Mabillon: Act. Sanct. O. S. B., I. pp. 659-677. See also Longueval: Histoire de l'Église Gallicane, II. p. 262; Oudin: Diss. d. Vita et Scriptis S. Cæsarii Archiepiscopi. HAGENBACH.

CÆSARIUS OF HEISTERBACH, b. in the latter part of the twelfth century; d. in the middle of the thirteenth; was educated in Cologne, and spent about thirty years in the Cistercian monastery of Heisterbach near Bonn, as a monk and as prior; but the date and the place of his death, like those of his birth, are unknown. His theological writings, sermons, homilies, etc., were edited by Coppenstein, Cologne, 1615, under the title of Fasciculi Moralitatis, and have interest as specimens of the rhetorical art of the time. But much greater importance must be ascribed to his historical writings: Vita S. Engelberti, printed at Cologne, 1633; Catalogus Episcoporum Colonien-sium, published in the second volume of Fontes Rerum German.; and Dialogus Magnus Visionum et Miraculorum, first printed at Cologne, 1591, and recently edited critically by Jos. Strange, 1851. The last-mentioned work is a dialogue between Cæsarius and Apollonius, de conversione, contortione, confessione, etc., best elucidating the subjects by anecdotes, historical narratives, observations from actual life, and thereby furnishing much precious material for the characterization of the period. See ALEX. KAUFMANN: Cæsarius von Heisterbach, Cologne, 1850.

CAIAPHAS (oppressor), the surname of the high priest who condemned Jesus Christ to death (Matt. xxvi. 57-68), in full, Joseph Caiaphas (Joseph. Ant. 18, 4, 3); the fourth high priest appointed by the Procurator Valerius Gratus, the predecessor of Pontius Pilate, within three or four years after the deposition of Ananus or Annas ben Seth. Caiaphas was high priest for eighteen years (A.D. 18-36), of which the last ten years were under Pilate. In religious bias he belonged to or favored the Sadducees (Acts v. 17). In character he was hard, coarse, brutal, yet adroit and crafty (Matt. xxvi. 3, 4; John xi. 49, 50, xviii. 14). He was son-in-law of Annas (John xviii. 13). In Luke iii. 2 Annas and Caiaphas are spoken of as "high priests," and in Acts iv. 6 Annas is called "high priest." Very probably Annas was president of the Sanhedrin; and, as he had five sons high priests, he retained the office very largely in his own hands, and was to all intents and purposes the high priest himself. The expression Caiaphas was high priest "that same year" (John xi. 49) means "the memorable year of our Lord's sufferings," and not that the office was annual. He was deposed by Vitellius, and nothing more is known of him (Joseph. Ant. 18, 4, 3).

CAIN AND THE CAINITES. The name of the first-born in the world is usually interpreted "a gotten one" (Gen. iv. 1); but it also resembles the Hebrew for "spear," "smith," "lamentation," "dirge," all of which words describe different turns in the Cainitic history. It is also interesting to observe that the two elements, the good and the bad, which were found united in Adam, seem to have been divided between his sons; Cain receiving the bad, and Abel the good. Again: the curse which God imposed upon the ground (Gen. iii. 17) was after his murder repeated upon Cain himself (iv. 12). That sacrifices and worship were found in that early time demonstrates their naturalness and reasonableness. The recognized privileges of primogeniture point to an ordered state. Cain's dread of being killed, his journey to the land of Nod, his marriage, and his establishment of a city, have, on the one hand, been laughed at as silly tales, and, on the other, been quoted as proofs of the existence of other races than the Adamic. The language may, however, mean no more than that the relater used the language of a later day to describe the very beginnings of history, i. e., Cain might well have dreaded meeting a son of his brother's. His wife was his sister: tradition calls her a twin-sister named Savé (Epiphanius, Hær. XXXIX. cap. VI. [vol. 2, Pt. 1, p. 529, ed. Ætler]), or his oldest sister, Azron or Azura (Malala, p. 2). The country to which he went received its name afterwards; and the "city" was a few of the rudest huts. The descendants of Cain were enterprising, industrious, and made far more rapid progress in civilization than the line of Seth. But if they were the first to use musical instruments, to work in iron, and to surround themselves with luxuries, they were true to their parentage in inventing or beginning sins. Lamech was the first to use offensive weapons. He was also the first bigamist, proving that woman had already been degraded in man's eyes, and polygamy was not far off. The poem Lamech composed on the occasion of his killing of some one is bloodthirsty and brutal in its tone, and seems to defy God, as Herder says: "What is God's power, compared to my sword?" The race of Cain was entirely destroyed in the Deluge. Too much has been made of the superficial similarity between the genealogy of Cain (iv. 16-24) and that of Seth (v.). The differences are greater than the agreements. But, even if they were less, the similarity would not prove that the lists were really the same. The Jewish legends of Cain are found in EISENMENGER: Entdecktes Judenthum, I. 462, 471, 832, 836; the Arabic in HOTTINGER, Historia orientalia, p. 25. See KURTZ and EWALD in loco. C. W. EDUARD NÄGELSBACH: Der Gottmenschen, Nürnberg, 1853.

In Judg. xv. 57 there is mention of a city called Cain, which, however, is not to be connected with the Cainites, but with the Kenites, a Canaanitish tribe.

CAIUS. Eusebius names six of this name (H. E., 5, 12, 2; 16, 22; 7, 11, 22; 32, 1); but the only one of interest is Caius, a writer of the Church of Rome, who flourished between 180 and 235. Eusebius calls him "an ecclesiastical man," who was born about the time of Zephyrinus, Bishop of Rome, and twice speaks of his work against Proclus, the leader of the Phrygian sect, entitled The Disputation, 2, 25, 6, cf. 6, 20, 3; 3, 28, 1, and 31, 4. There is no proof that he was a clergyman. Eusebius is really the source of all the information we possess about Caius; that which is said by Jerome, Theodoret, and Photius, is mere repetition, with more or less blundering. Indeed, a Caius myth has grown up, and many modern scholars have sanctioned these mistakes. The true Caius was one of the prominent and learned defenders of the Catholic faith against Chiliasm and Montanism. The fictional Caius was the author of the Labyrinth, or the tenth book of the Philosophumena, or Refutation of all Heresies; of the Philosophumena; of the Little Labyrinth; of On the Substance of the Universe; of the Muratorian canon. Further, he was a presbyter of Rome under Victor and Zephyrinus; consecrated by them "bishop of the nations (or Gentiles)," wrote a special treatise against Cerinthus, whom he held to be the author of the Apocalypse of John. See BUNSEN: Hippolytus and his Times, London, 1852, 2 vols.; WORDSWORTH: St. Hippolytus and the Church of Rome, 2d ed., London, 1880.

ADOLF HARNACK.

CAJETAN, Cardinal, b. at Gaeta, July 25, 1470; d. in Rome, Aug. 9, 1534. His true name was Jacob de Vio. The name Thomas he assumed in honor of Thomas Aquinas: that of Gaetano (Cajetan) was derived from his birthplace. In 1486 he entered the Dominican order, in 1508 he was chosen its general, and in 1517 he was made a cardinal. The most remarkable event in his life was the conference with Luther in Augsburg, 1518. He had come to Germany as legate a latere, on account of the war with the Turks; and during his stay there he received orders from Rome to summon Luther to his presence, and compel him to retract. In this he failed utterly; but the conference was not without a certain influence on himself.¹ He felt how far superior Luther was to himself and the theologians of the reigning school with respect to true knowledge of the Bible; and he immediately went to work to fill up this gap, undaunted of his lack of linguistic and historical qualifications. In his youth he had studied the schoolmen with great zeal, and he was generally considered the real head of the Thomistic school. He now became an exegete; and as such, though never left the track of the tradition, he occupies a much freer position than his predecessors with respect to the Fathers; and the allegorical method he altogether abandoned. The progress he thus made met with great opposition within his own order from the Dominican Ambrosius Catharinus; and in the collected edition of his works, Lyons, 1639, many passages have undergone mitigating modifications. There is a separate collection of his writings against Luther, Lyons, 1530. See R. SIMON: Histoire Critique du Nouveau Testament, 1689; JÄGER: Cajetans Kampf gegen die lutherische Lehrform in Zeitschrift f. d. st. Theologie, 1858, p. 430. C. WEIZSÄCKER.

CALAMY, Edmund, b. in London, February, 1600; d. there Oct. 29, 1666; educated at Penelope Hall, Cambridge; became vicar of St. Mary's in Swaffham Prior, Cambridgeshire; thence moved to St. Edmund's Bury in Suffolk, where he remained ten years or more, until compelled to retire on account of the Book of Sports, thereby identifying himself with the Puritan party. He was ejected from the Earl of Warwick the rectory of Rochford in Essex, where he remained, until 1639 he was chosen pastor of Aldermanbury church in London, where he labored until the Restoration. He composed with others "An Answer to a Book entitled, An Humble Remonstrance which the original of Liturgy and Episcopacy is discussed: and Queries proposed concerning both the Parity of Bishops & Presbyters in Scripture demonstrated. The occasion of their Inparity in antiquity discovered. The Disparity of the Ancient and modern Bishops manifested. The Antiquity of Ruling Elders in the Church vindicated. The Liturgical church bounded. Written by Smecnanus [e.g., S(tephen) M(arshall), E(dmund) Calamy], T(homas) Y(oung), M(atthew) N(ewman), and W(illiam) S(purstow)]. This re-echo of Joseph Hall's Humble Remonstrance became the platform of the Presbyterians, as that became the platform of the Episcopal party, each side claiming jure divino. Several other tracts were issued in the controversy pro and con. Calamy was chosen a member of the Westminster Assembly of Divines, and took an active part in its proceedings, being moderate in doctrinal position, inclined to a union with both Independents and Episcopalians in some comprehensive polity. He also became one of the most energetic members of the Provincial Assembly of London; took part in the composition of the Vindication of the Presbyterian Government and Ministry, 1649; was author of the Jus Divinum Ministerii Evangelici, 1654, both adopted by that body. He was active in restoring Charles II. to the kingdom in 1660; was one of the divines sent to Holland to negotiate with him. At the Restoration in 1660 he was made one of the King's chaplains, and offered the bishopric, which, however, he declined. With Reynolds, and others, he gave his energies to a comprehension of Presbyterians and Episcopalians through a revision of the Liturgy, and a reduction of Episcopacy on Archbishop Parker's model. He took part in drawing up the objections against the Liturgy, and reply to the objections of the Episcopal clergy. He was a great preacher, frequently delivering sermons before Parliament and the Lord Mayors on public occasions; and his lectures were frequented by the best people of London. A number of these have been published. His most popular work is, The Godly Man's Ark, 3d ed., 1661, 18th ed., 1709. He was a practical man of affairs, rather than a scholar and writer. He was ejected for nonconformity in 1662, and imprisoned for a short time. But the king interposed, on account of great public indignation, and he was released. For further information, see the Nonconformist's Memorial, 2d ed., 1802, I. p. 76; Reid's Memoirs of the Westminster Divines, 1811, I. 165. C. A. BRIGGS.

CALAMY, Benjamin, son of the preceding, d. 1686. Educated at Cambridge, he became a fellow of Catharine Hall. In 1677 he was minister of St. Mary's, Aldermanbury, London, and appointed one of the king's chaplains, and 1683 prebendary of St. Paul's. Unlike his father, he was a High Churchman, and very active in dissuading Dissenters. He published many sermons, which are still worth reading, "as well for the beauty of the language as for the excellent sentiments." His sermon on Luke xi. 41, Of a Scrupulous Conscience, preached in 1683, and published, made a great sensation. It was directed against the Dissenters, and called forth a reply from Thomas de Laune. Other sermons were popular. Sermons preached upon Several Occasions, 5th ed. (includes Dean Sherlock's funeral sermon), London, 1715.

CALAMY, Edmund, grandson of Edmund, b. in London, April 5, 1671; d. there June 3, 1732. On his return from the Utrecht University (1691), he studied divinity, joined the Nonconformists, was unanimously chosen assistant to Matthew Sylvester at Blackfriars, London, 1692, and, after several changes, pastor of a church in Westminster, London, 1703. He was the author of fourteen sermons on The Inspiration of the Old and New Testaments, London, 1710, and other collections; but his principal service is as an historian of Nonconformity. In 1696 he conducted Baxter's History of His Life and Times through the press; furnished it with an index and table of contents. In 1702 he published an abridgment of Baxter, but added a history of those ministers ejected for nonconformity down to 1691. Bishop Hoadley having criticised his History, he replied in A Defense of Moderate Nonconformity, London, 1703-05, 3 vols. In 1713 he published the second edition of his Abridgment of Baxter's Life, in which he carried the nonconformist history through the reigns of William III. and Anne; and in 1721 he closed his labors in this department of special study, bringing down the story still farther. Calamy was well qualified by his moderation and catholicity to be the fair-minded historian of nonconformity.

See An historical account of my own life. With some reflections on the times I have lived in (1671-1731). By EDMUND CALAMY, D.D. Now first printed. Edited by John Towill Rutt, London, 1820, 2 vols.

CALAS, Jean, a Protestant merchant of Toulouse, whose son, Marc-Antoine, hung himself in a fit of melancholy in the house of his father, Oct. 13, 1761. A rumor arose that the young Calas was going to embrace Romanism the very next day, that the father, from fanaticism, had killed the son, etc.; and the Roman-Catholic clergy did all in their power to rouse the passions of the populace. The old Calas was arrested, found guilty of the murder of his son, and executed on the wheel, March 9, 1672. The property of the family was confiscated, and the family itself fled to Geneva. But the case was now taken up by Voltaire, Elie de Beaumont, and Loiseau de Mauléons; and March 9, 1675, the Parliament of Paris completely reversed the verdict of the Parliament of Toulouse. The old Calas was declared innocent, the property of the family was restored, and the king gave the widow a present of thirty thousand francs; but neither the instigators of this hideous process, nor the judges, were punished. The acts in full are found in DE LA VILLE: Continuation des Causes Célèbres, Paris, 1770, tom. I. See also Voltaire's Traité sur la Tolérance, Paris, 1763.

CALATRAVA, THE KNIGHTS OF, a military order founded in the middle of the twelfth century, for the purpose of defending the city of Calatrava against the Moors, and confirmed in 1164 by Alexander III. The knights fought with great success in the beginning, and the order flourished; but in 1197 they lost Calatrava, and retired to Salvatiera. In 1487 the grand-mastership was annexed to the crown of Spain; and since 1808 the order has become simply an order of merit. Also the nuns of the order, instituted in 1219, have been secularized.

CALDERWOOD, David, the historian of the Scottish Church, b. 1575; d. at Jedburgh, Oct. 29, 1650. He took the degree of Master of Arts at Edinburgh, 1593; in 1604 became minister of Crailing, near Jedburgh, and distinguished himself by his opposition to King James's scheme of prelatizing the Church of Scotland. When in 1617 James visited Scotland, Calderwood presented him a remonstrance signed by the Presbyterian clergy, but refused to deliver up the roll of signatures to it; for which conduct, joined to other acts of insubordination, he was imprisoned, and only released, notwithstanding the interference of influential persons, upon condition that he would banish himself; and on Aug. 27, 1619, he sailed for Holland. So quiet and obscure was his life there, that at one time he was supposed to be dead; and one Patrick Scot fabricated a recantation, which was published under the title Calderwood's Recantation, directed to Such in Scotland as refuse Conformity to the Ordinances of the Church, London, 1622. But about this time Calderwood probably was in Scotland, busily occupied upon his history. In 1624 he was appointed minister of Pencaitland, in the County of Haddington, Scotland. He gradually came again into prominence. It is noteworthy that it was he who introduced in 1649 the practice, now common, of requiring a dissent from the General Assembly to be recorded. In 1648 the General Assembly urged him to complete his History of the Kirk of Scotland, and voted him a yearly pension of £800 (Scots), or £66 13s. 4d. (sterling); but he died ere the publication began, if, indeed, it was contemplated. The History remained in manuscript, and in three forms,—the original in the British Museum, a copy in the Library of the University of Glasgow, another in the Library of the Church of Scotland,—until 1842, when the Wodrow Society began its publication, finished 1849, Edinburgh, 8 vols. Calderwood prepared an abridgment of his own work, entitled A true history of the Church of Scotland, from the beginning of the Reformation unto the end of the Reign of King James VI., published 1678. The historical works are of great value as materials for history, collected with diligence and fidelity. In 1621 he published The Altar of Damascus, or the Pattern of the English Hierarchy and Church obtruded upon the Church of Scotland, in 1623 translated into Latin, Altare Damascenum, etc., and much enlarged, best ed., Batav., 1708.

CALEB, the son of Jephunneh of the tribe of Judah (Num. xiii. 6), but called the Kenezite, or son of Kenez (Num. xxxii. 12; Josh. xiv. 6, 14). The reconciliation of these accounts is either to suppose that that division of the tribe of Judah which Caleb headed had so intermingled itself with the Kenezites, a tribe of Southern Palestine, that he could be reckoned a Kenezite, or that Caleb was the head of the Kenezites, who had been absorbed by Judah. He was sent to spy out the land, and with Joshua rendered a true report, and encouraged the people to make the attack. For this fidelity he was richly rewarded; for he was permitted to enter the Promised Land as a conqueror, and given possession of Hebron and its neighborhood; and, when the city was set apart for the Levites, he yet retained the land and villages about. In David's time mention is made of the "South of Caleb," a considerable district inhabited by his descendants, and of a place called Caleb-Ephratha, which must have been near Bethlehem (Ephrathah) (1 Sam. xxx. 14; 1 Chron. ii. 24). These references show the increased importance of the family. RÜETSCHL.

CALENDAR, Hebrew. The Hebrew calendar dates from the creation. The year is semi-lunar, consists of twelve or thirteen lunar months, each of which has twenty-nine or thirty days. Thus the year has either three hundred and fifty-four or three hundred and eighty-four days. In either case it is sometimes made a day more or a day less in order that certain festivals may fall on proper days of the week for their due observance. The civil year begins in the autumn; the sacred, in the spring. The Jews had calendars wherein were recorded the festivals and saints' days; but none of those now extant are old. The oldest is Megillath Taanith ("the volume of affliction"), which contains the days of feasting and fasting hitherto, but not now, observed by the Jews. See YEAR.

Ecclesiastical, Origin of. The ecclesiastical calendar existed in very early times. Originally it was arranged not for one year, but every year, and was in reality nothing else than a Christian adaptation of the calendar in common use among Greeks and Romans. Numerous examples of the Roman Pagan calendar exist. Some had a merely local value, but others were adapted to a country. They contain astronomical data (the Greek calendars were particularly rich in these), the religious feasts, and civil festivities,—either bound up with religion, as many of the public games, or in memory of some historic event, as a victory. Very remarkable is it to find Christian influence exhibited in two calendars from the middle of the fourth and fifth centuries: indeed, they really mark the transfer from Paganism to Christianity so commonly made by the people. The first, from A.D. 321, published by Kollar (Anal. Vindobon., vol. I. p. 961 sqq.), contains the usual astronomical and astrological data, but omits the customary Pagan sacrificial and temple feasts, apparently in deference to Christian feeling, although it does not mention any Christian feast. Another trace of Christian influence is in the setting of the Christian week side by side with the Pagan: as the year beginning Jan. 1 is divided, on the one hand, in Pagan style, by the letters A-H, e., into divisions or weeks of eight days; while, on the other, the letters go from A-G, i.e., seven days, Christian style. The second dates from 448, published by the Bollandists (Acta Sancta Jan. T. VII. p. 176), is arranged quite evidently in the Pagan style, but yet gives the first recognition of Christian festivals, for it contains five festivals of Christ, and six of martyrs. The earliest known pure Christian calendar is of Gothic origin, from Thrace in the fourth century. It exists now as a fragment, merely thirty-eight days; but it contains mention of seven saints,—two from the New Testament, three from the Church Universal, and two from the Goths: See Krafft, Kirchengeschichte der germanische Völker, Bd. I., Alth. 1, pp. 371; 385-387. There were lists of saints' days arranged chronologically, but not in a calendar. The earliest known are a Roman one from the middle of the fourth century, and a catalogue of the Carthage Church from the end of the fifth century. Each contains bishop and martyrs' days, mostly of local interest.

The Mediæval Calendar.—Since originally the martyrs were celebrated only where they suffered, each church had its own calendar; but in the middle ages the Roman calendar spread through the Western Church. Thus the separate churches materially increased their list of saints and martyrs. From the eighth century many such combined calendars were made, and they are found in great numbers. They are all designed to suit all times, are supplied with means to ascertain the movable feasts, especially Easter, of each year, and differ from those named above in that they contain not alone the letters A-G to mark the days of the week, but also the numerals I-XIX. to mark the new moons, which, in each year of the lunar cycle, occur on that particular day of the month corresponding with that number. A monthly calendar thus arranged is called a perpetual (Julian) calendar, because one can find from it the day of the week of each date, and all the new moons through the year, as soon as the Dominical letter of the year is known. See F. Piper, Kirchenrechnung, Berlin, 1841, p. VI. Towards the close of the middle ages the calendar, which had hitherto been in Latin, makes its appearance in the vernacular of the different lands. An Anglo-Saxon one dates from the tenth century; one in French, from the thirteenth century; and quite a number of German calendars, from the fourteenth century. Manuscript calendars were frequently decorated, as with the signs of the Zodiac and pictures from church-history: e.g., famous for its ornamentation is the calendar in the prayer-book of Anna, wife of Louis XII., now in Paris. Particularly curious is a Russian calendar, dating from the second half of the seventeenth century, painted on wood in the form of a Greek cross, preserved in the Vatican Library, and known as the Capponi tables, after the Marchioness Capponi, who presented it. The four arms of the cross contain a complete monthly calendar; the table in the middle, the movable feasts from the fourth Sunday before Lent to the Sunday after Pentecost; and each day has its picture, with the name of the saint or the Sunday written in Slavonic underneath. See Assemanni, Kalendaria ecclesie Slavice sive Græco-Moscha, Rome, 1755. The earliest printed calendars naturally followed in arrangement the written. They were carved in wood, and engraved on copper; e.g., Calendar of Johannes de Gamundia, published 1468. These were all perpetual calendars. The first calendar for particular years was published at Nürnberg, in German and Latin, Johannes Regiomontanus, 1475, and arranged for 1475, 1494, 1513; i.e., for the first years of three successive nineteen-year cycles, yet so that the calendar could by calculation be made useful from 1475 to 1531 inclusive.

The Gregorian Reform of the Calendar took place under Gregory XIII. in 1582; was occasioned by the long-felt unsatisfactory method of calculating the time of Easter, and was the outcome of several attempts at a change. The Julian Calendar, which was introduced by Julius Cæsar, had in course of time proved itself to be inaccurate; for it made the year $365\frac{1}{4}$ days, and intercalated a day every four years, whereas the year is in reality more than 11 minutes shorter; so that in 128 years one whole day is apparently lost. Moreover the vernal equinox was reckoned according to the XIX. year cycle of 235 months, i.e., $19 \times 365\frac{1}{4} = 6,939\frac{3}{4}$; but in reality the cycle is too short by more than a month (in 310 years a day's difference), and the full moon was put so much too late. So it came to pass, that, whereas in Julius Cæsar's day the vernal equinox corresponded with the 25th of March, in Gregory's day it had retrograded to the 11th. In obedience to the Council of Trent, by a bull of Feb. 24, 1582 [translated in Mr. Lewis A. Scott's pamphlet, Act and Bull, privately printed, Phila., 1880] Gregory made the Calendar of Aloysius Cilius in his Compendium novæ rationis restituendi calendarium obligatory upon the Church. Agreeably to the new plan ten days in the calendar were dropped (this restored the vernal equinox to March 21, the day on which it fell at the time of the Council of Nice in 325), and a new rule of intercalation adopted, which was, every year whose number is divisible by 4 is a leap-year, excepting the centesimal years, which are only leap-years when divisible by four after suppressing the two zeros. The length of the mean year thus fixed is 365 days, 5 hours, 42 minutes, 12 seconds, which exceeds the solar year by 25.95 seconds,—an error which amounts only to one day in 3,325 years. For an account of the Gregorian Calendar see Ideler, Handb. d. Chronologie, Bd. II. pp. 301-321. As was to be expected, the new calendar was received at once in all Roman-Catholic countries; but the Protestant states continued to use the Julian. Germany and Denmark, however, made the change in 1700, and England in 1752. The Russians use the Julian Calendar still.

One other reform remains to be effected: the calendar should be purged of its obscure saints and martyrs, and in their stead be put the truly great names of all branches of the Church Universal. As an attempt to rectify the existing state of things, see the Evangelische Kalender of Dr. F. Piper, carried on for twenty years (1850-70) in connection with brief popular yet original biographies, and finally published, after a revision, under the title, Die Zeugen der Wahrheit Lebensbilder zum evangelischen Kalender auf alle Tage des Jahres, Leipzig (Tauchnitz), 1874-75, 4 vols. These volumes contain the revised calendar, and biographies of all persons mentioned. Rev. Dr. H. M. Maccracken published in 1879 a translation of parts of it, with important additions, under the title, Lives of the Leaders of our Church Universal. [The original volumes contain three hundred and ninety-nine biographies, contributed by one hundred and twenty-nine writers; the translation, one hundred and twenty-five; but thirty-three of the writers are Americans, and the work has been taken up by several denominational publication boards.]

FERDINAND PIPER.

CALENDAR BRETHERN (fratres Calendarii), a society which arose apparently in Saxony, but spread quickly over Northern and Central Germany, and to Hungary and France. The name comes from their original custom of meetings on the Kalends, or first day of every month. They are first spoken of in 1220, as in the Monastery of Ottberg. In idea the fraternity was good, — partly beneficent and partly devotional. Particular attention was given to the care of their sick, and the burial of their dead members or families, likewise to masses for their souls. The membership was not limited to any class or sex. The president was called dean: under him there was a treasurer. It was not a monastic order, but was under the authorization and oversight of the diocesan bishop, and not of the Pope. The monthly meetings were closed by a meal, paid for out of the society's funds. As the society increased in wealth through bequests, it degenerated: the monthly meeting became an occasion for carousal and vice. The reformatory zeal of the sixteenth century swept the society almost entirely away. The Caland of Brunswick is the only one now existing. See J. FELLER: Diss. de fratrib. Kalend., Francof., 1692; BLUMBERG: Ueber d. Calandsbrüder, Chemnitz, 1721; LEDEBUR, in vol. iv. of the Märkische Forschungen, Berlin, 1850.

H. MERZ.

CALF (the golden), CALF-WORSHIP. The first mention of calf-worship (or, more correctly, bull-worship, since not only does the word employed mean a bull as well as a calf; but among the other Shemitic peoples, and also among the Egyptians, not a calf, but a bull, was worshipped as an idol) is Exod. xxxii.; cf. Deut. ix. 16, the episode in the wilderness. The next mention of the worship is 1 Kings xii. 28-33; cf. 2 Kings x. 29, xvii. 16; Hos. viii. 5 ff., x. 5, xiii. 2; 2 Chr. xi. 15. But, when Aaron set up the steer-image, he revived an old Semitic religious rite. That he did not borrow it from the Egyptians, plausible and near-at-hand as the theory is, is proven by the fact that that people did not worship images of animals, but the living animals. Apis, represented, it is true, by a small bull-image in their processions, was a black bullock, sacredly guarded from injury; for in him the god Osiris was believed to be incarnated (Wilkinson's Manners and Customs of the Ancient Egyptians, new ed., London, 1878, vol. III. pp. 86-95, 306 ff.). It is true that Jeroboam set up the golden bulls at Bethel and Dan; but his long residence in Egypt is at most only presumptive evidence that he borrowed the idea thence; and it is very improbable that he would seek to strengthen his uncertain authority by introducing a foreign cultus, whereas he would really strengthen himself by substituting for the rigorous Jehovah-worship the laxer bull-worship, if it was indigenous. That such worship was indigenous is, of course, not easy to prove directly; but we know that the great and mighty of the earth are often represented in the Hebrew Scriptures under the figure of a bull; and especially is the horn of the bull the symbol of power, — a symbol even used of the divine power and of the outgoing salvation. The twelve oxen which supported Solomon's sea of brass may have been Phœnician in suggestion, and so the various animals in Ezekiel's visions may have been Babylonian. If the trace of the old Hebrew bull-worship is faint, the proof of its existence among the neighboring nations is abundant. In the Babylonian-Assyrian religion, and in the Syro-Phœnician, the bull represented the masculine divinity, as was natural to a people who were graziers. The old Aryan explained the heavenly phenomena by comparisons drawn from the life of their herds. In the Zendavesta we find mention of the first bull. The bull represents power and strength; to the Shemite the destroying, at the same time the reproductive, omnipotence of the sun, which was worshipped in all the different forms of Baal (see BAAL). It may be that the gold of the Hebrew bull-idols represents the glitter of the sun's rays. We possess pictures of the Syrian Baal of Doliche, which was transported to Rome, representing him standing upon a bull (see Fel. Hettner, De Iove Dolicheno dissertatio philologica, Bonn, 1877). The Jupiter of Hieropolis in Syria was pictured sitting upon a bull. The classical tale of the seduction of Europa is a form of the Baal myth, in which the god, in the shape of a bull, journeys with Astarte to Crete. The sacredness of cattle among the Philistines is demonstrated by the story of the sending home the ark (1 Sam. vi.). [It is not probable that Aaron's golden bull was solid; rather it was a rude wooden image covered with gold. Thus it could be burnt, and the gold be powdered.] When Jeroboam set up his bulls, and ordained his non-levitical priesthood, he did not pretend to do more than return to the Jehovah-worship of the past. That he did thus return is proved by his success. When Jehu destroyed the Baal-worship, he did not touch the bulls, — a clear proof of the distinction to be made between the two worships (2 Kings x. 29). The one was foreign and debasing; the other was domestic and orderly. Hosea is the only one of the prophets who alludes to the bull-worship; and to him the worship of an image is the same as the worship of an idol.

WOLF BAUDISSION.

CALHOUN, Simeon Howard, American missionary, b. in Boston, Aug. 15, 1804; d. at Buffalo, Dec. 14, 1876. He was graduated at Williams College in 1829; studied law; was converted, and came back to his Abna Mater as tutor. In 1837 he went to the Levant as agent of the American Bible Society, but in 1844 became a missionary under the American Board, subsequently under the Presbyterian Board. His field of operation was the seminary at Abeih on the slopes of Lebanon. He returned home in 1874. Mr. Calhoun was a most devoted missionary; and the epithet he bore, the "Cedar of Lebanon," proves how he was regarded. He was rarely gifted, yet content to spend his life in comparative obscurity. He published, in Arabic, Scripture Helps, Beirut, 2d ed., 1869, pp. 648.

CALIXTINES, The, one of the two great factions into which the Hussites divided in 1420, derived their name from calix ("the chalice"), because the cup, as an essential element of the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, was the point to which they held unswervingly fast, while in other respects they showed themselves much more tractable than the Taborites. See BOHEMIA and HUSSITES.

CALIXTUS I., Bishop of Rome under Heliogabalus and Alexander Severus. The history of this bishop has assumed a new and quite different aspect since the discovery of the work of Hippolytus, Refutation of all Heresies. Previously nothing certain was known of him. The magnificent church Santa Maria Trastevere was ascribed to him; but the custom of dedicating churches to special saints is of much later date. The celebrated Cemetery of the Martyrs bears his name; but it was always considered doubtful whether he really built it. Two decretals of his, regulating, among other things also, the four great annual fasts, the Quatember fasts, are spurious. His martyrdom is very improbable. The acts are fabulous from beginning to end; though they must be old, since extracts from them occur in the martyrologium of Bede. Such is the Calixtus of tradition, and such the trustworthiness of the tradition.

Quite otherwise the report of Hippolytus (IX., 11), though it must not be forgotten that Hippolytus was a violent adversary of Calixtus. According to this report, there lived in Rome during the reign of Commodus (180-192) a Christian of the name Kallistus, who was the slave of a Christian official called Karpophorus. From his master he obtained a considerable sum of money, and established a banking-business in the fish-market. Much money was intrusted to him also by widows; but he conducted the business ill, and lost all. Afraid of being called to account by his master, he sought refuge in flight, and was just about to set sail for some foreign port, when Karpophorus appeared in the harbor. He jumped into the water, but was caught, delivered over to the master, and shut up in the treadmill. Released after some time, he had a scuffle with the Jews in Rome, on account of which he was publicly whipped, and sent to work in the mines of Sardinia. By the influence of Marcia, the concubine of Commodus, he regained liberty; and, after his return to Rome, he ingratiated himself so well with Pope Zephyrinus that he was made director of the great cemetery which afterwards came to bear his name. But here an insoluble enigma presents itself; for how could such a man be ordained priest? and how could he be placed on the episcopal chair of Rome? The fact that he could be throws a very peculiar light on the moral state of the Roman Church at that period. The conflict with Hippolytus began already in the lifetime of Zephyrinus. Hippolytus accused Kallistus of patripassianism, and Kallistus accused Hippolytus of ditheism. But the controversy between them was not merely doctrinal. Hippolytus had adopted the maxim which the Novatians afterwards vindicated in all its rigor, — that those who had committed a deadly sin could never again be admitted into the church. Kallistus defended the milder practice of the Roman Church. He even taught that a bishop should not be deposed on account of a deadly sin. There were good reasons for his mildness. See DÖLLINGER: Hippolytus and Kallistus, Regensburg, 1853. [Eng. trans., Edinburgh, 1876. CRR. WORDSWORTH: St. Hippolytus and the Church of Rome, 2d ed., London, 1880. Dr. Döllinger defends the character of Kallistus against the charges of Hippolytus. On the other hand, Bishop Wordsworth accepts them, and explains (p. 140) the severity of the language and the freedom of the handling, on the ground that Hippolytus did not recognize Kallistus as a legitimate bishop of the church, because he was an abettor of heresy. The dates for the bishopric of Kallistus are 218-223. His heresy consisted in his view that the Son was merely the manifestation of the Father in human form; the Father animating the Son as the spirit animates the body, and suffering with him on the cross.

[Besides heresy in doctrine, Kallistus is accused of greatly relaxing the terms of re-admittance into the church; of allowing married men to be ordained, and ordained men to marry; of bringing the marriage-laws of the Church into conflict with those of the State; and, finally, of allowing repetition of baptism, probably as a substitute of the severe penance required of grievous sinners.

[The largest of the Roman catacombs is the Cemetery of St. Calixtus; and De Rossi says it was the first common cemetery, given to the Pope by some noble family for the use of the whole Christian community. Thirteen out of the next eighteen popes after Zephyrinus are said to have been buried there.]

HERZOG.

CALIXTUS is the name of two other popes. — Calixtus II. (Feb. 2, 1119-Dec. 13, 1124) descended from the royal house of Burgundy, and was received with applause by the whole of Christendom when elected Pope by the cardinals assembled at Clugny, because several of his immediate predecessors were men who had risen from the lower classes of the clergy, and by their narrow stubbornness made the long strife with the German emperors concerning the investiture a tedious, dangerous, and inextricable entanglement. Even Henry V. declared himself hopeful of a reconciliation. Nevertheless, at the Council of Rheims all negotiations failed; and Henry, together with Pope Burdinus (Gregory VIII.), was once more excommunicated (Oct. 30, 1119). By the aid of Duke William of Calabria, Calixtus succeeded in 1121 in seizing Burdinus, and shut him up in the Monastery of Cava, near Salerno, to do penance. This victory made the Emperor a little meeker, and at the same time there arose among the German princes a party which decidedly wished to put an end to the strife. At the Diet of Worms an agreement was at last arrived at (Sept. 8, 1122); and Sept. 23 the famous Concordat of Worms was solemnly read to the multitudes assembled in the plains outside of Worms. The principal point of the agreement was, that the bishops and abbots of the German Empire should receive the regalia, as temporal feudatories of the realm, from the Emperor, but the ring and staff, as spiritual servants of the Church, from the Pope. The letters of Calixtus are given by Jaffé, Regesta Pontif. Rom.; the sources of his life, by Watterich, Pontif. Roman. Vitæ, Tom. II. — CALIXTUS III. (April 8, 1455–Aug. 6, 1458) was a Spaniard by birth, and Bishop of Valencia. His true name was Alonso de Borja, Italian Borgia. He was seventy-seven years old, weak, good-natured, and incapable of energy, except for the elevation of his own nephews, and for a grand crusade against the Turks. In the latter undertaking he failed utterly, though the mendicant orders as alms-gatherers, and a swarm of crusade-preachers with loads of indulgences, sent immense sums of money into the papal treasury. But the fleet he equipped did nothing; and the tithe which he proposed to levy on the clergy caused rebellious murmurs, both in France and Germany. He succeeded better in providing for his nephews; for, though they all found it advisable to leave Rome as soon as he died, they were able to return after a short time. See PLATINA, Vita Calixti III., Venice, 1479. G. VOIGT.

CALIXTUS, Georg, b. at Medelby, a village of Sleswick, Dec. 14, 1586; d. at Helmstädt, March 19, 1656; was educated in the school of Flensburg; studied philology, philosophy, and theology at the University of Helmstädt, 1603–09; travelled in Holland, England, and France, 1609–13, and was in 1614 appointed professor of theology at Helmstädt. He was in the seventeenth century the most prominent and most influential representative of the school of Melancthon. With a large-hearted conception of that which is true in all Christian denominations, he labored to prepare the way for a general reconciliation of Christendom by the extinction of all minor, more or less individual differences. But his labor fell in the period of the Thirty-Years' War; and its result was an isolated position, attacked from all sides. The orthodox Lutherans very early suspected him of lukewarmness or looseness. His De Immortalitate Animæ et Resurrectione Mortuorum, 1616, was suppressed by the censor, because his exegetical explanations deviated from Luther's translation; and his Epitome Theologiae, 1619, was ransacked like a plague-stricken vessel. While his Theologia Moralis (1634) and De Arte

Nova Nihusii were considered by the Roman-Catholic theologians as the heaviest blows aimed against their system for a long time, among the orthodox Lutherans they occasioned an open accusation of crypto-papism (1640). The situation became still more involved and precarious after the conference at Thorn (1645). Calixtus hoped to bring about a reconciliation between the Lutherans and the Reformed; but succeeded only in being vehemently attacked as a crypto-Calvinist. He never gave up, however, to work for the great idea of his life, all the while defending himself as best he could. Desiderium et Studium Concordiæ Ecclesiasticæ and Wiederlegung der Verleumdungen are among his last works. Of his writings, many of which were several times reprinted, there is no collected edition; but a complete list is given in Moeller's Cimbria Literata III. pp. 121–210, together with a description of his life. See E. L. TH. HENKE: Calixtus' Briefwechsel, Halle, 1833, with two continuations, Jena, 1835, and Marburg, 1840; Georg Calixtus und seine Zeit, by the same author, Halle, 1853; H. SCHMID: Geschichte der synkretistischen Streitigkeiten, in der Zeit des Georg. Calixtus, Erlangen, 1846; W. GASS: Calixt. und der Synkretismus, Breslau, 1846. E. L. TH. HENKE.

CALLENBERG, Johann Heinrich, b. at Gotha, Jan. 12, 1694; d. at Halle, July 16, 1760; studied theology and Oriental languages at Halle, and became professor there, first in philosophy, 1727, then in theology, 1739. He founded in 1728 the so-called Jewish Institution, — a school for the education of missionaries among the Jews and Mohammedans; printed the New Testament, Luther's Catechism, etc., in Arabic; gave an introduction to, and dictionary of the corrupt Hebrew which the German Jews speak among themselves; and published Berichte von einem Versuch das jüdische Volk zur Erkenntniss des Christlichen anzuleiten, 3 vols., 1728–36, and De Conversione Mohammedanorum, 1733.

CALMET, Augustine, b. at Mesnil-la-Horgue, in the diocese of Toul, Feb. 26, 1672; d. at Senones, Oct. 25, 1757; was a Benedictine monk of the Congregation of St. Vannes, and became Abbot of St. Leopold at Nancy, 1718, and of Senones, 1728. He was a very prolific writer. The most remarkable of his works are: Dictionnaire de la Bible, Paris, 1722, with a supplement, 1728, 4 vols. fol., often reprinted with additions or abridgments; e.g., Calmet's Dictionary of the Holy Bible, as published by the Late Mr. Charles Taylor, revised, with Large Additions, by Edward Robinson, Boston, 1852; Commentaire littéral et critique de la Bible, Paris, 1707 sqq., 23 vols., trans. and ed. Taylor, London, 1847, 5 vols.; Histoire ecclésiastique et civile de Lorraine, Nancy, 1728, 4 vols., etc. See FANGÉ: Vie de Calmet, 1763, containing a complete list of his works.

CALLING is in theological as in popular religious speech the first phenomenon in conversion. (The word is not so used in the Old Testament, and in the New chiefly by Paul.) It comes from God as the carrying-out of a purpose of salvation formed from all eternity (Rom. viii. 28, 29). God knows his own (Cor. viii. 3; Gal. iv. 9). Yet it is evident that the calling is wider than the salvation: "Many are called, but few chosen" (Matt. xx. 16). The fact is, that the desire of God's heart, as testified to by his Word (1 Tim. ii. 4; 2 Pet. iii. 9; cf. Ezek. xxxiii. 11), is the salvation of all; but against this wish men set themselves, so that the fault is not God's, but man's (Matt. xxiii. 37; Acts xiii. 46). There is therefore in salvation a co-operation of man with God. The calling comes through the usual means of grace, particularly the Word as proclaimed by the preacher (Rom. x. 14). Paul's fruitful ministry was not exceptional. God has in every age as abundantly blessed his messengers. The assertion that the call is general means simply that the call is given to all who hear the gospel preached, and, if obeyed, leads to their salvation; for God's love takes in the world (John iii. 18), and he has put upon his church the duty of proclaiming to all this boundless love, and promised his presence in the work (Matt. xxviii. 19, 20). [Calvinistic theologians distinguish between the external and the internal call. The former is addressed to all, elect and non-elect alike; the latter, only to the elect, and is an effectual calling. It is thus defined in the Westminster Shorter Catechism, q. 31: "Effectual calling is the work of God's Spirit, whereby, convincing us of our sin and misery, enlightening our minds in the knowledge of Christ, and renewing our wills, he doth persuade and enable us to embrace Jesus Christ, freely offered to us in the gospel."]

CALOVIVS, Abraham, b. at Mohrungen, East Prussia, 1612; d. at Wittenberg, Feb. 25, 1686; studied theology at Königsberg; was rector of the gymnasium of Dantzig 1643-50, and became in the latter year professor of theology at Wittenberg. His Systema Locorum Theologicorum, 12 vols., 1655-77, is the most compact and comprehensive representation of Lutheran dogmatics, the true exemplar of what has been called Lutheran scholasticism. His essential character, however, was not dogmatical, but polemical. His chief exegetical work, Biblia Illustrata, 12 vols., roots in a polemical interest. It is a refutation of the Commentaries of Grotius. And the conspicuous position which he occupied in the theological world of the seventeenth century led to his violent polemics against Calixtus, and that reconciliating tendency which was represented by the University of Helmstädt, and which generally went under the name of syncretism. His principal writings in this line are: Olegomena Institutionum Theologicarum, 1649; Prolegomena de Nova Theologia Helmstadio-Regioitanorum Syncretistarum, 1651; Harmonia Calviniano-hæretica, 1655, etc. At last, however, he reached himself. His Historia Syncretistica, 1652, was suppressed. He was six times married. I. F. ERDMANN, Lebensbeschreibungen der Wittenbergischen Theologen Wittenbergs, Hamburg u. Leipzig, 1852.

CALVARISTS, or PRIESTS OF CALVARY, a mystic association founded at Bethoram in the diocese of Auch, France, in 1633, by Hubert Leprieux, for the purpose of bringing back France into the Roman Church. On the instance of Louis XIII. the association established a house near Paris on the Mont Valerien, which after that time was called Colline de Calvaire. There were also Benedictine nuns of the Colline de Calvaire.

CALVIN (Latinized form of Cauvin or Caulvin), John,¹ b. at Noyon in Picardy, some seventy miles north-east of Paris, July 10, 1509; d. at Geneva, May 27, 1564.

1. His Life. — His father, Gerard Cauvin, was apostolic notary, fiscal attorney of the county, and secretary to the Bishop of Noyon. His mother, Jeanne Lefranc of Cambrai, was noted for her personal beauty, as also for great religious fervor and strictness. His father was poor; but his influence secured his son the best educational advantages at home, and when only twelve years old the chaplaincy of the Chapel de la Gesine: so Calvin received the tonsure, although he was never ordained. In 1523 he was sent to Paris to prepare for the priesthood. He was then noted for his extraordinary ability, and also for a sternness of character which gave him his sobriquet, the Accusative Case. His support while a student was derived from church-preferments. He held successively his chaplaincy, and then the curacy of Marteville (1527) and of Pont l'Évêque (1529). In 1527, on the advice of his father, he turned his attention to law, and attended lectures at the universities of Orléans, and, the next year, Bourges. His career was brilliant. At Orléans he frequently lectured to the class in the absence of the professor, and received the complimentary degree of Doctor of Law (which, however, he never used). In Bourges he was a favorite pupil of Andreas Alciati, then the most distinguished law-professor in Europe, and studied Greek, and Protestantism as well, under Melchior Wolmar (see BEZA), although he probably was already inclined to the new faith. On May 26, 1531, his father died; and that summer he returned to Paris and to theology. In April, 1532, he published, with a commentary, Seneca's De Clementia (On Mercy). He had assumed the cost of publication, and apparently was pecuniarily embarrassed by it; for he sold at this time his slender patrimony. But, if poor in purse, he was rich in honors. God had, however, better things in store for him, and was pleased by a "sudden conversion" to subdue him, making him willing, as he says, "to know the truth." The change was radical and permanent, like Paul's. This was in the latter part of 1532. But he did not break at once with his studies, although he made the Bible more of a text-book than ever.

The Reformation was making headway in France under Francis I.; and Calvin preached frequently in the meetings of the Evangelical party, commonly closing with the words: "If God be for us, who can be against us?" His friend Nicholas Cop, a learned physician of Basel, was elected rector of the University of Paris; and at his request Calvin prepared for him an inaugural address on Christian philosophy (see Calvin's Opera in the Corpus Reformatorum, vol. IX.), which Cop delivered on All-Saints' Day in 1533 in the Church of the Maturins, before a large assembly. Calvin had made the address a plea for the reform of the Church on the basis of the pure gospel. The consequence of this bold act was the compulsory flight of Calvin to the south of France. The next two years were spent in wandering as a fugitive under assumed names, all the while sowing the seed of the kingdom. For some time he was at Angoulême with his learned friend the young canon Louis du Tillet, who subsequently joined the Protestants, using his excellent library, and preparing his Institutes. Then he was at the court of Margaret of Navarre, the sister of Francis I.; at Noyon (May, 1534), where he parted with his ecclesiastical benefices; at Poitiers, where he celebrated with a few friends, for the first time, the Lord's Supper, according to the evangelical rite, in a cave near the town, called to this day "Calvin's Cave;" at Orléans, where he published (1534) his first theological work, Psychopannychia, confuting from the Scriptures the Anabaptist doctrine of the sleep of souls between death and resurrection; and finally again in Paris (the close of 1534), where he met for the first time Michael Servetus, and challenged him to a debate on the Trinity. The outbreak of persecution compelled his flight to Strassburg. Thence he went to Basel, and there published in Latin (1536), when he was twenty-seven years old, his immortal Institutes. (The French edition was made subsequently, and is a translation.) The dedication to Francis I. is a model of manly eloquence. He revisited Noyon, won a brother and sister to the Reformed faith, and then returned to Switzerland, with the intention of settling down to a studious life at Basel or Strassburg.

On Aug. 5, 1536, he arrived in Geneva, being compelled by the wars to go round that way, and intended to leave the next day; but William Farel threatened him with the curse of God if he preferred his studies to the work of the Lord. "These words," says Calvin, in the preface of his Commentary on the Psalms, "terrified and shook me as if God from on high had stretched out his hand to stop me; so that I renounced the journey I had undertaken." The timid scholar was forced to become a preacher at a stormy time. He and Farel labored to introduce reforms into Geneva, and by the severity of their discipline won the ill will of the leaders; and on Easter Monday (April 23), 1538, they were deposed, and expelled from the city, by the Council of the Two Hundred. Banishment meant freedom; and for three years (1538-41) he quietly pursued his studies in Strassburg, and at the same time ministered to the French Church there. In September, 1540, he married Idelette de Bures, or Van Buren, the widow of Johannes Storder, an Anabaptist whom he had converted. By her he had three children, all of whom died in infancy. Calvin's married life was otherwise very happy, but lasted only nine years. During his stay in Strassburg he made the acquaintance of Melancthon; and the "theologian," as the Germans called Calvin, and the "preceptor of Germany," were quickly firm friends.

Meanwhile Geneva was by no means forgotten. When Cardinal Sadolet tried to win it to Rome, Calvin came boldly to its defence; and often did he give his former flock his timely counsel. At length magistrates and people united in urgently and repeatedly recalling him, as the only one who could stop the disorders that had arisen; and very reluctantly he came. On Sept. 13, 1541, he made his entrance. The council gave him a house with a garden to live in, and, for salary, five hundred florins, twelve measures of wheat, and two tubs of wine. From that time on, Geneva was his home and his parish, his centre of activity, but by no means circumference of influence. Under his iron rule the city assumed a new aspect. Immorality of every sort was sternly suppressed. It was well for the success of this system that Geneva was a refuge for the persecuted in every land. Hollanders, English, Italians, Spaniards, and more particularly Frenchmen, settled in the town, and readily lent their aid in maintaining Calvin's peculiar methods. But not refugees alone came: his lectures and those of Beza attracted many thousands of students, and thus spread their fame far and wide. But incessant study, a vast correspondence, "the care of all the churches," his sedentary life,—these conspired to make him the victim of disease, and at fifty-five years of age he breathed his last. He had lived abstemiously, been most generous in his gifts, and left behind him in money only about a hundred and seventy dollars, but an incalculable fortune in fame and consecrated influence; and from him Geneva inherited faith, education, government, brave citizens, and pride in an honored name.

2. His Fundamental Ideas.—He based his system upon the Apostles' Creed, and followed its lines. Ethics and theology were handled in the closest connection. Calvin's reformation in theology was pre-eminently a practical affair. Even the doctrine of predestination was developed, not as a speculation, but as a matter of practical concern. By the extraordinary emphasis put upon it, the Genevans were taught to consider it almost the corner-stone of the Christian faith. In opposition to the lax views of sin and grace which the Roman Church inculcated, he revived the Augustinian doctrine in order by it to conquer Rome. In so doing he was one with Zwingli, Ecolampadius, Luther, and Melancthon. But in his supra-lapsarian views he stood alone among the Reformers. His views of ecclesiastical authority and discipline are also important. He allowed to the Church a greater authority than any other Reformer. Here, again, the influence of Augustine is seen. He says, "The Church is our mother" (Institutes, Bk. IV. chap. i. 1). Outside of the Church there is no salvation. Her ministry is divinely constituted, and to its believers are bound to pay deference. Her authority is absolute in matters of doctrine; but, when civil cases arise, she hands the offenders over to the State for punishment. State and Church have therefore separate and exclusive jurisdiction; yet they exist side by side, and co-operate. They mutually support each other.—The ideal government embraced a democracy, an aristocracy, and a king or autocrat. He taught obedience to the powers that be. In this scheme he had in mind the Israelites. He aimed at a theocracy. Calvin bowed before the majesty of the righteous Judge. His fear of God led him to unquestioning submission. In a sense it was his very breath; and so in his system justice is more prominent than love. God as the ruler, rather than as the lover, of all in Christ, was the object of his reverence.

3. His Reforms. — In accordance with his principles was his work. During his first residence in Geneva he showed his determination to separate Church and State; and therefore he and his fellow-preachers protested against the interference of the State in the matter of the use of fonts, of unleavened bread in the Lord's Supper, and in the celebration of the church-festivals, as these were properly within the ecclesiastical province. When, also, he refused the Eucharist unto the city, because of its immorality, he asserted for the Church freedom from the civil authority. This determined stand cost him temporarily his position; but, when he resumed his work in Geneva, he and the citizens knew that his power was henceforth absolute. The reforms he instituted are famous, and often condemned as infamous. They are, however, not only defensible, but commendable, if judged by the standard of that age. We cannot withhold our admiration of the moral courage, the self-forgetfulness, the stern morality, and the uncompromising zeal, with which Calvin addressed himself unto the apparently hopeless task of curbing the passions of the loose populace, and gaining the cordial co-operation of the upper classes. He succeeded. Geneva came to be regarded as a normal school of religious life. Religion was the life of the greater part of the inhabitants. With a correct insight into the necessities of the case, Calvin declared immediately after his victorious entry that he could not take up work without a re-organization of the Church, viz., by the formation of a church-court, which should have full authority to maintain discipline. On Nov. 20, 1541, at a popular meeting, the scheme he drew up was ratified. This provided for a consistory, composed of six city ministers and twelve elders, — one of the latter to be a syndic and their president, — which met every Thursday, and put under church-discipline, without respect of persons, every species of evil-doers. The rigor and vigor of this administration quickly awakened natural indignation, in part even among those who on the whole favored Calvin. His life was at times in danger. Some showed their terrified contempt for him by naming their dogs after him. In a city like Geneva, full of refugees of every description, there were many who looked upon all restraint as oppression; others who objected to Calvin's measures as going too far, or criticised its methods. In order still further to increase the authority of the church-court, Calvin secured (1555) an important modification of the city government, whereby the conseil général (the General Council), the highest law-making body, was only called twice a year, — in February to elect syndics, and in November to fill some minor offices, and fix the price of wine. But nothing might be discussed in this meeting which had not been previously determined upon in the Council of Two Hundred; nor in the latter which the Council of Sixty did not approve of; nor could this council take up any thing not previously agreed to in the highest council, which thus practically governed the State. The General Council became in this way a superfluity, without the power of initiative. It had, however, accomplished its mission, — accepted the Reformation.

Most prominent among the means Calvin used to reform the city was preaching. Every other week he preached every day in plain, direct, convincing fashion, without eloquence, but still irresistibly; and the life the preacher led constituted his strongest claim upon their attention. Our reports of his sermons are probably from notes made by his hearers; which was the easier done, because, being asthmatic, he spoke very slowly. Every Friday the so-called "Congregation" was held, in which questions were answered, and debates even carried on. Minors were carefully instructed in a catechism originally prepared by Calvin in Latin, 1545. In 1536 he had issued a French, and in 1538 a Latin, catechism, which was a mere abridgment or syllabus of his Institutes, and was not in the form of question and answer; but the catechism of 1545 was in the usual form.

Calvin has the credit of first introducing congregational singing into the worship of the Reformed Church in Geneva. The first songs were some of his own metrical renderings of the Psalms.

4. His Opponents. — Like Zwingli and Luther, Calvin had his difficulties with the Anabaptists, towards whom he adopted the same tactics. He met them in public debate March 18, 1537, and so effectually disposed of their arguments, that he was not troubled again.

But he had personal controversies — (1) first with Peter Caroli, a French refugee and pastor in Lausanne, a religious chameleon, whose latest hue was that of a stickler for orthodoxy. Calvin was very indifferent to the terminology of theology, so long as the truth was expressed. In discussing the nature of the Godhead during his first residence in Geneva, he avoided using the words "Trinity" and "Person," although he had no particular objection to them; and so they did not occur in the Confession of Faith which he drew up, and to which the citizens of Geneva were compelled to assent; nor did the Geneva Church subscribe formally to the Athanasian Creed. Caroli accused Calvin and his fellow-divines of Arianism and Sabellianism; and so plausible was the charge, that Calvin was greatly troubled. However, in the synod of 1537, held in Bern, the Genevan divines fully cleared themselves, and Caroli was deposed and banished. (2) Berthelier, the son of a martyr for freedom. Berthelier was forbidden the communion (1553) by the consistory. The council absolved the ban. Calvin from the pulpit, two days before the September Communion (one of the four yearly occasions), declared that he would die sooner than give the Lord's holy things to one under condemnation for despising God. Perrin, who was then syndic for the second time, ordered Berthelier to stay away from communion, and so ended a dispute from which the enemies of Calvin had hoped a great deal. (3) Bolsec (see title), whose presumption in denying predestination, and abusing the ministers at a congregation, drew upon him, not only Calvin's indignant reply at the time, but also imprisonment and banishment (1551). (4) But by far the most famous of all Calvin's opponents was Servetus (see title for fuller discussion), who seems to have been a rather flippant person. It is said he desired Calvin's banishment in order that he might be installed in his place. To this end he accused Calvin of perfidious, tyrannical, and unchristian conduct. It is no wonder, therefore, that Calvin treated him harshly. It is idle to shield Calvin from the charge of bringing about Servetus' death, although it is true that the mode adopted (burning) did not meet with his approval; but at the same time it is easy to excuse him on the ground of the persecuting spirit of his age. Strange as it may seem, the Protestants who had felt the persecution of Rome were ready to persecute all who followed not with them. The burning of Servetus (Oct. 27, 1553) for the crime of heresy, specifically antitrinitarianism, was approved by the Helvetic Church, and, what is more remarkable, by the mild Melancthon; but it failed even then to win universal approval, and now it is usually considered a sad, ineffaceable blot upon Calvin's character. Many who know nothing else of either Calvin or Servetus are very indignant over the tragedy, and apparently reject Calvinism because of it. We ought rather to mourn than to censure. Servetus knew the danger he braved in coming to Geneva. He had as early as 1534 been in debate with Calvin, although they did not personally meet. On his intimating an intention to visit Geneva, Calvin gave him fair warning, that, if he came, he would prosecute him to the death.¹ While, therefore, we hold Calvin responsible for Servetus' death, we clear him of the charges of having allured Servetus to Geneva, and of rejoicing in his death on personal grounds. See art. SERVETUS; R. WILLIS: Servetus and Calvin, London, 1877; H. TOLLIN: Servet. u. die oberländischen Reformatoren, I. Bd. Servet. u. Butzer, Berlin, 1880.

No good came of the execution, only evil,—ridicule from the Roman Catholics, and the adverse criticism from many friends. It likewise failed to check the antitrinitarian heresy. Calvin defended himself, and Beza aided him; but no defence could excuse the facts.

5. His Ecclesiastical Influence.—By his lectures he attracted students from every quarter. He often had as many as a thousand: therefore his influence was constantly spreading. As was natural, it was most formative in France, whence most of his pupils came, and to whose Protestants Calvin was leader and spiritual father. But in other lands he exerted his power. In Italy he came to the aid of the troubled Duchess of Ferrara. To England he sent his Commentary on Isaiah, with a dedication to the youthful King, Edward VI. To Cranmer he wrote letters; and through Knox he moulded Scotland. He counselled the Moravian Brethren. He helped the Poles in the Trinitarian controversy, and likewise the Reformed cause in Hungary. He also prepared, in his way, the present interest in foreign missions by his unfortunate mission to Brazil (1555). See VILLEGAINON and STÄHELIN, Johannes Calvin, vol. ii. pp. 234–238.

Calvin's relations with Switzerland and Germany were unpleasant. He strove most earnestly to unite the different branches of the Protestant Church. But unhappily he was suspected by many Swiss of Lutheran views on the Lord's Supper,—for this was the controverted point,—and by many Germans of too much Zwinglian-ism; so that he made but an indifferent mediator. He had high hopes of the "Consensus Tigurinus" (Consensus of Zürich, 1549), which harmonized the Swiss churches; but the controversy with the Lutherans was violently renewed by Hesshusius.

6. His Personal Character.—The common conception of Calvin is erroneous. He was not the stony-hearted tyrant, the relentless persecutor, the gloomy theologian, the popular picture represents him to have been. Men, by a blessed inconsistency, are often kinder than their creeds. So, at all events, was Calvin. To the superficial observer he is not attractive; but it is the opinion of every one who has studied him that he improves upon acquaintance. Granted that he was constitutionally intolerant; that he did draft and sternly carry out regulations which were vexatious and needlessly severe; that he knew no other stand-point in government, morals, or theology than his own,—he had other qualities which entitle him to respect and admiration. He was refined, conscientious, pure, faithful, honest, humble, pious. His offering to God was a bleeding heart. He attracted men by the strength of his character, the loftiness of his aims, and the directness of his efforts. He had the common human affections. He loved his wife, and mourned her death. He grieved over his childlessness. He took delight in his friends; and they were the noblest in the Protestant Church. Somewhat of the forbidding aspect of his life may perhaps be accounted for by the unnatural life he was forced to lead. He desired to spend his days in study; whereas he was forced to incessant, multifarious, and most prominent labor. Experience shows there is no harder master than a timid man compelled to lead. Again: his ill health must be taken into account. He was a walking hospital. Such men are not apt to be gentle. The wonder rather is that he showed so patient a spirit. The popular verdict has been given against him; but vox populi is not always vox dei. What Beza, his biographer, wrote is nearer truth: "Having been an observer of Calvin's life for sixteen years, I may with perfect right testify that we have in this man a most beautiful example of a truly Christian life and death, which it is easy to calumniate, but difficult to imitate." Ernest Renan finds the key to his influence in the fact that he was "the most Christian man of his generation" (Studies of Religious History and Criticism, N.Y., 1864, pp. 286 sqq.). Professor Dörner says, "Calvin was equally great in intellect and character, lovely in social life, full of tender sympathy and faithfulness to friends, yielding and forgiving towards personal offences, but inexorably severe when he saw the honor of God obstinately and malignantly attacked" (Gesch. d. Prot. Theol. pp. 374, 376).

7. His Personal Appearance.—He was of middle stature, and, through feeble health, of meagre and emaciated frame. He had a thin, pale, finely-chiselled face, a well-formed mouth, a long, pointed beard, black hair, a prominent nose, a lofty forehead, and flaming eyes. He was modest, plain, and scrupulously neat in dress, orderly and methodical in all his habits, temperate, and even abstemious, allowing himself scarcely food and sleep enough for vigorous work. (The famous portrait by Ary Scheffer is too much idealized.)

8. His Literary Labors.—Leaving out of view his correspondence, the writings of Calvin divide themselves into the theological and the exegetical. In regard to the latter, it suffices now to say that they have never been excelled, if, on the whole, they have been equalled. He possessed all the requisite qualifications for an exegete,—knowledge of the original tongues, good common sense, and abundant piety. His expositions are brief, pithy, and clear. His theological writings are remarkable for their early maturity and their unvarying consistency. Besides his minor writings, we possess that masterpiece of Protestantism, the Institutes of the Christian Religion, which came fully grown into the world, like Minerva from the brain of Jupiter. He really produced at twenty-six a book in which he had nothing to change at fifty-five. The repeated enlargements were mere developments of its germinal ideas. The first edition (Basel, 1536) contained only six chapters, and was intended merely as a brief apology of the Reformed doctrine: 1. Of law, with an exposition of the Decalogue; 2. Of faith, with an exposition of the Apostles' Creed; 3. Of prayer, with an exposition of the Lord's Prayer; 4. Of the sacraments of baptism and the Lord's Supper; 5. Of the other so-called sacraments; 6. Of Christian liberty, church government and discipline. The French translation made by Calvin himself appeared in Basel, 1541. The final form was given to the Institutes in the Latin edition of Geneva, 1559, when it was made into a treatise of four books, divided into a hundred and four chapters.¹

CALVINISM is a term used to designate the doctrinal system of Calvin. But the doctrines are far older than the man. The system was known originally as Augustinianism, from its earliest champion, St. Augustine (353–430).¹ Calvinism is the term for its developed and Protestant form, which finds its definition, not alone in the writings of Augustine and Calvin, but in the published confessions of those churches which have professed this form of doctrine, and in their standard theological writings.

A. A STATEMENT OF THE PRINCIPLES OF CALVINISM. — I. The Relation of the Creator to the Creation. — Calvinism teaches Christian Theism. It emphasizes at once the transcendence of God beyond, and the immanence of God within, the world. He remains ever a conscious personal Spirit, without and above the world, able, in the exercise of his free volitions, sovereignly to exercise a supernatural influence upon any part of that system of nature which he has established, ordinarily working through second causes, "yet free to work without, above, and against them, at his pleasure." At the same time his creatures are momentarily dependent upon the energy of his will for substance, and for the possession of the powers communicated to them as second causes in all their exercises.

But this is common ground for all Christians. Calvinism, or Augustinianism, just here opposes itself to Pelagianism (see title) in that it teaches, that, prior to apostasy, the spirit of man depended for spiritual life and moral integrity upon the concursus (concurrence) of the Spirit of God, the withdrawal of which is the immediate cause of spiritual death and moral impotence. This divine influence, in one degree, and in one mode or another, is common to all creatures and all their actions; and it is called "grace," when, as an undeserved favor, it is in a supernatural manner restored to the souls of sinful men, with the design of affecting their moral character and action.

II. The Design of God in Creation is declared in the Scriptures to be the manifestation of his own glorious perfections; and Calvinism seizes this principle, and applies it to the interpretation of all God's dealings with man, and of all man's duties to God.

III. The Eternal Plan of God and the Actual Succession of Events in Time is set forth thus: 1. This eternal and immutable plan of God has constituted man a free agent, and consequently can never interfere with the exercise of that freedom of which it is itself the foundation; 2. This created free will is not, however, independent, but ever continues to have its ground in the conserving energies of the Creator; 3. In the case of an infinitely wise, powerful, and free Creator of all things out of nothing, it is obvious that the certain foreknowledge of all events from the absolute beginning virtually involves the pre-determination of each event without exception; for all the causes and consequences, direct and contingent, which are foreseen in creation, are, of course, determined by creation; 4. Since all events constitute a single system, the Creator must embrace the system as a whole, and every infinitesimal element of it, in one all-comprehensive intention; ends more or less general must be determined as ends, and means and conditions in all their several relations to the ends which are made dependent upon them: hence, while every event remains dependent upon its causes, and contingent upon its conditions, none of God's purposes can possibly be contingent, because, in turn, every cause and condition is determined in that purpose, as well as the ends which are suspended upon them: all the decrees of God are hence called absolute, because they are ultimately determined always by "the counsel of his own will," and never by any thing exterior to him which has not in turn been previously determined by him; 5. This determination, however, instead of interfering with, maintains the true causality of the creature, and the free self-determination of men and angels. Since the holiness of the created moral agent is conditioned upon the indwelling of divine grace, and its turning from grace is the cause of sin, it follows that all the good in the volitions of free agents is to be referred to God as its positive source; but all the evil (which originates in defect, privation) is to be referred simply to his permission. In this view all events, without exception, are embraced in God's eternal purpose; even the primal apostasies of Satan and of Adam, as well as all those consequences which have flowed from them. The charge of fatalism so often made does not really lie against Calvinism; for the energizing will of the personal Jehovah, at once perfect Light and Love, is very different from fate. It is one thing to be borne along by irresistible yet utterly blind force, and quite another to be led by our heavenly Father's hand.

IV. God's Benevolence, Justice, and Grace in the Scheme of Redemption. — Justice, as well as benevolence, is an essential and ultimate property of the divine nature, and hence lies back of, and determines the character of, the divine volitions. By the perfection of God's nature he is always benevolent to the innocent, and just as certainly is he determined to punish the guilty. In the gospel, God has sovereignly separated the sin from the sinner in certain cases, in the vicarious penal sufferings of his Son treating the believing sinner as a righteous person; that is, as a person with regard to whom all the demands of justice are fully satisfied. Hence he has exercised both justice and benevolence, — justice to the sin and to the law, benevolence to the sinner; which benevolence to the undeserving is sovereign grace. Calvinism, while admitting the general benevolence of God, emphasizes his JUSTICE and GRACE.

V. The Effect of Adam's Apostasy upon his Posterity. — The entire soul with all its constitutional faculties and acquired habits is the organ of volition, the agent willing. It possesses the inalienable property of self-determination, the moral character of which always depends upon the indwelling of the Holy Spirit, and it needs, therefore, divine help to will rightly. Adam was created in fellowship with God, and hence with a holy tendency of heart, with full power not to sin, but also, for a limited period of probation, with power to sin; and when he sinned the Holy Spirit was withdrawn from the race, and he and his descendants lost the original power not to sin, and gained the necessity to sin; in other words, total moral inability. But this theological doctrine is to be carefully distinguished from the metaphysical one of "philosophical necessity." The phrases, the "bondage of the will," etc., are intended to apply only to the corrupt spontaneous tendency of fallen man to evil, which can be reversed only by a new creating energy from above. At the same time, every Calvinist holds devoutly to the free self-determination of the soul in every moral action, and is at liberty to give whatever psychological explanation of that fact may seem to him most reasonable. Hence Calvinists hold, —

First as to original guilt: (1) Human sin, having originated in the free apostatizing act of Adam, deserves God's wrath and curse; and immutable justice demands their infliction. (2) Such, moreover, was the relation subsisting between Adam and his descendants, that God righteously regards and treats each one as he comes into being as worthy of the punishment of that sin, and consequently withdraws his life-giving fellowship from him. The whole race, therefore, and each individual it embraces, is under the just condemnation of God; and hence the gift of Christ, and the entire scheme of redemption in its conception, execution, and application, are throughout and in every sense a product of sovereign grace. God was free to provide it for few or many, for all or none, just as he pleased; and in every case of its application the motives determining God cannot be found in the object, but only in the good pleasure of the will of the divine Agent.

Secondly as to original sin: (1) Since every man thus comes into the world in a condition of ante-natal forfeiture, because of Adam's apostasy, he is judicially excluded from the morally quickening energy of the Holy Ghost, and hence begins to think, feel, and act without a spontaneous bias to moral good. (2) But since moral obligation is positive, and the soul is essentially active, it constantly develops in action a spiritual blindness and deadness to divine things, and a positive inclination to evil. This involves the corruption of the whole nature; and the absolute impotency of the will to good is, humanly speaking, without remedy, and necessarily tends to the indefinite increase, both of depravity and guilt. It is therefore said to be total.

VI. The Nature and Necessity of Regenerating Grace. — Grace is free, sovereign favor to the ill-deserving. Calvinists distinguish (1) "common grace," or the moral and suasive influence on the soul of the Spirit acting through the truth, as the result of Christ's work, which tends to restrain his evil passions, but which may be resisted, and always prevailing resisted by the unregenerate, from (2) "effectual calling," which is a single act of God, changing the moral character of the will of the subject, and implanting a prevailing tendency to co-operate with future grace in forms of holy obedience. By reason of this new creative energy within it, the soul spontaneously embraces Christ, and turns to God. (3) Afterwards this same divine energy continues to support the soul, and prepare it for, and to concur with it in, every good work. This grace is always prevailing co-operated with by the regenerated soul, and at times resisted, until the status of grace is succeeded by the status of glory.

II. The Application of the Plan of Redemption. — Predestination, or the purpose of God to secure the salvation of some men, and not of all, has been popularly regarded as the distinguishing feature of Calvinism, and one most revolting to moral sense. Some Calvinists, reasoning backward from the nature of God as absolute, and developing this doctrine in a strictly speculative manner, have made it the foundation of their system. These have necessarily conceived of it as a high and logically coherent supralapsarian (election before creation; the decree to create, and permit men to fall, in order to carry out their predestined salvation or perdition), which has been rejected by the great body of the Reformed theologians as unscriptural, and revolting to the moral sense. The vast majority of Calvinists, however, are influenced by practical, and not speculative, considerations, and therefore hold to the infralapsarian (election after creation) view. God, they say, elects his people out of the mass of guilty sinners, and provides redemption for them, thus securing for them faith and repentance whereby they may be saved. These gifts cannot, therefore, be conditions of salvation, as Arminians hold; rather they are its predetermined and graciously effected results.

Gottschalk (808-868) taught a double predestination, — the elect to salvation, and the reprobate to damnation. But this theory is not taught in the recognized standards of Calvinism. God elects of free grace all those he purposes to save, and actually saves them; while those whom he does not elect are simply left under the operation of the law of exact justice, whatever that may be. All infants, idiots, and all believers in Christ, are saved by grace. All others are left to the operation of pure justice. It is obvious that all do not believe, that all are not saved. Calvinistic "particularism" admits the actual results of salvation in their widest scope, and refers all to the gracious purpose and power of God, but does not restrict it one iota within the limits determined by the facts themselves.

B. THE HISTORY OF CALVINISM. — The Eastern division of the Church had from the first, in re-action from prevalent Gnosticism, emphasized the autonomy of the human will. While the truth of human free agency was on all sides admitted, a tendency to give proportionate consideration to the correlative facts of the controlling influence of character over action, of original sin, and of moral impotency, is first traced in the Latin or Western Church, in the writings of Tertullian of Carthage (220 A.D.), Hilary of Poitiers (368), and Ambrose of Milan (397). But the characteristic principles of the system now called Calvinism were first fully developed by Augustine, Bishop of Hippo (324-430).¹ His great opponent was Pelagius (Morgan), — a British monk, a student of the Greek fathers, a man of pure life, moral earnestness, and wide familiarity with different parts of the Church, — assisted by Celestius, a Roman advocate, and Julian, an eloquent deposed bishop. The opinions of Pelagius were unanimously condemned by the whole Church, Eastern and Western, at the Councils of Carthage (407-416), Mileve (416), and Ephesus (431), and by Popes Innocent and Zosimus, — a sure proof that they were not in accordance with the original faith of the Church. And up to the present time Pelagianism has never been adopted into the public creed of any ecclesiastical body except that of the Socinians of Poland (Racovian Catechism, 1605). Afterwards the doctrines of Augustine triumphed, in their conflict with Semi-pelagianism, at the Synods of Orange and Valence (529), and by the decrees of Popes Gelasius (496) and Boniface (530). Henceforth a moderate Augustinianism became the legally recognized orthodoxy of Western Europe, and actually tintured the leading minds and events of that great community for several centuries. Bede, Alcuin, and Claudius of Turin, and afterwards the best and greatest of the schoolmen,—Anselm (910), Bernard of Clairvaux (1140), Hugo St. Victor, Thomas Aquinas (1247), and Thomas Bradwardine (1348),—were all of the school of Augustine. The same is true of all the “Reformers before the Reformation,”—Wycliffe (1324–84), John Hus (1369–1415), the Waldenses of Piedmont, John Wessel (1419–89), John of Goch (1475), Savonarola (1493), John Reuchlin, and Staupitz, the spiritual father of Luther.

The Reformation was a re-action from the growing Semi-pelagianism, as well as from the idolatry and tyranny of the Papal Church. It was in all its leaders, Luther as decidedly as Calvin, and in all its centres, England and Germany as well as Scotland, Holland, or Geneva, an Augustinian movement. Although Calvin was not the first to formulate the system which goes by his name, to him, nevertheless, justly belongs the praise of presenting to the world the first and grandest work of systematic divinity,—of recasting Augustinianism in its Protestant form, and of handing it to the modern world stamped with its great author's name. By him Calvinism and its correlatives—Presbyterianism in the Church, and Republicanism in the State—were, though not invented, advocated and disseminated with transcendent ability and success. From him his doctrines passed to that “apostolic succession” of Bullinger, Turretin, Witsius, John Owen, and Jonathan Edwards; to the Synod of Dort (1618–19) and the Westminster Assembly (1638); and so to the churches of France, Switzerland, Holland, England, and Scotland; to the Independents, the Baptists, and to the Presbyterians in all lands. The Episcopal Church of England and America, whatever may be the teachings of its different leaders, was, beyond controversy, in the intention of its founders, and in the first century of its history, and is yet in its doctrinal articles, essentially Augustinian.

Thus Calvinism exhibits its life by the very varieties it presents. In Germany it has been rendered less thorough and definite through the influence of the compromising school of Melancthon. In Holland, England, and Scotland it has been modified in form by the “Federal Scheme,” introduced by Cocceius and the Westminster divines. In America it has been coerced through more radical and more transient transformations, in the speculations of Hopkins, the younger Edwards, Emmons, N. W. Taylor, and others of the New-England school.

C. THE PRACTICAL EFFECT OF CALVINISM is the best possible refutation of the charges often brought against it. 1. It has uniformly raised the moral standard of both individuals and communities by exalting the sovereignty of God, and emphasizing the moral law. Compare the Waldensians with the other Italians; Geneva under Calvin's rule with its condition before or since; the Huguenots with their Roman-Catholic fellow-citizens; the Jansenists with the Jesuits; the English Puritans with the courtiers of Charles II.; and, finally, all those sections of America settled by the Puritans and the Presbyterians of Scotland, France, and Holland, with those settled by men of other faiths; North America with South America. Calvinism makes giants of men. William the Silent and Cromwell, Knox and Bunyan, were Calvinists. The Shorter Catechism fought through successfully the Revolutionary War. 2. As in personal character, so, of course, in government, both in Church and State. It promotes political freedom; it establishes religious liberty. Its principles strip the ministry of all sacerdotal powers. They make all men and all Christians equal before God. They make God absolute, and supreme over all, and the immediate Controller and Disposer of human affairs. Hence all churches accepting Calvinism, unless prevented by external conditions, have immediately adopted popular constitutions,—Presbyterian or Independent. The republic was established at the same time with presbytery at Geneva. The Mecklenburg Declaration (May 20, 1775) was adopted by twenty-seven delegates, nine of whom, including the president and secretary, were ruling elders; and one was a Presbyterian minister. The simple enumeration of the names of the great representative Calvinistic nationalities—the Waldenses, the Swiss, the Huguenots, the Hollanders, the Puritans, the Covenanters, the New-England and Scotch-Irish Americans—proves this point beyond question.

3. The relation of Calvinism to education is no less conspicuous and illustrious. The little republic of Geneva became the sun of the European world. The Calvinists of France, notwithstanding all their embarrassments, immediately founded and sustained three illustrious theological schools,—at Montauban, Saumur, and Sedan. The peasantry of Scotland excel in intelligence those of other European peoples, thanks to the parish schools. In this country, it has been said, for the first two hundred years of our history, “almost every college and seminary of learning, and almost every academy and common school even, had been built up and sustained by Calvinists.” With Calvinism goes the teacher; with Romanism, the priest.

4. While it is true that every religion and religious party, however impure its creed, or temporary its success, may boast its martyrs, it is nevertheless a fact equally certain and significant, that, beyond all others put together, the Calvinistic churches have furnished the martyrs to Christianity since the Reformation. It is only necessary to mention the Waldenses, the victims of the Inquisition in Italy and Spain, the Massacre of St. Bartholomew, the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes, the victims of Philip and Alva in Holland, of “Bloody Mary” and of the “High Commission” and of the “Bloody Assizes” in England, the Puritans and Covenanters, and victims of Claverhouse, and the “Killing Time” in Scotland.

5. And, lastly, Calvinism is the friend of missions. But in this it is not alone. No church of Christ can forget his command to “disciple all nations.” But this can be fairly claimed on behalf of the Calvinistic churches. They have been alike in priority and in extent of enterprise and devotion,—leaders in this great work. They have also excelled in the thoroughness of their mission educational organizations, and in the manly and Christian type of character they have formed in the converts they have gathered of all races and in all lands.

CAMALDULES (Camaldulani, Camaldulenses). The founder of this order was Romualdus, b. at Ravenna, 950; d. at Val de Castro, June 18, 1027. In his twentieth year he entered the Monastery of Classe, near Ravenna; but monastic life did not fully satisfy him. Aspiring to a higher state of holiness, he left Classe in 976, and became an anchorite. After wandering about for several years in various directions, he settled in the neighborhood of Ravenna; not for a long time, though, in the same place. He easily gathered a circle of followers around him; and, whenever the organization of such a circle into a monastic community was finished, he removed into another place. Thus at Val de Castro he founded a flourishing establishment. In 1000 Otho III. visited him in the Island of Pereo. On his wanderings he reached as far as the frontier of Hungary; but, feeling no special calling for missionary work, he returned to Italy. In 1018 he formed a small establishment at Campus Maldoli, at Arezzo, in the Apennines. In 1022 Henry II. visited him at Sitrien, near Saxoferato. A few years afterwards he retired to Val de Castro, and shut himself up in his cell. It was not wholly incidental that Campus Maldoli, Camaldoli, though one of the smallest of the establishments of Romualdus, became the centre of the whole movement. The spirit of seclusion and asceticism was kept purer here than in any of the other establishments. Camaldoli became the model institution; and its moral pre-eminence naturally led to social superiority. Meanwhile the movement itself was steadily spreading. Petrus Damiani wrote the life of Romualdus about 1040; and at his death (1072) there existed an order of Camaldules, not as a reformed branch of the order of the Benedictines, but as an independent association of anchorites. The prior was called "major." The members lived in separate huts, where they slept and ate. At certain hours they met in the prayer-house, and recited (not sang) the liturgy. They fasted often. Bread and water was their common diet: meat was not allowed. But the principal command was silence. The fourth major, Rudolf, was the first who put down the rules in writing (1102), at the same time mitigating them somewhat. A common table was introduced, wine was allowed, etc. He also established Camaldule nunneries (1086). In 1212 the anchorites were invited to Venice. Here they became cenobites, and their establishments became regular abbeys. But, as the order grew rich, its history developed the common stages through which all religious orders have run — deviation from the severe rules of life; gradual decay of order, moral and social; attempts at reform; separations, etc. In 1476 the Congregation of St. Michael of Murano was formed, independent of the authority of Camaldoli; and the celebrated monasteries of Classe, Val de Castro, and Fonte Avellana, were incorporated with this congregation. Other independent congregations existed in Northern Italy, in France, and in Austria. During the latter part of the eighteenth century, when great troubles befell the monks almost in all countries, the Camaldules fared better than their brethren. The order was abolished in Austria in 1782, afterwards also in France and Italy; but the monks were nowhere treated with harshness. In 1822 the order was restored in Naples. Gregory XVI. belonged to it.

LIT. — The life of Romualdus, by Petrus Damiani, is given by Mabillon in Ann. Ord. Benedict., III. and IV. The history of the order is found in HELYOT: Histoire des Ordres Mon. Rel. et Mil.,

CAMEL. Of the two distinct varieties, the one-humped and the two-humped, only the first is found in Bible lands. It is a ruminant animal. Its second stomach is divided into hexagonal cells, which receive and retain for gradual use the water which is drunk; so that it can go for three or four days without drinking any (and even for twenty or thirty days in the spring, provided that, at starting, it had a full supply), if it can get the dew upon the herbs it eats. But this is only one of the wonderful provisions of God which fit it for great usefulness. Its foot is large, broad, cushiony, covered with a tough sole, so it is insensible to the heat of the sand, and well-nigh incapable of slipping, or of sinking in it; callosities protect its breast and legs from cuts when kneeling upon stones; its nostrils close like valves, so it can breathe, though the air be full of sand; its horny mouth is covered by a divided upper lip, so that it can eat the thorniest shrubs; its hump is a mass of fat, sometimes to the amount of thirty pounds, and upon this carbon it can live for a while if other food fall short, so that often, at the end of a journey, the animal has no hump. No wonder that the camel is highly prized. To own one is for the Bedawy to be well off: to have several is to be rich. It is carefully looked after, and celebrated in song. But, although a domestic animal, the ordinary camel is not noted for docility. Travellers tell many stories about its vicious temper, how it everlastingly snarls and groans. This is true: but, as any one who has seen it will testify, the back of the poor camel is oftentimes one mass of sores; and therefore it is no wonder it complains when the heavy loads are put upon it. The speed of the camel is two miles and a half an hour, kept up for fourteen hours, and more if need be. Blood camels, commonly known as dromedaries, will make a hundred miles a day. The daily load, equally distributed on each side, varies from six hundred to eight hundred pounds: if the distance be short, or the animal exceptionally strong, like the canteen camel of Eastern tourists, it can carry from one thousand to twelve hundred pounds. It usually goes along at a slow, swinging gait, to which the rider soon becomes accustomed, and even learns to like. It is of no trouble to drive, since it will follow the trail: the most the Bedawy does is to walk in advance of it, with the rope from the animal's neck over his shoulder. When he is riding, he guides it by striking his foot against the side of the neck opposite to that he wants it to go, and controls it by his voice. Obedient to peculiar guttural sounds, which the traveller soon learns, the camel rises, or kneels. In fact, there is no animal easier controlled under ordinary circumstances, nor more agreeable to ride. The camel saddle of the Bedawy is a pair of cross-trees, with a skin underneath and a cloth above: on each side oftentimes is a basket or bag. The women and children of the rich sometimes ride in palanquins, provided with seats and curtains, balanced upon the back of a camel, and strongly fastened from the sides. For the natural history of the camel, see TRISTRAM: The Natural History of the Bible, London, 1867.

The Bible picture of Eastern life of course includes the camel. The name comes from the Hebrew gamal, which means burden-bearer, and occurs fifty-three times in the Old Testament. The Hebrew for the racing camel is the (female) "dancer" (Isa. lxvi. 20), swift beasts, because under the influence of music, of which it is very fond, its movements have a sort of rhythm. The camel figures in patriarchal times (Gen. xii. 16, xxiv. 10, xxiv. 64, xxxi. 34; Job i. 3) more frequently than in the later periods, because the camel was not properly a domestic animal among the Hebrews. It is essentially the property of the nomad. It came within the provisions of the Mosaic law, which condemned it as unclean, on the ground, that, while it chewed the cud, it did not divide the hoof; and therefore forbade to eat its flesh, or to touch its carcass. In the New Testament there is mention of camel's-hair cloth, which John the Baptist wore (Matt. iii. 4), as did former prophets (2 Kings i. 8; Zech. xiii. 4). It probably was the coarser variety (Matt. xi. 8). There is no further reference to the animal, except in the two proverbs, "to strain out a gnat, and swallow a camel" (Matt. xxiii. 24), i.e., to be very particular about little insignificant points, and indifferent about morality and religion; and, it is "easier for a camel to enter in through a needle's eye than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God" (Luke xviii. 25), an expression for the impossible. A similar one is in the Koran and in the Talmud, of the elephant: therefore there is no need to take the word "camel" in any other than its literal sense. RÜETSCHL.

CAMERARIUS, Joachim, b. at Bamberg, April 12, 1500; d. at Leipzig, April 17, 1574; descended from a noble family of the name of Liebhard; studied philology and theology at Leipzig, Erfurt, and Wittenberg, where he formed an intimate friendship with Melancthon; was appointed teacher of Greek in the gymnasium of Nuremberg in 1526, professor at Tübingen in 1535, and at Leipzig in 1541. In the last place he contributed very much to the firm establishment of the Reformation, but was, nevertheless, exposed to harsh attacks on account of his willingness to make concessions with respect to the Interim. Also on the general course of the Reformation he exercised considerable influence, both by his theological writings — exegetical, historical, systematical, and practical — and by his great zeal for the study of the classical languages and literatures, especially Greek. The best known of his works is his Narratio de Philippi Melancthonis ortu, totius vitæ curriculo et morte, etc., Leipzig, 1566, giving an outline of the whole history of the Reformation. His edition of Melancthon's

Letters, 1569, is not considered perfectly reliable.

CAMERO, or CAMERON, John, b. in Glasgow about 1577; d. at Montauban, 1625; studied philology and philosophy in Glasgow; went in 1600 to Bordeaux, and became professor of philosophy at Sedan; studied theology for four years in Paris, Geneva, and Heidelberg, at the expense of the Reformed congregation of Bordeaux, and became its pastor in 1608; was appointed professor of theology at Saumur in 1618, and at Montauban in 1624, but was here, by his doctrine of passive obedience, brought in conflict with the fanatical spirit of resistance prevailing in the place, and died from injuries received in a riot. Amyraldus, Placcus, and Cappellus were his pupils; and the whole theological school of Saumur, with its predilection for the doctrines of Piscator, with its views of the intellect as the primus motor of the will, in short, with its mitigated Calvinism, has its roots in him. He was not an Arminian, however, as is proved by his Amica Collatio cum Tileus, Leyden, 1621, and his Defensio de Gratia et Libero Arbitrio, Saumur, 1624. After his death, his works were collected and published in Geneva at the expense of the national synod.

CAMERON, Rev. Andrew, D.D., was born in Edinburgh, Scotland, 1822, and died at St. Kilda, Melbourne, 1877. He was educated at the high school and university of his native city, where he acted as reporter for the Witness newspaper, which was edited by Hugh Miller. Early impressed by the want of attractive religious literature, especially for sabbath reading, he projected and carried out the Christian Treasury in 1845, which, proving successful, may be regarded as the precursor of the numerous serials of this class with which we are now supplied. He afterwards organized and edited the Free Church Magazine, the British and Foreign Evangelical Review, and the Family Treasury. After long delay through pulmonary weakness, he at length entered on the work of the ministry at Maryton, Fifeshire, whence, in 1870, he accepted a call to Melbourne, Victoria. Shortly after his arrival in that colony he received the degree of "D.D." from Princeton. It was as a religious journalist, that, in Australia as in Scotland, he did his greatest work. He established, and till his death edited, the Southern Cross, an undenominational weekly religious newspaper of high tone, and extensive influence in those colonies. Dr. Cameron has been called the "Prince of Editors," a name not undeserved, as he led the way in a most important department of literature, and conducted the various publications with which he was connected with singular ability and judgment. He was also distinguished in the pulpit and in church courts.

CAMERONIANS. The name given to a body of Presbyterians, who, however, repudiate it, and call themselves "Reformed Presbyterians." Richard Cameron was one of the authors of the Banquhar Declaration, published in 1680, in which Charles II. was declared to have forfeited allegiance, in consequence of his tyranny, and his disregard of the constitution. Cameron was killed in the battle of Airdross. Those who followed him were united in "societies," which had become somewhat numerous before the revolution. The societies welcomed King William; but they did not approve of the revolution settlement, and did not join the Established Church. They objected to the church, which had made many unworthy compromises; were displeased at the want of recognition of the covenants; did not consider that the independence of the church was secured; and generally believed that God was not sufficiently honored in the new settlement. They objected, too, to the recognition of Erastianism in England. In 1706 Rev. John Macmillan of Balmaghie joined the societies, and was their first minister. In 1743, another minister having joined them, they constituted "the Reformed Presbytery." In 1774 a similar presbytery was formed in the United States. A presbytery was constituted likewise in Ireland. About 1863 most of the Scotch synod came to be of opinion that there was nothing in their principles requiring them to abstain from countenancing the political institutions of the country, e.g., from voting for a member of Parliament; but, a small minority having a different opinion, a disruption took place. In 1876 a union took place between the larger body and the Free Church of Scotland.

CAMISARDS (from camise, a jacket which the inhabitants of the Cevennes used to put on when fighting) is the name generally applied to those French Protestants, who, in the reign of Louis XIV., rose in arms in Languedoc, and waged a bloody war (1702-05) for the purpose of restoring their Church. Neither the dragonnades nor the revocation of the Edict of Nantes succeeded in destroying Protestantism in France; but, though private worship was never forbidden, new laws were steadily enforced which made it more and more difficult, and at last almost impossible, for a French citizen to adhere to the Reformed confession. In 1686 the gatherings in the desert were forbidden, and fines, confiscations, the doujon, the galleys, and the rack, were employed as punishments. Nevertheless, with the pressure grew the power of resistance. Religious meetings were held during night in secluded places, presided over by simple people, but fervent in prayers and exhortations; and distinguished men, such as Claude Brousson, Isaac Homel, and others, encouraged this passive resistance by a perseverance unto martyrdom.

As was natural, the miseries of the present forced up, as a necessary counterbalance, a corresponding hope of the future; and books like Jurieu's L'Accomplissement des Prophéties, Rotterdam, 1686, and Suite de l'Accomplissement, 1687, in which he predicted the speedy downfall of the Papacy, contributed to give shape and direction to this unconscious movement. A certain Guillaume du Serre appeared as prophet in Dauphiné in 1688. Other prophets arose in Vivarais. The number increased rapidly. Women and children became "possessed by the spirit." In the trance, when seized by convulsions, they saw the troops from the far-off garrisons come marching towards the place, they singled out those among their comrades who should fall in the encounter, they recognized the traitors among them, etc.; and these predictions, sent forth intermingled with words of penitence, prayer, and exhortation, were always accepted with reverence and confidence, and often they proved true. There was disease in all this,—a kind of mental epidemic. But there was also a heightening and intensification of the religious life, which attracted the wondering but sympathetic attention of the whole Protestant world, and which ought to be sheltered from any coarse imputation. At all events, if this psychological fact is left out of view, the enthusiasm and obstinacy of the Camisards is unintelligible.

The movement, however, of 1688-89, was speedily suppressed; but when the expectations of the Protestants were completely disappointed by the peace of Ryswick (1697), the fermentation began again. The Roman priests noticed, with much chagrin, that the newly-converted staid away from the churches, and took to the desert. François de Langlade du Chayla undertook to punish the refractory. At his parsonage at Pont de Montvert, in the present department of Lozère, he built a donjon, in which he shut up his guilty parishioners, and tortured them as best he could. On the instigation of the prophets Séguier, Couderc, and Mazel, the Camisards assembled, and in the night of July 23, 1702, they surrounded the house, stormed the donjon, while chanting their hymns, liberated the prisoners, and burnt the parsonage, and slew the priest. Bâville, the intendant of Languedoc, and a man as heartless as a millstone, felt a particular satisfaction in pursuing the guilty. Séguier was caught, and burnt at the stake Aug. 12; but the rest escaped among the mountains, where they soon were reinforced by new throngs formed by Castanet, Catinat, Roland, and others. In Jean Cavalier they found an able leader. He was born in 1680 at Ribaute, in the present department of Gard,—a small and plain-looking fellow, but full of courage and determination, a baker by profession, but of decided military talent. Bâville, with the stake and the gibbet, the rack and the galley, was unable to finish the affair. But in February, 1703, Marshal Montrevel arrived at the spot with a regular army-corps. He beat the Camisards repeatedly,—at La Jonguière, March 6; at La Tour de Bélot, April 29. He was effectively aided by loose bands of "crusaders" summoned to work by a bull of Pope Clement XI., May 1, 1703. He employed such means as razing all the single houses and minor villages in the Upper Cevennes, whereby he made seven thousand persons houseless. Nevertheless, he, too, was unable to put down the rebellion. The Camisards never numbered more than five thousand, and they had no military organization. But they fought with despair, sallying forth, with the agony of revenge in their hearts, to burn the churches, and hang the priest; and they fought with enthusiasm too, marching into the battle with the Psalms on their lips. In their camps they lived as in a church, preaching, praying, and fasting; and many brilliant victories they won,—the most brilliant at Sainte Chatte, March 15, 1704. But in April of that year Marshal Montrevel was replaced by Marshal Villars. Before Villars began active operation he first surrounded the whole district with a line of strong military posts, thus cutting off all communication between the rebels and the outside world; and then he offered pardon to all, who, within a certain term, laid down arms, and surrendered. Cavalier, who saw that further resistance was useless, left the country, fought afterwards against his countrymen in Holland, Italy, and Spain, and settled finally in England. There he became Governor of Jersey, and died at Chelsea, May 18, 1740. Roland fell Aug. 14, 1704. Castanet, Catinat, Joanni, etc., fled to Geneva. Without leaders, the Camisard army gradually melted away. Towards the close of 1705 peace and order were restored; but desolation and destitution had in the mean time spread over one of the richest and most fertile provinces of France.

VON POLENZ.

CAMPANELLA, Thomas, b. at Stilo, Calabria, Sept. 5, 1568; d. in Paris, March 21, 1639; entered the Dominican order in his sixteenth year, but devoted himself chiefly to the study of philosophy; was kept in prison for twenty-seven years by the Spanish Government of Naples, on account of certain social and political speculations, but was finally rescued by the Pope, Urban VIII.; lived for some time in Rome, but, not feeling safe there, repaired in 1634 to France, where Cardinal Richelieu gave him a pension. Strongly opposed to Aristotle, on account of the discrepancy he found between that which Nature herself showed and that which the school taught, his idea was to produce an altogether new philosophy; but this new philosophy should at no point come in conflict with Scripture, or the church, or theology. On the contrary, though a bold innovator in philosophy, he was very conservative, almost ultramontane, in theology. The Reformation was to him an abomination. Of his numerous writings, those which best characterize his position in philosophy and theology, and with respect to the Reformation, are Universalis Philosophia . . . Partes Tres, De Gentilismo non Retinendo, and Atheismus Triumphatus seu reductio ad religionem per scientiam veritatis.

CAMPANUS, Johannes, b. at Maeseick, in the diocese of Liège, in the beginning of the sixteenth century; d. 1574; studied at Cologne; came to Wittenberg in 1528; was present at the Conference of Marburg, but could gain no hearing for his peculiar conception of the Lord's Supper, differing equally much from the Reformed, the Lutheran, and the Roman-Catholic; was for some time during his stay in Saxony imprisoned on suspicion of anti-trinitarian and anabaptistic heresies; repaired to Julich, where he caused great excitement among the peasants by preaching that the end of the world was speedily approaching; was again imprisoned, and died insane. His anti-trinitarian and anabaptist views he developed in two works, Wider alle Welt nach den Aposteln, and Göttliche und heilige Schrift, of which the former is lost. He held there were only two divine persons.

CAMPBELL, Alexander, founder of the DISCIPLES OF CHRIST (see title); b. in the county of Antrim, Ireland, Sept. 12, 1788; d. March 4, 1866. He was educated at the University of Glasgow, and came to America as a licentiate of the Seceder Church, Scotland. His father, a minister of the same denomination, had been for two years settled in Western Pennsylvania. Young Campbell had expected opposition to his changed views in theology, but found his father altered and liberalized; confirmed, probably, in the new direction, because of an ecclesiastical trial he had stood for inviting to the communion-table members of other Presbyterian churches. Under him he continued his studies, and preached his first sermon July 15, 1810. He rapidly became widely popular. Many regarded the views of father and son as both novel and objectionable: hence they and the few who at first sided with them formed an isolated congregation, called "The Christian Association," organized as the "Brush Run Church," with Thomas Campbell (1763-1851) the father, as its elder, several deacons, and Alexander Campbell as its licensed preacher. The main points of this teaching in the early stages of the movement were: "Christian union can result from nothing short of the destruction of creeds and confessions of faith, inasmuch as human creeds and confessions have destroyed Christian union;" "Nothing ought to be received into the faith and worship of the church, or be made a term of communion among Christians, that is not as old as the New Testament, nor ought any thing to be admitted as of divine obligation in the church constitution or management, save what is enjoined by the authority of our Lord Jesus Christ and his apostles upon the New Testament church, either in express terms or by approved precedent." The Bible and nothing else was their confession of faith or creed. Mr. Campbell's marriage in 1812 with the daughter of a Presbyterian turned his attention to an examination of the Scripture mode of baptism, which was determined, after careful, earnest discussion, to be that of immersion. Consequently, he and his father, and the majority of the members of his church, with their families, were immersed on June 12, 1812, by Elder Loos, a Baptist minister, to whom he said, "I have set out to follow the apostles of Christ, and their Master, and I will be baptized only into the primitive Christian faith." Next the congregation, acting, as they believed, in accordance with the New Testament, ordained him to the ministry. He organized several churches, which joined, though openly acknowledging their peculiar view of the Bible, the Baptist denomination. But in 1827 they were formally excluded; and from that date the Disciples of Christ, or the Campbellites as they are popularly called, spread very rapidly as an independent, simple, and earnest body of Christians. In 1823 Mr. Campbell extended his labors from the limited region round about his home in West Virginia into Tennessee and Kentucky, and on July 4 of the same year started a monthly entitled The Christian Baptist, printed on his private press at home. The periodical was successful far beyond expectation; but in 1830 it was merged in The Millennial Harbinger, which was continued until his death. In 1840 he founded at Bethany, W. Va., Bethany College, in which the Bible was made a textbook. Mr. Campbell was a famous debater: indeed, by his first public debate he may be said to have called public attention to the existence of his denomination. This was at Mount Pleasant, O., in 1820, with the Rev. John Walker of Ohio, a Presbyterian, on the subject of baptism. Again, upon the same subject, he debated in 1823 at Washington, Ky., with the Rev. William McCalla, another Presbyterian; in 1828, at Cincinnati, with Robert Owen, on the Truth of Christianity; in 1836 with Archbishop Purcell of Ohio, in the same city, on the Infallibility of the Church of Rome; and in 1843, with the Rev. Dr. N. L. Rice, at Lexington, Ky., on the distinctive points of his communion. Mr. Campbell was gifted with a fine presence, great ease and skill of utterance, and possessed considerable information. His private life was stainless, and full of Christian grace. He was the author of The Christian System (often reprinted), Remission of Sin, 3d ed., 1846, Memoirs of Thomas Campbell, Cincinnati, 1861. See RICHARDSON: Memoir of A. Campbell, Philadelphia, 1868. See DISCIPLES OF CHRIST.

CAMPBELL, George, b. at Aberdeen, Dec. 25, 1719; d. March 31, 1796. He was educated at the University of Edinburgh; licensed in 1746; and after a pastorate in the country in 1757 he became one of the ministers of Aberdeen. He took great interest in philosophical questions, founded in 1758 a society for their discussion, and at last (1759) found a more congenial field of labor in the principalship of Marischal College. In 1763 he published his celebrated Dissertation on Miracles, a criticism of Hume's sceptical position. In 1771 he was elected professor of theology at Marischal College. In 1776 his Philosophy of Rhetoric, a much admired and widely used book, appeared. These two works have permanent value. In 1778 he issued The Four Gospels, translated from the Greek (3d ed. Aberdeen, 1814, 4 vols.; reprinted Andover, 1837, 2 vols.),—a work which derives its value from the preliminary dissertations and accompanying notes, critical and explanatory. In 1795 his feeble health compelled his resignation; and on his retirement he received a pension of three hundred pounds from the King. He is considered "the acutest and most cultivated theologian the Church of Scotland has produced."

His Lectures on Ecclesiastical History were posthumously printed: there is an edition, London, 1840. His works have been issued in a complete and uniform edition in 6 vols.

CAMPBELL, John M'Leod, b. May 4, 1800, at Ardmaddy House, near Kilninver, Argyllshire, Scotland; d. in the parish of Rosneath, Feb. 27, 1872. His father was the minister of Kilninver, and an excellent Latin scholar: so his son received good early training. From 1811 to 1820 he was a student of the University of Glasgow, but completed his course in Edinburgh. In 1821 he was licensed; and on Sept. 8, 1825, he was inducted to the parish of Row, and faithfully did he discharge his duties. His anxious meditation on the religious state of his congregation led him to the conclusion, that, in order to serve God with pure love, they must rest "assured of his love in Christ to them as individuals, and of their individually having eternal life given to them in Christ." This "assurance," further, rested on the promises of the gospel; but, unless Christ died for all (unlimited atonement), there was "no sufficient warrant for calling upon men to be assured of God's love to them." By manfully preaching these views he involved himself in a church trial for heresy, and was in due course deposed by the Assembly, Wednesday, May 25, 1831, by a majority of a hundred and nineteen to six. He went back to Kilninver, preached throughout the neighborhood, and at last, in the first week of 1833, began an independent ministry in Glasgow, which lasted for twenty-six years (1833-April, 1859). He was married on Sept. 26, 1838. In 1851 he published his book on the Eucharist, Christ the Bread of Life (2d ed., 1869), suggested by the then Roman-Catholic controversy. He rejected transubstantiation, because it contradicts the faculty of perception, which distinguishes man as a spiritual being. "There is a spiritual eye which sees that in Christ is presented to us the appropriate food of eternal life; and to fix the thoughts on him was the proper office of the Lord's Supper. As long as it was itself the object on which thought and interest were concentrated, so long it was misused; and this misuse of the ordinance was as possible, if not as common, among Protestants as it was among Roman-Catholics." In 1856 he issued his chief work, The Nature of the Atonement, and its Relation to Remission of Sins and Eternal Life (4th ed., 1873). By one of its sentences the main thesis of the book may be thus expressed: "It was the spiritual essence and nature of the sufferings of Christ, and not that these sufferings were penal, which constituted their value as entering into the atonement made by the Son of God, when he put away sin by the sacrifice of himself." In 1859 he was compelled by failing health to resign his charge at Glasgow. In 1862 he published Thoughts on Revelation, with Special Reference to the Present Time, — a book called forth by the Essays and Reviews (1860). In 1868 the University of Glasgow made him a doctor of divinity. In 1870 he removed his home from the neighborhood of Glasgow to Rosneath, to his house Ach-na-shee ("The Field of Peace"), an old local name. In this house, appropriately named, he partially prepared the volume which appeared in 1873, under the title Reminiscences and Reflec- tions, referring to his early ministry in the parish of Row (1825-31); and then, with his book unfinished, but with his life-work done, at peace with God and man, honored and beloved by all who knew him, a channel of God's grace unto many, this eminent and gifted servant went to his higher service. The impression Dr. Campbell made upon all his acquaintances was that of holiness. Dr. Norman Macleod said of him, "His character was the most perfect embodiment I have ever seen of the character of Jesus Christ." His readers testify to his sincere, humble, profound piety; and, where his theory of the atonement is unqualifiedly rejected, his personal charm is unhesitatingly acknowledged.

See D. CAMPBELL: Memorials of John M'Leod Campbell, London, 1877, 2 vols.

CAMPE, Joachim Heinrich, b. at Deensen, in the grand-duchy of Brunswick, 1746; d. in the city of Brunswick, Oct. 22, 1818; was chaplain to a Prussian regiment, and director of Basedow's Philanthropium at Dessau; established afterwards a celebrated boarding-school for boys near Hamburg, and settled finally at Brunswick, where he wrote and edited whole children's literature. Many of his books, as for instance Robinson der Jüngere, became almost world-famous, and are still very popular. His educational principle was exclusively rationalistic. Religion he recognized only as a prop for morality, and poetry he rejected altogether, as a snare to the intellect. But the success with which he labored made him one of the most prominent champions of rationalism in Germany.

CAMPEGIUS (Lorenzo Campeggi), b. at Bologna, 1474; d. in Rome, 1539; was first professor of canon law at Padua, and then priest. Julius II. used him in many important diplomatic cases; and Leo X. made him a cardinal in 1517. The principal events in his career are his missions to England in 1519 and in 1528, and his negotiation of a counter-reformation in Regensburg in 1524. He represented the Pope at the diets of Nuremberg (1524) and Augsburg (1530), and played a conspicuous part at the election of Paul III., 1534. Some letters by him are found in Epist. misc. sing. Pers., Basel, 1550.

CAMPIAN, Edmund, b. in London, Jan. 25, 1540; executed at Tyburn, Dec. 1, 1581; studied at Oxford, and was ordained a deacon in 1567, but felt himself at variance with the tenets of the Church of England; went to Ireland, thence to Douay; embraced Romanism, and entered the Society of Jesus. In 1580 he was sent by Gregory XIII. on a propagandist mission to England, but was arrested July 1, 1581, on a charge of treason, and condemned to death. He wrote a Narratio de Divortio Henrici VIII., published at Douay, 1622, and a History of Ireland, published in Dublin, 1633. For a full account of his mission to England see FROUDE: History of England, XI. He was a man of rare culture, amiability, and diplomatic skill.

CAMP-MEETINGS are religious gatherings held in a grove, usually lasting for several days, during which many find shelter in tents or temporary houses. The main features are the open-air preaching, the night prayer-meetings, and the freedom of the life. They are not so common as formerly, at least in the Eastern States, and are, indeed, regarded by some as morally if not spiritually objectionable. The first meeting of the kind is said to have taken place in Kentucky, on the banks of the Red River, in 1799, under a Presbyterian and a Methodist minister. These denominations at first used them in common; but gradually the Presbyterians withdrew, and of late years the Methodists and the Baptists have almost exclusively held them. In recent times the Methodists have purchased tracts of land in desirable locations on the seaboard or inland, and turned them into parks, with comfortable houses, streets, post-offices, meeting-places, biblical models, etc., and there in the summer many persons live, and there the religious gatherings of different kinds are daily held. Thus the primitive camp-meeting is continued in an improved form. The credit of introducing camp-meetings into England is due to the Rev. Lorenzo Dow (see title), an eccentric though able minister of Methodist views, who in 1807 proposed it in Staffordshire. Two Methodists, William Clowes and Hugh Bourne, were so impressed with the advantages of this style of service, that they persisted in holding them after they were disapproved by the Wesleyan Conference in 1807; for doing which they were finally expelled. In 1810 they founded the Primitive Methodists, which body uses the camp-meeting. The Irish Wesleyan commenced them in 1860. See art. "Camp-meeting" in McClintock and Strong's Cyclopaedia vol. II. p. 60).

CAMUS, Jean Pierre, b. in Paris, 1582; d. there 1652; became Bishop of Belley in 1608, and lived in great intimacy with François de Sales; resigned in 1628; was afterwards Abbot of Aulnay in Normandy, but retired finally to the Hôpital des Incurables in Paris. He was an extremely prolific writer, and much relished in his own time. A hundred and eighty-six works, many of which are in several volumes, were the result of his labor, — moral romances of a rather odd description, satirical pamphlets against the mendicant orders, etc. His L'Esprit de St. François de Sales, 6 vols., Paris, 1641, afterwards abridged by Collot, and his L'Avoisinement des protestants de l'Eglise Romaine, edited by Richard Simon, Paris, 1703, are still read.

CANA OF GALILEE was the home of Nathanael (John xxi. 2), and the scene of Christ's first miracle, and of another (John ii. 1-11, iv. 46). The traditional Cana is a village now called Kefranna, which is about four miles north-east of Nazareth. There are shown the "water-pots of one" from which the water made wine was drawn, the well whence it originally came, and the site of Nathanael's house; but Robinson denies the claims of the village, in favor of Kana-el-Hill, about nine miles north of Nazareth. The name is similar, the situation is fine, and, although there is now no village on the spot, the ruins indicate that once there was quite a large settlement.

CANAAN (low) occurs in the Bible as a personal name, the youngest son of Ham (Gen. ix. 18, 23); as a tribal name (Hos. xii. 7) ["merchant," the A. V.]; but above all as a geographical name, — the country inhabited by the posterity of Canaan, particularly in the phrase "the land of Canaan" (Gen. xi. 31 sq.). In the latter sense it denotes a well-defined district, all the country on the west of the Jordan, extending, at least in places, to the coast, including on the south the Negebh, or the South Country (Num. xxxiii. 40); on the north, Phœnicia; on the south-west, Philistia. The name occurs outside the Bible, among the Egyptians and Phœnicians, but does not seem to have been known to the Assyrians, who call the land, not Canaan, but the "back country." See Schrader, Die Keilinschriften, p. 14. The word in its meaning "low" referred to the "sinking," the Arabah, which is so striking a feature of the country, and the Shefelah, the South Plain. In its primary application in the mouth of Noah, it was prophetic of the condition of servitude to which Canaan would come in his descendants (Gen. ix. 25). The Canaanites appear to have been Shemitic in language; for quite evidently they spoke the same tongue with the Hebrews, as Isaiah says (Isa. xix. 18), with merely dialectical differences. For a discussion of the question whether the Canaanites were Hamites, see J. G. Müller, Die Semiten in ihrem Verhältniss zu Chamiten u. Japhiten, Gotha, 1872 (p. 54). Like the Phœnicians, they were a commercial people, so much so, — that the name, in later times, became an occasional synonyme for merchant (Job xli. 6; Prov. xxxi. 24 — Hebrew). The land of Canaan must have been settled ere the Canaanites arrived; for certain tribes are reckoned with the Canaanites in every full enumeration of the population, who evidently were one with them (Exod. iii. 8, 17; Deut. vii. 1, etc.). Whence they came cannot be determined. Their appearance was the cause of the spies' discouraging report (Num. xiii. 22, 33). The Canaanites and they appear to have lived peaceably together. One of their descendants, Og, King of Bashan, ruled over the Amorites within his borders (Deut. iii. 8). It is probable, however, that they gradually lost their ascendancy. The Canaanites, Perizzites, Amorites, Hittites, and Hivites were in the land in the patriarchal days (Gen. xiii. 7, xiv. 7, xxvi. 34, xxxiv. 2). In the genealogical table in Gen. x. 15-19, eleven Canaanite tribes are enumerated; but the enumeration subsequently varies from five (Exod. xiii. 5), six (Exod. xxiii. 23), seven (Deut. vii. 1), to ten (Gen. xv. 19-21); and these tribes were brought into close contact with Israel, while the Sidonians or Phœnicians on the north were not so much so. Of these tribes, the Amorites, and perhaps the Hittites, were probably mightier than the others; for whenever the name of Canaanite, or of Canaanite and Perizzite, are found together, there occur those of Amorite and Hittites (e.g., Gen. xv. 16, cf. ver. 21; Josh. i. 4) as general name. The tribal limits probably often changed; but, as near as may be, these were the locations of the tribes: the Amorites, chiefly at first in the south-west, shortly before Moses' time, migrated east of the Jordan, and founded the kingdoms of Sihon and Og (Deut. iii. 8, iv. 47; Josh. ix. 10). See AMORITE.

The Hittites, in Abraham's day, were found at Hebron (Gen. xxiii. 10), during the exodus (Num. xiii. 29), along with the Jebusites and Amorites, upon the mountains, higher up; in the days of the judges (Judg. i. 26), as far north as Bethel, whither the Amorites, or, more likely, the Israelites had driven them; and in Solomon's time upon Lebanon (1 Kings x. 29). The name in Assyrian records is Hatti.

The Perizzites appear to have been the peasant class of the population, living, during patriarchal times, in the middle of the West Jordan country, in the neighborhood of Bethel and Shechem (Gen. xiii. 7, xxxiv. 30), and afterwards as far north as Beth Shean, in the mountainous and wooded stretches of that locality (Josh. xi. 3, xvii. 15; Judg. i. 4, 5).

The Girgashites inhabited probably a small tract between the Hittites and the Amorites, with whom they are mentioned (Deut. vii. 1; Josh. xxiv. 11).

Whether the Geshurites (Josh. xiii. 2) and the Gezrites (1 Sam. xxvii. 8) were Canaanite tribes is uncertain.

The Jebusites (except Gen. x. 16) were always last mentioned, perhaps because their territory was the smallest, only their city and its immediate surroundings. Yet they were a "kingdom," and fought manfully (Josh. x.). Their capital, Jebus, was later called Jerusalem (Judg. i. 8).

The Hivites exchanged the middle country, where they inhabited Shechem and other cities (Gen. xxxiv. 2), for the northern about Lebanon, as far as Hamath (Josh. xi. 3; Judg. iii. 3).

The picture of life among the Canaanites drawn for us by the Bible is a very animated one. We see that they were essentially a warlike people, dwelling in cities, with walls and gates (Josh. x. 20), had fortresses upon the heights, and gave much time and thought to the perfecting and collecting of implements of war. Their iron chariots were irresistible (Josh. xi. 4, xvii. 16, 18; Judg. i. xix.). On the other hand, the fact that one of their cities was called Kirjath Sepher, "The City of Books" (Judg. i. 11), joined to the Greek tradition of the Eastern or Phœnician origin of writing, leads to the conjecture that reading and writing were in use. At all events, they carried on trade and manufacture; and the abundant crops which fell into the Israelites' hand at the time of the conquest attest their skill in agriculture and gardening (Josh. xxiv. 13). Over this people, divided as they were into tribes and lesser subdivisions, reigned many "kings," or sheikhs, as we should call them to-day (Judg. i. 7), although their authority was apparently shared and regulated by "elders" (Josh. ix. 11). But this bustling, martial, industrious people were the victims of superstition, idolatry, and vice. They worshipped Baal and Astarte (see titles), observed times and seasons, practised witchcraft and magic (Deut. xviii. 10), were addicted to unnatural lusts (Lev. xviii. 19-30). Laxity of morals, shamelessness of conduct, led to hard-heartedness, recklessness, and cruelty; for he who lives for the gratification of passion has no pity for the weak. Such a corrupt, corrupting people as the Canaanites pollute the air. God therefore ordered their destruction, and the Israelites felt no compunction in carrying the order out; it was in self-defence; and well had it been for Israel if they had not grown weary of blood-shedding. The remnant of the Canaanites was the cause of Israel's fall.

The history of Canaan after the conquest is in the main simply this: gradual extinction by the resistless conquerors, a lull in the battle, a resumption of hostilities on the part of the Canaanites, and a long series of victories for them, followed, after a time, by divine deliverances. The destruction of the Canaanites was begun again under Samuel, when Israel had a central government; was continued under Saul's better military organization, under David's greater skill; and completed under Solomon (1 Kings ix. 20). Thus the orders received by Moses were only partially carried out by the people under Joshua. So anxious were they to settle down, have their families about them, and pursue the peaceful callings in the land flowing with milk and honey, that they sheathed the sword too soon, as the first chapter of Judges shows. The Canaanites held strong cities in every part of the land, many of them probably very important places. Such were Jebus, between Benjamin and Judah, and Gezer, on the highway to Egypt. The former was taken by David (2 Sam. v. 7), and the latter taken and burnt by Pharaoh, Solomon's father-in-law (1 Kings ix. 16). Those who were driven out by the Israelites went to the north. It is said that Asher and Naphtali did not drive out the Canaanites, but dwelt among them (Judg. i. 31-33). As was to be expected, as soon as the old dwellers in the land perceived the scattered condition of Israel, they rallied their forces, and attacked the conquerors with great, though not permanent, success; for misfortune led Israel to God, and God raised up judges who delivered them. But the Canaanites unhappily taught the Israelites their idolatry; and so, long after they had been overthrown utterly, they overthrew Israel, since Baal had been put in the place of Jehovah, and vice was mistress instead of virtue. Marriages with Canaanites (Judg. vi. 3; 2 Sam. iii. 3; Ez. ix. 1), contrary to the express command of Jehovah (Deut. vii. 3), had introduced this strain in the nation's blood, and thus induced the disastrous overthrow. The foolishness of God is wiser than men. If the people had obeyed him, they would have been spared centuries of misery. See v. LINGERKE: *Kanaan. Volks- u. CANADA, DOMINION OF. The name of that vast British dependency that lies between the United States and the North Pole, and between the Atlantic and the Pacific Oceans. This country was discovered in 1534 by Jacques Cartier of St. Malo, who took possession of the Labrador region in the name of the French King. During a second visit in 1535, Cartier reached a great river, which he named the St. Lawrence, in honor of the saint on whose fête-day (Aug. 10) he had entered its waters. Passing up the river, he arrived at Stadacona, now Quebec, and subsequently at Hochelaga, lying at the foot of a mountain, the view from whose summit so charmed the explorer, that he named it Mont Roy, whence the present Montreal. No further effort was made for the colonization of Canada until 1603, when Samuel Champlain planted a colony in Acadia (now Nova Scotia), and in 1607 laid the foundations of the present city of Quebec (properly Kebec, an Indian word meaning straits), the St. Lawrence being at this point comparatively narrow.

In 1627 the government of Canada became vested in a commercial company of a hundred partners, with Champlain as governor, while the name of New France was used in the charter now issued. In 1663 the company was dissolved, and Canada became again a royal province, with its affairs administered by a council, consisting of the governor—who was responsible for all military measures, the bishop—in charge of the religious and educational interests, and the intendant, or civil governor—having charge of the finances and all matters affecting trade and commerce, along with a few other officials (the inhabitants having no representation),—a system that continued in operation for a hundred years. During this period, hunters and traders finding their way westward came into collision with the English settlers in Western Pennsylvania and Ohio; and this, combined with the constant troubles with the New-England colonies,—territorial boundaries being all undefined,—led to war. Though France and Britain were nominally at peace in Europe, yet each openly assisted their respective colonists in their local conflicts. At last, in 1759, Wolfe gained, under the walls of Quebec, the decisive victory of the Plains of Abraham, which resulted in the cession of Canada to England; the vanquished securing, as conditions of surrender, the continued exercise of "their language, their religion, and their laws." British emigrants now began to settle along the banks of the St. Lawrence; while in 1790 large tracts of land in the Niagara district were given to loyalist refugees from the revolted colonies of America. In 1791 Canada, hitherto under a military governor-general appointed by the Crown, received a constitution; and the upper, or western section, which was exclusively British, was separated from the lower, or eastern one, which was as exclusively French and Roman-Catholic; each division having an Upper House, or Legislative Council, appointed by the Crown, and a Lower House, or Assembly, elected by the people, along with a governor. After some years, dissatisfaction arose in both provinces against the governments; while in addition, in Lower Canada, race and religious antagonism became manifest. These things brought the country, in 1837-38, to the verge of civil war, but resulted finally in the formation of a legislative union between the provinces, with Kingston as the capital. The old dissensions, however, soon re-appeared; so that the great project of a confederation of the several North-American provinces under a Federal Government, having a Senate and a House of Commons, but with Provincial or State Legislatures, each independent for all local purposes, was adopted in 1867, by which the two Canadas, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick, were formed into "The Dominion of Canada," with Ottawa as its capital. In 1870 the newly-formed province of Manitoba, in 1871 British Columbia, and in 1872 Prince Edward Island, entered the Confederation. When the English took possession of Canada, its population was 65,000. At present it is 4,000,000, of whom about 1,250,000 are deemed to be of French origin, and are connected chiefly with the eastern portion of the country; the about 85,000 are Indians, who have lived in broken friendship with the government. Formerly Canada was known only as a lumber and fur-producing country, having in addition some valuable fisheries; but of late it has been exporting large amounts of farm-produce and cattle. Its mineral resources of gold, silver, copper, iron, and coal, are only now becoming known. Manufactories of a great variety of articles are springing up over all the country; while its immense wheat-growing prairie territory of Manitoba and the North-west offers homes for countless emigrants.

Canada is a self-governing country, with a parliamentary system, copied largely from that of Great Britain. The franchise is almost universal. The ministers must be sustained by a majority of the House of Commons; while the governor-general, though appointed by England, merely represents the British connection, and possesses no political authority whatever.

Religion.—The Roman-Catholic Church in Canada dates from the discovery, for Huguenots were allowed to settle, only on conditions that soon proved fatal to their religion. In 1615 four Recollet priests (a branch of the Franciscans) settled in Quebec, forming the earliest regular establishment. In 1624 the Jesuits arrived, and began their missionary and educational labors. In 1658 François Laval was sent out as vicar-apostolic of New France, becoming first bishop of Quebec in 1672. Under him the church system was fully organized. One-thirteenth of all the revenue (a proportion afterwards reduced to one-twenty-sixth) was collected as the tithe, or dime, for church-purposes. The bishop, though appointed by the Pope, must be subject to the king of France, while the parish curés were declared to be permanent in their offices. For some time after the conquest, the see of Quebec remained vacant, as the English Government would recognize its occupant only as the head of the Roman Church in Canada, and not as the bishop of that city. The difficulty was, however, overcome; for in 1806 the Pope appointed to the vacant see M. Plessis, who subsequently became the first Canadian archbishop. The Roman-Catholic Church is thus practically established by law in Lower Canada, now the Province of Quebec. Its ecclesiastical staff throughout the Dominion consists of two archbishops, twelve bishops, and nearly fifteen hundred clergy, all of an extremely ultramontane character.

The Episcopal Church in British North America dates from the conquest. In 1766 the first Episcopal congregation was organized in Montreal; service being held in the chapel of the Recollets, at such hours as the building was not required for mass. In 1774, while the Roman-Catholic Church was secured in all its previous rights, it was restricted to collecting its church-dues from members of its own communion, and the purpose was intimated of establishing a Protestant Church. In 1791, when the constitutional act was adopted, one-seventh of all the land in the colony disposed of by sale or grant to colonists was "reserved" for the support of a Protestant clergy. In 1787 Dr. Inglis was appointed by the English Crown Bishop of Nova Scotia,—the first of the colonial bishops; in 1793 Dr. Mountain was appointed Bishop of Quebec; and in 1837 the see of Montreal was instituted. Since then, other sees have been organized, until now the Episcopal Church, which has no connection with the Church in England, possesses fifteen bishops, with about six hundred and fifty ministers, and theological seminaries at Lennoxville, Winnipeg, London, Windsor (N.S.), and Toronto.

The Presbyterian Church dates from 1765, when the chaplain of the Twenty-fourth Regiment began service in Quebec. In 1769 Presbyterian ministers were sent out from Scotland to Nova Scotia. In a little while the numerous divisions of the Scottish Church were reproduced on North-American soil; but of these it is not necessary now to speak, as, after a series of local and partial unions, these all, reduced in number to four,—the Church of Scotland, the Canada Presbyterian Church, the Presbyterian Church of the Lower provinces, and the Presbyterian Church of the Maritime provinces in connection with the Church of Scotland,—entered, in 1875, into a union under the name of "The Presbyterian Church in Canada." This united church now extends from Newfoundland to the Pacific; consists of about fifteen hundred congregations, with a hundred and thirteen thousand communicants; raised in 1881 a million and a quarter of dollars; and has theological seminaries at Halifax, Quebec, Montreal, Kingston, Toronto, and Winnipeg.

Congregationalism dates from the settlement in Nova Scotia, in 1759, of some New-England Puritans, who were guaranteed full liberty of worship, and exemption from all disabilities, for not conforming to the Episcopal Church. In the Province of Canada it dates from 1801, when the London Missionary Society sent out an agent to Quebec to minister to a number of soldiers in the garrison there; while in 1810 the society sent an agent to Upper Canada. In 1827 the Canada Educational and Home Missionary Society was formed of Congregationalists and Presbyterians. In 1833 the Congregational ministers received a legal status as ministers of religion. In 1840 a theological seminary was established in Toronto, which in 1864 was removed to Montreal. The present strength (1881) of Congregationalism in the Dominion is six associations, a hundred and sixteen churches, and about seven thousand communicants.

The Methodist Church dates from the presence in Quebec, shortly after the conquest, of some soldiers of that persuasion; and subsequently Methodists from New York formed congregations in what is now Ontario. These congregations at first received their ministers from the United States, and formed an integral part of the Methodist-Episcopal Church of that country. In 1816 the English Methodist Conference sent out agents, who opened several stations; so that in 1820 it was agreed that the English Conference should have sole charge of Lower Canada, and the American one of that of Upper Canada. In 1824 the Canadian Methodists were formed into a general Conference of their own, and in 1828 separated from the American Church, becoming independent and self-governing, under the name of "The Methodist-Episcopal Church of Canada." Bishops, however, were never ordained; and in 1832 "The Wesleyan Methodist Church in Canada," as it was then called, united with the English Wesleyan Methodist Conference. This was followed by the formation, in 1834, of the "Methodist-Episcopal Church in Canada," claiming to represent the original Canadian Methodist Church. In 1873 a union was effected between a number of the Methodist organizations of the different Canadian provinces. As the result of this we have now "The Methodist Church of Canada," with fifteen conferences that include the whole Dominion, and about twelve hundred congregations; the "Primitive Methodist Church in Canada," with about one hundred congregations; the "British Methodist-Episcopal Church in Canada," with about sixty congregations; and the "Methodist-Episcopal Church in Canada," having nearly three hundred congregations. There are several other branches of the Methodist Church, such as "The Evangelical Association," or "Allbright Methodists," "The Bible Christian Church in Canada;" but these do not amount to more than perhaps two hundred congregations in all, and have their locations almost exclusively in the Province of Ontario.

There are several small bodies of Lutheran churches also, for the most part in Ontario.

The Baptist Church has about five hundred congregations in different parts of the Dominion.

Educational institutions were early established in Canada. In the early part of the seventeenth century, the Recollets, the Jesuits, and the Ursuline nuns, opened schools in Quebec, while the Sulpicians did the same in Montreal. Until the present century, however, boys could receive a superior education only in either of these cities; while numerous schools had been established for the benefit of girls. Some time ago an admirable system of public instruction was adopted by each of the present provinces of the Dominion, but with such modifications as might be required to meet circumstances and the peculiar religious condition of each locality; so that, by means of primary or elementary, high and normal schools, leading up to the university, a good education has been brought within the reach of almost every child throughout the Dominion. The expenses of the system are met by government grants, local assessments, and school fees. Masters of high schools must be university graduates, and experienced teachers. Teachers of public schools must be regularly qualified. G. D. MATHEWS (of Quebec).

CANDACE was the title of the queens of the Ethiopian realm situated north of Meroë, with the capital Napata. From Alexander the Great, and down to the time of Eusebius, we meet with Ethiopian queens of this name, whose etymology is obscure, though apparently not Shemitic. It seems that in Ethiopia the queen-widow succeeded to the throne, and that, as long as she lived, the son occupied only the second place. See LERSIUS: Briefe aus Ägypten, 1852, pp. 181, 217. In Acts viii. 27 is mentioned an eunuch who was treasurer to the reigning Candace. He was a "proselyte of the Gate," since he had come up to Jerusalem to worship; but he was not a Jew, since he was an eunuch (Deut. xxiii.). On his return from Jerusalem he met with the apostle Philip between Asdod and Gaza, and was converted and baptized. According to a loose tradition his name was Judich. He brought the first seeds of Christianity to Ethiopia; but the real evangelization of the country took place much later. See LUDOLPH: Hist. Æthiop., 1681, II. 4, 7, III. 2.

RÜETSCHI.

CANDIDUS, an Arian controversialist from the middle of the fourth century, wrote a book, De Generatione Divini Verbi, and addressed it to his friend, the celebrated African rhetorician, Victorinus, on the occasion of his conversion to Christianity. The book called forth an answer from Victorinus, Confutatorium Candidi Ariani; and the two works are generally printed together. See MIGNÉ: Patrol, VIII. pp. 1013 and 1036.

CANDLEMAS, a Christian festival instituted in the Eastern Church by the Emperor Justinian (542), under the name of ὑπαπαντή, or Festum Symeonis (Luke ii. 25). In the Roman Church, in which Baronius says that it occurred already in the time of Gelasius (492-496), it soon became a feast of Mary, Festum Purificationis Marice; the 2d of February, on which it was celebrated, being the fortieth day after the birth of Christ (Dec. 25), and consequently the day on which, according to Levitical rules, the purification of the mother should take place. In all its details, however, — the lighting of candles, the consecration by the Pope of all the candles to be used in the service during the year, etc., — the Candlemas, Festum Candelarum, shows itself to be a mere Christianization of an old Pagan feast celebrated in Rome just at the same season, by purification of the whole house, in order to make it ready for the returning sun, and by lighting of candles and torches, in memory of Ceres searching after Proserpina. See H. ALT: Der christliche Cultus, Berlin, 1851-1860, 2 vols., I. p. 559.

CANDLES, use of, in divine service. There is no trace of their use during the first three Christian centuries; for Lactantius (250-330) says, "If they (the heathen) would contemplate that heavenly light which we call the sun, they will at once perceive how God has no need of their candles, who has himself given so clear and bright a light for the use of man. . . . Is that man therefore to be thought in his senses, who presents the light of candles and torches as an offering to Him who is the Author and Giver of light?" (Div. Inst., VI. 2.) But in the fourth century Athanasius (296-372) reproached the Arians with having put to idolatrous uses the candles Christians had used in worship; and Jerome (331-420) says that the practice of burning candles during the reading of the gospel, even in the clear day, was universal in the Eastern Church (Liber contra Vigilantium, III.); and in another place he speaks of wax lights burning before the tomb of martyrs (Epist. ad Riparium, i.; Epist., CIX., ed. Migne, Opera Hieronymi, vol. I. p. 907 [726]). Chrysostom (347-407) speaks of the candles burning upon the altars in churches as a usual sight; but in chapels and before shrines, lamps were preferred. The candles were and are exclusively wax. The Roman Church forbids even stearine candles. Wax was chosen on account of its odor and its costliness; for we ought to give God our best and costliest. At mass, at least two tapers must burn upon the altar; they are carried in by the designated ceroferrarii: so, in other ceremonies, candles were used, and a symbolical meaning found. Thus the baptism candles spoke of the light of the good works by which heaven was entered; the marriage candles, of the purity and joy of the heart; the burial candles, of the eternal light of heaven. The Reformed Church has properly rejected the use of candles, as savoring too much of that heathenism whence the custom was borrowed. H. MERZ (in Herzog's 1st ed.).

CANDLESTICK, THE GOLDEN, or properly Candelabrum (Exod. xxv. 31-40, xxvii. 20, xxxvii. 17-24), stood on the south side of the first apartment of the tabernacle, "opposite the table of shew-bread, in an oblique position, so that the lamps looked to the east and the south: hence the central was called the 'western' lamp." Its object was partly, by its lights, to enable the priests to discharge their functions there, as all natural light was excluded from the holy place, but chiefly to be a holy sign and symbol of the invisible God, who dwells in the light which no man can approach unto, who covers himself with light as with a garment (1 Tim. vi. 16; Ps. civ. 2), who is himself light, and the source of it (Ps. xxxvi. 9). Bezaleel made it, after the divine directions, out of beaten gold. Dr. T. J. Conant thus describes it: "From the base, rose an upright central shaft, bearing the central lamp: from two opposite sides of it proceeded other shafts, three on a side, making six branches from the main shaft, all being in the same plane with it, and each bearing a lamp. A part of the main shaft and its branches, serving for ornaments of the structure, are mentioned, — flower-cups, capitals, and flowers. In shape the capital may have had the rounded form of fruit, as indicated in some of the ancient versions and Josephus. From the representation in Exod. xxv. 33-35, these parts appear to have been arranged as follows: each of the six side-branches had three flower-cups, shaped like the calyx of the almond-blossom, and terminated in a crown or capital, with its ornamented flower as a receptacle for the lamp. The central shaft was composed of four such combinations of calyx, capital, and flower, each pair of side-branches resting on the capital of one of the three lower, the fourth and uppermost bearing the central lamp."

The question whether the seven lamps were upon one level may probably be answered affirmatively. Of Josephus' statement (Antiq. III. 7, 7), that the ornaments upon the shaft and branches were seventy in number, there is no proof, nor much likelihood, although he finds in the number a secret intimation of the δεκαουπία, in astrology the ten degrees of a circle, and in the lamps a reference to the seven planets. Philo likewise finds symbolical reference in the seven lights; for he says, "The sacred candelabrum and the seven lights upon it are an imitation of the wandering of the seven planets through the heaven" (Quis rer. div. hæc. sil. § 44, ed. Mangey, Tom. I. pp. 503 sqq.; Bohm's trans. vol. ii. p. 137). Ewald, probably correctly, sees in the number seven merely the holy number, consecrated by the sabbath (Antiq. [Eng. trans.] p. 115). The lamps burnt day and night, although, as Josephus says (Antiq. III. 8, 3), it may well be that by day only three were kept burning. It was the business of the priests to fill the lamps every evening, for which purpose the finest olive-oil was used (Exod. xxvii. 20) to clean them in the morning, snuffing them with golden snuffers, and to carry away the snuff in golden snuff-dishes (Exod. xxv.

38). Whenever this was done, the priest was obligated to offer a sacrifice of incense upon the altar of incense in the inner sanctuary (Exod. xxx. 7, 8); thus, as Ewald says, giving perfect expression to the "correspondence between light and sacrifice."

The candelabrum and its appurtenances required a talent of pure gold, weighed a hundred minæ, and, according to the rabbins, was five feet high, and three feet and a half broad, i.e., the distance between the exterior branches. When it was moved, the lamp-stand was covered with a blue cloth, and put, with the "lamps, tongs, snuff-dishes, and all the oil vessels thereof," in badger-skin bags, which were carried on a bar (Num. iv. 9, 10).

In Solomon's temple, instead of one candelabrum, there were ten upon golden tables, — five on the north and five on the south side of the Holy Place. The larger number fitted the larger space and the greater pomp of the worship (1 Kings vii. 49). The Chaldeans carried them to Babylon (Jer. lii. 9). In the second temple, there was only one candlestick (Ecclus. xxvi. 17; "as the clear light is upon the holy candlestick, so is the beauty of the face in ripe age"). Antiochus Epiphanes removed it (1 Macc. i. 21), and Judas Maccabæus restored it (Macc. iv. 49); and it remained in Herod's temple until the destruction of Jerusalem, when Titus carried it to Rome, and it figured in his triumphal procession, and was sculptured upon his arch, although it would seem not altogether accurately (Joseph. War, VII. 5, 5). It was then deposited in the Temple of Peace. According to one account, it fell into the Tiber from the Milvian Bridge during the flight of Maxentius from Constantine, Oct. 28, 312; but the usually accredited story is, that it was taken to Carthage by Genseric, 455 (Gibbon iii. 291), recovered by Belisarius, transferred to Constantinople, and then respectfully deposited in the Christian Church of Jerusalem 533 (id. iv. 24). Nothing more has been heard of it.

The saying of Jesus, "I am the light of the world" (John viii. 12), was probably suggested by the illumination of the temple courts on the evening of the Feast of Tabernacles, by means of four great candelabra erected in the court of the women; although some see in it allusion to the golden candelabrum. In Rev. i. 12, 20, ii. 1, candelabra symbolize churches.

CANDLISH, Robert Smith, D.D., one of the most distinguished founders and leaders of the Free Church of Scotland, b. at Edinburgh, March 23, 1806; d. there Oct. 19, 1872. His father, who died early, was a medical teacher, and a friend of Robert Burns. He was educated at Glasgow, and, after two years spent as a tutor at Eton, he was licensed as a preacher; served as assistant in Glasgow, at Bonhill, and in St. George's, Edinburgh, and was ordained to the charge last named in 1834. In this very conspicuous sphere his great talent as a preacher soon made him famous. In 1839 he publicly identified himself with the party in the Established Church of Scotland which ultimately became the Free Church, by moving, in the Commission of the General Assembly, the suspension of the Strathbogie ministers who had indicated their intention to disobey the Assembly, and obey the Court of Session by ordaining Mr. Edwards as minister of Marnoch. In 1839 he was nominated by the crown professor of biblical criticism in the University of Edinburgh; but, on the angry remonstrance of the Earl of Aberdeen in the House of Lords, the nomination was cancelled. In 1841 he received the degree of D.D. from Princeton College, New Jersey. In all the public proceedings prior to the disruption (1843), and especially in the debates in the General Assembly, where he shone greatly, he took a leading part. After the disruption he exerted himself with great energy in the organization of the Free Church; and, more than any other man, he aided in her rapid development. On the death of Dr. Chalmers he was appointed by the General Assembly to succeed him as professor of divinity in the New College, Edinburgh; but, after accepting the appointment, he withdrew his acceptance, and remained minister of St. George's Free Church. On the death of Dr. Cunningham, he succeeded him as Principal of the New College. He was the chief organizer and extender of the school system of the Free Church, which was afterwards incorporated with the national system of education. For many years he was the most conspicuous man in the General Assembly, of which he was indeed the recognized leader. In every scheme and movement connected with the Free Church, he took a cordial interest, and generally an active share. His eloquence as a debater, his tact as a business-man, his high Christian character, and his thorough disinterestedness, secured for him the high place which he so long maintained, in spite of a somewhat sharp and abrupt manner, and a tendency to what some considered diplomatic management. He was a voluminous author, although his books did not attain a very large circulation. Among his writings were: Contributions towards the Exposition of the Book of Genesis, 3 vols.; On the Atonement; Scripture Characters and Miscellanies; Examination of Maurice's Theological Essays; The Resurrection of Life; The Two Great Commandments; The Fatherhood of God (Cunningham Lectures); Exposition of 1 John; The Gospel of Forgiveness; Select Sermons (posthumous). In 1880 appeared a Memoir, by William Wilson, D.D., at the close of which is a chapter on the character of Dr. Candlish as a theologian, contributed by Robert Rainy, D.D., his successor as principal of the New College.

W. G. BLAIR.

CANISIUS, Peter, b. at Nimeguen, May 8, 1524; d. at Freiburg, Dec. 21, 1597; descended from a Dutch family, de Hondt; was educated at Cologne; entered the order of the Jesuits (1543), the first German member; and became professor in the University of Ingolstadt in 1549, and rector of the Jesuit College in Vienna in 1551. In Bavaria he founded two Jesuit schools, — at Augsburg and Dillingen,—and contributed much to stop the progress of the Reformation. In Austria, where he became court-preacher to Ferdinand I., he labored with still greater success, so that the friends of the Reformation in Germany called him the Austrian dog, with reference to his name Canisius, De Hondt, the hound. His works have partly a more scholarly character, Commentarii against the Centur. Magd.; partly a more practical purpose, Summa Doctrinæ et Institutionis Christianæ, 1554, and Institutiones Christ. Pietatis, 1566. Both the latter were written as a counter-balance to the catechisms of Luther, and found a very wide use, being still reprinted. Biographies of him were written by Raderus, Munich, 1614; Sacchini, Ingolstadt, 1616; Dorigny, Cologne, 1692; Werfer, Schaffhausen, 1852; and Riess, Freiburg, 1865.

CANNON, James Spencer, b. in the Island of Curaçoa Jan. 28, 1776; d. in New Brunswick July 25, 1852. He was professor of pastoral theology and ecclesiastical history in the Theological Seminary of the Reformed Church, New Brunswick, N.J., from 1818 to 1819, and again from 1826 to 1852, during which time he was also professor of metaphysics in Rutgers College. Though his duties were thus manifold, he discharged them with fidelity and capacity. Learned, systematic, deliberate, his speech was slow but pithy, and his lectures were elaborate and exhaustive. His memory is still cherished by many pupils and hearers, and his portrait is found in many of the older families of his denomination. After his death, his Lectures on Pastoral Theology were given to the press, New York, 1853, and favorably received. See Dr. Proudfit's article in Sprague's Annals.

CANON (Canonici and Canonicæ), a general ecclesiastical designation, which originated in times prior to the Council of Nicæa, from the anon, or roll, on which the names of the clergy belonging to a certain church were inscribed, but which afterwards came to denote a peculiar ecclesiastical class, occupying a position intermediate between the monks and the secular clergy. See CHAPTER.

CANON, Old Testament. The word "canon" means primarily a straight staff, then a measuring-rod, hence, figuratively, that which is artistically, scientifically, or ethically a guide or a model: so in the earliest Christian use (Gal. vi. 16; Phil. iii. 16; Clemens Rom., I ep. ad Cor. 7, 1) the canon was a leading thought, a normal principle. The next change of meaning (indicated by Clemens Alex., Strom. 7, 16, § 94) was a type of Christian doctrine, the orthodox as opposed to the heretical. Since A.D. 300 the usual form (canons) has been used of ecclesiastical regulations. Now, since the Christian doctrines were professedly based upon the Scriptures, the writings themselves were naturally known as the Canon; and the test of the canonicity of any particular writing was its reception by the church. The earliest use of the word in this sense is in the fifty-ninth canon of the Council of Antiochia (A.D. 363): "No psalms of private worship can be read in the churches, nor uncanonical books, but only the canonical books of the Old and New Testament," and contemporaneously in Athanasius, Epistola festalis (ed.

Bened. I., 961, Paris, 1698). A few years later the use was general.

I. HISTORY OF THE CANON AMONG THE JEWS. (a) The Traditional Account of the Rise of the Collection.—The theory, which was almost universally received for fifteen hundred years, that Ezra was the author of the Old-Testament canon, dates from the first Christian century; for it is found in the Fourth Book of Ezra (Second Esdras) xiv. 44, that Ezra was inspired to dictate during forty days to five men ninety-four books [not two hundred and four, or nine hundred and four, as in King James' Version], of which twenty-four were to be published. These twenty-four quite evidently are the twenty-four books of the Hebrew Canon, according to the counting given below; and the seventy are the Jewish Apocrypha alluded to in chap. 28 of the Evangelium Nicodemii [Gospel of Nicodemus (Clark's trans.), p. 210]. What the Fathers have to say upon this matter is derived in part from Fourth Esdras, and is equally fabulous. The modern Protestant theory attributes the Old-Testament canon to Ezra and his associates, the men of the Great Synagogue, or at least to their time.

(b) The Theory of the Synagogue.—The above-mentioned theory has been supposed to be the one prevalent among the Jews themselves; and indeed the eminent rabbins David Kimchi (d. 1240) and Elias Levita (1472-1549) put it forth as a settled fact (see Levita, Massoreth ha-Massoreth, p. 120, ed. Ginsburg, London, 1867). But the only Talmudic passage which can be quoted directly in its behalf is in Baba Bathra; for the other quotations commonly made prove merely the care of Ezra and the men of the Great Synagogue for the law, not for the canon: indeed, mostly for the oral law, and some also for alterations in the text. The passage is in these words: "The order of the prophets is Joshua and Judges, Samuel and Kings, Jeremiah and Ezekiel, Isaiah and the Twelve. Hosea is the first, because it is written, 'The beginning of the word of Jehovah by Hosea' (i. 1). Did God, then, speak to Hosea first? and have there not been many prophets between him and Moses? R. Jochanan explained this as meaning that Hosea was the first of the four prophets who prophesied at that time,—Hosea, Isaiah, Amos, and Micah. Why, then, was he not put first? Because his prophecy stands next to that of the latest prophets, Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi: he is therefore counted with them. So this prophet should have been kept by himself, and inserted before Jeremiah? No: he was so small that he might then easily have been lost. Since Isaiah lived before Jeremiah and Ezekiel, ought he not to have been put before them? [No.] Because Kings closes with destruction, Jeremiah is entirely occupied with it, Ezekiel begins with it, but ends with consolation, while Isaiah is all consolation: hence we connect destruction with destruction, and consolation with consolation. But Job lived in the time of Moses: why should he not come in the first part? No; for it would never do to begin with misfortune. Yet Ruth contains misfortune? True; but it issues in joy. That is a support for the saying of Rab; for Rab Jehuda says, in the name of Rab, 'Ezra did not leave Babylon until he had written his own family register.' Who has ended it? Nehemiah the son of Hachaliah." It will be perceived that this passage says nothing about the closing of the canon, but also that it would readily furnish ground for the idea that the canon was closed in the time of Ezra and the Great Synagogue.

(c) Criticism of The Two Theories.—They both agree in assigning the collection of the Old Testament to Ezra and his companions and successors, and also in asserting that the division into the Law, the Prophets, and the Hagiographa, was primitive. But against this, two objections may be urged: (1) Critical investigation assigns the first part of the Book of Daniel, on account of its Greek words, to a time when Greek was understood, and the second part to the time of the Maccabees [so several modern German scholars. But see art. DANIEL]; (2) The position of some of the historical books, e.g., Ezra and Daniel, among the Hagiographa, is inexplicable if the canon was made at one time. Moses Maimonides, D. Kimchi, and Abarbanel explained the fact by a difference in inspiration. But Christ calls Daniel a prophet (Matt. xxiv. 15; Mark xiii. 14), and quotes him as worthy of all credence.

(d) Positive Exposition. 1. The Pentateuch (the so-called "first canon"). The Hebrews, like other ancient people, preserved their sacred writings in sacred places. So the law of the Lord was put by the side of the ark of the covenant (Deut. xxxi. 26), with its additions by Joshua (Josh. xxiv. 26); Samuel laid the "right of the kingdom" before the Lord (1 Sam. x. 25); Hilkiah, the high priest under Josiah, found "the Book of the Law of the Lord" in the temple (i.e., the well-known book: so it was no recent invention, as some claim) about 623 B.C. (2 Kings xxii. 8). We are therefore safe in believing, that, since the time of Moses, besides the tables of the law, the autographs of the legal and historical writings of Moses were carefully preserved in the sanctuary (Exod. xxiv. 4, 7, xxxiv. 27, xl. 20). The priests also would retain partly oral and partly written information (subsequently combined in the Codex of the Priests) in regard to many similar matters; and, between the eighteenth year of Josiah and the destruction of Jerusalem (about 586 B.C.), the writings of Moses and the priest-codex, long in existence, were combined. During and after the exile, the influence of this book is great, and the prophets and the pious give it canonical authority. See Karl Marti: Die Spuren der sog. Grundschrift des Hexateuchs in den vorexilischen Propheten des A. T., in Jahrbücher für protest. Theologie, 1880, cf. pp. 325-354. Originally Joshua formed part of the book; but, when the Mosaic elements received their present shape, it was separated, and then these elements themselves were divided into five parts, in imitation of which the fivefold division of the Psalms was made.

2. The Historico-prophetic and distinctively Prophetic Books (the so-called "second canon").—The prophets were the spiritual exhorters and guides of the people, and therefore held in high esteem by the faithful, whose natural desire to have a collection of their writings we have every reason to believe was early gratified. At all events, it is quite evident from the prophetic parallels, that the prophets were acquainted with each other's writings. The loss of so much sacred literature in the destruction of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans made the collection of the remaining historic as well as prophetic books the more imperative.

3. The Hagiographa (the so-called "third canon").—The last Psalms were written in the time of Nehemiah; but the collection dates from David. The first collection of the Proverbs of Solomon was so highly valued, that Hezekiah ordered a second to be prepared (Prov. xxv. 1). The name of the wise man sufficed to recommend the Canticles; its age and contents, the Book of Job. Lamentations appealed directly to every patriotic Jew during the exile, and was accepted as sacred, although Jeremiah was not its author. Ruth, by age, and especially by its genealogy of David, was put in the third canon, and formed an introduction to the Psalter. These early writings were followed gradually by the others, probably in this order: Ezra, Chronicles, Ecclesiastes, Esher (an explanation of Purim, the festival the Persian Jews brought back with them), and finally Daniel, in the time of the Maccabees. After this time, and down to the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus, A.D. 70, the nation was so affected by Greek customs, and divided by the growing rival parties, the Pharisees and Sadducees, that its religious development was too much hindered for any work to receive universal recognition, and hence canonicity. Not long after the Maccabees, the second collection or canon received its name, the Prophets, descriptive not only of a portion of its contents, but of their authorship; and thus the three divisions of the Old-Testament canon—the Law, Prophets, and Hagiographa—dated from the second century B.C. See the Prologue to Ecclesiasticus.

Witnesses for the Second and Third Parts of the Canon.—(For those for the Pentateuch see section (d) 1.) Jesus Sirach shows acquaintance only with the Prophets in the wider sense, the "second canon," chaps. xlii.-xlix., especially xlix. 10. His grandson testifies to the third division also.

Philo had the same canon as ours (see C. Siegfried, Philo, Jena, 1875, p. 161), and quotes from almost all the books; while from the Apocrypha he makes no excerpts or citation, not giving it the honor he accords to Plato, Hippocrates, and several other Greek writers.¹

Second Maccabees, dating from before 70 A.D., in the spurious section (i. 10-ii. 18) contains an account of the recovery of the sacred fire, a quotation from the "records" of Jeremiah (a lost apocryphal writing); and then follows ii. 13: "And the same things also were reported in the records, namely, the memoirs of Nehemiah [another apocryphal writing], and how he, founding a library, gathered together the books concerning the kings and prophets, and those of David, and epistles of kings concerning holy gifts." This verse bears reliable witness to Nehemiah's collection of the second canon substantially as we have it to-day, in addition to the Psalms and the documents so weighty for the rebuilt city. The next verse, "And in like manner also Judas gathered together all those books that had been scattered by reason of the war we had, and they are with us," applies only to the third canon. Therefore the last enlargement of the Hebrew canon took place under Judas Maccabee; although probably the most of the books of the third canon had previously been preserved in the temple archives.

The New Testament contains quotations principally from the Pentateuch, Prophets, and Psalms, as might be conjectured from its scope, but recognizes the threefold division of the canon (Luke xxiv. 44). (In this verse "the Psalms" does not stand for the entire Hagiographa; for our Lord meant to emphasize the fact that the Psalms spoke of him.) The absence of quotation in the New Testament of any Old Testament book argues nothing against its canonicity.

Josephus, in his book Against Apion, I. 8, bears the strongest testimony for the canon,¹ and, as is evident, expresses the national, and not his private opinion. And, further, the books mentioned are not mere literature, but a sacred, divine collection. He enumerates twenty-two books; thus, 1. The five books of the Law; 2. The thirteen Prophets, counting the twelve minor Prophets as one book, and Lamentations with Jeremiah; 3. The four Hagiographa, — Psalms, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and Canticles. But this arrangement is not to be looked upon as either old or correct.

Supposed Jewish Dissent from the Canon. — This dissent is not real, only apparent; but appeal has been made, first to the Talmudical controversies about certain books, e.g., Esther: on further examination these "controversies" are perceived to be mere intellectual displays; there is no intention of rejecting any book. Second, the Book of Sirach, it is said, is quoted as Scripture; but there is no proof that it was regarded as Scripture, and the two or three quotations are memoriter, and probably made under a misapprehension of their source. Third, the Septuagint is supposed by some to show that the Alexandrian Jews had a different canon from the Palestinian, because books are added to the canonical twenty-four; but this does not follow. For first the Palestinian idea of a canon (namely, the compositions of inspired prophets, a class of men not then existent) was not known in Alexandria, where, on the contrary, the statement of Wisdom (vii. 27), "[Wisdom] from generation to generation entering into holy souls, prepares them friends of God and prophets," was fully believed, as by Philo (cf. Quis ser. div. har. § 52, de Cherubim, § 9, and de præm. et poen. § 19) and Josephus (War, I. 3, 5; II. 8, 12; III. 8, 3, 9), who even declared that they themselves had been at times really inspired, and freely accorded the fact unto others. Therefore, to an Alexandrian Jew, there was no impropriety in enlarging the Greek translation of the Old Testament, not only by additions of sections to the canonical books, but of entirely new books. The great respect entertained for the Septuagint was extended to these additions, but without giving the latter any canonical authority. There was no Alexandrian canon; for neither the number nor the order of the books added was fixed. Besides, Philo, who was doubtless a type, proves, by the fact that he never uses the Apocrypha in the same way as the canonical books, that the Alexandrian Jews made a distinction between them.

The Triplex Division of the Hebrew Canon is testified to by the prologue to Sirach and the New Testament (Luke xxiv. 44). The Seventy gave up this division in favor of a different (namely, the present Christian) arrangement of the books, and inserted the apocryphal books and sections in appropriate places.

The Order of the Books in the Hebrew Canon [is as follows: 1. Law, — the five books of Moses; 2. Prophets, — Joshua, Judges, First and Second Samuel, First and Second Kings, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, the twelve minor Prophets; 3. Hagiographa, — Psalms, Proverbs, Job, Canticles, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Esther, Daniel, Ezra and Nehemiah, Chronicles, in all, twenty-four books].

The Number of the Canonical Books. — Jewish tradition, except when influenced by Alexandria, unanimously gives the number as twenty-four. Nevertheless, it is usual to say that the original reckoning was twenty-two. If, however, the witnesses for the latter number be not counted, but weighed, it is plain that the authority they rest upon is Alexandrian; and this is worthless for getting at the primitive reckoning, because the Alexandrian Jews altered, not only the order and division of the books, but added to them others not in the canon. But how did the Alexandrians arrive at the number twenty-two? By joining Ruth to Judges, and Lamentations to Jeremiah. Having thus made twenty-two, they were impressed with its numerical agreement with the number of letters in the Hebrew alphabet. This idea was thought significant, part of the divine intention indeed; and so it became fixed in the Jewish mind. The Fathers took it up in their uncritical fashion; and so it has come down to our day. Josephus first gives twenty-two; but he makes greater use of the Septuagint than of the Hebrew original. It is noteworthy that Epiphanius and Jerome, who reckon the books twenty-two, mention also twenty-seven; i.e., the Hebrew twenty-two letters, with the five final letters; made by separating the double books, Samuel, Kings, Chronicles, and Ezra. But this double counting was only possible for Jews using the Septuagint, since the original does not divide these books. Further: neither in the Talmud nor in the Midrash is there the least trace of any acquaintance with the number twenty-two; but, on the contrary, twenty-four is always given, not because it corresponds with the twenty-four Greek letters, but simply as the natural result of the gradual rise of the canon. In the present printed Hebrew Bible the number is thirty-nine, similarly counted, though not arranged, with those of Protestant Bibles.

II. THE OLD-TESTAMENT CANON IN THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH. 1. The Patristic and Middle-Age Writers.—No Father has impugned the authority of the Old Testament; but, because of the universal use of the Septuagint, they recognized as Scripture what we regard as Apocrypha. Since the fourth century the Greek Fathers make less and less use of the Apocrypha; while in the Latin Church conciliar action justified and emphasized their use. Jerome alone speaks out decidedly for the Hebrew canon. During the middle age the Apocrypha were not recognized by the majority of the Greeks; while just the opposite was true of the Latins, although not a few followed Jerome.

The Book of Esther, because of its curious contents, was sometimes excluded from the Christian Old Testament Canon. Melito of Sardis (about 170 A.D.) omits it from his list (see Eusebius, H. E., IV. 26), although perhaps it has rather dropped out after Esdras (Ezra), inasmuch as in other lists it comes next to this name. It is also omitted by Athanasius (Epistola Festalis, I. 961, ed. Bened.), Gregory of Nazianzum (Carm. XXXIII.), and in the sixth century by Junilius (De Partibus Legis Divinae, I. 3-7). On the other hand, it is included in the canon by Origen, Cyril of Jerusalem, and Epiphanius.

2. The Ancient Oriental Versions.—The old Syrian Church did not receive the Apocrypha. They are not in the Peshito, although found in a later Syriac translation. Ephraem Syrus (d. 373) does not give them canonical authority. Aphraates (fourth century) cites from no apocryphal, but from every canonical book. [Sasse, Prolegomena in Aphraatis Sapientis Persæ Sermones Homileticos (Lips., 1879), p. 40, says Aphraates had knowledge of First and Second Maccabees.] A great difference is perceptible in the Peshito translation between the Chronicles and that of the other books. This has started the query whether the Chronicles were accepted as canonical by the Syrian Church. The Nestorians certainly rejected it. The Ethiopic translation follows throughout the Septuagint, and contains, not only the canonical, but also the apocryphal books, except that for First and Second Maccabees it substitutes two books of its own under the same name, and some pseudepigraphs of which the Greek texts do not now exist; for the Ethiopic Church makes even less difference than the Alexandrian between canonical and uncanonical books. [See PSEUDEPIGRAPHS OF THE OLD TESTAMENT.]

3. The Roman Church is committed to the use of the Apocrypha as Scripture by the decision of the Council of Trent at the fourth session. In order to get a normal text for purposes of quotation, a Bible was published in Rome in 1592 under the orders and care of the Pope. In it Jerome's remark, that the additions to Esther and Daniel which are printed are not in the Hebrew text, is given; and in smaller type the candid announcement is prefaced to the prayer of Manasses and the Third and Fourth Books of Ezra, that, while it is true they are not in the Scripture canon of the Council of Trent, they are still included because they are quoted occasionally by certain of the Fathers, and are found both in printed and manuscript copies of the Latin Bible. The decree of the council was not passed without opposition; and later Roman Catholics, such as Du Pin, Dissert. prelim. sur le Bible, Paris, 1, 1; B. Lamy, App. Bibl. 2, 5, and Jahn, Einl. in d. göttlich. B.B. d. Alten Bundes, i. 119, 132, 140-143, have endeavored to establish two classes of canonical books,—the proto-canonical and the deuterocanonical,—attributing to the first a dogmatic, and to the second only an ethical authority; but this distinction evidently contravenes the decision of Trent, and has found little support.

4. The Greek Church. The synods of Constantinople (1638), Jassy (1642), and Jerusalem (1672), expressly reject the view of Cyril Lucar, Patriarch of Constantinople, and others, which distinguishes the canonical from the apocryphal. And the last, which is the most important in the modern history of the Eastern Church, defined its position in regard to the Apocrypha in the answer to the third question appended to the Confession of Dositheus, in which it expressly mentions Wisdom, Judith, Tobit, History of the Dragon, History of Susannah, the Maccabees (four books of), and Ecclesiasticus, as canonical. But the longer Catechism of the Orthodox Catholic Eastern Church (Moscow, 1839), the most authoritative doctrinal standard of the orthodox Græco-Russian Church, expressly leaves out the apocryphal books from its list on the ground that "they do not exist in the Hebrew." [See Schaff, Creeds of Christendom, vol. II. p. 451.]

5. The Protestant Church.—The Lutheran symbols do not give any express declaration against the Apocrypha. Nevertheless they are denied dogmatic value. Luther translated them, and recommended them for private reading. With this agrees the decisions of the other Reformed churches: the Gallic Confessions, 1559, §§ 3, 4; Belgic Confession, 1561, §§ 4-6; Thirty-nine Articles of Religion of the Church of England, 1562, § 6. [See Schaff, Creeds of Christendom, vol. III.] The Book of Common Prayer contains readings from the Apocrypha, and especial recommendation of portions of Wisdom and Sirach.—At the Synod of Dort (1618), Gomarus and others raised an animated discussion by demanding the exclusion of the apocryphal Esdras, Tobit, Judith, and Bel and the Dragon from the Bible. This the synod refused to do, although speaking strongly against the Apocrypha. Similarly opposed to them was the Westminster Assembly of Divines, 1647, Confession of Faith, c. I. § 3; the Arminians, Confessio . . . Pastorum, qui . . . Remonstrantes vocantur, I. 3, 6; the Socinians (Ostorodt, Unterrichtung von den vornehmsten Hauptpunkten der christlichen Religion, Rakau, 1604) and the Mennonites (Johann Ris, Præcipuorum Christianæ Fidei Articulorum Brevis Confessio, c. 29) agree with the other Protestants. For history of the relation of the Bible societies to the Apocrypha, see BIBLE SOCIETIES. For the Apocrypha in general, see APOCRYPHA.

