DANZ, Johann Traugott Leberecht, b. at Weimar, May 31, 1769; d. at Jena, May 15, 1851; studied theology at Jena and Göttingen; was for some years rector of the Latin School of Jena; and became professor of theology in the university there in 1810, from which position he retired in 1837. He was an exceedingly prolific writer. His principal theological works are; Lehrbuch d. christ. Kirchengeschichte, Jena, 1818-26; Libri Symbolici Eccl. R.-C., dedicated to Gregory XVI., Weimar, 1836; Universalwörterbuch d. Theol. Literatur, Leipzig, 1843, etc. But besides on theology, he wrote also on the history of human eating (1806), on the march of the French against India (1808, etc.), and translated and edited poems. His theological works became antiquated during his own lifetime.

DARBOY, Georges, Archbishop of Paris; b. at Fayl-Billot in Haute-Marne, Jan. 16, 1813; murdered by the Communists in Paris, May 27, 1871. His brave death called popular attention to his noble life. He was a bold, independent thinker, and a strenuous opponent of Ultramontanism. He endeavored to suppress the Jesuits and the religious orders within his diocese, voted against the infallibility dogma in the Vatican Council, yet, like many another opponent, hastened to submit to the decree. By his energy, measures for the relief of the sick and wounded in the Franco-Prussian war were successfully organized and sustained. He braved the terrors of the Commune, unwilling to leave his post. On April 4, 1871, he was arrested by the Communists as a hostage, and confined in the prison at Mazas, and then in that of La Roquette, where he was brutally shot by the wretched miscreants. He died in the attitude of blessing, with words of forgiveness on his lips. He was made Archbishop of Paris January, 1863. His works were numerous: chief were a translation of the works of St. Denis the Areopagite, 1845, 2 vols., and Vie de St. Thomas Becket, 1859, 2 vols. See, also, his Œuvres pastorales (posthumous), Paris, 1876, 2 vols.

DARI'US (דָּרְיָוֶשׁ, Greek Δαρείος, Persian Dārajavus, Babylonian cuneiform Dariyavus, meaning the restrainer, which was an epithet applied to a god or mighty king). Several kings of this name are mentioned in the Old Testament.

1. Darius the Mede (Dan. v. 31, etc.), "the son of Ahasuerus" (ix. 1). There is no mention of this character in profane history; but it would be rash to affirm that therefore he did not exist, since our knowledge of Babylonian affairs is far too defective. The Bible, which is yet unimpeached, and whose marvellous accuracy is attested by recent discoveries, makes him the immediate successor of Belshazzar, whom he slew, and king of the Chaldæans at sixty-two years of age, and therefore the immediate predecessor of Cyrus. But no satisfactory explanation of this Median interregnum has yet been given. Some would identify Darius the Mede with Cyaxares II. of Xenophon's Cyropædia (so Josephus, Antiq. x. 11, 4), who was the son and successor of Astyages, and uncle of Cyrus. If this identification, which is only one of many, stands, the notice of Darius's ascent to the throne is compatible with the taking of Babylon by Cyrus, who acted really as his lieutenant.

2. Darius, son of Hystaspes (in the Babylonian cuneiform Ustaashpi), the founder of the Perso-Aryan dynasty, B.C. 521-486 (Ez. iv. 5, 24; Hag. i. 1, 15; Zech. i. 1, 7, vii. 1). The principal of his cuneiform inscriptions (mostly trilingual) is the famous one at Behistun, which relates his dethronement of the magician Gaumata (Pseudo-Smerdis) and his six allies, and the overthrow of other rivals. Darius appears in these inscriptions as a very pious man. His reign was very prosperous. With this agrees the Bible record, which relates, that in the second year of his reign, — the date given to the prophecies of Haggai and Zechariah, — Darius, having found in the palace at Ecbatana a decree of Cyrus ordering the building of the temple, renewed the order; and the work was resumed, money supplied for it, and in the sixth year it was finished (Ez. vi.). The Bible record implies piety, generosity, and wealth.

3. Darius the Persian (Neh. xii. 22), usually identified with Darius Codomannus, the antagonist of Alexander the Great, and who reigned from B.C. 336 to 330.

See the commentaries on the above-mentioned books, and also the article Darius, by Kautzsch, in Herzog's Encyclopædie, 2d ed.

DATHE, Johann August, an eminent Oriental scholar and biblical critic, b. at Weissenfels, Saxony, July 4, 1731; d. at Leipzig, March 17, 1791. He became professor of Oriental literature at Leipzig in 1763. His chief work was Libri V. T. ex recensione textus Hebraei et versionum antiquarum Latine versi, notisque philologicis et criticis illustrati, Halle, 1791, 6 vols.: besides this he edited Erpenius' Syriac Psalter (Halle, 1768), vol. 1 of Glassius' Philologia Sacra (Leipzig, 1776), and Walton's Prolegomena (Leipzig, 1777). His minor works appeared posthumously, edited by E. F. K. Rosenmüller, Opuscula ad crisin et interpretationem V. T. spectantia, Leipzig, 1796.

DAUB, Karl, b. at Cassel, March 20, 1765; studied at Marburg, and was appointed professor of theology in 1794, at Heidelberg, where he died Nov. 22, 1836. He was the founder of the speculative school of theology. But though the idea he pursued—a scientific argumentation of the Christian dogma as a necessary part, or, indeed, as the very kernel, of philosophical truth—has played a conspicuous part in the history of modern theology, the result of his individual efforts has fallen into oblivion. The rapid development of the German philosophy in his age compelled him to change basis repeatedly,—in 1801 (Lehrbuch der Katechetik) he is still with Kant; but in 1805 (Orthodoxie und Heterodoxie) he has left for Fichte, and in 1806 (Theologumena), he has already reached Schelling. Schelling he then follows for several years (Einleitung in das Studium der Dogmatik, 1810); but in 1816 (Judas Ischarioth) it is evident that he is steering towards Hegel, and in the Hegelian philosophy he finally anchors (Die dogmatische Theologie jetziger Zeit) 1833; and it is perhaps this circumstance, which, in spite of his great talent and genuine piety, gave to his speculation the aspect of a brilliant chimera. DAUNT, Achilles, B.D., Dean of Cork; b. at Tracton Abbey, County Cork, Ireland, Aug. 23, 1832; d. at St. Anne's, Blarney (six miles from Cork), Monday, June 17, 1878. He was graduated from Trinity College, entered holy orders, and, after faithful service elsewhere, was called to be rector of St. Matthias', Dublin, a most important post. His preaching attracted great crowds, and his private labors drained his strength, but blessed many. He went about doing good. He was made Canon of St. Patrick's, and in 1875 Dean of Cork. His life was too busy for authorship. After his death, friends issued his six Donnellan Lectures, delivered in Dublin (The Person and Offices of the Holy Spirit, London, 1879), and compiled from his discourses The Morning of Life and Other Gleanings, Dublin, 1881. See F. R. WYNN: Spent in the Service, A Memoir of the Very Rev. Achilles Daunt, D.D., London, 1879, 3d ed., 1880.

DAVENANT, John, D.D., Bishop of Salisbury; b. in London about 1570; d. at Cambridge, April 20, 1641. He was made M.A. at Queen's College Cambridge, 1594, professor of theology, 1609, master of his college, 1614, sent by James I., with three other divines, to the synod of Dort, 1618, raised to the see of Salisbury, 1621. He was a divine of great learning and piety. He wrote Expositio Epistolæ D. Pauli ad Colossenses, Cambridge, 1627, trans., London, 1831, 2 vols.;

Dissertationes duæ, de Morte Christi, et de Prædestinatione, Cambridge, 1630; Prælectiones, etc., Cambridge, 1631, trans., A Treatise on Justification . . . together with Translations of the Determinations, London, 1844-46, 2 vols.; An Exhortation to Brotherly Communion between the Protestant Churches, Cambridge, 1641 (the Latin original appeared 1640). Fuller relates, that, when he was on his death-bed, "he thanked God for this his fatherly correction, because in all his lifetime he never had one heavy affliction, which made him often much suspect with himself whether he was a true child of God or no, until this his last sickness. Then he sweetly fell asleep in Christ, and so we softly draw the curtains about him" (Church History of Britain, Tegg's ed., vol. iii. p. 470).

DAVENPORT, Christopher (known as Franciscus à Sancta Clara), an English Romanist; b. in Coventry, 1598; d. May 31, 1680. He was educated at Oxford and Douay, entered the order of St. Francis, and became a missionary in England, and chaplain to Queen Henrietta Maria, wife of Charles I., and subsequently to Queen Catharine of Braganza, wife of Charles II. He was repeatedly chosen provincial of his order in England because of his zeal and ability in furthering the Roman-Catholic cause. His works were published at Douay, 1665, 2 vols. fol.

DAVENPORT, John, brother of the preceding; b. at Coventry, Eng., 1597; d. at Boston, Mass., March 15, 1670. He was educated at Oxford, and when nineteen years old began to preach in London, and eventually became rector of St. Stephen's, Coleman Street. He won great regard by his piety and learning. In 1626 he joined in a scheme to purchase impropriations (church lands in the hands of laymen), and "with the profits thereof," says Cotton Mather, "to maintain a constant, able, and painful ministry in those parts of the kingdom where there was most want of such a ministry. But Bishop Laud looking with a jealous eye on this undertaking, least it might in time give a secret growth to nonconformity, he obtained a bill to be inhibited in the exchequer-chamber by the king's attorney-general against the feoffees that had the management of it. The issue of the business was this: the court condemned their proceedings as dangerous to the Church and State, pronouncing the gifts, feoffments, and contrivances made to be uses aforesaid, to be illegal, and so dissolved the same, confiscating their money unto the king's use. Yet the criminal part referred unto was never prosecuted in the star-chamber, because the design was generally approved, and multitudes of discreet and devout men extremely resented the ruine of it." Soon after this he was converted to Puritan principles by John Cotton, and hence "fell under the notice and anger" of Laud; to avoid which in the fall of 1633 he went to Amsterdam, and became colleague to Mr. Paget. Here, however, his objection to the baptizing of children of non-professors was used against him; and in 1635 he returned to London. Having been one of the procurers of the patent for the Massachusetts Colony (1628), although his name was not mentioned through fear of Laud's opposition, he finally set sail thither, and arrived in Boston June 26, 1637; but on March 30, 1638, he sailed for Quinnipiack (now New Haven), where he started a new colony. For thirty years he served this people as pastor. With Cotton and Hooker he was invited to sit in the Westminster Assembly, but his congregation declined to allow him to go. In 1667 he was called to the First Church of Boston, and there died of apoplexy.

John Davenport was one of the great men of early New-England days who united learning with piety, and knowledge of men with kindness of heart. He was involved in all the general troubles of his day, compelled by his position to take part in the secular government no less than in the ecclesiastical. Thus in the beginning of New Haven Colony he was elected one of the "seven pillars" to support the civil government. He vigorously opposed the "Half-way Covenant" (see CONGREGATIONALISM in the U.S.A.), and it was as the great champion of the old ideas that he was called to Boston. His reputation for learning caused the Indians to call him "So big study man." He wrote, however, comparatively little. See list in DEXTER: Congregationalism as seen in its Literature, Appendix. Of most interest are The Saints Anchor-Hold in All Storms and Tempests (1661, 24mo, pp. viii, 282), and The Power of Congregational Churches Asserted and Vindicated (1672, 16mo, pp. x, 164). See COTTON MATHER: Magnalia Christi Americana, Bk. III. chap. iv., ed. Hartford, 1855, vol. i. pp. 321-331.

DAVID (beloved), the youngest son of Jesse, of the tribe of Judah; b. in Bethlehem, according to the common reckoning, B.C. 1085; d. in Jerusalem B.C. 1015. While a fugitive from Saul, he headed a band of freebooters (1 Sam. xxii. 1, 2), whose centre of operation was the cave, or, if we read קַצְרֵת לְקַצְרֵת, the stronghold of Adullam, either near the city of Adullam, in the low country of Judæa, about ten miles south-west from Jerusalem, or, according to tradition, in the Wady Khuriton, amid the mountains of Judæa, near Bethlehem. On the death of Saul, the tribe of Judah chose David king, and he reigned for seven years at Hebron, while Ishbaal (Ishbosheth) had his capital at Mahanaim. The son of Saul gradually lost his hold on the allegiance of the ten tribes. The desertion of Abner brought matters to a climax, and after the murder of Ishbaal the twelve tribes came under David's sway (2 Sam. v.) Jerusalem was captured, and made the capital of the united kingdom. David was king in all forty years (B.C. 1055-15). His reign was prosperous and memorable. Israel possessed the Promised Land well nigh entirely. David gave them their first military organization (1 Chron. xxvii. 1 sqq.).

As a Psalnist. — Later Jewish tradition, as recorded in the Talmud, ascribes the entire book of the Psalms to David: modern critical scepticism denies that he wrote a single one. The truth lies between these extremes. The Hebrew titles in the Psalter ascribe to David seventy-three Psalms out of the hundred and fifty; the Septuagint, eighty-eight. Of these, many, no doubt, are not his; how many cannot be accurately determined. Ewald allows him to have written Ps. iii., iv., vii., viii., xi., xv., xviii., xix., xxiv., xxix., xxxii., ci. To those in the Psalter should be added his dirge over Saul and Jonathan (2 Sam. i. 19-27) and the two psalms in 2 Sam. xxii., xxiii., of which the first re-appears in a slightly altered form as Ps. xviii. The uncertainty as to the authorship of the different psalms necessitates their very cautious use as sources of his biography. He remains, however, the "Sweet Singer of Israel," and the "Father of Hebrew Psalmody." See PSALMS.

Character. — The character of David has been very differently judged. In his own day he was the idol of his people; to the subsequent prophets and priests he was the model king; to the later Jews, his kingdom typified the kingdom of the Messiah, of whom he was himself a type. His piety, his zeal for Jehovah, his tender compassion, his generous sympathy, his bold enterprise, his dauntless courage, entitle him to admiration. He is recognized as the worthy leader of the chosen people, and, next to Abraham, the Father of the Faithful, comes David, the man after God's own heart. Some writers, such as Bayle, Voltaire, and, in our day, Kuenen, have slighted David's claims upon the enthusiasm of the Church, and sought to emphasize his faults so that they might sneer at his religion. But the best refutation of this detraction is the Bible record, so free from flattery, so candid and comprehensive, and yet leaving the impression that its subject was a hero, a man cast in a rare mould. It should be borne in mind that his likeness is sketched with a fidelity unrivalled in antiquity. His sayings and doings fill well-nigh three entire books of the Old Testament, while references to him are found upon almost every page of the Bible. He comes before us in every light, — as shepherd, musician, champion, courtier, fugitive, chief, warrior, king: what life could be more varied? In a more domestic way he appears as obedient son, respectful younger brother, modest youth, ardent lover, faithful friend, tender husband, and indulgent father. All along the line of his development, private and public, his piety is marked. The psalms he wrote attest the depth of his love for God, and his unwavering confidence. His character was essentially the same from the days when under the glistening stars, as boyish poet, he sang, "The heavens declare the glory of Jehovah" (Ps. xix.), until the day when as aged monarch it was said of him, "The prayers of David, the son of Jesse, are ended" (Ps. lxxii.). He was by no means perfect. He was compassed with infirmities; but he mourned his defections, and was pardoned. The struggle with his passionate nature, strong and proud, was kept up incessantly, and, though oft defeated, he conquered at last. The sins for which he is to-day mocked were precisely those of an Oriental king. He was the man after God's own heart, not in his sins, but in his repentance and in his earnest effort after a higher and purer life.

Criticism of the Text. — The narrative in the Books of Samuel, the Kings, and the Chronicles, is derived from different sources, official and traditional. Much attention has been given, especially of late, to the text; and, according to the critics, several errors of arrangement, and a few interpolations, are discoverable. But the changes demanded in the Hebrew text, so far as the history of David is concerned, are neither numerous nor important. In only one case does this criticism merit particular notice here. All students of David's life are aware, that, in the story of Goliath (1 Sam. xvii.), the common text represents Saul as ignorant of David (xvii. 55-58); whereas, according to xvi. 19-23, David played before him, and was his armor-bearer. The best explanation of this difficulty is that David had grown out of Saul's recognition. But a comparison of the Hebrew and the Septuagint shows that the latter omits xvii. 12-31, 55-xviii. 5. These verses read together like parts of an independent narrative of the same event. Accordingly, those who consider the Septuagint text purer than the Masoretic remove all difficulties in this narrative by omitting the verses referred to. It should, however, be remarked that such eminent Hebrew scholars as De Wette, Ewald, and Bleek, consider that the Hebrew text of the Goliath episode "has not been corrupted or interpolated, but that the two sections (from whatever source originally derived) form an integral part of the work as it came from the hand of the writer or compiler;" and also that we should be cautious in accepting the authority of the Septuagint upon any point; for we do not know what manuscripts lay before the Alexandrine translators, nor whether they were not willing, as in this case, to omit a portion of the original Hebrew text to secure a more consistent narrative. At the same time, reverence for the word of God compels honest endeavor to obtain a pure text.

DAVID (Welsh Dewi), St., d. 601; the most eminent of Welsh saints, a semi-mythical personage, about whom nothing can be definitely asserted. Rev. Charles Hole, in Smith and Wace, Dict. Christ. Biogr., relates the story of his life, leaving out the fabulous element, thus: He spent ten years of his youth in the study of the Bible, and afterwards founded a monastery, which in memory of him is now called St. David's. He won so high a reputation for theological learning, that the orthodox compelled him to leave his retirement to defend their side against the Pelagians in the synod of Brefi. His wonderful success led to his election to the primacy of the British Church. Shortly after, he convened another synod for the same purpose, — to destroy Pelagianism, — and succeeded so grandly that the synod bore the name, "Synod of Victory." Up to this time the archiepiscopal city was the famous Roman fortress on the Usk, Caerleon; but David removed to Menevia, "one of the ports from which ships passed over into Ireland," probably because "the tide of the Saxon conquest drove the British Church to cultivate closer relations with their Celtic brethren opposite." His primacy was marked by the division of Wales into dioceses. Personally saintly and zealous, his rule was apostolic in character and results.

DAVID-HA-COHEN, a learned rabbin; b. at Lara, Spain, about the beginning of the seventeenth century; d. at Hamburg, 1674. He was successively chief of the synagogues at Amsterdam and Hamburg. Suspicion — it would seem unfounded — of his being a Christian led to his deposition from the latter post. His title to fame rests upon his Corona Sacerdotum, a Talmudical and rabbinical dictionary, finished down to Resh, but only printed to Yod, Hamburg, 1667. It cost the author forty years of labor. In Amsterdam, 1648, a specimen was published, under the title Civitas David.

DAVID OF DINANTO (so called from Dinant, a town in Belgium, on the Meuse) lived in the beginning of the thirteenth century; was Magister Artium and Theologiae from the University of Paris, and stands as one of the most prominent representatives of that pantheistic tendency which now and then became very apparent during the middle ages. He is by some called a disciple of Amalric of Bena, and by others, his teacher. The truth seems to be, that the two systems, in spite of their internal resemblance, originated independently of each other. That of David is imperfectly known, however. His work, Quaterni, or Quaternuli, is lost: only fragments of it have come down to us through Albertus Magnus and Thomas Aquinas. It was condemned by the synod of Paris (1209), and burnt (MARTÈNE, Thes. Nov. Anecd., IV. 163). The author himself escaped the stake only by rapid flight. See KRÖNLEIN: Amalrich von Bena und D. v. D., in Studien und Kritiken, 1847, I. 2; HAURÉAU: De la phil. scholast., Paris, 1850, I. p. 414; JUNDT: Histoire du panthéisme populaire, Paris, 1875, p. 14.

DAVIES, David, a distinguished Independent preacher of Wales; b. in Carmarthenshire, June, 1763; d. at Swansea, Dec. 16, 1816. After a short ministry at Trefach he went to Swansea, where his preaching revolutionized the morals of the town. He was a fertile hymn-writer, and seventy of his hymns have passed into Welsh hymn-books. E. FAXTON HOOD (Christmas Evans, London, 1881) devotes a chapter to Davies.

DAVIES, Samuel, an eloquent Presbyterian preacher, and president of Princeton College; b. of Welsh ancestry, in New Castle County, Delaware, Nov. 3, 1724; d. at Princeton, Feb. 4, 1761. His mother, to use his own words, was "one of the most eminent saints he ever knew upon earth." He pursued classical studies under a minister, and subsequently in the school at Fagg's Manor. In 1746 he entered upon his ministry at Hanover, Va., having received a governmental license to "officiate in and around Hanover at four meeting-houses." His ministry was very successful, attracting people from great distances.

In 1753 he was deputed to go to Great Britain with Gilbert Tennent, to solicit funds for Princeton College. The effort resulted in a collection of more than four thousand pounds. During Mr. Davies' visit abroad he was listened to by admiring crowds wherever he preached. In 1759 he succeeded Jonathan Edwards in the presidency of the institution for which he had recently done so much. He lies buried at Princeton. His sermons were elaborately prepared, and are among the best products of the American pulpit, as regards both their tone and matter. They were first printed in London, 1767-71, 5 vols. The best American edition appeared in New York, 1851, 3 vols., with Biogr. Memoir by ALBERT BARNES. See GILLET: Hist. Presb. Church, Philadelphia, 1864, vol. I., chaps. vii., viii.

DAY, AND DIVISIONS OF TIME, AMONG THE HEBREWS. The Jewish day was reckoned from evening to evening, probably because of the use of a lunar calendar. The sabbath was the only day with a name: the others were simply numbered. The day was divided into morning, noon, and night (Ps. lv. 17), and also into six unequal parts, which were again subdivided: 1. Dawn, subdivided into gray dawn and rosy dawn; 2. Sunrise; 3. The heat of the day, about nine o'clock (1 Sam. xi. 11; Neh. vii. 3, etc.); 4. The two noons (Gen. xliii. 16; Deut. xxviii. 29); 5. The cool (lit. wind) of the day, before sunset (Gen. iii. 8); 6. Evening. The phrase "between the two evenings," of Exod. xii. 6, xxx. 8, probably means "between the beginning and end of sunset." Hours are first mentioned in the Bible in Dan. iii. 6, and hence were probably of Babylonian origin. The Jews got their first sun-dial from Babylon (2 Kings xx. 11). In our Lord's time the division was common (John xii. 9). The third, sixth, and ninth hours were devoted to prayer. The Jews, before the captivity, divided the night into three watches, from sunset to midnight (Lam. ii. 19), from midnight to cock-crow (Judg. vii. 19), from cock-crow to sunrise (Exod. xiv. 24). In the New Testament, mention is made of four watches, because the Greek and Roman division was then adopted.

The word "day" is used figuratively, and rather for a period than for a set time; thus, a day of ruin (Job xviii. 20), the day of Christ (John viii. 56), the judgment-day (Joel i. 15). The days of creation were creative days, stages in the process, but not days of twenty-four hours each.

A day's journey (Gen. xxxi. 23; Exod. iii. 18) was not a definite stretch, but the distance travelled in a day, yet this ordinarily would be twenty-five or thirty miles.

Day of the Preparation is the synagogue name for the day on whose evening a sabbath or a festival began. On it the necessary preparations were made; as, on Friday the food was cooked, or on the day before the Day of Atonement, which was a strict fast-day, enough food was eaten to satisfy for the ensuing twenty-four hours. According to Exod. xii. 3-6, the preparations for the Passover were appointed to last four days. On the last day a strict inquiry was instituted whether any leaven was in their dwellings.

The "Preparation of the Passover" in John xix. 14 means the Paschal Friday, or the Friday occurring during the week of the Passover, as in vers. 31, 42. On that Friday (the 15th of Nisan) Christ was crucified.

DAY, Jeremiah, D.D., LL.D., a president of Yale College; b. at New Preston, Conn., Aug. 3, 1773; d. at New Haven, Conn., Aug. 22, 1867. He was graduated from Yale College, 1795; became professor of mathematics and natural philosophy there 1801, and president, 1817. He resigned, 1846. Besides a series of mathematical text-books, he wrote, An Inquiry respecting the self-determining Power of the Will, 1838, 2d ed. 1849 (a refutation of Cousin), and An Examination of President Edwards on the Will, 1841 (a conciliatory and apologetic defence of Edwards).

DEACON (διάκονος, diaconus, also διάκων, diacones, in Cyprian's works, and in synodical decrees), i. e., minister, helper.

I. In the NEW TESTAMENT. The term in its generic sense is used of all ministers of the gospel as servants of God or Christ (1 Thess. iii. 2; 1 Cor. iii. 5; 2 Cor. vi. 4, xi. 23; Col. i. 7, iv. 7; 1 Tim. iv. 5), also of magistrates (Rom. xiii. 4). In a technical sense it denotes the second and lower class of congregational officers; the other class being the presbyters (elders) or bishops (overseers). Deacons first appear in the sixth chapter of Acts (under the name of the "seven"), and afterwards repeatedly in Phil. i. 1; 1 Tim. iii. 2, 8, 12.

(1) Origin of the Diaconate. This is related Acts vi. 1-7. It had, like the presbyterate, a precedent in the Jewish synagogue, which usually employed three officers for the care of the poor (see Lightfoot, Hor. Hebr. ad Act., VI. 3). Vitranga and some other writers (also Plumtre in Smith's Dict.) wrongly derive it from the office of the Chazzan (ἀνημέτης, Luke iv. 20; John vii. 32), which was merely that of a sexton or beadle. The diaconate grew out of a special emergency in the congregation of Jerusalem, in consequence of the complaint of the Hellenists, or Greek Jews, against the Hebrews, or Palestinian Jews, that their widows were neglected in the daily ministrations (ἐν τῇ διακονίᾳ τῇ καθημερινῇ) at the common love-feasts (Agape). Hence the apostles, who had hitherto themselves attended to this duty, caused the congregation to elect from their midst seven brethren, and ordained them by prayer and the laying-on of hands. The congregation, in a spirit of impartiality, and consideration for the minority, chose seven Hellenists, if we are to judge from their Greek names; namely Stephen (the protomartyr, and forerunner of Paul), Philip, Prochorus, Nicanor, Timon, Parmenas, and Nicolas. Greek names, however, were not uncommon among the Jews at that time. The diaconate, therefore, like the presbytero-episcopate, grew out of the apostolic office, which at first embraced all the ministerial functions and duties (the διακονία τῶν τραπέζων, as well as the διακονία τοῦ λόγου). Christ chose apostles only, and left them to divide their labor under the guidance of his Spirit, with proper regard to times and circumstances, and to found such additional offices in the church as were useful and necessary.

The seven (οἱ ἑπτὰ) elected on the occasion referred to (Acts vi. 3, cf. xxi. 8) were not extraordinary commissioners or superintendents (Stanley, Plumtre, W. L. Alexander), but deacons in the primitive sense of the term; for, although they are not called "deacons" in the Acts (which never uses this term), their office is expressly described as an office of help (διακονία), or servng at the tables (διακονεῖν τραπέζαις, Acts vi. 1, 2). Exegetical tradition is almost unanimously in favor of this view, and the latest and best commentators sustain it (comp. Meyer, Alford, Hackett, Lange-Lechler, Jacobson, Howson and Spence, on Acts vi. 3; also Lightfoot, Philippians, pp. 185 sqq.). In the ancient church the number seven was considered binding; and at Rome, for example, as late as the middle of the third century, there were only seven deacons, though the number of presbyters amounted to forty-six (Euseb., Hist. Eccl., vi. 43). There is indeed a difference between the apostolic and the ecclesiastical deacons, a difference which is acknowledged by Chrysostom, Œcumenius, and others; but the latter were universally regarded as the legitimate successors of the former,—as much so as the presbyters were the successors of the presbyter-bishops of the New Testament,—notwithstanding the changes in their duties and relations. "In these early days," says Alford, on Acts vi. 3, "titles sprung out of realities, and were not mere hierarchical classifications."

(2) The Duties. The diaconate was instituted first for the care of the poor and the sick. Those who held the office were alms-distributers and nurses; the deacons for the male portion of the congregation, the deaconesses for the female. But this care was spiritual as well as temporal, and implied instruction and consolation as well as bodily relief; for Christian charity uses poverty and affliction as occasions for leading the soul to the source of all comfort. Hence Paul counts the helps and ministrations (ἀντιλήψεις) among the spiritual gifts (1 Cor. xii. 28). Hence the appointment of such men for the office of deacons as were of strong faith and exemplary piety (Acts vi. 3; 1 Tim. iii. 8 sqq.). The moral qualifications prescribed by Paul are essentially the same as those for the bishop (presbyter). Hence the transition from the diaconate to the presbyterate was easy and natural. Stephen preached, and prepared the way for Paul's ministry of the Gentiles; and Philip, another of the seven deacons of Jerusalem, subsequently labored as an evangelist (Acts viii. 5-40, xxi. 8). But they did this in the exercise of a special gift of preaching, which in the apostolic age was not confined to any particular office. The patristic interpreters understand the passage in 1 Tim. iii. 13, of promotion from the office of deacon to that of presbyter; but "the good standing" (καλὸς βαθμὸς) which is gained by those who "have served well as deacons" refers to the honor rather than to the promotion. (See Wiesinger, Ellicott, Plumptre, and Speaker's Com. on 1 Tim. iii. 13.) We should not confound the liberty of the apostolic church with the fixed ecclesiastical order of a later age. In the fulness of the Holy Spirit, and under the guidance of inspired apostles, the church of the first century stood above the need of the mechanism of office, and divine charity was the leveller and equalizer of all class distinctions.

II. Deacons in the CATHOLIC CHURCH. After the departure of the apostles, during the mysterious period between A.D. 70 and 150, of which we have so little information, that change in the ecclesiastical organization must have taken place which we find pretty generally established towards the close of the second century. The bishops were raised above their fellow-presbyters, and regarded as successors of the apostles; the presbyters, at first simply pastors and teachers, were clothed with sacerdotal dignity ("priests"), which in the New Testament appears as the common property of all Christians; and the deacons became Levites, subject to the priests. They are often compared to the Levites of the Old Testament. These three officers constituted the three clerical orders (ordines majores) in distinction from the laity. An act of ordination marked the entrance. No one could become a bishop without passing first through the two lower orders; but in some cases a distinguished layman, as Cyprian and Ambrose, was elected bishop by the voice of the people, and hurried through three ordinations.

The deacons continued to be what they were in the apostolic age,—the almoners of the charitable funds of the congregation. Jerome calls them "ministers of the tables, and of widows." They had to find out and to visit the aged, the widows, the sick and afflicted, the confessors in prison, and to administer relief to them under the direction of the bishop. But in the course of time this primary function became secondary, or passed out of sight, as the sick and the poor were gathered together into hospitals and almshouses, the orphans into orphan-asylums, and as each of these institutions was managed by an appropriate officer.

The other duty of the deacons was to assist in public worship, especially at baptism and the holy communion. They arranged the altar, presented the offerings of the people, read the gospel, gave the signal for the departure of the unbelievers and catechumens, recited some prayers, and distributed the consecrated cup (in the absence of the priest, the bread also), but were forbidden to offer the sacrifice. Preaching is occasionally mentioned among their privileges, after the examples of Stephen and Philip, but very rarely in the West. Hilary the Deacon (Pseudo-Ambrose), in his commentary on Eph. iv. 11, says that originally all the faithful preached and baptized, but that in his day the deacons did not preach. In some cases they were forbidden, in others authorized, to preach. The Pontifical Romanum, however, defines their duties and privileges with the words, "Diaconum oportet ministrare ad altare, baptizare, et predicare." They stood near the bishops and presbyters, who were seated on their thrones in the church; but they were deputies and confidential advisers of the bishops, and often sent on important missions. This intimacy gave them an advantage, and roused the jealousy of the presbyters. The archdeacon (see that art.) occupied a position hardly inferior to that of the bishop, and hence he is called oculus episcopi. He transacted the greater part of the business of the diocese. The canonical age for deacon's order was twenty-five, according to Num. viii. 24; but the Council of Trent reduced it to twenty-three (Sess. xxiii. cap. 12).

The diaconate was the necessary step to the priesthood, "Ex diacono ordinatur presbyter" (Jerome); but not all deacons were promoted to the second order. In the West they could not become priests if they continued in the marriage relation. The Council of Trent forbids marriage to all the clergy; the Greek Church, only to bishops.

III. Deacons in the PROTESTANT CHURCHES have different meanings and functions.

(1) In the Church of England and the Protestant Episcopal Church of the United States they form one of the three sacred orders, as in the Greek and Roman churches. The canons require the age of twenty-three years (as the Council of Trent) before ordination. The deacons are permitted to perform any of the divine offices except pronouncing the absolution, and consecrating the elements of the Lord's Supper. In practice the diaconate is merely a stepping-stone to the presbyterate. The Episcopal deacons are what in other churches are called candidates or licentiates of the ministry. The archdeacon in England is a priest, and a permanent officer next after the bishop, with a part of the episcopal power and jurisdiction: he is ex officio examiner of candidates for holy orders, and has a seat in convocation. The institution dates from Lanfranc, Archbishop of Canterbury, the first prelate who appointed an archdeacon in his diocese (A.D. 1075).

(2) In the Lutheran Church the "diaconus" is merely a title, inherited from the Roman Church, of certain assistant clergymen and chaplains of subordinate rank, but equal standing with ordained ministers. In recent times they are often called second or third preacher or pastor. Luther desired the restoration of the apostolic deacons for the care of the poor and the church property (Works, XIII. 2464, ed. Walch). But in Germany the civil government has assumed the control of the ecclesiastical funds.

(3) In the Reformed Churches the apostolic diaconate was revived, as far as circumstances would permit, with different degrees of success. In the Reformation of the Church of Hessa (1526) it was prescribed that each pastor (episcopus) should have at least three deacons as assistants in the care of the poor. The Church of Basel in 1529 made a similar provision. Calvin regards the diaconate as one of the indispensable offices of the church, and the care of the poor (cura pauperum) as their proper duty (Instit. I. iv. c. 3, 9). The Reformed Confessions acknowledge this office (Conf. Gallicana, art. XXIX.; Conf. Belgica, Art. XXX. and XXXI.). In the Dutch and German Reformed Churches the deacons are "to collect and to distribute the alms and other contributions for the relief of the poor, or the necessities of the congregation, and to provide for the support of the ministry of the gospel." The Presbyterian Church in the United States of America teaches, in its form of government (chap. vi.), "The Scriptures clearly point out deacons as distinct officers in the church, whose business it is to take care of the poor, and to distribute among them the collections which may be raised for their use. To them, also, may be properly committed the management of the temporal affairs of the church." But in practice this article is much disregarded; and many Presbyterian congregations have no deacons at all, and leave the charge of the temporalities of the church either to the lay elders, or to a board of trustees, who need not be communicant members, but simply pew-holders.

(4) In the Congregational or Independent churches the deacons are very important officers, and take the place of the lay-elders in the Presbyterian churches. At first the Pilgrim Fathers of New England elected ruling elders; but the custom went into disuse, and their duties were divided between the pastor and the deacons. See H. M. Dexter, Congregationalism, Boston, 1876, pp. 131 sqq.

(5) In the Methodist-Episcopal Church the deacons constitute an order in the ministry, as in the Episcopal Church, but without the jure divino theory of apostolical succession. They are elected by the annual conference, and ordained by the bishop. Their duties are, "1. To administer baptism, and to solemnize matrimony; 2. To assist the elder in administering the Lord's Supper; 3. To do all the duties of a travelling preacher." Travelling deacons must exercise their office for two years before they are eligible to the office of elder. Local deacons are eligible to the office of elder after preaching four years. See The Doctrines and Discipline of the Meth. Episc. Church, ed. by Bishop Harris, New York, Section xv. 246, xvi. 248–251, xx. 302–304. PHILIP SCHAFF.

DEACONESS (ἡ διάκονος, διακονίσσα, diaconissa, diacona), a female church-officer. The office dates from the apostolic era; but the official term does not occur till after the apostles' time. Phœbe was a deaconess (Rom. xvi. 1, servant) in the Church of Cenchrea, and had lent assistance, amongst many others, to the Apostle Paul. The women whose names are given in Rom. xvi. 12 were probably deaconesses. No other traces of the office are found in the New Testament. The other passages usually adduced (Tit. ii. 3; 1 Tim. iii. 11, v. 9 sqq.) are not to the point. The opinion that the last passage (SCHAFF: Gesch. der apost. Kirche) refers to deaconesses is without sufficient foundation. It would, indeed, be surprising if Paul had fixed the sixtieth year for entering upon an office which must have demanded much labor and hardship. Nor can we agree with Neander, who finds here only a reference to the widows to be supported; for widows of a younger age might be just as deserving of support. The reference is rather to admission to that which was subsequently known as the Order of Widows (τάγμα χηρῶν). They held among their sex a relation something like that of the presbyters. (See Tit. ii. 3.) This order is attested by Chrysostom (Hom. 39), Epiphanius (Har. 79, 4), Tertullian (De Virg. Velandis, 9), etc. The eleventh canon of the synod of Laodicea, which abolished the office, calls them "Elder Widows" (viduæ seniores) in distinction from the deaconesses, who also soon received the name of widows. This interchange of appellations is accounted for by the fact that deaconesses were at first selected from the widows. But they were not drawn exclusively from this class, much less from aged widows. Tertullian speaks of a girl of twenty years being admitted to the order of widows (in viduatam). They were consecrated to their office by the laying-on of hands of the bishop and his blessing. The Nicene Council forbade this consecration in order to avoid giving the appearance as if the deaconess was consecrated to perform priestly functions (Epiphan., Hær. 90, 3).

Their duties consisted in the care of the poor, sick, and imprisoned. In some churches they prepared the female catechumens for baptism (4th Council of Carthage, xii.) and assisted in the immersion of female believers (Const. Ap. viii. 28). The order of deaconesses, however, had not a protracted existence. The first synod of Orange (441) and that of Epaon (517), abolished it in France. The names "deaconess" and "arch-deaconess" continued to be used, but, as in the Greek Church, only as designations of officers in convents. They are still found at Constantinople at the end of the twelfth century, aiding at the communion. The total disappearance of the deaconess is, to a large extent, due to the State's having assumed the care of the poor and the sick, as also to the gradual introduction of infant baptism, and the administration of the rite by sprinkling, which made the assistance of women unnecessary.

DEACONESSSES, Institution of, is of recent origin in the Protestant Church. Among the rare notices of the existence of deaconesses since the Reformation are those in connection with the church of Wesel from 1575 to 1610, and the Puritan church of Amsterdam. In Gov. Bradford's Dialogue it is stated that there was one deaconess "who visited the sick, relieved the poor, and sat in a convenient place in the congregation, with a little birchen rod in her hand, and kept little children in great awe from disturbing the congregation" (YOUNG: Chronicles of the Pilgrim Fathers of Plymouth [1602-1625], Boston, 1811, pp. 445 sq.).

The organization of a Protestant female diaconate was accomplished in 1836, under Pastor Fliedner, in Kaiserswerth-on-the-Rhine. The movement was not in the interest of a mere revival of an ancient churchly order, nor meant to be a copy of the Roman Catholic sisterhoods. It grew out of a deeply-felt need of trained nurses for hospitals. Pastor Fliedner, who had already been very active in providing relief for the poor and criminal classes, was struck with the contrast in England between the fine architecture of the hospital buildings and the incompetency of the attendants within. He proposed to remedy the defect by training nurses, and in 1836 organized "The Order of Deaconesses for the Rhenish Provinces of Westphalia," and opened a hospital and training institution at Kaiserswerth. This institution, which has grown to large proportions, educates three kinds of deaconesses. The first class are nurses, and devote themselves to the care of the sick, the poor, and the fallen in Magdalen asylums. The second dedicate themselves to teaching; and the third class, the parochial deaconesses, aid ministers in parish-work. The fundamental conditions of admittance to the diaconate (after the regular course of training) are Christian character and a strong constitution. Among the others are these: the candidate must be between eighteen and forty years of age, must be unmarried (or a widow), and must consecrate herself for five years to the office. The Kaiserswerth deaconesses take no vows, wear no crucifixes, and are distinguished by simplicity, but not necessarily uniformity, of dress. One of the chief characteristics of the order is, that, unlike the sisterhoods of charity in the Roman Catholic Church, they are presided over by men.

Besides supplying many institutions in Germany, this institution on the Rhine has under its control in foreign lands the Protestant hospitals in Constantinople (since 1852), Jerusalem (1851), Alexandria (since 1857), and the deaconess seminaries of Smyrna (1853), Florence (1860), etc. It has, moreover, become the mother of many similar training institutions in different parts of the world,—in Paris (1841), Strassburg and St. Loup (1842), Dresden and Utrecht (1844), Berne (1845), Stockholm and Berlin (1847), etc. Miss Florence Nightingale went through a thorough course of training under Pastor Fliedner before taking charge of the Female Sanitarium in London; and Mrs. Fry, after a visit to Kaiserswerth, established the first English institution of the kind in Devonshire Square, London. The large North London Deaconesses' Institute was formed on the Continental plan in 1861. In 1849 Pastor Fliedner brought with him to America four nurses, who became the nucleus, under the direction of Dr. Passavant, of an institution for deaconesses at Pittsburg. The statistics of 1881 for the whole order are 53 homes and 4,748 deaconesses at work in 1,436 stations.

The sisterhoods of the Church of England and the Episcopal Church in the United States are to some extent independent (though subsequent) in origin and in practice from the order of deaconesses which had its origin at Kaiserswerth. The first was the Sisterhood of Mercy, organized in 1848 by Miss Sellon. Dr. Gooch (an eminent physician) and Southey had before urged organizations in the Protestant Church similar to the Béguines; but nothing came of it. Miss Sellon and three other ladies were led to bind themselves in an association for the relief of the sufferings of the poor which came under their observation in Devonport and Plymouth. They adopted a uniform dress, the use of the cross, etc. They gradually gathered around them at Devonport a House for Destitute Children, a House of Peace for Elder Girls, and an Industrial School. Miss Sellon was known as Mother Superior. The leaning towards the Roman idea of the nun was so strong, that Dean Howson passes them by in his work. In this connection he expresses himself in "favor of a free and flexible parochial diaconate, but not of a strictly organized system of the conventual kind" (Deaconesses, p. xii). — The Sisterhood of St. John the Baptist at Clewer was founded in 1849, and devoted itself more especially to the reformation of fallen women. In his charge May 2, 1850, the Bishop of London emphatically commended the Kaiserswerth institution. Since that time, many sisterhoods, with various names, have been formed in England, and in 1858-61 woman's work was a special subject of consideration in the convocation of Canterbury. The late Sister Dora belonged to the sisterhood of the Good Samaritans, but subsequently withdrew. The Sisterhood of the Holy Communion was organized by the late Dr. Muhlenberg in New-York City in 1845. The results have been excellent. Since 1858 they have been in charge of St. Luke's Hospital, since 1866 of St. Johnland, and more recently have labored effectively in the so-called midnight mission, etc. In 1863 the Sisterhood of St. Mary was organized in New York, in 1855 the Order of Deaconesses for the diocese of Maryland, etc.

DEAD, Communion of. In the ancient church the custom existed of putting a piece of the eucharistic bread as viaticum into the mouth of Christians who by sudden death had been prevented from communing. The proof of this statement is the prohibition of the practice by the following councils, — Hippo, A.D. 393 (Hefele, Concilien-geschichte, vol. ii. p. 52); Carthage (third), A.D. 397; Auxerre, A.D., 578, "one must not give the dead either the eucharist or the kiss, nor cover the body with the velum or the altar-cloth" (Hefele, vol. iii. p. 41); Quinisexta or Trullan Synod of Constantinople, can. 83 (Hefele, vol. iii. p. 311); to which Balsamon adds, the bishops were given the eucharist after their death, to protect them from demons while on their way to heaven. This idea was at the bottom of the custom. Later, a piece of the consecrated bread, instead of being put in the mouth of the corpse, was simply laid upon the breast, and buried with it. Gregory the Great tells, in the second book of his Dialogues, how Benedict of Nursia did this in the case of a young monk who had left his monastery and gone home without permission, but in consequence had died on his return-journey, lest the earth should refuse to harbor his dead body. Another trace of the custom is found in the ninth century. The monk Yso relates that when the body of Othmar, Abbot of St. Gallen, was moved, under his head and upon his breast were found round pieces of bread. Some of these were replaced, others preserved in a box as witness of the holiness of the man. Yso himself was ignorant of the object of the bread, — a proof how entirely the early custom had vanished even from memory. See C. J. W. DEAN, from the Latin decanus, originally a military term designating the leader of a decania, or body of ten Roman soldiers. The word early acquired the more general meaning of overseer of a small number of inferiors. It was used in households for the overseers of slaves, and subsequently in Constantinople for police officials. The term, passing over into ecclesiastical usage, has had different applications. (1) Monastic deans, whose authority extended over ten novices (Augustine, De Mor. Eccl. I. 31). (2) A presbyter appointed by the bishop to visit and oversee a part of his diocese. He had supervision of the official and private conduct of the priests, presided (from the ninth century on) at their district conventions, etc. His title was archipresbyter, and his office is generally held to correspond to that of rural dean (Richter, Kirchenrecht, p. 234). (3) The dean of a cathedral. He is a recognized cathedral officer as early as the eighth century; and the Council of Aix-la-Chapelle (817) subordinated the provost to the dean. In the English Church the dean is the next ecclesiastic to the bishop. In general they are divided into deans of cathedrals and rural deans. The bishoprics of Sodor and Man, Liverpool, St. Albans, and Truro have no deans. The deaneries of the "Old Foundation," i.e., those of date prior to the Reformation, are elective: those of the "New Foundation," i.e., created by Henry VIII., are appointed by the crown. The jurisdiction of the dean is supreme in his cathedral in all matters except those which affect doctrine. The deans of Westminster and Windsor are independent of all superior ecclesiastical authority. (4) The rural deans of England are clergymen appointed by the bishop "to execute the bishop's processes, and inspect the lives and manners of the clergy and people within their jurisdiction" (Philemore, Eccles. Law). The guilds of the middle ages had their deans, and the title is still given to an officer in some universities. The oldest cardinal is the dean of the Sacred College, and has an authority second only to the Pope.

DEATH. 1. Definition. — Death stands in direct contrast to life. As an event, it is impossible to God, who is absolute Life (Ps. xxxvi. 9; John v. 26); but it happens to all men (Heb. ix. 27), there having been only two exceptions in human history, — Enoch (Heb. xi. 5) and Elijah (2 Kings ii. 11). Among the Greeks, Thanatos, or death, was represented as a god, and the twin-brother of sleep (Hesiod and Homer). They endeavored to exclude all that is revolting from the idea. The representation of it, however, at a later period, under the figure of a priest in sable garments, cutting the hair from the heads of the dying to offer it to the gods of the under-world, betrays the natural dread of death common to the race. The Romans brought forward prominently the awful features, describing death as a pitiless divinity, pale, and haggard of aspect, furnished with black wings, etc. The mythologies of northern nations presented him under the figures of a fowler spreading his net, or a reaper with sickle in hand, or a skeleton. Milton's descriptions, as might be expected, are grand but terrible. The "Portress of Hell-gate," who gave Death birth, says, —

. . . "I fled, and cried out, 'Death!' Hell trembled at the hideous name, and sighed From all her caves, and back resounded, 'Death!'"
Par. Lost, ii. 785.

And again, at hearing Satan's plan of tempting the race, —

. . . "And Death Grinned horrible a ghastly smile, to hear His famine should be filled," etc.
Par. Lost, ii. 845.

In the Scriptures death is also personified, and described as intelligent (Job xxviii. 22), as sitting on a pale horse (Rev. vi. 8), or cast with hell into the lake of fire (Rev. xx. 14). It has always excited man's fears. The very thought he has endeavored to banish from his mind. The Romans did not even write in their epitaphs the words, "he died," but only indicated the years of the departed's life. Scripture likewise expresses this universal sentiment of mankind, when it calls death the king of terrors (Job xviii. 14), and an occasion of suffering and fear (Ps. lv. 4; Heb. ii. 15). But it also speaks of it as a release from pain (Job iii. 17), the passage to a better life (2 Cor. v. 4), as "being gathered to his people" (Gen. xxv. 8), a taking-down of the pilgrim's temporary tent (2 Cor. v. 1), a sleeping with the fathers (1 Kings ii. 10), or with Christ (1 Cor. xv. 18; 1 Thess. iv. 13-15), and a departure into heavenly mansions (John xiv. 2).

There are three kinds of death mentioned in the Scriptures, — physical death, spiritual death, and the second or eternal death. Physical death is the dissolution of the body into its component parts. The spirit takes its flight (Eccles. xii. 7), and the body passes back into the dust from which it was taken (Gen. iii. 19; Eccles. iii. 20). In this respect man resembles the brute, which, however, has no fear or terror in the presence of death. The time of this dissolution is known to God only (Ps. xxxi. 15; Matt. xxv. 13). It must be regarded as a benignity for the righteous man (Num. xxiii. 10; Rom. vii. 24), but as a dread calamity to the impenitent, whom it ushers to his own place (Acts i. 25). — Spiritual death is a state of sin and darkness, in which we are alienated from God, who is the fountain of life and light (1 John i. 5), and are consequently destitute of true spiritual life. The whole world, at the coming of Christ, was sitting in the shadow of this death (Luke i. 79). All men, without exception, are dead in trespasses and sins (Eph. ii. 1, 5; Col. ii. 13; comp. Luke xv. 32). Our Lord became subject unto the death of the body, but was always in communion with the Father, and free from sin. The entrance upon a life of faith is called arising from the dead (Eph. v. 14), or becoming alive unto God (Rom. vi. 11). Spiritual death is not a stagnant condition, but a progressive state, the heart becoming more hardened, the eyes more blind (John xii. 40; Rom. i. 21), the conscience seared as with a hot iron (1 Tim. iv. 2), and the pleasure in lust and hatred of God increased (Rom. i. 26-31). — The second or eternal death signifies the complete ruin of the individual from the stand-point of God. The personality is not destroyed; but God's image is wholly defaced, and heavenly blessedness forfeited. The soul suffers final shipwreck. This terrible doom of the second death is described under the figure of a lake burning with fire and brimstone, into which the finally impenitent are cast (Rev. xx. 14, xxi. 8). Those who overcome (Rev. ii. 11), and are partakers of the "first resurrection" (regeneration, comp. Eph. v. 14, etc.), shall in no wise be hurt of it (Rev. xx. 6). The same idea is expressed by the expressions "perishing" (John iii. 15), and "eternal punishment" (Matt. xxv. 46).

2. Origin of death. Sin and death are indissolubly associated together in the Old and New Testaments. Death is not merely the natural fruit of sin (Jas. i. 15), but its just punishment or wages (Gen. ii. 17; Rom. vi. 23), and expression of the divine wrath (Ps. xc. 7-10; Rom. ii. 5-8). We are subject to it because we are subject to the law of sin, and in virtue of our union with Adam (Rom. v. 17; 1 Cor. xv. 22). — It has been denied by some (Pelagius, the Socinians, etc.) that physical death was included in this penalty. The body is regarded as having been mortal before the fall. This view is in contradiction of what seems to be the plain meaning of the words, "In the day thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die" (i.e., begin to die, or become mortal — Gen. ii. 17), when read in the light of the curse in Gen. iii. 19, "Unto dust thou shalt return." Although our first parents did not actually return to dust the very day they sinned, nevertheless, the principle of death then began to work in them (Augustine, De Pecc. Mer., i. 21). Nor is it necessarily true that the body is mortal, especially when we consider its union with the soul. Man was created in the image of God, and this might have kept him from the fate of the brutes (Dorner, Theology; Oehler, Theol. of the O. T., sect. 39). This physical immortality was, however, conditional upon his maintaining the state of innocence.

3. Abolition of death. Christ has abolished death (2 Tim. i. 10). This has been accomplished by the defeat of him who had the power of death (Heb. ii. 14), and the spoliation of the kingdom of darkness (Eph. iv. 8; Col. ii. 15). Christ could not be holden of death (Acts ii. 24), and triumphantly rose from the grave. The dead were raised by his word of power (Mark v. 41; Luke vii. 15; John xi. 44). He quickens with new spiritual life whom he will (John v. 21; Eph. ii. 5); so that moral death has no more dominion over us (Rom. vi. 9). Expressed from the stand-point of human activity, he that believeth is "passed from death unto life" (John v. 24). The death of the body becomes, for those thus spiritually revived, a sleep (1 Thess. iv. 14) and a rest from labor (Rev. xiv. 13), from which they shall be raised to an estate of eternal blessedness (1 Cor. xv. 21, 22; 1 Thess. iv. 13-16). The sea, then (Rev. xx. 13), as well as all earthly graves, shall give up their dead. And so effective is this quickening power of Christ, that they who are raised by him can nevermore die (Luke xx. 36); and so perfect is the life in heaven that there is no death there (Rev. xxi. 4).

DEATH, Dance of. A famous subject of art in the fifteenth century. Death, in the figure of a skeleton, is depicted in the company of representatives of every class of society. None are too holy, none too rich, none too powerful, to evade his presence. The artists introduced pope and clergy, emperor and aristocracy, as well as the artisan and beggar, into their pictures. The fell enemy is represented in the most various attitudes; now harshly tugging at the victim, and now gently leading him; now walking arm in arm, and now beating him; now smiling as he politely guides the blind man, now gloating, as with spear he transfixes the knight. An hour-glass is very generally found somewhere in the pictures. The Dance of Death was painted on the walls and windows of churches, on house-fronts, in illuminated books, and on bridges. The oldest are those of Minden (1333), Dijon (1436), and Basel (1441); the principal ones, those of Basel, Berne, and Erfurt. Moral and descriptive verses were frequently printed below the pictures, and usually closed with such sentences as, "Death awaits all," "Death awaits thee also," "Cruel Death is near," etc. Hans Holbein is the only painter of fame associated with these curious works of art. He, however, never went farther than to make sketches. These were engraved on wood by Lützelburger, and appeared at Lyons (1538), but, as Peignot says, are totally different in spirit from the representations in Basel. As might be expected, they were characterized by humor and poetic imagination.

DEB'ORAH (דְּבֹרָה, a bee). (1) The nurse of Rebekah (Gen. xxxv. 8). (2) Judge and prophetess. She judged Israel from under a palm-tree in Mount Ephraim. All that we know of her is given in Judges (iv., v.). By her heroic example and suggestion she became the savior of her country from the yoke of Sisera, the Canaanitish king. With great boldness she summoned Barak to strike against the oppressor. After securing her promise to go with him (iv. 8) to battle, he gathered together ten thousand men from the tribes of Zebulon and Naphtali. The battle was fought on the banks of the Kishon, and the Canaanites were completely routed. Their king, Sisera, leaping from his chariot, fled on foot. He was executed while asleep in the tent of Jael. In chap. v. Deborah sings an impassioned and splendid psalm over the victory. She blesses God for his help, describes in vivid colors the preparations for the battle, taunts the tribes that timidly remained behind, praises the two which went, describes the battle-scene, "the stars in their courses fighting against Sisera" (v. 20), exalts the deed of Jael, "blessed above women" (v. 24), and portrays with keen irony the expectation among the women of Sisera's palace, and the anxiety of his mother at the delay in his return. DECALOGUE (Greek ten words), the more exact designation of the Ten Commandments, which in Hebrew are called "Ten Words" (Exod. xxxiv. 28; Deut. x. 4, etc.). It is recorded in Exod. xx. 2-17 and Deut. v. 6-21. The only important variation in these accounts is the motive urged for the observance of the Sabbath. The account in Exodus recalls God's rest after the six days of creation; that of Deuteronomy falls back upon the bondage in Egypt. This variation in the letter is easily explained on the hypothesis that the same author wrote both records. There have been three arrangements of the Decalogue,—the Talmudic, the Augustinian (adopted by the Roman-Catholic and Lutheran churches), and the Hellenistic, the view of Philo, Josephus, Origen, the Greek and Reformed churches, etc. The following table exhibits the differences, the record in Exod. xx. being used:—

TALMUDIC.	HELLENISTIC.	AUGUSTINIAN.
1. "I am the Lord," etc. (v. 2).	Against idols (v. 5).	Against idols and images (3-6).
2. Against idols and images (3-6).	Against images (4-6).	Blasphemy.
3. Blasphemy.	Blasphemy.	The Sabbath.
4. The Sabbath.	The Sabbath.	Filial obedience.
5. Filial obedience.	Filial obedience.	Murder.
6. Murder.	Murder.	Adultery.
7. Adultery.	Adultery.	Theft.
8. Theft.	Theft.	False witness.
9. False witness.	False witness.	"Thou shalt not covet thy neighbor's house" (17. a).
10. Coveting.	Coveting.	The rest of v. 17.

The Ten Commandments were inscribed on two tables of stone (Exod. xxxii. 15). How were they distributed? The Paraschas, or divisions for public reading in the Hebrew Bible, favor the division of three for the first table, seven for the second. This arrangement would give seventy-six words for the first, and ninety-six for the second. The contents, however, of the Commandments, outweigh this consideration, and favor five for each of the tables. The first table would then contain our duties to God, parents being represented as his representatives, or the so-called duties of piety; and the second table our duties to our neighbor, or the duties of probity. Paul's grouping (Rom. xiii. 9) seems to favor this division.

The Decalogue is the summary of God's will to Israel. Although its injunctions are negative rather than positive, and social rather than personal, yet they contain the whole duty of man in his double relation to his Maker and his fellow, as our Lord affirmed (Luke x. 27, 28). Its motives are drawn exclusively from this life, and its threats and promises reach no farther. This is sufficiently explained by the circumstance that the Decalogue was primarily meant for the nation of Israel. But God's law for a nation cannot contradict his law for the individual man as such. Even in the Tenth Commandment, although the reference is principally to the external act, there seems also to be an allusion to the thought of sin. Paul is right therefore in calling lust (Rom. vii. 7) a violation of this Commandment. But in the code of the kingdom of God (Matt. v. 27-32) Christ made no distinction between committing adultery, and coveting a neighbor's wife. The law for a people concerns the outward commission of sin: the law for the individual deals with it at its roots. The Commandment for the observance of the Sabbath, like the other Commandments, is a part of the eternal law of God. The life of man is to be an alternation between labor and rest, and he should set apart one day out of the seven for his spiritual interests, and to recruit his physical strength. FRZ. DELITZSCH.

The circumstances under which the Ten Commandments were spoken give to them a unique and solemn authority above all the other legislation of the Mosaic code. Thunderings and lightnings attended its transmission (Exod. xix. 16); and it alone was preserved upon tablets of stone, which were inscribed by the very finger of the Almighty (Exod. xxxi. 18). There is a striking contrast between the contents of the Ten Commandments and the Sermon on the Mount. The former issue forth from the holiness and majesty of Jehovah, which cannot tolerate sin; the latter, from the love of Christ, who pities the sinner. The former address a sinful world, and demand absolute obedience: the latter are gracious and merciful in tone. The very surroundings in which the Commandments and the Sermon on the Mount were spoken bring out this contrast. Sinai itself is a silent though powerful sermon, preaching the terrible majesty of Jehovah. Its stern, lonely, and awful scenery was no less fit a place for the promulgation of the Law than the green banks and the smiling waters of Galilee were for the preaching of the Beatitudes. But the gospel has not superseded the Ten Words of Sinai, nor abolished their authority. "They are embedded," says Dean Stanley, "in the heart of the Christian religion. Side by side with the Prayer of our Lord and with the Creed of his church, they appear inscribed on our churches, read from our altars, taught to our children as the foundation of all morality" (Jewish Church, Lect. vii.).

DECAP'OLIS, the region of the ten cities, whose names were, says Pliny, Scythopolis, Hippos, Gadara, Pella, Philadelphia, Gerasa, Dion, Canatha, Raphana, Damascus. Six are now deserted, and the last is the only one deserving the epithet "city." They were first built by the followers of Alexander the Great, and were rebuilt by the Romans B.C. 65. The region was near the Sea of Galilee, probably on both sides of the Jordan. It is three times referred to in the Bible (Matt. iv. 25; Mark v. 20, vii. 31).

DECIUS, Cajus Messius Quintus Trajanus, was b. towards the close of the second century at Budalia, near Sirmium, in Lower Pannonia; distinguished himself in the army, and was made a senator under Philip the Arab. When (in 259) the legions rebelled in Mœsia and Pannonia, he was sent to suppress the insurrection; but the soldiers compelled him to place himself at their head. He assumed the imperial title, defeated Philip at Verona, and ascended the throne. He was a man of great plans. He wanted once more to make the Roman Empire one compact mass, governed from Rome; and he was as successful as energetic in suppressing internal wars, throwing back foreign invaders, and establishing general peace. But, in his attempt to revive the old Roman spirit and institutions, he met with a formidable adversary, Christianity. Like Trajan he considered the Christians as merely forming a kind of secret society; but he hated them because he feared them. They were a power, and he determined to destroy them. In 250 the edicts purporting the complete eradication of Christianity appeared, and the persecution began. According to the old manner of counting, this persecution is reckoned as the seventh; but in reality it was the first general attack. It took the Christians by surprise. Horror spread everywhere through the congregations; and the number of lapsi of every description (thurificati, sacrificati, libellatici, acta facientes, etc.) was enormous. There was no lack, however, of such as remained firm, and suffered martyrdom rather than yielding; and, as the persecution grew wider and more intense, the enthusiasm of the Christians and their power of resistance grew stronger and stronger. The edicts were originally directed against the officers of the Church. Origen was martyred, Cyprian fled; but the persecution had in many places reached the humblest members of the congregation, when the movement suddenly collapsed by the emperor's death: he fell (in 252) in a battle against the Goths on the Lower Danube. The sufferings which the Christians had undergone were terrible; but the history of the Church proves, that, if not necessary, they were certainly not superfluous. The sources to the history of the Decian persecution are EUSEBIUS: Hist. Eccl. VI., 40-42; and CYPRIANUS: De Lapsis and Epistola. ALBRECHT VOGEL.

DECREE, DECRETAL. In the canonical sense the latter is an authoritative rescript of a pope in reply to some questions. The original name was decretale constitutum, or decretalis epistola; afterwards decretalis. A decree is a papal ordinance enacted with the advice of the cardinals, but not as response to an inquiry; while a canon is a law ordained by a general or provincial synod.

DEDICATION, Feast of the, instituted to commemorate the purging of the temple, and the rebuilding of the altar under Judas Maccabæus, Chisleu (Dec. 25), B.C. 165, after the pollution and sacrilege of Antiochus Epiphanes (B.C. 168). The feast lasted eight days, and in general features, especially in joyfulness, resembled the Feast of Tabernacles (during which the dedication of the first Temple had taken place: cf. 1 Kings viii. 2), only that attendance at Jerusalem was not obligatory. The Hallel (Ps. cxliii.-cxviii.) was sung every day. The modern Jews keep it on Dec. 12. The feast is referred to in John x. 22, also 1 Macc. iv. 52-59, and Josephus, Antiq. xii. 8, 6.

DEFECTUS SACRAMENTI, a canonical term for offences against the marriage ideal. See HUGO SACHSSE: Die Lehre vom Defectus Sacramenti, Berlin u. Leipzig, 1881.

DEFENDER OF THE FAITH (Fidei Defensor), a title borne by the sovereigns of England. It was bestowed upon Henry VIII. by Leo X., in a bull Oct. 11, 1521, in recognition of the king's book (De Septem Sacramentis) against Luther, and was confirmed by Clement VII. Leo's bull is in the British Museum. The Pope subsequently, for his conduct in suppressing the religious houses, deposed Henry, and took the title from him; but by 35 Henry VIII., cap. 3, "An act for the ratification of the king's styles and titles," Parliament restored it to him, and made it part of the titles of the sovereign of England forever.

DEFENSOR MATRIMONII is an officer in every diocese in the Roman-Catholic Church deputed, according to the bull Dei miseratione of Benedict XIV. (Nov. 3, 1741), to prevent by all proper means the dissolution of the marriage-tie where any proceedings to that end have been begun.

DEGRADATION denoted in the ancient church a punishment by which the offender was moved from a higher to a lower grade of office: the presbyter became a deacon; the deacon, a sub-deacon, v. s. o. Later on, but before the twelfth century, the term came to denote the severest punishment which could be inflicted on a priest: namely, the deprivation of his orders. He was actually stripped, — the bishop, of the mitre, crosier, and ring; the common priest, of the chasuble, stole, chalice, and paten. In case of heresy he was then surrendered to the civil authorities: in other cases he was generally shut up in the dungeon of some monastery for lifetime. See DEPOSITION.

DEGREES, Songs of. See PSALMS.

DEGREES, Academic. The bestowal of academic degrees is an ancient, convenient, and much-perverted method of publicly proclaiming the attainments of a scholar. It is a usage inherited from mediæval times, and from lands where civil and ecclesiastical titles conveyed important rights and privileges. Originally the bestowal of academic honors was so carefully guarded, that the recipients were encouraged and aided by their possession; and this is still true to a certain extent. But of late, and especially in the United States, degrees have been awarded by so many feeble institutions, on such slight pretexts, and under so many names, that their value is much lessened, and the honor needs to be defined before its worth, or want of worth, can be known. The idea of a degree was substantially this: After the completion of a novitiate, or course of fundamental studies, the student was graded or ranked among those who were devoting their lives to learning. He reached the "Commencement" of a scholar's life: he was graduated a bachelor of arts. By pursuing his studies for a longer period, he might attain to a second or higher degree, — that of master or doctor. From having a right to interpret a text-book, he advanced to the right of speaking or teaching by authority. The degree of doctor might thus be reached in arts or philosophy, in theology, in medicine, and in civil or canon law, or in both, and the title corresponding might be indicated by the abbreviations, A.M., Ph.D., M.D., S.T.D., D.C.L., LL.D., or J.U.D., — the usage varying in different universities and at different times. From time to time those who did not come forward by regular courses to these degrees were admitted to them causâ honoris, and sometimes the graduate of one university received honors from another; and thus the custom of academic compliment grew up. The right of conferring degrees was usually, though not exclusively, restricted to universities. The university was a corporation of great dignity and weight, quite transcending in its powers the tributary colleges. Its rights were protected by civil and ecclesiastical edicts, carefully considered. In the United States, colleges have exercised the right of bestowing degrees; and charters for colleges and universities have been readily obtained. Academic titles have been multiplied needlessly; so that now the United-States Bureau of Education reports eleven varieties of the baccalaureate degree, and enumerates several hundred institutions which claim State authority for their diplomas. It is not strange, under these circumstances, that "bogus" degrees have been offered for sale. The remedy for this state of affairs seems to lie in an absolute neglect of academic titles, or a limitation of their use to the institution which confers them, or announcement of the source from which they are derived.

D. C. GILMAN.

DEI GRATIA. Following the example of Paul, who protests that he has been called to the apostleship by the "will of God," the bishops, as the successors of the apostles, very early began to use similar designations of themselves. Felix of Rome (356) styled himself per gratiam Dei episcopus; and similar expressions — Dei or Christi nomine, miseratione, misericordia, etc. — soon became common among ecclesiastics. Afterwards also secular persons of high rank, kings, and dukes, adopted this style. Agilulf (591) called himself Gratia Domini rex totius Italiae; Ethelbert (605), Dei gratia rex Anglorum; Charlemagne, Dei gratia rex regniq[ue] Francorum rector, etc. See GEISLER: De titulo, Nos Dei gratia, Leipzig, 1677; TILESIIUS: De sensu tituli Nos Dei gratia, Regiment, 1723; HEUMANN: De titulo Dei gratia, Göttingen, 1727.

MEJER.

DEISM designates that view of God, which, as against atheism, recognizes his real existence; as against pantheism, his distinctness from the world; and, as opposed to theism, represents him not merely as transcendent above the world, and distinct from it, but also separate, in the sense, that, having once created the world, he is not immanent in it as its providential ruler and guide, but allows it to pursue an independent course. This philosophical definition is, however, of recent date. In the history of doctrine, Deism is that conception of Christianity which finds in it only a religion of nature, accepting it so far as it agrees with reason, and discarding from it as ungenue whatever is not consonant therewith. It is on the one hand pure naturalism, declaring natural religion to be the norm and sum of the Christian religion, and, in its treatment of the Bible, rationalism, in that it accords to reason unrestricted authority to investigate and explain Christianity and its records.

Deism flourished in England in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, and was an indirect product of the strife of parties within and without the pale of the Anglican Church. In this strife was engendered the impulse to find, outside of all, religious ground upon which all could unite. The principles of three philosophers were also, to some extent, responsible for its rise. Bacon (d. 1626) laid down the principles of empiricism as the gauge of knowledge; and while he himself made a sharp distinction between knowledge and faith, philosophy and theology, others took up his principle, and applied it to theology as well as to philosophy. Thomas Hobbes (1588-1679) derived all knowledge from sense-perception and the reason (sensualism), affirmed that disinterested affection did not exist, accorded to the sovereign the highest official position in the Church, and denied that the contents of God's Word could ever be contrary to reason, though they might be above it. Hobbes has been called the "Grandfather of English freethinkers." John Locke (d. 1704) likewise affirmed the sovereign right of human reason to determine not only the reality, but the true meaning, of a revelation. Revelation cannot teach any thing contradictory of reason, but such things, however, as reason may not have itself discovered. That Christianity is not a product of reason, but in agreement with it, is the fundamental proposition of his work, The Reasonableness of Christianity (1695).

Of the Deists, properly so called, the first is Lord HERBERT OF CHERBURY (1581-1648). In his two principal works, De Veritate (1624) and De Religione Gentilium (1645), he assigns to religion a high place, and designates it as the only distinguishing characteristic of man. He lays down five fundamental principles (notiæ communes), of which he affirms the qualities of having been received at all times and in all places (semper et ubique). They are, (1) The existence of God, (2) Obligation to worship, (3) Virtue, the chief concomitant of worship, (4) Repentance from sin, (5) Rewards and punishments in this life and the life to come. These five principles are sufficient for salvation, and independent of revelation (which he did not declare to be impossible, only not needed). The obscuration of the pure and primitive religion based upon these principles, he attributes to the priests. — Lord Herbert was closely followed by CHARLES BLOUNT (1654-93), in his Anima Mundi (1679), and his posthumous work, Oracles of Reason (1695). — JOHN TOLAND (1670-1722) is the next figure, and his Christianity not Mysterious marks an epoch. He lays down the propositions that the teachings of the gospel are neither contrary to reason nor above it, and that Christianity contains nothing really mysterious (i. e., not before revealed). The mysteries in Scripture were not a part of Christianity in its original form, but Jewish and heathen excrescences. In his Amyntor he suggests doubts of some of the records of the New Testament. — ANTHONY COLLINS (1676-1729) defended, in his Discourse of Freethinking (1713), free thought as a privilege which none had a right to suppress. He affirmed that the Scriptures allowed it, the prophets themselves of the Old Testament were great freethinkers, Christ exhorted to search the Scriptures, and Paul recognized this freedom of judgment by the use of arguments and proofs. This book, which is written in a spirit of bitter hostility to the Church, called forth many works in reply, of which the most powerful was that of Richard Bentley. In his Discourse of the Grounds and Reasons of the Christian Religion (1724), Collins again attacked Christianity by an application of Whiston's principle, that its main argument is prophecy and prophecy as interpreted allegorically. He affirms that the belief that Jesus was the Messiah was gotten, not from Christ, but based upon the Old Testament. If the argument from prophecy, so he reasoned, was strong, Christianity stood. But the argument depended upon an allegorical interpretation of prophecy. This was weak: hence the conclusion, which, however, is only inferentially found in this work. This attack upon the prophetic basis of Christianity was followed by an assault upon the miracles by THOMAS WOOLSTON (1669-1733). In his Discourses on Miracles (1727-30) he explains fifteen miracles, and finds in the suspicious look of the narratives, and the character of the persons introduced, grounds for the conclusion, that, taken literally, the narratives are absurd and incredible, and therefore are meant to have only a mystical sense. His ablest opponent was Sherlock, in his Trial of the Witnesses (1744). — The EARL OF SHAFTESBURY (d. 1713) does not strictly belong to the Deists, but leans in that direction. In his Characteristics (1711) he attacked Christianity covertly. According to him, its purpose was to advance morality. But MATTHEW TINDAL (1656-1733), called by Skelton the "Great Apostle of Deism," represents deism in its highest development. In his Christianity as Old as the Creation he maintains the propositions that natural religion is absolutely perfect, and that Christianity is genuine only so far as it agrees with natural religion. In this sense both date from the creation. He defines religion to be the discipline of morality in obedience to the will of God, or conduct guided by the reason of things. This morality is perfect, and stands not in need of a revelation. This work may be called the Deist's Primer. — THOMAS CHUBB (1679-1747), a glovemaking, follows next. His work, The True Gospel of J. Christ Asserted, takes up the discourses, works, and commandments of Christ. The author comes to the conclusion that Christ enjoined only what reason commands; that his mission was to restore the true moral conception of life which Jewish and heathen folly had blunted; and that Christianity consists not of confession and assent, but of active morality. He reiterates the proposition of Tindal, that the gospel is identical with natural religion. — THOMAS MORGAN (d. 1743), in his Moral Philosopher, carried the deistical principle to the extreme, by affirming a deep chasm between the Old and New Testaments, criticising the Old severely, and discarding atonement and other doctrines of the New as corrupt dregs of Judaism. — Lord BOLINGBROKE'S (1678-1751) works betray a low view of religion, which he regards purely as a handmaid of the State. In spite of his disclaimer to the title Deist, he, too, identifies Christianity with natural religion. — ally, DODWELL THE YOUNGER, in his Christianity not Founded on Argument (1742), declares not all rational faith, and all attempts to find faith in reason, and proves that it is not reason, but the gracious operation of the Holy Spirit, which can lead to genuine faith. In David Hume (1711-76), Deism, or the attempt to identify Christianity with natural religion, ran off into skepticism. But, while this was taking place, the Methodist revival came, and ushered in a better age of faith.

DE KOVEN, James, D.D., a leader of the High Church party in the Episcopal Church; b. at Middletown, Conn., Sept. 19, 1831; d. at Racine, Wis., March 19, 1879. He was warden of Racine College from 1859 to his death. In 1875 he was elected Bishop of Illinois; but his extreme High Church views prevented his confirmation. He was noted for eloquence of speech, and earnestness of manner. See the posthumous volume Sermons Preached on Various Occasions, with an Introduction by Morgan Dix, S. T. D., New York, 1880.

DEMETRIUS is the name of three kings of Syria, noticeable in Jewish history. — Demetrius I., (Σωτήρ "the savior"), 162-150 B.C., was elected in Rome, whither he was sent as a hostage by his father, Seleucus IV. When Antiochus III died (164 B.C.), Demetrius claimed the throne, and when the Roman Senate preferred Ptolemy, Antiochus V., he fled from Rome, and at Tripolis in Phœnicia, obtained the support of the people of Syria, put Antiochus V. to death, and took possession of the country. Once on the throne, he was recognized by the Romans; but difficulties soon arose. In the conflict raging in Judæa, he took the side of the Hasmoneans against the nationalists. He succeeded in establishing Alcimus as high priest in Jerusalem; but later on his generals, Nicanor and Gorgias, were repeatedly defeated by Judas Maccabæus, and the latter finally concluded a truce with Rome which expressly forbade Demetrius to interfere in the affairs of Judæa. In other parts of the East, too, he ran counter against the Roman legions; and his violence and extravagance gradually turned the hearts of his own subjects against him. When Alexander Balas stepped forward as pretender to the throne, Demetrius was driven in vain around to find allies. Jonathan, the successor of Judas Maccabæus, the Romans, espoused the cause of Alexander; and Demetrius was defeated in the battle against him. — Demetrius II. Nicator (Νικηταίης, "the victor"), 147-127 B.C., the son of Demetrius Soter; escaped to Cnidus to avoid the usurpation of Alexander, but returned to Syria and defeated the usurper, though he was finally captured by Jonathan. The relation between Demetrius and Jonathan, and Jonathan's successor, Simon, was always uncertain, for Demetrius was false and faithless: nevertheless, the Jews sided with him, and aided him materially during the rebellion of Tryphon. In 138 B.C. he invaded Parthia, but was taken prisoner, and kept in captivity for nearly ten years. Antiochus Sidetes, who in the mean time occupied the throne of Syria, also invaded Parthia; and, when Demetrius succeeded in defeating him, he returned to Syria, but was assassinated shortly after, perhaps by his wife Cleopatra. — Demetrius III., Eucærus (Εὐκαίρος), 94-88 B.C., a grandson of Demetrius Nicator; became King of Syria, together with his brother Philip, after the death of Antiochus Eusebes. He defeated Alexander Jannæus, but was prevented from any further interference in Jewish politics by the breaking-out of a war between him and his brother. He was defeated, and sent to Parthia, where he was detained in captivity till his death. — The history of Demetrius I. and II. is told in the Books of the Maccabees; that of Demetrius III., in JOSEPHUS: Ant. XIII.

DEMETRIUS, Bishop of Alexandria from 189 to 231; took a vivid interest in the catechetical school, and appointed Origen teacher when Clement left (203). Afterwards he sent Origen on an important mission to the Roman governor of Arabia; but the friendship between them was finally transformed into open opposition. In 228 Origen was ordained presbyter at Casarea; but in 231 Demetrius excommunicated him. See ORIGEN.

DEMETRIUS CYDONIUS, a Greek theologian of the fourteenth century; was b. at Thessalonica or Constantinople; occupied a prominent position at the court of John Cantacuzenus, and retired with him from public life, and became monk in 1355. Afterwards he went to Milan to study the Latin language and theology, and spent the latter part of his life at Cydone in Crete; d. after 1384. He has written and translated much; but most of his works remain in manuscript. Of his Greek translation of the Summa of Thomas Aquinas, one part, De contemptenda morte, has been edited by R. SEILER, Basel, 1553, and KUINOEL, Leipzig, 1786. His Monodia was published in Latin and Greek by COMBEFIS, in Scriptores post Theophanem; and his De processione Spiritus Sancti was translated into Latin by CANISIUS, in his Lectiones Antiquæ, Ingolstadt, 1604.

DEMME, Charles Rudolph, D.D., an eminent Lutheran minister; b. at Mühlhausen, Thuringia, April 10, 1795; d. in Philadelphia, Sept. 1, 1863. He was severely wounded in the battle of Waterloo; on recovery he studied theology; emigrated to America (1818), rose to distinction, and from 1825 to 1859 he was chief pastor of St. Michael's and St. Zion's churches, Philadelphia. He edited a German translation of Josephus, adding numerous and valuable notes.

DEMON (Greek δαίμων), improperly rendered devil in King James's version, is one of the spirits of the kingdom of darkness. There are many demons, but only one devil (Satan). In early Greek, Homer (Il., xvii. 98, 99) uses the term interchangeably with θεός, a god. Somewhat later in Hesiod the demons are beings intermediate between the gods and men (Op. 121). Plato (Symp., p. 202) fixes the term in this sense, and enumerates as among their number the departed spirits of good men. It was believed that they became tutelary genii, who presided over individual destiny. Socrates speaks constantly of his demon. In the Septuagint the word is employed to represent the Hebrew words "gods" (Ps. xc. 3), "devils" (Deut. xxxii. 17), "pestilence" (Ps. xci. 6), etc. In Josephus it is always used of evil spirits. He defines demons to be the spirits of the wicked (De Bell. Jud., vii. 6, 3). In the New Testament the term is employed several times in the general sense of heathen deities (Acts xvii. 18; 1 Cor. x. 20); but as a rule the term is used for evil spirits who believe and tremble (Jas. ii. 19), recognize Jesus to be the Son of God (Matt. viii. 29), and are the agents of Satan (Matt. xii. 24). See DEMONIACS.

DEMONIACS. Among the most striking miracles of our Lord were the cures of those possessed with demons. The condition of these unfortunate persons calls our attention to the activity of the powers of darkness in the world and the connection of human life with a terrible realm of fallen spirits. This class of cases is known neither to the Hebrew Scriptures nor [with some doubtful exceptions] to post-apostolic times.

1. The representations of the New Testament. Persons under the influence of demons are said to be "possessed with demons" (Matt. iv. 24, etc., Greek δαμονιζόμενοι), or "vexed with unclean spirits" (Luke vi. 18, etc., ἐνοχλούμενοι, etc.). The spirits which produce this condition are called "demons" (Matt. x. 8, etc.), "spirits" (Matt. viii. 16, etc.), and "unclean spirits" (Matt. x. 1). The cure, with allusion to the demons, is termed "casting out" (Matt. viii. 16), and, with allusion to the victims, "healing" (Luke vi. 18, θεραπεύεσθαι; Matt. xv. 28, ἰάσθαι). These various terms are of themselves a sufficient evidence that the New-Testament authors did not intend to designate a mere bodily disease. The demons are the bad spirits who compose the realm of darkness, and serve Satan. This is clearly taught in the passage (Matt. xii. 24-29) in which Beelzebub is called the prince of demons. The influence of the demons upon their victims was made evident in every case by affections of the body. The soul has lost its control of the body. Between the two a foreign influence has injected itself, which acts deleteriously upon the bodily organs of the soul. But nowhere does the demon take the place of the soul. It does not take up its habitation in the soul, nor exert its influence directly upon the spiritual nature. It attacks first the nervous system, and works through it, producing the same symptoms as are produced by other agencies disturbing the bodily organism. Demoniacal agency is not exerted through the spiritual upon the moral nature (this was the way in which Judas was affected, who, however, was not possessed with a demon, — John xiii. 27), but through the physical upon the rational nature. The demonized state showed itself in a kind of clairvoyance, the demons recognizing Christ to be the Son of God (Luke iv. 34), in insanity (Mark v. 8 sqq.; Luke viii. 27), epilepsy (Luke ix. 9), dumbness (Matt. ix. 32, xii. 22), lameness (Luke xiii. 11), and blindness (Matt. xii. 22). In all these cases the victim, as well as his acquaintances, attributes the unnatural state to demonic agency. If the demonic influence was in the first instance physical, the question arises, whether, perchance, the cause of the infirmity is not to be looked for in moral offences. The case of the lunatic boy settles the question in the negative, and shows that the two were not necessarily connected. He was possessed from childhood. Demoniac possession is, therefore, a misfortune which results from the fall and sinful condition of the race, and originates in the disturbing agency of dark powers upon a soul which is powerless to resist. Our Lord's cures of this infirmity were effected by a command directed to the demon (Matt. viii. 16). He gave the disciples power to do the same (Matt. x. 1); and even Jews who did not believe in him seem to have exercised it (Matt. xii. 27). Josephus (De Bell. J., vii. 6, 8) mentions the formulas and roots which were used by the Jews, and which were reported to have come down from Solomon. In this connection it is well to notice that the demons usually tore their victims as they were about to be cast out (Mark ix. 20), and the victims trembled for fear of the cure (Mark v. 7).

2. Down to the eighteenth century the view prevailed universally that satanic agency was exercised, and produced the infirmities attributed to demons in the New Testament. There was a difference of opinion about the origin of the demons, some holding that they were the souls of departed men (Philostratus, Apoll., I. 18); others, that they were the spirits of the giants who perished in the flood (Pseudo-Clementines, viii. 18); and still others, that they were fallen angels. In the middle ages it was held that they still pursued and possessed men; and the great question was upon the power of exorcism. In the eighteenth century there came a violent change, which can hardly excite surprise when the trials of the witches of the preceding two centuries are remembered. Hobbes (Leviathan) was the first to express doubts. He was followed by Lardner (1758) and Farmer (1775) in England, and Semler (1760) in Germany. The latter made the express statement, that demoniacal possession was nothing more than insanity, or some other natural disease. From him the view passed into all rationalistic commentaries. That diseases accompanied demoniacal possession there can be no doubt; but the question is, whether the diseases are to be attributed to natural causes or to demonic agency. Reference has been made to the belief in demonic possession prevalent in the heathen world before and at the time of Christ, and the conclusion drawn that it was a mere superstition of the time. Many of the instances referred to, as the excitement of the Corybantes and Bacchanals (Herodot., iv. 79, Eurip., Bacch., 293 sqq.), have nothing analogous to the possession of the New Testament, which was involuntary. However, it is plain from the above reference to Josephus, that the Jews knew of persons so afflicted, and that the heathen also attempted to expel evil spirits with formulas of exorcism (Plutarch, Sympos., vii. 5, and Lucian, Philop., 16). But, even if these were not real cases, they do not prove those of the New Testament to be false. Alongside of the light of revelation in Israel went the twilight of heathendom, and at the side of prophecy those human anticipations which concealed an element of the truth. On the other hand, if it be granted that no cases of the kind occur now, this cannot disprove their real existence. Refuge is also had to the explanation that Christ accommodated himself to the view current in his day. They were purely physical maladies; but they were popularly held to be the result of demonic agency, and Jesus fell in with the belief. But, leaving aside the argument that such a method of procedure is at discord with his moral character, there are passages which are wholly inconsistent with this explanation. In Luke xi. 17-26 he makes demonic agency the subject of a didactic discourse. And again: he not only never speaks a word to discourage the popular belief, but repeatedly speaks on the presumption that such agency was the immediate cause of infirmities (Matt. x. 8, xvii. 21; Luke x. 17 sqq.). Some, feeling the force of these considerations, have, passing beyond the theory of accommodation, affirmed that Jesus, as well as his contemporaries, was in error as to the cause of the diseases (Paulus). Christ, who is the truth, teaches that there is a kingdom of darkness. On rational grounds nothing can be said in objection to the doctrine promulgated by him, that this kingdom is composed of beings of other endowments than our own, who, having fallen into sin, now employ their powers against God and man. Experience confirms what Jesus has taught, that they influence our moral freedom. Passing one step further, it can hardly be contested, that, in addition to this agency upon man's spiritual nature, they may act through his physical nature upon his rational soul.

3. The teaching of the New Testament about the victims of demonic possession is not in contradiction to the principles of physiology. It is a well-ascertained fact that the soul, with its desires, and power of volition, exerts its influence on the body, and is no less influenced by it. A fever, for example, attacking the body of a pious man, poisons the blood of the brain, and thus affects the soul, till it is filled with the most insane fancies. Through dyspepsia men become gloomy and despondent. Frequently a spiritual malady is removed by removing a bodily complaint. With these facts, and the well-known facts of animal magnetism before us, the agency of demons becomes intelligible. If effects between man and man can be produced by animal magnetism, and the diseases of the body can produce disturbances of the soul, so the beings of another world may influence and disturb both the physical and rational natures of man.

From 1847 to 1854 he was professor in the Biblical Institute, which he founded, first at Newbury, Vt., soon afterwards removed to Concord, N. H., and now at Boston as the School of Theology, Boston University. From 1855 till his death, he was professor in the Garrett Biblical Institute, Evanston, Ill. "The great work of his life was the organization of theological seminaries in the Methodist-Episcopal Church. After eighteen years of labor he saw two of these (Concord and Evanston) in full operation, largely as the fruit of his own industry, energy, and perseverance." DEMPSTER, Thomas, a Scotch writer, b. at Cliftbog, Aberdeenshire, Aug. 23, 1579; d. near Bologna, Sept. 6, 1625. He studied at Cambridge and Paris, and was professor at Pisa and Bologna. He stood high in papal favor, and was remarkably gifted. His chief work is Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Scotorum, a biographical dictionary of Scotchmen, — a very curious book, more remarkable for its fictions than for its facts; for he has not hesitated to claim as Scotchmen authors who never saw Scotland, and to describe minutely the lives of imaginary persons.

DENCK, Johann, or Hans, one of the unruly elements which disturbed and impeded the movement of the Reformation; is first known as rector of a school in Basel, whence he moved, in 1523, to Nuremberg, on the recommendation of Oecolampadius, as rector of the school of St. Sebaldus. In Nuremberg, however, he immediately began to preach openly the wild ideas he had adopted from Thomas Münzer and the Anabaptists; and in 1524 he was expelled from the city. In 1525 he was also expelled from Augsburg, in 1526 from Strassburg, in 1527 from Worms. By the influence of Oecolampadius he was allowed to return to Basel; and there he died, from the plague, in November, 1527. In connection with L. Haetzer he translated the prophetic books of the Old Testament, Worms, 1527; and the translation has its value. See HEBERLE, in Studien und Kritiken, 1851, I., and 1855, II.

DENIS, St., the first bishop of Paris, the apostle of the Franks, and the patron-saint of France; came to Gaul about 250, — according to Gregory of Tours (d. 595), Hist. Frank., I. 28, — and died by the sword, in Paris, probably under Aurelian (272). According to the Acts of the martyr, also dating from the sixth century (Act. Sanct., Oct. 9), he was sent into the country by Bishop Clement of Rome, and was accompanied by Rusticus, a priest, and Eleutherius, a deacon. In Paris they were all three tortured and beheaded, and thrown into the Seine; but their corpses were rescued by a pious woman, and interred in a church near by, on the Montmartre (Mons Martyrum, as tradition has it; though Mons Mercurii was the original name of the place). See DAVIN, La Tradition sur le premier Tombeau de St. Denys, Paris, 1876. Thence the relics were brought to the afterwards so famous Abbey of St. Denis, founded in the middle of the seventh century by Dagobert I., and consecrated to the memory of the apostle of the nation over which he ruled, — the Franks. In the first half of the ninth century, Hilduin, Abbot of St. Denis, wrote, at the request of Louis the Pious, a life of the saint (Patrol. Latina, cvi. 23); and here, for the first time, St. Denis is identified with Dionysius the Areopagite. But all that great and admirable activity which the Abbey of St. Denis developed in the field of French history from the ninth to the fourteenth century is concentrated upon the idea that Dionysius the Areopagite is the patron-saint of France, the star of French history. Abelard had his doubts, but was whipped into silence; and it was not until the middle of the seventeenth century that Launoy (De Areopagitice Hilduini, Paris, 1641, and De Duobus Dionysiis, Paris, 1640) and Sirmond (Diss. in qua ostenditur D. p. et D. a. discrimen, Paris, 1641) succeeded in exploding the more than audacious hypothesis. On account of the prominent part which St. Denis played in French life (the soldiers charged with his name on their lips), his shrine grew immensely rich, and the abbey became a storehouse, crowded and crammed with invaluable historical memorials. See FÉLIBIEN: Histoire de l'Abb. de S. D., Paris, 1706. But during the Revolution it was most barbarously and shamefully plundered (Nov. 12, 1793) by a mob led by one of its own priests; and its relics, jewelry, etc., were carried on six carts into the Convention, where they disappeared.

DENMARK. The Christianization of Denmark began in the eighth century, and was completed in the eleventh. Willibrord was the first Christian missionary who visited the country (about 700). Ansgar (800–865) became its apostle. But it was in Ireland that the Danish vikings first heard the tales about the "White Christ;" and it was English priests and monks, who, in the reign of Canute the Great (1019–35), finally converted the Danish people, and organized the Danish Church. The Anglo-Saxon missionary understood the Danes, and was understood by them; while the Frankish or Franco-Saxon was compelled to use interpreters, or learn a foreign language.

Denmark belonged originally to the archiepiscopal see of Hamburg-Bremen, and the relation was generally very pleasant. It was purely political reasons which made the Danish kings hanker after an independent Danish archbishop. In 1104 they got him settled at Lund; and in 1105 began the contest between the royal power and the hierarchy. In the latter part of the thirteenth century the contest reached its climax; but the hierarchy was utterly vanquished. It fought in Denmark at many disadvantages. The Roman law never crossed the Eider. The law of the land was a national growth, on which it proved impossible to ingraft the canon law. Thus the Roman Church remained an institution without any basis. It had no head, either. The Pope was too far away. Even among the clergy he could not enforce his decrees without the aid of the king, which, however, the king often was foolish enough to give him, as, for instance, in the case of celibacy; but the Peter's-Pence was never paid, and the appeals were rare. On the whole, the temperature was too low for the Roman Church. The papal lightning froze before it struck. When an archbishop was killed, he made no miracles. The Inquisition was something entirely unknown. The Roman Church was rich; but it had, comparatively, no power, and when the Reformation came it could make no resistance. There seems to have been no spontaneous reformatory impulse among the Danes. The movement came from Germany; but it spread instantaneously through the whole people, and, at the Diet of Copenhagen (1536), the Roman-Catholic Church was quietly abolished; its whole authority, spiritual and secular, was abrogated, and vested in the crown; all its property was confiscated, and divided between the king and the nobility; and the bishops themselves, all but one, signed the instrument of the transaction.

In Denmark the period of the Reformation was one of new beginnings in almost every field of human life. But the spring was very short, and there came no summer. A fiendish current of intolerance set in. Protestants of the French Reformed Church, who sought refuge in the country, were rudely driven away; and a royal ordinance of 1580 made death the penalty for introducing a copy of the Formula Concordie into the realm. But in the seventeenth century the Danish Church developed one of the strictest forms of orthodox Lutheranism; also one of the most barren. There was a church, but hardly any religion; formulas enough, but no life; much disputation, but without ideas; and the learned parson, who often played the part of the court-fool in the mansion of the nobleman, was generally, by his peasant flock, considered a kind of magician.

In the first half of the eighteenth century the pietists came, in the train of a German princess who became Queen of Denmark. There was a little too much "blood" and "wounds" in their preaching, and a little too much prohibition and punishment in their discipline; but they brought life. They closed the theatres, tethered literature, put poor people in the stocks, and fined the rich ones, when they did not go to church twice every Sunday, etc. But they brought with them the Confirmation, which proved one of the noblest moral agencies in Danish society, and a new kind of hymns, which melted the indifference of the preceding century into enthusiasm, though of a somewhat sentimental description. How deep an impression the pietists made became apparent from their encounter with the rationalists. Rationalism was also a foreign importation, but from France, rather than from Germany, and reached Denmark in the latter part of the eighteenth century. The radicals among the party proposed to use the churches as public warehouses, and employ the ministers as lecturers on agriculture and political economy; but such propositions had, of course, no other effect than producing some scandal and laughter. Quite otherwise with the milder, more cautious, and more dignified form of rationalism, with its fine artistic taste, and broad scientific sense. It took possession of the church and the school; and, wheresoever it came in conflict with the pietism of the peasants, it used force. See article on BALLE.

The overthrow of rationalism in Denmark, in the third decade of the present century, took place with an almost dramatic effect. Its chief representative, H. N. Clausen, a young man, but a man of great ability, was professor of theology in the university, and stood as the acknowledged teacher of the Danish Church. Suddenly he was most violently attacked by N. F. S. Grundtvig, then a minister in the church. Grundtvig was an offshoot of the pietists; but the old, narrow, and somewhat low-bred pietism was here transfused with the young enthusiasm of the Romantic school, and connected with a strong, practical instinct of liberty and democracy. It was not the old family pietism, whose exclusiveness was almost sure to run counter to any form of an established church, but a grand idea of the will of God, which demanded a whole people for its realization. See article on GRUNDTVIG. The controversy ended with a lawsuit (1827). Grundtvig was suspended, forbidden to perform any of the offices of the Christian ministry, put under royal censorship, etc. Then the contest began. Clausen's victory produced just heat enough in the hearts of his adversaries to allow Grundtvig's ideas to germinate; and a party began immediately to form. In 1840 it was necessary to reinstate Grundtvig in his office. In 1850 it was evident that the Danish people was going to belong to him, whatsoever might become of the Danish Church. Before he died, his pupils held the most prominent places both in the church and the school, and were numerous enough in the constitutional representation of the people to turn the scales the way they wanted. There is now hardly a mouse-hole in the Danish Church in which the influence of N. F. S. Grundtvig is not visible; while the influence of H. Martensen and Søren Kierkegaard has hitherto hardly penetrated beyond the literature.

During all these vicissitudes the constitution of the Danish Church has remained almost unaltered for three centuries. It was established by the diet of Copenhagen in 1536. The "Evangelical Lutheran Church" was then called the "Church of the Country," and no other denomination was tolerated. The legislation of the absolute monarchy, under Christian V. (1670-99), confirmed this constitution, and it was not abrogated by the freer constitution of June 5, 1849. The "Evangelical Lutheran Church" is here called the "Church of the People," and is, as such, entitled to the support of the State; but other denominations were allowed free exercise of their religions, and all social or political disqualifications or restrictions attached to religion were abolished. The changes which have taken place since 1849 all point in the direction of greater freedom. A law of April 4, 1853, dissolved the parochial bound so far as to allow any member of a parish to join the congregation of a neighboring minister. The law of May 15, 1868, allowed the establishment of free congregations within the Established Church, that is, of congregations that choose and pay their ministers themselves. The sabbath-law of April 7, 1876, forbids all business, "inside and outside the house," between nine A.M. and four P.M. on Sundays and holidays, but does not interfere with the old custom, according to which Sunday evening is considered the most proper time for social gatherings and merry-making. Of the inhabitants of the country, 1,769,583 are Lutherans, 4,290 Jews, 3,223 Baptists, 1,767 belong to the Reformed Church, etc.; and these figures, taken from the census of 1870, are nearly identical with those of the census of 1860. CLEMENS PETERSEN.

DENS, Peter, b. at Boom in Belgium, 1690; d. at Malines as archpriest of St. Rumold's Church, Feb. 15, 1775; was the author of a Theologia Moralis et Dogmatica, which was often reprinted (e.g. Dublin, 1832, 4 vols.), and much used as a textbook in Roman-Catholic seminaries. See J. F. BERG: Synopsis of the Theology of Peter Dens, Philadelphia, 1840, 4th ed. 1869.

DENUNCIATIO EVANGELICA, a term of canon law and Roman-Catholic morals, means the denunciation of sin before an ecclesiastical authority. But as every civil case—for instance, the non-payment of a debt—may be conceived of as a sin, it may, according to the principle involved in the denunciatio evangelica, be drawn into an ecclesiastical court.

DEPOSITION, a term of canon law, which, in the ancient church, meant the deprivation not only of benefice and office, but also of orders, but which, from the beginning of the twelfth century, came to mean, in contradistinction to degradation, a simple deprivation of benefice and office, but not of orders. After deposition, re-instatement is possible, but after degradation not. In some free Protestant churches, however, not dependent on State authority, degradation and deposition are synonymous. See DEGRADATION.

DEPRIVATION "the taking-away" (deprivatio), for cause, of a clergyman of the Church of England from his preferment. There are two sorts of deprivations,—deprivatio a beneficio, when the deprivation is from the living simply, in punishment of an atrocious offence; and deprivatio ab officio, deprivation of clerical standing, or degradation (which see).

DEPUTATUS, in the Greek Church (δευότατος), means a lower class of ecclesiastics, who, on solemn occasions, accompany the bishops or deacons with lighted tapers, but form no special order themselves. In the Roman Church, deputati occur as directors of regiuncule. As the diocese is divided into deaneries, so the larger deaneries are sometimes divided into regiuncule; and the director or superintendent of such a division, the deputatus, is generally subject to the authority of the dean, though, in some cases, he ranks immediately under the bishop, and the dean is simply primus inter pares.

DERESER, Thaddäus Anton, b. Feb. 9, 1757, at Fahr in Franconia; d. July 16, 1827, at Breslau; studied philosophy and theology at Würzburg and Heidelberg; was ordained a priest (1780), and appointed professor of Oriental languages in the University of Bonn (1783); moved in 1790 to Strassburg, in 1797 to Heidelberg, and in 1807 to Freiburg. In 1810 he was made parish priest at Carlsruhe, but was dismissed in 1811, on account of a funeral sermon over the Grand Duke of Bade; became professor at the Lyceum of Luzern in 1811, but was suddenly discharged in 1814, and was in 1815 made professor in Breslau. He belonged to the liberal wing of the Roman Church, and his Tu es Petrus (1790) was put on the Index. He published commentaries, and a translation of the Old Testament.

DERHAM, William, b. at Stowton, near Worcester, Eng., Nov. 27, 1657; d. at Upminster, where he had been rector since 1689, April 5, 1735. He was graduated from Oxford, 1675, made F.R.S., 1702, canon of Windsor, 1716, D.D., Oxford, 1730. He was the author of the once famous Physico-theology, London, 1713 (the substance of his Boyle Lectures for 1711, 1712), new ed., 1798, 2 vols., French trans., Rotterdam, 1726, German trans., Hamburg, 1730; Astro-theology, London, 1714, 4th ed., 1726, French trans., Paris, 1729, German trans., Hamburg, 1765; Christo-theology (a sermon on Acts xxvi. 28), London, 1730; and A Defence of the Church's Right in Leasehold Estate, London, 1731. See Account of his Life and Writings, in last edition of his Physico-theology.

DERVISH, or DERVISE, a Persian word, signifying "the sill of the door," or those who beg from door to door. Dervishes are a Mohammedan approach to Christian monks, while the ulemas are the secular clergy. They are bound by oaths of poverty, chastity, and humility, and live together in communities, under the headship of a sheik. But, unlike monks, some of them are allowed to marry, and live outside of the convent, although they must pass at least two nights of every week within. There are numerous orders of dervishes, the largest and most popular being the Mevlevis (from Mevlevi Jelal ed-Din el-Rumi, a Persian poet of the thirteenth century) and the Rufais (from Sheik Ahmed Rufai, who dates from 1182), called by travellers the "whirlers" or "dancers," and the "howlers," respectively. The former is joined by persons of the highest rank; but, if they do not go beyond the first stage, they may meet all requirements by saying a few prayers at home, and wearing for a few minutes every day the sacred cap. But he who sets out seriously to win the goal of full membership must undergo one thousand and one days of menial labor, during which he is called "jackal." Then he is given the woollen belt with its cabalistic "stone of contentment," the earrings shaped like the horseshoe of Ali, the mantle, the rosary with the ninety-nine names of God, and the taj, or white cap. The public services they conduct are certainly fanatical, and yet witnessed by the people with the utmost decorum and solemnity. The Dancing Dervishes, dressed in white flowing gowns, and with high white hats of stiff woollen stuff, after preliminary exercises of prayer and prostration, whirl around upon the left heel to the music of flutes and tambourines, ring within ring, without touching each other, their hands outstretched, their eyes half closed, and their faces fanatically illumined, all the time quietly but closely watched by the sheik. They keep up this extraordinary performance, with brief intervals of rest, for an hour, and give a performance once a week. The Howling Dervishes, either in line or a ring, sway themselves backward and forward, crying incessantly and with all their might, "Lâ ilahâ ill'Allâh" ("No God but Allah"), until they drop from sheer exhaustion. It is a wild spectacle, which, to a European, has neither dignity nor sense, but impresses one with the tremendous power of fanaticism.

Besides the members of the regular orders, there are many dervishes in the Mohammedan world who wander about and support themselves, and even acquire great wealth, by their incantations, feats of legerdemain, and other kinds of more or less conscious imposture. The dervishes as a class have great power among the people, but are dreaded by the sultans, because they do not recognize the legal exposition of the Koran, nor acknowledge the authority of any other than their spiritual chief, or of Allah himself speaking directly to them. See J. P. BROWN: History of the Dervishes, Philadelphia, 1868; OSMAN-BEY: Les Imams et les Derviches, pratiques, superstitions et mœurs des Turcs, Paris, 1881.

DESCARTES, René (Renatus Cartesius) was b. at La Haye in Touraine, March 30, 1596, and d. in Stockholm, Feb. 11, 1650. He received his first education in the College of the Jesuits, at La Flèche, and served afterwards (1617-22), first under Maurice of Nassau, then under Maximilian of Bavaria, and finally under Tilly, not from any passion for war, but in order to gather knowledge of men and manners. In the latter part of his life he travelled much, for the same purpose. He visited Italy and Denmark, England and Hungary. His home he fixed in Holland (from 1629), for the sake, he says himself, of that quiet and seclusion which he found necessary for a meditative life, but more probably in order to be safely out of the reach of the Roman-Catholic Church. In 1649 he went to Stockholm on the invitation of Queen Christina, the eccentric daughter of Gustavus Adolphus.

In pursuance of the principle de omnibus est dubitandum ("you shall doubt about every thing"), Descartes arrived at his cogito ergo sum ("I am, because I think") as an ultimate fact of consciousness which cannot be doubted. From this point of primary unity between thought and being,—the corner-stone of the ontological evidence of the existence of God,—he developed a system of unmitigated dualism. In man, for instance, soul and body touch each other only at one single point, the pineal gland of the brain, and animals are mere machines; a doctrine which, with some of his disciples,—the physician Delaforge, the theologian Malebranche, etc.—gave rise to very singular conceptions. In the social circles of Paris his philosophy was received with great enthusiasm. The Duke de Luynes translated his Latin writings into French, and Rohant's lectures were frequented by ladies and gentlemen of the highest rank. The congregations also accepted it; that of the Oratory, Bérulle, Malebranche, etc.; that of Port Royal, Arnauld, Nicole, etc. The Jesuits, however, proved averse; and at their instance the Roman curia forbade the printing and reading of Descartes' writings. In France the prohibition was enforced by a royal decree; but it fell soon into desuetude, as many of the most prominent characters of the Gallican Church, Bossuet, Fénelon, etc., were Cartesians. In Holland, too, Descartes' philosophy exercised considerable influence on theology; though at one time it was accused of being atheistic, and generally was confounded with the views of Cocceius. When, however, Descartes' doctrine of vortices had been completely superseded by Newton, and his views of innate ideas were abandoned for those of Hobbes and Locke, Cartesianism gradually lost all direct influence, and lived on only through its continuators, Leibnitz, Wolff, etc.

The principal works of Descartes are, Discours de la Methode (Leyden, 1637), Meditations de Prima Philosophia, Paris (1641), Principia Philosophiæ (Amsterdam, 1644), of which three works an English translation was published in Edinburgh, 1853. A collected edition of his works appeared at Amsterdam, 1692-1701, in 8 vols.; another was given by V. Cousin, Paris, 1824-26, 11 vols., to which were added some Œuvres inédites, Paris, 1859-60; Œuvres philosophiques de Descartes, Paris, 1885, 4 vols., ed. by Garnier, with life and analysis. See, also, A. KOCH: Die Psychologie Descartes', systematisch u. historisch-kritisch bearbeitet, München, 1881. His life was written by A. BAILLET: La Vie de M. des Cartes, Paris, 1691, 2 vols. The principal works on Descartes are, BOULLIER: Histoire de la Philosophie Cartésienne, Paris, 1854; SAISSET: Précurseurs et Disciples de D., Paris, 1862; MILLET: Descartes, sa vie, ses travaux, ses découvertes avant 1637, Paris, 1867; JEAUNEL: D. et la princesse palatine, Paris, 1869; BORDAS-DEMOULIN: Le Cartésianisme, Paris, 1874; J. DESERT is the English equivalent in the Authorized Version for four Hebrew words, no one of which means "a sandy waste," but, on the contrary, simply "untilled pasture-land, which may be covered with a luxuriant vegetation." The four words are: 1. Arabah (עֲרָבָה), the name of the remarkable depression which runs from the Sea of Galilee to the Gulf of Akabah; this tract, though now waste and parched, is capable of cultivation (the Hebrew word occurs only in the prophets Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel); 2. Midbar (מִדְבָּר, "pasture-land"); 3. Horbah (הֲרָבָה) occurs only three times in the Hebrew (Ps. cii. 6; Isa. xlviii. 21; Ezek. xiii. 4); 4. Yeshimon (יֵשִׁימוֹן). See Young's Concordance under Desert, for the Bible passages.

DES MARETS, Samuel (Latin, Maresius), b. at Oisemont, Picardy, Aug. 9, 1599; d. at Gröningen, May 18, 1673; studied theology at Saumur and Geneva; and was appointed pastor at Laon (1620), professor at Sedan (1624), pastor at Maesricht (1632), and at Bois-le-Duc (1636), and professor at Gröningen (1643). Though up to his twelfth year he took no other food than milk, and though, in his very first controversy with the Jesuits at Laon, he was stabbed in the chest by way of argumentation, he was one of the most prolific and most rabid polemics of the Reformed Church, pursuing with equal zest the liberal tenancy represented by the Academy of Saumur (Amyraut), the Socinians, and the Jesuits. He wrote more than a hundred works, of which a list is given in La France Protestante; but they are now all forgotten.

DESMARETS DE SAINT-SORLIN, Jean, b. in Paris, 1595; d. there 1676; began his public career as a debauched fool, and ended it as a hypocritical rascal, equally ridiculous and equally vicious in both characters. Before his conversion, he manufactured poetry of all descriptions: after his conversion, he manufactured visions of the worst kind. His Les Delices de l'esprit, Paris, 1658, fol., pretends to be a commentary on the Revelation, by which he felt authorized to promise Louis XIV. and the Pope an army of one hundred thousand faithful to destroy the Turks and the Jansenists. He is now known only from the infamous manner in which he brought Simon Morin to the stake, and from Nicole's Lettres imaginaires, Paris, 1664-66.

DESSERTANT, in the Gallican Church, means, first, a priest appointed by the bishop to perform all ecclesiastical functions in a parish during a vacancy; second, a priest occupying an ecclesia succursalis. In contradistinction to the ecclesia parochialis (the true parish-church), there are in France, Belgium, and the Rhenish Provinces, a great number of auxiliary churches (ecclesie succursales), organized in places where the congregation was found too large for the parish-church, whose occupants, the desservants, differ from the curates only by having a smaller salary, and by standing more directly under the control of the bishop.

DESUBAS (Mathieu Majal), a pastor of the Desert, so called from his birthplace; b. at Desubas, 1720; d. as a martyr, at Montpellier, Feb. 2, 1746. As pastor of Vivarais he sat in the National Synod of Bas Languedoc, Aug. 18, 1744, and distinguished himself by his wisdom and patriotism. He was arrested April 6, 1745, and taken to Vernoux. The supplications of a throng of his parishioners were answered by a round of musketry, and so the "massacre of Vernoux" took place. He was tried, condemned to die, and accordingly executed, at the age of twenty-six. See D. BENOIT: Une victime de l'intolérance au XVIII. siècle. Desubas, son ministère, son martyre (1720-46), d'après des documents inédits, Toulouse, 1879.

DETERMINISM is the common name for all those theories of the human will which represent it as absolutely determined by motives which lie entirely outside of it, thereby reducing its freedom to a mere delusion. There is a dogmatic determinism, which, in order to glorify the majesty of God, excludes all other causality from human action but God himself (Luther, De servo arbitrio); and there is a philosophical determinism, which explains all human actions as results of surrounding circumstances (La Mettrie). There is a fatalistic determinism, which places God himself in the grip of an iron necessity (the ancient idea of Nemesis, Islam); and there is a pantheistic determinism, which makes even the faintest gleam of human freedom vanish into the darkness of a natural process (the Hindoos, Stoicism, Spinoza). Indeed, like the chameleon, determinism is capable of assuming the color of any thing which happens to be next to it, and fanaticism is as apt to produce it as indifference; but it is always characterized by placing freedom and necessity in such an opposition to each other that the former disappears. One of the most interesting forms under which determinism has appeared in theology is that which it received from Schleiermacher and his school. See I. P. ROMANG: Ueber Willensfreiheit und Determinismus, Bern, 1835.

DEURHOFF, William, b. in Amsterdam, 1650; d. there 1717; was a basket-maker by profession, but a speculative genius by nature; studied theology and philosophy, though in a desultory and unsystematic way; lectured in the evenings, often to large audiences; wrote books, which were published in a collected edition (1715), and caused considerable stir in the Dutch Reformed Church. His special study was Descartes; and the Cartesian occasionalism found great favor with him. Still, his ideas of God as a mere force pervading the universe, and of the individual human soul as a mere modification of the one thinking substance, show his affinity to Spinoza.

DEUSEDIT, also called Deodatus, Adeodatus, sometimes Adeodatus I., in opposition to the usual bearer of that name (see title); b. in Rome, according to one report; the son of a sub-deacon, Stephanus; and chosen Pope in 615, after the death of Boniface IV.; d. 618. His life is connected with legends, and his pontificate with false decretals; but he has passed into the galaxy of Roman-Catholic saints, and is commemorated Nov. 9.

DEUSING, Herman, b. at Groningen, March 14, 1654; d. there Jan 3, 1722; studied, first mathematics and medicine, but afterwards theology, and made himself known as one of the most extreme representatives of the typical school of scriptural interpreters, by his Historia Allegorica V. et N. Testamenti (1690), Commentarius Mysticus in Decalogum (1700), and Mysterium S. Triadas (1712). Having been accused of heresy, and excommunicated by the Dutch Reformed Church, he joined the Walloon Church.

DEUTSCH, Emanuel Oscar Menahem, an eminent Oriental scholar; b. of Jewish parents, Oct. 28, 1829, at Neisse, Prussian Silesia; d. at Alexandria, Egypt, May 12, 1873. His uncle, a learned rabbi, gave him his early education, and he studied at Berlin. From 1855 to his death he was assistant in the library of the British Museum. He contributed articles to Chambers's Encyclopædia, Kitto's and Smith's Bible dictionaries, and to various periodicals. From childhood he was a student of the Talmud, and intended to write an elaborate volume upon it. In October, 1867, he published an article on The Talmud, in The Quarterly Review. By it he became famous. The article was translated within a year into French, German, Russian, Swedish, Dutch, and Danish. But hard work induced disease, and death drew on apace. Twice he visited the East, — in 1869 and 1872. Besides in Hebrew, Deutsch made remarkable attainments in Sanscrit, Chaldee, Aramaic, and Phœnician. His Remains, edited by Lady Strangford, with a brief sketch, appeared, London and New York, 1874.

DEUTSCHMANN, Johann, b. at Wittenberg, Aug. 10, 1625; d. there Aug. 12, 1706; was professor of theology from 1657, and was one of the most curious representatives of the orthodoxy of that time. With an almost furious hatred of the younger Calixtus and Spener, he connected an almost ridiculous love of the so-called Theologia paradisiaca, and was very busy in proving that not only the Old Testament, but also the faith of the patriarchs, and even of Adam, harmonized with the Confessio Augustana and the Formula Concordia. Symbolum Apostolicum Adami is the title of one of his works. THEOLUCK.

DÉVAY, Mátyás Biró, one of the most prominent of the Hungarian Reformers; was born in the village of Déva in Transylvania, towards the close of the fifteenth or in the beginning of the sixteenth century; and died, probably in Debreczin, about 1547. In 1523 he studied in the University of Cracow, where the Hungarians from Transylvania and the Theiss Valley formed a peculiar nation. In 1527 he was active in his home as a Roman-Catholic priest; but in 1529 he went to Wittenberg, where he staid, for one year and a half, in the house of Luther. After returning home, he preached the new doctrines, first in Ofen, then at Kaschau, and published two pamphlets, De sanctorum dormitione, against the worship of saints, and a more systematical representation of the theology of the Reformers, in fifty-two propositions; which two pamphlets, however, circulated only in manuscript copies, because as yet there was no printing-press in Hungary. At the instance of Thomas Szalaházy, Bishop of Erlau, he was arrested, and kept in prison, first at Likava, then at Pressburg, and finally in Vienna. He was soon released, however; but when, immediately after his release, he took up again his former business as a preacher of the new doctrines, he was arrested once more, and kept in prison for nearly three years (1532-34). Released a second time, he settled at Sárvár, in the county of Wasch, under the protection of Count Nádasdy, a powerful Hungarian magnate, who had espoused the cause of the Reformation. In 1537 he again visited Wittenberg, and went thence to Basel, where he published his Disputatio, etc., a refutation of the Censura, etc., which Gregór Szegedy, the provincial of the Franciscans in Hungary, and member of the Sorbonne, had written against his fifty-two propositions. On his return to Sárvár he put up a printing-press there, and published his Orthographia Ungarica, the first book printed in Hungary, and containing a grammar of the Hungarian language, and extracts of Luther's minor catechism, written in Hungarian. Justly realizing with what kind of weapons the Reformation was most likely to win in the contest, he was also a zealous teacher in the school which Johannes Sylvester, another Hungarian Reformer, had founded at Sárvár. But this noble activity came to a sudden stop by the invasion of the Turks in 1540. Dévay fled to Switzerland, and did not return until 1542, when he settled at Debreczin, under the protection of Count Valentin Török, a relative of Nádasdy, and, like him, a Protestant. In Switzerland he had become acquainted with Zwingli's views of the Lord's Supper, and adopted them; and he now preached them openly in Debreczin, to the disgust and scandal of Luther and the Wittenberg Reformers. In one of the last years of his life he published a text-book for use in the religious instruction in the schools. It was written in Hungarian, and probably printed in Cracow. He was also the author of a very popular hymn, in which the principal articles of the Protestant faith were given in substance.

REVEEZ.

DEVELOPMENT, Theological and Historical, is held in different shapes. (1) The evangelical Protestant theory maintains that Christianity objectively considered is perfect in Christ and the New Testament, but that its understanding and application is gradual, and progressing from age to age. In this sense there can be no history without motion and development. (2) The rationalistic theory holds that Christianity itself is imperfect, and will ultimately be superseded by philosophy or a humanitarian religion, or that reason will take the place of the Bible as a rule of faith and action. (3) The Roman-Catholic theory, as advocated by Cardinal Newman, in his Development of Christian Doctrine, London, 1845, written just before he went over to Rome, but never indorsed by the Roman Church, is that the New Testament contained the germs of certain doctrines, i. e., those distinctive to the Roman and Greek Catholic Churches, which, under divine care, have been developed into their present shape. It is true that the doctrines and practices of these churches can be traced to very early times; but that is quite a different thing from allowing that such development was always in the way of truth and purity. One of the most vigorous replies to Dr. Newman was W. A. BUTLER'S Letters on the Development of Christian Doctrine, in reply to Mr. Newman's Essay, Dublin, 1850. See, also, PHILIP SCHIAFF: What is Church History? A Vindication of the Idea of Historical Development, Phila., 1846.

DEVELOPMENT, Scientific. See EVOLUTION.

DEVIL, an apostate angel, the ruler of the kingdom of darkness, the enemy of all good, and the source and promoter of all evil. His chief designations are Satan (Ἰαβώβα), meaning adversary, and Devil (διάβολος), calumniator. We shall treat the subject by giving the Old and New Testament doctrine, and by presenting the views that have prevailed at various periods of the church.

1. The Old Testament does not contain the fully-developed doctrine of Satan that is presented in the New Testament. It does not portray him as at the head of a kingdom, ruling over kindred natures, and an apostate from the family of God. The belief in evil spirits, the Sherim and Sedim (Deut. xxxii. 17; Isa. xiii. 21, xxxiv. 14, etc.), is distinctly alluded to. Their element is the night, and their habitation waste places. It was forbidden to offer sacrifices to them (Deut. xxxii. 17; Ps. cvi. 37, etc.). In the older books, God is described as the source from which come influences noxious to man, such as hardening Pharaoh's heart (Exod. viii., etc.), smiting the first born (Exod. xii. 29); but there are not wanting references to evil spirits, to whom are attributed evil agencies, as the evil spirit which troubled Saul (1 Sam. xvi. 14), and the lying spirit among the prophets of Ahab (1 Kings xxii. 20 sqq.). In this connection the two parallel statements of 2 Sam. xxiv. 1 and 1 Chron. xxi. 1, should be compared, and it will be found that the same event is attributed in the first passage to God as its author, which in the second is attributed to Satan (comp. in the New Testament Luke xii. 5 and Heb. ii. 14). The rare mention of evil spirits in the Hebrew Scriptures is to be explained, on the one hand, by the jealous monotheism of the Hebrews; and, on the other, the subordination of evil to God's supreme power and purpose agrees exactly with the more definite statements of our Lord and his apostles.

The term "Satan" is used in the general sense of adversary (Ps. cix. 6, etc.), but more particularly also as the spirit of evil, who comes in collision with the plans of God, and plots the hurt of man. It is not definitely stated, in the account of the fall, that the serpent who tempted Eve was the Devil, or his agent. The first identification of the two is in the Book of Wisdom (ii. 23 sq.), and is taken for granted by John in the expression, "that old serpent called the Devil" (Rev. xii. 9; comp. John viii. 44). This inference is justified by the words which the serpent used, and agrees exactly with the portrait of the Devil as the tempter (ὁ πειράζων). The only other reference to Satan in the Pentateuch is Lev. xvi. 8. Aaron is there instructed to cast upon each of two goats, on the great day of atonement, a lot, "one for the Lord, and the other lot for Azazel" (marg.). This certainly means an evil spirit, if not Satan himself. In the Book of Job he is definitely brought out as a distinct personality. He presents himself before the Lord with the sons of God (i. 6), and, after questioning the motives of the patriarch, secures permission to tempt and torment him, but not to kill him (i. 12). The Cycl. Brit. assumes too much when it says (art. Devil), "Satan is not represented as the impersonation of evil or as a spiritual assailant of the patriarch. The evils with which he assails Job are outward evils." This is in the line of Herder, Eichhorn, and others, who affirm that Satan was a good angel, delegated by God as his agent. But, if he was a good angel, how could the evil design originate with him of bringing Job by bodily plagues, and, as we suppose, spiritual doubts, to curse God? The whole conversation between him and the Almighty (i. 7-12) leaves the impression that he was the restless (ver. 7) agent of evil. In Zech. iii. 1 he is portrayed as standing at the side of Joshua the high priest to assail him. These descriptions complete the portraiture of the Old Testament, which, if it is far from being as full as that of the New, has no traits dissonant with it.

2. The New Testament is full of allusions to the personality and agency of the Evil One. His character is drawn in strong colors, because he is the adversary of the kingdom of grace which Christ came to establish, and rules over the kingdom of darkness with which this shall be engaged in a life-and-death-struggle. He bears the titles of Tempter (1 Thess. iii. 5), Beelzebub and Prince of devils (Matt. xii. 24), the Evil One (Matt. vi. 13, xiii. 19, etc.), Prince of this world (John xii. 31, xiv. 30, xvi. 11), God of this world (2 Cor. iv. 4), Prince of the power of the air (Eph. ii. 2), the dragon and the serpent (Rev. xii. 9, xx. 2). He has a kingdom (Matt. xii. 26) which is hostile to the kingdom of Christ (Acts xxvii. 18), and dominates over a realm of demons (Matt. ix. 14). Created one of the angels, he became an apostate (John viii.

44), and fell from heaven (Luke x. 18; Jude 6). He is the bitter and indefatigable adversary of the kingdom of grace, but will ultimately be overthrown, and cast into everlasting punishment (Matt. xxv. 46; Rev. xxi. 10). He endeavored to traduce Christ himself (Matt. iv. 1), worked among the apostles (John xiii. 2), and worketh in the children of disobedience (Eph. ii. 2). Conversion is the passage and deliverance from his kingdom of darkness to the kingdom of light (Col. i. 13). He is restlessly sowing seeds of error and doubt in the church (Matt. xiii. 39), blinding the eyes of them that believe not (2 Cor. iv. 4), goes about as a roaring lion (1 Pet. v. 8), and has the power of death (Heb. ii. 14). Christ has given a more definite description of him (John viii. 44) as a "murderer and liar." His chief characteristics are power and craft. He is as a "strong man" (Matt. xii. 29), and his subtlety (comp. Gen. iii. 1) is exhibited in treacherous snares (2 Tim. ii. 26), wiles (Eph. vi. 11), and devices (2 Cor. ii. 11), and the delusive shift of transforming himself into an angel of light (2 Cor. xi. 14).

It was to undo the desolation, and destroy the works of this Satan, that the Son of God was manifested (1 John iii. 8). It has been attempted to make him out to be a mere personification of evil, and to show that evil exists only as it is found in the human heart. Schleiermacher thinks that Jesus accommodated himself to the ideas and language that then prevailed in Judæa, but did not himself regard Satan as a real and living person. But certainly this is beneath the dignity of Christ. He would hardly, in speaking of him, make use of such strong language, and bid the disciples beware of his craft and power. In the exposition of the parable of the tares he makes the didactic statement that the enemy who sowed them was the Devil (Matt. xiii. 39).

The Satan of the Scriptures is a portrait independent of Persian mythology. He and Ahriman agree only in this, that they are alike spirits of evil. In subordinate particulars they are disparate. Ahriman rules over one-half the world, and is independent of Ormuzd. Satan's dominion is limited, and subject to the supreme authority of God. Ahriman is co-eternal with Ormuzd, Satan is a creature who apostatized from the truth.

3. The church fathers agreed in representing Satan as an apostate, and the inveterate enemy of the Church and the believer. The work of the atonement was regarded by Irenæus, Origen, etc., as a price paid to Satan. During the middle ages the belief in the Devil took the wildest shapes. He was represented with horns and hoofs, painted on bridges and canvas, regarded as living in witches and ghouls; and Luther afterwards found an easy explanation of mosquitoes, mice, and similar troublesome creatures, in his creative agency. The Bogomili went so far as to call him the elder brother of Christ, so great was the dread of his power. The Reformers clung with their deep consciousness of sin also to the belief in Satan. The strong individuality of Luther is nowhere more clearly apparent than in his imagined visions of the Evil One, at whom he once threw his ink-bottle. On another occasion he said, "I heard some one walking on the floor above my head; but, as I knew it was only the Devil, I went quietly to sleep." The rationalists deny the existence of Satan as a mere superstition. Even Schleiermacher with great ability combats the view of a personal Satan; but later theologians, like Martensen, Nitzsch, Twisten, Julius Müller, Dorner, etc., hold firmly to his personality. Three of the greatest poets of three languages have given pictures of Satan, his rebellion, and his realm, — Dante, Milton, and Goethe.

How Satan came to fall is a deep question which has been differently answered, but can hardly be settled. Milton, following the ancient fathers, represents (i. 37) pride as the motive.

... "His pride
Had cast him out from heaven with all his host Of rebel angels."

And again (i. 261), —

... "My choice
To reign is worth ambition, though in hell."

Martensen says he was "Christ's younger brother, and became God's adversary, because he was not content to be second, but wanted to be first; because he was unwilling to bear the light of another, and wanted to be the light itself." Jacob Böhme: "Lucifer envied the Son his glory; his own beauty deceived him, and he wanted to place himself on the throne of the Son." An attempt has even been made to fix the date of that apostasy. Lange thinks it occurred on one of the days of the creative week; while Kurtz and others hold that the formless and void chaos of the world (Gen. i. 2) was the result of Satan's fall. In connection with these views it is not irrelevant to quote the words of Hugh Miller (Test. of the Rocks, p. 112): "The reptile selected as typical of the great fallen spirit that kept not his first estate is at once the reptile of latest appearance in creation, and the one selected by philosophical naturalists as representative of a reversed process in the order of being." Whatever may be said of these theories, three things may be stated as fixed: 1. The possibility of Satan's apostasy is as conceivable as the fall of man; 2. The inveterate and undying hostility of Satan to the kingdom of Christ makes the denial of eternal punishment on the ground of the divine compassion untenable; 3. In proportion as the Christian consciousness of sin is deep does the belief in the personal agency of Satan prevail. The denial of the personal Satan is the first step in the denial of the sinfulness of sin. In the New Testament it is the struggle between the kingdom of Christ and the kingdom of Satan which causes apostles to glow in the description, and draws forth the vivid exhortations to fight manfully and with the armor of God, and to resist by prayer and vigilance. We may say with Dorner, that the conviction of a great struggle going on between the two kingdoms of darkness and light, a struggle in which we all may take part, is adapted to produce an earnest conception of evil, and develop watchfulness and tension of the moral energies. See art. DEMON.

LIT. — Works on Dogmatics (English systems do not treat the subject at length): SCHLEIERMACHER (§§ 44, 45); MARTENSEN (pp. 213-231); LANGE (ii. 569 sqq.); VAN OSTERZEE, vol. ii. pp.

413-422 (Am. trans., New York, 1874), and especially DORNER: Christl. Glaubenslehre (vol. ii. pp. 188-217); SCHELLING: Philos. der Offenb., ii. 257 sqq. — Special works: ANSELM: De Casu Diaboli; MAYER: *Histor. DEVOTION, DEVOTIONAL EXERCISES, and BOOKS OF DEVOTION. By devotion we mean every sort of exercise of the soul, prayer and meditation, whether public or private, free or set. Devotional exercises include two distinct elements: the first consists in the more or less self-conscious determination to turn the attention to things divine; the second, the exaltation of the soul to God. To these exercises belong public, family, and private worship, consisting in reading of the Bible, prayer, praise, meditation, and exhortation. There is danger of viewing devotions as purely external matters, and therefore in performing them perfunctorily, as a mere matter of duty. But, the closer one walks with God, the less constraint will one feel. Devotional exercises will be privileges most highly valued. But, whatever the feeling in respect to them, they should be carefully maintained, as habits of prayer will produce praying habits. By services at stated times we are far more likely to see God at last than if we postponed them until we "felt like it."

Books of devotion characterize every phase of church life and history. The temper of the times is reflected by them. Such books as The Shepherd of Hermas, Augustine's Confessions, Thomas A Kempis' Imitation of Christ, Tauler's Sermons, the Theologia Germanica, mark the pulse of an ascetic though spiritual life. Those written by Protestants breathe an altogether different spirit. Jeremy Taylor's Holy Living and Holy Dying, Baxter's Saints' Everlasting Rest, Böhme's Way to Christ, Arndt's True Christianity, Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress, Doddridge's Rise and Progress of Religion in the Soul, are books addressed to those who live in homes, not to those in cloisters. In the Roman-Catholic Church the writings of Francis de Sales, Fénelon, Molinos, and others, though full of heavenly piety, are not so well adapted to men and women tossed to and fro by worldly cares and business. These books, and many others, are gifts from God of inestimable worth. Their perusal has been of saving efficacy unto many, and cannot be too strongly recommended. At the same time, devotional reading must be mingled with Scripture and prayer, and followed by direct effort in practical Christian work. The defect of present-day Protestantism is that it is too active and too little meditative. It needs to be recalled to the duty of acquainting itself with the devotional thoughts of the ages, and of spending time in devotion.

No devotional volume should be suffered to usurp the place of the Bible. Only from it do we receive the rays of divine light unrefracted. The devotions of the church in public and private should make more of Scripture reading. In non-liturgical churches it is too commonly curtailed. If the words of God were heard more, and the words of man less, in our churches, it would be better for us.

DE WITT, Thomas, D.D., b. at Kingston, N.Y., Sept. 13, 1791; d. in New York City, May 18, 1874. He was graduated at Union College, 1808, and at the New Brunswick Theological Seminary, 1812; pastor of the Reformed Dutch churches of Hopewell and New Hackensack, N.Y., 1812-25; of Hopewell alone, 1825-27; and one of the Collegiate Church pastors, New York City, from 1827 till his death. He edited The Christian Intelligencer, 1831-43; was vice-president of the New York Historical Society for thirty years, and its president from 1870 to 1872. He was an honored citizen of New York, and for many years one of its favorite preachers and pastors. By all who knew him esteemed for his many virtues, pre-eminently for his humility and simplicity. His writings consisted, for the most part, of occasional sermons and translations from the Dutch, relating to ecclesiastical history. The latter are found in The Christian Intelligencer (1830-74), The Historical Collections of the State of New York, and in The Documentary History of the State of New York.

DIABOLUS. See DEVIL.

DIACONICUM means, in ecclesiastical writings, sometimes a text-book for the duties and functions of a deacon, but more often a separate building of apsidal form, adjoining the basilica, just south of the bema, and communicating with it through a door in the side-wall. In this building, the modern vestry or sacristy of the church, the deacons kept the holy vessels and vestments, prepared and lighted the incense, etc. No priest of a lower order was allowed to enter it.

DIA'NA OF THE EPHESIANS. In the city of Ephesus was one of the wonders of the world, — the Temple to Diana. But this goddess is not to be confounded with the Artemis of the Greeks, or the Diana of the Latins. She was a nature goddess, and the point of similarity is in her nourishing power over all life. She was not, like Artemis, the goddess of the chase, the chaste and virgin sister of Apollo. For a description of her temple and her image, see EPHESUS. See, also, A. CLAUS: De Dianæ antiquissima apud Græcos natura, Breslau, 1881.

DIASPORA, a term applied to the Jews who were scattered through the Roman world (Jas. i. 1; 1 Pet. i. 1). See CAPTIVITY. On the Moravian diaspora, see MORAVIANS.

DIATESSARON (literally, through four) is applied to the combination of the four Gospels in one consecutive narrative. While the harmony of the accounts is thus brought out, the individuality of the writers is lost. The earliest diatessaron was Tatian's, in the second century. See Theodor Zahn, on Tatian's Diatessaron, in the First Part of his Forschungen zur Gesch. des Neu. Testament. Kanons, Erlangen, 1881. Tregelles says that this work "led to a confusion and intermingling, on the part of transcribers, of the words and expressions of one Gospel with that which was found in another," and thus "had more effect apparently on the text of the Gospels in use throughout the church than all the designed falsifications of Marcion and every scion of the Gnostic blood" (Horne's Introduction, vol. iv. p. 40). Tatian has had many followers. A few are, to mention only modern English works, W. Greenwood, London, 1765; J. White (with Greek text), Oxford, 1799, new ed., 1856; T. Thirlwall, 3d ed., London, 1804; J. D. Macbride, Oxford, 1837; John Forster, 3d ed., London, 1847; W. Stroud (with Greek text), London, 1853; The Gospels Consolidated, London (Bagster's); F. Gardiner, Andover, 1871; The Life of our Lord in the Words of the Four Evangelists, N.Y., 1877. See list in DARLING, Cyclopaedia Bibliographica, also HARMONY OF THE GOSPELS, TATIAN.

DIAZ, Francisco, a Dominican monk; born at S. Cebrían de Maynelas in Castile; went as a missionary to the Philippine Islands in 1632, and in 1635 to China, where he was killed during a persecution, Nov. 4, 1646. He wrote a catechism in Chinese and a Chinese-Spanish dictionary.

DIAZ, Juan, b. at Cuenca, in Castile; studied in the University of Paris, and was converted to the Protestant faith in 1540. He was present at the diet of Ratisbon, December, 1544, and his conversations with Pietro Malvenda and the other Spanish priests stirred up the Spanish fanaticism and pride to the highest pitch. His brother, Alphonzo, who was an officer at the papal court, hastened to Germany with the fixed purpose to kill him; and March 27, 1546, he perpetrated the foul deed, at Neuburg-on-the-Danube. In Germany this fratricide produced general horror; but the emperor and the Pope approved of it, and the murderer was not punished. He committed suicide, however, in 1551. Juan Diaz wrote a confession of faith, Christianæ Religionis Summa, which was published at Neuburg, 1546, put on the Index by Pius IV., 1564, and translated into French, 1565, and into Spanish, 1865. In the epistolary part of Opera Calvini are found several letters of Diaz. See BOENNER: Spanish Reformers of Two Centuries, from 1520, Lond., 1874.

DIBON, in Moab, now called Dhībān, about twelve miles east of the Dead Sea, and three miles north of the Amon, is now an extensive ruins, covering the tops of two adjacent hills. It is referred to several times in the Bible (Num. xxi. 30, xxxii. 34; Josh. xiii. 9, 17; Isa. xv. 2; Jer. xlvi. 18, 22; called Dimon, Isa. xv. 9). The famous MOABITE STONE was found here (see title).

DICK, John, D.D., an eminent Scotch theologian, son of a clergyman; b. in Aberdeen, Oct. 10, 1761; d. in Glasgow, Jan. 25, 1833. He belonged to the Secession Church; was settled first at Slateford, near Edinburgh, and in 1801 over Greyfriars Church, Glasgow. He received his title of D.D. from Princeton, 1815. In 1819 he became professor of theology in the Theological Seminary of the Secession Church. His principal work is his Lectures on Theology (2d ed., Edinburgh, 1834, 4 vols), which was for many years used as a text-book in theological seminaries. Besides the usual topics, he takes up the evidences of Christianity, and gives an exposition of the Decalogue. His other works are, An Essay on Inspiration (1800) and Lectures on the Acts (Glasgow, 1805-08, 2 vols., 3d ed., 1848). See AMERICAN edition of his Lectures, New York, 1836, 2 vols., with a biography.

DICK, Thomas, LL.D., a Christian philosopher; b. at Dundee, Scotland, Nov. 24, 1774; d. at Edinburgh, July 29, 1857. He was for two years (1803-05) in the ministry of the Secession (United Presbyterian) Church of Scotland, but spent the rest of his life in teaching and in literary labor. His first work appeared in 1824, The Christian Philosopher, or the Connection of Science with Religion. It was a great success, and determined him to follow still farther the line of combined instruction and edification. Perhaps the best known of his works are, The Philosophy of a Future State (1828), Celestial Scenery (1838), The Sideral Heavens (1840), The Solar System (1840), The Practical Astronomer (1845). Their circulation has been very large. Several of his books have been translated into different languages, the last-mentioned even into Chinese. They are written in a simple and admirable style, and present the result of much study in an interesting form; while the religious reflections attest the piety of the author, and edify the reader. Shortly before his death the government granted him a pension, in recognition of his great services. There are two American editions of his works, both in print, Cincinnati, 2 vols. Svo, and Phila., 10 vols. in 5, 12mo.

DICKINSON, Jonathan, a prominent Presbyterian divine, and first president of Princeton College; b. at Hatfield, Mass., April 22, 1688; d. at Elizabeth, N.J., Oct. 7, 1747. He graduated at Yale College, 1706, and in 1708 settled at Elizabeth. He covered an extensive area, preaching regularly to six or seven congregations. He not only exerted a permanent influence in building up churches, but was an acknowledged leader in the old synod of Philadelphia, and subsequently in the synod of New York. Although a strong Calvinist, and sound in the doctrines of the Westminster Confession, he nevertheless firmly opposed the binding authority of creeds and confessions drawn up by uninspired men, when the question of subscription was brought up before synod in 1727.

Dickinson took a prominent part in the measures which led to the formation of the synod of New York (1745), the second of the Presbyterian Church in the United States. David Brainerd and Indian missions found in him a warm friend. He also took a deep interest in education, and was the most prominent among the founders of Nassau Hall (Princeton College). Under his counsel a charter was received for the institution in October, 1746. He was elected president, but only lived to perform the duties a single year. Dr. Gillett (Hist. Presb. Ch., I. 40) characterizes him as a man of "rare sagacity, calm judgment, and unshrinking firmness." Dickinson's writings are considered to be among the soundest expositions of Calvinism that America has produced. Dr. John Erskine said that the British Isles had not produced any writers on divinity in the eighteenth century equal to Dickinson and Jonathan Edwards. His works are, Four Sermons on the Reasonableness of Christianity, Bost., 1732; Display of God's Special Grace, Bost., 1742; Familiar Letters upon Subjects in Religion, Bost., 1745; Vindication of God's Saving Free Grace, Bost., 1748; True Scripture Doctrine concerning Some Important Points in Christian Faith (an able discussion of the five points of Calvinism), Philadelphia, 1841; complete edition of his Sermons and Tracts, Edinburgh, 1793. See SPRAGUE'S Annals, III. 14.

DICKSON, David, a commentator; b. at Glasgow, 1583; d. in 1662-63. He was professor of philosophy in Glasgow after his graduation; from 1618 to 1641 he was minister in Irvine, after which he was professor of divinity at Glasgow and Edinburgh, and was ejected at the Restoration in 1662. He wrote A short Explanation of the Epistle to the Hebrews (Aberdeen, 1631, reprinted London, 1839), A brief Exposition of the Gospel of Matthew (London, 1651), A brief Explanation of the Psalms (London, 1655, 3 vols, reprinted Glasgow, 1834, 2 vols), Therapeutica Sacra (in Latin, Edinburgh, 1656, in English, 2d ed., 1697), Exposition of all the Epistles (1659). See WODROW'S A short Account of the Life of the Rev. David Dickson, in vol. ii. Select Biographies, edited for the Wodrow Society, Edin., 1847.

DICTATES OF POPE GREGORY (Dictatus Papæ, Dictatus Gregorï VII., Dictatus Hildebrandini) consist of twenty-seven short propositions relating to the supreme power of the Pope, and are found among the works of Gregory VII., inserted between the fifty-fifth and fifty-sixth of his epistles. By modern critics they are generally considered spurious. See MOSHEIM: Church-History, English translation, 1854, vol. ii. p. 161.

DICTIONARIES AND CYCLOPÆDIAS, Biblical, Ecclesiastical, and Theological. I. The following are the best known and most useful BIBLE DICTIONARIES.—AUGUSTINE CALMET: Dictionnaire historique, critique, chronologique, géographique et littéral de la Bible, Paris, 1722, with a supplement, 1728, 4 vols. fol. This work was the first of its kind, and has been often reprinted, translated, and abridged. It is now superseded. The best reproduction of it is by Dr. E. Robinson, Boston, 1832. GEORG BENEDICT WINER: Biblisches Real-Wörterbuch zum Handgebrauch für Studierende, Candidaten, Gymnasiallehrer u. Prediger ausgearbeitet, Leipzig, 1820, 2 vols. 8vo; 3d ed., enlarged and much improved, 1847, 1848. Still valuable; it has never been translated. JOHN KITTO: Cyclopædia of Biblical Literature, Edinburgh, 1845, 2 vols. 8vo, reprinted in N.Y. the same year; new ed. by Dr. Burgess, Edinburgh, 1856; 3d ed., thoroughly revised, much enlarged and improved by Dr. W. L. Alexander and a staff of contributors, Edinburgh, 1862-65, 3 vols. royal 8vo; the first to combine the labors of specialists under editorial management. WILLIAM SMITH; Dictionary of the Bible, London, 1860-64, 3 vols. 8vo, a monument of British biblical scholarship; American edition by H. B. Hackett and Ezra Abbot, with the co-operation of a number of American scholars, N.Y., 1868-70, 4 vols. 8vo. The American edition is an improvement upon the English original, in correctness, fulness, and usefulness (e.g., by means of cross references). PATRICK FAIRBAIRN: The Imperial Bible Dictionary, Edinburgh, 1865, 2 vols. royal 8vo. Like Smith's, it is a composite work, but of a more popular character. JOHN AYRE: The Treasury of Bible Knowledge, London, 1866, 2d ed., 1868, small 8vo, 943 pp., double column; excellent, an immense amount of well-digested information packed into a very small space. DANIEL SCHENKEL: Bibel-Lexikon, Leipzig, 1869-75, 5 vols. 8vo; written by a number of scholars of the liberal (i.e., more or less sceptical) school. E. G. A. RIEHM: Handwörterbuch des biblischen Altertums, Leipzig, 1877 sqq.; represents the conservative biblical scholarship of Germany. SPOL: Dictionnaire de la Bible, Paris, 1877. A. R. FAUSSET: The Englishman's Bible Cyclopædia, London and N.Y., 1878, 2d ed., 1881. Unlike the last two mentioned, this work is of single authorship. Its plan is peculiar in that it is expository as well as critical, and therefore a partial substitute for a commentary on the whole Bible.—Among the smaller Bible dictionaries two claim mention,—that published by the American Tract Society, A Dictionary of the Holy Bible, for General Use in the Study of the Scriptures, N.Y., 1859, pp. 534, and that published by the American Sunday School Union, A Dictionary of the Holy Bible, including Biography, Natural History, Geography, Topography, Archaeology and Literature, Phila., 1880, 3d ed., 1882, pp. 958. The first was originally prepared by Dr. Edward Robinson, and is a model of condensation, accuracy, and felicity of expression, but is now a little antiquated. The second was edited by Dr. Schaff, and is more comprehensive, embracing every name in the Bible, and utilizing the most recent discoveries and researches of the Palestine Exploration Societies. Both these dictionaries are copiously illustrated, and contain maps. Of quite different aim is J. HAMBURGER: Real-Encyclopædie des Judenthums Wörterbuch für Gemeinde, Schule und Haus, Neustrelitz, Abtheilung I., 1874, Abtheilung II., 1874 sqq. It is recommended in emphatic terms by Dr. Franz Delitzsch. The object of the author is to treat alphabetically not only those historical, geographical, and natural-history articles, but also those ethical, dogmatical, and juridical articles which require explanation to the reader of the Bible or the Talmud. It is written by a Jew for Jews.

II. DICTIONARIES OF THE BIBLE LANGUAGES.—Hebrew and Chaldee.—The standard source of Hebrew lexicography is still GESENIUS: Novus Thesaurus philologicus criticus Lingue Hebrææ et Chaldææ Veteris Testamenti, Leipzig, 1829-58, 3 vols. But besides this, there are numerous manuals. The best is GESENIUS: Hebräisches und Chaldäisches Handwörterbuch über das Alte Testament, Leipzig, 1812, 2 vols.; 8th revised ed. by Mühlau and Volek, 1878, 1 vol., with improvements which should be incorporated in the English translations by Edward Robinson (Boston, 1836; revised, 1854; 20th edition, 1872), Samuel Prideaux Tregelles (London, 1847; new ed., 1857). Much used, but, because of its philological theories, considered by competent critics inferior to Gesenius, is FÜRST: Hebräisches und Chaldäisches Handwörterbuch über das Alte Testament, Leipzig, 1857-61, 2 vols.; 3d ed., completed by V. Ryssel, 1876. The English translation is by Samuel Davidson, Leipzig, 1865, 1866; 4th ed., 1871. A third dictionary is R. DAVIES: Compendious and Complete Hebrew and Chaldee Lexicon to the Old Testament; with English-Hebrew Index Revised, with Statements of Principles of Hebrew Grammar, by E. C. Mitchell, D.D., Andover, 1879 (reprinted from the third Eng. edition). The German originals of Gesenius and Fürst have German-Hebrew indexes; but these have been dropped in their translation. An index to Gesenius has appeared separately. J. L. POTTER: English-Hebrew Lexicon; Index to Gesenius's Hebrew Lexicon, Boston, 1872. A more elaborate work is M. SCHULBAUM: Neues, vollständiges deutsch-hebräisches Wörterbuch mit Berücksichtigung der talmudischen und neuhebräischen Literatur, Lemberg, 1881. Besides these large works, there are many small, handy volumes, of which the best probably is Bagster's Pocket Hebrew-English Lexicon, containing all the Hebrew and Chaldee Words in the Old Testament, London [n.d.], pp. 287. — A work sui generis is B. DAVIDSON: The Analytical Hebrew Lexicon, London. In it every separate word in the original Old Testament is parsed, and referred to its proper conjugation or declension, primitive form or root. Thus every grammatical difficulty is solved, and anybody who knows the Hebrew letters can by the use of this volume read the Hebrew Old Testament.

Greek. — The best is C. L. W. GRIMM: Lexicon Græco-Latinum in Libros Novi Testamenti, Leipzig, 1867, 2d ed., 1879, which entirely supersedes the work upon which it is based, WILKE: Clavis Novi Testamenti, Dresden, 1839, 2d ed., 1850. Professor J. H. THAYER of Andover has in press (1882) a translation of Grimm, with improvements. In English the best is E. ROBINSON: A Greek and English Lexicon of the New Testament, New York, 1836; new ed. revised and in great part rewritten, 1850. There is also E. W. BULLINGER; Critical Lexicon and Concordance to the English and Greek New Testament, London, 1877. There are numerous abridged and condensed New-Testament Greek Dictionaries, among them GREENFIELD: Polymicrian Greek Lexicon (32mo), and T. S. GREEN: Pocket Greek-English Lexicon to the New Testament, both published by S. Bagster and Sons, London. This firm also publishes The Analytical Greek Lexicon to the New Testament, which is upon the same plan as that of the Analytical Hebrew Lexicon mentioned above, and similarly facilitates the acquisition of the original. — On a different plan from any of the above, not a complete dictionary, but very valuable for exegesis, is H. CREMER: Bib. Theol. Wörterbuch, Gotha, 1867; 2d ed., 1872; 3d ed., 1882; English trans. by Rev. William Urwick (Biblico-Theological Lexicon of N.T. Greek), Edinb., 1878; 3d ed., 1880.

III. DICTIONARIES OF PARTICULAR BIBLE TOPICS. — On the proper names of the Bible. — A List of the Proper Names occurring in the Old Testament, London, 1844 (anonymous, a professed compilation from Gesenius and Simonis, and therefore in many cases needing revision); ALFRED JONES: The Proper Names of the Old Testament, Expounded and Illustrated, London, n.d. (Bagster's); The Proper Names of the Old Testament, with an Appendix of the Hebrew and Aramaic Names in the New Testament, London, 1859; W. F. WILKINSON: Personal Names in the Bible Interpreted and Illustrated, London, 1865; T. G. BEHARRELL: A Complete Alphabetically Arranged Biblical Biography, Indianapolis, 1867; WILLIAM HENDERSON: A Dictionary and Concordance of the Names of Persons and Places . . . in the Old and New Testaments, Edinburgh, 1869 (a very meritorious work). On the geographical names.

— G. H. WHITNEY: Handbook of Bible Geography, N. Y., 1875; revised ed., 1879; DESAULCY: Dictionnaire topographique abrégé de la Terre Sainte, Paris, 1877.

IV. GENERAL BIBLICAL, ECCLESIASTICAL, AND THEOLOGICAL DICTIONARIES. — J. NEWTON BROWN: Encyclopædia of Religious Knowledge, Brattleborough (N.H.), 1835; revised by Rev. G. P. Tyler, 1858; reprinted in Philadelphia, 1875. The book in matter and illustrations belongs to a former generation. J. ASCHBACH: Allgemeines Kirchen-Lexikon, Frankfurt a-M., 1848-50. A useful and reliable work; written by Roman-Catholic scholars. WETZER UND WELTE: Kirchen-Lexikon, Freiburg-im-Breisgau, 1847-56, 12 vols. (the 12th is supplementary); 2d ed. begun by Cardinal Hergenröther, continued by Dr. Franz Kaulen, 1880 sqq. (to be completed in ten vols.). The best Roman-Catholic cyclopædia. The first edition was moderately liberal; the second is in the hands of Ultramontanists. J. J. HERZOG: Real-Encyclopædie für protestantische Theologie und Kirche, published by Rudolph Besser, vol. 1, Hamburg, 1854, vols. 2-9, Stuttgart u. Hamburg, 1854-58, vols. 10-21, Gotha, 1858-66, in all 22 vols.; 2d ed. revised and partly rewritten, Leipzig (Hinrichs), 1877 sqq., vols. 1-7 by J. J. Herzog and G. L. Plitt (d. Sept. 10, 1880), vols. 8 sqq. by J. J. Herzog and A. Hauck. This is the great storehouse of German theology in all its branches, and is the basis of the present work. J. H. A. BOMBERGER: The Protestant Theological and Ecclesiastical Encyclopædia, being a Condensed Translation of Herzog's Real-Encyclopædia, with Additions from other Sources, Phila., 1860, 2 vols., begun in 1856, but never completed, and now superseded by the new Herzog. McCLINTOCK AND STRONG: Cyclopædia of Biblical, Theological, and Ecclesiastical Literature, N. Y., 1867-81, 10 vols., with one or more supplementary volumes to be published in 1882. The work was begun in 1853. It is the most complete religious cyclopædia in the English language. Its vocabulary is said to embrace about 50,000 titles. The literature, given under each article, has been brought down to date. The work is profusely illustrated throughout, and contains several new maps. In the original distribution of the work Dr. Strong had charge of the biblical department; but after Dr. McClintock's lamented death, in 1870, the heavy burden of the whole work fell upon him. Different occasional contributors and several persons constantly employed have materially aided in carrying out the extensive scheme. In each department, dictionaries and text-books have been freely and often literally used, especially SMITH, KITTO, and HERZOG; but this was in accordance with the announcement of the editors, and many additions have been made from less accessible sources. The editors have secured a noteworthy freedom from theological bias by employing persons of the various denominations to write regarding their respective interests, theological and biographical. The Cyclopædia has many defects, typographical and otherwise, especially in the earlier volumes. Not a few articles bear marks of mechanical compilation, and undue prominence is given to minor biographies; nevertheless, it is a most useful collection of information upon a very wide range of topics, and a monumental work of American industry and perseverance. F. LICHTENBERGER: Encyclopédie des sciences religieuses, Paris, 1877 sqq. Scholarly, clear, and concise, to meet the wants of French Protestants, as Herzog meets those of the German Protestants. JOSEPH SCHÄFLER: Handlexikon der katholischen Theologie, Regensburg, 1880 sqq. First volume finished 1881, to be completed in 4 vols., quite full, very well done.

V. SPECIAL ECCLESIASTICAL OR THEOLOGICAL DICTIONARIES. — C. BUCK: A Theological Dictionary, London, 1802, 2 vols. 8vo., 1821, 1 vol., edited and much improved by Rev. Dr. E. Henderson, London, 1847, reprinted, Phila., 1869 (a book of permanent value, noted for its conciseness and fairness); WILLIAM STAUNTON: Dictionary of the Church, N.Y., 1839, enlarged ed. under title An Ecclesiastical Dictionary, N.Y., 1864; WILLIAM FARQUHAR HOOK: A Church Dictionary, London, 8th ed., 1859, reprinted, Phila., 1854; JOHN EADIE: The Ecclesiastical Cyclopaedia, London, 1861; JOHN HENRY BLUNT: Dictionary of Doctrinal and Historical Theology, London, 1870, 2d ed., 1872; the same: Dictionary of Sects, Heresies, and Schools of Thought, London, 1874 (two excellent volumes, written from the High-Church standpoint); Dictionary of the English Church, Ancient and Modern, London and N.Y., 1881 (anonymous, a compendious volume upon its limited field).

VI. DICTIONARIES OF CHRISTIAN HISTORY, ANTIQUITIES, OR BIOGRAPHY. — SIEGEL: Handbuch der christlich-kirchlichen Alterthümer, Leipzig, 1836-38, 4 vols.; CHERUEL: Dictionnaire historique, Paris, 1855; W. The two latter works are wonderfully comprehensive in their respective fields, embracing every proper and descriptive name of their period, but cover only the first eight Christian centuries. It is intended to follow them with other volumes which shall continue this systematic analysis of church characters and life to modern times. F. X. DIDEROT, Denys, b. at Langres, in Champagne, Oct. 5, 1713; d. in Paris, July 30, 1784; was educated in the Jesuit college of his native city; studied law for a short time, and then engaged in literature in general. He began with translations of the English deists, and then became a preacher of deism himself. In 1746 he published his Pensées Philosophiques; but the first work in which he proved himself an original thinker was his Letter on the Blind, 1749. It was, however, a little too sharp for the taste of the time: he was prosecuted, and put in the dungeon of Vincennes for three months. Here he conceived the idea of the great work of his life, the Encyclopédie, of which the first volume appeared in 1751, the last in 1772. In 1759 its publication was forbidden; and D'Alembert, Turgot, and others of his most brilliant collaborators, left him. Aided only by mediocrities, and compelled to employ all kinds of shifts in order to avoid the interference of the police, he finished the work alone and with enormous toil. He was not exhausted, however. Besides the Encyclopédie, he has written a multitude of comedies, criticisms, spirited impromptus (Regrets on my old Dressing-gown), philosophical controversies (D'Alembert's Dream), etc. The collected edition of his works, by Assézat and Tourneux, Paris, 1877, comprises twenty volumes; his correspondence with Grimm, Paris, 1829, fifteen volumes. Diderot was not a dogmatical philosopher, but a critic; and his criticism, though in many respects excellent, whether it treats of art or science, has often an aphoristic character. But, in spite of the almost total absence of positive propositions, the informing tendency of this criticism is nowhere doubtful: it is a somewhat coarse materialism, tinged with a very prosaic sentimentalism and a rather low-bred humor, — a character very frequently met with among the philanthropic atheists or atheistic philanthropists of the eighteenth century.

