

NYPL RESEARCH LIBRARIES

3 3433 06741733 1

Library of Edward C. Gleason

flie fro the prese and dwell with in sothfastnesse

THE
Connecticut Evangelical Magazine,

VOLUME II.

CONSISTING OF TWELVE NUMBERS, TO BE PUBLISHED MONTHLY.

FROM JULY 1801 TO JUNE 1802.

THE PROFITS ARISING FROM THE SALE OF THIS MAGAZINE ARE DEVOTED TO FORM A PERMANENT FUND, THE AN-NUAL INTEREST OF WHICH IS TO BE APPROPRI-ATED, BY THE TRUSTEES OF THE MISSIONARY SOCIETY OF CONNECTICUT, TO THE SUP-PORT OF MISSIONS IN THE NEW AMERICAN SETTLEMENTS, AND AMONG THE HEATHEN.

THE FOLLOWING PERSONS ARE EDITORS OF THE WORK,

—VIZ.—

REVEREND MESSIEURS

NATHAN WILLIAMS, D. D.	§§	CHARLES BACKUS, A. M.
JOHN SMALLEY, D. D.	§§	TIMOTHY DWIGHT, D. D.
JEREMIAH DAY, A. M.	§§	DAVID ELY, A. M.
BENJAMIN TRUMBULL, D. D.	§§	NATHAN STRONG, A. M.
LEVI HART, D. D.	§§	NATHAN PERKINS, A. M.
SAMUEL J. MILLS, A. M.	§§	ZEBULON ELY, A. M.
ISAAC LEWIS, D. D.	§§	ABEL FLINT, A. M.
ELIJAH PARSONS, A. M.	§§

PUBLISHED ACCORDING TO ACT OF CONGRESS.

HARTFORD :

PRINTED BY HUDSON AND GOODWIN, FOR THE EDITORS.

THE NEW YORK PUBLIC LIBRARY
355047A
ASTOR, LENOX AND TILDEN FOUNDATIONS
R 1925 L

P R E F A C E.

ENCOURAGED by the liberal patronage given to the first volume of the Connecticut Evangelical Magazine, the Editors are induced to enter on the publication of a second. The same general plan will be pursued, and it will be their aim to render the work interesting and useful. To communicate instruction upon the great truths and doctrines of religion, to comfort and edify the people of God, and to interest the pious mind by exhibiting displays of the grace and mercy of God, rather than to amuse the speculatist and entertain the curious, are the objects of this work. For the accomplishment of these purposes, it will be seen that Essays written in a short, interesting manner, judicious narratives of revivals of religion, accounts of remarkable Providences, and biographical sketches are better adapted, than labored disquisitions on speculative points. To the success of a work of this kind variety is essential; the Editors therefore hope their brethren in the ministry, and others who wish to promote the cause of truth and piety, will cheerfully communicate original pieces on the various subjects mentioned in the plan of the Magazine.

The present is not a period for indolence or indifference in the cause of the great Redeemer. Such are the signs of the times, as to call for the most vigorous exertions. The Prince of darkness is more than usually active; and at the same time the Lord of glory appears to be erecting a standard against him. "Profligacy of manners abounds; and infidelity assumes a formidable appearance, walking through the earth with gigantic strides, and threatening the destruction of every virtuous principle. Religion, on the other hand, gradually prevails; and the Son of God seems to be preparing the course of events for her final triumph." The late revivals of religion in so many parts of our land; an increasing spirit of piety among the serious people in various parts of Europe; and the engagedness manifested by so many, both in America and Europe, to send Missionaries to places where the gospel is not at all or but imperfectly enjoyed, lead to the animating consideration that the Redeemer still sits as king upon the holy hill of Sion, and that the gates of hell will not be suffered to prevail against his church.

In a word, such are the present appearances of things, that it may be said, there is much to excite hope, to alarm fear, to encourage the Saints and servants of God to the utmost diligence, and to induce all to address the father of mercies, in fervent prayer and humble supplication for the effusions of his spirit, and for a blessing upon any efforts which may be made to advance the kingdom of his dear Son.

These considerations induce the Editors to solicit the friends of Christ to encourage a work designed to diffuse religious knowledge and to raise a fund for continuing the light of the gospel among the inhabitants of the new and scattered settlements in the United States, and to spread this light among tribes of Savages now perishing for lack of vision.

The following is the plan of this work.

—TO CONTAIN—

Essays on the doctrines of Christianity, and on religious, experimental and moral subjects :—Occasional remarks on the fulfilment of scripture prophecies in the present day, and expositions of difficult and doubtful passages of scripture ;—Religious intelligence concerning the state of Christ's kingdom, throughout the Christian world, and sketches of the original ecclesiastical concerns of this country :—Information respecting Missions to the new settlements in the United States and among Heathen nations ;—Narratives of revivals of religion in particular places together with the distinguishing marks of true and false religion :—Accounts of remarkable dispensations of divine Providence :—Biographical sketches of persons eminent for piety :—Original hymns on evangelical subjects :—Together with whatever else on the subject of religion and morals may contribute to the advancement of genuine piety and pure morality.

This work will consist of original pieces and of extracts from the best European and American publications. As the Magazine is designed for the promotion of vital Christianity, and of a knowledge of the great and essential truths of the gospel, Essays which are merely controversial or deeply metaphysical, it will be seen, come not within the object of this publication ; nevertheless, should any such be sent which, in the opinion of the Editors, are highly meritorious, they will be admitted. The Magazine will be open to receive communications from all denominations of Christians who believe in the peculiar principles of Christianity ; but if written upon the distinguishing tenets of their respective sects, they will be excluded. The profits arising from the sale of this publication will be appropriated to the support of Missionaries to the Heathen or among the inhabitants of the new settlements.

T H E

Connecticut Evangelical Magazine.

[PUBLISHED ACCORDING TO ACT OF CONGRESS.]

VOL. II.]

JULY, 1801.

[No. 1.

Short Dissertation on the Communion of the Holy Ghost.

THE communion of the Holy Ghost is an expression used by the apostle Paul in 2 Cor. xiii. 14. The same word in the original, which is there translated communion, is frequently rendered fellowship. It is derived from a word which signifies common; and the word itself seems primarily to import a common interest—possessing, enjoying or sharing a thing in common; or a joint participation in the same thing. Hence, when several persons are joint partakers of the Holy Ghost, whether in equal, or in different degrees, the communion of the Holy Ghost is with them; or they have communion one with another in the Holy Ghost. This joint-participation of the Holy Ghost, as a good or enjoyment, in a greater or less degree, common to them all, is the communion of the Holy Ghost.

It is agreeable to scripture to say, Christians have fellowship [communion] with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ. 1 John i. 3. But it is not scriptural to say, they have communion or fellowship with the Holy Ghost. The communion of the Holy Ghost, is a scriptural expression: but communion with the Holy Ghost, is not a scriptural expression, and perhaps, not suited to convey a scriptural idea.

The following observations, it is apprehended, are founded on the representations contained in the scriptures, viz.

1. The Holy Ghost is the Spirit of the Father, and of his Son Jesus Christ. This will be admitted by all who read the New Testament with attention.

If we consider the Son merely as God, or in his original state, previous to his actual assumption of the human nature, the Holy Spirit is as truly his Spirit as the Father's, and in the same sense and manner, whatever that be. And if the Son is considered in his incarnate person and office-character, as God's anointed, the Holy Spirit is his, by virtue of the anointing which he received of the Father when he gave him the Spirit without measure.

2. The Holy Spirit is given to the children of God—to all true believers, to abide in them as a vital principle, like a well or fountain of water, springing up into everlasting life. John iv. 14. He is given by the Father. Luke xi. 13. Gal. iv. 6. And he is given by Christ. John xvi. 7. He dwells in Christians as the Spirit of God, and as the Spirit of Christ. Rom. viii. 9, 10, 11. The Holy Spirit, abiding in Christians as the Spirit of adoption and of promise, is the earnest of their inheritance; and by him they are sealed unto the day of redemption. He is the internal source and support of their spiritual life and holiness, comfort and joy. Hereby they are partakers of a divine nature. According to the measure of the Spirit communicated to them, they have the same Spirit with God and Jesus Christ—the same disposition or affection, in kind, towards the same objects—the same interest at heart—the same ultimate object of pursuit. Thus they have communion—a common interest, with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ, and jointly partake or share, though in a different manner, and in an infinitely lower degree, in the same things.

The principal thing, in which the Father and the Son and all true believers, have communion or a common interest, and which is the source of their fellowship or joint-participation in the same affection, interest and end, is the Holy Ghost. Therefore, this communion is, with propriety, termed, not communion WITH, but, the communion OF the Holy Ghost.

3. The word communion, though it may primarily import a common interest or joint-participation, is also used to signify mutual communication; which is generally implied in, or the natural result of, a common interest. And this is undoubtedly included in the communion, of Christians with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ. God and Jesus Christ communicate the Holy Spirit to believers; and they, under the influence of this Spirit, communicate or devote their hearts and their whole persons to Jesus Christ, and to God through him. The Spirit communicated to them, produces a return of communications, in the exercises of love, gratitude and praise, self-dedication, trust and dependence, joy and rejoicing, and in acts of worship and obedience, inclusive of all those spiritual sacrifices, which are acceptable to God by Jesus Christ. Such mutual intercourse and communications, between God and his people, exist and are maintained by the Holy Spirit; though, ordinarily, not without the instrumentality of external means.

God communicates himself to them, by giving them his Holy Spirit; and they give themselves to him. He sheds abroad his love in their hearts by the Holy Ghost; and they love and obey him with filial affection, joy and confidence. He comes to them, and makes his abode with them, by his Spirit; and they under the influence of this Spirit, draw nigh to him in prayer and praise, and other religious exercises and actions, and meet with a gracious acceptance. Hence, the communion consisting in such mutual communications, may, with propriety, be termed, the communion of the Holy Ghost—the Holy Spirit being the great and comprehensive good on God's part, communicated by him, producing all their holiness and spiritual joy and happiness; and the great agent in, or source of all holy and acceptable communications and correspondence, on their part.

4. All Christians, who have communion with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ, have fellowship with one another.

By one Spirit Christians are all baptized into one body, and are all made to drink into one Spirit. 1 Cor. xii. 13. Hence, as one general rule of faith and practice is common to them all, they have fellowship in sentiment, affection and practice. The same views and ideas of God, of Christ, and of themselves, of the law, and of the gospel, are common to them all—I mean, the grand capital ideas.

They believe the same fundamental doctrines—in the same mediator, and with the same kind of faith. They jointly partake of and share in the same Spirit. Hence, they are alike affected towards God and Christ and one another—towards mankind in general—towards the things of this world, and those of the world to come. They jointly partake in the same graces or fruits of the Spirit, though not all in the same degree. They have the same end ultimately in view—the same supreme ultimate object of desire, hope and pursuit. They enjoy the same spiritual privileges and blessings, though in different degrees and with circumstantial differences. They have a joint-participation in the same communion with God and Jesus Christ. They have a common interest in the same God and Father—in the same Lord and Saviour—in the same righteousness and atonement, and in the same eternal salvation. Being members of the same body, united to the same common head, they have a mutual interest in and care of one another, and can feel for and sympathize with one another in joy and sorrow; and according to their several wants and abilities, communicate and impart to one another, for their mutual benefit.

This communion of Christians with one another, appears to be comprised in the communion of the Holy Ghost; since it either consists in, or is the natural consequence of, their joint-participation of the same Holy Spirit, by whose agency they are formed into one body, of one heart and one soul, under and in union with one common head, the Lord Jesus Christ. Blessed communion! and happy, indeed, in every real subject of it!

ASTHENES.

For the CONNECTICUT EVANGELICAL MAGAZINE.

Thoughts on the nature and design of the Probation of Sinners for Eternity.

THAT mankind are probationers for eternity, is a truth abundantly evident from the scriptures—and it is of great importance that it should be rightly understood and believed. It is evident, however, that many entertain erroneous notions respecting it— notions which are inconsistent with the character of God, and involve a false idea of the nature of man, and of moral agency. It is a matter, therefore, worthy of particular attention. The following observations are offered with a design to set the subject in a true point of light—and a hope that they may excite, in the mind of the reader, some just sense of the solemn and all-important situation of mankind while in this probationary state.

When it is said that mankind are probationers for eternity, it is implied that they are in a state of trial; and that their condition in the future world is suspended upon the issue of this trial. It implies that they are moral agents; and that life and death are set before them for their choice—the one or the other of which is to be their portion, according to the issue of the trial, or the probation of their hearts.

First. In order to any person's being in a state of probation, he must be a moral agent. But what is moral agency? Or what is necessary to constitute a person a free moral agent? A few observations in answer to this question will tend to elucidate the general subject. Some just ideas respecting free moral agency, are necessary to a right understanding of the nature and design of that state of trial, or probation, in which mankind are placed.

And it may be observed that a person, to be a free moral agent must possess understanding, taste, and will. The understanding, is that faculty by which we obtain a speculative knowledge of truth, or of any natural or moral objects. The taste of the soul, (like that of the body from which the figure is taken) is a foundation, or predisposition to receive pleasure or pain, when objects of a moral nature are presented. The will is a faculty by which the mind puts forth volitions, or acts of choice, in view of objects, according to the affections which they excite.

It is immaterial what the nature of a person's taste of heart is, in order to free moral agency; because free moral agency does not consist in being of a particular taste, or temper of heart; but in acting according to our taste, be it good, or bad—acting as we please. If we are so formed as to feel the affection of pleasure or pain—love or hatred, in view of objects; and are able, upon feeling either of these affections, or any included in them, to put forth such volitions, and external actions, as are according to the affection experienced, and are the proper expressions of the taste or temper of our hearts, we are free moral agents in the highest sense of the words.

The idea which some have had, that in order to our being free moral agents, we must have a power to desire, will, and act contrary to our taste; or, which is the same, that we must be able to change our own hearts, or, to love and choose an object, at the same time in which we have a taste wholly opposed to it, is absurd. No such thing is implied in free moral agency. Whoever feels the affection of love or hatred—pleasure or pain, when the divine character, or any thing of a moral nature is brought into view; and whose volitions, or exercises of the will, are correspondent to these affections, is a free moral agent. He has all the freedom of action which it is possible to conceive of, in a creature.

That these ideas respecting what is implied in free moral agency, are just, will be evident, if we consider that the elect angels, who are established in holiness, are free moral agents, so far that all their exercises are praise-worthy or virtuous and holy. But wherein does this freedom consist, except it be in acting voluntarily and according to the holy taste of their hearts? Yet we cannot conceive of their being able to act otherwise than they do; or so that any of their actions should be sinful, unless they should first fall, and become of a depraved corrupt taste. But from this they will ever be kept by the constant upholding hand of God. Adam also, in innocency, was a free moral agent, and acted out the temper of his heart. The divine character, to which he was conformed, ever excited in him the affection of love—the natural effect of which was, such volitions and external actions, as were the proper expressions of it. And when by the fall he became of a corrupt taste—a partial, unholy affection, he was still as much a free moral agent as before. His exercises were still voluntary. He still acted as he pleased, or according to the taste of his heart, tho' it was now corrupt.

The fallen Angels also, are free moral agents; that is, if we consider them as sinful, or blameworthy, in their exercises. But what freedom have they, except that of acting voluntarily, and according to the taste of their hearts? If they, or any creature had power to act otherwise, or in opposition to their own natures, these volitions and external actions could no longer be considered as the expressions of the heart. A man's living, externally, in total disobedience of the divine commands, would not afford any certain evidence of a corrupt taste; nor would the most perfect external conformity be in the least degree evidential of a right temper or taste of heart. The tree could no longer be known by its fruit. The absurdity and falsehood of these consequences, prove the falsehood of the doctrine or supposition from which they flow.

Secondly. In order to men's being in a state of probation, they must not only be moral agents in the sense now explained, but life and death, good and evil, must be set before them for their choice; and their future state and condition be suspended upon their loving and choosing, or hating and refusing the one or the other; including those affections and volitions naturally connected with these. Both the lost and the fallen Angels, are free moral agents, as has been observed; but they are not probationers. The reason is, they are not now in a state of trial for their future condition; or upon which their treatment in a future state is put at issue. But this is essential to a state of probation. It implies a trial of character, by the presentation of objects of a moral nature, in such circumstances as will draw forth and exhibit to the view of creatures, the taste or disposition of the heart, in order to a state of retribution.

This probation, or trial and proving of hearts, by means of moral agency, or free volitions and actions, thro' a particular period of time, is not necessary for the information of God—He sees the hearts of all, intuitively. But for the information of creatures, it is necessary. In this way only can they learn the dependance of creatures—what they are when the divine influence is withheld—what the evil of sin is, and the implacable and incorrigible nature of a sinful heart; so as to be prepared, to the best advantage, to see the righteousness, propriety, and beauty of the divine character and conduct in the retribution he will make to mankind in their final state.

Further. With respect to man-kind, who have fallen and become sinners, and are under the probation of the gospel, it is to be observed, that there is some probability, or reason to hope, that they will pass thro' a change of character, and become of a new and holy taste or disposition: And thus become entitled to the future blessedness proposed in the gospel—and be prepared for it. Upon trial the hearts of all men prove to be naturally corrupt, and wholly so. The law of God which is a transcript of the divine character, and calculated to give the knowledge of sin, is presented to them : But their free moral agency, or volitions and actions respecting it, manifest that their hearts are opposed—yea, that they are enmity against God—that they are not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be, without a radical change. The gospel of the grace of God is also presented, containing the free offer of pardon and salvation thro' a glorious Mediator, with the alternative of a certain and aggravated destruction if they neglect so great salvation. But from this also they turn away, and with one consent excuse themselves, and refuse a compliance. Still, however, there is some hope of them—some probability that they may yet be of a taste or disposition to embrace the gospel ; because God waits upon them—calls and invites them by his word and providence—gives the Holy Spirit to strive with them, and set before them their sin and danger, and in numerous instances, renews and sanctifies the hearts of sinners—the consequence of which is, that they as voluntarily and freely embrace the Saviour, as they before rejected him. Now as the great design of God in giving sinners the means and advantages of the gospel was, not only to prove them, and exhibit to the universe the implacable wickedness of their hearts ; but also to sanctify and save many of them—And as he is in the way of saving sinners, and is pleased to do it in the use of means ; therefore all who have these means, or enjoy the offers and advantages of the gospel, are “prisoners of hope :” And especially when they are in any measure awakened and excited to attend to divine things. And this is a principal thing implied in the probation of sinners under the gospel, viz. the probability that they may become the subjects of a change of heart, by the word and spirit of God, and be heirs of salvation.

It may be observed, then, that the state of probation which men have under the gospel, both those who embrace it, and those who continue impenitent, is a state in which the means used with them, and the moral objects presented to their view, serve not only to prove their characters, and bring the nature of their affection out to view, but also to strengthen and increase that affection ; and thus prepare them more and more, for those opposite states to which the penitent, and impenitent, will be assigned. When the rain, and the rays of the sun fall upon a field that is sown, they cause the seed to spring up, and prove of what sort it is, whether wheat or tares. And by continuing to fall they strengthen and increase them, and bring them both to maturity, and thus prepare them for that end to which their natures are respectively suited—the one to be gathered into the barn, and the other to be burned.

Thus when mankind under the gospel have holy affection excited in them, or the Christian graces drawn into exercise by the truths held up and the means enjoyed, they are thereby proved to be vessels of mercy. And by continuing to exercise these graces under the power and influence of truth, they grow and increase, and become more and more fitted for glory. On the other hand, those who in view of the same truths, have unholy affection excited and opposition drawn forth, prove themselves to be vessels of wrath : And, continuing their opposition, the greater the light and advantages they enjoy, the faster will their guilt and wickedness increase, till they are ripened and "fitted for destruction."

Having suggested these thoughts upon the subject under consideration, it may be proper to add something more directly in support of the idea, that mankind, in the present life are in fact in such a state of probation as has been described.

1. That mankind are free moral agents; or that they have understanding, taste and will, and are therefore proper subjects of exhortation and command, is decidedly evident from the numerous commands and exhortations which are addressed to them in the scriptures, which are the word of God. It is evident also from our own conscious feeling and experience. We know that we have understanding, and that the truths of God's word, when attended to and realized, excite in us either pleasure or pain, love or hatred. We know also, and are conscious, that all our volitions respecting these truths, or any thing of a moral nature, are the free outflowings of our hearts, or moral taste and disposition. We cannot therefore conceive of any moral agency more perfectly free.

2. That the future condition of men is suspended upon the present trial of their characters, or, that life and death are set before them in the gospel for their choice, is also evident from the scriptures. It is implied in all the invitations, calls and warnings of the gospel, and is directly asserted in numerous instances. It is written "whatsoever a man soweth that shall he also reap." This intimates that the present is a seed-time for Eternity, and that the future state will be a state of retribution to mankind, in which they will be treated according to the issue of their present probation; or the character they form in this life.

This is expressly taught also by Christ himself in the parable of the talents, Math. xxv. which represents the future state of mankind, as to happiness or misery, to be according to their improvement of the present. And toward the close of the same chapter, it is set forth in a still more plain and literal manner, that there shall be a general judgment, in which the characters of all, as formed and proved in this life, shall be brought out to view. And that all who by their free moral agency in their treatment of Christ and his cause, have manifested themselves his enemies, and are proved to be of a taste and disposition suited to be companions with fallen apostate beings, shall be sentenced to "depart accursed into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels." But that the righteous those who have submitted to Christ, and are proved to be his friends, shall enter into life, and "inherit the kingdom prepared for them from the foundation of the world"!

This subject, in the light in which it has now been considered, brings into view, and confirms the following particular, and very practical and important truths.

1. The necessity of a regeneration of the hearts of sinners, in order to their embracing the gospel; and the consistency of this doctrine.

If mankind are moral agents, and are universally of a corrupt depraved taste or disposition, as is asserted in the scriptures; then it is evident that there must be a change of taste, or they will never have any holy affection, or love to God and the Savior, nor any holy or virtuous volitions and actions in the sight of God. It is necessary, not only that the seed of the word should be sown, but that the ground also be good, in order to fruit being brought forth unto holiness.

Mere cultivation of a bad or barren soil, and sowing good seed upon it, will not change its nature; though it may prove it, and show that it is nigh unto cursing, in that, while it drinketh in the rain which cometh oft upon it and receiveth cultivation, it sendeth forth nought but briars and thorns.

Or to change the figure; Cultivation, even when accompanied with the benign influences of the sun and the rain, will not change the nature of the seeds in a field that is sown; but it will bring them forth, and prove them, and prepare them for that end to which their nature is suited, whether good or bad. And thus it is with respect to the means used with sinners, or the cultivation they receive under the gospel. Such means are used with them, and such objects presented, as would draw forth holy affection and its fruits, were they not of an unholy nature, or a depraved corrupt taste. But since they are, nothing short of a radical change of heart or taste, or being "born again," will effect this, and bring them to a compliance with the gospel. And this is agreeable to the doctrine of Christ. "We must make the tree good or its fruit will not be good. A good tree bringeth not forth corrupt fruit: neither doth a corrupt tree bring forth good fruit."

2. The inextinguishableness of sinners in rejecting the gospel. Life and Death are set before them. Light has come into the world and shines around them, but they hate it, and turn from it, as it is not congenial to their natures, and choose darkness—the way which leads to death. This they do with all the freedom which it is possible for creatures to have. In rejecting the gospel, and treading under foot the Son of God, they act out their hearts. Their actions are the free outflowings of their natures, which are thereby discovered, as the nature of a tree is discovered by its fruit. They are in themselves as conscious of freedom, in "their ungodly deeds, and hard speeches" against Christ, and his cause, and in all their treatment of him, as they are in any of their conduct towards each other. And when they are treated by a fellow creature in any measure as they treat God and the divine Savior, they are ready to resent it as criminal and vile, and deserving a retribution of evil. Thus they are condemned by their own daily conduct and out of their own mouths; and might justly be cut down; immediately, as "cumberers of the ground." And God, by waiting upon them, and continuing the free and gracious offer of salvation, while they continue to harden their hearts, and turn away from it, evinces his long suffering goodness, and lays a foundation for the support of his character, and the display of his mercy and justice, in the great decisive day. Then, if not before, every excuse and false refuge of sinners, will be swept away—every cavilling, replying mouth will be stopped and all the world become guilty before God.

How solemn, therefore, is the situation of mankind in the present life! It is a probation for Eternity, and every circumstance involves eternal consequences. We are all, either vessels of wrath fitting for destruction, or vessels of mercy preparing for glory. Nor is there any hope respecting those who are still impenitent, except in the sovereign mercy and grace of God, who is able to humble and renew their hearts, and thus carry on his own work. The Lord is indeed carrying on his work, and will continue to carry it on, by bringing sinners into his kingdom, and sealing them by his Holy Spirit, unto the day of redemption. But with respect to any individuals who are still impenitent, we know not whether God will display his grace in their repentance and salvation, or glorify his justice in their destruction—giving them over to hardness to eat of the fruit of their own way and be filled with their own devices. But this is certain, and a truth which ought to sink deep into the mind of every impenitent sinner, that unless he is bro't to seek the Lord in earnest, and with a renewed humble heart he must perish. A consideration of these things, and of the shortness and uncertainty of life, ought to awaken and alarm the thoughtless and vain, and excite the children of God to diligence and to a careful examination of their state. Soon, at farthest, the day of death will arrive, and the awful day of judgment and final retribution, when every one will receive according to the deeds done in the body—the character formed while here in this life. There, he that is filthy will be filthy still, and he that is holy will be holy still. There will be no more sacrifice for sin, nor hope, to the wicked, of deliverance from wrath. For as the gift of God to the heirs of the promise, thro' Christ, is "eternal life," so "the wages of sin" the proper wages which the impenitent will receive, is death—eternal death.—"O that they were wise, that they understood this, that they would consider their latter end."

PHILOS.

Some thoughts on the doctrine of the divine decrees.

WE constantly find that persons who appear to be suitably awakened and humbled, have ever been ready to own and profess their belief of, and subjection to the truth of this doctrine; although before they opposed, and quarrelled with it: Which methinks, ought to be considered in favour of it; and indeed, it is difficult for me to have conceptions, which I can think to be any ways just, of a being of infinite knowledge, power and sovereignty, without conceiving of that Being, as having fixed purposes, respecting things pertaining to that universal dominion, which he doth exercise over the whole creation which he hath made.

But I here speak more particularly of the divine decrees respecting his creature man, which if it be a scripture doctrine, and truth, is, by us to be believed and professed; notwithstanding difficulties which are thrown in the way. There is a great difference between managing it with necessary prudence, as it ought to be, both by ministers, and private christians, and professedly renouncing, and discarding it; which, if a scripture doctrine, may not be done without much sin, and danger. Instead of the many places in scripture I might alledge in proof of this doctrine, I shall mention only the following ones, which appear to me sufficient, for that purpose; 1 Thess. i. 4. "Knowing brethren your election of God." Rom. viii. 33. "Who shall lay any thing to the charge of God's elect?" 2 Thess. ii. 13. "But we are bound to give thanks always unto God, for you, brethren, because God hath from the beginning chosen you unto salvation, thro' sanctification of the spirit, and belief of the truth." 1 Pet. i. 2.

"Elect, according to the foreknowledge of God, the father, through sanctification of the Spirit unto obedience, and sprinkling of the blood of Christ; grace unto you, and peace be multiplied."

2 Pet. i. 10. "Wherefore the rather brethren, give diligence to make your calling and election sure." If this doctrine, were not a true scripture doctrine why should the apostle exhort Christians, to use diligence to make their election sure to themselves?

And how are they to make it sure? Not by looking into the book of God's eternal decrees; but by making it sure to themselves that they are effectually called; for the elect of God, are sanctified by the Spirit, unto obedience, and do exercise faith in Christ, and his blood of sprinkling, and atonement; and those whom God did foreknow so as in his everlasting decree, to elect unto eternal life he predestinated, that they through the sanctification of the Spirit, should be conformed to the image of his Son; and when it is suitably remembered that they are thus called to holiness, and virtue, this doctrine may not be considered, and improved as any wise tending unto licentiousness, but to the obedience and comfort, unto which the gospel calls, and invites Christians.

PHILALETHES.

On the duty and importance of
SOCIAL WORSHIP.
(Continued from Vol. I. p. 286.)

NUMBER II.

HITHERTO we have considered the duty of social worship in a general view, under the comprehensive idea of prayer and praise offered up by a worshipping assembly; which general idea includes all the several parts of social worship, however varied in form.—It is now proposed to consider the subject in a more limited, tho' not less interesting point of view.

In addition to the faculty of speech which God hath bestowed on man, as a medium of communion with each other, and with himself; he hath even refined upon his own bounty in the gift of Music. This he hath appointed as a mean of the sublimest exercises of devotion; seemingly with special design, that the praises of his militant church should have the nearest possible approximation to the spiritual and refined worship of the Church triumphant. Thro' the influence of music our very senses become as it were hand maidens to devotion, and assist us in our near approaches to the throne of grace, by preparing our minds for the extatic enjoyment of divine communion.

Tho' there be in nature, but seven different kinds of sounds, yet by the various modulations of these in strains of melody; and the combination of two or more of these different, yet concordant sounds in concert, so as to constitute harmony, the mind, thro' the organ of hearing, and the sympathy of the nervous system, receives peculiar pleasure, exquisitely refined sensations of delight.

There appears a beautiful analogy between the several parts of nature's plan, and particularly between sounds and colours. There are also in nature but seven different kinds of original colours; and philosophers tell us that a combination of these in equal proportion and degree, forms the most beautiful appearance in which we behold any visible object, and by which even the external splendor of the saints in glory is represented; I mean a pure and perfect white. But it seems, that in point of communicating pleasurable sensations to the mind, the combination of colours falls short of the harmonious coincidence of sounds in music; nor can we wonder, when we consider, that the latter is a method specially instituted by God himself, to excite the holy affections of his people to the sublimest exercises of devotion and praise.

In this point of view, that solemn injunction of the Apostle comes very pertinently to our aid.

—Be filled with the Spirit; speaking to yourselves in Psalms, and Hymns, and Spiritual Songs, singing and making melody in your hearts to the Lord. (Eph. v. 19, 20.)

In further pursuing this subject, let us take this passage of inspiration for our guide. In it we find full evidence of the divine institution of Psalmody, or the exercise of vocal music in social worship; intimations respecting the nature and design of the duty, with special directions for the right performance of it. That Psalmody, or the public worship of God by vocal music is a duty of divine institution, and as such has been practised by the people of God in every age of the Church, is a point, I shall now endeavour to establish. In a future number, will be considered the manner in which the duty is to be performed agreeably to the directions of our sacred guide, and the general instructions of scripture upon the subject.

But why attempt to establish the divine institution of Psalmody, it may perhaps be asked, a point, concerning which, the mind of every intelligent scripture reader, cannot entertain a doubt?—True, nor do I affect to consider it in any other light. It is not for speculative argumentation, but for practical improvement, that I would hold up the idea as a subject of formal treatise. It is from a desire that this truth may be more deeply realized under the solemn impression of divine authority, that our obligation to the duty might be more generally and sensibly felt; and the duty itself attended upon with seriousness and solemnity, in the fear and love of God, with a view to his glory, from a principle of obedience to his authority, and with a faith in the divine injunction and acceptance of the duty. Without these views, all our acts of visible and pretended worship, however devoutly performed, are but will-worship; and that solemn question from the word of God heard and realized by conscience, who hath required this at your hand, must strike us dumb in the midst of our presumption, and cover us with confusion and shame.

How many duties of revealed religion are there, of the most plain and positive injunction, which we formally and habitually discharge without any sense of, or respect to the divine authority! The following questions, put home to our consciences, will help us to a conviction of the truth of this reflection, In all my conduct, do I act from a principle of obedience to God?

In whatever action I am now about to engage, am I going to do it, because God commands me to do it? This exercise would be calculated to convince us of our extreme alienation of heart from the life and service of God, that we hold the truth in unrighteousness; and that in many, if not in all our religious duties, we have but the form without the power of godliness. And I am induced to think that there is no one duty of the religious life, in which mankind, and even christian professors themselves, are so essentially deficient, which they perform with so little conscientiousness, and so feeble a respect to the divine authority, as the duty of singing God's praises in the social worship of the family, and the congregation. While our ears are charmed with the music, how often are our hearts untouched with the sentiment, and even frozen with unbelief? How strange, and unaccountable this, if true! That in that exercise of devotion the nearest akin to the heavenly worship, we should be even the most formal and dull! Must it not be because we are in so great measure carnal, and destitute of the spirit? Because we have so little faith in God's word, and so little heavenly mindedness in exercise? Is it not highly necessary therefore, that we assiduously cultivate the impressions of known duty, and attend earnestly to this instructive precept of Scripture, Be filled with the Spirit; speaking to yourselves in psalms, and hymns and spiritual songs; singing and making melody in your hearts to the Lord. Surely our duty cannot be more explicitly enjoined, nor can we reasonably require a more certain foundation of faith.

For a more impressive conviction of truth, let it be noted that this scripture passage, is not a single solitary precept, but the same command is often repeated in the holy scriptures both of the Old and New-Testament. Too numerous are they indeed to be cited at large, or even referred to. As a specimen of the New-Testament precepts, the one just recited, may suffice: and in referring to the concurring authority of the Old, the whole book of Psalms might be adduced. * "O come let us sing unto the Lord, let us make a joyful noise to the rock of our salvation. Let us come before his presence with thanksgiving, and make a joyful noise unto him with psalms. † Serve the Lord with gladness, come before his presence with singing." And in an extacy of devotion the Psalmist celebrates the glorious ascension of our Redeemer; ‡ "God is gone up with a shout, the Lord with the sound of a trumpet. Sing praises to God, sing praises: Sing praises unto our king, sing praises, for God is the king of all the earth, sing ye praises with understanding."

David was himself, not only an inspired prophet and teacher, but a divine poet, and an eminent musician. He appears to have been an accomplished performer on all the various musical instruments then in use, these he tuned to the praise of his God. His psalms were originally written in Hebrew verse, and severally set to music. We find them directed to the chief musician. They were designed for the stated use of God's people in the worship of the Sanctuary. In them we find that not only the glorious perfections and marvellous works of God are celebrated, interspersed with prophetic views of the Messiah and the Gospel Church, but that the whole system of religious duties—experimental religion, and all the various exercises of the christian in his spiritual warfare thro' life, are made the subjects of sacred song.

David, by way of eminence is styled the "sweet Psalmist of Israel;" as he brought the art of Psalmody into system. He was made instrumental of this important service to the Church of furnishing the pattern and subject of psalmody in all ages. His writings, with all the poetical paraphrases upon them are distinguished by the title of Psalms. Other verifications upon sacred subjects are called hymns and spiritual songs. The use of all which is divinely commanded—"speaking to yourselves in psalms, and hymns and spiritual songs."

* Psalm xcvi. † c. ‡ lxxvii, 5, 6, 7.

God hath ever had a church in the world. And we have reason to believe that ever since the commencement of social worship in the world, God's praises have been publicly celebrated in sacred psalmody. Of this we have certain evidence, as far back as from the time of Israel's deliverance from Egypt—when upon the eastern shore of the Red Sea, the whole congregation celebrated, in the song of Moses, their wonderful deliverance and the destruction of their enemies. And perhaps we have reason to believe, notwithstanding the silence of the Scriptures, that even from the time of Jubal the grandson of Methusael, who was the first inventor of musical instruments, and the father of all such as handle the harp and organ, music has been cultivated, not only as a polite art, but as a mode of social worship. In fine, psalmody is the exercise and worship of Heaven, and there is just so much of heaven on earth, as there is of the true spirit of psalmody.

God's works both of creation and redemption, were celebrated with an anthem of heavenly music. When man was made in the image of God, "the morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy;" but when God appeared in fashion as a man, all Heaven came down to earth to view the wonder—their harps were ready strung, and in notes of sweetest melody warbled that memorable anthem of praise, "Glory to God in the highest, on earth peace, good will towards men."

ASAPH.

(To be continued.)

Thoughts suggested by 1 John iii. 16. "Hereby perceive we the love of God, because he laid down his life for us!"

WHILE we read this passage, we are led to inquire, What can be meant by God's laying down his life? and second, What could be the design of such a wonderful event?

1. What can be meant by God's laying down his life? This cannot mean that Jehovah, the great and independent God ever ceased to exist; or that the exercise of his divine attributes was ever for a single moment suspended. To suppose this would be absurd and blasphemous to the highest degree:

The question, now returns, what can be meant by God's laying down his life? Surely, to lay down one's life is to die. This we shall not dispute; but shall endeavor to show in what sense God died. It may be explained by the death of a man. We say such a man died last night, or last week. Is the man dead? Yes, you say, the man is dead. But what is a man? All believers in divine revelation are ready to answer—a man is a rational creature, having an immortal soul connected with a mortal body. The soul is by far the most dignified and important part of the man. "The mind's the standard of the man." It is this that raises him above the beasts, and makes him akin to angels. Yet when you say of such a man, that he is dead, you do not mean that his immortal, i. e. undying soul is dead—Certainly not; for in such a sense as this, no man dies. You mean then, when you say that such a man is dead, that he, in his mortal, or dying part, is dead. We say Abraham, Isaac and Jacob are dead; but Christ taught us that their souls were yet alive and in heaven. A man has two natures animal and rational; yet but one person: So that the whole man is said to suffer what is suffered in either of the natures, of which he is possessed. Hence it is that man is, at one time, called mortal, and, at another time, immortal. Man is mortal, because his body dies and moulders to dust—man is immortal because his soul never dies, but will endure forever.

This may serve to help us understand what is meant by God's laying down his life. He died as far as he could die. He died in that nature, which was capable of dying. Considered simply as a divine being, he could not die, therefore a body was prepared for him.* He was born of a woman.† “He took upon him the seed of Abraham”—the nature of man. “God was manifest in the flesh,” in such a way, that it is said, John i. 14. He was made flesh. Divinity was not turned into humanity, but the divinity was truly joined to human nature: So that the body which hung on the cross was the body of God, in distinction from all other bodies, just as this, in distinction from all other bodies, is the body which belongs to my soul. I may have children—in one sense their bodies are mine. I may own herds and flocks—in another sense they are none. But if my children and beasts should all die, it cannot, with propriety, be said, that I am dead. Yet when this body, which is personally united with my immortal spirit, dies, I shall be truly dead. In a high and important sense, all things in the universe are God's. All bodies, whether of men or of beasts are his; yet in a higher and quite different sense, the body of Jesus Christ, was the body of God. All the men and beasts in the world might die; yet there would be no propriety in saying, that God had laid down his life. The blood of all the sacrifices under the law was nothing more than the blood of bulls and goats; but the blood of the cross was truly the blood of God; see Acts xx. 28.

We are in the next place led to inquire, what was the design of this wonderful affair? Why did the great Jehovah ever assume a human soul and body into personal union with himself—when this was done, why did he bleed and die? To this we reply; he took a human body that he might be in a capacity to die; and he died for us, that he might redeem us from the curse of the law. By our rebellion, we had cast contempt upon the infinite God—we had violated infinite obligation, and were truly deserving of an infinite punishment. Punishment is designed to show God's opposition to sin, and determination to maintain his holy law. As the opposition of God to sin does not imply malevolence towards the sinner, it admits of an atonement, or vicarious sufferings. But nothing could be admitted as an adequate atonement, which did not fully exhibit that it suite opposition, which there is in the divine mind against sin. From this it is clear, that no finite sacrifice could be accepted. An infinite sacrifice must be made, or sinners must perform ally suffer the endless pains of hell. But where could an infinite sacrifice be found? No where in creation. The life of God must be laid down, or sinners could not live.

* Heb. x. 5. † Gal. iv. 4.

But here a difficulty throws itself into view. Though it was God, who laid down his life for us, yet it was nothing but his human, mortal part, which suffered; and how could this make an infinite atonement?

This has been a great difficulty in my mind towards understanding the immensity of the atonement, or that infinite honor done to the penalty of the divine law, by the sufferings of Christ. Perhaps, some other weak disciples may be perplexed with the same difficulty. I feel bound, therefore, if God has given me any light, to impart it to my weak brethren; for I do not expect, by this piece, that I am going to add any thing to the knowledge of the fathers in Christ.

When a man dies, though nothing but his mortal part perishes, yet we view it as something more than the death of a mere animal. Nothing but the animal part is dead; yet it is a part of man, a rational creature and first of God's works below. Hence the crime of killing a man, though nothing but his animal part is destroyed, is great in comparison with the crime of killing a mere animal. "Who so sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed: for in the image of God made he man." The lives of many beasts are taken to support the life of one man, and that his animal life too. But why is the animal life of man made so much account of? It is evidently because it is personally and intimately joined to a rational soul. It is on this account, we treat with great respect the mouldering remain of men, while the carcases of those creatures, which are mere animals, we expose to be eaten up by dogs, wild beasts and birds of prey. If our fellow men die in the woods or in the water, where their bodies are exposed to be eaten up by these animals, we take great pains to search after them, that we may give them the honors of sepulture. And, no doubt, this is suitable and proper. Now, if we view our bodies more precious and respectable than the carcases of animals, because they have been, and are again to be connected with reasonable and immortal souls, how precious and honorable must the body of Christ appear, which was really and truly united to the Godhead? It is reunited, and will continue in personal union with the great Jehovah to all eternity!

Another thing, which will tend to illustrate the subject is this: We inter with more respect the remains of a man eminently great and useful, than we do the remains of an obscure member of the community. Though funeral pomp is often misplaced, by being given to the rich instead of the truly great and excellent; yet there is, no doubt, a propriety in making a difference in our treatment, not only of the living, but of the dead. It was proper that Josiah and other good kings in Judah should be buried in the chiefest sepulchres of their fathers, and that there should be a great mourning at their funeral, while some of the wicked, idolatrous kings of Israel had the burial of an ass. When the soul has left the body, what remains in our sight of a good man is no better than what remains of a wicked man, neither is a man, in this sense, any better than a beast: for all moulder back to dust. It is evident therefore, that we do, in some measure, appreciate, or value the body, in proportion to the greatness and goodness of the immortal inhabitant, which does, which has, or which will reside in it again. We view the man, soul and body, in such a sense, one, that we attach and transfer the dignity and excellency of the soul to the body. In this view, what infinite dignity must be attached to that body, which the infinitely glorious God has been pleased to take into an incomprehensibly near relation to himself, so as to call it his own body, and the blood poured from it his own blood! It is no wonder that this blood is called the precious blood of Christ.

It is reckoned by us a much greater thing to suffer in our person than in our estate. The taking away life is the greatest punishment, which men inflict. "All that a man hath will he give for his life." A fine, even if it were to extend to all our property, would be viewed as a light punishment, or a light evil, in comparison to the loss of life. It would by men of feeling be viewed light in comparison to any corporeal punishment. It was a greater expression and more decided proof of the real, unfeigned love of God to sinners, to lay down his life for them than to have made a sacrifice of all creation in their behalf. This would be only like a man's giving up his property but that is like a man's giving up himself. "Greater love than this hath no man than that a man lay down his life for his friend." And as God by laying down his life for us has given the most decided proof of his unfeigned love toward us; so he has, at the same time, given the clearest possible exhibition of his infinite opposition to sin and full determination forever to frown upon it. And this is what is necessary to constitute an atonement infinite. Though the Divinity itself did not suffer (for this was impossible) yet it was the greatest sacrifice, which God could make to give up to such bitter sufferings, shame and reproach the man Christ Jesus, whom he had taken into an incomprehensibly near and sweet connection with himself, even so near, as to be a part of himself, so that his blood should be God's blood, and his dying be called God's laying down his life.

Let these thoughts be pursued, and we shall discover the infinite greatness of the atonement, made by the sufferings of the Son of God. We shall see, that by this propitiation, the righteousness of God is so fully declared, that he can now be just, while he justifieth him, who believeth in Jesus. There is forgiveness with God, because there is plenteous redemption through the blood, the precious blood of Christ, who was a Lamb, without spot. Here is a broad basis; on which to build everlasting hopes!

FOR THE CONNECTICUT EVANGELICAL MAGAZINE.

Explanatory notes and remarks on Ezek. x. 8—12.

"And there appeared in the cherubims, the form of a man's hand under their wings. And when I looked, behold, the four wheels by the cherubims, one wheel by one cherub, and another wheel by another cherub: And the appearance of the wheels was as the colour of a beryl-stone. And as for their appearance, they four had one likeness, as if a wheel had been in the midst of a wheel. When they went, they went upon their four sides; they turned not as they went, but to the place whether the head looked, they followed it; they turned not as they went. And their whole body, and their backs, and their hands, and their wings, and the wheels were full of eyes round about, even the wheels that they four had."

IN the first chap. the Prophet relates a remarkable vision which he had in Babylon in the fifth year of Jehoiachin's captivity. And again in this chap. he gives an account of seeing the same vision.—Here we may observe, that this remarkable vision, was but a vision, though a very affecting and instructive one. And for a right understanding of it, let us observe, that what are called living creatures in the first chap. are here termed cherubims. Cherubims here means an order of angels, it is conceived. And they signify more generally, the angels whom God employs in the administration of the affairs of his providence.

These are represented, as having each four wings. With two of these wings they did fly, and with two cover their bodies. This may denote the reverence of their minds, and their entire obedience to God.

Each one has four faces, one looking to every quarter. This may signify their fitness to watch, and do what God requires of them on all occasions: their fitness to run any way on his messages. Each face is compared to what is most excellent in its kind. They had the face of a man, denoting intelligence and wisdom: The face of a lion, denoting their dignity and strength: The face of an ox, denoting their obedience and patience: The face of an eagle, denoting the acuteness of their penetration or discernment, and celerity in performing the divine will.

They had the form of a man's hand under their wings, which may denote their preparedness to do God's will. They have hands to do their work: and probably to signify that their manner of working is sacred, their hands are hid under their wings.

In the vision, there are four cherubims, and four wheels; a wheel by each cherub. The colour of the wheels, was that of a beryl-stone, i. e. a lively sea green; which may denote the apparent instability of all human affairs. The wheels were all four alike; and of a remarkable workmanship; as if a wheel had been in the midst of a wheel. This corresponds with the four faces of each cherub. The wheels were so framed as one ring or rim of a wheel was framed into another, i. e. as if it had two rims, one set to run north or south, and the other east or west: so that the wheels, as well as cherubims were ready to run any way without turning. In the 10 and 11 verses, it is said, "as for their appearance, they four had one likeness, as if a wheel had been in the midst of a wheel; when they went, they went upon their four sides; they turned not as they went, but to the place whither the head looked, they followed it; they turned not as they went."

In this vision, this seems to be a representation of the chariot of state in which the Lord Jehovah rides, in the administration of the affairs of the kingdom of providence.—Both cherubims and wheels are full of eyes. "And their whole body, and their backs, and their hands, and their wings, and the wheels were full of eyes round about, even the wheels that they four had."

And further, the spirit of the living creature or cherubims was in the wheels. Both moved and went together ; and with the greatest swiftness : They ran and returned like a flash of lightning.

In order to give a just view of this vision, it may be observed,

1. That God uses the ministry of angels in the administration of the affairs of providence. Their ministry is invisible to us ; but is nevertheless real, important and necessary. God is represented as sitting upon a throne, and governing the world by means of angels ; or riding in the chariot of state, attended by angels swift to do his will, and fulfil his pleasure. Hence says the psalmist, “ Bless the Lord, ye his angels, that do his commandments.”

The angels are ministering spirits to the people of God : Sent forth to minister for them who shall be heirs of salvation.—The affairs of divine providence are managed by angels, who receive and obey orders from God.

2. The wheels in this vision, signify the wheels of providence. They are managed by intelligent agents, under the direction of God. He does not suffer the affairs of the world to run at random. No, they are all conducted by intelligent spirits ; filled with knowledge, sagacity and power, suitable to the trust committed to them : And under the direction and control of God. The cherubims and the wheels are full of eyes ; to see every way ; to see which way danger is coming to them committed to their charge, and which way to go to prevent it. The wheels are ready to move any way as the angels guide ; for the spirit of the living creature is in them.

3. We see who presides over all the affairs of divine providence ; it is God. The cherubims and wheels move at his pleasure.

It is the comfort and rejoicing of his people, that all things are under the direction of an infinitely wise, mighty, just, holy, powerful, good and faithful being ; that being who has ever shewn himself a friend to the righteous, their guardian and protector ; and has avenged them on the wicked.

Though we cannot see the wheels, nor how they move, yet the spirit of the living creature is in them, and they have eyes. Their motions are all guided by an intelligent agent. They are all under the direction of an all-wise being.

4. The manner of providence, and the methods which God takes, though effectual, to bring about his own purposes, are mysterious to us ; a wheel in the middle of a wheel. As it is difficult to explain the vision ; and particularly the workmanship of the wheels ; so it is difficult for us to search out the ways of God. The ways of divine providence are mysterious to us. The wheels are high, we cannot reach them.

5. Divine providence in its workmanship is incomprehensible. There is divine skill in forming the wheels, a wheel in the midst of a wheel, so that it will go any way without the pains of turning : And all the wheels are under the direction of cherubims with four faces : And both cherubims and wheels full of eyes. O how exquisite is the management of divine providence ! God’s works are wonderful ; marvellous are his doings !

6. There is real harmony in those dispensations of providence which seem to interfere with each other. That which seems to hinder, shall eventually promote God’s designs. Thus the hardness of Pharaoh’s heart, and his unwillingness to let the children of Is-not go; though it seemed to oppose God's fulfilling his promise (to give the land of Canaan) to the children of Israel; yet eventually promoted God's design. He got himself honor upon Pharaoh, and the Egyptians; and brought out his people with a high hand, and an out-stretched arm. The malice and wickedness of men are over-ruled by God for the promotion of his own glory and his people's good. God brings great good out of evil. Thus in the case of our Saviour's crucifixion and death. See Acts ii. 23. "Him being delivered by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God, ye have taken, and by wicked hands have crucified and slain."

7. God can easily change affairs in providence, and move the wheels for or against his people. The wheels are so framed as to run any way; and they move easily and speedily as the cherubims are disposed; for the spirit of the living creature is in the wheels: And the cherubims are ready to obey God's orders, and fulfil his pleasure. God can with infinite ease work salvation for his people, let the appearances of things be ever so dark and difficult. We have various instances of this in scripture. Once when the Israelites were at the Red Sea. Another when Gideon with three hundred men defeated a large host of Midianites. Another when Sennacherib besieged Jerusalem with a great host, and the angel of the Lord slew an hundred, eighty and five thousand of them in one night.

When the church is in distress, God works salvation many times in unexpected ways; uses the vilest instruments to promote his designs, and bring good to his people. The earth helped the woman.

Sometimes God makes use of instruments to promote the good of his people, who design the contrary; thus in the instance of Haman and others.

Let us acknowledge God as the sovereign ruler of the universe; and be sensible that the wheels of providence are under his direction. He can send his angels to protect his people in times of greatest trouble. If God be for them who can be against them? In vain will be all the attempts of earth and hell against his children.

Therefore let us labor for tranquillity under all the dispensations of providence. What more proper to produce and maintain such a state of mind, than a consideration that God rules, and that the wheels are full of eyes, and guided by him; do not move but by his order or permission. Infinite wisdom presides. Supreme power, joined with infinite wisdom and benevolence conducts all the affairs of the universe.

Let us commit ourselves, and all our concerns to God by faith and prayer. The consideration that the wheels and living creatures are all under his direction, is an encouragement to faith, prayer, and trust in him.

The vision will come in its time, and will not tarry; wait for it. God never fails those who seek him, trust in him, and wait for him.

OMEGA.

An account of a work of divine grace in a revival of religion in the town of PLYMOUTH, State of Connecticut, in the year 1799, in two letters to the Editors from the Rev. SIMON WATERMAN.

LETTER I.

TO THE EDITORS OF THE CON-

CONNECTICUT EVANGELICAL MAGAZINE.

GENTLEMEN,

WHEN the Lord shall build up Zion, he shall appear in his glory: and perhaps, in none of God's works, are several of his perfections, more gloriously displayed than in revivals of religion; particularly, his wisdom, power, sovereignty and goodness; his wisdom in choosing the time when and the means by which, to effect his purpose; his power in awakening the most secure and stupid, and subduing to himself the most perverse and obstinate sinner; his goodness in plucking sinners as brands from the burning, and saving their souls from eternal death; and his sovereignty, in taking some and leaving others to perish in their sins. No reason can be assigned for that discrimination which is made between one town and another, when the spirit is poured out more copiously upon the one than upon the other, or why one sinner is the subject of regenerating grace, and not another, but only this, "even so father, for so it seemeth good in thy sight." Before the late revival of religion in this town, the people in general were in a very languid state as to any visible appearance of the power of godliness among them; nor can I find upon enquiry, that there ever hath been, until this time, a general spirit of seriousness and attention to religion among them from their first incorporation, which is more than sixty years ago. Since I have had the pastoral charge of this people, which is more than thirteen years, there have been, so far as I know, but very few instances of persons under apparent conviction of sin and deep concern about their future state. The people in general appeared to be at rest, in a formal attendance upon the external duties of religion, and abstaining from the grosser pollutions of the world. About four or five in a year, upon an average, had come forward, and by an open profession of christianity, joined the church. In the two years next preceding the awakening, there were but three that visibly entered into covenant with God. Thus were the wise and the foolish apparently slumbering and sleeping together, when it pleased God to revive his work among us and give visible manifestations of his favorable presence with us.

Towards the end of the year 1798 there was an appearance of more attention to religion than had been common among us; although it was not generally noticed at that time; our assemblies upon the sabbath were more full, and the attention of the congregation to the word preached, and other parts of social worship, more fixed than had been usual. Nothing farther very especially appeared, until in the month of February 1799, when the spirit came like a mighty rushing wind, and seemed to breathe on many at one and the same time. The first visible indication of this, was on a lecture-day, previous to the administration of the sacramental supper. These lectures had heretofore usually been attended but by few, besides professors, and too many of these were negligent in their attendance. But at this time, there were probably three if not four times the number which had ordinarily attended on such occasions, especially of young people; and the countenances of many indicated sadness of heart. Indeed the whole congregation appeared solemn; but some in different parts of the house, by their tears which they could not conceal, manifested that their minds were tenderly impressed; at the close of this meeting in the day-time an evening lecture was appointed, which it is believed, was the first evening religious meeting which had ever been publicly notified or attended, in the town; at this meeting in the evening, a much greater number attended than did in the day-time. A brother in the ministry being present preached from these words, He flattereth himself in his own eyes, until his iniquity be found to be hateful. The assembly was solemn, the hearers attentive, and the word preached seemed to be accompanied with a divine power: A religious meeting was now appointed on the Wednesday evening of the next week; and although the season and travelling were both uncomfortable, many came from almost every quarter; and it seemed as if God was present of a truth, speaking to sinners in a still small voice, and saying, what have you been doing? And where are you going? Consider what you do, and what your end is like to be. After prayer and singing, the people assembled, were addressed from these words, Escape for thy life; look not behind thee; neither say thou in all the plain; escape to the mountain lest thou be consumed. A solemn silence reigned among the hearers, who appeared to hear as for their lives; and many were to be seen in various parts of the house, weeping and trembling under a sense of their guilt and danger; and saying to themselves, what shall I do to be saved! For at this time, but few spoke out the feelings and exercises of their hearts; but at the close of the meeting, silently returned to their respective homes, in pensive sadness. From that time to the present, there have been almost every week, from two to five and sometimes six religious meetings, beside the two upon the sabbath; and as I have, invariably attended them myself, can witness to the order and decency, the silence and solemnity, with which, and the numbers by which these meetings have been attended. The silence observable among those who were going to or returning from these meetings, was very impressive, and frequently noticed with surprize and pleasure. Little or no tumult or noise, and the appearance of most, such as if they had been going to, or were returning from the funeral of some near relative or friend. And while in the house, nothing was said but by the minister; for so little disposed were people to take an active part in any religious exercise, except singing, that it was difficult to get one publicly to propose or ask a question. Many were swift to hear, but all slow to speak.

During this time of awakening, the people in general, were much more disposed, to hear the word preached, and other religious instructions, than heretofore; and attended to receive instruction, in a manner, to outward appearance, very different from what is common in most worshipping assemblies. Our assemblies upon the sabbath were full, and for many sabbaths successively, it is believed not one of adult years, was seen to turn his face from the preacher, or to rise from his seat, from the time the sermon began, until it was finished, nor yet to sleep or doze; nor could an attentive observer, discover a smile, upon any occasion in the countenance of any one, arrived to the years of understanding, during the time of religious worship or after they came into the place of worship, until they left it. When people came up to the house of the Lord to worship, it seemed as if each one said to himself, surely the Lord is here. How dreadful is this place! And frequently, when the religious exercises, have been closed and the assembly dismissed, many by their countenances and other signs, manifested a kind of unwillingness to leave the place, as if they said, it is good to be here. Upon several communion-days, the whole or nearly the whole of the congregation, attended as spectators, the administration of the sacramental supper; and a large proportion of them, as well as of the communicants, were in tears during the solemn scene.

In this time of God's pouring out his spirit, and reviving his work among us, sixty-one, have been added to the church, and baptism administered to about one hundred. Among the baptized, are sixteen households or families. At one time a number of households, containing about twenty souls, were baptized.

Those who have in this time of awakening, joined the church, are most, if not all of them, between fourteen and forty years of age. The greatest number have been from the class of married people; of the unmarried, twenty-one are females.

How solemn and affecting, to behold heads of families who had all their life time, restrained prayer and lived without God in the world, praying with their families, morning and evening, day by day continually, and in a public manner devoting themselves and their households to the Lord? and how impressive and animating to the friends of Zion, to see those in the bloom and gaieties of youth, become sober-minded; and voluntarily enrolling their names among the followers of the Lamb? Especially, what inexpressible joy must it afford pious parents, who are travelling in birth, that Christ may be formed in their children, to see them in a serious manner, take upon themselves the bonds of their baptismal covenant, and confess a crucified Saviour, before a scoffing world? Sundry parents have seen several of their children, unitedly devoting themselves to God. In one instance, four sisters came forward together and renouncing the vanities of youth, professed godliness. Such views must lead every contemplative and pious mind, to meditate with raptures of joy, upon such divine promises and predictions, as that in the 44th Chapter of Isaiah, at the beginning "Thus saith the Lord—I will pour my spirit upon thy seed and my blessing upon thine offspring, and they shall spring up as among the grass, as willows by the water-courses. One shall say, I am the Lords: and another shall call himself by the name of Jacob; and another shall subscribe with his hand unto the Lord, and surname himself by the name of Israel."

All of those, who have in this time of awakening made an open profession of christianity, have appeared as yet to adorn their profession by a conversation, in a measure becoming the gospel of Christ, one only excepted; and should there be reasons for other exceptions, a few years hence, it ought not to be thought strange, as if some new and strange thing had happened in the world. That which hath been, is that which shall be; but tares have always been in fields of wheat, and in a great house, there are not only vessels of gold and of silver, but also of wood and of earth, some to dishonor as well as some to honor. Among the twelve, whom Christ himself chose to be with him and whom he stiled Apostles, there was a Judas; and at a certain time many of Christ's disciples forsook him and walked no more with him. Apostacies among professors of christianity, and the falling away of such as appear to receive the word with joy, and endure for a while, are to be expected. To see such apostacies and falling away, of those who appear for a time to run well, will grieve the generation of real Christians, and be matter of joy and triumph to scoffing infidels. And among the many who have professed christianity during the time of the late refreshing shower of divine influence, it is to be expected some will return to their wallowing in the mire; but we are persuaded better things of many, and things which accompany salvation; and doubt not but God hath granted repentance unto life, to a goodly number, whose light will shine before men, while life continues; and whom God will keep by his mighty power through faith unto salvation. But should God take only one from a neighbourhood, and two from a town, and bring them to Zion, glory will redound to him, through the thanksgivings of many; for there is joy in heaven over one sinner that repenteth. The Lord knoweth them that are his. And let every one that nameth the name of Christ depart from iniquity; and let him that thinketh he standeth, take heed lest he fall. When the attention first began in this town, it was feared there would be great opposition; but such hath been the manner in which the work hath been carried on, that opposers have been, very much confounded and silenced. On observing which, some of the friends of the work, have been reminded of what Daniel in the lions den, said to Darius, my God hath sent his angel and hath shut the lions mouths, that they have not hurt me.