II. L. STRACK.

CANON OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.¹—Christ and the apostles, and, following their example, the early Church, used the Old Testament as the word of God; but the formation of the New Testament was relatively late in its origin, and slow in its progress. Decades passed before the Christian Church thought of collecting the apostolic writings, and yet longer time before they gave them canonical authority. The Church had the Old Testament, and could trust to verbal testimony for its knowledge of Christ. But very early in its history a literature which is now preserved in our New Testament did obtain currency. The explanation lies in the authority of the writers, the pains they took to guard against forgery (2 Thess. ii. 2, iii. 17), the requested reading of the letters in the church (1 Thess. v. 22), the circulation of these letters from church to church (Col. iv. 16); and, finally, the character of the writings themselves which demanded currency; e.g., the Synoptic Gospels were designed for the Jews; that of John, for believers generally (John xx. 31); and the Catholic Epistles, for the whole Church. It is evident their end would not be attained without a wide circulation. One instance of the use by one writer of another is 2 Pet. i. 16. It was not, however, to be expected that a collection of these apostolic writings would be made in their day. Since the fall of Jerusalem, there was no favorable place for depositing such a collection, if made; nor was there any demand for one. It is probable that the wide-spread expectancy of the end of the world, joined to the fact that the apostles were yet with them, drove all such ideas out of their minds.

The APOSTOLIC FATHERS will naturally be turned to first in proof of the existence of a canon; but while very many of their expressions can be paralleled in the New Testament, and sentences of Jesus are quoted, yet the impression left on the mind is rather that they drew from the fountain-head of tradition, and possessed written Gospels now perished, and other sources of knowledge closed to us, than that they regarded any number of writings as of paramount canonical authority. It is indeed true that it is easier to quote this early patristic support for the Epistles than for the Gospels; for CLEMENS ROMANUS, writing to the Corinthians (c. 47, cf. 1 Cor. i. 10 sqq.), IGNATIUS to the Ephesians (c. 12, cf. Eph. vi. 18), and POLYCARP to the Philippians (c. 3, cf. Phil. iii. 1), mention the Epistles of Paul to those churches respectively. The quotations from the New Testament are fewer than from the Old Testament; and, while the quotations from the Old Testament are generally introduced by "The Scripture saith," "The Holy Spirit saith," or "The Holy Word speaks," those from the New have, for the most part, no such introduction. We conclude, therefore, that, to the Apostolic Fathers, the New Testament had not attained canonical authority. To this conclusion the testimony of PAPIAS leads us. See Eusebius, H. E., III. 39.² Papias wrote five books entitled Interpretations of our Lord's Declarations. In them he recorded not only the oral tradition, but also what he had read. How far his acquaintance with the written Gospels extended is not clearly expressed; but there is explicit information given regarding Matthew and Mark, and his acquaintance with Luke is fairly conjectured from the similarity of his preface (not given below) to that of Luke's. His silence about John proves neither his ignorance of that Gospel nor his disbelief in it. Eusebius also says that Papias "made use of testimonies from the First Epistle of John, and likewise from that of Peter." What Papias says of Mark puts the latter in silent yet evident contrast to the other evangelists, who were both eye and ear witnesses to Christ. We have a right to assert that Papias was acquainted with our four evangelists, and drew from them, and not from apocryphal sources, joined to oral tradition, his knowledge of the gospel.

The next witness is JUSTIN MARTYR, whose First Apology (before 160) was quickly followed by the Second, in both of which, as in his Dialogue with Trypho, he frequently speaks of and quotes from the Memoirs of the apostles; thus, Apology I. 66, "The apostles, in the memoirs composed by them, which are called Gospels;" Dialogue 103, "The memoirs which were drawn up by his apostles and those who followed them." These "memoirs" are doubtless our present Gospels. The references to Matthew and Luke are easiest recognized. Mark is called the "memoir of Peter" (Dial. 106). The influence of John's Gospel is seen, not so much in quotation as in the style of argumentation and expression. See Luthardt, Der joh. Ursprung, pp. 63 sqq. [Eng. trans., St. John, the Author of the Fourth Gospel, Edin., 1875. See ABBOT: The Authorship of the Fourth Gospel, Boston, 1880.] Justin refers to the Apocalypse (Dial. 81) and to the Pauline Epistles as the authoritative writings of Christians (Apol. I. 28), and further, that the "memoirs of the apostles" were read in their weekly meetings with the same frequency and solemnity as the writings of the prophets (I. 67). Thus Justin gives us certain knowledge of a veritable canon of the New Testament. Some of our present canon must have been already collected and recognized as authoritative Christian literature. TARTIAN, the scholar of Justin, made a Diatessaron, "a gospel by the four" (Eus., H. E. IV. 29), and therefore must have used John's Gospel. It seems to have been in the interests of Gnosticism, and is therefore really all the higher testimony to the position of these writings. We are hence justified in saying that by the end of the second century the canonical Gospels were in common use as sources of the life of Jesus. The apostolic Epistles were not, however, as yet collected. Paul's were probably gathered first. ATHENAGORAS (d. about 200) grounds his argument for the resurrection of the dead upon words of the Epistles to the Corinthians (De Resurr., 16, cf. 1 Cor. xv. 53, 2 Cor. v. 10); and THEOPHILUS (d. about 188) quotes Rom. xiii. 7 sq., 1 Tim. ii. 2, Tit. iii. 1, with the formulas, "the holy word exhorts us," or "teaches us;" and to do this was to put the apostolic upon the level of the Old Testament writings.

² "And John the Presbyter also said this, Mark being the interpreter of Peter, whatsoever he recorded he wrote with great accuracy, but not, however, in the order in which it was spoken or done by our Lord, for he neither heard nor followed our Lord; but, as before said, he was in company with Peter, who gave him such instruction as was necessary, but not to give a history of our Lord's discourses. Wherefore, Mark has not erred in any thing by writing some things as he has recorded them; for he was carefully attentive to one thing,—not to pass by any thing that he heard, or to state any thing falsely in these accounts." "Matthew composed his history in the Hebrew dialect, and every one translated it as he was able."

The rise and spread of heresy, especially Gnosticism, was largely instrumental in deepening the authority of the New Testament in the Church; for she found in it the dam to check the flood of error. The heretics in their own interest corrupted the New Testament, or gave it false interpretations, and even forged books in the name of apostles. MARCION of Sinope, the Gnostic (fl. about 140), made a collection of apostolic writings, in which he included one Gospel, and ten Pauline Epistles, in this order: Galatians, First and Second Corinthians, Romans, First and Second Thessalonians, Colossians, Philemon, Philippians, Laodiceans, (Epiph., Hær. XLII. 9). This Gospel did not exactly harmonize with any one of ours, but approached nearest to Luke. But outside of Marcion's circle, BASILIDES (about 130) made use of some Gospel; but we are not sufficiently informed to pronounce decisively that it was one of our four. Similarly the Ophite references [to Matthew, Luke, John, Romans, First and Second Corinthians, Galatians, Ephesians, and Hebrews] cannot be added in proof of their use of the New Testament, because we do not know the primitive shape of their teaching. The position of the New Testament in another Gnostic set, the Valentinians, is much clearer; for, of the pupils of Valentinus, Heraclion wrote a commentary upon John (about 160), of which fragments have been preserved by Clement of Alexandria and Origen; and Ptolemy cites the fourth Gospel as from John the apostle. Valentinus himself seems to have made a gospel-harmony: at all events, he and his followers were well acquainted with the Gospel of John (Irenæus, Adv. Hær. III. 11, 7). See Heinrici: Die valentinianische Gnosis u. die heilige Schrift, Berlin, 1871.

IRENÆUS, Bishop of Lyons (177-202), is the next witness, exhibiting the Gallic view of the canon at the close of the second century. He quotes all the books of the New Testament save Philemon, Second Peter, and Jude. He shows special knowledge of the history of our Gospels, and emphasizes their unity and unshakable position; denies ecclesiastical authority to Hebrews, but looks upon the New Testament as the pillar and ground of the faith (Adv. Hær. III. 11); says that both the Old and New Testaments proceed from the same Spirit (III. 21); but, it should be added, he puts equal stress upon tradition (III. 4, 2), and expressly cites the Pastor of Hermas as "scripture" (IV. 20, 2). CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA (d. about 220), a little later, is witness to the use of the Alexandrian Church. He uses all the canon of Irenæus, and, besides, the two omitted Catholic Epistles; considers Paul to have been the author of Hebrews, and Luke its translator (Euseb., H. E. VI. 14); assigns to the "Gospels," as he calls our New Testament, an equal position with the Law and the Prophets (Clem. Alex., Strom. IV. 1, § 2), but nevertheless does not seem to have fixed ideas in regard to a canon; for he lays great emphasis upon an unwritten saying of Jesus, and the Epistle of Barnabas (Strom. 6). TERTULLIAN is the contemporary witness for Proconsular Africa (See Rönisch, Das Neue Testament Tertullians, Leipzig, 1871). He shows no acquaintance with Second Peter, Second and Third John, ascribes Hebrews to Barnabas (De Pudic. c. 20), and, along with First Peter and Jude, considers it an appendix to the apostolic writings, and, before his conversion to Montanism, quoted as Scripture the Pastor of Hermas (ib. c. 10). With these six exceptions, he makes copious use of the New Testament.

The Peshito, the Syrian Bible version (see BIBLE VERSIONS), surely not later than the beginning of the third century, contains the four Gospels, the Acts, Epistles of James, First Peter, First John, and fourteen Pauline Epistles (i. e., it includes Hebrews, whose apostolicity and full canonicity were afterwards denied), but leaves out Second Peter, Second and Third John, Jude, and Revelation. This, then, was at that time the canon of that part of the Church.

The MURATORIAN FRAGMENT, so called because discovered by Muratori (published 1740) in the Ambrosian Library at Milan, in a manuscript of the eighth or ninth century, originally belonged to Columban's great monastery at Bobbio, repeatedly published and investigated [see MURATORIAN FRAGMENT, Tregelles, Canon Muratorianus, London, 1868, and Westcott, Canon of the New Testament, London, 1881]; and was probably originally written in Latin, is surely of Occidental origin, dates from the last quarter of the second century, but of unknown authorship. The fragmentist draws a sharp line between the fully and the only partially received writings. The list includes the four Gospels, Acts, thirteen Epistles of Paul, First John, Second John, Jude (although, in the judgment of the compiler, the last two Epistles had as little right to their names as Wisdom to that of Solomon), and Revelation of John and that of Peter (not for public reading); excludes Hebrews, James, First and Second Peter, Third John. The compiler also declares that the Pastor of Hermas was for private reading only.

From the preceding statements it follows, that, at the close of the second century, our present New Testament was completed, and in parts had received the unanimous indorsement of the Church; but, as there was no agreement as to certain books, there was no canon in a universal sense. Passing over to the third century, the first, and unquestionably the most learned, scholar to be examined is ORIGEN (185-254). See Eusebius, H. E. VI. 25. This testimony is important; for he had the best information, derived from men, books, and travel. At the same time he was, according to his own confession, determined to follow the Church's tradition, and hence his list is really that of the Church as he knew it. He puts first "the four Gospels, which, as I have understood from tradition, are the only undisputed ones in the whole Church of God throughout the world." He knows of those of the Hebrews, of the Egyptians, and of Peter; but he rejects them. To the Gospels he adds the Acts (whose author he asserts was surely Luke), and the Epistles of Paul (fourteen, although he considers Hebrews only Paul's in doctrine), Peter, and John. James and Jude are omitted purposely; but elsewhere he calls James a "holy Epistle." Jude he cites, although he acknowledges that its genuineness was questioned. The Apocalypse he accepts as canonical. But Origen apparently places on a level with these writings the Pastor of Hermas and the Epistle of Barnabas and the First Epistle of Clement.

The memorable canon of EUSEBIUS, the church-historian (265-340), given in H. E. III. 25, is as follows: 1. 'Ὀμολογούμενα (confessedly genuine), the four Gospels, Acts, Epistles of Paul (number not stated), First John, First Peter, and εἰς φανερίαν ("if it seems right"), the Revelation of John; 2. Ἀντιλεγόμενα (spoken against), "although they are well known, and approved by many," Epistle of James and Jude, Second Peter, Second and Third John; 3. Νόθα (spurious), the Acts of Paul, Pastor of Hermas, the Revelation of Peter, Epistle of Barnabas, Institutions of the Apostles, and, "if the opinion appears correct, the Revelation of John, which some reject, but others rank among the genuine."¹

¹ [As the remarks of Eusebius which follow the above are very important, we give them in full: "But there are also some who number among these the 'Gospel according to the Hebrews,' with which those of the Hebrews that have received Christ are particularly delighted. These may be said to be all concerning which there is any dispute. We have, however, necessarily subjoined here a catalogue of these also, in order to distinguish those that are true, genuine, and well authenticated writings, from those others which are not only not embodied in the canon, but likewise disputed, notwithstanding that they are recognized by most ecclesiastical writers. Thus we may have it in our power to know both these, and those that are adduced by the heretics under the name of the apostles; such, viz., as compose the 'Gospels' of Peter, Thomas, and Matthew, and others beside them; or such as contain the 'Acts of the Apostles,' by Andrew and John, and others, of which no one of those writers in the ecclesiastical succession

In this section Eusebius hesitatingly pronounces judgment in favor of Hebrews, which he reckons among Paul's Epistles (cf. H. E. III. 3) and Revelation.

By the close of the fourth century the doubts which had rested upon certain books of the New Testament have vanished. ATHANASIUS of Alexandria, who first uses "canon" in our sense (d. 373), CYRIL of Jerusalem (d. 386), GREGORY of Nazianzum (d. 389), and EPIPHANIUS, Bishop of Salamis (d. 403), have left catalogues of the New Testament, which agree in granting to the disputed Catholic Epistles an equal place with the undisputed; noticeable is also the unquestioning reception of Hebrews. The sixtieth canon of the Council of Laodicea (360) gives the list of the present New Testament (but no apocryphal books), with the exception of Revelation, and thus voices the decision of the Eastern Church of the fourth century in regard to the New Testament canon.

The Western Church also at this time had settled upon a canon. There is little difference between the lists; and what one omits another restores. Thus HILARY of Poitiers (d. 368) leaves out the five Catholic Epistles, but PHILASTRIUS (d. 387) and RUFINUS (d. 410) insert them. So AMBROSE (d. 379) numbers Hebrews among Paul's Epistles, and the Apocalypse is universally accepted as apostolic and canonical. The decisive judgment came from JEROME (d. 420) and AUGUSTINE (d. 430). Yet Jerome, while, out of respect to tradition, including in his canon the disputed Epistles, acknowledged that they had been often put aside. Augustine was much more influenced by the voice of tradition. The synods were also in substantial agreement upon the canon. Thus that of Hippo Regius in Numidia (393), while Augustine was a presbyter there, in its thirty-sixth canon gives the list as now received: so Carthage (397 and 419), and so Bishop GELASIVUS in the decree prepared by a Roman synod (495), which decree fixed the order in which the books of the New Testament at present stand.

By 397 the canon of the New Testament was established; but the canonicity of certain books was still occasionally questioned, nor is there wanting individual cases of their rejection. Thus CHRYSOSTOM (d. 407) ignores the Epistles of Jude, Second Peter, Second and Third John, and the Apocalypse. But these dissenting voices were few and unimportant. The middle age came on, and the Catholic Church left off thinking and questioning on the subject. Not until the Council of Trent was the Western Church (not now Catholic, but Roman) called upon to express her mind upon the canon; and, when she did, she re-affirmed the canon of the fourth century, and anathematized all dissent. See Conc. Trid., Sess. IV., April 8, 1546.

The Reformation awoke new interest in the canon. The Reformers expressed themselves very freely upon it. First comes CARLSTADT:

has condescended to make any mention in his works. And, indeed, the character of the style itself is very different from that of the apostles; and the sentiments, and the purport of those things that are advanced in them, deviating as far as possible from sound orthodoxy, evidently proves that they are the fictions of heretical men, whence they are to be rejected not only among the spurious writings, but are to be rejected as altogether absurd and impious."¹

De Canonis Scripturis; and the same year and place, in German, in condensed form, Welche Bücher biblisch sind, Wittenberg, 1520. He divides the entire Bible into three classes: I. The Law, the Gospels, and Acts; II. (of secondary dignity) The Prophets, thirteen Epistles of Paul, First John, and First Peter; III. (of lowest dignity) The remainder of the canon. But this purely subjective arrangement, which showed neither dogmatic nor critical principles, was of no influence. Its historical cause was the fear lest LUTHER should actually destroy the traditional canon by his free handling and criticism, especially in regard to Hebrews, James, Jude, and the Apocalypse. Luther attributed Hebrews to Apollos; said that James was quite beneath apostolic dignity in its style, and legal in its spirit, "an epistle of straw;" pronounced Jude "an unnecessary epistle;" while as for the Apocalypse, he considered it neither apostolic, nor prophetic, nor inspired, of no more value than Second Esdras, particularly because it presented pictures and guiding words. He did not ignore the historical attestation of a book; but his standard for the canonicity of a book was its power to teach Christ; and so, because these four books failed to present Christ according to his notions, he puts them at the end of his New Testament. As was to be expected, Luther had followers in this path, such as Brenz, Flacius, and the "Magdeburg centuriators," and Chemnitz; and while the Gallic (§ 3) and Belgic (§ 4) Confessions, and the Westminster Confession of Faith (§ 1) commit these churches to a canon, the Lutheran does not, nor do the Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England (§ 6); for the latter says, after the list of the Old-Testament Apocrypha, "All the books of the New Testament as they are commonly received we do receive, and account canonical." The Reformed churches were, however, agreed upon the canon; and as for the Reformers, ÆCOLAMPADIUS (d. 1531) might object to putting the antilegomena on a level with the homologoumena, and ZWINGLI (d. 1531) might reject the Apocalypse; but none of them went so far as to make a canon of his own. Two names in the modern German-Protestant Church represent the sceptical opinions of their day. JOHANN SALOMO SEMLER (d. 1791), in his Abhandlung von freier Untersuchung des Kanons, Halle, 1771-75, 4 vols., set forth the idea that the early Church did not regard the canon as normal for all time, but rather as a list of books which were read in public service. No book was truly canonical except it was universally usable; and therefore a later age was not bound to respect the limits of the original collection. See SEMLER, ACCOMMODATION. He anticipated the Tübingen school in the assertion that the Catholic epistles were reconciliatory documents. The founder of this school was FERDINAND CHRISTIAN BAUR (d. 1860). They almost give up the idea of a canon; nor does the question of canonicity enter into discussion in their later New-Testament criticism. See TÜBINGEN SCHOOL. Their opponents seem likewise to have abandoned the discussion, although, as Schleiermacher has said, "The Protestant Church must strive after a more definite determination of the canon; and this is the highest exegetico-theological task for the higher criticism."

CANON LAW. Collections of Canons and Decretals. Corpus Juris Canonici. In the first three centuries the word "canon" simply denoted such rules of conduct and discipline as had descended immediately from the founders of the Christian Church, and were generally accepted by it. But by degrees, as the synods took the lead in the life of the Church, and their decrees were recognized as authoritative by the Church, these decrees, too, were called canones; and in the same manner, when the primacy of the Bishop of Rome became firmly established, both the name and the authority of canones were transferred to his decretals, until at last, in the language of the middle ages, the word "canon" came to denote any ecclesiastical prescription in contradistinction to the regulations of the civil law.

During the first centuries the Christian Church felt no necessity of having a systematic collection of its canons. Its relations were as yet so simple, that the intermediate prescriptions of Christ and the apostles were sufficient for its constitution and discipline. That the so-called Apostolical Constitutions and Canons do not reach back to the time of the apostles is certain. A Codex Canonum is first mentioned in the acts of the Council of Chalcedon (451). Here the canons 6, 83, 84, 95, and 96 of a certain collection, were read aloud; and a closer examination shows that those canons are the canon 6 of the synod of Nicea (325), and the canons 4, 5, 16, and 17 of the synod of Antiochia (332). Thus it seems quite probable that this Greek collection contained the canons of several councils numbered in continuous succession, beginning with the Council of Nicæa, and ending with that of Antiochia. There were other Greek collections of canons. See Petr. et Hieron. Ballerini, De Antiquis, tum editis tum ineditis, Collectionibus et Collectoribus Canonum, in Oper. Leonis Magni, Venice, 1757, Tom. III. But it is a mistake to ascribe an official character recognized by the whole Church, either to that Codex Canonum used at the Council of Chalcedon or to any other collection; and the so-called Codex Canonum Ecclesie Universæ, which Christoph Justeau published in Paris, 1610, is nothing but a miscarried attempt at fabrication: both the title and the arrangement are the editor's own work.

Of the decrees of the Greek councils, only those of the Council of Nicæa were immediately accepted by the Western Church (Innoc. I. Epp. ad Theophil. Alex. and ad Cler. et Popul. Const., in Schönemann: Pontif. Roman. Epistolæ Genuinæ, Göttingen, 1796, pp. 539, 549), and also those of the Council of Sardica in the original Latin text. But already in the fifth century there existed Latin translations of the Greek collections of canons; and of these translations three are specially noticeable; namely, the Spanish or Isidorian translation, the Translatio Prisca, and the Dionysian translation. The Spanish or Isidorian translation received its name from the circumstance that it afterwards came to form the basis for the great Spanish collection of canons and decretals, which for a long time was ascribed to Isidore of Seville; but its birthplace was, no doubt, Italy, and with respect to its date the translation of the decrees of the Council of Nicæa was known in Gaul in 439 (Concil. Regense); and that of the decrees of the Council of Ancyra (Canones Ancyritani), in 517 (Concil. Epaonens.). This translation forms part of a collection of canons made in Gaul towards the close of the fifth century, and was first published by Paschasius Quesnell, in Opera S. Leonis, Paris, 1675, Tom. II., under the title, Codex Ecclesie Romanæ. The title is a misnomer, however, as the collection was never authorized by the Roman Church. Different from this translation is the Versio or Translatio Prisca, made in Italy in the second half of the fifth century, containing the decrees of the Councils of Ancyra (Ancyrenses), Neo-Cæsarea, Nicæa, Antiochia, Gangra, Constantinople, and Chalcedon, and published first by Justeau, in Biblioth. Jur. Canon. Tom. I. p. 275, but after an incomplete codex, and then complete and more correct, by the Ballerini in Opera Leonis Magni. Tom. III. p. 473. Of still greater importance is the translation made in Rome by Dionysius Exiguus, on the instance of Bishop Stephan of Salona, at the end of the fifth century. It contains fifty Canones Apostolorum, hundred and sixty-five canons from the Councils of Nicæa, Ancyra (Ancyritani), Neo-Cæsarea, Gangra, Antiochia, Laodicea, and Constantinople from the Greek collection, twenty-seven canons from the Council of Chalcedon from another, and finally, in the original Latin text, twenty-one canons from the Council of Sardica and the acts of the synod of Carthage (419). Besides this work, Dionysius also made a collection of the decretals of Siricius, Innocent I., Zosimus, Boniface I., Cælestinus I., Leo I., Gelasius I., and Anastasius II., on the instance of the presbyter Julian, and during the reign of Symmachus (498-514). These two works of Dionysius were afterwards united into one collection, which soon gained the precedence of all other collections, was frequently quoted by the popes, and was, according to the testimony of Cassiodorus (De Instit. Divin. c. 23), in general use throughout the Western Church in the middle of the sixth century. In the time of Charlemagne it even obtained the rank of an official Codex Canonum. Augmented with the decretals of Hilarius, Simplicius, Felix, Symmachus, Hormisda, and Gregory II., it was presented in 774 by Pope Adrian to Charlemagne, and at the diet of Aix-la-Chapelle (802), it was formally recognized by the Frankish Church as Codex Canonum. This Codex Dionysio-Hadrianeus was first edited by Wendelstein, Mayence, 1525, and then by Pithou, Paris, 1609; and it is found in Biblioth. Jur. Canon., Tom. I., and in Migne, Patrologia, Tom. 67, p. 135.

The African Church based its discipline principally upon the decrees of its own councils. Especially the synod of Carthage (419) was in this respect of great importance, as it incorporated with its own decrees those of the synods held under Aurelius of Carthage since 393. This collection of African canons Dionysius merged into his compilation, though in an incomplete and abbreviated shape; and the Dionysian text was afterwards translated into Greek, and combined with various Greek collections. Justeau published in 1615, in Paris, both the Latin and the Greek texts, under the arbitrary title, Codex Canonum Eccles. Africanæ; and they have been reprinted in Biblioth. Jur. Canon. Tom. I. p. 305, and in Biblioth. Ecclesiast., Berlin, 1839, vol. I. p. 155. The two most noticeable among the other African collections are the Breviatio Canonum, made in 546 by Fulgentius Ferrandus, deacon of the Church of Carthage, containing an extract of the Greek canon after the Isidorian translation, and the decrees of the African councils up to 523, and published, first by Pithou, Paris, 1588, and then in Biblioth. Jur. Canon., Tom. I. p. 448, and in Migne, Patrologia, Tom. 67, p. 949; and Concordia Canonum, probably made about 690 by an African bishop, Cresconius, and printed in Biblioth. Jur. Canon. Tom. I. App. p. 3.

Collections of decrees of councils and of papal decretals existed in Spain in the sixth century, as appears from the acts of the synod of Braga (563); and the overthrow of Arianism, and the restoration of the Catholic Church, made a complete and systematic arrangement of all canonical matter very desirable. Shortly after the fourth council of Toledo (633), such a collection was actually made. In the form in which we now know this collection, as published in Madrid (1808), it belongs to the eighth century; but it is quite possible to form an idea of the original collection. As the text contains much more than is mentioned by the indices, it seems legitimate to infer that the indices were made to the original collection, and retained unchanged; no notice being taken of the later additions to the text. The collection consists of two parts. Part first contains the decrees of the councils: Concilia Græcorum, after the above-mentioned so-called Spanish or Isidorian translation; Africa Concilia; Concilia Gallie (16); and Concilia Hispanie (36). Part second contains the papal decretals from Damasus to Gregory I. (604). The author of this collection is unknown. None of the existing manuscripts contain any thing to put the collection in connection with Isidore of Seville. He is first mentioned as its author by the author of the Pseudo-Isidorian decretals; which article see.

The old British, the Scotch, and the Irish churches developed their constitution and discipline independently through their own synods; but very few of the canons of those synods have come down to us. Some canonical collections from the fifth and sixth centuries are simply penitentials. In the Anglo-Saxon Church, too, the discipline depended for a long time upon native synods, though the Dionysian collection was known there already in the seventh century, as appears from the acts of the synod of Herford (673). With the exception, however, of the penitence-ordinances of Theodore, Bede, and Egbert, nothing exists of an Anglo-Saxon collection of canons. The De Jure Sacerdotali and Excerptiones are of Frankish origin. See Wasserschleben: Bussordnungen der abendländischen Kirche, Halle, 1851. But there exists an Irish collection of canons, published at Giessen, 1874, by Wasserschleben, which treats the whole field of church-discipline. The collection is interesting, not only on account of the rich patristical materials it contains, but also on account of the great number of decrees of Irish synods it presents, and which give a vivid picture of the peculiar constitution of the national church of Ireland.

Long before the Codex Dionysio-Hadrianeus was recognized as the Codex Canonum, or Liber Canonum, there circulated in the Frankish Empire a great number of collections of canons and decretals. One published by Paschasius Quesnell, under the title Codex Ecclesie Romanæ, is mentioned above. New materials were added, when, towards the close of the eighth century, the great Spanish collection became known in Gaul; but, as the materials grew richer, they became more difficult to handle. Systematical arrangement was necessary, and such systematically arranged collections soon became very frequent. One belonging to the latter part of the eighth century, and containing three hundred and eighty-one capitula, has been published by Richter, Marburg, 1844; another, dating probably from the beginning of the ninth century, by d'Achery in Specileg. I. p. 510; a third, the so-called Pœnitentialis of Bishop Halitger of Cambrai, 810-837, by Canisius, in Lectio. Antiq., edited by Basnage, T. II. P. II. p. 87. These three collections pay special regard to the question of penitence, and so do the various collections by Hrabanus Maurus: Liber Pœnitentium ad Otgarium, 841, and Epistola ad Heribaldum, 853. The so-called Capitula Episcoporum also evince a somewhat similar character. They are minor collections, generally made by some bishop, and consisting partly of extracts from larger works, partly of local decrees and prescriptions. To this kind of collections belong Statuta Bonifacii Mogunt., 797 (Mansi: Concil., XIII. p. 383), Capitula Theodulphi Aurel., 797 (Mansi, XIII. p. 993), Capitula Ahytonis Basil., 820 (Mansi, XIV. p. 393), Capitula Herardi Turonensis, 858 (Baluze: Capit. Reg. Francor., I. p. 1283), Capitula Hincmari Remens., 852-877 (Mansi, XV. p. 505), etc. The great influence which during the Carolingian period the secular power exercised on the Church, even on its discipline, added still more new materials to the body of the canonical law; and systematical compilations also of these new elements, the capitularies of the Frankish kings, were made, for instance, by Ansegis, Benedictus Levita, etc.

After the ninth century this labor of systematization became of still greater importance; and attempts were made, on a steadily-increasing scale, almost in every country, until, in the middle of the twelfth century, the whole development reached its consummation in the Decretum Gratiani. Among the principal works of the kind may be mentioned Libri Duo de Causis Synodabus et Disciplinis Ecclesiasticis by Abbot Regino of Prüm (d. 915), written on the instance of Archbishop Rathbod of Treves as a manual for bishops, and published at Leipsic, 1840, by Wasserschleben; Decretum, or Liber Decretorum Burchardi, written by Bishop Burchard of Worms, between 1012 and 1023, and published in Migne, Patrologia, Tom. 140, p. 537 sqq.; a collection of canons by Cardinal Deusdedit, dedicated to Victor III. (1086-87), and published by Martinucci, Venice, 1869; the Decretum in seventeen books, and the Pannormia in eight books, by Bishop Ivo of Chartres (d. 1117), both found among his works in Migne, Patrologia Tom. 161; besides a number not yet printed. But all these attempts were completely superseded by the Discordantium Canonum Concordia, or Liber Decretorum, or simply Decretum Gratiani, consisting of three parts, of which the first is divided into one hundred and one distinctiones, each distinctio comprising a number of canones; the second into thirty-six causa, each causa comprising a number of questions and answers; and the third into five distinctiones. The division of the first and third parts into distinctiones is the work of Paucopalea; while that of the second part into causa proceeded from Gratian himself. The work, however, is not simply a systematical arrangement of the materials, but also, to a certain extent, a treatment of the subject. Besides the text of the canones, it also contains short explanations, Dicta Gratiani, in which the author endeavors to explain away the contradictions between the canones. To this feature the work owed a great deal of its success. Written at Bologna, and written at a time when Bologna was the centre of all juridical study, it was planned and executed in accordance with the method then prevailing in the juridical lecture-room, rather than with a view to special practical purposes. It was immediately made the subject of study. Gratian himself lectured upon it in the same manner as the glossatores on the Corpus Juris Justiani; and through the school it conquered and ruled the world, though it was never formally confirmed by the popes, or accepted by the Church as authoritative.

The Decretum Gratiani appeared in the period when the papal power stood at its highest, and developed its greatest legislative activity. Hence the natural consequence, that, though the work at its first appearance was justly considered as the Corpus Juris Canonici, only a few years elapsed before it became incomplete, or even antiquated. Supplements were necessary; and no less than five new collections were made before the development again reached a halting-point with the Decretalium Gregorii IX. Compilatio (1234). The first of these supplementary collections was the Breviarium Extravagantium; that is, a collection of decretals, extra decretum videntes, by Bernardus, provost of Pavia. It was finished in 1190, and consists of five books, subdivided into tituli and capitula. The influence of the Codex Justiniani, and even of the Pandects, is still more apparent here than in the decretum itself. The arrangement of the material in the five books is indicated by the verse: Judex, Judicium, Clerus, Connubia, Crimen. The second collection, the so-called Compilatio Tertia, was made by the papal notary Petrus Collivacinus, from Benevent, on the instance of Innocent III., and contains the decretals issued by that Pope during the first eleven years of his reign. The Pope sent it himself to the University of Bologna in 1210. The Compilatio Secunda is later in time than the preceding, but contains the decretals issued by the popes from Alexander III. to Innocent III.: hence its name, Secunda. It was made by Johannes Galensis. After the fourth council of the Lateran (1215), a new collection was made by an unknown author, and recognized by the University of Bologna as Compilatio Quarta. These four collections were first published by Ant. Augustinus, Herdæ, 1567, and then by Labbé, Paris, 1609. The Compilatio Quinta, containing the decretals of Honorius II. and the constitution of the Emperor Frederick II., was sent to the University of Bologna in 1220, and published first by Cironius, Tolosæ, 1645, and then by I. A. Riegger, Vienna, 1761. In 1230 Gregory IX. charged his chaplain, Raymond of Pennafort, with the compilation of a new collection, in which the preceding five collections, together with his own decretals, should be merged into one body; and this new collection, Decretalium Gregorii IX. Compilatio, was in 1234 sent to the University of Bologna with a papal bull. From this time it was, both in the schools and in practical life, considered and used as the law-book of the Church; but, as it had taken the place of the Extravagantes, it was in quotations marked like those; namely, by the word Extra. The Compilatio Gregorii also very soon needed supplements; and such were furnished by Innocent IV., Alexander IV., Urban IV., Clement V., Gregory X., and Nicholas III. These supplements were, by Boniface VIII., united into one body together with his own decretals, after the plan which Gregory IX. had employed with respect to the Extravagantes; and this new collection was in 1298 sent to the universities of Bologna and Paris, under the name of Liber Sextus, and with a papal bull of authorization. The decretals which Boniface VIII. issued after 1298, and among which were the famous bull Unam sanctam, as well as the decretals of Clemens V. (1305-14), were finally collected by John XXII., and in 1317 sent to the universities, where they were treated under the name of Constitutiones Clementine; but with the Clementines the official collections of papal decretals stopped. The battered authority of the Pope, and the steadily increasing discrepancy between the papal see on the one side, and the secular power and the national churches on the other side, gave the papal legislation an entirely new character, and made the success of such an undertaking as an official collection of decretals more than problematic. The law-collections already in existence, the Decretum Gratiani, the Compilatio Gregorii, the Liber Sextus, the Clementines, and two compilations of Extravagantes by Chappuis, were held together as the Corpus Juris Canonici (Vitalis de Thebes and Jean Chappuis, Paris, fifteenth century, most correct edition by A. L. Richter, Leipzig, 1839, 2 vols.); but any attempt at further development failed. The Liber Septimus published by Petrus Matthæus at Lyons, 1590, was never authorized; and the Liber Septimus, which resulted from the labors of a committee appointed by Gregory XIII., was withdrawn in 1598. Chronological collections of the papal bulls, the so-called Bullaria, took the place of the systematized compilations of papal decretals; and the authority of the Corpus Juris Canonici itself became a question of the Concordats.

CANONICAL HOURS, certain portions of time set apart for the performance of prayer and devotion. In their fully-developed arrangement they are seven: prime, about six A.M.; terce, about nine A.M.; sext, about noon; nones, about three P.M.; vespers, about sunset; compline, about bedtime; nocturns, matins, or lauds, at midnight. The book which contains the prayers, psalms, hymns, canticles, scripture-lessons, and patristic readings, used according to fixed rule on these occasions, is called a "Breviary" (see title), and the separate services themselves, "Hours." These services came up very early, but the exact time is uncertain. The apostolic church observed, very likely, the Jewish custom of praying three times daily, — at the third, sixth, and ninth hour (Ps. lv. 17; Dan. vi. 10; cf. Acts ii. 15, iii. 1, x. 30). Clement of Alexandria (second century), Tertullian (third century), and Jerome (fourth century), all speak of these three hours as the usual times of prayer. In the third century a morning (matins) and an evening (vespers) hour were added by some, making five hours; and the innovation was at last universally accepted. In the fourth century the zeal of the Psalmist, "seven times a day do I praise thee" (Ps. cxix. 164), was held up for Christian imitation by Ambrose, Augustine, and Hilary; but Cassian (424) claimed to have been the first to have instituted the rule.

Various grounds have been stated for observing these hours. Thus for prime, Cassian gives the practical reason that it prevents the comparative idleness and sloth which the long interval between matin lauds and terce entailed. "The third (terce), sixth (sext), and ninth (nones) hours were thought to have been selected in honor of the Holy Trinity." Other reasons were given: thus Cyprian says, "The Holy Ghost descended on the disciples on the third hour" (terce); and, for sext, St. Peter, "at the sixth hour went up to the housetop; again, "The Lord was crucified at the sixth hour;" for nonas, "At the ninth hour Christ washed away our sins with blood." For vespers, he says, "When at the departure of the sun . . . we pray . . . we are praying for the coming of Christ, who will give the grace of everlasting light." For compline, the manifest propriety of prayer before resigning one's self to the "elder brother of death" would be a sufficient reason. "Nocturns originated in the pious custom of prayer when one awoke in the night." Matins, or lauds, were later united with nocturns. The services used at the canonical hours are manifestly appropriate only to monasteries, although all Christians might with advantage observe these set times of prayer.

In England the hours from eight to twelve in the forenoon are also called "Canonical Hours," before or after which marriages cannot legally be solemnized in any parish church without a license. See the exhaustive article by Mr. Scudamore, "Hours of Prayer," in Smith and Cheetham's Dict. Christ. Antiq., vol. i. pp. 792-799.

CANONIZATION is the ceremonial act by which one previously beatified is put down on the roll or canon of saints, as entitled to the worship of the Church. The most proper way in which to arrive at such an honor seems to be a papal verdict; and cases very early occur in which the Pope confirmed a beatification or canonization which had taken place independently of him. As an exclusive right, however, the papal see did not claim canonization until the time of Alexander III. (1181); and, as the bishops continued to beatify and canonize in their dioceses, Urban VIII. issued (1625 and 1634) new and more emphatic bulls, presenting in detail the whole manner of proceeding. When it could be proved with valid testimonies that a person had led a holy life, and worked miracles, a motion for his beatification could be made in the following manner: fifty years after his death, the bishop of the place should appoint a committee, which had to carry the case, first before the Congregatio Rituum, then before the cardinals, and finally before a consistory presided over by the Pope himself. The act of beatification always took place in the Basilica Vaticana (see the bull by Benedict XIV. of Nov. 23, 1741, in Bullar. Magnum, Tom. XVI.); and the beatus was entitled to be commemorated in the canon missæ, to have altars erected in his honor, to have his remains publicly exhibited, etc. If miracles continued to be wrought, a new and still more rigid investigation was instituted, and in due time the canonization followed. This act, too, took place in the Basilica Vaticana; and the sanctus was entitled to the invocation and adoration of the whole Church, — beatorum cultus fidelibus permittitur, canonizatorum autem precipitur.

CANONS REGULAR, members of monastic orders, lived under some rule, but not with monastic strictness.

CANSTEIN, Karl Hildebrand, Baron Von, b. Aug. 4, 1667, at Lindenberg in Brandenburg; d. in Berlin, Aug. 19, 1719; studied law in Frankfurt-on-the-Oder; travelled, and served for a short time in the Prussian army, but retired then into private life, and devoted himself wholly to religious studies and philanthropical undertakings. He wrote a Harmonie der vier Evangelisten, 1718, and a Life of Spener, who was an intimate friend of his; and in 1712 he founded in Halle the Cansteinsche Bibelanstalt, which was able to sell the New Testament for two groschen, and the whole Bible for six, and which, up to 1876, had sold 4,383,285 Bibles and 1,337,058 New Testaments. His life was written by Lange, 1740, as a supplement to his Life of Spener, and by C. H. Chr. Plath, Halle, 1861. The history of the Bible institution was written by Oswald Bertram, Halle, 1863.

CANTERBURY, the Anglo-Saxon Cantuarabyrig, the Roman Durovernum, became the metropolitan see of the English Church, when Augustine and his fellow-missionaries were settled there in 596 by King Ethelbert, who gave them an old Roman church and his own palace. The church was entirely rebuilt by Lanfranc (1070), much enlarged by Anselm, and again enlarged by its restoration after the fire in 1172. The nave was rebuilt in the course of the fifteenth century, and the central tower was not finished until 1500. The building is five hundred and forty-five feet long, and a hundred and fifty-six feet broad at the eastern transept, and is one of the largest and most magnificent cathedrals in England. Its brightest days it saw in the century following after the murder of Thomas Becket (1170), whose shrine, placed in a special chapel, was immensely wealthy, and attracted thousands of pilgrims every year, not only from England, but also from the Continent, until the commissioners of Henry VIII. destroyed the shrine, and cleared the chapel (1538).

Our word "canter" is a contraction of "Canterbury gallop," and therefore a reminder of the Canterbury pilgrimages, and the easy pace at which they were performed; for they were quite as much excursions as religious exercises. Chaucer (1328-1400), in his Canterbury Tales, has given us an "admirable picture of such pilgrimages, with the manners and behavior of a party of pilgrims, leisurely enjoying the journey, and telling stories to each other on the road."

The Archbishop of Canterbury, who is the primate of all England and metropolitan, does not live in Canterbury, but in Lambeth Palace, London. The cathedral staff consists of a dean, six canons, twenty-four honorary canons, an auditor, six preachers, four minor canons, and subordinate officers. The crypt of the cathedral is a church founded by Queen Elizabeth for French Protestant refugees, and still used by a small French congregation. The ecclesiastical remains in the town are very interesting, including those of the first friary of the Dominicans in England, and of the church in which Ethelbert was baptized. See STANLEY: Memorials of Canterbury, 6th ed., 1872.

CANTHARUS, a well, or cistern, or fountain, or simply a vessel for water, in the centre of the atrium just in front of the entrance of the ancient basilica, used by the faithful for the ablution of hands and face before entering the church building.

CANTICLES, or SONG OF SOLOMON, called in Hebrew, שִׁיר הַשִּׁירִים, Song of Songs; i.e., the most beautiful of songs: so in Greek, ᾠδα ἀγαθή, and Latin, Canticum Canticorum. The book is plainly a love-song; and the difficulty of its interpretation arises from its unique position in Hebrew literature: we have no other examples with which to compare it. But is the love immortalized merely carnal, or is it spiritual? Does the poem find its end in the earthly, or is it rather an allegory, setting forth the heavenly in the garb of the earthly? It is the task of the critic to explain first of all the peculiar phraseology, and then decide whether it compels or can bear a deeper meaning.

The poem is a unit. The persons throughout are King Solomon, his rustic Beloved, and the Daughters of Jerusalem. The same phrases repeatedly recur, cf. ii. 7, iii. 5, v. 8, viii. 4; iii. 6, vi. 10, viii. 5; ii. 17, iv. 6, viii. 14; ii. 6, viii. 3; i. 2, iv. 10; ii. 5, v. 8, etc. Many parts are manifest parallels; e.g., ii. 8 sqq., iii. 1 sqq., and v. 2 sqq. Canticles is a lyrical drama, yet not intended for presentation on a stage so much as for recitation: Ps. ii. and xxiv. are examples of similar use of dialogue in poetry. According to the traditional view, Solomon celebrates his marriage with the Shulamite; while, according to the modern and now prevalent view (the Shepherd Theory), he celebrates rather the constancy of the country maiden, who, unmoved by the blandishments of the great king, persists in her love for an humble shepherd, until the king gives his consent to the match, and retires from the field. These two interpretations of course lead to wholly different allotments of the speeches.

(1) The Shepherd Theory quotes weighty names in its defence. It is the theory of Ewald, who thus analyzes the Song: Solomon and his suite once found in a "garden of nuts" (vi. 11) near the village of Shulem (or Shunem) a most charming and modest girl, whom Solomon attempted to get for his harem, notwithstanding the rough treatment she had received, and her lowly station as keeper of a vineyard (i. 6). These two play together the first scene, wherein it appears that she is in love with a shepherd (i. 7), and will not yield to Solomon's wishes. So the dramatic poem goes on. When Solomon praises her, she responds by praising her beloved swain: she longs for him by day, she seeks him in her dreams at night. The culmination of the action is in Solomon's final efforts to win her favor. He offers to her his throne: as queen he leads her to his capital, but in vain. He tries upon her the magic of his speech (vi. 4 sqq.); but the simple-minded girl is overcome of homesickness, and the embraces of her lover are dearer to her than those of the king. Solomon, finding persuasion useless, magnanimously gives her up; and in the last act we see her walking with her lover upon their native hills. Joy has come to her at last. She has received her reward. The moral of the piece is expressed in viii. 6, 7. Love is inflexible, inextinguishable, unpurchasable; and to this free and faithful love is the victory.

It must be confessed that the above scheme is attractive and plausible; but a careful examination of the Song shows that it is without foundation. Against it decidedly is the passage iii. 6-v. 1 inclusive,—a description of a royal marriage which is happily terminated. Where, then, is the maiden's constancy? In order to carry out his scheme, Ewald was obliged to interpolate two lines between vers. 7 and 8 of chap. iv.,—"Look, my love, look! There he comes! Listen while he speaks to me,"—because there is no indication in the text of any change of speakers. It is also ridiculous to make Solomon step aside while the lovers meet. Again, viii. 11, 12, is plainly a speech of the Shulamite to Solomon. Besides, why may not Solomon be supposed to be the shepherd of the poem? Delitzsch has explained vi. 2 and elsewhere by saying, "The country-life of the maiden, and the delight of Solomon in nature, express themselves in these words, and prove by their spiritual beauty that the romantic girl saw in the lover a plain shepherd, not a king, and as such loved him, and pictured herself as sharing with him her accustomed simplicity; in which fancies the king humored her." It is noteworthy that the poem contains no word of complaint, but that Solomon's tender tones are echoed by the Shulamite—facts which are against the Shepherd Theory.

(2) The Traditional Theory. The poem consists of confessions of reciprocal love between Solomon and the Shulamite. We divide it into five acts: I. The first meeting of the lovers (i. 2-ii. 7); II. Their reciprocal longing and searching (ii. 8-iii. 5); III. The marriage in the capital (iii. 6-v. 1); IV. New seekings and findings of the lovers (v. 2-viii. 4); V. Sealing of the bond, and its meaning (viii. 5-14). The scene of the first act (i. 2-ii. 7) is a country-seat of the king's, near the home of the fair Shulamite. The pair meet; and the maiden is at sight so enamoured of Solomon, that she permits herself to be led to his garden-house, where she receives a garland from the court ladies. The king is also at once smitten, and the pair express their mutual regard. In the second act (ii. 8-iii. 5) the lover seeks his love, and finds her at home. She seeks him at night upon the streets of the city, and, finding him, expresses her delight with the same words used in the first act. The latter scene is manifestly not adapted to representation. In the third act (iii. 6-v. 1) the wedding march and songs are heard. The fourth act (v. 2-viii. 4) concerns incidents of the wedding festivities. In the closing scene one of the brothers of the bride appears, and invites her to go home with him. In the fifth act (viii. 5-14) this request is granted: Solomon and the Shulamite revisit the scene of their first meeting. Her brothers are suitably rewarded for their care of their sister. With Solomon's request of the bride to sing, and her counter-request that he should show his agility, the joyous, lively Song closes.

The book is a story of conjugal love, of its anxieties and rewards, and as such it deserved a place in the canon. Because of its purity and mystery, writers in other parts of the Bible use it as an image of the holiest desires. And the poem owed its canonical position likewise to the peculiar dignity of the king of whom it spoke; for Solomon was for his time, as David had been for his, the anointed of the Lord, the Messiah, the vicegerent of the unseen King (Ps. ii. 7, xlv. 7 sq., cx. 1). When, therefore, the king, seeking a purer, holier love than he found in his harem, condescended to raise a simple maiden of the people to a place by his side, because she realized to him the very love he sought, what was this but a picture of the Messianic marriage of which Ps. xlv. sings,—a culmination-point of the visible kingdom of God, at that time thought to be on earth? According to this hypothesis, there is no difficulty about the Solomonic origin of the poem, nor about its representation of literal facts. Yet it may be of different authorship and occasion, as the peculiarity of a few words may indicate. (The Shepherd Theory renders a Solomonic origin improbable.) The majority of the recent critics assign it to a time shortly after the disruption (950-946 B.C.), and maintain it was a popular protest against the luxury of the court of the Northern Kingdom.

In later Hebrew literature there are numerous references to it (cf. Cant. iv. 12, 15, and Prov. v. 15 sqq.; v. 6, Prov. i. 28; vi. 9, Prov. xxxi. 28; vii. 10, Prov. xxiii. 31; vii. 7, Prov. vi. 30). Questionable is the use in Jeremiah (xxii. 24), in Haggai (ii. 23; cf. Cant. viii. 6), and the reference in Isaiah (v. 1); but Hosea appears to have known Canticles, and borrowed much from it. That references to it are not common in the prophetic writings is proof that it was not a people's book, but rather artistic and esoteric. It was, however, admitted into the canon, and declared by Rabbi Akiba to be so valuable, that the whole world was not worth as much as the day on which it was given to Israel. Yet a mystery was made of it: no one under thirty years old was allowed to read it (thus putting it in the same category with the history of creation and Ezekiel), on the ground that it could be licentiously interpreted (see Fürst, Der Kanon des A. T. nach den Überlieferungen im Talmud und Midrasch, Leipzig, 1868). It was interpreted as an allegory epitomizing the whole theocratic history of Israel. This is the view of it taken in the commentaries of Rashi and Aben Ezra. But Maimonides, in Moreh Nevachim, substitutes for this historico-allegorical theory an allegorico-mythical one, rejects the continuity of the Song's action, and wins from some of its parts instruction on the soul's relationship to God.

The Christian Church, under the lead of Origen, likewise regarded it as an allegory, in which the Bride was the Church, the lover was Christ; and Theodore of Mopsuestia was anathematized for interpreting it of earthly love. In the middle ages the allegory was supposed to relate to the intercourse between Christ and the individual soul. So Bernard of Clairvaux, in his famous eighty-six sermons on this book (down to iii. 1). The reformers adopted the allegorical interpretation. Coming down to later times, Grotius considered it a nuptial song for Solomon and the daughter of Pharaoh; so others, erotically. Herder was enamoured of its beauty, and distributed it into "separate voices, accordant only in the breath of love." So the Protestant interpreters differ: some are literalists, and others allegorists; some hold to the unity, others to the collective nature, of the Song. The author maintains that the theme is conjugal love, pure and sweet.

CANTOR (singer), an ecclesiastical order of the ancient church, instituted in the fourth century. It is mentioned in the Apostolical Constitutions; and the Council of Laodicea (365) forbids anybody to sing in the churches, but the cantors. The ordination could be performed by a presbyter, and imposition of hands was not a part of it.

CANUS, Melchior, b. at Tarancon, Spain, 1523; d. at Toledo, 1560; entered the order of the Dominicans; studied at Salamanca; was professor of theology at Alcalá and Salamanca, Bishop of the Canaries, and provincial of his order. His principal works are De Penitentia, De Sacramentis, and Loci Theologici; which last work occupies a prominent place in the history of Roman-Catholic dogmatics. His works appeared at Cologne, 1605, and at Lyon, 1704.

CAPERNAUM (the village of Nahum, not to be connected with the prophet) is not mentioned outside of the Gospels, perhaps was not built till after the exile, but is called Christ's "own city" (Matt. ix. 1), and was the scene of many of his mighty acts. See Matt. viii. 5-14, ix. 2, xvii. 24; John vi. 17-59, iv. 46, etc. It is plain from the Gospels that it was, (1) in Galilee (Luke iv. 31); (2) on the lake (Matt. iv. 13; John vi. 17-24); (3) the seat of a collector and of a garrison (Matt. viii. 5), perhaps of a custom-house (Matt. xvii. 24; Mark ii. 1, 14; Luke v. 27, cf. Matt. ix. 1, 9); (4) noted for its synagogue built by a Roman centurion (Luke vii. 1, 5); (5) joined with Chorazin and Bethsaida in the denunciations of Jesus, and its destruction predicted (Matt. xi. 20-23; Luke x. 13-15). It has been inferred that it was in the land of Gennesaret; but this is not certain (cf. Matt. xiv. 34; John vi. 16, 17, 24, 25). The indications are, that the city was on the west side of the lake, and near its northern end. Constantine built there a church upon the site of Peter's house. We find references to the place in the thirteenth century, but to-day its very site is in dispute. The expression, "On the borders of Zebulun and Naphtali" (Matt. iv. 13), does not help us any, because it is uncertain where these borders were. Two places, only about three miles apart, lay claim to be Capernaum, — Khan Minyeh, on the northern end of the plain of Gennesaret; and Tell Hum, a ruin near the lake, about two miles south-west of where the River Jordan enters the lake, — and biblical geographers are much divided between them; the claims of other places, such as 'Ain Mudawarah, meeting now with no support. The arguments for and against each place are as follows: 1. Tell Hum is well located for a custom-house and garrison, since it was on the border of Philip's tetrarchy. But Khan Minyeh was on the Roman highway to Damascus: whether it ran by Tell Hum in Christ's day is very doubtful. Khan Minyeh is surely much more accessible, and therefore more likely to get trade. To reach Tell Hum one must follow a narrow path (anciently a conduit) cut in the rock at some height above the lake. 2. When it is said (Mark vi. 32, 33; cf. Matt. xiv. 13; Luke ix. 10) that the people walked around the head of the lake while Jesus went across in a boat, but yet they arrived first, it does not necessarily follow that Capernaum was far to the north, because no mention is made of it as the point of departure.

Nor is it proven that Capernaum belonged to Gennesaret, because Mark (vi. 53) says, that, on the return journey, Jesus came to Gennesaret; and John (vi. 24), that the people found him at Capernaum. 3. Josephus (Life, 72) relates, that when wounded, near the entrance of the Jordan into the lake, he was carried into a village named Capernaum, or Kepharnome, which apparently was the nearest; i. e., Tell Hum. But, as Josephus does not say that Capernaum was the nearest village, it might just as well have been a little farther off; and the passage is not conclusive. In the only other passage in which Josephus mentions Capernaum (War, III. 10, 8), it is not the name of a place, but of a "most fertile fountain" by which Gennesaret was watered. This is probably the 'Ain et Tabighah, the fountain from which, by means of an aqueduct along the seashore, the water was carried to the northern part of the plain. It is only about two miles from Tell Hum, and a mile from Khan Minyeh: by the latter place itself flows 'Ain et Tin ("the Fountain of the Fig-tree"), which, however, falls into the sea a few hundred steps off; southward is the Round Fountain, 'Ain Mudawarah, in which, as in Josephus' Kapharnaum, the Nile fish coracinus, or catfish, is found. [Lieut. Kitchener remarks that 'Ain et Tabighah is too muddy, and too much overgrown with weeds, to allow the coracinus to be seen; for they always remain at the bottom of the water.] 4. The statement of Theodorus (c. 530), that Capernaum was twice as far from Magdala as the latter from Tiberias, and that of Arculfus (c. 670), that he had seen Capernaum lying from west to east, between the sea on the south, and the mountain on the north, agree best with Tell Hum, which lies upon a point of the shore projecting into the lake. But later tradition is of small account either way. 5. Robinson interprets Tell Hum "hill of the camel-herd," which is very questionable. But to compare Hum with Nahum [the mound or ruin of Nahum] is equally so. The Jewish tradition connects it with R. Tanchum. 6. Tell Hum is, at all events, one of the most important ruins in Palestine, a half-mile long, a quarter-mile broad, embracing that of a synagogue about seventy-five feet long by fifty-eight feet wide; its walls built of hard limestone, resting on basaltic rock.

FR. W. SCHULTZ.

[If Tell Hum be Capernaum, then this is probably the synagogue built by the pious centurion, and in which Jesus taught (Luke vii. 5; Mark i. 21). The walls of many private houses can be traced, and two tombs have been found. But there are ruins at Khan Minyeh also, according to Lieut. Kitchener, under the present surface of the ground. This review of the arguments shows that there is much to be said on both sides. The claims of Khan Minyeh are supported by Robinson (1852), Macgregor (1864), Sepp (1867), Porter (1875), Kiepert, and by Lieut. Kitchener and Selah Merrill (1877), representatives respectively of the British and American Exploration Societies; while those of Tell Hum are maintained by Dr. John Wilson (1847), Dr. W. M. Thomson (1859), Hepworth Dixon (1864), Dean Stanley (1871), Capt. (now Lieutenant-Colonel) Wilson (1871), Ritter, Delitzsch, Socin, in Bædeker's Syria and Palestine, Schaff, and others. The strongest argument for Khan Minyeh, or the Khurbet Minyeh of Lieut. Kitchener, is the geographical: it is near the shore, in the land of Gennesaret (if Gennesaret be el-Ghuweir), and is well located for a custom-house, on the highway from Jerusalem to Damascus. For Tell Hum there is the similarity of name, and the extensive ruins. Dr. Robinson explains their absence from Khan Minyeh on the ground that Tiberias may have been built with them; but Tiberias was already built (A. D. 20) while Capernaum was flourishing; and, besides, so complete a demolition as the conjecture necessitates is not easily effected. If Tell Hum be Capernaum, then Kerazeh, two miles northward, is Chorazin. This is, upon the whole, the most probable view. But see CHORAZIN.

CAPHTOR, the original home of the Caphtorim, or Philistines (Deut. ii. 23; Jer. xlvii. 4; Amos ix. 7), either an island, as Jeremiah calls it, or a coast country. Various identifications have been proposed. 1. Cappadocia, favored by the old versions because of similarity of sound; but Cappadocia was originally Catpatuk, and so the similarity vanishes. 2. Cyprus, but in the Old Testament the island is called Chittim. 3. Crete; the generally received identification, supported by Amos ix. 7: the Philistines are said to have been brought from Caphtor as the Israelites from Egypt; but the Philistines are called Cherethites, cf. 1 Sam. xxx. 14, 16; Ezek. xxv. 16; Zeph. ii. 5; but the latter are Cretans, as the Septuagint calls them. The objection that Gen. x. 13, 14 (cf. 1 Chron. i. 12) makes the Caphtorim to come from the Egyptians is thus explained: the Cashim were the inhabitants of Cassiotis; colonists from Crete or Caphtorim settled there, were counted Egyptians, and then went to Palestine, where they were joined by their countrymen direct from Crete. 4. The Phœnician colony on the coasts of the Nile delta, because Egypt, Aiguptos = Aia guptos = Ai Kaphtor (Heb.) = coast-land of Phœnicia, for Caphtor = Kaftur = Great Phœnicia. But these etymologies are not undoubted. [It is improbable that at the earliest times a tribe moved from an island to the mainland: hence these "island" identifications are unlikely, while the last is likely]. See J. G. MÜLLER: Die Semiten, Gotha, 1872; STARK: Gaza. RÜETSCH.

CAPISTRANUS (Giovanni di Capistrano), b. at Capistrano in the Abruzzi, June 23, 1385; d. at Villach, Carinthia, Oct. 23, 1456; studied law, and entered the service of the King of Sicily, but gave up this career in 1415, and became a monk of the Franciscan order. He was one of the greatest preachers of that time, and distinguished himself by the zeal and the success with which he worked against the Fraticelli. In 1450 he was sent to Germany to counteract the Hussites. In this mission he partially failed; but, after the fall of Constantinople, he succeeded in rousing once more the crusading enthusiasm of the people. He led personally an army of crusaders to the support of Johannes Corvinus, and he contributed much to the signal defeat of the Turks at Belgrade.

CAPITO, Wolfgang, b. at Hagenau, Alsace, 1478; d. at Strassburg, 1541; studied at Freiburg, first medicine, then law, and finally theology; became preacher at Bruchsal, 1511, and at Basel, 1513; removed in 1519 to Mayence, where he lived in great intimacy with the archbishop, Albrecht; but, carried away by the Reformation, he left Mayence in 1523, and settled at Strassburg, where he became one of the most prominent leaders of the reformatory movement. He is the real author of the Confessio Tetrapolitana. At the synod of Bern, 1532, he played a conspicuous part; and his moderating and conciliatory influence was also felt in the Peasant War and the Anabaptist disturbances. A list of his writings is found in BAUM: Capito und Butzer, Strassburg, 1860.

CAPITULARIES. The various nations of which the Frankish Empire was composed had each its own law, according to which the people lived, also when it left its native territory. But, besides these national laws, there was also a general imperial law, valid not only for the individual, but also for the territory. In the Merovingian time the names of decretam, decretio, constitutum, editum, auctoritas, pactio, were given to such general imperial prescriptions; but during the Carolingian time capitularies—from capitula, because the edict was divided into chapters—came into general use, and it has afterwards been extended also to laws of an earlier date. The language was Latin, but the text was accompanied with translations for the provinces. As the Frankish kings exercised a legislative authority also in the affairs of the Church, many capitularies have a direct ecclesiastical bearing; and special collections of ecclesiastical capitularies were made at an early date, for instance, by Ansegisus, 827. Of the original copies of the capitularies, only a few fragments are still extant; but from the archives of monasteries and chapters the text of a great number of capitularies is well ascertained. The best edition of them is found in vol. III. and IV. of PERTZ: Mon. Hist. Germ., Hanover, 1835-37. See STORBE: Geschichte der deutschen Rechtsquellen, Part I., p. 209, where older editions are noticed; A. CAPPADO'CIA, the largest and most easterly province of Asia Minor. On the north was Pontus; on the east, the Euphrates, beyond which were Armenia and Mesopotamia; on the south, Syria and Cilicia; and on the west, Galatia. It was high table-land, intersected by ranges of mountains sparsely wooded, but fitted for grain or grazing. It was conquered by Cyrus, ruled by Alexander the Great. Made a tributary by the Seleucide, it became a Roman province A. D. 17. Some Cappadocian Jews were in Jerusalem on the Day of Pentecost (Acts ii. 9); and Christians of the province are specially addressed by Peter (1 Pet. i. 1).

CAPPEL, Jacques (Jacobus Cappellus), b. at Rennes, 1570; d. at Sedan, 1624; descended from a family which has given to France many excellent men, and was educated in the Reformed Church. In 1599 he became professor of Hebrew at Sedan, and in 1610 professor of theology. A list of his numerous works is given as an appendix to the sketch, De Cappellorum Gente, which is printed as an introductory to Ludovici Cappelli Commentarii et Notæ Criticæ in Vetus Testamentum, Amsterdam, 1689; and his Observationes in Selecta Pentateuchi Loca, in Josuam, Judices, etc., are contained in the same volume. His Historia Sacra appeared at Sedan, 1612. Many of his works are not printed.

CAPPEL, Louis (Ludovicus Cappellus), a younger brother of the preceding; b. at St. Élier, a village near Sedan, Oct. 15 or 16, 1585; d. at Saumur, June 18, 1658; studied theology at Sedan, and acted for some time as tutor to the daughters of the Duke of Bouillon; received a stipend from the Reformed Church of Bourdeaux, and travelled for four years in England, Holland, Germany, and Switzerland; was appointed professor of Hebrew in the Academy of Saumur in 1618, and professor of theology in 1633. He was a man of vast learning; but the subject on which he specially concentrated his energy was the history of the text of the Old Testament, on which he wrote Arcanum Punctuationis Revelatum, Amsterdam, 1624; Critica Sacra, Paris, 1650; and Diatriba de Veris et Antiquis Hebræorum Literis, Amsterdam, 1645. By these works, advocating the comparatively recent introduction of the vowel-points in Hebrew writing, he seemed to shake the authority of the Scriptures as the inspired regula et novum fidei, and they met with great opposition in the Protestant world. The first was vehemently attacked by Buxtorf, which attack called forth the Vindiciæ Arcani Punctuationis; but this answer was not published until 1689, by his son, in Ludovici Cappelli Commentarii et Notæ Criticæ in V. Test. The Critica Sacra was finished in 1634; but such strong objections were made to it by the author's friends, both in Geneva, Leyden, and Sedan, that its publication was postponed for sixteen years. It was severely criticised, and the author wrote thrice in defence of it, — Justa Defensio adversus Injustum Censorem; De Critica, 1651; and De eadem illa Critica, 1652. The opposition at last became so strong, that the first propositions of the Formula Consensus Helvetica, are pointed directly against Cappellus. But after the lapse of half a century, the results of his investigations were universally accepted. A complete list of his works, printed and unprinted, is given in the above-mentioned Comment. et Nota in V. Test., Amsterdam, 1689. CAPTIVITY OF THE JEWS. This term is used in a narrow sense to express the "seventy years" between the first invasion of Judæa by Nebuchadnezzar and the permission for the return, given by Cyrus B.C. 605–536. But in its widest sense it may be taken to include the different times when the Jews came under the power of their foes. Six such times of partial and transient captivity, however, are recorded in Judges: 1. By Chushan-rishathaim, King of Aram-naharaim, i.e., Mesopotamia, during eight years (iii. 8); 2. Eglon, King of Moab, during eighteen years (iii. 14); 3. Jabin, King of Hazor, during twenty years (iv. 3); 4. the Midianites during seven years (vi. 1); 5. the Ammonites during eighteen years (x. 8); 6. the Philistines during forty years (xiii. 1). The chronology of this period of the Judges being very uncertain, we cannot tell whether any two of these captivities were synchronous, or whether they followed each other in time, as they do in the record.

Captivity in the strict sense first fell upon the Northern Kingdom; for after Pul, B.C. 762 (2 Kings xv. 19), Tiglath-pileser, B.C. 740 (xv. 29), King of Assyria, made war upon Israel, and carried members of the tribes of Reuben, Gad, and Manasseh, with a few of other tribes, into his land. The residue remained under their own king, but paid tribute to the Assyrian Government. After the lapse of some twenty years, this tribute was refused: therefore Shalmanezar "went up to Samaria, and besieged it three years," or rather, two according to our reckoning. It was finally taken by the "King of Assyria," probably his successor, Sargon (B.C. 721), who carried away the mass of the population beyond the Euphrates (xvii. 6). — The kingdom of Judah, as was inevitable, fell next under the great world-power, Assyria. In the fourteenth year of Hezekiah (B.C. 713), Sennacherib took all the fenced cities of Judah, and was prevented from taking Jerusalem only by the large tribute sent him (xviii. 13–16). His next attempt upon the city occurred a few years later. He sent an army against Jerusalem, and sowed upon the very eve of success, when God slew one hundred and eighty thousand of his army, and thus prevented any attack (xviii. 17, xix. 35). One hundred years of comparative quiet passed; and then Nebuchadnezzar, King of Babylon, began his depredations (B.C. 605). At first he carried away only a few; but among them were Daniel and his companions (xxiv. 1; Dan. i. 1–4). In B.C. 598 he came again, and took away ten thousand (2 Kings xxiv. 10–16). The seventy-years' captivity, in the ecclesiastical sense, began in B.C. 588, when, for the fourth time, Nebuchadnezzar invaded Judæa, and took Jerusalem after a siege of eighteen months, whose horrors are graphically depicted in Jeremiah's Lamentations. The King, Zedekiah, and his people, were transported to Babylon, the city was burnt, and the walls broken down (xxv. 1–21). The "seventy-years' captivity," in the civil sense, came to an end when Cyrus allowed the Jews to return (B.C. 536); in an ecclesiastical sense, not until the temple was rebuilt (B.C. 517). The first company went under Zerubbabel (Ez. ii. 2); a second under Ezra (B.C. 458); and a third under Nehemiah (B.C. 445). Those who remained in Assyria, or who were afterwards scattered over the Roman Empire, were known as "The Dispersion" (John vii. 35; 1 Pet. i. 1; Jas. i. 1). They were the soil for the gospel seed. See DISPERSED.

The Jews themselves commonly reckon four national captivities, — the Babylonian, the Median, the Grecian, and the Roman. The Babylonian has been already described; the Median (Medo-Persian) was from Darius the Mede to Darius Codomanus (B.C. 536-332); the Grecian, from the entrance of Alexander the Great into Jerusalem to the insurrection of the Hebrews under the Maccabees (B.C. 332-167); and the Roman, from B.C. 63. From A.D. 7 to 68 there were thirteen Roman procurators in Judæa. In A.D. 70 the Jews lost every thing: their temple was destroyed, and they were driven from their land. In a sense they are still in their Roman captivity.

CAPUCHINS. A Minorite of the Observantine Convent of Montefalconi, Matteo di Basio, heard, of a brother-monk, that the capuchin (hood) which St. Francis had used was of quite a different shape from that which afterwards his followers, the Franciscan monks, adopted. He was much struck by this discovery, left his monastery immediately, appeared in Rome before Pope Clement VII., and obtained (in 1526) permission of him to put on a pyramidal capuche, to wear a long beard, to live as a hermit, and to preach wherever he liked, on the condition that he should report once every year at the provincial chapter of the Observants. But enthusiasm is contagious. Shortly after, another Observantine monk, Ludovico di Frossombone, became enamoured with the genuine capuche, the long beard, and the literal observation of the rules of St. Francis; and, together with his brother Raffaello, he repaired to Rome, where he received by a breve the same permission as Matteo had received orally. The three enthusiasts now joined fortunes, and found protection against the Observants with the Duke of Camerino. By a bull of July 18, 1528, Clement VII. confirmed them as a separate congregation (Fratres Minores Capuzini), entirely independent of the Conventuals. They should have only a vicar-general, and he should be confirmed by the general of the Conventuals; they should be subject to visitations from the chapter of the Conventuals; when walking in a procession, they should walk under the cross of the Conventuals, and not under a cross of their own, etc. But they were free to display the large pyramidal capuche, and that was to them the great thing. Their first monastery was founded at Colmenzono by the Duchess of Camerino. In 1529 they had already four monasteries, and in the same year Ludovico could convene the first chapter of Capuchins at Alvacina. But in 1543 its vicar-general, Bernardino Ochino, embraced Protestantism. He had left the Observants, and joined the Capuchins in 1534. In 1538 he was made vicar-general of the congregation; and so successful was his administration, that he was re-elected in 1543. But now he left, not only the congregation, but the Church, fled to Geneva, and became an apostate. This was, of course, a fearful blow to the congregation. The Pope thought of dissolving it altogether; and only the most doleful supplications, the most absolute submission to the wish of the Pope, the most complete abnegation of all individual opinions, saved it from death. As soon, however, as it began to recuperate, it showed its sincerity and vigor by developing one of the most extreme types of Latin monasticism. The Reformation acted upon the monks of the Roman Church as a kind of magnetic polarization; and while the Jesuits developed to the highest degree of excellency the positive qualities of the Church,—the unscrupulous energy and cunning intrigue of a consummate casuistry, the Capuchins succeeded in giving perfect expression to its negative qualifications,—its ignorance, its credulity, and its coarse sympathy with the lower instincts of the masses. Originally the congregation was confined to Italy; but in 1573 it invaded France, in 1592 Germany, and in 1606 Spain. In 1619 it obtained its own general, and right to walk in a procession under its own cross. In the latter part of the eighteenth century it was abolished in Germany and in France; and, in the third and fourth decades of the present century, it suffered very much both in Spain and Portugal. In the last decade, however, it seems to be recuperating in all Roman-Catholic countries.

There was also an order of Capuchin nuns founded by Maria Laurentia Louga, who in 1534 took the veil at Naples with nineteen other women. They adopted the third rule of St. Francis, and were placed under the authority of the Theatines. But in 1538 they made a change, adopted the rules of St. Clara, assumed the pyramidal capuche, and came under the authority of the Capuchins. In 1575 they founded a monastery in Rome, and in 1606 one in Paris.

The Annales Sacr. Hist. Ordinis Minorum S. Francisci qui Capucini nuncupantur, by BAVERIUS, Lyons, 1632, is simply an impudent praising-up of the Capuchins at the expense of the Observants, and full of palpable lies. Reliable information is found in HELYOT: Histoire des Ordres Monastiques, Paris, 1714-19; WADDING: Annales Ord. Min., Lyons, 1625. ALBRECHT VOGEL.

CAPUTIATI (capuched), thus called from the hood of their cowl; appeared first in Auvergne (1182), under the leadership of the carpenter Durand, who boasted to have received revelations from the Virgin for the purpose of establishing peace in the Church, and destroying all her enemies. According to other accounts, the ultimate object of these peacemakers was nothing so innocent as peace. At all events, Bishop Hugo of Auxerre marched against them with troops, took them all prisoners, and condemned them to go about a whole year bareheaded, in frost and heat, by cutting the capuche of their cowl.

CARACCIOLI, Galeazzo (Marchese di Vico), b. at Naples in 1517; d. at Geneva, May 7, 1586; descended from one of the wealthiest and most distinguished families of the kingdom of Naples, and entered early on a brilliant career at the Neapolitan court. The reformatory movement, which in this period sprang up almost everywhere in the Roman Church, and which in Naples, under the leadership of the Spaniard Juan de Valdés, early attracted his attention and sympathy, and his acquaintance with Pietro Martire Vermigli, carried him still farther onward in the direction of Protestantism. But in Naples, as in so many other places, an ecclesiastical re-action followed immediately after the reformatory movement; and, though the attempt of introducing the Inquisition in the kingdom failed, the ultramontane re-action soon became so powerful that Caraccioli felt compelled to flee (1551). He settled at Geneva, and became a member of the Protestant-Italian congregation which had existed there since 1542; and he remained there, an exile, and a stranger to his own family, in spite of the exertions which his relatives, and, among them, his uncle, Pope Paul IV., made to induce him to return. His life has been written by BALBINI, preacher to the Italian congregation at Geneva: Historia della Vita di Galeazzo Caraccioli, 1587; new edition, Florence, 1875.

CARCASS. The Hebrews were not alone in thinking that the dead body of any animal, clean or unclean, was defiling. The Parsees, to mention another people, shared the concept; but the Hebrew law contained many regulations upon the subject; and statute gave justification and a religious meaning to the natural repugnance to the presence of death (see particularly Lev. xi.). It was defilement to eat, even of a clean animal which had either died naturally, or been killed by other animals, or to touch it, or to carry the carcass of an unclean animal (Lev. xi. 39, 40). If the touching was accidental, a trespass offering was demanded (Lev. v. 2, 5, 6). Of animals which died naturally, they were forbidden to use more than the fat, but were at liberty to give the carcass to dogs, to the stranger, and to sell it to aliens (Exod. xxii. 31; Deut. xiv. 21); but, if the stranger ate it, he was unclean (Lev. xvii. 15). To refrain from things strangled was one of the requirements laid upon the Gentile Christians by the Council of Jerusalem (Acts xv. 20 sq.) For Talmudical regulations see Tr. Oheloth, I. 5, 6; II. 1.

CARCHE'MISH (Fortress of Chemosh), very probably identical with Circesium, at the juncture of the Khabur (Chebar) and the Euphrates, — one of the cities taken by Pharaoh-Necho shortly after the battle of Megiddo (about B.C. 608), and retaken by Nebuchadnezzar, B.C. 605 (Isa. x. 9; Jer. xlv. 2-12; 2 Chron. xxxv. 20). The Gargamis upon the cuneiform inscriptions is not to be regarded as identical with Carchemish, but rather as describing a city much farther north. SCHRADER: *Keilinschriften u. CARDINAL is the title of the highest dignity in the Roman-Catholic hierarchy, next to that of the Pope. Its origin dates far back in the history of the Church of Rome, though its final definition was not fixed until the middle of the sixteenth century. Each of the dioceses into which that city was divided had its own cathedral, or baptismal church, titulus; and the occupant of such a church was called intitulatus, incardinatus, cardinalis. According to the pontifical of Damasus (384), Pope Marcellus (308) divided Rome into twenty-five tituli. In the same manner the city was divided into charity-wards (an institution which is ascribed to Clement I.), and at the head of each ward stood a diaconus. At the beginning, there were seven such wards; and the seven diaconi also belonged to the presbyteri intitulati. Pope Stephan IV. (771) added the bishops of the suburban dioceses, that is, the suffragans of the archiepiscopal see of Rome, to the class.

The number of cardinals, however, was variable. In the twelfth century it seldom rose above thirty (HURTER: Geschichte Papst Innocenz III., I. 73, note 419); in the thirteenth it once fell to seven. The Council of Basel fixed it at twenty-four (sess. 23, c. 4 decr. de numero et qualitate card.); but in 1516 there were only thirteen cardinals, while under Pius IV. (1559) there were once no less than seventy-six. Sixtus V. finally fixed the number, once for all, at seventy, corresponding to the seventy elders of Israel; so that there should be six cardinal-bishops (Ostia, Porto, Frascati, Sabina, Palastrina, and Albano), fifty cardinal-priests, and fourteen cardinal-deacons. The number, however, was very seldom complete. By a bull of Feb. 15, 1567, Pope Pius V. finally confined the title, which formerly had been applied somewhat vaguely to all priests appointed at a cathedral church, to such among the clergy of the city of Rome as had been "incardinated" by the Pope himself (FERRARIS: Bibliotheca Canonica s. v. Cardinales, Art. I. ser. 6), referring to the old testimony about Rome as the cardo ecclesiarum . . . unde Senatus Cardinalium a cardine novem accepit.

The rights and duties of cardinals depend upon a number of older and more recent constitutions, but especially upon the Ceremoniale Romanum (the Concil. Tridentinum, sess. XXIV. cap. 1 de reform) and the bulls of Sixtus V. A cardinal is "created" by the Pope; and the qualities demanded in a candidate are generally the same as those demanded in a bishop, — the person must have been born in legal wedlock, be possessed of the lower degrees of ordination for at least one year before his elevation, have no progeny, have no relatives of second degrees (according to canonical computation) among the cardinals, etc. The creation takes place in a secret, but is announced in a public, consistory, when the installation with hat, ring, etc., is performed. Until all formalities are gone through, — and they are very multitudinous, and often completely unmeaning even to antiquaries, — the cardinal cannot exercise his rights; for instance, not vote in the conclave, though in this respect the constitution of Eugene IV. (Oct. 26, 1431) and the rescript of Pius V. (Jan. 26, 1571) contradict each other. By the appointment the Pope is obliged to pay some regard to all nations, but the majority of cardinals are always Italians. Of the sixty-seven cardinals in 1850, fifty-one were Italians. In former times the kings had a right of presentation; and cardinals who had been created in that manner were called crown-cardinals. The principal rights of the cardinals are: they alone are eligible to the papal see (Stephan III., 769), and they alone elect the Pope (Nicholas II., 1059); and, on account of this their close connection with the papal dignity, they were allowed by Innocent IV. (1245) to wear the red hat with the pendent tassels, and by Paul II. (1464) to wear a purple robe. Urban VIII. (1630) conferred the title of Eminentissimi upon them, the same as was applied to the prince-electors of the German Empire; and offences against them were considered as crimen læsæ majestatis. Among themselves the cardinal-bishops rank first, then the cardinal-presbyters, and finally the cardinal-deacons. The oldest cardinal-bishop residing in Rome is the dean of the College of Cardinals. See articles on CONCLAVE, CONSISTORY, CURIA, and POPE, and the literature there given. CAREY, William, a Baptist missionary and Orientalist; b. at Paulerspury, Northamptonshire, Eng., Aug. 17, 1761; d. at Serampore, India, June 2, 1834. By baptism a member of the Established Church, he was early in life convinced of the scriptural authority for the Baptist views, and joined this sect, in which he soon became a preacher. His congregations were very poor, and he supported himself and family by shoemaking. But his thirst for knowledge was strong; and he managed, notwithstanding the pressure of poverty, to acquire Latin, Greek, Hebrew, and a goodly amount of other useful learning, especially in natural history and botany. Thus, unknown to himself, he was being prepared for the great career God had planned for him. His attention was turned unto the heathen, and he saw plainly his duty go to them. On Oct. 2, 1792, largely through his exertions, the first Baptist missionary society was founded; and on June 13, 1793, he and his family sailed for India, accompanied by Mr. John Thomas, who had formerly lived in Bengal. On reaching Bengal, Carey and his companion lost all their property in the Hugli; but, having received the charge of an indigo-factory at Malda, he cut off his pecuniary connection with the missionary society, and began in earnest what, instead of regular missionary labor, was to be the work of his life, — the study and translation, both from and into the languages of India. In 1799 the factory was closed; and he went with Thomas to Kidderpore, where he had purchased a small indigo-plantation. Here, joined by Marshman and Ward, he started, under bright hopes, a mission, but soon encountered the opposition of the Indian Government, which forbade the mission's enlargement, and compelled its removal, at a great pecuniary loss, to Serampore, a Danish settlement (1800), where it took a fresh lease of life. For some time Carey and Thomas had been diligently at work upon a version of the New Testament in Bengalee. In 1801 it was published by the press Carey instituted. About the same time the Marquis of Wellesley appointed him professor of Oriental languages in the Fort William College, which the marquis had founded at Calcutta for the instruction of the younger members of the British Indian civil service. Carey held this position for thirty years, and taught Bengalee, Mahratta, and Sanscrit. He wrote articles upon the natural history and botany of India for the Asiatic Society, to which he was elected, 1805, and thus made practical application of tastes cultivated in former years; but this was only a part, and by far the less valuable part, of his work. That which has given him his undying fame was his translations of the Bible, in whole or in part, either alone or with others, into some twenty-four Indian languages. The Serampore press, under his direction, rendered the Bible accessible to more than three hundred million human beings. Besides, he prepared grammars and dictionaries of several tongues; e.g., Mahratta Grammar, 1805; Sanscrit Grammar, 1806; Mahratta Dictionary, 1810; Bengalee Dictionary, 1818; and a Sanscrit dictionary which unhappily was destroyed by a fire in the printing establishment. Later students have discovered errors and omissions in these works; but all honor is due to Carey for "breaking the way," and every inhabitant of India is his debtor. See J. C. MARSHMAN, Life and Times of Carey, Marshman, and Ward, London, 1859, 2 vols.

CARGILL, Donald, one of the leaders of the Scotch Covenanters; b. in the parish of Rattray, Perthshire, 1610; beheaded at Edinburgh, July 27, 1681. He was educated at Aberdeen; and about 1650 he became pastor of the Barony Church, Glasgow. In 1661, when Episcopacy was established in Scotland, he refused to accept his charge from the archbishop, and was banished beyond the Tay; but he did not go. In 1679 he joined Cameron, Douglas, Hamilton, and others in the rebellion against prelacy, which arose out of the "Rutherglen Declaration" of May 29 of that year, and with his fellow-Covenanters endured the defeat of Bothwell Bridge, June 22. He fled to Holland, but soon returned. The next year he and Cameron, with their adherents, drew up the "Sanquhar Declaration," June 22. The government set a price upon the leaders' heads. They were attacked at Ayrsmoss, July 22, and Cameron was slain; but Cargill succeeded to the leadership, and, as if to testify in the most signal manner his abhorrence of the tyrannical persecutors, he publicly excommunicated the king and several of the nobles at a field-preaching held at Torwood in Stirlingshire in September. When the Duke of York, one of the "excommunicated," came to Scotland, the persecution of the followers of Cargill increased. He himself was hunted from place to place; but in June 11, 1681, he was captured between Clydesdale and Lothian, and taken to Edinburgh for trial. He readily confessed that he had done what the council had called treason. The council were equally divided whether to imprison him for life, or to execute him; but the vote of the Duke of Argyle decided in favor of the latter, — a vote which cost Argyle, later on, the support of the Covenanters, to say nothing of deep remorse. Accordingly Cargill was put to death. See HETHERINGTON: Hist. Ch. Scotland, ch. vii. N. Y. (Carter).

CARLSTADT, Andreas Rudolphus Bodenstern, b. probably a couple of years before Luther, at Carlstadt in Franconia, whence his surname; d. of the plague, at Basel, 1541; made his first studies at some Italian university, and came in 1504 to Wittenberg, where in 1513 he was made professor of theology, and archdeacon of the collegiate church. He was well versed in the works of the schoolmen; and all he wrote himself at this period was scholastic in spirit and in form. But, having made a journey to Rome in 1515, he found, on his return, the whole theology of the university changed by Luther. The schoolmen had gone, and the Bible and Augustine had taken their place. His first instinct was haughty resistance; for he was used to consider himself the representative and the honor of the university. But the attempt of resistance failed; and, as failure always made him very meek and submissive, he immediately yielded to the change, and threw himself into the opposite extreme. He became a mystic. Working together with Luther for some time in perfect unison, he even anticipated him in several points, as is shown by his hundred and fifty-two theses of April 26, 1517, De Natura, Lege, et Gratia contra Scholasticos et Communem Naturam. But this reformatory activity brought him in conflict with Dr. Eck; and at the Leipzig disputation, June 27, 1519, he had the great mortification, not only to see himself foiled by the skill and adroitness of his adversary, but also to see Luther step forward with commanding superiority, and usurp the whole attention. The next year (August, 1520) he made the first attack on Luther in his De Canonicis Scripturis, though without mentioning his name.

Carlstadt was, no doubt, sincerely devoted to the cause of the Reformation: but he was vain; he wanted to be the first, the leader, whenever he took a part in anything, and that was just the very position which he was utterly unable to occupy. While Luther was away in Wartburg, Carlstadt found the field free; and by the impetuosity and rashness of his character he carried not only the populace, but also the council and the university, into a most dangerous revolution. Christmas Day, 1521, he celebrated the Lord's Supper in his church, leaving out all the most essential features of the Roman liturgy, — the confession, the consecration of the elements, the elevation of the host, the reservation of the cup for the clergy, etc. Jan. 20, 1522, he married in a most ostentatious way. The destruction of images, the abolition of monasteries, and other sweeping reforms, were in preparation. Meanwhile the students and the mob bombarded the house of the canons with stones, and interrupted the service when it was not in accordance with the latest frenzy; and the whole community was on the very verge of chaos and anarchy. Luther's re-appearance in the city (March 6, 1522) brought back order and quiet; and all the rash and premature reforms were set aside. Carlstadt himself was treated with leniency, even with regard, by Luther; but he felt sick and humiliated. In the spring of 1523 he left Wittenberg, settled on a farm in the neighborhood, put on a peasant's dress, called himself a "new layman," and began to cast about in an unruly and planless manner.

Once more, however, he got an opportunity to show himself as a practical reformer. Towards the end of 1523 he was made pastor of Orlamünde, and he immediately began to repeat his experiment from Wittenberg. But Carlstadt at Orlamünde, and Thomas Münzer at Allstädt, soon became the centres of a wild and uproarious fermentation, which rapidly spread throughout the whole of Thuringia; and in 1524 he was banished from Saxony. Through the interference of Luther he was allowed to return in 1526; but he was kept, under very strict control, apart from all public business, forbidden to write or publish anything. He gained a poor pittance by selling gingerbread and beer. Such an humiliation the proud man could not, of course, bear. In 1528 he fled, and roved about in Holstein, Friesland, and the Rhine regions, until in 1530 he arrived at Strassburg. The controversy between Luther and Zwingli concerning the Lord's Supper he contemplated with unconcealed interest; and he took, of course, the side of Zwingli. He was consequently well received in Strassburg and Zürich; and everybody there was eager to do something for the unhappy man, though no one seemed willing to have him as a co-operator or neighbor. In 1531 he was appointed pastor of Altstätten in the Rhine Valley, and in 1534 professor of theology in Basel. His life has been written by MAYER: Dissertatio de Karolstadtio, Greifswald, 1703; FÜSSLIN: Lebensgeschichte des Andreas Bodelstein von Karlstadt, Frankfurt, 1776; JÄGER: Andreas Bodelstein von Karlstadt, Stuttgart, 1856. A complete list of his works has been given by Rotermund in his Erneuertes Andenken, Bremen, 1818.

ERBKAM.
CARLYLE, Thomas, historian, biographer, and essayist; b. at Ecclefechan, Scotland, Dec. 4, 1795; d. in London, Feb. 5, 1881; buried at Ecclefechan, Feb. 10, though a grave was offered in Westminster Abbey. He was early noted for his extraordinary memory, and for his love of reading. He entered the University of Edinburgh in 1810, and distinguished himself as a mathematician. Having abandoned the study of theology, he taught mathematics in the high school at Annan for two years. In 1816 he was appointed rector of the Burgh School at Kirkealdy. Here he devoted himself to the study of German, and also translated Legendre's Geometry, adding an Introductory Essay on Proportion. He removed to Edinburgh in 1818, and from 1820 to 1823 contributed a number of articles to the Edinburgh Encyclopaedia and the Edinburgh Review. In 1824 he introduced Goethe to English readers by the translation of Wilhelm Meister's Lehrjahre, and in 1825 published the Life of Schiller. He married Jane Welsh in 1826, and removed in 1828 to Craigenputtoch, where he wrote his Critical and Miscellaneous Essays.

Sartor Resartus, a philosophic romance in the form of a treatise on dress, containing his views on the problems of religion and life, was published during 1833-34, in Fraser's Magazine. In 1834 he removed to London, to the house in Cheyne Row, Chelsea, where he resided until his death. In 1837 appeared The French Revolution, the first of his works to which his name was formally attached. In the same year he began lecturing; and, during 1837-43, delivered courses on German Literature, The Periods of European Culture, the Revolutions of Modern Europe, and Heroes and Hero-Worship, besides publishing Chartism, a political treatise, and Past and Present.

One of his most important works, Oliver Cromwell's Letters and Speeches, was issued in 1845, and produced a great revolution of sentiment in favor of Cromwell. In 1840 he inaugurated the movement which resulted in the London Library, of which he was afterwards elected president. During 1848-50 he wrote a number of political and social treatises, notably The Latter Day Pamphlets, the ultimate and most violent expression of his political creed.

The Life of John Sterling, especially valuable as a partial expression of his own religious views, appeared in 1851. His magnum opus, The History of Frederick the Great, was begun in 1858, and finished in 1865. It is a monument of patient industry and minute research, and contains a complete political history of the eighteenth century, but weakened his moral influence by its laudation of a despot, and its assertion and defence of the right of the strongest.

He espoused the Southern side in the American conflict. His unappreciative and contemptuous treatment of the question appeared in The Nigger Question (1850) and The American Iliad in a Nutshell (1863). In 1866 he was chosen rector of the University of Edinburgh, and delivered an inaugural on The Choice of Books. Mrs. Carlyle died during his absence on this occasion (April 21). A few newspaper articles, with Historical Sketches of the Early Kings of Norway, and The Portraits of John Knox, marked the next five years, and completed his literary labors.

Carlyle's life is marked by great unity of purpose and concentration of energy. He lived for literature. With his imaginative genius, his poetic insight, and his opulent diction, he was a poet by constitution; but his lack of the sense of form and proportion, and his impatience of measured expression, made him despise poetry. His few poetical experiments, The Night Molt, The Adieu, To-day, and The Sower's Song, are among the earliest of his literary efforts. He is a preacher and a prophet, rather than an artist. His keen sense of the grotesque, with the real depth of his nature, made him a humorist at once racy, subtle, and satirical; but this element developed itself disproportionately, and ran into cynicism as he grew older.

Notwithstanding the large admixture of ethics and philosophy in his writings, it is well-nigh impossible to define accurately his position as a philosopher, moralist, or religionist. Veracity is the basis of his ethical conceptions, by which he means the disposition to go behind appearances to facts, and the assertion of reality as against mere symbols and conventionalities. His hatred of shams is intense, and often leads him into needless roughness of speech. His ethical ideal is defective from its identification of physical and moral order, of might and right. It is too subjective, lodging the test of right in each man's moral consciousness. Hence his fundamental fallacy, expounded in Hero-Worship, and applied in Frederick,—the reverence for strength, regardless of moral quality. He is a dangerous guide, therefore, as an historian and political philosopher. His conception of history as only the record of the world's great men is radically false. He has no sense of the popular power in the solution of political problems. The moral teaching of his histories is unsound in blinding the reader to vice through the admiration of greatness. The logical outcome of his political philosophy is slavery and despotism. As an historian he is distinguished by exact and laborious attention to detail. He studies folios and pasquinades alike; and no detail of topography, feature, or costume, escapes him. His histories are a series of striking portraits or pictures. He stands committed to no philosophical system. With much talk about the real and practical, his philosophy is intuitional and sentimental, emphasizing feeling above reason.

Theologically he cannot be accurately placed. The Life of Sterling throws most light upon his religious views. He may fairly be regarded as a theist. He is mainly silent on the truth of creeds, always reverential towards Christ, and, while agreeing that Christianity is the supreme religion, denies that it embraces all truth. He seems to hold that responsibility to God is the essential truth foreshadowed in all religions, and that the essence of all religion is to keep conscience alive and shining. He believes in retribution as the natural outcome of wrong. He revered genuine piety, and his own moral life was singularly pure. As a critic he has great knowledge and keen discernment, but is too liable to be swayed by his personal prejudices.

His earlier style, as in the Essays on Burns and Scott, was natural, simple, dignified, and vigorous. His later style is figurative, abrupt, enigmatical, sometimes turgid and involved, inverted, declamatory, and at times coarse, yet withal often beautiful, rich, and powerful, and always picturesque.

CAR'MEL Mount, (park), once the southern boundary of Asher (Josh. xix. 26); later, part of Galilee. At the time of Josephus it belonged to Tyre (War iii. 3, 1). The range runs south-east to north-west, is about twelve miles long. Its highest elevation is 1,740 feet. It is to-day covered with trees and flowers. In its forests animals of all sorts are found. It is a magnificent sight; but the view from it is grander, inasmuch as the ridge divides the Plain of Sharon from the Plain of Jezreel, and projects itself into the Mediterranean Sea. No wonder that to the poets and prophets of the Old Testament it was a symbol of beauty (Song vii. 5; Isa. xxxv. 2, cf. xxxiii. 9; Jer. 1. 19; Amos i. 2; Nah. i. 4). Hidden there during the stormy days of Ahab, lived Elijah; and his cave is yet shown. Somewhere upon its slopes the wondrous contest between Jehovah and Baal took place, and the answering fire proved who was the true God (1 Kings xviii. 20-42). The traditional site is at El Mohraka, i.e., "burnt place," upon the southern slope of the range, a long way from the coast. But this site is too far from the Kishon to meet the requirements of the narrative; and hence Dr. Robinson prefers the south-eastern extremity of the range. The range ends abruptly: a bluff over five hundred feet high juts out into the sea. Here stands the famous Monastery of the Carmelites. The monks show you behind the high altar the grotto of Elijah. But on the range Elijah also dwelt (2 Kings ii. 23, iv. 25); and, indeed, so numerous are the caves in its sides, that there could be no difficulty in finding shelter. When first mentioned, it was a holy mount, a place of concourse (2 Kings iv. 23); and altars of Baal were doubtless erected upon it, which was probably the reason why Elijah selected it as the site of his sacrifice. In later times Pythagoras visited the mountain, attracted by its sanctity. Here Vespasian came, and sacrificed to the divinity of the same name with the mountain, without image or temple, but whose oracle had foretold his elevation to the imperatorship. In the early days of Christianity, there were many hermits in its many caves; and to-day one of the most hopeful facts for Palestine is the little German colony of Haifa, which is at the foot of Carmel, near the sea, and whose labor has made the wilderness to rejoice.

CARMELITES. A certain Berthold came, in the latter part of the twelfth century, to Palestine, on a pilgrimage or crusade, and formed an association of hermits at the Well of Elijah on Mount Carmel. In 1209 the association received its rule of sixteen articles from Albert, Patriarch of Jerusalem; and in 1224 this rule was confirmed by Pope Honorius III. As long as the crusading enthusiasm sent thousands and thousands of people from Europe every year to Palestine, the association of Mount Carmel prospered much; but when this whole movement came to a standstill by the armistice between Frederick II. and the Saracens, the hermits at the Well of Elijah began to feel very lonesome, and in 1238 they removed to more lively places in Cyprus and Sicily. In 1240 they came to England, in 1244 to Southern France, and in 1245 they held their first general chapter at Aylesford in England. In order not to be completely ousted by the Mendicant orders, which just at that period won their greatest triumphs, it was necessary for the Carmelites to follow fashion; and so they did. They changed their rule (1247), their organization, their dress, after the Dominicans and Franciscans. But they had one piece of good luck: they invented the scapulary (1287). The scapulary consists of two stripes of gray cloth, worn on the breast and on the back, and connecting with each other on the shoulders. This innocent piece of dress was brought expressly from heaven by the Virgin herself; and she promised to go on Saturday evenings to purgatory, and relieve all those who wore it. Of course, the scapulary immediately became the rage. Large associations or brotherhoods of the scapulary were formed among laymen, and brought in a more or less loose connection with the order, which earned both fame and influence from this circumstance. As was natural, the success stimulated their ambition. They began to dispute the claims of the Dominicans to the rosary. They brought out the Virgin's House at Loretto as a counterbalance to the Portiuncula Church of the Minorites. They claimed to be the oldest monastic order, the trunk from which other orders had sprung, since they could show an uninterrupted succession of generals from the days of Elijah, who had been one of their generals. They reckoned the Virgin Mary as one of their members, and called themselves Fratres Beatæ Mariæ de Monte Carmelo. They aspired to occupy a position above all other monastic orders, as the true representatives of Monasticism. But then the bubble burst. The Jesuits fell upon them with violence; and Papebroch, the Bollandist, laid out in a most merciless manner the emptiness of their pretensions. The controversy became at once so bitter and so ridiculous, that the Pope had to interfere; and in 1698 Innocent XII. ordered both parties to drop the matter, and keep silent. But the great aspirations of the Carmelites were blasted forever. Other circumstances had also proved unfavorable to their success. An uncommonly great number of independent congregations were formed; and several of them—as, for instance, the congregation of Mantua, founded by Thomas Connecte, who in 1433 was burnt in Rome as a heretic; the Discalceati, or Barefooted Carmelites, founded in the sixteenth century in Spain by Theresia de Jesu; and others—had their own generals. There were at one time four independent Carmelite generals; and all attempts at consolidating the whole order into one body failed. There were also Carmelite nuns. The first monastery was founded in 1452 by Soreth, a general of the order, who was poisoned at Nantes in 1471 by the discontented monks. To this order of nuns belonged the daughters of Louis XV. But in modern times the Carmelites have played no conspicuous part, and the order is at present falling rapidly into decay, without any means of reconstruction. CARNAHAN, James, D.D., LL.D., for thirty-one years president of Princeton College; b. near Carlisle, Penn., Nov. 15, 1775; d. in Newark, N.J., March 2, 1859. In May, 1823, he was chosen president of the College of New Jersey, resigned in 1853, and connection with the institution dissolved June, 1854.

CARNIVAL (a word of uncertain etymology: carni-vale, "farewell to flesh-meat;" carn-acallare, "swallow flesh-meat") denotes the period from the end of the festival of the Epiphany to the end of Shrove-Tuesday. This part of the year is in all Roman-Catholic countries considered a proper season for social enjoyments; and more especially the last seven or ten days are in many cities, particularly in Rome, given up to public merriment. The custom is of Pagan origin. It is the revelry and debauchery of the old Saturnalia and Lupercalia, which have been continued under this form in the Christian world, and nowhere in a more unrestrained manner than in the centre of Christendom,—in Rome. Several popes have tried, if not to repress the custom, at least to restrain its license. Clement XI. issued two apostolical briefs (1719 and 1721), Benedict XIV. an encyclical letter, for this purpose. But other popes, who had a clearer understanding of the economical and political import of the custom, did every thing they could to encourage it. Thus Paul II. issued a decree with very minute provisions with respect to the races of the Corso; and when the Italian people, during its struggle for national unity, instinctively withdrew from these frivolous dissipations, the papal government under Pius IX. was very desirous, and very active, to allure it back on the old track. The Roman Carnival of the present day is a comparatively tame affair.

CAROLINE BOOKS (Libri Carolini, or Opus Caroli). The work originated in the controversies of the eighth century concerning image-worship, the participation of Pope Adrian I. in the second synod of Nicæa (787), and the communication of the acts of this synod by Adrian to Charlemagne and the Frankish Church. Charlemagne, who just at that time felt very much displeased with the Byzantine court and the equivocal policy of the Pope, had the whole matter—the authority of the synod, the orthodoxy of its decrees, etc.—discussed by the theologians of his court, and then forwarded the acts to England to King Offa, who likewise laid them before the bishops of his realm. Alcuin, who at that moment was staying in England, drew up a criticism of the decrees of the synod in the form of a letter, which he delivered personally to Charlemagne in the name of the English princes and bishops. The epistle is lost; but Charlemagne sent an elaborate answer, the so-called Libri Carolini. The work, which is divided into four books and a hundred and twenty chapters, contains a very sharp censure of the synod and its decrees, and establishes a principle, which, on the one side, gives the Christian art full freedom in the representation of Christian ideas, but on the other excludes all superstitious misuses of the merely artistic creation. The Pope received the book with submission and extreme flattery, but declined to recognize its principles. He died, however, shortly after (795); and the synods of Francfort (794) and of Paris (825) took the book as basis for their whole relation to the question of image-worship. The first edition of the Caroline Books was given by Jean du Tillet (Elias Philgra), Paris, 1549; the best by Heumann, Augusti Concilii Nicæni Secundi Censura, Hanover, 1731. See II. I. WAGENMANN.

CARPENTER, Lant, LL.D., an English Unitarian divine and author, b. at Kidderminster, Sept. 2, 1780; drowned between Naples and Leghorn, April 5, 1840. He was intended for the nonconformist ministry; but he joined the Unitarians, and was minister to the church at Exeter, 1805–17, and minister at Bristol, 1817–39. He was made doctor of laws by Glasgow University, 1806. He published numerous works, of which the more important are: Introduction to the Geography of the N.T., 1805; Unitarianism the Doctrine of the Gospels, 1809; An Examination of the Charges made against Unitarians and the Improved Version, by Bishop Magee, Bristol, 1820; A Harmony of the Gospels, 1835, 2d ed., London, 1838; Sermons on Practical Subjects, London, 1840. His son is Dr. W. B. Carpenter, the famous physiologist. His life was written by another son, Rev. Russell Lant Carpenter.

CARPENTER, Mary, philanthropist, b. at Exeter, Eng., 1807; d. at Bristol, June 14, 1877. She was the daughter of the Rev. Dr. Lant Carpenter, mentioned above, and was educated by him. Her life-work, the inspiration to which came in 1833 from the Hindoo reformer Rammohun Roy, was among the criminal class, whom she strove faithfully to raise. To this end she originated the system of reformatory schools for vicious girls. In the drawing-up of the bill which was passed by Parliament in 1854, she was greatly aided by the recorder of Bristol, Matthew Davenport Hill. She was also one of the chief promoters of the Industrial Schools Act, which passed in 1837. So great was her zeal, that she visited India four times between 1866 and 1876, in order to get personal knowledge of the educational and reformatory methods in that country. Her reports were laid before Parliament. In 1871 she established the National Indian Association, and edited its journal. Her noble, unselfish life had its roots in her fervent piety. She wrote much in behalf of her projects, and prepared elaborate reports for various bodies. Besides these she issued, Morning and Evening Meditations, 5th ed., 1868, and Six Months in India, 1867. See J. ESTLIX CARPENTER: The Life and Work of Mary Carpenter, London, 1879, new ed. 1881.

CARPOCRATIANS, a Gnostic sect founded by Carpocrates, who, in the first decade of the second century, developed in Alexandria a monastic system, in which all positive religious and ethical ideas were lost in Pantheism. As the public identified the Carpocratians and the Christians, the wild vagaries and immoral life of the former were often laid at the door of the latter.

CARPZOV is the name of a family of scholars, several of whom were theologians, and occupied a prominent position in the Church. I. Johann Benedikt Carpzov, b. at Rochlitz, June 22, 1607; d. at Leipzig, Oct. 22, 1637; was professor of theology at Leipzig from 1643. His work Isagoge in Libros Eccles. Luther. Symbolicos, 1665, is the starting-point of that branch of theology called "symbolics." Also his Hodegeticum, 1656, played a prominent part in the field of homiletics. As the Lutheran minister is demanded to choose his text for a certain Sunday from a certain part of the Scriptures, he may be compelled, during a career of fifty years, to preach fifty times over the same text. In this emergency he may find great help with Carpzov, who, in his Hodegeticum, found no less than one hundred different manners in which to vary the theme. II. Johann Gottlob Carpzov, b. at Dresden, Sept. 26, 1679; d. at Lübeck, April 7, 1767; studied at Wittenberg and Altdorf, and was professor of Oriental languages at Leipzig from 1719 till 1730, when he became superintendent-general at Lübeck. His Introductio in Libros V. Test., 1721, Crítica Sacra, 1728, and Apparatus Historicocriticus Antiquitatum V. Test., 1748, are works both of learning and talent, though his stand-point is still that of Buxtorf, and already somewhat antiquated: the authority of the text depends with him upon an almost materialistic conception of inspiration. He was a decided adversary of the whole pietistic movement, more especially of the Herrnhuters. III. Johann Benedikt Carpzov, b. at Leipzig, May 20, 1720; d. at Helmstädt, April 28, 1803; became professor of Greek in the University of Helmstädt in 1748, and earned his fame chiefly as a philologist, but vindicated the name of the family as representative of pure orthodoxy by his Liber Doctrinalis Theologic Purioris, 1768. He was one of the last professors of Germany who continued to use the Latin language in his lectures.

CARRANZA, Bartolomé de, b. at Miranda in Navarre, 1503; d. in Rome, May 22, 1576; entered the Dominican order in 1520, and gained a great reputation as a teacher of theology in the University of Valladolid; went to Rome in 1539 as a representative of his order to its chapter-general, and sat as one of the imperial theologians, 1546–48, in the Council of Trent, where he played a conspicuous part as leader of the party demanding disciplinary reform (Controversia de Necessaria Residentia Personali Episcoporum, Venice, 1547); labored with great zeal for the restoration of the Roman Church in England under Philip and Mary, and was in 1557 made Archbishop of Toledo. But in 1559 he was seized by the Inquisition, and thrown into prison. He had been present at the death-bed of Charles V., and a rumor sprang up that the emperor had not died in the right faith. Testimonies of several prisoners of the Inquisition made him suspected; and his Commentarios . . . sobre el Catechismo Christiano, 1558, finally furnished the basis for an accusation. Though it is not true that the book contains a complete system of Protestantism, the author certainly belonged to the reform party within the Roman Church, and there was much in his book which was fit to give offence. He appealed to the Pope, but was, nevertheless, kept in prison till 1567. He was then removed to Rome, on the instance of Pius V.; but there, too, he was imprisoned; and no sentence was given in his case until Gregory XIII., a short time before his death, suspended him from his office, and compelled him to retract certain passages of his catechism. Among his other works are Summa Conciliorum et Pontificum, Venice, 1546, a compendium of church history, which has been often reprinted, and Controversie Quatuor, a treatise on the authority of the tradition, the Scriptures, the Pope, and the councils. See FLORENTE: History of the Inquisition in Spain (Spanish and French), 1817-18; M'CRIC: History of the Reformation in Spain, Edin., 1829; HEINRICH LANGWITZ: Bartholomæus Carranza, Kempfer, 1870.

CARRASCO, Antonio, one of the leaders of the new Reformation in Spain; b. in Malaga, Jan. 19, 1843; drowned in the Ville du Havre disaster in mid-ocean, Nov. 22, 1873. He was converted at sixteen, and joined Matamoros' band of Bible-readers at Malaga: in consequence, he was imprisoned two years, and then sent to the galleys. On the solicitation of the Evangelical Alliance deputation at Madrid, May, 1863, Queen Isabella changed his sentence to exile; and for five years he studied theology in Geneva. In September, 1868, on the downfall of Isabella, he returned to Spain, and entered with great zeal on the work of evangelization, and was, at his death, pastor of the Free Church in Madrid, which had a membership of seven hundred. He was the best educated and the most eloquent Protestant preacher in Spain. He was president of the Protestant Synod, and made frequent visits to the scattered congregations throughout the land. See the memorial sketch in the volume of the Evangelical Alliance, N. Y., 1874, pp. 764, 765.

CARROLL, John, the first Roman-Catholic bishop of the United States; b. at Upper Marlborough, Md., Jan. 8, 1735; d. Dec. 3, 1815. He was a cousin of the famous Charles Carroll of Carrollton, one of the signers of the "Declaration of Independence." He was ordained a priest at Liege, and entered the Society of Jesus, and later was a tutor in two English Roman-Catholic noble families. When the war for independence broke out, he returned to America; and at Dr. Franklin's instance he was in 1786 appointed vicar-general of the new established Roman-Catholic hierarchy; and in 1789 he was in England consecrated a bishop under the title of "Bishop of Baltimore," and in 1815 made archbishop.

CARSON, Alexander, LL.D., b. in County Tyrone, Ireland, 1776; d. at Belfast, Aug. 24, 1844. He sprang from Presbyterian stock; was educated at the University of Glasgow; became the Presbyterian minister in Tubbermore, Ireland, 1797, but in 1805 withdrew from that denomination because of the worldliness of many of its ministers in the synod of Ulster, and justified himself in his published Reasons for Separating from the Synod of Ulster. He was followed by a majority of his congregation. Unable to retain his former church edifice without litigation, he gave it up, and preached for many years in barns or fields, until at last a rude stone church was built for him at Tubbermore. In the early part of his independent career, while studying the New Testament in order to confute the Baptists, he was converted to Baptist principles; and henceforth he advocated these views, except close communion, with all the wealth of his scholarship, which was considerable, and all the power of his mind, which was great. The Baptist denomination value his writings highly. See Baptism, in its Mode and Subjects, with a Sketch of the Life of Dr. Carson, 5th ed., Phila., 1857; also the sketch of Dr. Carson, by Rev. Dr. THOMAS ARMITAGE, in Johnson's Cyclopaedia.

CARSTARES, William (or Carstairs), a Scotch clergyman and political leader; b. Feb. 11, 1649, at Cathcart, near Glasgow; d. Dec. 28, 1715. His father, the Rev. John Carstares, belonged to the extreme Covenanting party of Protesters. After studying at Edinburgh, he went to the University of Utrecht, and there his friendship with William III. began. This intimacy, together with his participation in the composition of the severe tractate, An Account of Scotland's Grievances by Reason of the D. of Lauderdale's Ministrie, humbly tendered to his Sacred Majesty, generally attributed to the learned James Steuart, and his being the bearer of despatches from those in Holland who sympathized with the disaffected in Scotland, made Charles II's government suspicious of him. Accordingly, when, at the close of 1674, he landed in England, he was arrested, lodged in the Tower, the next year transferred to Edinburgh, and kept in prison until August, 1679. He went to Ireland, and became a nonconformist pastor. But in 1682 he was again in Holland, and the next year in London. He entered into the Rye-house Plot for an insurrection in favor of the Duke of Monmouth and to assassinate Charles II. The plot was discovered in the middle of July, 1683. He was examined before the Scottish council, tortured by the thumbscrew, but firmly refused to make any disclosures, "until he was assured that his admissions would not be used as evidence; and in the disclosures he then made he displayed great discretion." The King pardoned him. Prince William of Orange welcomed him warmly on his return to Holland, and appointed him court chaplain. When the Revolution of 1688 had put William on the throne of England, he became royal chaplain for Scotland; and by his broad catholic views, his tact and learning, he rendered the King invaluable service, especially in thoroughly reconciling the Scotch Presbyterians to the new régime. He held the same position under Queen Anne and George I., with that of principal of the University of Edinburgh (1704), and minister of St. Giles. He was four times elected moderator of the General Assembly. See State Papers and Letters addressed to William Carstares, with Life by M'CORMICK, Edinburgh, 1774; STORY: Character and Career of William Carstares, 1874.

CARTHAGE, a famous city of the ancient world, situated near the modern town of Tunis, North Africa; was the seat of numerous church councils, of which two were very important. In 411 a conference was there held, on command of the emperor, with the Donatists, in order to refute their errors, and reconcile them with the Church. Augustine and Petilian were the principal opposing speakers; and Marcellinus, the Emperor Honorius' tribune, decided that the Donatists had been completely answered, nor from this sentence was there any appeal allowed. From this conference dates the decided decline of Donatism; for more stringent measures were adopted towards such determined heretics as they were adjudged. See DONATISTS. In 412 Paulinus of Milan appeared at the council held under Aurelius, Bishop of Carthage, as the accuser of Cœlestius; and thus the Pelagian heresy received there its first condemnation, and at the same time its first ecclesiastical recognition. See SCHLAF: Church History, vol. ii. pp. 365 sq., vol. iii. p. 793; and HEFELE: Conciliengeschichte.

CARTHUSIANS, an order of monks founded by St. Bruno in the latter part of the eleventh century. Bruno was born at Cologne, studied at various schools in France, became chancellor of the chapter of Rheims, and enjoyed great reputation as a teacher. Despairing both of the Church and of the theological science as ways of salvation, he determined to retire from the world, and live as a hermit, and settled, together with a few companions, at Saisse Fontaine, in the diocese of Langres. In 1086 the company removed to La Chartreuse, in the neighborhood of Grenoble; and here, at one of the wildest spots of the whole region, they built their huts around an oratory, making a vow of silence, abstinence, the observation of the canonical hours, etc. When Urban II., who had been a pupil of Bruno, ascended the papal throne, Bruno was called to Rome; and, as his brother-hermits would not leave him, they all went together. Bruno, however, exercised no influence on the policy of Urban II. The archbishopric of Rheggio, which was offered to him, he declined; and when Urban II. went to France, preparing for the first crusade, Bruno retired to La Torre, near Squillace, in Calabria. Here he died Oct. 6, 1101, and was buried in the Church of St. Stephan. He was canonized in 1514. The order grew slowly. In 1137 it numbered only four establishments; in 1151, fourteen; but fifty-six in 1258. It was formally recognized and confirmed as an independent order by Alexander III. in 1170. Its rules, the Consuetudines Cartusie, were first put down in writing by Guigo, the fifth prior of La Chartreuse. In 1259 Bernard de la Tour made a collection of all the decisions of the chapter-general since 1141, — Statuta Antiqua. A second collection, Statuta Nova, was made in 1367; a third, Tertia Compilatio Statutorum, in 1509; and a fourth, Nova Collectio Statutorum Ordinis Cartusiensis, in 1581. In the beginning of the eighteenth century, there were a hundred and seventy Carthusian monasteries, of which seventy-five were in France; but all the latter disappeared during the Revolution, and only a few of them have since been re-established. There are also Carthusian nuns. The order is said to have originated in the twelfth century; but the five Carthusian nunneries which existed in the eighteenth century dated all from the thirteenth or fourteenth century. For the life of Bruno, see Histoire Littéraire de France, IX. p. 233; for the history of the order, HELYOT: Histoire des Ordres Monastiques, Paris, 1714-19. ALBRECHT VOGEL.

CARTWRIGHT, Thomas, b. about 1535, in Hertfordshire; d. Dec. 27, 1603. He was matriculated as a sizar of Claire Hall, November, 1547, and as a scholar to St. John's College, Cambridge, Nov. 5, 1550. In 1560 he became a minor fellow of Trinity College, and on the 6th of April of the same year a fellow of St. John's College; in April, 1562, a major fellow of Trinity College. In 1567 he took his bachelor's degree, and in 1569 was chosen Lady Margaret professor of divinity, and began to lecture on the Acts of the Apostles. His lectures were exceedingly popular, and made a profound impression in favor of his distinctively Puritan views, but created a storm of opposition from the Prelatical party, headed by Dr. Whitgift. This conflict, under these two great champions, continued to grow more and more severe, and was continued by their successors in two great parties in the Church of England, — the Presbyterian and the Prelatical. The Puritan platform is well stated in the six propositions which Cartwright delivered under his own hand to the vice-chancellor, the grounds of his persecution by the Prelatists: "(1) That the names and functions of archbishops and archdeacons ought to be abolished. (2) That the offices of the lawful ministers of the Church, viz., bishops and deacons, ought to be reduced to their apostolical institution: bishops to preach the word of God, and pray, and deacons to be employed in taking care of the poor. (3) That the government of the Church ought not to be intrusted to bishop's chancellors, or the officials of archdeacons; but every church ought to be governed by its own ministers and presbyters. (4) That ministers ought not to be at large, but every one should have the charge of a particular congregation. (5) That no man ought to solicit, or to stand as a candidate for the ministry. (6) That ministers ought not to be created by the sole authority of the bishop, but to be openly and fairly chosen by the people."

Having been deprived of his professorship Dec. 11, 1570, of his fellowship at Trinity College in September, 1571, he went to the Continent, and especially to Geneva, and conferred with Beza and other chiefs of the Reformed Churches. He was prevailed upon to return by his friends in November, 1572. An Admonition to Parliament for the Reformation of Church Discipline had been issued by his friends, John Field and Thomas Wilcocks, for which they had been cast into prison. Cartwright espoused their cause, and issued The Second Admonition, with an Humble Petition to both Houses of Parliament for Relief against Subscription, 1572. Whitgift replied in An Answer to a Certain Libell, intituled An Admonition to the Parliament, 1572. Cartwright rejoined in A Replye to an Ansicere maile of M. Doctor Whitegiste againste the Admonition to the Parliament, 1573. This was a renewal of the old discussion on a larger scale, going to the roots of difference; Cartwright and the Puritans contending that the church government and the discipline, as well as the doctrine, must be reformed according to the Scriptures.

The discussion took a wide range, — as to the standard of church government, the choice of ministers, the offices of the Christian Church, clerical habits, bishops, archbishops, the authority of princes in matters ecclesiastical, confirmation, etc. Whitgift replied in A Defense of the Ecclesiasticall Regiment in Englande defaced by T. C. in his Replie againste D. Whitgiste, 1574, and also The Defense of the Answere to the Admonition, against the Replie of T. C., 1574, pp. 812, folio. An order for Cartwright's apprehension was issued Dec. 11, 1574; and he fled to the Continent, and became minister of the English congregation of merchants at Antwerp and Middleburgh.

In 1576 he also went to the Isles of Jersey and Guernsey, and aided the Puritans there in settling the discipline of their churches, and then returned to Antwerp, and preached for several years. Whilst abroad, he wrote the Second Replie of Thomas Cartwright agaynst Maister Doctor Whitgistes Second answer touching the Churche Discipline, 1575, and also The Rest of the Second Replie, 1577.

He also, in 1574, prepared a preface to the Latin work of William Travers, and translated it under the title A Pull and Plaine Declaration of Ecclesiasticall Discipline out off the Word off God and off the Declininge off the Churche off England from the same, 1574, which still more embittered his foes. In 1582 he was invited to the divinity chair in St. Andrews, Scotland, but declined. In 1583, at the solicitation of the Earl of Leicester, and Lord Treasurer Burleigh, and a large number of Puritan friends, he undertook to write a confutation of the Rhemish version of the Scriptures, which took him many years; but he was prevented by the ecclesiastical authorities of England from publishing his work. The year before his death, however, his Answere to the Preface of the Rhemish Testament, 1602, was issued; but the work itself, not until 1618, under the title A Confutation of the Rhemists Translation, Glosses, and Annotations on the New Testament, so farre as they containe Manifest Impieties, Heresies, Idolatries, etc., fol. pp. lviii. 761, xviii., Leyden.

In 1585 he returned to England under the protection of the Earl of Leicester and Lord Treasurer Burleigh, but was apprehended by Bishop Aylmer, and cast into prison, where he remained from April until June, when he was released through the influence of his powerful friends, and the Earl of Leicester appointed him master of a hospital which he had founded at Warwick. His preaching was opposed by his enemies, but without success, until 1590. During this time he went over a great part of Proverbs and Ecclesiastes. The latter was published in 1604 under the title Metaphrasis et Homiliæ in Librum Solomonis, qui inscribitur Ecclesiastes, 4to; the former in 1617, Commentarii Succincti et Delucidii in Proverbia Solomonis, 4to. He is said to have been the first preacher in England who practised extempore prayer before sermon, although he usually employed forms of prayer. During this period the ecclesiastical conflicts waxed hotter and hotter. The Puritans had been making rapid progress. The first presbytery was organized at Wadsworth within the Church of England in 1572. Classes were rapidly organized in all parts of England, but secretly. In 1583 a rough draft of a book of Discipline was drawn up by Thos. Cartwright and Walter Travers, and at an assembly held either at London or Cambridge it was resolved to put it in practice. It was revised at a national synod in London (1584), and referred to Mr. Travers, "to be corrected and ordered by him." It was then passed around the various classes. It was adopted and subscribed by an assembly of all the classes of Warwickshire in 1588, and then by a provincial synod in Cambridge; and by 1590 the Directory had spread all over England, and was subscribed to by as many as five hundred ministers. The episcopal party were greatly alarmed, and determined to arrest Cartwright and the other leaders, and destroy as large a number of copies of the Holy Discipline as possible. A few copies were, however, preserved, and subsequently issued in English in 1644 by authority of the Long Parliament, entitled A Directory of Church Government anciently contended for, and as farre as the Times would suffer, practised by the first Non-Conformists in the Daies of Queen Elizabeth. Found in the study of the most accomplished Divine, Mr. Thomas Cartwright, after his decease; and reserved to be published for such a time as this.

The discussion between the Presbyterians and the Prelatists was complicated by the Brownist party and the Martin mar-prelate tracts, which bitterly satirized the bishops. Cartwright took strong ground against the Brownists and their doctrine of separation, and opposed the Martin mar-prelate method of controversy; but it was the policy of the Prelatists to make the Puritans bear all the odium of the weaker and more obnoxious party. Manuscripts of Cartwright against the Brownists are preserved, but no printed books. In May, 1590, he was summoned before the High Commission, and committed to the Fleet. He and his associates were confronted with thirty-one articles of charges, afterwards increased to thirty-four, besides articles of inquiry. He was willing to reply to the charges, but refused to give testimony against his brethren. He was then summoned before the Star Chamber with Edmund Snape and others; but the case never reached an issue. Powerful friends worked on his behalf, and he was finally released from prison in 1592, on the promise of quiet and peaceable behavior, in broken health. The remainder of his life he passed quietly on the Island of Guernsey, and at his beloved hospital, save that he had to meet one bitter attack, to which he wrote A Brief Apologie of Thomas Cartwright against all such slanderous Accusations as it pleaseth Mr. Sutcliffe in his Severall pamphlets most injuriously to load him with, etc., 4to, pp. 28, 1596.

Thomas Cartwright is the hero of Presbyterianism in England, laying the foundations of Puritanism broad and deep, upon which a great structure was subsequently erected, which has continued till the present time. Some of his positions have subsequently proved untenable; but, in the main, the Presbyterian churches of Great Britain and America still stand by his principles.

Other works besides those mentioned in their historical connections were published after his death by his disciples: A Catechisme, 1611; A Commentary on the Epistle to the Colossians, 1612; A Treatise of the Christian Religion, 2d edit. 4to, 1616, edited by William Bradshaw; Harmonia Evangelica, Amsterdam, 4to, 1627; Commentaria Practica in totam Historiam Evangelicam, 1630, 3 vols. 4to. C. A. BRIGGS.

CARTWRIGHT, Peter, an American Methodist clergyman, b. in Amherst County, Virginia, Sept. 1, 1785; d. near Pleasant Plains, Sangamon County, Illinois, Sept. 25, 1872. His parents removed while he was a child to Kentucky; there in 1801 he was converted, and in 1806 made a deacon, 1808 an elder, in the Methodist Church. In 1812 he was made presiding elder, and spent eight years in the old Wesleyan Conference, four in the Kentucky, eight in the Tennessee, and over forty-five in the Illinois Conference. He is said to have received more than ten thousand members into the church, baptized more than twelve thousand persons, and preached more than fifteen thousand sermons. He was familiarly known as the "Backwoods Preacher;" but no one questioned his devotion, and probably his homely preaching secured him the better attention: he has been known, however, to knock down the inattentive. See his Fifty Years a Presiding Elder, and the Autobiography of Peter Cartwright, the Backwoods Preacher, edited by Rev. W. P. Strickland, New York, 1856.

CARY, Henry Francis, b. at Birmingham, Eng., in 1772; d. in London, Aug. 14, 1844. After graduation at Christ's Church, Oxford, in 1796, he took orders in the Established Church, and was appointed vicar of Bromley Abbot's, Staffordshire. Was an assistant librarian of the British Museum from 1826 to 1832. Though he had distinguished himself by an original ode on the misfortunes of Poland, when at Oxford, and published a number of sonnets and odes, his fame rests upon his work as an editor and translator. He had devoted much attention to the ancient and modern languages, and thus had fitted himself to edit The Early French Poets; a Series of Notices and Translations (published after his death by his son, Rev. Henry Cary, in 1847), and the Birds of Aristophanes, and the Odes of Pindar. His great work is his translation of the Divina Commedia of Dante. The Inferno appeared in 1806, and the completed work in 1813. This work received little attention until it was commended by Coleridge in his lectures in 1818; but Southey afterwards pronounced it "one of the most masterly productions of modern times;" and The Edinburgh Review said that it was "executed with a fidelity almost without example." It has not been excelled. It is in blank verse. Cary also edited carefully revised editions of Pope, Milton, Cowper, Thomson, and Young. His Life was published in 1847 by his son. He was buried in the "Poets' Corner" of Westminster Abbey.

ARTHUR GILMAN.

CARYL, Joseph, b. in London, 1602; d. there Feb. 7, 1673. He was for some time a commoner at Exeter College, and a preacher at Lincoln's Inn. He was one of the Triers for the approbation of ministers in 1653, ejected in 1662, and afterwards minister to a congregation gathered near London Bridge. His title to fame was his Exposition, with Practical Observations, on the Booke of Job, London, 1648-66, 12 vols. quarto, 2d ed., 2 vols. folio, 1676-77, abridged by Berrie, Edinburgh, 1836, 8vo. Spurgeon (Commenting and Commentaries, London, 1876, p. 6) says of the work, "Caryl must have inherited the patience of Job, to have completed his stupendous task. It would be a mistake to suppose that he is at all prolix or redundant: he is only full."

CASAS, Bartolomeo de las, b. at Seville, 1474; d. in Madrid, 1566; entered the Dominican order; went in 1535 to St. Domingo as a missionary among the Indians; became Bishop of Chiapa, Mexico, in 1544, and spent his life in preaching the gospel to the American aborigines, and in defending them against the cruelty of their conquerors. Nine times he travelled between America and Spain in order to induce Charles V. to put an end to the horrible miseries which the Spaniards inflicted on the Indians. But he succeeded only partially. Of his works, written about or in behalf of the Indians, there is a collected edition in 2 vols. by Llorente, Paris, 1822, containing a detailed sketch of his life.

CASAUBON, Isaac, b. at Geneva, Feb. 18, 1559; d. in London, July 1, 1614; was professor of Greek, first at Geneva (1582-96), then at Montpellier (1596-1600); removed in the latter year to Paris as librarian to Henry IV., but left France after the assassination of the king (1610), and settled in London, where he was well received by King James and the bishops of the Anglican Church. He was acknowledged to be the greatest scholar of the age, next to Scaliger; and though he was a philologist and a critic, rather than a theologian or historian, he was frequently drawn into the theological controversies of his time. Besides some minor pamphlets, he edited a Norum Testamentum Græcum, Geneva, 1587; but his Excitationes in Baronium remained unfinished. His letters, accompanied with a carefully written life, were published by D'Almevean, Rotterdam, 1709; but for his biography his Ephemerides, published in 1850 by The Clarendon Press, are of paramount interest. See MARK PATTISON: Isaac Casaubon, Oxford, 1875.

CASELIUS, Johann, b. at Göttingen, 1533; d. at Helmstädt, April 9, 1613; studied at Wittenberg under Melancthon, and at Leipzig under Cameronius; visited Italy twice (1560-63 and 1566); was appointed professor at Rostock in 1563, and removed to Helmstädt in 1599. He belonged to the Melancthonian school, and was one of the most brilliant representatives of humanism in Germany; but he was vehemently attacked, especially in the latter part of his life, by the rigid Lutherans, who wanted to have philosophy and classical learning ejected from the universities. Of his numerous writings many still remain in manuscript. See E. HENKE: G. Calixtus und seine Zeit, I. p. 48; JAKOB BURCK-

HARD: Epistola de J. Caselio, Wolfenbüttel, 1707.

CASSANDER, Georg, b. on the Island of Cazaund, in the Scheldt, 1515; d. at Cologne, 1566; taught classical literature, canon law, and theology at Bruges and Ghent, but retired to Cologne, and devoted himself exclusively to studying. His great object was a reconciliation between the Roman Church and the Reformers. On the instance of the Duke of Cleve, he wrote against the Anabaptists, and still nearer he approached his great idea by his work De Officio Pii, 1561. Summoned afterwards to Vienna by Ferdinand I., expressly for the purpose of such a reconciliation, he wrote his Consultatio de Articulis Fidei inter Papistas et Protestantis Controversis; but he achieved nothing but to offend the one party without gaining the confidence of the other. In some respects he is a precursor of that spiritualizing Romanism of a later date, which manages to retain even the worst misuses by representing them as mere symbolization of some fanciful but pure idea. The collected edition of his works was published in Paris, 1616. See CALKOEEN; Vita Cassandri, Amsterdam, 1859; BRUCK: Cassanders Ideen, Cologne, 1876 (from a Roman point of view). C. WEIZSÄCKER.

CASSEL, The Conference of, 1661, was, to a certain extent, the result of the great influence which Georg Calixtus of Helmstädt had exercised in this part of Germany, and engaged the personal support of Wilhelm VI. of Hesse, with whom it was a serious wish to see a union brought about between his Lutheran and Reformed subjects. The disputation lasted from the 1st to the 9th of June. On the Lutheran side, spoke Peter Musæus and Johann Hennichen, both from Rinteln, and pupils of Georg Calixtus; on the Reformed side, spoke Sebastian Curtius and Johannes Hein, both from Marburg. The subjects of discussion were the doctrines of the Lord's Supper, predestination, the two natures in Christ, and baptism; and the whole character of the proceedings was moderate and conciliatory. A basis of union was also established, and Wilhelm VI. was requested to take measures for the further consolidation and extension of the result arrived at. But he died in 1663, and the cause was lost by the stubbornness of the Lutherans, specially in Saxony. CASSIANUS, Johannes, b. between 350 and 390; d. between 440 and 450; was educated in a monastery at Bethlehem, under the tutelage of abbot Germanus. In 390 the master and his pupil, now two friends, made a pilgrimage to the Egyptian hermits; and this oasis of stillness and quiet, situated on the very confines of the confusion and restlessness of the ancient world, made a deep impression on the two wanderers, that they remained there for seven years. Leaving Egypt, they repaired to Constantinople, where Cassianus was consecrated a deacon by Chrysostom; but after the overthrow of Chrysostom (404) Cassianus went to Rome alone. Of Germanus nothing more is heard. The sack of Rome by the Goths, made upon Cassianus, as upon so many others, the impression that peace and safety could not be attained except by leaving society and the stir of the multitude, and settling down in solitude. He went to Massilia, founded two monasteries (one for men and one for women), and wrote, for the instruction of his pupils, De Cœnobiorum Institutis Libri XII., and Collationes Patrum XXIV. In the former of these works he gives first the external rules after which a hermit's life is led, and then he describes the internal labor by which the final goal is reached. In the latter he gives his experiences from the Egyptian hermits. By these books, and by his two foundations, he introduced monasticism in the Western Church.

Also from another side the Western Church was deeply moved at that moment, namely, by the genius of Augustine. But the discrepancy between the ideas of Augustine and the theological system of the Eastern Church, in which Cassianus was educated, was so great, that he never felt able to adopt such doctrines as those of predestination, the irresistibility of grace, etc. He did not separate himself, however, so far from the views of Augustine as to embrace those of Pelagius. On the contrary, on the instance of Leo the Great, he wrote his De Incarnatione Libri VII., directly against Nestorianism, but indirectly against Pelagianism; and thus he became the founder and first representative of semi-Pelagianism. The best collected edition of his works is that by GAZÆUS, Douai, 1616, which has been often reprinted, latest at Leipzig, 1733. An accurate analysis of his stand-point has been given by G. FR. WIGGERS: Darstellung des Augustinismus und Pelagianismus, 1833, II. pp. 6-183. [There is an Italian translation of Cassianus's work, Venice, 1663, and a French, Paris, 1667.] THIERSCH.

CASSIANUS, Julius, a heretical teacher from the latter part of the second century, is known to us only through Clement Alexandrinus, who twice (Stromata, I. 21; III. 13) refers to his writings. According to Clement he was the originator of docetism; and his denial of the reality of Christ's body seems to be a natural sequence of his absolute condemnation of generation even under the form of matrimony; for, if it is an evil to be born, the birth of Christ must be an evil too, and there is no other means to place Christ outside of the evils of generation than denying the reality of his human nature.

CASSIODORUS, Magnus Aurelius, b. at Scylacium in Bruttien, about 477; d. in the Monastery of Vivariers about a century later; descended from a noble and wealthy family, and entered early on a brilliant political career; became senator and consul, and carried great weight in the council of the Ostro-Gothic kings from Theodoric to Vitigis, but retired in 540 from public life, founded the Monastery of Vivariers, and devoted himself exclusively to literary pursuits. As he induced his brother-monks to follow in the same track, he set an example, which, during the dark ages, made the monasteries asylums for science and the liberal arts. In the earlier period of his life his literary activity was chiefly directed to history; but the works which he wrote after his retirement are religious or theological: Institutiones Divinarum et Sæcularium Litterarum, a kind of theological encyclopædia; De Orthographia, a continuation of the preceding; Complexiones in Epis- tolas et Acta Apostolorum et Apocalypsin; Historia Ecclesiastica Tripartita, etc. Collected editions of his works were given by I. GARET, Rouen, 1679, and in MIGNÉ: Patrologia Lat. LXIX.—LXX. See DENIS DE STE. MARTHE: Vie de Cassiodore, Paris, 1694; OLLERIS: Cassiodore Conservateur des Livres de l'Antiquité latine, Paris, 1841; A. FRANZ: M. A. Cassiodorius Senator, Breslau, 1872.

CASTELL, Edmund, Orientalist; b. at Hatley, Cambridgeshire, 1606; d. in Bedfordshire, 1685. He was educated at Emanuel and St. John's College, Cambridge. While at the university, he compiled his immortal work, Lexicon Heptaglotton, Hebraicum, Chaldaicum, Syriacum, Samaritanum, Ethiopicum, Arabicum, conjunctim, et Persicum separatim, London, 1669, 2 vols. folio. He spent eighteen years, and twelve thousand pounds, upon the work. Thus he ruined his fortune and his health. In 1666 he was appointed King's chaplain, Arabic professor, and later a prebend of Canterbury: at his death he was rector of Higham Gobion in Bedfordshire. He assisted Walton upon his Polyglot (1657), not only by labor, but by money to the amount of a thousand pounds, and for it his Lexicon was specially prepared.

CASTELLIO or CASTALIO, Sebastian, b. at St. Martin-du-Fresne, a village of Savoy, 1515; d. at Basel, Dec. 29, 1563; made his studies under very difficult circumstances, and was in 1540 appointed tutor to three young noblemen at Lyons, where he published the first part of his Latin Dialogues, a work which was often reprinted, and used as a text-book up to 1731, and which has been translated into English under the title Youth's Scripture Remembrancer, London, 1743. Having made the acquaintance of Calvin at Strassburg, he was called to Geneva as rector of its high-school. But disagreement soon arose between him and the great reformer; and in 1544 he left Geneva, and settled at Basel. After living there for several years in great poverty, he published, in 1551, his Latin translation of the Bible, dedicated to Edward VI. of England; and in the following year he was made professor of Greek. In 1555 appeared his French translation of the Bible, dedicated to Henry II. of France. The Latin Bible of Castellio, the last edition of which appeared at Leipzig, 1756, may be characterized as the Bible of the Humanists. The powerful realism of the original text is often weakened by the elegant forms of the translation. But the violent attacks of Calvin and Beza find their explanation, not so much in the faults of the work as in the connection in which Castellio stood to certain anonymous treatises against Calvin's doctrine of predestination, and to Martinus Bellius's De non Punientis Gladio Hæreticis. See his Life by I. MÄLLY, Basel, 1862, founded upon careful study of the sources. BERNHARD RIGGENBACH.

CASUISTRY is a theological discipline which developed, generally in connection with ethics, but sometimes independently, and for a long period even succeeded in completely superseding this science. Its first germs may be found in the very text of the New Testament. Christ answers casuistical questions (Matt. xxii. 17; Luke xiv. 3). Paul does the same (1 Cor. vii., viii. 10). As the institution of confession and penance developed in the old church, manifold opportunities occurred to decide upon the moral worth of so special action. The ethical writings of Tertullian and Augustine, among the Latin fathers, are rich in such decisions. In the penitentials, or books of penance, the movement began to take shape, and show direction. They contained long lists of sins observed in common life, or imagined as possible, minutely described, and accurately classified; and to each sin was added the penance or ecclesiastical punishment set upon it. New materials flowed from the canon law, which, in consequence of its own inborn principle, always considered morality in its relation to actual circumstances; and the method which the proper treatment of such materials demanded was brought to its very perfection by the schoolmen. Thus the penitentials of the ancient church gradually grew into the mediæval science of casuistry; and when auricular confession, in 1215, was made a formal law, this science became of so great practical importance, that the casuist appeared in the universities by the side of the canonist.

Raimund de Pennaforte, from the thirteenth century, is generally mentioned as the earliest representative of this science of casuistry. His Summa de Casibus Penitentialibus consists of four books, and is alphabetically arranged: it was edited by Hon. Vinc. Laget, Lyons, 1719. A great number of similar books followed in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, generally called Summa, and often named after the author or his birthplace: thus the Astesana, ed. Nuremberg, 1482, after Asti in Piedmont; the Pisana or Pisanella, ed. Paris, 1470, after Pisa; the Angelica, ed. Nuremberg, 1492, after Angelus, the Genoese; the Pacifica, ed. Venice, 1574, after Pacificus from Novara, etc. But by degrees, as the science developed, its inner confusion increased. Every trace of a ruling principle disappeared, and the whole field was covered with a loose conglomerate of details. The cases became more and more intricate, the solutions more and more subtle; the power of conscience to give a clear and ready verdict was blunted and confounded; and the blight of scepticism, with its indifference and frivolity, fell upon the whole moral field of Christian education.

At this point, as at so many others, the Reformation laid the axe at the root of the evil. Luther burnt the Angelica, together with the papal bull, and declared openly that the true Christian needs no special moral instruction, as the spirit of his faith will surely lead him to that which is sanctioned by the will of God, and demanded by brotherly love. Even Zwingli, though representing a more specifically moral side of the Reformation, never ceased to assert that the individual spirit, when fully imbued with the word of God, is the true source from which to draw the moral rule, entirely independent of any external prescription. Although a number of difficult moral cases presented themselves in which the Reformers had to give a decision, as, for instance, with respect to marriage, usury, obedience to established authority, etc., nevertheless, no casuistry, properly speaking, developed during the first decades of the Reformation; and when it, later on, grew up both within the Reformed and within the Lutheran Church, it proved of a merely trans-sient nature, and was speedily absorbed by ethics.

In the Reformed Church, W. Perkins (1558-1602) was the first who attempted to revive casuistry, though he completely abandoned the old scholastic method. He wrote in English, The Whole Treatise of Cases of Conscience, London, 1602, which was edited in Latin, by MAGER, Hanover, 1603, and DRAKUS, Geneva, 1624, and in German, by SPRÜNGLI, Basel, 1640, and Leipzig, 1690. His pupil, WILLIAM AMES, followed the same track: De Conscientia et ejus Jure vel Casibus, Amsterdam, 1630, translated into German, Nuremberg, 1654; also others; HALL: Resolutions and Decisions of Divers Practical Cases of Conscience, London, 1649; SANDERSON: Nine Cases of Conscience, London, 1678; I. H. ALSTED: Theologia Casuum, Hanover, 1621, which he in his theological encyclopædia placed independently beside the Theologia Moralis. In the Lutheran Church the attempt was made a little later by Fr. Balduin (1575-1627), whose Tractatus de Casibus Conscientiæ, first published (1628) in Wittenberg, was meant to form an opposition to the corrupted casuistry of the Roman-Catholic Church. It contains all the casuistic materials scattered throughout the works of the Reformers, arranged after a very superficial plan; and the great regard which is paid to such subjects as ghosts, evil spirits, sorcerers, witches, etc., shows how tightly the Orthodox Lutheran Church was held in the mazes of superstition and pedantry. The same character re-appears with the other Lutheran casuists of the seventeenth century,—Fink, 1631; Dunte, 1636; König, 1654; Kessler, 1658; Dannhauer, 1679; Osiander, 1680; Olearius, 1694, etc. Nevertheless, the influence of Spener soon became apparent; and the clear and convincing exposition, by his pupil Buddeus, of the superfluity of casuistry as an independent branch of evangelical theology, finally made it disappear.

Quite otherwise in the Roman-Catholic Church. There, among the Jesuits, casuistry attained a new and most luxuriant growth. To re-establish the tottering dominion of the hierarchy over the souls was the avowed object of the order; and what more suitable means could be found for such an aim than the dissolution of all morality in casuistry? Consequently, instead of a deeper conception of the universal ideas of morality, instead of a stronger assertion of conscience in its office as the organ of the spirit of faith, the Jesuits invented the doctrines of probabilism, of the aim justifying the means, of a difference between philosophical and theological sins, of mental reservation, etc.; and the result was an inner confusion which actually made the penitent the slave of the confessor. The most prominent among the Jesuit casuists are Mariana, Mendoza, Suarez, Sanchez, Molina, and Escobar in Spain; Filiiucci and Francolini in Italy; Less and Lobkowitz in Holland; Busenbaum and Laymann in Germany. The laxity, however, and frivolity of the Jesuit morality, caused scandal, even within the Roman-Catholic Church itself. In the first half of the seventeenth century, Arnauld began the opposition; then followed Pascal. The Sorbonne condemned the doctrine of probabilism in its Corpus Doctrinæ, ed. by Pfaff, Tübingen, 1718.

Scholars, like Mabillon and Du Pin, kept aloof from the pestiferous atmosphere; and serious men, like Heinrich a St. Ignatio, attempted to rear a new moral system on another basis (Theologia, 1707; Ethica Amoris, 1709). But all this was done with very little effect. There is in the doctrinal system of the Roman Church a tendency which necessarily leads to casuistry in morals, and which cannot be eradicated except together with the Church itself. Even Sobiech's Compendium Theologiæ Moralis, Breslau, 1814, bears witness to this truth.

CASUS RESERVATI are cases of sin in which the Pope or the bishop reserves the right of absolution to himself, or to a priest authorized by him. The Roman-Catholic Church justifies such reservation in the following manner: as Christ, properly speaking, conferred the power of absolution only on the apostles and their successors (John xx. 21-23), the Pope and the bishops, by further conferring the power on their substitutes, the lower ranks of the priests, have a right to make such reservations as they deem necessary for the weal of the Church; which conception has been confirmed by the Council of Trent, sess. XIV., cap. 7, de penitentia. The cases which the Pope has reserved for himself may be found enumerated in FERRARIS: Bibliotheca Canonica, Madrid, 1795, 10 tom. in 5 vols. fol. The cases which the bishops have reserved for themselves differ in the different dioceses. With respect to Germany see HARTZHEIM: Concilia Germaniæ, Tom. XI.

CATACOMBS is the name of certain subterranean galleries and halls in which the ancient Church, up to the fifth century, buried her dead; though instances of burial in the manner now common occur even in the first days of the Church. The Pagans called their burial-places κοιμητήρια (dormitoria, "sleeping-rooms"); and the Christians adopted the name, which among them, from their hope of resurrection, received a new and deeper meaning. Christian cemeteries of the above description are found in Syria, Alexandria, Melos, Malta, Sicily, Spain, and throughout the whole of Italy, especially in Naples and Rome. The most extensive, and, both in artistic and in ecclesiastical respect, the most important, of these cemeteries, are those built under the hills just outside the gates of Rome. They are fifty-four in number; and their labyrinthine galleries and corridors, excavated in the tufa, would, if stretched out in one continuous line, reach from one end of the Italian Peninsula to the other. They are computed to house about six millions of dead. In the surroundings of Rome, there are found twenty-four more subterranean cemeteries, and thirty in the rest of Italy.

It was formerly believed that the Roman catacombs were merely quarries, which had been abandoned, and then taken into use by the Christians, in lack of something better. But it has now been ascertained beyond doubt that such was the case only with a few of them; and there is a marked difference between those which originated as independent structures, and those which were reared in the quarries. The latter have broader but also more irregular galleries, built up with masonry and props of all kinds; while in the former the galleries are narrower but higher, more regular, and always hewn out in the granular tufa, which at once is firm, easy to work, and well suited to preserve the corpses, because it is porous, and easily lets off the water. It has also been ascertained that originally the catacombs were not built secretly, nor were they fitted up in a poor and dismal style. Among the privileges which Julius Cæsar gave the Jews of Rome was also legal protection of their burial associations and graves. As the first Christian congregation in the city consisted mostly of converted Jews, it naturally enjoyed the same privilege. The first Christian cemetery, like that of the Jews, was built on a hillside, near the public highway, and with a conspicuous entrance. It was a locus religiosus, though not, in the Roman sense of the words, a locus sacer. Even the remains of the martyrs could be buried without any trouble. But it is true, that, when the times of persecution came, the original entrances had to be covered up, and new entrances to be made in some forgotten corner of an adjacent quarry, where they were not easily detected. Regular service was not held in the catacombs until the second or third century, and then only exceptionally, but more frequently during the third and fourth centuries. Even the death-days of the martyrs were celebrated in the chapels, or small basilicas, above the catacombs, up to the middle of the third century; and it was not until an edict of 257 had forbidden the Christian assemblies, that Pope Felix I., in 269, ordered those natalitia to be celebrated at the very graves. According to tradition, five or six of these subterranean burial-places date back to the times of the apostles, as, for instance, those of Priscilla, Lucina, and Flavia Domitilla; and, indeed, inscriptions, wall-paintings, and ornaments belong to the times of the Flavians and Trajan. The orchards or vineyards under which the cemeteries were excavated were given to the congregation by some wealthy member, for this purpose. Thus the first common burial-place which the Christian congregation of Rome possessed was, no doubt, founded by a noble lady at her villa, ad catacumbas, where afterwards Constantine built a church over the grave of St. Sebastian. The place was probably called κατὰ κύμβας, from some natural or artificial cave; or, as κύμβα also means a cup, there may have stood an inn, κατὰ κύμβας, catacumbas, analogous to ad enses, ad aquilas, etc., at a spot on the much-frequented Via Appia, and in the vicinity of Vicus Sulpicius, and from this inn the whole neighborhood may have received its name.

In the third century, there were in Rome twenty-five large cemeteries, and about twenty minor martyr or family tombs. Pope Zephyrinus placed the deacon Kallistus, propositus of the Roman clergy, over the above-mentioned Cæmeterium ad Catacumbas; and, of the eighteen popes between Zephyrinus and Sylvester, thirteen were buried there. During the period of peace from Caracalla to Decius, Pope Fabianus (238) erected also, in other cemeteries, a number of small oratories for service: such a one was discovered in 1874 in the Cemetery of Domitilla. In 257 Valerian forbade the Christians to visit their cemeteries, declared their loca religiosa state property, and had Pope Sixtus and his deacon Laurentius beheaded in the Cemetery of Prætextatus. Gallienus, however, again allowed the Christians to use their burial-places (260); but from that time it became customary to conceal the entrances. Under Numerian, a great number of the faithful, who, with the vasa sacra, had sought refuge in a catacomb on Via Salaria, were buried alive; the entrance having been choked up. Shortly before his death, Aurelian issued an edict against the Christians, and in 303 the grounds under which the cemeteries were built were taken from them. Instead of that named after Kallistus, Marcellinus now founded another large common cemetery, built very deep under the ground; and the entrances to the graves of the martyrs were covered up. Under Maxentius, the persecutions ceased. In 311 the church property was restored, and with the edict of Milan (312) a new era began for the Church.

The victorious Church did not like to bury her dead in the catacombs, and consequently the catacombs were less and less used. Melchisedes was the last pope interred at St. Kallistus. Sylvester lies in the basilica built by him over the Cæmeterium Priscillæ; and Marcus, in the cella memoriæ at the entrance of the Cæmeterium Balbinæ. The example once set, graves in or near the basilicas soon came to be preferred to graves in the catacombs. The extraordinary increase, however, of the martyr-worship after the time of Constantine, contributed to give the catacombs a new interest. Costly basilicas were erected above the graves of the martyrs; and the whole side of the hill where was the mouth of the gallery leading to those graves was, so to speak, carved off in order to lay bare the graves themselves. Under Damasus this arrangement was completed. Walls were propped up, corridors and passages were formed, flights of steps were built, the chambers themselves were adorned with marble, and the calligrapher, Furius Dionysius Philokalus, was busy everywhere making inscriptions. Prudentius, in his hymns on the martyrs (Περί οσσησίων XI., 153-218), gives a description of the tomb of Hippolytus, such as it had been restored by Damasus. The walls of the little chapel were inlaid with slabs of Parian marble, and leaves of glittering silver; and on the birthday of the martyr such a multitude of devotees thronged to the grave, that the narrow passages proved altogether incapable of holding them. Indeed, the catacombs became a much frequented place. Jerome, in his commentary on Ezek. xl. 5, 6, gives a graphic description of the visits he made while a school-boy, and, together with his comrades, on Sundays, to this dreary yet awful spot. "On both sides the walls rise, filled with corpses; and the whole place is so dark, that the prophet's words, 'And they shall go alive to hell' (Ps. lv. 16), seem directed to us. Now and then a little light breaks down from above, through a wall-eye,—just enough to soften the horror of the night for a moment. But by the next step we are again in the densest darkness; and the words of the poet, 'Horror ubique animos, simul ipsa silentia terrent' (VIRGIL, Æneas II., 755), come home to our heart."

According to records still extant, two-thirds of the Christians who died in Rome between 338 and 364 were buried in the catacombs; but, between 373 and 400, not more than one-third; after 410 only a few; and none after 454. In Naples, however, and in Sicily, interment in catacombs continued as late as the ninth and tenth centuries. After the conquest by Alaric, the Christians in Rome could not afford to adorn their graves any more; and from 410 the catacombs actually began to fall into oblivion and decay. After 426 no fossores, "grave-diggers," are mentioned any more. The Ostrogoths under Vitiges (537), and again under Totila, did not hesitate to outrage the graves of the martyrs, and throw out their bones; and though the Popes Vigilius and John III. (568), and Sergius and Gregory III. (735) did much for the restoration of the catacombs, and the revival of the devotion at the martyrs' graves, when the "godless" Longobards, under Aistulf, broke open the tombs, and carried away the bones of the saints, the awe and even the respect of the people for the catacombs sank so low, that sheep-pens were built in the consecrated graves. In 761 Paul I. transferred a hundred holy corpses to the new church he had erected, and dedicated to St. Sebastian and St. Sylvester. July 20, 817, Paschal I. transferred twenty-three hundred holy corpses to St. Prassede; and Sergius II. and Leo IV. carried them by the cartload into the Pantheon. Thus the ruin of the catacombs was completed. In the fourteenth century, however, three of these old cemeteries were still visited by pilgrims; but in the fifteenth the Cæmeterium in Catacumbas, or, as it was also called, the Cæmeterium Catacumbas ad Sebastianum, was the only one open to visitors; and thus it came to pass that its name, Catacumbas, became the common appellation applied to all subterranean burial-places.

In 1578 another catacomb was incidentally discovered, and immediately made a mine from which the altars of those churches, which during the counter-reformation had been taken from the Protestants, were refurnished with relics. St. Borromeo, the chief of the counter-reformation, prayed whole nights in the catacombs; and, some years before him, Filippo Neri spent every night there. Water from the wells of the catacombs, or the mere use of cups found there, began to work miraculous cures. Pope Sixtus did his best to push the movement, discovering, investigating, and restoring catacombs. Bosio, an official of the order of Malta, spent his fortune, and often risked his life, in examining the catacombs. Gems, utensils, sarcophagi, were found in great multitude; but most of them were lost again by bad management. What remained was gathered into the Christian Museum in the Vatican, in the eighteenth century, by Benedict XIV. The description of Bosio's discoveries appeared at Rome (1632) shortly after his death, under the title, Roma Sotterranea; but both the description and the illustrations are very inaccurate. A Latin translation by Aringhi, much enlarged, appeared in 1651; and a pocket edition, somewhat abbreviated, in 1671. The literature of the subject now began to flourish. See Cardinal BOTTARI: Sculture e Pitture Sacre Estratte Dei Cemeteri di Roma, Rome, 1737-54, 3 vols. fol.; MARCHI: Monumenti delli Antiche Arti Cristiane nella Metropoli del Cristianismo, Turin, 1841; PERRET: Catacombes de Rome, Paris, 1851. But all these works were completely superseded by G. B. DE ROSSI: La Roma Sotterranea, I.-III., 1864-78. See also S. SPENCER NORTHCOTE and W. R. CATAFALCO, or CATÁFALQUE, from the Italian balco, a "scaffold," is a representation of a tomb, made of plain carpentry, but often magnificently decorated. It came into use in Italy, when it became customary not to bring the corpses into the church while the singing of the Vigil, Requiem, and Libera, took place; and its object was, as a visible memorial of the dead, to strengthen the devotion.

CATALDUS, ST., a saint of the Roman-Catholic Church, but a person of a very fabulous record. It seems, however, that he lived in the sixth century, came from Ireland, made a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, settled at Tarent, and became bishop there. In 1071 his bones were discovered; and, as they made the customary miracles, he was canonized. His festival is celebrated on May 10. The Acta Sanct., May, gives his life, and the literature belonging to it.

CATECHETICS, CATECHISMS, and CATECHUMENS. Catechetics, from κατηχίσειν, "to teach," "to instruct," is a part of practical theology, and corresponds to catechesis, as theory to practice. The practical art of catechisation originated together with the Church, and in the fourth and fifth centuries it began to develop its scientific theory. Some instruction in the truths of Christianity, more or less comprehensive, more or less profound, was, no doubt, from the very first days of the Church, considered an indispensable condition for admission into membership, that is, for baptism and very early the catechist appeared as an officer, the catechumenate as an institution, in the Church. The Constitutiones Apostolicæ, from the latter part of the third century, show the institution, its functions, and its proceedings, in a fair state of development; and a century later on, in the writings of Cyril of Jerusalem, Gregory of Nyssa, Chrysostom, and Augustine, it presents itself as a missionary apparatus of great completeness and vigor. After a simple application to the deacon, or presbyter, or bishop, and a preliminary investigation by him of the moral standing of the applicant, any person, Jew, pagan, or heretic, was admitted into the state of a catechumen by the sign of the cross and the imposition of hands; that is, he was recognized as a Christian, though not as one of the fideles, and enjoined to attend the catechisation in the church. As a catechumen he passed through several stages. Some distinguish between two, others between three, and others again between four; though a first class, not allowed to enter the church-building, but receiving instruction outside the wall, is a very doubtful supposition. The first class comprised the Audientes, who attended the sermon, but left the church before the strictly liturgical part of the service began; the second, the Genusflectentes, or Prostrati, who were allowed to attend, kneeling, the prayer which was offered up for them; the third, the Competentes, or candidates for baptism, to whom the arcani disciplina was unveiled, — the creed and the Lord's Prayer. The whole course through the catechumenate took between two and three years; and in this, its great missionary function, the Church appears to have employed as much caution as energy. In the third and fourth centuries, questions of the what and the how of this instruction were mooted; and in the fourth and fifth centuries the settled practice began to develop its theory. See CYRIL: Catecheses; GREGORY OF NYSSA: Oratio Catechetica; CHRYSOSTOM: Catecheses ad Illuminandos; AUGUSTINE: De Catechizandis Rudibus. Comp. I. MAYER: Geschichte des Katechumenats und der Katechese in den ersten sechs Jahrhunderten, Kempten, 1868.

In the period from the sixth to the sixteenth century very little was done for catechetics and catechesis. The missionary activity of the Church assumed an entirely new character. On the one side, the society in which Christianity was born, and in which it was now growing into supreme power, had been thoroughly christianized; infant baptism had become the rule; the catechumenate disappeared; the instruction in Christianity was left to the family, and the clergy gradually dropped those functions which characterize the catechist, developing only those which characterize the priest. On the other side, the Church carried on its mission among the barbarians in a peculiar wholesale style, which plainly shows that the kingdom of heaven had become a kingdom on earth, and meant to vindicate itself as such. Whole nations were converted by the sword, or as a natural consequence of the conversion of their ruler; and the great object of the Church was to subdue the masses under an external organization, which did next to nothing for the internal training of the individual. The grave shortcomings of the Roman-Catholic Church in this respect were felt; but very little was done to make up for the deficiency. The capitularies of Charlemagne and Louis the Pious, the councils of Lambeth (1281), Bezier (1346), and Tortosa (1429), ardently inculcated the duty of the priest to instruct his flock in the Christian faith. In the ninth century Otfried wrote the so-called Weisenburg Catechism; in the eleventh, Bruno of Wurtzburg, a catechism in the form of questions and answers; in the fifteenth, John Gerson, his De Parvulis ad Christum Trahendis. But it was only among the heretical sects of the period, — the Cathari, Waldenses, Wiclifites, Bohemian Brethren, etc., — that catechesis and catechetics still lived on, and bore fruit. Among them no child was allowed to grow up without being able to give an account of its faith; and in Bohemia there are traces of gradated catechumenate similar to that of the ancient Church. It is apparent, however, as we approach the outbreak of the Reformation, that a feeling of the necessity of giving more and better religious instruction becomes more and more vivid in the Church; and not only have the Brethren of the Common Life done much good in this field, but all the reformers before the Reformation found here one of their principal practical issues.

How powerful the impulse was which catechesis (and, soon after, also catechetics) received in the beginning of the sixteenth century may be inferred from the sudden and almost contemporaneous appearance in all churches of the catechism; that is, a summary of the contents of the faith, drawn up under the authority of the Church, and destined to form the basis for oral instruction. [See PHILIP SCHIAFF: Creeeds of Christendom, New York, 1877, 3 vols.] In the Lutheran Church several attempts had been made, both by Luther and others, to write a catechism; but they were all superseded in 1529, when Luther published his Larger and Smaller Catechism, — the former destined for the minister and the schoolmaster, the latter for the people and the children; which two books soon became, and still are, the standard text-books in the Lutheran churches in Germany and Scandinavia. In the Reformed Church the Catechismus San-Gallensis appeared in 1527; the catechism of Ecolampadius and Leo Juda in 1534; that of Calvin, in 1536; and in 1563 that of Ursinus and Olevianus, the so-called Heidelberg Catechism, which became one of the symbolical books of the Dutch and German Reformed Churches in Europe and America. In the French Reformed Church various catechisms were used, — by Capell, 1619, Drelin-court, 1642, etc., — until in 1806 the Catechisme à l'Usage de toutes les Eglises de l'Empire Français was introduced. Even the Roman-Catholic Church felt the influence of this impulse. The catechism of Canisius appeared in 1554; that of Bellarmin, in 1603; that of Bossuet, in 1687, etc. The standard work, however, is the Catechismus Romanus ex Decreto Conc. Trident., published under the authority of Pius V., in 1566 [and translated into English by Donovan, Dublin, 1829].

The two great catechisms which the Reformation produced in England are that of the Episcopal Church and that of the Presbyterian Church. The former was prepared, after the Hampton Court Conference of 1604, by John Overall, or at least in part by him, and at the instance of James I., and it is still the standard text-book of the Church of England. The latter was prepared by the assembly of divines at Westminster, and appeared in a double form, — a smaller, 1646, and a larger, 1647. It is the standard text-book for all evangelical Nonconformists in England, and Presbyterians in America. Other but less successful attempts in the same field are, Cranmer's Catechisme, 1648; Allen's Catechisme, that is to say, A Christen Instruccion of the Principall Pointes of Christes Religion, 1551; King Edward VIth's Catechisme, 1553; ALEXANDER NOEL: Catechismus sive prima Institutio Disciplinæque Pietatis

Christianæ, 1570; DANIEL ROGERS: Practical Catechisme, 1640; EZEKIEL ROGERS: Grounds of the Christian Religion by way of Catechisme, 1648; BUNYAN: Instruction for the Ignorant, 1672; ISAAC WATTS: Catechisms for Children and Youth, 1730, etc. Valuable contributions to catechetics were given by ISAAC WATTS: Discourse on Instruction by Catechism, 1728; GILLY: Horæ Catechetice, 1828; GREEN: Lectures on the Shorter Catechism, Philadelphia, 1841; ARDEN: Manual of Catechetical Instruction, London, 1851. But a systematic representation of catechetics has been produced only in Germany, where the practical application of very different principles and methods of catechisation by the orthodox Lutheran, the Pietists, and the Rationalists, naturally led to the creation of a scientific theory. See C. PALMER: Evang. Katechetik, Stuttgart, 4th ed., 1844; G. VON ZEJSCHWITZ: System d. christ. kirchl. Katechetik, Leipzig, 1864, 3 vols.; R. KÜBEL: Katechetik, Barmen, 1877; P. CATENA (a chain). From the very first days of the Christian Church her teachers were deeply engaged in the study and exposition of Holy Writ; and the books of the Old Testament attracted the same attention, and carried the same authority, as those of the New Testament. In Origen the Eastern Church produced a comprehensive and most fertile exegete; and in the middle of the fifth century her literary activity reached its acme. Ambrose, Augustine, and Jerome labored at the same time in the Western Church; and such a mass of exegetical materials was produced as to make sifting, arrangement, and epitomizing, after the manner of the old scholiasts, absolutely necessary. Thus originated exegetical collections, which the Greeks called ἐπιτομῆ (ἐπιτομὴ, συναγωγὴ) ἐρμηνειῶν, etc. while the Latins simply designated them as glossæ, postillæ, etc. The name catenæ is of a later date. Formerly it was generally believed that Thomas Aquinas was the first to use it; but the title Catena Aurea, of his work on the Gospels, does not belong to him: all the oldest editions have Glossa Continua, or Continuum.

According to general acceptance, the catenæ began in the West with Cassiodorus, from the end of the fifth century, and in the East with Procopius of Gaza, from the beginning of the sixth century. But this is hardly correct. The true catena consists merely of extracts from a greater or smaller number of exegetes, whose names are given after every quotation. The collector himself offers no opinion of his own. His business is simply to collect and arrange, and he makes changes only when he feels compelled to abbreviate or condense. The choice of authorities from whom to make extracts was individual and incidental; but prominent teachers—Origen, Chrysostom, Theodoret, and Cyrillus in the East, and Augustine in the West—were, of course, preferred. Also heretics were sometimes quoted, but generally for the purpose only of warning against their propositions. Somewhat different from this, the true catena, is another kind of exegetical collections, in which the collector uses only one authority, whom he epitomizes, condenses, transcribes, etc. To this latter kind belong the works of Procopius, Cassiodorus, Primasius, Florus Magister, Beda, and Rhabanus Maurus; and they are the nearest predecessors of the true catena.