DIDYMUS, called "the Blind," b. in Alexandria, 308; d. there 395; became blind in the fourth or fifth year of his age, according to Jerome and Palladius, but became, nevertheless, one of the most learned men of his time. He was one of the last directors of the catechetical school of Alexandria, laboring there for more than fifty years. Jerome, Palladius, Ambrose of Alexandria, Evagrius, Isidore of Pelusium, etc., were among his pupils. Though he fought with great zeal against the Arians, he was condemned as a heretic by the second council of Nice, because he defended the Περὶ ἀρχῶν of Origen. Of his many writings, — of which a complete list is given by Jerome, De Vir. Ill., and by Fabricius, Biblioth. Græca, v., viii., — only the following have come down to us. I. A work on the Trinity, translated by Jerome, and found among his works, and published separately at Cologne, 1531, and at Helmstädt, 1614. See J. Basnage: Animadversiones in Didymum. II. A short commentary on the canonical and Catholic epistles, translated into Latin by Euphantius Scholasticus, and found in Max. Bibl. Patr., Lyons, 1677, Tom. iv. p. 319. III. Fragments of a Greek work against the Manicheans, given by Basnage, l.c. IV. Three books on the Trinity, discovered by Aloysius Mingarelli, and published by his brother, Rome, 1764. See GUERICKE: De Schola Alexandrina, i. 92-97; ii. 83-96, 332-377. HERZOG.

DIDYMUS, Gabriel, b. at Joachimsthal, in Bohemia, 1487; d. 1558. He studied in Prague and Wittenberg; entered the order of the Augustines in 1502, and was ordained a priest in 1513, but embraced the Reformation in 1521. He was one of those vehement characters which it often proved difficult for Luther to manage. He followed Carlstadt in his eccentric attack on the schools and universities; and, though he afterwards was brought to repentance by Luther, he left Wittenberg, and was minister, first at Altenburg, then at Torgau, from which latter position he was discharged by Maurice of Saxony, on account of his opposition to the Interim of Leipzig, in 1549. He afterwards lived in retirement. See TERNE: Nachricht von des G. Didymus fatalem Leben, Leipzig, 1737.

DIEPENBROCK, Melchior, b. Jan. 6, 1798, at Bocholt, in the principality of Salm-Salm; d. at Johannesberg, in Austrian Silesia, Jan. 20, 1853. As a boy he was remarkable for the exuberance of his spirits. He was sent from one educational institution to another, no teacher being able to curb his feeling of independence. Even from the military school of Bonn he was dismissed for insubordination, and, after serving for some time as a lieutenant in the Prussian army, he was advised by his superiors to resign his position. But an incidental meeting with Sailer, in 1817, changed his character at once and completely. He began to study theology; was ordained priest in 1823; and lived for several years with Sailer, as his secretary. He studied especially the mediæval mystics, gave out an edition of the works of Suso (1829), and published a volume of religious poetry, Geistlicher Blütenstrauß. In 1845 he was elected Prince-bishop of Breslau. The relation between the Prussian Government and the Roman-Catholic Church was at that period very cordial. The government found a valuable aid in the church against the liberal aspirations of the people; and more than once it was Diepenbrock who finally carried through the government's schemes of taxation and other measures by his pastoral letters to his flock. He was rewarded: in 1850 he was made a cardinal. See his Life by his successor, Foerster, Breslau, 1859.

DIES IRÆ. The opening words of one of the most celebrated Latin hymns from the middle ages, still used in the Roman-Catholic Church at funeral services. It was probably written by Thomas of Celano in the middle of the thirteenth century, and sprung from Zeph. i. 15 (see the Vulgate), and Ps. xvi. 13, xvii. 3, cii. 26, etc. Suggestions from earlier judgment-hymns seem also to have been worked into the fabric. Translations of it in all civilized languages may be counted by the hundreds; but none equals the original. Dr. Schaff (Christ in Song, London ed., 1870, p. 290) thus characterizes this remarkable hymn: "The secret of the irresistible power of the Dies Iræ lies in the awful grandeur of the theme, the intense earnestness and pathos of the poet, the simple majesty and solemn music of its language, the stately metre, the triple rhyme, and the vowel assonances chosen in striking adaptation to the sense, all combining to produce an overwhelming effect, as if we heard the final crash of the universe, the commotion of the opening graves, the trumpet of the archangel that summons the quick and the dead, and as if we saw the 'King of tremendous majesty' seated on the throne of justice and mercy, and ready to dispense everlasting life or everlasting woe."

See F. G. LISCO: Dies Iræ, Berlin, 1840; H. A. DANIEL: Thesaurus Hymnologicus, Leipzig, 1855, II. 103-131, V. 110-116; ABRAHAM COLE: Dies

The best English translations are by Irons, Alford, Trench, Cole, and Dix, the latest is by Charles Elliott, D.D., published in The Standard, Chicago, Feb. 24, 1881.

DIESTEL, Ludwig von, a German theologian of the liberal school in Old-Testament exegesis; b. Sept. 28, 1825; d. May 15, 1879. He was educated at Königsberg, Berlin, and Bonn; in the latter university he was privatdocent (1851), and then extraordinary professor of theology (1858) until 1862, when he went to Greifswald as ordinary professor. He subsequently was called to Jena, 1867, and to Tübingen, 1872, where he died. His best work is the Geschichte des Alten Testaments in der christlichen Kirche, Jena, 1868, a full history of Old-Testament exegesis down to the present time.

DIET (Latin dies, day). The earliest diets of the German or Holy Roman Empire were assemblies in which the emperor discussed with his subjects the common interests of the empire. Originally all members were bound by their feudal tenure to be present: absence cost them not only their votes, but also rendered them liable to fine. Thus the diet was a feudal, not a representative, parliament. But, since gradually the feudatories of the emperor became independent sovereigns, the diet was at last a mere congress of princes, in which the emperor, instead of presiding in person, was represented by a delegate, called "principal commissarius," and to which the princes sent envoys; the right of suffrage belonging, not to individuals, but to certain territories or districts. The diets consisted of three bodies, who met and voted in separate colleges: (1) The electoral college; (2) The princes of the empire, spiritual and temporal; (3) The free imperial cities. When the three colleges agreed, the decree, or recess as it was called, was submitted to the imperial sanction; but the emperor had no power to modify it. The diet met regularly twice a year, — in the spring, to discuss general matters; in the autumn, finance. From 1663 it met in Regensburg. The power of the diet steadily declined after the Thirty-Years' War (1618-48). The diets of great religious importance — for religion, of course, was a topic of discussion — are Worms (1521), which issued an edict of outlawry against Luther; Spires (1526), which allowed choice of religion to the several states; Spires (1529), at which the name "Protestant" originated; Augsburg (1530), where the famous Confession was presented; Augsburg (1555), famous for the "Religious Peace of Augsburg," which regulated the civil relations of the Lutherans.

DIETRICH, Veit (Vitus Theodorus, or Theodoricus), b. at Nuremberg, 1506; d. there March 24, 1549; studied theology at Wittenberg, and became the amanuensis of Luther in 1527, and preacher to the Church of St. Sebaldus in Nuremberg, in 1530. He translated into German, and edited, a number of Luther's and Melancthon's minor writings; wrote sermons and hymns and an Agendbüchlein für die Pfarrherrn auff dem Land (1543); and maintained a lively correspondence with all the most prominent of the Reformers. See STROBEL: Nachrichten von dem Leben und Schriften, V. D., Nürnberg, 1772.

DIETRICH OF NIEM, b. at Niem, or Nieheim, in Westphalia, between 1338 and 1348; became Scriptor Apostolicus in the papal chancery in Avignon, 1371; followed Gregory XI. to Rome in 1377, and held the position there of papal prothonotary and abbreviator, until 1418, after which time nothing is known about him. See H. V. SAUERLAND: Leben des Dietrich von Nieheim, Göttingen, 1875; LENZ: Drei Traktate, Marburg, 1876. According to Lenz, the following works are by Dietrich of Niem: De modis uniendi ac reformandi ecclesiam in concilio universalis, though it is printed by Hardt, in Magnum Œc. Concilium Constant. II., as a work of Gerson; and Avisamenta pulcherrima de necessitate reformationis in capite et in membris, printed by Hardt, l.c., as a work of Ailli. P. TSCHACKERT.

DIEU, Louis de (Lodewijk), b. at Vliessingen, April 7, 1590; d. at Leyden, Dec. 22, 1642; was appointed pastor at Middelburg in 1613, and at Vliessingen in 1617, and professor at the Walloon College, in Leyden, in 1619. He was a distinguished Orientalist, and published a Compendium Hebræicæ Grammaticæ, Leyden, 1626; Grammatica Trilinguis, Hebræica, Syriaca, et Chaldaica, Leyden, 1628; and a Persian grammar, 1639. His extensive knowledge of Oriental languages and history he applied with success to the exegesis of the Bible. His exegetical writings were published in Amsterdam, 1693, collected under the title of Critica Sacra.

DICBY, Sir Kenelm, b. at Gothurst, Buckinghamshire, Eng., June 11, 1603; d. in London, June 11, 1665. Educated in the Protestant religion, in Paris he became (1636) a Roman Catholic, as his father had been, after he had been graduated from Oxford (1621), been knighted by Charles I., and given various high positions. On his return to England (1638), he joined the Royalist side; was imprisoned by order of Parliament; was released by request of the French queen-dowager, and in 1643 retired to France, where he formed an intimacy with Descartes, and wrote his Treatise on the Nature of Bodies (London, 1644), Peripatetic Institutions (London, 1646), Treatise on the Soul (London, 1669). By the friendship of Cromwell he was permitted to live in England. At the Restoration he returned to London; was one of the first council of the Royal Society. His other works are: A Conference about a Choice of Religion, Paris, 1636, London, 1654 (justifying his conversion); Letters (on the same subject), London, 1651; Observations on Religio Medici, London, 1643; A Treatise of Adhering to God, London, 1654; On the Cure of Wounds by the Powder of Sympathy, London, 1658 (one of his curious hobbies). See The Private Memoirs of Sir K. Digby, written by himself, London, 1827.

DIMAN, Jeremiah Lewis, D.D., b. at Bristol, R.I., May 1, 1831; d. at Providence, R.I., Feb. 3, 1881. He was graduated from Brown University, Providence, R.I., 1851; studied privately for a year; entered the Theological Seminary at Andover, Mass., completed the junior and middle years; went to Europe, 1854; studied in Halle and Berlin; returned, 1856; was ordained in the Congregational Church; pastor, first at Fall River, Mass., 1856-60, and then at Brookline, Mass., 1860-64. In 1864 he was inaugurated professor of history and political economy in Brown University, and held the position at his death. Professor Diman was a ripe scholar and a most catholic Christian. After his death, two books, made up of his lectures and sermons, appeared: The Theistic Argument, and Orations and Essays [and sermons], with Memorial Discourse, by J. O. Murray, D.D., both Boston, 1881.

DIMISSORY LETTERS (littere dimissoriæ, or dimissoriales) is the name of a kind of documents by which a person belonging to the jurisdiction (diocese, congregation) of a certain ecclesiastic is by him formally permitted to withdraw from his authority, either forever (littere dimissoriæ perpetuæ), or for a particular purpose, such as ordination (littere dimissoriæ temporales).

DIMCERITES (from δυοῦρα, two-thirds) is the name of the adherents of Apollinaris the Younger, so called, because, in the person of Christ, they recognized only two human elements, — the ψυχή λόγος and the body; the divine Logos taking the place of the νοῦς, the ψυχή λογική. Sozomen (Hist. Eccl., VI. 25) calls them Vitalians from Vitalis, their bishop in Antioch; and Facundus of Hermione (Pro Defensione trium Capitulorum, Paris, 1679), Synousiastes, because they taught that the flesh of Christ was of an eternal and heavenly nature, forming one substance with his godhead. The last name, however, is applicable only to one of the two parties of Apollinarists, the Polemians, thus called from their leader Polemo, who, according to Photius (Bibl. Cod., CCXXX.), declared that the doctrine of two natures in Christ was a mere invention by Athanasius, the two Gregories, Basil the Great, and the Italian bishops. The other party, the Valentinians, thus called from Valentinus, who is said to have kept very closely to the doctrines of Apollinaris (Theodoret., Hæc., IV. 8, 9), held the very opposite views. Augustine's division of the sect (De dono perseverantiæ, 69) — into those who recognize no soul in Christ, those who recognize no rational soul, and those who consider the divine Logos itself transformed into flesh — is consequently not fully correct. DINANT, or DINANTO, David of. See DAVID OF DINANTO.

DINTER, Gustav Friedrich, b. at Borna, in Saxony, Feb. 29, 1760; d. at Königsberg, May 29, 1831; studied theology and philosophy at Leipzig, and was appointed pastor of Kitscher (1787), and director of the normal college of Dresden, in 1797. For the sake of his health he left Dresden in 1807, and settled as pastor of Görnitz, where he founded a normal school and business college. The school was very successful; and in 1816 he was called to Königsberg as professor of theology, and president of the board of education. He was a very prolific writer, and a rationalist every inch; but he was a man of great tact, and never touched the vulgar, or made fuss about the unnecessary. His Schullehrerbibel (Bible for the Schoolmasters) is the most widely known of his productions, and caused much controversy. See SCHWABE: Zur Geschichte der Schullehrerbibel, etc., Neustadt-on-the-Oder, 1826; HOFFMANN: Über Werth und Brauchbarkeit d. D. Schullehrerbibel, Bunzlau, 1828. His Autobiography (Neustadt-on-the-Oder, 1829) gives insight both into his character and his system.

DIOCESE (δοίκειρος). It was quite natural that the civil division of the empire, which Constantine undertook, into dioceses, and the dioceses again into provinces, should be transferred to the church, so that each diocese was placed under an exarch or patriarch, and each province under a metropolitan. In the course of time, however, the name "diocese" changed its meaning, and was applied, from the beginning of the ninth century, to any territorial circumscription of ecclesiastical authority, but more especially to the episcopal. The earliest name for a bishop's see was parish (παροικία). The right of founding or changing dioceses belonged, after the fourth century, to the metropolitan and the provincial synod (c. 50, Can. XVI. qu. I. [Conc. Carthag., II. a. 390, c. 5] c. 51, ead. [Conc. Carthag., III. a. 397, c. 20]); but in the Western Church it was, after the eleventh century, reserved to the Pope, like all other causae episcopales (c. 1. X. de translatione episcopi, I. 7, Innocent. III. a. 1198).

DIOCLETIAN, or DIOCLETIANUS, Caius Areluius Valerius, Roman emperor, 284-305; was b. at Salona, in Dalmatia, 245 (the son of a freedman), and d. there 313, having committed suicide by poison. He entered the army as a simple soldier, but rose rapidly, and was elected emperor at Chalcedon, after the assassination of Carus and Numerianus. He took up his residence at Nicomedia, and appointed Maximian co-emperor (Augustus) in 286, and Galerius and Constantius Chlorus, Cæsars in 292. In the beginning of his reign he paid no particular attention to the Christians: they were found in the army, the administration, and in the very palace. But Galerius, who was wholly in the hands of the Pagan priests, persuaded him that the total destruction of Christianity was necessary to the preservation of the empire; and in 303 the persecution began suddenly and violently. An imperial edict of Feb. 24 ordered the Christian service to cease, all copies of the Bible to be surrendered and burnt, and all Christian church-buildings to be pulled down. Another edict ordered all Christians who held offices in the administration or in the army to sacrifice to the gods under penalty of discharge; and it declared that a Christian had no rights as a citizen or free man, that a Christian slave could never be manumitted, etc. A third edict of the same year ordered, that, of the Christians who had been imprisoned, those who were willing to sacrifice should be released, while those who refused should be compelled by force. Finally, a fourth edict of 304 ordered that all Christians, without any exceptions, should be compelled to sacrifice; and the employment of tortures of all kinds was allowed. The effect of these edicts was really startling. Among the Christians a great number hastened to surrender their books, to deny their faith, and sacrifice to the idols; but a still greater number remained firm and faithful in spite of the rack, even in spite of death. Among the Pagans many magistrates were very lenient, conniving at the various artifices which some Christians employed, and looking with disgust at the strange excitement under which others pressed towards martyrdom. But in other places the wildest fanaticism and the basest forms of hatred and revenge were let loose, and the Christians suffered unspeakably. The persecution spread over the whole empire, with the exception of the north-western part, where Constantius Chlorus contented himself with the destruction of the church-buildings; and it continued unabated, also, after the abdication of Diocletian and Maximian in 305. Towards the close of his life (311) Galerius issued an edict in which he confessed that his whole policy with respect to the Christians had been a failure, that he had decided to give it up, and to return to status quo ante, etc. But Maximinus and Maxentius, the son of Maximianus, renewed the persecution; and it was only the victories of Constantine, the son of Constantius Chlorus, which finally brought it to an end.

DIODATI, Giovanni, b. at Geneva, June 6, 1576; d. there Oct. 3, 1649; was made professor of Hebrew, in Geneva, 1597, in 1609 professor of theology, succeeding Beza, and resigned in 1645. He attended the synod of Dort as a delegate from Geneva, and was one of the committee of six appointed to draw up the account of its proceedings. He translated Sarpi's History of the Council of Trent into French, and also published an Italian translation of the Bible (1603) which is still much used in Italy, though it is a paraphrase rather than a translation; and a French translation (1644). Of his various theological works the best known is Annotations in Biblia (1607), translated into English, Pious and Learned Annotations upon the Holy Bible, plainly Expounding the most Difficult Places thereof, London, 1648, 3d ed. (and best), 1651, folio. See SCHOTTEL: J. Diodati, 1844.

DIODORUS, Presbyter of Antioch, consecrated Bishop of Tarsus 378; d. in 394; was, as an exegetist, one of the masters of the Antiochian school, and in dogmatic respects its founder. He descended from a distinguished family in Antioch, and studied classical literature in Athens, and Christian lore under Eusebius of Emesa (JEROME: Vit. Ill., c. 119). Thus equipped, he commenced on the great work of his life,—to defend the faith of the orthodox church, and to realize the ascetic ideal of Christian virtue. A walking skeleton, looking more like a shadow than a man, he moved around among the tumultuous stir of Antioch, where Pagans and Jews and Christian heretics of every description met and mixed together, fighting each other at all other points, but perfectly agreed in their attacks on the orthodox church. He had, however, vigor and strength enough to take it up with them all; and the zeal and success with which he combated Platonists and Porphyrians, Manichæans and Apollinarists, etc., made his name one of the most revered and most feared in the Eastern Church.

Curiously enough, however, although during the ascendancy of the Arians in Antioch he wrought persistently to keep together the remnants of the orthodox church, assembling with them for worship in all kinds of secret places, and, when even that became impossible, visiting them one by one in their houses; although the Council of Constantinople (381) appointed him who was only Bishop of Tarsus Metropolitan of Cilicia (SO-CRAT.: Hist. Eccl., 5, 8), and an imperial edict (Cod. Theos., I. XVI., tit. 1, I. 3) mentions him as the fourth of those bishops who were to give judgment in any question of orthodoxy; although he was a friend of Basil the Great, and numbered Chrysostom among his pupils,—hardly fifty years elapsed after his death before the shadow of heresy fell upon his own name. The Nestorian controversy was the cause. In harmony with the whole tendency of the Antiochian school, and eager to emphasize every thing human in Christ in opposition to the strained idealism of the Alexandrian school, he developed, in his controversy with Apollinaris, a theory of the relation between the two natures in Christ which split the God-Man into two persons, the Son of God dwelling in the son of David as in a house or in a garment. The two works of his relating to this subject are Πρὸς τοὺς συνομοιαστὰς and Περὶ τοῦ ἁγίου πνεύματος (PHOT.: Bibl. Cod., 102); fragments of the former work in Marius Mercator (ed. Baluze, p. 349) and Leontius Byzantinus (Nestor. et Eutychn., I, 3, in CANIS. lectiones antiquæ, edit. Basnage, I. p. 591). A view so singularly mechanical could, of course, not satisfy the more developed christological demands. Already Cyril of Alexandria (432) tried to have the writings of Diodorus and his pupil Theodore of Mopsuestia condemned; and the condemnation actually took place in 499.

Diodorus' works have dogmatic interest also on other points. He is the founder of the cosmological argument for the existence of God (Περὶ εἰμαρμένης, PHOT.: Bibl. Cod., 228); he opposed the doctrine of everlasting punishment (Περὶ οἰκονομίας, in ASSEMANI: Bibl. Orient., III. 1, p. 324), etc. As an exegete he followed and further developed the principle of the Antiochian school; which article see. The twenty-three fragments on Exodus, published by Pitra, Spicileg. Solesmeni, Paris, 1852, I. p. 269, are not of any great interest. A complete list of the works of Diodorus has been given by Suidas (ed. Bernhardy, I. p. 1379), by the Nestorian metropolitan, Ebed Jesu (ASSEMANI: Bibl. Orient., III. 1, p. 28), and by Fabricius (Bibl. Græc., ed. Harles., IX. p. 277).

SEMISCH.

DIOGNETUS, The Epistle to, one of the most precious relics from Christian antiquity, hardly equalled, either in spirit or form, by any other work from the post-apostolic age. It is not the novelty, however, nor the richness of its ideas, nor the depth of its dogmatic expositions, nor the acuteness of its apologetic argumentation, which secures this prominent place to it. In all these respects it is not beyond the average, and in many points it approaches very near to heresy. The extraordinary charm which it exercises springs from the noble simplicity of a faith which grasps the divine truth of Christianity as an inner experience, and from the perfect, classical education, which, in bold and striking but fully harmonious expressions, bears witness to this fact. The author does not share in the naïveté of the faith of the apostolic fathers, nor has he any interest in an elaborate speculation. His theological stand-point is that of the transition when faith and knowledge, though still essentially one, are just about to break away from each other.

With respect to its form, the epistle is an answer to a series of questions put forward by Diognetus, a distinguished and educated Pagan, concerning Christianity and the Christians; but, in his rapid sketch of Christian life and doctrine, the author makes no pretension to reveal the deeper Christian mysteries. The author himself is unknown. In the oldest manuscript, from the thirteenth century, but destroyed by the conflagration of Strassburg in 1870, the epistle was placed with several (pretended) works of Justin, and blunderingly ascribed to him. But that is impossible. The style of the epistle and the style of the genuine works of Justin cannot belong to the same person. Still greater, perhaps, is the discrepancy of ideas. The epistle speaks of the Pagan gods as mere idols made by human hands; while Justin considers them as symbols, or even real apparitions, of demonic powers. The epistle gives a very harsh and sweeping verdict on Judaism, denying its divine origin, its character of revelation, and the ethical worth of its institutions; while Justin places the Old and the New Testament in providential connection with each other. The date of the epistle is undoubtedly the second century, though no external witnesses bear testimony. The newness of Christianity, and the ignorance of it among educated Pagans; the predominant feeling among the Christians of being strangers in this world, and the passionate hatred to them among the Jews and the lower classes of the Pagans; the steadily growing church, and the increasing self-consciousness among the Christians of being the leaven of the world,—all the most prominent features of the sketch point to the second century.

LIT.—The epistle was first published by H. Stephanus, Strassburg, 1592, and recently by Otto, in Opera Justini, 1843, 2d ed., 1849, and with annotations separately, Jena, 1845, 2d ed., Leipzig, 1852. New contributions to a critical revision of the text have been given by HOLLENBERG: Der Brief an Diognet, Berlin, 1853; HEFFELE: *Patr. Apost. DIONYSIUS AREOPAGITA, citizen of Athens, and member of the Areopagus, was converted to Christianity by Paul (Acts xvii. 34). According to Eusebius (Hist. Eccl., 3, 9, and Const. Apost., 7, 46), he was the first bishop of Athens; and a later tradition tells us that he suffered martyrdom there.

At the conference held in Constantinople (533), at the instance of Justinian, between the Orthodox and the Severians, the latter quoted, among other ecclesiastical authorities, also Dionysius the Areopagite against the synod of Chalcedon; and when the former objected that Athanasius and Cyril certainly would have used such an authority against Nestorius, if he had existed and been known to them, the Severians asserted that Cyril had actually quoted the works of Dionysius in his books against Diodorus of Tarsus and Theodore of Mopsuestia, as might have been seen from the copies of those books in the libraries of Alexandria. The works here referred to are: I. Περὶ τῆς οὐρανιας ἱεραρχίας ("On the Heavenly Hierarchy"); II. Περὶ τῆς ἐκκλησιαστικῆς ἱεραρχίας ("On the Ecclesiastical Hierarchy"); III. Περὶ θεῶν ὀνομάτων ("On the Names of God"); IV. Περὶ μυστικῆς θεολογίας ("On Mystic Theology"); and V., — ten letters (the eleventh is spurious), all evidently belonging to the same author. They are mentioned for the first time in the records of the above conference; but after that time they are very frequently spoken of. Severus himself, monophysite patriarch of Antioch from 513, often quotes them, and so does Ephraim, orthodox patriarch of Antioch from 526. Commentaries upon them were written by Joannes Scythopolitanus in the sixth century, and by Maximus Confessor in the seventh. Pachymeres paraphrased them in the thirteenth. In the Greek Church they enjoyed, on the whole, a great reputation, though the genuineness of their authorship was not altogether undoubted.

In the Western Church, Gregory the Great is the first who refers to these writings (Hom., 34, in Ev. Luc.); but when the Byzantine emperor, Michael the Stammerer, sent a copy of them to Louis the Pious in 827, they soon became better known; and after the invention of Abbot Hilduin, combining Dionysius the Areopagite, and St. Denis the patron saint of the Franks, in one person, they became quite celebrated. Joannes Scotus Erigena translated them into Latin at the instance of Charles the Bald, and he was himself deeply influenced by them. In the Western Church, among the schoolmen, the Areopagite became a leader towards mysticism, a teacher of mystical theology. Hugo of St. Victor, Albertus Magnus, Thomas Aquinas, Dionysius Carthusianus, etc., drew their inspiration from him. Corderius has shown how much, for instance, Thomas Aquinas owes to the Areopagite. The Platonists of the Italian renaissance also appreciated him very much, as did other humanists, for instance, John Colet, Dean of St. Paul's in London, who were swayed by Dionysius' angelology, not to speak of the poets, Dante, Milton, etc. (Cf. Jo. Coletus super opera Dionysii. Two Treatises on the Hierarchies of Dionysius by Dean Colet. Now first published with a translation, introduction and notes by J. H. Lupton, London, 1869.)

The development, however, of literary criticism (Laurentius Valla, Erasmus, etc.), one of the most prominent features of the period of the renaissance, could not help destroying, first the invention of Hilduin (the identification of Dionysius the Areopagite and St. Denis), and then the glory of the apostolic date of the authorship. The internal evidences of a later date, besides the total absence of mention or quotation up to the conference of Constantinople (533), were too striking and too strong, — the difference between the pompous and inflated style of the writings and the simplicity of the apostolic age; the use of theological terms which were not formed until the fourth century; references to an elaborately developed church ritual and church government; allusions to later persons and events, as, for instance, to the martyrdom of Ignatius, and to "Clement the Philosopher" (Clemens Alexandrinus); appeals to "ancient traditions," etc. Even Roman-Catholic theologians (Sirmond, Launo, Morinus) gave in; and the attempts of the Jesuits (Halloix, Delrio, Natalis Alexander, Schelstrate, etc.) to vindicate the authorship of Dionysius the Areopagite were easily met and reduced by Dallæus, Le Nourry, etc.

The non-authorship of Dionysius the Areopagite once agreed upon, the question arose, by whom, then, and at what time, these works were written; and a number of hypotheses were proffered, from that of Baumgarten-Crusius, placing the author at Alexandria, in the third century, to that of Westcott, placing him at Edessa, at the beginning of the sixth century. The general outcome, however, of the critical researches is, that the philosophical, and more especially the mystical, ideas expounded in these books presuppose that later development of Neo-platonism which was due to Proclus; and, as Proclus died 485, the date of the authorship of the books seems to coincide with the date of their first notice.

LIT. — The works were first printed at Basel, 1539 (Greek). By P. Lansselius they were edited (Greek and Latin), Paris, 1615. The best edition is that by the Jesuit, Balthasar Corderius, Antwerp, 1634 (containing the commentaries of Maximus and the paraphrase of Pachymeres), which was reprinted at Paris, 1644, Venice, 1755 (with augmented apparatus), Brixia, 1854, and by Migne. — Comp. DIONYSIUS OF ALEXANDRIA, also called the Great, a pupil of Origen, succeeded Heraclas in 232 as director of the catechetical school, and in 247 as bishop. A few years later on (250) he was overtaken by the Decian persecution. He fled, as did Cyprian; but, unlike him, he did not afterwards assume a severe attitude towards those who had become lapsi during the persecution. On the contrary, the mild discipline which he exercised he defended both in letters to his friends and colleagues, and, according to Eusebius (Hist. Eccl., VI. 46), in a separate book. He was a man of a mild and kind temper; and the position he occupied in the schism of Novatian, in the controversy concerning heretical baptism, etc., was that of a mediator. During the persecution of Valerian he was banished (257), first to Kephron in Libya, and then to Kolluthian in the Mareotis; but the edict of Galienus (260) allowed him to return to Alexandria. In the last part of his episcopacy the city was fearfully devastated by uproar, murder, plague, and famine, of which a striking picture is found in Eusebius, Hist. Eccl., VII. 22.

Dionysius is generally considered the most prominent of Origen's pupils. He opposed successfully the chiliastic views revived by Nepos; and his critical comparison of the Gospel and the Revelation by St. John is a model production of the older Alexandrian school. His opposition to Sabellianism was less successful: he stood on the very verge of heresy, but retreated safely through a book dedicated to Dionysius of Rome. Of his many works, polemical, ascetic, exegetical, and apologetical, only fragments have come down to us. Most of these are found in EUSEBIUS: Hist. Eccl., VII. They have been collected by GALLANDI: Bibl. Vet. Patr., III. p. 481, by ROUTH: Reliquiæ Sacræ, Oxford, 1814, II. and IV., etc. Comp. FÖRSTER: De doctrina et sententiis D. M., Berlin, 1865; DITTRICH: Dionysius d. Grosse, Freib., 1867. WEIZSÄCKER.

DIONYSIUS OF CORINTH became bishop of that city in 170, and wrote eight letters, — to the Lacedæmonians, Athenians, Nicomedians, etc., — which enjoyed a great reputation in their time, and are greatly praised by Jerome. They are lost, however; and only fragments of them have been preserved by Eusebius: Hist. Eccl., iv. 23.

DIONYSIUS OF ROME, bishop, 259-269, succeeded Xystus, having been presbyter of the Roman Church under Stephen. He was a Greek by birth, and maintained a lively connection with the Greek Church. When Dionysius of Alexandria, in his controversy with the Sabellians, went too far in the opposite direction, and defined the nature of the Son as a mere creation, Dionysius of Rome stepped forward, and compelled him to retract. Afterwards the two Dionysii, of Rome and Alexandria, acted in unison against Paul of Samosata in the councils of Constantinople (264 and 269).

DIONYSIUS EXIGUUS ("the Little"), a Scythian by birth, but one of the most conspicuous and influential men of the Latin Church in the sixth century; acquired his vast learning in Rome, and d. there, as abbot of a monastery, 556. He translated a number of Greek works into Latin: RATHERIUS: Epistola Paschalis, Vita St. Pachomii; PROCLUS: Laudationem in Mariam, and his epistle to the Armenian clergy; GREGORY OF NYSSA: De conditione hominis, etc. But that which has made his name most famous is his collection of canons and decretals (see Canon Law), and his Cyclyus Paschalis, which forms the basis of the Christian or Dionysian era. See ERA.

DIONYSIUS THE CARTHUSIAN, also called Rickel, from his birthplace, or Lewis, the name of his family, was b. in 1403, in the diocese of Liège, the present Belgian Limburg; studied theology and philosophy in Cologne, and entered in 1423 the Carthusian Monastery of Roermonde, where he d. in 1471. He boasted of his iron stomach, which allowed him to practise the everest ascetical exercises, and of his iron head, which enabled him to write more than one hundred works. He also boasted of receiving divine inspirations and revelations, on account of which he enjoyed a great reputation, obtained the title of Doctor Ecstaticus, and was taken into the intimacy of kings and kaisers. But when his chief work — Enarrationes, or Commentarii on the whole Bible, a heap of quotations from the Fathers and mystico-allegorical trifles — was printed at Cologne (in 7 vols., 1530-36), in order to be used as a thunderbolt against the Reformers, it proved entirely ineffectual. His Life, written by a brother Carthusian, Theodorich Loer, was published at Cologne (1532), and is found in Act. Sanct., March 12, Tom. II. p. 275. Some information about his ecstasies is given by Dorlandus in his Chronicon Carthusiense, Cologne, 1608. HERZOG.

DIOSCURIUS succeeded Cyril, in 444, as Bishop of Alexandria, and presided in 449 over the so-called Robber synod at Ephesus, which deposed Flavian, Patriarch of Constantinople, but was himself condemned and deposed by the œcumenical council of Chalcedon (457), and banished to Gangra, Paphlagonia, where he died, 454. See EUTYCHES and EPHESUS.

DIPPEL, Johann Konrad (Christianus Democritus), b. at Frankenstein, Aug. 10, 1673; d. at Witgenstein, April 25, 1734; represents a curious mixture of rationalism and mysticism, frivolity and pietism. After studying at Giessen, he went, in 1693, first to Wittenberg, and thence to Strassburg, where he lectured on alchemy and chiro-mancy, and preached against the pietists, but was expelled on account of debt and disorderly conduct. In 1677 he published, under the pseudonym of Christianus Democritus, his Orthodoxia Orthodoxorum, in 1698 his Papismus Protestantium vapulans, and in 1699 his Wein und Oel in die Wunden des gestäubten Papstthums; but these books, in which he rejected the doctrines of inspiration, atonement, etc., were suppressed by the censor. After practising in Berlin as an alchemist, inventing the oleum Dippelii, the Berlin-blue, etc., and in Amsterdam as a physician, he settled at Altona, but was arrested on account of some incautious remark on the Danish Government, and imprisoned in Bornholm from 1719 till 1725. After his release he went to Stockholm, where he found a flattering reception, and was about to be made Bishop of Upsala, when, for the second time, some incautious remarks interfered with his career. He was banished, but found a refuge at the castle of Witgenstein, the home of all religious enthusiasts and philosophical curiosities. His Life has been written by H. V. Hoffmann, Darmstadt, 1783.

DIPTYCHS (δίπτυχα tabulæ bipartitæ), a book or tablet, consisting of two leaves folded together, and made of gold, silver, ivory, or some kind of fine wood. On these tablets were written down the names of such persons, living or dead, as were to be specially mentioned in the prayer preceding the consecration, — benefactors of the church, teachers, popes, patriarchs, metropolitans, and bishops. To have one's name registered in the diptychs was considered a great honor, and to have it struck out was synonymous with excommunication. In the twelfth century the diptychs fell out of use in the Latin Church; but they are still in use in the Greek and Armenian churches.

DIRECTORY OF WORSHIP. See WORSHIP. DISCALCEATI, or BAREFOOTED MONKS and NUNS, is the common name of all such religious orders, or branches of religious orders, as wear sandals, or nothing, instead of shoes. There are Barefooted Augustines, Carmelites, Capuchins, Franciscans, etc. It is generally the strictest divisions of the orders which adopt this feature.

DISCIPLES OF CHRIST, or CHRISTIANS.

Name.—This religious people, sometimes called "Campbellites," or "Campbellite Baptists," in accordance with their cherished principles of union and apostolic simplicity, wish to be known only by the names applied to followers of Christ in the inspired Word. They reason from 1 Cor. iii. 4, and kindred passages, that sectarian names are unscriptural, and causes of division; and in harmony with Acts xi. 36, xxvi. 28; 1 Pet. iv. 16; and Rev. xxi. 9, as individuals and as a people, call themselves simply "Disciples of Christ," or "Christians," and their churches, "Churches of Christ," or, using the adjective, "Christian Churches." Under this title they plead for the union of all lovers of Christ.

History.—As a distinct body of believers they date from the early part of the present century. Simultaneously, in different parts of the United States, arose teachers among the religious denominations, who pleaded for the Bible alone, without any human addition in form of creeds or formulas of faith, and the union of Christians of every name upon the basis of the apostles' teaching. This movement assumed most notable proportions in Virginia, Ohio, and Kentucky. In 1823 Alexander Campbell (see title) of Bethany, Va., began to set forth with great vigor and learning, in a periodical entitled The Christian Baptist, the plea for a restoration of the original gospel and primitive order of things, as under the apostles. It was not a reformation that was sought, but a restoration, a renewal of the ancient landmarks of the Christian religion. But, as long before as 1811, he had publicly advocated the principles already stated, and had organized the first regular organization at Brush Run, Penn., May 4, 1811, with thirty members. The Campbells, father and son, having been convinced of the Scripture necessity of immersion, were themselves immersed, and impressed the doctrine and practice upon their followers. From that hour Thomas Campbell gave place to his son Alexander, who was afterwards the soul of the movement. In 1813 the Brush Run Church united with the Redstone Baptist Association, and ten years later with the Mahoning Association in the Western Reserve of Ohio. In 1827 the Baptist churches withdrew fellowship from those who contended for the Bible alone, and the followers of Campbell organized themselves anew. Since the death of Alexander Campbell (1866), the religious people known as "Christians," or "Disciples of Christ," have made their mightiest strides. They number now in the United States six hundred thousand communicants, fifty-one hundred churches, and thirty-eight hundred ministers, besides having many churches in England and Australia, and missions in France, Denmark, Turkey, and Jamaica. Their strength in this country lies chiefly in the West and South-west; Illinois, Indiana, and Kentucky having the largest bodies.

Educational Enterprises.—They are active in the work of education, supporting two universities (the North-Western Christian University, Indianapolis, Ind., and Kentucky University, Lexington, Ky.) and thirty-two colleges and seminaries of high grade, the best known of which are Bethany College in West Virginia, founded in 1840 by Alexander Campbell, and presided over by him until his death; and Hiram College, Hiram, O., of which James A. Garfield was for a time president. They publish forty religious periodicals.

The most prominent man among them was the late President, James A. Garfield, who was an active member of this body, and, by his elevation to the chief magistracy of the United States, did much to bring the principles of the disciples into notice. He was baptized by Elder William A. Lillie, March 4, 1850. For five years, while a teacher at Hiram College, he preached the doctrines of the church with great eloquence and success, until 1856, when his political career began. During all his subsequent life, until his death, Sept. 19, 1881, he was devoted to the church of his choice, a trustee of Hiram and Bethany Colleges, and actively interested in the local churches at Washington and Mentor, and the general missionary enterprises of his brethren.

Doctrine and Practice.—The Disciples endeavor to follow closely New-Testament models. In agreement with what are termed Evangelical Christians, they accept the divine inspiration of the Holy Scriptures; the revelation of God in the tri-personality of Father, Son, and Holy Spirit; the all-sufficiency and alone-sufficiency of the Bible as the revelation of God's will and a rule of faith and practice to his creatures; the divine excellency of Jesus as the Christ the Son of God, — his incarnation, doctrines, miracles, death as a sin-offering, resurrection, ascension, and investment with supreme authority; the personal mission of the Holy Spirit to convict the world of sin, and to comfort and sanctify Christians; the alienation of man from God, and his dependence upon the divine mercy in Christ; the necessity of faith and repentance to salvation; the importance of baptism and the Lord's Supper as divine ordinances; the duty of observing the Lord's Day in memory of the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ; the necessity of righteousness, holiness, and benevolence in Christians; the divine appointment of the Church of Christ, composed of all who by faith and obedience confess his name, with its ministry and services for the edification of the church and conversion of the world; the fulness and freeness of the gospel to all who will accept it on the New-Testament conditions; the final judgment, with the reward of the righteous, and the punishment of the ungodly.

The Disciples hold, that, while both Old and New Testaments are equally inspired, both are not equally binding upon Christians. The Old Testament was God's will with reference to the Jews; the New, God's with reference to us, God having spoken unto us by a Son. Accepting fully the Scripture statements concerning the Godhead, they repudiate all philosophical speculations, both of Trinitarians and Unitarians. They do not use the theological terms common to the schools, but insist on "the form of sound words" given in the Scriptures. Accepting the Bible as the all-sufficient revelation of the divine will, they repudiate all authoritative creeds and human bases of fellowship. Receiving Jesus in all his divinity and Christhood, they accept the truth that he is the Christ, as the one article of faith, the creed of the church, the fundamental fact of the Christian religion and belief; faith in that, with all the heart, being all they ask in order to baptism and church-membership. Recognizing the agency of the Holy Spirit in conversion, they repudiate all theories of special spiritual operations outside of the Word, but demand that the sinner shall hear, believe, repent, and obey the gospel, trusting God to do the rest. Admitting the necessity of faith and repentance, they submit no other tests, no human formula of belief; but on a confession of Christ, and assurance of heartfelt desire to abandon sin, and work righteousness, men are baptized, and received into the church. Accepting baptism as a divine ordinance, they insist that "he that believeth and is baptized shall be saved." They bid men "Repent, and be baptized for the remission of sins," and claim that the evidence of pardon and of the gift of the Spirit is not in dreams or visions, but in the sinner's knowledge of his heartfelt acceptance of the terms of pardon, and his assurance of the faithfulness of God. Claiming the Lord's Supper a divine ordinance, they consider it not as a sacrifice, but a memorial feast, and keep it on every first day of the week, meeting as the Lord's people, and recognizing neither open nor close communion. The Lord's Day they regard not as the sabbath, but a New-Testament appointment in memory of the resurrection. The Church of Christ with them is not a sect, but a divine institution. Sects are not branches of the church, but are unscriptural: God's people are to be gathered from them, and united in the "one body," of which Christ is the Head.

In regard to the action of baptism, the Disciples are in accord with the Baptists. Immersion with them is the only baptism that is scriptural, and that could be universally accepted. As to the subjects of baptism, they receive to that ordinance only believers in Christ. With respect to the design of baptism, they accord more with Pedobaptists. They baptize "for the remission of sins," and claim that the sinner, in obeying this ordinance, appropriates God's promise of pardon, relying on the divine testimony, "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved," i.e., pardoned. The Disciples date the beginning of the Christian institution from Pentecost, not from Abraham, Moses, nor John the Baptist. The Jewish institution, they claim, passed away when Christ exclaimed, "It is finished." All things then became new; and the New Testament contains the history, constitution, and laws of the Church of Christ. In church government they have no distinction of clergy and laity. Their government is congregational, with evangelists, bishops or elders, and deacons. The Bible is their only book of doctrine and discipline.

The special plea of the Disciples is the restoration of original apostolic Christianity, and the union of all Christians. They insist, that as, in the beginning, there was one spiritual brotherhood,—one body with one Lord, one faith, and one baptism,—there should be but one to-day; that all party names, creeds, and organizations should be abandoned, and the church have no creed but the Bible, no law but the Lord's, no name but the Master's; and that, as the basis of that primitive union was the common teaching of Christ and the apostles, nothing is now essential to the union of Christians but the apostles' teaching, and nothing is essential to the conversion of the world but the union and co-operation of Christians with the apostles' teaching or testimony.

DISCIPLINA ARCANI. See ARCANI DISCIPLINA.

DISCIPLINE. The Christian congregation, like every other community, needs discipline for the sake of self-protection, in order to suppress or eliminate any thing that might impair or destroy its life. But, as the Christian congregation is a community of the faithful, the character of its discipline is purely spiritual. The object of all church-discipline is to prevent scandal, with a further view to retrieving the offender himself; and the only means which can be employed for this purpose is, properly speaking, exclusion, partial or total, from the community. A punishment which has a civil effect is inadmissible.

The centre of the whole scriptural doctrine of ecclesiastical discipline is the passage Matt. xviii. 15-18; and its practical application in the apostolical church we learn from 1 Cor. v. and 2 Cor. ii. 4-8. A member of the Corinthian congregation had taken his stepmother for a wife, and the congregation had made no objection. Paul then wrote to the Corinthians, that he who had done that deed should be excommunicated, and "delivered unto Satan;" and his words produced such an impression, not only on the congregation, but also on the offender, that, when he wrote again to the Corinthians, Paul could recommend mercy. It is, however, not only for such flagrant offences as the above that he demands punishment, but also for such minor failings as idleness, by which a man is made a burden to his fellow-men (2 Thess. iii. 6); and the danger against which he warns the congregations most urgently is heresy, for it eats like a canker (2 Tim. ii. 17). A heretic, after admonishing him once or twice in vain, reject (Tit. iii. 10): do not even bid him God speed (2 John 10, 11). The punishment, however, must never be administered in a spirit of retaliation. Church discipline, though ever so necessary for the self-protection of the church, has its last and highest aim in the reconciliation of the offender; and in the spirit of love it must dictate its punishments (2 Cor. ii. 6-8).

The apostolical institutions of excommunication and reconciliation lived on in the post-apostolic church, and during the period of persecution became even more peremptory in their demands. Under Decius, whose goal seems to have been the total destruction of Christianity, there occurred, by the side of the most admirable examples of faithfulness, so frequent instances of defection, that a special regulation for the reconciliation of the lapsed became a necessity. This regulation, which continued valid down to the fifth century, established a course of penance (see art.) which ran through various stages, and comprised a period of several years; but its severity naturally called forth devices of evasion and subterfuge, such as the libelli of the confessors (see art.); and at various times and in various places church-discipline became somewhat lax. A re-action towards greater severity followed, and the Montanists arose, declaring that the excommunicated ought to remain for their whole life in a state of penance, and the Novatians, declaring that the church had no right at all to forgive the lapsi their sins, though the Lord might be willing to do so, etc. When the persecutions ceased, and the Christian Church became the Church of the State, great numbers of unconverted and thoroughly worldly people entered it as members, and thereby discipline was almost lost. It became not only laxer, but entirely changed character. Already in the sixth century there existed casuistical regulations of penance-fines. The first book of penance in the Greek Church was written by Johannes Jejunator, Patriarch of Constantinople (d. 595). A new re-action followed, and the Donatists arose, demanding that the church should be kept absolutely pure, and declaring that one who had been excommunicated could never administer the sacraments. But no re-action against the degeneration of the discipline of the church was of any avail from the moment the church adopted the theory of indulgences, and put it into practice.

Under Gregory the Great the doctrine of purgatory became the doctrine of the church; and on this foundation Peter Lombard reared the theory of indulgence, according to which the church has the power, not only to transform the punishments of purgatory into earthly punishments, but also to transform the latter into simple money-fines. The most prominent among the schoolmen followed in the track of the Lombard; and in 1343 Clement VI. solemnly confirmed the theory of the dogmatists. The punishments which the church inflicted were generally alms, pilgrimages, fasts, participation in a crusade, etc.; but, if any of these forms of punishment was found too inconvenient, a sum of money could be substituted for it. The greatest ecclesiastical punishments which the middle ages knew were the great ban and the interdict; and, so far as they consisted in exclusion from communion with the church, they both presented the true character of church-discipline. But this character of pure spirituality they entirely lost; first by being administered, not for spiritual offences against the Church, but for secular quarrels with the Pope; and next by the delivering-up of the victim of the ban by the Church to the State, for civil punishment; which, in case of heresy, consisted in death. Indeed, it is enough to mention the name of the Inquisition in order to show what the apostolical institution of church-discipline became in the hands of the Roman-Catholic hierarchy.

From these aberrations the Reformation returned to the principles of the apostolic church.

Two years after he nailed his theses on the church-door of Wittenberg, Luther published his Sermon vom Bann (1519), in which he rejects the great ban and the surrender of the victim to the secular authorities, and retains only the minor ban, in the sense in which it is defined in Scripture. He not only rejects civil punishment in every form, but he also insists upon the just motive,—the reconciliation of the offender. At first he always placed the congregation in the foreground, and the office in the background; but after the contest with the enthusiasts, and the dangerous crisis into which they threw the Reformation in Germany, he began to change his views, and to emphasize the offices. Church-discipline became a part of soul-cure. Thus it is treated in the symbolical books of the Lutheran Church,—the Augsburg Confession, the Apology, the Articles of Smalcald, etc. In the Lutheran churches, however, this whole side of the life of the church was only very feebly developed, and not always in the right direction. Where the Church is a State-establishment, and the highest episcopal authority is vested in the head of the State, church-discipline is apt to become a matter of civil legislation. Thus princes ordered their subjects, under heavy penalties, to go to church thrice every Sunday; if not, the poor were scourged, or put in the stocks, and the rich were fined. Very often no distinction can be made between church-discipline and police-regulations. The Rationalists, of course, abolished all such laws; but at the same time they also swept away every trace of church-discipline, and it was not until after 1848 that the question was again mooted within the Lutheran Church.

In the Reformed Church, with its strong sympathy for the Old Testament, with its view of the congregation as the chosen flock of the Lord, organized as it was under the form of a theocracy, but wholly repudiating the private confession, it was quite natural that its discipline should be established, not on the merely negative principle of preventing evil, but on the positive principle of producing good; as a kind of superintendence and regulation, not only of the life of the congregation in its totality, but also of that of each individual member. In Zurich, Zwingli transferred the whole church-discipline to the magistrate; and he considered it right that a member for whose improvement simple excommunication proved insufficient should be further prosecuted and punished. In Geneva, Calvin formed a special consistory for church-discipline, composed of elders, magistrates, and clergymen; but this consistory, too, added heavy civil penalties, even death, to the ban. In the Reformed Church discipline became a social institution, whose aim was to form a holy congregation by superintending the moral purity of the members; and, thus organized, it was exercised with much greater vigor, and developed much further, than in the Lutheran Church; though in the course of time it was much modified and mitigated, in France, the Netherlands, Scotland, and America.

CHURCH-DISCIPLINE IN THE UNITED STATES.—In the Episcopal Church the discipline is laid down in the canons. It relates mainly to the clergy; but laymen can be kept from the sacrament of the Lord's Supper on conviction of serious offences.

In the Presbyterian Church discipline is in the hands of the session, or the governing board of each local church, consisting of the pastor and elders; but, if the party feels aggrieved, an appeal can be made to the next higher court, the presbytery, thence to the synod, and thence to the general assembly. The method of trial in all such cases is minutely laid down in book ii. of the Form of Government. In the Northern Presbyterian Church, reference to the highest court can only be made when the points involved are doctrinal or constitutional. Discipline is defined to be "the exercise of that authority, and the application of that system of laws, which the Lord Jesus Christ has appointed in his church." The subjects of discipline are "all baptized persons." The offence must be public, or such as demands the cognizance of the church judicatory; but private exhortation must first be employed.

Similar in definition and practice of discipline are the Dutch Reformed and German Reformed Churches. See The Constitution of the Reformed [Dutch] Church in America, Arts. XI.—XIV., and Constitution of the Reformed [German] Church of the United States, Part iii.

In the Congregational Church, discipline is a purely congregational matter; and there can be no appeal. See H. M. DEXTER: Congregationalism, Boston, 4th ed., 1876, pp. 188-195.

In the Methodist Church, "an accused member shall be brought to trial before a committee of not less than five, who shall not be members of the quarterly conference (and, if the preacher judge it necessary, he may select the committee from any part of the district), in the presence of the preacher-in-charge, who shall preside in the trial, and cause exact minutes of the evidence and proceedings in the case to be taken. In the selection of the committee the parties may challenge for cause." The various causes of such action are stated. "The accused shall have the right to call to his assistance as counsel any member in good and regular standing in the Methodist-Episcopal Church." If the pastor-in-charge dissent from the finding of the committee, he can appeal to the ensuing quarterly conference. Expulsion is the penalty for unworthy conduct on the part of accused members. See The Doctrines and Discipline of the Methodist-Episcopal Church, 1880 (N.Y., 1880), pp. 144-151.

DISCIPLINE, Book of, in the Methodist-Episcopal Church, is a volume published every four years, after the meeting of the General Conference. The volume for 1880 contains six Parts: I. Origin, Doctrine, and Rules; II. Government of the Church; III. Administration of Discipline; IV. Educational and Benevolent Institutions; V. Temporal Economy; VI. Ritual of the Church.

DISCIPLINE, First and Second Books of. The first was composed by Knox, Winram, Rosse, and Douglas (in 1560), and approved by the Assembly, but not ratified by the privy council. The second was approved by the Assembly of 1578, "inserted in the registers of assembly (1581), sworn to in the National Covenant, revived and ratified by the Assembly (1638), and by many other acts of Assembly, and according to which the church government is established by law (1592 and 1690)." It is the Presbyterian standard on order and government.

DISEASE. See MEDICINE.

DISMES (decime), the tenth part, or tithe, of the value of each spiritual benefice, which, together with the annats, or the entire income of the first year of possession, was paid yearly to the Pope by the Western Church. The tax was evidently based upon Num. xviii. 16. See TAXES, ECCLESIASTICAL.

DISPENSATION. As soon as the Church became fully organized as a religious community, he who broke the established order fell, of course, out with the Church, and could be reconciled to her only by repentance and by doing penance. Brotherly love, however, might forgive the offence, and remit the punishment; and by degrees, as the canon law developed its many and severe precepts entirely in the spirit of the Old Testament, relaxation was felt to be indispensable. In difficult cases, especially of marriage, questions were addressed to Rome, and Rome answered; and in this way the bishops of Rome saw fit to arrogate to themselves a right of dispensation. Bishops and synods protested, not from any moral hesitancy, but simply from a desire to have for themselves a share of the power; but the Pope came out of the struggle victorious, and this right of dispensation became, in his hand, a very rich source of influence and revenue. The bishops held the right only in a few and unimportant cases, though it was understood that they could exercise it in cases of danger, when it was impossible to address the Pope himself. See THOMAS-SIN: Vetus ac nova ecclesie disciplina, Pars II. lib. III. cap. 24-29; FERRARIS: Bibliotheca canonica s. v. dispensatio ur., 19, 20.

DISPERSED. See DIASPORA; CAPTIVITY.

DISSENTER. The epithet can be properly used only of those who dissent from the doctrine or order of an established church. In England it is synonymous with nonconformist: in Scotland the name was given to adherents of the secession church. Dissent in England once implied more or less persecution, but the disabilities are being gradually removed by successive legislation. See CONGREGATIONALISTS (ENGLAND); ENGLAND, CHURCH OF; NONCONFORMITY; PURITANS.

DISTAFF'S DAY, ST., the day after Twelfth Day, also called St. Rock's Day.

DISTINCTIO RATIONIS RATIOCINANTIS designates in the scholastic terminology a purely subjective logical distinction, not one objective in the matter itself; while distinctio rationis ratio-cinatae designates a distinction merely thought of, but yet resting upon good grounds.

DIVINATION. See MAGIC.

DIVORCE. The earliest notion of the relation between a child and a parent seems to have been that of property; and hence the man who sought for a wife bought a daughter from her father for this purpose. But in time the money went, in many tribes, with the daughter to her husband; yet the feeling still was that she was her husband's property. If she was unfaithful to him, he had the right of putting her to death: if she did not suit him, he could send her back to her friends. But his infidelity to her gave her no corresponding rights against her husband. The earliest conception of adultery was, that a married woman must be one of the parties; but a married man could not be guilty of this crime with an unmarried woman. The penalty for the crime was commonly death, but might be, by act of the husband, mitigated into sending away or divorce. It would seem, that, when the crime was committed, the trial of the woman, according to the practice among the Jews, came, in time, to be put into the hands of "righteous men" (Ezek. xxiii. 45), in which passage a public trial is evidently thought of. Probably all that the husband ordinarily did was to put away a guilty wife; but, if she were caught in the act, he could kill her and her paramour.

There is in the Hebrew Scriptures no evidence that the woman could get herself divorced from her husband; and Josephus (Antiq. xv. 7, 10), when he speaks of Salome's sending a bill of divorce to Costabarus, adds that this was not in accordance with Jewish law; so that a woman separated by her own act from her husband could not marry another, but only if she were put away by her first husband. What meaning, then, are we to give to Mark x. 12? Was the wife's power to put away a husband creeping in among the Jews, who lived under Greek or Roman law? or did our Lord give a rule to his apostles, as future teachers of the heathen world?

Divorce on the husband's part was at first unrestricted. But in Deut. xxiv. 1 two restrictions were laid upon it: the one of them, that a "bill of divorce" should be given to the wife, which would show that she had committed no crime, and might marry again; and the other, that the first husband could never take back the wife so put away, in case the second husband should repudiate her. This would greatly pollute the land (Jer. iii. 1). The cause or causes of divorce in Deuteronomy, u. s., are expressed by the words ervath dabar, the meaning of which, since the times of Hillel and Shammai, in the century before Christ, has been matter of dispute. They occur also in Deut. xxiii. 14, and may be rendered "uncleanness or filthiness from a thing" in a moral sense, as Shammai's school understood them, or any thing disgusting or unpleasant in a physical sense, as was Hillel's opinion. The passage in Mal. ii. 16, "For the Lord the God of Israel saith that he hateth putting away," indicates a moral and humane dislike of what was once tolerated.

Our Lord and the apostle Paul go far beyond these restrictions on divorce. Christ (Matt. v. 31, 32, xix. 3-9; Mark x. 2, 12), without giving a code of rules, sets aside the practice allowed in Deut. xxiv. 1 to the husband, and forbids the putting-away of a wife, and marrying another, except for the cause of her fornication. To this he adds that the woman thus divorced commits adultery by her marrying another man, and that this new husband is involved in the same guilt: in other words, adultery is the only cause for which a man can put away his wife, and for which, as Mark adds, a woman can put away her husband, without violating this commandment. In Matt. xix. 3-9 and Mark u. s. our Lord places before his disciples his views concerning marriage, which accorded entirely with this prohibition. The union commenced by marriage was so close that they became one flesh, and could not cease to be such by one of the parties tearing away his body, except by a violent disruption, from the other. This was the original idea in the institution, which really opposed polygamy also; and it was a departure from the original law of our nature when Moses, on account of the Jews' inveterate attachment to an evil usage, "suffered them to put away their wives." Adultery only can separate this close union; and there can be no marriage of either consort to any one else, except on this account.

Of the addition in Mark to what is contained in Matthew we have spoken already. The passage in Luke xvi. 18 completes the teaching of our Lord found in the Gospels on this subject. It contains no exception or qualification, as if all remarriage after divorce were adultery. But the passage is found in company with others with which it has a very remote connection. It seems to have been a portion of the Sermon on the Mount, and must be interpreted by the fuller account in Matthew.

In no other place does our Lord act as a legislator and an amender of the law of Moses; and even here he gives no body of rules, but confines himself to a single command. The command itself is confined to that case which was touched in Deuteronomy. One may still ask whether the guilty party, divorced on account of adultery, may marry again: the answer must be affirmative, in so far as the adulterer or adulteress ceases to be one flesh with his or her former partner. But, as such adultery would be a capital crime by Jewish law, there was less need of saying any thing further about it, and it is a wonder that it can be tolerated in any Christian country.

The apostle Paul, in 1 Cor. vii. 10-16, gives directions to the Corinthian Church, which may be called a supplement to our Lord's commands, as contained in the synoptical Gospels. These directions consist of two parts, one of which is intended to meet a case which would have occurred when both husband and wife were professed Christian believers (vers. 10, 11). A wife is commanded not to separate herself (χωριζομαι) from her husband; to which is added, that, if she be already in a state of separation from him, she is to remain unmarried, or be reconciled to him. The husband also is not to put away his wife. Here we remark, first that the word denoting "be or become reconciled" implies a previous dissension which led the wife to withdraw from her husband's society. But did the apostle have in mind a disagreement arising out of the husband's adultery? We are led to believe, from the terms used, that the Greek word χωριζομαι denotes simple separation unattended with divorce, as if it were a transaction not formally taking place before a civil court. She had left her husband, and was living apart. As long as she lives apart, let her contract no new marriage, or return to her husband when their strife shall have ceased. In accordance with this interpretation we understand the husband's putting away the wife not to include the crime of adultery on her part: otherwise the apostle would come into collision with our Lord's clear permission of divorce on account of adultery; and this permission he must have been acquainted with, as is shown by the words, "to the rest speak I, not the Lord," evidently showing, that in ver. 10 he refers to the words of Christ, with which he, and probably the Corinthian Church also, was familiar.

The apostle's other precept relates first to cases where either husband or wife was still an unbeliever, but might wish to live with his or her Christian partner. In this case the Christian was not to leave the unbeliever (vers. 12-14). Or again: the unbeliever might wish to separate himself or herself from the Christian. The apostle's direction here is, if the unbeliever depart (χωριζεται), that is, live separate, let him depart (χωριζεσθαι) as in vers. 10, 11. In such cases the Christian wife or husband is not in bondage, that is, is under no such obligation, or in such a state of bondage, as to feel constrained to continue the marriage connection. This feeling might be cherished in the hope of saving the unbelieving husband or wife; but this was too uncertain an event to demand that the Christian should keep up the family life when the heathen was bent on separation, and when God had called believers in peace, i.e., to be in the ethical condition of peace. Thus the believer is to be passive, and not active, in the separation, and is not to feel that the possibility of saving a heathen wife or husband at any expense of strife is a duty. Here in ver. 15 and in ver. 10 the word χωριζομαι must be understood, we must believe, as simple separation; although this has been much disputed.

From Christ's precepts it follows that a marriage is dissolved by adultery, so that the innocent party may marry again, and that other separations are not included in this permission.

On these foundations the practice of divorce in Christendom has been placed, after long struggles of Roman law for a looser practice, which we have no room to unfold. The Catholic doctrine of the sacraments modified the view of marriage, and so of divorce, by forbidding second marriages after divorce for cause of adultery; and divorce became simply separation à mensa et toro, in every case where the parties were both Christians. Where one of them was a heathen, the Roman Church simply withheld a permission conceded by Christ to remarry in that one case, but enjoined nothing new. And to this may be added, that cases of nullity, of which Christ says nothing, were multiplied by enlarged civil and by spiritual relationships. The dissolution of such marriage, however, is not an act of divorcing, but of pronouncing a marriage in form no marriage in substance, and therefore void ab initio. It cannot be denied that the Catholic Church, by its sacramental theory applied to marriage, takes the most sacred of all natural institutions out of the hands of the civil power in great measure. It can endure what is called civil marriage, although loath to make any concession: but divorce it must keep under its control; its principle being that re-marriage, while a husband or wife is living, places a person outside of the pale of the Church.

In Protestant countries, when the new State churches were founded, they were very considerably under the control of civil powers, which asserted their own rights of controlling marriage and divorce. Yet the State law concerning divorce was not framed, we believe, without the concurrence or the lead of the theologians. All the Protestant states, excepting England, legislated at an early date on divorce, starting from the assumption that divorce for adultery was sanctioned by Christ, and for desertion by the apostle Paul. England dissolved marriage by act of Parliament in cases where adultery was proved; and separations were under the control of ecclesiastical courts. This continued until 1857, when a new court was established, having jurisdiction in matters pertaining to marriage and divorce, and the old ecclesiastical courts lost this jurisdiction. The law of divorce was also altered. Divorce absolute may be granted for adultery of the wife, or for adultery, connected with certain other crimes, of the husband; and judicial separation may be granted to either party for adultery, cruelty, or causeless desertion for two years or more.

Other Protestant countries in modern times have greatly multiplied the causes for which divorce or separation may be obtained, by adding to the original two causes stated already such others as cruelty, imprisonment for crime, drunkenness, contagious or incurable disease, and even insanity. In some countries incompatibility of temper, in some, mutual agreement, with no allegation of crime, are allowed to be causes for divorce absolute. In one of the United States the judges are left free to grant divorce when they think that the happiness of the marriage relation requires it. Separation a mensa et toro is one of the reliefs generally provided for parties petitioning to have their marriages terminated by law; but a number of the States of the American Union grant divorce absolute alone.

In the Catholic countries of Europe either no absolute divorces are granted, or both divorce and separation are allowed for their respective causes, or the law is so made as to suit the religious confessions of the parties bringing suits before the courts. France is an example of the first plan, which, since the restoration of the Bourbons, has remained until now, notwithstanding a number of attempts in the chambers to alter the law. Belgium follows the French code civil, which prevailed there before the separation from France in 1815, in allowing both divorce and separation. Austria modifies the law according as Catholics, Greeks, Protestants, and Jews petition for divorce; and Switzerland acts on a somewhat similar principle.

Nowhere is the problem of divorce so poorly solved, or so charged with danger for the future, as in the United States. It is certainly an alarming fact that the ratio of divorce to marriage is as one to ten, or even greater, in some States; and that in another State it has sunk, within twenty years, from the ratio of one to fifty-one, down to the ratio of one to twenty-one. Happily, these and similar indications of a greater ratio than is elsewhere known are now exciting the attention of many Christian people, as is shown by the recent formation of the New-England Divorce Reform League, in which all the Christian denominations are united with a hearty interest.

The evils of divorce in the United States are felt in no one quarter of the Union, but are more exactly known in the Eastern States. If the laws grant dissolutions of marriage for grounds which Christians cannot find to be justified in the Scriptures, it must injure the church, and society suffers still more. Loose laws aggravate the evils they are made to relieve. If any partners in marriage were told by the State that they can be separated on declaring, for instance, their mutual consent and desire before the court, they would, of course, be tempted mentally to put, "as long as we agree," into the place of "until death do us part." The ideal of marriage would then be lowered. It is no longer the close union denoted by "twain becoming one flesh," or by God's joining man and wife together, so that man may not put them asunder; but it is a contract made between two persons for their own convenience, and made with the less caution because either can put the other away. The real closeness of the union cannot be preserved unless the parties feel the truth of what Christ says of it. Then, again, law, in a country like ours, is liable to constant changes for the worse, if the feeling of the sanctity of the marriage is not sustained; but this feeling cannot be sustained without some religious sense of the nature and ends of marriage. Bad laws tend to make bad husbands and wives, and hence bad families. The laws of divorce and the opinion of society will act upon one another.

When the laws respecting divorce and the opinions concerning divorce in the New Testament are in conflict, there is no question, in most cases, what is the duty of Christians. The law can be permissive only; that is, it may leave it to individuals to choose whether they will make use of the license it affords them or not. It does not oblige them to bring suits for dissolution of marriage, even in the case when a husband or wife has been unfaithful in their marriage relations. The offence may be condoned, and they may live together still. And again: law could not, without being tyrannical, require a church, which has disciplined one of its members on account of divorce and re-marriage contrary to the rule of Scripture, to restore him to his standing. But, although this be true, a church may be brought into great perplexity when State law opens a gate which the law of the New Testament shuts. For the thoughtless are tempted by the law to do what is held to be unlawful by the Church; while the Church has no option in regard to exercising its discipline upon offenders within its folds. The State's permission is no more of a bar to discipline in such case than if the church-member had opened an authorized gambling or drinking house. But if the law had agreed in its provisions with the Church, there would have been no such trouble, and those who, in the case supposed, had been led by the State into unlawful marriages, would, in all probability, have been deterred from committing such an offence.

There is, however, one case which deserves notice on account of its difficulty. Two irreligious persons have connected themselves in marriage, one of whom had put away a wife or husband for an offence not recognized by the law of Christ as justifying divorce. They live for years together, and have a family. At length they become believers in Christ, and apply to the church for admission. In such an extreme case as this, shall the request be denied? Shall they be required to live apart afterward, until the former husband or wife of one of them shall die? We leave the settlement of this case to casuists, glad that it is rare, and only remarking that its peculiarity consists in the performance of important duties which cannot be performed when once the parties are separated.

DOCTOR (teacher). Originally there were only two degrees in graduation, — bachelor and master; and doctor was given to certain masters, probably as a merely honorary designation. The evolution of the doctorate as a third university degree above that of master cannot be distinctly traced. The law faculty at Bologna is said to have conferred it as early as the twelfth century; but the story that Imerius originated the ceremonial of investiture, and Bulgarus first took the degree, is probably a fiction. The University of Paris conferred their first degrees in divinity upon Peter Lombard and Gilbert de la Portree (1150). In England the degree was first given under John (1207). The degree in law and divinity is given now in England and America without examination.

The term Doctor of the Church is applied to four of the Greek fathers (Athanasius, Basil, Gregory Nazianzen, and Chrysostom), and to twelve of the Latin Church (Ambrose, Augustine, Jerome, Hilary, Gregory the Great, Chrysologus, Leo I., Isidore of Seville, Thomas Aquinas, Bernard, Bonaventura, and Alphonso Liguori).

The church officer who had charge of the instruction of the catechumens was called in the early church Doctor audientium. The title Doctor is used in the present Greek Church; thus the interpreters of the Gospels, Epistles of Paul, and the Psalms, are called Doctors of the Gospels, the Apostles, and the Psalter respectively.

Doctor is also part of the epithet describing the most prominent quality or trait of several of the great schoolmen of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries: thus, Thomas Aquinas, D. (i.e., Doctor) Angelicus; Johannes Bonaventura, D. Seraphicus; Johannes Duns Scotus, D. Subtilis; Raimundus Lullus, D. Illuminatus; Alanus de Insulis (de l'Isle), D. Universalis; Durandus d. S. Pourcain, D. Resolutissimus; Gregorius de Rimini, D. Authenticus; Johannes Taulerus, D. Illuminatus; Johannes Gersonus, D. Christianissimus; Alexander Hales, D. Irrefragabilis; Roger Bacon, D. Admirabilis; William Occam, D. Singularis. For the Jewish Doctors of the Law, see RABBINS.

DOCTRINAIRES is the common name of two religious associations which originated, independently of each other, in Italy and France. In Italy the association of the Padri della Dottrina Christiana was founded in Rome (1562) by Marcus de Sadis Cusani, a nobleman from Milan, for the purpose of instructing the people, more especially the children, in the catechism. Under Pius V. it spread rapidly. In France the association of the Doctrinaires, or Pères de la Doctrine Chrétienne, was founded by Cæsar de Bus, priest and canon of Cavaillon. He gathered a number of young priests; and after due preparation he sent them into the streets, and out upon the high-ways, to catechise every one they met; while he walked himself from house to house, offering to instruct any one, young or old, ignorant or educated, in the catechism of the Roman-Catholic Church. The association prospered, and in 1597 Clement VIII. confirmed the constitution. See HELYOT: Histoire des Ordres Monastiques, etc., Paris, 1714-19. HERZOG.

DOCTRINES, The History of Christian, did not become an independent branch of theological learning until the latter part of the eighteenth century. Before that time, it was treated simply as a chapter of dogmatics or church-history. But the richness of its materials, and the importance of its study, naturally led to a more elaborate treatment. The first impulse was given by the rationalists: CH. W. FRANZ WALCH: Gedanken v. d. Geschichte d. Glaubenslehre, Göttingen, 1756; ERNESTI, 1759; SEMLER: Einleitung zu S. J. Baumgartens Glaubenslehre, 1759; and RÖSSLER: Lehrbegriff der chr. Kirche in den 3 ersten Jahrhunderten, Frankfurt-a-M., 1777. In the earlier Protestant theology the subject forms only an appendix, either to church-history or to dogmatics. See the Magdeburg Centuries, Basel, 1559-74. CHEMNITZ: Examen Concilii Tridentini, Frankfurt, 1615; JOH. GERHARD: Confessio Catholica, Leipzig, 1679. Twice, however, it was treated independently, — by PETAUVIUS, a Roman Catholic (Opus de theologicis dogmatibus, Paris, 1644-50, 5 vols. fol.), and by FORBESIUS A CORSE, a Scotchman of the Reformed Church (Institutiones historico-theologicæ de doctrina Christiana, Amsterdam, 1645); but in both cases the treatment was more argumentative than truly historical. The rationalists found the method by which a history of Christian doctrines can be written, but they failed to find the right stand-point from which it ought to be written. They did not understand that the whole sum of Christian truth has been given in the teachings of Christ and the apostles; that, however great may be the difference between the confession of the church of our day and that of the primitive church, in precision, elaborateness, etc., nothing new has been added; that the history of a dogma is simply an evolution of form, put in motion by a craving for a deeper conception of the idea, and, at every stage of its movement, authorized in its results by the consent of the whole church. They hold the history of Christian doctrines as a contest between merely subjective opinions about religious matters, without any foundation in a given revelation, and without any regulation from an inherent logic. The same stand-point was occupied by MÜNDSCHER, the most erudite of the historians of Christian doctrines (Handbuch d. chr. Dogmengeschichte, Marburg, 1793-1809, 4 vols., and Lehrbuch d. Dogmengeschichte, 1812, 2d ed., 1819, 3d ed. by Coelln and Neudecker, Cassel, 1832-38). But a change took place under the influence of Neander and Schleiermacher, and the results have been very rich: BAUMGARTEN-CRUSIUS: Lehrbuch d. Dogmengeschichte, Jena, 1832, and Compendium d. chr. Dogmengeschichte, Leipzig, 1840-46, 2 parts, the 2d part edited by C. Hase; the Lehrbücher of HAGENBACH, Leipzig, 1840, 5th ed., 1867 [several times trans. into English, as by Dr. H. B. DOD, Albert Baldwin, a Presbyterian scholar and divine; b. at Mendham, N.J., March 24, 1805; d. at Princeton, Nov. 20, 1845. He was graduated at the College of New Jersey in 1822, and at the Princeton Seminary, and was professor of mathematics in the college from 1830 to his death, teaching in his latter years architecture and political economy in addition. He was widely read, and gifted with a philosophical mind of rare power. His contributions to The Princeton Review are remarkable, especially those on phrenology (April, 1838) and on capital punishment (April, 1842). Some of them are reprinted in The Princeton Essays, N.Y.; and one, on Transcendentalism, was issued separately.

DOD, John, Puritan, called the Decalogist from his work named below; b. at Shotledge, Cheshire, 1547; d. as rector of Fawesley, Northamptonshire, August, 1645. He was fellow of Jesus College, Cambridge, and then pastor for many years; eminent for Hebrew learning. His wit was also famous; and his Sayings were proverbial, and to be found in cottages. He wrote, in connection with Robert Cleaver, Expositions of the Ten Commandments, London, 1606, 18th ed., 1632; Of Proverbs, 1608; Of the Lord's Prayer, 1635.

DO'DANIM, a people descended from Javan, the son of Japheth, and therefore neighbor to the Greek (Gen. x. 4; 1 Chron. i. 7: in the last passage Rodanim in almost all Hebrew MSS.). The "sons" of Javan may be thus distributed, — Elishah, perhaps Sicily; Tarshish, Tartessus in Spain; Kutim, Cyprus and adjacent islands; and Dodanim, Rhodes.

DODDRIDGE, Philip, D.D., a celebrated dissenting (Independent) divine, and writer of hymns; son of a merchant, and last of twenty children; was b. in London, June 26, 1702; d. at Lisbon, Oct. 26, 1751. From infancy he was of infirm constitution. He enjoyed the instructions of pious parents, and early turned his attention to the ministry. He was first settled at Kibworth in 1723. In 1729 he became assistant at Harborough, and head of an academy by the choice of a general meeting of dissenting ministers. The same year he was called to Northampton: he here continued his activity as teacher, and was very successful. He was forced, by the rapid development of consumptive tendencies, to seek for health in a milder climate. He went to Lisbon, where he died, and lies buried in the English graveyard.

Dr. Doddridge was a man of great piety, and practised strict habits of self-examination. He was as scrupulous in his habits of study; rising at five in the morning, and laying out plans of study, and subjects of sermons, months ahead. He made it a rule to avoid controversy, and showed sympathy with the Methodists, — a course which drew upon him the charge of "trimmer and double-dealer."

Among his works, the most important are Life of Colonel Gardiner, The Family Expositor, A Commentary on the New Testament (which became a household work in England), and The Rise and Progress of Religion in the Soul (1745), which he wrote at the suggestion of Dr. Watts. With the Pilgrim's Progress, Henry's Commentary, and Al- leine's Alarm, it has been more extensively used as a stimulus to piety than any other work in the English language. As an author of hymns he was very prolific. Among the more favorite ones are, "Awake, my soul, stretch every nerve," and "Grace, 'tis a charming sound!"

LIT. — Works of the Rev. P. Doddridge, D.D., with a Life by Rev. DODWELL, Henry, a learned though whimsical theologian; b. at Dublin, October, 1641; d. at Shottesbrooke, Berkshire, June 7, 1711. He was a fellow of Trinity College, Dublin, but resigned on taking orders (1666), and settled in London (1674); wrote in defence of the Anglican Church, and made such a reputation that he was appointed Camden Professor of History at Oxford in 1688, but lost the position in 1691, on the accession of William III., by refusing to take the oath of allegiance, for he had joined the party of James II. He defended the non-juring bishops, declaring those "schismatics" who submitted, and himself left the Anglican communion, but afterwards changed his mind, and as publicly recognized the authority of the "schismatics," and shortly before his death re-entered the Church of England. His works were numerous, particularly in the various departments of classical literature, and attest great industry and learning, but little judgment. He is remembered for his assertion, in his Dissertationes in Irenæum (Oxford, 1689), that the New-Testament demoniacs were epileptics, and for his Epistolary Discourse, proving from the Scriptures and the First Fathers that the Soul is naturally Mortal, but immortalized actually by the Pleasure of God, to Punishment, or to Reward, by its Union with the Divine Baptismal Spirit, London, 1706. He raised a violent opposition, but vigorously defended himself. He connected immortality with baptism, and also advocated priestly absolution. In private life he was exemplary, and strict to asceticism. Curiously enough one of his sons (Henry) became noted for scepticism, and another (William) for orthodoxy. — See Works abridged, with an Account of his Life, by FRANCIS BROKESBY, B.D., London, 1715.

DOEDERLEIN, Johann Christof, b. at Windsheim, in Franconia, Jan. 20, 1745; d. at Jena, Dec. 2, 1792; studied at Altorf; was made professor in theology there in 1772, and moved in 1782 to Jena. Of his exegetical works, his Jesaias (1775) and Solomon's Wisdom (1778) were much appreciated; but it was more especially in the field of dogmatics that he exercised influence, Institutio theol. Christianæ (1780) forming a transition from the old orthodoxy to the dawning rationalism. In the same spirit he also edited the Theologische Bibliothek from 1780.

DO'EG, an Edomite servant of Saul, who being at Nob, probably on account of conjectured leprosy, saw the interview between Ahimelech and David, and reported it to Saul, whose anger was so raised that he put the entire priesthood at Nob to death, with the solitary exception of Abiathar who escaped to David, and the settlement destroyed, in which bloody proceeding Doeg gave the first blow (1 Sam. xxii.).

DOGMA (Greek δόγμα) means, first, a fixed and final resolution, especially when having a public and general character, — a decree. In this sense the Septuagint and the New Testament use it for all obligatory precepts with respect to practical life, for the decrees of civil authorities (Esth. iii. 9; Dan. ii. 13, vi. 8; Luke ii. 1), for the decrees of the apostles (Acts xvi. 4), and for the Mosaic decrees (Col. ii. 14; Eph. ii. 15). Next, it denotes in the language of the philosophers, more especially in that of the Stoics, such definitions of principles and ideas as are considered settled forever, and raised above doubt. Thus Plato applies it (De Rep., VII. 538 Steph.) to those axioms of the philosophy of the good and beautiful which he wanted children to learn in the school. Finally, it means such propositions or sentences, expressive of ethico-religious truths, as are believed to have originated from a divine revelation. Thus Josephus (Contra Apion., I. 8) calls the contents of the sacred books of the Jews θεῶν δόγματα; and for the application of the name to the Christian revelation, see IGNATIUS: Ad Magnes., 13; ORIGINES: De Princ. Fragm., IV. 156; CLEMENT ALEXANDRINUS: Strom., VII. p. 763, etc.

DOGMATICS (from dogma, see above) means the systematic representation and scientific argumentation of the tenets of a religious community. Judaism and Mohammedanism might have their dogmatics, like Christianity, and partially have. Generally, however, the name is confined to the systematic treatment of the Christian verities as they have been divinely revealed and historically developed and comprehended.

A Christian science (that is, a philosophical exposition of the ideas of Christianity, and a scientific argumentation of the truth of these ideas) arose very early in the Church; but, as it arose almost exclusively as a defence against the attacks of Pagan or Jewish civilization, it naturally assumed the character of apologetics, and that character it retained down to the beginning of the fourth century. (See art. Apologetics.) When Christianity became the State religion of the Roman Empire, it needed the apology no more; but the scientific spirit, once awakened within its bosom, was not destined to go to sleep again; it only changed object. From the fourth to the ninth century it was engaged in a scientific definition of the Christian truths, in the formulation of the Christian dogmas; and this task was performed through a continuous series of literary controversies, rising now and then into furious contests. With the beginning of the ninth century this fermentation was about finished; and then followed, down to the beginning of the sixteenth century, a period in which all the doctrinal results of the preceding debates were most carefully gathered and sifted by the schoolmen, while at the same time the reasoning methods of the Greek philosophy were applied to their exposition. A new fermentation took place with the Reformation, shorter, because less comprehensive, but equally sharp and bitter. After the lapse of a century, or little more, it ended with the establishment of the Protestant Confessions.

While moving through these various stages of apologetics, polemics, scholasticism, and confessionalism, Christian science found no necessity of making any distinction between the theoretical and the practical aspect of its subject. The whole Christian truth, so far as it existed in the Church under the form of well-defined doctrine, was embraced in its contents. Theology treated not only of the nature of God and his relation to the world, but also of the duties which this relation involves for man; not only of the person of Christ and the end and aim of his activity, but also of the hopes which this aim involves for man; not only that which a Christian believes, but also that which he acts upon. There are instances in early Christian literature, in which practical questions and practical principles are treated independently in separate works; as, for instance, by Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian, and others: but it happened incidentally. The sacra doctrina (Anselm), the loci theologici (Melancthon), the Institutio religionis Christianæ (Calvin), etc., made no distinction between theoretical and practical. The schoolmen considered a chapter on the virtues, often strongly marked with an influence from Cicero, as an indispensable part of the science which they taught. The distinction was not made until the latter part of the seventeenth century, when the sacra doctrina, the loci theologici, etc., begin to branch off into two independent parts, — one practical (ethics), and one theoretical (dogmatics), each from that time following a course of its own, though, of course, under steady interaction with its partner. The name dogmatics theologica dogmatica was first used by Hildebrand (1692), then by Niemeyer (1702), Jäger (1715), and so on. In English and American theology it has not superseded the older name of "Systematic Theology."

After this separation, by which dogmatics was established as an independent branch of Christian science, as its theoretical division, the questions which have exercised the greatest influence on its further development are, From what sources can dogmatics draw its materials? and, According to what norms has it to treat them? To the Roman-Catholic Church it proved comparatively easy to answer these questions. She presents in Scripture and tradition a double field from which her dogmatists can gather their materials; and in the decisions of the living Church, of the infallible Pope, she has established an absolute norm for the truth of a dogma and for its correct interpretation. It must not be inferred, however, from the utter arbitrariness of this norm, that, within the Roman-Catholic Church, dogmatics has sunk down to a mere registration of the papal whims: on the contrary, Roman-Catholic dogmatics has now and then admitted fertile impulses from other powers, and now and then utilized them with considerable freedom. (See art. Hermes, and K. WERNER: Geschichte der katholischen Theologie seit dem Trienter Konzil, München, 1867.) Much greater difficulties the Protestant churches experienced in answering the above-mentioned questions: for they rejected the Roman-Catholic norm altogether; and of the two Roman-Catholic sources they recognized only the one, Scripture, to the exclusion of the other, tradition. Indeed, in the Protestant churches, Scripture became at once the only dogmatic source and the true dogmatic norm. But again: from these almost revolutionary proceedings it must by no means be inferred that the old Protestant dogmatics drew its whole contents, new and fresh, from Scripture: on the contrary, besides its articuli puri, which were derived directly from Scripture, it had its articuli mixti, which were derived from the general religious consciousness; and though these articuli mixti were not to be adopted as part and parcel of Christian truth until they were proved by Scripture, they became the channel through which a great mass of merely traditional materials were carried from the Roman-Catholic dogmatics into the Protestant. (See GASS: Geschichte der protestantischen Dogmatik, Berlin, 1854-67, 4 vols.)

In course of time this incongruity between the contents of the old Protestant dogmatics and the dogmatic contents of Scripture became too palpable to pass by unnoticed. Criticism began its work. It did not confine itself, however, to censuring the above incongruity, but attacked, under the form of rationalism, the very position Scripture held as the norm of Christian truth. It rejected the doctrine of the inspiration of Scripture; it denied that Scripture is itself a divine revelation; it accepted Scripture only as the first, the most authentic, and consequently the most authoritative, testimony to the divine revelation in Christ. By degrees its own position became perfectly clear: it assumed human reason as the highest norm for revealed truths (D. F. Strauss),—a self-contradiction which must lead to the denial of all revelation, that is, out of Christianity. The lasting result, however, of the rationalistic criticism, was the distinction between a purely scriptural dogmatics developed into an independent branch of the theological system, under the name of Biblical Theology, and the whole sum of Christian truth such as it has grown up from Scripture in Christendom during a period of nearly two thousand years. The question then arose, where to seek that supplementary constituent, which, together with Scripture, could form the absolute norm for this truth; and it is on this question that modern dogmatics is divided; Schleiermacher presuming to have found what he sought in the "pious self-consciousness;" I. T. Beck and Schenkel, in the "conscience;" H. Plitt, in the "inner religious experience;" H. Martensen, in a "perfect mediation between the ideas of Scripture and the ideas of modern civilization," and so on. J. KÖSTLIN.

DOGS among the Hebrews were not so highly esteemed as they are among us. They were not man's companions and friends. While useful as the guardian of herds (Job xxx. 1; Isa. lvi. 10), they are often spoken of as disturbers of the night (Ps. lix. 6, 14; Isa. lvi. 11), and devourers of dead bodies: hence to be unbury was a revolting thought and a curse (1 Kings xiv. 11, xvi. 4, xxi. 19, 23, xxii. 38; 2 Kings ix. 10, 36; Ps. lxxviii. 23; Jer. xv. 3). They appear in Bible proverbs, thus: "Against any of the children of Israel shall not a dog move his tongue" (the exodus would be safe, Exod. xi. 7); "He that passeth by, and meddeth with strife belonging not to him, is like one that taketh a dog by the ears" (the folly of meddling, Prov. xxvi. 17); "As a dog returneth to his vomit, so a fool returneth to his folly" (the hopelessness of sin, Prov. xxvi. 11, quoted in 2 Pet. ii. 22). The Hebrews were forbidden to sacrifice dogs (Isa. lxvi. 3) as several nations of antiquity did; and the word was an epithet of that which was unclean, profane, and altogether vile (cf. 1 Sam. xvii. 43; xxiv. 14; 2 Sam. ix. 8; 2 Kings viii. 13; Phil. iii. 2; Rev. xxii. 15). So foreigners were called "dogs" by the Jews (Matt. xv. 26), even as Christians are now by the Mohammedans. In the Orient to-day the dog is a filthy, ignoble cur, howling in the streets, and making night hideous by his barks and yelps, whose only redeeming feature is his capacity to fill the position of scavenger. DOKETISM (docetism) is a theory according to which Christ had no real body: his appearance in the actual world was only a magical apparition, his body a phantom, his birth and death visions. The origin of this theory seems to date very far back. Ideas of the kind are refuted in 1 John iv. 2 and 2 John vii.; and in one form or the other the theory entered into nearly all Gnostic systems, as, for instance, in those of Saturninus, Basilides, Valentinus, Marcion, etc. Towards the close of the second century there existed a sect called Doketæ, δοκταί (THEODORET, Ep. 82; CLEM. ALEX., Strom. 7, 17; EUSEB., Hist. Eccl. 6, 12). The root from which the theory sprung was the idea of matter as being the cause of evil. Ascribing all evil to matter, it seemed necessary to represent Christ as entirely disconnected with the material world; and gnostical subtlety hoped to do this without making his work totally unreal. Undoubtedly, however, the theory was often connected with a peculiar superficiality of feeling which transformed the deepest religious instincts of human nature into a merely æsthetical playing with intellectual ideas; as, for instance, when Basilides taught that it was Simon of Cyrene who was crucified under the disguise of Jesus, while Jesus stood by, in the disguise of Simon of Cyrene, and laughed at his persecutors.

DOLCINO was b. in the diocese of Novara; a son of a priest, and joined in 1291 the sect of the Apostolic Brothers; which see. After the death of Segarelli (1300) he became the leader of the sect, and made an armed resistance to the troops sent to arrest him; but in 1307 he was defeated and burnt. Of the three works he wrote, the third and last has perished altogether; but of the two others, extracts and fragments are still extant. The first was written in 1300, the second in 1303; and both are addressed to the scattered members of the sect. He distinguishes four stages in the historical development of providence. The first begins with the patriarchs, the second with Christ and his apostles, the third with Sylvester and Constantine the Great, and the fourth and last with Segarelli and himself. Each stage is good by itself; but degeneration makes reform, and the development of a new stage, necessary. Thus, when the great masses of Pagans adopted Christianity in the fourth century, the Christians were compelled to assume the responsibility of riches in order to show how the goods of the earth shall be used to the glory of God and for the sake of the poor. But the attempt proved a failure; and neither the rules of St. Benedict, nor the still severer rules of St. Francis and St. Dominic, were able to mend matters. The true reform, the return to the example of Christ, the transformation of all earthly relations, marriage, property, etc., into spiritual relations, comes with the fourth stage, ushered in by Segarelli and Dolcino. In his first book (1300) Dolcino announced that in 1303 all his enemies should be vanquished, and the whole Christian world gathered into the sect. In his second book (1303) he was compelled to announce a postponement of one year, which he did without losing the confidence of his followers. There are, indeed, in his works both true religious enthusiasm and a sharp sense of the corruption of the Church; but both are blurred by the whims of a sensuous and ill-regulated imagination.

DOMICELLA. See CHAPTER.

DOMINIC, St., and the DOMINICANS. Domingo de Guzman, the founder of the Dominican order, was b. 1170, at Calaruega, in the diocese of Osma, Old Castile, and d. in the Monastery of St. Nicholas, at Bologna, Aug. 6, 1221. From his sixth year he was educated by his uncle, who was archpresbyter at Gumyel de Yçan; and when he was fourteen years old he entered the University of Palencia. In 1194 he was made a canon, and afterwards sub-prior of the chapter of Osma, where he aided the Bishop Diego de Azevedo in introducing the rules of St. Augustine. He also labored, and with great success, as a missionary among the Mohammedans and heretics of the neighborhood. In 1204 he accompanied Diego on a diplomatical errand into Southern France, and there he came into contact with the Albigenses. The task of converting these revolters against the faith and authority of Rome had been intrusted to the Cistercians; but they had utterly failed, and were about to give up the work, when, in an assembly at Montpellier, Diego and Dominic persuaded them to go on. But the success was slight: only a few were converted. Diego soon left for his diocese; also the Cistercians withdrew; and Dominic with a few followers was left alone in the field. From Bishop Fulco of Toulouse he received some support; but the foundation of an asylum for girls at Prouille, in the diocese of Toulouse, was nearly the only result of his activity.

This nunnery of Prouille became the place of rendezvous for Dominic and his followers until the Cellanis joined the brotherhood, and presented them with a house in Toulouse. The Roman curia also showed that it felt obliged to Dominic: it offered him the bishopric of Beziers. Innocent III. had no confidence in prayers and preaching as weapons against heretics. The sword and the battering-ram he considered more effective; and after the assassination of his legate, Cardinal Castelnau, he preached a crusade against the Albigenses. Dominic and the brotherhood followed in the wake of the terrible army as a kind of court of inquiry. All suspicious or suspected persons were placed before this court; and, having been convicted of heresy, they were passed on to the stake. After the end of the war Dominic determined to transform the brotherhood he had founded into a permanent weapon of attack against heresy, into an order of predicant monks. Bishop Fulco, who liked to see his diocese becoming the seat of a new monastic order, was charmed at the idea, and accompanied Dominic to Rome, where the fourth council of the Lateran was just assembled (1215); but the council determined that no new order should be founded, and the petition of Dominic was left unheeded. He did not give up his idea, however; and finally Innocent III. gave his consent on the condition that the brotherhood should adopt the rules of some older, already recognized order, and organize itself in the simple form of colleges of canons. The brotherhood chose the rules of St. Augustine, to which were added some others from the statutes of the Præmonstratensians, — silence, poverty, fasts, complete abstinence from flesh, linen clothes, etc.; but the prospects of success were very small. Then Innocent III. died (July 17, 1216); and his successor, Honorius III., held a much more favorable opinion of the efficacy of a predicant order. Dominic hastened to Rome; and in December (same year) Honorius confirmed the statutes, and gave the order, as its symbol, a dog with a lighted torch in his mouth; the order being destined to watch the Church like a dog, and to illuminate it like a torch. The brotherhood now began to develop a great activity for the purpose of spreading the order. Some went to Spain, others to Paris, where a monastery was founded in the house of St. Jacob, whence the Dominicans in France were afterwards called Jacobins. Dominic himself founded monasteries in Metz and Venice. During a visit to Rome he began to preach to the lower servants of the papal household, who were allowed, it seems, to live on without any spiritual care at all; and he was then appointed Magister Sacri Palatii, or court-preacher to the Pope, an office which still exists, and still is held by a Dominican. Still the order would not grow. Something was missing in order to insure success, and it took time before Dominic discovered what it was.

In 1219 he seems to have been present at the chapter-general held by the Franciscans at Assisi. There he saw how an ostentatious display of poverty and destitution, an almost crack-brained passion for dirt and rags and all the disgusts of misery, made the monks accepted by the mass of the people as brethren: consequently, he immediately threw himself upon the track pointed out by the Franciscans. At the chapter-general which the Dominicans held in 1220, in the Monastery of St. Nicholas, at Bologna, the order renounced the possession of property in any form or shape, and declared for complete poverty, and the daily begging of the means indispensable to the sustenance of life. When the next chapter-general was held in Bologna (1221), sixty monasteries were represented, and members were sent to far-off places to make new foundations. Thus Dominic lived to see his order successful; and twelve years after his death (1233) he was himself canonized by his friend Gregory IX.

Many external circumstances were favorable to the prosperity and rapid growth of the order after it first got started. Mendicant and predicant monks cannot live in a desert. The large city is their natural "environment;" and city-life entered just at this time upon a period of brilliant development. Other orders, for instance the Cistercians, saw their opportunity, and moved into the city; but none found it so easy to strike root there as the Dominicans. The most miserable hut was good enough for them: the next day they began begging and preaching. Their poverty, however, soon became a mere simulation. In 1425 Martin V. recalled the prohibition to possess real estate or other property. Donations and bequests poured in upon the order. It built monasteries and churches; and art is indebted to it for some of the finest specimens of Gothic architecture. Still greater was the influence which it exercised on science. In 1228 the teachers of the University of Paris left the city on account of some squabbles with Queen Blanca, and retired with their pupils, partly to Rheims, partly to Angers. A chair was then established for a Dominican monk, and in 1230 another was added. Thus the mendicant orders got a foothold in the universities (for the Franciscans soon followed); and not only did they vindicate their place in the teeth of a most vehement opposition, but they finally usurped the whole space, and became the means by which the Church succeeded in crushing all free science. Scholasticism is not simply a scientific form which the Dominicans found ready-made, and were compelled to adopt: in its latest, most elaborate, but also narrowest and most unnatural phase, it is a production of the Dominicans themselves; and during its reign the history of theology, philosophy, science, was hardly more than a rivalry between the Dominicans and the Franciscans. The controversy between Thomists and Scotists—the controversy concerning the exemption of Mary from hereditary sin—began and ended in this rivalry. The Dominicans were victorious; and many great and good men they produced,—Albertus Magnus, Thomas Aquinas, Meister Eckart, Johann Tauler, Heinrich Suso, Savonarola, Las Casas, Vincent Ferrer, and Vincent of Beauvais. They have given the Church more than eight hundred bishops, a hundred and fifty archbishops, sixty cardinals, and four popes. But they gradually degenerated. At the beginning of the Reformation they held supreme sway over theological science; but they were shockingly ignorant, and by their activity as dealers in indulgences they actually prostituted the Church. Still worse: they lacked the power of regeneration, such as the Franciscans proved themselves possessed of, by the formation of reformed congregations; and the end of their long labors through six centuries was a severe rebuke by the head of the Church, when, on Dec. 8, 1854, Pius IX. promulgated the dogma of the immaculate conception of the Virgin,—a dogma they had always opposed.

DOMITIAN, Roman emperor 81-96; is commonly spoken of as having originated the second great persecution of the Christians. The whole affair amounts to this: first, under Vespasian and Titus a tax was levied upon the Jews for Jupiter Capitolinus; and Suetonius tells us (Domit., 12), that, under Domitian, this tax was extended also to such as lived after the manner of the Jews without acknowledging themselves to be Jews, or such as concealed their race and religion. Second, during the reign of Domitian the accusation of atheism is first heard of; and instances of condemnation on account of this crime are mentioned without any special statement, however, that the victims were Christians; only Dio Cassius says (67, 14) that all who were converted to Judaism were accused of atheism. Finally, we are told by Eusebius, that, during the reign of Domitian, many Christians suffered martyrdom. It is in the light of these facts that Tertullian's report (Apolog., 5) must be read, of Domitian's attempt to persecute the Christians, and of his later abandonment of the plan. The investigations which the emperor made concerning the descendants of David (Euseb., III. 12 and 20) had a merely political object. As he was told that those people were politically dangerous, he summoned two of them to his presence, and questioned them about Christ and his kingdom. But when they answered that the kingdom of Christ was not of this world, and should not begin until the world had perished, he sent them away with contempt. See FR. OVERBECK: Studien zur Geschichte d. alten Kirche, Schloss-Chemnitz, 1875, 1, 93; AUBÉ: Histoire des persecutions de l'Eglise jusqu'à la fin des Antonins, Paris, 1875; [KEIM: *Rom. u. d. DOMITILLA, according to Suetonius (Domitian, 18) and Dio Cassius (67, 14) a niece of the Emperor Domitian, married to her cousin, the Consul Flavius Clemens, and banished to the Island of Pandateria where her husband was decapitated on the charge of atheism or Judaizing; according to the Acts of Martyrdom of Nereus and Achilleus (May 12) and Eusebius, quoting from a contemporary Pagan chronicler, Brutius, she was a niece of the consul Flavius Clemens, and banished to the Island of Pontius. Whether there were two Domitillas, or only one, and how, in the latter case, the two reports are to be reconciled, is still an open question. The Acts of Martyrdom of Nereus and Achilleus are undoubtedly a spurious fabrication; but the monuments of the catacombs, from the so-called Camiterium Domitilla, prove that they have a historical kernel. DONALDSON, John William, b. 1812; d. in London, Feb. 10, 1861. He was graduated at Cambridge, won eminence as a classical scholar; wrote The New Cratylus (1839), and Varronianus (1844). His Jasher, or Fragments of Original Hebrew Songs inserted in the Masoretic Text of the Old Testament (1854), which was written in Latin, and attempts to "reconstitute the lost book of Jasher from the remains of old songs and historical records, which, according to the author, are incorporated in the existing text of the Old Testament," raised a great storm. He showed very plainly his latitudinarian principles, characteristic recklessness of statement, and lack of judgment. At the same time the book is very learned, and contains much valuable information. Of all the criticisms of it, that by Perowne is the best. See the article on Jasher, in Smith's Dictionary of the Bible.

DONATI. See MONASTICISM.

DONATION OF CONSTANTINE, an alleged imperial edict by which Constantine the Great is said to have bestowed Rome and Italy as a gift on the papal see in 324. The document, which exists both in a Greek and Latin text, was not produced, however, until the middle of the eighth century, in a letter from Pope Adrian I. to Charlemagne; but from that time it was firmly believed in until Laurentius Valla exposed the fraud.

Danté (Inferno, XIX. 112-118) alludes to the fiction, believing the fact, but deploring the effect, in the famous lines:—

"Ah, Constantine! of how much ill the cause,
Not thy conversion, but those rich domains
That the first wealthy Pope received of thee!"

See MÜNCH: Ueber die erdichtete Schenkung Constantin des Grossen, Freiburg, 1824; MACK: De Donatione a C. M. sedi Apost. oblata, Munich, 1861.

DONATISTS. As a direct result of the persecution of Diocletian, there arose among the Christians a great enthusiasm for sufferings, and even for death, for the sake of the faith. They were demanded to surrender their sacred books; but not only did many refuse to comply with this demand, but some even stepped forward purposely, and boasted that they had the books, and could by no means be forced to give them up. The name of a traditor, that is, one who has surrendered his Bible, became extremely odious. Mensurius, Bishop of Carthage, openly opposed the fanaticism of the voluntary martyrs and the extravagant reverence shown to confessors. He sent his archdeacon, Cæcilianus, into the prisons where the confessors sat, and had the crowds which gathered there in enthusiastic devotion dispersed by force. But thereby the fanatics became only so much the more excited, and it was to be expected that they would seize upon the first opportunity to avenge themselves. In 305 a synod was convened at Circa; but, before the synod was opened, the primate of Numidia, Bishop Secundus of Tigisis, proposed that an investigation should be made, whether there were any traditores among the assembled. The result of the investigation was, that nearly every one of the bishops present was proved guilty of the crime, in some form or other. Suspicion fell even upon Secundus himself. He was consequently compelled to drop the investigation; but he, nevertheless, saw fit to assume the attitude of a guardian of the discipline of the Church, and, when he heard of the troubles which had occurred in Carthage, he sent a warning to Mensurius and Cæcilianus. Mensurius died 311, and, according to the common course of affairs, the archdeacon succeeded the bishop; and, as Cæcilianus was known to hold the same views as Mensurius, the moderates hastened to elect him, without awaiting the arrival of the Numidian bishops, and without inviting the primate, Secundus of Tigisis, to perform the consecration. The Numidian bishops felt much offended at the slight shown to them, and allied themselves with the rigorists. Secundus convened a synod, and summoned Cæcilianus to defend himself. As Cæcilianus did not appear before the synod, he was deposed and excommunicated, and Majorinus was elected in his stead. When Majorinus died (in 313), Donatus, called the Great, became his successor.

Thus the schism originated in the Church of Carthage. There were two bishops and two congregations. From the capital it spread through the whole province. A majority of the country people, and a considerable number of bishops, declared in favor of Donatus. Outside of Africa, however, Cæcilianus was generally recognized as the legitimate bishop; and the opposite party (the pars Majorini, afterwards the pars Donati, the Donatiani, or Donatistæ) were considered as schismatics who had separated from the true Catholic Church. In an edict of 313 Constantine the Great promised the Church of Africa his protection; but the Donatists were expressly excluded from the imperial favor. They immediately addressed themselves to the emperor, and begged him to examine their complaints against Cæcilianus. He consented, and appointed a committee of five bishops from Gaul, with Melchiades, Bishop of Rome, at its head. The committee summoned Cæcilianus, and ten African bishops of each party, to its presence. Donatus of Casæ Nigræ was the spokesman of the Donatists; but, in spite of all his exertions, Cæcilianus was acquitted, and Donatus was deposed. The other Donatist bishops were allowed to retain their office and dignity, on the condition that they returned to the Catholic Church. But the condemned would not submit. They complained to the emperor of the partiality of the verdict, and begged that some juridically educated persons might be sent to Africa, to hear witnesses, and gather evidence, and the case be laid before a synod of bishops. Their request was granted, and imperial commissioners appeared in Carthage. But the commissioners decided in favor of Cæcilianus. The Donatists became extremely excited on account of this verdict, and in an unfortunate moment they appealed directly to the emperor. Constantine was astonished and disgusted, that he, a Pagan, was asked to decide upon the internal affairs of the Christian Church; but he accepted, nevertheless, the appeal, summoned Cæcilianus and his accusers to Milan (316), and condemned the latter as guilty of calumny. All further resistance now became a crime against the imperial majesty; but the Donatists, nevertheless, refused to submit. Constantine preferred, however, to ignore the whole affair; and, although no less than two hundred and seventy Donatist bishops were present at a synod held in 330, the policy adopted by the emperor would probably have proved the best way of healing the schism.

Constans, however, did not continue his father's policy, and the severity with which he treated the Donatists immediately produced very strange effects. Africa suffered at that time much from a vicious kind of ascetics, — the so-called Circumcelliones. An affiliation took place between these Circumcelliones and the lower elements of the Donatist party; and the result was a complete uproar, which, however, was speedily suppressed by Taurinus (345). At this time Cæcilianus died, and an opportunity presented itself of healing the schism by recognizing the Donatist bishop. But the Donatists had made themselves so despised and hated, that a compromise was impossible. Gratus succeeded Cæcilianus as Catholic bishop, and the schism continued. Soon a new uproar broke out. As most of the Donatists belonged to the poor class, and many were completely destitute, Constans sent (in 348) Paul and Macarius to Africa to try to reconcile them by means of a liberal support. But Donatus the Great declared with vehemence against this attempt of seduction; and Donatus of Bagai met the negotiators at the head of a swarm of armed Circumcelliones. The commotion, however, was speedily suppressed. Donatus of Bagai was decapitated, Donatus the Great was banished, and the Donatist churches were closed. A complete change took place in the condition of the party when Julian ascended the throne. It was his policy to fight the Catholic Church by means of heretics and schismatics. The Donatists were immediately allowed to use their churches, and their banished bishops returned. Donatus the Great had died; but Julian appointed Parmenianus his successor, and established him in Carthage by means of force. The Donatists had for a short time the power, and they did not use it sparingly. But Valentinian I. and Gratian issued again very severe laws against them (373 and 375).

Meanwhile the inner decay of the sect had begun. One of its most prominent members, Tychonius, distinguished for his great learning, and appreciated as the author of the Regulas septem ad investigandum intelligentiam Sacrarum Scripturarum, rejected the Novatian views held by most Donatists, and objected to the ostentatious exclusiveness of the party. Such milder and more moderate views found many adherents; and Primiarius, the successor of Parmenianus, belonged to the moderate side of the sect, and came soon in conflict with the extremists, at whose head stood the deacon Maximianus. The conflict was very bitter; and, when he ventured to excommunicate Maximianus, the extremists convened a synod (393), deposed him, and elected Maximianus bishop in his stead. Thus there were three bishops in Carthage; and, just as the sect in this way was gliding down into a state of dissolution, it encountered its most decided and most powerful adversary, Augustine. After writing several books against the sect, as it would seem, without any great effect, Augustine himself consented to an appeal to force, referring to Luke xiv. 23. A synod of Carthage (405) petitioned the Emperor Honorius to issue penal laws against the Donatists. The petition was granted: laymen should be fined, clergymen banished, and the churches closed. But Honorius could not afford to make any more enemies than those he already had, and in 409 he issued an edict of toleration; but this edict raised such a storm in the Catholic Church, that it had to be immediately repealed. A disputation was then arranged in Carthage (411), Collatio cum Donatistis. Two hundred and eighty-six Catholic and two hundred and seventy-nine Donatist bishops were present: Augustine and Aurelius were the speakers of the former; Primiarius and Patilianus, those of the latter. For three days the debate lasted, but no result was arrived at. Finally the imperial commissioner declared the Donatists vanquished, and very severe measures were decided upon against them. In 414 they lost all civil rights; in 415 they were forbidden to assemble for worshipping, under penalty of death. Nevertheless, they had not become extinct, when, in the seventh century, the Saracens occupied the country, and destroyed the African Church.

DONATIVE is a benefice conferred on a person by the founder or patron, without either presentation, institution, or induction by the ordinary: resignation therefore is to the patron.

DONATUS VESONTIENSIS, the only son of Duke Waldelenus; was educated in the Monastery of Luxenil (Luzovium) by St. Columban, and was in 624 elected bishop of his native city, Besançon (Vesontio). There he founded a nunnery, Jussanum, and wrote for it a statute-book in seventy-seven chapters, which on account of its minute prescripts forms an interesting historical document. When the abbess said grace at the table, and a nun forgot to answer "Amen," she was served with six strokes of a whip: when a nun forgot to have herself blessed before walking outside the cloister wall, she was punished with twelve strokes, etc. See HOLSTENIUS: Codex Regularum monast. et canonic., I. p. 375.

DONNE, John, D.D., divine and poet, son of a merchant; b. in London, 1573; d. March 31, 1631. He was educated at Oxford and Cambridge, but did not take a degree. In 1592 he renounced the Roman-Catholic faith, and subsequently wrote two polemical treatises against it, — Pseudo-Martyr (1610), and Ignatius his Conclave (1611). He followed civil pursuits, until, induced thereto by James I., who had read the Pseudo-Martyr, he took orders (in 1614), a step to which he had been urged seven years before by Dr. Morton, afterwards Bishop of Durham. He was immediately appointed royal chaplain, in 1620 Dean of St. Paul's, and in 1630 preached his last sermon, which was afterwards published under the title, Death's Duel. He is buried in St. Paul's Cathedral. Donne's poetical works were excessively admired by his own generation, praised by Dryden, and paraphrased by Pope. His published sermons are marked by metaphysical insight and poetical imagery.

DONNELL, Robert, one of the early leaders in the Cumberland Presbyterian Church; b. in Guilford County, North Carolina, April, 1784; d. at Athens, Ala., May 24, 1854. His parents early moved to Tennessee. Under a deep conviction of the urgent need of more ministers, he offered himself in 1806 to the so-called "Council" of the Cumberland Presbytery, who encouraged him to exercise his gifts as a catechist and exhorter. He preached independently of ecclesiastical connection, and for the most part in Alabama, until 1811, when he placed himself under the care of the newly organized Cumberland Presbytery. From that time on he labored incessantly, in Tennessee, Alabama, and Western Pennsylvania, organizing many churches, and winning the position of a leader in his denomination. He preached the opening sermon at the First General Assembly of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church. He is the author of Thoughts on Various Subjects, last ed., Nashville, 1880.

DONNELLAN LECTURE, The, was founded by the provost and senior fellows of Trinity College, Dublin, with a legacy of twelve hundred and forty-three pounds, left by Mrs. Anne Donnellan, dated Feb. 22, 1794, "for the encouragement of religion, learning, and good manners." The lecturer is elected on the 20th of each November, and delivers six sermons upon such topic as the board may designate. Perhaps the best known volumes thus produced are GRAVES, Lectures on the Pentateuch, London, 1807, 2 vols., and DAUNT, The Person and Offices of the Holy Spirit, London, 1879.

DONOSO-CORTES, Juan (Marquis de Valdegamas), b. May 9, 1809, at Valle de la Serena, in Estremadura; d. in Paris, May 3, 1853; studied law in Seville; settled in Madrid in 1830, and engaged in literature and politics. In 1837 he entered the Cortes as a representative of the city of Cadiz, and took his seat as a member of the moderate-liberal section of the house. But the study of Bonald and De Maistre, and his acquaintance with the queen-mother, Marie-Christine, gradually changed his views; and in 1849 he suddenly startled his party and his country with a bitter denunciation of all liberal principles, and the demand for a dictatorship. In 1850 he was sent as ambassador to Berlin, and afterwards to Paris, where he died. In 1851 he published his Essay on Catholicism, Liberalism, and Socialism, which was immediately translated into French and German, and in 1862 also into English, by Madeleine Goddard, Philadelphia. It is an eloquent and brilliant plea for the ideas of Gregory VII. and Innocent III., against modern philosophy; and it ushered in the European re-action of the latter part of the nineteenth century. A collected edition of his works was published in Madrid by Tejado, 5 vols., 1854-55, and also at Paris, in French, by Louis Veullot, 3 vols., 3d ed., Lyon, 1876.

DONUS I., or DOMNUS, pope 676-678, is noticeable only on account of his passion for adorning the churches of Rome. — Donus II. is sometimes put down as having reigned a short time in 974, between Benedict VI. and Boniface VII.; but his whole existence depends upon an error of the copyist. See Giesebrecht, in Jahrbücher d. deutschen Reichs, 1840, vol. II., part I., p. 141.

DOOLITTLE, Justus, b. at Rutland, N. Y., June 23, 1824; d. at Clinton, N. Y., June 15, 1880. He was graduated from Hamilton College in 1846, and Auburn Seminary, 1849; from 1849 to 1869 and from 1872 to 1873 missionary in China, at Foochow, Tientsin, and Shanghai. He was the author of The Social Life of the Chinese, N. Y., 1865, 2 vols. (an exhaustive treatment for a limited district of China), and Vocabulary and Handbook of the Chinese Language, Romanized in the Mandarin Dialect, New York, 1872, 1873, 2 vols.

DOOLITTLE, Thomas, Nonconformist; b. at Kidderminster, 1630; educated at Cambridge; settled in London; ejected for nonconformity in 1662; kept a private school, and preached till his death, May 24, 1707. Among his works, which were very popular, were A Treatise concerning the Lord's Supper, 9th ed., 1675; A Call to Delaying Sinners, 1683; A Complete Body of Divinity, 1723, folio; Love to Christ Necessary to Escape the Curse at His Coming, reprinted 1830.

DORA, Sister (Dorothy Wyndlow Pattison), b. at Hauxwell, Yorkshire, Jan. 16, 1832; d. at Walsall, South Staffordshire, Tuesday, Dec. 24, 1878. Her father was rector of Hauxwell, and a man of means; yet she voluntarily left her position in society, and in 1864, after three years of village school-teaching, joined the Church of England "Sisterhood of the Good Samaritans." In 1865 she was sent to the Cottage Hospital at Walsall, then under the charge of the sisterhood. She quickly developed that marvellous capacity both for nursing and general management which made her so famous. In Walsall she labored until 1876, and only left off to die. Her life there was a practical embodiment of the spirit of Christ. Her biography is more thrilling than a novel, and yet the changes of her life were few. By unwavering courage and unflinching devotion she won the respect of all, and was recognized as the friend of every patient in the wards, and of every poor body in the town. She was one of the noblest of women. Like her Master, she went about doing good. The anecdote told of one of the railroad employees reveals the regard in which she was held. He was asked why he thought her monument ought take the form of a statue; and he said, "Why, nobody knows better than I do that we sha'n't forget her, no danger of that; but I want her to be there, so that when strangers come to the place, and see her standing up, they shall ask us, 'Who's that?' and then we shall say, 'Who's that?' — 'Why, that's our Sister Dora.'"

In the exercise of her profession she had the unquestionable advantages of good birth, liberal education, excellent health, fine personal appearance, abundant animal spirits, great natural shrewdness and tact. Walsall is a manufacturing town, and accidents are constantly occurring. Sister Dora became a skilful surgeon as well as nurse. But the secret of her influence was, after all, her religion. She was not content to heal the body simply: she aimed to touch the heart, to convert the soul; and to many she was thus, in a spiritual as well as a physical sense, a savior. See MARGARET LONSDALE: Sister Dora, London, 1880 (22d ed., 1881), reprinted, Boston, 1880.

DORCAS SOCIETY. The name comes from the good friend of the poor mentioned in Acts ix. 36, and fitly describes its work, which is to provide the poor with clothing, or else with materials to make up. Such societies are common in connection with churches, and afford Christian women useful employment. Dorcas is the Greek equivalent of Tabitha, an Aramaic form of the Hebrew word which means "gazelle," and was a favorite name for women among Hebrews and Greeks, because the gazelle was considered to be the standard of beauty. Dorcas must have been comparatively rich, and was probably of some rank. Peter restored her to life after she had been some time dead.

DOROTHEA, a virgin martyred at Cæsarea, Cappadocia, probably during the persecution of Diocletian, and celebrated by the Roman Church on Feb. 6. See Act. Sanct. Febr. I., p. 771. Different from this Dorothea is the Prussian Dorothea, who, after reaching the forty-fourth year of her age, and having borne nine children, determined to devote herself to an ascetic life (1394), and took up her abode in a cell near the cathedral of Marienwerder, where she lived according to a rule which she pretended to have received from the Lord himself. After her death (1404) many miracles took place at her grave; and the grand-master of the Teutonic knights applied to Boniface IX. for her canonization. But, when the investigation began, it was learned that in a vision Dorothea had seen one of the former grand-masters in hell, and had predicted the downfall of the order; after which the proceedings were stopped. The people, however, continued to reverence Dorothea as the patron-saint of Prussia. See S. TH. CHR. LILIENTHAL: Historia Beatæ Dorotheæ, Danzig, 1744.

DOROTHEUS, Bishop of Martianopolis in Mæsia, and a zealous Nestorian, joined, at the Council of Ephesus (431), the party opposite to Cyril, and pronounced Cyril's excommunication. Shortly after he was excommunicated himself; and when his congregation refused to accept his successor, he was banished to Cæsarea in Cappadocia. He left some letters which are found in the Synodicon, Nos. 78, 115, and 137, and in BALUZE: Concil. N. Coll.

DORT, Synod of, the largest and [next to the Westminster Assembly] the most imposing synod ever held within the bounds of the Reformed churches, was convened by the States-General at Dort (Dordrecht), Nov. 13, 1618, and adjourned May 9, 1619. The Arminians, or Remonstrants, after the death of Arminius (1609), had at their head Simon Episcopius, professor at Leyden, and included among their number John of Barneveld (Advocate-General of Holland) and the learned scholar and statesman Hugo Grotius. At the head of the Calvinists, or Counter-Remonstrants, stood the stadtholder Prince Maurice of Orange. In 1609 Barneveld and Grotius, against the wishes of Maurice, concluded a twelve-years' truce with Spain. This brought upon them, and, by consequence, upon the Remonstrants, the charge of disloyalty by the adherents of Maurice. The conviction soon spread that the party which had endangered the nation should be condemned by a common act of all the states. This led to the thought of an orthodox national synod; and the interest excited by the general subject was so great, that everywhere large meetings were held to discuss it.

In November, 1617, the States-General passed an act convoking a synod at Dort to settle religious issues. The synod was designed to be a national assembly. The Reformed churches of other lands (with the single exception of Anhalt) were requested to send delegates; but it was particularly stated in the invitation that their presence and counsels were desired in order that a more cautious conclusion concerning the controversies prevalent in the Church of the Netherlands might be arrived at. Twenty-eight delegates in all came from Germany, the Palatinate, Switzerland, and England. The four delegates selected by the National Synod of France were forbidden being present by the king. The English commissioners (chosen by James I.) were Carleton, Bishop of Llandaff; Davenant, afterwards Bishop of Salisbury; Samuel Ward, professor at Cambridge; Joseph Hall, afterwards Bishop of Exeter and Norwich; and Walter Balcanquhall, a Scotchman, and chaplain to the king. Among the Dutch delegates were thirty-one ministers, five professors, and twenty elders. There were also eighteen commissioners appointed by the States-General. All of the delegates from the Netherlands belonged to the Calvinistic party, the three Remonstrants regularly elected from Utrecht being denied seats.

The synod convened Nov. 13, 1618, and, after listening to a sermon in the Great Church of Dort, chose at its second sitting John Bogermann, a pastor at Leeuwarden, its president. The Remonstrants were treated from the first as an accused party; and at the fourth sitting Episcopius and twelve other Remonstrants were summoned to appear at the expiration of fourteen days before the synod, and defend their doctrines. In the interval a committee was appointed to prepare a new translation of the Bible, whose labors subsequently gave birth to one of the most accurate versions in any language. The question of the administration of baptism to the children of heathen parents in India was also discussed.

At the twenty-second session, the thirteen Remonstrants appeared before the synod. Episcopius, who managed the defence, spoke with much eloquence, but gave offence by his confidence and boldness of statement. He declared the synod to be a schismatical assembly. His judges reprimanded him for his temerity; and after he had given the Remonstrant construction of the five articles, or "knotty points," of Calvinism, a protracted discussion took place, which was brought to a close at the fifty-seventh session (Jan. 14, 1619), the Remonstrants being excluded from the floor. This done, the synod occupied itself with the preparation of articles refuting Remonstrant tenets and the definition of the five articles, until, at the hundred and thirty-sixth session (April 23, 1619), the "Canons of Dort," teaching strict views of predestination, were passed. The delegates, however, from England, Hesse, Nassau, and Bremen, had argued persistently in favor of recognizing a conditional universalism; that is, the divine intention and sincere offer of salvation to all men. The synod then unanimously, with the exception of the delegates from Hesse and England, voted the sentence upon the Remonstrants of ecclesiastical rebels and offenders, and that as such they were to be excluded by the synods and classes from their ecclesiastical places. Before adjournment, the Heidelberg Catechism and the Belgic Confession were indorsed. In the hundred and forty-fourth session the synod repaired to the Great Church, where the canons and the sentence were read in Latin to an overflowing audience. The next session, the hundred and forty-fifth (May 9, 1619), was its last.

The canons of the Synod of Dort are infralapasarian, and do not express the deepest and ultimate conclusion of the Calvinistic system, which is proved by the opposition of Gomarus, professor at Leyden, a supralapsarian Calvinist. The synod ignored the spirit of union embodied in the Second Helvetic Confession, just as in Germany the Formula of Concord had done in effacing the impress of Melancthon, and incorporated the old predestinarianism into its canons.

DOSITHEUS, a false Messiah among the Samaritans, and founder of a religious sect, on a line with Simon Magus and Menander. Very little is known of him; and the uncertainty of the reports is increased by his being confounded with an older Dositheus, the teacher of Zadok, who founded the sect of the Saduceeans. His appearance was probably contemporary with that of Christ, or perhaps a little later. In those days of great religious excitement among the Samaritans, he presented himself as the prophet promised in Deut. xviii. 18; which passage, according to Samaritan doctrine, is the only true Messianic prophecy ever given (ORIGEN: Contra Celsum, I. p. 44; VI. p. 282, ed. Spencer; EPIPH.: Hæres, I. 13). The most prominent feature of his doctrines was the severe stress he laid upon the precepts of the law, especially concerning the sabbath. The number of his followers was probably never great; but the sect lived on, nevertheless, down into the sixth century. Theophilus, a Persian, wrote against them in the fourth century (ASSEM.: Bibl. Orient., I. 42); and in 588 the Samaritans and Dositheans disputed in Egypt about Deut. xviii. 18 (PHOTIUS: Biblioth. Cod., 230). [Cf. SMITH AND WACE: Dict. Chr. Biog., s.v.]

DOUAI, or DOUAY, a town of France, in the department of Le Nord, on the Scarpe; grew gradually during the middle ages into a place of some commercial and industrial importance under the sway of the counts of Flanders; passed afterwards into the possession of the dukes of Burgundy; fell then as an inheritance to the crown of Spain, and was in 1667 conquered by France. In 1568 William Allan founded there a college, or "seminaire," for the education of Roman-Catholic priests destined for the English mission. Though supported only by private subscription, it flourished. In a short time it had a hundred and fifty scholars and ten professors. But it made the town the headquarters of the Roman-Catholic Englishmen living on the Continent, and the hot-bed of all their intrigues. Campian and his colleagues, Sherwin and Briant, came from Douay. This gave rise to great disturbances; and, after a Huguenot riot, the college was compelled to move (1578), but found an asylum at Rheims, under the protection of the Duke of Guise. In 1593, however, the college returned to Douay; and in 1602 the Old Testament of the so-called Douay Bible was issued there. See T. F. KNOX: The First and Second Diaries of the English College, Douai, and an Appendix of Unpublished Documents. With an Historical Introduction, London, 1878. On the Douay version, see ENGLISH BIBLE VERSIONS.

DOVE. More than fifty times this bird is mentioned in the Bible; and it is the only one that could be offered in sacrifice, and was usually selected for that purpose by the less wealthy (Lev. v. 7, xii. 6; Luke ii. 24); and, to supply the demand for it, dealers in this kind of birds sat about the precincts of the temple (Matt. xxi. 12, etc.). The raising of doves was from an early day a pursuit peculiar to the Jews (Isa. lx. 8); although there were also many wild doves in Palestine (Ezek. vii. 16), which built their nests in clefts of the rocks (Jer. xlvi. 28; Cant. ii. 14), or at least sought a refuge there when chased (Ps. xi. 1). The flight of the dove was employed by the poet as a figure of swiftness (Ps. lv. 6; Hos. xi. 11; Isa. lx. 8). In songs of love, the eyes of the beloved, as expressive of attachment and of innocence, are compared with those of the dove (Cant. i. 15, iv. 1). The voice of the dove is represented by the poets as a sigh, as an expression of sorrow (Isa. xxxviii. 14, lix. 11; Nah. ii. 7). To the white and glimmering plumage reference is made in Ps. lxxviii. 13. The dove was the harbinger of reconciliation with God (Gen. viii. 8, 10 sqq.), and is frequently mentioned as the emblem of purity and innocence (Matt. x. 16). In Christian art the dove is employed as the emblem of the Holy Ghost (cf. John i. 32). B. PICK.

DOW, Lorenzo, an eccentric Methodist preacher; b. at Coventry, Conn., Oct. 16, 1777; d. at Georgetown, D.C., Feb. 2, 1834. He began itinerating in 1798, but was dropped by his conference shortly after, and never joined any other, although in doctrine and practice he was a Methodist. He travelled and preached through England and Ireland, as well as through the United States, and introduced camp-meetings into England. His eccentricity showed itself in dress and manners; but, although he was in consequence called "crazy Dow," his fearless earnestness and native eloquence won him listeners and converts. He was a voluminous writer. See Dealings of God, Man, and the Devil, as Exemplified in the Life of L. Dow, with his Writings, N. Y., 1854, new ed., 1875; PECK: Early Methodism, N. Y., 1860.

DOWLING, John, b. in Sussex, Eng., May 12, 1807; d. in New York, July 4, 1878. He is best known by his History of Romanism, N. Y., 1845, of which a revised edition appeared in 1871. He was pastor of the Berean Baptist Church in New York city for many years.

DOXOLOGY (δοξολογία, glorificatio, gloria). There are a greater and a minor doxology. The former—Doxologia major, Gloria in excelsis, Hym- nus Angelicus—consisted originally only of the few words communicated in Luke ii. 14, Gloria in excelsis Deo et in terra pax hominibus bonæ voluntatis. Early, however, an addition was made, first in the Greek Church, and then in the Latin, probably due to Hilary, Bishop of Poitiers, who died 366; and in the fifth century the Doxologia major read thus: "Glory to God on high, and on earth peace to men of [his] good will. We praise Thee, we bless Thee, we worship Thee, we glorify Thee, we give thanks to Thee for Thy great glory. O Lord God, heavenly King, God the Father Almighty; O Lord, the only-begotten Son, Jesus Christ; O Lord God, Lamb of God, Son of the Father, that takest away the sins of the world, have mercy upon us; Thou that takest away the sins of the world, receive our prayer; Thou that sittest at the right hand of the Father, have mercy upon us; For Thou alone art holy, Thou only, Jesus Christ, with the Holy Ghost, art most high in the glory of God the Father. Amen." [Gloria in excelsis Deo et in terra pax hominibus bonæ voluntatis. Laudamus te, benedicimus te, adoramus te, glorificamus te, gratias agimus tibi propter magnam gloriam tuam. Domine Deus, rex cælestis, Deus Pater omnipotens; Domine, Fili unigenite, Jesu Christe; Domine Deus, agnus Dei, Filius Patris, qui tollis peccata mundi, miserere nobis; Qui tollis peccata mundi, suscipe deprecationem nostram; Qui sedes ad dextram Patris, miserere nobis; Quoniam tu solus sanctus, tu solus Dominus, tu solus latissimus, Jesu Christe, cum Sancto Spiritu in gloria Dei Patris. Amen.] Considerable opposition was made to this addition, but suppressed by the fourth Council of Toledo, 633. Down to the twelfth century the Doxologia major was used only by the bishops, and by the priests only at Easter. In older times it seems to have been used principally at Christmas. In the Lutheran Church the Gloria in excelsis was retained in its Latin form for a long time as an essential element of the divine service, and has been often thus used, even in the nineteenth century. [It is a regular part of the service in the Episcopal Church, but only in the English version.]

The Doxologia minor consisted originally of the simple formula, Gloria Patri et Filio et Spiritui Sancto in secula sæculorum, and the translation was left free, whether "Glory to the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit," or "Glory to the Father in the Son and the Holy Spirit," or "Glory to the Father through the Son in the Holy Spirit." When the Arians, however, intentionally confined themselves to the two last formulas, the Church forbade them as heretic, and an addition was made; "as it was in the beginning, is now and ever shall be, world without end" [sicut erat in principio et nunc et semper et in secula sæculorum]. At divine service the Doxologia minor was used at the end of each hymn: the priest intoned, and the choir responded.

The term "doxology," or "doxological formula," is also applied to those passages of glorification with which a prayer may end, as, for instance, in Romans xvi. 27; Eph. iii. 21; and the Lord's Prayer such as it is found in Matt. vi. 13, in the textus receptus [also to the verse or verses commonly sung either at the beginning or end of the service].

M. HEROLD.
D'OYLY, George, the commentator; b. in London, Oct. 31, 1778; d. Jan. 8, 1846. He was fellow of Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, and rector in various places. In connection with Richard Mant, afterwards Bishop of Down, he edited Notes, Explanatory and Practical, on the Authorized Version of the Bible, taken principally from the Most Eminent Writers of the United Church of England and Ireland, London, 1814, 3 vols. 4to, ed. (and improved) by Bishop Hobart, N.Y., 1818, 2 vols. 4to. The work has had a large sale, chiefly among Episcopalians.

DRABICIUS, Nicol, b. at Stradteiss, Moravia, 1585; grew up in a community of Bohemian Brethren, and from 1616 worked as an evangelical preacher, but fell out with the Protestant clergy of the neighborhood, and moved in 1629 to Lednitz in Hungary, where he lived in great poverty, engrossed by theological studies. From February, 1638, he pretended to receive divine revelations, and prophesied that the house of Austria should be overthrown in 1657, that Lewis XIV. should be made Roman emperor in 1666, that the Papacy should be abolished, and the Church reformed, etc. As his prophecies became too disagreeable to the Austrian Government, he was arrested and executed for crimen læsæ majestatis, July 17, 1671. His prophecies made some impression, however, and were published by J. A. Comenius in 1657, under the title Lux in Tenebris. In 1659 they were republished, in connection with other prophecies of the same kind, under the title Historia Revelationum, etc. There is a third edition from 1665, and with the original title. See KÖLER: Disp. de N. Drabicio, Altenburg, 1791.

DRACONITES, Johannes (properly Drach, or Trach, sometimes, also, named after his native city), b. at Karlstadt, 1494; was appointed teacher in the philosophical faculty at Erfurt, and canon of the Church of St. Severin, but declared for Luther, and went in 1523 to Wittenberg. In the same year he was chosen minister at Miltenberg, but was soon driven away by the Romanist clergy of the neighborhood, and returned in 1524 to Wittenberg. After being minister at Waltershausen for a few years, he was professor of theology at Marburg from 1534 to 1547, and at Rostock from 1551 to 1560. But there was something restless in the man's character; and in 1560 he retired to Wittenberg, where he died, April 18, 1566. He was a good Hebrew scholar, and wrote commentaries on Genesis, the Psalms, Obadiah, Daniel, etc. But his principal work is his Biblia Pentapla, which occupied him for many years, but of which only fragments have been published.

DRACONTIUS, Blossius Æmilius, a Latin poet who flourished during the reign of the younger Theodosius, in the beginning of the fifth century. He was probably a native of Spain. His great poem in heroic verse on the creation, Hexæmeron, was first published at Paris, 1560, together with the Genesis of Claudius Marius Victor, then at Paris, 1619, by Sirmond, together with the Opuscula of Eugenius of Toledo, and in a version corrected and enlarged by Eugenius, and finally at Rome, 1791, by Arevali, together with the poem De Deo, of which the Hexæmeron evidently is a fragment. This last edition is reprinted in MIGNÉ: Patrologia, LX. Some minor poems by Dracontius were published at Leipzig, 1873, by Fried. de Duhn.

DRÆESEKE, Johann Heinrich Bernhardt, b. at Brunswick, Jan. 18, 1774; d. at Potsdam, Dec. 8, 1849. He was in Bremen 1814, and since 1832 Bishop (general superintendent) of Prussian Saxony, from which position he retired in 1843. Possessed of an extraordinary power of eloquence and a very impressive personal appearance, he became one of the most celebrated pulpit orators of modern Germany, and was much admired. But he lacked that sharp decision of character and that wide range of intellect which alone are able to sustain a fame under trying circumstances. He was educated among rationalists, but he soon burst the narrow bands of their doctrines. The rich sympathy of his nature connected him with all that was great and growing in his time. In 1814 he published Predigten über Deutschland's Wiedergeburt, 3 vols., and in 1817 Das Heilige auf der Bühne. He had an interest both in politics and the theatre. Even his theology went through a considerable development. His Predigten für denkende Verehrer Jesu, 1804-12, 5 vols., represents a Pelagian and merely humanitarian stand-point; but his Vom Reich Gottes, 1830, 3 vols., shows a much deeper conception of the truths of Christianity. He was a brilliant meteor of his time,—brilliant, more light than heat,—a meteor passing away. THOLUCK.

DRAGÓN. In the apocryphal book Bel and the Dragon, mention is made of the worship of a dragon (i.e., a large serpent) at Babylon. But, as we do not read elsewhere of such a thing among the Assyrians and Babylonians, it has been rashly conjectured that this apocryphal book was written in Egypt, where we know the species of idolatry was common, and that this worship was very unhistorically introduced. But upon Babylonian inscriptions there is frequent representation of gigantic serpents, which plainly had a religious meaning; and often upon Assyrian representations of sacrifices, near the altar are two serpents bound upon staffs. Moreover, Diodorus Siculus (II. 9) says that there was a serpent in the right hand of Hera in the Temple of Bel, and that Rhea stood near two large silver serpents. In the Assyrian inscriptions one reads of the "great serpent with seven heads" (Fried. Delitzsch: Assyrische Studien, Heft I. p. 87).

The reverence of serpents was common in other Shemitic peoples, although among the Phœnicians there is no certain trace of it. Indeed, almost all peoples have called serpents "wise;" and far outside of Shemitism one finds serpent-worship. See BAUDISSIN: Die Symbolik der Schlange im Semitismus, in his Studien zur semitischen Religionsgeschichte, Leipzig, Heft I., 1876 (pp. 255-292), and art. Apokryphen des A. T., in Herzog, 2d ed., vol. i. p. 499. WOLF BAUDISSIN.

DRAM. See MONEY.

DREAMS, among the Hebrews, as universally in antiquity, were thought to be of importance, as lifters of the veil. At the same time the word is used as a symbol of total destruction, because dreams are usually totally forgotten when one awakes (Job xx. 8; Ps. lxxiii. 20; Isa. xxix. 7 sq.). We find in the Bible descriptions of dreams from the two frequent causes,—conscience and fear. Thus from the latter came the dreams of Pharaoh and his chief baker and butler (Gen. xl.); of the Midianitish soldiers (Judg. vii. 13 sq.). But these are not referred to divine agency, although the power of their interpretation is (Gen. xl. 8, xli. 16; Dan. i. 17). Of dreams from an awakened conscience we mention that of Abimelech (Gen. xx. 3) and of Laban (Gen. xxxi. 28). In general the dream corresponded to the character. Sometimes the imagination was the vehicle of revelation, in which case imagery indicated the divine will. So Joseph saw the sheaves bowing to his sheaf (Gen. xxxvii. 7), and Nebuchadrezzar the image (Dan. ii. 36 sq.).

The prophets also had dreams, which are spoken of as, like Urim, a legitimate way of finding out the future (1 Sam. xxviii. 6). The false prophets particularly depended upon them, and hence the test was given that only those prophets who encouraged the people in the worship of God were to be listened to (Deut. xiii. 1-5; Jer. xxiii. 25; Zech. x. 2). The prophetic gift was also called forth in the interpretation of dreams: so Joseph, and particularly Daniel. Josephus relates the prophetic dreams of Archelaus and his wife Glaphyra, and how the first was interpreted by Simon the Essene (Antiq., XVII. 13, 3, 4). He likewise claims to have himself received prophetic dreams (War, III. 8, 3). — [Dreams have been vehicles of divine revelation, but as such always inferior to visions. The greater number of such dreams recorded in the Bible "were granted to those who were aliens to the Jewish covenant; and, where dreams are recorded as means of God's revelation to his chosen servants, they are almost always referred to the periods of their earliest and most imperfect knowledge of him." See FRANZ DELITZSCH: A System of Bib. Psychol., Edin., 1867, 2d ed., Ger. orig., Leip., 1861.] Also art. VISIONS. L. DIESTEL (Herzog, ed. I.).

DRELINCOURT, Charles, b. at Sedan, July 10, 1595; d. in Paris, Nov. 3, 1669; was educated at Sedan and Saumur, and was pastor of the Reformed Church of Charenton, near Paris, from 1620 to his death. He was a very prolific writer; and two of his works achieved quite an extraordinary success: Consolations de l'âme fidele contre les frayeurs de la mort, which was reprinted in more than forty editions (the last of 1819), and translated into several foreign tongues. In English it appeared under the title, The Christian's Defence against the Fears of Death, and to which De Foe wrote (1705) his famous Introduction, A True Relation of the Apparition of Mrs. Veal after her Death to Mrs. Bargrave, in which the dead lady recommended Drelincourt's book. This ingenious advertisement of the book is said to have greatly helped its sale (13th ed. 1732); for, if the righteous dead approved of it, surely the living might read it with profit. Drelincourt wrote also Visites charitables, which was reprinted several times, variously in 5 or 3 or 2 vols., and translated into several languages.

DRESS OF THE HEBREWS. See CLOTHING AND ORNAMENTS AMONG THE HEBREWS.

DRESS OF THE EARLY CHRISTIANS. There never has been a particular Christian costume. The early Christians, both clergy and laity, dressed like their Pagan neighbors, and according to their station. The Epistle of James testifies to great inequality in this respect, even in the assemblies conducted by the apostles themselves. James does not blame the rich man for wearing the "fine" clothing any more than he commends the poor man for his "vile" clothing; but he does blame those who paid respect to a man in proportion to the value of his clothes. The virtues of humility and modesty conflict with extravagance in dress, and therefore the latter has always been recognized as unbecoming a Christian. Some of the exhortations savor, however, too much of asceticism. Thus CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA (close of second century) would have his hearers not only eschew ornaments, silks, all embroidered and dyed goods, particularly purple, but have the men and women dress precisely alike (Stromata, ii. 10, C. in Ante-Nicene Library, vol. i. pp. 255-263). More stringent are the demands of TERTULLIAN (d. about 245), who inveighs against either sex wearing gold, jewels, or dyed garments, or having the hair elaborately dressed, or in any way making a show. The Christian, he claims, should be modest and humble, and not only be so, but seem so. Then follows this striking passage: "Such delicacies as tend by their softness and effeminacy to unman the manliness of the faith are to be discarded. Otherwise I know not whether the wrist that has been wont to be surrounded with the palm-like bracelet will endure till it grow into the numb hardness of its own chain. I know not whether the leg that has rejoiced in the anklet will suffer itself to be squeezed into the gyve. I fear the neck beset with pearl and emerald nooses will give no room to the broadsword. . . . Go forth [to meet the angels] already arrayed in the cosmetics and ornaments of prophets and apostles, drawing your whiteness from simplicity, your ruddy hue from modesty; painting your eyes with bashfulness, and your mouth with silence; implanting in your ears the words of God; fitting on your necks the yoke of Christ" (De Cultu Feminarum, ii. 13, T. in Ante-Nicene Library, vol. i. pp. 331, 332). To the same intent, CYPRIAN, in his interesting and forcible treatise On the Dress of Virgins, earnestly counsels Christian women to lay aside all luxury in dress, all dyed fabrics, and all ornaments: "For God neither made the sheep scarlet or purple, nor taught the juices of herbs and shell-fish to dye and color wool, nor arranged necklaces with stones set in gold, and with pearls distributed in a woven series or numerous cluster, wherewith you would hide the neck which he made, that what God formed in man may be covered, and that may be seen upon it which the devil has invented" (c. 14). He is especially severe upon the use of cosmetics and paints: "The work of God, and his fashioning and formation, ought in no manner to be adulterated, either with the application of yellow color, or with black dust or rouge, or with any kind of medicament which can corrupt the native lineaments" (c. 15, Cyprian in Ante-Nicene Library, vol. i. pp. 343, 344).

Two strange freaks of the ascetic spirit were for women to cut off their hair, and to wear men's (i.e., monks') clothes (in order to show that for the saints there was no longer male or female), as was done among the Eustathians. These were condemned by the synod of Gangra (A.D. 370), in canon 13, "If any woman, under pretence of asceticism, changes her apparel, and, instead of the usual women's clothes, wears those of men, let her be accursed;" and in canon 17, "If any woman, under pretence of asceticism, cut off her hair, which God has given her as reminder of her subjection, let her be accursed" (Hefele, Conciliengeschichte, i. § 94). The frequency of the denunciations of luxury proves how common the failing was. Indeed, the Church has never been able to curb this passion.

DREW THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY. Drew Theological Seminary is one of the fruits of the century of American Methodism, which was duly commemorated in 1866. In this year Mr. Daniel Drew proposed to give two hundred and fifty thousand dollars for ministerial education. The Gibbons property, near Madison, N.J., was purchased. The spacious mansion was found eminently suitable for the work of instruction: two other buildings for the use of students, and four homes for professors, were also provided. The grounds of the seminary comprise a hundred acres of land, much of it well wooded. It was the intention of Mr. Drew to add to his original gift the sum of two hundred and fifty thousand dollars for endowment, but his financial reverses defeated his plans. Through the efforts of the then president, the Rev. Dr. J. F. Hurst, a new endowment of three hundred thousand dollars was subscribed, which is now in process of collection. The number of students is at present upwards of eighty. There are five departments of study; viz., New-Testament exegesis, Old-Testament exegesis, practical theology, systematic theology, and historical theology. The first president of the seminary was the Rev. Dr. John McClintock, who died in 1870. His immediate successors, Drs. Foster and Hurst, have been elected to the episcopal office. The present president is Rev. Dr. Henry A. Buttz, who is also professor of New-Testament exegesis. His associates in the faculty are James Strong, S.T.D., professor of Hebrew exegesis; John Miley, D.D., professor of systematic theology; George R. Crooks, D.D., professor of historical theology; Samuel F. Upham, D.D., professor of practical theology. The library contains fifteen thousand volumes. Since the year 1869 the seminary has sent out into the ministry of the Methodist-Episcopal Church two hundred and fifty-nine graduates.

GEORGE R. CROOKS.

DREY, Johann Sebastian, b. at Killingen, Oct. 16, 1777; d. at Tübingen, Feb. 19, 1853; was ordained priest in 1801, and appointed professor of catholic theology at Ellwangen in 1812, and in 1817 at Tübingen, from which position he retired in 1846. His principal work is his Christliche Apologetik, Mayence, 1838-47, 3 vols. In connection with Gratz and Hirscher he founded in 1819 the Theologische Quartalschrift, one of the ablest periodicals of the Roman-Catholic Church.

DRONTHEIM (Norwegian Trondhjem; Latin Nidarosia), the seat of the first Christian bishopric in Norway, founded in 1020. Norway belonged originally to the archiepiscopal diocese of Hauburg-Bremen, after 1104 to that of Lund, but obtained in 1152 its own metropolitan, who resided in Drontheim. The cathedral of the city, containing the shrine of the patron saint of the country, St. Olaf, was one of the largest and most magnificent church-buildings in Scandinavia; but it was never finished. In the time of the Reformation it was literally plundered. Shortly after, it was struck by lightning, and partially burnt down. Only the choir is still standing, and in repair.

DROSTE ZU VISCHERING, Clemens August, Baron von, b. at Münster, Jan. 22, 1773; d. there Oct. 19, 1845; was consecrated priest in 1798, and in 1807 elected vicar-general by the chapter of his native city. In 1813 he resigned because he was opposed to Napoleon; but after the latter's fall he again assumed his office, and administered the diocese of Münster until 1820, when he formally abdicated on account of disagreement with the Prussian Government. He retired into private life until 1835, when he was appointed Archbishop of Cologne.

Before being installed, he subscribed to the convention concluded between the government and the Roman-Catholic bishops, but did not keep it; and when his proceedings, governed by the maxim that the State is absolutely subordinate to the Church, became too arbitrary, the Prussian Government had him arrested (Nov. 20, 1837). The affair caused great excitement, mostly, though, of a literary character. About two hundred pamphlets were issued pro et contra; but a result was not arrived at. Droste was not re-installed. He was compelled to choose a co-adjutor; but the Roman priests were allowed to carry on a fanatic agitation among the people.

The writings of Droste are few, and not remarkable. The most characteristic of his standpoint are Ueber die Religionsfreiheit der Katholiken, 1817, and Ueber den Frieden unter der Kirche und den Staaten, 1843. The principal sources for the study of the whole movement are, RHEINWALD: Acta Historico-ecclesiastica, II. and III.; IRENÆUS (Gieseler): Ueber die cölnische Angelegenheit, Leipzig, 1838; Commonitorium ad archiepiscopum Coloniensem, Lyons, 1837; GÜRRES: Athanasius, 1838; K. HASE: Die beiden Erzbischöfe, Leipzig, 1839.

DROZ, François Xavier Joseph, b. at Besançon, Oct. 31, 1773; d. in Paris, Nov. 5, 1850; studied law in Paris; served three years in the army of the Rhine; was appointed teacher in the Ecole Centrale of his native city, and settled in 1803 in Paris, where he devoted himself exclusively to literature. His Essai sur l'art d'être heureux, Paris, 1806, is the production of an outspoken sceptic of the epicurean description. His Pensées sur le Christianisme, Paris, 1842, contains many deep and sincere conceptions of Christian truths, though strongly tainted with Romanism. His principal works, however, are De la philosophie morale, Paris, 1823, and Histoire de Louis XVI., Paris, 1838-42, 3 vols.

DRUIDISM is the general designation of the religion of the old Celtic race. The derivation of the name is uncertain, — from the Greek δρυς "an oak;" or from the Celtic deru, "an oak," and udd, "lord;" or from the Celtic de, "god," and rouyd, "speaker," etc. Nor is our knowledge of the doctrinal system and hierarchical organization of Druidism any more certain, gathered as it is from stray notices by Latin and Greek writers, beginning with Cæsar, and from some few reininiscences in old Irish songs. The Druids performed various functions in Celtic society. They were the teachers and poets, the prophets and sorcerers, the judges and priests, of the people. According to function they were divided into classes, — bards, vates, and druids proper, of which the last class ranked first. The dark oak-groves were their temples; and there reigned not only mystical wisdom, but also abominable savagery. Human sacrifices were offered up with peculiar cruelty. Of an equally mixed character was their doctrinal system: it was based upon faith in one supreme being. But this monotheism of an Oriental description was singularly blended with wild polytheism and stupid superstition, belief in Hesus, Tentates, the misteltoe, the snake-egg, etc. The conflict between Druidism and Christianity seems to have been long and very severe, but very little is known with certainty about the matter.

DRUSES. Occupying the western slope of the Lebanon and the whole Antilebanon, from Beyrout in the north to Sur or Tyre in the south, and from the Mediterranean in the west to Damascus in the east, there lives under Turkish supremacy, but enjoying a considerable measure of political freedom, a peculiar people, the Druses, whose religion is as mysterious and perplexing as is their ethnography. The name Druse, or more properly Durus, is probably derived from Darasi, the founder, or one of the founders, of their religion; but they themselves derive it from an Arab verb (darisa), to which they ascribe various fanciful meanings. Referring to their religion, they call themselves Muwahhidun ("Unitarians"), and their creed Tauhid ("Unitarianism"). They have also some settlements east of Palestine, in the Hauran (the Auranitis of Greek writers), and at Safed in Palestine Proper; and they number about seventy thousand men, not reckoning women and children. A number of Crypto-Druses (that is, Druses according to religion, but not according to descent) are said to live in the neighborhood of Cairo, where their religion first originated. The Druses proper, the mountaineers of the Lebanon and Antilebanon, are probably, like the Maronites with whom they live in close contact, descendants of the old Syrians. The report that they descend from a French colony settled in the Lebanon during the crusade by a certain Count Dreux, is a mere fiction.

The creed of the Druses is a child of Mohammedanism; but in some of its fundamental and most characteristic tenets it completely repudiates the very spirit and essence of the mother-creed, and approaches Christianity. Its origin must be sought for among the Shiites, the great antagonists of the Sunnites, and more especially among the Batiniya, or Batenians, one of the most radical sects of the Shiites. The Batiniya interpret the Koran on the principle that every exterior must have a corresponding interior; that, consequently, every passage of the Koran must have behind its plain grammatical sense a deeper, occult, allegorical meaning. This principle was by one group of the Batiniya (the Karamita, or Karamatians) actually used as a means to destroy all faith in a divine revelation, and led finally to absolute materialism and atheism. The further step taken by the Druses, and which brought them not only out of Mohammedanism, but in conflict with it, was their doctrine of incarnation. There is no god but God, they say with the Mohammedans, and he is unknowable to man: senses cannot grasp him, words not define him. But he has revealed himself to man, they add, by taking upon himself the form of man, by incarnation (an idea which to a Mohammedan is utter abomination); and the last of these incarnations which has taken place, and ever will take place, is that of Hakim Biamrillahi (caliph from 1019 to 1044), the sixth of the Fatimides. In 1040 he first claimed publicly, in the mosque of Cairo, to be the incarnated God; and with that year begins the era of the Druses.

Hakim, who on his accession to the throne assumed the surname of Biamrillahi (that is, he who judges by the command of God), was a cruel and half-crazy tyrant, yielding without restraint to the freaks of a diseased mind, an object of terror and scorn to his own people. During the twenty-five years of his reign he succeeded in killing about eighteen thousand men. He hated the Christians and the Jews, and ordered them to be marked off, so as not to be mistaken for Mohammedans: the Christians with blue clothes, the Jews with black; the Christians with a cross three feet long, and weighing five pounds; the Jews with a heavy wooden club, etc. About thirty thousand Christian churches and monasteries were destroyed in Egypt and Syria by his commands. One little trait is very characteristic of this man, who became the god of the Druses. The ladies of Cairo gave him offence by their extravagance and luxury. Suddenly he ordered, that, under penalty of death, no woman should show herself in the streets, or even look out of the doors and windows. The effect of this order was that many women who had none to take care of them died of starvation. Hakim belonged to the Batiniya, and was very anxious for the propagation of their doctrines. But he had a further purpose of his own. In 1040 his favorite, Ismael Darasi, a Persian by birth, suddenly appeared in the mosque of Cairo, and began to expound to the astonished audience that Hakim was Allah incarnated. People were very indignant. A riot ensued, and lasted for several days. Hakim dared not defend Darasi, who fled to Damascus, where he soon after began to preach his new doctrines among the mountaineers of the Lebanon. Another attempt, by Haidara Fergani, to get the divinity of Hakim recognized, failed as signally. Finally, however, Hamsa succeeded in managing the affair. He was also a Persian by birth, and lived at a mosque just outside of Cairo. But he was shrewd and cautious. He gathered disciples in a quiet way, and sent them out as missionaries. Preparations were made also in other ways. Hakim ceased to pray in the mosque, sent no presents to the Kaaba, prevented people from pilgrimizing to Mecca, etc. In spite, however, of the caution of the leaders, a new revolt broke out. Hamsa's house was plundered and torn down, and he himself was saved only with great difficulty. The uproar was finally suppressed; but the fanaticism of the orthodox had been roused to such a pitch, that shortly after (1044) Hakim was mysteriously killed.

Meanwhile Darasi had labored with great success among the Druses. His easy morals (chastity was not enjoined, drunkenness was not prohibited), and also his liberality with money, drew much people to him; but he was finally rejected by his own party. A disagreement arose between him and Hamsa, and he was assassinated. Hamsa became the real founder of the new religion, at least so far as regards its theoretical or doctrinal foundation. After his banishment from Egypt he developed a great activity as a writer. Later on, Behaeddin, or Moctana, also acquired great celebrity as an author. His books circulated from Calcutta to Constantinople. One of them was addressed to Constantine VIII.; another, to Michael the Paphlagonian. But the later history of the sect is very obscure. Professing Mohammedanism externally, the Druses kept for a long time their sacred books and their religious rites a deep secret; and it was not until the latter part of the eighteenth century that any thing certain became known about them outside of their own people. — For their wars with the Maronites, see MARONITES.

DRUSILLA, a daughter of Herod Agrippa I., and sister to Herod Agrippa II.; was first married to Azizus, King of Emesa, from whom she was divorced, and afterwards to Felix, procurator of Judæa. She was present at Cæsarea, where Paul was brought before Felix, and preached to him (Acts xxiv. 24). According to Josephus (Ant., XX. 7, 2), she perished in the eruption of Vesuvius (79 A.D.), together with her son Agrippa.

DRUSIUS, Johannes (Jan van der Driesche), b. at Oudenaarde, June 28, 1550; d. at Franeker, Feb. 12, 1616; was educated at Ghent, Louvain, and Cambridge, whither his father went when he was banished, for religious reasons, from the Netherlands, 1567. In Cambridge he studied Hebrew under Cevallier, and in 1572 he was himself made professor in Hebrew at Oxford. After the peace of Ghent (1576) he returned to his native country, and was made professor of Hebrew at Leyden in 1577, and at Franeker in 1585. It was his principle never to allow the dogmatical controversies of his time to have any influence on the result of his scientific researches; but this principle was often misunderstood. He was considered an undecided and vacillating character, and attacked from different sides. Nevertheless, by his vast learning and great ability, he drew many students from England, Germany, and Denmark to his lecture-room, and contributed much to bring the Dutch universities into a flourishing condition. His principal work is his annotations to the Old Testament, incorporated with the Critica Sacra. Detailed information of his life and writings is found in his Vita, by his son-in-law Abel Curiander, Franeker, 1616. See DIESTEL: Geschichte d. Alten Testaments in d. christlichen Kirche, Jena, 1869, pp. 317–555. E. BERTHEAU.

DRUTHMAR, Christian, a learned monk in the first half of the ninth century; was b. in Aquitania, and taught, first in Corbie, and afterwards in Stablo, in the diocese of Liège. In Stablo he wrote a commentary on the Gospel of St. Matthew, distinguished for its clearness, and remarkable on account of the emphasis it lays upon the historical sense as that which must be studied first, and never be lost sight of. This commentary was published by Secer, Hagenau, 1530; and Secer's text was incorporated with the Bibl. Patr., Cologne (Tom. IX.), and the M. Bibl. Patr., Lyons (Tom. XV.). It was to be expected, however, the exegetical principle of the author would lead him to reject the doctrine of Paschasius Radbertus concerning the transmutation of the elements of the Lord's Supper; and, indeed, the commentary contains passages which flatly contradict the Roman-Catholic doctrine of transubstantiation. Roman-Catholic theologians, therefore, prefer another text, by a Franciscan monk, Sixtus of Siena, in which the passages in question occur in a wording just different enough to make the contradiction disappear. DUALISM forms the opposite to monism. While monism dissolves all differences and contrasts into a final unity,—the absolute idea of the Hegelian school, the indestructible matter of the present English school,—according to dualism existence itself is based on a contrariety which appears in philosophy as spirit and matter, in theology as God and the world, in psychology as soul and body, and in morals as good and evil. The crudest forms of dualism occur in certain Christian heresies, establishing the contrarieties as eternal principles; of monism, in certain phases of modern materialism, reducing even the moral differences into illusions.

DU BARTAS, Guillaume Salluste, b. at Montfort, in the department of Gers, 1544; served in the Huguenot army; undertook several missions to foreign Protestant courts, and received in the battle of Ivry, March 14, 1590, a severe wound, of which he died in the following July. His poem on the creation, La première semaine, made a deep impression, and represents the Puritan movement of religion, just as Ronsard represents the sceptical. In 1584 he published La seconde semaine, an epic destined to comprise the whole period from the creation to the revelation in Christ, but unfinished. There is a collected edition of his works from 1629. His Weeks were translated into English by J. Sylvester, London, 1641.

DUBOSC, Pierre, b. at Bayeux, Feb. 21, 1623; studied theology at Montauban and Saumur; became minister of the Reformed Congregation of Caen in 1645; was banished from France in 1685, and settled at Rotterdam, where he died Jan. 2, 1692. He was one of the most prominent pulpitorators of his time, and among the first to abandon the old dry doctrinal exposition, and employ illustrations and rhetorical language to make the Christian truths impress the heart and the imagination. Two collections of his sermons appeared at Rotterdam, 1692, in 2 vols., and 1701 in 4 vols. His son-in-law, Legendre, wrote his life, Rotterdam, 1694; enlarged edition, 1716.