The manner in which the goings of God have been among us (to allude to the Lord's appearing to the prophet Elijah at Horeb) hath not been in a great and strong wind, nor in an earthquake, nor in a fire; but in a still small voice, saying to one and to another, what dost thou hear? There hath not been discovered any appearance of a spirit of enthusiasm or delusion, or of spiritual pride and ostentation; nor of censoriousness and rash judging of others; but on the contrary, a spirit of humility and meekness, of fear and a sound mind; arising from a rational conviction of sin, and principle of gospel benevolence; each one appearing to esteem others better than himself, and to work out his own salvation with fear and trembling; and at the same time to express an ardent desire that others might taste and see the goodness of the Lord.

Gentlemen, if the preceding narrative meets your approbation, you may expect something further from yours most affectionately.

SIMON WATERMAN.

Plymouth, (Con.) Jan. 1, 1801.

(To be continued.)

The confession and conversion of a Deist.

A SOVEREIGN and long forbearing God, in his holy providence, has seen fit to open the eyes of one, who was ripening fast for judgment and destruction. I cannot therefore but feel it my duty, to make known certain circumstances of my life to this congregation. It is written, "He that covereth his sins, shall not prosper, but he that confesseth and forsaketh them shall find mercy." And not knowing but that others may be meetening, for the same dreadful calamity that I was, I am the more desirous to represent my situation, not knowing but yet it may call up the consideration of some in this place, to attend to their immortal concerns before it be forever too late.

In my infancy, I had the happiness of being in the charge of parents who were sedulously anxious for my well-being. In the morning of my life, much care was taken by my tender father, to implant within my mind, sentiments of piety. He was eager to have me a child of virtue and godliness; and often warned me to escape from the sinful conversation, and examples of the prophane and unsteady. My present and eternal enjoyment, he often reminded me, was wholly dependant on the conduct of my life. He often conversed with me upon Religion. Told me the unhappy consequence of sinning against God. He alledged that sinners must go to misery and be always in hell. Such was his care to train me up in wisdom's ways, that I was fearful of going away from the path of rectitude. When I was about fourteen years old, my father died, and now I was no longer to be guided by his daily example. However, being young, the unpression he had made upon my mind in some measure restrained me from indulging very freely in the fashionable follies of those of my age. At the age of sixteen it pleased God, to send the convictive influences of the Holy Spirit, and revive his cause in the place in which I lived. An attention to religion commenced, and many were brought to see their situation as sinners, and turn unto God. Seeing such an attention, my mind became impressed, I was brought to realize my sad state and condition as a sinner. Heaven and hell seemed realities, my fears arose and my apprehensions were very terrible. In this situation how much did I suffer from a fear, that my associates would suspect my concern and laugh at my credulity.

This no doubt is emphatically the case at the present time, young people are afraid of being laughed at, and discountenanced if they attend to religion, and shun the places, where prayers are made and serious conversation entered upon; in this way how many souls go on to destruction. In this situation I continued sometime, but throwing off my convictions, I became again, more stupid, than ever, more hard, and unsusceptible. Then going on in a state of impiety and rebellion against God, I began to feel that I had become free from the shackles, of what the world calls religion. It was no more with me an object of concern and little did I estimate it. From day to day I became more attached to the vanities of time and sense. Seriousness was soon abandoned, and eternity was kept out of my mind. The tender warnings of my father began to be forgotten and lose their efficacy on my behaviour. Little did the idea of death, judgment and eternity, at any time affect me. Thus, although visibly moral in my conduct, I entertained very disrespectful sentiments of religion. It appeared to me little else than priestcraft, as I was proudly pleased to stile it. Thus I entered into family life, and acted in the capacity of a father. My little offspring came around me, they looked upon me their safe father for their daily support. While I laboured, acting in constant rebellion against God, to procure their sustenance, I neglected their souls. Alas, the parents task was suspended, and little thought was taken with regard to their precious and immortal souls. They looked up to me for their daily food; they needed daily instruction in religion, they needed the morning and evening prayers of a pious father, and to be dedicated to God, but were neglected. I have to recollect with astonishment the time when I disbelieved the word of God—and esteemed it nothing more than a cunningly devised fable. As a consequence of this, I had no conductor. I was therefore as you will easily conceive, set adrift in the world. The bible, containing threatenings, made me despise it, and the man who should speak with a reverent respect for it. Such being the condition of things, I became a great reasoner, and supposed I could confute any arguments in favor of religion. My reason soon became my God and the boastful mad philosophy of the Atheist, began to be a glorious thing to me. By this supposed superiority of reason above God's word, I hesitated not to esteem him foolish and insignificant who would admit any thing which came from the pulpit or press in favor of vital, experimental religion. Christianity now appeared a sophism, regeneration a delusion, and any pretensions to religion enthusiasm, and eternal misery was thought ideal. My former belief, which my indulgent and honored father had impressed on my mind, was banished. Such being my state of mind, Paine's Age of Reason found (though I was first reluctant) an advocate in me, I read it attentively, it engaged my affections for a short time, and engrossed my precious probation season of preparation for eternity. But feeling that this pamphlet was more specious than clear or argumentative, I forsook it. Boasted reason carried me above it, yet still my soul was unimpressed, and my danger, daily of sinking into hell torments, totally disappeared. I lived the life of a pagan, without prayer in my family, without prayer in any situation. My children were taught, but not in a way of piety. In this situation I became perfectly independent, and eternity was totally obliterated from my mind. I neither wished, nor cared to have any others concerned, about their souls. Thus I lived in perfect security, every day hovering about the door that enters into misery. The bible, lay undisturbed, like a useless page upon the shelf. I began to think that gloomy infidelity would soon be universal. Disturbed however in a certain conversation, about this time, I went away something embarrassed—this put me upon providing against the worst.—Poor thoughtless mortal!! Not feeling that God's anger was great against me, and that hell must be the portion of all impenitent sinners, I thought to admit the idea of eternity, and to place myself in the best possible situation, I agreed to lead a more strict moral life, and not to say so much to the injury of religion, as I had done. I thought my morality would certainly secure me from harm. And although I still discredited every thing like vital religion, I hoped I should come off well at last. My bible was still left to moulder on the shelf, and eternal realities were left, without occupying any of my attention. Thus I was left, in perfect carnal security. Six months ago an enemy to religion, I had an idea that the gospel was of no value, and considered it vain to encourage a dispensation of it, and although I attended public worship pretty steadily; yet in heart I despised the awful, and sublime truths, which were communicated from the word of God. Heaven and hell, were mere sounds to me, I utterly despised the words, as they flowed from the mouth of a minister. I thought there was something great in disapproving all religious pretensions. Thus a sinner ripe for damnation, was permitted to live from one day unto another, and although, hell, opened to receive its victim, yet God who was boundless in compassion to my precious soul, kept me from deserved wrath.

About four months ago God saw fit to make a discovery to me, of my calamitous situation. He showed me the vanity of my endeavors, to counteract his benevolent purposes, by opening my eyes, and giving me to see the strictness of his law. At this time human philosophy made me to shudder, and I was brought to see that eternal woe, was too solemn a reality to sport with, I saw I had lived in a state of perfect dependence on myself, that I was under a most holy sentence of condemnation, that I had incurred the divine displeasure, by my constant rebellion, and that my situation was deplorable. I saw a God that was incensed against me, "the terrors of hell laid hold on me." I saw a justice, that threatened destruction to ungodly men. A sovereignty, holy and gracious that I had dishonoured. Mercy that I had abused. My sins were of a crimson dye. Alas! my soul was lost, I had forfeited all mercy from God. I had rejected his calls, I had slighted proffered pardon, and now I found in myself every thing that was necessary to constitute a hell. The dependence I had made on my morality vanished like the idle wind, I saw that I had ruined myself, and this without any hope of deliverance. I had heard of a Saviour, but alas! I had abused his mercy. In this situation I saw that I could not do any thing to merit salvation, and that if sovereign mercy did not come to my assistance, I must perish forever. O! what a hell is there prepared for sin-hardened despisers. "Behold ye despisers and wonder and perish." Total depravity I now realized, not by speculation but by feeling, I saw myself dead in trespasses and sins. I saw the doctrines of the gospel were all against me, and that God might justly cast me off forever, and his character be very glorious. Lost to all hope of recovering myself from the fatal disease of sin and death; I was, finally, as I trust, brought to lay aside my opposition to God and bow before his sovereignty and holiness; acknowledging him to be God. And now what shall I say, but God be merciful to me a sinner. Father, I have sinned against heaven and in thy sight. Pardon my iniquity, O Lord, for it is great. Give me I pray, the sincere conviction and deep heart-felt repentance for sin. O give me a deep self-abasement before thee. Humble me O Lord into the dust, and O may I never have the baseness to deny thee. Lay my sins in order before my face, and for Jesus Christ's sake, give me to be perpetually an enemy to sin, to those sins, which crucified my Lord, and make me truly holy, truly humble, truly resigned to thy will. May infidelity that poison of my soul be entirely removed; and may I trust in thee for increasing penitence, increasing engagedness and conformity of heart to thy most holy and glorious Lord. O may I be clothed upon with the garment of a Mediator's righteousness, and be saved from every sin. And as the day of trial is coming, may I so conduct, as to come off a conquerer through the blood of Jesus Christ, to whom, be glory forever.

Extract of a Letter from the Rev.

DOCTOR HAWEIS of London to the TRUSTEES of the MISSIONARY SOCIETY of CONNECTICUT.

Bath, Jan. 31st, 1801.

Brethren beloved in Christ,

YOUR favor of September 24th reached me only yesterday. It drew forth the warm effusions of thanksgiving to our common Lord. It is evident the different continents contain the same holy catholic Church, that the waters of the Atlantic separate not the communion of saints, and that the redeemed by blood, whose sins are forgiven them for Christ's name sake, hold fast the blessed hope of eternal life and rejoice in the prospect of meeting around the throne from every kindred tongue and nation, when we shall know even as we are known.

Nothing will be more grateful to us than to hear your increasing progress; and that the cloud no bigger than a man's hand spreads over your firmament and portends abundance of rain. The glorious display of divine grace in many lands adds to our hope, that he whose right it is, will take to himself his great power and reign; and amidst the awful and increasing calamities around us, we of this island draw favorable auguries from the diffusion of gospel light and grace; and tho' infidelity and irreligion lift up their banners as tokens, and bitter enmity breathes its venom against the principles, and people that bear the mark of evangelical peculiarity, we hope, that if the Lord had meant to slay us, he would not have shewed us such and such things, and that we shall yet be preserved for a light to the Gentiles and to carry his salvation to the ends of the earth. Thus the wall is still built in a troublous time, and whilst we leave all events in his hands, we would be found in the path of duty, as the way of safety. I shall say nothing of the increasing and wide spreading ravages of war, deeply interested as I am in the welfare and prosperity of the land wherein I dwell. We have a kingdom that never can be moved, a city whose maker and builder God is; and looking not to the things which are seen and temporal, but to those things which are not seen and eternal, we thank God, take courage and go forward.

The intelligence you wish will be gladly communicated by our Secretary, to whom, being at a distance, I have sent your Magazines and kind letter, and the Society will I am sure receive this token of your fraternal affection with delight, and return it with equal assurance of theirs. Meantime, I thought the most acceptable service I could render to my Rev. Brethren and their honorable associates in the missionary work, would be to give them an epitome of our late proceedings and present state of the Mission with which they seem unacquainted.

The intelligence we receive from Otaheite is highly encouraging, and the requests of the Missionaries there to be reinforced are urgent. We hope nine or ten, firmly, faithfully, devotedly living together, preach and teach Jesus Christ, with considerable attention from the natives, and some apparent impression. They are in possession of the same house, and plead with us to fix a stable settlement on the Island, as a focus from which the gospel could be easily diffused on every side, by a little schooner, which would visit any of the tropical regions around them. I wish greater things had been done for them, but obstructions of various kinds have curtailed the numbers intended to be sent by the Royal Admiral. Crook was reserved with a design to be sent with Tomoteiti to the Marquesas, the poor lad is since dead. Only eleven, I hope, faithful men are now either on their way, or arrived at the place of their destination. I have good accounts from them dated August 20th, from Rio Janeiro. They are all well, but the convicts with whom they sailed and to whom they have been greatly blessed have suffered a great mortality. I have furnished them with the choicest English Books out of my little library for the common use of the brethren at Otaheite, hoping they may convey valuable information, where books must be a treasure to men in such a situation.

They will touch at Port Jackson, and having landed the convicts proceed to Otaheite. The wars which have broke out and desolated Tongataboo, have driven the Missionaries from thence, and three who were under the protection of the vanquished chief were slain.

From the Cape of Good Hope we have received very pleasant intelligence, as the Magazines will inform you. I last week heard from Dr. Vanderkemp, whose life is preserved in the Caffree country amidst many dangers. The Boshemmen seem ripe for harvest, the Society have sent two embarkations of Missionaries to the Cape, one in May, with four persons, two Dutch and two English, to divide and join Dr. V. in Caffraria, and Mr. Kicherer among the Boshemmen; another of three men and four women all Dutch, was forwarded in November.

What our two brethren in Canada have yet done I know not, you are nearer to them than we. The Missionary at Twilingate, Newfoundland, sends very pleasing accounts of his success and acceptance.

In my views the South sea still appears to hold out the great door of Missionary usefulness on the largest scale, and I trust he who hath begun the good work will carry it on. Our difficulties are fewer, and our prospects more confirmed, and evidently nothing wanting to accomplish the work with efficacy, but perseverance, and a firm establishment in one central place, with which we may maintain regular communication, and from whence the light may be diffused. It is asserted by those who are on the spot, that a commercial intercourse would probably repay the expense of visiting them. The particulars I cannot detail. The present hateful state of war has been so injurious already, and is such a hindrance that we sigh for peace as a Missionary body. Were I an American I would have a ship laden for the southern Ocean before the present year expired. We hope however that at this present moment twenty or more are firmly fixed at Otaheite, and unwearied exertions are making to increase their number, whenever a providential opening shall be made.

I have hastened to communicate these particulars knowing they will be interesting to you. Our secretary will, I doubt not, fulfil your wishes. Mr. Eyre is a man of singular excellence and to whom the mission is in an especial manner indebted.

Shall I beg a kind remembrance in the hearts of my brethren, and a mention in their prayers of their affectionate friend and brother.

T. HAWEIS.

Report of the Trustees of the Missionary Society of Connecticut.

To the MISSIONARY SOCIETY of CONNECTICUT, to be convened at LITCHFIELD, the third Tuesday of June instant, the TRUSTEES beg leave to submit the following REPORT, with the papers therein referred to.

IN this their annual report the Trustees feel it to be their duty, first of all, to acknowledge the good hand of God in so far seconding their feeble efforts, to advance the cause of the Redeemer. In answer to the prayers of his people, and in tender pity and compassion to perishing sinners, he has been graciously pleased to increase a missionary spirit, to open the hearts of many to contribute generously to the support of missions, and to crown the labors of his missionary servants, in various places, with great success. Never did there appear to be so much need for faithful, zealous Missionaries as at the present time, and never have so many circumstances conspired to stimulate the exertions and excite the prayers of the people of God for the furtherance of this desirable object. The Trustees would arrogate nothing to themselves. If God has enabled them to be in any measure faithful to the important trust committed to them, and if he has succeeded any of their attempts to promote the great objects for which the Society was instituted, they would give him all the glory, and be humble from the consideration that their zeal has not been greater in his service, and that their hearts have not been more warmed with love to him and to the souls of their fellow-men.

As the general concerns of the institution are entrusted to their management, the Trustees not only feel themselves accountable to God for the faithful discharge of their trust, but also bound in duty to communicate to the Society, whose agents they are, a particular account, from time to time, of the manner in which the important concerns committed to them are conducted.

The narrative, published by direction of the Trustees, last winter, and sent to the several parishes in the state, a copy of which is herewith transmitted to each member of the society, contains a general view of their proceedings and of the labors of Missionaries to the close of the year 1800. To repeat in this report what is therein contained will not be deemed necessary; as reference can be had to that for any information which is desired.

In that narrative the following persons are mentioned as Missionaries then in the service of the society, viz. the Rev. Messrs. Seth Williston and Jedidiah Bushnell and Mr. Amasa Jerome in the western counties of New-York state; the Rev. David Huntington in the northern counties of New-York and Vermont; and the Rev. Joseph Badger in New-Connecticut, all appointed to continue during the pleasure of the board of Trustees. The Rev. Ira Hart is also mentioned as appointed to a mission to the settlements on Black river and other places in the vicinity.

Mr. Williston returned to Hartford about the first of May ult. having been absent nearly 18 months;—the whole of which time he labored as a Missionary in the western counties of New-York, except a few weeks which he spent at Lisle, supported by the people of that place. This was in consequence of a vote of the Trustees authorizing him to spend one half of the time at that place at the expense of the people, and to travel the other half as a Missionary. He will continue in the service of the society and has lately entered on another mission to that part of the country where he has been before.

Mr. Bushnell returned; in January last, from a missionary tour in the western counties of New-York of nearly 12 months; and after about three weeks went out again. He proposed to spend a short time in the northern part of Vermont and then proceed to Springfield, in Otsego county, state of New-York, to take the pastoral charge of the church in that place for one half of the time, and to itinerate as a Missionary the other half, to be supported by the people of Springfield while there, and by the Missionary society when absent from them. This arrangement to continue for one year.*

Mr. Jerome returned the beginning of May last, having spent nearly 11 months in the western counties of New-York.

Mr. Huntington returned from Vermont about the 10th of March, having been on his mission 22 weeks. The state of his health was such as to prevent his continuing longer at that time. Should his health permit, he will probably perform another tour, as he stands appointed during the pleasure of the board of Trustees.

* By a late letter received from Mr. Bushnell, it appears he will in Vermont, in Addison county, where he proposes to continue some time longer.

Mr. Badger arrived at New-Connecticut sometime in December last. Two letters have been received from him. He gives very favorable accounts concerning the country. It is very rapidly settling, mostly by people from Connecticut; and in some of the settlements there are appearances of a revival of religion. The call for Missionaries to that territory will increase, and it is a place to which much attention will be paid by the Trustees. Another Missionary will be sent there as soon as a suitable person can be found for the service; and two or more Missionaries will in future be kept there continually.

Mr. Hart did not go on the mission to which he was appointed, on account of the indisposition of his family, and Mr. Robert Porter was appointed in his room. He went about the first of March last and returned the beginning of May.

A more particular account of the labors of these Missionaries, and of the state of the settlements which they visited will be given in the narrative to be published next winter.

From their journals it appears that they were generally received with cordiality; and in many towns particularly in the counties of Otsego and Delaware their labors have been abundantly blessed. A glorious work of divine grace has been carrying on there. Many sinners have been hopefully converted, and the people of God greatly comforted and edified. The country where the Missionaries have travelled is settling with an astounding rapidity ; new churches are forming and the call for Missionaries is continually increasing.

From the above account it will appear that there are at present but three Missionaries out in the service of the Society, viz. Messrs. Wilkinson and Bushnell in New-York state and Mr. Badger in New-Connecticut. The Rev. Job Swift of Bennington has been lately appointed to a mission of a few weeks to the northern parts of Vermont. Whether he will accept the appointment is not known.

The month of May is the time when the Trustees make their arrangements and appointments for the year. They have determined to employ, for the current year, the following number of Missionaries—two to New-Connecticut, three to the western counties of New-York, one to the northern counties of New-York and the north-western parts of Vermont ; one for four months to the settlements on Black River and parts adjacent, and one for four months to the northern counties of Vermont. To the mission to Black River, &c. Mr. Robert Porter is appointed.

Other Missionaries are to be appointed, and vacancies supplied by the committee of missions, as shall become necessary.

With regard to the mission to the Indians, the Trustees have no information to communicate, in addition to what is contained in the printed narrative, except that Mr. Bacon left this place the latter end of January last. He took with him a young man to learn the Chippeway language, and it is supposed he is now at Detroit performing the services to which he was appointed. A considerable time must necessarily elapse before much can be expected to be done among the Indians. The difficulty of procuring suitable interpreters is exceedingly great, if not wholly insurmountable except by appointing persons to learn the Indian languages expressly for that purpose. The Trustees hope that Mr. Bacon and the young man with him, after they shall have learned the Chippeway language, will be able to affect something towards accomplishing an object so near to the hearts of the Society and all good people as the diffusion of the light of the gospel among the poor pagans on our borders. The promotion of this object will continue to occupy the attention of the Trustees, and while they themselves would look to God for divine light and wisdom therein, they ask the prayers of the Society and all well wishers to the cause that God would direct them to the adoption of measures which he will bless to the furtherance of this great and important work. The peace at present subsisting between the United States and the various tribes of Indians, together with an increasing spirit of harmony and friendship between the white people and Indians are auspicious circumstances. The jealousy which the latter have ever felt towards the former has been a great bar in the way of their receiving the Christian religion. Any decrease of this jealousy is therefore an omen of good. From these and other circumstances the Trustees are led to indulge the pleasing expectation, that the time is not far distant when many of the aboriginal natives of America will be brought to a knowledge of the true God and of the way of salvation through a crucified Saviour ; and when to impure rites, and sacrifices offered to idol or imaginary Gods will succeed the pure incense of prayer and praise to the only living and true Jehovah.*

(To be continued.)

NOTE. By request of the Trustees of the Missionary Society of Connecticut, there will be published in this Magazine, from time to time, an account of their proceedings, and of the receipts and expenditures of the Society. There will also be published monthly an account of donations made to the Society within the month, with the names of the donors where they are known, and of any losses which the Society may sustain.

The public are again informed, that subscription books are opened at the Office of the Treasurer of the Missionary Society, and also in each county town in the state, to give opportunity to those who may be disposed to subscribe to the funds of the Society. The following persons are furnished with subscription books. Mr. Jeremiah Atwater, Merchant, New-Haven, Capt. Richard Douglass, New-London, Doctor Joshua Latbrop, Norwich, David Burr, Esq. Fairfield, Hon. Joseph P. Cooke, Danbury, Jabez Clark, Esq. Windham, Col. Benjamin Talmadge, Litchfield, Matthew T. Russell, Esq. Middletown, Doctor Smith Clark, Haddam, Ephraim Grant, Jun. Esq. Tolland.

FOR THE CONNECTICUT EVANGELICAL MAGAZINE.

The importance of trusting in God

* An account of Receipts and Expenditures from the close of the year 1800, to June 10th 1801, will be published next month, at the close of the Trustees report. It is postponed with part of the report, in order to give place to the interesting letter from Dr. Haweis.

illustrated from circumstances in the life of Jacob.

BEFORE the birth of Esau and Jacob, God had said that the elder should serve the younger. Yet neither Rebekah nor Jacob could confide in God, and leave it with him to dispose things in his own way, for bringing about what he had foretold. Both mother and son united in a piece of gross deceit and falsehood, to secure a blessing, which God himself had before promised. This was the source of many of the future evils of Jacob's life. Though the blessing was reserved for him, he was not to go wholly unpunished. Accordingly, many circumstances were ordered, in a peculiar manner, to lead him to reflect on his wicked imposition on the Father, and his unkind treatment of his brother. Thus, when he loved Rachel, and had agreed with her father to serve seven years for her, the tender-eyed Leah was imposed on him. Here God caused him to experience some of the pains of disappointment and imposition; and made him know how it felt to be overreached and cheated. As we dounto others, so is it often rendered to us again, even in this world. But this was not all the evil Jacob experienced, at the hand of Laban. How often was he imposed on, and his wages changed! All, however, being peculiarly adapted to lead him to reflect on the deceit which he himself had practised.

When he had spent twenty years with Laban, and received much unkind treatment from him, God directed him to return back to his native country, and promised to be with him. A little before he arrived, news was brought him, that his brother Esau, with four hundred men, was coming to meet him. This, it is natural to suppose, brought afresh to his mind, all his deceit and wickedness in his former treatment of his brother. How must these thoughts now have crowded upon his mind, and oppressed it! He might rationally conclude, that Esau felt, now was his time to take ample revenge. What should he do? Which way should he turn, when his abused, enraged brother was coming against him? There was no way for him to flee: Nor was he able to resist the force, which he must soon meet. There was now but one way left; and that was, to go to God. It was now so ordered, that he should be driven from every refuge, excepting the divine promise. Before, he had not confided in the promise of God; but must interpose wicked art, lest its accomplishment should fail. Now, no art, no skill, no power of his would be of any avail. The Lord alone could afford him help. He, therefore, betakes himself to prayer; and, confessing his own utter unworthiness, asks mercy, and pleads only the divine gracious promise. What other plea could he make? What other does the humble, broken heart ever wish to make? After taking prudent measures for avoiding the threatening evil, the propriety of which, to proper trust in God ever excludes, he spent the night alone, in fervent humble supplication—committing himself, and all, to the God of promise and of all mercy and grace. His wrestling that night, denotes strong faith, and fervent prayer—yes, such was his fervor and the strength of his faith, that he would not quit his hold, except the Lord would bless him. On this, the Lord gave him the name Israel, for, said he, as a prince hast thou power with God and with man, and hast prevailed.

The Lord, notwithstanding his former wickedness, would now be with him, and protect him; and would disarm Esau of his anger, and turn his heart to pity and tenderness. What confidence could Jacob now feel, that his brother should not injure him; or, ever after, resume his resentments and meditate revenge! In this deep humility, what lively confidence, what sweet composure of soul did the good Patriarch feel! The intimate converse, and near holy communion, which, on that ever-memorable night, he had with the glorious God, filled him with deep humility, laid him in the dust, and made him most sensibly feel his own nothingness and infinite unworthiness. Now, remembering his former wickedness, he felt low, he felt humble enough to go and bow himself seven times to the ground before an injured brother. Now, with sincerity, he could say to Esau, “ay, I pray thee, if I have found grace in thy sight, then receive my present at my hand: for therefore have I seen thy face, as though I had seen the face of God, and thou wast pleased with me.” “Your anger, and that of the holy God, both which I had such reason to fear, are appeased.” Whatever gives such a sense of entire helplessness in ourselves, and infinite unworthiness—what forms to such self-abasement, such humbleness of mind, as near, intimate communion and intercourse with the great and holy God! And, whoever trusted in this glorious God in vain! How kind to be beat off from all other refuges, but the Lord! Let appearances to the views of men, be ever so dark, ever so threatening, faith finds relief and a sure refuge in the covenant and promise of God. Blessed are all they that trust in him.

An appeal to the Christian's heart.
Phil. iv. 11—13.

FOR I have learned in whatsoever state I am, therewith to be content. I know both how to be abased, and I know how to abound; every where and in all things I am instructed, both to be full and to be hungry, both to abound and to suffer need. I can do all things thro' Christ which strengtheneth me." "Here," said an "Angel of the Church," to the pious Angelina, as he sat, one day, conversing with her, upon religion, opening the bible and reading,—“here, Angelina, is a description of the blessedness and glory of the Christian temper; and, if my own heart has not deceived me, I have, sometimes, thought, I could heartily say amen to it; let the will of the Lord be done, whatever becomes of me, who am but a worm of the dust—a being of yesterday—a creature of his power—made for his glory, in one way or another. But, to drop the description of my own past feelings—here, Angelina, is a description of godliness, which a false heart can never feel—which a stranger will never believe, and which an hypocrite can never imitate.

To feel as Paul felt, is to feel that God reigns—that, a wise—an holy—a benevolent God reigns; it is to feel, that we are placed in his hands, and wholly, at his disposal—that, not so much as an hair will ever fall from our heads, without his notice; and that, whatever becomes of us, in this changing world, our mouths will be stopped, right will be done, and God will be glorified. Yes, Angelina, to feel, as Paul felt, when these last words dropped from his pen—“I can do all things thro' Christ which strengtheneth me,” is, to feel an heaven upon earth—to have an angel's spirit, tho' in rags—and without crowning, to be a king—a conqueror—yea, more than a conqueror—a young immortal, born for endless glory.—To feel Christ's image formed in one's soul; to rise up in the morning in his strength—to go forth to our daily employments under the protecting shadow of his wings, and, at night, to retire to rest, with a grateful heart, that God, in infinite goodness, has preserved us from evil—that he still will do us good; and that however mysterious and afflicting the changes of this world may be to our bodies, they will all, thro' his overruling care, work together for our final good, and serve to prepare us for the enjoyment of unspeakable and endless glory, is not the sum of all these feelings, Angelina, peace—resignation—present contentment, in whatever state we are in?—How will such a temper of soul take away the bitter stings of human sorrow, and brighten with hope the afflicted mortal! When one is abased, poor and afflicted in the world, how will it soften his sorrows, and sweetly wipe, from his cheerless eyes, those tears, which, otherwise, might continue to flow, without relief! Oh, when one's poverty is changed to abundance—to riches, honors and earthly goods, how will it melt the, otherwise, proud and scornful heart, into pity and compassion towards the suffering poor, remembering how the dear

* John xi. 26. And whoever liveth, and believeth in me, shall never die.

Saviour, in his poverty, was despised by the rich and the worldly great! How will it warm the, otherwise, frozen heart, to open the hand of liberality, and scatter its refreshing blessings on all around! How will it open wide and stretch out the cheerful, supporting hand to God's ministers—bid them go on, in the strength of the Lord, and seek the salvation of those, who are madly running into ruin, and perishing in darkness! It was this strengthening of the Lord Jesus, Angelina, which supported and comforted the pious Lazarus, more than any earthly aid could have done, when full of sores, with his wounds all open to the air and the dust, and nothing to cover them, he was laid, at the proud sinner's gate, helpless and friendless; "And desiring to be fed with the crumbs which fell from his plentiful table." For, the very "dogs," as if more compassionate than this hardened wretch, "came and licked his sores." Yet Lazarus, friendless and forlorn, poor Lazarus, whom nobody would pity, ragged and sick, begging for crumbs to relieve his hunger, was sweetly resigned; not a curse proceeded from his heart against the unpitying Dives—not a single murmur from his lips, why has God dealt thus with me? He knew how to be abused. The Lord Jesus strengthened him. He was already a new-born son of God; and shortly after angels came, and conducted him, to a throne of glory, in heaven, where he shall reign with Christ, in his kingdom, forever and ever. The strengthening power of Christ none but saints can feel. The soul-humbling energy—the sweetness and the glory of divine grace, never can be realized by the ungodly. It is therefore, Angelina, no wonder that the glorious Redeemer is so exceedingly precious to the believer's soul; for he is his life—his dependence—his strength, and, in short, the foundation of all his happiness and glory. Let him therefore, forever be endeared to thy soul, as "the chiefest among ten thousand, and altogether lovely."

"When all thy mercies, O my God,
 " My rising soul surveys;
 " Transported with the view, I'm lost
 " In wonder, love and praise."

AMANA.

QUESTIONS.

GENTLEMEN,

A CONSTANT reader of your useful Magazine, offers for explanation the 18th verse of the vision of Obadiah.

Quest. What is that peculiar chastening which is experienced by God's children?

Religious Intelligence.

ORDINATION.

ORDAINED, May 20th, 1801, at Milford, Massachusetts, the Rev. David Long. The Rev. Edmund Mills of Sutton made the introductory prayer; the Rev. Walter Harris of Dunbarton (N. H.) preached the sermon; the Rev. David Sanford of Medway made the consecrating prayer; the Rev. Nathaniel Emons, D. D. of Franklin gave the charge; the Rev. Caleb Alexander of Mendon gave the right hand of fellowship; and the Rev. John Cleaveland of Wrentham made the concluding prayer.

The agreement of the people in the choice of their Pastor, and the uncommon religious attention now prevailing among them, are grounds of joy to all good people.

POETRY.

COMMUNICATED AS ORIGINAL.

Thoughts on a thunder Storm.

1. HARK, from the heav'n's th' Almighty roars;
In awful streams his lightnings fly;
His angry terrors down he pours,
And wings his vengeance thro' the sky,
2. Think clouds are for his carpet spread
And hide the day beneath his feet;
Heav'n hung in fable speaks his dread,
And thunders loud th' alarm repeat,
3. In vain shall frightened Cæsar hide,*
And haughty tyrants fly the flame;
Terrors surprize the sons of pride,
Aghast at thy tremendous name.
4. What tho' the scenes, which hang the sky,
Spread universal trembling round,
Deists lie quaking, Atheists die,
And all fall prostrate to the ground:
5. These but a faint resemblance are,
A feeble shade, a lifeless die,
To what the final day shall wear,
When blazing lightnings sheet the sky;
6. When thunders wake the wasted dead,
And flames intense shall fire the pole,
Dissolve the earth, like molten lead,
And roll the heavens, as a scroll.
7. Yet these profuse displays of God
Are but a preface to the day,
An herald to proclaim abroad,
That Christ, the Judge, is on his way.
8. When he appears, his guilty foes Shall bid th' inflamed earth, in vain,
Deep from its center disclose,
To shield them from a fiercer pain.
9. Buried beneath the molten rocks,
And liquid mountains they would lie,

* History informs us that one of the Cæsars was so terrified with thunder that he sometimes crept under his bed thro' fear.

Or dive to hell in eager flocks,
The face secure of Christ to fly.

10. Dear Saviour, in that solemn day,
Thy saints shall rise, at thy command,
Shall shout thy conquests on their way,
And sing thy grace, at thy right hand.

MİKROS.

The holy Sabbath.

1. HAIL, sacred morn! This day
The bands of death, the Saviour burst;
In the dark grave he lay,
But rose triumphant from the dust.
2. This dawning light doth bring,
The glorious tidings to our ears;
With rapt'rous joy we sing,
That Christ hath burst the bars.
3. Come, mortals, learn his will;
His sacred day with love revere:
Up to the holy hill
We'll go, to pay our homage there.
4. The watchmen of the Son,
His glories in his house proclaim;
The wondrous things he's done
The wonders of his holy name.
5. On Zion's heights they stand,
The mystery of grace unfold;
Set forth his high command,
To saints more precious than gold.
6. To saints these courts afford Pleasures more pure than those of flesh:
Sweet converse with their Lord,
Till he, in love, shall call them
hence.
7. Oh! How I love the place, Where Christ commands his flock
to come,
To take his sovereign grace;
By faith to seek an heavenly home.
8. Each sabbath's fun I'll call,
To witness my devotion there
I'll make my God my all
And praise, and pray, and love, and fear.

A.

Donation to the Missionary Society of Connecticut.

Nathaniel Hubbard of Bolton,

50 Dollars.

THE

Connecticut Evangelical Magazine.

[PUBLISHED ACCORDING TO ACT OF CONGRESS.]

VOL. II.]

AUGUST, 1801.

[No. 2.]

TO THE EDITORS OF THE CONNECTICUT EVANGELICAL MAGAZINE.

On the special operations of the Holy Spirit.

GENTLEMEN,

THE usefulness of your Magazine exceeds the expectations of its friends. The narratives of the revival of Religion in sundry places, awake the attention of many to the much neglected, tho' all-important truths of the Bible. In these narratives, the doctrine of a special operation of God's spirit on the human heart, is fully supported. This is a doctrine greatly disrelished by the carnal mind, and through ignorance of the nature and extent of moral depravity, perseveringly opposed. It is said, that all men have the Spirit of God alike—that there is no need of his special influence for a holy life, and that all that is said in the narratives concerning his extraordinary operations, is mere pretence and delusion.—This is said, not by open Infidels alone, but by some that are considered religious people, and is therefore worthy of notice.

Being assured, that the attention of some, heretofore in considerate minds, has been lately excited to this subject by the narratives you have published; and feeling its importance, while I recollect the solemn observations of a late author in these words: “ Fallen creatures have no better principle than depraved self-love, and it must be the work of the Holy Spirit to create them to new and holy affections. To resist or deny the Spirit of God is shutting the door of the kingdom of Heaven, and destroying to ourselves the efficacy of the gospel. All those who deny the work of the Spirit make the gospel as inefficacious for their own salvation as if they were to deny Christ himself:” I say feeling the importance of this subject, I am earnestly solicitous, that in addition to what appears in the narratives, something may be said expressly upon it. I do not feel as though I should do ample justice to the subject, but I submit the following observations unreservedly to your inspection and disposal.

It is admitted that all men have natural powers, sufficient to accept of Christ, and to lead a holy and religious life; and that all men have the Spirit of God, as he is a Spirit, and every where present. Nor will I say that all men, in a Christian land, have not some particular awakening influences of the Holy Spirit at one time or another. What I aim at is to oppose the assertions before mentioned, and to say something in support of the doctrine of the extraordinary operations of the Spirit in forming the hearts of men to true religion; and in producing all the real holiness there is in any of the sons of men. And here it may be premised, that the moral depravity of every man, evinces the absolute need of such operations, and proves that if ever God saves a single soul, he must exert some extraordinary power of his Spirit. The renovation of the soul to the love of that holiness which it naturally hates, in all its exercises, is indeed a new creation, and can be accomplished only by that power which raised up Jesus Christ from the dead. And it is observable, that all the circumstances attending the beginning, progress, and permanent effects of the late Revival, testify to the same purpose.

In support of my design, let me call the attention of the reader to the nature of the sin against the Holy Ghost, which shall never be forgiven. As all sins that are against God are against the Holy Spirit as he is one person in the sacred Trinity, and yet all such sins may be forgiven; it must follow that the sin here spoken of is against the Holy Spirit in his distinct office or operations. It is the office of the Holy Spirit to convince of sin, of righteousness and of judgment. This is effected in the awakening, renewing and sanctifying of the soul. Hence, unless all are awakened, renewed or sanctified, all have not the spirit, and those who are awakened, &c. are the subjects of its extraordinary operations. This consideration, in conjunction with what has been said above on depravity, is, if candidly viewed, sufficient to refute all that is objected against the doctrine.

But it may be profitable to pursue the matter further. And here may be noticed what St. Paul says, No man speaking by the Spirit calleth Jesus accursed. But if all men have the Spirit they speak by it, and yet Jews and Deists are daily calling Jesus accursed; surely they have not the Spirit.

Our Saviour once, in a holy rejoicing, said, I thank thee, O Father, Lord of Heaven and earth, that thou hast hid these things from the wise and prudent and hast revealed them unto babes. When the things of the Spirit of God are hid from any, it seems to be absurd to suppose that they have the Spirit of God. And the Apostle intimates the same thing when he says, The natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness unto him; neither can he know them because they are spiritually discerned. If they are ever received, it is not through the powers of the natural man, but through the uncommon operation of the Spirit on the heart. But our Saviour expressly declares, that some wise and prudent men have not these operations, for these things are hidden from them, they discern not the things of the Spirit of God, and hence it is certain that they have not the Spirit.

In the sixth chapter of John, it appears, that the Jews, who were ready to believe that Jesus was an extraordinary person, were notwithstanding destitute of the peculiar teachings of the Spirit. For not only many things which he preached unto them in righteousness, were considered as hard sayings, but he expressly declares verse 63d, that it is the Spirit that quickeneth: Had they the Spirit that quickeneth, they never would have thought that the words which were Spirit and were life were hard sayings. Therefore they had not the Spirit.

In the first chapter of John we are told, that the Lord Jesus came to his own and his own received him not, but as many as received him to them gave he power to become the Sons of God, even to them that believed on his name; Which were born, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man but of God. His own did not in general receive him, all that did receive him were born of God.—How they were born of God is told us in a discourse with Nicodemus, in which Jesus declares that except a man be born again, of water and of the Spirit he cannot see the kingdom of God. Baptism itself, if baptism is meant by being born of water, does not supersede the necessity of being born of the Spirit. Consequently, even baptized persons, though surrounded with the presence of God so as to be able to say with the Psalmist, whither shall I go from thy Spirit, yet may be destitute of it, in its peculiar operations towards a holy life, and in need of being born again by it. Here then we find conclusive testimony that all men have not the Spirit.

The same thing is confirmed by all those passages which speak of Christians as born of the spirit; of God's pouring out his spirit; of his giving the holy spirit to them that ask him; and of his giving a spirit of grace and supplication, which leads any to look on him they have pierced and mourn: if any do not look on him and mourn, they have not the spirit. St. Paul says walk in the spirit and ye shall not fulfil the lusts of the flesh: Those therefore who fulfil the lusts of the flesh, have not the spirit. He says also Rom. viii. 1, 2. that those who are freed from condemnation, walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit, and the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus has made them free from the law of sin and death. Where this Spirit is, there is true religion. If all men then have this Spirit, all men are truly religious; but this is difficult to believe.

We read of being led by the Spirit; that the Spirit witnesses with our Spirits, that we are the children of God; that thro' the Spirit we mortify the deeds of the body, and that the Spirit is life, and yet men are naturally dead in trespasses and sins, and many remain so to the end of life. We read also of the earnest of the Spirit given of God to Christians, that thro' this they look not at the things which are temporal but at those which are eternal: This however is not the case of all men.

The Apostle tells us, of sanctification of the Spirit, of the gospel's coming to believers in demonstration of the Spirit, and in such a manner as that others may notice it; for the manifestation of the Spirit is given to every man to profit withal. This last text has been frequently quoted in proof that every man has the Spirit. But if the word manifestation be not omitted, it will no more prove that all men have the Spirit, than my holding up or manifesting that I have a book in my hand will prove that all who see it, have it also.

Further, Christians are known to belong to God by the Spirit which is given them, see 1 John iii. 24. but this is impossible if all men have the spirit alike, unless all are Christians.

Again, let us consider what is told us Rom. viii. 14. As many as are led by the Spirit of God they are the sons of God. Upon this we may observe, if all men have the Spirit of God leading them to a religious and holy life, then are they all the sons of God, and there is no distinction of state between men. One has the spirit and privilege of adoption as much as another, and every one in his foulest crimes, may cry Abba Father by the Spirit of God, without falsehood or mistake, and Jude was mistaken when he said, these are sensual having not the spirit.

The Apostle likewise in the same Chapter v. 9. after describing the situation of those who walk after the flesh, in which he evidently supposes some do walk, says but ye are not in the flesh but in the spirit, if so be the Spirit of God dwell in you. Some walk in the flesh, but this is not the case if the Spirit of God be in them. Can any thing be plainer? And yet he adds, if any man have not the Spirit of Christ he is none of his. Christians know their union to Christ by the Spirit which he gives them. If all have his Spirit all are united unto him, he dwells in all, none walk in the flesh, and there is no ground for intimating that any do not belong to him. Further, if all have the spirit there is no room to say any thing about the enmity of any one, for the Spirit of God is not enmity to God. If all therefore have the Spirit, all are friendly, all are reconciled, and the main purpose of the gospel ministry, which is to beseech sinners in Christ's stead to be reconciled to God, is at an end; nay it was always unnecessary. Hence also the promise, Lo I am with you to the end of the world, is useless.

The sense which is put on these passages of scripture is confirmed by a variety of others which might be mentioned. The doctrine of the extraordinary operations of the Spirit, in order to a holy life, seems to be interwoven with the whole system of the gospel religion. But if the texts which have been brought into view, do not afford conviction 'tis useless to examine any more.

The application of the foregoing passages is greatly confirmed by Christian experience. Many judicious professors of Christianity, whose lives were irreproachable, and who were considered sincere Christians have testified to this purpose. They tell us that in all their former religion, when they thought themselves sincere, and that the desire of being seen of men was not their object, they had not the Spirit of Christ. Many who opposed the idea of any extraordinary influences of the Spirit, have been by their own experience, convinced of their error, and induced to acknowledge the doctrines which are supported in the narratives. It may possibly be said, that they are deceived about the matter. But how does the objector know it? Is it rational to deny what others say they have experienced, merely because we have not experienced the same thing? Especially, when in every thing else they appear as judicious and upright as any that we are acquainted with. If a man tells us that honey is sweet, should we act rationally to suppose that he is deluded, when we have not tasted it ourselves? It seems to be much more rational to compare it with some other thing, the taste of which we had experienced to be sweet. And yet, even then, we might not have the right idea, as we should soon discover by tasting it ourselves. When a man tells us of the operations of the Spirit of God on his heart, we frequently are ready to disbelieve what he says, or to form some idea of it according to our preconceived notions: Like the man that has never tasted honey, he disbelieves or does not receive what is told him about it, or compares it with some other taste which is sweet. But as in tasting of honey itself he would find a peculiar difference, so in feeling the operations of the Spirit of God which are saving, we shall perceive something different from any that we had before. This is testified by our Lord, when he says, if any man will do his will, he shall know of the doctrine.

It is frequently objected, that "if every man has not the Spirit of God which is necessary for his conversion or a religious life, then he is not to blame for remaining impenitent." To this it may be replied, that the objection supposes that God is obligated to give his Spirit in its uncommon influences. This would be making God what all sinners wish him to be, their servant. But it must be considered that the object of these operations of the Spirit, is not to give new natural powers to the mind, but to alter the depraved disposition of the heart. God has given natural powers enough, but sinners will not use them aright. And is it reasonable that blame should lie on him because he does not by almighty power alter their inclinations?

But it is said that "sinners are willing to exert themselves to the uttermost, and that they sincerely wish to use all their advantages aright;" that is, in other words, from a selfish disposition without any regard to God as God (which is the temper of all the impenitent) the sinner wishes to exert himself without selfishness and in regard to God as God; or plainer still, he selfishly wishes not to be selfish. This is the amount of the objection. But can God who knows the whole truth be imposed on, or shall we (as alas! sinners commonly do) impose upon ourselves so far as to believe that in our selfish wishes not to be selfish, we are not selfish?

The sinner knows not that God truly, whom he thinks he is willing to serve with uprightness. His understanding is darkened and is alienated from the life of God, through the blindness of the heart. The way of sinners is darkness, they know not at what they stumble; a deceived heart has turned them aside.

But still it is replied, "if God bestows his spirit in a peculiar and distinguishing manner on some, and not on others, he is partial."

In answering this, it may be asked was it partial in the husbandman, Matt. xx, to give out of his own stores as much to those who labored only one hour—as to those who had borne the heat and burden of the day? Were not the claims of every one answered? Is it partial to give some an opportunity for a religious education and not to others? Partiality does not consist in bestowing greater favors on one than on another, but in answering the claims of one more than of another. If there be no claims there can be no partiality in bestowing favors. If a man, in settling an account with his neighbour, should self-moved throw up the sum of one hundred dollars justly due to him, would he be partial if he did not the same to the next? If this can be supposed, then a man never can remit a debt or bestow a favor without being partial, unless he does the same to every one in similar circumstances. He may not do what he will with his own: And if he have not enough for every claimless person, he must bestow a favor on none, lest he be guilty of the sin of partiality.

Again, God actually does give some children a better opportunity to secure eternal life than others. In the course of his Providence, some are favored with examples and instructions of piety continually;—while others hear scarcely any thing about God and religion, unless in profanity and contempt; but God is not partial.

Farther it is important to consider, that all men are naturally in all their exercises and volitions, warring against Heaven. They can lay no claim to mercy, they reject the Saviour, they have nothing to plead. God may exact the hundred talents of them: He may also for Christ's sake remit them in the way of effectually calling them. He repeatedly calls upon them to submit, to own his sovereignty and to serve him only, but no one returns, none will come unto him that they might have life. Therefore in the day of his power, not for their sakes, but his own, he makes one and another willing, by the operation of his Holy Spirit. How can he be partial if he leaves othersequaly guilty? He had a just right to leave all. Let those who are left show their claims, and they may rest assured that God will not utterly leave them. But if they have no claims upon him, it is very wicked to upbraid him with partiality because he is good, and does what he will with his own. Rather ought every sinner to admire the riches of that grace, which while it passes over and leaves him to the just consequences of his rebellion, makes another infinitely blessed. His eye ought not to be evil, because God is good. 'Tis a great favor bestowed on them that are reclaimed, but it is arrogance to find fault because he does not bestow the same unmerited favors on all.

The foregoing observations lead to a few remarks.

1. When men have not experienced something extraordinary or uncommon in their minds, in respect of their sinfulness and the salvation offered in the gospel, they have great cause to fear that they are not partakers of the saving influences of God's spirit; and the same applies to the case of all those who walk in ways of sensual indulgence—they have not the spirit and are none of Christ's.

2. There is great reason to believe the doctrine of awakening to religion, by the special operations of the Spirit of God; and to admit such extraordinary things as are contained in the narratives of a revival of religion. They exhibit the marvellous grace of the Most High. It does not become short-sighted and rebellious creatures to follow their own conjectures on so important a subject; but in the fear of Jehovah to receive the instructions of scripture, and not shut their eyes against truth which is of everlasting importance.

3. It is dangerous and criminal to revile what others testify respecting their experience of the operations of the Holy Spirit. To deny such things is, at least, to be guilty of falsehood; perhaps of lying. It exposes to hardness of heart, and in some circumstances compares with the sin which will never be forgiven; it is to resist the Holy Ghost.

4. To be habitually in a state of stupidity, especially if we are professors of religion, and to have but now and then some uneasiness of mind respecting our spiritual state while lust in the heart prevails against the voice of our consciences, is a fearful state. It proves that we are not regenerated; that we are not friends, but enemies to Christ; exposed to the threatening, my Spirit shall no longer strive with man; and, in short, that we are on the borders of everlasting burnings. And how awful must be the state of those who have had many serious impressions and convictions on their minds, but have lost them all and turned again to folly! No tongue can describe their danger! ALANSON.

An Essay on Christian Communion; for the Connecticut Evangelical Magazine.

THE apostle John, in his 1st epist. i. 3. says, That, which we have seen and heard, declare we unto you, that ye also may have fellowship with us; and truly our fellowship is with the Father, and with his Son, Jesus Christ. The term fellowship, in this use of it, has the same signification with communion. It intends, summarily, a joint participation in one common good.

By means of the apostacy, all holy communion between God and men, and between one man and another, was at an end. Mankind thence became supremely selfish, and as such, disposed to seek every one his own interest, as the supreme good. The great and happy change which is wrought in men, by the grace of the gospel, is, that it makes them holy, and thence happy, in view of the general good. It accordingly extends their regards, from private interest, to the glory of God, and the supreme happiness of his kingdom. When the Apostle to the Cor. says, "God is faithful, by whom ye are called unto the fellowship of his Son Jesus Christ," he has in view their absolute safety, on the ground of divine promise, and thence their joint participation with Jesus Christ, in the joy set before him, when he endured the cross, and despised the shame. Hence, when he pronounced this blessing on the Cor. "The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the communion of the Holy Ghost, be with you all;" his meaning must have been, that they should be made partakers of the Holy Spirit, in his special and appropriate influences, and thereby be actual partakers of the grace of Christ, and the love of God, and thence be fitted for the holy service of the three in one, who bear record in heaven. But the subject will be more fully illustrated, by the following particulars.

1. The communion of Saints implies, that they have one common interest. It cannot exist, among beings, whose interests are separated, and thence opposed, each to the other. Hence says the Apostle to the Cor. "What fellowship hath righteousness with unrighteousness, and what communion hath light with darkness?" So far as men have the mind and spirit of Christ, they have one au-

terest, in common with him. He is heir of all things. They are expressly made joint heirs and partakers with him. As Christians they have no interest, separate from his. Christ saith, "All things, that the Father hath, are mine." He saith further, to denote the community of interest, between the Father and the Son, "All mine are thine, and thine are mine." Hence, as all true believers have one interest, in common with Christ, their head, they have the same with the Father; for saith Christ, "I and my Father are one." Being one in essence, they have one common interest. This, which is primarily the infinite perfection and happiness of the divine mind, is the good, of which all true believers are made partakers, by grace. Hence they are not only so united, as to have a community of interest among themselves, for they are all one in this view, but they have one and the same interest, and thence one source of happiness, with the Father and the Son.

2. This implies a union of holy affection. True believers are all united in the bonds of mutual love. They are specially commanded, to love one another. By this therefore as an essential branch of evidence, they are to be known, by all men, as the disciples of Jesus. Beside, they all unite in supreme love to the same infinitely worthy object, even God. "They all, with open face, beholding, as in a glass, the glory of the Lord, are changed into the same image." Hence, one moral image, instamped on the heart, is a fundamental character, in all the disciples of Jesus. Hence saith Paul to the Cor. "We have all been made to drink into one spirit."

3. Christian communion implies

farther a union of pursuit. God is uniformly pursuing his own glory, as the source of all rational happiness; as that, which furnishes the means of the most perfect gratification and joy, to all benevolent minds. God regardeth this, as his last end, in all his operations. He evidently intends to manifest his glory, consisting in his infinite, eternal, and unchangeable perfection and happiness, to the view of the universe. Christians, so far as they are such, all mind and pursue the same things. In this they unite with the first cause, and the last end. They desire, and accordingly pursue nothing so much, as to glorify their God and Redeemer, and thence promote the design of all his wondrous works. The end of all God's commandments is charity out of a pure heart. This charity is a purely disinterested and holy affection. Hence, in all its operations and pursuits, it perfectly harmonizes with the divine benevolence.

4. Christian communion implies, as the consummation of it, a union of holy enjoyment. The source of this enjoyment is indivisibly one. The happiness of all real Christians is one. It consists chiefly, and primarily, in that holy joy, for which they are capacitated, by means of a benevolent temper of heart. By this they are made capable, so far as their views are extended, of enjoying the good of the universe. This is an earnest of the heavenly inheritance, which is enjoyed by the Saints in this life. In this they not only have fellowship, one with another, but with the Father and the Son. The three, who bear record, in heaven, rejoice in all the divine works, as these are most perfectly conceived and executed, for gratifying the divine benevolence, in the view of its own operations, and the happiness thence diffused, through all benevolent minds. Whatever is pleasing to the Father and the Son, is likewise to all holy creatures, so far as it falls within their view of things. Hence, believers are spoken of, as rejoicing, in hope of the glory of God. They accordingly rejoice, in all the prosperity and happiness, which are enjoyed, by the church and kingdom of God, at present; and in all the good, which is anticipated, on the sure ground of divine promise and faithfulness. Hence, the peculiar joy of saints on earth is the same, with that of angels and the spirits of just men made perfect, in heaven; and theirs is a participation in the joy, with which Jehovah contemplates his own perfections, purposes, laws, and administrations; and the answerable stability, glory, and happiness of his moral kingdom.

In view of the preceding observations, we see how to understand, 1 Cor. x. 16. 17. "The cup of blessing, which we bless, is it not the communion of the blood of Christ? the bread, which we break, is it not the communion of the body of Christ? For we, being many, are one bread, and one body: for we are all partakers of that one bread." Communion, in this holy ordinance, is not merely a joint partaking of the representations of Christ's body and blood. This may consist with men's being wholly dead in sin, and thence at enmity with God and one another. But real disciples partake of these outward signs, in the exercise of holy love; and hence, in a believing and joyful remembrance of Jesus Christ, and him crucified. Their souls, therefore, are feasted and nourished, with the bread and the water of life.

Hence, it appears farther, that Christian communion, though in some things, it may depend on outward signs, or circumstances, is yet altogether spiritual and holy. It depends essentially on the inward frame of the heart, and is founded in that holiness, without which no man shall see the Lord. Hence, fallen men can have communion with God, and with one another, in things pertaining to him, no farther, than they are made spiritually alive, by the washing of regeneration, and the renewing of the Holy Ghost. Without this; all, which they can do; or experience, however it may counterfeit the graces of the divine spirit; is the fruit of an unholy temper, and thence of the nature of opposition to God, and his holy truth. This shows the necessity of men's being renewed, after the image of God, as fundamental to a consistent profession of the Christian faith, and a due attendance on the institution of the Lord's supper.

We are farther taught, by this subject, that no religion, which is founded in mere selfishness, whatever zeal, strictness, and external purity, it may induce, is the least qualification for the kingdom of heaven. It forms the subject, in no degree, for uniting in the holy services and joys of the heavenly state. This explains the absolute necessity of men's being born again, that they may see the kingdom of God, and enjoy its blessings. Preparatory to this, they must relish the beauties of holiness, and rejoice in God, as their portion and happiness. Hence, the unholy are not only excluded, by the unalterable purpose of God, but if admitted to dwell in the presence of his glory, it would be no joy to them. Even heaven itself would be a very hell to them, from which, if possible, they would make their escape. The apparent union and joy of holy minds, so far from exciting answerable feelings in them, would fill them with tormenting malice and envy. How alarming is this view of the subject, to all, who are yet in the gall of bitterness, and bond of iniquity!

Finally, how highly honorable and glorious, as well as delightful, is the sublime reality of Christian communion! It is not a growth of the pride and vain conceits of visionary philosophers, who must yet become fools, that they may be wise. It is not a mere partnership of privileges and pleasures, with the rich, the great, and the honorable of the earth, who have their portion in this life. No, it is an endless and holy union of heart, of interest, and of enjoyment, with an innumerable company of angels, and spirits of just men made perfect, in the kingdom of God; yea with God himself, and his Son, Jesus Christ, who is king of glory, and heir of all things. How immensely exalted then, how replete with glory, honor, and blessedness is that divine communion, to which redeemed sinners are admitted, through the blood of the Lamb!

TROPHIMUS.

Special discoveries of divine things made to Believers.

THE holy scriptures evidently teach us, that God has a special kindness for his own people, who are united to Jesus Christ in the covenant of grace. They are called his elect, in distinction from all other men. Our Saviour calls them his friends, his brethren, and his members; and tells us that he layeth down his life for them; and all the promises of the gospel are also limited to them. The blessings which the saints shall receive in another world are very great; but these are not all: The sacred scriptures teach us, that God distinguishes them from other men with blessings in this world. It would be easy to show, in many respects, how they are so distinguished; but I shall confine myself to observations on the knowledge, instructions and discoveries by which they are peculiarly favored.

God is pleased to give his saints his word, ordinances and institutions of religion. These privileges are not enjoyed by mankind in general; but are blessings which he bestows from his singular love to his own people. It is true, there are others, who have these privileges, as well as the saints; but they are those people with whom the saints live, and it is for the elect's sakes, that these privileges are given. God blesses those societies and nations, among whom his own people live, on their account, as he would have saved Sodom from destruction, if but ten righteous persons had lived in that city. While the Jews were the church, to them were committed the lively oracles of God, and Christian churches have enjoyed them since, and for their sakes, the people with whom they have lived; but no other people. The rest of mankind have been given over to an utter ignorance of the holy scriptures; which intimates, that these scriptures are given out of kindness to the saints. But God has given his own people communications of divine knowledge, which are peculiar to them, which no other people, not even those with whom they live, have ever enjoyed. This is evident from many passages in the bible. Our Lord said to his disciples, 'Unto you it is given to know the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven; but to them, (the multitude) it is not given.' Mysteries are secrets, which none can understand, but such as are particularly instructed into them, and according to our Lord, none but his disciples have this instruction. To the same purpose Paul says, 'Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man the things, which God hath prepared for them that love him; but God hath revealed them unto us by his Spirit'. And he adds, 'The natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God, neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned.' Our Saviour also speaks of revealing himself unto his own people, as he doth not unto the world. These, and many other passages of scripture, which might be mentioned, prove that God is graciously pleased to communicate to his saints such knowledge of divine things, as he does not give to other men.