Once invented, the catena flourished during the whole period of the middle ages, and up to the latter part of the sixteenth century. Rich materials exist, scattered about in the various libraries; but only a small portion of it has as yet been examined and utilized. See J. A. FABRICIUS: Bibliotheca Græca, Hamburg, 1718–28, VIII. p. 637 sqq.; J. A. NOESSELT: De Catenis Patrum Græc., in his Opusc. ad Hist. Eccl., Halle, 1817; J. MORELLIUS: Biblioth. Marc. Venet. Manser. Græc. et Lat., Bassani, 1802, I.; and his Cod. Græc. Musæ. apud Nanius Patricios Venetos Asservati, Bonn, 1784. On closer investigation, however, it appears that there were originally only a limited number of catenæ, which were copied over and over again, and abbreviated or enlarged in a rather arbitrary manner by the copyists. Among the most prominent catena writers were Nicetas, Bishop of Serrai in Macedonia, and afterwards metropolitan of Hieraclea in Thracia (eleventh century), and Macarius Chrysocephalus, metropolitan of Philadelphia (fourteenth century). There occur also catenæ in the vernacular tongues,—one in Low German, on Jesu Sirach; another in High German, on the New Testament, etc. The exegetical value of these works is very small; but, besides having interest as literary monuments of the age in which they originated, they are of importance to the text-critic, especially in cases in which they quote from books which now are lost.

As the Latin catenæ mostly quote from works which still exist, they are only of subordinate consequence, and need no further mention here. The most important of the Greek catenæ are: I. To the Old Testament.—One to the Octateuch, very rich, edited by NICEPHORUS, Archbishop of Philadelphia, Leipzig, 1772, 2 vols. fol.; one to Jeremiah and Baruch, printed in the Commentary of MICH. GUISLERIUS, Lyons, 1633, 3 vols. fol.; one to Daniel, published in A. MAI: Script. Vett. Nova Coll., I. 2, p. 161 sqq.; one by Bishop Nicetas to the Psalms, edited by BALTH. CORDERIUS, Antwerp, 1643–46, 3 vols. fol., very interesting. II. To the New Testament.—To Matthew, one edited by P. POSSINUS, Tolosæ, 1646, and another edited by BALTH. CORDERIUS, Antwerp, 1647; to Mark, one edited by P. POSSINUS, Rome, 1673, and another edited by C. F. MATTHEI, Moscow, 1775; to Luke, one made by TITUS BOSTRENSIS, and published in FRONTO DUCÆUS, Auctar. Biblioth. Patr., II. p. 762 sqq., and in Bibl. Patr., Paris, XIII.; and large parts of another, published in A. MAI, Script. Vett. Nova Coll. IX., p. 626; to John, one edited by BALTH. CORDERIUS, Antwerp, 1630; and to all the books of the New Testament, one edited by J. A. Cramer, Oxford, 1838–44, 8 vols. The commentaries of EUTHYMIUS ZIGADENUS to the Psalms and the Gospels, of THEOPHYLACTUS to the Gospels and Paul's Epistles, and of ANDREAS and ARETHAS to the Apocalypse, all dating from the tenth century, have the character of catenæ, though they are not altogether without independent production.

The powerful impulse which biblical exegesis received in the sixteenth century from the Reformation soon produced a great quantity of new exegetical materials; and in the seventeenth century exegetical collections were made which in all essential points show the character of the old catenæ. Such are the Biblia Magna, Paris, 1643, 5 vols. fol.; Biblia Maxima, Paris, 1660, 19 vols. fol.; Annotations upon all the Books of the Old and New Testaments, London, 1645, 2 vols. fol.; PEARSON'S Critici Sacri, London, 1660, 9 vols. fol.; ABR. CALOVIVS: Biblia Illustrata, Francfort, 1672, 4 vols. fol. And, indeed, the exegetes of the Roman-Catholic Church have retained many of the features of the ancient catenæ up to this very day.

CATHARI (καθαροί, "the pure"), a dualistic sect which originated in Eastern Europe, independently of the Manichæans and Paulicians, but from the same source,—an intermingling of European and Asiatic ideas. Most probably they originated among the Slavs, and in some Bulgarian monastery; though Shaffarik, the great authority on Slav antiquities, while confirming their Slav origin, puts their birthplace in Dragowitza, in Southern Macedonia, where, at all events, they had a bishopric in the twelfth century. Thence they spread into Thrace, where they were known as the Bogomiles, into Dalmatia, Slavonia, Bulgaria, whence the crusaders brought back to France the name Bulgari, or Bougres, and Albania, where the great split took place between the absolute dualists, the Albanenses, and those adopting a milder form of dualism, the Concorezenses (from Coriza in Dalmatia, or, according to Shaffarik, from Goriza in Albania). From the Slav countries in the Balkan peninsula, where they maintained themselves up to the latter part of the fifteenth century, when they were absorbed by Mohammedanism, they spread, during the middle ages, over all Europe, more especially over the southern part.

Travelling Slav merchants early brought the heresy to Italy. Though the first traces of the sect in the Western Church are found in France and Flanders, it is expressly affirmed that the new doctrines were brought thither from Italy. In Italy the first Cathari were discovered in the Castle of Monteforte, near Turin, about 1035; and their chief Girardus, together with several others, was burnt. A century later on they had spread widely in Upper Italy, especially in Lombardy; and in 1167 Nicetas, the Bishop of the Cathari in Constantinople, came to Italy, on account of the schism between the Albanenses and the Concorezenses, and for the purpose of securing the firm adherence of the Italian Cathari to the doctrine of absolute dualism. In Milan and Florence, in Calabria and Sicily, even in the Papal States, they had churches, and at last also dioceses. Political circumstances were favorable to them; many powerful nobles protected them; for centuries they withstood all the exertions of the popes and the Inquisition. But it is an exaggeration of a sickly criticism, when Aroax tries to make Dante a preacher among the Cathari, and the Divina Commedia an allegorical libel on the Roman Church (see his Dante Hérétique, Revolutionnaire et Socialiste, Paris, 1854, and Clef de la Comédie Anti-Catholique de Dante Alighieri, Paris, 1856). It is true, though, that one of the most active members of the sect, Arnanno Pangiolo, from Ferrara, was very near being canonized by the Pope in the last years of the thirteenth century. Even late in the fourteenth century the Inquisition in Italy was busy persecuting the Cathari; but after that time they are not heard of any more in that country. Their name in Italy was not Cathari, however, but Patareni, from Pataria, an obscure street in Milan, the headquarters of the rag-pickers, where they held their secret assemblies.

Their principal seat in Western Europe the Cathari had in Southern France, where they were known as the Albigenses; which article see. Thence they penetrated into the northern provinces of Spain, where they numbered many adherents in the thirteenth century. To Germany they came partly from the East, from the Slav countries, partly from Flanders and Champagne. In 1052 several Cathari were condemned to death at Goslar. In 1146 Evervin, provost of Steinfelden, held a disputation with them in Cologne; but the disputation was interrupted by a mob, and the Cathari were murdered. Still the sect lived on in the regions along the Rhine, especially in Cologne and Bonn. In 1163 several of them were burnt, after the canon Echbert had tried in vain to convert them; and in 1231 a severe persecution broke out, under the leadership of the fanatical Dominican monk, Konrad of Marburg, after which event the sect is not mentioned any more in Germany. The Waldenses, however, and the Brethren of the Free Spirit, seem to have found more easy access among the Germans, and maintained themselves in the country during the whole of the middle ages. In England the Cathari found very little sympathy. They came over in 1159 from Holland, and in 1210 some are said to have been discovered in London; but their influence was very insignificant.

The doctrinal system of the Cathari consists of some imperfect speculations concerning the nature and the origin of evil, physical as well as moral, mixed up with some curious mythological fancies about the creation of the world, of man, etc. This system they based upon the New Testament, of which they possessed a translation, probably derived from the Orient, and deviating considerably from the Vulgate. But the text of this translation they interpreted in a most arbitrary manner,—now literally, now allegorically, after the requirements of their doctrinal system. They also held certain apocryphical books in great esteem, especially the Visto Jesaie, and a Gospel according to John, entitled Narratio de Interrogationibus S. Johannis et Responsionibus Christi Domini. Of their own writings nothing is known but a short though very remarkable ritual, drawn up in the language of the Troubadours of the thirteenth century, and edited, after a manuscript in Lyons, by Cunitz, Jena, 1852. Unable to understand how evil ever could have originated from God, they were led to ascribe it to an independent principle. According to the oldest view, and that most widely adopted among them, the evil principle was absolute and eternal, like the good. But this coarse dualism was afterwards softened down by the assumption that the evil spirit had originally been a pure creature, who, by an act of his own free will, had separated himself from the good. Both systems maintained themselves for a long time, as the difference between them concerned only the metaphysical part of the whole system, the theology proper, the cosmogony, and the anthropology; while the morals, the rituals, and the ecclesiastical organization remained untouched by it, the same for both parties.

The moral system of the Cathari was thoroughly ascetic. Sin was defined as lust after that which is material; for matter was the work of Satan. The soul was created by God, and heaven was its home; but Satan had allured her down on earth, and locked her up in a material body to prevent her return to heaven. Natural life was consequently nothing but a term of penance. Any contact with matter was sin. Any act of the will which was not an abnegation of nature, a sacrifice of the material self, was a sin. To hold property, to keep intercourse with worldly men, to tell lies, to wage war, to kill animals (except those that creep), to eat flesh (except that of fishes), were deadly sins; and the greatest of all sins was generation, whether in or out of marriage. The extreme severity of this system was somewhat mitigated by a distinction between the perfecti and the credentes. Only the former were demanded to fulfil the rules in all their rigor: considerable allowances were granted to the latter. But only the perfecti formed the Church proper, outside of which there was no salvation; and all were enjoined to enter this class, if not earlier, at least in the moment of death, by receiving the spiritual baptism, which was administered by a single imposition of hands, and which was not a sacramentum, but only a consolamentum.

The ritual and ecclesiastical organization were exceedingly simple. There were no churches, but only oratories, without images, crosses, or bells. All the furniture and ornament which the building contained consisted of a plain table, covered with a white cloth, on which laid the Bible, opened at the Gospel of John. The service consisted of the reading and expounding of a chapter of the Bible, after which one of the perfecti blessed the kneeling assembly. There were no sacraments. The baptism with water was rejected as something insignificant. Instead of the Lord's Supper, a kind of agape was held, at which the perfecti broke and blessed the bread; but no reference was made by this act to the body of Christ. There were parishes and dioceses, with deacons and bishops: but the clergy had no power, spiritual or secular; and that which made the Cathari most odious, and most dangerous to the eyes of the Roman Church was, no doubt, their strongly pronounced anti-clerical tendency.

CATHARINA (ἡ καθαρινή, "the always pure"), one of the most celebrated saints, worshipped both in the Greek and Roman Church. Since J. T. Assemani, she is generally identified with that noble and wealthy Alexandrian lady of whom Eusebius tells (Hist. Eccl., VIII. 14–15) that she withstood all the adulterous attacks of the Emperor Maximinus, and for that reason was banished, and despoiled of all her property. But this does not agree either with the circumstance that Rufinus calls the Alexandrian lady Dorothea (Hist. Eccl., VIII. 17), or with the principal feature of the old legend such as it is recorded in the Martyrologium Romanum, and by Simeon Metaphrastes (MIGNE: Patrol. Græc., T. 116, pp. 275–302). According to the legend, St. Catharina was the daughter of King Konstos, eighteen years old, and as wise as beautiful. She converted the philosophers with whom she held a disputation on the command of the emperor. She converted also the empress, the general Porphyrius, two hundred soldiers, etc.; and, when she was placed on a torturing engine composed of wheels, she was miraculously rescued. Finally she was beheaded; and her remains were carried by angels to Mount Sinai, where afterwards the emperor, Justinian I., built a monastery in her honor. She is the patron saint of the philosophical faculty of the University of Paris; and she was a favorite subject with the painters of the middle ages, who represented her with a crown, a book, a wheel, etc. Her festival is celebrated in some places on Nov. 25, in others on March 5. See SURTUS: Vit. Sanct., Nov. 25; Act. Sanct. Boll., March 5; BUTLER: Lives of Saints, Nov. 25. ZÖCKLER.

CATHARINA OF BOLOGNA, b. 1413; d. March 9, 1463; entered the order of St. Clara in 1430, and became afterwards abbess of one of the convents of the order. She was canonized in 1724 by Benedict XIII. A book of Revelations is ascribed to her. It was first printed at Venice, 1511. See Act. Sanct., March, T. II. pp. 34–88; BUTLER: Lives of Saints, March 9.

CATHARINA OF GENOA (Catharina Flisca Adorna Vidua Genuensis), b. 1447; d. Sept. 14, 1510; was a daughter of Robert Fieschi, vice-regent of Naples; married the dissipated Giuliano Adorno, but became a widow in 1474, and devoted the rest of her life to the poor and the sick. She was canonized by Clement XII. in 1737. She wrote Demonstratio Purgatorii, Dialogus Animam inter et Corpus, and other mystico-prophetic works of the kind quite common during the middle ages. See Act. Sanct., September, T. V. pp. 123–195; BUTLER: Lives of Saints, Sept. 14; UPHAM: Life of Catharina Adorna, New York, 1856.

CATHARINA OF SIENNA (Catharina Benincasa), b. 1347; d. April 29, 1380; assumed the habit of the Third Order of St. Dominic in 1365, and enjoyed, on account of the austerity of her asceticism and the ecstatic state of her mind, so great a fame that at several occasions she could play a conspicuous part in politics as mediator between Florence and Rome, between Urban VI. and Clement VII., between Rome and Naples, etc. She was canonized in 1461 by Pius II. Her festival is observed on April 30. She left three hundred and seventy-three letters addressed to popes, cardinals, princes, etc., six treatises under the common title Libro della Divina Dottrina, some prayers, prophecies, etc., which were published by Aldus Manutius, Venice, 1500, and again by Girolamo Gigli, Sienna, 1707–26. A separate edition of the letters, chronologically arranged, was given by Nicolo Tommaseo, Florence, 1860. Her life was written by Raimund of Capua, her confessor (Act. Sanct., April, T. III, pp. 852 sqq.); by Chavin de Malan, Paris, 1846; Alfonso Capaulatro, Florence, 1855; Hase, Leipzig, 1864; Olga von Leonrad, Cologne, 1880. The Processus Contestationum super Sanctitate et Doctrina Beatæ Catharinæ de Senis is given by Martene and Durand, in Vet. Script. Collectio, VI. See in English, J. E. BUTLER: Catherine of Sienna, 3d ed., London, 1881; AUGUSTA THEODOSIA DRAVE: Catharine of Sienna, London, 1880.

CATHARINA OF SWEDEN (Catharina Suecica Vastanensis), b. 1331; d. March 24, 1381; was a daughter of St. Birgitta, whom she accompanied to the Holy Land, and succeeded as Abbess of Wadstena. When thirteen years old she was married to a young and pious nobleman; but immediately after the wedding they both made a solemn vow of perpetual chastity, and kept it. She wrote a book, The Soul's Comforter, which is lost. In 1474 she was canonized. Her festival falls on March 22. See Act. Sanct., March, T. III, pp. 503-531; BUTLER: Lives of Saints, March 22.

CATHARINA RICCI, b. 1522; d. Feb. 2, 1589; entered the Dominican order at Prato in Tuscany, and became prioress of the nunnery. She was canonized in 1746 by Benedict IV. Her letters were edited by CESARE GHOSTI, Prato, 1848. Her life was written, first by Seraphin Razzi, a Dominican monk, and then by Philip Guidi, her confessor. See BUTLER: Lives of Saints, Feb. 13.

CATHARINUS, Ambrosius, the monastical name of Lancelot Politi, b. 1483; d. Nov. 8, 1553; studied, and taught jurisprudence for several years, but entered the Dominican order in 1515; became Bishop of Minori 1546, and Archbishop of Conza 1552. He was a prolific writer. His Apologia pro Veritate Catholica et Apostolica Fidei ac Doctrinæ, written against Luther, is his first work. He also wrote against Cajetan, Carranza, and Dominico Soto.

CATHEDRA and CATHEDRAL. Cathedra, in ecclesiastical usage, meant originally simply the episcopal throne or chair placed against the wall in the middle of the semicircular apsis, with a row of lower seats for the presbyters on each side, and so that the priest officiating at the altar faced the bishop. Afterwards the word was applied, first to the see itself, and then to the very building in which the bishop officiated, ecclesia cathedralis, in contradistinction to ecclesie diocesane. Thus the transition was made to the use, now so general, of the adjective "cathedral" in a substantive sense, — a usage which dates from the tenth century, and is confined to the Western Church.

CATHOLIC (throughout-all, i.e., general, universal). This word early came into use among Christians to distinguish their church from the Jewish, which was national: later on, it distinguished the orthodox church from the heretical sects. In modern times it has been arrogantly and absurdly claimed by the Church of Rome; and Protestants usually call her so, although it were nearer truth to say the Roman-Catholic Church. The phrase in the Apostles' Creed, "the Holy Catholic Church," is often ignorantly supposed to refer to the Roman Church; but the word "catholic" merely means "universal," and was not in the first form of the creed. The phrase is correctly explained by what follows, — "the communion of saints:" thus it simply expresses a belief that the Holy Church, the communion of saints, is not confined to one nation, but, by the appointment and help of Christ, shall be disseminated through all nations. Cf. Pearson, On the Creed, Art. IX.

CATHOLIC APOSTOLIC CHURCH, or IRVINGITES. The man to give the strongest, if not the first, impulse to this religious movement, was Edward Irving (1792-1834, see title), although he is little mentioned by the writers of this Church, who regard him merely as a forerunner, and not as the founder of their community. The historic occasion for the Apostolic Church was the manifestations which occurred in the spring of 1830, on the shores of the Clyde, among some pious Presbyterian men and women, who believed that their organs of speech were used by the Holy Spirit for the utterance of his thoughts and intentions. The fame of these phenomena spread: in April, 1831, the same took place in London. The "prophecings" were addressed to the audience in intelligible English, and were like Quaker utterances; but the "tongues" were monologues or dialogues between the speaker and God, which no one could understand. Toward the end of 1832 a considerable number of persons had become believers in the supernatural character and divine origin of these spiritual phenomena, and, further, convinced that it was the will of God the apostolic office should be restored. God was believed to indicate who should be put in this office; and "by the middle of 1835 the full number (twelve) was completed, and they entered, as a twelvefold Apostolic College, on the work of caring for the whole Christian Church." From these apostles this church has received its doctrine, organization, and worship. In doctrine it is eclectic. Its advocates make a great deal out of the second coming of Christ, which they think is very near: they believe in baptismal regeneration, and the spiritual presence of Christ in the Supper, with the additions that the elements after consecration have a heavenly and spiritual as well as a material character, and that the eucharist is not only a sacrament, but a sacrifice, in the patristic sense of a thanksgiving. With them it is also connected with a commemoration of the departed. They lay stress upon the ecumenical creeds, and embody them in their worship. In organization this church is very elaborate — apostles, prophets, and evangelists, for the general care of the church, and angels (or bishops), presbyters (priests), and deacons, for the care of particular congregations. All officers are called by the Holy Ghost, through the prophets, except the deacons, who are elected by the respective congregations as their representatives. In worship, as in doctrine and organization, it is eclectic and elaborate. It is highly ritualistic, with a solemn liturgy, based upon the Anglican and ancient Greek, and with an elaborate symbolism, derived from a fanciful interpretation of the Jewish tabernacle as a type of the worship of the Christian Church in the wilderness. In its hierarchical constitution and ritualistic worship consists the chief peculiarity of this community. They are, upon the whole, the highest of High-Churchmen; and have, indeed, most sympathy with the Episcopal Church, from which they received the majority of their original members. Their main strength is in London, where they have seven churches, after the model of the seven churches of Asia; but they are also found throughout Great Britain and in North Germany; and they have one church in New-York City, but very few adherents in the country.

This church combines a high order of piety and humility of individual members with astonishing assumptions, which, if well founded, would require the submission of all Christendom to the authority of its inspired apostles. But, as these die, their vacancies are not filled: soon there will be none left, and then the church at large will be no better off than it was before the movement began.

CATHOLIC EMANCIPATION, the name given to the Act of Parliament, April 13, 1829, which removed from the Roman Catholics, particularly those of Ireland, the political disabilities which had lain upon them. The Act was one of simple justice; but the tardiness of its execution is a striking instance of the existence in Protestantism of that grasping, persecuting, intolerant spirit so commonly condemned by Protestants as a Roman-Catholic spirit. From their subjugation in 1691, down to the Act, Roman Catholics in Ireland were grievously oppressed. No Roman Catholic could act as guardian for any child; a son turning Protestant could dispossess his father, and take the estate; a Roman-Catholic heir to a landed property was to be set aside in event of the next Protestant heir; no office, military or civil, could be held by a Roman Catholic; he could not vote, or marry a Protestant wife; he could not practise law, or teach school; a priest marrying a Roman Catholic and a Protestant was to be hanged. Such was the law; but the practice was naturally much milder, and several of these wicked laws were repealed by the Irish Parliament of 1790. In 1806 came the Union. Mr. Pitt pledged himself to secure an act of emancipation, but failed; and not until the agitation of O'Connell and the Catholic Association awoke the usually slumbering conscience of Great Britain about all that relates to Ireland was any thing done. But when aroused, the British are always fair; and so the measure of relief was triumphantly passed. See sub Titulo JOHNSON'S Cyclopaedia.

CATHOLIC EPISTLES. Seven epistles — those of James, First and Second Peter, First, Second, and Third John, and Jude — are so denominated. Three explanations, none very satisfactory, have been given of the term: 1. Because these epistles are "general letters of instruction, the name being at first applied only to a part, but afterwards including even those addressed to private person;" 2. Because the different apostles were engaged in writing them; 3. Because of the catholic doctrine taught in them; 4. The First Epistle of Peter, and the First Epistle of John, having from the beginning been received as authentic, obtained the name of catholic, or universally acknowledged (and therefore canonical), epistles, in order to distinguish them from the Epistle of James, the second of Peter, the second and third of John, and the Epistle of Jude, concerning which doubts were at first entertained; and they were considered by many as not being a rule of faith. But, their authenticity being at length acknowledged by the generality of the churches, they also obtained the name of catholic, or universally accepted, epistles, and were esteemed of equal authority with the rest. HORNE: Introduction (14th ed., London, 1877, vol. iv. p. 589).

CATHOLIC or UNITED COPTS, that portion of the Coptic Church which acknowledges the supremacy of the Pope. They numbered (1876) about thirteen thousand.

CATHOLICUS was, in the time of Constantine, a civil officer established after the organization by law of dioceses; each diocese having its catholicus, or receiver-general. As an ecclesiastical officer occurring in several Eastern churches, the catholicus occupied a position between the metropolitan and the patriarch. The Armenian Church has still three catholicis, — at Etchmiadzin, Ayhtamar, and Sis.

CATTLE-RAISING AMONG THE HEBREWS.

From the Bible we know that the patriarchs led a pastoral life. Their descendants continued this life, in connection with agriculture, even after the taking of Canaan. From 1 Sam. xx. 2, 1 Kings v. 3, 8, 63, and other passages, we get an idea of the extent of cattle-breeding which existed at different times. We confine ourselves to speaking of those kinds which were generally used in the house and for sacrificial purposes; viz., —

(1.) Neat-Cattle, collectively designated by the Hebrew word bakar. Single animals of this kind are alluph, an "ox," or shor, a "bullock;" the calves are styled e'gel, a "heifer," also a young cow, even when broke to the yoke (Judg. xiv. 18; Hos. x. 11), and para, even when grown, but still in full youthful vigor. There was a great demand for neat-cattle: many hundreds were yearly slaughtered in sacrifice; others were employed for food, especially veal (e.g., Deut. xii. 21; 2 Sam. xii. 4; 1 Kings iv. 23), although, among some ancient nations, it was regarded as an act of wanton prodigality to slay useful agricultural beasts in order to enjoy their flesh. The milk was used either sweet or curdled, and was made also into cheese. Cattle were yoked to the plough (Deut. xxii. 10; 1 Kings xix. 19 sq.), likewise for draught (Num. vii. 3 sq.), but more especially for threshing. They were driven with a pointed stick. During summer, cattle ranged under the open sky. In the stalls their fodder was placed in a crib. Besides fresh grass and meadow-plants (Dan. iv. 29; Num. xxii. 4), meslin (Job vi. 5; Isa. xxx. 24, to which salt was also added, Isa. l.c.) is mentioned.

Concerning the cattle the following legal enactments were given:—

1. An ox and an ass must not be yoked together to the plough (Deut. xxii. 10); 2. The mouth of the threshing-oxen was not to be bound (Deut. xxv. 4); 3. A goring ox was to be stoned, and his flesh not to be eaten (Exod. xxi. 28 sq.); 4. Whoever stole, and then sold or slaughtered, an ox, must give five oxen in satisfaction (Exod. xxii. 1); but, if the animal was found alive in the possession of the thief, he was merely required to make double restitution (Exod. xxii. 4); 5. Whoever met an ox that had fallen or strayed was under obligation immediately to help it up, and bring it back to the owner (Exod. xxiii. 4; Deut. xxii. 1, 4); 6. The law of the sabbath had also reference to the cattle (Exod. xx. 10, xxiii. 12).

(2.) Small Cattle, collectively designated by the Hebrew word son, "sheep," singly by sch, "lamb." Sheep-breeding formed the chief employment of a large part of the people, and even kings had their shepherds. The flesh of the sheep, especially that of wethers and lambs, was a highly esteemed food (1 Sam. xxv. 18; Isa. xxii. 13). The milk of sheep, as well as their wool, was also made use of; the former for culinary purposes, the latter for garments. Sheep-shearing was a rural festive occasion (1 Sam. xxv. 4; 2 Sam. xiii. 23); of the wool, tithes were to be paid (Deut. xviii. 4). The color of sheep is in the East generally white (Isa. i. 18), although black ones are also found (Gen. xxx. 32), as well as spotted and grizzled.

Along with the sheep are classed the goats. They were used not only for sacrifice, but also for food (Deut. xiv. 4). Their milk was also used (Prov. xxvii. 27), it being more wholesome than that of sheep. Their skins were employed as clothing by poor persons (Heb. xi. 37), whilst their hair was often the material of tent-cloth (Exod. xxvi. 7) as well as of mattresses and bedding (1 Sam. xix. 13, 16). On the Mosaic enactment respecting cooking a kid in its mother's milk (comp. Exod. xxiii. 19, xxxiv. 26; Deut. xiv. 21), comp. the art. Viehzucht, in Herzog's Real-Encyclopädie (1st ed.) by Leyrer. B. PICK.

CAUSSIN, Nicholas, b. at Troyes, 1583; d. in Paris, July 2, 1651; entered the Society of Jesus in 1607; became confessor to Louis XIII., and wrote Cour Sainte, translated into English, The Holy Court, by Thomas Hawkins, London, 1663. His De Eloquentia Sacra et Humana was also a much-used book, and often reprinted.

CAVALIER, Jean. See CAMISARDS.

CAVE, William, a learned patristic scholar and author; b. at Pickwell, Leicestershire, Dec. 30, 1637; d. at Windsor, Aug. 4, 1713. He was made M.A. of St. John's College, Cambridge, in 1660, and D.D. 1672, and by Oxford in 1681. In 1662 he was appointed vicar of Islington, and afterwards one of the King's chaplains; in 1679 rector of All Hallows the Great, London; and canon of Windsor in 1681; and in 1690 vicar of Isleworth. His repute rests upon his eminent attainments in patristics. In his different works he makes use of over two thousand fathers, and writers upon the fathers. His principal works are: (1) Apostolici, or History of the Apostles and Fathers in the Three First Centuries of the Church, London, 1677; Ecclesiastica, or History of the Most Eminent Fathers of the Fourth Century, London, 1683, folio. (2) Scriptorum Ecclesiasticorum Historia Literaria (from the birth of Christ to the fourteenth century), London, 1688, 2 vols. folio. The first two were republished by Rev. Henry Cary, Oxford, 1840, 3 vols. 8vo, under the title, The Lives of the Most Eminent Fathers of the Church that Flourished in the First Four Centuries. The latter work was brought down from 1698 to 1517, and finally appeared (best edition), Oxford, 1740-43, 2 vols. folio, reprinted Basel, 1741-45, 2 vols. folio. (3) Primitive Christianity, London, 1672; reprinted, Oxford, 1840, along with Cave's Dissertation on the Government of the Ancient Church (London, 1683). (4) Tabulæ Ecclesiasticæ, tables of ecclesiastical writers, London, 1674. (5) Charophylax Ecclesiasticus (an improved edition of the preceding), London, 1685.

Cave was uncritical, but extremely industrious. He did not know how to use the collections he made; but others, such as Möhler, have drawn from his reservoir. So, although he was not a scientific patristic scholar, he yet greatly helped patristic learning.

CAWDREY, Daniel, a Nonconformist; d. October, 1664; educated at Peterhouse, Cambridge; ejected from his living of Dilling, in Northamptonshire, 1662; a member of the Westminster Assembly of Divines, and author of numerous works of a controversial character, principally against the liturgy of the Church of England, against independency, and also of a work on the sabbath, which was his masterpiece.

CAYET, Pierre Victor Palma, b. at Mont-richard in Touraine, 1525; d. in Paris, 1610; studied at Geneva; was ordained minister at Poitiers, and became chaplain to Catherine of Bourbon, but was deposed by the thirteenth general synod (1594) on account of two scandalous treatises he wrote on sins against the Sixth Commandment; embraced Romanism, and was made professor of Hebrew in the Sorbonne. The Remonstrances and Admonitions he addressed to his former co-religionists attracted no attention; and he is now known only on account of his historical works, — the Chronologie Noveaire, 1608, and the Chronologie Septenaire, 1608, and his translation of the German tale of Dr. Faustus.

CAZALLA, Augustin, b. 1506; d. May 21, 1559; studied at Valladolid and Alcalá; became a pupil of Carranza, and was in 1545 appointed chaplain and almoner to Charles V. At the outbreak of the Smalcaldian war he accompanied the emperor to Germany, and returned in 1552 to Spain, — a Lutheran. He preached his new ideas in Valladolid and Salamanca with more and more openness, but was in 1558 arrested by the Inquisition, brought before the tribunal, and condemned to death, together with his mother, brethren, sisters, and a large circle of friends. At the Auto da fé some of the guilty were burnt alive; but others, among whom Augustin, were first strangled before they were burnt.

CECIL, Richard, an eminent evangelical, b. in London, Nov. 8, 1748; d. at Hampstead, Aug. 15, 1810. In his early life he professed infidelity, but about 1772 was converted, and the next year entered Queen's College, Oxford; was ordained priest 1777, and held several clerical appointments. He was distinguished as an eloquent preacher of gospel truths, and for his skill in music and painting. See Memoir in the Works, London, 1811, 4 vols., reprinted New York, 1845, 3 vols.; also his Elementary Religious Truths from the Five Books of Moses, London, 1881, 2 vols.

CEILLIER, Remi, b. 1688; d. 1761; entered the Congregation of Saint Vannes (Reformed Benedictine) in 1715, and published Histoire Générale des Auteurs Sacrés et Ecclésiastiques, 23 vols., Paris, 1729-63.

CELESTINE is the name of five popes. — Celestine I., September, 422-July 26, 432; tried to assert his authority over the African Church by claiming the right to receive appeals, but was severely rebuked by an African synod. In the controversy between Nestorius and Cyrillus he was more successful. The latter addressed the Bishop of Rome as the supreme judge and arbiter of the Christian Church; and Celestine was not slow in condemning Nestorius, and intrusting the execution of the verdict to Cyrillus. — Celestine II., Sept. 26, 1143-March 8, 1144. — Celestine III., March 30, 1191-Jan. 8, 1198; began his pontificate by crowning Henry VI., and continued during his whole reign to be contemptuously dependent on the emperor. Even in the case of Richard I. of England, who on his return from the Holy Land was taken prisoner by Duke Leopold of Austria, he dared not interfere with the necessary energy, though the case was a breach of international law, and the Pope just based his claims to political supremacy on his office as the guardian of international law. — Celestine IV., Oct. 26-Nov. 17, 1241. — Celestine V., July 5-Dec. 13, 1294. After the death of Nicholas IV. there occurred a vacancy of two years and three months; until finally the cardinals, compelled by Charles of Anjou, King of Naples, agreed to raise Pietro di Murrone, a hermit, founder of the order of the Celestines, and eighty years old, to the papal throne. In moving from his cell at Murrone to the Vatican in Rome, the poor old man simply lost his head; but, feeling his own unfitness for the assumed task, he abdicated, and determined to return to his solitude. His successor, however, Boniface VIII., feared that somebody might use the former pope as a suitable material for a schism, had him seized, and kept him in prison till his death, May 19, 1296.

CELESTINES, The, a monastic order, founded in 1254 by Pietro di Murrone, afterwards Pope Celestine V., followed the rule of St. Benedict, and spread rapidly in Germany, France, and Italy; but at present there are only a few convents left. There is a Franciscan congregation which bears the same name.

CELIBACY, in the Roman Church, is the state of virginity to which a person pledges himself, either by a special vow, or by receiving the consecration of one of the higher ecclesiastical orders. The Jewish priests and high priests lived in marriage; but, on account of the holiness of their office, they were forbidden to marry a harlot, a profane or a divorced woman. The high priest was even forbidden to marry a widow (Lev. xxi. 7, 8, 13, 14; comp. SAALSCHÜTZ: Das Mosaische Recht, II. 786-788). When preparing for actual service they were furthermore demanded to abstain from their wives, as was the whole people at the time when the law was given them on Mount Sinai (Exod. xix. 15; comp. SPENCER: De Legibus Hebræorum Ritualibus, Tübingen, 1732, pp. 189 sqq.). The holy books of the new dispensation contain no prohibition of marriage. Several of the apostles were married (Matt. viii. 14; 1 Cor. ix. 5), and recommended even the chiefs of the congregation to marry (1 Tim. iii. 2), though without overlooking, that, under certain circumstances, it would be better not to marry (1 Cor. vii. 38). From this last notice and others of the same bearing, there arose very early in the Church an idea that the unmarried state ought to be preferred to the married (Hermas, lib. I. vision II. 3; Ignatius ad Polycarp. c. V.), and the idea soon developed into actual contempt of marriage (Origenes in Num. Hom. VI., ed. de la Rue, Tom. II. p. 288; Hieronymus ad Jovinianum, I. 4). Already, in the second century, instances occur of voluntary vows of virginity; and the demand of abstinence before officiating was generally acknowledged as just (comp. SCHWEGLER: Der Montanismus, Tübingen, 1841, p. 122). In the fourth century, laws were issued with the same tendency, such as c. 1, Conc. Neocæsar. a. 314 (c. 9, dist. XXVIII.); c. 10, Conc. Ancyran. a. 314 (c. 8, eod.). Unmarried men were preferred for ecclesiastical offices, though ecclesiastics were as yet not forbidden to marry: nay, it was even forbidden to dissolve a marriage for religious reasons (c. 5 Apostolorum in c. 14, dist. XXVIII.; comp. the account of the close of the Council of Niceæ by SOCRATES, Hist. Eccl. lib. I. c. 11, and SOZOMENUS, Historia Tripartita, lib. I. c. 23, in c. 12, dist. XXXI.). Siricius, Bishop of Rome in 385, declared (Ad Himerium Tarraconensem, Ep. I. c. 7, in c. 3, 4 dist. LXXXII.), that, under the old dispensation, the priest's marriage had been allowed because priests could be taken only from the tribe of Levi; but with the abrogation of this limit also the license was abrogated, as the obscenæ cupiditates, i. e., marriage, greatly impeded the ecclesiastical duties. The next bishops of Rome followed in the same track (see the decretals of Innocent I. from 404 and 405 in c. 4-6, dist. XXXI. and of Leo I. from 446 and 458 in c. 1, dist. XXXII. and c. 10, dist. XXXI., etc.), and the whole Western Church soon joined issue with Rome (Conc. Carthag., II. a. 390, c. 2 in c. 3, dist. XXXI., c. 3, dist. LXXXIV.; Conc. Carthag., V. a. 401, c. 3 in c. 13, dist. XXXII., c. 4, dist. LXXXIV., etc.). The prohibition regarded at first only bishops, priests, and deacons, but from the fifth century also subdeacons, who were not allowed to enter into marriage after ordination (Leo I., a. 446 in c. 1, dist. XXXII.; Gregory I., a. 591 and 593 in c. 1, dist. XXXI., c. 2, dist. XXXII., etc.; and Conc. Agath. a. 506, c. 39 in c. 19, dist. XXXIV.). The clergy of the lower orders were allowed to marry, though not widows, or for a second time (Conc. Carthag., V. a. 401, c. 3 in c. 13, dist. XXXII.; Gregory I. a. 601 in c. 3 eod.). The civil law confirmed these ordinances. Married persons, or such as had children, could not be elected bishops. The marriage of the clergy of the higher orders was declared null and void, and the children sprung from such a marriage illegitimate (c. 10, 14 Cod. Theod. de Episcopis et Clericis by Constantius and Constans, a. 353 and 357; Theodosius and Valentinian, a. 434 in c. 20 Cod. Just. cit. I. 3-c. 42, § 1, c. 45 C. J. de Episc. et Cler.; Justinian, a. 528 and 530, Nov. V., c. 8, a. 535; Nov. VI., c. 1, 5, a. 535; Nov. XXII., c. 42, a. 536; Nov. CXXXIII., c. 1, 14, 29, a. 546).

At this point the Greek Church halted; and its present arrangement of the matter rests upon the ancient canon law. But the Latin Church pushed onwards. Its conception of the duty of virginity grew more and more severe, though it met with great resistance from the side of the clergy. From the middle of the eleventh century, Hildebrand, afterwards Pope Gregory VII., exercised a decisive influence on the question, as is apparent from the decretals of Leo IX. (c. 14, dist. XXXII., a. 1054), Stephen IX. (c. 14, dist. XXXI., a. 1058), Nicholas II. (c. 5, dist. XXXII., a. 1059), and Alexander II. (c. 6, dist. XXXII., c. 16-18, dist. LXXXI., a. 1063). At a synod of 1074 he revived the decree of 1059 and 1063 according to which a married priest who administered the Lord's Supper, and a layman who received the sacrament from a married priest, should be excommunicated (c. 15, dist. LXXXI.). In 1089 Urban II. decreed that any ecclesiastic of the higher orders who married should lose his office and benefice (c. 10, dist. XXXII.), to which the councils of Rheims (1119) and of the Lateran (1123) added that such a marriage should immediately be dissolved, and the parties shut up in a place of penitence. When, in the beginning of the sixteenth century, the Reformers completely abandoned the Roman system, Charles V., who, by the Interim of 1548, had tried to abrogate it, caused the subject to be thoroughly ventilated by the Council of Trent (PALLAVICINI: Hist. Conc. Trid. XVII. 4, 8, XXII. 10, 15, XXIV. 12; SARPI: Hist. Conc. Trid. VII. 20; WESSENBERG: Die grossen Kirchenversammlungen d. 15 und 16 Jahrhunderts, IV. pp. 99 sqq.). The council, however, generally confined itself to confirming the existing state. The duty of remaining in the unmarried state is, for the higher orders, so absolutely binding, that it makes a marriage contracted after consecration null and void. If one belonging to the lower orders marries, the marriage is valid; but the person loses his ecclesiastical position. Married persons can obtain consecration to the lower orders after a vow of perpetual marital abstinence; but they cannot be promoted to any of the higher orders unless the wife declares herself willing to take the veil, and enter a convent. The Evangelical Church has never acknowledged the prohibition of marriage. The question is carefully discussed in the Confession of Augsburg (art. XXIII.), the Apology (art. VI.), Confessio Helvetica, I. (art. 37), II. (art. 29), Confessio Anglicana (art. 8, 24), etc.; and the various evangelical church organizations rest upon the same principle.

CELLARIUS, Martin, b. at Stuttgart, 1499; d. at Basel, Oct. 11, 1564; studied Oriental languages and theology under Reuchlin and Melancthon, but joined in 1522 the Anabaptists, and was even arrested at Königsberg as a spiritual vagabond; recovered slowly from this error, by the aid of Capito and Œcolampadius; settled at Basel in 1536, and was in 1546 appointed professor of the Old Testament there. A list of his writings is found in the Athenæ Rauricæ, p. 24.

CELSIUS, Olaus, b. 1670; d. 1756; was professor of Oriental languages and theology in the University of Upsal, Sweden; undertook, with the support of King Charles XI., extensive botanical excursions, and published Hierobotanicon seu de Plantis Sanctæ Scripturæ Dissertationes Breves, Upsal, 1745-47.

CELSUS, a Greek philosopher who in the second century (about 178) wrote a book against the Christians, to which Origen replied with his Contra Celsum. Nothing is known either of the book or of the author, except what can be gathered from Origen's reply. Keim has attempted to reconstruct the book from these fragments: Celsus wahres Wort . . . widerhergestellt, Zürich, 1873. See ORIGEN.

CELTIC CHURCH. See KELTIC CHURCH.

CEN'CHREÆ, the eastern harbor of Corinth, on the Saronic Gulf, about nine miles east of the city. A Christian Church was established there, of which Phoebe was deaconess (Rom. xvi. 1). Paul sailed from thence to Ephesus (Acts xviii. 18). The modern name among the educated is still κεχρηæ (Kenchreæ), although the vulgar name is Kikries.

CENSER. It is certainly reasonable to suppose that the censor used by the Hebrews was similar to that of the Egyptians, which consisted of a box in which were the live coals, a straight or slightly curved handle by which to carry it, and, at a convenient place on the handle, a little cup, in which were the small round pellets of the incense. The priest projected these pellets into the coals by means of his thumb and finger. The fact that the Jewish incense was a paste lends additional likelihood to the supposition.

CENSER, in Roman-Catholic Worship. See THURIBLE.

CENSORSHIP OF BOOKS is an institution which examines all literary works destined to be published, and either authorizes or forbids their publication. Institutions of this kind are not older than the invention of the printing-press; while prohibition of books as dangerous to religion, morals, and the State, dates back to a much earlier time. Thus all works on magic were condemned to be destroyed as books of bad contents during the reign of Alexander Severus; and Constantine issued an edict that the works of Arius should be burnt, those who used or possessed them were threatened with death. Also the Church forbade, on its own account, the reading of Pagan or heretical books (see Apost. Const. lib. I., cap. VI.; Concil. Carthag. IV., c. 398, can. XVI., etc.). During the middle ages, both Church and State adhered firmly to these maxims.

After the discovery of the printing-press, however, and more especially since this invention became so formidable a weapon in the hands of the Reformation, simple prohibition, in the form of destruction of books already printed, proved impractical; and preventive measures, taking effect before the publication, were resorted to. It was the Roman Church which introduced the censorship of books. In a letter addressed to the Archbishops of Cologne, Mayence, Treves, and Magdeburg, Alexander VI. ordered, in 1501, that no book should be printed without special authorization. In 1515 the Council of the Lateran decreed that no book should be printed without having been examined, in Rome, by the Pope or the magister sacri palatii; in the other dioceses, by the bishop, or the inquisitor of heresies. Further and more detailed legislation followed, and the Council of Trent sanctioned the measures by its decretum de editione et usu sacrorum librorum. But while the State, which at first adopted the institution, and used it for its own purposes, afterwards abolished it as inadequate and vicious (in which it was followed both by the Lutheran and the Reformed Churches), the Roman Church still maintains it in all its rigor. No ecclesiastic is permitted to publish any thing without the authorization of his superior.

As the Roman Church could exercise no censorship over the literatures of Protestant countries, it was necessary to continue the old prohibition. By the Council of Trent the whole subject-matter had been placed in the hands of a committee; and the results of the labors of this committee, which were never laid before the council, but sent directly to the Pope, were the ten rules concerning prohibited books and the Index Librorum Prohibitorum. The rules have been further enlarged and improved by Clement VIII., Sixtus V., Alexander VII., and especially by Benedict XIV., by his constitution of July 10, 1753. The Index was continued by a Congregatio Judicis; but it has never been acknowledged in Germany, and in France it has been formally rejected (see De l'Autorité de l'Index en France, Paris, 1853). Besides its Index Lib. Prohib., the Roman Church also keeps an Index Lib. Expurgatorum and an Index Lib. Expurgandorum. MEJER.

CENSUS. In the Old Testament there is mention made of twelve censuses: 1. Under Moses (Exod. xxxviii. 26; Num. i. 2, xxvi.); 2. Under David (2. Sam. xxiv. 9); 3. Under Solomon (2 Chron. ii. 17, 18); 4. Rehoboam (1 Kings xii. 21); 5. Abijah (2 Chron. xiii. 3); 6. Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. xvii. 14-19); 7. Amaziah (2 Chron. xxv. 5, 6); 8. Uzziah (2 Chron. xxvi. 13); 9. Under Zerubbabel (Ez. ii. 64, viii. 1-14). Some important facts are evinced by a scrutiny of these passages; e.g., the kingdom of Judah was largest under Jehoshaphat; the ratio of population was five hundred and thirty to the square mile, a dense population; but then Palestine had a very fertile soil; nor is the number unparalleled in modern times.

In the New Testament, there is incidental reference to the census of the Roman Empire ordered by Cæsar Augustus: "Now it came to pass, in those days there went out a decree from Cæsar Augustus, that all the world should be enrolled, i.e., counted" (Luke ii. 1). We know that there were at least three such enrolments during his reign. The Roman method differed from the Jewish in requiring the enrolment of women: hence Joseph takes Mary with him to Bethlehem, and there Jesus is born. Thus upon the peculiarity of the Roman census, we may say the Bethlehem birth of Jesus depended. The ultimate object of the census was taxation: this design was probably at first concealed, for there is no recorded outbreak under Herod; but one later on occurred (Acts v. 37). For critical questions and difficulties in connection with Luke's statement, see QUIRINIUS.

CENTRAL AMERICA comprises, geographically, Guatemala, Honduras, San Salvador, Nicaragua, Costa Rica, Panama, and the British Colony Honduras or Balize; but politically Panama belongs to Columbia. The number of inhabitants is only approximate: Guatemala, 1,194,000; British Honduras, 24,700; Honduras, 351,700; San Salvador, 600,000; Nicaragua, 250,000; Costa Rica, 165,000. The majority of the population are Indians. The whites, descendants of the Spanish emigrants, form only a small minority, and the Ladinos, a mixture of Indians and Europeans, another minority equally small. The general standard of civilization has been considerably lowered in these states since their separation from the mother-country; and the cause is undoubtedly the rough treatment which the Church experienced during the Revolution and the next following decades. The property of the Church was confiscated, the monasteries were abolished, the monks banished, and the secular clergy heavily persecuted. The clergy still represents nearly all the civilization which the nation possesses; but, impoverished and down-trodden as it is, it can exercise no decisive influence, though the mass of the people is fervently devoted to the Church. At the head of the clergy stands the Archbishop of Guatemala; his suffragans are the Bishops of Leon (Nicaragua), Comayagua (Honduras), San Salvador, and San José (Costa Rica). The population is Roman Catholic throughout. The number of Protestants is insignificant: only in British Honduras is there an Anglican Church. The legal position of the Protestants is somewhat different in the different states.

Guatemala and Costa Rica concluded in 1852 concordats with the Pope. In Guatemala the monastic orders, even the Jesuits, were allowed to return, and the Jesuits take care of the popular education. In the city of Guatemala there is a university, the best educational institution in Central America. In Costa Rica the Roman-Catholic faith was declared the religion of the republic, but the Jesuits were not admitted. In both states free worship has been secured to the Protestants. In Honduras, San Salvador, and Nicaragua, the Church has suffered exceedingly from poverty. It has no regular revenue, and the tax which is levied in San Salvador under the name of "Religious Gift" has proved a barren source. A great number of the clergy are ignorant negroes. In Honduras the Roman-Catholic Church has the exclusive right of public worship; but other denominations are allowed to worship in private. G. PLITT.

CENTURIAE MAGDEBURGENSES ("The Magdeburg Centuries"). The first, and, for a long time, unsurpassed attempt to write the history of the Church from an evangelical point of view, was planned by Flacius, and executed by him and a number of other scholars, — Johann Wigand, Matthæus Judex, Basilius Faber, Andreas Corvinus, Thomas Holzhtuter, etc. The headquarters of the enterprise was Magdeburg, and hence the name under which the work is generally known, though its real title is Ecclesiastica Historia Novi Testamenti. It was printed at Basel, and appeared in thirteen volumes folio, from 1559 to 1574. It comprises the thirteen first centuries of the history of the Church, and gives a volume to each century, arranging the materials under the following fifteen heads: de loco et propagatione ecclesie; de persecutione et tranquillitate ejus; de doctrina ejusque inclinatione; de hæresibus; de cæremoniis diversis in locis; de gubernatione ecclesie; de schismatibus et certaminibus levioribus; de conciliis; de personis illustribus in ecclesie; de hæreticis; de martyribus; de miraculis; de rebus judaicis externis seu politicis; de aliis religionibus extra ecclesiam; de mutationibus politicis in imperiis. The style is tasteless and repulsive, the arrangement mechanical and awkward, the tone controversial; but the learning is immense, the criticism bold and upright, the spirit enthusiastic; and thus it became, in spite of its defects, the inauguration of the free study of church-history. See BAUR: Die Epochen d. kirch. Geschichtschreibung, Tübingen, 1852; SCHAFF: Church History, vol. I. p. 37, revised edition, New York, 1882.

CENTURION, from centum, "one hundred," occurs Matt. viii. 5, 8, 13, Luke vii. 2, 6, Acts xxi. 32, xxii. 25, 26, etc.; and denotes an officer in the Roman army, commanding one hundred men.

CEOLFRID, b. about 642 in the kingdom of Northumberland; d. at Langres, France, Sept. 25, 716; was abbot, first of Jarrow, and afterwards of Jarrow and Wearmouth. A letter by him, addressed to Naiton, King of the Picts, has been preserved by Bede (Hist. Eccl., V. 21). His life was written by an anonymous contemporary printed in Stephenson's edition of Bede, and by Bede in his Lives of the Five First Abbots of Wearmouth and Jarrow.

CERDO, a Gnostic teacher from the second century, the predecessor of Marcion, and known only through him; was a native of Syria, and came about 137 to Rome, where Marcion became his pupil. He left no writings. See Gnosticism.

CERINTHUS, a Gnostic teacher who came from Egypt, and was active in Asia Minor towards the close of the apostolic age. He was a converted Jew, and represents a mixture of Gnosticism and Judaism. He left no writings, and the sect he founded soon died out. See Gnosticism and JOHN THE APOSTLE.

CESTIUS GALLUS was procurator provincie in Syria when the Jewish rebellion, which ended with the destruction of the temple, broke out. From Antioch he moved slowly towards Jerusalem; and though he easily drove the Jews back to the upper part of the city, and every thing seemed to indicate a rapid close of the campaign, he suddenly retreated, harassed in the rear by the exultant Jews. When Nerva heard of these proceedings, he immediately sent Vespasian to Palestine to take the command; but Gallus died before Vespasian's arrival.

CHADERTON, Laurence, the first master of Emmanuel College, Cambridge; b. at Lees Hall, Lancashire, Sept. 14, 1536; d. November, 1640. He was born of a Roman-Catholic family, and was disinherited when he joined the Established Church. He was a fellow of Christ's College, Cambridge, and preached in Cambridge for many years with great applause. Sir Walter Mildmay, on refounding Emmanuel College in 1584, chose him for master, and, indeed, conditioned the continuance of the foundation upon his acceptance. He was one of the five Puritan representatives in the Hampton Court Conference (see title), and also one of the Bible translators, translating from Chronicles to Canticles inclusive. He published a treatise On Justification, and a sermon preached at St. Paul's Cross in 1578. Some other of his theological works remain in manuscript.

CHALDÆANS. In the Old Testament, from the time of Jeremiah and the establishment of the new Babylonian Empire under Nabopolassar and Nabuchadrezzar, the terms Chaldæans and Chaldees denote the inhabitants of Babylonia, or the subjects of the Babylonian Empire (Jer. xxi. 4, xxxii. 4, 5; Hab. i. 6; Ezek. xxiii. 14, 15). With this terminology agree both Strabo, who makes the territory inhabited by the Chaldees border on Arabia and the Persian Gulf, and the monuments, which on the one side (west) place the Chaldees opposite to the Syrians, and on the other (south) extend their country to the sea. There was another nation of the name Chaldæans, or Chaldees, an Armenian mountain-tribe, related to the Kurds and Karduches, and, according to Strabo, originally called the Chalybes. But they were of Aryan, Indo-Germanic descent, and had nothing to do with the Babylonian Chaldæans, who were Shemites. In the inscriptions, the name Chaldee can be traced back till about 900 B. C.; but there can be no doubt that it is much older; and it seems originally to have denoted a special part — the southern Shinar — of the whole Babylonian territory. When the Book of Daniel (ii. 2, 5, 10, iv. 4, v. 7, 11), and the profane historians Curtius, Strabo, and Diodorus, speak of the Chaldæans as the learned class of the Babylonian people, or even as a peculiar section of this class, — the astrologers, — the terminology has no foundation whatever in reality. See, for further information, ASSYRIA, BABYLONIA, etc. (Add to literature under Assyria, Assyriologische Bibliothek, ed. by FRIEDRICH DELITZSCH and PAUL HAUPT, in course of publication at Leipzig since 1881.)

CHALCEDON, a city of Bithynia, on the Bosphorus, near Constantinople. Here the fourth œcumenical council was convened (451) by the Emperor Marcianus. Six hundred and thirty bishops were present (mostly from the Orient), the legates of the Pope Leo I., and the commissioners of the emperor. The sessions began Oct. 8, and ended Oct. 31. The principal result of the debates was the condemnation of Eutychianism, and the symbolical statement of the orthodox Christology. See CHRISTOLOGY.

CHALMERS, Thomas, the leader of the Free Church of Scotland; b. in East Anstruther, Fifeshire, March 17, 1780; d. in Edinburgh, Sunday night, May 30, 1847. The family to which he belonged were middle-class people of the strictest type of Calvinism; and hence, in his opening years, he received thorough indoctrination. He entered St. Andrew's University when only eleven years old, and confined his attention almost exclusively to mathematics, but did not give up his original intention of becoming a preacher, and accordingly was licensed by the presbytery of St. Andrew's, January, 1799. His character early developed into maturity. Instead of beginning his professional work, he continued the study of mathematics and natural science; and during the winter of 1802-03 he acted as assistant of the professor of mathematics at St. Andrew's. He showed an extraordinary power to awaken enthusiasm in almost any topic he took up; although it was this very fact which at that time cost him his place, the authorities disliking the novelty of his methods. He settled as minister of Kilmany, nine miles from St. Andrew's, May, 1803, and in the following winter, while preaching regularly, opened voluntary and independent classes in mathematics at the university, which were largely attended, although vigorously discouraged by the authorities. He was a faithful pastor at Kilmany, but his heart was not in his work. He was trammelled by the prevailing moderatism, which put culture above piety, and state support above independence. In 1808 evidence of the trend of his thinking appeared in his Inquiry into the Extent and Stability of National Resources. The supply of man's physical and social needs was uppermost in his mind. But God was preparing him by these very studies for a glorious career of divine service. In the midst of such work he was visited with severe domestic afflictions, and a serious illness brought him to death's door; but he recovered after a year. Dr. Brewster asked him to contribute to his Edinburgh Encyclopædia. He at first chose "Trigonometry," but at length took "Christianity." And as he examined the doctrines of this religion, and went deeper into its mysteries, he realized its importance, and by studying about Christianity he became a Christian. The congregation quickly became aware that he had really not so much resumed his work among them as begun it. His whole soul was on fire, and his culture was now used to make the saving truth of saving power. He cut loose from the moorings of moderatism, and became a decided Evangelical. His eloquence was expended in new channels, and with great results.

In July, 1815, he was formally admitted as minister of the Tron Church, Glasgow. In 1816 he delivered the famous series of seven Discourses on the Christian Revelation, viewed in Connection with Modern Astronomy. In September, 1819, he removed from the Tron parish to that of St. John's, in order that he might, in a newly-constituted parish, have an opportunity of testing the practicability in a large city of the old Scottish scheme of providing for the poor. In the parish there were two thousand families. These he distributed into twenty-five divisions; and over each such district he put an elder and a deacon,—the former to attend to their spiritual, the latter to their temporal, needs. Two commodious school-houses were built; four competent teachers were employed, and by school-fees of two and three shillings each per quarter, seven hundred children were educated; while on Sunday the forty or fifty local schools supplied religious instruction. Dr. Chalmers not only presided over all this system of work, but made himself familiar with all the details, even visiting personally every two years each family of the parish, and holding evening meetings. He also assumed complete charge of the poor; and by thorough system, and consequent weeding-out of unworthy cases, he reduced the cost of maintaining them from fourteen hundred to two hundred and eighty pounds per annum. This efficient system, however, in 1837 was given up; and the "English" plan of compulsory assessments, which requires much less trouble, and probably does much less good, was substituted. In November, 1823, Dr. Chalmers became professor of moral philosophy in St. Andrew's University, and in November, 1828, professor of theology in Edinburgh. In 1833 he issued his Bridgewater Treatise, On the Adaptation of External Nature to the Moral and Intellectual Constitution of Man. This work made a great sensation; and his biographer, Rev. Dr. Hanna, says, that, in consequence, he received "literary honors such as were never united previously in the person of any Scottish ecclesiastic." In 1834 he was elected fellow of the Royal Society of Edinburgh, and soon after one of its vice-presidents, in the same year a corresponding member of the institute of France; and in 1835 the University of Oxford conferred on him the degree of D.C.L.

Up to this time he had taken little part in church government; from then on he was destined to do more than any other man of the century. The friction between Church and State in Scotland was rapidly producing trouble. The attempt to settle ministers who were obnoxious to the congregations was the commonest complaint. The historic case is that of Marnoch. Here only one person in the parish signed the call; and yet the presbytery of Strathbogie decided, by a vote of seven to three, to proceed with the ordination, and did, although these seven were suspended. In so doing they were upheld by the civil authority, which annulled their suspension. But this case was only an aggravation of a common ill. Matters became so serious in all parts of Scotland, that a convocation was held in November, 1842, to consider the matter; and a large number of ministers resolved, that, if relief was not afforded, they would withdraw from the Establishment. No help came; and accordingly, on the 18th of May, 1843, four hundred and seventy clergymen withdrew from the General Assembly, and constituted themselves into the Free Church of Scotland, electing Dr. Chalmers as their first moderator. He had foreseen the separation, and drawn up a scheme for the support of the outgoing ministers. But, after he had safely piloted the new Church through the stormy waters, he gave himself up more exclusively to professional work, especially in connection with the New College, Edinburgh, of which he was principal, and to the composition of his Institutes of Theology. He died suddenly.

Dr. Chalmers is to-day a moulding influence. All the churches of Scotland unite to do him reverence. He was a greater worker than writer, and a greater man than either. It was surely enough honor for one life to inspire spiritual life throughout an entire land; and as the tireless and practical reformer, as the Christian philanthropist, and, above all, as the founder of the Free Church of Scotland, he will live. See Memoir of his life and writings by his son-in-law, Rev. WILLIAM HANNA, Edin., 1849-52, 4 vols.; J. L. WATSON: The Life of Thomas Chalmers, D.D., Edinburgh, 1881; DONALD FRASER: Thomas Chalmers, D.D., LL.D., London and New York, 1881.

CHAMIER, Daniel, b. 1565; d. Oct. 17, 1621; studied theology at Geneva, and had charge of various Reformed congregations in France, at last in Montauban, where, during the siege, he was killed by a cannon-ball. He distinguished himself by the courage and energy with which he fought for the rights of his church at every occasion, but especially during the discussions which preceded the Edict of Nantes. His writings, which are mostly polemical, comprise Dispute de la Vocation des Ministres en l'Eglise Réformée, Larochele, 1598; Epistolæ Jesuiticæ, Geneva, 1599; La Honte de Babylon, Larochele, 1612; Panstraticæ Catholicæ, unfinished, published by his son, Geneva, 1626, etc. See Memoir of D. Chamier, London, 1852; READ: Daniel Chamier, Paris, 1858.

CHANDIEU, Antoine de la Roche, b. at the Château of Chabot in Maconnais (Saone-Loire), 1534; d. at Geneva, Feb. 23, 1591; embraced the Reformation; studied theology at Geneva; was the minister of the Reformed congregation of Paris, 1555-62, and convoked the first national synod of the Reformed Church in France, Paris, May 26, 1559; retired in 1564 to his estates in Maconnais, but did not cease to take the most active part in all the business of the Reformed Church, in the synods, and at the court, as a preacher and as an author; fled to Switzerland after the Massacre of St. Bartholomew, and lived, first in Lausanne, afterwards in Geneva, as professor of Hebrew. His principal works are, Histoire des persecutions et martyrs de l'église de Paris depuis l'an 1557 jusqu'au temps de Charles IX., Lyons, 1563; Locus de Verbo Dei Scripto, 1584; De Christi Sacerdotio, 1588; De Vera Peccatorum Remissione, 1591, etc. Most of his writings were published either anonymously, or under the pseudonyms of Sadee and Zamariel. Collected editions appeared in 1592 and 1599.

CHANDLER, Edward, opponent of Collins; b. at Dublin, 1670; d. in London, July 20, 1750. He was made Bishop of Lichfield, 1717, and transferred to the see of Durham, 1730. He is best known by his Defence of Christianity from the Prophecies of the Old Testament (London, 1725), in reply to Collins's Discourse on the Grounds and Reasons of the Christian Religion. The work went over the whole ground with remarkable biblical and rabbinical learning. In 1727 Collins replied to it in his Scheme of Literal Prophecy considered; and the controversy closed by the publication of Chandler's Vindication of the Defence of Christianity from the Prophecies of the Old Testament, London, 1728. The point in debate was the existence of an expectation of the Messiah at the time of Christ's birth. This Collins denied. See COLLINS, A.; also CAIRNS, Unbelief in the Eighteenth Century, pp. 77-79.

CHANDLER, Samuel, b. at Hungerford in Berkshire in 1693; d. in London, May 8, 1766. His father, who was an eminent Nonconformist minister, gave him a good education, sending him first to Gloucester, where he formed what proved to be lifelong friendships with Bishop Butler and Archbishop Secker, and then to Leyden. In 1716 he was pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Peckham; and from 1726 pastor of the Presbyterian Church, Old Jewry, London, to which he ministered for forty years. His learning and talents were recognized by his election to the Royal and Antiquarian Societies, and doctorate in theology, both from Edinburgh and Aberdeen. On the death of George II. (1760), Chandler published a sermon in which he compared the deceased king to David. This drew out a pamphlet which set forth David as a bad man. Chandler replied briefly, but was led to give more study to David's history, and so wrote his best-known and most valuable work, finished just before his death, A Critical History of the Life of David, London, 1766, 2 vols. Svo, reprinted, Oxford, 1853. Among his other works of note (all published in London), are, A Vindication of the Christian Religion (against A. Collins), 1725; A Vindication of Daniel's Prophecies, 1728; The History of Persecution, 1736; A Vindication of the History of the Old Testament, 1741; Commentaries on Galatians, Ephesians, and 1 and 2 Thessalonians, 1777, and on Joel, 1735; four volumes of posthumous Sermons, 1768. In theology he was a semi-Arian.

CHANNING, William Ellery, the most celebrated and influential Unitarian theologian and philanthropist of America, and better known in Europe than most American authors; b. at Newport, R.I., April 7, 1780; d. at Bennington, Vt., Sunday, Oct. 2, 1842. His father was an honored judge and a moderate Calvinist; his mother, a refined and pious woman: under such influences he early manifested a deeply religious nature, and chose the clerical profession. He traced his conversion to the influence of the funeral of his father, and a religious revival which then swept over New England. He was graduated at Harvard College. He devoted his leisure hours chiefly to the study of Shakspeare. In 1798 he went as private tutor to Richmond, Va., and while there had such mental agony from religious doubts, that he was physically enfeebled, and returned to Newport in 1800 a "thin and pallid" invalid, with a constitution permanently impaired. At home he associated much with the Rev. Dr. Samuel Hopkins, — the famous Calvinist, and follower of Jonathan Edwards, — whom he warmly esteemed. In 1802 he was licensed to preach, and at once distinguished himself by his fire, his unction, and elegant style. Although popularly supposed to be orthodox, he was really an Arian, but with the ethical principles of Dr. Hopkins. On June 1, 1803, he was ordained, and installed pastor of a puritanical Calvinistic Congregation in Federal Street, Boston. His audience increased rapidly with his reputation for eloquence and devotion. His church was always well filled. At the close of his sermons he was often physically exhausted. He introduced a new era in preaching, and enlivened the pulpit by themes of Christian philanthropy and social reform.

Not very long after this time, it became apparent that many of the Congregational churches of New England, especially in Boston and its neighborhood, had, through various influences, become gradually Antitrinitarian and Anti-Calvinistic. In the separation which followed, Channing allied himself with the so-called "Liberal" party, and became their acknowledged head. He is commonly called a Unitarian; but in his own language he wished to regard himself as "belonging not to a sect, but to the community of free minds, of lovers of truth, and followers of Christ, both on earth and in heaven." This catholicity of spirit secured him the esteem of men of all schools and parties. In a letter of Aug. 29, 1841, addressed to an Englishman, he expressed the noble sentiment: "As I grow older . . . I distrust sectarian influence more and more. I am more detached from a denomination, and strive to feel more my connection with the Universal Church, with all good and holy men. I am little of a Unitarian, have little sympathy with the system of Priestley and Belsham, and stand aloof from all but those who strive and pray for clearer light, who look for a purer and more effectual manifestation of Christian truth" (Memoir, vol. II. p. 380). From this confession some have inferred that towards the close of his life he leaned more to orthodoxy; but this is emphatically denied by his nephew and biographer, and by Dr. Gannett, his colleague and successor. In another letter, written three months later (November, 1841), he says, "I value Unitarianism, not because I regard it as in itself a perfect system, but as freed from many great and pernicious errors of the older systems, as encouraging freedom of thought, as raising us above the depotism of the Church, and as breathing a mild and tolerant spirit into all the members of the Christian body" (Memoir, II. 400).

Channing opposed, on the one hand, the hard and bony Puritan orthodoxy of his day, and combated vigorously the traditional views on the trinity, the atonement, and total depravity; while on the other he equally opposed the rationalistic and radical Unitarianism, and sought a middle way. He emphasized the human element in Christ and Christianity, which was too much overlooked by Calvinism, and paid one of the most beautiful and eloquent tributes to the perfection of the moral character of Christ. He held up his example as the great ideal to be followed. He found in Christ a perfect manifestation of God to men, and at the same time the ideal of humanity, who spake with divine authority. He firmly believed in his sinlessness and miracles, especially his resurrection. He was "always inclined," he wrote as late as March 31, 1832, "to the doctrine of the pre-existence of Christ" (Memoir, II. 416). He was, therefore, not a humanitarian, like Priestley, but rather an Arian, as his nephew calls him (Memoir, II. 93). He paid little attention to metaphysical questions, and preferred to dwell on the historical Christ. But he remained a supernaturalist to the end; and his last utterances on the Gospels and the character of our Lord are among the strongest and noblest. See Memoir, II. 431, 436, 442.

Channing, however, was not so much a theologian as a preacher and a philanthropist. He was no dreamer, but a practical reformer. He labored for the purification and elevation of life and society, and entered heartily into schemes for the abolition of slavery, of intemperance, of prison-abuses, and for the circulation of the Bible. He had an extended idea of the nobility of human nature, and an unbounded faith in freedom and progress.

He was reserved and reticent, but earnest and ardent when aroused. He was short and slender. He had a devout and unworldly spirit. He was singularly free from selfishness, and full of sympathy for others. A French-Catholic writer calls him the "American Fénelon." The impression he made upon Coleridge, whom he met in England in 1822, was so favorable as to draw forth the expression, "Channing has the love of wisdom, and the wisdom of love." Dr. H. W. Bellows, one of his pupils, says (in his Centenary Address, 1880, p. 6), "He belonged to the order of Christians called Unitarians, but he belonged still more to the Church Universal; and nothing would have grieved him more than any attempt to shut him into any enclosure that shuts out the pure and good of any name, — Catholic or Protestant, Trinitarian or Unitarian."¹

Channing's Works were published in six volumes, Boston, 1848, and in London, 1865, two volumes; German translation by Sydow and Schulze, Berlin, 1850. The best known of them are his Evidences of Christianity, delivered at Cambridge 1821; his treatise on Slavery, 1841; his discourses on the Character of Christ; and his critical essays upon Milton, Fénelon, Bonaparte, Self-Culture. His Memoir, with Extracts from his Correspondence and Manuscripts, was prepared by his nephew, the Rev. William Henry Channing, London and Boston, 1848, 3 vols., 10th ed., 1874. (Cf. the French work, Channing, sa vie et ses œuvres, with a Preface by Ch. de Rémusat, 1857, enlarged ed., 1861.) An abridgment was published as a Centennial Memorial Edition in 1880 by the American Unitarian Association.

On the 7th of April, 1880, the centenary of his birth was celebrated at Newport, R.I. In the morning the Rev. Dr. Henry W. Bellows of New York delivered a Discourse (afterwards published, New York, by G. P. Putnam); in the afternoon the corner-stone of the Memorial Church was laid, and an address delivered by the Rev. W. H. Channing. Another meeting was held in the evening. Memorial meetings were also held in New York, Brooklyn, and Washington, and in several cities of England. Among the books more or less called forth by this centenary, although all published before it, were C. T. Brooks's William Ellery Channing: A Centennial Memory;

¹ To this I may add an extract from a private letter of Dr. Bellows (Oct. 10, 1881): "I have read with general assent your article on Channing, and do not feel disposed to change it. I am convinced, that although the survival of many ideas of his youth (and the pre-existence of Christ among them) makes it possible to say that Channing was not a humanitarian in the strict theological sense, and not a Unitarian after the prevailing modern type of Unitarianism, yet that he was as much a Unitarian as any of his contemporaries, and that his whole influence went toward the support of the Unitarian movement. It would be as absurd to cut him off from the body that acknowledged him as its head as to deny that Wesley was a Methodist, because he had tender and strong leanings towards the English Church. . . . Channing did not belong to us in any exclusive sense. Neither, I may add, do any of our leading men."

By Dr. Bellows's kind permission I make also the following extract from a letter to him by William F. Channing, M.D., a son of Dr. Channing, dated Oct. 10, 1881: "In the autumn of 1841, the year before his death, I improved the opportunity to ask him what his view then was of the nature of Christ. His answer was, 'I am more and more disposed to believe in his simple humanity.' . . . During my boyhood and earlier youth I had discussed long and often with my father the great questions of theology and religion; and I knew that during many years, while holding the most exalted view of Christ's position and office, he yet refused to dogmatize or definitely affirm Christ's rank and place in the scale of being." But see above.

C. A. BARTOL'S "Portrait," in Principles and Portraits; and, most important of all, Miss ELIZABETH PALMER PEABODY'S Reminiscences of Rev. William Ellery Channing, D.D., all published, Boston, 1880. The Channing Centenary, edited by Russell Morris Bellows, Boston, 1881 (532 pages), contains an account of the memorial meetings in America and Great Britain, and reports of the addresses made on those interesting occasions, which show the extent of the impression which Dr. Channing made upon his age, especially in New England. The Channing Memorial Church was dedicated Oct. 19, 1881. PHILIP SCHAFF.

CHAPEL (Latin, capella), a small church, destined for a family or a convent, but without parochial rights; or an addition to a large church, destined for occasional service, or for a mission congregation. The derivation of capella is obscure, but generally referred back to the capa, or cloak, of St. Martin, which the French kings carried with them in battle, deposited in a small, transportable structure, hence called a capella.

CHAPIN, Edwin Hubbell, D.D., a Universalist minister, b. at Union Village, Washington County, New York, Dec. 29, 1814; d. in New-York City, Dec. 26, 1880. In 1837 he was ordained to the Universalist ministry, and until 1840 preached to a society composed of Universalists and Unitarians in Richmond, Va. After a six-years' pastorate in Charlestown, and two years in Boston, Mass., he came to New York in 1848, as minister of the Fourth Universalist Society, and from that time until the last few years of his life, he was one of the most admired and popular preachers and lecturers of the city. Harvard College bestowed upon him the degrees of A.M. and D.D. His publications were numerous, although ephemeral, consisting in the main of sermons. Among them are Moral Aspects of City Life, 1853; True Manliness, 1854; Lessons of Faith and Hope, 1877; The Church of the Living God, and Other Sermons, 1881; God's Requirements and Other Sermons, 1881.

CHAPLAIN (capellanus), in the Roman-Catholic Church, means a parson's assistant, ordained priest himself, and aiding the parson in the discharge of his pastoral duties. According to canon law, a parish has only one parson; but when the flock is very large, or other circumstances prevent the parson from fulfilling his whole duty, the bishop can order him to procure one or more assistants (Trid. Sess. 21, c. 4 de ref.). These assistants (capellani, chaplains) are in the service of the parson, are paid by him, and may be dismissed by him at pleasure, though the bishop's approbation is necessary to their appointment. In cases in which, by endowments, means have been provided for the establishment of a perpetual chaplaincy, the incumbent, whether a capellanus curatus (that is, appointed for the general assistance of the parson), or a capellanus sacellanus, or vicarius, or primissarius (that is, appointed for some special service), ceases to be in the service of the parson, and cannot be dismissed by him, though he still remains in a certain dependence. As the word "capellanus" originally meant any one officiating in a capella, there are, of course, capellani regii, capellani episcopales, etc. The Pope has also a number of chaplains, divided into three groups,—capellani honorarii, a mere title; capellani ceremoniarii, who assist him in officiating; and capellani secreti, who serve as private secretaries. See VAN ESPEN: Jus. Eccl. Univers. pars. II.; PESOLD: Parochialrechte, 1848, I. 332 sqq; HINSCHIUS: System des Kath. Kirchenrechts, 2, 321 sq.

CHAPTERS, in the Roman-Catholic Church, mean ecclesiastical corporations, organized, both at the cathedrals, and, later on, also at collegiate churches, with special regard to the regulation of the divine service. They grew up from the presbyteries; that is, from those colleges of priests and deacons which in the old church stood by the side of the bishop as his council or senate; and they assumed a more distinct form, when, from the fourth century, the monastical vita communis (communal life) began to be transferred to the secular clergy.

Eusebius of Vercelli, and Augustine, introduced the vita communis at Vercelli and Hippo. The clergy lived together in one house (monasterium); and in the latter city, also, the monastic vow of perpetual poverty was adopted. This arrangement was imitated in Africa, Spain, and Gaul; but it was not generally accepted, nor fully developed, until the eighth century. At that time the vita canonica (canonical life), based upon Acts iv. 32, and, by its idea of common property, distinguished from the monastical life (regulariter vivere), with its absolute poverty, was organized in France by Chrodegang of Metz, about 760. See MANSI: Conc., 14, 313; WALTER: Fontes Jur. Eccle., p. 29. This organization spread so rapidly, that, under Louis the Pious, the synod of Aix-la-Chapelle (816) elaborated a new regulation, resting on Chrodegang's rules, as they rested on the rules of Benedict, and comprising not only the cathedral, but also the collegiate churches. According to both these regulations, the clergy should live together in one house (claustrum), with the bishop and their special head, who, according to Chrodegang, is the archdeacon, according to the synod of Aix-la-Chapelle, the praepositus, to whose discipline they were subject. From pure monasticism this organization differed by retaining that gradation of rank which follows with the gradation of ecclesiastical order and function, and the right of the individual to hold private property. In the ninth century this organization generally came to bear the name capitulum, which at first simply referred to the chapter of the Bible which was read aloud at their daily gatherings, then to the room or house in which the assembly was held (the chapter-house), and finally to the assembly itself and the whole organization.

In the latter part, however, of the ninth century, a division of the common property began to take place between the bishop and the chapter, and between the members of the chapter, each retaining for himself individually a certain portion of the common mass. At the same time it became customary for the members of the chapter, at least for those of the higher grades, to have houses of their own (mansiones); and thus the very foundation of the so-called vita canonica was gradually broken up. In the course of the eleventh century the transformation was nearly completed; but, in the latter part of the eleventh and the beginning of the twelfth century, a reaction arose. The ascetic and monastic tendency was still in the ascendancy; and supported by men like Petrus of Damiani, and Gerhoh of Reichensberg, and favored by the popes, an attempt at restoration was made. At many places the canonici seculares were replaced with canonici regulares, and at some, even the latter were replaced with Præmonstratensian monks. Nevertheless, the ascetic tendency proved too weak, or, rather, the relations which the holding of property had established between the clergy and the world were too manifold and too strong: the restoration failed. From the thirteenth century, the vita canonica in its original form was of very rare occurrence.

The members of a chapter (canonici majores or cathedrales, at a cathedral church, and canonici collegiales, at a collegiate church) consisted of two groups, which, however, were not so very sharply distinguished from each other. The canonici seniores, or capitulares, had a votum in capitulo, a stallum in choro, and, generally, a præbenda; that is, an individual revenue derived from real estate, ground-rent, tithes, tolls, etc. The canonici juniores, non capitulares, domicelli, or canonici in pulvere, were young men admitted into the chapter for further ecclesiastical development, and perhaps still frequenting the school (non emancipati). The conditions for admittance into the chapter were the tonsure, an age of fourteen years, a sound body, legitimate, and sometimes, also, noble birth, etc. Originally it was the bishop or the præpositus who selected the fit subjects for vacant places; afterwards it was the older members of the chapter itself; and finally, when by its participation in the administration of the diocese, and by its great wealth, the chapter had obtained an important political and social position, and a canonry had become the usual way in which the nobility provided for their younger sons, the pope, the emperor, the ruler of the country, the patron of the Church, and others, claimed a vote in the decision. For admission into the class of canonici seniores a higher ecclesiastical consecration than the tonsure was necessary; and the degree as magister, or doctor, or licentiate, in theology or canon law, here formed a counterbalance to nobility of birth and secular influences.

At the head of the chapter stood the præpositus, whose business it was to administer the property of the institution. The decanus had to watch over the discipline among the members, and their proper discharge of the duties of the service. He accordingly exercised a certain power of punishment. The primicerius, or cantor, or præcentor, had charge of the singing; the scholasticus, of the cathedral school; the custos, of the utensils and paraphernalia belonging to the service; the sarista or thesaurius, of the treasures; the cellarius, of the internal economy, etc. As the chapter grew in wealth and importance, these officers got one or more substitutes, who did the work while they themselves enjoyed the revenues,—the decanus, a subdecanus; the cantor, a succentor, etc. The rights and the duties, which originally referred chiefly to the service, assumed gradually a more and more secular character. Though the whole institution continued to stand under the authority of the bishop, the bishop could not sell or mortgage the property of any of the cathedral or diocesan establishments, or make any important changes in the economical arrangements of the diocese, or take a coadjutor, etc., without the consensus of the chapter; and even in minor matters, by appointments or dismissals, by dispensations or confirmations, etc., he was bound to hear the consilium of the chapter, though he was not bound to follow it. After the sixteenth century, however, the institution disappeared almost entirely in countries in which the Reformation prevailed; and even in Roman-Catholic countries it has since that time undergone a number of simplifications and curtailments which have bereft it of a great deal of its importance.

CHAPTERS AND VERSES, Modern. The purpose of the present division into chapters and verses was to facilitate reference. They sometimes, but not generally, ignore logical and natural divisions. Of the chapters the origin is obscure. Common opinion attributes them to Cardinal Hugo de Sancto Caro (Hugues de St. Cher, d. circa 1262), who is alleged to have made the division for use in his concordance to the Latin Vulgate (circa 1240, first printed, with modification, at Bologna, 1479). This opinion rests on the direct testimony of Gilbert Genebrard (d. 1597); though that is greatly weakened by his well-known statement,—alleged as an inference from the seeming fact that theologians earlier than Hugo were ignorant of these chapters, while later ones knew them,—that “the scholastics who with Cardinal Hugo were authors of the concordance” made the division. Quétif and Echart, a century and a half later than Genebrard, who wrote competently and carefully about Hugo, ascribe to him only the subdivision of the chapters presently to be mentioned. The better opinion is, that Stephen Langton, Archbishop of Canterbury (d. 1228), made it for purposes of easier citation. This rests on the direct testimony of several writers, many of whom, again, seem to repeat that of Trevet or Trivetius (1258–1328). Before the invention of printing, this division had already passed from Latin manuscripts to those of other tongues, and after the invention of printing it became general. It has undergone slight variations from the beginning to the present day. Many early printed Bibles, especially Greek Testaments, besides these chapters retain also the old breves or τιτλοι noted in the margin.

The chapters were at first subdivided into seven portions (not paragraphs, as we now use the word), marked in the margin by the letters A, B, C, D, E, F, G; reference in the concordance being made by the chapter-number and the letter under which the passage occurred. In the shorter Psalms, however, the division did not always extend to seven. In Ps. cxix. (cxviii. in the Vulgate) it seems not to have been used at all. This division (except in the Psalms) was modified by Conrad von Halberstadt (circa 1290), who reduced the divisions of the shorter chapters from seven to four; so that the letters were always either A-G or A-D. This subdivision continued long after the introduction of the present verses. But in the seventeenth century it became much modified; some chapters having more than four, and less than seven, subdivisions, and, though still used to mark liturgical readings or lessons, apparently useless for concordantial purposes.

The present verses differ in origin for the Old Testament, New Testament, and Apocrypha. In the canonical Old Testament they go back to the obscurity of the Massoretic division of the Hebrew Bible, appearing in the oldest known manuscripts marked with the accent soph pasûk. They are thus older than the ninth century, though not used for citation by the Jews till the fifteenth century. The Hebrew concordance of Rabbi Nathan (finished 1448, first printed at Venice 1524) seems to have been made upon the basis of a numeral for each verse; but the earlier printed Hebrew Bibles marked each fifth verse only with its Hebrew numeral. Arabic numerals were first added for the intervening verses by Joseph Athias, at Amsterdam, 1660, at the suggestion of John Leusden. The first portion of the Bible printed with the Massoretic verses numbered was the Psalterium Quincuplex (Latin) of Faber Stapulensis (James or Jacques Le Fevre), printed at Paris by Henry Stephens (Stephanus, Estienne, father of Robert) in 1509 (2d ed., 1513; 3d ed., by another printer, 1515). In 1528 Sanctes Pagninus published at Lyons a new Latin version of the whole Bible, with the Massoretic verses marked and numbered. He also divided the Apocrypha and New Testament into numbered verses; but these were three or four times as long as the present ones. The Massoretic verses have been sometimes modified in translating, in a few places; as, e.g., by Luther, for which subsequent historians (e.g., Mayer) have felt called upon to defend him.

The present New-Testament verses were introduced by Robert Stephens in his Greek-Latin Testament of 1551 (some copies erroneously have MDXLI. on the titlepage, not MDLXI., as stated by Wright and Tregelles), printed at Geneva. This contains, in parallel columns, the Vulgate (always in the inner column), the Greek (in the centre), and the Latin of Erasmus (in the outer). In Erasmus a smaller type serves the purpose of the Italics of modern English Bibles. Of the verses, Stephens says in his preface that the division is made to follow the most ancient Greek and Latin copies, and that the more willingly "quod hac ratione utraque translatio posset omnino e regione Græco contextui respondere." But it will be difficult, if not impossible, to find any Greek or Latin manuscripts whose divisions (even the later Latin, marked with ¶, like Pagninus's verses) coincide very nearly with Stephens's verses. It is likely, as Masch intimates, that he made this statement to forestall opposition from known enemies. His son Henry, in the preface to his Greek concordance (published in 1594, after Robert's death), relates that this division was made by his father on a journey from Paris to Lyons, and a great part of it "inter equitandum," or on horseback. Doubtless this division was made with reference to his concordance to the Vulgate, then preparing, published in 1555, in the preface of which he announces his Greek concordance as also in hand. This Latin concordance, like former ones, contains references to the letters A, B, C, D, E, F, G, but also the numbers of the verses of each chapter "after the Hebrew method" of division. This latter, the preface states, has special reference to an "operi pulcherrimo et præclarissimo" which he is now printing; which must mean his splendid Bible of 1556-57, 3 vols., containing the Vulgate, Pagninus, and the first edition of Beza's Latin New Testament. Meanwhile, for present convenience, he is issuing a [more modest] Bible (Vulgate), with the verses marked and numbered. This latter was his Vulgate of 1555 [Geneva],—the first whole Bible divided into the present verses, and the first in which they were introduced into the Apocrypha. The text is continuous, not having the verses in separate paragraphs, like the New Testament of 1551, but separated by a ¶ and the verse-number. On the titlepage is a reference to the concordance, with a statement substantially the same as that just mentioned in the latter's preface. The verse-division differs in only a very few places from that of 1551; and a comparison shows that the concordance agrees rather with that of 1551 than with that of 1555.

While Stephens was meditating this division, as his son Henry relates (ubi supra), most people thought his plan useless, if not ridiculous. "But lo! contrary to their condemnatory opinion . . . no sooner did the invention come to light than it met with universal favor, and at once obtained such influence that other editions of the New Testament which did not adopt that invention—whether Greek, or Latin, or German, or in any other vernacular tongue—were, so to speak, cashiered." This is nearly the truth. In other languages the division appeared first as follows: French, New Testament, Geneva, 1552, Bible, Geneva, 1553 (both R. Stephens); Italian, New Testament, L. Paschale [Geneva?], 1555; Dutch, New Testament, Gellius Ctematius (Gillis van der Erven), Embden, 1556, Bible, Nicolaus Biestkens van Diest, Embden, 1560; English, Geneva New Testament, 1557, Geneva Bible, 1560; German, Luther's Bible, perhaps Heidelberg, 1568, but certainly Frankfurt-a.-M., 1582.

In Beza's editions of the Greek Testament (1565-1604) sundry variations were introduced, which were followed by later editors, notably the Elzevirs (1633, etc.). But many minor changes have been made, quite down to the present day. (For variations in the Greek Testament see Dr. Ezra Abbot's collation in C. R. Gregory's Proleg. to Tisch. Gr. N. T., ed. viii.) These Stephanic verses have met with bitter criticism; but their utility for reference outweighs their disadvantage, at least when they are confined, as they should be, to a numbering in the margin.

CHARIOTS for war, although used by the Philistines, were introduced among the Jews by David (2 Sam. viii. 4); but, as those in general use under the kings came from Egypt (1 Kings x. 29; 2 Kings xviii. 24; Isa. xxxi. 1), a description of an Egyptian chariot will answer for the Jewish. It was an "almost semicircular wooden frame with straightened sides, resting posteriorly on the axle of a pair of wheels, a rail of wood or ivory being attached to the frame by leathern thongs, and a wooden upright in front. The back of the car was open; and the sides were strengthened and embellished with leather and metal binding: the floor was of rope net-work, to give a springy footing to the occupants. On the off-side were the bow-case, sometimes the quiver, and spear case, crossing diagonally; the last-named inclined backward. If two warriors were in the chariot, there was a second bow-case. The wheels had usually six spokes, fastened to the axle by a linchpin, secured by a thong. The horses had a breastband and girths attached to the saddle, but were without traces. They wore head-furniture, often ornamented, with a bearing-rein. The driving-reins passed through rings on each side of both horses. Two persons, generally, were in a chariot; but there was sometimes a third, holding the umbrella of state" (WILKINSON: Ancient Egyptians, vol. I. pp. 222-241, vol. I. pp. 201-203). The occupants sometimes fought from them, sometimes used them merely for purposes of transportation.

CHARISMATA. See GIFTS, SPIRITUAL.

CHARITY, Brothers of, a religious order founded by Johannes Ciudad, or di Dio, a Portuguese, b. 1495, d. 1550, who in 1540 hired a small house in Granada, and filled it with poor sick people, whom he nursed, working, begging, and praying for them. He was soon joined by others, who were roused by his example of self-sacrifice; and at his death he left a well-regulated association, which in 1572 was confirmed by Pius V. as a religious order under the rules of Augustine (Fratres Misericordiae). To the common monastical vows was added that of nursing the sick, and this became the characteristic feature of the order. It spread rapidly in Italy (Fate ben Fratelli), in France (Frères de la Charité), in Germany (Barmherzige Brüder), etc. Its monasteries were hospitals, in which poor sick people were taken in and cared for, without distinction of religion. Such hospitals, on a grand scale, are found in Madrid, Paris, Rome, Naples, Vienna, and Prague. In this order, the study of theology is generally preceded by that of medicine.

CHARITY, Sisters of, Daughters of Charity, Grey Sisters (from their dress), names applied to several orders of celibate women in the Roman Catholic Church, who devote themselves to the care of the sick, and children. Some of these orders are very small, others very large; but the most important are "The Sisters of St. Vincent de Paul," and "The Daughters of St. Carlo Tommaso."

The first was founded in Paris, by Vincent de Paul and Madame Louise de Marillac le Gras.

The providential occasion was an appeal for help to a suffering family, made to Vincent de Paul at Chatillon, just as he was about to enter his pulpit, which affected him so that he laid aside his sermon, and preached powerfully upon their duty toward this case. The congregation were deeply interested, and help was at once offered. But the incident led him to think upon the needs of the poor in times of sickness, and, under divine direction, to the foundation of an association of women for the care of the poor. It began with a membership of about fifteen, but quickly spread, so that in a few years it was found in more than thirty places. But the very spread of the order weakened it; for when Vincent de Paul and his missionaries could not longer give it their personal direction and encouragement, the love of many waxed cold, and many, especially in the country, who required instruction in nursing, could not get it. But at this juncture Madame Louise le Gras, née de Marillac, left a widow in 1625, and, by the advice of her bishop, under the spiritual direction of Vincent de Paul, made known her determination to devote her life to the poor. Vincent de Paul determined to avail himself of her help; but for four years he tested her, ere he sent her out to visit the order of women he had founded. She rendered him such efficient service, that she is entitled to be linked with him in the history of the order. But considerations for her family held her back from nursing very bad cases; and so Vincent de Paul found it expedient to enlist only virgins, and give them over to Madame le Gras for instruction. The order became very popular. Not only poor girls, but those of the highest rank of society, volunteered; and the world learned how much women will sacrifice and suffer for the sake of Christ. In 1633 the Archbishop of Paris raised the association into a distinct order, to be called the "Daughters of Christian Love," although they are commonly known as the "Sisters of Charity." In the lifetime of Vincent de Paul the order spread all over France, and also into Poland. The rule which he gave it was confirmed by Pope Clement IX., when in 1668 the order was officially acknowledged and indorsed. This rule was, that the Sisters should remember, that, in nursing the sick, they were nursing Christ, whose servants they were, and therefore go about their duty irrespective of the praise or blame of men; that they should rise daily at four a.m.; twice in the day engage in earnest prayer; live very simply; never drink wine except in case of sickness; never refuse to nurse the sick, even in the most repulsive and infectious diseases; never to stand in awe of death; always to render implicit obedience to their superior. Moreover, they were to dress in uniform, to cultivate mutual trust and peace of spirit, and to do all and bear all, out of love for Christ. The vow is not perpetual or irrevocable, but is renewed every year; but it is not given until after a probation of five years. The simplicity and flexibility of the rule has worked admirably in favor of the order. In France it took such a hold that it survived the storm of the Revolution; for, notwithstanding the edict of 1790, suppressing all religious orders, it did not stop its work; and no sooner had the storm passed in 1800, when Napoléon gave them public support, than it showed a more vigorous life than before. The community was introduced into the United States, under a distinct rule, however, by Mrs. Elizabeth Ann (Bayley) Seton (1774-1821) of Maryland, a convert from Protestantism, who, with her sisters-in-law Harriet and Cecilia Seton, took the veil as "Sisters of Charity," Jan. 1, 1800, at Emmetsburg, Md. There she opened a religious house in 1812; and "Mother" Seton became the head, or superior-general, of the order in America. Mother Seton's rule is still followed in several dioceses, but in more the French. See SETON, MOTHER: art. "Schwestern barmherzige," in Wetzer u. Welte, Kirchen-Lexicon, 1st ed. vol. ix.

2. Different from the order of "St. Vincent de Paul" is that of the "Sisters of St. Borromeo," founded, and provided with a rule in 1652, by Epiphanius Louys, Abbot of Estival, general of the order of the Præmonstrants. The Sisters who that year took the vow to dedicate their whole lives to the sick and to children chose this name for the order, because they then served in the Hospital of St. Carlo Borromeo, at Nancy. This community also was wide-spread in France, and outlived the Revolution.

The idea of an order of single women devoted to the care of the sick, of the poor, and of children, particularly foundlings, was surely divine; and noble have been the services of the different communities of Sisters of Charity. They are the glory of the Church of Rome. All credit and praise to these women who have braved the horrors of war and plague, who, undeterred by dangers seen and unseen, have nursed the sick, bound up the wounds of soldiers, soothed the troubled spirits of the sufferers, and brought calm upon many a brow, and peace into many a heart, by their promise to care for the children. They have been, with few exceptions, genuine daughters of that divine love and charity which bless the world; and it is a pity and a shame that Protestants should often speak of them so disparagingly, for surely all who do good to Christ's little ones deserve respect and recognition. The charge against them is that they proselyte the sick: but, when we bear in mind that these sisters believe that all outside of the Roman-Catholic Church are lost, we can surely excuse and explain their action; for how can they conscientiously do otherwise? Then as to their enforced celibate life: such a life is the only one befitting their occupation. There is no sin in being unmarried, but rather virtue, if marriage be foregone for the kingdom of heaven's sake.

CHARLEMAGNE, b. April 2, 742; d. Jan. 28, 814; succeeded, together with his younger brother Carloman, his father, Pepin the Short, as King of the Franks in 768; became sole ruler of the Frankish Empire by Carloman's death in 774; was crowned Roman emperor by Leo III. in the Church of St. Peter in Rome, Christmas Day, 800, and stood, in the latter part of his reign, as one of the three great rulers of the world, the equal of the Emperor of Constantinople, and the Caliph of Bagdad.

No layman has exercised so great an influence on the history of the Church as Charlemagne; though his influence was, properly speaking, merely that of extension, organization, and consolidation. Personally he probably did not reach far beyond a tolerably accurate fulfilment of the precepts of the Church. His character has, no doubt, been much embellished by the legendary poetry of the Church. His want of chastity, and disregard of the marriage-vow, must be freely admitted. Practically the Church was to him, not only the visible representative of Christ on earth, but also an organ of civilization, an instrument of government; and he was sometimes unscrupulous enough in the use of this instrument, as, for instance, when he compelled the Saxons, by force and with unexampled cruelty, to receive baptism. Nevertheless he contributed perhaps more than any one else to make the Church a power in the history of the race, and enabled it to form during the middle ages a much-needed and highly beneficial counterpoise to the military despotism of feudalism.

His relation to the Church is strikingly characterized by a total absence of any distinction between spiritual and temporal power. Both were identical to him; and as he unquestionably was the holder of the one he necessarily came to consider himself as holder of the other too. Without paying the least regard to the Pope, whom, under other circumstances, he was not unwilling to recognize as the representative of the Church, he condemned at the synod of Francfort (794) the decrees of the second council of Niceæ concerning image-worship, and with as little ceremony he introduced the Filioque of the Spanish churches into the Nicene Creed at the synod of Aix-la-Chapelle (809). He was liberal to the Church. The exarchate of Ravenna was his splendid donation to the papal see. Churches and monasteries received enormous endowments everywhere in his realm; and the first business he took in hand after conquering a new territory was the formation of dioceses, the building of churches, the foundation of missionary-stations, etc. But of this church, made great and rich by his liberality, he demanded absolute obedience. The metropolitans received the pallium from the Pope, but only with his consent; and the bishops he chose and appointed himself alone. He would have been very much surprised if any one had intimated to him — what, a century later on, was preached from the roofs — that there was within the Church a spiritual power to which even the emperor owed obedience. Church and State were one to him. His idea of government was theocratic, with the distinction, though, that, in his case, it was not the Church which had absorbed the State, but the State which identified itself with the Church.

Nothing shows more plainly than the circle of great men which gathered around Charlemagne that the principal problem which he expected the Church to solve had a general civilizing bearing. All the great men of his age, such as Alcuin, Leidrade, Angilbert, Eginhard, Agobard, Paschasius Radbertus, Rabanus Maurus, Scotus Erigena, Hincmar, were connected, either as teachers or as pupils, with that school which he had founded in his palace, and which became the fertile germ of the mediæval university. All these men were theologians, but not exclusively: on the contrary, their greatness was their many-sidedness. They had studied grammar, rhetoric, philosophy, classical literature, canon law, etc. They were poets, philosophers, statesmen, practical administrators, etc. They were exactly what Charlemagne wanted, — men whom he could send out as legates to see how the counts were doing in the marches, or could settle as bishops in a diocese to take care, not only of the Church proper, but also of the school and the court; for, according to his ideas, the Church was an institution with many worldly duties of education and jurisdiction; and consequently it became, under his hands, an institution with many worldly interests of property and ambition.

CHARLES V., b. at Ghent, Feb. 24, 1500; d. at Monastery of San Yuste, Sept. 21, 1558; son of the Archduke Philip of Austria and Joanna of Aragon; was educated in Flanders by William de Croy, an acute statesman, and Adrian of Utrecht, afterwards Pope Adrian VI.; and inherited in 1517, after his maternal grandfather, Ferdinand the Catholic, Spain, with Naples, Sardinia, Sicily, and the newly-discovered America, and in 1519, after his paternal grandfather Maximilian, Emperor of Germany, Austria and Burgundy. In the same year he was elected Emperor of Germany. Goaded onward by the idea of a world-empire, he spent thirty-six years in war, and hardships of every kind, but gained no other result of his enormous exertions than a clear understanding of the impossibility of his own aim. Disenchanted, and finding a kind of rest by occupying his mind with bagatelles, he abdicated in 1556, leaving Spain and the Netherlands to his son, Philip II., and Austria and the imperial crown of Germany to his brother Ferdinand, and retired, a suffering cripple, but a monster of gluttony, to the Monastery of San Yuste, in Estramadura in Spain, where he died.

His conduct with respect to the Reformation did not spring from a settled religious conviction, but from worldly and selfish policy. The rumors which spread after his death, and which cost Carranza, his confessor, and some of Carranza's pupils, so dear, may have been unfounded; but, on the other hand, the cruel measures which he actually employed in Flanders, and tried to employ in Germany, for the suppression of the Protestants, were nothing but political plans, colored by the innate despotism of his nature. Charles had no devotedness to any thing but himself: he would in religious respects have been completely indifferent, but for the habits of his childhood. There was only one idea which had root in his heart, beside his many whims and vices; and that was the idea of the renewal of the empire of Charlemagne. When this idea brought him into a deadly duel with Francis I., he proved himself ready to sacrifice any thing in order to reach his goal. It was necessary for him to have peace in Germany in order to be strong against France; and he found it easiest to maintain peace by sacrificing the Protestants. Had the opportunity pointed the other way, he would have sacrificed the Pope without a moment's hesitation.

Immediately after his coronation at Aix-la-Chapelle (Oct. 22, 1520) he convoked a diet at Worms, at which (April 26, 1521) Luther was outlawed. Soon after, however, the duel with Francis I. began; and the religious conflict in Germany was left so far to itself, that a diet of Spires (1526) allowed the German princes to regulate the religious affairs of their respective states according to their own judgment. At a second diet at Spires (1529), held during a pause in the wars with France, the Roman Catholics obtained a decree purporting to stop the further progress of the Reformation; and, when the Protestant princes met this decree with a Protest (April 19, 1529), an outburst of the despotism in Charles's nature followed, and might have led him to some decisive step, if he had not felt the pressure of the Turk so heavily at the same moment. At the diet of Augsburg he seemed to have been gained completely over by the Romanists; and a decree of Nov. 19, 1530, not only condemned the Confession of the Protestants, but demanded their unconditional submission. However, when this decree was answered by the Protestants with the league of Smalcald (Feb. 27, 1531), and Solyman on the one side, and Francis I. on the other, began to move, Charles was ready with the truce of Nuremberg (July 23, 1532), which granted freedom of conscience. It was evident, however, that sooner or later it must come to an armed conflict between the Protestants and Roman Catholics in Germany; and, from the decided preponderance which the Roman-Catholic interests possessed in the policy of the emperor, it was easy to infer which side he would take. But after the victory of Mühlberg (1546), which was almost crushing for the cause of the Reformation, he treated the Protestants, in general, with great leniency. After his entrance in Wittenberg, the Protestant service ceased in the churches; but it was taken up again, and continued, on his express order. He had at this time fully made up his mind that the religious conflict should come to an end, and unity be restored within the Church; and he had his hands free to do what he liked. Francis I. was dead, also Henry VIII.; and the Turk had fallen asleep. But when the Pope transferred the council from Trent to Bologna, and proved himself unyielding at every point, Charles showed him his displeasure as openly as he ever had done with the Protestants, and chose his allies in the Evangelical camp. The Interim proved, however, better than any thing else could have done, how incapable he was to deal with such a question; and the affair suddenly took a pitiful turn for him, when Duke Maurice of Saxony fell upon him at Insbruck, and compelled him to sign the treaty of Passau (Aug. 2, 1552), which gave to the Protestants complete religious liberty.

In his retirement at San Yuste, the idea of the restoration of unity in the Church occupied his attention nearly as much as his clocks. He began to understand that that which had thwarted all his plans, and baffled all his hopes, was not so much Francis I. as the Reformation; and, like an old woman whose brain has only one wheel going, he began to repeat over and over again, "Put it down! put it down!" But he probably never understood that it was he who had completely mistaken the time in which he lived, and wasted his power, while history went onward, pretty nearly undisturbed by him.

CHARNOCK, Stephen, D.D., the author of Discourses on the Attributes; b. in London, 1628; d. there July 27, 1680. He studied at Cambridge, but became (1649) a fellow of New College, Oxford, and ultimately proctor. In 1653 he went to Dublin as chaplain to Henry Cromwell; but in 1660 the Act of Uniformity put an end to his useful ministry there, and he returned to England. He preached afterwards irregularly until 1675, when he accepted the charge, in London, which he held at his death. His Discourses upon the Existence and Attributes of God (often reprinted) are acknowledged masterpieces, and surely take rank with the greatest of the many great products of the Nonconformist clergy. Charnock published only one sermon; but after his decease two volumes appeared, edited by Adams and Veel from his manuscripts, London, 1682-83, fol. Best edition of his complete works in Nichol's Series of Standard Divines, with introduction by Rev. Dr. James McCosh, Edinburgh, 1864, 5 vols. 8vo.

CHARRON, Pierre, b. in Paris, 1541; d. there 1603; studied law at Orléans, and practised for several years at Bourges as an advocate, but gave up this career, studied theology, was ordained a priest, and was very active in Southern France as a preacher, and finally as vicar-general in the diocese of Cahors. His Traité des trois verités (1594), and Discours chrétiens (1600), exhibit him as a very orthodox Romanist; but his great work, Traité de la Sagesse (1601), suddenly revealed him as a disciple of Montaigne, drawing consequences which the master himself would have hesitated to draw. See CHANET: Considerations sur la Sagesse de Charron, Rochelle, 1643; the article in BAYLE; and SAINTE-BEUVE: Causeries du lundi, vol. XI.

CHASE, Irah, D.D., one of the founders of Newton Centre Baptist Seminary; b. at Stratton, Vt., Oct. 5, 1793; d. at Newton Centre, Mass., Nov. 1, 1864. He was graduated at Middlebury College in 1814; a student at Andover, but ordained in the Baptist Church in 1817; was professor of theology in Baptist theological seminaries from 1818 to 1845,—1818-25, in the seminary at Washington; 1825-45, in that at Newton Centre, Mass. The latter part of his life was spent in literary pursuits. Besides other books, and many controversial articles, he published The Work claiming to be the Constitutions of the Holy Apostles, including the Canons, N.Y., 1848; Infant Baptism an Invention of Man, Phila., n.d., and a Life of Bunyan.

CHASSIDIM, or PIOUS, is a name given to a Jewish party which became very conspicuous in the time of the Maccabæan struggle. "The zeal and even the fanaticism of this party had been admirable qualities in the hour of trial and exertion" (Milman). The Chassidim rigidly adhered to the written as well as traditional law of their fathers. "Themselves austere," says Milman, "they despised all who did not practise the same austerities. Earnest in their belief, they branded as free-thinkers all whose creed was of greater latitude than their own, and considered it their duty to enforce the same rigid attention, not merely to every letter of the law, but likewise to all their own peculiar observances, which they themselves regarded as necessary, and most scrupulously performed." . . . till they finally degenerated into the "haughty, tyrannical, and censorious Pharisees, the Separatists of the Jewish religion." In the course of time they disappeared, until, about the year 1740, Rabbi Israel, with the epithet Baal-Shem ("Possessor of the Name," i.e., the mysterious name of God), appeared at the head of a small party of men, first at Hussti, and afterwards at Medziboze in Podolia, who called themselves Chassidim, or Saints. Rabbi Israel was most probably a man of devotional and enthusiastic spirit, who felt the insufficiency and lifelessness of Rabbinism, and thought he had discovered the essence of true piety in the mysticism of the cabalistic system. His fame soon spread, in spite of the opposition of the rabbins; and in a short time his followers were numbered by tens of thousands. As long as he lived, the sect formed one great whole, of which he was the head. After his death, which took place in 1760, it was divided into separate congregations, each of which had its own rabbi, or, as the Chassidim call him, Tsaddik, or Saint. They soon spread over Galicia, South Hungary, West and South Russia, Wallachia, and extended to the East. The Chassidim have separate synagogues; and their great object is—at least they profess it—to strive after a perfect union with God. To effect this, they spend much time in contemplation, and in prayer use the most extraordinary contortions and gestures, jumping, writhing, howling, in order to exalt their minds, and do certainly succeed in working themselves into a state little short of frenzy. Their chief edification is the spending of the sabbath day with the Tsaddik, when they listen to a sort of moral, mystical, cabalistical discourse, which is received as the dictates of immediate inspiration. For the benefit of such as are too far removed to come on the Saturday, the Tsaddik makes journeys through his district, when he lodges with some rich member of the sect, and is treated with all the respect due to one who stands in immediate communication with Deity. He then imposes penances, dispenses amulets, and slips of parchment with cabalistical sentences written on them, to those who wish exemption from sickness and danger, or protection against evil spirits; and pronounces on the sick and the barren his benediction, which is supposed to remove all infirmities, and to procure the fulfilment of every wish. The late Dr. Alexander McCaul, who for a number of years labored as a missionary among the Jews in Russian-Poland, once saw one of the most famous of these Tsaddikim, the Tsaddik of Medziboze, or Mezbesh, during one of these periodical visits to a large congregation. "His antechamber," says Dr. McCaul, "was crowded with Jews and Jewesses, anxiously waiting for admission. The Tsaddik himself was seated in an inner chamber, in an arm-chair. He wore a long robe, something like a cassock, of sky-blue silk, a white girdle, and cap. He was a fine-looking, portly old man, with a long white beard. His attendants all stood around him, attired in the usual costume of the Polish Jews, excepting the cap, which was not black velvet, but white cotton. His conversation was that of a shrewd, sensible man; and with us he certainly showed nothing either of the mystic or fanatic. The Jews said, at his departure, that his receipts in his town alone were two thousand silver rubles, or about three hundred pounds." The articles of faith of the Chassidim, which may be gathered from the Kitsur Likkute Moharan, and the Sepher Hammidoth, may be thus summed up: "The most important of all principles is unreserved devotion to the Tsaddik; never to turn aside from his precepts - to reject wisdom and science, to use one's own understanding, and to receive only what the Tsaddik says. Even when one thinks that the Tsaddik is acting contrary to the law, he is still to believe that the Tsaddik is in the right; he must therefore reject his own understanding, and rest confidently on that of the Rabbi." We thus see an infallible Jewish pope before Pius IX. The number of the Chassidim is still very large in Poland, Wallachia, Moldavia, Galicia, and Palestine. Modern Jews do not look very favorably upon them. Says Dr. D. Cassel in Lehrbuch der jüdischen Geschichte u. Literatur, Leipzig, 1879, p. 517: "To the disgrace of Judaism and modern culture, the Tsaddikim still go with their disgraceful business, and are thus the most essential hindrances for the dissemination of literary progress in Galicia and Russia. There are still thousands who behold in the Tsaddik the worker of miracles, the prophet, the one who is in close communion with God and angels, and who present him with rich gifts, and divulgate the wonders which they have seen.

Covetousness on the one hand and spiritual narrowness on the other are the channels through which this evil is fed anew." B. PICK.

CHASTITY is the inner side of modesty, the condition of bodily and moral purity in the sexual relations, and the virtue of self-control from forbidden sexual longings. Its opposites are lust, coquetry, and idle wit. It is a virtue known to and esteemed by the ancients, though rarely found among the men. Even the chosen people, as is proved by the numerous allusions to unchastity in the Old Testament, do not seem to have been exceptionally chaste. But Christ has made chastity in word and deed common, and laid its obligation upon all. The New-Testament writers employ the word ἀγνός in this connection, the original meaning of which is dedicated, then clean, unspotted, and so chaste. The New-Testament idea of chastity is the natural result of its new view of the body as the temple of the Holy Spirit. Hence the obligation to be chaste was of the strongest (1 Cor. vii. 15-20). But obedience is difficult, owing to the force of passion (1 Pet. ii. 11). This sexual passion is not in itself sinful, but is to be gratified only within the marriage-bond. Unchastity is a scourge, a pestilence which lays low body and soul. It has a certain and sad effect upon the religious feelings, killing them, so that God is utterly cast out, and therefore the door is open to every sin. It leads to unnatural vice (Rom. i. 26, 27). And therefore according to the Bible the unchaste are lost (1 Cor. vi. 9; Eph. v. 5; Rev. xxi. 2, 27).

Chastity is to be in thought (Matt. v. 28) and word (Eph. v. 3, 12), as well as in deed. In regeneration the Christian receives grace to attain this high ideal. It is the duty of both sexes, and of all ages and relations, married or not, to be chaste. To some a special grace to this end is given (Matt. xix. 12; 1 Cor. vii. 7). To those who preserve absolute chastity outside of the married state, there is peculiar honor; though this is no implied disparagement to marriage (Rev. xiv. 4), which is a divinely-ordered protection. Modern ways of living have debarred many from entering that state, but their celibacy is no excuse for unchastity. See the Ethics of HARLESS, NEANDER, SCHMID, WUTTKE, MARTENSEN, and ROTHE. KARL BURGER.

CHASUBLE, an ecclesiastical garment, is derived from casula, a diminutive of casa, a "hut." Casula seems originally to have been a local or provincial designation for the pænula, an outer garment used by the humbler classes in the Roman world, and consisting of a single piece of cloth, with a hole in the centre, provided with a hood. With the head thrust through this hole, the wearer of the casula was completely covered, as if by a portable house. The Christian clergy adopted this piece of clothing as their common outer garment, the monks, as their regular dress; and after the eighth century it became a liturgical vestment, though in a somewhat altered form. It was split open on both sides in order to give free play to the arms; and afterwards the superfluous laps were cut away, and the whole vestment reduced to two broad strips hanging down in front and behind. The color varied according to the character of the solemnity at which it was used. The changes seem first to have taken place in Italy and Spain, where the vestment was known as the planeta, a century before it was generally adopted by the whole Western Church.

CHAUCER, Geoffrey, the first great English poet, b. (perhaps in London, where his father, John Chaucer, was a vintner) before 1346 (possibly in 1340, though nothing is certain about it); d. in London in the autumn of 1400 (Oct. 25 has been given as the date). The most of Chaucer's life was passed in association with the higher classes of English society; and he is pre-eminently the poet of the "gentles." A person of his name entered the service of Lionel, third son of Edward III., probably as page, in 1357; and in 1359 Chaucer joined the army of Edward III. as it went to invade France. He was made prisoner, but was ransomed in 1360, before the peace; and his importance may be inferred from the fact that the king himself paid a portion of the ransom. The next seven years are blank, so far as the record of his doings is concerned; then we find him a pensioner at court, and one of the valets of the king's household, — a position always held by "gentlemen." Before this time he had married one Philippa, possibly sister of Katherine Roet, who became wife of John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster; though there are reasons for doubting his relation to the duke in this way. Upon this connection, and upon various contemptuous expressions regarding the clergy, found in his poems, it has been assumed that Chaucer was a follower of Wiclif, or at least a sympathizer with him. While it is not improbable, that at a time when it was said that every third man was a Wiclifite, and when the only other great poet was strongly opposed to clerical corruption, Chaucer should have sympathized in the feelings of the "first Protestant," it is difficult to put out of court the testimony of the sentiments of devout Romanism found in some of Chaucer's verses. From 1370 to 1380 he was much of the time engaged in the service of the king on the continent, visiting Italy twice. The incidents founded upon passages in The Testament of Love (a composition long wrongly attributed to Chaucer) — such as that he was engaged in the disputes between the court and the citizens of London about the election of John of Northampton to the mayoralty (in 1382), his attempted arrest, his flight to Zealand, his return (in 1386), his imprisonment in the Tower, and his release — are all contradicted by official records. He retired from court in 1386, but received new appointments in 1389, and again lost all his offices in 1391. He was in embarrassment until the accession of Henry Bolingbroke in 1399, but he died the next year. His reputation rests upon his Canterbury Tales, written at various dates during his life, and partially arranged in a connected form. These are remarkable pictures of society. Two of them are in prose, — The Parson's Tale, which is simply a sermon on penitence, from the text Jer. vi. 16 of the Vulgate; and The Tale of Melibeus, an illustration of the law of love and mercy. Both of these are crowded with Scripture allusions, as, in fact, are most of the poems of Chaucer. In various parts of his poems he discusses the prescience of God, and the subjects of predestination, pre-ordination, and free will. The latest complete edition of the poems of Chaucer is that edited by Arthur Gilman (3 vols., Bost., 1879), which is the only one containing the best text of the Canterbury Tales, that of the Ellesmere MS. ARTHUR GILMAN.

CHAUNCY, Charles, second president of Harvard College; b. in Yardleybury, Hertfordshire, Eng., in 1589; d. at Cambridge, U.S.A., Feb. 19, 1671. He was educated at Westminster school and Cambridge, Eng.; at the latter was chosen by the heads of houses professor of Hebrew, but by the vice-chancellor made professor of Greek. Shortly after, he left the university, and took the vicarage, first of Marston, and later of Ware, Hertfordshire (1627). His ministry was eminently successful. By his uncompromising Puritanism he involved himself with the ecclesiastical judicatories, was imprisoned and fined. In an hour of weakness he recanted (Feb. 11, 1635). He never forgave himself for this, and, overcome by shame, left the country, and landed at Plymouth a few days before the great earthquake, which happened Jan. 1, 1638. He first preached in Plymouth for three years, and then at Scituate. In 1654 he received an invitation to return to Ware, and was in Boston in November to make arrangements for his departure, when he received the appointment of president of Harvard College, successor to Henry Dunster. Reluctantly he accepted the position, but faithfully and ably he fulfilled its duties. Cotton Mather, in his Magnalia Christi Americana (Bk. iii. c. 23, 2d Amer. ed., Hartford, 1855, vol. I. pp. 463-476), devotes a chapter to Chauncey, and commends especially his piety. The epitaph put on his tombstone in Cambridge (in Latin) says he was for "seventeen years a most faithful president of Harvard College in New England, a man of unsullied integrity, an accomplished debater, gifted with equal merit in piety and scholarship." He wrote Greek and Latin poems. His remorse at his weakness in yielding to his prosecutors was incessant, and led to his publication in London, 1641, of The Retraction of Mr. C. C., formerly Min. of Ware in Harfordshire, written in 1637, and published, as he says, "for the satisfaction of all such who either are, or justly might be, offended with his scandalous submission, made before the High Commission Court, Feb. 11, anno 1635" (4to, pp. 40). He published also Antisynodalia Scripta Americana, or a Proposal of the Judgment of the Dissenting Messenger of the Churches of N.E., Cambridge, 1662 (4to, pp. 38), and several pamphlets and sermons.

CHAUNCY, Isaac, son of the above, was ejected in 1662; a successor of Dr. John Owen (d. 1683) in London, 1687; retired from ministry, 1704; taught divinity in Dissenter's Academy in London; d. Feb. 28, 1712. He wrote, The Catholike Hierarchie, or The Divine Right of a Sacred Dominion in Church and Conscience, 1681; Ecclesia Enucleata, a Clear Demonstration of the True Gospel Church in its Nature and Constitution, 1684; Ecclesiasticum, or a Plain and Familiar Christian Conference concerning Gospel Churches and Order, 1690; The Doctrine which is according to Godliness, etc., 1694; The Divine Institution of Congregational Churches, 1697, besides pamphlets, etc.

was graduated at Harvard, 1721, and ordained pastor of the First Church in Boston in 1727, and there remained for sixty years. He was a learned, copious writer, and publicly taught Restorationism, or Universalism. He wrote, Seasonable Thoughts on the State of Religion in New England, Boston, 1743; several open letters to Whitefield, — A Letter to G. Whitefield, publicly calling upon him to Vindicate his Conduct, or Confess his Faults, Boston, 1744; Second Letter to G. Whitefield, urging upon him the Duty of Repentance, Boston, 1745; and A Letter to Rev. G. Whitefield, Boston, 1745; two treatises on church-government, — The Validity of Presbyterian Ordination Asserted and Maintained, Boston, 1762, and A Compleat View of Episcopacy until the Close of the Second Century, Boston, 1771; several works on universal salvation, — The Salvation for All Men Illustrated and Vindicated as a Scripture Doctrine, Boston, 1782; Divine Glory brought to View in the Final Salvation of All Men, 1783 (in 1784 a second ed., so Dexter supposes); The Benevolence of the Deity fairly and impartially considered, Boston, 1784; Five Dissertations on the Scripture Account of the Fall and its Consequences, 1785.

CHAUTAUQUA, on Chautauqua Lake in Western New York, is the site of the "Chautauqua Assembly," — a summer convocation, school, and resort, in the interest of education, religious and general, and of legitimate and wholesome recreation. The movement was projected in 1873 by Lewis Miller, Esq., and Rev. Dr. J. H. Vincent, the former a wealthy manufacturer in Akron, O., the latter, editor, and secretary of the Sunday-school department of the Methodist-Episcopal church. The first Assembly was held in August, 1874, as a two-weeks' normal (Sunday-school) institute, with general, biblical, and normal lectures, class-drills, specimen illustrative exercises, models of Palestine, an archæological museum, &c. Its leaders early asked, and promptly answered, the questions: "How shall we increase the power of the Sunday school by connecting it more intimately with the other departments of the church and other agencies in society?" "How control, in the interest of religious culture, the forces — social, commercial, industrial, and educational — which for good or evil are affecting our pupils every day of the week?" These questions were practically answered at Chautauqua by the holding of "Church Congresses," "Reform Councils," "Scientific Conferences," and "Summer Schools." Brilliant lectures were delivered on chemistry by such men as Dr. Ogden Foreman, and Professor S. A. Lattimore; on astronomy, by Drs. Burr and Warren; on geology, Professor Alexander Winchell, and Professor William N. Rice. Telescopes were in use night after night, season after season. A department of microscopy was established. Permanent organizations were effected for the prosecution of the several studies by persons at their homes. The Chautauqua Assembly aimed to give a start and an inspiration. Its few weeks' session at Chautauqua led individuals to read and study at home during the year. The C. L. S. C. (Chautauqua Literary and Scientific Circle) was organized in 1878. It is a "home college," and now numbers more than twenty-five thousand members. Its course of reading requires an average of forty minutes a day, and covers a period of four years. The C. F. M. I. (Chautauqua Foreign Missionary Institute) held its first session in 1879. The C. L. S. (Chautauqua School of Languages), the C. T. R. (Chautauqua Teachers' Retreat), the C. S. T. (Chautauqua School of Theology), and the C. Y. F. R. U. (Chautauqua Young Folks' Reading Union), are all departments of this new movement, which aims at popular literary, scientific, and religious education, at the promotion of rational recreation, at true reform, — domestic, social, and political, — and which aims to cultivate independent self-education at home by those who have hitherto lacked educational opportunity. CHEKE, Sir John, an eminent Greek scholar, b. at Cambridge, June 16, 1514; d. Sept. 13, 1557. He was appointed by Henry VIII. in 1540 the first Regius Professor of Greek in the University of Cambridge. To him and Sir Thomas Smith belongs the honor of reviving the knowledge of Greek in England. In 1544 he was appointed tutor to Prince Edward, and on the accession of the latter (January, 1547) received honor and wealth; for he was appointed to various positions, — from provost of King's College, Cambridge, 1549, to secretary of state, and privy councillor, 1553. But, having joined in the attempt to establish Lady Jane Grey in the government (1553), he was deprived of all his honors, and finally of all his wealth, by Mary, and confined for a year in the Tower. On liberation he obtained permission to travel; visited Italy and Switzerland; settled in Strassburg, where he supported himself by teaching Greek; and took so prominent a part in the English Church there, that the home government was alarmed, and, by means of a decoy, caught him, and brought him to England (1556). There he recanted, and even took part in the judgment of Protestants more constant than he. The Queen restored him to wealth and position; but his heart was broken, and he died from remorse, giving the best evidence that his recantation was insincere, and "carrying God's pardon, and all good men's pity, along with him." Cheke was a remarkable man, and deserves a wider fame. His Greek learning won the admiration of the day. He knew quite intimately the prominent Protestants of Europe. He was a sincere, humble, though a not sufficiently manly Christian, and inspired universal esteem by his lovely life. Curiously he anticipated two important phenomena of the present day, — the reform of the spelling, and phonography. (See Strype, pp. 161, 162.) He was also a strenuous advocate of pure English. In exemplification of his idea, he prepared a revised version of Matthew, and part of Mark, in which Saxon equivalents of Latin theological and ecclesiastical words are given. (For specimen see Stoughton's Our English Bible, pp. 176, 177.) He was a voluminous and learned writer. (For list see Strype, pp. 165-167.) The most interesting is said to be the True Subject to the Rebel, or the Hurt of Sedition, 1549 (also Oxford, 1641, with a Memoir). His translation of Matthew, and seven of his letters, were edited and published by J. Goodwin, D.D., London, 1843. His Life was written by JOHN STRYPE, new edition, Oxford, 1821.

CHEMNITZ, Martin, b. at Treuenbrietzen, Brandenburg, Nov. 9, 1522; d. at Brunswick, April 8, 1586; lost his father when he was eleven years old, and finished his education under very difficult circumstances. From 1539 to 1542 he studied at Magdeburg, preparing for the university, but was then compelled to go to Calbe, and afterwards to Wrietzen, and teach school, in order to earn money enough to continue his studies. In 1545 he came to Wittenberg, and attached himself closely to Melanchthon, on whose advice he studied mathematics and astrology, and who, in 1547, sent him to Königsberg with a letter of recommendation to Dr. Sabinus. In Königsberg he lived as tutor to some young Polish noblemen, as rector of the school of Kneiphof, and as a practical astrologer; which last business brought him in connection with Duke Albrecht, who in 1550 made him his librarian. From this time he began to concentrate himself on theology, having ascertained the looseness of the foundation on which astrology rested. He studied the Bible, the Fathers, Luther, Lombardus, etc. But his theological interest allured him into the Ossiander controversy; and this became, at last, so disagreeable to him, that in 1552 he gave up his position at Königsberg, and went to Wittenberg. There he continued his studies of dogmatics, and began to lecture in the university on Melanchthon's Loci Theologici; and his lectures attracted so much attention, that in 1554 he was called to Brunswick as coadjutor to the superintendent. In 1567 he was made superintendent himself, and in that position he remained until 1584, when, on account of ill health, he retired into private life.

Chemnitz made his first appearance in literature in the controversy concerning the Lord's Supper, by his memoir, Anatome Propositionum A. Hardenbergi de Cœna Domini, which was followed by his Vera et Sana Doctrina de Presentia Corporis et Sanguinis Christi in C. D., 1560; Repetitio Veræ Doctrinæ, etc., 1561; Fundamenta Sane Doctrinæ, etc., 1561; and De Duabus Naturis in Christo, etc., 1571. But his greatest celebrity he gained by his controversy with the Jesuits. In 1560 appeared in Cologne the Censura de Præcipuis Capitibus Doctrinæ Cælestis, a direct attack on Protestantism, and the first work of the Jesuits which attracted any attention. Chemnitz answered with his Theologiæ Jesuitarum Præcipua Capita, 1562, in which he treated the Jesuits as a faction, a conspiracy. He soon discovered, however, from the works of Andrade, that the Jesuits were in reality the true exponents of the Roman-Catholic Church, and he went to work on a greater scale: from 1565 to 1573 he published his Examen Concilii Tridentini in four volumes, a classical work as yet unsurpassed. In the latter part of his life he was very active, together with Andreü, for the unification of the evangelical churches, but without decisive success; though in many respects he seemed to be just the right man for such a task. He was not a creative mind: order, arrangement, systematization, was his talent. In that direction lie also his literary merits. The preceding generation the Reformers had been the producers: Chemnitz took the inheritance, and became the first theologian of the Reformation. His Loci Communes, however, were not published until after his death (1592), by Polycarp Leyser.

CHE'MOSH (subduer), the national deity of the Moabites, who are called the people of Chemosh, just as the Israelites were the people of Jehovah (Num. xxi. 29; Jer. xlviii. 46); identical with Molech, the god of the Ammonites (Judg. xi. 24). Solomon introduced (1 Kings xi. 7), and Josiah suppressed, his worship in Jerusalem (2 Kings xxiii. 13). The Moabite worship of Chemosh has received unexpected illustration by the Moabite Stone [C. D. GINSBURG: The Moabite Stone, 2d ed., London, 1871]. It was to Chemosh that Mesha offered his son (2 Kings iii. 27). See MESHIA; MOAB; MOABITE STONE.

CHER'UB, CHER'UBIM (uncertain derivation, perhaps from strong, hence terrible). Cherubim are a distinct order of beings from angels; for they are always in the immediate presence of God, whereas angels are sent on varied errands. They are winged, while angels are not. The Bible descriptions of their appearance are rather vague. Nothing very intelligible is said about their shape, except that they are winged. According to the Hebrews' primitive conception, they were the bearers of God when he appeared in glory upon earth (Ps. xviii. 10; Ezek. xi. 22); the witnesses of God's presence, wherever they are, he is. Very appropriately, therefore, were representations of them placed in the Holy of holies, both in the tabernacle, when the golden figures stood upon the mercy-seat (Exod. xxxvii. 8), and in the temple, when they were of colossal size (fifteen feet high), and stood on the floor, overshadowing the ark, which was between them (1 Kings vi. 27). They were pictured upon the curtains (Exod. xxvi. 1, 31, xxxvi. 8, 35), and upon all parts of the temple (1 Kings vi. 29, 32, 35, vii. 29, 36). Thus was testified the truth that God was in the midst of his people, and also the further ideas, that the holy places were under sleepless surveillance, and God by them was covered from the irreverent gaze of men. God is spoken of and addressed as dwelling between the cherubim (Num. vii. 89; 1 Sam. iv. 4; 2 Sam. vi. 2; 2 Kings xix. 15; 1 Chron. xiii. 6; Ps. lxxx. 1, xcix. 1; Isa. xxxvii. 16). After the fall, it is said (Gen. iii. 24) God placed at the east of the Garden of Eden the cherubim, and a flaming sword (a separate thing, not a sword in the hand of a cherub), to keep the way of the tree of life. The garden, having been the scene of God's presence, was an appropriate, indeed necessary, place for the cherubim (see above).

Much study has been given to the supposed non-Hebraic origin of the cherubim; but, although analogous shapes are found upon Egyptian and Assyrian monuments, it remains to be proven that these were patterns, in any sense, of the cherubim of the tabernacle and temple. What is much more likely is, that the cherubim of Ezekiel and the later Jewish thought were developments of the earlier ideas under the influence of the surrounding cultus. In regard to Ezekiel, it has been noticed that he has two different sorts of cherubim in his prophecy. 1. In xxviii. 14 he calls the king of Tyre, in a passage of great beauty, "the anointed cherub" that covereth with his wings the holy things: in other words, the king is said to have been raised to a divine throne. The cherub here appears as a divine being, who upon the mount of the gods has his fire-encircled seat. There is no such use of language in the non-Hebraic peoples. 2. The second sort of cherubim is that in i. iii. 13, xi. 22, cf. xii. 18 sq. Here we find, for the first time, a description of the shape of the cherubim, which, however, does not go far. They have four faces, four arms and hands, four wings, are covered over with eyes, stand between wheels which have wheels in them, so that they can move in any direction. They carry the throne of God. In this conception we trace Babylonian influence; for winged gods, and animals with men's faces, and vice versa, are common on their monuments. In Ezekiel, as in other parts of the Bible, we trace the connection between the cherubim and the thunderstorm, in which God manifests himself. There is the same fire of lightning running to and fro, and the same roar as of rumbling wheels.

Later Jewish speculation resulted in a change in the conception. The cherubim appear in the Book of Enoch, but not as the guardians of the places of God's appearance upon the earth, but of the heavenly throne itself. They are higher than the seraphim and the ophanim, are nearest the throne, and are its sleepless watchers (Enoch iv. 11, 18, xx. 7, lxi. 10 sq., lxxi. 6 sq., cf. lxxxix. 12 sq.). In the Apocalypse this later conception is again modified. The cherubim who in the authorized version misleadingly are called beasts] are four in number, each resembling a different animal (iv. 6, 7); have six wings (iv. 7), like Isaiah's seraphim (Isa. vi. 2); are the guardians (and give the seer invitation to approach, vi. 1, 3, 5, 7), not the bearers, of the throne of God; and are vocal (cf. Isa. vi. 3), not silent; are, indeed, leaders of the unceasing praises of heaven (Rev. iv. 8-10). A remarkable variation from the old Hebraic idea is the statement that one of the cherubim gave unto the seven angels the seven golden vials full of the wrath of God (xv. 7).

As the cherub-concept from the beginning served substantially to set forth a lively notion of the holiness, and particularly of the glory, of God as the Creator, and as Employer, of all things show forth his majesty and power, so the Christian Church, as fruit of the previous development, holds fast to the notion that in the highest rank of heavenly creatures stand the angels, who, in power to reflect, and eloquence to proclaim, the glory of God, transcend all others; and from them eternally goes forth the wondrous descriptions of honor and power unto Him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb, for ever and ever. CHEYNELL, Francis, Puritan theologian, b. at Oxford, 1608; d. at Preston, Sussex, 1665. He was made a fellow of Merton College, Oxford, 1629, and took orders; sided with the parliament, 1640; was a member of the Westminster Assembly of Divines, 1643; rector of Petworth, Sussex, and one of the delegation sent in September, 1646; to obtain the submission of Oxford to parliament. In 1648 he took forcible possession of the Lady Margaret professorship of theology in that university, and the presidency of St. John's College; but he was quickly removed. He was ejected from his rectory, 1662. He published Rise, Growth, and Danger of Socinianism, London, 1643 (in which he accused Chillingworth, Laud, and others, of Socinian leanings); and Chillingworthi Novissima, or Sickness, Heresy, Death, and Burial of William Chillingworth, London, 1644. For his relations with Chillingworth, see title.

CHILI, The Republic of, established Feb. 16, 1817, and numbered 1,938,861 inhabitants in 1869, most of whom were of pure Spanish descent. The number of independent Indians, the so-called Araucanians, is estimated at seventy thousand. The religion of the State is Roman Catholic, though the public worship of other denominations is tacitly allowed. The president of the republic, however, appoints the bishops; and no papal bull or episcopal letter can be published in the country without his placet. At the head of the Church stands the Archbishop of Santiago, with three suffragans,—of La Serena, or Coquimbo, Concepcion, and Ancud, or Chiloë. The number of priests is insufficient, but there are no means to provide for any more. The Church of Chili was never rich; and after the separation from Spain, the State seized all the estates of the Church, and also the tithes. As compensation, the State assumed the duty to pay the clergy, but is not always able to fulfil it. There are two theological seminaries, and a theological faculty at the University of Santiago. Twenty missionary stations, kept by the Capuchins, Franciscans, and Jesuits, and supported by the State, are laboring among the Indians. Some of the monasteries had their property restored to them in 1830, on the condition that they should establish free schools for poor people. In Valparaiso the foreigners—Englishmen, Americans, and Germans—form two small Protestant congregations. In the southern provinces of Valdivia and Llanquihue the German settlers have an evangelical minister residing at Puerto-Montt. Another evangelical congregation was afterwards formed at Asorno.

CHILLINGWORTH, William, b. at Oxford, October, 1602; d. at Chichester, Jan. 30 (?) 1644. He was made a fellow of Trinity College, Oxford, 1628; and was converted to Romanism by the Jesuit, John Piercy, alias John Fisher, who, with others of the Society of Jesus, was at that time particularly active among the talented young men of the universities and the gentry, and successful in proselyting. The marriage of Charles I. with Henrietta Maria of France (1625) had deepened the interest in the question as to the probable ecclesiastical fate of the country, and Rome did her best to bring the nation over to her side. Chillingworth was persuaded to go to Douay; but his godfather, Laud, then Bishop of London, put the Protestant side so forcibly to him, that he determined to leave Douay, return to Oxford, and investigate the question de novo. The result of his investigations was his hearty acceptance of Protestant teaching. A controversy had sprung up between

Dr. Christopher Potter, Provost of Queen's College, Oxford, and Matthias Wilson, alias Edward Knott. The latter had published, in 1630, the little treatise, Charity Mistaken; and to it Dr. Potter replied in 1633. Wilson replied to him, in Mercy and Truth, 1634. Chillingworth took a deep interest in the discussion, carefully studied the question, and replied to Wilson, in the famous The Religion of Protestants a Safe Way to Salvation, 1637, 1638,—a work yet read and prized as a consummate argument. In its day it was widely circulated: two editions were sold within five months of publication. It is a vindication of Protestantism, and of the author's return to it, and proclaims that "the Bible, the whole Bible, and nothing but the Bible, is the religion of Protestants," and that no church of one denomination is infallible. In the preface, however, Chillingworth seems to grant practical infallibility in teaching to the Church of England; and this position is all the more strange because it is notorious, that in 1635, while busy with his book, he had said that he could not conscientiously subscribe to the Thirty-nine Articles, and considered that the damning clauses in the Athanasian Creed were "most false, and also, in a high degree, schismatical and presumptuous." Indeed, previous to its publication, Laud, then Archbishop of Canterbury, had the book examined by the Vice-Chancellor of Oxford and two professors of divinity, because "the young man had given cause why a more watchful eye should be held over him and his writings." But, now that Chillingworth had expressed his unqualified assent to the Church, he was willing and able to accept the preferment he had previously refused; and so in 1638 he took the chancellorship of the church of Sarum, with the prebend of Brixworth in Northamptonshire annexed to it. While an advocate of religious, he had no idea of civil, liberty; for he wrote (1642) an unpublished treatise on the Unlawfulness of Resisting the Lawful Prince, although most Impious, Tyrannical, and Idolatrous. In the civil war he of course followed the royalists; was in Charles's camp at the siege of Gloucester (August, 1643), and brought his classical knowledge to bear upon the construction of machines, like the Roman testudines cum pluteis, which ran upon cart-wheels, and had a musket-proof covering to conceal the assailants, who shot through holes: they were further provided with a projection which would rest on the breastworks, and so form a bridge over the ditch into the city. In December, 1643, he was taken prisoner at Arundel Castle, when laid up by illness; and in January, 1644, he was conveyed to the bishop's palace at Chichester, where he died. A strange scene occurred at his funeral. Francis Cheynell (see title), that eccentric but devout Puritan, who happened to be in the town, had treated him with the utmost kindness, secured him the lodgings in the palace, nursed him, and vigorously defended his reputation, but, by his further efforts to convert him, is said to have shortened his days: and at the funeral he outraged all decency by flinging a copy of the Religion of Protestants into the open grave, exclaiming, "Get thee gone, thou cursed book! go rot with thine author." He afterwards published his Chillingworthi Novissima, 1644. Chilling-

worth was estimable for piety, modesty, and learning, for genius, acuteness, and enthusiasm. "He was the best reasoner, and the most acute logician, of his age." The charge of Socinianism was brought against him by Cheynell and others; but, as Tillotson sadly explains, in that day every one that offered to give a reasonable account of his faith, and to establish religion upon rational principles, was presently branded for a Socinian. Besides his great work, Chillingworth wrote many treatises of much, though, in comparison, minor value. The best edition of his Works: reprint of the tenth folio edition of 1742, containing life by Dr. Birch, Oxford, 1838, 3 vols. 8vo; American reprint, Phila., 1840. CHINA, Christian Missions in. The knowledge that so populous an empire was ignorant of the gospel of Christ was an incentive to his followers in early times to preach it to the Chinese; and about A.D. 505 the Nestorians had missions among them. Very little authentic information, however, concerning the extent and thoroughness of their work, has been preserved. Not a single fragment of their religious literature in Chinese has been discovered, nor any portion of the Bible; no legend or ruins of an ancient church remain to bear witness of their work. The only certain relic left is a stone tablet dated A.D. 781, still standing in Si-ngan, the ancient capital of China. Its author was Liu Siu-yen, a court-councillor; and it records the establishment of the King Kiao, or Illustrious Religion, in that city, with the consent of the Emperor Kien-chung. Nestorian churches are mentioned by travellers as late as the fourteenth century; but their extinction leads to the sad conclusion, that, like the church at Sardis, they were all dead, while they had a name to live. Shut off from constant intercourse with Western Asia, dependent on a native ministry alone for their pastors, and these having no Chinese version of the Scriptures to guide and animate them, it is not surprising that ritualism, ignorance, poverty, and dissensions, gradually destroyed their life and continuity.

The Roman-Catholic Church took up the missionary work a little while before the Nestorians had entirely quitted it; and Nicholas IV. sent John de Monte Corvino, who reached Peking in 1292, while Kublai khan was living. He labored alone eleven years; when Clement V. made him archbishop, on hearing of his zeal and success, and sent him seven assistants. He translated the Psalms and New Testament into Mongolian; and at his death, in 1328, he "had converted more than thirty thousand infidels." At this distance of time it is impossible to ascertain what these conversions really amounted to. But the seed sown seems to have been like that which fell in stony ground; for after the expulsion of the Mongol rulers from China in 1369, nothing survived of these numerous churches or their bishops. John of Florence, one of the Pope's nuncios to China, returned to Europe in 1353, after an absence of twelve years.

The next attempt was made by Xavier in 1552, but he died just at landing; and China remained till 1580 without a Christian teacher. Matthew Ricci and Michael Ruggiero were then designated by Valignani, and entered upon their work with zeal and tact. The details of their efforts, disappointments, and successes during the next thirty years, until they and their colleagues were settled in Peking, Nanking, and other cities, are fully given by Abbé Huc. It is a record of unceasing labors, and skilful uses of means and men calculated to promote their purpose. At Ricci's death, in 1610, he was at the head of a large body of coadjutors, scattered in many cities between the capital and Canton, who were gathering churches among the people, and propagating their tenets among all ranks. His body was buried in a plat of ground west of the city, given for the purpose by the Emperor Wanli, where, with those of many of his successors, it still remains to draw the homage of visitors and believers. His work has been minutely detailed by admiring friends. They have given its modus operandi in the full belief that its results proved its purity and power; and some of them continued it on the same principles: while, on the other hand, his conduct has called forth criticism from his own church, and Protestants, according to their differing views taken of mission-work.

His mantle fell on Longobardi, who exhibited great prudence in the trying times of disorder and opposition while the Ming dynasty was hastening to its downfall. The growing faith was then upheld by the co-operation of its native adherents, among whom Paul Sü and his daughter Candida shine forth during many years of charitable and consistent efforts among their countrymen. She built thirty-nine churches in different provinces, printed a hundred and thirty Christian books, established foundling and other hospitals, and was regarded with such consideration, that the emperor conferred on her the title of "virtuous woman."

Other societies also entered the field. Franciscan and Dominican priests began their labors at various points; and, as their system of operations was unlike that of the Jesuits, differences arose which tended to further separate them. Ricci was disposed to gloss over the idolatry involved in the Chinese worship of ancestors by allowing its practice with mental reservations; and the worship of Confucius was so described, that no one needed to regard it as otherwise than the veneration due to a great sage and legislator. The imperial state worship on the altars of Heaven and Earth in Peking was also divested of its idolatrous principle, and resolved into a state craft that possessed no religion at all. The advocates on each side took their discussions to Rome, and each obtained a bull in their favor, thus providing themselves with the strongest proof of their orthodoxy they could desire. In 1699 the Jesuits appealed to the Emperor Kanghi to decide between them, stating the pith of their own belief in such a manner that he could not fail to coincide with it. He assured them that "tien means the true God, and that the customs of China are political."

Soon after Longobardi became superior-general, disorders arose in the ill-governed empire; and many among the converts desired to free themselves from their allegiance to their rulers. He was aided in his efforts to maintain a discreet neutrality by Adam Schaal, whose science and skill had become well known, and whose influence reached to the farthest province. When the Manchus possessed themselves of Peking in 1644, Schaal and his colleagues made friends with their chiefs during the reign of Shunchi; but during the minority of his son, in 1665, a strong opposition developed at court, and its leaders succeeded in banishing, degrading, and imprisoning them and their adherents in the capital and provinces. Schaal died of grief: and dangers thickened over the heads of his coadjutors, who were beaten, imprisoned, and ordered to leave the country; so that their enemies looked for a speedy triumph, when an earthquake at Peking delivered the missionaries by terrifying their adversaries. On the majority of Kanghi, in 1671, they were gradually restored to their positions, and Verbiest took the place of Schaal in imperial favor.

During his reign of sixty years, the extension of the missions throughout the Chinese Empire suffered little real reverse: churches, schools, and other religious establishments, multiplied in the provinces; so that it is a cause for wonder that the Romish Church did not become dominant among the people. No exact data are given of its condition; but we are told, that when at Kanghi's death, in 1722, an edict was issued for the suppression of the faith, "more than three hundred churches were destroyed or suppressed, and three hundred thousand Christians abandoned to the fury of the heathen." The dissensions which arose during the last fifteen years of his reign, about the right of the Pope to direct the worship of his subjects, had aroused a spirit of suspicion among native officials; and he began to restrain the freedom of propagating Christianity while employing the missionaries in state duties. His son Yungching was sustained in his repressive policy by the officers in the capital and provinces; so that when he died in 1735, the cause had suffered severe losses. Its noble army of martyrs had also greatly increased; and the record of their constancy, patience, and fidelity, even unto death, does honor to their profession. Their foreign teachers also suffered with them, and many sealed their ministrations with their blood. It is not possible here to describe in detail how the great expectations entertained of the prosperity and final triumph of the faith were gradually destroyed by the dispersion of the native clergy, the want of foreign teachers, and the opposition of the educated class to a heretical religion, until the fires of persecution languished and died for want of fuel, towards the end of the century. Between the years 1768 and 1820 the disturbed state of Europe crippled the resources of missionary bodies, and few of their agents went to China. At the last date an estimate of the Roman-Catholic Church in China gives 8 bishops and coadjutors, 23 missionaries, 80 native priests, and 215,000 converts, as the total communion. Since then it has steadily increased; so that in 1866 the report enumerates 20 bishops, 8 coadjutors, 233 missionaries, 237 native priests, 12 colleges with 331 students, and 400,000 converts: 54 boys' and 114 girls' schools were opened in the province of Szechuen alone.

In 1844 Louis Philippe sent M. Lagrené as French envoy to China; and, after the latter had signed the treaty of Whampoa, he obtained from the Chinese plenipotentiary, in reply to a memorial sent to court, an imperial rescript, which granted toleration to these long-persecuted native converts, and placed them on a higher ground than ever before. Fourteen years after, an express article in each of the four treaties negotiated at Tien-tsin gave the highest sanction to the exercise of Christianity in all its forms throughout the empire. This was about three hundred years after Xavier's death at St. John's Island, near Macao.

The character of the work of these earnest laborers, if examined by the standard of the word of God, will be found to lack many vital points, and goes far to explain why the existence of such a number of Christians scattered through the land has failed to elevate the morality and intelligence of the natives. The greatest deficiency in this system of evangelizing is withholding the Sacred Scriptures from the people. This keeps the great salvation hidden away under a mass of ritual ceremonies; and the person of Christ is obscured by the worship of the Virgin and numerous saints, whose pictures and images too closely resemble the same thing in Buddhist temples to be easily discriminated by ignorant converts. The hierarchy which governed and guided these converts could therefore teach for doctrines the commandments of men, and control every part of their dioceses. If, therefore, a struggle arose between the civil and religious duties of the converts, their choice was in favor of the new faith; and the officers of the Chinese Government naturally resorted to force, oppression, and injustice, to maintain their power. This struggle has already developed some irritation and suspicion on the part of influential scholars and high officers, and contains in it the germs of serious troubles in the future.

The results of over two hundred years of unopposed proselytism in China by Roman-Catholic missionaries, as shown in the morals, learning, enterprise, and self-sustaining power of their converts, are sufficient proofs, that without the direct, continual instruction in the word of God, no heathen nation can ever be elevated to become a free and intelligent Christian people. Yet it is likewise true, that the good effects of so many years of careful labor are seen in many villages and communities of peaceable, industrious, and obedient believers attached to their worship. These Chrétiens are found in all the provinces; and their members are generally superior to their pagan countrymen.

It was therefore, in the providence of God, a preparation for the new relations into which the ultra-Gangetic nations were to be forced by Christian powers during this century, that the Protestant churches in Europe and America were led to establish their missions in all of them as soon as the way was opened. China was occupied first. Robert Morrison, the pioneer of Protestant missions to all that region, was told by the officers of the London Missionary Society, at his departure in 1807, that, after he had learned the Chinese language, "he might have the honor of forming a Chinese dictionary more comprehensive and correct than any preceding one, or the still greater honor of translating the Sacred Scriptures into a language spoken by a third part of the human race." He earned both these honors, and published the dictionary and translation before his return to England in 1824. The cordial reception extended to him by all classes — from King George IV. to the cottagers in his home at Newcastle — indicated the national sense of his services.

The year of his death (1834) saw the winding-up of the East India Company's establishment in China, and the commencement of the new era. During the past half-century the evangelizing labors of both divisions of Christians have gone on among the Chinese. The same toleration-acts contained in the treaties now give each of them access to all parts of the empire, and allow a candid comparison of their modes of operation, many of which, are, of course, alike; as schools, theological seminaries, erection of chapels, orphanages, and churches, etc.

Protestant missions in China really date from 1844, when their agents first occupied the five newly opened ports. The missionaries presently procured chapels in convenient positions for the daily preaching of the gospel, and thereby soon became known to the common people in and around the cities. Connected with the missions was usually a hospital, where diseases and wounds were attended to by a trained physician as far as the means allowed; and the crowd of patients became also a company of auditors to hear the message of salvation. The first institution of this kind was opened at Canton in 1835, by Dr. Peter Parker, and has since been imitated, with uniform success, at about twenty other places. The Canton hospital has received about seven hundred and fifty thousand patients since it began; and, like the others, its operations have been aided by the donations of foreign residents in China.

Printing-offices were also opened in three or four central stations, and four or five fonts of movable metallic types (each containing nearly eight thousand sorts) cut and cast, with which printing could be cheaply done. These types have also furnished the natives with facilities for issuing newspapers, thus incidentally starting one of the powerful agencies of their education. The printing-offices and foundries at Shanghai, Hongkong, Canton, Foochow, and Peking, have issued millions of copies of works upon religion, science, history, and geography, besides many copies of the Bible in whole or in part, nearly all of which were written and translated by the missionaries. Their quality, variety, and suitability vary greatly, of course; but all tend to one point, — the explanation and enforcement of God's truth and works. In addition to purely Chinese books, about three hundred others have been printed at these offices, — dictionaries, vocabularies, phrase-books, grammars, and numerous separate treatises of a more scientific character, besides periodical publications in the English as well as Chinese languages. From all these sources the natives have learned more, in thirty-five years, about God and their fellow-men, and their duties to each, than they had previously learned since they were a people.

In schools and seminaries the labors of Protestant missions have kept pace with the means at their command. Through these schools and the public preaching, the missionaries have aimed more directly to carry out Christ's command: "Teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you." Calling in the aid of native converts to supplement their own teachings, it has been shown, as it was in apostolic times, that no agency can take the place of the living voice in arousing dull intellects, vivifying dead consciences, and leading men to the cross of Christ. In a country where common schools are within the reach and means of even the very poor, it is not necessary to spend time and money in extensive plans of education. The children of converts, are, however, gathered under the care of the Church, and parents thereby taught their new responsibilities in training their offspring in the nurture and admonition of the Lord. Chinese education does not include girls in ordinary cases; and the energies of the ladies who have in recent years joined the missions are much directed to the training of girls.

In no one respect is the difference between the two bodies of missionaries now pursuing their work in China more apparent to the mass of people than in the oral preaching of the gospel. The open door of the wayside chapel, where usually stands a foreign or native teacher to invite the passers-by to enter, and hear the Word, is known in the neighborhood or village as one of the common tokens of their presence. Curiosity, for a while, draws the residents and strangers to the house. Out of the hundreds who hear little or much, with more or less comprehension of the truth, some are led to inquire more, and their hearts become the honest ground where fruit grows up to eternal life. But everybody at first is aroused, and learns something of the foreigner and his message. It is difficult for a stranger to understand the utter ignorance of the great body of natives of every thing pertaining to other lands; but a few years' chapel-preaching in a town has the result of removing much of this ignorance and prejudice. The divine declaration, "The entrance of thy words giveth light, it giveth understanding unto the simple," is found to be constantly verified. The erection of large and expensive churches at foreign expense has been generally discouraged by Protestants. Such is not the plan of the Romish missions. An imposing edifice for the ceremonies of their Church by its pomp and priests is erected, and thus becomes a centre to attract and hold their converts, around which they group their schools and seminaries, and provide retreats for their missionaries. Some of these establishments have grown to large dimensions, and prepare hundreds of catechists and native clergymen.

The growing power of the Christian Church in China renders statistics of its condition at a given time of comparatively little value. In the enlargement of Protestant missions was aided with vigor. Out of a total of 466 men and women sent out by twenty-five societies from the United States, Great Britain, and Germany, 280 were ordained ministers and physicians, 100 were stationed at 92 stations and 532 out-stations in various provinces, and aided in their work by 93 native pastors and 1,039 helpers, colporteurs, and schoolmasters. They reported 18,707 communicants of both sexes in their churches, and 6,227 children in day and boarding schools, for whose education, and other religious objects, $9,571 had been contributed by the Christians in 1876. About 725 churches and chapels had been erected up to that year; and 18 hospitals were opened, where nearly 100,000 patients had been treated. No satisfactory data of the myriad copies of Sacred Scriptures, in whole or in part, and of tracts, sold and distributed, can be obtained. The estimates derived from these figures and statements, showing the progress made in leavening the dormant mind of China with religious, scientific, and political truths, will be very imperfect if their collateral results on the vast mass of people not yet reached personally by foreigners is not also considered.

These figures need only to be contrasted with the condition of mission-work at Morrison's death, in 1834, when two missionaries and four converts formed the entire working-force in the empire, to be assured that God's time for the fulfilment of his ancient promise through Isaiah (xlix. 12), "Lo these from the land of Sinim," has at last fully come.

(formerly Sec. of the U.S. Legation, Peking).

CHOIR, a body of men, or of boys, or of men and boys, or of men and women, performing or leading the song which forms part of the Christian service. There was a choir in the Jewish temple: after the time of David it was at certain occasions composed of no less than four thousand singers. There was also a choir at the worship of Bacchus, singing and dancing around his altar; and this choir became the nucleus of the Greek tragedy. Indeed, the choir seems to have formed part of all public religious worship. For "choir," as an architectural term, see ARCHITECTURE, CHRISTIAN.

CHORAZIN, a city of Galilee, not mentioned in the Old Testament, nor by Josephus, and only twice in the New Testament (Matt. xi. 21; Luke x. 13), where it is associated with Capernaum and Bethsaida. The etymology of the name is uncertain. Origen (Migne's ed. ii. p. 280) makes it a Greek name, Χώρα Ζιν ("district of Zin"); but the manuscripts give Χοραζίν, or Χοραζείν, which, if of Hebrew derivation, might mean "woodland." Its identification is still a matter of sharp controversy, along with that of Capernaum and Bethsaida. Ritter, who was never in Palestine, puts Bethsaida at Khan Minyeh, Chorazin at Tabiga, and Capernaum at Tell Hûm. Some writers put Bethsaida at Tabiga, Capernaum at Tell Hûm, and Chorazin at Kerazeh (two miles north of Tell Hûm), without assigning any place to Khan Minyeh. Robinson puts Capernaum at Khan Minyeh, Bethsaida (about two-thirds of a mile farther north) at Tabiga, and Chorazin (about a mile and a half north of Tabiga) at Tell Hûm. In support of this theory we have first of all the positive statement of Jerome (Migne's ed., iv. p. 124), that these three places were all of them, with Tiberias, on the shore of the Lake of Gennesaret. Kerazeh is a good long two miles away from the lake, and the remains of buildings found there are not apparently very ancient. The inhabitants of Chorazin, which, in the time of Eusebius (Onomasticon, Larsow and Parthey's ed., p. 375), was already deserted, may have taken the old name along with them to the new site; as in the case of Sarepta by the seaside, which is now Surafend upon the hill, a mile and a quarter off. We have also the itinerary of the German bishop, Willibald, who visited Palestine about the middle of the eighth century, and, in going up on the west side of the lake, went from Tiberias, through Magdala, to Capernaum, Bethsaida, and Chorazin (TOBLER'S Descriptioes Terræ Sacre, 1874, p. 63). This order of places is exactly that of Robinson. [For another view, see CAPERNAUM.] ROSWELL D. HITCHCOCK.

CHOREPISCOPI, i. e., lit. "country bishops," those who acted as bishops in distant rural districts under the authority of some city bishop. They were a class between bishops proper and presbyters, and appeared first in Asia Minor, at the close of the third century, because there and then the impossibility of careful oversight of all the interests of large dioceses was first felt. In the West they are mentioned first in the fifth century. They performed such episcopal duties as the ordination of readers, exorcists, subdeacons, but only rarely of deacons or presbyters, and never of bishops, confirmation in their own district, and the granting of letters dimissory; they also assisted at the Lord's Supper in the mother-church in the city. One of the subsidiary yet important uses to which the office could be put was to make a place for schismatical bishops who had returned to the Church. In both parts of the Church they were common. But the office declined and vanished. In the West its place was taken by the archdeacons, although in France and Germany the title was long given to an altogether different office. In the East it continued for a time among the schismatics. A modern analogy is the English suffragan bishop. See art. Chorepiscopus, in SMITH and CHEETHAM: Dict. Chr. Antiq. vol. i. pp. 353-355.

CHRISM (from χρῖσμα, "oil," or "unction"), the consecrated oil, or mixture of oil and balsam, which is used in the Greek and Roman Church in the administration of baptism, confirmation, and extreme unction, applied respectively to the crown of the head, the forehead, and the organs of the five senses, the loins, and the feet. The usage dates far back into the Christian Church. The earliest testimonies are, TERTULLIAN: De Baptismo, c. 7; ST. CYPRIAN: Epist. 70, c. 2; Apost. Constit., VII. 43, § 3; 44 § 1. The right to consecrate chrism is, since the Council of Toledo (398), an episcopal privilege in the Western Church: in the Eastern it is reserved for the patriarchs alone.

CHRISMAL. The word is applied to, (1) The vessel or flask which held the chrism, (2) A cloth for covering relics, (3) Chrism, see below.

CHRISOM, the white cloth with which the Roman priest covers the head of an infant after the administration of baptism: hence the expression, a "chrisomed child." Before the introduction of infant baptism, the catechumen received a white robe, chrismalis; which word is also used of the vessel in which the chrism was preserved.

CHRIST JESUS. See JESUS CHRIST.

CHRIST, Monogram of. In the Roman catacombs is found a monogram of Christ, consisting of the two first letters of his name, X and P, combined in various manners, and sometimes further adorned with an added Alpha and Omega; which article see. By Constantine this monogram was applied to the military standards, coins, etc. See Mrs. JAMESON and Lady EASTLAKE: History of our Lord as exemplified in Works of Art, 2d ed., London, 1865.

CHRIST, The Order of, was founded in 1317 by Dionysius, King of Portugal, under the name of the Knights of Jesus Christ, and for the purpose of defending Algarbia against the Moors. In the beginning of the sixteenth century the order had four hundred and fifty canonries, and enormous revenues. In 1550 the grand-mastership was forever combined with the Portuguese crown by Pope Julius III. In 1789 the order was abolished, and its estates confiscated. Its titles and insignia are now simply a token of royal favor.

CHRIST, Pictures of. None of the evangelists gives us the least hint with respect to the personal appearance of Christ; and when afterwards a tradition began to form, it was evidently the product of incidental circumstances. The persecuted Church of the first three centuries liked to imagine Christ in his state of humiliation, starting from the prophetic description of the suffering Messiah in Ps. xxii. and Isa. lii.; the victorious Church liked to imagine him in his state of elevation, starting from the Messianic pictures in Ps. xlv. and the Song of Solomon. The first formal description of the personal appearance of Christ is found in a Latin letter, which pretends to have been written by Publius Lentulus, a contemporary of Pilate, and "president of the people of Jerusalem" (there was no such office), and sent to the Roman Senate. Christ is here described as "a man of noble and well-proportioned stature, with a face full of kindness and yet firmness, so that the beholders both love and fear him. His hair is wine-colored, golden at the root, straight, lustreless, parted down the middle of the crown, after the fashion of the Nazarenes [Nazarites?]; his beard is full, but short, forked, and hazel-colored; and his eyes are blue and brilliant. In reproof and rebuke he is formidable; in exhortation and teaching, gentle and amiable. He has been never seen to laugh, but oftentimes to weep." The letter was first discovered in a manuscript copy of the works of Anselm from the twelfth century, and it is certainly not older than the fourth century. Another description is found in the works of John of Damascus, Epist. ad Theoph. Imp. de venerandis Imag., from the eighth century; and a third, in the Church History of Nicephorus I. 40, from the fourteenth century. Christ is here represented with long, waving, blond hair, and pale olive complexion. Besides these traditions and formal descriptions may be mentioned as materials utilized by modern artists in pictures of Christ, the two so-called portraits of Christ, — that sent to King Abgarus, and that imprinted on the silken handkerchief of Veronica. See the articles on ABGAR and VERONICA. Modern pictures of Christ show generally, either the Salvator type, with its expression of calm serenity and dignity, or the Ecce Homo type, with the crown of thorns and the tears of suffering.

CHRISTIAN, Origin of the Name. The Greek χριστιανός is a transliteration of the Latin Christianus, the nickname meaning "partisan of Christ," given by the people of Antioch to the believers in the new religion brought there by those driven from Jerusalem by the persecution after Stephen's death (Acts xi. 19, 26). The name may have been given in ridicule, for the Antiochians were known for their scurrilous wit; but the time had come for naming, in some popular, intelligible way, those who were in religion neither Gentiles or Jews. The name arose, probably, in the mistake that Christ was a proper name; nevertheless, it was the fittest, most honorable, possible: it expressed the distinguishing features of the Christian religion. It is a Person, not a system of ethics or of divinity; it is a Life, not a thought; it is, moreover, Christ, the Messiah, the Son of God, whose partisans we are, not Jesus, the Son of man, — a name common among the Jews. And it is striking, that whereas "Christian" is a term of respect all the world over, "Jesus" is just the opposite, even in Roman Catholic lands. See Conybeare and Howson's Life of Paul, vol. I. chap. 4. The form of the word is suggestive. (Bishop Lightfoot is in the minority in denying the Greek form of this in word. See his Com. on Philippians, p. 16.)

It is a combination of the two widespread languages, Greek and Latin, reminding us that Christianity desires not concealment, but publicity, and prophesying that in all tongues the name of Christ shall be heard.