DUBOURC, Anne, b. at Riom, in the department of Puy de Dôme, 1531; burnt at the stake in Paris, Dec. 23, 1559; was professor of civil law in the University of Orléans, when, in 1557, he was appointed conseiller-clerc to the Parliament of Paris. In his father's house he became acquainted with the doctrines of the Reformation; and, as he was conscientious, he made a deep study of the Scriptures, the fathers, and the early church-history, before he undertook to decide upon the question. He had not embraced the Reformation, however, when he was called to Paris. But he heard mass for the last time, Easter, 1558; and shortly after he began to frequent the meetings of the Reformed Congregation in Paris. In the Parliament most of the younger members inclined towards the Reformation; and of the older members some of the most prominent, as, for instance, the president Harlay, Seguier, etc., were in favor of very mild proceedings against the so-called heretics. There was, however, another party in the Parliament,—a party of fanatical Romanists,—led by Minard, Le Maistre, and St. André; and a conflict was not slow in arising. In the Grande Chambre,—that division of the Parliament in which the civil affairs of the king, the crown, the university, etc., were treated,—the Romanists had the majority; while the friends of the Reformation had the majority in the Chambre de la Tournelle,—that division to which all criminal matters belonged. In the spring of 1559 the Chambre de la Tournelle condemned four citizens of Toulouse, who were accused of rejecting the doctrine of transubstantiation, to banishment; while at the same time, the Grande Chambre condemned a poor vine-dresser, Pierre Chenet, to the stake for the same crime. In order to reconcile this discrepancy, the procurator-general, Bourdin, convoked a Mercuriale; that is, a plenary assembly of all the divisions of the Parliament, thus called because it always convened on Wednesday,—Dies Mercurii. From the protracted and bitter debate, it was evident that the friends of the Reformation were in the majority; and the Romanists then addressed themselves directly to the king, Henry II. The king appeared personally in the Parliament, at the head of an imposing escort, and reproached it for the lukewarmness it showed with respect to the Church. Dubourg spoke immediately after the king, and spoke with great openness and eloquence; but the king became so provoked that he immediately ordered Dubourg arrested. Legally, a member of Parliament could be judged only by the Parliament itself. Nevertheless, the king appointed a committee to investigate the case of Dubourg, and the committee consisted of the most enraged Romanists. Dubourg appealed successively to the archbishops of Paris, Sens, and Lyons; but the appeals were not accepted. An appeal to the Pope was still possible; but Dubourg refused to have any thing to do with "Antichrist." The death of Henry II., July 10, 1559, only made the situation still more desperate; as, by the accession of Francis II., the Guises came into power. It was evident that the life of Dubourg was wanted. All exertions of his friends, Coligny, the elector Friedrich III., of the palatinate, etc., were in vain. For a moment Dubourg wavered. The first confession he presented was ambiguous, and was considered as a surrender by the Romanists; but he soon recovered, and the confession which he finally gave in, and which has often been printed, is a masterpiece of clearness, precision, and completeness. Dec. 21 the verdict was given, and two days afterwards the execution followed. See La vraie histoire contenant l'inique jugement et fausse procédure contre Anne Dubourg, Anvers, 1561, reprinted in the Mémoires de Condé, London, 1743.

DU CANGE, Charles Dufresne, Sieur, b. at Amiens, Dec. 18, 1610; d. in Paris, Aug. 16, 1688; studied law at Orléans, but soon abandoned the juridical career, and devoted himself exclusively to the study of the history of the middle ages, living first at Amiens, afterwards (from 1668) in Paris. He was a scholar of the very first rank, his industry equalling his accuracy; and at the same time he was a man of extraordinary loveliness of character, modest and disinterested. By his labor he rescued the history of the middle ages from that dense obscurity into which the Renaissance and the Reformation had thrown it. His principal works are Glossarium mediæ et infimæ Latinitatis, and Glossarium mediæ et infimæ Græcitis. The former, which is not simply a dictionary of the Latin language during a certain period, but an encyclopædia of the history, geography, archæology, etc., of that period, appeared first in Paris, 1678, 3 vols. fol., then at Frankfurt, 1681 and 1710, Venice, 1733-36, 6 vols. fol., Opera et studia Monachorum O. S. Bened.; which edition was reprinted at Basel, 1762, with a supplement by the Benedictine monk Carpentier, in 4 vols., 1766, of which an extract was published at Halle, 1772-84, 6 vols.; and the last complete edition, by Henschel, embodying the labors of previous editors, Paris, 1840-50, 7 vols. [A Mediæval Latin-English Dictionary, based upon this edition, by Dayman and Hessels, appeared, London, 1882.] The Greek glossarium appeared in Paris, 1688, 2 vols. fol. The first work which Du Cange published was his Histoire de l'empire de Constantinople sous les empereurs françois, Paris, 1657; the last, not appearing until after his death, was his edition of Chronicon Paschale, Paris, 1688. Several of his works still remain in manuscript. See LÉON FAUGÈRE: Essai sur la vie et les ouvrages de Du Cange, Paris, 1852.

DUCHOBORTZI, a sect which originated in the Russian Church about 1740. Their doctrinal system is variously described. By some they are said to adhere faithfully to the conceptions of the Christian doctrines which the Russian Church has adopted; while others tell us that they have developed these conceptions into a fanciful mysticism, dissolving the idea of trinity into merely different forms of action, placing the fall before the creation, etc. In their practical tenets they resemble the Quakers. They refuse to take oaths, to serve in the army, to partake of the sacraments, etc.; and they reject a liturgically arranged service, a sacerdotal class, etc. The sect arose among the Molokans, and was very severely persecuted by Catherine II. Under Alexander I. they were tolerated, and a settlement was granted them near the Sea of Azov, whence they were removed in 1837 to the Caucasus. See LENZ: De Duchoworzi Commentatio, Dorpat, 1829; W. GASS: Symbolik d. griechischen Kirche, Berlin, 1872, pp. 430 sqq.

DUDITH, Andreas, b. at Buda, 1533; d. at Breslau, 1589; studied at Breslau and Verona. In the latter place he made the acquaintance of Reginald Pole, and accompanied him to England in 1553, when, after the accession of Mary, the cardinal returned home as the legate of Julian III. Over Paris, Dudith went the following year back to Hungary, and was made provost of Pöchlitz. Once more he visited Italy, where he translated Pole's biography from the Italian into English (Venice, 1563, London, 1690); and after his return he was made apostolical protonotary, count-palatine, and bishop of Tina. In 1562 he was sent to the Council of Trent as representative of the Hungarian clergy; and the five speeches he made there contain many attacks on the Reformation, though he advocated the use of the cup in the Lord's Supper also for laymen. In 1565 the Emperor Maximilian sent him on a diplomatical errand to King Sigismund of Poland; and there he fell passionately in love with one of the queen's maids-of-honor. He resigned all his offices, married her, and settled at Smigla in Bohemia: afterwards he also left the Roman Church, and embraced Socinianism. But, though Paul V. put him under the ban, both Maximilian, and after him Rudolf II., continued to protect him and to use him. The last ten years of his life he spent in Breslau. His works were edited by Reuter, Offenbach, 1610; his Five Speeches appeared at Halle, 1743; his Biography was written by Stief, Breslau, 1756. HERZOG.

DUFF, Alexander, D.D., a very eminent missionary in India; was born at the farmhouse of Auchnahyle, in Moulin, Perthshire, Scotland, April 25, 1806; d. in Edinburgh, Feb. 12, 1878. He studied at the University of St. Andrews, under Dr. Chalmers and others, and was licensed to preach the gospel in 1829. At the age of twenty-three he was appointed first missionary to India of the Church of Scotland. On his way to Calcutta he was shipwrecked, and lost all his books,—a circumstance that threw him the more earnestly on the divine arm for support and guidance. Having been left to adopt the mode of aggressive operations which he deemed most expedient in the circumstances, he resolved to make an educational institution a leading feature in his plan, partly in order to train up native evangelists, and partly to scatter the darkness associated with the Hindoo religion. There was a powerful party in Calcutta, the old Orientalists, who thought that any progress, intellectual or social, to be made in India, must be on the old lines, recognizing the traditions, prejudices, and other absurdities which the past had consecrated. Duff looked on all that as nonsense, and felt assured that the Hindoo mind was quite ready to be carried onward on the lines of Western civilization and progress. Practical effect was given to this conviction in his Calcutta school, which was conducted on two great principles,—first, that Christian Scriptures were to be read in every class able to read them, and to be used as the foundation and pervading salt of the school; and, second, that through the English language the science of the West was to be taught, notwithstanding the revolution it must inevitably cause in many Hindoo notions, including some of the most sacred and venerable beliefs. On these lines Duff worked from the very beginning, and worked with such effect that his school was extremely popular among the natives; and the Orientalist party were placed hors de combat. Quite a revolution, indeed, was effected. At the same time the mission did not want for striking spiritual fruit. Among its early converts were a number of young men of great power and promise; and the esteem in which they were held was evinced by the fact that the Church Missionary and other societies got some of them as their agents, and they turned out to be very useful in their work in India.

Returning home in ill health in 1834, Duff, on recovering, made a tour through Scotland, and most wonderfully increased the interest in his mission. His speeches in the General Assembly were wonderful specimens of gushing eloquence, and made a profound impression. The degree of D.D. was conferred on him by the University of Aberdeen.

After his furlough he returned to India, and prosecuted his work. The disruption of the Scottish Church in 1843 was in one way a great trial; although he and all the other missionaries of the Church to both Jew and Gentile had no hesitation in throwing in their lot with the Free Church. As the property of the mission belonged legally to the Establishment, Duff was stripped of every thing. His trust in God remained; and he was enabled to build up a new institution from the foundation, and equip it as well as the old had been. The influence of his work continued to increase. Interesting conversions took place. Public storms raged whenever a conspicuous youth was baptized; but they passed away, and it became apparent to all that the tree which Duff had planted was spreading forth its roots as Lebanon.

In 1850 he again returned home, and sought to rouse the Free Church to new and more energetic efforts in the cause of missions. He was called in 1851 to the chair of the General Assembly. He also visited America, under the auspices of Mr. George H. Stuart of Philadelphia, and by his overwhelming appeals and eloquence made a deep impression both in Canada and the United States.

He returned to India, and continued his labors for some years; but, his health utterly failing, he returned permanently to Scotland in 1864. Appointed Convener of the Foreign Missions Committee, he had the chief management of the foreign work of the Free Church, and showed his catholicity by the deep interest he took in South-African missions, and especially by the share he had in organizing the Livingstonia mission on Lake Nyassa. In 1867 he was appointed first professor of evangelistic theology in the Free Church.

Dr. Duff took an active interest in many important movements of the home church. He was an active promoter of the proposed union of the Free, United Presbyterian, Reformed Presbyterian, and English Presbyterian churches, which, however, came to no satisfactory result. He was deeply interested in the Colportage Society of Scotland, of which, for a time, he was president. He took an active part in the preparations for the General Presbyterian Council at Edinburgh, but was unable to be present, through illness. His strength continued to decline thereafter, and on Feb. 12, 1878, he fell asleep. His Life was written by George Smith, LL.D., Edinburgh and N.Y., 1880. W. G. BLAIRIE.

DUGUET, Jacques Joseph, b. at Montbrison, on the Upper Loire, Dec. 9, 1649; d. in Paris, Oct. 25, 1733; entered the Congregation of the Oratory in 1667, but left it in 1686, when its members were compelled to subscribe a condemnation of Jansen. Afterwards he lived for some time in Brussels with A. Arnauld, and at various places in France, always in retirement, and always pursued by the ruling power in the Church. He was a prolific writer, and one of the best writers among the Jansenists. His Traité de la prière publique, etc., Paris, 1707, was often reprinted, and so were his Lettres sur divers sujets de morale, etc., 1718, originally in 3 vols., but afterward enlarged to 10 vols., and his Explication du mystère de la passion, 1722, originally in 2 vols., but afterward enlarged to 14 vols. He also wrote Explications of Genesis (6 vols.), Job (4 vols.), and other parts of the Bible. A biography of him is found in that edition which Goujet has given of his Institution d'un prince, etc, 1739. See also ANDRÉ: L'esprit de M. Duguet, etc., Paris, 1764.

DU HALDE, b. in Paris, Feb. 1, 1674; d. there Aug. 18, 1743; entered the Society of Jesus in 1708; succeeded Father Legobien as editor of Lettres édifiantes et curieuses écrites des missions étrangères, of which he published vols. IX.-XXVI., and wrote The General History of China, Paris, 1735, 4 vols., translated into English by Brookes, London, 1736, 4 vols.

DULCINISTS. See DOLCINO.

DULIA (service). The Roman Church teaches that saints and angels should receive dulia (reverence), the Virgin hyper-dulia (the highest kind of reverence), and the Persons of the Trinity latreia (adoration, or worship proper). The distinction between these three kinds of worship is generally obscured by the laity, who not only pray as much and as fervently to one class of divine helpers as to the other, but who, it is probable, pray quite as much to the images as to the persons imaged.

It is, however, by this fine distinction that the Church rids herself of the charge of idolatry.

DU MOULIN, Charles, b. in Paris, 1500; d. there Dec. 27, 1566; studied law in Orléans and Poitiers. A fault of pronunciation debarred him from success as a pleader; but in Paris, where he settled in 1539, and where, in 1542, he joined the Reformed Congregation, he soon acquired great celebrity as a consulting lawyer. Of his many writings (fifty-two in number), two are of great interest to church-history. In 1551 he published his famous Commentaire sur l'Edit des petites dates, in which he shows that Henry II. was right, when, as a move in his contest with the Pope, he forbade the exportation of gold or silver from France to Rome. And so victorious was the argumentation, that the Pope immediately dropped the question so far as the king was concerned; but brought the author to trial for heresy, and when he was acquitted the priests caused a riot, and had his house pillaged. Du Moulin fled; and from this moment till his death he moved from one place to another (Strassburg, Tübingen, Geneva, Lyons, etc.), everywhere attracting people by his learning and acuteness, but always pursued by the Roman Church. He returned to Paris in 1564, and published his Consultation sur le fait du Concile de Trent; but the Parliament of Paris, though approving of his views, condemned his book. He was imprisoned, and released only by the exertions of Jeanne d'Albret. After his death the priests said that he had secretly returned to the bosom of the Roman Church; but they have told the same story about many others without proving it.

DU MOULIN, Pierre (Molinaeus), b. at Buhly, on the boundary of Normandy, Oct. 16, 1568; d. at Sedan, March 10, 1658; was educated in Paris and Sedan, and studied at Cambridge (1588-92) and Leyden, where he was made professor, first of ancient languages, and afterwards of philosophy. In 1599 he was ordained and appointed pastor of Charenton, near Paris, and chaplain to Catherine of Bourbon, a sister of Henry IV. With this last appointment began his career as the most vigorous and brilliant controversialist of the French Reformed Church. According to the fashion of the day, a disputation was arranged (1602) between Du Moulin and a Roman-Catholic scholar, Palma Cayet, in the presence of Catherine, her husband (who was a Roman-Catholic), and others. Du Moulin's victory was unquestionable; and the books he published in consequence of the disputation — Eaux de Siloe pour esteindre le purgatoire 1602, and Accroissement des eaux de Siloe, La Rochelle, 1604 — attracted much attention. Of still greater importance, while producing a much wider and deeper impression, were his controversies with the Jesuit Cotton about the dogmatics and morals of the order, Trente-deux demandes proposées par le P. Cotton, etc., La Rochelle, 1607, and Geneva, 1635; with the Jesuit Gontier about transubstantiation, Véritable narré de la conférence entre les sieurs Du Moulin et Gontier, 1609, and Apologie pour la sainte cène du Seigneur, Geneva, 1610; and with the Dominican Coeffeteau, Anatomie du livre du sieur C., Geneva, 1625. But his masterpiece as a controversialist is his Bouclier de la foy, the most complete work of the kind produced by the French Reformed Church, and, though now antiquated in form and tone, still valuable on account of its learning and keenness. The Jesuit Arnoux, confessor to the king, preached against the Reformed Confession; and Du Moulin took up the challenge, and wrote Défense de la confession de l'Église réformée de France (Charenton, 1617), Bouclier de la foy (Charenton, 1617, 3d ed., 1619, last ed., 1845, Eng. trans., London, 1631), and Fuites et évasions du sieur Arnoux (Charenton, 1619.) It was, however, not only the Roman-Catholics who had to smart under his polemical ire, but also the various sects of his own denomination, especially the Remonstrants. A bitter controversy arose shortly after the death of Henry IV., consequently in a very critical moment, between him and Tilenus, professor of theology at Sedan; and they were not reconciled until 1617. In that year Du Moulin was engaged by the commission of the National Synod of Vitry, to prepare a formula consensus, in which all sects or parties of the Reformed faith would agree; but the formula consensus turned out the Anatomie de l'Arminianisme, Leyden, 1619, — a harsh and scathing criticism of Arminianism. Meanwhile his position at Charenton, always difficult, became actually dangerous. For many years he had stood in intimate connection with James I. of England. Already in 1604 he wrote Défense de la foy pour Jacques I.; and in 1615 James I. proposed to him to make an attempt at uniting the whole Reformed Church. In 1619 he wrote a letter to James I. to induce him to aid his son-in-law, the Elector of the Palatinate. The letter was intercepted, and the Jesuits hoped to construe it as treason. Du Moulin was compelled to flee, and sought refuge in Sedan, which belonged to the dominion of the Duke of Bouillon. He was made professor of theology, and spent the rest of his life there, somewhat more quietly, though never giving up what seemed to be his nature, — criticism and polemics. To this period belong his Nouveauté du papisme, etc. (Sedan, 1627), and Anatomie de la Messe (Sedan, 1636, 2d ed., 1638, last ed., 1851, translated into German and English, and still studied with profit on account of the mastership with which the unnatural and the unreasonable in the scholastic argumentation of transubstantiation is exhibited). See Bulletin de la Société de l'Histoire du Protestantisme, VII., pp. 170, 345, 532, where his autobiography is given; AYMON: Synodes nationaux de France, II. p. 273, containing a list of his works; ARMAND: Essai sur la vie de Du Moulin, Strassburg, 1846.

DUNCAN, John, LL.D., a Scotch Orientalist; b. at Gilcomston, near Aberdeen, 1796; d. in Edinburgh, Saturday, Feb. 26, 1870. He was graduated from the University of Aberdeen, 1814; studied divinity in Edinburgh, and was licensed June 24, 1825. In 1826, under the influence of Cesar Malan, he was converted; in 1831 he was settled in Glasgow; went in 1841 to Pesh as missionary of the Church of Scotland to the Jews; in 1843 he became professor of Hebrew and Oriental languages in New College, Edinburgh, and served in that capacity until his death. He was an extraordinary man: learned in several departments, gifted as a talker, and profound as a thinker, he impressed all he met. His students did not get much Hebrew instruction, for he was a very poor teacher; but they were inspired by his spirit so eminently godly. He lived above the world, and drew them up with him. His religious experience comprehended all grades, from scepticism to faith. His most brilliant period intellectually was when farthest from God; but his most fruitful was during his latter years, when he showed a simple piety which was based upon personal knowledge of the deep things of God. Many stories are told of his eccentricity; but the charm of his biography lies in its revelation of a rare personality. See DAVID BROWN: Life of the Late John Duncan, LL.D., Edinburgh, 1872, 2d revised ed. same year; the same: John Duncan in the Pulpit and at the Communion-Table, Edinburgh, 1874; also his striking sayings in WILLIAM KNIGHT: Colloquia Peripatetica, by the late John Duncan, LL.D., 2d ed., Edinburgh, 1870.

DUNCAL, the author of the Responsa contra perversas Claudii sententias, written in 828, against Claudius of Turin, and edited by Masson, Paris, 1608, and in Bibl. Patr. Max., XIV. He was a Scotchman. But very little is known about his life. By some (Hist. Litt. de la France, IV., p. 493) he is identified with a certain Dungal of St. Denis, who wrote some Latin poems (MARTÈNE ET DURAND: Ampl. Coll., VI. p. 811) and an Epistola ad Carolum Magnum de duplici eclipsi solari (D'ACHERY: Spicilegium, III. p. 324). More probably he is identical with that Dungal whom Lothar mentions in one of his decrees as teacher in Pavia.

DUNIN, Martin von, b. at Wal, a village of Western Poland, Nov. 11, 1774; d. at Posen, Dec. 26, 1842; was educated in the Collegium Germanicum in Rome, and was appointed Archbishop of Gnesen-Posen, 1831.

In Poland the validity of the canon law remained unquestioned up to 1768: it was even specially confirmed and extended by a bull of Benedict XIV., Aug. 8, 1748. But by the treaty of Feb. 13, 1768, between Poland, Russia, England, Prussia, Denmark, and Sweden, the canon law was suspended in various fields of social life. Thus mixed marriages were declared legitimate; and it was determined, that, of the children, the boys should be educated in the religion of the father, and the girls in that of the mother. This rule was continued in those parts of Poland which were incorporated with Prussia, and no trouble arose from its application until 1836. Inspired, no doubt, by the behavior of Droste zu Vischering, Archbishop Dunin suddenly demanded permission of the Prussian Government, either to go back to the regulations of 1748, or to ask the Pope for new instructions. As neither was granted, the archbishop issued a pastoral letter (Jan. 30, 1838) to his clergy, in which he simply forbade the priests to consecrate a mixed marriage, or to admit any Roman-Catholic who lived in unconsecrated wedlock to the sacraments. But this injunction was annulled by a royal decree of June 23, 1838; and legal proceedings, were begun against the archbishop. Feb. 23, 1839, the supreme court of Posen gave the verdict that the archbishop had transgressed his power, and that the transgression should be punished with deposition, and incarceration in one of the fortresses for half a year. The king transmuted the incarceration in a fortress to simple residence in Berlin; but, when the archbishop wilfully left the capital to go to his diocese, he was arrested, and confined at Colberg. On the accession, however, of Friedrich Wilhelm IV., in 1840, a compromise was effected: the archbishop was re-instated on the condition of modifying his pastoral letter in harmony with former practice.

DUNKERS. See TUNKERS.

DUNS SCOTUS, Johannes, was b. in 1260 or 1274, according to Matthæus Veglenis and Dempster, at Duns, in the southern part of Scotland; according to Leland and others, at Dunstane, in Northumberland; according to Wadding, in Ireland; d. at Cologne, 1308. He early became a Franciscan, and studied theology at Oxford, under William de Vuarra (Varro). When the latter went to Paris, Duns succeeded to his chair, and taught in Oxford with great success. He is said to have had three thousand pupils. It was especially his keenness and subtlety which impressed people; for which reason he received the title of doctor subtilis. While in Oxford he wrote a commentary upon the Sentences of the Lombard, — Opus Oxoniense. About 1301 he went to Paris, and there he also lectured on the Sentences; which lectures afterwards were published under the title Reportata Parisiensia. In 1305 he obtained the degree of doctor. After the order of Clement V. he held a grand disputation with the Dominicans concerning the immaculate conception of Mary. He came out victorious. Even the marble statue of the Virgin, standing in the disputation hall, bowed to him when he descended from the cathedra; and it became a rule in the university, that he who obtained a degree there should take an oath to defend the doctrine of the immaculate conception. In 1308 Duns was sent to Cologne, by the general of his order, to contend with the Beghards, who were numerous in those regions, and with the Dominicans, who refused to accept the new dogma. He was received with great honors, but died in the same year from apoplexy.

The best edition of his works is that by Wadding, Lyons, 1639, in 12 vols. fol. The first four volumes contain his miscellaneous writings on grammar, logic, etc.; vols. V.—X., the Opus Oxoniense; vol. XI., the Reportata Parisiensia; and vol. XII., the Quodlibeta. These works give striking evidence of the comprehensive scholarship of their author. Duns was not only familiar with the writers of his own time and the early middle ages, but he was also deeply conversant with the works of the fathers, and he had studied both the Greek and the Arab philosophers. From Averroes and Avicenna he borrowed many Platonic and Neoplatonic ideas. Porphyry and Aristotle he specially treated of: Questiones in quinque universalibus Porphyrii, his commentary on Aristotle's metaphysics and De anima, etc.

The difference between Duns Scotus and Thomas Aquinas is very striking. It lodged deep in the natures of the two men, and it became a stirring element in the after-history of scholasticism. In their ideas of God, Thomas is always inclined to emphasize necessity, Duns, freedom; for Thomas had a natural bent towards generalization, Duns a vivid sense of individuality. While to Thomas the relation between God and the world is a relation of substance, Duns vindicates the free causality of God; and while the Thomistic conception of the Trinity retains a shade of modalism, Duns fully carries through the distinction between the persons of the Trinity, the attributes of God, etc. The genius of Thomas was speculative: that of Duns was critical; and his method is, consequently, negative destruction of error rather than positive construction of truth. But, just as his natural bent towards individualism never made him a nominalist, so his natural talent for criticism never made him a sceptic. His scepticism refers only to the argumentation, and arguments he may destroy until he has no other basis for truth than the absolute will of God and the voluntary submission of man; but this basis, the truth of the divine revelation, and the authority of the Established Church, he never touches.

The relation between God and the world was to scholasticism the great problem, and in the system of Duns Scotus this problem received an original and bold treatment. Representing God as the absolutely self-sufficient and self-controlling subject, he tries to give to the world a higher degree of independence and substantiality than it ever could attain in a system of emanation or Pantheism. But the solution is incomplete. In his innermost being, in his very essence, God remains unknown and unknowable to man, and consequently his will can never become the direct and natural contents of the will of man. The will of God is an enigma, manifested only in the form of arbitrary commands: the will of man is an empty form, receiving its contents through voluntary submission to external authorities,—the Church.

The life of Duns Scotus has been written by MATTIÆUS VEGLENSIS, in Thesaurus Bibliographicus; by WADDING, in his edition of Duns' works, vol. I.; by FERCHI, Cologne, 1622; GUZMAN; JANSSEN, Cologne, 1622; COLGAN, Antwerp, 1655. His system has been treated by ALBERGONI: Resolutio doctrinæ Scoticæ, Lyons, 1643; HIERONYMUS DE FORTINO: Summa theologica ex Scotis operibus; JOANNES DE RADA: Controversiæ theologice inter Thomam et Scotum, Venice, 1599; BONAVENTURA BARO: *J. DUNSTAN, St., b. at Glastonbury, 924; d. May 19, 988; was educated by Irish monks, settled in his native city, and was twice introduced into the king's household, but was both times driven away by the envy of the rough soldier-courtiers. After taking the monastic vow, he lived for some time in retirement, studying and teaching; but King Edmund made him Abbot of Glastonbury, and appointed him treasurer of the whole kingdom. Under the reign of Edred (946-955), Dunstan seems to have been the real ruler of the country. Under Edwy he was con-pelled to flee the country (955), and seek refuge in Ghent, but only for a short time. When Edgar succeeded in establishing himself on the throne of Mercia and Northumbria, Dunstan returned to power, and was made Bishop of Worcester and London, and finally Archbishop of Canterbury. In spite of intrigues and conspiracies, he remained in power under Edward and Ethelred; and it is a significant fact that the really successful invasions of the Danes began immediately after his death. As a character he is variously described. Some represent him as a reformer of the Saxon clergy of his time, and as a worker of miracles; and the fact of his canonization shows the indebtedness of the Church to him. Others represent him as a statesman; and, indeed, for many years he ruled England with great energy and wisdom. Several works have been ascribed to him, — a commentary on the Benedictine rule, a Regularis Concordia, etc.; but the authorship is doubtful. For his life, see Act. Sanct., May 19; E. W. ROBERTSON: Dunstan and his Policy, in Historical Essays; DEAN HOOK: Lives of the Archbishops of Canterbury.

DUNSTER, Henry, first president of Harvard University; b. in England; d. at Scituate, Mass., Feb. 27, 1659. He was educated at Magdalen College, Oxford; emigrated to America, and was chosen president of the recently established college at Cambridge, Aug. 27, 1640, but compelled to resign Oct. 24, 1654, on account of his Baptist views, and he spent the rest of his days in retirement. He was a learned, modest, and pious man. See JEREMIAH CHAPLIN: Life of Henry Dunster, Boston, 1872.

DUPANLOUP, Felix Antoine Philippe, b. at St. Felix, Savoy, Jan. 3, 1802; d. at Laincey in Loiret, Oct. 11, 1878; studied in Paris; was ordained priest in 1825; became confessor to the Count de Chambord in 1827, catechist to the Orléans princes in 1828, and almoner to Madame la Dauphine in 1830, but retired from all these positions after the Revolution, and was appointed superior of the diocesan seminary of Paris in 1837, and Bishop of Orléans in 1849. He belonged to the group of Liberal or Gallican Catholics, but submitted to the decisions of the Vatican Council in 1870. While young, he kept aloof from the circles of De Maistre and De Lamennais; when old, he opposed the definition of the dogma of papal infallibility. On the other hand he labored zealously to awaken the French people from its religious apathy, and fought bravely against the Life of Jesus, by Renan, his former pupil. A similar position of mediation he occupied in the field of education, between Veuillot, who wanted the Latin classics driven out of the schools, and the University of Paris, which wanted to forbid the religious orders in the schools. One of his best works is his L'Education, Paris, 1855-57, 3 vols. His Œuvres Choies appeared in 1861 in 4 vols. See PELLETIER: Monseigneur Dupanloup, Paris, 1876; J. HAIRDET: Mgr. Dupanloup, biographie et souvenirs, Paris, 1878 (72 pp.).

DUPERRON, Jacques Davy, b. at Bern, 1559; d. in Paris, Sept. 5, 1618; descended from Protestant parents, from St. Lô, in Normandy, who, during the persecutions against the Huguenots, had sought refuge in Switzerland. Having received an office in the household of Henry III., and finding his religion an embarrassment in a court career, he embraced Romanism, was ordained priest, and devoted himself to religious polemics and proselytizing. He was instrumental in the conversion of Henry IV., and was by him made Bishop of Evreux. He also aided the king in procuring a divorce from Margaret of Valois, and in 1606 he was made Grand-almoner of France, and Archbishop of Sens. In 1604 Cleme-ent VIII. invited him to take part in the debates of the Congregatio de Auxiliis concerning the Molinistic controversy, followed his advice in deciding the question, and made him a cardinal. His works appeared in Paris, 1620-22, 3 vols. fol. First volume contains his Traité sur l'Eucharistie against Du Plessis-Mornay. See FÉRET: Le Cardinal Duperron, Paris, 1877.

HERZOG.

DU PIN, Louis Elies, b. in Paris, June 17, 1637; d. there June 6, 1719; was made a doctor of the Sorbonne in 1684, and professor at the Collège de France; but on account of his opposition to the bull Unigenitus, and having as a Jansenist signed the cas de conscience, he was banished to Chatelleroult, and, though he afterwards was allowed to return to Paris, he was never restored to his professorship. He partook with much zeal in the negotiations for a union between the Greek and Roman churches, which were started on occasion of the visit of Peter the Great in Paris, 1717, and he corresponded with Archbishop Wake of Canterbury concerning a union of the churches of England and France; which correspondence is given in the third appendix to Maclaine's translation of Mosheim's Church History. His principal work is his celebrated Bibliothèque universelle des auteurs ecclésiastiques, which provoked Bossuet and the clergy in general by its liberality, and at one time was stopped by an act of Parliament, but again allowed to appear under the title of Nouvelle bib., etc. The work appeared in Paris, 1686-1704, in 58 vols. 8vo, and at Amsterdam, in 19 vols. 4to: there is an English translation of it in 17 vols. fol., London, 1693-1707. A complete list of Du Pin's numerous writings is found in NICERON: Mémoires, II. pp. 25-48. Notices of his life are given by himself in the last volume of his great work.

DU PLESSIS-MORNAY, properly PHILIPPE DE MORNAY, Seigneur du Plessis-Marly, b. at Buhy, Normandy, Nov. 5, 1549; d. at La Forêt-sur-Sèvre, Nov. 11, 1623; one of the most prominent leaders of the French Protestants during one of the most critical periods of their history. Carefully educated, he was about to join the Protestant army under Condé, in 1567, when a fall with his horse threw him on the sick-bed. In 1568 he started on a great tour through Europe, visited Italy, Austria, Bohemia, Germany, the Netherlands, and returned to Paris in June, 1572. A pamphlet he wrote concerning the Spanish dominion in the Netherlands attracted the attention of the Prince of Orange; another, concerning the expediency for France to support the Netherlands introduced him to Coligny. Only with great difficulty he escaped the massacre of Aug. 24, 1572. He fled to England, and entered upon an unsteady career of many years, spent partly on the battle-field, partly at the writing-desk, partly in diplomatical negotiations. In

DUPRÉAU, Gabriel, French theologian and philologist; b. at Marcoussis (Ile de France), 1511; d. at Péronne, April 19, 1588. His Latin name was Prateolus. He was for many years a professor in the College of France in Paris. His principal work was De Vitiis, sectis, dogmatibus omnium hæreticorum, Paris, 1569.

DURAND OF ST. POURCAIN (Durandus de Sancto Porciano), the most prominent representative of scholasticism in the fourteenth century; was b. towards the close of the thirteenth century in the village of St. Pourcain, in the present department of Puy de Dôme, and entered very early the Dominican order at Clermont. After studying in the Monastery of St. Jacques, in Paris, where (June 26, 1303) he signed the appeal of Philip the Fair to a general council, he taught in the University of Paris as licentiatus et doctor, and was by Clement V. called to Avignon as Lector Curie et Magister S. Palatii. John XXII. made him Bishop of Puy-en-Velay, 1318, and in 1326 Bishop of Meaux, where he died Sept. 10, 1334.

Of his works a number still remain in manuscript in the National Library in Paris: the most important, however, have been printed. I. Commentarius in Libros Sententiarum Lombardi, which Gerson recommended to his pupils as the best work on the subject; printed in Paris, 1508; Lyons, 1533; Venice, 1571, etc. II. Statuta Synodi Aniciensis, over which synod he himself presided (1320), edited by Gisse, Lyons, 1620. III. De Origine Jurisdictionum, etc., an argument in the controversy between the French prelates and Philip the Fair concerning the amenability of the clergy to the civil courts, printed, together with other tracts to the same purpose, Paris, 1506. IV. Tractatus de statu animarum, etc., a polemical tract against the view of Pope John XXII., that the departed souls are not able to see God per essentiam, nor to feel perfectly happy until they have re-assumed their bodies.

His surname Doctor resolutissimus he received from the resoluteness with which he adopted and followed the principle that there is no human authority above the human reason; that a man who bends his reason before any human authority degrades himself into a beast, etc. The first consequence of this principle was an open split between faith and knowledge, between theology and philosophy. The Anselmian proposition, credo ut intelligam ("I believe, that I may know") and its complement, quæro intelligere ut credam ("I seek to know, that I may believe"), he rejected, though they form the very foundation of scholasticism. Theology and philosophy have, he said, nothing to do with each other. The question then arose, When it has only faith for its contents, is theology then a science? And he boldly answered, No, thereby openly breaking off from the Thomistic school, which defined theology as the science of God. He made the object (or subject, as he called it) of theology to be man, and declared the Scriptures were for practical help in attaining heaven by good works. Thus he completely inverted theology: man was the centre around which theology turned.

In regard to the sacraments, he denied that they had any inherent efficacy: they are merely divinely ordained conditions of grace. Hence the benefit came not from the sacrament as such, but directly from God. Nor do the sacraments confer any spiritual quality upon the recipient; but he declared, that, just as the stamp of the mint sets a certain value upon a coin, so the sacraments set the divine seal upon an existing relation between God and man. He divided the sacraments into two classes: those strictly such, and those such only in a wider sense. Among the latter he puts marriage. He disputed the current scholastic teaching respecting transubstantiation, which he declared to be unscriptural and unintelligible, and preferred to say transformation, since the material of the bread changed its form, and took on that of the Body of Christ. By these views he prepared the way for the reformers of the sixteenth century. See reviews of his ideas in the histories of philosophy by STRÜCKL, UEBERWEG, HAURÉAU, PRANTL, and J. LAUNOY: Syllabus rationum, etc. (a defence of Durand), in Opera, vol. I. pars 1, Geneva, 1636. WAGENMANN.

DURAND, Guillaume, surnamed Speculator; b. at Puimoisson, in Provence, about 1230; d. in Rome, 1296; taught canon law at Modena; was by Gregory X. sent as legate to the Council of Lyons (1274), and wrote Rationale divinorum officiorum, Mayence, 1453, of which the first part, The Symbolism of Churches and Church Ornaments, has been translated into English by J. M. Neale and B. Webb, Leeds, 1843; Speculum juris, Rome, 1474 (whence his surname); besides several other juridical works.

DURBIN, John Price, D.D., b. in Bourbon County, Kentucky, 1800; d. Oct. 17, 1876. From 1834 to 1845 he was president of Dickinson College. He was a most eloquent preacher, and an efficient secretary of the Missionary Society in the Methodist-Episcopal Church from 1850 to 1872. He wrote Observations in Europe, N.Y., 1844, 2 vols., and Observations in Egypt, Palestine, Syria, and Asia Minor, N.Y., 1845, 2 vols.

DURY, John (Durie, Durye, Duræus), is generally supposed to have been born in Scotland, although Whitlock, in his Memorials, represents that he was of German birth. Possibly he was born of Scotch parents settled in Germany. At all events, he is first known as minister of the English company of merchants at Elbing in Prussia, whence in 1628 he addressed a letter to Gustavus Adolphus, king of Sweden, "for the obtaining of aid and assistance in this seasonable time, to seek for and re-establish an ecclesiastical peace among the evangelical churches." This was the beginning of his life-work as the great peacemaker of his century. He received encouragement from the pastors of Danzig, and went to England with favorable letters from them in 1630, and succeeded in enlisting Sir Thomas Rowe, the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Bishop of London, in his cause. In 1631 he returned to the Continent, and received letters of commendation from the king of Sweden, and prosecuted his work among divines in Hesse, Hanau, and the Palatinate, and especially before the meeting of the Protestant States at Heilbronn and Frankfort, and corresponded with the chief universities of Germany and Holland. In 1633 he again went to England, and conferred with Archbishop Laud, and received declarations from Bishops Morton, Hall, and Davenant, which he published in 1634, in connection with a treatise, Sententia de Pacis rationibus inter Evangelicos (also apart in 1638, and in English in 1641). He returned to the Continent to the meeting of the Protestant States at Frankfort, which passed a resolution that they "did judge his work most laudable, most acceptable to God, and most necessary and useful to the Church." Once more returning to England, he received encouragement from King Charles I., and went with commendations to the Continent, visiting the States of Holland, the various classes, synods, and universities, passing then into Germany, and through Sweden and Denmark, everywhere winning friends to his cause (from 1635 to 1640). Among these, Calixtus of Helmstadt was most energetic. In 1639 he presented to Sir Thomas Rowe a Summary Discourse concerning the work of Peace Ecclesiastical (published 1641). He passed over into England in 1641, and presented a petition to the House of Commons, urging "that the blessed and long-sought-for union of Protestant churches may be recommended unto the publick prayers of the church," and "that his majesty with your honour's advice and counsell, might be moved to call a general synod of Protestants in due time, for the better settling of weighty matters in the church which now trouble not only the consciences of most men, but disturb the tranquillity of publick states, and divide the churches one from another, to the great hindrance of Christianity and the dishonour of Religion." He also issued a Memorial concerning Peace Ecclesiastical, in 1641, addressed "To the King of England and the Pastors and elders of the Kirk of Scotland meeting at St. Andrews." Soon after, he accepted the position of chaplain to the princess royal of England at the Hague, and then became pastor of the English Church at Rotterdam. The commencement of the civil wars in England disturbed all his plans. But he did not weary in his efforts. He became a member of the Westminster Assembly of Divines, and was diligent in his labors for peace. He took part in the discussion with the Independents, publishing in 1644 An Epistolary Discourse, discussing how far and with what limitations Independents should be tolerated. In 1647 he issued A model of Church Government. In 1649, by the recommendation of Parliament, he became the Librarian of St. James, under the supervision of Whitlock, and issued in 1650 The Reformed Library Keeper, and other kindred publications. He protested and labored against the execution of the king, and with the Presbyterians, although with an irenic spirit. He thus brought on himself the ridicule of Prynne, who calls him "the time-serving Proteus, and ambidexter divine." In reply he published in 1650 a tract, in which he vindicates himself as "the unchanged, constant, and single-hearted peacemaker." Under the Commonwealth he persevered in his irenic efforts, assembling the Presbyterian and Congregational ministers of London on several occasions, "to compare their own differences, and join with me in the design of my negotiations towards the churches." A declaration was penned, and subscribed by the heads of the universities and the ministers of London, both Congregational and Presbyterian, authorizing him to advocate that business among the churches in their name; and, securing the support of Cromwell, he journeyed to the Swiss churches for the purpose. He issued in 1654 An earnest plea for gospel Communion, and also A summarie Platform of the heads of a body of Practicall Divinity.

He renewed his efforts at the Restoration through Lord Chancellor Hide and the Earl of Manchester, but in vain, and left England to spend the rest of his life on the Continent. In 1662 he issued in Amsterdam his Irenicorum Tractatum Prodromus, and continued to work in a more quiet way until an advanced age. In 1674 he issued at Frankfort Manière d'expliquer l'Apocalypse par elle même, etc., and seems to have died soon after at Hesse, where he enjoyed the protection and support of the Princess Sophia. For further information we refer to A brief Relation of that which hath been lately attempted to procure Eccl. Peace among Protestants, by Samuel Hartlib, Lond., 1641; A declaration of John Durie, Lond., 1660; Reid's Memoirs of Westminster Divines, Paisley, 1811; and Chalmers's Biographical Dictionary. DUTIES, Conflict of, is a misnomer, strictly speaking; for duty is always the one thing to be done: hence there cannot be several duties which clash. But the phrase as used really means that one is in doubt what to do, or that the conflict is between duty and inclination: as soon as duty is obeyed, the conflict ceases. The supposed collision of duties occupied large space in books of casuistry; but the phrase should vanish, as the thing it expresses is imaginary.

DUTOIT, or DUTOIT-MEMBRINI, Jean Philippe, b. at Moudon, in the canton of Vaud, 1721; d. at Lausanne, Jan. 21, 1793; has interest both as a local revivalist of considerable power, and as a representative of mysticism within the pale of the French Reformed Church. He studied theology at Lausanne, and became (in 1750) acquainted with the works of Madame Guyon, which made a great impression upon him. To him Madame Guyon is a cherub, a seraph, etc.; and her works are sacred books, divine writings, inspired by the Holy Spirit, the divine logos. Nevertheless, the practical tendencies of his Protestant and biblical stand-point preserved him from the extremes of quietism. Though he never occupied any official position in the church, he was a frequent and very successful preacher. He actually drove Voltaire out of Lausanne. After 1759 he ceased to preach, on account of ill health; and a circle of friends then began to form around him, and spread his influence among the masses, not without some chicaneries from the friends of Voltaire, but without any serious impediment. His two principal works are Philosophie divine (1793, 3 vols.) and Philosophie chrétienne (1800-19, 4 vols.). He also published a new edition of the Letters of Madame Guyon, augmented with the Correspondance secrète de M. de Fénelon avec l'auteur, London, 1767, 5 vols.

See JULES CHAVANNES: Jean Philippe Dutoit, Lausanne, 1865.

DUVEIL, Charles Maria, b. at Metz, Lorraine; d. in London about 1790. He was born a Jew, and educated in that faith; but study led him successively to enter the Roman-Catholic, the Episcopal, and the Baptist churches. His works embrace a Literal Exposition of the Canticles (London, 1679, in Latin), and (in English) Literal Exposition of the Minor Prophets (London, 1680), A Literal Explanation of the Acts of the Apostles (London, 1685, new ed., London, 1851).

DUVERGIER, DE HAURANNE, Jean, generally known under the name of St. Cyran, was b. at Bayonne, 1581, and d. in Paris Oct. 11, 1643. While he studied at Louvain, he became acquainted with Jansen; and perfectly agreeing in their contempt of scholasticism, and enthusiasm for the fathers, especially Augustine, they spent several years together at Bayonne (1611-16), and afterwards maintained an intimate correspondence through life. In 1620 Duvergier was made abbot of the Monastery of St. Cyran, at Breme, in Poitou; but the severity of his reforms, and his violence in introducing them, caused such an opposition that he left his abbey, and settled in Paris. Having been appointed court-preacher and confessor to Henrietta of France (married to Charles I. of England), he undertook to re-organize the Roman-Catholic Church in England after the model of the Gallican Church, and wrote a work upon the subject (Petri Aurelii Theologi opera), which was accepted by the general convocation of the French clergy, but which brought him into strife with the Jesuits. In 1635 he was made confessor and director of the Abbey of Port Royal; and the reforms he succeeded in introducing there form the great work of his life. But the jealousy and hatred of the Jesuits, once aroused, continued to pursue him; and in 1638, a few days after the death of Jansen, he was arrested by order of Richelieu, and kept imprisoned at Vincennes until the death of the cardinal, Feb. 6, 1643. One of his principal works is his Somme des sautes, written in 1625 against the Jesuit Garasse. See SAINTE-BEUVE: Histoire de Port-Royal, Paris, 1840-60.

DWIGHT, Timothy, an eminent American teacher, preacher, and theologian; b. at Northampton, Mass., May 14, 1752; d. at New Haven, Jan. 11, 1817. His mother was a daughter of Jonathan Edwards. Dwight was graduated at Yale College in 1769, where he was a tutor from 1771 to 1777. For more than a year he was a chaplain in the army of the Revolution. From 1783 to 1795 he was at the head of an academy in Greenfield, Conn. From 1795 to his death he was president of Yale College, where he acquired a very high reputation as an instructor and also as a preacher. His sermons in the college chapel constituted a system of divinity, and were published, with a prefatory memoir, in 1813, under the title of Theology Explained and Defended. This work attained to great popularity, not only in this country, but also in Great Britain. It taught a moderate Calvinism, with an avoidance of extreme statements, but in general consonance with the Edwardean or New-England theology. Its freedom from metaphysical refinements, and the warmth of Christian feeling pervading it, contributed to its wide diffusion. President Dwight, in the earlier part of his life, published two extended poems, — The Conquest of Canaan (1785) and Greenfield Hill (1794). These are not read at the present day; but his hymn, "I love thy kingdom, Lord," is used wherever the English language is spoken. Other writings of Dr. Dwight are Travels in New England (1822, 4 vols.), Sermons on Miscellaneous Subjects (1828, 2 vols.), besides minor publications. The fame of Dr. Dwight in his own time was due in no small degree to his conversational powers, his impressive eloquence as a preacher, and his uncommon influence as an instructor of youth. (Sprague's Annals of the American Pulpit, Sprague's Life of Dwight, and Memoir prefixed to his System of Theology.)

G. P. FISHER.

DWIGHT, Sereno Edwards, son of the preceding, b. at Greenfield, Conn., May 18, 1786; d. at Philadelphia, Nov. 30, 1850. He was graduated at Yale College, 1803; tutor there 1806-10, and a lawyer 1810-15. In 1816 he entered the ministry; 1817-26 was pastor of the Park-street church, Boston, resigned on account of health; 1828-31 taught in New Haven; 1833-35 was president of Hamilton College, New York. "He was an able preacher, a good writer, and a captivating teacher." His most celebrated work was The Hebrew Wife (an essay on the lawfulness of marriage with a deceased wife's sister), 1836. He also wrote a life of his great-grandfather, Jonathan Edwards, prefaced to his edition of Edwards's works in 10 vols., N.Y., 1830. See Memoir by his brother, Rev. Dr. W. T. Dwight, in a volume of Select Discourses, 1851.

E.

EACHARD, John, D.D., b. in Suffolk, 1686; d. as Master of Catherine Hall, in Cambridge, July 7, 1697. He is famous for his essay on The grounds and occasions of the contempt of the clergy and religion, inquired into in a letter to R. L. (1670), with its sequel, Observations on An Answer to the Inquiry, in a second letter to the same (1671), and for his vigorous attacks upon Thomas Hobbes. He was master of a light, bantering, satirical style, which was very effective. He attributed the failure of the clergy to their defective education, small salaries, and lack of spirituality, and illustrated these points very humorously. His Works were published, London, 1705, best edition, 1784, 3 vols., with account of his life and writings.

EADFRID, Bishop of Lindisfarne 698-721, wrote and illuminated the celebrated Evangeliarium, known as the Durham Book, or Lindisfarne Gospels, to which Aldred added an interlinear gloss in the Anglo-Northumbrian dialect. The manuscript, which is one of the most beautiful in Europe, and noticed by every writer on paleography, is preserved among the Cottonian manuscripts of the British Museum, and has been edited by Stevenson and Waring for the Surtees Society, and by Kemble, Hardwick, and Skeat, for the Syndics of the University of Cambridge. The gloss has been printed by Karl Bouterwek: Die vier Evangelien in altnordhumbrischer Sprache, 1857.

EADIE, John, D.D., LL.D., pastor, professor of theology, and commentator on some of the Pauline Epistles; b. at Alva, Stirlingshire, Scotland, May 9, 1810; d. at Glasgow, Saturday, June 3, 1876. He was educated at the University of Glasgow and in the theological seminary of the United Secession, now United Presbyterian, Church. He was ordained, on Sept. 24, 1835, to the pastorate of the Cambridge-street Church, Glasgow, which he retained until, in 1863, he removed, with a portion of his people, to form the new Lansdowne church, of which he was minister until his death. As early as his student days, he showed his leaning to the department in which he achieved his greatest success by writing an able article in the Edinburgh Theological Magazine for 1832, in review of Moses Stuart's commentary on the Epistle to the Hebrews; and he had so diligently given himself to biblical study in later years, that, on the death of Dr. John Mitchell, he was elected by the synod of his church (May 5, 1843) to the professorship of biblical literature in its divinity hall. Such an appointment at that time did not involve, as it now does, the dissolution of the pastoral relationship; for then the seminary sat for only two months in the year, those of August and September, and the professors were at once pastors and professors. But in the professorship Eadie found the great sphere of his life, and now began that course of industry which resulted in the extensive authorship which is indicated below. He held the offices of pastor and professor for thirty-three years: and just after the synod had decided to remodel its theological seminary by lengthening its annual session from two to five months, shortening its curriculum from five to three years, increasing its corps of professors, and dissolving the relationship between them and their congregations, he died, on the 3d of June, 1876.

As a preacher, Eadie was satisfying rather than striking. His manner was not elegant, and his utterance was often thick; but he was always, like Elihu, "full of matter," and one could not listen to him without learning much at his lips. He was especially excellent as an expositor, and frequently by a few clear sentences cast a flood of light upon a difficult portion of the word of God. As a professor he was affable, easy, and natural, "wearing his load of learning lightly like a flower," and possessing that magnetic influence which quickened all his students into enthusiasm. His scholarship was extensive and accurate, and was so generally recognized, that he was chosen as a member of the New-Testament company to whom was committed the preparation of the Canterbury revision of the English Bible. His commentaries are distinguished for candor and clearness, and above all for an evangelical "unction" not common in works of the kind, and which may, perhaps, be accounted for from the fact, that, while he was poring over these epistles in his study, he was also discoursing on them from his pulpit. His influence gave an immense impulse to biblical exegesis in the denomination to which he belonged, and indeed to Scotland generally. He received the degree of LL.D. from the University of Glasgow in 1844, and that of D.D. from the University of St. Andrews in 1850.

LIT. — Besides contributions to the Eclectic and North British Reviews, and KITTO's Journal of Sacred Literature, Dr. Eadie did an immense amount of literary work in connection with MCKENZIE'S Imperial Dictionary of Universal Biography (in which he had charge of the department of ecclesiastical biography), with the first and last (3d) editions of KITTO'S Cyclopædia, and with FAIRBAIRN'S Imperial Bible Dictionary. He prepared an excellent Concordance to the Scriptures on the Basis of Cruden (1839), and compiled the series published in Edinburgh, and very widely circulated, The Bible Cyclopædia (1848, based upon The Union Bible Dictionary, Phila., in condensed form, under the caption Dictionary of the Holy Bible for the Young; new ed. of the Cyclopædia, entirely re-written, 1869); An Analytic Concordance to the Holy Scriptures (1856); and The Ecclesiastical Cyclopædia (1861). He published two volumes of discourses, The Divine Love (1855), and Paul the Preacher (1859). But his fame rests on his commentaries on the Greek text of Ephesians (1854), Colossians (1856), Philippians (1859), Galatians (1869), and, published posthumously, on First Thessalonians (1877). In addition must be mentioned his interesting biographies of John Kitto (1857) and William Wilson, his posthumous treatise on Scripture Illustrations from the Domestic Life of the Jews and other Eastern Nations (1877), and finally The English Bible, an External and Critical History of the Various English Translations of Scripture, with Remarks on the Need of Revising the English New Testament, London, 1876, 2 vols. EADMER, monk in Canterbury; was elected Bishop of St. Andrews in 1120, but never took possession of the see, on account of disagreement with King Alexander, and died in Canterbury, 1124. He is one of the most important English historians of the period, and wrote: I. Historice Novarum, in six books, giving the history of the three archbishops of Canterbury, Lanfranc, Anselm, and Radulf, edited by Seldeu, London, 1623, reprinted in Gerberon's edition of Anselm's works, Paris, 1675; II. The Life of Anselm, edited by Surius and the Bollandists, April 21; III. Two letters to the monks of Glastonbury about the life of St. Dunstan, and to the monks of Winchester about episcopal election; IV. The Lives of St. Bregwin, St. Oswald, and St. Odo, edited in Wharton's Anglia Sacra; V. The Life of St. Wilfrid of York, edited by the Bollandists, April 24; VI. Finally, some minor works, hitherto wrongly ascribed to Anselm. His collected works are found in MIGNÉ: Patrol., CLIX., pp. 345 sqq.

EADMUND, or EDMUND, king and martyr; was b. in 840, and ascended the throne of East Anglia in 855, when King Offa abdicated, and retired to Rome as a penitent. Edmund ruled in meekness, was the shelter of the weak, learned the psalter by heart, and made his whole life a preparation for martyrdom. In 870 the heathen Danes landed in East Anglia, slew the clergy, outraged the nuns, burnt and pillaged churches and houses. Edmund tried to stem the flood, but was overwhelmed, taken prisoner, tortured, and finally beheaded, Nov. 20, 870. His remains were interred at Bury St. Edmunds, and miracles were wrought at his grave. In 1020 Canute the Great built there a magnificent church and abbey in his honor. In 1122 the national council of Oxford placed the Festival of St. Edmund among English holy days. The English kings have taken him for their patron. His life was written by Abbo of Canterbury and John Lydgate.

EADMUND, St., b. at Abingdon c. 1195; d. at Soissy Nov. 16, 1240; studied at Oxford and Paris, and became a teacher at Oxford, treasurer of Salisbury Cathedral (1222), and Archbishop of Canterbury (1233). But Eadmund belonged to the national party, and was consequently in opposition to the king; and, when the king succeeded in having a papal legate sent to England to neutralize the influence of the archbishop, Eadmund found himself in opposition also to the Pope. He fought manfully, but was at last compelled to yield. He left England in 1240, and settled, first at Pontigny, then at Soissy, where he died, Nov. 16, same year. He had adopted and practised asceticism since a boy: in 1227 he had preached a crusade. Miracles were wrought at his grave, and 1246 the Pope canonized him. His life has been written by his brother, Robert Rich, and by Bertrand, prior of Pontigny.

EADWARD, or EDWARD, III., the Confessor, king of the Anglo-Saxons; b. 1004; crowned King at Winchester, April 3, 1043; d. at Shene Jan. 5, 1066. He dedicated Westminster Abbey, Dec. 28, 1065. His virtues were monastic rather than regal; but such was his reputation for sanctity, that he was canonized by Pope Alexander III. in 1166. An interesting and sympathetic sketch of Eadward is given by GREEN, in his Short History of the English People (Harper's ed., pp. 91-100); but for full information see FREEMAN'S History of the Norman Conquest (vol. ii.), and also LUARD'S Lives of Eadward the Confessor.

EAR-RING. See CLOTHING AND ORNAMENTS AMONG THE HEBREWS.

EAST. The Hebrew mizrach and kedem are both translated "east." The first means literally rising (i.e., of the sun), and therefore indicates the place of the sun's rising, answering to ανατολή and oriens, and means the east in distinction from the west (Josh. xi. 3; Ps. l. 1, ciii. 12; Zech. viii. 7). Kedem means rather the east as one of the four quarters of the globe (Gen. xiii. 14; Job xxiii. 8, 9; Ezek. xlvi. 18 sq.). Each term has a secondary or derivative meaning. Kedem is the proper name for the countries on the immediate east of the Holy Land; while mizrach designates the far east (Isa. xli. 2, 25, xliii. 5, xlvi. 11).

EAST, Praying towards, a custom of the early church. It evoked the charge that the Christians were sun-worshippers (Tertullian, Apolog., 16). Augustine (De Serm. in Monte, ii. 5) speaks of it as a general custom: cum ad orationem stamus, ad orientem convertimus ("when we rise for prayer, we turn toward the east"). The reason usually given was, that the rising of the sun is the type of the new life, and Christ is called the "Day-spring from on high" (Clem. Alex., Stromata, vii. 7). Other reasons mentioned were, that thereby the soul utters its longing after the lost Paradise (Basil, De Sp. Sancto, 27), or that Christ will appear in the East when he comes again the second time (Matt. xxiv. 27). The practice has been revived by some of the ritualists of the Episcopal Church. The influence of the last reason mentioned for praying towards the east is felt in the practice of burying the dead with their feet turned in that direction. The Jews in exile turned their faces toward Jerusalem when they prayed (Dan. vi. 10); and the Mohammedans face Mecca, the holy city.

EASTER, the festival of our Lord's resurrection, and with Christmas the most joyous day observed by the Church. Term.—The term is derived from the Saxon Ostara, or Eostre (German Ostern), the goddess of spring. The French designation pâques preserves a reference to the Jewish pascha, or passover. In the early church, pascha designated the festival of Christ's crucifixion. After the second century (Neander, Hilgenfeld, etc.), or, according to others, after the third or fourth (Steitz), it designated both the festival of the crucifixion and the resurrection (πάσχα σταυρώσιμον and ἀναστήσιμον). Subsequently the term was limited to the latter. Only in a single instance is the original rendered Easter (Acts xii. 4) in our version; in all other cases, passover. The Revised Version has rectified this inconsistency in translation.

Date.—In the early church there was no uniformity in the day observed (Epiphan., Her., LXX.). Bede at a later date makes frequent reference to this discrepancy, and mentions, that, while Queen Eanfleda was keeping Palm Sunday, King Oswy was observing Easter (about 651). The present (or Nicene) rule seems to have been adopted in England by Archbishop Theodore, in 669. A party called the Quartodecimani, or Fourteeners (Greek Tetraditai and Tetradekaitai) observed the day (of crucifixion) on the 14th of Nisan, no matter on what day of the week it fell. The Western Church deviated from this custom; and Polycarp, on a visit to Rome (154), endeavored in vain to persuade Anicetus to adopt the quartodeciman mode. Victor of Rome (197) was only restrained by public opinion, and the protests of Irenæus, from excommunicating the Quartodecimans, so grave an offence was it considered to observe the 14th. The Council of Nicea (325) decreed that there should be uniformity in the date of observance. It is not in place here to go farther into the question of the ancient controversy on the date of Easter. See art. PASCHAL CONTROVERSIES. It is, however, proper to state the results of the decree of Nicæa which determines our date of Easter. By that decree it is fixed on the Sunday immediately following the fourteenth day of the so-called Paschal moon, which happens on or first after the vernal equinox. The vernal equinox invariably falls on March 21. Easter, then, cannot occur earlier than March 22, or later than April 25. In the former case the fourteenth day of the moon would coincide with March 21, the day of the vernal equinox. In the latter, the fifteenth day of the moon would happen on March 21, and a whole lunar month would have to intervene before the condition, "the fourteenth day of the moon first after the vernal equinox," was fulfilled; and, as this might be Sunday, Easter sabbath would not occur till seven more days had elapsed, i.e., April 25.

Celebration.—The key of the observance of Easter is set in the exultant strain of St. Paul, "Now is Christ risen!" (1 Cor. xv. 20). The ancient church celebrated it with solemn and joyous observances. The fasting which had begun on Good Friday was discontinued on Saturday, at midnight (89th Trullian Canon) or at the cock-crow on sabbath morning (Apost. Const., v. 18). Gregory Nazianzen (d. 390) and Gregory of Nyssa (d. 395; Orat. xiii. De Pascha) speak of persons of all ranks carrying lamps and setting up tapers on Easter Eve. This custom was significant of the vigils which were kept (Lactant., Div. Inst., vii. 19) in the expectation that the Lord at his coming again would appear at this time. Easter Eve was also set apart as a special season for the baptism of catechumens. Easter Day itself was observed as a feast of universal gladness and jubilation. Gregory Nazianzen (Or., xix.) calls it the "royal day among days" (βασιλίσσα τῶν ἡμερῶν ἡμέρα). The early Christian emperors signaled its return by setting minor criminals at liberty (Cod. Theod., ix. 38, 3). For fourteen days public spectacles were intermitted, and business largely stopped. But by the third Council of Orleans, Canon 30 (538), and the Council of Maçon, Canon 14 (581), Jews were forbidden to tread the streets, and mingle with Christians, lest their joy should be interrupted.

In the Roman-Catholic Church elaborate rites are still observed; and at the cock-crowing the tapers are re-lighted with the words Lumen Christi! ("Light of Christ!") to which the priests respond Deo Gratias! ("Thanks be to God!") St. Peter's at Rome is illuminated, and the Pope from the balcony at mid-day pronounces a blessing upon the world.

In the Protestant churches of Europe, Easter is generally observed, especially among Lutherans and Episcopalians. It was formerly entirely disregarded, with other church festivals, by the English dissenters and Scotch Presbyterians, but is coming to be pretty generally observed in America.

EASTERN CHURCH meant originally simply the Greek Church in contradistinction to the Latin or Western Church, but means now generally those churches which in the East sprung from the Greek Church, and includes the orthodox Russian Church, and in a wider sense also the Oriental schismatics, namely the Armenians, the Copts, the Nestorians, and the Jacobites. See GREEK CHURCH.

EATON, George W., D.D., LL.D., b. at Henderson, Penn., July 3, 1804; d. at Hamilton, N.Y., Aug. 3, 1872. He was professor of ancient languages in Georgetown College, Ky. (1831-33), of mathematics and natural philosophy (1833-37), and of ecclesiastical and civil history (1837-50), at the Literary and Theological Institution, Hamilton, N.Y. The institution was incorporated in 1846 as Madison University: in it he served as professor of systematic theology (1850-61), was president (1856-68), and president of the theological seminary, and professor of homiletics (1861-71).

E'BAL (stone, stony), a mountain opposite Gerizim; rises 3,076 feet above the sea, and 1,200 feet above the valley. The distance between the two peaks is at the summit about a mile and a half, while their bases nearly meet; and experiments have shown that the voice can be distinctly heard from one peak to the other, as well as in the intervening valley. Ebal was one of the two mountains upon which Israel stood pronouncing blessings and cursings (Deut. xi. 29; Josh. viii. 30-35); and Conder thinks that the site of Joshua's altar may be found at the modern Amâd-ed-Dîn ("monument of the faith"), a sacred place on the top of Ebal. The modern Nablûs (the ancient Shechem) is situated in the valley.

EBO, Archbishop of Rheims; b. 786; d. March 20, 851; was the son of a serf, but the foster-brother of Louis the Pious, and was given freedom by Charlemagne; educated in a cloister school, ordained priest, and appointed to some ecclesiastical position at the imperial court. Louis the Pious made him Archbishop of Rheims in 816; and in 822 he assumed the lead of the Danish mission. He visited Denmark twice; and it was no doubt due to him that the Danish king, Harold Klak, when heavily pressed by domestic foes, sought refuge at the Frankish court, was baptized, and returned with Ansgar in his retinue. But there is no evidence, except his own words (Apologia Archiepiscopi Remensis cum ejusdem ad gentes septentrionales legatione), that he did any thing for the introduction of Christianity in Denmark, beyond cunning utilization of confused political circumstances. He was less successful in manipulations of the same kind in his native country. Though he owed every thing to Louis the Pious, he deserted him as soon as it became apparent, that, in the contest with his three sons, the sons had the ascendancy. When the armies met at Colmar, Ebbo did what he could in order to allure people away, by bribes and by threats, from the camp of Louis; and when the battle was lost, and the poor emperor was condemned to make public penance, Ebbo was there to take off his golden arms, and lay on the sackcloth and ashes, announcing to the world that he was thereby incapacitated to reign. But there came a turn in the affairs. Louis the Pious once more was in power; and Ebbo hastened to the diet of Diedenhofen (835) to be reconciled to him. The emperor was too angry, however. He threw the archbishop into a dungeon at Fulda; and there he lay, in spite of the Pope's protest, till the death of Louis (840). Lothair re-instated him in the archiepiscopal see, but Charles expelled him. Lothair then gave him as a recompense the abbeys of Stablo and Bobbio; but Ebbo felt disappointed, and tried Louis the German, who, however, had only a pittance left for him, — the administration of the diocese of Hildesheim. Besides the above Apologia, Ebbo has also written an Indiculum de ministris Remens. Eccl.

EBED JESU (Syriac, "Servant of God"), surnamed Bar Brika ("Son of the Blessed"), a Nestorian theologian of comprehensive scholarship; was born in the middle of the thirteenth century, in Gozarta, an island in the Tigris; became early Bishop of Sinshar and Arabia, and was, between 1285 and 1287, made metropolitan of Nisibis, or Zoba, where he died in the beginning of November, 1318. He left twenty works: one, exegetical, on the Old and New Testaments (not allegorical, as often stated); three, dogmatical, on the incarnation of the Logos, on the sacraments, and on the verity of the faith (edited in Syriac and Latin by A. Mai, in Script. Vet., 10, 317-366); several works referring to canon law; The Paradise of Eden, a collection of fifty poems (comp. Assemani, Bibl. Or., 3, 1, p. 325); twelve poetical tracts on the sciences; a book on the philosophy of the Greeks; a rhymed catalogue of two hundred Syriac authors (Assemani, Bibl. Or., 3, 1, p. 1-362), enumerating also his own works.

Different from this Ebed Jesu is another Nestorian patriarch of the same name, who in 1562 was converted to Romanism. R. GOSCHE.

EBEL, Johannes Wilhelm, Dr., b. March 4, 1784, at Passenheim; d. Aug. 18, 1861, at Hoheneck-in-Württemberg. After his graduation at Königsberg, he became acquainted with Johann Heinrich Schönherr one of the most original thinkers of the period, and espoused his views of relative dualism (see SCHÖNHERR). His pronounced evangelical views, and eloquent advocacy of practical Christianity, were distasteful to the rationalistic and dead orthodox clergy of the province, who tried, from the very beginning of his ministerial career at Hermsdorf (1807-1809), to awe him into submission, and, upon his removal to Königsberg as preacher and teacher of Frederick College (1810), resented his growing popularity by charging him with heresy. The matter being referred to Berlin by the local consistory, the latter, whose masked purpose was duly penetrated by Schleiermacher, received a scathing and well-merited rebuke for their ill-natured odium theologicum; while Ebel, whose dignified bearing under this persecution increased both his influence and popularity, was chosen preacher of the Old Town Church at Königsberg, the largest in the city, in 1816, and filled that high position until his deprivation in 1842.

This was brought about as follows. In 1826 a ministerial rescript, warning the several consistories against mysticism, pictism, and separatism, was eagerly seized by Schön, the provincial governor, a notorious enemy of Christianity, and an utterly unprincipled man, and the opponents of Ebel and Diestel, his brother minister and friend, as an opportunity for assailing him, on the pretence that he had founded a sect which held secret meetings, and advocated tenets of perilous and immoral tendency. The wildest rumors were circulated and believed; and after an animated controversy, necessitating the withdrawal of the first from Königsberg, Ebel and Diestel were openly charged with having founded a sect. Schön appointed Kähler, a member of the consistory, known to be personally hostile to and jealous of Ebel, to investigate the matter, with the result that he discovered, or rather invented, him guilty of the alleged charge of having founded a sect. Ebel refusing to admit the charge, and to submit to an interrogatory, unless the specifications were communicated to him, the consistory arbitrarily and illegally decreed his suspension ab officio, Oct. 7, 1835, and that of Diestel, Dec. 9, 1835. The action of the consistory led to a criminal suit, which lasted four years, with the result that the accused were acquitted of all charges except that of having founded a sect, and sentenced to be deposed, and Ebel to be imprisoned until he should have given proof of amendment. From this sentence appeal was made; and, after a further delay of eighteen months, the finding of the lower court was cancelled, Ebel acquitted of the charge of having founded a sect, but nevertheless deprived, on the ground of gross neglect of duty. There is probably no criminal case on record more flagrantly unjust; for, in spite of the acquittal of the offence with which Ebel and Diestel were falsely charged, they were punished with degradation from the ministerial office, of which they were bright and shining ornaments. Their persecution, originating in theological hatred, and eventuating in their sacrifice to it, took place at a time (1842) when the judicial process in Prussia was still private: that explains the injustice. To-day it would be impossible to bring such a case to the cognizance of a jury. After his deprivation, Ebel lived at Grunenfeld from 1842 to 1848, at Meran-in-the-Tyrol from 1848 to 1850, and at Hoheneck-in-Württemberg from 1850 to 1861, in which year he entered into rest. The memory of that noble man, purified from all the aspersions of theological hatred, and the calumnies of ungodly men, has been vindicated in the following and other works: HAINENFELD: Die Religiöse Bewegung, etc., Braunsberg, 1858; VON DER GRÖBEN: Die Liebe zur Wahrheit, Stuttgart, 1850; KANITZ: Aufklärung nach Actenquellen, Basel and Ludwigsburg, 1862. The last is a masterpiece; and its author has succeeded, by making the official record disclose the truth, in inducing every respectable encyclopædia and church-history to correct the slanderous and false notices which twenty years ago disfigured their pages. — An article on the Religious Suit may be seen in the Bibliotheca Sacra, 1869, vol. XXVI., No. 104, and the full history in my Life of Ebel, London and New York, 1882. — The most important of the works of Ebel are: Die Weisheit von Oben, 1823, 2d ed., Basel, etc., enlarged, 1868; Die Treue, 1835, 2d ed., ibid., 1863; Gedehliche Erziehung, Hamburg, 1825, in English, 1825; Die apostolische Predigt ist zeitgemäss, Hamburg, 1835; Verstand und Vernunft (by DIESTEL and EBEL), Leipzig, 1837; Zeugniss der Wahrheit (by the same), ib., 1838; Grundzüge der Erkenntniss der Wahrheit, ib., 1852; Die Philosophie der heiligen Urkunde des Christenthums, Stuttgart, 1854–56; Compas de route, containing extracts from most of these works, and also from the Liebe zur Wahrheit. See also s.v. SCHÖNHERR. J. I. MOMBERT.

EBER, Paul, b. at Kitzingen, Franconia, Nov. 8, 1511; d. at Wittenberg, Dec. 10, 1569; was educated at Ansbach and Nuremberg, and entered in 1532 the University of Wittenberg, where he gradually formed so intimate a connection with Melancthon, that he was called Philippi Repertorium. In 1541 he was appointed professor in Latin grammar, and began to lecture on the whole range of the artes liberales, publishing a handbook of Jewish history, a historical calendar, destined to supplant the calendar of Roman saints, etc. In 1557 he was made professor of the Old Testament, and in 1559 superintendent-general of the whole electorate. During the last years of his life he devoted himself almost exclusively to theology, and took part in the various theological controversies and disputations of the time, though essentially as a mediator. His Biblia Latina, a correction of the Latin translation of the Old Testament, he himself considered as his principal work. See SIXT: Paul Eber, Freund und Amtsgenosse der Reformatoren, 1843, and Paul Eber, ein Stück Wittenberger Lebens, 1857; PRESSEL: *Paul Eber, in Väter und Begründer der luther. EBERLIN, Johann, b. at Günzburg, in Suabia, in the second half of the fifteenth century; d. 1530; studied philology and philosophy at Basel; entered the order of the Franciscans, and was appointed preacher in their monastery at Tübingen, but afterwards removed to Ulm on account of disagreement with his superiors. In Ulm he became acquainted with the writings of Luther, and began to preach the views of the reformers. Compelled to leave the city, he went to Switzerland, where he wrote his first book, Die fünfzehn Bundesgenossen, 1521, dedicated to Charles V. After a stay in Wittenberg (1521–23), where he became intimately acquainted with Luther and Melancthon, he visited the regions of the Rhine, especially Basel and Ulm, preaching and publishing pamphlets in the spirit of the Reformation. During a second visit to Wittenberg he published his Wie sich eyn Diener Gottes worts ynn all seynen thun halten soll, etc., 1525. The last years of his life he spent in Thuringia, steadily working with energy and success, though in his own independent and original way, for the cause of the Reformation. See BERNHARD RIGGENBACH: Johann Eberlin von Günzburg und sein Reformprogramm, Tübingen, 1874.

EBIONITES. This designation was at first, like "Nazarenes," a common name for all Christians, as Epiphanius (d. 403) testifies (Adv. Her., xxix. 1). It is derived from the Hebrew עֲבִיּוֹנִים, "poor," and was not given, as Origen supposes, in reference to their low views of Christ, but to their own poverty. This poverty, especially characteristic of the Christians of Jerusalem, evoked from the Pagan and Jewish world the contemptuous appellation of "the poor." Minutius Felix says, "That we are called the poor is not our disgrace, but our glory" (Octav., 36). Subsequently its application was limited to Jewish Christians. "The Jews who accept Christ are called Ebionites," writes Origen (c. Cels., II. 1). Then, when a portion of the Jewish Church became separate and heretical, the designation was used exclusively of it. Later in the fourth century Epiphanius, Jerome, and others use it of a separate party within the Jewish Church distinct from the Nazarenes. This outline of history proves that Tertulian was wrong when he derived the term from a pretended founder of the sect called Ebion.

The notices in the early fathers are fragmentary, and at times seem to be contradictory on account of the double application of the term, now to Jewish Christianity as a whole, now only to a party within it. The New Testament knows of no sects in the Jewish Church, but indicates the existence of different tendencies. At the Council of Jerusalem a legalistic and Judaizing spirit manifested itself, which was in antagonism to the spirit of Paul, and was shown in the Judaizing teachings which did so much mischief in the Galatian churches. But it was not until after the destruction of Jerusalem, and the founding of Aelia Capitolina by Hadrian, in 134, that Jewish Christianity became a distinct school, gradually becoming more and more heretical till it separated into the two sects of Ebionites proper and Nazarenes. The latter still held to Paul as an apostle, and while they kept the law themselves, did not demand its observance of the Gentile Christians. The former held the observance of the law to be obligatory upon all Christians alike, and rejected Paul as an apostate. This was the state of affairs at the time of Justin Martyr (Dial. c. Tryph., 47). Irenæus, who does not mention this party division, describes the Ebionites as stubbornly clinging to the law, as rejecting the apostle Paul as an apostate, and all the Gospels except Matthew. He further notices a christological heresy. Denying Christ's birth from the Virgin, they regarded him as a mere man. Origen (c. Cels., V. 61) distinguishes between two branches of Ebionites, — those who denied and those who accepted the miraculous birth. Here the distinction between Nazarenes and the Ebionites proper becomes apparent. In the later fathers, as Jerome, Epiphanius, etc., the notices are more frequent; but nothing is added to our knowledge except that the Ebionites were chiliasts (Jerome ad. Esdr., 35, 1). In Epiphanius' day (d. 403) they dwelt principally in the regions along the Dead Sea, but also in Rome and Cyprus. The disintegration of Jewish Christianity was consummated by the introduction of Gnostic philosophy, of Greek culture, as also, perhaps, of Oriental theosophy. See the art. ELKESAITES.

EBRARD OF BETHUNE, a place in Artois, lived in the latter part of the twelfth and the beginning of the thirteenth century, and acquired a name as a writer on grammar and theology. Of his personal life nothing is known. His two known works are, Græcismus, a poem of two thousand verses, on grammar, prosody, rhetoric, etc., used for a long time as a handbook in the schools of the middle ages, and Liber antihæresis, a refutation of the heresies of the Cathari, at that time very numerous in the Flanders. The latter work, still important as a source of information concerning the doctrines of the Cathari, was first printed by the Jesuit Gretser, under the title Contra Waldenses, in his Trias Scriptorum contra Waldenses, Ingolstadt, 1614, then in Max. Bibl. Patr., Lyons, vol. XXIV., and finally in Gretser's Works, vol. XII. Several other works are ascribed to Ebrard; but the books are unimportant and the authorship doubtful. C. SCHMIDT.

ECBATANA (Greek Ἐκβάτανα, or Ἐκβάτανα, Babylonian Agamatanu or Agamtanu), the capital of Media, is mentioned (Ez. vi. 2) as Ἀχμῆθα, Achmetha. It was the place where, in Darius' time, was found the record of Cyrus' decree authorizing the restoration of the temple at Jerusalem. The name occurs often in Greek (Herodotus, Æschylus, Ctesias), and notably in the apocryphal books (Tob. iii. 7, vii. 1, xiv. 12, 14; Jud. i. 1, 2, 14; 2 Macc. ix. 3, etc.). It was, however, applied to several different places; and the question has been discussed whether the Ecbatana, whose magnificent fortifications are described by Herodotus (i. 98, 99), and in the Book of Judith (i. 2-4), is the same with the Ecbatana which was the summer residence of the Persian kings, — the modern Hamadân, and, if not, which of the two is the Hebrew Achmetha. Sir H. Rawlinson has sought to place the former at Takht-i-Suleiman, to the north of Hamadân, where there are remarkable ruins, and where topographical features are thought to favor Herodotus' description. There is, however, no evidence from the cuneiform inscriptions that the Agamtanu, the royal city of Astyages, which Cyrus captured (Trans. Soc. Bib. Arch., VII.), was not the Agamtanu of Darius (Behistun Inscr. 60); and the identity of this with the old Median capital on the one hand, and with Achmetha on the other, is probably to be maintained. In the autumn of B.C. 324, after the battle of Arbela, Alexander the Great spent some months in Ecbatana, and celebrated the Dionysia (ARRIAN., Exp. Alex. iii. 19); but after his death it had a checkered history, losing much of its prestige and influence, and subjected to the harsh treatment of successive conquerors. It was favored by the Parthian rulers, who made it once more the royal summer residence. But this honor was again taken away under the Sassanides; and it was completely overshadowed by Bagdad and Ispahan, dropping almost entirely out of notice. Hamadân, its modern representative, is an active business town of some fifty thousand inhabitants. There are few traces of antiquity to be found there, though the tombs of Esther and Mordecai are pointed out with pride. See KARL RITTER: Erdkunde, IX. 98-128; H. RAWLINSON: Memoir on the Site of the Atropatenian Ecbatana (Journ. of Royal Geogr. Soc., vol. X. art. 2, 1841); G. RAWLINSON: Five Great Oriental Monarchies, London and New York, 1881.

ECHELLENSIS, Abraham, b. at Eckel, in the latter part of the sixteenth century; d. in Rome 1664; was educated in the Maronite College in Rome, and appointed professor of the Syriac and Arab languages at the Congregation of the Propaganda. His chief work was his participation in the edition of the Paris polyglot under Le Jay, which lasted from 1640 to about 1653, though with interruptions. He furnished the Syriac, Arab, and Latin texts of the Book of Ruth, and the Arab text of the third Book of the Maccabees. He also undertook a revision of the labor of his predecessor, Gabriel Sionita; but this revision brought upon him a very severe criticism by Valerian de Flavigny (Paris, 1646), to which, however, he gave a very sharp answer (Paris, 1647). Comp. MASCHI: Bibl. Sacra, I, 357 sqq. Among his independent works are: a Syriac handbook, Rome, 1628; Eutychius Patriarcha Alexandrinus vindicatus, Rome, 1661; a defence of the episcopacy, directed against J. Selden; an edition of the letters and sermons of Anthony, Paris, 1641 and 1646; an edition of the Chronicon Orientale of Ibu ar-Râhib, Paris, 1653; Concordantia nationum Christ. Orient. in fidei catholice dogmata, Mayence, 1655 (together with Leo Allatius), etc. Assemani's verdict on him is severe but not undeserved. R. GOSCHE.

ECCLESIASTES (ἐκκλησιαστής, LXX., Ἐκκλησιαστής).

1. Title. — "The Book of Kohelath, the son of David, King in Jerusalem" (i. 1). The word Kohelath is the feminine participle of Kâhal, "to call together," "to assemble." Though feminine in form, which does not necessarily imply that the writer wished to identify himself with Wisdom (cf. Prov. i. 20), it is masculine in meaning, following the analogy of Sophereth (Neh. vii. 57), Pochereth (Ez. ii. 57), Alemeth, and Azmaveth (1 Chr. viii. 36). It is interpreted "preacher" (as if in the Hiphil, one who addresses an assembly, — Septuagint, the Vulgate, and Modern Versions), "debater" (one who is a member of an assembly), "collector" (i.e., of different opinions), "gatherer" (i.e., of an assembly).

2. Author. — (1) Solomon. — This is the traditional view. It is maintained by the rabbins, the fathers, and by the great majority of commentators. In its favor are: (a) The age of the opinion, which is strong a priori evidence in its favor; (b) The eminent fitness of Solomon to write this book, because of his divine wisdom and wide experience; (c) The style and diction belong to the golden age of Hebrew literature (so, e.g., argues Tayler Lewis; but others maintain the exact opposite); (d) The claim of the book itself, not made, it is true, in so many words (i.e., Koheleth does not say he was Solomon), but still made in the very title, in the sentence, "I was king over Israel in Jerusalem" (i. 12), and in many allusions (i. 16, ii., xii. 9, etc.); (e) The lack of agreement among critics as to date and authorship, if the Solomonic view be given up; (f) The natural desire to find some confession of repentance from one who so flagrantly disobeyed the elementary truths of Judaism; for, as Dante says, "All the world craves tidings of his doom" (Par., x.).

(2) An unknown personator of Solomon. — In favor of this view are: (a) The spirit of the book, which is sceptical, and most unlike that of Proverbs; for, whereas the latter book is cheerful and inspiring, Ecclesiastes is sad and depressing; (b) The difference of style between Ecclesiastes and Proverbs; for, whereas the latter's is correct and elegant, the former's is so full of irregularities, that "one might almost say the writer was in a death-struggle with the language;" (c) Such expressions as "I have been king in Jerusalem" (i. 12), "all that have been before me over Jerusalem" (i. 16); (d) The studied absence of direct statement regarding the personality of the writer; (e) The vocabulary is of an Aramaic cast; (f) The author's allusions to prevalent corruptions (iv. 1, v. 8, viii. 9, x. 5) are those of a student of life, and not of a king directly responsible for such abuses; (g) The late reception (in the first century B.C.) of Ecclesiastes into the canon, and that not without debate; for, as Plumptre says, "Absolutely the first external evidence which we have of its existence is found in a Talmudic report of a discussion between the two schools of Hillel and Shammai as to its admission into the canon of the sacred books" (Com., p. 27); the decisive fact in its favor was that its first and its last words were in harmony with the law; (h) The existence of an apocryphal book called The Wisdom of Solomon, which would scarcely have been written as a rival, and in places (cf. Wisd. ii., iii.; Eccles. ii. 18-26, iii. 18-22) as a corrective, of Ecclesiastes, if the latter were generally believed to have been Solomon's.

To these arguments the defenders of the traditional view reply: (a) The differences between Proverbs and Ecclesiastes, in spirit and style, are explicable on the ground that Solomon was an old and jaded man when he wrote the former book; and, besides, Hebrew is unfit for philosophic, while it is eminently fit for pithy, sententious expressions; (b) The Aramaic cast is much exaggerated; the one hundred (so styled) non-Hebrew words, or forms, or meanings (Delitzsch), can be reduced to eight (Herzfeld); and we know too little of the ramifications and connections of Hebrew with cognate dialects to make the argument of much weight either way; (c) The author's use of the past tense ("I was king," etc.) is happily paralleled by Mr. Bullock's quotation (Speaker's Com., iv. p. 623) of the language of Louis XIV. in his old age, — quand j'étois roi ("when I was king"); (d) The allusion to those who had been before the writer (i. 16) is quite easily interpreted of the "long line of Jebusite kings;" (e) The corruptions alluded to may have been outside of Judaism, nor was Solomon responsible for them all; (f) and (g) do not materially weaken the Solomonic origin theory.

The advocates of this theory emphasize the point that no other Hebrew than Solomon answers the descriptions given of the magnificence in which the unnamed author lived, nor is known to have possessed so rich an experience.

3. Date. — Among those who deny the Solomonic origin there is no agreement as to time. Opinions among the deniers vary from 975-588 B.C. — somewhere between Solomon and Jeremiah (Nachtigall) — to A.D. 8, the time of Herod the Great (Grätz, a modern rabbi); the reason for this extraordinary difference being the different opinions held as to the historical period whose social condition could explain the general tone of the production; for all agree that the time must have been very evil. To quote two eminent modern commentators upon Ecclesiastes, — Zöckler, in Lange, and Dean E. H. Plumptre. Zöckler says, "The book may be considered as about contemporary with Nehemiah and Malachi, or between B.C. 450 and 400, and the author to be a God-fearing Israelite of the sect of the Chakamim" (p. 15). Plumptre thinks that Ecclesiastes was written somewhere between B.C. 240 (the death of Zeno) and B.C. 181 (that of the death of Ptolemy Epiphanes); his principal reasons for this late date being the traces in the book of "the influence of the teaching both of Stoic and Epicurean philosophy, and the thorough saturation of the book with Greek thought and language. Such phrases as 'under the sun,' 'seeing the sun,' 'birds in the air,' are echoes in Hebrew of Greek expressions and ideas" (Comm. pp. 30-34).

4. Plan. — Here, again, there is no agreement. Some (like Zöckler) maintain that it is a formal treatise; others, that it is a collection of unconnected thoughts and maxims (Luther), like the Meditations of Marcus Aurelius, or Pascal's Thoughts; or a colloquy between a seeker and a teacher (Herder). One of the most elaborate attempts to analyze the book is Zöckler's. He maintains that it contains four discourses, of about equal length, upon the vanity of all human relations, destinies, and efforts: 1 (i. and ii.) Knowledge and enjoyment alike fail of their end; 2 (iii.-v.) The highest good is to enjoy this life and to do good; 3 (vi.-viii. 15) The practical wisdom of life consists of patience, contempt of the world, and fear of God; 4 (viii. 16-xii. 7) The only true happiness springs from benevolence, fidelity to duty, a contented and serene enjoyment of life, and sincere fear of God from early youth to advanced age. To these discourses is added an epilogue (xii. 8-14), which contains a comprehensive view of the whole, and a recommendation of the truths therein taught, with reference as well to the personal worth of the author as to the serious and important contents of his teachings. Zöckler, following other commentators, divides each of these discourses into almost as many subdivisions as there are verses. But instead of putting the book under the scalpel, and laying bare its bones, it is better to consider it as a living body, and discover the secret of its life. Taken thus as a whole, it may be considered as a confession written in prose, yet with a rhythmical flow (sufficient to justify Taylor Lewis in making a metrical version of it), devoid of plan, except so far as it is a continuous unburdening of self. Its unity is in its authorship and theme,—the vanity of life. Its contents are miscellaneous illustrations of the theme, derived from experience, and told with great sadness. It is because the book is thus a collection of observations, that some interpret the title, Koheloth by "collector."

5. Character and Tendency.—Many advocates of the Solomonic hypothesis find in the book evidence of his change of heart. But, whether Solomon be the author or not, it will be probably best to consider it a unique exhibition of Hebrew scepticism, subdued and checked by the Hebrew fear of God, and reaping lessons of wisdom from the follies of life. The tone is sad. On every side the writer sees persistent and gigantic evil. Nothing turns out as he would like. "O vanity of vanities, all is vanity." And yet the conviction is fixed that it is always right to do right; and, in view of the coming judgment (xi. 9), the book closes with this memorable sentence: "Fear God and keep his commandments, for this is all of man." Such a book is edifying rather than enlivening reading. Its facts are undeniable; but they are depressing, and represent only the dark side. There is no glad recognition of the glorious outcome of all the ills of life. Ecclesiastes has its place in the canon of Holy Scripture. It puts more vividly than in any other way the worthlessness of all human efforts to get happiness, and thus prepares the heart to accept of God's way of happiness,—a blameless, trustful, pious life.

ECK, Johann Maier von, b. at Eck, on the Günz, Nov. 13, 1486; d. at Ingolstadt, Feb. 10, 1543; was the son of a peasant, but was educated by an uncle, Martin Maier, who was priest at Rottenburg, on the Necker. He studied at Heidelberg, Tübingen, and Cologne, and took his degree, as master of arts, at Tübingen, 1501. From 1502 to 1510 he lived in Freiburg, in Breisgau, studying and teaching; and here he made his debut as a writer by his Logices Exercitamenta. He also found opportunity to distinguish himself as an orator, more especially as a disputant; and in 1510 he was appointed professor of theology in the University of Ingolstadt, which institution he actually ruled for the rest of his life. He was a man of great learning, though not a great scholar. His learning was knowledge rather than insight, the result of a remarkable memory rather than the product of a clear intellect. He was also possessed of great talent as a disputant; though he generally had the misfortune to confirm his adversaries in their own opinions, instead of alluring them over to his, for he lacked that seriousness of conviction which alone is able to create conviction in others. Though by no means a charlatan, he was one of those vain characters who believe the victory won when they feel their vanity gratified. Characteristically enough, he won his first laurels as a disputant by defending, in October, 1514, at the instance of the merchants of Augsburg, the proposition that "usury," as the taking of five per cent interest was then called by the Church, was legitimate business.

Having received the ninety-five theses of Luther, with whom he before had had friendly relations, Eck circulated, in March, 1518, a manuscript criticism on them, — Obelisci (marks made in books to draw the attention to suspicious passages). As Luther was away on his Heidelberg journey, Carlstadt published some counter-criticism (Conclusiones); and, when Luther returned, he answered with his Asterisci. A rapid exchange of theses and counter-theses now followed; and the affair was finally wound up by a grand disputation, which was solemnly opened at Leipzig, June 27, 1519. On June 27 and 28, and on July 1 and 3, Eck disputed with Carlstadt concerning divine grace and good works, etc.; and from July 4 he disputed for ten successive days with Luther concerning the absolute supremacy of the Pope, purgatory, penance, etc. The general impression was that Eck had won. He was flattered and feasted as the "Achilles of the Church." But the real result was, that Luther went away much clearer and more decided with respect to the futility of the Pope's claims to infallibility. Eck himself, however, does not seem to have felt quite sure about his victory. He suffered the humiliation that the arbitrators declined to give any verdict; and though he continued to shower a multitude of rabid theses, criticisms, etc., down upon Luther and the other reformers, he now saw fit to appeal to force. With the German princes he failed; but in January, 1520, he went to Rome, and the result was the bull Exurge Domine, which he was to make public in Germany himself in the quality of apostolical prothonotary and papal nuncio. The task, however, proved less enjoyable than he had expected. From Leipzig, from Erfurt, etc., he had to flee from the riots of the mob, covered with ridicule and scorn; and even in his own city, in Ingolstadt, he found it difficult to get the bull published with due solemnity.

Twice more Eck visited Rome on diplomatic errands; and though he was not received by Adrian VI. with the same cordiality as by Leo X., he nevertheless achieved his purpose. In Bavaria, too, his influence was steadily increasing, and he fairly succeeded in transforming the country into a province of the Spanish Inquisition. One process of heresy followed the other, and in them all Dr. Eck played a conspicuous part; but, in his ever-raging contest with the reformers, his successes were half only. His Enchiridion locorum communium adversus Lutherum ran through forty-six editions between 1525 and 1576. It was read and admired, but it had no permanent effect. Similarly with his disputation with the Swiss reformers. It cost him much exertion and many intrigues to bring it about. Zwingli would not leave Zürich, and to Zürich Eck dared not go. Finally Baden-in-Argau was fixed upon; and from May 21 to June 8, 1526, the disputation took place. Ecolampadius and Eck were the principal interlocutors, the doctrine of transubstantiation the principal subject. But, though Eck seemed to be in an uncommonly conciliatory humor, the only result of the disputation was, that the Swiss-reformed doctrine of the Lord's Supper became still more distinctly developed in its difference from the Lutheran. At the diet of Augsburg (1530) Eck had to write the refutation of the Protestant Confession; and he worked on it day and night from June 27 to July 13, assisted by twenty other theologians. But he was compelled to re-write it twice before it suited the emperor. In the last years of his life he was chiefly occupied in counteracting the various attempts made to bring about a reconciliation. It was due to him that the Roman-Catholic princes rejected the Regensburg Interim in 1541.

ECKHART (generally called Meister Eckart), the most remarkable of the German mystics of the fourteenth century, was probably born at Strassburg, 1260, and died, probably on a journey to Avignon, 1329. He belonged to the Dominican order, and was prior of Erfurt towards the close of the thirteenth century. In 1302 he taught in the College of St. Jacques in Paris, and took the degree of licentiatus theologiae. In 1303 he was appointed provincial of his order for Saxony, and in 1307 vicar-general for Bohemia. In 1308 he again taught in Paris, and in 1316 he settled at Strassburg as vicar for the grand-master of his order. There he became acquainted with the Brethren of the Free Spirit; and when, some time after, he was removed to Francfort as prior of the Dominican monastery, the extraordinary character of his preaching aroused suspicion, and he was accused, before the grand-master Hervé (at that moment present at Metz), of entertaining connections with suspicious persons. An investigation was instituted, and Eckart was acquitted. Archbishop Henry of Cologne, however, the implacable enemy of the Beghards, had formed an opinion of his own about Eckart; and in 1325 very heavy accusations against him were laid before the chapter of the order assembled in Venice. Nicholas of Strassburg, as papal nuntius et minister, was charged with the investigation; and, as he himself belonged to the mystical school of theology, he found nothing to blame in Eckart. But Henry would not suffer himself to be robbed of his prey in this way. He accused both Eckart and his protector, Nicholas, of heresy; and a regular process was instituted before an episcopal court of inquisition. Both Eckart and Nicholas protested against the competency of the court, and appealed to the Pope; but they were, nevertheless, both of them condemned. On Feb. 13, 1329, Eckart read from the pulpit of the cloister-chapel in Cologne a solemn declaration, in which he protested his willingness to recant any error into which he might have fallen. Immediately after, he set out for Avignon; but when the papal decision was given, in the bull of March 27, 1329, he had died. The bull, however, treated the case with great leniency. On account of the declaration he had made at Cologne, Eckart was evidently considered as one who, before death, had returned to the bosom of the Church. The bull condemned seventeen propositions of his, and pointed out eleven more as suspicious. But, in spite of this condemnation, his pupils still clung to him with great reverence and love. When Heinrich Suso wrote his autobiography, in 1360, he spoke of Eckart as the "holy master;" and his sermons were frequently copied in the monasteries of Germany, Switzerland, Tyrol, and Bohemia. In 1430 the papal condemnation was repeated; but in 1440 Nicholas of Cusa, nevertheless, mentions Eckart's works as one of the sources of his system. A collected edition of his works was given by Franz Pfeiffer, Leipzig, 1857.

What startles the reader in Eckart's writings is his strongly pronounced though mystic pantheism, often expressed with singular power. God is not the highest being, he says, for he is the only being. Outside of God there is nothing but illusion and deception. In its true existence every creature is not only a revelation of God, but a part of him; and—here enters the easy transition from Eckart's pantheistic speculations to his ascetic morals—the true object of human life must consequently be to strip it of all illusions and deceptions, and return into the one great being, God.

ECLECTICISM, a philosophical method by which a philosopher extracts from various systems of philosophy that which seems to him to be most strikingly true, and fits it together as best he knows how. The method is completely unscientific, and has never produced results of any account. It generally becomes very fashionable, however, in all post-philosophical ages, when the true philosophical productivity has died out. Neoplatonism was at the bottom eclecticism, and so was Roman philosophy in general.

ECUADOR, The Republic of, situated between Brazil, Peru, the Pacific Ocean, and Colombia, comprises an area of about three hundred thousand square miles, and contains, according to the census of 1875, about nine hundred thousand inhabitants, besides two hundred thousand Indians who are semi-civilized. The bulk of the civilized population consists of descendants of whites and Indians, Indians with fixed abodes, negroes, and descendants of negroes and whites, and negroes and Indians. They are all Christians; while the Indians, among whom there formerly was carried on a very active mission, have now relapsed completely into Paganism. According to the constitution, the Catholic-Apostolical-Roman Church is the Church of the State, and other denominations are excluded. Toleration is shown, however; but as yet no independent congregation has been established in the country. The relation to Rome is based upon a concordat of Sept. 26, 1862. The capital (Quito) is the seat of an archbishop. There are episcopal seats at Cuenca, Guayaquil, Riobamba, Loga, and Ibarra, and an apostolical vicariate at Napo. The number of the clergy is not given in the latest statistics: in 1858 it was insufficient. By the revolution, the Church lost its estates: it is now poor. Nor is proper care taken of popular education: its standard is very bad. G. PLITT.

EDELMANN, Johann Christian, b. at Weissenfels, July 9, 1698; d. in Berlin, Feb. 15, 1767; studied theology at Jena and Eisenach; was tutor in several Austrian families; lived for some time with the Moravian Brethren, and partook in the Berleburg translation of the Bible. He translated the Second Epistle to Timothy and the Epistles to Titus and Philemon. In the mean time he had reached the stand-point of absolute rationalism, considering all the positive religions defective forms, and reason as the highest authority also in the field of religion; and with this conviction he proposed to retire into obscurity, and maintain himself as a weaver. But he had already written his Unschuldige Wahrheiten (1735), and his friends induced him to go on with his authorship. There followed Moses mit ygedecktem Angesicht (1740), Die Götlichkeit der ernunft (1741), etc., books which attracted some attention by their coarse eloquence, and talent for blasphemy, but which made no real impression. The last years of his life he spent in Berlin, under the protection of Friederich II., though on the condition that he should publish nothing more. His autobiography was published by Klose, 1849. See MÖNCKEBERG: Reimarus und Edelmann, Hamburg, 1867; GUDEN: Edelmann, 1870. PAUL TSCHACKERT.

E'DEN (Heb. עֵדֵן; LXX. Ἐδέμ) is the land or region in which "the Lord God planted a garden," where "he put the man whom he had formed" (Gen. ii. 8). The Hebrew word (עֵדֵן), when used in the plural, has the meaning "delights;" and hence Eden has been supposed to mean "land of delight" (LXX. τροφή; Vulg. voluptas). The Hebrews themselves may have so understood it; but the real origin of the name is more probably to be found in the Assyrian idinu (from Accadian edin), "plain."

Description of the Garden of Eden. — Eden and the garden are so closely related in the Old Testament and in Christian thought, that it is necessary to treat of them together. Although in Gen. ii. 8, 10 they are not identical, and "the garden" is repeatedly mentioned alone in chapters ii. iii., while in iv. 16 Eden is so mentioned, with apparent reference to the land or region, yet the expression עֵדֵן-גַּן ("garden [of] Eden") occurs Gen. ii. 15, iii. 23, 24; Joel ii. 3; Ezek. xxxvi. 35; and in the following passages Eden alone seems to be used in the same sense: Ezek. xxviii. 13, xxxi. 9, 16, 18; Isa. li. 3. We find also the expression "garden of God," גַּן אֱלֹהִים Ezek. xxviii. 13, xxxi. 8 (twice), 9, and "garden of Jahve," גַּן-יְהוָה (Gen. xiii. 10, Isa. li. 3), and, with kindred meaning, "mountain of God," הַר אֱלֹהִים (Isa. xi. 9, lxxv. 25, Ezek. xxviii. 14, 16). The LXX. generally translate עֵדֵן by τροφή (see above), in Gen. ii. 8, 10, iv. 16, by Ἐδέμ, and in Isa. li. 3 by παρὰδεισος. This latter word (from Pers. pairidaēza, whence also Heb. פַּרְדֵּס) is generally employed by the LXX. for גַּן, "garden" (Ezek. xxxvi. 35, ἀήπος), and the Vulgate in most cases follows their example.

Eden and the garden were situated "toward the east;" i. e., eastward from the writer (Gen. ii. 8). The vegetation was luxurious (ii. 9): among other fruit-trees was found the fig-tree (iii. 7), and two trees beside, which are repeatedly named, but not minutely described, — "the tree of life," and "the tree of knowledge of good and evil." Irrigation was secured by a river flowing into the garden from Eden: where its sources were we are not distinctly told. On leaving the garden it divided into four "heads," or branches; and the course of each is indicated, except in the case of the fourth, which was too well known to need it. Besides its abundant fertility, the garden was also the home of all kinds of animals, including cattle, beasts of the field, and birds (ii. 19, 20).

Into this garden man was put "to dress it and to keep it" (ii. 15); i. e., to cultivate and guard it. Here he gave names to all the animals (ii. 20); here the woman was fashioned out of his rib (ii. 21, 22); here the two lived unclothed and innocent (ii. 25), accustomed to intercourse with God (ii. 19, 22, cf. iii. 8), with only one restrictive command to observe, — the prohibition to eat of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil (ii. 17). Through the specious words of the serpent (iii. 1-5) the woman was led to disobey the command, and the man followed her example (iii. 6). Thus they lost their innocence; and the Lord passed sentence upon them, and cursed the serpent. He provided tunics of skins (iii. 21) to take the place of the aprons of fig-leaves which the man and his wife in their shame had made (iii. 7), and then sent them out of the garden, that, with their newly-gained knowledge of good and evil, they might not eat of the tree of life also, and so live forever (iii. 22, 23). On the east of the garden the Lord placed "the cherubim, and the flaming sword, self-brandishing, to guard the way to the tree of life" (iii. 24). (See ADAM, CHERUBIM, CREATION, EVE, SERPENT, SIN.)

The conception of an early home of man, where innocence and happiness reigned, and there was habitual intercourse with divine beings, is found, with some striking similarities to the account in Genesis, in the mythologies of other peoples, notably those of India and Persia. According to the former, Mêru, the "mountain of the gods," situated in the north, gives rise to the spring Gangâ, which waters the "land of joy," on the summit, and then forms four lakes, whence issue four rivers that flow through four regions, and empty into four seas. On the northern side of Mêru was Utara-Kuru, a kind of paradise, in which Manu Vâivasata lived before the flood.

According to the Persian myths, the sacred mountain Harâ-Berezaiti, from which flow twenty rivers, overshadows the happy land, Airyana-Vaedja, where Yima dwelt in the time of his purity.

Such details as the tree, the serpent, and the loss of paradise through sin, also re-appear in these mythologies. The first two are found also in that of Babylonia; and here the conception of the cherubim appears under the form of the winged bull, called generally lamasu and šidu, and by other names, but also Kirûbu = כַּרְבּוּב (derivation probably from karûbu, "to be mighty, majestic"). The exact belief of the Babylonians as to the primitive condition and surroundings of man is not yet known.

But, whatever the general or even detailed resemblance between the biblical account and those in heathen mythologies, the differences are still more marked. The former is unique in its simplicity, dignity, lofty conception of God and of man, and in its distinct idea of sin as a voluntary and responsible violation of God's command, entailing the gravest moral consequences. And, while the Old-Testament writers looked back to the garden of Eden as the ideal of that which was lovely and desirable (Gen. xiii. 10; Joel ii. 3; Isa. li. 3; Ezek. xxviii. 13 sq., xxxi. 8, 9, 16, 18, xxxvi. 35; cf. Prov. iii. 18, xi. 30, xiii. 12, xv. 4), it became to the prophets a standard to measure the coming blessedness of the Messianic age (Isa. li. 3; Ezek. xxxvi. 35); and the conception of that happy time was more or less shaped by the recollection of what had been (Isa. xi. 6-9, lxv. 25; Ezek. xlvi. 1 sq.). Later Jewish thought (as seen especially in the Book of Enoch) developed the notion of the future abode of the chosen, and in the New Testament there appeared the clear belief in the Christian paradise. (See PARADISE.)

sired and intended that his readers should understand where Eden lay. He speaks of it as "eastward." He points out, incidentally, marked features of the land and climate. He seems to regard Eden as a definite region or district, by whose location another land could be described,— "the land of Nod on the east of Eden" (Gen. iv. 16). But most important of all is his statement with regard to the rivers. First there is a נַחַר, nahar (sometimes = "current," and then it may be used of the sea, as Jon. ii. 4; Ps. xxiv. 2; generally = "river," never "river-system"), flowing into the garden: this is not named. Then there are the four branches into which this river divides as it leaves the garden. The first is Pison (פִּיֶּסֶן), whose course is described with reference to "the land of the Havilah" (הַחַוִּילָה) הַפִּיֶּסֶן (A. V., "which compasseth") can mean "which surrounds," "flows quite around," or "bends around" one side (Num. xxi. 4; Judg. xi. 18), or even "goes about in," i. e., goes circuitously in; cf. Isa. xxiii. 16. (If this last is the meaning here, then we understand the use of כָּל, "all" before the names of the countries. Without this, the idea of passing quite through the countries would be unexpressed.) The land of "the Havilah" is then described as the land "where the gold is." It is added, "And the gold of that land is good; there is the bedolach and the shoham-stone."

The bedolach (בְּדוֹלַח) is mentioned in Num. xi. 7, where the manna is compared with it. Joseph, Ant., III. 1, 6, calls it βέλλιον, a reddish-brown resinous gum, transparent and fragrant, and he is generally followed. The manna was white (Exod. xvi. 31): the resemblance was perhaps partly in the consistency, and partly in the transparent character. The shoham-stone (שׁוֹהַם) has not been satisfactorily explained. LXX. (Job xxviii. 16) render οὖνξ, "onyx;" Joseph, "sardonyx;" LXX. (Exod. xxxv. 9), λίθος σαρδίου, "sardius;" LXX. (Exod. xxviii. 20; Ezek. xxviii. 13, and Targg.), "beryl" (βηρύλλιον); LXX. (Gen. ii. 12), ὁ λίθος ὁ πρᾶσιμος, "chrysoprasus;" LXX. (Exod. xxviii. 9, xxxv. 27), λίθος (της) σμαράγδου, "smaragdus." All these interpretations and other later ones (derived from Arabic sâlim, "sun-burnt," or Hebrew שׁוֹשׁ, "leek," from the green color) are wholly uncertain. The Babylonians apparently knew the stone as (abnu) sâmtu.

The second river (גִּיזָן), as above) is Gihon (גִּיזָן), "which flows about," or "winds through." "all the land of Cush." The third river is Chiddekel (Tigris): "this is the one going before Assyria." The fourth river is Phrat (Euphrates). No one questions the identity of the third and fourth rivers. The whole question turns about the first two, and the lands around or through which they flow. Each of these two rivers bears a name admitting of explanation from the Hebrew, Pison from פִּיֶּסֶן, and Gihon from גִּיזָן, both with the same general meaning, "to break forth," "flow forth." It is, however, quite conceivable that the original derivation was different, and that the Hebrews merely associated them with these roots.

But there is the greatest difficulty in harmonizing the statements in regard to them with modern geographical knowledge, and wide disagreement still prevails. There are said to have been in all some eighty hypotheses as to the position of Eden. This number, however, includes the eccentric proposals to find it in Prussia, on the shores of the Baltic (HASSE), or in the Canary Islands (CREDNER), and others of like character.

All the views which deserve notice here may be grouped under three heads:—

I. THEORIES WHICH PLACE EDEN IN THE FAR EAST.—This class of views is sometimes called "traditional," because it can be traced back to Josephus, and has been thought to rest on genuine tradition. It identifies the Pison with the Indus or the Ganges, and Havilah with India or, vaguely, with the Eastern region. Cush is then commonly the country south of Egypt, or, in general, the south land of Asia and Africa (see CUSH), and Gihon is the Nile; or else Cush is derived from the supposed Caspian people, Kooaioi; and Gihon is the Oxus, called by Islamites Gaihānu. (When Pison is made identical with Indus, then Gihon has sometimes been explained as Ganges.) It is then sometimes supposed that Euphrates and Tigris have been inserted in place of two other Eastern rivers. This general theory has been held, in some form of it, by Josephus, most church fathers, and, among modern writers, Ewald, Renan, Maspero, Bertheau, Dillmann, Rüetschi, etc. In support of this view such grounds as the following have been adduced, (a) The language of Gen. ii. 10, iv. 16, xi. 2, as well as modern research, point to the far East as the early home of man. (b) The Indian conception of Méru suggests that the biblical account rests on recollections from that region. (c) Gold and gems are products of India. (d) Havilah (being, perhaps, originally an appellative from הוּל, "sand," hence "the sandy," or "sand-land") can be applied to India as a country of which the Hebrews had only dim knowledge: denoted in their history a land south and south-east of Palestine; to extend it vaguely eastward as easy. (e) Gihon (= Nile, called Γῆων; LXX.

Gen. ii. 18) for Hebrew שְׁחֹר) may be regarded as the re-appearance of an Asiatic river, or as flowing out of the same earth-embracing Okeanos from which the Pison, Tigris, and Euphrates come. Gihon = Oxus is of course relieved from such difficulty. It is replied to these arguments, (a) The language of Gen. xi. 2 only shows that after the flood men came from the East; and although the legends of other peoples identify the original home of man with the resting-place after the flood (see Lenormant, Ararat and Eden, Contemp. Rev., September, 1881), there is no evidence that the Hebrews did the same. Gen. iv. 16, however, says nothing of the location of Eden, but only of the land of Nod; and Gen. ii. 8 need not mean more than that Eden was eastward from the writer of the account, or from those for whom he wrote. The scientific word as to the cradle of the human race is not yet so definite as to warrant the theory. (b) The assumption that the form of an Aryan tradition is a sure key to Semitic traditions is groundless. (c) Gold and gems are indeed found in India, but not only there. (d) Havilah was a land known to the Hebrews (see CUSH); and, whether India was so or not, the Hebrews must have been aware that Havilah did not extend across Tigris and Euphrates, and off into the distant south-east. (e) The "river" of Gen. ii. 10, which "went forth from Eden," can have nothing to do with Okeanos; and there is no proof that the notion of a river which disappeared in one continent, and re-appeared in another, existed among the Hebrews. As to the identification of Gihon with Oxus: the Arabic Gaihān is an appellative, and can be applied to any rushing river (e.g., Araxes, Gaihān er Ras); and the Kooaioi did not live east of the Caspian Sea, but, as is clear from the cuneiform inscriptions, in the mountain-region south-west from the Lake of Oromiah, and thence eastward toward the borders of Elam and Media.

II. THEORIES WHICH FIND EDEN IN ARMENIA.—These take as the starting-point the known sources of the Tigris and Euphrates, and seek two other rivers rising in the same region. Thus, Pison = Phasis, Havilah = Colchis (or Pison = Kur, Cyrus), Gihon = Araxes, Cush = Kooaioi. Representatives of this class of views are Reland, Calmet, Leclerc, Keil, etc. But, if the Kooaioi cannot be found on the eastern shore of the Caspian, neither can they on its western shore; and although some might be tempted to make use of the name of the country Kūsu, or Kusua, which appears on a Cappadocian tablet (Proceedings Soc. Bib. Arch., November and December, 1881), still it is not easy to see how this could be connected with an Armenian river. The other proposed identifications are still more precarious. Further: by no possibility could these four rivers be supposed to be branches of one parent-stream. When it is claimed that nahar can mean "river-system," this is not borne out by the usage of the language (see above); and the hypothesis (Luther and others) that the flood altered the physical features of Asia, so that the courses of streams are now different from the original courses, is unsupported by any thing in the biblical account of the flood, and is so far from being hinted at by the writer of Gen. ii. 10 that he evidently expects, in his description, to be understood by his contemporaries as referring to a region still accessible to men, and recognizable by them.

III. THEORIES WHICH PLACE EDEN IN BABYLONIA.—Advocates of this location had their attention fixed by the fact that the Euphrates and the Tigris are actually united for a certain distance in the Satt el-Arab, which then empties into the Persian Gulf by two or more mouths. The Satt el-Arab was therefore regarded as the "river" of Gen. ii. 10; the Euphrates and Tigris were looked upon as its branches, reckoning up the stream; and the Pison and Gihon were identified with the two main arms through which the Satt el-Arab empties. Calvin, who held this view, considered the Pison to be the eastern arm, and the Gihon the western. Scaliger and others followed him; while Huet, Bochart, etc., found Pison in the western, Gihon in the eastern arm. A modification of this view is given by Pressel (Herzog's Real-Encycl., ed. I., vol. XX., art. Paradies), to the effect, that, instead of being these outlets of the Satt el-Arab, Pison and Gihon are two tributary streams flowing in from the east. This form of the theory is more consistent than the other, since it seeks all four branches in the same general direction, — up the stream; but the words of Gen. ii. oblige us to seek them all in the opposite direction, — down the stream. Only in the direction of its current could the river, on leaving the garden, divide into four branches. Against these theories it is further urged that we have ample grounds, from classical history and from the cuneiform inscriptions, as well as from the nature of the soil and the present rate of physical change in that region, to believe that the sea once extended a hundred miles or more beyond its present limits to the north, thus covering the supposed site of Eden, and that the Euphrates and Tigris emptied into it without uniting (PLINY: Nat. Hist., VI., § 31; RITTER: Erdkunde, X. 3; KIEPERT: Alte Geog., p. 138).

Another view has been proposed, and advocated with great force and skill. It finds Eden in Northern Babylonia, immediately about the site of Babylon (FRIEDR. DELITZSCH, Wo lag das Paradies?). Where the Euphrates and Tigris approached nearest to each other, the country was intersected by very numerous water-courses, whose current was always from the Euphrates toward the Tigris, on account of difference of level (ARRIAN: Exp. Alex., VII. 7, contr. Xen. Anab., I. 7, 15). The effect was that of an extremely wide river flowing in almost countless channels. This is claimed to satisfy the requirements of Gen. ii. 10, and to be precisely the way in which an Oriental would conceive of irrigation, — the express object of the "river." As the Euphrates and Tigris, which have thus formed in effect only the outside limits of this great irrigating stream, diverge more widely from each other, they resumed their independent course; and from the former there proceeded two important streams, partly natural, perhaps partly artificial, like the water-courses named above; the Satt en-Nil (= Gihon) on the east, and the Pallakopas (= Pison) on the west. The Satt en-Nil was known as an important navigable stream as late as when the Arabs overran Babylonia. Delitzsch identifies it with the Assyrian Arahtu, or Gugân dê (Cun. Inscr. of Western Asia, II. pl. 50, and cf. 1172), mentioned immediately after the Tigris and Euphrates. This stream flowed through Babylonia, where the Kassû from the mountains (cf. Kassaiot, and Egyptian Kas, Keš, for 𐤊𐤍) had settled. The Pallakopas (Παλλακόπας, ARRIAN, Exp. Alex., VII. 21), although the name "Pison" (from Assyrian pisânu, "water-holder," "channel"?) is not known to have been applied to it, was of sufficient importance, and flowed into the Persian Gulf west of the mouth of the Euphrates; and Gen. x. 29, xxv. 18, 1 Sam. xv. 7, point to the north-west shore of the Persian Gulf as the location of Havilah. Gold, bdolach (if, as is probable, this is bdellium), and the yet unexplained shoham-stone (Babylonian sâmtu) are all authenticated products of Babylonia, to which, on this hypothesis, Havilah is immediately adjacent: there is therefore no difficulty in attributing these products to Havilah as well.

In general support of this theory are advanced, the dependence of the Hebrews on the Babylonians for their traditions, the extreme fertility of the district surrounding Babylon, the name attaching to that district (Karduniaš = "Garden of the god Duniaš"), the oldest name of Babylon and its environs (Tintira, "Grove of Life"), the fact that "Eden" has a satisfactory etymology in Akkadian ēdin, Babylonian-Assyrian īdinu ("plain," "lowland"), and the fact that the district northward from the junction of the Euphrates and Tigris is now called the Zôr, i. e., "depression" (WETZSTEIN, in DEL. Jesaja, 3 Ausg.).

The weak points in this theory are the following: the difficulty of understanding why the main river is not named in Gen. ii., if it is thus really the divided current of the Euphrates; the description of the Tigris by naming its course previous to its reaching Babylonia; the uncertainty attaching to the identification Pison = Pallakopas, and to the location of Havilah (the statements in Gen. x. 29, etc., quoted above, are, after all, vague); the lack of clear knowledge about the Kassû (= 𐤊𐤍) in Babylonia. While, therefore, it has the great merit of treating the biblical account as intelligent, and meant to be intelligible, and has much in its favor, we must await further light before accepting it as fully established.

EDEN (Heb. ֵדֵן) is named (Ezek. xxvii. 23) after Havan and Canneh. It denotes a people, probably the same with "the children of Eden," ֵדֵן (2 Kings xix. 12; Isa. xxxvii. 12), who are said to live "in Telassar" (תֵּלֶסָר), and are perhaps to be identified with the Bil-Adini ("house of Adin") in Western Mesopotamia, often named in the cuneiform inscriptions.

Whether the Beth-Eden of Amos i. 5 (בֵּית-עֵדֵן, A.V., "house of Eden") is the same people, is still a matter of question. This is at any rate more likely than its identification with 'Ehden on Lebanon, Beit Djenn at the foot of Hermon, or Djusieh el-Kalimeh, south-east from Laodicea, the Paradise of Ptolemy. The fact that it is named in connection with Damascus does not necessarily disprove its identity with the Mesopotamian Eden; for the intention of the prophet might be to extend his threatening to the Aramaic tribes generally.

At all events, the Hebrew pointing of עֵדֵן in these passages shows a correct apprehension that these Edens were distinct from the Eden (עֵדֵן) of Genesis.

(See FR. DELITZSCH: Wo lag das Paradies? Leipz., 1881; R. SMEND: Der Prophet Ezechiel, Leipz., 1880; E. SCHRADER: Die Keilinschriften und die Geschichtsforschung, Giessen, 1878.)

EDESSA, a city of Northern Mesopotamia (the Armenian Edesia, the Syrian Urhoi, the Arab Rohâ, the present Orfa or Urfa), is situated on the Daisun, a tributary to the Euphrates, fifty-five miles west of Diabekir, and is estimated to have a population of from twenty-five thousand to fifty thousand. It seems to be a very old city. One tradition identifies it with Erech, one of the principal cities of the Babylonian Empire; another, with the Ur of the Chaldeans. But nothing is known with certainty of its history until after the Macedonian conquest of Persia. A Græco-Macedonian colony was settled in the city and its neighborhood; and in 136 B.C. Urhoi, or Osrhoes, founded an independent kingdom there, Osrhoene, which lasted till 217 A.D., when Caracalla made the country a Roman province. In 637 the city was conquered by the Arabs; but in 1097 Count Baldwin of Flanders succeeded in establishing once more an independent empire there, which for fifty years formed a bulwark for the kingdom of Jerusalem. It was conquered in 1146 by Nouredin, and the city is now a Turkish possession.

Christianity was early introduced in Edessa; though the legend about the correspondence between Christ and King Abgarus appears to have no historical foundation. In the third century the city became the seat of a bishop, and in the fourth the wealth and splendor of its churches and monasteries was such as to tempt the covetousness of Julian. In the fourth century it also became the principal seat of Syrian learning. Ephrem Syrus resided there, and was the founder of the Edessene school of theology. At the same time the Persian school flourished in the city. After the death of Ephrem, however, his school fell into the hands of the Arians, just as, later on, the Persian school became the stronghold of Nestorianism. After the Mohammedan conquest, the Christian churches were transformed into mosques. The city is still the seat of a Greek bishop and an Armenian bishop.

EDICT (1) is an order issued by a ruler, either of command or prohibition. It is applied in church history to the orders of the Roman emperors relating to Christianity. From Trajan to Constantine these edicts had instituted persecution. But Constantine issued three which forbade meddling with Christians on the part of the authorities. Several religious edicts of previous Roman emperors are extant; but, as they are altogether too favorable to Christianity, grave doubt is thrown upon their genuineness. The distinction between an edict and a rescript is that the latter is issued in answer to an inquiry. See PERSECUTIONS, and KEIM, Rom und d. Christenthum, Berlin, 1881.

(2) Edict is the technical name for a formal invitation given by presbyteries in Scotland to all who know any thing against the character of a pastor-elect to come forward and testify.

EDICT OF NANTES. See HUGUENOTS, NANTES.

EDICT OF WORMS. See LUTHER, WORMS.

EDIFICATION, a New-Testament designation, comparing the Church and the Christian believer to a house or temple (1 Cor. iii. 9; Eph. ii. 21). Christian character is an edifice built on Christ (Eph. ii. 20; Col. ii. 7), and enlarged by the Word (Acts xx. 32), Christian intercourse (1 Thess. v. 11), and all the other means of grace. The Holy Ghost himself dwells in the believer regarded as a temple (1 Cor. vi. 19); and the constant injunction is, that it should be kept holy, and thus be a fit sanctuary of God (1 Cor. iii. 17).

E'DOM, E'DOMITE, IDUMÆ'A, IDUMÆ'AN.

[Esau (עֵשָׂו), the twin-brother of Jacob, was the son of Isaac and Rachel, and was so called because he was "hairy" (Gen. xxv. 25). He was subsequently named Edom (דִּי'וּמָא, "red"), because he said to Jacob, "Feed me with that same red," meaning lentils (xxv. 30). The traits of their ancestor re-appear in the Edomites; for, like Esau, they were wild hunters, and of low spiritual tone.]

The Land of the Edomites was called Seir (סֵיר, "rugged"). The original inhabitants were the Horites ("dwellers in caves"), or troglodytes. The Edomites, who dispossessed them, are sometimes called "children of Seir" (2 Chron. xxv. 11, 14). The country lay south of the Dead Sea, and west of the Arabah (Josh. xv. 1; Judg. v. 4); although in a wider sense the same name is given to a stretch to the east of the Arabah (Deut. ii. 1). Poetically the country was the "Mount of Esau" (Obad. 8, 9, 19, 21). From the "Mount of Judah" it was separated by the wilderness of Zin (Josh. xv. 1). Bozrah (now Busairah) was, at all events, at times, its capital (Isa. xxxiv. 6). Among its other cities were Sela (Petra), in a narrow wady off the Arabah (2 Kings xiv. 7; Isa. xvi. 1); Maon (now Ma'an) (Judg. x. 12); Elath, or Eloth, and Ezion-geber, the important harbors at the northern end of the Red Sea (Deut. ii. 8; 2 Chron. viii. 17). The borders of the country varied, especially to the west and east, as their fortunes rose and fell. The country is mountainous; but the soil in the glens and on the mountain-terraces bears a luxuriant growth of plant and vegetable life,

The People and their History. — There were kings in the land of Edom "before there reigned any king over the children of Israel" (Gen. xxxvi. 31). The Edomites were brave warriors, and fond of the chase; but they also cultivated the soil, and carried on trade, especially from their great ports Elath and Ezion-geber. They, or at least the Temanites, one of their tribes, were famous for wisdom (Jer. xlix. 7; Obad. 8; cf. Eliphaz the Temanite, Job ii. 11). In religion they were polytheists, and probably Baal-worshippers. Their history as given in the Bible begins with the victory of their King Hadad over Midian (Gen. xxxvi. 35). When the Israelites, on their way to the promised land, asked permission to go through Edom, they were refused (Num. xx. 14-17), and therefore they went around (xx. 21). The insult was all the greater because of Moses' recognition of brotherhood in Edom. The ill feeling thus naturally produced increased; and, as soon as the Israelites were united under a king (Saul), they made war upon the Edomites, whom they now called "enemies," and under David brought them into subjection (1 Sam. xiv. 47; 1 Kings xi. 15 sq.); in which condition they remained until the reign of Jehoram (2 Kings viii. 20-22), when they broke the yoke, and "made a king over themselves." Amaziah fifty years afterwards attempted to reconquer them, but was only partially successful (2 Kings xiv. 7; cf. 2 Chron. xxviii. 17). The later kings of Judah were too much engrossed by troubles with Assyria to undertake expeditions against Edom, and therefore the Edomites enjoyed independent government (Jer. xxvii. 3). The relations between the two kingdoms probably continued hostile: at all events the Edomites joined Nebuchadnezzar in the siege and pillage of Jerusalem, and therefore are cursed by the prophets (Ezek. xxxv. 15; Amos i. 11, 12; Obad. 10-16). They also improved the opportunity to leave their territory, and go as far north as Hebron (1 Macc. v. 65); and therefore the later name, Idumæa, designated quite another district than the old Edom. Into the lands they left, Arab tribes came, and built up a mighty kingdom, with Petra as its capital. The highly interesting ruins discovered at Petra by Burckhardt, in 1812, date from the time of the Roman rule. Petra gave at a later period the name Arabia Petraea to the whole land (see art. NABATHÆANS). The old hate of Edom for Israel came out in the later relations of the two peoples (1 Macc. v. 3, 65; 2 Macc. x. 15, xii. 13 sq.). John Hyrcanus (135-105 B.C.) forced the Idumæans to unite with the Jews and to receive circumcision (Joseph., Antiq., XIII. 9, 1, XV. 7, 9); but Antipater, the son of the governor of Idumæa, having gained Julius Cæsar's favor, was by him appointed Procurator of Judæa (47 B.C.). His son was Herod the Great, whom the Roman senate appointed (40 B.C.) King of Judæa (Joseph., Antiq., XIV. 14, 4); and in his family the kingdom was held until the death of the last king, Agrippa II. (A.D. 100).

Under the Romans, Idumæa formed one of the eleven toparchies into which Judæa was divided (Joseph., War, III. 3, 5). During the confusion of the great Jewish war against Rome, the Idu- mæans make their last appearance on the stage of history, and their rôle is tragic. Twenty thousand of them came to Jerusalem on the invitation of John of Gischala and the Zealots; and, because they were not immediately received, they were so enraged that they caused the streets of Jerusalem to run with blood (Joseph., War, IV. 4 and 5). — Curiously enough the name of "Edomite" is given by the rabbins to the Romans, because the latter were also the death-foe to the Jews.

ED'REI (strength, stronghold) was (I.) the name of the second capital of Bashan, situated on the road which the Israelites under Moses followed to go from Gilead to Bashan, and the place where King Og attacked them, and lost his life (Num. xxi. 33; Deut. iii. 1-10). Its ruins, covering a space of three miles in circuit, and consisting of remains of temples, churches, and mosques, form the present Edhra or Der'at, a place inhabited by about five hundred souls.

II. A town of Naphtali, identified by Porter with Tell Khuraibeh, two miles south of Kedesh (Num. xix. 37).

EDUCATION AMONG THE HEBREWS, before the exile, consisted mainly in the knowledge of the distinctive tenets, facts, and symbolism of their religion, and was imparted by parents to their children (Exod. xii. 26, 27; Deut. iv. 9, vi. 6, 20). Some have inferred from Deut. vi. 8, 9, xxvii. 2-8, that a knowledge of reading and writing was common; but this is probably going too far. The priests, of course, could read and write; and thus there was always a large body of educated men. Educated laymen are also mentioned, such as the historians of the Judges and Kings, the surveyors of the promised land (Josh. xviii. 8, 9), and the diplomats, who conducted the business with foreign courts and peoples (2 Kings xviii. 26). That the mass of the people were illiterate was nothing particularly unfavorable to Judaism; for what ancient people, except possibly the Chinese, could show any different state of things? Popular education is, in our sense of the term, a very modern and Protestant phenomenon. It may be claimed for the ancient Hebrews that their sacred books and their profound religious mysteries and services gave them a mental training far superior to that of any contemporary nation.

From the mention of "sons of the prophets" (1 Kings xx. 35; 2 Kings ii. 3, 5), it has been inferred that certain young men were trained for the prophetic office in so-called "schools of the prophets," at Naioth (1 Sam. xix. 18—for this name is interpreted in the Targum "the house of learning"), Bethel, Jericho (2 Kings ii. 8, 5), and other places; but such training was given to few, and, besides, was technical, consisting of homiletics and music.

During the captivity the synagogue system of worship was developed; and as a consequence, a higher grade of intelligence in religious and educational matters characterized the national life. On the return, the disuse of Hebrew as a vernacular rendered instruction in it imperative, if the people at large were to understand their own sacred books. Contact with great nations like the Babylonian, the Greek, and the Roman, enlarged the Hebrew mind. Other things than religion claimed attention. Jerusalem became the seat of a university, and in strange contrast to former exclusiveness there was generous appreciation of heathen culture. In the towns and villages education was not carried so far. Reading and writing, the law, and the tenets of the Jewish faith, were probably the only topics taught. "At five years a child should study the Bible, at ten the Mishna, and at fifteen the Talmud." A graphic description of the school in Nazareth in our Lord's day is given by an anonymous writer in these words: [The school-room is] "the interior of a squalid building rudely constructed of stone, with a domed roof, and whitewashed walls, a wooden desk or cupboard on one side, and an inscription in Hebrew over the door. From the building, as we approach, comes the hum of many children's voices, repeating the verses of the sacred Torah [the law] in unthinking and perfunctory monotone. The aged teacher sits silent in the midst. As we look in, we see his huge turban, his gray beard, and solemn features, appearing over the ruddy faces of the dark-eyed boys who sit on the floor around him. The long row of tiny red slippers extends along the wall near the door. The earthen water-bottle stands on the mat beside the Khazzan, or synagogue teacher. The scholars are the children of the richer members of the village community; of the Betlanim, or 'men of leisure,' who form the representative congregation at every synagogue service; or of the 'standing men,' who go up yearly with the village priest for a week in Jerusalem, to fulfil similar functions in the temple ritual" (Rabbi Jeshua, Lond. and N.Y., 1881, pp. 23, 24).

Thus, even then, education was limited, and there was much ignorance; so that the phrase "country people" was synonymous with the "illiterate." Of these the contemptuous remark was made by the Sanhedrin, "This multitude which knoweth not the law are accursed" (John vii. 49). Very probably this ignorance was principally among the lowest class, the lineal descendants of the primitive settlers of Palestine, whose children are the wretched fellahin of to-day. According to Philo (On the Virtuous being also Free, Bohn's trans., vol. iii. 509) Josephus (Contra Apion, i. 12), and the Talmud, the pious Jews took great pains with their children's education. "Jerusalem was destroyed because the education of children was neglected." "The world is preserved by the breath of the children in the schools." So said the rabbins. The later Jews were taught a trade in their schools, and thus would earn their own living. That Saul of Tarsus, the learned pupil of the great rabbin Gamaliel, had a trade (tent-making) was quite in the order of things (Acts xviii. 3). The most celebrated doctors of the law supported themselves. — Unmarried men or women were forbidden to teach boys. The Essenes are honorably mentioned for their care of children.

Female education was of very limited extent among the Hebrews, as among all Oriental peoples; but more advantages were open to Hebrew mothers than to those of other lands. They were taught the law (for they were expected to join their husbands in educating their children) and also woman's proper work. The Hebrew ideal wife (Prov. xxxi. 10-31) was a woman of superior training, destitute though she might be of book-learning. To be a model wife and mother was set before the Hebrew maiden as a loftier object of womanly ambition than a so-called "higher education." Yet a few women acquired learning.

After the destruction of Jerusalem the Jewish rabbins set up high schools in other places. Two of these achieved great fame (Tiberias and Babylon); for they furnished respectively the Jerusalem and the Babylonian Talmud (i.e., the Gemara portion), in which they poured forth a stream of varied learning unparalleled in history. "The Talmud is an encyclopædia of all the sciences of that time, and shows that in many departments of science these Jewish teachers have anticipated modern discoveries." See the elaborate article on Schools, Hebrew, by Dr. Ginsburg, enlarged by Rev. B. Pick, Ph.D., in McCLENTOCK and STRONG'S Cyclopædia, vol. ix. 429-435. Monographs to be mentioned are: MARCUS: Zur Schul-Pädagogik, Berlin, 1866; VAN GELDER: Die Volksschule des jüdischen Alterthums, Berlin, 1872; SIMON: L'éducation des enfants chez les anciens Juifs, 3d ed., Leipzig, 1879.

EDUCATION, Ministerial. — Organizations and Measures for aiding in. — From the earliest ages it has been the policy of the Christian Church to aid in the education of worthy but indigent students who had consecrated themselves to the gospel ministry. Calvin, in his Institutes, Book IV. chap. 4, § 9, speaking of the pattern set for us in this particular by the primitive fathers, says, "For to form a seminary which shall provide the church with future ministers, those holy men took under their charge, protection, and discipline such youths as, with the consent and sanction of their parents, enlisted themselves in the spiritual warfare. And so they educated themselves from an early age, that they might not enter on the discharge of their office ignorant and unprepared." And this custom was kept up through the middle ages by the monastic schools, which were liberally endowed for this purpose by pious souls, and it is still maintained everywhere by the Roman Church. Her priests are to this day all and altogether educated at the church's expense. The Protestant churches have been no less wisely liberal in their provisions for the supply of their pulpits. Neither by those of the Lutheran or Reformed name was poverty allowed to bar any worthy young man from the privilege of qualifying himself for the Christian ministry: aid was furnished him, sometimes by scholarships attached to the schools, and sometimes by contributions taken up directly for this purpose by the congregations, and sometimes by private mu-nificance. As an example may be cited the act passed by the first national synod of the French Reformed Church in 1559: "In order that the church may be furnished with a sufficient number of pastors and other persons fit to govern them, and preach the word of God unto them, they shall be advised to choose those scholars who are already well advanced in good learning, and of most promising and hopeful parts, and to maintain such in the universities, that they may be fitted and prepared for the work of the ministry. Kings, princes, and the nobility shall be petitioned and exhorted particularly to mind this important affair, and to lay by some part of their revenues towards their maintenance; and the richer churches shall do the like. Colloquies (i.e., presbyteries) shall, as they see meet, take the best measures in the premises that matters of so great necessity may be successful. If single churches have not means, their neighbors shall join them, so that one poor scholar at least may be maintained in every colloquy. And, in order that this design shall not fail, every fifth penny of all churches shall be set apart, when it may conveniently be done, to be employed in this service." A like policy was general throughout the Reformed bodies of France.

In 1641 the General Assembly of the Scotch Church recommended that every presbytery consisting of twelve ministers should maintain one bursar, and, when the number was fewer than twelve, they should be joined to another presbytery. Four years later, the minimum of aid ordered to be given was put at a hundred pounds scots yearly. Shortly after the session of the Westminster Assembly, a society for securing and aiding candidates of the ministry was organized by leading divines and laymen, several of whom were members of that assembly; and among these were such men as Baxter, Bates, Poole, Stillingfleet, and Cudworth. This movement, however, came to an end soon after the Restoration. The Church of England attains the same result by scholarship endowments at her universities.

In the United States of America the scarcity of ministers, and the exigencies of an extending population, constrained the leading ecclesiastical bodies and prominent members in the church early to adopt vigorous measures for meeting the demand thus created. Colleges were founded at Cambridge (1636) and New Haven (1700) and in New Jersey (1748), where education was freely granted to young men contemplating the ministry who were unable to defray their own expenses. In 1751 the synod of New York "recommended an annual collection from all its churches for the support of young students whose circumstances render them incapable of maintaining themselves at learning." Funds also were obtained from England and Scotland and Ireland for this same cause, but with special reference to the supply of the ministry. In 1770 the combined synods of New York and Philadelphia approved and recommended a plan proposed by the president of New Castle "for the assistance of candidates for the ministry by assessments in proportion to the number of ministers and on vacant congregations, as well as by voluntary annual subscription." These and other initiatory measures culminated in the organization of a "board of education" by the General Assembly in 1819. This board, with various modifications of rules and measures, has continued until this time. At present (1881) the maximum appropriation for a student, when the funds allow it, is a hundred and fifty dollars for students in college and theological seminary. Besides the aid thus given, there are scholarships attached to her institutions, of which worthy students may avail themselves. Full three-fourths of her ministry have thus been more or less helped into sacred orders.

There is also a board of education in Presbyterian churches (South), conducted on the same principles.

In the Episcopal Church the education work is left to the several dioceses, some of which have small societies collecting each a few hundred dollars per year. It has, besides, two general societies representing the two prominent schools of thought in the Church; viz., the Society for the Increase of the Ministry (organized 1857, and having its office in New York, mainly High Church in its tendencies, which has helped to ordination five hundred and fifty young men), and the Evangelical Education Society (organized 1862, and having its office in Philadelphia, which has contributed two hundred and fifty men to the ministry). It acts upon a liberal policy, and grants stipends according to the needs of the student, even to the amount of three hundred dollars per annum.

In 1815 was formed the American Education Society, a voluntary association, combining among its members at the first both Presbyterians and Congregationalists, but of late years confined almost exclusively to the latter body. For a long period this society was strengthened by auxiliary bodies organized in the several States of the North and in parts of the West; but these auxiliaries have now altogether expired. In 1873 this society was united under one administration with the college society, and has its office in Boston. Besides annual contributions from the Church, it has fifty-four endowed scholarships, the revenues of which go to aid students. The whole number of students aided by it up to the year 1880 is 6,724.

The Baptists have no general education society; but, instead, they have a number of limited organizations scattered throughout the States. Of these there are at present nine. The amount of aid granted by these varies according to the need of the students; some receiving per year between two hundred and fifty and three hundred dollars.

The Board of Education of the Methodist-Episcopal Church was organized in 1869, and has several auxiliary societies established in different parts of the Union. Its scope is broader than most of the other kindred organizations; as it contemplates aiding, not only individual students, but also literary and theological institutions, both at home and abroad. The grants made to students are chiefly in the form of loans, to be paid back at the earliest opportunity.

The Reformed Church (lately Dutch), the Lutheran Church, the German-Reformed Church, and indeed nearly all other Christian bodies, operate on the same principle to secure a ministry among themselves suited to edify their congregations, and command public respect. And we must add, that it is to the wise and liberal policy thus pursued the fact is largely due that the ministry of Protestant Christendom throughout the world has attained its present high repute, not only for sound moral and religious character, but also for broad intelligence and extensive learning.

D. W. POOR.

EDWARDS, Bela Bates, D.D., was b. in Southampton, Mass., July 4, 1802; graduated at Amherst College in 1824, at Andover Theological Seminary in 1830. In the two years 1826-28 he was a tutor in Amherst College, and in the five years 1828-33 he was assistant secretary of the American Education Society. In 1837 he was ordained as a minister of the gospel, and was also appointed professor of the Hebrew language in Andover Theological Seminary. Professor Moses Stuart having resigned his office in 1848, Professor Edwards was elected as his successor. In this professorship he explained the Hebrew and Greek Scriptures with great accuracy and success. He was an enthusiast in sacred philology. He injured his constitution by his unremitting toil. In 1846, in consequence of enfeebled health, he made an extended tour in Europe, visiting England, France, Germany, and Italy. In 1851 he was again compelled to absent himself from Andover, and spend the winter in the South. He died at Athens, Ga., April 20, 1852 when he was nearly fifty years of age. He was distinguished not only as a skilful instructor, but also as a wise counsellor. He united soundness of judgment with rare delicacy of taste and poetic sensibility. Without grace of elocution, he was an eloquent preacher. The tenderness of his sensibilities, and the earnestness of his piety, were indicated in his countenance and tones of voice, as well as in his pure and classical language. He originated and planned many philanthropic institutions, among others, that which has resulted in the Congregational Library at Boston. He published various addresses and sermons, and an indefinite number of newspaper articles. In 1831 he edited the Memoir of Henry Martyn, and added to it valuable Notes and an Introductory Essay. His character bore a striking resemblance to that of Martyn. In 1832 and 1835 he edited two high-school books, The Eclectic Reader and The Introduction to the Eclectic Reader. In 1832 he published The Biography of Self-taught Men, also The Missionary Gazetteer. The former of these works has been repeatedly republished. In 1839 he united with E. A. Park in a volume of Selections from German Literature. In 1843 he united with Dr. Sears, afterward president of Brown University, and Professor Felton, afterward president of Harvard College, in publishing a volume entitled Classical Studies. In 1844 he and Dr. Samuel H. Taylor translated and published the larger Greek Grammar of Dr. Kühner. While assistant secretary of the Education Society, he became an editor of The American Quarterly Register, and had the chief care of this periodical from 1828 to 1842. In 1833 he founded The American Quarterly Observer, took the sole care of it for three years, and then united it with The American Biblical Repository, which, during the four preceding years, had been edited by Professor Robinson at Andover. In 1844, in conjunction with E. A. Park, he established the Bibliotheca Sacra on its present plan. Of this periodical he remained editor-in-chief until 1852. Mainly through his influence The Biblical Repository, then published in New York, was united with the Bibliotheca Sacra in 1851. For twenty-three years he was employed in superintending periodical literature, and, with the assistance of several associates, has left thirty-one octavo volumes as the monuments of his enterprise and industry. As an early and active friend of two important academies and of Amherst College, which he served as a trustee, as a director of the American Education Society, and a zealous member of other philanthropic institutions, he performed a vast amount of labor, the results of which will long remain. Some of his discourses and essays were published in Boston in 1853, in two duodecimo volumes. The first volume contains a Memoir in 370 pages by the editor.

EDWARDS A. PARK.

EDWARDS, John, D.D., b. at Hertford, Feb. 26, 1637; d. at Cambridge, April 16, 1716. He was "a zealous Calvinist, and a most voluminous writer." His principal works were, Discourse concerning the authority, stile and perfection of the books of the Old and New Testament, London, 1693, 3 vols.; A complete history, or survey, of all the dispensations and methods of religion from the beginning of the world to the consummation of all things, as represented in the Old and New Testament, London, 1699, 2 vols.; The preacher, London, 1705-1709, 3 vols.; Theologia reformata, London, 1713-26, 3 vols. folio.

EDWARDS, Jonathan, the Elder. The ancestors of Jonathan Edwards in this country were notable men. His great-grandfather, William, and his grandfather, Richard, were among the pillars of society in Hartford, Conn. His father, Rev. Timothy Edwards, was born at Hartford, in May, 1669, graduated with distinguished honor at Harvard College in 1691, ordained pastor of the Congregational Church in "Windsor Farms," now East Windsor, Conn., in 1694. He remained pastor of this church more than sixty-three years, and died Jan. 27, 1758, at the age of eighty-eight. There was a marked resemblance between the sermons of the father and those of his son. — The mother of Jonathan Edwards was Esther Stoddard, daughter of the noted "father in Israel," Solomon Stoddard, who for more than fifty-six years (1672-1729) was pastor of the Congregational Church in Northampton, Mass. She was a woman of queenly presence and admirable character. She was born in 1672, married in 1694, became the mother of eleven children, and died in 1770, in the ninety-ninth year of her age. Ten of her eleven children were daughters; Jonathan being the only brother in a nest of sisters, four of whom were elder, and six younger, than himself. He was born in East Windsor, Conn., Oct. 5, 1793. In his early years he was instructed, partly at the public school, chiefly by his parents and sisters, at home. His father being an excellent classical scholar, his mother being uncommonly intelligent and refined, his elder sisters being well trained in Latin and Greek, were the best instructors he could have had. He began the study of Latin when he was only six years old. Before he was thirteen, he had acquired a good knowledge of Latin, Greek, and Hebrew. In his childhood he was taught to think with his pen in hand, — thus to think definitely, in order that he might express his thoughts clearly. When he was about nine years old he wrote an interesting letter on Materialism, and when he was about twelve he wrote some remarkable papers on questions in natural philosophy. One month before he was thirteen years of age, he entered Yale College. There he spent four years, and was graduated, with the highest honors of his class, in 1720. At the age of fourteen, one of his college studies was Locke on the Human Understanding. "Taking that book into his hand upon some occasion, not long before his death, he said to some of his select friends who were then with him, that he was beyond expression entertained and pleased with it when he read it in his youth at college; that he was as much engaged, and had more satisfaction and pleasure, in studying it, than the most greedy miser in gathering up handfuls of silver and gold from some new-discovered treasure."

As a child, his sensibilities were often aroused by the truths of religion. He united himself to the church, probably at East Windsor, about the time of his graduation at college. After his graduation he spent nearly two years as a resident scholar in New Haven: then and there he pursued his theological studies. He was "approved" as a preacher in June or July, 1722, several months before he was nineteen years of age. From August, 1722, until April, 1723, he preached to a small Presbyterian Church in New-York city. Here he penned the first thirty-four of his well-known Resolutions, and some exquisitely poetical descriptions of the spiritual life. His eloquence in the pulpit moved his hearers deeply. They desired him to become their pastor, but he felt impelled to labor elsewhere. In September, 1723, he was appointed a tutor in Yale College. He devoted himself to severe study in the winter and spring of 1723-24, and entered on his tutorship in June, 1724. In this office he remained about two years.

On the 15th of February, 1727, when in his twenty-fourth year, he was ordained as pastor of the Congregational Church at Northampton. On the 27th of the next July he was married to Sarah Pierrepont, daughter of Rev. James Pierrepont, "an eminent, pious, and useful minister at New Haven," one of the fathers and trustees of Yale College. At the time of her marriage she was in the eighteenth year of her age, was distinguished by her graceful and expressive features, her vigorous mind, fine culture, and fervent piety. The description which Mr. Edwards gave of her in her girlhood was regarded by Dr. Chalmers as a model of fine writing. During her married life she relieved her husband of many burdens which are commonly laid upon a parish minister, and thus enabled him to pursue his studies with comparatively few interruptions.

During the first two years of his pastorate he was colleague with his grandfather, the celebrated Solomon Stoddard; but in 1729, after the death of his grandfather, he took the entire charge of the congregation. As a youthful preacher he was eminent for his weighty thought and fervid utterance. His voice was not commanding, his gestures were few; he was apt to keep his eye fixed upon one spot above the front gallery of his meeting-house: but many of his sermons were overwhelming. He wrote some of them in full. Often he spoke extempore, oftener from brief but suggestive notes. The traditions relating to their power and influence appear well-nigh fabulous.

In 1734-35 there occurred in his parish a "great awakening" of religious feeling; in 1740-41 occurred another, which extended through a large part of New England. At this time he became specially intimate with George Whitefield. During these exciting scenes, Mr. Edwards manifested the rare comprehensiveness of his mind. He did not favor the extravagances attending the new measures of the revivalists; but he felt compelled to advocate the principle out of which those extravagances needlessly sprang. He did more, perhaps, than any other American divine in promoting the doctrinal purity, and at the same time quickening the zeal, of the churches; in restraining them from fanaticism, and at the same time stimulating them to a healthy enthusiasm. His writings were in his own day, and are in our day, a kind of classic authority for discriminating between the warmth of sound health and the heat of a fever. He did not remain stationary, like the centre of a circle: he moved in an orbit not eccentric, but well-rounded and complete.

As early as 1741 he preached with great vehemence against certain demoralizing practices in which some of his parishioners indulged. He offended several influential families by his method of opposing those practices. In process of time he became convinced that his grandfather, Mr. Stoddard, was wrong in permitting unconverted persons to partake of the Lord's Supper. He feared, that, in resisting the authority of Mr. Stoddard, he would make a sacrifice of himself. He followed his convictions: he made the sacrifice. After a prolonged and earnest controversy, he was ejected from the pastorate which he had adorned for more than twenty-three years.

In August, 1751, about a year after his dismissal from Northampton, Edwards was installed pastor of the small Congregational Church in Stockbridge, Mass., and missionary of the Housatonnuck tribe of Indians at that place. Here he was in the wilderness. He was sadly afflicted with the fever and ague and other disorders incident to the new settlement. His labors were interrupted by the French and Indian War. He persevered, however, with marked fidelity in his mission. He preached to the Indians through an interpreter. He gained their admiration and their love.

While living in a kind of exile, among the Indians at Stockbridge, he was invited to the presidency of the college at Princeton, N.J. He was elected to the office on the 26th of September, 1757. He was reluctant to accept it; but finally yielded to the advice of others, and was dismissed from his Stockbridge pastorate, Jan. 4, 1758, after having labored in it six years and a half. He spent a part of January and all of February at Princeton, performing some duties at the college, but was not inaugurated until the 10th of February, 1758. One week after his inauguration he was inoculated for the small-pox. After the ordinary effects of the inoculation had nearly subsided, a secondary fever supervened, and he died on the 22d of March, 1758. He had then resided at Princeton about nine weeks, and had been the inaugurated president of the college just five weeks. His age was fifty-four years, five months, and seventeen days. His aged father died only two months before him. His son-in-law, President Burr, died in his forty-second year, only six months before him. His daughter, Mrs. President Burr (the mother of Vice-President Burr), died in her twenty-seventh year, only sixteen days after him. His wife died in her forty-ninth year, only six months and ten days after him.

While the pastor at Northampton, President Edwards published the following works: God glorified in Man's Dependence, 1731; A Divine and Supernatural Light Imparted to the Soul by the Spirit of God, 1734 (a sermon noted for its spiritual philosophy; the hearers of it at Northampton requested it for the press); Curse ye Meroz, 1735; A Faithful Narrative of the Surprising Work of God in the Conversion of many Hundred Souls in Northampton, etc., London, 1736; Five Discourses prefixed to the American Edition of this Narrative, 1738; Sinners in the Hands of an Angry God, 1741 (one of his most terrific sermons; frequently republished; severely criticised without regard to the character and condition of the persons to whom it was preached); Sorrows of the Bereaved spread before Jesus, 1741; Distinguishing Marks of a Work of the True Spirit, 1741; Thoughts on the Revival in New England, etc., 1742; The Watchman's Duty and Account, 1743; The True Excellency of a Gospel Minister, 1744; A Treatise concerning Religious Affections, 1746 (one of his most spiritual and analytical works; "it will no doubt always be considered as one of the most important guards against a spurious religion"); An Humble Attempt to promote Explicit Agreement and Visible Union among God's People in Extraordinary Prayer, 1746; True Saints when Absent from the Body Present with the Lord, 1747; God's Awful Judgments in breaking the Strong Rods of the Community, 1748; Life and Diary of the Rev. David Brainerd, 1749 (a volume which exerted a decisive influence on Henry Martyn, and has affected the missionary spirit of the English as well as American churches: Brainerd was a beloved pupil of Edwards, and was engaged to be married to Edwards's second daughter, Jerusha); Christ the Example of Gospel Ministers, 1749; Qualifications for Full Communion in the Visible Church, 1749 (a treatise of great historical not less than theological importance); Farewell Sermon to the People of Northampton, 1750. After he had left his first pastorate, his more important works were published; some of them not until after his death: "Misrepresentations Corrected, and Truth Vindicated, in a Reply to Mr. Solomon Williams's Book on Qualifications for Communion, to which is added a Letter from Mr. Edwards to his Late Flock at Northampton, 1752; True Grace distinguished from the Experience of Devils, 1752; An Essay on the Freedom of the Will, 1754 (Dr. Chalmers said that he recommended to his pupils this Treatise on the Will "more strenuously" than any other "book of human composition;"; and he added, it was "read by me forty-seven years ago, with a conviction that has never since faltered, and which has helped me, more than any other uninspired book, to find my way through all that might otherwise have proved baffling and transcendental and mysterious in the peculiarities of Calvinism"); The Great Christian Doctrine of Original Sin defended, etc., 1758; Eighteen Sermons annexed to Dr. Samuel Hopkins's Memoir of Edwards, 1764; History of Redemption, 1772; Dissertation concerning the End for which God created the World, and Dissertation concerning the End of True Virtue, 1788; Two New Volumes of Sermons, 1789 and 1793; Miscellaneous Observations on Important Theological Subjects, 1793; Remarks on Important Theological Controversies, 1796; Types of the Messiah, 1829; Notes on the Bible, 1829; Charity and its Fruits, 1851 (edited by Rev. Dr. Tryon Edwards, and republished in 1872 under the title of Christian Love as Manifested in the Heart and Life); Selections from the unpublished writings of Jonathan Edwards, 1865 (edited by Rev. Alexander D. Grosart. See Bibliotheca Sacra, vol. xxxviii. pp. 147-187, 333-369).

The published works of Edwards were collected, and printed in eight volumes, at Worcester, Mass., under the editorship of Dr. Samuel Austin, in 1809. A larger edition of his writings, in ten volumes, including a new Memoir and much new material, was published at New York, in 1829, under the editorial care of Rev. Dr. Sereno Edwards Dwight. Some of Edwards's writings were originally published, and many of them have been republished, in Great Britain. They have been collected in an English edition, and published by Messrs. Ogle & Murray, Edinburgh. The edition more commonly used in the United States at the present time is entitled The Works of President Edwards, in four volumes; a Reprint of the Worcester Edition, with Valuable Additions, and a Copious Index, New York.

The works of Edwards have received the highest encomiums from Dr. John Erskine, Dugald Stewart, Sir Henry Moncrief, Dr. Priestley, Dr. George Hill, Isaac Taylor, and other British scholars. Robert Hall says, "I consider Jonathan Edwards the greatest of the sons of men. He ranks with the brightest luminaries of the Christian Church, not excluding any country or any age, since the apostolic." Sir James Mackintosh says of Edwards, "This remarkable man, the metaphysician of America. . . His power of subtle argument, perhaps unmatched, certainly unsurpassed, among men, was joined, as in some of the ancient mystics, with a character which raised his piety to fervor." Robert Morehead says, "Edwards comes nearer Bishop Butler as a philosophical divine than any other theologian with whom we are acquainted." EDWARDS A. PARK.

EDWARDS, Jonathan, the Younger, was the second son and ninth child of Jonathan Edwards the Elder, and was b. at Northampton, Mass., May 26, 1745. In 1788 he said of himself, "When I was but six years of age, my father removed with his family to Stockbridge, which at that time was inhabited by Indians almost solely, as there were in the town but twelve families of whites, or Anglo-Americans, and perhaps one hundred and fifty families of Indians. The Indians being the nearest neighbors, I constantly associated with them: their boys were my daily schoolmates and playfellows. Out of my father's house I seldom heard any language spoken but the Indian. By these means I acquired the knowledge of that language, and a great facility in speaking it. It became more familiar to me than my mother-tongue. I knew the names of some things in Indian that I did not know in English. Even all my thoughts ran in Indian; and, though the true pronunciation of the language is extremely difficult to all but themselves, they acknowledged that I had acquired it perfectly, which, as they said, had never been done before by any Anglo-American. On account of my skill in their language in general, I received from them many compliments applauding my superior wisdom. This skill in their language I have in a good measure retained to this day."

The elder Edwards, being himself a missionary to the Indians, intended that his son should be one also, and therefore sent him, in October, 1755, to a settlement of the Oneida Indians, on the banks of the Susquehanna, in order that he might learn their language. At this time the boy was not eleven years old. He was accompanied by his father's friend, Rev. Gideon Hawley, and resided about six months in the family of Mr. Hawley, the noted missionary to the Oneidas. The boy endeared himself to the Oneida tribe; and on one occasion, when they expected an attack from the French, the Indians took him upon their shoulders, and bore him many miles through the wilderness to a place of safety. The settlement of the Oneidas was about one hundred miles distant from any English settlement; but young Edwards exhibited a rare degree of courage, fortitude, and perseverance. He uttered no complaint, when, in the depth of winter, he was compelled to sleep on the ground in the open air. He returned to Stockbridge in 1756, and resided there until January, 1758, when his father removed to Princeton. In less than ten weeks after that removal the father died, and in less than seven months after the father's death the mother died; and thus in his fourteenth year young Edwards was left an orphan.

He entered the grammar-school at Princeton in February, 1760; was admitted to Princeton College in September, 1761, and was graduated there in September, 1765. He became a member of the church in 1763, studied theology with Dr. Joseph Bellamy in 1765-66, and was "approved" as a preacher, in October, 1766, by the Litchfield County Association in Connecticut. In his early childhood he had been afflicted with an ocular disease, and therefore did not learn to read at so early an age as his instincts prompted. His father's ecclesiastical troubles deprived him of certain facilities for his education; but his native power triumphed over all discouragements. He was indefatigably diligent while at college; was appointed a tutor there in 1767, remained in that office two years, and received an appointment (which, however, he declined) to a professorship of languages and logic in the college. On the 5th of January, 1769, he was ordained as pastor of an important church in New Haven, Conn. He remained in this office more than twenty-six years. Several members of his church were advocates of the "Half-way Covenant;" he opposed it. His pastorate was also disturbed by the spiritual re-action which had followed the "great awakening" in 1740-42, and by the demoralizing influences of the Revolutionary War. The result was his dismissal from his pastorate on the 19th of May, 1795.