The knowledge here spoken of, is not merely different in degree, but in kind, from that which others possess, in common with the saints. For this reason, the things that they know, are called the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven. The Christian knows by experience the nature of holiness, and the difference between that and sin. He has a direct knowledge, what these things are, which in the scriptures are called regeneration, repentance, faith, love, obedience, communion with God, Christian comfort, divine support and joy in the Holy Ghost; and he has an experimental acquaintance with the other things which the bible mentions, relating to the Christian life. He has been in the practice of them himself, and therefore when he reads of them in the word of God, or hears of them in the sanctuary, or elsewhere, he understands the ideas meant by the words. Christians also are the only people, who know any thing of the moral beauty and amiableness of the character of God, and of Christ, and who are acquainted with the excellency and loveliness of God's moral government. To others there is no form or comeliness in Christ, why he should be desired, and they have no delight in the law of the Lord; while Christians taste and see that the Lord is good. The knowledge, which sinners have of God, and of the things of religion, is communicated to their understandings by books and descriptions; but Christians enjoy the teachings of the Spirit. These learn religion, and the nature of holiness and divine things, not only by book, but also by practice. This knowledge of the spirituality and excellency of the divine life, and of the things of God, differs from the ideas of others on these subjects, much more than the knowledge of an husbandman, concerning his business, differs from the ideas of it, which he could communicate by words, to a savage of the wilderness, who had never seen any thing of the kind. The knowledge of the Christian is experimental, the ideas of others are derived from report and hear-say; and they form false and inadequate ideas of all these things; and of many of them they have no notion at all. They are wholly ignorant of their richness and excellency. They know not the Lord. Hence it is, that when a sinner is first brought into the kingdom of Christ, the Bible appears new to him, and the things of which it treats, very different from what he expected to find them, if he should become a Christian.

Christians receive glorious instructions, by the teachings of the Spirit, which are communications made, not immediately to their understandings, but to their hearts, by which they are enabled to see the beauty of holiness. The spirit of Christ is in them. When one of Christ's apostles asked him, 'How is it, Lord, that thou wilt manifest thyself to us, and not to the world?' He replied, that both the Father and himself would come and take up their abode with them. This respects a spiritual intercourse, between God and Christians, in which their spiritual life and comfort consist. This can be known to none, but such as partake of it.

Let me observe further, that it is not only true, that the distinguishing love of God, to his own people, has led him to give such peculiar privileges and instructions to them; but that it is evidently fit and reasonable, that God should give them such privileges, and make such special discoveries of himself, and of divine things to them. They are his peculiar people. He hath chosen them, from a world of enemies, to be to the glory of his grace—to be the examples and monuments of his unspeakable goodness and mercy. They are singled out, to be the reward of Christ's mediatorial work; it is therefore suitable, that God should, for his own sake, pour out upon them of his Spirit in abundant measures, and afford them all such instructions and communications, as are necessary, in the best manner to fit them to answer his designs, that they may be illustrious witnesses of the greatness of his mercy, and an honor to their Redeemer. Accordingly God considers them as vessels set apart for himself, and he instructs, purifies and enriches them, for his own use and service, to any degree he pleases. But this is not the case with other men, who remain the enemies of God. They are left to the direction of their own evil hearts, and are vessels of wrath sitting for destruction. They, by their evil ways, judge themselves unworthy of eternal life, and God turns from them to his own people.

The preceding observations are sufficient to show us how it comes to pass, that regeneration, faith and many other things, spoken of in the holy scriptures, are so differently understood by different people. Real believers, who have not only a speculative, but a practical knowledge of them, understand all the essential things of religion alike, in all nations, and among all denominations. But those, whose notions of religion are derived only from books and information, and often from misinformation respecting it, are very liable to mistakes. They have hearts opposed to true religion, and to the doctrines of the bible; they wish them to be different from what they are, and are prepared to embrace some of those false representations of them, which have been devised, and are industriously circulated, by the enemies of truth. They love darkness, rather than light. Here is room enough for the introduction of endless differences, without a suspicion, that they arise from any obscurity in the word of God. Such men fulfil the predictions of the scriptures, by writing them to their own destruction. We ought not to be surprised at the errors invented and circulated by men, who have no personal acquaintance with true religion, and whose evil hearts dispose them to embrace error, in preference to truth. But 'if any man, (saith Christ,) will do his will, he shall know of the doctrine, whether it be of God.' And an apostle, speaking to Christians, says, 'Ye have an unction from the Holy One, and know all things.'

These observations will also lead us to discover whence it comes to pass, that there are some men, who do not believe in the necessity of awakenings, convictions, conversions and such earnest attention to the things of religion, as sometimes take place among men. They do not believe in that, which is sometimes called experimental religion, to distinguish it from that, which consists in nothing more than a reputable morality, and a formal attendance on the ordinances of the gospel. The reasons given, why they do not believe in such things, very commonly are, that they never experienced any thing of the kind, or that, at some former day, they were under concern of mind, but it wore off, and left them as they were before, and therefore that they know, by their own experience, that there is nothing in such things, but enthusiasm and delusion. By this account of themselves, they describe those, who are represented by seed sown on stony ground, which springeth up suddenly, but soon withereth away. Instead of drawing this false and dangerous conclusion, it is earnestly wished, that they would seriously consider this admonition, given them by our Lord, 'When the unclean spirit is gone out of a man, he walketh through dry places, seeking rest and findeth none. Then he saith, I will return into my house, from whence I came out, and when he is come, he findeth it empty, swept and garnished. Then goeth he, and taketh with him seven other spirits, more wicked than himself, and they enter in and dwell there; and the last state of that man is worse than the first.' Such men are not Christians; they have not that knowledge, which the bible tells us, is peculiar to Christians, and therefore their want of knowledge and experience in these things, is so far from proving that they are mere delusion, that it only proves that themselves are in the broad way, that leads to death. And since this divine knowledge is revealed to Christians only, it is not strange that many others, should disbelieve and deny it, notwithstanding the evidence we have of it, in the holy scriptures.

The foregoing observations show also the propriety of calling true religion, experimental religion, to distinguish it from the opinions of men, who have had no experience in it.

Finally, It appears from the foregoing observations, that a man must be a Christian indeed, that he may have any competent knowledge of the nature and exercises of Christianity. 'This is life eternal, to know thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom thou hast sent.'

MIKROS.

FOR THE CONNECTICUT EVANGELICAL MAGAZINE.

Genesis xvii. 23. "And Abraham took Ishmael his Son, and all that were born in his house, and all that were bought with his money, every male among the men of Abraham's house; and circumcised the flesh of their foreskin, in the self same day, as God had said unto him."

HAD we sufficient light to direct our inquiry, it might be of some importance to understand upon what ground it was, that circumcision was administered to Abraham's household. When God first instituted a seal of his new and gracious covenant, and gave an express command that it should be administered to all the males of Abraham's family, it would be reasonable to suppose, that the conditions upon which it was to be applied were such as God designed should be observed, in his church, in all future ages. As this was the original institution of a seal, and was designed, not only to distinguish and separate the family of God from all others, but to initiate and introduce into it; it is reasonable to suppose, that the posterity of Abraham would follow his example in its administration. Not only so, but it will be hard to admit, that the terms upon which God originally directed any to be circumcised, were different from those upon which he afterwards required the seal of circumcision to be applied.

It seems generally to have been regarded as a clear case, that the men of Abraham's household, though of various and different ages, and many of them as capable of judging and acting for themselves, in matters of a religious nature, as Abraham himself, were, nevertheless, circumcised, not in testimony of their own faith, but of Abraham's: Consequently, that they, none of them, received circumcision as a seal of the righteousness of their own, but of his faith. The following considerations may be sufficient to render it doubtful whether the adults in Abraham's family, and men far advanced in life, were circumcised, not on their own but on Abraham's account, viz.

1. The supposition that they were circumcised only on Abraham's account, without any regard to their own personal qualifications, is, at least apparently, inconsistent with the directions afterwards given, by the God of Abraham, respecting the administration of the seal of the covenant of grace. Just before his ascension, Christ directed his Apostles, Matt. xxviii. 19, "Go teach, (disciple) all nations, baptizing them". Under the Christian dispensation, baptism takes place of circumcision, and is a seal of the same covenant of promise—the same righteousness of faith. But if the Apostles of our Lord were not to administer this seal to those, to whom they preached, until they were discipled and appeared to embrace the Christian faith; there needs some caution in admitting the supposition, that, by the express command of God, it was to be administered to adults, under the former dispensation, without any regard to their personal characters—and merely because they were servants to one, who was himself a believer. Abraham's household was made up of men of various ages. Before the institution of circumcision, he had upwards of three hundred trained servants, who were born in his own house. These were as capable of embracing the faith of Abraham, as the Gentiles were, of embracing the Christian faith, when the Apostles were commissioned to preach to them, and baptize. And as the Christian baptism is no more a seal of the righteousness of faith, than circumcision was, under the former dispensation, it is hardly admissible that the latter, by express direction of the Head of the church, was heretofore to be administered to adults, without any regard to personal character; when faith in the promise is now made the condition of its being administered to those, to whom the gospel is preached. It is true, we have but few materials from which to collect the moral characters, and judge, directly, of the personal piety of Abraham's servants. We are, nevertheless, not left perfectly in the dark with regard to the subject. Abraham's eldest servant, who was sent to take a wife to Isaac, appears to have been eminently pious. And God had, before, said, Gen. xviii. 19. "I know Abraham that he will command his children, and his household after him, and they shall keep the way of the Lord to do justice and judgment." This is a divine testimony to the fidelity of Abraham. It seems that, on trial, God had found him faithful. Hence there is great reason to suppose, that Abraham had been a painful and faithful instructor of his household, taught them the true religion, and labored to form his whole family to the knowledge and love of God.

2. It appears that God was now collecting and forming a church, in the family of Abraham, to be distinguished from all other people, as well by a particular, visible mark, or badge, as by larger and more explicit promises than had been before made. This mark God stiles his covenant in their flesh. This was a seal, on his part, of his covenant of promise. And this, from that time forward, until the introduction of the Christian dispensation, was initiating; and was the only door into the visible church. And the seal of the same covenant of promise, ever since the ascension of Christ, has been equally initiating into the visible family of God; and, will remain so, to the end of time. The circumcised were considered, under the former dispensation, as members of the visible family of God; the uncircumcised as strangers and aliens. So it is now in regard of those who are baptized according to the directions of the word of God; and, those who remain unbaptized. The circumcised not only might, but were required to eat the passover, under the former dispensation: But this was forbidden to the uncircumcised. So none, but they who are baptized may partake of the Christian passover; all others are to be excluded from it. These considerations seem sufficient to support the opinion which has generally been entertained, that, with the institution of circumcision, God set up a church in the family of Abraham. God had a church in the world, before this; but its members, scattered here and there, were not formed into a distinct society, or collected into a particular family; nor were they distinguished from the rest of the world, by any special, visible marks. But now God was setting up a church, to live and be perpetuated to the end of time, which was to be distinguished, by an external, visible mark, from the rest of mankind: And this mark, the seal of a gracious promise of his mercy and favor; and, that this church should never be forsaken or cast off, but should live and flourish to the latest generations.

This church is God's family—God's own household, in the midst of which he will ever dwell—sealing to its members the gracious promise, that he will be their God. On this church God has had his heart from eternity. For this the world was made: And for this, the Lord of glory died, and now lives, and will live and reign till her last enemy shall be destroyed. The church, erected in the family of Abraham, and distinguished by the seal of God's gracious covenant and promise, is the same church of the living God, which still exists, though under a different dispensation; and is distinguished from the rest of the world by an outward, though different, seal of the same gracious covenant and promise, which was made and sealed to the father of the faithful.

These considerations would naturally lead us to suppose that, when God himself began a church, to be distinguished in all future ages from the rest of mankind, he would form it agreeably to the pattern, which, when afterwards manifest in flesh, he gave to his apostles, of a Christian church.—That, in the formation of this church, the Lord himself would observe the same rules, which he required his apostles to observe in erecting churches.—And, that he would admit none into it by circumcision, but such as his apostles might, afterwards, admit by baptism.

But if we suppose that circumcision was administered to Abraham's adult servants, without any regard to their personal characters, and only on account of the faith of their master, Abraham; we shall here behold a church, formed immediately by God himself, without one pious person in it, or, at least, without piety being insisted on, or a visibility of it being even sought in one member of it, excepting merely the master of the family. This hypothesis being admitted, how extremely different will the plan appear, upon which the holy God himself formed a church, from that upon which he, afterwards, directed his servants, who acted under him, to form churches for him. And this the church, too, which was to be perpetuated in all ages, and into which none, to whom the Apostles were sent to preach, were to be admitted by baptism, but such as were visibly believers.

That God himself should direct and require Abraham to set the seal of the righteousness of faith on adults, without any regard to their personal moral characters;—that he should, in the first instance, direct the church, with whom he said he would dwell, and to whom he promised to be a Father and a God, to be composed of members destitute of visible marks of piety toward him;—that this should be the visible church redeemed from among men, and formed to show forth the praises of him, who hath called them to glory and virtue; and, that, afterwards, he should direct peculiar care to be used respecting the materials of which his house is to be builded, and require the evidence of discipleship to be given, before the initiating seal into his house and family might be administered; are suppositions, which are inadmissible, without clear and full evidence to support them.

Besides, it is worthy of enquiry, whether it be correspondent with God's usual manner of dealing with men in matters of religion, and agreeable to that grace, wherein he hath abounded toward us in all wisdom and prudence, to suppose that he should require Abraham to exercise the authority of a master in compelling men to submit to a religious rite—a sacred seal of God's new and gracious covenant; and, on the other hand, whether it correspond with the character of Abraham, and the testimony which God himself gave of him, that he would command his children and his household after him, to suppose that he should compel men far ad- vanced in life to receive the instituted distinguishing mark of being in covenant with the holy God, without previously instructing them into the sacred nature and design of the institution; or, when thus instructed, on their rejecting the covenant, of which circumcision was the seal, that he should proceed to administer it to them.—These considerations alone, aside from what has been before urged, furnish apparently plausible objections against the opinion, that the adult servants of Abraham's household were circumcised on account of his faith, without any regard to their own personal characters.

On the duty and importance of Social Worship.—Particularly in the exercise of Psalmody.

(Continued from p. 17.)

NUMBER III.

— Be filled with the Spirit; speaking to yourselves in Psalms, and Hymns and Spiritual Songs; singing and making melody in your heart to the Lord. Paul to the Ephesians, v. 19, 20.

THAT public worship, in some form, is a duty of perpetual obligation on men, is generally admitted; and its important relation to the interests of human society, is felt, and rarely denied even by infidels.

That Psalmody in particular, or the exercise of vocal music in the public worship of God is a duty of divine institution, and as such has been practised by the people of God in every age of the church, has been considered in my second number, and the apostolic injunction at the head of this, together with various passages from the Old Testament Scriptures adduced in establishment of the point.

The design of all which was, not so much to convince the doubtful, as to excite the serious attention of the inconsiderate, and impress the influence of divine authority as a matter of the utmost importance to a right and acceptable performance of the duty—for, “whatsoever is not of faith, is sin.”

The particular manner, both as to outward act and moral temper with which the duty is to be performed, yet remains to be considered; and this is the proposed subject of enquiry in the present number.

As the subject presents itself in a twofold view, viz. external and internal, this method of treating it is accordingly suggested. And as to the first, we may observe, that reason and common sense, as well as the concurring authority of Scripture, point out the propriety, yea, the duty of qualifying ourselves in the knowledge both of the theory and the practice of the musical art, that we may join in that part of worship, so that the exercises of God's house may be performed decently and in order. To disconnect, or discard this principle from our idea of the duty, would manifest an extreme degree of stupidity, and of disrespect for a divine institution. As a general rule, perhaps it would go as far to disprove a heart of piety, as an ear for music. Ill-timed singing, or a medley of an hundred jarring discordant sounds poured upon the ear at once, must have such a disagreeable effect, as will tend rather to extinguish than excite devotion. This idea then, that we must so sing as to make melody to the ear, must be taken as a given first principle. Voluntary penance enters not into religious worship, and the effect of discordant sounds is simply the sensation of distress and horror.

As I am now treating upon the external part of the duty, permit me to descend still more minutely upon matters of form; for whatever is connected in point of propriety with this subject cannot be viewed as unimportant. In the exercise of this, as well as every other art of worship, we should observe a decent, solemn and regular deportment—not indulge in postures of sloth, of apparent inattention and indifference—in no indecent, light and trivial gestures. Our eyes should be upon our psalm books—not an unnecessary whisper should escape from our lips, and never a smile of levity appear upon our faces.—Our articulation should be clear, our pronunciation distinct, our emphasis correct and natural as in reading or speaking.

If we feel, as we ever should feel in this duty, that it is a solemn act in which we are engaged; and that we are addressing our homage to the all-present, omniscient God, our outward deportment will be conformable.

The choice of tunes belongs to each worshipping assembly, or to the leading choir of singers, who act in behalf of the whole in making this selection. I would however humbly suggest the expediency of not indulging to the extreme a taste for novelty, or a predilection for new tunes, in exclusion of all such as are generally known, and in which the older part of the congregation can unite their voices; and for the same end, that is, to make the worship as general, and as generally edifying as may be, that fuging music, and musical repetitions without very evident propriety, be but sparingly used. A want of due solemnity and seriousness in much of the modern church music now in use, is felt and regretted by many people of serious minds, and correct musical taste. There is surely a certain fitness and propriety to be attended to in this matter, or we are at once exposed to very unbecoming extremes. There is nothing sacred in sounds, it will perhaps be replied; and it is as readily granted; but that there is not something in certain transpositions and modifications of sounds less calculated than others, to excite seriousness and devotion, and therefore not so proper to be used in the solemn exercise of divine worship, surely cannot be pretended. And that slighty, unserious airs of music form the best medium of our communion with heaven, and the most suitable in which to address our direct and solemn homage to the King eternal in the temple of the living God, will not be conceded.

But the great and essential requisite of the duty is still to be considered and applied; without which the utmost attention to outward form, will be as unavailing as a tinkling cymbal, and as destitute of true worship. We must not indulge so gross an idea as that the Most High is capable of being pleased with sounds—it is a meek and quiet spirit alone that is of worth in his sight. “The Lord taketh pleasure in them that fear him, in those that hope in his mercy.” It is the melody of the heart only that ascends with acceptance and makes music in the ear of God. This end, our music is designed as a mean to effect—in tranquillizing the passions—fitting the affections to a spirit of devotion, and preparing the heart, thro’ the aid of divine grace, for the perception and enjoyment of moral beauty.

The first and fundamental direction, the Apostle gives for the performance of the duty is, "be filled with the Spirit." Here is an idea, which, perhaps, many of the votaries of sacred music have not sufficiently considered; and perhaps too in all their time, attention and expense bestowed in learning to sing, they have not even brought it into account as a qualification for acceptable religious praise. If so, let them, for once attend carefully to the instruction of the bible, and receive conviction of truth.

There is something striking and instructive in the connection which the first clause of this scripture passage, has with what immediately precedes it, "Be not drunk with wine wherein is excess, but be filled with the Spirit, speaking to yourselves in psalms and hymns," &c. People of temperate lives will not so readily apprehend any special application to themselves, of this part of the apostolic injunction; before, by way of reproof—yet I must think, that in its connection is contained an important instruction for all; and as far as we are actuated by improper motives in our attention to the musical art, and do pervert the melody of our voices to a wrong and improper end, we are not so uninterested in the passage, as at first seemed; but the reproof, by implication, actually reaches us. And do we not see a general propensity in mankind to abuse and pervert the sacred art of music? The use which a great part of mankind make of music, and the highest end they propose from the practice and enjoyment of it, is to excite carnal mirth, and give a keener relish to scenes of conviviality, if not of riot and intoxication. A merry song over the bottle or card-table, beguiles the insipidity of mispent time, and adds a gaiety of humour to their festive mirth.

Saith the prophet Isaiah, "The harp and the viol, the tabret and pipe and wine are in their feasts, but they regard not the work of the Lord, neither consider the operation of his hands". (Isaiah v. 12.) The prophet Amos gives the same description. "They chant to the sound of the viol, and invent to themselves instruments of music like David—that drink wine in bowls, and anoint themselves with the chief ointment, but they are not grieved for the affliction of Joseph". (Amos vi. 5, 6.) How displeasing to the Most High was this prostitution of music, the same prophet gives us to understand. "Take thou away from me the noise of thy songs, for I will not hear the melody of thy viols."

These scripture passages, I think, explain the connection of the former one, to which we have adverted; and shew us, that the use of music, for selfish, carnal, sensual ends and purposes, is divinely forbidden; and that, like all other enjoyments, it is to be improved, with either an immediate, or ultimate respect to the service of God; either to unbend and relax the mind from cares; to refresh and enliven the animal spirits in a state of dejection, or under too great intensity of mental exercise, and thereby the better fit us for the active duties of life; or, in the noblest use of music, to enkindle a spirit of devotion in our souls—to worship and glorify God.

In the direction given us by the Apostle for the performance of the duty, he sets up a character, moral temper, performance and enjoyment, in the exercise of the musical art, in direct contrast with what immediately precedes it.—As if he had said, would you enjoy true pleasure in the charms of music, apply the art to the proper end for which it was designed and given to man. Seek it not in the song of the drunkard, or the lewd ballad of the sensualist, but address your melody in humble fervent worship, to him who formed to song your tuneful voices, "speaking to yourselves in psalms and hymns and spiritual songs, singing and making melody in your hearts to the Lord." And for this end, "be filled with the Spirit"—be assimilated, in the temper and dispositions of your hearts, to the glorious moral character of Deity, the infinite source and standard of all perfection.—What it is to be filled with the Spirit, we may learn, by knowing what are the genuine effects of the Spirit's sanctifying operations upon the soul. "Now the fruits of the Spirit are these, love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance." Where these are found in the worshipper, he is filled with the Spirit—and what divine harmony, what heavenly music must flow from the combination and concert of these virtues! It is a melody pleasing to God himself.

There is something very instructive, and inexpressibly beautiful in the figurative expression, "making melody in your hearts to the Lord." If it mean any thing, it is descriptive of the most composed, serene, and tranquil state of mind—forming a direct contrast to that of the carnal mind, which, distracted with worldly cares, in enmity with his God, and his fellow creatures, opposed to the nature and the object of his worship, is harrowed up with the distracting conflict of jarring passions, and like the troubled sea that cannot rest, continually casting up mire and dirt. There is nothing but discord in such a heart how tuneful soever may be his voice. But where the rough and turbulent passions are smoothed and regulated—all the powers and faculties of the soul—all the affections and desires of the heart, strike unison in love to God and man; here is melody indeed, it is the melody of the heart:—here is celestial music; it is the harmony of the soul. This on earth precludes the exercise of angels, and the transports of heaven.

If then Psalmody, be a divine institution, which we cannot doubt, it ought to be diligently cultivated and reverently attended. Let none remain inattentive to the duty, or insensible of their obligations to sing God's praise in his public worship. Let all be exhorted to unite with the music of their voices, that melody of the heart which the sacred scriptures enjoin, and they may humbly hope for the approbation and acceptance of that great and glorious Being, who is the immediate object of their worship. Let us only be filled with the Spirit, and we can want no motive of encouragement, that can arouse the attention, warm the affections, and inspire the devotion of a rational being.

ASAPH.

An account of a work of divine grace in a revival of religion in the town of PLYMOUTH, State of Connecticut, in the year 1799, in two letters to the Editors from the Rev. SIMON WATERMAN.

(Continued from page 27.)

LETTER II.

GENTLEMEN,

AGREEABLE to intimations given in the close of my former letter, I shall now give some further particulars, relating to the late revival of religion in this town.

About four or five months after the attention began, two lads or young men, who lived near each other, having finished their daily labor in the field, met in a school-house near by, and spent the evening in religious conversation. They had not spent more than two evenings in this manner, before their being together and the design thereof, was known to some in the neighborhood, who, the next time they met, joined their company. About this time, I heard of their meeting, although it was not generally known. A doubt, at once, arose with respect to the propriety of encouraging so young a class, of the different sexes, meeting by themselves, for religious purposes; without some one of more age and experience, to superintend their meetings, and preserve regularity among them, as also to instruct them, in things pertaining to the kingdom of God, and their own salvation. At their next meeting, I went among them, and found nearly forty males and females, from about eight to about eighteen years of age, convened for the purpose of praying together, reading, singing psalms, and talking upon religious subjects. Being now desired by them I met with them, weekly, for several months. The second time I met with them, there were about double the number there were the first time; and the third time, I judged about one hundred and forty. Although it was now the busiest season of the year with farmers, being about harvest-time, and the evenings short, young men and women and children, came from a distance of several miles; and much the greater part appeared to have their minds impressed with seriousness; for in every part of the house, tears were seen, and sighs and sobs heard; altho' endeavors were used to suppress the one, and to conceal the other. These meetings of the young people and children, were kept up for several months, and until more elderly people, who wished to participate with them in their devotional exercises, came in among them, and so rendered them common for those of every age: but it is hoped, the religious impressions made at this time, upon the young and tender minds of a number, will never be wholly effaced, but remain through time and be like a well of water, springing up into everlasting life.

I shall now take notice of some expressions, or forms of speech, made use of by individuals, during the time of the awakening. These expressions and forms of speech, so far as they indicate the exercises of the heart, will show what the views and feelings of some were; and perhaps, afford a specimen of the whole; for it is not doubted, but similar views and feelings were common to many, if not to most of those among us, who have been the subjects of an uncommon operation of the spirit.

When one was asked, "Do you hope you have acquainted yourself with God, and are now at peace with him? Or should you leave this world in your present state, what would your end be?" The answer was, "I do not know what my state is, nor what will become of me: I am in the hands of God, who hath a right to and will do with me as he pleaseth; and I know he will do right." Question, "Do you think yourself a sinner, and that you deserve to be forever separated from God, and to be made everlastingly miserable?"

Answer, "Yes, I know I am a sinner and deserve eternal death ; and if God should cast me off forever, and make me everlastingly miserable, I never should have any just cause to complain."

Question, "Do you feel reconciled to the will of God : is it the joy of your heart that the Lord reigneth ; and can you trust yourself in his hands, and leave it with him to do with you as he pleaseth ?" Answer, "It seems to me I can. I know he does and will do right."

Question, "Do you think you love God for what he is in himself ?" Answer, "I hope I do."

Question, "If God should reject and cast you off forever, do you think you should still love him ?" Answer, "I should have the same reason to love him for what he is in himself, as I should if he should make me happy, and it seems to me I should love him then as much as I now do."

Question, "Do you feel willing to be eternally separated from God, and banished his presence forever ?" Answer, "No, I do not ; but if I should be, God would still be, a just and good being, for I deserve his wrath forever."

To another it was said, "When I asked you a few months ago, what you thought would become of you, if you was then to die, you told me you hoped it would be well with you ; but you did not, at that time, give the reason of your hope ; what do you think of yourself now ?" Answer, "I think, sir, if I had died when you spoke to me before, I should have been in misery now ; for I then deceived myself ; but I hope I am not deceived now, and think, if I should leave the world at this time, I should go to rest."

Question, "But you say you have been

"deceived, and what reason have you to believe your present hope is not that of the hypocrite, which will fail you when God shall take away the soul ?" Answer, "I have views and feelings now, which I never had before. I never had such views of God and Christ and holiness, as I now have : I never wished to enjoy God and Christ as I now do."

Question, "Are you so confident of your good estate, as that you are not afraid to die ?" Answer,

"Sometimes I am, and sometimes I am not, and sometimes I feel as if I wished I was dead."

Question, "Do you ever feel a willingness to leave your relations and companions and friends, and now in the days of your youth lie down in the cold and silent grave ?" Answer, "Yes sometimes I do."

Question, "But why do you not feel so at all times ?" Answer, "Sometimes

I am afraid I do not love Christ in sincerity, and then I am afraid to die ; but at other times, I have such views of Christ, and he appears so glorious and lovely, that I have a desire to be gone, that I might be with him, and love him more and serve him better, than I do, or can while I live in this world."

To another, who expressed a desire to profess Christ and commune at his table, it was said, "Do you think yourself worthy to come to the table of the Lord ?"

The answer was, "No, I know I am not ; but the dogs eat of the crumbs which fall from their masters table, and this, sir, is what I wish to be permitted to do. I think it my duty to confess Christ before men ; and as unworthy as I am, I have a desire to commune with him at his table."

Question, "Do you feel a love for holiness,

2. hungering and thirsting after righteousness, a relish for and delight in the duties of religion?"

Answer, "Yes, above any thing in the world. I used to think I took pleasure in being in young company, in attending balls and other amusements; but I now find more satisfaction in reading the bible, conversing upon religion, and attending religious duties, than in any thing else; and have more pleasure in attending one religious meeting, than I ever took in all the balls I ever attended. And altho' I have read the bible through several times, I never open it now, but I find something new in it, something I never saw before."

To another it was said, "Do you find by experience that Christ's yoke is easy, and his burden light; his ways pleasant, and his paths peace?" Answer, "Yes, and I now believe there is no real happiness in any other way, than in walking with God, and keeping his commandments. I have lived a number of years in the world, without God, and without attending to the duties of religion, or practising godliness, and then tho't myself happy; but I never knew what happiness was, until of late; and have enjoyed more real happiness, within a few months, or even weeks, than I ever enjoyed, in all my life before."

Another said, "I never, until of late, knew what friendship meant; I never loved and enjoyed my friends and acquaintance, as I now do. I wish to do them all the good I can, and want they should experience the power of godliness, and taste and see how good the Lord is. I lately attended public worship upon the sabbath, in a neighboring town; the minister preached a very serious and good sermon, and appeared to feel the importance of what he said; but many of the hearers, especially of the young people, were very inattentive, and some of them very rude. O, how did I wish some word spoken by the preacher, might reach their consciences, and some arrow prick their hearts, check their levity, and make them serious! To see a minister, spending his strength for nought, and young people trifling and playing in the house of God, gave me very disagreeable feelings; and if my heart does not deceive me, I wish all may be saved."

Another said, "In early life I was thoughtful about religion, and for many years past, had a great desire to profess Christ, and commune at his table. But doubts and fears, respecting my preparedness for transactions so solemn and important, always kept me back, until of late, when my mind hath been so strongly impressed with a sense of its being my duty, I could refrain no longer. I therefore publicly gave up myself to God, and the same day communed at the Lord's table; but not without fear and trembling, lest I should eat and drink unworthily. The night following, as I lay in bed, meditating upon what I had done, examining myself, and praying to God, that he would lead me in the way everlasting, I suddenly had such manifestations of God and Christ and such a time of refreshing as I never had before. It seemed as if I beheld heaven opened, and Christ standing on the right hand of God. Not that I saw any thing with my bodily eyes, the whole was mental. God appeared glorious in holiness, and as an absolute sovereign, and Christ an able and willing Saviour. My heart appeared at once reconciled

• to God, and I seemed to have no
 • choice of my own, but wholly re-
 • signed to God ; and my will swal• lowed up in his will. Christ ap• peared both able and willing to save
 • me, as unworthy as I was. I
 • now experienced such joy as I • never did before. I attempted to • describe it to a friend in bed with
 • me, but it was joy unspeakably
 • great, joy unutterable. My whole • soul seemed to be swallowed up in • viewing God and Christ, without • reflecting I had, or ever should
 • have any interest in either of them.
 • I rejoiced in God and rejoiced in • Christ, on account of the glorious
 • beauty and excellencies, which I • saw in them. From that moment,
 • I have felt a sweet calmness and • serenity of mind. I seem to have
 • no will of my own, but my will
 • bowed to the will of God, in life
 • and death, for time and for eterni• ty. I feel as if I could cheerful• ly leave myself, and all I have,
 • with God, for him to do with me
 • and them, as he thinks best ; be-
 • ing fully assured he will do right.
 • If I am finally saved, it will be of
 • his sovereign mercy and grace,
 • through the atonement of Christ ;
 • and if I am finally lost, God will
 • be just and good, and the faulty • cause of my perdition lie at my • own door. This Lord's day
 • night, and the ravishing views I
 • then had, I shall never forget ;
 • and my daily prayer is that I may
 • have times of refreshing from the • presence of the Lord ; and that I
 • may be more conformed to God,
 • in the temper of my mind, and
 • have more of the Spirit of Christ."

Another said, " As I was walk• ing to the house of God upon the • sabbath, I saw a number of little
 • worms, swimming about in a small
 • brook ; I stopped and viewed • them, and said to myself, how in-
 • nocent and happy are these worms

• compared with such a sinful wretch
 • as I am. They never dishonored
 • the God that made them, as I
 • have done. They never slighted
 • the Saviour, nor grieved the Ho• ly Spirit of God, as I have done.
 • They never committed the sins I
 • have. O ! how mean and vile I • am ! I am meaner and viler
 • than the meanest and most con• temptible worm. How wonder• ful and astonishing that God
 • should suffer such an unworthy,
 • ill-deserving creature as I am to • live in his world, to tread upon
 • his earth, or breathe his air. I • deserved to have been shut up in • hell long ago, and yet I am still a • prisoner of hope : Oh ! the • goodness and long-suffering of
 • God, and the ingratitude and
 • wickedness of hardened sinners ! "

I shall now subjoin a few ex• tracts from some letters, sent to • particular friends. They were not
 • written with a view of being seen
 • by any but the persons to whom
 • they were addressed. One writes
 • thus, " Dear Friend, Do let me • know how you do, and what
 • you are doing, I am more con• cerned for my friends now than • ever ; am more fond of their • company and conversation ; and
 • yet at times, love retirement,
 • and enjoy myself very well
 • alone. How thankful should
 • we be, that we are made rational
 • creatures, capable of enjoying
 • social happiness ? Do we consid• er from whom we receive our
 • blessings, and the obligations we
 • are under to live devoted to the • giver ? When we give to God
 • the dew of our youth, he will be • pleased with the offering. A • flower offered in the bud is an ac• ceptable sacrifice."

Again, the same writes, " Dear • Friend, The spring is now open• ing, the snow dissolving, the ' streams murmuring over the pebbles, the lambs skipping in the meadows, and the birds on the branches straining their little throats in melodious songs; all speak, in different ways, their maker's praise. Should not we, who are endowed with reason, join in praising the creator; even the mute creation would find a voice, and upbraid our silence. Let us in our youth attend to the one thing needful. Now is the best time to lay in store a good foundation against the time to come. It is written, remember now thy creator in the days of thy youth. And now is the accepted time. If you ask, what this world is, and what the pleasures of it are? I answer, vanity of vanities, all is vanity. There is no real and substantial happiness in the enjoyment of any thing this world affords. If your ideas of this world are the same with mine, then

" Whilst the busy croud,
 " The vain, the wealthy & the proud,
 " In folly's maze advance,
 " Tho' singularity and pride,
 " Be call'd our lot,
 " We'll step aside,
 " Nor join the giddy dance."

The same writes again, " I retire from company, to converse alone with one I love; for so I call writing to a friend. What privileges have we which thousands are denied? We have kind parents to instruct us, are taught to write, and thus to converse with absent friends. Let us improve our advantages and cultivate our minds in early life. Doing this will render us dutiful children and faithful friends; render the path through life pleasing, and a death-bed easy. When I hear people complaining of their misfortunes and hard' ships, I often say in my heart, ' alas, there is no cause of complaint, but the highest reason for gratitude and praise. Nature is eloquent in praising the creator.

" But man alone intent to stray,
 " Ever turns from wisdom's way.

' Until you see me, do think of me or think of something better. ' Adieu."

Another writes thus. " Dear friend, I now sit down to tell you what hath taken place with me this present week. On Wednesday evening, I was thoughtful and very serious, and after attentively listening to some religious conversation between two friends, I retired to rest, with my mind deeply impressed, and lay sometime in bed, wetting my pillow with tears. This was not the first time, my mind hath been fixed on, and my thoughts swallowed up with things of another world; and I have sometimes entertained a hope, I experienced the power of godliness in my childhood. But now on a sudden, my sins were set in order before me and seemed to stare me in the face; and my heart was so pricked I could not lie still. I used to think, I had a desire to embrace Christ, and partake of gospel blessings. But I now experienced views and feelings, such as I never did before; and was afraid to close my eyes in sleep; for I thought nothing kept me from the pit of endless perdition, but the slender and brittle thread of life. What shall I do? was now the language of my heart. If the righteous are scarcely saved, where shall the ungodly and the sinner appear! If I attempted to pray, these words were in my mind, the prayer of the wicked is abominable tion to the Lord. I then said to myself, what can I, or what shall I do? I am wretched, and wretched I must be. I deserve nothing but the frowns and wrath of the Almighty. Better would it have been for me, if I had not been born. At this time, my views, exercises and feelings were such as I cannot express; they were such as I never had before. But at this moment, my heart breathed out the prayer of the publican, who thought himself unworthy to lift up so much as his eyes to heaven; God be merciful to me a sinner. Immediately upon this, I appeared to myself, to be lost, for a short space; I believe it was not more than a minute or two, but I do not know how long it was, nor what passed, during a time, for whether I was in the body or out I cannot tell. But as soon as I came to myself, I did from my heart, give up my myself, both soul and body, to him who gave me being.* After I had thus given myself up to God, being much fatigued, and having had but very little sleep, since Monday night, I fell asleep; and when I awoke, found my mind more at ease, than it was before. But I seemed to myself, to be a new creature. I could not tell how I was altered, but I tho't, surely I am not the same person I used to be. In the forenoon of Thursday, while I was about my common domestic concerns, many tears fell from my eyes; not because I was concerned about the salvation of my own soul; but, O! the goodness of God! In the afternoon, I attended a

* "Torrents of grief can ne'er repay,
"The debt of love I owe;
"Here, Lord, I gave myself to thee,
"This all that I can do."

sacramental lecture; and heard a sermon from these words, Jesus, when he had cried again with a loud voice, yielded up the Ghost. The words of the text, affected my heart, and the sermon seemed to do my soul good. He died for sinners! Happy are those that trust in him! In the evening I attended a religious meeting; and what I heard, was to me, as cold water to a thirsty soul. During most of the day, I had by turns doubts and fears respecting my future state. But at night, felt as if I could trust myself in the hands of God, and having committed myself to his keeping, gave myself to sleep, saying, I will both lay me down in peace and sleep; for thou Lord makest me to dwell in safety. I spent most of the forepart of Friday in reading and writing, and in the afternoon, began to entertain a hope I had seen and been with Jesus, who hath said, those that seek me early shall find me. To-day, viz. Saturday, my hope is strong; and I believe, if God ever did pour his Spirit into my heart, he did it last Wednesday evening. But at that time I thought of no such thing. My prayer now is, that God, for Jesus' sake would pour out his Spirit upon all flesh."

In narrating the preceding conversations and extracts, the narrator, hath not confined himself wholly to the modes of expression, and forms of speech made use of by the speakers and writers; but hath endeavored to retain the true sense and meaning of every particular sentence, and as far as he could consistently with rules of propriety, hath confined himself to the original words and phrases.

During the time the awakening continued, sports and pastimes, and ceremonious visits, were generally discontinued; and the ball-room so far unoccupied, that the musician feared his craft was in danger, and his hopes of gain were gone. And in those days, the word of the Lord, both read and preached, was precious. In some houses, where the bible was kept heretofore useless in the book-case it might now be seen, lying in the most convenient places, for frequent use. To many it appeared a new book, whenever they opened it they always found something new in it, something they had never seen, or never attended to before; and preaching appeared new to many; yea, the old sermons they had heard before, were new, and they were ready to imagine they never heard such excellent sermons before.

Although much time was spent in religious exercises, such as reading, attending lectures, and other religious meetings, yet in such a manner did those who were serious economise and redeem time that it was believed by unbiaffed and candid observers, that worldly business did not suffer by means of the religious attention.

A good number of families who had always lived without calling upon God either morning or evening, are now devout worshippers.

To see or hear of such revivals of religion and times of reformation, must refresh and gladden the hearts of all the godly; and excite the children of Zion, while they rejoice in their king, and in the prosperity of his kingdom, to pray without ceasing, that he would hasten the time, even the set time for the accomplishment of all those glorious things spoken of in prophecy, concerning the enlargement, peace, prosperity and glory of Christianity. When the enemy shall come in like a flood, the spirit of the Lord shall set up a standard against him; but for this he will be enquired of by the house of Israel. And with what freedom and importunity may God's spiritual Israel address the throne of grace for so rich a blessing! Thus saith the holy one of Israel and his maker, "ask of me concerning my sons, and concerning the work of my hands, command ye me." Nor did he ever say to the seed of Jacob, "seek ye me in vain."

"He frees the souls condemn'd to death,
"And when his saints complain,
"It shan't be said that praying breath,
"Was ever spent in vain."

He that shall come, faith, behold I come quickly. Amen, even so come, Lord Jesus!

I am, Gentlemen, with considerations of high esteem,
yours, &c.

SIMON WATERMAN.

Plymouth, (Con.) Feb. 1, 1801.

Admonitions from the Death-Bed.

NUMBER I.

IN my early life, I was witness to an extraordinary instance of clear views and triumphing joy and hope in a dying person. I was then so young that I cannot distinctly recollect the descriptions which he gave of his faith and hopes, but remember the deep impressions they made on my own mind; and I was thereby led to reflect much on the evidence in favor of truth and religion which may be collected from the views, the hopes and the fears of those who feel their near approach to the eternal world. This determined me, at the commencement of my ministry, to note in my diary, extraordinary instances of conviction, fear, or joy which I should observe in the close of life. The result has been somewhat different from the sanguine opinions of my youth; for I was then ready to conclude that men's eternal state might always be determined from their apprehensions on the known approach of death. Since that time, I have seen a few instances of most hardened stupidity, and souls departing without any sense of sin, guilt and an approaching judgment; but these were persons who had either been notorious for crimes, or who, governed by a detestable avarice, had maintained some visible decency of conduct, that under this disguise they might make the unwary their prey. I have also seen a few, for whom I had a charitable hope, departing in darkness. Many have I seen close their time of trial either in a state of delirium, or stupified by disease and medicine, so as to have little knowledge of what passed between the first attack of pain and their appearance at the bar of God. Such instances as these are a solemn warning not to postpone our preparation for another world to the time of sickness and death.

But altho there may be many such cases, in which the scene of death presents nothing but stupidity or distraction; I yet believe that the state of men's minds at that hour is often such as affords a solemn and weighty argument for the reality and importance of religion and divine truth. Then the appetites are cooled;—then the world and all its pleasures and interests appear in their true light;—then the mind solemnly pauses and considers, and consideration is most favorable to rational and sincere conviction. If many, who behold such scenes with stupidity, did but feel that they must soon be in a similar situation, they would not fail to tremble for their own state. Under these impressions, and with a love for the souls of men, I shall occasionally select from the notes I have preserved, and communicate an account of sundry persons whose state of mind, in the prospect of death, deeply impressed me, and from which I collected much evidence for the reality of truths, which are doubted by some in this day of scepticism.

The first instance which I shall relate was my last interview with an aged and dying Christian Minister. This good man had passed a long life in a faithful discharge of the duties of his ministry. Wherever known he was loved and respected; and among the serious people of his own charge, and the neighboring churches, he was almost venerated. His conversation was exemplary; his heart affectionate and pious; his preaching was on the great doctrines of the gospel—the wisdom and holiness of God in the redemption of sinners—the excellency and sufficiency of a crucified Jesus—and the nature and necessity of Christian holiness.

By particular request, I repeated a visit to this good man near the close of his life. On entering his room he said, “I have sent for you, to tell you how great a sinner may trust and even rejoice in the sovereign mercy of God, and also to charge you to be a faithful minister of Christ.” Afterwards, as he found strength and opportunity, he said nearly the following things. “You behold in me one of the greatest of sinners; and if divine sovereignty had not prevented, according to my abilities to do evil, I should have been the very greatest. God placed me under the restraints of his providence, and I sometimes hope of his grace, in my early youth. But how unworthy have I been! How little have I done for the glory of God! What a stupid heart I have had! I wonder how I have been able to hope with so many imperfections and sins as have been crowded into my life; but still I feel myself strangely drawn to trust and rejoice in free mercy. I am more than ever amazed at free grace! I must also love that justice which condemns me. Eternity will be short enough to praise the justice and the free grace which are now my only support.—Oh, how deficient I have been in my ministry, and how feebly I have pressed truth on the hearts and consciences of sinners! Now I can only pray for them, and at times God hath given me a precious freedom in this duty.”

On hearing these expressions of unworthiness, from one who had been so faithful in his ministry, and such an example of piety, I was confounded. My short experience in the ministerial life, and in Christian knowledge, did not enable me to give an answer; nor had I then a just conception what a deep sense of sin and unworthiness is found in those who excel most in true godliness. He then added, “But my principal desire was to charge you to be faithful to God and to the souls of men. I am going, but you may yet live many years; and you cannot conceive, until a prospect of death assails you, how solemn an account ministers of the gospel will have to give, of the people of their charge. If a world of earthly things were committed to your charge, it would comparatively be nothing—but it is souls—immortal souls, which must be happy or miserable forever. If you can conceive the worth of one soul, it will help you to feel the importance of your work. You will have many temptations; but never cease praying to God to discover them, and to strengthen you. Let not the fear of man entice you to disguise the truth; for many have been caught in that snare. You will be faithful to declare the whole truth no longer than you fear God more than man, and can trust in him to protect you against those who will be your enemies for the truth’s sake. Forget yourself in doing God’s service. Look on me and remember what it will be to die. In such an hour as this, you will find no excuse for a want of faithfulness; nor can you die in peace without some degree of your master’s presence. Preach the doctrines of grace in such a manner as to show the nature and necessity of holiness. Those precious doctrines which I have feebly taught are now my only support. A Saviour of infinite holiness is truly worth having, for he hath merit; he can cleanse his people, and it will be blessedness enough to behold and serve him.”

After several stops, through pain and weakness, he added; “The people with whom I have lived lie heavy on my heart. Some of them I hope to meet in that glory, which I cannot but hope God will give to me, the most undeserving of all sinners; but too many of them have opposed those peculiar doctrines of the gospel which I now find by experience are the only ground of hope for a dying sinner. Oh, how I am pained at my heart for these people! I charge you, my young brother, when you may occasionally be with them, to carry this my dying testimony to their ears, and assure them, that those who do not believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and live in all holy conversation and godliness, cannot be saved. But all strength fails me." In a short time after, this faithful servant of Christ was received to the reward of his labors.

This scene deeply impressed my mind with a sense, how solemn the appearance of a Christian minister must be before the tribunal of his Lord and Master, and what it will be to answer for souls. To every minister of religion the Lord says, "Son of man, I have made thee a watchman unto the house of Israel. When I say unto the wicked, thou shalt surely die; and thou givest him not warning, nor speakest to warn the wicked from his wicked way, to save his life; the same wicked man shall die in his iniquity; but his blood will I require at thine hand." To every Christian minister a dispensation of the gospel of Jesus Christ is committed.

I have made this communication, hoping that it may be seriously read, and that all to whom it appertains may enter into a fresh and solemn enquiry into their faithfulness to Christ and the souls of men. Such ought to enquire, with much prayer, Whether they preach the gospel with all plainness and power, as it was taught by Christ and his Apostles? Whether, unbiassed by prejudice and the fear of men, they declare the whole counsel of God? Whether they denounce the terrors of the law to all ungodly ones, and apply the gospel encouragements only on those strict terms of renovation by the grace of God, faith, repentance, and a holy life to which all the promises are limited? Whether they have been willing to spend and be spent in the service of the church? Whether they have recommended religion by their example, while they exhorted Christians to godliness and a pure life, and sinners to repentance? And finally, Whether on a dying bed they could say, "Wherefore I take you to record this day, that I am pure from the blood of all men: For I have not shunned to declare unto you all the counsel of God."

PRESBUTEROS.

Letter from Matilda to Maria.

MY DEAR MARIA,
YOU give me inexpressible pleasure in the information, that you are in some degree awakened to the importance of the salvation of immortal souls. Angels desire to look into the glorious mystery. It ought to be the joy of a fallen world; but alas! how few are sensible of its excellence? A happy few see and feel its importance, and rejoice that the power, and glory of God are manifested, and that the incarnation of Deity, will be the joy of all holy beings, and their praise, throughout a never-ending and ever-blessed eternity.

Religion is a divine principle, influencing the whole moral conduct; its simple and determinate sense is love to God, and good will to mankind. This is the sum of all religion; without it, vain were the oblations of the Jewish Church, vain are the ceremonials of Christians!

The love of God is that sentiment of reverence and of gratitude which ought to arise in every mind, when reflecting on one Supreme beneficent power, who is the immediate author of all good, and the foundation of all perfection. Lovingly is early piety, and precious are the promises annexed to it. Your heavenly Father can make the outgoings of the morning and evening to rejoice; he can irradiate every scene, and cheer you with a sense of his ever-blessed presence;

he can brighten the sunshine of prosperity, and perfume with sweet incense the sacrifices made to virtue.

You wish to know, my dear young friend, if religion is not a melancholy service? Ask those who love their God, if they would exchange even the tears of repentance for all the noisy mirth of fools? Ask them, when they approach his presence with sweet and humble confidence, and are sensible of near and intimate communion with him, if a world would not be bought too dear, if they should barter their joys for all it holds in estimation? What are the feelings of a repenting sinner, when viewing the love of God to a fallen world? Exactly suited to every wish of an enlightened soul is an offered Saviour. It wants nothing else. Upon the blessed terms of the gospel it desires to receive him; and chiefly because the glory is all his own; and, as it secures the honor of the divine government; and humbles the creature, sweetly bends his stubborn will, and brings every power and faculty of the soul into submission to that will, on which hangs the blessedness of the universe. How safe, how secure is that happy soul, which renouncing every dependence on itself, on its own miserable attainments, can rest on the perfect, immaculate righteousness of God himself? For Deity became incarnate, and as the sinner's substitute performed every jot and tittle of the law, and even rendered it more honorable. Therefore when conscience accuses, when that law denounces its curses, the sinner may plead what Jesus has done and suffered on earth, and what he is now doing in heaven; and may rest on that blessed foundation, a foundation secure as the perfections of an ever-living God.

MATILDA.

Report of the Trustees of the Missionary Society of Connecticut.

(Continued from p. 36.)

THE Trustees congratulate the Society on the flourishing situation of their funds and the increasing liberality with which the people of the state contribute to the support of missions. From the list of the contributions in the several parishes in the state on the first sabbath of May last, herewith transmitted, the Society will observe that they amount to a very considerable sum more than in any preceding year. This is a most pleasing circumstance as it shows that the people of the state are disposed to aid the Missionary Society, in their exertions to advance the cause of truth and piety. It is also a circumstance which should call forth emotions of gratitude to that God, who has the hearts of all men at his disposal, and from whose spirit it proceeds that any are led to exercise pity and compassion towards their suffering fellow-men, and to contribute of their earthly substance to the relief of those less favored than themselves.

From the Treasurer's account of receipts and expenditures since the publication of the narrative last winter, together with the statement subjoined to the narrative, it will be seen that within the past year several donations have been made to the Society, that a considerable sum has been contributed in the new settlements and paid to the Missionaries, and that the permanent fund is increasing, having amounted to upwards of 1200 dollars. To this fund a large addition is expected to be made within a few months from the profits of the Connecticut Evangelical Magazine, the Trustees having been informed by the Editors of said Magazine that the profits for the first year, provided punctual payment is made, will probably exceed 1500 dollars. This sum added to that now on hand will make the permanent fund upwards of 2700 dollars. The Trustees are also informed that the Rev. Doctor Dwight proposes to give to the Society, in aid to the establishment of a permanent fund, twenty dollars on every thousand copies of the Psalm-book, now publishing by him, which shall be sold. The money which may be expected to arise from this source, together with the profits of the Connecticut Evangelical Magazine, should the work continue to be published with the present number of subscribers, and other donations will, it is hoped, in a few years, increase the fund to a respectable amount.

With a view of further increasing the permanent fund the Trustees have directed that all donations which have been or may hereafter be made to the Society, exclusively of the annual contributions of the people of the State, be appropriated to the establishment of a permanent fund, where not otherwise especially appropriated by the donors; and that the interest of the permanent fund be added to the principal, until otherwise ordered by the Board.

The time having elapsed for which contributions were granted by a resolve of the General Assembly of the State passed in the year 1798, the Trustees in compliance with the 5th article of the Constitution of the Society, which directs them to "adopt such measures, from time to time, for raising funds, as they shall judge to be expedient," thought it their duty to apply for a renewal of the grant. They accordingly presented a memorial to the Honorable Legislature, at their last session, which was granted, and a resolve passed authorizing contributions for three years.

With a view of further promoting the designs of the Society, the Trustees have opened a correspondence with several Missionary Societies in Europe and America; one particular object of which correspondence, as respects the Societies in the United States, is to adopt measures in concurrence with them to prevent a disproportionate number of Missionaries being sent to the same part of the country. Answers to their letters have not yet been received except from the Society for propagating the gospel, established at Boston. That Society employs several Missionaries among a few small tribes of Indians still left in the State of Massachusetts, and among the new settlements in the Province of Maine. Their Missionaries will not interfere with those sent out from this State.

The Trustees continue to receive letters from various parts of the States of New-York and Vermont, expressing the gratitude of the inhabitants to the Missionary Society and people of Connecticut, for their generous exertions to favour them with the preaching of the gospel and the administration of Christian ordinances. They mention that their scattered situation and other circumstances peculiar to new settlements, will necessarily render them unable for a considerable time to settle a competent number of ministers among them. They therefore solicit the further exertions of the society on their behalf. The Trustees have thought it proper again to present an address to the inhabitants of the new settlements, in which they have called up their attention to the subject of assisting in the support of Missionaries by contributions among themselves so far as their circumstances shall permit.

Having given this detail of their proceedings, the Trustees close their report by commending the important concerns of the Society to Almighty God, praying that he would appear to build up Zion, and fill the earth with righteousness and peace.

In the name of the Trustees,

ABEL FLINT, Secretary.
Hartford, June 10th, 1801.

MESS'RS. EDITORS,

THE following is a narration of the hopeful conversion of a young person in the 24th year of his age, in one of the late religious revivals, in New-England. It was written by himself, without any idea of its ever appearing in public. If it is thought it will be for the spiritual edification of your readers, you are at liberty to put it into the Magazine, you have it in the original, unstudied simplicity of the author's own words, as follows :

" I had some serious impressions, when I was about ten, or twelve years old ; but was in general careless, and thoughtless. My attention was in some measure, called up again when I was about fifteen ; but I soon grew stupid, and lived, for the most part, as the world in general do, until I was about twenty-two, when my attention was in a considerable manner called up to the important things of eternity. I saw that I was exposed to hell, that I had been a sinner, and that I had lived a wicked life. I thought I must try to mend my ways by breaking off from all my evil conduct. I endeavoured to build up a righteousness of my own ; but was finally convinced that I could not recommend myself to the favor of God. This caused me great distress. But my convictions gradually decreased, and I became somewhat thoughtless concerning a future state, for about a year, when my eyes were in some measure opened to see on what foundation I was standing. I again tried to do something to help myself. I was careful to attend religious meetings, and to read the Bible ; and often retired in secret to pray. But I found I was not sincere in my pretended duties ; but that my heart was in opposition to the very things I asked for ; that I had no desire for any thing that was good, but that my heart was full of iniquity, that every thing that I did was all self. It appeared to me that I was in the hand of a sovereign God, and that he would do with me as he pleased. I saw that I was justly condemned to hell. That it was nothing but the abused patience of God, that kept me from destruction. I saw that my own weight was more than enough to carry me down, as soon as God withdrew his supporting hand. Time appeared to me exceeding short. Eternity seemed to be at the door. I tried every way to do something towards preparing for the scenes that were before me, but found that I lay at the mere mercy of God ; and all the curses of his word were out against me. I was condemned by God, and man. It seemed to me that I was a burden to all creation. I saw my danger to be awful ! I was at times filled with great distress, having a guilty conscience and a stubborn will. I saw that my will barred me from good ; and that it was so stubborn that nothing but almighty power could bow it. I sometimes thought that I had sinned away the day of grace, and that there was no mercy for me. I had at times such a sense of the dismal condition of those, that should fall under the wrath of God, and the wrath of God appeared so terrible, that it seemed as if I could not endure the sight. I had at times such a sense of the immediate presence of God, that it would take away my strength. I felt that he saw my heart, and I could not get out of his presence, but his all-seeing eye was upon me. I saw that the presence of God would be hell to me. I could not bear the sight of his children: I hated the sight of all that loved God. I seldom saw a beast, or any kind of creature, but that I longed to be in their place. I saw I ought immediately to repent, and believe the gospel. It seemed to me that I ought to suffer eternal punishment for not that moment accepting of offered mercy. I now saw and felt that all I had done was nothing, and worse than nothing: that I grew more stubborn and chose the way to hell. And though I could not bear the thought of being in the hands of a sovereign God, yet it seemed to me that all the hope I had, was in the sovereignty of God, and election.

I saw I should never come of myself, my will was such, but if ever I was saved it must be of the mere mercy of God; yet I could not endure the thought of accepting of mercy as a free gift. I felt so proud and stubborn, that I could not be willing to come down at the feet of Jesus. But it pleased God as I hope to bow this stubborn and rebellious will; and to give me sweet resignation to his divine will.

I thought then that I could rejoice that the Lord reigned; that I was in his hand, as the clay was in the hand of the potter. It seemed to me that the desire of my soul was that God might be glorified, and his kingdom built up. I now saw great beauty in the way of salvation by Christ, as it was so calculated to humble the creature, in the dust before God. I thought I could rejoice to be nothing, that God might be all. This world appeared like God's world, and every thing in it spake forth his praise. I now thought I loved his word, and his image wherever I saw it; and rejoiced that God would bring me into judgment, and that I should be judged according to the deeds done in the body. I feel at times great pity, for those that are out of Christ, to see them going on to destruction, many of them without concern. But I think it is a comfort that they are in the hands of God, and that I am in his hands, and at his disposal who hath infinite wisdom, and cannot do other ways than right."

QUESTIONS.

MESS'RS. EDITORS,

SINCE one important object of your useful Magazine is "expositions of difficult or doubtful passages of scripture," one of your readers desires an answer to the following questions, on the prophecy, Isaiah xlix. 22, 23. "Thus saith the Lord God, behold, I will lift up my hand to the Gentiles, and set up my standard to the people: and they shall bring thy sons in their arms, and thy daughters shall be carried upon their shoulders. And Kings shall be thy nursing fathers, and their Queens thy nursing mothers: they shall bow down to thee with their face towards the earth, and lick up the dust of thy feet; and thou shalt know that I am the Lord: for they shall not be ashamed that wait for me."

Quest. 1st. Does not this prophecy pointedly respect the times of the most pure state of the Christian Church, on earth?

2d. Does it not pointedly promise, that, in those happy times, kings, or civil rulers and their queens shall be nursing parents of the Christian church, being themselves examples of evangelical piety, and sought for, among other qualifications, on that account?

3d. In what sense is it to be understood, that kings or civil rulers shall then be nursing fathers of the church?

A. B.

Religious Intelligence.

Extract from the proceedings of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, in the United States of America, at their session May 1801.

"The Assembly having heard a circumstantial narrative, from almost every one of its members, on the state of religion in his own charge, and in other places to which his observation had extended, are of opinion, that in general the cause of religion has been progressive, and in some places eminently so. In some places infidelity does not assume that bold and threatening aspect which it did for some years past, but seems to be in some measure abated and disposed to retire into its former state of concealment. In some instances avowed and inveterate enemies to Christianity have been remarkably converted, and have become, to all appearance, sincere and lively Christians.

"From many of their churches the General Assembly have heard the most pleasing accounts of the state of vital piety. Revivals, of a more or less general nature, have taken place in many parts, and multitudes have been added to the church. In the northern and eastern Presbyteries, there appears, in several congregations, a serious attention to the great things of religion; and its interests appear evidently to be advancing. In several of their churches, times of refreshing from the presence of the Lord have been experienced. Sinners have been brought to repentance, and saints have been comforted and edified. And these pleasing appearances in some instances still continue. From the west the Assembly have received intelligence of the most interesting nature. On the borders of Kentucky and Tennessee, the influences of the spirit of God seem to have been manifested in a very extraordinary manner. Many circumstances attending this work are unusual: And though it is probable that some irregularities may have taken place; yet, from the information which the Assembly have received, they cannot but exceedingly rejoice in the abundant evidence given them, that God has visited that people, and poured out his spirit remarkably upon them.