CHRISTIAN COMMISSION, The United States. One of the grandest fruits in history of combined Christianity, patriotism, and philanthropy. It was first proposed by Mr. Vincent Colyer of New York, in a letter written Aug. 22, 1861, to his colleagues of the New-York Young Men's Christian Association Committee, and originated by a meeting of the Young Men's Christian Association of New-York (Sept. 23, 1861) upon all similar associations in the North, to unite in a convention to order the religious needs of the soldiers. The convention was approved by the National Committee of the Young Men's Christian Association of the United States of America, who alone had the authority to call the convention; and on Oct. 28 an official call was issued, and the convention was accordingly held in the rooms of the Young Men's Christian Association of New-York City on Saturday and Friday, Nov. 14 and 15, 1861. The result of their deliberation was the organization of a commission of twelve to take charge of the work, which reported to the Young Men's Christian Association and the public, collected funds and contributions of various kinds, and kept up the interest in the movement. The amount of good done was of course incalculable. The Sanitary Commission looked after the bodies of the soldiers; the Christian Commission, after their souls; but at the same time the bodily wants were cared for, and the soldier's comfort was much increased. The soldiers knew there were at home daily prayers on their behalf; and on the very battlefield God was invoked to bless the right. The evils of camp-life were ameliorated; the wounded were tended, and given spiritual comfort. Into a Christian's ear the dying told his secret, or gave his last bequests. An aggressive work for Christ was carried on amid all the distractions of war. Bibles, hymnals, tracts, religious newspapers and books, were distributed, and personal work was done. Two special works were taken up. The Commission was the medium of speedy and safe communication between the soldiers and sailors and their friends at home; and, besides, it circulated "Loan-Libraries" of general literature through the army. The money collected for this cause was, in the aggregate, nearly $2,750,000; but counting in the gifts of books, etc., and the value of the facilities gratuitously given, the official Annals of the United States Christian Commission reckon the total amount as $6,291,107.68 (p. 729). Of course these figures do not tell the whole story; but they show how ready the Christian public was to give, to carry on the work of the Commission. The final meeting of the Christian Commission was held on Sunday evening, Feb. 11, 1866, in the hall of the House of Representatives, Washington, D.C. The leading men in this movement were the president, Mr. George H. Stuart of Philadelphia, and Dr. Nathan Bishop of New York. For a full and very interesting account of the grand work, see LEMUEL MOSS: Annals of the U. S. Christian Commission, Phila., 1868.

CHRISTIAN CONNECTION, or CHRISTIANS (often pronounced Christ-yans). The denomination is the resultant of three independent secession movements. The first was in 1793, in North Carolina, when certain seceders from the Methodist-Episcopal Church called themselves "Republican Methodists," but, influenced chiefly by Rev. J. O'Kelley, adopted the name of "Christians." The second movement was in Vermont, in 1800, among the Baptists; and a church was organized at Lyndon. The third movement was in Kentucky and Tennessee, among the Presbyterians, in 1801; and the Springfield presbytery, which proclaimed the principles of the denomination, was formed in 1804. But a union was quickly effected between these different organizations, inasmuch as the expulsive force was found to be in each case the same, — the desire to be free from the "bondage of creed." But although the Bible is their only authoritative rule of faith and practice, yet the general characteristics of their belief may be determined. They are antitrinitarians, yet call Christ a divine Saviour, and acknowledge the Holy Spirit to be the power and energy of God; immersionists, yet open communionists of the widest kind, extending their fellowship to Christians of every name. In ecclesiastical polity they are congregational, but have annual State conferences, and quadrennial general conventions. At first their ministry was not well educated; but now the sect has several institutions of learning, including the Christian Union College at Merom, Ind. They are distributed throughout the United States and Canada. Their membership in the United States is about two hundred thousand. See the general histories of the different denominations in the United States by WINEBRENNER (1844), and by BELCHER (1855); also BAIRD: Religion in America (1856).

CHRISTIAN UNION CHURCHES OF THE WEST. This body of Christians arose in the West in 1863-64. The official statement of their principles is as follows: 1. The oneness of the Church; 2. Christ the only head; 3. The Bible the only rule of faith and practice; 4. "Good fruits" the only condition of membership; 5. The repudiation of controversy; 6. Each local church self-governed; 7. No partisan politics preached. They have no creed; but they unite cordially with organized Christian churches in supporting such institutions as the American Bible and the American Tract Society; and their pulpits are open to all denominations which they recognize as sound. The body holds a general council every four years, and each State a separate yearly council. They claim to number about a hundred thousand members. It seems to be a purely ephemeral movement. See art. in supplementary volume to Appleton's Cyclopedia, pp. 803, 804.

CHRISTIANS OF ST. JOHN. Some Carmelite missionaries laboring in the regions of Basrah and Susa, in the middle of the seventeenth century, met there with a body of Christians who called themselves Nazareans or Mendæans, but by the Mohammedans were called Sabinians. They pretended to be the descendants of the disciples of John the Baptist, and to have been driven away from the regions of the Jordan by the Mohammedans; hence their name, "Christians of St. John," given to them by the missionaries. Their holy books are written in an Aramæan dialect. One of them has been published, with a Latin translation, Codex Nazareus, by Matth. Norberg, London, 1815-16, 3 vols. See IGNATIUS A JESU: Narratio Originis, Rituum, et Errorum Christianorum S. Johannis, Rome, 1652.

CHRISTIANS OF ST. THOMAS, or, as they call themselves, The Syrian Church of Malagala; a Christian sect living in the southern part of the Malabar coast of India; pretend to be the descendants of the converts of the apostle Thomas on his visit to India, but originated, probably, from some early Nestorian colony. In the sixth century they were in regular communication with the Nestorian Church of Western Asia; and, though this connection was afterwards disturbed, their whole tradition rests on a Nestorian basis. When the Portuguese reached India, they found the church, numbering about sixteen thousand families, in a very poor condition, and under their protectorate its very independence and natural character were threatened. In 1599 the Archbishop of Goa brought it in connection with Rome. The Jesuits came, and the conversion began; but in 1653 most of the converts again broke off from the Roman Church, and at present one-half, comprising about ninety-seven churches, follow their old Syrian rites, while the rest conforms to the Church of Rome. The language of the liturgy is not the Malabar, but the Syriac. See W. GERMANN: Die Kirche der Thomaschristen, Gütersloh, 1877.

CHRISTMAS, a Christian festival celebrated on Dec. 25, in memory of the birth of Jesus Christ. The English name Christmas, like the Dutch Kerstnisse, or Kersmis, is formed analogous to such names as Candlemas, Michaelmas, etc. In the Romanic languages the name is derived from the Latin Natalis, Natalitia, or Nativitas, Italian Natal, Spanish Nadal, or Natividad, French Noël. The German Weihnacht is a literal translation of the Hebrew Chanuka, the name of the Jewish festival of the dedication or purification of the temple by Judas Maccabæus. The Scandinavian Juul, and the Anglo-Saxon Geol, mean "wheel," and refer to the winter solstice.

When the festival of Christmas is first spoken of in the ancient Church (CLEMENS OF ALEXANDRIA: Stromata, lib. I., cap. 21), it was celebrated by the Eastern Church on Jan. 6, under the name of Epiphania, and by the Western Church on Dec. 25, under the name of Natalis. This discrepancy is easily accounted for, however, by the circumstance that the gospel gives no date of Christ's birth, but simply tells that it took place during night. But the date of the Epiphania is arbitrary, so far as it rests upon an inference of merely allegorical import, — the first Adam was born on the sixth day: consequently the second Adam ought also to be born on a sixth day, — and the festival itself had something allegorical in its character. It was celebrated, not so much in memory of the actual birth of Christ, as in memory of the first manifestation of the divinity of Christ; the name Epiphania being the word commonly used in the Greek language to denote the manifestation of a god in human shape. Later on, however, from the beginning of the fourth century, when the restless searchings of the nature and person of Christ drove men's mind into many singular errors, the Eastern Church began to feel the importance of emphasizing the actual birth of Christ by a separate festival distinct from the Epiphania, with its somewhat vague historical bearing; and from a sermon of Chrysostom, delivered, it is believed, on Christmas Day, 386, it appears that the Natalis of the Western Church was rapidly though gradually adopted throughout the East.

What foundation there originally was for the Roman date of Dec. 25 is difficult to decide. On account of this date, some connect the Christian festival of Christmas with the above-mentioned Jewish feast, Chanuka; and many features seem to speak for such a relation between them. Others connect it with the Saturnalia, or Brumalia, or some other Pagan Roman feast; and here, too, the single features are often strikingly resemblant. Others, again (Lightfoot, Jablonsky, Münter), inveigh against the date as arbitrary, and not in harmony with the gospel narrative, etc. Nevertheless the fact remains, that the whole Western Church unanimously agreed upon this date, and that the Eastern Church adopted it without much contradiction; which fact goes far to show that the date cannot well have been a mere assumption, but must have had some kind of tradition to support it.

The date once fixed, Christmas gradually became one of the three great annual festivals of the Church. The whole period from Nativity to Epiphany was consecrated, — Dec. 26 as a memorial of the martyr Stephen; Dec. 27, of St. John; Dec. 28, of the Massacre of the Innocents, etc. The four Sundays preceding Christmas were incorporated with the cycle, under the title of Advent, as a preparation for the festival. The day itself was celebrated by three masses, — one in the night, one at daybreak, and one in the morning; and the costliest utensils and furniture were used. During the middle ages the celebration assumed, in accordance with the taste of the time, quite a theatrical aspect. The manger was shown, with the Virgin sitting beside it, surrounded with chanting angels. The wise men, the shepherds, Joseph, etc., were also represented; and a complete Mystery was formed. As a remnant of this symbolical representation of biblical events which formerly found so much favor both with the priests and with their flocks, it may be mentioned, that, in the third decade of the present century, the custom was still kept up of rocking a doll, in a cradle adorned with lights, on the top of the spire of the Cathedral of Tübingen at twelve o'clock Christmas night, while a band of wind instruments blew the Hymn of the Nativity.

No other Christian festival penetrated so deeply into the household as Christmas, probably because its character is essentially joy. Such as it appears in the household, however, many features indicate that there were non-Christian elements present in its origin. The use of lighted tapers reminds forcibly of the Jewish festival of purification. The giving of presents was a Roman custom. The Yule-tree and the Yule-log are remnants of old Teutonic nature-worship. In the household, also, the festival gradually sank down into a mere revelry. In England an abbot of misrule was chosen in every large household; in Scotland, an abbot of unreason; and during the term of the festival he was the master of the house. By an act of Parliament this custom was forbidden in 1555; and in England, as everywhere, the Reformation brought in a kind of refinement in the celebration of Christmas by emphasizing its Christian elements, and excluding every feature which had not, or could not be given, a religious character. Under the influence of evangelical Christianity, Christmas has become a children's feast, and the Roman-Catholic church has followed the example. The dissenters of the Church of England, taking offence at the coarse and un-Christian character which the festival had retained from the middle ages, polished it altogether; but of late years the celebration of Christmas in some form or other has become well-nigh universal in England and America. CHRISTOLOGY (Χριστολογία, from Χριστός and λόγος, as "theology" is from θεός and λόγος).¹

The length of this article arises from the fact that it is a complete though condensed historical summary of all the related topics; such as Apollinarianism, Eutychianism, Nestorianism, Chalcedon, Monophysitism, Monotheletism,

It embraces the doctrine of Christ's person; while soteriology is the doctrine of Christ's work, or the doctrine of salvation. Some writers include both the person and work under the term; but we confine it here to the former, although we admit, of course, the inseparable connection. The word was used by the English divines in the seventeenth century,² and has recently been re-introduced from Germany. Christology is based upon the life and testimony of Christ, as represented historically in the Gospels, and as reflected doctrinally and experimentally in the Acts and Epistles. It treats of the mystery of the incarnation (in the wider sense of the term), (1) the humanity, (2) the divinity, of our Lord, and (3) their relation to each other in his one person. This divine-human personality forms the basis of his work, which is the redemption, reconciliation, and re-union of men with God. It is the central doctrine of Christianity (preceded by theology and anthropology, and followed by pneumatology, soteriology, ecclesiology, and eschatology). It was the one article of St. Peter's creed, and it forms the heart of the Apostles' Creed. The leading evangelical divines of Europe and America come to agree more and more in this estimate of its importance; and the ever-increasing number of Lives of Christ strengthens the christocentric character of modern theology. Yet care must be taken not to emphasize the incarnation at the expense of the equally important doctrines of the atonement by Christ's death, and the regeneration by the Holy Spirit.

I. THE BIBLICAL CHRISTOLOGY embraces, (1) The Messianic prophecies of the Old Testament; (2) The christology of the New Testament, (a) The testimony of Christ in the Gospels; (b) The christology of the apostles, — (aa) of James, (bb) of Peter, (cc) of Paul (including that of the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews), (dd) of John (including the Apocalypse). Christ is the heart of the Scripture, and the key to its spiritual understanding. All revelations of God look to him as the final revelation.

(1) The Old Testament is the preparation for the New. The soul of the Old Testament is the promise of the Messiah, which began in Paradise with the protevangelium of the serpent-bruiser, and culminated in the testimony of John the Baptist, pointing to Jesus of Nazareth as the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world. See MESSIAH and MESSIANIC PROPHECIES, and the literature quoted there.

Communicatio idiomatum, Kenosis, Kenoticists, etc. The author has made some use (by permission) of his own articles in McClintock and Strong's Cyclop., III. 277-285, and Smith and Wace's Dictionary of Christian Biography, I. 480-495, and of the third volume of his own Church History; but the whole is reconstructed, adapted, and virtually a new article, especially the exposition of the modern theories.

² Dr. Thomas Jackson (1595-1640) defined it correctly as "that part of divinity which displays the great mystery of godliness, — God manifested in the human flesh." John Owen used the term; and Robert Fleming, jun., a Scotch divine (d. 1716), wrote a Christology, in 3 vols., London, 1705-1708. Some French writers also use it; although they have not paid much attention to the doctrine, notwithstanding the sensation of Renan's Life of Jesus. Lichtenberger (Encycl., III. 129) correctly defines it: "On comprend sous ce nom [Christologie] l'ensemble des doctrines touchant la personne de Jésus-Christ dans ses rapports avec Dieu et avec l'humanité, telles qu'elles sont contenues dans le Nouv. Test. et telles qu'elles ont été développées dans le cours des siècles, au sein de l'Église chrétienne."

(2) It is the unanimous teaching of the New-Testament writings, that Christ combines in a most real, though mysterious way, the double character of a unique divine sonship and a unique sinless manhood in one harmonious personality; and that by this very constitution of his person he is qualified to be the Lord and Saviour of the human race, and the only Mediator between God and man. He represents at once the nearest approach which God can make to man, and the nearest approach which man can make to God. The orthodox christology is an attempt to formulate this "mystery of godliness," and to guard it against error; but every age must grapple anew with this problem of problems, and make it alive, and fruitful for its own intellectual and spiritual benefit.

Christ strongly asserts his humanity, and calls himself about eighty times in the Gospels the Son of man; not a son of man among other descendants of Adam, but the Son of man emphatically; as the representative of the whole race; as the second Adam, descended from heaven (comp. Rom. v. and 1 Cor. xv.); as the ideal, the perfect, the absolute man, the head of a new race, the King of Jews and Gentiles, the model man for universal imitation. While putting himself on a par with us as man, he claims at the same time, as the Son of man, superiority over all, and freedom from sin, and thus stands solitary and alone as the one and only spotless human being in the midst of a fallen race, as an oasis of living water and fresh verdure, surrounded by a barren desert of sand and stone. He never fell out of harmony with God and with himself: he alone needed no repentance, no conversion, no regeneration, no pardon. This sinlessness of Christ is the great moral miracle of history which underlies all his miraculous works, and explains them as natural manifestations of his miraculous person.

On the other hand, Christ as emphatically asserts his divinity, and calls himself not simply a son of God among other children of God by adoption, but the Son of God above all others, in a peculiar sense; the Son by nature; the Son from eternity; the Son who alone knows the Father, who reveals the Father to us, who calls him, not "our" Father (as we are directed to pray), but "my" Father. He is, as his favorite disciple calls him, the "only-begotten Son" (according to some of the oldest manuscripts, "the only-begotten God," θεός); or, as the Nicene theology expresses it, "eternally begotten of the essence (οὐσία) of the Father." He is thus represented to us by himself and his disciples as a divine-human being, truly God and truly man in one person; and his words and acts and sufferings have a corresponding character and effect. Hence he puts forth claims which in the mouth of every other man, no matter how wise and how good, would sound like blasphemy or lunacy, but which from his lips appear as natural as the rays of light emanating from the sun, and which command the respect even of unbelievers, so far as to prevent any charge of pride and presumption. He represents himself constantly as being sent from God, or as having come directly from God, to teach this world what he had not learned from any school or any book. He calls himself the Light of the world, the Way, the Truth, and the Life; he invites all men to come to him, that they may find rest and peace; he claims the power to forgive sins, and to raise the dead; he says, "I am the Resurrection and the Life," and promises eternal life to every one that believeth in him. Even in the moment of his deepest humiliation, he proclaimed himself the King of truth, and the Ruler and Judge of mankind. His kingdom is to be co-extensive with the race, and everlasting as eternity itself. And with this consciousness he sent forth his disciples to proclaim the gospel of salvation to every creature, forewarning them of persecution and martyrdom, and promising no reward in this life, but pledging them his presence to the end of the world, and a crown of glory in heaven. He co-ordinates himself in the baptismal formula with the eternal Father and the eternal Spirit, and allows himself to be worshipped by the sceptical Thomas as his "Lord" and his "God."

This central truth of Christ's divine-human person and work is set forth in the New-Testament writings, not as a logically-formulated dogma, but as a living fact and glorious truth, as an object of faith, a source of comfort, and a stimulus to a holy life, in humble imitation of his perfect example. This is sufficient for all practical purposes. The simple narrative of the Gospels is far more powerful for the general benefit of mankind than all the systems of theology. But the mind of the Church must meditate, and try to grasp this truth; and the New Testament itself furnishes ever new impulse and food for the theological speculation. The beginning of a christology we find already in Paul and John.

II. THE ANTE-NICENE CHRISTOLOGY (from A. D. 100 to the Council of Nicaea, 325). The ecclesiastical development of this fundamental dogma started from Peter's confession of the Messiahship of Jesus (Matt. xvi. 18), and from John's doctrine of the incarnate Logos (John i. 14). It was stimulated by two opposite heresies, — EBIONISM and GNOSTICISM; the one essentially Jewish, the other essentially heathen; the one affirming the humanity of Christ to the exclusion of his divinity, the other running into the opposite error by resolving his humanity into a delusive show (δόκησις, φάντασμα); both agreeing in the denial of the incarnation, or the real and abiding union of the divine and human in the person of our Lord.

Besides, there arose in the second and third centuries two forms of Unitarianism or Monarchianism.

(1) The RATIONALISTIC or DYNAMIC Unitarianism — represented by the ALOGIANS, THEODOUS, ARTEMON, and PAUL OF SAMOSATA — either denied the divinity of Christ altogether, or resolved it into a mere power (δύναμις), although they generally admitted his supernatural generation by the Holy Spirit.

(2) The PATRIPASSIAN and SABELLIAN Unitarianism maintained the divinity of Christ, but merged it into the essence of the Father, and so denied the independent, pre-existent personality of Christ. So PRAXEAS, NOËTUS, CALLISTUS (Pope Calixtus I.), BERYLLUS OF BOSTRA, and SABELLIUS.

In antagonism with these heresies, the Church sought the full divinity of Christ (versus Ebionism and rationalistic Monarchianism), his full humanity (versus Gnosticism and Manichæism), and his independent personality (versus Patripassianism and Sabellianism). The dogma was developed in close connection with the dogma of the Trinity, which resulted, by logical necessity, in the deity of Christ and the deity of the Holy Spirit on the basis of the fundamental truth of Monotheism.

The ante-Nicene Christology passed through many obstructions, loose statements, uncertain conjectures and speculations; but the instinctive main current of the Church was steadily towards the Nicene and Chalcedonian creed-ements, especially if we look to the worship of Christ as the object of worship, prayer, praise (which implies his deity) from the beginning, as we must infer from several passages of the New Testament (John xx. 28; Heb. i. 6; 1 John v. 13-15; Rev. v. 6-13), and the heathen testimony of Pliny the Younger concerning the singing of hymns to Christ as

“Carmen Christo quasi Deo dicere,” Ep. x. from the “Gloria in Excelsis,” which was the daily morning hymn of the Eastern Church early as the second century, from the “Terminus,” from the Hymn of Clement of Alexandria to the divine Logos (Pædag. III. 12), from statements of Origen (Contra Cels. VIII. 67), Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. V. 28), and many other testimonies. Christ was believed to be divine, and as divine, before he was clearly taught to be divine. Life preceded theology (“Fides pre-intellectum”). Many a martyr in those days of persecution died for his faith in the divinity of the Lord, with very imperfect knowledge of doctrine. It is unfair to make the Church responsible for the speculative crudities, the tentative and tentative statements, of some ante-Nicene fathers, who believed more than they clearly express in words. In the first stages of the human mind to grapple with so great a mystery, we must expect many mistakes and inaccuracies. The ante-Nicene rules of faith as we find them in the writings of Irenæus, Tertullian, Cyprian, etc., are essentially the same among themselves and with the Apostles’ Creed, so called, as it appears, first in the fourth century, especially at Rome and Aquileia. (See Irenæus, De Symbolo.) They all confess the divine-human character of Christ as the chief object of the Christian faith, but in the form of facts, and in simple, popular style, not in the form of doctrinal or logical statement. The Nicene Creed is much more explicit and dogmatic in consequence of the preceding contest with heresy; but the substance of the faith is the same in the Nicene and Apostles’ Creeds. See these ante-Nicene Rules of Faith in SCHIAFF, Creeds of Christendom, vol. II. 11-45.

In the Apostolic Fathers we find only simple practical, biblical statements, and reminiscences of apostolic preaching for the purposes of edification. Ignatius of Antioch does not hesitate to call Christ God without qualification (Ad Ephes. c. 18: ὁ γὰρ Θεὸς ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦς ὁ Χρ., c. 7; ἐν σαρκὶ γενόμενος Θεός, comp. Ad Rom. c. 6). Polycarp calls him “the eternal Son of God” (Ad Phil. c. 2, 8), and associates him in his last prayer with the Father and the Spirit (Martyr. Polyc. c. 14).

The theological speculation on the person of Christ began with Justin Martyr, and was carried on by Clement of Alexandria and Origen, in the East; by Irenæus, Hippolytus, and Tertullian, in the West.

JUSTIN MARTYR (d. 166) takes up the Johannean Logos idea, which proved a very fruitful germ of theological speculation. It was prepared by the Old-Testament personification of the word and wisdom of God, assumed an idealistic shape in Philo of Alexandria, and reached a realistic completion in St. John. Following the suggestion of the double meaning of the Greek λόγος (ratio and oratio), Justin distinguishes in the Logos two elements, — the immanent and the transitive; the revelation of God ad intra, and the revelation ad extra. He teaches the procession of the Logos from the free will (not the essence) of God by generation, without division or diminution of the divine substance. This begotten Logos he conceives as a hypostatical being, a person distinct from the Father, and subordinate to him. He co-ordinates God, the Son, and the prophetic Spirit, as objects of Christian worship (σεβόμενο καὶ προσκυνούμενο, Apol. I. 6). Peculiar is his doctrine of the λόγος σπερματικός, the seminal Logos, or the Word disseminated among men, i.e., Christ before the incarnation, who scattered elements of truth and virtue among the heathen philosophers and poets, although they did not know it.

CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA (d. 220) sees in the Logos the ultimate principle of all existence (without beginning, and timeless), the revealer of the Father, the sum of all intelligence and wisdom, the personal truth, the author of the world, the source of light and life, the educator of the race, who at last became man to make us partakers of his divine nature. Like some other ante-Nicene fathers (Justin Martyr, Tertullian, and Origen), he conceived the outward appearance of Christ’s humanity in the state of humiliation to have been literally without form or comeliness (Isa. liii. 2, 3); but he made a distinction between two kinds of beauty, — the outward beauty of the flesh, which soon fades away; and the moral beauty of the soul, which is permanent, and shone even through the servant form of our Lord (Pæd. III. c. 1).

ORIGEN (d. 254) felt the whole weight of the

christological problem, but obscured it by foreign speculations, and prepared the way, both for the Arian heresy and the Athanasian orthodoxy, though more fully for the latter. On the one hand he closely approaches the Nicene Homousion by bringing the Son into union with the essence of the Father, and ascribing to him the attribute of eternity. He is, properly, the author of the Nicene doctrine of eternal generation of the Son from the essence of the Father (though he usually represents the generation as an act of the will of the Father). But on the other hand he teaches subordinationism by calling the Son simply God (Θεός), and a second God (δευτερος Θεός), but not the God (ὁ Θεός, or ἀπρό-Θεός). In his views on the humanity of Christ, he approached the semi-Gnostic doketism, and ascribed to the glorified body of Christ ubiquity (in which he was followed by Gregory of Nyssa). His enemies charged him with teaching a double Christ (answering to the lower Jesus, and the higher Soter of the Gnostics), and a merely temporary validity of the body of the Redeemer. As to the relation of the two natures in Christ, he was the first to use the term "God-man" (Θεάνθρωπος), and to apply the favorite illustration of fire heating and penetrating the iron, without altering its character.

The Western Church was not so fruitful in speculation, but, upon the whole, sounder and more self-consistent. The keynote was struck by Irenæus (d. 202), who, though of Eastern origin, spent his active life in the south of France. He carries special weight as a pupil of Polycarp of Smyrna, and through him a grand-pupil of St. John, the inspired master (ὁ θεόλογος). He likewise uses the terms "Logos" and "Son of God" interchangeably, and concedes the distinction, made also by the Valentiniens, between the inward and the uttered word, in reference to man, but contests the application of it to God, who is above all antitheses, absolutely simple and unchangeable, and in whom before and after, thinking and speaking, coincide. He repudiates also speculative or à priori attempts to explain the derivation of the Son from the Father. This he holds to be an incomprehensible mystery. He is content to define the actual distinction between Father and Son by saying that the former is God revealing himself; the latter, God revealed. The one is the ground of revelation: the other is the actual, appearing revelation itself. Hence he calls the Father "the invisible of the Son;" and the Son, "the visible of the Father." He discriminates most rigidly the conceptions of generation and of creation. The Son, though begotten of the Father, is still, like him, distinguished from the created world as increate, — without beginning, and eternal; all plainly showing that Irenæus is much nearer the Nicene dogma of the essential identity of the Son with the Father than Justin Martyr and the Alexandrians. If, as he does in several passages, he still subordinates the Son to the Father, he is certainly inconsistent, and that for want of an accurate distinction between the eternal Logos and the incarnate Christ. Expressions like "My Father is greater than I," which apply only to the Christ of history, in the state of humiliation, he refers also, like Justin and Origen, to the eternal Logos. On the other hand he is charged with leaning in the opposite direction, — towards the Sabellian and Patripassian views, — but unjustly. Apart from his frequent want of precision in expression, he steers in general, with sure biblical and churchly tact, equally clear of both extremes, and asserts alike the essential unity and the eternal personal distinction of the Father and the Son. The incarnation of the Logos he ably discusses, viewing it both as a restoration and redemption from sin and death, and as the completion of the revelation of God and the creation of man. In the latter view, as finisher, Christ is the perfect Son of Man, in whom the likeness of man to God (the similitudo Dei), regarded as moral duty, in distinction from the image of God (imago Dei) as an essential property, becomes for the first time fully real. According to this, the incarnation would be grounded in the original plan of God for the education of mankind, and independent of the fall. It would have taken place even without the fall, though in some other form. Yet Irenæus does not expressly say this: speculation on abstract possibilities was foreign to his realistic cast of mind. He vindicates at length the true and full humanity of Christ against the doketism of the Gnostic schools. Christ must be man, like us, in body, soul, and spirit, though without sin, if he would redeem us from sin, and make us perfect. He is the second Adam, the absolute, universal man, the prototype and summing-up (ἀνακεφαλαιώσις, recapitulatio) of the whole race. Connected with this is the beautiful idea of Irenæus (repeated by Hippolytus), that Christ made the circuit of all the stages of human life to redeem them all (Adv. Hær. II. 22, § 4: omnes venit per semet ipsum salvare . . . infantes et parvulos et pueros et juvenes et seniores, etc.). To carry this out he extended the life of Jesus to fifty years, and supported it by a mistaken inference from the loose conjecture of the Jews (John viii. 57), and by an appeal to tradition. He also teaches a close union of the divinity and humanity in Christ, in which the former is the active principle, and the seat of personality, the latter the passive and receptive principle.

TERTULLIAN (about 220) cannot escape the charge of subordinationism. He bluntly calls the Father the whole divine substance, and the Son a part of it, illustrating their relation by the figures of the fountain and the stream, the sun and the beam. He would not have two suns, he says; but he might call Christ God, as Paul does in Rom. ix. 5. The sunbeam, too, in itself considered, may be called sun, but not the sun a beam. Sun and beam are two distinct things (species) in one essence (substantia), as God and the Word, as the Father and the Son. But we should not take figurative language too strictly, and must remember that Tertullian was especially interested to distinguish the Son from the Father, in opposition to the Patripassian Praxeas. In other respects he did the Church christology material service. He propounds a threefold hypostatical existence of the Son (filialio): (1) The pre-existent, eternal immanence of the Son in the Father, they being as inseparable as reason and word in man, who was created in the image of God, and hence in a measure reflects his being; (2) The coming-forth of the Son with the Father for the purpose of the creation; (3) The manifestation of the Son in the world by the incarnation. He advocates the entire yet sinless humanity of Christ, against both the doketistic Gnostics (Adv. Marcionem, and De carne Christi) and the Patripassians (Adv. Praxeam). He accuses the former of making Christ, who is all truth, a half lie, and, by the denial of his flesh, resolving all his work in the flesh into an empty show. He urges against the latter that God the Father is incapable of suffering and change.

CYPRIAN (d. 258) marks no progress in this or any other doctrine, except that of the Catholic unity and the episcopate. He was not so much a theologian as an ecclesiastic, and a typical High-Churchman.

DIONYSIUS, Bishop of Rome (262), came nearest the Nicene view. He maintained distinctly, in the controversy with Dionysius of Alexandria, the unity of essence, and the threefold personal distinction of Father, Son, and Spirit, in opposition to Sabellianism, tritheism, and subordinationism. His view is embodied in a fragment preserved by Athanasius (De sent. Dionysii, c. 4, and Routh Reliqu. s. III. 384).

III. The NICENE christology (from 325 to 451) is the result of struggle with ARIANISM and SEMI-ARIANISM, which agitated the Eastern Church for more than half a century. The Arian party denied the strict deity of Christ (his co-equality with the Father), and taught that he is subordinate divinity, different in essence from God (ἕτεροουσίος), pre-existing before the world, but not eternal (ἦν ποτε ὄντι ἦν), himself a creature of the will of God out of nothing (κτίσμα ἐξ ὕλης), who created this present world, and came incarnate for our salvation. Semi-Arianism held an untenable middle ground between Arian hetero-ousia and the orthodox homo-ousia, co-equality of the Son with the Father, and asserted the homoi-ousia, or similarity of essence, which was a very elastic term, and might be connected into an Arian, or stretched into an orthodox sense, according to the general spirit and tendency of the men who held it.

In opposition to these heresies, Athanasius of Alexandria ("the father of orthodoxy," at one time "unus versus mundum"), and the three Cappadocian bishops, — Basil, Gregory of Nazianzus, and Gregory of Nyssa, — maintained and defended with superior ability, vigor, and perseverance, the homo-ousia, i.e., the essential oneness of the Son with the Father, or his eternal divinity, as the corner-stone of the whole Christian system.

This doctrine triumphed in the first œcumenical council, convened by Constantine the Great; and, after a new and longer struggle, it was reasserted in the second œcumenical council. It is briefly and tersely laid down in the chief article of the Nicæno-Constantinopolitan Creed, which has stood ever since like an immovable rock:—

"(We believe) . . . in one Lord Jesus Christ, the only-begotten Son of God, begotten of the Father before all worlds [God of God], Light of Light, Very God of Very God, Begotten, not made, being of one substance with the Father; by whom all things were made; who for us men and for our salvation came down from heaven, and was incarnate by the Holy Ghost of the Virgin Mary," etc.

IV. The CHALCEDONIAN christology finds its normal expression in the Chalcedonian statement of 451. It was the answer of the Orthodox Church to the heresies which related to the proper constitution of Christ's theanthropic person.

These heresies are chiefly three; viz.,—

(1) APOLLINARIANISM, a partial denial of the humanity, as Arianism is of the eternal deity, of Christ. Apollinaris the Younger of Laodicea (d. 390), on the basis of the Platonic trichotomy, ascribed to Christ a human body (σῶμα) and animal soul (ψυχὴ ἄλογος), but not a human spirit or reason (ψυχὴ λογικὴ, νοῦς, πνεῦμα); he put the divine Logos in the place of the rational soul, and thus substituted a θεὸς σαρκόφορος for a real θεάνθρωπος.—a mixed middle being for a divine-human person. From this error it follows, either that the rational soul of man was not redeemed, or that it needed no redemption.

(2) NESTORIANISM (from Nestorius, Patriarch of Constantinople, d. in exile 440) admitted the full deity and the full humanity of Christ, but put them into loose mechanical conjunction, or affinity (συνίψευα) rather than a vital and personal union (ένωσις); and hence it objected to the unscriptural term "mother of God" (Θεοτόκος, Dei-para), as applied to the Virgin Mary, while willing to call her "mother of Christ" (Χριστοτόκος).

(3) EUTYCHIANISM (from Eutyches, presbyter at Constantinople, d. after 451) is the very opposite of Nestorianism, and sacrificed the distinction of the two natures in Christ to the unity of the person, to such an extent as to make the incarnation an absorption of the human nature by the divine, or a deification of human nature, even of the body: hence the Eutychians thought it proper to use the phrases "God is born," "God suffered," "God was crucified," "God died."

The third and fourth œcumenical councils

(Ephesus, 431, and Chalcedon, 451) settled the question of the precise relation of the two natures in Christ's person, as the first and second (325 and 381) had decided the doctrine of his divinity. The decree of the Council of Ephesus, under the lead of the violent Cyril of Alexandria, was merely negative, a condemnation of the error of Nestorius, and leaned a little towards the opposite error of Eutyches. This error triumphed temporarily in the justly so-called "Robber Synod" of Ephesus, in 449, under the lead of Dioscurus of Alexandria, who inherited all the bad, and none of the good, qualities of his predecessor, Cyril. But Dyophysitism re-acted; and Dioscurus and Eutyches were condemned a few years afterwards by the Council of Chalcedon. This council gave a clear and full statement of the orthodox christology as follows (see the Greek and Latin text in Act v. in MANSI'S Concil. tom. vii. p. 115, and in SCHAFF'S Creeks of Christendom, II. 62-64):—

"Following the holy Fathers, we all with one consent teach men to confess one and the same Son, our Lord Jesus Christ, the same perfect in Godhead and also perfect in manhood; truly God and truly man, of a reasonable [rational] soul and body; consubstantial [co-equal] with the Father according to the Godhead, and consubstantial with us according to the Manhood; in all things like unto us, without sin; begotten before all ages of the Father according to the Godhead, and in these latter days for us and for our salvation, born of the Virgin Mary, the Mother of God, according to the Manhood; one and the same Christ, Son, Lord, Only-begotten, to be acknowledged in two natures, inconfusedly, unchangeably, indivisibly, inseparably; the distinction of natures being by no means taken away by the union, but rather the property of each nature being preserved, and concurring in one Person and one Subsistence, not parted or divided into two persons, but one and the same Son, and only begotten, God the Word, the Lord Jesus Christ; as the prophets from the beginning [have declared] concerning him, and the Lord Jesus Christ himself has taught us, and the Creed of the holy Fathers has handed down to us."

The same doctrine is set forth in a more condensed form in the second part of the Symbolum Quicunque, or the falsely so-called Athanasian Creed (see the Latin text, with notes, in SCHAFF, Creeks, etc., II. 66-71):—

"Furthermore it is necessary to everlasting salvation: that he also believe rightly [faithfully] the Incarnation of our Lord Jesus Christ. For the right Faith is, that he believe and confess: that our Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of God, is God and Man; God, of the Substance [Essence] of the Father; begotten before the worlds: and Man, of the Substance [Essence] of his Mother, born in the world. Perfect God and perfect Man; of a reasonable soul and human flesh subsisting; equal to the Father, as touching his Godhead; and inferior to the Father as touching his Manhood. Who although he is God and Man; yet he is not two, but one Christ. One; not by conversion of the Godhead into flesh, but by assumption of the Manhood into God. One altogether; not by confusion of Substance [Essence], but by unity of Person. For as the reasonable soul and flesh is one Man; so God and Man is one Christ; who suffered for our salvation; descended into Hell [Hades, spirit world], rose again the third day from the dead," etc.

V. THE POST-CHALCEDONIAN christology.—The Chalcedonian decision did not stop the controversy, and called for a supplementary statement concerning the two wills of Christ, corresponding to the two natures.

Eutychianism revived in the form of Monophysitism (μόνη φύσις), or the doctrine that Christ had but one composite nature (μία φύσις σύνθετος, or μία φύσις διττή). It makes the humanity of Christ a mere accident of the immutable divine substance. The liturgical shibboleth of the Monophysites was "God has been crucified," which they introduced into the Trisagion (ἅγιος ὁ θεός ἕως ἡσυχίας, ἅγιος ἀθάνατος, ὁ σταυρωθεὶς δι' ἡμᾶς, ἐλεῶν ἡμᾶς): hence they are also called Theopaschites (θεοπασχίται). The tedious Monophysite controversies convulsed the Eastern Church for more than a hundred years, weakened its power, and facilitated the conquest of Mohammedanism.

The fifth œcumenical council (held at Constantinople 553) made a partial concession to the Monophysites, but did not reconcile them. They separated, like their antipodes, the Nestorians, from the orthodox Greek Church, and continue to this day under various names and organizations,—the Jacobites in Syria, the Copts in Egypt, the Abyssinians, and, the most important of them, the Armenians.

Closely connected with Monophysitism was MONOTHELETISM (μόνον and θέλημα), or the doctrine that Christ had but one will, as he had but one person. The orthodox maintained that will is an attribute of nature, rather than of person, and consequently that Christ had two wills,—a human will and a divine will,—both working in harmony. The Monothelite controversy lasted from 633 to 680. The Emperor Heraclius proposed a compromise formula,—one divine-human energy (μία θεανόρμηκη ἐνέργεια); but it was opposed in the West.

The sixth œcumenical council (held in Constantinople, 689; also called the Third Constantinopolitan Council, or the Conc. Trullanum I.) condemned the Monothelite heresy, and repeated the Chalcedonian Creed, with the following supplement concerning the two wills (Artic. xviii. in MANSI'S Conc., tom. XI. p. 637, and in SCHAFF'S Creeks, II. 72, 73):—

"And we likewise preach two natural wills in him [Jesus Christ], and two natural operations undivided, inconvertible, inseparable, unmix'd, according to the doctrine of the holy fathers; and the two natural wills [are] not contrary, far from it! (as the impious heretics assert), but his human will follows the divine will, and is not resisting or reluctant, but rather subject to his divine and omnipotent will. For it was proper that the will of the flesh should be moved, but be subjected to the divine will, according to the wise Athanasius."

The same council condemned Pope Honorius as a Monothelite heretic, and his successors confirmed it. This undeniable fact figured conspicuously in the Vatican Council (1870) as an unanswerable argument against papal infallibility, and was pressed by Bishop Hefele and other learned members of the council, although they afterwards submitted to an infallible modern pope and council versus infallible old popes and councils. Monothelism continued among the Maronites on Mount Lebanon (who, however, afterwards submitted to the Roman Church), as well as among the Monophysites, who are all Monothelites.

With the sixth oecumenical council closes the development of the ancient Catholic christology. The Adoption controversy, which arose in Spain and France toward the close of the eighth century, turned upon the question whether Christ as man was the Son of God by nature (naturaliter), or simply by adoption (nuncupative). The Adoptionists maintained the latter, and shifted the whole idea of sonship from the person to whom it belongs to the nature. Their theory was a modification of the Nestorian error, and was condemned in a synod at Frankfort-on-the-Maine, 794; but it did not result in a positive addition to the creed statements.

The scholastic theology of the middle ages made no real progress in christology, and confined itself to dialectical analysis and defence of the Chalcedonian dogma, with a one-sided reference to the divine nature of Christ. John of Damascus in the East, and Thomas Aquinas in the West, were the ablest exponents of the Chalcedonian dogma. The mediæval Church almost forgot, however, the glorious divinity of our Lord, his real humanity (except his passion), and substituted for it virtually the worship of the Virgin Mary, who seemed to appeal more tenderly and effectively to all the human sensibilities and sympathies of the heart than the exalted Saviour.

VI. ANALYSIS OF THE OECUMENICAL CHRISTOLOGY. — The following are the leading ideas of the Chalcedonian or oecumenical christology, taught in common by the doctrinal standards of the Greek, Latin, and Evangelical Protestant churches: —

1. A true incarnation of the Logos, i.e., the second person in the Godhead (ἐνανθρώπησις Θεοῦ, ἐνσάρκωσις τοῦ Λόγου, incarnatio Verbi). This is an actual assumption of the whole human nature — body, soul, and spirit — into an abiding union with the divine personality of the eternal Logos, so that they constitute, from the moment of the supernatural conception, one undivided life forever. The incarnation is neither a conversion or translation of God into man, nor a conversion of man into God, and consequent absorption of the one into the other, nor a confusion (κρίσις, σύγχυσις) of the two. On the other hand, it is not a mere indwelling (ἐκπνοή, inhabitatio) of the one in the other, nor an outward, transitory connection (συνάφεια, connectio) of the two factors.

The distinction between nature and person. Nature or substance (essence, οὐσία) denotes the totality of powers and qualities which constitute being; while person (ὑπόστασις, πρόσωπον) is the self-conscious, self-asserting, and acting subject. The Logos assumed, not a human person, else we should have two persons. — a divine and a human, but human nature, which is common to us all; and hence he redeemed, not a particular man, but all men. Yet no council has defined the human personality of Christ.

The God-man (θεάνθρωπος) as the result of incarnation. Christ is not a (Nestorian) being, with two persons, nor a compound (Apollinarian, or Monophysite) middle being, a tertium quid, partly divine, and partly human; but he is one person, both wholly divine, and wholly human.

4. The duality of the natures. The orthodox doctrine maintains, against Eutychianism, the distinction of natures, even after the act of incarnation, without confusion or conversion (ἀσυχύτως, inconfuse, and ἀρέπτως, immutabiliter), yet, on the other hand, without division or separation (ἀδιαίρετος, indivise, and ἀχωρίστος, inseparabiliter); so that the divine will ever remain divine, and the human ever human; and yet the two have continually one common life, and interpenetrate each other, like the persons of the Trinity (περιχώρησις). According to a familiar figure, the divine nature pervades the human as the fire pervades the iron. The two natures are complete, and embrace every thing which pertains to them separately, even will (according to the anti-Monothelite decision). Christ has all the properties which the Father has, except the property of being unbegotten (the ἀγεννησία); and he has all the properties which the first Adam had before the fall: he has, therefore (according to John of Damascus), two consciousnesses, and two physical wills, or faculties of self-determination (ἀντιθέουσία). This is the extreme border to which the doctrine of two natures can be carried, without an assertion of two full personalities; and it is almost impossible to draw the line.

5. The unity of the person (ἑνωσις καθ' ὑπόστασιν, ἑνωσις ὑποστατική, unio hypostatica, or unio personalis). The union of the divine and human nature in Christ is a permanent state, resulting from the incarnation, and is a real, supernatural, personal, and inseparable union, in distinction from an essential absorption or confusion, or from a mere moral union, or from a mystical union, such as holds between the believer and Christ. The two natures constitute but one personal life, and yet remain distinct. "The same who is true God," says Pope Leo I. in his famous Epistle, which anticipated the decision of Chalcedon, "is also true man; and in this unity there is no deceit, for in it the lowliness of man and the majesty of God perfectly pervade one another. . . . Because the two natures make only one person, we read, on the one hand, 'The Son of man came down from heaven' (John iii. 13), while yet the Son of God took flesh from the Virgin; and, on the other hand, 'The Son of God was crucified and buried,' while yet he suffered, not in his Godhead as co-eternal and consubstantial with the Father, but in the weakness of human nature."

6. The whole work of Christ is to be attributed to his person, and not to the one or the other nature exclusively. The person is the acting subject; the nature, the organ or medium. It is the one divine human person of Christ that wrought miracles by virtue of his divine nature, and that suffered through the sensorium of his human nature. The superhuman effect and infinite merit of the Redeemer's work must be ascribed to his person, because of his divinity; while it is his humanity alone that made him capable of, and liable to, temptation, suffering, and death, and renders him an example for our imitation.

7. The Anhypostasia, or, more accurately, the Enhypostasia (Impersonality) of the human nature of Christ. The meaning is, that Christ's human nature had no independent personality of its own, and that the divine nature is the root and basis of his personality. His humanity was enhypostatized through union with the Logos, or incorporated into his personality. The synod of Chalcedon says nothing of this feature: it was an after-thought developed by John of Damascus. It seems inconsistent with the dyotheletic theory; for a being with consciousness and will has the two essential elements of personality, while an impersonal will seems to be a mere animal instinct.

8. Critical Estimate. The Chalcedonian christology is regarded by the Greek and Roman, and the majority of the orthodox English and American divines, as the ne plus ultra of christological knowledge attainable in this world. Dr. Shedd (History of Christ. Doctrine, I. 408) thinks it probable that "the human mind is unable to go beyond it in the endeavor to unfold the mystery of Christ's complex person;" and he therefore serenely ignores all subsequent christological controversies and speculations. Dr. Hodge, in his Systematic Theology, vol. II. 397 sqq., notices and criticises several of the more recent "erroneous and heretical doctrines," as he calls them, but abides in the Chalcedonian statement as adopted by the scholastic Calvinists of the seventeenth century.

On the other hand, the Chalcedonian christology has been subjected to a rigorous criticism in Germany by evangelical as well as rationalistic divines,—by Schleiermacher, Baur, Dörner, Rothe, and the modern Kenoticists. It is charged with a defective psychology, and now with dualism, now with doketism, according as its distinction of two natures, or the personal unity, is made its most prominent feature. It oscillates between two extremes, without truly reconciling them; as the orthodox doctrine of the Trinity stands between tritheism and modalism, now leaning to the one, now to the other, when either the tripersonality or the unity is emphasized. It assumes two natures in one person; while the dogma of the Trinity assumes three persons in one nature. It teaches a complete human nature with reason and will, and yet denies it personality. It does not do justice to the genuine humanity of Christ in the Gospels, and to all those passages which assert its real growth. It overshadows the human by the divine. It puts the final result at the beginning, and ignores the intervening process. If we read the gospel history, we find that Christ was a helpless infant on his mother's breast,—and therefore not omnipotent till after the resurrection, when "all authority in heaven and on earth" was given unto him (Matt. xxviii. 18); he grew in wisdom, and learned obedience (Luke ii. 40; Heb. v. 8), and was ignorant of the day of judgment (Mark xiii. 32), therefore not omniscient; he moved from place to place, and was therefore not omnipresent before his ascension to heaven; he was destitute of his divine glory, which he was to regain after his death (John xvii. 5). To confine these limitations and imperfections to his human nature, while in his divine nature he was, at one and the same time, omnipotent, omniscient, and omnipresent, even in the manger and on the cross, is to destroy the personal unity of life, and to make two Christs, or a double-headed Christ. How can ignorance and omniscience simultaneously co-exist in one and the same mind? How can one and the same individual pervade and rule the universe in the same moment in which he exclaims, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" Christ speaks and acts throughout as one undivided Ego. We must, therefore, so reconstruct or improve the Chalcedonian christology as to conform it to the historical realness of his humanity, to the full meaning of his own sayings concerning himself, and to all the facts of his life. This is now generally felt among the evangelical divines in Germany, where christological speculation has been most active since the Reformation, and by not a few in other countries. If any thing has resulted from the multitude of Lives of Christ, written by learned and able men in this nineteenth century, it is the fact of the perfect and unique divine-human personality of Jesus of Nazareth.

At the same time, the Chalcedonian dogma is the ripest fruit of the christological speculations and controversies of the Ancient Church, and can never be lost. It gave the clearest expression to the faith in the incarnation for ages to come. It saves the full idea of the God-man as to the essential elements, however imperfect the form in which it is cast. It defines with sound religious judgment the boundary-line which separates christological truth from christological error. It guards us against two opposite dangers,—the Scylla of Nestorian dualism, and the Charybdis of Eutychian Monophysitism, or against an abstract separation of the divine and human, and an absorption of the human by the divine. It excludes also every kind of mixture of the two natures which would result in a being which is neither divine nor human. With these safeguards, theological speculation may boldly and hopefully move on, and penetrate deeper and deeper into the central truth of Christianity. Protestantism cannot consistently adopt any doctrinal or disciplinary decisions of popes or councils as an infallible finale, but must reserve the right of further research and progress in the apprehension and appropriation of Christ and his infallible teaching according to the Scriptures as the only rule of faith.

VII. THE ORTHODOX PROTESTANT CHRISTOLOGY. The churches of the Reformation (Lutheran, Anglican, and Calvinistic) adopted in their confessions of faith, either in form or in substance, the three œcumenical creeds, and with them the ancient Catholic doctrines of the Trinity, and of Christ's divine-human character and work. They condemned the old and new Antitrinitarians, and the peculiar doctrine of the Socinians,—that Christ was raised by his own merit to a participation in the divine honor and dignity. The Unitarians, like the Anabaptists, were everywhere (except in Poland and Transylvania) imprisoned, exiled, or executed; and the unfortunate Servetus was burnt as a heretic and blasphemer, under the eyes of Calvin, and with the full approval of the mild Bullinger and Melancthon. We quote from the principal Protestant Confessions. The Augsburg Confession of the Lutheran Church (1530), Art. III. (De Filio Dei):—

"Also they teach that the Word, that is, the Son of God, took unto him man's nature in the womb of the blessed Virgin Mary, so that there are two natures, the divine and the human, inseparably joined together in unity of person; one Christ, true God and true man: who was born of the Virgin Mary, truly suffered, was crucified, dead, and buried, that he might reconcile the Father unto us, and might be a sacrifice, not only for original guilt, but also for all actual sins of men."

The Second Helvetic Confession, by Bullinger (1566), chap. 11:—

"We acknowledge, therefore, that there are in one and the same Jesus Christ our Lord, two natures, the divine and the human nature; and we say that these two are so conjoined or united, that they are not swallowed up, confounded or mingled together, but rather united or joined together in one person, the properties of each nature being safe and remaining still: so that we do worship one Christ our Lord, and not two; I say, one, true, God and man; as touching his divine nature, of the same substance with the Father, and as touching his human nature, of the same substance with us, and 'like unto us in all things, sin only excepted.'"

The Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England, Art. II.:—

"The Son, which is the Word of the Father, begotten from everlasting of the Father, the very and eternal God, and of one substance with the Father, took man's nature in the womb of the blessed Virgin, of her substance; so that two whole and perfect natures, that is to say, the Godhead and Manhood, were joined together in one Person, never to be divided, whereof is one Christ, very God and very man; who truly suffered, was crucified, dead, and buried, to reconcile his Father to us, and to be a sacrifice not only for original guilt, but also for [all] actual sins of men."

The Westminster Confession, which gives the clearest and strongest expression to the faith of the strictly Reformed or Calvinistic churches, thus states the doctrine of Christ's person in chap. viii. § 2:—

"The Son of God, the second person in the Trinity, being very and eternal God, of one substance and equal with the Father, did when the fullness of time was come, take upon him man's nature, with all the essential properties and common infirmities thereof, yet without sin, being conceived by the Holy Ghost in the womb of the Virgin Mary, of her substance: so that two whole, perfect, and distinct natures, the Godhead and the Manhood, were inseparably joined together in one person, without conversion, composition, or confusion. Which person is very God, and very man, yet one Christ, the only Mediator between God and men."

The Westminster Shorter Catechism, which is famous for clear and terse definitions, says (Qu. 21):—

"The only Redeemer of God's elect is the Lord Jesus Christ, who being the eternal Son of God, became man, and so was, and continueth to be, God and man, in two distinct natures, and one person, forever."

VIII. THE SCHOLASTIC LUTHERAN CHRISTOLOGY. On this general basis of the Chalcedonian christology, and following the indications of the scriptures as the only rule of faith, the Protestant, especially the Lutheran, scholastics, at the close of the sixteenth, and during the seventeenth, century, built some additional features, and developed new aspects of Christ's person. The propelling cause was the Lutheran doctrine of the real presence or omnipresence of Christ's body in the Lord's Supper, and the controversies growing out of it with the Zwinglians and Calvinists, and among the Lutherans themselves.

There is, however, a characteristic difference between the christology of the Lutheran and that of the Reformed churches, which affects the whole system. The former has a leaning towards the Eutychian confusion of the divine and human natures; the latter, to the Nestorian separation: yet both distinctly disown the Eutychian and Nestorian heresies. The Lutheran christology started from the principle that the finite is capable of receiving the infinite (finitum capax infiniti), and went to the very border of docketism, which destroys the realness of Christ's humanity. The Reformed christology held fast to the inseparable gulf which separates the finite from the infinite as to their essence or nature (finitum non capax infiniti), and kept open the possibility of a full appreciation of the humanity of Christ in its actual growth and development.

The progress made in christology since the Reformation, on the basis of the Chalcedonian orthodoxy, relates to the communion of the two natures, and to the states, and the offices of Christ. The first was the production of the Lutheran Church, and was never adopted, but partly rejected, by the Reformed: the second and third were the joint doctrines of both, but with a very material difference in the understanding of the second.

(1) The communicatio idiomatum, the communication of attributes or properties (ιδιώματα, proprietates) of one nature to the other, or to the whole person. It is derived from the unio personalis and the communio naturarum. The Lutheran divines distinguish three kinds or genera.

(a) The genus idiomaticum (or ιδιοποιητικόν), whereby the properties of one nature are transferred and applied to the whole person, for which are quoted such passages as Rom. i. 3; 1 Pet. iii. 18, iv. 1.

(b) The genus apotelesmaticum (κοινοποιητικόν), whereby the redemptory functions and actions which belong to the whole person (the ἀποτελέσματα) are predicated only of one or the other nature (1 Tim. ii. 5 sq.; Heb. i. 2 sq.).

(c) The genus auchematicum (ἀύχηματικόν), or majestaticum, whereby the human nature is clothed with and magnified by the attributes of the divine nature (John iii. 13, v. 27; Matt. xxviii. 18, 20; Rom. ix. 5; Phil. ii. 10). Under this head the Lutheran Church claims a certain ubiquity or omnipresence for the body of Christ, on the ground of the personal union of the two natures; but as to the extent of this omnipresence there were two distinct schools, which are both represented in the Formula of Concord (1577). Brennius and the Swabian Lutherans maintained an absolute ubiquity of Christ's humanity from his very infancy, thus making the incarnation not only an assumption of the human nature, but also a deification of it, although the divine attributes were admitted to have been concealed during the state of humiliation. Chemnitz and the Saxon divines called this view a monstrosity, and taught only a relative ubiquity, depending on Christ's will (hence called volipresentia, or multivolipresentia), who may be present with his whole person wherever he pleases to be, or has promised to be.

(1) A fourth kind would be the genus kenoticum (from κένωσις), or tapeinoticum (from ταπεινώσις), Phil. ii. 7, 8; i.e., a communication of the properties of the human nature to the divine nature. But this is decidedly rejected by the old Lutherans as inconsistent with the unchangeableness of the divine nature, and as a "horrible and blasphemous" doctrine (Form. Conc. p. 612), but is asserted by the modern Kenoticists (see below).

The Reformed divines never committed themselves to the communicatio idiomatum as a whole (although they might approve of the first two kinds, at least, by way of what Zwingli termed ἀλλοίωσις, or a rhetorical exchange of one part for another); and they decidedly rejected the third kind, because omnipresence, whether absolute or relative, is inconsistent with the necessary limitation of a human body, as well as with the Scripture facts of Christ's ascension to heaven, and promised return. The third genus can never be fully carried out, unless the humanity of Christ is also eternalized. The attributes, moreover, are not an outside appendix, but inherent qualities of the substance to which they belong, and inseparable from it. Hence a communication of attributes would imply a communication or mixture of natures. The divine and human natures can indeed hold free and intimate intercourse with each other; but the divine nature can never be transformed into the human, nor the human nature into the divine. Christ possessed all the attributes of both natures; but the natures, nevertheless, remain separate and distinct. The familiar illustrations of the iron and the fire, of the body and the soul, favor the Reformed rather than the Lutheran theory; for the fire, while it pervades the iron, does not communicate its properties to the iron, nor the iron its properties to the fire. The soul resides in and interpenetrates the body; but its spiritual qualities, as cognition and volition, are not communicated to the body; nor are the physical qualities of the body, as weight and extension, communicated to the soul. The Scripture passages quoted by the Lutherans are inconclusive.¹

(2) The doctrine of the twofold state of Christ, — the state of humiliation and the state of exaltation. This is based upon Phil. ii. 5-9, and is no doubt substantially true. The status exinanitionis (humiliationis) embraces the supernatural conception, birth, circumcision, education, earthly life, passion, death, and burial of Christ: the status exaltationis includes the resurrection, ascension, and the sitting at the right hand of God.

But here, again, the two confessions differ very considerably. First as to the descent into hell, or Hades rather. The Lutherans regarded it as a triumph over hell, and made it the first stage of exaltation; while the Reformed divines viewed it as the last stage of the state of humiliation. It is properly the turning-point from the one state to the other, and thus belongs to both.

Secondly, the Lutheran Creed refers the two states only to the human nature of Christ, regarding the divine as not susceptible of any humiliation or exaltation. The Reformed divines refer them to both natures; so that Christ's human nature was in a state of humiliation as compared with its future exaltation, and his divine nature was in the state of humiliation as to its external manifestation (ratione occultationis). With them the incarnation itself is the beginning of the state of humiliation; while the Lutheran symbols exclude the incarnation from the humiliation.

Finally, the Lutherans regard the humiliation only as a partial concealment of the actual use (κρύψις χρήσεως) of the divine attributes by the incarnate Logos.

The proper exegesis of the classical passage in the second chapter of Philippians decides here in favor of the Reformed, and against the Lutheran theory. The κένωσις, or self-humiliation, cannot refer to the incarnate Logos, who never was ἐν μορῇ θεῶν, but must refer to the pre-existent Logos (the Λόγος ἄσαρκος). This is admitted by the Greek fathers, and by the best modern commentators, Lutheran as well as Reformed. (See quotations in SCHAFF'S Creeeds, etc., I. 328 sq.)²

(3) The threefold office of Christ. (a) The prophetic office (munus, or officium propheticum) includes teaching and the miracles of Christ. (b) The priestly office (munus sacerdotale) consists of the satisfaction made for the sins of the world by the death on the cross, and in the continued intercession of the exalted Saviour for his people (redemptio et intercessio sacerdotalis). (c) The kingly office (munus regium), whereby Christ founded his kingdom, defends his Church against all enemies, and rules all things in heaven and on earth. The old divines distinguish between the reign of nature (regnum naturæ sive potentie), which embraces all things; the reign of grace (regnum gratiæ), which relates to the Church militant on earth; and the reign of glory (regnum gloriæ), which belongs to the Church triumphant in heaven.

This convenient threefold division of the office of Christ was already approved by Calvin, and used by the divines of both Confessions during the seventeenth century. Ernesti opposed it, but Schleiermacher restored it.

On the difference between the Lutheran and Reformed christology, see especially MATTHIAS

² Dr. Lightfoot, also, in his Com. on the Philippians, p. 139, gives the Reformed interpretation: "The point of time is clearly prior, not only to our Lord's open ministry, but also to his becoming man. Even if the words μορῆν δούλου λαβών did not directly refer to the incarnation, as they appear to do, nothing else can be understood by ἐν ὁμοιώματι ἀνθρώπου γενόμενος."

Güter, Stuttgart, 1855, 2 parts. Very accurate and discriminating. (Schneckenburger was a Swabian Lutheran, but professor at the Reformed University of Berne, and hence well qualified to appreciate the strength and the weakness of both Confessions. He made the first preparations for HERZOG's Encykl. before his death, 1848.) — On the Lutheran side, see FRANK: Theologie der Concordienformel, Erl., 1865, vol. III. pp. 165-396; CHARLES P. IX. THE KENOSIS CONTROVERSY between Giessen and Tübingen. This is the last chapter in the development of the orthodox Lutheran christology on the basis of the Formula of Concord. The Reformed churches had no share in it; since they rejected the deification of Christ's humanity, which it presupposes. In the early part of the seventeenth century, there arose a subtle controversy between the Lutheran divines of the University of Giessen and those of Tübingen about the Kenosis and Krypsis; that is, about the question whether Christ, in the state of humiliation, entirely abstained from the use of his divine attributes (κένωσις, abstinentia ab usu, Phil. ii. 7), or whether he used them secretly (κρύψις, occultatio). The divines of Giessen (Bathasar Mentzer, his son-in-law Feuerborn, and Winkelmann) defended the Kenotic; those of Tübingen (Thumm, Hafenreffer, Osiander, Nicolai), the Kryptic view. Both schools were agreed as to the possession (κτῆσις) of the divine attributes by Christ, including omnipotence, omniscience, and omnipresence, during all the stages of his humiliation, and differed only as to the use (χρήσις) of them, — whether it was a κρύψις χρήσεως (a concealed use), or a κένωσις χρήσεως (a non-use). The Kryptic view of Tübingen is logically (i. e., from Lutheran premises) more consistent, but carries the theory of the communicatio idiomatum to the very verge of Gnostic doketicism, which resolves the human life of Christ on earth into a magical illusion. The Kenotic view of Giessen is more in accordance with the facts of Christ's life, but agrees with the other in principle, and admits, after all, an exceptional use in the performance of miracles. The controversy was waged with violence, and threatened to weaken the Protestant cause at a very critical period. The Lutheran princes interfered. In their name, Hoe von Hoenegg, court-preacher at Dresden, issued a Solida Decisio (1624), essentially favoring the cause of the Giessen Kenoticists; but the Tübingen divines defended their position till the controversy was lost in the disastrous events of the Thirty-years' War, without leading to any positive result. The Kenotic controversy was renewed recently, but in a modified form, and on a new basis (see below).

X. MODERN CHRISTOLOGIES. The orthodox christology emphasized the divinity of Christ, and left his humanity more or less out of sight (although it was always recognized in theory), and, in the last stage of its Lutheran development, arrived at the brink of Gnostic doketism. Rationalism arose, towards the close of the eighteenth century, as a re-action against symbolical and scholastic orthodoxy, and ran into the opposite extreme: it ignored the divine nature, and fell back upon a purely human or Ebionitic Christ. Its force, as well as its weakness, consists in the examination of the human element in Christ and in the Bible.

With the revival of evangelical faith in Germany, the divine element in Christ was again duly appreciated by theologians. Hegel and Schleiermacher mark a new epoch in christological speculation, with two tendencies, — the one pantheistic, the other humanistic; and these, again, were followed by original reconstructions and modifications of the Catholic doctrine of the God-man. The pantheistic tendency of Hegel is more congenial to the maxim of the Lutheran Confession, that the finite is capable of the infinite: the humanistic of Schleiermacher, to the tendency of the Reformed Confession, which guards the genuine humanity of Christ against confusion with the divine. The former starts from the divine, the latter, from the human element; but both may unite, and do often unite when they proceed from naturalistic premises.

Both Hegel and Schleiermacher gave impulse to orthodox as well as negative and destructive tendencies. To most of his pupils Schleiermacher was a sort of John the Baptist, who led them to Christ.

1. The HUMANITARIAN or UNITARIAN CHRISTOLOGY makes Christ a mere man, though the wisest and best of men, and a model for imitation. It is held in various forms, from the communicated semi-divinity of the old Socinians down to the pure humanity of modern Unitarians and Humanitarians.¹ Kant may be said to have inaugurated the modern Humanitarian view. He regarded Christ as the representative of the moral ideal, but made a distinction between the ideal Christ and the historical Jesus. The more conservative Unitarians admit the sinless perfection of Christ. Dr. Channing (see that art.) was, at least in his earlier period, a firm believer in the pre-existence of Christ: hence he is sometimes called an Arian. He certainly rose above the mere Humanitarianism of Priestley. He saw in Christ the perfect manifestation of God to man, and the highest ideal of humanity, and paid one of the noblest and most eloquent tributes to Christ's character and inspiring example.

2. The PANTHEISTIC CHRISTOLOGY, suggested by Schelling and Hegel, and best represented by Daub, Marheineke, and Göschel (of the right or conservative wing of Hegelianism), and by Baur, Strauss, and Biedermann (of the left or radical wing), starts from the idea of the essential unity of the divine and human, and teaches a continuous incarnation of God in the human race as a whole, but denies, for this very reason, the specific dignity of Christ as the one and only God-man. This, at least, is the theory of the "left" or radical and negative wing of the Hegelian School, although Hegel himself had no sympathy with rationalism, but despised it. "The infinite," says Strauss, "cannot pour out its fulness into a single individual." The peculiar position of Christ, however, is that he first awoke to a consciousness of this unity, and that he represents it in its purest and strongest form. Under this view Biedermann (Christliche Dogmatik) places Christ highest in the scale of humanity, not only in the past, but for all time to come. Even Strauss was at one time willing to go so far; but he destroyed nearly the whole historic foundation of his life, and ended in the philosophical bankruptcy of materialism.

3. SCHLEIERMACHER'S CHRISTOLOGY represents the highest form of Humanitarianism with an important admission of the supernatural or divine element. He regards Christ as a perfect man, in whom, and in whom alone, the ideal of humanity (the Urbild) has been fully realized: at the same time he rises above Humanitarianism by emphatically asserting Christ's essential sinlessness and absolute perfection ("wesentliche Unsündlichkeit," and "schlechthinige Vollkommenheit"), and a peculiar and abiding indwelling of the Godhead in him ("ein eigentliches Sein Gottes in ihm"), by which he differs from all men. He admits him to be "a moral miracle," which means a great deal for a divine of the boldest and keenest criticism in matters of history. He was willing to surrender almost every miracle of action in order to save the miracle of the person of Him whom he adored and loved, from his Moravian childhood to his deathbed, as his Lord and Saviour. He adopts the Sabellian view of the Trinity as a threefold manifestation of God in creation (in the world), redemption (in Christ), and sanctification (in the Church). Christ is God as Redeemer, and originated an incessant flow of a new spiritual life, with all its pure and holy emotions and aspirations, which must be traced to that source. Sabellian as he was, Schleiermacher did not hold an eternal personal pre-existence of the Logos which would correspond to the historical indwelling of God in Christ. His conception of the abstract unity and simplicity of the Godhead excluded an immanent Trinity. See his christology in his Der christl. Glaube, §§ 92-99 (vol. II. 26-93), and the sharp criticism of Strauss, l.c. II. 175 sqq.

ULLMANN (d. 1865), originally a pupil of Schleiermacher, but more orthodox, wrote the very best book on the important topic of the sinlessness of Christ, which has an abiding doctrinal and apologetic value, independently of all speculative theories (Die Sündlosigkeit Jesu, 7th ed., 1853).

Somewhat similar is the christology of RICARD ROTHE (d. 1866), the greatest speculative divine of the century next to Schleiermacher (d. 1834). He was influenced by Hegel and Schleiermacher, but wrought out an original system of ethics of the highest order. He abandons the orthodox dogma of the Trinity and the Chalcedonian dyophysitism (which he thinks goes far beyond the simplicity of biblical teaching, and makes the union physical rather than moral), but fully admits the divine-human character of the one personality of Christ, and lays great stress on the ethical feature in the development of Christ, by which alone he can become our Redeemer and Example. God, by a creative act, calls the second Adam into existence in the bosom of the old natural humanity. Christ is born of a woman, yet not begotten by man, but created by God (as to his humanity), hence free from all sinful bias, as well as actual sin. His development is a real, but normal and harmonious, religious moral growth, and a correspondingly increasing indwelling of God in him. There was not a single moment in his conscious life in which he stood not in personal union with God; but the absolute union took place with the completion of the personal development of the second Adam.¹ This completion coincided with his perfect self-sacrifice in death. Henceforth he was wholly and absolutely God (ganz und schlecht-hin Gott), since his being is extensively and intensively filled with the true God; but we cannot say, vice versa, that God is wholly the second Adam; for God is not limited by an individual person. The death of Christ on earth was at the same time his ascension to heaven and his elevation above all the limitations of material existence into the divine mode of existence (a return to the μορφή θεοῦ) which, however, implies also his perpetual presence with his Church on earth (Matt. xxviii. 20).

Here is the place also for the theory of HORACE BUSHNELL (d. at Hartford, Conn., 1876), which strongly resembles those of Schleiermacher and Rothe, but differs from them by adhering to the eternal pre-existence of Christ (though only in a Sabellian sense). It was first delivered in his Concio ad Clerum, at the annual commencement of Yale College, New Haven (Aug. 15, 1848), and was published, together with two other discourses (delivered at Cambridge and Andover), and a preliminary dissertation on the Nature of Language as related to Thought and Spirit, under the title, God in Christ (new ed., New York, 1877). It gave rise to his trial for heresy. Bushnell, one of the most independent and vigorous American thinkers, was not a German scholar; but he read Schleiermacher's essay on Sabellianism translated by Professor Moses Stuart in the Biblical Repository, and says that "the general view of the Trinity given in that article coincides" with his own view, and confirmed him in the results of his own private struggles (l.c. p. 111 q.). He maintains the full divinity of Christ on the Sabellian basis. He rejects the theory of three metaphysical or essential persons in the being of God," with three distinct consciousnesses, wills, and understandings; and he substitutes for it simply a trinity of revelation, or what he calls (p. 175) an "instrumental trinity," or three impersonations, in which the one divine being presents himself to our human capacities and wants, and which are necessary to produce actuality, or terms of conversableness, between God and him, and to pour his love most effectually to our feeling (p. 137). "God may act," he says (p. 152), "a human personality, without being measured by it." The real divinity came to the finite, and was subject to human conditions. There are not two distinct subsistences in the person of Christ, — one infinite, and the other finite; but it is the one infinite God who expresses himself in Christ, and brings himself down to the level of our humanity, without any loss of his greatness, or reduction of his majesty. At the same time, Bushnell holds to the full yet sinless humanity of Christ; and the tenth chapter of his work on Nature and the Supernatural is one of the ablest and most eloquent tributes to the sinless perfection of the moral character of Christ.

4. The modern KENOTIC theory differs from the theories just noticed, by its orthodox premises and conclusions as far as the dogma of the Trinity and of the eternal Deity of Christ is concerned; but it likewise departs from the Chalcedonian dyophysitism, by holding to one divine human Christ, with one consciousness and one will. It is chiefly based on the famous passage Phil. ii. 6-8 (ἑαυτὸν ἐκένωσεν, he emptied himself, etc., the subject of the Kenosis being the pre-existent, not the incarnate, Logos), and also on 2 Cor. viii. 9; John i. 14 (ἐγένετο, became); Heb. ii. 17, 18, v. 8, 9; and on the general impression which the gospel history makes of Christ as a truly human, yet divinely human being, speaking of himself always as a unit. It was suggested by Zinzendorf in the form of devout sentimentalism, that brought the divine Christ down to the closest intimacy with men; it was scientifically developed, though with various modifications, by a number of eminent German divines of the Lutheran Confession (Thomasius, Liebner, Gess, Von Hofmann, Kahnis, Delitzsch, Schöberlein, Kübel), and several Reformed divines (Lange, Ebrard, Godet, Pressensé, in Europe, Henry M. Goodwin and Howard Crosby in America). It is hardly just to call it (with Dr. Dorner) a revival of Apollinarianism and Patripassianism, or Theopaschitism; for, while it resembles both in some features, it differs from them by assuming a truly humanized Logos dwelling in a human body. It carries the Kenosis much farther than the Giessen Lutherans, and makes it consist, not in a concealment merely (κρύψις), but in an actual abandonment, of the divine attributes of omnipotence, omniscience, and omnipresence, during the whole period of humiliation from the incarnation to the resurrection; the differences between the advocates of this theory referring to the degree of the Kenosis. It substitutes a genus kenoticum, or tapeinoticum, for the genus majesticum of the Lutheran Creed: in other words, a communication of the properties of humanity to the divinity for a communication of the properties of the divine nature to the human. It proceeds from the maxim, infinitum capax est finiti, which the old Lutheran theology rejected; while it held to the opposite maxim, finitum capax infiniti, which the Calvinists rejected. Instead of raising the finite to the infinite, the Kenotic theory lowers the infinite to the finite. It teaches a temporary self-exinanition or depotentiation of the pre-existent Logos. In becoming incarnate, the second Person of the holy Trinity reduced himself to the limitations of humanity. He literally emptied himself (ἑαυτὸν ἐκένωσεν, Phil. ii. 7), not only of his divine glory, but also of his divine mode of existence (the μορφή θεοῦ), and assumed the human mode of existence (the μορφή δούλου), subject to the limits of space and time, and the laws of development and growth. He ceased to be omnipotent and omnipresent: he became ignorant and helpless as a child. But he retained what Thomasius calls the essential attributes of truth, holiness, and love, and revealed them fully during his humiliation. The incarnation is not only an assumption by the Son of God of human nature, but also a self-limitation of the divine Logos; and both constitute one divine-human personality. Otherwise the infinite consciousness of the Logos could not coincide with the human consciousness of the historical Christ: it would transcend and outreach it, and the result would be a double personality. The self-limitation is to be conceived as an act of will, an act of God's love, which is the motive of the incarnation; and his love is absolutely powerful, even to the extent of the utmost self-surrender.

This is the view of THOMASIUS, a Bavarian Lutheran. He and LIEBNER held, first, that the Logos actually became a rational human soul; but afterwards they assumed a truly human soul alongside with the Kenosis of the Logos, and thereby they lost the chief benefit of the Kenosis theory.

GESS, a Swabian divine brought up under the influence of the school of Bengel, Cöttinger, and Beck, and starting from a theosophic biblical realism, carries the Kenosis to the extent of a suspension of self-consciousness and will.¹ He identifies it with the outgoing of the Son from the Father, or his descent from heaven, which resulted in a temporary suspension of the influx of the eternal life of the Father into the Son, and a transition from a state of equality with God into a state of dependence and need. Gess and Ebrard assume an actual transformation of the Logos into a human soul, i. e., he assumed a human body from the flesh of the Virgin, but became a rational human soul, so that he had no need of assuming another soul. Consequently the soul of Christ was not derived from Mary: it was the result of a voluntary Kenosis, while an ordinary human soul derives its existence from a creative act of God. This view, therefore, is inconsistent with traducianism, and presupposes the theory of creationism.² It is very questionable whether such a soul, which is the result of a transformation which begins with divinity, and ends with divinity, can be called a truly human soul any more than the Apollinarian Logos, who, remaining unchanged, occupied the place, and exercised the functions, of the human soul. The bond of sympathy with Christ, on the ground of the identity of his mental constitution and condition, seems to be broken by this form of the Kenotic theory.

MARTENSEN, a very able Danish theologian,

more cautiously teaches only a relative, though real, Kenosis. He distinguishes between the Logos-revelation and the Christ-revelation, and confines the Kenosis to the latter. In the Logos-revelation the Son proceeds from the Father as God: in the Christ-revelation he returns to God as God-man, with a host of redeemed children of God. The eternal Logos continues in God and his general revelation to the world as the Author of all reason; while at the same time he enters into the bosom of humanity as a holy seed, that he may arise within the human race as a Mediator and Redeemer. He would, however, have become man even without sin, though not as Redeemer.³ The Son of God leads a double life. As the pure divine Logos (der reine Gottheitslogos), he works in all-pervading activity throughout the kingdom of nature; as Christ, he works through the kingdom of grace, redemption, and completion, and he indicates his consciousness of personal identity in the two spheres by referring to his pre-existence, which, to his human consciousness, takes the form of a recollection. But Martensen does not explain how this Doppelleben of the Logos can be reconciled with the unity of his personality any more than the two natures of the orthodox creeds.

KAINIS and LANGE limit the Kenosis substantially to an abandonment of the use, rather than the possession, of the attributes. Lange's christology abounds in fruitful and original hints for further and clearer development.

JULIUS MÜLLER (d. 1879), one of the profoundest divines, whose humility and modesty induced him to forbid the publication of any of his valuable manuscripts, taught, likewise, a moderate Kenosis theory, which I am able to give from my notes of his Lectures on Dogmatics (1839 to 1840): "Paul contrasts the earthly and pre-earthly existence of the Son of God as poverty and riches (2 Cor. vii. 9), and represents the incarnation as an emptying himself of the full possession of the divine mode of existence (Phil. ii. 6). This implies more than a mere assumption of human nature into union with the Son of God: the incarnation is a real self-exinanition (Selbstentäusserung), and a renunciation, not only of the use, but also of the possession, of the divine attributes and powers. . . . The Church is undoubtedly right in teaching a real union of the divine and human nature in Christ. But in the state of humiliation this union was first only potential and concealed; and the unfolded reality belongs to the state of exaltation. Only with the assumption of a self-exinanition can we fully appreciate the act of the self-denying condescension of divine love; while in the orthodox dogma God gives nothing in the incarnation, but simply receives and unites something with his person." Want of space forbids further extracts.

GOODWIN differs from the German Kenoticists by assuming that the Logos is the human element in God which pre-existed in him from eternity, and became incarnate by taking flesh, and occupying the place of the soul.¹ No incarnation, he thinks, is possible without a humanization of the divine; and this implies a self-limitation, and true development from ignorance to knowledge and wisdom. The incarnation is not a synthesis or union of opposite natures, but a development of the divine in the form of the human. The Word did not assume flesh or human nature, but it became flesh. As the true idea of God includes humanity, so the true idea of man includes God. The divine and human differ only as the ideal differs from the actual, or the prototype from the copy. This essential unity is the basis of the possibility of the incarnation as a Kenosis.

Dr. Crosby holds, that, according to the Scripture, the Son of God reduced himself to the dimensions of humanity, to a state of "dormancy," but declines to enter into speculations about the possibility of such self-reduction, which he regards as transcending human thought. The supreme Godhead of Christ is clearly taught in words, he says, but Christ nowhere showed it in action from Bethlehem to Calvary; for his miracles, like those of Moses, Elijah, and the apostles, were wrought by the power of God, by a delegated authority, and proved merely that he was sent from God, not that he was God. His Godhead, therefore, was in a state of quiescence during his humiliation, and awoke with the resurrection, after which the divine overshadowed the human.

Criticism. A theory advocated by so many learned and pious divines cannot be altogether false. We cannot think too highly of the amazing condescension of God, and the self-denial of his love for the good of his creatures. The Kenotic theory has the merit to have brought out the truth of the classical passage in Phil. ii. more forcibly than ever before. But it carries the idea of the humiliation and self-limitation of the Logos to the extent of a metaphysical impossibility: it contradicts the essential unchangeableness of God. The humiliation of the Logos is an abandonment of the divine doxa and its enjoyment, but not of the divine being. He laid aside his divine majesty, and assumed the condition and function of a servant; as a king in noble self-denial may condescend to the lowest of his subjects, and put himself on an equality of condition with him, without losing any of his qualities. The true Kenosis is a renunciation of the use (χρησις), but not of the possession (κτῆσις), of divine attributes. The former is possible, the latter impossible. God can do nothing that is contrary to his rational and moral nature. It is admitted by the Kenoticists that the Logos cannot, in the incarnation, limit or suspend his moral attributes of love and holiness, but reveals them most fully in the state of humiliation. But his metaphysical and intellectual attributes belong just as much to the essence and nature of God as his moral attributes, and all are inseparable from his nature; so that God cannot give up any of his attributes without mutilating and so far destroying his own being. He cannot commit suicide, nor can he go to sleep. He cannot reduce himself to the unconscious existence of an embryo, without ceasing to be God, and without destroying the life of the world, which without him cannot exist a single moment. The illustration borrowed from sleep proves nothing; for man's identity continues undisturbed in sleep, and he awakes with the full exercise of all the faculties. Moreover, we cannot conceive of such a self-reduction of the Logos without suspending the inter-trinitarian process, and also the Trinity of revelation. It would stop for thirty-three years, as Gess frankly admits, the eternal generation of the Son, the procession of the Spirit from the Father and the Son, and the government of the world through the Logos. To say that the Logos remained unchanged in the Trinity, while at the same time he went out of the Trinity, and became man, is virtually to establish two distinct Logoi, or a Logos with two heads, which is no better than the orthodox theory of two parallel natures,—one infinite, the other finite. The Father and the Son have but one essence: how, then, could the divinity of the Son be suspended, or almost annihilated for a time, without suspending the divinity of the Father? It may be said with Thomas Aquinas, that it was not the nature, but the person, of the Logos that became man. True, but a person without a nature is an impossible abstraction. If the Logos surrendered his divine self-consciousness, his omnipotence, and omniscience, how did he regain them? Was it by a recollection of his pre-existent state? Or by a reflection on the Old-Testament Scriptures? Or by a revelation from the Father? Or by the development of a native instinct? These and similar questions cannot be satisfactorily answered by the consistent Kenoticists.

BRUCE gives the fullest account in English of the Kenosis theories in his able work, The Humiliation of Christ, Edinb., 2d ed., 1881, Lect. IV. Dr. HODGE also notices the Kenotic theories of Thomasius, Ebrard, and Gess, but condemns them very severely, saying, "Any theory which assumes that God lays aside his omnipotence, omniscience, and omnipresence, and becomes feeble, ignorant, and circumscribed as an infant, contradicts the first principle of all religion, and, if it be pardonable to say so, shocks the common sense of men" (Syst. Theol. II. 439). He also objects that the Kenosis destroys the humanity of Christ, since a being which never had a human soul and a human heart cannot be a man. But Gess maintains that the Logos became a true human soul.

5. The last theory which promotes a solution of the problem, but has not yet been sufficiently matured, is the theory of a GRADUAL or PROGRESSIVE incarnation. It carries the divine Kenosis, or the motion of God's love to men, through the whole earthly life of Christ, instead of confining it to an instantaneous act when the Holy Spirit overshadowed the Blessed Virgin. When John says that the "Logos became flesh," he spoke as one of those who "beheld his glory, the glory of the only-begotten of the Father;" as it manifested itself in his whole public life. We discard the impossible idea of an essential self-limitation of the Logos, but assume instead the rational idea of a limitation of the self-communication of the Logos to humanity. There are various degrees in this self-communication. The being and actuality of the Logos remained metaphysically and morally unchanged; but Jesus of Nazareth possessed the Logos merely so far as was compatible with the truth of human growth and the capacity of his expanding consciousness. In other words, the eternal personality of the divine Logos entered into the humanity of Jesus, measure by measure, as it grew, and became capable and worthy of receiving it. There were two corresponding movements in the life of Christ, — a descent of the divine consciousness, and an ascent of the human consciousness. There was a progressive self-communication of the divine Logos to Jesus, and a moral growth of Jesus in holiness keeping step with the former. The process of union began with the supernatural conception, and was completed with the ascension. The first act of the incarnation of the Logos was the beginning of the man Jesus, and both constituted one undivided personality. There was a personal unity and identity throughout the whole period, the same life of the divine-human personality, but in actual growth and development from germ to full organization, from infancy to ripe manhood. Christ became conscious of his Godhead as he became conscious of his Manhood; but the divine life always was the basis of his human life. The twelfth year of Jesus in the temple, and the baptism in the Jordan, mark two important epochs in the development of this divine-human consciousness. There was in connection with the gradual incorporation of the divine Logos into the humanity of Jesus an actual elevation of his humanity into personal union with the Godhead, as he grew in moral perfection: hence his exaltation is spoken of by Paul as a reward for his humiliation and obedience (Phil. ii. 9; comp. Heb. v. 7-10).

This theory escapes the difficulties of the Kenotic theory, and is even better reconcilable with the orthodox christology of the creeds, as far as the result is concerned; the difference being only that the latter puts the end at the beginning, and ignores the intervening process by which the result is attained. Nearly all christologists admit now the genuine growth and development of Christ's humanity, to which the Kenoticists add the impossible growth of the divine Logos from unconsciousness and impotence to omniscience and omnipotence. Our view teaches the former without the latter, and saves the continued integrity of the Logos. There still remains the speculative problem felt by the Reformed divines, — how the infinite consciousness of the eternal Logos can ever become absolutely coincident with the limited consciousness of the man Jesus; but this difficulty attaches to every theory which holds fast to the strict divinity of our Lord.

LIT. — Comp. DORNER: Christliche Glaubenslehre, Berlin, 1880, vol. II. 431, where he sums up his matured view of a gradual incarnation, hinted at towards the close of his classical History of Christology.¹

6 CONCLUSION. — In reviewing these various theories, we can readily accept the elements of truth which they variously express. Christ is the ideal man realized, the head of the redeemed race, the perfect model for universal imitation. So far, even the Humanitarian theory is correct;

In the progress of his profound discussion (as sketched vol. II. 384), Dr. Dörner unfolds (1) The pre-existence of Christ according to his divine side, or the Eternal Word of God and his activity in creation and history; (2) Christ's presence on earth, or his parousia in the state of progressive humiliation and inner transfiguration, (a) The act of the incarnation of God in Christ, or his divine-human nature, (b) The ethical God-manhood (Gottmenschlichkeit), or the doctrine of the holy divine-human personality, (c) The official God-manhood of Christ, or his divine-human functions on earth, in which he presents himself as the Redeemer, — his prophetic, high-priestly, and kingly office; (3) The post-existence of Christ, or his person and work after his earthly life, the descent into Hades (Hadesfahrt), resurrection, exaltation to the right hand of God, and the continuation of his threefold office in heaven till the completion of his work, and the judgment of the world.

only it does not go far enough, and it becomes a serious error when it denies the higher truth beyond. For Christ is also the eternal Son of God, who in infinite love renounced his glory and majesty, and lowered himself to a fallen race, entering into all its wants, trials, and temptations, yet without sin, and humbled himself, even to the death on the cross, in order to emancipate men from the guilt and power of sin, and to reconcile them to God. He is the one undivided God-man, who, as man, calls out all our sympathies and trust, and, as God, is the object of true worship. In this respect we accept fully the faith of the Church in all ages, and consider the divinity of our Lord as the corner-stone of Christianity. We hold, with Rothe and Ritschl, to the moral nature of the God-manhood of Christ, but without sacrificing his eternal divinity. We would go as far with the Kenosis theory as the unchangeable nature of God permits, and as the unbounded love of God demands. We dissent from the dyophysitic and dualistic psychology of Chalcedon, and hold to the inseparable personal unity of the life, and at the same time to the genuine growth of Christ, without asserting, with the Kenoticists, a growth of the divine Logos, who is unchangeable in his nature; but we substitute for this impossible idea a gradual communication of the divinity to the God-man.

This is, in substance, the Christ of the Catholic creeds and the Protestant confessions of faith. He is a mystery indeed to our intellectual and philosophical comprehension, but a mystery made manifest as the most glorious fact in history, — the blessed mystery of godliness, the inexhaustible theme of meditation and praise for all generations. How the whole fulness of uncreated divinity can be poured out into a human being passes our understanding, but not more, perhaps, than the familiar fact that an immaterial and immortal soul made in God's image, and capable of endless perfectibility, inhabits and interpenetrates a material and mortal body. And deeper and grander than both mysteries is the infinite love of God which lies back of them in the very depths of eternity, and which prompted the incarnation and death of his only-begotten Son for the salvation of a sinful world. Yet this love of God in Christ, whose "breadth and length and height and depth passeth knowledge" (Eph. iii. 18, 19), is more certain and constant than the light of the sun in heaven and the voice of conscience in our hearts.

NOTE.—Besides the books already mentioned, among which DORNER's exhaustive History of Christology is the most important, the following English works deserve notice, though mostly confined to an exposition and defence of the Chalcedonian dogma: R. J. WILBERFORCE: The Doctrine of the Incarnation of our Lord, etc., London, 1847; H. P. LIDDON: The Divinity of our Lord Saviour Jesus Christ (Bampton Lectures for 1867), London, 1868; M. T. SADLER: Emmanuel, Incarnation of the Son of God, the Foundation of Immutability, London, 1867; ALEX. B. HARTZHEIM: The Humiliation of Christ in its Physical, Moral, and Official Aspects, Edinb., 1876, second edition, 1881. The various Lives of Christ will be found, with the historical facts, in the art. CHRIST. Here we have discussed the person of Christ simply from the dogmatic point of view, as an object of the Christian faith, leaving out the historical, the ethical, and the artistic aspects of this central fact in the history of mankind. PHILIP SCHAFF.

CHRISTOPHER, St., lived, according to the oldest versions of his legend, at Saucos in Lycia, and suffered martyrdom under King Dagnus; but no place of the name Saucos is known in Lycia, nor any king of the name Dagnus. Nevertheless, though the historical kernel of this legend seems to be of a very doubtful character, few legends have grown so luxuriantly. In mediæval art and poetry St. Christopher is of frequent occurrence, generally represented as a huge fellow wading through the waters, and carrying a child on his shoulder. His day in the Greek Church is May 9, and, in the Latin, July 25. See Act Sanct., July, VI. pp. 125-149; BUTLER: Lives of Saints, July 25; Mrs. JAMESON: Sacred and Legendary Art, II. 439-450.

CHRISTOPHORUS, pope from November, 903, to June, 904, imprisoned his predecessor, Leo V., but was himself imprisoned by his successor, Sergius.

CHRISTO SACRUM, the name of an association founded (1797-1801) by Onder de Wijngaart Canzius, burgomaster of Delft, and some members of the Walloon congregation, for the purpose of gathering all Christians into one body, irrespective of the different denominations to which they might belong. The foundation of the association was the so-called positive Christianity; that is, the faith in the divinity of Christ and the redeeming power of his suffering and death. In the beginning the association was very successful: the number of its members increased to three thousand. But in 1836 the church had to be closed, and in 1838 the association was dissolved. CHRODEGANQ (Chrodegandus, Ruotgang), b. in Hasbania (Belgian Limburg) in the beginning of the eighth century; d. at Metz, March 6, 766; descended from one of the most distinguished families among the Ripuarian Franks, and was destined for an ecclesiastical career, and incorporated with the court clergy. Having been appointed referendarius by Charles Martel, he was made Bishop of Metz in 742 by Peppin, Charles's son. Twice he visited Rome, — in 753 to conduct the Pope safely to Gaul, and in 764 to bring back with him the relics which the Pope had presented to his monasteries and churches; and the intimate relation which sprang up between the papal see and the Frankish empire was much furthered by his influence. His great fame, however, is chiefly due to his labors for the improvement of the discipline of the Church. By his rules, which in parts are borrowed from those of Benedict, he instituted or regulated the so-called Vita Canonica. Of these rules there was a double version: an older, destined only for the Cathedral of Metz, and published by MANSI: Coll. Conc., XIV. 313; HOLSTENIUS: Codex Regularum Monasticarum et Canoniarum, II. 69; and a more recent, enlarged into eighty-six chapters, destined for the Church in general, and published by D'ARCHERY: Spicilegium, I. 565; HARTZHEIM:

Concilia Germaniæ, I. 96; and MIGNE: Patrologia Lat., 89, 1097.

LIT. — Chrodegang's Life was written by PAULUS WARNEFRIDUS: Liber de Episcopis Mellensibus, written in 784, published by PERTZ, Mon. Germ., II. 267; and by JOHN OF GORZ, between 965 and 973, published by PERTZ, Mon. Germ., X. 552; and in Act. Sanct., March, I. 453. MEJER.

CHROMATIUS, Bishop of Aquileia from 388 to 406, was a friend of Ambrose, Rufinus, Jerome, etc., and exercised considerable influence in the controversies of that time, not so much, though, on account of his writings, as by his frank and sympathetic character. Most of what he has written is lost; but some considerable fragments of homilies on Matthew, etc., are still extant, and have been published by GALLANDI in Biblioth. Patrum, VIII. p. 333, and separately by PIETRO BRAIDA, Udine, 1816.

CHRONICLES, The First and Second Books of. The name, since Jerome, for the Hebrew "Book of the Events of the Days," called in the Septuagint Παράλειπούμενα ("things omitted"). Originally our present First and Second Chronicles, Ezra, and Nehemiah, formed one book. The proof of this is the similarity of style, language, point of view, and the identity of the last two verses, of Second Chronicles (xxxvi. 22, 23) with the first two of Ezra. These books, therefore, were once one book, a history of the Israelites from the beginning; although the first part is exclusively genealogical tables to the post-exilic period. Our present division of this book into four parts is very ancient, originating with the Seventy. Chronicles is thoroughly reliable history, being drawn from the official records of the Israelites, which explains the numerous instances in which it coincides even verbally with Kings; and where it differs in names, etc., the discrepancy can be explained by textual corruptions, either in Chronicles, Kings, or their common source. But the point of view is priestly, and therefore the author dwells at greater length upon those features of the history which are ecclesiastical. Accordingly we find his narrative very full about David's religious reforms and arrangements, Solomon's erection of the temple, its consecration, and his care for religion (he passes over his defection). In regard to the other kings he emphasizes those like Asa, Jehoshaphat, Joash, Hezekiah, and Josiah, who were zealous for the Jewish religion. While, therefore, accurate, his language, times, mind, and purpose colored his story. He often translates the old speech into that of his day; alters expressions and things; omits single facts, and explains them peculiarly, and not always correctly; scatters over his pages all kinds of reflections and remarks. He is influenced by his dogmatic environment. By leaving out intermediate causes he represents ordinary events as miracles. He reproduces the spirit rather than the letter of the old speeches he professes to copy. He infuses into his frequent descriptions of the religious festivals of former days too much of the feeling of his own day. A hint, at times, furnishes him materials for a picture. In general, then, it is true that his ideas are correct and historical; but his mode of treatment follows the fashion of a later day, and his peculiarities must be borne in mind when using Chronicles for historical purposes. — The language, when not that of quotation, betrays in idiom and words, as well as in orthography, its later age and degeneracy. The time of composition is after Ezra and Nehemiah (cf. Neh. xii. 47), more exactly about 330 B. C., or a little later, in the beginning of the Greek rule in Asia, as Ewald acutely argued from the application of the phrase "King of Persia," to Cyrus and his successors (2 Chron. xxxvi. 22; Ezra i. 8, etc.); nor is the reckoning according to darikonim ("drams") (1 Chron. xxix. 7, and in Ezra and Nehemiah) against this view; because such reckoning would, of course, continue after the fall of the Persian Empire. — The object of the writer was not so much to retell the story of Israel, as, from the rich historical stores at his command, to select those portions which related more particularly to the history of worship in order to demonstrate to his compatriots how precious this legacy was, and how fundamental to the existence and prosperity of the new state arising from the ashes of the old. — The author was either a priest or a Levite. — The Septuagint text and the present Masoretic text are exactly the same. — The book was received into the canon because of its important additions to history; but, as it was plainly recent, it was relegated to the Hagiographa. It seems to have been originally wanting in the Peshitto.

A. DILLMANN.

Dr. Zöckler, in Lange, says, "Neither the exegetical nor the critical literature of this book is very rich: indeed, there is scarcely one portion of the Old Testament that has found fewer laborers, either in the one respect or the other. The older Jewish commentators shrank from the many difficulties which the genealogies of the first chapters presented; and there are in all very few Jewish commentaries. Of the Church Fathers, Theodoret and Procopius of Gaza alone commented upon the book at any length: Jerome is very cursory and meagre. None of the Reformers have treated Chronicles exegetically." CHRONOLOGY. See ERA.

CHRYSOLOGUS, b. at Imola, 406; d. there 450; was made Bishop of Ravenna in 433, and distinguished himself as one of the most eloquent preachers of the fifth century. A hundred and seventy-six Sermones ascribed to him are still extant; but only a hundred and sixty of them belong really to him. The five sermons (57-62) on the apostolical symbolum are of great historical interest, as containing an independent text. The first edition of the sermons was given by Vincentius, Bonn, 1534, and often reprinted. His letter to Eutyches was edited in Greek and Latin by Vossius, 1604. Both the letter and the sermons are found in Bibl. Max. Patrum, Lyons, Tom. VII.

CHRYSOSTOM (CHRYSOSTOMOS), Joannes, b. at Antioch, 347; d. at Comana in Fratas, 407; descended from an illustrious Greek family. His father was Magister Militum Orientis. His mother, Anthusa, was a Christian woman; and, though only twenty years old when her husband died, she remained a widow, and concentrated her whole life on the education of her son. The young Chrysostom — the name is a surname (the "golden-mouthed") occurring for the first time in the beginning of the seventh century, with Isidore of Seville — was destined for a public career in the administration or the court, and received instruction from the celebrated rhetorician Libanius. But there was a deeper craving in his nature. Rhetoric became repugnant to him. At last he left the Pagan sophist for the Christian priest; and, after studying for three years under Bishop Meletius of Antioch, he was baptized.

Monasticism, and generally the ascetic views of his time, attracted him powerfully; and immediately after the death of his mother he joined a society of hermits living in the mountains outside Antioch. It was probably there that he met with Diodorus, afterwards Bishop of Tarsus, and founder of the school of Antioch; and how deep a satisfaction he extracted from this kind of life, in which study of the Bible, and meditation on holy things, alternated with prayers and manual labor, may be seen from a couple of enthusiastic treatises written in its praise, and more especially from two letters addressed to his friend Theodorus, afterwards Bishop of Mopsuestia, who wished to abandon monasticism, and marry. After the lapse of six years, however, his failing health compelled Chrysostom himself to forsake the solitude; and, having returned to Antioch in 380, he was ordained a deacon by Meletius.

Thus began his practical labors in the service of the Church, and he inaugurated this period of his life by the publication of his celebrated treatise On the Priesthood. In 386 he was ordained a presbyter by Flavian, the successor of Meletius. As a presbyter he began to preach, and the very next year offered a grand opportunity for his extraordinary oratorical gifts. A rebellion broke out in Antioch, and the statues of the imperial family were hurled down from the pedestals into the dust. But the rebellion was speedily suppressed, and the city was in an agony of fear. Flavian proceeded to Constantinople to avert the emperor's wrath; and in the mean time Chrysostom delivered his famous twenty-one sermons On Statues. The activity which he developed as preacher during the twelve years he staid in Antioch was very great; and his fame as the greatest preacher of the Church was spreading rapidly. We have still from that time sixty-seven sermons on Genesis, sixty on the Psalms, ninety on the Gospel of Matthew, eighty-eight on the Gospel of John, and a number on the Epistles to the Romans, Corinthians, Galatians, Ephesians, Colossians, and Titus. Of a more strongly-marked doctrinal character is the series of sermons against the Anomœans, belonging to the same period.

In 398 he removed to Constantinople. Eutropius, the favorite of the Emperor Arcadius, wished to see him placed on the patriarchal throne of the metropolis; but Chrysostom absolutely refused to assume the responsibility of such a position. Nevertheless, by a trick he was allured to Constantinople, and by force he was compelled to accept the patriarchal ordination from Theophilus of Alexandria. Thus he suddenly found himself at the head of the whole Greek Church, very much against his own will. The situation was full of dangers to him. He was a man of single aims and straight ways. Severe to himself, he was severe to others too; and, in his passionate hatred of any thing bad or wrong, his frankness and courage prevented him from paying any regard to circumstances. But such a man was very ill adapted to manage the whims of a despotic court, and handle a population immoral beyond description, fanatical unto fury, and exceedingly proud of its own doctrinal orthodoxy. Controversies with heretics, Arians, Novatians, etc., added to the difficulties; and the situation finally proved too strong for the man who had been pressed into it.

Some Egyptian monks, who, on account of the esteem in which they held Origen, had excited the displeasure of Theophilus, Patriarch of Alexandria and a very violent character, fled to Constantinople, and sought refuge with Chrysostom. Theophilus was summoned to Constantinople to defend himself. But on his arrival there he found that Eudoxia, the empress, was very ill disposed towards Chrysostom; and at the decisive moment he managed to assume the part of the judge instead of that of the accused. Under his presidency a synod was convened on the imperial estate at Chalcedon, — the so-called Synodus ad Quercum; and there forty-six accusations were raised against Chrysostom, most of them mere lies, and some of them completely ludicrous. Nevertheless, as the synod was composed of Chrysostom's enemies, it gave in a verdict of guilty, recommending his deposition and banishment. The Emperor accepted the verdict; and Chrysostom was secretly brought on board a vessel to be carried to Bithynia. But an earthquake which shook the city during the night, and the threatening fermentation in the population, frightened the court. Chrysostom was recalled, and received by the people with great applause. Thus he escaped the first bolt.

A few months later, a silver statue of Eudoxia was raised on a column of porphyry in front of the Church of St. Sophia, and consecrated with all those idolatrous ceremonies and licentious rites which characterized such an occasion during the days of rank Paganism. Chrysostom gave a warning: Eudoxia accepted it as a challenge. Chrysostom went farther: he is reported to have said in the pulpit, "Again Herodias is dancing; again she demands the head of John on a charger;" and the empress now determined to get rid of the man. A council of Constantinople deposed him a second time; and June 20, 404, he was dragged into exile, Cuensus in Lesser Armenia having been fixed as his abode. In this dismal village he spent three years in bodily pain and mental anguish, but without losing his influence on the Church, without even relaxing his hold on his congregation in Constantinople. No less than two hundred and thirty letters, written from this place, are still extant, and bear witness to the extraordinary power and purity of his mind. His friends, even the Bishop of Rome and the Emperor Honorius, labored for his recall; but the result of their exertions was simply that he was transferred to a still more distant place, Pityos in Colchis. On the way thither he died.

LIT.—Collected editions of his works have been given by SAVILIUS, Etonæ, 1613 (8 vols.), FRONTO DUCÆUS, Paris, 1609–36 (12 vols.), and MONTFAUÇON, Paris, 1718–38 (13 vols.), reprinted at Venice, 1755, re-edited in Paris, 1835–40. Separate editions of his single works are very numerous. [English translations of the homilies and De Sacerdotio are found in the Oxford Library of the Fathers (1842–53).] His life was first written by his contemporary, PALLADIUS: Dialogus Historicus . . . de Vita et Conversatione J. Chrysostomi; compare SOCRATES: Hist. Eccel., VI. 2–21; SOZOMENUS, VIII. c. 2–23; THEODORET, V. 27, 31; JEROME: De Vir. Ill., 129. CHUBB, Thomas, deist, b. in East Hamham, near Salisbury, Sept. 29, 1679; d. at Salisbury, Feb. 8, 1746. He was a tallow-chandler to the end of his life. When Whiston published his Primitive Christianity revived, Chubb wrote a defence of the idea of the supremacy of the one God and Father, expressed in the preface, entitled The Supremacy of the Father asserted, and sent it to Whiston, who printed it in 1715. This brought Chubb into notice, and induced him to write a good deal. He represents the decay of Deism in England. He stated his objections to orthodoxy in a simple, vigorous style; but he had no learning, nor very great logical ability. His principal writings are, A Discourse concerning Reason, London, 1731; The True Gospel of Jesus Christ vindicated, 1739 (advocating the pregnant idea that Christianity is not doctrine, but life: wrongly, however, he makes the true gospel of Christ identical with natural religion: Lechler characterizes it as an essential moment in the historical development of Deism); The Author's Farewell to his Readers, printed in his Posthumous Works, 2 vols., 1748. This is the most complete summary of his opinions. He denied a special providence, miracles, literal inspiration, and apparently Christ's resurrection. Stephen says his writings show a very calm and honest intellect; there is little bitterness in his attacks upon the Established faith; and his arguments are fairly, though seldom vigorously, stated. He was a man of considerable natural ability, and in many of his tracts (and he wrote more than fifty) exhibits a logical faculty, which, guided by better training, might have made him a formidable antagonist. But it was not to be expected that much new light was to be thrown upon his well-worn topics by an ignorant chandler. See LECHLER: Geschichte des englischen Deismus, Stuttgart, 1841; STEPHEN: History of English Thought in the Eighteenth Century, London, 1876, 2d ed., 1881; CAIRNS: Unbelief in the Eighteenth Century, Edinburgh and N. Y., 1881. See DEISM.

CHURCH. 1. THE CHURCH IN THE NEW TESTAMENT. Meaning of the word.—The word ἐκκλησία in the New Testament means either the universal Church of Christ, or a local congregation. In modern use, "church" means also the "house of God," or the building in which the congregation assembles for divine worship, and a particular "denomination." [Our English word "church" is of Greek origin, from ἡ κυριακή or τὸ κυριακόν; in Anglo-Saxon, cyrice; in Scotch, kirk. The fact seems to be, that the Romance languages derive their word for "church" from ἐκκλησία; e.g., French, église, Italian, chiesa; the Teutonic and Scandinavian, from κυριακή.] In profane Greek ἐκκλησία, from ἐκκαλεῖν (to call together), describes an assembly of citizens called together, usually by a herald, the members of which were therefore the "elect," ἐκκλητοί (the called). Instances of this usage occur in Acts xix. 32, 41,—"the assembly" (ἡ ἐκκλησία), cf. ver. 39, where the town-clerk contrasts the tumultuous gathering with a "lawful assembly" (ἐννομος ἐκκλησία). But the ecclesiastical meaning of the word in the New Testament is directly connected with the Hebrew of the Old Testament and the Greek of the Septuagint. The two expressions in the Old Testament for the people of God are קָהָל and עֵבֶר: the difference between them is, that, while both express an assembly, עֵבֶר means assembly in general, and קָהָל an assembly for divine worship; cf. Lev. iv. 13, 14, where the two words are in juxtaposition. In ver. 13 the "congregation" is general: in ver. 14 the "congregation" is that assembled for religious worship. The Seventy translate עֵבֶר by συναγωγή, and never by ἐκκλησία, and קָהָל also by συναγωγή, though more frequently by ἐκκλησία. At bottom lies the idea that the congregation is called together by God himself.

The question has often been discussed, whether Jesus contemplated a new Church in distinction to the Jewish Church. He surely announced the nearness, nay, the existence, of the kingdom of God. But did he mean by this a particular organization of his own? The allusions to and parables of the kingdom, with the exception of Matt. xvi. 18, do not lend themselves to this idea. The "kingdom" is already present (Luke xvii. 21) in those who are good ground for the seed sown by the Son of man (Matt. xiii. 3–8, 37–43). These, together with those in whose hearts the seed does not come to fruitfulness, and those in whom it is mixed with weeds, are represented as standing upon one and the same field. But of any such connection between them as membership in one church would imply, there is no hint. Nor is there any in the parable of the net or of the pearl. At the same time, it is true that the disciples constituted a little body by themselves:

they were Jesus' flock (Luke xii. 32; John x. 1 sqq.), his devoted band, whose love and interest stood in boldest contrast to the indifference and hate of the rest of the nation. In Matt. xvi. 18 and xviii. 17 sqq., however, he contemplates the Church which should result from their activity, and therefore had a vision of the coming times. To him the ἐκκλησία was a לִקְוָה, an assembly for divine worship.

Our Lord declared that he would build his Church upon Peter (Matt. xvi. 18); by which play on the word petros (a rock) he prophesied that historically his Church should rest upon the sermon and activity of the inspired Man of Rock; and the Day of Pentecost realized his prophecy. But of any succession in office, and government of the Church thus established, there is not a word. For the meaning of the phrase "power of the keys," see KEYS, POWER OF THE.

Very naturally in the Early Church the apostles occupied the most prominent positions. Yet there was no distinction in authority between them and the newer disciples; rather, when churches were established, they left them to the care of the members, and discharged in all literalness their Lord's commission, and went forth to preach in new localities the gospel of Christ. In Matt. xxiii. 34 Jesus speaks of sending "prophets, wise men, and scribes;" and in Matt. xxiv. 45 sqq., Luke xii. 42 sqq., of "stewards" and "upper servants:" all which expressions are not to be considered other than different forms of loving service, by which the Church was built up. Next to the preaching of the Word came baptism, an institution plainly Christ's; and every congregation observed the other sacrament, the Lord's Supper, as the principal feature of its peculiar growth. At first the Church was a Palestinian affair; and although one might argue it was intended to be much more comprehensive, yet there was nothing in its structure to directly support the opinion that it would ultimately unite Jew and Gentile in one society. Therefore evangelical Protestantism is right in asserting that the existence of the Church does not depend upon the apostolic forms; for our Lord's speeches concerning his Church have nothing to do with the externals of religion, the ordering of worship, and of government, nor yet with the formulating of doctrine,—phenomena which have greatly occupied later attention. [The distinction between the Kingdom of God and the Church is important to observe. The Kingdom is much more comprehensive. It exists irrespective of the Church. Its members are the ultimately saved, whether they belong to the Church as an ecclesiastical body, or not. The Church, on the other hand, is made up of all under gospel influences. Therefore, when we pray for the Church, we pray for the progress of divine truth with all its attendant blessings; but when we pray, "Thy Kingdom come," we pray for the speedy presence of the saints, gathered under the sceptre of their King, Jesus Christ.]

The historical Church began on the Day of Pentecost; and it was at first composed of the disciples whom Jesus had personally gathered. It was a community inside of Judaism, with peculiar worship and government. It was the ἐκκλησία αἴα; and by this name Paul calls it in his earliest Epistles, whether in Palestine or outside (1 Thess. ii. 14). Its complete name was the "Church of God," or the "Church of Christ" (Rom. xvi. 16), whether of a single congregation, or of the whole body of believers. It was made up of the "sanctified in Christ Jesus" (1 Cor. i. 2), the "called saints" (Rom. i. 7), the "holy nation" (1 Pet. ii. 9). In the deep conception of Paul every believer was united with Christ, and entered this close union through baptism (1 Cor. xii. 13; Gal. iii. 27). The Church was Christ's body, of which he was the Head (Col. i. 24, ii. 19).

But how comes it that this body of Christ is described by Paul as enclosing unworthy members, "vessels of dishonor" (2 Tim. ii. 20)? Not because the term is used in a general sense, just as the Israelites were called collectively the "people of God," but rather, as Luther says, because Paul speaks synecdochically, putting the whole for a part, looking not at the unsaintly, but at the saintly, at those who had really put on Christ, and by their lives gave form and value to the whole body. It was indeed a recognition of the distinction between the visible and the invisible Church: only we must bear in mind that there was then no State Church; so that the relations of the unworthy to the worthy were quite different from what they afterwards became, when both made up one body politic. It is noticeable how Paul refers to Jesus' idea of the kingdom of God. He, like the other apostles, put the kingdom into another æon, when the Lord shall in person unite Christianity, and bring it to its highest development. In the present æon, Christianity is a developing, spreading force, working upon the hearts and practices of men: in the future it will be completed (cf. 1 Cor. vi. 9 sqq., xv. 24, 50; Gal. v. 21; Eph. v. 5; 2 Thess. i. 5; 2 Tim. iv. 1; Heb. xii. 28; Jas. ii. 5; 2 Pet. i. 11). The Church in the present has for its immediate duty the steady growth in God, letting his word dwell among it richly (Col. iii. 16), praying, praising, and working, reaching out its hands of love and comfort unto all needy ones, and providing especially for the necessities of the saints. Each member is a priest to offer spiritual sacrifices (Heb. xiii. 15 sq.).

To the proper discharge of these duties the Church had certain officers, who were endowed with particular gifts. In a collective sense the duties were called διακονία ("ministrations," 1 Cor. xii. 5). The leaders were known as ἐπίσκοποι ("overseers"), who were the elders, or "presbyters," and "deacons." Originally they were the selection of the apostles themselves, then by the congregations. See CLERGY. They sprang up in accordance with the wants of the different churches. Thus "deacons" were a necessity in the Jerusalem church; and that church was modelled upon the synagogue. But the clergy are not divinely constituted in the sense that God gave special order for their organization, or special direction for their continuance: on the contrary, the New Testament contains no particular ecclesiastical polity. The future Church was left free to manage its affairs according to its needs.—One gift of the nascent Church was the prophetic (1 Cor. xii. 28 sqq.). It was necessary to build up the communities, and lead them unto better acquaintance with the divine Word. But the "prophets" were not an order; rather the gift was shared by presbyters (1 Tim. iii. 2, v. 17), and generally by the Church (Jas. iii. 1). The apostolic office was by its very conditions unique and untransmissible. There will never be apostles again, because they were the divinely-ordered founders of the Church. See APOSTLE.

There was a mighty difference between the "legal" church in Jerusalem, and the "spiritual" churches permeated by Paul's heavenly freedom. But bond and free constituted one Church in Christ Jesus; and the test of membership was not ecclesiastical observances or theological conceptions, but love. Love to Christ, love to the brethren,—by this were Christians known to the world. "See how these Christians love one another!" was the admiring speech of their enemies. "These things I command you, that ye love one another," said Jesus (John xv. 17). And John, when too feeble through age to say more, repeated in the gatherings at Ephesus the words of the Master. Love was the higher unity in which the Church forgot minor differences. The seal of this sweet brotherhood was the holy kiss (Rom. xvi. 16).

2. THE CHURCH AND THE DOCTRINE OF THE CHURCH IN CATHOLICISM. (a) The Ancient Catholicism.—The Catholic Church is the development of the Church of the New Testament; and yet it contains elements which certainly are not found in the New Testament. In place of the body of Christ, is the episcopacy as a divine institution. Salvation is communicated by means of a priesthood. The uniting band is no more brotherly love, but the external organization. The holiness of the external Church is increasingly emphasized, instead of the holiness of the individual member, leading directly to a belief that the Church by its acts can impart this quality. The Pauline doctrine of faith, and liberty as the result, is unknown.

The Roman-Catholic theologians hold this entire movement to be normal, a real progress along the lines marked out for it in the New Testament. The Baur school, on the other hand (see SCHWEGLER: Das nachapostolische Zeitalter, 1846), hold that the Catholic Church was the resultant of the Petrine (the particular) and the Pauline (the universal) tendencies of the earliest times,—a position contradicted by the facts. Much more to the point is it to recognize the position of the Church in the midst of the Roman world, which was permeated with the idea of law, and therefore to find in the influence of the empire the solution of the unquestionable tightening of church bands. The Church opposed itself to the world. It required a stronger external organization to enable it to cope successfully with its foes. And this it received, although not according to any direct and special divine plan, from its very historical environment. When the Church thus benefited by the situation, and exhibited a marked departure from New-Testament ideas in other ways, there was not necessarily any fall from so-called "primitive purity." It is important to bear in mind that the apostles were not representative men, but inspired and elevated above their times. Their writings are not, therefore, to be considered as the expression of the Christian consciousness of their times, but rather of their consciousness,—quite a different thing. [Indeed, the Epistles are the very best evidence that the apostolic churches were by no means always such model communities as pious fancy pictures; although, speaking generally, the spontaneity and beauty of the new life must be freely and heartily granted.]

We now examine the writings of the Fathers, with a view to bring out their ideas upon the Church. And first, Clement of Rome, in his First Epistle to the Corinthians, parallels the episcopacy, or the presbyterate, with the Old-Testament priesthood, and the offerings in prayer which these bishops bring with the offerings of the priests, but knows nought of bishops as successors of the apostles, nor of offerings by them of saving efficacy for the congregation. In the Pastor of Hermas, the high idea of the Church comes out in his identification of the "Jerusalem that is above" (Gal. iv. 26) with the earthly Church. Ignatius, in his Epistle to the Church of Smyrna, and the Muratorian Fragment, first speak of the "Catholic Church,"—a phrase of contested meaning, but probably in opposition to the dividing and differing heretical churches. The Catholic Church takes in all true Christians; and so each congregation was a "Catholic Church."

With noteworthy definiteness speaks Ignatius: "Each church stands under one bishop, who is the representative of Christ or of God, and under the presbyters, who are about the bishop as the apostles were about Christ." But he does not discuss the questions, how the bishops came to occupy this position, how far they were divinely gifted for their office, and how the Church and they were guarded against erroneous leadings. Irenæus and Tertullian voice the general opinion of their day, when they speak of the episcopacy as the representatives of the apostles, continuing their work of teaching and leading the Church, and thus giving to it "apostolicity." See Irenæus (IV. 26, 2) and his famous sentence (III. 24, 1): "Ubi ecclesia, ibi Spiritus Dei, et ubi Spiritus Dei, illic ecclesia et omnis gratia" ("Where the Church is, there is the Spirit of God; and where the Spirit of God is, there is the Church, and every kind of grace"). Similarly Tertullian compares, as Clement of Rome had done, the presbyterate, and especially the episcopacy, to the Old-Testament priesthood, asserting that to the Church belonged an "order of priests," and that the bishop was the "high priest" (pontifex maximus, ἀρχιερεύς). It must, however, be allowed that the notion of the bishop as the dispenser of the means of grace was the development of a later age.—The Alexandrian theology of a Clement and an Origen did not affect this development. Their philosophical and aristocratic gnosis was out of the stream of New-Testament Christianity. Against this stream Montanism tried to work its way, but failed; and we find its progress in Cyprian, to whom the bishops are the Church's rulers, with divine authority. Baptism was indeed allowed to be valid, even if performed by heretics or schismatics; yet the shibboleth, that "out of the Church there is no salvation," was maintained; for those baptized by outsiders first received the saving effects of their baptism when they entered the Church. See BAPTISM BY HERETICS. Besides the expressions of Cyprian, which show that to the episcopacy he granted unconditional authority, are others which as emphatically point to a necessary participation of the presbyters, and even of the laity, particularly in the "power of the keys." Nor does he suggest any explanation of this contradiction. In him, also, the priest, in the Lord's Supper, represents Christ, and offers the body of Christ. See MASS. It is true, however, that he does not use the word "body" in its later Roman sense. — Cyprian finds the unity of the Church in its being built upon the one Peter (Matt. xvi. 18). In Rome he sees the "cathedra Petri," the root and the matrix of the Catholic Church (De Unit. Eccl., c. 4; Epist., 70, 73, 55 [59], 45 [48]); yet he explains that the Lord granted to the other apostles, and to the post-apostolic bishops, the same power originally given to Peter, and vindicates for himself independent episcopal authority. See the Old Catholic bishop REINKENS: Die Lehre des hl. Cyprian von der Einheit der Kirche, Würzburg, 1873.

We come now to Augustine. It is from him that the Church received her deepest and fullest exposition of the doctrine of the Church. The historical occasion for this was the contest with the Donatists, who denied the holiness of the Catholic Church, because she kept within her fold those who had sinned unto death, as they claimed; i.e., those who had delivered up the sacred writings to the heathen persecutors. To these idealists Augustine opposed the true conception of the Church as really the body of Christ, because the divine energy impelled her, and the divine love inflamed her, and not because she was spotless. In this mixed body the Lord knoweth his own. The elect constitute the true inner Church. It was substantially from Augustine that the present Roman-Catholic doctrine of the Church has been developed. He teaches that out of the Church there is no salvation, and the sacraments, including ordination, have no efficacy. He contends for the divine right of episcopacy, and calls the Church "catholic," because she spreads herself all the world over. Upon her depends the individual faith. He declared that he believed the gospel only on the authority of the Catholic Church ("Evangelio non crederem nisi me catholicæ ecclesiæ commoveret auctoritas," c. Epist. Funl.): consequently he finds nothing in the Scriptures which contradicts the teachings of the Catholic Church. And, finally, he demands for this Church the support of the State.

(b) The Oriental and Occidental (Roman) Catholicism. — The priesthood and the episcopacy were fully developed in both branches of Christendom, and in the Occidental churches the further ideas of priestly sacrifice and absolution, and of government in the Church analogous to that in the State, much more than in the Orient. It is noteworthy that the schisms which devastated the Church — the Novation and the Donatist — were peculiar to the Occident. This organization was at length carried to the point of the absolute monarchy, coupled with papal infallibility. In the Oriental churches, on the other hand, indulged in doctrinal speculations of various kinds, particularly in soteriology.

Pope Leo I. claimed for the Papacy, in the way of government more than of doctrine, the care of the Universal Church. Out of his teachings the later claims were naturally developed. The political position of Rome in the empire, and the support given to the Church of Rome by the emperor (edict of Valentinian III., A.D. 445), helped very greatly this tendency. The desire of the Latin and German peoples in the middle age for an earthly representation of the divine was gratified in the appearance of the one Roman representative of the one heavenly Lord, as by the doctrines of the mass, the saving efficacy of the sacraments, the transmission of the Holy Spirit through the ordination and the priesthood, with their ability to forgive sins as God's vicegerents. Over the State the Church claimed authority; and the great popes of the middle age, Gregory VII. and Innocent III., carried out this authority to its widest possible extent. Finally, the Occidental Church claimed to be the only Catholic Church, denying to the Greek Church any part in the genuine Church of Christ [or, rather, calling it schismatical].

But these pretensions of the Chair of Peter had not yet been formulated as a dogma; for in opposition to them stood not only the civil authority, which endeavored to break the yoke of the Church, but also national pride, as in France, during the pontificate of Boniface VIII., the consciousness of their original independence and importance on the part of the bishops, the bad or weak character of the popes, and the great papal schism, which aroused the Church against the Papacy. Hence, especially in France, do we find a vigorous exposition of a Catholic Church in distinction to the Roman Church; and under the leadership of D'Ailly and Gerson (cf. his De modis uniendi et ref. eccles.) these ideas were presented in the great Reform councils: the councils were infallible, not the Pope; the Roman Church was fallible, and under the authority of the Universal Church, which was represented in the councils, composed not of bishops alone, but also of princes, and delegates from the universities; the Head of the Church was Christ; the Pope was not the head, but only the vicar of Christ. The divine right of episcopacy, and the divine ordinance of the papal primacy, were not, however, denied; and Hus was condemned to death, even by a Gerson and a D'Ailly, for maintaining that the true Church was made up of the elect, that the Papacy was not divinely appointed, and that councils were not infallible.

Notwithstanding this opposition, the papal theory gained ground. It dominated the Lateran Council (1512-17) under Leo X. The Jesuits gave it their powerful advocacy. Bellarmine defines the Church as the assembly of those professors of the Christian faith who are bound by the sacraments under the rule of legitimate pastors, and especially under the Pope. But the Council of Trent refused to decide between the opposing theories; and it was left for the Vatican Council of 1870 to give the logical conclusion to the long development, in its dogma of the infallibility of the Pope, when speaking ex cathedra upon matters of faith and morals. This makes the Pope the Head of the Church, and as Pope Pius IX. actually claimed, in his famous letter of Aug. 7, 1873, to the Emperor William, rightful ruler of all who have received baptism.

3. THE CHURCH AND THE PROTESTANT DOGMA OF THE CHURCH SINCE THE REFORMATION. The Waldensians were the first to return to the primitive idea of the Church, but without any new principle of church-action, or any scientifically settled doctrine upon the subject. The first theologian who opposed to the Roman-Catholic doctrine of the Church another which was well grounded, was Wiclif, whom Hus followed. According to him, the Church is the company of the predestinated. This was so far forth both Catholic and Augustinian: but the conclusion to which his idea led him was decidedly otherwise; for he declared that to the proper administration of salvation neither priest, nor bishop, nor pope was needful. He denied the papal primacy and the de jure divino episcopacy, and maintained that God granted the laity to hold fast to truths lost sight of by the clergy. The Church, to Wiclif, was the elect, both living and dead. The next champion of Protestantism to Hus is Luther, who, at the Leipzig Disputation (1517), defined the Church as the Communion of Saints, whose existence depended upon its possession of the Word and sacraments, and not of bishop or clergy. The "power of the keys," which the true Church knew, was no exclusive class-possession, but the assurance, by the means of grace, that sin was forgiven, independent of the personal character of the administrator. The saints who form the Church are those who have been sanctified by the Word and sacraments, through the exercise of faith. On this basis Luther conducted the revolt against Rome; proving out of the Word that no human agency intervened before the sinner and his Saviour, but that by faith in Christ we were saved, and became members of his body. The Church thus defined was real, although not visible, except to God, who knows his own. The evidence of saintship was a holy life, and of the Church was the preaching of the Word and the sacraments: and it consequently assumed such shape as best suited this activity. Luther held strong notions of the right and power of the Church to punish offences. In cutting loose from the Church of Rome, Luther (like the Waldensians so long before) recognized in that Church the members of Christ's Church. Very different, of course, was Rome's opinion of Luther's followers. In the mouth of the Lutherans the Catholic Church is the Church spread all over the world and over all the centuries. Its Head is the one Christ: its bands are the one faith, one hope, one baptism. As is evident, this definition of Luther's is too vague to decide the many questions and problems which it starts: what is purity in preaching, and administration of the sacraments, and how far is it necessary? what is the power of the Church? who should exercise it? etc. The position of the Church to the State was the result of circumstances; its mode of government was almost accidental; and the question of a return to episcopacy was left open for many years. See LUTHERAN CHURCH. Melancthon in his later teaching emphasizes the conception of the Church as a visible organization, in which the pure Word or the pure doctrine was taught; and in its doing of these things consisted its visibility. [He also favored a modified episcopacy, and was willing even to allow a papal supremacy over the Church, provided the Pope tolerated the freedom of the gospel. See SCHAFF: Creeeds, I. 254.]

The Reformed Confessions describe the Church as the Communion of Believers or Saints, and condition its existence on the pure preaching of the Word. They distinguish between the visible and the invisible Church; the latter composed of the elect, who, however, know their election, and therefore their membership in the invisible Church. The Reformed theologians made much less of the sacraments. They declared that the Church was in no sense the "dispenser of grace," as the Roman Catholics and Lutherans affirm. Various solutions were offered to the problem of Church and State. Zwingli made the Church the servant of the State. Calvin favored presbyterianial government, and independence of the State, but could not carry out his scheme. As in the case of the Lutherans, the political surroundings and relations dominated the Church, and only where these were hostile did the Church assume independent government. The theory of complete separation of Church and State belongs to a later period. Inside the Reformed churches difference of opinion also existed in regard to ecclesiastical polity; and so Presbyterianism and Congregationalism sprang up side by side. The Reformed theory in government and theology reached its extremest point in Quakerism.

Unlike either the Lutheran or the Reformed churches, is the Anglican. Reformed in its teachings on the sacraments, it is yet Melancthonian in its assertion of the visibility of the Church. But its assertion of the necessity of apostolical succession to the existence of the Church of Christ is not found in its Thirty-nine Articles.

After the Reformation, followed a period when a newly-awakened religiousness rebelled against the too tightly drawn lines of ecclesiastical polity. Then came in rationalism, religious indifference, and unbelief, which depreciated the Church in any sense. Spenser strove to counteract this disintegrating tendency by awakening the laity; but Pietism sought rather the satisfaction of personal religious wants through ecclesiale. The piety which here sought satisfaction took on a narrow, legal character, and one related to the Reformed idea. Rationalism considered the Church as a purely human organization, on a level with other societies, and denied that Jesus ever contemplated the formation of a Church.

[Of great influence was the view of Schleiermacher (1768-1834); namely, that "the Christian Church is quickened by the Holy Ghost, and is in its purity and completeness a perfect copy of the Saviour, and that every regenerate soul is a component part of this society" (Der christliche Glaube, 3d ed., Berlin, 1836, II. 306). The theory of Rothe (1799-1867) was quite different. He held, that, in the true moral development, civil society is in itself a religious community. Every man should have a part in the Church; for only thus can his part in other associations have moral validity. It follows, that, when humanity becomes perfect, the Church vanishes; for then the sphere of the moral and that of the religious communion become one and the same: hence the Church disappears in proportion as the State becomes perfect. This gradual solution of the Church in the State can take place only by the State becoming a religious body, a kingdom of God,—a theocracy in the highest sense. See R. ROTHE: Die Anfänge der christlichen Kirche, Wittenberg, 1837.]

The fright of revolution in the first part of the century produced in Germany, in some quarters, a longing for authority; and so a new emphasis was laid upon the Church. It was clothed with divine might and right: it was a divine institution, and was composed of the baptized. There was talk of reviving the episcopacy. The discussion elicited by this Neo-Lutheranism showed the necessity of ecclesiastically recognizing the laity, and of giving them part in the government of the Church. The condition of the Church's existence and growth is, however, not in its polity or policy, but in its use of the divinely-ordained means of grace, and, above all, in the presence of the Holy Spirit, who gives efficacy to the Word, and enables the congregations to live and work together in love.

J. KÖSTLIN.

In England, about the same time, arose High-Churchism (Anglo-Catholicism) with its romanizing tendency as expressed in the famous Oxford Tracts for the Times. See PUSEYISM, TRACTARIANISM. The Anglo-Catholics announced their belief, (1) In apostolic succession (i.e., the ministry of the Church of England was derived by uninterrupted descent, through episcopacy, from the apostles, and is a permanent and unalterable institution: upon this connection with the apostles rested the efficacy of the sacraments); (2) In baptismal regeneration; (3) The eucharistic sacrifice, and the real communion in the body and blood of our Lord; (4) The appeal to the Church from the beginning as the depositary and witness of the truth. Opposite to them is the Broad-Church party, which, in the interests of the widest freedom, denies that apostolical succession is essential to the Church and the sacraments. A strange product of the extreme High-Church view is the Catholic Apostolic Church, commonly called the Irvingite. The interpretation of the New-Testament passages in the interest of episcopacy is gradually giving way to a more liberal exegesis under the influence of such scholars as shops Ellicott and Lightfoot, G. A. Jacob, and Hatch. See BISHOP; ENGLAND, CHURCH OF.

CHURCH-PROPERTY. The means necessary for its organization and maintenance the primitive Church derived, partly from voluntary gifts, and partly from direct taxes levied upon its membership. The revenues thus raised were collected in a common diocesan purse, whence they were paid out, in proportionate allotments, to the clergy, for the fabrica ecclesie (that is, the church-building, the cemetery, etc.), and to the poor. The administration devolved originally upon the presbytery, and afterwards upon a steward, διοκονομος, appointed by the presbytery, and acting under the supervision of the bishop. The Council of Chalcedon (451) recommended the appointment of such an officer in every diocese; and the office was still in existence when the Fourth Council of Toledo was held (633), though at that time the financial department of the Christian Church had long lost its original simplicity.

In 321 Constantine the Great granted permission to donate and bequeath property to the Christian Church; and this permission was so extensively used, that, already in 364, Valentinian felt constrained to enact a mortmain law in order to prevent the accumulation of land by the Church. Property consisted at that time chiefly of land; and great masses of landed property accrued to the Church from bequests for the erection or ornamentation of buildings, for the foundation or maintenance of establishments, etc. Valentinian's law, however, had no permanent influence. Under Justinian (527-565) it became a recognized maxim of Roman jurisprudence, and the general practice of the Roman courts, to put the most favorable construction on wills making dispositions of property for the benefit of the Church. It occurred very frequently, that by will a legacy was given to the Church in general, or to the poor in general, or to God; but in such cases the courts never allowed the legacy to be lost on account of the uncertainty of the instrument, but construed it to inure to the parish of the testator. Thus the Church soon became very rich, holding property in every form in which property could be held: and this wealth was well guarded; it could not be alienated by its present incumbents, and robbers of it were punished doubly.

But the question now arose, Who is the true owner of all this property? In the contest between the monastic institutions and the episcopal authority, the bishop protested that he was the real owner of all the ecclesiastical property in his diocese; but finding no support from the Pope, whose policy it was to use monasticism as a counterpoise to the episcopacy, the claim was never recognized. Again: in the contest between the episcopacy and the papacy, the Pope asserted that he, as the representative of the Universal Church, was the real owner of all the property of the Church, and to a certain extent he succeeded in establishing his claim. Finally, in the contest between the Church and the secular government, the Church declared that its property belonged to Christ, and any encroachment upon its rights, or privileges, or immunities, was a robbery of Christ. It may be doubtful whether such an argument ever could have obtained legal force; but it is certain that it made a deep impression on people in general, and exercised great influence on the formation of public opinion. There was also a theory afloat according to which the property of the Church belonged to the poor; but the practical difficulties of this theory were so obvious, that it remained a mere phrase. But the true theory, that on which practical life moved along, was, that each ecclesiastical institution was the real owner of its property: not so, however, that the present representatives of the institution, the congregation of the Church, the members of the order, the inmates of an asylum, etc., could do with the property what they liked; for the property did not belong to the persons who enjoyed it, but to the purpose, religious or charitable, for whose promotion it was set apart.

The Reformation acknowledged this principle, and acted upon it, at least in the beginning. When the object of a certain institution was rejected, as, for instance, in the case of monasteries, legacies for saying mass, etc., the institution was dissolved, and its property confiscated. But when the institution was preserved, its property remained with it, and was applied only for religious or charitable purposes. See LUTHER: Ordnung eines gemeinen Kastens, Rathsschlag, wie die geistlichen Güter zu handeln sind, 1523. By degrees, however, as the Reformation spread and split, and every State organized its own church establishment, the Church became a function of the State, a State institution, and the State became the owner of the property of the Church. Such is the case in all Protestant countries, with one great exception, — America, in which the Church is perfectly free and independent of the State, — and a number of minor exceptions arising from the existence of dissenting churches beside the State establishment. Such is also the case in France; though it has proved very difficult, as the people are Roman-Catholic, to carry through there the principle of organizing the Church as a State institution. But there is at present a tendency abroad in all evangelical countries to revise the now ruling system of Church organization in favor of freedom and independence; and the revision will, of course, have its influence also on the question of holding property. See the articles on TERRITORIALISM and COLLEGIALISM.

In America a church may hold property in various ways, sometimes not without impediments of various kinds, but always with perfect safety. The law of charity is here the chief protector of church-property, and, in connection with the law of trusts, also the chief regulator. When a religious society is incorporated, it is regarded by the law, and treated by it, exactly like any other civil corporation, — a railroad company, a bank, or an insurance company; and the civil courts will not interfere with its organization, order, discipline, doctrine, or ownership of property, except to enforce an application of its wealth in strict accordance with the purposes for which it was acquired. When, however, a religious society is not incorporated (and in some States a charter cannot be obtained by them), they are not recognized as having a legal existence. They can neither sue nor be sued in civil courts; and they cannot hold property directly, yet they can control property held by others for their use. Donations and grants may be legally made to trustees for the use and benefit of an unincorporated society; and courts of equity will protect them in the enjoyment of their rights, and, if necessary, will raise up legal trustees through whom they may act.

CHURCH-RATE is a tax imposed on the parishioners, and occupiers of land in a parish of England for church repairs: the payment, however, cannot be compelled. It is proposed by the church-wardens, and must be voted by a majority of the parishioners at a regularly constituted meeting.

CHURCH-REGISTERS were books in which the minister recorded the births, deaths, and marriages, etc., occurring in his congregation. The custom originated in the Roman law; but, in spite of its eminent usefulness, it never became a general law, and never acquired a universal method. The oldest records of this kind still extant are the baptismal registers of Florence, beginning with 1450. There are French burial registers from 1515; and in 1539 Francis I. ordered that baptismal registers should also be kept. The Council of Trent (sess. XXIV. cap. 1 and 2, de reform. matris.) instituted marriage registers; and the institution was adopted also in Protestant countries. As, however, the civil law could not well leave it entirely to the Church to decide whether or not in a certain case there existed a real marriage, a French law of Sept. 20, 1792, transferred the whole business of registering to a civil officer; and this change was afterwards introduced in all civilized countries.

CHURCH-WARDENS, lay-officers in the Episcopal Church in England and America, appointed by the united consent of minister and parishioners (in the United States they are elected at Easter), whose duties are to protect the church-building, and provide public worship, and see that it be orderly.

CHURCHING OF WOMEN, or Thanksgiving of Women after Childbirth. The Hebrew idea, that child-bearing was in a sense a defilement which required purification on the fortieth day (Lev. xii.), passed over into the Christian Church, and comes out in Dionysius of Alexandria, the canons of Nicæa, Chrysostom, and Augustine (Quest. in Levit., lib. iii. q. 64). Primitively there were no formularies for this purpose; but there was a service of some sort, at the discretion of the priest. "On the fortieth day the mother and the child, accompanied by the godfather, went solemnly to church. Before the church-door the priest received them, signed the mother with the cross, and said over her several prayers. He then took the child, made the sign of the cross with it, and carried it up to the altar. The godfather then received it from the priest, and left the church" (SMITH'S Dict. Christ. Antiq., in loco). The service as now used in the Greek, Roman, and Episcopal churches, is based upon the Chris-ian idea, that there is honor, not defilement, in motherhood; and women safely delivered are bound to thank God publicly for his mercy in granting them offspring, and in preserving their lives. In the Church of England the title to the office in the first book of Edward VI. was "The Order of the Purification of Women," the old title; but in the second book it was altered to "The Thanksgiving of Women after Childbirth; commonly called the Churching of Women." No set day was appointed for it, but custom would naturally fix upon one. The ceremony prescribed is very simple and beautiful. Some curious information upon this subject will be found in vol. iii. pp. 1751-1763, of the Book of Common Prayer, with Notes by ARCHIBALD JOHN STEPHENS, London, 1854, 3 vols.

CHURCH AND STATE. The relation between Church and State may be conceived of on three different principles,—the supremacy of the Church, the supremacy of the State, and their reciprocal independence of each other. Each of these principles has, in succession, been tried in the history of the Church. The first is the ideal of the Roman-Catholic Church, and has for centuries been the cause of perpetual contests, full of confusion and misery. At one time it seemed to be on the high road to victory; but it finally failed, and it now stands in history as a ghastly spectre from the past. The second was adopted by the Reformed churches as the most, if not the only, practicable issue,—as a convenience, if not as a necessity. But in course of time it proved so ill suited to the strongest demands of the Church, so incapable of satisfying her deepest impulses, that it became an object of many reproaches, and was driven into much compromising, remodelling, and patching up, probably as a preliminary to its entire abandonment. The third finally developed in the United States of America, as the natural result of their free political constitution; and the success which it has already achieved indicates that it has opened a new chapter in the history of the Church,—a chapter of the most decisive interest.

The Christian Church started in the Roman Empire as a forbidden organization, and was, as such, subject to bitter attempts at extinction. In the fourth century, under Constantine the Great, this situation was completely changed. When the Emperor became a Christian, the Christian Church became an active part of the State, like the judicature, or the army, an organ, and that the most vital one,—the heart. Still greater changes soon took place in its external condition, with corresponding effect, of course, on its internal construction. In the East, when the Greek civilization had run out its course, Christianity became the heir of its philosophy; but, in the same degree as it assimilated this its new acquisition, it ceased to be a religion, and became itself a philosophy. Its enthusiasm sprouted out in speculation; its conscience got entangled in dialectics; its wisdom became petrified in mere dogmatics. In the West, by the general decay of the empire, by its division into two empires, by the disintegration of the western empire, the Christian Church was made the heir of the prestige of the city of Rome, for centuries the mistress of the world; and in the same degree as the Church took possession of this its new heirloom it ceased to be a preacher, and became itself a ruler. Most of the good which the Roman-Catholic Church has done for Europe during the dark ages and the middle ages—and the sum total is incalculable—she did, not as the messenger of the gospel, but because she furnished the noblest and the strongest government.

The sources of the immense power which the Church of Rome attained during those ages are by no means a mystery. She was then teaching people the first rudiments, that is, the essential elements, of human nobleness,—to obey, not as the slave or the vanquished, but from love and reverence, and to work, not from greed or any other impulse of egotism, but from gratitude for the faculties given, and for the glory of the giver. She was then gathering into her bosom the most and the best of the genius which was produced. In the feudal world one was born in a castle, on the back of a horse, and with a sword in his hand; another in a hut, crouching on his knees in the dust: and no amount of idiocy or genius could possibly change their lots. But in the ecclesiastical world the gates of the Church stood open to all, to the serf as well as to the king, provided he was a man of upright heart and clear brain, of pure will and strong understanding; and in the Church he was sure to rise according to his gifts and his energy. She was, then, the sole possessor of science and art. All knowledge, from the origin of a thunderstorm to the mysteries of the Trinity, from a song by Horace to the Lord's Prayer, she held; all skill, from the tilling of a vineyard to the rearing of a cathedral, from the curing of a fever to the fabrication of gunpowder, was in her hands. Even the science and art of war did not form an exception. She held, then, the weightiest, the most intelligible, and the only beloved and awe-inspiring title of authority. The king had his sword with what agony of blood and brand might still cling to it, and upon his sword depended all his claim to authority: could anybody dull or break it, so much the better. But the Pope had the prestige of Rome, and on the background of this radiant effulgence the words of the Lord to Peter, his predecessor. To deny this authority, was, indeed, to shut one's self out from what light the world contained, and turn away into utter darkness. Thus the idea that all power on earth emanated from the Church, and centred in the Pope, was the natural and inevitable outcome of history itself, and by no means the dream of a diseased ambition, or the result of a well-contrived fraud. But the idea was one born of time, to be again swallowed by time. In Gregory VII. it became conscious of itself. In Innocent III. it found its most brilliant expression. In Boniface VIII. it already became a desperate struggle on the other side of the line, on the course downwards.

In order to realize this idea, it was necessary, first, to organize the whole mass of the Church into one compact body, independent of those divisions into states into which the secular world was cut up, and, next, to bring the collected force of this one body to bear upon each of the secular divisions individually until the State was actually crushed into submission. The first part of this problem the Roman Church handled with marvellous success. But she never achieved a complete solution; and hence it follows, that she never came to try herself fairly on the second part of the problem. In his contest with Germainy the Pope succeeded in making the papal election completely independent of the Emperor; but with respect to the next step in the process of emancipation, his attempt to make the episcopal election dependent on the papal see alone, he accomplished only a compromise. In spite of such striking scenes as Henry IV. at Canossa standing barefooted, almost naked, for hours and days under the window of the Pope, or the army of Barbarossa before the gates of Rome melting away like snow, vanishing into nothingness, until the victorious emperor must flee, alone, and with no one but Death himself for a groom, the victory was only apparent. The investiture with ring and staff was reserved for the Pope; but the bishops' oath of allegiance to the Emperor, as holders of imperial fiefs, was not abolished. Equally ambiguous was the Pope's victory in his contest with England. The question was, whether the canon law, or the "customs of our fathers," should rule over England; that is, whether, in secular affairs, the English clergy should be amenable to the jurisdiction of the civil courts of the country, or whether, in secular as in spiritual matters, they should be amenable only to the jurisdiction of their own ecclesiastical courts. But though Henry II. was soundly flogged on his bare back by the Canterbury monks before the miracle-working corpse of the murdered Thomas Becket, the English king could never be prevented from dragging into the civil courts the priests who happened to commit murder or theft, and punishing them according to the "customs of our fathers." Thus, although the organization of the Church into one compact body, independent of all secular powers of the States, was carried onwards with triumphant energy, it was never completed; and the result hereof was, that when the Pope attempted to meet the secular power in its own field, and to overawe it by his mere presence, his attempts were looked upon by many contemporaries as a dangerous and unbearable arrogance, and to our times they even assume a somewhat humorous aspect. He pretended to give away the crowns of Naples, of Hungary, indeed, all crowns, even that of the Emperor; but, when he happened to give a crown to a man who had no power of his own to vindicate it, the gift never proved of any value.

The principal reasons, however, why the establishment of a universal church-monarchy failed, were the internal decay of the Church herself, and the rapid development of distinct nationalities in Europe. There came a time, towards the close of the middle ages, when the Church of Rome was not teaching people any more the rudiments of nobleness, but the refinements of crime; when she was not gathering to herself any more the flower of the nations, but filled her ranks with those who were weak and lazy and indifferent; when science and art had gone somewhere else, and even become her bitterest enemies; when her very title of authority was read with incredulity, and laid aside with a smile. By her vices she lost her power; and, the power gone, the idea suggested by it became absurd.

But, even if the Church of Rome had never been found wanting herself in any respect, the idea of a universal church-monarchy would, nevertheless, have proved an impossibility on account of the steadily growing national differentiation of the mass of the subjects. Had Europe been inhabited by one nation, with homogeneous instincts and impulses, homogeneous traditions and aspirations, homogeneous customs and manners, it might still have been sitting quietly in the dark ages, lit up with Roman candles from one end to the other, and no one suspecting the existence of a sun in the world. But as it was a number of nations consolidating themselves, each having its own errand to do, the Church herself became split into many divisions; for the Church is not and can never be, like the imperium Romanum, a mere superstructure which can be stretched across all national differences. With the nations the Church became national; and already, at the Council of Trent, the Pope was compelled to make special arrangements with the special states (see CONCORDAT), which simply amounts to a practical abandonment of the idea of a universal church-monarchy. In the individual states the Pope still continued to exert himself in order to maintain the supremacy of the Church, with what ups and downs may be learned from the concordats with Napoleon I. and Francis Joseph I., with what final result may be inferred from recent events, — the Kulturkampf in Germany, the expulsion of the Congregations in France, etc. But if the Pope now would repeat the famous words of Boniface VIII., "Romanus pontifex omnia jura in scrinio pectoris sui habere censetur," he would simply make the impression of a distracted actor suddenly wandering astray into a wrong part. A striking exposition of the enormous claims which the Pope made, and of the opposition which he met already in the period of the Council of Constance, is found in GERSON'S De potestate ecclesiastica considerationes, written during the sessions of the council, Opera, vol. II. pars II., Antwerp, 1706. Among modern ultramontane writers, see JOSEPH DE MAISTRE: Du Pape, Lyons, 1819.

With the Reformation the principle of the relation between Church and State was completely reversed. The Roman-Catholic Church had tried to make the State her right hand by which to defend her property, temporal and spiritual, from robbers and heretics. The Reformed Church became the left hand of the State, charged with keeping back the citizens from any kind of unruly or immoral behavior. The Church supreme, the State her knight; the State supreme, the Church its servant, — that was the change. It took place in a somewhat different manner in England and on the Continent; but it was essentially the same in both cases, and had the same effect. The maxim "cujus regio, ejus religio," the pithy definition of territorialism, which makes the religion of the people dependent of the religion of the ruler of the country, became the leading principle in all Protestant states on the Continent; and, in spite of a certain roughness of expression, it agrees fully with what we read in the Thirty-nine Articles: "The Queen's Majesty has the chief power in this Realm of England, and other her Dominions, unto whom the chief Government of all Estates of this Realm, whether they be Ecclesiastical or Civil, in all causes doth appertain. . . . They [the princes] should rule all states and degrees committed to their charge by God, whether they be Ecclesiastical or Temporal, and restrain with the civil sword the stubborn and evil-doers" (Article XXXVII.); or in the Westminster Confession of Faith: "The civil magistrate . . . has authority, and it is his duty, to take order, that amity and peace be preserved in the Church, that the truth of God be kept pure and entire, that all blasphemies and heresies be suppressed, all corruptions and abuses in worship and discipline prevented or reformed, and all the ordinances of God duly settled, administered, and observed" (chap. xxiii. sect. III.).

It was Luther's as well as Calvin's view, that the Church should stand free and self-governing under the protection of the State. But the view proved impracticable. When the Protestants cut loose from the old church-moorings, the question was not simply of re-organization, but of self-defence. But the Reformers could go nowhere else for protection than to the secular powers, — what the case would have become in the hands of the people, the Peasants' War showed; and the princes were sure to give no support unless their ideas of reform agreed with those of the Reformers. Thus the power of reform lay practically in the hands of the princes; and the maxim, "whoever rules in the State has the say in religion," became the established rule. Furthermore, as the bishops everywhere protested against the Reformation, the episcopal authority and jurisdiction had, in the Protestant countries, to be conferred on the civil ruler. He became the master of the Church as the Pope had never been. He authorized its creed and rituals; he appointed its ministers and teachers; he held and administered its property without responsibility, etc. The Church became a mere department of his government, a mechanical apparatus, by which he proposed to instil quietness, submissiveness, industry, and good morals in general, into his subjects, just as he distilled money from them by means of the taxing machine. For the theoretical justification of this practice see GROTIUS: De imperio summarum potestatum circa sacra, 1623; PUFFENDORF: De habitu religionis ad vitam civilem, 1672; THOMASIVS: Kirchenrechtlichen Vorträgen, published after his death, 1738; BRENNESSEY: De jure principis circa adliaphora, 1695.

The results to the Church herself, of this her complete subordination to the State, were, first the so-called orthodoxy, a barren pedantry which made it impossible for any one who had not a lawyer's smartness to become a good Christian; and, next, rationalism, which made Christianity an enlightenment of the intellect, a matter of the school merely. The opposition of pietism to orthodoxy did not touch the question of the relation between Church and State; but that opposition did, which, in the third and fourth decades of the present century, arose against rationalism. It claimed that the Church should be a representation of the religious life of the congregation, and it consequently demanded that the congregation should at least have a certain share in the government of the Church. The movement was strongest in Prussia, weakest in Sweden; but it achieved everywhere some results. Elements of presbyterian or synodal government were everywhere introduced, and the movement is still in vigorous progress.

In England the Reformation did not begin from below, but from above, Henry VIII. simply taking the place of the Pope, and, making himself the head of the English Church; and, when it was finally accomplished under Elizabeth, the supremacy of the State was firmly established as the principle of the relation between Church and State. Opposition, however, soon arose, first from the Puritans, and afterwards from other dissenters. The Puritans protested that the Church and the State are two entirely distinct societies; that they ought, therefore, to stand wholly independent of each other; that the Church can in no way rightfully be made subject to the control of the civil magistrate, etc. The opposite view, the theory adopted by the Established Church itself, is represented by HOOKER, Laws of Ecclesiastical Polity, London, 1594, who maintains that Church and State are one and the same society, only contemplated from two different aspects, and that the State, therefore, has a perfect right to legislate for the Church. After a short victory for the Puritans under Cromwell, who, with certain limitations, adopted the principle of toleration, guaranteed free exercise of religion to all who professed faith in God and in Christ Jesus, and forbade all compulsion, by penalties or otherwise, to conform to the Established religion, there followed a violent re-action under Charles II. It is said, that, on account of the Act of Uniformity of 1662, two thousand ministers were ejected, eight thousand laymen imprisoned, and sixty thousand persons made to suffer, in some way or other, for conscience' sake. Finally, however, the Toleration Act of 1688, granting full liberty of worship to all nonconformists excepting Roman Catholics and Unitarians, broke down the main bar obstructing the freedom of the Church; and the progress towards liberty and independence has ever since been uninterrupted, though slow. The act was extended in 1778 to Roman Catholics, and in 1813, to Unitarians. The repeal of the Test Act, etc. (1828-29), gave the dissenters access to Parliament and public offices. The Registration and Marriage Acts of 1836, 1837, and 1844, made the baptisms and marriages performed by dissenting ministers valid before the law. The Reform Bill of 1854 opened the universities of Oxford and Cambridge to dissenting students, etc. Meanwhile, also, the theory changed. In his The Alliance between Church and State, London, 1736, Warburton accepts the Puritan premise, that the Church and the State are distinct societies, but rejects the inference, that, for that reason, they should remain independent of each other, and construes the relation as an alliance, something like a contract social for the sake of mutual advantage. The book is not remarkable for any logical strength in its reasoning; but it is interesting as indicating a decisive step onward in the direction of liberty. Among more recent contributions to the theoretical solution of the question are, S. T. COLERIDGE: On the Constitution of the Church and State according to the Idea of each, London, 1830; THOMAS ARNOLD: Fragment on the Church, unfinished, and published after his death, London, 1844; GLADSTONE: The State in its Relations with the Church, London, 1838, fourth revised edition, 1841; Church Principles considered in their Results, London, 1840; LORD MONTAGUE: The Four Experiments in Church and State, London, 1863.

The principle of independence as the true relation between Church and State was not brought to America by the Puritans. Though they left their native country on account of the tyranny of its church-establishment, they established a state-church themselves no less tyrannical. No man, they enacted, who did not belong to the Church of the Colony, should have the freedom of the Colony. Romanists, Baptists, and others were excluded. Quakers were punished with imprisonment, and, in four cases, even with death. But other denominations were settled in other Colonies,—the Baptists in Rhode Island, the Episcopal Church in Virginia, the Roman Church in Maryland, the Quakers in Pennsylvania, etc.; and when these Colonies were united, and a Constitution was framed for the Union, it was found necessary to secure entire freedom of religion by the provision that "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof." From the Constitution of the Union this principle was gradually introduced into the constitutions of the individual States, so far as it was not found there beforehand. In Virginia it had been established already in 1785; but in Massachusetts it was not completed until 1833, up to which time the Church was still supported in Massachusetts by State taxation; and with the State support followed, of course, a kind of State control. Now, in all the States and Territories (except in Utah), the Church is entirely separated from the secular government, forms her creeds, arranges her rituals, builds and owns her churches, educates and appoints her ministers. In the Mormon Territory of Utah, politics and religion are blended; but other denominations have built churches in Salt Lake City.

CHURCH HISTORY. I. NATURE AND AIM.

—Church history is the largest, and, with the exception of exegesis, the most important, department of theological science or sacred learning. It embraces, in the widest sense, the whole religious development of mankind, from the creation down to the present time, and is continually growing in bulk. In a narrower sense, it is confined to a history of Christianity and the Christian Church from the birth of Christ and the Day of Pentecost, when Christianity made its first appearance in an organized form as distinct from the Jewish religion. The historian has to trace the origin, growth, and fortunes of the Church, and to reproduce its life in the different ages. The value of his work depends upon the degree of its truthfulness, or exact correspondence with the facts. Church history is not a heap of dry bones, but life and power: it is the Church itself in constant motion and progress from land to land, and from age to age, until the whole world shall be filled with the knowledge of Christ. It is the most interesting part of the world's history, as religion is the deepest and most important concern of man, the bond that unites him to God. It embraces the external expansion and contraction of Christianity, or the history of missions and persecutions, the visible organization or Church polity and discipline, the development of doctrine and theology, the worship, with its various rites and ceremonies, liturgies, sacred poetry and music, the manifestations of practical piety, Christian morality, and benevolent institutions: in one word, all that belongs to the inner and outer life of Christianity in the world. It is a panorama of God's dealings with the human race, and man's relations to God under all aspects. It shows the gradual unfolding of the plan of redemption,—a plan of infinite wisdom and goodness, in constant conflict with the Satanic powers and influences which are struggling for the ascendancy, but are doomed to ultimate defeat, and overruled for good. It is the greatest triumph of God's wisdom to bring good out of evil, and to overrule the wrath of man for his own glory and for the progress of truth and righteousness. Church history is a book of life, full of warning and precept, of hope and encouragement.

II. CHURCH HISTORY AND SECULAR HISTORY.

—They differ as Church and State, as Christianity and humanity, as the order of grace and the order of nature; yet they are inseparably connected, and the one cannot be understood without the other. Among the Jews the spiritual and secular history together form one history of theocracy. Both currents intermingle in the Byzantine Empire, in the European States and the Latin Church during the middle ages, in the period of the Reformation, during the colonial period of America, and in all countries where Church and State are united. Gibbon's History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire is in great part also a history of the rise and progress of Christianity, which survived the fall of Old and New Rome, and went forth to conquer the barbarian conquerors by Christianizing and civilizing them. Every history of the papacy is also a history of the German Roman Empire, and vice versa. No history of the sixteenth century can be written without constant reference to the Protestant Reformation and Roman-Catholic reaction. The Puritan settlements of New England are the beginning, alike of the ecclesiastical and secular history of North America. In modern times the tendency is more and more towards separation of the spiritual and temporal powers:

nevertheless, the Church will always be influenced by the surrounding state of civil society, and must adapt itself to the wants of the age, and progress of events; while, on the other hand, the world will always feel the moral influence, the restraining, ennobling, stimulating, purifying, and sanctifying power of Christianity, which works like a leaven from within upon the ramifications of society.

III. SOURCES. — They are mostly written, in part unwritten.

A. The written sources include, (1) The official documents of ecclesiastical and civil authorities, such as acts of councils, creeds, liturgies, hymn-books church-laws, papal bulls and encyclicals. (2) The writings of the personal actors in the history, and contemporary observers and reporters, such as the Fathers for ancient Christianity, the Schoolmen for mediæval, the Reformers and their opponents for the Reformation period. (3) Inscriptions on walls, pictures, churches, tombstones, and other monuments. The history of the Jewish religion has derived much light from modern discoveries of monumental remains in Egypt, Babylon, and Assyria, the deciphering of the hieroglyphic and cuneiform inscriptions, the Moabite stone (1868), and the Siloam inscription in the tunnel of the Kedron Valley at Jerusalem (1880).

B. The unwritten sources are works of Christian art; as churches, chapels, pictures, sculptures, crosses, crucifixes, relics, and other monuments which symbolize and embody Christian ideas. The Roman catacombs, with their vast extent, their solemn darkness, their labyrinthine mystery, their rude epitaphs and sculptures, their symbols of faith, and their relics of martyrdom, give us a lifelike idea of the Church in the period of persecution, its trials and sufferings, its faith and hope, its simple worship, and devoted piety. "He who is thoroughly steeped in the imagery of the catacombs will be nearer to the thoughts of the early Church than he who has learned by heart the most elaborate treatises of Tertullian or Origen." The basilicas are characteristic of the Nicene; the Byzantine churches, of the Byzantine age and the Eastern and Russian Church; the Gothic cathedrals, of the palmy days of mediæval Catholicism; the Renaissance style, of the revival of letters. Even now, most churches and sects can be best appreciated in the localities, and in view of the monuments and the people, where they originated, or have their centre of life and action.

IV. DUTY OF THE HISTORIAN. — (1) He must master the sources in the original languages in which they were written (Greek, Latin, Syriac, and the modern languages of Europe); separating the genuine from the spurious, the original from corruptions and interpolations, sifting the truth from falsehood, the facts from fiction and partisan judgment, comparing the accounts of all actors, friend and foe, narrator, eulogist, advocate, and antagonist, whether orthodox or heretic, whether Christian, Jew, or Gentile, aiming in all this laborious investigation at "the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth." (2) He must, then, reproduce the clearly ascertained facts and results of his investigation in a faithful and lifelike narrative, so as to present the objective course of history itself, as it were, in a photograph, or rather in an artistic painting; for a photograph gives a ghastly view of the momentary look of a person, while the portrait of the artist combines the changing moods and various aspects of his subject into a living whole. The genuine writer of history differs as much from the dry chronicler of isolated facts and dates as from the novelist. He must represent both thoughts and facts. He must particularize and generalize, descend into minute details and take a comprehensive bird's-eye view of whole ages and periods. He must have a judicial mind, which deals impartially with all persons and events coming before his tribunal. He must be free from partisan and sectarian bias, and aim at justice and truth. It is the exclusive privilege of the divine Mind to view all things sub specie æternitatis, and to see the end from the beginning. We can only know things consecutively and in fragments. But history is its own best interpreter; and, the farther it advances, the more we are able to understand and appreciate the past. Historians differ in gifts and vocation. Some are miners, who bring out the raw material from the sources (Flacius, Baronius, Tillemont, Gieseler); others are manufacturers, who work up the material for the use of scholars (Bossuet, Mosheim, Gibbon, Milman, Neander). Some are wholesale merchants, some retailers. Some are bold critics, who open new avenues of thought (Ewald, Baur, Renan); others popularize the results of laborious researches for the general benefit (Hagenbach, Merle, Pressensé, Stanley).

V. PERIODS AND EPOCHS. — These represent the different stages in the religious development of the race. They must not be arbitrarily made, according to a mechanical scheme (such as the centurial division, introduced by Flacius in the Magdeburg Centuries, and followed by Mosheim), but taken from the actual stops or starting-points (which is the meaning of ἐποχή, from ἐπέχω, "to stop," "to pause") and circuits (περίοδοι) of the history itself. The following are the natural divisions: —

A. Sacred or Biblical History, the history of the divine revelation, from the creation to the close of the apostolic age, running parallel with the Scriptures, from Genesis to Revelation. Here we must distinguish the dispensation of the law and the dispensation of the gospel, or the history of the Old-Covenant religion and that of the New-Covenant religion.

(1) Under the Old Dispensation, from the creation down to John the Baptist. Subdivisions: (a) The primitive period; (b) The patriarchal period; (c) The Mosaic period (the establishment of the theocracy); (d) The Judges, the Jewish monarchy and prophets; (e) The Babylonian exile; (f) The period of the restoration (Ezra, Nehemiah, and the post-exilian prophets); (g) The Maccabees; (h) The Roman rule till Herod the Great, and the destruction of Jerusalem.

(2) Under the New Dispensation — Christ and the apostles, or primitive and normative Christianity in its divine-human founder and inspired organs. Subdivisions: (a) The preparatory mission of John the Baptist; (b) The life and work of Christ; (c) The founding of the Church among the Jews and Gentiles by the labors of Peter, Paul, and John.

B. Christian History, or Ecclesiastical History proper, from the close of the apostolic age to modern times. Subdivisions:—

(1) History of Ancient Christianity, embracing the first six centuries to Gregory I. (590): Græco-Latin, Patristic, Catholic, the common stock from which the Greek, the Roman, and the Protestant churches have sprung. Subdivisions: (a) The life of Christ and the apostolic age (see A 2); (b) The age of persecution, to Constantine the Great and the Council of Nicæa (325); (c) The age of patriarchs, Christian emperors, and œcumenical councils (to 590). Some historians carry ancient Christianity down to Charlemagne (A.D. 800) and the beginning of the Holy Roman Empire and the temporal power of the Papacy. In this case we have a fourth subdivision, from Gregory I. to Charlemagne (A.D. 590 to 800). But Charlemagne belongs to the middle ages and the Germanic phase of Christianity.

(2) History of Mediæval Christianity, from the close of the sixth to the beginning of the sixteenth century, or from Gregory the Great (A.D. 590), the first mediæval pope, to Luther (A.D. 1517). Character: The Greek and Roman churches, divided since the controversy of Photius and Pope Nicolas I., pursue their independent course; the Latin Church extending west among the Celtic and Germanic races; the Greek, north-east among the Slavonians (in Russia); conversion of the Northern and Western barbarians; conflicts with Mohammedanism; the crusades; rise and progress of the papacy, scholasticism, mysticism; the reformatory councils of Pisa, Constance, and Basel; revival of letters; invention of printing; discovery of America; biblical theology; forerunners of Protestantism (Wiclif in England, Hus in Bohemia, Savonarola in Italy, Wessel in Holland, etc.) Subdivisions: (a) The missionary period of the middle age, from Gregory I. to Gregory VII. (Hildebrand, A.D. 590-1049); (b) The height of the papal hierarchy, from Gregory VII. to Boniface VIII. (A.D. 1049-1294); (c) The decline of the papacy from Boniface VIII. to Leo X., or Martin Luther (A.D. 1294-1517).