In January, 1796, he was installed pastor of the church in Colebrook, Conn. Here he desired and intended to pass the residue of his life. His parishioners were intelligent, affectionate, and confiding. They gave him leisure to pursue his theological and philosophical inquiries. In May, 1799, however, he was elected president of Union College, Schenectady, N.Y. As he had declined a professorship at Princeton, so he was prompted to decline the presidency of Union College. He applied to an ecclesiastical council for advice: the advice was in favor of his removal. He was therefore dismissed in June, and entered on the duties of his presidency in July, 1799. He discharged his duties with his accustomed fidelity. His reputation as a philosopher gave him an uncommon influence over his pupils, and his skill as a teacher heightened his reputation as a philosopher. He remained in this office, however, but a short time. About the middle of July, 1801, he was attacked by an intermittent fever, and on the 1st of August, 1801, he died. A sermon was preached at Schenectady, on occasion of his death, by his friend Rev. Robert Smith of Savannah; another sermon was preached at New Haven by President Timothy Dwight.

The college at Princeton conferred on Mr. Edwards the degree of D.D.: hence he is usually styled "Dr." Edwards, in distinction from his father, who is styled "President" Edwards.

As a theological teacher Dr. Edwards was eminently successful. He was powerful in his conversation with his pupils, a prince among disputants. Several of his scholars in theology rose to eminence. One of them was his nephew, Timothy Dwight, President of Yale College; another was Dr. Edward Dorr Griffin, President of Williams College; still another was Dr. Samuel Austin, President of Burlington College. Each of these presidents bore hearty testimony to his faithfulness and skill as a teacher. Among his other pupils were Dr. Samuel Nott and Dr. Jedediah Morse.

One great work of Dr. Edwards's life was his editorship of his father's writings. He was an early and confidential friend of Dr. Joseph Bellamy and Dr. Samuel Hopkins. From them, especially from the latter, he obtained many nice discriminations in regard to the President's theories. He studied the President's writings with great assiduity. He prepared for the press the President's History of the Work of Redemption, also his Miscellaneous Observations on Important Theological Subjects, his Remarks on Important Theological Controversies, and two volumes of Sermons. After careful study of his father's doctrinal system, as that system was modified by Hopkins, Bellamy, Smalley, and others, Dr. Edwards was well fitted to write his noted paper on the Improvements in Theology made by President Edwards and those who have followed his Course of Thought. It is in his published works that the influence of Dr. Edwards has been most conspicuous. While he was at Colebrook he published, in 1797, A Dissertation concerning Liberty and Necessity, in Reply to the Rev. Dr. Samuel West. Perhaps this volume is the fairest exponent yet given of President Edwards's theory of the will.

Dr. Edwards published a large number of articles in The New York Theological Magazine, over the signatures "I" and "O." He also published many sermons: one in 1783, at the ordination of Rev. Timothy Dwight, at Greenfield, Conn.; one in 1791, on the Injustice and Impolicy of the Slave-trade (Dr. Edwards, like his friend Hopkins, was an early opponent of the slave system); one in 1791, on Human Depravity; one in 1792, at the ordination of Rev. Dan Bradley, at Hampden; one in 1792, at the ordination of Rev. William Brown at Glastenbury; one in 1792 (Concio ad Clerum), preached in the chapel of Yale College, on the Marriage of a Deceased Wife's Sister; one in 1793, on the Death of Roger Sherman; an Election Sermon, in 1794; a Sermon on the Future State of Existence, and the Immortality of the Soul, in 1797; and a Farewell Sermon to the people of Colebrook, in 1799. The most celebrated of his discourses are the three On the Necessity of the Atonement, and its Consistency with Free Grace in Forgiveness. They were "preached before his Excellency the Governor, and a large number of both Houses of the Legislature of the State of Connecticut, during their sessions at New Haven, in October, 1785, and published by request." They have been frequently republished; and they form the basis of that theory of the atonement which is sometimes called the "Edwardean theory," and is now commonly adopted by what is termed the "New-England school of divines." Closely connected with this volume was another, entitled The Salvation of all Men strictly examined, and the Endless Punishment of those who die impenitent, argued and defended against the Reasonings of Dr. Chauncey in his book entitled "The Salvation of all Men." This work was originally published in 1789, but has been frequently republished. It exhibits a singular acuteness of mind, a depth of penetration, a rare precision of thought and style. In 1788 he published a paper which established his fame as a philologist, and has elicited the enthusiastic praises of Humboldt. This work is entitled Observations on the Language of the Muhhekanew Indians, in which the Extent of that Language in North America is shown, its Genius grammatically traced, and some of its Peculiarities, and some Instances of Analogy between that and the Hebrew, are pointed out. These observations were "communicated to the Connecticut Society of Arts and Sciences, and published at the request of the Society." One of the most accomplished of American linguists, Hon. John Pickering, who edited one edition of this paper, says of it, "The work has been for some time well known in Europe, where it has undoubtedly contributed to the diffusion of more just ideas than once prevailed respecting the structure of the Indian languages, and has served to correct some of the errors into which learned men had been led by placing too implicit confidence in the accounts of hasty travellers and blundering interpreters. In the Mithridates, that immortal monument of philological research, Professor Vater refers to it for the information he has given upon the Mohegan language, and he has published large extracts from it. To a perfect familiarity with the Muhhekanew dialect, Dr. Edwards united a stock of grammatical and other learning which well qualified him for the task of reducing an unwritten language to the rules of grammar."

Nearly all of Dr. Edwards's published writings were collected and reprinted in two octavo volumes, each of above five hundred pages, in 1842. Rev. Tryon Edwards, D.D., edited them, and prefixed to them a Memoir.

Dissimilar as the two Edwardses were in some, they were similar to each other in many, respects. Dr. Samuel Miller of Princeton says, "The son greatly resembled his venerable father in metaphysical acuteness, in ardent piety, and in the purest exemplariness of Christian deportment." The son, like the father, was a tutor in the college where he had been a student; was first ordained over a prominent church in the town where his maternal grandfather had been the pastor; was dismissed on account of his doctrinal opinions; was afterwards the minister of a retired parish; was then president of a college; and died at the age of about fifty-five years, soon after his inauguration. His Memoir states that both father and son preached, on the first sabbath of the January preceding their death, from the text, "This year thou shalt die." EDWARDS A. PARK.

EDWARDS, Justin, D.D., b. in Westhampton, Mass., April 25, 1787; d. at Virginia Springs, July 23, 1853. He was settled in the ministry at Andover, Mass., 1812-28; was one of the founders of the Tract Society at Boston, 1814; and in 1825, with fifteen others, founded the American Society for the Promotion of Temperance, of which he was, from 1829 to 1836, the efficient secretary. From 1837 to 1842 he was president of the seminary at Andover. In the latter year he became secretary of the American and Foreign Christian Union. He was the author of numerous popular tracts, and a work upon The Sabbath. For several years he was engaged upon a compendious Bible commentary, of which the New Testament was finished; and the first volume of the Old Testament was in the press of the American Tract Society, Boston, at the time of his death. See WILLIAM A. HALLOCK: Life and Labors of the Rev. Justin Edwards, D.D., N.Y., 1856.

EDZARDI, Ezra, b. at Hamburg, June 28, 1629; d. there Jan. 1, 1708; studied at Leipzig, Wittenberg, and Tübingen, and more especially at Basel, under Buxtorf. On his return to Hamburg he declined to accept any office, and lived as a private teacher of Hebrew, and as a missionary among the Jews. In both respects he was very successful. His fame as a Hebrew scholar drew pupils to his school from all Germany. Most of his writings still remain in manuscript. See MÖLLER: Cimbria literata, III. p. 221; GLEISS: E. E. ein alter Judenfreund, Hamburg, 1871. — His youngest son, Sebastian Edzardi, b. at Hamburg, Aug. 1, 1673, d. there June 10, 1736, succeeded him as teacher and missionary, but became more noticeable as a polemist against the Reformed Church. Several of his books were publicly burnt at Berlin. See MÖLLER: Cimbria literata, I. 147-151.

EGBERT, St., b. in Northumbria [639]; d. at Hy [April 24], 729; was monk in the monastery of Rathmelsigi, and made, when smitten by the plague (644), the vow, that, if he recovered, he would go to foreign countries to preach the gospel to the Pagans. He recovered, and immediately set out for Germany, but was by storm compelled to return, and settled in the monastery of Hy. Thence he sent out Wictbert and twelve others missionaries to Friesland, and contributed much to stimulate the missionary zeal of the Scoto-Irish Church. In Hy he persuaded the monks to adopt the Roman calculation of Easter and the Roman tonsure. See BEDA: Hist. Eccl. Angl., III. 27, V. 10, 11, 23.

EGBERT, or ECQBERT, Archbishop of York, a pupil and friend of Bede, was first teacher in the cathedral school of York, and brought it into a flourishing condition by his talent and learning. Among his pupils were Alcuin and Albert. In 731 he was made Bishop of York; and in 735 York was made an archiepiscopal see, with metropolitan authority over all bishoprics north of the Humber. He continued, however, his activity as teacher in the school till his death, 767. Alcuin he appointed librarian of the library he founded, and also his successor as teacher. He left a collection of canonical prescriptions: De jure sacerdotali, of which, however, only fragments are still extant; Dialogus de ecclesiastica institutionis; De remediis peccatorum, probably an extract from the first-mentioned work made by another hand,—all to be found in MANSI, XII. The penitentials ascribed to him are not by him.

EGEDE, Hans, the apostle of the Greenlanders, b. at Senjen, in the northern part of Norway, Jan. 31, 1686; d. at Stubbekjøbing in the Danish island of Falster, Nov. 5, 1758; studied theology in the University of Copenhagen, and was appointed pastor of Waagen, one of the Lofoten Islands, 1707. In the same year he married Gertrude Rask. From his brother-in-law, a whaler from Bergen, he heard that the south-western part of Greenland was inhabited by heathen savages; and the reading of old Norwegian chronicles made him believe that these heathen savages were descendants of former Norwegian colonists. Greenland was, indeed, discovered by Pagan Norsemen from Iceland in the tenth century; and, the natives having been pushed towards the interior, a flourishing colony was founded on the south-western coast. Under Olaf the Saint, about 1000, Christianity was introduced in this colony. In 1055 an itinerant bishop was established there by the archbishop of Bremen, and in 1125 a fixed episcopal see was founded by the Archbishop of Lund. Sixteen congregations, with their churches and several large monasteries, belonged to the diocese. But in 1348 the whole of Scandinavia was scourged by the "black death;" and so completely was the mother-country paralyzed, that all communication with the colony in Greenland immediately stopped. For half a century the colony strove along as best it could; but the natives took advantage of its insulation, and attacked it time after time. The last authentic report which reached Norway from it dates from 1410. In the sixteenth and seventeenth century the Danish kings, Norway being at that time united with Denmark, tried to vindicate their rights to the country, and establish mercantile connections; but the attempts failed. The real reconqueror of the country was Hans Egede. He had made up his mind that he would go thither, and preach the gospel to the heathen savages; and he realized his plan in spite of all difficulties. He first addressed the bishops of Bergen and Drontheim, the newly established committee of missions in Copenhagen, and the king himself (Frederik IV.), without obtaining any thing but bland words. Understanding that he had to take the whole task upon himself, or leave it undone, he resigned his position in Waagen, 1717, and went, with wife and children, to Bergen. By combining a mercantile enterprise with his missionary project he succeeded in forming a company willing to support him; and May 3, 1721, he left Bergen on board the vessel "Hope," and started for Greenland with his family. In the last moment he received notice from Copenhagen that the king would contribute three hundred dollars a year.

July 3, 1721, Egede landed on the south-western coast of Greenland; and he was immediately met with a disappointment, as the heathen savages turned out to be Esquimaux, and not at all descendants of the old Norwegian colonists. A settlement was made, however, at Godt-Haab ("Good Hope"), and the work was begun. The Greenlanders proved ignorant and stupid, kind but shy, and the tradesmen scared them away. Only through the intercourse between his own children and theirs was Egede able to come into relations with them, to learn their language, and to induce them to listen to him. Nevertheless, already (in 1723) a new settlement could be made; and Luther's catechism was translated into the native tongue. But in 1727 the trading company of Bergen dissolved; in 1730 Frederik IV. died; and in 1731 Egede received notice that the royal support would be withdrawn, and that all Europeans should return home immediately, or remain on their own risk. Egede hesitated; but when the Greenlanders themselves implored him to stay, and his wife consented, he remained. The new king, however (Christian VI.), belonged to the Pietists, and when Count Zinzen-dorf came to Copenhagen he easily induced the king to renew the support: only it was for the future to be divided with another mission, sent out by the Moravian Brethren; and with this mission Egede could not work in harmony. But the troubles thus arising were soon forgotten for that horrible calamity which befell the country in 1735. A Greenlander lad returning from Copenhagen brought the small-pox with him; and in the course of a few months more than three thousand people died. The misery was unspeakable. The settlements were transformed to graveyards. Egede's wife died. He himself held out heroically as long as the hardships demanded his exertions; but when all was over he felt himself a broken man. July 29, 1730, he preached his farewell sermon, intrusted the work to his son Paul, and returned to Copenhagen. In Denmark the Greenland mission had in the mean time awakened much interest. A seminary for the education of fit laborers was established, and Egede was made its director. In 1747, however, he retired to Stubbekjøbing; but he continued to labor for his life-work till his death. His son, Paul Egede, remained in Greenland till 1740, wrote a Greenland grammar and dictionary, and translated the New Testament into Greenland. The Greenland mission was afterwards never abandoned by the Danish Government; and, though the zeal slackened somewhat during the rationalistic period (1790-1820), the Christian Church in Greenland is at present in a flourishing condition. There are no more heathen in the country.

EGINHARD, or EINHARD, b. in Franconia about 770; d. at Seligenstadt, March 14, 844; was educated at the court of Charlemagne, a pupil of Alcuin; acted first as secretary to the emperor, and superintendent of public buildings at Aix-la-Chapelle, then as tutor to the children of Louis le Debonnaire, and retired finally to the monastery which he had founded at Seligenstadt, near Mühlheim, on the Rhine. He wrote a life of Charlemagne, which is invaluable for the general history of the age, and of great interest also to church history. He left seventy-one letters, and a minor essay, De adoranda cruce, which now is lost. His works have been edited by Teulet, Paris, 1840-43, and by Jaffé, in Monumenta Carolina, Berlin, 1867.

EGLINUS, Raphael (Latin Iconius), b. at Rüssikon, in the canton of Zürich, Dec. 23, 1559; d. at Marburg, Aug. 20, 1622; studied at Zürich, Geneva, and Basel; settled as a teacher at Sonders, in the Veldlin, in Lombardy, but was compelled, like all other Protestants, to leave the place in 1586; was made professor of the New Testament in Zürich, 1592; and was called to Marburg in 1606 as professor of theology. He was an enthusiastic student of alchemy; and it was his reputed proficiency in that art which procured for him the call to Marburg. In other respects, too, he was inclined to a fanciful mysticism. He wrote, in defence of the Rosicrucians, Assertio fraternitatis R. C., 1618, and also Meerwunderliche Prophezeiung, etc., 1611, in which, from the peculiar appearance of a herring caught in Norway in 1598, he believed himself able to discover the secrets of the future. He is of interest in church history, however, on account of the influence he exercised on the Hessian theologians: gradually bringing them over from the standpoint of Melancthon to that of Calvin. His two principal theological works are, besides a number of disputations, theses, etc., Dixerodus theolog. de magno illo insitiones nostræ in Christum mysterio, and Disput. theol. de fœdere gratiæ. A list of all his works is found in STRIEDER: Hess. Gelehrten-Geschichte, III. pp. 301-318. HEPPÉ.

EQ'LON (calf, calf-like). I. A king of the Moabites who made an alliance with the Ammon-ites and Amalekites, subjugated Israel, and kept them in bondage for eighteen years (Judg. iii. 14). He resided at Jericho, and was assassinated there by Ehud.

II. An Amorite town conquered by Joshua, and allotted to Judah (Josh. x. 3-5, xv. 39). Ruins of it were found ten miles north-east of Gaza, covering a hill, now called Ajlon, and situated among cornfields and tobacco-plantations.

EGYPT, Ancient. NAME. — The name Αἴγυπτος is used by Homer both of the country and of the river which has formed the country, the Nile. Some have derived it from a Shemitic root, guph; others, from a Sanscrit, āgupta: but as it occurs only among the Greeks, and peoples connected with the Greeks, its Greek origin seems certain, though no root has been found for it in the Greek language. The native name was Keme, represented hieroglyphically with the ideographic character of the crocodile-tail. It means "black," both in the hieroglyphic inscriptions and in the Coptic language. Egypt was thus called "the black country," not on account of the color of the skin of its inhabitants, for that was red and not black, but on account of the color of its soil; the floods of the Nile covering the bottom of the valley with a black mud, and thereby distinguishing the fertile fields from the surrounding deserts. Herodotus noticed that the soil of Egypt resembles neither that of Arabia nor that of Libya, but is black from the mud which the river carries down with it from Ethiopia. The native name has often been brought into connection with the Hebrew name Ham, the name of one of the sons of Noah, the progenitor of the Hamites. But the Hebrew root ham means "hot," and not "black;" though the Hebrew Ham, like the Greek Aithiops, was used as a general designation of the hot southern countries. The common Hebrew designation of Egypt was Masôr, or more frequently the dual form Misrayim, from Matsar, to enclose or to watch over. Originally this name was probably used only for the capital, that is, Memphis, just as, in our days, Cairo is called by the Arabs El Masr. The dual form referred to the division into Upper and Lower Egypt, not to the two banks of the Nile. From the hieroglyphics it is evident that the Egyptians always considered their country as double or divided; the division into Upper and Lower Egypt being not simply geographical or political, but historical, manifesting itself in the language, customs, and worship of the two peoples. The cuneiform inscriptions show that Masr was generally used in Asia as name for Egypt.

COUNTRY. — Egypt, in the narrower sense of the word, comprises only the Valley of the Nile from the first cataract to the Mediterranean, between 24° 6' and 31° 36' N. Lat. So far as the river runs along undivided, the average breadth of the valley is only about six miles, though occasionally it widens to about sixteen miles; but at 30° N. Lat. both the walls enclosing the valley retreat to the east and to the west, and the river divides into several arms, and forms the low fertile plain of the Delta. Surrounded on the north by the sea, and on all other sides by immense deserts, the long narrow strip of fertile and inhabited country forms an oasis, whose perfectly secluded position has exercised a decisive influence on the development of the Egyptian people. The two high walls enclosing the valley are often, but wrongly, described as two mountain-ranges running parallel with the river. They are simply abrupt cleavages in the elevated stone plateau of the desert, through which the Nile has carved a deep furrow for its bed. Only at a distance of several days' journey to the east is the level surface of the desert broken by a real mountain-range, which runs parallel with the coast of the Red Sea, and of which several peaks rise about six thousand feet. This broad stretch of land between the Nile Valley and the Red Sea has always been considered a part of Egypt, as have also the oases in the western desert, so far as they can be reached from the Nile Valley. To the south the first cataract, formed between the Islands of Elephantine and Philæ by a ledge of granite stretching east to west for many miles, and absolutely interrupting all navigation, has always formed a national and linguistic boundary, separating in old times Egypt from Ethiopia, as it now separates Egypt from Nubia. On the western boundary of the Delta lived the Libyan people; and near this frontier lay, in the Delta, the principal part of the country in the oldest times, as later on. To the east, Egypt communicated with Syria and Palestine by a route along the desert coast of the Mediterranean. The "River of Egypt," the present Wadi-el-Arish, which runs through the northern part of the Sinaitic peninsula, formed the boundary between Egypt and Palestine; and at its issue in the Mediterranean lay the Egyptian frontier fortress Pelusium.

The climate is different in different parts. The Delta near the sea has the common coast-climate of the Mediterranean, and rain is not rare; while in the Thebaid not a cloud is seen on the sky all the year round. The fertility of the country depends altogether on the floods of the Nile, whose regulation and utilization are and always have been of the utmost importance for the welfare of the people. In the southernmost part of Egypt the flood does not now reach the height of the banks any more; and there, as in Nubia, the water has to be raised by means of water-wheels. The annual rise of the Nile is caused by long protracted rains regularly occurring in the tropical highlands between 1° and 16° N. Lat. The flood reaches the first cataract in the middle of June, and the Delta at the end of June. The water rises during three months: at the end of the second month the dams are cut in Upper Egypt, a month later in Lower Egypt, and the waters are let in over the fields. At the end of September the waters retreat; in the course of October the ground becomes dry, and is sown; towards the close of March the harvest begins, the river decreasing all the while until June, when a new rotation begins. Egypt has thus only three seasons, each of four months, — the water-season, June–September; the gardening season, October–January; and the harvest-season, February–May.

Egypt was in antiquity famous for its great fertility. It was the granary of all the neighboring countries. Abraham and the sons of Jacob were attracted thither by its richness in grain (Gen. xii. 10, xlii. 1, xliii. 2). But, besides corn, also other kinds of food abounded. The children of Israel longed for the flesh-pots of Egypt (Exod.

xvi. 3), and for its fish, cucumbers, melons, leeks, onions, and garlic (Num. xi. 5). Pictorial representations on its monuments bear witness to its richness in cattle, sheep, goats, swine, game, wine, figs, fruits, and vegetables of all kinds. In a tomb near the Pyramids of Memphis 835 cows, 220 calves, 760 asses, 974 sheep, and 2,235 goats are enumerated as belonging to the interred person. Among the plants growing in the country the papyrus and the lotus were especially noticeable: the former, however, is not found any more in Egypt. The date-palm, on the other hand, which now is of the greatest importance to the country, occurs very seldom, either in the hieroglyphic inscriptions, or in the pictorial representations on the monuments, and the camel not at all. The camel cannot have been entirely unknown to the ancient Egyptians, as it was much used by all neighboring peoples, especially in Palestine, for mercantile expeditions to Egypt (Gen. xxiv. 10, xxx. 43, xxxvii. 25): Pharaoh even presented camels to Abraham (Gen. xii. 16). The horse was also introduced from Asia. During the old empire, before the invasion of the Hyksos, it does not appear: it occurs for the first time during the new empire, in the reign of Thothmes III., in the sixteenth century B.C., in a representation of a procession of foreigners bringing as presents various Asiatic animals, among which are a couple of horses. Under the kings of the nineteenth dynasty great numbers of horses were used, though only to draw the chariots: the Old Testament, however, speaks also of cavalry (Gen. l. 9; Exod. xiv. 9, 23). The animal generally used for riding was the ass, which was kept in great numbers. Wild asses are still found in great herds in the highlands of Nubia. The Leviathan of Job li. 1 is the crocodile: the Behemoth of Job xl. 15 is the rhinoceros. The country was also rich in minerals and in building-stones. Through the larger part of the country both the walls of the valley consist of limestone of a fine and firm quality. Beyond Thebes, in the neighborhood of El Cab, the sandstone begins, of which there are famous quarries at Silsileh. Granite and sienite of beautiful coloring occur in the cataract. The pale-yellow alabaster and various kinds of porphyry are found in the Arabian mountains. Gold occurs at Syene, emerald at Berenice. Copper-mines were worked from the oldest times in the Sinaitic peninsula.

HISTORY. — The fertility of the soil, the ease of life under a sky always gay, and in a warm, healthy climate, and especially the seclusion of the geographical position of the country preventing all interference by unruly neighbors, were the natural advantages which made the Egyptians the first people on earth having a history. The historical sense, once awakened, found in the country excellent and abundant material; for its gratification by erecting monuments; and in this respect the Egyptians have preceded and surpassed all other peoples. After further development, a want arose for correct annalistic reports of events requiring an exact chronology; and the monuments even of the first historical epoch, the old empire, give ample evidence of the knowledge of astronomical periods based upon long and accurate observation of the stars. What we know chronologically of the first Egyptian Empire, before the invasion of the Hyksos, we owe to the work of Manetho (supreme pontiff at Heliopolis), which he wrote in Greek on the command of Ptolemy Philadelphus, drawing his materials from the annals and chronicles of the temple archives. Extracts of this work have come down to us through Josephus, Africanus, and Eusebius; and the historical character of the statement that there ruled thirty dynasties in Egypt before the Greek rule began is proved by the deciphering of the hieroglyphics. Already Champollion reached back as far as the beginning of the new empire (the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries), and now also the first part of Manetho's dynasties must be considered an indubitable historical fact. A great multitude of monuments, whose dates are ascertainable, present us a nearly continuous series of kings as far back as the fourth dynasty; and we have the hieroglyphic names and annalistic reports as far back as Menes himself, the head of the first dynasty. There were originally two different views with respect to Manetho's dynasties: one represented by Böckh, Manetho und die Hundsternperiode, Berlin, 1845; and the other by Bunsen, Aegyptens Stelle in der Weltgeschichte, Hamburg, 1845, and Lepsius, Chronologie der Aegypter, Berlin, 1848. Böckh holds that the thirty dynasties have succeeded each other, and places the first year of the reign of the first king (Menes) at 5702. Bunsen and Lepsius hold that several of these dynasties have been contemporary, and place the beginning of the Egyptian Empire, the former at 3643, the latter at 3892. The latter view is now generally adopted by Egyptologists.

The Egyptians, like all other peoples, assumed, that, before the human dynasties spoken of in the annals began, there had been a government by gods, and that in three dynasties: the first consisting of Râ, the sun-god, the family of Osiris, and the local god of the oldest royal residence, This, in Upper Egypt; the second of twelve gods, with the moon-god Thoth at their head; and the third of thirty demigods. See Lepsius: Ueber den ersten ägyptischen Götterkreis, Berlin, 1849. Between the government by the gods and the first historical king (Menes) the Egyptians further placed a prehistoric dynasty of so-called Manes, whose residence was at This, the native city of Menes. Menes came from This, and settled in Lower Egypt, where he founded Memphis and the first historical dynasty. During the fourth dynasty the old empire reached its point of culmination. The two largest Pyramids—those of Cheops and Chephren, the khufu and khafra of the inscriptions—were then built. From the tombs arranged around the royal Pyramids, partly hewn into the cliffs, and especially from the chambers destined for the worship of the dead, with their innumerable inscriptions and pictorial representations, we derive a surprisingly complete idea of the life which the Egyptians then led,—their arts and trades, their riches, customs, offices, honors, their worship of the gods and the dead, etc. More than three thousand years before Christ, while all the rest of the world is still mute, human speech here becomes audible to us. At the same time as the fifth dynasty, the names of whose members we find in the tombs of Memphis, reigned in Lower Egypt, the sixth dynasty, descending from Elephantine on the Ethiopian frontier, reigned in Upper Egypt; and thus the Ethiopians appear for the first time in Egyptian history. Under the following dynasties up to the eleventh the prosperity of the country decreased. The eleventh was the first Theban dynasty; and with it begin the power and fame of that city, hitherto unmentioned, and of its local god Ammon. Under the twelfth dynasty (the second in Thebes) the country again flourished. The grand character of the whole epoch is proved by the gigantic undertakings which were accomplished, as, for instance, the construction of the Joseph Canal. It carried the waters of the Nile into an artificial lake (Mœris), and thereby transformed Fayum, by nature one of the poorest provinces of the country, into one of the most fertile. Amenemha III., who reigned for forty-two years, extended the empire to the present Senneh in Ethiopia, beyond the second cataract. He ordered the height of the annual flood to be measured, and denoted on the cliffs of the shore. The pyramid and temple which he built in Fayum afterwards became the centre of the famous Labyrinth.

Shortly after the death of Amenemha III. (about 2100 B.C.), the Hyksos, a warlike people, shepherds, coming from the East, invaded the country. Without opposition, they took possession of all Lower Egypt, captured Memphis, which they made their capital, laid tribute both upon Lower and Upper Egypt, and fortified the north-eastern entrance to the country, which they themselves had found open, but which they wanted to close against any other people likely to follow them, more especially against the Assyrians, who at that time were powerful in Asia. For five hundred and eleven years they reigned in Egypt. At last the native kings, who had kept independent in Upper Egypt and Ethiopia, succeeded, after long and stubborn resistance, in expelling them from their principal stronghold, Anaris, near the later Pelusium, and drove them into Syria. This first counter-movement from the south, against the stream of peoples which from Central Asia rushed onwards to the south and to the west, must have produced an effect so much the greater as it was followed by the brilliant victories and great conquests of the Pharaohs of the eighteenth and nineteenth dynasties, which extended the boundaries of the Egyptian Empire far into Asia. A people numbering hundreds of thousands, and, at least to some degree, conversant with the arts and sciences of Egypt, could not be compelled to change abode without causing a corresponding commotion among other peoples; and, indeed, all the historical or historico-mythical remembrances of the nations of antiquity, especially so far as they concern immigration, colonization, introduction of divine worship, or knowledge of mythological genealogies, can be traced back to this epoch (between the sixteenth and fourteenth centuries B.C.), and no farther.

The expulsion of the Hyksos has often and very early been put in connection with the exodus of the children of Israel. The two events have even been declared identical. Josephus held this view. He gives no other proof, however, than that which he extracted from Manetho; and he does not notice that he is in complete contradiction to his source. An impartial examination of the statements of Manetho does not leave it in the least doubtful that the Egyptians themselves considered the two events as entirely different. According to Manetho, the expulsion of the Hyksos from Anaris took place under King Thummosis, or Tuthmosis (Thothmes) III.; while the exodus of the Israelites—which by Egyptian historians is generally spoken of as the expulsion of a rebellious tribe under the leadership of a Heliopolitan priest, Osarsiph, who afterwards called himself Moses—took place under a king who was the son of a Rameses and the father of a Sethos, and who consequently can be no other than the Menophthes, or Menephtes (Africanus reads Amenephtes), of the list of Manetho, who was the son of Rameses II., and the father of Sethos II. (Josephus calls him sometimes Amenophis, and sometimes Menophis). As the two kings, Thothmes III., and Menophthes, denote the beginning and the close of the epoch of the greatest prosperity of Egypt, they are both perfectly well known to us through the monuments. The latter lived about two hundred and fifty years later than the former, and that period consequently separated the two events from each other.

With respect to Manetho's views of the two events there can be no difference of opinion. The date of the reign of King Menophthes can be ascertained from the fact that the last Sothis period, beginning 1322 B.C., and ending 139 A.D., was, according to the mathematician Theon of Alexandria, called the era of Menophthes, because it opened during his reign. The question now arises, How do the statements of the Old Testament correspond with those of the Egyptian historian? They are so far from contradicting each other, that, on the contrary, the Egyptian tradition would receive its most decided confirmation from the Hebrew documents, if we could presume a mistake in the latter's calculation of the period between the exodus and the building of the temple, which, according to 1 Kings vi. 1, comprised four hundred and eighty years. But this figure does not harmonize with the figures in the Book of Judges, or with the reading of the Septuagint, or with the view of the author of Acts (xiii. 20), or with even the view of Josephus (Ant., VIII. 3, 1; C. Ap., 2, 2). Most of these deviations arrive at still higher figures; but an impartial investigation and a comparison of the genealogical tables, of which especially the Levitical can claim the highest trustworthiness, bring out a much lower figure, but one which exactly corresponds with the Egyptian tradition. A piece of evidence of the greatest importance is derived from a circumstance mentioned in the Hebrew narrative, and pointing decisively to the date indicated. It is the building by the Jews of the cities of Pithom and Ramses, under the predecessor of the Pharaoh of the exodus; that is, Rameses II. From the monuments we know that this powerful Pharaoh dug many canals, and founded many cities, and, more especially, that he constructed the great canal in the province of Goshen, which afterwards was used to complete the communication between the Red Sea and the Nile, and at whose western termination Pithom (Patunos) was situated, as was Ramses at the eastern. Among the ruins of the latter city a granite group was found of two deities, and between them the deified Rameses II., whose statue, as the heros eponymos of the city, stood in the sanctuary of the temple.

That the Israelites did not arrive in Egypt until after the expulsion of the Hyksos, is evident from every detail of the Hebrew narrative. It is not an Arab, but a genuinely Egyptian court, at which Jacob is received. The king bears the Egyptian title of "king." Joseph has an Egyptian name, Zaphnathpaneach ("the savior of life"). The officers of the king have also Egyptian names, such as Potiphar ("consecrated to Phra"). Joseph speaks to his brothers through an interpreter; and the Egyptians refuse to eat bread with them, because they are shepherds, etc. Still more decisive is the circumstance, that the expulsion of the Hyksos, the greatest historical event of the age, is even not alluded to in the Bible; which would be inexplicable if it had taken place while the Israelites were in Goshen, under the father or grandfather of Moses. To all this may be added, that the important political reforms, which, according to the Old Testament (Gen. xlvii. 20-26), were introduced into Egypt by Joseph, are mentioned and described with essential similarity both by Herodotus (II., 108, 37) and Diodorus (I., 54, 73, 74), who ascribe them to King Sesostris, or Sesosis; that is, Sethos I., whose reign began in the middle of the fifteenth century B.C.

Of the three kings of the nineteenth dynasty whom we know best,—Sethos I., under whom Joseph arrived in Egypt; Rameses II., at whose court Moses was educated; and Menophthes, in whose reign the exodus took place,—Rameses II. is by far the greatest; yea, we may say that under him the Egyptian Empire reached the culminating point of its power and fame. His successor, Menophthes, under whom Moses led the Israelites out of Egypt, and founded the Jewish theocracy, is by Herodotus (II., 111) described as a weak but haughty man, smitten with blindness for ten years as a punishment of godlessness. ["He impiously hurled his spear into the overflowing waves of the river, which a sudden wind caused to rise to an extraordinary height."] Under the last kings of the nineteenth dynasty, and under the following dynasties, the empire gradually sank down into luxury and indifference. Only the first king of the twentieth dynasty, Rameses III., is by the monuments pointed out as a ruler who made several successful campaigns into Asia. But at that time the Asiatic empires themselves began to rise in power and activity.

The next noticeable contact between Egyptian and Israelitic history took place during the twenty-second dynasty, about 970 B.C., when Shishak made war upon Rehoboam, the first king of Judah, and conquered Jerusalem (1 Kings xiv. 25); which event is also commemorated on the monuments, though in a somewhat obscure manner, by the name Yuthmalk (i.e., "King of Judah"). The royal family of Thebes was afterwards succeeded by other families from Tanis, Bubastis, and Sais in Lower Egypt; and towards the close of the eighth century the decaying empire fell into the hands of the Ethiopian conqueror Shabak, the Sabakon of Herodotus, the So of the Bible. He and his successors, Shabatak and Taraka, the Tirhakah of the Old Testament (2 Kings xix. 9; Isa. xxxvii. 9), constitute, according to Manetho, the twenty-fifth dynasty. Tirhakah afterwards retired to the old Ethiopian residence on the mountain of Barkal, the Meroe of Herodotus, where he built several temples, the names upon whose ruins show that his dynasty still flourished there for a long time.

When the Ethiopians had gone, there followed a period of dissolution and confusion, described by Herodotus as the dodekarchy, but not mentioned by Manetho, who speaks only of the legitimate rulers. Finally, Psammetichus I., one of the dodekarchs, and the legitimate heir of the crown, succeeded in putting an end to the anarchy; and under him and his successors, forming the twenty-sixth dynasty, the country once more enjoyed a period of great prosperity. Psammetichus I. ascended the throne by the aid of Ionian and Carian mercenaries; and in reward he gave them large estates and great privileges, which no doubt was the reason why, during his reign, a large portion of the national warriors emigrated to Ethiopia. The Greek colony in the country increased rapidly. Amasis allowed them to build the city of Naukratis, which soon became an important commercial port. The gates of Egypt were opened to foreign commerce, and greater riches flowed into her lap than in the times of the victories of the eighteenth and nineteenth dynasties. The number of cities is said to have increased under Amasis to twenty thousand; and private people were able to build for themselves rock tombs larger and more magnificent than the royal tombs of Bab-el-meluk. But the military strength of the country did not increase in a corresponding measure, and the empire finally succumbed before the power of Persia. From 525 to 504 Egypt was a Persian province; and, though she once more enjoyed a short period of independence under the twenty-ninth and thirtieth dynasties, she was conquered a second time by the Persians in 340, and fell in 332 to Alexander the Great, who founded Alexandria, where he was buried (323).

Under the Ptolemies, Egyptian civilization may be said to have fulfilled its last mission in the history of the world, after which it vanished. During this period, Greek curiosity, still young and sound, took possession of all the accumulated wisdom and learning of the dying country as its legitimate inheritance; and Alexandria became the centre of Greek study. Immense libraries were formed; and every important work, not only of the Egyptian literature, but of all Oriental literatures, was translated into Greek. While this infiltration of the Oriental into the Greek civilization was still going on, Egypt finally lost its independence under Cleopatra VI. After the battle of Actium (30 B.C.), the country was incorporated with the Roman Empire. Already in the first century after Christ, Christianity was introduced into Egypt, and spread rapidly, though hieroglyphical inscriptions are found in the temples of Esneh dating from the middle of the third century; and the Isis-worship at Philæ did not cease completely until the middle of the sixth century, under Justinian. RECENT DISCOVERIES.—In the summer of 1881 there were discovered in a cave near Thebes thirty-nine royal mummies, besides papyrus rolls and other objects of interest and value. Among the mummies was that of Rameses II., the Pharaoh of the oppression. It was in a perfect state of preservation, in a mummy-case of plain sycamore-wood, unpainted and unvarnished, carved to represent Rameses as Osiris. The arms are crossed upon the breast. In his right hand he holds the royal whip, in the left the royal hook. The mummy itself is wrapped in rose-colored and yellow linen, figured with lotus-flowers, of a texture finer than the finest Indian muslin. One of the bands which pass across the shrouds to keep them in place bears a hieratic inscription stating that this (the mummy of Rameses II.) was concealed in a pit at a time when a foreign army invaded Egypt. In January, 1882, G. Maspero, the director of the Boolak Museum, made his official report of this remarkable discovery.

Another discovery in 1881 was that of a trilingual stela containing the decree of the synod of priests assembled at Canopus, ordaining the deification of Berenice, the daughter of Ptolemy Euergetes (q.v.), and creating a fifth order of priests, to be called Euergetæ. This Ptolemy is supposed to have been prophetically described Dan. xi. 7, 8. He was one of Egypt's greatest rulers. The date of the decree is B.C. 238, and it is therefore a century older than the Rosetta Stone. The inscription upon the newly discovered tablet is the same as that upon the stone of Sâh, discovered in 1865, but better preserved.

The year 1881 witnessed also the opening of the Pyramid of Maydoom, which is a century older than the Great Pyramid of Cheops, and probably is the tomb of Snefroo of the third dynasty, B.C. 4200 or 3766.

Meanwhile, our knowledge is being increased through the correct decipherment of the demotic writing, which was a very much abbreviated form of the hieratic, — the usual style of penmanship employed by the priests. In the demotic the ordinary business and legal transactions of the Egyptians were recorded. From the numerous documents written in it which have been preserved, an insight will be given into the laws, social state, customs and manners, of the Egyptians, such as is not afforded by those in the monumental styles of the hieroglyphic and hieratic. But there is a growing conviction among Egyptologists, that the earliest Egyptian civilization we know of is the highest, and that all we know of it is its decadence.

RELIGION OF ANCIENT EGYPT. — The Egyptians were among the most religious of the ancient nations. It is true that the principal reason why most of the documents which have come down to us are of a religious character is that all the ancient monuments of Egypt have perished, except some which were necessarily of a religious nature, — the temples and the tombs. The palaces of kings and nobles have utterly disappeared. Our knowledge of Egyptian civil architecture is derived from paintings in the tombs. Many texts of historical interest have been preserved; but the original intention was not historical, but religious. Religion in some form or other was dominant in every relation of life in ancient Egypt. The Egyptian deities were literally innumerable. Every town and village had its local patrons. Every month of the year, every day of the month, every hour of the day and of the night, had its presiding divinity. All these gods had to be propitiated; and Egyptian life thus became a constant round of religious and semi-religious ceremonies and festivals which amazed the foreigner. When Herodotus visited Egypt, in the middle of the fifth century B.C., the first remark he made of the people was that they were religious to excess. He said it was easier to find a god in Egypt than a man.

In order to reduce this bewildering multitude of deities into something like a mythological system, it is only necessary to notice that special titles and names were given to divinities according to the place in which they were worshipped. Thus Osiris was called Che ("the child") at Thebes, Ura ("the great one") at Heliopolis, Oti ("the sovereign") at Memphis. The goddess Hathor was identical with Isis at Denderah, with Sechet at Memphis, with Neith at Sais, with Saosis at Heliopolis, with Nehemanit at Hermopolis, with Bast at Bubastis, with Sothis at Elephantine, etc. Hence the explanation of the singular fact that Apis is called the son of Ptah, of Tum, of Osiris, and of Sokari; that Horus is called the son of Isis and of Hathor; that Osiris is called the father, brother, husband, and son of Isis, and also the son of their child Horus; that Horus is said to have been born in Tattu, but also in Cheb, etc. What at first glance represents itself as different deities is in reality only different aspects of the same deity. That Egypt which Menes first gathered together under one sceptre was a country divided up into nomes. Each nome had its own capital, and each capital had its own gods with their special names. But it is only the names which are different: the doctrines are everywhere the same. It is evident that Mentu and Tum, two of the great gods of Thebes, are merely individual or local aspects of the sun-god Râ; and so are Ptah and Amon: indeed, the whole swarm of gods of the first order is easily reduced to two groups; the first representing the sun-god Râ and his family, and the second, Osiris and his family. Râ is not only the name of the sun-god, but also the word commonly used to denote the sun itself. In other mythologies the sun-god generally rides across the sky in a chariot drawn by horses: in Egypt he sails in a boat. The sky is conceived as an expanse of water, to which the Nile forms the earthly counterpart. The adversary of Râ is Apap, and the conflict between them is that between light and darkness. Osiris is the eldest son of Seb ("the earth") and Nut ("the sky"), but more powerful than his parents. He wedded his sister Isis whilst they were yet in their mother's womb, and their son was Horus. Osiris' adversary is Set, who shall slay him; but he shall be avenged by Horus. Osiris means the same as Râ, only his myth is more elaborate and wilder in its features. Already in antiquity it was the subject of much subtle meditation and many fanciful interpretations. Modern mythologists do not find it difficult — either with this particular myth, or with the whole Egyptian mythology — to go behind the wild, gaudy, coarse, and often ridiculous polytheism, which was the religion of the multitude, to the subtle, mystical, often sublime monotheism, which was the heart and conscience of the educated classes.

Egyptian religion, considered not as a mythological system, but in its bearing upon morals and practical life in general, presents two very remarkable features, — its worship of the dead, and its worship of sacred animals. In Egyptian life the tomb played a much more prominent part than the temple. The temple was exactly a place of worship in our sense of the word; it was principally and essentially an offering made by the king to some god: but the tomb was the centre of all family worship. The greatest importance was attached to the permanence of the tomb, to the continuance of the religious ceremonies, and even to the prayers of passers-by. We constantly find men praised for having made the names of their father and mother, or of their "fathers," live again. Ancestor-worship, however, even though it may not be the first origin of all religion, is a part of human nature itself, commands respect, even when it presents itself under very curious forms, and will continue under some refined form as long as human nature keeps whole and sound. But animal worship is always a strange phenomenon, and it became especially so in Egypt on account of the grotesque forms under which it presented itself. Some kinds of animals were held sacred universally, others received only a local veneration. To the first class belonged the cat, sacred to Bast or Sekhet; the ibis and the cynocephalous ape, sacred to Thoth; the hawk and the beetle, sacred to Rā, etc. None of these animals were allowed to be killed or injured. In each locality where any kind of animal was sacred, some individuals of the species were attached to the principal temple, where they had their special shrines or chambers, and their train of priestly attendants, who carefully fed them and cleaned them. When they died, they were embalmed according to the most approved method, and entombed with much pomp and ceremony. The origin of this animal-worship may have been natural enough, starting from the idea of transmigration; but its continuance down to the third century of our era exposed the Egyptians to the laughter and contempt of the rest of the civilized world. The Greek comedy-writers of the middle and of the last school, and the Christian fathers, as, for instance, Clemens Alexandrinus and Origen, agree in their feelings on this point. See P. LE PAGE RENOUF: Religion of Ancient Egypt (the Hibbert Lectures for 1879), New York, 1880, from which these last paragraphs have been chiefly drawn.

RELATIONS OF EGYPT AND THE BIBLE. — With Abraham the mention of Egypt in the Bible begins, and is, as always, minutely accurate (Gen. xii. 10–xiii. 3). The plenty in Egypt in that time of famine was the attraction, for the overflowing of the Nile has always blessed that land. Sarah was unveiled (xii. 11), for at that time women upon the monuments always appear so. No mention is made of horses (xii. 16, xiii. 2) in the caravan which accompanied him thither, nor among his presents when he went away, for none are portrayed until Thothmes III., neither are camels; but bones of dromedaries were dug up in the Delta in 1852. His arrival was announced to the Pharaoh (xii. 15, 18), since strangers from Asia were personally examined by the monarch; and permission to remain, if given, was by a duly certified document. Sarah was taken into the royal harem, as the tale of The Two Brothers (trans. in Records of the Past, vol. ii. 137–152) shows was customary in the case of beautiful women.

The next mention of Egypt is in the history of Joseph (Gen. xxxix.–l.), which is truthful and accurate beyond doubt. The Midianites brought "spicery, balm, and myrrh" (xxxvii. 25),—articles necessary to embalming. Joseph was sold (xxxvii. 36) to Potiphar ("consecrated to the god Phra, i.e., the sun") the captain of the guard, which had its headquarters in a famous fortress, known to the Romans as the "White Castle," at Memphis. A papyrus of the period states the daily quantum of bread supplied to the fortress (xxxix. 5, 6). The wives of the Egyptian nobles were not above reproach (xxxix. 7–17; cf. The Two Brothers). The very prison where Joseph was confined is copied upon an existing mosaic found in a Roman house at Preneste (see woodcut in Geikie's Hours with the Bible, vol. i. p. 461). The wine-drinking habits of the country (xl. 1) are illustrated by the tombs of Beni Hassan, built long before Abraham. The importance of dreams was universally granted in antiquity; but Joseph dared a good deal in invading priestly prerogatives in interpreting those of his fellow-prisoners (xl.). His sudden call to the presence of the Pharaoh (a Hyksos), Apepi, according to Brugsch, cleanly dressed and closely shaven (xli. 14), as custom demanded, and his sudden promotion (xli. 41), are thoroughly Egyptian. So, too, are the insignia of his rank, the new name, and the mode of his public reception (xli. 42, 43). By his marriage with Asenath ("devoted to Neith"), the daughter of a priest in the great university temple of the Sun at On, near Memphis, he was incorporated into the priesthood, and therefore into the highest class of the land. The "divining bowl," which comes up in the subsequent narrative (xliv.), is a proof how a man's environment saps his faith. Brugsch finds an allusion to the seven years of famine in an inscription at El-kab from the age of Joseph: "I gathered grain, a friend of the god of harvest; I was watchful at the seed-time, and, when a famine arose through many years, I distributed the grain through the town in every famine."

The land of Goshen, where Joseph settled his family (Gen. xlvii. 4), was admirably adapted for the purpose. It lay on the north-east of the Delta, toward the Isthmus of Suez, and was isolated from the native Egyptians in the Valley of the Nile, who held in abhorrence all shepherds (xlvi. 34). Goshen was famous for its fertility; and, being especially fitted for tillage, the Israelites there were providentially led to change from a pastoral to an agricultural people. To the south were Memphis, the ancient capital, and On, the seat of a great university. In direct contact with Egyptian pomp, at a period when the nation was at its height, the Israelites lived unmolested for four hundred years. The Pharaoh who welcomed them was a Hyksos king; but after a struggle of a hundred and fifty years the Hyksos were driven out, and a native dynasty once more reigned. Then began oppression. They were set to building and beautifying cities (Exod. i. 11). The outrages to which the modern Jellahin in Egypt are subjected give an idea of the sore trials of the chosen people. But "at evening time it shall be light," and to the weary Israelites day was about to dawn; for in one of their most pious families, to judge by the names of his parents, — Amram ("kindred of the Lofty One") and Jochebed ("my glory is Jehovah") (vi. 20), — Moses, their future savior, was born (ii. 2). By the instrumentality of Thermouthis, as Josephus calls the princess who found him (one of the wives of Rameses II., as a contemporary document proves), he was taught all the learning of the Egyptians. But his mother was his first teacher, and from her he received his religion. His killing of an officer was the cause of his flight, rendered all the more imperative because he had buried the body in the sand (ii. 12), and thus prevented its embalment, without which, according to Egyptian belief, the dead man's soul could not live.

When Moses returned, Menephta, the thirteenth son of Rameses, was on the throne. The plagues (vii. 14-xii. 29) were directed against the idolatry of Egypt. By them, in order, the following gods were mocked: (1) Osiris, the great god of the Nile, the sacred river; (2) Heki, the "driver away of frogs;" (3) and (4) The fly gods; (5) The sacred ram worshipped at Thebes, and the sacred ox at Memphis and On; (6) "Human sacrifices of foreigners were offered yearly, and their ashes scattered in the air, to avert evil from the land; but now ashes similarly cast abroad carried misery far and near;" (7) The multitude of divinities who had charge of the air; (8) The insect gods; (9) The sun, the chief Egyptian divinity; (10) The destruction of the first-born put the whole religion to shame; for it demonstrated that a greater than any god in their pantheon had the Egyptians in his power, and favored unmistakably the despised Israelites. For a discussion of the exodus, see EXODUS OF THE CHILDREN OF ISRAEL.

The references to Egypt after the exodus are few and incidental, although several Pharaohs are named. Sheshonk, or Shishak, in the ninth year of Rehoboam (909 B.C.) came up against Jerusalem with twelve hundred chariots and sixty thousand horsemen, and took all the walled towns of Judah (2 Chron. xii.). Upon the south wall of the Temple of Karnak is inscribed, among the conquered kings, "Yuthmalk:" probably Rehoboam is meant. Osarchon, or Zerah, the Ethiopian who was expelled by Asa 940 B.C. (2 Chron. xiv. 9), is inscribed on the same temple. In 1878 an inscription of Tirhakah (2 Kings xix. 9), contemporary of Hezekiah (700 B.C.), who defeated Sennacherib, was discovered at Tanis (the Bible Zoan). Pharaoh-Hophra is mentioned in Jer. xliv. 30. A recently deciphered cuneiform inscription proves that Jeremiah's prophecy was fulfilled in the thirty-seventh year of Nebuchadnezzar. Pharaoh-Nechoh (2 Kings xxiii. 29) is sculptured at Thebes. See HENGSTENBERG: Egypt and the Books of Moses, Eng. trans., Edin., 1847; EBERS: *Aegypten u. d. CHRISTIANITY IN EGYPT dates, according to tradition, from St. Mark the evangelist, who is said to have founded the church in Alexandria. This became afterwards a metropolitan and even a patriarchal see. In the second century, Alexandria (see art.) was the seat of a theological school where the great Origen taught. It flourished for two centuries, and trained some of the most distinguished divines of the Greek Church. Nevertheless, Christianity seems never to have permeated the entire people, nor altered very much many of those who were superficially affected by it; for the great mass of the people simply exchanged a gross for a refined idolatry. The Arabs swept in triumph over Egypt, and at the sword-point forced Mohammedanism upon the nation; and in this religion they have ever since remained. Yet a considerable number of Christian Egyptians remained faithful, and their descendants constitute the present Coptic Church. See COPTS. They are schismatics, rejecting the orthodox dogma of the two natures of Christ. As in ability and training they are superior to the Arabs, they hold most of the government clerkships. In November, 1854, the United Presbyterian Church of America began in Alexandria, and especially in Cairo, a work among these degenerate Christians. It was not the first attempt to preach among them Protestant Christianity; for the Moravians in 1769, and the Church Missionary Society of London in 1826, started missions among them. But the first was abandoned in 1782, owing to the unfavorable character of the times, and the second after a quarter-century of effort, when the delusion of the hope of a reform inside the Coptic Church was demonstrated. The United Presbyterians were more favored as to time, and wisely adopted a different method. Not to resuscitate, but to regenerate, has been their aim. For the first ten years they limited their efforts to the two principal cities; but since then they have extended their operations to Middle and Upper Egypt. From Alexandria, along the Nile to Nubia, they had (1881) four central stations (Alexandria, Cairo, Sinoris, and Osiout), forty out-stations, eight ordained foreign missionaries, sixteen female foreign assistants, a hundred and forty-nine native helpers, and over a thousand communicants. In Cairo and Osiout the mission has acquired valuable property, and in the latter place has even a college and theological seminary for training a native clergy.

Miss M. L. Whately, a daughter of the late Archbishop of Dublin, has for the past twenty years conducted a school in Cairo for the training of Arab youth. It is unsectarian, but strongly Christian, and spreads Bible truth into households which otherwise would be wholly inaccessible. There are also a few English and German churches in Alexandria and Cairo for the foreign population there.

The Roman-Catholic Church has also a hold in Egypt; and there is a sect, called the United Copts, which acknowledge the papal supremacy.

EHRENFEUCHTER, Friedrich Aug. Edu., an evangelical theologian (Vermittlungstheologe), b. Dec. 15, 1814, in Leopoldshafen; d. March 20, 1878, in Göttingen. He studied theology at Heidelberg; in 1845 became professor and university preacher in Göttingen, where he remained in spite of calls to Heidelberg, Leipzig, etc. His principal department was practical theology. His lectures attracted large audiences; and his sermons, two volumes of which appeared in 1849 and 1852, are profound in thought, and finished in form. He was a man of irenic temperament, and bore patiently the attacks of the new Lutheran party in Hanover. His principal works are, Entwicklungsgesch. d. Menschheit, Heidelb., 1845; Die praktische Theologie, Götting., 1859; Christenth. u. d. moderne Weltanschauung, Götting., 1876.

EICHHORN, Johann Gottfried, b. at Dörrenzimmern, in the principality of Hohenlohe-Oehringen, Oct. 16, 1752; d. at Göttingen, June 27, 1827; studied at Göttingen, and was appointed professor of Oriental languages and literatures at Jena in 1775, and professor of theology at Göttingen in 1788. To his Jena residence belong Gesch. d. ostindischen Handels vor Mohammed (Gotha, 1775), Monumenta antiquissima historiae Arabum (Gotha, 1775), De rei nummariae apud Arabes initiis (Jena, 1776), Der Naturmensch, a translation of an Arab romance (Berlin, 1783), a great number of historical and critical essays in his Repertorium für biblische und morgenländische Litteratur (18 vols., 1777–86), which from 1787 to 1803 was followed by his Allgemeine Bibliothek der biblischen Litteratur (10 vols.), and finally his Einleitung in's Alte Testament (Leipzig, 1780–83, 3 vols.), a work written with great boldness and enthusiasm, and accepted by its times as a new departure in theological science. To his Göttingen residence belong his Einleitung in d. apokryphischen Bücher des A. T. (1795: Kritische Schriften, I.–IV.), Einleitung in d. N. T. (1804–12: Kritische Schriften, V.–VII.), Die Propheten (3 vols., 1816–19), a number of voluminous works on history, Weltgeschichte (5 vols., 1801–14), Gesch. d. drei letzten Jahrhunderte (1803, 1804), Gesch. d. Litteratur von ihrem Anfange bis auf d. neuesten Zeiten (5 vols., 1805), etc., besides a multitude of minor essays and reviews. When it is remembered that during fifty-two years he lectured every day three hours in the university, his activity is simply amazing. His historical writings have now fallen into oblivion; but his works on biblical criticism, though their rationalistic tendency has been completely overthrown, are still acknowledged to contain many happy views and profound investigations. EICHHORN, Karl Friedrich, son of J. G. Eichhorn; b. at Jena, Nov. 20, 1781; d. at Berlin, July 5, 1854; studied law at Göttingen, Wetzlar, and Vienna; and was appointed professor of law at Francfort-on-the-Oder in 1805, at Berlin in 1811, at Göttingen in 1817, and again at Berlin in 1832. His Grundsätze d. Kirchenrechts d. kathol. u. d. evangel. Religionspartei in Deutschland, 1831–33, is one of his best works, and the first attempt to apply the principles of the so-called historical school to ecclesiastical law. EINHARD. See EGINHARD.

EINSIEDELN, or MARIA-EINSIEDELN, a Benedictine monastery in Switzerland, and a famous place of pilgrimage. In the first half of the ninth century Meginrad, or Meinrad, from Sulichgau, in the Neckar region, settled on the top of the Etsel, a cliff on the southern shore of the Lake of Zürich, whence he afterwards penetrated farther into the wild Alpine regions, until in 861 he was murdered by robbers in his cell. In the beginning of the tenth century Benno and Eberhard from Strassburg came to the spot where St. Meinrad had been murdered; and there they founded a monastery, which was splendidly endowed by Otho I. and Otho II., and prospered much. It never attained, however, the celebrity of the neighboring St. Gall; and when the Reformation began, it became almost completely deserted. Abbot Joachin Eichhorn (1544–69) retrieved its good fortune, and made it a stronghold for the counter-Reformation. The French invasion of 1798 it also outlived; and when, in 1861, it celebrated its millenary anniversary, it numbered about a hundred inmates, and was visited by about a hundred and fifty thousand pilgrims. The object of the pilgrimage is a visit to the black image of the Virgin, preserved in a separate chapel; and the origin of a special devotion in this chapel is, according to the legend, the circumstance that on Sept. 14, 948, Mary herself and the angels came down from heaven, and consecrated the chapel. Materials for the history of the institution are found in Documenta Archivi Einsiedlensis, published in 3 vols. fol. in the seventeenth century, under Abbot Placidus Reymann; and a continuous history was given in 1612 by the librarian P. Chr. Hartmann, in his Annales Heremi. MEYER VON KNONAU.

EISENMENGER, Johann Andreas, b. at Mannheim, 1654; d. at Heidelberg, Dec. 20, 1704; was educated in the Collegium Sapientie, and studied Hebrew and Arabic in Holland and England; was appointed registrar at the Palatine court in 1693, and professor of Oriental languages at Heidelberg in 1700. The fanatical hatred of Christianity which characterized the Jewish rabbins of that period, more especially his teacher of Hebrew, the famous David Lida, engendered an opposite fanaticism in him; and he spent nineteen years in writing his Entdecktes Judenthum, a curious and learned but exceedingly one-sided and spiteful representation of Judaism. When the book was printed, the Jews procured an inhibition against its publication from the emperor, and even offered to buy the whole edition for twelve thousand florins; but Eisenmenger demanded thirty thousand. After the death of the author, the Prussian king, Friedrich I., appealed to the emperor on behalf of the heirs, but in vain. Finally, however, the book was printed at Königsburg (1711) at the expense of the Prussian King. Eisenmenger's Lexicon Orientale Harmonicum was never printed. His edition of the Hebrew Bible (without points), which he undertook in connection with Leusden, was published 1694. PRESSEL.

EKKEHARD is the name of several monks of literary fame, of the Monastery of St. Gall.—Ekkehard the First, d. 973; was educated there; became director of the cloister-school, and dean of the convent, and made the place a centre of learning and study. He wrote hymns, and a Latin poem on the life and deeds of Walter of Aquitania, last ed. by R. Peiper, Berlin, 1873.—Ekkehard the Second (surnamed Palatinus), d. April 23, 990; was a nephew of the preceding, and educated by him; taught for some time in the school of St. Gall, but was by the Duchess Hedwig of Suabia invited to Hohentwiel, where he taught the duchess Latin and Greek. He was afterwards drawn to the imperial court as one of the chaplains of Otho II., and was finally made provost of the Cathedral of Mayence.—Ekkehard the Third was a cousin of the preceding, and accompanied him to Hohentwiel as teacher of the young clerks at the court of the duchess.

He afterwards returned to St. Gall, and died, as dean of the convent, in the beginning of the eleventh century. — Ekkehard the Fourth (Ekkehardus junior), b. about 980; d. about 1060; was educated at St. Gall by the celebrated Notker Labeo, and became early a master in Latin, Greek, mathematics, astronomy, and music. In 1022 he was invited to Mayence by Archbishop Aribio as director of the cathedral school; but in 1024 he returned to St. Gall. He continued the chronicle of St. Gall, Casus Monasterii Sancti Galli (Monum. Germ. Hist. Script., II. pp. 74–163), commenced by Ratpertus. He made a collection of hymns (Liber Benedictionum), wrote a poem (De ornatu dictionis), and translated into Latin the Life of St. Gall, written in German by Ratpertus. — Ekkehard the Fifth (surnamed Minimus) lived in the beginning of the twelfth century, and wrote a Vita Sancti Nolkeri, of no great interest. — See MEYER VAN KNONAU: Die Ekkehardte von St. Gallen, Basel, 1876. E'LAM (highland), the classical Elymais, was the name of a country east of Babylonia, on the other side of the Tigris, bounded north by Assyria and Media, east by Media and Persia, and south by the Persian Gulf. Its capital was Susa. According to Gen. x. 22 this land was inhabited by descendants of Shem, and called after his son Elam. But from the circumstance that the Hebrews called the land Elam, and the Assyrian inscriptions Ilam, or Ilamti, it cannot be inferred that the people itself also used the name: on the contrary, the Elamites named themselves after their principal cities, — Kis, whence the Greek Cissia; Uwaya, whence the Greek Uxia, etc. When the Shemites settled in Elam, they found there, as in Babylonia, a primitive non-Shemitic population; but while, in Babylonia, the Shemites gained the ascendancy over, in Elam they were absorbed by, that population, as is proved by the circumstance that the language of the inscription found in Elam does not belong to the Shemitic, but to the Altaï-Turanian stock. In the time of Abram the Elamites were quite a powerful nation (Gen. xiv. 9). By the Assyrians, however, they were conquered; and they followed Sennacherib's army when he invaded Judæa (Isa. xxii. 6). Afterwards they once more became independent; and Jeremiah mentions them among those nations upon which the wrath of God was about to descend (Jer. xlix. 34–39). The doom came with Nebuchadnezzar. After the fall of Babylon they were incorporated with the Persian, then with the Syro-Macedonian, and finally with the Parthian Empire. A remarkable confirmation of the Scripture is a record of the Assyrian Assur-banipal (B.C. 668–626), recently deciphered: "In my fifth expedition, to Elam I directed the march. . . . I overwhelmed Elam through its extent. I cut off the head of Teumman, their wicked king, who devised evil. Beyond number I slew his soldiers; alive in hand I captured his fighting men" (Records of the Past, vol. i. p. 71).

E'LATH, or E'LOTH (strong trees), a seaport at the northern extremity of the eastern arm of the Red Sea, the Gulf of Akabah, belonged to the Edomites, and owed its prosperity to its trade with the Indies. Israel passed by it on their exodus from Egypt; and David conquered it (Deut. ii. 8; 2 Sam. viii. 14). From it and Ezion-geber Solomon sent his ships to Ophir (1 Kings ix. 26, 28); but after his death it was retaken by the Edomites (2 Kings viii. 20), and was only for a short time in the possession of Israel, during the reign of Uzziah (2 Kings xiv. 22; 2 Chron. xxvi. 2). Under the Romans it was still an important mercantile place, the station of a legion, and the seat of a bishop, present at various councils between 320 and 536. Under the Mohammedans it lost its trade. Various ineffectual attempts were made by the crusaders and the kings of Jerusalem to regain it. About 1300, at the time of Abulfeda, it had been completely deserted. The present town of Akabah consists only of some scattered huts, and an old fortress with towers, occupied by some Turkish troops. It forms the tenth station on the pilgrims' route from Cairo.

ELDER. See PRESBYTER.

ELDERS AMONG THE HEBREWS were not necessarily old men, but merely the first-born of the several chief families in each tribe, just as to-day the Arab sheik claims authority by reason of priority of birth. The same phenomenon was true respecting the Midianites and other neighboring tribes (Num. xxii. 4, 7; Josh. ix. 11). There must have been hundreds of them in Israel when Moses chose the "seventy" to be the National Council. It is not stated that this number was composed of one from each of the fifty-eight families (Num. xxvi.), and one from each tribal chief family; and indeed the phraseology is against this idea (Deut. i. 15). The elders were sometimes judges, but not necessarily, for David put priests and Levites in this office; and in Deut. xxi. 2, 6, the elders are expressly distinguished from judges. After the settlement in Canaan the elders constituted the governing body in every village, town, and city (Ruth iv. 2 sqq.), and the medium of business with another place (Deut. xix. 12). It was the elders who demanded a king in the people's name (1 Sam. viii. 4 sqq.), and who chose him (2 Sam. iii. 17); they were also the natural companions and advisers of the king (1 Kings viii. 1; 2 Kings xxiii. 1), and the best agents of the prophets in promoting a revival of religion (Jer. xix. 1). In the exile the elders kept up their authority; and on the return they sided with the priests, and next to the princes were the rulers (Ez. x. 8, 14, 15). The great synagogue, according to tradition, was composed of priestly and civil elders. In our Lord's mouth the elders are the channels of tradition (Matt. xv. 2; Mark vii. 3, 5), which bound like fetters the pious Jews. FR. W. SCHULTZ.

ELEUTHEROPOLIS, a city of Southern Palestine, and the seat of a bishop, received its name, "Free City," from Alexander Severus (203), and was a place of importance in the days of Eusebius and Jerome. In 796 it was razed to the ground by the Saracens, and its Greek name was replaced by the old Aramaic Bethgebrim. In the twelfth century the crusaders built a fortress on the spot, which was taken by Saladin, and retaken by Richard. At present the site is occupied by an insignificant village (Beit Jibrin), and covered with ruins. See ROBINSON: Biblical Researches, New York, 1841.

ELEUTHERUS, a river of Syria, mentioned 1 Macc. xi. 7, xii. 30, the modern Nahr-el-Kebir; rises at the north-eastern base of the Lebanou, and enters the Mediterranean about eighteen miles north of Tripolis.

ELEUTHERUS, Bishop of Rome 177-193; was a Greek by birth. Two events are noticed during his administration: first, the churches of Lyons and Vienne sent Irenæus (then a presbyter, afterwards bishop) to Rome to present to Eleutherus the acta martyrum from the persecutions which the churches had just suffered (EUSEBIUS, Hist. Eccl., V. 4); next, the British king, Lucius, wrote to Eleutherus (according to BEDA, Hist. Eccl., III. 25, and the Liber Pontificalis) to tell him that he was ready to accept Christianity as soon as Eleutherus would send him teachers. The latter notice is a little suspicious; as, towards the close of the sixth century, Augustine found in Britain a Christianity quite different from the Roman type, while Beda was naturally anxious to catch any hint at an early connection between Britain and Rome.

HERZOG.

ELEVATION OF THE HOST. See MASS.

ELI (עֲלִי, "elevation"), a descendant of Ithamar, and high priest. The proof of the first statement is this: Abiathar was a lineal descendant of Eli (cf. 1 Kings ii. 27; 1 Sam. ii. 31, 35); but his son Ahimelech is expressly stated to have been "of the sons of Ithamar (1 Chron. xxiv. 3). The sins of his two sons, Hophni and Phinehas, brought sorrow upon his head, and entailed the destruction of his house. Samuel disclosed to him these judgments (1 Sam. iii. 13, 14). He judged Israel forty years (1 Sam. iv. 18). At the news of the defeat of the Israelitish army he fell backward and broke his neck. He had grown dim of sight, and was ninety-eight at the time of his death (1 Sam. iv. 15).

ELIAS LEVITA, or, more properly, Elihu ben Ascher Hallevi, acquired great reputation in the first half of the sixteenth century, both in Italy and Germany, as a teacher of Hebrew. Reuchlin, Pellican, and Luther had learned their Hebrew from Matthew Adrianus, a converted Jew from Spain, who taught at Basel, Heidelberg, Liège, Louvain, and Wittenberg. But the next generation of Hebrew scholars, Sebastian Münster, Fr. Buxtorf, etc., were the pupils of Elias Levita, either directly or indirectly through his works. He was born 1472 (probably Feb. 8), at Neustadt-on-the-Aisch, near Nuremberg, but emigrated early to Italy, taught Hebrew at Padua (1504-09), and wrote a commentary on the Hebrew grammar of Moses Kimchi, which Sebastian Münster translated into Latin (Basel, 1531). When Padua was captured and pillaged by the French in 1509, he lost all his property, and removed first to Venice, and then, in 1512, to Rome, where he was well received by Egidio of Viterbo, the general of the Augustine order, and afterwards a cardinal. He did not exactly teach the cardinal Hebrew: he only aided him in deciphering the enigmas of the Cabala, and was in reward boarded and lodged

(he and his family) for thirteen years in the cardinal's house. But Dr. Eck was his pupil in this period. In Rome he wrote a Hebrew grammar (1518), and a book on composition explaining difficult forms. The first was translated into Latin by Sebastian Münster. When Rome was captured and pillaged (1527) by the troops of Charles V., he lost for a second time all he owned. He then removed to Venice; and there he remained till his death (1549), with the exception of a few years he spent at Isny in Suabia, as assistant of Paul Fagius, who had established a Hebrew printing-press there. In Venice he wrote his principal work, an introduction to the Massorah (1538); and at Isny he published a Chaldee dictionary (1541). As a grammarian he was neither deep nor original, but he was a man of great erudition and just views. He first popularized the idea that the canon of the Old Testament was formed by Ezra and the great synagogue; and he also held the view that the vowels of the Hebrew language were of late origin, later even than the Talmud. See J. C. WOLF: Bibliotheca Hebraica, I. 153-161; III. 97-102; IV. 182; Rossi: Dizionario degli Autori Ebrei; and a biography written in Hebrew by KOBER, Leipzig, 1856.

ELIGIUS, b. at Chatelat, near Limoges, about 588; d. at Noyon, Nov. 30, 658 or 659; descended from a Gallo-Roman, not Frankish family, and was apprenticed to the goldsmith Abbo, at Limoges, the mint-master of the king of Aquitania. In 610 he went to Paris, the residence of the king of Neustria; got work in the royal treasury; acquired the particular favor of King Clotaire, and accumulated a fortune. Meanwhile, the influence of Columban reached the Neustrian court from Burgundy and Austrasia, and obtained absolute sway over Eligius and his young friend Audoenus, at that time page to the king. Without abandoning his trade, Eligius began an ascetic life; and he soon earned a great reputation, not only as an artist, but also for his piety. In 628 Clotaire died, and was succeeded by his son Dagobert; but this change only made the influence of Eligius stronger at the Neustrian court, though he was opposed by the Frankish chieftains and courtiers, headed by the major domus. Young Saxons were then brought to Paris, often in great numbers, and sold there as slaves. He bought them by the hundreds, and gave them freedom, either sending them home or making them monks. Monasteries and churches he founded, built, adorned, and supported in the most lavish manner. The Monastery of Solignac, near Limoges, was one of his foundations; the great nunnery in Paris, another. Even on the appointment of bishops, he is said to have exercised a decisive influence. But in 638 Dagobert died, and Herchenvald, the major domus who governed the realm during the minority of Clodvig II., wished to have Eligius removed from the court. In 640 he was made Bishop of Noyon, at the same time as his friend Audoenus was made Bishop of Rouen. As a bishop he was very austere and active, reforming not only the chapter of his cathedral and the monasteries of his dioceses, but also the courts of the Frankish chieftains, whose wild drinking-bouts and fighting-feasts were a scandal to him. In the synod of Chalons (644) he effected the deposition of the metropolitan, Theodosius of Arles, on account of his arbitrary and uncanonical rule. In the synod of Orléans (650) he and the whole clergy of Neustria declared in favor of Martin of Rome, and persecutions were instituted against the Monothelists. In 656 both Clodvig II. and Herchenoald died; and, during the reign of the pious Queen Bathilde, Eligius again occupied his old position at the court. After his death, miracles were said to take place at his grave, and he was honored by the people as a saint. His life (Vita S. Eligii) was written by his friend Audoenus, and is found in D'ACHERY: Spicilegium, II. pp. 76-123; but, in the form in which it is found there, it belongs certainly to a later time. Some sermons ascribed to him, and printed in Bibl. Max. Patr., Lyons, 1677, XII. pp. 300-322, belong evidently to the Carolingian period. A letter from him to Desiderius, Bishop of Cahors, is found in CANISI, Antiqu. Lect., ed. Basnage, I. p. 646. ALBRECHT VOGEL.

ELIJAH (אֵלִיָּהוּ, or אֵלִיָּה, "My God is Jehovah;" LXX. Ἠλιὰς; New Testament [West. and Hort] Ἠλιίας), the greatest of the prophets belonging to the northern kingdom of Israel, and one of the grandest and most romantic characters in Hebrew history. The events of his life are recorded in four chapters of 1 Kings (xvii., xviii., xix., xxi.), in the first two chapters of 2 Kings, and in 2 Chron. xxi. 12-15. As in the case of Daniel, and of a majority of the twelve minor prophets, nothing is known of his parentage. Six times in the course of the narrative, including a later reference (2 Kings ix. 36), he is called "the Tishbite," which indicates his birthplace. This cannot have been the Thisbe of Upper Galilee, from which Tobit was carried captive by the Assyrians in the time of Shalmaneser (Tob. i. 2), since Elijah the Tishbite is said expressly to have been "of the inhabitants of Gilead" (1 Kings xvii. 1). The Septuagint reads, "from Thisbe [or Tishbi] of Gilead;" Josephus (Ant., VIII. 13, 2) also says, "of Thesbona, a city of Gilead." Somewhere in this wild but fertile and beautiful district the great prophet was born; and the exact spot is now probably determined. In the fourteenth century Pârchi, the learned Jewish traveller in Palestine, heard of it, and considered it the birthplace of Elijah. In 1876 it was found and identified by Dr. Selah Merrill, archæologist of the American Palestine Exploration Society. The name of the place is El-Istib, which Dr. Van Dyck of Beyrout pronounces the exact Arabic equivalent of Tishbi. It is in the Wady Mareh, which opens northward into the Wady Yabis, which, in turn, opens westward into the Jordan Valley. El-Istib (or Listib) is about twenty-two miles in an air line south of the Lake of Galilee, some ten miles east of the Jordan, and some six miles south-east of ancient Pella. The brook Cherith was probably in the same immediate neighborhood, though no relic of the name has yet been discovered.

We have no account of the early life of the prophet, nor is it certain at what time exactly his translation occurred. From the narrative in Kings it might be supposed to have occurred in the reign of Ahaziah, king of Israel (897-896 B.C.), the immediate successor of Ahab. But if the "writing" spoken of in 2 Chron. xxi. 12 was a personal letter from Elijah to Jehoram, king of Judah (892-885 B.C.), Elisha must have commenced his public ministry before his master's translation. At all events, the public ministry of the Tishbite in Israel ended with his rebuke of Ahaziah (897-896 B.C.); the great errand of his life having been to antagonize the idolatry of Ahab (919-897 B.C.).

The dramatic interest of the narrative is surpassed only by that of the exodus from Egypt. Ahab, seventh of the nineteen kings of Israel, a weak man, who had married the Phœnician Jezebel, gave himself up also to the Phœnician idolatry, and the true religion was in imminent danger of being rooted out. Suddenly the apostate king is confronted by a rough-looking man from beyond the Jordan, described as a hairy man wearing a leathern girdle and a sheepskin cape or mantle. It was Elijah the Tishbite, who had come as a prophet of Jehovah to tell the king there should be neither dew nor rain but according to his word. And then the prophet hastens back to Gilead. There, in the Wady Cherith, the ravens feed him till the brook dries up, and he is told to betake himself to the Phœnician Zarephath, where a widow-woman had been commanded to care for him, where he and the widow's family are fed miraculously, and the dead son of the widow is restored to life. Some three years later, when drought and famine had become well-nigh intolerable, he meets Ahab again, calls down fire from heaven upon his altar on Carmel, and slays, with Ahab's consent, the four hundred and fifty prophets of Baal, reddening the Kishon with their blood. Then he prayed for rain; and then he ran before the chariot of the apparently repentant Ahab, sixteen miles across the plain of Esdraelon, to the entrance of Jezreel. But the rage of Jezebel drives him to Beersheba, and into the desert south of it, where he sinks down discouraged, praying for death. Thence he goes on to Sinai, where he has wonderful visions of God, which revive his faith and courage. Some six years later he appears again to denounce both Ahab and Jezebel for what they had done to Naboth, causing him to be put to death on a false charge of blasphemy, that they might seize his vineyard. His last personal appearance was to Ahaziah, son of Ahab and Jezebel, some three or four years after the Naboth tragedy. Elijah's life was thus one of bold, sudden appearances and disappearances in a gallant struggle against the mad idolatry that was working the ruin of the northern kingdom. Where he was, and what he was doing, during the long intervals of his public ministry, we can only conjecture. His departure out of life was in keeping with the whole previous tenor of it. His sheepskin mantle, rolled up into a rod, smote a path for himself and for Elisha across the Jordan. A chariot of fire, and horses of fire, parted the two prophets, and the Tishbite went up in a storm into the sky. This, however, does not quite end his biography. Second only to Moses, who, also, was strangely snatched away not far from the same locality, Moses and Elijah came back together to meet our Lord transfigured on Hermon. The abundance and boldness of the miracles ascribed to Elijah bring no suspicion upon the narrative, when it is considered that the true religion was in such desperate straits. Elijah has been canonized in both the Greek and the Latin churches, the twentieth day of July being sacred to his memory.

The literature of the subject is abundant. ELIM (strong trees), the second station of Israel after crossing the Red Sea (Exod. xv. 27; Num. xxxiii. 9). As the place had twelve springs and seventy palm-trees, and no alteration is likely to have taken place in the desert since that time, Elim is with most probability identified with Wady Gharandel; though by some it is placed a little more to the south, at Wady Useit, or Wady Taiyibeh. See SCHAFF: Through Bible Lands, pp. 152, 164.

ELIOT, John, "The Apostle to the Indians" (1604-90), was a native of Nasing, Essex County, Eng. Of his childhood and youth but little is known, except that he was blessed with eminently godly parents, by whom, to use his own language, his "first years were seasoned with the fear of God, the Word, and prayer." He was educated at the University of Cambridge, where his superior attainments, especially in the knowledge of the Hebrew and Greek languages, marked him out already for the great work to which in the New World his life was to be consecrated. Upon leaving the university, he became an usher in the grammar-school of the Rev. Thomas Hooker, at Little Baddow, near Chelmsford in Essex. Mr. Hooker had been silenced for nonconformity. He afterwards emigrated to New England, and is known in history as the father of the Connecticut churches. Eliot's connection with this admirable man formed a turning-point in his spiritual history. "When I came to this blessed family," said he, "I then saw, and never before, the power of godliness in its lively vigor and efficacy." He resolved to devote himself to the ministry of the gospel; and as his nonconformist principles exposed him to the tyranny of Laud, he sought the shores of America, arriving at Boston in November, 1631. In November, 1632, he was settled as teacher of the church of Christ in Roxbury, and continued in that office until his death, — a period of nearly sixty years. He married also in the same year. In 1639 he was appointed, with his colleague Mr. Welde, and Richard Mather of Dorchester, to make a new version of the Psalms. It was printed in the following year, and was called The Bay Psalm Book, but is now best known as The New-England Version of the Psalms. It was the first book printed in North America.

Soon after his settlement at Roxbury, Eliot became deeply interested in the Indians, and at length resolved to preach the gospel to them. There were some twenty tribes within the limits of the Colonies, but they spoke substantially the same language. Having acquired a competent knowledge of it, he met for the first time an assembly of Indians at Nonantum, in the present town of Newton, Oct. 28, 1646, and opened to them the way of salvation. He thus entered upon that career of missionary zeal and labors which has rendered his name so illustrious throughout Christendom. He was violently opposed by the sachems and powwows, or juggling priests; but, nothing daunted, he prosecuted his mission with apostolic energy, until villages of praying Indians began to appear in different parts of the Colony. In 1660, at Natick, the first Indian church was organized. Eliot tried also, though with only partial success, to civilize as well as convert the Indians. In process of time he came to be regarded by them as their best friend. His influence over them was extraordinary; and he exerted it for their good, in things temporal and spiritual alike, with rare wisdom and sagacity. The story of his missionary tours among the different tribes is full of interest. In 1661 he had the joy of publishing the New Testament in the Indian language, and three years later the whole Bible. Richard Baxter said of a copy of it sent to Charles II., "Such a work and fruit of a plantation was never before presented unto a king." Of this Bible Cotton Mather wrote: "Behold, ye Americans, the greatest honor that ever ye were partakers of, — the Bible printed here at our Cambridge; and it is the only Bible that ever was printed in all America, from the very foundation of the world." Eliot's Indian Bible is the grandest monument of early American scholarship and evangelism. The longest word in it is in Mark i. 40, Wutap-pesittukqussunnoohwehtunkquoh ("kneeling down to him"). Eliot also translated into the Indian tongue a catechism, Baxter's Call to the Unconverted, and various other treatises on practical religion, besides preparing an Indian grammar. At the end of the latter he wrote, "Prayer and pains, through faith in Christ Jesus, will do any thing." In his last years, when weighed down by bodily infirmities, and unable any longer to preach, or to visit the Indians, he induced several families to send their negro servants to him once a week, that he might instruct them in the truths of the gospel. His old age was adorned with the simplicity and artlessness of a little child, with wonderful humility, and a charity that never failed. Nor was he wanting in fine touches of humor. He pretended to fear that his old friends and neighbors, Cotton of Boston, and Mather of Dorchester, who had gone to heaven many years before, would suspect him to have gone the wrong way, because he staid so long behind them. His missionary work excited great interest in England; and the funds for carrying it on were chiefly supplied by the Society for propagating the Gospel in New England. This corporation, instituted in 1649 by an ordinance of the famous Long Parliament, largely aided him also in defraying the expense of publishing the first and second editions of his Indian Bible. Mr. Eliot died on the 20th of May, 1690, in the eighty-sixth year of his age. His wife, a woman of uncommon excellence, and singularly adapted to be his companion and helpmeet, passed on to the better country three years before him, in the eighty-fourth year of her age. They had six children, — a daughter and five sons. Four of the sons were graduated at Harvard College, and three of them became ministers of the gospel. Only the daughter and one son survived their father.

No worthier or more venerable name than that of John Eliot is to be found in all the annals of New England. "There was no man on earth whom I honored above him," wrote Richard Baxter. Southey pronounced him "one of the most extraordinary men of any country." Even in his own day he was called "The Apostle to the Indians;" and, although he earnestly deprecated such a title, it has adhered to him ever since by common consent of the Christian world.

LIT. — In addition to his Indian Bible, grammar, etc., Eliot published various other works, among them, The Harmony of the Gospels, The Divine Management of Gospel Churches by the Ordinance of Councils, The Christian Commonwealth, also several letters and other writings relating to the progress of the gospel among the Indians. The best account of him and his missionary labors is Life of John Eliot, the Apostle to the Indians, by CONVERS FRANCIS, vol. V. of SPARKS'S Library of American Biography (Boston, 1836).

GEORGE L. PRENTISS.

ELISÆUS (Armenian Egishê), an eminent Armenian historian and theologian of the fifth century; was educated by Sahak and Mesrob, and served as secretary to the Armenian prince Vartan during the rebellion against Yzdegerd II., the Persian king, who threatened the existence of Christianity in Armenia. Elisæus was afterwards made Bishop of Amatunik, and was as such present at the great national synod of Ardushad, 449. He died 480 at Reschdonni, on the southern shore of Lake Van. His principal work is a history of the Persian persecution of Christianity in Armenia, which he narrates as an eyewitness, and with the employment of all official sources. The work was first printed in Constantinople, 1764: the best edition of it is that of Venice, 1852. It was translated into English by Neumann, Lond., 1830. He has also written commentaries on various books of the Old Testament and other theological works, of which a collected edition appeared at Venice, 1838. R. GOSCHE.

ELISHA (עִישָׁא), "God is salvation;" LXX. Ἐλισαῖος; New Testament Ἐλισσαῖος), Hebrew prophet, and successor of Elijah. As he was engaged in ploughing, Elijah consecrated him to the prophetic office by throwing his mantle over him (1 Kings xix. 19-21). He left his plough, and became the most faithful and eminent disciple of the great master. His prophetic activity fell in the reigns of four kings, and lasted more than half a century (c. 890-840). Under his predecessor a religious reformation had been effected, so that the times of Elisha were favorable to a dispensation of healing and of grace. It was this difference of surroundings, and also a difference in temperament, to which is to be attributed the difference in kind of the activity of the two prophets. Elijah was stern and severe, solitary and lonely; Elisha benevolent and tender, a man of the city and the home. He was often seen in the vicinity of Jericho, and on the Jordan, at Gilgal and at Bethel, and owned a house at Samaria. He is the friend of the poor and needy, who interests himself in the smallest details of domestic life. Now he heals the impure waters with salt (2 Kings ii. 19-22), now he makes the penurious fare of the sons of the prophets palatable (iv. 38-41). He helps the widow out of debt (iv. 1-7), and restores to a poor boy the axe which had fallen into the water (vi. 1-7). A few loaves through his blessing suffice for a hundred (iv. 42-44). To his hospitable Shunammite friend he promises a child (iv. 8-17), and, when it has died, restores it to life (viii. 1-6). His fame extended to Syria; and Naaman the captain, by his counsel, bathes in the Jordan, and loses his leprosy (v.).

But Elisha's gracious activity was not confined to cases in private life. King Joram applies to him for counsel in his distress (iii. 11-20). His prediction of the Syrian attacks is so accurate, that the Syrian commander attributes his defeats to a traitor in the camp (vi. 11); and, when he seeks to take the prophet captive, Elisha leads him and his army to Samaria, as though they had been stricken with blindness (vi. 13-19). Elisha was obliged to follow the divine direction, and against his will, and with tears, predicted before Hazael that he would come to the throne, and would ravage Israel (viii. 7-15). He had constantly before his mind the well-being of his people, as is evidenced by the unceasing esteem of the nation, and the testimony of a king at his death, who called him his father, and Israel's "chariot and horsemen" (xiii. 14).

In sublime intellectual power Elisha was not equal to his predecessor; but in him the grace of God shows its tender and solicitous care for the smallest events. His miracles approach nearest to those of the Saviour, in which the fulness of divine grace revealed itself. He who sees deeds of supernatural power in the saving life of Christ will not deny them to his type in the Old Testament.

ELIZABETH, QUEEN. See ENGLAND, CHURCH OF.

ELIZABETH, ST., of Hungary, the daughter of Andreas II., King of Hungary; b. in Pressburg, 1207; d. at Marburg, Nov. 19, 1231. In her fourth year she was betrothed to Ludwig, son of Hermann, Landgrave of Thuringia, to whose court she was at once sent in a silver cradle. The Wartburg, the residence of the landgrave, was at that time one of the most brilliant courts in Germany. The marriage was perfected in 1221, Ludwig having succeeded his father in 1216. It proved to be a happy one. Both were of serious temperament, and under their administration the tone of life radically changed at the Wartburg. Elizabeth displayed in an ever increasing measure the virtues of humility, mercy, and charity. She was the friend of the afflicted, in person relieved the sufferings of the sick, and distributed large sums among the needy; and in the famine of 1226 her charity relieved the poor from far and near. She founded a hospital at Eisenach for twenty-four persons enfeebled by age, or rendered helpless by disease. The even tenor of this life of marital felicity and charitable effort was interrupted by the death of Ludwig in 1227, in Apulia, on the eve of departure on a crusade with Frederick II. Beautiful and bright as her life had heretofore been, it henceforth becomes a melancholy record of ascetic mortification, which the religious sentiment of the time commended and praised as the best evidence and most perfect fruit of piety, but which the more evangelical spirit of modern Christianity condemns as unnatural and barbarous.

While her husband was still living, and with his consent, Elizabeth had made Conrad of Marburg, the papal inquisitor-general in Germany, her confessor and religious guide. Under his influence she gave herself up to an ascetic discipline, undergoing severe castigations at the hands of her attendants. Conrad endeavored to separate her from her husband, but only succeeded in extracting a promise, that, in the event of his death, she would not marry again. After Ludwig's demise, she submitted herself slavishly to this iron-hearted priest. She received harsh treatment from Heinrich Raspe, her brother-in-law, who had usurped the throne, and was driven forth from the Wartburg. After much suffering she found refuge with her uncle Egbert, Bishop of Bamberg. The knights who brought back her husband's remains, sought and secured justice for Elizabeth. She was invited back to the Wartburg, but at her own request was sent to Marburg, where she ended her days. After occupying for a while a dilapidated cottage, she entered a convent, but did not become a nun. She was wholly under the withering influence of Conrad, who set himself to the task of destroying every natural affection, however pure, in the hope of making a saint. Elizabeth submitted to the most menial services, separated herself from her three children, and bared her back while brother Gerhard flagellated it, and Conrad sang the Miserere as an accompaniment. From this painful and ghastly spectacle, which was, however, in perfect accord with the morbid and mistaken religious ideas of the day, we turn away with relief, and think only of the Christian humility and tender charity of character which underlay this asceticism. In Marburg, as in the bright days on the Wartburg, she labored to relieve the wants of the sick and poor. A hospital which still stands attests her munificence. She was canonized by Gregory IX. in 1235; and the same year the Landgrave Ludwig laid in Marburg the corner-stone of the stately Elizabeth Church, which still stands, and, up to the time of the Reformation, contained the remains of this most honored of the women of mediæval Germany.

HERZOG.
ELIZABETH ALBERTINE, countess-palatine,

b. at Heidelberg, Dec. 26, 1618; d. at Herford, in Westphalia, Feb. 11, 1680; was a daughter of Friedrich V., elector of the Palatinate, and king of Bohemia, and Elizabeth Stuart, a daughter of James I. She was educated at the Hague, where her parents kept a quiet court. She learned six languages. Descartes was her teacher in mathematics. Malebranche and Leibnitz were among her friends and correspondents. She early decided to remain unmarried, and devote her life to philosophy; and the decapitation of her uncle, Charles I. (1648), and the unhappy marriage of her brother, Karl Ludwig of the Palatinate, etc., only confirmed her decision. In 1667 she retired to Herford in Westphalia as abbess; and there she had opportunity to show hospitality to the followers of Labadie in 1670, and to the Quakers in 1676; circumstances which, towards the close of her life, gave her mind a more decidedly religious turn. Biographies of her have been written by GUNRAUER, in Raumer's hist. Taschenbuch (1851), and by GOEBEL, in his Geschichte d. christ. Lebens, etc., Coblenz, 1855, vol. II.

ELKESAITES, a school in the Jewish Christian Church, whose doctrines were tinged with Gnosticism. Our principal sources of information are the Philosophumena of Hippolytus and Epiphanius, who also calls them Sampsaiot (from שָׁמַשׁ, "sun"). The derivation of the name has led to many conjectures. Delitzsch derives it from a Galilean village (Elkesi); others, from a Hebrew word meaning apostate; while the church fathers derive it from a pretended founder, Elxai. Epiphanius (Hær., xix. 2) defines the name to mean "hidden power" (δύναμις κεκαλυμένη). It was probably merely the designation of a book. At any rate, the Elkesaites had in their possession a book which was widely used, and, according to Origen, believed to have fallen from heaven, or, according to the more accurate Philosophumena, was revealed by the Son of God himself. Elxai is reported to have received it in Parthia in Trajan's reign, and to have presented it to the Sobiai (Epiphanius, xix. 1; Philos., ix. 13). The work itself contains a large element of natural religion mingled with Judaistic and Christian ideas. It authorizes the practice of astrology and magic. Besides those features which Elkesaitism had in common with Ebionism may be mentioned the doctrine that baptism washes away sins; and the frequent repetition of the rite is enjoined. Before the Philosophumena were discovered (1851), the Elkesaites were identified with the Ebionites (Gieseler), and the Pseudo-Clementine Homilies were regarded as the main authority on the subject. But the two works differ; the Philosophumena teaching an intensified Ebionism, and the Clementines a modified type, giving up circumcision. The book of Elxai was widely circulated, but cannot be regarded as the confession of Ebionism. The Elkesaites were not a distinct sect, but rather a school scattered among all parties of the Judæo-Christian Church.

ELLER, Elias, b. at Ronsdorf in the duchy of Berg, 1690; d. there May 16, 1750; married at Elberfeld a rich widow (Bolckhaus), and established himself at the head of a sect of apocalyptic millenarians, called "Ellerians," or "Ronsdorfers," who received their revelations through a young baker-daughter from Elberfeld (Buchel), whom Eller married after the death of his first wife. The Bible the sect accepted as the word of God; but it needed various kinds of supplements; and these were given by Buchel, in the Hirtentasche ("shepherd's bag"). Abraham, Moses, and Elijah were only prototypes of Eller, in whom the whole fulness of divinity dwelt. The Messiah was to be born again by Buchel, etc. When investigations were had at Elberfeld concerning the meetings of the sect, Eller moved (in 1737), with all his followers, to Ronsdorf, where a church was to be built, and a minister was appointed (Schleiermacher). After the death of his second wife, Eller married another rich widow (Bosselmann); and the sect, though suspected of immoralities, began to spread, when disagreement broke out between Eller and Schleiermacher. Schleiermacher was expelled, and fled to Holland, formally accused by Eller of sorcery. Wülffing was appointed minister in his place. After the death of Eller, Wülffing and Bolckhaus (a son of Eller's first wife) tried to propagate the sect; but it soon after died out. Full accounts of it are found in the writings of J. W. KNEVEL, (the defender of Schleiermacher), P. WÜLFFING, and J. BOLCKHAUS. See J. A. ENGELS: Geschichte der religiösen Schwärmerei im Herzogthum Berg, Schwelm, 1826. G. H. KLIPPEL.

ELLIOTT, Charles, D.D., b. at Glenconway, County Donegal, Ireland, May 16, 1792; d. at Mount Pleasant, Io., Jan. 6, 1869. He was licensed as a local Methodist preacher 1813, and in 1815 emigrated to America. He served in various capacities, having been superintendent of the mission among the Wyandotte Indians at Upper Sandusky, a presiding elder of the Ohio district, professor of languages in Madison College, Uniontown, Penn., and for many years editor of different Methodist religious papers. From 1857 to 1860 he was professor of biblical literature, and president of the Iowa Wesleyan University, and again from 1864 to 1867. His general reputation rests upon his Delineation of Roman Catholicism, N. Y., 1841, 2 vols., London, 1851 (with full index); but he also wrote The Great Secession (a history of the division of the Methodist-Episcopal Church in 1844 on account of slavery), N. Y., 1852; and South-western Methodism, a History of the M. E. Church in Missouri from 1844 to 1864, N. Y., 1868.

ELLIS, William, missionary, b. in London, Aug. 29, 1794; d. at Hoddesdon, Hertfordshire, June 25, 1872. He was sent by the London Missionary Society to the South Sea Islands in 1816, and labored there until 1823, when he removed to Hawaii, and rendered efficient service to the American missionaries in reducing the Hawaiian language to a written form. See SANDWICH ISLANDS. The state of Mrs. Ellis's health compelled his return to England in 1825. He entered into the home-work of the society, at first as travelling agent, but from 1832 to 1839 as foreign secretary. In 1839 he published the Martyr

Church of Madagascar; in 1844, the first volume of a history of the London Missionary Society. Circumstances prevented the completion of the work. In 1853 he was sent out to Madagascar to revive the mission there, which had suffered so terribly from persecution. By his tact and zeal he succeeded in putting Christianity upon a firm basis. Between 1853 and 1863 he visited the island four times; and he has published his experiences and information in Three Visits to Madagascar (London, 1858), Madagascar Revisited (London, 1867).

Mr. Ellis was one of those missionaries who have laid the church and the world under tribute. He was not only indefatigable in labor, and solicitous for the spiritual welfare of his converts and their brethren, but he was also able to improve their temporal condition by his practical knowledge. In his boyhood he had worked enthusiastically at market-gardening; and, in the year before he sailed on his first missionary journey, he learned not only theology, but printing and book-binding. He was able, therefore, to acclimatize many species of fruits and plants in the South Sea Islands, which have been a source of revenue to the inhabitants, and also to set up the first printing-press in Polynesia. His books are not merely faithful and interesting records of missionary labor, but contributions to science.

ELLWOOD, Thomas, a Quaker, the suggester of Paradise Regained; b. at Crowell, Oxfordshire, 1639; d. at Hunger Hill, near Amerdean, Buckinghamshire, March 1, 1713. He was Latin reader to Milton for some months. During the Great Plague in London (1665) he took a house for Milton at Giles Chalfont; and there he read the manuscript of Paradise Lost, which he returned with the remark, "Thou hast said much here of Paradise lost; but what hast thou to say of Paradise found?" To Ellwood we are indebted for much information in regard to Milton and the persecutions of the Quakers. Of his own works the most important are, Forgery no Christianity (London, 1674), and Foundation of Tithes Shaken (1682), and his Autobiography, with supplement by Joseph Wyeth (1714), reprint, Boston, 1877, in the Choice Autobiographies series, edited by W. D. Howells.

ELO'HIM (אֱלֹהִים), the term most frequently used in the Old Testament for God. It is the plural form, the singular, Eloah (אֱלֹהַּ), being exclusively used in poetry. The ancient Semitic name for God, El (אֱל), occurs seldom. It defines God, beyond dispute, as having absolute power. So in Assyrian alilu means "powerful." But Eloah cannot be proved to mean "powerful." The verb means in the Arabic "to be afraid," and (according to Oehler) is connected with the Assyrian alal, so that it would mean power which inspires fear. Elohim, as the designation of the true God, is not used in any of the Semitic languages except biblical Hebrew. Various explanations have been given of this plural form. The old theologians, beginning with Peter Lombard, found a reference to the Trinity; and, by pointing to the inexhaustible fulness of the Deity, it is, to say the least, inconsistent with an abstract monotheism. A second view sees in the plural form a relic of an ancient polytheism; but the opinion is untenable, that the monotheism of the Old Testament developed out of polytheism. A third view finds the higher spirits who surround God referred to; but the use of the word for angels cannot be proved, confessedly not [many commentators, like Perowne on the Psalms, dissent] in Ps. viii. 5, xcvi. 7, cxxxviii. 1, where the Septuagint translates it "angels." And in Ps. lxxxii. Elohim does not mean, as Hupfeld thinks, angels, but the theocratic officers of the law. The correct view was advanced by Dietrich in his Hebrew grammar (1846), who regards it as a plural of quantity, the same which is used for natural objects, like the ocean and the heavens, which make the impression of power. Elohim, therefore, designates the fulness of divine power, and is rightly called by Delitzsch a plural of intensity. [See TH. NÖLDECKE: Ueber den Gottesnamen El, Berlin, 1880.]

ELVIRA, a town of Spain which has now disappeared, but which probably was situated near Granada. A council (Concilium Eliberitanum, or Illyberitanum) was held there in 305 or 306, according to Hefele (in the spring of 306, according to Dale, not 324, as in some copies of the acts), and attended by nineteen bishops, among whom was Hosius of Corduba, and a number of priests. Its canons refer exclusively to discipline, prohibiting unchastity, clerical marriages, pictures in churches, lights by day in cemeteries, etc. See MANSI, II.; HEFELE: Conciliengeschichte, i. § 13; DALE: The Synod of Elvira, London, 1882.

ELY, the seat of an English bishopric, is a town on the Isle of Ely, near the Ouse, sixteen miles north-north-east of Cambridge. A monastery was founded there by Etheldreda, Queen of Northumbria (673), of which she died abbess (679); but, when the town was ravaged by the Danes (870), it was burnt. Ethelwold, Bishop of Winchester, rebuilt it in 970, and placed in it monks, instead of nuns. In 1083 the Abbot Simeon commenced the conventual church, which was converted by Henry VIII. into a cathedral. The see of Ely was founded 1107. The cathedral is of mixed architecture, but very imposing. It has recently been restored at an expense of more than seventy thousand pounds. The bishop is paid fifty-five hundred pounds yearly. The present incumbent (1882) is Dr. James Russell Woodford. See Whitaker's Almanack for 1882, p. 199.

EMANATION denotes a theory of the relation between God and the universe, according to which the world was not created by a divine fiat, but developed through various stages, and by an involuntary outflow of the divine substance, gradually deteriorating, and at last ending in mere matter. In a vague and confused form this theory may be found in most Oriental religions; but it owes its elaborate and systematic form to the Neo-Platonists, from whom it was borrowed by the Gnostics. Its scientific value was absolutely null; but teaching people, as it did, to raise themselves above their natural state, and strive towards the divine, it has had some moral influence.

EMBALMING, an art peculiar to the Egyptians, was not practised by the Hebrews, and is mentioned in the Bible only in the cases of Jacob and Joseph (Gen. 1. 2, 26), both of whom died in Egypt, and were afterwards transferred to Canaan; the former immediately after his death, the latter not until after the lapse of centuries (Exod. xiii. 19; Josh. xxiv. 32). According to Herodotus (II., 86), the Egyptians knew three different methods of embalming. After the first, which cost about one talent of silver, the brain was removed through the nostrils, and replaced with drugs. An opening was then cut in the left flank, and the intestines taken out by the hand, placed in a peculiar vessel, and thrown into the river. The cavity was rinsed with palm-wine, and filled with aromatic herbs, after which the opening in the flank was again closed by being sewn up. The corpse thus prepared was then steeped for seventy days in "natron" (according to a recent analysis, sub-carbonate of soda), and swathed in linen bandages smeared with gum. The mummy was finally laid in a coffin of sycamore-wood, which was placed vertically in the tomb. After the second method the intestines were not removed by hand, but by means of cedar-oil, which, introduced into the body, dissolved them. The corpse was then steeped, as usually, in natron. After the third method, the corpse was only rinsed internally by an infusion, and then steeped. The embalming of Jacob's corpse took only forty days; but it appears, from the mummies preserved at Memphis, that a method of embalming was employed there, less complete and less careful than that employed at Thebais. In the Christian Church embalming seems to have been used now and then with martyrs and saints, as intimated by Tertullian (Apol., 42); or perhaps this was only an adaptation of the Jewish custom of filling the grave with myrrh and spices (2 Chron. xvi. 14; John xix. 39). See WILKINSON: Manners and Customs of the Ancient Egypt, London, 1837-41, re-edited by S. Birch, London, 1878; MASPERO: Mémoire sur quelques papyrus du Louvre; le rituel de l'embaumement. EMBER DAYS are the first Wednesday, Friday, and Saturday after the first Sunday in Lent, after Whitsunday, after the 14th of September, and after the 13th of December, which were fixed by the council of Placentia, 1095. Their name is in Latin, Jejunia Quatuor Temporum; in French, Quatre-Temps; in German, Quatember; in Danish, Tamperdag; which seems to indicate pretty plainly the derivation of the English name, though another has been attempted, from the Anglo-Saxon Ymbreu, "a circuit." In the ancient church they were solemnized with fasting, and prayers for God's blessing on the seasons ushered in by them. Afterwards they were fixed by the Roman and the Anglican Church as fit periods for ecclesiastical ordination.

EMBURY, Philip, the first Methodist minister in America; b. in Ballygaran, Ireland, Sept. 21, 1729; d. at Camden, Washington County, N. Y., August, 1775. He emigrated to America 1760. He was a carpenter by trade, and had been a preacher in Ireland. He settled first in New-York City, but did not preach until 1766, when he acted on the advice of Barbara Heck. The first services were in his own house; but in 1767 the famous "Rigging Loft" was the place of meeting, and there Methodism in New York may be said to have been born. In 1768 the first Methodist chapel was built, on the site of the present John-street Church; and upon it he worked as a carpenter. In 1769 the first missionaries sent out by Wesley came to the city, which then had a population of only twenty thousand; and Embury resigned his charge, and went to Camden, near which place (at Ashgrove) he organized a society, and continued his joint work of carpenter and preacher. His remains were thrice interred, — in Camden, Ashgrove, and finally, by order of the Troy Conference, in Woodland Cemetery, Cambridge, N.Y.

EMERSON, Ralph, D.D., b. at Hollis, N.H., Aug. 18, 1787; d. at Rockford, Ill., May 26, 1863. He was graduated at Yale College 1811, and at Andover Seminary 1814, and was professor of ecclesiastical history and pastoral theology in that seminary from 1829 to 1854. Besides a life of his brother, Rev. Joseph Emerson, he translated and annotated the first volume of Wigger's Augustinianism and Pelagianism (Andover, 1840), and contributed to various periodicals.

EMMAUS (Hebrew Khamnath, "hot spring"), the village, "threescore furlongs," or sixty stadia (seven miles and a half), from Jerusalem, where Christ revealed himself to the two disciples on the day of his resurrection (Luke xxiv. 13). Its site has not yet been satisfactorily determined, although many attempts have been made. It has been identified with (1) Amwas, the Emmaus-Nicopolis mentioned in 1 Macc. iii. 40, 57, ix. 50, where Judas conquered the Greeks. So an old tradition supported by Eusebius and Jerome. The conclusive arguments against this view are that Emmaus-Nicopolis was not sixty, but a hundred and sixty, stadia from Jerusalem, and was not a small village, but a town of some importance. (2) Kubeibet, seven miles north-west of Jerusalem, the last halting-place before reaching that city, in the beautiful Wady Beit Chanina. Supported by tradition dating back to the twelfth century, the time of the crusades. So Robinson. See H. ZSCHOKKE: Das neutestamentliche Emmaus, Schaffhausen, 1865. (3) Khamesa, now a ruin. Supported by similarity of name, but opposed by its distance from Jerusalem, which is at least eight miles and a half in a straight line, and nine miles and a half by road. (4) Beit Mizzeh, a ruin a mile north of Kolonieh (Colonia); but it is only forty furlongs from the city. (5) Kolonieh. This was and is still a place of resort by the Jerusalemites. The expression "went into the country" (eis ārpon, Mark xvi. 12) may be understood of making this usual excursion. Josephus states that Emmaus was colonized by eight hundred of Titus' soldiers, hence the name Colonia; and the Talmud asserts that the willows which adorned the temple at the Feast of Tabernacles were brought from there. These two facts make out a case for Kolonieh. But the distance is too short. See Quarterly Statement of the Pal. Explor. Fund for January (p. 46), July (pp. 237, 238), and October (p. 274), 1881.

EMMERAM, or HAIMAREM, was made Bishop of Poitiers in the beginning of the eighth century, but abdicated shortly after in order to go to Pannonia as a missionary to the Pagan Avars. At Radaspona, the residence of Duke Theodo of Bavaria, he was persuaded to remain for some time, purifying and consolidating the Christian Church in Bavaria. After a stay of three years, he left for Rome, but was overtaken, still on this side of the mountains, by Theodo's son, Lautbert, who had him tied to a ladder, and sawed to pieces joint by joint; the reason being that Lautbert's sister Uta confessed, immediately after the missionary had left, that she was pregnant by him. Just before dying, however, Emmeram explained that he was innocent, that he had allowed Uta to accuse him only in order to save herself, that the guilty man was one Sieghald, etc. When Duke Theodo heard this, he ordered the bones of Emmeram to be gathered, and deposited in a chapel at Aschheim. Another chapel was afterwards built in his honor in Regensburg, and he was made a saint, Sept. 6 being fixed by the Roman-Catholic Church as his day of celebration.

The life of St. Emmeram was written in the second half of the eighth century by Aribio, Bishop of Freising, and again in 1036 by Arnold of Vochburg, and finally by Meginfred a short time after. These three biographies are found in Acta Sanctorum, Sept. VI.; CANISUS: Lectiones Antiquae III.; and PERTZ: Monum., VI. It has proved very difficult, however, to lay bare the historical kernel of the Emmeram legend on account of its chronological absurdities; and it must be added that such a feat, even if it could be done, would probably hardly be worth doing.

EMMONS, Nathanael, D.D., was b. April 20 (O.S.), 1745, in the parish of Millington, in the town of East Haddam, Conn. This town was also the birthplace of the missionary brothers, David and John Brainerd, of President Edward Dorr Griffin, and his brother George D. Griffin, Esq., of the jurist, Jeremiah Gates Brainard, and the poet, James Brainard Taylor. In 1763, at the age of eighteen, he entered Yale College. Here he was a classmate of John Trumbull, the author of McFingall; John Treadwell, governor of Connecticut; and Dr. Samuel Wales, professor of divinity in Yale College. These three and Emmons were the first four scholars of his class, which contained other eminent men, among them Rev. Dr. Joseph Lyman of Hatfield, Mass. A few months after his graduation, in 1767, he began his theological studies with Rev. Nathan Strong of Coventry, Conn., and finished them with Dr. John Smalley of Berlin, Conn. Smalley was a pupil of Bellamy, and Bellamy of the elder Edwards. Through Smalley, Emmons gained a well-nigh personal acquaintance with the Bethlehem and Northampton divines. In 1769 he was "approved" as a preacher, and on the 21st of April, 1773, was ordained pastor of the Congregational Church in Franklin, Mass. He resigned his pastorate on the 28th of May, 1827. He had remained in the office fifty-four years. He died Sept. 23, 1840, in the sixty-eighth year of his ministry and the ninety-sixth year of his age. He retained his faculties to a surprising degree until his death. Few men have ever left the world with a more unflinching and solid faith in Christ. He enjoyed to the last the reverence of his parishioners and the highest esteem of the neighboring churches. He was an intimate friend of Dr. Hopkins of Newport, R.I., Dr. Hart of Preston, Conn., Dr. West of Stockbridge, Mass. He was a brother-in-law of Rev. Dr. Spring of Newburyport, Rev. Dr. Austin, President of Burlington College, Rev. Leonard Worcester, Rev. William Riddel. These four Hopkinsian ministers married the daughters of Rev. Dr. Hopkins of Hadley, who himself was not a Hopkinsian.

Dr. Emmons published more than two hundred Articles in various periodicals, such as The Massachusetts Missionary Magazine, The Connecticut Evangelical Magazine, The Utica Christian Repository, The Hopkinsian Magazine, and The Christian Magazine. He also published numerous ordination and funeral sermons, which are not found in the collected editions of his works. The following are his more important publications: A Dissertation on the Scriptural Qualifications for Admission to the Christian Sacraments, in Answer to Dr. Hemmenway (1793); Candid Reply to Dr. Hemmenway's Remarks on [this] Dissertation (1795); an Essay on Miracles (1798); a volume of sermons (1800); a second volume (1812); a third volume (1813); a fourth volume (1823); a fifth volume (1825); a sixth volume (1826). In 1842 many of his sermons were collected, and published in a uniform edition of six octavo volumes. His son-in-law, Rev. Jacob Ide, D.D., prefixed to this edition a Memoir of Dr. Emmons. In 1850 a seventh volume of his sermons was published. In 1860 and 1861 a new collected edition of his works was published in Boston in six large octavo volumes; and to this edition was prefixed a Memoir containing 468 pages, by E. A. Park of Andover Theological Seminary.

The house of Dr. Emmons was a theological school. No private instructor in our land has educated so many young men as he for the Christian ministry: the number of them cannot be exactly ascertained, but was probably not less than a hundred. Among his pupils nine became presidents or professors of colleges or theological seminaries, fourteen had an important agency in establishing literary and charitable institutions, forty-six are noticed in the biographical dictionaries of eminent men.

Few ministers in the world have devoted themselves so earnestly, patiently, and methodically as Dr. Emmons to their professional work. He preached nearly or quite six thousand times, and spent ten, twelve, or fourteen hours every day in his study, with his pen or book in hand, for more than seventy years. He was temperate, even abstemious, in his diet, regular in his habits, and was a model of punctuality, self-consistency, persevering industry. He combined a sprightly wit with a profound reverence for the truth. His style of thought was precise, definite, sharp. Dr. Leonard Woods of Andover said, "Emmons has one of the grandest understandings ever created." He was an original thinker, and formed his theological system with rare independence of mind. Although a man of study, rather than a "man of affairs," he entered with zeal into several public enterprises. He was one of the fathers of the Massachusetts Missionary Society, and for the first twelve years of its existence was its president. He was one of the original editors of The Massachusetts Missionary Magazine. When the Masonic fraternity was most popular, he was a pronounced anti-Mason. When antislavery was most generally condemned, he was an active abolitionist. In politics he was an outspoken Federalist. His Jeroboam Sermon is a curiosity in politico-homiletical literature.

The theological system of Dr. Emmons is often confounded with that of Dr. Samuel Hopkins. The following statement of the two systems was given by Emmons himself, and will explain the difference, as well as the agreement, between the two.

The distinctive tenets of Hopkinsianism are: 1. All real holiness consists in disinterested benevolence; 2. All sin consists in selfishness; 3. There are no promises of regenerating grace made to the doings of the unregenerate; 4. The impotency of sinners with respect to believing in Christ is not natural, but moral; 5. A sinner is required to approve in his heart of the divine conduct, even though it should cast him off forever; 6. God has exerted his power in such a manner as he purposed would be followed by the existence of sin; 7. The introduction of moral evil into the universe is so overruled by God as to promote the general good; 8. Repentance is before faith in Christ; 9. Though men became sinners by Adam, according to a divine constitution, yet they have and are accountable for no sins but personal; 10. Though believers are justified through Christ's righteousness, yet his righteousness is not transferred to them.

The distinctive tenets of Emmons's system are: 1. Holiness and sin consist in free, voluntary exercises; 2. Men act freely under the divine agency; 3. The least transgression of the divine law deserves eternal punishment; 4. Right and wrong are founded in the nature of things; 5. God exercises mere grace in pardoning or justifying penitent believers through the atonement of Christ, and mere goodness in rewarding them for their good works; 6. Notwithstanding the total depravity of sinners, God has a right to require them to turn from sin to holiness; 7. Preachers of the gospel ought to exhort sinners to love God, repent of sin, and believe in Christ immediately; 8. Men are active, not passive, in regeneration. Dr. Emmons believed that these eight statements are involved in the system of Dr. Hopkins; that they are evolved from that system, rather than added to it. Still they characterize Emmonism as it is grafted upon Hopkinsianism.

EMORY, John, a Methodist-Episcopal bishop; b. in Queen Anne County, Maryland, April 11, 1789; d. in Reisterstown, Md., Dec. 16, 1835. From 1824 to 1835 he was book-agent and editor for the Methodist Church at New York, during which time he paid off all the debts of the book concern, and put it in a far better position than ever before. He also founded the Methodist Quarterly Review; and nearly all the original articles in the first two volumes are from him. In 1832 he was elected a bishop. He was one of the organizers of Dickinson College. He wrote Defense of our Fathers, N. Y., 1824; The Episcopal Controversy Reviewed, N. Y., 1838. — Robert, son of preceding; b. in Philadelphia, July 29, 1814; d. in Baltimore, May 18, 1848. He was elected president of Dickinson College in 1845. He wrote a life of his father (N. Y., 1841), a History of the Discipline of the Methodist-Episcopal Church, N. Y., 1843 (in a new edition brought down to 1864, and an unfinished analysis of Butler's Analogy, completed by Dr. Crooks, N.Y., 1856.

EMSER, Hieronymus, b. at Ulm in March, 1477; d. at Dresden, Nov. 8, 1527; studied at Tübingen and Basel, and accompanied Cardinal Raymund of Petrandi as secretary on his tour of visitation through Germany. Raymund was a great collector of relics, and Emser's first work was an essay on crosses said to have fallen down from heaven. After lecturing on humaniora at Erfurt, where he had Luther among his hearers, and editing the works of Picus of Mirandola, he went to Leipzig, where he lectured on canon law, and published some essays on the propriety of toasting each other when drinking (1505), on the improvement of wine, beer, and vinegar (1507), etc., and an apotheosis of Bishop Benno, which has been incorporated with the Acta Sanctorum. In 1510 he was sent by Duke George of Saxony to Rome to negotiate the canonization of Benno; and on his return he received several rich benefices, and settled at Dresden, where Luther was his guest in 1517. It was already then apparent, however, that, if the case of the reformer should ever become decidedly serious, Emser would not be found on his side; and immediately after the conference of Leipzig a rupture took place between them, and a controversy began, of a character by no means edifying, and without any profit to the cause. Luther called him the he-goat of Dresden, with reference to his escutcheon, and he called Luther the bull of Wittenberg: that is about all which needs be said of the controversy. The only one of Emser's polemical writings which has any real worth, and has exercised any real influence, is his Annotationes uber Luthers new testament. Many of his corrections were adopted by Luther himself, and others were afterwards introduced in Luther's translation by others. A translation he himself made of the New Testament after the Vulgate (1527) is completely worthless. BERNHARD RIGGENBACH.

EMS, Congress of (1786). In the latter part of the eighteenth century there prevailed among the German prelates a general discontent with the encroachments of the Pope upon the episcopal authority. More than once complaints were lodged with the emperor, and protection was urgently demanded at every new imperial election. Finally the establishment of a new nunciature at Munich brought the archbishops of Cologne, Mayence, Treves, and Salzburg to combine in action. The papal nuncios had always by the German prelates been considered a great inconvenience; and the nunciature was, indeed, by its very nature a limitation, if not an infringement, of the episcopal power. That just the above four prelates should feel called upon to take hold of the matter was only natural. They all favored the Gallican principles of episcopal independence which recently had been so vigorously expounded by Hontheim, the suffragan Bishop of Treves, in his famous work, Justini Febronii Icti de statu ecclesiæ et legitima potestate Romani pontificis singularis ad reuniendos dissidentes in ecclesia Chris- tianos compositus, 1763, and, in conformity with these views, they had begun to reform both the school and the church in their dioceses; but they knew only too well from experience that such reforms would meet with the most decided opposition from a papal nuncio. They were, moreover, led to believe that they would receive vigorous aid from the emperor, Joseph II. When, in October, 1785, they laid their complaints before him, he declared that he would recognize the papal nuncios only as political agents, as emissaries concerned with the general polity of the church only; that he would tolerate no encroachments upon the diocesan rights of the bishops and archbishops, etc.; and he encouraged them to openly resist any such attempt from the side of the Pope. The four prelates consequently made inquiries in Rome whether the new nuncio at Munich was sent simply as an ambassador to the Bavarian court, or whether he came intrusted with papal powers; and, when it was answered that the latter was the case, they remonstrated.

Nevertheless, the new nuncio, Zoglio, appeared at Munich in May, 1786; and the nunciature of Cologne, falling vacant shortly after, was immediately filled by Pacca. The prelates then took an energetic step: they sent representatives to meet at Ems, and a minute investigation was made of all the precepts of canon law concerning the relation between the Pope and the bishops. As the result of this investigation, an elaborate exposition, the so-called Emser Punctuation, was signed by the four prelates Aug. 25, 1786, and sent at the same time to the Pope and the emperor, requesting that the actual relation between the Pope and the bishops should be regulated according to these precepts. The general bearing of this exposition is, that the Pope shall renounce all such rights and privileges and reservations as did not belong to the papal primacy during the first centuries of the Church, but were derived from the Isidorean decretals. As these decretals have been proved to be false, and are now generally recognized as such, any power based upon them must be considered an empty pretence. The whole relation between the Pope and the bishops is defined in harmony with the Febronian principles. The Pope is and must always be the primate of the Church, the centre and the point of unity; but the bishops, as the successors of the apostles, have from Christ received the power of the keys, the right to give laws and to suspend them, etc. Any person living in a diocese is subordinate to the bishop; no recourse can be had to the Pope except through the bishop; the office of the nuncio must be abolished; exemptions cannot be granted by the Pope; dispensations can be granted only by the bishop; monastic orders in the diocese cannot be governed by a general outside the diocese, etc. In short, a theory of the Papacy is propounded which involves the very cessation of the Papacy, and which only existed in reality before the Papacy itself became a reality. Since the œcumenical councils of the fifteenth century, such an attack was never made upon the Papacy by dignitaries of the Church.

In the controversy which now ensued, the Pope took care not to touch the principal question, — whether the conception of the Papacy set forth by the Punctuation was right or wrong. His first step was to order the nuncios to continue their work in accordance with the instructions given. This, however, it was impossible for them to do, as the archbishops opposed them at every point; and it began to look doubtful whether the Pope would not finally be compelled to yield. Then aid came from various sides. The emperor, on receiving the Punctuation, advised the archbishops to try to come to a complete understanding with their suffragan bishops and the secular powers of their dioceses. But this the archbishops neglected to do, and the exclusiveness of their proceedings gave umbrage to the bishops. Many bishops believed, and perhaps not altogether without reason, that the real purpose of the Punctuation was to transfer the power which had hitherto been exercised by the Pope to the metropolitans; and they preferred the Pope far away in Rome, to the metropolitans close at their doors. Thus it came to pass that several German bishops, headed by the Bishop of Spire, declared against the Punctuation. A still more effective aid the Pope obtained from the Elector of Bavaria, Charles Theodore. Bavaria did not form a compact diocese, but was in ecclesiastical respects cut up in a number of sections, each section belonging to some foreign diocese. Discontented with this state of affairs, Charles Theodore had worked hard for the establishment of a nunciature in Munich, and he now supported the nuncio with all his might in the contest with the archbishops. The archbishops were defeated. Finally the union between the archbishops became loosened by the ambiguous behavior of the Archbishop of Mayence. He was a member of the Fürstenbund (Union of Princes) which Friedrich II. had formed in 1785 against Austria; and, as he was an old man, Friedrich was very anxious to have Baron von Dahlberg, who was decidedly in favor of the Fürstenbund, appointed his coadjutor. But this could not be done without the consent of the Pope; and it was not probable that the Pope would give his consent without certain stipulations with respect to the Punctuation. Secret negotiations were carried on with the papal court through Prussia; and, though no definite results ensued, the union of the archbishops was incapacitated for action. When the case was laid before the diet of Ratisbon (1788), the diet advised the archbishops to seek reconciliation with the Pope, each for himself. The brooding thunderstorm in France, whose first low murmur just now became audible, also acted as a persuasion to drop the question; and the Pope's answer to the Punctuation (November, 1789) was consequently received with a kind of passive and silent acquiescence, though it openly took its stand upon the Isidorean decretals, and flatly denied the justness of any of the remarks of the Punctuation. See CHR. F. WEIDENFELD: Geschichte des Nuntiaturstreitcs, 1788; MÜNCH: Geschichte des Emser Congresses, 1840. H. SCHMID.

ENCRATITES (abstinentis) is not the name of any distinct sect, but denotes generally the adherents of a certain false view of asceticism. According to Irenæus, there were Encratites both among the followers of Saturninus, and among those of Marcion. This view, enjoining abstinence from flesh-meat, wine, the marriage-bed, etc., did not originate within the pale of Christianity. It was found a long time before our era, in India, among the Jews (the Essenes), and among the Greeks (the Pythagoreans). When entering the Christian world, it became very popular among the Gnostics; though not all Encratites were Gnostics, or held the Gnostic doctrine of matter as evil and a creation of the evil principle. The most prominent leaders among the Encratites were Tatian, Saturninus, Marcion, Julius Cassianus, and Severus. They used the gospel according to the Egyptians, the Acts of Andrew, John, and Thomas, and other apocryphal writings.

ENCYCLICAL LETTERS are circular letters, which in the ancient church were generally sent by one church to the churches of a certain circuit, but which in our times are sent exclusively by the Pope to the bishops of the Roman-Catholic Church.

ENCYCLOPÆDIA OF THEOLOGY means, in one sense of the words, simply a dictionary of theological knowledge: in another, it denotes a distinct branch of the theological science itself; that branch, namely, which represents and explains the inner organization of this science, its divisions, and the relation of these divisions, both to each other reciprocally, and to the system as a whole. In this latter sense the name occurs for the first time in S. MURSINNA's Prince linee Encyclopædiæ theologice (Magdeburg, 1764), adopted from the Greek ἐγκύκλιος παιδεία (orbis doctrinæ), which meant, among the ancient Greeks, that course of general instruction which every free boy had to go through before he adopted a special trade or profession. The real development, however, of theological encyclopædia as a science, is still later, and was due to Schleiermacher.

As soon as the church began to develop a theology, there arose, of course, certain ideas about what was necessary for a teacher in the church to know in order to fulfil his duty; and hints were thrown out with respect to the proper way in which to attain this knowledge. Thus CHRYSOSTOM'S De officiis ministrorum, AMBROSIUS' De doctrina Christiana, etc., may be considered encyclopædias of theology; only it must be noticed that these works have a practical rather than a theoretical character. They teach how to study theology, rather than explain what theology is. They correspond to what we now call methodology; and this character all works of the kind retain, more or less, up to the days of Schleiermacher. Noticeable during the middle ages are the Didascalion of HUGO OF ST. VICTOR (d. 1141), in which the differentiation begins (the first three books being of purely propædeutic, the last three of marked methodological character), and the De studio theologico of NICHOLAS OF CLEMANGIS (b. 1360). From the Reformation the theological encyclopædia, like every other branch of theological science, received a new impulse. The Lutheran Church produced, among many other works, the Methodus studii theologici, by JOHANN GERHARD, Jena, 1617, and, more in harmony with the humanistic tendencies of the age, the Apparatus theologicus, by GEORG CALIXTUS, Helmstädt, 1628. The Reformed Church produced the Theologus seu de ratione studii theologici, by ANDREAS GERHARD (Hyperus), Marburg, 1572, in which the quadripartite division of theology into exegetical, dogmatical, historical, and practical theology occurs for the first time; and the Academy of Saumur, corresponding in the Reformed Church to the University of Helmstädt in the Lutheran, the essays of STEPHAN GAUSSEN, De studii theologici ratione, De natura theologicæ, etc. The Roman-Catholic Church also showed signs of life. POSSEVINUS' Bibliotheca selecta de ratione studiorum (Cologne, 1607) is merely an instance of modern scholasticism; but the Méthode pour étudier la théologie, by L. ELLIES DU PIN (1716), is a meritorious work, and was translated into several foreign languages.

A new epoch in the history of the theological encyclopædia, by which this branch of theological science really became a science itself, was ushered in by SCHLEIERMACHER'S Darstellung des theologischen Studiums zum Behufe einleitender Vorlesungen, Berlin, 1811. An exposition of the internal organization of the theological system is here attempted and achieved for the first time. A tripartite division into philosophical, historical and practical theology, is employed. But the philosophical theology comprises only apologetics and polemics; while dogmatics and ethics, as well as exegesis, belong to historical theology. That part of the book, however, which most strikingly shows the author's powerful grasp of his subject, is the section on practical theology, considered under the double view of church-government and church-service. At its first appearance this book seemed not to have attracted any particular attention; but, after the appearance of its second edition in 1830, the strong influence which it had exercised soon became evident. In 1831 appeared the Encyklopädie der theologischen Wissenschaften, by K. ROSENKRANZ, completely under the influence of the Hegelian philosophy; in 1833, the Encyklopädie und Methodologie der theologischen Wissenschaften, by K. R. HAGENBACH [10th ed., edited by Kautsch, 1880]; in 1837, the Encyklopädie und Methodologie, by G. C. A. HARLESS, etc. The influence of Schleiermacher's work was felt also in the Reformed Church — J. G. KIENLEN: Encyclopédie des sciences de la théologie chrétienne, Strassburg, 1842; HOFSTEDE DE GROOT: Encyclopædia theologi christiani, Groningen, 1851 — and even in the Roman-Catholic Church, F. A. STAUDENMAIER: Encyclopaedie der theologischen Wissenschaften, Mayence, 1834; [JOHN M'CLINTOCK: Theological Encyclopaedia and Methodology, Cincinnati, 1873; DOEDES: Encyclopaedie der christelijke theologie, Utrecht, 1876; J. R. LANGE: Grundriss d. Theolog. Encyk., Heidelberg, 1877; J. CH. K. V. HOFMANN: Encyk., ed. Bestmann, Nördlingen, 1879; J. F. RÄBIGER: Theologik oder Encyk. d. Theologie, Leipzig, 1880; R. ROTHE: Theolog. Encyk., ed. Ruppelius, Wittenberg, 1880]. HAGENBACH.

ENCYCLOPEDISTS is the name generally given to the editors of and contributors to the Encyclopédie ou Dictionnaire raisonné des Sciences, des Arts et des Métiers, which appeared in Paris, 1751-64, in 21 vols. fol. This work, so famous on account of the extraordinary influence which it exercised on its age, was edited by Diderot, and, for its mathematical and physical articles, by D'Alembert. Among its contributors were Rousseau, Voltaire, Euler, Buffon, Haller, Marmontel, Montesquieu, D'Anville, Holbach, Sulzer, Turgot, etc. Its religious, theological, and ecclesiastical articles were mostly written by Abbé Mallet, professor of theology in the University of Paris, and the abbés Yvon, Pastré, and De Prades.

It is generally believed that this book is full of open and bold attacks on religion, Christianity, the Roman-Catholic Church, etc. But this is a mistake. Though the article on the Jesuits is written with great gusto for scandals, and though the article on the Pope vindicates the Gallican views of the episcopacy, the work as a whole is confessedly Roman Catholic, and the Reformation, with all that belongs to it, is treated in a supercilious manner as a vicious innovation; to which must be added that there is hardly any Christian dogma which is not accepted and defended, — such as those of the trinity, of inspiration, of the atonement, etc. But (and this is characteristic of the book) the reasons for the acceptance of the Christian dogmas are generally of such a quality that a flat rejection, for no reason whatever, could not have made the matter worse. Theism is preferred to atheism, because it is better for the development of human happiness to accept than to reject the idea of the existence of God. Christ is the first and foremost of all religious founders, because he revealed the best and highest morality, etc.

By this perfidious acquiescence in something which it felt itself too weak to overpower, the book presented itself to the eyes of a godless and religiously indifferent age as the soundest and wisest compromise with an existing superstition, and obtained freedom to preach its sensualistic philosophy, which sooner or later would surely extinguish said superstition. The philosophical programme of the book — that is, its intellectual and moral stand-point — is set forth in the preface, written by D'Alembert; and there is really no contradiction between the sensualism and eudæmonism of the preface, and the choice reasons on which religion, Christianity, and the Roman-Catholic Church are accepted and defended in the book.

ENERGUMENS (ἐνεργούμενοι, "possessed by an evil spirit;" cf. Eph. ii. 2, ἐνεργούντος) were those in the early church who were, according to popular belief, plagued by demons, but who in our day would be simply called "insane." They were not permitted to enter the church if they were violent, but commanded to stand in the porch, so that they could hear the singing and prayers; and with them might be found lepers, and persons of offensive lives (see Hefele, Concilien-geschichte, vol. i. § 16, see Can. 17). After the prayers they came in to receive the blessing of the bishop (see Constt. Apost., viii. 6, 7, 92); but, if they were quiet, they were allowed in the church, yet separated from the catechumens, and listened to the sermon. They were also called Χεμαζόμενοι, because they were "tossed to and fro by the storms and billows of uncontrollable impulse," and not because they were "exposed to the inclemency of cold or rain," as many have explained it. The exorcists daily brought them food, laid their hands upon them, and prayed for them. After their recovery they kept a twenty to forty days' fast, then partook of the sacrament; a particular prayer was made for them by the priest, and their names were entered upon the church-records, with especial mention of their recovery. See the excellent art., 'Επερροβηνοιοι, in KRAUS: Real-Encyklopädie.

ENGEDI (the fountain of the kid), the present Ain Jidy, a small town about one mile from the western shore of the Dead Sea, at the foot of the mountains of Judæa, between three hundred and thirty and five hundred feet above the level of the Dead Sea, and about twelve hundred feet below the summit of the cliffs; received its name from the neighboring thermal springs, and is known to history as David's hiding-place from Saul (1 Sam. xxiii. 29, xxiv. 1-4).

ENGELBRECHT, Hans, b. at Brunswick, 1599; d. there 1644; was the son of a tailor, and a weaver by trade, but suffered from infancy so much from bodily illness, that he became very melancholy, and at times was oscillating between suicide and lunacy. In his twenty-second year he began to be haunted by religious visions, inspirations, and revelations, which he expounded before admiring crowds, generally to the great disgust of the clergy. Expelled from Brunswick, he roved about in Northern Germany, and was for some time imprisoned in Hamburg; but he finally returned to his native city, and died there in loneliness and seclusion. He wrote several pamphlets about his revelations, which appeared in a collected edition in a Dutch translation in 1697. See REHTMEYER: Braunsch. Kirchengesch., IV. p. 417.

ENGELHARDT, Jonann Georg Veit, b. at Neustadt-on-the-Aich, Nov. 12, 1791; d. at Erlangen, Sept. 13, 1855; studied at Erlangen, and was appointed professor at the gymnasium there (1817), and professor of theology in the university (1821). Besides a number of dissertations on the church fathers and the mystics, he wrote a Handbuch der Kirchengeschichte in 4 vols., Erlangen, 1833-34, and a Dogmengeschichte in 2 vols., Neustadt-on-the-Aich, 1839.

ENGLAND, Church of, is the established National Church of England, and adopts as its creed the Thirty-nine Articles, together with the Book of Common Prayer. In its autonomous organization it is, like the other churches of the Protestant Reformation, the product of emancipation from the Church of Rome; and its history begins with the reign of Henry VIII., when, breaking with the Pope, he was declared head of the Church in his dominions. In theology it has preserved the general features of the Protestant churches of the Continent; but, in the department of ecclesiastical government, it has retained in unbroken succession the three orders of the larger pale from which it came. It is proper here to state that many Anglo-Catholic writers regard the Reformation merely as an incident in the history of the Church of England, which did not interrupt its historic continuity, dating from Augustine, or even from the old Keltic Church.

I. Introductory. — The history of Christianity in England before the Reformation has three well-defined periods, — the British, Saxon, and Norman.

The annals of the British period are sparse and unsatisfactory. The traditional accounts of the founding of the Christian Church among the Britons by Joseph of Arimathea, St. Paul, or other of the apostles, as well as the history of the conversion of King Lucius, adopted by Ussher, must be given up as untrustworthy. Our first reliable information comes from Tertullian, who writes early in the third century that Christianity had penetrated into regions of Britain inaccessible to the Romans. The history of the British Church was thenceforth that of early Christianity everywhere. It furnished victims to persecution, one of whom, Alban (303), was early canonized. It sent its representatives to councils, as, for example, that of Arles (314), which three of its bishops attended, — Eborius, Restitutus, and Adelfius. And it had its heresies. Pelagius was a Briton; and, although he went to the East with Celestius of Ireland, he left the seed of his errors behind him.

The Anglo-Saxon period dates from the arrival, in 597, of the monk Augustine, who had been despatched by Gregory I. The Anglo-Saxons were still heathen when he landed on the Isle of Thanet. Augustine proceeded immediately to the court of Ethelberht of Kent, whose queen, Bereta, was the Christian daughter of the Frankish King Charibert. He was made bishop of the English, and afterwards metropolitan. Augustine came in conflict with the bishops of the old British Church; but the Roman type of Christianity prevailed over the Keltic (see Keltic Church), and crowded it out. Christianity spread rapidly in Southern England, and was introduced into Northumbria by Paulinus, and made the permanent religion by the labors of St. Aidan of Ireland. Under Theodore of Tarsus (consecrated Archbishop of Canterbury 668) the English episcopate was fully organized, and the dioceses grouped around Canterbury as the central and superior see. During this period monasteries were founded; and here and there a solitary form — like Cædmon, the Monk of Whitby; or Bede, "the father of English learning;" or Alcuin the scholar, called to the court of Charlemagne — stands out prominently on the dark background. The Danish invaders of the eighth and ninth centuries interrupted the services, and devastated the property of churches and monastic orders. But the judicious wisdom and enlightened zeal of Dunstan (959-988), the first of many English ecclesiastical statesmen, repaired their ravages, and effected a severer discipline and a more compact organization of the clergy.

The Norman period dates from the battle of Hastings in 1066. It is distinguished by the complete vassalage into which the Church went to the papal see, the humiliating subjection of the State to ecclesiastical domination, and the growing corruption of the clergy. But the State, in turn, struggled to emancipate itself from ecclesiastical fetters by legislation, and the people to rid themselves of clerical incompetency and scandal by a reform in the life and doctrines of the Church. — William the Conqueror dealt harshly with the Saxon bishops and abbots, many of whom were obliged to give way to foreign prelates, and he practically chose all ecclesiastical dignitaries himself. But under his successors, able ecclesiastics asserted and won the independence of the Church. Lanfranc, Archbishop of Canterbury (1070-89), secured the institution of special ecclesiastical courts, in which all ecclesiastical cases were tried. His successor, the learned Anselm (1093-1109), obliged the crown to relinquish its ancient custom of investing the new bishops with ring and crosier, and vindicated the dangerous precedent, that appeals should be made to Rome. Another great archbishop, Thomas à Becket (1162-70), contended with Henry II., who sought to reform the abuses growing out of clerical exemption from civil jurisdiction. The churchman was murdered, but victory did not rest with the king. It still remained for the State as a national body to come into subjection to the ecclesiastical power of Rome. This was accomplished under the most depraved, but, according to Green, the ablest, of the Angevin kings, John. For daring to resist the wishes of the papal see, his realm was placed under interdict by Innocent III. (1208). John finally submitted (a submission which was no more ignominious than it was politic), and accepted Stephen Langton (1207-28), the papal appointee, as primate.

The Church passed into a state of lethargy, and the clergy into official carelessness and personal corruption. The earnest and plain preaching of the Dominican (1221) and Franciscan (1224) friars aroused the laity for a time; but, becoming fat with lands, they lost their hold on the popular mind. Here and there a great bishop, like Grosseteste of Lincoln, 1235-53 (see GROSSETESTE), lifts up his voice boldly against the corruption of the clergy, dares to resist the Pope's assumption to force appointments within his diocese, and insists upon the authority and preaching of the Scriptures. The State is not completely paralyzed, and seeks to meet the ecclesiastical abuses with remedial legislation. Two great acts stand out as protests against them. The statute of mortmain (1279) forbade the alienation of lands to religious corporations in such wise as to be exempt from taxation. The statute of præmunire (Richard II.) made a royal license necessary to the validity within the realm of papal appointments and bulls. Neither of these acts accomplished much at the time, but the latter was used effectively by Henry VIII. Finally protests from the people and clergy themselves were beginning to be spoken. John Wiclif (1328-84), the "morning star of the Reformation," translated the Scriptures, and asserted the rights of conscience. William Longland, without Erasmus' scholarship, but in a more popular and earnest vein than he, sang rhymes ridiculing the friars. The Lollards were so numerous, that, according to the chronicler Knighton, every other person on the road was one. The indistinct mutterings of the Reformation were heard; and although Wiclif's ashes were disinterred, and scattered in the Swift, and the Church slumbered on for more than a century longer, the great movement finally came, out of which Christianity in England, crystallized in the Church of England, started forward on a new career of life and achievement.

II. History since the Reformation.—The Church of England dates its existence as a national body, independent of the papal see, from the passage of the Act of Supremacy (1534), and received its distinctive doctrinal character at the adoption of the Forty-two Articles in the reign of Edward VI.

(subsequently reduced to thirty-nine under Elizabeth), and the approval of the Book of Common Prayer. The same general principle of revolt against ecclesiastical corruption was involved in the Reformation movement in England that inspired the Reformation on the Continent. However, the movement in England had its own salient and distinguishing features. It preserved in unbroken continuity the ecclesiastical orders and succession of the Catholic Church, many of the bishops identifying themselves with it. But it did not in the first instance owe its origin to a pure motive to remedy ecclesiastical abuses, and correct doctrinal errors. The inglorious character of some of its early history, as Canon Perry says, cannot be denied. Yet some of the reformers of England, like Ridley and Latimer, were men of most fervent piety and lofty devotion; and its first annals describe the heroic constancy of a noble galaxy of martyrs who sacrificed their lives for their faith.

Circumstances had been preparing the way for the Reformation in England. The signs of the times in the early part of the sixteenth century indicated a mighty movement of men's minds in England as well as on the Continent. The revival of classical learning with such names as Erasmus, Colet, and Thomas More, the bold satire upon clerical abuses, the independence of thought (e.g., Erasmus' appeal to the Greek New Testament in the preface of his edition, Basel, 1516, and More's dreams of improvements in Church and State in his Utopia), the translation of the New Testament by Tyndale (1526), and its circulation in spite of public burnings and private espionage, were amongst the signs. Luther's mighty words from across the sea, arraignment of the papal dominion as the Babylonish captivity of the Church (1520), found an eager audience in England, which the public conflagration of his tracts by Wolsey (1521) could not quiet. But these were only the signs and forerunners of the Reformation: they did not accomplish it. The rupture from Rome in England was not, in the first instance, the product of the protest of religious principle against ecclesiastical abuse, however widely prevalent Reformation sentiments were among all classes: it was a political necessity to which Henry VIII. resorted in order to accomplish and to justify his divorce from Catherine, and marriage with Anne Boleyn. In 1531 Henry arraigned the clergy of a violation of præmunire for being accomplices with Cardinal Wolsey, who had exercised legatine functions without the royal consent. The two convocations compounded by the payment of a hundred and eighteen thousand pounds. But the king, not satisfied with this evidence of a submissive temper, demanded that he should be recognized as "chief protector, the only supreme lord and head of the Church and clergy in England." The Convocation of Canterbury accepted the title, only adding the limiting clause, "So far as the law of Christ will allow." In 1533 a parliamentary statute forbade all ecclesiastical appeals beyond the kingdom. The year following, actuated thereto by the Pope's command to take back Catherine, Henry secured the passage of the Act of Supremacy, by which the English sovereign became, without limitation, "the only supreme head in earth of the Church of England, called the 'Anglicana Ecclesia.' This statute made all papal appointments within the realm illegal, and vested in the crown unlimited authority to reform and redress ecclesiastical abuses. The Church in England was thus severed from the papal communion, and constituted an independent body. It was not long before the king made a bold use of his new authority by abolishing the monastic establishments, and confiscating their wealth, amounting to thirty-eight million pounds (1536-39).

But a thorough doctrinal reformation was not among the purposes of Henry. With the Continental Reformation he had little or no sympathy. The ten articles adopted by convocation in 1536 retained the doctrine of the real presence, the use of images, prayer to saints, purgatory, and auricular confession, and only divested these practices of some of the grosser superstitions. The king seemed to take higher ground when he gave his sanction to the translation of the Scriptures known as the Great Bible (1539). But all hopes of a thorough doctrinal reformation were doomed to disappointment. The six so-called "Bloody Articles" of 1539 denounced all denial of transubstantiation as heresy, and declared strongly in favor of auricular confession, the celibacy of the clergy, and the sacrifice of private masses. Henry had done his work. He was no reformer from principle; but Providence had used him to assert the independence of the Church of England, and to break the spell of tradition.

Under Edward VI. the doctrinal reformation was accomplished. The six articles were repealed, and the sympathy with the Continental reformers shown in the call of Bucer and Fagius to Cambridge, and Peter Martyr and Ochino to Oxford. A Prayer-Book was issued in 1549, and a second three years afterwards. The Forty-two Articles were drawn up in 1552. They state, in general, that "the Church of Rome hath erred not only in its living and manner of ceremonies, but also in matters of faith" (xix.). They expressly denied transubstantiation, admitted the marriage of the clergy, discontinued auricular confession, approved of the communion in both kinds. With their adoption the formative period of the Church of England closes. The reign of Mary (1553-58) checked the Reformation for the moment, but did not crush it. Hooper, Latimer, Ridley, Cranmer, were brought to the stake, and many refugees fled to Basel and Geneva; but these persecutions, which were attributed largely to Spanish influence, only awakened horror and dogged resistance.

With Elizabeth, Protestantism was restored, and — in spite of occasional resistance from within, the Spanish Armada and papal deposition from without (1570) — became the permanent religion of the large majority in the land. Two periods stand out in the history of the Church under Elizabeth. In the early part of the reign the divorce of the National Church from the Roman-Catholic see was consummated; in the latter part its position was clearly stated in regard to Puritanism, which demanded recognition, if not supremacy, within its pale. The queen was no zealous reformer, but directed the affairs of the Church with the keen sagacity of a statesmanship which placed national unity and the peace of the realm above every other consideration. In the first year of her reign the Acts of Supremacy and Uniformity were passed. By the former, all allegiance to foreign prince or prelate was forbidden; by the latter, the use of the liturgy enforced. The royal title of "Defender of the Faith and Supreme Head of the Church" was retained, with the slight alteration of "Head" to "Governor." But the passage was struck out of the Litany which read, "From the tyranny of the Bishop of Rome and all his detestable enormities, good Lord deliver us." The queen retained, against the protest of bishops, an altar, crucifix, and lighted candles in her own chapel, disapproved of the marriage of the clergy, interrupted the preacher who spoke disparagingly of the sign of the cross, and imperiously forced her wishes upon unwilling prelates. But, in spite of seeming to cater to the Church of Rome in points of ritual, Elizabeth did not interfere by any public measures with the results of the Reformation of Edward VI. The reduction of the Forty-two Articles to thirty-nine (1563), the form which they have ever since retained, did not impair their Protestant character.

The independence of the National Church being thus permanently settled, it only remained to settle disputes within her own pale. The great question was, whether Puritanism should be tolerated. This was a question not of doctrine, divine sovereignty, and predestination; for the prevailing doctrinal views were Calvinistic, and all of Elizabeth's bishops, almost without an exception, were Calvinists. It was a question of ecclesiastical polity and ritual. Many of the refugees who had fled to the Continent in Mary's reign returned strongly prejudiced against an elaborate ritual, and in favor of the Genevan form of government. Cartwright, Margaret Professor of Divinity at Cambridge, was the ablest exponent of these views (1570). There was no uniformity practised in the conduct of public services and the dress of the clergy. Hooper, Bishop of Gloucester, who died at the stake (1555), for a long time refused to be consecrated, from conscientious scruples against the usual episcopal habits; and Bishop Jewel pronounced the clerical garb a stage dress, and a relic of the Amorites. It is noticeable that two of Elizabeth's archbishops — Parker (1559-75) and Grindal (1575-83) — were averse to enforcing uniformity in these matters. The latter, with Bishops Parkhurst and Ponet, not only would have allowed a co-ordinate authority to the presbyterian system of Geneva, but would have gone even farther (Macaulay, Hist. Eng., vol. I. p. 39, Boston ed.). Grindal was so lukewarm in obeying the queen's command for the suppression of the Puritan "Propheysings," as to incur suspension from his office. By a royal proclamation these were suppressed, as before a royal proclamation had required the use of clerical vestments. It thus was decided that no liberty in matters of ritual and the conduct of public worship was to be tolerated. These acts forced many Puritan clergymen to resign their benefices. In Grindal's successor, Archbishop Whitgift (1583-1604), Elizabeth had a prelate more to her hand. The breach between the two parties became wider; and if the Church, on her part, was intolerant of all dissidence, the Puritans on theirs became coarse, as in the so-called Mar-prelate controversy (1588), when they issued scurrilous libels against the queen and bishops. The controversy was closed in 1593 by an act of Parliament making Puritanism an offence against the statute law.

The history of the seventeenth century is marked by the consolidation of the Church in spite of a temporary triumph of Puritanism, the growth of the doctrine of the essential necessity of episcopacy, the first indications of which show themselves in the Puritan controversy of the Elizabethan period, and a consequent intolerance towards all dissent from its forms and doctrines, culminating in the harsh legislation of Charles II. Under James I. (1603-25), who came to England with a cordial hatred of Presbyterianism, the Puritan party was completely humiliated. All their hopes, expressed in the famous Mildmay Petition, signed by eight hundred clergymen, and asking for the removal of superstitious usages from the Prayer-Book, etc., were doomed to disappointment. James maintained relations with the churches of the Continent, and sent five commissioners to represent the Church of England at the synod of Dort with instructions to "favour no innovations in doctrine, and to conform to the confessions of the neighboring Reformed churches." But full sympathy with the Continental churches was hereafter rendered impracticable, and recognition of their orders (as was the case under Elizabeth, see Professor Fisher, in the New-Englander, January, 1874, pp. 121-172) impossible by the high views of episcopacy which were spreading, and which, under Archbishop Laud (1633-45), assumed an extreme form. This prelate taught that episcopacy was not only necessary to the well-being, but essential to the very being, of the Church. His administration revived the ritual of Rome, and displayed, or seemed to display, so much sympathy with it, that he was offered a cardinal's hat. Since his day a large liberty of opinion has been allowed and practised in the Church of England on the question of ritual and episcopacy; the High-Church views of Laud, and the moderate views of Parker and Grindal, both having their representatives.

During the commonwealth period the Established Church was in fact a religio illicita, an act of Parliament having abolished episcopacy, and discontinued the use of the Liturgy (Sept. 10, 1642). Puritanism triumphed for a time; but its attempt to establish an ecclesiastical government was, in spite of towering theological intellects, and the massive and stern genius of Cromwell, a failure. (See the masterly account of Green, vol. iii. 321 sqq.) The accession of Charles II. in 1660 restored the Episcopal Church to the national position which it has ever since held. Harsh measures against the Puritans soon followed. By the Act of Uniformity of 1662 the use of the Prayer-Book was rigidly enforced; and two thousand English clergymen, amongst them some of the most scholarly and pious divines of the time (Baxter and Howe), were driven from their benefices. These hardships were increased by the Five-Mile Act (1665), which forbade them to approach within five miles of any parliamentary town or other place where they had preached. The Test Act of 1673, by excluding all Puritans from office, completed their discomfiture, and marked the culminating device of legislation disabling dissenters. Charles II. died a Roman Catholic. His brother James II. lived one. His efforts, however, to restore confidence and toleration for the Roman Church failed.

The accession of William and Mary ushered in a new epoch. To put it in a strong way, the principle that the National Church had an exclusive right to existence and protection was abrogated. The movement in favor not only of toleration, but of absolute freedom of worship, and political equality without reference to ecclesiastical connection, started with this reign. Put into more and more extensive practice, this principle has effected the abolition of most, if not all, political disabilities on account of religious differences. The first legislation in this direction was the Act of Toleration (1689), establishing freedom of worship. The present century has witnessed the repeal of the Test Act (1828), the removal of the disabilities of the Roman Catholics (1829) and Jews (1858), and the disestablishment of the Irish Church (1868).

The eighteenth century was characterized by a wide-spread religious apathy and worldliness among the clergy, until, in its final decades, the Church was aroused by the great popular revival, and in numbers weakened by the defection of the Methodists. The intellectual classes were affected by the deistic controversy, which, beginning with Lord Herbert of Cherbury (1581-1648), identified the Christian revelation with natural religion, and excluded from Christianity, as un-genuine and false, all that was not contained in the latter. It became as fashionable for statesmen to scoff at the Christian religion in their writings as it was common for them in their practice to treat its precepts with contempt. But while deism was being resolved into scepticism by Hume, its influence was more than counteracted by the evangelical spirit and earnest preaching of Whitefield and the Wesleys (graduates of Oxford), which worked with irresistible power upon the masses, and aroused the clergy of the realm out of their indifference to a new sense of their spiritual obligations. Fresh life sprang up in the Church of England as a result of this impulse. The so-called Evangelicals, including some of the most faithful pastors, fervent preachers, devout poets, and genial philanthropists,—men like Venn and Newton and Cowper and Wilberforce,—brought a warm consecration to their work, and vied with the more eloquent but no more devoted leaders of the Methodist movement to spread the truths and blessings of the gospel. And so the century went out with an intense sympathy for the heathen abroad and the depraved classes at home, in practical efforts to plant missions, and found charitable institutions.

The present century has witnessed the realization of these plans in part or in whole. No preceding period has been distinguished for piety at once more practical and more liberal than the nineteenth century. This is eminently true of the Church of England. It has also given evidence of vigor, as well as been distracted, by discussions of ecclesiastical order and discipline. The so-called Tractarian movement has agitated the Church to its depths. While Parliament was legislating in the interest of equal political rights, a movement in the interest of deeper piety, more aggressive effort, churchly zeal, and church authority, was spreading at Oxford (1838). Dr. Pusey was the moral, Dr. Newman the intellectual leader, and the saintly Keble the poet, of this movement. It led to a new investigation of the claims of the Catholic Church; and, before a decade had passed, the Church received a blow, from which, Lord Beaconsfield said a few years ago, it "still continues to reel." John Henry Newman, Edward Manning, Frederick W. Faber, and others of her ablest men of the clergy and nobility, went over to the Roman-Catholic communion.

The present state of opinion in the Church is classified under three heads. The High-Church party lays emphasis upon the exclusive right of episcopacy and apostolical succession, and practises an advanced ritual. The extreme wing, known as the Ritualists, has introduced practices which the Reformers regarded as papistical, — such as the elevation of the host, auricular confession, the burning of candles, etc. Some of their number go even so far as to declare the Reformation to have been a mistake and a misfortune. They display great zeal and devotion in benevolent church-work. Occupying opposite ground is the Low-Church party, which holds strictly to the natural interpretation of the Thirty-nine Articles, denies episcopacy to be of the essence of the Church, and renounces so-called ritualistic practices. Between these two schools a third has grown up within the last fifty years. Its combination of tolerant sympathies with loyalty to the Church has secured for it the name of the Broad-Church party. Among its more prominent representatives have been Arnold, Julius Hare, Maurice, Kingsley, and Stanley. During the century the vigorous life of the Church has been further shown by the restoration of cathedrals, and construction of churches, in the creation of new episcopal sees at home, — Truro, St. Albans (1877), and Liverpool (1880), — and the rapid extension of the Church and Episcopate in the Colonies. At no time in its history has it been stronger and more vigorous than now, more alive with theological discussion and achievement, more competent to cope with infidelity, more solicitous to relieve the poor and fallen, more munificent in its gifts for the conversion of the heathen, or more adapted to secure the esteem, and win the respect, of the Anglo-Saxon people on the island of Latimer and Ridley, as well as far beyond the seas, in the United States and Australia and India.

III. Theology and Worship. — The doctrinal standards of the Anglican Church are the Thirty-nine Articles and the Book of Common Prayer. To these may be added the Catechism and the two Books of Homilies issued in the reign of Edward VI., and sanctioned by the Thirty-nine Articles. Within the pale of the Church the most divergent views have prevailed concerning its doctrinal status. On the one hand it has been represented as strongly Calvinistic, both in respect to the sacraments and to the decrees: on the other, theologians, — such as Dr. Newman (before his transition to Rome), the late Dr. Forbes, Bishop of Brechin, Dr. Pusey (Eirenicon), and others, — minimizing the Protestantism of its standards, hold that nothing is taught in the Thirty-nine Articles which cannot be harmonized with the Tridentine decrees. An unprejudiced study of the plain and natural meaning of the language, without any inferences from what is left unsaid, will force upon us the conclusion that the Anglican standards teach a moderate Calvinism, and are, in the main, in sympathy with the Protestant Reformation of the Continent. The sole and supreme authority of the Scriptures is emphasized, as also justification by faith; Art. xi. reading, "Wherefore that we are justified by faith only is a most wholesome doctrine," etc. Original or birth sin is the corruption of nature of every descendant of Adam; and predestination is God's everlasting purpose to redeem "those whom he hath chosen in Christ out of mankind" (Art. xvii.). The erroneous doctrines of purgatory, the mass, celibacy, etc., are specifically denounced. The teaching concerning the Lord's Supper is plainly against transubstantiation, which in Art. xxviii. is declared to be "repugnant to the plain words of Scripture," the "body of Christ being given, taken, and eaten only after an heavenly and spiritual manner." Art. xxvii. can hardly be pressed to favor the theory of baptismal regeneration. But the case is different in the service of baptism in the Prayer-Book. After the child has been baptized, the minister says, "Seeing now . . . that this child is regenerate, and grafted into the body of Christ," etc. And again, after repeating the Lord's Prayer, he gives thanks to the heavenly Father for regenerating the infant, etc. These words interpreted naturally teach baptismal regeneration; but they are frequently explained as being used only in a hypothetical sense. For a fuller statement under this head, see ARTICLES THIRTY-NINE.