"In the middle and southern Presbyteries appearances are not so encouraging. For though in some of their churches religion flourishes, yet in many others, the wise and foolish virgins are slumbering together; iniquity abounds and the love of many waxes cold. Ignorance, vice and infidelity do, in many parts of our country, still prevail.

“The new settlements on our frontiers appear very desirous to have the gospel preached among them, and our Missionaries who have visited them do not appear to have labored without success. Good impressions have, not unfrequently, been made, and churches are rapidly forming, which will soon need settled pastors.

“The intelligence which the Assembly have received from the Heathen tribes is very pleasing, viz.

“That there is amongst them a willingness, yea an ardent desire, to have the gospel preached to them: Their prejudices seem to be removed, and many important obstacles are surmounted. Some of their chief men have offered to commit their sons to Presbyteries and Missionary Societies, in order that they may be instructed, not only in the arts of civilized life, but also in the principles of the Christian religion,

“The prospect of the conversion of the Indians is now more flattering than it has ever been before. The wilderness already begins to bud, and it is hoped will soon blossom like the rose. The solitary cottage of the wandering savage will, the Assembly trust, be soon gladdened by the reception of the glorious Redeemer, with whom there is no difference between the Jew and the Greek, between the barbarous and refined; for he is the Saviour of all men, and the propitiation not only for our sins, but for the sins of the whole world.”

Extract of a letter from a pious Christian in Vermont to his brother in Connecticut, Dated New-Haven (Vermont) June 7th, 1801.

“Dear Brother,

I have not written to you for some time, because I knew not what to write concerning religion;

the state of it appeared so gloomy. Professors, I hope, for some time have felt the importance of religion, and have been mourning and confessing their sins and the sins of the people; and pleading that a prayer-hearing and sin-pardoning God would, of his infinite sovereign mercy appear for us, and give us hearts to break off our sins by righteousness, and our iniquities by turning to God. And, forever praised be his name! We hope God has heard their groanings and answered their desires in a degree. Sometime the beginning of March, a Universalist came into these parts and preached two sabbaths and a number of lectures. People flocked to hear him and seemed to fall in with those sentiments so pleasing to sinful human nature. The people of God were alarmed. The enquiry was, what shall be done? Some thought best vigorously to dispute the point with the doubting. Others thought the time might be better spent in carrying our case to God; and never did we feel the necessity of a wise, faithful, understanding minister so much as at this time; and I believe there never was a time when more fervent desires went up to the throne of grace that God would appear and vindicate his own cause.

“About the middle of March, Mr. Bushnell, a pious Missionary from Connecticut, came into this place, and his coming was like the coming of Titus. He preached two sabbaths; administered the sacrament of the Lord's supper; attended a church conference; preached a number of lectures, and I think I never saw a more solemn time than our communion day. Heaven seemed to glow in the countenance of professors: Spectators appeared solemn as the grave; many weeping, and some seemed to show by their countenances that they wished to come and taste and see that the Lord was good. Soon the enquiry began to be, What shall we do to be saved? We had kept up conferences in our neighborhood for more than a year; but our numbers were few. Now they began to increase, and I believe have increased every week since. I do not mean to represent the attention to be general, though I hope there is a good number in this place and in Middlebury that are seriously impressed in their minds, and some we hope have chosen the better part.

“Mr. Bushnell went from this place to the northward, and was absent about seven weeks. He preached in this town last sabbath and spent the week here. He is to preach the next sabbath at Monkton and the sabbath after at Middlebury, where he expects to administer the ordinance of the Lord’s supper. He tells us that the gentle rain of the spirit is descending on a number of towns to the northward, viz. Essex, Georgia, and some others.

“Thus I have given you a short account of our situation as it respects religion at present, and it is with a mixture of joy and fear. I think I can rejoice at what the Lord has done in our land, in the course of a few years past, and that he has of his own goodness and mercy, condescended, to come and knock at the doors of our hearts, by his holy and blessed spirit, in these parts. But I fear lest many of us should be so dreadfully wicked, as to shut the door against the kind Saviour. But it all depends upon God and, thanks to his name! he will accomplish all his glorious purposes of grace; and may he, of his great mercy, carry on that blessed work, so full of the glory of God and blessings to man; and cause it to spread till it cover the earth as the waters cover the sea.”

MISSIONARIES.

In April last, the Rev. Timothy Woodbridge, returned from a mission of three months to the towns on the western shores of lakes George and Champlain. He was sent out by the Missionary Society in Berkshire. From several settlements which he visited he brings back reports, truly encouraging to those who are laboring and praying for the enlargement of the Redeemer’s kingdom.

About the first of June the Rev. Aaron Bascom was sent out, by the same Society, on a mission of three months to the counties of Onondaga and Cayuga and to the settlements on Black river.

The Missionaries now in the service of the Missionary Society of Connecticut are, the Rev. Messrs. Job Swift and Josiah Bushnell in the northwestern parts of Vermont, and the northern counties of New-York; the Rev. Seth Williston in the county of Tioga; and the Rev. Joseph Badger in New-Connecticut. The Rev. Jeremiah Hallock has lately entered on a mission to the northeastern parts of Vermont. Another Missionary will soon be sent to New-Connecticut, one to the southern range of Counties in the western part of New-York, and one to the settlements on Black river, &c. The Rev. Messrs. David Higgs and Holland Weeks are appointed Missionaries. Whether they will go is uncertain.

The Missionary Society of Massachusetts have voted to employ four Missionaries the present season, two in the Province of Maine, and two in the new settlements at the westward.

The General Assembly of the Presbyterian church in the United States, have lately been incorporated as a Missionary Society. Their funds are already very respectable; they are sending Missionaries to the western and south-western parts of the United States; and are taking measures to send the gospel among the Indians. They are also distributing many religious books among the new settlements, and endeavoring to communicate religious instruction to the slaves in the southern states.

The Treasurer's Account of Receipts and Expenditures of the Missionary Society of Connecticut, from the close of the year 1800, to June 10th, 1801, referred to in the Report of the Trustees.

No. 1.

Account of Monies received into the Treasury.

1801		D.	C.
Jan. 1.	From Josiah B. Andrews, contributed in new settlements,	20	48
26.	From Rev. Jedidiah Bushnell, do.	48
May 4.	From Amasa Jerome, do.	50	99
26.	From Rev. Seth Williston, do.	81	95
Feb. 5.	From a friend of Missions, - - -	1
May.	From Ladies Society in Norwich, - - -	13
	From a Stranger, - - -	3	55
	From Nathan Beers of New-Haven, - - -	10
	From a friend to Missions, in Berlin, - - -	5	50
	From Robert Porter, - - -	1
June.	From Daniel Morris, Norfolk, - - -	1
	From Rev. George Colton, - - -	20
April.	From the Editors of Hartford Hymns, - - -	40
May.	From Doct. Trumbull, profits of his Sermons, -	30	75
	From the Committee for purchasing books, balance returned, - - -		54
	Sharon Contribution, May 1800, - - -	8	25
	Contributions of May 1801, received to June 10th,	2690	64
	Interest received since Dec. 29, 1800, - - -	5	23
		<hr/>
Balance in the Treasurer's hands Dec. 30th, 1800,		3031	88
		<hr/>
Amount of Receipts, - - -		6862	26

No. 2.

Disbursements by order of the Trustees.

1800.
Dec. 30.	To Salmon King, balance of his account for Missionary services, - - -	1	03
31.	To Rev. A. Flint, for stationary and postage, -	3	30

1801	To Josiah B. Andrews, balance for Missionary services,	83
Jan. 1.	To Rev. David Bacon, Missionary to Indians in advance,	200
26.	To Rev. Jedidiah Bushnell, on account for Missionary services,	228
Feb. 3.	To Robert Porter, balance for Missionary services,	1
April.	To Rev. David Huntington, for Missionary services,	81
May.	To Rev. Joseph Badger, do.	100
	To Messrs. Hudson and Goodwin, for printing and stationary,	29 85
	To Rev. Wm. Storrs, balance for Missionary services,	1
	To Amasa Jerome, do. do.	200 64
	To Rev. Seth Williston, do. do.	274
	To Elisha Colt, for assisting the Treasurer;	3 33
June.	To Robert Porter for Missionary services,	63
	To Rev. David Bacon, Missionary to the Indians, orders drawn last summer,	100
		<hr/> 1369 15.
	Amount of Receipts, - - -	6862 26
	Amount of Disbursements, - - -	1369 15
		<hr/>

Balance in the Treasury June 10th, 1801, 5493 11

Permanent Fund, - - -	1211 50
For support of Missionaries, - - -	4281 61
	<hr/>

5493 11

A. KINGSBURY, Treasurer
to Missionary Society.

Hartford, July 1st, 1801.

Account of the sales, &c. of the first twelve numbers of the Connecticut Evangelical Magazine, to June 20th 1801.

	D. C.
The whole number printed is 3266 for each month, amounting to 39192, at 66 Mills each for printing,	2586 67
Postage, Stationary, &c. - - - - -	18 36
	<hr/>
Whole expenses of the Magazine,	2605 03
	<hr/>

32359	single numbers have been sold to subscribers, mostly at 12½ Cents, some few to Booksellers at 11 Cents, amounting in the whole to,	4011 25
2827	have been sold at retail,	353 38
1972	have been given gratis to subscribers who became responsible for 12 sets or more.
2034	are now on hand.
	<hr/>
39192		4364 63
	<hr/>

Amount of Sales,	4364 63
Expenses as above,	2605 03
	<hr/>
Profits to the institution,	1759 60

Of the above amount of profits there is due from Subscribers, as per the Publishers' books, - - - - 1107 28

Cash in the hands of the Publishers, - - - - 652 32

1759 60

The above Summary Statement is a true result from the accounts of said publishers, audited by the Subscribers on the 29th day of June, 1801.

Certified by,

JONA. BRACE,
JOHN PORTER, } Auditors.

The above mentioned sum of 652 dollars 32 cents, and a further sum of 347 dollars 68 cents, making in the whole 1000 dollars, were, on the 8th of July, paid by the Publishers to the Hon. John Treadwell, and the Rev. Messrs. Nathan Strong and Abel Flint, appointed by the Trustees of the Missionary Society of Connecticut, a Committee to receive the same, and by said Committee paid to the Treasurer of the Society, as per the Treasurer's receipt, as follows,

Hartford, July 8th, 1801.

RECEIVED from the Hon. John Treadwell, Rev. Nathan Strong and Abel Flint, Committee of the Trustees of the Missionary Society of Connecticut, the sum of One thousand dollars, for which I am accountable as Treasurer to the Missionary Society, having given a duplicate of this receipt therefor; it being avails of the Connecticut Evangelical Magazine.

A. KINGSBURY, Treasurer.

Note. There are some small bills against the Magazine, to be paid out of the above amount of Profits which have not yet been presented. They will not however amount to much. Should any losses accrue to the Editors through failure of payment, or from any casualties, a particular account of such losses will be published, that the public may have before them a fair view of the real profits of the work.

Donations to the Missionary Society of Connecticut.

Profits of the Connecticut Evangelical Magazine, as above,	1000 Dells.
From a Stranger,	55 Cents.

THE

Connecticut Evangelical Magazine.

[PUBLISHED ACCORDING TO ACT OF CONGRESS.]

VOL. II.]

SEPTEMBER, 1801.

[No. 3.

On Self-examination.

1. AMONG the various duties of the Christian life, it is generally agreed that self-examination has an important place.

The great subject of enquiry is, whether we are the true children of God, and so heirs of eternal life, through Christ Jesus, or, in the apostolic language, "whether we are in the faith." Because all true believers in Christ, are, in deed, the children of God and have, in the gospel, a sure title to eternal life.

The enquiry supposes the subject to be capable of a rational investigation and decision, on proper evidence, and that Christians have the means and abilities to examine and decide.

2. The duty and importance of self-examination, appears from various considerations. It respects the salvation of the soul, and is so intimately connected with it, that we may reasonably suppose it to be practised by all who are the heirs of salvation, and possessed of the abilities and means for this duty. The subject is so exceedingly interesting and important in itself, and in the view of all Christians, that none can be supposed to neglect this enquiry.

It is a subject capable of investigation. Those who are in a state of salvation may obtain satisfying evidence of it, by proper examination. If this were not the case it would be improper to urge it. In temporal concerns, where truth is attainable, men are disposed to discover it, in some proportion to its importance, their interest in it, and the means they possess for the discovery.

In the progress of this discussion it will appear that the important question of our title to heaven, may be decided on good scriptural evidence.

A false hope is exceedingly dangerous. Sad is the prospect of a man's future state who thinks himself to be something when he is nothing. He is hardened against all divine warnings to the wicked. Nothing short of a conviction that his hope is unfounded will awaken him to fly from the wrath to come; and so bring him within the reach of a hope which shall not make him ashamed at last. This conviction may be produced by self-examination. Without this there is little ground to expect it.

“Now is the accepted time and the day of salvation.” Whatever is done for the salvation of the soul must be done speedily.

Neither self-examination or any other mean of salvation, will be of any avail after death. The retributions of eternity will be “according to the things done in the body.” Hence all the truly wise consider this subject to be of the highest importance, and attend to it, as being intimately connected with their eternal concerns. They feel the need of divine teaching, and say with the psalmist, “examine me, O Lord, and prove me. Try my reins and my heart;”* and they submit, with alacrity, to the apostolic injunction, “Examine yourselves whether ye be in the faith, prove your own selves, know ye not your own selves, how that Jesus Christ is in you except ye be reprobates.”†

3. We must endeavor to prepare our minds for this duty, by deep and solemn contemplation on the importance of it, as probably extending its influence to our eternal state. We must enter upon it with serious deliberation, as far as possible with a mind sequestered from the cares of this life, and the concerns of time.

We must have, fixed in our mind, the most distinguishing scriptural marks of a gracious state, and be well established in the belief of the truth and divinity of the sacred writings, and in a full conviction of the principal doctrines, institutions and duties of Christianity, for it is by evidence of our conformity to these in heart and life, that our title to future happiness is to be proved to ourselves.

The importance of this work, our inefficacy in ourselves, and great liability to self-deception, will lead us to humble, fervent and persevering prayer, to the God of all grace, that he will enlighten our darkness, make us truly willing and desirous to know the truth of our state and character, and assist us in the work, and bring us to such a decision as will stand the test of his all-searching eye.

4. At our entrance on this work, we must examine ourselves, what we believe concerning God and religion, and on what evidence.

For as “all people will walk after the name of their God,” if our views of the divine character are essentially wrong, our religion will be so likewise; and our conformity to the character and institutions of the object of our worship, however exact, will be so far from proving our scriptural title to eternal life, that it will prove directly the reverse.

Will a belief of the character and institutions of the God exhibited in the Koran of Mahomet, and a conformity to it secure to the subjects the eternal life which the gospel promises to all true Christians?

Again, we must enquire on what evidence we believe the holy scriptures and the doctrines, institutions and duties which they teach.

A belief founded on the proper divine evidence is, itself, a good proof of our title to eternal life, for the scriptures assure us that “he that believeth shall be saved,” but there are many who have some kind of faith and yet draw back to perdition. Such are those in the parable of the sower represented by the stony ground and the thorny ground.

We first observe here, that the faith of the gospel, which is con-

* Psalm xvi. 2. † 2 Cor. xiii. 5.

rested with the salvation of the believer, receiveth divine truth on the testimony of God, submits to it, and embraces it, and is governed by it, and endures to the end. This implies that it is a fruit of renewing grace, that it involves reconciliation to God, repentance for sin, approbation of the law and gospel, and essentially, all Christian graces, and is productive of a course of persevering obedience to divine commands to the end of life.

5. We must examine, whether we experience the exercise of the Christian graces, in particular, whether we truly love the ever blessed God? This must be determined primarily, by a consciousness of what passes in our own minds. If this be determined in the affirmative, the enquiry may be extended thus, is the present consciousness of love to God a solitary experience, or have we a consciousness of a series of like exercises, from the time that we have hoped that we were the children of God?

There is indeed a time when the true Christian has the first experience of love to God, at the time of his saving conversion; but this can never be his case but once, and therefore doth not materially affect the present enquiry.

If we are unconscious of a series of exercises of love to God, from the time that we supposed ourselves to be renewed, no present impression of that aspect can give well grounded evidence that we are passed from death to life. If our love to God be genuine it is persevering.

This being found on examination, we enquire after the objective ground of our love to God. Does it rest on impressions of divine favor only? In a belief that God has given us some great temporal or spiritual good, or that he will do it hereafter? Or is it the result of a view of the real excellence, or beauty of the divine character, as holy, just, good and glorious, exhibited in the works or word of God, directly to the mind, without any respect to self or self-interest? For though true gratitude for divine favors is a spiritual and holy exercise of heart, totally different from selfish rejoicing in our own private advantage, and the consequent selfish affection to the benefactor, yet, the nature of gracious affection, is more easily discerned and distinguished when excited by direct views of the moral beauty or loveliness of divine objects as they are in themselves.

This distinction is exceedingly important. "Sinners love those who love them." A heart entirely sinful, may be deeply affected with the reception of personal favors, and this affection to the benefactor will be proportioned to the impression of the greatness of the evil to which the subject was exposed, and the greatness of the good bestowed. Hence the sinner, who is awakened to a realizing sense of the wrath of God and his extreme exposedness to eternal misery, and is suddenly impressed, (by whatever means) with a belief, that God loves him, that Christ died with a design to save him, that God has pardoned his sins, or will save him from endless torments, such a sinner will be filled with unutterable joy, and will be full of expressions of his great love to God and Christ, on the principle of perfect selfishness, and without the least degree of true holiness, or genuine love to God and Christ. Such was the case with the Israelites at the Red Sea, who "sang the praises of God but soon forgot his works." And such is the case of the stony ground hearers in the parable of the sower.

That we may not be deceived in this important article, we should enquire, whether our love to God is excited by a view of his law, its precepts, prohibitions and sanctions, by the mediatorial character and work of Christ, as supporting it, in all those views, and even magnifying it and making it honorable?

Whether we love God when he visits us with afflictions and crosses for our sins, and whether we love him when we have the least comfortable hope of saving mercy, or only when we believe he loves us and will save us?

6. We must examine, whether our love to God be attended with corresponding exercises of other gracious affections, such as repentance for sin, self-abasement, cordial compliance with the gospel way of salvation by Christ, the meek and gentle spirit of the gospel, love to the word, ordinances, and people of God, mercy and kindness to all, submission under divine chastisement, sensible dependence on God for all things, thankfulness for his mercies, weanedness from the world and longing after conformity to God and enjoyment of him, with the other branches of Christian experience.

The renewed soul is possessed of all the graces of the spirit, or the branches of Christian holiness, and there is an agreement and proportion of all the parts. This is evident from many scripture passages, and from the nature of the case. Thus true love to God is attended with genuine repentance for sin.

The primary source of repentance is a view of the moral excellence or loveliness of the divine character, as this produces in the mind a conviction of the excellence and perfection of the divine law, and thus shows the great evil of sin, which is "a transgression of the law." This view of personal sin, produces in the renewed soul, that self-disapprobation for it, that genuine submission to the condemning sentence of the law, and that cordial desire to return to God, which constitute the essence of true repentance and distinguish it from those legal sorrows for sin which may exist in the unsanctified heart, and which are excited by a conviction of exposedness to the wrath of God.

True love to God and repentance for sin, are attended with a conviction of our ruined state as sinners, of the righteousness of God in our condemnation, and of our perishing need of sovereign mercy; of course the mediatorial character and work of Christ appear in their glory, and the way of salvation for sinners through his atonement deeply impresses the mind, with its unrivalled perfection, as being in all respects worthy of God, suitable to the condition of man, and altogether divine. By this, especially, the mind is fully established in the truth and divinity of the gospel, embraces the salvation which it offers, and the way in which it is procured and bestowed. The believing sinner clearly sees the righteousness of God displayed and supported, in the mediatorial work of Christ, as God manifest in flesh; the law magnified and made honorable, sin condemned, and "grace reigning through righteousness to eternal life, by Jesus Christ our Lord." In this way of salvation his heart rests, and he has joy and peace in believing, and we are sure that he who thus believeth shall be saved.

As repentance towards God and faith towards our Lord Jesus Christ are essentially connected with genuine love to God; even so are all the graces of the Spirit, such as Christian humility, brotherly love, good will to all men, kindness to the poor and afflicted, forgiveness to the injurious, weanedness from the world, self-denial, heavenly mindedness; with all other branches of the Christian temper.

Hence if we find in ourselves an habitual and persevering love to God, from views of his moral excellence, we must enquire whether this love is attended with the corresponding graces, which have been named; for if this be not the case we have no just ground to conclude that we are the children of God, because there is an inseparable communion in the nature of all holy affections, and the holy scriptures abundantly teach, that all true Christians receive from Christ, grace for grace, and have the same mind which was also in him.

7. We must examine, whether our love to God, and to spiritual and divine objects be supreme. Our blessed Saviour has abundantly taught us that except we love him, more than all created objects, so as to part, willingly, from them all for his sake, when they are in competition with him; we cannot be his disciples, and that except we deny ourselves and take up our cross daily, and follow him, we have no part in him.*

If our love to God be supreme, it will be attended with the corresponding views and affections which have been named, and we shall abide the rest of those discriminating declarations of the divine Saviour. But if not, we shall, when "weighed in the balance, be found wanting."

That self-denial which Jesus assures us is essential to discipleship, consists not, as many misguided zealots have supposed, in tormenting the body, or excluding ourselves from those innocent enjoyments of life which God graciously gives us, and which are "to be received with thanksgiving, of those who believe and know the truth." But it consists in that experimental and practical religion, in which a supreme, governing love to God and divine things bears us on through all opposition from within and without, in the service of God, with a steady aim at his glory and the good of his kingdom, in contradiction to all the selfish and narrow pursuits of the carnal mind, which are ever directed to some private, personal advantage, without any respect to public good and which are not subordinate but ultimately opposed to it.

8. We must enquire, whether our internal views and exercises in religion, are attended and followed with the corresponding fruits of obedience, in a practical regard to all divine institutions and commands.—This is the last and crowning evidence of our discipleship, and title to eternal life, for "this is the love of God that we keep his commandments, and his commandments are not grievous."*

This subject of enquiry might be considered in relation to our whole life, since we have professed to know the truth: As it is connected with all our relations to God, as a being of infinite perfection, our creator and preserver, our law-giver, and judge,—as our Redeemer and sanctifier, our providential governor, and the object of our worship;—as it relates to all the relative duties which we owe to our fellow creatures, and to our present and future lives.—If our religion be genuine, it causeth us to have respect to all God's commandments, and produceth universal obedience, attended indeed, with sinful imperfection, for in every thing we come short, but still we aim at perfection, and are longing, praying and striving after it.—Our sinful imperfection in every duty is a source of humiliation before God, and we watch and pray lest we enter into temptation.

* Mat. x. 37, 38. and xvi. 24. Mark vii. 34. Luke ix. 23. & xiv. 26, et passim.

* 1 John v. 3. and 2 John 6.

That spirit of Christian obedience which animates the true Christian, is not less sincerely engaged in the discharge of the common duties of life, in our domestic and other relations, than in those which are the most public and splendid; for it esteems the divine commands concerning all things to be right, and hates every false way. To persons of this description, the word of God is precious as a daily companion, and guide. The Lord's day, and other divine institutions are highly regarded, and practically improved,—they strive to advance in Christian knowledge and grace themselves, and as far as may be to be useful to the best interests of others. This renders them faithful in all relations, and teaches them to "Do to others in all things, as they would that others should do to them." They live mindful of death and the future state, and unite in the prayer of the psalmist, "Lord teach us so to number our days that we may apply our hearts to wisdom."

PHILANDER.

FOR THE CONNECTICUT EVANGELICAL MAGAZINE.

Quest. Why is the regenerated man subject to any remainder of sin?

When God wrought the work of sanctification in his heart, and had the power, why did he not render him perfectly holy?

SUCH is the language of Infidels, who often make enquiries like these, with an expectation that they are unanswerable, and that they shall enjoy a certain triumph over the Christian, whose belief involves in it such supposed unanswerable absurdities. More reflection is necessary to answer the subtle questions of an Infidel, than is commonly bestowed on the subject of Christianity, even by professing Christians. The Infidel hardly appears as an interrogating champion, 'till he has, with some subtle inconsistency, settled his plan; through which its fallacy would not immediately appear. Having thus prepared himself, the Infidel comes forth to puzzle believers; and the subject of the foregoing enquiry, is one often resorted to, and one, on which he plumes himself. I will, therefore, endeavor to furnish the reasons to those who have not time to search them out.

The two questions I shall consider as implying the same thing; because the work of Regeneration and Sanctification, involving each other, and being solely the work of God, who certainly has the power to perform it in a different manner, if he will; it is plain that the enquiry implies this; why has not God taken away all sin from the hearts of those whom he has chosen, and completed them in holiness? In answering this I would observe the following things:

1st. I take it for granted that all, who allow of the existence of God, also allow him to be perfect. If he is not perfect, he is not God. If he is perfect, then he must be perfectly wise, else he is perfect, and imperfect ; which is a contradiction. I presume that all who admit of God's existence and perfections, also admit that he created the world. This I assume as a granted proposition, because I never heard of a man who admitted the one, that denied the other. If God is an infinitely perfect being, and if he created the world, he certainly had some design in it ; otherwise it must be charged upon him as folly, or stupidity. Either would undeify him. For our knowledge of God's design, (I mean his ultimate design) in the creation, we are wholly indebted to his Revelation. In that we learn that his design is the glorification of himself ; or the display, to all intelligent beings in the universe, of his own perfections. As means, leading to this end, the work of creation was begun and finished, in the manner in which it was. The fall of man, and all things revealed in the word of God, as tending to the work of redemption ; and the work of redemption itself, with all its attending circumstances, were effected, with a view to the ultimate design—the glory of God.

2d. If God is a perfect being, and has his own glory in view, as the last end of all his works, it must be that he has chosen the best possible means for the accomplishment of this end. To suppose him infinitely wise, and not to have chosen the wisest means, for the attainment of an end, is to suppose an impossibility in his character ; because it is supposing him infinitely wise, and not infinitely wise at the same time. If, then, God has chosen that the work of sanctification, though begun in the hearts of the elect here on earth, should not be perfected in this life, we may, on the forementioned premises, confidently assert that it is the best possible way which God could have chosen respecting it, so far as it relates to the attainment of his last end viz. the glorification of himself.

3d. As some, perhaps, may not be satisfied with this answer, and will enquire why it is more for God's glory, than some other way would have been—that is, than to have rendered man perfectly holy at once ? I will proceed, and attempt to shew, in several particulars, the advantages which this has over the way proposed.

1st. It is necessary that sanctified, and sinful men, should live together in the world, or that God should remove the sanctified out of it, as soon as sanctification takes place. If God were to remove them from the world, as soon as they were sanctified, there could be no advantage in immediate perfect sanctification over that more gradual method, of accomplishing the work, which has taken place. Because the elect are made perfect in holiness at death, and they would be no more on the other supposition. But it is conceived there is an important advantage derived to society, made up, as it is, of holy and wicked men, from the imperfect state of the sanctified, in this life.

The wicked cannot love holiness ; that is, the unregenerate man cannot love the holiness of God. If he could, he would love God. The more holy a man is, the more he is opposed by the wicked. Thus God, being perfectly holy, appears to them, so far as he is seen, perfectly hateful. If men were rendered perfectly holy in this life, they would be perfectly hateful to the unholy ; and it would be impracticable for them to negotiate, or transact any business together. All the kind offices which they stand in need of from each other, would cease to be performed, because they could not live together in society, without a perpetual state of warfare. The wicked man, if he had the power, would destroy all holy men, wherever he found them; thus, peace, even the little there is in the world, would be driven out of it, and the earth would, at once, become a hell. The wicked hate holiness, in proportion as they see it; and the only reason they do not now rise up in hostile opposition to the subjects of it, in the world, is, they are laid under restraint. They are kept from it by the power of God, and not by any goodness of their own. The restraint, which God lays the wicked under in this world, is all that keeps them from becoming devils at once. They have, by nature, the same passions; but God, in mercy to his friends, has kept them thus in subjection, and will continue to keep them under his controul, so far as is for the best general good of his kingdom, until the final separation. Then restraint will be taken off; and they will hate, curse, torment, and blaspheme, like their fellow devils, forever and ever.

2d. It is necessary that saints should not be perfectly holy in this life, that they might give evidence to others that holiness is their choice, and that they love it. If men were perfectly holy, though they would be perfectly obedient to all God's commandments, yet wicked men would say it was because they had no trials. "And the Lord said unto Satan, hast thou considered my servant Job, that there is none like him in the earth, a perfect man, and one that feareth God, and escheweth evil? Then Satan answered the Lord and said, Doth Job fear God for nought? Hast not thou made an hedge about him, and about his house, and about all that he hath on every side? Thou hast blessed the work of his hands and his substance is increased in the land: But put forth thine hand now, and touch all that he hath, and he will curse thee to thy face." This is the natural language of the un sanctified man. It is, therefore, necessary, in order to convince him of his error, that the sanctified man should be in a state of trial and temptation; that, by his cleaving to God, and to the faith that is true and holy, he may convince the wicked that there is such a thing as holiness; and that he loves it for its own sake; that is, because it is lovely in itself.

3d. It seems to be necessary that saints should not be perfected in holiness during this life, to shew them their true character. They could not know that holiness was their voluntary choice, were they not placed in a state of probation, after the principle of holiness was begun in their hearts. For, though they will love holiness when they are perfected in it, still they could not determine that they should love it, were temptations, not to love it, set before them.

4th. A state of imperfection in the saints in this life, is important to teach them their entire, and constant dependence upon God. By nature they are constantly prone to fall into sin; and, as the power of Christ was necessary to implant the principle of holiness in their hearts, so it is equally necessary that it should be constantly exerted, to keep that principle in existence. This the saints should know, because it is an important ground of gratitude and love. They could not so well know it in any other way, as in a way of probation; and imperfection in man, as was before observed, is essential to his probation. They are taught this dependence, by being strengthened by Christ, after those frequent lapses, which happen whenever they begin to stand by their own strength. Owing to the forgetful disposition of man, it is important that those truths, which it is for his good to remember, should be repeatedly impressed on his memory. And this is most effectually done in the way which God has chosen respecting the saints in this life; for, if they never had backslid, they could not be renewed; if not renewed, these impressions could not be repeated; & if the saint was perfect, he would not backslide.

5th It is necessary that saints should continue imperfect in this life, that the malignant nature of sin might be seen by them. If they were made perfect in holiness at once, they could not see, or have any realizing understanding of, the unyielding nature of sin. When holiness is implanted in the heart, it gives a death wound to the sinful nature of man. But, like the "Man of sin" it "has its life prolonged for a time and a season, though its dominion is taken away." The seed of the woman has "bruised the serpent's head," but he is not killed; and after he is bruised, and his power of destroying is taken from him, yet he writhes, and throws himself into every malignant, vindictive posture, that he possibly can. He keeps up a constant warfare in the saint, by the sanctification of whom, the serpent's dominion has been broken; and, though his life and strength are constantly diminishing in the contest, yet the feeblest remains of them are spent in expressions of a malignant hatred towards holiness. These things the saint could never know so well as by experience; and he would never experience them, except in a state of trial; and this, as observed before, is necessarily connected with a state of imperfection.

6th. Imperfect holiness in the saints, during this life, is necessary to teach the intelligent universe the greatness of Christ's victory over the adversary.

When two hostile armies contend in a field, we always estimate the magnitude of the efforts made in obtaining the victory, by the unyielding obstinacy with which the vanquished army fought. The contest between sin and holiness, is the contest between Christ and Satan. Ever since the fall, the dispute has been carrying on between them, for universal empire. The heart of every saint is made a field in which this battle is fought. The saint is the spectator who beholds it; and he sees sin, though vanquished thousands of times, return to the charge; and never submitting so long as it retains any power of opposition. And this it does so long as it retains any life. Though its head is bruised and broken—though it is mutilated and wounded, in its body; still, like the scorpion, it stings with its tail, that it may torment the saints, though it may no more destroy them.

This shews also the unbounded love that Christ felt and exercised, towards men, which influenced him to engage in so great and arduous a conflict, merely to rescue them from the power of his and their enemy. It shews his love to the saints, also, which influences him perpetually to exercise the same power for their preservation, which was exerted for their rescue. As great power is now, and ever will be, necessary to preserve saints from falling away into sin, both here, and in heaven, as was necessary, in the first instance, to bring them out of it. By experiencing this truth, in a state of trial here on earth, the saint, when complete in holiness in the heavenly kingdom, will have a more lively and glorious impression of it, than he possibly could have had, if God had completely sanctified him at once, and deprived him of this instruction which must be derived from experience. Thus God, for whose glory, all things in creation, are brought into existence, and there supported, will appear more "Glorious in Holiness," to the perfected saints in heaven, and to the holy angels round the throne, than he could possibly appear in any other manner. And the glory of God, manifested in the wonders of redeeming love, "which the angels now desire to look into," when divested of all mystery, and unfolded, perfectly, to the view of saints and angels, will be the theme of that everlasting song of praise, which they will unitedly sing to the Father, to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost for ever and ever.

From what has been said on the foregoing subject, two inferences may be drawn with propriety. 1st. In the introductory remarks on the subject of enquiry, it is observed, that such language is often adopted by Infidels, with a view to ridicule both divine revelation, and the religion of the heart. That Infidels should thus act out their malignity, is not strange; nor ought it to surprise believers. But there are people, and people too, who profess to be believers in the Christian scheme of salvation, who, by speaking lightly of the religion of the heart, are more deeply wounding the Redeemer's true cause, than the avowed Infidel. From him it is expected, and spectators are prepared for it. From these Infidel professors, it is not expected; and, when met with in them, by unsuspecting, but honest, enquirers after the truth, it has, at least, a tendency to quiet such in a false hope, if not to prejudice them against "the truth as it is in Jesus;" and to persuade them that religion is all hypocrisy. To those of my readers who have had experimental knowledge of the evangelical religion, which Calvinists contend for, this argument will come with great force; because, being taught its truth by experience, they become so strongly impressed, that all speculative reasonings in opposition to it, will appear idle and unmeaning, as the idiot's smile. But with those who have never felt the influence of holiness in their hearts, it is not expected that the argument will have any effect. Such are prejudiced against the truth; and, having never really known it, they are not qualified to judge. All, therefore, who feel prejudiced against, and see no wisdom, or beauty in the plan of sanctification which God has adopted, with respect to the saints, in this life, ought to conclude, against themselves, that they are yet strangers to true religion. For all who have experienced the religion of Christ in their hearts, have such prejudices removed, and they behold both a wisdom and beauty, in the scheme, worthy of that God whom they adore as their creator, preserver and Saviour. This leads us, in the

2d. Inference, to notice some displays of that wisdom and beauty, which God makes manifest to serious enquirers, in the gradual perfecting of the saints in holiness, which He has generally adopted with regard to them in this world.

By this progress God is communicating a species of knowledge to intelligent beings, which they could not attain to in any other way. It is a knowledge of the infinitely odious and inveterate nature of sin; and of that infinite love which Christ exercised, still exercises, and forever will exercise, towards his children. This knowledge is, and ever will be, in the saints, an inexhaustible source of gratitude to God. All the speculations, meditations and reasonings, on the subject, among men and Angels, which they could exercise could never have communicated this kind of knowledge to an intelligent mind. Here is a new display of the divine character connected with the fall and redemption of man, brought into the view of an intelligent mind, which, had it not been for this connection, must, for ought that appears, have forever remained unknown except to God himself. God, therefore, appears more glorious in this way, to the universe than he could have appeared, had he adopted the method of sanctification pointed out in the enquiry which has now been considered. And as God's glory is his ultimate design in all his works of creation, providence and redemption, we are taught, that, so far as his glory is connected with the sanctification of his children, it is, by the gradual accomplishment of that work, advanced in the best, and wisest possible manner that God could have devised.

A LAYMAN.

The greatness of divine mercy.

THOUGH multitudes abuse the representations which God has made of the greatness of his mercy; yet God declares that he is merciful and gracious, long suffering and abundant in goodness and truth, keeping mercy for thousands, forgiving iniquity, transgression and sin. An essay on the mercy of God may be so abused, that many may, by their presumption upon it, ensure their destruction: Yet this is no sufficient reason why it should be suppressed. Satan has two successful methods in beguiling souls to their perdition. One is to persuade them to suppose, that since God is infinite in mercy, there is no present necessity of denying themselves the gratification of their evil hearts, and that they may probably have sufficient opportunity hereafter, to make their peace with God. By this consideration, they accustom themselves to put off a present attention to religion—sin with less restraints, and so become hardened in iniquity by habit, and continue careless and irreligious till death. The other device of Satan is after a while to persuade them, that they have very much lost their opportunity, that there is little hope that God would receive them if they should now make a serious business of seeking salvation; with this they easily excuse themselves from attending to it, and persist in their evil ways, with only some transient, uncomfortable reflections. Both of these devices, however inconsistent it may seem, may be used with dreadful success, with the same sinner, at the same time. While he is saying to himself, that it is not probable that his seeking salvation will avail any thing, after all that is past, he may also say, that since God is infinite in mercy, things may in the end be better than his fears, and so encourage himself in his presumption. These stratagems of the tempter may be equally dangerous, and bring an equal number of souls to perdition.

It might be expected, that if sinners began to apprehend that their case admitted but little hope, it would increase their concern and exertions; but the fact is commonly otherwise. The carnal heart does not love to attend to a subject so disagreeable, and scenes of business or amusement more acceptable dispose the sinner to make an excuse of the little prospect he has of success, to quit the painful subject, and enjoy the false pleasures which are immediately before him. This case is exceedingly common. And shall nothing be said to break this dangerous snare? Shall not the infinite mercy of God be brought into view, and the great encouragements they have to attend to religion? Shall this great gospel truth be suppressed, because some may abuse it thro' presumption to their destruction? No.—A few observations will now be made to render it evident, that The mercy of God towards sinners is immense.

This truth is evident from the gift of Christ—the great atoning sacrifice he has made for their sins—from the freeness with which the benefits of it are offered to men—and from the universal terms in which the offer is made. Whoever will let him come and take of the water of life freely. These are manifestations of unspeakable mercy. The promises of the gospel to all such as come unto Christ are absolute. “If any man come unto me, I will in no wise cast him out.” And the immensity of divine mercy is further proved, by the examples of it. It has been bestowed upon all who have applied for it, by casting themselves upon it thro' Christ alone. Saul a persecutor and blasphemer obtained it. Publicans and harlots have entered into the kingdom of God, and none of the vilest, who have returned unto God, have been refused. These observations must convince the candid, that the mercy of God is immense.—I would now apply the subject to a number of particular cases, in which men are much exposed to neglect attending to religion, under the notion that there is little reason to hope, that God would accept them, if they should now attend.

This is frequently the case with sinners, who are very stupid and regardless of salvation. God declares, that he that confesseth and forsaketh his sins, shall find mercy. But they think otherwise, and suppose there is little hope for them. Therefore they neglect to cast themselves upon the mercy of God thro' Christ, and take the measures which render their salvation a forlorn hope. The profligate, who have been guilty of swearing, drunkenness and other open and atrocious crimes, and have practised them, are often ready to conclude, that there is little room for them to obtain a pardon, and often resolve, that since they can expect no portion but in this world, they will enjoy their own way, as long as they can, and leave the consequences. But God says even to such, “Let the wicked forsake his way, and the unrighteous man his tho'ts, and let him return unto the Lord, and he will have mercy upon him, and to our God, for he will abundantly pardon.” Publicans and sinners have found Christ accessible. The profligate have as great encouragements to attend to religion as any, and are as sure of success. It is Satan who wishes to persuade them to the contrary; and there is reason to suspect their own hearts are inclined to use this plea, to countenance them in their ungodly course. But this will not excuse their unbelief, for mercy is offered them on the same terms as to others, and the guilt of rejecting it is increased, in proportion to the greater exercise of mercy which is offered them.—Some have had much instruction from their parents, and others : Great means have been used with them, they have had solemn admonitions of providence, by sickness, and the death of near relatives and special friends, and have abused all, and continued in unbelief, till they are sensible they have become hardened in sin, and serious things do not affect them as formerly they did. They are exposed to conclude, that after all these provocations, God will not have mercy on them. They are sure they would not forgive one, who should treat them in the same manner. But God, speaking on this subject, tells us differently. He says, “My tho’ts are not your tho’ts, neither are your ways my ways ; for as the heavens are higher than the earth, so are my ways higher than your ways, and my tho’ts, than your tho’ts.” Because they would not forgive one who had committed such provocations against them, it is wrong to conclude that God will not. Tho’ your “sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow.” In addition to all this, some one may say to himself, “I have ridiculed religious people, despised godliness, and made a derision of the sabbath, ordinances, ministers, and even of the holy scriptures. I am a mocker, and though mercy may be found by all who have been detribed before, I have no reason to expect that God would accept me, if I were disposed to apply to him for mercy.” Your guilt is indeed great ; but the promise is absolute, “Him that cometh to me, I will in no wise cast out.” Men are apt to disbelieve God, when he speaks of things which are above, and different from their own exercises, and question whether he really means as he says. But this is questioning God at an high rate. God undoubtedly understood himself, when he made his promises, and would be understood to mean as he has said. No sinners will be pardoned because their sins are small, or be rejected, when they apply for mercy, because their sins are great. The smallness or greatness of our sins are nothing, either as a claim upon mercy, or a bar against it. Christ is the end of the law for righteousness, to every one who believeth. Mockers therefore, who will confess and forsake their sins, shall find mercy.—But though all those may be accepted, perhaps one may say, “I cannot. My sins are infinitely beyond all these. I have used my whole influence, with much activity, to prevent sinners from attending earnestly to religion. I have been a very devil to tempt enquiring souls into scenes of dissipation, that I might quench the strivings of the spirit with them. I have opposed the principal doctrines of grace, and have even used my authority, where it extended, to prevent awakened sinners, from attending religious meetings. And in some instances, I have succeeded, and they have become secure by my means, and are dead, and probably are now suffering the endless wrath of God. There can be no hope for me,” Your crimes are aggravated to enormous guilt. You can make no reparation for the evil you have done to such as are forever ruined. But with God is plenteous redemption. “He is plenteous in mercy to all that call upon him." He will abundantly pardon. God is wonderful in mercy. Mercy is as free for you as for any. No higher terms are propounded to you, than to the least transgressor. "He that believeth shall be saved." Is not the blood of Christ sufficient to wash away the deepest stain? Is not the benefit of it promised to all who apply? Did he not come to save sinners? And are not you a sinner? You owe ten thousand talents, and have nothing to pay: But will he not frankly forgive you all? Take heed, that in addition to all your former sins, you do not limit the holy one of Israel. Another may say, "I have done all this, and besides, have grown old in sin. I have seen several revivals of religion—have been under deep concern myself, and have resisted the strivings of the Spirit, until he has left me an old hardened sinner, guilty of the blood of souls. Surely God has sworn in his wrath, that I should never enter into his rest. It is in vain for me to think of repentance or faith. God will not accept me if I should now apply."—Your ideas of your guilt are by no means too great. You surely deserve no favor. If God's thoughts and ways were like ours, your case would be desperate. If they were not as far above ours, as the heavens are higher than the earth, there could be no hopes for you. The salvation of such sinners, at the eleventh hour, is among the wonderful works of divine grace. But come like the prodigal son, perishing, and cast yourself on the mere mercy of your abused father, and he will answer the character of the father in the parable.

There is indeed one sin, and but one, which God has pronounced unpardonable. This is blas-pheming the Holy Ghost, by openly, knowingly and expressly imputing the evident works of the Spirit to Satan; like the Pharisees, who enviously said, he casteth out devils by Beelzebub. This is a desperate case, not thro' the inadequacy of Christ's atonement; but because it is certain that such, as are guilty of it, will never apply for mercy. It is a groundless fear that God will not readily receive any as soon as they return unto him. The mercy of God is abundant. The grounds of apprehension are not, that he will reject; but that the sinner will not apply. Here is danger indeed, not by reason of any limits in the mercy of God; but by reason of the sinner's disposition to reject it. Let all who are in sin, apply to God, and hearken to him, who calls upon all the ends of the earth to look unto him and be saved.—Let not Christians be too hastily discouraged, concerning the salvation of sinners, who are uncommonly vile and hardened, or neglect earnestly praying for them. Finally, If any reader will abuse this declaration of the greatness of God's mercy by presumption, he must do it, and his blood must be upon his own head.

MIKROS.

FOR THE CONNECTICUT EVANGELICAL MAGAZINE.

Messrs. EDITORS,

IF the writer of Peter's improvement of his fall, published in the 12th Number of your Magazine, should not communicate to you David's improvement of his, you are at liberty to publish the following if you think it will be useful.

THE fall of Peter and the fall of David are often mentioned together by those who de-ride religion and its professors. Their repentance and their subsequent conduct may be properly viewed together. Peter's have been published and afforded instruction to many. David's in many respects, are similar. The sins in both cases were highly offensive to God, and were greatly aggravated because they were committed by his own children. The sins of David, especially his two distinguished ones, adultery and murder, were exceedingly great and attended with circumstances of peculiar aggravation. But like Peter he speedily became a penitent, and perhaps for one of his sins before he was guilty of the other. Sinning and repenting are often in succession, and sometimes in quick succession. Peter forsook Christ but repented of his sin and returned—then he denied him—then repented of this sin, and all in the space of a few hours. Matt. xxvi. 31, 33, 56. Some have supposed that David lived for several months without repentance, because his child was born before Nathan appeared to him and led him to a confession of his sins. It is more rational to suppose that he repented before; but considered his sins private ones and consequently let his humiliations for them be private. Great care was taken that none should be acquainted with the murder which he committed but Joab, and he was David's confident. The like care was probably taken in the other case. Messengers passed and repassed between David and Bathsheba, but they were probably ignorant of the sin that had been committed, or were charged to conceal it. The whole was so conducted that God said to David, "Thou didst it secretly." 2 Sam. xii. 12. David did it secretly; but contrary to his expectations it was spread abroad. When he was told by Nathan, that he had given great occasion to the enemies of the Lord to blaspheme, he perceived that it was known. This was probably the first information he received of its being made public. Then he openly acknowledged it. Then he made public that repentance which before he had kept to himself. The probability that he had repented in private arises from the following considerations. It is not reasonable to suppose that a man of his attainments in grace should remain without repentance for such a length of time as is pretended, or the hundredth part of it. He was a careful observer of his own heart and of providential events. Interesting events both in his kingdom and in his family, took place in that period. Can it be supposed that he was inattentive to them, or that he attended to them without reflections upon his own heart and conduct? But this is not all. In his confession in the 51st Psalm he said; "My sin is ever before me." This confession was made when Nathan came to him, as appears by the title of the psalm. It must be supposed that in saying, that his sin was ever before him, he looked back beyond his short interview with the prophet even to almost the whole of the time that had past away after his sin was committed. Besides, Nathan said to him; "The Lord hath put away thy sin." The Lord had pardoned his sin. But had he pardoned it without repentance? It was certainly more natural for Nathan to declare the forgiveness of his sin as a consequence of several months' repentance than as the consequence of that moment's repentance, in which he was speaking to him. If this truth-be established, that he repented without delay, no one may take encouragement that his state is good if he remain impenitent after his transgressions.

David's fall occasioned in him a great degree of repentance. He humbled himself greatly under a sense of his great wickedness. He was pained at his very heart. His pains he compared with those which are occasioned by broken bones. He said "Make me to hear joy and gladness that the bones which thou hast broken may rejoice." It may be said of him that he wept bitterly.

David's fall led him to a free and open confession of his sins. He confessed them to God, and he confessed them to man. It led him to a feeling sense of the wickedness of his nature and of his practice. "I was shaven in iniquity: and in sin did my mother conceive me. I acknowledge my transgressions." In all his humiliations and confessions his great burden was sin against God. All the wrongs he had done to his fellow-creatures, and particularly to a family which he had exceedingly injured, appeared as nothing compared with his sin against a holy God. "Against thee, thee only have I sinned," said he, "and done this evil in thy sight." Every true penitent feels that it is an evil and bitter thing to sin against God.

David's fall brought him to earnest prayer to God. Greatly burdened with his sins he prayed for a pardon. "Have mercy upon me, O God, according to thy loving kindness; according to the multitude of thy tender mercies blot out my transgressions." He prayed not only for pardon but for purity. "Wash me thoroughly from mine iniquity, cleanse me from my sin. Purge me with hyssop and I shall be clean: wash me and I shall be whiter than snow. Create in me a clean heart; and renew a right spirit within me." He prayed for the continuance of God's spirit. "Take not thy Holy Spirit from me." He prayed for the return of comfort. "Make me to hear joy and gladness—Restore unto me the joy of thy salvation." He prayed that he might be kept from sin for the future; for he trembled at the thought of falling again. "Deliver me from blood-guiltiness, O God, thou God of my salvation—uphold me by thy free Spirit." He had a sense of his entire dependence upon God for pardon, for comfort, for strength and for perseverance in holiness.

David's fall excited in him a concern for others. Grieved that he had given occasion to the enemies of the Lord to blaspheme, he earnestly desired to remove that occasion if he possibly could. He therefore resolved and promised that if he might be pardoned and restored to the divine favor, he would put forth his exertions for the salvation of souls. "Then will I teach transgressors thy ways, and sinners shall be converted unto thee." By transgressors he might mean those who had never been partakers of grace—by sinners those who had been partakers of it but had backslidden.—His resolution was to do all in his power for the conversion of sinners and for the recovery of saints who had fallen into sin. When he was converted he would strengthen his brethren. And he prayed for others as well as for himself. "Do good in thy good pleasure unto Zion; build thou the walls of Jerusalem."—For a full understanding of the things here related let the 51st Psalm be attentively read together with the 11th and 12th Chapters of the 2d Book of Samuel.

Another observation ought to be made in commendation of David after his fall. He received reproof with a proper temper. When it was administered with the greatest plainness, and from a subject to a king, he did not resent it; neither did he discover the least degree of anger at his reprover. The reply he made was "I have sinned." Instead of being displeased with Nathan for the reproof, he highly esteemed him and loved him, and in testimony of his esteem and affection and often to remind himself of the reproof, he called one of his sons Nathan, and one too whom he had by Bath-sheba. 1 Chron. iii. 5. "Rebuke a wise man and he will love thee.

These observations afford motives to saints to stand fast in the Lord, and warnings to sinners to forsake their sins and turn to him: If the righteous are scarcely saved, where shall the wicked and ungodly appear? Infidels themselves should be silent and receive conviction. Let the question be seriously put to them. Is not the evidence of the reality of religion, from the improvement which Peter and David made of their fall, greater than the evidence against it can possibly be from their fall itself?

On the evil tendency of relying on Dreams.

AMONG the various kinds of superstition to which the human mind is liable, a reliance on dreams is one which is calculated to do injury, to weak and unsettled minds; to lead them away from that full, clear, and glorious light, which a merciful God hath afforded us in Revelation; and, by which, we may, with entire safety, regulate all our conduct.—Is it to be supposed, that after our heavenly Father has done so much for us—has pointed out our duty in such explicit terms, and has filled up the book of Revelation, he will, either immediately, or mediately, undertake to direct us, by the blind and confounding instruction, which is, by some supposed to be conveyed in dreams?—I think not.

It seems to me, that a much more rational account may be given, of the origin and design of dreams, than that they are suggestions of either good or bad invisible beings, and intended to direct our conduct. And also, it seems to me, that we ought to look for this, that we may not countenance that strong inclination there is, in many minds at least, to obtain enjoyment without exertion.

What but this induces multitudes to forsake the habits of honest industry, and depend upon growing rich, by the arts of speculation; or even by the purchase of a lottery ticket?

What, but the same spirit, can be the reason, that others, forsaking that perfect system of divine instruction contained in the bible, are seeking to grow wise, and to receive direction for their conduct, from the idle wanderings of their minds in sleep?

These are feelings, which, every intelligent friend to mankind, would wish to counteract; as involving in them the wretchedness of all by whom they are indulged.

This view of things has induced me to offer you some observations, principally extracted from the 73 and 74 numbers of the periodical paper, called the Mirror; as exhibiting, in my view, important truth on this subject; I presume that in the circle of every one's acquaintance, persons may be found ; who, after almost any event has taken place, will tell of some dream, by which they suppose it was indicated to them.— I believe however, that it is not generally thought to be a mark of sound judgment and discretion.— Nor do I think, that it will be admitted as evidence at all, that invisible agents are concerned in our dreams. It seems to me not reasonable to suppose, that God would employ myriads of such agents, in such a business.—Our dreams are certainly in general extremely unimportant ; and unquestionably they often receive their complexion, and even their existence, from the state of our health, and other circumstances attending us, by which we cannot reasonably suppose such beings would be affected.

The wise man observes on this subject, that “ a dream cometh through the multitude of business.”—Agreeably to this idea, it must be supposed, and by an attentive observer, who is free from superstition, it will be found, that dreams allude not to what is future, but to what is present or past, unless where we have been anticipating some future event ; in which case our dreams may possibly resemble our conjectures. Now, if our conjectures be right, and if our dreams resemble them, it may happen that there shall be a likeness between a certain dream and a future occurrence. But, in this, there is nothing more supernatural, than that I should dream to night of what I have been employed in to-day ; for this is nothing more than a particular train of thought, impressed upon us in sleep, by a certain previous train of thoughts, into which reason and experience had led us when awake. For example,

“ when I see a man dissipating his fortune by debauchery, I may, with reason, apprehend, that disease and poverty will soon overtake him. If this conjecture troubles me in the day-time, it may also recur in sleep, accompanied with some visionary circumstances ; and I shall dream, perhaps, that I see him in rags and misery. Suppose this really happen soon after, what opinion am I to entertain concerning my dream ? Surely I have no more reason to consider it as prophetic, than I have to look upon the conjecture which gave rise to it as the effect of inspiration.”

“ Intemperance of every kind, in eating or drinking, in sleep or watching, in rest or exercise, tends to make dreams disagreeable ; and therefore one end of dreaming may be, to recommend sobriety and moderation. For the time we may employ in sleep bears a great proportion to the whole of human life ; and if there be any expedient for rendering that portion of our time agreeable, it is surely worth while to put it in practice. Habits of virtue and sobriety, the repression of turbulent desires, and the indulgence of pious, social, and cheerful dispositions, are, for the most part, effectual in giving that lightness to the animal spirits, and that calm temperature to the blood, which promote thoughts pleasurable through the day, and sweet slumber and easy dreams by night.”

“ Since our thoughts in sleep may receive form and colour from many circumstances ; from the general state of our health, from the present state of the stomach and fluids, from our employments, and from the tenor of our thoughts through the day ; shall we be 'surprised at the variety of our 'dreams? and when any uncom-

'mon or disagreeable dream oc'curs, is it not more rational to 'refer it to one or the other of these
'causes, than to terrify ourselves
'with a foolish conceit, that it is 'supernatural, and betokens calam'ity. How often, during the day,
'do thoughts arise, which we can-
'not account for, as uncommon,
'perhaps, and incongruous, as
'those which compose our dreams.
'A very slight cause may check 'that insensible perspiration, which 'is so necessary to health; and,
'when this happens, we cannot 'expect that our dreams should 'be so easy as at other times.—Let
'no one then be alarmed at an un'common dream. It is probably 'nothing more than a symptom of
'a trifling bodily disorder; and,
'if so, it has nothing more to
'do with futurity, nor is one whit
'more supernatural, than a cut-fin'ger, or a pang of the tooth-ache."

An explanation of the 18th verse of Obadiah.

"And the house of Jacob shall be a fire, and the house of Joseph a flame, and the house of Esau for stubble, and they shall kindle in them, and devour them, and there shall not be any remaining of the house of Esau; for the Lord hath spoken it."

THE prophecy, ascribed to Obadiah, has particular reference to the destruction of Edom, or the house of Esau. Edom was to be destroyed for their pride and for their wrong unto Jacob, as is obvious from the fourth verse—
For thy violence against thy brother Jacob, shame shall cover thee, and thou shalt be cut off forever. Tho' descended from Abraham, the house of Esau mingled themselves with the heathen, and acted the part of enemies to God's church.

They denied the Israelites a passage through their country into Canaan—they joined a confederacy of heathen kings against the people of God in the reign of Jehoshaphat —they captivated and slew many of the Jews in the reign of Ahaz—and they assisted the Chaldeans in burning Jerusalem. For all these things, the righteous Lord, the avenger of his people, was preparing a cup of wrath for them, and the prophet Obadiah was raised up to announce his intentions.
The verse proposed for explanation,
it is conceived, is merely a description of the way, in which God had determined to cut off Edom.
This strange work of the Lord was to be effected by the instrumen-tality of the house of Jacob, and the house of Joseph. The verse is highly figurative. When the fire is kindled in the dry stubble, it consumes all before it. In allusion to this, as a figure, the prophet says, The house of Jacob shall be a fire, and the house of Joseph a flame, and the house of Esau for stubble, and they, (the house of Jacob, and the house of Joseph) shall kindle in them (the house of Esau) and devour them, and there shall not be any remaining of the house of Esau: For the Lord hath spoken it.
Agreeably to this, history records that Judas Maccabeus, who has been called the Jewish hero, and Hircanus his nephew, effected the destruction of the Edomites, and consigned their nation to oblivion.

LEVI.

FOR THE CONNECTICUT EVAN-GELICAL MAGAZINE.

Hebrews v. 7. Who in the days of his flesh, when he had offered up prayers and supplications, with strong crying and tears, unto him that was able to save him from death, and was heard, in that he feared.

THESE words evidently refer unto our Saviour's prayer, and agony in the garden recorded in Matthew xxvi; Mark xiv. and Luke xxii. at which time, Christ began to be sorrowful, sore amazed, and very heavy, and said to his disciples, my soul is exceeding sorrowful even unto death; and our Lord kneeled down, and fell on his face, and prayed to his Father that if it were possible the hour might pass from him, and said, Abba Father, all things are possible unto thee, take away this cup from me; nevertheless not what I will but what thou wilt, and being in an agony, he prayed more earnestly and his sweat was as it were great drops of blood falling down to the ground. This was the time when Christ offered up prayers, and supplications, with strong cryings and tears: Our Lord conflicted with the powers of darkness, and a supernatural horror impressed his holy soul; and he was surrounded by infernal Spirits, who exercised all their force and malice to tempt, vex, and distract his innocent soul. Observe the thing petitioned, that the cup might be taken away, and pass from him. If we could with precision ascertain what is intended by the cup, such a discovery might furnish us with a key to the text under present consideration.—

It appears to me that the cup means, the sore terror and awful combat in which Christ was then actually engaged: And was heard in that he feared: was heard, that is, was helped, delivered, God heard him and delivered him, in that he feared, from that particular which he feared, viz. that cup of anguish, those terrors, and pains he suffered when the powers of darkness were set upon him. It is inconsistent to suppose our Lord prayed to be entirely freed or excused from death and sufferings: and to illustrate, see John xii. 27. Christ said, in prospect of all his sufferings, now is my soul troubled, and what shall I say? What petition shall I prefer unto my Father on this distressed occasion. Shall I say Father save from this hour? as though he had said I cannot make this prayer; for this cause came I unto this hour, I was born, and came to die to redeem my people: and I apprehend that Christ never did, and never would, pray that the final cup, of death should be taken away; for if Christ had not died, the whole plan of redemption, and salvation would have been frustrated, the divine perfections would not have appeared in their lustre, no atonement for sin, and not one of the posterity of Adam would have been saved. This appears to be the most safe, and consistent sense of the text.