(3) History of Modern Christianity, from the Reformation of the sixteenth century to the present time. Protestantism and Romanism; founding of the various evangelical churches (the Lutheran, Calvinistic, Anglican, etc.); restoration and revival of Romanism; the Council of Trent; Jesuitism; Jansenism; the Puritan conflict in England; the Westminster Assembly; the restoration of the Episcopal Church under Charles II.; the expulsion of the Stuarts; the Edict of Toleration; the organization of the dissenting denominations (Presbyterians, Independents, Baptists, Quakers); the settlement of North America; Pietism and the Moravians in Germany; the Methodist revival in England and the Colonies; the French Revolution, and spread of infidelity; revival of Christian life and missionary zeal; progress and triumph of Ultramontane Romanism (culminating in the Vatican Council, 1870); conflict of faith with rationalism and infidelity; growth of the churches in the United States, on the basis of the voluntary principle; immense activity in theology, literature, missions, and all forms of Christian philanthropy. Subdivisions: (a) The age of the Protestant Reformation, and the Roman-Catholic counter-reformation or re-action (from 1517 to 1648); (b) The age of scholastic and polemic confessionism, in conflict with nonconformity and subjective piety (from the middle of the seventeenth to the middle of the eighteenth century); (c) The age of revolution and revival, and conflict between Christianity and various forms of scepticism and secularism (from Deism in England, and the French Revolution, to our time).

VI. VALUE. — The study of history enables us to understand the present, which is the fruit of the past and the germ of the future. It is the richest storehouse of wisdom and experience. It is the best commentary of Christianity. It is full of comfort and encouragement. It verifies on every page the promise of the Saviour to be with his people always, and to build his Church on an indestructible rock. It exhibits his life in all its forms and phases, and the triumphant march of his kingdom from land to land and generation to generation. Earthly empires, systems of philosophy, have their day; human institutions decay; all things of this world bloom and fade away, like the grass of the field: but the Christian religion has the dew of perennial youth, survives all changes, makes steady progress from age to age, overcomes all persecution from without, and corruption from within, is now stronger and more widely spread than ever before, directs the course of civilization, and bears the hopes of the human race. The history of the world is governed in the interest, and for the ultimate triumph, of Christianity. The experience of the past is a sure guaranty of the future.

VII. LIT. — We confine ourselves here to works on General Church History. (1) Ancient Historians. — EUSEBIUS (d. 340): Church History, from the birth of Christ to Constantine the Great (324); his successors in the Greek Church: SOCRATES, SOZOMEN, THEODORET. The Latin Church contented itself with extracts from Eusebius and his continuators. The middle ages produced most valuable material for history, but no great general church history. The Reformation called forth the spirit of critical inquiry.

(2) Historians from the Sixteenth to the Eighteenth Century. — MATTHIAS FLACIUS (d. 1575) and other Lutheran divines of Germany wrote the Magdeburg Centuries (Basel, 1559-74), covering thirteen Christian centuries in as many volumes, — the first history, from a Protestant point of view, in opposition to the claims of Romanism. In defence of Romanism, and in refutation of Flacius, CÆSAR BARONIUS (d. 1607) wrote Ecclesiastical Annals, in 12 folio vols. (published at Rome, 1588 sqq.; new ed. by Aug. Theiner, Barle-Duc, 1868 sqq.), continued by Raynaldus, Spondanus, Theiner, and others, — a work of extraordinary learning and industry, but to be used with great caution. TILLEMONT (d. 1698), in his invaluable Mémoires (Paris, 1693-1712, 16 vols.), wrote the history of the first six centuries from the sources, in bibliographical style and in the spirit of the more liberal Gallican Catholicism. GOTTFRIED ARNOLD (d. 1714), of the Pietistic school of Spener, in his Impartial History of the Church and of Heretics (Frankfort, 1699 sqq., 4 vols. fol., to A.D., 1688), advocated the interests of practical piety, and the claims of heretics and schismatics, and all those who suffered persecution from an intolerant hierarchy and orthodoxy. J. L. MOSHEIM (d. 1755) wrote his Institutes of Ecclesiastical History (in Latin, Helmstädt, 1753, and often since in several translations) in the spirit of a moderate Lutheran orthodoxy, with solid learning and impartiality, in clear style, after the centurial arrangement of Flacius, and furnished a convenient text-book, which (in the translation of Murdock, with valuable supplements) has continued in use in England and America much longer than in Germany. SCHROECK'S Christian Church History (Leipzig, 1768-1810, in 45 vols.) is far more extensive and far less readable, but invaluable for reference, full of information from the sources. It forsakes the mechanical centurial division, and substitutes for it periodic arrangement. HENKE (d. 1809) followed with a thoroughly rationalistic work in 9 vols. (1788-1810).

(3) Historians of the Nineteenth Century. — NEANDER, a converted Israelite, professor of church history in Berlin (d. 1850), marks an epoch in this branch of theological literature; and by his truly Christian, conscientious, impartial, truth-loving, just, and liberal, and, withal, thoroughly learned and profound spirit and method, he earned the title of "Father of Church History." His General History of the Christian Religion and Church (Hamburg, 1825-52, 11 vols.), though incomplete (it stops with the Council of Basel, 1430), and somewhat diffuse and monotonous in style, is an immortal monument of genius and learning. It pays special attention to the development of Christian life and doctrine, and is edifying as well as instructive. It has been naturalized in England and America by the translation of Professor Torrey (Boston, 1847-52, 5 vols., 12th ed., 1872, new edition with a complete index, 6 vols., 1881), and will long be studied with profit, although in some respects superseded by more recent researches in the first three centuries. Equally valuable, though of an altogether different plan and spirit, is the Church History of GIESLER (Bonn, 1824-56), translated from the German, first by Cunningham in Philadelphia (1846), then by Davidson and Hull in England, and revised and completed by H. B. Smith of New York (1857-80, in 5 vols.). The text is a meagre skeleton of facts and dates; but the body of the work consists of carefully-selected extracts and proof-texts from the sources which furnish the data for an independent judgment. BAUR'S Church History, partly published after his death (Tübingen, 1863 sqq., in 5 vols.), is distinguished for philosophic grasp, critical combinations, and bold conjectures, especially in the treatment of the apostolic and post-apostolic ages, and the ancient heresies and systems of doctrine. HAGENBACH'S Church History (in 7 vols., Leipzig, 1873) is a popular digest of the vast material for the educated lay reader. SCHIAFF'S History of the Christian Church (New York, 1859 sqq., German ed., Leipz., 1868), 3 vols., till A. D. 600, to be completed in 5 or 6 vols., is written from the Anglo-German and Anglo-American standpoint. A new edition of the first volume, thoroughly reconstructed, will be published 1882, together with a volume on the middle ages. England has produced greater works on special departments (as Gibbon, on The Decline and Fall, etc.; Milman, on Latin Christianity; Stanley, on The Jewish Church and The Eastern Church; Farrar, on The Life of Christ and The Apostle Paul) than on general church history. WADDINGTON represents the general history, in six volumes, to the Reformation inclusive (1835 sqq.); superseded by JAMES C. ROBERTSON'S History of the Christian Church to the Reformation, in 3 vols., 1854 sqq., new ed. 1875, in 8 small vols. The older work of MILNER (d. 1797) is written in popular style for edification. The most valuable contributions of modern English scholarship to ancient church history are found in SMITH & CHEETHAM, Dictionary of Christian Antiquities, London, 1875, 1880, 2 vols., and in SMITH & WACE, Dictionary of Christian Biography, London, 1877 sqq., to be completed in 4 vols. The largest Roman-Catholic church history of recent times is Abbé ROUBACHER'S Histoire universelle de l'Eglise cathol., Paris, 1842 sqq., 25 vols.

CHURCH, States of the (Patrimonium Petri; Stato della Chiesa), the region occupying the central part of Italy, between Tuscany and Naples, and once forming an independent state, of which the Pope was the sovereign. This sovereignty of the Pope was not, as Roman-Catholic writers like to represent it, a striking providential arrangement: on the contrary, it was a long and laborious growth of a rather vicious character. The prominence which the Roman episcopacy very early obtained was a natural and necessary consequence of the position which the city of Rome held in the empire. Nothing in Rome could be second-rate; and, from the moment Christianity became the religion of the State, the Roman bishop naturally and necessarily became the centre of Christendom. It was only through reflection that Jerusalem could be any thing grand and awe-inspiring to people of Greek and Roman descent. The congregation of Rome was the largest already in the third century: in the fourth it also became the richest. It commanded respect by itself, independently of its being the representative of the metropolis of the world. The donation of Constantine is a mere fable. Constantine did not move his residence to Constantinople in order to give room in Rome for the "spiritual emperor;" nor did he cede the city of Rome, or the provinces of Italy, or the whole western part of the empire, to the Pope. The instrument of this bequest is a forgery of the ninth century; and, though the Pope had people burnt at Strassburg in 1478 for saying so, that century did not run out before Laurentius Valla and Ariost had made the hollow pretension the laughing-stock of Europe. But by a decree of 321 Constantine allowed the Christian Church to receive bequests by will; and the Bishop of Rome soon became one of the largest landed proprietors of the realm. Estates in Italy, Gaul, and Spain, were bequeathed to him; and to this solid wealth privileges and immunities were added by Gratian, Valentinian III., and others. His money helped him to enforce his authority, and his authority helped him to multiply his money. Still there were as yet no traces of any sovereignty in the Pope's position. For centuries after the alleged "donation of Constantine," he remained a humble subject, and much too often even a humble servant, of the emperor.

But circumstances were already preparing for the coming sovereignty. The removal of the imperial residence to Constantinople left an empty space in Rome; and on thousands of occasions, each, perhaps, very insignificant by itself, the Pope stepped in to fill the void. The idea of a spiritual empire, the condition of a temporal sovereignty, was fully developed, and ready to be acted upon, with Gregory the Great (590-604). Actual opportunities were neither lacking nor neglected. The storms before which the Western Empire finally fell, the continuous invasions of Italy by barbarous tribes, the feeble rule which the Byzantine emperors exercised in Italy, and the still feebler defence which they could give the country,—every thing tended to gather the people of Rome around their bishop as their natural leader, and to allure the bishop into the political field, first as a mediator who deserved his reward, then as an ally who demanded his recompense. Gregory II. received in 728 the city of Sutri from Liutprand, the king of the Lon-bards; and this is the first possession which the popes held independently of the emperor. Zacharias received in 742, from the same hand, the cities of Amelia, Orta, Bomarzo, and Bieda, which had been taken from the exarchate. The Pope's relations to the Lombard king were by no means safe, however. Gregory III. (731-741) had been compelled to ask for the interference of Charles Martel; and Stephan II. (752-757) was compelled to ask Pepin the Short for direct protection. As Stephan had given Pepin most valuable aid in the acquisition of the Frankish crown, Pepin went to Italy with a great army, defeated the Lombard king, Aistulph, conquered the whole exarchate and the Pentapolis (Rimini, Pesaro, Fano, Sinigaglia, and Ancona), and conferred the conquests on Stephan. This splendid donation, the real foundation of the temporal sovereignty of the Pope, was repeated, and confirmed in 774 by Charlemagne, who completely destroyed the Lombard rule in Italy. The instruments of Pepin's and Charlemagne's donations are not extant, and the real extent of the bequest is somewhat doubtful. The general character, however, of the gift, cannot be questioned: it was a fief. In 800 Leo III. severed the last bond between the papal see and the Byzantine Empire by crowning Charlemagne Roman emperor; and from that moment the Pope stands in the political field as a vassal of the Frankish Empire.

Immediately after the death of Charlemagne (814), the dissolution of the empire began. But, as the strength of the central government became weakened, the power of the feudal lords or fief-holders increased, and the popes were not slow in taking advantage of the situation. Nicholas I. (858-867) is said to have changed his mitre into a crown; and when Charles the Fat, the last emperor of the Carolingian house, was deposed (in 887), the papal independence became an accomplished fact. Thus the step from simple subjection to complete sovereignty was successfully made through a short, intermediate stage of vassalage. But to hold this new position proved exceedingly difficult in the beginning. First followed a century of shameless intrigue and scandalous fighting,—the period of the Pornocracy. The Pope was elected, not by the clergy alone, but by the clergy and people of Rome; and each election was disputed by factions led by foreign and native adventurers. Sergius III. (905-911) was simply the paramour of Marozin of Tuscany, and for her sake he prostituted the dignity of the apostolic see, and squandered its treasures. The disorder continued till the emperor, Henry III. (in 1046), marched into Italy with a great army, deposed the three pretenders at the Council of Sutri, and seated Clement II. on the papal throne: in 1052 he ceded the Duchy of Benevent to Leo IX., a relative of his. Then followed two centuries of bitter contest with the emperors of Germany, the most brilliant and most dramatic part of the history of the Papacy. In this contest the papal sovereignty did not form the principal issue; but through the whole period it exercised a considerable influence on the windings of the papal policy, and at times it actually occupied the foreground; thus, when the Countess Mathilde of Tuscany, in whose Castle of Canossa Gregory VII. received the homage of Henry IV. (1077), bequeathed all her possessions to the Pope. She died 1115; but her will was immediately disputed by the German emperors, and the question was not decided until the days of Innocent III. (1198–1216), when Otho IV. recognized the Pope's claim. A change, which in this period took place in the mode of electing the Pope, contributed much to consolidate the papal sovereignty. By a decree of 1059 Nicholas II. reserved the right of electing the Pope exclusively to the college of cardinals; and in 1179 Alexander III. further decreed, that a majority of two-thirds of the votes was necessary to make the election valid. Through the contest with the emperors of Germany the papal power reached its culmination. It was accepted as an undisputed fact, as a moral certainty, that in no case could there be an authority above the Pope; and only the next question was left open, — whether there could be a case in which the Pope had no authority. During the last three centuries, however, preceding the Reformation, the papal sovereignty was often in danger, but only from interior or domestic causes. Every now and then the memory of the past would flash upon the people of Rome, and cause turbulent commotions. Arnold of Brescia was the first of those heroes from Hades; and Lucius II. was massacred in the streets of Rome (1145). Cola di Rienzo (1354) was the last; and his failure was his own fault. Clement VI. and Innocent VI. sat doubtful and powerless at Avignon. Equally dangerous were the feuds and rebellions of the great families, — the Colonnas, Orsinis, Frangipanis, etc. They drove the sovereign from his capital; they caused schisms; and at times the Pope had only a very feeble hold on his own territory. Nevertheless, in the papal monarchy, as in most other European monarchies, the contest between the sovereign and the large fief-holders ended with the victory of the former; and, at the beginning of the Reformation, the Pope was not only in sure and quiet possession of the states of the Church, but he had even found opportunity to enlarge them. Philippe III. gave Venaissin in 1273 to Gregory X.; Clement VI. bought Avignon in 1348 from Queen Johanna of Sicily; Julius II. (1503–12) acquired Parma, Piacenza, and Reggio, etc.

From the Reformation the Papacy received a shock from which it never recovered, and which affected it in all its manifestations, also in the temporal sovereignty of the Pope. This sovereignty has another basis than royalty. It rests upon the spiritual supremacy, the infallibility, of the Pope; and the moment this infallibility, this spiritual supremacy, is understood to be a mere nightmare upon the moral and intellectual development of Christendom, the temporal sovereignty of the Pope becomes something merely incidental, which may last a thousand years, or one hour, according to circumstances. The strange light which the Reformation threw upon the Papacy had its effect, and the effect became apparent at the conclusion of the peace of Westphalia (1648). The Pope protested against this official recognition of a Christendom outside of the Roman Catholic Church; but no regard was paid to his protest. His position in the political system of Europe was shaken, if not already ruined; and now little was thought of his sovereignty within his own dominion, the squabble between Louis

XIV. and Innocent XI. (1676–89) shows. When, towards the close of the eighteenth century, the great ideas began to move, the Pope, as the sovereign of the states of the Church, was simply treated as people treat an inconvenience, — with a mixture of patience, indifference, and contempt. France occupied Avignon and Venaissin in 1792, and, in 1796, Ferrara, Bologna, and the Romagna, which, by the Peace of Tolentino (Feb. 19, 1797), were incorporated with the Cisalpine Republic. Next year (Feb. 15, 1798) the Republic was declared in the forum of Rome; and Pius VI. was deposed, and bereft of all temporal power. Once more, however, the Pope came into possession of his sovereignty. The Congress of Vienna, whose principal task was to undo what Napoleon I. had done, re-established the states of the Church, nearly with their old boundaries; and for about a decade every thing went on smoothly. But, since the French Revolution, people in Europe had generally got some sense for good government, and the papal government was as bad as it possibly could be. The administration of justice was as corrupt as the administration of the finances was stupid. Commerce and industry died out; science and art sickened; the country filled up with thieves and brigands; and riots became of daily occurrence. From 1832 to 1838 an Austrian army-corps occupied Bologna, and a French one Ancona, to preserve order. In 1848 the riots grew into a blazing revolution. Pius IX. fled to Gaeta, in the Neapolitan territory, and did not return until 1850, under the protection of a French army. Meanwhile a new great idea — the national unity — had begun to enter men's minds, and within a few years it swept away the papal sovereignty as a spider's web. In 1860 the States of the Church, with the exception of the city of Rome, were incorporated with the Kingdom of Italy; and in 1870 Victor Emmanuel took up his residence in Rome itself. The sovereignty of the Pope, if there still is any thing in existence which can be thus called, is now confined to the Palace of the Vatican.

CHYTRÆUS (Kochhufe), David, b. at Ingelfingen, Feb. 26, 1530; d. at Rostock, June 25, 1600; studied, under Camerarius and Schnepf, at Tübingen, and, under Melancthon, in Wittenberg; travelled in Italy, and was made professor at Rostock, in 1551; lectured on philosophy and theology, and distinguished himself as one of the most influential of the Lutheran theologians of the latter part of the sixteenth century. In 1569 he visited Austria, on the invitation of Maximilian II., for the purpose of organizing the evangelical church of the country. He was one of the chief directors at the foundation of the University of Helmstädt, and wrote the statutes. His theological works, among which are Onomasticon Theologicum, an Historia Confessionis Augustanæ, etc., were collected in 2 vols. fol., Leipzig, 1599. He also wrote a Chronicon Saxonica, 1500-95. His biography has been written by STURZ (Rostock, 1601), SCHÜTZ (Hamburg, 1720), PRESSER (Elberfeld, 1862), and KRABBE (Rostock, 1870).

CIBORIUM (from the Greek κιβώριον) denoted originally the canopy, which, borne by four columns, surmounted the altar, but was afterwards specially applied to the shrine or vessel in which the host was kept, which occasioned the erroneous derivation from cibus ("food").

CILICIA, the south-easterly province of Asia Minor, having Cappadocia on the north, from which it is separated by the Taurus and Anti-Taurus Range, Syria on the east, the Mediterranean Sea on the south, and Pamphylia on the west. Eastern Cilicia was a rich plain. Western Cilicia was rough and mountainous. Tarsus, the home of Paul, was its capital, and there was a famous school of philosophy. The province contained many Jews. There are many references to it in Acts (see vi. 9, xv. 23, 41, xxi. 39, xxii. 3, xxiii. 34, xxvii. 5; also Gal. i. 21). The goat's-hair cloth, called cilicium, was one of its products: to make tents of this was Paul's trade. The word, in a slightly modified form, exists to-day in modern European languages, to describe this article, which is still produced.

CIRCUMCELLIANS. See DONATISTS.

CIRCUMCISION, the cutting-away of the whole or of parts of the prepuce, was, in the oldest times, performed with a stone knife, both among the Israelites and the Egyptians (Exod. iv. 25; Josh. v. 2); and other nations adhered to this custom, even after becoming acquainted with sharper instruments; while in later times the Jews employed a steel knife. The operation was not without danger, especially when performed on adults. The third day was feared as the day of the crisis (Gen. xxxiv. 25). Every Israelite was allowed to perform the rite, but no Gentile. Generally it was the office of the father (Gen. xvii. 23); only under certain circumstances it became that of the mother (Exod. iv. 25; 1 Macc. i. 60). Afterwards it became the business of the physician, and at present it is performed by a special officer. According to Gen. xvii. 10-14, circumcision was laid upon Abraham, his seed, and his servants, as a direct commandment from God; and the penalty of neglect was, to be cut off from the people. The Mosaic law speaks only incidentally of it as something already established. According to Lev. xii. 3, the eighth day after the birth of a boy was the term fixed for the performance of the rite. If the child was ill, the rite could be postponed, however. The old Egyptians performed it between the sixth and tenth year; the Mohammedans of our days often wait till the twelfth or thirteenth year. With the Israelites, the naming of the child takes place together with the circumcision (Luke i. 59, ii. 11; comp. Gen. xvii. 5).

Besides by the Israelites, circumcision was practised, not only by the Terachitian peoples, such as the Edomites, Ammonites, Moabites (Jer. ix. 25, the interpretation of the passage is somewhat doubtful, however), but also by the Egyptians. Herodotus (2, 36, and 2, 104), and, after him, Diodorus and Strabo, even assert that the custom was original among the latter; while the Phœnicians and the "Syrians of Palestine" (the Jews) simply adopted it; a statement which even Josephus does not see fit to contradict (Cont. Ap., 2, 13). That the Egyptians should have learnt the practice from the Israelites cannot be maintained, on account of the great age of the Egyptian monuments representing the custom. In Egypt, however, it seems that only the sacerdotal caste was compelled by law to observe the rite. Josephus, Clement of Alexandria, Origen, and others, indicate that such was the case; and Apion, the adversary of Josephus, was himself an uncircumcised Egyptian, and submitted to the operation only late in life, and for physical reasons. The probability is, that the Israelites adopted the custom from the Egyptians; but, as intimate connections existed between the two nations long before the time of Moses, it is unjustifiable, and in contradiction with the whole Hebrew tradition, to place the establishment of the institution of circumcision among the Israelites after the exodus, in the times of Moses or Joshua. After the captivity, the Edomites remained uncircumcised until John Hyrcanus compelled them to re-introduce the rite, as did Aristobulus among the Ituræans (JOSEPH. : Ant., 13, 9, 1, and 13, 11, 3). Among the nations with which the Israelites had to deal, the Philistines are most frequently spoken of as uncircumcised; and, among the prophets, Ezekiel most strongly emphasizes the state of non-circumcision as a feature of heathenism. Among the nations practising circumcision, Herodotus also mentions the Colchians, a colony from Egypt, and the Ethiopians and Phœnicians. The Coptian and Habesynian Christians still retain the rite; and by Islam, which found it in general use among the Arabs, it was introduced to the Persians, Turks, and Hindoos. The custom is also found among nations which have no traceable connection with any form of ancient civilization; as, for instance, among the Congo Negroes and Caffrarians in Africa, the Salivas Indians in South America, the inhabitants of Otaheiti and the Fiji Islands, etc.

With respect to the symbolical signification of the rite, a distinction must be made between Israel and the heathen religions. Even if it could be proved, that, among the Egyptians, circumcision originated from the phallus-worship, this would have no bearing on the Israelite view of the rite. Nor can the rite be brought in connection with the idea of sacrifice (as a remnant of an ancient self-sacrifice, sacrifice of the body, castration in honor of the Deity, etc.); for sacrifice means the selection of something pure for the service of God, and not the destruction of something impure for the sake of God. But to the Israelite the foreskin was a token of human impurity and uncleanness, and circumcision was an act of purification and cleanliness. Other Oriental peoples considered the act from the same point of view, as, for instance, the Egyptians (HERODOTUS, 2, 37; comp. PHILO: De Circumcisione, 2, 211). The Arabs of to-day call the operation tawár, talhár, "purification." Thus the idea of bodily cleanliness forms the very basis, among the Israelites, for the religious rite of circumcision. But the idea of bodily cleanliness gradually grew into that of spiritual purity, such as was demanded of the chosen people of God: hence such expressions as those in Jer. vi. 10; Lev. xxvi. 41, etc.: the non-circumcision of the ear, the heart, etc. Finally, the act became the external token of the covenant between God and his chosen people, and has been designated as the patents of nobility of the Jews. As such it was the rite of admittance into Israel,—the rite by which a convert entered the synagogue, and without which he was not allowed to participate in the Paschal feast. In spite, however, of the exertions of the Judæa-Christians, it was dropped by the Christian Church, whose corresponding rite of admission is baptism.

CIRCUMCISION, Feast of. See OCTAVE.

CISTERCIANS, a monastic order founded by Robert, at Cîteaux near Dijon, in Burgundy, on the Day of St. Benedict, 1098. Robert, who at an early age had become Prior of the Monastery of St. Michel de Tonnerre, but felt unable to reform the loose and frivolous life of his monks, obtained dispensation from Pope Urban II., then travelling in France, and preaching the first crusade, to retire, at the head of a small colony of hermits, into the forest of Molesme, in the diocese of Langres, for the purpose of leading a life of austere asceticism. The colony prospered; but the reverence of the surrounding population, and the more substantial favors which followed in its wake, brought vanity and irregularities into the hermits' camp; and Molesme was soon as bad as St. Michel de Tonnerre. A second time Robert tried a change, and retired to Haure, a desert in the neighborhood. But the monks of Molesme would not lose their abbot; and the Bishop of Langres compelled him to return. Later on, however, he obtained permission of the papal legate, Archbishop Hughes of Lyons, to retire to Cîteaux, in the diocese of Châlons, where he formed a settlement of twenty hermits, who bound themselves to a strict observance of the rules of St. Benedict. The undertaking proved eminently successful. Count Odo built a monastery, and the Bishop of Châlons made Robert abbot. Donations came in plentifully, and it was apparent that Robert was destined to become an ornament to the diocese in which he lived. But this roused the envy of the Bishop of Langres, so much the more as the rise of Cîteaux would surely become the fall of Molesme; and, through the Pope, he compelled Robert to leave Cîteaux in 1099, and return to Molesme, where he died in 1108.

At Cîteaux Robert was succeeded by Alberic, and Alberic's first great task was to make his monastery independent of Molesme. Delegates, with letters of recommendation from the Bishop of Langres, the Archbishop of Lyons, etc., were sent to Rome; and in 1100, by a special bull, Paschalis II. placed the Monastery of Cîteaux directly under the papal authority. Shortly after, Alberic issued the Statuta Monachorum Cisterciensium, in which a strict observance of the rules of St. Benedict is adopted as the leading principle; and gradually the monks of Cîteaux assumed the position as the reformed, or as the only true Benedictines. They got a costume of their own. At first they were gray or tau-colored, like the monks of Molesme: but one night the Virgin descended from heaven, and presented Alberic with a white garment, and from that moment the Cistercians always appeared in white in the choir, and in black in the streets; hence the names of White-, Black-, and Gray-Friars. Nevertheless, a strict observance of the rules of St. Benedict may mean very much as a maxim of conduct, and very little as a principle of life. The example set by the Cistercians was much admired, but it was not followed. When Alberic died (in 1109), the ranks of his monks had been fearfully thinned out; and his successor, Stephan Harding, an Englishman, was in great fear that Cîteaux should die out without having had one single novice. Then came the living principle with St. Bernard.

Instinctively the Monastery of Cîteaux had formed itself as an opposition to Clugny. Clugny was wealthy and magnificent: at Cîteaux every kind of display was banished. The crucifix was of wood, the candlesticks of iron, the censers of copper; no gold, no silver. This austerity attracted St. Bernard. When he and his thirteen friends determined to renounce the world, and devote their lives to the service of God, they entered Cîteaux, and not Clugny. But in St. Bernard, asceticism was represented, not as a penance, but as an enthusiasm; not as a cross, but as a glory; and the influence produced by this most extraordinary phenomenon was at once instantaneous and overwhelming. Such a number of monks crowded to Cîteaux, that, within two years after the admission of St. Bernard (in 1113), Abbot Stephan had to found four new monasteries,—La Ferté, Pontigny, Clairvaux, and Morimond. In 1119 the number of Cistercian abbeys had increased to thirteen; in 1151, to five hundred; in the middle of the thirteenth century, to eighteen hundred. In 1119 the constitution of the order, the Charta Caritatis, was issued by Abbot Stephan, and confirmed by Pope Calixtus II. One of the principal points of this constitution was the establishment of the order entirely independent of the episcopal power, and directly under the papal authority; and the co-operation between the order and the Pope was at times complete. Eugenius III. belonged to the order, and was a pupil of St. Bernard. Led by St. Bernard, and following the Pope, the order occupied one of the very first places in the Christian world. It crushed the heretics, Abelard, Arnold of Brescia, the Cathari, etc.; it preached the second crusade; it called into life the military orders of the Templars, of Calatrava, Alcantara, Montesa, Avis, and Christ. In 1143 the kingdom of Portugal declared itself a fief of the Abbey of Clairvaux; and in 1578 the abbey actually tried to make good its claims.

By the middle of the thirteenth century the order had passed its point of culmination. It lost its historical mission, which was inherited by the mendicant orders; and the internal decay of the rich and proud institution soon became apparent. One of the first attempts of reform was made by Martin de Vargas in Spain, supported by Pope Martin V. (1426); and in 1469 an independent Spanish congregation was formed on the basis of extreme asceticism. Similar attempts were made a little later in Tuscany, Calabria, and the Papal States. In France, its home, the order suffered very much during the wars with England; and all the attempts of reform which were made during the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries failed. In the sixteenth and seventeenth century, independent congregations were formed, — the Feuillants, the Trappists, etc., which see. The first Cistercian nunnery was founded at Tart, probably by Abbot Stephan; but the most famous was that of Port Royal.

CITIES. Cities date from the days of Cain (Gen. iv. 17). In this article we consider only those of Palestine. The Hebrew word shows that originally they were walled, and thus were in contrast to the unwalled villages and the open country. In the walls were gates, over which were towers (2 Sam. xviii. 21 sq.). Immediately inside of the gate was a wide open space, known as the "gate." Here councils and public gatherings were held (Gen. xxxiii. 10, 18; Deut. xxi. 19 sq.; Ruth iv. 1, 11; Isa. xxix. 21 sq.): here, too, one went to learn the news (1 Sam. iv. 18; Job xxix. 7). The gates were provided with posts and bars (Judg. xvi. 3; 1 Sam. xxiii. 7; 1 Kings iv. 13). From the gate the streets led into the city, which, like those of modern Palestine, were probably narrow and unpaved, and distinctively business streets or bazaars; as the "Street of the Bakers" referred to in Jer. xxxvii. 21. The names of the Palestinian cities have almost always a reference to their situation, founding, or history. Many old names were altered, as Luz became Bethel (Gen. xxviii. 19). This frequently happened in Roman times, when the original names were romanized or grecized; but in most instances the old name exists to the present day, and only in few cases has the Romano-Greek name crowded out the old. ARNOLD.

CITIES OF REFUGE were six Levitical cities appointed by the Mosaic law as asylums, to any one of which unintentional manslaughter might flee for protection, and therein remain, or in the circuit of one thousand yards around it, until the death of the high priest (Num. xxxv. 4–34; Deut. iv. 41, 42, xix. 1–13; Josh. xx. 2, 7, 8). These cities, however, afforded no safety to wilful murderers; and, if the authorities decided the fugitive to be such, he was given up to the avenger of blood, on the demand of the elders of his own city. The roads to these cities of refuge were kept clear, and finger-posts indicated plainly the way. See the interesting tale, The Wood-cutter of Lebanon, by A. L. O. E. See AVENGER OF BLOOD.

CITIZENSHIP. 1. AMONG THE HEBREWS. The more distinctly the idea of being the chosen people, the people of the Lord (Judg. v. 11), the people of God (Judg. xx. 2), the congregation of the Lord (Num. xvi. 3), the holy people of the Lord (Deut. vii. 6), etc., developed in Israel, the more strictly the nation separated itself from other nations; though that particularism and narrow pride which afterwards characterized the Jews were fruits of a later growth, and resulted chiefly from the harsh treatment they experienced from the Pagans. Generally, citizenship was obtained by being born of Israelite parents; and the more special means by which the individual came into full possession of the whole dignity and holiness of the congregation were the circumcision, the Passover, and the Sabbath. Any neglect or breach of the duties of citizenship was severely punished with penance, and even with death.

Foreigners were allowed to live in Israel, both singly and in whole congregations (Josh. ix. 27; comp. Deut. xx. 10). Especially since the time of Solomon, many foreigners settled in the cities of Judah as merchants and tradesmen; 2 Chron. ii. 17 gives their number as 153,600. They became a kind of half-citizens, and had many rights in common with the Israelites. They could not hold real estate; but their lives and personal property were protected (Num. xxxv. 15; Deut. i. 16, xxiv. 17). They were compelled, however, to comply with certain of the most general laws of the land, — the sabbath, abstinence from blood, etc. (Exod. xii. 40; Lev. xvi. 29, xvii. 8, etc.). Entire strangers had no rights in Israel: they were only tolerated. Originally, foreigners could, under certain restrictions, obtain citizenship in Israel: only Ammonites, Moabites, the offspring of prostitution, etc., were excluded. Egyptians and Edomites could be nationalized in the third generation (Deut. xxiii. 1; Neh. xiii. 1). Afterwards, however, with the growing fanaticism, it was attempted to exclude all foreigners from citizenship in Israel. RUETSCHL.

2. AMONG THE ROMANS. The Roman idea of citizenship — that of a privileged class amidst a world of slaves — had no existence among the Hebrews; for their commonwealth was a congregation, and their ruler was God: men governed merely as God's vicegerents. But Roman citizenship is several times spoken of in the Acts as a valuable franchise. It was obtained by inheritance or purchase (Acts xxii. 28), by military service, favor, or manumission. It conferred the right of trial before imprisonment, and of appeal unto Caesar (xxv. 11). Its possessors could not lawfully be scourged (xvi. 37), much less crucified. Tradition, which puts the martyrdoms of Peter and Paul on the same day, respects Paul's Roman citizenship, and makes him die by the sword.

CLAP, Thomas, a president of Yale College, b. at Scituate, Mass., June 26, 1703; d. in New Haven, Jan. 7, 1767. He was graduated at Harvard College, 1722, and was minister of Windham, Conn., 1726–39, and president of Yale College, 1739–66. He was one of the most learned men of his day in the country: eminent as a mathematician, he constructed the first orrery in America. His devotion to Yale College was very great. The Code of Laws (in Latin) which he drew up for its government was the first book printed in New Haven. Although, as was universally acknowledged, a truly pious man, he opposed Whitefield, and against him wrote, A Brief History and Vindication of the Doctrines received and established in the Churches of New England, with a Specimen of the New Scheme of Religion beginning to prevail (1755). His opposition caused so much feeling, that in deference he resigned his office. His Annals or History of Yale College appeared in 1766.

CLARENDON, Constitutions of, is the name given to the laws made by the general council of English barons and prelates held at Clarendon, a royal summer residence near Salisbury, Wiltshire, and subscribed to by the bishops, with the exception of Becket, Jan. 25, 1164. They are a monument in the line of upward progress; because they checked the encroachment of the Church upon the State, put clerics guilty of crime under the civil tribunals, prevented all appeal to Rome, and made Henry II. the virtual "head of the Church." See BECKET, THOMAS. The Constitutions are in sixteen chapters, of which ten were condemned by the Pope: the rest were tolerated.

CLARE, St., and the CLARISSSES. Clara Sciffi, b. at Assisi, 1194, d. there Aug. 11, 1253, belonged to a distinguished family, but left her home in 1212 to follow St. Francis; practised, under his guidance, the severest asceticism; founded the order of the Nuns of St. Clare, or the Clarisses; and was canonized by Alexander IV. shortly after her death. The order received its rule from St. Francis in 1224, enjoining absolute poverty, temporary silence, fasting, etc. This rule was mitigated in 1246 by Innocent IV., and again in 1264 by Urban IV., after whom those who adopted only the mildest form of the rule were called Urbanists. In the fifteenth century, however, the development took the very opposite direction. Colette of Corbie (d. 1447) founded the Congregation of St. Colette, whose members bound themselves to a strict observance of the original rule. In 1631 Francisca of Jesus Maria, belonging to the house of Farnese, founded the Congregation of the Strictest Observance; and in 1676 Peter of Alcantara founded the Congregation of the Hermitesses of Alcantara, both of which went still farther in austere asceticism. Sanct.*, and BUTLER: Lives of Saints, Aug. 12; and the biographies of St. Clare, by VITALIS, Milan, 1646; STÖCKLER, Vienna, 1675; VAUCHOT, Paris, 1782; ORSBACH, Aix-la-Chapelle, 1844; DE MORE, Marseilles, 1848; and LOCATELLI, Naples, 1854.

CLARKE, Adam, the commentator, b. at Moybeg, north of Ireland, 1760 or 1762; d., of cholera, in London, Aug. 26, 1832. From 1782 to 1805 he travelled as a Methodist itinerant; preached over all Great Britain and Ireland. From 1805 to 1815 he held an appointment in London, his stay being prolonged by the special request of the British and Foreign Bible Society in order that he might continue to superintend the printing of their Arabic Bible. From 1815 till his death he devoted himself to literary work. In 1808 St. Andrew's University made him LL.D.

He was a most industrious student, and acquired much varied and profound learning, particularly in Oriental languages, and wrote many elaborate works, of which the principal are, A Bibliographical Dictionary, Liverpool, 1802, 6 vols.; The Bibliographical Miscellany, or Supplement to the Bibliographical Dictionary, London, 1806 (both works were published anonymously); Succession of Sacred Literature, vol. i., London, 1808 (vol. ii. by his son, 1830); and his widely circulated and still used Commentary on the Holy Bible, London, 8 vols., of which vol. i. appeared in 1810, vol. viii., 1826, and which cost him forty years of work. See Memoirs, edited by his son J. B. B. CLARKE, London, 1833, 3 vols.; EVERETT: Adam Clarke Portrayed, London, 1843; 2d ed., 1866, 2 vols.

CLARKE, John, a founder of Rhode Island, b. in Bedfordshire, Eng., Oct. 8, 1609; d. in Newport, April 20, 1676. He joined Roger Williams's colony, and at Newport, 1644, founded the second Baptist church in America. He was, with Williams, in 1651 sent to England as an agent of the Colony, and published in 1652 the famous tractate, All News from New England, or a Narrative of New England's Persecution (4to, 76 pp.).

CLARKE, Samuel, the English philosopher and divine, b. at Norwich, Oct. 11, 1675; d. in London, Saturday, May 17, 1729. He studied at Caius College, Cambridge, and greatly distinguished himself by publishing in 1697 a Latin version of Rohault's Physics, whose system was founded upon Cartesian principles, with notes derived from Sir Isaac Newton. Having chosen the clerical profession, he rose rapidly, until in 1709 he became rector of St. James's, Westminster, London. He was the author of numerous works, several of a scientific nature; but his fame chiefly rests upon his Boyle Lectures (1704-1705), printed together under the title, A Discourse concerning the Being and Attributes of God, etc., and his Scripture Doctrine of the Trinity (1712), a work which exposed him to the charge of Arianism. Dr. Clarke's famous proof for the being of God was not meant to be a purely a priori argument: it starts from a fact,—"something has existed from eternity,"—and often directly appeals to facts. Among other propositions maintained, is that time and space, eternity and immensity, are not substances, but the attributes of a self-existent being. And it is incorrect, although commonly said, that Clarke argued from the existence of time and space to the existence of Deity: rather, he presupposed the existence of an immutable, independent, and necessary being, before time and space. Nor could the opinion have been borrowed from the Scholium Generale of Newton's Principia, which was not printed till 1714.

Clarke's theory of virtue was briefly this. The inherent and necessary difference between things causes them to stand in different relations. These relations "make it fit that both creature and creator should act in accordance with them, separately from any command of the Creator, or any foreseen advantage or disadvantage which may follow such actions. It is fit, however, that the Creator should enforce this fitness by his positive commands, and by rewards and punishments. Inasmuch as the original tendency of things to reward virtue, and to punish vice, has failed to be effectual in the present condition of human existence, there must be a future state of existence for men in order that this adjustment may be complete."

Clarke has been accused of confounding mathematical and moral relations, and of meaning by "fitness" merely the adaptation of means to an end. But the charges are not well founded. What is true is, that he states an analogy between mathematical and moral truths, and means by "fitness" accordance to a standard of judgment.

His Works, prefaced with a biography by Bishop Hoadley, were published in 4 vols. fol., London, 1738. See also Hunt's Religious Thought in England, particularly vol. ii. pp. 447-457, and vol. iii. pp. 20-29, 109-115. The most elaborate essay on his philosophy as a whole is, perhaps, that by Professor Zimmermann, in the Denkschriften d. k. Akademie der Wissenschaften, Phil. Hist. Classe, Bd. XIX., Wien, 1870.

CLARKE, Samuel. Three lesser men of this name deserve mention. 1. Biographer and divine, b. at Woolston, Warwickshire, Oct. 10, 1599; d. at London, Dec. 25, 1682. He was educated at Emmanuel College, Cambridge; was minister of St. Bennet Fink, London, and ejected 1662. He was for eight years a governor, and for two years a president, of Sion College. He was also a member of the Savoy Conference. His biographical writings are valuable, because he drew upon sources now difficult to obtain. Among them are, A Mirror or Looking-Glass both for Saints and Sinners, London, 1646, 12mo; 2d ed., 1654, 8vo; 4th ed., 1671, 1672, 2 vols. fol.; The Marrow of Ecclesiastical History, 1650, 2 vols. 4to; 3d ed., 1675, 2 vols. fol.; A General Martyrologie, 1651, fol.; same with Lives of Thirty-two English Divines, 1652, fol.; 3d. ed., corrected and enlarged, 1677, fol. — 2. Commentator, d. Feb. 24, 1700-1701, aged seventy-five. He was educated at Pembroke Hall, Cambridge, and gained a fellowship, which he lost by the Rebellion. He afterwards became minister of Grendon, Buckinghamshire, and was ejected 1662. His reputation rests upon his learned work, The Old and New Testament, with Annotations and Parallel Scriptures, London, 1690, fol. The notes are very brief but judicious, and were highly commended by Owen, Baxter, Howe, and others. The book has, however, been superseded. — 3. Orientalist, b. at Brackley, Northamptonshire, 1623; d. at Oxford, Dec. 27, 1669. He was made M.A. at Oxford, 1648, and in 1658 returned to his Alma Mater, to be superior beadle of law and architypographer, — the last person who united the two offices. His great service was rendered in connection with Walton, whom he assisted in his famous polyglot. He contributed to the 6th. vol. Varie Lectiones et Observationes in Chaldaicam Paraphrasin. His acquirements comprehended Hebrew, Chaldee, Syriac, Æthiopic, Coptic, Arabic, and Persic.

CLARKSON, Thomas, an antislavery leader, b. at Wisbeach, Cambridgeshire, March 26, 1760; d. at Playford Hall, Suffolk, Sept. 26, 1846. In 1786 he gained the Cambridge University prize for a Latin essay upon the question, "Is Involuntary Servitude Justifiable?" which was afterwards published in English, and had an immense circulation and influence; and the rest of his life was devoted to vigorous efforts to put into practice the principles he held. He was particularly useful in collecting and diffusing information about the slave-trade. With William Dillwyn, Granville Sharp, George Harrison, and other Quakers, under the leadership of William Wilberforce, he labored untiringly, until on March 25, 1807, the British slave-trade was abolished. His principal writings are, Portraiture of Quakerism (1806), History of the Abolition of the Slave-Trade (1808, 2 vols.), and Memoirs of William Penn (1813). See Memoir of Thomas Clarkson, by Thomas Elmes and Thomas Taylor, 2d ed., London, 1847.

CLASS-MEETINGS, a distinctively Methodist arrangement, whereby the members of a congregation are divided into sections, over each of which is a leader, appointed by the pastor, whose duty it is "to see each person in his class once a week at least, in order to inquire how their souls prosper; to advise, reprove, comfort, or exhort, as occasion may require; to receive what they are willing to give towards the relief of the preachers, church, and poor; to meet the ministers and the stewards of the society once a week in order to inform the minister of any that are sick, or of any who walk disorderly and will not be reprov'd; to pay the stewards what they have received of their several classes in the week preceding" (Book of Discipline, pt. i. ch. ii. § 1). Mr. Tyerman, in his Life of John Wesley (vol. i. pp. 377-379), thus relates the origin of class-meetings: On Feb. 15, 1742, some of the principal members of the Bristol (Methodist) Society met to consult how the debt upon their meeting-house was to be paid. One of them said, "Let every member of the society give a penny a week, till the debt is paid." Another answered, "Many of them are poor, and cannot afford to do it." — "Then," said the former, "put eleven of the poorest with me, and, if they can give any thing, well: I will call on them weekly; and, if they can give nothing, I will give for them as well as for myself. And each of you call on eleven of your neighbors weekly, receive what they give, and make up what is wanting." "It was done," writes Wesley; "and in a little while some of these informed me they found such and such a one did not walk as he ought. It struck me immediately, 'This is the thing, the very thing, we have wanted so long.'" On March 25 Wesley introduced the plan in London. At first the leaders visited each member at his own house; but this was soon found to be inconvenient, and a common place of meeting appointed. The leader began and ended each meeting with singing and prayer, and spent about an hour in conversing with those present, one by one.

The class-meeting has been traced, in idea at least, in pre-existing religious societies; but it remains to-day a Methodist peculiarity.

CLAUDE, Jean, b. 1619 at La Sauvetat-du-Dropt, in the department of Lot-et-Garonne, France; d. in the Hague, Jan. 13, 1687; studied theology at Montauban; was ordained in 1645, and had charge of several minor congregations, till in 1654 he was made pastor in Nismes. Having defeated in the provincial synod a scheme of the Prince of Conti, governor of Languedoc, for the union of the Protestant and Roman churches, he was forbidden to preach any more in the province, and removed to Montauban. There, too, he was forbidden to preach (1665); and in the next year he was appointed minister at Charenton, near Paris, where he remained till the revocation of the Edict of Nantes drove him in exile. His controversies with Nicole, Réponse aux deux traités intitulés la perpétuité de la foi (1665), with Arnauld, Réponse au livre de M. Arnauld (1670), and with Bossuet, Réponse au livre de M. l'Évêque de Meaux (1683), attracted great attention; but his principal work is La défense de la réformation (1673). In his exile he wrote his Plaintes de Protestants; and after his death his son published five volumes, Œuvres posthumes and letters. His life was written by De La Devèze, Amsterdam, 1687.

CLAUDIUS (Claudianus Mamertes, Claudianus Ecdicius Mamertus), d. 474; was a presbyter at Vienne, brother of the bishop of the diocese, and an intimate friend of Apollinaris Sidonius. His work De Statu Animæ, which during the middle ages exercised considerable influence on the whole treatment of the subject, was written as a refutation of Faustus, Bishop of Riez, who held that the soul, like every thing else created, was material. The work has been published in Max. Bibl. Patr., VI., and with notes by Barth, Zwickau, 1655. Two letters by him — one to Apollinaris, and one to the rhetorician Sapandus at Vienne — are still extant; the former having been published among Apollinaris's Lectures, IV. 2, the latter in Baluze: Miscellanea, VI. p. 535. The hymn, Pange, lingua gloriosi, is generally ascribed to him.

EBERT.

CLAUDIUS, Roman emperor (41-54), is still by some historians considered the instigator of the first persecution of the Christians on account of the passage in SUTTONIUS, Claudius, 25: "Judæos, impulsore Chresto, assidue tumultuantes, Roma expulit." Now, it is very true that "Chresto" may be a corruption of "Christo" (see TERTULLIAN: Apolog. c. 3, and Ad Nationes, 1: 3); but this does not decide the question. Chrestus must have been a Jewish insurrectionist; and already Paul warns against such an insurrectionary spirit (Rom. xiii.). Moreover, Dio Cassius says in his Roman History (60, 6) that Claudius did not expel the Jews from Rome, but only forbade the public exercise of their religion.

HERZOG.

CLAUDIUS OF TURIN, d. 839; a Spaniard by birth, and a pupil of Felix of Urgel, whose peculiar opinions, however, he did not share; was appointed teacher in the palatial school of Lewis, king of Aquitania, shortly before the death of Charlemagne. When Lewis became emperor, Claudius was called to the episcopal see of Turin (820), and charged with the restoration of pure Christianity in that diocese, more especially with the suppression of image-worship. Claudius was a pious and learned man, of great energy, and of still greater zeal. With undaunted courage he fought, both against the Saracens who invaded his diocese, and against the misuses which had crept into his flock. In spite of the resistance of the people, he took away from the church of Turin the images and the relics, and preached with great fervor against the worship of any visible object. He was a disciple of Augustine, and saw clearly how far the Church already deviated from that great Father. The justification by good works and the intercession of the saints he rejected altogether. The special merit of the monastical vow he denied, also the opinion that Rome, or any other actual place, was the special seat of penitence and absolution. He went even farther: not any one sitting in the apostolic chair he would call Dominus Apostolicus, but only him who did the work of an apostle; and he denied that any special power of loosing and binding had been given to Peter and his successors.

Such views met, of course, with great opposition. Already Paschalis I. reproved the audacious bishop; and later on, it came to actual controversy. In or after 823 Claudius sent his Commentaries on the Epistles to the Corinthians, in which he expressed himself very plainly and very sharply to Abbot Theodemir. Theodemir, very anxious about the orthodoxy of his friend, laid the book before an assembly of ecclesiastics. Rumors began to spread in the country. In 828 Theodemir wrote directly to Claudius, to warn him against heresy; and then Claudius wrote the elaborate Apologeticum atque Rescriptum adversus Theumirum Abbatem, his principal work. The book was condemned by an assembly of the court-clergy of Lewis the Pious, and vehemently attacked by Dungal, a Scotchman whom Charlemagne had appointed teacher at Pavia, and by Jonas, Bishop of Orléans. Nevertheless, Claudius continued his activity in Turin unimpeded, till his death; but his book, the chief source to an understanding of his views, has disappeared. In 1461 there existed a copy of it in the Monastery of Bobbia; but, since the incorporation of the library of Bobbia with the Bibliotheca Ambrosiana, the Apologeticum has never been seen. Of Claudius's other works (commentaries on the Bible), the most still remain unprinted. See RUDELBACH: Claud. Turin., etc., Copenhagen, 1824; H. REUTER: Geschichte d. relig. Aufklärung im Mittelalter, I. pp. 16-24.

C. SCHMIDT.

CLAUDIUS, Matthias, b. at Rheinfeld, near Lübeck, Aug. 15, 1740; d. in Hamburg, Jan. 21, 1815; studied law at Jena, and spent most of his life at Wandsbeck, partly as reviser of the Bank of Schleswig-Holstein in Altona, partly as a private citizen. His writings consist of poems and articles published over the signature of Asmus in the Wandsbecker Bote and other periodicals. Of these writings he made the first collection in 1765, the last (in 8 vols.) in 1812: of the latter, the ninth edition appeared in 1871. He was not a theologian. His articles are not sermons or devotional tracts. None of his poems are used in the churches. He exercised, nevertheless, a great influence on the religious life of his country by his strong, primitive, and sympathetic Christian feeling, expressed in an easy and individual manner, in which humor and irony are singularly blended with warm and even passionate earnestness. The tendency of his writings points directly against the rationalism of his time, though he did not forget to condemn the barren and pedantic orthodoxy.

LIT. — His life has been written by HERBST, Gotha, 1857, 3d ed., 1863; MÜNCKEBERG, Hamb., 1870; REDLICH: Die poetischen Beiträge zum Wandsbecker Boten, Hamb., 1871. HAGENBACH.

CLEAN AND UNCLEAN, as a distinction between animals, existed apparently from the earliest times (Gen. vii. 2). Only those animals which divide the hoof, and chew the cud, were regarded as clean (Lev. xi. 3, 4). The distinction primarily related to sacrifice, but in the Mosaic law was extended to food (Lev. xi.; Deut. xiv.); and indeed some of the articles pronounced unclean are really unwholesome. The underlying idea, however, was the education of a people distinguished from all the world by peculiar modes of life. The Jews keep up the distinction to this day, and have their own butchers. So ingrained was the idea, that it required a miracle to convince Peter that he might eat with Gentiles who did not observe this law of food (Acts x. 9-16). See also APOSTOLIC COUNCIL.

CLÉMANGES, Nicolas de, b. in the village of Clémanges, in Champagne, 1360; was educated in the College de Navarre, in Paris; studied theology under Pierre d'Ailly and Gerson; began himself to lecture in 1391; and was in 1393 chosen rector of the university. In the ecclesiastical history of that period the University of Paris played a very prominent part, standing at the head of the party of reform, and exerting itself to restore order and unity to the Church; and many of the remarkable memoirs, addresses, and letters which it issued to kings and popes, were penned by Clémanges; thus, for instance, the memoir addressed in 1393 to Charles VI., to induce him to put an end to the papal schism, and the memoir of the following year, proposing, as the only means of ending the schism, the abdication of the popes, or a court of arbitration, or an œcumenical council, etc. When Clement VII. died at Avignon, both the French court and the University of Paris tried to prevent the election of a new pope, until the cardinals came to an understanding with their colleagues in Rome, and with Boniface IX. Nevertheless, Benedict XIII. was elected Sept. 28, 1394; and the following year Clémanges went to Avignon as his secretary. But in 1398 France withdrew from the obedience of Benedict; and in 1407 Benedict laid the king and the country under the ban. Clémanges, who was at Genoa when the bull of excommunication was issued, immediately returned to France, and repaired to Langres, where he a short time before had obtained a canonry. His enemies, however, accused him of being the author of the bull, and he was compelled to live in concealment,—first in a Carthusian monastery at Valprofonds, afterwards at Fontaine-dubosc. His benefice of Langres he exchanged for one at Bayeux, and after the lapse of some years he once more emerged into public life. In 1421 he defended the liberties of the Gallican Church in a public disputation at Chartres; in 1425 he again took up his lectures in the College de Navarre. The date of his death is unknown.

During his stay in Valprofonds and Fontaine-dubosc, Clémanges wrote, besides a number of exceedingly interesting letters, De Fructu Eremitæ, De Fructu Rerum Adversarum, De Novis Festivitatibus non Instituendis, De Studio Theologico (of special interest for the encyclopædia of theology), Disputatio de Concilio Generali, Oratio ad Galliarum Principes, De Lapsu et Reparatione justitiæ, etc.; and these works show that he went through a remarkable development. Always on the side of reform and liberty, he came farther and farther away from the idea of the papal authority; and his studies of the Bible brought him nearer to the great principles of the Reformation than his teachers d'Ailly and Gerson ever reached. Above the Pope he placed the œcumenical council; but above the œcumenical council he placed the Bible; and the idea of the invisible Church, to which all the paraphernalia of an established Church may be a mere scandal, began to dawn upon him. A collected edition of his works was published by Joh. Lydius, Leyden, 1613, in 2 vols. 4to; but much of what he has written still remains in manuscript, and some of his treatises seem to have been suppressed. His life was written by ADOLPH MÜNTZ, Nicolas Clémanges, sa vie et ses écrits, Strassburg, 1846.

The two works De Ruina Ecclesiæ, or De Corrupto Ecclesiæ Statu, and Apostoli (i. e., littere di missorie) et Responsio per Nationem Gallicanam Dominis Cardinalibus Appellantibus, etc., generally ascribed to him are, as Adolph Müntz has shown, not by him. C. SCHMIDT.

CLEMENS ROMANUS, one of the most celebrated names of Christian antiquity, but so overgrown with myths, that it has become next to impossible to lay bare the historical facts which it represents, occurs in all lists of the first Roman bishops, but not always in the same place. Thus Irenæus (Hær., III. 3, 3) puts it in the third place from Peter (Petrus, Linus, Anenctetus, Clemens); and so do Eusebius (both in his Church History, III. 13, 15, and in his Chronicle), Epiphanius (Hær., XXVII. 6), and Jerome (De Vir. Ill., 15); only that, with the two last mentioned, the name of the second bishop after Peter is Cletus, and not Anenctetus. But another succession meets us in the Chronicle of Hippolyte, in which Clement is placed before Cletus,—Petrus, Linus, Clemens, Cletus; and this succession was adopted by the Liberian Catalogue, by Augustine, Optatus, and others, as also by the Apostolical Constitutions; while at the same time the double tradition made two different persons out of the two names of Anenctetus and Cletus, thus producing the following list,—Petrus, Linus, Clemens, Cletus, Anenctetus. The Leonian Catalogue, however, returns once more to the old succession, according to which Clement occupies the third place after Peter; and thus the Felician Catalogue, which is merely a combination of the Liberian and Leonian Catalogues, arrives at the following succession,—Petrus, Linus, Cletus, Clemens, Anenctetus. The pseudo-Tertullian Carmen adv. Marcionem finally places both Cletus and Anenctetus before Clement; while the epistle said to have been written by Clement to the apostle James narrates that Peter himself appointed Clement his successor; but the former found no advocates at all, and the latter only one,—the author of the pseudo-Clementine romance. See LIPSIVS: Chronologie der römischen Bischöfe, Kiel, 1869. There is, indeed, no reason to abandon the oldest tradition of the Church, according to which, Clement was the third bishop of Rome after Peter; only it must be remembered that he was not a bishop in that sense of the word which the monarchical tendency of a later period developed. He was simply one of the most prominent presbyters of the Roman congregation immediately after the post-apostolical age.

So much for the time in which he lived. With respect to the identity of his person, Irenæus (l. c.) makes him a pupil of an apostle; and Origen (In Joann. 1, 29), Eusebius (Hist. Eccl., III. 15), Epiphanius (Hær., XXVII. 6), and Jerome (De Vir. Ill.) identify him with the Clement mentioned by Paul (Phil. iv. 3), making him a special pupil of Paul. This supposition Chrysostom carries still further (Comm. in 1 Tim.), speaking of Clement as the steady companion of Paul on all his travels; while the Clementine literature, in harmony with its Judeo-Christian character, brings him in the closest connection with Peter, and makes him his most intimate pupil. These two traditions have been combined in many various ways, all more or less artificial. But though the identity of Clement of Rome and Clement mentioned by Paul still finds its defenders (see WUCHER: Die Briefe des Clemens und Polycarp, Tübingen, 1830), it has been given up by most theologians, and with good reason; as Irenæus, if he had known any thing about this identity, would hardly have neglected to speak of it. The Clement mentioned by Paul was, no doubt, a Philippian. Still more intricate is the question, whether the report of the Clementine literature, that Clement was a relative of the imperial family, has any historical kernel or not. Recent investigations, and more especially the excavations of the Roman catacombs, prove that Christianity actually succeeded in penetrating into the Flavian family. [See NORTHCOTE and BROWNLOW: Roma Sotterranea, 2d ed., London, 1879, 2 vols. (vol. i. pp. 83 sqq.)]. If we now suppose that the consul Flavius Clemens (who was sentenced to death by Domitian on account of Atheism, the common Pagan designation of Christianity) belonged to the Christian congregation, we have, then, at the same time, two prominent Christians in Rome of the same name,—the one consul and martyr, the other bishop or presbyter; and the question arises, Was there originally only one person, afterwards split into two by a confusion of the tradition, or were there originally two, afterwards merged into one by the Clementine literature? On this point modern opinions deviate very much; and the question can, perhaps, never be fully answered. But it must be remembered, first, that the Christianity of Flavius Clemens is a mere assumption; next, that the martyrdom of Clemens Romanus is equally doubtful. The catacombs prove that Christianity penetrated into the Flavian family, but not that the consul Flavius Clemens was a Christian; and the report of Dio, or rather of his epitomizer Xiphilinus, is in many of its details so palpably erroneous, that it becomes unreliable as a whole. And how could the Roman congregation forget, in the course of only one century and a half, that one of its first bishops had been a consul, that the first martyr among its bishops had been a member of the imperial family? But Irenæus (l. c.) mentions Telesphorus as the first martyr among the Roman bishops; and Eusebius (Hist. Eccl., III. 34), as well as Jerome (De Vir. Ill., 15), says that Clement died a natural death in the third year of the reign of Trajan. This leads us to the conclusion that the consul and the bishop, Flavius Clemens and Clemens Romanus, were two different persons; which necessitates the admission that we know nothing of the personal life of Clemens Romanus but its approximate date and the position he occupied in the congregation.

Of the numerous writings which bear the name of Clement, most are evidently spurious, as, for instance, the Apostolical Constitutions, and the whole group comprised under the name of the Clementines; which articles see. Nor are the two Epistles on Virginity worth a long debate. They were first published by Wetstein as an appendix to his New Testament (1752), and afterwards by Vilecourt, in MIGNÉ, Patrol. Græc., I., and by I. Ph. Beelen, Louvain, 1856. But the views of asceticism which they propound, and the state of ecclesiastical development to which they refer, show that they belong to a much later period. Jerome knew them (Ad Jovin., I. 12), perhaps also Epiphanius (Hær., XXX. 15). The two Epistles to the Corinthians, on the contrary, especially the first, belong among the most important documents of Christian antiquity still extant. In the Ancient Church they were held in the greatest esteem, and in many places they were read at divine service. Nevertheless, after the fifth century they disappeared from the Western Church, and remained completely unknown until Junius rediscovered them in the celebrated Cod. Alex., a present from Cyrillus Lucaris to King Charles I., and published them at Oxford (1633). Up to 1875 this manuscript remained the only one known; and all editions before that year—by WOTTON, Cambridge, 1718; JACOBSON, Oxford, 1838; MADDEN (photographic facsimile), London, 1856; TISCHENDORF, Leipzig, 1867 and 1873; LIGHTFOOT, London, 1869, to which an Appendix was added in 1877; HILGENFELD, Leipzig, 1866; LAURENT, Leipzig, 1870; and finally by GEBHARDT and HARNACK, in DRESSSEL: Pat. Apost., Leipzig, 1875—were taken from it alone. But in 1875 Bryennios, metropolitan of Serræ, gave an edition from a newly-discovered manuscript in the Library of the Holy Sepulchre at Farnari, in Constantinople; and in this new edition, not only were the many gaps of the Cod. Alex. filled, but also the second epistle, of which hitherto only a fragment had been known, appeared in full. Editions based upon a comparison between the two manuscripts have been given by Gebhardt and Harnack, and by Hilgenfeld, Leipzig, 1876. [The Appendix of Lightfoot gives a good English translation of both epistles.] R. L. Bensly found in June, 1876, a Syriac translation of the two epistles in a manuscript purchased for the University of Cambridge at the sale, in Paris, of Julius Mohl's library.

The First Epistle is an official missive from the Roman congregation to the Corinthian, occasioned by some dissensions which had arisen in the latter. As it is written in the name of the whole congregation, it bears no author's name; but ancient witnesses mention Clement as the author. Dionysius, Bishop of Corinth, in a letter addressed to Bishop Soter of Rome, about 170, speaks of the epistle as written by Clement, and adds that it was always read aloud in his congregation (EUSEB.: Hist. Eccl., IV. 23). Clemens Alexandrinus also holds it in great esteem, quotes often from it, and designates its author as an apostle (Strom., IV. 17; I. 7; V. 12; VI. 8). As so very little is known of Clement, the question of the genuineness of the epistle becomes a question of the date of its authorship. Formerly the opinion was generally prevailing, and is still held by Hefele (Patr. Ap. Prolegomena, p. XXXII.) and Wieseler (Eine Untersuchung über den Hebräerbrief, Kiel, 1861), that it was written between 64 and 68. A closer examination, however, seems to lead to the last decade of the first century, between 93 and 97. On the one side, not only Peter and Paul, but all the apostles, have died, and the state of the congregational life seems to indicate that some time has elapsed since that event. On the other hand, there are presbyters in office who have been appointed by the apostles themselves; and there are members living who have been contemporaries of the apostles.

The Second Epistle is not an epistle at all, but a homily; and, as it is the oldest existing sermon, it is, of course, of great interest. Where, at what time, and by whom, it was written, are questions of great difficulty; and, of the many hypotheses which have been offered as answers, none has proved fully satisfactory. It seems most probable that it originated in Rome, and between 130 and 140; but how it then came to be connected with the Epistle to the Corinthians by Clement as a second epistle must for the present be left unexplained. For LIT. see editions mentioned above. G. ULLHORN.

CLEMENS, Titus Flavius, was one of the most celebrated teachers of the Church of Alexandria. The date of his birth falls near the middle of the second century; as between 192 and 202, when he began on his principal work, he was a man in his best years. The place of his birth was not Alexandria, since he speaks of Egypt as a country in which he finally settled. He was probably a native of Greece,—Epiphanius says, of Athens. His parents seem to have belonged to the upper classes, and to have been Pagans. He speaks of himself as one who has come to grace through penitence; and he shows an intimate acquaintance with Pagan life, even with its darkest sides. He frequented the schools of the rhetoricians; and, though strict method is not the most striking feature in his authorship, he studied logic and dialectics with great zeal. He was well versed in music; and the brilliant development which church-music achieved in Alexandria was no doubt due to him. But the principal subjects of his studies were the poets and the philosophers. His works bristle with quotations from the older Greek literature, and have, for this very reason, an additional interest to the student. But neither the poets nor the philosophers were able to fully satisfy his craving for truth. He began to study Christianity; and in Egypt, in Alexandria, he finally found a man who could give him what he wanted. Eusebius is probably right, when in this man he recognizes Pantænus, who acquired great fame as teacher in the Church of Alexandria. In this position Clemens afterwards succeeded him, and in fame he soon surpassed him. During the persecution of Septimius Severus he was driven away from Alexandria, and sought refuge with Alexander, bishop in some Cappadocian city, and afterwards of Jerusalem. It is a letter from Alexander which contains these notices of Clemens: another letter of a later date speaks of him as having recently died.

The three works of Clemens Alexandrinus still extant, Προτροπικός ("Exhortation to the Heathen"), Παδγωγός ("The Instructor"), and Στροματεῖς ("Miscellanies"), are his three principal works, and represent three successive stages in a systematical teaching of Christianity, beginning with the conversion from Paganism, and ending with full initiation in the Christian mysteries. [These three works have been translated into English in the Ante-Nicene Library, vol. IV., Edinburgh, 1867.] Other works are mentioned by Jerome and Photius, but they have perished. The writings of Clemens are rich in brilliant thoughts, often most strikingly expressed; and to a certain extent he has succeeded in permeating the whole mass of thoughts with certain grand fundamental ideas. But his talent is not systematical. Even when he most sincerely tries to be systematical, much remains loose, and only mechanically tied together. The elements which he proposes to harmonize are the Greek philosophy and Christianity, an independent reason, and an authority based on tradition. But though he never succeeds in fully defining the office of reason on the field of authority, or in fully separating that of Pagan thought which Christianity can assimilate from that which it must reject, he is, nevertheless, exceedingly suggestive, and often eminently striking.

LIT.—Collected editions of his works have been given by PETRUS VICTORIUS, Florence, 1550; F. SYLBURG, Heidelberg, 1592; HEINSIUS, Leyden, 1616; J. POTTER, Oxford, 1715; DINDORF, Oxford, 1868-69. CLEMENT is the name of fourteen popes.—Clement I. (see CLEMENS ROMANUS).—Clement II. (Dec. 24, 1046—Oct. 9, 1047). After the abdication of Gregory VI., Henry III., at the head of a formidable army, stood as the master of Rome and the Church; and the people and the clergy conceded to him the right of the first—and, according to the interpretation of Petrus Damiani, also the decisive—vote at the papal election. On Dec. 24 he presented Bishop Suidger of Bamberg to the synod assembled in the Church of St. Peter, and seated him on the papal throne, the first German pope; and the next day Suidger, who assumed the name Clement II., crowned King Henry and his wife. See JAFFÉ: Regesta; and WATTERICH: Pontif. Roman. Vita. I.—Clement III. (Dec. 19, 1187—March 25, 1191), a Roman by birth; ascended the papal throne just as the report of the fall of Jerusalem and the entrance of Saladin (Oct. 3, 1187) spread horror and dismay through all Europe. He espoused the cause with great fervor, and succeeded in rousing a general enthusiasm. Letters were sent to all the kings and princes; daily prayers were ordered for the rescue of the Holy Land; the Truce of God was preached in all countries; indulgences, dispensations, absolutions, were freely distributed; and the summons to the third crusade was accepted by the nations with nearly as much enthusiasm as that to the first. Venice and Hungary made peace with each other; the Emperor took the cross; even France and England were reconciled, and joined in the undertaking. The pitiful end, however, of this grand beginning, Clement was spared from seeing. With King William of Scotland he came into a sharp conflict. The see of St. Andrew became vacant. The chapter chose one bishop; the king appointed another. But the Pope threatened with interdict, and the king yielded. As a reward for this concession, the Pope placed Scotland immediately under the papal authority by a bull of March 13, 1188, thus exempting it from the jurisdiction of the Archbishop of York, who had hitherto acted as papal legate for Scotland. On Nov. 18, 1189, William II. of Sicily died. The Pope, who claimed the kingdom as a fief, invested Tancred with the country; but Henry VI., son of Frederic Barbarossa, protested as the next heir, and was marching against Rome, when Clement died. See JAFFÉ: Regesta; and WATTERICH: Pontif. Roman. Vita, Tom. II. There was an Antipope of the same name (see GREGORY VII.). — Clement IV. (Feb. 5, 1265–Nov. 29, 1268), a native of France; studied law, and held a high position at the court of Louis IX.; married, and had two daughters, but was, by sorrow over the loss of his wife, led to enter the Church, and was made Bishop of Puy in 1256, Archbishop of Narbonne in 1259, and cardinal in 1262. He was on a journey to England as papal legate, when he heard of his election to the papal throne; but such was the state of Italy that he had to put on the cowl of a mendicant friar in order to reach the papal dominion. His whole reign was occupied almost exclusively with the affairs of the Apulian Empire. The long tradition of the papal policy, the inveterate hatred of the curia to the Hohenstaufen House, and the necessity of withstanding the attacks of the Ghibellines, determined his course. Feb. 26, 1265, Charles of Anjou was invested in Rome with the fief of Apulia, and the war with Manfred began. Clement felt very indignant at the arrogance, faithlessness, and licentiousness of Charles, and was about to open negotiations with Manfred, when the latter died. Conradin now appeared in Italy; and in spite of the papal ban, launched against him Nov. 18, 1267, he entered Rome in triumph. But his defeat at Tagliacozzo was the end of his rôle and of that of the House of Hohenstaufen. It is sure, however, that Clement had no part in the pitiful end of his adversary. He was a right-minded and warm-hearted man; and the energy with which he attacked and suppressed nepotism, the cancer of the papal rule, is so much the more praiseworthy, as he had many poor relatives. See MURATORI: Script., III. P. I. p. 594, and P. II. p. 421; and the list of his letters given by POTTAST: Regesta Pontif. Rom., II. — Clement V. (June 5, 1305–April 20, 1314), a native of France; was made Bishop of Comminges in 1295, and Archbishop of Bordeaux in 1299, and showed himself a firm adherent of Boniface VIII., and a decided adversary of Philip the Fair. Cunningly manœuvring with this prestige, he secured the election after Benedict XI.; and only a few persons knew that he had actually bought the papal crown by a number of the most degrading concessions to the French king. He was crowned at Lyons, and took up his residence, first at Bordeaux, then at Poitiers. Finally he settled (1309) at Avignon with the whole curia. No argument or flattery or threat could induce him to go to Rome; and thus began the so-called Babylonian Exile of the Popes, which lasted for seventy years. At Avignon he led a brilliant but scandalous life; and, in spite of his ostentatious arrogance, he was not much more than a tool in the hands of Philip the Fair. In June, 1306, he invited the grand master of the Templars, Jacques de Molay, to Avignon, apparently to discuss the plan of a new crusade, but in reality as the first step towards the abolition of the order; which he had promised the king. An investigation was instituted, but only in order to give in an indirect manner the sanction of the Church to the violent proceedings of the king. Without waiting for the result of the investigation, the king at once imprisoned all the members of the order living in France, and confiscated their property. A general council was convened at Vienne, Oct. 16, 1311; and a papal bull of May 6, 1312, dissolved the order. But, though the bull reserved both the members and the property of the order for the decision of the Pope, the king burnt the members, and pocketed the property; and the Pope kept silent. While the process of the Templars was going on, a process was begun against Boniface VIII., whose memory Clement also had promised the king to condemn as a heretic. He confined himself to annul his acts of excommunication and interdict, and especially his bulls Clericis Laicos and Unam Sanctam, but only because the king did not find it necessary to press his claims. The decrees of the Council of Vienne, augmented with his own decretals, he ordered to be collected; and, under the name of the Clementines, they now form the seventh book of decretals. See BALUZIUS: Vite Papar. Avenion., Paris, 1693; MURATORI: Script., III. P. I. p. 673, and P. II. p. 441; VILLANI: Hist. Fiorent., VII.–IX. — Clement VI. (May 7, 1342–Dec. 6, 1352), a native of France; monk of the order of St. Benedict; Archbishop of Rouen; remained at Avignon, though the Romans, through an embassy of which Petrarca was a member, most humbly and most urgently solicited his return to Rome. He sat quietly at Avignon, and looked on while Cola di Rienzi played his farce in Rome. In the affairs of Germany he interfered in a very high-handed manner; and his claim to choose or confirm the Roman king was practically recognized. Avignon, which belonged to the crown of Sicily, he bought of Queen Johanna, and he spent great sums to adorn it. For the Church he had no interest: the most remunerative offices he gave to his relatives. A sumptuous table, fine horses, brilliant pageantries, and the company of beautiful women, were the things he liked; and in order to procure the necessary means he introduced the custom of celebrating the jubilee of the Church every fiftieth year, instead of every hundredth. See BALUZIUS: Vite Papar. Aven. — Clement VII. (Nov. 19, 1523–Sept. 25, 1534), an illegitimate son of Giuliano de Medici; entered the military order of St. John; was Prior of Capua, and carried the colors of the order at the coronation of his cousin Leo X., but was legitimized the very next day, made Archbishop of Florence, and soon after cardinal. After the death of Adrian VI. he ascended the papal throne by a shrewd compromise with his antagonist, Cardinal Colonna. But the great business capacity which he had shown under his two predecessors proved altogether insufficient for his new position; and his policy brought not only him, but the Papacy itself, into the greatest dangers. Afraid of the growing influence of Charles V. in the Italian Peninsula, Clement entered into an alliance with Francis I.; but May 6, 1526, Rome was stormed and sacked; the Pope had to ransom his own person for four hundred thousand scudi; and the Medici were expelled from Florence. This war between the Pope and the emperor proved a great opportunity for the German Reformation, and the Protestants utilized it. The diet of Spires established religious liberty in Germany, and placed the Protestant churches on equal terms with the Roman. The Pope now hoped to crush the Reformation by the aid of the Emperor: but Charles V. demanded a general council; and Clement VII. was afraid of such a measure, on account of his illegitimate birth, the manner in which he had obtained the tiara, etc. Once more he sought the support of France; and his niece, Catherine de Medici, was married to Henry of Orléans, the second son of Francis I. Meanwhile, Protestantism spread rapidly both in Germany and France; and when the Pope (in 1534) decided against Henry VIII. in the divorce case, the king immediately threw off all allegiance to the papal see. See ZIEGLER: Hist. Clementis VII., in SCHELHORN: Amœnit. Hist. Eccl. et Lit.; Rossi: Memorie Istoriche di Clemente VII., Rome, 1837. There was an Antipope of the same name (see URBAN VI.). — Clement VIII. (Jan. 30, 1592–March 5, 1605), Cardinal Ippolito Aldobrandini, descending from a noble Florentine family, undertook the difficult task to rescue the curia from the overwhelming influence of Spain, and finally succeeded in fulfilling it. The manner in which he dealt with Henry IV. of France is very characteristic of his policy in general. The conversion of the king (July 25, 1593) was not a sufficient guaranty. The absolution did not follow until Paris and the greater part of France had accepted the king (Dec. 17, 1595). The king then recalled the Jesuits; and the Pope kept silent on occasion of the Edict of Nantes. By the aid of Henry IV. Clement VIII. was able to retain Ferrara as a papal fief when the House of Este became extinct; and thus gradually the French influence grew until it was a match for the Spanish. The same method the Pope employed in the great dogmatical controversy between the Jesuits and the Dominicans, which he smoothed down without risking the estrangement of either of the two great orders by a definite decision. See WADDING: Vita Clementis VIII., Rome, 1723. There was also an Antipope of the same name (see MARTIN V.). — Clement IX. (June 20, 1667–Dec. 9, 1669), a native of Pistoja, and a peace-loving man; mediated the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle (1668), and the Pax Clementina, which brought the Jansenistic controversy to a temporary conclusion. — Clement X. (April 29, 1670–July 22, 1676), a Roman by birth; was eighty years old when he ascended the papal throne, and left all business to Cardinal Proluzzi. Under him began the controversy with Louis XIV., concerning the enjoyment, during vacancy, of episcopal revenues and benefices. See AMELOT DE LA HOUSSAYE: Relation du Conclave de Clement X., Paris, 1676; GUARNACCI: Hist. Pontif. a Cl. X. ad Cl. XI. — Clement XI. (Nov. 23, 1700–March 19, 1721), b. at Urbino; was a man of great ability, and achieved considerable results as a reformer of the internal administration of his dominion, but was very little successful in his external policy. His protest against the assumption of the royal crown by the ruler of Prussia (1700) made him almost ridiculous. In the War of the Spanish Succession he favored Philip V., but was compelled to acknowledge Charles III., which disturbed his relations with Louis XIV. In the controversy between the Dominicans and the Jesuits, concerning the advisability of allowing Chinese converts to retain certain Pagan customs, Innocent X. had decided in favor of the Dominicans, Alexander VII. in favor of the Jesuits; and Clement now decided in favor of the Dominicans. The Jesuits submitted, but only apparently. In the Jansenistic controversy, in which the Pope took a very decided stand, the bull of July 16, 1705 (Vincam Domini), demanding absolute submission to the decrees of Innocent X. and Alexander VII., against the book of Jansenius, was registered by the Parliament of Paris, and enforced by the king; but the bull of Sept. 8, 1713 (Unigenitus), against Quesnel's work, caused a great commotion, rallied all adherents of the Gallican views around the Jansenists, and contributed more than any thing else to stir up the hatred to the Jesuits, whose work the bull was. See Clementis Epist. et Brevia Selecta, Rome, 1724, 2 vols.; Bullarium Clementis XI., Rome, 1723; Oratt. Consistor., Rome, 1722. His life was written by BUDER (1721), PIETRO POLIDORO (1727), REBOULET (1738), LAFITEAU (1753). — Clement XII. (July 12, 1730–Feb. 6, 1740), a Florentine by birth, and seventy-eight years old when he ascended the throne. His attempt to reclaim Pavia and Placentia, and to incorporate the republic of San Marino, failed; and, while the political power of the Papacy visibly crumbled into dust, the literary and scientific opposition became sharper and more open day by day. — Clement XIII. (July 6, 1758–Feb. 3, 1769), b. at Venice; ascended the throne by the aid of the Jesuits, and became their zealous defender, though he thereby brought the Papacy itself to the very verge of ruin. The storm against them began in Portugal. In 1759 they were expelled from that country, and sent by ship to the Papal States. In France the king proposed certain modifications in the constitution of the order; and, when the Pope refused, the Parliament voted that the Jesuits should leave the country within a month, the king fixing the day at Dec. 1, 1764. On Jan. 7, 1765, the Pope issued the bull Apostolicum Pascendi Munus, in which he spoke of the order as a useful and holy institution; but the publication of the bull was forbidden in Portugal, France, and Naples. On March 31, 1767, the king of Spain had all the Jesuits living in Madrid arrested, and the following day all the Jesuits living in Spain. They were packed like slaves in some merchant-vessels, and carried across the Mediterranean to the shores of the Papal States. The contest became still more violent. The Duke of Parma introduced some reforms in his dominions; and by a breve or monitarium of Jan. 30, 1768 (Aliud ad Apostolatus), the Pope undertook to annul those measures. The duke answered by expelling the Jesuits; and the Pope actually began to prepare for war. But at this moment French troops occupied Avignon and Venaissin; Sicilian troops, Benevent and Ponte Coroa; and no other issue seemed possible but the destruction of the political power of the Papacy, when Clement suddenly died. See THEINER: Geschichte d. Pontif. Cl. XIV., Leipzig and Paris, 1853, vol. I. — Clement XIV. (May 19, 1769–Sept. 22, 1774). The conclave which assembled after the death of Clement XIII. lasted for three months; and only after a hundred and eighty-five scrutinies, the two parties, the friends and the adversaries of the Jesuits, agreed upon Cardinal Ganganelli (b. at Arcangelo in the Papal States), the son of a poor physician. He was agreed upon because he was considered the most insignificant; but he succeeded, nevertheless, in steering safely through the dangers of the moment. He became reconciled to all the estranged powers, even Portugal and Parma, without losing any thing of his dignity; and, when he understood the necessity of dissolving the order of the Jesuits, he did it by a breve of Aug. 16, 1772, quietly, but firmly. He had been warned against the revenge of the Jesuits; and he died, indeed, suddenly and under suspicious circumstances. He founded the Museum of the Vatican, afterwards called the Pio-Clementinum. His letters were collected, some say partly invented, by Caraccioli, Paris, 1776, who also wrote his Life, Paris, 1775. See Leben d. P. Cl. XIV., Berlin and Leipzig, 1774–75, 3 vols.; Esprit du P. Cl. XIV., Amsterdam, 1775; REUMONT: Ganganelli P. Cl. XIV., Berlin, 1847; CRÉTINEAU-JOLY: Clement XIV. et les Jésuites, Paris, 1847; A. THEINER: Geschichte d. Pont. Clemens XIV., Leipzig and Paris, 1853, 3 vols. G. VOIGT.

CLEMENTINES is the name generally applied to a very remarkable group of writings closely related to each other with respect to their contents, and evidently drawn from the same source, but often transcribed, augmented, and variously remodelled. Of the group, three works are still extant,—the Clementine Homilies, the Recognitions, and the Epitome.

Attention was first drawn to the Homilies of Clemens Romanus by Turrianus in his book, Pro Canonibus App. (1573); but the codex which he used seems to have disappeared. In 1672 the work was published by Cotelerius, after a codex in the Library of Paris: but the codex was incomplete; it breaks off in the middle of the nineteenth homily. A complete manuscript was discovered by Dressel in the Ottobonian Library in Rome, and published by him at Göttingen, 1853. Finally De Lagarde gave a complete and critical edition, Leipzig, 1865. The book consists of two letters to James, and twenty homilies, also addressed to him. The first letter is from Peter to James: the former asks the latter to keep the Kerygma sent to him an absolute secret. The second letter is from Clement to James, written after the death of Peter, and stating that the latter, shortly before he died, appointed the writer of the letter his successor. The work itself tells how Clement, having sought in vain after truth in the schools of the philosophers, and having heard something in Rome about Jesus, decides to go to Judæa. Arrived at Alexandria, he meets Barnabas; and at Cæsarea Stratonis Barnabas introduces him to Peter, who initiates him in Christianity, and invites him to remain with him during the disputation with Simon Magus. The disputation lasts for three days; but at the end of the third day Simon Magus flies from the city defeated. Peter pursues him; and, while journeying, Clement narrates the romantic incidents of his life,—how his father and mother and two brethren have mysteriously disappeared. It now turns out that his two companions, Niceta and Aquila, are his two lost brethren. His father and mother are also found; and Simon Magus is finally overtaken, and completely crushed in a disputation lasting four days. This romantic narrative, however, is used only as the framework around a doctrinal development. The doctrine is the chief interest of the book, and may generally be characterized as speculative Ebionitism, though it is not perfectly homogeneous. Sometimes God is represented decidedly pantheistically, as the One, the All, the world's Heart, which makes the whole stream of life pulsate, etc. At other times he is represented as a person, the Creator, the Judge, etc., but with the strongest anthropomorphisms known to Judaism. These two tendencies the author never succeeds in fully blending.

Of the Recognitions, the Greek original is lost. We have the work only in a Latin translation by Rufinus; but of this translation the manuscripts are quite numerous, bearing various titles, generally dramatic terms referring to the meeting between Clement and his brethren. The work was published before the Homilies, first by Sichardus (Basel, 1526 and 1536), then by Lambertus Gruterus Venradius (Cologne, 1563 and 1570). The best edition is that by Gersdorf, in Bibl. Patr. Lat., Leipzig, 1838, vol. I. [There is an English translation by T. Smith in the Ante-Nicene Library, vol. III., Edinburgh, 1867.] The difference between the Recognitions and the Homilies is comparatively small in the narrative part of the works, but very striking in the doctrinal. In the Recognitions the ideas and views are all through the work weakened and modified so as to suit a catholic reader.

The Epitome, first edited by Turnebus (Paris, 1555), then by Cotelier, is an uninteresting extract from the Homilies, to which are added extracts from the letter of Clement to James, from the Martyrium of Clement by Simeon Metaphrastes, etc. Dressel's edition, after a newly-discovered codex, and containing a second Epitome, has no great interest; nor has the Syriac translation, edited by De Lagarde, Leipzig, 1861.

The doctrinal labor with the Clementine literature was begun by Neander, who, in the appendix to his Genetische Entwicklung der gnostischen Systeme, Berlin, 1818, gave a representation of the doctrinal view of the Homilies; and it was continued by F. C. Baur, who, for his conception of the ancient Church, drew a considerable amount of evidential matter from this group of writings. Baur laid at first the emphasis on the Ebionitic elements (De Ebionitarum Origine, Tübingen, 1831; Die Christuspartei in der korinthischen Gemeinde, Tübingen, 1831), but seemed afterwards inclined to ascribe more importance to the Gnostic elements (Die christliche Gnosis, Tübingen, 1835; Über den Episkopat in der christlichen Kirche, 1838). In opposition to Baur, Schliemann wrote his Die Clementinen nebst den verwandten Schriften und der Ebionitismus (Hamburg, 1844), a book as careful in the collection of materials as acute in the investigation of details; and this work in connection with Schwegler's Nachapostolisches Zeitalter (see I. 364 sq.), formed the transition from a purely doctrinal to a purely literary treatment. The turning-point was Hilgenfeld's Die clementinischen Recognitionen und Homilien, Jena, 1848. Not the doctrinal views and their systematical elaboration, but the historical origin and literary character of this group of writings, were to him the points in question; and he attempted to show that the Recognitions formed the basis for the Homilies, and were themselves based on a still older tract, of Roman origin and Judæo-Christian character,—the true Kerygma Petri, of which he found an actual remnant in I. 27-72, and a general outline in III. 75. Against Hilgenfeld, Uhlhorn attempted to show, in his Die Homilien und Recognitionen des Clemens Romanus (Göttingen, 1854), that the author of the Recognitions had the Homilies lying before him when he wrote, and that the true nucleus from which the whole literature developed was to be found, not in Recogn., I. 27-72, but in Hom., XVI.-XIX. The one-sidedness of these two works was eliminated by Lehmann, who, in his Die clementinischen Schriften (Gotha 1869), begins by dissolving the Recognitions into two different parts, by two different authors,—I.-III. and IV.-X.,—and then penetrates deeper into the construction of the two works until he arrives at the root, the Kerygma. Still farther has this method been carried by Lipsius, in his Die Quellen der römischen Petrusage (Kiel, 1872), who finds the basis of the whole Clementine literature in the Acta Petri with their strongly-marked anti-Pauline tendency. The evidence which can be offered for this last supposition may be deemed insufficient; but the general results of the whole course of investigation are irrefragable. The Homilies, the Recognitions, and the Epitome are three independent elaborations, perhaps at first hand, perhaps at second or third, of some older tract not now extant.

G. UHLHORN.

CLERICUS (Jean le Clerc), b. at Geneva, March 19, 1657; d. at Amsterdam, Jan. 8, 1736; studied theology and philosophy in Geneva, Grenoble, Saumur, Paris, and London; was, by the reading of the works of Curcellæus and Episcopius, drawn over to the Remonstrants, and became professor of philosophy and belles-lettres at Amsterdam, and, after the death of Limborch, professor of church history. Of his numerous works, his commentaries on the Old Testament, and his Harmonia Evangelica, are still valuable. See NICERON: Mémoires, Tom. XI. p. 294.

CLERGY, Benefit of, a mediæval custom by which accused persons who could read Latin could claim the privilege of being tried in the bishop's court. Originally such "clerks" were really ecclesiastics; but laymen who had the knowledge claimed the privilege, to the great impediment, and, in many cases, the actual mockery, of justice. The struggle between the civil and ecclesiastical authorities over this point resulted in the common law courts abandoning the extreme punishment of death assigned to some offences, when the person convicted was a "clerk" in holy orders; but a secondary punishment was inflicted. For more atrocious offences this exemption was not allowed: consequently offences were divided into clergyable and unclergyable. This exemption ultimately wrought out the reformation of the entire criminal law. It became the practice for every criminal to claim, and to be allowed, the benefit of clergy; so that, when a crime was made capital, the statute declared that its action was without "benefit of clergy." The "benefit of clergy" in cases of felony was abolished in England in 1827. See Blackstone's Commentaries, iv. 28.

CLERGY, Biblical. It may be considered settled that there is no order of clergy, in the modern sense of the term, in the New Testament; i. e., there is no class of men mentioned to whom spiritual functions exclusively belonged. Every believer is a priest unto God. Every believer has as much right as anybody else to pray, to preach, to baptize, to administer communion (Rom. v. 2; Eph. ii. 19-22, iii. 12; 1 Pet. ii. 9; 1 John ii. 27; Rev. i. 6, v. 10, etc.). Believers constitute the body of Christ (Eph. i. 22, 23; cf. Col. i. 18, ii. 19), and therefore have all things (1 Cor. iii. 21-23). The so-called "power of the keys" is theirs, for it is surely true, that whatever the Christian Church binds (declares to be wrong or false) is bound in heaven, i. e., has also the divine condemnation, and what it looses (declares to be right or true) is loosed in heaven. But it does not follow that therefore the clergy are superfluous. Experience has shown that certain persons are by natural endowment better fitted for spiritual functions than others, and also, that, in the Christian communities, there will be leaders to whom will gravitate the major part of the work. The clerical order took its rise, therefore, in the very necessity of the case. Decency, order, and efficiency demanded that certain persons should make it their business to conduct the services, and have the oversight, of the congregations. Without such a class, the very freedom of the gospel would be defeated. If everybody discharged the spiritual functions of which they were capable, then confusion and anarchy would result. In the sense that "order is heaven's first law," and that progress is the object of public service, the spiritual may be said to be of divine origin.

But who selects and installs the stewards of the divine means of grace? The first servants and instruments for the announcement and upbuilding of the gospel Church were the disciples; and they were chosen by the Lord, and sent out with a direct personal commission; yet the baptism of the Spirit on Pentecost fell not upon them exclusively, but upon the whole body of the disciples (Acts i. 15, ii. 1). The apostles founded the Church on earth (1 Cor. iii. 10; Eph. ii. 20; Rev. xxi. 14): consequently they cannot have successors. The foundation does not need relaying. When persecution arose, the scattered Church did not require special commissions to spread the gospel. It was more difficult to conceal than to tell the glad tidings. Thus the Church grew, and extended to localities where neither commissioned apostle nor evangelist had ever gone. The model upon which these congregations organized themselves was the Jewish synagogue. It is nowhere said that the apostles founded the office of elders or bishops, much less that they endowed it with their own plenary power. In the Jewish-Christian congregations the arrangement grew up naturally. In the heathen-Christian the example of their brethren would be decisive. We read of elders in the Jerusalem Church in very early days (Acts xi. 30, xv. 2 sqq.), and of the ordination of elders by the apostles or their pupils (Acts xiv. 23; Tit. i. 5). But in every case the congregation existed before such ordinations; and the only effect they had was to organize the congregations upon a firmer basis, and fit them better for effective work. The offices thus filled were indeed for the benefit of the Church (1 Cor. xiv. 33, 40). They were, in a sense, necessary for the Church's existence; but they are not to be put on a par with the sacraments as the ordinances of Christ. In the beginnings of the Church the numerous necessary services were performed by the members in common, according to each one's natural ability and supernatural endowment (1 Cor. xii. 4-13, 27-30). The elders or bishops were merely the leaders and guides. That they were ordained by the laying-on of hands and prayer was in imitation of Old-Testament models. The conclusion of the whole matter is, the office in the Church is dependent on the means of grace, and not the means of grace on the office. The office is only necessary to the orderly progress of the Church. But the means of grace gain not a whit of efficacy from their administrator. Baptism, the Lord's Supper, preaching, and prayer, like singing, and taking up a collection; reading of the Scriptures, like reading of notices, — may be performed by laymen with precisely the same spiritual effect as if the highest or the most godly minister in the land had been the administrator. The source of all power is God. If he see fit, he can make the lowliest woman mightier to the pulling-down of strongholds than the whole clergy combined. If God withhold his blessing, the whole clergy are powerless to lift a finger for Christ. BURGEE.

Archæological and Historical. 1. Meaning of the Word. — The word "clergy" is derived from κληρος ("lot"), because the whole body of believers were the "lot," or inheritance, of the Lord (1 Pet. v. 3). The derivation from the choice of Matthias (Acts i. 26) is inaccurate; because, as a matter of fact, the clergy were not chosen by lot.

2. The Clerical Orders. — Although, in the New Testament, there is no clergy in the modern sense of the term, very early in church history do we find the distinction between clergy and laity. The three proper orders of bishops, presbyters, and deacons, were called primi clerici; and the lower orders, — the readers, singers, porters of monasteries, etc., — inferioris loci. The monks formed a third class of religious persons. "Clergyman," or "clerk," in the sense of a "scholar," or one who could write, dates from the eleventh century. "The term regularis coming into use when monachism was becoming regarded as 'religion' (i.e., about the eighth century), the term secularis also gradually lost its general sense of worldly, and became simply the antithesis of a 'regular,' or monk. Clerus regularis thenceforth meant a clergyman who was also a monk; and clerus secularis, a parish clergyman, or one who kept a school, or lived in any way not under a rule."

3. Support of the Clergy. — In the days of persecution the clergy derived their support both from the weekly offerings at the altar, and the monthly to the common treasury of each church. When, however, the cessation of persecution made it safe for the Church to hold landed property, it came into possession of it by inheritance and gift, and thus could depend, in part, upon its own revenues. Occasionally the Christian emperors gave large sums of money for the support of the clergy; and by Constantine and his successors (except Julian) they received an allowance from the State. The emperors paid the travelling expenses of the clergy coming to the œcumenical councils. Tithes were also collected by law; although, up to the time of Charlemagne, they were purely voluntary.

4. Immunities and Privileges. — The clergy enjoyed, under the christianized Roman Empire (see JUSTINIAN, CODE OF), immunity from certain taxes, — such as the poll-tax, the soldiers' horses tax, etc., — and from the obligation to fill certain public offices. They were likewise exempted from the jurisdiction of the secular courts in respect of minor offences, — a privilege outrageously abused, and converted into a crying shame. In this way "clerks" were punished more lightly than laymen for the same offences. Neither bishops nor presbyters might be tortured, nor the bishops be summoned as witnesses, nor sworn; their simple word being regarded as sufficient. Civil cases came before the bishops as magistrates; and in criminal cases they appeared as intercessors: and, as they thus time and time again defended the accused, so they came to have the legal defence of the weak; the churches, the right of sanctuary; and the clergy, the censorship of public morals.

The clergy had other immunities and privileges of a more ecclesiastical and private kind. Thus the clergy and the laity enjoyed the right to elect the bishops. The bishops had absolute authority over their clergy. The Bishop of Constantinople presided as lord over sixty presbyters, one hundred deacons, forty deaconesses, ninety sub-deacons, one hundred and ten readers, twenty-five chanters, one hundred door-keepers, and a guild of eleven hundred grave-diggers. The Bishop of Alexandria was faithfully and fanatically served by their parabolani (see title) to the number of six hundred. The Bishop of Carthage had five hundred clergy under his authority. The various provincial synods met twice a year for the free discussion of their affairs. The position of bishop depended, of course, upon the size of their city or diocese; but in any case they enjoyed great influence, and received much respect. The laity, and even the emperor, bowed the head to the bishop, and kissed his hand. The terms used in speaking of him were very honoring, not to say adulatory: indeed, some epithets were profane. Thus he was styled "God-beloved," "Most Holy," "Holy Lord," and "Most Blessed Pope." His seat in his cathedral was called his throne; his vestments were very rich; his praises were sung, although the latter practice was infrequent.

Of the regulations respecting the clergy, contained in the Justinian Code, and which have been enumerated above, few now remain in force. The difference in their present condition in England has been thus concisely put: "Their judicial privileges and immunities exist no longer, except so far as the coercive power of a bishop's court be regarded as a shadow of them. Their pecuniary privileges and immunities exist no longer; for the grant made in some countries to the clergy from the national exchequer is rather a substitute for estates confiscated than a free grant of love. Their official privileges and immunities exist no longer, unless the permission conceded to bishops to take part in national legislation, and the exemption of the clergy from having to serve in the army or on juries, be regarded as the equivalents of the honors and immunities bestowed by the Cæsars with so ungrudging a hand." It is the American idea very widely to separate Church and State; and no one who reads history with open eyes has aught but regret that the State ever undertook to coddle the Church, or the Church to rule the State. The State transcends her sphere when she attempts to regulate the Church.

5. Those Eligible to Orders.—So long as the Church was oppressed, comparatively few unworthy persons desired her offices; but, when she became the object of the liberality and care of the State, worldly men pressed into her service. Hence regulation was necessary. It was decreed that no more persons should be ordained than were needed for the service of each church. Among those ineligible to orders were soldiers, slaves, comedians, tax-gatherers, those who had been married twice, persons of a mean and servile occupation, those who had performed public penance, homicides, adulterers, lapsed, usurers, mutilated or self-crippled, clinics (see BAPTISM), and those once insane. See BINGHAM: Orig. Eccl. lib. 4.

6. Clerical Houses.—It was very common in early times for the clergy to live together, and have all things common. Leo IX. (1048-54) ordered that cloisters should be established in connection with the churches for this purpose.

7. The power of the clergy was probably at its height in the eleventh century, when they absorbed all the learning of the time, and their houses were places of refuge. But their influence was never greater than in the seventeenth century, when, according to Von Ranke, "they sat in the councils of kings, and discussed political affairs from the pulpit in the presence of the whole people. They directed schools, controlled the efforts of learning, and governed the whole range of literature." Hist. of the Popes (bk. vi. Introd.)

CLERK is derived from the Latin clericus, and was originally the name given to those in holy orders, and is still the legal name of clergymen of the Church of England. But afterwards it acquired a secondary meaning,—a learned man, or rather, one who could read; but now it is restricted (ecclesiastically) to the persons who lead the responses in the parish churches in England.

CLETUS, one of the first bishops of Rome. It is doubtful, however, whether he followed immediately after Linus, and whether he is identical with Anacletus. See ANACLETUS and CLEMENS ROMANUS.

CLINIC BAPTISM (clinici, from κλίνη, a "bed") meant in the ancient Church those who received baptism on the sick-bed. Most of the Fathers considered such baptism valid; though it was a question often raised whether it should be repeated or not, if the sick recovered. The ordination of a clenicus for the presbytery was objected to; and the synod of Neo-Cæsarea (314) forbade to ordain a clenicus priest.

CLOISTER (from the Latin claustrum, an "enclosure") meant originally simply the wall surrounding a monastery, but became gradually applied to the whole establishment, synonymous with monastery; as, for instance, in the capitularies of Charlemagne. A little later it acquired a more special sense (now the most generally used), denoting the arcades which surround the inner court of a monastery, and which were used by the monks as places of study, meditation, and recreation.

CLOTHING AND ORNAMENTS OF THE HE-BREWS. The collective name for clothes is begadim, which were made out of linen, wool, and cotton, although silk is also mentioned (Ezek. xvi. 10; Rev. xviii. 22). Clothing prepared from wool and linen was prohibited (Lev. xix. 19; Deut. xxii. 11). Costly clothing was of divers colors and of needlework. Luxury in, and imitation of, foreign fashions, are often censured (Isa. iii. 16; Zeph. ii. 8). The costume of both sexes was very similar: there was sufficient difference, however, to mark the sex. The articles of clothing common to men and women were: 1. The under-garment, which was held together by a girdle, and besides which a linen shirt (sadin) is sometimes mentioned. A person who had only this under-garment on was called "naked" (1 Sam. xix. 24; Job. xxiv. 10; Isa. xx. 2). Persons in high stations wore two under-garments; the outer one being called meil, a robe (1 Sam. xv. 27, xviii. 4, xxiv. 5; Job i. 20). A Chaldee costume was the patish, or mantle (Dan. iii. 21). 2. The over-garment, for which different expressions are given, and which was thrown around the person. Poor people and travellers also used the outer garment as night-clothes. Both sexes made out of the superabundant folds in front a pocket or lap. Priests alone wore a kind of drawers. Besides these dresses, women wore veils. Both sexes covered the head with a turban, made of divers articles, and in different forms: hence, from its costliness, it is also called "an ornament," "beauty." Gloves were not unknown; yet they appear not to have been used as a part of the attire, but by workmen as a protection of the hands from injury and soiling (cf. Mishna, Chelim, xvi. 6, xxiv. 15, xxvii. 3). The covering of the feet were sandals of leather or wood, bound to the foot with thongs: they were dispensed with indoors, and put on when leaving the house. On entering of sacred places the sandals were cast off.

Rending the clothes was a sign of nervous irritation and of mourning. Only the high priest was forbidden to rend his garment. Lepers also had to rend their clothes. In times of distress and sorrow, sackcloth (of coarse stuff) was worn. Prophets also used this kind of habiliments to express their sorrow over the sins of the people. On solemn occasions, however, the Israelites used so-called state dresses. Kings and nobles had a goodly wardrobe, which was superintended by the keeper of the clothes (2 Chron. xxxiv. 22). Such costly garments were also used as presents (Gen. xlv. 22; Esth. iv. 4, vi. 8, 11). Persons changed their clothes for religious reasons when they had become ceremonially unclean; and those in eminent stations, and females, anointed and perfumed their garments (Ps. xlv. 9; Cant. iv. 11). Public reverence and homage toward the monarch consisted in spreading the garments along the way; and the ribbon of blue attached to the outer garments was a sign of piety, especially of Pharisaic piety, the longer these ribbons were. To shake the garment was a sign of abhorrence (Acts xviii. 6), and to exchange it with another, a sign of friendship (1 Sam. xviii. 4). A person elevated to a post of honor was solemnly invested with the clothes of his office (Gen. xli. 42), and it was regarded as a disgrace when the clothes were half cut off.

As for the ornaments, they were especially common to the female sex, although both sexes wore bracelets (2 Sam. i. 10; Num. xxxi. 50). Besides, we find ear-rings, which (according to Job xii. 11) were also worn by men. So-called ear-pendants (Judg. viii. 26; Isa. iii. 19) were also attached to the ear-rings. Other ornaments were the nose-rings, made of precious metal or ivory; the signet, which was suspended by a string; necklaces formed of perforated gold drops strung together; to which must be added the anklets, an especial ornament of the women, which were connected with step-chains to announce their coming, and to either attract or chase away the opposite sex.

CLOVIS (Cludocus, Chlodovechus, Ludovicus, Ludwig, Louis), King of the Franks 481-511; defeated Syagrius in 486; extended his dominion from the Somme to the Seine, and fixed his residence at Soissons. In 492 he married Clotilda, a Burgundian princess, a Christian and a Catholic; and a happy incident, turning the battle of Zulpich to his advantage, induced him to embrace Christianity, together with the greater part of his warriors and subjects. It is related, that, when he heard the story of the crucifixion of Christ, he exclaimed, "Would I had been there with my valiant Franks to avenge him!" He was baptized upon Christmas Day, 496. This event contributed very much to bring the Teutonic races in closer connection with the Christian Church and Roman civilization; and the circumstance that he became a Catholic, while the princes of Burgundy and of the Visigothic realm in Southern France were Arians, exercised also a considerable influence on the development of the Roman Church. Partly from political, and partly from religious reasons, Clovis attacked the Visigothic king, Alaric II., defeated him, and extended the boundary of the Frankish Empire to Bordeaux. The principal source to his life is GREGORY OF TOURS: Historia Francorum, II. 27-43. See JUNGHANS: Geschichte der fränkischen Könige Childerich und Chlodovech, Göttingen, 1857.

CLUGNY. Towards the end of the ninth century, monastic life had sunk very low in France, partly because the monasteries had grown wealthy and were badly governed, and partly on account of the uncertainty which prevailed in all public life. Duke William of Aquitania, called the Pious, thought to save monasticism by reforming it. In 910 he founded a new monastery at Clugny, Cluniacum in Burgundy, endowed it well, and placed at its head Berno, a descendant of the ruling family of Burgundy, and Abbot of Beaume in the diocese of Dijon. Berno enforced the strictest observance of the rules of St. Benedict; and this severity struck a rich vein of sympathy in the time. The monastery immediately filled up with monks. Under his successor Odo (927-941) seventeen other monasteries joined the congregation of Clugny; and the success of the establishment continued increasing under Aymardus (941-948), Mayolus (948-994), and Odilo (994-1048). Clugny became the reformer, not only of the order of St. Benedict, but of monastic life in general. Its rules, Consuetudines Cluniacenses, first collected in the beginning of the tenth century by the monk Bernard (HERRGOTT: Vetus Disciplina Monastica, Paris, 1726), then in 1070 by the monk Ulric (D'ACHERY: Spicilegium, T. I.), and finally by Petrus Venerabilis (Biblioth. Cluniacen., p. 1353), were generally adopted; while the popes vied with each other in conferring new privileges on the establishment. Its abbots bore the title of archiabbates. Alexander II. decreed that no bishop or other prelate could lay the ban upon the place. Urban II. gave the abbot episcopal emblems, and exempted the monastery and its estates from the jurisdiction of the Bishop of Mâcon. Towards the end of the eleventh century three popes — Gregory VII., Urban II., and Paschalis II. — issued from the congregation. The monastery itself was the largest in Christendom. In 1245 it received at one time Pope Innocent IV. and the French king, with their whole retinue. Its church was one of the most magnificent built during the middle ages, ornamented with wall and glass pictures, and embroidered tapestries, and stocked with furniture of gold and bronze.

In the beginning of the twelfth century the discipline slackened; and the establishment was impoverished during the incompetent rule of Pontius. He finally abdicated, and went on a pilgrimage to the Holy Land; but on his return he fell upon the monastery, and sacked it. Under Petrus Venerabilis it rose again. The number of monks increased from two hundred to four hundred and sixty; and three hundred and fourteen abbeys belonged to the congregation; but the improvement was only temporary. The further history of Clugny is a steady decline. The abbot lost his power. In order to defend itself against the counts of Châlons, Clugny invoked the protection of the French king, and the monastery was surrounded with walls, and transformed into a fortress. Both the popes and the French kings interfered in the election of abbots. In the beginning of the sixteenth century the office became a commendam in the House of Guise. In 1744 a royal ordinance placed the establishment under the jurisdiction of the Bishop of Mâcon. The internal decay, however, was still worse. In vain Abbot Yvo of Vergy (1269) founded the College de Clugny at Paris in order to encourage studies and literary pursuits among the monks. In vain several abbots tried to introduce reforms, or at least to better the discipline. The whole result was a split in the order between the old Cluniacenses and the Reformates, which gave rise to much haggling, and even scandal. The whole organization was in a state of dissolution when the Constituent Assembly (1790) confiscated the property, and sold the church and the buildings to the city. The church was broken down. The last abbot, Cardinal Dominique de la Rochefoucauld, whose rare visits to Clugny had been marked by drinking-bouts and lascivious festivities, died in 1800. See Biblioth. Cluniacen., Paris, 1614; LORAIN: Essai Historique sur l'Abbaye de Clugny, Dijon, 1839, which book, however, is full of circumlocution and bombast. C. SCHMIDT.

COADJUTOR is the assistant of an ecclesiastic who by sickness or age is prevented from fulfilling the duties of his office, and may be appointed temporarily or perpetually; in the latter case with or without right of succession. Generally, however, the name is applied only to the assistant of a bishop. According to an old canon no successor shall be appointed as long as the bishop himself is alive (c. 5, 6, Can. VII. qu. I. [Cyprian. a. 252], c. 3, 4, Can. VIII. qu. I. [Conc. Antiochen. a. 332, c. 23]); and in case of his being disabled the neighboring bishops shall come to his aid, or a dispensator, intercessor, interventor, shall be appointed (c. 1, Can. VII. qu. I. [Gregor. I. a. 601]). Such appointments were originally made by the provincial synods, though with the consent of the Pope; but, later on, the Pope reserved this causa episcopalis, like all causæ majores, for his own decision (c. 13, 14, cit. c. 17. cod. [Zacharias ad Bonifacium a. 748]; c. 5, 6, X. de clerico ægrotante [III. 6], [Innocent. III. a. 1204; Honorius III.]; cap. un. de clerico ægrot. in VI. [III. 5], [Bonif. VIII. a. 1298]). The old principle, ne in una urbe duo sint episcopi (Conc. Nicæn. a. 325 c. 8), was preserved, at least formally, by consecrating the coadjutor on the title of some other church. The Council of Trent further decreed (sess. XXV. cap. 7, de reform.) that coadjutores should be appointed at cathedral churches and monasteries only in cases of absolute necessity, and that they should never acquire the right of succession, except after a careful investigation of all circumstances by the Pope.

COBB, Sylvanus, D.D., a Universalist minister; b. at Norway, Me., July, 1799; wrote a Commentary on the New Testament, and other works, and was editor of a denominational paper for almost twenty years; d. in East Boston, Mass., Oct. 31, 1866.

COBHAM, Lord (Sir John Oldcastle), a prominent supporter of the Lollards; b. in Herefordshire about 1360; martyred at London, Dec. 25, 1417. He married about 1408 Joanne (whose fourth husband he was, and who married again after his decease), grand-daughter of Baron Cobham, and by right of his wife's title sat in the House of Lords. He was a brave soldier, an able statesman, a faithful friend. He was called the "good Lord Cobham." He seems to have been early drawn toward the Lollards (see title), and to have freely used his wealth in defence and propagation of their doctrines; while his castle sheltered many a wandering Lollard preacher, to whose ministrations he listened with delight. His interest may have been at the start partly political; but at all events it was profound. He employed John Purvey, Wiclif's companion and fellow Bible-translator, to write books, and had Wiclif's treatises copied and distributed. In 1391 he delivered a speech in the House of Commons against the papal political despotism, which had the practical effect of leading to a law which forbade the publication of excommunications issued by the Pope. In 1395 he wrote a book in prose and poetry which exposed the abominations of the Church. After his marriage he was employed in France (1412) to support by English arms the interest of Philip the Bold, Duke of Burgundy. On his return, his troubles began. His bold stand on behalf of Lollardism led to persecution, from which his rank, wealth, and popularity could not save him; and after trial he was sentenced to be burnt as a "pernicious and detestable heretic." A respite of forty days was, however, granted, perhaps in the hope that he would recant. On the night of Oct. 27-28, 1413, William Fisher, a leather merchant, came with a number of determined burghers, and delivered him. For three months he lay concealed in the city. Very probably the king connived at his escape: at all events, no steps were taken against him until some disturbances on the part of the Lollards raised the rumor that Lord Cobham headed a conspiracy against the State. The king issued a proclamation against him (Jan. 11, 1414), and set a price of a thousand marks ($3,220) upon his head (an enormous amount in those days), and five hundred marks for information which should lead to his capture. Lord Cobham left his hiding-place, and fled to Wales, where he was discovered early in 1417, and in the fall of that year taken prisoner. On Dec. 14 he was brought before the Lords in Parliament assembled, and the proclamation of January, 1414, read to him. As he had no defence which was acceptable, he was sentenced a second time; and on Christmas Day he was carried from the Tower through the city to St. Giles-in-the-Fields, and there hung in a horizontal position by means of three chains, and burnt over a fire kindled on the ground. He died praising God, and exhorting the people to follow Christ.

COCCEIUS (Latin form of KOCH), Johannes, b. in Bremen, Aug. 9, 1603; d. in Leyden, Nov. 4, 1669. He pursued his theological studies at the University of Franeker in West Friesland. In 1629 he became professor of biblical philology in Bremen, in 1636 professor in Franeker, in 1650 professor of theology in Leyden. He laid down the guiding exegetical principle, that every passage must be interpreted according to its context, and have only that sense to which the context leads. He drew his theology directly from the Bible, and from it alone; and thus he put himself in opposition to the scholastics and the Cartesians. And since the Bible is the history of redemption, in the form of a covenant between God and man after the fall, he logically conceived of the relation between the parties before the fall as also a covenant. But this covenant is not, like a human one, an agreement for mutual service; rather it is one-sided. The fundamental law of every covenant of God with men is, he says, that man is receiver, God giver. Man was qualified by his creation to receive it. He was free, rational, and holy. The first Covenant was "of Works." God gave man the promise of eternal felicity, on condition that man remained holy, as he was able to do. This was his work. But he fell, and accordingly was cursed. After the fall he was still bound to perfect obedience and faith. God, however, who is rich in mercy, put in place of the Covenant of Works the "Covenant of Grace," upon precisely similar principles. God yet stands as free giver; man, as willing receiver. Cocceius shows that the fulfilment of the latter required the sending of Jesus Christ, and in the biblical way handles the doctrines of redemption under nine divisions, — its purpose (the promised grace), its mode (gratuitous), its founder (a mediator), its means (faith), its recipients (believers), its cause (God's good pleasure), its revelation (the Bible), the method of its application (the operation of the Holy Spirit), its ultimate object (the glory of God). — The history of the second Covenant falls into three divisions (economies), — the ante-legal (the law under the form of conscience, the grace under which the patriarchal protevangel manifested itself, and the kingdom of God existed in the form of the family), the legal (the written law, grace in the form of ceremonial types and prophecy, the kingdom of God existed in the nation), and the post-legal economy (in which Christ himself appeared as the completely fulfilled personal law, and as the personal grace, as the personal word, and in which the kingdom of God exists in universal form). — The effects of the Covenant of Grace are the happiness of the individual soul, the conversion of physical death from a punishment into a deliverance from the body of sin, and, lastly, the resurrection of the body. See his Summa Doctrinæ de Fœdere et Testamentis Dei, 1648, 2d ed., 1653.

The Federal theology of Cocceius does not rest upon the doctrine of predestination, as did the teaching of the Protestant scholastics of the sixteenth century. Man, he taught, was not a machine by which the divine decree was carried out, but a person who received the divine grace into his heart, and by it was led unto perfection. See EBRARD: Christliche Dogmatik, § 257. As was to be expected, the scholastic school attacked him, and called him a heretic. He replied that "orthodoxy à la mode" was the ruin of the Reformed Church, because it prided itself upon its orthodoxy, and yet was full of worldliness. Cocceius had the spiritually-minded upon his side. He took the substantially pietistic ground, that one should not listen to those preachers who regarded the work of teaching religion merely as a profession. Unhappily the controversy took a political turn. The aristocratic party which had supported Arminius supported the Cocceians; the Oranian party, his opponents. At one time a deeper split than Arminianism had made threatened the Netherland Church; but by pacificatory measures peace was restored, and it was established by law that one out of every three ordinarii at each university should be a Cocceian.

As an exegete Cocceius is open to the charge of fancifulness, but not more so than other students of prophecy of his day. His influence is best seen in his pupil, Campeius Vitranga. But in the history of theology he plays a very important part, in that he delivered the Reformed Church from the tyranny of the scholastic orthodoxy, and taught her to give heed to her true character and work as emphatically a Bible Church, and, as such, capable of great theological freedom. But he also lays theology in all churches under great obligation, in that his system of the covenants was the first attempt at a biblical theology. He built his system upon the Bible, and purposely arranged his theology under the biblical categories. In this method we perceive the influence of his teacher, Sixtinus Amama, who emphasized the study of the original text, and carried through the synod a measure requiring all candidates in theology to pass an examination in Greek and Hebrew.

The Works of Cocceius and his School. — He wrote, besides his Summa Doctrinæ, Summa Theologicæ (2d ed., 1665), which was more conventional in its use of terms, but not less independent in its explanations and contents. Among his followers are Wilhelm Momma and Hermann Witsius, who carried out the analogies between the two covenants with trifling ingenuity (De Œconomia Fœderum Dei cum Hominibus, Leeuwarden, 1685); but far more important is Franz Burmann (Synopsis Theologiæ et Speciatim Œconomice Fœderum Dei, Utrecht, 1671), who, in general, follows his teacher in his arrangement of his material, but enters into the discussion of all the scholastic questions which had genuine value, and embodies the results of the Federal theology in a perma-ment and lasting form: lastly, Van Til (Compendium Theologicæ, Bern, 1703; Theologicæ utriusque Compendium, Leyden, 1704) set forth a theology which had its roots in both the Federal and Cartesian schools.

The complete works of Cocceius appeared in twelve volumes folio, including two volumes Anektota (Opera Omnia, Theologica, Exegetica, Didactica, Polemica, Philologica, 3d ed., auctior et emendatior, Amsterdam, 1701). They include commentaries on nearly the whole Bible, essays, controversial and expository (among them one on the sabbath as a Jewish institution not binding upon the Christian Church, although he favored its observance on the ground of expediency), sermons, a Hebrew and Chaldee lexicon compiled at the request of a Brandenburg princess, and letters.

COCHLÆUS (Johann Dobeneck), b. at Wendelstein, near Nuremberg, 1479; d. at Breslau, 1552; was successively rector of the Latin School in Nuremberg, dean at the Church of Our Lady at Frankfort, secretary to Duke Georg of Saxony at Dresden, canon at Breslau, etc., and led a very erratic life as one of the busiest and most passionate adversaries of the Reformation. He was present at the diets of Worms, Ratisbon, and Augsburg, and at the disputation of Ratisbon. But as a debater he was too excited and violent. He had his force as a pamphleteer always ready, and well-nigh inexhaustible. He is, if not the inventor, at all events one of the first representatives, of the view according to which the Reformation was nothing but the stupid result of an incidental jealousy between the Dominican and Augustinian orders; and in his Commentaria de Actis et Scriptis M. Lutheri and Historia Hussitarum he derives with unexampled cynicism the causes of the grandest spiritual movements from the meanest personal circumstances. See URB. DE WELDIGE-CREMER: De Joannis Cochlei Vita et Scriptis, Münster, 1865; CARL OTTO: Johannes Cochleus, Breslau, 1874.

CŒLESTIUS, a native of Ireland; studied law; became a monk, and from 405 to 431 is often mentioned in the history of the Church as the friend and collaborator of Pelagius. He was condemned by a council of Carthage (412), but was soon after ordained a priest at Ephesus, and acquitted of heresy by Zosimus in 417. In the following year, however, he was condemned by a synod in Rome; and, after the condemnation of Pelagianism by the Council of Ephesus (431), he is not heard of any more. Of his writings (a Confessio Fidei, addressed to Zosimus, and some epistles) only fragments are still extant in the writings of Augustine and Jerome.

CŒLESYRIA. According to the early classic geographers, Cœlesyria included only the long valley which separates the parallel ranges of Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon. Subsequently, however, the name came to have a wider application, including not only the region surrounding Damascus, but also a large part of the country east of the Jordan. Cœlesyria thus expanded contained nearly all the cities of Decapolis within its limits; and, though the name does not occur in the Bible, it is frequently mentioned in the Apocryphal books (1 Esd. ii. 24, 27, iv. 48, vi. 29; 1 Macc. x. 69; 2 Macc. xiv. 3, 5, 8), and by Josephus (Ant. XIII. 4, 2; XIV. 9, 5; 11, 4) and other writers. It has a legendary history of its own, attested by curious monuments. At Kerak Nuh is shown the grave of Noah, one hundred and thirty-two feet long; and on the opposite side of the plain is the tomb of Neby Shift, the prophet Seth; while the temples at Ba'albek have astonished the world for many centuries. The massive foundations upon which they were built by Greek and Roman architects must have been placed there at a time too remote for even tradition to reach; and long before "Toi, King of Hamath," sent presents to David (2 Sam. viii. 9-11), the Hittites of that region were sufficiently powerful to contend with the Pharaohs of Egypt for supremacy in the Valley of Cœlesyria, or Hollow-Syria, as its original Greek name signifies.

That remarkable valley, now called el Būkā'a, — "the cleft," — extends to the north-east, from Jubb Jenin, under Hermon, for about one hundred miles, having an average width of seven miles. Its surface as seen from above seems to be quite level; but this appearance is deceptive. It is, in fact, an elevated plateau rising gradually northward, until, at the north-east end, it is nearly four thousand feet above the level of the sea, — a cold, rugged, and barren region.

The northern end of the Būkā'a is drained by the Orontes, called el' Asy, — "the rebellious," — because its course is northward, contrary to the other rivers of Syria. Its most southern source is at Lebweh, the Libo of the ancients. By means of canals the water is conducted far away to the north, to irrigate fields of Indian corn, the chief product cultivated along the numerous streams that form the Orontes. The main permanent source of that river is the copious fountain that flows out from under the cliffs of Lebanon, near Mughârat er Râhib. Passing below Kamû'a Hürmul, a unique monument with hunting-scenes carved upon its four sides, the Orontes irrigates the extensive corn-growing plains of the Biblical Riblah (2 Kings xxv. 6), and the equally fertile region around the small Lake of Kedes. The shapeless ruins near Tell Neby Mindau may mark the site of the chief city of the Hittite Kingdom. Issuing from the artificial Lake of Kedes, six miles south of Hums, the river pursues its winding course through the land of Hamath, past the extensive ruins of Apamea, and along the eastern foot-hills of the Nusairiyeh Mountains, where it turns westward, and, passing by Antioch, it enters the sea near the base of Mount Casius.

The central and southern portions of the Būkā'a are comparatively level, and their fertility and beauty are entirely due to the abundance of water. Perennial streams descend from the mountains on either side, and copious fountains rise in the plain itself, in such positions that the water can be conducted to all parts of its surface. Looking down upon the Būkā'a from any one of the hundred stand-points on Lebanon and Hermon, the beholder is charmed with the checkered and endlessly-varied expanse of blending wheat-fields, green or golden, recently-ploughed land, black or reddish-brown, and broad belts of dun-colored fallow-ground, reaching to and climbing up the gray foot-hills of the mountains.

Through the centre of the Būkâ'a meanders the Litâny, the ancient Leontes, one of the longest and largest rivers of Syria. It rises at 'Ain es Sultân, above Ba'albek, and is joined, as it flows southward, by many tributaries, amongst them el Berdûny, which descends from snow-crowned Lebanon, and the large remitting fountain near 'Anjar, that flows out from the very roots of Anti-Lebanon, near the site of the ancient Chalcis. Below Jubb Jenin the Litâny enters a profound gorge, along which it has worn its way through Southern Lebanon to the sea, near Tyre.

Cœlesyria, celebrated in ancient times for its fertility, and its numerous and warlike inhabitants, large cities, and magnificent temples, is now merely an insignificant district of the Turkish Empire.

W. M. THOMSON.

CÆLICOLÆ, the name of a Jewish sect first mentioned in 408, in a decree of the Emperor Honorius. Of their doctrines the decree says nothing: it only forbids their meetings. Afterwards Honorius had occasion to issue another decree, especially against the Cœlicolæ, enjoining either to embrace Christianity within a year, or to suffer the penalty of heresy. Their chief crime was, that they had seduced some Christians to embrace Judaism; and this crime was considered as treason, and punished in the severest possible manner. Augustine says (Ep. 163) that they were numerous in Africa, and used a peculiar form of baptism; but it is not correct to infer from this fact that they had borrowed their custom of baptizing from the Christians, as they might have taken it from the Jewish baptism of proselytes. Like the Jews, they often used the word "Heaven" instead of "God:" hence their name of "Heaven-worshippers." See SCHMID: Historia Cœlicolarum, Helmstädt, 1794.

COFFIN, Charles, a hymnist, b. at Buzancy, 1676; d. in Paris, 1749. He succeeded M. Rollin, the famous historian, in 1712, as principal of the College of Dormans-Beauvais, University of Paris, and held that position with distinguished success until his death. He was chosen rector of the university in 1718. Several of the Latin hymns which he contributed to the Paris Breviary are found in our collections in John Mason Neale's and John Chandler's renderings. In the original they are much commended for purity of style and felicity of expression. His works appeared in 2 vols., Paris, 1755, with prefatory "Éloge" by Lenglet.

COKE, Thomas, D.C.L., first superintendent of the Methodist-Episcopal Church; b. at Brecon, South Wales, Sept. 9, 1747; d. at sea, on a voyage to Ceylon, May 2, 1814. He was a gentleman commoner of Jesus College, Oxford, and curate of South Petherton, Somersetshire; but in the latter place he came under Methodist influences, and in 1777 joined Wesley, to whom he was "a right hand," and who in 1784, at Bristol, set him apart as a superintendent of the work among the Methodists in America. "Wesley meant the ceremony," says Mr. Tyerman, "to be a mere formality likely to recommend his delegate to the favor of the Methodists in America: Coke, in his ambition, wished and intended it to be considered as an ordination to a bishopric" (Life of Wesley, vol. III. p. 434). Coke and two elders arrived in America, Nov. 3, 1784, held a conference at Baltimore, Dec. 24, at which he ordained Francis Asbury to the office of superintendent, and with characteristic energy discharged his duties in this country. But he by no means confined his attention to America. On the contrary, he traversed Great Britain and Ireland, crossed the ocean eighteen times at his own expense, founded a mission among the negroes in the West Indies, and one also in the East Indies, and it was upon his voyage thither that he died. "During his life it was not deemed necessary to organize a missionary society among the Wesleyans, for he embodied that great interest in his own person." Coke was not only a missionary and organizer, he was also an author. His principal writings are (in connection with Henry Moore) Life of John Wesley (London, 1792), Commentary on the Old and New Testaments (finished 1807, 6 vols.), History of the West Indies (1808, 3 vols.). See S. DREW: Life of Thomas Coke, N.Y., 1837; R. STEEL: Burning and Shining Lights, London, 1864.

COLERIDGE, Samuel Taylor, poet, critic, philosopher, and theologian; b. at Ottery St. Mary, Oct. 21, 1772; d. at Highgate, July 25, 1834. He was the youngest child of the Rev. John Coleridge, vicar of Ottery St. Mary, Devonshire, and master of the free grammar-school founded by Henry VIII. in that town. His mother, whose maiden name was Ann Bowdon, managed skilfully the large household; while his father, a learned, guileless, good man, absent-minded and eccentric, devoted himself to his parish and school, and to writing curious unsalable books. The childhood of Samuel Taylor, according to his own account, had in it far more of shade than of sunshine. Although his father was very fond of him, and he was his "mother's darling," yet, for that very reason, Molly the nurse, who idolized his brother Frank, hated and tormented him. He became morbid and fretful, never played except by himself, read incessantly, never had the child's habits, never thought or spoke as a child. The year after his father's death, which occurred in 1781, Judge Buller, a friend of the family, obtained for him a presentation to Christ's Hospital, London, of which the noted Bowyer was then head master. Here he spent eight years, during the first half of which he describes himself as "a playless day-dreamer, a helluo librorum." Among his school-fellows was Charles Lamb, who, in one of the Essays of Elia, has drawn a vivid picture of him as "the inspired charity-boy." In February, 1791, he entered at Jesus College, Cambridge. The fame of his genius and classical attainments had preceded him, and raised high anticipations of his university career, which were by no means realized. He was studious, and a great reader, as well as brilliant talker; but his only college honor was a gold medal for the Greek ode. In November, 1793, in a fit of despondency, he suddenly left Cambridge for London, where, under the pressure of want, he enlisted as a private in the Fifteenth Light Dragoons. After serving four months, he was discharged, and went back to his college. About this time he openly avowed himself a Unitarian. He was also full of the generous but wild enthusiasm for liberty and the rights of man, aroused by the French Revolution. In the summer of 1794 he first met Robert Southey, with whom he formed a close friendship. He quitted college without taking a degree, and devoted himself to literature, lecturing also, and preaching occasionally in Unitarian pulpits. A scheme to emigrate to America with Southey and others, and to establish on the banks of the Susquehanna a new social order, called "Pantisocracy," perished in its birth. In October, 1795, he married, at Bristol, Sarah Fricker, whose sister Edith soon after became the wife of Southey. He resided for a while at Bristol, or in its vicinity, and later at Nether Stowey, near his faithful friend, Thomas Poole. At Bristol he became intimate with Mr. Cottle, who in 1796 published his Juvenile Poems. Early in this year he started a short-lived miscellany called The Watchman. In 1798 appeared at Bristol the famous Lyrical Ballads, written jointly by himself and Wordsworth. During this period he composed his finest poems. In September, 1798, in company with Wordsworth and his sister, he went to Germany, where he passed fourteen months, mostly at Göttingen, supported by the liberality of Thomas and Josiah Wedgwood. Soon after returning home, he made his admirable translation of Schiller's Wallenstein, and began to write for the Morning Post. Later he contributed to the Courier. In 1801 he settled at Keswick, remaining there until 1804, when he went to Malta. Here he acted for a time as secretary of the governor, Sir Alexander Ball. At Rome, where he spent some months, he met William von Humboldt, Tieck the poet, and Allston the painter. With the latter he formed a friendship that lasted for life. In 1806 he returned to England, and settled again in the lake country. In 1810 he betook himself to London, and for several years seems to have had no certain dwelling-place. This period was one of severe suffering, trials, and disappointment, relieved, however, by the hospitable kindness of Mr. and Mrs. Basil Montague and other devoted friends. In April, 1816, he became an inmate of the family of James Gillman, a surgeon of Highgate, near London. The friendship and watchful, affectionate care of Mr. and Mrs. Gillman afforded him a refuge and home during the rest of his days; and for this service their names should be ever held in grateful remembrance. From the time he settled at Keswick in 1801 until 1816, his literary activity consisted largely in giving courses of lectures in London and Bristol, and in writing The Friend, a new edition of which, recast and enlarged, appeared in 1818, with a beautiful dedication to Mr. and Mrs. Gillman. The happy effect of his life at Highgate soon showed itself also in the Biographia Literaria and the Lay Sermons, and, a few years later, in the Aids to Reflections (1825), and Church and State (1830). After his death, four volumes of his Literary Remains, three volumes of Essays on his own Times, Confessions of an Inquiring Spirit, and a fragment on The Idea of Life, were published. In the retirement of his last years he was resorted to as an oracle of wisdom by disciples and admirers from far and near; and some of the ablest minds of the next generation were formed under his influence.

It was while at Highgate that Coleridge at last conquered the terrible habit of opium-eating. He had first resorted to the fatal drug as a relief from disease and pain; but the taste grew into an insatiable appetite, involved him in untold miseries, and brought him to the verge of ruin. While passing through this desolate valley of humiliation, he took his deepest lessons in the school of Christian repentance. "I feel," he wrote, "with an intensity unfathomable by words, my utter nothingness, impotence, and worthlessness in and for myself." And here, too, he learned the infinite fullness and power of God's grace in Christ, the Redeemer of the world. He died in perfect peace on the 25th of July, 1834, in the sixty-second year of his age. The writer once received from the lips of Mrs. Gillman a very touching account of his last days on earth, and also many interesting details respecting his manner of life during the eighteen years which he passed at Highgate. Her picture of him, both living and dying, was that of a man as remarkable for the sweetness of his disposition and his unaffected piety and goodness, as for the splendor of his intellect. Shortly before his death he composed his own epitaph, which closes thus:—

"Mercy, for praise; to be forgiven, for fame—
He asked and hoped through Christ. Do thou the same."

Coleridge was one of the most remarkable men of his age. The annals of literature, indeed, hardly furnish another instance of such a union of poet, philosopher, and theologian in one and the same person. And, what is specially noteworthy, his genius as a thinker blossomed even earlier than his genius as a poet. "Come back into memory, like as thou wert in the dayspring of thy fancies, with hope like a fiery column before thee,—the dark pillar not yet turned,—S. T. C., logician, metaphysician, bard!" (LAMB). The impression he made upon his contemporaries is shown by the testimonies which some of the most eminent of them have left on record. Here is that of John Foster: "His mind contains an astonishing map of all sorts of knowledge; while in his power and manner of putting it to use he displays more of what we mean by the term 'genius' than any mortal I ever saw, or ever expect to see." Shortly after his death, De Quincey speaks of him as "This illustrious man, the largest and most spacious intellect, the subtlest and most comprehensive, in my judgment, that has yet existed amongst men." Less extravagant than this, but not less emphatic, is the witness borne by Sir Walter Scott, Hazlitt, Wordsworth, Dr. Arnold, Mill, Julius Hare, Maurice, and others, to his extraordinary gifts. And in full accord with this exalted opinion of his own countrymen was that of the German philosopher Schelling.¹

¹ Schelling once expressed to the writer his warm admiration for Coleridge, whom he pronounced the first Englishman who fully understood German philosophy. In one of his lectures he borrows from Coleridge the remark that mythology "is not allegorical, but tautological," and then subjoins a note in praise of the "highly-gifted Briton," and acquitting him of the charge of plagiarism, so sharply made by some of his own countrymen. "Für den erwähnten treffenden Ausdruck überlasse ich ihm gerne die von seinen eigenen Landesleuten scharf,

As a poet Coleridge occupies a place not only high, but almost unique. The Ancient Mariner and Christabel, not to mention other poems, are wonderful creations, full of imaginative power and beauty. He was also pre-eminent as a critic of literature and art. The notes of his lectures on Shakspeare are rich in subtle, discriminating thought, and original views; while his dissertation on Wordsworth, in the Biographia Literaria, is unsurpassed by any thing of the kind in the language. His writings on political subjects, whether questions of the day or the vital principles of government, are marked by deep reflection, ardent zeal for both liberty and law, and a skilful use of the lessons of history. If not always convincing, he is always fresh and instructive.

But the great work of his life belongs to the sphere of Christian philosophy. Here he was without a rival in his generation; and his influence was alike profound and far-reaching. Having fought his own way, through much error and doubt, to the full light of truth, he strove to guide other minds to the same light by showing, to use his own words, that Christianity, "though not discoverable by human reason, is yet in accordance with it; that link follows link by necessary consequence; that religion passes out of the ken of reason, only when the eye of reason has reached its own horizon; and that faith is then but its continuation, even as the day softens away into the sweet twilight, and twilight, hushed and breathless, steals into the darkness." As a philosopher he was a power rather than a system-maker; and his power was exerted almost as much in conversation as by his writings. When he came upon the stage, the mind of England was fast bound in the systems of mechanical thought and empiricism which ruled the last century. Locke and Paley were the oracles of popular wisdom. A subtle rationalism was everywhere at work sapping the ancient foundations in morals and religion. Coleridge undertook, at first almost single-handed, to re-assert the claims of a spiritual philosophy. In order to this, he laid the utmost stress upon the difference in kind between reason and understanding, — a distinction familiar already to German thought, and as old, indeed, as Aristotle. A careful statement of his views on this point may be found in Aids to Reflection, the most mature and complete of his works. He also revived the Platonic doctrine of ideas; that is, of the archetypal forms, or eternal verities, in the divine mind. Upon these two points his battle with the dominant systems largely hinged. His philosophical method and opinions were greatly influenced by Kant, of whom he was an ardent admirer. He owed much also to Schelling and Jacobi. Of Hegel he seems to have known nothing. His writings, while full of seeds of the highest thought and the noblest wisdom, are yet disciplinary rather than doctrinal: they contain no fully-developed system. For this very reason they are, perhaps, even the better fitted to aid inquiring minds, especially youthful minds, in the search for truth, and in solving the deep problems of existence both earthward and heavenward.

His religious temper and sympathies are indicated by his fondness for such divines as Luther, Hooker, Leighton, Donne, Baxter, Jeremy Taylor, and Bunyan. The writings of Archbishop Leighton and Pilgrim's Progress were his especial delight. As a theologian he revered the Fathers of the Reformation, and accepted heartily the catholic doctrines of faith, substantially as contained in the ancient creeds and in the great Protestant symbols. His orthodoxy has been warmly impugned, particularly in reference to inspiration and the atonement. It can hardly be denied that, in the re-action from what he called bibliolatry, he sometimes expressed himself incautiously, to say the least, on the question of inspiration. With regard to the atonement, whatever may be said about certain passages, the general tone of his later writings favors the conclusion that he was in substantial accord with the teaching of the Reformed churches on this subject. In general, it may be said that he anticipated, and furnished pregnant hints on the best way of meeting, most of the objections to revealed truth which have been raised by the sceptical science and speculation of the last fifty years. Whatever his faults and imperfections, whether as a man or an author, Coleridge must still be regarded as the most original, profound, and many-sided Christian thinker who has lived in England in the nineteenth century.

COLERIDGE, Hartley, b. at Clevedon, near Bristol, 1796; d. at Rydal, Westmoreland, Jan. 6, 1849; eldest son of Samuel Taylor Coleridge; was educated at Oriel College, Oxford. He inherited not a little of his father's poetical and conversational power. Some of his sonnets are very fine. The Worthies of Yorkshire and Lancashire, 1835, his most noted prose-work, has unusual merit.

ja zu scharf gerügten Entlehnungen aus meinen Schriften. . . . Einem wirklich congenialen Mann sollte man dergleichen nicht anrechnen." Some later writers, notably Mr. Carlyle, have spoken of him in a very different tone; but their estimate is not likely to be permanent. Sooner or later, wisdom is sure to be justified of her children.

He lies buried near the grave of Wordsworth in Grasmere churchyard. He was a frail mortal, but gifted with qualities which endeared him to such friends as Wordsworth and Southey, and led to the common saying, that he was no one's enemy but his own. See Poems by Hartley Coleridge, with an interesting memoir of his life by his brother Derwent, 2 vols., 1851. G. L. PRENTISS.

COLERIDGE, Sara, only daughter of Samuel Taylor Coleridge; b. at Keswick, 1803; d. in London, May 3, 1852. She passed most of her early years in the home of her uncle, Robert Southey. In 1829 she was married to her cousin, Henry Nelson Coleridge, editor of several of her father's works, and himself an author of note. While still a girl she translated from the Latin Martin Dobrizhoffer's Account of the Abipones, an Equestrian People of Paraguay, 3 vols., 1822. After the death of her husband (1843), she took his place as editor of her father's writings. She wrote a fairy-tale called Phantasmion, which was much admired. She possessed real learning, superior culture, no little power and acuteness of thought, and was a very lovely Christian woman. It was said of her, that her father "looked down into her eyes, and left in them the light of his own." See Memoir and Letters of Sara Coleridge, edited by her daughter, New York, 1874. G. L. COLERIDGE, Sir John Taylor, an eminent English jurist, nephew of Samuel Taylor Coleridge; b. at Tiverton, in Devonshire, 1790; d. at Ottery St. Mary, Feb. 11, 1876. He was educated at Oxford and the Middle Temple; became judge of the King's Bench in 1835, and privy councillor in 1858. He was an intimate friend, and the biographer, of the poet Keble.

COLET, John, Dean of St. Paul's, and founder of St. Paul's School (1512); b. at London, 1466; d. there Sept. 16, 1519, and was buried in St. Paul's Cathedral. He was one of the "Reformers before the Reformation." He took his M.A. at Oxford (1490), and went abroad (1493) to study Greek and Latin. On his return, in 1497, he publicly expounded Paul's Epistles at Oxford, and there became acquainted with Erasmus, with whom he maintained an intimate friendship. He was promoted to various positions, — made D.D. 1504, and Dean of St. Paul's 1505. His great reform was to introduce expository preaching, and a perpetual divinity-lecture on three days in each week, in St. Paul's Church. By his well-known disapproval of auricular confession, celibacy of the clergy, and other Roman practices, he was considered by the faithful little short of a heretic: hence he was subject to a variety of persecutions. He wrote Absolutissimus de octo orationis partium constructione Libellus, London, 1530; Rudimenta Grammatices, London, 1510 (a book designed for use in St. Paul's School, and dedicated to its first master, the famous George Lilly); Daily Devotions, or the Christian's Morning and Evening Sacrifice (Darling mentions only the edition of 1693). For his life, see the sketch, with portrait, in FULLER'S Abel Redevivus (sic), Nichols's ed., London, 1867, vol. I. pp. 112-125; SAMUEL KNIGHT: Life of Colet, London, 1724, Oxford, 1823; and recently in SEEBOHM: The Oxford Reformers of 1498 [Colet, Erasmus, and More], London, 1869.

COLIGNY, Gaspard de, b. Feb. 16, 1517, at Châtillon-sur-Loing, in the department of Loiret; d. in Paris, Aug. 24, 1572; was the second son of Gaspard de Châtillon, Marshal of France (d. 1522), and Louise de Montmorency, a sister of the famous constable of France, but became the head of the family, when, in 1533, the elder brother, Odet, was made a cardinal. Gaspard was a grave, pure, and proud character. Francis de Guise was his only friend. He fought with great distinction in Germany, Italy, and Spain, advanced rapidly on the military career, and was in 1547 made commander of the French infantry, among whose wild hordes he knew how to establish discipline. In 1552 he was made Admiral of France, and in 1555 Governor of Picardy. As such he signed the armistice of Vaucelles, Feb. 5, 1556; and, when Henry II. broke it, he felt both hurt and confounded. He was an honest man, and the papal dispensation weighed very little with him. Nevertheless, the war once renewed, he fought with all his might; and after the defeat of the constable at St. Quentin, Aug. 10, 1557, he actually saved Paris by holding the city of St. Quentin for seventeen days. On its surrender he was carried a prisoner into the Netherlands, where he was retained, first at Ecluse, then at Ghent, until the peace of Chateau-Cambrésis (1559). But from the prisons of Philip II. he returned a Protestant. He was not entirely a stranger to the Reformation. His mother was familiar with the "new ideas," and no priest was summoned to her death-bed (1547). His tutor, Berauld, was a friend of Erasmus. His wife, Charlotte de Laval, was strongly attracted by the movement; and his brother Andelot had openly embraced Protestantism. In the solitude of the prison the truth began to dawn upon the mind of Gaspard; and a letter from Calvin, Sept. 4, 1558, brought fuller clearness.

When they entered the military arena, the youthful friendship of Gaspard de Coligny and Francis de Guise soon became a jealous rivalry; and some years later, when, in the field of politics, they found themselves placed respectively at the head of two opposite parties, their rivalry grew into a deadly enmity. During the reign of Francis II. Guise lived at the court in power and splendor; Coligny, on his family estate, Châtillon, in quiet retirement. But when Francis II. suddenly died (Dec. 5, 1560), and Henry III. ascended the throne, the position of the two party-leaders was for a moment completely reversed. Coligny came into power, and he and his brother Andelot worked in perfect unison with the Chancellor l'Hôpital. Persecutions ceased, toleration was shown upon both sides, and there were fair prospects of ending the conflict with a peaceable settlement. But on March 1, 1562, the massacre of Vassy took place, and on April 2 the first religious war began with the occupation of Orléans by Andelot. On the one side, the Roman Catholics, the Guises, and Antoine of Navarre; on the other, the Protestants, Coligny, the Prince of Condé, and Henry of Navarre; and between the two parties, the court, the weak and vacillating king, and the craftily-calculating queen-dowager, Catherine of Medici. The war actually ended with the assassination of Francis de Guise by Poltrot de Mérey, in the camp before Orléans, Feb. 24, 1563; and March 19 peace was concluded at Amboise, by which freedom of conscience, and, within certain limits, liberty of worship, were granted to the Protestants. But the hatred between the House of Guise and Coligny was only deepened by the events. Poltrot declared that he had been encouraged to murder Francis de Guise by Coligny, Beza, etc.; and although the acts of the process (comp. Mémoires de Conde, IV. 285, 339; BEZA: Hist. Eccles. des Églises Réformées, II. 291, 310, 318) show, that, in this form, the accusation was an infamous calumny, it is, nevertheless, possible that Coligny was not altogether ignorant of what happened.

Four years of peace followed. But in the mean time the development of affairs in the Netherlands, the imprisonment of Egmont and Horn (Sept. 9, 1567), and rumors of a plan to capture the Prince of Condé and Coligny, made the Protestants suspicious; and the second religious war began. Coligny's scheme of taking possession of the person of the King at Monceaux, near Meaux, failed (Sept. 27, 1567); but the victory at St. Denis (Nov. 10, 1567) led to the peace of Longjumeau (March 23, 1568), by which the agreement of Amboise was renewed. The enmity, however, between the Roman-Spanish and Protestant-English parties, was too fierce not to break the peace; and within the same year the third religious war began. It ended with the peace of St. Germain (Aug. 2, 1570), after the battles of Jarnac, Moncontour, and Arnay le Duc. By this peace the cause of Protestantism in France seemed to be much improved. Charles IX. was averse to the Spanish direction which French politics lately had shown. Coligny was called to Blois Sept. 12, 1571; and the king seemed to listen to him with confidence. The negotiations for a marriage between Marguerite of Valois and Henry of Navarre finally succeeded. April 11, 1572, the marriage contract was signed, and Aug. 18 the wedding ceremony was celebrated. But Aug. 22, when Coligny, at eleven o'clock in the night, returned from the Louvre to his house (the present No. 144 Rue Rivoli), he was fired upon twice by one Maurevel, who escaped, and was brought home hard wounded. The next day the king visited him; but their intercourse was interrupted by the arrival of the queen-dowager. On the way back to the Louvre, the king confessed to his mother, that Coligny had given him certain warnings with respect to his councillors; and in the following night the men of the Duke of Guise penetrated into the house of Coligny, murdered him, and threw his body into the street, where the young Francis de Guise severed the head from the body. The head was sent, it is said, to Rome; while the body was dragged through the streets, and finally suspended in the gallows of Mountfauçon. Meanwhile the Massacre of the Day of St. Bartholomew took place, and several days elapsed before Marshal Montmorency had the body taken down and buried. An act of Parliament, Oct. 27, 1572, declared Coligny guilty of treason, and decreed that his escutcheon should be broken by the hangman, his castle be razed to the ground, and his children and children's children be treated as infamous; but it was cancelled by another act of Parliament, June 10, 1599.

LIT. — Of the writings of Coligny, the manuscript of a history of the religious wars was burnt by Catherine of Medici. A number of his letters have been published in Bulletin de la Société de l'Histoire du Protestantisme Français, Paris, 1852, especially in series I., II., XIV., and XXII., and in Archives des Missions Scientifiques et Littéraires, series III. COLLATION, in canon law, the conferring or bestowing of a benefice by a bishop who has it in his gift or patronage. Collation differs from institution, in that it proceeds at the bishop's own motion; and from presentation, in that it is the act of the bishop himself, while presentation is properly the act of a patron offering his clerical nominee to the bishop for institution into a benefice. See Dictionary of the English Church, s. v., London and N. Y., n. d. (1881).

COLLECT, a short prayer used in the Western churches, with these peculiarities, according to Blunt: "(1) An invocation; (2) A reason on which the petition is to be founded; (3) The petition itself, centrally placed, and always in few words; (4) The benefit hoped for; (5) A memorial of Christ's mediation, or an ascription of praise, or both." The two principal derivations are from collectas: (a) Because it was the prayer said in the early times for the people "when assembled (collectus) in one church, with the whole body of the clergy, for the purpose of proceeding to another;" or (b) Because "it indicates a prayer offered by the priest alone on behalf of the people, whose suffrages are thus collected into one voice, instead of being said alternately by priest and people, as in versicles and litanies." Many of the collects now in use in the Roman-Catholic and Episcopal churches are undoubtedly very old, being composed by Popes Leo the Great (440-461), Gelasius (492-496), and Gregory the Great (590-604). See art. Collect in SMITH AND CHEETHAM'S Dict. of Christ. Antiq.; also BLUNT'S Annotated Book of Common Prayer, p. 69; BRIGHT'S Ancient Collects, pp. 198 sqq.

COLLEGE. The word "college" is used in many senses, always, or nearly always, implying a limited company, meeting in one place, bound by common laws, and associated for mutual support in the promotion of a definite object. A college is a society of colleagues; as of cardinals, electors, physicians, preceptors, or scholars. Its purpose in a more restricted use is to promote learning. Its grade may vary from a school for boys to an association of learned men; but it usually suggests the promotion of a liberal education in distinction from a practical or elementary training.

In this country the words "college" and "university" have been unfortunately used as synonymous, so that the distinction between the two is commonly forgotten; but in England and on the Continent, and among careful writers in America, the separate functions are clearly recognized. It is the business of a college to train youth at an early age, commonly before they have reached their majority, in studies which discipline the mind, and store it with useful knowledge. It is the business of a university to advance and quicken those who have been trained. In many cases the students of a college dwell within college walls, dine at a common table, attend religious worship in their own chapel, and are governed in their daily conduct by prescribed regulations under the constant care of their tutors. Their ages, their needs, and their tastes are supposed to be so nearly alike, that substantially the same treatment may be given to them all. It is the distinctive office of a university to hold examinations, and confer degrees, and also to provide for the advanced education of those who have been trained in the fundamental sciences. The university may comprise one or more colleges and schools. Its teachings (as distinguished from those of the colleges it includes) are broader, and adapted to maturer minds. The true university teacher advances the science which he professes, and brings forward, in lectures or publications, the results he has reached; while the college instructor may fitly be devoted to the routine of instruction, and excel by patiently going over and over with his scholars fundamental principles.

The earliest colleges in this country were Harvard, William and Mary, and Yale; and their influence has powerfully controlled the higher education in America from colonial times until now. They were based on the model of the colleges of Oxford and Cambridge,¹ and there are some points of resemblance between their organization and that of Trinity College, Dublin. There are traces, also, of Scotch influence, at least in the two New-England colleges, and of the English public schools. All three were chartered by the State, were avowedly devoted to the maintenance of Christian doctrine (as held by the Puritans at Harvard and Yale, and as held by the Church of England at William and Mary). They sustained daily religious services, provided lodgings and a common table, were taught by a rector, with subordinate teachers in the languages and mathematics, and at the close of an appointed course of studies conferred the Bachelor's degree on successful scholars.

The pupils in these colleges were usually over fourteen years of age at entrance, and often took their first degree as early as eighteen. The notion that the acquisition of this honor was only "the commencement" of an education, and that the progressive scholar would come forward a few years later for his second degree of Master, was recognized from the beginning; although, for the want of professors who had the learning and the leisure to carry on the instruction of graduate students, there was but little efficiency in this part of the scheme. The form, however, has been constantly observed of encouraging Bachelors of Art to proceed to the degree of Master; thus implying that the freer study of the university rightly follows the limited training of the colleges. In recent years the second degree has in many places been restored to its proper dignity, and is now conferred only by examinations in advanced and non-professional studies.

Upon the type thus described,—an American variety from an English germ,—most of the colleges which were established during the eighteenth century were formed. They were not exactly alike, but so nearly of the same pattern that "the American college" still bears its own marked features, readily traced in charters, customs, buildings, schemes of study, and popular phraseology. To distinguish it from the schools of professional training which have grown up in later days, it is often called "the college proper," an infelicitous but significant phrase. Around the central college other institutions have in many places been planted,—the schools of theology, law, medicine, and science; and the group of seminaries thus formed is not infrequently termed the university in distinction from the college.

As the three colleges just named have been the models to which later colleges have referred, a few words in regard to the origin of each may be given.

Harvard College, at Cambridge, Mass., dates from 1636. Two years later it received a generous bequest from Rev. John Harvard of Charlestown, whose name it has since borne. Instructions began in 1638; the first rector assumed office in 1640; in 1642 the governor, deputy-governor, and magistrate of the jurisdiction, the teaching elders of six adjoining towns, and the president of the college, were constituted the overseers; and in 1650 "the corporation" was formally chartered.

At New Haven, Conn., a college was proposed by Rev. John Davenport, soon after the settlement of the town, in 1638; but, on account of the successful progress of the college at the Bay, the project was not pushed forward until 1700, when several of the ministers of the neighborhood gave their books for "founding a college in Connecticut." Instructions began soon afterward; and in 1718 a gift from Gov. Elihu Yale fixed his name upon the new institution. The first charter was granted in 1701, and a second in 1745.

Soon after the settlement at Jamestown, in 1607, a university was projected at Henrico; but the difficulties were not overcome at once, and it was 1660-61 when an act of the Grand Assembly made "provision for a college." In 1693 a charter was received from William and Mary, and in 1700 the first Commencement was held. It received royal, colonial, and private benefactions; and we are told by its historian that "in 1776 it was the richest college in North America."

Between 1700 and the Declaration of Independence six colleges were added to the three already named; and, before the close of the eighteenth century, seventeen more were added to the list. Since then, the number has rapidly increased, though all will admit that many of the institutions which are enrolled as "colleges" are poorly endowed, and imperfectly taught. A discriminating report on this subject is much to be desired. The list in the United-States commissioner's report for 1878 includes 358 colleges and universities, with 3,885 instructors and 57,987 students; but these figures are not of much value without elaborate statements in respect to the character of the instruction which is given.

Among the new institutions are the universities of Michigan, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Iowa, California, and other Western States, commonly including professional schools of law and medicine with the collegiate departments. Colleges of agriculture and the mechanic arts, fostered by the national land-grant of 1862, are to be found in all the States. To a limited extent the older colleges have received assistance from the State; but their chief reliance has been the generosity of individuals. There is a long list of noble benefactors, beginning with Harvard and Yale, whose names will be held in honor by those who watch the progress of knowledge. In the West, donations of land from the United-States Government have greatly aided the foundation of colleges and universities.

The most noteworthy innovation upon the traditional college system was made by the foundation of the University of Virginia, in 1826. "The class-system," then regarded elsewhere as of great value, was not introduced; great freedom was allowed in the choice of studies; and much stress was given to examinations. Gradually many of the ideas there introduced have been adopted in other places. The rapid growth of science, and the demand for instruction in modern languages and literature, have caused important changes in the college courses, and tend to-day toward the encouragement of optional or eclectic plans of study.

The Johns Hopkins University, which was opened in Baltimore in 1876, with a generous and unconditioned endowment, has been organized in such a way as to give prominence to university methods in distinction from collegiate. In the middle of its fifth year ninety graduates of colleges were enrolled among its students, twenty of whom hold fellowships; four scientific journals are published; and there are excellent collections of apparatus and books adapted to research.

Within the last few years there has been a loud call for collegiate education for women. To a limited extent, some of the colleges for men have been opened to women; but at the present time more favor seems to be given to new and independent endowments for the instruction of women; and the foundations which bear the name of Smith, Vassar, Wellesley, and Taylor, give promise of the highest utility.

The tendency to a separation of colleges from common schools is much to be regretted. Careful inquiries show that the number of college students in proportion to the population has diminished. College-bred men, for one reason or another, are less called upon than formerly to assume the lead in public affairs: they are less concerned in the administration of the common-school system. All this is here mentioned with regret; but there is not space to discuss the reasons, or point out the remedies. On the other hand, the colleges grow in wealth, in libraries, in museums, in admirable buildings: they grow more liberal, also, in their instructions, and are heartily sustained by the most enlightened men in Church and State. As we review the political, the literary, the scientific, and the religious history of the land, we perceive, that, after all, it is the college-bred men who have moulded our affairs, and given to this country its present standing as an enlightened and prosperous republic.

COLLEGIA NATIONALIA, or PONTIFICIA, colleges for the education of missionaries destined to go into Christian, but not Roman-Catholic, countries. The first institution of this kind, the Collegium Germanicum, was founded in Rome, in 1552, by Ignatius Loyola, and was at the same time a monastic and an educational establishment. It had a theological faculty, and enjoyed all the rights of a Roman university. It was governed by a rector, who, like all the teachers, belonged to the order of the Jesuits; and it stood under the protectorate or special authority of a committee of six cardinals. The committee was to communicate with trustworthy emissaries in Germany; and those emissaries had to select among the Germans, Frisians, Swiss, and Scandinavians, a number of young men between sixteen and twenty-one years old, able-bodied, well gifted in a general way, and specially endowed with an easy, pleasant, and impressive address. Before leaving Germany, the young men were informed of the method and purpose of the institution; and before adopted as pupils, generally after the lapse of a year of probation, they took an oath to labor for the Roman-Catholic Church as long as they lived, to go, without a moment's hesitation, at the time and to the place appointed by the protectors, not to try to evade their assumed task by entering a monastical order, etc. By this means the Roman-Catholic Church hoped to create an effective propaganda among the German heretics, — able disputants connected with their adversaries by the secret sympathy of common race, common language, etc. Gregory XIII. founded a number of similar colleges in Rome, — a Greek (1577), an English (1579), a Maronite (1584), an Illyrian, a Hungarian, etc. The Hungarian college was in 1584 connected with the German (see JULIUS CORDARA: Collegii Germanici et Hungarici Historia, Rome, 1770). Some of these colleges died out, but others were added. Also the constitution of the whole congregation de propaganda fide underwent some changes, especially in 1622. But the idea on which the institution was based proved a fertile and vigorous one. See URBAN CERRI: Etat présent de l'Eglise Catholique, Amsterdam, 1716; Notizia Statistica delle Missioni Catholiche in tutto il Mondo, Rome, 1843, pp. 21-27; MEJER: Die Propaganda, Göttingen, 1852, Part I. pp. 73-91, 225-245.

MEJER.

COLLEGIAL or COLLEGIATE CHURCHES, in contradistinction to cathedral churches, are in the Roman-Catholic Church served by a body of canons, regular or secular, living together in collegia, and in the Anglican Church by a dean and a number of canons; while the cathedral churches are always served by a bishop. In New-York City the term "Collegiate Church" is applied to a corporation in the Reformed (Dutch) Church, which owns a large amount of property, inclusive of three churches, with their mission-churches. Out of the income their ministers' salaries and other expenses are paid. The fact of several clergymen upon an equality in the government of the same body of communicants is true also of several other churches in the country; but the term "collegiate" is not so commonly applied to these latter churches.

COLLEGIALISM, or COLLEGIAL SYSTEM, a technical term denoting a peculiar conception of the relation between Church and State, which developed in the ecclesiastical jurisprudence of Germany during the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. The name, first used by J. H. Böhner of Halle, was derived from the Roman law, which, before Constantine, considered the Christian congregations as collegia illicita.

The Reformation assumed that the enforcement of the First Commandment belonged to the office of the divinely-instituted State government. In Germany, consequently, every petty state had its own church; and it was considered part of the government's duty to exclude any other form of religious worship but the true one from the territory. In Switzerland the Reformed Church was organized on exactly the same principle as the Lutheran Church in Germany, — as a State institution, founded, maintained, and superintended by the secular government. As soon, however, as the Reformation penetrated into France, where it met with a decided opposition from the side of the State authority, the Reformed Church was compelled to organize itself as an independent, self-governing association; and in Germany, too, various circumstances soon made a re-organization on a modified principle necessary, as, for instance, when the peace of Westphalia (1648) placed several churches on equal terms on the same territory. With the altered practice followed an altered theory. In his Jus Belli et Pacis (1625) Hugo Grotius defined the State as an association based on a contract, by which each member sacrifices a certain portion of his individual freedom in order to have the enjoyment of the rest guaranteed by the association. In his De Habitu Religionis Christianæ ad Vitam Civilem (1686) Pufendorff showed that religion and religious worship did not belong to that portion of his freedom which an individual sacrificed by entering the State; and Pufendorff's school at Halle further developed collegialism, or the collegial system, as the true view of the relation between Church and State. The last step was taken by C. M. Pfaff in his Akademische Reden über das Kirchenrecht, Tübingen, 1742, in which he demonstrates the contradiction between the innate principle of the Christian Church herself, and that principle upon which she actually had been organized in Germany. It must be noticed, however, that even Pfaff tries to prove by a curious and artificial train of reasoning that the actual organization, though flatly contradicting the natural principle, is, nevertheless, perfectly just.

COLLEGIANTS, or RHYSBURGERS, a fraction of the Remonstrants formed by the three peasants, Johann, Adrian, and Gilbert van der Codde, and the fisherman Anton Cornelison, who afterwards were joined by Dr. Kamphusen. During the persecutions which resulted from the synod of Dort, the scattered Arminians held their meetings at Warmond, in the neighborhood of Leyden. But soon the above-mentioned persons and their followers separated, and held independent meetings, which they called collegia, at the neighboring village of Rhynsburg. They adopted prophecy, and called themselves prophets. In many respects they resembled the Quakers. They rejected all symbolical books and a regular ministry. He who was called upon by the Spirit stood forth and preached. To serve in war, to hold a civil office, they considered incompatible with Christianity. Like the Anabaptists, they used immersion at baptism. The sect spread rapidly in Holland and West Friesland, but became extinct in the latter part of the eighteenth century.

COLLIER, Jeremy, b. at Stow-cum-Quy, Cambridgeshire, Sept. 23, 1650; d. in London, April 26, 1726. He took his M.A. at Cambridge, 1676; entered the ministry, but at the Revolution he refused to take the oaths, and was imprisoned (1688 and 1692) for advocating the cause of James II. In 1697 he won considerable fame by his Essays upon several Moral Subjects, of which a second series appeared 1705, and a third 1709. The essays cover much ground, and are interesting, and in their way valuable. In 1698 he issued A Short View of the Profaneness and Immorality of the English Stage, a vigorous attack which was as vigorously resisted, but resulted in the reformation of the stage. The most valuable of his works is An Ecclesiastical History of Great Britain, to the End of the Reign of Charles II. (1708–18), new edition, with life of the author, London, 1840, 9 vols. He also translated and continued Morery's Great Historical, Geographical, Genealogical, and Poetical Dictionary (1701–21), and translated the Meditations of Marcus Aurelius, London, 1701.