The worship of the Church of England is liturgical, and regulated by the Book of Common Prayer, one of the most precious legacies of the Protestant Reformation. Its beautiful forms of service, and its solemn and venerable prayers, are not only among the choicest specimens of English, but exert an influence on the ear and heart of those who use them which nothing else can replace. The rubrics (so called from having been printed in red ink) give directions for the smallest details of the service. The sabbath services consist of prayers, lessons from the Scriptures, responsive reading of the Psalms, chants, hymns, the offertory, and the sermon. The form and matter of the service of baptism, communion, marriage, and other services, are all prescribed. The inconveniences of this method are not to be overlooked, by which all departure from the fixed form is forbidden. An illustration is found in the service of burial. In all cases, over the most notorious sinner, as well as the pious churchman, the same consolatory passages (1 Cor. xv., etc.) are read, and the same prayers offered. But, on the other hand, there are manifest advantages which it would be hard to deny. See, on this subject, art. LITURGY.

IV. The Clergy and Clerical Patronage. — The clergy consists of three orders, — deacons, priests (presbyters), and bishops. The canonical age is respectively twenty-three, twenty-four, and thirty. The duties of the deacon are to render assistance to the priest in the services of the sanctuary and in pastoral work. He may preach, read the prayers and Scripture-lessons, assist in the distribution of the elements at communion, and administer baptism. In his ordination he assents to the Thirty-nine Articles and the constitution of the Episcopal Church as agreeable with the word of God. The priest serves at the altar, and consecrates the elements in the Lord's Supper. At his ordination the bishop pronounces upon him the words, "Receive the Holy Ghost for the office and work of a priest in the Church of God," etc. This is interpreted to be a petition for the anointing of the Holy Spirit, or to mark the transmission of a heavenly grace through the bishop, according to the different stand-point of the interpreter. The bishop has the exclusive right of ordination, confirmation, or admitting members to the Lord's table, and the consecration of churches. Bishops are appointed by the crown. A congé d'élire is sent to the chapter when a bishopric is vacant; but it is only a formality, as the name of the new incumbent is sent with it. A class of the priesthood known as the dignified clergy are the deans and archdeacons. Deans have charge of cathedral churches, and are assisted by canons, the number of which may not exceed six for any cathedral. The archdeacon assists the bishop in his official duties as superintendent of the diocese. He holds synods, delivers charges, and visits parishes. He is himself sometimes aided by rural deans. Both these classes are members of convocation by virtue of their office. No bishop is allowed to transgress the limits of his diocese in the performance of episcopal functions, unless requested so to do. The bishops frequently associate with themselves suffragan bishops.

England is divided into the two archbishoprics of Canterbury and York. Within the limits of the former there are twenty-three sees, including the two new ones (Truro and St. Albans) created 1877; within the latter, seven, — Durham, Ripon, Chester, Carlisle, Manchester, Liverpool (organized 1880), and Sodor and Man. In the order of dignity they rank, Canterbury, York, London, Durham, Winchester, etc. In addition to the Irish (twelve) and Scotch (seven) bishops, there are at present, in connection with the Church of England, sixty-three colonial and ten missionary bishops. The first colonial see was Nova Scotia (1787). The see of Calcutta was organized 1813. Nineteen colonial or missionary bishops have resigned their sees, and are now living in England. There are thirty deans presiding over as many cathedrals. The Deans of Westminster and Windsor are independent of episcopal control, and directly subject to the crown. All the sees have deans, except Liverpool, St. Albans, Truro, and Sodor and Man. There are eighty-two archdeacons, and six hundred and thirteen rural deans. The lower clergy of the Church in England and Wales (who number about 23,000) are called "rector," "vicar," "curate," etc. The benefices, or livings, number nearly 13,500. Their patronage is divided between the crown (1,150 livings), the bishops (1,853), universities (770), private patrons (6,200), etc. The consent of the bishop of the diocese is necessary to the induction of an incumbent; and, in the event of a disagreement between patron and bishop, the case is decided by the Court of Arches. The people have no voice in the choice of their rector; but the rector, once inducted, has absolute control of his church, so that not even the bishop may enter it without his consent. Many of the parishes have endowments in lands: others are supported, in whole or in part, from public funds, such as Queen Anne's Bounty. The system of patronage has led to very great abuses, some of which still remain. Benefices are sometimes held up for public sale, and, being subject to the choice of private patrons, may be filled with men of little ability or small interest in the spiritual welfare of the people. The Plurality system, by which a clergyman might hold any number of livings at the same time, and which was so much abused in the latter part of the last century, has been modified by parliamentary legislation. Under the present law no one can hold two cathedral positions at the same time. The holder of a cathedral position may hold besides only one parish. A clergyman may have two parishes; but, if the one numbers three thousand souls, the other may not include more than five hundred. The evils of non-residence have likewise been restrained by law. The yearly income of the Church of England amounts to at least eight million pounds. The income of the Archbishop of Canterbury is fifteen thousand pounds; of York, ten thousand pounds; of London, ten thousand pounds; of Durham, eight thousand pounds. The lowest income is that of the Bishop of Sodor and Man, which amounts to two thousand pounds. The average income of a dean is one thousand pounds. The incomes of the clergy are from one hundred and fifty pounds upward. A fund managed by the so-called "Ecclesiastical Commission," and supplied by the revenues of suppressed canonries, sinecures, and the surplus revenues of bishoprics over and above the episcopal salary, is used for the augmentation of bishoprics, the increase of the smaller salaries, the endowment of new ministers, etc. This commission was constituted in 1835.

V. Church Polity. — The Church or spirituality of England is one of the estates of the realm. Its relation to the State is one of dependence, the Sovereign being its supreme governor, and Parliament its highest legislature. The Archbishop of Canterbury is the first peer in the realm, and crowns the king. The bishops have their "palaces," and seats in the House of Lords, except the Bishops of Sodor and Man, Liverpool, Truro, and St. Albans. The Church does not legislate for itself independently or directly: it is subject to Parliament.

The Convocations of Canterbury and York are the two highest official church bodies. Constituted by Edward I., they enjoyed independent rights of ecclesiastical legislation until 1532, when, by the Submission of the Clergy, they became subject to the king. In 1717 the Convocation of Canterbury was dissolved by George I., for the supposed hostility of the lower house to the House of Hanover, was not revived till 1852, and did not receive the royal license to proceed to business till 1861. These convocations consist of two houses. Over the upper, consisting of the bishops, the archbishop presides. The lower house, whose presiding officer is called prolocutor, is made up of the archdeacons, deans, and representatives of the lower clergy. The laity have no representation. In the Convocation of York the distinction between the two houses is only made on occasions of actual transaction of business. The archbishops have the right of veto upon all measures. Convocation is assembled by the king's writ, and cannot proceed to make new canons without his license, nor have its decisions validity till confirmed by his sanction.

The judicial business is transacted in three courts. The lowest is the Diocesan Consistory Court, presided over by the bishop's chancellor. Appealed cases go up to the Court of Arches, the official head of which is styled Dean of the Arches. The last tribunal of appeal is the king in council. There are three church censures, — suspension (for the neglect of parish duties), deprivation, and degradation. The two latter follow upon the disuse of the Prayer-Book, teachings subversive of the Thirty-nine Articles, simony, or conviction in a civil court. The Court of Arches alone exercises the right of deprivation.

ENGLISH BIBLE VERSIONS. 1. Anglo-Saxon. — The earliest monument is that of CÆDMON, a monk of Whitby (d. 680), On the Origin of Things, consisting of poetical paraphrases of parts of the Bible, some of which were published by Junius at Amsterdam, 1655, and most of them by Thorpe (Cædmon's Metrical Paraphrase of Parts of the Holy Scripture, with an English translation, notes, etc.), London, 1832. In the beginning of the eighth century Aldhelm and Guthlac produced an interlinear Anglo-Saxon version of the Psalter on the basis of the Roman text. The manuscript is among the Cotton Manuscripts marked Vespasian A., I. In 730 (circa) Eadfrith, Bishop of Lindisfarne, translated parts of the Gospels (Durham Book,¹ Cotton Manuscripts, Nero D., IV.); and the Venerable Bede died (735) while engaged on the translation of John, in which he only proceeded to the beginning of chapter six. Parts of the Book of Exodus and the Psalter were translated by King Alfred (d. 901). The Rushworth Gloss (in the Bodleian Library), an interlinear evangelistary, made by Farnen and Owen about the same time, is peculiarly interesting from the agreement of its Latin text with the Codex Bezae where it differs from the Textus Receptus. Proverbs, in part, in an interlinear version, belongs to the tenth century (Cotton Manuscripts, Vespasian D., VI.). Towards the close of that century Aelfric, peculiarly odious to the monks of the period, produced in popular form paraphrases of the Pentateuch, Joshua, and Judges, parts of the historical books (Samuel, Kings, and Chronicles), Esther, Job (perhaps), Judith, and the Maccabees. Of these, the Pentateuch, Joshua, Judges, Job, and part of Judith, were printed in the Heptateuchus, edited by Thwaites, Oxonia, 1699, 8vo. An Anglo-Saxon version of the Gospels, of somewhat later date, by an unknown translator, based on an ante-Hieronimian Latin text, with a preface by John Foxe the martyrologist, was printed in London by John Daye, 1571, 4to. There exist, likewise, in manuscript, several copies of the Psalter, written shortly before the Conquest, and three Anglo-Norman manuscripts of the Gospels, of which the first is assigned to the time of William III., and the two others to that of Henry II. Besides the printed works already named, there appeared in 1640 the inter-lineated Psalter by John Spelman, London, 1658; an edition of the Gospels by William L'Isle, 4to; and another by Thomas Marshall, Dordrecht, 1665 (Amsterdam, 1684), 4to, with the Mæso-Gothic version. Benjamin Thorpe published Libri Psalmorum Versio Antiqua Latina cum Paraphrasi Anglo-Saxonica, London, 1835; The Anglo-Saxon Version of the Holy Gospels, Ib., 1842, reprinted in New York, 1846; The Gothic and Anglo-Saxon Gospels in Parallel Columns, with the Versions of Wiclif and Tyndale, by Joseph Bosworth, with preface and notes, London, 1865; The Gothic and Anglo-Saxon Gospels, by Bosworth and Waring, London, 1865, 2d ed., 1874; W. W. SKEAT: Gosp. accord. St. John in Anglo-Saxon and Northumbrian Versions, synoptically arranged, Cambridge, 1878; A Translation of the Anglo-Saxon Version of St. Mark's Gospel, with preface and notes, by H. C. Leonard, London, 1881.

2. Wiclifite. — Prior to Wiclif we have the Ormulum, so called from its author, Orm or Ormin, an English monk who lived in or about the twelfth century, and says in the preface, This boc is nemmedd Ormulum, Forthi thatt Orm itt wrohhte. It is a metrical paraphrase on the Gospels and Acts, neither alliterative nor in rhyme, but in imitation of a certain species of Latin mediæval poems, and is remarkable for its smooth, fluent, and regular versification. It was published by Dr. White, Oxford, 1852. — The Sowlehele, a very large volume (Bodleian Manuscripts, 779), assigned to the thirteenth century, author unknown, contains, among other writings, a metrical paraphrase of the Old and New Testaments. — A paraphrase, in the Northern dialect, of Genesis and Exodus, author and date unknown (? before 1300), and a metrical version of the Psalms, the first known translation into English, from the text of the Gallican (Jerome's) Latin Psalter, are among the manuscripts of Corpus Christi College, Cambridge. — The first prose translation of the Psalter into English is that of Richard Rolle, hermit of Hampole (assigned to the first half of the fourteenth century). It is excellent in its way; e.g., (Ps. xxiii. 4) "For win gif I hadde goo in myddil of the shadewe of deeth: I shal not dreede yeles, for thou art wilh me." There are quite a number of other manuscripts, notably one in Benet College, mentioned by Lewis, of which this is a specimen: (Mark vi. 22) "When the doughtyr of that Herodias was in comyn and had lomblyde and plesid to Harowde, and alss to the sittande at mete the king says to the wench." — John de Trevisa, Vicar of Berkeley, said to have translated the whole Bible into English before 1387, appears to have Englished only a few isolated passages: the assertion cannot be verified. The literature is given below. — John Wiclif, b. 1324 at Wiclif, near Richmond, in Yorkshire; studied at Oxford; was warden of Baliol Hall, rector of Fyflingham, and warden of Canterbury Hall (1361–65), royal chaplain, and commissioner to Bruges (1374); on his return to England he was presented by the crown with the prebend of Aust and the rectory of Lutterworth in Leicestershire, which he held until his death (1384). The generally received statement, that it was only during the last ten years of his life that he was engaged upon the translation of the Scriptures, lacks proof; and it is safer to hold, with Baber, that he bestowed upon that great work a much longer period. His translation of the Bible is the first published translation, which imports that he must have been unremitting in his zeal to diffuse it among the people; and the proof is furnished in the fact, that, in spite of the prohibition of 1408, numerous copies of it have come down to us. His version was made from the Vulgate; i.e., from Jerome's version, or such copies as passed for it. The portion from Genesis to Baruch iii. 20 was made by Nicholas de Hereford, an English ecclesiastic: the balance of the Old Testament and of the Apocrypha, as well as the whole of the New Testament, are ascribed to Wiclif. The original text of the version was completed about 1380: the revision of it by Richard Purvey was finished about 1388. It may be considered certain that Hereford did not translate from the Latin alone, but used the French translation, from which the new idiom introduced is clearly taken. The New Testament of Wiclif was made from the Latin and Anglo-Saxon, and is rather literal: the revision by Purvey, and other unpublished versions in manuscript, seek to give the sense. Purvey's authorities were Augustine, Jerome, the Glossa Ordinaria, and Lyra. Wiclif's Version is, as to style, robust, terse, and homely; Purvey's, and that of the others referred to, more polished, though quaint. The peculiar strength of the Authorized Version is of Wiclifite origin. In the absence of illustrations, for which no space can be found, a few examples of curious renderings may be given (Matt. v. 22, "fy" or "fogh" for "raca;" Luke xvi. 13, "bishop" for "high priest"), as well as of explanatory glosses, now more obscure than the word to be explained; e.g., yvel fame. schendeschepe: incorruptible, that may not dye ne ben payred; justified, founden trew; acception of persons, that is put oon bifore an other that is withouten deserte. Of obsolete words employed, the following are samples: tendith, kindleth; anentis, with; unbileful, unbelieving; leende, loins; herbore, lodging; mawmetis, idols; haburioun, breastplate; arettid, imputed; thilke, the same; stie, ascend; senuey, mustard; culueris, doves; chepyng, market; euene, fellow.

3. Tyndale's. — William Tyndale b. in Gloucestershire, 1471; went to Oxford about 1500; took his degrees at Magdalen Hall; began the translation of the New Testament from the Greek as early as 1502; but upon his removal to London in 1522 met with so little encouragement there for the accomplishment of his purpose, and on account of his evangelical sentiments became so obnoxious to the clergy, that he left for the Continent, where he translated the New Testament (1524–25) from the Greek, strongly but legitimately influenced by Luther's Version. He proceeded to Cologne, and was carrying his quarto edition through the press, when, in consequence of the opposition of the local authorities, instigated by Cochlæus, he had to leave the city with the unfinished sheets, and completed the printing of the first edition (4to) and the second edition (8vo), at Worms, 1525. The place or places where he was in hiding under an assumed name, and where he translated the Pentateuch, and had it as well as other works printed, are not yet fixed: the strongest probability points to Wittenberg. But the writer of this article feels warranted to announce the established facts, that the Pentateuch was not printed at Marburg, that Hans Luft never had a printing-press in that place, and that neither Tyndale nor Fryth ever were at Marburg. These conclusions, published by the author Dec. 10, 1881, have since been fully confirmed by Professor Dr. Julius Cæsar, the librarian of the University of Marburg, and are stated at length in his forthcoming volume on the English versions. — The numerous surreptitious editions of Tyndale's New Testament cannot be noticed here. The Pentateuch was published in 1530, the Book of Jonah in 1531. There is evidence that Tyndale translated, though he did not live to publish, other portions of the Old Testament from the Hebrew, most probably to the end of Second Chronicles, and several of the prophetic books. The translation of the Old Testament was his occupation in the gloomy prison of Vilvorde, where he was confined from May, 1535, till Oct. 6, 1536, on which day he suffered martyrdom, having been first strangled, and then burned. — Tyndale's translation is the first English version made from the original tongues. His helps were very meagre; and although he used the Vulgate, Wiclif, and Luther, he is thoroughly independent. His English is noble, and his phraseology Saxon, his idiom singularly pure; and much of his version remains unchanged in the Authorized Version, of which it is really the original basis. Samples of his felicitous renderings are: (Matt. xiv. 14) "his heart did melt upon them;" (xv. 27) "the whelps eat of the crumbs;" (xxiv. 11) "iniquity shall have the upper hand;" (Mark viii. 29) "thou art very Christ; (Luke xxii. 1) "the feast of sweet bread drew nigh, which is called Easter;" (John ii. 7) "filled them up to the hard brim;" (Acts xii. 18) "there was not a little ado among the soldiers;" (1 Cor. ii. 10) "searcheth the bottom of God's secrets;" (Phil. i. 8) "I long after you all from the very heart root in Jesus Christ;" (1 Tim. vi. 4) "but wasteth his brains about questions;" (Heb. viii. 1) "this is the pith;" (Jas. i. 1) "which are scattered here and there." Samples of homely phrase: (Matt. xxvi. 30) "and when they had said grace;" (Rev. i. 10) "I was in the Spirit on a Sunday;" (Acts xiv. 13) "brought oxen and garlands unto the church porch." — The numerous editions of Tyndale's New Testament cannot be noticed here beyond saying that that of 1525 (1526) is the first; and that of 1534–35, with the monogram G. II. on the second title, the last. (See Fry's Collation of Three New Testaments of William Tyndale, etc., and Biographical Description of Tyndale's New Testaments, and of two editions of the Bishops' Version, London, 1879.)

4. Coverdale's. — Miles Coverdale, b. about 1488 at Coverdale, in the North Riding of Yorkshire, was educated at Cambridge, and priested by John, Bishop of Chalcodon, at Norwich, in 1514. He fled to the Continent; but his meeting with Tyndale is purely conjectural, and his having assisted him in the translation of the Scriptures not only improbable, but absurd; for he was not an independent scholar, and his moderate proficiency in the tongues the accretion of a later period. Where he was from 1528 to 1535 is not positively known. At the instance of Crumwell he took in hand the translation of the Bible; and, as he was unquestionably an excellent German scholar, his proficiency in German explains, as the nature of its execution sustains, the honest titlepage of his first edition of the Bible (printed most probably by Froschover at Zürich, 1535); viz., Biblia—the Bible: that is, the Holy Scripture of the Olde and Newe Testament, faithfully and truly translated out of Douche and Latyn in to Englishe, MDXXXV. The "Douche" undoubtedly signifies "German," and the German versions he used were Luther's and the Zurich, perhaps also the Worms editions. The Latin versions he used were the Vulgate and that of Pagninus; and the published portions of Tyndale were the basis of his English. The Old Testament from Second Chronicles onward is Coverdale's own work; that is, it is a translation of Luther's and the Zurich versions, and a very servile one. His Diglott New Testament (exhibiting the English and the Vulgate in parallel columns) appeared in three editions (1538); his Bible was published in London by Andrewe Hester in 1550, and by R. Jugge in 1553. The part Coverdale had in the production of the Great Bible is noticed below. Coverdale's Version, though a second-hand production, has the merit of a pure and strong idiom: it is the basis of the version of the Psalter in the Book of Common Prayer. His language and his renderings are very musical; e.g., (Ps. xc. 10) "The days of our age are threescore years and ten;" (Isa. xlviii. 19) "Thy seed shall be like as the sand in the sea, and the fruit of thy body like the gravel-stones thereof; thy name shall not be rooted out, nor destroyed before me." He is also very quaint; e.g., (Job xix. 18) "Yea, the very desert fools despise me;" (Prov. xvi. 28) "he that is a blabbe of his tongue maketh division;" (Jer. xvii. 1) "graven upon the edge of your altars with a pen of iron and with an adamant claw;" (Col. ii. 10) "Let no man make you shoot at a wrong mark, which after his own choosing walketh in humbleness and spirituality of angels, things which he never saw."

5. Matthew's. — The name of Thomas Matthew is an alias of John Rogers, b. about 1500, at Deritend (in Birmingham); educated at Pembroke Hall, Cambridge (B. A., 1525); transferred to Cardinal College, Oxford, where he took orders the same year. He was next rector of Holy Trinity, London (1532), and accepted the chaplaincy at Antwerp, probably in 1534; there he became acquainted with Tyndale, and subsequently his literary executor. He published (where is not known, but most probably at Wittenberg) a folio edition of the Bible, entitled The Bible, which is all the Holy Scriptures, in which are contained the Olde and Newe Testaments, truly and purely translated into English, by Thomas Matthew. Esaye I, Hearcken to, ye heavens, and thou earth, geave eare: for the Lorde speaketh. MDXXXVII. This folio is a composite volume, and its critical analysis shows that the Pentateuch, and the portion from Joshua to Second Chronicles, as well as the whole of the New Testament, are Tyndale's translation: the remainder is Coverdale's. Rogers, however, did not merely put together these materials, but very skilfully edited and revised them. He added very valuable prefatory matter, especially the "Summe and content of all the Holy Scripture, both of the Olde and the Newe Testament," and "A Table of the princypal matters conteyned in the Byble, in which the readers may fynde and practyse many commune places," filling twenty-six folio pages, and constituting a sort of concordance and dictionary. It is chiefly taken from the French Bible of Olivetan. He likewise added several alternate renderings in his notes, introduced by the formula, "Some reade." He placed the contents or summaries before each chapter, and the notes at the end. His notes are diversified (textual, doctrinal, polemical, and practical), and form almost a running commentary. They are of various origin: many are taken from Pellicanus, and quite a number are original. His anti-papal notes are very striking: that on Matt. xvi. ("I say unto thee that thou art Peter, and upon this rock," etc.) reads, "That is, as saith St. Austin, upon the confession which thou hast made, knowledging me to be Christ, the Son of the living God, I will build my congregation or Church;" that on xxv. ("And the wise answered, Not so, lest there be not enough," etc.), "Note here that their own good works sufficed not for themselves, and therefore remained none to be distributed unto their fellows." The title of the Apocrypha reads, The volume of the booke called Apocrypha conteyned in the comen translation in Latyne, which are not found in the Hebrue, nor in the Chalde. He supplies the prayer of Manasses, omitted by Coverdale, from the French version of Olivetan; and he protests, in the language of the same writer, against their reception as an inspired collection. The peculiarities of the version, as distinguished from Tyndale's and Coverdale's, cannot be illustrated here; but an idea of it may be conveyed by two or three of its characteristic notes. "Selah. This word, after Rabbi Kimchi, was a sign or token of lifting up the voice, and also a monition and advertisement to enforce the thought and mind earnestly to give heed to the meaning of the verse unto which it is added. Some will that it signifies perpetually or verily." "Messiah. It signifieth anointed. Jesus Christ then is the earnest and pledge of God's promise, by whom the grace and favour of God is promised to us with the Holy Ghost, which illumineth, lighteth, reneweth our hearts to fulfil the law." Matthew's Bible is practically the basis of the text of the Authorized Version. It remains to say that John Rogers, in 1537, married, and moved to Wittenberg. He is supposed to have remained there until 1547. Distinguished by many favors under Edward VI., he was the first martyr in the Marian persecution, and was burned alive in Smithfield in February, 1555.

6. Taverner's. — Richard Taverner, b. at Brisley, Norfolk, about 1505; studied at Cambridge and Oxford (B.A., 1529); was a fine Greek scholar, and, though a laic, was asked by Crumwell to revise the Bible, which work he completed in 1539. It is more than an examination (recognitio), and less than a new translation, occasionally pedantic, and very unequal. His recognition is frequently in servile imitation of the Vulgate, on which he seems to have wholly relied in the Old Testament; e.g., (Gen. i. 2) "the Spirit of God was borne upon" (ferebatur);

(i. 7) "and so it was doon" (factum est); "bereth seed" (afferentem). In the New Testament, on the other hand, both the number and quality of his renderings proclaim the finished Grecian; and a large proportion of them are retained in the Authorized Version. Matt. i. 25 (Matthew's "Till she had brought forth her fyrst sonne") he renders "tyll at last she had brought forth her fyrst borne sonne;" xxii. 12 ("he was even speechless") is changed into "had never a word to say;" and xxii. 34 ("put the Sadducees to silence") into "stopped the Sadducees' mouth." In his studious endeavor to find Saxon terms, he gave us (1 John ii. 1) "spokesman" for "advocate," and (at ii. 2) coined "mercystock" as the equivalent of ἰακούς, and in place of Tyndale's and Coverdale's "he it is that obtaineth grace for us." To his regard for the Greek article are due the renderings (John i. 9), "that was the true light which . . . coming;" (i. 23) "I am a voice of one crying;" (i. 25) "Art thou the prophet?" Among the many phrases introduced by him, and retained in the Authorized Version, are, (Matt. xiii. 58) "because of their unbelief," (xviii. 12) "ninety and nine," (xxv. 35) "a stranger," (xxvii. 65) "Ye have a watch," (Gal. iv. 20) "I stand in doubt of you," (vi. 16) "the Israel of God." In 1551 his Old Testament appeared in the folio Bible, revised by Becke, and printed by Jhon Day. After that period it fell into neglect. The Epistles in this edition, as well as Matthew's Bible, follow the order of the Authorized Version as far as Philemon, after which come the Epistles of John, Hebrews, First and Second Peter, James, and Jude.

7. The Great Bible. — Tyndale's and Matthew's Bibles were for ecclesiastical reasons, Coverdale's, on account of its inaccuracy, not acceptable to Crumwell, at whose instance and charge the latter was directed to produce a new edition on more critical principles. Coverdale, accompanied by Grafton, repaired for that purpose to Paris (1538), where better paper and more skilful printing were to be had; and the work progressed satisfactorily at the press of Regnault, until, by the interference of the inquisitor-general, it was stopped, and had to be completed (in April, 1539) in London. This handsome folio, on account of its size, is the Great Bible, not Cranmer's, as it is sometimes loosely called. Its title runs: The Byble in Englyshe, that is to saye, the content of all the Holy Scripture, bothe of the Olde and Newe testament, truly translated after the veryte of the Hebrue and Greke textes, by the dylygent studye of dyuerse excellent learned men, expert in the forsayde tonges. Printed by Rychard Grafton & Edward Whitchurch. Cum privilegio ad imprimendum solum. 1539.

These "dyuerse excellent learned men" appear to have been the works of Münster and Erasmus. The elaborate frontispiece of this Bible is said to have been designed by Holbein. It is the text of Matthew, revised, or Coverdale's revision of Tyndale and of his own Bible; and he was so little attached to that, that (e.g., in Isa. liii.) he corrected it in about forty places. Almost every change in the Old Testament may be traced to Münster and Pagninus, and in the New, to Erasmus. Two examples will show this: (1) Pa. xxiii. 5 (COVERDALE, 1535), "Thou preparast a table before me agaynst mine enemies:^{a1} thou anyntest my head with oyle, and fyllest my cuppe full;"^{b1} (GREAT BIBLE, 1539) "Thou shalt prepare"^{a2} a table before me agaynst them that trouble me;^{b2} thou hast^{c2} anynted my head with oyle, & my cuppe shalbe full;"^{d2} (2) Gal. iii. 7 (TYNDALE), "Understand therefore that," (GREAT BIBLE, 1539), "ye know therefore" (scitis igitur); iii. 29 (TYNDALE), "by promise," (GREAT BIBLE) "according to the promise" (juxta promissionem). This Bible was very popular. A new edition appeared in the next year, again revised (and unsparingly, though often for the worse) by Coverdale. It had a preface by Cranmer; and the editions of April, July, and November, 1540, and May, November, and December, 1541, are really the Cranmer Bibles. This Bible (the Great and Cranmer's) remained the authorized version for twenty-eight years.³ The greater part of the portions of the Scriptures in the Prayer-Books of 1549 and 1552 were taken from it. It contains numerous paraphrastic and supplementary clauses from the Vulgate, and is decidedly inferior to Matthew's.

8. The Genevan. — Three among the English exiles at Geneva (namely, William Whittingham, Thomas Sampson, and Anthony Gilby) are conspicuous among the translators of this version; and among these three the most laborious was William Whittingham, b. at Lanchester, near Durham, in 1524; an Oxford man; married the sister of John Calvin's wife (Catherine Jaquemaine of Orléans); and was minister of the English Church at Geneva. They produced from the original Greek the New Testament, first in 1557, and a distinct version of it, with the whole Bible, in 1560. The first seems to have been the sole work of Whittingham, and was printed before the translation of the entire Bible was taken in hand. The Testament of 1557 was a small octavo, entitled The Newe Testament of our Lord Jesus Christ, conferred diligently with the Greke and best approved translations. With the arguments as well before the Chapters, as for every Boke and Epistle, also diuersities of readings, and most profitable annotations of all harde places: wherunto is added a copious Table. At Geneva, printed by Conrad Badius, MDLVII. This Testament is really Tyndale's, revised, collated with the Great Bible; which in the New Testament is likewise based on that version, and a strong leaning on Beza, with the result of a substantial agreement with Tyndale, a less frequent difference from him and agreement with the Great Bible, and an occasional agreement with Beza and difference from the two former. Among its peculiar readings note: (Matt. ix. 16) "No man peceth an olde garment with a pece of new clothe and vndressed. For that same piece taketh away something from the garment, and the cutte is made worse;" (Luke xviii. 34) "do me iustice against myne adversarie;" (John vi. 9) "there is a little boy here;" (Acts xxvii. 9) "because also the tyme of the Fast was passid;" (xxvii. 13) "lowsed nearer" (cf. Asson, in Wiclif, Tyndale, and Great Bible), —all exhibiting independent and superior scholarship, which likewise distinguish the notes for which the Genevan Testament is famous, and most of which were put into the edition of 1560. These notes are mostly original, or selected from Calvin and Beza, and treat of theology, history, geography, etc.; some are also inferential. This Testament is the first English Testament with verse division. The whole Bible of 1560 is a noble, scholarly production. Sampson was a fine Hebraist; and the translators were indebted in the Old Testament to Pagninus, Münster, and Leo Judæ. In the New Testament the force of the Greek particles γάρ, δέ, etc., is uniformly attended to. It was finished and published April, 1560, and printed by Rowland Hall. It is known also as the Breeches Bible, from the rendering of Gen. iii. 7,—"They sewed fig-leaves together, and made themselves breeches." It was printed — at the expense of the English congregation at Geneva, of which John Bodley (father of Sir Thomas, the founder of the Bodleian Library at Oxford) was a generous member—in quarto, and became very popular, more than one hundred and thirty editions having been published, the last in 1644, and the Authorized Version, with the Genevan notes, in 1715. Peculiar and novel features were, the attempted restoration of the original form of Hebrew names, the omission of St. Paul from the title of the Epistle to the Hebrews, the use of Italic letters for supplemental words, the substitution of biblical events and the names of reformers for the names of saints in the Calendar, and the entire omission of the Apocrypha. The Anglo-Genevan edition of the New Testament of 1576, by Lawrence Tomson, one of the best linguists of the day, introduced many changes, especially in the rendering of the article by that (e.g., John i. 1, 4, 5, 9, 14, etc.), and the notes, which, though more numerous, are less pithy than the old ones. The first Bible printed in Scotland (1579) is an exact reprint of the Genevan of 1561.

9. The Bishops. — The superior merits of the Genevan Bible, its great popularity, and the general dissatisfaction with the Great Bible, induced Archbishop Parker to make preparations for a new edition under church authority, looking to a revision of that Bible by the originals with the aid of Pagninus and Münster, etc., temperate annotations, the marking of unedifying portions, and the use, where required, of nobler forms of expression. Some of his episcopal coadjutors held extraordinary views (e.g., Bishops Guest, Cox, and Sandys), and the archbishop exercised accordingly a wise discretion in the assigning of the several books. The revision — on which not less than eight bishops were engaged (hence its name), as well as several deans and professors — was completed, and the Bible published in a handsome folio, on good paper, and superbly printed, in 1568, 1569, 1570, 1571 (New Testament), and 1572. It contains a vast amount of excellent prefatory and introductory matter, among it the preface by the archbishop, and Cranmer's prologue, and is highly ornamented, some of the ornaments of very dubious taste. As a translation it is of unequal merit; the different books in the edition of 1568 being qualitatively unequal, and the whole edition of 1572 greatly superior to the former. That of 1572 is the basis of the Authorized Version. The critical helps available to the Genevan translators were used by the translators of the Bishops' Bible; and, while the influence of the Genevan Version on this is very pronounced, the original was diligently consulted. The critical examination of Isa. liii. by Professor Westcott yields the result, that, of twenty-one corrections, five are due to the Genevan, five agree with Pagninus, three with Leo Judæ, three with Castalio, one with Münster, one is linguistic, and three are apparently original. These last are the omission (liii. 3) of "Yea, he was . . . regarded him not," and (liii. 4) of "and punished," and the correction (liii. 4) of "infirmities" into "infirmity." In Job xix. 25 the Bishops' of 1568 brings the new rendering, "he shall raise up at the latter day them that lie in the dust." Twenty-nine passages in the New Testament of 1568, faulted by Lawrence as incorrect, were, for the most part, as corrected by him, received in the edition of 1572, and into the present text of the Authorized Version. The examination of Eph. iv. 7-16 (by Westcott) in the Great Bible of 1550, and the Bishops', shows, that, among twenty-six changes, seventeen are new, nine being due to the Genevan, and the remainder the result of close and thoughtful reference to the Greek. The independence of the revision is evident in that only four of the new changes agree with Beza, while nine go against him. But, in spite of many excellences, the Bishops' Bible was the least successful of all the English versions. As peculiar to this Bible appear the attempted classification of the books of the Bible into legal, historical, sapiential, and prophetic (with the curious result that the Gospels, the Catholic Epistles, and those to Titus, Philemon, and the Hebrews, are described as legal, the other Pauline Epistles as sapiential, the Acts alone as historical, and Revelation as prophetic), the indication of ostracized portions, and, in one edition, two versions of the Psalter (Matthew's and the new).

10. The Rheims and Douay. — William Allen, Gregory Martin, and Richard Bristow were the chief promoters of this extraordinary version, which claims for the Vulgate, from which it is made, not only equal authority with the original Scriptures, but superior, reasoning thus: As a rule, the Latin agrees with the Greek; when it differs from the common Greek text, it agrees with some copy, "as may be seen in Stephens's margin," and the adversaries frequently concede the superiority of the marginal readings; when the Greek goes against the Latin, quotations from the Greek fathers are sure to sustain it, and, where these fail, conjecture may come in to adapt the Greek to the Latin; and, where conjecture and the Greek fathers fail, the Latin fathers are almost sure to sustain the Vulgate, and, if their readings should differ, the cause is to be sought in "the great diversitie and multitude" of the Latin copies. Admit these principles, and the superiority of the text of the Vulgate to the Greek text is established.

I am undecided whether the actual translation of the Rhemish New Testament agrees or conflicts with the expressed purpose of its authors; for their text, especially in the correct use of the article, often agrees with the Greek, and in spite of their deification of the Vulgate, even as authorized by the Council of Trent, and their ceaseless fulminations (in the notes) against heretics, they are greatly indebted to the Genevan mouse (Beza), the Genevan Version, the Bishops' Bible, and to Wiclif. The New Testament appeared in 1582, at Rheims, and the Old Testament in 1609, at Douay. The production is very scholarly, in fact, equal to that of any version extant at the time, and on that very account utterly useless as a translation. It is designedly literal, and its English so utterly unenglish, that it might pass for Latin; e.g., (Matt. i. 17) "transmigration of Babylon," (vi. 11) "supersubstantial bread," (xvi. 26) "what permutation," (Mark v. 35) "arch-synagogue," (xv. 46) "wrapped him in the sindon," (Luke xxii. 7) "the day of the Azymes . . . the pasche," (John vii. 5) "Scenopogia was at hand," (Rom. i. 30) "odible to God," (1 Cor. x. 11) "written to our correction," (xi. 4) "dishonesteth his head," (Phil. ii. 7) "exinanited himself" (Philem. 6) "evident in the agnition," (Heb. vi. 7) "grasse commodious," (ix. 23) "exampplers of the celestials," (xiii. 16) "God is promerited," (Jas. iii. 4) "with a litle sterne whither the violence of the director wil," (iii. 6) "the wheels of our natiuity," (1 John iv. 3) "every spirit that dissolueth Jesus," (Rev. xxii. 14) "blessed are they that wash their stoles." This new beatitude may have been necessary in certain monasteries, but cannot be accepted by the Latin Church; for many copies of the Vulgate add, "in sanguine Agni." The version is nevertheless meritorious in other respects, notably in the uniformity of its renderings (e.g., of Amen, Rabbi, charity, multitude, work); but not a word of commendation can be said of the notes, which are truly savage. Lord Bacon liked this version. It is proper to add that the modern editions are less unenglish and less furious. See Vulgate New Testament with the Douay Version of 1582, London, 1881. See also below in Miscellaneous.

11. The Authorized Version. — At the Hampton Court Conference (1604) the demand of Reynolds for a new translation was really the starting-point which eventuated, mainly through the king's dislike (pretended or real) of the Genevan, in the Authorized Version,—the work (in all) of fifty-four scholars (forty-seven on the list), divided into six companies, of which two met at Westminster, two at Oxford, and two at Cambridge, for the space of three years; after which six men, two from each place, met in London to superintend the publication. Bilson, Bishop of Winchester, who wrote the arguments of the several books, and Dr. Miles Smith, who wrote the noble preface, were the final correctors. The preface states, among many other matters, that their object was to make of many good translations a principal good one, to avoid extremes, and produce uniformity of rendering. "Never was a great enterprise like the production of our Authorized Version, carried out with less knowledge handed down to posterity of the labourers, their method, and order of working" (Scrivener, Introd. to Cambridge Paragraph Bible). It was published in 1611; and a number of years elapsed before its intrinsic superiority and merits drove all other English translations out of the field. Taken as a whole, it is the best and most truly English version. Couched in noble language, it abounds in felicities. It is musical, dramatic, and even tragical. It is, in turn, pathetic and sublime, and has, withal, a directness and force which commend it to all classes and conditions of men. But it is far from perfect; and wherein, in the opinion of many of its most ardent admirers, it should be made to conform more thoroughly and consistently with the original Scriptures remains to be briefly indicated under the following heads, preparatory to the Anglo-American revision:—

(1) The critical apparatus at the command of the translators of King James's Version was that already noticed in the earlier portions of this article, to which must be added, for the Old Testament, the Latin translations of the Hebrew by Arius Montanus (1572) and Tremellius (extended to the Apocrypha by his son-in-law, Francis Junius, 1579). They had likewise the translation of the Syriac New Testament by Tremellius, and of the Greek by Theodore Beza (London, 1593, 1597). For the Greek text of the New Testament they had Beza's edition of 1589, and the third edition of Stephens, with this result (following from the critical value, or rather want of value, of those Testaments), that many readings of the Authorized Version are unsupported by any known Greek manuscript, and that the Greek text they used, in more than a thousand cases, requires to be corrected by what is now known to be the true text (Professor Abbot's Paper in Anglo-American Bible Revision, New York, 1879). Of then existing critical versions (i.e., those made directly from the original) they had Luther, the Genevan-French (1587-88), the Italian by Diodati (1607), and the Spanish by C. Reynal (1569), and Valera's (1602).

(2) The improvements made upon former English versions, and their sources.—A critical examination of Isa. liii. shows, that, of forty-nine changes, about seven-eighths are due to the Genevan Version, two to Tremellius, two to Pagninus, that the Genevan is abandoned three times, and one rendering is independent (Westcott); to which I would add, that, in three instances, the Authorized Version returns to older English versions, that two renderings (comeliness, ver. 2, and griefs, ver. 4) are original, and in thirteen places the influence of Luther appears to me undeniable. In the New Testament the same scholar notes, that, in Romans, seventeen phrases are common to the Authorized Version and the Rhemish; in Heb. xiii. 1-16, of the twenty-three changes made, seven are due to Beza, or the Genevan, about seven to the Rhemish, two apparently suggested by the Syriac (Tremellius), and seven original or linguistic. Of thirty-seven alternative readings in Mark he found one-half to agree with the Genevan, or Beza, six with the Rhemish, three with the French, six with earlier English versions, and one each with Castalio and the Vulgate.

(3) Alleged blemishes requiring correction.—These are very numerous and diversified, and touch geography, proper names, mistakes of the meaning, grammar, archaisms, etc. For full and long lists and illustrations, impossible to supply here, see LITERATURE below.

The felicities of the Authorized Version are confessedly remarkable; e.g., (Gen. ii. 16) "Thou mayest freely eat," (xv. 2) "Seeing I go childless," (1 Chron. xi. 9) "David waxed greater and greater," and the now naturalized Hebraisms,

"God of peace," "Sun of righteousness," "Man of sin," "Man of sorrows," "Son of man," "Rock of ages," etc. The Saxon-English of the version is also striking. In the Lord's Prayer (Matthew) the sixty-five words exclusive of Amen consist of fifty-nine Saxon and six Latin ones. The first thirty-five are all Saxon in succession. Of the modern editions of the Authorized Version, those of Mant, and, as a rule, those published by the S. P. C. K., contain only authorized matter, which consists, besides the text, of 6,637 marginal notes in the Old Testament, 1,016 in the Apocrypha, and 765 in the New Testament; of the summaries of the contents of each chapter; and of nine thousand marginal references; viz., 6,588 in the Old Testament, 885 in the Apocrypha, and 1,527 in the New Testament. The chronological dates in the margin, and the chronological index at the end, were added by Dr. William Lloyd (d. 1717).

12. The Anglo-American Revision.—The action taken by the Convocation of Canterbury in February, 1870, and eventuating in the formation of a committee (consisting of two companies, one for the Old, the other for the New Testament) for the revision of the Bible in England, beginning their work June 22, 1870, and of a similar committee (with two companies) in America, beginning work Oct. 4, 1872, has culminated thus far in the publication, on May 17, 1881, of the first fruits of their joint labors; viz., The New Testament of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, Translated out of the Greek. Being the Version set forth A.D. 1611 Compared with the most ancient authorities, and Revised A.D. 1881. The whole number of the English revisers in 1880 amounted to fifty-two,—twenty-seven in the Old-Testament company (Dr. Browne, Bishop of Winchester, chairman), and twenty-five in the New-Testament company (Dr. Ellicott, Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol, chairman). The whole number of the American revisers amounted in 1880 to twenty-seven,—fourteen in the Old-Testament company (Professor Dr. Green, chairman), and thirteen in the New-Testament company (ex-President Dr. Woolsey, chairman, and Professor Dr. Schaff, President, of the American Revision Committee). More than two-thirds of the English revisers belong to the Church of England: the remainder are representatives of other churches. The American revisers represent the different Protestant churches. And all the revisers, both in England and America, are eminent biblical scholars. The general principles on which the revision is made are: 1. The least possible changes in the text of the Authorized Version consistent with fidelity; 2. To be expressed, if possible, in the language of the Authorized and earlier English versions; 3. To be twice revised; 4. The text to be adopted to be that sustained by preponderating evidence, and the changes to be noted in the margin; 5. Textual changes to be made by simple majorities on the first revision, by two-thirds majorities on the second; 6. The voting on changes causing discussion to be deferred to the next meeting, if required by one-third of the revisers present; 7. Headings of chapters, pages, paragraphs, Italics, and punctuation to be revised; 8. Reference, when desirable, to other experts, at home or abroad, for their opinion. The principles regulating the American co-operation are substantially as follows: "The English revisers to send their revision to the American revisers, to consider the American suggestions, to furnish them with copies of the revision in its final form before publication, and to allow them to present in an appendix remaining differences of reading and rendering of importance not adopted by the English revisers." The result, thus far, of this harmonious union and co-operation, is the Revised New Testament, which is unquestionably a most faithful and noble English version, and equal to any version of the sacred original, for the following reasons:—

(1) Its text, i.e., the Greek, is the purest extant, based on the authority of documentary evidence without deference to any printed text of modern times; which imports that only the most ancient and authentic manuscripts, versions, and patristic quotations were received, and diligently compared by competent experts, and their united testimony required for the adoption of any, even the minutest, integral portion of the sacred volume. The readers of the new revision have the undoubted assurance that the Greek text from which it has been translated has been verified, as far as human learning and fidelity could verify it, as the word of God. What the revisers rejected from the text had been added by careless or designing transcribers, what they received into it had been omitted by them. No version rests on a purer text.

(2) Its translation is a marvel for fidelity, accuracy, elegance, purity of idiom, and harmony of expression. Some of its noblest features depend for their full appreciation on the publication of the Old Testament. The changes introduced are fivefold: 1. Those required by change of reading in the Greek text; e.g., (1 Pet. ii. 21) "Christ also suffered for you, leaving you an example." 2. Where the Authorized Version appeared to be incorrect; e.g., (1 Cor. xi. 34) "that your coming together be not unto judgment." 3. The removal of ambiguous or obscure renderings; e.g., (Matt. xvi. 23) "thou art a stumbling block unto me." 4. The removal of inconsistent renderings; e.g., (1 Cor. xv. 27, 28) "For He put all things in subjection under his feet. But when he saith, All things are put in subjection, it is evident that he is excepted who did subject all things unto him. And when all things have been subjected unto him, then shall the Son also himself be subjected to him that did subject all things unto him, that God may be all in all." 5. Changes made necessary by consequence (see Preface). The grammatical inaccuracies of the Authorized Version have been removed; e.g., (Matt. ii. 4) "The Christ;" (1 Tim. iv. 10) "a root of all evil;" (Acts xix. 2) "did ye receive . . . when ye believed?" (v. 30) "whom ye slew, hanging him on a tree;" (Matt. xxviii. 19) "baptizing them into the name;" (Rom. viii. 7) "the mind of the flesh . . . the mind of the Spirit;" (Matt. xxvii. 44) "cast upon him the same reproach." Such archaisms as "anon," "offend," "scrip," "an eight days," "highest room," "lewd," "carriages," "profited," "proper," etc., used in senses now unintelligible, have been corrected by proper words. Consistency has been introduced in the rendering of proper names by the uniform preservation of one word for the same person or place.

Technical expressions, such as "deputy," "chief of Asia," "executioner," and "chamberlain," have been corrected by more appropriate terms. Some improvements have been made in the rendering of terms denoting coins. The adoption of "Hades" (e.g., Acts ii. 27) in place of "hell" is a great gain. The marginal notes are very valuable, and embody a vast amount of learning, and frequently shed light on the changes recommended by the American revisers (many of which are uncommonly well taken), but not adopted in England. Italics are used sparingly, and the combination of the paragraph system with that of the familiar division of chapters and verses is a decided improvement; but the preface does not explain the entire disappearance of the headings of chapters and pages, which, under their principles, the revisers were required to revise, not to discard. The same remark applies to the parallel references. The metrical arrangement of quotations from the poetical books of the Old Testament, etc., is a great aid to the right understanding of the sacred text, which is likewise facilitated by the system of judicious and consistent punctuation which marks this revision. Taken as a whole the unprejudiced reader of this English version enjoys the unspeakable privilege of reading the pure and true word of God in his mother-tongue, so faithfully rendered that he is virtually placed in the same position which was enjoyed by those to whom the New Testament came originally in Greek. It is a noble translation, destined to win its way into the hearts of all lovers of the word of God, who are under the greatest possible obligations to the noble company of learned and devoted men who have spent so many years on its production.

13. Miscellaneous.—During the short reign of Edward VI. there were published, in 1547, an edition of the New Testament in English and Latin Of Mayster Erasmus' Translacion with the Pystles taken out of the Old Testament, and altogether thirty-five editions of the New Testament, and thirteen of the whole Bible, distributed as follows: three of Coverdale (two in 1550, one in 1553), seven of Cranmer's Bible, and eight of the New Testament, five of Matthew's, two of Taverner (1549–51), twenty-four editions of Tyndale's or Matthew's New Testament; further, the Worcester edition of the New Testament sold by royal order at twenty-two pence, and, besides the Latin-English New Testament of 1547, two others with the paraphrase of Erasmus, translated by Nicholas Udall, 1548–49; that of 1548 ends with Hebrews, and the translator states, in the fulsome speech of the period, that the Princess Mary (of bloody memory) did part of John's Gospel; that of 1549 added Revelation in a translation of Leo Jude's paraphrase of that book. The fragment of Sir John Cheke's translation from the Greek (published by James Goodwin, B.D., London, 1843) belongs to this period (1550). It consists of Matthew (omitting the last ten verses), and twenty-one verses of Mark i., and is the most intensely Saxon version extant, made by a fine Grecian; e.g., he uses these words, wizants (wisemen), frosent (apostle), freshmen (proselytes), devild (possessed), crossed (crucified), mooned (lunatic), and toller (publican). The New Testament translated by Mace (1729) is an utterly undignified, if not vulgar and profane, production. The edition of the Authorized Version, containing for the first time the chronological dates (see Authorized Version) is known as Archbishop Tenison's of 1701. The Cambridge edition of the Bible by Dr. Paris (1762) and the Oxford edition by Dr. Blayney (1769) are important: the latter, on account of its great accuracy, is regarded as the standard in England. Dr. Scrivener's Cambridge Paragraph Bible (1873) is said to be the most accurately edited in the language. The Rheims New Testament was printed in a second edition, 1600, in a third at Douay, in 1621, and in a fourth, probably at Rouen, in 1633. The Old Testament appeared in a second edition in 1635. Among the later Roman-Catholic versions are prominent: (1) Nary's New Testament, 1719 (Dublin?), a vast improvement on the Rheims and Douay in tone and English; (2) Welham's New Testament, 1730-33 (Douay?); (3) Troy's Bible, Dublin, 1816, with very savage notes; (4) The Holy Bible, Dublin and London, 1825, in better English, but a very corrupt text; (5) A New Version of the Four Gospels by a Catholic (Dr. Lingard), 1836, by far the best of all, and on that account disparaged by Roman-Catholic writers, notably by Cardinal Wiseman.

14. LIT. — The enumeration of all the works would require many pages. Of those consulted, and containing the fullest information, the most important are, LEWIS: History of the Translations of the Holy Bible, etc., into English, etc., Lond., 1818; BAGSTER'S Hexapla, with an account of the Principal Eng. Translations, London, no date; ANDERSON: Annals of the English Bible, Lond., 1845, 2 vols., rev. ed., 1862, Am. ed., 1 vol., abridged and continued by Dr. Prime, N. Y., 1849; CONANT, MRS.: Pop. Hist. of the Translation of the Holy Scriptures, N. Y., 1856, revised ed. by Dr. Conant, N. Y., 1881; WESTCOTT: A General View of the History of the English Bible, London, 2d ed.; EADIE: The English Bible, London, 1876, 2 vols.; MOULTON: History of the English Bible, London, 1878; STOUGHTON: Our English Bible, London, no date; MOMBERT: The Versions of the Bible, vol. i., London and New York, 1882. On the revision, see especially the works of Bishop LIGHTFOOT, Archbishop TRENCH, and Bishop ELLICOTT, Am. ed. in 1 vol. with introduction by Dr. SCHAFF, N. Y., 1873; also Anglo-American Bible Revision, by members of the American Revision Committee, Phila. and New York, 1879; B. II. ENNODIUS, Magnus Felix, b. at Arles about 473; d. at Pavia, July 17, 521; belonged to a distinguished but poor Gallic family; lost his parents very early, and was educated at Milan by an aunt, who died 489, and left him nearly destitute. Having made a rich match, he lived, as it seems, only to enjoy himself, when a severe sickness awakened him to serious reflections. His wife entered a nunnery, and he was ordained a deacon: as such, he accompanied Bishop Epiphanius of Pavia on his mission to the Burgundian King Gundebaud (494), and, two years later on, he distinguished himself in Rome by an apology for Pope Symmachus and a panegyric of Theodoric.

By Pope Hormisdas he was made Bishop of Pavia, and as such he was twice sent as ambassador to Constantinople (515 and 517). His works (consisting of some poems, a number of letters, the panegyric of Theodoric, the defence of Symmachus, a life of Bishop Epiphanius, etc.) were first printed at Basel, 1569, Tournay, 1610, Paris, 1611 (best edition), and afterwards often, also in MIGNÉ, Patrol. Lat., vol. 63. They have no æsthetical merits, and only small historical interest: they show that in theology he was a semi-pelagian, and with respect to church-polity an ardent champion of the Papal supremacy. He was the first who addressed the Bishop of Rome as papa.

ENOCH (initiator, or initiated). There are several of this name mentioned in the Old Testament (Gen. iv. 17, and, in the Hebrew text, xxv. 4, xlvi. 9; and Exod. vi. 14); but the only one of any interest is the son of Jared and the father of Methusaleh (Gen. v. 18, 21-24). He "walked with God," a phrase expressive of constant companionship, an undisturbed, intimate intercourse with God; and so, at the age of three hundred and sixty-five years (very young for an antediluvian), suddenly he was not, for God took him. His disappearance was, in the antediluvian age, the striking evidence of immortality, just as Elijah's was to his age, and Christ's resurrection is to us. Men may have looked for him, as they did subsequently for Elijah (2 Kings ii. 16), but as vainly. He had gone, not to return. He had been translated. In the absence of biblical information, speculation has been active. According to the majority of the rabbins and the fathers he was taken to paradise, although some put him in heaven, and others in the seventh heaven. A parallel to Enoch's translation will be that of the saints who are alive at the second coming of Christ (1 Thess. iv. 17; 1 Cor. xv. 51). In the Epistle to the Hebrews, Enoch's walk with God is regarded as a triumph of faith (Heb. xi. 5).

Tradition has made of Enoch not only a preacher of repentance, and prophet of judgment, which indeed is very likely, but also (as "Enoch" may mean the initiated) a sage acquainted with divine secrets by reason of his walk with God, the transmitter of the true γνώσις in contradistinction to the knowledge which demons had brought into the world, and the inventor of writing and the sciences, particularly astronomy. Finally, in the century before Christ, a book was attributed to him, in which all the knowledge then attained about God, nature, and history, was by a fiction transferred to him. A quotation is made from it in Jude 14. See Enoch, Book of, in art. Pseudepigraphs of the Old Testament, and A. DILLMANN, Das Buch Henoch, Leipzig, 1853. Among the Arabs, Enoch or Idris (the learned), as he is more commonly called, plays the rôle of a medium of the higher knowledge and science.

The heathen myths of the assumption of Hercules, Romulus, and others, are not in point; because the ground for the translation of Enoch was his relations with God, while the legends rest upon a naturalistic conception of divinity, which merges the gods with the highest human development. Much nearer to the biblical account is the Babylonian Xisuthrus in the history of Berosus, who indeed corresponds to Noah, but who was after the flood translated, and was sought for until his voice was heard announcing, that, on account of his piety, he had been removed to dwell among the gods. In the cuneiform inscriptions he is called Ardrakbasis, and was with his wife taken away to live as the gods in a remote place at the mouth of the rivers. [See GEORGE SMITH: The Chaldean Account of Genesis, ed. Sayce, pp. 288, 309.] Another supposed parallel to the Bible Enoch is King Annakos, or Nannakos, who is said to have lived three hundred years before the Deukalion flood, and to have prophesied with tears the overthrow of the race after his death. But this story comes through Zenobius (200 A.D.), who borrowed freely from Didymus of Alexandria (30 A.D.); and it is therefore extremely probable, as the similarity of names would itself indicate, that the story is really derived from Jewish sources.

An endeavor has been made to identify Enoch with the Latin Janus, the god of the new year, because the year has 365 days, and he had 365 years; but it remains only an endeavor. See the commentaries and Bible histories and Bible dictionaries upon Enoch; [BARING-GOULD: Legends of the Patriarchs and Prophets, American reprint, N. Y., pp. 85-91].

VON ORELLI.

ENTHUSIASM (from ἐνθουσιάζω, filled or inspired by God) is an intense moral impulse or all-engrossing temper of mind. There is an enthusiasm for popular freedom and for art, for the emancipation of the slaves and for conquest. The term as applied to religion designates both a noble temper of mind and moral fervor (expressed by the apostle as a "being zealously affected in a good cause"), and also a misdirected and even destructive intensity of feeling.

The distinction between genuine and morbid enthusiasm will often depend upon the nice discrimination of a keen judgment, or the moral stand-point of the critic, as in the case of that ridicule which is by some applied to all religious workers or philanthropists who have undergone hardship, or even death, in the service and for the benefit of others; as in the case of monasticism, and of the apostles on the Day of Pentecost, who were said by some to be drunken (Acts ii. 13).

Enthusiasm is the quality without which the best in any department cannot be reached, nor the largest amount of results achieved. It is also a quality, which, controlled by ignorance, or misapplied, although conscientiously it may be, may work great harm.

In the better sense of the term, our Lord was the highest illustration of enthusiasm. His soul was possessed with overwhelming affection for men, and an intense impulse to help them. The apostles were enthusiasts in a good sense; being constrained by an overwhelming desire to preach the gospel, and ready to show it by suffering and death. The early monks, St. Francis of Assisi, Dominic, Hus, the Reformers, the early Methodists, and the present missionaries in foreign lands, are also examples of religious enthusiasm. Heathen religions have had their enthusiasts, as well as the Christian.

Christian enthusiasm in the good sense is derived from two motives, — love for men (brought out in a strong way by the author of Ecce Homo) and love for Christ. The New Testament combines both these motives in the labors and heroism of the apostles, the greatest of whom, however (St. Paul), attributes his enthusiasm prevailing to the love for Christ (Phil. i. 21, "To me to live is Christ; 2 Cor. v. 14, "The love of Christ constraineth us").

In the bad sense, enthusiasm is almost synonymous with fanaticism, and enthusiasts with zealots. It is fervor of soul drawn from wrong principles, founded on wrong judgments, and applied to wrong ends. Neither selfish nor impure motives necessarily prevail in such a temper of mind, and zeal of activity. Such enthusiasm may proceed from a sincere desire to glorify God. It substitutes fancies for the truth, and in its last stages the disorder of the mind becomes mental insanity. Warburton defines enthusiasm in this second sense as that "temper of mind in which the imagination has got the better of the judgment" (Div. Leg., V., Appendix).

The term "enthusiasts" has also had a technical sense, as in the Elizabethan period. Jewel, Rogers (Thirty-nine Articles, p. 158, Parker Soc. ed.), and others speak of Enthusiasts as they do of Anabaptists. During the Commonwealth period, and afterwards, the term was frequently applied to the Puritans in a tone of depreciation, as notably by Robert South, who preached a special sermon on the subject, "Enthusiasts not led by the Spirit of God," meaning by enthusiasts the Puritans. See ISAAC TAYLOR: Natural Hist. of Enthusiasm, 9th ed., Lond., 1843.

ENZINAS, Francisco de (Dryander, Duchesne, Van Eyck, Eichman, translations of the Spanish name "oakman"), b. at Burgos, 1520; d. at Geneva, 1570; studied in Italy, afterwards at Louvain and Wittenberg; embraced the Reformation; was arrested at Brussels (1543), escaped to England (1545), and lived afterwards on the Continent, — at Strassburg, Basel, and Geneva. He translated the New Testament into Spanish, and dedicated it to Charles V. — His brother, Jaques de Enzinas, also embraced Protestantism, and was burnt at the stake in Italy, 1546.

EON, or EUDO DE STELLA, an enthusiast in the middle of the twelfth century, and probably connected with the Cathari; was b. in Bretagne, and was, by the words which he once heard in the church ("per eum qui venturus est judicare vivos et mortuos"), led to believe that he ("Eon") was meant by that eum. Preaching, prophesying, and working miracles, he roved about in Bretagne, and much people gathered around him, and were seduced by him. In 1145 the papal legate, Cardinal Albericus of Ostia, preached against him at Nantes; then Archbishop Hugo of Rouen wrote a book against him, Dogmatum christianæ fidei Libri Tres (found in Bibl. Patr. Maz., Lyons, T. XXII.); and finally troops were sent against him. Several of his adherents were burnt in the diocese of Alet, while he himself retreated into Guyenne. In 1148 he appeared in Champagne, but was caught, together with a number of his disciples. When placed before the synod of Rheims, and asked by Pope Eugenius III. who he was, he answered, "Is qui venturus est judicare vivos et mortuos." The synod declared him crazy, and ordered him shut up in a dungeon: his followers were burnt, and very soon all trace of his sect disappeared.

EPAON, The Council of, was held in 517 in a town of Burgundy whose site cannot be identified any more. It was called by Avitus, Bishop of Vienne, and Viventolus, Bishop of Lyons, and attended by twenty-four bishops. On Sept. 14, 517, they subscribed forty canons, mostly of a disciplinary character, regulating the relations of bishops, priests, and monks. Canon 4 forbids bishops, priests, and deacons to keep hawks or dogs for hunting; canon 9 forbids an abbot to preside over two monasteries; canons 15, 16, 29, and 33 concern heretics, and forbid Catholic clergymen to eat at the same table with a heretic, etc.; canon 26 forbids any altar not of stone to be consecrated with chrism, etc. See LABBE: Dissertatio philosophica de Concilio Epavensi; MANSI: Con. Coll., VIII. 319-342, 347-372, 555-574.

EPARCHY (ἐπαρχία) denoted originally a merely political division, being the official administrative name of a province. It consisted of counties, and formed part of a diocese. This scheme of secular administration was afterwards followed by the organization of the church; so that the head of a county community became a bishop, the head of an eparchy a metropolitan, and the head of a diocese a patriarch. At the time of the Council of Nicæa (325) this organization and its terminology were fully developed.

EPHESIANS, Epistle to the. See PAUL.

EPHESUS, renowned as a seat of heathen rites, and conspicuous in the history of early Christianity, was an opulent city on the western coast of Asia Minor. It was advantageously situated on the fertile banks of the Cayster, and built partly on the plain, and partly on the hills, of which Prion and Coressus were the two principal ones. It was on the direct road to Sardis. To the south of it, on the Mæander, lay Miletus; at an equal distance to the north, Smyrna, on the Hermus. The city was colonized as early as the eleventh century, by Androclus, the son of the Athenian king, Codrus. It soon became famous as a mart and hostelry, the harbor affording ample shelter for ships. Asiatic elements mixed on its streets with Greek influences, and colored the social life. The city came successively under subjection to Cræsus, the Persians, the Macedonians, and the Romans. In 262 A.D. it was destroyed by the Goths. Although rebuilt, it never regained its former glory. The ravages of time and the ruthlessness of man have secured its total desolation. A squalid village, containing only twenty regular inhabitants (Wood's Ephesus, p. 14), occupies, in mockery of human magnificence, the ancient site, but in its name Ayasaluk (a corruption of ἅγιος θεολόγος, "holy theologian") retains a reminiscence of the Evangelist John, and the early Christian congregations.

Temple of Diana.—That which made Ephesus most famous was the celebrated Temple of Diana. It was reputed one of the seven wonders of the world, and was visited from all parts of Greece. The divinity was primarily an Asiatic goddess, and seems to have had little in common with the fair huntress. She was represented swathed like a mummy, her bosom covered with breasts,—a symbol of fertility, or a type of the many fountains which bubbled up on the Ephesian plain (GUIL). Her statue was believed to have fallen from heaven (Acts xix. 35). In 356, on the night of Alexander's birth, the temple was burned down. The Ephesians immediately set to work with great enthusiasm to rebuild, the women of the city contributing their ornaments. The structure was erected on a magnificent scale, and when completed was regarded as the most perfect work of Ionic architecture. The priestesses that ministered at the fane were virgins, and the priests celibates. When the Goths ravaged the city (262 A.D.), they spared not the temple. Some of its graceful columns are said to be incorporated in the Church of St. Sophia. But the very site of the magnificent structure was completely obliterated by the detritus of the river, and remained a mystery until the important discoveries of Mr. J. T. Wood (1863-74). Its dimensions were four hundred and twenty-five by two hundred and twenty feet. The roof was sustained by a hundred and twenty-seven columns sixty feet high.

Ephesus and the Christian Church.—The city early became one of the most conspicuous scenes of apostolic labors. The Church was distinguished by having St. Paul for its founder, St. John for its counsellor, and Timothy for its bishop. To it St. Paul addressed one of his Epistles, which abounds in references to the temple and theatre of the city. The congregation was fully organized at an early date, as is evident from the presbyters who bade Paul farewell at Miletus (Acts xx. 24 sqq.), and its mention as the first among the churches of Asia Minor (Rev. ii. 1). Here St. John spent his last years (Eusebius), and was probably stirred up to write his Gospel by the indications of heretical sentiments here manifesting themselves. Here Apollos first preached (Acts xviii. 24-28); and here the third oecumenical council met, which defined the doctrines of the Church over against Nestorius. Before passing away from the history of Christianity in Ephesus, it is proper to make a more specific mention of the labors of St. Paul in the city. His first visit was on his return from the second missionary tour. He was then accompanied by Priscilla and Aquila. On his second visit he made a sojourn of two or three years (Acts xx. 31). After preaching in the synagogue, he went to the school of Tyrannus. His preaching was so effective, that many brought their books of magic, to which the city was addicted (Acts xix. 12), and made a bonfire of them; and it interfered so materially with the superstitious traffic in silver shrines (xix. 26), as to arouse the enmity of Demetrius and the craftsmen. A riotous popular tumult was excited, and the watchword rang through the city, "Great is Diana of the Ephesians;" but Paul himself escaped.

LIT.—The city is described at length in the Travels of POCOCKE, CHANDLER, SCHUBERT, FELLOWS, HAMILTON, etc. GUIL: Ephesiaca, Berlin, 1843; FALKENER: Ephesus and the Temple of Diana, Lond., 1862; WOOD: Discoveries in Ephesus, London and Boston, 1877 (an interesting and elegant volume); CONYBEARE and HOWSON: Life of St. Paul, ii. 80 sqq., Am. ed.; FARRAR: St. Paul, II. pp. 1-14. EPHESUS, Councils of. The third oecumenical council was held in St. Mary's Church, Ephesus, A.D. 431 (June 22–Aug. 31). It condemned the heresy of Nestorius, that Christ had two persons as well as two natures. It was convened by letters of Theodosius II. and Valentinian II. Cyril of Alexandria presided, and opened the meetings with a hundred and sixty bishops. The number was afterwards increased to a hundred and ninety-eight. Nestorius was cited, but refused to appear until all the bishops had arrived, some of whom, like John of Antioch, were delayed. In the mean time, his heresy was denounced, and himself excluded from the episcopal office, and from all sacerdotal fellowship.

The so-called Robber Council was convened by Theodosius in 449. It was first so denominated by Leo, Bishop of Rome (Epist. 95), on account of the partisan and overbearing demeanor of the presiding officer, and the use of violence in the introduction of soldiery. Dioscuro of Alexandria, a man of hierarchical temper and inordinate ambition, presided. A hundred and thirty-five bishops were present. The council restored Eutyches, who had been deposed by the synod of Constantinople (448). Flavian, Patriarch of Constantinople, was deposed from his office for the hand he had taken in the deposition of Eutyches. All efforts to express dissent were brutally checked. Hilary, Deacon of Rome and papal delegate, one of the dissidents, only narrowly escaped with his life; while Eusebius, Bishop of Dorylæum, the accuser of Eutyches, lost his through the violence of the soldiery. The decisions of this scandalously conducted council were reversed by the Council of Chalcedon (451).

EPHESUS, The Seven Sleepers of. This legend gained currency very early, and was adopted in the Koran. Seven Ephesian youths of noble extraction, in the persecutions of Decius (249–257), concealed themselves in a cave which was ordered by the authorities to be sealed up. They fell into a slumber which lasted for a hundred and eighty-seven years. Some of the stones being removed from the entrance, a ray of light was admitted. Awakening, as from a night's sleep, they sent one of their number (Jamblichus) into the city to buy bread. The obsolescence of his dress, and the antiquity of the coin which he offered to the baker, no more startled the inhabitants than the change in the aspect of the city confounded himself. The facts becoming known, the bishop and magistrates of the city visited the cavern. After conferring their blessing, the Seven Sleepers immediately expired. See the story well told, GIBBON'S Rome, Am. ed., iii. 383 sq.

EPHOD. See HIGH PRIEST.

EPHRAËM, generally called Ephrem Syrus, is the most prominent of the fathers of the Syrian Church in the fourth century, and the greatest orator and hymn-writer produced by that church.

Life.—Besides the so-called confession of Ephraëm (existing both in Greek and in Armenian) and his testament (existing both in Syrian and Greek), we have a panegyric of him by Gregory of Nyssa (written shortly after his death, and found both among Gregory's works and in the first volume of the Roman edition of Ephraëm's Greek works), and an elaborate life of him (Acta Ephraëmi), written in Syriac, and found in the third volume of the Roman edition of his Syrian works. All these materials are very unreliable, however. They contradict each other, and are full of legendary matter. In modern times his life has been written by Zingerle, in the first volume of his translation, and by Alsleben, Berlin, 1853.

Ephraëm was born in the beginning of the fourth century, according to a notice in his commentary on the Genesis (Op. Syr. l. 23), in Mesopotamia; according to Sozomen (Hist. Eccl., III. 16) and the Syrian biography, at Nisibis. He was educated by Bishop Jacob of Nisibis, and seems to have accompanied him to the Council of Nicæa (325). When, in 363, the Emperor Jovian surrendered Nisibis to the Persians, Ephraëm moved first to Amid, the native place of his mother, and then to Edessa, at that time the centre of Syrian learning. He settled among the anchorites in a cave outside the city, adopted a life of severe asceticism, and devoted himself wholly to theological study and authorship. Now and then he appeared among the people; and his hymns and polemical speeches, directed against the Chaldaean astrologers, against Bardesanes and Harmonius, the Arians and Sabellians, Apollinaris, Marcion, etc., made a deep impression, and obtained a lasting influence. Later writers (Assemani, Bibl. Orient., IV. 924) tell us that he founded a school in Edessa; and it is, at all events, certain that he had pupils, and among them some of great celebrity. A tradition reports that he visited Egypt, and staid there eight years; another, that he visited Basil the Great at Casarea. He died during the reign of Valens, either 373, or 375, or 378.

Works.—Ephraëm was a very prolific author; but of his numerous writings only a part exists in the original Syrian text, and the rest in Greek, Latin, Armenian, and Slavic translations. A complete list of his writings is given by J. S. ASSEMANI, in Bibl. Orient., I. 59–164, and in the preface to the Roman edition of his Greek works. See also WRIGHT: Catalogue of Syriac Manuscripts in the British Museum, 3, 1271. The Slavic translations from his works were edited by J. P. Kohl, Moscow, 1701; the Armenian, by the Mekhitarists, Venice, 1836. The principal edition of the Syrian and Greek texts is that which appeared in Rome in 6 vols. fol., 1732–46, under papal authority.—3 vols. Greek text, with Latin translation, edited by J. S. Assemani, and 3 vols. Syrian text, also with Latin translation, edited by Petrus Benedictus and S. E. Assemani.

It is doubtful whether or not Ephraëm himself understood Greek; but it is quite certain that those of his works which have come down to us only in a Greek version are translations. Sozomen says that the works of Ephraëm were very early translated into Greek, even in the lifetime of the author; and this statement is corroborated by the fact that Chrysostom and Jerome were acquainted with them. They consist of sermons, homilies, and tracts, exegetical, dogmatic, and ascetic. Photius mentions (Bibl. Cod., 196) that he knew fifty-two such productions by Ephraëm, and had heard that there existed more than a thousand. In many churches in the East they were read aloud during service, after the Bible recitals; and they seem to have attained the same honor in the Western Church. Translations into Latin were early made. Small collections of Ephraëm's discourses translated into Latin circulated in the fifteenth century. The first larger collection (in 3 vols. fol.) was given by Gerhard Vossius, Rome, 1589, and reprinted in 1593 and 1598. It contains 171 pieces, of which only one was translated directly from the Syrian. Augmented editions of this collection appeared at Cologne (1603) and at Antwerp (1619). The first collected edition of Ephraëm's Greek works was given by Ed. Thwaites, Oxford, 1709. The best edition is Rome, 1732-46, 6 vols. folio, ed. by the Assemanis.

The existing Syrian works of Ephraëm consist of commentaries on the Pentateuch and most of the historical and prophetic books of the Old Testament. According to Ebed Jesu (Assemani, Bibl. Orient., III. 1, p. 62), he also wrote a commentary on the Psalms. Of his commentaries on the books of the New Testament, only an Armenian translation of that on the Pauline Epistles, and on Tatian's Diatessaron [for the latter see ZAHN: Forschungen zur Gesch. d. N.T. Kanons, Th. I., Erlangen, 1881, pp. 44 sqq., and Lit. below] have come down to us. The rest of his Syrian works, contained in the third volume of the Roman edition, consist of sermons, tracts, and hymns, all written in verse; that is, in lines of an equal number of syllables, grouped together in strophes, and adorned with rhymes and alliterations. The poetical form was, no doubt, adopted as the one best suited to impress the popular mind. At times it becomes prolix and dry; at others it exhibits truly poetical beauties. Several Syrian works ascribed to Ephraëm still remain in manuscript; as, for instance, a world's chronicle from the creation to the birth of Christ, of which one manuscript is found in the library of the Vatican, another in the British Museum.

Of modern translations we mention one in Latin, by CAILLAU (Paris, 1832-35, 8 vols.), forming part of the Patres Selecti, PIUS ZINGERLE: Die heilige Muse der Syrer (Innsbruck, 1830-38), and Ausgewählte Schriften des heiligen Ephraem (Kempten, 1870-76); ANGELO PAGGI and FAUSTO LASSINO: Inni funebri di S. Efreim Siro (Florence, 1851); J. B. MORRIS: thirteen pieces on the Nativity (Oxford, 1847); II. BURGESS: Select Hymns and Homilies of Ephraem Syrus (London, 1853); [Evangelii concordantis expositio facta a sancto EPHRAEMO doctore Syro, in Latinum translata a R. P. Joanne Baptista Aucher, ed. G. Mœsinger, Venice, 1879].

EPICTETUS, one of the most imposing representatives of the stoic philosophy, was b. at Hieropolis, in Phrygia; lived afterwards in Rome, first as a slave in the house of Epaphroditus, then as a freedman, and teacher of philosophy, but was in 90 A.D., together with all the other stoical philosophers, expelled from Rome, and settled at Nicopolis, in Epirus, where he continued teaching, and finally died. He wrote nothing himself; but many of his teachings were taken down by his pupil, Flavius Arrianus, and are still preserved. They have a peculiar interest to the church-historian on account of the influence they exercised on Marcus Aurelius. The best edition of the works of Epictetus is that by Schweighäuser, Leipzig, 1799-1800, 6 vols. There are at least two English translations,—one by Elizabeth Carter (London, 1758, 4to, new revised ed. by Thomas W. Higginson, Boston, 1865), and one by George Long (London, 1876). The Enchiridion was translated by T. Talbot, and also by T. W. H. Rolleston, both London, 1881. See F. W. FARRAR: Seekers after God; Lives of Seneca, Epictetus, and Marcus Aurelius, London, 1868.

EPICUREANISM is the common name of a system of morality which represents happiness as the only true aim of human actions, and pleasure as the only true happiness of human life (eudæmonism). The metaphysics on which this system is based is necessarily materialistic, and often atheistic. Such, however, as it was expounded by its founder, Epicurus (342-270 B.C.), in his garden in Athens, the system seemed not only decent, but even attractive. It meant to lead its pupils to a quiet and frugal, but elegant and refined enjoyment of life; but when in the time of the Roman emperors, and again in the time of the English deists and the French encyclopedists, the metaphysical premises of the system were carried out to their last practical consequences, the system was found to lead its pupils into shameless debauchery and abject stupidity. See art. Moral Philosophy, also P. v. GIZYCKI: Ueber das Leben u. die Moralphilosophie d. Epikur, Berlin, 1879, 64 pp.; W. WALLACE: Epicureanism, London, 1880; E. PFLEIDERER: Eudæmonismus u. Egoismus, Leipzig, 1880.

EPIPHANIUS, Bishop of Constantia (the old Salamis of Cyprus), was b. in the beginning of the fourth century, at Besandirke, a village of Palestine, in the vicinity of Eleutheropolis, and educated among monks. He afterwards lived for some time in Egypt, also among monks, and founded, after his return to Palestine, a monastery in his native town, of which he became abbot. His fame for holiness brought him to the metropolitan chair of Constantia (367), and from that time he took an active part in the theological controversies of his age. He was present at a synod in Antioch (376), and at another in Rome (382), where the trinitarian questions were debated. He went to Palestine in 394 to crush the influence of the famous Origen, and to Constantinople in 403 for the same purpose. He died on board the ship on which he was returning from Constantinople to Constantia.

The life of Epiphanius fell in a period when monasticism—sprung from the martyr-inspiration of the primitive Church, and hailed by the age as a higher standard of virtue—spread rapidly in the East, but at the same time assumed a character of narrow hostility to all free theological investigation, always preferring a system of stiff dogmatical definitions to the life of a vigorous personal conviction. But the man's character was well suited to the demands of the time; and he, as well as his friends, considered it a great merit to spend a whole life in bitter opposition to the greatest genius the Eastern Church ever produced, without understanding him. He seems, however, to have discovered during his stay in Constantinople, — whither he went at the instance of Theophilus of Alexandria, and for the purpose of opposing Chrysostom, and through him Origen, — that he had in most cases been a tool only in other men's hands. He left the city abruptly and in a rage.

His principal works are, Πανάριον ("the drug-chest"), a description and refutation of eighty different heresies, confused and trivial, but of historical value, and Ἄγκυρωτός ("the anchor of faith"), a dogmatical work, much read in its time. A life of him by a friend was edited, together with his works, by Petau, Paris, 1822, 2 vols. fol. The best edition of his works is Diendorf's, Leipzig, 1859, 5 vols.; and of the Panaria by Oehler, Berlin, 1859-61, 3 vols. (4 parts). See GERVAIS: L'Histoire et la Vie de S. Epiphane, Paris, 1738; EBERHARD: Die Betheiligung des Epiphanius an dem Streite über Origenes, Treves, 1859; LIPSIVS: Zur Quellenkritik des Epiphanius, Vienna, 1865. SEMISCH.

EPIPHANIUS, Bishop of Pavia, was b. in that city (439) of noble descent, and educated for the Church. When he was eighteen years old he was ordained a sub-deacon, and in 466 he was unanimously elected bishop by the clergy and the people. After his accession to the episcopal dignity, he increased the severity of his asceticism: he took only one meal a day; he abstained altogether from flesh, from wine, from baths, etc. The same energy he also evinced in taking care of his diocese and the Church in general. He was one of those admirable Italian bishops, who, while the dissolution of the Western Empire was going on, rapidly and inevitably, stood like rocks in the midst of the confusion, breaking the surges. In the wars between Anthemius and Ricimer, Glycerius and Euric, Odoacer and Theodoric, he often succeeded in making peace between the combatants; and, when peace could not be made, he was always able at least to mitigate the evils of the combat. He died in 494. His life has been written by his successor, Ennodius, among whose works it is found. HERZOG.

EPIPHANIUS SCHOLASTICUS translated, at the instance of his friend Cassiodorus, the works on church history by Socrates, Sozomen, and Theodoret, from Greek into Latin; which translations, corrected, condensed, and connected with each other by Cassiodorus, formed the Historia Tripartita so famous in the middle ages. Epiphanius also translated the so-called Codex Encyclicus, a collection of synodal letters to the Emperor Leo I. in defence of the synod of Chalcedon, the commentary by Epiphanius, Bishop of Cyprus, on the Song of Songs, the commentary of Didymus on the Catholic Epistles, etc.

EPIPHANY (ἐπιφάνη, Tit. ii. 11, iii. 4), one of the oldest Christian festivals, originated in the Eastern Church, and opened the annual cycle of festivals, though it referred to the baptism of Christ rather than to his birth. It was generally held, however, by the Eastern Church, that the manifestation of Christ to man took place at his baptism, and not at his birth; and consequently his nativity was celebrated only as an introduction to his epiphany, which fell on Jan. 6. The separation of the two festivals did not take place until the latter part of the fourth century, according to a homily preached by Chrysostom in Antioch, Dec. 25, 386. It was also generally held in the Eastern Church, that, by his baptism, Christ imparted certain qualities to the waters, which made them a fit bath of regeneration; and consequently the Epiphany became a favorite term for baptism.

From the East the festival was introduced to the West. The first trace of it in the Western Church is the report, by Ammianus Marcellinus (XXI. 2), that Julian celebrated it at Vienne in 360. But its doctrinal basis was changed. It was referred, not to the manifestation of Christ to man in general, but to his manifestation to the heathens, to the Three Wise Men of the East, to the Three Holy Kings. It also lost favor as a term for baptism. Pope Leo I. opposed this custom as an "irrational novelty." On the whole, in the Western Church it never became more than an appendix to the Nativity; hence its familiar English name "Twelfth-Day."

EPISCOPACY. Under BISHOP will be found a discussion of the origin, functions, and relative position of the episcopal office. The design of this article is to give a concise statement of the views held on the subject by different Christian communions.

I. The Roman-Catholic Church holds to the divine origin and authority of Episcopacy. Its position was distinctly defined by the Council of Trent at its twenty-third session: "If any one saith that in the Catholic Church there is not a hierarchy instituted by divine ordinance, consisting of bishops, priests, and deacons, let him be anathema" (Canon vi.). Episcopacy is as essential to the Church as the sacraments. The Church cannot exist without it. The words of Cyprian (iv. Ep., 9), Ecclesia est in Episcopo ("The Church is in the Bishop"), concisely represent this view. The bishops are the immediate successors of the apostles (Apostolis vicaria ordinatione succedunt, Cyprian, Ep. 69 ad Flor.), and superior to the priests and deacons, not merely in extent of jurisdiction, but in the kind of grace and function. Ordination is a sacrament, and confers a special grace, which is permanent. The Pope, or Bishop, of Rome is at the head of the hierarchy of bishops, and is the immediate successor of St. Peter, upon whom Christ promised to rear his Church (Matt. xvi. 18, 19), and who was the first Bishop of Rome. All bishops are subject to him as the vicar of Christ, but their apostolical power is derived through consecration. The Vatican Decrees (Session iv.) assigned to the Roman pontiff authority over the "Universal Church," and above oecumenical councils. This limits the prerogative of the bishop materially, and is opposed to the view ably advocated by D'Ailly and Gerson in the fifteenth century and by Gallicanism, and adopted by the Old Catholics.

II. The Eastern Church holds likewise to the divine origin of Episcopacy, to the transmission of apostolic grace, and to apostolic succession; but it dissents from the Latin Church in refusing to recognize the Pope, whom it regards as an usurper, and to acknowledge any pontiff with supreme authority in the Church and over the bishops.

III. The Jansenist Church of Holland, and the Old Catholics, both agree with the Roman-Catholic Church on the question of Episcopacy, but differ from it in their allegiance to the Pope. The episcopate in Holland was received (in 1724) from Dominique Marie Varlet, Bishop of Babylon, then living in Amsterdam. Other Catholic bishops, on being applied to, refused the rite of consecration. Each new consecration ever since has been noticed by a special excommunication from Rome. The Old Catholics secured their orders from the Jansenists of Holland, the Bishop of Deventer consecrating Bishop Reinkens (Aug. 11, 1873), who subsequently consecrated Dr. Herzog, Bishop for Switzerland (Sept. 18, 1876); so that they preserve the apostolic succession.

IV. The Church of England and the Episcopal Church of the United States tolerate two classes of opinion,—the Anglo-Catholic or High Church view, and the Low or Broad Church view. 1. The Anglo-Catholic view of the episcopate is in essential particulars that of the Roman-Catholic Church. It does not recognize the superior authority of the Pope, as the vicar of Christ and the infallible successor of St. Peter, nor even place ordination among the sacraments. But it regards Episcopacy as indispensable to the very being of the Church, holds to the transmission of grace by the imposition of hands, and accepts apostolic succession. Bishops, as "being the successors of the apostles, are possessed of the same power of jurisdiction" (Blunt). They are, and have been from the time of the apostles, an order distinct from the priesthood and diaconate, and higher than both. Archbishop Laud (1633-45) was the most extreme representative of the jure divino right of Episcopacy. 2. The Low and Broad Church view regards the episcopate as desirable and necessary for the well being of the Church, but in no wise indispensable to its existence. The episcopal is not the only form of government with scriptural authority (if, indeed, it or any other be recommended by Scripture); but it is the one best adapted to forward the interests of Christ's kingdom among men. The best writers on this side agree that the episcopate developed out of the presbyterate, and that there are only two orders of the ministry in the New Testament,—presbyters and deacons. Dr. Lightfoot, Bishop of Durham, in his very scholarly and exhaustive discussion of the subject in his Christian Ministry (Com. on Philippians, pp. 180-267), says, "It is clear, that, at the close of the apostolic age, the two lower orders of the three-fold ministry were firmly and widely established; but traces of the episcopate, properly so called, are few and indistinct." . . . "The episcopate was formed out of the presbyteral order by elevation; and the title, which originally was common to all, came at length to be appropriated to the chief of them." And again he says, "The episcopate was formed out of the presbytery." The late Dean Stanley, in the chapter on the Clergy in his Christian Institutions, representing the same view, says (p. 210), "According to the strict rules of the Church derived from those early times, there are but two orders,—presbyters and deacons."

This view, which is also held by such men as Arnold, Alford, Jacob, and Hatch, was the view of the divines of the English Reformation. Cranmer, Jewel, Grindal, and afterwards Field ("The apostles left none to succeed them," Of the Church, vol. iv. p. vii.), defended Episcopacy as the most ancient and general form of government, but always acknowledged the validity of Presbyterian orders. (See this subject ably discussed by Professor Fisher, in the New-Englander, 1874, pp. 121-172.) Bishop Parkhurst looked upon the Church of Zurich as the absolute pattern of a Christian community; and Bishop Ponet would have abandoned even the term "bishop" to the Catholics (Macaulay, Hist. of Eng., vol. I. p. 39, Bost. ed.). Ecclesiastics held positions in the Church of England who had only received Presbyterian ordination. Such were Wittingham, Dean of Durham, and Cartwright, Professor of Divinity at Cambridge. It is doubtful whether any prelate of the English Church in Elizabeth's reign held the jure divino theory of Episcopacy. Two of the most elaborate defenders of the Low-Church view in the seventeenth century were Stillingfleet and Ussher, the latter representing the episcopate as only a presidency of the presbyters over his peers; yet the Episcopal Church re-ordains all ministers who have not been episcopally consecrated, but accepts priests of the Greek and Roman-Catholic Churches without re-ordination.

V. The Reformed Episcopal Church holds to an Episcopacy of expediency. "It adheres to Episcopacy, not as of divine right, but as a very ancient and desirable form of church polity" (Declar. of Principles, passed Dec. 2, 1873). Its founder and first bishop was Dr. Cummins, who had been assistant bishop of the Episcopal Church in Kentucky.

VI. The Moravian Church deserves separate and special mention, for three reasons. Its episcopate was active before the Reformation on the Continent and in England began; it is in the apostolic succession; and its bishopric in America antedates those of the Episcopal (1784) and Methodist (1784) denominations by forty years. The first Moravian bishop was consecrated in 1467, by the regularly ordained Waldensian Bishop Stephens. (See Wetzzer and Welte, Encyclop., ii. p. 65, and De Schweinitz, Moravian Episcopate, Lond., 1877.) The British Parliament, in 1749, recognized the validity of Moravian ordination. But the recent course of Bishop Stevens of Pennsylvania, in re-ordaining a Moravian presbyter, disparages the episcopate of this venerable body. This occurred in Philadelphia (Sept. 30, 1881), and was designed to give the applicant, to use Bishop Stevens's own language, "a more ample ordination." The Moravians, or, as they prefer to be called, the Brethren, recognize the ordination of other Christian bodies as valid, admitting presbyters at once into their ministry (Law Book of the Church, ix. 63).

VII. The Lutheran Church has for the most part abandoned Episcopacy. The bishops on the Continent, unlike the bishops in England, held aloof from the Reformation. In Germany one order of the ministry only is recognized. An officer with jurisdiction somewhat similar to that of bishop is called superintendent. The office is only one of expediency. The Lutheran Church in Sweden has bishops, the validity of whose orders a committee was appointed in 1874, by the convention of the Episcopal Church in the United States, to investigate. The convention has taken no further action. There is much doubt concerning the integrity of the succession. Lawrence Peterson was consecrated by Paul Justin, Bishop of Abo, in 1575 Archbishop of Upsala. The evidence for the validity of Justin's consecration is defective. But the confessions of the Swedish Church recognize the equality of the ministry. The bishops of the Church of Denmark have no claim whatever to apostolic succession, although the English bishops of India have recognized Danish ordination. Christian III. in 1536 imprisoned the old bishops; and the new ones whom he appointed were at first called superintendents, and ordained by Bugenhagen.

VIII. The Reformed Churches recognize two orders of the ministry,—presbyters and deacons. The bishops of the New Testament are regarded as identical with presbyters. They do not deny that Episcopacy as a matter of expediency is justifiable; but they do not concede either its divine origin, or the transmission of grace by the imposition of hands, or apostolic succession, in the Anglo-Catholic sense. (See Form of Government of Presbyterian Church, chaps. iii. v., etc.)

IX. The American Methodist church has an Episcopacy. It is neither diocesan nor hierarchic, but itinerant and presbyteral. The bishops constitute an "itinerant general superintendency," and are "amenable to the body of ministers and preachers," who may divest them of their office. They are not a distinct order of the clergy, but only presbyters. The Methodist Church cannot lay claim to apostolic succession, if it would. John Wesley, after having previously applied in vain to the Bishop of London to ordain preachers for America, himself ordained the first bishop, Thomas Coke, in 1784. The Evangelical Association and the Church of the United Brethren also have episcopates. Their bishops are only elected for a stated period, and not for life. For further information see the articles under these special heads. For literature, see arts. BISHOP, POLITY, and the Forms of Government and Confessions of the several communions. D. S. SCHIAFF.

EPISCOPAL CHURCH, The Protestant, in the United States of America. History.—The first known clerical representative of the Church of England in America was Albert de Prato, a learned mathematician, and a canon of St. Paul's, London, who visited St. John's, Newfoundland, in August, 1527. The next clergyman appeared after the Reformation, in connection with Frobisher's expedition of 1578. This was Woolfall, who landed in the Countess of Warwick's Sound, and celebrated the first English communion recorded in connection with the New World. In 1583 Sir Humphrey Gilbert proclaimed the order of the English Church and State in Newfoundland. In 1584, Sir Walter Raleigh commenced his unsuccessful attempt to colonize Virginia, where, in 1587, the clergyman attached to the Colony baptized Manteo, an Indian chief. About the same time he also baptized Virginia Dare, the first white Christian born in Virginia. In 1605

the expedition of Waymouth reached the coast of Maine, and explored the Kennebec, having on board a person who regularly performed the service of the Church of England. In 1607 the work of colonization was commenced, both in Virginia and New England. On the coast of Maine the passengers and crews of two ships, sent out under Popham and Gilbert, landed at Monhegan, Aug. 9, 1607 (O. S.). A sermon was preached, and the first New-England Thanksgiving was observed. A colony was commenced at the mouth of the Kennebec, where, until the spring of 1608, the chaplain (the Rev. Richard Seymour) regularly celebrated the service of the Church of England, which was familiar to the savage ear on that coast nearly twenty years before the arrival of "The Mayflower" at Plymouth. This colony attempted on the peninsula of Sabino was not successful, though scattered emigrants continued to pursue the fisheries on the adjacent coasts. In Virginia, however, the work of colonization, under Church-of-England leaders, went on without interruption, the minister being the Rev. Mr. Hunt. When the Leyden adventurers reached New England (in 1620), the Virginia Colony was an accomplished fact. On Christmas Day, 1621, the "most part" of the people at Plymouth desired to keep the festival, showing their attachment to the Church of England. Soon, however, they were outnumbered by fresh arrivals; and the majority of the people who landed elsewhere set up their standard against the church, which it was expected they would favor on reaching their new homes. Soon the scattered adherents of the Church of England found that they were not to be tolerated in Massachusetts; and New Hampshire, under Mason, became the chief resort of the persecuted who sought religious liberty, though the Rev. William Blackstone went to Rhode Island. In 1631 the church services were celebrated in New Hampshire by the Rev. Richard Gibson; and in 1640, at Portsmouth (the ancient "Strawberry Bank"), an Episcopal Church (the present St. John's) was duly organized, being the first Episcopal parish known on this continent. In 1662 the royal proclamation secured to churchmen in Massachusetts the nominal liberty to observe their own forms of worship, and in 1682 King's Chapel was organized at Boston. After this period, Church-of-England clergymen labored in various parts of New England; and, though bitterly opposed, they met with some success, especially in Connecticut, where, in 1722, Cutler (president of Yale College) and six others declared for episcopacy. During the colonial period the strength of the church advanced in New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, Georgia, and the Carolinas. Trinity Church, New-York City, was in existence as early as 1692. The Rev. William Veasey, formerly a Presbyterian minister, became the first rector; and the churchmen of New York appear to have acted on the belief that the Ministry Act of 1693 was designed for their exclusive benefit. In due time the church became an acknowledged power. In New Jersey also, under Lord Cornbury, the church practically enjoyed benefits that attend establishment. In Maryland, Virginia, and Georgia the church was formally established by law; and at one period the Vir-gians were almost exclusively Episcopalians. The church continued to grow, especially under the impetus given by the missionaries of the Venerable Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, organized in 1701; but at the Revolution, a large portion of the clergy being royalists, the congregations, to a great extent, were broken up, and their property dissipated. At the close of the war the church was a melancholy wreck. Nevertheless, the clergy who remained commenced the work of restoration, aiming especially to secure the episcopate, which many had desired to obtain during the colonial period. Before the evacuation of New York by the British, the Rev. Samuel Seabury had been recommended for the office, and was consecrated by the non-juring bishops at Aberdeen, Scotland, Nov. 14, 1784. The first meeting for organization was held at New Brunswick, N.J., in May, 1784. In September, 1785, another convention was held in Philadelphia, when the so-called "Proposed Book" was drawn up, and when the convention also framed and adopted a constitution for the church known as "The Protestant-Episcopal Church." At the convention held in Philadelphia the following June, the members not being satisfied with the consecration of Dr. Seabury, the Rev. Samuel Provoost, D.D., the Rev. William White, D.D., and the Rev. David Griffith, D.D., were chosen, and instructed to proceed to England, and obtain consecration. Feb. 4, 1787, Drs. White and Provoost were consecrated in Lambeth Chapel by the Archbishop of Canterbury, Dr. John Moore, Dr. Griffith failing to appear. Subsequently the Rev. James Madison, D.D., was consecrated, the succession being made threefold. At the triennial convention of 1789 the consecration of Bishop Seabury was recognized, thus securing the adhesion of New England. The convention adjourned to September, when the present Book of Common Prayer was adopted, and the church entered fully upon her independent career, under the leadership of the sagacious Bishop White, who stood the acknowledged head for a period of forty years.

Organization. — This church is organized on the primitive episcopal plan, embracing a system of dioceses; the ministry being composed of the threefold order of bishops, priests, and deacons. The first order comprehends both the diocesan bishops and the missionary bishops, home and foreign. Each diocesan has charge of a particular diocese, while the missionary bishop presides over a jurisdiction formed of one or more States or Territories, or parts thereof. A missionary bishop may be elected bishop of a diocese, but the diocesan cannot; though, in case his diocese is divided, he may decide which part he will retain. Many States form a single diocese, while others are divided into several. The Episcopal Church in the United States has no legal connection with the Church of England, being governed in accordance with a constitution, and a body of canons drawn up and approved by conventions of the bishops, clergy, and laity. The legislative body known as the General Convention is composed of the House of Bishops and the House of Clerical and Lay Deputies. The approval of both houses is necessary to render any act effective. The House of Bishops (which is the upper house, corresponding to the Senate of the United States) is composed of both the diocesan and missionary bishops; and the House of Clerical and Lay Deputies consists of an equal number of clergy and laity, elected by regularly organized diocesan conventions. This lower house admits delegates from missionary jurisdictions to a seat; and they also have a voice on matters in which they are specially interested, but have no vote. The upper house is presided over by the bishop senior in consecration, who also has charge of various interests affecting the general administration of the church. The presiding officer of the lower house is chosen by ballot. The General Convention meets triennially. The Diocesan meets annually; being composed of three lay delegates from each parish in union with the convention, in addition to the duly qualified parochial clergy. Recently the attempt has been made, with some degree of success, to introduce the provincial system, in accordance with which two or more dioceses may enter into a confederation for the purpose of promoting such particular objects as may not come within the range of either Diocesan or General Conventions. Such confederated dioceses may have a special council and an appellate court. Many dioceses are divided into convocations, whose chief work is to advance missions within their own boundaries. Lay representation forms a special feature of this church, in which respect it is unlike the Church of England.

Discipline. — The discipline of the church is administered in accordance with the canons expressly provided; and all classes of the bishops, clergy, and laity, must be presented and tried by their peers. The church at large has no appellate court; but an appeal may be taken to the General Convention.

Doctrine. — The doctrine of the church, as drawn from Holy Scripture, is incorporated in the Book of Common Prayer, and is expressed chiefly by means of the Apostles' and the Nicene Creed, together with thirty-eight of the Articles of the Church of England, modified to meet the condition of things in this country. In framing the Book of Common Prayer, the American Church, while affirming a general agreement with the Church of England, made certain departures. The Athanasian Creed is omitted. In the Apostles' Creed, the clause "He descended into hell" is made optional, as well as the use of the sign of the cross in baptism; while the Absolution is made declarative, instead of positive, and is left out of the office for the visitation of the sick. In various other respects the American Prayer-Book conforms better to the wants of the average mind. The office for the Holy Communion is generally regarded as more especially the work of Bishop Seabury, showing as it does, quite strongly, the influence of the Scotch Communion office. Yet, while decided in its teaching as respects the presence of Christ in the sacrament, its language is irrevocably opposed to the theory of an objective presence, as it is to consubstantiation; the worshipper being taught that Christ is truly present, but in a spiritual sense, and in a manner that has baffled all attempts at statement upon the part of the doctors of the Catholic Church. The baptismal office has been cited in support of that extreme view of "the washing of regeneration" which has been pushed to the border of the opus operatum; yet the bishops of the church, in 1870, put forth what is known as the "Declaration," affirming that the word "regenerate" is not used in the baptismal office so "as to determine that a moral change in the subject of baptism is wrought in the sacrament." The Articles, to which Bishop Seabury was strenuously opposed, as the Scotch Church had none, do not meet with universal approval. In substance they are orthodox, and in spirit thoroughly Protestant; still they are intended to be comprehensive. On Predestination and Free Will they seem to serve the purpose of both Calvinist and Arminian. Indeed, the entire doctrinal system of the Protestant-Episcopal Church is tolerant. The church has continued in the lines of reformation adopted by the Church of England, in opposition to the policy of many Protestants on the Continent; the intention being to embrace all of the laity who accept the Christian faith as contained in the Apostles' Creed, no one being debarred from communion on account of any opinion entertained in connection with the test questions of certain denominations. Accordingly the Episcopal Church embraces various schools of thought, ranging from the so-called Evangelical to the Sacramentarian, or from the Genevan to the advanced Oxford type. Yet the schools in the American Church are not always to be considered as identical with those passing under the same name in England. All phases of theological opinion undergo essential modification in passing from the English to the American Church. This is especially the case with respect to the Broad-Church type of thought, which, in the Protestant-Episcopal Church, often comprehends the liberal Evangelical and the high advocate of church order; being a feeling as well as a conviction, though it also includes the rationalist and the legendarian.

Institutions. — The institutions of the church are quite numerous, and the principal ones only can be mentioned. The foremost is the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society, founded in 1820, and incorporated in 1846. Its work extends throughout the United States, to Mexico, Africa, China, and Japan. The General Theological Seminary, situated in New-York City, was founded at about the same period as the Missionary Society. Its trustees are selected from all the dioceses. The American Church Missionary Society, the Evangelical Education Society, and the Evangelical Knowledge Society are of more recent origin, being devoted to the promotion of so-called evangelical interests. The Society for the Increase of the Ministry has a wider scope. Mention should also be made of the Free Church Association (devoted to the work of increasing the number of free sittings), the Church Congress, the Church Temperance Society, and the American Church Building-Fund Commission, with the Western Church Building Society. The colleges and theological seminaries number about twenty-five; Columbia and Trinity College holding the foremost rank. A Quarterly Review is published, together with twelve or more newspapers, several of which are influential and widely circulated.

Statistics. — At the present time (1882) the church numbers 65 bishops, 3,401 priests and deacons, 3,035 parishes, 1,229 missions, 391 candidates for orders, 340,841 communicants (being an increase of 3,739 over the previous year), 34,363 Sunday-school teachers, 304,952 Sunday-school scholars. Contributions for the year, though only partially reported, amount to $7,311,761.91. There are 48 dioceses, and 16 missionary jurisdictions.

EPISCOPAL CHURCH, Reformed. The English, unlike the Continental Reformation, was political in its origin. Henry VIII., casting off the yoke of the Pope of Rome, became himself the Pope of England. Thus released from ecclesiastical bondage, the English Church, under Edward VI., who was largely guided by Archbishop Cranmer, attained a much more intelligent conception of spiritual truth.

The Edwardian reformers compiled the First Book of Edward, but died before they had completed the Second. During Mary's reign the Church of England fell back into the superstition from which it seemed to have escaped; and the teachings of the Reformation, to use the language of Froude, "passed away like a dream." It was Elizabeth's policy to frame such a Liturgy as would satisfy and conciliate both her Roman-Catholic and Protestant subjects, and unite them in peaceable submission to the church and the throne. Such a Liturgy was published early in her reign, at a time when there was some hope of effecting a reconciliation with Rome, and as might be expected, was so constructed as to foster this hope. Later on, Elizabeth became greatly offended with the Pope; and the Articles of Religion, which were issued in 1571, were, as a consequence, uncompromisingly Protestant in their tone. The royal commissioners of 1669 failed in their effort to bring the Formulary back to the spirit of the Second Book of Edward.

The English Prayer-Book, being thus the offspring of compromise, contains within itself antagonistic elements; its ritual (which constitutes its educating power) looking towards Rome; its articles of faith, towards Geneva. As a consequence of this the Church of England has always contained within itself two manner of peoples, two schools or parties,—one asserting its Protestantism, the other claiming its affinity with Rome.

When the Church of England in the Colonies became the Protestant-Episcopal Church of the United States, these influences, which had been transmitted and perpetuated here, secured the retention of the same Formularies and Articles; and so the American Book of Common Prayer wears all the marks of the old compromise.

In the early part of the second quarter of the present century the Tractarian movement began at Oxford. It was an attempt to revive those Anglo-Catholic sentiments which had been largely developed by Archbishop Laud, and, after his time by the non-juring clergy. It counted among its chief promoters John Henry Newman, John Keble, and Dr. Pusey. They and their associates issued a number of publications known as Tracts for the Times, by means of which they succeeded in largely leavening the Church of England with Anglo-Catholic ideas. These ideas engendered the ritualistic views and practices now prevalent in the Church of England and the Protestant-Episcopal Church in this country. Newman and a number of others of the more advanced mediævalists subsequently united with the Church of Rome. It is estimated that by 1852 two hundred clergymen, and as many more laymen thus influenced, had abjured Protestantism.

This Romeward drift became shortly afterwards apparent in the Protestant-Episcopal Church in the United States; conspicuously so at the time of the ordination of the Rev. Arthur Carey in New York, July, 1843. This young man deemed the difference between the Protestant-Episcopal Church and the Church of Rome such as embraced no points of faith, doubted whether the Church of Rome or the Anglican Church were the more pure, considered the Reformation from Rome unjustifiable, and declared that he received the Articles of the Creed of Pius IV. so far as they were repetitions of the decrees of the Council of Trent. On the ground of these views the Rev. Drs. Hugh Smith and Henry Anthon protested against his ordination, but in vain. This event created a profound sensation in the Protestant-Episcopal Church, and rallied the Low-Church or Evangelical party to the defence of their now clearly endangered principles.

Thenceforth the antagonism between the two parties—the Low Church on the one side, and the High, with which the Ritualistic party affiliated, on the other—became increasingly distinct and pronounced; the latter grasping the organized machinery of the church in its domestic missionary work; and the former, in self-defence, organizing three societies,—one for publication, a second for missionary labor, and a third for ministerial education. The Low-Church party sought in this way to defend, conserve, and disseminate its principles.

These measures widened the chasm. Evangelical men became more and more restive as the purpose of the dominant party to mould and control the church in the interest of mediævalism became increasingly apparent. Discussions were had, conferences held. Particular attention began to be paid to the writings of the English reformers; and finally the conclusion was reached by many, that the root of the difficulties which beset the church was to be found in the Romanism latent in the Book of Common Prayer as a result of the Elizabethan compromise. Urged by this conviction, a movement was quietly set on foot looking toward the revision of the Prayer-Book; and at a conference held in Philadelphia, 1867, a committee was appointed to consider and report upon the subject. Meanwhile the flames of discontent were fanned by events which indicated a determination on the part of the High-Church party to deal oppressively and repressively with their opponents.

These events were keenly watched by the Christian public generally, and undoubtedly exerted a great influence on the struggle.

They were:—

I. The trial (February, 1867) and admonition of the Rev. S. H. Tyng, jun., for preaching in a Methodist Church in New Brunswick, N.J., within the claimed parochial limits of a parish of the Protestant-Episcopal Church.

II. The trial (1868) of Rev. J. P. Hubbard of Rhode Island, for exchanging pulpits with a Baptist clergyman.

III. The sentence of suspension, subsequently of degradation, passed by an ecclesiastical court, in the diocese of Illinois, upon Rev. (now Bishop) Charles E. Cheney, for the omission of the word "regenerate" in the baptismal office.

Meanwhile the General Convention of the Protestant-Episcopal Church, which meets triennially, was besieged with remonstrances, suggestions, and petitions for redress and relief. These pleadings brought no result. The applications were either dishonored, or referred to committees, for quiet burial, to be heard of no more.

The fate of these measures convinced many of the Low-Church party that the dominant majority were resolved to yield nothing, that no reform could be hoped for within the Protestant-Episcopal Church, and they must either crush their consciences, or seek relief elsewhere.

They were anxiously waiting the indications of Providence when the Sixth General Conference of the Evangelical Alliance met in the city of New York (October, 1873). While this distinguished body was in session, a union communion service was held in one of the churches of the city, at which, in company with the representatives of other denominations, Bishop George D. Cummins, D.D., assistant bishop of the Protestant-Episcopal Church in the diocese of Kentucky, by invitation officiated. For this act of Christian courtesy and fellowship he was at once bitterly assailed through the press by representatives of the High-Church party. Pained by this manifestation of exclusiveness, and convinced, by previous experience in the diocese of Kentucky, that his official position obliged him to countenance, in some degree, the growing evils of ritualism, Bishop Cummins reached the conclusion that he could not, without sin, longer give his life, ministry, and influence to the advancement of a church, the theory and practice of which, as interpreted by the great majority of its adherents, denied the brotherhood of believers in Christ.

Accordingly, in a letter addressed to the Right Rev. Bishop Smith, D.D., the presiding bishop, he, on the 11th of November, 1873, withdrew from the ministry of the Protestant-Episcopal Church.

After consultation had with brethren like-minded, the Reformed Episcopal Church was organized, Dec. 2, 1873, in the parlors of the Young Men's Christian Association, New-York City, eight clergymen and twenty laymen giving in their adhesion to the movement. At the same time and place Bishop Cummins was chosen the presiding officer of the church; Rev. C. E. Cheney, D.D., rector of Christ Church, Chicago, was elected bishop (consecrated by Bishop Cummins in Chicago, Dec. 14, 1873); and a Declaration of Principles (of which subsequent statements of doctrine, polity, worship, and discipline are little more than an expansion) was set forth, as follows:—

I.—The Reformed Episcopal Church, holding "the faith once delivered unto the saints," declares its belief in the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments as the Word of God, and the sole Rule of Faith and Practice; in the Creed "commonly called the Apostles' Creed," in the Divine institution of the Sacraments of Baptism and the Lord's Supper; and in the doctrines of grace substantially as they are set forth in the Thirty-nine Articles of Religion.

II.—This Church recognizes and adheres to Episcopacy, not as of divine right, but as a very ancient and desirable form of church polity.

III.—This Church, retaining a Liturgy which shall not be imperative or repressive of freedom in prayer, accepts the Book of Common Prayer, as it was revised, proposed, and recommended for use by the General Convention of the Protestant-Episcopal Church, A.D. 1785, reserving full liberty to alter, abridge, enlarge, and amend the same, as may seem most conducive to the edification of the people, "provided that the substance of the faith be kept entire."

IV.—This Church condemns and rejects the following erroneous and strange doctrines as contrary to God's Word:—

First, That the Church of Christ exists only in one order or form of ecclesiastical polity:

Second, That Christian ministers are "priests" in another sense than that in which all believers are "a royal priesthood:"

Third, That the Lord's Table is an altar on which the oblation of the Body and Blood of Christ is offered anew to the Father:

Fourth, That the Presence of Christ in the Lord's Supper is a presence in the elements of Bread and Wine:

Fifth, That Regeneration is inseparably connected with Baptism.

The Reformed Episcopal Church has upon its roll a hundred and six clergymen, including bishops. It has parishes in the chief cities of the United States, in England, Canada, and the Bermuda Islands.

It may be estimated at this time (Jan. 1, 1882) to have

Communicants	7,000
Sunday-school scholars	9,000
Sunday-school teachers	800
Church property (exclusive of encumbrances) valued at	$1,000,000

At the late General Council (May, 1881) the additions to the membership by confirmation and letter were 1,149.

The contributions for parochial, benevolent, and missionary objects, were, at the same time, reported as $194,524.

This church recognizes but two orders in the ministry,—the presbyterate and the diaconate. The episcopate is not an order, but an office; the bishop being simply the first presbyter. The bishops preside over synods or jurisdictions, do not, as in the Protestant-Episcopal Church, constitute a separate house, but in council vote with and as their brother-presbyters, and are subject to confirmation or appointment by the General Council. EPISCOPIUS, Simon, b. in Amsterdam, 1588; d. there 1643; studied, at Leyden, philosophy and theology, under Jacob Arminius and Francis Gomarus; but, when the great controversy between the Arminians and the Gomarists broke out, he declared for the former, and suffered (especially after the death of Arminius, 1609) so much from the intolerance of the latter, that he left Leyden altogether, and settled at Franeker. In 1610 he accepted the position as minister of Bleyeswick, a village in the neighborhood of Rotterdam; and when, in 1611, Gomarus retired from his chair in Leyden, Episcopius was appointed his successor. In the beginning he experienced no troubles. He wrote his commentaries upon the Revelation and the First Epistle of John, his paraphrase of the twenty-four first chapters of Matthew, etc.; but by degrees, as his fame grew and the importance of the Arminian party increased, the annoyances from the side of the Gomarists began. At the synod of Dort (1618) he was the principal spokesman of the Arminians, but produced very little effect. He and twelve other Arminian theologians were condemned by the synod, and banished from the country. Episcopius went to the Spanish Netherlands, and settled in Brussels, where he wrote his Confessio (1622), in the name of all Arminian theologians, and his Responsio ad duas Petri Wadingi Jesuitæ epistolas, etc. On the outbreak of the war between France and Spain he removed to France, where he lived, partly in Paris and partly in Rouen, and wrote a great number of his minor treatises. In 1626 he was allowed to return to his native country, and was appointed preacher at the Remonstrant Church in Amsterdam, and in 1634 professor of theology in the Arminian college in that city. To this last period of his life belong, besides his Apologia pro Confessione and Verus Theologus Remonstrans, his two principal works, Institutiones Theologicae and Responsio ad Quaestiones Theologicas, which became the standard works of Arminian theology. A collected edition of his works appeared in two volumes folio, the first volume edited by Carcellæus, 1650, the second by Pölenbrugh, 1665. His life was written by PHILIP LIMBORCH in Dutch, and afterwards translated into Latin, 1701. [See CALDER: Memoirs of Simon Episcopius, New York, 1837.]

EPISCOPUS IN PARTIBUS, episcopus titularis, episcopus suffraganeus. When the Arabs conquered the southern part of Spain, the Christian bishops were expelled, and fled to Oriedo. There they remained for centuries, waiting for a return to their dioceses; and when one of them died, a successor was immediately appointed to him. Something similar took place when the Eastern Church was broken up by the Mohammedans. Dioceses entirely in the hands of the infidels (in partibus infidelium) had bishops, who lived in Rome, or elsewhere, as it became customary to employ these bishops without dioceses as help to such bishops as were unable to manage the whole business of their diocese. Many misuses and corruptions grew up from this custom; and the councils, from that of Ravenna (1311) to that of Trent (1545), tried hard to regulate, without destroying altogether, the useful practice.

EPISTLES, The, as the letters of the apostles contained in the New Testament are called, may be divided into congregational, those addressed to a particular church, and dealing with doctrinal or practical questions; private, those addressed to individuals, yet containing matter of wider interest; and general, those of an encyclical character, not meant for any one church or person. Paul's Epistles belong to the first two classes, or even to all three, if the words, "to Ephesus," be left out of Eph. i. 1, as there is weighty authority for doing; in which case this Epistle would be general. John's Epistles belong to the last two classes; James's, Peter's, and Jude's to the last. There are thirteen Epistles of Paul, three of John, two of Peter, and one each of James and Jude. The Epistle to the Hebrews is of uncertain authorship.

The Epistles in their outward form are similar to those of their day. With the exception of Hebrews and 1 John, they begin, according to the custom, with the author's name, and that of the person or congregation primarily addressed. Then follows the salutation (omitted in 3 John). This is usually "grace" and "peace;" but in 1 and 2 Timothy, 2 John, and Jude, "mercy" is added; while James employs the classic Greek expression, "greeting." "Grace" was Greek, and "peace" Hebrew; but they were not used by these writers in their original sense, which referred rather to physical health and temporal comfort, but transformed into a prayer for the saving grace of God and the peace in Christ. In the body of the Epistle the first personal pronouns, singular and plural, are used indiscriminately, just as they are in Cicero's letters. The terminations of the Epistles vary. James closes abruptly, and so does 1 John; 2 and 3 John close with salutations; Romans and Jude, with a doxology; the remaining Epistles, with a brief benediction.

The earlier Epistles antedate the Gospels. There was need of direction prior to written accounts of the life of Jesus. Our collection by no means includes all the letters of the apostles, but only such as were inspired for the reading and guidance of the Church in all ages.

Paul employed an amanuensis (Rom. xvi. 22), and only added a few words at the close in his own hand, by way of authentication; for it would seem that his letters had been forged or plagiarized (1 Cor. xvi. 21; Gal. vi. 11; Col. iv. 18; 2 Thess. iii. 17, cf. ii. 2). This fact explains many of the peculiarities of the style of the great apostle; for his sentences often read like the utterances of an impassioned speaker.

His letters were the answers of his heart and head to questions submitted to him. He put all his learning, his dialectical skill, his tact and judgment, and also all his affection, at the service of his converts and friends. His fellow-writers did the same, according to their ability.

In the Epistles are many doctrinal statements, upon which different theologies are founded, besides rich practical instruction. The chief facts of the gospel are alluded to; and so, if the Gospels were destroyed, the Church would yet possess an inspired though fragmentary history of her Lord. One of the most important services of the Epistles is their stimulus and support to the piety of the Church. Many passages in Paul's writings, 1 and 2 Peter, and 1 John entire, have ever been of incalculable value in centring the thought of the Church upon Christ. The common sense of James makes it the "business man's epistle;" but even this is full of the spirit of the Master. No other religion can boast of such letters as the twenty-one Epistles of the New Testament. Their existence is an unanswerable argument for the divine origin of Christianity. See LETTERS, PAUL, WRITING; also art. Epistle in the Bible Dictionaries.

EPISTOLÆ OBSCURORUM VIRORUM. The first edition of this famous book appeared in 1515, containing forty-one letters. A second edition, unchanged, soon followed, and a year later a third, augmented with seven letters. In 1517 a new series appeared, numbering sixty-two letters, which in the second edition were augmented with eight. Full information with respect to the history of the work may be found in ÉDUARD BÖCKING: Utrichi Hutteni operum supplementum, Leipzig, 1864-70, 2 vols., containing also the various answers to the book.

The immediate occasion for the production of the Epistolæ obscurorum virorum was the publication in 1514, at Tübingen, of the Epistolæ clarorum virorum. The latter intended to place the mental wealth of the humanists in a proper light; and, as a supplement, the former undertook to give a picture of the mental poverty and moral obscurantism of the Roman-Catholic Church, its monks, and its scholasticism. In its details the book is often coarse, and somewhat offensive to modern taste; but, considered as a whole, it is nevertheless a brilliant performance. The caricature of the style and language then used in the monasteries is extremely ludicrous; and the naïveté with which the virī obscuri lay bare their own ignorance and stupidity is very enjoyable.

With respect to the authorship, the plan of this "mimical satire" was due to Crotus Rubianus; and Ulrich von Hutten, a learned and fearless knight (see art.), was his principal collaborator. The effect was tremendous. In some places the monks mistook the book, and believed it to be a serious performance in their favor; but the mistake was of course soon discovered, and the delight turned into rage. Ortwin Gratius, to whom the letters are addressed, a comical person, a scholastic in humanist robe, the poetista asinus, as Luther called him, did his utmost to suppress it by means of a papal brief, and to disturb its influence by writing against it. [German trans., by Dr. Wilhelm Binder, Briefe von Dunkelmännern, Stuttgart, 1876.] BERNHARD RIGGENBACH.

EQUITIUS, abbot of several monasteries in the province of Valeria (a district in Abruzzo Ulteriore, thus called because it was traversed by the Via Valeria), flourished in the sixth century, and preached often in the neighboring towns and villages, though he was not ordained. This excited the jealousy of the ordained priests, and he was summoned to Rome by the Pope; but, after an interview, the Pope dropped the case. According to Alanus, the Waldenses afterwards used his example against the hierarchy, when forbidden to preach because they were laymen. An account of him, much mixed up with legendary matters, is found in GREGORY I.: Dial., I. 4. HERZOG.

ERA (Latin æra, or era) occurs for the first time in Isidorus' Etym. (V. 36), and is there applied to a chronological arrangement by Augustus, beginning with the year 716 A.U.C. Afterwards it became the common name for any chronological arrangement starting from a fixed point. Its etymology is uncertain. Ideler derives it from the Gothic jera ("year"), and asserts that it was first used for the chronology which the Visigoths found established in Spain and Southern France. Others derive it (and with more right) from the Latin æs, like opera from opus, and ora from os. The term æra (singular feminine) is used already by Cicero to denote the unit of certain measurements.

In the books of the Old and New Testaments, traces of an era, properly speaking, occur only in a few passages; a circumstance not to be wondered at, on account of the great age and devotional character of these books. The nations of antiquity used no era, either in their private or in their public life: contrivances of that kind were left solely to the historians and the chronologists by profession. Even the Romans, though they had a fixed era, beginning with the year of the building of Rome, dated all public and private documents, in social and political life, simply by the name of the consul in office, to which afterwards was added the year of the reign of the emperor. In the historical and prophetic books of the Old Testament, dates of some kind or other are of frequent occurrence; but continuous computation of time from a fixed point is very rare. In the Pentateuch, and down to the time of Jacob, all chronology is bound up with genealogy. When the Israelites had kings of their own, they dated the year after the reign of the king, as is done in Kings, Chronicles, and Jeremiah. When they were subjugated by foreign peoples, they dated after the reign of the foreign ruler; as, for instance, after the Babylonian kings (Jer. xxv. 1, lii. 12, 28; Dan. ii. 1, vii. 1), or the Persian kings (Ez. iv. 24, vi. 15, vii. 7; Neh. ii. 1, v. 14, xiii. 6; Hag. i. 1, ii. 11; Zech. vii. 1; Dan. x. 1). Dates of this kind also occur in the New Testament (Luke iii. 1; Matt. ii. 1; Luke i. 5). Sometimes, though not often, great national events are used as chronological starting-points; as, for instance, the exodus (Exod. xix. 1; Num. xxxiii. 38; 1 Kings vi. 1), or the beginning of the Babylonian exile (Ezek. xxxiii. 21, xl. 1). When the Jews became Syrian subjects, they adopted the Seleucidian era, beginning with the year 312 B.C. It is uniformly used in the first two books of the Maccabees; though else it appears that the authors of the books of the Maccabees do not date from exactly the same starting-point.

The establishment of the Christian Church was not immediately followed by the establishment of the Christian era. For centuries the Christians continued to date, each in the way to which he was accustomed. Thus the Christians of the East continued to use the Seleucidian era; and, indeed, the Syrian Christians still use it in all ecclesiastical affairs besides the Christian era, only that a difference with respect to the computation of New Year has crept in among them; the Nestorians and Jacobites reckoning from Oct. 1, and the Roman Catholics from Sept. 1. In Alexandria the era of Diocletian was adopted for the computation of Easter. It begins with the reign of Diocletian (Aug. 20, 284); and, as this reign was ushered in with horrible persecutions, the era received the name of Æra Martyrum. It was commonly used in Egypt, in all civil affairs, down to the invasion of the Arabs; and it is still used by the Egyptian and Ethiopian Christians, though the latter also employ a world-era, beginning from the creation. The Christian Armenians date from the year 551 A.D., when their chronology was reformed and finally fixed by the patriarch Moses.

The Christian era, thus called because it dates from the person of Christ, is now universally used by the nations of Europe and America; but five centuries elapsed before it was invented, and five more before it was generally adopted. In 537 the Emperor Justinian ordered that all public documents should be dated by the year of the emperor, the name of the consul, the indiction (tax-period), the month, and the day (Noëlla, XLVII.); but in 541 the last consul was elected, and the need of a new starting-point for the computation of time, fixed once for all, and generally adopted, became more and more urgent. Meanwhile, in 525, the Roman abbot, Dionysius, had begun in his Easter-tables to count the years ab incarnatione Domini, and not after the era of Diocletian; which, though adopted by the Alexandrians, never became popular among the Christians. The first year of this Dionysian era runs from Jan. 1 to Dec. 31, 754 A.U.C.; and the birth of Jesus falls towards the close of the year,—Dec. 25, as, according to common patristical usage, incarnatio means conceptio, and not nativitas. This method of computing time found great favor; and Bede and Charlemagne contributed much to introduce it. In the tenth century it was widely adopted. In Spain, however, it did not supersede the so-called Spanish era, beginning with the year 716 B. C., until the latter part of the fourteenth century. In Russia it was introduced in 1700 by Peter the Great. Great inconveniences arose at first, from the circumstance, that, in different places, the year was begun at different dates, — Dec. 25, Jan. 1, March 25, or Easter Day. Thus there was a difference of a whole year between the chronology of Pisa and that of Florence; and uniformity was not established until 1749. The German emperor began the year at Dec. 25, until the latter part of the sixteenth century; France, at Easter Day, until 1567. Jan. 1 was not fixed upon as New-Year's Day in Scotland until 1599, and in England 1752.

A world's era, dating from the creation, and constructed out of the Old Testament, was in use among the Jews at the time of Christ. The Jewish historian, Josephus, employs it in his work on archæology. Such an era seems to recommend itself in several respects; but its construction presents difficulties which can hardly ever be overcome. Every scholar who tries comes to a different result. L'art de vérifier les dates gives no less than a hundred and eight different views; and the two extremes differ no less than two thousand years from each other. Julius Africanus counts, from the creation to Christ, 5,500 years; Eusebius, Bede, and the Roman martyrologium, 5,199; Scaliger and Calvisius, 3,950; Kepler and Petavius, 3,984; Ussher, 4,004, etc. Uniformity is not to be hoped for under such circumstances; and without uniformity no practical good can be accomplished. The so-called Byzantine or Constantinopolitan era also begins from creation, and counts 5,509 years down to Christ. It first occurs in the Chronicon Paschale, from the seventh century; but it was afterwards generally adopted by the Byzantine historians, the East-Roman emperors, and the patriarchs of the Eastern Church, and it is still used throughout the Greek Church, with the exception of Russia.

ERASMUS, St., was bishop somewhere in the patriarchate of Antioch, suffered much under Diocletian in Antioch and Sirmium, and d. at Formiæ in Campania, whither he had retired. Already Gregory the Great calls him a martyr (Ep. I. 8), and his acts are found in Act. Sanct., June 2. In the ninth century, when Formiæ was destroyed by the Saracens, his bones were brought to Gaëta; nevertheless, several other Italian cities boast of possessing them. As he is often represented with the intestines laid bare, he has become the popular patron of stomach-ache and all kinds of complaints of the bowels. In Italy and Portugal he is worshipped under the name of St. Elmo. HERZOG.

ERASMUS, Desiderius, the most brilliant representative of humanistic culture at the beginning of the sixteenth century, and the head of a movement in the interest of a reformation of ecclesiastical abuses which prepared the way for the Protestant Reformation. His life divides itself naturally into three periods; the first, lasting till 1507, was the period of gradual emancipation from the fetters of his age; the second lasted till 1519, and marked his greatest reputation and most efficient reformatory activity; the last is the period of conflict, isolation, and final abandonment of the Reformation movement.

Erasmus was b. in Rotterdam, and d. in Basel July 12, 1536. The date of birth is variously put in 1466, 1467, and 1469. Oct. 28, 1465, is probably the right one, and is favored by the statement of Rhenanus, that Erasmus died in his seventieth year, as by his own statement (Ep. 207, Feb. 26, 1516), "I have entered my fifty-first year." He seems to have been born out of wedlock. His father, Gerhard Roger, according to some accounts, was a priest at the time; but according to others he did not enter a convent till after the event. Erasmus was sent to the famous school of Hegius at Deventer, attended at that time by two thousand scholars. His parents died in his thirteenth year, and, being cheated by a guardian out of his inheritance, he entered the convent school of Herzogenbusch, and subsequently took vows in the convent of Emaus, at Steyn. At a later period (1514) he calls this step the direst misfortune of his life. In 1491 he went into the service of the Bishop of Cambray, who sent him to Paris to conclude his studies. While attending the College of Montaigu he contracted a disease, which forced him to seek relief in Holland. Returning to Paris, he acted as tutor to several English youths, one of whom, Lord Mountjoy, induced him to visit England in 1498. Erasmus resided for a while at Oxford, and formed a close friendship with More and Colet. In the face of Henry VII.'s offer of a house, and a pension amounting to a thousand pounds in present money, he returned to the Continent. In 1500 his Adagia (a collection of proverbs and witty sayings derived from ancient writers) appeared, and in 1502 the Enchiridion Militis Christiani, which, he says, was "designed to counteract the error of those who place piety in ceremonies and external observances, but neglect its very essence" (Ep. 102). In 1505 he edited Valla's Annotations to the New Testament with a preface, which calls for a return to the Greek text, and its grammatical exposition as the fundamental conditions of a right understanding of the Scriptures. In 1506 he visited Italy, taking the degree of doctor of divinity at Turin, and receiving from the highest dignitaries marks of distinction. In 1509 he returned to England, forming on the way the plan of his Encomium Moriæ ("The Praise of Folly"), which subsequently appeared with a dedication to More in 1511. Here the second period of his career begins.

Erasmus was now in the zenith of his fame, a fame which has never been surpassed in the annals of men of letters. He remained in England about five years, a part of the time lecturing at Cambridge. Returning to Brabant, he was elected by the archduke one of his counsellors, and subsequently to a similar position by Charles V. From 1515 to 1521 he resided in Brussels, Antwerp, and Louvain (Ep. 354). A papal brief gave him a much desired relief from the duties and dress of his monastic vow. From 1514 all his writings were published by Froben at Basel. This necessitated frequent journeyings to Switzerland through Germany. These journeys were triumphant processions; scholars, councils, and bishops doing him homage. His correspondence at this period was enormous, and included princes, the highest prelates, and the Pope himself. In Germany a party grew up called the "Erasmians," which regarded him as a leader of a new movement in the church as well as in the department of letters. Among the writings of this period are a school-book, de Duplici Copia Verborum ac Rerum, 1512, and the Colloquia Familiaria, 1518, 1522, much enlarged in 1526. The latter is the most read of all Erasmus' writings. It contains the keenest sarcasm, and wittiest sallies against conventual life, fasting, pilgrimages, and the worship of saints. He edited numerous editions and translations of classic authors and the fathers, the most valuable of which is that of Jerome. The most important of all Erasmus' works appeared in 1516. It had a decided influence upon the Reformation. It was an edition of the Greek Testament under the title of Novum Instrumentum omne, diligenter ab Erasmo Roterdamo recognitum et emendatum, etc. Besides the text, it contained a Latin translation, which departs quite largely from the Vulgate; and annotations justifying these departures, explaining different passages, and condemning frequently, by comparison with apostolic teaching, the excesses and ignorance of the monks. The work was prefaced with a dedication to Leo X. to stamp it with the sanction of the Church. An Introduction, composed of three parts, exhorts to the study of Scripture. The text was faulty, and inferior to that of the Complutensian Polyglot, which, although completed two years previously, did not appear till 1520. The printer's errors were corrected in subsequent editions, but the editorial faults remained. This text had a very large circulation. Within a few decades, thirty unauthorized reprints were made. Erasmus himself sent out four more editions. Luther's translation was based upon the second edition (1519); and in the third (1522) the editor restored to the text 1 John v. 7, "ne cui foret ansa calumniandi." (See BIBLE TEXT.) In 1517 he began to publish the Paraphrases of the Epistles and Gospels, which also exerted an extensive influence upon the Reformation.

In these writings Erasmus is in many points the precursor of the Reformation. His satire against the ecclesiastical abuses and corruption of the day is keen and bold. He also made the Scriptures the standard of doctrine and life in the Church. They had disabused his own mind of prejudices in favor of the specific holiness of cloistral and celibate life. With the Reformers he thus far agreed. He differed in particulars equally important. They found the essence of Christianity in the reconciliation of the sinner to God and his sense of the forgiveness of sin. Erasmus regarded Christ from another standpoint, as the exemplar of all virtue, and the restorer of moral order to the world. The Reformers were Augustinian in their theology, he Pelagian. Erasmus treated with somewhat of indifference the doctrinal part of Christianity, and at times estimated the morality of Greece and Rome so high as to obliterate the line between it and that of Christianity (Enchir., ii., etc.).

There were certain defects of character, and certain qualities of disposition, which explain the failure of Erasmus to understand and advocate the Reformation. His opposition to the state of the Church had proceeded from æsthetic feeling, rather than from moral indignation. He lacked the enthusiasm of a moral cause. He says he would rather sacrifice a part of the truth than destroy peace (Ep. 643, Dec. 25, 1522). After long vacillation, in which the fear of man comes out only too conspicuously, he cut loose from the Reformation.

The third period of Erasmus' life is marked by a complete rupture with the Reformers. The most prominent of these attributed their emancipation from the dominion of the Church to his writings. He was popularly classed with them. But Luther saw deeper, and wrote to Lange (Letters 22, 29), "I fear that Erasmus does not sufficiently exalt Christ and the divine grace." But down to his letter of March 28, 1519, to Erasmus, he had the highest esteem for him, calling him "our pride and hope." In his reply (Ep. 325), Erasmus, while applauding Luther's attitude towards the friars, counsels him to be moderate and careful. After preserving, as long as it was possible, an attitude of neutrality, he gradually drew off from the German reformer, and studiously avoided his writings, lest he should be called upon to give an opinion upon them. [Mr. Froude keenly discriminates between these two men in his essay: "In Luther, belief in God was the first principle of life: in Erasmus it was an inference which might be taken away, and yet leave the world a very tolerable and habitable place," etc.] In spite of this, his enemies (Ep. 562) said Luther had sucked poison at his breast, or that he "laid the egg which Luther hatched out." Erasmus was, however, still opposed to persecution, and did not conceal his disgust at the papal bull of excommunication. But in a letter to Leo X., dated Sept. 13, 1520, he hastens to clear himself of all connection with the excommunicated reformer, and to declare that only his incapacity, and fear of stirring up strife, keep him from answering Luther (Ep. 529). Neither death nor life would induce him to leave the communion of the Church (Ep. 621, 645).

In 1521, no longer feeling himself safe in the Netherlands, Erasmus went to Basel to reside permanently. The open breach with Luther was now to occur. In September, 1524, he wrote, in answer to the reformer, his Diatriba de Libero Arbitrio. The work shows him to be unequal to the problem, and inferior to Luther, who replied in the De Servo Arbitrio. Erasmus wrote, in 1526, a feeble retort, — Hyperaspistes. Luther henceforth regarded Erasmus as a "sceptic and epicurean, an enemy of all true religion." In 1523 Erasmus broke off correspondence with Zwingli, and henceforth he regarded the Reformation as a calamity and a crime (Ep. 906). In contrast to his former utterances, he now ridiculed the marriage of the clergy, and proclaimed for the authority of the Church to punish heretics with death. The Reformation extended to Basel; and he removed to Freiburg, in Breisgau, where he heard with satisfaction the news of Zwingli's and Æcolampadius' death (Ep. 1206).

In the last decade of his life the most of his editions of the fathers appeared,—Hilary (1523), Irenæus (1526), Ambrose (1527), Augustine (1528), Epiphanius (1529), Chrysostom (1530), Origen (1531). His Modus Confitendi (1525) vindicated the confessional, and his Ecclesiastes (1535) is in many respects a valuable homiletic commentary. While bowing submissively to the Church, he still continued to ridicule ecclesiastical abuses. The Sorbonne, in 1527, condemned thirty-two articles extracted from his works, after having previously forbidden the circulation of the Colloquies in France. But the Pope's friendship suffered no abatement. Paul III. offered to make him cardinal, but he declined on account of age. Erasmus returned to Basel in 1535, where he died of an attack of his old trouble, the stone, combined with dysentery. He died without the priest, but invoking the mercy of Christ. His body lies interred in the cathedral of Basel. A lifelike portrait by Hans Holbein hangs in the museum of the same city.

LIT.—A collected edition of Erasmus' works, with biographical sketch, appeared, under the editorship of his friend BEATUS RHEXANUS, at Basel, 1540, 9 vols. folio; more complete, but less accurate, edition, by LE CLERC, 10 folio vols., Leyden, 1703–06. ERASTUS, Thomas, b. Sept. 7, 1524, at Baden, in Switzerland, or, according to another account, at Auggen, in the margraviate of Baden; d. at Basel, Jan. 1, 1583; studied theology at Basel, and philosophy and medicine at Bologna and Padua, and was in 1558 appointed body-physician to the elector-palatine, and professor of medicine at Heidelberg, whence, in 1580, he moved, as professor of medicine, to Basel. As a practical physician he enjoyed a great reputation, and as a student of nature he strenuously opposed the astrology, alchemy, and magic of Paracelsus and his school; but it is chiefly as a theologian that his name has become known to the after-world. He was a pupil of Zwingli; took active part in the conferences at Heidelberg (1560) and Maulbronn (1564); and defended, in the controversy concerning the Lord's Supper, the Swiss view against Dr. Johann Marbach, a Lutheran minister at Strassburg. Some years later he had occasion to defend his master's ideas against the Calvinists in a question of church-polity. There was in Heidelberg a Calvinist party, headed by Caspar Olevianus, which wanted to introduce in the country a purely presbyterian church-constitution with a corresponding church-discipline. Erastus strongly opposed the movement, but in vain. He was himself the very first victim of the established church-discipline, being excommunicated on a charge of latent Unitarianism. He was restored after five years; but, six years after his death (1589), Castelvetro, who had married his widow, published a work of his, Explicatio gravissimæ questionis, utrum excommunicatio mandato nitatur divino, an excogitata sit ab hominibus, written in 1568, and found among his posthumous papers. The book, written, according to the fashion of the time, in form of theses, and denying that excommunication is a divine ordinance, that the Church has any power to make laws or decrees, and to inflict pains and penalties of any kind, that the sins of professing Christians are to be punished by pastors and elders, instead of the civil magistrate, etc., attracted much attention, and was attacked by Beza. It was translated into English in 1659, and again, in 1844, by R. Lee; and its views were adopted by a distinct party in the Westminster Assembly, headed by Selden, Lightfoot, Coleman, and Whitelocke. Since that time the doctrine of the State supremacy in ecclesiastical causes generally goes under the name of Erastianism; though in its broad sense, and wide application, this doctrine is by no means due to Erastus. ERNESTI, Johann August, b. Aug. 4, 1707, at Tennstädt, in Thuringia; d. at Leipzig, Sept. 11, 1781; studied at Wittenberg and Leipzig, and was appointed professor in the latter place, of classical literature (1742), of rhetoric (1756), and of theology (1758). As a philologist he enjoyed a great fame. His editions of Cicero, Homer, Xenophon, Tacitus, etc., were celebrated; and his Opuscula Oratoria (1762), Opuscula philologico-critica (1764), and Initia Doctrinæ Solidioris (1736) were much read. His principal theological work is his Institutio Interpretis N.T. (1761), [translated into English by Terrot, and published in the Biblical Cabinet, Edinburgh, 1834,] which opened a new epoch in the history of hermeneutics, and founded the grammatico-historical school. Its principle is, that, in the divinely inspired book, the sense shall not be sought for, nor can it be found out, by any other method than that applied to an ordinary human book; and by this principle the chains of the old dogmatical method of interpretation were burst. He also edited the Theologische Bibliothek, first series, 1760–69, second, 1773–79. ERPENIUS, Thomas (van Erpe), b. at Gorkum, in South Holland, Sept. 7, 1584; d. at Leyden, Nov. 13, 1624; studied at Middleburg and Leyden; travelled in England, France, Italy, and Germany; and was in 1613 appointed professor of Oriental languages at the University of Leyden, acting at the same time as interpreter to the government. He was the first to draw attention to the great advantages which the student of the Bible may derive from a knowledge of the Arab language and literature. His Grammatica Arabica (1613) and Rudimenta Linguae Arabicae (1620) were universally used by Arab students for two centuries, until they were superseded by the works of De Sacy. His translation of the New Testament into Arabic appeared 1616; that of the Pentateuch, 1622. See P. SCRIVERIUS: Manes Erpeniani, Leiden, 1625.

R. GOSCHE.

ERSKINE, Ebenezer, M.A., founder of the Scottish Secession Church; b. June 22, 1680; d. June 2, 1754. His father, Henry Erskine, an English Nonconformist minister (ejected by the Act of Conformity, 1662, and a sufferer otherwise from the persecutions of the reign of Charles II.), belonged to the family of the Earls of Mar. His mother, Margaret Halcro, was descended, on one side, from Halcro, Prince of Denmark, and on the other from the Duke of Albany, son of James V. of Scotland. Both parents were even more distinguished by their piety and holy living than by birth. The son inherited their more valuable qualities, but also somewhat of the high spirit not unbecoming the noble blood which flowed in his veins. He was educated at the University of Edinburgh, and having been licensed as a probationer in February, 1703, he was ordained minister of the parish of Portmoak before the end of the same year. In 1731 he was translated to the more important charge of Stirling, which he occupied till his deposition from the ministry of the Church of Scotland, in 1740.

As a minister of the National Church, no less than after his secession, his labors were most abundant, and eminently successful. Few ministers of that day enjoyed greater popularity as a preacher. People came from distances of sixty or seventy miles to benefit by his ministrations; and at the dispensation of the communion it was sometimes found necessary, even in the small parish of Portmoak, to make provision for no fewer than two thousand participants. His discourses were plain, even homely in style, but were delivered with a certain elevation and dignity of manner which was always characteristic of him. A contemporary, Mr. Hutton, minister of Dalkeith, writes, "I never saw so much of the majesty of God in any mortal man as in Ebenezer Erskine."

But it is chiefly as a leader in ecclesiastical affairs, at a critical period of the history of the Church of Scotland, that Mr. Erskine was known in his own day, or will be remembered in after-times. The history of the secession of 1733 (a movement small in its beginnings, but destined to influence materially the ecclesiastical and religious life of Scotland) cannot be told here. (See SECESSION CHURCH.) Of this first considerable division in the Scottish Church, Mr. Erskine is admitted both by friends and foes to have been the prime mover. The immediate occasion of the rupture was an act of the General Assembly of 1732, in connection with the questio rezata of Patronage. It may be noticed, however, that the relations of Mr. Ebenezer Erskine and his followers to the "ruling party in the Church" had been already strained long before this: first, in the controversy as to The Marrow of Modern Divinity, — a book condemned by the Assembly, but which Erskine and others as warmly approved; and again, in a celebrated case of alleged heresy, — the case of Mr. John Simson, professor of divinity in the University of Glasgow. In fact, in announcing their secession in the formal Protest of Nov. 16, 1733, the four original members of the Associate Synod, as the new body was at first called, expressly ascribed the step which they felt it their duty to take, not to any one act of the Church, but to "a course of defection from our Reformed and covenanting principles."

Among the incidents of his later years must not be omitted the part he took at the time of the rebellion of 1745, when he even offered his services as a volunteer soldier on behalf of the government, and for his patriotic conduct received the public thanks of the Duke of Cumberland. It is also to his credit, that when the Associate Synod was in 1747 rent asunder by disputes as to the religious clauses in some burgher oaths, he took the side of toleration, refusing to make non-subscription a term of communion.

Mr. Erskine was twice married, and left a numerous family. His only published works were occasional sermons, collected after his death in four volumes 12mo.

WILLIAM LEE.

ERSKINE, John, D.D., a distinguished minister of the Church of Scotland; b. at Edinburgh in (or about) 1721; d. there Jan. 19, 1803. He was the eldest son of John Erskine, Esq., of Carnock, a member of the Scottish bar, and the author of The Institutes of the Law of Scotland. His mother was a daughter of the Hon. James Melville of Bagarvie, and grand-daughter of the fourth Lord Melville. It had been intended by his parents that he should follow his father's profession; and for a year or two, out of deference to their wishes, he applied himself to the study of the law. But a strong predilection for the service of the Church had been early formed, and showed itself, even while he was still a law-student, in the publication of a theological work which gained him the friendship and correspondence of Bishop Warburton. He became a licentiate of the Church in 1743; and in 1744 he was ordained minister of the parish of Kirkintilloch, near Glasgow. In this laborious country-charge Dr. Erskine, from the first, devoted himself earnestly and faithfully to his professional duties; — duties which throughout his life he always regarded as having paramount claims on his attention. And he here, also, formed those habits of careful preparation for the pulpit which never failed to render his sermons, which are vigorous expositions of Calvinism, if not eloquent, interesting and useful.

It was at this period of his life, too, that he began a practice which illustrates an important phase of his character; namely, that of maintaining friendly intercourse on religious questions with the representatives of foreign churches. In an age of bigotry and intolerance—at least among the members of the party to which he himself belonged—Dr. Erskine was, if no Broad-Churchman in the modern acceptation of the term, a man of wide sympathies and enlightened Christian liberality. In the list of his earliest correspondents were several distinguished ministers of America, amongst them being found the honored name of Jonathan Edwards. A frequent interchange of letters between Dr. Erskine and leading American ministers was indeed continued down to his death. Reference has already been made to his friendly relations with Bishop Warburton, many of whose letters will be found in Moncreiff's Life. He had no less loyal intercourse with some of the English Dissenters, especially with Mr. George Whitefield and the Wesleys. His correspondence with members of the Continental churches was carried on for a long time under circumstances of peculiar difficulty, from his ignorance of any foreign language except French; and it is a singular proof at once of his energy, and of the importance he attached to fellowship with Christian brethren outside his own church, that, for the purpose of carrying it out more extensively, Dr. Erskine undertook, as late as in his sixtieth year, the acquisition of the Dutch and German languages, and, in the absence of any teacher of these languages within his reach, gained a competent knowledge of them without assistance except from books.

It is greatly to Dr. Erskine's honor that he was one of the first advocates of missions to the heathen in the Church of Scotland, having actively supported and strenuously defended them at a time when, as a rule, churchmen and dissenters were, in Scotland at least, equally indifferent to what is now recognized as one of the chief obligations of the Christian Church.

He was married in the year 1746; his wife being Christian Mackay, a daughter of George, Lord Reay. In 1753 he was translated from Kirkintilloch to the parish of Culross, and thence he removed, in 1758, to New Greyfriar's Church, Edinburgh; which charge he held for nine years, afterwards exchanging it for the Collegiate Church of Old Greyfriars in the same city. Here he had Principal Robertson, the historian of Charles V., as his colleague, and, in spite of their differences in ecclesiastical politics, as one of his best friends. In Edinburgh he found his work as a minister somewhat different in character from that of either of his country parishes, but not less laborious; and he was equally conscientious in giving his first attention to it, while always finding time for literary study, and for social intercourse with his friends. As an Edinburgh minister, he was also called to take a more prominent place in public business than before. As a leader in the church courts, he represented for many years the evangelical or popular party in the Church. In this position, as in every other, he was far from adopting extreme views; and it may be added that he enjoyed the respect and esteem of all parties throughout the whole of his long and useful life.

LIT.—A striking description of Dr. Erskine's appearance and manner in the pulpit, and his character as a preacher, evidently derived from personal observation, is given by Sir Walter Scott, in Guy Mannering (see chap. XXXVII.). Two graphic pen-and-ink sketches of him, with biographical notices, will be found in KAY'S Series of Original Portraits, Edinburgh, 1837, vol. I. pp. 171–176. See, however, especially, the Account of the Life and Writings of John Erskine, D.D., by Sir HENRY MONCREIFF WELLWOOD, D.D., Edinburgh, 1818. WILLIAM LEE.

ERSKINE, Ralph, M.A., minister of Dunfermline, N.B.; b. at Monilaws, on the English border, March 15, 1685; d. at Dunfermline, Nov. 6, 1752. He was a brother of Ebenezer Erskine (see above), with whose ecclesiastical views he sympathized, and whose secession from the Church he eventually joined. His diary shows him to have been a man of fervent piety. He was hardly less popular as a preacher than his brother; and his Gospel Sonnets and other Scripture Songs were received with favor in his own day. His works were published after his death, in two vols. folio, Glasgow, 1764. See DONALD FRASER: Life and Diary of Ralph Erskine, Edinburgh, 1834. WILLIAM LEE.

ERSKINE, Thomas, of Linlathen, b. in Edinburgh, Oct. 13, 1788; d. there March 20, 1870. He was educated a lawyer, and practised from 1810 to 1816; but then, succeeding to the family estate at Linlathen, near Dundee, he retired from the bar, and spent the rest of his life in the care of his property, and in literary labor in behalf of his views. He never married. While still a young man, he rebelled at the current Scotch theology, and at length found what he conceived was a better way in which to represent the divine revelation. His views may be thus expressed: the only proper criterion of the truth of Christianity is "its conformity or nonconformity with man's spiritual nature, and its adaptability or nonadaptability to man's universal and deepest spiritual needs." The incarnation of Christ was "the necessary manifestation to man of an eternal sonship in the divine nature, apart from which those filial qualities which God demands from man could have no sanction." Faith as used in the Bible is a "certain moral or spiritual condition which virtually implied salvation, because it implied the existence of a principle of spiritual life possessed of an immortal power. This faith could be properly awakened only by the manifestation, through Christ, of love as the law of life, and as identical with an eternal righteousness which it was God's purpose to bestow on every individual soul" (Encyc. Brit., 9th ed., vol. viii. pp. 530, 531). Such views were not "orthodox," and at first subjected Mr. Erskine to considerable adverse criticism. But they gained favor; and he numbered among his intimate friends some of the finest minds of the century,—Thomas Carlyle, Edward Irving, Frederick Denison Maurice, John McLeod Campbell, Bishop Ewing, and Dean Stanley. Maurice and Campbell were indebted to him for those conceptions of the atonement which have had so great an effect upon later

English and American popular religious thought; and it was Campbell's public advocacy of them which led to his expulsion from the Kirk. Mr. Erskine's theology was part of his life, it permeated his being; and it was his unflinching delight to impress his views upon all he met. His sincerity, his earnestness, his pure and lofty character, gave him a great influence.

Besides minor and fugitive pieces, he wrote (all except one published in Edinburgh): Remarks on the Internal Evidence for the Truth of Revealed Religion, 1820, 3d ed., 1821, reprinted Andover, 1853, new ed., 1871; An Essay on Faith, 1822, 3d ed., 1823; The Unconditional Freeness of the Gospel, 1828, new ed., 1873; The Brazen Serpent, or Life coming from Death, 1831; The Doctrine of Election, London, 1837. There also appeared, posthumously, Spiritual Order and Other Papers, 1871, 2d ed., 1876, and in 1877 two volumes of his letters, edited by Dr. William Hanna, with reminiscences by Dean Stanley and Principal Shairp.

E'SARHAD'DON (Heb. אֶסְרַחַדְדֹּן, LXX. Ἀσσορδάν and Ἀσραδάν, Assy. Aššur-ah-iddina, "Assur gave a brother"), son and successor of Sennacherib, was king of Assyria B.C. 681-668. He is named in the Bible, 2 Kings xix. 37 (= Isa. xxxvii. 38), and Ez. iv. 2; see also Tob. i. 21, where he is called Σαχερδωνός. It is disputed whether the "King of Assyria" who carried Manasseh captive to Babylon (2 Chron. xxxiii. 11) was Esarhaddon, or his son Asurbanipal, with the probabilities in favor of the latter. The passages in 2 Kings and Isaiah relate Esarhaddon's accession after the murder of Sennacherib by two other sons, Adrammelech and Sharezer. From the latter we learn that the "adversaries of Judah and Benjamin" (Ez. iv. 1) had been brought into Palestine by him. The numerous cuneiform inscriptions dating from his reign give no additional information in regard to the circumstances of his ascending the throne, if we except the account of a battle in the country Hanigalmit or Hanirabbat (perhaps Eastern Cappadocia) against enemies who are believed to have been his parricidal brothers. (Comp. Abydenus, in Euseb., Chron. I. 9. Abydenus calls him Axerdis: Alexander Polyhistor, in Euseb., Chron. I. 5, calls him Asordanes.) The statement of Ez. iv. 2 receives incidental confirmation from an inscription which speaks of his transplanting "inhabitants of the mountains and the sea of the rising sun" (i.e., the Persian Gulf) to the conquered city of Sidon (Cun. Insc. of West. Asia, I. 45, l. 31-33). His records, and those of his son Asurbanipal, represent him, further, as a mighty and sagacious king. One of the earliest acts of his reign was to subjugate Babylon (B.C. 680). Thenceforth he repeatedly designates himself "Ruler of Babylon, King of Sumir and Accad" (Southern and Northern Babylonia). Ptolemy's canon, or list of Babylonian kings, names him as Ἀσραδώνου, and, in agreement with the inscriptions, assigns him a reign of thirteen years. But, besides this, he waged successful wars against districts of Media, and subdued all Western Asia as far as Cyprus, including Judah, Phœnicia, and Philistia. Cylinders from his reign and that of his son give the names of "twelve kings of the seacoast" and ten kings of Cyprus who paid tribute to him. The list begins "Baal, king of the land of Tyre; Manasseh, king of the land (var. 'city') of Judah; Kausgabri, king of the land (var. 'city') of Edom; Musuri, king of the land (var. 'city') of Moab; Sil-Bel, king of the land (var. 'city') of Gaza," etc. Among the tributaries from Cyprus are the kings of Idalium, Salamis, Paphos, Soli, and Curium. In the latter part of Esarhaddon's reign (subsequent to B.C. 673) he extended his authority over Egypt. He vanquished the powerful Cushite king, Tirhakah, and put an end to the Cushite dominion in Egypt, where he established his own governors. In his later inscriptions he takes the title "King of Egypt and Cush," or "King of the Kings of Egypt and Cush."

Besides these conquests, in which he often showed a wise clemency as well as great military vigor, his reign was marked by splendor at home. He built or rebuilt great palaces, fortresses, and temples, particularly in Nineveh, Calah (Nimroud), and Babylon. The last and greatest of these buildings, the "South-west Palace" at Calah, was unfinished at his death. It shows the influence of Egyptian art in the appearance, for the first time, of sphinxes by the side of the usual colossal bulls and lions. Esarhaddon was succeeded by his son Asurbanipal, probably the "great and noble Asnapper" of Ez. iv. 10.

ESCHATOLOGY, or "the doctrine of the last things," is that branch of theology which concerns itself with the termination of our earthly life, and those things which may lie beyond death. The term may have been derived, like the old designation, De Novissimis, from Jesus Sirach (vii. 36). The expression τὰ ἔσχατα, or "the last things," is of biblical origin (comp. Isa. ii. 2; Mic. iv. 1). This sketch cannot go into a discussion of the particular subjects of eschatology. They will be found treated under their special heads, — APOKATASTASIS, DEATH, HADES, PUNISHMENT, PURGATORY, etc.

The meaning of death, and the question of a future life, have engaged thought at all times; and hardly a people has been found destitute of all belief in a future existence.

The position of the Old Testament on this question has been a matter of dispute. Expositors, from the older Jews and the church fathers down to the present day, have differed as to whether it teaches immortality or not. Israel, in the first instance, turned its hopes not to the destiny of the individual, but to the coming of the Messiah, and the generation living at the time of that coming (Hos. vi. 2; Isa. xxv. 8; Ezek. xxxvii.). Only as a secondary matter is the presentiment introduced of the restoration of the righteous dead, who should participate in the glory of Israel (Isa. xxvii. 19; Dan. xii. 2, 13). God is recognized as having power over death and its kingdom (Deut. xxxii. 39; 1 Sam. ii. 6); and his power over life is the pledge of the immortality of his people (Isa. xl. 28 sqq.; Pa. cii.

27 sqq.). Out of this relation grew the belief in the existence of the individual after death. Such passages, however, as Ps. xvi. 10 sq., xlix. 15, lxxiii. 23 sqq., Job xix. 25-27, do not contain a clear and positive statement of the resurrection, but rather the kernel of hope and presentiment (Oehler and Schultz). The essential points of Old-Testament eschatology are the Messiah and his world-wide kingdom of peace and righteousness, and the sifting judgment upon God's people and against the world that is at enmity with it. In the Apocrypha the national hope of the Messianic coming is intense, and pictured in rich colors; and at the side of this the belief in personal immortality is brought out, which was afterwards so strong among the Pharisees at the time of Christ.

From an eschatological point of view, as in other respects, our Lord did not destroy, but fulfilled. Adopting the expression "kingdom of God," and associating it with his own person, he gives prominence to the expectation of that kingdom, which was so universal among the Jews. He also predicted his second coming, which implies his resurrection. We must notice the construction he gives to the views he takes up. In the parables of the kingdom of heaven he confirms the expectation of a Messianic judgment, but gives to it a purely moral (as opposed to a national) significance (Matt. viii. 11 sqq., xxi. 43, xxii. 1 sqq.). All will be rewarded in the final adjudication, according to their relation to Christ, with full communion with God on the one hand, or unending death (not annihilation) on the other (Matt. vii. 21 sqq., xxv. 31 sqq.). Of individual immortality our Lord speaks expressly only on special occasions, but then bases it upon our union with God (Matt. xxii. 23 sq.). Of this certainty the Gospel of John testifies most positively (iv. 14, v. 24, vi. 39 sq., 50 sq., x. 28, xi. 25 sqq.).

In the writings of the apostles three things are to be noticed: (1) Their first preaching of the gospel gives prominence to eschatological subjects (Acts ii. 17 sqq., iii. 19, x. 42, xvii. 30, 31); (2) The hope of eternal life is associated immediately with the person of a risen Christ, who will return again (1 Cor. xv.; Eph. i. 18 sq.; Col. iii. 3, 4; Heb. ix. 28; Jas. v. 7; 1 Pet. i. 7 sqq.; 1 John iii. 2, etc.); (3) This hope reaches out with confidence beyond this earthly development, and the moral distinction between heaven and earth shall be blotted out (1 Cor. xv. 44 sqq.; 2 Pet. iii. 10 sqq.; Rev. xxi. 22).