An account of a work of divine grace, in a revival of religion, in the counties of OTSEGO and DELAWARE, State of NEW-YORK, in the year 1800, communicated to the Editors by the Rev. JEDIDIAH BUSHNELL, one of the Connecticut Missionaries.

GENTLEMEN,

IN the course of my last mission to the western counties of New-York, it pleased God to pour out his Spirit upon some of those counties, particularly the counties of Otsego and Delaware, in which there was a remarkable revival of religion. The following account of the revival, extracted from my Missionary journal, you will please to publish, if you think it will subserve the cause of truth and piety.

The former of these counties lies upon the head waters of the Susquehanna river, the latter upon the head waters of Delaware river. The counties united comprehend a tract of country, almost as large as the State of Connecticut.

The moral state of the people in these counties, previous to the late awakenings, was much as it is in other parts of the new settlements, which have not been visited with the effusions of the Holy Spirit. The people had little preaching, the sabbath was greatly profaned, and the few pious people scattered through the country were much discouraged; consequently a train of vices and errors succeeded, which rendered the situation of the country melancholy indeed. Some places were more enlightened and civilized than others, but a general stupidity reigned through the whole; and some settlements, where the power of divine grace has since been gloriously displayed, were truly sitting in the region and shadow of death.

The first tokens of the late religious attention in these counties, were visible in the town of Delhi, the capital of Delaware county. This place had been remarkable for stupidity, religion was treated with contempt; and the little church, consisting of three or four male members, concluded that they must soon become extinct. The revival began in the month of March, 1800. Its first glimmerings were small, rendering it doubtful whether a day of grace was to succeed. The small number of Christians were between hope and fear; sometimes, they thought the work increased and there were prospects of a joyful harvest; at others, their prospects were covered with clouds, and they were afraid that the Holy One of Israel was departing. Thus the friends of Zion watched and prayed until near the last of April, when it became evident that the cause had gained ground, and a deep solemnity sat upon the countenances of many people. The latent spark, which had gradually made its way to the conscience began to burn with a gentle flame.

The work increased; in the month of May we had solemn days. Near the close of the month, in one part of the town, called Little Delaware, the power of divine grace appeared to bear down all opposition before it. Whole families were under deep conviction of their lost state; they crowded to know what they must do to be saved. It was glorious to see the displays of divine grace; some persons appeared as tho' they had lost all their friends, and that their ruin was inevitable, while others were comforted with the hope of divine mercy. About the time the awakening became visible at Little Delaware, the attention of the people was arrested, in the southern part of the town. Here the cause struggled with much opposition, but was succeeded, so that a joyful number of people hopefully became the subjects of the glorious work. The revival continued in the town without much alteration, for many months; until many sinners were brought to experience in their souls the merits of the Redeemer's purchase. About fifty persons in this town, have become visible members of Christ's church, since the commencement of the late revival; some few others expect soon to make the same public profession.

While the work was increasing at Delhi, God was pleased to send his Holy Spirit into the town of Franklin, which lies seventeen miles west of Delhi. The Rev. David Harrower preaches one half of the time in this place, the other half in the town of Wolton. The attention in this place, like that in Delhi, was gradual at its commencement; until God, in the dispensation of his providence, visited that town with some solemn instances of mortality. These, under God, gave vent to the feelings of the people, which had been suppressed through timidity. The fear of the world vanished; and sinners confessed their guilt. It was a solemn time, for months; many people will remember it forever. How many people have made a public profession of religion in this place, since the reformation began, I cannot tell, not having visited them for months; the number, however, is great.

Soon after the awakening commenced at Delhi, it began at Stamford, on Delaware river, ten miles north of Delhi. The attention has not been great among this people; they have received a pleasant shower. The little church, formed in this place, some years since, has been much refreshed, and considerably strengthened by additions. Other places in the county have had some small sprinkling of divine grace, and particular instances of conversion have been in most parts of the county.

We will now give some account of the glorious work of God, in the county of Osego. From information since the commencement of the awakening, it appears, that in this county, the religious attention began in the hearts of the people months before it was noticed by the public eye. The Angel of God's presence evidently went before the preaching of the gospel. The Missionaries observed among the people, in some parts of this county, an unusual readiness to receive the word. The good people appear to have been given much to secret prayer, and in some instances united together for social prayer, and to read the best printed sermons. Some sinners were convicted of their danger, and some few hopefully converted, before the work became public.

At length, in Union society, at the head of Osego creek, in the month of April, 1800, the awakening put on a public appearance. The friends of the church began to lift up their heads and sing, hoping that the day of its redemption drew nigh. The attention was not great on its commencement; one was awakened here, and one there, in almost every direction of the society, and some without its bounds. It soon became evident, that the cloud of divine blessing was gathering, and there was a sound of abundance of rain. God evidently appeared to set up his kingdom in the hearts of men, and stout-hearted sinners seemed to bow to the power of divine grace.— Both the righteous and the wicked acknowledged, that God was present. Our public assemblies and conferences were crowded, full, and solemn. Many people, on the sabbath, come a great distance to divine worship; some eight, some ten, and some fifteen miles. Missionaries often preached to four, five, six, and seven hundred people. Only the reading of a text of scripture, or some sentence from a speaker, would have more effect upon the audience than whole laboured, approved discourses in time of religious declension. God held the work in his own hand; creatures prayed, and some of them used the foolishness of preaching, but God wrought the salvation; to his name be the glory. The church in this place was formed since the awakening began; it now consists of sixty-one persons; some of them, however, live without the bounds of the Society. There are other persons also, who probably will soon profess their faith before men.

Soon after the commencement of the awakening at Union Society, divine light began to shine in a small settlement, called Metcalf settlement. This settlement is eight miles northeast from Union Society. About the same time the work made its appearance, in the Hartwick settlement, seven miles southeast from Union Society; tho' in this settlement there had been some tokens of an awakening, for some time before. In each of the settlements Christ has a number of witnesses to his cause; they have not yet united with any church, except those of them who reside in the western part of the Hartwick settlement, they have united with the church in Union Society.

About the middle of June the same glorious work began in the town of Springfield, in the northern part of the County. The means which God used at the beginning of the attention were a little singular. The small church in that place invited a clergyman to come and preach with them on the sabbath and administer the sacrament of the Lord's supper. On Friday, preceding the sabbath, he preached the preparatory lecture. After the public exercises were closed, he requested the church to tarry, and examined them respecting their experimental and practical religion. They were so deficient in family prayer, in the education of their children, and in other Christian duties, that they were informed without reformation, he did not feel clear to administer to them the Lord's supper. The church was solemnly moved, most of them were in tears, and before they left the house confessed their sin, and promised reformation. From that day the church arose from the dust and put on her beautiful garments; and the awakening immediately followed. It has, by no means, been general in this town; some people have been convicted and hopefully converted, some others solemnized, but many have remained unmoved. Our places of divine worship have been full, and usually attended with much decency, and sometimes with deep solemnity. Seventeen persons have publicly united with the church, in this place, since the commencement of the awakening; and a considerable number of others expect soon to make the same declaration of their faith in Christ.

The attention to religion began in Worcester, in the month of July, though in one part of the town there were favorable appearances some time before. This town is on the southeast part of the County; and is very extensive, comprehending three small societies; the land is mountainous, consequently the people not so numerous as in some other parts of the country. The attention became public in the various parts of the town, nearly at the same time. Many people were under deep concern for their souls; and there was a general flocking to hear the gospel. In some instances, in this town, conviction rose uncommonly high, and some conversions were remarkably clear.

It may be proper to mention one instance of conviction: he was a young man of handsome talents, about twenty-five years of age. He had been tinctured with universalism, but now says, that he never, in his conscience, believed those sentiments. Soon after his awakening commenced, his doubts were removed respecting universalism, and he was convinced there was a hell; and a most dreadful scene of legal convictions followed. In conversation with his friends he often used these expressions; two hells are my portion, one in the infernal regions, the other in my own breast. After a series of the most dreadful temptations in which his life was endangered, and his friends much alarmed, God was pleased to reveal his Son in him, and shew him the riches of his grace. His conversion, in his own opinion, was not the most clear at first; his language was, it cannot be, that God should show mercy to such a creature, as I am. But the more he examined his hope, the more he was comforted; and finally became a visible member of Christ's church.

Probably, the awakening has been as genuine in this town, as in any part of the wilderness. Fifty-one persons have made a public profession of their faith in Christ, since the commencement of the awakening. Fifteen of them have united with the first church in town, seven with the second, and twenty-nine with the third. The latter of these churches was organized, since the commencement of the awakening, the other two were previously formed.

At Cooperstown, the capital of the county, a large wealthy, and respectable society has been organized the last summer, and a church formed by the Rev. Isaac Lewis, who has since been installed, their minister. This church has increased to thirty-three persons. The things of religion have appeared encouraging among this people for some time; but the present prospects are much more favorable. In the northern part of the society, by the name of Piertown, God has displayed his power, and many people are solemnly awakened, and numbers hopefully converted. The prospects, in this society, are now as encouraging as in any part of the county.

In the course of my mission, I took a tour down the Susquehanna river to Tioga Point, which is about one hundred and fifty miles from its source, then turned my course west up the Chenango river, called sometimes Tioga river, sixty miles, then turned my course north-east through Cayuga, Onondago, and Oneida counties. On the Susquehanna and Chenango rivers, there are some Christians, but the people are generally stupid. In Cayuga and Onondago counties there have been awakenings. The towns of Milton, Scipio, and Homer have all received showers within a year past. A number of settlements in Oneida county have experienced similar effusions of the Holy Spirit; especially the society of Clinton, under the preaching of the Rev. Mr. Norton, and the town of Paris, under the ministry of the Rev. Mr. Steele have been uncommonly awakened, and a multitude of sinners flocked to Christ. The academy in Clinton, under the instruction of the Rev. Mr. Niles has been considerably favored. Also from accounts from Ontario county, Genesee, we learn that the churches formed there, in the great revival of religion a year ago last summer, are built up and edified, and numbers of them have ministers ordained.

These awakenings, in the new-settlements, have been regular and and free from enthusiasm. Persons have, at the beginning of their convictions, been solemn, and have manifested a great eagerness to hear the word. Their countenances have been full of meaning, denoting that something of importance lay with great weight upon their minds. As their convictions increased they have complained much of the stubbornness of their hearts and of their helpless state by nature. Previous to conversion, they have been disposed to find much fault with divine sovereignty; but, when they have been born again, they have joyfully embraced that glorious truth, as one of the great sources of their consolation. Jesus Christ and the bible have been their great themes. They have not only improved exceedingly fast in the plain points of divinity, but have made astonishing progress in the great doctrines of the gospel. They have not been disposed to vaunt, but modestly to hear, rather than dictate. As far as we can judge, since the commencement of the awakening, the fruits have been the effect of that wisdom from above, which "is first pure, then peaceable, gentle, and easy to be intreated, full of mercy and good fruits, without partiality and without hypocrisy."

The preaching, in these settlements, has been plain. Ministers have dwelt much on experimental religion, on the great doctrines of sovereign grace; such as repentance, faith, the necessity of the new birth, and other plain or leading doctrines of the gospel. They have also equally enforced Christian morals as the only visible evidence of a gracious state.

Notwithstanding the great revivals of religion in the new-settlements, for two years past, a great part of the wilderness remain stupid in their sins. The tract of country, through which missionaries, from the United States, travel, is several hundred miles square. This tract has but partially experienced the influences of the Holy Spirit. When we consider the worth of souls, and their unalterable state beyond the grave, it is hoped that every person will contribute to send salvation to those who are destitute of the means of grace; not only to our brethren in the new-settlements, but to the heathen upon our frontiers. They have souls as valuable as ours, and are capable of enjoying the same spiritual and everlasting blessings.

I have been kindly treated in the wilderness. The people present their thanks to the Missionary Society of Connecticut, for their liberal contributions and exertions to the support of missions in the new-settlements. They wish the people in Connecticut grace, mercy and peace, an hundred fold more in this life, and in the world to come, life everlasting.

JEDIDIAH BUSNELL.

Hartford, January 26th, 1801.

Angelina, a Fragment.

ONE day, as Angelina sat conversing with her minister, who had called to spend an half hour in serious discourse, with her, the conversation turned upon experimental religion, and the power of godliness, as a satisfying witness, of the truth of the gospel, to the believer's mind. For it was known that Angelina had long entertained an humble hope of her change of heart, and had given such an external evidence of Christian humility and piety, in her life and conversation, as gained the approbation of all her acquaintance. The subject, therefore, was a natural one; and was intended to lead to an impartial discovery of the feelings of her own mind, which were accordingly related, in substance, as follows,—“For a long time, said she, I was under serious impressions of mind, and a deep concern for the salvation of my soul. I seemed to be alone, in my distress. I considered myself to be singular. All the world around me appeared to be stupid;

 the wise and the foolish virgins had alike fallen asleep, and in company, experimental religion was rarely mentioned, but in the way of contempt. I often asked myself, can there be any thing in experimental religion? Can the great God of nature, that made heaven and earth, condescend to fill the souls of any of the sinful children of men, with such heartfelt discoveries of his ineffable grace and glory, as is sometimes pretended? Is it not all a delusion?
 The gay world laugh at it. Professors are few in number; they say little about it. Where then is the evidence of its truth? But this answer was not satisfactory.
 My mind was still distressed.
 Something was wanting. I could not rest easy; for conscience whispered, all is not right. I wanted some friend, to whom I might disclose these feelings of my heart; but I knew of none, in whom I had sufficient confidence to mention so interesting a subject.
 I had bought myself a little selection of books, and among others, Milton’s paradise lost fell in my way. In reading his account of the fall of man, and of the miserable state of sinners, I felt more distressed than ever for my soul. I now gained a clearer knowledge of the doctrine of the real depravity and helplessness of the sinner than ever I had before had, and saw the real necessity of regeneration. This led me to search the scriptures, on the subject, with great attention, and to read other religious books. I continued in this state of mind, anxious and distressed and trying to humble myself before God, for my sins, for nearly a year. Sometimes much distressed, then, again, more tranquil; and then I would hope, I was regenerated. Then, again, I was brought to see, I had found no resting place. In this restless manner I lived till the late revival, which was so wonderful and glorious, that it renewed all my former convictions afresh; for instead of being singularly distressed above others, I now felt myself as much behind many, in this respect. So that I now was distressed to think I was no more distressed, under a feeling sense of my sins, being at the same time anxious, diligent in the use of means, prayerful and never sparing any pains to hear religious instruction. At length, I suffered myself to entertain a weak and humble hope of regeneration;

 feeling a real change in my heart and affections towards the Trinity and the duties of religion in general, tho’ in all my distresses not being able to fix upon the precise moment. I thought I could say, one thing I believe, whereas I was once blind, I now see. I felt that I truly loved God and religion, and found it my chief joy to promote his glory.—
 Still, I was anxious, for though I admitted a hope, and joined the people of God, I was far from enjoying myself so much as some other lively Christians did, being perplexed with doubts, because my legal terrors were far less than theirs had been. I long-ed to have God manifest himself

' to my soul, with peculiar power
 ' and glory, that I might no longer
 ' doubt my experience of his glo' rious grace. One night, after ' having been to a religious meeting,
 ' at which I was much affected,
 ' with the truths delivered, while
 ' at prayer I cannot but hope my ' request was granted. I seemed ' to have an unusual spirit and free' dom in prayer. I seemed to rise ' above the world and all its vani-
 ' ties, and all the energies of my ' soul were unitedly drawn out in ' fervent supplication to God, that ' he would show me his glory and
 ' grant me his salvation." "Or ' ever I was aware, my soul made ' me like the chariots of Ammina-' dab. Return, return, O Shu' lamite, return, return, that we ' may look upon thee." "In a ' moment my soul was filled with ' unsutterable joy and glory; and
 ' God and the Lord Jesus were
 ' bro't nigh unto my soul. I then
 ' tasted that the Lord was gracious.
 ' I felt the all-subduing power of his ' grace, melting all the powers of
 ' my soul, at his feet, into a rap-
 ' ture of holy love, gratitude, joy
 ' and praise. It seemed like heav' en begun upon earth; and for ' once. I felt completely happy, in ' the enjoyment of God. God and ' Christ, heaven and hell, and sal' vation by grace were now heart' felt realities. It seemed to me, ' at the time, that, if it had been
 ' my proper province, I could have ' gone out, and convinced all the ' infidels and scoffers at religion, in
 ' the world, of their folly and
 ' madness, and of the reality of ' experimental religion. Every ' thing was real. The veil between ' this and the heavenly state seem' ed drawn up and invisible things ' were no longer hidden. I felt a ' willingness to follow, wherever
 ' God in his providence should ' lead the way. Since that time I ' have had several times of sweet ' refreshing from the Lord; and ' tho' I often have had reason to la' ment my coldness and want of zeal

 ' in religion; yet, I never have had ' those anxieties and fears of being ' deceived in my hope, which I ' had before." Well, then, re' plied the clergyman, after hearing
 ' her out, you consider the gospel its ' own witness, do you not, Angeli-
 ' na?—Or, in other words, you be' lieve there is such a thing as a per' son's having such a change of heart,
 ' and such an inward conviction of ' the truth of the scriptures by the ' renewing and sanctifying influences
 ' of the holy spirit, as to be fully ' satisfied of their truth, without any ' other evidence than what flows from
 ' the doctrines themselves, thus ap' plied by the power of the Holy ' Ghost?—"I have tho't so," an' swered Angelina; "and I still ' think so. I know, I am weak
 ' in strength. I feel liable to fall ' into temptations and sin, and I ' am ashamed of myself, to think I ' live no more to the glory of God;
 ' or that I should so often dread
 ' the reproaches of the world, in ' the way of duty. But yet, it ' seems to me, that whatever infi' dels may say or do, (or, what' ever may be the conduct of those
 ' stony-ground hearers, who once
 ' said, we will serve the Lord, but ' now serve him no longer,) noth' ing will make me reject the Lord
 ' Jesus, nor doubt the reality of ' the divine power of the Holy ' Ghost in the sinner's regenera' tion."—May not Christians then,
 ' replied the clergyman, humbly a' dopt the language of the great A-' postle of the Gentiles, "I am not ' ashamed: for I know whom I ' have believed, and am persuaded ' that he is able to keep that which ' I have committed unto him against that day" ?—Doubtless, it was this internal evidence of experimental religion, arising from the renewing, the sanctifying, the strengthening and the comforting power of the Holy Ghost, which enabled so many of the primitive Christians to say, "O death! Where is thy sting" ? Even when begirt with fiery ragots, or torne to pieces, limb by limb, in the slow pains of the torturing wheel.

AMANA.

Admonitions from the Death-Bed.

(Continued from p. 70.)

NUMBER II.

MESS'RS EDITORS,

OBSERVING that you published my first number, I send you another piece which, if you think it worthy of publication, you will please to insert in your useful Magazine. I shall first mention some reflections on the dying speech of an aged and pious minister of the gospel, lately communicated to me in a letter from a friend; and then relate a case which fell within my own observation. My friend writes as follows:

"An aged and pious minister of the gospel, in New-England, who died a few years ago, addressed himself to a younger brother, who visited him in his last sickness, nearly in the following words: "My dear Brother, you are engaged in a great and good work. Be faithful to Christ and to the souls of men. Be abundant in labors; and faint not under trials and temptations. If you put your trust in the Redeemer, he will support you in life and in death, and will give you a crown of immortal glory. I can assure you that it is safe to trust in God as revealed in Jesus Christ. I feel myself to be near the world of Spirits. I think that I can commit myself into the hand of God. I am sure that it is my duty thus to do; and that it is the only way to find true peace and happiness, in life, and in the hour of death. I never did any thing to recommend myself to God: I have been an unprofitable servant. All my hope is built upon the sovereign mercy of God. The divine sovereignty is not mere arbitrary pleasure; there is nothing like tyranny in it: It is holy sovereignty—it is wise sovereignty—it is good sovereignty. I do not find the rapturous joy in religion which some appear to possess, when they apprehend themselves to be on the borders of the eternal world; but I find true peace and solid enjoyment in the glorious doctrine of the divine sovereignty."

"In this frame of mind, this worthy and pious man continued to the end of his days. This venerable father professed to build on the only foundation of Christian hope. God shows favor to sinners, either from reasons which exist in them or in himself. If any suppose that they are made heirs of the heavenly inheritance, on account of something in themselves, they are under an awful delusion. Instead of being the children of God, they are yet in their sins, and in the high road to endless woe. What did any one of the apostate race of Adam ever do, which could recommend him to God? What sinner would turn to God, if he were left to indulge his own corrupt desires? The reasons which influence the Most High to save sinners, must be taken from his infinite benevolence and wisdom. Hercin is love, not that we loved God, but that he loved us and sent his Son to be the propitiation for our sins. We love him, because he first loved us. 1 John iv. 10, 19.

“ The atonement which Christ hath made doth not change the hearts of sinners. They will continue enemies to God, if he doth not subdue them by the efficacious influences of his holy spirit. When he doth this, he acteth from the same general motives as he did in providing a ransom for a rebellious race. Christian experience harmonizes with Christian doctrine. True believers, amidst all their doctrinal mistakes, will acknowledge that they never should have been brought into Christ’s kingdom, or have remained in it, had not God, in sovereign mercy, renewed them in the spirit of their minds, and kept them by his almighty power.

“ The present subject furnishes a rule of trial for all who profess to be Christians. Do you believe that God showed mercy to you, for reasons taken from your minds or from his own? Do you believe that you first fitted yourselves for a place in Christ’s family, and that by this fitness you moved God to come to your assistance? Or are you convinced that he first came by the efficacious influences of his spirit, and inclined you to submit to his holy will? When death is brought near to you, do you feel that you can plead with God for acceptance, on account of your faithfulness in improving the means of grace? Or do you feel that you must plead for favor solely on the ground of his holy, wise, and good sovereignty, as displayed in the gospel?

“ The Lord traineth up his people for heaven, in a way which prepares them to say with a loud voice, Worthy is the Lamb that was slain to receive power, and riches, and wisdom, and strength, and honor, and glory, and blessing.”

The instance above recited shows how great support is derived in the hour of death, from a submissive trust in the wise and holy sovereignty of God. The peace and consolation of a dying Christian strikingly evince that true religion is a thing real in the heart; also that it is given by a special communication from God himself. As there is a great diversity in the lives, so there appears to be in the deaths of those for whom we have a charitable hope, that they are the friends of Christ. In this matter, God conducts as a sovereign. He may have wise reasons for denying special supports and communications of his love to some whom he hath forgiven: and among these reasons one may be, the honor of religion. Christians often deviate publicly from the character of piety, meekness, humility and condescension, which they ought to support. They may have sins which easily beset them, against which they do not watch and pray as they ought; and by which they give the enemy occasion to scandalize a religious profession. In such cases, I think we have little reason to expect those communications of light and peace, which are necessary for a triumphant death.

I will describe an instance which fell under my own observation. It was a man who appeared to be constitutionally exposed to rash anger. In his youth he became serious and made a profession of religion; and, until his death, which happened about the age of sixty, except in the fault which hath been mentioned, lived in a most exemplary manner. His heart generally appeared warm with a love of God, the truth, and the souls of men; he was a steady and affectionate attendant on the public and private duties of religious worship; and to his most intimate, pious acquaintance gave comfortable evidence of a gracious sincerity. But by the sin beforementioned, he was often left to dishonor his Christian profession, in the course of his life. The decline which ended in his death was long, and through the whole of his sickness he was covered with the deepest darkness concerning his own personal condition. His reason was clear, nor was there any evidence of hypochondriac melancholy. His former pious companions spent much time with him in conversation and prayer, without any effect to remove his darkness. He appeared to have clear conceptions of the nature of religion, but could feel none of its power. He said there was no rising of his heart against God and the truth, at the same time he appeared to be in deep distress, without a ray of light or comfort to cheer the dreary hour. The sin of rash anger lay with great weight on his conscience, and he now saw that he had not watched against that besetting sin as he ought to have done. He did not appear to be terrified with a sense of divine anger and vengeance; but his pain of mind, which was sometimes extreme, arose from a sense that all divine communications were withdrawn from him. His last intelligible words were, "God is altogether withdrawn: how dreadful it is to have no sensible communications of his grace?"

The state of this person we know not, and if he was pious, as those most acquainted with his whole life continued to hope, why did God leave him in such fearful darkness? Perhaps without enquiring too curiously into the reasons of a sovereign dispensation, we may conjecture it was done to bear witness against a sin by which he had often dishonored a Christian profession, and tempted sinful men to doubt the reality of a meek and lowly character as belonging to the disciples of Christ. Christians have no right to expect that God will bear a witness for them in death, unless they have witnessed for him by such a life as the gospel requireth. Men may, by natural constitution, or by a contracted habit; or by temptations arising from a particular situation and employment, be more exposed to some sins than to others; still this is no justification. Christians should never say, this or another sin is unconquerable, for it is not truth. The most powerful sins may be resisted by the grace of God, which we ought continually to seek. Sins of every kind are to be resisted, and those especially by which we are conscious of being most easily overcome.

It is common to pray that we may have the divine presence in death; and when this request is granted, after a life of eminent watchfulness, piety, and an exemplary holy conversation, it proves very impressive on the minds of survivors. Christians are confirmed in the covenant faithfulness of their Redeemer, and ungodly men are convinced of divine power and grace. But let not those who live unworthy their profession, and are constantly crucifying Christ afresh, by their unchristian passions and practices expect extraordinary support in death. It is true that divine sovereignty may grant it, yet it is more probable that infinite wisdom will bear testimony against their great imperfections by leaving them to afflicting darkness.

PRESBUTEROS.

MESS'RS EDITORS,

IF you have nothing at hand which you judge will be more useful, please to insert the following in your magazine.

A letter to a young person who had long labored under the extreme pains of a wounded conscience.

MY DEAR FRIEND,

AS the things of which I now write are of infinite importance to you, no less than about the concerns of your immortal soul, permit me to write freely those truths which you must feel, before you can expect to receive the sanctifying influences of God's holy spirit. You inform me, in your letter, that you are ready sometimes to despair of God's ever changing your heart, or of bringing you home to himself; but rather are led to think you were made for the purpose of being miserable forever. Such thoughts are truly distressing, and are such as you ought not to indulge. You have indeed been a long time in distress and anguish; you have seen many others receiving comfort, and obtaining a hope that they are brought from death unto life. But these things ought not to discourage you. Be not discouraged in a thing of so great importance as the welfare of your immortal soul. Persevere unto the end. Consider God has a right to do his pleasure with his own, and it is just for him so to do. He is now trying you, to let you see that you are not truly desirous of having an interest in Christ; but are excited only by fear of punishment. Consider, further, that probably this is the best time you will ever have for doing this great work, which is to be done, or you must perish forever.—Christ says "Except a man be born again he cannot see the kingdom of God." You must acknowledge this to be the best time. Will you ever be so free from care and worldly concerns, as at present? Will you not rather, as you grow older, grow likewise older in iniquity, and increase the danger of final perdition? Surely you never will be better able to bear the pains of a wounded conscience than at present. Do not, because you have been a long time under conviction, and have received no comfort, despair of receiving mercy from God. Permit me to tell you plainly, it is you who are unwilling to come; so that if you finally perish, it will be while Jesus cries, "Whoever will may partake of the water of life freely." But the declaration of God to youth is still more encouraging. "I love them that love me and those that seek me early shall find me." Nothing can be more directly adapted to you. And will you doubt the words of God himself? He says he will not turn away those empty who sincerely seek him. Recollect you are not the only person whose unregenerate seeking has been long unsuccessful; that God has suffered others to remain a long time in anguish, almost to despair; but has at length appeared for them, and given them another heart and that joy and peace in believing which the world can neither give nor take away. You should not despair of receiving mercy from God, for many who have labored under the pains of a wounded conscience have, through the divine sovereignty, embraced the promises. Such instances are by no means rare; they are to be seen in every revival of religion in our towns. And they are not only to be seen among us at the present day, but are recorded in the scriptures for our encouragement. Another reason why you should not despair, is that you will incur the displeasure of God; and because you will be in great danger of being a final impenitent. That God is displeased with those who turn back is abundantly taught from the scriptures, but more particularly from Hebrews x. 38. "If any man draw back, my soul shall have no pleasure in him." And from Luke ix. 62. "No man having put his hand to the plough, and looking back is fit for the kingdom of God."

The danger you will be in of being a final impenitent is very great. This probably is not the first time you have been concerned for the welfare of your soul. Every time you shake off the ideas of future and eternal things, you become more hardened, and less likely to be awakened again. Do not therefore quench the spirit. Be often at the throne of grace. Think not that you can do any thing of yourself to merit salvation. While you are in an impenitent state every action is sin. You must feel willing to be in the hands of God, and that Christ should be all in all, in your salvation, or you can never attain eternal life. That God would subdue your stubborn will, and prepare you for the reception of his holy spirit, is the earnest prayer of your affectionate friend,

PHILOPSEUCHOS.

MESS'RS. EDITORS,

IF the following extract from a letter, written sometime ago to a young gentleman in College, should be thought proper for a place in the Evangelical Magazine, you have the writer's consent for its insertion. ASTHENES.

DEAR SIR,

AS your father was but a little younger than myself and an amiable person, and we passed the years of childhood and youth together, he was a brother peculiarly dear to me. As the natural consequence of this, you, his only son and bearing his name, have a special share in my affectionate regard. I trust you will, therefore, not think it strange, nor consider me as acting an over-officious part, if I address you with freedom, and make an effort to serve you, in the only way in which I am at present able to attempt it.

The only intelligence I have had of you in a number of years, was communicated by Mr. ———. He informed me, that you had entered a member of Yale College.— Hence, I consider you in a situation, which, to a young man of your age, and in your circumstances, presents great good to be obtained and accomplished, by a steady, wise and virtuous conduct, and a judicious and faithful improvement of the means and advantages placed within your reach; but exposed to numerous and great temptations, and encompassed with snares and dangers, which render it problematical, whether the result will be ultimately beneficial to you.

It is extremely difficult for the inexperience of youth to attain clear ideas and a just sense of the vast importance of a diligent and wise improvement of the early part of life—of keeping clear of the follies and vices, into which the young are liable to fall, and as much as may be out of the way of temptation—of governing their appetites and passions—of fixing good principles in their minds—of acquiring and cultivating good and beneficial habits, habits of industry, economy, temperance, chastity, justice, honesty, integrity, benevolence, kindness and mercy—of steadily pursuing a virtuous and manly line of conduct—of reverencing the name, the word and the worship of God, and in short, of early piety and true religion.

Therefore, as your father was long since taken away, permit me in his stead, with the affectionate tenderness and concern of a father for his son, to entreat and beseech you, to remember and habitually bear in mind, that the existence begun in this world is to continue forever, and that during the short period of your present life, your character will be formed for eternity, and a foundation laid for endless glory or endless misery—that the eye of God is continually upon you and nothing can be hid from him—that in order to escape everlasting destruction and be happy hereafter, you must be born of God, and saved by grace, through faith in Christ—that the holy scriptures, however lightly esteemed and despised by many, are indeed the word of the living God, and contain the only true and perfect rule of faith and practice. Be persuaded, therefore, to read them with attention—to attend, with conscientious diligence, the sacred institutions therein contained and inculcated—to refrain from every thing which appears to be contrary to the will of God revealed in his word, and to study to conform in all respects to his revealed will, and to let no day pass without prayer and thanksgiving to God. Be persuaded likewise, to be particularly careful, that you do not consent to the enticements of sinners, or associate with the vicious and profane; but choose the virtuous, the well behaved and pious for your companions, remembering that “he who walketh with wise men shall be wise; but a companion of fools shall be destroyed.”

Let me entreat you also, to be particularly cautious against the too frequent practice of disregarding and despising instructors and governors, and treating their instructions and counsels, reproofs and authority with neglect and contempt; and on the contrary, to respect and esteem them, and to endeavor to possess their good will and esteem by a uniformly steady, orderly and dutiful, unassuming and modest carriage and behaviour—to exercise diligence and discretion in the prosecution of your studies, taking advice and direction from your teachers, and such as, thro’ age and experience, are likely to be in that way serviceable to you. And whilst you labor to make proficiency in the knowledge of arts and sciences, and the various branches of polite or useful literature, remember, that the wisdom which is from above, involving the fear of the Lord, is highly necessary to fit you for acting in a manner most honorable and useful to yourself and to others, in any public business or station, calling or profession, and absolutely essential to your future everlasting felicity.

I know not with what sentiments and feelings you may be likely to receive this letter, which an earnest desire for your best good has induced me to write; tho’ on account of extreme low health, it has been not a little labor and weariness to me. But if you should take it in good part, and it should, thro’ the blessing of God, prove the occasion or means of any real benefit to you, I shall think myself most amply recompensed.

An Address from the Trustees of the Missionary Society of Connecticut, to the Inhabitants of the New-Settlements, in the northern and Western parts of the United States.

Christian Friends and Brethren.

THE deep impressions which the entirely destitute condition of various of the New-Settlements, in the States of New-York and Vermont, with respect to the preaching of the gospel, the administration of the ordinances, and the enjoyment of the means of grace in general made upon the minds of the ministers and good people of this state, with a consideration of their inability, in their infancy, to support those means, induced them, some years since, to devise and effect measures for the assistance of those settlements. With a view that you and your dear children might, with us and ours, enjoy the blessings of the gospel, six general contributions have been made through the state, and a considerable number of missionaries have been annually employed in preaching the gospel, instructing your children, administering the sacraments, and in gathering churches unto the name of the Lord among you. They appear to us to have endured much self-denial and hardship, and to have been laborious for your souls, for Christ's and the gospel's sake. You have witnessed their zeal, labors and concern for you and your offspring. We hope that through the divine blessing both you and they have profited by their faithful and holy ministrations. Those of us, who, during those years, have been appointed by the Missionary Society of Connecticut, to carry their benevolent designs into execution have employed much concern and many prayers in your behalf, have expended much time and labor, and been at considerable expense annually, to serve the best interests of yourselves and children, whom, in general, we never saw, nor expect to see until we shall meet in the great and general judgment. Under these surest pledges of our benevolent concern and regards for you, we persuade ourselves that you will, in a candid and most serious manner receive, the address which we now make to you, and that you will earnestly and immediately attend to the duties which we recommend.

Know, we beseech you, That religion is the great concern and business of man. Wisdom is the principal thing; the one thing needful. Therefore get wisdom. Seek first the kingdom of God and the righteousness thereof. That you and your families may be under the best advantages for this, labor, as soon as your circumstances will possibly admit, to obtain the constant, regular preaching of the word, and administration of the ordinances among you. Be assured, that Faith comes by hearing, and hearing by the word of God; and that by the foolishness of preaching it pleaseth him to save them that believe. Prize the gospel more than thousands of gold and silver, and spare no pains nor expense to enjoy it. Until you can obtain the stated preaching of the gospel and administration of the ordinances among you, constantly assemble every Lord's day for the public worship, though you may not be able to obtain a preacher. Let your ablest and best men lead in your prayers, and read to you sermons on the most interesting and important subjects. Be careful to be doers as well as hearers of the word, that you may be blessed in your deeds. By constantly keeping up the public worship among you, you will habituate yourselves and your children to it. It will enable you to maintain a sense of religion on your hearts, be an important mean of your sanctification of the sabbath, and of calling up your attention to all other Christian duties.

We wish you to search the scriptures daily, and that the word of God may dwell in you richly in all wisdom and spiritual understanding, and that you may take it for your counsellor and heritage forever. While these words which the Lord your God hath commanded you are in your hearts, according to the divine command, *Teach them diligently to your children, and talk of them when you sit in your houses, and when you walk by the way, and when you lie down, and when you rise up. Diligently teach the catechism, morals and good things contained in the books which we have sent, or may send unto you. While you have before you an ocular demonstration of our care and concern for them, we beseech, and plead with you for the fruit of your own bodies, that you would not neglect them, but bring them up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord. Pray with them abundantly, restrain them from evil practices, and from the company of evil men. Set them good examples; govern them well, teaching them subordination to all good government.

While we are sending out unto you missionaries approved and esteemed among us, as pious and faithful brethren who, we persuade ourselves will spare no pains to promote your spiritual interests, to make you rich in faith and good works, and heirs of the heavenly kingdom, we intreat you to receive them with the respect and kindness due to the ministers of Christ, and assist them in all their labors and attempts for your salvation. We send them fully authorized to itinerate and preach the gospel among you, to catechize your children, instruct your young people, assist in your religious conferences, and such as have been duly ordained, to administer the ordinances to the proper subjects, as there may be opportunity, to gather and organize churches, and in general to assist you in all your spiritual concerns. We intreat you not to neglect the precious opportunity and advantages which you will have through their ministrations; but most zealously and faithfully improve them. Boast not of tomorrow, but realize that the present time and opportunities are the only ones you may ever enjoy.

Besides, we wish to observe, that the present time, with you, is a most important juncture, and that the manner in which you now conduct yourselves will have great and lasting influence on the state of the New-Settlements; on your own present and future state, and on that of your descendants. If you will maintain religion in your families, sanctify the Christian sabbath, support the public worship, make the scriptures the rule of your faith and practice, attend the secret duties of religion, and habituate your children to these holy practices, they will have the happiest aspect on the honor, peace and comfort of your families, and on the order, peace and beauty of your settlements in a civil and temporal view. They will prove the most powerful guard against all the vices which make individuals, families and communities in general disorderly, inglorious and miserable. The tendency of a zealous, faithful and persevering attention to these great points will be to promote all those virtues which make a people honorable and happy. Righteousness

* Deut. vi. 6, 7.

exalteth a nation. The blessing of the Lord is upon a righteous people, and it extends to their posterity. He sheweth mercy unto a thousand generations of them who love him and keep his commandments. We beseech you therefore, by all our care and love for you, by all these weighty considerations, by the commands and love of God, and our Lord Jesus Christ, that you would by no means neglect these momentous duties.

We have given direction to all our missionaries to communicate this address to you as an introduction to their labors among you. By this you may know that they have been authorized and sent by us.

We persuade ourselves, that the charitable and good people among you will enter into our views and feelings with respect to the new and vacant settlements, and the Heathen who are perishing for lack of vision, and that they will unite their prayers and charity with ours, for the furtherance of the gospel among them. We pray God to give you understanding in all things, to bless you in all your lawful labors and enjoyments, and especially to grant that your souls may be in health and prosper.

By order of the board of Trustees of the Missionary Society of Connecticut.

ABEL FLINT, Secretary.
Hartford, May 26, 1801.

A Plan of government for the Churches in the new settlements.

At a Meeting of the General Association of the State of Connecticut, holden at Litchfield, June 16th, 1801.

VOTED to approve the following regulations proposed by the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in America, viz.

“ Regulations adopted by the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in America, and by the General Association of the State of Connecticut, with a view to prevent alienation, and promote union and harmony, in those new settlements which are composed of inhabitants from these bodies.

1st. It is strictly enjoined on all their missionaries to the new settlements, to endeavour, by all proper means, to promote mutual forbearance and accommodation, between those inhabitants of the new settlements who hold the presbyterian and those who hold the congregational form of church government.

2d. If in the new settlements, any church of the congregational order shall settle a minister of the presbyterian order, that church may, if they choose, still conduct their discipline according to congregational principles, settling their difficulties among themselves or by a council mutually agreed upon for that purpose: But if any difficulty shall exist between the minister and the church or any member of it, it shall be referred to the Presbytery to which the minister shall belong, provided both parties agree to it, if not, to a council consisting of an equal number of presbyterians and congregationalists, agreed upon by both parties.

3d. If a presbyterian church shall settle a minister of congregational principles, that church may still conduct their discipline according to presbyterian principles, excepting that if a difficulty arise between him and his church, or any member of it, the cause shall be tried by the Association, to which the said minister shall belong, provided both parties agree to it, otherwise by a council, one half congregationalists and the other half presbyterians, mutually agreed on by the parties.

4th. If any congregation consist partly of those who hold the congregational form of discipline and partly of those who hold the presbyterian form; we recommend to both parties, that this be no obstruction, to their uniting in one church and settling a minister; and that in this case, the church choose a standing committee from the communicants of said church, whose business it shall be, to call to account every member of the church, who shall conduct himself inconsistently with the laws of christianity, and to give judgment on such conduct: and if the person condemned by their judgment, be a presbyterian, he shall have liberty, to appeal to the Presbytery; if a congregationalist, he shall have liberty to appeal to the body of the male communicants of the church; in the former case the determination of the Presbytery shall be final, unless the church consent to a further appeal to the Synod or to the General Assembly; and in the latter case, if the party condemned shall wish for a trial by a mutual council the cause shall be referred to such council. And provided the said standing committee of any church, shall depute one of themselves to attend the Presbytery, he may have the same right to sit and act in the Presbytery, as a ruling elder of the Presbyterian Church.

Passed in Association,

Attest

NATHAN PERKINS, Scribe.

QUESTION.

An explanation is desired of Luke xvi. 8, 9.

Religious Intelligence.

Extract of a Letter from Rev. Dr.

HAWES of Aldwinkle, England, to Rev. Dr. Rodgers of New-York, dated in May last.

"I AM just going up to London, to meet our brethren in our annual assembly for Missionary purposes, and have the pleasure of informing you, that our work at the Cape of Good Hope is very prosperous and promising. The first fruits to Christianity, among the Hottentots, have written to us their grateful acknowledgements, for the truth as it is in Jesus preached unto them, and embraced in the love of it by them. A large society at the Cape, of 229 members, vigorously pursue the same objects with us, and about 2000 heathen are under their tuition.

"From our affiliated society in Friesland, we have received the most cordial co-operation, and several German brethren have been proposed to us and accepted by us. Three of them are immediately to be added as a reinforcement to the Cape mission.

"Among ourselves the work continues to spread greatly; the sheet anchor of hope for our country. I look more to the Gospel for our deliverance and preservation from the devouring scourge, than to our victories in the Baltic, Egypt, or elsewhere."

A short extract from the Journal of a Missionary in the new settlements.

"Tuesday February 10th, 1801, I rode about ten miles and preached at Mr. R——'s, from Daniel v. 23. "And the God in whose hand thy breath is, and whose are all thy ways, hast thou not glorified." There are but four families in this settlement. I preached here about the beginning of last September, at the funeral of an infant. I was then at a loss about coming to attend the funeral, being 15 miles off when sent to ; but now I am glad that I attended. I believe God sent me here then and now too. To-day, after service was over, I discoursed with two women, who, since the time referred to, have obtained a hope of an interest in Christ. They seem to talk well. I hope the Lord has been doing something for them. They were exceeding glad of the opportunity of hearing a sermon. Why may we not say there has been an awakening in this settlement ? Out of four families, two persons have received a hope. Let there be as great a proportion in a large settlement, and we should call it a remarkable work of God. This is an encouragement to Missionaries to notice small settlements and neighborhoods."

Extract of a letter from Rev. Joseph Badger, Missionary to New-Connecticut, dated No. 1. 6th Range June 23d, 1801.

"I really want a fellow laborer in this great wilderness, and I think the cause of God loudly calls for one. I have spent my time until now in about 12 townships in the south-east part of the Reserve, excepting four sabbaths, one of which I was in Washington, after attending Presbytery, one at Mackinac, and the other two near the line against No. 2 & 5, in the 1st Range, where there appears to be considerable serious awakening. There appears a general disposition among the people to hear, and in some instances real conviction. I expect to be at Hudson, on the 10th Range, next sabbath, and to spend the rest of my time on the western and northern parts of the Reserve until I return to New-England, unless I should go, in the month of September, to the Shawney tribe of Indians. George Bluejacket, son of the great Shawney chief, is much engaged that I should go with him to his people ; the gentleman with whom he is at school, and the Presbytery are also urgent that I should go. The reasons are, he is to all appearance a subject of powerful convictions, and from some views he has about religion, and exercises in it, it is hoped sometimes that he has found the pearl of great price. He wants some one to go with him, and help him to tell his people about religion, and see if they will not be willing to have some Missionaries come among them and teach them religion and how to live. His object is now only to make a visit of about two weeks to his people and then return to his school. I should be glad to have the opinion of the Committee on the subject by the earliest conveyance.

"The prospects of this country are very flattering ; respectable people are flocking in from every quarter. The crops at this season afford the most flattering prospects. A remarkable degree of health prevails through the country. The friendly disposition of the Indians banishes all apprehensions of danger from them. If the Lord should make this wilderness as a watered garden by planting and nourishing up his church in it, there would be no place more desirable to live in.

"I have the copy of a letter from the Rev. James M'Grady in Kentucky, giving a particular account of an awakening and work of grace carried on there the last season. I have not time to transcribe it and send it by this opportunity."

MISSIONARIES.

The Rev. Job Swift lately returned from a mission of a few weeks to the North-Western parts of Vermont.

The Rev. David Higgins expects to enter on a mission, the beginning of this month, to the western countries of New-York.

POETRY.

COMMUNICATED AS ORIGINAL.

TO THE REVEREND EDITORS OF THE CONNECTICUT EVANGELICAL MAGAZINE.

SHOULD the following version of the 29th chapter of Job be thought worthy of a place in the next number of your useful publication, it will much oblige one of your readers. If the attention of a single person can be drawn to the beauty, and fablimely poetical spirit of the original, by this small effort, I shall be convinced that it was not made in vain.

C. Y. A.

MOREOVER Job continued his complaint,
And mournful strains his former glory paint.

" Oh that I were again, as once I was,
When God stood forth to plead my righteous cause ;
When light divine my ev'ry way o'er-spread,
And strange effulgence shone around my head !

" Oh might I be, as in my younger years,
When mysteries sublime dispell'd my fears ;
When the Almighty visited my house,
And blest with children sweet, my marriage vows ;
When ev'ry good of life I largely stor'd,
And streams of ' food and gladness' round me pour'd ;
When I with pomp proceeded through the street,
And in the midst prepar'd my lofty seat :

" The young men saw me, and themselves withdrew ;
The aged rose, and render'd homage due ;
The princes paus'd, and not a whisper crept,
So strict a silence, from respect, they kept ;
The nobles, full of reverence, ceas'd to speak ;
No murmur from their lips was heard to break.

" The ear was glad whene'er it heard my voice,
The eye which saw me hasten'd to rejoice ;
Because a patron of the poor I stood,
And gave the fatherless to taste my food ;
Because to him o'er whom woes seem'd to bend,

I always introduc'd myself a friend.
The thanks of him in danger I receiv'd,
And fill'd with joy the widow sorely griev'd.

" In righteousness array'd, a light I stood,
With judgment showing what was just and good.

Through me the blind their loss of sight forgot,
Through me the lame, that lameness was their lot :
I rais'd the fall'n, I search'd the unknown cause,
And brought oppression down by wholesome laws ;

The jaws of the profane I boldly broke,
And from their fasten'd gripe the booty took.

" 'Twas then I fondly hop'd my life would be Replete with years, and bright prosperity.

In great magnificence, and pomp, I stood,
Like some tall tree the glory of the wood ;
With moisture sweet and pure my roots were fill'd,
And dews ambrosial on my top distill'd ;
Myself in vigour and in strength I view'd ;
My might as in a bow I felt renew'd.

" When I began to speak they all gave ear,
And my advice seem'd willingly to hear ;
When I had finish'd, nought they wish'd to say,
For to the heart my speeches made their way.

" Just as in times of drought, the drooping grain,

And thirsty fields, and with'ring grafs complain ;
But when some fruitful shower on them
descends,
They raise their heads ; their time of mourning ends.
So all the crowd my sentiments besought,
And as the latter rain receiv'd each thought.
Was I familiar, they dar'd not advance,
Nor e'er presum'd t' abash my countenance,
I led their way, I sat as chief, as king,
Or those who to th' afflicted comfort bring."

It is desired that some ingenious person would paraphrase the succeeding chapter, as it forms a very striking contrast with this.

A sure Remedy for a sad heart.

1. WHILE all the fair Volumes of Science and Art
My mind, seeking pleasure, with ardor surveys,
There's nothing I find that can cure my sad heart.
There's nothing can teach an enjoyment of days.
2. 'Tis thy blessed Volume, great Father of lights,
Can yield the enjoyment of days and of peace.
This is the sure treasure—the source of delights
Which never delude and which never will cease.
3. 'Tis there that thy name is delightfully view'd,
'Tis there that thy love is most precious-
ly shewn,
'Tis there thou appearest, the great,
wife and good,
While justice and grace are the laws of thy throne.
4. How happy the people that know the glad sound,
In thy pleasing light will they walk all the day :
They trust thee, and love thee, and joys must abound,
While that joyfal light, thou wilt ne'er take away.
5. In sickness and sorrows—reproaches and woes—

"In poverty's vale"—or in riches bright
sky—

Amidst disappointments, convulsions and foes,
Thy strong arms of mercy will ever be nigh.

6. A sight of thy justice, combined with thy grace

A sight of thy love as pourtray'd on the cross

Will all the impressions of sorrow efface
And work a true gain, from the heaviest loss.

7. Great Sovereign of all, we are filled with fear—

Till from the blest pages we learn thy design.

There holiness, wisdom and goodness appear,

And none but the Proud, can refuse to reign.

8. Allur'd by thy name, then in thee I'll confide

Eternal concernments, with thee I will trust,

While faith is an anchor the storms to outride

And eyes to see yonder, the prize of the just.

9. Let, Father of mercies! thy truths be made known,

They'll suffice to make glad every indigent soul!

—Poor Deists and Heathen! alas!
how they grieve,

With nothing to render the wounded heart whole.

10. O send thy good spirit and teach them thy word,

Their obstinate hearts will relent and be still,

They'll bless thee, and praise thee, and own thee their Lord,

And do, with a pleasure supreme, all thy will.

11. Enraptured with knowing thee,
Here they will feast

On dainties which sinners can never procure,

Hereafter!—their love to perfection increas'd,

Will yield full delights, which forever endure.

ALANSON.

Donation to the Missionary Society of Connecticut.

From a Friend of Missions,

Dolls. Cts.

Digitized by Google 11 16

THE

Connecticut Evangelical Magazine.

[PUBLISHED ACCORDING TO ACT OF CONGRESS.]

VOL. II.]

OCTOBER, 1801.

[No. 4

Evidence of Human Depravity.

HISTORY and observation afford abundant evidence of the truth of the scripture account of the depravity of human nature. They are an unexceptionable comment on the sacred text. God has pleased, in the progress of time, to place men in a great variety of situations, calculated, in various degrees, to bring out to view their true character; and he will continue to vary those situations, in future, until it is as fully disclosed as the nature of the divine government requires. Thus, not only individuals, for the period of their lives, but the whole race as such, from the fall to Christ's second coming, are in a state of probation. During this period the heart of man will be fully proved; and it will appear, from fact and experience, that it is deceitful above all things and desperately wicked. God will be found to be true, but every man a liar.

To attain the ends of this trial and probation of human nature, fully, a long period of time seems necessary, and during its progress, a certain degree of order among men is requisite; for, without this,

the race of man itself would be exterminated, and no opportunity would remain for the dispensations of divine mercy. Hence the necessity of great and powerful restraints on the lusts and passions of men. In providing these, at different times, and in degrees suited to the course of events fixed in the divine counsels, the power, wisdom and goodness of God are wonderfully displayed. In viewing the character of man, however, under the operation of such restraints we are apt to form conclusions too much in his favor; for by means of them, no doubt, much wickedness is prevented, and a semblance of goodness is often exhibited; still, as they produce their effect by laying a force upon, and not by changing the inclinations of the heart, they ought to be laid wholly out of the question, in forming an estimate of the human character. In proportion as these are withdrawn, the naked human heart appears. And in order to discover it to the view of finite minds, God is pleased, from time to time, to withdraw those restraints, as far as the state of things will admit.

Among the countless restraints which limit the reign of wickedness are, natural conscience, or a moral sense, common to men, by which they distinguish between right and wrong, with the comfort or remorse which pursues the sentence it passes on our moral conduct, accompanied with a presentiment of future retribution—a conviction that the judgment of God will be according to truth and righteousness—a hope, resulting from revelation, tradition, or the expressions of the divine benignity, of appeasing God's anger and conciliating his favor, by our services and offerings—remarkable judgments with which God has visited a wicked world, and in which he has shewn his wrath and made his power known, to every age and nation—the shortness of human life after the deluge—a consciousness which all men feel of weakness and mutual dependence, the fear of evil from those we injure, and a hope of good from those we treat with justice and benevolence—civil government—the dread of shame, of loss of reputation, health and interest, which is, more or less, connected with a course of vice; and the desire of reputation and influence of health and affluence which usually attend a course of virtue—pity, which, by a law of our nature, is excited by objects in distress—friendship, founded on a similarity of tastes and pursuits—the natural affections, which exist between those, whom the God of order has called to act together in the most intimate connections, where the sinful passions are apt to be brought into perpetual collision—the interfering pursuits of men which limit the sphere of individual agency, and confine the effects of selfishness within narrower bounds; and, to mention no more, even the interfering lusts in the same heart, which limit each other, or subject the weaker to the predominant passion.

Such are the bands and cords by which Almighty God binds, in such degree as he pleases, a race of apostate creatures, who refuse to be united to him and to one another, in that charity which is the bond of perfectness.

God has been pleased however, for wise and holy purposes, in every age, and under every degree of light which has shone on the world, to remove these restraints, or some of them, from nations and from individuals, and in such degree as to give sufficient openings into the human heart.

It may be useful to illustrate, in the conduct of nations and of individuals, in a few particulars, these general observations.

It is an undoubted fact, that nations, in relation to each other, are under fewer restraints, than individuals, in a state of society, are: the former must be considered, in relation to each other, as individuals in a state of nature, without any law to control them, but that of force or convenience. Power and right are, with them, considered and treated as the same thing. The weaker may, thro' fear, be induced to respect the rights of the stronger, but whenever by uniting their strength or otherwise, the balance of power may be in their favor, they will shew the same disregard to right as others. Add to this, individual responsibility for national injustice is very lightly felt, the still small voice of conscience, which may whisper in individuals, will be silenced by the voice of the nation; the dishonor of national baseness and perfidy will be felt to be more than compensated, by the splendor of victory and conquest, and the advantages resulting from national aggrandizement. Accordingly, the nations which have shed most blood, have, in all ages, not excepting the present, been held the most renowned. Compacts and treaties with each other, though, among Pagans, the gods above and gods below, and among Christians, the Holy Trinity, are called upon in the most solemn manner, to avenge their violation, are mere straw and rotten wood; no one expects they will be maintained with good faith, even at the solemn moment of ratification; they are received as matters of necessity, use or convenience, and to be laid aside, either with or without a pretext, when interest requires. The nations, considered as individuals or bodies politic, have been, with few exceptions, atrocious murderers, their feet have been swift to shed blood, and they have had no fear of God before their eyes.

This sketch of the character of nations is supported by the representations of them in the holy scriptures. The four great monarchies are there represented by four ferocious beasts of prey; the Chaldean by a lion, the Persian by a bear, the Grecian by a leopard, and the Roman by a beast, sei generis, which had no prototype in nature, dreadful and terrible and strong exceedingly, which had great iron teeth, which devoured, brake in pieces, and stamped the residue with the feet of it, and which had ten horns. Such is the true character of nations the most powerful and illustrious, whose great exploits, in laying waste the world, have been celebrated in all ages since they figured upon the theatre of human affairs, by poets and historians, and indeed by mankind in general. And such is the character of all other nations, so far as they have had power and opportunity to display themselves; and so true is the divine declaration, "My thoughts are not your thoughts, neither are your ways my ways." From the character of nations we may certainly infer the character of the body of the people or individuals which compose them; if these loved their fellow-men as they do themselves, they would prevent the prosecution of unjust or cruel wars; and, if they had the fear of God before their eyes, they would find means to secure the faithful and religious observance of treaties; they are therefore, unless they manifest, in some proper way, their dissent, guilty of all the fraud, injustice, cruelty, murder, perfidy and impiety, of the nation which they compose, and as individuals they must account to God the common Father of men. Why do they freely perpetrate such horrid wickedness as members of a nation, which, perhaps, they would not do as individuals? Because their temptations are greater, and their restraints less. Here then the human heart appears stripped of disguise. The same appears in the conduct of most kings and great men who are above, and of many mean and base men who are in some sense below the cognizance of law. The former prove tyrants and oppressors; the latter, protected by their poverty and meanness, prove cheats, liars, thieves, drunkards and are addicted in general to what is called low vice. The infant of a span long feels few restraints; if disturbed in its enjoyments, it will show that perverse and wrathful temper which, strengthened by time and left unrestrained, will impel to murder;

it appears to be wholly selfish ; it will soon fight the breast that feeds it ; it never doubts, till taught the contrary by painful experience, that all things around were made to subserve its interests and pleasures ; it will fight the person who takes away its baubles, just as nations fight with one another on a like account ; if, by means of its sickness or otherwise it is excessively indulged, it will, when able, soon fill the house with noise, and indiscriminately deal its rage around ; the fondest endearments serve to nourish peevishness and pride, instead of gratitude and obedience. If effectually restrained by a temperate parental authority, it will begin to feel its true situation, as related to those around, and to conduct accordingly ; but if not, it will disobey its parents, it will lie, it will soon slip out oaths and imprecations, and shew that the poison of asps is under its lips, and that its mouth is full of cursing and bitterness ; it will quarrel, and, in a word, will rush, with the whole force of nature, into all manner of vice, as opportunity presents and age permits.

The force of natural conscience is always diminished as persons advance in life, unless they are renewed, and in part sanctified by the Spirit of God. Its genuine dictates are suppressed, and at last nearly or quite annihilated ; and if they, when advanced, maintain a decorous conduct, it must be owing to the operation of other restraints ; and this will be visible to the eye of critical observation : But, in consequence of the gradual diminution of this powerful restraint, there is observable, in most men, a gradual depreciation of character, until the lusts of the heart gain a great and visible ascendancy. Such being the state of things, how happy is it for the church and world, that God has reduced the life of man from near a thousand years to three score years and ten. Had it not been for this wise and gracious appointment, another deluge of water, or of fire, might, long ago, have been necessary to sweep the world of its wicked inhabitants.

A man of boisterous and unbalanced passions, when in the presence of his prince, or other great man, and paying his court for some favor which he holds most dear, will be a paragon of gentleness and patience : But follow him, after the tumult within is raised to the highest violence, by some untoward events, to his own house ; and his passions, let loose upon the unhappy objects around him, will overturn every thing in their course, and will display a scene ten-fold more dreadful than that of conflicting elements. What is the matter now ? Why restraints are removed, and the man acts out his nature freely. An aperture or opening is made into his heart, and we have a glimpse of the dreadful object, which is always naked and opened unto the eyes of him with whom we have to do.

A person of impure desires and wholly un sanctified, whose memory and fancy are the store-house of filth and pollution, and whose understanding has been debased, and compelled, it may be, for a long time, to pander for sense ; and all whose faculties are brutalized by sensual indulgencies, will, in the presence of persons of a different description, assume the character of purity itself : But trace his steps to his customary haunts, or into retirement, covered with night and darkness, where no eye sees him but that of an associate in guilt, and the eye of Almighty God ;

on, perhaps, that of God alone: here I will close the scene, for it is a shame even to speak of those things which are done by such in secret. The reason of this conduct is plain, the eye of man, from whom he fears evil and expects good, is a restraint; but the eye of God from whom perhaps he expects nothing and fears nothing, is either no restraint, or not sufficient to prevent the guilty indulgence.

When a vicious and profligate course is attended with shame and infamy, vice will, for the most part, be driven into corners. In such a state of society, a wicked man, who nevertheless is conscious of enjoying a fair reputation, will be careful to preserve it, if he can do it, and still indulge his reigning propensity; if not, he will sooner or later give up his reputation, and he is then prepared to give the reins to his predominant inclination, and to sin, as it were, with a cart-rop. Such is the state of the notorious libertine, thief and drunkard; but when such like characters are greatly multiplied, so that vice is kept in countenance, and the benefit of a fair character is comparatively small, in the intercourse of society; especially, if the people have enjoyed great light and advantages for religion, the state of such a people must be viewed as nigh unto cursing.