COLLINS, Anthony, an English deist; b. at Heston, in Middlesex, June 21, 1676; d. in London, Dec. 13, 1729. He was a country gentleman, educated at Eton and Cambridge, a justice of peace, and the intimate friend of Locke. His best known work is A Discourse of Freethinking, occasioned by the Rise and Growth of a Sect called Freethinkers, London, 1713. This was attacked, and, in the judgment of most, demolished, by Bentley, under the pseudonyme of Philonetherus Lipsiensis. Swift also wrote against it a pamphlet in his inimitable style, Mr. Collins's Discourse of Freethinking, put into plain English, by way of abstract, for the use of the Poor. Collins tried to prove that all sound belief must be based on free inquiry, and, further, that the adoption of rationalistic principles would involve the abandonment of a belief in supernaturalism. The book was weak, the critics were strong; and Collins went to Holland to avoid the storm he had raised. Nevertheless, he soon returned again, and renewed the attack. In 1715 appeared his brief Inquiry Concerning Human Liberty, a defence of necessitarianism. In 1724 he published his Discourse on the Grounds and Reasons of the Christian Religion, to show, that since the fulfilment of prophecy is the only valid proof of Christianity, and such "fulfilment" is only accomplished by fraud, or at least by unwarranted liberty with the text, therefore Christianity has no valid proof. In reply to Edward Chandler (see title), he wrote Scheme of Literal Prophecy considered (1727). These three works, as well as his earlier, Vindication of the Divine Attributes, an attempt to show that we can attain to a true, even if limited, knowledge of the divine attributes, and Priestcraft in Perfection (1709), an attack on the clergy, were published anonymously; but the authorship was really no secret. See STEPHEN: History of English Thought, 2d ed., London and New York, 1881; CAIRNS: Unbelief in the Eighteenth Century (Edinburgh, 1881), pp. 37-78.

CÖLLN, Daniel Georg Conrad von, b. at Oerlinghausen, in the principality of Lippe-Deilmold, Dec. 21, 1738; d. at Breslau, Feb. 17, 1833; studied theology at Marburg, Tübingen, and Göttingen, and was appointed professor of theology at Marburg in 1816, and at Breslau in 1818. In 1830 he published, together with his friend David Schulz, Über theologische Lehrfreiheit, which called forth from Schleiermacher a Sendschreiben, in Theol. Studien und Kritiken, 1831, pp. 1-39, also, in SCHLEIERMACHER'S Sammliche Werke, P. 1, vol. 5, p. 667. Cölln was a moderate rationalist, and his treatise a warning against certain orthodox formulas. In his Sendschreiben, Schleiermacher said that a rationalist might use orthodox formulas without any hesitation, mentally reserving his own conception; which remark caused much astonishment, and was vehemently attacked. Cölln and Schulz also published Zwei Antwortschreiben, Leipzig, 1831. Besides a number of articles to periodicals, and minor essays, Cölln's principal work is his Biblische Theologie, Leipzig, 1836, 2 vols., of which especially the Old-Testament part is highly valued. See his biography by David Schulz, prefaced to his Biblische Theologie.

COLLYRIDIANs, according to EPIPHANIUS (Heres, 78), a party of enthusiastic women in Arabia, who considered themselves priestesses of Mary, and, on the day consecrated in her honor, carried cakes (κολλυρίς) around in a solemn procession, which were presented as a sacrifice to the Virgin, and then eaten in common. Epiphanius considered the whole affair as idolatry: probably it arose from the Pagan harvest-feasts in honor of Ceres, HERZOG.

COLMAN, an Irish missionary; d. at Inishbofin, County Mayo, Ireland, Aug. 8, 1676. He was consecrated Bishop of Lindisfarne in North Britain, 661, and in 664 held with Wilfrid (see title), in the presence of King Osway, at Whitby, a public debate upon the Easter controversy and other points then in dispute between the Scoto-Irish portion of the Christian population of Britain and the Anglo-Catholic. Defeated by popular vote, Colman, accompanied by all his Irish, and thirty of his English monks, returned to the parent Monastery of Hy, Ireland. In 668 he removed to the Island of Inishbofinne, now Inishbofin, off the west coast of Mayo. Dissensions arising between his Irish and English monks, he placed the latter in a new monastery at Mayo, but lived himself on the island.

COLMAN, Benjamin, D.D., b. at Boston, Oct. 19, 1673; d. there Aug. 29, 1747. He was graduated at Harvard College 1692, ordained in London, Aug. 4, 1699, as pastor of the Brattle-street Church, Boston, of which he was the first minister. He was made D.D., by the University of Glasgow, 1731. He published several volumes of sermons, besides pamphlets and smaller writings. See the list in the bibliographical appendix to Dr. Dexter's Congregationalism (N.Y., 1880), in addition, Evangelical Sermons, Collected (1707, 1722, 3 vols.), Poem on Elijah's Translation (1707), Observation on Inoculation (1722), Treatise on Family Worship (1730). COLOGNE, situated on the Rhine, and now a city of about a hundred and forty thousand inhabitants, was from very old times a place of importance, and has at various times played a conspicuous part in church history. It was the chief seat of the Ubii. When conquered by the Romans, it rose rapidly. Agrippina, the daughter of Germanicus, and the spouse of Claudius, was born there, and planted a Roman colony there: hence the name of the place, Colonia Agrippinensis. While belonging to the Romans, it was the metropolis of Germania Secunda.

In the beginning of the fourth century the city was Christian, and the seat of a bishop. In 313, on occasion of the Donatistic controversies, Marnernus is mentioned as Bishop of Cologne; and in 314 his name is found under the acts of the Council of Arles. But in 330 the city was taken by the Franks, and Christianity had to labor under very difficult circumstances till the conversion of Clovis (496). In the hands of the Franks the city was the metropolis of the Ripuarians until the time of Charlemagne, when it was incorporated with the empire. Hildebald, Bishop of Cologne (784-819), was by Charlemagne made archicapellanus in 794, and archbishop in 799; the dioceses of Utrecht, Liège, Bremen, Münster, Osnabrück, and Minden, forming his province. The territory, however, of the new archbishopric, underwent many modifications. In 834 it lost Bremen, which was transferred to Hamburg. Nevertheless the see prospered, and increased both in power and wealth. Archbishop Heribert (999-1021) was chancellor of the German Empire, and received the electoral dignity.

Among the most prominent of the archbishops of Cologne are Rainald of Dassel (1159-67) and Conrad of Hochstaden (1238-61). Rainald was a great friend of Frederic I., who conferred many and large donations on the see, mostly, though, of Italian estates, which soon were lost. From Italy, Rainald brought to Cologne the remains of the Three Holy Kings, of the martyrs Felix and Nabor, of St. Apollinaris, and other relics which added to the fame of the Church. Conrad founded the cathedral in 1248, but was by the unruly citizens compelled to remove the residence to Bonn. Hermann V. (1515-48) favored the Reformation, but was excommunicated and deposed. Gebhard II. (1577-83) openly embraced Protestantism, but was also deposed and excommunicated. For nearly two centuries in succession the see was occupied by Bavarian princes, who squandered its wealth, neglected the discipline, and coquetted with France. Joseph Clemens (1688-1723) was only eighteen years old when he was enthroned. Clemens August I., who was only fifteen years old when he was made Bishop of Ratisbon, was Bishop of Hildesheim and of Osnabrück, and Grand Master of the Teutonic order, at the same time he was Archbishop of Cologne. Under Anton Victor, a son of the Emperor Leopold II., the archbishopric was secularized (1801); one part of its territory falling to France, others to Nassau, Hesse-Darmstadt, etc.

By the Congress of Vienna (1815) the territory was again gathered together, and laid under the Prussian crown; and in 1824 the archbishopric was re-established. But the relation between the Roman-Catholic archbishop at Cologne and the Protestant minister of state at Berlin soon became very difficult, and under Droste-Vischering (1835-45) it came to a crisis. The troubles arose from the mixed marriages. Droste-Vischering forbade his priests to sanction any such marriage, unless both parties promised that all the children should be educated in the Roman-Catholic faith; and the Prussian minister, Altenstein, answered by having the archbishop arrested (1837). The case ended with a compromise (1840) equally unsatisfactory to both parties.

The Cathedral of Cologne — one of the most famous, and also one of the finest, specimens of Gothic architecture — was founded in 1248. In 1322 the choir was consecrated, and in 1437 the southern tower was ready to receive its bells. From that time, and up to the middle of the present century, the work with the building proceeded very slowly: at times it stopped altogether. But in 1842 Friederich Wilhelm IV. of Prussia appointed a sum of fifty thousand dollars a year for the completion of the structure, and a building association was formed. Rich contributions came in from everywhere in Germany; and on Oct. 15, 1880, the completed Catholic cathedral was consecrated in the presence of the Protestant Emperor, William I., and his Protestant court, while the archbishop was absent, being in exile. The length of the building is four hundred and eighty feet; the breadth, two hundred and eighty-two feet; the height of the central aisle, a hundred and fifty-four feet; that of the towers, five hundred feet. The largest of the bells weighs eleven tons.

COLORS IN THE BIBLE. The names of colors which are mentioned in the Old Testament are (1) White, bright, pale, gray, cream-colored; (2) Yellow, green; (3) Red, fox-colored, ochre-red, crimson; (4) Purple, violet; (5) Black, brown. Of the natural colors noticed in the Bible we find white, black, red, green, but very seldom yellow. Some colors were more preferred to others. Thus white dresses were the raiment of a gentleman (as the black coat in our days); purple, the garment of the princes, and the sign of royal dignity. Each color had its special significance. Light colors were the expression of joy; dark, that of sorrow (2 Sam. i. 24; Mal. iii. 14). White was also symbolical of innocence: hence the raiment of angels (Mark xvi. 5; John xx. 12) and of glorified saints (Rev. xix. 8, 14). White was symbolical of victory, in opposition to black, which denoted evil (Zech. vi. 2, 6). Red was symbolical of bloodshed. But this color, of which the Hebrews seem to have had a clear conception, was also regarded as an element of personal beauty (comp. 1 Sam. xvi. 12; Cant. ii. 1, where the lily is the red one for which Syria was famed; Cant. iv. 3, vi. 7, where the complexion is compared to the red fruit of the pomegranate; and Lam. iv. 7, where the hue of the skin is redder than rubies, contrasting with the white of the garments before noticed).

Looking at the artificial colors, we notice (1) the purple. This color was obtained from the secretion of a species of shell-fish found in various parts of the Mediterranean Sea, especially on the coasts of Phœnicia. Robes of this color were worn by kings (Judg. viii. 26) and by the highest officers, civil and religious (comp. Esth. viii. 15; Dan. v. 7, 16, 29; 2 Macc. iv. 38). Purple dresses were also worn by the wealthy and luxurious (Jer. x. 9; Ezek. xxvii. 7). Next to purple we notice (2) scarlet. This dye was produced from an insect somewhat resembling the cochineal, which is found in considerable quantities in Armenia and other Eastern countries. Robes of this color were worn by the luxurious (2 Sam. i. 24; Prov. xxxi. 21; Jer. iv. 30; Lam. iv. 5), and it was also the appropriate hue of a warrior's dress, from its similarity to blood (Nah. ii. 3). (3) Blue, or rather violet. This dye was also procured from a species of shell-fish found on the coast of Phœnicia, and was used in the same way as purple, as the color of dresses worn by the princes and nobles (Ezek. xxiii. 6); and Babylonian idols were clothed in robes of this tint (Jer. x. 9). Another red color was the vermilion, a pigment used in fresco-painting, either for drawing figures of idols on the walls of temples (Ezek. xxiii. 14), or for decorating the walls and beams of houses (Jer. xxii. 14).

Symbolical Significance of the Colors. — Purple, blue, scarlet, and white are the four colors of the Mosaic cultus. The four were used in combination in the outer curtains, the veil, the entrance-curtain, and the gate of the court, as also in the ephod, girdle, and breastplate of the high priest. The first three, viz., purple, blue, and scarlet, were used in the pomegranates about the hem of the robe of the high priest. Exclusively blue were the robe of the high priest, the lace of the high priest's breastplate, the lace on his mitre, and the fifty loops of the curtains. Exclusively white were the breeches and mitre of the high priest. The cloths for wrapping the sacred vessels were either blue, scarlet, or purple. White were also the clothes of the lower priests. Added to this the blue ribbon and the fringe of the Hebrew dress, we perceive at once the use and application of the colors used in the Hebrew service. The red is only used once (Exod. xxvi. 14). Black is excluded everywhere, as well as yellow and green; which is significant. That purple, blue, scarlet, and white were used only is not merely accidental, but rather the outgrowth of the consciousness of their significance. The reason for the use of the white to the total exclusion of the black is easy to perceive. Black, as it absorbs all colors, and thus buries the light, is the symbol of death, and of every thing that tends towards death. But life, light, holiness, and joy, on the one hand, and cessation, death, darkness, malice, and sorrow, on the other hand, are biblical contrasts, of which white and black are the representatives of this twofold series of opposites. White, however, reflects the light: hence it symbolizes purity and victory. Whilst the third rider of the Apocalypse sits on a black horse, bringing with him famine, and with it death (Rev. vi. 5), the Persian horses in the eighth vision of Zechariah are white, because no worldly power had ever shown a more noble disposition towards Israel than the dynasty of the Achæmenides, which set the exiles free, and promoted the building of the temple. The first of the four apocalyptic riders has a white horse; for he went forth to conquer. The "Ancient of days," i.e., the Ever-living (Dan. vii. 9), appears in a garment white as snow: even the hair of his head is like the pure wool. And thus, likewise, the glorified Christ (Rev. i. 14). Even the throne of God which Ezekiel saw is white. White denotes the victory and triumph of the light: hence we understand why the garments of the priests were white. Even the high priest wore the so-called golden robes over the white ones; and in the temple which Ezekiel saw in his vision the priests wore white garments only. The robes of the priests are, according to their natural color, white, as the angels and blessed appeared to the seers, and as the garments of Jesus became white, whilst on the mount of transfiguration, "like the light." White is the color of the light; and what the light is to the natural world God is above all, and to every creature. He is light, and gives light, or he is holy, i.e., holy love. Suppose that the colors in the garments of the priests have reference to their office, viz., to act as the medium between God and his congregation, it will be their duty to go before the people in holiness and purity.

Connected with white is its opposite, the fox-color of the scarlet, as the emblem of fire. The red horses in the first vision of Zechariah bring about bloody war; and the fox-colored, a consuming fire. But light and fire are opposites according to the ethical idea of Holy Writ; viz., the light is the symbol of communicating love, the fire, that of consuming anger. When Isaiah describes the sins of his people, he speaks of them as being red like scarlet, not like purple. The scarlet along with the white in the high priest's garment means, therefore, to say that he is not only the servant of the God of love, but also of the God of anger. As to the purple and blue, which are always connected, be it along with white and scarlet, or between, as they are only two kinds of one and the same purple color, which again is not a natural but an artificial color, consisting of red and violet, they refer to a twofold attribute of the royal King, — the purple to the majesty of God in his glory, and the blue to God's majesty in his condescension. The purple of the garments of the high priest denotes, therefore, that he is a servant of that God of whom the song at the Red Sea says, "The Lord will reign for ever and ever" (Exod. xv. 18); and the song of Moses, "And he was king in Jeshurun" (Deut. xxxiii. 5). The red color of the red heifer, whose ashes, mixed with water, were to be used in purification of the unclean, had also a symbolical signification. Red is the color of blood, which, again, is the life. The animal intended as antidote against uncleanness through contact with a dead body was to be without blemish, and upon which never came yoke, and thus represented in its color a picture of fresh and vigorous life. Maybe that the colors of the twelve precious stones which were on the breastplate of the high priest had a symbolical significance as to their relation to the twelve tribes whose names were engraved on them (Exod. xxviii. 17-21). This, at least, may be derived from Jewish tradition. [Compare the art. Farben (Eng. "colors") in the Bible dictionaries of Smith, Winer, Hamburger, Riehm, and Schenkel. See also BÄHR: Symbolik des mosaischen Cultus, Heidelberg, 1837-39, I. pp. 363 sq.]. DELITZSCH (B. PICK).

COLOSSÆ. This Phrygian city was situated upon the Lycus, a branch of the Mæander, twelve miles above Laodicæa. In ancient days it was an important place, standing as it did on the line of travel from Eastern to Western Asia: but after the time of Cyrus it declined; so that when Paul wrote his epistle it was a small town, and is now extinct. Lightfoot says it "was without doubt the least important church to which any Epistle of Paul was addressed. Not a single event in Christian history is connected with its name; and its very existence is only rescued from oblivion, when, at long intervals, some bishop of Colossæ attaches his signature to the decree of an ecclesiastical synod." The variation in the spelling of the name is an indication of the insignificance of the place. Should it be Colossæ, or Colassæ? The Codex Sinaiticus gives Κολοσσαί in the title, and, i. 2, Κολοσσαίς, but, in the headings of the pages and the subscription, Κολασσαίς. The former spelling is found upon coins and in classical authors, and seems to be the correct, the latter the vulgar, form.

The church at Colossæ was not founded by Paul, but probably by Epaphras, during Paul's three-years' sojourn at Ephesus (A.D. 54-57).

COLUMBA, St., or Columbkille; b. at Gartan, County Donegal, 7th December, 521; d. at Iona, Whitsunday, 9th June, 597. Like many of the Celtic saints, he was of princely descent; and this, no doubt, contributed to his influence, and perhaps to the blemishes, as well as to the virtues, of his character. He was educated in part under St. Finnian of Moville, and in part under St. Finnian of Clonard, from whose school so many noble missionaries sprang. He early gave himself to mission-work in his native country, and, previous to his departure from it, had founded many religious houses — monasteries in form, Christian colonies in reality — in the midst of a still barbarous people. The chief of these were Derry, founded in 545, and Durrow, erected in 553. The cause usually assigned for his expatriation from Ireland is the part he took in a great contest in vindication of the right of sanctuary in his monasteries, and stirring up war against the king who had violated it. For this he is said to have been excommunicated, and to have been enjoined as a penance, or to have voluntarily consented, to go into exile, that he might gain for Christ as many from among the Pagans as he had occasioned the loss of among the Christians of Ireland.

But he was thoroughly actuated by the missionary spirit, then so characteristic of his countrymen; and his expatriation is more likely to have been prompted by this, and desire to sustain and promote the cause of Christianity in Alban, which seemed to be threatened by the misfortunes of the Dalriad Scots under his relative, King Conal. With twelve like-minded companions, he sailed from Derry in 563, in a currach, or skiff, of wicker-work covered with hides; and touching first at Colonsay, and then, according to some, at the chief fort of his relative on the mainland, he passed on to the little island since made famous by his residence and labors,—the Island of Hy, Iona, or, as Dr. Reeves says it should be written, Iova. (See IONA.) Bede says that this island was presented to him by the Picts; but the Irish annalists claim the credit of the gift for his relative, the king of the Dalriad Scots. Probably the concurrence of both was sought for the greater security of the infant establishment as a home for himself and his companions, a centre of missionary work among surrounding Pagans, and a shelter for such converts as might desire to lead a more thorough Christian life than they could among their Pagan relatives. After erecting a humble monastery, according to the custom of his country, he set himself to gain for Christ the nearer Pictish tribes. Having met with some success among these, he next essayed to visit Brude, the king of the whole nation, in his fort by the Ness, to make known the truth to him. We may dismiss as legendary the details of his biographer as to the miracles he wrought to secure access to the reluctant king, believing, with Bede, that it was his teaching and holy life that ultimately gained for him the hearts of the king and the nation; and holding that the real miracle needed was his steadfast faith in the Master he served, and unwearying devotion to that Master's work. In his first visits he may have addressed the Picts through an interpreter; and he had among his companions at least two of Iro-Pictish descent, Comghall and Cainnech, who would be able as well as acceptable interpreters to the chiefs of this nation. But the Pictish dialect was so nearly allied to his own, that he could have no difficulty in acquiring it. With the aid of his companions he strengthened and confirmed the Christian Scots, and ultimately won over to the Christian faith the Picts of the North, as well as the tribes on the banks of the Tay, and even the inhabitants of Fife, once partially evangelized by St. Ninian. He founded among them, and in the islands of the West and North, religious houses,—little Christian colonies,—all in subordination to the mother-house of Iona, and under his own direction. His religious establishments in Ireland also continued under his guidance, and were occasionally visited by him. One visit he paid to Ireland in the year 575 was especially noteworthy, as he took with him Aidan, whom he had inaugurated as successor to Conal in the kingdom of the Argyllshire Scots, and secured his more entire independence of Ireland. The evening of his days was passed in his island home, and the closing scene was particularly touching. The day before he died, ascending the hill which overlooked the monastery and its little farm, he stood surveying it for some time, and, lifting up both his hands, bestowed on it his parting blessing. Returning to his hut, he resumed his daily task in transcribing the Psalter, and proceeded to the place where it is written, "They that seek the Lord shall not lack any good thing." "Here," he said at the close of the page, "I must stop: what follows let Baithene write;" indicating him apparently as his successor. After some time he lay down to rest; but, when the bell for matins rang, he hastened to the church, and, ere the brethren could join him, he had fainted before the altar. Unable to speak, he made a feeble effort once more to raise his right hand to bless them, and, with joy beaming in his face, passed to his rest and reward.

Columba was "of lofty stature and noble bearing. He could express himself with ease and gracefulness, and had a clear, commanding voice." "He was a man of quick perception and great force of character,—one of those masterful minds which mould and sway others by mere force of contact." His faith in its essence was that of the church of his day, though by his isolation he may have been preserved from some of the errors which were already creeping in elsewhere. He had an intense love for the word of God, and spent much time in reading, studying, and copying it. He gave much time also to prayer, and to the guiding of the communities which put themselves under his care, endeavoring to train them in useful arts as well as in Christian knowledge. At times he failed to curb an imperious temper, and inspired with awe, not only his enemies, but his votaries, as if his motto were that afterwards appropriated by his adopted country,—"Nemo me impune lacessit." But all in all his character was a singularly noble one, and he deserves to be held in lasting remembrance as the Apostle of Caledonia. Twenty-four churches or other religious foundations are said by Dr. Reeves to have been dedicated to him in Pictland, and thirty-two in other parts of Scotland, and thirty-seven in Ireland. Three Latin hymns of considerable beauty are attributed to him; and in the ancient Irish Liber Hymnorum, in which they are preserved, there is also a preface to each, describing the occasion on which it was composed. Some Irish poems have also been ascribed to him, but apparently without so satisfactory evidence, though they are undoubtedly ancient.

ALEX. F. MITCHELL.

COLUMBANUS, b. in Leinster, Ireland, about 543; d. in Bobbio, 615; was educated at Bangor; went about 595, with twelve brother-monks, to France, and settled in the wilderness of the Vosges, where, on the ruins of the Castle of Annegray, he founded a monastery after the Irish model; that is, a school at once for ascetic devotion and sacred learning. The undertaking was eminently successful. Similar establishments arose at Luxeuil, Fontaine, Besançon, etc., and in the next generation all the most prominent members of the clergy of Gaul had been educated in Columban's schools. But the success engendered jealousy. Brunhilde, the grandmother of King Theodoric, was afraid of the influence of the austere monk, and used the discrepancies between him and the Frankish Church with respect to the computation of Easter, the tonsure, the monastical organization, etc., so cunningly, that a synod condemned him, and banished him from the country. He found refuge with Chlotar of Neustria, and afterwards went to Austrasia, where King Theodebert also received him well. He settled on the shore of the Lake of Constance, at Bregenz, where he took possession of an abandoned church, and enjoyed the support of the bishop. But in 612 Theodebert was defeated by Theodoric, and his dominions were conquered, and incorporated with the realm of the Salian Franks. Columban once more was homeless. He went to Italy, and obtained the protection of Agilulf, King of the Lombards. On the Trebia, south of Pavia, he founded a new monastery, Bobbio, which soon became a prominent centre of learning and study. There he died, according to general acceptance, on Nov. 15; according to Martyrol. Rom., on XI. Cal. Decemb., according to the biography by Jonas, on II. Cal. Decemb.

As a pupil of Bangor, and son of the old Irish church community, Columban occupied a very peculiar position with respect to Rome and the Pope. He deviated from the Roman Church in many points of rites, liturgy, and government; and, though he acknowledged Rome as the metropolis of the Church, the idea of a papal primacy was entirely foreign to him. In 602 he addressed a letter to Gregory I. to defend his computation of Easter; but he received no answer. Two more letters, one to Boniface III., after the condemnation of the Gallic synod, and one to Boniface IV., in the controversy of the Three Chapters, had the same fate. But in spite of their small effect, the general tone of these letters shows the independence of the writer. More difficult to decide is the point of difference between the Roman and the Ir-Scottish Church with respect to monastical organization and rules. Two documents, both referring to the subject, but of a very different character, are still extant, — the Regula Columbani and the Regula Cœnobialis Fratrum de Hibernia. The former is a thoroughly biblical direction towards a Christian life in evangelical freedom: the latter orders that he who neglects to make the sign of the cross over the spoon before eating shall be punished by a sound whipping; that he who speaks to a layman shall be punished by singing a number of hymns, etc. But while the character of the Regula Columbani corresponds very closely with that of Columban's sermons, which are genuine, the Liber Pœnitentialis Colum- bani, which corresponds to the Regula Cœnobialis, is evidently spurious.

LIT. — The works of Columban were edited by Fleming, Louvain, 1667; his Regula is found in Cod. Reg., I. 166, ed. Holsten Brockie; his biography by Jonas, in Act. Sanct. Ord. S. Ben., II. 3. See EBRARD: Die irschottische Missionskirche.

COLOMBIA, United States of, contain, according to the census of 1871 (not so very reliable), 2,910,329 inhabitants, besides about a hundred thousand Indians living in a state of savagery. The religion of the State is Roman-Catholic. The Church is governed by the Archbishop of Bogotá and the Bishops of Popayán, Cartagena, Santa Marta, Antioquia, Panamá, and Pamplona. The number of priests, however, is insufficient. In 1854 there were thirty-two monastic establishments, with six hundred and ninety-seven inmates; but the number is decreasing. For the education of the clergy a theological faculty and four seminaries are provided; but the provision is inadequate, and the moral influence of the clergy on the population is said to be small. Since 1851 other denominations have the liberty of public worship: but the Protestants of Bogotá have no church, and form no congregation; they have only a separate cemetery. The Christianization of the Indians is still one of the great problems of the government.

COMBEFIS, François, b. at Marmade, in the department of Lot-et-Garonne, 1605; d. in Paris, March 23, 1679; entered the Dominican order in 1624; taught theology and philosophy in several of the schools of the order, but retired, and devoted himself exclusively to the restitution of the texts of the works of the Fathers, for which purpose he was pensioned by the French clergy. His principal works are Græco-Latinæ Patrum Bibliothecæ Novum Auctuarium, Paris, 1648, 2 vols. fol., which work displeased the papal court on account of the openness with which the Monotheletic controversy was represented; Bibliotheca Patrum, Paris, 1662, 8 vols. in fol. reprinted 1747; a complete edition of the works of Basil the Great, 1679, 2 vols.; the works and fragments of Amphilochus, Methodius, Andreas of Creta, St. Maximus, etc.

COMENIUS, Latinized form of Komensky, Johann Amos, the last bishop of the Church of the Bohemian Brethren; b. at Niwnitz, Moravia, July 28, 1592; d. in Amsterdam, in November, 1670. After studying theology at Herborn and Heidelberg, he entered the ministry, and had charge, first of the parish of Prerau, afterwards of that of Fulnek. In 1624 he and his co-religionists were expelled from Bohemia, and in 1627 he settled at Lissa in Poland. Driven away, also, from this place, in 1654, he finally settled in Amsterdam. As a preacher, and leader of the Church, he enjoyed a great reputation; and his Labyrinth der Welt und Paradies des Herzens and Unum Necessarium belong to the best which the Church of the Bohemian Brethren produced. But his greatest fame he attained as a pedagogue. His Geöffnete Sprachentür and Orbis Pictus were translated into all European languages; the former even into Persian and Arabic, and reprinted over and over again for two centuries. He was specially invited to England (by Parliament, 1642), Transylvania (by Rakoczy, 1650), Sweden, etc., to examine and reform the whole educational department; and many of the ideas of Rousseau and Pestalozzi may be found in his writings in fully developed form. [He was even invited, through Governor Winthrop, to succeed Henry Dunster as president of Harvard College. See COTTON MATHER'S Magnalia, 4th book, pt. 1, § 5, ed. Hartford, 1853, vol. ii. p. 14. COMMENDA, or in commendam, from the Latin commendare, "to intrust;" a term applied when the administration of an ecclesiastical office and the enjoyment of its revenues are, for some reason, temporarily intrusted to a person already holding another ecclesiastical office. As the canon law forbade the accumulation of offices, the way in which the popes evaded the law, and indulged their nepotism and favoritism, was to give offices in commendam, but for lifetime; and so general became this irregularity, that the Council of Trent felt unable to cope with the evil, and confined itself to making some restrictions.

COMMERCE AMONG THE HEBREWS. The ancient Hebrews, whose descendants became the commercial people of the globe, were not originally predestinated for commerce and traffic on account of their theocratic position, although Palestine possessed all the conditions for commercial enterprises. The many enactments forbidding the intercourse with Gentiles, rather tended to impress the belief that commerce was ill becoming a theocratic people; which was not the case with agriculture, on account of the many religious duties connected with it. On the whole, foreign trade was, indeed, contemplated by the law, and strict rules for morality in commercial dealings were laid down by it (Deut. xxviii. 12, xxv. 13-16; Lev. xix. 35, 36); and the tribes near the sea and the Phœnician territory appear to have engaged, to some extent, in maritime affairs (Gen. xlix. 13; Deut. xxxiii. 18; Judg. v. 17); but the spirit of the law was more in favor of agriculture, and against foreign trade (Deut. xvii. 16, 17; Lev. xxv.). As the country was rich in produce, the possibility for an export trade was given (Deut. xxviii. 12); and we know that Phœnicia was supplied from Judæa with wheat, honey, oil, and balm (1 Kings v. 11; Ezek. xxvii. 17; Acts xii. 20). Until the time of Solomon, the Hebrew nation may be said to have had no foreign trade. The earliest contact of the Hebrews with foreign trading nations was in the time of the patriarchs. With the exception of the Ishmaelites, or Midianites, who, on account of their descent from Ishmael, were related with the Hebrews, all trading nations mentioned in Scripture were mostly Hamites, modified, perhaps, somewhat through Semitic elements. Prominent among these nations were especially the Phœnicians (comp. Isa. xxiii.; Ezek. xxvii. 17; Joel iii. 4 sq.). During the reign of Solomon the people of Israel had an active part in the trade of the world, mainly represented by the king himself. Against the prohibition of the law (Deut. xvii. 16), he imported from Egypt horses for himself and other kings. Ships were built for him in Eziongeber, which, with Hiram's ships, used to sail into the Indian Ocean, and every three years brought back gold, silver, ivory, etc. (1 Kings ix. 26, x. 11; 2 Chron. viii. 17, ix. 10). After Solomon's death the maritime trade declined, and an attempt made by Jehoshaphat to revive it proved unsuccessful (1 Kings xxii. 48, 49). After the exile the places of public market were chiefly the open spaces near the gates, to which goods were brought for sale by those who came from the outside; and the traders in later times were allowed to intrude into the temple, in the outer courts of which, victims were publicly sold for the sacrifices (Zech. xiv. 21; Matt. xxi. 12; John ii. 14). Under the Maccabees, Joppa was fortified (1 Macc. xiv. 34), and Herod the Great made Cæsarea a port. But all trade was mainly in the hands of the Greeks; and the Jews did not care much for it, as long as they lived in the land of their fathers, and could devote themselves to agriculture. Pharisaic separatism from the uncircumcised, it is true, quenched the spirit of traffic; although the prophets Hosea (xii. 7), Amos (ii. 6, viii. 5 sq.), Micah (vi. 10 sq.) had greatly to complain against injustice and unfairness in dealing. Their present position in the commercial world, the Hebrews owe in part to their exile among other nations, in part to the position which they occupy among such nations, which excluded them from political rights. COMMINATION (threatening) SERVICE is an addition to the usual service on Ash-Wednesday in the Church of England, so called from the opening address, or exhortation to repentance, which contained a list of God's curses against sin. It was a substitute introduced by the Reformers for the sprinkling of ashes on Ash-Wednesday.

COMMODIANUS, b. at Gaza in Syria, and educated in Paganism; was by the reading of the Bible led to Christianity, and stands in the history of the Church as one of her first Latin poets. Two of his works are still extant, — Instructiones, consisting of eighty acrostics of partly apologetic and polemical contents, partly parenetical, written in the third decade of the third century, first edited by RIGALTUS, Toul, 1650, last by OEHLER, in GERSDORF'S Biblioth. Patr. Eccles. Lat., XIII., Leipzig, 1847; and Carmen Apologeticum, consisting of ten hundred and fifty-three verses, written in 240, first edited by PITRA, in the Spicileg. Solesmense, Paris, 1852, T. I., last by RÖNSCH, in Zeitschrift f. d. histor. Theologie, XLII., 1872. In both poems the author shows himself to be addicted to Chiliasm and Patripassianism. In formal respect it is noticeable that he models his verses, not on the principle of quantity, but on the principle of accent. A new edition has been given by Ed. Ludwig, Leipzig, 1877. EBERT.

COMMODUS, Roman emperor from 180 to 192; succeeded his father, Marcus Aurelius, but resembled him very little. Not from any just appreciation of Christianity, but from utter indifference to all religion, he left the Christians at peace. According to Dio Cassius (72, 4) it was his concubine Marcia, who, though not a Christian herself, induced him to stop the persecutions. Irenæus says (Adv. Hær., 4, 30) that Christians held positions, even in the imperial palace. As the laws against the Christians still existed, instances of martyrdom continued to occur. Thus the senator Appollonius was decapitated.

COMMUNICATIO IDIOMATUM, a dogmatical term, referring to the relation between the divine and the human nature as united in the one person of Christ. While the ancient church, during the Nestorian, Monophysitic, and Monotheletic controversies, confined itself to simply asserting the fact of the personal union of the two natures, the Lutheran theologians, in the dogmatic interest of their doctrine of the eucharistic presence, undertook to expound its internal relations, which resulted in the doctrine of an actual transfer of attributes or properties of the one nature to the other. There are logically (on the basis of the Chalcedonian dyophysitism) four possible kinds of this interchange of attributes, — (1) The communication of attributes of one nature to the whole person (genus idiomaticum); (2) The execution of personal acts and functions by one of the two natures (genus apotelesmaticum); (3) The transfer of divine attributes to the human nature (genus majestaticum); (4) The transfer of human attributes to the divine nature (genus kenoticum or tapeinoticum). The first three were adopted and taught by the Formula of Concord (1577) and the scholastic Lutherans of the seventeenth century. The fourth was rejected on the ground of the unchangeableness of the divine nature, but has been adopted by the modern Kenoticists, as Thomasius, Gess, and others. The whole theory is very artificial. The Reformed and Anglican churches rejected the third kind as destructive of the necessary limitations of the human nature of Christ, to which the Lutherans ascribed omnipotence, omnipresence, and omniscience, even in the state of his humiliation. The most recent work on the subject is HERMANN SCHULZ: Die Lehre von der Gottheit Christi. Communicatio Idiomatum, Gotha, 1881. There is also a long article on this title by Schenkel, in Herzog, ed. I., and one by H. Frank, in Herzog, ed. II. See art. CHRISTOLOGY.

COMMUNION. See LORD'S SUPPER.

COMMUNION OF THE DEAD. See DEAD, COMMUNION OF.

COMMUNION OF SAINTS, a dogmatic expression in the third article of the Apostles' Creed: "I believe in the Holy [Catholic] Church, the communion of saints." In the creeds in the Greek Church the phrase is not found. We find it in the West, for the first time, in Faustus, Bishop of Reji, Southern Gaul, about 455; also in the church at Aquileja, in Rufinus' Expositio Symboli, where it is explained of the Christian Church, made up, from the beginning, of the saints. The words express the common Christian idea that in the Church one enjoys the society of the saints, shares in their divine gifts, and looks forward to the final blessedness. Hence in the creed, closely linked with such communion, are the ideas of the forgiveness of sins, and eternal life; for in the communion of the Church one attains to these things. The Roman-Catholic Church expresses the development of her ideas of the saints, and of communion with them, in the explanation given in the Roman Catechism of the phrase, — Communion is in the sacraments and other gracious gifts to the Church, and in the fellowship of her members with one another. The communion of saints is therefore only in the Roman-Catholic Church. Distinction is made between the faithful upon the earth, the saints in heaven, and the souls in purgatory: yet are these classes one; so that the saints' prayers avail for those on earth, while prayers, masses, and good works help.

The churches of the Reformation rejected these ideas. Luther declared the Church was the body of believers, who by faith were saints: hence the phrase was exegetical of the "Holy Church." So, also, the Reformed Church at first in its symbols, the First Helvetic, and the Scotch Confession of 1560. Calvin, however, did not accept the phrase in this way, but rather as a description of a peculiarity of the Church; for he says (Bk. IV., chap. i., § 3), "It excellently expresses the character of the Church; as though it had been said that the saints are united in the fellowship of Christ on this condition that whatever benefits God bestows upon them they should mutually communicate to each other." He is followed in the Genevan and Heidelberg Catechisms, and in the Westminster Confession. J. KÖSTLIN.

COMMUNISM means the abolition of personal property, or the surrender of all individual rights in property to the community, which acts as the proprietor proper in all relations, both to other communities and to its own members. Whether the communistic character of the primitive Church of Jerusalem (Acts ii. 44, 45) was the result of incidental circumstances, or whether there is in Christianity an innate tendency towards communism, has been a much debated question, differently answered, for instance, by the Church of England and the Moravian Society. But none, except sectarian fanatics such as Thomas Münzer, have ever held that communism was an essential element of Christian life (comp. Lamennais). Whenever communism has been practised by small communities, and as an appendix to, or natural consequence of, a religious principle, it has proved successful. The history of monasticism gives ample illustrations; lay-societies also, as, for instance, the Beghards. But preached or practised simply as a principle of national economy, as the only means to reconcile the millionaire and the proletaire, it has always ended in foolishness and failure. COMPOSTELLA, The Order of the Knights of San Iago de. According to a Spanish tradition, the apostle James the Elder, son of Zebedee (Acts xii. 2), who was beheaded in Jerusalem (44), came to Spain, and suffered martyrdom there. The place of his suffering was called ad Sanctum Jacobum Apostolum, or Giacomo Postolo; hence Compostella. The legend is first recorded in the ninth century by Walafried Strabo, in his Poema de 12 Apostolis; and, though the Bollandists still maintain it, it has been abandoned even by Roman-Catholic writers, as, for instance, Natalis Alexander. Among the people, however, it always found much favor; and it made Compostella the most celebrated and most frequented place of pilgrimage in Spain. It also gave the name to one of the richest and most renowned military orders in Spain, founded in 1161 by Don Pedro Fernandez, confirmed by Celestine III., and not dissolved until 1835. HERZOG.

COMPTON, Henry, Bishop of London; b. at Compton, 1632; d. at Fulham, near London, July 7, 1713. He was Bishop of Oxford, 1674, and in the following year transferred to London, made a privy councillor, and intrusted with the education of the princesses Mary and Anne. His opposition to Roman Catholicism was firm, and cost him his councillorship, and his suspension on the accession of James II.; while his liberality toward the Nonconformists was unusually great. He joined the side of William and Mary in the Revolution, and crowned the king. His prosperity returned. He regained his former positions, and was appointed one of the revisers of the liturgy; but the close of his life was embittered by his disappointment at not receiving the primacy. He wrote A Treatise of the Holy Communion (London, 1677), and translated from the Italian The Life of Donna Olympia Maladichini (1667), and from the French The Jesuits' Intrigues (1669).

COMTE, Auguste, the founder of the positivist school of philosophy, was b. at Montpellier, Jan. 12, 1798, and d. in Paris, Sept. 5, 1857. He entered the École Polytechnique in 1814, and continued to live in Paris after the school was broken up in 1816, giving lessons in mathematics. For a short time he was tutor in the family of Casimir Périer. In 1818 he made the acquaintance of St. Simon, and soon became one of his most enthusiastic disciples. But the sustained energy and systematic power of the pupil could not fail to outgrow the authority of a master whose inspirations were mainly due to his loose mental habits. In 1824 a complete and violent breach took place. From St. Simon, however, Comte received the first impulse towards philosophy, a number of loose but brilliant ideas, and the whole informing tendency of his system.

In 1825 Comte married, and in 1826 he began the first series of lectures on positive philosophy. But after the third lecture he was overcome by a cerebral derangement, and for a whole year he was confined in a lunatic-asylum. In 1828 the lectures were renewed. In 1830 the first volume of La Philosophie Positive was published. In 1833 Comte was appointed examiner at the admission to the École Polytechnique, and in 1842 he finished his great work by the publication of the sixth volume. According to its ground-plan, this work is simply a re-arrangement of the hierarchy of the sciences on a new principle,— the positive principle, in contradistinction to the theological and metaphysical principles. Moving from the more simple and abstract to the more complex and concrete, the scale runs thus: mathematics, astronomy, physics, chemistry, biology, and sociology. There seems to be nothing alarming in this. As here represented, positivism is a method, rather than a doctrine. It becomes a doctrine, however, partly by that which the method excludes (all inquiry into the causes of phenomena, all theology, all metaphysics), and partly by that which the method adds (a new science, the great panacea for all the sufferings to which flesh is heir,—sociology). Comte meant that the revolutionary state of modern society is solely due to the mental anarchy into which theology and metaphysics have led us. The only way out of this confusion is the positive philosophy; for the only cognition which can compel universal acceptance, and unite all minds into perfect agreement, is that which refuses to pay any regard to the cause of a phenomenon, and simply confines itself to ascertaining the law of the evolution of phenomena; and that is just the sole object and contents of positive philosophy. As soon, therefore, as the laws of social and political evolution are recognized in their positive shape, stripped of all theological and metaphysical dreams, new and satisfactory forms of social and political life will present themselves, and revolution will cease forever.

Some remarks in the preface to the sixth volume of La Philosophie Positive caused Comte's dismissal from his position at the École Polytechnique in 1842: and from that time till his death "he lived as best he could," receiving support at one time (1842-45) from some English friends of J. Stuart Mill, and at another (after 1848) from public subscriptions. Other calamities were added. In 1842 he separated from his wife. Meanwhile he was busy with his Système de la Politique Positive, of which the first volume appeared in 1851, the fourth and last in 1854. It proposes to found a new religion,—the religion of humanity. But while positivism as a philosophical school has exercised, and is still exercising, a most powerful influence on modern civilization, positivism as a religion has proved a miserable failure. Comte describes the development of human intellect as having passed through two stages,—the theological, at which all phenomena are explained as the effects of hidden, supernatural, divine causes; and the metaphysical, at which the causes are defined as a kind of mystical entities, which form the real substance underlying all phenomena. These two stages passed, the third is reached,—the positive, at which no more questions are made about the causes of phenomena; only the laws of the evolution are ascertained. As this description is itself the definition of a law, it is evident that positivism, the religion of humanity, can have no theology. But it has no God, either. Humanity is an ideal, and can never be made a god; and, at this time of the day, to try to press the development of mankind back to that moment when the Greek tragedy was produced, when the god was the ideal, when religion and art were still slumbering on each other's bosoms, is simply futile. Still worse: in 1845 Comte fell desperately in love with Madame Clotilde de Vaux, who died in the following year; and, in his plans of organization which he laid for the church of humanity, memories of this passion mix in a most disagreeable manner with reminiscences from the palmiest days of the Roman-Catholic Church. It is true, as Mr. Morley says in the last edition of Encyclopædia Britannica, that the queer dreams of the Système de la Politique Positive are not altogether incidental, but foreshadowed in the earliest writings of Comte. But it is also true, as J. Stuart Mill says in his essay on Positivism, that there is "a gulf" between that book and the Philosophie Positive. The latter has a relation to theology; it excludes it: the former has none; it only counterfeits it.

Of La Philosophie Positive, Miss Harriet Martineau has given an excellent English condensation in 2 vols., London, 1853. The Catechism of Positivism was translated into English by Dr. Congreve in 1858; the Politique Positive, anonymously, in 1875-77. Essays on positivism have been written by J. Stuart Mill, Herbert Spencer, Huxley, etc. See, also, FISKE: Outlines of Cosmic Philosophy, Bost., 1874, 2 vols.; LEWES: Biog. Hist. of Philosophy, Lond., N. Y., 4th ed., 1871, 2 vols. CONCEPTION, Feast of, a festival of the Roman-Catholic Church which is celebrated Dec. 8, in honor of the immaculate conception of the Virgin Mary. See IMMACULATE CONCEPTION.

CONCEPTION OF OUR LADY, Nuns of the Order of. This religious order was founded by Beatrix, sister of James, first Count of Poralego, Portugal, in 1484; confirmed by Innocent VIII. 1489; given the rule of St. Clara by Cardinal Ximenes, but by Julius II. given a separate rule in 1511.

CONCEPTUALISM denotes an intermediate stand-point between nominalism and realism. Rejecting, on the one side, nominalism, which defines the universalia as merely subjective notions, as mere words (voces), and, on the other side, realism, which defines the universalia as the very essence of all individual existence, Abelard tried to define the universalia as sermones; that is, as mental conceptions, which, though in themselves merely the result of an intellectual process, nevertheless corresponded to something real, existing in all individuality. The stand-point was afterwards more clearly defined by Petrus Lombardus and Albertus Magnus.

CONCLAVE means the assembly of cardinals convened in order to elect a new pope. Up to the latter part of the eleventh century, the pope was elected by the clergy and people of Rome; but by a decree of 1059 Nicholas II. gave the whole election into the hands of the cardinals, to the exclusion of the clergy and the people; and by a decree of 1179 Alexander III. constituted a majority of two-thirds of the conclave sufficient to make an election valid. At times, however, it proved very difficult to procure such a majority. When Clement IV. died at Viterbo (1268) seventeen months elapsed, and no agreement was arrived at. Bonaventura, the general of the Minorites, then induced the inhabitants of Viterbo to shut up the cardinals in the palace; and there they sat for a whole year, but still no agreement. Finally somebody hit upon the device of depriving the building of its roof, and exposing the electors to the whims of the weather; and the very same day Gregory X. was elected. This experience led the second council of Lyons (1274) to establish a number of minute rules for conducting a conclave, which, in the main, are still adhered to. The cardinals are absolutely separated from the surrounding world, the windows and doors of the assembly-room having been walled up, all but one. If no agreement has been arrived at after the lapse of three days, only one meal a day is served to the electors, and, after the lapse of eight days, only bread and wine, etc. The method of electing generally used is the ballot; and, concerning this point, too, a number of minute rules have been established in order to prevent fraud. Every morning a ballot is cast, followed in the evening by an "accessit;" that is, if the morning ballot has led to no result, any of the electors is allowed to transfer his vote to that one of the candidates whom he can expect thereby to get elected. In spite of the minute rules, however, which govern the proceedings, and in spite of the solemn oath which binds the electors, the history of the papal conclave is crowded with the meanest and grossest frauds and intrigues which any election can present. See T. A. TROLLOPE: On the Papal Conclaves.

CONCOMITANCE denotes the doctrine, that, when Christ's body is present in the Eucharist, his blood is so too, and that, the godhead and manhood of Christ being inseparable, Christ himself, God and man, is present in the Eucharist when either his body or his blood is present. This doctrine forms the basis for the disciplinary rule of the Roman-Catholic Church, withholding the cup from the laity in the administration of the Lord's Supper.

CONCORD, Formula of (Formula Concordiæ), the last of the six symbolical books of the Lutheran Church, was issued on the fiftieth anniversary of the Augsburg Confession (June 25, 1580), and was signed by three electors, twenty dukes and princes, twenty-four counts, four barons, and thirty-five free cities. Since the death of Luther (1546) alarming dissensions had invaded the Church, and a split between the ultra-Lutheran orthodoxy and the Melancthonian Crypto-Calvinism seemed imminent. The necessity of unity and concord was very strongly felt, however; and in 1567 Duke Christoph of Würtemberg, and Landgrave William IV. of Hesse-Cassel, commissioned Jacob Andreaë to draw up a formula, based upon the Confession of Augsburg, and capable of uniting all the Lutheran churches of Germany. The attempt failed; but in 1573 Andreaë tried again, and the so-called Suabian Concordia—a remoulding of his famous six sermons On the Differences of the Lutheran Church—found much favor. On the instance of Duke Lewis of Würtemberg and Margrave Charles of Baden, Lucas Osiander, Balthasar Bidebacht, and Abel Scherdinger composed, in 1575, the Formula of Maulbronn; and in the following year the Elector of Saxony invited a number of theologians to meet at Torgau, and to form, on the basis of these two formulas, a third one acceptable to all parties. The result was the so-called Book of Torgau, which was sent to all the Protestant princes of Germany, and on which the elector received no less than twenty-three more or less elaborate criticisms. A new committee of theologians, among whom were Martin Chemnitz, Nicolaus Selnecker, David Chytraeus, etc., was formed to digest and utilize these criticisms. They began their meetings at Bergen, near Magdeburg, in 1577; and the final result of their labor was the Formula Concordia. It was immediately accepted by Saxony, Brandenburg, Brunswick, Würtemberg, Baden, Hamburg, Lübeck, etc.; but it was rejected by Hesse, Anholt, Lauenburg, Holstein, Nassau, Strassburg, Frankfort, Spire, Worms, Neuremberg, Bremen, etc. Outside of Germany it was accepted by Hungary, Sweden, and Denmark; though in the last-mentioned country it was first rejected, and its publication was forbidden under penalty of death. The Formula consists of two parts, — the Epitome, and the Solid Repetition and Declaration, each containing twelve articles.

CONCORDANCE, from Latin concordare, to agree: hence a collection of passages which in one respect agree with one another. Concordances are of two kinds, verbal and topical: the first gives the exact place in the text where a certain word can be found; the second is an orderly analysis of the contents of the work. It is evident concordances can be made to any work, and we have them upon classic authors (e.g., Shakspeare, Milton, Pope, Tennyson, etc.); but in this article we treat of those upon the Bible, for which, of course, there has been most demand.

I. LATIN. — Cardinal HUGO DE S. CARO (d. 1263) led the way. In 1244, with the help of five hundred Dominican monks, he prepared a concordance upon the Vulgate (see BELLARMIN: De Script. eccles. ad ann. 1245, pp. 247 sqq.) as an aid in his Commentary on the Bible. Since the verse-divisions did not yet exist, he supposed each chapter divided arbitrarily into seven parts, which he designated by as many letters consecutively (e.g. terra, Gen. i. a; i.e., the word terra is in the first part of Gen. i.). The work was defective and short, as in the references merely words, and not sentences, were given. It was called Concordantie S. Jacobi, because Hugo prepared it at the Convent of St. Jacob, in Paris. The monks of this house found it most useful in preparing their sermons, but at the same time they recognized its defects; and so John of Derlington, Richard of Stavensby, and Hugo of Croyndon (about 1250) set about to correct it by adding the words in immediate connection. This made Hugo's work a veritable concordance in our sense of the term. On account of the English extraction of the revisers, their work was known as the English Concordance. The next builder upon Hugo's foundation was CONRAD OF HALBERSTADT, OF GERMANY (de Alemannia), THE ELDER, who, towards the end of the thirteenth century, further improved the original work by subdividing the shorter chapters into four parts each (letters a-d), while the longer were, as usual, divided into seven (letters a-g), and by reducing the number of words cited in connection with one another, which materially reduced its size. This new sort of concordance entirely supplanted the old, and was the one printed. The influence of this concordance is seen in the printing upon the margin of the Vulgate, even as late as 1826, in an edition printed at Frankfurt, of the letters Conrad used to divide the chapters. During the Council of Trent (1431-49) a grave defect in the concordance was discovered. John of Ragusa, a very learned man (d. 1444), held an animated discussion with Bohemians at the council, upon the true meaning, in the Bible, of the particle nisi, and later, with Greeks at Constantinople, whether the council had sent him, over the true meaning of per and ex. But the concordance failed him just here; for it did not contain particles. He determined to remedy this defect, and, unable himself to command the time, intrusted the task to the Spanish doctor of theology, JOHN OF SUABIA, who alphabetically arranged the particles, and then, in 1437, published the work, with an historical introduction. Sebastian Brant carried the first edition of it through the press of John Peter and John Froben, in Basel, 1496, under the title Concordantie partium sive dictionum indeclinabilium totius Biblie ("Concordance to the particles or indeclinable words in the entire Scriptures"), as the second part of the Conrad Concordance. And so the defect in Hugo's Concordance was supplied. The first printed concordance bore the title Fratis Conradi de Alemannia Ord. Prædic. Concordantie Bibliorum, etc., Argentorati (Strassburg), c. 1470, 2d ed., 1475. Bindseil, in his monograph, Ueber die Concordanzen (Theol. Studien und Kritiken, 1870), the basis of this article, gives a list of sixty-four concordances to the Vulgate, substantially reprints of the first edition. The last is by F. P. DUTRIPON: Bibliorum Sacrorum Concordantie, 7th ed., Paris, 1880.

II. HEBREW. — The first Hebrew concordance was made by Rabbi ISAAC (or MORDECAI) NATHAN. The origin of the work, according to the author's preface, was as follows: he was disturbed by the repeated challenges of his Christian companions, and, in his search after materials for an answer, lighted upon a Latin Bible concordance. By diligent use of this he repelled the attacks, and, having tested its great utility, determined to prepare a concordance to the Hebrew Bible, which he conceived would be more useful than a mere translation of the Latin. Accordingly he began the work in 1438, and finished it, having called in many helpers, in 1448. He kept the chapter-divisions of the Vulgate, but added verse-divisions of his own. The concordance was first printed at Venice, by Daniel Bomberg, in the year 1524, under the title הקראת קונקורדנטיש כמאיר נתיב; i.e., The Light to the Way, called "Concordances." An interesting point in connection with this title is the fact that the final word is a mere transliteration, in Hebrew characters, of the Latin Concordantie. After the words, alphabetically arranged, are explanations in rabbinical characters, and then the passages in which they occur. Editions of this work appeared subsequently at Venice (1564) and at Basel (1581), under Buxtorf's supervision; and a Latin translation (poor and very defective) was made by Reuchlin, Basel, 1556. An unprinted Latin translation by Nicholas Fuller is preserved in the Bodleian Library, Oxford.

The second Hebrew concordance was undertaken by the Franciscan scholar, MARIUS DE CALASIO, appointed by Pope Paul V. public teacher of Hebrew at Rome. He wrote a Hebrew grammar and dictionary; d. Jan. 24, 1620. He was over seventy when he began the concordance, and at his death left it not quite ready for the press. By papal command it was given over to the Minorite general, Benignus of Genua, who employed upon it the Minorite provincial, Michael Angelus of St. Romulus, professor of theology and Hebrew. It was finally printed in four folio volumes, in Rome, 1621, under the title Concordantie Sacrorum Bibliorum Hebraicorum. Each word was accompanied by its different meanings in both Hebrew and Latin, then the corresponding words in the other Shemitic languages, with Latin interpretations, and finally the Bible passages in which the word is found,—Hebrew verses on the right hand, Latin on the left. This concordance was three times published,—Cologne (1646), Rome (1657), London (1747-49), 4 vols. fol.

The third concordance was begun by JOHANN BUXTORF THE ELDER, and finished by his son Johann Buxtorf, Basel, 1632, fol. It was professedly an improved edition of Nathan's. It is, therefore, upon the same general plan. Each word is followed by Nathan's explanations in rabbinical characters, but also in Latin. An improvement is the assignment of the different forms to the different passages in which they occur, instead of massing the passages together. A great many missing references were supplied, errors corrected, and, not the least, at the end a concordance of the Chaldee words in the Old Testament. Yet two defects are pointed out by Buxtorf himself: certain particles are missing, and all the proper names. Modern edition, edited by Bernhard Bär, Stettin, 1861. Two abridgments of Buxtorf's great work were published: one at Wittenberg, 1653; the other, edited by CHRISTIAN RAW, under the title Fount of Zion, Berlin and Frankfort, 1677.

The two defects already noticed in Buxtorf were remedied, as far as the Hebrew particles were concerned, in the Concordance of CHRISTIAN NOLDE, Copenhagen, 1679, small quarto. Later came other Hebrew concordances; among others Dr. JOHN TAYLOR'S Hebrew Concordance adapted to the English Bible, disposed after the manner of Buxtorf, London, 1754-57, 2 vols. fol.

These were superseded when Baron Tauchnitz brought out that of Dr. JULIUS FÜRST, assisted throughout by Dr. FRANZ DELITZSCH (to whom he generously ascribes great praise), Librorum Sacrorum Veteris Testamenti Concordantia Hebraica atque Chaldaica, Leipzig, 1840, folio. This well-known and elaborate work is based upon Buxtorf, but is a great improvement upon the original. Yet even in it are wanting most of the Hebrew particles and pronouns, and all proper names. Fürst follows Buxtorf's plan. He gives under each word the explanations in the rabbinical character; then arranges the different inflections of the word in regular order, and under each the passages in unpointed Hebrew. There are eight appendixes: 1. Etymological Index; 2. Explanatory List of Bible names (pointed Hebrew), to which is appended a syllabus of Ethnic-Hebrew (i.e., Phœnician) names; 3. A Lexicon of Aramaic and New Hebrew (i.e., the correspondences to Hebrew, arranged in alphabetical order); 4. An Etymological Table; 5. A Scheme of the Formation of Words; 6. "Propylæa Masoræ" (an orderly arrangement of the Masoretic notes); 7. "Chronicles of the Holy Tongue" (entirely in unpointed Hebrew); 8. A Comparative Table of Arabic, Syriac, Aramaic, and Hebrew.

But Fürst's book, by its unwieldy size, and use of Latin throughout, is unadapted to the wants of the ordinary English student. For his benefit the Englishman's Hebrew and Chaldee Concordance was prepared, designed 1830, published London, 1843, 3d ed., 1866, 2 vols. The editor, who also paid for the work, was George V. Wigram, who contributes an eccentric preface. Among the collaborators were S. P. Tregelles and B. Davidson. The work is superior. Each page presents (1) The Hebrew word (pointed); (2) Its pronunciation; (3) In the case of nouns, the gender, of verbs, the moods and tenses; (4) The passages of Scripture in which the words occur, quite fully printed, the title-words being distinguished by Italics. The appendixes are (1) Hebrew and English index (after each Hebrew word the various English terms by which it is rendered in the authorized version are given in alphabetical order); (2) Table of the variations of chapter and verses in the English and Hebrew Bibles; (3) List of proper names (pronounced), together with their occurrences, with index to the same. The work is very painstaking and useful, but is defective in that it makes no distinction between the inflections of the nouns; e.g., father and his father are under the same head.

The Hebraist's Vade Mecum, edited by Mr. Wigram (a verbal index to the Hebrew and Chaldee Scriptures), London, 1867, is valuable. It gives all the words, grammatically arranged, and under each form the passages wherein it occurs. A revised and corrected edition of B. DAVIDSON'S excellent Concordance of the Hebrew and Chaldee Scriptures appeared in London, 1876, under the care of the Rev. Joseph Hughes.

III. GREEK.—EUTHALIUS RHODIUS, a monk of St. Basil, is said to have finished (1300) a concordance to the entire Bible in Greek. But the work was never printed, if, indeed, it was ever written. These Greek concordances are usually either to the Old Testament with the Apocrypha, or to the New Testament. We consider first,

(1) The Concordances to the Old Testament and Apocrypha.—The first was made by CONRAD KIRCHER, Frankfort, 1607, and was a Hebrew-Greek, rather than a Greek, concordance, inasmuch as the work follows the order of the Hebrew words, placing the corresponding Greek word after it. Each Hebrew word had its Latin translation; and then, without alphabetical arrangement, followed the various Greek equivalents, with the passages in which they occur. There is a register of the Greek words, and a distinction made between canonical and apocryphal passages.

But the second independent concordance is much more valuable. It appeared under the title ABRAHAMI TROMMI Concordantiæ Græcæ Versionis vulgo dicta LXX. Interpretum, cujus voces secundum ordinem elementorum sermonis Græci digestæ recensentur, contra atque in opere Kircheriano factum fuerat, Amstelodami (Amsterdam) et Trajecti ad Rhenum (Utrecht), 1718, 2 vols. fol. This is a genuine Greek concordance, containing the Greek words in proper order, with their meanings in Latin, the corresponding Hebrew words alphabetically arranged below, and under them the passages in the canonical and apocryphal books. When the word occurs in any of the Greek versions, — Aquila, Theodotion, or Symmachus, — the passages are put below those from the Septuagint, as are also the passages from the Apocrypha. The work cost Tromm sixteen years' labor, and he was eighty-four when it appeared. It is still the standard work.

Tromm's derogatory remarks on Kircher led to the publication, by Professor John Gagnier, of Vindiciæ Kircherianæ animadversiones in novas Abr. Trommii Concordantias græcæ versionis LXX., Oxford, 1718.

(2) Concordances to the New Testament. — The first appeared under the title Συμφωνία, ἢ συλλεξις τῆς διαθήκης τῆς καινῆς (literally, "Symphony, the gathering-together of the New Testament"), Basel, 1546. It was the work during eight years of XYSTUS BETULEJUS (Sixtus Birken), librarian of the city library at Augsburg. The references are only to books and chapters, as verses did not then exist.

The second was brought out by HENRY STEPHENS, the famous printer, Paris, 1594. Stephens did not do the work himself, but merely wrote the preface. In this concordance the verses, invented by his father, Robert Stephens, are for the first time used. The Greek words are interpreted in Latin.

The third was by ERASMUS SCHMID, Wittenberg, 1638. It corrected the faults of the two concordances mentioned, and won at once universal applause. In 1717 Ernst Salomon Cyprian brought out a new edition containing a few corrections. Bagster (London, n.d.) has published a 32mo edition of it.

The fourth is KARL HERMANN BRUDER'S, under the title Ταμειὸν τῶν τῆς καινῆς διαθήκης λέξεων ("Treasury of the words of the New Testament"), Leipzig, 1842. This is the latest and best concordance to the Greek New Testament, and is to be credited to the famous publisher, Karl Christian Tauchnitz.

Besides the above, there is the Englishman's Greek Concordance of the New Testament (London, 1840, 5th ed., 1868), edited and paid for, as was the Englishman's Hebrew Concordance, by George V. Wigram, and prefaced in the same eccentric manner. The work is excellent, and by English readers is decidedly to be preferred to all others. It gives all the words of the Greek New Testament in alphabetical order, according to their uninflected forms, as in a dictionary. Each word is transliterated; but no further attempt is made to indicate its pronunciation, except by marking a diæresis or a long vowel. Under the word are the passages from the English New Testament in which the word, in its various cases or tenses, etc., appears, the translation of the word being italicized; e.g., ἐπιγινώσκω (epiginōsko). On next line, Matt. vii. 16: "Ye shall know them by their fruits." Mark ii. 8: "And immediately when Jesus perceived," etc. At the close is an English-Greek index, by means of which the English reader can see how many words in Greek are used to express the English, and a Greek-English index, differently arranged, which performs exactly the opposite service.

In 1870 appeared A Critical Greek and English Concordance of the New Testament. Prepared by CHARLES F. HUDSON, under the direction of Horace L. Hastings. Revised and completed by EZRA ABBOT, Boston, 3d ed., 1875, 508 pp. 12mo. The smallest and most convenient complete Greek-English concordance. Novel in plan, and scholarly in execution, it has been indorsed by all examiners. The preface gives a minute account of its genesis and execution. It gives the Greek words in dictionary order, the English translations of the authorized version alphabetically, in bold-faced type, and by each all the passages where the translation is found. Thus, μεταξὺ, between, Matt. xviii. 15, etc.; mean-while, John iv. 31; next, Acts xiii. 42. At the close all the proper names are given and assigned; then follow an index of the English words, an appendix of various readings in larger clauses, and a supplement giving the readings of Tischendorf's eighth edition, which vary from those of his seventh edition. The last two parts are the work of that admirable scholar, Professor Ezra Abbot.

IV. SYRIAC. — CARL SCHAAF published at Leyden (1709) a Lexicon Syriacum Concordantiale, omnes Novi Testamenti Syriaci voces — complectens. As the title indicates, it is more a lexicon than a concordance; yet its completeness is sufficient to allow its use in this way.

V. GERMAN. — 1. The honor of preparing the first concordance to any modern version belongs to JOHANNES SCHRÖTER, who published Concordantz des Neuen Testaments zu teutsch, Strassburg, 1524, folio, — a concordance to Luther's version.

2. CONRAD AGRICOLA (Bauer) first brought out a concordance upon the entire German Bible, Concordantia Bibliorum, Das ist biblische Concordantz und Verzeichnuss der Fürnehmsten Wörter, Frankfurt-a.-M., 1610. In 1612 he issued an appendix, which supplied deficiencies. Editions appeared 1621, 1632, and 1640, which incorporated the appendix. CHRISTIAN ZEISIUS (in Leipzig, 1658) brought out an improved concordance based upon Agricola's.

3. FRIEDRICH LANCKISCH issued Concordantia Bibliorum Germanico-Hebraico-Græcæ, Deutsche, Hebräische und Griechische Bibel, Leipzig u. Frankfurt-a.-M., 1677, folio. This was a truly important work, and well received; 2d ed., 1688, 3d ed., 1696, 4th ed., 1705, each edition being carefully revised and improved. Notwithstanding the pains already taken, CHRISTIAN REINECK found it worth while to prepare a fifth edition (1718). Lanckisch himself died in 1669, before the first appearance of his laborious work, which had these objects, — to revise, correct, and enlarge the Zeise edition of Agricola; to arrange under each German word the Greek or Hebrew words of which it was the translation; to place next to every Hebrew word a Greek letter, and to use these letters to represent the word in the passages quoted from Luther's Bible, so that the reader seeing the letter would know of what Hebrew or Greek word the German was the translation.

4. The Cruden of Germany is GOTTFRIED BÜCHNER. His concordance, moreover, agrees with Cruden's in that it is a so-called Real Concordanz, i. e., it contains definitions and notes. After the notes come the texts, as in other concordances. It appeared in two forms. Of the smaller the 1st edition appeared Jena, 1740; 2d, 1746; 3d, 1756; 4th, 1765; 5th, 1776: of the larger the 1st edition appeared Jena, 1750; 2d, 1757, 2 vols.; 4th, 1765. Up to 1776 the smaller or Hand-Concordanz was a widely-circulated work; but in that year the publisher failed, and the concordance oddly fell into disuse. The appearance of WICHMANN'S Concordance (Dessau und Leipzig, 1782, new ed., 1806, 2 parts), and the theology of Büchner, were two causes operative against the work. It would not sell at any price; and the remaining copies were about to fall into the paper-manufacturer's hands, when their then owner determined to make a final attempt. He employed Dr. H. L. Heubner to revise the work, and got out a new edition (the 6th, Halle, 1840) at an increased price. His confidence was justified by results. Once more Büchner was the popular work: the 7th edition appeared 1844; 8th, 1850; 11th, Braunschweig, 1859; 15th, 1877. In 1871 the first American edition appeared in Philadelphia (published by I. Kohler), provided with a Preface by Dr. Schaff, and an Appendix of eight thousand and sixty omitted passages by Professor A. Späth. The work answers, in a measure, the purposes of a Bible-dictionary: thus an historical sketch of Jerusalem is given under the name.

VI. FRENCH. — Of these may be mentioned MARK WILKS: Concordance des Saintes Ecritures, Paris, 1840.

VII. ENGLISH. — The first concordance was entitled The Concordance of the New Testament, most necessary to be had in the hands of all soche as desire the communication of any place contained in the New Testament, London, n. d., but certainly before 1540, and very probably by the printer JOHN DAY, though attributed to a "Mr. Thomas Gybson." The first concordance to the entire Bible was by JOHN MARBECKE, entitled A Concordance, that is to saie, a Worke wherein, by the ordre of the letters A, B, C, ye maie redely finde any worde conteigned in the Bible, London, 1550, folio. The references are only to chapters. In the same year appeared a translation from the German, A Briefe and a Compendious Table, in maner of a Concordance, openyng the waye to the principall Histories of the whole Bible, and the most comon articles grounded and comprehended in the Newe Testament and Olde, in maner as amply as doeth the great Concordance of the Bible. Gathered and set forth by Henry Bullinger, Leo Jude, Conrade Pellicane, and by other ministers of the Church of Ligurie (Zurich). Translated from the Hygh Almayne into English by Walter Lynne. To which is added a translation of the Third Booke of Machabees. This was a translation of the Index Bibliorum of Conrad Pellican, Zurich, 1837. See additional titles in Darling's Cyclopædia Bibliographica. Subjects, folio, 1859. He enumerates six concordances made between 1578 and 1737, of which the most important was by SAMUEL NEWMAN, London, 1650, reprinted at Cambridge, 1720, and generally known as the Cambridge Concordance.

But all these attempts were forgotten on the publication by ALEXANDER CRUDEN of his Complete Concordance to the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testament, London, 1737. This work is likely to keep its place as the best of all the concordances, so long as King James's Version remains in use. It has appeared in different shapes, and with more or less completeness. The original work contains explanatory notes on important words, exhibiting oftentimes much acuteness, and always profound piety. Those editions which contain them are therefore desirable. The concordances of Brown, Cole, and Eadie, are only revisions of Cruden. The Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge issued an edition (London, 1859), which is an improvement upon his, inasmuch as it is more complete; for Cruden does not give all the words of the Bible, and is especially defective in proper names. There are several American editions of Cruden: the most to be commended is that of Dodd, Mead, & Co., New York.

The latest, best, and most comprehensive concordance is by ROBERT YOUNG, LL.D.: Analytical Concordance to the Bible, Edinburgh, 1879, 4th revised ed., 1881. According to the title-page it is "on an entirely new plan, containing every word in alphabetical order, arranged under its Hebrew or Greek original, with the literal meaning of each, and its pronunciation; exhibiting about three hundred and eleven thousand references, marking thirty thousand various readings in the New Testament, with the latest information on biblical geography and antiquities, etc.; designed for the simplest reader of the English Bible." It is the outcome of forty years' labor, and took Dr. Young "nearly three years (from six A.M. to ten P.M.) merely to carry it through the press." It has been well received, and needs only revision in accordance with the revised version to be a work of permanent value. For the first time we have a really complete concordance. Very curiously in the first edition all reference to the "Holy Spirit" and "Holy Ghost" under "Holy" was missing. By means of this concordance the merely English reader may become to no inconsiderable degree a Bible critic.

Akin to a concordance is an analysis. Such a one was that made by MATTHEW TALBOT, London, 1800, quarto, revised and reproduced in America by NATHANIEL WEST, D.D., New York, 1853, which was again thoroughly revised and greatly improved by Professor ROSWELL D. HITCHCOCK, D.D., LL.D., and issued under the title New and Complete Analysis of the Holy Bible, N. Y., 1870. It is the best work of its kind. Besides the analysis proper, it contains Cruden's Concordance as revised by Dr. Eadie, and several appendixes, including a brief Dictionary of Religious Denominations, Sects, Parties, and Associations.

See H. E. BINDSEIL: Concordantiarum Homeritarum specimen cum Prolegomenis in quibus præsertim Concordantiæ biblicæ recensentur earumque origo et progressus declarantur, Halis, 1867; the same: Ueber die Concordanzen, in Theol. Studien u. Kritiken, 1870. SAMUEL M. JACKSON.

CONCORDAT means a treaty between the Pope, as the head of the Roman-Catholic Church, and a temporal sovereign, concerning the relations between the State and the Church. The name was first used in 1418 for those agreements on reform which Martin V. made with the nations of the Council of Constance. But it soon became general, though, officially, a distinction is still made between concordats and conventions; the latter name being applied to treaties with sovereigns not belonging to the Roman Church. There is, however, a striking difference between the earliest concordats and those of a later date. Thus the Concordat of Worms (Sept. 23, 1122) contains nothing but concessions from the side of the emperor. He gives up the right of investiture with ring and staff; he guarantees the freedom of the elections and consecrations of bishops in Germany; he promises to restore all ecclesiastical estates in his possession, etc. But from the beginning of the fifteenth century, when national kingdoms were consolidating and monarchical states organizing, the concordats changed character. It was now the Pope who had to make concessions; or, at all events, the concessions became reciprocal.

The motion that the principal measures of reform should be agreed upon before the new pope was elected could not be carried in the Council of Constance; and when Martin V. was elected (Nov. 11, 1417), it soon became evident that he intended to frustrate the reform. Nevertheless, concordats were made with France, Germany, and England. The two first are dated May 2, 1418; the last, July 11. All three are given by VON DER HARDT in his Æcum. Constantiense Concil., Leipzig, 1700, in tom. I. p. 1055, tom. IV. p. 1565, and tom. I. p. 1079, respectively. That with England was considered as final, those with France and Germany only as provisional. The principal features of these concordats are limitation of the number of cardinals, and provisions with respect to their appointment, revenues, etc.; restrictions of the appeals to the Pope, of papal dispensations, of indulgences, etc.; provisions with respect to annates and other papal taxes, to commendas, etc.; very severe rules against simony, etc.

The opposition of the episcopal system to the papal system, which had showed itself already in the Council of Constance, became still more apparent in the Council of Basel. A series of the decrees of that council was adopted by the French clergy, July 7, 1438, and, under the name of the Pragmatic Sanction of Bourges, incorporated with the law of France. The popes, however, never recognized the Pragmatic Sanction: at times it was not maintained even by the French kings; and Aug. 18, 1516, a new concordat was concluded between Leo X. and Francis I., the principal feature of which was, that it left the nomination of bishops to the king, but made no provision with respect to the term within which the papal institution should follow. Much haggling between the papal curia and the royal government was the necessary result; and in 1682 the French clergy, headed by Bossuet, issued the famous declaration in which the principles of the episcopal system and the National Church were formally asserted. See Histoire contenant l'Origine de la Pragmaticque Sanction et des Concordats, in Traité de Droits de Libertés de l'Église Gallicane, Paris, 1731, tom. I.

By the Revolution, the Roman-Catholic Church was abolished in France, but re-established by the concordat of July 15, 1801, concluded between Pius VII. and Napoleon Bonaparte. It was extremely humiliating to the Pope; and the high-handed manner in which Napoleon carried on the negotiations did not sweeten the pill. The number of bishops was reduced from a hundred and fifty-eight to sixty; and the right of nomination was vested in the first consul. All claims to property confiscated by the Revolution were renounced, and the clergy were to be paid by the State at a fixed rate. The worship should be free, though subject to the general police regulations of the country, etc. Without awaiting the final consent of the Pope, Napoleon published the concordat in the Moniteur as part of the law of France, and together with the concordat a number of organic articles which the Pope had never seen, and never would recognize. See PORTALIS: Discours, Rapports, etc., sur le Concordat de 1801, et les Articles Organiques, Paris, 1845; Mémoires des Cardinal Consalvi, Paris, 1864, 2 vols.; HAUSSONVILLE: L'Église Romaine et le Premier Empire, Paris, 1868; AUG. THEINER: Histoire des deux Concordats, etc., Paris, 1869. After the restoration, the papal curia and the royal government labored in unison to effect a complete change. The concordat of 1801 was abolished, and that of 1516 was restored. It was intended to re-establish a number of episcopal sees, and to endow them with real estate, etc. But, when the proposition was laid before the chambers, it met with such an opposition, that it had to be abandoned. After the revolution of 1830, the concordat of 1801 was again adopted; and, though somewhat modified, it still forms the basis for the relation between the Gallican Church and Rome.

The reformatory decrees of the Council of Basel were also adopted in Germany by the diet of Mayence, March 26, 1439, though not in exactly the same form as in France. The decrees specially emphasized by the Instrumentum Acceptationis (see KOCH: Sanctio Pragmatica Germanorum Illustrata, Strassburg, 1789) are those concerning the regular recurrence of œumenical councils and the Pope's submission to them, concerning provincial synods, the discipline of the clergy, the appeals to the Pope, the annates, etc. Eugene IV. tried to make resistance, and deposed the archbishop-electors of Treves and Cologne, the two first prelates of the German Church, but also known as the two staunchest adherents of the Council of Basel. At the diet of Francfort, however (March 21, 1446), all the electoral princes of Germany agreed to present an ultimatum to the Pope, — either he should accept the decrees of the Council of Basel, restore the two archbishops, convoke an œumenical council in some German city on May 1, 1447, or they would leave his guidance, and follow the council; which might mean that they would follow Felix V., the Antipope. Eugene IV. yielded. He accepted the Concordata Principum Francofordensis; and his successor, Nicholas V., confirmed it. See KOCH,

l. c. p. 197. Some modifications, however, were introduced in the final text of the concordat, among others a passage about restitution for losses which the papal see might incur from the restrictions of the appeals, indulgences, dispensations, annates, etc.; and the fulfilment of this obligation gave occasion to a new concordat, that of Aschaffenburg, concluded at Vienna with Frederic III., Feb. 17, 1448. By this agreement the Pope gained great advantages, especially with respect to the nomination and institution of bishops. The relation between the German Church and Rome was thereby made vague and uncertain, and remained so until, in the beginning of the present century, the influence of the French Revolution, the wars with France, and the dissolution of the German Empire, produced a complete change.

The confusion began to break into the German Church immediately after the peace of Luneville (1801), when Germany adopted the French idea of secularizing the ecclesiastical estates; and at the time of the Congress of Vienna it had become so complete, that only five bishops were left in the whole church of Germany. The curia, however, did not want a new organization: it simply demanded a restitution of the status quo ante bellum, the restoration of the ecclesiastical property and revenues, the re-establishment of the ecclesiastical principalities, etc. This was soon found to be an impossibility; and in 1815 negotiations began between the Pope and the various German states. Concordats were concluded with Bavaria in 1817, with Prussia and Hanover in 1821, with Baden and Württemberg in 1827, with Hesse in 1829, etc. The most remarkable of all the German concordats is that with Austria of Aug. 18, 1855. See MOY and VERING: Archiv. für kath. Kirchenrecht, 21, 22. In Austria the Josephine traditions were still continued, though tempered by the character of ruler and the spirit of the government. After the confusion of 1848, however, a strong re-action set in; and the result was a concordat, which, in the middle of the nineteenth century, actually attempted to galvanize into life the principles of the middle ages. It opens with the declaration that the Roman-Catholic Church shall enjoy all its prerogatives and privileges in full and unimpeded, that is, no other denomination shall be tolerated; and it ends by cancelling as null and void all Austrian laws which are opposed to the doctrines and practices of the Roman-Catholic Church. The most important institutions in social life, the most important forms of personal life, the school, the university, literature, science, art, matrimony, etc., were delivered up, bound hand and foot, to the papal curia. But the experiment failed. Most of the provisions of the concordat could not possibly be carried out; and the effect of those which could became so strikingly apparent in the battle at Sadowa, that, in spite of the protest of the Pope, no further effort was made to carry them out. After the declaration of the new dogma of the infallibility of the Pope in 1870, the whole concordat was abolished.

CONCUBINAGE AMONG THE HEBREWS.
See MARRIAGE AMONG THE HEBREWS.

CONCUBINAGE. The word has two entirely different senses,—a good, as in application to Hebrew usage, and a bad, as in use among us. The ancients recognized inferior wives, who yet had rights, and whose children were legitimate. The Romans had three sorts of "marriages," which might be simultaneous in any particular case. The highest was a genuine marriage, with certain rites. The children were full heirs: the wife was mater familias. In the second sort the wife was called a uxor tantum ("wife" only, in contradistinction to mater familias, "mother"). No formalities were required, only residence for a year uninterruptedly in the man's house. The bond was a loose one, for an absence of three successive nights broke it. The third sort was simple concubinage. The children were not called bastards, yet they could not inherit. This last condition was legalized. The Justinian Code calls it licita consuetudo ("allowed custom"). This legal concubinage is still known in Germany, Austria, and Denmark, where morganatic ("left-handed," because the man gives the left hand) marriages occasionally take place between persons of varying ranks, e.g., a prince and a commoner. In such cases neither the wife nor the children have claim upon the man's name, title, or estate; yet the marriage is real, as among the Romans, in the sense that infidelity in the woman is adjudged adultery.

The Christian Church was founded in a community accustomed to far laxer notions on the relations of the sexes than ours; and some scholars see in Paul's demand that "a bishop must be the husband of one wife" (1 Tim. iii. 2) a repudiation by the apostle of those who had concubines. The Church could not legislate against such unions in all cases; yet for a married man to have a concubine was declared to be adultery. So Augustine, in Sermo CCXXIV. (Migne's ed., tom. V. 1093). But the common case, where the man was unmarried, was differently dealt with. The Apostolical Constitutions, dating from before 325 (see title), in a section (viii. 32) reputed to come from Paul, says, "Let a concubine who is slave to an unbeliever, and confines herself to her master alone, be received;" but, "if one of the faithful hath a concubine, if she be a bond-servant, let him leave off that way, and marry in a legal manner; if she be a free woman, let him marry her in a lawful manner: if he does not, let him be rejected." It may be said, therefore, that, before the fifth century, the Church tolerated concubinage. So the Council of Toledo (A.D. 400) in its seventeenth canon: "If any one has not a wife, but instead, a concubine, let him not be kept from communion" (Hefele, Concilien-geschichte, 1st ed., vol. ii. p. 67). But, from that time on, the Church frowned upon the custom. So Leo I. (458), in his decretals, declared marriage was the only moral sexual union, although he did not directly condemn concubinage. See, also, the canons of the following synods, as given in HEFELE, vols. iv.-vii.: Mantua (827), Paris (829), Mainz (851), c. 12, "Whoever has a concubine not regularly pledged to him can leave her, and marry another;" c. 13, "Whoever has both wife and concubine must be kept from communion; not so he who has only the latter." Tribur (895), c. 38, "Marriage is only allowable among equals. A man who already has a concubine can marry; but, if he has married an emancipated slave, he must remain faithful to her." The great synod in Rome (1059), c. 12, "A layman who has both wife and concubine will be excommunicated." Piacenza (1095), which is very strong, c. 1, "Nobody will be allowed to do penance who does not renounce concubinage, hate, and other deadly sins." The Roman synod of 1099 also forbade the Eucharist to all living in concubinage. The Hungarian national synod at Ofen (1279), c. 47, "No laic may publicly have a concubine." Nougaret (1303), c. 14, "All notorious concubiners, usurers, and adulterers are to be publicly announced as excommunicated;" c. 5, no concubine was to be tolerated by the priests, under penalty of a heavy fine. Valladolid (1322), c. 22, "A married man who has openly a concubine, and also every unmarried man who has an infidel concubine, is ipso facto excommunicated." Benevent (1331), c. 57, "No married man is allowed a concubine." Palencia (1388), similar to Valladolid. Copenhagen (1425) ordered the parish priests to announce to those living in concubinage that they must separate within a year. As will be seen by the above-quoted canons, concubinage was a very common practice; and the reason why it lasted, notwithstanding its repeated condemnation, was because the clergy very commonly set the example, for the Church called their unions with women, which were to all intents and purposes marriages, "concubinages," and in many places the payment of a yearly tax to the bishop secured them immunity from molestation. See CELIBACY. It was therefore evident to the earnest moralists that the evil among the laity could best be reached through the clergy: hence the reform-legislation in the Council of Basel (1431-49), which was of the most rigorous description. The guilty priests were to be punished with loss of position, imprisonment, and fine. Concubines and all suspicious women were to be driven from the houses of the clergy, and the children born of such unions were not to be allowed to remain with their father.

In the wake of this earnest effort to clear the Church of reproach came the Lateran Council (1516), under the guidance and inspiration of Leo X., which inaugurated church-legislation against the unmarried men who had concubines. The Council of Trent (1543-63) likewise, not only put this sort of concubinage under the ban of the Church (sess. XXIV., c. 8, De Ref. Matrimonii), but revised the marriage regulations, and thus made the distinction between concubinage and marriage more pronounced; for the bridegroom and bride must publish their intention before their own pastor and two witnesses. According to the present law in the Roman-Catholic Church, every commerce of the sexes other than in lawful marriage is forbidden and punishable. If, after three warnings, the concubine is not given up, both parties are put under the ban; and if, in the course of a year, a separation does not take place, the concubine is removed, if necessary, by the civil power. The canons of the Council of Trent (sess.

XXIV., De Sacramento Matrimonii) have nothing to say about concubinage. In canon 2 we read, "If any one saith that it is lawful for Christians to have several wives at the same time, and that this is not prohibited by any divine law, let him be anathema." This is rather a prohibition of polygamy (Schaff, Creeeds, vol. ii. p. 195).—In Protestant churches the immorality of concubinage has never been doubted. It constitutes ample ground for the excommunication of a member. The connivance by the Lutheran Reformers at the bigamy of Philip of Hesse is an exceptional case.

SAMUEL M. JACKSON.

CONCURSUS DIVINUS, a dogmatical term referring to the relation which exists, in the evolution of nature and history, between the divine agency, as causa finalis, and the natural agencies, as causae efficientes. In the Bible the idea does not occur. The Bible says that the earth covers itself with grass and herbs, that men and animals multiply, etc.; and it also says that it is God who covers the earth with grass and herbs, and God who makes men and animals multiply. And, again, the Bible says that we act from the impulses of our own hearts, and it also says that in God alone we live, and move, and have our being. The idea belongs to the dogmatic speculation, and is the result of philosophical reflection. It has been most elaborately expounded by the schoolmen (Thomas Aquinas) and the theologians of the old Lutheran orthodox school (Gerhard, Quenstedt); while modern dogmatists seem most inclined to leave the question in the form it has in the Bible, and refer the whole matter to philosophy.

CONDIGNITY and CONGRUITY, or meritum de condigno and meritum de congruo, are terms used by the schoolmen after Thomas Aquinas in their attempts at reducing the doctrines of grace into one harmonious system; meritum de congruo denoting the inborn ability of the human will to perform certain works of a lower order of obedience, thereby throwing itself in the direction of divine grace, while meritum de condigno denotes the ability to perform works which are pleasing and acceptable to God, after the infusion of grace, and by the aid of the Spirit.

CONE, Spencer Houghton, D.D., b. at Princeton, N.J., April 30, 1785; d. in New York, Aug. 28, 1855. He taught for several years, and then went on the stage, and played with great success. But he was converted, and in December, 1812, became a journalist, but in 1815 a Baptist minister, and the chaplain to Congress, 1815-16. He was pastor of the Oliver-street Church, New York, 1816 to 1823; of the First Baptist Church, from 1841 till his death; a corresponding secretary of the American Bible Society, 1832-35, but resigned because of its action in the matter of the Burmese translation of the New Testament; and was the leader in the formation of the American and Foreign Bible Society (1836), and later of the American Bible Union (1850), of both of which societies he was president. See BIBLE SOCIETIES, pp. 263, 264. His Memoir was written by his sons, N. Y., 1856.

CONFERENCE. I.—In the ROMAN-CATHOLIC CHURCH the term is used to describe, (1) the assemblies of priests called by themselves of free choice pastoral conferences, and (2), those called by the constituted colleges of priests, chapter conferences. 1. Although the Roman-Catholic Church does not forbid, she by no means favors, such irregular gatherings. She demands that they shall be limited both in numbers and in topics, and shall be under the entire control of the ordinariat. The amount of liberty enjoyed may, therefore, be imagined. Yet such course is eminently wise, for Rome has never pretended to be the friend of free speech or of progress.

2. The second kind of conference first took place in the ninth century, as a consequence of the great size of the diocesan synods, which made it impossible for all the clergy to meet together: so district meetings were ordained. These conferences were held upon the first day of every month, if it was not a feast (hence the name Calendæ), and were called by the archpresbyter or dean. Harduin gives account of several. One was held in London, 1237; but after that date there is no record of any, until, in 1565, Cardinal Carl Borromeo issued directions for their organization and guidance, and accordingly several met. They were looked upon as substitutes for the diocesan synods, but have failed to become general in the Roman-Catholic Church. See WETZER U. WETTE, Kirchen-Lexikon, s. "Conferenzen" (1st ed. vol. ii. pp. 766-769).

II.—In the LUTHERAN CHURCH in Germany there are diocesan clerical conferences, at which the superintendents preside. For the conference in the Lutheran Church of the United States see title.

III.—Two famous and fruitful ENGLISH ecclesiastical gatherings are known as conferences. 1. The Hampton Court Conference. Hampton Court, which is near London, the favorite residence of Henry VIII., and one of the principal royal palaces until George II., was built by Cardinal Wolsey, and by him given to his king. There, on Saturday, Monday and Wednesday, Jan. 14, 16, and 18, 1604 (old style, 1603), a conference between four leading Puritans, and nine bishops, and eight deans, was held, presided over by King James I., who also took a leading part in the discussions. The leaders were John Whitgift, Archbishop of Canterbury, Richard Bancroft, Bishop of London, and Dr. John Reynolds, President of Corpus Christi College, Oxford, the spokesman for the Puritans. The conference was nominally called to discuss the usages complained of by the Puritans; such as non-residence, pluralities, the use of the cross in baptism, the cap and the surplice, and other ceremonial peculiarities: but in reality the prelates were so insolent toward their adversaries, and so servile to the king, and the Puritans were so intimidated, that discussion was impossible. Yet the conference had one most important result,—the revision of our English Bible. Dr. Reynolds suggested it; and the king, seeing in the proposition a chance to immortalize his reign, at once assented, and ordered the work to be done. And so appeared, seven years thereafter, King James's Version. Besides, the conference made some alterations in the Liturgy, forbade women's baptizing of infants (formerly frequent), inserted "remission of sins" in the Rubric of Absolution, and altered some words in the Dominical Gospels. See FULLER: Church History of Britain, vol. v. pp. 206-303; Teggs's ed., London, 1868, vol. iii. pp. 193-215; PROCTOR: History of the Book of Con-

mon Prayer, pp. 88-93; SCHAFF: Creeds, vol. i. pp. 706-709.

2. The Savoy Conference was held in the Savoy Palace, London, from April 15 to July 25, 1661, between twenty-one Episcopalians (twelve bishops and nine assistants) and an equal number of Presbyterians. The object of the meeting was the revision of the Prayer-book; but such was the temper on both sides, that no results were arrived at. Baxter embodied the changes desired by the Puritans in his Liturgy, the hasty work of a fortnight. The book was never used, yet has a certain value. It was republished by Professor C. W. Shields of Princeton, Philadelphia, 1867; new edition, New York, 1880.

IV.—In the METHODIST-EPISCOPAL CHURCH in America there are four judicatories so named. 1. The General Conference, which meets once in four years, is composed of ministerial and lay delegates; one ministerial for every forty-five members of each Annual Conference, and two lay for each Annual Conference. Two-thirds of the whole number of delegates constitute the quorum. The two classes of delegates deliberate together, but vote separately whenever such separate vote is demanded by a third of either order. One of the general superintendents presides. The conference has full power to make rules and regulations for the Church, provided such enactments do not alter in essentials the doctrine nor the polity of the Church. "Provided, nevertheless, that upon the concurrent recommendation of three-fourths of all the members of the several Annual Conferences who shall be present and vote on such recommendation, then a majority of two-thirds of the General Conference succeeding shall suffice to alter any of the restrictions [except in relation to doctrine]; and also, whenever such alteration shall have been first recommended by two-thirds of the General Conference, so soon as three-fourths of the members of all the Annual Conferences shall have concurred as aforesaid, such alteration shall take effect" (Book of Discipline, ed. of 1880, ¶¶ 63-72, pp. 47-52).

2. The Annual Conference appoints its own place of meeting; but the length of its sessions, over a week, is determined by the bishop who presides. There are now (1880) ninety-four annual conferences (Discipline, pp. 231-258). Attendance is obligatory upon all travelling preachers. The conference takes cognizance of all matters properly ecclesiastical, collects statistics of membership, baptisms, church-property, Sunday schools, benevolent collections, ministerial support, and current expenses, and publishes the same. It elects and ordains deacons and elders. Particular attention is given to the mission churches; and all those able to support themselves are not allowed to remain on the list of its missions. A certified copy of the minutes is sent to the General Conference (Discipline, ¶¶ 73-86, pp. 53-61).

3. The District Conference is composed of the travelling and local preachers, the exhorters, the district stewards, and one Sunday-school superintendent and one class-leader from each pastoral charge in the district. It meets once or twice a year. A bishop, or else the presiding elder, presides. Minutes sent to the Annual Conference. Its province is the superintendence of church matters in the district in a manner similar to the Quarterly Conference (Discipline, ¶¶ 87-94, pp. 61-68).

4. The Quarterly Conference "is composed of all the travelling and local preachers, exhorters, stewards, class-leaders, and trustees of the churches in the circuits or stations, and the first superintendents of our Sunday schools; said trustees and superintendents being members of our church, and approved by the Quarterly Conference." The presiding elder, and, in his absence, the preacher-in-charge, is president. The regular business of the conference is to hear complaints, and to receive and try appeals, take cognizance of all the local preachers and exhorters in the circuit or station, to inquire into their usefulness, to license proper persons to preach, and to try, suspend, deprive of ministerial office and credentials, expel or acquit, any local preacher against whom charges may be preferred, to elect trustees and also stewards, and to supervise the Sunday schools within the circuit, and to remove unworthy superintendents. The order of business in the respective successive Quarterly Conferences is minutely and clearly laid down.

V. — The WESLEYANS of England and Ireland have annual conferences attended by all the ministers. The FREEWILL BAPTISTS, as well as other minor religious bodies, call their annual meeting by this term.

CONFESSION OF FAITH. See CREED.

CONFESSION OF SINS. Roman-Catholic writers like to date the institution of private or auricular confession back to the very first days of the Christian Church. See BINTERIM: Denkwürdigkeiten, 1825-33, I. 1, 3; KLEE: Die Beichte, 1828; SIEMERS: Die sacrament. Beichte, 1844. Already Dallæus, however (De Sacramentali s. Auric. Confessione, Geneva, 1661), proved that this assertion rested on a confusion between private and public confession. See, for the latter, the article on Penance. Private confession originated in the monastery, where only transgressions of the rules of the order were subject to public confession and penance. According to its idea, monastic life presupposes all sin impossible but sin in thought, and this was to be confessed privately to the abbot. See JEROME: De Regul. Monachar., in Op. XI. 499; and BASIL: Regul. Brev., in Op. II. 492. Outside the monastery, private confession at first met with opposition from the side of the clergy. The Bishops of Apulia and Campania demanded that sins confessed in private should be made publicly known to the congregation; and it was this demand which first caused Leo the Great to officially recognize and confirm private confession as a legal institution. See Op. Leonis M., ed. BALLERINI, Ep. 168. In the eighth and ninth centuries the practice thus legalized was made compulsory. The synod of Liege (710) decreed that every person should confess once a year to the priest of his parish; and the can. 21 of the Lateran Council of 1215 confirms the old established custom. Chrodegang's rules (MANSI, XIV. 313) demanded that ecclesiastics should confess twice a year; and, while the synods of the sixteenth century recommended lay people to confess frequently, they made the confession of ecclesiastics weekly (HARTZHEIM, VII. 679). The Council of Trent (sess. 23, can. 10) decreed that nuns should confess once a month. It was also in the thirteenth century that the formula of absolution used by the priest, Dominus absolvet ("May the Lord absolve thee"), was changed to Ego te absolvo ("I absolve thee"). When the right of hearing confessions was granted to the Dominican order, conflicts arose with the parochial clergy; and in 1321 the chancellor of the University of Paris demanded that confessions made to a Dominican friar should be repeated to the priest of the parish, but Pope John XXII. refused his confirmation. The Reformers absolutely rejected compulsory confession, though the Lutheran churches generally retained confession in some form as a preparation to the celebration of the Lord's Supper. VON ZEESCHWITZ.

CONFIRMATION. In the Apostolic Church baptism was invariably connected with imposition of hands, by which act the gift of the Holy Spirit was communicated, and without which the sacrament was not complete. From several passages, however, of the New Testament (such as Heb. vi. 2, Acts xix. 6, viii. 12-19) it would seem as if these two features were or could be kept separate; the latter, the imposition of hands, being considered an apostolical, and afterwards an episcopal, prerogative; and this direction the development took during the first century. Tertullian describes the sacramental act as consisting of three distinct elements,—the baptism proper, the anointing with chrism, and the imposition of hands. The question of the validity of heretical baptism gave occasion to a still sharper separation between these elements, as the party which refused to repeat the baptism maintained the necessity of the imposition of hands; and the circumstance that the baptism proper was administered by the lower ranks of the clergy, while the imposition of hands was reserved for the bishops, finally caused a separation also in time between these two acts. Both Jerome and Augustine were opposed to the tendency involved in this development; but the interest of the hierarchical system, and the tremendous growth of this interest, finally forced the measure through; and by the synods of Lyons (1274) and Florence (1439) the imposition of hands by the bishop, the episcopal act of confirmation, was established as the second sacrament of the Roman-Catholic Church.

The sacrament, which, in accordance with the various aspects from which it may be viewed, is called confirmatio, sigillum, consignatio, chrisma, unctio, or impositio manum, is administered by the bishop at various places of his diocese, and at various times of the year, according to convenience. The catechumen must have filled his seventh year. He has generally a sponsor, and receives a confirmation-name. A spiritual preparation is recommended, but not demanded: the external signs—fasting, cutting off the hair, etc.—are sufficient. The principal feature of the act is the anointing with the chrism. After an introduction with prayer, the bishop makes the sign of the cross on the forehead of the catechumen with the prepared and consecrated oil, addressing him as follows: Signo te signo oracis et confirmo te chrismate salutis. The sacrament is not absolutely necessary, but cannot be repeated: its effect is the communication of the Holy Spirit, an equipment for the battle of life. In the Greek Church it has essentially the same character as in the Roman, with the exception that it can be administered by every priest.

From the very first the Reformers rejected confirmation as a sacramental act,—partly because it lacks the true characteristics of a sacrament (it was not established by Jesus; and it involves no divine promise), and partly because it detracts from the sacrament of baptism. Calvin has especially expounded this latter point with great vigor. It was not the idea, however, of the Reformers simply to abolish the institution without putting any thing in its place. There is also an evangelical confirmation, though without any sacramental character. Most closely this new institution resembles the old Roman-Catholic in the Anglican Church, where it is administered by the bishop or his assistants, and while the catechumens are still very young. In the other Reformed churches, and also in the Lutheran, it was often put in a certain relation to the first communion as a preparation for the sacrament of the Lord's Supper; the catechetical exercises being its most characteristic feature. It was not generally adopted, however, nor did it develop any high degree of vigor until the time of Spener. His idea of confirmation was that of a renewal of the baptismal pact, a conscious and responsible assumption, by the individual himself, of the vow, which, at his baptism, had been made for him by his sponsors. Its principal features were the catechetical exercises, the confession, and the vow, and its purpose a kind of new-kindled or revived devotion. In this form it was almost unanimously and universally adopted by the Lutheran churches of Germany and Scandinavia. In the Calvinistic churches of the United States a public confession of faith, prior to the first communion, is the substitute for confirmation. See BACHMANN: Die Konfirmation der Katechumenen in der evangelischen Kirche, Berlin, 1852.

CONFLICT OF DUTIES. See DUTIES, CONFLICT OF.

CONFUCIUS (a name Latinized from Kung fu-tszé, i.e., the "Master Kung") was born in the district of Tsow, in the feudal kingdom of Lu, now the southern part of Shantung, in the year 551 B.C. His father was governor of the district at the time,—a man of prowess, and honored by his country, who died at the age of seventy-three, when his son was three years old. His mother, though struggling with poverty, carefully cherished his love of learning; but our information concerning his early training is scanty and legendary. His grave demeanor and precocious mind early attracted attention, and he was led to study carefully the ancient laws and records. At nineteen he married. The following year he became a keeper of granaries, and overseer of public fields, in which the reforms he instituted gained him the favor of his sovereign. Induced by the disregard for law among his countrymen to examine more closely the ancient writings, and satisfied as to the ability of their teachings to check existing evils, he began to gather pupils around him. Although only twenty-two, his reputation attracted many young men to his house; and their numbers increased as the value of his instructions was recognized. The death of his mother when he was twenty-four afforded him opportunity to offer a sincere tribute to her memory, and also to revive an old custom of retiring from office in order to mourn three years, upon the death of a parent. His example has been followed to the present day. With the exception of a visit to the court of the Duke of Lu, he devoted the next ten years of his life to still further study and instruction of his numerous disciples, all the while rising in influence as a public teacher and learned man, one who was qualified to rule and advise in affairs of the state. This course of life he continued till he was thirty-four years old, when his wish to enter public service was gratified. One of the chief ministers of Lu on his death-bed (B.C. 517) advised his son to join the school of Confucius to learn the nature of ceremonial observances, in order to better perform his official duties. He and a near relative did so; and they gave new éclat to the master, who was ere long, at their representation, sent by his sovereign, Duke Chao, to the imperial court at Loh-yang, to study the rites then in use, so as to introduce them into Lu. He went as a private man, to see and learn, which he was permitted to do without restraint, and returned home the same year.

Soon after, Duke Chao was obliged to fly to the adjoining state of Tsi to save his life; and Confucius followed as a loyal subject. Not approving his position there, the sage returned home. He was now known as a great teacher. Lu was distracted by civil strife, from which he managed to keep aloof during the next fifteen years. In the year 500 Duke Chao's brother Ting came into power in Lu, and the rival factions were gradually put down. Confucius was fifty years old when he was appointed magistrate of the town of Chung-tu. The influence of his stern virtue, and the wisdom of his administration, wrought a speedy revolution in the social and economical condition of the place. The next year he was raised to be minister of crime, in which he introduced many reforms to simplify and enforce the administration of justice. These reforms, however successful, excited the envy of neighboring lords, whose efforts finally succeeded in seducing the ruler of Lu to remove the sage from office (B.C. 496).

During the next thirteen years he wandered from state to state, at one time honored, at another in danger of his life, but always surrounded by a band of faithful disciples. In many respects it was the most useful and influential period of his career. When sixty-six years old, he returned to Lu, and employed his remaining years in completing his literary works. He died 478 B.C., at the age of seventy-three. His wife and only son, Kung Li, had both died before him; but he was honored and mourned by many attached followers. His tomb at Kih-fau in Shantung is surrounded by an extensive collection of temples, halls, and courts, and has been recently described by Rev. A. Williamson in his Journeys in North China, vol. I. chap. xiii. His descendants still live in that region, and the head of the family is known as the Sacred Duke Kung. Though discouraged and neglected at the end of his career, Confucius, through his literary works, was destined to compel such homage from his fellow-men as no other man has ever had, and which amounts in reality to worship. In every city of China, down to those of the third order, there is a temple to him, and in every college and school he is venerated and adored.

The ideal of Confucius, to the attainment of which all his efforts and teachings were directed, was a condition of happy tranquillity prevailing throughout the empire. He considered that this could be accomplished by maintaining the sacredness of the universal obligations of human society; viz., those between sovereign and minister, between father and son, between husband and wife, between elder and younger brother, and between friends, each one faithfully performing the reciprocal duties arising from each. He claimed, to a certain degree, unlimited authority for the sovereign over the minister, father over the son, husband over the wife, elder brother over younger; and he enjoined kind and upright dealings among friends, thus inculcating as his leading tenets subordination to superiors, and virtuous conduct. In harmony with the practical character of his system, he taught, with great minuteness, rules for social intercourse, and laid special stress upon the care and education of the young, which he regarded as the foundation of the welfare of the state. His teachings in regard to political and social morality are based essentially upon the same grounds. He taught that the sovereign was the father of his people, and as such entitled to the same obedience, mingled with reverence, which is due from a child to its parent. His idea of government was a paternal despotism. But on the other hand, ascribing great importance to the power of example, he insisted upon personal rectitude and good government as the pledges and arguments for a ruler's maintenance in power. The general tendency of the philosophy of Confucius is good; and, compared with that of Greece and Rome, it takes precedence by the purity of its teachings and the attention paid to the rules governing the common intercourse of life; but is inferior to them in the profundity which was exhibited by those philosophers in their gropings after truth.

Throughout his works and teachings Confucius seldom referred to the great problems of human condition and destiny. To his practical mind the consideration of theology and metaphysics seemed uncertain and useless in its results; and he evaded, if he did not rebuke, his disciples, for prying into things beyond their depth. "To give one's self earnestly," said he, "to the duties due to men, and, while respecting spiritual beings, to keep aloof from them, may be called wisdom." This contains the essence of his teachings in regard to the ancient creed of China. While he enjoined respect for its twofold worship and religious observances, enforcing his command by his example, yet he crushed out every spiritual tendency by discountenancing speculation upon higher things. It has been questioned whether he even did not doubt the existence of a divine Power, and regard the universe as a vast self-sustaining mechanism; but he undoubtedly gave occasion to his disciples for such a belief by his silence upon the subject, and his use of the indefinite term "heaven."

For twenty-three centuries Confucius has held complete sway over the minds of nearly a third of the human race. The source of this influence may be ascribed to the use of the Four Books and the Five Classics as text-books. In adopting them as the text-books at the national examinations, the rulers of China took the best moral guides their literature afforded, and trained their rising youth in the best principles of government they possessed. Not only does every scholar learn at the lap of Confucius, but all civil offices are reached only after going through the competitive examinations in those nine classics. His doctrines are thus deeply impressed upon the Chinese mind. But, however great his influence has been in the past, it is destined to wane in the near future. His system is not capable of being expanded proportionately with the progress of the nation, for it lacks the high sanctions and the vital force of Christianity.

CONGREGATIO DE AUXILIIS DIVINÆ GRATIÆ. The name is applied to the commission ordered by Pope Clement VIII., in 1598, to examine the Jesuit Molina's book, Concordia liberi arbitrii cum gratia ("On Harmony between the Freedom of the Will and Divine Grace"), Lisbon, 1588. The occasion of this famous examination was briefly this: A Spanish Dominican, Dominicus Banez, issued a book on the doctrine of grace, which was aimed at the newly-established order of the Jesuits. Molina prepared the above-mentioned book, which received ere issue the approbation of the censor of books in the Spanish Inquisition, and of the Portuguese arch-inquisitor, who had examined it on complaint of Banez. The work met at first with almost universal applause. The Dominicans alone, under the leadership of Banez, opposed it strenuously, on the ground that it was Semi-Pelagian in its teachings, inasmuch as it emphasized the freedom of the human will at the cost of divine grace, really made the divine action dependent on the human, and thus impeached the authority of Augustine and Thomas Aquinas, and revived the old Pelagian and Semi-Pelagian theology. It was said, moreover, that the Molinists denied the necessity of divine grace at all in the work of human salvation, and ascribed to purely natural works the first rank of merit.

So between the Dominicans and the Jesuits a great fight broke out, and continued for many years. In the beginning of 1598 the Pope ordered the formation of the so-called "Congregatio de auxiliis divinæ gratiæ," to examine Molina's book. After three months and eleven sittings, nine out of the eleven examiners condemned the book in the strongest terms; and the result of a second examination, at the papal order, was precisely the same. Meanwhile influence of all kinds was brought to bear in favor of Molina; and accordingly the Pope ordered a debate between the two parties, who, however, argued on the questions in dispute rather than upon Molina's book. As the Pope himself inclined to the Dominican side, the Jesuit Gregor Valentia very shrewdly addressed himself directly to him, and with such effect, that the Pope did not condemn Molina's book, but determined upon a second debate. This began March 20, 1602, in the Vatican, before the Pope, and lasted four years. The debaters were cardinals, bishops, doctors of theology, censors, generals of the Dominican and Jesuit orders, and professed theologians. After listening for some three years to the discussion of Molina's book, the Pope formed the odd notion to read it himself, but unhappily died (March 3, 1605) ere he could find time to do so. The weary debate continued under his successor, Paul V., until Aug. 23, 1607, when Paul V. closed the proceedings, and afterwards issued an order allowing each party to teach as it pleased, so long as it did not call the other heretical. Thus ended the struggle of many years. It was a virtual victory for the Jesuits, who obtained full liberty to preach their pernicious doctrines to the present corruption of Roman-Catholic theology.

Naturally the history of this Congregatio was one of the burning questions in the subsequent Jansenist controversy. Santamour and other Jansenists circulated the history written by Pagna, Coronell, and De Lemos, along with a decretal, said to have been prepared, but not promulgated, by Paul V., in which he condemned Molina. But it may be a forgery. In the beginning of the eighteenth century a Dominican, Hyacinth Serry (under the name Augustine Le Blanc), and a Jansenist (anonymous), published at Lyons another history. To meet this, the Jesuit Levin Meyer, under the name of Theodore Eleutherius, prepared his Historia Controversiarum de divinae gratiæ auxiliis sub. P. Sixto V., Clemente VIII., et Paulo V., Antw., 1705. See complete and interesting art. Congregatio de auxiliis, in WETZER U. WELTE: Kirchen-Lexikon, 1st ed. vol. ii. pp. 786-794; also G. CONGREGATION (Hebrew קהל, or עדה, assembly; Greek ἐκκλησία, those called together; from καλέω, to call: see further, on etymology, under CHURCH), an assembly, a gathering of people for either political or religious purposes.

I. SCRIPTURAL USAGE.—In the Old Testament the word denotes the Hebrew people in its collective capacity, under its peculiar aspect as a holy community, held together by religious rather than by political bonds (Deut. xxxi. 30; Josh. viii. 35; 1 Chron. xxix. 1). The congregation was governed, ere Israel had a king, by a council of seventy elders, chosen from the chiefs of the tribes and head of families (Num. xvi. 2, xi. 16). In post-exilian days this council developed into the Sanhedrin. By this council the king was chosen (1 Sam. x. 17; 2 Sam. v. 1: 1 Kings xii. 20; 2 Kings xi. 19). In the New Testament the word is used of the Christian Church at large, or in a local congregation as the translation of ἐκκλησία. See CHURCH.

II. ECCLESIASTICAL USAGE. 1. General.—The primitive congregations were modelled upon the synagogue, and governed by the elders, who were styled "presbyters," or "bishops;" while deacons cared for the temporalities; but in all the arrangements and proceedings the entire congregation took part. With the growth of the priesthood in authority, especially because of the development of the mass, the congregation decreased in power, until the Roman Church reached, long before the Reformation, its present system of government, in which the Pope, as the representative of Christ, appoints for each diocese the bishop, who, in turn, appoints the parochial clergy, and thus the congregational power is reduced to a minimum. Yet the primitive idea is so far recognized, that each parish has its so-called patrimi ("church fathers"), who, however, although chosen by the congregations, have very limited powers. The churches of the Reformation, both Lutheran and Reformed, rejected the papal theory, and restored in a measure the primitive system. The Lutheran Church vindicates the rights of the congregation to representation and expression in the ecclesiastical courts, to complaint against pastors offensive in doctrine or conduct, to at least a negative vote in the choice of pastors, and of local self-government. Yet so closely allied are these churches to the state, that they are considerably under its control. The Reformed Church gives much more authority to the congregation. It is republican in its idea. Calvin taught the complete identification of Church and State. He organized the presbytery, composed of both teaching and ruling elders, as the board of control, into its hands placed the government of the churches, and made it responsible for the care of things temporal and spiritual; in all which, however, the congregations took more or less active part. According to the old Reformed principle, the presbyter exercised his functions for life, and another was chosen to fill his place at death. Congregationalism in England and America has developed most fully the principle of independence (see those articles). See MEYER: Lehrbuch des Kirchenrechts, 3d ed., Göttingen, 1869.

2. Roman Catholic.—In the Roman Church the term is applied, (a) To the committees of cardinals appointed by the Pope to expedite the business of the Roman curia. These congregations are eleven in number, thus named: (1) Of the Inquisition, or the Holy Office; (2) Of the Council (i.e., of Trent, which decides cases arising out of misunderstanding of that council's decrees); (3) Of Bishops and Regulars; (4) Of the Index; (5) Of the Ritual; (6) Of Consistorial Affairs; (7) Of the Election, Examination, and Residence of Bishops; (8) Of the Propaganda; (9) Of Ecclesiastical Immunities; (10) Of Indulgences and Sacred Relics; (11) Of Extraordinary Ecclesiastical Affairs. Besides the seregular congregations, there are others which have been called to meet emergencies, or supply temporary service; as those of Study, of the Fabric of St. Peter (to keep the building in repair, etc.), and of Ceremonials. See CARDINALS; CURIA, ROMAN. (b) To communities which are bound by monastic vows, yet are not monkish, for contemplative, ascetic, or practical purposes. (1) Some of these congregations are removed from the world, others attend unto nursing or education. They are modelled upon the pattern of the monastic orders, and differ in the strictness of their rules. Their members are laity of both sexes. (2) Besides these, are communities of clergy, who may live in society, and do not assume the vow of poverty, although they all take the vow of chastity. Some of these congregations have been very useful to the Roman Church; such as the Congregation of the Brothers of Christian Love, the Congregation of the Oratory, the Redemptorists, etc. (3) The so-called "congregation orders," branches of the Benedictine order, which have sprung up under the leadership of energetic monks, or from the exigencies of the times, and have assumed partial independence of the original order. To this class belong the Congregation of the Camaldules, of Cluny, the Cistercians, — all of the eleventh century. From the latter, under the lead of the Abbot Bouthillier de Rancé (1662), was developed the strict and severe Trappist Congregation. (c) The word "congregation" is applied unto the meetings held separately by the different nations (English, German, French, Italian, and Spanish) which were represented at the Council of Constance (1414-18). The Emperor Sigismund introduced the plan of voting by nations, giving only one vote to the nation; and therefore it was necessary in such meetings to find out the national sentiment as expressed by the representatives; and as the majority would vote on the impending measure, so the vote was cast. (d) In France the congregation of the regular canons of Sainte-Geneviève is called the "Congregation of France."

III. — In Scotland the title "Lords of the Congregation" is given to the chief subscribers to the First Covenant, which was signed at Edinburgh, Dec. 3, 1557. The title came from the frequency with which the word "congregation" occurs in the document. See the text in HETHERINGTON'S Hist. of the Ch. of Scot., chap. ii.

CONGREGATIONALISM, English. I. The distinguishing principles of English Congregationalism are, —

1. That Jesus Christ is the only head of the Church, and that the word of God is its only statute-book.

2. That visible churches are distinct assemblies of godly men gathered out of the world for purely religious purposes, and not to be confounded with the world.

3. That these separate churches have full power to choose their own officers, and to maintain discipline.

4. That, in respect of their internal management, they are each independent of all other churches, and equally independent of state control.

English Congregationalism is not merely a development of English Puritanism. It is an independent system of church government, as fundamentally distinct from Episcopacy and Presbyterianism, as they are from each other.

II. Amongst the refugees to the Continent from the Marian persecution, there were representatives of both the hierarchical and Presbyterian systems. Heylin, in his History of the Refor- mation, when speaking of the troubles of Frankfurt says, "A new discipline was devised by Ashley, a gentleman of good note among the laity there, and his party, whereby the superintendency of pastors and elders was laid aside, and the supreme power in all ecclesiastical causes put into the hands of congregations" (Hist. Ref. Pt. II., 62, 3). Thus it is seen that Congregationalism is co-eval with the other forms of church government which exist in England.

But those who embraced and advocated this system were few and weak, and, because of the opposition they encountered, were obliged to seek concealment. Little is known of their actual history; but Henry Ainsworth and John Robinson recognize the existence of a separatist church in England, in the early days of Queen Elizabeth, of which Mr. Fitz was pastor before Robert Browne published the system with which his name is associated. There is evidence that it was not a mere company of godly men, but a church organization, having a pastor and deacon, Richard Fitz and Thomas Rowland, both of whom died in the Old Bridewell prison before 1571.

III. But, though Robert Browne may not have been the first English Congregationalist, he has claims to be called the founder of English Congregationalism; as he was the man who first clearly developed its principles, and brought them into public notoriety. His singular career in connection with these principles commenced about the year 1571, when, for disseminating doctrines regarded as seditious, he was cited before the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. He refused to appear, claiming his privilege as domestic chaplain to the Duke of Norfolk. His first desire appears to have been to reform the gross evils he found prevailing in the parochial assemblies; but he came at length to the conclusion that the parishes were in such bondage to the bishops, that reformation was impossible. The evil was the natural outcome of the existing ecclesiastical constitution.

About 1580 he went to Norwich, holding this belief, that, if reformation were impossible, "every true Christian was to leave such parishes, and to seek the church of God wheresoever." Here his principles were fully developed, and here he founded a Congregational church. He was at Bury St. Edmund's in 1581, setting forth his views, and influencing the people. In this town, where in 1583 the first martyrs of Congregationalism suffered, and where its principles were baptized in blood, it was found that his spirit lingered even till the year 1646, when the Independents attempted to form a church under the guidance of the renowned Catherine Chidley. This church adopted a covenant which breathes unmitigated Brownism, and will give us a good idea of its spirit.

"Convinced in conscience of the evil of the Church of England . . . fully separated, not only from them, but also from those who communicate with them, either publicly or privately; we resolve by the grace of God not to return unto their vain inventions, their human devices, their abominable idolatries or superstitious high places which were built and dedicated to idolatry, etc."

Browne developed the principles of Congregationalism more perfectly, and held them more consistently, than those who came after him; but he held them uncharitably. He not only denied that the parochial assemblies could in any sense be regarded as Christian churches, but refused communion with any who were identified with them. His little church at Norwich was persecuted by puritans as well as by hierarchists, as local records abundantly prove; and he and they concluded "that the Lord did call them out of England." In the autumn of 1581 they emigrated in a body to Middleberg, where, in consequence of their attempting a too rigorous internal discipline, the church was distracted and divided, as the result of which he relinquished his office, and removed to Scotland in December, 1583. There he protested against "the whole discipline of Scotland," and was cited to appear before the authorities. At length he returned to England, where after various trials and sufferings, which apparently unbinged his intellect, he at least outwardly conformed to the Established Church, about 1586, and accepted preferment in it.

IV. Henry Barrowe and John Greenwood caught the falling flag, and held it aloft for a season, till they, in their turn, were imprisoned, and at length executed, April 6, 1593. During their imprisonment they wrote much and well in exposition and defence of their principles; but it is to be noticed that Barrowe's Congregationalism differed from that of Browne in one important particular. Seeking to avoid the evil, as he thought, of too much democracy in the government of the church, he placed that government in the hands of the eldership, and not in the whole brotherhood,—a modification which prevailed in the churches for many years.

V. In 1592 an Act of Parliament was passed, entitled "An Act for the Punishment of Persons obstinately refusing to come to Church." Its object was utterly to extinguish the Brownists and Separatists, who had by this time increased, if not to a very considerable number, at least so much as to become a formidable body. Barrowe and Greenwood were condemned and executed under the powers of this Act; but its principal effect was to drive the greater number of these Brownists from the country, many of whom removed to Holland. There Francis Johnson became the pastor, and Henry Ainsworth the teacher, of a Brownist, or rather Barrowist church at Amsterdam. Barrowism, it was found, could be worked in two ways. Men of liberal principles could respect the feelings and opinions of the brotherhood; whilst men of autocratic temperament could ignore them. There were men of both these classes at Amsterdam, and after a while this church divided; the liberal party, under Ainsworth, leaving the rest under Johnson. But in 1608, before this separation, Smyth, Clifton, and John Robinson, with the members of the Scrooby Church, came to Amsterdam: they found the church here in an unsettled state, and "contentions ready to break out." Consequently they resolved to remove to Leyden, that they might not be involved in them. In the following year they carried out their purpose.

VI. When Robinson arrived in Holland, he was a strict Brownist; but, after his settlement at Leyden, he modified his views and practice respecting fellowship. Divine light, brought to his mind through intercourse with Dr. William Ames and others, led him to admit to the communion of his church members of other churches not reformed according to his model; which churches he would not deny to be true churches, though he saw it necessary to separate from them. In regard to the Dutch churches, he allowed his own people to unite with them in ordinary worship, but not in sacraments and discipline. His practice in this respect has been generally followed by churches of this order in succeeding times, and he has therefore not improperly been called the Father of Modern Congregationalism. The church increased in Leyden, and grew in grace under Robinson's ministry, and for ten years enjoyed rest and peace. But anxious to live in a country they could call their own, in which they could also enjoy their religious freedom, and desirous also of carrying the gospel to the heathen, they resolved to emigrate. On July 1, 1620, one hundred and one members of this congregation left Leyden,—a Pilgrim band; and on the 11th December in the same year, the first company of them from "The Mayflower" landed in America, on Plymouth Rock. Robinson remained at Leyden, intending to follow the pioneers with the residue of the church; but he died at Leyden in 1625, before they left. Though decided in his opinions, he was no bigot in the matter of church government. Whereunto he had already attained by the light given to him, he walked by that rule, and then patiently waited till God should reveal more unto him; and when the first Pilgrims left Leyden he urged them to pursue the same course.

VII. After the church was scattered of which Richard Fitz was pastor, we find brief notices of other societies of the same character, which appeared from time to time like islands in mid ocean: but, after the general banishment of the Brownists and Separatists in 1592, scarcely any of these little societies remained, and, if any existed, they were compelled to remain in concealment; and it was not till 1616, when Henry Jacob returned to England from Holland, where he had been in communion with Ames and Robinson, that a church was organized in Southwark, which has had a continuous existence to the present time. Jacob continued in the pastorate eight years, and then emigrated to Virginia. He was succeeded by John Lathrop, who, being summoned before the High Commission to answer articles touching the keeping of conventicles, in order to avoid the consequences, sailed to America in 1634. Henry Jessey apparently succeeded him in the pastoral office. A second church was formed by Mr. Hubbard in 1621, to which John Canne afterwards ministered; and for it a house of worship was opened in Deadman's Place, Southwark, in 1640-41.

VIII. The victims of Laud and Wren, in the reign of Charles I., were Puritans, and not Separatists. Many of these went over to Holland, which they called "their hiding-place," and which proved to be their training-school; for there they were led to embrace the principles the maintenance of which gave them the distinguished position they occupied in the new era which presently commenced. Shortly after the opening of the Long Parliament (Nov. 3, 1640), several of those who had gone to Holland as Puritans returned as Congregationalists. Such were Thomas Goodwin, Nye, Burroughes, Hooker, Sympson, and Bridge. The cause of their exile, the course they pursued in Holland, and the purpose they desired to effect on their return, can best be presented in their own words (Yarmouth Ch. Bk.): "The urging of Popish ceremonies and divers innovated injunctions in the worship and service of God by Bishop Wren and his instruments, the suspending and silencing of divers godly ministers, and the persecuting of godly men and women, caused divers of the godly in Norwich, Yarmouth, and other places, to remove, and to pass over into Holland, to enjoy the liberty of their conscience in God's worship, and to free themselves from human inventions.

"After they came into Holland, divers joined themselves to the church in Rotterdam, and abode members of that church five or six years; among whom were Mr. William Bridge and Mr. John Ward, who also were chosen officers of the church there. But after the glad tidings of a hopeful Parliament, called and convened in England, was reported to the church aforesaid in Rotterdam, divers of the church (whose hearts God stirred up to further the light they now saw, by all lawful means, in their own country,—not without hope of enjoying liberty there,—after much advising with the church, and seeking God for direction) returned, with the assent, approbation, and prayers of the church, into England, etc."

These men, with a few others holding similar principles, soon found themselves, not an insignificant company of returned exiles, but chosen and honored members of the Assembly of Divines, which was gathered to give advice to the Parliament of England on matters concerning religion. One consequence of their acceptance of this position was, that they felt themselves constrained to advise and entreat "all ministers and people to forbear for a convenient time the joining of themselves into church societies of any kind whatsoever;" in the hope that they might be comprehended in some new national organization, or at any rate permitted to form Congregational societies, which should enjoy a full toleration. The Presbyterians far outnumbered them in the Assembly; and these, urged on by Baillie and the Scots divines, and backed up by the Scots army, were altogether disinclined to allow a toleration; whereupon these "dissenting brethren" argued incessantly, until, the power of Cromwell being in the ascendant, more liberal counsels prevailed. Congregational churches were now formed generally in the kingdom; and during the Commonwealth and Protectorate we find them of two different types.

Gathered churches were societies formed by the voluntary adhesion of Christians, having no respect to parochial boundaries; and their ministers were in no sense (at least at first) parish ministers, but were chosen and maintained by the churches themselves.

Reformed churches, on the other hand, were those formed in parishes, the rectors or vicars of which, happening to embrace Congregational principles, selected the godly inhabitants of their parishes, and formed them into Congregational societies. These societies met in the parish churches, and the ministers continued to receive their maintenance from the tithes. The greater number of both these types eventually found their way into Cromwell's comprehensive establishment, where orthodox men of all tolerable opinions on church government labored together in considerable harmony.

The doctrines held by the Congregationalists of this period, and the discipline maintained by them, are set forth in the "Confession agreed on at the meeting of messengers from the Congregational churches at the Savoy Palace," held immediately after the death of the Protector, September, 1658.

It was necessary that this Congregationalism, true but mixed, should be delivered from secular entanglements, should be shaken and sifted, that only those things which could not be shaken might remain. The restoration of Charles II. followed in 1660, and the sifting began.

IX. The hierarchy was re-established, and the Episcopal Church re-instated in its former position. All the ministers officiating in churches, who had not been legally presented by the patrons, were removed, if the old sequestered incumbents were living, and the latter were at once restored. On Bartholomew Day, Aug. 24, 1662, all other ministers who could not submit to the requirements of the new Act of Uniformity were ejected from their cures. More than two thousand ministers, many of them among the best and best qualified of the time, were thus sent forth to endure poverty, persecution, and contempt. Most of these men were Presbyterian in their ideas of church government; but twenty-six years of stern repression, often involving imprisonment, drew them very much nearer to their fellow-sufferers of the Congregational order, several of whose churches lived on through all the persecution, and continue to the present day.

X. After the Revolution in 1688 a new era commenced. The Act of Toleration was passed. The Congregational churches which survived came out of their concealment. Most of the old meeting-houses were then built which were known to the last generation. Now these are almost all removed. The new churches which were then formed were of two classes,—Congregational, according to the Savoy platform of order, and Presbyterian. The latter had no presbyteries, and thus resembled the Congregational, except in this one point, that their elders had greater power than those of the Congregational churches. Both parties had become more tolerant in spirit; and the leaders on both sides thought they could unite.

In 1691 Heads of Agreement were drawn up; old names of distinction were discarded; the union was declared, and henceforth all were to be known as The United Brethren. But differences in principles, and perhaps, too, infirmities of temper, prevented the smooth working of the plan, and it was abandoned. The attempt, however, was not without result. The more general rules of the Heads of Agreement took the place of the stricter requirements of the Savoy Confession in matters of church government, and now they almost universally prevail.

XI. After the death of King William III. attempts were made to deprive dissenters of the restricted liberties they had secured; but the death of Queen Anne, the last of the Stuarts, put an end to such endeavors; and, under the present reigning family, those liberties have been extended, disabilities have been removed, and the day seems not far distant when religious equality shall be enjoyed.

XII. In English Congregationalism since the Revolution, the power of the eldership has been but little recognized: the churches have managed their own affairs, and have been jealous of their independency. So much has this jealousy prevailed, that, though they have never repudiated associations and councils, they have not till lately encouraged them. Informal meetings of ministers and fraternal associations have often had cases of doubt or difficulty brought before them for advice; but no organization existed specially to meet such cases. Of late, however, some county unions have appointed committees of reference, which may be called together if any of the churches desire their assistance; and some churches have resolved, that when difficulties arise, especially if they are of a threatening kind, they will at once seek the advice of neighboring churches.

XIII. "The Congregational Union of England and Wales" was, after much consideration and amidst many fears, formed in 1833. It meets to deliberate, not to legislate; to advise, not to compel; and its Declaration of Faith is not a creed to be subscribed. It meets twice in the year,—in the spring, in London; in the autumn, in one or other of the larger provincial cities or towns; and its influence is quickening and healthful. Its professed object is "to strengthen the fraternal relations of the Congregational churches, and facilitate co-operation in every thing affecting their common interests; and also to maintain correspondence with the Congregational communities throughout the world." Under its auspices Mr. Benjamin Hanbury published his Historical Memorials relating to Independents, 3 vols. 8vo, 1839-44. Two other volumes were published, entitled Tracts and Treatises of John de Wycliffe, and Select Works of Rev. David Clarkson, B.D.; and the project of printing The Works of John Robinson, 3 vols. fcp. 8vo, 1851, was approved, and afterwards carried out by the Rev. R. Ashton. The Union has published fifteen courses of Congregational Lectures, delivered 1833-51, and six other courses of a more recent date.

XIV. About the middle of the eighteenth century the churches felt the necessity of more intercourse and communion with sister-churches than they had up to that time been enabled to maintain; and gradually associations were formed in almost every county, their objects, in addition to the manifestation of fraternal sympathy, being, generally, to encourage and sustain home missionary work, and to assist the weaker churches within their bounds. Of late years the conviction has been growing, that there were districts in the country which were not able to accomplish these ends effectively by reason of the sparseness of the population and the poverty of the churches; and it has been resolved to form a Union of Unions, the design of which is, that the stronger and wealthier districts should contribute to aid those which are more feeble. The Congregational Church-Aid and Home Missionary Society was therefore formed in 1878, with these objects in view: (1) To aid the weaker churches; (2) To plant and foster new churches; and (3) To do evangelistic work in spiritually destitute places; and to do these things through the existing county associations, all of which contribute to a common fund, which is distributed to each as they severally need, or as nearly as possible in this proportion.

XV. With regard to the growth of English Congregationalism, it may be stated that in 1716, less than a generation after the Revolution, the number of Congregational and Presbyterian churches in England was 860; in 1851 the Congregationalists alone possessed 3,244 places of worship in England and Wales. The summary given in the Congregational Year-Book for 1881 shows the total number of churches, branch churches, and preaching-stations in England and Wales, to be 4,188; and the total number of pastors, lay-preachers, and evangelists, to be 2,723. Within the same limits, there are 13 Congregational colleges, having 42 professors, and 453 students for the ministry: from all which it will be seen that the denomination is growing in numbers and strength. Its periodical literature is represented by The British Quarterly, The Evangelical Magazine, The Congregationalist, The Nonconformist and Independent, etc.

JOHN BROWNE (Wrentham, Suffolk, Eng.).

CONGREGATIONALISM IN THE UNITED STATES denotes a system of belief in general historical agreement with the Reformed Confessions, and a polity combining the principle of the autonomy of the local church with that of the duty of fellowship between sister churches.

I. HISTORY.—“The Mayflower” bore to Plymouth, in New England, an organized Christian church (1620). Under the increasingly liberal teaching of JOHN ROBINSON, its pastor, it had already passed into the second stage of independency, viz., semi-separatism, and was thus prepared to influence the formation of the earliest churches of the Puritan or Nonconformist emigration. The members of these churches had also been providentially trained, by removal to the New World, and the circumstances in which they here found themselves, to form a polity in harmony with the Plymouth pattern. Thus arose what was called the New-England way, the Middle way between Brownism and Presbyterianism, and the Congregational way.

The Plymouth Church remained alone until 1629. In 1648 the number of churches in New England had increased to fifty-one; viz., two in New Hampshire, nine in Plymouth Colony, thirty in the Colony of Massachusetts, five in Connecticut, five in New Haven Colony. There were also two or three on Long Island, and one in Virginia. The period thus indicated (1620-48), closing with the completion of the Cambridge Platform, is the creative era of American Congregationalism. The leading writers and the “organizing minds” were Cotton, Hooker, Norton, Davenport, and Mather.

The early Congregationalists held to the principle that a church should be composed of persons who give credible evidence of regeneration by the Holy Spirit, though “severity of examination is to be avoided,” and “the weakest measure of faith is to be accepted in those that desire to be admitted into the church, because weak Christians, if sincere, have the substance of that faith, repentance, and holiness which is required in church-members; and such have most need of the ordinances for their confirmation and growth in grace” (Camb. Plat. c. xii.). Baptized children were recognized as members, yet not as in full communion; which could only be obtained upon personal profession of repentance from sin, and of faith in Jesus Christ. A demand soon sprang up for a relaxation of these terms of admission. In the Colonies of New Haven and Massachusetts church-membership had been made a necessary qualification for the franchise: in the other Colonies it was of unquestionable civil and political advantage. Under these conditions it would be strange if desire for civil rights and political influence had not moved some of the colonists to seek a change in the terms of church-membership. If, however, such motives operated, no traces of them appear in the discussions of the time which have come down to us. The clergy, rather than the laity, were foremost in the movement for relaxation; and it is clear that at least the main reason, and the one which controlled the course of events, was religious,—the desire to extend the privileges and blessings of church-fellowship. The traditional principle, and, still more, the inherited feeling, that persons unbaptized were as Pagans, probably had a great influence. Still the principle of a regenerated membership was too strongly held to be discarded; and so a compromise was made, by which baptized persons of orthodox belief and reputable life, upon covenanting with the church, were allowed to offer their children in baptism. The covenants in use were so evangelical and full, that it is difficult to understand how they could have been taken by persons who were not ready and willing to enter into full communion. They were, however, understood to imply something less than a full profession of personal repentance and faith. The principle of membership upon lower terms being thus once admitted, it received development, until, in some churches, the sacrament of the Lord’s Supper was administered to all who took what has been called the “Half-way Covenant;” and Solomon Stoddard advocated the theory that “the Lord’s Supper is instituted to be a means of regeneration.” The influence of this modification and practical abandonment of the primitive belief of the Congregational churches deserves more thorough, exact, and comprehensive investigation than it has yet received. The worst effect, doubtless, was the diminution, in the public mind and conscience, of a sense of the obligations of personal religion; and this disastrous result was wide-spread.

The evils thus introduced were partially arrested by the “Great Awakening,”—a religious revival under the preaching of the elder Edwards, Whitefield, and others, which added, it is claimed, from twenty-five thousand to thirty thousand communicants to the churches, and led to the abandonment of the plan of the Half-way Covenant. Before, however, this result was fully reached, a large number of churches, chiefly in Eastern Massachusetts, became Unitarian in faith. The effect of the trials through which the churches passed in this defection was very important as to doctrine, polity, and Christian activity; the discipline, though severe, proving to be very salutary. This chapter, also, in the history of the denomination, has not yet found its historian, though very valuable contributions to it have been made. [See GILLET: Hist. Mag., 1871, pp. 221-324; CLARK: Hist. Sketch of the Cong. Churches in Mass.; BURGESS: Pages from the Eccles. Hist. of N. E.; ELLIS: Half-Cent. of the Unit. Controversy; PUNCHARD: Hist. of Cong., vol. V. pp. 557-604.]

In 1708 a synod, convened at Saybrook by order of the Legislature of Connecticut (which now included the Colony of New Haven), adopted what is called the Saybrook Platform; viz., the Savoy Confession of Faith, the Heads of Agreement (which had united Presbyterians and Congregationalists in England), and Articles for the Administration of Church Discipline, the chief peculiarities of which are the union of churches with their pastors in consociations, of ministers in associations, and the formation of standing councils. All the early Connecticut churches came sooner or later into this scheme; but it has been, in later times, largely superseded by the conference system.

In 1801 a Plan of Union was adopted by the Presbyterian General Assembly and the General Association of Connecticut, with reference to churches forming in new settlements. This was abrogated by the Albany Convention of Congregationalists in 1852, experience proving that it operated to their disadvantage. Since then, the growth of Congregationalism outside of New England, particularly at the West, has been rapid.

The following general synods have been held: in 1637, at Newtown, with reference to the Antinomian teachings of Rev. John Wheelwright and Mrs. Anne Hutchinson; in 1646-48, at Cambridge, where the Westminster Confession was adopted, "for the substance thereof," and a Platform of Church Discipline framed; in 1852, at Albany; and in 1865, at Boston. The last two synods dealt particularly with questions relating to the spread of Congregationalism. From the same conditions of progress sprang the National Council, which has met triennially since 1871.

Local synods of special importance were held; in 1662, at Boston, "a synod of elders and messengers from all the churches in the Massachusetts Colony," which agreed upon the so-called Half-way Covenant, and commended in a qualified way Consociationism; in 1679, at Boston, the "Reforming Synod;" in 1708, at Saybrook.

Congregationalists have from the beginning stood in the front rank as respects educational, benevolent, and missionary operations. Schools were established in the Colonies almost from the beginning. The endowment of Harvard College began as early as 1636. In 1647 an act was passed by the General Court of Massachusetts, which established a system of common schools. More than twenty important colleges are now wholly or partially under the care of Congregationalists, with numerous academies. "A great hope and inward zeal" for missionary labor inspired the Pilgrim Fathers. An order passed by the General Court of Massachusetts (Nov. 19, 1644) elicits from Dr. Palfrey (Hist. of N. E., II. 189) the comment, that, with possibly a single exception, "the General Court of Massachusetts was thus the first missionary society in the history of Protestant Christendom." Shortly before this, John Eliot, the "Apostle of the Indians," had begun his work among them. The American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions was instituted by the General Association of Massachusetts in 1810; in 1826 was formed the American Home Missionary Society, with which were connected previous organizations. In addition to these two societies, the following were commended to the churches by the last (1880) National Council: the Congregational Publishing Society; the American Missionary Association; the American Congregational Union; the American College and Education Society; the Western Education Society; the New West Education Commission.

For the early history of Congregational churches in the Southern States and in the Dominion of Canada, see PUNCHARD, Hist. of Cong., vol. iv. chaps. 12, 13, 17, 18, 19.

II. DOCTRINE.—Congregationalism emphasizes the principle, that the Scriptures are the only authoritative rule of faith and practice. Its understanding of that rule is expressed in the creeds of its local churches, and in the symbols which its general synods and other organizations have commended. These formulas of faith are not imposed, either upon individual members of the churches, or upon the local churches or other ecclesiastical bodies. Each candidate for membership, each church or conference, seeking recognition, determines freely what is accepted as of faith. On the other hand, each organization decides for itself whether the confession of an applicant is sufficient. As general standards, or testimonies, the Westminster Confession (adopted substantially by the synod of 1646-48) and the Savoy Confession (adopted by the synods of 1680 and 1708) have held the foremost rank. The National Council of 1865 declared its adherence to the faith "substantially as embodied" in these confessions, and added an impressive statement of the "fundamental truths in which all Christians should agree," and on the basis of which catholic fellowship and co-operation can exist in the work of extending the Redeemer's kingdom (Burial Hill Declaration). The indefiniteness of the word "substantially," and the growing and prevalent conviction that the Westminster and Savoy Confessions fail to represent adequately the present beliefs, led the National Council at St. Louis (Nov. 15, 1880) to appoint a committee of seven to "select from among the members of our churches, in different parts of our land, twenty-five men of piety and ability, well versed in the truths of the Bible, and representing different shades of thought among us, who may be willing to confer and act together as a commission to propose, in the form of a creed or catechism, or both, a simple, clear, and comprehensive exposition of the truths of the glorious gospel of the blessed God, for the instruction and edification of our churches." This commission has been formed, and is expected to publish the result of its labors.

This effort to secure a new statement of belief has its roots in the doctrinal discussions originated or promoted by the elder Edwards. The practical problems presented to the churches by the immense home missionary work devolved upon them have also had an important influence. Theology has been cultivated with special reference to preaching; and preaching has aimed at conversion, and the promotion of active benevolence. The chief discussions have related to "questions of anthropology and soteriology." The controversies with Unitarianism and Universalism have widened the range of inquiry. The attention given to theology, especially in New England, has been remarkable in its extent and degree; and what is known as the "New-England Theology" has exerted a powerful influence in other communions than the one in which it has most flourished.

For an account of this theology, and special references, see Professor H. B. SMITH's additions to HAGENBACH's Hist. of Doctrines, II. 183, 192, 435-452, N.Y. ed., 1868; Ib.: Hist. of the Church of Christ in Chronol. Tables; MCLINTOCK AND STRONG'S Cyclopaedia, II. 479, X. 327, art. on New England Theology, by President Warren.

Among leading theologians may be mentioned, John Robinson, John Cotton, Thomas Shepard, Samuel Willard, Jonathan Edwards, sen., Joseph Bellamy, Samuel Hopkins, Jonathan Edwards, jun., Timothy Dwight, John Smalley, Jesse Appleton, Asa Burton, Nathaniel Emmons, Leonard Woods, Moses Stuart, Bennet Tyler, Lyman Beecher, Nathaniel W. Taylor, Horace Bushnell, C. G. Finney, Enoch Pond, Edward Beecher, Edwards A. Park.

III. POLITY. — The Congregational polity is a body of usages as well as a system with principles. These usages are set forth in platforms and manuals, which are recognized by courts of law and ecclesiastical councils, although their authority is declarative, and not canonical. It is of chief importance to mark the fundamental principles of the system, as it is by these that usages must be tested.

A. The Formal Principle. "The Holy Scriptures, and especially the scriptures of the New Testament, are the only authoritative rule for the constitution and administration of church government; and no other can be imposed on Christians as a condition of membership and communion in the church" (Boston Platform, Pt. I. chap. i. 1). "The New Testament contains in express precept, or in the practice of the apostles and primitive churches, all the principles of church organization and government" (Constitution of the Illinois and of other Associations).

The Cambridge Platform asserted more than this; viz., that "the parts of church government are all of them exactly described in the word of God . . . so that it is not left in the power of men . . . to add, or diminish, or alter any thing in the least measure therein." So John Robinson and the early Congregationalists generally. The best thought and aspiration of the next century recognized more fully the light of nature and the province of human reason. Near its beginning, Rev. John Wise argued, on rational grounds, that the best species of government is a democracy, and that it is to be presumed that Christ has prescribed such a form to his churches. He also quietly assumed this to be the polity derived from the Scriptures by the framers of the Cambridge Platform. Congregationalism, in accordance with the spirit of the age, became democratic, and also less rigid in its claim to a complete prescriptive basis in the Scriptures. The progress of more recent times in exegetical and historical theology has strengthened this tendency.

B. The Material Principle. — This is a combination of the two principles of the self-government of local churches and of their obligation to preserve church communion. The distinctive character of Congregationalism arises from its union in one system of these two principles. Its formal principle has been admitted by other bodies. The autonomy of the local church is also elsewhere conceded. The claims of fellowship also have been admitted. Congregationalism alone has endeavored to blend local self-government and church communion, to unite them in one organic constitution, and to develop whatever agencies are requisite for this end. It has been aptly described, from this point of view, as an ellipse, the two principles of autonomy and fellowship being the foci. The Cambridge Platform makes this definite, complete, and fundamental statement: "Although churches be distinct, and therefore may not be confounded one with another; and equal, and therefore have not dominion one over another; yet all churches ought to preserve church communion one with another, because they are all united unto Christ, not only as a mystical, but as a political head, whence is derived a communion suitable thereunto."

Besides recognizing the obligation of fellowship, Congregationalism supplies the needed instrumentalities. It provides organs of fellowship.

One of these is an ecclesiastical council, — "the agency by which the churches determine with whom they will be in fellowship as Christian churches."

Another such organ is a conference or association of churches, — the agency through which churches in fellowship co-operate in advancing the kingdom of Christ.

These local or district bodies now generally unite in forming a state association or conference, which meets annually, and also the National Council, which meets triennially. For a fuller account of these bodies we must refer to their several constitutions, which present minor diversities.

The action of a council is advisory, and not juridical; yet it is the recognized agency through which a decision is reached of all questions of ministerial and ecclesiastical fellowship. For the constitution and more special functions of councils, see Boston Platform and the accepted manuals by Upham, Punchard, Dexter, and others. The same, also, for customs and usages.

Associations of clergymen for mutual improvement and for co-operation were early formed. Under the system of consociationism they became an integral part of the system. In New England, and to some extent elsewhere, they have for many years examined and approbated candidates for the Christian ministry. Out of New England and districts adjacent they are passing away, and their functions are devolved on properly ecclesiastical bodies. Where they still flourish, the tendency is to regard them less as public and more as private bodies; although by common consent they render service in various ways in respect to questions of ministerial fellowship and certification.

Originally the ministry was limited in theory to occupants of the office of pastor or teacher in a particular church. This conception was soon outgrown, yet, until comparatively recent times, was allowed largely to determine in the churches the methods of ministerial discipline. The Boston Platform gave a broader definition, which has been generally accepted. The National Council at St. Louis (1880) adopted a resolution definitely recognizing the responsibility of every ordained minister to the communion of the churches. See the MINUTES.

A review of the history of Congregationalism as a polity shows a progressive practical adjustment of the two principles, autonomy and the duty of fellowship.

During the eighteenth century, in connection with the increasing purpose to secure political independence, and with other movements in the public mind, the original conception of church communion was overshadowed. The organization of the Union of States, the outbreak of Unitarianism, with the lessons it enforced, the growth of the missionary spirit, the propagation of Congregationalism in the West, the necessity of a definite basis of co-operation in order to a national extension of the system, have restored the neglected element to its due influence. At the same time the principle of self-government and the rights of individual liberty and responsibility are sacredly cherished and guarded.

CONNEXA, in scholastic usage, are such concepts as must necessarily be thought of together; e.g., creator and creation.

CONNOTATA, in scholastic usage, are concepts which necessarily suggest one another; e.g., father suggests the idea of son, son that of father.

CONON, pope from Oct. 21, 686, to Sept. 21, 687; was a Thracian by birth, and educated in Sicily. The report that he commissioned St. Kilian to go as a missionary into Eastern Franconia is wholly unhistorical.

CONONITES, the followers of Conon, Bishop of Tarsus in Cilicia in the beginning of the seventh century; held certain tritheistic views, which, through Conon, they had derived from Johannes Philoponus. In other points, as, for instance, with respect to the resurrection of the body, Johannes and Conon disagreed very much. The sect had disappeared at the end of the seventh century.

CONRAD OF MARBURG. See KONRAD OF MARBURG.

CONRING, Hermann, b. at Norden in East Friesland, Nov. 9, 1606; d. at Helmstädt, Dec. 12, 1681; was educated at Helmstädt and Leyden, and became professor at Helmstädt in 1632, first in natural philosophy, then in medicine, and finally in law. He was one of the most learned men of his age, and in the field of theology he wrote a number of valuable treatises on the juridical position of the Protestant Church in its relation to the Roman-Catholic Church, the empire, etc.,—De Constitutione Episcoporum Germaniæ (1647), De Conciliis (1650), Defensio Ecclesiæ Protestantium adversum duo Pontificiorum Argumenta (1654), De Germanorum Imperio Romano, etc. The edition of his works by GÖBEL, Brunswick, 1730, in six volumes in folio, does not contain his medical works; also a number of his letters are omitted.

CONSALVI, Ercole, Marchese di, b. in Rome, June 8, 1757; d. there Jan. 24, 1824. The last representative of an old Roman family, he received a careful education, first in the College of Frascati, afterwards, when he had adopted the Church as his career, in the Accademia Ecclesiastica in Rome. In the last days of Pius VI. he was minister of war; and this position, as well as his strong aversion to the French Revolution, caused him to be very severely treated when the French occupied Rome in 1798. Immediately after the accession of Pius VII., he was made a cardinal, and secretary of state, Aug. 11, 1800, and in this latter quality he concluded the concordat with France, July 15, 1801. But he soon became utterly disagreeable to Napoleon; and in 1806 he was compelled to resign, and was banished to Rheims. After the fall of Napoleon, however, he was returned to his office; and the restoration of the papal dominions nearly in their old extent was due to his remarkable diplomatical skill. He also succeeded in concluding advantageous concordats with Spain, Naples, Austria, Russia, etc. His internal government was less successful. He had at last no other means of protecting the country against the robbers and burglars with whom it swarmed, but pensioning them. CONSCIENCE (New-Testament Greek, συνείδησις). The word comes to us from the Latin consciens, conscientia ("conscious," "consciousness"); but neither Greek nor Roman used it in our sense. It had no religious bearing. It is unknown to the Old Testament, never used by our Lord, nor by the New-Testament writers except Paul (and those inspired directly by him) and Peter. But Paul makes direct appeal to the conscience (2 Cor. iv. 2; Rom. ii. 15, xiii. 5, 6), and speaks of "weak" consciences (1 Cor. viii. 7, x. 25 sqq.). Elsewhere he uses it of the Christian conscience exclusively (Acts xxiii. 1; 2 Tim. i. 3). In the Epistle to the Hebrews (ix. 9) the word is a short expression for the state of mind of those under the old covenant. The pre-Christian "conscience" is, according to Paul, the divinely ordered ground of obedience (Rom. xiii. 4 sqq.), or, generally speaking, the moral sense which sides with the requirements of the law (ii. 14 sq.) because of a self-judgment testifying to the innermost fact (ix. 1; 2 Cor. i. 12), and therefore to be placed alongside of that of the Searcher of hearts (2 Cor. v. 11; Rom. ii. 15, 16), and which also can judge the actions of others (2 Cor. v. 11, iv. 2). But Paul never hints at a conscious autonomy through the conscience, nor at any difference between the pre-Christian and Christian conscience. The New Testament knows nothing of a coercive conscience; rather it may be weak, narrow, erroneous (1 Cor. viii. 7 sqq.). There can be "conscience," or a consciousness of guilt, which is removed by purification (Heb. x. 2).

The discussion of the "weak" conscience leads Paul to recognize the individuality of conscience. This was an important advance. He lays down the law that one should follow his own conscience, not another's, even though his conscience be weak, else moral personality were destroyed (1 Cor. x. 29 sqq., cf. viii. 10 sqq.).—By the blood of Christ the conscience is cleansed, and so the Christian has a "good" conscience (Rom. ix. 1; 2 Cor. i. 12; Heb. ix. 14, x. 22; in 1 Pet. iii. 21 it is connected with baptism), and struggles earnestly to keep it (Acts xxiv. 16; Heb. xiii. 18; 1 Pet. iii. 16). This Christian "good" conscience is not the certainty of reconciliation, but the mirror of the moral condition in its truest colors. Hence its chief characteristic is its sincerity (2 Cor. i. 12), which testifies to its purity (1 Tim. iii. 9; 2 Tim. i. 3). Its opposite is a branded, defiled conscience (1 Tim. iv. 2; Tit. i. 15), the witness of conscious wickedness (1 Tim. i. 19); and therefore the "faith unfeigned" stands or falls with the "good" or "pure" conscience (1 Tim. i. 5, 19, iii. 9, iv. 1, 2).

There is no evidence that Paul considered conscience as competent to give of itself a correct knowledge of God, nor that from him the word—like "faith," "love," "spirit"—passed into the early Christian current speech: on the contrary, the word is seldom met with in the oldest Christian literature, and first comes up frequently when exegesis arose. Chrysostom gave the earliest clear expression to the idea of a "commanding, authoritative" conscience; but both Augustine and Pelagius repeat the popular idea of moral consciousness. The connection between "conscience" and "consciousness" was emphasized by the schoolmen in the interest of their subjective views of ethics. The most peculiar thing about the first scientific treatment of conscience by Alexander of Hales and Thomas Aquinas was the introduction of the idea of συντήρησις (literally, close watching), "the inner guard keeping watch and ward over the hidden sources of the will," which was identified with conscience, and at the same time distinguished from it. The word came from Jerome; but the schoolmen, under the influence of the Aristotelian psychology, found in it the practical intellect; i. e., what they called the potentia or habitus of the moral principle. Conscientia, on the other hand, denoted the application of this synteresis to the individual. It is therefore, according to Thomas Aquinas, only an actus. With its application came in the idea of fallibility; and so the door was opened to all sorts of hair-splitting judgments, notably by the writers of books upon casuistry. The Jesuits carried this direction the farthest; but they ignore synteresis, and call conscientia a prejudice which probabilism removes. By Gerson and other mystics the synteresis defined the longing and power of the soul to come into immediate contact with God. See KÄHLER: Sentiarum, quas de consc., § 5. For the scholastic theory, and especially for the synteresis, the best work is W. GASS: Die Lehre von Gewissen, Berlin, 1869, pp. 43 sq., 216 sq. The Jesuits to read are ESCOBAR: Liber Theol. Moral., Ludg., 1644, specially chap. v., and GURX: Comp. Theol. Moral., Brux., 1853, specially chap. iv.

During the middle age the idea of conscience was developed far beyond the New-Testament limits, and played a prominent part in the Reformation. Luther used the word in the sense of consciousness of duty, and appealed to its tribunal for its approval of the doctrine of justification by faith. Calvin calls conscience "the sense of divine, imperial justice." Rome has since that day developed her casuistry; and Protestantism has ever called upon the religio-moral individual consciousness. Conscience is now recognized as an inalienable possession, but the idea itself has undergone no further development.

A school of Protestant casuistry has sprung up for the settlement of cases of conscience and theological doubts, which indulges too much in the old minute subdivisions, but yet seeks to form "pure and good" consciences. Theologians speak of the "Christian" conscience, by which one is to govern his life. The phrase "innate ideas" was abandoned for the "moral sense." Rousseau talked about an instinct which led to morality, — a quite different thing from the "conscience" of the Reformation. Kant, on the other side, emphasized duty, and the "inner court." His influence was long felt. Fichte defined conscience as "the immediate consciousness of specific duty." But of late conscience has been considered [particularly by the school of Herbert Spencer] a product of education.

With the individuality of conscience is connected "liberty" of conscience, which primarily means that God, and not man, decides rightfully how a man shall worship. But this liberty is not license. It is abused, when in its name pretended worship is turned into an orgy. It is denied, when any one church undertakes to say what worship shall be rendered in other churches.

CONSCIENTIARIII, the followers of Matthias Knutsen, a candidate of theology, b. at Oldenburg, Schleswig, who came to Jena, September, 1674, and boasted to have gathered around him six hundred students and peasants from Jena and Altorf. His opinions were infidel and atheistic; but he professed to have derived them by an appeal to conscience. It is needless to add that his conscience allowed him and his followers to lead licentious lives. The Jena University authorities felt called upon to deny all connection with the scandalous sect, and deputed Professor J. Musäus to write for them. The result was Ablehnung der ausgesprengten abscheulichen Verleumdung, ob wäre in der Universität Jena eine neue Sekte der sogenannten Gewissener entstanden, Jena, 1674, 2d ed., 1675. After this we hear no more of the sect. A letter of Knutsen is reprinted in Historia Atheismi a Jenkino Thomasio. See ADELUNG: Gesch. d. menschlichen Narrheit, Leipzig, 1785-99, 8 vols.

CONSECRATION. This term means to set apart for holy uses, and is variously applied. In the Bible both persons and things — vessels (Josh. vi. 19), profits (Mic. iv. 13), fields (Lev. xxvii. 28), cattle (2 Chron. xxix. 33), individuals (Num. vi. 9-13), and nations (Exod. xix. 6) — were separated to God's service. In the ecclesiastical sense it is limited to persons and things distinctively holy. Thus churches, bishops, and the elements in the Lord's Supper, are consecrated. For the two latter uses of the word see BISHOP and LORD'S SUPPER respectively. This article is limited to the Consecration of Churches. 1. The idea of setting apart by solemn and peculiar ceremonies a building for the exclusive use of God's servants and service would seem to be inborn. All nations have sacred places in which esoteric rites are performed. Accordingly the Jews had such places, and pre-eminently a temple whose consecration had in it supernatural elements. It may well have been that synagogues were consecrated, although there is no record of the fact. Christian churches are mentioned in the third century (see ARCHITECTURE, Christian), and perhaps were formally consecrated; so that, although Eusebius (fourth century) in his Life of Constantine gives the first account of such consecrations, the form used may have been in part traditional. Of especial interest is the account of Constantine's consecration of the church called the "Martyrium" over the holy sepulchre at Jerusalem. From all parts of the empire bishops assembled, besides an immense concourse of clergy and laity. The services included discourses of different varieties, and were held Saturday, Sept. 13, 335. The dedication of St. Sophia in Constantinople (360) was with "prayers and votive offerings."

In later times it became customary to build churches over the tombs of martyrs; and then relics came to be regarded as "absolutely essential to the sacredness of the building, and the deposition of such relics in or below the altar henceforward formed the central portion of the consecration-rite." All the ancient rituals of consecration now extant belong to this later period.

These consecrated buildings were henceforth set apart exclusively for religion. No eating or drinking was permitted in them, nor any carrying of arms. This latter prohibition speedily made them asylums; and the Theodosian code extended the privilege to the "various surroundings of a church, where meals might be taken, and sleeping-quarters established, for any length of time. By another law, however, it was modified by excluding public debtors, slaves, and Jews from benefiting by it in future; and Justinian afterwards excluded malefactors."

2. The modern Church of Rome, in the matter of consecration of churches, retains the ancient usage, although the rite itself is commonly designated as a "dedication." The ceremony has been thus described: "The relics which are to be deposited in the altar of the new church are put into a clean vessel, together with three grains of incense, to which a piece of parchment is added containing the day of the month and year, and the name of the officiating bishop. Three crosses are painted on each of the church walls, and over each cross a candle is placed. On the morning appointed for the ceremony, the bishop, arrayed in his pontifical vestments, and attended by the clergy, goes to the door of the church, where they recite the seven penitential psalms, after which he makes a tour of the church-walls, sprinkling them in the name of the Holy Trinity. This rite being performed, he knocks on the church-door with his pastoral staff, repeating from Psalm xxiv., Attollite portas, et introibit Rex Glorie ('lift up, O gates, and the King of Glory shall come in'). A deacon shut up in the church demands, Quis est iste Rex Glorie? ('Who is this King of Glory?') To which the bishop answers, Dominus fortis et potens, Dominus potens in praelio ('The Lord strong and mighty, the Lord mighty in battle'). At the same time the bishop crosses the door, repeating the following verse: Ecce Crucis signum, fugiant phantasmata cuncta ('Behold the sign of the Cross, flee every kind of evil spirit, flee'). On the admission of the bishop and clergy into the church, the Veni Creator is sung. Then one of the sub-deacons takes ashes, and sprinkles them on the pavement in the form of a cross. Next follow the litanies and other parts of divine service; after which, the bishop with his pastoral staff describes, as with a pen, two alphabets [the Greek and Latin] in the ashes sprinkled by the deacon, and proceeds to consecrate the altar by sprinkling it with a mixture of water, wine, salt, and ashes, in the name of Jesus Christ. The consecration of the altar is followed by a solemn procession of the relics, which are deposited under it with great ceremony. During the whole of this imposing solemnity the church is finely adorned, and tapers are lighted upon the altar. Mass is afterwards performed by the bishop, or by some other person."

3. But outside of Rome, in the Greek and all other Episcopal churches, some form of consecration has always been used. In the Church of England and the Episcopal Church of this country there is no authorized form of consecration for churches; but one prepared by the bishops in 1712 is used on both sides of the ocean. It is printed in the Prayer-Book. In the Methodist-Episcopal and other Protestant denominations the setting-apart of buildings for divine service is usually called their "dedication," and the forms vary greatly. That used in the Methodist Church is given in § 501 of the Book of Discipline (ed. 1880), and consists of Scripture readings, prayers, a sermon, etc., all which service is conducted by the bishop.

CONSENSUS GENEVENSIS, drawn up by Calvin for the purpose of uniting the Swiss Reformed churches with regard to the doctrine of predestination, appeared at Geneva in 1552, having received the signatures of all the pastors of that city. But beyond Geneva it acquired no symbolical authority. The attempts to enlist the civil government in its favor created dissatisfaction and opposition in Berne, Basel, and Zürich. See NIEMEYER: Collectio Confessionum, Lips., 1840, pp. 218 sqq.; SCHAFF: Creeeds of Christendom, New York, 1877, 3 vols., vol. I. p. 474.

CONSENSUS TIGURINUS was drawn up by Calvin, in concert with Bullinger and the ministers of Zürich, in 1549, for the purpose of uniting the Swiss Reformed churches with regard to the doctrine of the Lord's Supper. It appeared at Zürich and Geneva in 1551, was adopted by the churches of Zürich, Geneva, St. Gall, Schaffhausen, the Grisons, Neuchatel, and Basel, and favorably received in France, England, and parts of Germany. See NIEMEYER: Collectio Conf. in Eccles. Ref. public., Lips., 1840, pp. 191-217; SCHAFF: Creeeds of Christendom, 3 vols., New York, 1877, vol. I. p. 471.

CONSILIA EVANGELICA. In contradistinction to the præcepta, the Roman-Catholic Church calls such moral rules as are not obligatory on all Christians consilia evangelica. By adopting and fulfilling them, a Christian rises above that stage of holiness and virtue, which, strictly speaking, can be demanded from him, and acquires a, so to speak, superfluous merit which can be transferred to others. Already, very early, people believed that traces of such rules could be found in the New Testament (see Matt. xxv. 21; Luke xvii. 10; 1 Cor. vii. 10, 25; comp. HERMAS: Pastor Simil., III. 5, 3; ORIGEN: Ad Rom., III., in tom. IV. p. 507, edition by De la Rue); and the doctrine began to develop, comprising, at first, only the three vows of chastity, poverty, and obedience, with reference to Matt. xix. 11, 21; Luke xiv. 26. With Thomas Aquinas the distinction between præcepta and consilia is fully developed (Sum., II. 1, Quest. 108); and in the mean time the number of vows increased from three to twelve, referring to such places as Matt. v. 29, 35, 39, 42, etc. The three original vows, however, continued to be considered as the præcipua et substantialia perfectionis consilia; and on them was based a whole series of doctrines on monasticism and a contemplative life, on the distinction between a higher and a lower virtue, on the merits of the saints, on the thesaurus operum supererogationis, etc.