The Church, in its first period, opposed to heathenism and its pessimistic tendency a renunciation of the world, and a confident assurance of the victory with which it awaits the Lord and prosecutes the evangelization of the world. The second coming of Christ may be called the oldest church dogma (Dorner, Person of Christ). This early Chiliasm looked for an earthly Messianic kingdom. But, while the persecutions were still raging, the Alexandrian school, opposing itself to these worldly conceptions, claimed the future for the moral development of the individual, and affirmed degrees of bliss, the termination of punishment, and universal restoration. After the Church ascended the Roman throne, eschatological questions were made to give way to the burning questions concerning the present. But the Greek Church still held firmly to that notion of the incarnation which makes it the implanting of the germ of eternal life in our nature (Dorner). The Church of the middle ages presumed to have a jurisdiction beyond the grave, and developed the ideas of purgatorial fire. It was this eschatological excrescence of a Pelagianizing hierarchy which gave the external occasion for the Reformation. Four points were taken up in the eschatology of the Protestant confessions,—death, the resurrection, the judgment, and the consummation,—and stress laid upon the intimate connection of the seed of eternal life implanted here, and its perfect development hereafter. Rationalism knew only of a certainty of immortality which was based upon philosophical reasoning, and the prevalence of the belief among different peoples (Wegscheider). This was followed by the pantheistic renunciation of individual immortality. Finally came the triumphant sneer against the future life, as the last enemy of "speculative criticism" (Strauss, Glaubenslehre, § 106 sq.).

ESCOBAR Y MENDOZA, Antonio, b. at Valladolid, 1589; d. July 4, 1669; entered the Society of Jesus in 1604, and acquired a great name both as a preacher and as a writer. His collected works, mostly on morals, comprise forty volumes in folio. The principal are Summula Casuum Conscientiæ, Universæ Theologiæ Moralis Problemata, and Liber Theologiæ Moralis, the last of which appeared in Lyons, 1646, ran through forty editions in the author's lifetime, and has been translated into several foreign languages. His works give the most complete and also the most authoritative representation of the moral system which the Jesuits inculcated; and they far outdo any other attempt of the kind, even the writings of Busenbaum, in the audacious frivolity of their probabilism and the ludicrous subtlety of their casuistry. After passing through the hands of Pascal, Molière, and Boileau, they became an object of scorn, even to devout Roman Catholics; and in French speech the author's name, Escobarterie, is now synonymous with egotism, levity, and licentiousness adroitly covered up with hypocrisy.

ESCORIAL, or ESCURIAL, one of the most remarkable buildings in Europe,—at once a palace, a church, a convent, a mausoleum, and a museum,—is situated twenty-seven miles north-west of Madrid, at an elevation of thirty-five hundred feet above the level of the sea, in a barren and inhospitable waste. It was built by Philip II. (1563-93), in honor of St. Lawrence, on whose day (Aug. 10) the battle of St. Quentin was won (1557). With an allusion to the martyrdom of the saint, the ground-plan of the whole ensemble of buildings shows the form of a gridiron; and, in spite of its splendor and real magnificence, it makes a most gloomy and dismal impression. The church, one of the noblest in Europe, is three hundred and forty feet long, two hundred feet broad, and three hundred and twenty feet high under the dome. The convent houses two hundred monks of the order of the Hieronymites. The picture-gallery contains the masterpieces of Velasquez and Murillo.

ESNIK, b. at Kolp, near Mount Ararat, 397; d., as Bishop of Bagrewand, 478; was a pupil of Sahak and Mesrob; travelled in Mesopotamia, Syria, and Greece, whose language he learnt; took an active part in the conflict between the Christian Church in Armenia, and Parseeism, and wrote a book, which is still extant, against various forms of Pagan infidelity and Gnostic heresy. The book was first printed at Smyrna, 1762, and then by the Mekhitarists, Venice, 1826. It was translated into French by Le Vaillant de Florival: Réfutation des différentes Sectes, Paris, 1853.

ESPEN, Zeger Bernhard van, b. at Louvain, July 9, 1646; d. at Amersfort, in the diocese of Utrecht, Oct. 2, 1728; studied theology and canon law at the university of his native city, and was appointed professor there of canon law, 1675. As he sided with the Jansenists, his Jus Ecclesiasticum, which appeared at Louvain, 1700, was put on the Index; and he escaped from further persecution only by living in a very quiet and retired manner. Nevertheless, when, in 1723, the chapter of Utrecht elected an archbishop in opposition to the Roman curia, he stepped forward, and defended the election as valid. But he was then compelled to flee from Louvain, and all his works were put on the Index; which condemnation, however, does not seem to have detracted any thing from their authority. ESS, van, is the name of two Roman-Catholic priests in Germany, who in modern times have acquired a name as translators of the Bible. — Karl van Ess, b. Sept. 25, 1770, at Warburg, on the Diemel, in the diocese of Paderborn; d. Oct. 22, 1824, at Huysburg, near Halberstadt; entered the Benedictine abbey of Huysburg in 1788; was ordained priest in 1794; became prior in 1801, and was, after the secularization of his monastery in 1804, made first pastor of the congregation of Huysburg, and since 1811 also episcopal commissary for the dioceses of Magdeburg, Halberstadt, and Helmstädt. By the enthusiasm of his cousin Leander he was induced to take part in the translation of the New Testament; but when that movement of nationality and independence, which in the first decade of the present century affected also the relation between the Roman-Catholic Church in Germany and the Pope, subsided, and was followed by a strong ultramontane re-action, he left the enterprise, and seemed to change views. — Leander (properly Johann Heinrich: the other is his monkish name), b. at Warburg, Feb. 15, 1772; d. at Affolderbach, in the Odenwald, Oct. 13, 1847; entered the Benedictine abbey of Marienmünster, in the diocese of Paderborn, in 1790; was ordained priest in 1796; was appointed pastor of Schwalenberg in 1799, and professor of theology in the University of Marburg in 1812, but resigned his position in 1822, and lived thenceforward as a private gentleman. The translation of the New Testament, which he made in connection with his cousin Karl, appeared in 1807 at Brunswick, and ran through many editions. The first part of the translation of the Old Testament did not appear until 1822; the second followed, 1836; and the first edition of the whole Bible was published, 1840, at Sulzbach. He also gave out editions of the Vulgate (1822), the Septuagint (1824), and the Greek text of the New Testament (1827). Persecuted in every way by the Romanists for his zeal in spreading the Bible among laymen, he wrote a number of pamphlets in defence of his views, some of which have a scientific interest, as, for instance, his Geschichte der Vulgata, Tübingen, 1824. His library is now in the Union Theological Seminary, New-York City, and is extremely valuable, containing as it does that of the abbey of Marienmünster. It consists of over 13,000 volumes, including 430 incunabula, 1,246 numbers of reformation literature in original editions, 37 manuscripts, about 200 editions of the Vulgate and of German Bibles (the earliest being 1470). It was bought in April, 1838, at the suggestion of Dr. E. Robinson, one of the professors of the seminary.

ESSENCE (Latin essentia, from esse, "to be") denotes that which makes a thing to be what it is. The schoolmen made a distinction between essence and substance, referring the former to the logical combination of qualities expressed in the definition, the latter to the abstract notion of matter underlying all existence. Ancient philosophy, however, did not know this distinction, the Greek οὐσία denoting at once essence and substance; and so again in modern philosophy.

ESSENES, The. At the time when Christ appeared on earth, Judaism was divided into three religious parties,—the Pharisees, Sadducees, and Essenes. With the first two we are somewhat familiar from the New Testament, but not with the last, who were the object of admiration to Jews, heathens, and Christians, although their admirers are uncertain to this day whether they were Jews, or a school of Jewish proselytes, or, as Eusebius thinks, Christians.

Sources.—The sources from which our information is derived concerning the Essenes are, chiefly, Josephus (Jewish War, II. 8, 2-13; Antiquities, XIII. 5, 9, XV. 10, 4, 5, XVIII. 1, 2-6), Philo (Every virtuous man is free, §§ 12, 13 [Mangey's ed. ii. 457-459] and Apology for the Jews [preserved by Eusebius, Præp. Evang., VIII. 11, also found in Mangey's ed. ii. 632-634]), and Pliny (Nat. Hist., 5, 17). These sources were again made use of by Solinus, Porphyry, Eusebius, Hippolytus, and Epiphanius, all of whom copy either the one or the other.

Name.—As to the name, which is variously written in the Greek, it has provoked countless interpretations. The best is probably that given by Ewald, according to whom it means "the pious;" whilst Lightfoot prefers "the silent ones."

Origin. — As difficult as the explanation of the name is the fixing of the precise date of their origin. The probable date may be derived from Josephus, who assigns their rise to the time when the Pharisees and Sadducees had their origin; that is, in the middle of the second century before Christ. But it is questionable whether they were the outgrowth of Judaism, or whether they stand between Judaism and Hellenism. They were allied to the Pharisees, and yet with very distinctive differences: they were zealous for the law, and yet transgressed it; they were righteous in the spirit of the prophets, and yet more painfully intent than the Pharisees on outward purification. They were Jews, and yet shut themselves out from the nation; servants of Jehovah, and yet praying, like the heathen, to the sun. "They were," as Keim remarks, "like a mosaic picture, with no inward unity, — a phenomenon of religious despair."

Organization and Tenets. — According to Philo and Josephus, the number of the Essenes amounted at their time to more than four thousand, and they lived exclusively in the Holy Land and in the adjoining parts of Syria. But Pliny found the Essenes also on the western side of the Dead Sea, near the city of Engeddi; and, if we may believe Josephus, they were found everywhere. They lived in a separate community, having every thing in common. There existed no distinction among them. They lived peaceably with all men, reprobated slavery and war, and would not even manufacture any martial instruments whatever. They were governed by a president, who was elected by the whole body, and who also acted as judge of the community. All matters of the society were governed by a jury of at least a hundred members. A brother guilty of a gross offence was excommunicated, but received again after due repentance. Celibacy being the rule of the order, the ranks of the brotherhood had to be filled up by recruits from the Jewish community at large. They preferred taking children, whom they educated most carefully, and taught the practices of the order. Every grown-up candidate, upon entering the order, had to cast all his possessions into the common treasury. He then received a copy of the regulations of the brotherhood, a spade to bury the excrement, an apron to be used at lustrations, and a white robe to put on at meals. He was not at once admitted, but had to pass through a novitiate of twelve months, when he was admitted to the lustrations. Then followed another novitiate of two years; and at the end of this period he was admitted to the common meals, after having bound himself by a most solemn oath not to divulge any thing to outsiders, and to be open with the members of the order.

In order not to come in contact with such as did not practise the laws of Levitical purity, the Essenes raised the supplies of all their wants among themselves. Each one of the community took his share of work in the department in which he most excelled. Some were tillers of the ground; others tended flocks, and reared bees; some prepared the food; some made articles of dress; some attended to the sick, and some instructed the young; whilst all of them devoted certain hours to studying the mysteries of nature and revelation, and of the celestial hierarchy. They always got up before the sun rose, and never talked about any worldly matters till they had all assembled together, and, with their faces turned towards the sun, offered up their prayer. This done, every one betook himself to his allotted work. They remained at their work till about eleven o'clock A.M., when they assembled together for a common bath. Having put on their white robes, they entered, with great solemnity, the refectory, to partake of the common meal, which was very simple, consisting chiefly of vegetables. The blessing having been invoked by the priest, the repast commenced. The deepest silence reigned throughout, to be interrupted only by the priest, who concluded the meal by offering thanks; which was the sign of dismissal. Thereupon all withdrew, dressed themselves in their working-dress, resumed their several employments till the evening, when they assembled again in the aforesaid manner to partake of a common meal. Whilst every thing was done according to the directions of the overseers, yet they were at liberty to act as they pleased in relieving the distressed with as much money as they thought proper, and to manifest their compassion for those who were not of the brotherhood as much as they liked and whenever they liked. Such was their mode of living during the week. The Sabbath was observed very strictly. They prepared the food on the previous day in order that no fire need be lighted on the Sabbath, and did not dare to remove a vessel from its place on that day. They even restrained the necessities of the body. The whole day was given up to religious exercises and to exposition of the Scriptures. In the synagogue, as at meals, each one took his seat according to age, in becoming attire. One read aloud out of the law of their land, and the most experienced among them expounded, clothing the mystery in symbols. The others remained quiet, only giving a sign of assent or doubt with the head, the eye, or hand. In their abstention they went even so far as to abstain from anointing the body, which in hot climates is almost a necessity of life.

Theology of the Essenes. — They had a tendency to sun-worship. This tendency is rather a foreign element in Judaism. As has already been indicated above, at daybreak they addressed certain prayers to the sun, "as if entreating him to rise." They were careful, also, to conceal and bury all polluting substances, so as not "to insult the rays of the god." They denied the resurrection of the body, but believed in the immortality of the soul. Whilst they refused to offer sacrifices at Jerusalem, they sent gifts to the temple. They believed in angels; and to conceal the names of the angels was included in the oath taken by the candidate. They studied sacred books, which, however, are not described. They also learnt the qualities of roots and the properties of stones. By means of these and similar studies connected with their lustrations, the Essenes believed to be enabled to foretell the future; and Josephus affirms, that, in their prophecies, they seldom erred, giving some examples of fulfilled prophecies.

The question has been raised, and has been agitated by Continental scholars, whence Essenism derived its foreign influences, which distinguished it from Pharisaic Judaism; for, although most of the peculiarities which distinguish Essenism could be traced back to Judaism, yet there is an alien admixture of foreign elements which could hardly be reconciled with Judaism. Some have regarded the distinctive characteristics of the sect as an offshoot of the Neo-Pythagorean school grafted on the stem of Judaism. This solution is suggested by the statement of Josephus, that "they practise the mode of life which among the Greeks was introduced by Pythagoras." This theory has found its ablest and most persistent advocate in Zeller, who draws out the parallels with great force and precision (Geschichte der Philosophie der Griechen, III. 2, p. 281). This theory of Zeller was objected to by Lightfoot from a chronological and geographical stand-point, showing, on the one hand, the priority of Essenism to Neo-Pythagoreanism, and, on the other hand, that Essenism (having its home on the eastern borders of Palestine, the shores of the Dead Sea) was least of all exposed to the influences of Greek philosophy. Lightfoot is rather inclined to trace the tenets of Essenism back to the influence of Parseeism, and makes his assertion good by drawing out the parallels between both. Which of the two theories is the correct one is hard to decide. This much is certain, that the theories of Jewish and Christian writers who would explain Essenism from a Talmudic stand-point have no foundation at all. Of greater importance, however, is the question as to the relationship between—

Essenism and Christianity.—It has become a common practice with a certain class of Jewish and Christian writers to call Essenism to their aid in accounting for any distinctive features of Christianity. We cannot enter into a refutation of the points of resemblance between Essenism and Christianity adduced by such writers as Graetz and Ginsburg. This theory has been ably treated and refuted by Lightfoot. Suffice it to say that Essenism, notwithstanding all its favorable effect upon individuals, had no influence upon the Jewish people in particular, or upon the world in general. "Essenism," as Keim says, "was, in fact, only an admission of helplessness against the actual state of things, renouncing the attempt to restore all Israel, to which it was opposed as heterodox and impure. . . . In short, the salvation of individuals in the general shipwreck is frankly the watchword of the party. We hear nothing from them of a cry for the kingdom of God, nor for the Messiah, since these were enclosed within their own limits. . . . We may learn from its weakness, that the healing power which arose upon the nation, and, indeed, upon the world, with fresh creative fruitfulness, cannot be counted among the impulses and forces of Essenism."

LIT.—The literature on the Essenes is very rich. Besides what has been enumerated by SCHÜRER (Lehrbuch der Neutestamentlichen Zeitgeschichte, Leipz., 1874, pp. 599 sq.), see KEIM: The ESTHER (star, from the Persian sitareh), the Persian name of the Jewish Hadassah (ii. 7), and the adopted daughter of Mordecai, her cousin. After the deposition of Vashti, her charms won the admiration of Ahasuerus, who chose her above many competitors for his queen. Through her mediation the extermination of the Jews in the Persian Empire was averted, and their bitter enemy, Haman, executed. Esther's patriotism and heroism have won for her a place beside Deborah and Judith in the gratitude of her nation.

Book of. The Book of Esther describes the elevation of Esther to the Persian throne, the overthrow of Haman's scheme for the destruction of the Jews, and Haman's own ignominious death. The scene is laid in Susa, at the court of Ahasuerus (Xerxes). The book opens with the description of a great feast for the princes of the empire (488 B.C.), the deposition of Queen Vashti for refusal to comply with the king's request (i. 12), and the elevation of Esther to the throne. The narrative then dwells upon the power of the prime minister Haman, his wounded pride at the refusal of Mordecai to bend before him, and his plot to exterminate all the Jews in the empire, out of revenge (iii. 6). He secured a decree to this end; and the Pur, or lot for its execution, fell on the thirteenth day of Adar (iii. 7). The wariness of Mordecai, and Esther's influence over the emperor, were used to secure counter-legislation, whereby the evil effects of the irreversible decree were averted (v. 6). The Oriental monarch now changes his mind towards Haman himself, and orders him to be hung on the gallows he had erected for Mordecai (vii. 9). At this point, with the humiliation of Haman's haughty pride and the deliverance of the people by the counter decree, the story culminates. The book closes with the appointment of a national festival to commemorate the deliverance, and a notice of the advancement of Mordecai to Haman's place of power. The whole narrative is told with consummate dramatic skill. It gives a striking illustration of patriotism, a terrible warning against pride and contempt for inferiors, and shows how the self-sacrificing devotion of the heroine fits in with the workings of Divine Providence to defeat the plot of the enemy.

The authorship has been attributed to Morde-cai (Clement of Alexandria), Ezra (Augustine), and Joiakim, the high priest. These names are nothing more than conjectures. But the references to Ahasuerus and Mordecai (comp. i. 1 sqq., x. 1 sqq.) make it necessary that the work should have been written after their death. As to the time of composition, we can only speak with probability. Eichhorn, Keil, and others put it in the reign of Artaxerxes I. (464-425 B.C.); but the style rather points to the Greek period (about 325 B.C.). [Rawlinson fixes upon 444-434 B.C. as the date. That the author wrote in Persia is made very probable by the accuracy of the references to Persian customs, and the absence of all allusion to Palestine.]

The authenticity has been questioned, but without good reason. The allusions to Persian manners are minute and accurate. The luxurious habits and capricious temper of Xerxes are in exact accord with the portraiture of secular history. The great assembly of his princes, recorded in chap. i., agrees with the statement of Herodotus, that the king began to make preparations for his Grecian campaign in the third year of his reign. That Herodotus does not mention Esther (for Amestris cannot be identified with her) offers no difficulty when we remember that Persian monarchs did not limit themselves to one wife. But an irrefutable argument for the truth of the narrative is the Feast of Purim, which commemorates the facts, and is inexplicable on any other hypothesis than that they occurred.

The religious character of the work has from the earliest times been the subject of unfavorable criticism. It makes not a single mention of God by name, and yet mentions the Persian monarch a hundred and eighty-seven times. Luther speaks of its marked Judaistic features, and its heathen frivolity, and thought it unworthy of a place in the canon. Others have spoken of the spirit of national revenge and pride which pervades it (De Wette). But, in spite of these criticisms, the book is not irreligious in tone. The fast which Esther orders, and the heroic words of Mordecai, indicate the very opposite (iv. 14-16). The latter's refusal to bow down before Haman was based upon his regard for the Jewish law. And, if the religious allusions are few, this is due to the fear of profaning the sacred in a book which was to be read at joyous feasts. The canonicity of Esther was at one time questioned in the Jewish Church, as we infer from the conduct of the eighty-five elders in opposing the observance of the Feast of Purim. In the early Greek Church it was placed by some (e.g., Athanasius) amongst the Apocrypha; but the Latin Church always held it to be canonical.

In the Septuagint Esther appears with apocryphal additions, which were no doubt made by some Hellenistic Jew. They bear on their face the marks of being spurious, inaccurate as their references to Persian customs are, and designed as their frequent mention of the name of God is, to give to the original work a specifically religious character.

ÆTHELBERT, or ÆTHELBERHT, d. Feb. 24, 616; king of Kent 560-616, and, since 593, bretwalda among the Anglo-Saxon kings; married Bertha, a daughter of Charibert, king of Paris, and allowed her to practise her own Christian religion at the old Roman-British Church of St. Martin, in Canterbury, under the guardianship of her bishop, Liudhard, but seems to have taken no further interest in the peculiar faith of his wife. When Augustine, however, landed at the Isle of Thanet in 597, he was well received by Ethelbert, who was converted and baptized in the very same year; and it seems that Ethelbert henceforward used all his influence as king and bretwalda for the promotion of Christianity. He removed the royal residence to Reculver (Regulbium), and left Canterbury to Augustine; he aided in the rebuilding of the old Roman church, and himself built a large monastery (St. Augustine) outside the walls of Canterbury; and, among the ninety dooms and decrees of his which are extant (THORPE: Ancient Laws and Institutes of England), one makes provision for the security of the property of the church and the ecclesiastical officials. He issued (600) the earliest code of Anglo-Saxon laws now extant. He founded the see of Canterbury (602) and that of Rochester (604).

ÆTHELDREDA, St., a daughter of the East Anglian king, Anna, made a vow that she would remain a virgin, and kept her word, though she was twice married, first to Tondbert, an East-Anglian prince, who died shortly after the marriage, and then to Egfrid, King of Northumbria, from whom she was divorced. After the divorce had taken place (671), she retired to the Isle of Ely, where she led a life of severe asceticism, and died from the plague, June 23, 679. See BUTLER: Lives of Saints, June 23.

ETHERIDGE, John Wesley, a Methodist Orientalist; b. at Grangewood, near Newport, Isle of Wight, Feb. 24, 1804; d. at Camborne, May 24, 1866. Although not a university man, he made himself master of Latin, Greek, Hebrew, Syriac, French, and German. He was nearly all his life a circuit preacher, yet found time to prepare valuable books showing biblical and linguistic learning. In 1848 he received the degrees of M. A. and Ph. D. from the University of Heidelberg. His chief works are Horæ Aramaicæ, comprising Concise Notices of the Aramean Dialects in General, and of the Versions of Holy Scripture Extant in them, with Translations of St. Matthew and Epistle to the Hebrews, from the Ancient Peshito Version, London, 1843; The Syrian Churches, their Early History, Liturgies, and Literature, London, 1846 (contains a translation of the four Gospels from the Peshitto); The Apostolical Acts and Epistles, from the Peshito, or Ancient Syriac, to which are added the Remaining Epistles and the Book of Revelation, after a Later Syriac Text, translated with Prolegomena and Indices, London, 1849; Jerusalem and Tiberias; Sora and Cordova, a Survey of the Religious and Scholastic Learning of the Jews, designed as an Introduction to the Study of Hebrew Literature, London, 1856; The Targums of Onkelos and Jonathan Ben Uzziel on the Pentateuch, with the Fragments of the Jerusalem Targum, from the Chaldee, London, 1862-65, 2 vols. He wrote also Lives of Adam Clarke (London, 1858, N.Y., 1860) and Thomas Coke (London, 1860). See THORNLEY SMITH: Memoir of Rev. John Wesley Etheridge, London, 1871.

ETHICS, from the Greek ἠθός, which, besides the objective element (customs, habits, the Latin mores, whence disciplina moralis), also includes a subjective element, a conscious feeling at home in the customs, an approval by conscience of the habits, which transforms the merely mechanical routine into responsible action, and elevates the merely instinctive disposition to character.

Ethics is the science of conduct; Christian ethics, the scientific representation of the truths of Christianity in their practical application to individual life as duties and ideals. (Philosophical ethics, see MORAL PHILOSOPHY.) In the science of divinity considered as an organic whole ethics occupies a position of its own as one part of systematic theology. From exegesis and church history it is distinguished by its very object; for it is neither a demonstration of what, according to the authentic documents of the divine revelation, is true Christianity, nor a record of what, in the course of history, has vindicated itself as such, but an exposition, with respect to a peculiar sphere,—the sphere of conduct,—of Christianity as the highest truth. Less distinct is its relation to dogmatics, which forms the other part of systematical theology. At one time it was treated as a mere appendix to dogmatics; at another it was fairly in the way to entirely supersede it. In general, however, the relation between dogmatics and ethics may be defined as that between the theoretical and practical aspects of the same thing; not that ethics has no theoretical interest, and dogmatics no practical bearing: on the contrary, the connection between them is a deep, reciprocal interdependence.

Rich materials for a Christian ethics are found in the writings of the apostolical fathers, Clemens Romanus, Ignatius, Polycarp, Barnabas, Hermas. They refer mostly to individual life, often also to married life and the family, and sometimes to the church (Ignatius, Hermas, Clemens Romanus). Still more deeply Tertullian penetrated into the subject in his numerous ethical writings,—De spectaculis, De velandis virginibus, De monogamia, De penitentia, etc.—everywhere expounding his peculiar conception of Christianity as a spiritual power which shall keep aloof from the Pagan world, organize its children into a compact army, attack Paganism in closed ranks, conquer it, judge it. Starting from quite a different conception of Christianity, and not at all afraid of adopting elements of Greek philosophy, Clemens Alexandrinus develops a number of striking ethical ideas in his Pædagogus, Stromata, Exhortation to the Pagans, etc. To him Christianity is a spiritual power, which certainly raises the soul far above any epicurean eudæmonism, or stoical apathy, or merely negative asceticism, but whose proper task it is to get itself naturalized in the world, to penetrate its every fibre, to regenerate it. With Cyprian (De ecclesiæ unitate, De observatione disciplinae, etc.) the church comes into prominence in the sphere of ethics, not simply as governing Christian life, legislating for it, influencing it in many various ways, but as the very centre of the whole field of ethics: to every Christian individual his relation to the church now becomes the principal ethical relation of his life. The full realization of this idea was the result of a long development; but in this development Cyprian occupies a central position.

His views were the natural outcome of the Montanist and the Novatian movements; and they reached their perfection by Augustine's victory over the Donatists. While the Montanists accepted the sudden outbursts of individual enthusiasm as the true medium through which the Holy Spirit communicates with the congregation, and consequently demanded absolute obedience to the dictates of this ecstatic prophecy as a condition of communion between the spirit and the individual, the Novatians found the true vehicle of spiritual communion in the church itself considered as a totality, as an organization of the universal priesthood under presbyterial forms; and they were consequently very rigorous with respect to admission to membership. Cyprian opposed both parties, and did so in favor of the hierarchical development of the idea of the church. Though he asserted the possibility of a second penance, and rejected the possibility of a church of saints, he agreed with the Novatians in the holiness of the church as a totality; but this totality he found represented by the episcopacy, which, in its nature and essence, is one and undivided, though in reality it is distributed over a plurality of individuals. With this idea of the episcopacy as the true expression of the unity of the church, he turned upon the Montanists, and opposed to their abrupt, sporadic, and incidental ecstasies the sacrament of ordination as the true medium of communion between the spirit and the church. He did not go the full length, however, of his own argument. He never dared assert that infallibility and personal holiness followed as necessary effects of the sacrament. He demanded blind obedience to the bishop, but he granted that the congregation might expel an unholy and unworthy bishop. He stopped in a self-contradiction. The Council of Nicæa led the way out of this contradiction by basing the infallibility of the church, its inspiration, not upon the individual bishop, but upon the collective episcopacy, the œcumenical council; and when the Donatists, nevertheless, vehemently urged the holiness of the bishop as an absolute condition of the holiness of the church, Augustine was naturally led to object, that, in that case, the whole idea was reduced to something merely subjective, and quite impalpable. It is not necessary, he said, that the sacrament of ordination shall confer personal infallibility and personal holiness on the ordained: it is sufficient, when it gives authority in teaching, efficacy in the administration of the sacraments, and power to govern the congregation; for the church is holy, not on account of the holiness of its members, but because it is a divine institution: its holiness is impersonal. Thereby the foundation was laid for the hierarchical fabric soon to be reared, and thereby the ethical relation between the church and the individual was fixed in a manner soon to become strikingly apparent; for the more vigorously the church developed as a divine institution, a holy state, the more closely its ethics assumed the aspect of a criminal code. A new, so-called higher virtue, with the character of a pre-eminently negative asceticism, and blooming forth in monasticism, virginity, poverty, etc., became the real focus of Christian life, and found in the penitential its true literary expression. Ethical studies, in the broader and sounder sense of the word, were few and far between; nor do they generally evince any marked originality. Ambrose, De officiis (comp. J. Dæseke, Ciceronis et Ambrosii de officiis Libri III., etc., Augsburg, 1875); Gregory the Great, Magna Moralia; Martin of Bracara, Formula honestæ vitæ; Alcuin, De virtutibus et vitiis; Paschasius Radbertus, De fide, spe, et caritate—that is about all produced down to the time of Thomas Aquinas. On the other hand, the so-called Libri Penitentiales (that is, collections of disciplinary precepts extracted from the apostolical constitutions, the fathers, and the canons of the councils) were innumerable: some of the most prominent are those made by Johannes Jejunator, Fulgentius Ferrandus, Cresconius, Theodorus Cilix, Bede, and Rhabanus Maurus.

The ethics of the mediæval mystics is also ascetic, but the asceticism is there of another and higher type. By John Scotus Erigena the Greek mysticism—represented by Makarius the Egyptian, Dionysius Areopagita, and Maximus Confessor—was introduced into the Latin world, and became the starting-point of the mysticism of the Western Church, both in its Romanic form (Hugo and Richard of St. Victor, Bernard of Clairvaux, Bonaventura, Gerson, Molino) and in its Germanic form (Suso, Ruysbroeck, Tauler, Eckart). So far as this mysticism developed an ethics, the principle of the false asceticism was retained. The contradiction between finite and infinite, matter and spirit, world and God, was left standing. To escape from the finite, to die away from the world, to crush the flesh, was still considered the only true ethical process. But to this mere negation was added a positive object,—to be absorbed by the infinite, to arrive at spiritual freedom, to live in God; and thereby the mainspring of Christian ethics was actually touched. When, nevertheless, the mediæval mystics failed to produce a true ethics, the reason was that they lacked that conception of the human personality which achieves a perfect union of finite and infinite by means of the created soul's capability to receive the divine,—an idea which first obtained full scope in Luther's doctrine of faith and justification by faith. Alongside with the mystics—who, in spite of all shortcomings, form the real sap-carrying vesicles both of ethics and dogmatics during the middle ages—the scholastics went their own way, in some respects continuators, they too, of asceticism, though generally more deeply engaged in other directions. After the example of Petrus Lombardus, they used to incorporate a certain amount of ethical materials with their dogmatical sententiæ and summae. To the four philosophical virtues—justitia, fortitudo, moderatio, and sapientia—the three theological virtues were added,—faith, hope, and charity; thus making the sacred seven full. The internal relation, however, between these two groups of virtues always remained somewhat vague. The best treatment which the subject found among the schoolmen was that by Thomas Aquinas, in his Prima et secunda secundæ, which became the model for all later Roman-Catholic ethics. But, besides these products of the theoretical interest of the scholastic philosophy, the practical wants of the confessional called forth a luxuriant ethical literature of quite another type, the so-called casuistry. (See article.)

When the Reformation took its final stand upon Scripture, it not only escaped the great errors of the middle ages, but it also succeeded in establishing the true principles of Christian ethics. By the new doctrines of faith, and justification by faith, the fundamental ethical ideas of duty, virtue, and highest good, were, so to speak, melted down and recast. A new ethics appeared, bearing the characteristic marks of the double development of the Protestant or evangelical principle,—the Lutheran Church, with its talent for plastic representation, art, hymnology, science; and the Reformed Church, with its talent for practical action, discipline, missions, statesmanship. Though neither Luther nor Calvin has written on ethics, in the proper sense of the word, both have occasionally treated of various ethical subjects, such as prayer, oath, marriage, civil authority, etc., especially in the form of expositions of the Decalogue in the Catechism. The Catechism is, indeed, the primitive form of evangelical ethics. Just as evangelical dogmatics arose from the regula fidei and the apostolical symbolum, so evangelical ethics grew out of the Decalogue. The religious relations of ethics were treated under the first three Commandments,—more especially the doctrines of worship, prayer, and devotion, under the third,—family, education, school, state, and civil authority, under the fourth; the duties towards our neighbors, temperance, care of the body, also the question of capital punishment, under the fifth; marriage and chastity, under the sixth; property and honor, under the seventh and eighth. Even the scientific writers retained for a long time this form; as, for instance, David Clytræus (Virtutum descriptiones, 1555), Paul von Eitzen (Ethica doctrinae libri IV., 1571), Lambert Danæus (Ethices Christianæ, Geneva, 1577). Nevertheless, it cannot be denied that the evangelical churches, especially the Lutheran Church, in the beginning, showed a lack of fertility in the field of ethical science; and the reason seems to have been a certain awkwardness in the establishment of the true relation between philosophical and theological ethics. The new principle was obtained in the doctrines of faith, and justification by faith. Materials were plentifully at hand in the works of the ancient philosophical ethics; but the evangelical theologians felt a certain shyness when applying the new principle to the old materials, and for some time this, the most fertile of all ethical principles, was left in a state of lonesome grandeur, like a king without subjects. Melancthon, in his Philosophia moralis (1539) and Enaratio aliquot librorum Aristotelis (1545), derived his whole system from general human consciousness and philosophical knowledge, without attempting to give to Christian ethics an entirely new shape by the application of the principle of faith. In his Systema ethica (Geneva, 1614), Keckermann places the philosophical ethics after the theological, as the practical part. The theological ethics deals only with vita interior, the bonum gratia, the vir pius et religiosus; the philosophical, only with the bonum civile, the felicitas civilis, the vir probus et honestus. Less mechanical was Calixtus, in his Epitome theologicæ moralis, Helmstädt, 1634. He distinguishes between philosophical and theological ethics by distinguishing between a natural and a supernatural law; but he defines both laws as eternal, and ascribes to human nature an ineffaceable right within Christianity, and to Christianity an internal affinity to human reason. What was needed as a preparation for a completely harmonious union of the philosophical and theological principles in ethics was an independent development of each of them; and a development in that direction — in the direction of the emancipation of the philosophical principle — began with Hugo Grotius, Puffendorf, and Thomasius. In his De jure pacis et belli (Paris, 1625), Grotius defines the highest good, and the duty therein involved, as the weal of the community. His antagonist, Schomer, proposed as the fundamental ethical maxim, Follow Reason and her innate ideas. Lorenz von Mosheim finally introduced the principle of happiness in ethics, and thereby opened the long series of eudæmonistic attempts. On the other hand, Buddeus (Institutiones theologicæ moralis, 1711), J. F. Reuss (Elementa theologicæ moralis, 1767), and C. A. Crusius (Moraltheologie, Leipz., 1772), developed the principle of faith as the true principle of Christian ethics, defining the highest good as the kingdom of heaven, though placing the kingdom of heaven beyond the earth.

A philosophical ethics, truly deserving the name, was first founded, however, by Kant (Kritik d. prak. Vernunft, Metaphysik der Sitten, etc.). Ethics then became severed from religion by the autonomy of the individual; but an end was put forever to the flat eudæmonism of the ethics of the Wolfian school. The subjectivism of Kant having reached its last consequences in Fichte, philosophy turned with Schelling once more towards objectivism; and on this basis of identity of subject and object Schleiermacher became the founder of modern theological ethics. He returned to the old idea of the kingdom of heaven as the highest good, — an idea which had entirely disappeared from the ethics of the Wolfian and Kantian schools, — but without adopting either the definition of Buddeus, as an indefinite realm beyond the grave, or the definition of the Roman-Catholic moralists, as a ready-made institution on earth, — the Church. The kingdom of heaven he found produced and reproduced in every sphere of human life — church, state, science, art, family, marriage, etc. — by the virtuous action of the individual. In his Monologen (1800) he set forth a multitude of new ethical ideas; and in his Grundlinien einer Kritik der bisherigen Sittensysteme (1803) he approached the centre of the subject. In 1819 he wrote for the Berlin Academy several spirited essays (Ueber den Tugendbegriff, Pflichtbegriff, etc.); but his complete system did not appear until after his death, edited by Twesten and A. Schweizer (1835). Harless (Christliche Ethik, 1842 [translated by Morrison, Edinburgh, 1868]) is not strictly scientific in method, and returns to a pre-Kantian stand-point. After Schleiermacher, the greatest production of evangelical theology in the field of ethics is, no doubt, Richard Rothe's Theologische Ethik (Wittenberg, 1845-48, 3 vols., 2d ed., 1867). Rothe was at once a pupil of Schleiermacher and Hegel. In his Rechtsphilosophie Hegel had established the State as the highest good, in direct opposition to the doctrine of the Roman-Catholic ethics; and this idea Rothe retained, making it the object of the Church, so to speak, to resolve itself into the State. Beside Rothe must be mentioned Schmid (Christliche Sittenlehre, ed. by A. Heller, Stuttgart, 1861, noticeable especially for its development of the idea of the law). Strongly polemical, both against Schleiermacher and Rothe, is Wutke (Handbuch der christlichen Sittenlehre, 3d ed., Leipzig, 1874, 2 vols. [translated by Lacroix, N.Y., 1873, 2 vols.], giving in the first part of first volume an interesting survey of the history of ethics). Noticeable are also the works of A. von Oettingen (Die Moralstatistik u. die christliche Sittenlehre, Erlangen, 1872 sqq., 2 vols.); J. Chr. von Hofmann (Theologische Ethik, Nördlingen, 1878) and H. Martensen (Den christelige Ethik, Copenhagen, 1871-78, 3 vols., Eng. trans., Edinburgh, 1873-82, 3 vols.); though both are of a somewhat more popular character.

The ethics of the Roman-Catholic Church continued, from the middle ages down to the eighteenth century, to run along in the two above described parallel lines, — scholasticism and mysticism. The peculiar legalism of the former is often apparent from the very title of their works, — De jure et justitia (Joh. de Lugo; Dominicus a Soto). Among the principal representatives of the latter are Bellarmine, St. Theresa, Francis of Sales, Molinos, Pascal, Arnault, Nicole Perrault. But, when the quietism of Molinos was condemned, the whole mystical branch of Roman-Catholic ethics withered, and the Jesuits were left alone in the field. They lost, however, all hold on public confidence by their doctrine of probabilism, by their attack on Port Royal, and by the merely mechanical method of their ethics. But from the philosophy the Roman-Catholic, like the evangelical moralists, received powerful and fertile impulses during the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries: from the Wolfian school, Luby, Schwazhüber, Schanza, Stadler; from the Kantian school, Wanker, Mutschelle, Hermes, Elvenich, Vogelsang; from Fichte, Geishüttner; from Schelling, C. Weiller. More independent are Michael Sailer (Handbuch der christ. Moral, 1834), Werner (System der christ. Ethik, Ratisbon, 1850-52, 3 vols.), Palasthy (Theologia Morum Catholica, Buda, 1861, 4 vols.), and Simar (Lehrbuch d. kath. Moraltheologie, Bonn, 1867, giving a survey of the history of Roman-Catholic ethics).

ETHNARCH (ἔθναρχης, "ruler of a nation") was the title of a ruler or prince, who, though not fully independent, or possessed of royal power, nevertheless governed his people according to their national laws. It was specially applicable to the Jews, after their relations with the Romans had begun, and several of their rulers bore it; as, for instance, Simon (1 Macc. xiv. 47), his son Hyrcanus (Josephus, Arch., 14, 8, 5), and Archelaus, the son and successor of Herod. It was, however, also applied among other nations. Thus King Aretas had settled an ethnarch at Damascus (2 Cor. xi. 32).

ETSHMIADZIN, or ECHMIEDZIN, a famous Armenian monastery, situated fifteen miles west of the city of Erivan, in Asiatic Russia. It was founded in 524, contains a valuable library, is the seat of the Catholics, or patriarch of the whole Armenian Church.

ETTWEIN, John, a Moravian bishop; b. at Freudenstadt, Württemberg, June 20, 1721; d. Jan. 2, 1802. In 1754 he emigrated to America, and labored efficiently as evangelist and bishop. In 1772 he led the Christian Indians from Susquehanna County in Pennsylvania to the Tuscarawas in Ohio. He enjoyed friendly intercourse with Washington, and devoted himself to the care of the sick soldiers in the general army hospital at Bethlehem, Penn. In 1784 he was appointed a bishop. In 1787 he founded the Society of the United Brethren for Propagating the Gospel among the Heathen, to which Congress granted several townships on the Tuscarawas, in trust, for the Christian Indians.

EUCHARIUS was, together with Valerius and Maternus, sent by the apostle Peter across the Alps to preach the gospel in the Valley of the Rhine, and occupied the episcopal chair of Treves for twenty-five years. According to the criticism of the Bollandists he belongs to the second half of the third century; and the legends of his missions and miracles are mere fables:

EUCHELAION, in the Greek Church, is the "prayer oil," consecrated by seven priests, and used for the unction of the sick. It is counted one of the seven sacraments of the church, and corresponds to the extreme unction of the Roman Church, but is not limited to cases of mortal illness. See EXTREME UNCTION.

EUCHERIUS, St., d. about 450; was b. at Lyons, of a distinguished family, and was a senator, and married; when, in 422, he entered the monastery of Lerinum, and became a monk. He afterwards retired to the Island of Lero (St. Marguerite), where he lived as a hermit till 434, when he was elected Bishop of Lyons. He has left several works, among which are Epistola de contemptu mundi et secularis philosophiæ (edited by Rosweid, Antwerp, 1621), Epistola de laude eremi (edited by Rhenanus, Basel, 1516, and by Erasmus, Basel, 1520), Liber formularum spiritualium, etc. Collected editions of his works were given by BRASSICANUS (Basel, 1531), also in Biblioth. Patr. Max. (Lyon, Tom. VI.), and in MIGNÉ, Patrol. Lat., vol. 50, containing, however, many spurious writings. See A. MELLIER: De vita et scriptis sancti Eucherii, Lyon, 1878; A. GOUILLARD: Saint Eucher, Lérins et l'église de Lyon au Ve siècle, Lyon, 1881.

EUCHITES. See MESSALIANS.

EUCHOLOGION (εὐχολόγιον, "collection of prayers") is in the later Greek Church the common name for books on liturgy, and rituals. It occurs for the first time in the writings of Anastasius Sinaita (Quest. 141) in the sixth century, but is afterwards very frequent in the liturgical works of the Byzantines. Numerous manuscripts of books of this kind, in which the Greek Church was much richer than the Latin, are found in the libraries of Vienna, Rome (Bibliotheca Barberina), Paris, Venice, and the monasteries of Mount Athos. A series of printed editions have appeared at Venice since 1526 (1544, 1553, 1570, etc.); but the best and most complete edition is that by Jacobus Goar, Paris, 1645.

EUDEMONISM. See EPICUREANISM.

EUDES, Jean, founder of the Eudists; b. at Mezerai, in Normandy, Nov. 14, 1601; d. at Caen, Aug. 19, 1680; was educated by the Jesuits at Caen; entered the Congregation of the Oratory in Paris, 1623; was ordained priest in 1625; labored among the plague-stricken people of Normandy and as a missionary among the clergy; was in 1639 made superior of the House of the Oratorians at Caen, but was shortly after called to Paris by Cardinal Richelieu, for the purpose of founding an ecclesiastical seminary. This plan was foiled by the death of the cardinal; but, on the advice of several bishops, Eudes, nevertheless, left his order, and founded an independent congregation—the Eudists, or the Congregation of Jesus and Mary—for the education of priests and for missions among the clergy. The congregation, however, never attained any great importance. During the storms of the Revolution it was dissolved. In 1826 it was re-established. It has a college in Indiana. HERZOG.

EUDOCIA, Empress, wife of Theodosius II.; was b. at Athens; the daughter of a sophist; came while very young to Constantinople, where she captivated not only Pulcheria, but also her brother, with her accomplishments; was baptized, and married to the emperor, 413 or 421. The latter part of her married life was clouded, however, by some misunderstanding between her and her husband; and she lived, separated or divorced, in Palestine. Photius mentions several works by her, — a paraphrase in verse of the Pentateuch, Joshua, etc.; a poem on the martyrdom of St. Cyprian, etc., — and he praises them much; but they have not come down to us. She is also said to have finished the Centones Homericæ of Patricius, — a life of Christ composed of verses, or fragments of verses, of Homer, printed at Frankfurt, 1541, Paris, 1578, and Leipzig, 1793.

EUDOXIA, Empress, wife of Arcadius; descended from a Frankish family; was married to the emperor, April 27, 395, and d. Nov. 6, 404. The origin of the enmity between her and Chrysostom is not clear, but she caused his banishment in 403. The horror which seized the inhabitants of Constantinople on account of an earthquake compelled her to recall him; but his denunciations of the Pagan chants and dances which accompanied the inauguration of her silver statue, raised in front of the Church of St. Sophia, exasperated her to such a degree, that she caused him to be banished a second time. See CHRYSOSTOM.

EUDOXIUS was made Bishop of Germanicia, on the confines of Syria, Cilicia, and Cappadocia, in 331, Bishop of Antioch in 347, and finally Patriarch of Constantinople in 360. He died in 370. He was a full-blooded Arian, a disciple of Aëtius, a friend of Eunomius, and the leader of the Anomæan party. Baronius calls him the worst of all the Arians.

EUGENIUS is the name of four popes. — Eugenius I. (Aug. 10, 654–June 1, 657) was a weak character, who for the sake of peace, and in order to escape the fate of his predecessor, Martin I., who had been sent in banishment by the emperor to the Thracian Chersonesus, made an agreement with Pyrrhus, Patriarch of Constantinople, and leader of the Monothelites, on the basis that Christ had neither one nor two wills, but three (unam super duas), — a compromise worthy of a farce. See JAFFÉ: Regest. Pont. Rom.; BOWER: History of the Popes, III. 70. — Eugenius II. (June, 824–August, 827) submitted with good grace to the imperial sway which Louis the Pious still exercised over the Church, in imitation of his father. Louis sent his son Lothair to Rome with an army, to establish order and peace in the city; and the decrees of a council which he convened at Paris (November, 825), and which decided the question of image-worship in the same spirit as the synod of Frankfurt, were accepted and confirmed by Eugenius, though without exercising any influence on the practice of the Roman Church. See JAFFÉ: Regest. Pont. Rom. — Eugenius III. (Feb. 15, 1145–July 8, 1153) was a monk from Cîteaux, and a pupil of St. Bernard of Clairvaux. Immediately after his election, the Roman people rose, and demanded that he should content himself with the spiritual authority, and renounce all secular power. He fled to Viterbo, laid interdict upon the rebellious city, and succeeded in returning in 1146. But in the mean time Arnold of Brescia had begun his stirring agitations; and Eugenius was compelled to flee a second time. Over Siena and Brescia he went to Treves, and thence to Paris, accompanied by St. Bernard, holding synods and conferences, and enjoying a good reception everywhere. By the aid of Roger of Sicily he was enabled to return to Rome in 1149; but in the beginning of 1150 he left the city again, driven away by the Republicans. He afterwards lived mostly at Segni. The principal event of his reign was the second crusade. His letters are found in JAFFÉ: Reg. Pont. Rom.; the sources of his life, in WATERICH: Pont. Rom. Vita, II. — Eugenius IV. (March 3, 1431–Feb. 23, 1447) began his reign by stirring up the hatred of the family of Colonna against him. The Colonnas fled; and in the war which he waged, in connection with Florence and Venice, against Milan and Naples, they took the side of his enemies. One province of the Papal States was conquered after the other. In Rome rebellion broke out, and (June 4, 1433) Eugenius fled in disguise to Florence. But the greatest danger to him was the Council of Basel, opened March 12, 1431. It first assumed the character of an episcopal aristocracy, and then changed into an ecclesiastical democracy; but under both forms it was in decided opposition to the Pope. Eugenius tried to dissolve it (1437), but failed. The council deposed him, and set up an antipope, Felix V. Meanwhile, Eugenius succeeded in convening a more tractable council at Ferrara (1438), which the following year was transferred to Florence; and the refractory council of Basel, and its antipope, gradually sank into insignificance. In his warfare he also experienced a change of fortune, especially after he abandoned his old allies, the republics, and united himself with his old enemies, the monarchies. In 1443 he was enabled to return to Rome. See BOWER, Hist. of the Popes, VII. 238, and the sources to the history of the Council of Basel. G. VOIGT.

EUGIPPIUS, or EUGYPIIUS, a monk of Italian descent; lived for some time in the monastery of St. Severinus, near Fabianæ, in Noricum; returned after the death of the saint, and carrying his remains with him, to Castrum Lucullanum, near Naples, and wrote (in 511) a Vita St. Severini, often printed, best by Friedrich, at the end of the first volume of his Kirchengesch. Deutschlands. Besides this work, which is invaluable for the first period of the church history of Germany, he also compiled a Thesaurus ex D. Augustini Operibus, Basel, 1542; composed a set of monastic rules, etc.

EUEMERUS, a Greek philosopher who flourished about 300 B.C.; was the originator of that principle of interpreting the Pagan mythology according to which each myth is supposed to have developed from some simple historical event as its kernel. This principle of interpretation, Euhemerism, was afterwards much in favor with Tertullian, Clement of Alexandria, Lactantius, Chrysostom, and others of the church fathers. Of the works of Euhemerus, nothing has come down to us but a fragment of a Latin translation by Ennius.

EULALIUS was put up as antipope against Boniface I. (in 418), after the death of Zosimus, by a minority of the clergy of Rome, and the city prefect, Symmachus. The emperor convened a council to decide the question, and ordered the two contenders meanwhile to leave the city. Boniface obeyed; but Eulalius did not, and was consequently banished from the city by the emperor. He was afterwards made Bishop of Nepe, and kept quiet during the reign of Boniface I. After the death of the latter the friends of Eulalius wished him to step forward and try to enforce his claims; but he declined.

EULOGIA (εὐλογία), properly fine, sonorous speech, then praise, benediction, consecration. Thus the formulas with which the liturgical materials were consecrated, or the benediction of the congregation spoken by the bishops and presbyters, were called "eulogia." From many passages in the works of Chrysostom, Cyril of Alexandria, etc., it appears, that, up to the fifth century, eulogia was used synonymously with eucharistia, probably referring to Paul's words (1 Cor. x. 16); but after that time it was confined to the consecrated bread which the participants of the Lord's Supper brought home with them to sick persons or absent friends.

EULOGIUS OF CORDOVA was elected Archbishop of Toledo in 858, but by the Moors prevented from entering upon the duties of his office. He was a zealous champion of Christianity in its contest with Mohammedanism, and was beheaded March 11, 859, because he had been instrumental in the conversion of a young Moorish girl. His writings, among which his Memoriale Sanctorum sive Libri III. de Martyribus Cordubensibus occupies the chief place, were first printed by Peter Pontius Leo at Complutum, 1574. They are found, together with the commentaries of Ambrosius de Morales, in Andreas Schott's Hispania Illustrata, IV., and, together with his life by his friend Alvarus of Cordova, in Migne, Pat. Lat., CXV. See BAUDISSIN: Eulogias und Alvarus, Leipz., 1872. KLÜPFEL.

EUNOMIUS and the EUNOMIANS. Eunomius, b. at Dacora, in Cappadocia, near Altisiris, on the Galatian frontier; d. there about 392; came in 356 to Alexandria to study under Aëtius, whose pupil and amanuensis he became. He was an honest and robust but dry and mechanical nature; and in the most extreme Arianism — that of Aëtius and the Anomæans — he found exactly what he sought. In 358 he accompanied Aëtius to the Arian Council convened at Antioch by Eudoxius. The Semi-Arians were in power; and through various intrigues they succeeded in getting Aëtius banished to Pepuza, and Eunomius to Migde; while Eudoxius, retiring before the storm, retreated into his native Armenia. Eudoxius, however, understood how to ingratiate himself with Constantius; and in 359 he was made Patriarch of Constantinople. Aëtius he could not or would not re-instate; but Eunomius was recalled, and made Bishop of Cyzicus, 360. He remained there four years. In the beginning he refrained, at the instance of Eudoxius, from openly proclaiming his extreme Arian views; but hypocrisy was not his vice, and the contempt he felt for people who were not of his opinion soon made him forget all prudence. The inhabitants of Cyzicus repeatedly and bitterly complained of him and his heresies; and finally Eudoxius was compelled, by a direct order from the emperor, to summon him to Constantinople, and institute an investigation, the result of which was that he was deposed and banished. He then placed himself at the head of the Anomæans (who from this time generally bore the name of the Eunomians), and wrote and spoke in their interest; but he never again held an official position in the church. He moved about from place to place, always in banishment.

In his treatment of the great question of his day, — the divinity of Christ, — he started from the conception of an absolute unlikeness in substance between the Father and the Son, and was thereby led to represent the Son as a creature among other creatures, as a mere man. These views produced such an indignation, that successive imperial edicts ordered his books to be burnt. Of his Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans, and of his Letters (more than forty, according to Photius), nothing has come down to us. The Confession (Ἐκθεσις τῆς πίστεως), which he presented to Theodosius in 383, but which was not accepted, was first printed by Valerius, in his Notes to Socrates, then by Baluze, in his Concill. Nov. Collect., I. 89. Of his two Apologies, the first was written directly against the Nicene doctrine of the Trinity, the second as a defence against the attacks of Basil. From several manuscripts of the latter's work (Adversus Eunomium) it has been possible to restore the whole first Apologeticus of Eunomius. The attempt was first made by CAVE (Hist. Lit., I. 220), and then more completely by FABRICIUS (Bibl. Græca, V. 23). There is also an English translation of the book by WHISTON, Eunomianism Redivivus, Lond., 1711. About the second Apology, Philostorgius, an admirer of Eunomius, tells us that Basil died of despair after reading it; while Photius, an adversary, states that Eunomius dared not publish it until after the death of Basil. The writings of Eunomius were, indeed, as much extolled by his adherents as they were disparaged by his enemies. After his death, his party separated from the church, and branched off in a number of minor divisions named after various leaders, such as Eutyches, Theophronius, etc., until it was dissolved by internal dissensions. See KLOSE: Gesch. u. Lehre d. Eunomius, Kiel, 1833. GASS.

EUNUCH (lit. bed-keeper, chamberlain). This class of persons is a natural consequence of polygamy, and is numerous to-day throughout the East. Frequent mention is made of them upon Egyptian and Assyrian monuments, and they were common in the degenerate days of Greece and Rome. The men who sing soprano in the Sistine Chapel at Rome are eunuchs. Eunuchs always display the same character: they are cowardly, jealous, intriguing, licentious, and shameless. They incline to melancholia, and frequently commit suicide. Yet they rose to the highest eminence, and were intrusted with the life of the sovereign.

According to Deut. xxiii. 1, eunuchs could not enter into the congregation of the Lord. In the Christian Church eunuchs could not be ordained.

History records a few instances of self-mutilation (of which the most famous is Origen) out of a fanatical or ascetic obedience to our Lord's words (Matt. xix. 12): "There are eunuchs who made themselves eunuchs for the kingdom of heaven's sake." If, however, a man was a born eunuch, or was made one by his persecutors, the prohibition against ordination did not apply to him. Abelard was mutilated, but, notwithstanding, rose to be an abbot. In the famous saying of Christ's already referred to, the word "eunuch" is used in three senses: (1) Of those who were born so, (2) Of those who were made so, (3) Of those who abstain from marriage in order that they may give their attention more exclusively to the interests of the kingdom of heaven.

EUPHRATES (Hebrew פְּרָת; LXX. Εὐφράτης; Assy. Purât, Purâtu, "the river") occurs (Gen. ii. 14, xv. 18; Deut. i. 7, xi. 24; Josh. i. 4; 2 Sam. viii. 3; 2 Kings xxiii. 29, xxiv. 7; 1 Chron. v. 9, xviii. 3; 2 Chron. xxxv. 20; Jer. xiii. 4, 5, 6, 7, xlvi. 2, 6, 10, li. 63) as the name of the well-known river, called also "the great river" (הַנְּהַר הַגָּדוֹל, Gen. xv. 18; Deut. i. 7, etc.), "the river" (הַנְּהַר, Gen. xxxi. 21; Exod. xxiii. 31; A. V. "flood," Josh. xxiv. 14, 15), and even "river" (נָהָר, Isa. vii. 20; Jer. ii. 18; Mic. vii. 12).

It takes its rise in the mountains of Armenia, its volume being due to the union of two streams. — the Murâd Su or Eastern Euphrates, and the Frat or Northern Euphrates, — which unite about lat. 39° and long. 39°. The sources of the Euphrates are expressly mentioned by Salmanassar II. (B.C. 860–825), who relates how he marched from the sources of the Tigris to those of the Euphrates (probably meaning the sources of the Murâd Su, north-east of Lake Van; the Frat begins near Erzroum), and there sacrificed to the gods, dipped "the weapons of Assur" in the water, and set up his royal likeness.

The river breaks through the Taurus range toward the west, then turns southward in a winding course, making a second great bend toward the south-east, in about lat. 36°, and following this general direction till it joins the Tigris in Lower Babylonia, and empties through the Satt el-Arab into the Persian Gulf. Its total length is from sixteen hundred to eighteen hundred miles, and it is navigable for small craft twelve hundred miles from its mouth. After the junction of the two branches, it has few tributaries. The only considerable ones are the Sajur (Assyr. Sangura, or Sagura), entering from the west in lat. 36° 40'; the Belik (Assyr. Baliku), entering from the north (below the great south-easterly bend), in long. 39° 9'; and the Khabûr (Assyr. Hâbûr), entering from the north-east in lat. 35° 7', long. 40° 30'. From the Khabûr to the sea, a distance of eight hundred miles, there is no tributary, but, on the other hand, a tendency toward the mouth to divide into smaller streams. The melting of the mountain snows causes a yearly flood, beginning in March, and increasing gradually till May; when, after some weeks, the waters sink by degrees, until, in September or October, the river is at the lowest.

Forming the western boundary of Mesopotamia proper, it was, of course, in ancient times, the limit of the various districts of that region inhabited largely by Aramaean peoples, which gradually came under the control of Assyria; so that the expression "I crossed the Euphrates" denoted for an Assyrian king the beginning of a foreign campaign. It divided Mesopotamia from the "Land Hatti," a name, which, from the time of Sargon (B.C. 722–705), was applied to the whole territory between the Euphrates and the Mediterranean. (See HITTITES.) The most important ancient cities on or near the Euphrates were Charchemish (2 Chron. xxxv. 20), later Hierapolis, now Jerablûs, not far from one of the main crossings of the river, and, lower down, Sippara, Agade, Babylon, Borsippa, Erech (Warka), Larsa and Ur (Mugheir).

For the ancient Babylonians the river was indispensable, not only nor mainly as giving them water-communication with the sea, but as offering them means of irrigation by opening canals through the land: the result was a fertility abundantly evidenced in classic writers (e.g., Herodotus, i. 193; Xen., Anab. ii. 3, §§ 14–16; Strabo, xvi. 1, § 14), which, by proper engineering, might be restored.

The union of the Euphrates and Tigris in the Satt el-Arab is of comparatively modern date. The encroachment of the land on the water of the Persian Gulf is said by Lord Loftus (Chaldea and Susiana, p. 282) to have been going on at the rate of a mile in seventy years since the beginning of the Christian era. It is believed that the rate was once larger, so that in the earliest historic times the sea may have extended a hundred and fifty or two hundred miles farther to the north-west than at present. This great physical change is confirmed by the statement of Pliny (Nat. Hist., VI. § 31) and by the cuneiform inscriptions. These (Cuneiform Inscriptions of Western Asia, III. 12 s.) represent Sennacherib (B.C. 705–681) as sailing down the Euphrates to its mouth, and then, after solemn sacrifices, as before a dangerous voyage, embarking his army in Phœnician ships, and crossing the sea to the mouth of the Euleus, the River of Êlam: this is now the Karûn, and empties into one of the arms of the Satt el-Arab. An inscription of Sargon (Cun. Inscr. West. Asia, III. 11, 23–25) speaks also of the city Dilmun, situated "thirty Kasbu" (about a hundred and twenty miles, which may be an exaggeration) in the sea. The island or peninsula where this city stood has now become a part of the mainland.

EUSEBIUS, a Greek by birth, the son of a physician, succeeded Marcellus as Bishop of Rome in 310. There raged at that moment a bitter controversy in Rome concerning the treatment of the lapsi. Eusebius insisted on penance, but caused thereby great tumults, which caused Maxentius to banish the leaders of both parties. Eusebius died in Sicily, after a reign of four, or, according to other authorities, of seven months. He is honored in the Roman calendar as a saint. Sept. 26 is his day.

EUSEBIUS OF ALEXANDRIA is the author of a number of homilies (twenty-one) which enjoyed great reputation in the Eastern Church during the sixth and seventh centuries. Nothing is known with certainty of his life. In the manuscripts of his works he is described as a monk and high dignitary of the church, — bishop, archbishop, patriarch, papa: in an old biography of him, printed by Cardinal Mai, in Spicileg. Rom., IX. p. 703, he is designated as Bishop of Alexandria after Cyril. But we have the list of Alexandrian bishops; and there is nowhere room for an Eusebius, least of all immediately after Cyril. Some of the homilies, which, however, are of no great interest, are found in GALLANDI, Bibl. Patrum, VIII. p. 252. See THILO, Ueber d. Schriften d. E. v. A., Halle, 1832. SEMISCH.

EUSEBIUS, surnamed Bruno, Bishop of Angers from 1047 to his death (1081), was, at least for some time, an adherent and defender of Berengarius of Tours. In a letter dating from 1049 he bitterly complains of the manner in which the Pope treated Berengarius. Berengarius himself reckoned him one of his patrons (Cæn. Sacr., ed. Vischer, p. 52): so did others. Bishop Theotwin of Liège expressly charges him with having renewed the old heresy concerning the Lord's Supper, that it contained only a semblance or shadow of Christ's body (Gallandi, Bibl. Patr., XIV. p. 244). Nevertheless, after the death of Count Gaufrid of Anjou (1060), the valiant champion of the cause of Berengarius, he seems to have lost his courage. At the conference of Angers (1062) he assumed a very cool attitude towards Berengarius; and in the same mood is the famous letter written (somewhere between 1063 and 1066), in which he declines to act as arbiter in a disputation between Berengarius and Gaufrid Martini. Lessing has called this letter one of the most excellent theological productions of the eleventh century; but this is simply a mistake. The letter is nothing but a cunningly devised cover for a cowardly retreat. The letters of Eusebius are found in an authentic text in MENARDUS: Augustini c. Julian. operis imperf. I. 2 priores, p. 499. The texts given by Du Roye and Du Bouley are mutilated. Two new letters were given by SUDENDORF, Bereng. Turonensis, 1850. SEMISCH.

EUSEBIUS, Bishop of Cæsarea (surnamed Pamphili, "the friend of Pamphilus"), was b. in the latter part of the third century, between 260 and 270, probably in Palestine; d. at Cæsarea, 340. One of his earliest teachers was Bishop Meletius of Pontus, who, during the persecution of Diocletian, sought refuge in Palestine. Afterwards he studied at Antioch, under the presbyter Dorotheus. But the two great decisive influences in his education were the writings of Origen, and the intimate intercourse, at Cæsarea, with Pamphilus, under whose guidance he made his first literary attempt as an exegete (305). In 309 he was compelled to leave Cæsarea on account of the persecution, during which Pamphilus suffered martyrdom. He fled to Tyre, and thence to Egypt. After his return he was made Bishop of Cæsarea (313). The principal problem which presented itself for solution during his episcopate was the Arian controversy, opened in 318. His own stand-point was one intermediate between Arius and Athanasius, based on Origen; but he had neither dialectical power to justify, nor force of character to maintain it. At the Council of Nicæa (325) he tried to effect a reconciliation between the two contending parties, but failed. After fighting against the idea of homoousion to the last, he finally yielded, and signed the orthodox confession. But he retained in his heart a feeling of rancor against Athanasius, and he was ever afterwards one of the leaders of the Arians. He presided at the synod of Tyre (335), convened for the purpose of deposing Athanasius. But the attempt at reconciliation he made at Nicæa procured him the friendship of the emperor. He enjoyed the confidence of Constantine in a particular degree; though it may be, that, in many cases, this confidence was addressed to the author, rather than to the person. In his relation to Constantine, however, he showed the same weakness of character as in his relation to Athanasius. As he was unable to see the truth when it concerned Athanasius, he was unable to speak the truth when it concerned Constantine.

It is as an author, however, rather than as a bishop, that Eusebius attained his great fame. His writings are historical, apologetic, theological, and exegetical. The most important of them are those on history; and his ἐκκλησιαστικὴ ἱστορία, in ten books, giving the history of the Christian Church from its origin to 324, has naturally procured for him the title of the "Father of Church History;" not because he was a master of the historiographer's art, — for he has neither method with respect to the whole, nor criticism with respect to details; neither style nor absolute veracity, — but because he was the first in the field; because he was possessed of materials which would soon have been lost if he had not utilized them; and because he availed himself of these advantages with indefatigable industry and energy. As a repertory of facts and documents, his work is invaluable. The principal editions are by Valesius (Du Valois), with Latin translation, Paris, 1659, re-edited by Reading, Canterbury, 1720; by Heinichen, Leipzig, 1827, 2d ed., 1868, 3 vols.; Burton, Oxford, 1838; Schwegler (pocket edition), Tübing., 1852; Dindorf, Leipzig, 1871. [Into English the book has been translated by Hamner, 1584, and, better, by C. F. Crusé, N.Y., 1865.] Special investigations into the trustworthiness of the book have been made by Möller, Copenhagen, 1813; Danz, Jena, 1815; Kestner, Göttingen, 1816; Reuter-dahl, Lund, 1826; Rienstra, Treves, 1833. Before he wrote his Ecclesiastical History, and as a preparation for it, Eusebius compiled his Chronicle, of which the first part gives an outline of the history of the world to 325, and the second an extract of this outline, arranged in tabular form. Of the original Greek text, only fragments have come down to us. Of the second part, Jerome gave a free translation into Latin. Collections of all fragments (Greek, Latin, and Armenian) of the Chronicle have been made by Mai (Script. Vet. Nov. Coll., 1833, VIII.), and best by A. Schöne, Berlin, 1866, 1875, 2 parts. Among the other historical works of Eusebius are: a Life of Constantine, written after 337, edited by Heinichen, Leipzig, 1830, 2d ed., 1869, a somewhat fulsome panegyric of Constantine, written on the occasion of the thirtieth anniversary of his reign; a book on the Martyrs of Palestine, during the persecution of Diocletian; a letter on pictures of Christ, to the sister of Constantine, etc.

Next in importance to his historical writings are his apologetic works, especially the two most elaborate ones, — the Preparation [for the demonstration] of the Gospel (προπαρασκευὴ εὐαγγελική) and the Demonstration of the Gospel (ἀπόδειξις). The former (edited by Vigerus, Paris, 1688, and Heinrich, Leipzig, 1842) shows the insufficiency and inner unreasonableness of Paganism: the latter (edited Paris, 1628, Cologne, 1688, and by Gaisford, Oxford, 1852) proves the truth of Christianity from its internal character and its external effects. The gist of both these works was compressed into the Theophania; but that book exists now only in a Syrian translation, first discovered in a Nitrian monastery by Tattam, edited by Lee, London, 1842, and translated into English in 1843. His Prophetical Extracts (προφητικὰ ἐκλόγια) was edited by Gaisford, Oxford, 1842. Of his Defence of Origen, written in company with Pamphilus, only the first book is extant, and that only in an unreliable translation by Rufinus.

Of much less consequence are Eusebius' dogmatical and exegetical writings. The former comprise two works against Marcellus, generally printed as an appendix to the ἀπόδειξις, independently edited by Gaisford, Oxford, 1852. The latter contain commentaries on the Psalms, Isaiah, Daniel, the Song of Songs, the Epistle to the Hebrews, etc.; but they are extant only in fragments. A work of special interest is his Onomasticon, of which the first part contains a topography of Palestine, and specially of Jerusalem; the second, an alphabetically arranged list of names of biblical places, with descriptions. The work was edited (Greek and Latin, the Latin text being a free translation by Jerome of the second part) by Bonfrère, Paris, 1631; Clericus, Amsterdam, 1707; Larsov and Parthey, Berlin, 1862; Lagarde, Göttingen, 1870. A collected edition of all the works of Eusebius is found in MIGNÉ, Patrol. Græca, XIX.—XXIV.

EUSEBIUS, Bishop of Dorylæum, lived as a rhetorician in Constantinople, and held some minor government office (agens in rebus), when one day, in 430, he arose in full church, and interrupted Nestorius in the midst of his sermon, with a protest against his views as heretical; and shortly after he posted in the principal church of Constantinople an elaborate denunciation of the Nestorian heresies, comparing them to those of Paul of Samosata. As he thus opened the Nestorian controversy, he also opened the Eutychian by his complaint of Eutyches at the synod of Constantinople (448). He had in the mean time been appointed Bishop of Dorylæum in Phrygia; and by his persistency he succeeded in getting Eutyches condemned and deposed. By the synod of Ephesus, however (449), he was himself deposed, and fled to Rome; but by the Council of Chalcedon (451) he was re-instated, and died in his see. Some minor polemical writings of his — Libellus adv. Eutychem, Libellus adv. Dioscurum, etc. — have come down to us, and are found in LABBE, Conc. Coll., IV.

EUSEBIUS, Bishop of Emesa, d. about 360; was b. of a distinguished family in Edessa, Mesopotamia; studied under Eusebius of Cæsarea, and Patrophilus of Scythopolis, also in Antioch after 330 (with the method and spirit of whose school he became thoroughly imbued), and finally in Alexandria. His fame as an exegete and preacher was so great, that in 341 the synod of Antioch designated him as a fit successor to the deposed Athanasius; but he knew too well how ardently the Alexandrian congregation adhered to its bishop, and he declined. He was then appointed Bishop of Emesa, in Phœnicia; but there, too, he encountered great opposition. The inhabitants feared his astronomical knowledge, and rose against him as a magician. He fled to Laodicea, and settled afterwards in Antioch, where he spent the rest of his life. Of his numerous writings (Jerome mentions polemical works against the Jews, Pagans, and Novatians, ten books of commentary on the Epistle to the Galatians, and homilies on the Gospels; Theodoret mentions polemics against the Marcionites and Manichæans; Ebed Jesu, a work on the Old Testament, etc.), nothing but fragments have come down to us. The homilies edited by Gagnée, (1547) and by Fromy (1575) are spurious; but the two first homilies against Marcellus, ascribed to Eusebius of Cæsarea, and found among his works (Opuscula 14, ed. Sirmondi, 1646), belong probably to Eusebius of Emesa. His Life, written by Bishop George of Laodicea, is also lost. See AUGUSTI: Eus. Emes. Opuscula, Elberfeld, 1829; THULO: Eus. of Alex. and Eus. von Emes., Halle, 1832. SEMISCH.

EUSEBIUS, Bishop of Laodicea, in Syria, d. 269; was b. in Alexandria, and gave, while deacon of the church in his native city, the most striking proofs of Christian love, and fearless constancy of faith, both during the persecution of Valerian (257) and during the plague (263). As the representative of the Alexandrian bishop, he was present at the synod of Antioch which condemned Paul of Samosata; and the impression he made was so favorable, that he shortly after was elected Bishop of Laodicea. See EUSEBIUS, Hist. Eccl., 7, 11, 21, 23, 32. SEMISCH.

EUSEBIUS OF NICOMEDIA was first Bishop of Berytus, in Phœnicia, then of Nicomedia, where the imperial court resided, and finally of Constantinople, where he died 342. Distantly related to the imperial house, he not only owed his removal from an insignificant to the most splendid episcopal see to his influence at court, but the great power he wielded in the church was also derived from that source. With the exception of a short period of eclipse, he enjoyed the complete confidence both of Constantine and Constantius; and it was he who baptized the dying emperor, May, 337. Like Arius, he was a pupil of Lucian of Antioch, and it is probable that he held the same views as Arius from the very beginning. He afterwards modified his ideas somewhat, or perhaps he only yielded to the pressure of circumstances; but he was, if not the teacher, at all events the leader and organizer, of the Arian party. At the Council of Nicæa (325) he signed the Confession, but only after a long and desperate opposition. His defence of Arius excited the wrath of the emperor, and a few months after the council he was sent into exile. After the lapse of three years, he succeeded in regaining the imperial favor; and after his return (in 329) he brought the whole machinery of the state government into action in order to impose his views upon the church. In 331 a synod of Antioch condemned and deposed Eustathius, one of the pillars of the orthodox party. In 336 Athanasius was banished to Treves, and in 337 Arius was invited to Constantinople to be solemnly received again into the bosom of the Catholic Church. The Arian party was victorious, and ready to take possession of the church; and the victory was due chiefly to Eusebius. See, for further information, literature, etc., the article on ARIANISM.

EUSEBIUS, Bishop of Samosata, on the Euphrates, since 361, d. about 379; was one of the chief pillars of the orthodox church during its contest with Arianism in the latter part of the fourth century. During the reign of Valens he travelled through the dioceses of Syria, Phœnicia, and Palestine, in the disguise of a soldier, exhorting the faithful, and consecrating orthodox priests; and the election of Basil to the see of Cæsarea, in Cappadocia, was chiefly due to his exertions (370). In 373 he was banished to Thrace, and lived in exile to the death of Valens, 378. Shortly after his return, while engaged in the re-organization of the Syrian Church, he was killed at Dolica (a small town in the district of Comagene) by a stone thrown at him by an Arian woman. See, besides THEODORET (Hist. Eccl., 2, 28; 4, 12, etc.), the Letters of Basil (Ep. 5-9, 253-265; Opp., ed. Paris, 1638, III.) and Gregory Nazianzen (Ep. 28-30, 204; Opp., ed. Paris, 1690, I.) SEMISCH.

EUSEBIUS, Archbishop of Thessalonica, flourished about 600; wrote ten books against the Aphthartodocetæ (a branch of the Monophysites), which have been lost, but of which Photius gives the list of contents (Bibl. Cod., 162); and was by Gregory the Great encouraged to employ still more vigorous measures against heretics (Ep. 10, 42; 11, 74).

EUSEBIUS, Bishop of Vercelli, in Piedmont, d. about 371; was b. in the island of Sardinia, and educated in Rome by Pope Eusebius. Elected Bishop of Vercelli by an unanimous vote of the people and the clergy, he became one of the principal champions of the orthodox church in its contest with Arianism during the reign of Constantius. The synod of Milan was convened in 355. The orthodox party hoped to procure a vindication and restitution of Athanasius. The Arians tried to get the condemnation of Arles repeated and confirmed. The emperor finally employed force, and the Arians gained the ascendancy; but Eusebius did not yield. He was banished, first to Scythopolis, afterwards to Cappadocia, and finally to the Thebaid; and in the latter places he was kept in close confinement. After the death of Constantius he regained his liberty; but the contest with Arianism still continued, and he was finally stoned to death, according to the legend, by his adversaries. His Letters are found in GALLANDI, Bibl. Patr., V. p. 78, etc. For his life, see JEROME, Vires Illustres. c. xcvi. Migne's ed., T. 23, p. 697; Act. Sanct., Aug., I. p. 340; and UGHELLI, in Italia Sacra, IV. p. 747.

EUSTACHIUS, or, as the Greeks call him, EUSTATHIUS, is one of the most celebrated saints of the Roman-Catholic Church, though his life lies wholly in the field of romance. According to his acts, written in Greek, and dating from the eighth century, he was an officer of some repute in the army of Trajan. His name was Placidus. By a miraculous apparition of Christ he was converted; and, after many wonderful vicissitudes, he was roasted to death in Rome, together with his whole family. His remains came afterwards to France, and rest now in the Church of St. Eustache in Paris. In the Roman-Catholic Church he has been celebrated since the sixth century as a saint and martyr. His day is Sept. 20. His acts, Greek and Latin, were edited by Cambesif, Illustrium Christi Martyrum Lecti Triumphi, Paris, 1660.

EUSTATHIUS OF ANTIOCH, b. at Side, Pamphylia; d. at Philippi 337; was first Bishop of Berrhœa (Syria), and then of Antioch. In the Council of Nicæa he vehemently opposed the Arians; but they took revenge when they got into power, and deposed him in 331. The inhabitants, however, of Antioch, arose in defence of their bishop, though in vain: they only succeeded in provoking the emperor, and Eustathius was banished to Thrace. Of his numerous writings, only a work against Origen is still extant: Bibl. Max. Patr., XVII.

EUSTATHIUS, Bishop of Sebaste (Armenia) from 350; a native of Cappadocia; d. 380; changed several times from orthodoxy to Arianism, and from Arianism to Semi-Arianism, and back again, and joined finally the Eumomians, but was condemned by several synods, and lost at last the confidence of all parties. He built a hospital for sick people and travellers in Sebaste, and introduced monasticism in Armenia, Pontus, and Paphlagonia, which gave rise to the formation of an enthusiastic ascetic party, the Eustathians. They were condemned by the synod of Gangra, and disappeared speedily. See SOCRATES: H. E., II. 43; SOZOMEN: H. E., III. 14. HERZOG.

EUSTATHIUS OF THESSALONICA, b. in Constantinople in the first half of the twelfth century; metropolitan of Thessalonica since 1175; d. there in 1194; has long been famous for his commentaries on the Greek classics, especially Homer. But the publication of his theological works by Tafel (Opuscula, Francfort, 1832, and De Thessalonica, Berlin, 1839) shows, furthermore, that he was a man of true Christian spirit, with a sharp eye for the moral and religious depravation of his time, and with something of the talent and character of a reformer. His Thoughts on the Monastic Life (ἐπίσκοπος βίου μοναχικοῦ) was translated into German, Betrachtungen über d. Mönchsstand, by Tafel, Berlin, 1847. GASS.

EUSTOCHIUM, a daughter of Paula; was b. in Rome about 370; made while young a vow of perpetual virginity, which caused Jerome to write his De Virginitate, and devoted herself to an ascetic life. Together with her mother, she accompanied Jerome to Palestine (385); and, after the death of Paula, she became superior of the convent in Bethlehem, where she died 418. In the Roman Church she is considered a saint. Her day of celebration is Sept. 28.

EUTHALIUS, a deacon of the Alexandrian Church, and afterwards Bishop of Sulca; flourished in the middle of the fifth century, and introduced in the Acts, the Epistles of Paul, and the Catholic Epistles, the same division into chapters and verses which had already been introduced in the Gospels by Ammonius of Alexandria in the middle of the third century. See BIBLE TEXT, p. 269.

EUTHYMIUS ZIGADENUS, or ZIGABENUS, one of the most prominent Byzantine theologians of the twelfth century, and a characteristic representative of the whole school. Of his life very little is known. He was monk in a monastery near Constantinople, enjoyed the favor of the Emperor Alexius Comnenus, is spoken of with praise by Anna Comnena, and died after 1118. Of his exegetical works his commentary on the Psalms was published in a Latin version by Philip Saul, Verona, 1530, and afterwards often. The Greek text of the preface and introduction was printed by Le Moyne, Varia Sacra, Lyons, 1685, I. pp. 150-210. The whole work, Greek and Latin, is found in Opera Omnia Theophylacti, Venice, 1754-63, T. IV. Another and still more important work, a commentary to the four Gospels, was likewise first printed in a Latin version by J. Hentenius, Louvain, 1544: the Greek text was not published until 1792, by C. F. Matthäi, at Leipzig. His great dogmatical work, Πανολία δογματική, a refutation of twenty-four different heresies, was written at the instance of the Emperor Alexius. In the Latin version by P. F. Zini (Venice, 1555) the twelfth and thirteenth chapters against the Pope and the Italians are left out. In the only Greek edition (Tergovist, Wallachia, 1771), the twenty-fourth chapter against the Mohammedans is lacking. Single parts of the work have been specially edited; for instance, the chapter against the Bogomiles in Wolf: Hist. Bogomilorum, Viteb., 1712 (edited by Gieseler, Gottingen, 1842); the chapter against the Massalians in Tollius: Insignia Itinerar. Ital., Treves, 1696, etc. See ULLMANN: Nikol. von Methone, Euth. Zig. und Nic. Choniates.

EUTYCHES and EUTYCHIANISM. Eutyichianism denotes that form of the older christology in which the Alexandrian doctrine of one nature in the incarnation was pushed to a docetic absorption of the human by the divine in the person of Christ. It originated as a re-action against Nestorianism. The reconciliation which (in 433) was effected between the Syrian and Egyptian Churches, and between the schools of Antioch and Alexandria, was nothing but a compromise; and the vague formulas of the instrument could not fail increasing the confusion. Both parties claimed the victory. The Antiochians pointed to the strong emphasis which was laid upon the two natures; and the Alexandrians exulted over the actual condemnation of Nestorius. In the dogmatical stand-points of the two adversaries nothing was changed. The Antiochians continued accusing the Alexandrians of Apollinarianism and Docetism; and the Alexandrians answered by accusing the Antiochians of Nestorianism and Photinianism. The Alexandrians were supported by the court and the monks, and labored secretly but successfully to spread suspicion throughout the church with respect to the orthodoxy of Diodorus and Theodore of Mopsuestia. The Antiochians employed chiefly the weapons of science; and they were in this respect far superior to their antagonists, especially since the death of Cyril. In 447 Theodoret published his Eranistes, which is simply a challenge to all the adherents of the Anathematismata of Cyril. In the Eastern Church the whole atmosphere was overloaded. A storm was inevitable.

Eutyches finally caused it to burst forth. He was at that time about seventy years old, and had lived for more than thirty years as superior of a monastery in the neighborhood of Constantinople. A severe ascetic, he seldom left the monastery; but in his cell he used to converse with his visitors in an astounding manner about the mystery of the god-man. He was honest, but uneducated; unpracticed in reasoning, and yet delighting in debate. He hated the Antiochian theology; and all his life through he was zealous in hunting down heretics. At the synod of Ephesus (431) he was one of Cyril's most devoted partisans; and he no doubt was one of the leaders of that procession of psalmodizing monks which penetrated into the imperial palace, and compelled Theodosius II. to confirm the party-macuvres of the synod as œcumenical decisions. At present he was in great favor at the court, especially with the imperial minister of state, Chrysaphius; and, playing with equal force the saint in the halls of the palace and the oracle in the cell of the monastery, he was deeply engaged in counteracting the Antiochians. In the spring of 448 he wrote to Pope Leo I. (Leo. Ep., 20, in Mansi, V. p. 1323), to inform him that the Nestorian heresy was still living in the Eastern Church. Indeed, when at this time Domnus, Patriarch of Antioch, appeared before the emperor, and accused Eutyches of heresy, it was simply an act of self-defence from the Antiochian side.

The move of Domnus had no effect; but in the fall of the same year (448) Bishop Eusebius of Dorylæum laid before the synod of Constantinople a formal accusation of Eutyches, as holding and teaching blasphemous views of the person of Christ. Flavian, who was a moderate Antiochian, and who knew that he had a bitter enemy in Dioscurus, Cyril's successor in Alexandria, wanted to have the whole matter smoothed down by means of a personal conference between Eutyches and Eusebius; but the latter pushed his case with so much vigor, that Eutyches was actually summoned before the synod. After many delays he appeared, accompanied by a division of the imperial guard, and swarms of excited monks. He was examined, and he answered half defiantly, half evasively. Nevertheless, he acknowledged that he considered the body of Christ to have been of quite another substance than other human bodies, and that was of course enough to prove his Apollinarianism, Valentinianism, Docetism, etc. Under tears and sobs, as the official style has it, he was deposed from his office as a priest and archimandrite, and expelled from the community of the faithful.

Eutyches, however, Dioscuros, Chrysophius, and the whole party whose interests were at stake, did not feel willing to acquiesce in the decision. Their first move was to demand a revision of the acts of the synod. It was granted, but no irregularity was discovered. They then began to clamor for a new œcumenical council. Flavian and Leo I. tried to prevent such a measure; but when Leo I. dated his famous letter (Leo. Ep., 28, in Mansi, V. p. 1366), by which he hoped to place himself as arbiter between the two contending parties (June 13, 449), the invitation to the new council had already been sent out (March 20, 449). It opened at Ephesus (Aug. 8, 449), under the presidency of Dioscuros, a shameless and violent character; it proceeded amid the howlings and tumult of drunken soldiers and fanatical monks; and it bears in history, for good reasons, the name of the "Robber Synod." Eutyches was re-instated, and Eusebius was even not allowed to speak. Flavian was condemned; and when some bishops attempted to embrace the feet of the president, and move him to pity, he cried out for the soldiers; and in broke the rabble with unspeakable confusion. Flavian was trampled upon, and beaten almost to death. Eusebius fled; also the papal legate escaped. Domnus of Antioch, Theodoret, and other prominent members of the Antiochian school, were deposed; and by means of falsified acts the sanction of the emperor was obtained. The triumph of the Alexandrian party was complete; but it did not prove lasting.

The sudden death of Theodosius II. (450) produced a change in the affairs. The new rulers, Pulcheria and her husband Marcian, were orthodox. The bishops who had been banished by the instrumentality of Dioscuros were recalled; the remains of Flavian were brought to Constantinople, and entombed in the Church of the Apostles; Eutyches was once more excommunicated, and banished from the metropolis. It was the wish of the new government to give the country peace; and nothing seemed better suited to stop all controversies, and appease the reigning feeling of excitement, than a fourth œcumenical synod. It was convened at Chalcedon, and opened Oct. 8, 451. Dioscuros was unanimously condemned; not on account of heresy, however, but on account of the frightful accusations of fraud, violence, and crimes of almost every description, which were raised against him by his own congregation. More difficulty was experienced in elaborating a set of christological formulas, which should exclude all heresies, and gather the whole church together. The problem was solved, however, by taking the above-mentioned letter of Leo I. for a basis; and an imperial edict of Feb. 7, 452, made this confession obligatory. The measures which were employed against the Eutychians were rather harsh. Nevertheless, remnants of the party, having monasteries of their own, and celebrating service in a somewhat peculiar manner, lived on for a long time. See the article CHRISTOLOGY.

EUTYCHIANUS, Bishop of Rome (from January, 275, to December, 283), is honored in the Roman-Catholic Church as a saint and martyr. His day falls on Dec. 1. There is, however, no proof of his martyrdom but a report found in some later recensions of the Liber Pontificalis. The earlier recensions, as well as all other sources, are silent on the subject. Some decretals ascribed to him, but spurious, are found in MIGNÉ, Patr. Lat., V.

EUTYCHIUS, Patriarch of Alexandria, b. 876, at Fostat, the present Cairo; d. May 12, 940; was originally a physician; studied afterwards history and theology; entered the church, and was made patriarch in 933. As such he sustained very severe attacks from the Jacobite Copts, he himself being the leader of the orthodox or Melchite party. He was a prolific writer, and wrote in Arabic; but most of his writings have perished. His principal work, however (a world's history from the creation to 937, and of no small interest for the history of the Eastern Church), is still extant, and was edited in Arabic, with a Latin translation by E. Pococke, Oxford, 1658, 1659.

EUTYCHIUS, Patriarch of Constantinople, b. about 510; d. 582; was a monk and catholicos in the city of Amasia, in Pontus; came in 552 as delegate from his bishop, and gained the favor of the Emperor Justinian by proving from Scripture that it was right to lay the ban of the church upon men, even though they had died long ago; was in the same year made Patriarch of Constantinople; played a prominent part in the "Three Chapters" controversy, and presided at the œcumenical synod of 553, but lost the favor of the emperor by refusing to acknowledge the doctrine of the monophysite Aphthartodocetes as orthodox; was deposed, and banished to Amasia 565. After twelve years of banishment he was re-instated in his see by Justin II.; and by the church he was honored with the dignity of a saint on account of his sufferings for the cause of orthodoxy. His Life, written by an intimate servant of his, is found in Act. Sanct., April, I. p. 550. Of his writings three fragments on the Lord's Supper have been published by Mai; Class. Auct., X. 493, and Script. Vel. Nov. Coll., IX. 623. A letter from him to Pope Vigilius, dated 553, is found in MANSI, X. 186.

EVAGRIUS PONTICUS was b. at Iberis, on the Black Sea; studied under Basilus, Gregory of Nyssa, and Gregory Nazianzen, who brought him to Constantinople in 379, and with whom he went to Jerusalem in 385. He afterwards retired into the Nitrian Desert, and lived a hermit among the hermits. The year of his death is unknown. From contemporary documents it is evident that he enjoyed a considerable reputation; and the reason why the after-time treated him so coolly is simply, that, in the Origenistic controversy, he took the side of Origen. What has come down to us of his works is found in GALLANDIUS, Bibl. Patr., VII. pp. 551-581. GASS.

EVAGRIUS SCHOLASTICUS, b. about 536, at Epiphania, in Cœlesyria; enjoyed a careful instruction in the schools of the rhetoricians and grammarians, and settled in Antioch, where he practised as a lawyer. He lived in intimate connection with Bishop Gregory, and wrote, as a continuation of Eusebius and the older church historians, an ecclesiastical history from the synod of Ephesus (431) to the twelfth year of the reign of Mauritius (594). He is superstitious, but orthodox; credulous, but impartial; and his work is invaluable for the understanding of the Nestorian and Eutychian controversies. It was first edited by R. Stephanus (Paris, 1544, Geneva, 1612), then by Valesius (Paris, 1673, Francfort, 1679, etc.), and finally by Reading (Canterbury, 1720). [There is an English translation of it by M. Hammer, in BAGSTER'S Eccles. Historians, and in BOHN'S Eccles. Library.] GASS.

EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE. See ALLIANCE, EVANGELICAL.

EVANGELICAL ASSOCIATION, an ecclesiastical body which in all essential particulars follows the doctrine and polity of the Methodist-Episcopal Church. Its founder, Jacob Albright, was a man of limited education, but earnest piety. Originally a Lutheran, he connected himself with the Methodist Church, and began to preach in 1796. A meeting of his followers in 1803 ordained him as a minister of the gospel in accordance with Acts xiii. 1-3. Albright labored amongst the German-speaking classes; and, as the Methodist-Episcopal Church did not make any effort among the Germans, the congregations gathered by his labors banded themselves together in a separate denomination. In 1807 a conference was held, and Albright elected bishop, and instructed to draw up articles of faith and discipline. Several years after his death (1808) his followers, who had been known as "Albright People," adopted for their organization the name of Die evangelische Gemeinschaft von Nord Amerika, "Evangelical Association of North America." The organization of the church is similar to that of the Methodist-Episcopal Church. Bishops and presiding elders are elected by the general and annual conferences, and hold office for four years. The itinerant system is practised. In doctrine they are Arminian, but are very decidedly biblical. The progress of the body in its early history has in recent years been rapid. The first general conference was held in 1816 in Union County, Pennsylvania. The labors of the association were at first exclusively among the Germans, whence the name "German-Methodist Church." More recently English congregations have been organized. It has also a conference in Germany numbering 8,000 adherents, and carries on a mission in Japan. The present strength of the denomination is 22 conferences, 1,523 ministers, and 113,871 church-members. It has three bishops, and conducts a biblical institute at Naperville, Ill., in connection with the North-western College. Its book concern at Cleveland is in a prosperous condition, and publishes several papers in German and English, the principal of which are Der christliche Botschafter and The Evangelical Messenger.

EVANGELICAL UNION. In 1841 James Morison, minister of the United Secession Church at Kilmarnock, Scotland, was deposed for holding anti-Calvinistic views upon faith, the work of the Spirit in salvation; and upon the extent of the atonement. Faith was declared to be one's belief that Christ died for him; the Spirit is "poured out upon all flesh," and strives with all the unregenerate, and dwells in all believers; while the atonement was universal. Mr. Morison's father, who was a minister, and two other ministers who held these views, met at Kilmarnock, and formed the Evangelical Union. The movement spread, and now the union embraces about ninety churches. These are independent in government, and also in doctrines resemble in general the Congregational churches of Scotland and the Cumberland Presbyterian Church of the United States. Mr. Morison is the author of very valuable commentaries upon the Third Chapter of the Epistle to the Romans (Lond. 1866), Matthew (1870), and Mark (1873, 3d ed., 1881). See Evangelical Union Annual, and F. FERGUSON, History of the Evangelical Union, Glasgow, 1876.

EVANGELIST (εὐαγγελιστής, "a herald of glad tidings") is from the same root as the words translated "gospel" (εὐαγγέλιον) and to "preach the word" (εὐαγγελίζομαι). In Eph. iv. 11 the evangelists are enumerated side by side with apostles, prophets, pastors, and teachers, and follow prophets. This special mention leads us to attribute to them a distinct form of activity. It did not consist in the execution of apostolic functions, the exercise of prophetic gifts, the oversight of churches, or diaconal service, but in preaching, and testifying to the facts of Christ's life. But the evangelists are not to be regarded as a distinct order of church officials. Deacons, presbyters, and apostles (Acts viii. 25; 1 Cor. i. 17, etc.), all might exercise evangelistic functions. Timothy, the bishop-presbyter, was exhorted to "do the work of an evangelist" (2 Tim. iv. 5); and Philip, one of the seven deacons at Jerusalem, is called an evangelist (Acts viii. 5, xxi. 8). The evangelists are to be regarded as itinerants, travelling from place to place. This was the case with Philip, who preached in Samaria, expounded the word to the eunuch on his way to Gaza, and then labored in Cæsarea and the cities round about (Acts viii. 40). They acted independently (Acts viii. 4), but largely as "fellow-laborers" and assistants of the apostles, accompanying them on their journeys, and laboring under their direction. Theodoret was the first to restrict the term to itinerant preachers (περιτόντες ἐκκλησιαστικῶν); and Cœcumenius applied it for the first time strictly to the authors of the Gospels. The term is used at the present time in both these senses.

EVANGELISTARY (Evangelistarium), the name of the church-book which contains the portions of the Gospels to be read in the Liturgy. If the book contained all the four Gospels, it was called Evangelistarium plenarium.

EVANGELIUM ÆTERNUM was a supposed book, rather than a real book, based upon the writings of Joachim of Floris, and referring to certain ideas entertained by one party of the Franciscans concerning the reforming and reorganizing mission of their order. Gerhardus, a Franciscan monk belonging to the above party, compiled in the middle of the thirteenth century, from the writings of Joachim of Floris (d. 1202), a book, which he called Introductorium in Evangelium Æternum, and in which he applied to his order Joachim's vague prophecies of a third stage in the history of mankind, — the era of the Holy Spirit. From the title of this book arose the rumor of a new gospel, the Everlasting Gospel, in the possession of the Franciscans. The book itself has perished; but it is partially known to us from a fragment of a work by Hugo of Caro (d. 1262), Processus in Evangelium Æternum, communicated by Quétif and Echard, in Script. Prædict., I. 202-213. See JOACHIM OF FLORIS.

EVANS, Christmas, an eloquent Baptist preacher of Wales; b. at Esgaiswen on Christmas Day, 1766; d. July 14, 1838. He was the son of a shoemaker, and after his father's death was forced to work at servile employments for a living. At the age of seventeen he was converted, and for the first time learned to read. At this period he lost an eye in an act of self-defence. He was ordained 1790, and, after a pastorate of two years at Lleyn, went to the Isle of Anglesea, where his salary for many years was only seventeen pounds. In 1826 he removed to Tonyvelin, and in 1833 to Caernarvon. Evans was a man of ardent piety, and great power as a preacher. The fragments that remain of his sermons show him a master in parabolic comparison and dramatic representation. These characteristics have won for him the title of the "Welsh Bunyan." When Robert Hall was reminded that Evans had only one eye, he replied, "Yes, sir; but that eye could lead an army through a wilderness at midnight." In recent times Evans's career has acted as a powerful stimulus upon Mr. Moody.

EVANS, John, D.D., a nonconformist divine; b. at Wrexham, Denbighshire, 1680; d. in London, May 16, 1730. He succeeded Dr. Daniel Williams in London. He completed Matthew Henry's commentary on Romans, and gathered much of the material subsequently used by Mr. Neal in his history of the Puritans. His best-known work is his Discourses concerning the Christian Temper; being Thirty-eight Sermons upon the Principal Heads of Practical Religion, Lond., 4th ed., 1737, 2 vols., edited, with a Life, by Dr. John Erskine, Lond., 1825.

EVANS, John, LL.D., a Baptist minister; b. at Usk, Monmouthshire, 1767; d. in London, 1827; wrote A Sketch of the Denominations of the Christian World, with a Persuasive to Religious Moderation, London, 1794; 15th ed., revised by the author, 1827; 18th ed., 1841, trans. into Welsh and Continental languages, reprinted in several editions in United States. Upwards of a hundred thousand copies were sold during the author's lifetime; but for the copyright he received only ten pounds.

EVANSON, Edward, a minister of the Church of England; b. at Warrington, Lancashire, April 21, 1731; d. at Colford, Gloucestershire, Sept. 25, 1805. He took his M.A. at Cambridge, 1753. In 1773 he was tried in the Consistorial Court of Gloucester for publicly altering or omitting such phrases in the church-service as seemed to him to be untrue, correcting the authorized version of the Scriptures, and for conversing against the Creeds and the divinity of Christ. The case was carried on appeal to the Court of Arches, and finally quashed, on technical grounds, in 1777. He gave the widest currency he could to his heretical views in his Dissonance of the Four generally received Evangelists, and the Evidence of their Respective Authenticity examined, with that of other Scriptures deemed Canonical (Gloucester, 1792), in which he rejected the greater part of the New Testament as a forgery, and accepted the Gospel of Luke alone of the four. To this book Thomas Falconer replied in the Bampton Lecture for 1810, — Certain Principles in Evanson's Dissonance of the Four generally received Evangelists, etc., examined. Evanson's views upon the sabbath brought him into controversy with Dr. Priestley.

EVE (חַוָּה, "life:" so LXX., in Gen. iii., translates by Ζωή "life;" elsewhere, however, Eva), "the mother of all living." According to Gen. ii. 20, God would give man a "help meet for him;" literally, a help as before him; i.e., corresponding to him, his fellow in body and spirit. The simple, straight-forward Bible narrative of Eve's creation and reception, is given in Gen. ii. 21-25. Different interpretations have found defenders and expositors.

1. The Literal. — While Adam slept, God took one of his ribs, and fashioned out of it a woman. Adam recognized the identity of substance and unity of life, and called the new creation אִשָּׁה (Ishsha, "female man"), because she was taken out of אִשׁ (Ish, "man"). The name חַוָּה was not given until after the fall, and was not an appellative, but her proper name, having not only a natural, but an historical significance, connected with the history of redemption; for it indicated Adam's faith that new life and salvation would issue from the womb of Eve. How long the first pair lived in Eden is unknown. By eating the forbidden fruit, under the temptation of Satan, they fell. Outside of the garden, Eve bore her first-born, and called him Cain ("possession"), apparently under the impression that she had borne the promised deliverer. Her second son she named Abel ("vanity"), indicating her disappointment: the third son she called Seth ("compensation"), because God had appointed her a seed, instead of dead Abel. With this remark the history of Eve closes.

2. The Allegorical. — The allegorists find their Coryphæus in Philo, who, having declared (in the second book of his Allegories of the Sacred Laws, after the Work of the Six Days of Creation, II. § vii.) the literal statement (that Eve was made from Adam's rib) to be fabulous, proceeds to explain that by the story is meant the creation of the external sense immediately after the creation of the mind. This took place when the mind was asleep. By "rib" he understands "one of the many powers of the mind; namely, that power which dwells in the outward senses." This mode of interpretation was followed by the Alexandrian school among the fathers, who, however, granted the historicity of the story. To them Eve represented the sensuous or perceptive part of man, and Adam the rational.¹ The Latin fathers did not go quite this length, although willing to allow that a spiritual sense underlay the literal, and to find in the formation of Eve from the side of Adam a type of the formation of the Church from the Saviour's side. Later on, among the schoolmen, Thomas Aquinas speaks of Eve as a type of the Church, and her formation from the side of Adam as a type of the sacraments — blood (i.e., the wine of the Lord's Supper) and water (i.e., baptism) — which flowed from the side of Christ.² In the same paragraph is the apparent genesis of the famous remark of Matthew Henry: "The woman was made of a rib out of the side of Adam; not made out of his head, to top him; not out of his feet, to be trampled upon by him; but out of his side, to be equal with him; from under his arm, to be protected; and from near his heart, to be beloved;" for he says, responding to arguments against the formation of woman from the rib of man, "Primo quidem ad significandum quod inter virum et mulierem debet esse specialis conjunctio; neque enim mulier debet dominari in virum; et ideo non est formata de capite; neque debet a viro despici, tanquam serviliter subjecta; et ideo non est formata de pedibus."

3. The Mythical. — Adam, Eve, the whole story of the early life of the race, in short, is a mist spread over the face of creation. There were no beings corresponding to the biblical pair: the story is mere dramatic personation of ideas, — sexual contrast, sexual love, the beginning of existence.

4. The Poetical. — The advocates of this interpretation believe in all the results stated in Genesis, but not in the processes. The creation of woman after that of man they allow; but as for the story — it is a charming idyl. The Bible opens with a poem. Adam and Eve doubtless existed, but one cannot vouch for the actions attributed to them.

It remains to glance at the legends which are actually told about Adam and Eve. A very widely circulated opinion is, that man and woman were originally joined in one body, and that God separated them, the rabbins say by a hatchet. They say further, that, "When Eve had to be drawn out of the side of Adam, she was not extracted by the head, lest she should be vain; nor by the eyes, lest she should be wanton; nor by the mouth, lest she should be given to gossiping; nor by the ears, lest she should be an eavesdropper; nor by the hands, lest she should be meddling; nor by the feet, lest she should be a gadabout; nor by the heart, lest she should be jealous; but she was drawn forth by the side: yet, notwithstanding all these precautions, she has every fault specially guarded against." It was a rabbinical fancy that Eve was Adam's second wife, the first being Lilit. In this way the double account of woman's creation (Gen. i. 27 and ii. 18) was accounted for. Lilit was formed of clay at the same time with Adam, but expelled for pride and bad conduct. She subsequently married the Devil, and was the ancestress of the Jins, — creatures endowed with human and devilish qualities. According to the Targum of Jonathan, Eve was made from Adam's thirteenth rib.

EVELYN, John, b. at Wotton, Surrey, Oct. 31, 1620; d. there Feb. 27, 1706. He is best known by his Sylva, London, 1664, an elaborate work upon arboriculture (the first book published by the Royal Society), and by his Diary from 1641 to 1706 (best edition by William Bray, with Life by Henry B. Wheatley, London, 1879, 4 vols.), a treasury of information in regard to the private life of his century. He is mentioned here because of his History of Religion, a Rational Account of the True Religion (first published from his manuscript by Rev. R. M. Evanson, London, 1850, 2 vols.), a valuable epitome of arguments against the infidelity of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. Evelyn preserved an untarnished reputation at a time when men of his high social position were commonly lax in morals.

E'VILMERO'DACH (Heb. אֵוִיל מֵרוּדַח; LXX. Ἐβιλμάρωδᾶκ, Ὀβιλμάρωδᾶχαρ, and variants; Babyl. Avil-Marduk; late pronunciation of Amil-Marduk; "man of the god Merodach") was the son and successor of Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, and reigned, according to Ptolemy's canon (list of Babylonian kings), B.C. 561-560. The only scriptural mention of him is in 2 Kings xxv. 27-30 (= Jer. lii. 31-34), where it is related, that, in the year of his accession, he released from prison, after a captivity of thirty-seven years, Jehoiachin, king of Judah, that he changed his prison-garments, set his seat above the seat of the Babylonian vassal-kings or princes, gave him a daily allowance, and made him his constant table companion. Notwithstanding this, Josephus (c. Ap., I. 20) represents him, on Berossus' authority, as a lawless and dissolute ruler. On the same authority he was murdered, after a two-years' reign, by his brother-in-law Neriglissar, whom Ptolemy's canon also names as his successor. The statement of Josephus (Ant., X. 11, 2), that he reigned eighteen years, is as little worthy of credence as the twelve years assigned to him by Alexander Polyhistor (Euseb., Chron., I. 6), or his regency of seven years, of which Jerome speaks (on Isa. xiv. 19). Contemporary records exist in the form of eleven contract tablets, inscribed in the cuneiform character, and dated in his reign, three from the year of his accession (B.C. 562), four from his first year, and four from his second year (W. St. C. BOSCAWEN, in Trans. Soc. Bib. Arch., VI. p. 52). FRANCIS BROWN.

EVOLUTION and DEVELOPMENT. These phrases, so much used in the present day, have much the same meaning. Both point to one process viewed under two different aspects. Both indicate that one thing comes out of another. But development denotes the process going on; whereas evolution refers more to the process as we look back upon it. We talk of the seed being developed into the plant, and of the plant being evolved from the seed. Development or evolution is a method of procedure adopted by God, both in the kingdom of nature and the kingdom of grace.

I. There is undoubtedly development in nature. It is wrong in religious people to deny it. Everybody acts upon it. We all regard events as coming out of antecedent circumstances, commonly out of a concurrence, or train of occurrences. The process is seen more particularly in organic nature, in which there is a double development, — the seed from the plant, and the plant from the seed; the child from the parent, and, it may be, growing into the parent. Generally, in God's works, the present is the fruit of the past and the seed of the future. This was noticed from the beginning of observation. But of late years it has been scientifically examined, and the process is shown to be extensively employed, in a sense to be universal. What science and philosophy combined require to do in the present day is to determine the precise nature of development and the limits to it.

For several ages it has been acknowledged that there is universal causation; not merely the grand first and abiding Cause, but second causes. It is God who produces the spring; but he does so by agents, like the sun, the seed, and the soil. Pious people have come to acknowledge this, and have found it not inconsistent with their belief in God, to whose existence these works bear witness.

There is not only individual causation, that is, one cause producing its effect: there is combined and co-operative causation. I believe that J. S. Mill has shown that there is more than one agent in all physical causation. We speak of the cause of the killing of that plant to be the frost; but the full and true cause consists of the cold, and the state of the plant, without both of which the effect would not have occurred. I have shown that there is a like duality, or plurality, in the effect; each agent producing other effects. In almost all natural action there is a considerable number of agencies in the operation. What a variety of combined powers in the growth of every plant and in the production of spring!

Now, development consists essentially in a combination, or rather I would call it an organization, of causes, or, better still, a corporation of agencies for mutual action. Such are the united powers that produce the spring, that produce the plant, that produce the animal. Such are the activities which unite to produce the great events of history, — the rise and fall of literature in Greece, and of the Roman Empire, the Protestant Reformation, the English, French, and American Revolutions.

In many of these organizations I discover evident design. Such is the union of elements and powers producing vision, — the coats and humors, the rods, cones, and nerves, so arranged as to enable us to see. Such are the vibrations, the canals, convolutions, hammer and stirrup, and fibres, which work together to give the power of hearing. Men are led spontaneously, and I hold reasonably, to believe that there is design in these collocations, and adaptations of one thing to another, to produce a good end.

In some cases there is only one set of agencies in the development. A number of agencies are thrown, as it were, into a closed ball (this was a Pythagorean idea); and these as they work produce certain results, which are the same from year to year, and from age to age. In other cases, powers come in from without to act upon and with the more central and abiding agents, and so far modify and vary their actions: hence the varieties in the same species of plants and animals, and the differences between events so far alike, such as the English, French, and American Revolutions. In evolution thus considered there is nothing irreligious, provided we see therein the wise God carrying out his designs, and connecting the past, the present, and the future in one grand system.

The great and utterly inexcusable error of certain physicists is, that they make development do every thing, and supersede all other natural powers, and even God himself. This has made many good men turn away from the name and thing with aversion. But it is surely possible to maintain that evolution (that is, organized causation) reigns widely, even universally (that is, over all nature), and yet believe, that, like all creative action, it is limited, and is not the only process in operation, and that it is one, and only one, exercise of the mighty power of God. Let us notice its limitations.

1. It cannot give us the original matter, which must be there before it begins to develop. Its very name and nature indicate that there was something prior, from which it is derived. Whence did this come? We have clear proof that there is intelligence needed to organize nature (διακόσμεν, as Anaxagoras expresses it), and it is most reasonable to believe that He who arranged it also made it. At all events, evolution cannot give us the original matter, and we have to call in a power which I believe is still working.

2. Development cannot account for the beneficent order and special arrangements of the universe. Being itself blind, it might as readily work evil as good. A railway train, without a head and hand to set it on the track, might go on to destruction. We have to call in a power above itself to account for the beneficence of evolution.

3. There is evidence that new potencies have been added from time to time. Geology shows us new powers coming in. It is not possible to account for the actual phenomena of the world by a mass of molecules acting according to mechanical laws. There is no proof that there was life in the original atom, or molecule formed of atoms. How, then, did life come in when the first plant appeared? Was there sensation in the original molecule? If not, what brought it in when the first animal had a feeling of pleasure and pain? Was there mind in the first molecule, say a power of perceiving objects out of itself? Was there consciousness in the first monad, say a consciousness of self? Was there a power of discerning things, of comparing and judging, of noting resemblances and differences? Had they the power of reasoning, of inferring the unseen from the seen, of the future from the past? Were there emotions in these primitive existences, say a hope of continued existence, or a fear of approaching dissolution? All sober thinkers acknowledge that there is no evidence whatever in experience or reason to show that matter can produce mind, that mechanical action can gender thought, that chemical action can manufacture consciousness, that electricity can reason, or organic structure give us the idea of the good and holy. According, then, to the principles of thinking and right observation, we have to call in powers above the original physical forces to produce such phenomena. In particular there must have been a special act when man appeared with intelligence and moral discernment, with free will and love.

4. When these new and higher potencies come in, they act upon and act with the previously existing powers. In our bodily frame, mind acts harmoniously with matter, and the two produce joint results. The memory proceeds upon the information given by the senses, and the understanding and the conscience presuppose both the senses and the memory. Man is made of the dust of the ground; but there is breathed into him the breath of life, and he becomes a living soul.

5. As the result of the whole — of the action of the old forces and the introduction of the new — the work goes on in eras or epochs, in which we have, first, lifeless creation with all things mixed, then the separations of air from water, and of land from sea, the distinct appearance of the heavenly bodies, the forthcoming of plants, and animals rising higher and higher till they culminate in man.

6. This work combined — the evolution of the old and the superaddition of the new — is progressive, advancing from the inferior to the higher. This progression is still going on; and from causes now operating, especially from the intelligence and industry of man, there will be an increased fertility and wealth; and the earth and its principal inhabitant will be brought to a higher and higher condition.

In regard to development, see, on the one side, DARWIN'S Origin of Species and Descent of Man, and HERBERT SPENCER'S works, and, on the other side, DAWSON'S works, — Fossil Men and their Modern Representatives, The Chain of Life in Geological Time, Life's Dawn, Nature and the Bible, The Beginning of the World according to Revelation and Science, — and MIVART, On the Genesis of Species, and Man and Apes.

II. Analogous to this there is evolution in the kingdom of heaven. Many interesting correspondences may be traced between the two kingdoms. In both there are old powers and new, leading to higher and higher products. The kingdom of heaven is like to leaven, which a woman took and hid in three measures of meal, and which ferments there. It is a seed becoming a tree. There is first the blade, then the ear, and then the full corn in the ear.

It is our privilege to live under the dispensation of the Spirit. There were anticipations of the operation of this blessed agent in the Old Testament, who converted and sanctified individuals. But these manifestations were only partial. "For the Holy Ghost was not yet given, because that Jesus was not yet glorified." But Jesus spake of "the Spirit which they that believe on him should receive." When Jesus was taken up into heaven and glorified, the disciples waited for the promised blessing, which was fulfilled when the day of Pentecost was fully come, and the Spirit was poured out from on high.

When the spiritual begins to act, we have now two powers tending towards development and progression. First there are the mental powers, which have been acting previously, and which we may call the old or natural powers. Then there is the higher or spiritual power superinduced.

When a new power comes in, it does not set aside the old ones: on the contrary, it acts with them. We have this in the geological ages; for instance, in the introduction of intelligence in the midst of animalism. The senses continued to work, and to supply information, which is received, shaped, and guided by the intellect. When, at a further stage, the moral power came in, it did not supersede the intellect, which still operates, and tells us what things are; and upon this representation the conscience proceeds. It is the same when the still higher power, the spiritual power, acts. It does not push aside the senses, the conscience, the intelligence; but it purifies and guides them, and devotes them to higher ends.

There is the fullest accordance between the old powers and the superadded ones. They work in concert, as the soul does with the body, as the higher reason does with the senses and the animal impulses. The inspiration of Moses, of the prophets and apostles, did not destroy their natural character: it only sanctified and elevated them. The spirits of the prophets were subject unto them. Religion does not eradicate the natural powers: it moulds and directs them.

The development goes on in eras or epochs, like the ages of geology, like the days of Genesis. The patriarchal dispensation grows out of the antediluvian, the Jewish out of the patriarchal, the Christian out of the Jewish. We may discover marked epochs, even in the Christian Church — the time of the fathers (a time of establishing), the mediæval church, the reformation churches, the denominational churches, the missionary churches, to expand into the millennial church.

The issue of this joint action of the old powers and the new is progression. We have an example in the opening of Genesis, where new manifestations appear in successive days or epochs, the whole culminating in man, in the image of God. In the church there was first the shadow, and then the substance. There are first types, and then the archetype. There are promises and then performances, predictions and then fulfilments. "Howbeit, that was not first which is spiritual (πνευματικόν), but that which is natural (ψυχικόν); and afterward that which is spiritual." "And so it is written The first man was made a living soul; the second Adam was made a quickening spirit" (1 Cor. xv. 44-46); where we may mark the advancement from the merely living soul (ψυχὴν ζῶσαν) to the quickening spirit (πνεῦμα ζωοποιόν).

There is undoubtedly progression, development if we properly understand it, in the revelation which God has been pleased to make of his will. In the antediluvian times there was light like that of the dawn. There were prefigurations under the Levitical dispensation more minute and specific than in the patriarchal dispensations. There is higher ethical teaching in the prophetic books than in the older Scriptures. There is more spiritual teaching in the New Testament than in the Old. Jesus, in the fulness of time, becomes the light of the world. There is the fullest revelation of specific truth in the Epistles of Paul and John. This progressive work goes on under the two sets of powers,—the old and the new. This does not entitle us to argue, with some rational divines, that the new supersedes or sets aside the old.

Earnest minds have never been satisfied with such distant views of God as we have in causation and development. They have longed for and aspired after immediate communion with God. They have such in the dispensation of the Spirit. Here there is provision made for God dealing with each individual soul. There is room for convictions and conversions, for getting grace and more grace, for seasons of revival and refreshing. See MAN.

JAMES MCCOSH.

EWALD, Georg Heinrich August, one of the most learned Oriental scholars of the century; b. Nov. 16, 1803, in Göttingen; d. there of heart-disease, May 4, 1875. His father was a linen-weaver. In 1820 he entered the University of Göttingen, where Eichhorn was then teaching; but Ewald denied having been much influenced by him. After teaching in the gymnasium at Wolfenbüttel for two years, he began in 1824 to teach as Repetent at Göttingen, and was made professor in 1827. In 1837 he was expelled from his position for having signed, with six other Göttingen professors, a protest against the revocation of the liberal constitution of 1833; which Ernst August, king of Hanover, effected. This action made him famous. In 1829 and 1836 he had visited France and Italy, and now (in 1838) visited England. The same year he received a call to Tübingen. He was never contented during his stay there, and came into bitter feud with Baur and the Tübingen school. After laboring ten years in Tübingen, he was recalled in 1848 to Göttingen, where he continued until 1866, when his bitter attacks upon the Prussian government, and his refusal to take the oath of allegiance to the king of Prussia, were punished with his exclusion from the faculty of philosophy; but he was still allowed his salary and the privilege of lecturing. This latter privilege was withdrawn in 1868 on account of utterances in his Praise of the King and the People (4th ed., Stuttgart, 1869). He continued the uncompromising foe of the Prussian monarchy, and in 1869, and twice afterwards, was sent as the delegate of Hanover to the Prussian Parliament. [In 1874 he was imprisoned for three weeks for libel against Bismarck, whom he accused of ruining religion and morality in the war against Austria, and of picking out the best time for plunder and robbery in the war against France.]

Ewald was a solitary man. He was married twice; but from his childhood up he stood aloof from his fellows, had no intimate friends, and was, in an ever-increasing measure, intolerant of all opinions which contradicted his own. He felt himself called upon to go beyond the mere duties of the student and professor. He became a violent political pamphleteer, first against Ernst Georg of Hanover, and then against Prussia. In overweening but naive confidence, he dared to advise courts and church consistories, and addressed the Pope and the prelates in Germany on Roman errors. Their silence he construed into a confession that they were in the wrong. [Being asked why the Pope never answered his letter in which he called upon him to resign, Ewald replied, "He dare not!"]

But the intemperate vehemence of Ewald the citizen is only an accident to the patient laboriousness of Ewald the student, and his eminent contributions to philology and history. In the departments of Oriental language and criticism he has not had a superior. [His genius is even more remarkable than his learning, and in absolute defiant independence he stands alone.] His Hebrew grammar inaugurated a new era in Hebrew learning; and Hitzig, in his Preface to Isaiah, calls the author the second founder of the science of the Hebrew language. His History of Israel, in spite of errors of judgment and unreasonable dogmatism, must long remain the standard work in its line, and always a storehouse of the most patient research. He was indefatigable as lecturer, and equally so as author. At the University of Tübingen he gave instruction not only in Hebrew and Arabic, but also in the Persian, Turkish, Armenian, Coptic, and Sanscrit languages. Whatever department he devoted himself to, he threw an almost vehement enthusiasm into it. His literary activity began in 1823 with a work on the composition of Genesis (Die Comp. d. Genesis kritisch untersucht, Braunschweig), and only closed with an autobiography written during the last months of his life, which has not been published. The following list comprises his more important works: De Metris Carminum Arabicorum, Brunsv., 1825; D. Hohelied Salomo's übersetzt u. erklärt, 1826, 3d ed., 1866; Krit. Grammatik d. hebr. Sprache, 1827, subsequently enlarged, and Ausführl. Lehrbuch d. hebr. Sprache d. A. T., 1844, 8th ed., 1870 [Eng. trans. by Nicholson, Lond., 1836, of the Syntax alone, from 8th ed. by Kennedy, Edinb., 1879], also Hebr. Sprachlehre f. Anfänger, 1842 [Eng. trans. from 3d ed. by J. Y. Smith, Lond., 1870]; Com. in Apocalypsin Johannis, 1828; Grammatica Critica Ling. Arab., 2 vols., 1831-33; D. poetischen Bücher d. A. B., 1835-39, 3d ed., 1868 [Eng. trans., Lond., 1880 sqq.]; *Propheten d. [An incident in Ewald's life, related by Dean Stanley in the Preface to the third volume of his Hist. of the Jewish Church, deserves mention here. While an Oxford student, Stanley visited Ewald at an inn in Dresden. During conversation the great scholar, grasping a small copy of the Greek Testament, said, "In this little book is contained all the wisdom of the world."] BERTHEAU.

EWING, Alexander, Bishop of Argyll and the Isles, Scotland; b. in Aberdeen, March 25, 1814; d. May 22, 1873. He was elected bishop 1846, and represented the Broad-Church school on the episcopal bench. The characteristics of his theology have been thus presented: "He dwelt specially upon the illuminating power of Christianity as revealing the Fatherhood of God, and thus 'rolling back the clouds of human sin and sorrow,' so as even ultimately to 'exhaust hell of its darkness.' To him each attribute of God was equally light, and therefore he did not believe that any compromise had ever been effected between them. Christ was the supreme manifestation of that light, and the Bible was but the medium of its revelation, the means for enabling it to stream in upon the soul from sources beyond the mere letter of the truths which the written word contained. One of the chief of these external sources of light, specially welcomed by Ewing, was science, to the discoveries of which he looked forward as destined to lead to the manifestation of other and higher aspects of Christianity than were yet fully realized." These views will be found in his volume of discourses, Revelation considered as Light, London and N.Y., 1873. See also Memoir of Alexander Ewing, D.C.L., by A. J. Ross, B.D., London, 1877.

EWING, Finis, one of the founders of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church; b. in Bedford County, Virginia, July 10, 1773; d. at Lexington, Mo., July 4, 1841. From Virginia he early removed to Tennessee, and subsequently to Kentucky. His education was limited; but, under the influence of the revivalist preachers, he offered himself as a candidate for the ministry, and was licensed in 1802 by the presbytery of Cumberland. In 1810 he formed, with two others, the presbytery out of which grew the Cumberland Presbyterian Church. He is the author of Lectures on Import. Subjects in Divinity, Nashville, 1824.

EXACTIONS, EXACTIONES, TALLIÆ, in ecclesiastical law, are taxes levied by the church on the congregation, either entirely new, or of an increased scale. They were forbidden already by the Council of Toledo, 589, and often afterwards.

EXARCH denoted a hierarchical title intermediate between patriarch and metropolitan. When the church adopted Constantine's civil division of the realm into dioceses and provinces, the prelate of a province became a metropolitan, and of a diocese an exarch; and it was declared legal to appeal from the metropolitan to the exarch. From the exarch, however, there could be no appeal to the patriarch; though the higher rank of the latter was generally conceded, and also indicated by the fact, that, for instance, the patriarchate of Constantinople was formed by the absorption of three dioceses, — Pontus, Asia, and Thrace. In the fifth century the title of exarch seems to have disappeared. At present it is applied only in the Greek Church, and to the deputy of the Patriarch of Constantinople when visiting and inspecting the provinces.

EXCLUSIVA, in ecclesiastical law, means the right, claimed by Austria, France, and Spain, to exclude each one candidate at a papal election. The right has never been formally acknowledged by the curia; but the claim has always, since the fifteenth century, been complied with by the conclave.

EXCOMMUNICATION. I. AMONG THE HEBREWS. — Any person or thing — man, animal, weapon, tool, or piece of ground — which to pious eyes seemed abominable, or dangerous, or incorrigible, the Hebrews used to set apart from common life, transforming it into a kind of ban-offering, and sacrificing it to God, for him to do with it what he pleased, — destroying it, or simply rendering it harmless, or perhaps forgiving it. This usage, of which traces are found both among the Gauls (Caesar, De Bello Gallico, 6, 17) and the Germans (Tacitus, Ann., 13, 57), was very old among the Hebrews, and showed itself conspicuously in their relation to foreigners, to heathenism, and to any thing opposed to their own system of religion. Not only objects of heathen worship, such as altars, idols, temples, etc., but even the larger part of the booty made in war, such as chariots, weapons, horses, etc., were destroyed. Whole cities, with all their inhabitants, every thing breathing within their walls, yea, whole nations, such as, for instance, the Canaanites, were annihilated; and that not for political reasons, but on account of a religious principle.

Its most awful application, however, this principle obtained within the nation itself, as a weapon against any thing attacking the sacred institutions of the theocracy. It then became, not the fulfilment of a vow, but the execution of a punishment, and assumed the form of an excommunication. Thus a single person, or even a whole city, which broke the covenant with God, and fell into idolatry, was put under the ban, and with a curse abandoned to destruction. If a single person, he was killed (Lev. xxvii. 29): if a whole city, all that breathed within its precinct were killed, and the rest were burnt (Deut. xiii. 16). That which could not be thus destroyed, such as metal utensils, the soil, etc., became the property of the sanctuary (Lev. xxvii. 21-28).

As instances, may be mentioned the punishment of the people of Succoth and Peniel (Judg. viii. 4-17), of Jabesh (Judg. xxi. 10), of Benjamin (Judg. xx. 48), etc.

In the course of time the rigor of the law abated, and the punishment assumed the character of a simple ecclesiastical penalty; as in the time of Ezra, when those Israelites who would not send away their foreign wives were excluded from the synagogue, and their property confiscated. In the period of the New Testament there seems to have been two different kinds of excommunication, — one milder (the ἀφορίζω of Luke vi. 22), and another more severe (the ἀποσπῆραγον γίνεσθαι or ποιεῖν of John ix. 22, xii. 42, and xvi. 2). The Talmud and the Rabbins also distinguish between two kinds of excommunication, — the יָרֵי, which was limited to thirty days, and to the most intimate relations, and which did not exclude from the service, though the excommunicated was compelled to enter the synagogue through a peculiar door; and the חֲרָם, which should be pronounced by at least ten members of the congregation, and meant not only exclusion from the temple and the synagogue, but also from intercourse with co-religionists. See Buxtorf: Lex. Talm.; LIGHTFOOT: Horæ Heb. ad Joh., 9, 22. RUETSCH.

II. IN THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH. — On scriptural authority (Matt. xvi. 19, xviii. 18; John xx. 23; 1 Thess. v. 14; James v. 16; 1 John i. 8, v. 16; 2 Cor. v. 18) grave sins were punished in the ancient church with excommunication; and by the councils of Ancyra, 314 (c. 4, 6, 8, 9, 16), and Nicæa, 325 (c. 11, 12), the proceedings were completely systematized; only after a severe course of penitence the excommunicated was re-admitted into the bosom of the church. In the Western Church, however, this practice of doing public penance never obtained firm foothold, and soon disappeared altogether. But a double kind of excommunication developed, — an excommunicatio minor, excluding the culprit from the sacraments only; and an excommunicatio major, which also excluded him from the mass, from burial in consecrated ground, from ecclesiastical jurisdiction, and from all intercourse with other Christians, excepting a few cases, — utile, lex, humile, res ignorata, necesse. This last part, however, of the punishment, the Church could not enforce by her own power: she had to ask for the aid of the State, and she obtained it. The State declared the excommunicated infamous (c. 17, C. 16, qu. 1), all obligations to him, as, for instance, the feudal obedience, null and void (c. 4, 5, C. 15, qu. 6), etc. How completely the mediæval State submitted to the Church may be seen from the demands which the Pope made (1213 and 1219) to the Emperor Frederic II., and (1230) to his son King Henry VI., and to which these princes consented (Pertz, Mon., 4, 224, 231, 267). The canon law reigned supremely in most relations, and aspired to do so in them all.

With the Reformation a great change took place. In all Protestant countries where the State took the supremacy over the Church, the excommunicatio major was abolished as a secular punishment; but the excommunicatio minor was still retained as a point of church discipline, as a pœna medicinalis. Luther held, as did most of the Reformers, that, by admitting an impenitent to the Lord's Supper, the minister shared in the sin thereby committed. But he also held that this excommunication from the Lord's Supper should never be administered unless with the concurrence of the whole congregation. This last idea, however, was not carried out; and the excommunication itself gradually fell into disuse in the Reformed churches. The Roman-Catholic Church, which still pretends to maintain her social independence, and her supremacy over the State, continued to treat the prescripts of canon law as valid theoretically. Practically she has found out long ago that modifications are necessary, since an excommunication pronounced by the Pope, but not enforced by the State, would have no civil effect whatever; and an enforcement by the State is not likely to take place any more. The present theoretical arrangement of the whole question is set forth in the constitution of Oct. 12, 1869, Apostolica sedis. See KOBER: Der Kirchenban, Tübingen, 1857; GOESCHEN: Doctrina de disciplina ecclesiastica ex ordinationibus, Halle, 1859. MEJER.

EXEGESIS, EXEGETICAL THEOLOGY. I.

DEFINITION. — One of the four leading departments of theological science, and lying at the base of the others, — historical, systematic, practical. It has to do with the interpretation of the scriptures of the Old and New Testaments, which in the Protestant churches are regarded as the only infallible rule of the Christian faith and life, and the ultimate tribunal in all controversies. The term ἐξήγησις (from ἐξηγέομαι, "to lead out," "to expound") is borrowed from classical usage: the expounders of the oracles of Delphi, and the sacred rites in Athens, were called "exegetes" (ἐξηγηταί). In the New Testament the verb occurs once, in John i. 18, where it is said of Christ that he declared or revealed (ἐξηγήσατο) the hidden being of God. Exegesis originated among the Jewish scribes, passed into the Christian Church, and is now most extensively cultivated in Protestant Germany, Holland, England, and the United States. Every theological school must, first of all, have a chair of exegesis or biblical literature: most of them have two or more, for the Old and the New Testaments.

II. BRANCHES. — Exegetical theology, in the widest sense, embraces, beside exegesis proper, the following auxiliary and supplementary branches of theological learning: 1. Biblical philology (Greek for the New Testament, Hebrew and Chaldee for the Old Testament); 2. Biblical geography (Egypt, Mount Sinai, Palestine); 3. Biblical archaeology or antiquities; 4. Biblical history (from the creation to the close of the apostolic age); 5. Textual criticism (the restoration of the original text of the sacred writers); 6. A literary history of the Bible, usually called Historico-Critical Introduction (including an account of the several books, their genuineness, integrity, authorship, time and place of composition); 7. History of the canon; 8. Biblical hermeneutics (the science of the laws of interpretation); 9. Biblical theology (the summing-up of the results of exegesis in systematic form). See those titles.

III. KINDS OF EXEGESIS. — 1. Translation; 2. Periphrase; 3. Commentary. Of commentaries proper we may distinguish again three kinds. 1. Philological or grammatico-historical exegesis brings out simply the meaning of the writer according to the laws of language and the usus loquendi at the time of composition, and according to the historical situation of the writer, irrespective of any doctrinal or sectarian bias. It implies a thorough knowledge of Greek and Hebrew, and familiarity with contemporary literature. 2. Theological exegesis develops the doctrinal and ethical ideas of the writer in organic connection with the whole teaching of the Scriptures, and according to the analogy of faith. 3. Homiletical or practical exegesis is the application of the well-ascertained results of grammatical and theological interpretation to the wants of the Christian congregation, and belongs properly to the pulpit.

IV. HISTORY OF EXEGESIS. — 1. Jewish Exegesis, confined to the Old Testament. It began soon after the age of Ezra, but was first carried on by oral tradition of the scribes or Jewish scholars. It was especially devoted to the law (the Torah), i.e., the Pentateuch, and derived from it minute rules for the individual, social, and ecclesiastical relations. The body of these interpretations is called "Midrash." The prevailing method of exegesis was the rabbinical or literal. It excluded all foreign ideas, and was subservient to the strict legalism of the Pharisees. But among the Hellenist (Greek-speaking) Jews, especially in Alexandria, the allegorizing method obtained favor, especially through Philo (d. about 40 A.D.), who endeavored to combine the Mosaic religion with Platonic philosophy, and prepared the way for the allegorizing exegesis of Clement, and Origen of Alexandria. The Jewish rabbins of the middle ages cultivated grammatical exegesis at a time when the knowledge of Hebrew had died out in the Christian Church. The most distinguished among them are Ibn Ezra (d. 1167), R. Sal. Isaak or Raschi (d. 1105), David Kimchi (d. 1190), Moses Maimonides (d. 1204). Their commentaries are printed separately, and also in the so-called Rabbinical Bibles (e.g., of Buxtorf, Basel, 1618, 3 vols. folio).

2. Patristic Exegesis. — The first use made of the Bible in the Christian Church was practical and homiletical. It was to the early Christians what it is still to the great mass of believers, and will be to the end of time, — a book of life, of spiritual instruction and edification, of hope and comfort. Scientific or learned exegesis began when the Bible was perverted by heretics, and made to serve all sorts of errors. The Greek Church took the lead. Origen (180-254), the greatest scholar of his age, a man of genius and iron industry, is the father of critical exegesis. He is full of suggestive ideas and allegorical fancies. He distinguishes three senses in the Bible corresponding to the three parts of man: (a) A literal or bodily sense, (b) A moral or psychic sense, (c) An allegorical or mystic, spiritual sense. Where the literal sense is offensive, he escaped the difficulty by adopting a purely spiritual sense. The greatest commentators of the Greek Church are Chrysostom (d. 407), who in his Homilies explained the principal books of the Old and New Testaments, Theodore of Mopsuestia (d. 429), Theodoret of Cyrus (d. 457). Among the Latin fathers, Augustine (d. 430) is the profoundest and most spiritual, Jerome (d. 419) the most learned, expounder. The latter achieved the highest merit by his improved Latin version of the Bible (the Vulgate), which remains to this day the standard version of the Roman Church. The Council of Trent forbade the interpretation of Scriptures, except according to "the unanimous consent of the fathers." But this rule would prevent all progress in theology; and, besides, such a "unanimous consent" does not exist, except in the fundamental doctrines.

3. Mediæval Exegesis was purely traditional, and consisted of brief glosses (glossaria), or extracts from the fathers (called Catena Patrum). The original languages of the Bible were unknown in the West; and even the first among the scholastics had to depend upon Jerome's version for their knowledge of God's word. The prevailing method distinguished four senses of the Scriptures: (a) The literal, or historical; (b) The spiritual, or mystic, corresponding to faith, teaching what to believe (credenda); (c) The moral, or tropological, which corresponds to love or charity, and teaches what to do (agenda); (d) The anagogical, which refers to hope (speranda). These senses are expressed in the mnemonic verse: —

"Littera gesta docet;
Quid credas, allegoria;
Moralis, quid agas;
Quo tendas, anagogia."

The principal patristic compilations are: (a) In the Greek Church, those of Eusebius (d. 309), Theophylactus (d. 1007), Euthymius Zigabenus (d. 1118), and Nicephorus (fourteenth century); (b) In the Latin Church, Wallafried Strabo (d. 849), Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274). The Catena aurea in Evangelia of Thomas Aquinas has been reproduced in an English translation by Pusey, Keble, and Newman.

Among the more independent biblical scholars of the middle ages who prepared the way for the Reformation must be mentioned Nicolaus à Lyra (d. 1340); "Si Lyra non lyrasset, Lutherus non saltasset", and Laurentius Valla (d. 1465).

4. The exegesis of the Protestant Reformers of the sixteenth century marks a new epoch. It is full of enthusiasm for the word of God, and free from the slavery of ecclesiastical tradition. It went directly to the original Greek and Hebrew Scriptures, and furnished the best translations for the benefit of the people; while Romanism regards the Bible as a book for the priesthood, and discourages or prohibits efforts for its general circulation without note or comments. All the leading Reformers wrote commentaries, more or less extensive, on various books of the Bible, — Luther (d. 1546), Melancthon (d. 1560), Zwingli (d. 1531), Æcolampadius (d. 1531); the ablest of them are by Calvin (d. 1564) and his pupil and successor, Beza (d. 1603). Calvin combines almost all the qualifications of an expounder, in rare harmony; and his commentaries on Genesis, the Psalms, the Prophets, and all the books of the New Testament (except Revelation, on which he did not write), are valuable to this day. Beza, by his Greek Testament, his Latin version and notes on the New Testament, had great influence on the English version of King James.

5. Protestant commentaries of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, by Hugo Grotius (d. 1645; Arminian); Vitringa (d. 1722; Dutch Calvinist); Hammond (d. 1660; Church of England); Matthew Poole (Presbyterian; d. 1679; Annotations upon the Whole Bible, an English synopsis from his Latin synopsis); Matthew Henry (Independent; d. 1714; the best homiletical commentator of England; many editions, from 3 to 9 vols., Lond. and N.Y.); Patrick, Lowth, Arnald, and Whitby (Lond., 1694 sqq., new ed., Lond., 1822, in 6 vols., Phila. and N.Y., in 4 vols.); Calovius (Lutheran; d. 1686; Biblia Illustrata, versus Grotius); A. Clarke (Methodist, Lond., 1810-23, in 8 vols., best ed., London, 1844, in 6 vols.); John Gill (Baptist; d. 1771; London, 1763, 9 vols.); Philip Doddridge (Independent; d. 1751; author of Family Expositor); J. A. Bengel (Lutheran; d. 1752; author of the Latin Gnomon of the New Testament, twice translated into English, and largely used by John Wesley in his Notes, an admirable specimen of multum in parvo); Thomas Scott (Family Bible, London, 1796, 4 vols., 11th ed., 1825, 6 vols.). Collective works: Critici Sacri (Lond., 1660, 9 tom., Amsterdam, 1698-1732, in 13 vols.), compiled from the principal commentators, as an appendix to Walton's Polyglot, under the direction of Bishop Pearson and others; Poole's Synopsis Criticorum aliorumque S. Scripture interpretum (London, 1669-76, 4 vols. in 5, fol.), a very useful abridgment from the Critici Sacri and other commentators.

6. Exegesis in the nineteenth century. It is exceedingly prolific, chiefly German, English, and American. The Bible is now more studied than ever before, and with a better knowledge of the languages, antiquities, geography, and history. We can only mention a small number of works.

(a) Commentaries on the whole Bible: Lange's Bibelwerk (Bielefeld and Leipzig, 1857-77, in 16 parts; English translation, with large additions, by Philip Schaff, aided by more than forty American contributors, New York and Edinburgh, 1864-80, in 25 vols. royal 8vo, including a separate volume on the Apocrypha and a complete index), a threefold commentary, critical, doctrinal, and homiletical, for the use of ministers and theological students; Chr. Wordsworth (Bishop of Lincoln), The Holy Bible with Notes and Introductions (London, 1869 sqq., 6 vols., several editions), High Church, devout, patristic, uncritical; a Commentary in French, by Professor Reuss, in Strassburg (Paris, 1875-81, in 13 parts, with an index), is independent and critical; Jamieson, Fausset, and Brown, A Commentary, Critical, Experimental, and Practical (Edinb., repub. in Phila., 1875, in 6 vols., and at Hartford, Conn., in 1 vol.); Henry Cowles (d. 1881) commentaries, N.Y., 1861-81, 16 vols.; The Speaker's Commentary, suggested by the speaker of the House of Commons, ed. by Canon F. C. Cook aided by a number of bishops and presbyters of the Church of England (London and New York, 1871-82, in 10 vols., 6 for the Old, 4 for the New Testament), less learned, but more popular, than Lange, and, like the Church of England, eminently respectable and conservative; The Pulpit Commentary, ed. by Canon Spence and Rev. Joseph S. Excell aided by a large number of English divines (London, 1880 sqq.), to embrace many volumes; similar in plan to Lange's Commentary.

(b) On the Old Testament: Keil and Delitzsch, Eng. trans., pub. by Clark, Edinburgh, 1869 sqq.; Kurzgefasstes exegetisches Handbuch zum Alten Test., by Knobel, Bertheau, Dillmann, and others (new ed., Leipzig, 1880, etc.).

(c) On the New Testament: Olshausen (1837-56), trans.; De Wette (d. 1849), revised by Brückner and others; Meyer (d. 1874), revised in every new edition by Weiss and others, Eng. trans. pub. by Clark, Edinb.; Alford, The Greek Testament, etc. (in 4 vols., 6th ed., London, 1868 sqq.); J. B. McClellan (Lond., 1st vol., 1875). All these are for critical students of the Greek text. Popular commentaries on the New Testament: Albert Barnes (d. 1870) was one of the first, and had by far the widest circulation of any in America and England. More recent works: A New Test. Com. for English Readers, ed. by Bishop Ellicott (Lond., 1879, in 3 vols.); Illustrated Popular Com., ed. by Schaff, with English and American contributors (N. Y. and Edinb., 1879-83, in 4 vols., also issued since 1882 in small volumes, revised, under the title International Revision Com., based upon the Revised Version of 1881). Besides, there are many shorter and denominational commentaries. The Revision of 1881, and the International Lesson system, have greatly stimulated exegetical activity; and the market is now flooded with all sorts of helps for the study of the Bible.

(d) The present century has also produced a large number of exegetical works of the first order on separate books of the Bible, which it would be impossible here to enumerate. Among recent commentators on one or more books of the Old Testament, Gesenius (Isaiah), Ewald (the poetical and prophetic books), Hupfeld (the Psalms), Hitzig (Psalms, minor prophets), Hengstenberg (Psalms, etc.), Delitzsch (Psalms, Isaiah), Keil (historical books), Schlottmann (Job), Stuart (Daniel, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes), Joseph A. Alexander (Psalms and Isaiah) occupy the first rank.

Of New-Testament commentators on special books must be mentioned Winer (on Galatians), Fritzsche (Matthew, Mark, Romans; all in Latin), Tholuck (Romans, Hebrews, Sermon on the Mount), Lücke, Bleek, Harless, Stier, von Hofmann, Godet, Stuart, Hodge, Alexander, Stanley, Jowett, Ellicott, and Lightfoot. Among these, again, the following commentaries may be recommended as being very useful for a critical study of the Greek Testament: Tholuck on the Sermon on the Mount; Lücke on the writings of John; Luthardt on the Gospel of John; Keil on the four Gospels; Morison on Matthew and Mark; Tholuck, Forbes, Philippi, Hodge, Beet, and Shedd on Romans; Stanley on Corinthians; Wieseler on Galatians; Harless on Ephesians; Bleek on the Hebrews (especially the large work in 3 vols.); Beck on the Pastoral Epistles; Elliott on the Apocalypse; Ellicott on Galatians, Ephesians, Thessalonians, and Pastoral Epistles (republished in Andover); Lightfoot on Galatians, Philippians, and Colossians; Godet on Luke, John, and Romans (in French, and trans., in Clark's For. Theol. Libr.).

PHILIP SCHAFF.

EXEMPTION, in ecclesiastical law, means the transference of persons or institutions from the jurisdiction of their nearest regular superior to that of some special or higher superior. The most noticeable instance of exemption in the Roman-Catholic Church is found in the history of monasticism. The monks were originally subject to the jurisdiction of the bishop. See the Council of Chalcedon, 451, can. 4 (c. 12, Can. XVI. qu. I.; c. 10, Can. XVIII. qu. III.). But in course of time, first single monasteries, and then whole orders, succeeded in liberating themselves from the episcopal rules, and placing themselves immediately under the Pope. The change, however, did not take place without contest; and the acts of the Councils of Constance and Trent show the bitterness which prevailed on both sides. In the Reformed Churches there was no use for exemptions, except in cases in which the Lutheran and the Calvinistic or one of the Reformed and the Roman-Catholic Church met each other in the same parish. The first instance of exemption in the Reformed Churches was that of the prince, who placed himself outside of the regular ecclesiastical jurisdiction; then followed, in some countries, that of the royal officers, in others, that of the army, and in others, that of the whole nobility, etc.

EXERCISES, Spiritual (exercitia spiritualia), a term applied, in the Roman-Catholic asceticism, to certain exercises in meditation and mortification practices, both by ecclesiastics and laymen, generally under the guidance of the confessor, and partly as general penance, partly as a preparation for the Lord's Supper, ordination, etc. It was Ignatius Loyola who developed this institution of spiritual exercises to its highest and most elaborate form; and Pope Alexander VII. granted full absolution to any one, ecclesiastical or layman, who for eight days should practise these exercises in a house of the Jesuits, and according to the method of Loyola. See The Spiritual Exercises of St. Ignatius of Loyola, trans. from the Latin by Charles Seager, Baltimore, 1849.

EXETER, chief town of Devonshire, Eng.; population, 31,650; on the Exe, ten miles from its mouth, in the English Channel; is on the site of the British stronghold Caer Isc, and the Roman town, Isea Damnoniorum. It was afterwards occupied by Britons and Saxons, and called Exanceaster, whence comes the modern name. In 1050 the episcopal see of Devonshire, founded at Crediton, 910, was removed to Exeter. Its cathedral dates from the twelfth century, and, although not as large as some others, is inferior to none in architectural beauty. It was restored 1877. The income of the see of Exeter is £4,200; and the present bishop is Dr. Frederick Temple, who was consecrated 1869.

EXODUS OF THE CHILDREN OF ISRAEL.

The Pharaoh of the exodus is Menephtah I., the son of Rameses the Great, the Pharaoh of the oppression. This is now so generally acknowledged, that it may be accepted as a settled fact. The other view—that Amosis I. was the Pharaoh of the oppression, and Thothmes II. that of the exodus—has been given up by R. S. Poole, formerly its chief advocate, in his article upon Egypt, in the ninth edition of the Britannica. The date of the exodus may be set down as April 15, 1317 B.C. The other view mentioned would put it in 1485 B.C. A striking though strangely unnoticed passage in Herodotus seems to add confirmation to the accepted date. (See Schaff, Through Bible Lands, p. 102.) He says that the son of Rameses, whom the Greeks called "Sesostris," "undertook no warlike expeditions, being struck with blindness, owing to the following circumstance. The river had swollen to the unusual height of eighteen cubits, and had overflowed all the fields, when, a sudden wind arising, the water rose in great waves. Then the king, in a spirit of impious violence, seized his spear, and hurled it into the strong eddies of the stream. Instantly he was smitten with disease of the eyes, from which, after a little while, he became blind, continuing without the power of vision for ten years" (II. c. 111). This reads like a confused reminiscence of Menephtah's overthrow in the Red Sea. It is no objection that the king is said to have lived ten years thereafter; for the Bible-account does not compel us to believe that the Pharaoh perished then. The monuments, as was to be expected, contain no account of the disaster.

The route of the exodus is thus described in Scripture language: "The children of Israel journeyed from Ramesis to Succoth" (Exod. xii. 37); from Succoth they went to Etham, in the edge of the wilderness (xiii. 20); there they turned, and encamped "before Pi-hahiroth, between Migdol and the sea, over against Baal-Zephon" (xiv. 2). In Numbers (xxxiii. 2-10) there is another account, which presents the same facts in a more condensed form. The identification of the localities mentioned is not yet settled; but that given by Ebers seems most probable. This is: Rameses was el Mashuta, at the head of the Wady Tumilat; Succoth, Sechet (Taustastum of the Romans), north-east of Lake Timsah; Etham (fortress), a frontier fortress city; Pi-hahiroth, Ajrud, a fortress a few miles north-east of Suez ("Pi" is merely the Egyptian article); Migdol, Bir Suweis, about two miles from Suez; Baal-Zephon is Mount Atakah.

The collection of the great multitude—six hundred thousand men capable of bearing arms (i.e., between twenty and sixty years old), besides women and children, or in all between two millions and three millions—was the work of three or four days. The rallying-place was Rameses (el Mashuta). To this point the Israelites streamed from different parts, as they had been directed to do. The existence of tribal organization explains the fact that they marched in some sort of order. Yet they had so recently been emancipated, and were so entirely unarmed, that it was, humanly speaking, impossible for them to stand an attack from the disciplined Egyptian army. Accordingly, when Moses had led them as far as Etham upon the highway to Palestine, the seat of a garrison, he abruptly turned to the south, and went south for fifty miles until they reached Pihahiroth, over against Baal-Zephon, in the neighborhood of the present Suez. But their sudden disappearance from Etham naturally led the garrison there to believe that they had become entangled in the wilderness; and word to that effect was sent to Pharaoh (Exod. xiv. 3). The explanation of the delay in their pursuit is, that the universal bereavement had centred the attention of the Egyptians upon their funeral-rites, which required some ten weeks (Gen. l. 3), and which were paramount in importance. Nothing could be done until they were over. At the end of the seventy days, active measures were taken to bring back the fugitive slaves; and to the Israelites came the dismaying intelligence that the host of Pharaoh was upon their track. Before them was the Red Sea, behind them the angry host. No wonder they murmured, and said to Moses in bitter irony, "Because there are no graves in Egypt [that land of graves] hast thou taken us away to die in the wilderness?" (Exod. xiv. 11.) But man's extremity is God's opportunity. "Moses stretched out his hand over the sea; and the LORD caused the sea to go back by a strong [north] east wind all the night, and made the sea dry land, and the waters were divided. And the children of Israel went into the midst of the sea upon the dry ground; and the waters were a wall unto them on their right hand and on their left" (Exod. xiv. 21, 22).

There are three chief explanations of these verses. 1. The Arab tradition locates the crossing a few miles south of Suez, where the sea is about ten miles broad, and supposes the host to have made the distance thither in the night. This view meets best a literal interpretation of the narrative; for then the waters would have been a veritable wall upon either hand, and is maintained by von Raumer (Zug der Is. aus Aeg. nach Canaan, Leipzig, 1837). But it would have required an accumulation of miracles to have brought them to the place in so short a time, especially as there is but a narrow footpath between the Atakah range and the sea. Besides, the mention of the wind suggests that God employed natural means. Hence this view may be dismissed for the second.

2. The crossing took place at the head of the gulf, near or north of Suez. The gulf is here horn-shaped, and is a mere channel about four miles long by less than a mile wide. At low water, small islands and sand-banks are visible in it, and it is fordable by those acquainted with it. The strong wind laid this stretch bare, and over it the Israelites crossed. The waters had been driven into the south-west bay; and there they were a wall on the one hand, while those of the open sea were a wall on the other. The miracle was, as Dr. Robinson says, a "miraculous adaptation of the laws of nature to produce a required result."

3. The theory now associated with Brugsch (L'exode et les monuments égyptiens, Leipzig, 1875, for trans. see below in LIT.), although it is older, having been advocated as early as 1726 by Hermann van der Hardt, and recently by M. J. Schleiden (Die Landenge von Suez, Leipzig, 1858).

Sayce adopted it in 1881. According to this, the Israelites assembled at San (Zoan); and the "crossing" was not over the Red Sea at all, but over the Serbonian bog. To this view there are so many objections, that, as Dr. Bartlett says, it "derives its chief importance from the eminence and ability of its latest advocate (Brugsch)." It requires a renaming and replacing of every locality,—in itself, be it granted, no insuperable objection. Yam Suph is the Serbonian bog; Mara is the Bitter Lakes; Elim is Thent-remu; Etham is just before one crosses the lowest part of Lake Menzaleh; Pi-hahiroth is at the hither side of the Serbonian bog; Baal-Zephon is Mount Casius, upon the Mediterranean Sea. There the Israelites crossed, and came south-west and south to Ain Musa. The theory turns upon the meaning of yam suph. The words mean literally the weedy or reedy sea. Surely they fit better the shallow, reedy lakes of North-eastern Egypt than the Red Sea; but the stubborn fact is, that they are uniformly applied to the latter by the Seventy, who had the best means of knowing what the Hebrew meant; and thus the argument upon which the theory rests is worthless, and all Brugsch's learning and enthusiasm cannot give it value. He derives his proofs mainly from the following letter, written, Geikie thinks, to recall the gendarmerie who had watched the wall at Takhu, a fortress on the eastern frontier of the Delta, when the Hebrews, prior to the exodus, were advancing toward it. It reads thus: "Notice! when my letter reaches you, bring the Madjai at once, who were over the foreign Salkhi who have escaped. Do not bring all the men I have named in my list. Give attention to this. Bring them to me to Takhu, and I will admit them and you" (Hours with the Bible, vol. ii. p. 182).

That the Seventy were correct in interpreting yam suph by τὴν ἐρυθρὰν θάλασσαν ("the Red Sea") is very plain when another passage in Exodus is compared. Thus (Exod. x. 19) the locusts were cast by a west wind "into the Red Sea" (εἰς τὴν θάλασσαν τὴν ἐρυθρὰν); but it would have required a south wind to have blown them into the Serbonian bog.

There are other objections to the Schleiden-Brugsch theory. Ebers contests the Egyptological proof. Dr. Bartlett (p. 171) urges that the identification of Rameses and Zoan "seems incompatible with the use of both names in the Scriptures and in the same book (e.g., Numbers), without a hint of their identity." Dr. J. P. Thompson, in the Bibliotheca Sacra for January, 1875, adds: (1) "This theory, locating Rameses at Zoan, would require the Israelites first to march a long distance away from their destination to the place of rendezvous, to cross the Pelusiac arm of the Nile, and to recross it next day,—a process sufficiently improbable; (2) That the supposed route would take them on the most direct way towards the Philistines, contrary to the express statement of Exod. iii. 17; (3) That the leading of an army into the treacherous Serbonian bog, when there was a military road and a great thoroughfare south of it, is a strategical blunder not supposable in Moses, much less in Egyptian generals who were accustomed to the whole region, having frequently led their armies to the east."

It is important to remember that the night of the crossing was a terrible one. In the language of the Psalmist, "The clouds poured out water; the skies sent out a sound; thine arrows [the lightnings] lightened the world; the earth trembled and shook" (Ps. lxxvii. 17, 18). The pillar of fire was between the Israelites and the Egyptians: so where the latter, accustomed to see the flaming torches at the head of the host, supposed the van of the Israelites to be, there was really their rear. Misled, therefore, they forced their jaded horses onward, thinking they had already got into the very midst of the flying slaves. Under divine guidance, and perhaps miraculously hastened, the Israelites made the crossing in safety; but the Egyptians labored under unexpected difficulties. "At the morning watch the LORD looked unto the host of the Egyptians," and "troubled" (i.e., threw them into confusion), and "took off their chariot-wheels, so that they drave them heavily." The morning dawned. The Egyptians saw their slaves upon the bank, but saw also that the sea had broken its barrier, and was pouring in upon them. Amid groans and curses the pride of Egypt's army sank beneath the waves; while the Israelites sang their new song: "Who is like unto Thee, O LORD, among the gods? who is like unto Thee, glorious in holiness, fearful in praises, doing wonders?" "Thus the LORD saved Israel that day out of the hand of the Egyptians, and Israel saw the Egyptians dead upon the seashore."

EXORCISM (ἑξορκισμός, "adjuration"), a solemn adjuration with the intent of expelling evil spirits. Our Lord cured many cases of demonic possession, and conferred the power to do the same upon his disciples (Matt. x. 8). They were, however, not always successful (Matt. xvii. 19). The Jews likewise professed to have the power of casting out evil spirits; and Josephus mentions that it was done in his day with the aid of roots and a ring, by which the demon was extracted through the nose.

In the early church, exorcism was regarded as a charism which belonged to all Christians. Tertullian (Apol. 23) lays it down as an indisputable fact that the simple command of a Christian was sufficient to expel evil spirits. Origen (Cont. Celsum, VII.) testifies to the same thing, and notices that no artificial incantations were used. At a later period the exorcist was one of the four inferior orders of the clergy, and received ordination (Apost. Const., VIII. 26). Bishop Cornelius of Rome (251) makes mention of this. The Roman-Catholic priesthood are still ordained exorcists before being ordained priests.

It was the practice to exorcise catechumens, on the principle that all who did not believe in Christ belonged to the Devil. In the case of children at baptism, the priest breathed upon the child. The name of Christ, or a simple passage of Scripture, was considered efficacious in exorcism.

The Greek and Latin Churches still use not only formulas of exorcism at baptism, but also practise it over those actually possessed. In the latter case the patient is first sprinkled with holy water, after which the priest says, "I exorcise thee, unclean spirit, in the name of Jesus Christ: tremble, O Satan, thou enemy of mankind," etc. The Calvinistic Churches, at the Reformation, renounced exorcism. But Luther and Melancthon favored its retention, and the other Lutheran theologians followed them. Heshsiusius, in 1583, was the first to propose its omission, but was answered by Menius, in a tract (De Exorcismo), 1590. At present exorcism is given up; and the catechumen in the Lutheran Church says, "I renounce the devil and his works," etc. [The English Church retained exorcism in the Prayer-Book of Edward VI., the priest saying, "I command thee, unclean spirit, in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, that thou come out and depart from this infant," etc. It was, however, omitted in the revised Prayer-Book; and the seventy-second canon of the Church of England expressly forbids any priest attempting to expel demons. See SMITH and CHEETNAM, Diet. Antiq.]

EXPECTANCY (expectantia, exspectiva, gratia exspectiva), in canon law, means a prospective claim to an ecclesiastical benefice, granted before the benefice has actually fallen vacant. This curious custom, of giving a man a successor before he has died himself, developed very early in the mediæval church, and not altogether without some good reasons. It proved an effective means of preventing a benefice from being kept vacant, during which vacancy its revenues fell into the hands of strangers; and it might also be successfully applied as a check to too narrow provincial interest in the appointment of ecclesiastical officers, whereby the general interest of the church was made to suffer. But it soon developed into a hideous cancer, — an opportunity for the meanest speculation, for greed, fraud, and violence. Already the Lateran Council of 1179 forbade this custom, but in vain. It was restricted by the Council of Constance, again forbidden by the Council of Basel, and finally abolished by the Council of Trent. Only in one case the Council of Trent still acknowledged it (Sess. 25 de reform. c. 7), — in the case of the appointment of a coadjutor to a bishop with expectancy of succession.