Persons brought up in pious families, and under the restraints of well regulated society will usually be moral in their conversation; but place them in any situation where restraints are mostly taken off, and they may be expected, if renewed; to shew the bent of nature, and soon to become proficients in the school of vice.

Let reason be impaired by intemperance, and the foul and ferocious passions will rage without control; let it be impaired by old age, and the person, unless a radical change of temper has taken place, will be untractable, self-willed and passionate, so as to become a burden to all around him; and if he has experienced such a change, the remains of corrupt nature, in a like exhibition of it, to a certain degree, will be apparent; or let it be impaired by distraction, and the person will be imperious, or malicious, or profane, or obscene; or all of them at turns, as the propensities, apparent in those exercises, prevail. This last instance is as fair a trial of the native inclinations of the heart as any of the former; for, as those inclinations exist independently of reason, they will shew themselves as they really are, when reason is impaired, and no longer controls them.

Let dishonor be detached from a particular vice, and attached to the opposite virtue, as, in the case of duelling, it is in the opinion of the world; and few men, except such as are not of this world, will be able to resist the temptation of giving or accepting a challenge to fight with sword and pistol, when the laws of honor, falsely so called, require it. Such as do this, and such as give countenance to it, and especially such, whose province it is to execute the laws on the atrocious offenders, and from a criminal complaisance to public opinion, neglect to do it, are all murderers; though they would resent the imputation with as much spirit as Hazael did, with an "Is thy servant a dog that he should do this great thing"?

The infidels of the present day are under fewer restraints than the ancient pagans; for these last had not abandoned, but only corrupted the worship of God, nor did they disbelieve a state of future retribution ; but the former have wholly abandoned the worship of God, and most of them consider death as an eternal sleep : accordingly, they are more gigantic in wickedness than any of their predecessors who warred on heaven, they have boldly attacked all authority and power in heaven and on earth ; and this they have done, under the full splendor of gospel light, and should they continue to increase in numbers and in power, as they have lately done, and should they proceed to exterminate pity and the natural affections from the human breast, as inconsistent with their impious philanthropy, the miseries which they have already produced, though they have filled one half of the world, will be but the beginning of sorrows ; and in their further progress they will prepare the way for the battle of the great day of God Almighty. But not to enlarge,

In view of this subject I will conclude by observing, that all the friends of God have great reason to be humbled in the reflection that they carry about them great remains of this common nature—to bless God that he has seen fit, in favor to his church, hitherto to lay under such powerful restraints a race of apostate creatures, and to rejoice in the assured hope, that they will be continued so long, and so far as shall be necessary for the accomplishment of the purposes of God in building up, completing and glorifying the kingdom of his Son.

OMICRON.

Of the usefulness of the Scripture doctrine of Election.

MANY, who admit the doctrine of particular Election to be contained in the holy scriptures, yet consider it as unprofitable, if not dangerous. Had this been the sense of the author of our holy religion, it never would have appeared there. But in a harmonious system, such as the bible contains, the use of particular doctrines may not readily be discerned, unless viewed in their connection with others to which they are related. Should we set aside the doctrine of the entirely lost, ruined state of man—of the mere, sovereign good pleasure of God in his recovery—and, of the absolute necessity of the supernatural influences of the Holy Spirit on the hearts of men, to prepare them for the gospel-salvation ; we could discover no use, or even place for the scripture doctrine of Election. But in connection with these doctrines, it is not difficult to discover, both its certainty, and its usefulness. If the salvation of sinners is to be resolved ultimately into the mere sovereign power and mercy of God as its cause, it will appear altogether correspondent and suitable that God alone should choose the vessels of mercy. Accordingly,

1. It is difficult to suppose, that the sinner should become properly sensible of his really undone, helpless state and condition, without a conviction that his recovery depends on the sovereign pleasure, and the electing love of God. Nothing is more obvious, than that our salvation must depend, either on ourselves and such exertions of ours as are compatible with our natural dispositions, and with the moral powers we, all, possess ; or, on the sovereign power and grace of God. Between these, there is no medium. If, on the former, whoever obtains salvation maketh himself to differ and bath subservient to glory. If, on the latter, the recovery of the sinner depends on the electing purpose and love of God. But when we attend to the character, which the holy scriptures give of the sinner, and the representations there made of the human heart, it will readily be seen, that no one, who imagines that his eternal salvation depends on any exertions, which it is compatible with his present disposition to make, and will be connected with them, has any proper sense of the really wretched, helpless state and condition he is in. That conviction, which is of great importance to a right understanding of the nature and extent of gospel mercy, and which usually precedes conversion, implies such a discovery of the wickedness and obstinacy of our own hearts, as forces the conclusion upon us, that if we are ever brought to be willing to lie at the mercy of God, and love and rejoice in such a salvation as is offered in the gospel, it must be done, not only by a power foreign to our own, but by one which operates against all the natural biases of our hearts, and overcomes them. This conviction strongly impresses the sinner's mind with a persuasion of his absolute dependence on the sovereign mercy and electing love of God for salvation.

And the scripture doctrine of Election is evidently calculated to produce this conviction—a conviction without which it cannot be, that we should ever properly estimate the nature, and see the glory of that divine mercy, by which sinners are saved.

2. That God has, of his sovereign good pleasure, elected a certain number of the human race to eternal life, is the only doctrine, which affords any ground of hope to the sinner, when convinced of those other scripture truths with which it is connected. Without a knowledge of this, a sinner under proper conviction could find no ground of hope. Increasing light will discover increasing opposition of heart to God, and to the way of salvation by Christ. That, were the sinner, who has any clear discovery of the state of his own heart, to feel that it depended ultimately on himself—on the exertions of such a heart as he now possesses, whether he should ever comply with the proposals of the gospel, he would at once lose all hope. The only consideration, which will prevent despair, is, that God has mercy because he will have mercy, and on whom he will have mercy. This must be so, because it so evidently appears, from the word of God, that nothing short of the mighty power and influence of the Holy Spirit ever brings the heart of the sinner into the sentiments of the gospel. Since the sufficiency of the atonement, and the free and rich offers of mercy, both, leave the sinner's heart where they find it—under the entire dominion of sin; the plan of salvation would be incomplete without the doctrine of Election. Were it not for those saving purposes and that sovereign mercy; which necessarily imply a particular election, a conviction in the conscience of those truths, which are clearly taught in the word of God, would leave the sinner in a hopeless state. Without this doctrine—without evidence, both of the power, and the purpose of Christ to cause dead sinners to hear his voice, there could be no certainty that any one of the human race would be saved. Thus evidently is the doctrine of Election fitted to promote conviction, and at the same time to prevent despair.

3. The doctrine of Election gives an assurance, which could not be had without it, that the greatest good shall be accomplished, and the highest measures of felicity be the fruit of the glorious work of Redemption.

The good to be accomplished by the work of redemption, will be answerable to the wisdom and love, which appear in this most glorious of all the works of God. That the salvation of a certain number and proportion of the human race will best satisfy divine infinite love, God himself has decided. This is evident, from the clear, explicit declarations of his holy word, that some of mankind shall perish. But to ascertain this number and proportion, is infinitely beyond the power of any, or all created beings. In the doctrine of Election we have assurance, that it is ascertained, and most exactly ascertained, by infinite wisdom and love. God's saving mercy is the perfection and glory of infinite love. Where this appears to the greatest advantage, there the highest good must be effected. Just as many, and no more, of the human race will be saved, as will exhibit the greatest strength, and witness the greatest glory of divine, infinite love. Nor is it supposable that, without the highest measures of created holiness and happiness, Christ could see of the travail of his soul, and be satisfied. If, in the salvation of those whom the Father has given him, the infinitely benevolent heart of the Redeemer will be satisfied, love itself will be satisfied—goodness, the most perfect and infinite can desire no more: Nor is it supposable greater good should be done by the salvation of men.

That God himself, in his infinite wisdom, has ascertained and chosen the number, whose final recovery and salvation will satisfy his own love—that love, which spared not his own Son, but freely gave him up for us all—is a certain evidence, that the greatest good shall be accomplished.—That it is no more possible there should be higher felicity and enjoyment in God's moral kingdom, than will in fact be effected by the work of redemption, than it is possible that the wisdom which chooses the vessels of mercy, and the love which redeems and saves them, should be exceeded. And yet, without the decision of infinite wisdom in the case, the evidence could not be had that the highest and greatest good will be the certain and everlasting fruit of the glorious work of redemption.

4. Without the doctrine of Election, the evidence would be incomplete, that the salvation of sinners results from the mere self-moving love and mercy of God. Were the salvation of any to be independent of the electing love of God, where would be the evidence that grace alone originated and effected it? No scheme of doctrine gives so clear and lively a view of the glory and wonderfulness of divine wisdom and love—the unspeakable richness of divine mercy and grace, as that which represents men so sunk and dead in sin, that their recovery can be attributed to nothing, but the sovereign power and mercy—the all conquering grace of God. And with this, the doctrine of particular election is closely and inseparably connected—in this, it is necessarily implied. Where no distinction is made, in the bestowment of favors, the ground on which they are bestowed, is less distinguishable; and all ground of boasting is not so evidently removed. Were there no election, the evidence of mercy and self-moving goodness, in the bestowment of favors, would be less visible. Where there are no punishments, pardons will be less valued, and their nature and worth ill understood.

Besides, no view of things like that, which best shows the eternal God to be moved purely by the goodness of his own nature, to the recovery of sinners, and which attributes the whole and every part of their salvation to the mere mercy and grace of God, as their cause, is so fitted eternally to bind the heart in humble obedience and love, and raise it to high and delightful admiration of the glory of God as it shines in the face of Christ. No other scheme of doctrine lays the sinner so low in his own view, and so absorbs and swallows up his whole soul in love. Here a foundation is laid for the greatest nearness to God, and the highest felicity in the enjoyment of him.

To set aside the Scripture doctrine of particular Election, obscures the whole system of gospel grace, and casts a shade upon it. It takes away the only ground of hope from impenitent sinners, and renders it utterly uncertain whether any will ever be saved. It obscures the lustre and glory of divine mercy, and leaves the issue of the present state of things at the utmost uncertainty—depriving us of the evidence, that a good, worthy of infinite love, and answerable to the glorious displays which are made of divine power, wisdom and mercy, in the creation, government, and redemption of the world, will ever be accomplished.

On the best manner of preaching the gospel.

THE revelation of saving mercy to sinners, through Jesus Christ, is well termed gospel, or good news. It may be summed up in the concise declaration, that "Jesus Christ came into the world to save sinners."* It is more fully expressed in the divine testimony, that "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten son that whosoever believeth in him should not perish but have everlasting life."† But in whatever form of words it is summarily expressed, a proper explanation will shew that it involves many most interesting and important truths, relating to God, his perfections, character, government, and grace;—relating to man, as a creature and subject of God, and as a sinner against him;—relating to Jesus Christ, in his wonderful person, the union of his divine and human natures, his mediatorial character, offices, and work;—relating to the application of redemption by the agency of the Holy Spirit, in the hearts of sinners, in his renewing and sanctifying influences, by which they are made willing in the days of God's power; are brought to repentance towards God, and faith towards our Lord Jesus Christ; and thus become the subjects of pardoning grace, and are kept by the power of God, through faith to salvation.

It pleased God in the riches of his mercy to sinful man, to inspire a number of chosen witnesses, to commit to writing, the system of Christian truth, as far as was requisite for the communication of saving knowledge, and thus to furnish the world with the sacred scriptures, which are able to make us wise to salvation, through faith in Christ Jesus.

That nothing might be wanting in point of means, he hath graciously instituted the preaching of the gospel, and appointed an order of men, in the Christian church, to address their fellow-sinners, on the great concerns of religion, and the world to come; to explain and inculcate the truths, duties, and prospects opened in the gospel; to proclaim, from the scriptures, the glad tidings of salvation to penitent, believing sinners through the atonement of Christ; and to warn the impenitent and unbelieving of the wrath to come.

* 1 Timothy, i. 15. † John iii. 16.

So important, so glorious and awful are the effects of this ministry, that the apostle, when speaking of himself and his fellow labourers says, "We are unto God a sweet favor of Christ in those who are saved, and in those who perish. To the one we are a favor of death unto death, and to the other of life unto life;" and adds (in which every serious preacher of the gospel will join him.) "Who is sufficient for these things?"*

The preceding observations tend to shew the importance and solemnity of the Christian ministry, as it respects the preachers of the gospel, and those who hear them, and are a sufficient apology for this attempt to suggest a few thoughts on the best manner of preaching the gospel.

The writer is sensible of his inability to treat the subject as he could wish. But he hopes, through divine assistance, to offer something which may be useful, at least, to young ministers; and that, although he may suggest nothing new to the more experienced, he may be instrumental of "stirring up their pure minds by way of remembrance."

The following particulars appear to belong to the best manner of preaching the gospel.

I. The Christian minister must preach the gospel truly.

This is to preach it as it is revealed in the holy scriptures, without any perversion. God is, indeed, able to bring sinners to the saving knowledge of himself, under the most corrupt teachers. But this is not his ordinary way; neither is corrupt and false teaching an instituted mean of grace and salvation, or adapted to the benefit of the hearers, but the contrary, for "faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the word of God."†

If preaching be the proper mean of salvation to the hearers, it is by the exhibition of divine truth to their understandings and hearts, thus they are "begotten through the gospel," and the "pastors after God's heart feed them with knowledge and understanding." This shews us that public, authorized preachers of the gospel should be men of superior knowledge, in Christianity, such as are "able to teach others;" and excludes from the sacred office, the weak and ignorant, and shows that they are not called of God, to this work, whatever their own opinion may be of their ability and their call.

It is equally manifest that heretical teachers are not to be encouraged, whatever abilities they may possess. These do not make manifest the mystery of Christ as they ought to speak or testify the truth as it is in Jesus. Especially if their heresy respect any of the principal doctrines of the gospel. In that case, the apostle Paul represents them as preaching another gospel, and denounceth against them the divine malediction.‡

This naturally excites the enquiry, what are those essential truths of Christianity which must be de-

* 2 Corinthians, ii. 16.

† Rom. x. 17. ‡ Gal. i. 8, 9.

clared if the preacher would, in any good measure, speak as he ought?

To this it may be replied, that the Christian system is connected in all its parts. These may be compared to so many links of a great chain let down from heaven. None of these truths can be denied or obscured without injury to the Christian system.

Some are, however, more important and fundamental than others. These may be differently stated and enumerated by different persons, who equally regard divine truth.

To the writer, the following truths seem to be the most essential, in the foundation of Christianity, viz.

The being, perfections, and unity of God, and his infinitely perfect mode of existence, as a Triune Deity. The truth and divinity of the holy scriptures, of the old and new testament. The divinity and atonement of Christ. The justification of penitent, believing sinners, through his mediatorial righteousness. The total depravity of man, in consequence of the original lapse. The supernatural change of heart, by the agency of the Holy Spirit, in those who believe to the saving of the soul, the sovereignty and freedom of divine grace, in the salvation of sinners, displayed in time, according to the eternal purpose of God.

The nature and necessity of Christian holiness, and its unfailling connection with the faith of the gospel, in those who are saved. And the retributions of eternity, to the righteous and the wicked.

The preacher who enters deeply into these important truths of the gospel, will not, it may be hoped, essentially pervert any other;

and the hearer whose principles and manners are formed on them, will "go on in grace, and in the knowledge, of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ."

II The Christian minister must preach the gospel plainly.

This implies that he present to his hearers the truths of Christianity, in language, easy to be understood by them, that instead of using ambiguity of language, or general and indeterminate assertions, he make it a leading object, next to preaching the simple truths of the gospel, to do it in a manner adapted to the capacity of his hearers, that they may understand him. With the apostle Paul, he will prefer speaking "five words, in the church, with his understanding, that he may edify others, to ten thousand words in an unknown tongue."* He must not only avoid that studied ambiguity by which unfaithful teachers aim at escaping the offence of the cross, and seek to please carnal hearers, but he must study that plainness of address which will render his meaning intelligible to his common hearers, that they may be instructed, convinced and edified.

Cutting is the reproof of the apostle in the passage just mentioned, to the preacher who is more concerned to commend himself to his hearers, as an able, learned, or eloquent man, than to commend the truth as it is in Jesus. But most of all doth the awful censure fall on the faithless timeserver, who hides himself under general and ambiguous language, to avoid the truth. Such may well be ranked with "false apostles, and deceitful workers, who by good words and fair speeches deceive the hearts of the simple. †

* 1 Cor. xiv. 19. † Rom. xvi. 18. and 2 Cor. xi. 13.

III. The Christian minister must preach the gospel demonstratively.

His preaching should be "in the demonstration of the spirit, and of power,"† as distinguished from the enticing words of human wisdom, that the faith of his hearers "may not stand in the wisdom of man; but in the power of God." For this purpose he needs a deep and extensive acquaintance with the Christian system—much and well chosen reading—and much study and prayer, that his views of truth may be clear, and his reasoning, conclusive; and that not merely, to the man of science, and the well studied divine; but to his attentive and serious hearers of common capacity. These constitute the great body of those who hear him, and among these he must look for his principal success. His arguments must therefore be both conclusive and plain. To this end, much depends on the connexion of the parts of his discourse, and the due arrangement of his thoughts.

Nothing is here mentioned touching the manner of speaking most conducive to success. Books of oratory are common, and may be consulted with advantage. Among these, professor Blair's lectures, and Dr. Fordyce's art of preaching deserve particular notice.

After all, to the preacher possessed of proper abilities and information, and who feels the weight and importance of divine things, the subject will inspire an ardor and pathos, more adapted to impress the truth on the minds of his hearers, and affect their hearts, than all the accomplishments of art, without it.

The leading truths of religion already named, must be often clearly stated and urged, and the whole system of Christian truth and duty, connected with them, must be brought into view.

Divine truth, existing in the mind and resting on its mere evidence, is instrumental, through the divine blessing, to convince and convert the sinner; to detect the hypocrite; and to edify the true Christian. It is no less adapted to stop the mouths of gain-sayers, to silence unruly and vain talkers, and bring them to the acknowledgement of the truth. Not indeed without a powerful divine agency attending the word of truth.

Without this Paul may plant and Apollos water, in vain. But this affords no just objection against the use of divinely instituted means, or the least ground to expect that agency in the neglect of them.

IV. The Christian minister must preach the gospel boldly. Thus the apostle Paul requested the prayers of the Ephesians, that he might "open his mouth boldly, to make known the mystery of the gospel—that therein he might speak boldly, as he ought to speak."*—This boldness is essential to the right performance of his duty, as a preacher of the gospel, in distinction from a governing concern to please men, or obtain the approbation of the most respectable hearers, (however desirable when the fruit of fidelity.)

The fear of man must never shut his mouth, from declaring the whole counsel of God, in the most clear, solemn and demonstrative manner. He must keep back nothing, profitable to them, even whether they will hear or forbear, remembering that he is the steward of God, and to him he must shortly give an account.

† 1 Cor. ii. 4.

* Ephes. vi. 19, 20.

This boldness however, is widely different from that self-sufficiency and overbearing authority which have been, in some instances mistaken for it, and by which evil men have done much hurt to the cause of God and the souls of their hearers. The former is the result of deep impressions of the presence and authority of God, the worth of souls, the preciousness of gospel truth and the importance of eternity. The latter indicates the absence of all these, and shews a mind puffed up with religious pride and self-conceit. The boldness dictated and inspired by the gospel is that freedom of thought and expression which results from proper views of spiritual and divine objects. These fill the mind with impressions of their infinite importance, and lay the creature low before God, and thus deliver him from the fear of man by filling him with the fear of God.

V. The Christian minister must preach the gospel with humility.

With this, indeed, he must do all things; it is an essential branch of genuine Christianity. But it is peculiarly important in preaching the gospel.

Humility results from right views of the divine character and government, and of our own character and state. "I have heard of thee," said an eminent saint, "by the hearing of the ear, but now mine eye seeth thee, wherefore I abhor myself, and repent in dust and ashes."* Such was the effect of a clear display of the divine fulness to holy Job, and such will it ever be, to a heart prepared to embrace divine truth. The preacher, deeply impressed with a sense of his own exceeding unworthiness, is prepared to speak honorably of God and Christ, and to address his hearers in a manner adapted to impress their minds, and persuade them to consider their latter end: and thus he "commends the truth to their consciences in the sight of God."

VI. The Christian minister must preach the gospel in the spirit of kindness.

The pious and benevolent preacher, in his preparations for the public solemnities, will contemplate the worth of the soul of man, the malignity of sin, the awfulness of divine wrath, the importance of eternity, and the wonderful love and grace of God, revealed in the gospel, and brought to us through Jesus Christ. All these subjects and especially the last, will prepare him to feel the most tender benevolence to perishing sinners. He will therefore address them from the fulness of his heart, with ardent longing for their salvation. Numerous and weighty are the motives to the kindest address to the souls of his hearers. We add in the last place,

VII. The Christian minister must preach the gospel with solemnity.

This remark results from all which have preceded. The truths to be proclaimed are exceedingly solemn and weighty, as they respect the great things of God, and his wonderful love and grace to guilty man; they are solemn as they relate to the wonderful work of redemption by the obedience and death of our Lord Jesus Christ; and as they respect the joys and sorrows of departed souls—the glorious and dreadful realities of the future and eternal state, and as they respect the final condition of the preacher and his hearers, which will be decided forever, by the abuse or improvement of this momentary state, for "Behold now is the accepted time. Behold now is the day of salvation."

* Job xlii. 5, 6.

The faithful watchman will preserve his own soul, and may hope for the salvation of some, at least, of his hearers, even all who receive the truth in love, and fly for refuge to the hope set before them. But the people of the unfaithful minister, who were not warned by him it is much to be feared, will die in their sins, but their blood will be required at his hand.

How solemn and weighty is the ministerial charge! May all who take it on them feel its importance, and be qualified for its duties; and may the chief shepherd and bishop of souls assist them in their arduous work, and crown their labours with abundant success!

PHILANDER.

An attempt to distinguish such exercises as are the result of genuine religion, from such as are false.

1st. TRUE religion implies self-acquaintance, or a thorough conviction of the total depravity and ruin of human nature; and is the fruit of a new taste, which takes a decided part against self-exaltation, in favor of the divine perfections and government; while that counterfeit religion, which is self-delusive presupposes ignorance of the human heart, consequently is entirely destitute of humility, which flows from nothing but self-acquaintance. The divine law, has never come with power to the conscience, so that the subject is yet alive to himself, and dead to all proper views of God; and those affections which he exercises are toward an imaginary being, an idol-God of his own creating.

2d. The true Christian, while he entertains the most heart-felt loathing of his own original character, beholds, with ineffable complacence, the character of God, as forming a most perfect contrast with his own. He is pained while his thoughts turn on himself as so vile and loathsome, but his heart is filled with exhilarating joy when he adverts to the transporting idea, that infinite perfection fills the universe! And that all this sin and evil, shall be over-ruled, and its natural tendency so counteracted, as that infinite good shall be the glorious result. His soul is revived, his heart leaps within him; that he is encircled by such a God; and he with unspeakable delight yields himself to be disposed of according to the dictates of this infinite perfection. While the fondly deceived and warm-hearted hypocrite, is delighted too, with the character of his God, (for there are "lords many.") He has gotten the idea which is inwrought into the constitution of the heart, that we are offenders. He therefore feels himself exposed to the resentment of an angry God; he is told that there is a door of relief opened for such in the gospel; and exclaims "what marvellous—what astonishing goodness that thus appears to rescue from this infinite threatened evil!" While his soul melts with grateful affection toward his deliverer and benefactor.

3d. The true saint possesses a large, capacious benevolence, and embraces the universe in his bosom. His language is, "let the lord govern, and make such arrangements as will issue in the highest possible good of his kingdom; let me be an happy instrument of promoting this blessed interest, be disposed of in that very way, that will best answer that most benevolent purpose: here is my happiness, in this

I will rejoice. I say not, that I choose misery, or fear it, for I cannot be unhappy, while such a God reigns." But the selfish Christian, if he may be called a Christian, has his views and affections circumscribed by the narrow boundaries of self, or a limited sphere of operation. The spirit of his prayer is "save me and mine, and do as thou wilt with the rest." He has within him no sentiment of delight in a general, diffusive happiness, the good of others. This is peculiar to the new creature, "except a man be born again," he has no union with, nor can he enjoy the kingdom of God.

4th. It is very observable, that the well-informed, self-acquainted Christian, talks very little of his gratitude to God in a view of his benefits, compared with the expressions, of the formal, or legal professor; he is seldom conscious to himself that he is indeed in the present exercise of this highly becoming grace. He sees there is ample occasion for it, but how to attain to it, he knows not. He never promises, in a view of wished for mercy, that he will return a tribute of thankfulness on its reception, for he has been made deeply sensible of his absolute dependence on God, and thoroughly feels that there is no foundation in his heart for an exercise of this grace, "for in him dwells no good thing." By comparing his feelings with the truth, he cannot but hope he possesses its radical spirit, but "WHEN saw we thee an hungered, &c. He mourns and laments over the ingratitude of his heart. This is a "body of death," under which he cries, "who shall deliver me." While the deluded formalist overflows with gratitude, almost continually; he can set apart days of thanksgiving, and have periodical and annual returns of this Christian, but I fear, mechanical grace. May we be saved from delusion—learn to distinguish; and remember that we are to be weighed in a balance, that may prove us wanting!

AMELIA.

Questions and Answers—by AMELIA.

Ques. 1st. ON what ground, does the true Christian submit to, and confide in his God?

Ans. From a firm belief that he will manage all things in the very best manner for his kingdom at large. He does not wish that his individual happiness should be consulted, but derives his enjoyment from a purer, more refined source, to wit, the greatest happiness of intelligent nature—or the good of others.

Ques. From whence originates the fancied submission of the self-deluded hypocrite?

Ans. From an apprehension that by it, he shall be a gainer. He is taught the indispensable necessity of this exercise—that without it there can be no safety for him, he therefore, merely as a refuge from personal evil, throws himself into the hand of God. Not so the true Christian, who confides, not by necessity, but of choice, seeing ample foundation for unlimited confidence in a being of absolute perfection.

Ques. What is the object of true gratitude?

Ans. The true character of a holy God is the immediate object of true gratitude. That there is a being at the head of the universe possessing such endowments as every way qualify him to make the most equal and perfect distribution of things, fills the benevolent heart with holy triumph; and that be will make that very use of him, and all beside, as most effectually to promote the very best ends, excites the purest and most exalted gratitude.

Ques. What are the predominant features of selfish gratitude?

Ans. It is founded on the supposed partial goodness of God. The selfish heart is peculiarly exercised by what he calls redeeming love, that Christ should suffer and die for sinners! What heart would not melt at the idea? But this love and gratitude are built on misapprehension of the great mediatorial work. There never was such an atonement exhibited, nor such a Saviour provided, as the selfish heart forms to itself, while it idolizes the God of its own creating.

Ques. Does not the true Christian exercise gratitude in a view of the work of redemption?

Ans. Yes, but he does it unstandingly. That Christ has magnified the law and made it honorable—that he has witnessed to its righteousness and the ill-desert of sin, and sealed it with his blood—fills him with joy unspeakable. His heart attaches itself to Christ on these very considerations. This sentiment breathed by the benevolent Jesus, “holy father glorify thyself,” unites the sanctified heart to the Redeemer, with the most tender, endearing and complacential affections. O how unspeakably diverse are the exercises of the renewed heart, from every thing conatural to us! May we inquisitively search after its specific difference!

An account of a work of divine grace, in a revival of religion, in the town of LENOX, State of MASSACHUSETTS, in the year 1799, in a letter to the Editors from the Rev. SAMUEL SHAPARD, of that town.

GENTLEMEN,
AN aged person, who, in early life, idolized under the banner of Jesus, and who, in viewing the time of her departure at hand, can say with confidence, as we trust, that she “hath kept the faith,” was conversing with me, a few days since, upon the concerns of eternity; having complained of much coldness, stupidity and deadness of heart, she added, “I derive great comfort, however, from a perusal of the Connecticut Evangelical Magazine. It gives me a raised hope.” This was spoken with an emphasis which engaged my particular attention; and evinced the truth of that remark which has been frequently made, that, through the medium of such a publication as the Magazine, Christians might do much to strengthen the hands, and encourage the hearts of each other. Barnabas, when he came to Antioch, “and had seen the grace of God, was glad.” The narratives of the late revival of religion in many of our congregations, will also, to all the real friends of Zion who read them, give joy unspeakable.

The consideration, that religious intelligence of this nature must rejoice the friends of the Redeemer, and, by the divine blessing, tend, in other respects, to promote the prosperity of Zion, has induced me to send you some account of the late very striking manifestation of the reign, and power and grace of the Lord Jesus among the people of my pastoral charge.

I cannot learn from any of the first settlers, that there has ever been any remarkable revival of religion in this town until the month of June 1799. It appears, that the greatest number which was ever added to this church in the course of one year, was about ele-

no. This, if I am rightly informed, was in the year 1783. Such was the effect of the unhappy divisions which frequently occurred in the church, and the numerous interruptions to public religious instruction and the stated administration of divine ordinances, that, for many years, the message to the church in Sardis might with peculiar propriety have been addressed to us—"I know thy works, that thou hast a name, that thou livest, and art dead." At the time of my ordination, which was in April 1795, the situation of this church called for the earnest prayers of all who had a heart to pray. The number of its members was not much greater then, than it had been, perhaps, for twenty-five years before; and, almost the whole of them were bowing under the infirmities of age. No person, who was in early life, was a member of this church. Not a single young person had been received into it, in the course of sixteen years. To see the youth, all as one, wasting away their best moments in stupidity—to view them as accountable creatures, and yet, living apparently without a hope—"without a wish beyond the grave"—and, to see a few grey-headed persons compose almost the whole number of communicants at the sacramental table—must, to one just entering upon the work of the ministry, give feelings, which cannot easily be described. Well might this church, like God's ancient covenant people when they sat in captivity by the waters of Babylon, hang its "harps upon the willows;" for, it seemed, indeed, that, when the few, who were rapidly hastening down the vale of time, should be borne to the grave, and delivered from the evil to come, the name of Jesus, in the holy ordinance of the supper, would, among us, be scarcely had in remembrance.

Such were the melancholy prospects of this church until the spring of the year 1799. While showers of divine grace were falling on other parts of Zion, and God, by his spirit, was visiting one place and another, and quickening multitudes "for his name's sake," we seemed to be solemnly warned in the words recorded in Rev. ii. 5. "Remember, therefore, from whence thou art fallen, and repent, or else I will come unto thee quickly, and will remove thy candlestick out of his place." But, the Lord hath said, "I will have mercy on whom I will have mercy," and, glory be to his name. With him, is the residue of the spirit, and he can pour it out when, and where, and on whom he pleaseth. He hath made it, therefore, a day of his power, and caused, even in the midst of us, a "shaking among the dry bones."

In the month of April 1799, several members of the church, manifested great anxiety about the state of religion among us, and expressed a desire that meetings might be appointed for religious conference and special prayer for the out-pouring of the holy spirit. This request was afterwards made known to the church as a body. They unanimously approved of it, and a conference meeting was accordingly appointed. This meeting was attended by as many people, as previous appearances warranted us to expect. A sermon was preached at this meeting, and the audience were very attentive. At the next conference, we conversed upon a particular passage of scripture, which led to a consideration of the being and perfections of God. Several persons at this meeting appeared unusually solemn. About this time, two or three young persons were brought under deep conviction, and found earnestly inquiring what they should do to be saved; and at the third conference meeting, were to be seen, persons from every part of the town. The divine authority of the scriptures, was made the subject of conversation, and the appearance of the Assembly was truly affecting. They seemed now to consider the holy bible to be the very voice of God to a guilty world—and the religion of Jesus, a solemn reality. Sinners were brought to tremble in view of eternity—and professing Christians were animated and rendered fervent in prayer. From that time, the work became more general—religious conferences were multiplied—the house of God was thronged upon the sabbath—and multitudes seemed, to spare no pains in obtaining religious instruction. Several persons, in attempting upon a particular sabbath to sing the judgment Anthem, appeared to be greatly distressed. A sermon, the design of which, was to enforce the leading ideas contained in the anthem, was afterwards delivered from Acts i. 11th.—“This same Jesus, which is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven.” A divine blessing appeared in some measure to attend the discourse; and, while those who entertained a hope of a personal interest in Christ, seemed to be wrapped up in the contemplation of that glory and majesty of Zion’s King, which will be displayed in that all-important day to which reference is had in the anthem, some of the opposite character, were apparently filled with awful apprehensions on account of their ill-desert, and seemed to look forward to the day of judgment, as a time, when their hearts must die within them. From that solemn season, there was an increasing attention to things of a serious nature, among old and young, for several months. While we heard of some from time to time, who were brought to a sense of their guilt and danger, others, having seen the impending storm of divine vengeance and fled to one false refuge after another till all were tried in vain, were hopefully brought to bow at the foot of divine sovereignty—to see the moral beauty and transcendent amiableness and worth of the divine Saviour—to embrace him on gospel terms, and, to find by experience that “wisdom’s ways are pleasantness.”

On the twentieth of October, twenty-four persons were received into the church. This was with us, a memorable day. But a small part of the congregation had ever before seen a young person publicly engage in the Christian warfare. From the same youthful circle—from the same family, some were “taken” while others were “left.” While some parents were so happy as to see their children following them in the Christian profession, others, who were conscious of being still heirs of that kingdom which is doomed to destruction, saw their offspring fleeing for refuge to the wounds of a bleeding Saviour. Husbands and wives—parents and children—brothers and sisters were separated by that line of distinction which is formed by a religious profession. In this, the divine sovereignty was obvious, “The Lord reigneth, let the earth rejoice.” Having taken upon themselves the bonds of the Christian covenant, and heard a particular address to the church and them, dictated by the interesting occasion, those who, in this public manner, had united with the visible church of Christ, sang an hymn which concluded thus,

" Saints by the power of God are kept,
 " Till full salvation come :
 " We walk by faith, as strangers here,
 " Till Christ shall call us home."

The language to the spectators, in the scene then passing before them was, " We are journeying unto the place of which the Lord said, I will give it you : come thou with us and we will do thee good ; for the Lord hath spoken good concerning Israel." A solemn silence, was observed during the whole service. Not an air of levity was discovered, for a moment, in a single countenance. The infidel and abandoned man stood appalled—and, to the friends of Zion, the season afforded a prelibation of heavenly joys. The old and the young, who were present, seemed ready to adopt the language of Jacob, when he awoke from a dream, at Bethel, " How dreadful, is this place ! This is none other, but the house of God, and this is the gate of heaven."

It was not, until several months after this precious season, that the religious attention among us appeared to abate. An unhappy contention in the town relative to school-districts, had, among other things, a tendency, no doubt, to grieve away that divine guest, who had so much gladdened the hearts of the few who had long waited for the " consolation of Israel." At the present time, there is evidently a growing inattention to spiritual concerns. A goodly number, however, yet manifest, in their deportment, much of the life and power of religion ; and, from a " remembrance of past joys," are probably induced to go often to the throne of grace with the important petition, " Wilt thou not revive us again, that thy people may rejoice in thee ?"

The whole number of those, who have been received into this church since the beginning of the late awakening, is fifty-three. Some of this number, however, entertained a hope that they had become experimentally acquainted with religion before " the time of refreshing from the presence of the Lord," referred to in this narrative. Several persons, who, in the time of the late awakening, hoped, that, in a spiritual sense, they had " passed from death unto life," have never yet, in a public manner, declared themselves to be on the Lord's side. Of the number who have been recently added to the church, almost two thirds are females. Many of the new converts are in early life. Nearly all of them continue to give satisfactory evidence that they have been " called out of darkness into marvellous light," and that Christ is in reality, " formed in them, the hope of glory."

In a time of ingathering like this, however, it is to be expected that some chaff will remain with the wheat. " Let not him that girdeth on his harness boast himself, as he that putteth it off." It becomes all those who enter the Christian warfare, to remember, that the promise of salvation is to him, " that endureth unto the end ;" and, that the same grace, which at first called them, is requisite to their perseverance. " The fruit of the spirit," saith the apostle, " is in all goodness, and righteousness and truth ;" and, " every man who hath" the Christian " hope in him, purifieth himself, even as he" who is the author of it, " is pure."

The conduct of those, who attended religious conferences and lectures; and, for a time, appeared to be seriously impressed, but afterwards, returned to their former stupidity, forcibly reminds me of the case of one mentioned in Matthew xii. 45. "The last state of that man" said the Saviour, "is worse than the first."

The condition of those who remained uniformly careless and inattentive while the goings of God were so visible among us, appears to be still more dangerous and deplorable.

It is expressly foretold in the sacred volume, that, "in the last days, scoffers shall come, walking after their own lust." To those of such a character—those who openly and bitterly opposed this blessed work, and ridiculed every thing of a serious nature, it is to be feared that nothing remains, "but a certain fearful looking for of judgment, and fiery indignation, which shall devour the adversary."

I will close this general account of the late revival of religion among us, with a few particular remarks.

1. This revival was evidently the work of God. To prove this, the very sudden change in the appearance and pursuits of the people, is in stead of a thousand arguments. The immediate hand of omnipotence was strikingly exhibited in this work. It was preceded by no providential occurrences which were uncommon. No special judgments were felt, and, a little time only before the revival, people of every description appeared, as to religious concerns, to be slumbering and sleeping. Religious instruction was no other now, than it had been; and, so far from being affected by mere sympathy, it was often the case that persons who lived in the same neighbourhood, and in the same families, were greatly distressed in mind, without knowing the feelings of each other. Some such, who had ever before been extremely inattentive to divine things and most shamefully ignorant of the truths of revelation, were now able in a little time to speak of the depravity of the human heart—the nature of sin—the beauties of holiness—the plan of salvation by Christ—in short, of all the doctrines, duties and institutions of the Christian system with a propriety, which was truly astonishing. The Apostle knew what he said, when having the gospel dispensation in view, he spake these memorable words—"We have this treasure in earthen vessels that the excellency of the power may be of God, and not of us. "A Paul, divinely inspired will plant, and an Apollos, with the most commanding eloquence will water, in vain:—unless God give the increase. When he standeth in the valley of dry bones, and commandeth them to hear his word, they will live. He alone can quicken the dead in heart and bow the stubborn will, and when it is done, in any instance, may he alone have the glory!

2. This revival of religion began in the church; and I believe it will be found true, that, in almost every instance of religious revival, it makes its first appearance in the church of Christ. When God is about to bestow spiritual blessings upon a people, it is his usual method, first to awake his professed friends out of sleep. Before a single instance of conviction was known in this place, in the spring of the year 1799, many of the members of this church, in the course of a few days, manifested an anxious concern for the cause of Christ. A spirit of fervent prayer and supplication seemed to be given them; and, "as soon as Zion travailed, she brought forth children." While therefore professing christians continue to grieve the Holy Spirit, when they exhibit evidence of much leanness of soul, and of much coldness and stupidity in the discharge of incumbent duty, they can have but little reason to suppose that a shower of divine grace is near them.

3. Such a revival of religion most strikingly evinces the importance of all the means of grace which God hath instituted. When once the attention of a people is really called up to the concerns of the soul, how precious, in their view are seasons for prayer. How precious is God's holy sabbath—how instantly do they fly to the bible—how highly do they prize every opportunity to get religious instruction, and to associate with the people of God for serious conversation! How great would be the distress of such, if they were, at once, deprived of all opportunity to learn the character of God—to acquire right views of their own moral state—and, of the gospel plan of salvation? God works by means, in the moral, as well as natural world. They are necessarily connected with the end. "Faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the word of God."

4. The appearance of the people in this place, at the time of the late awakening, will enable me to add to the testimony of others respecting the work in general, that it has been attended with most remarkable regularity. God was emphatically in the "still small voice." Nothing was said, in particular, about dreams and visions—hearing unusual voices and seeing uncommon sights. No extravagance, either in gestures, or outcries, appeared. No wild enthusiasm attended the revival in any stage of it.

5. Among those in this town who have been awakened to attend to religious truth, a remarkable uniformity has occurred relative to the doctrines which have been embraced. These are such as are usually termed calvinistic. Such truths, as the total and awful depravity of the human heart—the necessity of regeneration; or, a change of moral taste as a preparation for the enjoyment of a holy heaven—the equity of the divine law in its penalty, as well as precept—the divine sovereignty in the salvation of sinners, as the only possible ground of hope in the case of a guilty offender—the necessity of gospel morality as an evidence of justifying faith—and all the doctrines essentially connected with these, were readily received by all "with one consent."

6. It is worthy of notice, that the revival of religion in this town has proved to be almost a death-wound to the vain amusements of young people. An attempt to establish a dancing-school among us in the time of the late special attention to religion was rendered nearly abortive: and, the youth in general are still very remarkable for sobriety. Many of them are ready to acknowledge instantly, that they have derived more substantial enjoyment in one hour of religious worship and conversation, than an eternity would afford them in the pursuit of selfish gratifications.

7. One distinguished feature of this work as it appeared among us, and elsewhere, according to the narratives which have been published, is humility. The subjects of this revival, who have obtained a Christian hope, have very uniformly appeared to be humble, and to walk softly before their Maker. In view of the divine perfections and requirements, they have, at times, expressed great self-abhorrence. This has been one striking effect of the genuine operation of the divine spirit, on the hearts of sinners, in every age. We find that "God and his grace are still the same;" and, that true religion is the same thing, in all the real subjects of it. Did a true knowledge of God, lead Job to "abhor himself and repent in dust and ashes"—and Isaiah to exclaim, "I am undone, because I am a man of unclean lips"—and Jeremiah to smite upon his thigh and confess his shame—and the Publican to smite upon his breast, saying, "God be merciful to me a sinner"—and Peter to fall down, saying, "depart from me, for I am a sinful man, O, Lord"—and Paul to exclaim, "O, wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me, from the body of this death?" A similar sense of their own vileness and personal guilt has also been manifested by multitudes, who, in the course of the late revival of religion in New-England, have been hopefully brought out of their natural darkness and ignorance "into marvellous light" and knowledge.

May an holy God, in infinite mercy, continue to make manifest the glory of his power and the glory of his grace, in building up Zion; for, in no other way, can we rationally expect to see happy individuals—happy families—happy neighborhoods—happy societies—happy towns—happy states—happy kingdoms—and a happy world!

Wishing a divine blessing to attend your laudable exertions to promote Christian knowledge, and, to communicate religious intelligence to the friends of Jesus in different parts of our land and world.

I am, Gentlemen,
very respectfully,
yours, &c.

SAMUEL SHEPARD.
Lenox, (Ms.) May 7, 1801.

MESS'RS. EDITORS,

SHOULD you judge the following observations from 1 Cor. vii. 16. and the subsequent narrative which is a real fact, and the remarks subjoined, to be worthy of a place in your Magazine, you are desired to give them an insertion, and oblige a friend to your most useful publication.

"For what knowest thou O wife whether thou shalt save thy husband."

IT is very plain from the connection in which these words stand that the Apostle was urging the propriety of believing husbands and wives continuing to live with their unbelieving companions, unless they first broke away from them, and rendered their union in the married relation no longer proper or possible. As an argument to evince the duty of their continuing with their unbelieving partners, the Apostle introduced the words before us, "For what knowest thou O wife whether thou shalt save thy husband"—and in the conclusion of the verse—"Or how knowest thou O man whether thou shalt save thy wife?" His obvious meaning was, addressing himself directly to a believing wife; How do you know, whether by your kind and Christian deportment—your meekness, humility and endearing conversation—and above all by your ardent prayers for his soul, you may not be made an instrument in God's hand, of softening his heart, and bringing him to genuine repentance and final salvation? You are placed in this situation by divine providence. While you both were sinners God had mercy on you; and now, how knowest thou, but he has brought you into this relation for the very purpose of making your Christian exertions operate for his spiritual good? They surely must be to him most powerful means of conviction; and if so, you have great reason to hope they may be rendered efficacious. And hence let no consideration induce you to leave him, if he is disposed to abide, and fulfil the duties of an husband. The same, precisely, may be addressed to the believing husband, concerning his unbelieving wife.

These ideas being plainly held up in the text, afford very great encouragement to persons placed in like circumstances. From causes too numerous to mention it is a fact, that multitudes in a Christian country are unequally connected, in the married state, with companions destitute of true piety; and while this is the case, and felt to be so, it is a source of the heaviest affliction, although the partner, in every other respect, is agreeable and truly respected. Not to speak of the almost unfermountable weight of sorrow which is added, when the unbeliever is highly disobliged by religion, and unpleasant in his carriage otherwise, let the observation apply to the most eligible condition the circumstances can admit. While the believer from day to day, feels the attractions of heavenly things and the sweets of communion with God: He, or she, has no partner in these joys. The bosom friend is unaffected, uninterested, and wholly occupied in meaner things, and even trifles comparatively. His mind, his tho'ts, his feelings are all carnal, worldly, and constantly pursuing some unsubstantial earthly toys. He has no relish for serious subjects—of the delights of religion he knows nothing—he has no spiritual taste, by which the invisible realities of heaven delight him—no, the odors of Paradise diffused through divine truths do not regale him—when his dear friend opens the heart-felt pleasures of devotion—the joys of holy contemplation upon the Saviour of sinners, and his wondrous methods of grace, he sits mute, or replies so wide from the current of her views and wishes, as demonstrates his unapprehension of what she has said. This same incapacity to join in holy joys or sorrows, or in whatever the heart is most interested, occurs unceasingly. This brings on a burden upon her soul which utterly surpasses description. And what can be done; shall they part? This is forbidden. But how can the heart endure its solitude, in so dear a connection, and be foiled in every pious social joy? How can it endure its temptations to sin from worldly pursuits, in order to please an un sanctified taste, in her partner—or how can it maintain the cheerfulness suitable to the Christian life, or discharge its duties? The answer to all these queries is, Abide in the spirit; hope and trust in God.—Be kind and gentle to your friend; condescend and oblige him to the utmost of your power in all lawful things, and pray for his soul.

The kind Julia, who lived in this situation, in one of the larger towns in this state, felt all the energies of pure religion for her dear, yet unbelieving husband. But what could she do? He was bred to seafaring business, and a complete man of the world. Like too many who visit foreign parts, and see how the fashionable world live, he set light by the pearl of great price. He never prayed in his family, or seriously thanked the giver of his daily bread. He associated himself with such as suited his own cast of mind, and spent his whole time in the mere acquisition of worldly treasures. Sometimes, though not steadily he waited on her to the house of God on the sabbath and attended public worship with decency.—But afterward was best pleased in spending the remainder of the day, in conversing upon business—hearing and rehearsing the public news or amusing himself some way with his associates, with whom he might happen to fall in company. He was kind to his Julia, and never allowed himself to speak disrespectfully of religion in her presence; but seemed to yield it reverence purely for her sake. He would often wait on her to the door, where a private conference meeting was held; and then retire to some worldly company till it was over; and then return and conduct her home. Thus she had no prospect, but to spend her days with one, whose kindest attentions, were but the shell of endearment; for their hearts had no communion, under all the outward civilities which they paid to each other. A concealed pain in Julia's heart attended every attempt to please or be pleased. Often a strange coolness, and indifference would steal imperceptibly upon them, which the moment perceived would give alarm, and all appearances again were saved by revived formalities of friendship and mutual tenderness. But in process of time Negotio became impaired in his health, and after repeated indispositions was obliged to omit business, and resign himself to confinement.—Soon likewise his temporal affairs became deranged and embarrassed. These things altered not the natural vigor of his spirits—they only introduced a temporary gloom, which partook of that sorrow of the world which works death; and then hope of amendment would revive him. Nearly two years elapsed in this situation, when his complaints increased upon him very materially. Through this scene, the kind Julia, was doubly attentive to all his necessities, by night and by day—no endearing office in her power escaped her; and often while administering some refreshing cordials, she would introduce the balm of the gospel, and discourse to him upon religion. His ear seemed in some measure to be opened to instruction; but this was all. She exhorted him to pray; but no, this was a business to which he never had attended. He expressed a willingness to have others pray for him, but he could not pray for himself. About this time how often did the heart of Julia melt within her, to notice from day to day, his disorders gradually advancing, and his poor soul buried in darkness, stupidity, and sin. She made it her constant practice every night, after tenderly reposing him in bed, to retire to another apartment and pour out her heart before God for his eternal interest. At length this appeared too little. The thought struck her with solemn energy, "How can I leave my poor, sick, unsanctified husband alone, and perhaps to die without prayer—totally insensible of the importance or privilege of it! How can I attend so particularly to his bodily wants and neglect the greatest expression of love which is due to his immortal part! How can I neglect to pray with him, as well as for him?"

The full conviction of duty so rushed upon her mind as to be irresistible.—She resolved to return to him and dismiss fear, and introduce the impressions she had felt.—Instantly she arose, and went and told him her heart.—He consented—and she kneeled down by his bed-side, and breathed out her soul to God for him, and herself, with tears of penitence, humility and affection, through the glorious Redeemer. This scene took hold of him most powerfully. His whole soul now began to tremble for his future existence, and his appearance before his judge. His sins were set in order before him. The solemn scene of hearing his Julia pray was repeated—and continued at proper seasons. But who can express sufficiently the glory and gratitude due to sovereign grace, or the joy among saints and angels, to hear that in a short time, these ardent prayers were most graciously answered—Negotio is revived from spiritual death—sanctified by the Holy Spirit, and rejoices in a well grounded hope of a glorious eternity.

The pious Julia wrote me since this took place, and by her indulgence, I am permitted to use her own words, as follows—“Who can express the satisfaction that I felt on account of his earnestly seeking for that happiness which cannot be found in earthly comforts. I continually breathed forth my desires to heaven for him, that he might be brought out of darkness, into God’s marvellous light. And I have a hope, that my prayers and tears have not been unnoticed by a merciful God, who has stiled himself a God hearing prayer. My dear friend I humbly hope is a child of God—his desires and feelings appear to be those of a penitent—He is patient under afflictions, and resigned to the will of heaven.—Though he is deprived of the privilege of conversing with his friends, we can judge of the feelings of his heart by his sighs and tears.—In the midst of trials, we can sing of mercy, as well as judgment.”

Since this apparent change I have frequently called at his house, and although exceedingly debilitated, the springs of remaining life seem to be absorbed in religious meditation and joy in God.—He never suffers an opportunity to pass without desiring to join in prayer—and he is often so carried out in the joys of this exercise as to be unable to command his feelings within the common bounds of moderation.—This frame of mind has now been so habitual to him for a length of time as convinces all who have opportunity to be in his company of its divine reality.

The encouragement held out in this example to all who are placed in similar connections is exceedingly great. It shews from real fact how strong reason there is, to hope that God will bless the endeavors of those, who actually fulfil their duty in the marriage relation, for the salvation of their unbelieving companions. The writer cannot forbear to urge upon all believing husbands and wives, the solemn and endearing duties which they owe to their unrenewed friends in the following particulars.

1. Your Christian profession and marriage vows require of you that you love them as yourselves. This implies that you study and endeavor to promote their greatest happiness in this life, and the future—that in the kindest manner possible you try to please them in all lawful things, and render their lives comfortable—and that you join with them in social prayer for their souls.

All this, is only loving them as you love yourselves, and carrying into effect your marriage vows. As benevolence is supposed to reign in your hearts, so kindness ought to dwell upon your tongues. Endearing condescension and tenderness should always attend every little office of personal regard. A sweet, cheerful disposition to bear the burdens and share in all the afflictions and disappointments of your nearest friends should mark your conduct—and let no opportunity to oblige them pass unimproved. Add to this, a strict integrity in your attention to all their weighty concerns of interest or reputation. By practising in this manner the force of your religion will be manifested, and its amiable tendency. You will be enabled in the happiest manner to introduce to your bosom friends, the infinite importance of their salvation and the propriety of social intercession for it. And under so many advantages, it is presumed, scarcely an instance will ever be found of an unbeliever, of either sex, who will hesitate to join in so plain and important a duty.

2. Your ardent and unceasing desire for the salvation of your friends and hope of success in striving for it must prompt you to perseverance in the above duties.—Many have succeeded and so may you—“How knowest thou O wife whether thou shalt save thy husband?” The power of religion acted out in the deportment of an amiable woman has an astonishing effect upon the world in general, but how much more upon a friend, so near as an husband? The purity of her designs for his real good universally displayed before him—and the charms of innocence, meekness and humility acted out in substantial services, will captivate and confine him in the externals of duty. The majesty of her innocence and piety will make him tremble at vice, and constrain him to unite with her in the forms of devotion to God. Under this influence how strong is the ground to hope that God will, in his own time, add the power of his spirit and give him a new heart? This hope will ever prompt her to persevere, and draw him with the cords of love. She will keep her eye fixed upon her duty, and cheerfully walk with the expectation of seeing the power of divine grace manifested, in the salvation of his soul: And finally should she succeed, her joy would exceed description. But,

3. Should you never succeed in winning to Christ your unbelieving companions, the practice of the above duties will exceedingly meliorate your present condition and give you peace in a dying hour. The man, or woman, who finds himself or herself connected with an unsanctified friend, will find it hard to maintain the fervor of religion alone. Yet, God is able to give this grace, and assist his children to perform their duty in this relation as well as any other; and doubtless will do it, if they pursue right methods to obtain it.—And when they are established in this course, they will make the most of life. Duty done to the utmost leaves the conscience at peace. The wife who spends her days in endeavors to sweeten the life of her husband, and draw his heart to God, will be rewarded in part as she passes along. Her engaging manners can never fail to procure esteem and kindness. She will have it in her power to arrest his whole attention to her reasonable wishes; and hereby increase every domestic comfort. But especially when she comes to die, how rich will be the consolation to reflect, that through grace she has fulfilled her duty, and nothing kind has been wanting towards her bosom friend. With more tenderness than ever; yea, with exquisite feeling she bids him, perhaps an eternal adieu, and commits his soul into the hands of him who gave it—and dies in peace. The believing husband likewise who has fulfilled his duty, will finish life in a similar manner.

NUNCIO.

Sketches of the character, life and death of the Rev. SAMUEL BUELL, D. D. late Pastor of the Church, at East-Hampton, on Long-Island.

DOCTOR SAMUEL BUELL was born of reputable parents, at Coventry in the State of Connecticut, Sept. 1, 1716. Nothing occurs to us in the course of his life, worthy of particular notice, in this place, till the 17th year of his age. About this time he fell under special serious impressions. His conviction of sin, guilt and misery, was clear, distinct and pungent. He was the subject of much legal terror, and experienced a deep work of humiliation. These exercises continued for a number of months, during which time, he was led to the most affecting discoveries of the evil of sin, the plague and total depravity of his heart, the utter insufficiency of his own righteousness, his perishing need of Christ, and absolute dependance upon the free and sovereign grace of God, for an interest in his merits. In this state of mind, it pleased the God of all grace to reveal his son in him. His spiritual discoveries of the glory of the divine character, perfections and law, of Christ and the way of salvation through him; and his consequent joy and peace in believing, were proportionate to the pungency and terror of his antecedent convictions.

This change in his views wholly altered the previously concerted plans of his life. His father being a wealthy farmer, and for a long time having no other son, he was designed for a life of husbandry; and himself expected to spend his days in agricultural pursuits. His prospects in this line of life were flattering. But the ardent desires, which he now felt, to promote the salvation of souls, disposed him cheerfully to relinquish these prospects, that he might serve God in the gospel of his son. More than two years being spent in prayer for direction in duty, observing the subsequent frame and temper of his own heart, advising with friends, and it was concluded that he should enter upon a course of public education, in reference to this end. He began his studies preparatory to his admission to Yale-College, in the 21st year of his age; and within a year from that time was admitted a member.

During the course of his academical education, he enjoyed much of the divine presence. From written memorials of that period, it appears that, though he was not without interposing seasons of darkness, he was greatly favored with the lively and sensible exercises of grace; and the elevated comforts of the divine life. He often speaks of instances of communion with God uninterrupted for weeks and months together. Here he became first acquainted with Mr. David Brainerd, with whom he afterwards maintained the most endearing intimacy, till death deprived the church and world of that distinguished servant and eminent minister of Christ. Nothing can be more affectionate than the terms in which Mr. Brainerd is often mentioned, in the Doctor's private writings; and he has frequently been heard to say, that there was no other man to whom he ever could so freely open his heart, and with whom he enjoyed such sweet and elevated Christian fellowship.

The proficiency which he made in his collegiate studies evidenced the strength of his mind, and the intenseness of his application. He received the honors of College, and took his first degree Sept. 1741.

Upon this, his intention was to have spent a number of years with Mr. Edwards of Northampton, afterwards President of the College at Princeton, in theological studies, preparatory to the ministry. But from the peculiar state of things, and the special call for zealous preachers, arising from the glorious revival of religion, then taking place, extensively, in the land, he was encouraged and advised to apply immediately for licence to preach the gospel; and, after passing the usual trials, was licensed the following October.

As a preacher he was well received, and his labors were attended with much power and remarkable success. Soon after his license, he made a journey to Northampton. On his way he preached almost every day, in the different congregations thro' which he passed; and the divine blessing seemed in a signal manner to attend every sermon. The influence of his labors, at Northampton, may be seen in the following extract of a letter from Mr. Edwards to the Rev. Mr. Prince of Boston, dated Northampton Dec. 1742. "About the beginning of Feb. 1741-2 Mr. Buell came to this town, I being then absent from home, and continued so till about a fortnight after. Mr. Buell preached, from day to day, almost every day, in the meeting-house, (I having left to him the free liberty of my pulpit, hearing of his designed visit before I went from home) and spent almost the whole time in religious exercises with the people, either in public or private, the people continually thronging him. There were very extraordinary effects of Mr. Buell's labors; the people were exceedingly moved, crying out, in great numbers in the meeting-house, and great part of the congregation commonly staying in the house of God for hours after the public service. Many, also, were exceedingly moved in private meetings where Mr. Buell was; and almost the whole town seemed to be in a great and continual commotion, day and night; and there was indeed a very great revival of religion. When I came home I found the town in very extraordinary circumstances, such in some respects as I never saw it in before. Mr. Buell continued here, a fortnight or three weeks, after I returned; there being still great appearances attending his labors."—Sometime after this, the Doctor having noted his preaching in a certain place, where there were no visible effects of the word, adds, "The first time I ever preached to an assembly, where tears of affection, under the word, were not to be seen; and almost the first when the Lord was not manifestly present with the people."

The remaining part of this year, he journeyed to Boston, and other parts of New-England, abounding in labors, as before; which, in almost every place, were attended with similar effects.

In Nov. 1743, he was ordained, as an itinerant preacher; in which capacity, he was indefatigable in labors, and also signally owned of God as the instrument of the awakening and hopeful conversion of multitudes and of building up saints in their most holy faith. It may not be improper to observe here, that as he went out under the patronage of ministers of note, and was careful to act according to their prudent advice, and always carried with him clear and ample testimonials, he was received in many places and admitted to many pulpits, from which others, less delicate, in these respects, were excluded.— Doctor Buell always disapproved of the rashness, and imprudence of some of the friends of the work of God, as well as the unreasonable opposition of others, who thought less favorably of it.

During this period his health was much impaired; and he was attacked with dangerous symptoms of a consumption. He was particularly exercised, about this time, with a severe fit of sickness, of seven months continuance; which in a great measure cut off the hopes of himself and his friends, as to the continuance of his life. It pleased God by thus shaking him, over the grave, to put his personal religion to the test, and happily it stood the trial. He has been heard to speak, with much gratitude and affection, of the triumphant faith he was enabled to exercise, under this affliction—the joy and peace which he had in believing, and the cheerfulness with which, had it been the will of God, he could have departed to be with Christ. But it pleased God, who had further service for him in the church to raise him up, and give him much better health than before. After his the labors of his ministerial course were rarely interrupted by bodily indisposition.