Before the criticism of the Reformation this whole illusion vanished. Not only was the distinction between præcepta and consilia completely disregarded, but the whole series of doctrines developed from it was decidedly rejected. As in a sound moral system there can be no adiaphora, so in a sound moral life there can be no opera supererogatoria; and that which, in the Scripture passages above referred to, the Roman-Catholic Church mistook for peculiar moral rules of a higher order, is nothing but a necessary regard to individual circumstances. See Confess. August., art. VI.; Apologia, cap. VI.; Form. Concord., art. VI.; and the first Protestant theologians, as, for instance, CHEMNITZ: Loci Theol., par. 102. The Roman-Catholic dogmatists felt the difficulty, and for a long time they used to settle the question of opera supererogationis in a hasty and vague way, until Möhler tried to take up anew the half-forgotten subject in his Symbolik oder Darstellung der dogmatischen Gegensätze der Katholiken und Protestanten, Mayence, 1832. A fresh investigation of the matter by Baur, Nitzsch, Rothe, and others, led to a second destruction of the whole web. See H. W. J. THIERSCH: Vorlesungen über Katholizismus und Protestantismus, II. 166, 2d ed., Erlangen, 1848, 2 vols. E. SCHWARTZ.

CONSISTENTES. See PENITENTS.

CONSISTORY means, in the Roman-Catholic Church, a meeting of the College of Cardinals, presided over by the Pope, and, in the Lutheran Church, a mixed board of ecclesiastical and lay officers, generally appointed by the sovereign of the country. The papal consistories, or consistories of cardinals, are either public, when the Pope, surrounded by the cardinals, receives the foreign ambassadors, and public affairs are decided by his allocutions; or private, when only the cardinals are admitted, and affairs are discussed. In the Lutheran churches the consistories often perform the functions of the bishop, administering and superintending ecclesiastical affairs, and in some countries exercising jurisdiction and inflicting penalties. In the Reformed churches the consistory corresponds to the session of the Presbyterian Church.

CONSTANCE, The Council of, sat from Nov. 5, 1414, to April 22, 1418, and was the second of those three councils, which, during the fifteenth century, were convened for the purpose of reforming the Church, head and members; that of Pisa being the first, that of Basel the last. It was called by Pope John XXIII. and the Emperor Sigismund; and its three great objects were to heal the papal schism, to examine the heresy of Hus and the religious disturbances thereby caused in Bohemia, and to carry through a general reform of the Church. It was attended by twenty-nine cardinals, three patriarchs, thirty-three archbishops, about one hundred and fifty bishops, more than one hundred abbots, more than five hundred monks of different orders, and a similar number of professors and doctors of theology and canon law, besides princes, noblemen, ambassadors, etc. The Pope was also present. He rode into the city on Oct. 28, with great magnificence, sixteen hundred horses carrying his retinue and luggage. The emperor arrived on Christmas Eve; but he had only one thousand horses in his train. The total number of visitors to the city during the council is computed, at the lowest rate, at fifty thousand; but of these, more than one-third were mountebanks, money-lenders, strolling actors, and prostitutes. The most prominent and most influential members of the council were Pierre d'Ailly and his pupil Gerson.

The Council of Pisa (1409) had attempted to put an end to the schism by deposing both Gregory XII. (Angelo Corraro), who resided in Rome, and Benedict XIII. (Petro de Luna), who resided at Avignon, and electing in their stead Alexander V. But the result was simply, that there now were three popes instead of two; and the confusion continued unabated, when, after the death of Alexander V. (in 1410), the leaders of the Pisan council elected John XXIII. (Balthasar Cossa). All the three popes were invited to Constance, but only John was present in person. He was a dissipated and unprincipled rascal, ready at any time for any crime; but he was courageous, shrewd, inexhaustible in shifts and intrigues, and equal to any emergency. He hoped to lord it over the council by means of the very great number of Italian prelates, who, mostly dependent upon him, accompanied him to Constance. But in this he failed. The order of business adopted by the council was that of working and voting by nations; and in the plenary sessions the Italian nation, though ever so heavily represented, had, of course, only one vote beside the four other nations, — the German, French, English, and Spanish. He now endeavored to urge upon the assembly the view that the Council of Constance was nothing but a simple continuation of that of Pisa, which had formally condemned his two rivals, and, indirectly at least, legitimized his own election. But in this, too, he failed; and the party of Pierre d'Ailly finally succeeded in carrying a motion that all the three popes should be compelled to abdicate, and a new papal election take place. John abdicated in the hope of being re-elected; but he soon became aware of his mistake, fled in the disguise of a groom, protested, was caught, and was finally brought to acquiesce in the decisions of the council. In its fifth plenary session (April 6, 1415), the assembly agreed that an œcumenical council, legally convened, and fully representative of the Church, has its power directly from Christ, and its decrees are consequently obligatory on all, even on the Pope. May 29, 1415, John XXIII. was deposed; July 4, 1415, Gregory XII. voluntarily abdicated; July 26, 1417, Benedict XIII. was deposed; and Nov. 11, 1417, Cardinal Odo Colonna was elected Pope, and assumed the name of Martin V., who closed the council April 22, 1418, at its forty-fifth session.

The Bohemian affairs were treated with great thoroughness; for Hus was burnt July 6, 1415, and Jerome of Prague, May 30, 1416. But a final settlement was not arrived at, still less a satisfactory one. It was the school-wisdom of the university which here overwhelmed and tried to crush the free evangelical movement of popular life. Still more conspicuously the council failed in its reform plans. A collegium reformatorium was formed in August, 1415; but characteristically enough for the whole situation, when Cardinal Zabarella read aloud to the assembly the decree of April 16, 1415, he wilfully left out the passage it contained on the power of the council to undertake reforms in the Church. It was the lower clergy, the monks, the doctors, and professors, led by Pierre d'Ailly and Gerson, and supported by the emperor, who demanded reforms. But the abuses in which reforms were necessary—such as the appeals to the Pope and the papal procedure, the administration of vacant benefices, and the giving in commendam, simony, dispensations, indulgences, etc.—were the very sources from which the Pope, the cardinals, and the huge swarm of ecclesiastical officials in Rome, drew their principal revenues. In fighting against reforms, the cardinals fought pro aris et focis, and they proved unconquerable. The emperor wished the question of reform discussed and decided before the election of a new Pope; but the cardinals declared that the worst ailing of the Church was its lack of a head: and, when Martin V. was elected, he understood how to bury away the whole affair quietly and smoothly, by grave hesitations and cautious procrastinations.

CONSTANTINE is the name of two popes.—Constantine, March 25, 708–April 8, 715, was a Syrian by birth, but fully adopted the policy of the Roman see, and pursued it with success. Though he was summoned to Constantinople by Justinian II., and compelled to stay there for two years (709–711), he returned to his see without loss of prestige, and in the monotheistic intrigues which were started after the assassination of Justinian II. and the elevation of Philippikus Bardanes, he opposed the emperor with great vigor, and was backed by the Roman people. See Lib. pontif., II. 1; JAFFÉ: Reg. Pontif. Roman., p. 173.—A second Constantine occupied the papal chair from 767 to 768. He was a brother to Toto, duke of Nepi, a violent adventurer, and with him he rose and fell. After Toto's death he was deposed, and confined in the Monastery of Cella Nova, where he was treated with great cruelty. The date of his death is not known. CONSTANTINE THE GREAT AND HIS SONS. 1. Constantine, Roman Emperor from 306 to 337; was born in 274, at Naissus in Upper Mœsia, a son of Constantius Chlorus and Helena, and was, after the death of his father at York (July 25, 306), proclaimed emperor by the legions of Gaul. He immediately took possession of Britain, Gaul, and Spain; and after a series of brilliant victories over Maxentius, ending with the bloody battle at the Milvian Bridge, just under the walls of Rome, he also became master of Italy (312). He now ruled over the Western Empire, as Licinius over the Eastern; but war broke out between them in 314; and in 323, after the battle of Chalcedon, in which Licinius was killed, Constantine became sole lord of the whole Roman world. He died in 337, at Nicomedia.

Tradition tells us that he was converted to Christianity suddenly, and by a miracle. One evening during the contest with Maxentius, he saw a radiant cross appearing in the heavens, with the inscription, "By this thou shalt conquer." The tradition is first mentioned by Eusebius, in his De Vita Constantini, written after the emperor's death. This miracle has been defended with ingenious sophistry by Roman-Catholic historians and by Card. Dr. Newman (Two Essays on Biblical and on Ecclesiastical Miracles, 3d ed., Lond., 1873, pp. 271 sqq.), but cannot stand the test of critical examination. Constantine may have seen some phenomenon in the skies; he was no doubt convinced of the superior claims of Christianity as the rising religion; but his conversion was a change of policy, rather than of moral character. Long after that event he killed his son, his second wife, several others of his relatives, and some of his most intimate friends, in passionate resentment of some fancied infringement of his rights. In his relation to Christianity he was cool, calculating, always bent upon the practically useful, always regarding the practically possible. He retained the office and title of Pontifex Maximus to the last, and did not receive Christian baptism until he felt death close upon him. He kept Pagans in the highest positions in his immediate surroundings, and forbade every thing which might look like an encroachment of Christianity upon Paganism. Such a faith in such a character is not the result of a sudden conversion by a miracle: if it were, the effect would be more miraculous than the cause. Judging from the character both of his father and mother, it is probable that he grew up in quiet but steady contact with Christianity. Christianity had, indeed, become something in the air which no one occupying a prominent position in the Roman world could remain entirely foreign to. But the singular mixture of political carefulness and personal indifference with which he treated it presupposes a relation of observation rather than impression. He knew Christianity well, but only as a power in the Roman Empire; and he protected it as a wise and far-seeing statesman. As a power not of this world, he hardly ever came to understand it.

His first edict concerning the Christians (Rome, 312) is lost. By the second (Milan, 313) he granted them, not only free religious worship and the recognition of the State, but also reparation of previously incurred losses. Banished men who worked on the galleys or in the mines were recalled, confiscated estates were restored, etc. A series of edicts of 315, 316, 319, 321, and 323, completed the revolution. Christians were admitted to the offices of the State, both military and civil; the Christian clergy was exempted from all municipal burdens, as were the Pagan priests; the emancipation of Christian slaves was facilitated; Jews were forbidden to keep Christian slaves, etc. An edict of 321 ordered Sunday to be celebrated by cessation of all work in public. When Constantine became master of the whole empire, all these edicts were extended to the whole realm, and the Roman world more and more assumed the aspect of a Christian state. One thing, however, puzzled and annoyed the emperor very much, — the dissensions of the Christians, their perpetual squabbles about doctrines, and the fanatical hatred thereby engendered. In the Roman Empire the most different religions lived peacefully beside each other, and here was a religion which could not live in peace with itself. For political reasons, however, unity and harmony were necessary; and in 325 the Emperor convened the first great œcumenical council at Nicæa to settle the Arian controversy. It was the first time the Christian Church and the Roman State met each other face to face; and the impression was very deep on both sides. When the emperor stood there, among the three hundred and eighteen bishops, tall, clad in purple and jewels, with his peculiarly haughty and sombre mien, he felt disgusted at those coarse and cringing creatures who one moment scrambled sportively around him to snatch up a bit of his munificence, and the next flew madly into each other's faces for some incomprehensible mystery. Nevertheless, he learnt something from those people. He saw that with Christianity was born a new sentiment in the human heart hitherto unknown to mankind, and that on this sentiment the throne could be rested more safely than on the success of a court-intrigue, or the victory of a hired army. The only rational legitimation which the antique world had known of the kingship was descent from the gods; but this authority had now become a barefaced lie, and was difficult to use even in the form of a flattery. At Nicæa, however, the idea of a kingship of God's grace began to dawn upon mankind. Constantine also met there with men who must have charmed and awed him by their grand simplicity, burdened, and almost curbed, as he was by the enormous complexity of Roman life. After the Council of Nicæa, he conversed more and more frequently and intimately with the bishops. His interest in Christianity grew with the years; but, as was to have been foreseen, he was sure to be led astray, for the needle lacked in the compass. He was more and more drawn over to the side of the Arians, and it was an Arian bishop who baptized him.

2. Of Constantine's three sons (1) Constantine II. died early; (2) Constans belonged to the Nicæan party, and enforced (in 349) the reinstatement of Athanasius in Alexandria; while (3) Constantius was at one time almost the leader of the anti-Nicæan party, and interfered in the affairs of the Church in a very high-handed manner. He fell out, however, with the rigorous Arians; and his success in propagating semi-Arianism was probably small, just as his violent measures against Paganism (he forbade sacrifice under penalty of death) proved almost futile.

CONSTANTINOPLE was built between 326 and 330, by Constantine the Great, and named after him. The old Byzantium, which, according to tradition, had occupied the site for nearly one thousand years, was not altogether without commercial and political consequence; but the importance of the place was, of course, manifold increased when it became the imperial residence. It had long been felt that the natural centre of the Roman Empire was not Rome any more, that it lay farther to the east, that it was impossible to defend and develop the eastern part of the empire from Rome, etc. Probably there were also, in Rome, traditions which Constantine, as the first Christian emperor, wished to escape from, since he had not power to break them. He chose Byzantium for his new capital, and spent immense sums of money in rebuilding and adorning it. Strong walls and commodious harbors were constructed; gorgeous palaces, baths, and theatres were erected; numerous magnificent churches were built, — that of the Apostles, that of St. Sophia, afterwards rebuilt by Justinian, etc. After a short time the city numbered a hundred thousand inhabitants.

The character of this new capital during the first centuries of its life is well known from the writings of St. Chrysostom. It was elegant but prodigal, feverish in its aspirations, over-refined in its enjoyment, and lax in its morals. What it produced was brilliant and gorgeous, but there was often poison in it. A striking feature was the prominent part which women played in its life. They cultivated the artistic forms, until, in Byzantine literature and art, the ideal contents were completely suffocated; and they introduced the same formalism into actual life. They nursed the court-intrigues until Byzantine government became a mere scuffle between the eunuchs of the antechamber; and they transferred this trickery to the affairs of the Church. Nevertheless, as a mere rival to Rome, Constantinople has been of invaluable service to the Christian Church, howsoever her direct influence may be considered.

The Bishop of Constantinople belonged originally to the metropolitan diocese of Heraclea. But just as the political prestige of Rome formed the most powerful impulse in the development of the papacy, exactly in the same manner the political prominence of Constantinople forced the Constantinopolitan episcopacy out of the shadow. The Council of Constantinople (381) decreed in its can. 3 that the Bishop of Constantinople should have the title of Patriarch (like the bishops of Alexandria, Antioch, Jerusalem, and Rome), and should rank next to the Bishop of Rome, no other reason being alleged, but that Constantinople was the new Rome, the second capital of the empire. The Council of Chalcedon (451) went still farther. Its can. 28 gave the Bishop of Constantinople equal rank with the Bishop of Rome, and the right of superintendence, ordination, and convocation of synods for Pontus, Thracia, and Asia. The Concilium Quinisextum (692) repeated, confirmed, and even enlarged all these privileges. Of course, the bishops of Rome protested. Leo I. rejected can. 28 of the Council of Chalcedon rather inconsistently, as he accepted all its other decrees; and Gregory I. almost forgot himself when John Ignatius in 587 assumed the title of Œcumenical Patriarch. These protests, and the shrewd manner in which the Roman bishops played upon the ever-recurring difficulties between the Constantinopolitan patriarchs and the Constantinopolitan emperors, contributed much to prevent the formation of a Constantinopolitan papacy, but could not prevent a split between the Roman and the Greek Church; which latter article see.

The succession of the Constantinopolitan bishops is almost completely known (see FABRICIUS: Bibl. Græc., VI. p. 707): and in many cases a mere glance over the list gives an insight into the turbulent events of this history; as, for instance, when Ignatius, Callistus, and Philotheus are found to have been deposed and re-instated, etc. Four periods may be conveniently distinguished: the first, to the controversy with Photius (861), or the complete separation from the West (1054); the second, to the establishment of the Latin dynasty, during which (1204–61), the Patriarch of Constantinople removed to Nice; the third, to the conquest of Constantinople by the Turks (1453); and the fourth, to our times. During the first centuries of the Turkish rule the patriarchs of Constantinople, charged not only with the ecclesiastical, but also, to some extent, with the civil jurisdiction over their flock, presented a sad picture of weakness, injustice, simony, fraud, and violence. (See HEINECCIUS: Abbildung d. alt. und neuen griech. Kirche, I. p. 46, and III. p. 49; THOMAS SMITH: De Eccl. Græc. Statu Hodierno, in his Opuscula, Rotterdam, 1716; GEIB: Darstellung d. Rechtszustandes in Griechenland während d. türk. Herrschaft, Heidelberg, 1835.) By the consolidation of the Russian Church their power lost in compass, but their misuse of it can hardly be said to have lost any thing in intensity. See the articles on Greek Church, Bulgaria, etc. HAMMER-PURGSTAL: Constantinopel und der Bosphorus, Vienna, 1822, gives in the first volume a complete list of the sources to the older history of Constantinople. CONSTANTINOPLE, Modern. Since 1453 Constantinople has been a Mohammedan city, the residence of the caliph, and the metropolis of the Moslem world. It has gradually become, also, the principal seat of Mohammedan learning. It is said that there are not less than forty thousand students (or softas) in the religious schools of the city, coming from all parts of the empire; and the ulema (or learned doctors of the law) are the most influential body of men in the city. In these schools they teach the Arabic and Persian languages, the Koran, the commentaries upon it, and the Sherâat, or sacred law; but the majority of the students enroll themselves simply to escape the conscription, and comparatively few become ulema. There are also secular schools, including a Lycée founded under French influence; but they are not well managed, and exert but little influence. The military, naval, and medical schools, supported by the government, are more important, but of inferior quality. Outside the palace and the ranks of the ulema and the softas, there is now but little fanaticism among the Mohammedans of Constantinople, and the official classes are supposed to be generally atheistical. The decay of the temporal power of the Sultan has weakened his influence as caliph, so far that his authority over the Mohammedan world is now only nominal. Sultan Hamid has made great efforts to revive it, but without much success. It seems probable that the caliphate will ultimately be transferred to Mecca, and become a purely spiritual office. Constantinople will then cease to be a Mohammedan city.

The non-Mohammedan population of Constantinople occupies a peculiar position. There are some sixty thousand foreigners, who are under the exclusive jurisdiction of the diplomatic and consular authorities of their respective countries. There are some forty thousand Jews of Spanish descent, who are Turkish subjects, but under the authority of their own Haham Bashi. There are also seven Christian communities — the Greeks, Armenians, Bulgarians, Latins, Armeno-Catholics, Protestants, and Syrians — which have separate organizations, and “enjoy special immunities,” or, more justly, are under special disabilities. The Mohammedan conquerors of the Byzantine Empire adopted the plan of dealing with all non-Mohammedans whom they found in the country en masse as communities and not as individuals. These communities were regarded by the Turks as religious rather than national, and their religious chiefs were recognized as their official representatives at the Sublime Porte. They were nominated by the communities, and appointed by the Sultan, their rights and duties being carefully specified in the imperial iradé which confirmed the appointment. The results of this system have been both good and bad. It has consolidated and preserved the churches, but it has secularized them. It has protected the Christians from persecution to a certain extent, but has left them without any interest in the government, and helpless in the hands of their own ecclesiastics. Viewed from a Turkish stand-point, it has preserved the purely Mohammedan character of the government; but it has insured its ultimate destruction. Since the Crimean war the Turks have seen what was coming, and have made some half-hearted attempts to escape this result. They have sought to divide up the Christian communities, to modify their charters, and to create an Ottoman nationality to include Mohammedans and Christians, “with equal rights and duties;” but these attempts have failed thus far because the Sultan and the ulema are unwilling to modify the essentially Mohammedan character of the government.

The authority of the religious chiefs of the Christian communities has been very much weakened; but, so far as the Turkish Government is concerned, this has been more than counterbalanced by the rapid growth of national feeling, the increasing influence of the laity, and the general progress of enlightenment in these communities. They are more opposed to Mohammedan rule than ever before. They would submit to the Sultan as a civil ruler under proper European guaranties; but they think that the time has come when Constantinople must soon cease to be a Mohammedan city.

Some important religious changes deserve to be mentioned here. The Greek Patriarch, since the beginning of the century, has lost most of his importance. He no longer has any authority over Greece, Servia, Montenegro, or Roumania; and by the Bulgarian schism he lost four million of his flock. His church numbers about two million at the present time. The Roman-Catholic Church has made but little progress in Turkey during this century; but it has made great efforts to Latinize its Oriental branches, and, in spite of an important schism in the Armeno-Catholic Church, it has been generally successful. It has many schools in Constantinople, but they are generally of a low order, and devoted to propagandism.

The Armenian Church has made important progress in enlightenment. It has adopted a liberal constitution, which limits the power of the ecclesiastics, and increases that of the laity. It encourages education and reform, and has ceased to persecute those who adopt evangelical views. An independent Bulgarian exarch has been recognized by the Porte, and a new church organized, which is in doctrinal agreement with the other orthodox Oriental churches, but liberal, and inclined to reform. There are but few Bulgarians in Constantinople, but this is the seat of the exarchate.

Protestantism has also been officially recognized as one of the authorized religions of the empire. It has its official vehit at Constantinople; but most of its adherents are in Asia Minor, Armenia, and Syria. Its establishment resulted from the labors of American missionaries, whose influence for good has extended far beyond the circle of their converts.

Among the most interesting institutions in modern Constantinople are Robert College and the American School for Girls at Scutari. Robert College was founded in 1863, by the munificence of Mr. C. R. Robert of New York, and under the direction of Rev. Cyrus Hamlin, D.D., formerly a missionary of the American Board. It was designed to give to the people of the East, without distinction of race or religion, an educational institution in all respects equal to the best American colleges; and it has won the respect and confidence of all the nationalities of the empire. It has now fifteen professors and two hundred and twenty-seven students. While not in any sense sectarian, it is a Christian college; and it has already exerted an influence for good which can hardly be over-estimated.

The school at Scutari was established later; but it is doing for girls essentially the same work which Robert College is doing for young men.

Modern Constantinople is no longer what it was even fifty years ago. The material civilization of Europe has invaded it and transformed it. Steamships, railways and tramways, telegraphs, and newspapers have forced their way into it. The streets are lighted with gas. Ready-made clothing and Manchester cottons have transformed the people. Great fires have desolated the city, and made way for stiff European houses built of brick and stone. The janizaries have disappeared. The European ambassadors, who used to submit quietly to every indignity, now dine with their wives at the Sultan's table, and dictate his policy. The Christian rayah no longer trembles in presence of a Turk, nor gets down from his horse when he passes the palace. The Mohammedan smokes his pipe in Ramazan if he pleases; and the Christian eats meat in Lent without fear of the Patriarch. The vices and follies of Europe have been added to those of the East; and, while there have been many changes for the better, it may be doubted whether, on the whole, there is as much genuine religious faith in the city as there was fifty years ago.

CONSUBSTANTIATION, a technical term denoting the Lutheran view of the elements of the Lord's Supper, in contradistinction from the Roman-Catholic view, — transubstantiation. According to the Roman doctrine, the bread and the wine are by the consecration transformed into the flesh and blood of Christ: while, according to the Lutheran doctrine, the bread and wine remain bread and wine; though, after the consecration, the real flesh and blood of Christ co-exist in and with the natural elements, just as a heated iron bar still remains an iron bar, though a new element, heat, has come to co-exist in and with it, — an illustration which Luther himself has used in his letter to Henry VIII. It is but proper to state that the Lutheran divines repudiate the popular term "consubstantiation," in the sense of a permanent connection of the elements with the body and blood of Christ. They confine this connection to the act of the communion.

CONTARINI, Gasparo, b. in Venice, Oct. 16, 1483; d. at Bologna, Aug. 24, 1542; descended from a noble Venetian family, and received a very careful but entirely secular education. He wrote De Immortalitate Animi adversus Pomponatium, but from a purely rational point of view. In 1521 he was sent to Germany as ambassador of the republic to Charles V.; and he accompanied the emperor back to Spain. After the conquest of Rome he contributed much to bring about a reconciliation between the Pope and the emperor, and between the emperor and the republic. The depth of his interest, and the compass of his capacity as a statesman and diplomatist, he proved by his work De Magistratibus et Republica Venetorum. From early youth, however, he had been open to strong religious impressions. In the days of Leo X. he had joined the Oratorium Sti Amoris; and in Venice he stood at the head of the movement which wished a reform of the Church, and was willing to work for it. Thus, when Paul III. in 1535 suddenly and unexpectedly made him a cardinal, he accepted the position without hesitation. In 1537 he was made a member of the committee formed for the purpose of examining the state of the Church, and making propositions to its reform; and when Paul III. received his Consilium de Emendanda Ecclesia without offence, if not with favor, he was full of hope and confidence. But nothing came of the matter. Under Paul IV. the treatise, which had been published without the knowledge of Contarini, and circulated in Germany with Luther's annotations, was put on the Index. As unsuccessful was his mission as papal legate to the Diet of Ratisbon (1541). He was fully convinced of the necessity of reform; but Luther, whom he had met at Worms, he disliked, and the German reform in its popular shape he utterly distrusted. He wanted a reform from the head. The evangelical doctrine of justification by faith he had accepted, but only in its positive form, not so as to exclude the whole false practice of the Roman Church. In Ratisbon he did not win the Protestants, and he roused the suspicion of the Romanists. After his return he was made papal legate at Bologna; but he lived to see the re-action set in, and his friends fleeing to foreign countries to escape the Inquisition. His works were published in Paris (1571) and in Venice (1589). In the latter edition, however, the text of the treatise on justification is mutilated and altered. See BRIEGER: Th. Gasparo Contarini und das Regensburger Concordienwerk, 1870; Die Rechtfertigungslehre der Card. Contarini, by the same, in Studien und Kritiken, 1872, I.; CHRISTOFFEL: Card. Contarinis Leben und Schriften, in Zeitschrift f. historische Theologie, 1875, II. C. WEIZSÄCKER.

CONVENT means both the whole establishment in which a society of monks or nuns are settled, its buildings, rules, purpose, etc., and the meeting of those members of the institution who are entitled to give their advice on certain points of administration or government.

CONVENTICLE (Latin, conventiculum) meant in the primitive church any meeting for the sake of religious worship, but is, since the time of Charles II., applied in English only to the meetings of the dissenters from the Church of England.

CONVENTICLE ACT, the first passed 1664, the second April 11, 1670; repealed by the Toleration Act, May 24, 1689. According to the first, "If any person above the age of sixteen, after the 1st of July, 1664, shall be present at any meeting, under color or pretence of any exercise of religion, in other manner than is allowed by the liturgy or practice of the Church of England, where shall be five or more persons than the household, shall for the first offence suffer three months' imprisonment, upon record made upon oath under the hand and seal of a justice of the peace, or pay a sum not exceeding five pounds; for the second offence, six months' imprisonment, or ten pounds; and, for the third offence, the offender to be banished to some of the American plantations for seven years, excepting New England and Virginia, or pay one hundred pounds; and in case they return" [i.e., ere the seven years], "or make their escape, such persons are to be adjudged felons, and suffer death without benefit of clergy. Sheriffs or justices of the peace, or others commissioned by them, are empowered to dissolve, dissipate, and break up all unlawful conventicles, and to take into custody such of their number as they think fit. They who suffer such conventicles in their houses or barns are liable to the same forfeitures as other offenders. The prosecution is to be within three months. Married women taken at conventicles are to be imprisoned for twelve months, unless their husbands pay forty shillings for their redemption. This act to continue in force for three years after the next session of Parliament." In 1670 the act was renewed in a modified form; the fines were lowered, and the risk of exile was removed. On the other hand, the chance of escape was made much less; for any justice of the peace who refused to execute the act was fined five pounds, and the greatest encouragement given to informers.

The Conventicle Act is a blot on English history. It caused much suffering to innocent worthy people. It was not even administered impartially; for, as Neal testifies, the Roman Catholics were not molested. See NEAL: History of the Puritans, part iv., chaps. 7, 8 (Harper's ed., vol. ii. pp. 251, 266).

CONVERSION (Hebrew תָּשׁוּבָה, "return," "repentance" [only once, Isa. xxx. 15], from שׁוּב, "to turn;" Greek μετάνοια, "a change of mind;" ἐπιτροπή [once, Acts xv. 3], "a turning towards or about;" Latin, conversio) denotes the act in which the soul estranged from God turns back to him in order that it may share afresh in his grace. It is a return, because man re-enters his former position towards God, which he had lost by the fall. It is also a turning-from, because former sins are abandoned (Acts xiv. 15), and, again, a change of mind (Acts xxvi. 20). By nature the "slave of sin," and therefore a "child of wrath" (Eph. ii. 3), and "dead" (Eph. ii. 1; Col. ii. 13), he is renewed in the spirit of his mind, and puts on "the new man, which after God hath been created in righteousness and holiness of truth" (Eph. iv. 24). But how can this radical change be made? Not by his own unaided will (John xv. 5), nor any more without his will (Acts iii. 19; 2 Pet. iii. 9). The condition, therefore, is the divine aid; and so repentance is a gift of God (Acts xi. 18; Phil. ii. 13), and therefore something to be thankful for. Yet every Christian knows that he has not been forced to repent; rather he has earnestly desired the altered life. In this work of God, therefore, the human and the divine acts stand side by side, and both must be equally recognized, not the one at the expense of the other.

It is a problem to find exactly where the human meets the divine. Pelagians, Semipelagians, Synergists, have in vain tried to solve it. The Lutheran doctrine on the means of grace (the Word and sacraments) solves it. This is, that these "means" are divine gifts, which convey the Spirit to their recipient, and thus he is strengthened, and awakened into new energy. But the grace is not irresistible, on the contrary, can be effectually and utterly resisted. The will formed by this grace is no longer bound by sin, but inclined towards God. Weak though it may be, it is capable of upward growth. God is in it, and he will see to its development.

No one can lay down laws for the process of conversion. One man is quickly turned about: to another a long struggle is requisite. In the former case there will be found a preparation, unconscious though the subject be of it. Take the crucial case of Paul (Acts ix. 1-22). His was a sudden conversion: yet the three days between the appearance of Christ to him upon his journey from Jerusalem to Damascus, and the visit of Ananias, must not be overlooked; for, during those hours of enforced cessation from work, the truth of that new faith for which Jews like himself so gladly died, may have been borne in upon his soul. Even so in the cases of the jailer at Philippi, there was an acquaintance with Paul's preaching (Acts xvi.); yea, the malefactor on the cross (Luke xxiii. 40 sqq.) showed that already he had been impressed by Christ.

When we speak of the baptized, we must bear in mind that such, by the very fact of their baptism, stand upon quite a different plane from the unbaptized. They are no longer "natural" men in the above sense of the word. Each of them has been accepted by God, called by his name, and had the seeds of the new life sown in his heart; for baptism is the "laver of regeneration" (Tit. iii. 5). Regeneration is not, however, the same thing as conversion. It is rather that act of divine grace whereby God sets the new manhood in a man, not as the ultimate fruit, but as a seed. It is therefore conceivable, and indeed actually, though rarely, the case, that this "seed" steadily grows unto its perfection. For such there is no "conversion" necessary. But for the great majority the seed sown in baptism is partially killed; yet not entirely. The grace of baptism affords a basis for the divine operation. By other means of grace the process of growth is effected, particularly by the word of God, in the form of preaching (Rom. x. 17) in its two forms of law and gospel. They work together, — the law, repentance; the gospel, faith. It is indeed true that preaching has a similar effect upon baptized and unbaptized; but, in the former, conversion is only necessary when the grace of baptism is lost, while in the latter it is indispensable to salvation.

Conversion must not be confounded with sanctification. The former has its end and conclusion in justifying faith. It is a continuous process which can be hastened or retarded. Sanctification begins when conversion has done its work. It is the fulfilment of the divine call to perpetual struggle against besetting sin, through daily renewing of repentance and faith, until, in the day of Jesus Christ, the flesh and all its works are forever removed. Again: conversion and justification must be distinguished. Conversion is the reaching-out after union with God: justification effects this union. It declares that the fall is healed, the separation from God ended, the relation between man and God (begun in baptism) finally established. See the Lutheran Confessions and their adherents, especially FRANK: Theologie der Konkordienformel, Erlangen, 1858. BURGER.

The above expresses the evangelical Lutheran view of conversion. Calvinists emphasize the divine factor, and generally maintain that grace works irresistibly in the elect. Arminians, on the other hand, emphasize the human factor, deny irresistible grace, yet affirm that grace is the "beginning, continuance, and accomplishment of all good." The two terms, conversion and regeneration are often confounded, but should be carefully distinguished. Conversion (μετένοια) is a human act of turning from sin, and turning to God, and may be repeated: regeneration (παλιγγενεσία, Tit. iii. 5, and the verb "to be born again," of the Spirit, "from God," ἀναγεννάομαι, 1 Pet. i. 3, 23, and γεννάομαι ἄνωθεν, or ἐκ θεοῦ, or ἐκ πνεύματος, John i. 13; iii. 5, 6, 8) is a divine act, the work of the Holy Spirit, and, like the natural birth, incapable of repetition. Baptismal regeneration is rejected by both Calvinists and Arminians. It is, however, taught by the High Anglican theologians (see BLUNT: Dictionary of Doctrinal and Historical Theology, art. Baptism). The Calvinistic view of conversion is given in HODGE: Systematic Theology, vol. iii. chap. xv., "Regeneration;" the Arminian, in WATSON: Institutes (29th ed. N.Y.), vol. ii. chap. xxiv. See REGENERATION.

CONVOCAION, in the Church of England, an assembly of the bishops and clergy by their respective metropolitans, in pursuance of royal order, within the provinces of Canterbury and of York. Its sessions are contemporaneous with those of Parliament, and concern ecclesiastical affairs. Each convocation has two houses, — the Upper, which consists of the bishops; and the Lower, of the deans, archdeacons, proctors for the chapters, and proctors for the parochial clergy. Their actions were formerly of great importance; but since Henry VIII.'s time they have been shorn of their power. In consequence of the Bangorian Controversy (see Bishop HOADLEY), the Convocation of Canterbury, which has always been by far the more important body, was prorogued in 1717; and no license from the Crown for the transaction of business was obtained until 1861. In this body originated the Anglo-American Bible-revision movement, February, 1870 (see CANTERBURY). See the article CONVOCAION in Encycl. Brit., 9th ed., vol. VI. pp. 325-330. In the Episcopal Church in America there is no body exactly corresponding to Convocation. See EPISCOPAL CHURCH. T. LATNBURY: History of the Convocation of the Church of England, and of the Anglican Ecclesiastical Councils, from the Earliest Period, London, 1842.

CONVULSIONISTS is the name of a fanatical section of the Jansenists. In 1727 the Dean François de Paris died, and was buried in the Cemetery of St. Médard. A "Jansenist every inch," he had belonged to the Appellants, and died with the appeal in his hand. His saintly life, the ascetic practices which caused his death, and the extraordinary charity which made him divide his great revenues among the poor, had made a most effective propaganda for Jansenism and the Appellants among the lower classes in Paris. In 1729, when the intrigues of Abbé Dubois, the violence of Cardinal Fleury, and, more than any thing else, the retraction of M. de Noailles, Archbishop of Paris, had brought the victory into the hands of the Jesuits, it was suddenly reported that miracles were wrought on the grave of François, God himself thus bearing witness against the Pope and his hated bull Unigenitus. People crowded in great numbers to the cemetery, and when they reached the grave they were often overtaken by violent fits of convulsions: hence the name. In this state they prophesied, and testified against the bull; and a guaranty of the truth of their prophecies and testimonies was given by the instantaneous cures from diseases which they experienced. In 1732 the commotion became so great, that the king ordered the cemetery shut up, and the grave watched by military; but the miracles continued, now wrought by earth from the grave, or by water from a neighboring spring. Large books were written, containing testimonies to the miracles by eye-witnesses, and illustrations representing the most remarkable convulsions. First the Bishop of Montpellier, then other bishops, and finally a number of prominent persons from the court and the aristocratic circles, were caught by the movement. The Jesuits were in despair. They declared that the miracles, which they could not or dared not deny, were wrought by the Devil. But none would believe them. It took nearly twenty years before the roused energy had fully spent itself, and the party disappeared, broken up by internal dissensions. See PIERRE BOYER: Vie de M. François de Paris, Paris, 1731; LA TOSTE: Lettres théologiques sur les convulsionnaires, Paris, 1733; MONTGERON: La vérité des miracles opérés à l'intercession de François de Paris, Paris, 1737; and the article JANSENISM.

CONYBEARE, William Daniel, b. at Bishopsgate, Eng., June 7, 1787; d. near Portsmouth, Aug. 12, 1857. In 1839 delivered the Bampton Lecture on the Christian Fathers during the Ante-Nicene Period. He was made Dean of Llandaff in 1845. The majority of his writings were upon geological topics; and of the Geological Society he was an early and stanch friend.

CONYBEARE, William John, son of the preceding, d. 1857. He was a fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge, and a frequent contributor to the Edinburgh Review, upon ecclesiastical and social topics, of which essays the most famous was on Church Parties, i.e., the parties within the Anglican Church. He also wrote a novel, Perversion, or the Causes and Consequences of Infidelity, London, 1856. But his title to fame rests upon his labor, in conjunction with the Rev. J. S. Howson (now Dean of Chester), upon the Life and Letters of St. Paul, London, 1850-52, 2 vols., since often reprinted in England and the United States. Of the twenty-eight chapters of this work Mr. Conybeare contributed nine; but these include the speeches and letters of Paul, all of which he translated and annotated. His translations are spirited and faithful. A volume of his Sermons preached in the Chapel Royal, Whitehall, London, appeared London, 1844; and his Essays, Ecclesiastical and Social, have been collected and published.

COOK, Charles, the father of Methodism in France and Switzerland; b. in London, May 31, 1787; d. at Lausanne, Feb. 21, 1858. Merle d'Aubigné said of him, "The work which John Wesley did in the British Kingdom, Charles Cook did upon the Continent, except that it was not so extensive." He went to France in 1816, was indefatigable in labor, and largely through his agency was there a revival of religion among French Protestants under the Restoration. He organized numerous little societies, which either joined the Reformed Church, or continued independent. One of the most important controversies he carried on—for he must needs fight his way—was with César Malan, upon the doctrine of Predestination, which led to his publication of

COOK, Emile F., son of the preceding; b. in Niort (Deux-Sèvres), 1830; d. at Hyères, in the south of France, Jan. 29, 1874. He was educated in Lausanne and the Wesleyan institutions in England; ordained in 1854; and in 1866 came to Paris to be pastor of the Wesleyan Congregation there. He came to America as delegate to the General Conference of the Evangelical Alliance held in New York Oct. 2-12, 1873, and escaped shipwreck in the ill-fated Ville du Havre (Nov. 22, 1873), only to die on land. See Mrs. Houghton: Story of Emile Cook's Life, Phila., 1881.

COOKE, Henry, D.D., LL.D., the champion of Orthodoxy against Arianism in the Irish Church; b. at Grillagh, near Maghera, County Londonderry, Ireland, 1788; d. in Belfast, Sunday, Dec. 13, 1868. After graduation at the Glasgow University, he was ordained (1808) pastor of Duncane in County Antrim, but remained only two years. He then held successively charges at Donegore, near Templepatrick, in County Antrim (1811-15), at Killyleagh, County Down (1818-29), in Belfast (1829) till his death. He was elected in 1847 professor of sacred rhetoric, and president of the faculty in the Assembly's College at Belfast; but, yielding to the urgent request of his congregation, he remained their preacher. He was a man of eloquence, tact, and influence. He was raised up to destroy Arianism in Ireland, and he did the work appointed him. From the first year of his preaching unto the last, he strove earnestly for the Orthodox views on the person of Christ, and for the consequent growth of piety. The opposition to him at the start was very great. It is striking proof of the intensity of his devotion, that not finding himself able to cope successfully with the Arian leaders, who were men of much culture and learning, he studied for three years in Glasgow University and Trinity College (1815-18), and resumed his ministry with much increased mental stores. The fight he waged reads like a romance. He defeated his opponents again and again. He stemmed the tide of popular sympathy, and turned it strongly and permanently to Orthodoxy. He drove Arianism out of the colleges, synods, and congregations of the Irish Presbyterian Church; so that in 1829, after a crushing defeat in the synod of Ulster, at Lurgan, the Remonstrant synod of Ulster was formed by the Arians. But it has not flourished in Ireland; for to-day there are not four thousand adherents, while in England Presbyterianism became almost entirely Arian. (The present Presbyterian Church in that country is an exotic, being imported from Scotland.) This victory may properly be put, under God, to the credit of Henry Cooke; for his was the indomitable energy, the facile learning, the polished tact, and the worldly prudence, which combined to make him triumphant. He won golden opinions: his brethren rejoiced to honor him. He was made in 1829 D.D. by Jefferson College, Pennsylvania, and LL.D. by Trinity College, Dublin. Three times he was elected moderator of the General Assembly. He was made professor in the Assembly's College, and throughout his long settlement in Belfast he was their most admired and thronged preacher. In private life he was simple, dignified, and gentle. For him to live was Christ. See J. L. PORTER: Life and Times of Henry Cooke, D.D. LL.D., London, 1871, new edition, Belfast, 1875.

COOKMAN, George Grimston, b. in Kingston-upon-Hull, Yorkshire, Eng., Oct. 21, 1800; lost at sea in the steamship President, March, 1841. He became a Methodist preacher in 1823, and in 1825 settled in America, first in Philadelphia, and became an itinerant preacher, although his purpose in leaving England was to convert the negroes. From the first year of his ministry he took a commanding position. His speech at a meeting of the Young Men's Bible Society in New Brunswick, N.J., in the year 1828, was one of his earliest platform addresses, but immediately established his reputation as a first-class orator. He served upon various circuits. In the spring of 1838 was sent to Washington, and in the winter was elected chaplain of the United-States Congress. Here he won fresh laurels, and not only human plaudits, but the approval of his conscience; for he did not shun to declare the whole counsel of God. In the spring of 1841 the expiration of that Congress terminated his chaplaincy. He then determined to revisit England. He was made a fraternal delegate to represent the American Bible Society at the anniversary of the British and Foreign Bible Society, and bearer of the first despatches to the British Government from the incoming administration of Gen. Harrison. He preached a farewell sermon in the Capitol,—one of the greatest oratorical triumphs of his life. He sailed from New York March 11, and was never heard of more. He wrote no books; and with the exception of a few sermons and a volume of Speeches (N.Y., 1841), there are no published products of his genius. — Cookman, Alfred, son of the preceding, b. at Columbia, Penn., Jan. 4, 1828; d. in Newark, N.J., Nov. 13, 1871. He was licensed as an exhorter in the Methodist-Episcopal Church in Baltimore, Nov. 1, 1845. He held various appointments in connection with different conferences, and lived the life of a popular and beloved Methodist minister, carrying on his work in church and chapel, camp-meeting and private, going from place to place, and everywhere doing that blessed work whose record is on high. He left no publications of importance. See H. B. RIDGAWAY: The Life of the Rev. Alfred Cookman, with some Account of his Father, the Rev. George Grimston Cookman, N.Y., 1873.

COPE (Latin capa), a long cloak reaching from the neck to the heels, open in front, but fastened at the top by a clasp; was known in antiquity as one of the most common fashions of overcoat, then adopted as an ecclesiastical vestment, and worn, until quite recently, in the English Church, by bishops in Parliament, by canons at coronations, and on other similar occasions.

COPLESTON, Edward, an English prelate; b. at Offwell, Devonshire, Feb. 2, 1776; d. near Chepstow, Oct. 14, 1849. He was elected a fellow of Oriel College, Oxford (1795), and in 1802 appointed professor of poetry. In 1813 he published the substance of his famous lectures under title Prelectiones Academicae. In 1814 Provost of Oriel College, he became in 1826 Dean of Chester, and took the degree of D.D. by diploma, and in 1827 Bishop of Llandaff, and Dean of St. Paul's. He published, besides articles, several important theological works, of which the best is Enquiry into the Doctrines of Necessity and Predestination, London, 1821. Dr. Whateley edited his Remains with Reminiscences of his Life. See, also, W. J. COPLESTON: Memoirs of E. Copleston, with Selections from his Diary and Correspondence, London, 1851.

COPPING (Coppin, Copyn), John, a martyr of Congregationalism, a layman of Bury Saint Edmunds, who was hanged on Friday, June 5, 1583, for "dispersing of Brownes (Robert) bookes and Harrison's bookes." In 1576 he was committed at Bury by the commissary of the bishop for disobedience to the ecclesiastical laws, and was imprisoned in all seven years, although not very strictly. In August, 1578, a child was born to him; and, because there was no minister in the place who "could make a sermon," he refused it baptism for four months. This action aggravated his case. During his long imprisonment he and his fellow-prisoner, Thacker, found means of circulating Brownes's books against the Church of England; and for this offence they were both hanged. See DEXTER: Congregationalism, as seen in its Literature, N.Y., 1880 (pp. 208-210).

COPTS AND THE COPTIC CHURCH. Egypt Proper, that is the Valley of the Nile from the sea up to Assuan, contains at present a population of about five millions and a quarter, of which the five millions are Mohammedans, and the rest Christians. Of the Christians, by far the greatest and most interesting portion belongs to the Coptic Church, a native institution of the country; while a minor portion belongs to various foreign churches.

Ethnographically speaking, the Copts have descended directly from the old Egyptian population, so far as this was a pure and unmixed race at the time when Christianity was introduced in the country, during the Roman and Byzantine rule. While the mass of the people, after embracing Islam, suffered a considerable influx of Arabian blood, the Copts kept pure their blood as well as their creed. Their very name proves their direct connection with antiquity. The word "Copt" is not derived from Coptos, a city in Upper Egypt, whither the Egyptian Christians are said to have sought refuge during a persecution, nor from Jacobites, the sectarian name of the community, but from Αιγύπτιος, of which it is an abbreviation or corruption. When the Arabs conquered Egypt, Greek was the language spoken in the country; and "Ghubt" or "Ghibt" is still the name by which the Arabian tongue designates those among the natives who kept aloof from the conquerors, and strove to preserve intact their religion and their nationality. A still stronger evidence of this connection is the Coptic language, essentially the same as the old Egyptian tongue, and, for this very reason, of the greatest philological and historical interest. It is not spoken any more. In popular life, private as well as public, it has been completely superseded by the Arabic tongue; but it is still used in divine service, studied by the priests, and taught in the schools. It is written with Greek letters; and only in a few cases, in which the Greek alphabet had no sign for the Egyptian articulation, the old Demotic characters have been retained. The typical character, finally, and certain usages and customs, point directly towards old Egypt. Circumcision, for instance, performed together with baptism, and total abstinence from pork, are peculiarities which the Copts hardly have adopted from the hated Moslems.

With respect to religious and ecclesiastical relations, the present Coptic Church is a continuation of the old Monophysitic Church of Egypt. By the zeal of the Syrian monk Jacob-el-Baradai (whence the sect name, Jacobites), Monophysitism spread to such an extent in Egypt that nearly the whole population adopted it; and neither the decrees of the Council of Chalcedon (451), condemning its doctrines, nor the edicts of the emperor, were able to eradicate it. The party of the Orthodox Church were called "Melechites;" that is, royalists, because they were supported by the state, by the emperor. The party was very small; but it comprised the officials, it commanded the troops, it had the power. Between the two parties, bloody contests arose, in which not only the populace partook, but also the swarms of fanatical and pugnacious monks and hermits which covered the neighborhood of Alexandria and the deserts on both sides of the Nile Valley. The steadily repeated attempts of suppression from the side of the Byzantine Government produced a steadily increased exasperation among the Egyptian Christians; and the result was, that the latter actually hailed the Arabs (in 638) as liberators. Not only they made no resistance against the invaders, but they actually aided them in driving out the Imperialists, and in taking possession of the country. In recognition of their services, they were at first treated with mildness and regard by the conquerors, and many privileges were granted to them. But by degrees, as the proselytizing zeal of the Moslems came into active play, and large portions of the Christians proved willing to abandon their faith, persecutions were instituted against the stubborn ones, and the Coptic Church has suffered much from the intolerance and fanaticism of Islam.

The Copts form at present nowhere in Egypt a compact population. They are scattered all over the country, mostly in small communities. They are most strongly represented in Fayûm (the famous oasis in Middle Egypt) and in Cairo, where the community numbers about ten thousand souls. Their total number is about two hundred thousand. But, in spite of its circumscribed dimensions, the Coptic Church has a very elaborately articulated hierarchy and a numerous clergy. At the head stands the Patriarch, who, like all the higher dignitaries, is taken from among the monks. He resides in Cairo, but is still styled "Mutrân-el-Isanderijeh" (Metropolitan of Alexandria), and regarded as the successor of St. Mark. Next to the Patriarch ranks the abuna of the Abyssinian Church, residing at Gondar; then follow the bishops, of whom there are no less than twelve; then the lower clergy, arch-priests, priests, and deacons; and finally the inmates of the monasteries, monks and nuns, whose rules are said to be very strict. There are quite a number of monasteries, and some of them date back to the first Christian centuries. One of the most prominent among them is that of St. Anthony, situated in the Eastern Desert. The Patriarch is always taken from among its monks. Celibacy is common among the clergy, though not universal. In the Coptic, as in other Oriental churches, marriage is forbidden only to the regular clergy and to the higher grades of the secular clergy. Generally the clergy is much revered by the people; though the stand-point it actually occupies, spiritually and morally, does not command respect. Of theological education very little is found, even among the highest dignitaries. The priests know generally nothing of the Bible but the Gospels and a few Psalms: they can read Coptic, but they cannot understand it. Unfortunately their morals are not better than their theology. They are avaricious, and full of swindling and lying. As they are poor, and without any fixed pay of any kind, the most make their living by begging, and shifts of all kinds. But the worst of all is, they drink. Drunkenness is the besetting sin of the Coptic Church: head and members drink raki together, and even the church festivals are often disgraced by frightful outbursts of this vice.

The church-buildings are generally miserable, dirty, and out of repair. Only in Cairo and Alexandria are there large and comely churches: that of Alexandria was built in 1871. The Church of Mary, however, at Old Cairo, is noticeable; as it dates from the sixth century, and is the oldest Christian church in Egypt. It is built over a grotto, in which Mary is said to have lived with the infant Jesus during her stay in Egypt. The interior of the churches is generally divided into several parts. The Holiest of the Holy contains the altar, but is entirely concealed from the eyes of the congregation. In the Holy the priests officiate. In the room occupied by the congregation a place is set apart for the women. As the building is, so is the service, — mean, monotonous, unimpressive, and without dignity. It consists mostly of recitation of passages from the Bible or the Liturgy, in the Coptic or in the Arab language; no preaching, or, at all events, very seldom. Still the service is very long, beginning at daybreak, and ending with a kind of agape [and, as the custom is to stand, all are supplied with crutches of the proper height to lean upon]. Again: as the service in the church, so the life in the congregation, — dull, dead, a mere routine. Fasting, and prayers to the virgin and the saints, are considered essential features of piety. Of late, however, European and American missionaries have brought some life into this inert mass. The first attempt was made by the English Church Missionary Society (1825), and with marked success. In 1855 the United Presbyterian Church of North America entered the field; and in 1875 it founded at Siut a promising seminary for the education of young Coptic preachers. The St. Chrischona Society at Basel began in 1861 the foundation of several missionary stations in connection with their mission in Abyssinia; but the undertaking was abandoned in 1872. COQUEREL, Athanase Laurent Charles, French Protestant liberal theologian; b. at Paris, Aug. 25, 1795; d. there Jan. 2, 1868. He studied theology at the Protestant seminary of Montauban, and was ordained 1816, and from 1817 to 1832 was pastor of the French church at Amsterdam. In 1832, on the invitation of Baron Cuvier, he came to Paris to be colleague to Marron. He was very outspoken on behalf of Protestant liberalism, and founded successively the journals, Le Protestant (1831), Le Libre Examen (1834), and Le Lien (1841), for the advocacy of his opinions. By the latter he labored to unite the factions of French Protestantism. He was also a member of the Consistory of the Legion of Honor (in reward for his vigorous defence of the University of Paris), and of the National Assembly of 1848, and of the Legislative Assembly; but after the coup d'état of Dec. 2, 1851, he confined himself exclusively to professional duties. "His last days were saddened by the predominance of Orthodoxy in the French Protestant Church." He was an eloquent preacher, a prolific writer, and a popular speaker. Eight volumes of his sermons were published between 1819 and 1852. He wrote, besides, Biographie sacrée (1825-26), Histoire sainte et analyse de la Bible (1839), Orthodoxie moderne (1842), Christologie (1853). These and other of his works have been widely circulated at home, and translated into English, Dutch, and German.

COQUEREL, Athanase Josué, son of the preceding; b. at Amsterdam, June 16, 1820; d. at Fismes (Marne), July 24, 1875. He was an even more pronounced liberal than his father, whom he succeeded as editor of Le Lien in 1849, and kept the position until 1870. In 1852 he joined in founding the Historical Society of French Protestantism; in 1858 published, beside others, his remarkable Jean Calas et sa famille; Libres études; and La conscience et la foi (1867). Among his translated works is First Historical Transformations of Christianity, Boston, 1867.

CORAN. See MOHAMMED.

CORBAN (Old Testament קָרְבָּן, "offering," δῶρον, oblatio; in New Testament, κορβάν; Vulgate explains by donum). The word occurs very frequently in the Hebrew text of Leviticus and Numbers, but only in those books in the Old Testament, and once in the New Testament (Mark vii. 11). It means "an offering to God, of any sort, bloody or bloodless, but particularly in fulfilment of a vow." The teaching of the scribes, which our Lord so vigorously repudiated, was, that a son might say to his parents, in respect to anything they might require, "It is corban [i.e., devoted] that whatever of mine thou mightst have been profited by me," and henceforth be free from all claim upon him for their support. Or, according to Luther's paraphrastic note, "Corban means an offering; and it was as much as to say, 'Dear father, I would willingly give it to thee; but it is corban: I count it better to give it to God than to thee, and it will help thee better.'" Josephus relates that Pilate spent the money which was corban, and as such deposited in the temple, upon aqueducts (War, II. 9, 4). Matthew uses the word κορβανάς (Matt. xxvii. 6) to indicate the treasury. It was in the court of the women, where stood thirteen chests, called "trumpets" from their form, to receive the money offered in the temple.

CORBINIAN, whose true name was Waldekiso, was born at Chartrettes, near Melun, in France, towards the close of the seventh century, and died as Bishop of Freising, in Upper Bavaria, Sept. 8, 730. He was one of those Franks who labored in the service of the Frankish major domus for the establishment among the Germans of ecclesiastical order and authority, and may be considered as precursors of St. Boniface. They generally labored under the sanction of the Pope, and must be distinguished from the Iro-Scottish missionaries; but the result of their labor was so insignificant, that St. Boniface and the popes completely disregarded them. The life of Corbinian has been written by Aribo, his fourth successor in the Episcopal see of Freising, and is found in Act. Sanct. (Bolland) Sept., III. p. 281; BUTLER: Lives of the Saints, II. p. 434.

CORDELIERS, a name generally given in France to the Franciscan monks, because they wear a rope tied around the waist. According to tradition, it originated during the wars between Louis IX. and the Saracens, in the following manner: the king, seeing the monks pursuing the enemy, asked who they were, and was answered that they were the men corde liés.

CORDOVA, the Corduba of the ancients, appears twice in the history of the Church as the source of a remarkable influence, — first, in the middle of the ninth century, when it was the meeting-place of one of the most famous synods ever held in Spain, and next, during the period between the tenth and the thirteenth centuries, when it was the seat of one of the most celebrated schools in Europe.

The Synod of Cordova was convened in 852, on the instance of the Caliph Abderrhaman II. Many Christians, especially monks, impelled by fanaticism, and a mistaken idea of the merit of martyrdom, studiously provoked the Mohammedans among whom they lived, simply in order to stir up persecution, and win the martyr's crown. A majority of the synod, among which were Bishop Hostegis of Malaga, and Bishop Recaffrid of Sevilla, carried a decree forbidding this kind of voluntary martyrdom; but a minority — among which were the presbyter Samson, author of an Apologeticus contra Hostegisum, the monk Alvarus, author of a Vita S. Eulogii, and Eulogius himself — protested; and practically the minority retained the field. The synod was styled the impium conciliabulum, its acts were destroyed, and we know its proceedings only from the works of Eulogius. See AGUIRRE: Collectio Conciliorum Omnium Hispania, Rome, 1693, III. 149; W. BAUDISSIN: Eulogius und Alvar, Leipzig, 1872.

The School of Cordova was founded in 980 by the Caliph Hakem II. Before that time, both theology and jurisprudence had been cultivated in Cordova by famous teachers; but, by Hakem's energy and support, chairs were erected also for other branches of learning, teachers were invited, and a complete university began to flourish. In the beginning of the twelfth century this institution had a library of about six hundred thousand books, and the best astronomical observatory in the world; and it was renowned as the centre of the study of astronomy, mathematics, medicine, and philosophy. A little later it became the principal seat of the Arabian study of Aristotle; and thus it became a mediator between the antique philosophy and the mediæval speculation. Its most famous teacher was Averroës, and his most famous pupil was Maimonides. See JOURDAIN: Recherches critiques sur . . . traductions latines d'Aristote, Paris, 1843; E. CORINTH, the "Star of Hellas," and the capital of Achaia, stood on the isthmus, which, stretching between the Gulf of Corinth and the Gulf of Ægina, connects the Peninsula of Morea with the Greek mainland. It was defended by a citadel built on a lofty rock, Acro-Corinth, which rose just in the rear of the city. It had two harbors,—Cenchreæ on the Gulf of Ægina, and Lechæum on the Gulf of Corinth; and it commanded two very important commercial routes: one east to west, between Asia Minor and Italy; and one north to south, through Macedonia and Greece.

The old Greek city—rich, beautiful, the capital of the Achaian League, the arena of the Isthmian games—was totally destroyed by Lucius Mummius (146 B.C.); and for a whole century its site lay bare and desolate. But in 44 B.C., Cæsar settled a colony of Roman freedmen there, and the colony prospered prodigiously. The new city was made the capital of the Roman province of Achaia. Gallio, the brother of Seneca, was proconsul during Paul's first visit there. It soon became one of the most important commercial places on the Mediterranean; but its character was somewhat peculiar. It was not a Greek city, nor a Roman one. Its population was extremely heterogeneous. A numerous colony of Jews settled there when driven away from Rome by Claudius, and among them were Aquila and Priscilla. Everybody went to Corinth to make money, or to spend it. All nations were represented there; but nearly the only bonds which held the inhabitants together were their common enterprises and their common debaucheries.

Paul visited the city three times,—first in 53 (Acts xviii. 11), then between 54 and 57 (according to 1 Cor. xvi. 7; 2 Cor. xii. 13, 14, xiii. 1), and finally in 57–58 (Acts xx. 2). From Corinth he wrote his Epistle to the Romans (Acts xx. 2, 3; comp. 1 Cor. xvi. 6; Rom. xvi. 1); and to the Christians of Corinth he wrote two epistles.

CORINTHIANS, Epistles to the. See PAUL, EPISTLES OF.

CORNELIUS, Bishop of Rome from June, 251, to Sept. 14, 252, adopted a milder view of the case of those who had fallen off from the Church during the persecution of Decius, and corresponded about the matter with Cyprian; of which correspondence several letters from each side are still extant, and given among Cyprian's works. In Rome itself there was a minority which favored the severer views of the Bishop of Carthage; and the head of this party, Novatianus, became the first antipope.

CORNELIUS À LAPIDE (van der Steen), b. at Boehaff, in the diocese of Liège, in 1568; d. in Rome, March 12, 1637; was professor of exegesis, first at Louvain, and afterwards in Rome, and wrote commentaries on nearly all the books of the Bible. On account of the ample quotations from the fathers which they contain, these commentaries enjoyed great favor in the Roman-Catholic Church, and are still used. Collected editions appeared at Antwerp, Paris, Lyons, and Venice. An edition in 20 vols. 4to appeared at Lyons in 1872. See T. W. MOSSMAN: The Great Commentary of Cornelius à Lapide, London, 1881.

CORONATI QUATUOR, "the Four Crowned Brothers," is the common name of four martyrs—Severus, Severianus, Carpophorus, and Victorinus—who suffered martyrdom in Rome during the persecution of Diocletian. Their festival falls on Nov. 8. The old church built in their honor is mentioned by Gregory the Great. It was repaired in 841 by Leo IV., and rebuilt, after a conflagration, by Paschalis II., and again by Paul V. One of the cardinal-priests takes his title from it. See BUTLER: Lives of the Saints, II. 300.

CORPORAL, or CORPORALE, is the white linen cloth with which the remnants of the consecrated elements are covered; also, and usually, the linen cloth, never decorated in the Roman Church, upon which the Eucharist is laid. The name and texture are derived from the story of the wrapping of our Lord's dead body (Luke xxiii. 53). Originally it was large enough to cover the altar.

CORPUS CATHOLICORUM denotes the Roman-Catholic states of Germany so far as they were united into one body, and acted as such in their relations with the Protestant states,—the Corpus Evangelicorum. The thing existed long before the name. As early as the Diet of Spire (1529) and the Peace of Nuremberg (1532), traces of such a union are apparent from the unanimity with which the members act; and at the conclusion of the Peace of Westphalia (1648), the unity is completely constituted: it has its representatives and its organs. The name was still avoided, however. The Roman-Catholic Church could not and would not officially recognize a body whose rights and liberties might prove so many limits to her own authority; and with respect to the Peace of Westphalia, which arranged the relations between the Roman-Catholic and the Protestant states of the empire as between two bodies, the Pope never gave his sanction. Nevertheless, towards the close of the seventeenth century the name came into general use, and was employed officially by the union itself. With the dissolution of the German Empire in 1806 the union disappeared. See CORPUS EVANGELICORUM. NEUDECKER.

CORPUS CHRISTI (the Body of Christ), the name of a festival of the Roman-Catholic Church in honor of the transubstantiation. It was instituted in 1264 by Urban IV.; and, after the times of Clement V., it became one of the most imposing pageantries of the Roman Church, the consecrated host being carried about in a magnificent procession, and exhibited for adoration.

The origin of this festival was the vision of Juliana, prioress of the Nunnery of St. Corneli, near Liège, recorded in her Life, in Act. Sanct., April 5. She saw the moon fully illuminated, with the exception of one dark spot, and was told that this dark spot referred to the lack in the Church of a festival in honor of the transubstantiation. See J. C. DANNHAUER: De festo Corporis Christi, Strassburg, 1662.

CORPUS DOCTRINÆ is the common name, which, in the sixteenth century, the Protestants applied to certain collections of doctrinal treatises made for the purpose of forming an authorized and normative representation of a certain type of faith, or of a certain individual church. The first of these collections — the so-called Corpus Doctrinæ Philippicum, or Misnicum, afterwards Corpus Doctrinæ Christianæ — was published at Leipzig in 1560, and consisted of all the principal doctrinal and confessional writings of Melancthon, — the Confessio Augustana, Apologia, Confessio Saxonica, Loci Theologici, Examen Ordinandum, Responsio ad Articulos Bavaricæ Inquisitionis, together with the Refutatio Serueti. It was issued first in a German edition, and shortly after also in a Latin, and was accepted by Saxony and other evangelical countries; not without opposition, though. It represented exclusively the influence of Melancthon; and since the adiaphoristic controversy a sharp distinction had been drawn between his stand-point and orthodox Lutherdom. In the very same year the Corpus Doctrinæ Christianæ was published, appeared the Corpus Doctrinæ of the City of Hamburg, consisting of five confessional declarations, issued since 1548 by the clergy of Hamburg. It was strongly Lutheran in its character; and still more strongly so was the Corpus Doctrinæ of the City of Brunswick, which appeared in 1563, and consisted of the Ecclesiastical Ordinance of the City of Brunswick by I. Bugenhagen, the Confessio Augustana, the Apologia, the Articles of Smalcald, and the Articles of Lüneburg. A remarkable specimen of these collections is the Corpus Pomeranicum, made in 1564. Up to that date, the Corpus Doctrinæ Christianæ had been accepted as the authorized representation of the Pomeranian Church; but an addition was now made of the Greater and Lesser Catechisms of Luther, the Articles of Smalcald, and some minor treatises of Luther, by which addition the exclusively Melancthonian tendency of the Corpus was thought to be duly counterbalanced. All these Corpora Doctrinæ — and many more might be mentioned, as, for instance, the Corpus Præteriticum, Corpus Thuringicum, Corpus Brandenburgicum, etc. — lost their importance when the Formula Concordiæ was produced, and accepted as the common Corpus Doctrinæ of the whole Lutheran Church.

CORPUS EVANGELICORUM, also called Corpus Sociorum Augustanæ Confessionis, denotes the union into one body of all the Protestant states of Germany. From the earliest days of the Reformation, various Protestant princes had tried to unite all the Protestant states into a permanent confederacy, or, at least, to establish a regular "correspondence" between them. In the diets it often proved necessary to treat the interests of an individual state as a common Protestant interest; and, as the Roman-Catholic states from the very first appeared and acted as a unit, both parties gradually came into the habit to treat with each other de corpore ad corpus. Its complete constitution, however, the Corpus Evangelicorum did not obtain until July 22, 1653, when it was organized under the leadership of the Elector of Saxony. All Protestant interests, general and special, were placed under its authority, and it corresponded independently with the emperor and with the separate states, and even with foreign powers. When, in the latter part of the seventeenth century, the electoral house of Saxony was converted to Romanism, the Corpus Evangelicorum came under the leadership of a Roman-Catholic prince; but the danger of throwing the country out of the alliance, together with its ruler, determined the union to bear with this singular anomaly. With the dissolution of the German Empire the Corpus Evangelicorum also dissolved. See H. W. v. BÜLOW: Ueber Geschichte und Verfassung des C. E., Regensburg, 1795; [A. FRANTZ: Das Katholischen Directorium des Corpus Evangelicorum, Marburg, 1880.] HEPPE.

CORRODI, Heinrich, b. at Zürich, July 31, 1752, d. there Sept. 14, 1793; studied theology in Halle, under Semler, and was in 1786 appointed professor of morals and natural law in the gymnasium of his native city. He was considered one of the great lights of the rationalism of his age; but his works, Geschichte des Chiliasmus (1781), Geschichte des jüdischen und christlichen Bibelkanons (1792), Beiträge zur Beförderung des vernünftigen Denkens in der Religion (1780-93), have had no influence, and are now of no interest.

CORVEY, the famous Westphalian abbey, the centre of the Saxon and Scandinavian mission, and for a long period the principal seat of learning among the Germans, was a colony from the Monastery of Corbie, in the diocese of Amiens. The subjugation of the Saxons by Charlemagne, the slow progress of Christianity among them, and, more especially, the education of a number of young Saxons in Corbie, finally ripened the idea with Abbot Adalhard of sending out some of his older monks to make a permanent settlement in Saxony. The first attempt was made in 815; and the place chosen was Söllinge, near the present city of Uslar. But the locality was too unfavorable; and, after seven years of hard labor and vain exertions, the settlement had to be moved to the imperial villa of Hyxori, the present Höxter, on the bank of the Weser. Here it thrived prodigiously under the name of Corbeja Nova, or New Corvey, in contradistinction from Corbeja Aurea, or Vetus, the mother-convent. During the lifetime of Adalhard it remained united to Corbie under the same abbot; but after his death it obtained its own abbot, Varinus, and, after the lapse of a short time, it completely outshone the old place. Louis the Pious endowed it with Höxter, Eresburg, and Meppen, and gave it the right of coining money, besides many other privileges. Count Gerolt bequeathed to it all his estates in 851. The transference of the remains of the martyr Vitus from the Abbey of St. Denis, in 836, contributed still more to the material prosperity of the young institution, as the Saxons believed that the possession of these relics would secure them good luck and the ascendancy over the Franks. But the real reason for the success was, of course, the energy and talent of the first settlers and their immediate pupils, — Ansgar, Rimbert, Autbert, Gautbert, Nithard, Unni, etc., the great Scandinavian missionaries, and Bruno of Cologne, Thiagrin of Halberstadt, Bruno of Verden, Wegbert of Hildesheim, Folkmar of Paderborn, etc., celebrated as leaders in the German Church. As its missionary activity came to a close, Corvey gradually developed as a seat of learning and an educational institution of the greatest importance. It possessed an excellent library. It kept at one time twenty-four professors. In its schools were taught not only theology and languages (Latin and Greek), but also the sciences. History was cultivated with great success. The work of Bovo I. is lost; but Widukind's history of Saxony is still extant (Res Gestæ Saxonica in PERTZ: Mon. iii. pp. 408-467). But during the Thirty-Years' War it suffered severely. Its library and archives were destroyed or lost; its estates and privileges were taken away from it, and very little was restored after the Peace of Westphalia.

CORVINUS, Antonius, b. Feb. 27, 1501, at Warburg, near Paderborn; d. at Hanover, April 5, 1553; was educated in the Monastery of Loccum, from which he was expelled on account of his holding Lutheran views; studied theology at Wittenberg, from 1523 to 1526; was a preacher at Goslar from 1528 to 1531, and at Witzenhausen from 1531 to 1541, and labored during the last part of his life for the introduction of the Reformation in the Duchy of Kalenberg-Göttingen. In 1546, however, Duke Erich II. was converted to Romanism; and on Nov. 1, 1549, Corvinus was seized at Pattensen by Spanish soldiers, and carried to Kalenberg, where he was imprisoned for three years. Without very great creative power, he had a considerable talent for organization; and he labored with faithfulness and patience in the cause of the Reformation. See BARING: Leben Corvinus, Hanover, 1749; UHLHORN: Ein Sendbrief von Antonius Corvinus mit einer biographischen Einleitung, Göttingen, 1853.

COSIN, John, Bishop of Durham, and a leader of the Anglo-Catholics; b. at Norwich, Nov. 30, 1594; d. in London, Jan. 15, 1672. He was educated at Caius College, Cambridge, and after service as domestic chaplain to the Bishop of Durham, prebendary of Durham, and archdeacon of the East Riding in Yorkshire, was elected master of Peterhouse, Cambridge, in 1638. In 1640 he was made vice-chancellor, and then Dean of Peterborough, but in the next year was sequestered from all his benefices, and impeached for popish practices by the House of Commons, but dismissed on bail, and not again called for. In 1642 he was concerned in sending the plate of the University of Cambridge to the king, and in consequence was ejected from his mastership. He went to France; but at the Restoration he was restored, and in December, 1660, raised to the see of Durham. He was distinguished for learning and controversial ability, and wrote several noteworthy books: A Collection of Private Devotions in the Practice of the Ancient Church, called the Hours of Prayer, taken out of the Holy Scriptures, the Ancient Fathers, and the Divine Service of our own Church, London, 1627, 9th ed., 1693 (a manual prepared by royal command for the use of the Queen's maids of honor); Historia Transsubstantiationis Papalis (Eng. trans., History of Popish Transubstantiation, London, 1676, new ed. with memoir by J. S. Brewer, 1840); A Scholastical History of the Canon of Holy Scripture, or the certain and indubitate books thereof, as they are received in the Church of England, London, 1657. These and his other writings are published in the Library of Anglo-Catholic Theology, Oxford, 1843-55, 5 vols.

COSMAS and DAMIANUS, two brethren from Arabia; lived in Cilicia, where they practised medicine without taking any fees, and were martyred during the persecution of Diocletian, having refused to offer sacrifice on the Pagan altars. They are commemorated by the Roman Church on Sept. 27, and were revered during the middle ages as the patron saints of physicians and druggists. An order of spiritual knights, devoting themselves to take care of pilgrims, was instituted in the eleventh century, and named after them, but met with no success. See Act. Sancto., Sept. 27; BUTLER: Lives of the Saints, II. p. 526.

COSMAS INDICOPLEUSTES, an Egyptian merchant, who, in the middle of the sixth century, navigated the Mediterranean, the Red Sea, the Persian Gulf, and even visited India, whence his surname. Tired of the business of the world, he became a monk, and wrote, among other works, which are lost, A Christian Topography of the World, in Greek and in twelve books, which has come down to us, and is found in MONTFAUCON: Coll. Nov. Patr. Græc., Paris, 1706, vol. II. pp. 113-346, and GALLANDI: Bibl. Veterum Patrum, vol. xi., Venice, 1776. The general idea which the author entertains of the earth, as a parallelogram, flat, and covered with a vault, is absurd; but his remarks on details are often acute and striking, and his book is by no means without interest.

COSSIT, Franceway Ranna, b. in Claremont, N. H., April 24, 1790; d. at Lebanon, Tenn., July 3, 1863. He was graduated at Middlebury College, 1813, and received there the degree of D. D. in 1839. His parents were Episcopalians, and after a number of years of teaching he was ordained as a minister of that denomination. Circumstances led him to go to Tennessee, and there he met Cumberland Presbyterians. Their methods and success greatly interested him; and, after a careful consideration of the matter, he decided to become one of them (1822). He rose to eminence in his new relations. He was elected successively the first President of Cumberland College, at Princeton, Ky., and of Cumberland University at Lebanon, Tenn. He was also President of the Board of Foreign and Domestic Missions of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, establisher and editor of a religious weekly, The Banner of Peace, and in other ways a power. He published The Life and Times of Finis Ewing, Nashville, 1853.

COTELERIIUS (Cotelier), Jean Baptiste, b. at Nismes, in December, 1627; d. in Paris, Aug. 19, 1686; studied theology and philosophy in Paris; was in 1667 commissioned by Colbert to investigate and catalogue the Greek manuscripts of the Royal Library, and became professor in Greek at the Royal College in 1676. His principal work is his edition of the Apostolical Fathers, — Barnabas, Clement, Hermas, Ignatius, and Polycarpus, — Paris, 1672, in two volumes. Most of the copies of the original edition were consumed by a conflagration; but there are later editions by Clericus, of 1698 and 1724. Cotelier also published Eccles. Græc. Monumenta, Paris, 1677–88, 3 vols., and Homilia IV. in Psalmos, Paris, 1661, which he ascribed to Chrysostom. See ANCILLON: Mémoires, p. 379; NICÉRON: Mémoires, IV. p. 243; and Baluze's Letter to Bigot, after the preface to vol. II. of Patr. Apost. HAGENBACH.

COTTON, George Edward Lynch, Bishop of Calcutta; b. at Chester, Oct. 29, 1832; accidentally drowned at Kooshtea, on the Ganges, Oct. 6, 1866. He was graduated at Trinity College, Cambridge, appointed head master of Marlborough College in 1852, and in 1858 Bishop of Calcutta, and metropolitan in India and Ceylon, and "by his piety, courtesy, catholicity of sentiment, and high accomplishments, obtained the esteem of all parties." He wrote Doctrine and Practice of Christianity, 3d ed., London, 1853; two volumes of Sermons, 1855 and 1858; and since his death, Sermons preached to English Congregations in India, London, 1867, and his Memoir, with Selections from his Journals and Correspondence, by his widow, London, 1870, have been published.

COTTON, John, b. at Derby, Eng., Dec. 4, 1585; d. at Boston, U.S.A., Dec. 23, 1652. He was graduated at Trinity College, Cambridge, and was a fellow of Emmanuel College. For twenty years he was vicar of St. Botolph's, Boston, Lincolnshire, and a noted Puritan; but, on being cited by Laud for not kneeling at the sacrament, he fled to London, and thence to America, landing in Boston Sept. 4, 1633. He took, in the New World, even a more prominent position than he had taken in the Old. On the 17th of October he was ordained teacher of the First Church in Boston (see DEXTER: Congregationalism, as seen in its Literature, p. 422), and colleague of Mr. John Wilson. In 1642 he was invited, along with Thomas Hooker of Hartford and John Davenport of New Haven, to sit in the Westminster Assembly of Divines; but no one of them went (see DEXTER, p. 653). He died of malarial fever in consequence of exposure in crossing the ferry to Cambridge. Cotton Mather, his grandson, says of him, "If Boston be the chief seat of New England, it was Cotton that was the honor and glory of Boston" (Magnalia, third book, chap. i., ed. Hartford, 1855, p. 252). Extravagant praise, yet indicative of Cotton's position and character, which are thus set forth by Palfrey: he was "far from being the ruling spirit of the Colony," yet "acting with others, and advised and instructed and checked by them, he rendered it memorable service. . . . There was no mistake in the opinion which his neighbors universally entertained of his devoted piety. . . . He had acuteness and learning for controversy, a moving eloquence for the pulpit, and an affectionate and winning address, and a knowledge of common business, which, in the less public duties of the sacred office, secured to him great power" (History of New England, vol. II. p. 410).

He was a voluminous writer: Dexter mentions thirty-six of his publications. The most important of these are, Questions and Answers upon Church Government (written, not printed, 1634); The Way of Life (1641); A Brief Exposition of the Whole Book of Canticles (1642); The Churches Resurrection and The Pouring out of the Seven Vials [his famous Lectures on the Revelation] (1642); The Keyes of the Kingdom of Heaven, and Power thereof, according to the Word of God (1644), reprinted Boston, 1852; The Way of the Churches of Christ in New England (1645); The Grounds and Endes of the Baptisme of the Children of the Faithfull (1647); The Way of Congregational Churches cleared (1648); A Briefe Exposition of Ecclesiastes (1654); The New Covenant (1654); Exposition of the Thirteenth Chapter of the Revelation (1655). See COTTON MATHER: Magnalia Christi Americana, ed. Hartford, 1855, vol. I. pp. 252–286.

COUNCIL (concilium). In the history of the Christian Church, the councils form centres of development with respect to doctrine and liturgy and constitution. They grew up from the very needs of the Church; and in the Apostolic Council at Jerusalem (reported in Acts xv.) they found their model and their legitimation. The first councils or synods of which we have a reliable account were held in Asia Minor, against the Montanists, and not earlier than the middle of the second century (EUSEBIUS: Hist. Eccl., V. 16). One, said to have been held in Sicily, in 125, against the Gnostic Heracleon, and another, said to have been held in Rome by Bishop Telesphorus (d. 139), are entirely unhistorical. A little later, towards the close of the second century, a number of councils were held — at Ephesus, under the leadership of Polycrates; in Palestine; at Osrhoëne in Mesopotamia; in Pontus; and in Gaul, under the leadership of Irenæus — concerning the Easter question; and from the same time dates a passage in TERTULLIAN (De Jejuniis, 13), showing that this custom, which had originated in the Eastern countries, among the Greeks, now began to attract the attention of the Latins in the Western countries. The first Latin synods were held in the beginning of the third century, in North Africa, where, under Cyprian, they became very frequent. Meanwhile they lost in the East the aspect of being something extraordinary. According to a letter from Firmilian, Bishop of Cæsarea in Cappadocia, to Cyprian (Ep. 75), councils were held regularly twice a year in Asia Minor in the beginning of the third century; that is, they had become a fixed institution, part of the constitution of the Church. Gradually they also grew in dimensions, especially after the middle of the third century. Thus the synod of Iconium in Phrygia (256) was frequented by bishops both from Galatia and Cilicia; and the synod of Arles (314), not only by bishops from Gaul, but also by bishops from Brittany, Germany, Spain, and North Africa. In course of time the diocesan synod developed into the metropolitan synod, and this, again, into the patriarchal council, until finally the great œcumenical council, authoritative to the whole Church, could be convened.

The first eight œcumenical councils (325-869) form a group by themselves. They were convened by the emperors (Roman and Byzantine); they received their impulses from the Greek Church; and they are principally of doctrinal interest. They form, so to speak, the mental process by which the Christian Church became conscious of the full meaning and proper bearing of its own fundamental doctrines; and, though the later logical systematization and philosophical argumentation have modified the outlines of the definitions, none of the dogmas then settled has ever afterwards essentially been changed. The Council of Nicæa (325), convened by Constantine the Great, frequented by three hundred and eighteen bishops, and led by Hosius of Cordova, and Athanasius of Alexandria, and the Council of Constantinople (381), convened by Theodosius the Great, frequented by a hundred and fifty bishops, and led by the two celebrated Cappadocian bishops, Gregory of Nazianzen and Gregory of Nyssa, settled the dogma of the Holy Trinity so far as regards the constituents which necessarily go into the definition; and only the dialectical relations between these constituents were left to be elaborated by the aftertime. See ARIANISM. The Council of Ephesus (431), convened by Theodosius II. and Valentinian III., frequented by about two hundred bishops, and led by Cyrillus of Alexandria, and the Council of Chalcedon (451), convened by Marian, frequented by five or six hundred bishops, and led by the representatives of Bishop Leo of Rome, laid the foundation upon which the orthodox christology of our days is still resting. See NESTORIUS, EUTYCHES, and MONOPHYSITES. It is noticeable, with respect to these two councils, first, that the invitations were not issued to the bishops, but only to the metropolitans, to whom it was left to select such of their bishops as they wanted to be present at the councils; next, that Bishop Cœlestine of Rome instructed his representatives at the Council of Ephesus not to participate in the discussion, but simply to give the decision, — an attitude which was assumed still more pronouncedly by the representatives of Bishop Leo of Rome at the Council of Chalcedon. The fifth œcumenical council did not meet until a century later (553). It sat in Constantinople, but was frequented by only a hundred and fifty bishops, mostly belonging to the Eastern Church, and it is generally considered as a mere epilogue to the Council of Chalcedon; while the sixth œcumenical council, also sitting in Constantinople (680), and convened by Constantine Pogonatos, actually carried the christological discussion a step farther. See MONOTHELITES. The part which the bishops of Rome played at these two last councils was not so advantageous as that they had played at the two preceding ones. Pope Vigilius was present in person in Constantinople (553), and subscribed the decrees of the council; but those decrees met with an obstinate resistance in the Western Church and among the Monothelites, who were excommunicated and anathematized as heretics in 680, as was also Pope Honorius, — a fact rather embarrassing for the dogma of papal infallibility. The seventh œcumenical council, convened at Nicæa (787) by the Empress Irene, was chiefly concerned with the question of image-worship; the eighth, convened in Constantinople (869) by Basilius Maredo, with the affairs of Photius: but the authority of both, especially that of the latter, was nearly confined to the Greek world. The schism between the Eastern and Western Church had now become complete, and it has lasted until the present day.

The second group of œcumenical councils (869-1311) belongs exclusively to the Western Church, and gives a very vivid picture of the growth and culmination of the papal monarchy. For two centuries and a half after the Council of Constantinople (869), there were held in the Western Church only provincial and national synods, in Spain, France, England, and Germany. Though several of these synods, especially those held in France, exercised great influence on the history of the Church, none of them obtained authority throughout the whole Church. The series of œcumenical councils is opened again with the Lateran synods, thus called from their place of meeting, — the Church of St. John Lateran in Rome. There are four belonging to this period, — the first, convened by Calixtus II. (1123), and frequented by about three hundred ecclesiastics, for the solemn establishment of the concordat of Worms, by which the emperor renounced the right of investiture with ring and staff; the second, convened by Innocent II. (1139), and frequented by about a thousand ecclesiastics, for the purpose of cancelling all the decrees issued by the antipope Anaclet; the third, convened by Alexander III. (1179), of merely disciplinary interest; and the fourth, convened by Innocent III. (1215), and frequented by four hundred and twelve bishops, and eight hundred abbots and priors, besides by ambassadors from the Byzantine court, and a great number of princes and noblemen, — one of the most brilliant ecclesiastical assemblies which ever met. Its debates encompassed the whole field of ecclesiastical legislation, — doctrine, liturgy, discipline, etc.; and both the results and the form of these debates give evidence of the towering height to which the Papacy had reached. The dogma of transubstantiation was promulgated, the decree of auricular confession was issued, the Inquisition and other courts of heresy were established, etc. But these and other measures did not originate in the assembly itself: they were, so to speak, dictated to it by the curia, as appears from the new formula under which they were adopted, — sacra universali synodo approbante sancium. To this group also belong the two councils of Lyons, of which the first was convened by Innocent IV. (1245), for the purpose of excommunicating and deposing the Emperor Frederic II.; the second by Gregory X. (1274), to accomplish the union between the Greek and the Latin Church; and, finally, the Council of Vienne, convened in 1311 by Clement

V., by which the order of the Templars was dissolved.

With the "Babylonian captivity" the Papacy begins to decline, and by the great schism it actually seems to be brought very near ruin. To heal the schism was also one of the principal objects of the Councils of Pisa (1409) and of Constance (1414-18). At the same time there arose within the Church itself a strong re-action against the prevailing corruption; and the demands of reform were loud, not only in the Council of Constance, but still more in the Council of Basel (1431-43), and even in the fifth Lateran synod (1512-17). The proceedings of these councils, — the great reformatory councils of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, — in which, however, all endeavors of reform were baffled by the curia, are described in separate articles, as are those of the Council of Trent (1545-63), whose principal business transaction was the condemnation of the German Reformation. After the Council of Trent, no œcumenical council was held until that of the Vatican (1869-70), by which the dogma of the infallibility of the pope was declared.

COURAYER, Pierre François Le, b. at Rouen, Nov. 17, 1681; d. at London, Oct. 16, 1776; was canon regular of the Abbey of Ste. Gèneviève in Paris, taught theology and philosophy in its schools, and had charge of its library. In 1723 he published at Brussels a treatise on the validity of English ordinations, in which he declared, that, in the episcopacy of the Anglican Church, there had occurred no breach of succession since the days of the apostles; and this assertion roused such a storm among his Roman-Catholic co-religionists, that he felt compelled to leave France. He sought refuge in England, where he was well received, and obtained a pension. He published at London, 1737, a French translation of Paolo Sarpi's history of the Council of Trent.

COURCELLES, Etienne de (Curcellæus), b. at Geneva, May 2, 1586; d. in Amsterdam, May 22, 1659; studied theology under Calvin and Beza, and afterwards in Heidelberg, and was appointed pastor at Bois-le-Roi, near Fontainebleau, in 1614. In 1621 he became pastor at Amiens; but, having refused to subscribe the decrees of the synod of Dort, he was deposed. He afterwards gave in a qualified assent, and was appointed pastor at Vitry, but gave up this position in 1634, went to Amsterdam, and became (in 1637) Episcopius's successor as professor of theology in the Remonstrants' College. Besides his edition of the Greek text of the New Testament, he wrote Vindicia Arminii (1645), Defensio Blondelli (1657), Dissertationes (1659), etc., which appeared in a collected edition, Amsterdam, 1675.

COURT AND LEGAL PROCEEDING AMONG THE HEBREWS. In the oldest times the heads of tribes, or of chief houses in a tribe, were the judges. In the times of Moses, the latter, who combined in his person all theocratical offices, was the judge; but, as the burden became heavier, he appointed, by the advice of Jethro, heads over thousands, over hundreds, over fifties, and over tens, to arrange smaller matters, whilst in more important cases his counsel was to be sought. In appointing judges, moral and intellectual qualifications were considered; but it is probable that Moses regarded the tribal constitution; and this supposition seems to follow from Deut. i. 15: "I took the chief of your tribes." When the people settled in Canaan, the elders of the city and the heads of the tribes adjusted all legal matters. During the period of the judges, in so far as they stood at the head of the people or of single tribes, the judgment was exercised by them; and of Samuel we know that he judged in several cities of the country, and appointed his sons judges at Beersheba (1 Sam. viii. 2). Afterwards the kings acted as judges; and from 2 Chron. xix. 8-11 we know that Jehoshaphat appointed a high tribunal at Jerusalem, to which the Levites, priests, and chiefs of the fathers, belonged. The prophets also exercised judicial functions. After the return from Babylon, the Sanhedrin adjusted all legal matters.

The legal proceeding was very simple. The complaint was made either by the parties themselves (Deut. xxi. 20, xxii. 16), or by others. Both parties had to appear before the judge, who had to hear and to investigate very carefully the matter (xxv. 1). Two or three witnesses were necessary, especially in penal cases; and, when capital punishment was decreed, the witnesses were the first to exercise it. Whoever committed perjury was subjected to the same punishment which had otherwise threatened the accused. When parents brought their disobedient sons before the judge, no witness was required. Sometimes the lot was used in exercising judgment (cf. Josh. vii. 14; 1 Sam. xiv. 40 sq., etc.). An immediate divine judgment is mentioned in the case of a woman suspected of adultery. The sentence was given orally, but in later times also in writing (Job xiii. 26; Isa. x. 1). All documents and contracts were legal when signed before witnesses. That oppression, bribery, partiality, and false witnesses often perverted the right and the law, we see from the many censures which the prophets pronounced. [P. B. COURT, Antoine, the organizer of the "Church of the Desert," the restorer of the Reformed Church in France; was born at Villeneuve de Berg, in the department of Ardèche, May 17, 1696, and died at Lausanne, June 15, 1760. He lost his father when he was four years old, and grew up in poverty under the shadow of the martyrdom of Brousson and Homel, and among the wonders and miseries of the wars in the Cévennes. Reports of people who were burnt alive, put on the rack, sent to the galleys, or hunted down like wild beasts, for the sake of their faith, made his daily bread; but these poor and dismal circumstances proved to be the right tutor for his character. When Louis XIV. issued the edict of March 8, 1715, declaring that there was no Protestantism in France, the young man stood ready to give the lie to the royal bravado.

The situation was exceedingly difficult. A circle of edicts closed around Protestantism, and kept it walled up as in a tomb. Marriages consecrated by a Reformed minister were considered by the civil law as mere concubinage, and children of such a marriage were treated as bastards. To preach Protestant ideas was death on the gallows. To participate in Protestant worship was imprisonment, or labor in the galleys. And in these circumstances no change took place at the death of Louis XIV. The regent continued the persecutions. From 1715 to 1723 seven Protestant meetings were surprised, and the men were sent to the galleys, the women to the Aigues-Mortes. In 1718 Etienne Arnaud was hanged as a "preacher of the desert." Houses and villages were razed to the ground: whole counties were fired. Nor was the internal state of the Protestant congregation without its dangers. While one part, the "newly-converted" as they were called, gradually relapsed into Romanism, another, influenced by the prophets of the Camisards, was led astray by a spiritualism which rejected the Bible as norma et regula fidei, and produced sectarianism. Nevertheless, in 1714-15 Court made his first journey as a travelling preacher through the Cevennes, Languedoc, Dauphiné, to Marseilles; and on Aug. 21, 1715, the first synod met at sunrise in a place where two roads cross each other, near Nîmes. Only a few persons were present; but a church ordinance was agreed upon, with regular services, with synods, and with a church discipline; and thus the "Church of the Desert" was founded.

In 1720 Court visited Geneva, and established a connection and intercommunication between the Reformed Church of Switzerland and that of France. For a similar purpose he also began a correspondence with William Wake, Archbishop of Canterbury. In 1722 he returned to France, and continued his work under innumerable dangers, but with very great success. Congregations were formed in Poitou, Bretagne, Agenois, Foix, Provence, and Picardie. After an interruption of sixty-six years, the first national synod met on May 16, 1726. In 1728 the evangelical numbered about two hundred thousand in Languedoc and Dauphiné. In Languedoc (with Rouergue and Vivarais) there were a hundred and twenty parishes with three synods and four ministers (Corteis, Court, Durand, Roger). In 1729 Court retired, and settled at Lausanne, where, some years earlier, he had established a school for the education of ministers for the Reformed Church of France. Only once more (in 1744) he again visited his native country; but he continued to the last to labor for the "Church of the Desert," and his work prospered in spite of cruel persecution. In 1744 the church had thirty-three ministers, and sixty-two in 1763. In the former year Normandie numbered seventeen parishes, Poitou thirty, Dauphiné sixty. Nîmes alone contained twenty thousand Protestants; and it began to dawn upon the French Government that a change of policy with respect to its evangelical subjects was absolutely necessary.

COUSIN, Victor, b. in Paris, Nov. 28, 1792; d. at Cannes, Jan. 14, 1867; was educated in Lycée Charlemagne and École Normale, and began to lecture on philosophy in 1815 in the Sorbonne, where he soon gathered a great number of enthusiastic students around his chair. In 1821, when the re-action thought itself strong enough to indulge its passions, Cousin was discharged; but he was re-instated in 1823, and, after the revolution of 1830, he was made councillor of state, director of École Normale, peer of France, and for a short time (1840-41) minister of public instruction in the cabinet of Thiers. After the coup d'état of Dec. 2, 1851, he retired into private life. His principal works are, Cours de l'histoire de la philosophie, 3 vols., Paris, 1840; Cours de l'histoire de la philosophie moderne, Paris, 1841 (translated into English by Wight, New York, 1852); Du vrai, du beau, et du bien, Paris, 1849 (translated into English by Wight, New York, 1854). The direct influence which Cousin exercised on Christian theology was not great, and may be limited to his edition of Abelard's works (1836-46). But indirectly his activity was of great consequence. He changed the whole character of the French philosophy. He led the students of philosophy among his countrymen from the materialism of the eighteenth century in France to the idealism of the Scotch school; and, again, he dissolved the dogmatic method of the French and Scotch philosophy, and introduced the dialectic method of German philosophy. A complete system he did not produce. He was an eclectic, but his eclecticism was not a mere mosaic. The vigorous understanding and vivid representation of the various philosophical systems which he gives, are everywhere permeated by a spirit of idealism, which, in the latter part of his life, drew him and his pupils nearer and nearer to Christianity.

COVENANT, an agreement or mutual obligation, contracted deliberately and with solemnity. 1. Theological Use. God's covenant with men signifies his solemn promise or engagement (Gen. xvii. 14; Exod. xxxiv. 10; Deut. iv. 13; Isa. lix. 21). The Hebrew word for covenant is from כָּרַת ("to cut"), and has reference to the practice of cutting animals in two, and passing between the parts, in ratifying a covenant (Gen. xvii. 14; Jer. xxxiv. 18). The term "the covenants," in Rom. ix. 4, refers to the various promises made to Abraham and the other patriarchs. The most important use of the word is, however, in relation to the two great dispensations which are distinguished as the Old and New, or as the Covenant of the Law and the Covenant of the Gospel. The former was made with the children of Israel, through Moses, and rested much in the outward ceremonies and observances which the law enjoined (meats and drinks, and divers washings, and carnal ordinances). The new covenant was made through Christ, sealed by his own blood, and secures to every believer the blessings of salvation and eternal life (comp. Exod. xx. 24; Gal. iii. 15, 17; Heb. viii. 6 sqq.). The titles "Old and New Testaments" arose from the inaccurate rendering in the Latin Vulgate of the word "covenant" (διαθήκη) by testamentum. It would be a decided gain if the correct titles could be used. In the revised version of the New Testament, the word "covenant" is everywhere the translation of διαθήκη in the text, with "testament" in the margin (e.g., Matt. xxvi. 28). But the American revisers (Classes of Passages, X.) prefer that "the word 'testament' be everywhere changed to 'covenant' without an alternate in the margin, except in Heb. ix. 15-17."

2. Ecclesiastical Use. The Congregationalists and Baptists apply the term "covenant" to the agreement between the members which is appended to the confession of faith drawn up by each church independently. It is either original, or derived from some authoritative symbol. On the "National Covenants" of Scotland, see COVENANTERS.

3. COVENANT OF SALT is a covenant in whose sealing or ratification a seal was used, imparting to it an inviolable character (Lev. ii. 13; Num. xviii. 19; 2 Chr. xiii. 5).

COVENANTERS. The name given to the Scottish Presbyterians, or a portion of them, of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, derived from a form of agreement called a "Covenant," by which they bound themselves for religious and patriotic ends. The first document of the kind was drawn up in 1580, at the request of King James VI., by his chaplain, John Craig, and was first called "The king's Confession." Afterwards it was called "The National Covenant; or, the Confession of Faith." It was subscribed in 1580 by the king, and by persons of all ranks in 1581; and its object was to maintain the reformed religion and the king's majesty, in opposition to the machinations of Romanism. In 1596, on occasion of a memorable revival of earnest religion, it was proposed that the Covenants be renewed; and the proposal was very cordially carried out by the General Assembly in the Little Church of Edinburgh, March 30, 1596. In 1638, when prelacy was overthrown, the Covenant was again renewed, with a bond binding the subscribers "to adhere to and defend the true religion, and forbear the practice of all innovations already introduced into the worship of God; and to labor by all means lawful to recover the purity and liberty of the gospel as it was professed and established before the aforesaid innovations." It was subscribed by barons, nobles, gentlemen, burgesses, ministers, and commons, a memorable scene occurring at its subscription in Greyfriars' churchyard, Edinburgh, where it was first publicly read and signed. It was approved by the General Assembly 1638 and 1639, and ratified by the Parliament of Scotland in 1640; and, besides the people, it was subscribed by Charles II. at Spey in 1650, and at Secon in 1651.

Another document, drawn up by commissioners of the English Parliament and the Westminster Assembly, and by committees of the Scottish Estates and the General Assembly, was called "The Solemn League and Covenant for Reformation and Defence of Religion, the Honor and Happiness of the King, and the Peace and Safety of the Three Kingdoms of Scotland, England, and Ireland." This Covenant, besides binding the subscribers to maintain the Reformed Church in its integrity, according to the word of God, pledged them "to endeavor the extirpation of popery, prelacy (i.e., church government by archbishops, bishops, their chancellors and commissaries, deans, deans and chapters, archdeacons, and other ecclesiastical officers depending on that hierarchy), superstition, heresy, schism, profaneness, and whatsoever shall be found contrary to sound doctrine and power of godliness, lest we partake in other men's sins, and thereby be in danger to receive of their plagues; and that the Lord may be one, and his name one, in the three kingdoms." The Covenant contained, among other clauses, a very explicit declaration of loyalty to the king. It was approved by the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, and by both Houses of Parliament, and the assembly of Divines in England, and taken and subscribed by them in the year 1643. It was thereafter, by the same authority, taken and subscribed by all ranks in Scotland and England the same year; ratified by the Scottish Parliament in 1644; again renewed, and taken, with an acknowledgment of sins and engagement to duties, by all ranks in 1648, and by Parliament in 1649; and (with the older Covenant) subscribed by Charles II. at Spey in 1650, and at Secon in 1651. The most characteristic feature of the Solemn League and Covenant as compared with the National Covenant was the repudiation of prelacy.

King Charles I. was so exasperated at the proceedings of 1638, that he gathered an army, and advanced towards Scotland, to compel submission. The Covenanters prepared to meet him, and intrusted the command of their troops to Gen. Leslie; and it was on this occasion that the banner was displayed "for Christ's crown and covenant." The Scotch obtaining some successes, a peace was concluded, but broken by the king in the following year, and once more renewed.

After the Westminster Assembly and the signing of the Solemn League and Covenant, war broke out again. The Marquis of Montrose made a great stand in Scotland for the royal cause, but in vain. Then came the flight of Charles I. to Scotland, his surrender into the hands of the English, and finally his execution. This event filled the Scots with consternation, and immediately Charles II. was proclaimed king. Coming to Scotland, he took the Covenants, though this turned out to be an act of pure hypocrisy. Their intense loyalty to the king threw the Covenanters into antagonism to Cromwell and those with whom they were really at one. But when King Charles was restored in 1660, instead of having the Covenants respected, and the Presbyterian Church purified from abuses, a bitter persecution followed that lasted for twenty-eight years.

The "Act rescissory" rescinded all acts passed between 1638 and 1650. In 1662 it was declared by the obsequious Scottish Parliament, that the ordering and disposal of the external government and policy of the Church doth properly belong unto his Majesty as an inherent right of the crown, by virtue of his royal prerogative and supremacy in causes ecclesiastical." In the exercise of this prerogative, so utterly opposed to the principles of the Covenanters, episcopal government was restored. The Covenants were denounced, and all who supported them proclaimed traitors. In 1661 the Marquis of Argyle was beheaded, and

James Guthrie also died on the gallows. Diocesan courts were instituted, and no minister was allowed to remain in a parochial charge without satisfying them. A commission headed by the Earl of Lauderdale was sent over the west country to enforce this law, when, to the great surprise of the commissioners, four hundred ministers resigned their charges rather than submit to the unlawful conditions. The ejected ministers were prohibited from holding meetings for worship under pain of death. Fines and imprisonment were inflicted on those who attended such services, and were found to have abetted the Covenanters. Detachments of troops headed by such men as Sir James Turner, and Graham of Claverhouse, scoured the country, persecuting all who were suspected of being friendly to them. Sometimes resistance was offered to the soldiers. A rising took place in Galloway in 1666, which terminated in the defeat of the insurgents at Rullion Green among the Pentland Hills near Edinburgh. Another battle took place at Drumcloy, where the Covenanters defeated Claverhouse; but at Bothwell Bridge they were vanquished. At Sanquhar, in 1680, a declaration was drawn up, disowning Charles II. as king, in consequence of his having acted as a tyrant, and violated the constitution of the country. Conspicuous among the authors of this declaration was Richard Cameron, who gave his name to the body called in common parlance Cameronians, but more strictly Reformed Presbyterians. At Airdmoss, in 1680, Cameron and his friends gave battle to the royal troops; but they were defeated, and Cameron himself was killed. The year before (in 1679) James Sharp, Archbishop of St. Andrews, formerly a Presbyterian minister, who was accused by his brethren of betraying the Presbyterian cause, was attacked by some Covenanters on Magus Moor, near St. Andrews, and put to death.

The state of things underwent little alteration until the Revolution occurred in 1688; James II. being dethroned, and William and Mary coming to the throne. During the reigns of Charles II. and James II. the cases of persecution were very numerous, and in many cases most harrowing. It was reckoned, that, in twenty-eight years, eighteen thousand persons were either banished or put to death. At the Revolution the Covenanters ceased to be distinguished by that title, with the exception of a small body who had been followers of Cameron, and who stood out against the Revolution settlement as not being a sufficient recognition of great Bible principles in the constitution both of the Church and of the State. See CAMERONIANS.

Very different estimates have been formed of the Covenanters, according to the ecclesiastical and religious proclivities of their judges. By high-churchmen they have been denounced as coarse, fanatical, intolerant, cruel, and unscrupulous; by high Presbyterians they have been extolled as men of the highest godliness, champions of liberty, holy martyrs and confessors, the saviors of their country. It is very certain that between 1580 and 1688 the friends and upholders of the Covenants embraced nearly all of the most learned, devout, and earnest ministers of the church, and many laymen in high position. The real lovers of the gospel were Covenanters, and the revivals of earnest religion were associated with them. The rugged character of the times, the general want of a tolerant spirit, and the absence of suitable leaders, may have led to excesses, and caused some degeneracy in the movement in its later stages. But the stand for freedom, civil and religious, made by the Covenanters, was of the noblest character, and conferred incalculable benefit on both Church and State. Had they been crushed, ecclesiastical liberty would have almost perished within the Reformed churches of Europe.

Among some of the friends of the Covenants an opinion has sometimes prevailed that they bound all the succeeding generations of Scotsmen, inasmuch as they were entered into by a corporate body,—the nation, which never dies. This opinion has but few supporters, and is manifestly extreme and untenable. Those who made the Covenants bound themselves very firmly; but they could not bind those who came after them; nor could these come under the obligation of the Covenants, except in so far as they were personally willing to do so.

COVERDALE, Miles, b. at Coverham, in the north riding of Yorkshire, and probably in the district that gave him his name, Coverdale, which lay in what was called Richmondshire, about 1488; d. in London, and buried, Feb. 19, 1569, in the chancel of St. Bartholomew. (When this church was taken down, in 1840, his remains were removed to St. Magnus.) The early part of his life is unknown. He entered the convent of the Augustine Friars at Cambridge, whose prior in 1523 was Robert Barnes, an early martyr (burnt at Smithfield, July 30, 1540), by whom, probably, Coverdale was converted to Protestantism; for about this time he appeared as the champion of the new faith, and would have been persecuted but for the known fact that Crumwell was his patron. As it was, in 1528 he went to the Continent. Nothing certain is known of Coverdale's whereabouts until the appearance of his Bible in London, in 1535. See ENGLISH BIBLE VERSIONS. In 1538 he went to Paris, and while there superintended a new edition of a diglott, the Latin and the English side by side. The first edition was printed and published in that year by James Nycolson, but was unauthorized by Coverdale, and full of errors. This second edition was printed by Fraunces Regnault in Paris, and published by Richard Grafton and Edward Whitechurch, London. In Paris, Coverdale made the revision of Matthew's Bible, known as the "Great Bible," because of its size. The printing was begun in Paris, inhibited Dec. 17, 1538, and finished in London, April, 1539, probably under the personal superintendence of Coverdale. At Crumwell's execution (July 28, 1540) Coverdale went to Germany, and was pastor of a church at Bergzabern, near Strassburg. On his return, in 1548, he was made one of Edward VI.'s chaplains, and almoner to the Queen-dowager, Catharine Parr. In 1550 he was appointed a member of the commission against the Anabaptists, and on Aug. 14, 1551, Bishop of Exeter; and so extreme was his poverty, that the usual payment of "first-fruits" was remitted in his case. On the accession of Mary (1553) he was deposed, imprisoned, and banished. He owed his escape from death to the intercession of the king of Denmark, whose chaplain was Macalpine, Coverdale's brother-in-law. Again an exile, he lived for a while at Wesel in Friesland, as pastor of an English congregation, then at Bergzabern, and finally at Geneva, where, with characteristic zeal and self-forgetfulness, he shared in the production of the Genevan Bible. In 1559 he returned to England, — Mary being dead, — but was not re-instated in his bishopric. From 1564 to 1566 he was rector of St. Magnus the Martyr, London Bridge, but resigned the position because of infirmity, or because of his Puritanical views in the matter of vestments, which had prevented his re-instatement in his bishopric. No more guileless man is reckoned among the heroes who gave the Anglo-Saxon race its precious versions of the word of God. But he did more than translate the Bible. He busied himself in making his countrymen acquainted with the Reformers by translations from H. Bullinger, Luther, Calvin, and others, by publishing (1564) a collection of the letters of the martyrs (Cranmer, Ridley, Hooper, etc.). He also wrote original pieces of a religious character. See his Writings and Translations, and Remains (edited for the Parker Society, Camb., 1844, 1846), and Letters of the Martyrs (edited by the Rev. E. Bickersteth, London, 1837). Darling's Cyclopædia Bibliographia gives a list of Coverdale's writings.

COWL, corresponding to the Latin cuculla, means primarily the hood which the monk draws over the head to prevent the eyes from glancing right or left. But, as this hood was the most characteristic part of a monk's dress, — and indeed it was the only article specially mentioned in the Rules of St. Benedict (c. 55), — cowl gradually came to be applied to the whole monastic garment, corresponding to the Latin casula.

COWLES, Henry, D.D., a commentator; b. in Norfolk, Conn., April 24, 1803; d. at Janesville, Wis., Sept. 6, 1881. He was graduated at Yale College, 1826; studied theology; was from 1828 to 1835 a pioneer missionary on the Western Reserve in Ohio; from 1835 to 1843, professor, first of Greek and Latin, and then of Hebrew, in Oberlin University; from 1843 to 1863 he was editor of The Oberlin Evangelist. In 1863 he began his Commentary, which eventually extended to sixteen volumes, covering the entire Bible, and completed it in 1881. It was published by D. Appleton & Co., New York, and intended for the educated laity. He was a man of strong practical sense, and of excellent judgment.

COWPER, William, poet and hymnologist, b. at Great Berkhamstead, Hertfordshire, Nov. 15, 1731; d. at East Dereham, Norfolk, April 25, 1800. He came of gentle blood. His father was one of George II.'s chaplains; and his grandfather was a judge, and brother of the first Earl Cowper, the Lord Chancellor. He was a delicate child; and his "fagging" experiences in the Westminster public school told sadly upon him, and may have, in part, induced his subsequent madness. At eighteen he began the study of law, and at thirty-two was nominally engaged in its practice, but really given up to literature. When his income began to be insufficient, he was nominated by influential friends clerk of the journals of the House of Lords; but, the right of nomination being disputed, he was required to submit to an examination, and nervous dread of the ordeal unsettled his reason (already affected by grief over his uncle's refusal to allow him to marry his daughter), and he had to be put under medical care, in the private madhouse of Dr. Cotton, who was a pious man. While there he was converted by reading a Bible which had been purposely put in his way. In 1765 he went to Huntingdon, and there formed acquaintance with the Unwins, and made his home with them. In 1767 Mr. Unwin was killed by a fall from his horse; and Mrs. Unwin and Cowper moved to Olney, on the invitation of the famous Rev. John Newton, one of the great lights of the Evangelical party, to which the pair belonged. But this new relation was fraught with danger to the hypochondriacal Cowper; for the life they now led was one continuous round of religious exercises. The only redemptive feature is the contact Cowper had with the poor, by which he enlarged his knowledge of life, and at the same time drove away melancholy. But again Cowper went mad; and it was not until after sixteen months, during which Mrs. Unwin assumed entire charge of him, that he recovered his reason under Dr. Cotton's skilful treatment. The departure of Newton was a favoring providence for him. Another was Mrs. Unwin's suggestion that he should write poetry. He had already joined Newton in writing the Olney Hymns (1779), and contributed sixty-eight to Newton's two hundred and eighty; but he now took a broader field, and produced The Moral Satires (1782). It was then he met Lady Austen, who by her vivacity, her tact, and knowledge of the world, exerted the most beneficent influence upon him. It was she who told him the story of John Gilpin, which he has immortalized, and set him The Task, by which he achieved fame. Soon Lady Austen left, and Lady Hesketh, his cousin, — another woman of the world, — came, and likewise favorably affected the poet. He then gave English literature a number of minor poems, and notable translations from Homer (1791) and Horace. In 1795 he obtained a pension of three hundred pounds. The last four years of his life were passed under a cloud. His reason was well-nigh destroyed, and the only original poetry he wrote was The Castaway. After his death his charming letters were collected and published.

Cowper's hymns are among the most popular; such as, God moves in a mysterious way; Oh for a closer walk with God; There is a fountain filled with blood. There is no gentler, purer, more winning character among English poets than William Cowper; and there is no better letter-writer among English authors.

LIT. — The best Life is by SOUTHEY, published, in connection with his works, London, 1833-37, 15 vols.; reprinted, with additional letters, by Bohn, 1853-54. A good sketch is given by GOLDWIN SMITH, in the English Men of Letters series, N.Y., 1880.

COX, Samuel Hanson, one of the gifted orators of his day; b., of Quaker parentage, at Rahway, N.J., Aug. 25, 1793; d. at Bronxville, N.Y., on Saturday night, Oct. 2, 1880. Abandoning law, he studied theology, and was pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Mendham, N.J., from 1817 to 1821, when he settled in New-York City, first as pastor of the Spring-street, and in 1825 of the Leight-street, Presbyterian Church. He was one of the founders of the University of the City of New York. In 1833 he went to Europe. In London he attended the anniversary of the British and Foreign Bible Society as delegate from the American Bible Society, and delivered a memorable address. He had entered Exeter Hall after the meeting was begun, and during an address which scathed the Americans for their "institution" of slavery. He was announced the next speaker, and secured for himself a hearty welcome by the following exordium:—

"My lord, twenty days ago I was taken by the tug 'Hercules' from the quay in New York to the good ship 'Samson,' lying in the stream. Thus, my lord,—going from strength to strength, from mythology to Scripture,—by the good hand of the Lord I was brought to your shores just in time to reach this house, and to enter, in the midst of the burning denunciations of my beloved country that have fallen from the lips of the gentleman who just sat down. He has reproached that country for the existence of slavery, which I abhor as much as he. But he did not tell you, my lord, that, when we revolted from your government, one of the reasons alleged was the fact that your king had forced that odious institution upon us in spite of our remonstrances, and that the original sin rests with you and your fathers." [Having adduced from memory the well-known facts of history to prove this position, he continued], "And now, my lord, instead of indulging in mutual reproaches, I propose that the gentleman shall be Shem, and I will be Japheth, and, taking the mantle of charity, we will walk backward and cover the nakedness of our common ancestor."

The effect was instantaneous and overwhelming.

He was professor of pastoral theology at Auburn, 1834 to 1837, but in the latter year accepted a call to the First Presbyterian Church of Brooklyn, and there remained until 1851, when his voice failed, and he resigned, and moved to Oswego, N.Y. During the last twelve years of his life he lived in retirement. He left no works of any consequence behind him; but his generation remembers his remarkable sayings, such as the opening of his prayer as moderator of the General Assembly (New School) in Philadelphia, 1846: "O Lord Jesus Christ, thou art the ne plus ultra of our desire, the sine qua non of our faith, and the ultima Thule of our hope;" and his characterization of the letters D.D. after a name as "semi-lunar fardels."

CRABBE, George, poet; b. Aldborough, Suffolk, Dec. 24, 1734; d. at Trowbridge, Feb. 3, 1832. His career was somewhat checkered. Educated as a surgeon, he abandoned his profession in 1780, and for a time was a literary adventurer in London, where he endured much suffering until he won the patronage of Edmund Burke, and was enabled to publish The Library (1781). By the help of Thurlow he entered the Church; and, although he never rose to fame or position as a preacher, he enjoyed the esteem of his parishioners. In 1783 he issued The Village, his first great success. His poems are still read. Though religious in their tone, few of them are suited for singing as hymns. See his Complete Works, with Memoirs by his Son, London, 1834, 8 vols., reprint in 1 vol., 1867.

CRADOCK, Samuel, a nonconformist divine; b. 1620; d. at Bishop's Stortford, in Hertfordshire, Oct. 7, 1706. He was educated at Emmanuel College, Cambridge; became a fellow; was ejected in 1662 from his living at North Cadbury in Somersetshire. He wrote Knowledge and Practice, London, 1639, 4th ed. with eight new chapters, 1702; The Apostolical History, 1672; The History of the Old Testament methodized, 1683, in Latin, at Leyden, 1685; Harmony of the Four Evangelists, 1688; Exposition of the Revelation, 1692.

CRAIG, John, one of the Scotch Reformers; b. 1512; d. in Edinburgh, Dec. 4, 1600. He was a Dominican monk, but, converted by Calvin's Institutes, condemned by the Inquisition in Rome to be burnt for heresy. The execution was stayed by the death of Pope Paul IV.; and the mob opened his prison, and he escaped. He returned to Scotland, became the colleague of John Knox, wrote the National Covenant in 1580, and compiled part of the Second Book of Discipline.

CRAIG, John, d. 1732; a Scotch mathematician, and author of the extraordinary Theologia Christiana Principia Mathematica, London, 1699, reprinted, with a learned preface, at Leipzig, 1755, in which he endeavors "to calculate the duration of moral evidence, and the authority of historical facts. By this mode the author attempts to show that the proofs of the Christian religion will cease in a certain number of years in proportion as the force of the testimony decays." According to his reasoning, Christianity will last until 3153, and then disappear, "unless the second coming of Christ prevent its extinction."

CRACKENTHORPE, Richard, b. at Strickland, in Westmoreland, 1567; fellow of Queen's College, Oxford, 1598; d. at his rectory of Black Notley, in Essex, 1624. His fame rests on his controversial writings: Popish Falsifications, London, 1607; A Defence of Justinian, 1616; The Defence of Constantine, with a Treatise on the Pope's Temporal Monarchie, 1621; Defensio Ecclesie Anglicanae, 1625, republished in the Library of Anglo-Catholic Theology, Oxford, 1847.

CRAMER, Johann Andreas, b. at Jöhstädt, Saxony, Jan. 27, 1723; d. at Kiel, June 12, 1788; studied theology at Leipzig, and took his degree of magister in 1745; became pastor of Crellwitz in 1748, and of Quedlinburg in 1750; was in 1751 invited to Copenhagen as court-preacher to the Danish king; removed in 1771 to Lübeck as superintendent; and was in 1774 appointed professor of theology in Kiel, and in 1784 chancellor of the university. His character as a theologian is that of a popularizer of rationalism, and the means he employed were those of a mistaken poet. But the almost incomprehensible pathos with which he preached about virtue as the safest stepping-stone to happiness, and the almost nauseous sentimentality with which he expounded the beauties of the Bible as the noblest æsthetical and literary enjoyments, corresponded exactly to the taste of the time; and he exercised a considerable influence, both in Germany and Denmark, though his writings — Sermons (22 vols., 1755-71), Poems (4 vols., 1782-91), Translations of Chrysostom (10 vols., 1748-51), Bossuet (7 vols., 1757-86), the Psalms in verse (4 vols., 1762-63) — have fallen into oblivion. CLEMENS PETERSEN.

CRANMER, Thomas, Archbishop of Canterbury; b. at Aslacton, Nottinghamshire, July 2, 1489; burnt at the stake in Oxford, March 21, 1556. He was appointed fellow of Jesus College, Cambridge, 1510 or 1511; married, and lost wife and child in a year, before 1523; ordained priest 1523; made D.D. 1523; met Henry VIII. 1529, and by him commissioned to prepare a work upon divorce, which should show, that, inasmuch as Henry's marriage with Catharine of Aragon was with his brother's widow, it was illegal and therefore void, and hence the king was released from it, and might marry whom he pleased, the papal bull to the contrary notwithstanding. In December, 1530, he was sent by the king as one of the embassy to Rome, there to argue upon this point before the Pope. For his services he henceforth stood high in the king's favor, and was consecrated Archbishop of Canterbury, March 30, 1533. In this spiritual capacity he pronounced the king's marriage with Catharine of Aragon null and void, and crowned Anne Boleyn, whom the king had secretly married, queen in her stead; but in 1536 he pronounced this latter marriage null and void, and went again through the farce of marrying the king to Anne of Cleves, and then dissolving the bonds, July, 1540. In 1541 he disclosed to the king the infidelity of Queen Catharine Howard. He was regent for Edward VI., under whom he hastened the Reformation in the Church. He supported the claims of Lady Jane Grey, although Mary was the rightful heir. For this conduct Mary hated him, and his doom was determined upon. He was tried upon the counts of treason and heresy. But the first was abandoned, and he was condemned to death on the second. In his cell he was visited by emissaries who promised him life and liberty if he would recant. He consented, and six times humiliated himself, each time more than before. At length, on Saturday, March 25, 1556, Cranmer, no longer archbishop, a prisoner condemned, stood in St. Mary's Church, Oxford, in order to make the public recantation which he had promised. But, to the amazement of all, he declared that he repented more of his recantations than of all the acts of his life, and so, as his right hand had offended, that should first be burnt. He held the hand in the flames, crying out, "This hand hath offended, this unworthy hand."

Cranmer is not a hero, but does not deserve the severe censure of Macaulay. He was the man for his times, and by his pliancy preserved the cause of the Reformation, through a reign of terror, for better times. Yet he did not make a very thorough work of reform when he had opportunity, although he introduced the important novelty of an English Liturgy in 1544. During Edward's reign he circulated the Bible, sanctioned the marriage of priests, and reduced the mass to the Protestant communion.

His writings relate exclusively to Reformation questions, evince wide reading, but no profound thought. Yet, by his mastery of the thoughts of others, Cranmer made a very skilful and influential advocate of the truth. He is the principal author of the Thirty-nine (at first forty-two) Articles of Religion, and of the Anglican Prayer-Book (in its English dress), which are the noblest and most enduring monuments of his labors.

CRASHAW, Richard, b. in London, 1613; d. at Loretto, Italy, 1650. The son of a fiery anti-Romanist, and educated at Cambridge, he was ejected from his fellowship in Peterhouse College, 1644, fled to France, embraced the Roman-Catholic religion, in 1646 became secretary to Cardinal Palotta, and in 1650 a canon of the Holy House of Loretto. There is no religious poetry in English so full at once of gross and awkward images and imaginative touches of the most ethereal beauty. The faults and beauties of his very peculiar style can be studied best in the Hymn to St. Theresa. His poems, in Latin and English, were first collected in one volume by W. B. Turnbull, London, 1838: a private edition, in two volumes, was published in 1872, edited by the Rev. A. B. Grosart.

CRATO VON CRAFTTHEIM (Johannes Krafft), b. at Breslau, Nov. 22, 1519; d. there Oct. 19, 1583; entered in 1534 the University of Wittenberg to study theology, and lived for six years in the house of Luther, where he also formed an intimate friendship with Melanchthon. His feeble health, which made it difficult for him to preach, induced him to give up the theological career, and from 1543 to 1549 he studied medicine at Leipzig and Padua. In 1550 he was appointed city-physician in Breslau; and his cures and writings rapidly made such a fame for him, that in 1560 he was called to Vienna as body-physician to the emperor. He was made an Imperial Councillor, ennobled, etc., and, both under Ferdinand I. and Maximilian II., he exercised great influence. Under Rudolph II. he was for a short time dismissed; but he was speedily recalled and remained till 1581, when he retired into private life. His stay at the court of Vienna was of the greatest importance for the cause of the Reformation in Austria. All the intrigues of Bishop Hoesus and the Jesuits he baffled, and it was not until after the death of Maximilian II., and during the latter part of the reign of Rudolph II., that the Jesuits really gained the ascendancy. He exercised, also, considerable influence on the development of the Reformation in Germany. He belonged originally to the Melanchthonian school, and fought with great zeal against the Flacians; but gradually he was won completely over by the Reformed Church; and the troubles which disturbed his last days arose, not from his being a Protestant, but from his being a Calvinist. CRAWFORD, Thomas J., D.D., a theological author, was born at St. Andrews, Scotland, in 1812, where his father was professor of moral philosophy, having been the immediate predecessor of Dr. Thomas Chalmers. As a minister of the Established Church, he filled successively the charges of Cults in Fife, Glamis in Perthshire, and St. Andrews in Edinburgh. On the death of Dr. John Lee, he was appointed professor of divinity in the University of Edinburgh. His principal works were on the Atonement, and on the Fatherhood of God. On the former subject he maintains the old Calvinistic doctrine, and criticises the modern theories of Bushnell, Robertson of Brighton, Young, and others. On the subject of the Fatherhood he controverts certain views maintained by Dr. Candlish in his Cunningham Lectures on that subject. He died in 1876. [His books are: The Fatherhood of God, considered in its General and Special Aspects, and particularly in Relation to the Atonement, with a Review of Recent Speculations on the Subject, 2d ed. (with reply to Dr. Candlish), Edinburgh, 1868; The Doctrine of Holy Scripture respecting the Atonement, Edinburgh, 1871, 3d ed., 1880; The Mysteries of Christianity (being the Baird Lecture for 1874), Edinburgh, 1874; The Preaching of the Cross, and other Sermons, Edinburgh, 1876.] W. CREATION. One of the points in which Judaism differs most conspicuously from the Paganism of antiquity is its cosmogony,—its doctrine of a creation out of nothing, and progressing through six days. The Paganism of antiquity has nothing which shows even a distant resemblance with such an idea. Stoicism is the true precursor of modern monism. God and the world, force and matter, are absolutely one, and every trace of dualism is anxiously avoided. Platonism is dualistic; but its dualism has something of the vagueness of a dream. God is not wholly immersed in the world, the idea in matter. Yet the world is eternal, like God: matter is eternal, like the idea. Creation is only an informing process of the idea in matter, a formative activity of God in the world.

Adopted by Christianity, the Hebrew doctrine of creation became the very basis of the Christian view of nature. But Christianity is a living growth, and not, like Judaism or Islamism, a mere crystallization. The Christian view of nature receives perpetually new impulses from the science of nature, and thus it came to pass, that, in course of time, the doctrine of creation underwent numerous modifications, though modifications of interpretation only. The keynote was retained, though the harmonies into which it was developed were very various. Indeed, the history of the doctrine of creation is for many centuries the history of natural science.

Down to the middle of the eighth century the Christian view of nature was more or less influenced by Philo and the Alexandrian school. In the two first centuries the Christian apologists and polemicists were occupied with refuting the theories of emanation, and the vague dualism held by the Pagans and the Gnostical sects; but most of their writings are lost. Tertullian's Ad-

versus Hermogenem, however, gives a good instance. Hermogenes denied the creation out of nothing, because, in that case, God would also have been the creator of evil. Tertullian refuted him. With Origen the influence of Philo became visible. His great commentary on Genesis is lost, with the exception of some fragments; but a homily by him on the Creation is still extant in a Latin translation; and this work, together with various passages in his De Principiis and Adversus Celsum, give a complete representation of his views. The principle of the biblical narrative he retains; but the details he transforms from facts into symbols. The act of the creation was the work of one moment, and the progressive succession of the biblical representation is an accommodation to the wants of the human understanding. The separation between the dry earth and the sea on the third day means the separation between the good works a man does and the wild waves of his passions, etc. From Origen this method of allegorization spread widely in the Eastern Church. In the Western Church, Augustine occupies the principal place among the writers on Christian cosmogony. In his earlier commentary, De Genesi contra Manichæos, as well as in books XI.—XIII. of his Confessiones, and book XX. of his De Civitate Dei, where he also treats the subject, a method of allegorization is applied not essentially different from that of Origen and the Eastern Church; but in his great commentary De Genesi ad Literam the allegory often assumes the character of casuistry. Like Lactantius and Ambrose, Augustine was well versed in natural science. He knew what was known in his time, and he applies his knowledge with great boldness. Doubts and objections are heaped up in the form of questions. Were the venomous animals and the beasts of prey created before the fall of man, or after? Why were only terrestrial animals, and no fishes or marine animals, present in Paradise when Adam named the animals? etc. The questions are often more subtle than the answers are satisfactory. In the track of Augustine followed all the commentators down to the time of Beda.

During the middle ages, from the eighth century to the period of the Reformation, the whole range of theology, its exegesis as well as its dogmatics, was under the sway of the Aristotelian philosophy; and the influence is conspicuous also in the manner in which the doctrine of creation was treated, both by the mystics and the scholastics. Of Hugo of St. Victor, the father and representative of French mysticism, two expositions of the dogma of creation are still extant,—one in his Annotationes Elucidatorie to the Pentateuch, and one in the opening chapters of his De Sacramentis Fidei. The idea of an instantaneous creation, introduced by Origen, and retained by Augustine, he abandons, and follows strictly the biblical narrative in its progression from one day to another, introducing at each stage a chapter of natural history, formed after the Aristotelian method of classification and description, but modified by an addition of a peculiar moral mysticism. Curious is his exposition of the creation, on the first day, of the primitive light as a radiant cloud rising above the earth, and throwing a dim light over chaos; and, on the fourth day, of the sun which is made out of the radiant cloud by a kind of transformation similar to that which took place at Cana when Jesus made wine out of water. Quite another character, and yet not without a certain air de famille, show the Libri Sententiarum by Petrus Lombardus, the true representative of mediæval scholasticism. Every trace of subjective mysticism, or of merely individual conviction, has disappeared: the foundation of the whole building is the tradition of the Church; and the great problem is, by means of the huge engine of the Aristotelian logic, to bring all the various elements of the tradition into harmony with each other. It is principally Augustine, Beda, Alcuin, and Hugo of St. Victor, from whom Petrus Lombardus draws in his exposition of the dogma of creation. Augustine's view of a simultaneous creation of the whole world in one instant he mentions, praises, and then cautiously drops as not conformable to the tradition of the Church. The works of the later schoolmen consist, with regard to the dogma of creation, to a great extent, simply in commenting upon the sentences of Petrus Lombardus.

Contemporary with the Reformation, there opens a new era also in the history of natural science. The Spanish and Portuguese discoveries in the latter part of the fifteenth and the beginning of the sixteenth centuries completely changed the ruling view of the form of the earth: there were antipodes. As completely, Copernicus changed the ruling view of the position of the earth in the universe: the system was heliocentric. The old idea of the earth as a flat disk covered with a semicircular expanse of crystal, on which the sun and the moon and the stars were moving, had to give way; and in the seventeenth century it began to provoke a smile. But however great the change was, it seems not to have affected the truly religious people in any great degree. Luther, though utterly averse to the Copernican system, wrote his great commentary on Genesis, and Calvin wrote his, without coming into any conflict with natural science. Indeed, the enemy which the new science of nature had to encounter was not the Church as such, still less the Church in the nobler and truer sense of the word, but the old science of nature, the Aristotelian influence, the scholasticism which had made itself a part of the Church, and thereby had come into possession of a great power. In all the bitter attacks which were made upon the new science of nature, it was not the Church which struck the blows, but the old science of nature; and it could strike with so much the more effect as it had succeeded in making people believe that its case was also the case of the Church. This was a mistake, however. There was no real antagonism between the tendencies and results of the new science and the true doctrines of the Church. On the contrary, the only influence which the revival of the study of nature in the period of the Reformation can be said to have had on the expositions of the dogma of creation is, that the commentators began to keep more closely to the words of the biblical narrative, and to avoid more carefully any trace of allegorization. But there came a time when natural science felt called upon to construct a doctrine of creation; and from that moment, the middle of the eighteenth century, until our time, a more or less noisy controversy has gone on between the orthodox party of the Church and the radical students of natural philosophy.

It was, in the beginning, chiefly from the science of geology that the arguments against the biblical representation were drawn. Evidences derived from the most authentic document (the earth itself), and by the most infallible method (scientific observation), were marched up to show, that, instead, of a creation in six days, there was, indeed, a progressive development through huge periods. The scriptural narrative was ridiculed as childish; and captious questions were put to those who still adhered to its very letters. These attacks from the geologists were met on one side with great coolness. "When God made the rocks," there was answered, "he also made the fossils embedded in them." Especially the English literature is rich in instances of people obstinately refusing to acknowledge that geological evidences have or can have any bearing on the correctness of the biblical representation of creation. See HENRY COLE: Popular Geology subversive of Divine Revelation; GEORGE YOUNG: Geology of Scripture; PETER MACFARLANE: Exposure of the Principles of Modern Geology, etc.,—all from the third decade of the present century. On the other side it was urged that the geological evidences contradicted only the exterior form of the biblical view, its æsthetical costume, not its inner religious idea; and, on the basis of this vague and yielding proposition, the biblical narrative was represented and treated as a kind of poetry, as a myth. Various developed instances of this method are frequent in German literature: Schleiermacher, Paulus, Strauss, Marheinecke, Bretschneider, etc. Meanwhile attempts were also made to reconcile the two antagonists, and that in a double way,—first by the theory of restitution, then by direct harmonizing. The former method, the theory of restitution, tries to accomplish the reconciliation by placing the geological periods as a development of chaos independent of, though sometimes co-ordinate with, the creation, and was adopted both by the rationalists, Rosenmüller, Michaelis, etc., and the theosophists of Schelling's school, Martin, Baader, etc. The direct harmonization was first tried by Cuvier, but further developed by Buckland and Lyell, and found its completion in HUGH MILLER: Footprints of the Creator (1852). But, shortly after, the whole question received a new point by the appearance of DARWIN'S Origin of Species, and the rise of the theory of evolution,—a phase of the question which is still under treatment. See EVOLUTION.

LIT.—ZÖCKLER: Theologie und Naturwissenschaft, Gütersloh, 1877-79, 2 vols., a very elaborate representation of the historical development of the whole question, from which the above article is derived.

CREATIONISM denotes one of the three theories of the origin of the human spirit: traducianism and pre-existence are the two others. In his commentary on the Canticles, Origen describes these theories thus: "The question is, first, whether the human spirit is created, or has existed from the beginning (pre-existence); next, if created, whether it was created once for all, and connected in such a way with the body as to be propagated, along with it, by natural generation (traducianism), or whether it is created successively, and, in each individual case, added from without, in order to vivify the body forming in the womb (creationism)."

The first of these theories (pre-existence) originated with Plato. He taught that all human souls had existed from the very beginning, though only in the realm of potentiality. Still and silent they sleep there, until they, one by one, through the birth of a child, enter into the realm of actuality. Origen adopted this theory, and introduced it into Christian theology. It was widely accepted throughout the Eastern Church. The christological development, however, after the Council of Nicæa, made the view almost untenable; for when two natures are assumed in Christ, a divine and a human, what can be the relation in the pre-existence between his divine and his human spirit? The final condemnation of Origen, under Justinian, threw a still deeper shadow over his ideas. Yet the theory of the pre-existence of the soul was still held by the last of the fathers, Maximus, and by the first of the schoolmen, John Scotus Erigena; and it has recently been revived within the new-rationalistic school of theology in Sweden. Its able and eloquent champion, Viktor Rydberg, protests that it forms the basis of the whole psychology, morals, and eschatology of the New Testament. Julius Müller, in his great work on the Doctrine of Sin, defends the pre-existence in order to explain the problem of hereditary guilt. Dr. Edward Beecher, in his Conflict of Ages, advocated the same view in America. But the origin of sin is thus only put back to prehistoric times, not explained.

In the Western Church traducianism was for some time the prevailing view. It was first taught by Tertullian, who, from the palpable unity of the human race, and the easily observed propagation per traducem of qualities and propensities, not to say of virtues and vices, from parents to children, inferred that the human soul, once created in Adam, naturally propagated itself along with the body by generation. But this theory, which corresponds so well with the peculiar materialism of Tertullian, — he protests that every thing real must have a body, and he consequently ascribes materiality, not only to the soul, but also to God (De Anima, chap. 9). — was unable to satisfy the deepest religious instincts of mankind; and, as the theory of the pre-existence of the soul had become untenable, on account of the above-mentioned christological difficulties, creationism gradually developed, and came, though without any formal or official declaration, to be considered the orthodox view, both in the Eastern and in the Western Church. During the Pelagian controversy the question was much debated; but Augustine refrained from giving any definite answer. He accepted the premises of traducianism, the unity of the human race, and the transmission of qualities and propensities by inheritance; but he rejected the conclusion, the materiality of the soul, and led the way to the new theory, which confined the propagation by generation to the material sphere (to the body), and assumed a concursum divinum, a new creation, at the origin of each new individual. With Jerome and Leo the Great the theory is almost complete; and with the schoolmen, Anselm, Peter Lombard, Thomas Aquinas, and others, it forms a conspicuous part of the whole theological system. Dr. Charles Hodge thus states the arguments for it: 1. It is more consistent with the prevailing representations of the Scriptures, which is that the spirit comes directly from God; 2. It is also most consistent with the nature of the soul, which is indivisible; 3. It explains the freedom of Christ's soul from sin, although he was conceived and born of a woman. Theology, ii. pp. 70-72. On the other hand, traducianism most easily explains the problem of hereditary sin, and has been adopted by all the orthodox Lutheran divines. See LUTHARDT: Kompendium der Dogmatik, p. 107.

Each of the three theories represents an element of truth, — the theory of pre-existence, the ideal pre-existence of man in the divine mind; creationism, God's agency in the origin of each human soul; traducianism, the parental agency. But it is well to remember the word of Augustine on this difficult subject: "Non sum ausus aliquid definire, quia fateor me nescire" ("I do not venture to define a matter of which I must confess myself to be ignorant").

CREDENCE TABLE, a table or shelf on which the sacramental bread and wine were put before their consecration.

CREDNER, Karl August, b. at Waltershausen, near Gotha, Jan. 10, 1797; studied at Jena, Breslau, and Göttingen; lived for several years as a tutor (1821-27), and was appointed professor of exegesis at Jena (in 1828) and (in 1832) at Giessen, where he died in the summer of 1857. He belonged to the rationalistic school of theology, and his rationalism became more and more conspicuous in his works as he grew older. Nevertheless, his labors as a biblical critic, especially his investigations of the origin of the books of the New Testament and of the history of its canon, are valuable, not only on account of their richness of information, but also on account of the clearness and objectivity of the representation. His principal works are, Beiträge zur Einleitung in die biblischen Schriften (I. 1832, II. 1838), Einleitung in's Neue Testament (1836, generally considered his chief work, but unfinished), Zur Geschichte des Kanons (Halle, 1847), and Geschichte des neutestamentlichen Kanon, edited after his death by Volkmar, Berlin, 1860. CREED. A creed is a confession of faith for public use. It may be of any length, and in any form. It may merely state the essentials of belief, or the entire body of doctrine. It may be written or oral, secret or published. It must, however, be authoritative, — the recognized tenets of the body from which it issues. It may be professedly limited in its constituency, or lay down the law for the world.

Creeds never precede faith, but presuppose it. They emanate from the inner life of the Church, independently of external occasion. They would have existed, even if there had been no doctrinal controversies. They are the pulses of the spiritual life. They are, indeed, not the foundations of the Church; but they are, in a sense, the cement which unites the stones of the building.

The Church has only one foundation, which is Christ, but many builders: hence her creeds are many and different. The lack of agreement is rather in detail than in cardinal truth: so, if there is a dissensus, there is also a consensus; and by both the Church manifests her corporate and individual life.

A creed may proceed from the general life of the Church in a particular age without any individual authorship (as the Apostles' Creed), or from an œcumenical council (the Nicene Creed), or from the synod of a particular church (the Decrees of the Synod of Dort), or from a number of divines commissioned for the purpose by ecclesiastical authority (the Thirty-Nine Articles of the Church of England), or from one individual, who acts in this case as the organ of his church or sect (the Augsburg Confession and Apology, composed by Melancthon), the creeds of Congregational and Baptist churches, drawn up by the pastor. What gives it binding force is the formal sanction or tacit acquiescence of the body it represents. In the Protestant system the creed is not co-ordinate with, but always subordinate to, the Bible; for in the best case it is only an approximate and relatively correct exposition of revealed truth. It follows, therefore, that the creed not only may be, but should be, improved when the Church's increased knowledge from the Bible and Christian experience demands it. The creed is the answer of man to the word of God. He should be willing to give a better answer if he can. The creed and the Bible are related as stream and fountain. The authority of the latter is divine and absolute: that of the former is human and relative. The Bible regulates the general religious belief and practice of the laity as well as the clergy: the creed regulates the public teaching of the officers of the Church, just as constitutions and canons regulate her government; liturgies and hymn-books, her worship. Any higher view of the authority of symbols is unprotestant and essentially Romanizing; for the Greek and Roman churches regard the Bible and tradition as two co-ordinate sources of truth and rules of faith, and claim absolute and infallible authority for their confessions of faith.

To the question, Of what use are creeds? the answer may be made, that, when they are put in due subordination to the Bible, they are of great use as summaries of the Bible doctrines, aids to their sound understanding, bonds of union among their professors, public standards, and guards against false doctrine and practice. In the form of catechisms they are of especial use in the instruction of children and in the systematic up-building of the believer in the faith. — Numerous and by no means contemptible are the objections to creeds. They are said to impede the study of the Bible, to interfere with the liberty of conscience and the right of private judgment, to produce hypocrisy, intolerance, bigotry, and so, by way of re-action, dissent, dogmatic indifference, and infidelity. But these objections apply particularly to the creeds of state churches, and also, in a modified degree, to those of denominations, if they are supposed to have been written under any special divine guidance. But because creeds are objected to is no good reason for rejecting them. The benefits claimed for them can be obtained in no other way; and it is hard to see any valid objection to a plain and full statement of belief, provided it is a real belief. What has done most to bring creeds into disrepute has been the notorious discrepancy between the actual belief of a particular church and the creed printed in its standards. A church whose clergy do not believe the creed they profess to believe has a plain duty before it, — to make a creed which shall express their belief.

The creeds of Christendom may be divided into four classes, — the œcumenical, and those of the three main divisions of the Church, the Greek, Latin, and Evangelical. The first are concerned chiefly with theology proper and christology: they are the Apostles', Nicene, Chalcedon, and Athanasian. The second class embrace those setting forth the distinctive faith of the Greek Church, particularly in distinction to Rome, which so long and so cunningly tried to subjugate her: hence their distinguishing elements concern the doctrine of the Procession of the Holy Spirit and the Papacy. The third class are the Roman creeds, from the Council of Trent (1543-63) to the Council of the Vatican (1870). The fourth class, the Evangelical, are the most numerous, and are subdivided into Lutheran and Reformed. These agree almost entirely in their principal tenets, but differ in their doctrines of divine decrees and of the nature and efficacy of the sacraments, especially the mode of Christ's presence in the Lord's Supper. They date mainly from before 1650. — See SCHAFF, Creeds of Christendom (3 vols.), for further information and abundant literature.

CRÉSPIN, Jean, b. at Arras; studied law at Louvain, and began to practise as an advocate in Paris, but embraced Protestantism, and fled in 1548 to Geneva, where he established a printing-house; was made a citizen in 1555; and d. 1572. Like many other celebrated printers he was himself an author, and wrote, besides other books, L'Etat de l'Eglise (Geneva, 1562) and Histoire des Martyrs (Geneva, 1554), giving the history of the martyrs of the sixteenth century. The latter became a very famous book, was translated into Latin by Claude Baduel, and repeatedly reprinted with additions, 1570, 1619, etc. The first-mentioned was translated into English, The Estate of the Church, London, 1602.

CRIMINAL, Hebrew. See COURT AND LEGAL PROCEEDINGS AMONG THE HEBREWS.

CRISP, Tobias, b. in London, 1600; d. there Feb. 27, 1643. He took his doctor's degree at Balliol College, Oxford. He was the leader of the Antinomians, although personally an amiable and benevolent Christian. His closing years were ruffled by controversy. After his death fourteen of his sermons were published under the title, Christ Alone Exalted, London, 1643, 4th ed., with Memoirs and Notes, 1791; Christ made Sin, 1691; new ed. by Dr. Gill, 1832, 2 vols. 8vo.

CRISPINUS and CRISPINIANUS, two brothers of a distinguished Roman family; left Rome in the beginning of the reign of Diocletian, and went to Gaul to labor for the conversion of the Pagans. They settled at Soissons, and maintained themselves, after the example of Paul, by the works of their hands: they were shoemakers.

In their missionary labor they seem to have been very successful until they were martyred by the Emperor Maximilianus. They are commemorated by the Roman Church on Oct. 25, and venerated as the patron saints of the shoemakers. See BUTLER: Lives of the Saints, II. pp. 210-212.

CRITICI SACRI, a thesaurus of Bible antiquities and exegesis produced by combining the labors of many of the best English and Continental scholars of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. It was undertaken and published by Cornelius Bee (London, 1660, 9 vols. folio), a London bookseller, as an appendage to Walton's Polyglot, under the direction of Bishop Pearson, John Pearson, Anthony Scattergood, and Francis Gouldman. It was reprinted at Frankfort, under the care of Gurtler, in 1695, 7 vols. Best edition, Critici Sacri, sive annotata doctissimorum virorum in Vetus ac Novum Testamentum, quibus accedunt tractatus varii theologico-philologici (9 vols.), Et Thesaurus theologico-philologicus, et Thesaurus Novus (4 vols.), in all 13 vols., Amsterdam, 1698-1732. CROCIUS, Johann, b. at Laasphe, in Hesse, July 28, 1590; d. at Marburg, July 1, 1659; stood for many years at the head of the Church of Hesse-Cassel, which occupied a distinct position between the Confessio Augustana and Calvinism. After studying at Herborn and Marburg, he became court-preacher at Cassel in 1612, and in 1617 first professor of theology at Marburg. But in 1624 the Duke of Hesse-Darmstadt, by the aid of Tilly's soldiers, expelled the Reformed, or, as they called themselves, Evangelical, professors, from Marburg; and Crocius retired to Cassel, where he resided till after the Peace of Westphalia. Those of his writings in which his religious stand-point is best defined are Commentarius de August. Confess. (Cassel, 1647), Illustratio Dissertationis Osnabrügensis (Cassel, 1647), De Ecclesie Unitate et Schismate (Cassel, 1650). The most remarkable of his polemical writings are Anti-Becanus (1643) and Anti-Weigelius (1651).

CROMWELL, Oliver, Lord-Protector of the Commonwealth of England, b. at Huntingdon, April 25, 1599; d. at Whitehall, Sept. 3, 1658. He studied for a year at Cambridge University (1616-17), but left it on the death of his father, and applied himself to law. In 1620 he married, and settled down on his patrimonial estate. In 1628 he represented Huntingdon in Parliament, and in 1640 Cambridge in the famous Long Parliament. His sturdy independence was shown by his vigorous opposition to the royal interference in the drainage of the Bedford fens, which won him the sobriquet "Lord of the Fens." When in 1642 war between King and Parliament broke out, Cromwell raised a company of volunteers to help the people's side. He perceived that the strength of his cause lay rather in its righteousness than in the military skill and training of his troops; and the more generally the latter believed in this fact, the more invincible would they be. Accordingly he gathered around him a thousand men, selected on this principle; and his regiment, the famous "Ironsides," who went into battle singing psalms, justified his wisdom, for it was never beaten. During the memorable struggle between the Cavaliers and Roundheads, Cromwell was the most prominent figure; and although, at the beginning, he knew nothing of tactics, he developed so much skill that he defeated the royalists on the hard-fought fields of Marston Moor (July 2, 1644), Naseby (June 14, 1645), and Preston (Aug. 17, 1648). He was a member of the High Court of Justice which tried Charles I., and as such signed the warrant for his execution, Jan. 29, 1649. In August, 1649, he was nominated lord-lieutenant and commander-in-chief in Ireland, and by a strong hand put down opposition. The Scotch Presbyterian advocacy of the royalist side—for Prince Charles had signed the Covenant, and captivated the national heart—led to his recall. Being made captain-general of all the forces of the Commonwealth, June 26, 1650, he marched into Scotland, and was completely successful, by trusting in God, and keeping his powder dry. The victories of Dunbar (Sept. 3, 1650), of Edinburgh (Dec. 19, 1650), of Perth (Aug. 2, 1651), put the country under him. The battle of Worcester, Eng. (Sept. 3, 1651), ended the war. Cromwell returned to London, and took up his residence at Hampton Court, Oct. 12, 1651; dissolved Parliament (which had become a mere "Rump," and so it was appropriately called) April 20, 1653; formed a Council of State April 30; summoned the Little (Barebone's) Parliament, which lasted from July 4 to Dec. 12; became Lord-Protector Dec. 16; and was solemnly installed in Westminster Hall. "He showed himself equal to the hard task he had undertaken, by sharp, decisive means keeping down plotting royalists, jealous Presbyterians, and intractable levellers, and by a bold and magnanimous foreign policy making England greater and more honored than ever. He interfered for the protection of the Vaudois Protestants, cruelly persecuted by the Duke of Savoy, and had a large sum (£37,097) raised for their relief." He also informed the Pope that he would take the first opportunity to send a fleet into the Mediterranean to visit Civita Vecchia, and so the sound of his cannon should be heard in Rome itself. He had to rule mostly without parliaments, since they gave him so much trouble. The one before the last offered him the title of "king;" and he was disposed at first to accept it, but finally declined it (May 8, 1657), and was again installed in the Protectorate with greater solemnities and added power.

At length the weight of cares and domestic afflictions broke down even his strength; and Friday, Sept. 3, 1658, the anniversary of so many triumphs, he won his greatest victory, that over death and the grave. He was interred in Henry VII. Chapel, at Westminster, with unheard-of funeral pomp, Nov. 23, 1658; but on June 30, 1661, by order of Charles II., his remains were exhumed, beheaded, and burnt at Tyburn.

One of the most remarkable reversals of historical judgments in modern times is in relation to Cromwell. By the simple presentation of Cromwell's letters and speeches in chronological order, with sufficient explanatory matter to render them intelligible, Thomas Carlyle produced this change in popular sentiment. From being calumniated, Cromwell was praised. The old epithets "regicide," "usurper," "tyrant," "fanatic," "bigot," "hypocrite," were exchanged for those of "statesman," "patriot," "wise, just, and religious ruler." The latter epithets express the truth about this man, who was not only the greatest Englishman, but the greatest man, of his age, and who deserves the reverence of all time. Possessed for a long period of absolute authority, he used it moderately. Living with narrow-minded, persecuting Puritans, he cherished lenient sentiments, and promoted religious liberty. Belonging to the Puritan party, he spoke in Bible language, as they did, and held as tenaciously to their sombre but profound theology; but in many respects he was unlike them, and was far too great to be sectarian. His prediction has been fulfilled: "I know God has been above all ill reports, and will in his own time vindicate me."

CROSIER, or CROZIER, the pastoral staff of the bishop, the emblem of his office as shepherd of the flock of God, the symbol of his right to rule the flock, and his duty to support it. It is borne before him when he appears officially, though not outside the territory over which he exercises jurisdiction. The crosier of the bishop terminates in a hook, that of the archbishop in a floriated cross, that of a patriarch in a cross with two, and that of the Pope in a cross with three, transverse bars. The emblem, however, does not seem to be of Christian origin. The staff has always been the emblem of the office of the king, the judge, and the priest; and on old bas-reliefs the Roman augur is represented with a hooked staff in his hand, very similar to the bishop's crosier.

CROSS. The Cross as a Sign and a Symbol.—The cross has been used everywhere and through all times as a means of marking and adorning. Among Pagan tribes, both in the Old and in the New World, it occurs under every possible form, as representative of natural forces, or accessory to idols; and after the crucifixion of Christ it became the true symbol of Christianity. The custom of making the sign of the cross with the hand or the finger, as a means of conferring blessing, or preserving from evil, is very old. Basil the Great refers it back to the apostles. Cyprian (De Unit. Eccl.) and the Apostolical Constitutions (III. 17) mention the signum Christi as a part of the baptismal rite; and Lactantius (Inst. Div., IV. 27) speaks of it as especially fearful to the demons by the baptismal exorcism. Prudentius (Hymn. 6) advises to apply it every night, before sleeping, to the forehead and the breast, as a preservative against temptations and bad dreams. In the Western Church it was made with the thumb, in the Eastern with the first finger, among the Armenians and the Raskolnik with the index and the middle finger. In the fifth century it became customary to apply the sign at the beginning of treaties, diplomatical notes, etc., instead of an invocation of the name of God, and at the end, beside the name of the signer, as a token of trustworthiness. Ecclesiastics always used it in this way. The Greek emperor used to put a red cross before his name when signing; the Byzantine princes, a green; the English kings, a golden. In the Lutheran Church the custom of making the sign of the cross was continued: in the French Reformed and most Calvinistic churches it was abandoned as not warranted by Scripture, and as superstitious.

The sign made with the hand or the finger was the crux usualis: the cross actually executed in some kind of material was the crux exemplata. According to a passage in TERTULLIAN (Apologet. 16), cruces exemplatae, made of wood, and painted, must have occurred even at his time; and Chrysostom, in his homily on the divinity of Christ, speaks of them as found everywhere,—in the houses, market-places, deserts, along the roads, on the hills, on bedsteads, arms, utensils, etc. In the fifth century they first appear on the tombs.

The anchor , the Buddhist Soastika symbol  and the monogram of Christ, which can be traced back to the third or even to the second century, were not cruces dissimulatee, but independent symbols occurring along with the crosses. The first actual representation of the cross dates from the second half of the fourth century. When Constantine adopted the cross in the labarum, and afterwards had himself represented as the victor, with the cross over his forehead, the start was made; and soon crosses were seen on helmets, bucklers, and standards, on crowns and sceptres, on coins and seals, etc. Their principal application, however, they found in the church-buildings, and in certain parts of the worship. In the procession the cross was the chief object; and the most important feature in the consecration of a church-building was the planting of the cross. At the time of the crusades the cross became the ground-plan of the whole church-construction, and at the same time it rose prodigiously in popular reverence and enthusiasm by being the Christian banner over against the crescent.

Thus variously employed, the cross assumed various forms; and the staurologia, from σταυρός, "a cross," became a special part of heraldry. Of these forms the principal are: I. The crux decussata,

, afterwards called the Burgundina cross, or the cross of St. Andrew, because the apostle Andrew is said to have suffered death on it; II. The crux commissa, , in the form of the Greek letter Tau, was the cross on which the apostle Philip died, and is also called the Egyptian cross, or the cross of St. Anthony, because by that St. Anthony is said to have stayed the plague, and destroyed the idols of Egypt;

III. The crux immissa or crux ordinaria, , the Latin cross, on which, according to general acception, Christ suffered; IV. The Greek cross,

, consisting of four equally long arms; V.

The cross of St. Peter, or the inverted Latin cross, on which the apostle Peter suffered, he holding himself unworthy to suffer in exactly the same manner as Christ; VI. The double cross, , whose upper bar refers to the inscription by Pilate on the cross of Christ; VII. The triple cross, , of which the first form is used by the Pope, the second by the Raskolniks. The lowest bar in the first form has no particular meaning; in the second it refers to the lignum suppedaneum.

The Cross as an Instrument of Death; Crucifixion; the Cross of Christ.—The cross which was used as an instrument of death, σταυρός, ακόλου, σάβις (crux, stipes), occurs under a double form: as a plain vertical stake to which the convict was tied or nailed, with the hands above the head; or as a vertical stake provided with a cross-bar (patibulum), to which the convict was fastened in the same way, but with the arms outstretched. The cross of St. Andrew is an invention of mediæval legends. The New Testament gives no decisive indications with respect to the form of the cross on which Christ suffered; but it is impossible that a correct tradition should not have been formed on this point, and it is the Latin cross, the crux immissa or ordinaria, which is spoken of by JUSTIN: Dial. c. Tryph., 91, and Apol., 1, 55; IRENÆUS: Adv. Hæc., II. 24, 4; TERTULLIAN: Adv. Jud., 10; FORMICUS MATERNUS: De Errore Profan. Relig., 21. The vertical stake was a little above the ordinary height of a man (APULEJUS: De Asino Aur., III. 17; CATUL.: Epigr., 107). Sometimes, however, it was considerably higher (SUETONIUS, Galba, 9), and it was so in the case of Christ (John xix. 29). To the stake was fastened a kind of saddle (sedile) for the support of the body; and Justin, Irenæus, and Tertullian speak of such a device in connection with the cross of Christ. The hypopodium, on the contrary, or suppedaneum, which formed a similar support for the feet, and which is well known from all mediæval representations of the crucifixion, is first mentioned by GREGORY OF TOURS, De Gloria Martyr., 1, 6, and is historically not well warranted.

Crucifixion as a punishment of death was common among the old Indians, Assyrians, Persians, Scythians, Egyptians, Phœnicians, Carthaginians, and even among the Greeks and Macedonians. After the conquest of Tyrus, Alexander the Great ordered two thousand Tyrians to be crucified as a punishment for the resistance which the city had made. The Israelites used to crucify those who had been decapitated or stoned, as a further aggravation of the punishment. The Romans learned crucifixion from the Carthaginians; but among them it always remained a supplicium servile (HOR.: Sat., I. 3, 80–83; CIC.: In Verrem, V. 66), applied only to slaves or to the meanest criminals, such as highway robbers, assassins, and rebels. Tiberius ordered the priests at the Temple of Isis to be crucified, because by fraud they had induced a distinguished Roman lady, Paulina, to surrender herself to the lust of a certain Menedas (JOSEPHUS: Arch. 18; 3, 4). After the conquest of Jerusalem, Titus could not find place enough for the crosses, and not crosses enough for the Jews he wanted to punish (JOSEPHUS: Bell. Jud., V. 11, 1). In the oldest times the execution was performed by soldiers, commanded by a centurion or tribune on horseback (TACITUS: Ann., 3, 14; SENECA: De Ira, 1, 16), afterwards by specially appointed persons, apparitores, belonging to the retinue of the procurator provinciae.

The execution generally took place just outside the city, beside the most frequented road (QUINTILIAN: Decl., 274; CICERO: In Verrem, V. 66; TACITUS: Ann., 15, 44; LIVIUS VIII., 15), and was preceded by a scourging, performed either in the prætorium, or on the way to the place of execution (JOSEPHUS: Bell. Jud., 5, 11; LIVIUS, 33, 36; CURTIUS, 7, 11, 28). The victim carried the cross himself, that is, the cross-bar (patibulum); and, when the soldiers compelled Simon of Cyrene to carry the cross of Christ, it was simply a coarse joke. Having arrived at the place of execution, the victim was stripped naked, and nailed, with the arms outstretched, to the cross-bar, which then was hauled up, and fastened to the stake. At the same time the body was brought in position on the sedile, and finally the feet were nailed to the stake. The scarf around the loins, and the crown of thorns, found in all Christian representations of Christ crucified, are additions of the imagination; and the representations of the mediæval German painters—Christ being nailed to the cross while the cross is still lying on the ground—are wrong. According to Cyprian, Gregory of Tours, and old Christian art, a nail was driven through each foot: according to Gregory Nazianzen, Nonnus, and modern Christian art, the feet are placed crosswise, and one nail driven through them both. The administration of a somniferous potion was a Jewish custom. The punishment of crucifixion was abolished by Constantine the Great.

The Invention and the Raising of the Cross.—In 526 the Emperor Constantine determined to build a church on Golgotha; and his mother Helena, who was staying at that time in Jerusalem, tried, together with Bishop Macarius, to make out the exact spot on which the cross of Christ had stood. Two centuries before, however, the Emperor Adrian had made the place of the crucifixion completely unrecognizable: the sacred tomb had been filled up, and a temple in honor of Jupiter and Venus erected over it. Nevertheless, by extensive excavations the rock-tomb was found; and close by were discovered the three crosses, together with the nails which had been used at the execution, and the tablet with Pilate's inscription. The question now arose, which of the three crosses was that of Christ. There was one of them to which the tablet fitted best; but more decisive testimony was necessary, and Macarius knew how to produce it. A distinguished lady of Jerusalem was sick unto death. She was brought to the place, and made to touch the three crosses. The empress and a great number of spectators were present. She touched the two first crosses without any effect at all, but hardly had she laid her hand on the third before she rose from her couch perfectly cured, healthy and strong. Eusebius, who was contemporary with these events, does not seem to have known them; but half a century later they were generally known and accepted. The miracles, however, did not end with the "invention" of the cross. One part of it, together with the nails, the empress sent to her son; but the larger part was framed in silver, and intrusted to Macarius to be preserved in the principal church of Jerusalem. Chips of this cross were presented to distinguished persons; after a while they were sold, and very soon an enormous trade in chips of the genuine cross sprang up. Everybody wanted them. They were incased in silver and gold, and worn as amulets around the neck. But the great marvel was, that, though cartloads of such chips were shaved from the cross, the bulk of the cross itself was not thereby diminished.

In 615 Jerusalem was taken and burnt by the Persian King, Chosroes II., and thousands of its inhabitants were killed, or carried away in captivity. Before the catastrophe, the Patriarch Zacharias had hidden the holy cross in a sealed box; but the box was discovered, and carried away among the other spoil. But in 628 a reverse of fortune took place. Siroes, the son of Chosroes II., was defeated by the Emperor Heraclius; and one of the conditions of peace was the return of the holy cross. The box was restored with the seal unbroken; and in 631 the cross was brought back to Jerusalem by the emperor himself. He carried it on his back up the Golgotha, and there it was again "raised" in its old place in the Church of the Holy Sepulchre. In commemoration of this event a festum exaltationis crucis was instituted, just as a festum inventionis crucis had been instituted in commemoration of the discovery of the cross. The former of these festivals is celebrated on Sept. 14, and enjoys great reputation in the Eastern Church. In the Western Church it was introduced by Honorius I.

The Crucifix, and Pictorial Representations of the Crucifixion. An artistic representation of Christ crucified was something utterly foreign to the primitive church: it sufficed to have him represented to the mind's eye through the apostolic word. And when, in course of time, the artistic instinct began to approach the subjects of sacred history, it preferred the idea of Christ as the good shepherd who gives his life for the rescue of his flock, to that of Christ as the high priest of the human race, sacrificing himself for the sins of the world. It did so, led on by the peculiarly joy and cheerful traditions of all antique art, and naturally repelled by the horrors of the actual crucifixion; and in doing so it was undoubtedly in harmony with the spiritual character of an age whose rest and joy and comfort was Christ resurrected, not Christ crucified. The earliest representation of the crucifixion consisted of the cross plain and simple and alone; then followed a symbolical expansion, — the cross and the lamb, the cross leaning against the shoulder of the lamb, or the lamb fastened upon the cross; then the figure of Christ brought in some external connection with the cross, — Christ as teacher, holding the cross in his right hand on the sarcophagus of Probus (d. 395), or Christ as teacher, with the cross in the background in the Church of St. Pudentiana, built in 398: but Christ nailed to the cross is not represented until about the middle of the fifth century. The bronze relief in the Church of St. Sabina in Rome, founded in 430, seems to be the very earliest representation of the kind: the ivory relief in the British Museum dates, probably, from the same time. In 600 the Monk Anastasius Sinaita painted in his Ὁμολογία a picture of Christ crucified, with the head surrounded by a glory, and heavily inclining to the one side, with the hair parted in the middle of the forehead, and the beard forked, with the blood dripping from the wounds of the hands, with the feet nailed separately to the hypopodium, with the whole body wrung by agony, etc.; and that picture became the typical representation from which the painters of the Eastern Church never deviated. In the Western Church the representations were much more various, and of an opposite type: not the suffering Son of God, but the lord of life defeating death; was the idea. The expression of pain was idealized or abandoned altogether: Christ appeared with a crown on his head, and clad in a purple robe. During the controversies between the Eastern and Western churches, Cardinal Humbert reproached the Eastern painters that they represented Christ as a dying man; while the Patriarch Cärolarius reproached the Western painters that they represented him as a fancy king. In the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, however, the Byzantine type began to exercise influence on Western Europe; and, after Giotto, a more healthy realism gained ascendancy. In the crucifix, too, a similar difference of type was recognizable; but in the Eastern Church the crucifix disappeared during the iconoclastic controversies. In the Western Church the crucifix was very frequently met with, not only in the churches, as an object of public devotion, but also and especially in the houses, as an object of private devotion.

CRUCIGER, Kaspar, the trusty but modest and quiet collaborator of Luther; was born at Leipzig, Jan. 1, 1504, and died at Wittenberg, Nov. 16, 1548. In 1521 he removed with his parents to Wittenberg, where he studied theology under Luther and Melancthon, also medicine, natural history, and the Hebrew language. From 1524 till 1528 he was rector of the Johannes School in Magdeburg, but returned in the latter year to Wittenberg as preacher and professor; aided Luther in the translation of the Bible, and partook, mostly as secretary, in the numerous disputations of the day. He was an expert in short-hand writing, and thus preserved many of Luther's sermons and lectures. Some of his letters and orations are found in Corpus Reformatorum XI., XII.