EXSUPERIUS, Bishop of Toulouse in the latter half of the fourth and the beginning of the fifth century, distinguished himself by the noble charity he showed during the frightful depredations of the Alani, Vandals, and Suevi, neglecting his own sufferings in order to administer to the sufferings of others. Jerome dedicated his commentary on the Prophet Zechariah to him. See Act. Sanct., Sept. 28.

EXTREME UNCTION (the rite of anointing the dying with oil) is the fifth of the seven sacraments of the Roman-Catholic Church. It is based upon Mark vi. 13 and Jas. v. 14, 15. In both these cases the rite is applied for the purpose of healing the sick, not in order to prepare them for death; which is the principal meaning of the sacrament in the Catholic Church. As for the fathers of the Greek Church, it will suffice to say that John of Damascus treats only of baptism and the Lord's Supper under the mysteries of the Church. Among the writers of the Western Church, Irenæus has been appealed to as the first witness to the existence of the institution; but Irenæus (I. 21, 5) simply says that the Herakleonites, a Gnostic sect, anointed the dying with a mixture of oil and water to protect them from hostile spirits in the other world. This practice by no means implies, as Bellarmine and other Catholic theologians affirm, a church sacrament of which it was a perversion. Tertullian and Cyprian, who describe at length the customs of the Western Church, do not mention extreme unction, while they discuss the Lord's Supper and baptism at length.

The use of oil, however, for producing miraculous cures, is noticed by many of the Fathers. Tertullian (Ad Scap. 4) mentions that Proculus healed the Pagan Severus, the father of Antoninus, with oil. Popular superstition took hold of these cures, and went so far, that, as early as the fourth century, we find the people stealing the lamps from the churches in order to preserve the oil for miraculous cures (Chrysos., Hom. 32, in Math. vi.). They did the same with the baptismal water. This superstition was the germ of the subsequent sacramental idea of the church. The transition is apparent in a letter of Innocent I. (416) to Bishop Decentius of Eugubium, which expressly calls anointing with oil a kind of sacrament (genus sacramenti). But the application of the oil was not confined to the priesthood: it was the prerogative of all Christians. From the close of the eighth century the rite is mentioned very frequently in the acts of councils. Theodulf of Orleans (798) and the first Council of Mayence (847) associate repentance and the Eucharist with it. The synod of Chalons (813) attributes spiritual as well as physical efficacy to the oil; and the synod of Regiaticinum (850) calls the rite a healthful sacrament (salutare sacramentum), of which one must partake by faith in order thereby to secure forgiveness of sins, and restoration of health. The question consequently arose in the twelfth century, whether the anointing could be repeated. Gottfried, Abbot of Vendome (1100), and Ivo, Bishop of Chartres, answered in the negative. The popular idea was, that those who recovered after receiving the rite ought never to touch the earth with bare feet, to eat meat, etc. Councils spoke out against this superstition; but it contributed not a little to give to the act the solemn significance subsequently attached to it. For the first time in the twelfth century do the expressions "extreme unction" and "sacrament of the dying" occur.

Hugo de St. Victor (d. 1141) was the first to introduce its treatment into a theological system; and Peter Lombard gave it the fifth place among the seven sacraments (Sentent., iv. 23). Thomas of Aquinas developed at length the doctrinal definition and significance of the rite. Eugenius IV., at the Council of Florence (1439) and the Decrees of Trent (Sess. xiv.), gave the final definition of the Church. The latter declare extreme unction to be a real sacrament instituted by our Lord, and revealed by James.

The purpose of the sacrament has been variously stated. The first idea was, that it healed the body. Peter Lombard says that it serves for the "remission of sins and the alleviation of bodily infirmity." Albertus Magnus (in Lib. iv. 23, 14) held that it removed the remainders of sin unexpiated by penance, or unwashed away by baptism; and Aquinas defined these remainders as spiritual weakness. He says that the physical restoration is only a secondary end. The Council of Trent states that the purpose of the sacrament is "to confer grace, and heal the sick."

The oil of anointing is consecrated by the bishop, and the act of anointing is alone performed by the priest. The Council of Mayence (847) limited its application to those in peril of death. The Roman Catechism confines it to the very sick, but denies it to children, and criminals condemned to death. Thomas of Aquinas held that the eyes, ears, nose, mouth, hands, reins, and feet should be anointed.

The Greek Church calls the sacrament euchelaion ("prayer" and "oil"), and gives it the seventh place among the sacraments. The consecration of the oil is the prerogative of the priest; and the rite, which may be repeatedly administered, is only in extreme cases applied in private dwellings. In all other points its practice and definition agrees with those of the Latin Church. [The late Bishop Forbes of Brechin (d. 1875), in his exposition of the Thirty-nine Articles, calls "the unction of the sick the lost pleiad of the Anglican firmament."]

THOLOUCK.

EZEKIEL (God will strengthen, or the strength of God), one of the prophets of the exile. He was the son of Buzi, and a priest (Ezek. i. 3). He lived in his own house (iii. 24, viii. 1), on the River Chebar, near Tel Abib, among the captives whom Nebuchadnezzar had deported with King Joiachim. He was married, as we learn incidentally (xxiv. 18). He prophesied from the fifth to at least the twenty-fifth year of the captivity (594-572 B.C.). The statement of Josephus (Ant. X., 6, 3), that he was only a boy when carried to Babylon, is rendered improbable by the date of the close of his prophetic activity, which we assume to have been the probable date of his death. This would have made him quite young at the time of his death. Although the exiles at times took offence at his prophecies (ii. 6), he was held in high esteem by them (viii. 1, xiv. 1 sqq., xx. 1, etc.). This is the extent of our reliable information concerning Ezekiel's life. Untrustworthy traditions speak of a meeting between him and Pythagoras, of various miracles, and a death of martyrdom. His pretended tomb was shown near Bagdad, where an autographic copy of the prophecies was said to be preserved.

EZEKIEL, Book of, without doubt the work of Ezekiel, is divided into two main divisions; chaps. i.-xxiv. closing with the inception of Nebuchadnezzar's siege of Jerusalem (589 B.C.), and chaps. xxxiii.-xlviii. beginning after the destruction of the city (587 B.C.). The intervening chapters contain denunciations against nations hostile to Israel. Both of the principal divisions are prefaced with a reference to the importance and responsibility of Ezekiel's prophetic office (iii. 16 sqq., and xxxiii. 6 sqq.). The first part is characterized by the announcement of judgment against Jerusalem; the second, by the promise of its re-edification. The first portrays God's wrath; the second, God's mercy.

The first main division is introduced by a vision of God in all his glory enthroned upon the cherubim, in which the prophet receives the prophetic mission to speak against Israel. He inaugurates his activity by a series of vehement predictions of the siege and consequent desolations of Jerusalem (iv.-vii.). In chap. viii. he has a vision of the idolatrous abominations in the temple. All, except those who mourned at this desecration, were to be destroyed (ix.); and fire from heaven was to fall upon the miserable city (x.). The people's trust in false prophets (xi.), and the captivity of Zedekiah (xii.), come under notice. The rejection of Jerusalem is pictured under the imagery of a barren vine fit only for the fire (xv.); and her immoralities, under the picture of a foster-child given over to whoredom (xvi.). In chap. xvii. David's royal house is presented under the allegory of a cedar, the top of which the Chaldaean eagle plucks away; but God will plant again a twig therefrom. He justifies God's punishments (xviii.), and laments over the fall of Israel, which is compared to a robbed lion's lair and a burned vine. The rebellious people will be gathered together again (xx.); but the downfall of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar is at hand (xxi.). The division closes with a scathing rehearsal of its iniquities (xxii.-xxiv.). The chapters that follow (xxiv.-xxxii.) contain denunciations of the enemies of Israel, — Ammon, Moab, and Philistia (xxv.), Tyre (xxvi.-xxviii. 19), Sidon (xxviii. 20 sqq.), and especially Egypt (xxix.-xxxii.). These utterances are not arranged in chronological order, as those of the rest of the book are. The second main division (xxxiii.-xlviii.) is full of hope and promise. The prophet's mouth is again opened at the announcement of Jerusalem's fall (xxxiii. 21 sq.). After denouncing the mercenary shepherds of Israel, he passes over to a prophecy of the coming of the Lord, who will himself feed his flock (xxxiv.). Mount Seir (Edom) shall be punished (xxxv.), but new prosperity shall come to the mountain of Israel (xxxvi.). In the vision of the dry bones gathered together and revived, the prophet sees the new spiritual creation which the Lord will accomplish upon his people (xxxvii.). The final peril of Israel in the campaign of Gog is depicted (xxxviii., xxxix.). The last eight chapters give an account of the reconstruction of the temple, its holiness, and its priests, and conclude with a description of the stream of living waters flowing out from the temple, and the new parcelling out of the land among the tribes.

The peculiarities of Ezekiel are to be traced to the peculiar position of the author in Chaldaea. Separated as he was from Jerusalem and the excitement of passing events, his prophecies differ from those of the older prophets (Jeremiah, for example), in that they are not adapted to arouse to immediate action, display more care in preparation, and give evidence of retirement and reflection. The short stirring appeal is not often heard; but in its stead there is a calm treatment of the subject in hand. Compare, for example, the extended description of the vision in chap. i. with the brief outline of the analogous vision of Isaiah (vi.). Ezekiel delights to give perfect pictures. His symbolism and imagery are rich, but here and there so enigmatical as to have frequently discouraged both Jewish and Christian expositors, and to have led the Jews to forbid their people from reading it before they had reached their thirtieth year. But the prophet is a master in the description of the grand and sublime; and many passages are examples of the finest lyric and elegiac poetry; as, for example, the lamentation for the princes of Israel (xix. 1 sqq.), the description of the fall of Tyre (xxvi. 15-xxvii.), the dirge over Pharaoh, represented under the image of the crocodile (xxxii.), etc. Although he excels as an author, he is not to be regarded as never having spoken his prophecies. His popular eloquence is expressly attested in chap. xxxiii. 30 sqq. And, in the absence of immediate activity, there are many references to symbolical acts with which he used to emphasize his prophetic utterances, — eating and drinking (iv. 9 sq.), shearing his hair (v. 1 sqq.), stamping with his foot (vi. 11), etc. His own person was a type (xxxiv. 24, 27), and the circumstances of his life typical of his nation's destiny (xxiv. 15 sqq.). The prophecies are usually introduced with such formulas as "Thus saith the Lord," and "The word of the Lord came." The prophet is addressed by God and angels by the title "Son of man." These and like peculiarities attest the originality and unity of the composition. In common with Jeremiah, Ezekiel draws upon the earlier prophets, and, in a larger measure than Jeremiah, he shows the influence of the Mosaic legislation (comp. chaps. xliii.-xlvi.), and the history of Israel (comp. Gen. ii. 8 with Ezek. xxviii. 13, xxxi. 8 sq., xxxvi. 35, and Gen. i. 28 with Ezek. xxxvi. 11).

The spiritual and theological teachings of the book. The characteristic of Ezekiel is, that though an exile in a foreign land, and living in a period of disintegration, he points to a better time in the future for the theocratic kingdom. With Jeremiah, he predicts the fall of the Jewish State as unavoidable, and pronounces the hopes of the patriots, based upon treaties with Egypt, as altogether illusory. The minuteness and detail of these prophetic references must impress us all the more when we bear in mind the prophet's separation from Jerusalem (see xii. 12 sq., xxi. 23 sqq., xlii. 2, etc.). But Ezekiel restored again in the picture of his visions the old institutions of the temple, and in a pure form. In these descriptions his priestly training shows itself; but he did not, in his concern for the outward form, overlook the ethical and spiritual. In chap. xviii. he urges the double duty of honoring God, and loving our neighbor, and reminds his hearers of their individual and personal responsibility. He insists upon the necessity of a new heart (xi. 19 sq., xxxvi. 25 sqq.). God's glory is the ultimate end of the restoration of Jerusalem (xxxvi. 22), and his aim not to destroy, but revive, his sinful people (xxxiii. 11). It is the prophet's peculiarity that his eye is directed not so much to the personal representatives as to the kingdom itself, where the glory of God should dwell in the midst of a holy nation of priests, serving him (xlii. 7). The description is given in the last eight chapters, and stands alone in the Old Testament. The vision here recorded of the temple is not of a mere building, although the architectural proportions given are exact. He passes beyond the material edifice to an ideal temple with its waters of life (xlvi.). In the furniture and services of this temple he presupposes the Mosaic legislation (xliv. 7 sq.). But it was not his purpose to revise it, or he would have made some reference to the ark of the covenant, the highpriesthood, the day of atonement, etc. As of special significance for the times, he mentions the Sabbath (xx. 12 sqq.), refers to a more joyful celebration of the feasts in the future (xlv. 9 sqq.), insists upon the purification of the temple (xliii. 7, xliv. 9), and bases the new division of the land on the equal rights of the tribes, all of which were to receive portions west of the Jordan.

The book has given difficulty to the Jews, because its statements do not always agree with the ritual of Moses; and this gave rise to some dispute regarding its canonical dignity. But this very fact is a pledge that not the letter of the law, but God's will, which was therein only expressed in a way adapted to the time, is eternal. The Christian Church has also found difficulty in distinguishing between that which was merely Jewish in the prophecies, and that which is Messianic. Less clearly than in the other prophets can the distinction be made out between the spiritual contents and the temporary form; but the book is, nevertheless, a prophecy of the new covenant of grace in the language of the old covenant of the law. The complete consummation of the kingdom of God on earth, however, alone can reveal how far the form in which Ezekiel clothes it was mere shadow, how far an adequate picture of that perfect manifestation. (For the influence of Ezekiel on the Apocalypse, see REVELATION.)

E'Z'ION-GA'BER, or GE'BER (giant's backbone), a city in the neighborhood of Elath, mentioned as the last station of Israel before entering the Wilderness of Zin (Num. xxxiii. 35; Deut. ii. 8), and as the navy station of Solomon (1 Kings ix. 26; 2 Chron. viii. 17) and Jehoshaphat (1 Kings xxii. 48); but its precise site has not been identified.

EZ'RA (help), priest, scribe (Neh. viii. 1, 2), and reformer of the period succeeding the Babylonian captivity. The book which bears his name, and the latter part of Nehemiah, are the only reliable sources of his life. He was of high priestly descent (Ez. vii. 1). With Artaxerxes' consent he led an expedition to Jerusalem (458 B.C.). He must have been held in esteem at court; for the king intrusted him with authority to appoint magistrates and judges, and with the power of life and death in Jerusalem (vii. 12-26). At the River Ahava (viii. 15) he gathered the members of the expedition together, and ordered a fast and prayer for divine protection. Arriving in Jerusalem, he delivered up the gifts the king had sent to the temple and his commissions to the Persian officials (viii. 36). He was grieved to find that his countrymen had intermarried with women of other nationalities, and succeeded in inducing them to put away their "strange wives." The narrative is here suddenly broken off, and Ezra does not re-appear again for thirteen years (Neh. viii.). The conjecture has been made, that he returned to Persia during the interval; but nothing certain is known. He performed priestly functions after his return. The time of his death is not noticed. Ezra marks an epoch in the study of the Mosaic law. He made that study the employment of his own life (vii. 10), and was thus led to become a scribe of the law (vii. 11). He had about him a corps of helpers (Neh. viii.), with whose aid he read the law in public, and expounded it. The pulpit first made its appearance in connection with him (Neh. viii. 4), and became the original of those synagogical desks from which Jewish rabbins in succeeding centuries read and interpreted the history and sacred writings of Israel. He was afterwards looked up to with reverence by the scribes as the founder of their order. According to Kuenen and others, Ezra was the author of a large share of the Pentateuch, — the so-called priestly Torah. According to the somewhat modified view of Professor W. R. Smith (The O. T. in the Jewish Church, chap. ix), he at least "gave the last touches to the ritual" of the Pentateuch, which he calls the "Canon of Ezra." (See PENTATEUCH.) Tradition, which is rich in details of Ezra's life, once says that he restored the entire Pentateuch (which had been lost), either from memory, or by special inspiration. In another place it describes him as the president of the great synagogue, and the collector and editor of the canon. The latter is made very probable when we remember the intense interest he had aroused in the law. In this interest a desire to have the writings of the historians and prophets would certainly be begotten. According to Josephus (Ant., XI. 5, 5), he died and was buried in Jerusalem. According to other writers, he died on a journey to the king of Persia, in the hundred and twentieth year of his age; and Benjamin of Tudela mentions that his tomb was shown on the banks of the Tigris.

EZRA, Book of (a chronicle of events occurring between 536 and 456 B.C.), consists of parts, the first of which extends through chap. vi. Between these two sections lies an interval of fifty-eight years. The first section (i.-vi.) gives an account of a decree for the reconstruction of the temple, and its achievement by Zerubbabel. Chap. i. gives the decree of Cyrus, and relates the return to Jerusalem. Chap. ii. enumerates those who returned. Chap. iii. describes the arrangements for work upon the temple, and the laying of the corner-stone, amidst the mingled weeping and rejoicing of the spectators. Chaps. iv. and v. give an account of the efforts, on the part of adversaries who had been refused the privilege of participating in the work, to check its progress, and their subsequent success in securing a royal decree to that effect. But work is again resumed by order of Darius, and the temple completed (vi.). The second section (vii.-x.) has Ezra for its chief actor. Artaxerxes grants him permission to lead a company of the exiles to Jerusalem, and confers upon him considerable authority (vii.). The members of the expedition are mentioned, and their halt at the River Ahava, and arrival in Jerusalem, described (viii.). Ezra laments the domestic condition of his people (ix.), and rids Jewish homes of their "strange wives" (x.).

The authenticity of the history recorded in the Book of Ezra is generally conceded. The facts are such as might be expected, and there is no reference to the miraculous to arouse suspicion. The main questions are the authorship, and the relation of the Book to Nehemiah. The Jewish Church, and the church fathers, regarded Ezra and Nehemiah as a single work. They are followed in this view by many modern scholars (Ewald, Bertheau, Dillmann, Davidson, etc.), who hold, that, with the two Books of Chronicles, they formed parts of one great work. But the LXX. and the Vulgate separate them into two books. This division (defended by Keil, Schultz in Lange's Commentary, Rawlinson in the Speaker's Commentary, etc.) has in its favor the opening words of Nehemiah: "The words of Nehemiah," etc. Their union in the Hebrew canon may be explained by the fact that they are chronicles of one and the same general period of restoration.

The Authorship. — It is not disputed that Ezra wrote chaps. vii. 27-ix. He here speaks in the first person. The preceding portion of the book and chap. x. have been attributed to other authors. The reasons urged are the laudatory reference to Ezra in chap. vii. 6, and the use of the third person instead of the first (vii. 6, 11, x. 1). But examples of such transitions are found both in other portions of Scripture (comp. Isa. vii. 1-16 with viii. 1, etc., also Dan. vi. 4 with vii. 2) and in profane writers (e.g., Thucydides, comp. Hist., I. 1 with I. 20-22, etc.); and the notice of vii. 6 is not so laudatory but that a modest man might have written it. The second objection would be equally valid were Ezra only the general editor, which it is generally acknowledged he was. The reasons are not sufficient to overthrow the traditional view, which is defended by Keil (Einleitung), Lange, Rawlinson (Speaker's Commentary), — that Ezra was the author of the whole work. The text of Ezra is in a bad condition, and many variant readings exist. Portions of the work are in Chaldee (iv. 8-vi. 18, and the decree of Artaxerxes, vii. 12-26). The language bears a close resemblance to that of the Chronicles and Daniel.

FABER, Basilius, b. at Sorau, in Nether-Lusatia, 1520; d. at Erfurt, 1575 or 1576; studied at Wittenberg; was a teacher in Nordhausen, Tennstädt, and Magdeburg, and became rector of the school of Quedlinburg in 1560; but, being a strict Lutheran of the Flacian wing, he refused to sign the Corpus Doctrinæ Philippicum as a crypto-Calvinistic innovation, and was discharged in 1570. Next year, however, he was made rector of the gymnasium of Erfurt, where he remained till his death. Besides some writings of pedagogical interest, — Thesaurus eruditionis scholasticæ (1571) and Libellus de disciplina scholastica (1572), — he translated Luther's commentary on Genesis into German (1557), was a contributor to the Magdeburg Centuries (1557-60), and published some eschatological tracts.

WAGENMANN.

FABER, or FABRI, Felix, b. at Zürich, 1441 or 1442; d. at Ulm, March 14 or May 15, 1502; studied theology at Basel; entered the Dominican order in 1472, and was made lector and preacher at the cloister of Ulm in 1478. Twice he visited the Holy Land (1480 and 1483-84); and his principal work is Evagatorium in Terræ Sanctæ, Arabia et Ægypti peregrinationem, edited by Hassler, Stuttgart, 1843-49, 3 vols. He also wrote a Historia Suevorum, edited by Goldast, Francfort, 1605, Ulm, 1727. He was bright, and a good observer, but very credulous, and too fond of curiosities. His Latin is of an exceptionally "canine" description.

WAGENMANN.

FABER, Frederick William, a Catholic theologian, and distinguished hymn-writer, of Huguenot ancestry; b. June 28, 1814, at the vicarage of Calverley, Eng., of which his grandfather, Thomas Faber, was the incumbent; d. Sept. 26, 1863. He studied at Balliol College, Oxford, and became while there an ardent admirer of John Henry Newman. He was made fellow of University College in 1837, and ordained priest 1839. Much of the next four years he spent in travelling with a pupil on the Continent, during which a great change took place in his feelings toward the Roman-Catholic Church; so that, after being for two years rector of Elton, he passed over (Nov. 17, 1845) to that church. After a visit to Rome, he founded a religious society at Birmingham. In 1849 he was placed at the head of the Oratory of St. Philip Neri, in London, where he remained till his death. Father Faber's title to permanent fame will rest upon his hymns, several of which have already taken their place among our classics. They are marked by fervor of piety, and grace of language. The most beautiful, perhaps, are, "O gift of gifts, O grace of faith," taken from a larger poem, "Conversion," and "Workman of God, O lose not heart," from the poem, "The Right must win," and "Paradise, O Paradise." He was a prolific author of religious works: among them are Essay on Beatification and Canonization (1848), The Spirit and Genius of St. Philip Neri (1850), The Blessed Sacrament (1856), etc. In 1848 he published a small collection of hymns. It was enlarged in 1849 and 1852. The final edition of the author appeared in 1861, containing a hundred and fifty hymns.

FABER, George Stanley, D.D., an English divine, and uncle of the former; b. Oct. 25, 1773; d. Jan. 27, 1854. He was educated at Oxford, and became fellow and tutor of Lincoln College. In 1801 he delivered the Bampton Lectures, which appeared under the title of Horæ Mosaicæ. In 1803 he left the university, and was vicar at various places, till he was made prebendary of Salisbury Cathedral (1831), and master of Sherburn Hospital (1832). He was a man of varied erudition, and a voluminous author of theological works; among these the principal are, The Origin of Pagan Idolatry, 3 vols. (1816), Difficulties of Romanism (1826), Sacred Calendar of Prophecy, 3 vols. (1828), and Papal Infallibility (1851).

FABER, Johannes, is the name of several Roman-Catholic theologians of the sixteenth century, whose persons and writings are often confounded. — I. Johannes Faber of Leutkirch (called Malleus Hæreticorum, from the book named below), b. at Leutkirch, in Suabia, 1478; d. in Vienna, May 21, 1541; studied theology and canon law at Tübingen and Freiburg-im-Breisgau; and was minister, first of Lindau, then of Leutkirch; vicar-general of the diocese of Constance (1518); chaplain and confessor to King Ferdinand (1524); and Bishop of Vienna (1531). He belonged originally to the humanistic and liberal party, and maintained friendly relations to Erasmus, Ecclampadius, Zwingli, and Melancthon. In 1520 he corresponded with Zwingli in a cordial and familiar manner; in 1521 he openly disapproved of Eck and his manœuvres; but in the same year he made a journey to Rome in order to straighten some difficult money matters, and he returned as one of the busiest and most violent adversaries of the Reformation and the Reformers. He wrote against Luther Opus adversus nova quedam dogmata Lutheri (Malleus in hæresin Lutheranam), and, in defence of celibacy and the papal authority, Pro celibatu and De potestate papæ contra Lutherum. He fought on the Roman side in the conferences and disputations; and he was active in burning people in Austria and Hungary (Kaspar Tauber and Balthasar Hubmeier). Of his works there is a collected edition in 3 vols. fol., Cologne, 1537-41, and a minor collection containing only his polemical writings, Leipzig, 1537. See C. E. KETTNER: De J. Fabri vita scriptisque, Leipzig, 1737. — II. Johannes Faber Augustanus, d. about 1530; was b. at Freiburg, in the latter half of the fifteenth century; entered the Dominican order, and was made prior of the monastery of Augsburg in 1515, professor of theology at Bologna in 1516, confessor to the Emperor Maximilian I., and afterwards court-preacher to Charles V. He was a friend of Erasmus, and in favor of lenient proceedings against Luther; but he afterwards changed his mind, and became a harsh adversary of the Reformation. His funeral-oration over Maximilian I. (Jan. 16, 1519) is the only work he has left. — III. Johannes Faber of Heilbronn was b. at Heilbronn, on the Neckar, 1504; studied theology and philosophy at Cologne; entered the Dominican order, and was made preacher at the cathedral of Augsburg, 1536. The date of his death is unknown. He was a bitter adversary of the Reformation, and wrote Quod fides esse possit sine caritate (1548), Enchiridion bibliorum (1549), Fructus quibus dignoscuntur heretici (1551), etc. WAGENMANN.

FABER, or FAVRE, Pierre François, b. at St. Barthelemi, in the canton of Vaud; was minister of Laudun, in Lower Languedoc; accompanied Francis de la Baune, Bishop of Halicarnassus, on his tour of visitation to Cochinchina, as his secretary and confessor; and published in 1746 his Lettres élogieuses et curieuses sur la visite apostolique de M. de la Baune à la Cochinchine en 1740, which gives a report of the abominable manner in which the Jesuits pushed the mission in those regions, and the infamous intrigues with which they tried to cover up their misdemeanors. The book was condemned by the Bishop of Lausanne, and publicly burnt at Freiburg; and the Jesuits bought up every copy they could reach. Large extracts of the work are found in SIMLER, Urkunden zur Beleuchtung der Kirchengeschichte, I., pp. 159–256. STEITZ.

FABER STAPULENSIS, Jacobus (Jacques Lefèvre d'Étaples), b. at Etaples, a village in Picardy, 1450; d. at Nérac, 1536; studied in Paris; visited Florence, Rome, and Venice; and began, after his return to Paris, to lecture on Aristotle, and to publish Latin translations, and paraphrases of the Aristotelian writings. From 1507 to 1520 he lived in the Benedictine abbey of St. Germain des Prés, near Paris, where his friend Briçonnet was abbot; and while here he began to study the Bible. The first result of this study was his Psalterium quintuplex, 1508; then followed, in 1512, his commentary on the Pauline Epistles, in 1522, on the Gospels, and in 1525, on the Catholic Epistles. A critical essay (De Maria Magdalena) which he published in 1517 gave the authorities occasion for an accusation of heresy; and Noël Bédier, syndic of the theological faculty of Paris, had the book formally condemned by a decree of Parliament, Nov. 9, 1521. Bédier, who suspected a secret Lutheran in Faber, wanted to institute further proceedings against him, but was prevented by the interference of Francis I. and Marguerite of Navarre in his behalf. In 1523 Briçonnet, who in the mean time had become Bishop of Meaux, made him his vicar-general; and in the same year he published his French translation of the New Testament, which spread rapidly, not only in his own diocese, but all over France, and produced a deep impression. But after the battle of Pavia (Feb. 25, 1525), and the imprisonment of Francis I. in Madrid, the Parliament and the Sorbonne felt free to employ more vigorous measures against the reformatory movement. Several of the clergymen appointed by Briçonnet were accused of heresy: some of them recanted. Pauvant was burnt: Faber fled to Strassburg. After the release of Francis I., he was recalled, and made librarian in the royal castle of Blois: but even there he was not safe; and, after publishing his translation of the Old Testament, he retired to Nérac, the residence of Marguerite of Navarre, where he died. He had, indeed, espoused all the chief principles of the Reformation, and he applied them with vigor in his writings; but he remained in the Roman Church, hoping that a reformation could take place without any violent concussion. For open fight with hostile powers he was completely unfit. He was not unlike Melancthon, but he had no Luther by his side.

FABIAN, the nineteenth bishop of Rome (236–250), was, according to Eusebius (Hist. Eccl., VI. 29), incidentally present at the election after the death of Anteros, and was unanimously chosen, because a dove came down from heaven and rested on his head. Of his reign nothing is known with certainty. In Cyprian's Letters to his successor, Cornelius, he is often mentioned with respect.

FABRICA ECCLESIAE, a technical term referring to the provision made for the maintenance of the fabric of the church, — its buildings, furniture, utensils, etc. In the latter part of the fifth century, Simplicius, and after him Gelasius, ordered that one-fourth of the whole revenue of a church should be put aside for this purpose, and afterwards the matter became the subject of a very varied and intricate, but wholly local, legislation. Thus, in the grand duchy of Baden, it is the rule that the nave and roof are kept in repair by the treasury of the church, the choir by the minister, the walls and outer buildings by him who enjoys the tenths, and the tower by the parish.

FABRICIUS, Johann, b. at Altorf, Feb. 11, 1644; d. at Helmstädt, Jan. 29, 1729; studied at Altorf and Helmstädt; travelled in Germany and Italy, 1670–77; and was appointed professor of theology at Altorf, 1677, and at Helmstädt, 1697. His principal work, besides his Amenitates Theologicae (1699) and Historia Bibliothecae Fabricianae (4 vols. 4to, 1717–24), is his Consideratio variarum controversiarum (1704), in which he pursued the irenic principles of Calixtus, but carried them unto weakness. In the same year a Gutachten was published, in which he most decidedly recommended the Princess Elizabeth Christine of Brunswick to embrace Romanism in order to get married to Charles of Spain, afterwards the Emperor Charles VI.; but this Gutachten caused such a scandal, especially in England, that he was discharged from the university. See W. Höck, Anton Ulrich und Elisabeth Christine, Wolfenbüttel, 1845.

FABRICIUS, Johannes Albert, b. at Leipzig, Nov. 11, 1668; d. at Hamburg, April 3, 1736; studied theology at Quedlinburg, and was made professor of rhetoric and moral philosophy at Hamburg in 1698. He was a very prolific writer, especially on literary history and bibliography, in which branches his principal works are: Bibliotheca Græca (14 vols. 4to, Hamburg, 1705–28, reedited by Harless, 1790-1809); Bibliotheca Latina (3 vols, 1697), new edition, 1721, 1722, continued by the Bibliotheca Latina, mediæ et infimæ ætatis (5 vols., Hamburg, 1734-36); and the Bibliotheca Ecclesiastica (1718). More special theological interest have his Codex Apocryphus N.T. (1703, 2 vols.) and Codex Pseudepigraphus V.T. (1713), which have not been made entirely superfluous by the labors of Thilo, Tischendorf, Volkmar, and Hilgenfeld. He also wrote a Hydrotheologie (1730) and a Pyrotheologie (1732), which now strike the reader as very curious, but suited the taste of his time, and were translated into other languages.

FACULTY usually means some power, inborn or cultivated, and, in the special sense, a body of men to whom is given the right to teach a particular science (thus we have the faculties of theology, law, medicine, and philosophy); but it is also a technical term of canon law denoting the transference of a certain power of ecclesiastical jurisdiction from the original holder to a subordinate officer for the purpose of speedier execution. The earliest cases in which such faculties were granted occurred in the middle ages, when the Pope transferred a certain measure of his power to the missionary on account of his necessary independence of papal oversight through his distance from Rome. Later on, in the sixteenth century, similar faculties were granted to the papal nuncios as a means of insuring a prompter enforcement of the canons of the Council of Trent, and of giving strength and energy to the Roman-Catholic mission in Protestant Germany. As, under these circumstances, conflicts would now and then arise between the papal nuncios and the bishops, the latter generally received the same faculties, though only for a certain length of time; as, for instance, five years (facultates quinquennales). Bishops may also grant faculties, transferring to their vicars-general, officials, deacons, or priests, some measure either of their own authority (auctoritas ordinaria or propria), or of that granted to them by the Pope (auctoritas apostolica). See PAPAL NUNCIOS. MEJER.

The word is used in England in the sense of a special dispensation to do what by law could not be done. Under the Archbishop of Canterbury there is a special court, called the "Court of Faculties," presided over by the "Master of Faculties," which has the power to grant these dispensations; usually for such purposes as marriages without previous asking of the banns, ordinations of deacons under age, the succession to a benefice on the part of the clergyman's son, etc. In this court are also registered the certificates of bishops and noblemen granted to their chaplains to qualify them for pluralities and non-residence.

FACUNDUS, Bishop of Hermiane, in the North-African province of Byzacena, was one of the bishops whom Justinian, in 544, summoned to Constantinople in order to get the Three Chapters condemned, and an agreement established with the Western Church. The emperor failed in his purpose. Facundus wrote his twelve books (Pro defensione trium capitulorum); and, when the African bishop broke off communion with the Roman bishop Vigilius, he wrote Contra Mosianum scholasticum in defence of their action. Of his later life nothing is known. His work, which was first edited by Sirmond, then in Gallandi (Bibl. Max., XII. 1-124) and Migne (Patrol. Lat., LXVII. 762), has more interest from an ecclesiastico-political than from a dogmatic point of view. He wrote not so much in order to justify Theodore and Theodoret, as in order to restrain the emperor from interfering in the affairs of the Church. C. HAGENBACH.

FACIUS, Paul (Büchlin), b. at Rheinzabern, in the Palatinate, 1504; d. at Cambridge, Nov. 13, 1549; studied at Heidelberg and Strassburg, especially Hebrew, under W. Capito, and afterwards under the celebrated Elias Levita; and was appointed rector of the school at Isny in 1537, and professor of theology, and preacher in Strassburg, 1543. But, when the Interim was introduced in Strassburg, he emigrated to England, where he was well received, and made professor in Hebrew at Cambridge in 1549. Most of his writings (Sententiæ sapientium Hebræorum, 1541; Annotationes in Targum, 1546; Isagoge in linguam Hebræicam, 1544, etc.) refer to his Hebrew studies; and as a teacher of Hebrew he exercised considerable influence in that direction of mediation which characterized the school of Strassburg. Under the reign of Mary his bones were dug up and burnt. His Life, in Latin, is found in PANTALEON, Prosographia, Basel, 1565. WAGENMANN.

FACNANI, Prosper, b. 1598; d. in Rome, 1678; practised as an advocate with great success in Rome; was for fifteen years secretary to the Congregatio Conc. Trid. Interpret., and afterwards professor in canon law at the academy of Rome. On the instance of Alexander VII. he wrote a commentary on the decretals, 1661, which has been often republished, and is frequently appealed to by the canonists. He was blind from his forty-fourth year.

FAIRBAIRN, Patrick, b. at Greenlaw, Berwickshire, Scotland, January, 1805; d. at Glasgow, Aug. 6, 1874. He was graduated at the University of Edinburgh, and after many years' pastoral experience was professor at Aberdeen, and, from 1856 to his death, principal, and professor of systematic theology and New-Testament exegesis, in the Free Church Theological College at Glasgow. Principal Fairbairn was one of the founders of the Free Church. His scholarship was respectable, and his books, especially the Typology, are useful. In person he was of commanding figure. His principal works, which are published in Edinburgh, are, The Typology of Scripture, 1847, 2 vols., 6th ed., 1880; Ezekiel and his Book of Prophecy, 1851, 4th ed., 1876; Prophecy viewed in its Distinctive Nature, its Special Functions, and its Proper Interpretation, 1856, 2d ed., 1866; Hermeneutical Manual, 1858; Revelation of Law in Scripture, 1868; The Pastoral Epistles, 1874; Pastoral Theology, with a Biographical Sketch of the Author, 1875. He also edited The Imperial Bible Dictionary, London, 1867, 2 vols. royal 8vo, and translated, in part, Schröder's Commentary upon Ezekiel, in the American edition by Lange, N.Y., 1876.

FAITH (πίστις). All personal relations in human life rest on faith. I can respect no one, unless I believe him possessed of some excellences of nature and character: I can love no one, unless I believe him possessed of some affinity to me,—naturally in the blood, or spiritually in the mind. In human life, faith is the connecting link between man and man. Thereby it becomes the latent source from which all individual development springs, mental and spiritual. Man was made for faith, and it is faith that makes the man. He who has lost his power of faith, his faculty of belief, is dead. But in no relation is this more true than in man's relation to God.

With respect to its form, faith is not a simple opinion formed by the intellect, and differing from cognition only by the subjective character of its evidences. The Church distinguishes between a fides historica ("historic faith") and a fides salvifica ("saving faith"). The latter is a movement of the heart, of all the fundamental powers of the soul, of the very roots of the personality; and hence it is propagated to all the branches: it involves knowledge, it stirs up the feelings, it acts upon the will. Knowledge, assent, and trust are all demanded in faith according to the doctrine of the Evangelical Church. None of them can be entirely missing; but their measure may be very different, according to the different stand-point of the individual.

The object of faith cannot be seen by the eyes, nor can it be grasped by the understanding: it belongs to the realm of the invisible, the spiritual, the divine (Heb. xi. 1, 6; 1 Pet. i. 8; 2 Cor. v. 16; John xx. 29). But this invisible, spiritual, divine, is not something unknowable: it proves itself to the inner man. The absolute object of faith is the revelation of God to mankind, originating in his love, and making his holiness manifest; and the centre of this revelation, the true fulfilment in relation to which all preceding preparations are only accommodations to the susceptibility of the race (Luke xxiv. 25, 26; Heb. i.), is the incarnation of God in Christ. Faith, in the absolute sense of the word, is therefore a personal and spiritual union with Christ, through which we become one with him, as he is one with the Father.

This union with Christ man cannot accomplish by his own efforts: God himself must awaken the new life in his soul (John vi. 29; 1 Cor. ii. 5). It is the Holy Spirit who works the faith in the heart; and the means by which he does this is the preaching of the word of God, the preaching of the grace of Christ (Rom. x. 17; 1 Cor. i. 21). But the soul can prepare itself for the coming of the new life by abandoning all confidence in itself and in the world, and by breaking all the selfish instincts under which it labors; and when, by repentance, it has made itself a fit receptacle for the work of the Holy Spirit, that movement of the heart will follow which is the faith,—the faith by which sins are forgiven (Acts xxvi. 18), and man is made just before God (Rom. iii. 26; v. 1; Gal. iii. 24).

The Roman-Catholic Church, proceeding from James, teaches that justification is by faith and works. But though it defines faith as meaning belief, not simply as an opinion, but as a conviction that "those things are true which God has revealed and promised, and this especially, that God justifies the impious by his grace through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus" (Conc. Trid., sess. VI. c. 6), it nevertheless confines faith to the sphere of the intellect, and only expects an influence from thence upon the feelings and the will. In its further development in the Roman-Catholic Church, this doctrine led to a direct deterioration of the idea of faith. From a living agency in the human soul, faith became a merely passive obedience to the authority of the Church; and such an emphasis was laid upon the merits of works, that morality itself was corrupted. This aberration has been happily corrected by the Reformed churches. Proceeding from Paul, they teach that justification is by faith alone; but faith they define, not as a merely intellectual process of acceptance, but as the true, vitalizing point of the whole life of the soul. FAITH, Rule of. See REGULA FIDEI.

FAKIR (Arabic poor man), a class of Hindoo religious mendicants, numbering now perhaps two millions, and found in India from very early times. They are noted for their self-inflicted tortures, by which they excite pity, and obtain the reputation of "saints;" so that, although the people have little respect for them, they dread their curses, and the very rajah will rise up on his elephant to salute them. The British Government has greatly curtailed their liberty to injure themselves, and forbidden their going around perfectly nude. It is questioned whether there is any religious sentiment in their performances. According to the oft-quoted summary of Hassan al-Bassri, a fakir is like a dog in ten things: (1) he is always hungry; (2) he has no sure abiding-place; (3) he watches by night; (4) he never abandons his master, even when maltreated; (5) he is satisfied with the lowest place; (6) he yields his place to whoever wishes it; (7) he loves whoever beats him; (8) keeps quiet while others eat; (9) accompanies his master without ever thinking of returning to the place he has left; (10) and leaves no heritage after death. Fakirs go either singly or in companies. They were formerly a dangerous element in Hindoo life, for their fanaticism nerved them for deeds of great cruelty.

FALASHAS (exiles), a people in Abyssinia, who are either Jews, or, more probably, descendants of proselytes to Judaism, and whose belief and practice is a mixture of Judaism and Paganism. There is no authentic information when they came into the country. They pretend to belong to the tribe of Levi, but their appearance is not Jewish. That they were early converted to Judaism is manifest from their ignorance of both the Babylonian and Jerusalem Talmud, of the fringed praying-scarf (taletth), of phylacteries, and of the Feasts of Purim and Dedication. They are also entirely ignorant of Hebrew; yet they possess in Geez the canonical and apocryphal books of the Old Testament; a volume of extracts from the Pentateuch, with comments given to Moses by the Lord, upon Mount Sinai; The Laws of the Sabbath; the Ardit, a book of secrets revealed to twelve saints, which is used as a charm against disease; lives of Abraham, Moses, etc.; and a translation of Josephus, called Sana Aihud. They practise circumcision; fast every Monday and Thursday, every new moon, and on the Passover; keep the Sabbath with such strictness that they will not even put on their clothes upon it; and observe the Feasts of the Passover, the Ingathering, Tabernacles (although they do not build booths), the Day of Assembly, and Abraham's Day. But joined to these Jewish rites are Pagan ones, such as the shedding of the blood of a sheep or a fowl in a new house in order to render it inhabitable, the use of fire in purification of unchastity, and the worship of the goddess Sanbat, really the Sabbath personified. Monasticism exists among them: but the priests are free to marry once; if their wives die, they are prohibited, like the Greek priest, from a second union. Education, which is imparted only to boys, is in the priests' hands. No one can be a priest, who himself, or whose father or grandfather, has eaten bread with a Christian. The Falashas are superstitious, and believers in magic. They offer sacrifices for the dead on the third day, up to which time they believe these souls dwell in a place of darkness; but every morning for seven days they formally lament them. Prayers for the dead are offered in the synagogues.

The Falashas are industrious and peaceable, dwell in villages of their own, for the most part, which it is said can be easily recognized by the red clay pots on the tops of their synagogues. Their exact number is unknown, — perhaps about a hundred and fifty thousand. See FLAD: Falashas of Abyssinia (trans. from the German), London, 1869; J. HALÉVY: Travels in Abyssinia (trans. from the French), London, 1878.

FALK LAWS, The (also called the "May Laws"), is the name generally applied to a series of laws carried through the Prussian diet, in the period between 1872 and 1875, by Dr. Falk, at that time Minister of Cultus and Public Instruction and Sanitary Affairs in Prussia. In March, 1872, the first of these laws was passed, transferring the superintendence of the primary schools from the Church to the State, by ordering that the school-inspector should be a layman. In June followed a ministerial order, prohibiting the members of religious orders to teach in the schools, and thereby still further limiting the influence of the Roman-Catholic clergy on the school. Next, the laws of November, 1872, and March, 1873, materially narrowed the bishop's power over the inferior clergy, and the clergy's power over the laity, whereby the whole ecclesiastical law of the country was radically changed; and at the same time a royal ecclesiastical court was established, enabling the government to deal in an effective manner with refractory bishops. A law of March, 1874, made civil marriage obligatory; and another, of April, 1875; required the bishop and clergy to sign a declaration of obedience to the laws of the State, before entering upon office. At the same time laws were passed forbidding the religious orders living within the borders of the Prussian dominion to receive new members, and transferring the control of the church property of a parish to a board of trustees of laymen.

In the so-called Kulturkampf those laws played a most prominent part; that is, in the contest between the feeling of national independence so deeply roused in Germany by the Franco-Prussian war, and the ambitious aspirations of the Roman curia, so strongly pronounced by the council of the Vatican and the promulgation of the dogma of papal infallibility. They originated, as simple acts of self-defence, from the side of the State; and it was repeatedly declared, both by Dr. Falk and Prince Bismarck, that, within the State, every confession (church) should have freedom to move and develop, but none the opportunity of crippling the actions of the State, or using the secular power for particular denominational purposes, or of eluding its civil duties, under pretence of some religious prescript. "We will never go to Canossa" (Nach Canossa gehen wir nicht) said the chancellor, May 14, 1872. The Ultramontane party, however, among the Roman-Catholic clergy in Germany, was very far from viewing the Falk Laws as merely defensive measures. On the contrary, it considered them as evidences and means of an intolerable tyranny; and encouraged by the Pope, whose encyclical of 1874 declared the laws null and void, the party adopted a policy of bitter and unflinching opposition. Several bishops were banished from their sees; and other sees, which became vacant by death, remained vacant. A turn, however, took place in the course of affairs when Pius IX. died, in 1878. Prince Bismarck had observed more than once during the contest, that, as the so-called May Laws were merely defensive measures, it would be possible to abandon them, or at least to modify them, when once again there reigned a "peaceable pope" in Rome; and, indeed, immediately after the accession of Leo XIII., negotiations concerning a modus vivendi between Germany and the Pope were begun, and seem, on account of reciprocal concessions, likely to succeed. See LUDWIG HAHN: Geschichte des Kulturkampfes, Berlin, 1881; and the addresses by LEOPOLD WITTE and AUGUST DORNER, in Evangelical Alliance Conference, 1873, New York, 1874.

FAMILIAR SPIRITS (from the Latin familiaris, "a household servant") were the spirits supposed to be at the service of the necromancers, by which they divined, and wrought their spells (Lev. xx. 27; Deut. xviii. 11; 1 Sam. xxviii. 7, 8, and many other places).

FAMILIARES is the name of certain lay members of monasteries, such as servants, mechanics, etc., generally admitted as members of the community through certain religious rites. As in the middle ages they often proved the very channels through which worldly tendencies were introduced into the monasteries, several popes insisted upon their complete separation from the monks and the monastic community.

FAMILIARS OF THE INQUISITION, the officers who arrested suspected persons. Their name came from the circumstance that they formed part of the inquisitor's family. They were often men of rank; and peculiar spiritual privileges, such as indulgences, were attached to the position.

FAMILISTS, Familia Charitatis, Huis de Liefde, a sect founded by a certain Henry Nicholas, a native of Münster, who, after living for some time in Holland, came to England under the reign of Edward VI. His efforts to make proselytes seem at first to have succeeded quite well: even theologians were found willing to listen to his ideas. But in 1580 Elizabeth ordered an investigation, and after that time very severe measures were taken against the sect, which disappeared during the reign of James I. The ideas of Henry Nicholas are often identified with those of David Joris, with whom he lived in close personal connection, as his followers were often confounded with the Anabaptists, though they acknowledged the baptism of infants, and showed no antagonism to the rituals of the churches. The predominant trait of the sect was its mysticism, which gave rise to very peculiar doctrines of Moses as the prophet of hope, Christ as the prophet of faith, and Henry Nicholas as the prophet of love, etc. In 1575 they published a confession of faith, in which they endeavored to prove themselves in harmony with the Reformed Churches. See JOHN ROGERS: The Displaying of a horrible Sect naming themselves the Family of Love, London, 1579; and KNEWSTUB: Confutation of the heresies of Henry Nicholas, London, 1579. J. KÖSTLIN.

FANATICISM (from Latin fanum, "temple"). The term "fanatici" was originally applied to all priests who pretended to receive divine revelations, and announced oracles, but more especially to the priests of Cybele and Bellana, who were noted for their wild enthusiasm. In the writings of the satirists, Horace, Juvenal, etc., the word gradually changed its sense, and came to imply something of a fraudulent inspiration, consisting of hollow excitement and empty visions. In this sense it was still used in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, when applied, for instance, to Cromwell, Mohammed, the prophets of the Church of the Desert, etc. At present the term "fanaticism" denotes a state of the mind in which enthusiasm for an idea has been transformed into mere hatred of its opposite.

FAREL, Guillaume, b. at Gap, in Dauphiny, 1489; d. at Neufchatel, Sept. 13, 1565; studied in Paris, and was appointed professor in the college of Cardinal le Moine on the recommendation of Lefèvre d'Étaples (Faber Stapulensis). His reformatory activity he began in the diocese of Meaux, under the auspices of Guillaume Briçonnet; but in 1523 he was compelled to fly by the beginning persecutions. He went to Basel, where he was cordially received by Œcolampadius; but his disputations, lectures, and preachings in that city, came to a sudden end in 1524: he was expelled, probably, on the instance of Erasmus. After a short stay in Strassburg and Mompelgardt, he returned to Switzerland in 1525, and began to preach the Reformation in various places belonging under the authority of Berne, — Aigle, Morat, Grandson, Biel, etc., — often with danger of life, but generally, also, with eminent success. After a visit to the Waldenses, he came in 1532 to Geneva; and the first establishment of the Reformation in that city is his work. In spite of a bitter and protracted opposition, the religious edict of Aug. 27, 1535, was issued; and it was followed by the confession of Geneva (written by Farel) and the settlement of Calvin in the city. By the victory of a short-lived re-action both Farel and Calvin were expelled in 1538. Farel went to Neufchatel, and thence to Metz; and in the latter city, as well as in the neighboring Gorze, he labored with great success for the establishment of the Reformation. But at Gorze the Evangelicals were surrounded in 1543 by the troops of the Cardinal of Lorraine; and a great number of them were massacred. Farel fled in disguise, visited Mompelgardt and his native town, Gap, and continued to labor for the Reformation, preaching and writing to the very day of his death. As a theologian he does not occupy a place in the foremost rank; but practically he was one of the boldest, as he was one of the first, of the French reformers. Among his most noticeable works are: Sommaire, 1534, new edition, with an introduction by I. G. Baum, Geneva, 1867; Du vrai usage de la croix de Jésus Christ, 1540, new edition in Librairie de la Suisse romande, Paris, 1865; Traité de purgatoire, 1543; La glaive de la parole véritable, 1550; Traité de la Cène, 1555, etc. There is no collected edition of his works.

LIT. — His biography was first written anonymously (probably by Olivier Perrot; compare HALLER, Biblioth. d. Schweizergesch., III. No. 781), then by ANCILLON, Amsterdam, 1691 (French); KIRCHHOFER, Zürich, 2 vols., 1831-33 (German); SCHMIDT, Elberfeld, 1860 (German); JUNON, Paris, 1865 (French); and GOGUEL, Neufchatel, 1873 (French). FARFA, one of the most famous monasteries of Italy in the middle ages; situated on the Farfa, in Central Italy; was twice destroyed, — in the seventh century by the Lombards, and in the tenth by the Saracens, — but both times rebuilt. Shortly after its second rebuilding it became very notorious on account of the licentiousness and dissipation of its monks. In the eleventh century, however, order was thoroughly re-established, and to that time belongs the celebrated Chronicon Farfense, by the Abbot Gregory (d. 1100), edited by Muratori: Script. Rer. Ital., T. II. p. ii.

FARINDON, Anthony, b. at Sunning, Berkshire, 1596; d. in London, September, 1658. He was educated at Oxford; suffered much as a royalist during the civil war, until he came under the patronage of Sir John Robinson, an alderman of London, who secured for him the pastorship of St. Mary Magdalen's, London, in which position he died. Competent judges have pronounced him the best preacher in the Church of England of that age. He was the recognized preacher for preachers, and gave solid and edifying discourses. His Sermons appeared in 4 folio volumes, 1637-73; new ed., with Life, by F. Jackson, London, 1849, 4 vols.

FARMER, Hugh, a learned and able Dissenting minister; b. near Shrewsbury, Eng., 1714; d. at Walthamstow, in Essex, Feb. 6, 1787. He was pastor of Walthamstow for forty years. In 1761 he removed to London, to become afternoon preacher at Salter's Hall, and one of the Tuesday lecturers. His principal publications, which evince his independence and scholarship, and are still read, are: An Inquiry into the Nature and Design of Christ's Temptation in the Wilderness, Lond., 1761, 3d ed., 1776, new ed., 1822 (in which he contended that our Lord's temptation was subjective, a divine vision, and not real and objective); A Dissertation on Miracles, designed to show that they are Arguments of a Divine Interposition, and Absolute Proofs of the Mission and Doctrine of a Prophet, 1771, new ed., 1810; An Essay on the Demoniacs of the New Testament, 1775, 3d ed., 1818 (these were, he maintained, merely persons strongly affected by certain diseases. This work is a classic with those who hold this view); The General Prevalence of the Worship of Human Spirits in the Ancient and Heathen Nations asserted and proved, 1783. FARNOVIUS (Stanislaus Farnowski), one of the principal leaders of the Polish anti-trinitarians in the sixteenth century; studied in Heidelberg; became a disciple of Petrus Gonesius, and formed a Unitarian party, the Farnovians, which, however, amalgamated with the Socinians immediately after his death. See BOCK: Hist. Antitrinitariorum, Königsberg, 1774-84, 2 vols.

FASTIDIUS, a Christian writer of the fifth century, and one of the few literary representatives of the ancient Briton Church. What we know of his life we owe to a few critically uncertain notices in Gennadius (Catal. vir. ill., 56), which have given rise to many untenable and self-contradictory speculations. The only certain facts are, that he was a Briton by birth, and lived about 420. His book De vitu Christiana was originally printed anonymously among the works of Augustine, until Holstenius discovered the true author, and published the work separately, Rome, 1663. It shows a strong Pelagian tendency.

FASTING, among the Hebrews. Properly speaking, there was only one divinely-ordained public fast,—that of the Day of Atonement (cf. Lev. xvi. 29 sq., xxiii. 27 sq.; Num. xxix. 7). But it was quite in accordance with the will of God, and the spirit of the Old-Testament dispensation, that when great national calamities had overtaken Israel, or great national wants arose, or great national sins were to be confessed, a day of public fasting and humiliation should be proclaimed (cf. Judg. xx. 26; 1 Sam. vii. 6; 1 Kings xxi. 27; 2 Chron. xx. 3). During the Babylonish captivity the Jews observed four other fasts,—the fasts of the fourth, the fifth, the seventh, and the tenth months (Zech. vii. 1-7, viii. 19). "The fast of the fourth month" took place on the 17th of Thammuz (about June or July), in memory of the taking of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar, and the interruption of the daily sacrifice. According to tradition it was also the anniversary of making the golden calf, and of Moses breaking the tables of the law. "The fast of the fifth month," on the 9th of Ab, was kept in memory of the destruction of the first (and afterwards of the second) temple. "The fast of the seventh month," on the 2d of Tishri, commemorates the death of Gedaliah and his associates at Mizpah (Jer. xli. 2). "The fast of the tenth month" was on the 10th of Tebeth, when the siege of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar commenced.

To these fasts has been added that of Esther, kept on the 13th of Adar (Esth. iv. 16). Besides these six fasts, the Jewish calendar at present contains other twenty-two fast-days. But that is not all. It was customary to fast twice a week (Luke xviii. 12); viz., on Monday and Thursday, because, according to tradition, Moses went up Mount Sinai the second time to receive the tables of the law on a Thursday, and came down again on a Monday. Very minute directions concerning fasting are contained in the Talmudical treatise Taanith. The Essenes regularly fasted as a means of subduing the flesh, often eating nothing for three days in succession. The present Jews fast on the Day of Atonement, wearing a white shroud and cap: hence the fast is called "the white fast." On other days, mourning is worn: hence they are called "black fasts." FASTING, in the Christian Church. Fasting appears as an established practice already in the primitive church (Acts xiii. 2, xiv. 23, xxvii. 9; 2 Cor. vi. 5, etc.), derived partly from the discipline of the synagogue, partly from spontaneous inspiration. By the Montanists it was considerably furthered (Tertullian, De jejuni), and still more so by monasticism; but it developed differently in the different churches.

I. The Church of Rome.—The principal fast of the Roman Church is the so-called Quadragesimal Fast before Easter, which a later time has designated as an apostolic tradition relating to the precedence of Moses (Exod. xxxiv. 28), and to the circumstance of our Lord lying forty hours in the grave. Originally this fast lasted only forty hours, but it was gradually extended. In the fourth century it lasted three weeks in Rome, but six in Illyria, Achaia, Alexandria, etc.; and this latter term was finally adopted also by Rome. As, however, there was no fasting on Sundays, the six-weeks' fast comprised only thirty-six fast-days; and, in order to reach the symbolical number of forty, it became customary to begin the fast on the Wednesday (Ash-Wednesday) of the preceding week. An attempt was also made to introduce a quadragesimal fast before Christmas and the day of John the Baptist; but the practice never became firmly established. See II. Lienke, Die Quadragesimalfasten der Kirche, Munich, 1853.

Fasting on certain days of the week is also an old custom of the Roman Church. The Pharisees fasted twice a week,—on Thursday and Monday,—in commemoration of Moses ascending Mount Sinai, and again descending from it. The Christians adopted this practice, only the days and their signification were changed. Wednesday and Friday (feria quarta et sexta) were selected as the days on which our Lord was betrayed and crucified. These days were called dies stationum, the life of a Christian being compared to that of a soldier (Tertullian, De Oratione, XIV.). Wednesday, however, was afterwards dropped as a fast-day. The custom, prevalent among the Jews after the exile, of keeping a fast-day respectively in the fourth, fifth, seventh, and tenth months, in commemoration of the conquest of Jerusalem, the destruction of the temple, the murder of Gedaliah, and the beginning of the siege of Jerusalem, was also adopted by the Christians; but, in this case too, both the days and their designation were changed. The days were put down as days of general fasting and prayers, and arranged so that the year thereby became divided into four seasons (quatuor tempora): hence the name of Quatember-fast. (See EMBER-DAYS.) In former times these quarter-days were also days for the collection of taxes, and hence called angariae ("servitude"). The vigilia (which see) are also fast-days; and, besides these the ordinary fast-days, the Roman Church also appoints extraordinary fast-days on special occasions.

II. The Greek Church has on this field developed different practices in its different sections; but one characteristic mark is common to them all, — strictness in keeping the rules. The principal fasts are: 1. A quadragesimal fast before Easter, based on Matt. iv. 2; 2. A quadragesimal fast before Christmas (from Nov. 15 to Dec. 24), based on Exod. xxxiv. 28; 3. The Fast of Mary (from Aug. 1 to Aug. 15); 4. The Fast of the Apostles (from the day after Whitsuntide to June 29). The old dies stationum (both Wednesday and Friday) are still retained, except between Christmas and the Epiphany, during the third week after the Epiphany (in opposition to the Armenians), and in the weeks following Easter and Whitsuntide.

III. The Reformed Churches. — The reformers were by no means averse to fasts; but they returned to the original conception of them, as a means of self-discipline and a preparation for prayer. They rejected all compulsory regulations of the practice, and wholly discarded the idea of direct moral meritoriousness. To this purport Luther expresses himself in his commentary to Matt. vi. 16; and so does Calvin in his Institutiones, IV. 12, 14, 15: "Therefore let us say something of fasting, because many, for want of knowing its usefulness, undervalue its necessity, and some reject it as almost superfluous; while, on the other hand, where the use of it is not well understood, it easily degenerates into superstition. Holy and legitimate fasting is directed to three ends; for we practise it either as a restraint on the flesh, to preserve it from licentiousness, or as a preparation for prayers and pious meditations, or as a testimony of our humiliation in the presence of God when we are desirous of confessing our guilt before him." Accordingly we find ideas of this or a very similar character incorporated with all the confessional books of the Reformed Churches (Confessio Augustana, XXVI.; Conf. Helvetica Secund., XXIV.; Conf. Bohem., XVIII.; Conf. Gall., XXIV.; Westminster Confession, XXI. 5), and carried out practically in Switzerland, England, the United States, etc. [During the civil war (1861–65), the President appointed days of national fasting, which were generally observed irrespective of denominations.]

FATALISM (Latin fatum) denotes the doctrine of an irresistible necessity, differing, however, from the idea of nemesis by being the effect of an external, arbitrary power, rather than the result of an inherent, inevitable law. In its sterner form, presenting itself as an irrevocable decree, it bears some resemblance to the Christian idea of predestination, but has found its only full expression in the fanaticism of Mohammedanism. In its more frivolous form, looking like a mere haphazard, it crept stealthily about in the Greek philosophy, and shows itself sometimes, too, in modern pantheism and materialism.

FATHERS OF THE CHURCH. The term is applied to several classes of persons. — to the patriarchs, to the rabbins, to the founders of churches or denominations, to venerable men in churches or denominations, but chiefly to certain orthodox teachers in the early centuries of the Christian Church. While Protestants refuse to accept the authority of any writer out of the sacred canon as conclusive and final in matters of doctrine and discipline, the other branches of the Church catholic appeal to many authors who lived prior to the eighth century. For the Latin Church the line of the fathers closes with Gregory I. (d. 604); for the Greek Church, with John of Damascus (d. 754). The High-Church party of the Church of England place particular stress upon the orthodox writers prior to and of the Nicene period, and consider them especially worthy of attention as expositors of Scripture. The study of these early writers is called PATRISTICS; which see.

FAUCHET, Claude (commonly known as Abbé Fauchet), b. at Dornes, in the department of Nièvre, Sept. 22, 1744; guillotined in Paris, Oct. 31, 1793; entered the service of the church, and was rapidly promoted. He was grand vicar of the Archbishop of Bourges, preacher to the king, and Abbot of Montfort-Lacarre, in Brittany; but his Discours sur les mœurs rurales, delivered at the festival of La Rosière, at Surènes, in 1788, gave such offence on account of its open sympathy with the revolutionary ideas of the time, that he was deprived of his office as preacher to the king. When, shortly after, the revolution actually broke out, he took his place in the foremost rank of its champions. He was one of the leaders of the people in the attack on the Bastille (July 14, 1789), and in the next year he delivered in the rotunda of the corn-market an Éloge civique on Franklin, which appealed in the strongest manner to the revolutionary passions. Having contributed to the re-organization of the church by his Discours sur la religion nationale, he was made constitutional Bishop of Calvados in 1791, and by his diocese sent to the legislative assembly and the convention. In the beginning he followed the Jacobins unhesitatingly; but the trial of the king alarmed him. He spoke against the proposal to put the king to death, voted for the appeal to the people, etc., and, after the execution, he joined the Girondins, with whom he fell, accused, among other things, of having been privy to the assassination of Marat.

FAUCHEUR, Michel Le, b. at Geneva, 1565; d. at Charenton, 1657; was successively minister of the Protestant congregations of Dijon, Montpellier, and Charenton, and enjoyed a great reputation as a preacher. Besides a number of sermons, he published Traité de la Cène, Geneva, 1635, Traité de l'action de l'orateur, Paris, 1637, etc. His The Wages of Sin and the Reward of Grace is translated in COBBIN'S French Preacher.

FAUSTINUS, a presbyter of Rome; lived in the second half of the fourth century, and distinguished himself in the Athanasian controversy. As an adherent of Bishop Lucifer of Cagliari, he wrote against the Arians; but his works (De trinitate and Fides), first published in Rome (1575), circulated for a time under the name of Gregorius Baeticus, the Luciferian bishop of Eliberi, or Granada, in Spain, until Tillemont discovered the true author. In the contest between Damasus and Ursinus, Faustinus sided with the latter, and by his Libellus precum moved Theodosius to interfere. His collected works are given in MIGNE, Bibl. Patr. Magn., XIII. 38.

FAUSTUS REJENSIS, or RECIENSIS, also called Faustus the Breton, or of Riez, an ecclesiastical writer of the fifth century, and one of the most important literary representatives of the so-called Semi-Pelagianism; was b. in Britain, or Brittany, towards the close of the fourth, or in the beginning of the fifth, century; entered the monastery of Lerins as a monk; became its abbot in 434, and succeeded Maximus in 462 as Bishop of Reji or Regium, the present Riez, in Provence. In 481 he was expelled from his see by Eurich, king of the West Goths; but he returned in 484, and staid at Reji till his death, in 491. He wrote letters and tracts against the Arians and Macedonians (Responsio ad objecta quædam de ratione fidei catholica), against the Nestorians and Monophysites (Ad Gratium), on various dogmatical and ethical questions, especially on the nature of the soul, whose corporeality he asserted. He also wrote homilies and sermons, of which especially the Six Sermones ad Monachos are celebrated; but his principal work is the De gratia Dei et humane mentis libero arbitrio libri II. In 474 the Gallic presbyter Lucidus gave a rather coarse-grained exposition of Augustine's ideas of grace and predestination. Faustus answered, first in a Epistola ad Lucidum, and then in the above-mentioned work. In this book he refutes Pelagius, whom he calls pestiferus; but he also rejects Augustine, though he calls him quidam sanctorum. He attempts to take up an intermediate position, and he does it with great adroitness and no small acumen. The book proved a great success in Gallia; but in Constantinople and North Africa it met with bitter opposition, and Hormisdas afterwards declared that its author does not belong among those whom the church calls its fathers. A collected edition of Faustus' works does not exist; but most of them may be found in Bibl. Patr. Magna, T. V. Pars III. 500; Bibl. Lugd., VIII.; MIGNE: Patrol. Lat., LVIII., etc.

WAGENMANN.

FAUSTUS THE MANICHEAN was an African by birth, a native of Milevis; settled in 383 in Carthage, but was in 386 banished by Messianus. He was the chief of the Manichæans of Africa, and wrote a work against Christianity; but he, as well as his book, is known to us only through Augustine, who at one time wanted his instruction (Confessiones, V. 3, 6, 7, etc.), and afterwards wrote against him, Contra Faustum.

FEAST OF FOOLS. The celebration of the Pagan Saturnalia on Jan. 1 was continued in the Christian Church, and almost without restraint, although the church tried to give the festival a Christian character by celebrating it in honor of the circumcision of Christ. From Italy the festival was introduced into the whole Western Church; and in the twelfth century it was everywhere celebrated in Spain, France, Germany, and England, and generally in a most wanton way. A boy-bishop was elected, and surrounded by boy-abbots, boy-deacons, etc. He conducted service in the church, generally on some day between Christmas and New Year, interspersing the liturgical acts with travesties and parodies of the coarsest description, but all to the greatest amusement of the congregation. In the thirteenth century the church tried seriously to stop this disturbance: council after council, pope after pope, forbade it, but in vain. It was, indeed, the Reformation and the secular authorities which finally put a stop to the scandal. In DUCANGE, Glossarium, is found a complete ceremonial for the whole feast, written out in 1369, at Viviers, in Southern France. See DU TILLIER, Mémoires pour servir à l'histoire de la fête des fous, Lausanne, 1741.

FEATHERS' TAVERN ASSOCIATION, a society of three hundred English clergymen, and some laymen, in the latter part of the eighteenth century, demanding a revision of the Liturgy of the Church of England. Amongst other changes they sought the excision of the damnatory clauses from the Athanasian Creed. The organization had a short existence, and accomplished nothing. The name was taken from Feathers' Tavern, the place where they met. See BAXTER, Church History of England (Lond., 1849), p. 668.

FEATLY, Daniel, D.D., the author of The Dippers Dipt; was b. at Charlton, Oxfordshire, March 15, 1582; d. at Chelsea, April 17, 1645. After graduating at Corpus Christi College, Oxford, he went as chaplain with the English ambassador to the court of France. Returning to England, he became rector of Lambeth, and in 1627 of Acton. In 1643 he became member of the Assembly of Divines, and was the last of the Episcopal members to remain, but was expelled and imprisoned for revealing its proceedings. He is now remembered by his work entitled The Dippers dipt, or the Anabaptists duct and plunged over head & ears at a disputation in Southwark (5th ed., 1648). This work against the Baptists originated in a disputation he held with four Baptists at Southwark, in 1641. In the dedication to the reader, he says, "I could hardly dip my pen in any thing but gall." Other works by Featly are: Mystica Clavis, a key opening divers difficult & mysterious texts of Scripture in 70 sermons, etc., Lond., 1636; Ancilla pietatis, or the handmaid to private devotion, etc., 8th ed., 1676.

FELGENHAUER, Paul, b. at Putschwitz, in Bohemia, towards the close of the sixteenth century; d. at some unknown place, after 1660; studied theology at Wittenberg, and appeared, after his return to his native country in 1620, as a theosophic and mystical writer. In his Chronologie he demonstrated that the world would come to an end before 1765; in his Zeitspiegel he made a vehement attack on the corruption of the Reformed Church and the Lutheran clergy. Compelled to flee from Bohemia in 1623, on account of persecutions directed against all Protestants, he settled in Amsterdam, but continued his literary activity, which attracted much attention in Northern Germany, especially in the lower classes. The clergy began to be alarmed. They wrote against him. When he removed to Bederkesa, near Bremen, in 1636, they had him expelled. In 1657 he was imprisoned some time at Celle, but shortly after dropped out of notice. A complete list of his works is given in ADELUNG: Geschichte d. menschl. Narrheit, IV. 400 sqq.; STARK: Lübeckische Kirchengeschichte, p. 790. HAGENBACH.

FELICISSIMUS was appointed deacon in the Church of Carthage by the presbyter Novatus, without the assent of Cyprian, and belonged to that party which represented the aristocratical and presbyterian system of government in opposition to the monarchical and episcopal system, represented by Cyprian. Cyprian protested against the appointment, but did not depose Felicissimus; and when, shortly after, the Decian persecution broke out, he fled from the city, and left his see. During his absence the presbyters undertook to re-admit the lapsi into the church by virtue of the libellos pacis, which they procured from the martyrs. This, too, Cyprian considered as an encroachment upon his authority; and he sent an episcopal committee to the city. Felicissimus, however, supported by five presbyters, declared that he would admit none into the community of his church who appeared before the episcopal committee; and, when Cyprian returned (Easter, 251), he was formally excommunicated by the party of Felicissimus, which chose a certain Fortunatus for its bishop. Felicissimus himself repaired to Rome, to gain over to his side the Roman Bishop Cornelius; but, the Novatian controversy having at this time broken out both in Rome and Carthage, Cornelius and Cyprian were naturally allies, and Felicissimus' mission failed; after which nothing more is heard of him and his party. KLAIBER.

FELICITAS is the name of two saints of the Roman-Catholic Church: one, a distinguished Roman lady, a widow, who, together with her seven sons, was martyred in Rome under Marcus Aurelius, and is commemorated on July 10; and another, a servant-girl, who was martyred under Septimius Severus, in Carthage, together with Perpetua, and is commemorated on March 7. See Act. Sanct. on the respective dates.

FELIX and FESTUS, the two governors of Judæa (procuratores provincie), appearing in the life of the apostle Paul, as told in the Acts, chap. 21-26. Other sources of information are: for Felix, JOSEPHUS (Ant., XX. 7: 1-8: 8, and Bell. Jud., II. 12: 8-13: 7), TACITUS (Ann., XII. 54, and Hist., V. 9), SUETONIUS (Claud., 28); for Festus, JOSEPHUS (Ant., XX. 8: 9-9: 1, and Bell., II. 14: 1).

The facts which the Acts give—that Felix at the time of Paul's imprisonment (58 or 59) had been "of many years a judge unto this nation" (xxiv. 10); that he had married a Jewess, Drusilla (xxiv. 24); and that, after the lapse of two years, he was succeeded by Porcius Festus (xxiv. 27)—are confirmed by the other sources, without being affected by their differences. Thus when Josephus calls Drusilla a sister of Agrippa II., while Tacitus calls her a grand-daughter of Anthony and Cleopatra; or when Josephus tells us that Felix was not sent to Judæa as procurator until after the deposition of Ventidius Cumanus (52 or 53) by Claudius, and at the instance of the high priest Jonathan, at that time present in Rome, while Tacitus says that he was for many years procurator of a part of the province Samaria, until by the deposition of Cumanus he was appointed procurator of the whole province by the Syrian prefect, Quadratus,—these differences have no effect on the report of the Acts. Among the additional facts derived from extraneous sources may be mentioned: that Felix was a brother of Pallas, the imperial favorite, and, like him a freedman; that Festus died in Judæa, holding office only a very short time, etc. The picture which the Acts give of the two men—of Felix as a vulgar ruffian, and of Festus as a frivolous cynic—also corresponds well with that which Josephus and Tacitus give.

FELIX THE MANICHÆAN, one of the leaders of the sect in Africa, came to Hippo, and held a disputation with Augustine in the Christian Church, and in presence of the congregation. The disputation lasted in two days, and ended with the conversion of Felix. The acts, prepared by notaries, and signed both by Felix and Augustine, are still extant, and are found both in the Paris and the Benedictine edition of Augustine's works.

FELIX THE MARTYR, and his fellow-sufferer Regula, were, according to tradition, the first to bring Christianity to the city of Zürich, and are still venerated as its patrons. They were executed under Maximian, and gave rise to a very luxuriant legend. See Mittheilungen d. ant. Gesellschaft zu Zürich, 1841, vols. I. and II.

FELIX OF NOLA became a confessor during the persecution of Decius. Legend tells us how he concealed himself in a fissure of an old building, and was saved by a spider drawing her web across the fissure, and thereby hiding him from the messengers. His fate was celebrated by Paulinus, Bishop of Nola, in a long poem of fourteen songs.

FELIX OF URGEL. See ADOPTIIONISM.

FELIX is the name of five popes.—Felix I. (269-274), a Roman by birth, is said to have buried with his own hands three hundred and forty-two martyrs, and was probably martyred himself during the persecution of Aurelian. His day falls on the 30th of May. The fragment of a letter from him to Bishop Maximus of Alexandria, which Cyrillus gives in his Apologeticus, is of doubtful authenticity; but the letters ascribed to him by the pseudo-Isidorean collections are certainly spurious. See Act. Sanct., April. pars I; JAFFÉ: Reg. Pontif. Rom.—Felix II. (355-358) was elevated to the Roman see by the Arian court party, without the concurrence of the clergy and the people, when Liberius refused to sign the condemnation of Athanasius, and consequently was driven into exile. After the lapse, however, of three years, Liberius, tired of his exile, submitted to the imperial will, returned to his see, and drove away Felix. Of the later fate of the latter nothing is known with certainty. According to Jerome, he tried to regain the see by force; according to Socrates, he was formally banished by the emperor; according to others, he lived in seclusion at Porto, and died in obscurity. Singularly enough, though his title is very dubious, he is a saint of the Roman-Catholic Church. His saintship was confirmed by Gregory XIII. in 1582. His day falls on July 29. See BARONIUS: Ann. eccl. ad an. 357; JAFFÉ: Reg. Pont. Rom.—Felix III. (March, 483-Feb. 25, 492) was elected by the influence of Adoacer, and became noted for the vigor and decision with which he inter-ferred in the affairs of the Eastern Church. The Emperor Zeno issued the Henoticon on the instance of his patriarch, Acacius, and for the purpose of reconciling the Monophysites. But Felix placed himself at the head of the opposition against this measure, and deposed and excommunicated Acacius at a synod of seventy-seven bishops, thereby occasioning the first schism between the Eastern and Western churches. See Act. Sanct., Februar., III., and JAFFÉ: Reg. Pontif. Rom. — Felix IV. (July 12, 526–September, 530) was elected by the influence of Theodoric the Great, an Arian. — Felix V. (Jan. 5, 1440–49), Duke Amadeus of Savoy, was b. 1383, and d. Jan. 7, 1451. In 1434 he abdicated, left the government of Savoy to his son, and retired to Ripaille, on the Lake of Geneva, as head of the knightly hermit order of St. Mauritius. The process which the Council of Basel instituted against Eugenius IV. roused his ambition; and when, through various intrigues, he was actually elected Pope by the council, he eagerly accepted, assumed the name of Felix V., and immediately formed a curia, mostly consisting of Frenchmen. But residing at Geneva, without any revenue, not in possession of the States of the Church, not acknowledged by any of the great powers, he presented a piteous spectacle. Even the cardinals he made declined the honor. When Germany and France recognized Nicholas V., Felix abdicated, and retired to Ripaille. His reign forms simply an interlude in the history of the Council of Basel, and is described in its acts. G. VOIGT.

FELL, John, D.D., Bishop of Oxford, was b. in Berkshire, June 23, 1625; d. July 10, 1686. He was educated at Christ Church, Oxford, of which his father was the dean. He was a royalist, and after the restoration of the Stuarts was made dean of Christ Church, and in 1676 Bishop of Oxford. He was distinguished for learning, and munificent benefactions to the university. The following famous lines were written by a student to whom Dr. Fell had given the thirty-third epigram of Martial for translation:—

“I do not like thee, Dr. Fell,
The reason why, I cannot tell;
But this I know, and know full well,
I do not like thee, Dr. Fell.”

Among his works the more important were an edition of the Greek Testament, Lond., 1675 (which was the standard edition until Mill), and Paraphrase and Annotations upon the Epp. of St. Paul, Lond., 1675, 3d ed., 1703. See Hook, Eccl. Biogr.

FELLER, François Xavier de, b. at Brussels, Aug. 18, 1735; d. at Regensburg, May 23, 1802; entered the order of the Jesuits in 1754; went to Hungary after the expulsion of the order from France; returned to the Netherlands in 1770, and lived since 1796 at the court of the Bishop of Freysing, in Bavaria. He was an exceedingly prolific writer, publishing about a hundred and twenty volumes during his lifetime, among which are the Journal of Luxemburg, 1774–94 (a periodical, 70 vols., but chiefly written by him), Dictionnaire historique et littéraire (Liège, 1781, 8 vols.), etc. One of his most interesting productions is his Coup d'œil sur le congrès d'Embs, 2 vols., Dusseldorf, 1789.

FELTHAM, Owen, an author highly esteemed in his day, was b. in Suffolk about 1609. At the age of eighteen he published Resolves, divine, moral, political, giving pointed moral and religious maxims. The work was subsequently augmented, and passed through many editions. The edition of 1806 contains the little that is known about his life, written by James Cumming.

FELTON, Henry, D.D., a learned English divine; b. in London, 1679; studied at Oxford; made rector of Whitewell, 1711; principal of Edmund Hall, Oxford, 1722; and d. 1740. Among his works are: The Christ. Faith asserted against Deists, Arians, & Socinians, in 8 Sermons (with a long preface on the necessity of a revelation), Oxf., 1732; The Resurrection of the same Numerical Body, in which Mr. Locke's notions of personality & identity are confuted, 3d ed., Lond., 1733; Sermons on the Creation, Fall, and Redemption of Man, Lond., 1748.

FENCING THE TABLES, a Scotch-Presbyterian term for the address made before the administration of the Lord's Supper, because in it the character of those who should partake was described.

FÉNELON, François de Salignac de la Mothe, Archbishop of Cambrai, and one of the most brilliant and devout of French divines; was b. Aug. 6, 1651, at the castle of Fénelon, in Périgord; d. Jan. 7, 1715, in Cambrai. Brought up by pious parents, he was early set apart for the priesthood. In his twelfth year he was sent to the then flourishing university of Cahors, and passed from there to his uncle's in Paris, the Marquis de Fénelon, an able statesman. At his request, Fénelon, who was now eighteen, preached several times, and with great acceptance. He entered the college of St. Sulpice, where he remained for five years, applying himself assiduously to study and to spiritual exercises. The Archbishop of Paris, M. de Harley, recognizing his talents, appointed him the superior of the Nouvelles Catholiques,—an association of Catholic ladies of noble birth, for the instruction of Protestant girls. The experiences which he had at this post during ten years of service were embodied in his book De l'éducation des filles (“The Education of Girls”). Intended in the first instance for the Duchess de Beauvilliers, the pious mother of a large family, it unfolded the principles of education and heart-training as they are found in Scripture and suggested by a careful observation of child-nature, with a practical wisdom that can hardly be surpassed.

Fénelon's success as Superior of this association attracted the attention of the king, and brought him into contact with Bossuet, the eloquent Bishop of Meaux, with whom he entered into a close friendship. Louis XIV. determined to use his gifts for furthering a plan of bringing over the whole of France to one faith, and assigned him a mission in Poitou for the conversion of the Protestants. Fénelon accepted the duties, but declined the military escort which it was customary to send on such occasions, preferring, like the apostles, to use only the weapons of the Spirit. He secured, at least, the respect of the Protestants, if he did not succeed in bringing them over to the Roman Church. Returning to his old position, he was accused of holding Protestant principles,—an accusation which he sufficiently refuted in his Sur le ministère des pasteurs ("The Ministry"). This tract denies the divine authority of the Protestant clergy, on the ground that such authority depended upon regular episcopal ordination handed down from the apostles.

The year 1689 was an important epoch in Fénelon's life. The king appointed him tutor for his grandsons,—the Dukes of Burgundy, Anjou (afterwards king of Spain), and Berri. For the duties of this office he was eminently adapted by the untarnished nobility of his own character, high sense of honor, magnetic power, patience, and gentleness of temper. The Duke of Burgundy was of a violent temper ["so passionate that he would break the clocks which summoned him to some unwelcome duty, and fly into the wildest rage with the rain which hindered some pleasure," as St. Simon says]. But the teacher succeeded not only in mollifying his disposition, and enriching his mind, but in securing the prince's respect and gratitude. The king presented him with the abbey of St. Valérie, and in 1695 with the see of Cambrai; Fénelon, much to the former's surprise, resigning the abbey at his elevation.

With his promotion to the archbishopric began a succession of hard conflicts and humiliations. In 1687 he had formed the acquaintance of Madame Guyon (see art.), which ripened into intimate friendship. It was a severe trial for him, when a theological examination of her devotional works was instituted, that he should have been placed on the commission. Bossuet, one of the commissioners, sought to secure his signature to the Instruction sur les états d'oraison ("Instruction about the States of Prayer"), which he had written in refutation of Madame Guyon's views. Fénelon's conscientious scruples forbade his assent; and Bossuet not only began to grow cold towards him, but to antagonize him. Fénelon never fully approved of Madame Guyon's tenets and language, but always defended her intentions as above suspicion. In 1697 he made public his views on the subject, in Maximes des Saints sur la vie intérieure ("Maxims of the Saints on the Life of the Soul"). The work was a defence of Madame Guyon's fundamental principles, and elaborated the two propositions,—that the love towards God is a disinterested love of him for his own sake, and independent of the reward; and that, in the most perfect Christians, love is the predominant grace. Others professed to find the principle laid down in it, that perfect sanctification, and absolute rest in God, were possible on earth, and that a state of contemplative quietism, rather than of watching and conflict, was recommended.

Paris was split up into two parties over this work. Bossuet opposed it with passionate bitterness. Fénelon observed an exemplary moderation and patience. The king decided for Bossuet, and Fénelon was ordered to leave the court, and proceed to his diocese. He was received with joy, and at once devoted himself, with a consecration seldom equalled, to the duties of his see. He was untiring in his visitation, preached in all the churches he visited, cared for the poor, removed clerical abuses, and became the father and friend to poor and rich. His sermons were not studied works of art, but flowed with evangelical simplicity from the fulness of his heart.

In the mean time the controversy with Bossuet went on. Fénelon had submitted his case to the Pope, and sought his judgment upon the Maxims of the Saints, which Bossuet insisted he should renounce. The latter drew the most severe logical consequences from Fénelon's work, and embodied them in an answer to his Explication des Maximes des Saints ("Explanation of the Maxims of the Saints"), which he likewise sent to Rome. Fénelon answered every criticism with ability. In 1698 Bossuet wrote his Relation du quietisme, a history of the controversy, to which Fénelon replied in his Réponse, which aroused a very favorable feeling towards him. But the Sorbonne had already condemned twelve articles of the Explication; and in 1699 a papal brief declared the Maxims of the Saints, and twenty-three articles drawn from it erroneous (not heretical). The general interest as to the archbishop's course was speedily put at rest. Fénelon submitted unconditionally, finding the papal sentence severe, but recognizing in it the "echo of the divine will;" and he believed only one course to be open to a true son of the church. He revoked the twenty-three articles, and forbade the circulation of the book in his diocese. Although, from the stand-point of the gospel, we cannot approve of Fénelon's course, we cannot help but admire the spirit of moderation and humility which guided him during the whole progress of the controversy. Bossuet, on the one hand, eulogized his submission: the people, on the other, throughout France, had learned to esteem him.

The leisure he could find in the administration of his diocese, Fénelon employed in furthering the education of the Duke of Burgundy. This he did by correspondence. In order to instil in him the principles of justice and goodness, he gathered together the fragments of the Télémaque, and revised the whole. He gave the manuscript to a copyist in order to secure a neatly-written copy for his ward. The copyist made a second copy, without the knowledge of Fénelon; and it was printed at Paris under the title Aventures de Télémaque ("Adventures of Telemachus"), but, being suppressed by royal order, was reprinted in Holland, June, 1699. The book was translated into every language of Europe, and had one of the largest circulations of any book after the Bible. The king thought he discovered in the work a satire against his administration, but without just ground.

In 1712 Fénelon wrote two other works for the Duke of Burgundy,—Dialogues des morts ("Dialogues of the Dead"), and Directions pour la conscience d'un Roi ("Rules for a King's Conscience"). The latter was first printed in Holland, 1734. It is full of sapient advice, and searching questions, such as only an experienced confessor could present. In 1713 appeared his Démonstration de l'existence de Dieu ("Proof of God's Existence"), and in 1718 a most excellent treatise on eloquence,—Dialogues sur l'éloquence. The latter is composed in the purest and most classic French, and full of healthy and inspiring thoughts. He lays down the threefold condition of an oration,—that it must prove, illustrate, and move. He holds up the Scriptures as the most perfect illustration of true eloquence, which the preacher cannot study too diligently.

The nobility of Fénelon's character was shown most conspicuously during the war of the Spanish Succession (1701-13), when his diocese was for a while the seat of war. In a general way he sought to mitigate the horrors and ravages of the war by wise counsels to the Duke of Burgundy, who was commander-in-chief. When, in 1709, Flanders, in which Cambray was located, was desolated, he opened the chambers of his palace to the wounded and the sick; and when a dearth of grain was felt he offered his whole income to the state. The French admired their archbishop for his self-denying interest in the suffering and wounded, and bowed before his piety. No less did the enemies of France esteem his virtues; and Prince Eugene and Marlborough not only treated him politely, but sent troops to guard his property.

He died of a fever. His last days were peaceful. The latter part of the fourth chapter of Second Corinthians and the fifth chapter were read and re-read to him, affording great comfort. After listening to the high-priestly prayer in Gethsemane (John xvii.), he blessed his attendants, and went to sleep, aged sixty-four. Fénelon's death was regarded as a loss, not only to the diocese of Cambray, but to all France. His virtues and talents were known throughout Europe, and recognized by all church communions. He was a strict son of the Roman-Catholic Church; but, above all, he was a genuine, believing, active Christian, liberal and charitable enough to sympathize with Protestants, who, in turn, revere his memory.

[The description of St. Simon, in his Memoirs (XXII.), deserves to be quoted. "He was a tall, thin man, well made, pale, with a large nose, eyes whence fire and talent streamed like a torrent, and a physiognomy the like of which I have never seen in any other man, and which, once seen, could never be forgot. . . . It united seriousness and gaiety, gravity and courtesy; the prevailing characteristics, as in every thing about him, being refinement, intellect, gracefulness, modesty, and, above all, noblesse," etc.]

LIT. — No complete edition of Fénelon's works has appeared. Editions more or less complete appeared in Paris, 1787-92 (9 vols.); Paris, 1810 (10 vols.); Toulouse, 1809-11 (19 vols.); and Paris, 1835 (38 small vols.). Lives of Fénelon. — RAMSAY: Vie de Fénelon, 1725, 2d ed., 1729; Abbé QUERBEUF, in the ed. of 1787; BAUSSET: Hist. de Fénelon, Paris, 1808 (3d ed., 1817), 4 vols. G. V. LECHLER.

FERGUSSON, David, one of the fathers of the Scottish Reformation, was b. not later, and probably some years earlier, than the year 1525 (see Wodrow MSS., vol. xvii. No. 16). He d. in 1598, "the eldest minister that tyme in Scotland" (James Melvill's Diary, Edin., 1842, p. 437). He seems to have been a native of Dundee, and by original occupation a glover (Fergusson's Tracts, ut infra, Intro., p. xiv). Though not a graduate of any university (Row, Hist., p. 418), he shows in his writings, and in the many wise and witty sayings which have been, doubtless truly enough, attributed to him, a familiarity with the classical languages and classical literature. In July, 1560, he was selected by the Parliament to be minister of Dunfermline, an important charge, as containing a royal palace, which afterwards became the favorite residence of James VI. But he had been one of six men, as he tells us himself, who began to preach the Reformed faith in Scotland some years before the Reformation; at a time "when" (to use his own words) "there was no stipend heard tell of; when the authority, both ecclesiastic and civil, opposed themselves; and when scarcely a man of name and estimation [was found] to take their cause in hand" (James Melvill's Diary, p. 357). As to the matter of stipend, indeed it must be here added, that, even after the establishment of the Reformation, there was for some years little change for the better in this respect. In one of the Tracts already referred to, and afterwards more particularly noticed, a tract published in the year 1563, Fergusson, speaking of himself and his brethren generally, says, "The greatest number of us have lived in great penury, without all stipend; some twelve months, some eight, and some half a year, having nothing to sustain ourselves and our families, but that which we have borrowed of charitable persons, until God send it to us to repay them" (Answer to Renan Benedict, p. 11). He proved an excellent minister, "preaching," says Row (Hist. p. 418), "with great boldness, wisdom, and holiness," and "bringing the people [of his charge] to very good order, knowledge of the truth, and obedience to the discipline of the Kirk." As a church-leader, he was characterized by firmness, sagacity, sound judgment, and also what Wodrow (Analecta, Glasgow, 1842, vol. I., p. 120) calls "pleasant and facetious conversation, by which," Wodrow adds, "he often pleased and pacified the king when he was in a fury." He was, accordingly, very frequently employed by the Church as a medium of communication with the king.

Fergusson published two tracts in his own lifetime. The first is a controversial work, entitled An Answer to Ane Epistle written by Renan Benedict, the French doctor, to John Knox, and the rest of the bretheren. This treatise was printed at Edinburgh, in the year 1563, and was reprinted for the Bannatyne Club in 1860, from a unique copy in the library of the University of Edinburgh. It contains an able discussion of the chief points at issue between the Romanists and Protestants at the period of the Reformation. His second publication appeared nine years afterwards, being a sermon preached before the regent and nobility at Leith (Jan. 13, 1571-72), during the meetings of the General Assembly. It relates chiefly to the inadequacy of the existing provision for the Reformed ministers, the schools, and the poor; and it condemns in no measured terms the neglect by the king and Parliament of objects regarded by the Church from the first as having paramount claims on their attention. The sermon was printed at the request of the General Assembly held at Perth in the year 1572, with the special approbation of five of the most eminent ministers of that day, to whom it had been submitted for revision; John Knox, then on his death-bed, giving his imprimatur in these words: "John Knox, with his dead hand, but glad heart, praising God, that, of his mercy, he leaves such light to his kirk in this desolation." Fergusson is also the author of a posthumous work, entitled Scottish Proverbs: Gathered together by David Fergusson . . . and put ordine alphabetico when he departed this lyfe (Edin., 1641).

Among his descendants many well-known names occur, including Adam Fergusson, minister of Logierait, who took a prominent part in the controversies connected with the Scottish secession of 1733, and his much more distinguished son, Dr. Adam Ferguson, professor of moral philosophy in the University of Edinburgh, and the author of a history of the Roman Republic (Lond., 1783), and other standard works. Principal Robertson, the historian of America and of Charles V., and Henry, Lord Brougham, also alike claimed lineal descent from the first minister of Dunfermline.

LIT. — The few facts now known as to the life of this eminent Reformer will be found in the books and documents quoted above, and especially in Row's Historie of the Kirk of Scotland from the year 1558 to August, 1637 (Edin., 1842), and in the introductory notice to the Bannatyne Club's reprint of Fergusson's Tracts (Edin., 1869), also already mentioned. Many of the "Sayings" of D. Fergusson will be found in the Wodrow Manuscript Collections preserved in the library of the University of Glasgow. See, also, Encyclopædia Britannica (supplement), ed. 1824, s. v., Dr. Adam Ferguson, and Edinburgh Review for January, 1867 (vol. 125, pp. 48 sqq.).

FERRAR, Nicholas, an English clergyman of ascetic tastes; b. in London, Feb. 22, 1592; d. Dec. 2, 1637. He studied at Clare Hall, Cambridge; in 1624 was elected to Parliament; and in 1626 was ordained deacon by the Bishop of St. David's (Laud). He consecrated himself to a life of retirement and devotion, and refused flattering offers to benefices. He turned his manor, Little Gidding, into a sort of conventual establishment, at which vigils and other formal religious exercises were scrupulously observed. Ferrar himself slept on the floor, and rose at one in the morning for religious meditation. He also did much good by providing a free school for the children of the neighborhood, and himself catechised them. See Lives of Ferrar by Dr. PECKARD (Camb., 1790), MACDONOUGH (2d ed., Lond., 1837), and by his BROTHER and Dr. JEBB (1 vol., Camb., 1855).

FERRAR, Robert, Bishop of St. David's, and martyr; b. at Halifax, Yorkshire; d. at the stake, in Caermarthen, Wales, March 30, 1535. He studied at Cambridge and Oxford, and was elevated to the see of St. David's, under Edward VI., in 1548. Bishop Burnet (Hist. of Ref., I. p. 451) describes him as "a rash and indiscreet man," and as having been arbitrary in his treatment of the canons of his cathedral. At the accession of Mary he was deprived of his see, and tried and condemned for heresy. To a young man who deplored his death-sentence he is reported to have said, "If you see me once stir while I suffer the pains of burning, then give no credit to those doctrines for which I die." He made good his assertion, and was felled to the ground by a blow on the head. See FOXE: Actes and Monumentes: Hook: Eccles. Biogr., vol. v.

FERRARA-FLORENCE, Council of. The course of opposition to the Pope and the curia, which the Council of Basel pursued, was even more pronounced than had been anticipated. A breach became unavoidable; and the project of a union between the Eastern and Western churches, started for political reasons by the Byzantine emperor, and eagerly caught at by the Pope, gave the occasion. For many reasons, Eugenius IV. wished that these negotiations should be carried on in Italy; and he proposed to transfer the Council of Basel to some Italian city. But the council refused; and after the stormy meetings on March 6 and 7, 1437, the papal minority left Basel, and placed itself at the disposition of the Pope. Jan. 8, 1438, the council was solemnly opened at Ferrara; and in March, same year, the Eastern delegates arrived, numbering about seven hundred persons, and including, besides the emperor, Johannes VI. (Palæologus), all the highest dignitaries of the Greek Church,—the patriarch of Constantinople, Joseph II.; the archbishop of Nicæa, Bessarion; the archbishop of Ephesus, Marcus Eugenius; the metropolitan of Kiev, Isidore, etc. April 9, 1438, the debate of the union question began.

The principal points of the debate were, the procession of the Holy Spirit (Filioque), the intermediate state of the soul between death and judgment (purgatory), the use of unleavened bread in the Eucharist, the primacy of the Pope, etc. The debates were very copious; but though the union had several warm friends among the Greeks, as, for instance, Bessarion, and though the emperor, pressed as he was on all sides by the Turks, and well knowing that the union was the condition of help from Western Europe, did his utmost to dampen the ardor of his theologians, nothing seemed likely to come out of the attempt. Troubles of another kind were added. The Greeks were the guests of the Pope, but the Pope had no money. In this emergency he addressed himself to the rich Florentine bankers; but the Florentines demanded that the council should be transferred from Ferrara to Florence, and this transference frightened the Greeks. Nevertheless, Feb. 26, 1439, the council was opened at Florence; and, after some months of more discussion, an agreement was actually arrived at. An act of union was signed by thirty-three Greek and a hundred and fifteen Latin church-dignitaries; and July 6, 1439, the Pope celebrated a commemorative service of unity in the Cathedral of Florence. Unfortunately, this union, so pompously announced to the world, was in reality a mere illusion. With respect to the principal dogmatical question,—the procession of the Holy Spirit,—the Latin addition (Filioque) was recognized by the Greeks, but not adopted in their creed: with respect to the principal practical question,—the papal primacy,—the claims of the Pope were recognized by the Greeks; but at the same time the rights and privileges of the patriarchs of Constantinople, Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem, were renewed and confirmed. In the West this union produced no enthusiasm for the suffering Greeks; and in the East it intensified the hatred to the Latins. Several of the Greek ecclesiastics who had signed the act of union were made to suffer for it. Isidore was thrown into prison: Bessarion had to flee to Rome, etc. In 1472 the Greeks solemnly renounced the union.

LIT.—The authentic acts of the council are lost; but a documentary history of it, probably written by Archbishop Dorotheus of Mitylene, is found in vol. 9 of HARDUIN, and vol. 31 of MANSI. It is in favor of the union. From the opposite stand-point wrote Sylvester Syropulos, a Greek priest, whose work was edited by Creighton, London, 1660. FERRARA, Renata (Renée), celebrated for her relations to the Reformers, was the daughter of Louis XII. of France, and wife of Hercules of Este, Duke of Ferrara, whom she married in 1527; was b. at the castle of St. Blois, Oct. 25, 1510; and d. at Montargis, June 12, 1575. Brought up in the court of Francis I., she came into intimate relations with Margaret of Navarre, whose evangelical sentiments she imbibed. Her mind delighted in the pursuits of literature and art; and her court at Ferrara attracted the learned men of Italy. She remained true to evangelical sentiments, in spite of opposition and the forced separation of her children, and welcomed to her palace Ochino, Peter Martyr, Calvin, and other evangelical divines. Calvin, during his stay (in 1536) of several months, instructed her carefully in the Reformed doctrines, and afterwards maintained a correspondence with her. On the death of her husband (in 1559) she returned to France, and made profession of the Reformed faith, in which she died. See P. BAYLE (Dictionary), MERLE D'AUBIGNÉ (iv. 425-427, v. 420-423, Am. ed.), and other Histories of the Reformation.

FERRER, Vincentius, b. at Valencia, Jan. 23, 1357; d. at Vannes, in Bretagne, April 5, 1419; entered the Dominican order in 1374; studied at Barcelona and Lerida; wrote Tractatus de moderno Ecclesie schismate, visited Paris; was appointed confessor to Queen Yolanda of Aragon; wrote Tractatus de vita spirituali, and other works, and was in 1395 called to Avignon by Benedict XIII., as Magister Sacri Palatii. But two years later on he gave up this position, and determined, in spite of the opposition of the Pope, to devote his life to missionary labors. Travelling on foot through France, Italy, Spain, and England, he preached, often twice a day, in the streets or on the road, to great crowds. Soon he was not alone any more. A wandering congregation formed around him, accompanying him everywhere, practising the severest asceticism, and filling the towns and the fields with their sombre songs. He was canonized by Calixtus III., June 29, 1455. See LUDWIG HELLER: Vincentius Ferrer, Berlin, 1830; HOHENTHAL: De Vincentio Ferrerio, Leipzig, 1839. L. HELLER.

FERRIER, Jérémie, b. at Nîmes in 1565; d. in Paris, Sept. 26, 1626; was appointed pastor of the Reformed Congregation of Nîmes in 1601, and considered one of the most talented and courageous champions of the Reformation in France. He publicly defended the thesis that the Pope was Antichrist. He preached with such a violence against the Jesuits as to cause riots, etc. Nevertheless, some suspicion of his sincerity arose in 1611; and in 1613 he was forbidden to preach, because it was evident that he had sold himself to the Court and the Romanists. He went to Paris and abjured Protestantism in 1614. In the same year he wrote De l'Antechrist et de ses marques, contre les calomnies des ennemis de l'Eglise catholique. See BORREL, Hist. de l'Egl. réf. de Nîmes, 1856.

FERRIS, Isaac, D.D., LL.D., b. in New York, Oct. 3, 1799; d. at Roselle, N.J., June 16, 1873. He was graduated from Columbia College, 1816; a pastor in the Reformed Dutch Church over different charges (New Brunswick, N.J., 1821-24; Albany, 1824-36; New York, Market Street, 1836-54); and chancellor of the New York University, 1852-70, emeritus, 1870-73. His service to the university was long and faithful. By his efforts a crushing debt of a hundred thousand dollars was extinguished, four professorships endowed, and several new departments added to the course of instruction. He possessed great sagacity, common sense, and administrative ability. As preacher, pastor, and professor, he was beloved. His presence was majestic. He delivered the address at the Jubilee of the American Bible Society, New York, 1866, subsequently published, — Jubilee Memorial of the American Bible Society; being a Review of its First Fifty Years of Work, N.Y., 1867.

FERRY, Paul, b. at Metz, Feb. 24, 1591; d. there July 28, 1669; was pastor of the Reformed Congregation there for about sixty years. He was a very prolific writer; but most of his works still remain in manuscript, and those which have been printed are mediocre. He is noticeable, however, for his participation in the project of uniting the Protestants and Romanists of France. His correspondence with Bossuet on that occasion is found in vol. xxiv. of the works of the latter. His Lettre aux ministres de Genève, in defence of a poor lunatic who was burnt at Geneva for blasphemies against the Trinity, is found in vol. ii. of Bibliothèque Anglaise.

FERRY LAW, The, is the name generally applied to a law concerning public instruction, especially in the higher schools, which was laid before the Legislative Chamber of France, March 15, 1879, by Jules Ferry, at that time minister of public instruction, and passed by the Senate, July 19, same year. The tendency of this law is to exclude the influence of the Roman-Catholic Church from the school. Article VII. of the law, the centre of the debate, and the object of a very bitter contest, prohibits the member of a not recognized religious association to be the director of, or to teach in, a public school. In consequence of this article, twenty-seven Jesuit colleges were closed, and eight hundred and forty-eight Jesuit teachers were forbidden to work. But, besides the Jesuits, twenty-six other religious communities which could not obtain, or would not seek, the confirmation of the government, were affected by the law. See FRANCE, ECCLESIASTICAL STATISTICS OF.

FESCH, Joseph, b. at Ajaccio, Jan. 3, 1763; d. in Rome, May 13, 1839; was a younger stepbrother to Lætitia, the mother of Napoleon I., and was educated for the church in the seminary of Aix. After the outbreak of the Revolution, he entered the military service, and accompanied his nephew on his first Italian campaign as an army commissary. He took part in the negotiation of the concordat, returned to the church, and was made Archbishop of Lyons in 1802, and Cardinal in 1803. As ambassador to Rome, he succeeded in inducing the Pope to go to Paris to crown Napoleon; and the day before the crowning he gave the civil marriage of Napoleon and Josephine the consecration of the church. He was, however, not a mere tool in the hands of his nephew. He afterwards absolutely refused to annul the marriage which he had consecrated; and as president of the National Council assembled in Paris, 1810, he resisted the policy of Napoleon so persistently, that he entirely lost his favor. After the fall of the emperor, Cardinal Fesch sought refuge in Rome, and was very kindly received by the Pope. He joined Napoleon during the Hundred Days, but returned then to Rome, where he spent the rest of his life. His correspondence with Napoleon was published by DU CASSE, in 3 vols., Paris, 1855. See LYONNET: Le Cardinal Fesch, Lyons, 1841, 2 vols.; and La vérité sur le Cardinal Fesch, Lyons, 1842.

FESTIVALS OF THE JEWS. The festivals of the Jews may be divided into pre-exilian and post-exilian. They will be found described under their respective titles.

I. The Pre-Exilian Festivals. — There are (a) The Seventh Day, or the Sabbath; (b) The Feast of Trumpets, or New Year; (c) The Day of Atonement; (d) The Feast of Tabernacles; and (e) The Feast of Pentecost. Besides, each seventh year was observed as a sabbatical, and, after seven times seven years, the Feast of Jubilee was observed. On the holy seasons in general comp. Exod. xxiii. 10-17; Lev. xxiii., xxv.; Num. xxviii., xxix.; Deut. xvi. As these festivals are treated separately, we need not enter upon the mode of their observation.

II. The Post-Exilian Festivals. — After the exile, other holy seasons were added to those already enacted by Moses; thus the four fasts mentioned in Zechariah (for which comp. the art. Fasts), the Feast of Esther, or Purim, that of the Dedication of the Temple on its restoration by Judas the Maccabee, and that of Wood Offering, on which offerings of wood were brought for the use of the temple, and on which see the Mishna Taanith iv. 5, and Josephus, Jewish Wars, II. 17, 6. Comp. Delitzsch, in Herzog's Real Encyclop. (2d ed.), s. v. Feste.

FESTUS. See FE'LIX AND FES'TUS.

FETICHISM, or FETISHISM (from the Portuguese feitico, fetisso, a "charm"), denotes one of the lowest forms of religion, — the worshipping of fetiches. The fetich is not itself considered a deity by the worshipper, or even a symbol of a deity: it is simply supposed to be a vehicle through which a supernatural power makes itself felt in the world; and, as no logical connection is demanded between the power and the vehicle through which it acts, any object whatever, natural or artificial, animate or inanimate, may become a fetich. Entirely incidentally — by a dream, by some kind of delusion, by a mere whim — some one is induced to believe that a supernatural power exercises influence on his destiny through this pebble or that feather; and immediately he falls down and worships the pebble or the feather, and makes it his fetich. But just as incidentally the object may lose this dignity of being a fetich. If the worshipper discovers, or thinks he has discovered, that the influence is not so real as he supposed, he will withdraw his allegiance, and perhaps take vengeance. If the fetich is an animate object, it will be punished: if it is an inanimate object, it may be destroyed. The idea, however, of influencing, perhaps coercing, the supernatural power through the vehicle, is not altogether foreign to the fetich worshipper; for the fetich has, at least to some extent, the character of being a means of witchcraft.

This form of religion was observed and described for the first time, when, in the fifteenth century, the Portuguese boarded the coasts of Guinea. Afterwards numerous traces of it were found among the savages in America, Australia, and Siberia; and De Brosses, in his Du Culte des Dieux Fétiches (Dijon, 1760), brings it in connection with the religion of the ancient Egyptians. General attention was drawn to it by A. Comte, who, in his Philosophie positive (Paris, 1830-42), places it as the first stage in the logical evolution of religion, and defines it as a conception of nature, according to which all bodies are animated, in the same manner as the human body, and, like that, governed by a will. This definition depends upon a mistake; for fetichism is not pantheism, but just the reverse of pantheism, a very coarse dualism, as has been very ably shown by Sir JOHN LUBBOCK, in his Origin of Civilization, 1870, and by HERBERT SPENCER, in his Sociology, 1879. See FRITZ SCHULTZE, Der Fetichismus, Leipzig, 1871. CLEMENS PETERSEN.

FEUERBACH, Ludwig Andreas, b. at Landshut, Bavaria, July 28, 1804; d. at Bruckberg, near Ansbach, Sept. 13, 1872; studied at Heidelberg and Berlin, and began to lecture on philosophy at Erlangen, but spent most of his life in literary retirement at Bruckberg. In 1848, 1849, he once more began to lecture publicly at Heidelberg; but, when the revolutionary movement completely failed, he again retired to private life. In the last year of his life he was rescued from actual want only by a public subscription. He was originally a pupil of Hegel, but left the master in 1839 with a very bitter criticism, and attempted an independent development in the direction of naturalism, or rather materialism. In his principal work (Das Wesen des Christenthums, 1811) he defines God as a mere projection into empty space of the human ego, as an image of man, and religion as a simple psychological process, as an illusion. The book was translated into English with consummate art by George Eliot (Mrs. Cross), Essence of Christianity, London, 1853, new ed., 1881. See SCHALLER: Darstellung und Kritik d. Philosophie L. F., 1847; R. HAGEN: Feuerbach und die Philosophie, 1847.

FEUILLANTS, The, received their name from the abbey of Feuillans, about eighteen miles from Toulouse, and were originally a branch of the Cistercian order, subject to the authority of Cîteaux, but became an independent congregation by the reforms of Jean de la Barrière (b. 1544, d. 1600). He became abbot of Feuillans in 1574, and in spite of much opposition, and many difficulties, he succeeded in re-establishing the old discipline and order among his monks. As a consequence of the reform, the reputation of the monastery increased so rapidly, that the envy even of the mother-institution at Cîteaux was excited, and Barrière was compelled to ask support from the Pope. In 1586 the Pope not only confirmed the reforms, but also forbade the Cistercians to meddle with the affairs of Feuillans. Monks from Feuillans were invited to Rome; and monasteries on the reformed plan were founded in Rome, in Paris, and in Bordeaux. In 1595 the Pope entirely exempted the Feuillants from the authority of Cîteaux, and confirmed their constitution as an independent congregation. Under Henry IV. they obtained the right of electing their own general; and in the middle of the seventeenth century they numbered about thirty monasteries in France and Italy. Nunneries were also founded; the first by Barrière, in 1588, at Montesquion, in the diocese of Rieux, for fifteen inmates; a second, in 1599, at Toulouse; a third at Poitiers, in 1617, etc. See JOSEPH MOROTIUS: Cistercii reforescentis . . . histor., Turin, 1690, fol.; Dom J. de la Barrière, Paris, 1699. FEW, Ignatius A., D.D., LL.D., b. in Augusta, Ga., April 11, 1789; d. in Athens, Ga., Nov. 28, 1845. After practising law for a few years, he was converted, and entered the ministry of the Methodist-Episcopal Church, 1828, and attained to great eminence. He was the founder and first president of Emory College, Oxford, Ga., and one of the leaders of the Methodist-Episcopal Church, South. His attainments, intellectual and spiritual, made him beloved and trusted.

FIACRE (Irish-Gaelic, raven or worth), d. 670; a saint of Gaul, and patron of the gardeners, who celebrate his festival on Aug. 30. He was most probably of Irish parentage, and went to Meaux, in France, where he erected an oratory to the Virgin Mary, which became a famous resort for pilgrims. Of his life little is known. Miracles are attributed to him, and his relics were believed to have retained the same power. Women were excluded from his chapel; and, according to Boece (Hist. Scotland, ix. 19), "All women that gangis in his chapell wil be other blind or mod [mad]." His name has been given to a carriage. In 1640 a merchant rented a building in Paris for his carriages, which he hired out. Over the building was an image of the saint, and the building itself was called "Hôtel de St. Fiacre." The name passed to the vehicles themselves. See BOL-LANDIST: Acta SS., Aug. 30, vol. vi. p. 604 sqq.; A. J. ANSART: Hist. de St. Fiacre, Paris, 1782; SMITH: Dict. Christ. Biog., art. Fiacrius.

FICHTE, Johann Gottlieb, b. at Rammenan, in Upper Lusatia, May 19, 1762; d. in Berlin, Jan. 27, 1814; was educated at Schulpforta, and studied theology at Jena. The son of a poor ribbon-weaver, he was enabled to follow his intellectual ambition only by the aid of Baron von Miltiz; and, when this his benefactor died, he led for several years a very precarious life as a tutor in Zürich and Warsaw, and as a student in Leipzig and Königsberg. He came out, however, from those years of poverty and embarrassments of all kinds, a character of steel. His first strong intellectual impression he received from the writings of Lessing. Afterwards, in the course of his mental development, he successively moved from the freethinking of Lessing to the determinism of Spinoza, and again from the determinism of Spinoza to the criticism of Kant. In Kant's limitation of causality to the world of phenomena he found the starting-point for his own philosophy,—that audacious deduction of both nature and God from the human ego, as to whose true character (atheism, or not) people still disagree. In 1794 he was appointed professor of philosophy at Jena; and the following year he published his chief work, Die Wissenschaftslehre (translated into English by A. E. KROEGER, Science of Knowledge, Philadelphia, 1868), and the beautiful essay, Ueber die Bestimmung des Gelehrten (translated by W. SMITH, The Vocation of the Scholar, in his Popular Writings of J. G. Fichte, 2 vols., London, 1847-49, new edition, 1871). Both his writings and his lectures made a deep impression. But a suspicion of atheism was already abroad; and when, in 1799, in a little essay, On the Grounds of our Faith in the Divine Government of the World, he declared that the moral order of the world is God, and that there is no other God, he was formally rebuked by the government, and discharged. The rest of his life he spent in Berlin, where he lectured to great audiences, and took an active part in the foundation of the university. The effect of his lectures (as, for instance, his Reden an die deutsche Nation), was felt through all Germany, and can still be felt at this very day. In these his later writings, as, for instance, in The Destination of Man, 1800 (translated by Mrs. Sinnett, London, 1846), The Nature of the Scholar, The Characteristics of the Present Age, The Way towards the Blessed Life, etc., 1805-07 (all translated by W. Smith in the book mentioned above), he took great pains to clear up his relation to religion, especially to Christianity. In some points he succeeded. It is evident that he was very far from considering Christianity a mere code of morality: he recognized it as an agency of much deeper significance in the history of the human race. But the incarnation, for instance, seems to have been to him nothing more than a typical representation of what takes place in every man when he is converted. Of the historical facts on which Christianity rests, he seems to have grasped the typical signification only. His collected works were edited (Bonn, 1834-46, 11 vols.), and his life was written, by his son, I. H. Fichte, Sulzbach, 1830, 2 vols., 2d ed., Leipzig, 1862.

FICHTE, Immanuel Hermann, the son of the former; b. at Jena, July 18, 1797; d. at Stuttgart, Aug. 13, 1879; was professor of philosophy at Bonn (1836-42), and at Tübingen (1842-75). He was a very prolific writer on all branches of philosophy, and exercised considerable influence as a champion of Christian theism. In this respect his Die speculative Theologie, Heidelberg, 1846, and System der Ethik, Leipzig, 1850-53, are of special interest. He founded the Zeitschrift für Philosophie.

FICINUS, Marsilius, b. at Florence, Oct. 19, 1433; d. in his villa, at Careggi, Oct. 1, 1499; was a son of the body-physician of Cosmo di Medici, and grew up in the palace, enjoying the instruction of Gemistus Pletho, and the intercourse of all the leaders of the Renaissance. In time he became one of the leaders himself; and he, more than any one else, was instrumental in familiarizing the age with the ideas of Plato and the Neo-Platonists. It was an enthusiastic conviction of his, that the depraved theology of his time could be regenerated only by an infusion of Platonism. In that spirit he preached, having been consecrated priest in 1477; and in that spirit he wrote and lectured as president of the Platonic Academy. He gave a complete Latin translation of Plato and Plotinus, and published a number of original works.—Theologia Platonica, De Religione Christiana, De Immortalitate Animum, etc. Collected editions of his works appeared at Venice, 1516; Basel, 1561; Paris, 1641. Among his pupils were Pico di Mirandola, Reuchlin, Sixtus IV., etc. See SIEVERING, Geschichte d. platonisch. Akademie zu Florenz, Göttingen, 1812.

FIDDES, Richard, D.D., a fertile theological author; b. at Humanley, Yorkshire, in 1671; and d. at Putney in 1725. He was educated at Oxford; became rector of Halsham about 1694, but, losing his voice, resigned, and devoted himself with much industry to authorship. Among his works are: A Body of Divinity, Lond., 1718-20, in 2 vols. (the first discussing the doctrines of natural and revealed religion,—Theol. speculativa, the second, the duties,—Theol. practica); a Life of Cardinal Wolsey, Lond., 1724 (in which the writer disparages the Reformation); and 3 vols. of Discourses, Lond., 1713-15, vol. i. passing through three editions.

FIDELIS, St., properly Marcus Roy, was b. at Sigmaringen, 1577; studied law, and began to practise as a lawyer in Ensisheim, but suddenly changed career, entered the order of the Capuchins, and was consecrated priest, and appointed preacher at Feldkirch, in the Vorarlberg, 1621. His great aim was to re-establish the Roman-Catholic Church in these regions; and at the head of an Austrian regiment of dragoons he set out on a missionary trip. But the peasants rose in defence of their religious liberty, defeated the dragoons, and put Fidelis to death, April 24, 1622; for which Benedict XIV. declared him a saint. G. PLITT.

FIELD, Richard, an eminent divine of the Anglican Church; b. Oct. 15, 1561, in Hempstead, Hertfordshire; d. Nov. 21, 1616. He studied at Oxford; was made rector of Burghclere in 1598, chaplain in ordinary to Elizabeth, and in 1610 raised to the deanery of Gloucester. He was an intimate friend of Hooker, recognized as a good preacher and profound theologian, and esteemed by James I., who, after hearing him for the first time, expressed his sentiments in the pun, "This is a Field for God to dwell in." Fuller, in his Holy War, calls him "that learned divine, whose memory smelleth like a Field the Lord hath blessed." Field's fame rests upon his work entitled Of the Church, Five Bookes, by Richard Field, D.D., and sometime Deane of Gloucester, 1606-10. It treats of the nature, members, and government of the true church, and was occasioned, as he says in the dedication to the Archbishop of Canterbury, by the "unhappy divisions of the Christian world, and the infinite distractions of men's minds." It seeks to "discover the vanity of the insolent boastings of the Papists, that all men may know that we have not departed from the ancient faith, or forsaken the fellowship of the Church Catholic." In the fifth book, which discusses the ministry, he takes the moderate view of episcopacy. "When the Apostles had finished their course, they left none to succeed them . . . yet they authorized presbyters and deacons," etc. (Epistle to the Reader). Field's work has been republished by the Ecclesiastical History Society, 4 vols., Cambridge, 1847. For his life, see Some Short Memorials concerning his Life, by his son, NATHANIEL FIELD, London, 1716, 1717.

FIFTH-MONARCHY MEN, republican and millenarian enthusiasts of the Commonwealth period, who attempted to set up "the kingdom of Jesus," or the fifth monarchy of Daniel. Powell and Feake were the first leaders, and called Cromwell "the dissemblingest perjured villain in the world." They formed a plot in 1657 to murder Cromwell; but it was discovered by Secretary Thurloe, and some of the chief conspirators imprisoned. On Sunday, Jan. 6, 1661, a band numbering about fifty, and headed by Venner, a wine-cooper, rose again in insurrection. They carried a banner with the design of a lion couchant (the lion of the tribe of Judah). They were quickly dispersed, and Venner taken prisoner, and hung. The Independents and Quakers were unjustly accused of being in sympathy with the Fifth-Monarchy Men. See NEAL: Hist. of the Puritans, ii. 176, 220 (Harper's ed.); CARLYLE: Life of Cromwell; STOUGHTON: Rel. in England, new ed., Lond., 1881, vol. ii. pp. 57-60.

FIJI ISLANDS, a group of two hundred and fifty islands in the Southern Pacific, and comprising an area of nearly eight thousand square miles. The two largest are Vanua Levu (Great Land), which is a hundred miles long, and has an average breadth of twenty-five miles, and Viti Levu (Great Viti, or Fiji), which is ninety by fifty miles. Eighty of these islands are inhabited. They are the result of coral and volcanic formation. The climate is delightful, the thermometer seldom rising above 90°. The islands were discovered by Tasman in 1643, and visited by Bligh in 1789, and by Wilson in 1797. The ethnological relations of the Fijians have given much difficulty. They combine characteristics of the Melanesian and Polynesian types. Physically they are an athletic, well-formed race, and mentally they are far above the Papuans. The population was divided up into tribes, and ruled by kings, until 1874, when the islands were annexed to Great Britain. The more powerful chiefs voluntarily proposed the cessation, and signed articles to that effect in October of 1874. Sir Arthur Gordon was appointed the first governor. The advantages accruing to the islands from the annexation have been signal. A code of laws has been adopted, and justice is now administered in courts. When the English governor arrived at the islands in 1875, they were in a state of almost hopeless poverty. A terrible pestilence had carried off, the year previous, one-third of the population. From that time the yearly revenue has rapidly increased from £16,000 in 1875 to £75,150 in 1879. The chief productions are yams, sugarcane, maize, copra (cocoanut), and bananas. The population in 1880 was 110,000 natives, 1,902 Europeans, and 3,200 Polynesians, imported to work on the plantations.

In no part of the world have modern missions had a more glorious triumph than in Fiji. The first missionaries were Messrs. Cross and Cargill, who went in 1835 to Fiji from the Friendly Islands, where Mr. Cross had been laboring for eight, and Mr. Cargill for two years. The religion of the islands was a degrading superstition, and witchcraft was widely practised. The tribes were in a constant state of war with each other. The people wore no covering, except a kilt, four inches wide, around the waist. Their ornaments were limited to whale-teeth: but they took great pride in the dressing of their hair, which was so trained as to form a large bushy covering for the head; and so careful were they to protect it, that, in the place of pillows, they substituted a narrow yoke, one or two inches wide at the top, on which they rested their necks. Polygamy was practised, and the condition of woman was a very inferior one. The wife or wives were strangled at the death of the husband. Life was cheap, the kings sacrificing men at the launching of a new canoe, or the inception of a campaign, or the erection of a house. Cannibalism was also practised on a large scale, although there were some whom the missionaries found averse to eating human flesh. The victims of war, and shipwrecked mariners, were invariably served up on the table. The treatment of women has undergone a complete revolution; and the practice of cannibalism has been entirely given up (except among a few mountain tribes), under the influence of the missionaries.

The English Wesleyans have been left to undisputed control of the islands ever since 1835 by the other Protestant churches. Messrs. Cross and Cargill were re-enforced by Messrs. Lythe and Hunt in 1839, and by Mr. Williams and others in 1840. The work was carried on amidst great discouragements and perils during the first years, but was richly rewarded with extensive revivals, and the gradual conversion of nearly the whole population. Thokombau, the chief king, after resisting the missionaries for a number of years, was baptized January, 1857, after having given up all his wives but one. The language was reduced to writing; and the Bible, Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress, a Fijian-English dictionary (by Rev. David Hazlewood), and other books, have been printed in the native language. There are at present fourteen hundred schools and nine hundred churches. Not only are the church services crowded by devout congregations, but the people seem to be thoroughly in earnest. They have given up polygamy; and most of those who had many wives have put away all but one, and been legally married by the missionaries. The Sabbath is strictly observed, and family-worship scrupulously held. Miss Cumming (governess in Sir Arthur Gordon's family) says, "The first sound that greets your ears in the morning, and the last at night, is the sound of family worship in the village" (p. 86). The same writer, referring to the change that has taken place in the habits of the population, says, "I often wish that some of the cavillers who are forever sneering at Christian missions could see something of their results in these isles" (p. 66). FILIOQUE CONTROVERSY. One of the principal differences between the Eastern and the Western Church is the addition by the latter of the word Filioque to its creed. The Apostles' Creed has simply, "And in the Holy Ghost," to which the Nicene Creed added, "Who proceedeth from the Father." But there the Greek Church stopped; while the Latin Church, without the sanction of an oecumenical council, or even consultation with the Greek Church, still further added, "and the Son" (Filioque). The Greek Church protested as soon as it discovered the addition; and every attempt which afterwards was made to re-establish union between the two churches, has been wrecked on this word.

The addition is met with for the first time in the acts of the third council of Toledo (589), in opposition to Arianism. From Spain it spread into France, where it seems to have been generally adopted at the time of Charlemagne. The councils of Constantinople (681) and of Nicæa (787) did not notice it. But in 809 two monks from the court of Charlemagne made a pilgrimage to the Holy Land, and were accused of heresy by the hermits of Mount Olivet for their use of Filioque. Charlemagne felt provoked; and the council which he convoked at Aix-la-Chapelle (809) sanctioned the use of the addition.

But Pope Leo III., whose confirmation of the decision of the council was asked for by Charlemagne, refused to formally incorporate the Filioque with the Creed, though he admitted the justness and soundness of its doctrinal bearing; and this attitude of cautious reserve the Pope endeavored to maintain so far as he could under the pressure of the steadily-growing impatience of the East and the all but universal practice of the West. Towards the close of the century, however, this attitude became impossible. Photius, in his encyclical letter, emphasizes the Filioque as one of the gravest errors of the Pope; and the Council of Constantinople anathematized it. Political circumstances compelled the Pope to take up the challenge. Nevertheless, the first time a pope actually used the addition to the Creed was in 1014, by Benedict VIII., at the crowning of Henry II. But from that moment the Pope himself appears as the defender of the practice of the Western Church, and at the Council of Ferrara-Florence he seemed to have entirely forgotten, that, at least historically, there was a flaw in his argument.

The doctrine in whose statement the word Filioque was destined to play so prominent a part is called the "Procession of the Holy Ghost." The term comes from John xv. 26, in which Christ speaks of the Spirit of truth who "proceedeth from the Father" (παρὰ τοῦ πατρὸς ἐκπορεύεται). Inasmuch as nothing is said in this passage or in any other of the "double procession," i. e., from both the Father and the Son, the Greek Church holds to the single procession, and defends its position, not only by an appeal to the text of Scripture and to the original form of the Nicene Creed, but also to the "monarchy" (μοναρχία) of the Father as the sole fountain, root, and cause of the deity. It distinguishes sharply between the eternal metaphysical procession of the Spirit from the Father alone, and the temporal mission of the Spirit by the Father and the Son (John xiv. 26, xvi. 7). The former belongs to the trinity of essence, the latter to the trinity of revelation, and begins with the Day of Pentecost. The Latin Church defends the double procession on the grounds of the double mission of the Spirit and the essential unity of the Son with the Father; so that, if the Spirit proceed from the essence of the Father, he must also proceed from the essence of the Son, because they have the same essence. The Greek patriarchs declined to attend the Vatican Council of 1870, on the ground of the heresy of the Latin Church upon this point.

A compromise was suggested from the writings of John of Damascus, to say that the Spirit proceeds from the Father, through the Son. This was accepted by the conference held in Bonn (August, 1875) between the Old Catholics, Orientals, and Anglo-Catholics, in which the Filioque was surrendered as an unauthorized addition to the Creed.

FILLAN (the Scotch form of the Irish Faelan) is the name of two Iro-Scotch saints. The one whose festival falls on June 20 had his chief churches at Ballyheyland, Queen's County, Ireland, and at the eastern end of Loch Earn, Perthshire, Scotland. The other, whose festival falls on Jan. 9, had his chief churches at Cluain Maoscna, Westmeath County, Ireland, and at Strathfillan, Perthshire, Scotland. The legend of the latter is found in Act. Sanct., Jan. 9, Tom. I. p. 594, and in FORBES, Kal. Scot. Saints, 342.

FINLAND, The Christianization of, is the common story of the Roman-Catholic missions in the middle ages, — the conquest of the country, the forced baptism of the people, the building of fortresses, and the establishment of bishoprics. The Finns, a branch of the Uralo-Altaic family, and allied to the Magyars, lived in scattered settlements throughout Northern Europe at the time when the migration of the nations began. Pushed farther towards the North by the Germanic peoples and the Russians, they seemed in many places to melt away; and Finland, the large peninsula between the Bothnian Gulf and Gulf of Finland, is the only part of Europe in which a Finnish tribe succeeded in maintaining itself as a nation up to our time. The country comprises an area of 144,221 square miles, with 1,912,647 inhabitants, according to the census of 1875.

On account of their sombre and savage religious rites, the ancient Finns had the reputation, among their neighbors, of being a nation of sorcerers and magicians; and their passion for piracy and plunder was, of course, not suited to mend the reputation. Sweden was especially exposed to their attacks; and in the middle of the twelfth century the Swedish king, Eric the Saint, determined to put a stop to their disturbances. As the war was waged against heathens, the campaign became a crusade; and Archbishop Henry of Upsala, an Englishman by birth, accompanied the king. After landing in Finland (1157), Eric completely defeated the Finnish army, baptized those of the soldiers he did not slay, built the fortress of Åbo, and established a bishopric at Rendamecki. Christianity, however, did not make great progress in the country. Some Finns came and paid their tithes, in ermine, at Rendamecki; but the great majority of them remained heathen, and Henry was killed. Even the political ascendancy of Sweden waned away; and small support for it was derived from the elevation of the slain Henry to a saint, and the patron of the country. But in 1248 Birger Jarl made a new campaign, and built the fortress Tavaste; and in 1293, under the reign of the young King Birger, the Swedish chancellor, Torkil Knutson, completed the conquest of the whole country, built the fortress of Wiborg, moved the episcopal see from Rendamecki to Åbo, and made Finland a Christian province. It was found, however, when in the sixteenth century the Reformation was introduced in the country from Sweden, that most of the inhabitants, even such as regularly paid their ermine tithe, lived in utter ignorance of Christianity, and in open enjoyment of their heathen license. In Finland the Lutheran minister was a missionary rather than a reformer.

In 1809 the country came under Russia, but a considerable measure of national independence was granted to it. The Czar of Russia bears the title of Grand Duke of Finland; yet the government of all the interior, especially the ecclesiastical affairs of the country, is completely separated from that of Russia. Of the population, ninety-eight per cent belong to the Lutheran Church, and only two per cent to the Græco-Russian Church or other denominations; but there is complete freedom for other religious bodies. The Lutheran Church is represented by the Archbishop of Åbo, the Bishops of Borgå and Kuopio, and an ecclesiastical assembly, consisting of thirty-four clerical and fifty lay members, and convened every ten years. The country has four hundred and forty-eight primary schools, besides a number of itinerant teachers in the more sparingly settled regions, three seminaries, and a university with a flourishing theological faculty. The official language is Finnish. Swedish is spoken only in a few parishes. See RUEH: Finnland und seine Bewohner, Leipzig, 1808; and Bishop REUTER-

FINLEY, James Bradley, a distinguished pioneer of Methodism in Ohio; b. in North Carolina, July 1, 1781; d. at Cincinnati, Sept. 6, 1856. Joining the Ohio Conference in 1809, he was made presiding elder 1816. In 1821 he was sent to the Wyandotte Indians, where his labors were attended with much success. From 1845 to 1849 he was chaplain of the Ohio Penitentiary. He was a man of rugged eloquence and large influence. His chief works are Wyandotte Mission, Sketches of Western Methodism (Cincinnati, 1857), Life among the Indians (Cincinnati, 1857), Memoirs of Prison Life (Cincinnati, 1860).

FINLEY, Robert, D.D., a Presbyterian divine; b. in Princeton, 1772; d. at Athens, Ga., 1817. He graduated from Princeton College in his sixteenth year. After studying theology under Dr. Witherspoon, he became pastor at Basking Ridge, N.J., 1795. In 1803 a powerful revival was felt in his church, a hundred and twenty persons being admitted at one communion. He took a very prominent part in the organization of the Colonization Society (1816). In 1817 he accepted the presidency of the University of Georgia (Franklin College), located at Athens, where he died a few months after. Several of his sermons were published during his lifetime.

FINLEY, Samuel, D.D., a Presbyterian divine, and president of Princeton College; b. in Ireland, 1715; d. July 17, 1766. He came to America in 1734, and studied, so it is supposed, under Mr. Tennent in Log College. Licensed in 1740 by the presbytery of New Brunswick, he co-operated vigorously with the friends of revival preaching. In 1743 he was called to Milford, Conn., but was before many months expelled from the colony for preaching, in violation of the statute, in another pulpit than his own. In 1744 he was called to Nottingham, Md., where he established an academy which educated some prominent men. In 1761 he was chosen the successor of President Davies at Princeton College. Died and was buried in Philadelphia. Several of Dr. Finley's sermons were published during his lifetime, the principal of which were one on Matt. xii. 28, Christ triumphing, and Satan raging (1741), and The Curse of Meroz (1757).

FINNAN, a native of Ireland, and monk at Iona; was made Bishop of Lindisfarne 652, with charge of the whole of Northumbria, and d. there Aug. 31, 661. He was a very active and energetic man, and successful as a missionary also beyond the boundaries of Northumbria. He consecrated Cædmon, and baptized Peada, king of Mercia, and Siegbert, king of the East Saxons. But he belonged to the Culdee Church, and was strongly opposed to Rome, especially to the Roman manner of observing Easter. See BEDE: Hist. Eccl., III. 21-25.

FINNEY, Charles G., a powerful revivalist preacher, and president of Oberlin College; was b. at Warren, Litchfield County, Conn., Aug. 29, 1792; d. at Oberlin, O., Aug. 16, 1875. When he was only two years old, his parents removed to Western New York. This placed him beyond the reach of any thing more than a common-school education. At seventeen he began to teach, and in 1818 to study law at Adams, in Western New York. Neither of his parents was a church-member, nor did he up to his twentieth year enjoy any but the most meagre opportunities of hearing the gospel. His conversion in 1821 was remarkable for its suddenness, thoroughness, and the definitely marked stages of his experience. Feeling an immediate call to preach, he forsook the law, held prayer-meetings, was received under care of presbytery (1822), and licensed to preach 1824. He at once turned his attention to revival labors, which were continued, with few interruptions, until 1860, when he was forced to give up the work of an itinerant evangelist on account of age. These labors, beginning in Western and Central New York, were extended to Boston, New York, Philadelphia, and other cities of the East, and reached to England, which Mr. Finney visited in 1849 and 1858, preaching with much power. In 1832 he accepted a call to the pastorate of the Second Free Church of New-York City, and, two years later, another to the recently organized Congregational Church known as the Broadway Tabernacle. In 1835 he went to Oberlin as professor, where he continued to labor till the time of his death as instructor of theology, pastor, and college president (1852). During his residence at Oberlin he still continued, as before, to hold revival meetings in Eastern cities until 1860.

Mr. Finney's career naturally falls under the two heads of revivalist preacher and theological teacher. His power as a preacher was very great; and his labors produced, in many places, wonderful effects. Wherever he went, extensive revivals prevailed. His manner was vigorous, direct, and personal. He used simple language and illustrations. His presentation was clear, and strictly logical. He directed his appeals to the conscience, rather than the affections, and made it tremble and quake by the most searching analysis of the motives of the heart. On one occasion he says, "Everybody was out at meeting, and the Lord let me loose upon them in a wonderful manner" (Autobiog., p. 100). He chose for themes those passages which delineate the sinner's condition as one of conscious alienation from God, and sinning against him. He dwelt upon the enmity of the carnal mind, the want of holiness, and the certain destruction of the impenitent. He called upon his hearers to come to an immediate decision, and submit to God. "Instead of telling sinners," he says, "to use the means of grace, and pray for a new heart, I called on them to make themselves a new heart and spirit, and pressed the duty of immediate surrender to God" (Autobiog., p. 189). These meetings were often accompanied by violent bodily manifestations; and Mr. Finney practised the methods of calling upon the audiences to go forward to the anxious-bench, or to rise in attestation of new resolutions. These attendant circumstances, and Mr. Finney's methods of preaching, early evoked criticism and strong opposition. Mr. Nettleton and Dr. Beecher were among the opponents of the "new measures;" and a convention was held in July, 1827, at New Lebanon, of prominent ministers (such as Dr. Hawes of Hartford, Edwards of Andover, Beecher of Boston, Beman of Troy, etc.), to take the whole matter into consideration. However, with better information, the opposition decreased. Mr. Finney's preaching reached all classes; lawyers and educated men being particularly convinced by it, as notably at Rochester.

As a teacher at Oberlin, Mr. Finney's influence was also great. He was an original thinker, and very positive in his convictions. His lectures on theology define his position as a theologian. It is here not necessary to do more than merely state some of the main and distinguishing views. He held to the plenary ability of the sinner to repent, regarded happiness as the chief aim, and explained regeneration (which he did not clearly distinguish from conversion) to consist of an act of the will, rather than an act of the Holy Spirit. He exerted a shaping influence over the minds of his students; and his theology, in a modified form, had a wide acceptance in his own denomination in the West.

LIT.—Mr. Finney's works are: Lectures on Revivals, Boston, 1835, passed through many editions (new and enlarged edition, Oberlin, 1868); Lectures to Professing Christians, Oberlin, 1836; Sermons on Important Subjects, New York, 1839; Lectures on Theology, Oberlin, 1846, new ed., 1878, republished in London. FINTAN, a native of Leinster, Ireland; was carried off by a swarm of marauding Northmen, but escaped, and spent two years on the coast of Caithness with a bishop; went thence to Rome, and from Rome to Switzerland, where he entered the monastery of Rheingaw, or Rheinau, in the canton of Zürich, as a monk. In 800 he retired from the monastery, and lived to his death (in 827) as a hermit in the neighborhood, practising the most austere asceticism. FIRKOWITSCH, Abraham, a Jewish archaeologist; b. at Lutzk, in the Crimea, 1786; d. 1874; deserves mention for his lifelong labors in collecting Hebrew manuscripts, biblical and other, fifteen thousand of which he deposited in the Imperial Library at St. Petersburg. He was a Carait, and it was his interest in the authors of his sect which determined him to devote his life to finding as much as he could about them. Many of his manuscripts have probably considerable critical value in determining the Hebrew text of the Old Testament.

FIRMILIAN, Bishop of Cæsarea in Cappadocia; d. at Tarsus in 269; was a friend of Origen, and one of the leaders of the Church of Asia Minor. According to Eusebius, he took a prominent part in the close of the Montanist controversy, in the opening of the Trinitarian controversies, and in the discussion of the validity of baptism by a heretic. The only literary monument of him which has come down to us relates to the last-mentioned point,—an elaborate letter to Cyprian, of which a Latin translation is found among Cyprian's letters (No. 75). As Firmilian in this letter shows himself very decidedly opposed to the Bishop of Rome, Roman church-historians have tried first to suppress the letter, afterwards to make its genuineness suspected; but in both they have failed. KLAIBER.

FIRST-BORN (בְּכוֹרִים, πρωτότοκος). The first-born males of human beings and animals were, according to the Mosaic law, to be sacred unto the Lord. The first-born of human beings was not to be killed, but was to be dedicated to the service of the sanctuary. This original institution was afterwards altered, since, in place of all the first-born, the whole tribe of Levi was appointed to assist Aaron and his sons in public worship (Num. iii. 12); whilst the male first-born among the other tribes were to be presented in the temple when one month old, and were to be redeemed according to the estimation of the priests (Exod. xiii. 13; Num. xviii. 16 sq.). The orthodox Jews still observe this law of redemption, with this difference, that the rabbi takes the place of the priest, who, having received the price of redemption, swings it round the head of the infant, in token of his vicarious authority, saying, "This is for the first-born, this is in lieu of it, this redeems it; and let this son be spared for life, for the law of God, and for the fear of Heaven. May it please thee, that, as he was spared for redemption, so he may be spared for the law, for matrimony, and for good works. Amen." The rabbi lays his hand upon the child's head, and blesses it, as follows: "The Lord make thee as Ephraim and Manasseh." When the first-born son is thirteen years of age, he fasts the day before the Feast of Passover. The redemption of the first-born of animals seems to have wholly disappeared after the destruction of the temple. The first-born of unclean animals, since it could not be offered, was either to be redeemed according to the valuation of the priest, with the addition of one-fifth of the value, and then remain with the owner, or be sold, and the price given to the priest (Lev. xxvii. 11-13, 27). The first-born of an ass had to be redeemed with a lamb, or, if not redeemed, put to death (Exod. xiii. 13; Num. xviii. 15). The first-born of every clean animal, from eight days to twelve months, provided it had no blemish, had to be taken to Jerusalem, and delivered to the priest, who offered it as a sacrifice to Jehovah, sprinkled its blood upon the altar, burned the fat, and ate the flesh (Num. xviii. 15-17); but, if it had any blemish, it was not to be sacrificed, but eaten up at home, whilst the blood was to be poured upon the ground (Deut. xv. 19-23). As among most nations, the male first-born among the Israelites enjoyed special prerogatives over the younger brethren, as is indicated in many passages of the Old Testament (comp. Gen. xlix. 3; 2 Chron. xxi. 3). W. PRESSEL (B. PICE).

FIRST-FRUITS. From the very first pages of the Sacred Writings (Gen. iv. 3 sq.) we learn that a feeling of gratitude toward the Giver of all good was shown by the first men in offering the first-fruits, or the first and best which they had. What seems to have been at first a natural feeling was afterwards regulated among the Hebrews by the Mosaic law, which ordained the following first-fruit offerings. (a) On the morrow after the Passover sabbath (i.e., on the 16th of Nisan) a sheaf of new corn was to be brought to the priest, and waved before the altar. This offering was accompanied by a lamb as sacrifice, two tenth-deals of flour, and a drink offering of a fourth part of a hin of wine (Exod. xxix. 39 sq.; Lev. xxiii. 9 sq.). (b) Seven weeks from this time (i.e., at the Feast of Pentecost), an oblation was to be made of two loaves made of two tenth-deals of flour. They were accompanied by a burnt offering of seven lambs, one young bullock, and two rams, a meat and drink offering, a sin offering of one kid of the goats, and two lambs for a peace offering, which were waved with the loaves, but afterwards belonged to the priests (Lev. xxiii. 17 sq.). (c) The Feast of Ingathering (i.e., the Feast of Tabernacles), in the seventh month, was itself an acknowledgment of the fruits of the harvest (Exod. xxxiv. 22; Lev. xxiii. 39).

Besides these stated occasions, every Israelite was to consecrate to the Lord a part of the first-fruit of the land; as of oil, honey, dough, wool,—in fact, of every thing. The fruits of every newly-planted tree were not to be eaten or sold, or used in any way for the first three years, but considered “uncircumcised,” or unclean. In the fourth year, however, the first-fruits were to be consecrated to the Lord, and in the fifth year became available to the owner (Lev. xix. 23 sq.). As the quantity of these offerings was not fixed by the law, but was left to the good will of the individual (Deut. xvi. 10), tradition has laid down rules and regulations, with such minuteness as only rabbinism is capable of; and the Talmudic treatises Biccurin and Therumoth (cf. art. Talmud) are especially full on this matter. For a description of a Biccurin procession, see DELITZSCH: Jewish Artisan Life at the Time of Jesus, Eng. trans., Lond., 1877, p. 94 sqq. (Ger. orig., p. 66 sqq.).

FISCH, George, D.D., b. at Nyon, Canton de Vaud, Switzerland, July 6, 1814; d. at Vallorbes, Switzerland, Sunday, July 3, 1881. He studied theology at Lausanne, and was for five years pastor of a small German church at Vevey; but in 1846 he was called to Lyons, France, to be assistant preacher to Adolphe Monod, of the Free Church, whom he subsequently succeeded. In 1855 he was called to Paris as the colleague of Pressensé. He was warmly attached to the cause of the Free churches, and took part in the Constitutional Synod of 1849, which formed the union of the Evangelical churches of France. From 1863 till his death he was president of the Synodal Commission, and thus directed the work of the Free churches. He was one of the founders of the Evangelical Alliance, and “the very soul of the branch of this society in France,” an active member of different home and foreign missionary societies, particularly interested in South-African missions and in Mr. McAll’s mission in Paris. But in every way he labored to advance the gospel. He was remarkably gifted, and used his powers to the utmost. Twice he visited the United States (in 1861 and in 1873), coming the last time as a delegate to the Evangelical Alliance Conference held in New York, Oct. 2–12. He was also a delegate to the First Council of the Presbyterian Alliance in Edinburgh, July 3–10, 1877.

FISH, Henry Clay, b. at Halifax, Vt., Jan. 27, 1820; d. in Newark, N.J., Oct. 2, 1877. He was graduated from Union Seminary, New York, in 1845; entered the Baptist ministry, and after a five-years’ pastorate at Somerville, N.J., came to the First Baptist Church of Newark, 1850, and was its pastor when he died. He was very successful, attracting large audiences, and making a profound impression. His preaching was essentially revivalistic. He was an ardent and efficient worker in extending the Baptist Church. Notwithstanding his devoted pastoral labors, he found time to prepare several meritorious works: Primitive Piety Revived, Boston, 1855 (20,000 copies sold in two years); History and Repository of Pulpit Eloquence, N.Y., 1856, 2 vols., new ed. in 1 vol., 1877; Pulpit Eloquence of the Nineteenth Century, N.Y., 1857, new ed., 1875; Select Discourses from the German and French, N.Y., 1858; Heaven in Song, N.Y., 1874 (a poetical compilation); Handbook of Revivals, Boston, 1874; Bible Lands, Hartford, 1876 (based upon his visit in 1874).

FISHER, John, Bishop of Rochester; was b. at Beverley, Yorkshire, in 1459, and beheaded at Tower Hill, June 22, 1535. He was educated at Cambridge, where he subsequently became master of Michael House. Taking orders, he was appointed chaplain and confessor to Margaret, the mother of Henry VII.; in 1501 was elected Chancellor of Cambridge, and 1504 consecrated Bishop of Rochester. He took a deep interest in the revival of learning, and began himself the study of Greek in his sixtieth year. Among his friends were Reuchlin and Erasmus. He was by no means blind to the clerical abuses of the time, but had no sympathy with the Reformation ideas which began to prevail in the latter years of his life. Following the king’s example, he published an able rejoinder to Luther’s tract, De Babyl. Captivitate. He was one of the chief advisers of Henry VIII. until the divorce with Catharine began to be agitated. In 1531 he signed the formula constituting the sovereign the supreme head of the Church, with the limiting statement, “so far as the law of Christ permits,” but resisted all further attempts to divorce the Church in England from the Pope. In the debate upon the suppression of the monasteries he showed himself the spirited champion of the clergy. He opposed the divorce of the king strenuously, and wrote a pamphlet against it. In 1533 Parliament found him guilty of treason for concealing prophetic utterances of the Maid of Kent, who, it was assumed, with accomplices, had entertained a plot against the king’s life. Fisher was released from prison on payment of a fine of three hundred pounds. In 1534 he refused assent to the Supremacy Act, and with Sir Thomas More was sent to the Tower. The Pope sent him a cardinal's hat to protect him; but this served only to exasperate the king, by whose orders he was executed.

FISK, Pliny, a devoted American missionary in Syria; b. in Shelburne, Mass., June 24, 1792; d. at Beyrout, Oct. 23, 1825. He graduated at Middlebury College (1814) and Andover Seminary. On Sept. 23, 1818, the prudential committee of the American Board of Missions determined to establish a mission in Palestine, and the same day appointed Levi Parsons and Fisk missionaries. The latter was ordained at Salem, Nov. 5, 1818; and after spending a year in Georgia and South Carolina, collecting money for the Board, he embarked with Parsons for the East. The first years after their arrival were spent at Smyrna and the Island of Scio, seventy miles off. In January, 1822, he went to Alexandria, where Parsons soon after died. He finally settled down between Jerusalem and Beyrout, distributing tracts and Bibles, and preaching. He died at the age of thirty-three, in Beyrout, a few days after separating from Dr. King, but tenderly cared for by Dr. Goodell. Fisk was a man of much missionary enthusiasm; and, as one of the founders of the thriving missionary station at Beyrout, his work lives on. See ALVAN BOND: Memoir of P. Fisk, Boston, 1828; ANDERSON: Oriental Missions, Boston, 1872, i. 1-33.

FISK, Wilbur, D.D., first president of Wesleyan University; b. in Brattleborough, Vt., Aug. 31, 1792; d. at Middletown, Conn., Feb. 22, 1830. After graduating at Brown University, he gave himself up to the study of law, but soon changed his mind, and became an itinerant preacher in the Methodist Church. In 1826 he was made principal of the Wilbraham Academy, and in 1830 of the new university at Middletown, Conn. While travelling in Europe in 1835 he was elected bishop, but declined the office. Dr. Fisk was a saintly man and an enthusiastic educator. Among his works are The Calvinistic Controversy (N.Y., 1837), Travels in Europe (N.Y., 1838), Sermons and Lectures on Universalism. See HOLDICII, Life of W. Fisk, N.Y., 1842.

FIVE-MILE ACT (called also OXFORD ACT, the session of Parliament which passed it having met at Oxford), entitled "An Act to restrain Nonconformists from inhabiting Corporations," was promoted by Clarendon, Archbishop Sheldon, and others, and passed by Parliament in 1665. It enjoined upon all nonconformists an oath not to take up arms against the king, or attempt any "alteration of government either in Church or State." It forbade their approach within five miles of any corporation represented in Parliament, or any place where they had preachers, on penalty of a fine of forty pounds for each offence. A penalty of forty pounds was also enacted against those who, refusing to take the oath, taught school or kept boarders. Any offence against the act might be punished with six months' imprisonment. This legislation caused intense suffering among the nonconformists, only very few of whom took the oath. See NEAL: Hist. of Puri- tans, ii. p. 255 sqq. (Harper's ed.); GREEN: Hist. of Engl. People, iii. 375 sq. (Harper's ed.).

FIVE POINTS OF CALVINISM, a theological term indicating the five characteristic tenets of Calvinism as opposed to Arminianism. They were defended by the synod of Dort (1618, 1619) in answer to the Five Articles of the Arminians or Remonstrants, put forth in 1610. They are particular predestination, limited atonement, natural inability, irresistible grace, and the perseverance of saints. The best special discussions of the Five Points are by WHITBY (Lond., 1710) on the Arminian side, and GILL (Cause of God and Truth, 4 vols., London, 1735-38) and JONATHAN DICKINSON (Philadelphia, 1741) on the Calvinistic. See ARMINIANISM and CALVINISM.

FLACIUS (VLACICH), Matthias, b. March 3, 1520, at Albona in Istria (hence the surname Illyricus); d. at Francfort, March 11, 1575; was very early sent to Venice to study ancient languages, and was about to enter a monastery and become a monk, when a relative of his, Baldus Lupetinus, provincial of the Minorites, advised him to go to Germany, and study theology there. He visited first Basel (1539), then Augsburg, and came in 1541 to Wittenberg, where he was kindly received by Luther and Melanchthon; and in 1544 was appointed professor in Hebrew. He also lectured on the Epistles of Paul and on Aristotle; but his activity was suddenly interrupted by the outbreak of the Smalcaldian war. He fled to Brunswick, where he lived by teaching school; but, though he was recalled by the elector Maurice, the establishment of the Leipzig Interim drove him away again, and he settled at Magdeburg (1549), where printing and publication were still free. The literary activity he there developed against the Interim, in the adiaphoristic controversy and in the Osiander, Schwenkfeld, and Major controversies, was very comprehensive, and of great influence; but it placed him in direct opposition to Melanchthon. And when, in 1557, he was appointed professor at Jena, together with Musæus and Wigand, Jena became the headquarters of the strict Lutheran party, as Wittenberg was that of the Philippists. In the beginning he exercised great influence on the development of affairs in Saxony, but, having lost the confidence of the duke, he was discharged in 1561, and went to Regensburg. There he endeavored to found an academy, but his plans were frustrated by his enemies. In 1566 the magistrates of the city even withdrew their protection, and he was glad to accept an invitation to Antwerp. The progress, however, of the Spanish army, soon compelled him to leave that city; and he betook himself to Francfort. Meanwhile a somewhat hasty utterance of his raised the storm of persecution into a very whirlwind. In an essay accompanying his Clavis, he declared (1567) hereditary sin to be the very substance of human nature since the fall; and this untenable proposition was immediately made the basis for an accusation of Manichæism. Even his old friends from Jena, ultra-Lutherans like himself, attacked him in the harshest manner; and every thing he did in order to come to an understanding with them was in vain. Expelled from Francfort, he went to Strassburg; expelled from Strassburg, too, he returned to Francfort, but was hardly allowed to die there.

That there was something narrow and exclusive in his stand-point, something obstinate and bitter in his polemics, cannot be denied. The sad fate which overtook him may not have been altogether undeserved. But the great ability of the man, and the fundamental integrity of his character, are proven by his brilliant scientific performances, — the Catalogus testium veritatis, answering the Romanist's objection to the Reformation as a mere innovation; the Magdeburg Centuries, of which he was the originator and leading spirit (see CENTURIES, MAGDEBURG); and the Clavis scripturæ sacræ, the basis of biblical hermeneutics. The antipathy which for centuries has clung to his name is unjust. W. Preger has recently vindicated his memory by his excellent work, Matthias Flaccius Illyricus und seine Zeit, Erlangen, 1859–61. [See also J. W. SCHULTE, Beiträge zur Entstehungsgeschichte d. Magdeburger Centurien, Niesse, 1877.]

G. PLITT.

FLAGELLANTS (Flagellantes), Brothers of the Cross (crucifrates), Crossbearers (cruciferi), Brothers in White (so called because of their dress), and Independents (acephali, because they had broken with the hierarchy), are the names of morbid fanatics from the thirteenth to the fifteenth century. The prelude to the Flagellant pilgrimages was the fraternity brought into life by the preaching of Anthony of Padua [about 1210]. The men composing it went about in large bodies, singing, and scourging themselves. In 1260–61 many of the inhabitants of the Guelph city of Perugia began suddenly, as if vehemently moved by a mighty spirit of repentance, to flagellate themselves with leather thongs. High and low, and young, went together in procession two and two, with bodies bared above the waist, through the streets. Their numbers increased like an avalanche. Some marched through Lombardy to Provence; others went to Rome. The Pope did not molest them, as they did not resist the ecclesiastical authorities; and a perceptible improvement in morals, the reconciliation of enemies, and generous gifts of alms, attested the sincerity of their penance.

In Italy the enthusiasm soon cooled; but beyond the Alps it broke out afresh, and in 1261 large bodies of Flagellants marched through Bavaria, Saxony, the Upper Rhine country, Austria, Bohemia, and Poland. They marched two or three abreast, with body bared above the waist, and face veiled. They were preceded by flags or crosses, and flagellated themselves twice a day for thirty-three days, in memory of the thirty-three years of our Lord's life. They accompanied the strokes of the scourge with the music of hymns (among which was the Stabat Mater of Jacopone da Todi). At first priests were found in the ranks. But the Flagellants soon came to be accused of opposing the hierarchy; and the clergy not only separated themselves from their company, but preached against them, and persecuted them, so that by the end of the year hardly a vestige was left in Germany of their existence.

The movement was at its height in the fourteenth century. They made their first appearance again in Italy. A mighty impetus was given by the terrible plague which in 1347–49 ran through Europe, carrying off 60,000 people in Florence, 100,000 in Venice, 1,200,000 in Germany, not to mention other cities and lands. While many gave full sway to their passions, and some sat down in despair, others gave themselves up to self-inflicted flagellations, in the hope of appeasing the divine anger, and with the purpose of preparing for the end of the world, which they regarded as being near at hand. On the 17th of April, 1349, the first Flagellant fraternity appeared in Magdeburg. This was quickly followed by others in Würzburg, Speier, and Strassburg. They were regarded with awe on all sides; and the movement spread throughout all Germany, and extended to Denmark and England. Women were also found in the ranks. There was a regular organization, and conditions of membership. The candidate had to have the permission of his wife, promise obedience, have at least four shillings and fourpence to defray expenses, as begging was prohibited, etc. When they came to towns, the bands marched in regular military order, and singing hymns. At the time of flagellation they selected a square, or churchyard, or field. Taking off their shoes and stockings, and forming a circle, they girded themselves with aprons, and laid down flat on the ground. The particular position or gesture of each signified his chief sin. ["They fell on their back, side, or belly, according to the nature of their sin" (Chron. Thuring.)]. The leader, then stepping over each one, touched them with the whip, and bade them rise. As each was touched, they followed after the leader, and imitated him. Once all on their feet, the flagellation began. The brethren went two by two around the whole circle, striking their backs till the blood trickled down from the wounds. The whip consisted of three thongs, each with four iron teeth. During the flagellation a hymn was sung. After all had gone around the circle, the whole body again fell on the ground, beating upon their breasts. On arising they flagellated themselves a second time. While the brethren were putting on their clothes, a collection was taken up among the audience. The scene was concluded by the reading of a letter from Christ which an angel had brought to earth, and which commended the pilgrimages of the Flagellants. The fraternities never tarried longer than a single day in a town. They gained great popularity, and it was considered an honor to entertain them.

The feeling, however, underwent a complete change. The Flagellants began to be a burden to the people. Nine thousand passed through Strassburg alone in three months. The clergy inveighed against their assumption. The arrival of a band at Avignon was finally the occasion for Clement VI. to issue a bull (Oct. 20, 1349) forbidding their pilgrimages, and commanding the authorities in Church and State to suppress them. This was efficacious; and only now and then did the enthusiasm break out again. The trial of a Flagellant in Anhalt, 1481, is the last vestige of the movement in Germany.