It was a direction of providence, in some respects, extraordinary, which brought him first to East-Hampton. That congregation was now in a broken state, having been disappointed in their attempts to settle several Candidates. In respect to the last a council was called to ordain him. Of this Council the Rev. Mr. Burr and other ministers from New-Jersey were members. Upon the meeting of the Council the people were found so much divided, that they did not think it prudent to proceed. And when those, who were desirous of the ordination, urged among other arguments, for it the great pains they had taken and expense they had been at to obtain a minister, Mr. Burr and the other ministers from New-Jersey replied, “that they should be at no further trouble, that they would take it upon them to send them a preacher who would be agreeable.” Soon after this Mr. Buell arrived, in New-Jersey, on his way to the southern states, recommended from New-England—and, by the importunity of these ministers, he was prevailed upon to turn his course and visit East-Hampton. His labors proved acceptable. He received a pressing invitation from the people to settle with them in the ministry; and, after suitable time for deliberation and prayer, accepted the call, and was installed, as their Pastor, Sept. 19, 1746.

In this retirement he devoted himself, with great ardor, to his studies. Though Doctor Buell always entertained a high opinion of the special aid of the spirit of God, in preaching and other parts of ministerial duty, yet he by no means thought lightly of that furniture for the ministry, which is acquired by study. On the contrary he considered it as of great importance; and was not satisfied with ordinary measures of it himself. His present situation, notwithstanding the avocations of parochial duty, compared with the unsettled state he had been in before, afforded many advantages for intellectual improvement. These advantages were improved with much assiduity and he early obtained the character of a reputable divine, as well as powerful preacher. As an instance of the uniformity of his application, at the close of a number of the first years of his ministry it is noted, "This year have written all my sermons, and preached them without notes." A favorite work, which lay upon his hands for a number of years, was a treatise upon the prophecies which he intended for the public. But Bishop Newton's Dissertations upon that subject coming out about that time induced him to relinquish the design, as being in a great measure superseded by that celebrated performance.

Still however, Doctor Buell considered his studies, and the acquirement of knowledge as a mean, not as an end. It was his desire to know, not merely for the sake of knowing, or being reputed a learned man, but for the sake of being useful. His favorite maxim was, "Usefulness in life." Hence his studies, however much he loved them, did not prevent his punctual attention to the claims of active service. Never could he content himself, to be shut up in his study, whilst immortal souls within his reach, whether in his own congregation or round about, were hungering for the bread of life. He never made any attempts to discover with how little service his people would be contented. On the contrary he encouraged them to expect much, and rejoiced when they were disposed to receive it.

He always entertained a deep sense of the solemn nature and connections of the ministerial office; and the sacred obligations of all who sustain it. His ministrations were usually performed under a weighty sense of invisible and eternal things. As an instance of this, he notes, at a certain time, "This day preached before the Supreme Court, in the presence of the great God." In the various branches of pastoral duty he was diligent and faithful. "He watched for souls, as one who expected to give account." In preaching the word he was abundant. It was common with him, in addition to his stated labors on the Lord's-day, to preach once or twice, and in times of special attention much oftener, in the course of the week. The doctrines, which he taught, were strictly calvinistic. What are commonly called the doctrines of grace made the substance of his preaching.* His manner was plain and solemn, warm and pungent. He left not the understandings of his hearers uninformed; but his principal talent lay in urging home divine truth on the heart and conscience. He taught not only publicly, but from house to house. The rising generation were not neglected by him. In the earlier parts of his ministry he was laborious, in chatechising the children and youth of his charge; and more recently, for years together, he lectured to them in the Academy, every week. He was skilful in counselling such as applied to him under spiritual trouble; and in administering consolation to the distressed, of every description; and to such offices he was always ready.

* The Doctor's religious sentiments, as to all the distinguishing doctrines of the gospel, were the same with those of President Edwards and Doctor Bellamy; whose writings he read with much pleasure and approbation, often observing of the former of these two great divines, that "he was, under heaven, his oracle."

(To be continued.)

Admonitions from the Death-Bed.

(Continued from p. 110.)

NUMBER III.

MESS'RS EDITORS,

IT has often been observed that the greatest degree of error and stupidity, concerning moral obligation and duty, and a state of retribution in the world to come, is found in certain persons who have been the subjects of serious impressions, and by long resisting their own consciences and the strivings of God's spirit, have provoked him to leave them to their own blindness and lusts. As a warning to others I have transmitted to you the following instance.

A man, who possessed reason and sagacity above the common proportion, and about the age of thirty, fell into such a state of debility as rendered him incapable of much attention to business. Before this he had discovered an inordinate attachment to property, and omitted neither diligence, nor art, nor parsimony to obtain it. His state was called hypochondriac by his neighbors, for a certain recluseness of temper prevented his communicating to them the distracting feelings of his mind. When he was in this state, I accidentally passed a day in his company. After a short conversation I discovered marks of a wounded conscience, and told him my suspicion, that his whole disorder proceeded from anxiety on spiritual accounts. Finding I had detected his feelings, he made a frank acknowledgement it was the case, but solicited that it might remain a secret with me. He told me of sundry times in his past life when, for short seasons, his conscience had continually accused him. He had seen himself to be a sinner, if there was any truth in the scriptures, and he dreaded an appearance before God as the most awful of all events; still he could not bear to think of another kind of life, and of parting with those worldly designs which had governed his past conduct. He said he had been many months in this situation, and something continually sounded in his ears, that he was a sinner, that he must die and come into judgment, and without another state of heart must be miserable; but, added he, "I cannot part with my worldly schemes. I must again be a man of business; I have just laid a foundation for success, and if I give way to these apprehensions there is an end of my prospects. This I own to be the cause of all my gloom, and if I could put another world and my own preparation for it out of sight, I should again be a happy man."

I immediately perceived, that altho' pressed with some conviction of the truth, he was contending with one who will prevail. I set before him the danger of resisting such impressions; the folly of preferring an avaricious life of gain to the immortal interests of his soul; and the superior wisdom of subordinating all our worldly labors, views and hopes to our eternal well-being. I endeavored to shew him his true state, his need of another heart, the danger of his being left to a most ruinous blindness and to eternal misery. After much solemn conversation we parted.

Nearly a year from this time we had another opportunity for free discourse. It was sought by himself with an evident design to confront and reproach me for the exhortation I had given him with the most friendly intention. I instantly saw that his seriousness was departed, and his conscience seared. By his own account, he continued several months longer in that state of apprehension and resistance to the truth which has been described, when he came to the rash opinion, that the whole of his past feelings were but a hypochondriac gloom, and supported himself by the following argument. "You know 'that hypochondriacism is a false 'imagination of the mind; and 'within one week after I detected 'my folly in being so anxious for 'another world, I became well and 'happy, and have so continued.'" He further added, "I now think 'that all the notions I have had 'concerning the holiness of God 'and the rewards of another world 'are false. As to sin, it is evident 'there can be no such thing, nor 'do I any more believe that I shall 'exist after this body dies, than 'that those trees before us will exist hereafter, and be happy or 'miserable." "But," replied I, "is it not a gloomy thought, that 'your existence will cease when 'your body dies?" "As for that," he answered, "I cannot help it, 'and we must make the most of 'what we have." I perceived him determined not to think lest it should make him unhappy, and on my solicitously urging him to review the momentous subject, he became peevish and said I was trying to give myself importance in the world by all I said concerning religion.

His life, for several years after this, was such as might be expected from his principles. Riches were his idol. His parsimony preserved him from licentious excess. Honest men detested the principles by which they saw him to be governed. His unprincipled associates were afraid to fall under his power. There was something in his countenance indescribable that marked him for another Cain, and while many through necessity resorted to him for assistance, there was not a man on earth who loved him. Passing over several parts of his conduct, which evidently proceeded from an endeavor to erase from his mind a sense of moral obligation, of sin, and a state where impenitent sinners shall receive a reward according to their deeds, I shall now come to his death-bed. A just Providence forbid him a long state of decay as a season of admonition and preparation for eternity. He had his call before and it was rejected. An awful accident in a moment placed him in a hopeless state, and within two days of his exit from this world. This accident tho fatal, did not immediately affect his head, and the powers of reason were in full strength.

Now behold the man who had exploded moral obligation, denied the existence of sin, determined there was no future life, and consequently no punishment for him, and all this for the sake of gaining and enjoying this world without the molestations of his own conscience. True it is, that in this awful moment he was left to a great degree of judicial blindness concerning another world, the nature of hopeful preparation for death, and the just and eternal reward of sin; but misery and dismay rose upon him from a quarter he did not expect. His beloved scheme of ceasing to exist at death became his terror. "And have I now," said he, "done with existence? Shall I presently cease to think, to see, to feel? Am I to exist but a few moments filled with pain, and then lie down to be nothing forever? I am pained for the fruits of my labor; I have labored for nothing; I cannot bid farewell to the earnings of so many years."

On being told by one who had not known his previous opinions, that he certainly should exist, and that the future being of men was indicated by nature, and made sure by scriptural evidence, an aspect of still greater horror settled on his countenance, and after a pause of a minute he replied: "If those scriptures are true, eternity will be more dreadful to me than the loss of being. I will not believe them; yet how dreadful the idea of sinking into eternal thoughtless night!" This struggle of feeling lasted but a few minutes, before this miserable man either sunk into the eternal sleep which he dreaded, or opened his eyes in an eternity to him more dreadful!!!

Such are the dying comforts of impiety. Thus at last will the excites and pleas. of irreligion torment those who adopt them in their lives, to quiet an accusing conscience, and resist the warnings of the holy spirit who strives with men. This is a fearful example of that blindness into which many are left judicially to fall through grieving the spirit of grace!

PRESBUTEROS.

A letter from a Father to his Daughter.

DEAR DAUGHTER,

YOU mention in your's of the 11th inst. a treatise of Mr.

Vol. II. No. 4.

Dickinson upon the doctrine of election in my possession which you had formerly read and wish for it with my opinion, meaning, as I suppose, on the subject, and not respecting the performance. I have not the book in my possession at present, but will send you some of my thoughts on the subject.

That the bible is of divine original or a real and true revelation from Heaven will not be denied, or doubted, by a person who seriously and impartially attends to the evidence in support of the idea or supposition. As it is, in my apprehension, of the highest importance to have this point fully established in order to settle our opinion and establish a belief of any doctrine of revelation, I will give you a few of my thoughts (and I can do no more in a letter) respecting the evidence we have in support of the truth of the bible as a revelation, or rather, revelations from God. It is natural to begin with Moses—Philosophy will teach us that there are very few, if any, original or innate ideas in the human mind, and experience will join to prove that, however fruitful the imagination, the human mind does not possess ideas which have not had some antecedent archetypes. But what was there to suggest to Moses the history he has given us of creation. He might, indeed, from the works of God possibly have traced out some of the divine attributes which belong to the Creator; but if we form an opinion on this point from the known and acknowledged stupidity, ignorance and gross misconceptions (where there are any at all) respecting the existence and perfections of God, which possess the minds of that part of mankind not favored with divine revelation, we shall at once conclude that his ideas of the author of nature—that God who he tells us created the heavens and earth were solely matter of revelation. Be this as it may, what is there in nature, in all the works of God which we see, or which Moses saw, which has or then had the least conceivable aptness or fitness to excite in his mind one idea of creation? And much less to suggest the manner or process in which the work was carried on. But least of all, the idea of divine rest. All the ingenuity of the Deist will leave the history of the creation as given by Moses perfectly unaccountable and inconceivable on any other supposition but this, that God revealed it to him, or that he had it from those to whom it had been revealed before his day.

The prophecies delivered several thousand years since, which contained the history of the world in epitome, the accomplishment of which has been clearly made out down to our day, furnish further striking proof of the truth of the divine scriptures.

But the most forcible and irresistible evidence of the truth of the scriptures is the sublimity and incomprehensible nature of their doctrines. There can hardly be conceived a more palpable and ridiculous absurdity than this, that doctrines which the mind of man cannot comprehend should have any other than a divine original. The bible then is a revelation of divine truth. Taking this for an established truth I will offer some thoughts more immediately connected with the doctrine of Election.

Human depravity is a doctrine of the bible. It is there taught in terms which imply at once its certainty, malignity and universality in the most pointed manner. It is represented as very enmity itself against God, not subject to his law, nor can be. Stronger language is not to be found. Universal experience concurs to support the scripture account of the matter. The government of God and man appear to have their foundation, and I think only foundation, in depravity. Regulations might be useful, probably necessary, in a society perfectly holy and virtuous, but coercive and penal laws could have neither place or use. The bible throughout supposes and implies the depravity of human nature, the best men have ever acknowledged and lamented it, the history of the Jews gives ample proof of it, but the most finished, complete proof is to be found in the appointment and work of the Saviour.— It is agreed that this depravity has fixed its seat in the moral powers of the man principally; but I think we shall not err if, we suppose that a degree of injury or inconvenience rests on all his faculties. If the heart be by nature opposed to the divine government can it be possible for it to alter itself, to oppose its own motions and feelings? The supposition is contrary to the reasoning of philosophers; and absolutely repugnant to the bible. This depravity of our nature being allowed, one of these consequences must follow, viz. That all men will be objects of sovereign mercy without any regard to the condition specified in the gospel; or a certain number only, as we are theretaught. The current of scripture seems to me strongly to militate against the supposition of universal salvation; but those passages especially which declare that Christ will call all before him to judgment and then make that public and just distinction between the righteous and the wicked which their respec-

five characters shall require, and in consequence, assign to them vastly different portions. Salvation then must be wholly of grace, and it will follow that God is a sovereign, and has mercy on whom he will have mercy. And the doctrine of Election as given us in the bible will not only appear to be true, but the thing itself necessary to the salvation of any part of the children of apostate Adam. I have gone, you will see, upon the supposition that all the divine acts are results of divine counsel, or more properly perhaps, of divine decrees; a truth easily demonstrated, but it will not be necessary to show it. I am sensible, objections are made against the doctrine I have attempted to establish; one is that it is irreconcilable with some parts of the scripture—and it is a bold presumptuous cavil. Is it possible that eternal unchangeable truth should declare inconsistent things? Most certainly it is not. That there should be difficulties attending the doctrine ought not to be considered as ground of just objection against it. Every thing about us, every thing within us presents numberless unsearchables—abundant matter for difficult inquiry and which, indeed, will forever disappoint the best and most thorough human investigation. In God we live and move and have our being. This implies the most absolute, continual and universal dependence. This notwithstanding, we feel ourselves possessed of all the liberty necessary to render us the proper subjects of divine commands, and to make us accountable for all our conduct; nor could we use a greater portion of liberty than we now enjoy. Apply this observation to the doctrine of Election.—Did ever any person feel his liberty impaired by it? Do not saints and sinners act with equal freedom in choosing their respective objects? They certainly do. No man can come unto me (says a benevolent Redeemer) except the Father who hath sent me draw him. Did anyone in consequence of this drawing, ever perceive the least force or compulsion upon his mind? Surely not. That we short sighted creatures cannot perceive the consistency of the present doctrine with other scriptures affords no solid ground of objection against it. On the like ground we might deny the possibility of God's making a man. The same objection will lie in its full strength against the moral government of God; and will lead to downright scepticism; and possibly to that which is more to be dreaded, rooted unbelief. It ought to satisfy us to believe and know that God who favors us with his revealed truths perfectly sees their connection and consistency.

It may be observed here, with propriety, that could men clearly discern the consistency, and fully comprehend the mysteries of revealed truths and doctrines this of itself would remove a main pillar on which the spiritual building rests. It would weaken, it would destroy one of the most substantial arguments we have to prove the truth of the scriptures. Could men comprehend revealed truths in their full extent and meaning, would they not immediately, and with appearance of reason, say, is this the revelation which claims divine honors? There is nothing here above what the sagacity of a Newton or a Locke might have discovered. Thanks to God the scriptures are divine, sublime, and incomprehensible! Besides, we live by faith. What ground for faith could we see every thing!

The difficulty philosophic minds feel respecting the scriptures grows out of a misapplication of their reasoning powers more than out of the divine oracles themselves. The proper province of reason is to examine the evidence produced in support of the authenticity of the scriptures. Having found this evidence satisfactory, reason has done its work. We have then little else to do but believe and obey. This examination will take in both the internal and external evidence of divine truth, and having found no absurdity, the sublime truths of the scriptures are not to pass the scrutiny of cavilling worms and then receive a contemptuous rejection. This will afford you a striking reason why unbelief has marks of divine displeasure so pointedly fixed upon it in the gospel. God has given us clear evidence of the truth of the scriptures, and particularly of the coming and work of Christ, and commands us on pain of death to give him credit, to believe him. The penalty is not unreasonable. A man will not patiently take the lie. He that believeth not maketh God a liar!—I hope, daughter, you will not dispute about the bible doctrines. If you are convinced they are divine writings take them as you find them, and believe them as they stand. Their meaning, so far as is necessary we should know and understand it, is generally plain and obvious. Those things in them hard to be understood, you need not worry yourself with. The doctrine of election is a doctrine of reason as well as of revelation, and it will most certainly demand your particular acknowledgments to God if you can find any marks or fruits of divine and sovereign grace in yourself.—The bible is designed to make us good, not to make us disputants. If you find your love to God the Father for his precious unspeakable gift, to God the Son for his matchless love to man, to God the Spirit for astonishing and much abused and despised Grace in arresting and binding a rebel madly pursuing the road to ruin, daily receiving an increasing glow, accompanied with greater animation in duty, warmer zeal for God and more operative benevolence to men, rejoice and be thankful. Give him the praise to whom it is due; but don't forget that you may be deceived in the view you take of yourself if you do not perceive that humility increases in proportion to that glow of love I have mentioned.

Religious Intelligence.

The following Letter from the East-Indies to the Directors of the New-York Missionary Society cannot fail to interest every friend to Missions.

Serampore, Oct. 15th, 1800.

To the New-York Missionary Society.

DEAR BRETHREN,

IT has given us much pleasure to hear that a society has been established in America for the purpose of spreading the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ among the heathen nations which border upon you. We most heartily wish you God speed; we pray that you may have wisdom from above, to enable you to concert your plans aright, and patience to wait in these labors of love till God shall give the blessing expected.

The various tribes of American Indians appear to have a claim upon the American churches; or rather, perhaps we may say, that one great end of the existing of the churches in America is, to spread the glorious gospel among the heathens in their vicinity, It is said, "He that believeth, out of his belly shall flow rivers of living water." The saints individually are converted, that they may work for God, and glorify him; not merely that they may go to heaven when they die; so also churches may be looked upon as little encampments from which we are to sally out, in attacks on the great enemy, or rather on the kingdom of the great enemy of God and man. You, dear brethren, are now drawing up in battle array—Go forward—Persevere—Redouble your efforts. Be not weary in well doing: for if you don't faint, you shall reap in due time. Undoubtedly you will meet with discouragements: many professors of the gospel may not at first enter into the idea that Christians, and all which they profess, belong entirely to the Lord, and consequently may for a time act as if the giving or withholding supplies was at their option; others may tire, if they don't see immediate success, and many may blame your measures, after you have done the best in your power; but it is your business to endure all things for the elect's sakes, that they may be saved.

It is now, dear brethren, seven years since we entered upon the work of the Mission in this country, and it is uncertain to this hour, whether any of the heathens are truly converted or not, though there have been many very hopeful appearances, and some which were so much so, that we believed God had begun his work in reality: and the evidences continued for a long time, but at last decayed. Yet we still hope of some persons. Were we however to look on the Mission in this point of view, we should conclude that nothing had been done to any purpose; but when we compare the time of our first arrival with the present, we cannot help concluding that some very important ends have been accomplished. Our first landing was a formal taking possession of the country for God: it was fixing a colony in the strongest part of Satan's possessions. Since that we have been preserved and increased inasmuch that the colony which at first consisted of only five grown persons and five children, now consists of seven males and five women, evidently on the side of God (tho death has removed two of our brethren, viz. Grant and Fountain from us) besides the children in number seven. God has also been gracious in the conversion of some Europeans, and others. The language has been acquired—the gospel preached to many thousands, and the bible translated into the Bengal language: part of the New-Testament is printed, and the whole will be so before you get this. Some hundreds of copies of Matthew's Gospel, and some other small pieces have been distributed and read by many. The system of Hindooism begins to totter, and even Bramans are in many instances ashamed to avow that their Shalters are of divine original: so that, notwithstanding all our discouragements, and all our want of success, we are constrained to say that the Lord has done great things for us; and it is also in our hearts to expect greater. We are indeed rather strengthened than weakened, and though the much desired success has been delayed till now, yet we are all with one heart trusting in the Lord; and I believe are all disposed to continue in our work till death, and not to be moved with any discouragement.

What can we say, dear brethren, to encourage you to persevere in the good work, and to abound in it? Two considerations are of great weight with us, viz. 1. Every soul is of more value than the whole world: therefore no length of time, or expense of treasure is too great to be devoted to the salvation of souls; and the effectual calling of one to the fellowship of the faith, is more than an ample recompense for all that can be given, done, or suffered, to accomplish it. 2. The Gospel is the power of God to salvation; and the publication thereof the ordinary means of delivering sinners from the power of sin and Satan. It would be presumption in us to expect the salvation of sinners any other way; and the height of unfeeling cruelty to refuse to the heathen world, that which we believe and know to be God's ordinance for the salvation of sinners. The man who keeps that money in his purse, or employs it in trifling gratifications, which is wanted to send the gospel to them, is guilty of the blood of souls; and the man who is furnished with gifts for this work, if when encouraged by the Church to devote himself to this work, declines it through fear of danger, or love of ease, is also guilty of the blood of souls. Churches not seeking out, and encouraging such gifts, are in the same condemnation. So that this work is as incumbent on every Christian, as any of the divine commands are, and cannot be neglected without very great guilt.

But on the other hand, the example of our Lord Jesus Christ, who spared no pains or cost to send the gospel of his grace to sinners; the example of the Apostles, who did not account their lives dear, so that they might finish their course with joy, and the ministry which they had obtained of God, to testify among the Gentiles the unsearchable riches of Christ; the intrepidity of the martyrs, who loved not their lives unto death; the promises that he that watereth shall be watered himself, and that Christ will support his ministers in this important work till the end of time; these—all these are arguments with us, and we doubt not with you also, to persevere in this work; and never, never to give it up—rather to consider it as a work which must not be deserted; which must be persisted in; which must become more and more common; and which must be finally successful, and terminate in the universal dominion of our Lord Jesus Christ over every kindred, and nation, and people, and tongue.

Dec. 9. Capt. Hague, the bearer of this, has frequently visited us, and has gone with us when we have gone out to proclaim the Saviour in the streets to the wretched Hindoos. Within the last two months our prospects and hopes have brightened up, and we hope the Lord has revealed himself to some of the heathens. Five persons, three men and two women, give us great hope. One has given himself up to the church by relating the experience of the grace of God on his soul; and we expect that the others will soon follow his steps. We may be too sanguine in our joy at this event; but when you reflect on its vast importance, you will easily excuse us. We have felt the pain of disappointed hopes before, more than once or twice: but the first true converts must appear some time; and appearances strongly encourage us to think that the present are the first fruits of Bengal to Christ.

We take the liberty to present to you a copy of the gospel of Matthew in the Bengalic language, at the end of which are some small tracts and hymns, which we have dispersed pretty widely. Our dear brother Williams, of New-York, will present it to you as a token of our hearty concurrence with you in your work, and as a motive of praise and thanksgiving to God on our behalf.

We take our leave—pray for us—we pray for you. May we all be steadfast, unmovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, so far as ye know that our labour will not be in vain in the Lord.

We are your affectionate brethren in the kingdom and patience of Christ.

Signed in behalf of all the Missionaries, and by their desire,

WILLIAM CAREY.

Our readers will recollect we informed them that the Rev. David Bacon, soon after his ordination last winter, commenced a journey to Detroit with a view of laboring there as a Missionary, and of learning the Chippeway language, that he might go as a Missionary among the western Indians. No intelligence has been received from him till within a few days. He got no further than Bloomfield, in the State of New-York, by sleighing. There he was detained several weeks and then proceeded on his journey with his wife and her brother, a young man who is to learn the Chippeway language, that he may qualify himself for an instructor among the Indians. After a very fatiguing and dangerous journey Mr. Bacon and his companions arrived at Detroit the 9th of May last. At Fairfield a town on the north side of Lake Ontario, he found a settlement of Moravians and some civilized and christianized Indians.

The following anecdote of two Squaws whom he found at this place is extracted from his letter. "Having occasion to mention the name of Mr. Brainard, who was formerly a Missionary to the Indians, the Moravian ministers told me that they had two Squaws in their society, who were baptized by him; and that one of them had shown them a bible, a few days before which she said he gave her. Recollecting that Mr. Brainard visited the Delawares, and that these Indians were a part of that nation, I credited the report; and was pleased to find that some of his Indians were not only in the land of the living, but in the very neighbourhood where I was. I immediately sent for the one who lived the nearest. She came to see me, and appeared very decent, sensible and clever. She was considerably advanced in years, but did not know her age, as is commonly the case with Indians. She spoke pretty good English, observed that she was very small when she was baptized by him; and putting her hand out about three feet and a half from the floor, observed that she was not more than so high when she saw him last. As she left the place about that time she knew of none of his Indians, but the Squaw that was with her. I had not much opportunity to know whether she gave evidence of grace; but the Moravian ministers suppose them both to be Christians; and that they were converted under Mr. Brainard's ministry. May God be praised for his merciful care of them!

Mr. Bacon is now at Detroit where he preaches to the people of that place, and will probably be very useful as a minister, there being no Presbyterian Minister within several hundred miles. There is a probability that a church will soon be formed in that place. Mr.
 Bacon also keeps a school, and under the instruction of the public interpreter he and the young man with him are learning the Chippeway language. He has frequent opportunities of seeing some of the Indian chiefs, and there is a pleasing prospect that he will soon be made an instrument of communicating the light of the gospel to some of the poor benighted Indians.

POETRY.

COMMUNICATED AS ORIGINAL.

MESS'RS. EDITORS,

THE ingenious version of the 29th
 Chapter of the book of Job in your last Magazine and the suggested request at the close has induced me to attempt the following paraphrase of the succeeding Chapter. If it meets your approbation please to give it a place in your next number. C. R. L.

BUT now alas, mankind commence
 my foes,
 The young the vile deride me in my woes ;
 Dregs of all flesh an outcast savage brood,
 Who dwell in caves and roam the wastes
 for food ;
 Of vile descent and hateful in their ways,
 They feared and served me in my pro-
 perous days,
 But now am I their by-word and their song,
 Reproach and insult dwell on every tongue.
 My countenance which once o'ershined the vile,

Now pale and wan, with spitting they defile ;
 My cord is loos'd, to this vile race 'tis given,
 To execute the afflicting will of Heaven.

At my right hand the youth assuming soar,
 And take that place they dar'd not take before.

As sweeping floods o'erflow the spacious plain,
 And lay whole fields beneath their wa-
 try reign ;

So throngs tumultuous compass me around,
 Insult my grief and open every wound.
 Swift as the winds pursuing terror's crowd,

My welfare flies me as the morning
 cloud ;
 With anguish deep my melting soul is prest, Pierced are my bones my sinews take no rest :

Loathsome disease my stiffen'd garments bind,
 In filth and dust my former glories end.
 To fill complete my cup of pain and grief,
 My heavenly Father to my cries is deaf,
 I feel thy heavy hand, thine angry frown
 Like wind pursues and melts my substance down.

Soon o'er my head shall death's dark standard wave,
 Soon this weak frame shall moulder in the grave ;

That land of silence and perpetual peace,
 Where all my woes shall end, my sorrows cease ;

Did not my heart with tenderness o'er-flow,

And weep responsive to the sighs of woe ?
 I look'd for good but countless ills ensue,
 For light I waited but the light withdrew.

My bowels boil with keen disease oppress'd,

I mourn in darkness with no comfort
 bless'd ;

The lonely wood I roam, my spirit faints,
 The owl and dragon echo my complaints.

My skin is black my bones are fill'd with pain,

And naught but sore calamities remain ;
 Once harp and organ caused my joys to flow,

But now are tuned to melodies of woe.

Donations to the Missionary Society of Connecticut.

From Rev. Dr. Trumbull,	-	-	Dolla.	11.
Two Strangers,	-	-	do.	2.
Mary Stone,	-	-	do.	7.

T H E

Connecticut Evangelical Magazine.

[PUBLISHED ACCORDING TO ACT OF CONGRESS.]

VOL. II.]

NOVEMBER, 1801.

[No. 5.

On the Scriptural foundation for celebrating the first day of the week, as the Christian Sabbath.

ALTHOUGH Christians are generally agreed, in the belief of a divine warrant for the observation of the Christian sabbath, it is apprehended that a view of the leading evidences of this duty will be serviceable both to confirm their faith, and promote their edification.

The following brief-statement of the arguments is, therefore, presented to their consideration.

The observation of every seventh day, as a season of religious and holy rest, to man, was instituted from the beginning, as a memorial of the completion of the work of creation, and the divine well-pleas'dness with it.

When the work of the sixth day was completed, "God saw every thing which he had made and behold it was very good. And on the seventh day, God ended his work which he had made, and he rested on the seventh day, from all his work, which he had made. And God blessed the seventh day and sanctified it; because that in it, he had rested from all his work, which God created and made."*

From the Mosaic relation respecting the manna, it appears that the holy rest of the sabbath was known to Israel before the promulgation of the Sinai law.—That it was known to other nations, is evident from several ancient writers.†

This divine institution was renewed in the Mosaic law, and the ground and reason of it again ascertained, in the following words :

"Remember the sabbath day to keep it holy. Six days shalt thou labour and do all thy work. But the seventh day is the sabbath of the Lord thy God. In it thou shalt not do any work.—For in six days the Lord made heaven and earth, the sea, and all that in them is, and rested the seventh day. Wherefore the Lord blessed the sabbath day and hallowed it."‡

In the sacred writings of the old testament, we find frequent reference to the sabbath, as an institution of God, and the proper celebration of it, as an essential part of practical religion. It seems to be designed as a day of religious and devout rest from the labors and pursuits of the present world, and of thanksgiving to God for all his favors, especially for the work of creation; and as an expression of faith in the gracious intimations of God to his church, of a state of holy rest and joy, in his eternal kingdom, for all the redeemed, through the promised Messiah.

* Genesis ii. 2, 3. † In particular Hesiod, Homer, and Linus, see Pol. Synop. on Genesis ii. 2, 3. ‡ Exod. xx. 8, 9, 10, 11.

With a view to the same important object, was the institution of the rest of the seventh month, (which was almost wholly consecrated to religious solemnities) as also of the seventh year, and of the great year of jubilee after the completion of seven times seven years. This last was a season of abundant rest and joy, and was eminently typical of the gospel salvation, and that blessed rest, which remains for the people of God, in the heavenly state.

Indeed, the sabbath of the seventh day, and all the sabbatical institutions which have been mentioned, together with the possession of the land of Canaan, given to the seed of Abraham as the earthly, promised rest, were ultimately designed for the same end.

As it pleased God, through all ages after the apostacy of man, to intimate his designs of mercy to sinners through a divine Redeemer, foretold in prophecy, as "the seed of the woman, and as the seed of Abraham—of the tribe of Judah, and of the family of David;" so the old testament abounds with predictions and representations of a new and more glorious state of things, which should succeed his appearance in our nature and world. And the work of redemption, which he was to accomplish by his obedience and death, is represented as the greatest of the works of God, manifested to man, to which all his other works are subordinate.

This new state of things was to consist especially in a new system of rules and ordinances, respecting the worship of God, from which (as also from other sources of argument) it appears that the institutions and ordinances of worship in the old testament, and especially in the Mosaic system, were not generally designed to be perpetual, in the church of God on earth; but, to be typical of that new state of things just mentioned, and introductory to it. So that we are to view the whole Mosaic œconomy as a shadow of good things to come, of which the body is Christ and Christianity, or the institutions of the gospel.*

This great and general change, in the ordinances of religion, by no means implies any alteration in the nature and object of divine worship or of religion in general, but only in the mode of exemplifying that religion. And as might be expected, the substance is more perfect than the shadow, or there is an advance from the imperfect state of things, under the old testament, before the incarnation of the Messiah, to a more perfect state under his reign, in the days of the gospel.

Thus, instead of the natural seed of Abraham, and the earthly Canaan, there are his spiritual seed, and the Jerusalem which is above. For the priesthood, and the blood of slain beasts offered in sacrifice, we have the Lord Jesus Christ, with his eternal priesthood, and the offering of himself unto God, in the shedding of his own blood, which alone is sufficient to take away sin. Similar observations will apply to all other ordinances of the ancient dispensation, when contrasted with the new.

* See Coloss. ii. 17. Heb. viii. 5. and x. 1. et passim.

From the analogy of divine dispensations, we should be led to look for a change of the day of sacred rest, that in future it might celebrate the work of redemption, by the consecration of the day in which God rested from that work, which was the great object of creation, and to which that, and all his other works are evidently subordinate. But we must not affect to be wise beyond what is written in the holy scriptures.

Let us then inquire whether there is any evidence from the prophecies of the old testament, that there should be a change of the Sabbath at the commencement of the gospel dispensation. In this examination—we shall attend to two scripture passages only.

In the first of them we find these words, "This is the day which the Lord hath made, we will rejoice and be glad in it."* That a great part of the psalm from which these words are taken, respects the Messiah, appears not only from the subject-matter, but, from its application to him in various passages in the new testament. † This is particularly evident concerning the words quoted, and those which immediately precede and follow them. That the resurrection and exaltation of Christ is the subject, appears from the words, in their connection; that the day of his resurrection is referred to follows of course. So that these words are directly to the purpose of the present argument. For if the Lord hath made this day, in any sense different from that in which he makes all days; it must undoubtedly mean that he has consecrated it for the use to which the inspired writer says it shall be applied; even to rejoice and be glad, or to keep it as a day of sacred rest and thanksgiving for the great work of redemption—from which Jesus rested on this day, by his resurrection; as God rested on the seventh day from the work of the first creation. The passage may therefore be justly considered as a direct prediction of the change of the sabbath; or that the first day of the week should be celebrated in the Christian church as a sabbath in grateful commemoration of the resurrection of our Lord Jesus Christ.

The other prophetic scripture, from the old testament, which invites our attention, is in the following words, viz.

"Behold I create new heavens and a new earth and the former shall not be remembered, nor come into mind. But be you glad and rejoice forever in that which I create: for behold I create Jerusalem a rejoicing and her people a joy.* The new heavens and the new earth import the new creation, and are designed to represent the effects of the work of redemption, in the state of the redeemed church, from the incarnation of the Saviour to the final consummation in the heavenly rest. † That the old heavens and earth shall not be remembered or come into mind can mean nothing more than that they shall not be celebrated by the standing memorial of the seventh day sabbath, which was the only way in which the old creation ever had been stately celebrated. The religious rejoicing predicted in the latter clause of the text on account of the new creation imports that it shall be celebrated in like manner, as was the old creation, previous to the introduction of the new. Therefore as that was celebrated by a holy rest and thanksgiving, on the day in which God rested from his work; even so the new creation or the work of redemption, shall be celebrated by a stated holy rest and thanksgiving, on the day in which he rested from this, or in which Jesus Christ rose from the dead.

* Psalm cxviii. 24. † Matth. xxi. 42. Acts iv. 21. 1 Peter ii. 4.

* Isaiah lxv. 17, 18. † See Isaiah lxvi. 22. 2 Peter iii. 13. Rev. xxi. 1.

We now proceed to make the following observations, viz.

1. Our Lord Jesus Christ rose from the dead, on the first day of the week. This is expressly asserted by the Evangelists, in their respective histories of their divine master; and is confirmed by the account of the precaution taken by the Jews to prevent any possible fraud or collusion in the case.

Jesus was crucified on the day preceding the Jewish sabbath. He expired about three o'clock in the afternoon, and was laid in the sepulchre, just before the setting of the sun, that the Jewish sabbath, which commenced at sun set, might not be infringed. This was therefore the sixth day of the week. Jesus had predicted his resurrection on the third day after his death which would be the first day of the week, the Jews therefore took no care of the body till the commencement of the third day, at which time they went to the Roman governor and, referring to this prediction of Jesus, requested a guard of soldiers to watch the sepulchre "till the third day should be past." This was obtained, the sepulchre was made sure, and the guard placed. But all that care was vain as to preventing the resurrection of the Lord Jesus. Early in the morning of the third day, he was alive from the dead. Thus by all this precaution of the Jews, we have the resurrection of our Lord still more confirmed, and the day of it fully ascertained.

We therefore infer, with abundant certainty, that this is the day predicted by the Psalmist, in which Christians should rejoice in their king and Saviour, and celebrate the praises of redeeming grace, by a stated observation of it, instead of the seventh day, as predicted by Isaiah.

It appears from the gospel history, that our Lord appeared to his disciples on the day of his resurrection, and afterward on the first day of the week,*—that on this day the disciples met together to break bread,† that it was distinguished among them by the name of the Lord's day; and that on this day the Lord Jesus made his celebrated visit to his beloved disciple, suffering for his name in the isle of Patmos in which he revealed to him the great events relating to the redeemed church till the end of the world.‡

The general observation of the first day of the week as the Christian sabbath, in the primitive church, in the ages next succeeding that of the Apostles, is confirmed by the earliest writers, whose works have reached our time, and who had occasion to speak on this subject.

Now had it not been a usage divinely instituted and practised by the Apostles, and other inspired men, it is utterly inconceivable how it should have obtained so early in the Christian church, and with so few dissenting voices; considering the strong attachment of the Jewish converts to the ancient rites of their church. But it is perfectly easy to account from the circumstances just named, for the remaining attachment of some professing Christians, to the Jewish sabbath.

* John xi. 1—19—26. † Acts xx. 7.
‡ Rev. i. 10.

The preceding statement of the arguments in favor of the celebration of the first day of the week, as the Christian sabbath, it is presumed will be satisfactory.

It deeply concerns us that we celebrate this blessed day, agreeably to its institution and design. Much has been written by the learned and pious on this subject, which we ought diligently to peruse and reduce to practice.

The writer would however earnestly recommend to his Christian readers, to remember that this blessed day is to be celebrated, as a thankful memorial of the resurrection of our divine Saviour; and consequently of his whole mediatorial work, for the salvation of sinners, and is it then possible that we should fail to celebrate it in the worship, and to the praises of him who loved us and washed us from our sins in his own blood!

PHILANDER.

An address to those who in the late revival of religion have been bro't into the kingdom of Christ, on the discouragements of Christians.

IT is common that people, when first reconciled to God, have warm affections, and such joys as arise from their first espousals. Satan is so chained, that for a season, he can give them little disturbance. Their morning is a morning without clouds, and they promise themselves perpetual sunshine. Much of this extasy arises from the newness of their discoveries. I remember I once read of a man born blind. After he arrived to maturity, his films were taken off by a surgeon. The beauties of creation rushed at once upon his sight, and tho' he was much less able to distinguish objects and take the benefit of his eyes than other men, yet his extasy for a season was above description: so when one has always been blind to the glory of God, and the beauties of the moral world, it is reasonable to expect, the first discoveries of them must produce that admiration and rapture, which is peculiar to such seasons tho' their views are less distinct, and their humility, dependence and other Christian exercises are more imperfect. In this situation they are sometimes ready to triumph, as if the victory was already compleat, and they had nothing to do, but rejoice thro' life. But these expectations will not be realized. The great apostle to the Gentiles had sharp conflicts; and all who will live godly in Christ Jesus, shall suffer persecution. And for the most part need requires, that they endure many tribulations. They hear more experienced Christians tell of darkness, but tho' they hardly expect it, it comes upon them. It is then discouragements begin.

One source of discouragement is their own inconstancy. This, tho' they are as confident as Peter, they will learn by painful experience, as soon as God, to teach them their weakness and dependence, leaves them a little to themselves. It is necessary that God should effectually teach you this lesson, and you will hardly be taught it, but by briars and thorns. You will then say, that you little expected to find yourselves so inconstant, that you had no idea there were such sad remains of unbelief and wickedness in your hearts, and especially that they had strength to produce such disorders and deplora-

rable effects, and render you so fickle in your duty, and so unfaithful to God.

There is reason to fear your inconstancy will act itself out in many ways;—by dissipating your thoughts in seasons for meditation and prayer, when alone,—when in company, by such conversations and conduct as you hoped never to find in yourselves,—by want of resignation in afflictions,—by feeling the sad influence of temptations to your sorrow, and often by a sad indifference about your duty and divine things. I wish you may never also be overawed and unmanned by the company, example and ridicule of the profane and thoughtless. You are sanctified but in part. Wickedness will appear and be acted out by you. You will do evil, and will not answer your raised expectations. It is true your exercises at such times, will be very different from those, who depend on a false hope. You will lament and abhor yourselves, be earnest in prayer, and hold a constant warfare with your lusts, less thro' fear of wrath, than from a tenderness towards the honor of God, and the fear of wounding his cause. The false convert is chiefly stung with conscience, and the dread of punishment. But tho' quite different from hypocrites, you will often tremble, lest you shall prove nothing more. So much depravity as you will find in yourselves, so contrary to your raised expectations, will lead you to doubt whether it can be possible you have any grace.—If you are left to fall into this state, you will be much discouraged. You will hardly be able to resolve on any duty, lest your inconstancy should prevent its accomplishment. You will have little courage in religion. How many have in this way been so discouraged, as greatly to palsey their exertions, kill their comforts, and distress them to the heart!

In addition to this, you will perceive that your enemies have great strength. You will find Satan a formidable enemy, with many wiles, long practised; that he understands his advantages, knows the sins which easily beset you, and is dexterous in his applications of temptation. We fight not against flesh and blood; but against principalities, and powers, and spiritual wickedness in high places. The devil, as a roaring lion, goeth about seeking whom he may devour. He is one who hath ruined millions, and of whom we are particularly warned in the scriptures. And I wish you may not find too, that the things of this world, its riches, honors, customs, and the usual pleas that are made for indulgence in its pleasures, have sufficient power over your hearts, to prove very injurious to your spiritual life. The strength and frequent success of all these enemies are often a great discouragement to Christians, they become disheartened, and are often on the point of laying aside an attempt to lead that strict and holy life, which they approve and desire, under the idea that they cannot succeed in it, against such enemies; and are ready to think of moderating their aims, to what they suppose their abilities may secure. This greatly wounds them, and destroys their comforts, and the brightness of their graces.

Should you be left to this, another discouragement may present itself to you, in your poor disconsolate state, more dreadful than any thing you have met with before. You will now reflect on your inconstancy, and the strength and success of your enemies, and in addition to this, you will reflect on your grievous provocations of God. Now you will probably contemplate God in no other light, than as an angry God, provoked by your wickedness. You will see it would be just with him to give you up to fearful distress. You may be hardly able to hope that God will afford much assistance, to such provoking offenders, or deign to make use of you to do much good in the world. You may lose your confidence in God, and be abandoned to the fury and temptations of your enemies. Should you ever fall into this sad condition, you will feel like others, who have experienced it before you. They would pray, but like Adam, do almost dread to meet with God in prayer. In this case, the Christian prays with little expectations, goes thro' his devotions without comfort, and his prospects of amendment, and of enjoying the light of God's countenance, present but a forlorn hope. If he had no religion, he would probably be much more quiet. He would not be likely to trouble himself so much about these concerns. But he has a living principle within him, which has just strength enough to ruin all carnal comforts, and make him wretched in the view of his guilty and ungrateful life. And perhaps he also loses all sense of the evidences of his having any grace. This, you will say, is drawing a melancholy picture of a Christian. It is. But this is sometimes his case. I have pointed out the criminal way by which he sinks into it, that you may avoid it. And I have drawn it in its darkest colours, that I might also point the way of recovery, to the most burdened and discouraged Christian.—I will now suppose my reader to be in this desolate state, and show you your deliverance.

The grace of God is your only hope. He hath said, 'My grace is sufficient for thee.' Whatever may be the situation of a believer, from his own inconstancy, the strength of his enemies, or his grievous provocations, repeatedly, and for a long time committed against God, or however great his temptations and discouragements may be, still there is sufficient grace in God for him. Sufficient to recover him from his inconstancy, to vanquish his enemies, support him in temptations, forgive his provocations, restore joy and comfort to his soul, and make him a useful joyful Christian.—Is not God infinite in all his perfections? And therefore in his grace? He assures you that mercy is his delight. How affectionately does he call on you saying, 'Return ye backsliding children, and I will be a Father unto you.'—You have been informed of the provision, which in his mercy he has furnished for a sinful world. You know the sacrifice by which it was made, and with what instructions, and arguments it is accompanied. These things God has done for the most part unasked by our world, and certainly by you. You then ought to be ashamed that you have ever been capable of questioning the sufficiency of his grace for you, in your present situation. The Bible is full of precious promises. Christ is your surety.—He has fulfilled the conditions of your final salvation, and secured to you even in this life, that if you will ask, you shall receive.—But you fear you are not Christians.—Then cast yourselves on his general promises made to all, however vile, who will come unto him.

But your own experience of divine grace is a proof which should silence all your apprehensions, that the grace of God is not sufficient for you. Have you not tasted his love? Are you not enemies to sin—mourners for it—hearty in your desires for the honor of God? Do you not groan to be delivered from evil, and made holy, that you may honor him? Are not your sins your burdens, and the evil nature of sin the cause of your hatred to it? Is not Zion dear to you, and the cause of God precious?—Yes, you will say, if I know my own heart, these are the things, which above all others, command my soul.—And how came you by this spirit? Who gave it? Who supports it notwithstanding all your provocations? you own it is—it must be God. Do you not then find by experience he is gracious?

The infinite sufficiency of Christ you do not scruple. Why then do you lose your confidence in God? God has owned him, as the Lord our righteousness—as man's Redeemer. He has renewed your heart. It was not always as it now is. You are therefore one, whom he has given unto Christ, as part of the reward of the travail of his soul. God when he gave you to him, and began the work of his grace in your heart, and took you into covenant, knew how inconstant you would prove. He has not been disappointed in you, that he should change his purposes concerning you. He never indeed expected much from you. But under all these circumstances, it appears by your gracious exercises, tho' low, that you have been given to Christ. And he is well able to fit you for the use he designs you for and enrich you to any degree he pleases. Why then should you be discouraged? And how do you know but your present condition is allotted you in kindness, to humble you, empty you of self-depend-dance, and bring you to cast yourselves more entirely on God? If you depended on God, your present causes of trouble would not discourage you, you would still be strong in the Lord. It is then plain from your present discouragements, you do not sufficiently depend on him. You then need the thorns which now tear you, to teach you not to be discouraged at your own frailties and corruptions, and the strength of your enemies, while you may rely on the strength of God, to keep you from all self-dependence hereafter.

It is sinful for Christians to harbour any discouragements to dishearten them from duty, and a strict and holy walk with God. It betrays their want of confidence in him.

Christians should abound in faith and prayer. These are the means to secure the special interpositions of God in their behalf. They live by these, and by these, they are made strong in the Lord, and in the power of his might, and may safely undertake an holy life, with confidence of success.—O the admirable mercy of God, to such inconstant provoking sinners!

MIKROS.

TO THE EDITORS OF THE CONNECTICUT EVANGELICAL MAGAZINE.

GENTLEMAN,

THE following thoughts, on the superior excellency of the scriptures, are sent for a place in the Magazine, if they meet your approbation.

WE read in the latter part, of the 2d verse in the 138th Psalm, "For thou hast magnified thy word, above all thy name."

WORD in scripture hath various significations. In some places it signifies Christ, in others the law, and in others the gospel. But most generally we are to understand by the word the holy scriptures in general. And this is the meaning of, thy word, in the above sacred passage. Likewise, the name of God hath divers meanings. It sometimes signifies any thing by which God maketh himself known. And as the Apostle calleth the contributions of the Church at Corinth their liberality, so by the name of God (now under consideration) is meant his works of creation and common providence, by which his glorious character is made known.

Certainly, all thy name cannot mean the word; for then the passage would read thus, for thou hast magnified thy word above all thy word. But if, by all thy name is meant creation and common providences, then the above passage would read thus, for thou hast magnified, thy word, above all thy works of creation, and common providence. This would make sense, and this it is humbly conceived, is the genuine meaning of the Psalmist.

We live in an unbelieving age, when many under-value the word, and extol nature, human philosophy, and the visible creation far above it. But while the infidel glories in nature and creation, as his superior book, the infinite God magnifieth the believer's bible far above them. And let not worms affect to despise that which the great Jehovah, so extolleth above all his name; as it appears he doth his word.

1. The Lord no where speaketh so honorably, of nature and creation, as he doth of his written word. When speaking of the heavens and earth, he saith, they shall wax old, pass away, and perish. And he calleth high feeling man in all his glory grass, and a fading flower. And how do such expressions, mortify the pride of man, and cast a dismal gloom on all the visible creation? But the Lord was never heard to speak after this sort of his exalted word. When speaking of the magnified word, he saith, it shall stand forever, it shall not pass away, tho' all flesh shall fade and the heavens and earth be removed. And it is easy to see how, that in so speaking, the Lord doth magnify his word, far above the laws of nature, and all the material creation.

2. The Lord gives superior honor to his word, in that he doth at all events make it good. "Hath he spoken; and shall he not make it good?" Nations and individual, are wont to so under-value their word as to give it up, or suffer it to fail. It may be bought, or they will give it up, in the day of temptation. And who ever selleth his word for gold, magnifieth gold above it. But the Lord hath such a value for his word, he cannot suffer it to fail either as to time, or in any other respect. He would see all this lower creation in flames, and stop every wheel in providence, before he would let a syllable of his word fail; yes, before he would delay its accomplishment a single second. The twelve legion of Angels were not sent, to relieve God's suffering Son, neither did Jesus ask for them, because a fulfilling of the scripture stood in the way. And who can hear Jesus testify, that "heaven and earth shall pass away, before one jot or tittle; of the law shall fail," and see the shining legions stand aloof from the suffering son of God, because the scripture stood in the way of their flying as on the wings of a cherub for his relief; who can hear, and see all this, and not exclaim, O how doth God magnify his word!

3. The Lord magnifieth his word above creation, and providence, in this also, in that he directeth us to it, in order to know his will, and our duty, and not to them.

We cannot tell love, or hatred by common providence. Neither doth the Lord send us to creation and the laws of nature, in order to have our doubts solved, and to learn what we must do. But he saith, "to the law and to the testimony." To this men are sent as to the good old way; as to a light that shineth in a dark place, which is able unerringly to guide them in the path of wisdom and life. Jesus extolleth Moses and the prophets, above the testimony of one from the dead. In Deut. 13. the written word is magnified above the miracles of an idolater. And the apostle preferreth it to his, or the witness of an angel from heaven. A parent would bestow his greatest honor upon a book, in telling his children it was able to make them wise unto salvation. And in telling this wisdom was to be found in this book, and in no other, how would he magnify it, above all other books? And the Lord in sending men to his word, and to that only for wisdom unto salvation, doth honor it beyond expression; while creation, philosophy, dreams, the witness of one from the dead, look dark and insignificant before the word.

4. The Lord sheweth his peculiar regard for his word, in his promises and blessings bestowed on them who keep it, because of their obedience. Such are honored with the title of wise men. They abide in God's love, and have the life that now is, and that which is to come. But God hath never thus blessed any because they possess this world, or are versed in the laws of nature. But he will let the men of this world, the self-glorifying philosopher, with these visible heavens and earth, all perish together, in the great burning day. While, with eternal blessings, he will bless them who have delighted in his word. And how doth God in this magnify his word above all the things of time!

5. The Lord doth manifest his superior esteem for his word (and to esteem an object is to honor it), in destroying those who despise it, for their disobedience.

If the Lord did not esteem his word above the present world and its things, he would no sooner condemn us for neglecting it, than for being poor and destitute of natural philosophy. There are many who would prefer a philosopher and a rich man, to a Christian who was rich in faith. The reason is, such people magnify riches, and philosophy, more than the bible. But while the Lord neither praise men for being rich, and skilled in philosophy, nor condemneth them for the want of these things, yet for despising his word, the Lord esteemeth them foolish, threateneth to blow them away in the day of his anger like worthless chaff, and to burn them up with the tares.

6. The Lord bestoweth superior honor upon his word in granting it the special testimony of his Holy Spirit. We do not hear of the Spirit's being poured out on heathen lands though they were ever so eminent for their knowledge in natural things. But God first sent his word in the days of the apostles, and the Spirit was shed forth with the word. And the Lord doth thus in all ages magnify the holy scriptures.

7. The Lord doth magnify his word above all the visible creation, in giving his son to die for the honor of his law.

Had the visible heavens and earth stood in the way of the sinner's salvation, God would have dissolved them, rather than have devoted up his son, to the death of the cross. But the Lord would not make his law, or his word void; rather than that this should be done, Jesus must die.

8. The Lord doth magnify his word above creation and providence, in making it the repository of all his unsearchable riches.

The king honors that city most in which he bestows his peculiar treasures. And the Lord doth honor the word with all the riches of his glory. In the word we have the glory of all the divine perfections, which he proclaimed to Moses at the rock. Here is the true light which aboliseth death, and bringeth to view eternal life. In the word we have all the graces of the Spirit, the pardon of sin, the true bread from heaven, satisfying waters, and all the good of the new covenant. And how do these and the like things, which pertain to the true riches, raise the value and glory of the scriptures? How insignificant is all the perishing bread of this world, to the true bread from heaven?

Now there are two reasons why the Lord doth thus magnify his word above all the things of time. The first is because the holy scriptures are most excellent.

Two things may be the work of God, and yet one of them far the most valuable. God is the author of the spirit of a beast as well as of the soul of man; yet the soul of man is of unspeakably more worth. And though the Lord is the author of the visible creation, as well as of the word, yet the word infinitely exceeds in value. And hence it is that God doth so magnify his word, not because he is partial, but because it is most excellent.

2. The Lord doth thus extol his word because it is of the greatest importance it should be magnified. All the moral glory of God, and all the real happiness of creatures depend upon it. A man may pull down his house, or part with his farm, and still support his moral character. And God may drown this world, or burn it, and be glorious still. But was he to undervalue his word, his moral glory must fall with it. And as the word is the rock on which Zion is built, so if the word is made void, the house of Zion must fall with it. Thus the glory of God, and his holy kingdom, which comprehendeth all the real good in the universe, depend on the word's being magnified. Hence it is that God doth thus magnify it. And how unlike to God must they be who despise and speak light of the scriptures, or leave them for the things of time, and the science of man? Certainly such were never born from above; for all who have the Spirit of God, will be like him in magnifying the word.

Again, How provoking to God, sinful, and hazardous it must be to make light of the word!

If we please, we may call a fruitful hill a barren heath; or call such a spot rocky and worthless. We may in many respects, use great freedom in talking about creation; and speak of it, as temporal and perishing. But every thing against the word, is against the honor and life of God, and he that toucheth it, toucheth the apple of his eye.

Hence, let children, youth, and every one shun the seat and way of those who reject the divine testimony, which God took such care of, as to keep it in the ark, within the most holy place. But let all learn, by faith and practice, to magnify the holy scriptures, after the example of Jesus, who in his three-fold dreadful combat, used no other weapon, except, "it is written."

PHILOLOGUS.

FOR THE CONNECTICUT EVANGELICAL MAGAZINE.

MESS'RS EDITORS,

THE words of the Apostle 1 Cor. xv. 19. "If in this life only we have hope in Christ, we are of all men most miserable." are often brought forward by enquiring minds for explanation. They are doubtless liable to be misunderstood unless carefully attended to—and it is probable that sinners may have often drawn conclusions from them to confirm their prejudices against a life of religion, as being a painful and unhappy life and attended with more evils in the present world, than a life of sin. There are two constructions which are often put upon the words, both of which it is presumed are false, and if received, would be prejudicial to the cause of religion. One is, that Christians while in this life are in general the most unhappy and miserable of mankind—and that there is no motive to embrace and practise Christianity, except the retribution of a future state.

But this construction is inconsistent with the general tenor of scripture, and with fact and experience. The scriptures abundantly testify in favor of religion as it respects our happiness in the present life. They testify that "wisdom's ways are ways of pleasantness, and all her paths peace." That "godliness with contentment, is great gain—that it is profitable to all—having the promise of the life that now is, as well as that which is to come." It is inconsistent with these and numerous other passages of like import which might be cited, to suppose that Christians in general and in ordinary times, experience less real enjoyment or substantial happiness in the present life, than others. It is inconsistent also with fact, or the experience of Christians. The universal testimony of those who cordially embrace the gospel, is that they find a happiness in the knowledge, love and service of God which they never before experienced—and which, if they know their hearts, they would not relinquish, for all the joys, pleasures, and prosperity of this world—even tho' a refusal might expose them to the greatest persecutions and outward afflictions.

The other construction, or exposition given to these words, referred to above, is this; that they are to be understood as confined to the apostles and primitive Christians; or those who suffer similar afflictions and persecutions—and imply that such, so far as respects the present life, are losers by religion, and the most unhappy of mankind. But this idea, tho perhaps the most generally prevalent, is far from being according to the truth. The apostles and primitive Christians, and many in later periods have suffered peculiar afflictions and persecutions, from a wicked opposing and scoffing world.—But they enjoyed that in religion which supported them, and more than counterbalanced those evils. Agreeably to the words of Christ, John

16. 33. "These things have I spoken unto you, that in me ye might have peace. In the world ye shall have tribulation, but be of good cheer, I have overcome the world." As Christ here predicted, so it was in fact. In the world they had tribulation; as Christ had been despised and rejected of men, so they were despised for confessing him, and their name was cast out. They were persecuted—and suffered the loss of all things—yet in him they had peace. Such was their hope and confidence in Christ who had overcome the world, that they were of good cheer—they could rejoice, and even "glory in tribulation."

Therefore the apostle says, speaking of his sufferings and his consolations—"as sorrowful, yet always rejoicing"—and again "I am filled with comfort, I am exceeding joyful in all our tribulation"—"For as the sufferings of Christ abound in us; so our consolation also, abounds by Christ"—Yea, it is represented by Christ, that those who cheerfully submit to persecution and temporal losses and sufferings for his sake shall be great gainers, even in the present life. Mark x. 29, 30. "Verily I say unto you, there is no man that hath left house or brethren or sisters, or father or mother, or wife or children or lands (i. e. has been deprived of or suffered the loss of these things, and submitted) for my sake and the gospel's—but he shall receive an hundred fold, now, in this time, houses and brethren and sisters and mothers and children and lands with persecutions—and in the world to come, eternal life."

Here Christ plainly declares that tho a person may suffer the loss of all external enjoyments, being distressed and persecuted for his sake, yet amidst all his losses and persecutions, he shall have such satisfaction, and inward peace and joy, by the gracious influences and comforts of God's spirit, and in the exercise of that benevolent affection by which he enters into, and enjoys all the happiness of others as will be an hundred fold advantage to him, in the present world. So that instead of being "of all men most miserable" the apostles and primitive Christians, and all who have suffered the loss of all things for Christ, in whatever age they may have lived, have enjoyed an hundred fold more happiness, even in the present life, than they would have enjoyed had they continued possessed of all those outward comforts of which they were deprived, and in a spirit of selfishness, had refused to part with them for Christ and his cause. But if we are not to understand the apostle as meaning to intimate, either that Christians in general, or the apostles and primitive Christians, who lived in times of persecution, and suffered most were on the whole, as to real happiness and enjoyment of mind, losers by Christianity, in the present life—what then, is the meaning of the words? An attention to the scope and subject of the apostle's reasoning in the chapter containing the words, will assist in answering this question. The subject upon which the apostle was treating, was the erroneous sentiment, embraced, or favored by some to whom he wrote, that there would be no resurrection from the dead nor any future state of retribution.