CRUDEN, Alexander, the author of the Concordance; b. at Aberdeen, May 31, 1701; d. in London, Nov. 1, 1770. He was graduated at Mareschal College, Aberdeen; took the degree of M.A., and was about to be licensed, when suddenly he first revealed that lunacy from which he suffered in a greater or less degree all his life. From 1722 to 1732 he taught; but at the latter date he settled in London as bookseller, and corrector of the press, and eventually became bookseller to the queen. In 1737 he issued his immortal work, A Complete Concordance of the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments (4to), dedicated to Queen Caroline. His means having been exhausted by the printing of his book, he was obliged to sell his stock in trade. This step naturally produced a return of his malady. He was confined in a private asylum, but escaped. He then issued (March, 1739) The London Citizen Exceeding Injured; giving an account of his severe and long campaign at Bethnal Green for nine weeks and six days; the Citizen being sent there in March, 1738, by Robert Wightman, a notoriously conceited, whimsical man; where he was chained, handcuffed, strait-waistcoated, and imprisoned; with a history of Wightman's Blind Bench, a sort of court that met at Wightman's room, and unaccountably proceeded to pass decrees in relation to the London Citizen, etc., and instituted legal proceedings against Wightman, the proprietor of the asylum, and Dr. Munro the physician. He pleaded his own cause, it is needless to add, unsuccessfully, yet had a report of the trial printed, and dedicated to the king, George II. He resumed his occupation of corrector of the press; and, with the exception of a few days in 1753, he was not again in confinement. His unbalanced mind led him to do very odd things. He thought himself called to be the public censor; assumed the title "Alexander the Corrector," and tried to reform public manners, especially in regard to keeping Sunday. He also habitually carried a sponge, with which he effaced all inscriptions that were of an immoral tendency, according to his notions. He appeared as parliamentary candidate of the city of London, applied for knighthood, sought to marry a daughter of a lord-mayor of London; and, to further these and other wild schemes, he published extraordinary pamphlets. In 1761 he issued a new edition of his concordance, again in quarto; and the labor it cost him, in connection with his professional proof-reading for the Public Advertiser (a daily paper), had a most beneficent effect upon his health; so that thenceforth he was little troubled. In 1769 the third edition (4to) appeared. It is satisfactory to record, that, for the second, he received five hundred pounds, and for the third three hundred pounds more, beside twenty copies on fine paper. He was thus reimbursed for his early expenditure, and acquired a comfortable property. His Concordance was not a monetary speculation, but originated and was carried on in a sincere love for the Bible, and desire to promote its study. He prepared also an Account of the History and Excellency of the Holy Scriptures, a Scripture Dictionary (published posthumously at Aberdeen), the very elaborate verbal Index affixed to Bishop Newton's edition of Milton's Poetical Works, and an autobiography, under the title, Adventures of Alexander the Corrector.

Cruden was a most excellent man, kind-hearted, benevolent, fearless in the discharge of duty, a public-spirited citizen, and a humble, devout Christian. The definitions in his concordance, which are unhappily omitted in so many editions, are strongly Calvinistic; but he was no bigot. He was a member of Dr. Guyse's Church (Independent), and proved by a blameless life of enthusiastic, albeit eccentric philanthropy, how deeply interested he was in the cause of humanity, which is the cause of God. He was found dead upon his knees in the act of prayer.

See the well-written and copious Memoir of Mr. Alexander Cruden, by SAMUEL BLACKBURN, prefaced to the 10th London edition, 1824, reprinted by Dodd and Mead, New York.

CRUSADES. The conquest of Jerusalem by the Mohammedans, and the insults offered to the most sacred memories of the Christian world, roused such a feeling of shame and indignation throughout Christendom, but especially in Western Europe, that a series of wars, called crusades, from the cross which was worn by all participants as a badge, was undertaken for the purpose of reconquering Palestine. The chief motive power in this movement was at first pure religious enthusiasm, helped on, it may be, by the ample ecclesiastical indulgences and great social exemptions which were granted to all who took the cross; and the idea which precipitated whole nations like a rushing stream towards the Holy Land, no doubt continued to be the principal impulse in many a noble heart. But gradually the restless and adventurous spirit of the age, which, in this fight for the glory of God, found satisfaction for its coarsest cravings without any disturbance of its gross superstition, transformed the religious contest about the Holy Land into a romantic tournament between the Christian knight and the Moslem warrior; and finally political ambition and commercial greed degraded the whole undertaking into a mere means of intrigue, speculation, and fraud. The number of these wars is seven; but there were several minor expeditions, such as the premature rushing-wards under Peter the Hermit, the Children's Crusade, etc., which are not counted, because they miscarried at the very outset.

1. — The first crusade (1096-99) was led by Godfrey of Bouillon, Duke of Lorraine; Hugh of Vermandois, a brother of the king of France; Robert, Duke of Normandy, a son of William the Conqueror; Bohemund of Tarent; and Tancred of Hauteville, the son and the nephew of Robert Guiscard, etc. The powerful address of Urban II., delivered to an enormous audience at Clermont in November, 1095, and answered with an unanimous "God will it!" may be considered as the real starting-point of the first crusade. The organization of so huge an enterprise was, of course, slow and difficult. Aug. 15, 1096, was fixed as the day on which the armies should begin to move. But people could not wait. One swarm started in March under Peter the Hermit, another a little later under Walter the Penniless, a third under Gottschalck; but all these swarms, after committing horrible excesses and crimes, melted away under the resistance and punishment of the Magyars, the Slavs, and the Greeks. The regular armies, moving by sea and by land, united in Constantinople in the last days of 1096; and June 24, 1097, Nicæa was captured; but Antioch was not taken until June 3, 1098; and Jerusalem not until July 15, 1099. All the Jews in the city were burnt alive in the synagogue: all the infidels—some say seventy thousand—were massacred. Through the desolate streets the victors went in a procession to the Church of the Resurrection, singing their hymns, and wading in blood. Shortly after, the kingdom of Jerusalem was established, and Godfrey was made king. The sources to the history of the first crusade, reports by eyewitnesses and contemporaries (among which the Historia de Hierosolyma, by William of Tyre, is the most important), are collected in BONGARSUS: Gesta Dei per Francos, Hanover, 1611. See, also, MATTHEW OF EDESSA: Recit de la première croisade, trans. from the Armenian by Édouard Delaurier, Paris, 1850; H. SYBEL: Geschichte d. ersten Kreuzzuges, Leipzig, 1841, 2d ed., 1881; H. II.—The second crusade (1147) was caused by the conquest of Edessa by the Mohammedans, and their advance against Jerusalem. The religious enthusiasm of the West was rekindled. Eugene III. placed himself at the head of the movement; and Bernard of Clairveaux preached the crusade in France and Germany, promising certain victory, promising even that God would smite the hosts of the infidels by a miraculous interference. Two brilliant armies, led by Conrad III. of Germany and Lewis VII. of France, moved toward the East. But the Byzantine emperor was more afraid of the crusaders than of the Turks. He made peace secretly with them; and chiefly by his treachery the German army was wasted in the defiles of Asia Minor. The French army also suffered severely; and, when the remnants of the magnificent army joined King Baldwin III. before the walls of Damascus, famine, disease, dissensions, and the treachery of the Pallanes (the Christian inhabitants of the besieged city, descendants of the first crusaders), soon brought the whole undertaking to a sorry end. Consternation, anger, and despair filled the whole of Germany and France; and Bernard added what he could to the misery. He saved his fame as an inspired prophet by declaring the crusading armies unworthy of victory, and the defeat a divine punishment of their sins. See KUGLER: Geschichte des zweiten Kreuzzuges, Stuttgart, 1866.

III.—Oct. 3, 1187, Jerusalem was taken by Saladin, and Gregory VIII. preached a new crusade. Frederic Barbarossa of Germany, Philippe Auguste of France, and Richard I. (Cœur-de-Leon) of England, followed the summons; and all Christendom paid the Saladin tithe to support the undertaking. Frederic Barbarossa forced his way through Asia Minor, but was drowned in the Kalykadnus (July 10, 1190); and his army was much reduced when it reached Acre, led by his son, Frederic of Suabia. The French and English kings arrived by sea, splendidly equipped, and in full vigor; but the siege of the city was long, and cost, it is said, about three hundred thousand lives; and, immediately after its capture, Philippe Auguste returned to France. Richard continued the contest, but rather as if it were only a chivalresque tournament between himself and Saladin; and the result was very meagre,—permission for the Christian pilgrims to visit Jerusalem. He left the Holy Land in 1192; but on his journey back to England he was captured by Duke Leopold of Austria, and sold to the emperor, Henry VI., who, to the great scandal of the whole Christian world, made a good bargain by exacting an immense ransom. IV.—How the spirit from which the crusades originated had changed in the course of little over a century, became sadly apparent when Innocent III. preached the fourth crusade (1203). A number of the most distinguished noblemen—Thibaut of Champagne, Simon of Montfort, Baldwin of Flanders, etc.—assembled at Venice with about twenty thousand combatants. But Venice demanded eighty-five thousand marks silver for the transfer of the crusaders to the Holy Land; and, as they were unable to pay this sum in cash, they went first to Dalmatia, where they conquered Zare for Venice, and then to Constantinople, which they also conquered (April 12, 1204), and where they established a Latin Empire under Baldwin of Flanders. To the Holy Land they never went. The Pope felt shocked, and summoned a new crusade. He was answered by the children. In France arose a movement in 1212 which even the government was not able to suppress. Thousands of children, boys and girls, often of the tenderest age, took the cross, and rushed in feverish enthusiasm towards the Holy Land. Some swarms reached Italy; and there they melted away, by hunger and disease, in the waves, and in the slave-markets. Two regular armies were organized in 1217 by Andrew II. of Hungary, and Count William of Holland. But, Andrew having left the enterprise with the best part of his troops, the rest of the armies went, not to the Holy Land, but on a robber-expedition to Egypt, where most of them perished in the Nile floods. See GEORFROI DE VILLE-HARDOUIN: Histoire de la conquête de Constantinople, Paris, 1656; G. Z. GRAY: The Children's Crusade, New York, 1872; L. STREIT: Beiträge zur Geschichte des vierten Kreuzzuges, Anklam, 1877.

V., VI., VII.—The complete failure of the undertaking of Andrew II. and Count William was generally ascribed to the Emperor Frederic II., who had taken the cross in 1215, but steadily refused to fulfil the promise given. Compelled by the Pope, Gregory IX., he finally embarked (Aug. 15, 1227) at Brundisium, but returned a few days afterwards, protesting that he was sick. Utterly provoked, the Pope put him under the ban; and the next year he actually went on the expedition. He was very successful. Palestine was reconquered; and in 1229 he crowned himself King of Jerusalem, and returned to Europe, defying the Pope and the excommunication. Jerusalem, however, was not long in the possession of the Christians. The uproar which the Mongolian avalanche caused in Southern and Western Asia reached also the Holy Land. The Chawaresmians, a Turkish tribe, overran the whole country, and (1247) Jerusalem was taken and pillaged. In the following year Louis IX. of France took the cross for the rescue of the city, and landed with a great armament in Cyprus. After spending the winter on that island, and making still further preparations, he went (in 1249) to Egypt, and conquered Damiette and Mansura. But, when he attempted to penetrate farther into the country, he suffered very severe losses, and was finally compelled to surrender with his whole army. In 1254 it cost France most of its wealth to ransom its King and its warriors. Notwithstanding this great misfortune, Louis IX. did not give up the idea of delivering the Holy Land from the sway of the infidels. In 1269 he began a new crusade, the last; and the whole French nobility followed him. Political reasons led him to open the campaign with an invasion of Tunis; and there he died (Aug. 24, 1270). His son and successor, Phillippe III., made peace with Tunis, and returned to France. See JOINVILLE: Histoire de St. Louis, edited by Charl. du Fresne, Paris, 1668.

CRUSIUS, Christian August, b. at Leuna, near Merseburg, Jan. 10, 1715; studied theology and philosophy at Leipzig; was appointed professor there, first in philosophy (1744), and then in theology (1750), and died there Oct. 18, 1775. In philosophy he was a staunch adversary of Wolff. He wrote a series of treatises on logic, psychology, metaphysics, and morals, in direct opposition to the Wolffian system. In morals he based the idea of duty on that of divine authority, while Wolff derived it from the idea of perfection (Begriff der christlichen Moraltheologie, Leipzig, 1772, 2 vols.). In theology he defended the tradition of the Church, as an element in true exegesis, against Ernesti, whose exegetical principle admitted only a purely grammatical interpretation (Hypomnemata ad Theol. Prophetica, Leipzig, 1764, three parts, of which the last has appeared independently, under the title Commentarius in Jesaiam, 1779). During the last part of his life the students of the university were divided into two camps, the Crusians and the Ernestians; but the noble repose of his mind was not disturbed by the contest.

CRYPT (Latin crypta; Greek κρυπτή, "a hidden place") meant in its classical use any subterranean room or passage, and was applied both to the sewer and the fruit-cellar. By an easy transition it afterwards came to denote the subterranean cemeteries of the Christians, the so-called catacombs, or, more properly, such single passages and galleries of them in which martyrs or saints were buried. As it became customary to erect chapels, or even churches, on the surface of the catacombs, just over the grave of a martyr, and with an opening under the altar which allowed to look down into the grave, into the crypt, it was natural that afterwards — though the cathedrals were not built over the graves of the martyrs, but the graves of the martyrs were dug under the altar of the cathedral — the name "crypt" was transferred also to these excavations under the choir of the basilicas and churches of the Romanesque style, which sometimes were so extensive as to form whole subterranean churches, and often were used as places of interment for bishops and archbishops. With the Romanesque style the crypts disappeared.

CRYPTO-CALVINISM is the term properly applied to those Germans who secretly held the Calvinistic doctrine on the eucharist (i.e., the spiritual presence of Christ), while they rejected that on predestination. Luther's view of the Lord's Supper implied the ubiquity of Christ's body. Melancthon's later view agreed essentially with Calvin's; and for a number of years it was that entertained by the majority of Lutheran divines, even at Wittenberg and Leipzig, and at the court of the Elector of Saxony: it was also in various ways officially recognized with the Augsburg Confession of 1540. But as soon as the two views were labelled "Luther's," "Calvin's," there was no doubt in the public mind which should be accepted. The first to call attention to the true authorship of Melancthon's view was Joachim Westphal, a rigid Lutheran minister at Hamburg, who in 1552 opened war upon those who denied the corporeal presence, and the literal eating of Christ's body even by unbelievers. Calvin took part in the controversy, and appealed to Melancthon, who, however, prudently declined to take active part in the strife, although he never concealed his essential agreement with Calvin. (See Corp. Reform., vol. viii. p. 362.) His followers were now stigmatized as Crypto-Calvinists. The controversy was carried all over Germany with incredible bigotry and superstition. In Bremen and Heidelberg the Calvinistic view prevailed; but in Würtemberg and Saxony it was finally condemned, and in the latter kingdom its defenders suffered exile and even death. In the American Lutheran Church the charge of Crypto-Calvinism was in 1881 renewed against the Missouri Lutherans; not, however, for holding the Calvinistic doctrine of the Lord's Supper, for they hold rigidly to Luther's view, but for defending the (semi-Calvinistic) doctrine of unconditional election as taught in the Formula of Concord. See SCHAFF'S Creeks of Christendom, vol. i. pp. 279-285.

CUDWORTH, Ralph, English Platonist; b. at Aller, Somersetshire, 1617; d. at Cambridge, June 26, 1688. He was educated at Emmanuel College, Cambridge; was fellow of his college, and M.A., 1639; rector of North Cadbury, 1641-43; master of Clare Hall, Cambridge, and Hebrew professor, 1644-54; D.D., 1651; master of Christ's College, 1654-62; rector of Ashwell in Herefordshire, 1662; and prebend of Gloucester, 1678. As a philosopher and theologian he occupied an intermediate position between the Puritanic and Romanizing tendencies of his time; and, without taking actual part in the controversies upon church government and doctrine, he stood boldly forth as the champion of revealed religion against the reigning deism. Besides a Discourse concerning the True Notion of the Lord's Supper, with two Sermons (1642), The Union of Christ and the Church (1642), the posthumous Treatise on Eternal and Immutable Morality, published by Bishop Chandler in 1731, and A Treatise on Free Will, edited by Rev. John Allen, 1838, he wrote the great work upon which his fame rests, The True Intellectual System of the Universe, wherein all the Reason and Philosophy of Atheism is refuted, and its Impossibility demonstrated, 1688, fol.; 2d ed., with Life of the author by Dr. BIRCH, 1742, 2 vols. 4to; Abridgment of 1st ed. by Rev. THOMAS WISE, 1706, 2 vols. 4to; Latin translation by MOSHEIM, Jena, 1733, 2 vols. fol., with improvements, Leyden, 1773, 2 vols. 4to; original English edition, reprinted, Andover, U.S.A., 1837, 2 vols. 8vo; enlarged edition, containing translation, by John Harrison, of MOSHEIM'S valuable Notes, and also an Index, London, 1845, 3 vols. 8vo.

The treatises quoted above are parts of a gigantic whole, of the refutation which Cudworth had planned to give the doctrine of necessity as held by atheists, deists, and some Christian theists. The treatise on Morality contends in platonic phraseology for the independence of moral distinctions, and that they are discerned directly by the reason. The treatise on Free Will is a direct answer to the necessitarian doctrines of Hobbes, as propounded in his Letter to the Marquis of Newcastle, on Liberty and Necessity (1654). Cudworth did not thoroughly work out any more than the first part of his scheme. He called it The True Intellectual System; because its position over against the refuted errors made it true, and it was intellectual in distinction from physical systems, like the Ptolemaic, Tychoinic, and Copernican. The occasion of its appearance was the philosophy of Hobbes; and therefore a comprehension of Hobbes is an indispensable necessity to the comprehension of Cudworth. Hobbes (1588-1679) was the fashionable philosopher of the time; because his political views supported the despotic policy of the restored monarchy of Charles II., and his materialistic and necessitarian ethics sanctioned the corrupt morals of the Cavaliers. Cudworth entered the lists against him, and, as President Porter says, had him "prominently in mind, even when criticising the ancient necessitarians and materialists." The True Intellectual System in dealing with materialistic atheism considers four species, — "the atomic, adopted by Democritus, Epicurus, and Hobbes, which recognizes no other substances than material atoms, and no other forces than their movements; the hylopathic, maintained by Anaximander, which makes infinite matter devoid of understanding and life, form all things by a 'secretion or segregation,' which takes place according to inherent law; the hylozoic, asserted by Strato of Lampsacus, which explains every thing by the supposition of an inward, self-organizing, plastic life in matter; and the cosmoplastic, perhaps held by Seneca and the younger Pliny, which represents the universe as an organized being, like a plant, with a spontaneous and necessary but unconscious and unreflective development." The enormous learning of the book has hindered its usefulness. So fully did he state the views he intended to refute, that it was claimed in his day that he was at heart an atheist himself; and in ours the number of his quotations has led superficial readers to suppose that he had little original to say, whereas he is in reality profound, acute, and fresh.

Cudworth is a storehouse whence much precious material has been taken by many a lesser writer. But to the disgrace of his university there is no complete edition, even of his printed works; while many of his manuscripts lie unprinted in the British Museum and elsewhere. The publication of the first part of his Intellectual System was delayed seven years in consequence of court opposition; and the dread of a theological war restrained him from completing it. It would seem that adverse circumstances even yet debar him from his proper place and representation in literature. He was the leader of the Cambridge Platonists. See PLATONISTS, CAMBRIDGE.

CULDEES. The derivation and meaning of this name, and the exact functions, habits, and opinions of those who bore it, have been the subject of much controversy, if not also, as Dr. Reeves asserts, of much mystification. But by the publication, in our day, of so many of the old records relating to their establishments, British scholars are coming to agree in a different opinion respecting them, though Dr. Ebrard still ably defends the long-received view. That view was not, in any sense, as it is sometimes charged, an invention of Presbyterians seeking historical support for their system. It came to them from Hector Boece and other pre-Reformation historians, and at first was substantially accepted by all Protestants, who, perhaps, were too eager to find historical prototypes or precursors in the primitive Church. Nor, if the old Protestant view is abandoned, should we be warranted without qualification to accept what some have proposed to substitute for it, and altogether to identify the Culdees of the British Isles with certain disorderly canons cleric of the Continent. The following are in brief the conclusions of Mr. Skene respecting them, than whom no one has treated the subject more learnedly and impartially. The monastic Church of the Columbites, after the fervor of its first zeal had passed away, was assailed by a twofold disintegrating influence: 1st, The introduction of a secular clergy from abroad; and, 2d, An influence from within in favor of increasing asceticism, leading not a few, in whose breast the fire of piety still glowed, to abandon the cenobitical life for the cell of the anchorite. This form of ascetic life had long existed in the Christian Church, and had come to be regarded by many as a higher form of it than the cenobitical; and the name Deicola came in time to be assigned to those who followed it, as that of Christicola was extended to ordinary Christians, or specially appropriated to Cenobites. Such preference for the solitary over the cenobite life had occasionally been shown in early times among the Columbite monks; and many of their monasteries had their desert, cave, carcair, or lone islet, to which one seized with a longing for solitary communion with God could retreat for a longer or a shorter time. It was towards the end of the seventh, or beginning of the eighth, century, that this passion for a solitary life increased so much among them, that it tended greatly to break up the regular monastic system, and became embodied in what is termed the third order of Irish saints, as distinct from the second or Columban, as that was from the first or Patrician. "These were holy presbyters and a few bishops . . . who dwelt in desert places, and lived on herbs and water and the alms of the faithful. They shunned private property; they despised all earthly things, and wholly avoided all whispering and backbiting; and they had different rules and masses, and different tonsures;" or, in other words, with all their fervor they belonged, many of them at least, to the party in South Ireland, who, in the course of the seventh century, conformed to the Roman tonsure, time of observing Easter, etc. Before the close of that century they not only lived in strict solitude, but seem at times to have formed "hermitical establishments," where a number of so-called hermits lived in separate cells, but within a common enclosure; and the nomenclature of the Continental hermits began to appear among them in an Irish form, Ceile De being applied to them as an equivalent of Deicola, meaning primarily socius, and secondarily servus, or famulus Dei. The Latinized Irish form of Ceile De was Colidæi; its Scottish form, when it appeared later, Calledæi and Keledei. Callidæi is the name applied by Jocelin to the singulares clerici of Kentigern's church, who lived in separate huts around it. Keledei is the name which came to be used in Scotland generally to denote the Culdees. Historically they made their appearance in the territory of the Southern Picts after King Nechtan had expelled the old Columban monks for refusing to conform to the Roman time of observing Easter; and Mr. Skene supposes that Adarnan himself, after breaking with the stricter party at Iona, may have had to do with the introduction of them. So he thinks may St. Serf or Servanus, to whom he assigns a later date than that of Palladius or Kentigern, and whom he supposes to have been, by the mother-side, of Pictish descent. He is specially connected with the history of the church in Fife in his time; and it is in connection with the house founded by him at Lochleven that Culdees are first referred to in actual documents as "Keledei hermits, who serve or shall serve God there." However they may have been originally introduced, they came in time to occupy many of the old seats of the Columbite monks within the

Pictish kingdom, as at St. Andrews, Abernethy, Lochleven, Brechin, Dumblane, Dunkeld, Muthill, Rosemarkie, Dornoch, Lismore, Monymusk, etc. Of course they were independent of Iona, and indeed, so far as appears, of all external control, till, in the end, the strong hand of the king was laid on them; for, whatever their original fervor and unworldliness, they had mostly, long before this, fallen away from what their first patrons had meant them to be. The highest offices in their establishments were often in the hands of laymen, nominally monks it may be, but not clerics, and not qualified to perform any spiritual function, at best devolving such functions on some substitute with inferior emoluments; at times making no provision for them at all. Thus in some cases the establishment itself fell into ruin; and its site was marked only by some holy well or old churchyard remaining, and the lands around passing by a peculiar tenure, from father to son in the family of some former abbot or superior. To meet and remedy this state of matters was one main object of the reformation begun under Malcolm Canmore and his good Queen Margaret, and completed by the pious King David, which, whatever shortcomings it may have had, certainly substituted earnest, educated, and zealous monks in place of those whose zeal had sadly decayed, and their influence been lost. The old endowments, to a large extent, were transferred to the newly founded or restored bishoprics, and to the new orders of monks; the Culdees being generally absorbed into these, or gradually superseded by them. After the thirteenth century, all trace of them disappears, save, perhaps, in connection with the old Church of St. Mary of the Rock, at St. Andrews, over which King Constantine had once presided, and the provost of which, down to the time of the Reformation, continued to be instituted by lay investiture on the part of the king. In conclusion, it is but right to add, that not all the anchorites had degenerated from their first original, even in the days of Queen Margaret. Her biographer, as quoted by Mr. Skene, expressly states, that at this time "there were many in the kingdom of the Scots, who in different places, enclosed in separate cells, lived in the flesh, but not according to the flesh, in great straitness of life, and even on earth lived the life of angels. In them the queen did her best to love and venerate Christ, and frequently to visit them with her presence and converse, and to commend herself to their prayers. . . . Whatever was their desire she devoutly fulfilled, either in recovering the poor from their poverty, or relieving the afflicted from the miseries which oppressed them." Among those better anchorites, Mr. Skene includes the Culdees of Lochleven, to whom the king and queen gave the town of Balchristie, and to whom, as to those living devoutly in a school of all virtues, Bishop Fothad sometime before had given the Church of Auchterderran. Even these met with harsh treatment at the hands of King David. (For references to the opinions and practices of the Culdees, see art. KÉLTIC CHURCH.)

CULLEN, Paul, D.D., cardinal, b. in Dublin, April 27, 1803; d. Oct. 24, 1878. He was educated at Rome, became archbishop of Armagh (1850), archbishop of Dublin (1852), and cardinal-priest in 1866. He was the main supporter of the Roman-Catholic University of Dublin.

CUMBERLAND PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH

is a growth of the present century. It originated in the remarkable revival of religion which began, in 1797, to develop itself in South-western Kentucky, under the labors of Rev. James McGready of the Presbyterian Church. This revival rapidly grew to such proportions as to create a demand for ordained ministers of the gospel greater than could be supplied. This circumstance caused the Cumberland Presbytery to ordain certain men who could not quite meet the theological and educational requirements of the Confession of Faith and Form of Government to which that presbytery was amenable. This produced dissensions in the synod of Kentucky, to which the Cumberland Presbytery belonged, and which culminated, in 1806, in the dissolution of the presbytery. The synod annexed to the adjoining Transylvania Presbytery the members who had not been placed under prohibition to preach the gospel and administer its ordinances, by the committee appointed by the synod, in 1805, to take charge of the matter. The Cumberland Presbytery had taken the ground in the controversy, that the proceedings of the committee appointed by the synod were unconstitutional, and, of course, that the proscribing act was unconstitutional and void. Nevertheless, from a general respect to authority, and from an obvious desire to procure a reconciliation, and enjoy peace and quietude as far as possible, both the proscribed members, and those who had promoted their induction into the ministry, and sympathized with them, constituting a majority of the presbytery, organized themselves into what they called a council, determining in this manner to carry forward the work of the revival, to keep the congregations together, but to abstain from all proper presbyterial proceedings, and await what they thought would be a redress of their grievances.

This council continued their organization from December, 1805, to February, 1810. By that time they became satisfied that they had nothing to hope, either from the synod or the General Assembly. As a last resort, and in order to save what they represent to the General Assembly as "every respectable congregation in Cumberland and the Barrens of Kentucky," two of the proscribed ministers, Finis Ewing and Samuel King, assisted by Samuel McAdow, one of those who had been placed under an interdict by the commission for his participation in what they denominated the irregularities of the presbytery, re-organized the Cumberland Presbytery at the house of Mr. McAdow, in Dickson County, Tennessee, on the 4th of February, 1810. It was organized as an independent presbytery. It will be observed that it was a re-organization of a presbytery which had been dissolved, and which had received its name from its locality. The church which grew up from these beginnings naturally took the name of its first presbytery as a prefix. Hence this church is called, from the circumstances of its origin, "The Cumberland Presbyterian Church." This church has grown with exceeding rapidity, extending from Pennsylvania to the shores of the Pacific, and from the Lakes to Louisiana and Texas.

The new presbytery immediately set forth a synopsis of its theology and principles of action by which it proposed to be governed. Its theology was Calvinistic, with the exception of the offensive doctrine of predestination, so expressed as to seem to embody the old Pagan dogma of necessity or fatality. The construction which they, in opposition to the letter, or form, of the Calvinistic symbols, put upon the "idea of fatality," was: (1) That there are no eternal reprobates; (2) That Christ died, not for a part only, but for all mankind, and for all in the same sense; (3) That infants dying in infancy are saved through Christ and the sanctification of the Spirit; (4) That the Spirit of God operates on the world, as co-extensively as Christ has made the atonement, in such a manner as to leave all men inexcusable. The exception of this one "idea of fatality," corresponding to these four points, must have meant and included only their antipodes: (1) Eternal reprobation; (2) An atonement limited to the elect member; (3) The salvation of only elect infants; (4) The limitation of the operations of the Spirit to the elect. Aside from these points, covered by the exception, the doctrine of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, as set forth in its Confession, was, according to the opinion of its founders, identical with that of the Westminster Confession. In the year 1813 the Cumberland Presbytery had become so large, that it divided itself into three presbyteries, and constituted the Cumberland Synod. This synod, at its sessions in 1816, adopted a confession of faith, catechism, and system of church order, in conformity with the principles avowed upon the organization of the first presbytery. The Confession of Faith is a slight modification and abridgment of the Confession of Faith of the Presbyterian Church. The Larger Catechism was omitted, and also some sections of the chapter on "God's Eternal Decrees." The form of government is Presbyterian.

In 1826 its first college was organized, under the supervision of the church. It was located at Princeton, Ky. In 1842 it was transferred to Lebanon, Tenn., and the name changed to Cumberland University. It is composed of four schools — preparatory, academic, law, and theological; each school having its own corps of professors and lecturers. It is one of the oldest, and has long been one of the most prominent and useful, educational institutions in the South-west, notwithstanding the great difficulties under which it has had to struggle much of the time. The church now has colleges at Tehuacana, Tex., Lincoln, Ill., and Waynesburg, Penn., besides a number of high schools and academies under presbyterial and synodical control. It has only one theological school,—the one in connection with Cumberland University at Lebanon, Tenn. It employs four regular professors, and the course of study extends through two years of ten months each.

In 1830 the first newspaper under the patronage of the church was published: it was a weekly religious and literary journal published at Princeton, Ky. The church now has under its patronage three weekly newspapers, one quarterly, and one monthly, besides the usual Sunday-school magazines and papers. It has a board of publication at Nashville, Tenn., a board of missions located in St. Louis, Mo. It sustains four missionaries in the foreign field, besides doing much mission-work at home. The incomplete statistics reported to the General Assembly, May, 1880, are as follows:—

Synods, 27; presbyteries, 117; ordained ministers, 1,386; licentiates, 270; candidates, 169; congregations, 2,457; elders, 8,824; deacons, 2,616; added by profession, 9,601; added by letter, 3,007; total added, 12,608; adult baptisms, 5,850; infant baptisms, 2,005; total baptisms, 7,855; total in communion, 120,000; Sunday-school officers and teachers, 7,117; scholars, 54,813; volumes in library, 28,028; funds contributed (Sunday school), $11,682. R. V. FOSTER
(Professor in Theological School, Lebanon, Tenn.).

CUMMING, John, D.D., b. in Aberdeenshire, Scotland, Nov. 10, 1810; d. in London, July 6, 1881. He studied at King's College, Aberdeen; was tutor near London; ordained pastor of the Scotch Church, Crown Court, Covent Garden, London, in 1833, and resigned only a short time before his death. He was a member of the Established Church of Scotland, and strongly opposed to the disruption of 1843. His repute as a preacher was for many years very great, due rather to his topics than to his genius. His great themes were Prophecy and Roman Catholicism; and they exactly suited his fervid, impassioned, brilliant mind. He portrayed the future as if it were the present, and saw in it the final, desperate conflict of Protestantism with Romanism.

His publications were originally discourses. They include the Apocalyptic Sketches (1849), The Great Tribulation (1859), The Great Preparation, or Redemption Draweth Nigh (1861), The Destiny of Nations (1864), Sounding of the Last Trumpet (1867), The Fall of Babylon Foreshadowed in her Teaching, in History, and in Prophecy (1870), and The Seventh Vial, or the Time of Trouble Begun (1870). In the last volume he quotes reliable evidence in proof that the Scripture predictions have been fulfilled, and stands firmly by his own interpretation of prophecy.

CUMMINS, George David, D.D., first bishop of the Reformed Episcopal Church; b. near Smyrna Del., Dec. 11, 1822; d. at Lutherville, near Baltimore, Md., June 26, 1876. He was graduated from Dickinson College (1841), and, after a two-years' licentiate in the Methodist-Episcopal Church, became (spring, 1846) an Episcopalian minister, and assistant at Christ Church, Baltimore. He afterwards held the following charges: 1847, Church Church, Norfolk, Va.; 1853, St. James's Church, Richmond, Va.; 1855, Trinity Church, Washington (in May, 1857, he held the first religious service in the new hall of the Capitol; in July, 1857, he received the degree of D.D. from Princeton College); 1858, St. Peter's, Baltimore; 1863, Trinity Church, Chicago. In these different fields of labor he greatly endeared himself to his congregation. On June 1, 1866, he was elected, and on Nov. 15 he was consecrated, assistant-bishop of Kentucky. He was speedily recognized as a leader of the Evangelical party in the Protestant-Episcopal Church. He shared the belief that a revised prayer-book would meet the difficulties. He clung to the idea of reform within the Church: so when, in the summer of 1869, the necessity of separating was put to him, he could not acknowledge it, but persevered in his efforts against abuses, greatly crippled by his subordinate position, for he could not forbid what he disliked. At length, thinking the time for decisive action had come, he wrote (on Nov. 10, 1873) to his senior bishop, declaring that he could no longer seem by his presence to countenance the ritualistic practices of certain churches of his diocese; that he had lost all hope that this system of error could be or would be eradicated by any action of the Church; and, lastly, that the abuse he had received for communing with his fellow Christians during the General Conference of the Evangelical Alliance in New York (October, 1873) had convinced him that he must take his place where he could give open expression of the Christian brotherhood without alienating those of his own household of faith: and accordingly he withdrew from the Episcopal Church, and was in consequence deposed from the ministry. Conferences with some who were like minded followed, and out of them grew the "Reformed Episcopal Church" (for its history, see title). In this new enterprise Bishop Cummins entered with all his energy, for it he willingly spent himself; but the burden of labor, and the far heavier burden of abuse, the bitterness of finding that few had the courage or the conscience to follow where he led, in comparison with the many who were expected so to do, broke him down, and after a brief illness he died. The Church which he founded reveres his memory as a man eloquent, conscientious, and devout. See MEMOIR OF GEORGE DAVID CUMMINS, D.D., First Bishop of the Reformed Episcopal Church. By his Wife. New York, 1878.

CUNEIFORM INSCRIPTIONS. The cuneiform, or wedge-shaped, characters were used by various peoples of Western Asia from the earliest historic times down to Alexander's conquest. They even appear occasionally still later. They originated in picture-signs, now lost, which were probably traced on papyrus, or some like material, and degenerated slowly into mere collections of lines and angles. When clay tablets were substituted for papyrus, and the characters were made by the pressure of a chisel-like instrument, the lines easily became wedges; and thus the wedge was gradually adopted as the normal element of the character.

The earliest specimens known to us of cuneiform writing are in the Accadian language, which, together with the Sumerian, a dialect of the same tongue, was spoken by a cultivated people of Babylonia. (See ACCAD, ASSYRIA, BABYLONIA, SHINAR.) They were probably its originators, and perhaps the inventors of the picture-signs out of which it was developed. From them it passed to the Shemitic Babylonians, who possessed their land by invasion, and thence to the Assyrians, the Medes, and the Persians; while the Assyrians, in their turn, gave it to the people bordering on Lake Van, on the confines of Armenia. Little is known as yet of the Vannic language; the Persian simplified the original system, so that it closely approached an alphabet; the Medes seem to have nearly followed the Babylonians; while the Babylonians and Assyrians had in the main developed the principles of the Accadian writing.

The use of picture-characters in its simplest stage requires merely that there be attached to each character the sound of the name belonging to the object pictured. But the Accadians had gone farther, and had not merely combined two or more characters into a third, representing a compound word, but had sometimes given this compound character an entirely new pronunciation. Moreover, they had so far forgotten the picture-origin of the characters, that in many cases these came to represent mere syllables; e.g., the character meaning "hand" might be used for the preposition "to," simply because both were pronounced šu. In short, the system, at first purely ideographic, began to be also phonetic.

When the characters were adopted by the Shemitic Babylonians, certain difficulties arose. The Accadian language had a smaller number of sounds than the Shemitic, and yet it had some sounds which the latter had not. There was need, therefore, of various adaptations. Accadian signs were used not only for identical, but also for kindred, Shemitic sounds. For example, the Accadian d had to serve for the Shemitic d and t, sometimes for t; and the Accadian g, not found in Shemitic, was made to represent the Shemitic h. The weaker Shemitic gutturals and the quiescents, having no equivalent in Accadian, were commonly not represented at all in the Assyro-Babylonian. But there was a further complication. While a Shemitic pronunciation was given to characters used as ideograms, and the same sounds were often employed for the same characters used as syllables, the Accadian sounds were also retained as syllabic values. Thus one character may be variously read as bilu (Assyrian for "house"), as the syllable bit, or as the syllable z, which in Accadian is a word meaning "house." Furthermore, both the Accadians and their Shemitic conquerors represented words of kindred meaning by a single character; e.g., the Assyrian has one sign for inu ("eye"), pānu ("face"), and amāru ("to see"). This character could likewise be used as a syllable, and was then pronounced in (from Assyrian inu), ši, or lin: the last two sounds belonged to the character in Accadian, and were adopted with it by the Shemitic invaders. The difficulty of reading which this polyphony involved was diminished by certain habits in regard to the employment of particular values, such as that a phonetic was preferred to an ideographic value, and an open to a closed syllable; that a phonetic value ending in a vowel is often followed by one beginning with the same vowel, etc. After the first steps in the decipherment of the cuneiform characters had been taken, still more important helps to further reading were found in the inscriptions themselves. Such are: (1) Bi- and tri-lingual texts; (2) Parallel texts in the same language; (3) Dictionaries, vocabularies, and glosses, giving the pronunciation and meaning of ideograms. In all these cases the values which are simplest, and most easily learned, are made to explain more unusual or difficult ones. Assistance has been derived also from the representations on the bas-reliefs accompanying many inscriptions; and general information gained from Greek and other historians has had some value for the decipherer.

History of Decipherment. — The first inscriptions read were Persian. In 1618 De Figueroa, a Spanish ambassador, visited and described the ruins of Persepolis, calling special attention to the cuneiform inscriptions there; and in 1621 Pietro della Valle expressed the (correct) opinion that they were to be read from left to right. For generations no further progress was made; but in 1774-78 a new impulse was given to investigation, when Carsten Niebuhr published an account of his travels in the Orient, with many plates of inscriptions from Persepolis. He noticed that there were three distinct kinds, often parallel, and was followed in his attempts to decipher, at least the simplest kind, by Olaf Tychsen and F. Münter. But Georg Friedrich Grotefend of Hanover, Germany, was the first to succeed in this task. He deciphered in the year 1802 two short Persian inscriptions from Niebuhr's collection. Knowing that at Persepolis the Achaemenian kings had built palaces, and assuming that these brief inscriptions contained royal names, he adopted the suggestion of Münter, that a certain oft-repeated character must stand for "king," and observed that each of his inscriptions contained this character, and two groups of characters beside. The first group in one he perceived to be the same with the second group in the other; and in the one the sign for "king" followed only the first group, while in the other it followed both. He inferred that three persons were named (two royal, and one not), and that the relationship between the three was that of son, father, and grandfather. The translations, "Xerxes the King, son of Darius the King," and "Darius the King, son of Hystaspes," proved to meet all the requirements; and not only was this translation found, after many tests, to be correct, but the number of accurately known letters in the Old Persian was raised, by this one decipherment, from two to eleven, besides others read with approximate accuracy. Some decades later (1836) E. Burnouf and C. Lassen contributed materially to further progress: N. Westergaard and A. Holtzmann followed. In 1837 Henry C. Rawlinson discovered the great tri-lingual inscription of Darius on the cliff of Behistun; and through the labors of these scholars, together with E. Hincks and J. Oppert, a full knowledge was gained of the old Persian characters and language. Meantime, the discoveries in Babylon and Nineveh had begun. Rich (1820) brought to England a small box of stone fragments from Nebi-Junus and Kuyundjik, opposite Mosul. Botta (1843-45) unearthed the palace of Sargon, at Khorsabad, and the Louvre received its treasures. Botta was succeeded in the work by Place; and A. H. Layard (1845-51) not only brought to light four great palaces at Nimrūd, but made brilliant discoveries in the mounds of Nebi-Junus and Kuyundjik. Further excavations were made in the same region by Hormuzd Rassam (1852-54), — to whom belongs the credit of discovering the palace of Tiglath-pileser I. at Kileh-Shergat, and the crowning glory of unearthing the library of Ašurbanipal at Kuyundjik, — by George Smith (1873-76: he died at Aleppo on his third expedition, 1876), and by Rassam again, since 1876. In Babylonia, Fresnel and Oppert made a valuable collection (1851-54); but the boat which held it capsized in the Tigris (1855), and all was lost. Something was done by Loftus and Taylor (1853-55); and since 1878 H. Rassam (see above) has made important discoveries in Babylonia as well as in Assyria. A vast amount of material for the decipherer has thus been gathered. It was found that the inscriptions were chiefly in a character like the third species in the tri-lingual inscriptions mentioned above. The Persian proper names of the first species already deciphered gave the pronunciation of many signs in the parallel species, and in this way became the key to the whole Assyro-Babylonian language. As early as 1849 De Saulcy discovered that the language was Shemitic: Hincks found that the signs represent (words and) syllables, not letters. H. C. Rawlinson published and translated the Babylonian text of the Behistun inscription (1851): Oppert, Menant, Norris, Fox Talbot, Lenormant, followed, with grammatical and lexical as well as epigraphic studies. The new science began to rouse wide enthusiasm; and since 1870 it has been pushed with redoubled vigor by Rawlinson, Smith, Sayce, Pinches, and others in England; Oppert, Menant, Lenormant, Pognon, and Guyard in France; and by Schrader, Friedrich Delitzsch, Haupt, Lotz, and Hommel in Germany.

The second species of cuneiform writing in the tri-lingual inscriptions proved to be in the ancient Median language, which still needs fuller investigation. The Accadian, with its dialect the Sumerian, was reached through the medium of the Assyrian by the aid of very numerous bi-lingual tablets, — Accadian texts with Assyrian translations, either interlinear or in parallel columns.

Some of the far-reaching results of the decipherment of the cuneiform inscriptions are these: the discovery of several new languages, the proof that Shemitic culture is largely derived from the non-Shemitic Accadians, new light on the history of Shemitic wanderings and on long periods of sacred and profane history. The early chapters of Genesis, and the period of the kings, from Ahab to the close of the exile, are the parts of the Bible which receive special illustration.

The contents of the inscriptions, as well as the materials inscribed, are most various. Stone slabs, gems, clay tablets, glass, and metals are all employed; and the subject-matter is historical, poetical, mythological, religious, official, commercial, astronomical, and mathematical.

A few of the most striking inscriptions are: accounts of the creation and the flood; the Eponym Canon, or list of officials whose names mark successive years; records of the Assyrian kings, Shalmaneser II. (contemporary of Ahab, Jehu, and Hazael), Tiglath-pileser II. (Pul), Shalmaneser IV., who besieged Samaria, Sargon, his successor, who took it, Sennacherib (who describes his campaign in Palestine, and names Hezekiah as king of Jerusalem), Esarhaddon, and Ašurbanipal, the last great Assyrian king; records of the Babylonian and Persian kings, Nebuchadnezzar, Nabonidus, Cyrus (his capture of Babylon is described), and Darius.

The cuneiform inscriptions are preserved chiefly in the British Museum; some, particularly those of Sargon, are in the Louvre in Paris; a few are in Berlin and elsewhere. The sculptured and inscribed slabs owned by several American museums all date from the Assyrian king Ašurnasirpal (B. C. 883-858); and the inscription is the same on all, with only slight variations. It celebrates the restoration of the ancient city of Calah (Nimrūd).

CUNNINGHAM, William, D.D., an eminent Scotch theologian and controversialist; b. at Hamilton, Oct. 2, 1805; d. in Edinburgh, Dec. 14, 1861. He studied at Edinburgh under Dr. Chalmers and others; was licensed as a preacher in 1828; settled as a minister in Greenock in 1830; translated to Trinity College Church, Edinburgh, in 1834; appointed professor in the New College in 1843, and principal (in succession to Dr. Chalmers) in 1848. From his student-days his great capacity for theological learning and singular controversial power were apparent. He threw himself with great energy into the strife in the Church of Scotland, which began to become earnest about the time of his settlement in Edinburgh. Both his ecclesiastical learning and his debating power found a splendid field, as the strife advanced, in conflict with such learned men as Lord Medwyn and Sir William Hamilton. In the General Assembly his speeches were singularly weighty and telling. To his combativeness he added a simple, childlike nature, a warm heart, and a blunt, honest manner; so that, while his foes spoke of him with dread and horror, his friends were devotedly attached to him. As a professor he had a remarkable power of inspiring his students with confidence in himself, and enthusiasm for their studies. When appointed professor, he was requested by the General Assembly to go to America, and make himself acquainted with the methods of study pursued there. Among other friendships thus formed was one of unusual warmth and sympathy for Dr. Hodge of Princeton. In theology Dr. Cunningham was a thorough Calvinist. His works (chiefly posthumous) were: Historical Theology* [Edinburgh, 1862], 2 vols.; The Reformers and the Theology of the Reformation* [1862]; Discussions on Church Principles* [1863]; Lectures on the Evidences, Canon, etc.* [N. Y., 1878]; Sermmons from 1828 to 1860* [1872], etc. His Life was written by the late Rev. James Mackenzie, and Rev. Dr. Rainy, who succeeded him as professor of church history, Edinburgh, 1871. CURCELLÆUS, Stephanus. See COURCELLES.
CURATE denotes, in the Church of England, the lowest degree of ministers, licensed by the bishop, and employed by the incumbent of a parish as his assistant, either in the same church, or in a chapel of ease, but removable at pleasure by the bishop or the incumbent. There was formerly a distinction made between perpetual and temporary curates, the former not being removable; but this distinction has been abolished by 31 and 32 Vict., chap. 117, which confers the title of vicar on all perpetual curates. In the Anglican Prayer-Book the name is sometimes used in a general sense, denoting the incumbent of any kind of ecclesiastical office with which is connected the care of the souls of the parish; and this is also the original meaning of the name in the Roman-Catholic Church. There too, however, curatus came, in the course of the fifteenth century, to be used only for the vicars or assistants of the regular incumbents of the churches, though the office never sank so low in social respect as in the Anglican Church. The Council of Trent forbade to employ temporary curates, removable at pleasure (sess. vii. chap. 5, 7, de reform.). In the performance of their duty, in their cura actualis, the real incumbent of the church, the parochus primitivus, exercises only a cura habitualis.

GURATE, Perpetual. See CURATE.

CURETON, William, a distinguished Oriental scholar, especially in Syriac; b. at Westbury, Shropshire, 1808; d. there June 17, 1864. He was educated at Christ Church, Oxford; was sub-librarian of the Bodleian (1834), assistant keeper of the manuscripts in the British Museum (1837-50), chaplain to the queen (1847), canon of Westminster, and rector of St. Margaret's, Westminster (1849). His services, especially to biblical and patristic learning, were very great, as a mere enumeration of the titles of his publications will show: Syriac Version of the Epistles of Ignatius (1845); Catalogue of Arabic Manuscripts in the British Museum (1846); Vindiciæ Ignatianæ, or the Genuine Writings of St. Ignatius, as exhibited in the Ancient Syriac Version, vindicated from the Charge of Heresy (1846); Corpus Ignatianum, a complete collection of the Ignatian Epistles, genuine, interpolated, and spurious, together with numerous extracts from them, etc., in Syriac, Greek, and Latin; an English translation of the Syriac text, copious notes and Introduction (1849); John, Bishop of Ephesus, the Third Part of his Ecclesiastical History [in Syriac], (1853); the same, translated by Dean Smith, 1860; Spicilegium Syriacum, containing Remarks of Bardesan, Meliton, Ambrose, and Mara-Bar-Serapion, with an English Translation and Notes (1855); Quatuor Evangeliorum Syriace, recensiois antiquissimæ, atque in occidente adhuc ignotæ quod superest (1858).

CUREUS, Joachim, b. at Freistadt, Silesia, in 1532; studied theology and philosophy at Wittenberg (1550-54), and medicine at Padua and Bologna (1557-59), and settled as practical physician at Glogan, where he died in 1573. He was a passionate disciple of Melanchthon, and the author of the famous Exegesis Perspicua et Ferme Integra Controversiæ de Sacra Cæna, which appeared anonymously at Leipzig in 1574, by the same publisher who had issued the Corpus Philippicum. The work is a defence of a semi-Calvinistic view of the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, and occasioned the elector August of Saxony to discharge all those of his counsellors and theologians who leaned towards Melanchthon. The work has been reprinted at Marburg in 1853 by W. Scheffer.

CURIA ROMANA denotes the whole body of officials which together forms the papal government. As the Pope is Bishop of Rome, archbishop of a province of seven bishoprics, primate of the Roman-Catholic Church, and, up to 1859, occupant of a large territory, the States of the Church, the organization of the papal government consequently developed in each of these directions. Generally, however, the archbishop employs no special officials for the performance of his archiepiscopal duties, but simply uses his episcopal officers for these functions too; and exactly in the same manner it was originally simply the presbytery of his episcopal diocese which joined the Pope in the administration of important affairs, whether episcopal, or archiepiscopal, or primatial; while cases of minor consequence were left to him to be disposed of personally, in capella, or by the aid of his chaplains. The College of Cardinals, the chief organ of the papal government, developed around the papal see exactly in the same manner as the chapter around any other episcopal see. See CARDINAL.

In the episcopal chapter it was the two principal members, the arch-deacon and the arch-presbyter, who transacted all business; while the chapter proper, the former presbytery, stood by as a board of advice. So, too, in the College of Cardinals, where the affairs were divided between the cardinal-camerlengo (the arch-deacon) and the cardinal-vicarius (the arch-presbyter). The cardinal-camerlengo is already mentioned in the liber diurnus as the most influential member of the presbytery as its representative. To him belonged the jurisdiction and the finances of the diocese; and he appointed his three principal sub-officials himself,—the vice-camerlengo for the criminal jurisdiction, the auditor camera for the civil jurisdiction, and the treasurer (tesoriere) for the finances. To the cardinal-vicarius belonged all the ecclesiastical affairs of the diocese, and he had a suffragan bishop among his sub-officers. As the papal possessions increased, the separation between these two offices became more sharply marked. All secular interests were gathered under the cardinal-camerlengo, and he became a state-officer in the modern sense of the word: all ecclesiastical interests gathered under the cardinal-vicarius, and he became practically the Bishop of Rome. The granting of benefices, however, and the power of the keys (potestas ligandi et solvendi), the Pope reserved for himself, or rather for a special officer, the cardinal-penitentiary. To these three grand officers was added, though not until the latter part of the fifteenth century, a fourth,—the cardinal-patron, or, as he is now generally called, the cardinal-secretary-of-state. He began as a kind of minister of the papal household, became then, on account of his daily and intimate intercourse with the Pope, the minister of foreign affairs, and assumed finally a position as minister of the interior, too, having the command of the papal troops and the direction of the papal legates, which placed nearly the whole administration of the Papal States, both the patrimony proper and the legations, in his hands. The centre of the whole machine was of course the Pope, to whom the final decision of all questions belonged, and who, in connection with the consistory, exercised a general superintendence.

The whole organization, such as it had developed and was working in the beginning of the sixteenth century, before the Council of Trent, comprised the College of Cardinals assembling in consistories, the two signatures (Signatura Gratiæ and Signatura Justitiæ), the Pœnitentiaria, the Rota, the Dataria, and the Chancery. The last-mentioned, the Cancellaria Apostolica, was simply a bureau of expedition in which the affairs treated by the College of Cardinals and in the signatures received their final business form, and were issued. The Dataria originated as a mere department of the chancery, as a kind of board of control, in which all ingoing and outgoing communications were dated and registered; but, on account of the great importance which this simple function had for all cases of benefices, the department soon became independent, and gradually came to exercise a considerable influence. The Rota was the Supreme Court of Christendom, and an immense amount of business flowed into its rooms. It consisted of twelve members (auditores),—three Romans, one from Bologna, one from Ferrara, one alternately from Tuscany or Perugia, one from Venice, one from Milan, one German, one Frenchman, and two Spaniards. It lost some of its importance when the Signatura Justitiæ was established above it as a court of appeal for Italy; and by degrees, as the jurisdiction of the Pope was confined on the one hand to a small number of cases, on the other, first to the Papal States, then to the City of Rome, and finally to the palace of the Vatican, the Rota and the Signatura Justitiæ shrank into mere shadows. The Signatura Gratiæ and the Pœnitentiaria treated all cases, assorting to the postestas legandi et solvendi dispensations, indulgences, etc., the former in a more private and personal way, the latter publicly and officially. Affairs of dogmatics, liturgy, finance, general policy, appointment of bishops, etc., belonged to the College of Cardinals, among whose members every country, diocese, monastic order, etc., had its special protector, who reported on its affairs, pleaded its cause, and took care of its interests.

From the middle of the sixteenth century, however, a great change was effected in this organization by the establishment of the so-called Congregationes, committees of cardinals formed for some special range of business. The oldest of these congregations is the Sancta Congregatio Romanæ et Universalis Inquisitionis, or Sancti Officii, generally called Sant' Ufficio, founded in 1542, on occasion of the German Reformation, and with the object of eradicating all heresy: it was afterwards considerably enlarged by the addition of the S. Congr. Judicis Librorum Prohibitorum for watching the literatures. A second congregation, S. C. Cardinalium Concilii Tridentini Interpretum, or Congregatio Concilii, or Conciglio, was founded in 1564 for the correct publication and true interpretation of the decrees of the Council of Trent. Its verdicts (resoluciones, declarationes) enjoy great authority; and a collection of them (Thesaurus Resolutionum), comprising over one hundred volumes, has appeared since 1718. Three other congregations were founded by Sixtus V.; namely, S. C. super negotiis Episcoporum et Regularium, or Vescori et Regulari, for all episcopal and monastic affairs; S. C. Rituum, for rituals, liturgy, canonization, etc.; and S. C. Consistorialis, to prepare all business matter before it is brought into a regular consistory. Of the congregations established in the seventeenth century, the most important are De Propaganda Fide (1622), for the centralization of all mission business; S. C. Immunitatis Ecclesiastica (1626), to guard against any encroachment from the side of the State on the privileges of the Church; S. C. Indulgentiarum (1669), etc. The Gerarchia Cattolica for 1878 mentions still more congregations. The relation between these congregations and the old authorities still existing often gives rise to very difficult questions. Generally, however, the old and the new authorities are equally competent; and he who has any business to transact can choose the party with which he prefers to deal, for reasons of cheapness, speed, personal connections among the officials, etc.

CURIO, Cœlius Secundus, b. at Cirie, near Turin, May 1, 1503; d. at Basel, Nov. 24, 1569; one of those numerous Italians, who, attracted by the evangelical movement of the Reformation, were compelled by the counteraction of Rome to leave their native country, and seek refuge beyond the Alps. While studying classical languages, history, and jurisprudence at Turin, he became acquainted with the writings of Luther, Melancthon, and Zwingli, through an Augustinian monk, Hieronymus Niger; and the impression he received was so strong, that he immediately set out for Germany in order to study the new theology. But, on the order of the Cardinal-bishop Boniface of Ivrea, he was arrested near Aosta, and imprisoned. Released after two months, he was brought to the Monastery of St. Benignus to continue his studies; but after half scandalizing and half seducing the monks by his views, which he never desisted from preaching, he fled from the monastery, visited Rome and other Italian cities, and finally settled at Milan, where he married Margaretha Blanca of the distinguished family of Isachi. In order to avoid the war troubles, he successively removed to Piedmont, Savoy, Pavia, where he lectured in the university; but, as he was zealous in defending and preaching the evangelical views, he was seized at Pavia by the Inquisition, and incarcerated. He escaped, however, and found refuge in Venice, and at the court of the Duchess Renata of Ferrara. On her recommendation, he obtained a position at the University of Lucca. But he had hardly begun to teach, before the Pope demanded that he be delivered up; and, when the city declared itself unable to defend him, he fled (in 1542) to Switzerland, where he was professor of literature, languages, and rhetoric, first at Lausanne (1543-47), and then in Basel. As a humanist teacher he earned a great reputation, and received splendid offers from Maximilian II., the Duke of Savoy, and even from Pope Paul IV.; but he declined to leave Basel, where alone he felt free and safe. He was not, strictly speaking, a theologian, but took great interest in all the theological movements of his time, and was not without influence. In Basel he stood at the head of that latitudinarian group of Italians which gathered there; and he was looked upon with suspicion, not only by the Roman Catholics, but also by Calvin and the orthodox Lutherans. His most widely known and most characteristic work is his Pasquilli Ecstatici, a satire on the papacy and the Roman Church, Geneva, 1544. A positive representation of his religious stand-point may be found in his Christianæ Religionis Institutio, Basel, 1549. But the work which caused the most contradiction from all sides was his De Amplitudine Beati Regni Dei, 1554.

CURTIUS, Valentin (Korte, or Kortheim) b. at Lebus, in Brandenburg, Jan. 6, 1493; d. at Lübeck, Nov. 29, 1567; came to Rostock to study theology in 1512, and entered the order of the Franciscans, but embraced the Reformation, and was made Protestant preacher at the Church of the Holy Spirit in 1528; married in 1532; was called to Lübeck in 1534, and made superintendent in 1554. Lübeck was at that time the centre of orthodox Lutherdom in Northern Germany, and Curtius occupied a prominent place in the conventions and disputations of that time. He drew up the Formula Lübecensis (1560), which, up to 1685, was signed by every ecclesiastic appointed in the city, and the Protestatio contra Synodum Tridentinam (1561). But he was also very eager to have the English refugees of 1554 expelled from the city on account of their Calvinism. See C. H. STARCKE: Lübeckische Kirchen-Historie, Hamburg, 1724; J. H. GERCKEN: Dissertatio de Form. Lub., Göttingen, 1755.

CUSANUS, Nicolaus (Nicolai Krypffs, or Krebs), also known as Nicholas de Cusa; b. at Cues, or Cusa, a village on the Moselle, in the diocese of Treves, 1401; d. at Lodi, Aug. 11, 1464; was the son of poor parents, but was by Count Ulrich of Manderscheid, in whose service he had entered, sent to the school of the Brethren of the Common Life, at Deventer, and then to the University of Padua, where he studied law, and took the degree in 1424. He lost, however, the very first case in which he pleaded, at Mayence; and this determined him to leave the legal career altogether, and enter the Church. For several years he studied mathematics and astronomy, Hebrew and Greek, philosophy and theology, with great zeal; and he was Archdeacon of Liège, when, in 1433, he was sent to the Council of Basel. There he attracted general attention by his De Catholica Concordantia and De Auctoritate præsidentis in Concilio Generali. In the former he declares that the papal authority is not tied up with the Roman see; that the true successor of Peter is he who is duly chosen by the representatives of Christendom, and not he who incidentally occupies the chair of Rome; that the donation of Constantine is a fable; that the secular princes are completely independent of the Pope in all secular affairs, etc. In the latter he vindicates the authority of the œcumenical council above that of the Pope; and, when he concedes to the Pope the right to preside at the œcumenical council, this right is one of honor only, not of power, etc. Nevertheless, some years later we find him travelling in Germany as papal legate, and defending in the diets of 1440-42 the very opposite views. He had in the mean time become a friend of Eugenius IV.; and he served him with great devotedness on many important missions, — to Constantinople, to work for the union of the two Churches; to Germany, to gather money for the building of the Church of St. Peter, etc. Nicholas V. also showed him great confidence, and made him cardinal in 1448, and Bishop of Brixen in 1451, in spite of the protest of Archduke Sigismund. During the Congress of Mantua he was the Pope's vicegerent in Rome, and published his Cribratio Alchorani. His troubles with Sigismund disturbed his last days (when the duke imprisoned the bishop, and the bishop excommunicated the duke); and unhappily the decision of the emperor in his favor was not given until after his death.

The extraordinary change in Cusa's views has generally been explained as the result of ambition and cowardice. He saw that nothing could be attained in the Church except by standing on the Pope's side, and he was tempted. He saw that his views could not be carried through without causing a complete revolution, and he was frightened. There is, however, in Cusa's character, nothing at all to justify such an explanation. He was an honest, open, simple-hearted man, who for truth's sake could have sacrificed his worldly prospects, even his life, without regret, without fear, without the least trace of the martyr's bravado, if he had only known the truth. But there was just the hitch. In his intellect, though he actually broke with the tradition of the schoolmen, and though he often is spoken of as the dawn of modern philosophy, there was just that kind of confusion and obscurity, which, with an honest man who is too naive to conceal any thing, makes such a glaring inconsistency almost a matter of course. In his books De Docta Ignorantia and De Conjecturis, his two principal philosophical works, he defines the relation between absolute truth and the human mind as one of complete incongruity. Absolute truth the human mind is utterly unable to grasp: it can only form opinions, conjectures, about it. But, when the intellect can establish no other relation than that of conjecture between itself and absolute truth, an honest character can, just because it is honest, hardly escape, at least once in the course of its development, to be thrown from that stand-point which it holds over to the very opposite, unless it can keep itself forever oscillating in a sceptical dilemma. But Cusa was not a sceptic, either intellectually or morally. Intellectually he was a realist, not without a tint of materialism. He was a great mathematician. His propositions for the improvement of the Julian Calendar resembled those adopted afterwards by Gregory VII. He anticipated Copernicus in his views of the earth's position in the planetary system. He was the father of Giordano Bruno. Morally he was a mystic, with a strong leaning towards asceticism. He taught that glimpses of the absolute truth could be caught by means of intuition, which aided the mind in divining, as spectacles aid the eyes in seeing. He was a pupil of Meister Eckardt. The speculative result of this singular combination was an obscure and inconsistent pantheism—God as the maximum has nothing outside himself, the world is a finite condensation of the maximum—which frightened his contemporaries; and the practical result is a number of mystico-materialistic absurdities—De Quadratura Circuli, De Novissimis Diebus, according to which the universe should perish in 1734—which deter a modern reader. But of cowardice and ambition, and other moral blemishes, there is not much in the man. Cusa's works make three volumes, and have been published three times; last edition by Henri Petri, Basel, 1565.

CUSH (Hebrew קוש, Egyptian Kaš, Kiš, or Keš, Assyrian Kusi and Miluhhi, LXX. Αἰθιοπία, Vulgate Æthiopia, except Gen. x. 6-8, 1 Chron. i. 8-10, where LXX. have Χούς, Vulgate Chus) is a name applied in the Old Testament to a person, a land, and a people. As a person, Cush is the first son of Ham, having five sons of his own,—Seba, Havilah, Sabtah, Raamah, Sabtechah,—and being also the progenitor of Nimrod (Gen. x. 6-8). Two sons, Sheba and Dedan, are assigned to Raamah (v. 7). The Scripture-writer appears to look back to Cush, with his sons and grandsons, as the founders of peoples known in his time; and, where these names are elsewhere mentioned (except 1 Chron. i. 8-10, which repeats Gen. x. 6-8), they refer, not to the founders, but to the peoples descended from them, and to the lands (some in Asia, some in Africa) where these peoples lived. Seba (שֵׁבָא, Ps. lxxii. 10; Isa. xliii. 3, xlv. 14) denotes probably an African people; Havilah (הַוִּילָה), Gen. ii. 11, x. 29, xxv. 18; 1 Sam. xv. 7, and see EDEN), an Asiatic, and perhaps an African as well, for Ptolemy (Geogr. iv. 7, 27) puts the people Ἀβαλίται on the sinus Abalitis (Ἀβαλίτης), along the African coast near the Straits of Bab-el-Mandeb; Sabtah (סַבְתָּח), probably an Asiatic (an old commercial town of Arabia was called Σάββαθα); Raamah (רַמָּה), Ezek. xxvii. 22), Sheba (שֵׁבָא, 1 Kings x. 1 f.; Job vi. 19; Ps. lxxii. 10; Isa. lx. 6; Jer. vi. 20; Ezek. xxxvii. 22, xxxviii. 13; comp. Gen. x. 28 and xxv. 3), and Dedan (דְּדָן, Isa. xxi. 13; Ezek. xxvii. 15, 20, xxxviii. 13; comp. Gen. xxv. 3), were all three Asiatic (Arabian) peoples; Sabtechah (סַבְתְּחָח) was probably Asiatic also; and the great territory of Cush, divided among these peoples, formed the southern boundary of the inhabited world as known to the Hebrews. The appearance of Sheba and Havilah among the descendants of Shem through Joktan (Gen. x. 28, 29), and of Sheba and Dedan as descendants of Shem through Abraham and Jokshan (Abraham's son by Keturah, Gen. xxv. 1-3), points to a mixture of blood in these peoples, unless we have to do with different tribes bearing like names, which cannot be proved.

Cush, as applied to a land, is further used in a more limited sense (Gen. ii. 13, and elsewhere in the Old Testament,—twelve passages in all). On the Cush of Gen. ii. 13 see EDEN. In the other eleven passages it denotes the Nile Valley southward from Egypt, with the lands between the Nile and the Red Sea, from Syene (Ezek. xxix. 10) as far south as the junction of the Blue and White Nile. The earlier boundaries toward the south were quite vague; and, even when Cush became a well-defined province and kingdom, tribes of the same origin with the historical Cushites dwelt outside its borders. In a sense which would include these, the African Cush extended into Abyssinia, and perhaps covered it; but the restricted sense is the ordinary one in use. In the Book of Esther (i. 1 and viii. 9) Cush is named as the extreme south-west limit of the kingdom of Ahasuerus.

This land of Cush was called by the Greeks Μερόη, from its ancient capital city (native name Meru or Merua, "white cliff"), situated near Mount Barkal, and identical with Napata.

The people of Kaš (Keš or Kiš) are, in the Egyptian records, always distinguished from negroes (Nahasi), both in name and in appearance. They are depicted with Caucasian features, and their color is red or brown. They appear to be kindred with the Egyptians. It is believed that the ancestors of all the historic inhabitants of the Nile Valley came of a single stock (Cush and Mizraim are brothers, Gen. x. 6), and had a common home in Asia. One stream of immigration entered North-eastern Africa by the Isthmus of Suez, and became the Egyptian people; another, starting from the same source, moved down into Southern Arabia; then a part crossed the Red Sea into Africa, and occupied the region described above, becoming the historic Cush; as such they are named some twenty-five times in the Old Testament; others remained in Arabia, and it is possible that reference is had to these in 2 Chron. xxi. 16: "Arabians that were near the Ethiopians." (As to the theories that another branch wandered northward, and became the Phœnicians of history, and that Babylonia was peopled by colonists from the African Cush, see PHŒNICIA, NIMROD.)

The (African) Cushites are first mentioned in the Egyptian records of the twelfth dynasty (Lepsius, c. B.C. 2350), which fought successfully against them. During the reign of the Hyksos in Egypt, the native Egyptian kings, forced southward, came into closer contact with the Cushites; and, after the expulsion of the Hyksos (seventeenth century B.C.) Kaš was treated as a province of Egypt, and had an Egyptian governor. In the time of the twenty-first dynasty it gained its independence; and, in the eighth century B.C., the Cushite king, Piankhi I., conquered all Egypt. The twenty-fifth dynasty of Manetho is composed of Cushite kings, — Shabak (Sabacu = שַׁבַּק [?], 2 Kings xvii. 4), Shabatak (Sebichu), and Taharaka (Tirhaka). The relation between these kings is obscure; and, besides these, Miamun Nut, successor, and perhaps son, of Piankhi, figures on the monuments. The Cushite kings of Egypt came repeatedly in contact with the Hebrews. Hoshea of Samaria tried to form an alliance with So against the Assyrians (2 Kings xvii. 4). Isa. xviii. seems to imply like proposals from the Cushites to the Hebrews. Sennacherib's march through Philistia was checked by the approach of Tirhaka, the most formidable of all the Cushite kings. Both before and after this time, there is mention of individual Cushites who lived in Palestine: Ebed Melech (Jer. xxxviii. 7ff., xxxix. 16 ff) is a notable example. The Cushite control of Egypt ended with the defeat of Tirhaka and the establishment of an Assyrian protectorate on the Lower Nile by Esarhaddon (King of Assyria B.C. 681-668); and an attempt of Tirhaka to regain a foothold there was foiled by Asurbanipal, son of Esarhaddon, about B.C. 666. After this we find Ethiopian soldiers in the service of Egyptian rulers (Jer. xlvi. 9; Ezek. xxx. 4 f.); but Tirhaka's successors were powerful monarchs in their own domain, and were still reigning at the old Meroe when Cambyses made his unsuccessful attempt to conquer Ethiopia (B.C. 524). As late as B.C. 450 Herodotus speaks of the "long-lived Ethiopians," whose capital was at this old Meroe. The later Meroe, the island in the south, near Khartum, was included in the empire of Tirhaka and his successors, but probably did not become the capital of the kingdom till about the third century B.C., under Ergamenes, contemporary with Ptolemy Philadelphus. The later Greek writers begin to distinguish from the civilized Meroites various ruder Cushite tribes, such as the Blemmyes, Megabares, and Troglodytes. These occupied the territory from the Lake of Axum, in Abyssinia, up to the Egyptian boundary, and were the ancestors of the present Bega, or Bischari tribes.

The Cushite kingdom existed until after the Christian era (Acts viii. 27 names Candace, Queen of Ethiopia); but by degrees the Nubians, who had been crowded out by the Cushites, began to get the upper hand of it, and at length it disappeared. The precise date of its extinction is unknown.

In person the Cushites were large, strong, and handsome. Their land produced corn and costly woods, such as ebony and balsam; of minerals they exported gold and gems; besides these they drove a large trade in cattle and rare animals, as well as in negro slaves. These are all depicted on the monuments as articles of tribute paid to Egypt.

The culture and religion of the Cushites were derived from Egypt, and began to take firm root among them as early as the time of the Hyksos. They developed the arts thus received; so that, toward the end of the eighteenth dynasty, not only the natural products named above, but artistic furniture, covered with woven stuffs of many colors, shields lined with variegated skins, chariots of gold and iron, rich garments, ear-rings, and bracelets, together with other fine work in gold, appear in a representation of tribute-offerings.

The language of the African Cushites was distinct from the Egyptian, and is represented by that of the modern Bischari; but they employed the Egyptian hieroglyphs from an early time. A peculiar demotic character which abounds in the neighborhood of the Island of Meroe is not yet deciphered, but is believed to belong to the later Cushite period, probably since the time of Ergamenes.

The land and people of Cush are usually called, after the Greek writers (so in the LXX., the Vulgate, and the Authorized Version), Ethiopia and Ethiopians; but the Cushites must be carefully distinguished, not only from the Nubians and negro tribes generally, but also from the Semitic people of Abyssinia, who spoke the Ge'ez (Ethiopic) language, and have transmitted to us a considerable Christian literature. These also came across the sea from Arabia, but cannot be traced back beyond the Christian era. See ABYSSINIAN CHURCH.

Of Cush, the Benjamite (Septuagint Xawai, Vulgate Chusi), who is named in the inscription of Ps. vii., nothing further is known. He must have been a persecutor of David, and was, perhaps, an instrument in the hands of Saul.

CUTHBERT, St., d. at Farne, March 20, 687; was born, in the first half of the seventh century, in Northumbria, beyond the Tweed, of humble descent. While shepherding his flock one night (in 651), he received, it is said, a heavenly revelation in form of a vision, and went immediately to the Monastery of Melrose (the Old Melrose, situated at the confluence of the Leader and the Tweed), whose provost, Boisil, admitted him into the brotherhood. Melrose was a colony from Lindisfarne, but was at this time sending out colonies herself. Cuthbert accompanied one which went to Ripon to found a monastery on a spot presented to them by Alchfrith; and served there as hostiliarius (with whom rests the entertainment of strangers). But when Alchfrith adopted the Roman views of Easter, the tonsure, etc., the monks of Ripon could not agree with him. They returned home to Melrose in 661; and in the same year, Boisil having died of the plague, Cuthbert succeeded him as provost. Afterwards, however,

Cuthbert must have adopted the Roman views himself; for in 664 he was called as provost to Lindisfarne expressly for the purpose of introducing those views among the monks of that monastery; in which task he succeeded. For twelve years he staid at Lindisfarne; but in 676 the ascetic tendency of his disposition gained upon him: he resigned his office, and settled as a hermit in one of the small islands of Farne. In 684 he was prevailed upon to return to Lindisfarne as its bishop, but only for two years. In 686 he went back to his hermitage on the lonely island, and there he died.

Already during life Cuthbert was revered by his brother-monks as a saint, and for centuries after his death his fame was still increasing. The power of working miracles was ascribed to him, and even to his remains. Before he died, he gave permission that his corpse might be brought to Lindisfarne, on the condition that the monks vowed never to desert it. Consequently, when the Danes took the monastery (in 875), and the monks fled, they carried Cuthbert's corpse along with them on a bier for eight years, until (in 883), they were settled at Chester-le-Street. Overtaken here, too, by the Danes, they began their wanderings again in 990, but were finally settled in 992 at Durham, in whose cathedral Cuthbert's remains now rest.

Ltr.—Of Cuthbert's own writings, Ordinations and Præcepta Vitæ Regularis, nothing has come down to us; but the materials for his biography are very rich. The oldest life of him was written between 698 and 705, by some unknown brother-monk, either from Lindisfarne or Melrose, and is printed in Act. Sanct. (March 20), and in Stevenson's edition of Bedæ Opera Minora (pp. 259–284). Of the two Lives by Bede, the oldest is in verse, the best in prose, both printed in Stevenson's B. Op. Min. (pp. 1–43, 45–137) and in Act. Sanct. (March 20). The Historia Translationum S. C. from the eleventh century, the Reginaldi Monachi Dunelmensis Libellus de . . . from the twelfth century, and treating especially of his miracles, and the so-called Irish life from the fourteenth century, have been published by the Surtees Society. CYPRIAN, Ernst Salomon, b. at Ostheim, Franconia, 1673; studied at Jena, and was appointed professor of philosophy at Helmstedt, 1699, rector of the gymnasium of Coburg, 1700, and member of the Over-Consistory, in 1713, in Gotha, where he died in 1745. Friedrich Wilhelm I. of Prussia, who considered the controversies between the Lutheran and Reformed Churches "a bitter sauce mixed by the priests," conceived the plan of effecting a union between all Protestant churches; and at first it seemed as if the plan would succeed. At this juncture, Cyprian appeared as one of the few staunch champions of the old orthodox Lutheranism, and wrote three pamphlets, Abgedrungenener Unterricht, etc. (1722), Authentique Rechtfertigung, etc. (1722), and Das Urtheil englischer Theologen von der Synode zu Dortrecht und ihrer Lehre (1723), which by their rich historical illustrations give considerable information about the whole question.

CYPRIANUS, Thascius Cæcilius, which last name he assumed in honor of an old presbyter, Cæcilius, who was instrumental in his conversion to Christianity, was born in Northern Africa, towards the close of the second, or in the beginning of the third, century, and educated at Carthage, where, in the fourth decade of the third century, he held a prominent position as a teacher of rhetoric. He was a man of wealth. His house and gardens were beautiful, his landed property considerable. He was also a man of elegance and dignity, both in dress and manners, both in literary productions and in business affairs. Of the history of his conversion nothing is known, but he was baptized in 245 or 246. Immediately after baptism he gave away a part of his fortune to the poor; and all his time he seems to have devoted to the study of the Bible and the Christian writers of the second century. His Epistola ad Donatum, De Idolorum Vanitate, and Libri III. Testimoniorum adv. Judæos, in the last two of which works he closely follows Minucius Felix and Tertullian's Apologeticus, belong to this period.

The African Church was at this period flourishing enough externally, but internally its state was rather precarious. The long peace it had enjoyed (nearly thirty years) had slackened the zeal and the discipline of its members. Even the character of the episcopate had suffered. Many of the bishops were engaged in agriculture or trade, or even in usury. Instances of fraud and swindling occurred among them. Sometimes they were so ignorant that they could not instruct the catechumens, nor distinguish between orthodox and heretical compositions. Under such circumstances the conversion of a man like Cyprian naturally made a sensation, and awakened expectations. In 248 the episcopal chair of Carthage became vacant, and he was elected bishop. It is characteristic, however, that it was the lower mass of the church-members which carried his election, while a portion of the presbytery opposed it to the very last. The poor, the ignorant, the humble, of the Church of Carthage, felt how good it would be to them to have for their bishop a man of wealth, a man of learning, a man of social standing. They knew of Cyprian that he was liberal with his means, that he was possessed of brilliant literary talents, that he showed both decision and tact in business transactions, and they would hear of no refusal. Between July 248 and April 249 he was consecrated bishop. The opposition did not dissolve, however, after its defeat. On the contrary, it became more firmly organized; and it soon found a point from which an attack could be made. Early in 250 Decius issued the edict for the suppression of Christianity, and the persecution began. Measures were first taken against the bishops and officers of the church: by slaying the shepherds it was hoped the flock would be stolen. The proconsul on circuit, and five commissioners for each town, administered the edict; but, when the proconsul reached Carthage, Cyprian had fled.

In his book De Lapsis, and in his letters to his congregation, to his fellow-bishops of the African Church, and to the clergy of Rome, Cyprian defends very adroitly the line of conduct he had adopted; but none of the reasons which he proffers — the necessity of preserving himself for the good of his church, the direct command of God through a vision, etc. — are quite acceptable, and with the idea of heroism they are altogether incompatible. But it must be remembered, first, that martyrdom had not yet become a fashion, a rage, the necessary close of a distinguished life, the greatest grace which God could grant. When the Decian persecution broke out, Dionysius of Alexandria, Gregory Thaumaturgus, Maximus of Nola, and many other bishops, did as Cyprian, — fled before the storm. Next, the edict was directed, principally if not alone, against the bishops, — a circumstance which could not but influence their policy. In Rome the congregation left, for this very reason, the episcopal chair unoccupied for sixteen months after the martyrdom of Fabian. Finally the individual character must be taken into account. Cyprian was a man of education, not of genius; he reasoned from facts, not from enthusiasm; he acted upon convictions, not upon passion. But with such characters every thing grand is the result of a slow growth, not of a moment's inspiration; and the remark of Augustine about Cyprian's style, that it ripened with age, growing simpler, nobler, and more fit to express the fulness of Christian truth, must be applied also to his conduct. Nevertheless, his flight gave his enemies a dangerous weapon in hand. Towards the close of 250 he sent the two bishops, Caldonius and Herculanius, to Carthage with money for the poor, with spiritual aid for the weak, with disciplinary power for those who had fallen. But in Carthage Caldonius and Herculanius met with the most determined opposition from the side of Felicissimus, a deacon; and when Cyprian excommunicated Felicissimus, five presbyters, headed by Novatus, took up his cause: a schism thus broke out. In spring of 251 Cyprian returned; and the great question of the re-admission into the Church of the lapsi, especially of the libellatici, was now to be decided. The most extreme views found defenders. One party refused altogether to re-admit the lapsi: another granted them re-admission without any restriction at all. Cyprian adopted a middle course: after due penance he re-admitted those who had fallen. In the synods of Carthage (251 and 252) he carried through his policy, and it became the policy of the whole Christian Church. The two other parties, however, in which his adversaries were mixed up in a most singular manner (see the articles on Felicissimus, Novatianus, and Novatus), appointed each an anti-bishop, Maximus and Fortunatus. The schism was thus complete.

It would seem, however, that the authority of Cyprian was in no way impaired by this schism. The practical wisdom, the inexhaustible energy, and the great self-abnegation with which he administered to the weal of his flock during the horrible plague which reached Carthage in 252 (see his De Mortalitate and De Eleemosynis), drew all true Christians close to their bishop; and the schismatics were forgotten. At the time when the controversy concerning baptism broke out between him and Bishop Stephen of Rome (255), Cyprian stood undisputedly as the prominent and most influential leader in the Christian Church. The Roman Church held that baptism administered in due form was valid, even when administered by a heretic, and admitted baptized heretics and schismatics by simple imposition of hands; while Cyprian protested that there was no baptism outside of the orthodox church, and baptized, or rather re-baptized, heretics and schismatics, before admitting them into the church. The Roman view held the ground; but it is very instructive to notice the relation in which Cyprian places himself to the Bishop of Rome. Acknowledging Rome as the natural centre of Christendom, and the successor of Peter as primus inter pares, he recognizes the precedence as one of honor only, and by no means as one of power. Of a feeling of subordination, of a yielding to a higher power of jurisdiction, there is in all his tracts and letters not the least trace. The papacy was not yet born. On the contrary, it is Cyprian who is styled Papa by the Roman bishop; and he does not give back the title to his interlocutor.

In spring of 257 Valerian's edict against the Christians was issued, and in August, Cyprian appeared before the proconsul, Aspasius Paternus; and, when he refused to offer sacrifice to the Roman state-gods, he was banished to Curubis, a lonely place on the seashore, but only a day's journey from Carthage. He lived there eleven months, in decent retirement, and in steady communication with his flock. A new proconsul, Galerius Maximus, recalled him; but shortly after a much severer edict was issued, and (Aug. 13) he was again arrested. On Sept. 13 the trial began, and the next day the proconsul pronounced reluctantly the sentence of death by the sword. "Deo Gratias!" Cyprian exclaimed. The execution followed immediately. But the proceedings were carried on, from the side of the State, with a regard for the victim which shows the great weight he carried in public opinion; and the execution was witnessed with a sympathetic awe which was still vibrating in people's hearts when Augustine preached.

LIT. — The first collected edition of Cyprian's works is that by ERASMUS (Basel, 1520); among the later are those by GOLDRORN (Leipzig, 1838-39, 2 vols.), and G. HARTEL (Vienna, 1868-71, 3 vols.). The last is by far the best: it rests upon a critical comparison of above forty manuscripts. Translations into English of his treatises On Mortality, On the Lord's Prayer, etc., are numerous. Of his complete works there are two, — by MARSHALL (London, 1717, fol.), and by R. E. WALLIS, in Ante-Nicene Library, vol. VIII., 1868, and XIII., 1869.

The sources to Cyprian's life are, besides his own writings and the church-history of Eusebius, PONTIUS, De Vita Cypriani, and the Acta Proconsularia Martyrii Cypriani, both given by RUINART, Act Mart., II., and the former in most editions of his works. Among modern treatments of his life are, J. PEARSON: Annales Cypriani, Oxford, 1682; II. DODWELL: Diss. Cypri., Oxford, 1684; A. F. GERVAISE: La vie de St. Cyprien, Paris, 1717; RETTBERG: Thasc. C. Cyprianus, Göttingen, 1831; G. A. POOLE: Life and Times of C., Oxford, 1840; B. FECHTRUP: *Der heilige Cyprian. I. CYPRUS, a large fertile island of the Mediterranean Sea, triangular in form, a hundred and fifty miles long, and from fifty to sixty miles broad. Its principal towns were Salamis at the east, and Paphos at the west, end of the island. Its chief goddess was Venus, who had a famous temple at Paphos, and hence was called the Paphian goddess, as well as Cypria. The island was colonized in early times by the Phœnicians. It is called Chittim in the Old Testament. The Greeks gave it the name Kypros, perhaps from the plant of that name, which is our henna. Copper, and articles in copper, made the inhabitants rich. Cyprus was successively tributary to the great empires of antiquity, and finally fell under Rome (B.C. 58). Cicero was proconsul there (B.C. 52). In the reign of Trajan (117 A.D.) the Jews there revolted, massacred the Greek inhabitants, but were massacred themselves. In the division of the Roman Empire the island fell to the East; in the seventh and ninth centuries the Saracens seized it; but each time it quickly lapsed again into the hands of the Byzantine emperors; but from them the Crusaders, under Richard I. of England, wrested it (A.D. 1191), and gave it to "the titular king of Jerusalem, as some compensation for the loss of the holy city." Later the Genoese and Venetians held it, until in 1570 the Turks dispossessed the Venetians. According to the terms of the treaty of Berlin (1878), the island was secured by the English Government. Gen. Cesnola's excavations there have been of extraordinary interest and value (CESNOLA: Cyprus; its Ancient Cities, Tombs, and Temples, N. Y., 1877).

In the Acts alone Cyprus is mentioned. The gospel very quickly reached it; and the response to the Master's command, "Go," was very prompt (Acts xi. 19, 20; cf. xxi. 16). Barnabas was a Levite of Cyprus (iv. 36), and naturally began there his missionary activity (xiii. 4), and sailed thither after his dispute with Paul (xv. 39). The other New-Testament references are purely geographical. All the notices of Cyprus occurring in ancient writers can be found in MEURSIUS Opera, vol. iii., Flor., 1744, and in ENGEL: Kypros, eine Monographie, Berlin, 1841, 2 vols.; FR. LÖHER: Cyprus, History and Description, CYRE'NE, the capital of a small province, and the chief city of Libya, in Northern Africa. Modern Tripoli corresponds to the province. It was a Greek city, dating from B.C. 631. Alexander the Greek granted the Jews, who formed about a fourth of its population, the rights of citizenship on equal terms with the Greeks. After Alexander's death, the city became a dependency of Egypt, and in B.C. 75 became a Roman province. The New-Testament allusions to it are of singular interest. Simon, a Cyrenian, bore our Lord's cross (Matt. xxvii. 32); Cyrenians were present at Pentecost (Acts ii. 10, vi. 9), and of them were some of the earliest preachers of the gospel (Acts xi. 20, xiii. 1). The city was destroyed by the Saracens in the fourth century, and is now desolate.

CYRIACUS (synonymous with Dominicus, "belonging to the Lord") is the name of several persons, some legendary and some historical. Thus the Acta Sanctorum contain no less than eleven saints of this name, among whom are a deacon of Rome, who was sentenced to the galleys under Diocletian, fled to King Sapore of Persia, and was beheaded under Maximian; and a pope of Rome, who resigned his office, and followed St. Ursula and her eleven thousand virgins to Cologne, where they all suffered martyrdom. It has proved impossible to get a place for this pope in the papal succession; but then it has been suggested that the cardinals may have erased his name from the catalogues, from indignation over his abdication! The Church of St. Cyriacus, however, in Neuhausen, near Worms, boasts of possessing his remains.

Historical are Cyriacus, Patriarch of Constantinople in the time of Gregory I., and Cyriacus, Metropolitane of Carthage in the time of Gregory VII. The former was presbyter and aconomicus of the Church of Constantinople, when (in 595) he was elected patriarch, on the death of John IV. Like his predecessor, he assumed the title of "Œcumenical Patriarch," and a synod of Constantinople confirmed the title; but these proceedings were met with the most violent protests from Gregory I. of Rome, who wrote letters upon letters to the Emperor Mauritius and to the other patriarchs of the Orient, denouncing the assumption as scandalous, perverse, punishable, anti-Christian, Satanic, etc. (see JAFFÉ: Regesta Pontif., 1105, 1109, 1111). In 602 Mauritius was dethroned by Phocas, a rude and coarse soldier; and disagreement soon arose between the emperor and the patriarch. Gregory I. was too wide awake not to avail himself of such an opportunity; and, according to Roman historians, Phocas issued an edict in which he designated the Bishop of Rome as caput omnium ecclesiarum. But the edict does not exist, and is probably a mere fable. At all events, the edict had not appeared when Cyriacus died (Oct. 7, 606); and the connection which some authors have thought to find between the imperial edict and the death of the patriarch is mere fiction. See Gregorii I. Epistole, VII.

of the eleventh century, was one of the last Christian bishops of Northern Africa. He refused to perform uncanonical consecration; and for this reason some of his flock accused him before the Saracenic emirs, who tortured him in a most cruel manner. He addressed himself to Gregory VII., and received from him letters of consolation and exhortation. See Gregorii VII. Registr., I., 22, 23; and JAFFÉ: Reg. Pont. ad ann., 1073, Sept. 15, No. 3557.

CYRIL OF ALEXANDRIA was b. in Alexandria, towards the close of the fourth century, and d. there in 444. After living for several years as a monk in the Nitrian Mountains, he succeeded his uncle Theophilus on the patriarchal chair of Alexandria, in 412. Like his predecessor, he distinguished himself by his violence against any deviation from what he considered orthodox faith. He expelled the Novatians from their church, and robbed their church-treasury; he led in person the mob which drove all Jews away from Alexandria in 415; and he took part, at least indirectly, in the foul murder of Hypatia. He became most notorious from his controversy with Nestorius, Patriarch of Constantinople. Nestorius refused to give to Mary the predicate θεοτόκος: this occasioned Cyril to write a treatise (429), explaining the union of the logos and the human nature in Christ, and the birth of the logos by Mary, and to issue an encyclic letter to the Egyptian monks, warning them against Nestorianism. The controversy between the two patriarchs soon became very excited; and both endeavored to gain the emperor, Theodosius II., and Pope Celestine, over on his side. Celestine finally decided against Nestorius, and commissioned Cyril to excommunicate him if he did not recant within ten days. Cyril consequently convened a synod at Alexandria, and the anathema was spoken against any one who refused to give to Mary the disputed predicate. Nestorius answered with a counter-anathema, and both appealed to an œcumenical synod. This, the third, was called by the emperor, at Ephesus, 431. But, before John of Antioch and his bishops arrived, the synod condemned Nestorius and his doctrine of the two natures in Christ. The Antiochian bishops (from thirty to forty) then formed an independent synod, and condemned Cyril; and the emperor confirmed both condemnations, — both that of Nestorius and that of Cyril. The party of the latter, however, succeeded in gaining over the emperor; and Cyril was re-instated in his see, while Nestorius was sent back to his monastery. A reconciliation was afterwards effected between Cyril and John of Antioch; but the former continued to look with suspicion at the Antiochian school, especially at Diodorus of Tarsus, and Theodorus of Mopsuestia, whom he considered the true fathers of Nestorianism. Besides his dogmatical works, Cyril wrote ten books of Apologetics against Julian, and a number of homilies. His collected works have been edited by J. AUBERT, Paris, 1638, 4 vols. fol. His Life has been written by RENANDOT: Hist. Patriarcharum Alex., Paris, 1743; KOPALLIK: Cyryllus von Alexandria, Mainz, 1881.

C. BURK.

CYRIL LUCAR (Cyrillus Lucaris, Kyrillos Loukaris, i. e., Cyril, son of Lucar), Patriarch of Constantinople; b. 1568 or 1572, in Candia (Crete);

strangled to death, by order of the Sultan, in Constantinople, 1638. He studied and travelled extensively in Europe, and was for a while rector and Greek teacher in the Russian seminary at Ostrog, in modern Volhynia, a part of Western Russia, formerly Lithuania. In French Switzerland he became acquainted with the Reformed Church, and embraced its faith. Subsequently he openly professed it in a letter to the professors of Geneva (1636) through Leger, a minister from Geneva who had been sent to Constantinople, and conceived the bold scheme of ingrafting Protestant doctrines on the old œcumenical creeds of the Eastern Church, thereby effecting her reformation. In 1593 he was ordained in Alexandria a priest of the Greek Church, and afterwards archimandrite by his uncle, who was the patriarch. In 1595 he went as exarch to Poland to oppose the union of the Greek and Latin churches; from this event dates his hatred of the Latin Church. In 1602 he was elected Patriarch of Alexandria, and of Constantinople in 1621. In 1623 he was deposed by the intrigues of Jesuits, and banished to the Island of Rhodes, but re-instated mainly through the exertions of the English ambassador at the Turkish court. In 1629 he wrote in Latin his remarkable Confession, and in Greek in 1631, with an addition of four questions and answers. It was published in both languages at Geneva, 1633. It expresses his own individual faith, which he vainly hoped would become the faith of the Greek Church. It is divided into eighteen brief chapters, each fortified with Scripture references. Eight chapters contain the old Catholic doctrine, while the rest bear a distinctively Protestant character; thus in chap. ii. he asserts that the authority of the Scriptures is superior to the authority of the Church, since the Scriptures only are infallible, and defends their circulation, excluding the Apocrypha. In chap. iii. he accepts the Calvinistic doctrine of the decrees; in chap. xv. he maintains that the sacraments are two in number, and that faith is the condition of their application, and in chap. xvii. that there is a real but spiritual presence. As might be supposed, Cyril was persecuted. Five times he was deposed, five times re-instated. He was well aware that his foes were many, and his staunch friends few. The Jesuits, with the aid of the French ambassador at the Sublime Porte, spared no intrigues to counteract and checkmate his Protestant schemes, and to bring about instead a union of the Greek hierarchy with Rome. Even the printing-press, which he had imported from England on which to print his Confession and several catechisms, was, on their instigation, destroyed by the Turkish Government. At length they succeeded in their unprincipled designs. They accused him of conspiring against the government. He was strangled by order of the Sultan, and his body was thrown into the Bosphorus. His friends surrounded the palace of his successor, Cyril of Berœa, who had been a chief instigator of his murder, crying, "Pilate, give us the dead, that we may bury him." But it was not until the body, once thrown up by the tide, had been again pushed upon the unwilling waters, and again returned, that it was given over to the dead man's adherents. Cyril of Berœa was himself soon after deposed and anathema-tized for fraud, extortion, and the part he took in Cyril Lucar's death; and the next patriarch, Parthenius, granted the reformer a decent burial.

Cyril unfortunately left no followers able or willing to carry on his work. His doctrines were denounced by the Patriarch Cyril of Berœa and the synod of Constantinople held in 1638; which condemnation was confirmed by the synods of Jassy, in Moldavia, 1642, and of Jerusalem, 1672. The two latter synods saved the honor of Cyril's name and his patriarchal dignity by boldly denying the authenticity of his Confession, and contradicting it by written documents from his pen. It is, however, a vain invention which attributes it to Cornelius van der Haga, ambassador of the United Netherlands to the Sublime Porte. Cyril sincerely loved his church, and ardently longed to bring her back to the primitive faith, and to guard her against the seductions of Rome. The Greek Church of his day was surely in a humiliating condition under the Mohammedan yoke and amid the toils of Rome. Cyril may have looked longingly upon Protestant aid, which he knew was to be obtained only on condition of acceptance of the Protestant faith. He certainly did his best to bring about this desired result. He entered into correspondence with Protestant divines in Switzerland, Holland, and England (e.g., with Abbot, Archbishop of Canterbury), sent promising youths to Protestant universities, and enlisted the press to circulate the truth. But all was in vain. Yet not all; for his nobility of thought and conduct, his ability and courage, his sincerity and piety, have endeared his memory to that nation which he was fain to lead to the liberty and religion of Christ.

Cyril Lucar has a peculiar claim upon Bible students, because he presented the famous uncial codex Alexandrinus, denominated codex A. (see BIBLE-TEXT, N.T.), to Charles I. of England, 1628. He also translated the New Testament into the modern Greek language, Geneva (or Leyden), 1638, London, 1703.

CYRIL OF JERUSALEM, b. probably in 315; d. probably March 18, 386; spent his whole life in Jerusalem, where he was consecrated deacon, in 335, by Bishop Makarius, and presbyter, in 345, by Bishop Maximus, and where he finally became bishop himself. In the Arian controversy he tried to maintain a neutral position, in which, however, he did not succeed. After the death of Maximus, or, as Socrates and Sozomen have it, after the expulsion of Maximus by the Arians, Cyril became bishop by the aid of this party. At all events, he was consecrated by Acacius of Cæsarea, who was an Arian. But the harmony between him and Acacius did not last long. According to the seventh canon of the Council of Nice, the Bishop of Jerusalem ranked immediately after the Bishops of Rome, Alexandria, and Antioch, though with reservation of the right of the Bishop of Cæsarea as metropolitane. From this point the disagreement began; but it was greatly inflamed by religious discrepancies. Acacius cited Cyril before him; and, when the latter declined to appear, the former had him deposed by a council of only a few bishops (358). Cyril appealed to another and larger council, held at Seleucia (359), and mostly composed of Semi-Arians; and this council deposed Acacius. But in 360 a still larger council of Arians, held in Constantinople, confirmed the deposition of Cyril; and it was only the death of Constantius and the accession of Julian which enabled Cyril to return to his see. During the last twenty years he lived in comparative peace and quiet, though he was expelled twice more, under Valens.

Of the works ascribed to Cyril, the homilies are certainly spurious, though with the exception of the one on the impotent man at the Pool of Bethesda, first published by Thomas Milles in 1703, which seems to be genuine. The letter addressed to the Emperor Constantius, and giving an account of a vision of a radiant cross in the heavens, is, at all events, much interpolated. But the catecheses, or catechetical lectures, are genuine, and are of the greatest interest, both for the history of the Christian dogmas, and for the true understanding of the liturgy and catechetical methods of the ancient Church. They were edited by J. Prevot (Paris, 1608), Thomas Milles (Greek and Latin, Oxford, 1703, fol.), and A. A. Toutée (Paris, 1720, fol., reprinted at Venice, 1763). There is a translation of them in German by Feder, Bamberg, 1786. See VAN VOLLENHOVEN: Specimen Theol. De Cyr. Hier. Cat., Amsterdam, 1837; I. TH. PLITT: *De Cyrilli Hier. CYRILLUS and METHODIUS, the apostles of the Slavs. In the sixth and more especially in the eighth century, the Slavs penetrated across the Danube and the Balkan, into Macedonia, Epirus, Thessalia, Hellas, and Peloponnesus, and took permanent possession of those regions. Towards the close of the eighth century they were Christianized from Thessalonica, in which place Greek civilization, stimulated by the influx of the Slav elements, burst into a fresh bloom. It was also from Thessalonica that the conversion of the Slavs outside the Greek Empire was effected. Cyrillus and Methodius were born there in the first half of the ninth century.

the friendship of the learned Photius, was for some time a teacher himself of profane science, and was given the surname "the Philosopher," which he retained ever after. Soon, however, the religious tendency of his nature gained the ascendancy. He entered the clerical estate, took up his abode in a monastery, together with his brother Methodius, removed thence, and finally settled in the solitude of the mountains. At the same time he began to take active part in the dogmatical controversies. He had a dispute with Photius about the unity or duality of the soul; he defended the worship of images; he distinguished himself as a Christian apologist against the Mohammedans; and in this last direction went also his first activity as a missionary.

Among the Chazari, a Tartar tribe occupying the regions between the north-eastern shore of the Black Sea and the lower course of the Wolga, Jews and Mohammedans had for some time been busy making proselytes. Christian missionaries had also visited them; and when, in 860, they addressed the emperor, Michael III., on the question, he sent Cyrillus to them. In order to prepare himself properly for the mission, Cyrillus first settled at Cherson, and began to study the language of the Chazari; and it was in Cherson that he came in possession of the remains of Clement of Rome, which he afterwards always carried about wherever he went. After due preparation he penetrated deeper into the country; and, under the protection of the chief, he preached and held disputations in defence, and for the propagation, of Christianity. It also seems that a considerable number of the inhabitants decided in his favor: but there is not the least trace of any church organization among them; and, some years later on, the majority of the Chazari had adopted either Judaism or Mohammedanism. Having effected the release of a number of Greek captives, Cyrillus returned with the relics of St. Clemens to Constantinople, where he lived in ascetic seclusion, together with his brother, until a field of practical activity opened before them.

Rastislav had just formed a great Slav Empire on the eastern boundary of Germany. Its name was Moravia: its boundaries are uncertain, and were probably somewhat variable. A number of his subjects were Christians, converted by German missionaries from Passau and Salzburg. But, with German missionaries of that time, conversion to Christianity meant, first and foremost, political submission; and this was the very reason why Rastislav wanted the whole matter put into the hands of the Greek Church. The Greek missionaries employed only instruction, no violence, and they were always willing to adapt themselves to national peculiarities. By their aid only an independent Slav Church could be reared; and, as it was only such a church which could fit into the politic fabric of Rastislav, he was eager to invite Greek missionaries to come to Moravia. Cyrillus and Methodius accepted the invitation. They were well prepared for the task. They understood the Slav language; perhaps they themselves belonged to a family of Grecized Slavs: at all events, they must have heard the Slav language at Thessalonica from their early youth. Cyrillus had even formed an idea of influencing the Slavs in a literary way. He had translated parts of the Bible into Slav, and invented an alphabet, by means of which the translation could be put in writing.

In 863 the two brothers arrived at the court of Rastislav, where they were well received; and the labor began. They founded a seminary for the education of native priests; they distributed the holy writings in Slav translation; they taught the people, preached, and celebrated divine service, in the vernacular tongue, etc. The effect was very great. The German priests, with their Latin liturgy, which they did not understand themselves, and their perpetual haggings about tithes and revenues, returned to their respective dioceses; and an independent national church began to arise among the Slavs. Pope Nicholas I. was well aware of the importance of this fact, and summoned the two brothers to Rome to have their work legitimized. The summons was immediately obeyed. Cyrillus always nourished a kind of mystic enthusiasm for Rome; and Nicholas I. was much beloved on account of the rare wisdom and full trustworthiness which he had evinced in the Bulgarian affairs. Accompanied by a great number of pupils, the brothers set out for Rome in 867, carrying thither the remains of St. Clemens. When they reached the city, Nicholas I. had died. But Adrian II. adopted, with respect to the Slav mission, the policy of his predecessor; and the organization of a Slav Church, independent both of the Greek and the German Church, and corresponding directly with the see of Rome, was agreed upon. Of the Slav translation of the Bible, of the Slav liturgy, the Pope took no umbrage, not even of the Greek dogmatics. Cyrillus died in Rome, Feb. 14, 868; and Methodius returned alone to Moravia, having been consecrated archbishop of the new church.

The establishment of the Slav Church was, to some extent, an encroachment upon the rights of the Archbishop of Salzburg; and in 871 a memoir appeared, setting forth how the countries now belonging to the diocese of Methodius originally had received Christianity from Salzburg, and how the Greek Methodius had seduced the people, and allured them away from the doctrine, liturgy, and language of the Roman Church. On the merely juridical side of the question this memoir made no impression, either in Moravia, or in Germany, or in Rome. But Pope John VIII. was very much averse to the use of the Slav language in divine service, and considered that the time had come to take back the concession which his predecessors had granted. He consequently ordered Methodius to substitute the Latin for the Slav language; and, when this order was disregarded, he summoned him to Rome. But when Methodius arrived in Rome, and began to explain the whole matter, the Pope understood that he could not treat the Slav Church in this high-handed manner, without throwing it directly into the arms of the Patriarch of Constantinople. Methodius returned from Rome in 880 with an express confirmation of the use of the Slav language in his Church, and with his doctrines and practices fully justified.

In the mean time a suffragan see had been established at Neitra, and its first occupant was Wiching. But Wiching was a vehement adversary of Methodius and the Slav churches. As Swatopluk, the successor of Rastislav, also leaned towards Germany, Wiching succeeded, by supposititious letters from the Pope, exciting him against Methodius, whose position became more and more difficult. Methodius addressed himself to the Pope for support, and the Pope answered him very kindly March 23, 881. But John VIII. died in 882; and in the contest with Wiching, Swatopluk, and the German prelates, Methodius finally succumbed. His successor, Gosrad, a Slav, was expelled. The Slav language and liturgy were abolished in the service, and supplanted by the Latin; the Slav priests were persecuted, and finally banished: they fled to Bulgaria, whither they brought the Slav translation of the Bible. The death-year of Methodius is not known: it varies between 881 and 910. The Pannonian legend gives April 6, 885. The Bohemians and Moravians celebrated the thousandth jubilee of their apostle, July 5, 1863. Cyrillus and Methodius were canonized in 1881, under Pope Leo XIII.

CYRUS THE GREAT (date of birth unknown, d. B.C. 529) is named in the following passages of the Old Testament. — 2 Chron. xxxvi. 22, 23; Ez. i. 1-8, iii. 7, iv. 3, 5, v. 13, 14, 17, vi. 3-5, 14; Isa. xlv. 23, xlv. 1; Dan. i. 21, vi. 28, x. 1. For his history in detail we must look to Greek writers, particularly Herodotus, Xenophon, and Ktesias, and to scanty but invaluable contemporary records in the cuneiform character. His early life is obscured by conflicting traditions, through which only a few general facts may be clearly distinguished. Cyrus (Persian K'ur'ush, Babylonian Kuraš, Hebrew שָׁרָא, Greek Kūros:

the meaning is in dispute) was the descendant of a line of kings ruling in Anzan (Babylonian Anšan, or Aššan), a country known to the nations west of it as Elam (highland). They had established themselves there by invasion, not many generations before Cyrus, whose genealogy is traced in the inscriptions no farther than his great-grandfather, Teispes. The order is as follows: Cyrus, Cambyses, Cyrus, Teispes. What relation this royal line had sustained to Persia, the country south-east of Anzan, we cannot certainly tell; but to Media on the north it had probably paid a continuous or occasional tribute. Herodotus and Xenophon tell us that Cyrus's mother was Mandane, the daughter of Astyages, King of Media: this is opposed to the testimony of Ktesias, and is unlikely. It is still more unlikely that Astyages sought to kill his grandson, because he was heir to the throne (Herodotus). All traditions, however, point to a sojourn of Cyrus at Astyages' court, presumably as hostage. While there, he no doubt observed the degeneracy of the Median kingdom, and the disaffection of the nobles from Astyages, who estranged them by his arbitrariness and favoritism. In B.C. 558, probably at the death of Cambyses his father, Cyrus ascended the throne of Anzan; and his ordinary title in the contemporary cuneiform records is "King of Anzan," rarely "King of the land of Persia." How soon the struggle with Astyages began is not clear; but its decisive settlement was not reached till 550, when, in the midst of a campaign, the soldiers of Astyages revolted, and delivered him into Cyrus's hands. Cyrus then seized and plundered the royal city Ecbatana. After the fall of Media, and the voluntary or forced acknowledgment of Cyrus's authority by several tributary peoples, with Armenia already his friend, he soon turned his attention toward Lydia. Croesus, its king, was overcome, and Sardis captured in 547; and while the general of Cyrus was reducing the whole Ionian coast to submission, Cyrus himself marched toward the East. The following eight years were spent in triumphant campaigns, which made his power felt even beyond the Indus. But a further achievement was in store for him, less difficult, as it proved, than many others, but of far-reaching importance. He must become master of Babylonia. In the month Tammuz (July), B.C. 538, he entered Accad, or Northern Babylonia, with a powerful army. The empire which Nebuchadnezzar had made so terrible had, however, become outwardly reduced and inwardly weak. Nabonidus the king was too inactive to secure the enthusiasm of the people, and too negligent of the gods and temples to retain the support of the powerful hierarchy. Accad revolted from him, and none were more eager than the priests in welcoming the conqueror. Cyrus entered Sippara ("City of the Sun," comp. Heb. שִׁפְרָא) without striking a blow; and two days later his general, Gobryas, occupied Babylon, where Nabonidus, who had fled from the field at the time of the revolt, was taken prisoner. Cyrus followed in person nearly four months later (3d Marchesvan), and appointed Gobryas and others to official positions. Nabonidus died before the close of the year.

Cyrus's religious policy began at once to show a marked difference from that of Nabonidus. He repaired the shrines; he issued a proclamation calling Merodach and Nebo "his lords," and recognizing his victory as due to them; his son Cambyses presided at a great religious festival; he pacified tributary peoples by restoring to them the images of their gods which had been brought to Babylon. Among those whose religious feelings he thus regarded were the captive Hebrews, to whom he at the same time restored certain political and social rights. The coming of this deliverer had been foretold to them (Isa. xlv. 23, xlv. 1 sqq., xlv. 1 sqq.; Jer. l., li., etc.), and no doubt they welcomed him with joy and hope. This hope was gratified by an edict, transmitted to us in two fragments (Ez. i. 2-4, vi. 3-5), in which he gave them permission to return to Jerusalem, and directed that Jehovah's temple should be there rebuilt at the expense of his own treasury. This was evidently in pursuance of his settled policy of conciliation. The remaining years of Cyrus were spent chiefly in reducing to order the affairs of his vast empire. Some dated tablets prove, that, as early as B.C. 532, he set Cambyses on the throne of Babylonia as semi-independent ruler of that province. He himself was doubtless engaged elsewhere. His last expedition was against a people in the north-east (either the Massagetæ or the Derbikkæ), and it ended in his death from wounds received in battle B.C. 529. His tomb, of doubtful genuineness, is still to be seen on the plain of Murgab, north of Persepolis.

Cyrus was not a monotheistic zealot: he was probably a polytheist, and no Zoroastrian at all. His own records show him uttering the same language in regard to Merodach that Ezra puts into his mouth with reference to Jehovah. It can hardly have had much depth of meaning in either case. But he was politic and considerate, knowing how to use the sentiments of others for large political ends; and, even if his friendly treatment of the Hebrews sprang mainly from a desire to have attached subjects on a threatened frontier, he was none the less their deliverer from bondage.

In the nature of the case he could not organize his vast conquests as Darius afterwards did. If he had been born heir to a great empire, instead of having to create one, his administrative power would have had freer play. As it was, the qualities of a determined, rapid, successful, politic, benignant conqueror, are those that will perpetuate his fame.

DACH, Simon, b. at Memel, July 29, 1605; d. at Königsberg, April 16, 1659; studied at Königsberg, Wittenberg, and Magdeburg, and became teacher in the cathedral school of Königsberg in 1633, co-rector in 1636, and professor of poetry in the university in 1639. He was the most prominent member of what, in the history of German literature, is called the School of Königsberg, and wrote a great number of poems, social and religious; the former without any value, the latter highly esteemed. They were printed separately, on loose leaves; but there are comprehensive collections of the original prints in the libraries of Königsberg, Breslau, and Berlin. The Prussian hymn-books of 1665 and 1675 contain many of his religious poems. The Churbrandenburgische Rose, Adler, Löw, und Scepter (1680) contains the verses he wrote in honor of the reigning dynasty. A selection of his poetry, and a life of him, is found in KARL GOEDEKE and JULIUS TRITTMANN: Deutsche Dichter d. 17ten Jahrhunderts, Leipzig, 1876.

DA COSTA, Isaak, b. in Amsterdam, Jan. 14, 1798; d. there April 23, 1860; belonged to a rich and distinguished family of Portuguese Jews, but embraced Christianity in 1821. He studied jurisprudence and belles-lettres at Leyden, and developed, under the influence of W. Bilderdyk, into one of the most brilliant poets of the Dutch literature. His poetical works appeared in three volumes at Harlem (1861). But, besides being a great poet, he was one of the most energetic and influential of modern Christian apologists. Possessed of comprehensive knowledge and considerable critical power, he opposed the anti-Christian tendencies of the age, especially the Tübingen school, with a zeal and perseverance which had effect also outside of his own country. He worked principally as a lecturer, and his apologetical works originated in the lecture-room. The most important was The Four Witnesses (1840, translated into English by D. Scott, London, 1851), directed against D. F. Strauss's Leben Jesu. His Life has been written by H. J. Koenen, in Handelingen van de Maatschappij der Nederl. Letterkunde, 1860. J. J. DACGETT, Oliver Ellsworth, D.D., b. at New Haven, Conn., Jan. 14, 1810; d. in Hartford, Sept. 1, 1880. He was graduated at Yale College (1828); was pastor of the South Church, Hartford, and of the First Congregational Church, Canandaigua, N.Y., twenty-three years; pastor of Yale College three years, and of the Second Congregational Church, New London, Conn.; and was one of the compilers of the Connecticut Hymn-Book, 1845.

DA'GON (דַּגּוֹן great fish), a Philistine divinity, having a marine body, and human face and hands. Philo Byblius, followed by others, falsely derived the name from Σίτρον (corn), and designates the god as Ζεὺς ἀγροτικός (the god of agriculture). That the former derivation is correct is plain from 1 Sam. v. 4, where it is reported, that, when the hands and face were broken off, only "Dagon" was left. The English version puts in what is not in the Hebrew, "the stump of Dagon." Dagon is allied to the Syrian female divinity, Atargatis (also called Derceto), and is probably the same as the Assyrian fish-god, Odakon, mentioned by Berosus. He had temples in Ashdod (1 Sam. v. 3 sqq.), where, on two successive nights, his image fell to the floor when the ark of the Lord was placed beside it, and at Gaza (Judg. xvi. 23 sqq.). This latter Samson pulled down by pushing out the two columns. Cities in Judah (Josh. xv. 41) and Asher (xix. 27) were called Beth-dagon ("home or temple of Dagon").

DAILLÉ, Jean, b. at Châtellerault, Jan. 6, 1594; d. at Charenton, April 15, 1670; studied at the seminary of Saumur, under Camero and Gomar; was an intimate friend of Amyraut and Cappel; lived for a number of years in the house of Gov. du Plessys-Mornay as tutor to his grandson, with whom he visited Italy, where he made the acquaintance of Sarpi at Venice, Switzerland, England, and Holland; and was in 1626 appointed pastor at Charenton, that is, to the Reformed Congregation of Paris. His principal work is his treatise De usu Patrum (1636), translated into English (1651) under the title, A Treatise concerning the right Use of the Fathers in the Decision of Controversies that are at this Day in Religion, re-edited by Jekyll, London, 1841, Philadelphia, 1842. His Exposition of the Philippians and of the Colossians have also been translated into English by Sherman, London, 1841.

D'ALLI, or D'AILLY. See AILLI.

DALBERG, Karl Theodor (baron, arch-chancellor of the German Empire, prince-primate of the Rhenish Confederacy, grand duke of Frankfurt), was b. at Hemsheim, Feb. 8, 1744, and d. at Regensburg, Feb. 10, 1817. He studied first law at Göttingen and Heidelberg, but entered afterwards the church, advanced rapidly, and became, as governor of Erfurt (from 1772), one of the centres of literary and political life in Germany, a friend of Goethe, the Mæcenas of Schiller, an intimate of Joseph II. Some very spirited writings of his belong to this period: Betrachtungen über d. Universum (1777), Verhältniss zwischen Moral und Staatskunst (1786), etc. In 1787 he was appointed coadjutor and successor to the Elector of Mayence, and in 1788 coadjutor to the Bishop of Mayence. In the same year he was consecrated Archbishop of Tarsus, and in 1797 he was made provost of the chapter of Würzburg. When the French invasion began, in 1797, he belonged to the patriot party; and for several years on he still clung to the old establishment of the empire. But he was unable to withstand Napoleon, who alternately coaxed and threatened him, until he became a mere tool in his hands. He was present at the coronation in Paris (1804); he signed the Rhenish Confederacy in 1806, and was made prince-primate; he accepted in 1810 the title and function as grand duke of Frankfurt; but he paid in honesty what he got in honors. After the battle of Leipzig he tried to explain his relation to Napoleon, but in vain. With a pension he retired from public life. His biography has been written by B. A. KRÄMER, Leipzig, 1821, and also by J. MÜLLER, Würzburg, 1874.

DALE, James Wilkinson, D.D., b. in New Castle County, Del., Oct. 16, 1812; d. at Media, Penn., April 19, 1881. He was graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1831, and at Princeton Theological Seminary. He also studied medicine with a view to more efficient missionary service in India; but the financial difficulties of the American Board prevented his departure, and for seven years he held an appointment from the Bible Society of Philadelphia, to distribute Bibles throughout the State. From 1845 to 1871 he was pastor of the united Ridley and Middletown Presbyterian churches in Delaware County, Pennsylvania, from 1871 to 1880 pastor of the Wayne, and, at his death, of the "Glen Riddle," Presbyterian Church.

Dr. Dale was a man of intense activity. He issued many sermons, and labored zealously in behalf of total abstinence. His reputation, however, was made by his elaborate works upon baptism, in which he defends pedobaptism and sprinkling. The volumes are, Classic Baptism (Philadelphia, 1867), Judaic (1871), Johannic (1872), Christic and Patristic (1874). Condensed statements of his views will be found in The Cup and the Cross, Philadelphia, 1872, and in his article BAPTISM, contributed to this Cyclopædia shortly before his death.

DALMATIA, a mountainous district on the east of the Adriatic Sea, visited by Titus (2 Tim. iv. 10).

DALMATIC (Dalmatica sc. vestis), a white tunic with long and wide sleeves, worn by rich and distinguished persons, at one time by the Roman senators, derived its name from the province Dalmatia, in which it was first manufactured. By a decree of Pope Sylvester I., 335, it was made a part of the deacon's vestment, and as such adorned by two longitudinal stripes behind. It corresponded to the colobium used in the Greek Church, which, however, was without sleeves.

DAMASCUS (usually called Esh-Shâm, also Dimishk), situated at the base of the Anti-Lebanon Mountains, in latitude 33° 32' N., longitude 36° 20' E., a hundred and thirty-three miles north-north-east of Jerusalem, and about fifty miles east of the Mediterranean, at an altitude of 2,260 feet above the sea, is one of the oldest and most remarkable cities in the world, — remarkable both on account of the beauty of its location and on account of the interest of its history. It is called the "Eye of the Desert." The Mohammedans regard it as the best earthly reflection of paradise.

Josephus affirms that the city was founded by Uz, the son of Aram; and it was certainly known in the days of the patriarchs, as Abraham's trusted servant Eliezer was a native of Damascus (Gen. xv. 2). It is often mentioned in the Old Testament, also in the Acts, and twice in the Epistles of Paul (Gal. i. 17, and 2 Cor. xi. 32). David conquered it after a bloody war (2 Sam. viii. 5, 6); but, under Solomon, an adventurer made himself King of Damascus, and founded an empire, with which the Israelites came thenceforth often into violent conflict. In 732 B.C. the kingdom of Damascus lost its independence, conquered by Tiglath-pileser; and the prophecy of Isaiah was thus fulfilled (Isa. xvii. 1-3). Alexander the Great conquered Syria in 333 B.C. After various fortunes, the country became a Roman province in 63 B.C. At the time of Christ, Damascus had several Jewish synagogues. In the Byzantine Empire it became the residence of a Christian bishop next in rank to the Patriarch of Antioch, and numbered several churches and a cathedral in honor of John the Baptist. In 634 A.D. it fell into the hands of Islam; and Moawyah, the first caliph of the Omeiyades, made it the capital of the Mohammedan Empire (661), and raised it to great splendor. During the crusades it shared the changing fortunes and misfortunes of the cities in the Holy Land. Saladin made it his headquarters in his campaigns with the Franks, and in 1516 it passed into the possession of the Turkish Sultan. The cross has never since displaced the crescent. Damascus is still a provincial capital of Turkey.

The most important event which took place in Damascus, and one of the most important events in the history of mankind, is the conversion of St. Paul. It is reported three times in the Acts of the Apostles (ix. 1-22, xxii. 4-20, xxvi. 12-20), and several times alluded to in the Epistles of St. Paul. It occurred a few years after the crucifixion of Christ, and a few weeks after the martyrdom of St. Stephen, about 37. An old tradition points out the place at a distance of about five miles from the city, at a point where the direct road from Jerusalem crosses the one from Banias and Kefr Hauwar, near an oasis and a fountain, in view of the minarets of the city, the majestic Hermon, and the bare ridge of the Anti-Lebanon. The window in the wall through which Paul was let down in a basket (2 Cor. xi. 33), the house of Ananias, and the house of Judas, are also shown; and "the street which is called Straight," and in which Ananias was to inquire after Saul of Tarsus, still bears that name.

At present the city is a hotbed of Mohammedan fanaticism: the Moslems mingle curses on the Christians with their prayers to Allah. Every Christian there remembers the frightful massacre in 1860. Taking advantage of the disturbances among the Druses in the Lebanon, the Moslems arose, on the 9th of July, against the Christians; and on that day and the following about three thousand adult males were murdered in cold blood, and many others afterwards died of their wounds, or perished in the desert. The Turkish Government looked on without interfering. A wholesome lesson, however, was given to the Moslems by the French expedition, and the punishment it inflicted upon the guilty; but the hatred is still burning, and restrained only by fear.

Since 1843 the United Presbyterian Church of America and the Presbyterian Church of Ireland have jointly maintained a mission in Damascus, with a church for converts from the Jews and the Greek Christians, and with schools. The London Society for the Conversion of the Jews has also a mission there.

DAMASUS is the name of two popes. — Damasus I. (366-384) was born in Rome, (probably 306), and made archdeacon in 355. His election to the episcopal see was contested by the deacon Ursicinus, and the contest spread even into the provinces. He was a staunch opponent of Arianism, and held one synod in Rome (in 368), which condemned the two Illyrian bishops Ursacius and Valens, and another (in 370), which condemned Auxentius of Milan. He stood in intimate relations to Jerome, whom he encouraged to revise the Latin translation of the Bible. He showed also great interest for the artistic improvement of the Roman Catacombs. After his death he was canonized. His festival falls on Dec. 11. His works, consisting of letters and poems, appeared in Rome 1638 and 1754, and in Paris 1840. See also MARTIN RADE: Damasus, Bischof von Rom., Freiburg in B., 1882. — Damasus II. was Bishop of Brixen, when, in 1048, he was elected Pope by the influence of Henry III.; but he died twenty-three days after his accession.

DAMIANUS, or DAMIANI, Peter, b. at Ravenna, 1007; d. at Faenza, Feb. 23, 1072; studied at Ravenna, Faenza, and Parma, and taught for several years in his native city, with great success, but retired, when about thirty years old, suddenly and unexpectedly, to the hermits of Fonte Avello, near Gubbio. Here, too, he distinguished himself; was made prior and abbot, enlarged and consolidated the congregation, and brought into fashion a new system of flogging-penance. The flogging, performed with a leathern thong on the bare back, accompanied the recitation of the psalms, and followed along with the measure of the verses. To each psalm belonged a hundred strokes; to the whole psalter, fifteen thousand. But three thousand strokes were computed to be equal to one year of damnation, and an energetic person could by one day's work make up for several years of penance. The fashion became a rage; and monks flogged themselves to death after the music of the psalms; and Damiani himself had to interfere, and try to moderate the enthusiasm. Meanwhile his fame grew prodigiously. The whole party among the Italian monks who inclined towards an austere view of monastic life looked to him as their leader. Miracles were ascribed to him; and when Henry III. came to Italy he found it necessary to make the hermit his ally, in order to have his reforms accepted by the people. With Gregory VI. and Clement II., Damiani corresponded; and to Leo IX. he sent his Liber Gomorrhianus, comparing the life of the clergy to that of the men of Sodom and Gomorrah. To the Hildebrand party he belonged, so to speak, by nature; and in 1058 Stephen X. called him from the hermitage to the papal court, and compelled him to assume the offices of Bishop of Ostia and head of the College of Cardinals. This position, however, did not suit him, and he fled back to the hermits. But he became, nevertheless, one of the most active members of the Hildebrand party. In 1059 Nicholas II. sent him as papal legate to Milan; and he succeeded in reforming the church, and bringing it into due submission to the Roman see. After the death of Nicholas II. he was very active for Alexander II., and did much for his cause in Florence, Monte Casino, and Clugny. In 1062

he became the confessor of Agnes, the widow of Henry III.; and in 1069 he was sent as papal legate to Henry IV., on account of his intimate relations both with the father and the mother of the young prince. Henry submitted. His last great practical undertaking was the reform of the church of his native city.

DAMIANUS, ST. See COSMAS and DAMIANUS.

DAMIANUS, d. 601; Patriarch of Alexandria, inclined towards monophysitism, and maintained views concerning the Holy Trinity very similar to those of Sabellius. "The godhead," he said, "of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, forms one single substance, in such a manner that the three persons of the Trinity are not God each by himself and separately, but only when united together." The adherents of this view were called Damianites, or, after their meeting-place in Alexandria, the Angelium, Angelites. Their adversaries called them Tetradites, Τετραδίταις, because they had four gods—the Father, the Son, the Holy Spirit, and the Divine Being—in which those three were united.

DANÆUS, Lambert, b. at Beaugenzy, in 1530; d. at Castres, 1595; studied, first law at Orléans, afterwards theology at Geneva, and was made pastor in Chien, but driven away by persecution in 1563; fled from France after the Massacre of the night of St. Bartholomew (1572), and was pastor in Geneva, and citizen of the city from 1581; accepted an invitation to Leyden, but was compelled to give up the position after the fall of Leicester; was finally made pastor and professor at Castres, in the Kingdom of Navarre. A list of his works, exegetical, dogmatical, ethical, etc., is given in HAAG, La France Protestante, IV. p. 194. He was one of the first to treat Christian ethics separately from dogmatics. His Commentary on the Minor Prophets was translated into English by Stockwood, London, 1594.

DANCE AMONG THE HEBREWS. The Hebrew language has several expressions denoting the art of "dancing." Thus we find rakad, which means to skip, or leap for joy (Eccl. iii. 4); karar, "to jump or spring" (2 Sam. vi. 14, 16); chagag, "turning round in a circle" (1 Sam. xxx. 16); and chul, "to twist," probably referring to the whirling motions of the dances (Judg. xxi. 21). Occasions for dancing were either solemn anniversaries in common life, or anniversaries partaking of a religious character. In the Old Testament no dancing or dancing procession in connection with divine service is mentioned. When it is said, "Return, return, O Shulamite; return, return, that we may look upon thee. What will ye see in the Shulamite? As it were the company of two armies" (Song of Songs, vi. 13), a form of dancing is probably meant, which is still used in the harems, where two rows of dancing-girls, in accordance with the orders given by a leader, perform their dances. At the dance the maidens made use of a tambourine, as is still customary in the East. From the time of Alexander the Great, Greek dances became customary in the East; and of the dances as were common among the Jews on the Feast of Tabernacles, or on the Day of Atonement, nothing is said in the Old Testament. They are the outgrowth of later Judaism.

DANCERS, wild enthusiasts of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries. Religious dancing, of a reverent and decorous sort, as, for instance, among the Shakers, has been occasionally introduced into Christian worship; but the sect of the Dancers, who were enthusiasts, first appeared in 1374, on the Lower Rhine, dancing in honor of St. John, although why he was selected no one knows. In July of that year they made their appearance at Aachen,—a crowd of men and women dancing hand in hand, either in pairs or in a circle, on the streets, in the churches, in private houses, wherever they might be, without shame, without rest, hour after hour, until they dropped from sheer exhaustion. Then convulsions set in: they felt severe pain in the abdomen, and so they cried out lustily, until by cloths wound tightly about their waists, by blows with the fists, or even by being trodden on, they got relief. During the dance they sang, "Here sent Johan, so so, frish ind fro, here sent Johan," and encouraged themselves to renewed exertions by crying, "Frish, friskes." They also employed unintelligible expressions, which were, of course, interpreted as calls upon unheard-of demons; visions visited them: in short, these dancers were thorough-going fanatics. But the mania spread in a short time through all the Low Country, and even into France: wherever these dancers went, they found ready imitators. Children left their parents, and joined the wandering, crazy throng; wives forgot their houses, maidens their duties; all classes sent recruits. Of course, immorality quickly showed itself, for thieves and libertines improved the opportunity. But at last the clergy bestirred themselves. The evil was universally attributed to demoniacal possession, and therefore it was to be cured by solemnly exorcising the devil. This was done with great success, although it was almost a year before the excitement entirely died out; and for several years afterwards sporadic cases of dancing were found. In Cologne, where these had been frequent, much time was required to get the mastery.

In the next century, the fifteenth, religious dancing again made its appearance; but the epidemic was milder than before, and of a different character. In Strasburg, for instance, during the plague in 1418, this form of enthusiasm appeared; but the dancers now went to the church, not to dance there, but to be healed. On advice they were collected and sent in divisions, under proper supervision, to the Chapel of St. Vitus at Rofestein, where the mass was celebrated for them, and they were led around the altar in solemn procession: hence our name for the disease "St. Vitus's Dance" (chorea). Cases of the malady, and occasionally very many, occurred up to the seventeenth century: they were always attributed to demoniacal possession, and treated accordingly. Since then it has been rare, although a case of this maniacal dancing occurred in Ohio a few years ago, on the breaking-up of a religious gathering, and the confusion had to be put down by force. DANIEL (דָּנִיֵּאל God is my judge), the fourth, of the greater prophets. He was of noble, perhaps royal descent, and was carried off, in the reign of Jehoiakim, into exile by Nebuchadnezzar. With three other Hebrew youths he was, by command of the king, selected for his comeliness of person and talent, to receive special training for service at court. He became a conspicuous personage in the realm, and was promoted by Nebuchadnezzar to be "ruler over the whole province of Babylon, and chief of the governors over all the wise men of Babylon" (Dan. ii. 48). During the subsequent reign of Belshazzar he seems to have withdrawn into retirement (v. 11), from which he was summoned to the impious feast which just preceded the overthrow of that monarch. In the subsequent reigns of Darius and Cyrus he held high office, and in the former the most distinguished in the kingdom, next to the king (vi. 2). In addition to his great prosperity, three prominent features in his life are to be noticed. (1) His devotion to principle. He began his career by refusing to partake of that which he had been taught to regard as unclean (i. 8). The temptations of preferment and court favor could not corrupt him; and he was thrown into a furnace for disobeying the royal command to bow down to a golden image (Dan. iv.), and into the lions' den, for refusing compliance with an injunction forbidding for thirty days prayer to God (vi.). (2) His distinguished wisdom. He was known above all the magicians and astrologers of the realm for skill in interpreting visions and dreams (i. 20). To this he added practical knowledge of statecraft. (3) His fearlessness. He hesitated not to convey to Nebuchadnezzar the news of God's purpose to abase him (iv. 32), and to interpret in the presence of the royal revellers the doom of Belshazzar (v. 28). Ezekiel refers to Daniel as a pattern of righteousness (xiv. 14) and of wisdom (xxviii. 3). His life bears a strong resemblance to that of Joseph, who, also an exile, acquired the highest dignities at a foreign court, and gave one of the most conspicuous illustrations of fidelity to God under the most trying temptations. His career is also a comforting example of God's protection of his people.

DANIEL, Book of. There is testimony, outside the limits of the book which bears his name, to the life of Daniel. Ezekiel twice (xiv. 14, xxviii. 3) refers to him as a well-known personage. The first passage was written 592 B.C. If Daniel was deported to Babylon in the third year of Jehoiakim's reign (606 B.C.), he must have been, at the time of Ezekiel's first mention, about thirty years old; for at the date of deportation he had already passed the years of childhood (Dan. i. 4).

In order to a just judgment of the book, two things must be taken into consideration: (1) Nowhere in the book itself is any direct claim made to Danielic authorship [but see chaps. vii.-xii. and remarks below]; and (2) In the Hebrew canon the work is placed among the Hagiographa, and not among the Prophets. This location determines nothing certainly as to the date of composition, but proves, that, although Daniel was endowed with prophetic vision, he was not in the strict sense a prophet by vocation. The work is certainly derived from Danielic traditions, a statement justified by the above references in Ezekiel, which speak of a Daniel of the exile period, who was a wise and righteous man. A comparison with the apocryphal additions which pretend to narrate facts of his life, fully establishes the majestic simplicity of the book, and its accurate acquaintance with Babylonian and Persian institutions. The book is divided into two parts of six chapters each. Its language is the Aramaic from chap. ii. 4 to chap. vii. : otherwise Hebrew. The Hebrew, when compared with that of the ancient authors, as well as the Mishna, exhibits many peculiarities, and much harshness of style, but bears resemblance to that of the chroniclers who wrote at the opening of the Greek period (third century B.C.). The Aramaic is distinguished from the later Aramaic of the Targums, as, for example, the ך has not yet been abbreviated into ך. With the Book of Ezra it is the oldest monument in existence of East-Aramaic. The Aramaic was used in the Babylonian realm, at the side of the Assyrian; and the transition from Hebrew needs no other explanation than that the author desired to let the Chaldeans speak in their own tongue. The work throughout is homogeneous; and the theory of Lenormant and Zöckler, that the work contains interpolations, is resorted to in the interest of the Danielic authorship, but is without facts to warrant it. The Greek names of three musical instruments, sackbut, psaltery, and dulcimer (κίθαρα, συμφωνία, ψαλτήριον, chap. iii. 5), seem to indicate a date in the second century B.C. It is possible, but, as Lenormant himself acknowledges, very improbable, that these should have been known in Babylon in the time of Nebuchadnezzar. But we know from Polybius (Athenæus, x. 52) that the dulcimer was a favorite instrument at the court of Antiochus Epiphanes (175-164 B.C.). This seems to be more than a mere casual coincidence.

The truth of the historical narrative has been questioned; but it must be granted that savants in Assyriology are more conservative in their judgment on this point than others. Lenormant says he is more and more impressed with the genuineness each time he peruses the book. Oppert thinks he has found the very pedestal on which the image of Dura rested. Talbot illustrates the punishment of the fiery furnace from inscriptions. These investigators find confirmative testimony of Nebuchadnezzar's insanity in Berosus, Abydenus, and Josephus. In 1854 an inscription was discovered at Mugheir, containing the name of Belsâr-usur, son of Nabonahid. In regard to other historical difficulties advanced, it must not be overlooked that chap. v. 30 speaks only of the death of Belshazzar, not necessarily of the termination of the Chaldean monarchy. It is difficult, also, to harmonize the account of Darius with the records of profane history, and no place may have yet been found in contemporary accounts for his dynasty; but it deserves, on the other hand, to be carefully noticed that the inscriptions of the first two years of Cyrus's reign designate him as "King of Nations," and for the first time in its third year is he styled "King of Babylon, King of Nations." The attempt of Lenormant to clear up the difficulty by supposing Darius to have been a viceroy of Cyrus fails. The book evidently lets a Median monarchy follow the Chaldean.

As regards the monarchies (see DARIUS) of Nebuchadnezzar's dream (chap. ii.), which Ménant thinks have the ring of a word-for-word paraphrase of some cuneiform inscription, the old interpretation (Hengstenberg, etc.) represents them as respectively the Chaldean, Medo-Persian, Grecian, and Roman. But the later and better view (Ewald, Bleek, Zöckler, etc.) agrees in making the last monarchy to be the Grecian, thus excluding the Roman entirely.

With chap. vii. begin the visions, and from the second verse Daniel speaks in the first person. This chapter narrates a vision of four beasts coming up out of the sea, in appearance like a lion, a bear, and a leopard, and the fourth "dreadful and terrible," with ten horns (ver. 7). A little horn (the eleventh) grows up among the ten horns of the fourth beast, and plucks up three of their number by the roots. Then the Ancient of days appears, who destroys the beasts, and confers upon "the Son of man coming in the clouds" (ver. 13) a kingdom which is indestructible. The beasts of this vision refer to the same monarchies as the image of chap. ii., and the Son of man corresponds to the stone cut out of the mountain. While our first impulse is to interpret the fourth beast to be the Roman Empire, the vision of chap. viii. forces us to the former conclusion, that it was the Grecian. There (chap. viii.) the Medo-Persian is represented by the ram, and the Grecian (ver. 21), so it is expressly stated, by the goat, which overcomes the ram. At first it has one horn, whose place is subsequently taken by four others. A fifth then grows out, which reaches to heaven, casts down some of the stars, tramples them under foot, and oppresses nations, and especially the saints for two thousand three hundred days (Hebrew, evening-morning). This great horn is Alexander the Great, and the other four, stretching "toward the four winds of heaven" (ver. 8), the Macedonian, Syrian, Egyptian, and Thracian dynasties. The little horn (ver. 9) which desolates the sanctuary (vers. 11, 12) is Antiochus Epiphanes. The termination of the two thousand three hundred days (ver. 14) is marked by the reconsecration of the temple in 164 B.C., an event which the Jews have since commemorated by a yearly festival, beginning the 25th of Kislev. It being settled that the little horn of chap. viii. is Antiochus, there can be no doubt that we should interpret the fourth beast of chap. vii. and the fourth world-kingdom of chap. ii. as the Grecian, and not the Roman, Empire. The conduct of the "little horn" (chap. viii.) and the fourth beast (chap. vii.) towards the saints is the same,—cruel and relentless; and, though there are variations in the descriptions, they are no greater than those between the fourth beast of chap. vii. and the fourth kingdom of chap. ii. This view is further favored by the correspondence in the periods during which the desolations of the arch-enemy continue. According to chap. vii. 25 they last for a "time, and times, and the dividing of time" ($1+2+\frac{1}{2}=3\frac{1}{2}$). According to ix. 27 they stop in the middle of the week, or after three days and a half; and chap. xii. 7 agrees with this description. Turning back to chap. viii. 19, these desolations are said to occur just before the "end of the indignation." Comparing all these statements, we find the measurement to be the same, and are again forced to the conclusion that the fourth beast of chap. vii. is identical with the "little horn" of chap. viii. which Gabriel interprets to be "Grecia" (ver. 21). The result, then, we finally reach is, that the four kingdoms preceding that of the Messiah, of chaps. ii., vii., and viii., are the Chaldaean, Median, Persian, and Greek. That the Median and Persian were distinct is confirmed by the additional fact that the ram of chap. viii. 20 had two horns, and that, while Cyrus is styled "King of Persia" (x. 1), Darius never is. The symbolism of the iron legs, with feet composed in part of iron, and in part of clay (chap. ii.), is well borne out by the Grecian kingdom, which was divided after Alexander's death. The admixture of iron and clay is explained by the intermarriage of the Egyptian and Syrian dynasties (xi. 6, 17). The ten horns (or toes) are ten kings (vii. 24): (1) Seleucus Nicator, 312-280; (2) Antiochus Soter, 279-261; (3) Antiochus Theus, 260-246; (4) Seleucus Callinicus, 245-226; (5) Seleucus Ceraunus, 225-223; (6) Antiochus the Great, 222-187; (7) Seleucus Philopator, 186-176; (8) Heliodorus, who held the throne for a short time; (9) Demetrius, the lawful successor of Philopator; (10) Ptolemy VI., in whose favor Cleopatra laid claim to the throne. These three last, Antiochus Epiphanes (the "little horn") superseded (vii. 24).

The second great historical problem is the seventy weeks ($7+62+1$). At the beginning of the single week (ix. 27) the Messiah will be cut off, the city and sanctuary destroyed, and a flood and desolations will occur. In the middle of the week sacrifices are to cease. This week is the time of the Antiochian persecution (see vii. 25, xii. 7). In 176 Onias III., the high priest (Messiah, comp. Lev. iv. 3, Hebrew), fell, and in 170 B.C. Antiochus plundered the temple, cut down forty thousand Jews, and was bent upon the extermination of the whole nation and its religion. His death occurred 164 B.C., seven years (one week) afterwards; in the middle of which period (three days and a half), or the year 167, the sacrifices were abolished, and Olympian Zeus introduced into the temple. Sixty-two weeks precede this period. [Dr. Delitzsch divides ix. 25 in the middle, after the expression "seven weeks;" so that the seven refers to the first, and the sixty-two to the second, clause. We may also state here that he refers the term "Messiah" to the high priest (Lev. iv. 3), and "prince" to Antiochus (ix. 26), but the "Messiah-prince" of v. 25 to Christ.] During these sixty-two weeks (434 years) Jerusalem was built. Counting back from 170 B.C., this would give us the date 605 B.C., which is the fourth year of Jehoiakim's reign, and the year of the battle of Carchemish, and the first year of Nebuchadnezzar's reign. The other seven weeks followed the $62+1$. That we are justified in regarding the sixty-two weeks as antecedent, and the seven weeks as subsequent, to the one week, is apparent from the fact that the end of the period $62+1$ is marked by a terrible judgment (ix. 26); the end of the whole period, $62+1+7$ (seventy weeks), on the other hand, by the final salvation, etc. (ver. 24). This obliges us to put the seven weeks after the $62+1$. Here, however, we meet the difficulty, that, if we count from 164 B.C. (the end of the $62+1$ weeks) the seven weeks (forty-nine years), we do not reach the birth of Jesus. Wieseler avoids the difficulty by assuming that the seven weeks stand for an indefinite period, like the Jubilee Year. But the difficulty still remains an unsolved mystery. As for the words of Christ (Matt. xxiv. 15), they certainly establish the prophetic character of Dan. ix. 26 sq., but, while he refers the prophecy to the destruction of Jerusalem, it does not follow that it was not fulfilled before (under Antiochus), and will not be fulfilled again in antichrist (2 Thess. ii. 4). The first fulfilment of a prophecy may be only partial. It is not necessarily exhaustive.

In spite of the conclusion to which we have thus arrived, that Antiochus Epiphanes is the stand-point from which Daniel makes his eschatological observations, we cannot draw an absolutely certain inference that the book was written in the period of the Seleucidæ. But the weight of the considerations cannot be denied, which make for a date at this time (the middle of the second century B.C.),—a man of God incorporating into a work of consolation for the Jews, Babylonian and Persian traditions, and prophecies of Daniel which had been handed down. The more exact date which commends itself to us for its composition is the winter of 168 B.C., soon after the ignominious third Egyptian campaign of Antiochus, and the attack upon Jerusalem by Apollonius.

FRZ. DELITZSCH.

To the above discussion, in which the author with great learning presents his own view, it is proper to add the following upon the chronology of Daniel, and the question of genuineness.

1. Chronology.—The interpretation of the seventy weeks (four hundred and ninety years), and the explanation of the fourth kingdom (or fourth beast of chap. vii.), are so closely related, that the determination of the one settles the other. If the fourth kingdom be the Roman Empire, then the seventy weeks terminate in the events of Christ's life and the years immediately succeeding. If the fourth kingdom, however, be the Greek Empire, then the weeks terminate in the events of the life of Antiochus Epiphanes (175 B.C.—164 B.C.). This is on the supposition that the seventy weeks be reckoned in the order of $7+62+1$ (chap. ix. 25). But the author of the foregoing article changes this order, making the seven weeks come last ($62+1+7$). In this he follows Tertullian and Theodoret, and agrees with Hofman, Wieseler, and others. This enables him to interpret the fourth kingdom to be the Grecian Empire, and at the same time to hold, that, at the end of the seventy weeks, the Messiah came.

In general, the interpretations concerning the seventy weeks, and the prophecies therewith connected, may be reduced to four:—

1. They have their fulfilment in the events of the life of Antiochus Epiphanes (175 B.C.—164 B.C.). He died at the termination of the last week (164 B.C.), in the middle of which (167 B.C.) the sacrifices (by his sacrilege) were violently discontinued in the temple.

2. The prophecies were fulfilled in Antiochus Epiphanes, but, in accordance with the view of a cyclical and progressive fulfilment of prophecy, were fulfilled again at the time of Christ, and will be fulfilled once more at his second coming.

3. The third view is the one generally prevalent in the church, — that reference is exclusively to events of Christ's life and the time that followed, some including the Pope of Rome in the fulfilment. This view denies all allusion to Antiochus Epiphanes. Dr. Pusey, in his extended work on Daniel, places the inception of Christ's ministry at the beginning of the last week, his death in the middle, and the rest of the week (three years and a half) he refers to the years that immediately follow.

4. The modified view elaborated in the preceding article. Antiochus Epiphanes fulfils the events of the single week; but the seven weeks (forty-nine years) follow upon these events, and the prophecy connected with them (ix. 25) refers to Christ.

As regards these views, the following may be said. The first view must be discarded, as it denies the prophetic character of the work and the reference to the kingdom of Christ, which the book evidently intends. The stone cut out of the mountain, and the Messiah the Prince (ix. 25), can only refer to Christ and his kingdom. The second view (Westcott, in Smith's Bible Dictionary, and others) does not sufficiently account for the definiteness of the prophecy of the Messiah. But the cyclical principle of interpretation may still be applied as Delitzsch himself does. The third view, while the most plausible, strains the significance of the expressions in chap. ix. 25–27. For example, the death of Christ in the middle of the last week can hardly be made to fulfil the words, "and in the midst of the week he shall cause the sacrifice and the oblation to cease" (ix. 27). These did not cease in fact till the destruction of Jerusalem, forty years afterwards. Another consideration bearing against this view is, that no event can be found to correspond with the end of the single week, which is at the same time the end of the whole period of seventy weeks. We then turn to the view in Dr. Delitzsch's article. The arguments he gives in its favor need not be repeated. The events in the life of Antiochus correspond so exactly to the minute details of the prophecy, that the conclusion can hardly be escaped that they refer to him. The change in the order of counting the weeks to $62+1+7$ has much in its favor, and carries us back exactly to the battle of Carchemish as a starting-point. The conclusion of the $62+1$ weeks has a character so different from the conclusion of the whole seventy weeks, that we are almost shut up to this way of counting. The principal objection to this view is, that the interval from the death of Antiochus to the birth of Christ is a hundred and sixty-four years, while the prophecy only allows seven weeks (forty-nine years).

II. Genuineness. — The received date of the Book of Daniel is 570–536 B.C. The date given by some modern critics is 175–160 B.C. The first to deny the Danielic authorship was Porphyry (233–302 A.D.). No further attempt was made to discredit it till many centuries later, by Spinoza and Sir Isaac Newton. The first critical attack of much weight was made by Bertholdt in 1803. It has since been one of the burning questions of biblical criticism; such scholars as Bleek, De Wette, Hitzig, and Ewald, denying the authenticity, and Hengstenberg, Hävernick, Gausson, Außerlen, Pusey, and Moses Stuart, asserting it.

Arguments against the Genuineness are: 1. Philological. Nothing can be certainly determined from the Hebrew and Aramaic used, although, as indicated above, the peculiarities rather make for the early date. As for the Greek terms employed for the musical instruments (chap. iii. 7), Bertholdt adduced ten. But their number has been reduced to three (see above); and only in the case of one of these is the evidence unquestionable (Lange's Commentary, p. 26). It is argued that no Greek instruments were known at Babylon before the conquest of Alexander, and therefore the work could not have been composed at the received date. This argument, however, presumes too much. Rather is it likely that Babylon, the "city of merchants" (Ezek. xvii. 4), had intercourse with the Greeks even before the fifth century B.C.; and, according to Strabo (xiii. 3, 2), a brother of the Greek poet Alcæus served in the armies of Nebuchadnezzar.

2. Historical. There are several difficulties under this head deserving special mention here. Two errors are professedly found in chap. i. 1, and chap. ii. 1. In the first passage the statement is made that Nebuchadnezzar besieged Jerusalem in the third year of Jehoiakim's reign. This is said to contradict Jer. xlvi. 2, where the event is referred to the fourth year of his reign. A proper explanation is secured by ascribing the first passage to Nebuchadnezzar's departure for Jerusalem (comp. Jonah i. 3), the second for the actual arrival, not forgetting the loose usage of the terms "day" and "year" amongst the Hebrews. The second apparent error affords more difficulty; but a deeper study of the scriptural chronology more than vindicates our author. Chap. i. 5, Daniel is said to have been in tutelage three years. But Nebuchadnezzar is called King (chap. i. 1) at the time of the siege of Jerusalem; and it was in the second year of his reign (chap. ii. 1) that he dreamed his dream. There seems to be no place for these three years. We shall see that the term "king" was only given to Nebuchadnezzar by anticipation at the siege (chap. i. 1), Nabopolassar being then king, and that Daniel's statement is strictly accurate in chaps. i. 6, ii. 1. Nebuchadnezzar's actual reign began about a year after Daniel's arrival in Babylon. This is proved by the following calculation. Jehoiakim's reign lasted seven years after the siege (2 Chron. xxxvi. 5). His son Jehoiachin, after a short reign of three months (2 Chron. xxxvi. 9), was carried into captivity. He had spent thirty-seven years in captivity when Evil-Merodach began to reign, and his predecessor, Nebuchadnezzar, died (2 Kings xxv. 27). Counting up, we have fully forty-four years from the siege of Jerusalem till the death of Nebuchadnezzar. But that monarch, as we know from other sources, only reigned forty-three years. This would make his reign begin about one year after the siege. With this year, and the statement that it was not till the second year of his reign that he had his dream, we have an interval sufficient to comprise the three years of Daniel's tutelage after his deportation to Babylon. Two other historical difficulties may be mentioned. In the list of kings given by Berossus, Belshazzar is not mentioned. Great stress was at one time laid upon this omission. But the scriptural account has been fully confirmed by an inscription found by Sir H. Rawlinson in 1854 among tablets obtained at Mugheir. It mentions a Bilsar-uzur, a son of Nabonidus, whom that monarch associated with himself on the throne. This enables us to understand how Daniel could be called the "third ruler" (v. 16, 29). It is said that profane history knows nothing about Darius the Mede, King of Babylon. Various explanations have been given; the one identifying him with Cyaxares II., whom Xenophon said preceded Cyrus, having perhaps most in its favor. It was not uncommon for individuals to bear two names, just as Daniel did himself. Some future discovery may clear up this difficulty as satisfactorily as the preceding one has been.

3. The main objection is based upon the supernatural events and prophecies which the book records. The miracles are said to be too portentous to be authentic, and the prophecies too minute and definite to accord with the general spirit of the genuine prophecies of the Old Testament. This objection seems to imply a dogmatic prepossession averse to the belief in the miraculous. But, leaving this aside, it may be said that the peculiar position of Daniel and the Jews in exile demanded a striking exhibition of divine power, such as was given in other exigencies of Old-Testament history.

Arguments for the Genuineness. — 1. The work is either by Daniel, or else an imposture. The justice of this dilemma is denied by many critics; but, on the very face of it, the work seems to shut us up to one of these two views. In chaps. vii.-xii. the author speaks of himself as Daniel. 2. Christ refers to it (Matt. xxiv. 15) as a prophecy spoken by (ἠνθὲν διὰ) Daniel. 3. According to Josephus (Ant., XI. 8, 4), the book was placed before Alexander (356-323 B.C.). 4. The work betrays an accurate and minute acquaintance with Babylonian and Persian manners, such as only a contemporary could be expected to have, as in the description of the courtiers' dress (iii. 21), punishment by burning alive (iii. 6), presence of women at feasts (v.), etc. 5. The whole spiritual tone of the book, which distinguishes it in a marked manner from the apocryphal additions, makes strongly for the genuineness. To these arguments the following considerations must be noted. Whether we settle upon the later or earlier date, the work, in both cases, remains a prophecy of Christ. And, second, too much stress cannot be laid upon the fact that the great Assyriologists do not grant the conclusions reached by critics unfavorable to the genuineness. Monumental evidence is always decisive as against arguments based upon induction. Discoveries in Babylon have already confirmed statements of Daniel which were denied by critics. They may be expected to do so in the future.

DANIEL, Apocryphal Additions to. These exist only in Greek, and are, 1. The Song of the Three Holy Children, which purports to give the triumphant song of Daniel and his companions in the furnace (Dan. iii. 23); 2. History of Susanna, who was cleared from the charge of adultery by the shrewdness of Daniel; 3. The History of Bel and the Dragon, an exaggeration of the miraculous deliverance of Daniel (vi.). There is no evidence that these works ever formed a part of the Hebrew text, and no sufficient proof that they even had Aramaic originals.

DANNHAUER, Konrad, b. at Breisgau, 1603; d. at Strasburg, 1666; studied theology at Marburg, Altorf, and Jena, and was appointed professor at Strasburg in 1628, and pastor of the Cathedral Church in 1638. He was the teacher of Spener, but does not seem to have made any great impression on him; nor could he, as the whole character of his activity was essentially polemical. He was an ardent champion of Lutheran orthodoxy, and wrote against the Romanists, Hodonomia Spiritus Papa and Hyæna Friburgica; against the Calvinists, Hodomoria Spiritus Calviniani and Reformirte Salve, and against the syncretistic tendency of one wing of the Lutheran Church, represented by Calixtus, Mysterium Syncretismi Detecti. His polemical zeal, however, for the purity of doctrine, was connected with personal piety, deep practical earnestness, — his Katechismusmilch forms 10 heavy vols. in 4to, — and comprehensive learning, as seen from his Hodosophia and Theologia Conscientiaria. See THOLUCK: Akademisches Leben d. 17 Jahrhunderts, II. p. 126.

THOLUCK.

DANTE ALIGHIERI, b. at Florence, between May 18 and June 17, 1265; d. at Ravenna, Sept. 14, 1321. Dante is a contraction for Durante, by which name he was baptized. The family name of his mother, Donna Bella, is unknown. His teacher was Brunetto Latini, a philosopher and historian, under whom he learned the classic poets, rhetoric, and the elements of mathematics. He also applied himself to painting and music, and later to theology and philosophy, and became master of all the science of his age.

He belonged to the Guelph or Papal party, and fought with distinction at the battle of Campaldino in 1289, in which the Ghibellines or Imperial party were utterly and finally routed.

In 1295 he became a member of the Arte degli Speziali, or druggist's guild, and in 1300 was chosen one of the six priori in whom the executive power of the State was lodged. The Guelph party became split into the Bianchi and Neri (Whites and Blacks). Dante was instrumental in banishing the leaders of both parties; but the next year the Neri, returning, enlisted the aid of Charles of Valois. To defeat this combination, Dante, with three others, was sent to Rome to secure the veto of Pope Boniface VIII.; but the delay gave the advantage to the Neri, and on Dante's return he was arraigned on a charge of peculation, and was sentenced, in January, 1302, to a heavy fine and to perpetual banishment. From this time he espoused the Ghibelline side, until he gradually detached himself from both parties, and created a party for himself.

In 1292 he married Gemma Donati, by whom he had seven children, and whom he never saw after his banishment. The history of his exile is obscure. He appears at Arezzo, Verona, Padua, Milan, whither he went to meet Henry of Luxemburg on his assumption of the iron crown; at Paris, Lucca, Venice, and finally at Ravenna, where he died, of a malarial fever, at the age of fifty-six years and four months, and where his remains still rest.

Literary Works. — 1. The Vita Nuova; or, life renewed by love. Its inspiration was Beatrice Portinari, whom he made the subject of an ideal passion, and afterwards the incarnation of divine philosophy in the Commedia. The Vita Nuova is the story of this passion. It is written in prose, in short chapters, interspersed with brief poems, to each of which is appended a short explanation in prose. It contains the first hint of the Commedia, and without it the latter cannot be thoroughly understood. Its date is somewhere from 1295 to 1307.

2. Convito; or, The Banquet. An incomplete work projected in fourteen treatises, only four of which were written. It was intended to be a handbook of the knowledge of the age. Date uncertain.

3. Canzoniere; or, Minor Poems, a collection of songs, ballads, and sonnets, some of them by other hands.

4. De Monarchia (On Monarchy), date between 1310 and 1313. Written in Latin, and consisting of three books, in which he tries to prove that monarchy is the normal and divinely instituted form of government; that Rome is its divinely appointed seat, and the Roman sovereign God's civil vicegerent; that man with his double nature is subject to a double order, temporal and spiritual, the empire and the papacy, the Pope being God's spiritual vicegerent, and, like the emperor, having his legitimate seat at Rome, and being, though the two jurisdictions are independent, in some sense superior to the emperor, as the mortal interest of man is subordinate to the immortal.

5. De Vulgari Eloquentia (On Popular Eloquence), also in Latin. It treats of poetizing in the vulgar tongue, and of the different Italian dialects; and its object is to establish the Italian language as a literary tongue, and to give rules for the composition of Italian poetry. It was projected in four books, but only two are extant.

6. Latin Epistles, fourteen in number.

7. De Aqua et Terra (On Water and Earth).

8. The Bucolic Eclogues. Two epistles in Latin hexameters, in answer to an invitation to come to Bologna and compose a great Latin work.

9. Divina Commedia. Composed during the nineteen years between Dante's banishment and death. He called it Commedia, because, though beginning harshly, it ends pleasantly, unlike tragedy, which, with a pleasing beginning, issues in a catastrophe. The term "divina" is a later addition; the original title is "Incipit Comœdia Dantis Alighierii Florentini natione non moribus." "The subject of the whole work," he says, "taken literally, is the state of souls after death regarded as a matter of fact: taken allegorically, its subject is man, in so far as by merit or demerit in the exercise of free will he is exposed to the rewards or punishments of justice."

The cosmogony of the poem is based upon the Ptolemaic system. The central point of the universe is the centre of the earth. The globe is divided into two elemental hemispheres, — the eastern, of land; and the western, of water. Jerusalem is the centre of the land hemisphere; and the lowest point of Hell is directly under it, and forms the centre of gravity. Hell is in the form of a hollow inverted cone divided into nine concentric circles, each devoted to the punishment of a different class of sins. Purgatory is a lofty island-mountain in the western hemisphere, its shores washed by the western ocean. From its base a path rises in a spiral of three circles, forming Ante-Purgatory, and terminating at the Gate of St. Peter, the entrance to Purgatory proper, a series of seven concentric terraces girding the mountain, and communicating with each other by steps in the rock. On each terrace one of the seven sins is expiated. The soul then emerges to the Earthly Paradise on the summit, where it bathes in the River Lethe, and drinks the waters of Eunoe, thus obliterating the memory of earthly sin and sorrow, and awakening the memory of good.

Above the Purgatorial Mount rise the nine heavens, each a hollow revolving sphere, enclosing and enclosed, and ending with the Primum Mobile, or Crystalline Heaven, which controls the motions of the lower spheres. Outside this is the Empyrean, the abode of God and of the saints, who, arranged in the form of a rose, surround a vast lake of light.

The poem consists of three parts, or cantice, — Inferno, Purgatorio, Paradiso, — each part divided into thirty-three cantos in allusion to the years of Christ's earthly life. Dante, in the midst of his life-journey, finds himself astray in a gloomy and savage forest, where he is met by the shade of Virgil, sent by Beatrice to conduct him through the three worlds. Passing through the successive circles of Hell, they reach the apex, where Lucifer sits, and, climbing by the shaggy hair of the fiend round his haunch, they pass the centre of gravity, and make their way to the shores of Purgatory. Ascending the terraces, on the sixth of which they are joined by the poet Statius, they reach the Earthly Paradise, where Virgil leaves Dante to the guidance of Beatrice, in whose company he ascends through the successive heavens to the presence of the Eternal.

The poem is written in the terza rima, the lines being hendecasyllabic. The scheme of rhyme consists of six lines, the rhyme falling on the first and third, the second and fourth, while the fifth introduces the basis of the next group of rhymes, interlocked with its predecessor by the sixth line, which retains the rhyme of the second and fourth. The poem is a picture of mediæval society at the end of the thirteenth and the beginning of the fourteenth century. Its range of allusion is encyclopædic. Great as is Dante's pictorial power, his real sublimity is moral. He rises highest in depicting human character and human passion. The intense moral purpose of the Commedia divests even the hideous details of the Inferno of vulgarity. Under his pervading conception of man as the inheritor of a moral destiny, distinctions of time, race, and position, disappear, and classic heroes and mythological creations mingle with popes, martyrs, and Christian emperors. His terrible satire respects neither civil nor ecclesiastical dignity. The poem is packed with similes, allegories, portraits, historical and personal references, and theological and philosophical disquisitions. It is intensely personal, often egotistic, revealing the poet's consciousness of his own genius, tinged with the bitterness of his stern and deeply wounded spirit, and recording his cruel wrong and his colossal scorn, yet revealing also the sympathy and tenderness of a great soul. No work "more faithfully depicts a noble character in its strength and dignity." Dante is impatient of vagueness. He is intensely realistic. In his pictures every space is measured, every region mapped, every dimension noted as in a schedule. His very tediousness in certain places grows out of his determination to express his thought on all sides. In his sublimest passages he is attentive to details. His similes are chosen without regard to their source, with the single view of illustrating his thought; and the most grotesque images appear amid the very sublimities of heaven. He unites a delicate sense of color and sound to his wonderful sense of form. The qualities of his genius are definiteness, intensity, sincerity, and brevity. The faults of the poem are grotesqueness and obscurity.

Dante as a figure of history is many-sided. As a politician, he represents the ideal of the Holy Roman Empire, a universal Christian monarchy, consisting of the Roman Empire and the Roman Church. As a theologian, he is the voice of mediæval faith, "the painter of its visions," and the exponent of the law of man's moral being in the light of mediæval creeds and in the terms of the scholastic philosophy.

As a man of letters, he is the founder of modern literature, and the creator of Italian poetry. He broke loose from the scholastic Latin of literary Europe, and out of the mass of Italian dialects created a noble, pure, universal Italian.

He is the first Christian poet. Christianity furnishes the main motive of the Commedia. The poem is the first great exponent of the struggle of the human will and the aspiration of the human soul toward God. Its highest ideal of beauty is Christian: it is pervaded with the sense of moral responsibility, moral destiny, and the sanctifying power of sorrow.

The literature is enormous. Vid. for bibliography FERRAZZI BASSANO, Manuale Dantesco (1865-71), and COLOMB DE BATINE, Bibliographia Dantesca, 2 vols., Prato, 1845-48.

DANZ, Johann Andreas, b. at Sundhausen, near Gotha, 1654; d. at Jena, Dec. 22, 1727; studied theology at Wittenberg, and Hebrew under Esdras Edzardi, at Hamburg; visited Holland and England, and was made professor of theology at Jena in 1713, being at the same time professor in Oriental languages. He wrote a Hebrew grammar, — Nucifrangibulum, Jena, 1686, called Literatur Ebræo-Chaldæus in the second edition, Jena, 1696, — formed a school of Oriental philologists, and was himself considered the greatest Orientalist of his age. Though a friend of Spener, his private life does not seem to have been so very edifying. See THOLUCK: Das akademische Leben des 17. Jahrhunderts, Halle, 1853, I. p. 148, and Das kirchliche Leben d. 17. Jahrh., 1862, II. p. 183.