The fraternities which appeared at the end of the fourteenth century, in Italy, France, and Spain, were of a different character, but likewise pleaded a divine command. Christ and Mary appeared to a peasant, and revealed that the destruction of the world could only be averted on condition of a Flagellant pilgrimage. In 1398 large bands appeared in Genoa, clad in long white garments which covered the head, and had only two holes for the eyes. Priests and bishops joined them. But in 1399 Boniface IX. had one of their number executed, and the fanaticism disappeared. The Council of Constance took the matter under discussion [and Gerson wrote a tract against them, Contra Sectum Flagellantium]. Flagellating fraternities existed in France in the sixteenth century, were used by Henry III., and suppressed by Henry IV. [So late as 1820 a procession of Flagellants passed through the streets of Lisbon.]

HERZOG.

FLAVEL, John, an eminent English Nonconformist divine, the son of a minister; b. in Worcestershire about 1627; d. in Exeter, June 26, 1691. He was educated at Oxford, and became curate of Deptford. From there he went to Dartmouth in 1656. By the Act of Uniformity he was deprived of his living, with two thousand others, and retired to Hudscott Hall, in Devonshire, where he was liberally supported by the lord of the domain. He preached privately in the woods and remote places, until, at the expulsion of the Stuarts, he returned to Dartmouth, and labored as pastor of the Nonconformist Church. Flavel was a prolific writer on practical religion; and some of his works are eminently adapted to stimulate piety. His principal works are: Husbandry Spiritualized; The Fountain of Life Opened up (in forty-two sermons); The Soul of Man; Exposition of the Assembly's Shorter Catechism; Seaman's Companion (in six sermons), etc. Complete editions of his works, London, 1701, 2 vols., and London, 1820, in 6 vols. The American Tract Society publishes in cheap form his Fountain of Life, Method of Grace, On Keeping the Heart, etc.

FLAVIANUS, Patriarch of Antioch (381-404), sprung from a rich and distinguished family, but devoted himself from early youth to a life of severe asceticism. While still a layman, he and his friend Diodorus, afterwards Bishop of Tarsus, formed the centre of the opposition to the Arian tendencies of Bishop Leontius. By Meletius he was made a presbyter; and in 381 he accompanied the bishop to the Council of Constantinople. During the council, Meletius died; and Flavianus was chosen his successor, against the advice of Gregory Nazianzen, who understood that thereby the Meletian schism would be continued, and the difficulties of a reconciliation with Rome aggravated. Flavianus encountered, indeed, much opposition as a bishop, but showed great energy and decision, and was finally recognized by Rome. Chrysostom was a pupil of his. The Messalians he treated with great hardness. In 387, when the Antiochians, during a riot, had pulled down the statue of the emperor, Flavian made a voyage to Constantinople, and succeeded in appeasing the wrath of Theodosius. See SOCRATES: Hist. Eccl., V.; SOZOMEN: Hist. Eccl., VIII.; THEOPHORET: Hist. Eccl., II.

FLAVIANUS succeeded Proclus as Bishop of Constantinople, in 447, and played a prominent part in the Eutychian controversy. Deposed by the synod of Ephesus (449), he died, on his way into exile, at Epipa in Lydia. But on the accession of Marcian and Pulcheria a re-action set in. His remains were brought to Constantinople, and interred in the Church of the Apostles, with great solemnity; and his name was inscribed among those of the martyrs. See Act. Sanct. III, Feb., and the article EUTYCHES.

FLÉCHIER, Esprit, b. at Pernes, in the county of Avignon, June 10, 1632; d. at Montpellier, Feb. 16, 1710; was educated by the Jesuits, and studied theology in Paris, but devoted himself chiefly to poetry, and attracted some attention by a Latin poem on a grand tournament held by Louis XIV. Compelled to leave Paris on account of poverty, he lived for some time in the country, as a tutor and school-teacher, but returned again to Paris, and gained soon a high reputation as a preacher. Especially his funeral orations became very celebrated; and in 1673 he became a member of the Academy, together with Racine. In 1685 he was made Bishop of Lavaur, and in 1687 of Nîmes. As a bishop he was greatly beloved, even by the Protestants, who hid in his diocese on account of his mildness and great benevolence. A collected edition of his works appeared, in 10 vols., at Nîmes, 1782. His life was written by A. DELACROIX, Paris, 1865, 2 vols.

FLEETWOOD, John, the name, probably assumed, under which a Life of Christ, Lives of the Apostles, John the Baptist, and the Virgin Mary, usually found together, were issued. These have very frequently been printed. Before the modern elaborate Lives of Christ, which are far superior in point of scholarship, appeared, Fleetwood's was almost the only one found in Christian families. Two other volumes, The Christian Prayer-Book, Lond., 1772, and The Christian's Dictionary, 1773, are attributed to him.

FLEETWOOD, William, a learned English prelate; b. in London, Jan. 21, 1650; d. at Tottenham, Middlesex, Aug. 4, 1723. He was educated at Cambridge; became Canon of Windsor 1702, Bishop of St. Asaph 1706, and of Ely 1714. He was one of the most eloquent preachers of his day. A complete collection of his Sermons, Tracts, etc., appeared at London, 1737; Complete Works, 3 vols., Oxford, 1854.

FLESH (σάρξ) Biblical Meaning of. The Bible has different representations of man's material nature. The term "flesh" is always used with reference to man's body; so that Chrysostom's comment on Gal. v. 16 is any thing but precise,—"The flesh (σάρξ) is not the body, nor the essence of the body, but the evil disposition, the earthly, lustful, and lawless reason." The same is true of Julius Müller's definition,—"The flesh is the tendency or inclination of human life turned away from God, the life and movement of man in the midst of the things of this visible world." The flesh is regarded as being endowed with mind, φρόνημα (Rom. viii. 6), desire, or lust, ἐπιθυμία (Gal. v. 16, 1 John ii. 16), will, θέλημα (Eph. ii. 3), etc. It cannot, therefore, stand for a disposition of the will. But as κόσμος ("world") designates, not a tendency of the world hostile to God, but the world with that tendency, so σάρξ ("flesh") designates, not a tendency or disposition of the flesh, but the flesh itself with that disposition.

Flesh is the substance of the body. It is sometimes used with the bones, as constituting the body (Luke xxiv. 39), or with blood (1 Cor. xv. 50). By synecdoche it is used for the body (Ps. xvi. 9; 2 Cor. x. 3). This use of the term is a Hebrew idiom, and is really foreign to the Greek; so that the LXX. often translate the Hebrew word בשר ("flesh") by σῶμα ("body"). The expression "all flesh" is sometimes used for the race in its totality (Gen. vi. 17), but usually for the race as human (Gen. vi. 12; Luke iii. 6, etc.).

We are thus led to the peculiarity of the biblical use of the word. It designates man, because man appears through it, and manifests his nature by it. Thus, as flesh, he is weak and frail, "a wind that passeth away" (Ps. lxxviii. 39). Flesh is not spirit, nor vital power (Isa. xxxi. 3), but stands in living and moral contrast to spirit, the spirit of God (Deut. v. 26).

Flesh also indicates the peculiarity of man's visible or tangible nature. Thus it is opposed to πνεῦμα, or spirit (Col. ii. 1, 5); and a distinguishing characteristic of the earthly life is that it is a "life in the flesh" (Phil. i. 22). To boast of the flesh means to build on man's visible nature. The expression "The Word was made flesh" (John i. 14) gets its force from the contrast with (ver. 1) "The Word was God." The same contrast is brought out in Ps. lvi. 5, 2 Chron. xxxii. 8, 2 Cor. xiii. 4. The flesh then designates human nature as weak (Matt. xxvi. 41) and sinful in contrast to God.

The sinfulness of the flesh is specially brought out by Paul (Rom. viii. 3). In this sense he calls the body "a body of the flesh," σῶμα τῆς σαρκός (Col. ii. 11), and life a "walking in the flesh" (2 Cor. x. 3). But sinful flesh is not a disposition (Chrysostom and Müller), as above quoted, nor is it sufficient, with Neander, to define it as "human nature in its alienation from God," nor, with Holsten, to describe it as essentially finite and evil, so that in the Pauline theology sin was a necessity. The flesh is only the substance of the body, the seat of sin, but not originally evil: it is man's human or bodily nature, as Hofmann says (Schriftbeweis, I. 559), in the state in which it was left after the fall.

The flesh contains the germ of physical life (John i. 13, iii. 6); it is the essence: the body is the form. Sin now inheres in the flesh, and therefore all who are sons of Adam are sinners, because he was a sinner; and he who overcomes the flesh overcomes it by a conflict between the νοῦς ("mind") and the flesh, and thereby overcomes sin. Christ entered into the flesh with all the consequences of sin or the fall (Col. i. 22; Heb. ii. 14); but his own spiritual nature overcame, so to speak, at the very beginning, its disposition to sin.

FLETCHER, Giles, preacher and religious poet; b. in Cranbrook, Kent, about 1584; d. at Alderton, 1623. He was educated at Cambridge, where he remained till 1617, preaching with much acceptance from the pulpit of St. Mary's. He then became rector of Alderton, Suffolk. Fletcher is principally known by a poem published in 1610, — Christ's Victory and Triumph in Heaven, in Earth, over and after Death. It is one of the "most remarkable religious poems in the language," and furnished not a little material to the author of Paradise Regained. In 1623 he published The Reward of the Faithful, a theological treatise in prose. The latter has not been republished. See GROSART'S edition of the Victory and Triumph, Lond., 1869.

FLETCHER, John William, Vicar of Madeley, associate of John Wesley, and one of the most pious and useful men of his generation; was b. at Nyon, Switzerland, Sept. 12, 1729; d. at Madeley, Eng., Aug. 14, 1785. His original name was De la Flèche. He was a fine scholar in his youth, studying German, Hebrew, etc., and taking off all the prizes at the school in Geneva which he attended. He was designed by his parents for the ministry, but preferred the army. Against their wishes he went to Lisbon and enlisted, but was providentially prevented from going to Brazil, a servant spilling, the very morning of the intended embarkation, a kettle of boiling water on his limbs, which confined him for some time in bed. The vessel was lost at sea. Fletcher returned to Switzerland, but, not disheartened, went to Flanders at the invitation of his uncle, who promised to secure a commission in the army for him. But the sudden death of his relative, and the termination of the war, again providentially interfered with his plans. He now went to England, and, after acquiring a good knowledge of the language, became tutor in the family of T. Hill, Esq., of Shropshire, in 1752.

A new period soon began in Fletcher's history. His curiosity being aroused by a casual conversation, he went to hear the Methodists. Their language about faith was a new revelation to him, but it was not till two years had elapsed that he gained peace in believing. In 1757 he was ordained priest by the Bishop of Bangor. During the next few years he preached occasionally for John Wesley and others, and became known as a public supporter of the great religious revival. In 1760 he accepted the living of Madeley, after having refused the living of Dunham with much easier work and a much larger salary. He accepted this position against the advice of Mr. Wesley, with whom, however, he preserved a lifelong friendship, so that he is called by Tyerman (Life of Wesley, iii. 463) "Wesley's most valuable friend."

For twenty-five years, with the exception of the interval between 1776 and 1781, when the feeble state of his health forced him to take a respite from work, Fletcher labored at Madeley with singular devotion and zeal. The parish was very much run down, and the people knew little or nothing of vital religion, when he became vicar. He preached with great fervor the plain truths of the gospel, and labored incessantly during the week to awaken sinners. Now he rose at five o'clock Sabbath morning, and went through the neighborhood ringing a bell, that no one might be able to give as an excuse for non-attendance at church that he did not awake early enough. Now he appeared suddenly at vulgar entertainments, and with Knox-like fearlessness preached to the astounded revellers upon the folly of forbidden pleasures. "Those sinners," says John Wesley, "that tried to hide themselves from him, he pursued to every corner of his parish by all sorts of means, public and private, early and late," etc. Great and blessed results necessarily followed from such fidelity. In 1768 he was called to preside over Lady Huntingdon's College at Trevecca, Wales. He accepted the position, but did not leave his parish. Disagreements with the authorities on points of doctrine led him to resign in 1771, but no unpleasantness was connected with the resignation.

As a preacher, Fletcher directed his appeals to the conscience. He was well trained, and had a fine voice. J. Wesley said, that, if he had had physical strength, he would have been the most eloquent preacher in England. As a man, he was characterized by saintly piety, rare devotion to God, and blamelessness of life, which Wesley said he had not found equalled in Europe or America. In the judgment of Southey, "no age ever produced a man of more fervent piety, or more perfect charity, and no church ever possessed a more apostolic minister;" and, according to Bishop Ryle, "his devotion has been equalled by few, and probably surpassed by none."

In theology, Fletcher was an Arminian of Arminians. Most of his writings are directed against Calvinism, were written to defend Mr. Wesley, and grew out of controversies with Toplady and Mr. Richard Hill. Some of these works are still extensively circulated, and are authorities in the Methodist churches. However, controversial as his writings are, Fletcher was not a polemic, but always treated his opponents with fairness and courtesy, and in this presented a marked contrast to Toplady. He was also a millenarian (see his letter to John Wesley, Nov. 29, 1755).

LIT.—His principal works against Calvinism are: Five Checks to Antinomianism; Script. Scales to weigh the Gold of Gospel Truth, being an Equal Check to Pharisaism and Antinomianism, and the Portrait of St. Paul (posthumous, has been much admired). The first complete edition of his works, London, 1803, 8 vols.; the best, The Works of Rev. John Fletcher, in 4 vols., by Methodist Book Concern, N. Y. Lives by J. WESLEY, London, 1786; by J. FLETCHER, Joseph, D.D., an Independent minister; b. at Chester, 1784; studied at Glasgow University; pastor at Blackburn 1807, and at Stepney 1823; d. 1843. His works were edited by JOSEPH FLETCHER of Hanley, in 3 vols., London, 1846. Vol. i. contains a Memoir, vol. ii., Lectures on Puseyism and Romanism (the latter being much admired, and, in separate form, running through a number of editions); vol. iii., Sermons. Some other discourses were published separately.

FLEURY, a town with a celebrated abbey (Floriacum), situated in the diocese of Orléans, on the right bank of the Loire, and founded by Leodebad, Abbot of St. Aniane, in the first years of the reign of Chloderig II., 638-657. When the Lombards destroyed Monte Casino, Abbot Mummolus sent the monk Aigulf to Italy in order to bring the remains of St. Benedict to Fleury. The expedition succeeded; and the relics worked so many miracles, that the report of them filled four big volumes (Floriacensis vetus bibliotheca Benedictina, etc., Opera Joannis a Bosco, Lugduni, 1605); and Fleury became, as Leo VII. expressed it, caput ac primas omnium cœnobiorum. The Danes visited the place thrice. The first time the monks fled, and the vikings plundered the abbey; the second time the marauders were defeated and repulsed by the monks; and the third time St. Benedict himself appeared in person, and the heathen barbarians were converted to Christianity. Reformed by St. Odo, towards the close of the ninth century, the abbey rose to still greater distinction. Its library was one of the richest in the realm, and its school had at one time five thousand pupils; but it never produced any great scholars. During the Huguenot war it suffered so much, that it lost its independence, and joined the Congregation of St. Maur.

FLEURY, Claude, b. in Paris, Dec. 6, 1640; d. there July 14, 1723; was educated by the Jesuits at Clermont; studied law in Paris, and practised as an advocate for nine years, but changed his career, was ordained priest in 1672, and lived from that time till his death at the court, as tutor, first to the Prince of Conti, then to the Count of Vermandois, and finally to the Dukes of Burgundy, Anjou, and Berry, and as confessor to Louis XV. (1716-22). He was an ardent student and a prolific writer. He was made Abbé of Loc-Dieu (1684), member of the Academy (1696), prior of Argenteuil (1706), when he resigned his abbacy, and was throughout a friend of Fénelon. The results of his juridical studies came out in his Histoire du droit français (Paris, 1674, last ed., 1822) and Institution au droit ecclésiastique (1692, often republished). For his pupils he wrote Les mœurs des Israélites (1681, Eng. trans., Lond., 1756, 2d ed., enlarged, by Adam Clarke, Manchester, 1805, and New York, 1836), Les mœurs des Chrétiens (1682, last ed., 1810, trans. Newcastle, 1786), and several other historical sketches of a pedagogical tendency. But his principal work is his Histoire ecclésiastique (Paris, 1691 sqq. 20 vols., extending to 1414, but continued to 1584 by Claude Fabre, in 16 vols., 1722-36, with 4 vols. of indexes, 40 vols. in all), a work of considerable merit, designed for the educated public in general, and still read with satisfaction (Eng. trans. down to 570, Lond., 1727-32, 5 vols.; and by Cardinal Newman, with notes, from the Second Ecumenical Council (861) to 456, Oxford, 1842-44, 3 vols.). Of his minor works, Eméry gave a collected edition, Opuscula de l'Abbé Fleury, Paris, 1807.

FLIEDNER, Theodor, D.D., the founder of the institution of Protestant deaconesses, b. Jan. 21, 1800, the son of a clergyman, at Epstein, near Wiesbaden, and d. at Kaiserswerth, the scene of his labors, Oct. 4, 1864. He was a plain, unpretending German pastor, of great working power, indefatigable zeal, fervent piety, and rare talent of organization. Left an orphan at the age of thirteen, he studied at Giessen, Göttingen, and Herborn; was for one year tutor in a family at Cologne, and began to doubt his fitness for the ministry, when he received and accepted, in November, 1821, what he considered a providential call, with the promise of a salary of a hundred and eighty Prussian dollars, from a small Protestant colony at Kaiserswerth, a Roman-Catholic town of eighteen hundred inhabitants, on the Lower Rhine, below Düsseldorf. The failure of a silk manufactory, upon which the town depended largely for support, led him to undertake, in the spring of 1822, a collecting tour to keep his struggling congregation alive. By the end of a week he returned with twelve hundred thalers. This was the beginning of much greater things. By experience and perseverance he became one of the greatest beggars in the service of Christ. In the year 1823 he made a tour to Holland and England, which not only resulted in a permanent endowment of his congregation, but suggested to him the idea of his benevolent institutions. "In both these Protestant countries," he tells us himself, "I became acquainted with a multitude of charitable institutions for the benefit both of body and soul. I saw schools and other educational organizations, alms-houses, orphanages, hospitals, prisons, and societies for the reformation of prisoners, Bible and missionary societies, etc.; and at the same time I observed that it was a living faith in Christ which had called almost every one of these institutions and societies into life, and still preserved them in activity. This evidence of the practical power and fertility of such a principle had a most powerful influence in strengthening my own faith."

Fliedner made two more journeys to Holland, England, and Scotland (in 1832 and 1853), in the interest no more of his congregation, but of his institutions. He also visited the United States in 1849. Twice he travelled to the East, — in 1851 to aid Bishop Gobat in founding a house of deaconesses in Jerusalem, and again in 1857, when he was, however, too feeble to proceed farther than Jaffa. King Frederick William IV. of Prussia and his Queen Elizabeth took the most cordial interest in his labors for the sick and poor, granted him several audiences, furnished him liberally with means, and founded a Christian hospital, with deaconesses at Berlin (Bethany) after the model of Kaiserswerth. In the parsonage garden at Kaiserswerth there still stands the little summer-house, with one room of ten feet square, and an attic over it, which was the first asylum for released female prisoners, and the humble cradle of all Fliedner's institutions, the most important of which is the institution of Evangelical Deaconesses, founded in 1836 on the basis of the apostolic precedent, and with some resemblance to the catholic sisterhoods of charity, but without binding vows. At his death the number of deaconesses in connection with Kaiserswerth and its branch establishments exceeded four hundred. In 1873 there were thirty-four houses, with over seventeen hundred nursing and teaching sisters; in 1878 the number of institutions in Germany, Switzerland, France, Scandinavia, Russia, and Austria, rose to fifty-two, and the number of sisters to nearly four thousand, who labored on eleven hundred stations.

FLODOARD, or FRODOARD, or FLAVALDUS, b. at Epernay in 894; d. March 28, 966; was canon at the cathedral of Rheims, and wrote a poem in hexameter, and in three parts, on the life of Christ, the exploits of the first martyrs, and the history of the popes; a chronicle (Annales) of his own time, from 919 to 966, best edition in PERTZ, M. G. Script., III.; and a Historia Ecclesie Remensis, first published by Sirmond, Paris, 1611. There is a collected edition of his works by LE JEUNE, Rheims, 1854, also in MIGNÉ, *Patrol. FLOOD. See NOAH.

FLORE, The Order of (Floriacenses, or Floriacenses, to be distinguished from Floriacum, the Latin name of the abbey of Fleury), was founded by Joachim, Abbot of Flore (Fiore), in Calabria (1111-30); which article see. The constitution of the order was confirmed by Coelestine III. (1196), and its houses were richly endowed by Henry VI. and his wife Constantia. It spread rapidly, and numbered many monasteries, not only in Calabria, but throughout Italy. Originally it rose as a branch of the Cistercian order; but its rules were more severe, and this circumstance gave Gregory IX. occasion to forbid the Cistercians to receive any Floriacensian into their order. The Cistercians became infuriated at this slight, and did their utmost to ruin the privileged rival; they finally succeeded. In the beginning of the sixteenth century the order of Flore disappeared. Most of the members joined the Cistercians; others, the Carthusians or the Dominicans. See HELYOT, Histoire des ordres monastiques, Paris, 1714-19, 8 vols.

FLORENCE, Council of. See FERRARA-FLORENCE, COUNCIL OF.

FLORIAN, a martyr, and a saint in the Roman-Catholic Church, whose day falls on March 4. He was a soldier in the army of Diocletian (284-305), and was drowned in the Enns, because he openly confessed the Christian faith. On the spot where his corpse drifted ashore, a magnificent monastery was afterwards built. But his remains were brought to Rome, where they rested until 1183, when Pope Lucius III. presented them to King Casimir of Poland. Thus St. Florian became the patron saint of Poland.

FLORUS (not Drepanius, surnamed Magister, on account of his great learning; or Diaconus, from his ecclesiastical position), lived at Lyons in the ninth century, and took a prominent part in the dogmatical controversies of his time. A decided adversary of Paschasius Radbertus's doctrine of transubstantiation, he taught that there is no other participation in the body and blood of Christ than that through faith, and calls the bread the mystical body of the Lord. See his Expositio in Canon. Missæ, written before 834, and first printed in Paris, 1548, though without his name. In the controversy concerning predestination he wrote his Liber adversus Joh. Scoti erroneas definitiones (852) and Sermo de predestinatione, though without fully adopting the ideas of Gottschalk. He was present at the first synod convened in the case by Hinemar, at Chiersy, 849. In the controversy between Agobard and Amalarius he wrote a number of passionate letters, which made much noise in their time. They are found in Bibl. Patr. Max., XV., and, together with his other essays, in MIGNÉ, Patrol. Latin., 119. His most comprehensive work, a commentary on the Epistles of Paul, is a mere compilation from Augustine. It was formerly ascribed to Bede, and is found in the Basel and Cologne editions of his works; but Florus's authorship has been conclusively proved by Mabillon. [F. MAASSEN: Ein Commentar des Florus von Lyon zu einigen d. sogenannten Sirmondischen Constitutionen, Wien, 1879.] G. PLITT.

FLORUS, Gessius, succeeded Albinus in 64 A.D. as Roman governor of Judæa, and caused by his rapine and tyranny that insurrection which led to the destruction of the temple in Jerusalem, and the annihilation of the national independence of the Jews. What finally became of Florus himself is not known; but vivid descriptions of his nefarious rule in Judæa are found in JOSEPHUS (Antiq., XX. 9, and De Bello Jud., II. 24, 25) and in TACITUS (Hist., V. 10).

FLÜE, Niklaus von, generally known under the name of Bruder Klaus, was b. at Flüeli, in the canton of Unterwalden, Switzerland, March 21, 1417; and d. in his hermit's cell at Rauf, close by his native place, March 21, 1487. He grew up without receiving any other education than that which naturally resulted from active participation in the business of the home. Nevertheless, he served his country well, both in the army and as a judge. In 1450 he married. He had ten children in seventeen years; and he was known as an energetic, prudent, and tender house-father. Nevertheless the whole bent of his nature was towards a life of seclusion and devout contemplation. From early youth he practised a severe asceticism; and Oct. 16, 1467, he actually retired from his home and family, and settled in a lonely place up among the Alps, where he built a cell, and spent the rest of his life. To the great esteem and reverence which all who knew him felt for him, was soon added a tinge of the miraculous. People told of him that he never ate. Pilgrimages were made to his cell. Everybody wanted his advice; and he exercised great influence in the surrounding country, not only in general by his example, but in numerous special cases by his exhortations or warnings. At the diet of Stanz (1481) he actually saved the confederation from civil war, and brought about an agreement on that constitution under which Switzerland lived until the close of the eighteenth century. After his death, his countrymen made the greatest exertions to have him canonized. But a canonization is a very expensive affair; and in spite of subscriptions, heavy taxes, etc., nothing more than a beatification could be obtained from Clement IX., 1669.

LIT. — The literature concerning Bruder Klaus is very great. A complete list of it may be found in E. L. ROCHOLZ, Schweizerlegende von B. K., Aarau, 1875, pp. 255-309. The best biography of him is that by JOH. MING, 3 vols., Luzern, 1861-71. JUSTUS BEER.

FONSECA, Pedro da, b. at Cortizada, Portugal, 1528; d. at Coimbra, Nov. 4, 1599; entered the order of Jesuits in 1548; studied at Evora, and became professor at Coimbra. Among his works are a Latin commentary on the metaphysics of Aristotle (4 vols., Rome, 1577-89), and Institutiones dialecticæ (Lisbon, 1564), etc. He was the first who taught the doctrine of a scientia media Dei (i.e., what God might have done, but did not), which afterwards received its name, its due development, and its influence, under the hands of Molina.

FONT, The Baptismal, originally a cistern, rather beneath the level of the floor of the baptistery, surrounded by a low wall, and entered by steps; afterwards a vessel for containing water used at the administration of baptism. The form of the font, whether a cistern or a vessel, was generally the octagon, with reference to the eighth day, as the day of the resurrection of our Lord; though other forms, the circle, the hexagon, etc., are also found. In the Western Church the fonts were generally made of some fine marble, and often highly ornamented: in the Eastern Church they were made of metal or wood, and generally without any ornamentation. See art. Font, in SMITH and CHEETHAM, Dict. Chr. Antiq., and art. BAPTISM, in this Cyclopædia, p. 203.

FONTEVRAUD, The Order of (Ordo Fontis Ebraldi), was founded by Robert of Arbrissel (the present Arbresee), b. 1047; d. 1117. After acting for some years as administrator of the bishopric of Rennes, and teaching theology for some other years at Angers, Robert retired into the forest of Craon, and settled there as a hermit. Others joined him; and in 1093 he formed a community of regular canons, out of which afterwards grew the abbey De la Roc, or De rota. Selected by Urban II. to go through the country, and preach penance, the overwhelming impression he made, especially on women, led to the foundation of the great monastic institution of Fontevraud. It comprised, under the title of pauperes Christi, a male and a female division. The former was dedicated to St. John: the latter consisted of three subdivisions, of which the first was dedicated to the Holy Virgin, and contained three hundred virgins and widows; the second to St. Lazarus, containing a hundred and twenty lepers; and the third to Magdalene, containing a number of female penitents. The whole institution stood under a female head: its first abbess was Petronella of Craon-Chemillé. But the separation between the two sexes was complete, and the rules for both divisions very severe, — perpetual silence, total abstinence from flesh and wine, etc. In 1106 Paschalis II. confirmed the constitution of the order: in 1109 Calixtus II., in person, consecrated the church. At the death of Robert, the monastery numbered three thousand nuns; and the number rose still higher. Indeed, the institution was still flourishing when it was dissolved by the Revolution. The buildings were transformed into a jail; and the last abbess, Charlotte de Pardaillan, died in destitution, in Paris, 1799. See Règles et constit. de l'ordre de Fontevr., Paris, 1643; NIQUET: Hist. de l'ordre de Font., Paris, 1643; J. DE LA MAINFERME: Clypeus Fontebraldensis, Paris, 1684 (an apologetic work).

TH. PRESSEL.

FOOT-WASHING, an ancient act of hospitality (Gen. xviii. 4; Judg. xix. 21; 1 Sam. xxv. 41, etc.), made necessary in Palestine by the dry climate, dusty roads, and the fact that sandals, covering only the sole of the foot, were worn. Our Lord, the night before his crucifixion, washed the feet of his disciples, and wiped them (John xiii. 1-17), and commanded his disciples to "wash one another's feet" (xiii. 14). This is usually interpreted to mean that they should emulate his spirit of ministration and humility. It has, however, been taken literally. Upon the basis of this passage and of 1 Tim. v. 10, in which one of the conditions of being admitted to the order of widows is that she had "washed the saints' feet," the Roman and Greek churches and the Tunkers still practise the rite.

Augustine (Ep. ad Januarium) refers to the ceremony of foot-washing as taking place on Maunday-Thursaday (the Thursday before Easter). The synod of Toledo, in 694, went so far as to exclude from the communion-table those who refused to have their feet washed on this day. Bernard of Clairvaux even sought to have it recognized as one of the sacraments, but without success. The ceremony is still observed in some of the convents of the Roman Church, and very generally in those of the Greek Church. The czar of Russia, the emperor of Austria, and the kings of Spain, Portugal, and Bavaria, have observed, and perhaps do still observe, the custom of washing the feet of twelve beggars on Maunday-Thursaday. The Pope at Rome, likewise, in illustration of Christian humility, sprinkles a few drops of water on the feet of thirteen poor men, attired in white tunics, and seated in the Clementine Chapel.

This ceremony Luther denounced as hypocritical, and not at all in the spirit of the Lord's command. He thought the people would "be far better served if they were given a common bath, where they could wash their entire body." And Bengel, in his Commentary, suggested that the Pope would "deserve more admiration, if, instead of washing the feet of twelve beggars, he would in real humility wash the feet of a single king." The Moravians practised foot-washing till 1818, when a synod at Herrnhut abolished the practice. The Tunkers are strenuous advocates of it. See TUNKERS.

FORBES, Alexander Penrose, D.C.L., Bishop of Brechin; was b. at Edinburgh, June 6, 1817; d. at Dundee, Oct. 8, 1875. He was educated at Oxford, and was powerfully influenced by the Tractarian movement. He was made bishop in 1847. He had decided Romanizing leanings, and was tried for heresy in 1857, and censured. His principal works are, A Short Explanation of the Nicene Creed (Oxford, 1852) and an Explanation of the Thirty-Nine Articles (Oxford, 1867).

FORBES, John, a Scottish divine, son of Patrick Forbes; was b. May 2, 1593; d. April 20, 1648. He was professor of divinity at Aberdeen 1619-40. He leaned to Episcopacy, and, refusing to sign the Solemn League and Covenant, was ejected from his position. He was a man of much learning; and his work, Instructiones Historico-Theologicæ, etc. (Amst., 1645), had a considerable reputation, and is referred to by Baur as one of the two most important on the history of doctrine of the seventeenth century. See CHAMBERS, Biog. Dict. of Eminent Scotsmen.

FORBES, Patrick, a Scottish divine; was b. in Aberdeenshire, 1564; d. March 28, 1635. He was made Bishop of Aberdeen 1618. His principal work was, An Exquisite Commentary on the Revelation, Lond., 1613. See the Biographical Memoir prefixed to The Funeral Sermons, Orations, etc., on the Death of the Right Rev. Patrick Forbes, D.D. (1635), edited by C. F. SHAND, Edinb., 1845.

FORBES, William, a learned Scottish divine; was b. at Aberdeen. 1585; d. April 1, 1634. Charles I., on a visit to Edinburgh (1633), was much pleased with his preaching, and made him First Bishop of Edinburgh, January, 1634. His work, Considerationes Modestæ de Justificatione, etc., first published in Lond., 1658, was reprinted in the Library of Anglo-Catholic Theology, Oxford, 1850-56, 2 vols.

FOREIRO, Francisco, b. at Lisbon, 1523; d. at Almada, Jan. 10, 1587; entered the Dominican order; studied theology in Paris; and was, after his return in 1540, appointed court-preacher in Lisbon. He distinguished himself as one of the Portuguese delegates to the Council of Trent (1561), and was appointed a member of the committee charged with the compilation of a Roman-Catholic Catechism, with the revision of the Missal, and with the compilation of the Index. Most of his writings—commentaries on the Books of the Old Testament, a Hebrew dictionary, etc.—still remain in manuscript.

FORMOSUS, Pope (Sept. 21, 891—April 4, 896), a native of Rome; was made Cardinal-Bishop of Porto in 864 by Nicholas I., and, both by him and by Adrian II., employed in many important missions, but was by John VIII. deprived of his ecclesiastical position, and even excommunicated, April 19, 876, on account, as it was said, of participation in a conspiracy against Charles the Bald and the holy father himself. By Marinus he was restored, however, to his former dignity; and at the death of Stephen VI. he succeeded to the papal chair, the first instance in the Western Church of the transfer of a bishop from one see to another. On account of the almost complete dissolution of the Frankish Empire, the Pope found it necessary at this period to lean upon some of the native Italian princes; and Wido, Duke of Spoleto, was crowned emperor, together with his son Lambert. But it soon became apparent that dependence upon a neighbor was too dangerous; and Formosus, therefore, called the German king, Arnulf, into Italy, and crowned him emperor. Immediately after Arnulf's return to Germany, Formosus died; and Lambert now entered Rome, and took his revenge by the aid of Formosus's successor, Stephen VII. The corpse of the late pope was dug up from the grave, and seated in the papal chair; and then a synod was held, accusing him of having intruded himself in St. Peter's see, etc. He was declared guilty; and his remains were atrociously mutilated and defiled, while all his ordinations and consecrations were cancelled. The confusion which arose herefrom was still further increased by the circumstances that some popes (Sergius III. and John X.) recognized the proceedings of the synod, while others (Theodore II., John IX., and Benedict IV.) declared them null and void; a circumstance which presents an embarrassing argument in the question of papal infallibility. See the writings of Auxilius and Vulgarius, in MABILLO (Analecta Vetera, Paris, 1723) and in DÜMMLER (Auxilius und Vulgarius, Leipzig, 1866). R. ZÖPFEL.

FORSTER, Johann, b. at Augsburg, July 10, 1495; d. at Wittenberg, Dec. 8, 1556; studied Greek and Hebrew at Ingolstadt, under Reuchlin, and theology at Leipzig and Wittenberg; became one of Luther's favorite pupils, aided him in translating the Old Testament, and was, on his recommendation, made preacher in Augsburg, 1535. But in Augsburg, as afterwards in Tübingen and in other places, his strict and exclusive Lutheranism brought him in conflict with his colleagues. In 1548 he was made professor in Hebrew at Wittenberg. His great work is his Dictionarium Hebraicum Novum, published at Basel, after his death, 1557.

FORTIFICATIONS AMONG THE HEBREWS.

In general each place was surrounded by a wall; but municipal places had fortifications containing garrisons, especially in times of war (2 Chron. xvii. 2). Thus Jerusalem was fortified by David (2 Sam. v. 7, 9), and the work of its fortification continued in later times (2 Chron. xxxii. 5). Solomon also built forts throughout the land (1 Kings ix. 15, 17 sq.; 2 Chron. viii. 5); and their number was increased as necessity required it, especially after the exile and during the Jewish war. Among them were Masada and Machærus.

Such fortified places were surrounded by one, sometimes by double or triple, walls (2 Chron. xxxii. 5), with bulwarks (xxvi. 15) and wall-towers. Over the gateways, which were closed by ponderous doors, and secured by wooden or metallic bars, were watch-towers, and around the walls was a ditch. Besides these large fortresses, there were also castles or citadels, as well as forts. In the forests and in the open fields watch-towers were also found.

During the war, in case a city thus fortified would not surrender voluntarily, a siege was laid against it, and operations began, whereby the wall could be approached (2 Sam. xx. 15; 2 Kings xix. 32; Jer. vi. 6, xxxii. 24; Ezek. xxvi. 8 sq.). After this the battering-rams were set against it. That the besieged did not remain idle, but endeavored to prevent the approach of the enemy, we see from passages like Isa. xxii. 10, Jer. xxxiii. 4, 2 Sam. xi. 21, 24, 2 Chron. xxvi. 15; and thus it happened that strongly fortified places were not so easily taken. Thus Ashdod was besieged twenty-nine years, Samaria three years (2 Kings xvii. 5), Jerusalem a year and a half (xxv. 1, 2). But cities taken were razed to the ground, and their inhabitants killed, or sold as slaves. If they capitulated, they were more leniently dealt with (Deut. xx. 11 sq.; 1 Macc. xiii. 15 sq.). The Chaldeans were the most famous besiegers of antiquity.

RÜTSCHI.

FORTUNATUS, Venantius Honorius Clemens, b. about 530 at Treviso; d. at Poitiers about 609; studied grammar and rhetoric at Ravenna; lived for some time at the court of Sigibert, king of Austrasia, whose favor he won by his poetry; repaired thence to Tours, and afterwards to Poitiers, where he settled in a monastery founded by the divorced wife of Clothaire I., the learned Radegunde; entered finally the service of the church, and became Bishop of Poitiers about 599. His fame, however, he acquired as a poet; and he is, indeed, the last great poet of the period before Charlemagne. He wrote epics (among which is the life of St. Martin, in hexameters, based on the works of Sulpicius Severus), lyrics (especially hymns), epistles, epigrams, didactic and descriptive poems, etc. The two most celebrated of his hymns are Veilla regis prodeunt and Pange, lingua, gloriosi; of which Neale's translations are found in SCHAFF'S Christ in Song, New York, 1869. The best edition of his works is that by Luchi, Rome, 1786, in 2 vols. 4to, incorporated with MIGNÉ, Patrol. Latin., vols. lxxii. and lxxviii. See EBERT: Geschichte d. latein. christ. Literatur bis zum Zeitalter Karls d. Grossen, Leipzig, 1874, pp. 494-516.

FOSCARARI (Ægidius Foscherarius), b. at Bologna, Jan. 27, 1512; d. in Rome, Dec. 23, 1564; entered early the Dominican order; preached, and taught theology, in various cities of Italy; and was appointed Magister sacri palatii by Paul III. in 1546, and Bishop of Modena in 1550 by Julius III. In 1551 he was sent to the Council of Trent, and when (April 28, 1552) its meetings were suspended he returned to his episcopal see. Under Paul IV. (in 1558) he was accused of heresy, and imprisoned in the Castle St. Angelo. Though the Inquisition could prove no heresy against him, he was not released until after Paul's death. By Pius IV. he was once more sent to the Council of Trent, and made a member of the Committee on the Catechism and the Revision of the Missal.

FOSTER, James, D.D., an English dissenting minister; b. in Exeter, Sept. 16, 1667; d. Nov. 5, 1753. He became pastor in London in 1724. He was an eloquent preacher, and won the eulogies of Pope and others. Many of his sermons were published. Amongst his other writings the most important is The Usefulness, Truth, and Excellency of the Christian Revelation, etc., 1734, a defence against Tindal the deist.

FOSTER, John, a Baptist clergyman and eminent essayist; b. in Halifax, Yorkshire, Sept. 17, 1770; d. at Stapleton, near Bristol, Oct. 15, 1848. He engaged in weaving wool till he was seventeen. How he secured his primary education is unknown. Becoming a member of the Baptist Church at this time, he determined to study for the ministry; entered Breamly Hall, and subsequently passed into the Baptist College, Bristol. In 1792 he preached for three months at Newcastle-on-Tyne; passed from there to Dublin, and in 1797 was invited to become pastor of the Baptist Church, Chichester, where he remained till 1800, when he was called to Downend. From here, in 1804, he removed to Frome. A throat trouble obliged him to resign in 1806. The year before, he published his essays, and became contributor to The Eclectic Magazine. In 1817 he determined to take up pastoral work again, and went back to Downend, but remained only six months. He was frequently called upon to lecture, and preached at intervals, until his death in 1843. Foster was a man of very delicate sensibilities, reserved disposition, and humility of Christian character. He was not successful as a preacher; but as an essayist he excels in vividness of imagination, penetration of thought, and earnest sincerity. Writing was, however, a laborious task to him, and he is said to have spent several days in the elaboration of a single paragraph. His friend Robert Hall said of him, "His conceptions are most extraordinary and original." Foster's principal work is Essays on Decision of Character, which has passed through many editions. Other works are, Evils of Popular Ignorance (1818), Introductory Essay to Doddridge's Rise and Progress (1825), Lectures delivered at Broadmead Chapel (2 series, 1844-47), a hundred and eighty-five contributions to The Eclectic Review, and Observations on the Character of Mr. Hall as a Preacher. See RYLAND: Life and Correspondence of J. Foster, 1846, republished in Boston, 1851; W. W. EVERTS: Life and Thoughts of J. Foster, New York, 1849.

FOX, George. This great reformer, a man of original genius and deep spiritual discernment, was b. in July, 1624, at Drayton-in-the-Clay, now called Fenny Drayton, in Leicestershire. His father, Christopher Fox, was a weaver, called "righteous Christy" by his neighbors: his mother, Mary Lago, was, as he tells us, "of the stock of the martyrs." From childhood, Fox was of a serious, religious disposition. "When I came to eleven years of age," he says (Journal, p. 2), "I knew pureness and righteousness; for, while I was a child, I was taught how to walk to be kept pure. The Lord taught me to be faithful in all things, and to act faithfully two ways; viz., inwardly to God, and outwardly to man; . . . and that my words should be few and savory, seasoned with grace; and that I might not eat and drink to make myself wanton, but for health, using the creatures in their service, as servants in their places, to the glory of Him that hath created them." As he grew up, his relations "thought to have made him a priest;" but he was put as an apprentice to a man who was a shoemaker and grazier. In his nineteenth year he was grieved at the health-drinking of two companions who were professors of religion, and heard an inward voice from the Lord, "Thou seest how young people go together into vanity, and old people into the earth; and thou must forsake all, both young and old, and keep out of all, and be as a stranger unto all." Then began a life of solitary wandering in mental temptations and troubles, in which he "went to many a priest to look for comfort, but found no comfort from them." Some of his friends advised him to marry, some to enter the army: "an ancient priest in Warwickshire" bade him "take tobacco, and sing psalms." At one time, as he was walking in a field, "the Lord opened unto" him "that being bred at Oxford or Cambridge was not enough to fit and qualify men to be ministers of Christ," but that a spiritual qualification was necessary. Not seeing this requisite in the priest of his parish, he "would get into the orchards and fields" with his Bible by himself. Regarding the priests less, he looked more after the dissenters, among whom he found "some tenderness," but no one that could speak to his need. "And when all my hopes in them," he says, "and in all men, were gone, so that I had nothing outwardly to help me, nor could tell what to do, then, oh! then, I heard a voice which said, 'There is one, even Christ Jesus, that can speak to thy condition.' And when I heard it, my heart did leap for joy. . . . Christ it was (who had enlightened me) that gave me his light to believe in, and gave me hope, which is himself, revealed himself in me, and gave me his spirit, and gave me his grace, which I found sufficient in the deeps and in weakness." Afterwards the hearts and natures of wicked men were revealed to him, that he might have a sense of all conditions, and thus be able to speak to all conditions; and he "saw that there was an ocean of darkness and death, but an infinite ocean of light and love which flowed over the ocean of darkness," and in that he saw "the infinite love of God." In 1648 he began to exercise his ministry publicly in market-places, in the fields, in appointed meetings of various kinds, sometimes in the "steeple-houses," after the priests had got through. His preaching was powerful; and many people joined him in professing the same faith in the spirituality of true religion. In a few years the Society of Friends had formed itself spontaneously under the preaching of Fox and his companions. Fox afterwards showed great powers, as a religious legislator, in the admirable organization which he gave to the new society. He seems, however, to have had no desire to found a sect, but only to proclaim the pure and genuine principles of Christianity in their original simplicity. In 1650 the name "Quakers" was first applied to the Friends in derision, by "one Justice Bennet," because Fox had bidden the justices to "tremble at the word of the Lord." Fox was often arrested and imprisoned for violating the laws forbidding unauthorized worship. He was imprisoned at Darby in 1650, Carlisle in 1653, London in 1654, Lancaster in 1656, Lancaster in 1660 and 1663, Scarborough in 1666, and Worcester in 1674, in noisome dungeons, and with much attendant cruelty. In prison his pen was active, and hardly less potent than his voice. In 1669 Fox married Margaret Fell of Swarthmore Hall, a lady of high social position, and one of his early converts. In 1671 he went to Barbadoes and the English settlements in America, where he remained two years. In 1672 he attended the Yearly Meeting at Newport, R. I., which lasted for six days. At the end of this meeting he says, "It was somewhat hard for Friends to part; for the glorious power of the Lord, which was over all, and his blessed truth and life flowing amongst them, had so knit and united them together, that they spent two days in taking leave one of another, and of the Friends of the island." In 1677 and 1684 he visited the Friends in Holland, and organized their meetings for discipline. He died in London, Nov. 13, 1690, having preached with great power two days before, and was buried on the 16th, in the Friends' Ground, near Bunhill Fields.

Fox is described by Thomas Ellwood, the friend of Milton, as "graceful in countenance, manly in personage, grave in gesture, courteous in conversation." Penn says he was "civil beyond all forms of breeding." We are told that he was "plain and powerful in preaching, fervent in prayer," "a discerner of other men's spirits," and very much master of his own," skilful to "speak a word in due season to the conditions and capacities of most, especially to them that were weary, and wanted soul's rest;" "valiant in asserting the truth, bold in defending it, patient in suffering for it, immovable as a rock."

THOMAS CHASE

(President of Haverford College).

FOX (or FOXÉ), John, author of the Book of Martyrs; was b. in Boston, Lincolnshire, 1517; d. April 15, 1587. He was educated at Oxford, and became fellow of Magdalen College, where he applied himself to the diligent study of church history. He espoused Protestant sentiments, and for this was expelled from his college. He became tutor in Sir Thomas Lucy's family, and then to the children of the Earl of Surrey, but was obliged to seek refuge from persecution on the Continent. He went to Basel, where he laid the plan of the work which has given him fame. At the elevation of Elizabeth he returned to England, but never received higher position than that of prebend of Salisbury Cathedral. Called by Archbishop Parker to subscribe to the canons, he refused, and, holding up a Greek Testament, said, "To this will I subscribe." He was fearless in the avowal of his convictions, and petitioned the queen earnestly but unsuccessfully to spare the lives of two Dutch Anabaptists. Fox's title to fame rests upon the Book of Martyrs, in the compilation of which he had the assistance of Cramer and others. It required eleven years of preparation, and appeared in its first form at Basel, 1554; the first complete Eng. ed., in 1563, 4th ed., 1583, etc. The original title was Actes and Monumentes of these latter perillous days touching matters of the churches . . . from the year of oure Lorde a thousande to the time now present, etc. By order of Elizabeth this work was placed in the common halls of archbishops, bishops, deans, etc., and in all the colleges and chapels throughout the kingdom. It exercised a great influence upon the masses of the people long after its author was dead. The Roman Catholics early attacked it, and pointed out its blunders. Fox wrote other works; for these see a volume in British Reformers, published at London. The Book of Martyrs has appeared in numerous editions, the best of which are those of Rev. M. H. SEYMOUR (New York, 1838) and of Rev. GEORGE TOWNSEND, M.A. of Trinity College, Cambridge, with a Life of the Author, and Vindication of the Work, London, 1843. D. S. SCHLAF.

FOX, Richard, English prelate and statesman; b. at close of the reign of Henry VI.; d. Sept. 14, 1528. He was educated at Oxford. He was a great favorite of Henry VII., and filled the offices of privy counsellor, keeper of the privy seal, and secretary of state. In turn he was Bishop of Exeter, Bath and Wells (1491), Durham (1494), and Winchester (1500), and master of Pembroke College, Cambridge (1507-19). Wolsey was his protégé; and he was much mortified at that favorite's insults and superior influence. He founded Corpus Christi, Oxford (1516), and the free schools of Taunton and Grentham.

FRANCE, Ecclesiastical Statistics of. France comprises an area of 528,577 square kilometers, with 36,905,788 inhabitants (according to the census of 1876), of whom 35,387,703 belong to the Roman-Catholic Church, 467,531 to the Reformed, 80,117 to the Lutheran, and 33,109 to other Protestant denominations; 49,499 are Jews, and the rest belong to no confession. Thus the overwhelming majority of the French people are Roman Catholic, and there is no prospect of any change in the proportion at present; but liberty of conscience, and freedom of worship, are constitutionally guaranteed in the country, and a remarkable religious movement (headed by MeAll) has been going on among the laboring and lower Roman-Catholic classes in Paris and other cities.

I. The Roman-Catholic Church. — In order to give a just representation of the state of the Roman-Catholic Church in France at this moment, it is necessary to consider (a) its organization and official relation to the State and the Pope, (b) the support it receives from the congregations and the religious associations, and (c) the influence it exercises on the school, and education in general.

(a) The French Church consists of 18 archbishoprics and 68 bishoprics; that is, of 86 dioceses: but it has no primate of its own. The primacy of Aquitania, or even that of the whole Gaul, is, like the pallium, which pertains to certain sees (for instance, to that of Autun), a distinction of rank only, not of dignity, still less of power. Though five of the archbishops are cardinals (Bordeaux, Cambrai, Paris, Rennes, and Rouen), they have as such no special authority in the country. Each bishop is the sole and proper chief of his diocese, and maintains direct communication with the State and with the Pope. Apostolical equality between the bishops is the first maxim of the French Church. The bishop governs his diocese independently, restrained only by the general ecclesiastical laws and the will of the Pope. He arranges the whole course of theological education, lays out the programme of study, selects the handbooks, chooses the professors: he ordains, appoints, and discharges the priests, founds or confirms all religious associations, calls or installs the ecclesiastics who teach in the State schools, excommunicates and re-admits, etc.

and a chapter. The number of vicar-generals varies with the size of the diocese. The government pays two, or sometimes three. Their title is vicaires généraux titulaires, and their number 187. Others are appointed by the bishop himself, but only for the internal affairs of the church. Their title is vicaires généraux honoraires, and their number may be larger. Of secretaries, the government pays 133. The episcopal court, whose competency, by Code Napoléon, is confined to matrimonial affairs and church-discipline, is composed of an official, a vice-official, one or more assessors, a promoteur, and a greffier; but all the members hold other offices at the same time. The chapter has also lost its former importance. It is divided into three classes, — chanoines d'honneur, titulaires, and honoraires; but only the second class is paid by the State, and has any practical signification. It takes care of the service, and numbers 763.

The lower clergy consists of curés, desservants, and vicaires. The curés are priests of the cures, or principal parishes, and are appointed by the bishop; though their appointment must be confirmed by the government. In 1876 they numbered 3,440. The desservants are priests of the succursales, or subordinate parishes, and are appointed and dismissed by the bishop alone (ad nutum amovibiles). Though they are only a kind of help to the curés, the latter have no authority over them, only a right of superintendence with report to the bishop. The number of desservants is 31,191. The vicaires, finally, who act only as assistants to the curés and desservants, number 11,679. As in the large cities the service of the mass requires a greater number of officials, the State pays 4,423 prêtres habituels for this purpose. Adding furthermore the almoners of the lycæums, colleges, normal schools, hospitals, and asylums (who are appointed by the respective administrations, but stand under the authority of the bishop), the clergy of the army, the navy, and the colonies, the teachers and pupils in the theological seminaries, etc., the total number of the clergy recognized and paid by the State amounts to 63,750. The budget of 1877 allowed 51,526,445 francs for the expenses of the Roman-Catholic Church, of which 1,640,000 francs were for the cardinals, archbishops, and bishops.

By the laws of Feb. 13, 1790, and Aug. 18, 1793, the religious orders were abolished in France. Napoleon, however, by a decree of Feb. 18, 1809, allowed the re-establishment of communities of female nurses; though reserving to himself the right of examining their statutes, fixing the number of members, etc. He also gave his consent to the re-establishment of female communities with educational purposes; and from that time the religious orders gradually crept into the country, half permitted, half tolerated. Though a decree of March 18, 1836, formally declared that the government would never allow the establishment of a community whose aim was a merely contemplative life, the congregations, nevertheless, contrived to set apart for this purpose a portion of their members. It is very difficult, however, to obtain complete and reliable statistics on this field. There is a general report from 1861, — Statistique de France, Strassburg, 1864, the result of the general census of 1861; and there is a more special report, — État des congrégations, communautés et associations religieuses autorisées ou non autorisées, laid before the legislative assembly in 1878. Both are valuable documents, but neither is complete. A comparison between these two reports reveals the interesting fact, that while, in 1861, the number of all the members, male and female, of the religious orders in France was only 108,119, it had in 1878 risen to 158,040. This last figure, however, is not correct any longer, since the law of 1879 made the confirmation by the State necessary to the legal existence of any association whatever; and disobedience to this law caused the expulsion of the Jesuits, Benedictines, Dominicans, etc.

The female associations which have been confirmed by the State comprise 224 Congrégations à supérieure générale proprement dites, organized for the whole country, namely, 11 for nursing, 58 for education, and 155 both for nursing and education, with 2,450 houses and 93,215 sisters; 35 Congrégations diocésaines à supérieure générale, organized only for some special diocese, namely, 6 for nursing, 6 for education, and 23 both for nursing and education, with 102 houses and 3,794 sisters; and 644 Communautés à supérieure locale indépendantes, namely, 312 for education, 159 for nursing, 157 both for education and nursing, and 16 for a contemplative life, with 16,741 sisters. The total number of members of these associations is 113,750, to which must be added, according to the report of 1878, 14,003 sisters belonging to religious orders not recognized by the State. The names of the principal orders of the first kind are, Filles de la Charité de S. Vincent de Paul, numbering 9,130 members, with 89 stations; Petites Sœurs des Pauvres, founded at St. Servan, in Bretagne, in 1840, by Abbé le Poilleur, and numbering 2,685 members, with 184 stations; Filles de Sagesse, numbering 2,588 members, with 105 stations; Sœurs de S. Joseph, numbering 2,520 members, with 155 stations, etc. See CALMETTE, Traité de l'administration des associations religieuses, 1877.

Only 32 male associations have obtained the confirmation of the State; the reason being, that according to the law of Jan. 2, 1817, the chief of the State can confirm a female association by a simple decree, while a male association must be recognized by the legislative assembly. Among the legalized associations two are devoted to work in the seminaries, — Congrégation de S. Lazare (numbering 1,195 members) and Compagnie des prêtres de S. Sulpice (numbering 200 members); and three are devoted to missionary work, — Congrégation des Missions étrangères (with 480 members), Congrégation de S. Esprit (with 515 members), and Congrégation de S. François de Sales (with 28 members). The total number of members belonging to these 32 associations is 22,843. In certain respects, however, the associations which never sought and never obtained the sanction of the civil government were of much more importance,—the Jesuits, Benedictines, Dominicans, Carthusians, Franciscans, etc. The Jesuits returned to France with the Bourbons in 1814, and from that time their influence has been steadily increasing up to 1879, in which year they possessed 58 houses, with 1,471 inmates. The Benedictines numbered 239 members, in 13 houses; the Dominicans 303, in 21 houses; the Trappists 1,158, in 17 houses, etc. But, as all these associations refused to seek the State's legalization of their existence, the houses were broken up in 1880, and the inmates expelled.

Among the lay associations, especially two have acquired great celebrity; namely, Société de St. Vincent de Paul and Société de St. François Régis. The former devoted itself, besides, to other kinds of charity,—to guarding the youth from temptation and seduction; and in 1852 no less than 131,000 young persons stood under its protection. The latter devoted itself to the regulation of unhappy matrimonial affairs; and from 1826 to 1865 it treated no less than 43,236 cases. In 1870 these two associations were united in one, which holds its annual convention in May or April, in Paris. The clergy exercises, of course, a great influence in the working of this great society; but the president's chair is always occupied by a layman. Another lay association of great importance is Société de Foi, in Lyons, devoted to missionary work. It has about six millions of francs a year at its disposal, and publishes Annales de la propagation de la Foi and Les Missions catholiques, which appear at Lyons, the former in eight, the latter in four languages. See Manuel des œuvres et institutions religieuses et charitables, Paris, 1877.

(c) From of old the Christian clergy has considered the education of the children of the Christian congregation their duty and their privilege; and the French clergy has, in the face of a strong opposition, steadily endeavored to bring this whole field under their authority. They were already near their goal, when the so-called Ferry Laws of 1879 entirely reversed the state of affairs. The effect of those laws cannot yet be exactly stated; but a fair estimate may be formed by considering the contents of the laws, and the state of affairs before their issue.

With respect to the primary schools (in which free instruction is given), the latest statistics are found in A. LEGOYT, La France et l'Étranger, études de statistique comparée, Paris, 1870. Of primary schools maintained by the State, 35,348 schools for boys, or for boys and girls, with 1,986,441 pupils, had lay teachers; while 2,038 schools with 412,852 pupils had teachers from the congregations. Connected with these schools were 4,848 supplementary schools for apprentices, Sunday classes, etc., of which 4,471 with 84,427 pupils were under lay, and 377 with 36,068 pupils under clerical leadership. Of 14,059 schools for girls, 5,998 with 317,342 pupils had lay teachers; while 8,061 with 697,195 pupils had teachers from the Congregations. Of 1,192 boarding-schools for girls, 184 with 1,662 inmates were under lay, and 1,008 with 15,065 inmates under clerical leadership. Of primary schools maintained by private support, 2,572 schools for boys with 125,779 pupils had lay, and 543 with 82,803 pupils, teachers from the Congregations, 7,637 schools for girls with 290,206 pupils had lay, and 5,571 with 417,825 pupils, teachers from the Congregations. Of 3,474 boarding-schools, 2,090 were under clerical direction.

In the middle and higher schools the clergy also had gained considerable ground. Especially in the middle schools the Jesuits exercised so great an influence, that the political leaders and state authorities became alarmed; and March 15, 1879, the then minister of public instruction, Jules Ferry, laid before the Chambers a law almost eliminating the influence of the clergy. As the law prohibits any member of a non-recognized association to be director of or teach in a school, the 27 Jesuit colleges which at that moment flourished in France were closed, and 848 teachers put out of activity. Twenty-six other communities, having 61 establishments and 1,089 teachers, fared no better. The teachers belonging to the recognized associations, and numbering 22,769, were as yet not interfered with; but they will in the future be subjected to the same examinations as lay teachers, instead of simply obtaining an episcopal certificate.

II. The Protestant Churches. The constitutions of the Reformed and Lutheran churches rest on the law of April 7, 1802, completed and somewhat modified by the law of March 26, 1852. Each congregation has its presbytery, whose lay members are elected by universal suffrage. Above the presbytery stands the consistory, one for each six thousand souls, and consisting of the ministers and representatives of the presbyteries. The consistory chooses its own president; but he must be a clergyman, and obtain the confirmation of the government. Five consistories were destined to form a provincial synod in the Reformed, and an inspection in the Lutheran Church. The provincial synods, however, were never formed, nor was the Reformed Church allowed to convene its general synod until 1872. The Lutheran Church was in this respect more fortunate. It formed its inspections, and obtained in its directory a centre of organization, to which the power of appointing the ministers was confided, without any restrictions from the side of the consistories or the congregations. The Reformed Church comprises 100 consistories (one for each 4,675 souls), and the Lutheran 6 (one for each 13,373 souls). The State pays 616 Reformed ministers (one for each 759 souls), and 64 Lutheran (one for each 4,675 souls). The budget of 1877 allowed 1,430,500 francs for the expenses of the Protestant churches; but this sum was overrun by 20,000 francs.

For the historical development of the French churches see the arts. FRANKS, GALLICANISM, GAUL, HUGUENOTS, etc.

The above article is a condensation of the articles by Alb. Matter and C. Pfender in Herzog, in some cases supplemented with more recent statistics.

FRANCE, Protestantism in, since the Revolution. At the outbreak of the Revolution the number of Protestants in France, including the Lutherans of Alsace, amounted to about eight hundred thousand; but their religion was not recognized by the State. They were excluded from all civil offices: as they mostly lived in small groups, dispersed all over the country, they were prevented from exercising any appreciable social influence, and had to submit to numberless petty chicaneries from the surrounding Roman-Catholic population; and, though the churches of the Desert were generally connived at, actual persecutions occurred now and then. In this state of affairs the edict of toleration brought a change in 1787; and, as the Protestants could not fail recognizing a movement towards liberation in the dawning Revolution, they joined it with eagerness: there sat nine Protestant pastors in the Constituent Assembly. A decree of Dec. 24, 1789, made the Protestants eligible to all civil offices, and another, of Dec. 25, 1790, restored the property confiscated by the revocation of the Edict of Nantes to the descendants of the exiles, on the condition that they should return home, and become French citizens. The real work of restoration, however, did not begin until after the conclusion of the concordat (July 15, 1801), when Napoleon undertook to re-organize the church affairs of France. The Protestants were placed on equal terms with the Roman Catholics; their churches were restored to them; their pastors were to be paid by the State; a Lutheran seminary was founded at Strassburg, a Reformed at Montauban, 1808, etc. All these reforms were, of course, received with gratitude by the Protestants, though it soon became evident that the new church constitution was very inferior to the old. In 1637 the Reformed Church in France had had eight hundred and six churches, served by six hundred and forty-one pastors: in 1806 she had only a hundred and seventy-one churches, and of these fifty had no pastors. This loss might be repaired; but how was the religious life of those times, the active piety, the fervent spirit, to be revived? In its new constitution the Church was wholly dependent on the State, and curtailed both in its freedom and in its authority. The congregation exercised no influence on the choice of its pastor, the most essential element of freedom; and Napoleon refused to revive the national synod, the most essential element of authority. Indeed, the prospects were not so very promising.

After Napoleon's fall, when a violent current of re-action set in, stimulated by the fiercest feelings of revenge, the hatred of the Roman Catholics to the Protestants also showed itself. Riots took place, especially in Southern France, and grew into actual persecution. Around Nismes more than one hundred homesteads were devastated, the houses burnt, and the fields laid waste, and more than two hundred persons were killed. The government seemed inclined to look on with indifference, until it was compelled by remonstrances from England to interfere, and maintain order. As soon, however, as the Protestant Church once more felt herself protected in her plain rights, she began to develop a very remarkable activity in the field of education. The consistory of Paris opened its first school Dec. 31, 1817, with three pupils. But at the same time the first Sunday school in France was founded by a Protestant pastor, and the method of mutual instruction was introduced by Protestant teachers. In 1819 the first Bible Society was founded in France, and met with great sympathy; a Tract Society (1821) and a Society for Evangelical Mission (1822) were also successful. The Society for the Development of Primary Instruction among French Protestants was formed in 1829, and developed rapidly. The first Protestant papers, Archives du Christianisme (1817), and Mélanges de Religion (1820), were established, and proved successful. Less encouraging was the aspect which the internal state of the Church presented. The old orthodoxy still found its firm defenders; but it soon became apparent, even to the staunchest among them, that it would be impossible to maintain a dogmatic system which was at variance with all the reigning ideas of the age, which, indeed, though none as yet attacked it, most had ceased to understand. Religion regained rapidly in the nineteenth century what it had lost in the eighteenth. But a crisis like the French Revolution cannot be gone through without making all the old forms more or less unfit for use. A movement was necessary; but it was a misfortune that it should come from without, and come at a moment when the Church was bereft of its principal organ of authority, the national synod.

The first who attempted the evangelization of France were disciples of Wesley. In 1790 they founded several small missionary stations in Normandy and Bretagne; but during the reign of Napoleon their activity almost ceased. After the battle of Waterloo, however, they immediately resumed work, and a church was built at Cherbourg. They labored with prudence and moderation; but it was, nevertheless, easy to see, that, if they succeeded, the result of their labor would be the establishment of a number of independent churches, and the breaking-up of the Reformed Church of France. In 1825 Guizot characterized the situation as merely involving a difference between those who looked at the primitive, and those who looked at the progressive, in the common religion. But the characterization was too mild: independent churches were at that moment formed or forming in Lyons, Havre, Strassburg, St. Etienne, etc. In 1834 the consistory of Paris took some steps in order to organize an authoritative representation of the Reformed Church of France, and thereby procure a revision of her organic law. In 1839 the minister of worship and public instruction made a similar attempt, but both in vain; and when, finally, an unofficial synod was assembled in 1848, the actual split took place. There were at that moment three parties within the Church: one, the Latitudinarians, whose principal object was the maintenance of the national Church; another, the Revivalists, who considered a separation unavoidable when the cause of true religion should be truly served; and a third, which considered it possible to reach the object of the Revivalists by the means of the Latitudinarians. The synod assembled Sept. 11, 1848; but when the assembly altogether refused to attempt the establishment of a clear and positive confession of faith, F. Monod and Count Gasparin retired, and invited, a month later, the Protestant Church to meet at a new synod the following year. At this synod, which assembled Aug. 20, 1849, thirteen churches perfectly constituted, and eighteen churches in process of formation, were represented; an explicit confession of faith was adopted, and the Union des Eglises évangéliques de France was constituted. The imperial decree of March 26, 1852, made considerable changes in the organization of the Reformed Church in France (thus it gave back to the parishioners the right to elect their pastor); but on the development of the internal life of the Church it had no influence. The last hope of healing the split was the convocation of a national synod such as had not met since the synod of Loudun, 1659.

June 6, 1872, the thirtieth national synod met in Paris, but not under the most favorable auspices. All relations had ceased for several years between the orthodox and the liberal; and the incessant polemics had caused many to entirely forget that they were members of the same church. A vehement debate arose on the question of the confession of faith. By a vote of sixty-one against forty-five, a short confession was adopted, and its subscription made obligatory on all young pastors. But the result of this vote was, that, when the synod assembled in a second session (Nov. 20, 1873), the seats of the left stood empty, and the liberal party was represented only by a protest laid on the table. There was, however, on both sides, among the orthodox as well as among the liberals, a strong feeling against a schism, even though it might be effected without the separating party losing any of the advantages which accrue to the Church from its connection with the State. In a circular of Nov. 12, 1874, the liberals declared that the difference between the orthodox and themselves was not a question of faith, but simply a question of authority in matters of faith; that though, on account of this difference, there had arisen factions within the Reformed Church, these factions were not sects, etc. Equally conciliatory are the orthodox in their expressions; but there is nevertheless very little hope at present that a new national synod will be able to bring about a full and thorough agreement.

FRANCIS OF ASSISI, St., was b. at Assisi, 1182; d. there Oct. 4, 1226. His true name was Giovanni Francesco Bernardone. His father was a rich merchant. Handsome, bright, and adventurous, with a keen relish of beauty in all its manifestations, but disinclined to serious work of any description, he grew up without learning any thing, became the leader of a club (corti) of the gay youths of Assisi, served in a campaign against Perugia, and was taken prisoner, etc. But a heavy sickness which befell him brought a change into his life. He retired into solitude; and when again he appeared in the world it was as a nurse to the sick, selecting such as suffered from contagious or disgusting diseases. He made a pilgrimage to Rome; and, while there, a voice from above seemed to say to him that he should go and restore the ruined house of God. He took the words in their literal meaning; and, with the money which he begged together, he rebuilt a small decayed church in his native city (the Portiuncula), which ever after remained his favorite residence. A sermon he heard on Matt. x. 9, 10, opened up a new channel to his energy. He determined to become a preacher, to restore the ruined house of God in a higher sense of the word; and fitted out like one of the apostles, without shoes, and with no staff (for he had already some time ago disinherited himself), he began to preach penitence in the streets of Assisi. He made an impression. Other young men joined him; and in 1210 he lived with ten followers in hermitages near the Portiuncula Church. For these ten followers he wrote a set of rules containing the common monastic vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience, but emphasizing the first point with particular stress. He then repaired to Rome, to have his rules confirmed, and his society recognized, by the Pope; but he obtained only the verbal assent of Innocent III. Shortly after his return from Rome, however, he was joined by Clara Sciffi, the foundress of the order of the Clarisses (which article see); and this circumstance threw great lustre both over his person and his enterprise. In 1212 he sent out the brethren, two and two, to reform the world by preaching penitence. He went himself to Tuscany. In Perugia, Pisa, and Florence he found many followers; in Cortona he was able to found the first Franciscan monastery; from the Count of Casentino he received Monte Alverno as a present. But the five brethren he had sent to Morocco to preach the gospel to the Mohammedans were martyred; and he now determined to go thither himself. In Spain, however, through which he took his way, he was detained by sickness, and compelled to return. Meanwhile, the order grew steadily and rapidly in Italy. At the general assembly of the order, in 1219, no less than five thousand members came together; and brethren were sent to Spain, Egypt, Africa, Greece, England, and Hungary. Hitherto every attempt the order had made to penetrate into Germany had failed. But in 1221, Casarius of Spire, with twelve other brethren of German descent, went to Germany; and from that moment the order took root in the country. In the same year Francis himself set out for Egypt, and actually preached before the Sultan, though without any effect. The success of the order was now fully assured; and the Pope was consequently willing to transform his verbal assent into official acknowledgment. By a bull of 1223 Honorius III. confirmed the rules, and sanctioned the order, and Francis was made its first general. In the very next year, however, he left the government of the order to Elias of Cortona, and retired to the Portiuncula Church, where he died. He was canonized in 1228 by Gregory IX.

LIT. — His Opuscula were published by WADDING, Antwerp, 1623, and often afterwards. FRANCIS OF PAULA, St., b. at Paula, Naples, 1416; d. at Plessis-les-Tours, France, April 2, 1507; entered, when he was twelve years old, the Franciscan monastery of San Marco, in Calabria, and became in a short time a great virtuoso in fasting and other ascetic practices. When he was fourteen years old, he retired to a cave on the seashore, where he lived as a hermit; and when he was twenty, so great a number of hermits had gathered around him, that he could constitute them an order, and give them a rule. They were to outshine the Franciscans in austerity; and to the three vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience was added a fourth one, of perpetual fasting; that is, of refraining not only from all kinds of flesh, but also from milk, butter, cheese, eggs, etc. The order was confirmed in 1474 by Sixtus IV., under the name of the "Hermits of St. Francis," which by Alexander VI. was changed to that of the "Minims," and Francis was made its superior. His fame as a miracle-worker was so great, that Louis XI., on his death-bed, had him brought to France, and implored him to prolong his life; which, however, he refused to try. Charles VIII. also held him in great favor; and he remained in France, where he founded several monasteries. He was canonized by Leo X. in 1519. See HILARION DE COSTE: Le portrait de S. François de Paul, Paris, 1655; FR. GIRY: Vie de S. François de Paul, Paris, 1680; Act. Sanct., April; [ROLLAND: Histoire de Saint François de Paule, 2d ed., Paris, 1876]. See MINIMS.

FRANCIS OF SALES, St., b. at Sales, Savoy, 1567; d. at Lyons, Dec. 23, 1622; studied law and theology in Paris and Padua; entered the church against the will of his parents; was ordained a priest in 1591, and appointed a member of the chapter of the Bishop of Geneva, who, since the victory of the Reformation in that city, resided at the neighboring Annecy. Very successful in re-establishing the Roman Church in the Chablais and the Pays de Gex, he acquired a great fame as a missionary among the Protestants. He even tried to convert Beza; and his Roman biographers assert that the number of his Protestant converts amounted to seventy-two thousand. He was, at all events, one of the most energetic and influential representatives of the Roman-Catholic re-action which set in immediately after the Reformation. In 1599 he was made co-adjutor to the Bishop of Geneva, and in 1602 he became Bishop of Geneva himself. In 1604 he founded, together with Madame de Chantal, the order of the Visitants. With Sister Angelica of Port Royal, he also maintained very intimate relations. As a writer he is a precursor of Molinos and Fénelon, the first representatives of the so-called Quietism. His collected works have often been published; e.g., in Paris, 1836 (4 vols.), again in 1874 sq. He was canonized in 1665, and made a doctor of the church in 1877 by Pius IX. His life was written by Marsollier, [Hamon (Paris, 1854), and Pérennés (Paris, 1864)]. FRANCIS XAVIER, b. at Xavier, in Navarre, April 7, 1506; d. in Canton, China, Dec. 2, 1552; was a teacher of Aristotelian philosophy in Paris when he became acquainted with Loyola; and was one of the original members of the Compagnia Jesu. Until the order was confirmed by the Pope, he labored in the hospitals of Northern Italy. He then went as a missionary to the East Indies. April 7, 1541, he left Portugal, and May 6, 1542, he landed at Goa. Seven years he spent in the Indies and the Malayan Archipelago. In 1549 he went to Japan, where he spent two years; and in 1552 he went to China, where he died. The immediate result of his missionary labor was, perhaps, not so very great, as he did not understand the languages, but was compelled to use an interpreter: at all events, it seems a great exaggeration to call him the apostle of the Indies, and to compare him with Paul. But indirectly he exercised a great influence by organizing and consolidating the Portuguese mission in the Indies, and by opening up Japan and China to the Christian missionaries. The principal source of his life is his Letters, the best edition of which is that of Bologna (1795). His life was written by Tursellini, 1596; Joar de Lucena, 1600; Bontours, 1682; Reithmeier, 1846 (Roman-Catholic); and by Venn, 1862, and W. Hoffmann, 1869 (Protestant). G. PLITT.

FRANCIS, Convers, D.D., a Unitarian clergyman; b. at West Cambridge, Mass., Nov. 9, 1795; d. at Cambridge, April 7, 1863. He graduated at Harvard in 1815; was pastor of the Unitarian Church in Watertown from 1819 to 1842, and professor of "pulpit eloquence and pastoral care" at Harvard from 1842 until his death. He published some lectures, and wrote the biographies of Rev. John Eliot and Sebastian Râle for SPARKS'S Am. Biogr.

FRANCISCANS (Minorites, Gray Friars, in England and Ireland, sometimes also the Seraphic Brethren), The Order of the, was founded by St. Francis of Assisi in 1210, and confirmed by Honorius III. in 1223. In the middle of the thirteenth century it had eight thousand monasteries, with two hundred thousand monks.

This extraordinary success was due to various causes. Immediately after his death, the founder of the order was transformed into a kind of divinity in the eyes of the time. The story that Christ had appeared to him on Monte Alverno, and imprinted on his hands and feet the stigmata of the crucifixion, was universally believed. Pope Alexander IV. and St. Clara had seen the marks; Gregory IX., Nicholas III., Benedict XII., Paul V., vouched for the truth. When Bonaventura wrote his life of St. Francis, the most incredible fictions would be easily believed when told of the "seraphic" saints; and in 1399 Bartholomew Albizzi actually instituted a comparison between Christ and St. Francis, in his Liber Conformitatum. Of still greater effect were the enormous privileges which the popes granted to the order. Already in 1222 Honorius III. allowed the Franciscans to celebrate service, though with closed doors, in places which were under the ban. Soon after, they obtained the right to preach wherever they liked without first procuring the consent of the bishop or the parish priest. They were permitted to hear confession, and give absolution; and, in the same year they were constituted as an order, they received the Portiuncula indulgence; that is, every one who visited the Portiuncula Church on the anniversary of its consecration (Aug. 2) received absolution. But, beyond these and other favorable circumstances, the very idea on which the order was based, the very principle on which it worked, corresponded to the deepest wants of the time. Everybody felt that reform was necessary; and the humble, miserable Franciscan, clad in rags, but filled with holy enthusiasm, struck everybody as the reformer.

But success always engenders jealousy; and the Dominicans were the born rivals of the Franciscans. The two orders fought for a time cordially together, side by side, as long as they had a common object; namely, to get access to the universities. But hardly were Bonaventura the Franciscan, and Thomas Aquinas the Dominican, installed as doctores theologicæ at the university of Paris, before a strongly marked scientific difference between the two orders became apparent, and it continued to separate them during the whole period of the middle ages. The Franciscans were realists; the Dominicans, nominalists: the Franciscans leaned towards Semi-Pelagianism; the Dominicans were ardent disciples of Augustine: the Franciscans were Scotists; the Dominicans were Thomists: in the debate on the immaculate conception of Mary, the Franciscans said Yes, and the Dominicans, No. But the difference was by no means confined to the sphere of science: it came to many vexatious and sometimes ridiculous outbursts of rivalry between the two orders also in practical life.

Of much greater importance, however, was the difference which arose within the order itself almost immediately after its foundation. The absolute poverty which the founder had ordered seemed to some to be a mere impediment to the success of the order; while by others it was vindicated as the very character of the order. There thus arose two parties, — a milder, headed by Elias of Cortona; and a severer, headed by Casarius of Spire (see H. RYBKA, Elias von Cortona, Leipzig, 1874); and the contest between these two parties not only threw the order itself into confusion, but at times also involved the Pope and the kings in serious difficulties. Nicholas III. attempted a reconciliation by the bull Exiit, 1279, in which he explained, that though the Franciscans were not allowed to own things, they were, of course, allowed to use things; that the real owner of all the treasures, grounds, buildings, etc., which the order had amassed, was the Pope; and that the members of the order only had the use of these treasures by his permission, etc. This subtle distinction did not satisfy the severer party. Under the leadership of John of Oliva they raised a violent opposition to the bull and to the general of the order, Matthias of Aquas Spartas, who headed the milder party. The latter was victorious, however; and the Spiritualists, as the severer party was called, were cruelly persecuted. In Naples they were expelled; and in many places they were seized by the Inquisition, tortured, and burnt. Nevertheless, they continued their resistance, and under John XXII. the strife broke out with renewed vehemence; the general, Michael of Cesena, being this time at the head of the Spiritualists (see E. GUDENATZ, Michael von Cesena, Breslau, 1876). The result was a permanent split in the order. The Observants, the severer party, were formally recognized by the Council of Constance in its nineteenth sitting (Sept. 23, 1415); and Leo X., after an ineffectual attempt to gather the whole order under one observance, constituted the milder party, the Conventuals, an independent congregation, by a bull of 1517. Each division obtained its own superior; though that of the Observants (the minister generalis) took rank before that of the Conventuals (the magister generalis).

In another respect these internal differences contributed much to keep the order alive; and the frequent formation of more or less independent congregations proved the presence of an active principle of development and reform. By the Reformation the order lost heavily, and a great number of its convents were broken up. Nevertheless, at the beginning of the eighteenth century it still numbered about a hundred and fifteen thousand monks; and its monasteries are still flourishing, from the interior of Russia to the interior of America. It has produced five popes (Nicholas IV., Alexander V., Sixtus IV., Sixtus V., and Clement XIV.), a considerable number of theologians (Bonaventura, Alexander of Hales, Ockham, etc.), and of poets, Thomas de Celano, the author of Dies iræ, Jacopone da Todi, the author of Stabat mater, etc. (See OZANAM, Les poètes franciscains en Italie, Paris, 1852.)

LIT. — The history of the order has been written by an Irish Franciscan, LUCAS WADDING (Annales minorum s. trium ordinum a. s. Francisco institutorum), 17 vols., Rome, 1731–41, reaching to 1540, and continued to 1553 by I. DE LUCA. See also the works of HELYOT (vol. vii.) and HENRION-FEHR and F. FRANCK, Sebastian, b. at Donauwörth, 1499; d. at Basel, 1542; was appointed evangelical preacher at Gustenfeld, near Nuremberg, 1526, but resigned this position in 1528, and followed for some time the Anabaptists. Dissatisfied with them, too, he separated from them, and determined to belong to no party-church, but to devote his life to a literary representation of the ideal, the truly spiritual church. Sustaining himself and his family, first by running a soap-factory, and afterwards by working a printing-press, he published Chronika, Zeitbuch und Geschichtsbibel, Strassburg, 1531, the first German world's-history; Weltbuch, Cosmographie, Tübingen, 1534, the first German geography; and a great number of mystico-theological books, — Paradoxa, Die güldene Arch, Das Kriegsbüchlein, etc. But as these books contained very sharp criticisms, not only of the Roman, but also of the Reformed, churches, the author was bitterly persecuted, and driven from place to place. Nevertheless, his books became popular in the true sense of the word, and many of them are still living among the people. See C. A. HASE, Sebastian Franck, der Schwarmgeist, Leipzig, 1869.

FRANCKE, August Hermann, b. at Lübeck, March 23, 1663; d. at Halle, June 8, 1727; studied theology at Erfurt, Kiel, and Leipzig, where, together with Paul Anton, he founded the famous Collegium Philobiblicum. The spiritual direction which he ever afterwards followed he received from Spener, whom he met in 1688; and the success he achieved, and the enmity he aroused, at the very beginning of his career, were due to his "Pietism." In 1689 he began to lecture on the Epistles of St. Paul in the university of Leipzig, and his lectures attracted extraordinarily great audiences; but in 1690 they were forbidden by the faculty. In that year he was called as preacher to Erfurt, and, when he preached, the church was crowded; but he was suddenly ordered to leave the city within twenty-four hours. In 1691, however, he was appointed professor at the newly-founded university of Halle, first in Oriental languages, and afterwards in theology; and there, the homesteader of Pietism, he was allowed to develop all his energy undisturbed and in peace. [Of his works several have been translated into English, such as Manuductio ad Lectionem Scripturæ Sacræ, Halle, 1693, by Jacques, London, 1813; Nicodemus, a Treatise against the Fear of Man, London, 1709; and Footsteps of Divine Providence, London, 1797.] But it was less as a writer than as a teacher and practical philanthropist that Francke exercised his great influence. On Nov. 5, 1695, he received an orphan into his house; but, before the month ran out, he had nine, and twelve before New Year. The number steadily increasing, a neighboring house was bought, and, as this also soon proved too small, the foundation was laid, on July 24, 1698, of the Orphan Asylum, — the first and one of the greatest establishments of the kind. In 1695 he also opened a small children's school in his house. In 1698 the school numbered five hundred pupils, eleven hundred in 1709, over two thousand at the death of the master. In the same manner developed the printing-press and publishing establishment, which he connected with the Orphan Asylum: it is now one of the greatest publishing establishments of Germany. For the various foundations of Francke, see Die Stiftungen A. H. Franckes, Halle, 1863. An important source for his life and character is KRAMER: Beiträge zur Geschichte A. H. Franckes, Halle, 1861, containing his correspondence with Spener; Neue Beiträge, 1875 [and a Life of Francke, Halle, 1880 sq.]. A good biography of him is that by GUERICKE, Halle, 1827. Minor sketches of his life are very numerous.

FRANK, Jacob Joseph, a Hebrew sectary; b. in Poland, 1712; d. in Offenbach, Austria, Dec. 10, 1791. He acquired fame as an expounder of the Cabala, but accepted the doctrine of the Trinity, and founded a sect whose tenets are a mixture of Judaism and Christianity. He was compelled to declare himself a Christian, and was accordingly baptized into the Roman-Catholic Church at Warsaw, Dec. 25, 1759. A charge of heresy led to his imprisonment; and he was not released until 1773, when the Russians invaded Poland. He emigrated to Austria, was wonderfully successful in attracting followers, and by them was enabled to live in princely splendor. He pretended to be the Messiah, and his followers believed him to be immortal. See GRÄTZ: Frank und die Frankisten, Breslau, 1868.

FRANKENBERG, Johann Heinrich, was b. at Grossglogau, in Silesia, Sept. 18, 1726; d. at Breda, in Holland, June 11, 1804; studied theology in his native city and in Rome, and was made co-adjutor to the archbishop of Goertz 1749, archbishop of Malines 1759, and cardinal 1778. He was one of the most decided opponents against the church policy of Joseph II. The question was about the abolition of the episcopal seminaries, and the establishment of a general seminary, under royal superintendence, at Louvain. Frankenberg protested, and continued to protest, until the whole country was brought almost into open revolt. He also opposed the Revolution, and was by the Convent sentenced to deportation, but escaped by flight. See AUGUSTIN THEINER, Der Kardinal Frankenberg, Freiburg, 1850.

FRANKFURT CONCORDAT. See CONCORDAT.

FRANKFURT, The Council of, was convened by Charlemagne, in 794, at Frankfurt-on-the-Main, and was attended, according to later writers, by three hundred bishops, from Germany, Gaul, England, Spain, and Italy, and two delegates of the Pope. Fifty-six canons are ascribed to it, the most important of which are, — the first, condemning Felix and Elipandus, the leaders of the Adoptionists; and the second, condemning the decisions of the second Council of Nicæa (787) concerning image-worship, which had been accepted by the Pope. See MANSI, Concil., XIII.

FRANKINCENSE (Hebrew, lebana), the odorous resin of trees of the genus Boswellia, which grew in India and Arabia (Isa. lx. 6; Jer. vi. 20), and perhaps also in Palestine (Song of Songs iv. 14); was not only used as perfume (Song of Solomon iii. 6), but also for fumigation in sacrifices (Lev. ii. 2, 16, v. 11; Isa. xliii. 23, lxvi. 3), and was one of the ingredients in the perfume which was to be prepared for the sanctuary (Exod. xxx. 34). It was offered both morning and evening (Exod. xxx. 7 sq.), and used as an accompaniment of the meat offering (Lev. ii. 1, 16, vi. 15, xxiv. 7; Num. v. 15). Being one of the daily necessities, frankincense was often given as a freewill offering (1 Chron. ix. 29; Neh. xiii. 5, 9; Jer. xvii. 26, xli. 5). From its fragrant odor when burnt, the incense came to be an emblem of prayer (Ps. cxli. 2; Luke i. 10; Rev. v. 8, viii. 3). From notices of ancient writings we see that frankincense was also used in the religious services of the heathen. On the plant, comp. BORDWOOD, The Genus Boswellia, London, 1870. It is called frank, because of the freeness with which it burns, and gives forth its odors.

FRANKS, The, was the name of a wild, warlike, and cruel, but highly gifted Germanic race, which, divided into several branches (the Salian Franks, the Riparian Franks, etc.), lived, during the third century after Christ, on the right shore of the Rhine, along its middle and lower course. When Carausius conquered Brittany, and drew the legions away from Belgium, the Salian Franks crossed the Rhine; and though Roman historians tell us that they were often defeated by Constantius, Constantine, and Julian, they were never thrown back beyond the Rhine. In 406 they began to advance towards the west and the south; and in 486, Chlodwig, the son of Childeric, the son of Merowig, who in 481, when only fifteen years old, had succeeded his father as chief of the Salian Franks, defeated Syagrius, the Roman governor of Gaul, at Soissons, and extended the Frankish Empire to the Loire. In Gaul the Franks met with a remarkable after-bloom of the classical civilization; and though for centuries they remained rude and coarse and cruel to the very core of their being, yet so completely did they yield to the mental superiority of the conquered race, that, even before 490, Latin had become their official language,—the language in which their famous law, Lex Salica, was written down. In Gaul the Franks also met with Christianity; and though Chlodwig allowed his men to burn and plunder the Christian churches, he nevertheless stood in great awe of the Christian bishops. In 493 he married Chlothilde, a Burgundian princess, and a Christian. Their children were baptized; and Chlodwig, like many of his men, was hesitating with respect to this new and strange religion, when an incident decided his course. He was compelled in 496 to give battle to the Alemanni; and on the issue of this battle depended the very existence of the Frankish Empire in Gaul. But the Franks wavered; and in this emergency Chlodwig made a vow to the God of the Gauls, that, if he gained the victory, he would become a Christian. The victory he gained, and he and many of his men were baptized. But in this, as in so many other cases of conversion, the way from the baptism to a thorough Christianization was very long, a distance of several centuries.

FRATERNITIES (Fraternitas, Sodalitas) are associations formed in the Roman-Catholic Church for special religious purposes, such as nursing the sick, supporting the poor, practising some special devotion, etc., but of a less rigorous description than the monastic orders. They have their own statutes, religious exercises, privileges, etc.; but they stand under the authority of the bishops, and are only morally separated from the world. Such a fraternity, dedicated to Mary the Virgin, is mentioned by Odo, Bishop of Paris, about 1208; another, the so-called "Gonfalonieri," was confirmed by Clement V., 1265-71. Among the most prominent were those of the Scapulary, the Rosary, Corpus Christi, etc. One, the Fratres Pontifices, was formed for the purpose of procuring good bridges across the water-courses. The fraternities may be divided into four classes. 1. Those which particularly relate to the worship of Christ, such as the fraternities of The Most Holy Sacrament of the Altar, of The Most Holy Heart of Jesus, of The Most Holy Name of Jesus, The Holy Five Wounds, etc. 2. Those which pay particular honor unto the Virgin Mary. They are very numerous. The most famous one, and one of the most celebrated in modern times, is The Fraternity of the Most Holy and Immaculate Heart of Mary for the Conversion of Sinners, founded in Paris, 1837, by Abbé Dufriche Desgenettes. 3. Those formed for the honor of particular saints—very numerous. 4. Those that are charitable.

FRATRICELLI, FRATICELLI. Wishing to put an end to the split in the Franciscan order, which had prevailed for the larger part of the thirteenth century, Cœlestine V. authorized the brothers Petrus de Macerata and Petrus de Faro Sempronina, and some other Italian Spirituals, to form an independent congregation under the name of Pauperes Eremitæ Domini Cœlestini. This congregation was heavily persecuted by the rest of the Franciscans, and finally dissolved by Boniface VIII.; but, excited by Peter Olivi's apocalyptic prophecies and vehement invectives against the Pope, the hermits, now generally called "Fratricelli," determined to resist. They declared that there had been no true pope since Cœlestine. They pushed the vow of poverty to the extreme, whence they were often called "Bizochi," from the Italian bizochio, French besace, a "beggar's sack." They entered into communication with the Beghards, and taught that they were possessed of the Holy Spirit, and exempt from sin; that they needed neither penitence nor sacraments, etc. An attempt of Clement V. to re-unite the Spirituals with the Franciscans failed in 1312; and meanwhile the Fraticelli grew more and more unmanageable. In 1314 they expelled by force the Franciscans from the monasteries of Béziers and Narbonne. This caused John XXII. to adopt severer measures against them. In 1317 the Inquisition was ordered to step in. In Italy, Sicily, and Southern France, where they had spread widely, a number of Fraticelli were seized by the Inquisition between 1318 and 1352, condemned, and burnt. Only a few were willing to recant. But after the middle of the fourteenth century they gradually disappeared. By later writers they, like all heretical sects, have been accused of various abominable vices; but there are no proofs.

C. SCHMIDT.
FRAYSSINOUS, Denys, b. at Curières, in Gascony, May 9, 1765; d. at St. Geniès, also in Gascony, Dec. 12, 1841; studied theology, and appeared, after the conclusion of the concordat of 1801, as one of the most zealous and most successful agitators for the Roman-Catholic Church, and against the reigning atheism and materialism. In 1809 he was forbidden to continue his conferences in the Church of St. Sulpice, in Paris; but he resumed his work after the Restoration, and was made grand-almoner to Louis XVIII., Bishop of Hermopolis in partibus infidelium, peer of France, and minister of public instruction from 1824 to 1828. He went into exile with Charles X., and after his return to France he lived in retirement. His principal works are, Les vrais principes de l'église gallicane, 1818 (in which he proves himself a staunch defender of the principles of Gallicanism), and Defense de Christianisme, 1828, translated into English, London, 1836, 2 vols.

FREDERICK III., THE WISE, Elector of Saxony 1486-1525; was b. at Torgau, Jan. 17, 1463; and d. at Lochau, May 5, 1525. He was a man of common sense, probity, and firmness, and much respected, both in the realm and among foreign princes. One of the most consequential of his acts as a ruler was the foundation, in 1502, of the university of Wittenberg, and the appointment of Luther and Melancthon as professors. It was by no means his intention, however, to make his new university a school of reform: on the contrary, he was as yet a true son of Rome. In 1493 he had made a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, and brought back five thousand pieces of relics for the church of Wittenberg. Nevertheless, when Luther, in 1517, nailed his theses on the church-door in Wittenberg, the elector kept quiet; and when the Roman curia, in 1518, demanded that Luther should be sent to Rome to be punished for heresy, the elector refused: yea, when Dr. Eck returned from Rome in 1519 with the bull of excommunication against Luther, the elector declined to lend his aid to its enforcement; and, when Luther publicly and solemnly burnt this same bull, the elector saw no reason why he should interfere. The greatest service, however, which Frederick the Wise did to the cause of the Reformation was the removal of Luther to the Wartburg after the Diet of Worms, probably the only means of protecting him against the Pope and the emperor. There was in this policy,—so firm, so consistent, and yet so cautious,—no doubt, a high political wisdom; but there was also something else. A spark of Luther's conviction had fallen into Frederick's soul; and shortly before he died he took the Lord's Supper under both forms. See TUTZSCHMANN: Friedrich der Weise, Grimma, 1848; G. SPALATIN: Fried. d. W., ed. by Neudecker and Preller, Jena, 1851; [CARL BECKER: Das edle sächsische Fürsten-Kleeblatt, Berlin, 1861; K. FREDERICK III., THE PIOUS, Elector of the Palatinate, 1559–76; was educated by Bishop Eberhard of Liège, and at the court of Charles V., but was, nevertheless, early impressed by the ideas of the Reformation. In 1537 he married the Lutheran Princess Maria of Brandenburg-Bayreuth, and in 1549 he openly embraced Lutheranism. On his accession he found the Lutheran Church almost fully established in the Palatinate; but, shortly after, a violent controversy broke out between the Lutheran and the Reformed theologians, concerning the Lord's Supper. Frederick asked Melancthon to interfere; but the memoir which Melancthon wrote approached the ideas of Zwingli or Calvin so closely, that Frederick himself became wavering. The religious disputation at Heidelberg (1560) completed his conversion; and, as his people also seemed inclined to Calvinism, the festivals of Mary and the saints were abolished; the altars, organs, baptismal fonts, images, etc., disappeared from the churches; Calvinists were appointed as teachers and preachers; the government of the church was confided to a council-board, consisting of three ecclesiastical and three lay members, etc. In 1562 appeared the Heidelberg Catechism, written by Ursinus and Olevianus, but under the eyes of the elector himself; and it found so much favor, that it immediately was translated into French, English, Dutch, and Latin, and adopted almost by the whole body of the Reformed Church. An attempt was made by the Lutheran princes of the empire to prevent the establishment of Calvinism in the Palatinate; and they even went so far as to threaten the elector with war and deposition. But at the diet of Augsburg (1566) he met them with such courage and straightforwardness, that the case was dropped. To the end of his life he was a great support to the Reformed Church, both in France and in the Netherlands. See his life, by

FREE CHURCH OF SCOTLAND. See SCOTLAND, FREE CHURCH OF.

FREE CONGREGATIONS (Friends of Light, Protestant Friends) were formed in Prussia during the fifth decade of the present century, as the result of a rationalistic re-action against the revival of positive Christianity. Under the presidency of Uhlich, pastor of Pömmelte, near Magdeburg, a number of pastors belonging to the old rationalistic school assembled in 1841, first at Gnadau, and then at Halle; agreed upon a platform of nine strongly pronounced rationalistic propositions; adopted the name of Friends of Light, afterwards Protestant Friends; and decided upon the publication of a periodical,—Blätter für christliche Erbauung. At their seventh meeting at Coethen (1844), a hundred and thirty theologians and about five hundred laymen were present. Uhlich delivered a lecture, in which he openly rejected the doctrines of hereditary sin, atonement, the trinity, the divinity of Christ, and the Church. He was followed by Wislicenus, pastor at Halle, and a rationalist of a younger stamp, but of a still deeper dye. The stand-point of Wislicenus was a popularized form of the pantheism of the young Hegelian school; and in his lecture, Ob Schrift? Ob Geist? he broke with the church of which he was a servant, and which establishes Scripture as the rule of faith. The authorities then interfered; and in 1845 Wislicenus separated from the Established Church of Prussia, and formed a free congregation at Halle. Other free congregations were formed by Uhlich at Magdeburg, by Rupp at Königsberg, and at other places, often accompanied with rather tumultuous expressions of enthusiasm. A combination was, however, brought about with the German Catholics in 1847; and in 1848 the leaders of the movement found themselves in the Parliament, and generally in the political arena as the leaders of the nation. But when the revolution was over, and the re-action set in, a great change took place. While Uhlich, Wislicenus, Rupp, and, indeed, most of the leaders, gradually moved onward from one negation to another, until at last they ended in complete nihilism, without any positive basis at all, teaching a religion without any God, and forming congregations without any faith, the government began to suspect the congregations as political instruments. In Saxony and Bavaria they were completely suppressed; and in Prussia they lived on, only under great difficulties, and affiliating themselves with atheists and materialists. In 1868, however, there were a hundred and twenty-one free congregations in Germany, with about twenty-five thousand members. In the United States of America there are also found some free German congregations,—in Philadelphia, St. Louis, Hoboken,—which mostly act in unison, more or less cordial, with the various free-thinker associations. KAHNIS.

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, established in Boston, Mass., May 30, 1867, aims at the emancipation of religion from all sectarian limits, the reconciliation of faiths, and the application of the scientific method to the study of theology. Mr. O. B. Frothingham was the first president. Each member holds and defends in their meetings those views upon the various subjects which come before the association which he deems truest. The utmost liberty of opinion is given. The elastic nature of the organization, for "any person desiring to co-operate" is "considered a member," renders exact statistics impossible. Up to this time (1882) the association has not attempted to organize local societies, but contented itself with holding conventions, and distributing publications. From 1867 to 1880 the Annual Report was issued in pamphlet form: since then it has been published in the Index of Boston, Mass.

FREE SPIRIT, Brethren of. See BRETHREN OF THE FREE SPIRIT.

FREETHINKERS, a general designation denoting a class of writers and thinkers who deny the truth of revealed religion. The term was applied primarily to the deists of England. A letter to Locke, in 1697, refers to Toland as "a candid freethinker." In 1713 Antony Collins published his work, entitled A Discourse of Freethinking, occasioned by the Rise and Growth of a Sect called Freethinkers. The term "free thought" is often used in a broad sense for all rationalism and infidelity. See A. S. FARRAR, Hist. of Free Thought (Bampton Lectures), Lond., 1863. See DEISM.

FREEWILL BAPTISTS, a denomination of American Christians who baptize by immersion, and are Arminian in doctrine.

History. — The first Freewill-Baptist Church was organized at New Durham, N.H., in 1780, by Benjamin Randall (1749–1808). Converted under the preaching of Whitefield, Randall joined the Baptist Church. In 1779 he was called to account for holding to an unlimited atonement and the freedom of the will, and was disfellowshipped. He was ordained in 1780, and at once began to propagate his views. A sect with similar tenets had been organized in 1751, in North Carolina, under the preaching of Shubael Stearns, and were called "The Separate Baptists." Randall's followers continued to claim to be Baptists; but the claim was repudiated by the original Baptists, who called them "Freewillers," — a designation which they themselves subsequently adopted. In 1827 the first General Conference was held: and the body has extended to Canada, New Brunswick, and Nova Scotia.

Doctrine and Polity. — The Freewill Baptists agree in all the fundamental Christian doctrines with other evangelical denominations. With the regular Baptists they practise baptism by immersion. They differ from the Baptists on the questions of predestination, the extent of the atonement, and the ability of the sinner to repent. On these points their Book of Faith thus expresses the views of the denomination: "God has ordained man with power of free choice, and governs him by moral laws and motives; and this power of free choice is the exact measure of his responsibility. All events are present with God from everlasting to everlasting; but his knowledge of them does not in any sense cause them, nor does he decree all events which he knows will occur" (chap. iii. 2, 3). "The call of the Gospel is co-extensive with the atonement to all men, both by word and the strivings of the Spirit: so that salvation is rendered equally possible to all; and, if any fail of eternal life, the fault is wholly their own" (chap. viii.). While they hold to regeneration, they deny the doctrine of the perseverance of saints. The Freewill Baptists differ also from the Baptists in practising open communion.

The church has an ordained ministry, and heretofore individual churches have ordained ministers; but the Conference of 1880 deprecated this practice, and called upon the churches to proceed on such occasions with the advice of the Quarterly Meetings. The church adopts a form of government intermediate between the Congregational and the Presbyterian. The individual churches are independent organizations, governed by elders and deacons, and alone have authority over their members. There is no court of appeal for the member. There are three associate church bodies. The Quarterly Meeting is composed of two or more ministers voluntarily bound together. The Yearly Meeting is composed of two or more Quarterly Meetings, and the "General Conference of the Freewill-Baptist Connection" is composed of delegates from the Yearly Meetings, and assembles every three years, in the month of October. Each of these associations may "labor with" the next lower down to the church "as a body;" but neither has appellate jurisdiction.

Statistics. — The report of the General Conference of 1880 (the centennial year) gives the following numbers: churches 1,432, ordained ministers 1,213, communicants 78,000. Almost one-half of their strength (or 36,000 members) is concentrated in New England. The denomination is much stronger in Maine, where it has 290 churches and 15,000 communicants, than in any other State. The denomination maintains flourishing institutions at Lewiston, Me. (Bates College), and Hillsdale, Mich.; also has colleges at Ridgeville, Ind., and Rio Grande, O.; and maintains a mission in India, with eight missionaries and four assistants. The Freewill or Free Baptists number 9,389 members in New Brunswick, and 3,368 in Nova Scotia. See STEWART: History of the Freewill Baptists (from 1780 to 1830), Dover, 1862; A Treatise on the Faith and Practice of the Freewill Baptists, Dover, 1871; Freewill-Baptist Register and Year-Book, 1880.

FREEMAN, James, D.D., pastor of the first Unitarian Church of New England; b. in Charlestown, Mass., April 22, 1759; d. at Newton, Mass., Nov. 14, 1835. Graduating at Harvard College in 1777, he was called to King's Chapel, then an Episcopal Church, Boston, as reader, in 1782. He gave up the belief in the Trinity, and, being refused ordination by the bishop, was ordained pastor by his church (1787), which adopted his views. Thus the oldest Episcopal Church in New England became the first Unitarian Church of America. Dr. Freeman was a man of fine social qualities, and much power in the pulpit. He was one of the founders of the Massachusetts Historical Society, and in 1832 published a volume of Sermons and Addresses. See WARE: Unitarian Biog.; and SPRAGUE'S Annals, viii. 162.

FRELINGHUYSEN, Hon. Theodore, b. at Millstone, Somerset County, N.J., March 28, 1787;

d. at New Brunswick, N.J., April 12, 1861. He was graduated with the highest honors at Nassau Hall 1804; called to the bar 1808. From 1817 to 1829 he was attorney-general of New Jersey; served a term in the United-States Senate, during which he delivered many eloquent speeches, and displayed in the highest stations his earnest Christian character. He heartily supported all acts tending to ameliorate the condition of the poor and oppressed, or to elevate their moral or religious character. He advocated bills for the improvement of the condition of the Indian tribes, and the suppression of Sunday mails. When his term was ended, he resumed his practice. In 1837 and 1838 he was mayor of Newark, N.J. In 1839 he became chancellor of the University of the City of New York, from which office he went in 1850 to the presidency of Rutgers's College, New Brunswick, N.J., and held it until death. In 1844 he was an unsuccessful candidate for the Vice-Presidency of the United States on the ticket with Henry Clay for President. At one time he was president of the American Bible Society, the American Tract Society, and the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions. "His eloquent tongue was ever ready to plead for every good Christian or humane cause." He was one of the most distinguished Christian laymen of his day. See his Memoir, by the Rev. T. W. CHAMBERS, D.D., N.Y., 1863.

FRENCH CONFESSION OF FAITH. See GALILICAN CONFESSION.

FRENCH PROPHETS were Camisards (see art.), who appeared in England in 1706, and prophesied the speedy establishment of the Messiah's kingdom. For a time they produced a great impression, and won the allegiance of distinguished men, among whom was John Lacey, who, although previously a member of Dr. Calamy's congregation, "entered into all their absurdities, except that of a community of goods, to which he strongly objected, having an income of two thousand pounds per annum." But these prophets overreached themselves by their fanaticism, even going to the length of asserting that one of their number, lately deceased, would rise from the dead upon a certain day. Failure in this and other predictions weakened their hold even on the credulous, and their little day ended in disgrace. FRESENIUS, Johann Philipp, b. at Niederwieschen, near Kreuznach, Oct. 22, 1705; d. at Francfort, July 4, 1761; studied theology at Strassburg; and was appointed minister at Oberwieschen, 1727, court-preacher at Giessen, 1734, and preacher at St. Peter's in Francfort, 1743. The influence which he exercised as a preacher and as a minister in general was very great and beneficial. Several collections of his sermons are still living in the church; such as Die heilsamen Betrachtungen (1750, new edition, 1872), Epistelpredigten (1754, new edition, 1858), etc. He followed the Spener-Francke direction, but was strongly opposed to the Moravian Brethren, against whom he wrote many volumes. His Antwieslingerus against the Jesuits also attracted much attention (1731). His life was written (1743) by K. K. Griesbach, the father of the famous editor of the Greek Testament. Goethe describes him, in the fourth book of Wahrheit u. Dichtung, as a "mild man, of handsome and pleasing appearance, who was universally revered in Francfort as an exemplary minister and good pulpit-orator, but not relished by those who sympathized with the Moravians, because of his attacks upon them." FREYLINGHAUSEN, Johann Anastasius, one of the principal hymnists and leaders of the Pietistic movement in Germany; b. at Gandersheim, near Wolfenbüttel, in Hanover, Dec. 2, 1670; d. at Halle, Feb. 12, 1739. He received from his mother a strictly pious though legalistic education; studied theology at Jena, 1689; became acquainted with Augustus Hermann Francke, the founder of the Orphan House at Halle, married his only daughter, Anastasia, and succeeded him in 1727. In connection with him and Spener he labored for the revival of practical piety in Germany. He combined the activity of an academic teacher, pastor, and superintendent of the benevolent institutions at Halle, and exerted a very salutary influence upon the rising generation. His theological works, of which the Fundamental Theology (Grundlegung der Theologie, 1703) deserves to be mentioned, are not distinguished for any vigor or depth of thought, but for their piety and practical tendency, in opposition to the dry and cold scholasticism which then prevailed in the German universities. His most valuable productions are forty-four hymns, pregnant with Scripture truth, and fervent love to the Saviour. Some of them have passed into common use, and found a place in every good German hymn-book; as, "Wer ist wohl wie du, Jesu sisse Ruh," "Jesus ist kommen, Grund ewiger Freuden," "Mein Herz gieb dich zufrieden," etc. [See translations in Miss Catharine Winkworth's Lyra Germanica, first and second series.] Freylinghausen published also one of the best German hymn-books, in 2 vols., Halle, 1704 and 1713. The historical significance of this collection consists in its pietistic spirit, and the introduction of the element of subjective devotion as a supplement to the older, more objective, and churchly hymns of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries.

FRIDOLIN or FRIDOLD (also Tridolin or Trudelin, often styled the "First Apostle of Allemannia," and still venerated as the patron of the Swiss canton of St. Glarus) was a native of Scotland, and preached Christianity to his heathen countrymen, but repaired afterwards to Poitiers, where he restored the church and congregation of St. Hilary (ruined and corrupted under the influence of Arianism) to their former splendor and purity. Moved by a vision of St. Hilary, he set out for Allemania, and received from Chlodvig an island in the Rhine (Säckingen), where he built a church, and founded a monastery, and where he died. All that is known of Fridolin is drawn from a Life of him written by Balthar, a monk of Säckingen, and dedicated to Notker Labeo of St. Gallen, who died 1022; but as this Life is written four centuries after the time of Fridolin, as it presents several chronological difficulties, and is much embellished with legendary ornament, the historical foundation it furnishes is rather slim. The best edition of it is found in MOXE: Quellensammlung d. badischen Landesgeschichte, Carlsruhe, 1845, vol. I. See GELPKE: *Kirchengeschichte d. FRIENDLY ISLANDS. This group, discovered by Tasman, 1643, and named by Capt. Cook, on account of their friendly demeanor towards him, lies in the Southern Pacific, two hundred and fifty miles south-east of the Fiji group. It consists of a hundred and fifty islands with an area of four hundred square miles. The islands are mostly of coral formation, some of them, however, of volcanic origin. Tonga, the largest, is twenty-one by twelve miles, and Vavau, the second in size, is forty-two miles in circumference. In 1847 the missionaries estimated the population to be fifty thousand. It does not now exceed twenty or twenty-five thousand. These islanders were excellent seamen, and frequently visited the Fiji group to procure wood for the manufacture of boats. They were superior in intelligence to the Fijians, but, with them, cannibals, and far sunk in iniquity. The first missionaries went to them in 1797, of whom several were murdered, and the rest retired in 1800. In 1825 the Wesleyan Missionary Society undertook missionary work amongst them in earnest. In 1834 a revival of great power passed over the islands. King George Tubou was converted, and became an active Christian worker, often occupying the pulpit himself. A great change took place in the habits of the people. Slavery has been utterly abolished, the language has been reduced to writing, schools are scattered through the islands, and education is compulsory. The Christians of the islands early sent missionaries to the Fiji group. In 1869 the contributions of the native churches were £5,689, £3,000 of which were devoted to benevolent and missionary purposes. One of the last reports gave 126 churches, 8,300 communicants, and 17,000 attendants on church.

FRIENDS, Society of. The rise of this body of Christians is one of the most noteworthy events in the religious history of England in the seventeenth century. In the midst of the efforts then made to rescue the Church from the corruptions which had grown up around it, there were men who felt that Luther and Cranmer had not gone far enough, and that there was still much sacerdotalism to be purged away, before the original simplicity of Christianity could be restored. Such men found a leader in George Fox. He and his followers announced as their aim the revival of primitive Christianity; and this phrase remains as the best definition of their work. The privilege of direct access to God, without the intervention of human priest or rite, was revealed to Fox's soul. Having found one; "even Christ Jesus, who could speak to his condition," he longed to impart his discovery of the spirituality of true religion to others, and in 1647 began his labors in public ministry, going forth through England on foot, and at his own charges. His message appears to have been mainly to direct the people to the great Shepherd and Bishop of souls, who died for them, and had sent his spirit into their hearts, to instruct and guide them in the things pertaining to life and salvation. "I was sent," he says, "to turn people from darkness to the light, that they might receive Christ Jesus; for, to as many as should receive him in his light, I saw that he would give power to become the sons of God, which I had obtained by receiving Christ. I was to direct people to the Spirit that gave forth the Scriptures, by which they might be led into all truth, and so up to Christ and God, as those had been who gave them forth." To the illumination of the Holy Spirit in the heart he turned the attention of all, as that by which sin was made manifest and reprov'd, duty unfolded, and ability given to run with alacrity and joy in the way of God's commandments. He preached repentance towards God, and faith in the Lord Jesus Christ, and showed that one became a true disciple, not by a bare assent of the understanding to the truths contained in the Bible, nor by any outward rite, but by a real change of the heart and affections, through the power of the Holy Spirit. The soil was ready for the seed, and the rapid spread of Fox's doctrines was surprising. All classes flocked to his preaching; and among his converts were persons of the best families in the kingdom, priests of the Established Church, and ministers of other societies, and many men of wealth and learning. For four years Fox was the only minister of the society: the second preacher was Elizabeth Hooton. In the fifth year there were twenty-five preachers; in the seventh, upwards of sixty. Within eight years, ministers of Friends preached in various parts of Europe, in Asia, and in Africa, and heroically endured persecution in Rome, Malta, Austria, Hungary, and other places. Among the noteworthy preachers in the earlier years, Francis Howgill, John Audland, and Samuel Fisher had been clergymen; George Bishop, Richard Hubberthorn, and William Ames, officers in the army; Anthony Pearson and John Crook, justices of peace. The courtly and cultured Penn, and Barclay, a member of a noble family in Scotland, a near relative of the Stuart kings, and a man of thorough classical and patristic scholarship, joined the society about twenty years after its formation. In 1680 the number of Friends in Great Britain was not less than sixty-six thousand.

America was first visited by Friends in 1656,

when Mary Fisher and Anne Austin arrived in Boston from Barbadoes, to which island they had gone to preach the gospel the preceding year. They were charged with holding "very dangerous, heretical, and blasphemous opinions," and were kept in close confinement, at first on the vessel, and afterwards in jail. Their books were burned by the common executioner, and even their persons searched to discover signs of witchcraft. They were then sent back to Barbadoes. In 1660 this same Mary Fisher held an interview with Sultan Mahomet IV., at Adrianople, where he was then encamped with his army. Two days after the banishment of the first Friends from Boston, a vessel having on board eight other Friends arrived from London. They were at once imprisoned, and, eleven weeks afterwards, sent back to England. But, nothing daunted, others of the same faith continued to arrive in New England, to suffer scourging, imprisonment, banishment, and four of their number (William Robinson and Marmaduke Stevenson in 1659, Mary Dyer in 1660, and William Leddra in 1661), death by the gallows. Monthly Meetings had been established in New England before 1660, and in 1661 a Yearly Meeting on Rhode Island, which has been kept up regularly to the present date. New York, New Jersey, Maryland, Virginia, and the Carolinas were visited very early; and, although there was much persecution, flourishing communities of Friends sprung up. George Fox himself made an extended journey in America in 1671-73. But the most important event in the early history of the society on this continent was the settlement of Pennsylvania by William Penn and a large number of his brethren in faith, beginning in 1682. In 1690 there were about ten thousand Friends in the American Colonies.

While no Friends in England suffered immediate martyrdom, the sum of their persecution was most severe. Between the years 1650 and 1689 fourteen thousand of them were fined and imprisoned; and three hundred and sixty-nine, including the majority of the first preachers, died in jail, "not to mention cruel mockings, buffetings, scourgings, and afflictions innumerable." Never were persecutions borne in a more heroic spirit of endurance, or in a more Christian spirit of forgiveness. Never, too, were the inalienable rights of conscience more bravely asserted, and the privileges of Englishmen more boldly claimed. "The trials of the Friends, and especially that of John Crook in 1662, and that of William Penn and William Mead in 1670, at the Old Bailey, will forever remain as noble monuments of their resistance to the arbitrary proceedings of the courts of judicature at that time, and the violent infringement of the privilege of jury." Soon after the Revolution of 1688, the persecution ceased on both sides of the Atlantic.

When the martyr age had passed, the society became less aggressive, and made fewer converts to its views; but it devoted itself to the quiet practice of all the Christian virtues, and to an active philanthropy, which have made its praise to be in all the churches. An exaggerated asceticism in some directions, and a rigid, though in most respects an admirable, discipline, visiting with excommunication even the offence of marrying a person not a member of the society, cooperated to keep it numerically small. But it has always exerted a power, in the church at large and in the community, far beyond what was to be expected from its numbers. In the recognition of the equal rights of women, in the abolition of slavery and the slave-trade, in the protection and instruction of the Indians and the weaker races of mankind, in the amelioration of penal laws and prison discipline, in the adoption of enlightened methods for the care and relief of the insane, in testimony against war, intemperance, oaths, corrupting books and amusements, extravagance, insincerity, and vain display, it has been in the fore-front of Christian reformers; while it has maintained the highest standard of integrity and practical virtue, and in the everyday charities of life its bounty has been unstinted.

About the year 1827 the society in America was divided into two bodies,—evangelical or "orthodox," and liberal or "Hicksite," each of which claims to be the true representative of the early Friends. The orthodox society is the one acknowledged as genuine by the London Yearly Meeting. A tone of thought similar to that prevailing in the evangelical section of the Church of England was fostered by the preaching and writings of Joseph John Gurney (1788-1847), and had great influence on both sides of the Atlantic. This school of opinion found an opponent in the Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, which claims to maintain the truths taught by the founders, against perversion on either hand; but it has been very influential in the society at large. An earnest school is now arising, holding the essential doctrines of orthodox faith, and animated with an increased zeal for education and for the growth of the church, while discarding formalities of dress and speech, and all undue asceticism.

Distinctive Creed.—The creed of the Society of Friends may be described, as, from the first, one singularly free both from heresy and from exaggeration. Objecting to scholastic terms and "man-made" symbols, the Friends endeavor to confine themselves to scriptural words in defining their belief. One of the earliest authoritative statements of their views is found in a letter addressed by Fox and others to the Governor of Barbadoes in 1671. What is most distinctive of the society is its belief in the immediate influence of the Holy Spirit, and its expectation of the guidance of the Spirit in worship and all religious acts. This might degenerate into mysticism, were it not corrected by the society's full recognition of the inspiration and authority of the Scriptures, by which they admit it, in the words of Barclay, "as a positive certain maxim, That whatsoever any do, pretending to the Spirit, which is contrary to the Scriptures, should be accounted and reckoned a delusion of the Devil." Their belief in the spirituality of Christianity has led them, also, to the disuse of the outward rites of baptism and the Lord's Supper, while they fully believe in the necessity of spiritual baptism, and the privilege of spiritual communion with the Father and the Son, through the Holy Spirit. They do not find, in the texts ordinarily understood as establishing these rites, any indication of such intention, and regard the rites themselves as inconsistent with the whole spirit of Christianity, in which types have given place to the substance. Their views in regard to the ministry are also characteristic. They believe that no one should preach the Word without a direct call from God, and that this call may come to male or female, old or young. No high human learning and no course of theological study are necessary qualifications for a minister, who may be as unlettered as were most of the apostles, if plenteously endued with heavenly grace. But Friends do not deny the self-evident proposition, that learning and intellectual ability conduce to the usefulness of a preacher of the gospel, and that a church needs men possessing both, to assert and defend the truth. Any one who feels it laid upon him is allowed to speak in the meetings for worship, so long as he speaks things worthy of the occasion. If, after sufficient probation, he gives evidence of a divine call, he is formally acknowledged as a minister, and is allowed one of the seats at the head of the meeting. Besides ministers, the society appoints elders, whose especial duty is to sympathize with and advise ministers, and watch that they be sound in the faith; and overseers, as in the primitive church, who have a general care of the flock. In meetings for business, the society recognizes the presidency of the great Head of the Church, and strives to do all in his fear, and with his guidance. Decisions are not made by votes and majorities, but are recorded by the clerk, in accordance with what appears to be "the weight" of either side; or, if there is not a general spirit of acquiescence, action is postponed.

Worship and Ministry. — Believing that every act of divine service should proceed from an immediate impression of duty, prompted by the Holy Spirit, the meetings of the society for worship are held in silence, unless some one feels called upon to preach or teach, to offer prayer in behalf of the congregation, or to give praise to the Most High. But this silence is itself intended to be occupied with religious acts. Highest of these is the direct communion of the soul with its Maker and its Lord, in rapt devotion, in thanksgiving and prayer. But there are services, in these hours of silence, adapted to every degree of religious experience and every serious mood of mind. One of the most profitable of these is self-examination. As in the sight of the All-Seeing Eye, the humble worshipper recounts his thoughts and deeds, confesses his sins, supplicates for pardon for the past and strength for the future, and prays that he may be cleansed even from secret faults. Another exercise is religious meditation. At worst, every attender can force himself to think on profitable themes by repeating to himself texts of Scripture, or the verses of some suggestive hymn. "Sometimes a light surprises" the humble worshipper; his thoughts are led on and upward by a higher Power; new meanings of texts flash upon his mind, a new illumination is given to the path of duty, and in answer to the prayer breathed forth by his inmost soul he feels conscious of a closer union with God, and strengthened for his future warfare with the world, the flesh, and the devil. And, if some brother or sister is led to offer vocal service, it often happens that the word of exhortation or reproof or comfort, or the earnest petition to the throne of grace, harmonizes with the private exercise of mind which the hearer has passed through, confirming his faith, and invigorating his resolution.

The theory of the exercise of the ministry among Friends asserts the prompting and guidance of the Holy Spirit, both what to say, and when to say it. It does not, however, intelligently understood, claim any infallibility, or plenary inspiration, in the speaker. The treasure is borne in earthen vessels, and the imperfections of the instrument may sometimes appear. Yet he that lives daily near his Lord, and is careful not to assert more than he has tested in his own experience, or to utter words beyond those in which he feels a full consciousness of divine leading, seldom outruns his Guide, or fails to speak to the edification of the church.

Education. — The society provides that all its members shall receive a good practical education, and cherishes also the higher learning. It has colleges at Haverford, Penn., Richmond, Ind., Wilmington, O., and Oskaloosa, Io., and one for girls at Bryn Mawr, Penn. There are excellent boarding-schools in most of the Yearly Meetings.

Organization. — The congregations are grouped together to constitute Monthly, Quarterly, and Yearly Meetings; the Monthly Meetings sending representatives to the Quarterly, and the Quarterly to the Yearly. Each Yearly Meeting is an independent body, but united with all the others by a common faith. There are two Yearly Meetings in Great Britain, and ten in America. The number of members is about twenty thousand in Great Britain, and eighty thousand on this continent. Besides these, there is a large number of regular attenders of Friends' meetings, sympathizing with their views.

Hicksites (so called). There are six Yearly Meetings of this body, all in America, with about forty thousand members. They have a flourishing college for both sexes at Swarthmore, near Philadelphia. (See HICKS, ELIAS.)

FRIENDS OF GOD, the beautiful name of a large brotherhood of mystics which existed in German-speaking lands during the fourteenth century. They did not constitute a sect: on the contrary, they attended the church-services assiduously, but gave novel interpretations to the ecclesiastical symbols. Their centres were at Cologne, Strassburg, and Basel: their teachers were mostly Dominicans. Their ideas and principles were drawn from the German mystics. They held more or less personal and epistolary communication with one another, especially with the members of the same local society. They protested against the corruptions of the times, and set an example of holy living. Their great leader, hero, and martyr was NICHOLAS OF BASEL: their preacher was JOHN TAULER. (See those articles.) In 1380 some of the more earnest of them assembled in the mountains, according to an agreement made the year before; but, being warned that the explosion of divine wrath would not come for three years, they disbanded, and no later meeting is recorded. See Essays upon the Gottesfreunde, by C. SCHMIDT (1854) and RIEGER (1879).

FRISIANS (Frisii, Frisones), The, inhabited, at the beginning of our era, the coast of Holland and Germany from the Scheldt to the Weser, the Islands of the German Ocean (Silt, Föhr, Heligoland, etc.), and the western coast of Sleswick. They were a rude and warlike people, not aggressive, but jealous for their nationality, and fanatic in their religion. Christianity entered the country, together with the Franks, in the seventh century; and for two centuries it rose and fell among the people together with the Frankish power. It was not Frankish missionaries, however, who converted the Frisians, but Anglo-Saxon. The Franks and the Frisians did not understand each other, but the Anglo-Saxons and the Frisians did. St. Amandus (626) and Eligius (641) met with only indifferent success; but Wilfred of York (677) made an impression; and Willibrord, the apostle of the Frisians (700-730), procured a footing for Christianity in the country. The conversion of the Frisians seems at that time to have been what we now would call a fashion among the Anglo-Saxons. One missionary followed the other. Winfred, too, made his first and his last attempt as a missionary in Friesland. Willibrord's successor, Gregory, founded at Utrecht a school, which, like those of Corbie and Fulda, became a fertile seed-plot for Christian piety and learning. Among his helpers were Lebuin and Willehad; among his pupils, Lindger, a native Frisian. In the latter part of the eighth century Christianity had advanced from the Scheldt to the Yesel, and it approached the same point from the Weser. Nevertheless, when the Saxons arose, under Wittekind, against Charlemagne, the Frisians followed the example; and Christianity was nearly driven out of the country together with the Franks. But Charlemagne treated the Frisians as he treated the Saxons. The country was made a province of the Frankish Empire; the people, a branch of the Christian Church. Bishops with liturgy, schools, jurisdiction, and tithes were settled in the country; and all became quiet, though remnants of rank heathenism were still glimmering among the dark, impenetrable forests of the country until the twelfth century. FRITH (or FRYTH), John, an English Reformer and martyr; b. at Sevenoaks, Kent, about 1503; d. at the stake, July 4, 1533. He studied at Cambridge, and was selected by Cardinal Wolsey to be a member of the college (now Christ Church) at Oxford, which he had recently founded from the spoils of several monasteries. In 1525 he became acquainted with Tindal, and in his intercourse with him imbibed those evangelical sentiments for which he afterwards died. At Oxford he was imprisoned, with several companions, by the Romanists, for his attachment to the views of Luther and Zwingli. In 1528 he retired to the Continent, having escaped from prison, into which he had been thrown with the connivance of Wolsey. He remained abroad for two years. Returning to England, Frith was a marked man. Sir Thomas More had replied to a sharp attack against the ecclesiastical establishments of England (The Supplication of the Beggars) in a work entitled The poor seely (simple) souls pewled out of purgatorye. Frith published, in answer to More's work, Disputacyon of Purgatorye, in which he denies all efficacy to papal indulgences, and maintains that Christ's satisfaction is sufficient, and precludes the necessity of purgatorial cleansing. The author was forthwith confined in the Tower. The authorities were disposed, however, to deal leniently with him. But he not only persisted in his views on purgatory, but wrote in prison a treatise on the Lord's Supper, in which he denied transubstantiation. He was tried, and condemned by Dr. Stokesly, Bishop of London, to the stake. He was burned at Smithfield, in company with Andrew Hewet, a tailor's apprentice, who professed the same views of the Lord's Supper.

Frith was regarded as an able and learned man by his contemporaries. He was the first English martyr for the true doctrine of the Lord's Supper, and the first of the Reformers of England to write against transubstantiation. Besides the treatises already mentioned, he put forth a tract on Baptism, and A Mirror or Glass to know thyself. His writings are published in vol. iii. of the Writings of the Brit. Fathers, London (Rel. Tract Soc.). For his life, see that volume, and FOXE'S Actes and Monuments.

FRITZSCHE, Karl Friedrich August, b. at Steinbach, near Borna, Dec. 16, 1801; d. at Giessen, Dec. 6, 1846; studied theology at Leipzig; was appointed professor at Rostock, 1826, and removed to Giessen, 1841. A pupil of Gott. Hermann, he applied the philological principles of his master to biblical exegesis, and thereby promoted a more exact grammatical interpretation of the sacred documents. His principal works are Latin commentaries on Matthew (1826), Mark (1830), and the Epistle to the Romans (1836-43), 3 vols., all marked by great philological learning and acumen. He always lectured in Latin. He was by nature a controversialist, and gave stinging blows.

FROMENT, Antoine, b. at Triers, near Grenoble, 1509 or 1510; d. in Geneva at an unknown date, but after 1574; entered early into relations with Faber Stapulensis, Marguerite of Navarre, Farel, and the whole party of Reformers, and exercised considerable influence on the reformatory movement in its beginning. In 1529 he labored at Aigh, in 1530 at Tavannes, in 1531 at Bienne and Grandson. In 1532 he arrived at Geneva. As it was not possible to preach the Reformation there openly, he established a school, and advertised that he would teach everybody, young or old, man or woman, to read and write the French language in one month. People crowded to the school, where they were taught, not only reading and writing, but also the new religion; and in 1533 Froment preached publicly in the market-place. But he was immediately driven out of the city by the Roman priests. He returned, however, a month later, but caused a tremendous uproar by protesting in the very church against the invectives and slander of the priests, and was again compelled to flee from the city. This time, however, he returned, backed by an embassy from the canton of Bern; and in 1535 the council granted permission to preach the Reformation in the city. In the presence of Viret, Farel, and Calvin, Froment naturally retreated into the background; and the latter part of his life was much troubled. His wife proved untrue to him, and he was compelled to leave the clerical state. He became a notary, and even a member of the council; but his domestic troubles seem to have affected his moral character. His life became disorderly; and in 1562 he was dismissed from the council, and banished from the city. After ten years of exile and misery, the old man was allowed to return to Geneva, and in 1574 he was re-instated as a notary. His principal work is Les actes et gestes merveilleux de la cité de Genève (edited by Gustave Revilliod, Geneva, 1854), a work full of freshness and vivacity, but not fully reliable. There is no independent biography of him, but numerous sketches of his life in La France Protestante, GABEREL, Histoire de l'église de Genève, etc. THEODOR SCHOTT.

FRONTON LE DUC (Duceus). b. at Bordeaux, 1558; d. in Paris, Sept. 25, 1624; entered the Society of Jesus in 1577; taught rhetoric and theology at Pont à Mousson, Bordeaux, and Paris, and was in 1604 made librarian at the royal library. Besides editions with notes, and Latin translation of Chrysostom, John of Damascus, Irenæus, Gregory of Nyssa, Basil, etc., he published a number of polemical and apologetical works, of which a list is given by BACKER, in Bibliothèque des écrivains de la Compagnie de Jésus.

FROSSARD, Benjamin Sigismond, b. at Nyon, in Switzerland, 1754; d. at Montauban, 1830; studied theology at Geneva; was appointed pastor of the Reformed Church at Lyons, 1777, and professor of morals in the École Centrale of Clermont-Ferrand, 1792. In 1808 he was charged with the organization of a Protestant theological faculty in Montauban, of which he himself became dean, and professor of morals. Besides translations of Hugh Blair, Wilberforce, etc., he published La Cause des Esclaves Nègres (1788, 2 vols.), which attracted great attention in France.

FROUDE, Richard Hurrell, an ardent supporter of the Oxford movement; b. March 25, 1803, at Dartington, Devonshire; d. there Feb. 28, 1836. He was educated at Eton and Oxford; elected fellow of Oriol College, 1826; and ordained priest, 1829. During the last four years of his life he resided in Southern Europe and the West Indies. He was a man of fair talents and a love of the pure and good, but of gloomy temper and ungovernable will, as his mother's letters expressly testify. He fell in heartily with the Tractarian movement. "Really I hate the Reformation more and more," he says. And again: "I think people are injudicious who talk against the Roman Catholics for worshipping the saints, and honoring the Virgin and images." He was very bitter in his judgment of Milton and the Puritans. To a friend he writes, "Try to un-Protestantize and un-Miltonize Southey and Wordsworth." His Remains, consisting of sermons, letters, journals, etc., appeared in 2 vols., Lond., 1838, 1839. He was a brother of the well-known historian. See Newman's Apologia, also TRACTARIANS.

FRUCTUOSUS, the apostle of the Suèves and Lusitanians, Archbishop of Braga, in Galicia, since 656; d. about 670; was educated in the episcopal school of Palencia, and sold his estates in order to get money for the foundation of monasteries, of which he had built no less than seven, in Lusitania, Asturia, and Galicia, up to 647; and he continued building to his death. There exist two sets of rules written down by him for his monks. The first (Regula Complutensis) is based on the rule of St. Benedict, and written for the monks of Complutum (not the famous place in Castile, the present Alcala, but a place of the same name, probably in Asturia or Leon). It fixes the life of the monks in the minutest details. Not only they should not walk about or speak without the permission of the superior, but they were even forbidden to turn their heads, or rise from their seats, unless on a given signal. The other (Regula Communis) regards cases in which a whole family entered a monastery. All family ties were immediately dissolved, and all the property appropriated by the monasteries. Both rules are given by HOLSTEN-BROCKIE, in Cod. reg. monasticorum, II. See MONTALEMBERT: Monks of the West, II. ZÖCKLER.

FRY, Elizabeth, an eminent philanthropist, daughter of John Gurney, a Friend; was b. near Norwich, Eng., May 21, 1780; d. at Ramsgate, Oct. 13, 1845. She was of fascinating manners, and manifested little interest in religious matters until her eighteenth year. At twenty she married Joseph Fry, a wealthy London merchant. At the death of her father, in 1809, she spoke for the first time in public, and was soon recognized as a minister among the Friends. Her attention being drawn in 1813, by a report of Friends, to the wretched condition of criminals in the jails, she visited the prison at Newgate. "The filth, the closeness of the rooms, the ferocious manners and expressions of the women toward each other, and the abandoned wickedness which every thing bespoke, are quite indescribable," were her own words in describing what she had seen.

Mrs. Fry at once instituted measures for the amelioration of prison morals and life, daily visiting the prison, reading to the prisoners the Scriptures, and teaching them to sew. A committee of ladies was soon organized to carry on the work on a larger scale. These labors effected a complete change in the condition of the criminals. Riot, licentiousness, and filth were exchanged for order, sobriety, and comparative neatness of person. Previously many who had entered the prison only comparatively abandoned, left completely debauched. Now the process was reversed, and many profligate characters went out of the prison renewed. The mayor and aldermen early took notice of these labors, and acknowledged their beneficence.

In 1818, in company with her brother, J. J. Gurney, Mrs. Fry visited the prisons of Northern England and Scotland, and in 1827 those of Ireland. Kindred societies for the help of female criminals were organized in other parts of Great Britain; and the fame of her labors attracted the interest, and stimulated the competition, of women in foreign lands. In 1839, 1840, and 1841 she visited the Continent, extending her travels as far as Hungary. She found the condition of the prisons lamentable. In Hungary many of the criminals slept in stocks, and whipping was universally practised, even to bastinadoing. Her example and immediate efforts secured remedial legislation, and the organization of prison-reform societies in Holland, Denmark, France, Prussia, and other Continental countries. In the mean while her efforts secured the organization of a society (1839) for the care of the criminals after their discharge from prison, and for the visitation of the vessels that carried the convicts to the colonies.

Mrs. Fry did not confine her labors to prison reform. She successfully prosecuted a plan to supply coast vessels and seamen's hospitals with libraries. A governmental grant was supplemented by liberal private donations which enabled her and the society to distribute 52,464 volumes among 620 libraries (report for 1836). After several years of growing feebleness, she died at Ramsgate, full of faith, and interested, to the very hour of her departure, in labors of charity for the seamen. A fitting memorial was erected to her in the Elizabeth Fry Refuge. Mrs. Fry was a woman of even temper, great practical skill, tenderness of heart, and deep knowledge of Scripture. Her maxim was "Charity to the soul is the soul of charity," and Sir James Mackintosh rightly characterized her as the "female Howard." See Lives of Mrs. Fry by TIMPSON (Lond., 1847) and CORDER (Lond., 1853), also Journals and Letters, edited by her daughter, London, 1847. D. S. SCHAFF.

FULBERT OF CHARTRES, b. about 950; d. April 10, 1029; was educated by Bishop Odo of Chartres, and in Gerbert's school at Rheims; founded in 968 a school himself at Chartres, which soon rivalled even that of Rheims, and in which Berengarius of Tours was a pupil; and was elected Bishop of Chartres in 1007. He left, besides some hymns and minor essays, a hundred and thirty-eight letters, which are of great interest for the history of his time, and are found in MIGNE: Patrol. Lat., vol. 140.

FULCHER OF CHARTRES was chaplain to Baldwin, the second king of Jerusalem, and wrote Gesta peregrinantium Francorum, a history of the crusaders up to 1127. The best edition of it is that by DUCHESNE, in Script. Hist. Franc., Tom. IV.

FULCO, minister of Neuilly, near Paris, and one of the most popular preachers of his time; d. 1202; seems to have led a rather supercilious life of pleasure until a great change suddenly took place with him in 1192. He went every week-day to Paris to study under Peter Cantor; and the sermons he delivered on Sundays began to attract the greatest attention. Soon he preached, not only in the church, but also in the market-place, not only in Neuilly, but also in Paris and all the great cities of France. In 1198 he was charged by Innocent III. with preaching the fourth crusade; and at the chapter-general of the Cistercians, in 1201, he asserted that more than two hundred thousand had received the cross from his hands. Of most importance, however, was, perhaps, the influence he exercised on his own colleagues, whom his words and example led to a more conscientious fulfilment of the duties of their office. See JACOB. A VITRIACO and OTTON DE ST. BLOSIO, in Recueil des Historiens de la France, vol. xviii.; GEOFFREY DE VILLE-HARDOUIN: Chronique de la prise de Constantinople, and in BUCHON: Coll. des chroniques nationales françaises, vol. iii. FR. DIBELIUS.

FULDA, The Monastery of, was founded in 744, by St. Boniface, who lies buried there. The place was selected by Sturm, a pupil of Boniface; the ground was given by Duke Karlmann; the internal organization was adopted from Monte Casino and the rule of St. Benedict. In 754 the Pope sanctioned the institution, and exempted the abbey from episcopal authority, placing it immediately under the papal see. The first abbot was Sturm; and before his death, in 779, the number of monks had increased to four hundred. New donations were given by Pepin and Charlemagne; and under the leadership of Rabanus Maurus, himself a pupil of Fulda, the school became the centre, not only of learning, but of general progress and civilization in Germany. It gave instruction in theology, grammar, rhetoric, dialectics, mathematics, physics, and astronomy. Among its pupils were Walafried Strabo, Servatus Lupus, Otfrid, etc. It also cultivated the arts. Isambert, Rudolf, Candidus, Hatto, and others of its monks, were celebrated artists; and great numbers of well-trained artisans, weavers, tanners, carpenters, etc., spread from its rooms over all Germany. After the time of Rabanus Maurus, the school lost some of its lustre, though it continued to exercise a great and beneficial influence for several centuries. Under Abbot Werner (968-982) the monastery obtained the primacy among the abbeys of Germany and Gaul; and Otho I. gave the abbot the title and dignity of arch-chancellor of the realm. In the fourteenth century the abbey successfully resisted an attack of the burghers of the city of Fulda, and in the sixteenth it fortunately escaped the Reformation; but its significance as a social institution is of course lost long ago.

KLÜPFEL.

FULGENTIUS FERRANDUS, a friend or relation of Fulgentius of Ruspe, whom he followed into banishment under Thrasimund, king of the Vandals, and with whom he lived at Cagliari, in Sardinia, until 523, when he returned to Carthage, where he became a deacon, and died before 547. He left a Vita Fulgentii Ruspensis, a Breviatio Canonum (of great interest for the history of canon law), and a number of Letters, of which especially one addressed to the Roman deacons Pelagius and Anatolius, concerning the Three-Chapters controversy, is of great interest. His works were first edited by P. F. CHIFFLET, Dijon, 1649, afterwards often; as, for instance, in MIGNE: Patr. Lat., vol. 67.

FULGENTIUS OF RUSPE, b. at Telepte, a city of North Africa, 468; d. at Ruspe, in the province of Byzacena, Jan. 1, 533; belonged to a distinguished senatorial family, and was educated for a brilliant political career, but felt himself so strongly drawn towards a life of devotion, seclusion, and asceticism, that he entered a monastery, very much against the wishes of his family. After a journey to Sicily, Italy, and Rome, occasioned by the Arian King Thrasimund's persecutions of the Catholics, he was chosen Bishop of Ruspe in 508, but was shortly after banished, together with sixty other Catholic bishops, from North Africa. He settled in Sardinia, and remained there till 523, when the death of Thrasimund allowed him to return. A year before his death he retired from office, and spent his last days in a monastery. As well during his exile, as before and after, he developed a great literary activity; and his writings, among which the most prominent are Contra Arianos, Ad Monimum, Ad Petrum Diaconum de Incarnatione, De Veritate Prædestinationis, etc., contributed very much to stop the progress of Semi-Pelagianism, and establish a modified Augustinianism. They were first published by W. Pirkheimer (Nuremb., 1520), and most completely by Mangeant (Paris, 1684), also in MIGNE: Patrol. Latin., vol. 65. See Act. Sanct., Jan., I.; WIGGERS: Augustin und Pelagius, II. 369 sqq.

WAGENMANN.

FULKE, William, D.D., an able Puritan divine; b. in London some time before 1538 (as we learn incidentally from his own statements); d. August, 1589. Educated at Cambridge, he became fellow of St. John's College. He studied law for six years; but, turning his attention to the ministry, he espoused the Puritan cause and became a most zealous champion of Puritanism. A sermon preached in 1565 against popish habits in ecclesiastical establishments evoked the opposition of the university authorities. Removed from his office, he was made, in succession, rector of Warley and Kedington. After a trip to the Continent, he was chosen (1578) Master of Pembroke Hall and Margaret Professor of Divinity. On a tablet erected to his memory at Kedington are these two lines amongst others:—

“His works will show him free from all error, Rome's foe, Truth's champion, and the Remishes' terror.”

They indicate the general tenor of Fulke's life. He was a fearless opponent of Romanism, at different times being engaged in public disputations with Papists. In controversy he was one of the ablest divines of his day. His principal works are, Confutation of a libelle, etc. (1571), The Discovery of the Dangerous Rock of the Popish Church (1580), Defence of the sincere and true transl. of the Holy Scriptures into Engl. against the Cavils of Gregory Martin (1583, recently published by the Parker Society, Cambridge, 1843). He was also the author of some works against astrology. See BROOK, Lives of the Puritans, I. p. 385 sqq., Lond., 1813, and the Memoir prefixed to the volume of the Parker Society.

FULLER, Andrew, a distinguished Baptist divine; was b. at Wicken, Cambridgeshire, Feb. 6, 1754; d. at Kettering, May 7, 1815. He received only a common-school education. Joining the church at sixteen, he exercised his gifts occasionally at religious meetings, and was ordained (1775) pastor of the Baptist Church in Soham. In 1782 he passed to the church at Kettering. He was honored with the degree of D.D. by Princeton and Yale Colleges, but never used the title. Mr. Fuller's reputation rests, not upon his pulpit achievements, but upon his services as a theological writer, and a promoter of Baptist missionary efforts. He stood in intimate relations with Carey, and contributed to awaken in his mind an interest in the heathen. He was one of the founders of the Baptist Missionary Society in a back-parlor at Kettering, Oct. 2, 1792, and was made its first secretary. As a theological writer, one of his biographers (Dr. Ryland) pronounces him “the most judicious and able theological writer that ever belonged to the Baptist denomination.” He shared with Robert Hall and John Foster a first place in the esteem of the Baptists of his day. His principal works are the following. The Gospel Worthy of all Acceptation, a work which involved him in a protracted controversy of nearly twenty years. In opposition to hyper-Calvinism, he here elaborates the principle that all may apply for the gospel, confidently expecting to receive its benefits. “No man is an unbeliever,” he says, “but because he will be so.” The Gospel its own Witness, an able criticism upon Deism, and reply to such writers as Thomas Paine. The Calvinistic and Socinian Systems Examined, pronounced by Robert Hall to be his ablest work. Expository Notes on Genesis, 2 vols. Dialogues and Letters between Crispus and Gaius, containing discussions of Total Depravity and other theological topics.

LIT. — Complete Works, Am. ed., 1833, 2 vols., with Memoir by his son, Andrew Gunton Fuller; Lives of Fuller, by his friend JOHN RYLAND, D.D. (Lond., 1816), J. W. MORRIS (Lond., 1830), and THOMAS EKINS FULLER, his grandson (Lond., 1863).

FULLER, Richard, D.D., an eloquent Baptist preacher; b. in Beaufort, S.C., April 22, 1804; d. in Baltimore, Oct. 20, 1876, from a malignant carbuncle. After graduating at Harvard (1824), he practised law in his native town, where he soon secured a lucrative practice. In the meetings of the great revivalist Rev. Daniel Baker, in 1832, he was converted, and joined the Baptist Church. "His case was a very clear and delightful one," is an entry in Mr. Baker's journal, referring to him. He was ordained the same year, and began his ministry in Beaufort. In 1847 he became pastor of the Seventh Baptist Church in Baltimore, and in 1871 removed with a part of the congregation to the fine new edifice on Eutaw Place. Dr. Fuller was a man of fine presence of body, and endowments of mind. He was a born orator, and is said to have carried off, on several occasions, the honors with Webster and Clay on the platform. As a preacher he stood in the front rank of the most eloquent and scriptural of his generation. He was for a time co-editor of the Baltimore Herald, and published Letters on the Roman Chancery (Balt., 1840), Baptism and Communion (Balt., 1849), and a number of sermons in pamphlet form. See CUTHBERT: Life of R. Fuller, N.Y., 1879.

FULLER, Thomas, D.D., a learned and witty divine and church-historian; b. 1608, at Aldwinkle, Northamptonshire, where his father was rector; d. Aug. 16, 1661, in London. He was educated at Cambridge, and in 1631 was made fellow of Sidney College, and prebend of Salisbury. This year he issued his first publication, David's Hainous Sinne, Heartie Repentance and Heavie Punishment. In 1634 he was made rector of Broad Windsor, and, 1641, lecturer of the Savoy in London. The year before, he published at Cambridge The Hist. of the Holy War, an account of the Crusades, and in 1642 The Hist. of the Holy and Prophane States, an interesting collection of essays and biographies. Fuller was a Royalist; and in 1643 he entered the Royal army as chaplain, but kept a prudent silence during the Commonwealth period. During his service in the army, he began the investigations which resulted in a work, published after the author's death (1662), entitled History of the Worthies of England, Endeavoured by Tho^s Fuller, D.D. The subject matter of this work is treated under the several counties of England and Wales, and includes the most varied information about their products, animals, buildings, battles, proverbs, eminent men, etc. In 1650 appeared his Pisgah sight of Palestine and the Confines thereof, with the history of the Old and New Testament acted thereon. Fuller was presented with the living of Waltham Abbey in 1648, and at the Restoration, in 1660, was re-admitted to his lectureship in the Savoy, and made chaplain in extraordinary to the king.

In 1656 Fuller published his great work, Church Hist. of Britain from the birth of Jesus Christ to the year 1648, to which was subjoined a Hist. of the University of Cambridge. This, as all of his works, abounds in quaint humor and epigrammatic sayings. He was an inveterate punster, and delighted in striking alliterations, but was also recognized by his contemporaries as a "perfect walking library." His memory is also reported to have performed almost incredible feats. He was able to repeat five hundred strange words after hearing them twice, and on one occasion undertook to repeat backwards and forwards in regular order all the shop-signs along the street from Temple Bar to Cheapside, after passing them once, and accomplished it. Coleridge says that "he was incomparably the most sensible, the least prejudiced, great man of an age that boasted a galaxy of great men."

LIT. — Amongst the works by Fuller not already mentioned are his devotional manuals, Good Thoughts in Bad Times (1645), Good Thoughts in Worse Times (1647), Mixt Contemplations in Better Times (1660); all bearing upon the vicissitudes of the Royalist cause, but containing thoughts for all times, and which to-day are read with delight and profit. Most of Fuller's works have been republished in this century. The best edition of his Church History is that of J. NICHOLS, 3 vols., Lond., 1868; Of the Worthies of England, by NUTTALL, 3 vols., Lond., 1840. See the biographies by RUSSELL (Lond., 1844) and of BAILEY (Lond., 1874), the latter an exhaustive work.

FUNCK, Johann, b. at Wöhrd, a suburb of Nuremberg, Feb. 7, 1518; beheaded at Königsberg, Oct. 28, 1566; studied theology at Wittenberg, and was appointed preacher in his native town in 1539, but was dismissed by the magistrate of Nuremberg in 1547, on the approach of the emperor. In the same year he entered the service of Duke Albrecht of Prussia; was made court-preacher in 1549; became one of Ossiander's most ardent adherents, and after his death the leading representative of his ideas, and exercised, through his intimacy with the duke, a decisive influence on all affairs in Prussia, political as well as ecclesiastical. Though he in 1556 became reconciled with the Wittenberg theologians, and in 1563 actually retracted what he had written in defence of Ossiander, he was, nevertheless, in 1566, put under the accusation of heresy, and disturbance of the peace, and condemned. Of his Chronologia ab orbe cond., the first part appeared in 1545, the rest in 1552. See C. A. HASE: Herzog Albrecht von Preussen u. sein Hofprediger [Funck], Leipzig, 1879. W. MÖLLER.

FUNDAMENTAL DOCTRINES OF CHRISTIANITY. The distinction between fundamental and non-fundamental doctrines is a useful one, as adapted, by bringing out in sharp outline the great cardinal articles of the Christian faith, to unify the various parts of the Christian Church, and to develop a spirit of tolerance towards each other with regard to the articles of lesser importance in which they disagree.

History. — The Roman-Catholic Church rejects the distinction (Wetzer and Welte, art. Dogma, III. pp. 195 sq.) on the ground that it resolves doctrines into essential or necessary, and unessential or incidental. Although it is not universally made by Protestant theologians, it early came into use. Hunnius, in 1626, was the first to use the distinction in the Lutheran Church in his De fundamentali dissensu doctrinae Luth. et Calvin. (the fundamental difference in the Lutheran and Calvinistic theologies). He was followed by Quenstädt and others, and recently by Philippi (Glaubenslehre, i. 73 sqq.), who, starting from the atonement as the constitutive principle, defines as fundamental all articles which necessarily follow from it.

The distinction was urged by the younger Turretin, and in England by Chillingworth, Stillingfleet, Waterland, and others in the interest of ecclesiastical toleration; Lord Bacon having before, in his Advancement of Learning, insisted upon distinguishing "between points fundamental and points" which he calls "points of further perfection." The Parliament of 1643 voted indulgence to all who professed the "Fundamentals," and appointed a commission, consisting of Archbishop Ussher (who resigned, his place being filled by Baxter), Owen, Goodwin, and others, to define what these were. Baxter was for holding to the Lord's Prayer, the Creed, and the Ten Commandments. But the commission drew up sixteen articles, which were presented to Parliament, and only missed ratification by its sudden dissolution. Neal (Hist. Puritans, II. pp. 143 sq., Harpers' ed.) gives a full account of this movement. The varying importance of the doctrines of the Christian system and the growing tolerance of this century have produced the conviction that it is desirable to emphasize the more important articles. The Evangelical Alliance, which was organized 1846, on the assumption that agreement in fundamentals is a sufficient foundation for Catholic communion, adopts a constitution of nine articles.

Definition.—The distinction of fundamentals and non-fundamentals is based upon the valid assumption that some articles are of greater importance than others. It is justified by the example of Paul in his teaching over against the Judaizing tendencies of his time. The following distinctions will help us in defining the term:—

1. Fundamental when applied to articles does not imply that they are the only articles which it is expedient or desirable for a church to teach, and the individual to believe. The apostasy of the angels, the eternal duration of future punishment, the single or double procession of the Holy Spirit (the Filioque clause being rejected by the Greek Church), may all be scriptural doctrines, and ought to be believed, but are not fundamental doctrines of Christianity (although some would so consider the endlessness of future punishment).

2. The fundamental doctrines of Christianity are not to be confused with the distinctive tenets of a denomination. Denominational differences may and often do embody the truth; but the mode of baptism, for example, or the particular theory of the decrees (however valuable a right view on this subject may be as a constructive principle in dogmatic theology), or the special form of ecclesiastical polity, cannot be regarded as fundamental. Christianity might not do as well with one class of opinions on these subjects (say, baptism by sprinkling, supralapsarianism, and the congregational principle of church government) as it would with another; but it would still remain radically unchanged, and continue to exert its beneficent influence.

3. The fundamental doctrines of Christianity are not synonymous with the doctrines essential to salvation. The latter depend upon the answer of the individual to two questions,—"What think ye of Christ?" and "What must I do to be saved?" A living faith in Christ as the Sent of God for the salvation of the world is essential to salvation, and sufficient for it (John vi. 47; Acts xvi. 31). The fundamental doctrines of Christianity are broader in their scope. They concern it as an objective system of truth.

4. Again: the term fundamental is not applied to doctrines which distinguish Christianity from natural religion. There is a distinction between the fundamentals of religion and those of Christianity. Religion is possible on the basis of the Five Articles of Lord Herbert of Cherbury; but the superstructure of the Christian religion needs a broader and deeper foundation. But some of the tenets which Christianity has in common with natural religion, as the existence of God, are fundamental to the former.

5. The Apostles' Creed, though a most venerable and excellent summary of the Christian's faith, is not a perfect statement of the fundamental articles of Christianity. On the one hand, it brings out only by implication the doctrine of atonement, passes over entirely the Scriptures, and on the other, as Waterland puts it, is in this connection "peccant in excess."

The fundamental doctrines of Christianity, then, are those which lie at the basis of the Christian system, and without which its professed and comprehensive aim (the glory of God and the highest welfare of man) could not, by logical necessity and with subjective certainty, be evolved. Waterland's definition is as follows: "Fundamental, as applied to Christianity, means something so necessary to its being, or at least its well-being, that it could not subsist, or maintain itself tolerably, without it" (v. p. 74). And again: "Whatever verities are found to be plainly and directly essential to the doctrine of the Gospel covenant are fundamental" (p. 103). According to Sherlock (Vindication, etc., p. 258), they are doctrines "which are of the essence of Christianity, and without which the whole building and superstructure must fall."

The most fundamental doctrine of Christianity is salvation by Christ; and the principle will hold good, that whatever doctrine stands in most necessary connection therewith is the most fundamental. The statement in Rom. i. 1-6 (the divine existence, Scriptures, incarnation, grace, faith, and resurrection) approaches nearest of any passage in Scripture to a comprehensive enumeration of the fundamental doctrines. Waterland enumerated seven; as follows: (1) The Creator, or Covenantant; (2) Covenant; (3) Charter of the Covenant, or Sacred Writ; (4) Mediator; (5) Repentance and a holy life; (6) Sacraments; (7) Two future states. The central principle from which he started was the Christian covenant. The sacraments, however, can hardly be regarded as a fundamental. We prefer the following statement: (1) The Fatherhood of God; (2) The Trinity; (3) The incarnation; (4) Atonement; (5) Faith or union with Christ, the condition of man's best being; (6) The immortality of the soul; (7) The Scriptures the summary of the divine purposes concerning man.

In defining what is fundamental in Christianity, it is equally desirable to avoid a narrow and a latitudinarian tendency. Certain communions insist upon regarding episcopacy and the authority of the church as fundamental. Individuals might insist upon particular views of original sin, the divine decrees, the inspiration of the Scriptures, or the duration and nature of future punishment. But few of these are touched upon in the Apostles' Creed, and none definitely answered. Divergence of view on these points is of inconsiderable importance in comparison with the cardinal doctrines of God's existence, the Messiah's work, saving faith, the soul's immortality, and the sufficiency of Scripture for human illumination and guidance, and cannot limit the perpetuity of Christianity. It is, however, not to be forgotten that a church may profess these fundamental doctrines, and yet so combine fundamental errors as to modify, if not to completely destroy their force. Of such errors, as held in the Roman-Catholic Church, Sherlock says (p. 314) that "all the wit of man cannot reconcile them with the Christian faith." On the other hand, a religious communion (as the strict Unitarians or Universalists) may deny fundamental truths, and yet sincerely accept Christianity as the only and perfect religion, and Christ as the Lord and Saviour.

FUNERAL. See BURIAL.

FURSEUS, a native of Ireland; founded the abbey Knobbersburg, in East Anglia, with the support of King Sigbert. Leaving Knobbersburg to his brother Foillan, he retired into seclusion, and lived as a hermit, but was by King Penda's persecutions compelled to flee the country, and repaired to France, where, with the support of Chlodwig II., he founded the monastery of Lagny, near Paris, and died between 650 and 654. See Act. Sanct., Jan. 16, vol. 3; MABILLON: Act. Sanct. O. S. B. ad a 650. G. PLITT.

FÜRST, Julius, Hebrew lexicographer; b. at Zerkowo, Posen, May 12, 1805; d. in Leipzig, Feb. 9, 1873. He studied at Berlin, Posen, and Breslau, and in 1864 became professor at Leipzig. He was of Jewish descent, and won fame by his Oriental researches. One of his theories was that triliteral should be reduced to biliteral roots. This idea is now generally discarded. In consequence of this and other philological notions, his great Hebräisches u. chaldäisches Handwörterbuch (Leipzig, 1857-61, 2 vols., 2d ed., 1863, 3d ed. by Victor Ryssel, 1876, Eng. trans. by Samuel Davidson, Leipzig, 1865, 1866, 4th ed., 1871) is not generally considered as equal to Gesenius. Probably his best work was upon his Concordantie Libr. Sacr. V. T. Heb. et Chäl. (Leipzig, 1837-40), in which he was aided by Franz Delitzsch, as he handsomely acknowledges. See Concordance. Among his other works (all published in Leipzig) are: Bibliotheca Judaica, 1849-63, 3 vols.; Gesch. d. Käräerthums (said to be very inaccurate), 1862-65, 2 vols.; Gesch. d. bib. Lit. u. d. jüdd.-hell. Schriftthums, 1867-70, 2 vols.; and Kanon d. A. T. nach d. Ueberlief. in Talmud u. Midrasch, 1868. Fürst's books evince great learning, but must be used with caution, for they are not reliable.