In order to confute this error he intimated in the first place the inconsistency of denying, or doubting of the resurrection of the dead, and yet admitting the resurrection of Christ, as it seems some of them did. "Now if Christ be preached that he rose from the dead, how say some among you, that there is no resurrection of the dead? For if there be no resurrection of the dead, then is Christ not risen." Taking it for granted therefore, that the doctrine of the resurrection of the dead would be sufficiently established, if the resurrection of Christ was proved, the apostle proceeded to support this truth, by stating some of the consequences which would follow from a denial of it. "If Christ be not risen, then is our preaching vain, and your faith is also vain—ye are yet in your sins."

The apostle seems here to appeal to the consciences and feelings of Christians. As if he had said—'If Christ is not risen, then his promise has failed, and he is not the Son of God—so that all our preaching that there is salvation in him, has been a vain thing, and has never been accompanied with a divine power and efficacy—your faith also, is a mere delusion—It was not wrought by his spirit—You have never been brought out of darkness into light, by the gospel, nor to a sanctified and pardoned state—but are yet in your sins.' As the apostle knew that every real Christian would be conscious that all, or most of these consequences were false, he rightly supposed that upon the least reflection they would reject the sentiment from which they flowed. But as this would be satisfactory to none but real Christians, he proceeded to state another consequence, respecting which an appeal might be made to all—"Yea, and we are found false witnesses of God; because we have testified of God, that he raised up Christ; whom he raised not up if the dead rise not."

It is evident that the apostles, and the great number of primitive Christians mentioned in the fore part of this chapter, who testified that they had in such a variety of instances seen, handled, and conversed with Christ after his resurrection, could not be deceived. If Christ was not risen, they were all false witnesses and deceivers—which considering all circumstances, and their self-denial and sufferings in the cause, is incredible to suppose, and absolutely impossible. And it is conceived that the words under consideration, were added to show the unreasonableness and absurdity of such a supposition. "If in this life only, we have hope in Christ, we are of all men most miserable." The import of which is this—'If we are false witnesses, and know that Christ is not risen, and have no hope or expectation of any thing from him, or our professing his name, except some temporal good to be obtained in this life, we are voluntarily making ourselves the most miserable of men—and acting the part of the highest folly and madness. For upon this supposition we have nothing within to support us; and there is nothing to be expected from a future state. We have not even the support of a delusive hope, whatever we may suppose that to be; for by the supposition, we know the whole to be an imposture.—And yet we are, for Christ, plunging ourselves into the greatest evils and afflictions, and even jeoparding our lives—and many have already laid down their lives in support of their testimony.' This then, in brief, is the scope of the apostle's reasoning—If the dead rise not, then Christ is not risen—and if Christ is not risen, then your faith is vain—we are false witnesses and deceivers—and knowing this, we have nothing to support us—no hope of any reward for our adherence to Christ, except what we get in this life, and that is only contempt, persecution, poverty, wretchedness and death. The conclusion which the apostle supposed would be drawn by every rational mind, is, that as these consequences are false and absurd, and absolutely incredible, therefore the principle which leads to them is false and pernicious. If the preaching of the gospel is not vain, but has been attended with a divine power and efficacy, and has bro't thousands to love and embrace truth against which every feeling and bias of the natural heart is at enmity—If the faith of Christians is not a vain thing, but flows from a divine principle by which they are enabled to overcome the world, and to glory in tribulation—And especially, if the apostles and primitive Christians who testified to the fact of Christ's resurrection, were not false witnesses and deceivers—to suppose which, would be to suppose that they voluntarily plunged into wretchedness, and designed to make themselves “of all men most miserable” both here, and hereafter—then it will follow, that Christ is arisen, and is divine—That the scriptures also are divine, and every doctrine they contain, the truth—One of which, of very great importance, is, the resurrection of the dead; that they who sleep in Christ have not perished, but shall be raised, “every man in his own order: Christ the first fruits, afterward they that are Christ's, at his coming.”

PHILOS.

TO THE EDITORS OF THE CONNECTICUT EVANGELICAL MAGAZINE.

ONE of your correspondents has desired an explanation of 1 Cor. xv. 29. Else what shall they do who are baptized for the dead, if the dead rise not at all? Why are they then baptized for the dead. If you think the following opinion, amongst the great variety which have been advanced upon this obscure passage of scripture, is worthy of consideration, you are at liberty to publish it.

THE expression baptized for the dead may fairly be read baptized for the sake, or on account of the dead. Christian baptism is baptism into the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, this is baptism for his sake, or on his account. The apostle is here vindicating the doctrine of the resurrection against the cavils of professed Christians, who were so far perverted as to deny that doctrine. His argument appears to be this. All Christians are baptized into the name of the Lord Jesus, and you all profess to believe, that the rite of baptism, into his name, is divinely instituted, and essential in the scheme of Christian doctrine. How then say some amongst you that there is no resurrection of the dead? For, if there be no resurrection of the dead, then is Christ not risen, and if Christ be not risen, then is our preaching vain, your faith is also vain, your baptism, into the name of Christ, by which you received the name and character of Christians, is vain; for in stead of your being baptized into the name of a divine person, the Lord of life, you are baptized into the name of a dead man, who, so far from being able to help and save you, must, on your principles, forever remain himself under the dominion of death. Such opinions then are utterly inconsistent with the Christian profession and hope. This reasoning, it is conceived, must, with such as had not renounced their Christian profession, be wholly conclusive.

But to this it may be objected, that the apostle's language most naturally applies to certain individuals only; what shall they do, &c. and not to Christians generally, as this construction supposes; but I appeal to the reader, whether it offers any violence to the words to apply them to all baptized Christians. What shall they, or all such do, who are baptized for the dead? The application is not necessarily limited by force of the term itself; its extent then must be determined by the scope of the apostle's reasoning. Again

It may be objected, that the Greek word translated dead is plural; and so it cannot refer to an individual, or to Jesus Christ alone.

But there seems not to be much weight in this objection. The words, though in the interrogatory form, contain this general proposition. They who are baptized for the dead, are baptized in vain, or to no purpose. This, in the form of a general proposition, is true of all the dead, but it is true also of any of the dead in particular. No mode of reasoning is more common or more legitimate than that from generals to particulars. A Marcionite, who had been baptized in the name of a dead relation, might be very pertinently told, in the form of a general proposition, that a person could derive no advantage from being baptized for the dead, if the dead rise not; and if he saw the truth of the general proposition, nothing more could be necessary to be said, to convince him of his error in the existing particular case. And I see no reason why the same general proposition might not, with equal pertinence, be urged to convince any baptized Christian, who should deny the doctrine of the resurrection, of the inutility, on his principles, of his baptism in the name of the Lord Jesus.

OMICRON.

An account of a work of divine grace, in a revival of religion, in the town of WINTHROP, District of MAINE, in the years 1799 and 1800, communicated to the Editors by the Rev. JONATHAN BELDEN of that town.

GENTLEMEN,

WE read your excellent, instructive, Evangelical Magazine. The accounts in it of serious enquiry, and religious reformation, in various parts of our land are interesting. Revivals of piety are indicative of the distinguishing mercy and goodness of God, towards an apostate world. When sinners return to God, and become the heirs of his grace, angels rejoice, and all heaven is glad. "There is joy in heaven, over one sinner that repenteth." Wherever there is a revival of religion, the peace and blessedness of some immortal souls are secured for eternity. It is hoped the following brief account of a work of God's holy Spirit, in a revival of religion in this place, will be pleasing to the Editors, and conduce to gladden the hearts of your pious readers.

IN the month of October 1799, I came a licensed candidate, for the work of the ministry, into this town, the situation of which was truly deplorable in regard to religion, as is the case, with reference to many towns in this vicinity at present. Here was no steady sabbath-worship. Here was a divided people, neglect of religion, prophaned sabbaths, corrupt sentiments, forgetfulness of God, and a general unconcern about the salvation of the soul. The inhabitants in general were secure in sin. Infidelity prevailed; and few were heard to enquire, "What must I do to be saved?" Innovators in religion, met with reception; the doctrines of grace, were discountenanced; the general aspect of things was gloomy; a dark cloud was suspended over the town; impieties abounded; God's goodness was unheeded; and his mercy unasked.

The first sabbath in Nov. 1799, was a day distinguished, for a general solemnity, in our congregation. The people seemed attentive to hear the gospel dispensed. A general awe was visible on their minds. Sacred, awful truths seemed by some to be felt. One woman became convinced of her sin and misery. She found no more peace of mind, until, being made sensible of her ruined state, and her perfect dependance on the sovereign, electing grace of God, she hopefully received the Saviour. At this time serious enquiry began to be made; and heavenly and divine realities began to be attended to. Here and there one enquired, "Is there any thing in religion, besides the external forms? Is not vital experimental godliness, something more than mere pretence?" A spirit of grace and of supplication was poured out upon the pious few. The beginning of a reformation was evident. The sabbath became an interesting and important day. Before this, it had been devoted to visits, relaxation and mirth. Pains were now taken to appear in the Sanctuary. Instructions were usually heeded. Eternal concerns occupied individual attention. Infidelity looked on, and wondered. Eternal misery was feared, and the throne of mercy addressed. But God manifested by his spirit, that some sinners were to be snatched from deserved wrath, and made the trophies of sovereign, victorious grace. As a consequence of the outpouring of the divine spirit, a goodly number of every age, sex, and character have found consolation in the things of religion, and are anticipating, we trust on a right foundation, celestial blessedness beyond the grave. May the number be increased; reformation still be carried on; prayerless families and prayerless persons, see their danger; and become converted unto God!

Some observations relative to the feelings and exercises, of those who have come to an understanding of their deplorable condition, it may be proper to notice. While under conviction, they have been brought to realize the total depravity of the heart; and their pain of mind has been exquisite. They would often ask, "What must I do to be saved? Where shall I look for help? How escape the misery I deserve?" The idea of being exposed to misery greatly affected them. They could not lie down to rest, without a fearful apprehension of awaking in misery. The thoughts of eternity filled them with pain. Their language would often be, where have I been? What have I been doing? How have I misimproved holy time, God's word, and providences? They complained of a heart opposed to God, to his law, his government, his Son and all good people. They felt opposed to the doctrines of grace. They could not endure the thought of being wholly dependant on sovereign mercy, for salvation. They esteemed God's law severe, his ways unjust and unequal. It is hardly possible to express their aversion to divine sovereignty, and free grace. The very idea provok-ked them. At the same time, they were sensible that no arguments could induce them to receive the gospel of life. Lay before them the willingness of God to shew them mercy, the sufficiency of Christ's righteousness, his calls, invitations and remonstrances, the arguments drawn from the unreasonableness of sin, the pleasures of piety, the shortness of human life, the certainty of death, the solemnity of the grave, the rewards of righteousness, the everlasting misery of the ungodly, and still they would remain opposed, and despise the way of life. Notwithstanding this, they were sensible, that unless God, interposed for their deliverance, their final misery was certain. While laboring under the terrors of the law often would they say, my hard heart will land me in hell. O my soul how miserable! All heaven is against me! In conversation, sometimes they would say, I am about determined no more to attend public worship, it will only aggravate my condemnation. Their obstinacy and opposition were more conspicuous, when God appeared for others, and converted their hearts to the truth. In such cases, they would raise a thousand objections. Like sinners of old, their language would be, "The way of the Lord is not equal." Still they felt and acknowledged that they had forfeited the mercy and favour of God, and that their hearts were stubbornly opposed to the way of salvation by Jesus Christ.

What is worthy of remark, every rising of heart against God, Christ and salvation, was followed with the most painful remonstrances of conscience for having opposed the ways of God; whd, their reason and understanding taught them, was worthy of supreme regard and praise. The persons who hope that their sins are pardoned, are very dissident; but at times think they can rejoice in the following truths: That there is one eternal, self-existent, almighty, and glorious first cause of all things. They are pleased that he acts as Supreme. They see this good and holy being manifested in every object around them. O how willing were they to speak forth his praise, as holy, just, and good; as blessed forever more. It gave them joy that all things were in his hands. His government was the government of their choice. They rejoiced that he could glorify himself; and they wondered why they had not been praising God for his excellent greatness and glory, and his universal government. They seemed to say in their hearts, "The Lord reigneth let the earth rejoice, let the multitude of isles be glad thereof." That God should reign in the most sovereign manner; they esteemed reasonable, & that all things should be at his divine and gracious disposal: in this connexion; they saw his law to be holy, just and good, perfectly right and glorious; in requiring the supreme affection of the human soul. Christ appeared glorious in having died to magnify the law and make it honorable, and in supporting God's divine government, salvation in a sovereign way how precious! In this way God gets all the glory while man is made happy.

One effect of this revival has been an attention to the important duty of family religion. In many families where God was wholly disregarded, the morning and evening sacrifice is now regularly paid. The time also of many, which was formerly spent in the ways of sin, and in the vanities of life, is now spent in pleading the divine promises in behalf of the church; and in supplicating the outpouring of the Spirit to awaken, convince, and renew the hearts of sinners. And many find by their own experience that to serve God is delightful and a prayerful life pleasant.

I am, Gentlemen,
with much respect,
yours, &c.

JONATHAN BREDDEN.

Sketches of the character, life and death of the Rev. SAMUEL BUELL, D. D. late pastor of the Church, at East-Hampton, on LONG-ISLAND.

[Continued from page 151.]

GREAT and distinguished as were the fidelity, diligence and zeal of Doctor Buell, his success was still more extraordinary. To display his adorable sovereignty, and exclude all glorying in men or means, it pleased God to suspend, in a great measure, the special influences of his Spirit from his people, for a number of the first years of his ministry. His labors, which elsewhere had proved so signally efficacious for the conviction of sinners and their conversion, seemed here to be without effect. But he was afterwards more signally owned as a minister of spiritual good, to his own people, than he had ever been to others.

Under his ministry, there were three particular seasons of the great and remarkable effusion of the Spirit of God. The first, which was the most signal, took place in the year 1764. This revival of religion, accompanied with great power, extended thro all parts of the congregation. The whole town was deeply impressed; and the attention of all was, in a most solemn manner, arrested to the affairs of their salvation. The word preached abundantly by the Doctor himself, and many other ministers, from various parts of the country, was attended with the most surprising effects—and multitudes were hopefully converted. There were added to the Church, at one time, no less than ninety nine persons, all credibly professing saving grace; besides many, who afterwards and before joined themselves to the Lord. And such were the blessed fruits of this revival that the multitude of them that believed were of one heart and as it were, had all things common. The two other seasons were less extraordinary, but still remarkable. The convictions of multitudes were strong and powerful; and many hopeful subjects of salvation were added to the church. These times of refreshing from the presence of the Lord took place, the one in 1785, and the other in 1791, and in both there was great spiritual joy, thro the town. Before and between these remarkable periods, his ministry was not without effect; but, from time to time, sinners were bro't home to God and saints were greatly refreshed, strengthened and animated in the divine life. So that to a very large proportion of his congregation, he was a spiritual father.

After what has been said, it will be presumed that Doctor Buell was happy in his people. This was indeed the case. He possessed their confidence in a high degree. They were at peace among themselves, and he was among them without fear.

In the revolutionary war, when the Island fell into the hands of the enemy, (1776) and many were flying from it, he tho't it his duty to continue with his people; and his prudent and vigorous exertions were highly beneficial, not only to them, but the neighboring towns

He faithfully improved his utmost influence in favor of the oppressed, and often with success. By his instrumentality many impossible demands of the enemy were recalled, and many rigorous ones abated. Such was his activity, in these respects, as often subjected him to the resentment of the inferior officers and soldiers; and more than once intrinsically endangered his life. In no period was he, perhaps, more useful, than the present. In temporal as well as spiritual things, he was the father of his people, and the care of all the churches lay upon him, as there was but one minister, within forty miles of him, able to do service, and he, thro the infirmities of age, was confined to his own congregation.

Doctor Buell's attention to the cause of Zion was not confined to his own people. He had a tender concern for the interests of the church, at large. He deeply felt the importance of maintaining union among the churches. He was a Presbyterian, and punctual in attending presbyterial meetings, even in his advanced age; and in this, as well as other respects, was highly useful. The mildness of his temper, the strength of his judgment, and his high reputation for uprightness and piety, rendered him of eminent use in accommodating differences in the churches.

He was known and respected abroad. His publications were fourteen sermons, preached upon particular important subjects and occasions, and a narrative of the work of God, among his own people, in 1764. They are an expression of a strong mind, and ardent piety; and have been read, with pleasure and advantage, by the lovers of experimental religion. As a mark of the public esteem he received, in the year 1791, the degree of Doctor of Divinity, from Dartmouth College.

As to Doctor Buell's more private character, he possessed a very happy natural disposition. His genius was uncommonly sprightly, and he was eminently formed for activity in his day and generation. This appears thro his whole life, and constitutes a prominent feature, in his character. "Whatever his hand found to do he did it with his might." These qualities were highly improved, and happily directed by the laws of Christianity. Of Christian graces and duties he was a pattern to the flock over which the Holy Ghost had made him overseer. His heart being enlarged by divine grace, he was distinguished for public spirit. His ears were open to the cries of the poor, and the demands of the public good, in church and state. Of this, as well as his love to science, Clinton Academy, in East-Hampton, is a monument. Of that institution he was the father and patron. He was no less distinguished for Christian moderation, and self-government. His appetites and passions were happily subjected to the laws of reason, and the gospel of Christ. Of his having excelled in this respect, were there no other evidence, the candor, serene cheerfulness and equanimity, which he eminently retained to the last of his days, would be a decided proof. He was much of the Gentleman as well as Christian—possessed a large fund of improving and entertaining anecdotes, and his company was instructive and pleasing to persons of every age. In his various relations, as husband, parent, master, friend and neighbour, he was peculiarly affectionate and happy. His house was a mansion of hospitality, and no man received and enjoyed his friends with greater cheerfulness and pleasure.

But in no respect was Doctor Buell more distinguished, than for a spirit of devotion. He always entertained a high opinion of the power and efficacy of prayer. As he was abundant in exciting others to abound in this rational, profitable and delightful exercise, so he abounded in it himself. He entertained a deep habitual sense of his dependence upon God for every blessing; and was disposed to acknowledge and trust in him, under all the changing circumstances of life. Thus, in the manuscript sermon, preached upon the death of his first wife, after enumerating the changes in his family, he adds "I hope your candor will not deem it ostentation for me to say, that my comforts were received with prayer, praise, and the joy of trembling, and have been parted with (however nature might oppose) with prayer, submission, and, at last, praise." A praying frame he always considered as a very necessary part of preparation for the sanctuary, without which, the exercises of the pulpit, which were commonly his delight and life, were burdensome.

Soon after his settlement at East-Hampton he married Miss Jerusha Meacham daughter of the Rev. Joseph Meacham, of Coventry; with whom he lived about twelve years. After her death he contracted a second marriage with Miss Mary Mulford, daughter of Mr. Elisha Mulford of East-Hampton; with whom he lived twenty-two years. And after her death, he still contracted a third marriage with Miss Mary Miller, daughter of Mr. Jeremiah Miller of East-Hampton, who survives him.

Doctor Buell was, perhaps, as much distinguished for the manner in which he suffered, as for the manner in which he did the will of God. As the joys, so the sorrows, of his life, were great and peculiar.—He was the subject of many sore bereavements. In addition to the loss of two wives, in both of whom he was very happy, he was called to bury eight children, which, in connexion with four servants, made the deaths in his family no less than fourteen. Under these bereavements, some of which were in the highest degree affecting, he displayed the most exemplary Christian fortitude. By faith he eyed the hand of God and was submissive. His personal sorrows did not interrupt the duties of his public ministry. It appears to have been his practice to preach upon the occasion of the deaths, which took place in his family, laboring to improve them for the benefit of his people. Two of his sermons, on these occasions, he published, in which may be seen the sweet composure of mind and resignation of spirit, which were common with him, in such seasons.*

He was favored with uncom-

* The one upon the death of his daughter, Mrs. Conkling, a woman of distinguished accomplishments, and eminent piety, who died Feb. 1782. Some account of her character, life and death is annexed to the sermon. The other upon the death of an only son named Samuel, who died of the small pox Feb. 1787, aged 16 years. He was a youth of excellent parts, and true piety—had made considerable advances in his classical education, and the Doctor justly indulged raised hopes of him not only as to the support of his name and family, but as his successor in the ministry. Memoirs of his life and death are to be seen at the end of the sermon.

mon health of body, and soundness of mind, to the last of his day. To this the strict rules of temperance, which he always observed, without doubt, very much contributed. The day he was eighty years old, he rode fourteen miles, preached, and returned home at evening. It was his prayer that he might not outlive his usefulness; and it was signally answered. He preached the sabbath but one before his death. His last illness was short, and tho' severe, left him in the full possession of his reason. This was manifested in the justness and propriety, of the exhortations and advices, which he administered to those who were about him. In his last hours he was favored with the sensible supports and consolations of that gospel which he had so long and with such glorious success preached to others. The more particular state of his mind, in this solemn extremity, may be seen in the following extract of the sermon preached upon the occasion of his death. "He said that his mind was in perfect peace, and seemed never to have enjoyed a more triumphant faith. He appeared to have impressions upon his mind concerning the glory of the Church as hastening on, which he wished to communicate, but could not for want of strength. He desired also to speak much to those about him, upon the subject of having an interest in Christ, the importance of which, as it then appeared to him, he said, was unutterable. He had no desires to recover, but to depart, and be with Christ. He viewed himself, he said, as now passing Jordan's flood, and within a step, as it were, of the promised land; and the tho't of returning again into the wilderness, was painful to him. When asked, at one time, concerning the state of his mind, he requested his friends, in order to obtain it, to read the 17th chapter of John, repeating several times the 24th ver. "Father I will that they also whom thou hast given me be with me where I am; that they may behold my glory, which thou hast given me." Toward the last, he repeatedly observed that he felt all earthly connexions to be dissolved; and his soul appeared to be drawn with such strength and pleasure, to the glorious world of light, that he could not bear to be interrupted by the assiduities of his friends, who were seeking to administer to his perishing dust—frequently putting them aside with one hand, whilst the other was raised to heaven, where his eyes and his soul were fixed. And in this happy frame he continued, till the progress of his disorder wholly deprived him of the power of speech." On Thursday, July 19, 1798, he obtained his release from the cares and sorrows of mortality, and entered, as we have the fullest reason to believe, into the joys of his Lord.

His funeral was attended, the next day, by the neighboring ministers, his own congregation, and a numerous concourse of people from the adjacent towns, with the most solemn decency and respect.

Thus lived, and thus died, this eminent servant of Christ. May the wide breach made upon Zion, in his removal, be mercifully repaired, others be raised up in his excellent Spirit; and the church to the latest generation be blest with a succession of ministers, thus faithful and diligent, powerful and successful.

Letter from a respectable Physician in Connecticut, to his sister in a distant State.

IT has often been the case, that after I have had an interview with my friends, I have exceedingly regretted that the great things of religion have made little or no part of our conversation. And although I have often resolved that I would better improve future opportunities, yet have too generally found that a multiplicity of other concerns, together with a criminal backwardness to introduce those glorious subjects, have made subsequent visits as unprofitable as the former.

As it is very uncertain whether we shall ever again meet in this world, and even if we should, it is to be feared that things of little importance might as heretofore too much supersede religious conversation; I now embrace a favorable opportunity to write to you, hoping it may be a means of stirring up both our minds to more diligence, watchfulness and prayer, especially at this time; in these days of the deception of the unclean Spirits, which have evidently gone forth into the whole earth, to gather the nations to the battle of that great day of God Almighty.

I believe that all understanding Christians are agreed, that the present is the time of which God has so abundantly warned his church in his word; the time in which he has told us there should be scoffers, murmurers and complainers walking after their own lusts; those perilous times, or perhaps the beginning of them, when there shall be proud blasphemers, despisers of those that are good; when men will not endure sound doctrines, but will privily bring in damnable heresies; and although they may have a form of Godliness, will deny the power; and when artful and powerful deceivers shall arise, so that if it were possible, they would deceive the very Elect.

And how important is it, that all who profess friendship to Christ should be on their guard; that they should watch and keep their garments, lest they also be found naked; that they should not believe every Spirit, but try the Spirits whether they be of God; that they should beware of dogs, of wolves in sheeps clothing; that they should mark the men that make divisions, and avoid both their corrupt sentiments and practices. And especially how infinitely important does this appear, when we reflect that there is no neutral station; but all who are not found among the followers of the Lamb, clothed in fine linen, white and clean; all who are not called, and chosen, and faithful, will be found among those that make war with him.

Happy indeed would it be if none but professed enemies to the Christian religion were to be found in arms against heaven. Instead of this, it appears that some of the most hurtful adversaries to Christ and his church, are to be found among those that make high professions of friendship.

There is one position that I conceive will not be controverted; and that is, a man cannot be a friend to God, and at the same time disapprove of his law or government; we cannot be friendly to Christ while we oppose the doctrines and precepts of the gospel. But that these doctrines are opposed, and God's universal government disputed and objected to, by multitudes, and even by many profellors, is beyond contradiction. How many objections are there to the sovereignty of God; that he will have mercy on whom he will, and whom he will he hardeneth. How much fault with the doctrine of the decrees, or particular election; that God should from eternity designate the objects of his mercy, give a certain number to Christ, and determine to leave the rest to perish, and that he should not be influenced in this choice by any thing foreseen in the character of the Elect; but wholly from motives within himself; even so, for so it seemed good in his sight. How much is said against the doctrine of total depravity; that mankind without the new birth, are totally destitute of holiness; that they are only evil; and determined enemies to God. And how much pains is there taken to explain away the new birth, and make it mean nothing more than a little external reformation; something effected by the sinner, without any supernatural change of heart.

How much opposition to the doctrine that God is not pleased with any thing short of true love.—That nothing which the unregenerate do, or can do, has any influence in moving God to show them mercy; but that God looks upon all their duties (as they call them) abominable hypocrisy, and deserving everlasting wrath.—And how much is said against the doctrine, that it is the immediate and indispensable duty of every sinner to love God with his whole soul—that he can have no excuse for neglecting gospel repentance and faith a single moment—and that while he neglects this, let him do ever so much else, he is going away from God, rejecting the offers of life, and becoming more and more deserving of eternal destruction.

How much evil is there against the doctrine of absolute and entire dependence—that we have no claim on mercy, and that it is impossible for us to lay God under the least obligation to help us; but that we lie entirely at his sovereign mercy, and that he will save or destroy us as shall be most for his glory.

Now every one that has read the bible with attention must know that it is full of these doctrines; and that they are there much insisted on as essential to be not only believed but loved, and yet it is as well known that they are much spoken against.

It is difficult to find out what mankind would have. God at first put the human race under a law that is certainly unobjectionable; that requires nothing of us but what is most reasonable that we should perform—it requires that we love him with our whole strength, and yield perfect obedience to him—and is he not worthy of our love?—Is he not deserving of our obedience?—This law we have violated, and consequently fallen under the curse; and we cannot reasonably object to its execution—and the law can not be given up short of God's denying himself. And what can be done? what has been done? or rather what has not been done? God has so loved the world, as to give his only begotten Son to die, that whosoever believeth on him might not perish, but have eternal life. The gospel is proclaimed; and all invited to partake of its salvation. But what now?—how is the gospel provision treated by us?—what reception has Christ, and all his glorious offers met with from the world?—Why, they all make light of it—they with one consent make excuse—and unless some thing more is done, there is not one of the human race but what will suffer eternal damnation, rather than embrace the salvation of the gospel—now what can be done? what in heaven or earth, can help such miserable, obstinate wretches? Surely nothing but sovereign mercy.—Nothing but free grace.—Nothing short of everlasting electing love.

God has actually brought this into view; and what has been the consequence?—the consequence is, it has set the world in a rage. Every thing is said against it; and against those that preach it; and God is accused of partiality and injustice, and while Jesus Christ in view of the subject, breaks out into a holy rapture, and thanks his heavenly father on this account; and angels rejoice;—this world is filled with complaints. O the amazing ingratitude, stupidity and wickedness of the selfish heart.

It would be impossible to enumerate all the objections which are made to the doctrines which have been mentioned. It is often said, they destroy free agency; but we all feel that we act freely notwithstanding; without any force against our wills, and God certainly considers it in this light, and will treat us accordingly. It is said also, if these doctrines are believed, it will prevent all exertions to escape future wrath, and obtain heaven. And why is not the same objection urged against striving for the good things of this life?—they apply equally in this case. But who ever heard any object against sowing and planting, or employing a Physician in a dangerous sickness, on the ground, that it depended entirely on the immutable counsels of God whether he should have a crop or recover from his disease. The fact is, temporal food, and bodily health, are considered of too much importance to be neglected on such a frivolous excuse; and we always find that where there are any just apprehensions of the importance of fleeing from the wrath to come, we hear no more of this objection.

Some say, that they are at best, unprofitable doctrines; and therefore though true, ought not to be preached.—Now this is certainly charging God foolishly. God has revealed such things to us as he thought best; and is it not very extraordinary that we should undertake to say he has made a mistake; and taught us things in which we had no concern. But these, and many more, are objections that were never made by the humble penitent, and never will be; the repenting publican and the prodigal never thought of them. But they were invented entirely, through the pride and obstinacy of the carnal heart; and are persisted in from a total blindness to our real situation.

The fact is, we are sick, even to death; while we think that little or nothing ails us; as poor as the curse of God's law can make us; and yet feel important, and rich, and well able to take care of ourselves. Dead in trespasses and sins; and yet greatly disturbed with even the mention of sovereign mercy.

And it is clearly the case, that opposition to these great and glorious gospel doctrines, and indeed to the gospel itself, is the parting point, where most of the errors and numerous separations of the present day begin.

Hence we see such violent opposition to a regular support of gospel ministers, and multitudes obtruding themselves into the ministry, that have never been consecrated to that work according to the word of God.

Hence we hear so much against the doctrine of the saints perseverance. The ordinance of baptism is disregarded by many; the holy sabbath given up; family prayer discarded, and the worship of the sanctuary neglected. And hence Arminianism, Universalism, Infidelity and Atheism, together with all the unscriptural errors and practices of this ungodly world.

But I must conclude, earnestly praying, that God of his sovereign mercy, would guide us into all truth; make us faithful to do his will; give us all that grace and strength which we need; grant that we may manifest our love to him by keeping his commandments, and that he would glorify his grace in our salvation; that he would dispel the thickening cloud of error and confusion of the present day, and fill the earth with his glory through Jesus Christ.

Begging your prayers for me, I subscribe myself yours, &c.

MESSRS. EDITORS,

THE following remarks and facts, illustrative, of, the danger of adopting false principles of religion, you will please to insert in your useful Magazine, if you judge it will be beneficial to your readers.

THE tendency of any doctrine goes far toward proving whether it be according to the gospel or not. God is a God of holiness and cannot encourage wickedness—the Bible is a holy book—and the salvation which it proposes is a holy salvation. All its doctrines tend to lay restraint on the passions of men. The doctrine of universal salvation tends to take off those restraints and to open the floodgates of iniquity. It therefore proves itself not of God.

There is a young man of my acquaintance who was once amiable and promising, regular in his life and conversation, and steady in attending on public worship. A few years ago he embraced the doctrine of universal salvation—since which he appears to be totally changed. He is no longer the amiable and steady young man that he formerly was. He has become ferocious in his manners—profane—contentious—so that his family and neighbours often feel the effects of his contentious spirit. He has thrown off all appearance of respect to religion, and lives in the total neglect of public religious worship. I have often endeavoured to convince him of his errors from scripture arguments, but in vain. In a late conversation, I argued with him on the tendency of the doctrines he had embraced. I referred him to his former course of life and to his present conduct, and asked whether he did not think his sentiments tended to make him relax the duties of religion, and pursue vicious courses, and whether he did not feel more easy to neglect duty and commit sin now, seeing he hoped in this way to go to Heaven at last, than he formerly did? He ingenuously confessed to me that he did—that he used to have, some trouble of conscience about these things, but now he had got in a great measure relieved. I then asked him, whether that could be a doctrine of Jesus which in its effects was so pernicious and tended to the destruction of moral virtue? He was greatly confounded—but still it was a doctrine so consonant to his feelings and wishes that he could not give it up and consent to receive a holy salvation. He is in the hands of a sovereign God, who is able to bring him off from this dangerous and pernicious error—and in his hands we must leave him.

As principles like these will not do to live by, so they will not do to die by. However they may flatter the secure sinner, and ease a guilty conscience in health and prosperity, they will be a poor support in a dying hour when the sinner feels himself just about to appear in the presence of a holy God.

I have been acquainted with another person, who died a few years since, who in health disbelieved the divinity of Christ and believed that all men will be saved. He was a person who was very fond of disputing. I saw him when in health and had frequent disputes with him on these subjects. I told him that tho he might be satisfied with his scheme in health, it would fail him in the near view of death. He had a few months before been very sick. I reminded him of his sickness, and asked him whether he was then satisfied with his principles and was willing to die by them. He said he was not but was much distressed in his mind, lest they should not prove true. I asked him whether it was safe trusting to a scheme, which would not support him in the time when he most needed support? He acknowledged it was not, but added he was not so well confirmed in his sentiments then as he had since been, but now he was willing to die by them. I told him it was altogether probable he would change his mind when he came to look death in the face—and that as he had made one trial and found no comfort in the principles he had embraced, he would act a wise part to renounce them, and endeavor to fix his hopes on a more firm basis. He still persisted in his error. Soon after this he was visited with sickness during which time I frequently saw him. His confidence was shaken. He said that tho he had felt confirmed in the doctrine of universal salvation, yet now he began to fear he was in an error. As his disease encreased his fears were more alarmed. He now did not find that evidence in support of his doctrine which he thought he did before—conscience was alarmed—the character of a holy God came into view—his confidence was gone and with it his hope of divine mercy. He frequently asked with apparent earnest solicitude “what can I do? I must relinquish the hope of all mankind being saved, and as I have never become holy, but depended on being saved in my sins, I can have no hope of the mercy of God. As for Jesus Christ I know him not and cannot believe his divinity—and therefore cannot embrace him as God-man mediator. I can hope only in God’s mercy without regard to an atonement.” He was told that God displayed his mercy in saving sinners, only through Jesus Christ as the great atoning sacrifice, and that out of Christ he was a consuming fire. He then said he could have no hope. “But O, said he, whither shall I fly, or what can I do?” He was indeed a most pitiable object—His eyes seemed to roll in anguish, terror took hold upon him, the view of a holy God filled him with distress, he kept calling on all about him for help, his strength failed, but his fears became greater and greater without any sensible alteration until he expired.

I shall only add, it is a miserable scheme of doctrine which encourages a sinful life and will yield no rational comfort in the solemn hour of death.

The above descriptions are not fictitious, but realities. I choose to conceal their names and my own, out of tenderness to the surviving friends, but am willing the facts be published in hope they may serve as a beacon to warn others of the danger of such erroneous sentiments.

Oh, that sinners might tremble at the thought of embracing such pernicious principles. Let them admit nothing into their scheme of religion which will not encourage a holy life and yield peace in the hour of death. There is no necessity of flying to such vain refuges if they are willing to lay aside their sins and become holy. And the scriptures of truth assure us that without holiness no man shall see the Lord.

Letters concerning conference meetings.

LETTER I.

From PRæCO to the Editors.

Connecticut, Oct. 18, 1800.

TO THE EDITORS OF THE CONNECTICUT EVANGELICAL MAGAZINE.

Rev. Brethren,

UNDER proper regulations, I have always been in favor of what we commonly term, conference meetings. However some may stigmatize them as enthusiastic, being righteous over much, or as night meetings, as tho' it were lawful and commendable to keep unseasonable hours for the purposes of carnal mirth, but wrong to keep even seasonable hours for the worship of God; yet I have ever viewed them as perfectly agreeable to the tenor of scripture and the spirit of Christianity. In ancient times, we read that "those who feared the Lord spake often one to another," &c. Where two or three shall meet together, in the name of Christ, the glorious Immanuel hath promised his presence. Those who are united in the same blessed God and Saviour, who are influenced by the same spirit, who have one common enemy to oppose and the same grand interest to pursue, and who firmly expect all to dwell in the same holy and happy society forever; must necessarily take peculiar delight in religious, social intercourse. Such meetings, when conducted in that manner which becometh the worshippers of the God of order, are happily calculated to increase divine knowledge, to quicken and animate, to support and comfort, and in a word, to ripen for glory. With these views, when in different stages of my ministry, it hath pleased the father of mercies, in some small measure, to revive his work among us, I have thought it my duty to encourage them and to attend them myself, when circumstances would permit.

I have for more than a year past attended them weekly, and both experienced and seen, I humbly trust, their beneficial effects. Of late, fearing it would be too much for the state of my health, and apprehending the attention which might be termed special was declining, I intimated that the meetings would probably soon be discontinued.

The two following letters were since handed me. The first is from a young woman a constant attendant who hopefully became a subject of religion a few years since. The other is from a single woman in a different part of the parish, where there hath been some special attention of late, who appears to have the cause of Zion at heart.

If you find room in your Magazine and judge the publication of them may tend to encourage both ministers and people to persevere in improving every convenient opportunity of communicating and receiving religious knowledge, they are at your service.

Rejoicing in the prospect of the extensive utility of your evangelical repository, permit me to subscribe myself, Rev. Gentlemen,

Your affectionate brother,
PRÆCO.

LETTER II.

From SERENA to her Pastor.

Monday evening Oct. 13, 1800.

I Hope Sir, there are none of the youth who attend your sabbath evening lectures, that are entirely insensible of the privilege they enjoy, and of their obligations to you for the pains you take to instruct them in the best things—I trust there are at least a few who are not wholly deaf to your pious admonitions, and who feel, in some good degree, the force and propriety of them. But whatever return you may meet from us, sure I am that your care and pains shall not fail of an ample reward.—And should the seed, which you are now implanting in our minds, appear at present to produce no good fruit, yet perhaps hereafter it may spring and flourish, when your lips shall be sealed in death and your body mouldering in the tomb.

Never can I sufficiently render that tribute of gratitude I owe to the great author of all mercies, for the innumerable advantages I enjoy for obtaining religious instruction. Should I at last fall short of the One thing needful, should I not follow the example of the amiable, the pious Mary, who chose that good part, how aggravated !

O how unhappy ! I beg your prayers, dear Sir, that I may not only be a hearer, but a doer of the word ; that I may not be of that generation who are pure in their own eyes, yet are not cleansed. There is so much opposition in my heart, that I find it much easier to speak well of religion than to act at all times agreeable to its precepts. The power of the God of this world is at present very great. O that I may put my whole dependence upon him, who is the strength of all those who put their trust in him ! If I have allowed my pen too much liberty, be pleased, Sir, to pardon and believe me at all times,

Your sincere and affectionate friend, SERENA.

LETTER III.

From SPERINA to her Pastor.

Oct. 16. 1800.

Honored and worthy Pastor,

SINCE our glorious Immanuel condescended to visit the people in this vicinity, there has been a great, an amazing alteration, especially among those who have attended the meetings. I must charitably hope, that a considerable number have resigned themselves up into the hands of a merciful God, and may be stiled the friends of Jesus. And there are many more who seem in some degree to listen to the things which belong to their everlasting peace. The conversation is changed in almost every house. The tongue which was employed in vain trifling discourse is now talking about meetings and religion. The hands which were employed in trifling plays and vain pleasures, are now used in handling the book of life. The eyes that were looking round on every object to find pleasure, are fixed upon the holy scriptures; the ball-chamber is passed by, and the chequer-board, which consumed so much precious time, is laid aside, together with all vain amusements. Christians have been alive in religion, and we may say with Jacob, "The Lord is in this place." And I believe the blessed Jesus is now knocking at the door of the hearts of many poor sinners among us, and I cannot but hope they will be called to the sheep-fold of Christ. Altho' such visits of grace are generally short, yet Christ still continues to hear and it seems is carrying on a glorious work.

I hope Sir you will not be discouraged about keeping up the meetings, since Christ spent three years with little success. He perfectly knew every soul that would be converted, yet he calls upon sinners till his head is filled with dew and his locks with the drops of the night. Methinks he cast a wishful look towards this place, and what we have experienced of the power of divine grace, it may be hoped, are as it were only a few drops before a plentiful shower. But, Sir, you may be weary of reading these lines. It is with regret I write, but I am frequently desired to request you, Sir, to continue the meetings. The people appear to have a great desire for it. They fear they shall turn back to former stupidity and vanity, which God only is able to pervert.

SPERINA.

Observations on the Maxim—"RIDICULE IS THE TEST OF TRUTH."

AS we live in an age when the Almighty is pouring out the greatness of his indignation upon the Papal kingdom, in accomplishing its predicted downfall, we have reason to fear that the human mind, ever inclined to extremes, having once broke its anti-christian shackles, will now vibrate into the opposite extreme of scepticism indiscriminately rejecting the whole of Christianity. The strong abhorrence of the corruptions in false religion, while the strength of the indignation lasts, will tend to blind the mind and harden the heart, and serve as a pretext for rejecting the real gospel of Jesus Christ. The want of a proper distinction, between true Christianity and Anti-christianity, has probably been one principal ground of the satirical writings of Voltaire and other deistical writers. For when Voltaire examined the holy scriptures, and their excellent doctrines, he could not firmly resist their convincing influence upon his own conscience. The affrighting horrors of his last sickness, and his wretched death, are ominous of that state of misery, which awaits the ungodly beyond the grave.

But, it is to be feared, that many inconsiderate mortals, notwithstanding the miserable death of this great teacher of infidelity, will think it an honor to be ranked among his disciples. The utter rejection of the papal religion in many parts of Europe has had a strange effect upon the morals of many people in this country. Without distinguishing the true religion from its corruptions—Christianity from Anti-christianity, emboldened by the example of infidels who have been thus misled, they are ready to decry all religion—to despise the real gospel of Jesus Christ—to hate the real friends of piety—and to think it a mark of genius, to show their contempt of God—of the Lord Jesus Christ—of the Christian sabbath—of prayer—of virtue—of piety—of judgment and of all those future retributions, moral obligations and natural affections, which, when properly cherished, are productive of the sweetest enjoyments of life, and without which all the bands of order must inevitably be destroyed. But, shall man, a reasonable creature judge of truth in this hasty manner? Shall he plunge headlong into every kind of vice, brutality and wickedness, if he can find an example in history to keep him in countenance? What are greatness of talents without goodness of heart, but an empty sound—the fleeting bubble of a day? What considerate man would glory, to shine in the page of history, like the singular Voltaire, if like Voltaire he must miserably die, in unutterable horror, the wretched victim of his own mad philosophy. Shall man, born for eternity, blindly follow, wherever such a genius rambles, regardless of the way, and of the difficulties and dangers, to which he is every moment exposing himself? Yet, the very name of the inselless Voltaire as the atheistical leader of a sect of infidels, has led many foolish youth to glory in their shame, and, without examination, to reject the word of God. But, where is the boasted reason of the man, who follows the example of another man, without knowing why he follows him? True philosophy investigates; it seeks for truth, wherever it may be found; it builds only on that evidence, which the wreck of matter and the crash of worlds will never shake. Ridicule was never yet its grand basis. The man, who laid it down as an axiom, “Ridicule is the test of truth,” was either ignorant of truth, or ignorant of the human heart. In several years observation of the conduct of men, I never yet have seen the artillery of ridicule bro't into the field of literary contest, upon any weighty subject, in the way of argument, where the truth was not known to be fully established from other evidence, till the side of the employer became doubtful—till he began to fear his cause to be desperate—in short, till despairing of gaining his point by just reasoning, he fled to the use of this weapon, as his dernier resort, in hopes of effecting by a witty turn of expression what never could be defended by just reasoning. It is more truly an axiom, The use of ridicule, in the way of argument, in reasoning upon an important question, not already clearly established by other evidence, is the general test of a weak and defenceless side of the question. For ridicule is never used, by any sensible man, in serious argumentation, in search of truth, till all his treasures of evidence are exhausted. It is the only artillery, which can be used with advantage, in a desperate cause. The reason is obvious. For it has a peculiar charm to take the mind off from close thinking, and by unexpectedly pleasing it, to make it forget all farther search after the real truth. This is the grand reason, why ridicule has such a sudden influence upon mobs, and all the unstable and unthinking part of mankind. Unexpectedly pleased, they fall in love with the pleaser, and wholly forget the real truth, they are in search after. It is for this peculiar tendency, which ridicule possesses, of unhinging the mind from close thinking, and thus by unexpectedly pleasing, preparing it to stray into the flattering paths of error, that it is so much used in doubtful and desperate causes. It is for this reason, that all infidel books are filled with jelling and buffoonery, in reasoning upon the most solemn and interesting subject which ever engaged the attention of man. Infidels know, plain arguments—real truth will never gain them a single profelyte. They know they must first unhinge the mind, by the charm of ridicule, and thus darken the understanding, or the truth of the bible, shining like the sun in the meridian of heaven, will forever resist their wicked attempts to harden men in sin. The villany of infidelity therefore glaringly appears, in the very means which infidels employ to deprave the hearts of men. Ridicule—ridicule—forever ridicule, in conversation, in books, in all companies, contains all the strength of their boasted philosophy. Is ridicule then truly philosophical? Or is it of the nature of infallible demonstration? No: it is far from being so. It hath in all ages of the world, when improved in any other sense, than as an auxiliary to acknowledged virtue, in bringing vice to shame and contempt, been found the froward enemy of true philosophy. What torrents of ridicule were poured upon the philosophy of Columbus, in attempting the discovery of America, from the vulgar, from splendid courts, and, even, from the thrones of mighty kings! Had Columbus and all succeeding philosophers yielded to ridicule, as the test of truth, America to this day, must have remained a vast, howling wilderness, the lonely abode of wandering savages. Swayed by this false test of truth, the enlarged mind of Newton must have been cramped, and his system of philosophy, to this day, must have remained unknown to man. So far therefore is ridicule from being the true foundation of real philosophy, that, it is, the philosopher, who only is able to bear it—who knows it to be nothing but a glittering cheat—who rises above it, like the immovable rock in the ocean, regardless of the dashing of its tempestuous waves.—He knows the real evidence of demonstration is always to be looked for, from another source. The man therefore, who possessed of a comprehensive mind and extensive knowledge, appeals to ridicule as, the only test of truth, on the important subject of the existence of a God, or of the truth of a divine revelation, is wilfully blind to truth. He rises against all, that by the common sense of mankind, is called general, demonstrated truth. If his conscience be not seared as with an hot iron, at times, he cannot fail of being stung, with such painful moments of guilt and horror as that great wit, the Earl of Rochester once felt, for recurring to this delusive test of truth. The words are extracted from his memoirs, which contain his very humble confession, after an hopeful conversion to Christianity; and are as follows. “One day at an Atheistical meeting, at the house of a person of quality, I undertook to manage the cause, and was the principal disputant against God and piety; and for my performances, received the applause of the whole company. Upon which my mind was terribly struck, and I immediately replied thus to myself, Good God! That a man who walks upright, who sees the wonderful works of God, and has the use of his senses and reason, should use them to the denying of his Creator!”—After he became a serious man he often expressed, in the tenderest manner, to his friends, his abhorrence of the deceitful arts of ridicule—“Wishing his son might never be a wit, (as he explained it, one of those wretched creatures, who pride themselves in ridiculing God and religion, denying his being or his providence :) but that he might become an honest man, and of a truly religious character, which only could be the support and blessing of his family."

ZEPHO.

FOR THE CONNECTICUT EVANGELICAL MAGAZINE.

Thoughts on our Saviour's prayer in the garden. "O my Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me." The same petition is expressed a little differently; as, "That the hour might pass from him; and "That the Father would take away this cup."

IT is well known, that, in the figurative language of scripture, the term cup, often signifies the dispensations of providence, both in ways of affliction and mercy. The first is denoted by the cup of trembling; the other by the cup of salvation. Our divine Lord refers to grievous sufferings, which he then felt; or had in prospect. Many have supposed that the indignant and cruel treatment, which he was soon to meet with, from Judas and the rude company which would attend him; from the Jewish Sanhedrim, and the common people; from Pilate, and from the soldiers, who would execute his sentence, filled him with this overbearing distress; and caused his human nature almost to shrink back from his all-important undertaking. They consider his agony as arising from the dismal prospect before him, rather than from any present feeling. That if it were consistent with that plan of redemption, which was early concerted in the divine council, he might be saved from death, or from those aggravating circumstances, with which he foresaw it would be attended. Divines have generally supposed that our Saviour's agony was occasioned by some cause which he only could discern and feel; something which lay within and made his soul exceeding sorrowful. And yet, when they speak of his prayer, they consider it as alluding to sufferings, of which he had no present actual feeling; and that he prayed, (tho with submission to the Father's sovereign pleasure) that it might be removed from him, i. e. prevented; and he never have those afflictive feelings, which he expected those sufferings would occasion.

VOL. II. No. 5.

But are there not reasons to believe, that these are not the cup intended?

1. We are told that his agony began soon after he entered the garden. This seems to intimate that it was caused by some new impression; something, of which he could have no clear and full prospect, previous to this time; and therefore, when it actually came upon him, he was, almost, overcome with an amazing horror; such distressing consternation seized upon him, as had a wonderful effect upon his animal frame, forcing the blood, in copious measures, through the pores of his body. The expressions are remarkable, he began to be sore amazed and very heavy. The cup, which he prayed might be removed, was this distress, or that which occasioned this amazing agony; of this he had, indeed, some foretaste; which threw him into something of the same consternation, and forced from him a similar petition, as in John xii. 27. Now is my soul troubled; and what shall I say? Father, save me from this hour. He speaks like one almost at his wits end ; who knows not which way to turn, or what to say. But now the hour was come ; and an hour of thick darkness fell upon him ; which began his sore amazement ; and caused him to cry out in an agony of distress, my soul is exceeding sorrowful ; and as he apprehended, even unto death. He had as clear a view of that scene of sufferings which would begin upon the approach of Judas, before, as at that instant ; and often spake of those evil things, which he was to suffer from the hands of wicked men. And 'tis hardly probable that a little nearer view of them should, at once, awaken all his painful apprehensions, and have such a sudden and overbearing effect upon him.

Another thought is this. That the evil things, which our Saviour met with from his persecutors (tho' very grievous) did, perhaps, not greatly exceed what others have endured with calm fortitude. Some of his disciples have counted it all joy, when they fell into divers temptations ; i. e. the most grievous sufferings, for his name's sake. They had, it is true, the comforting presence of God, which was denied him, and drew from him a bitter complaint, when on the cross. But wicked men have endured from the hand of justice, very heavy punishment, without such amazement. The two thieves suffered with him the same kind of death ; tho' not with all the same aggravating circumstances ; nor does it appear, that they were so overborne with the prospect.

But in the next place, it is apprehended, that the cup, which occasioned our Saviour's agony, and which he prayed might pass or be removed from him, was a clear and heart-affecting sense of divine wrath for sin ; and a close conflict with the powers of darkness. Satan was now let loose upon him. This is your hour, says Christ, to the multitude, which came to apprehend him, and the power of darkness. He had, a little before, told his disciples, that the prince of this world cometh ; without doubt, to assault him with his fiery darts. And, who can tell, into what agonizing distress that old serpent, the devil, could throw him, when freed from divine restraint !

But the strokes which were laid upon him by the hand of divine justice, were still more overbearing. The Father now assumed the character of supreme judge, calling for the sword to smite the man, who was his fellow. It pleased the Lord (now) to bruise him, and to put him to grief ; and to lay upon him the iniquity of us all. He was (now) made sin for us ; was stricken, smitten of God, and afflicted. None knows the power of God's anger. But we are sure that he can impress the mind with such a sense of the evil nature and ill desert of sin, as to fill it with that amazement and sorrow, which will drink up all the spirits. When therefore, our Saviour had this cup of divine wrath put into his hands, of which he could have no clear preconception, he was fore-amazed and felt nature sinking under it. This bitter agony, which far surpassed any thing ever experienced ; or, that could be endured by a mere man, constrained him to cry earnestly to the Father, for some relief : That the cup might soon be removed, or some strength afforded, which would enable him to drink what still remained. This interpretation seems to be confirmed by that in Heb. v. 7. It bo, in the days of his flesh, when he had offered up prayers and supplications, with strong crying and tears, unto him that was able to save him from death; and was heard in that he feared. This refers to that agonizing prayer, which our Saviour put up in the garden, and repeated three times. God heard him, i. e. granted him his request, in that he feared. But if the thing he feared, and which he prayed might pass from him, was that cup of affliction, which would be put into his hand by wicked men, it does not appear that he was heard. For all those sufferings did come upon him, and in the same manner in which he expected them. The Evangelist, Luke, tells us in what manner he was heard—chap. xxii. ver. 43. There appeared an angel unto him from heaven, strengthening him. He feared, that if this cup of overwhelming sorrow was not removed, or if no special assistance was afforded him, his strength would fail; he must sink under the weight of divine wrath, which appeared to him intollerable. But tho the rod of God was not removed, nor his sense of divine wrath lessened; yet the strength which he thus received from heaven, afforded him very seasonable support, and relieved him from his painful and overbearing apprehensions of immediate distress.

It appears to me highly rational to believe, that the Father's forsaking the son of his love; (of which he complains, even as his greatest affliction when on the cross) his withholding all sensible divine support and consolation; and giving him a heart-affecting and overbearing sense of his just wrath for sin, so engaged his attention, that he hardly thought of the cruel treatment which he should soon receive from men. That this was the cup which occasioned his agony, and threw him into a profuse bleeding sweat, so that his garments appeared as if died red; and into such an amazing horror and consternation, that he scarcely know what to say. In this state and with reference to the distress, which he then felt, he prayed; and his agony still continuing and increasing, prayed more earnestly, for some relief. That, if it were possible, i. e. any how consistent with the design of his coming into the world, and so that hour, the cup of which he was then drinking might be removed; or, some special support afforded him. If this is a just view of our Saviour's agony and prayer, it will tend to show the ill-nature of infidel cants and reflections, as "That Christ discovered less fortitude, than many, who, in every age and country, have met with as dreadful trials, and with greater calmness; and that this ill agrees with the pretence, that his sufferings were of great necessity and efficacy for the salvation of sinners. That it intimates his willingness and even desire to give up the cause, in which he was engaged, even tho the consequence should be fatal to a world of sinners."

CHRISTIANUS.

A letter from a Christian friend to one who had great anxiety of mind for a time, but who soon became thoughtless.

DEAR SIR,

THE last time I saw you, your attention was taken up with the state of your soul. You thought the amusements, which are so pleasing to young and vain minds very unbecoming candidates for eternity. Sensual pleasures, worldly honors and wealth were of little value in your estimation. You was in search of religious instruction and peace of mind. How engaged was you to read and hear the word of God and religious discourse ! How punctually did you attend to the duty of secret prayer ! What guilt you thought you incurred in rejecting Christ by unbelief ! As opportunity presented, you enquired of God's people, what must I do to be saved ? You looked upon a good heart as the pearl of great price and the one thing needful. You would then have given all your possessions and every enjoyment of life to be reconciled to God and entitled to his favor through the promises of the gospel. Being without Christ and without God in the world, you viewed yourself in a dangerous and ruined condition.

Seeing the state of your mind and your solicitude concerning your salvation, I entertained a hope that your seriousness and enquiries would issue in your entire submission to the will of God, and that hereafter you would live in newness of life. For God most commonly impresses the minds of sinners with a sense of their danger and the importance of vital religion, before he gives them grace cordially to embrace the Savior. Observing your serious impressions I was led to hope that they would terminate in your saving conversion.

You must therefore suppose my disappointment and sorrow to be great, when I lately heard that your seriousness proved to be like the morning cloud and early dew. I understand that you are no longer concerned for yourself, and yet have obtained no hope and give no evidence that you are a subject of the new-birth. You mingle with the thoughtless and are thoughtless yourself. You are not so careful to attend upon religious duties, nor so eager to obtain religious instruction. You do not look upon sin so ill-deserving, nor feel your condition to be so dangerous. You now shun the company of serious people, which you lately sought ; and think religion to be of little importance.

Your friend, when giving me this account of you, could not refrain from weeping in fear of the consequences : And be assured, dear Sir, that my heart was deeply affected in hearing the relation, and I cannot but tremble for you, as I tenderly regard your happiness.

My hopes of your saving conversion to the truth are now dead or very faint. God's spirit does not always strive with men. When a person has been under great awakenings and deep conviction, and he becomes as stupid and thoughtless as ever, he has much reason to fear that God will let him alone, and suffer him to go down to destruction. I fear, Sir, that this will be your unhappy case. For you have resisted the Spirit and he has forsaken you : And from God's ordinary method of dealing with sinners, you cannot be very sanguine in your hopes of his return. You have but little very reason to expect it.

You having been so much alarmed at your state and felt the importance of a reconciliation to God, and again become thoughtless and secure ; permit me, as a friend, to enquire the reasons of your present security and indifference to religion. It cannot arise from rational hopes of salvation, for such hopes are always followed with the fruits of righteousness : And with watchfulness and diligent attention to our spiritual concerns. A short time since, you thought yourself a great sinner : Are you less sinful now than then ? You considered yourself as incurring awful guilt by the sin of unbelief : But is not unbelief as wrath-deserving now as then ? You had no peace of mind and was in the greatest fear and distress on account of the danger you was exposed to : But is not your state as dangerous now as then ? And have you not therefore as much reason to fear and tremble ? You looked upon your condition as dangerous and ruined because of your sinfulness and God's holiness : But are you not as sinful as ever, and is not God unchangeable in his holiness ? If so, you feel easy and safe when exposed to the endless wrath of heaven. Is religion less important now, than when you felt it to be all-important ? Does not the law of God and the gospel of Christ denounce the same evil against the wicked as they ever have done ? You have then the same reason to fear and be alarmed, as when under your greatest awakenings. Your danger is no less, because unseen and unrealized. I trust that you want no arguments to convince you that God is holy, or that you are sinful : And I presume that you allow the happiness of the righteous to consist in the enjoyment of God. How then, my friend, can you be happy ? For what is more opposite than the holiness of God's nature and the sinfulness of your own. Marvel not, that I say unto thee, thou must be born again.

The views you had of the state you was in, were in some measure according to truth ; but while you are at ease in a state of impenitence, your views and feelings are as far from the truth as possible. You are in the same danger of eternal misery as ever. And I wish you to realize it. Although you have dismissed the concerns of your soul and the things of religion, yet they are no less important than when you paid them attention. I fear that you have grieved the Spirit of God, so that he has departed from you, no more to return. You have great reason to be alarmed at your case. Arise, and call upon thy God that thou perish not.

Since you have such unequivocal evidence of my regard to your happiness, you cannot suppose that I would recommend or urge upon you any thing, but what I know and feel to be important. Without the spirit of Christ I consider you as lost forever. Therefore suffer me to exhort you, by all that is sacred in religion, by all that is dear to yourself, and by all that is solemn and interesting in eternity, to make your peace with heaven thro' the blood of reconciliation : And I pray God to have mercy upon your soul, and make your wife unto eternal life.

Your's affectionately,
SHAPHAN.

Religious Intelligence.

Extract of a letter from one of the Connecticut Missionaries in Vermont, dated August 14, 1801.

“ In a tour of eight weeks I have rode nearly 800 miles, and have aimed where I did not fail of giving notice, to preach daily, sometimes three times on the sabbath; and in most places attend a conference, and in places where there is an awakening to pay private visits. There is a special call for laborers in this part of the vineyard. The cloud evidently moves this way. It is to be acknowledged especially as to several places, that the Missionaries of this year have to enter into the labors of the Missionaries of last year. There has been since last year apparently a gradual work of grace, which has this season greatly revived and spread. The work has been, so far as I have been able to judge, remarkably free from wildness and enthusiasm. There are instances of persons who have been strongly opposed to the great doctrines of grace and salvation, who appear to be greatly changed, and strongly advocate the faith which once they endeavored to destroy. I had need however to guard, lest I lead your mind to view the work greater than it is. The number in any one town under deep conviction is not great, but there is in several towns a solemnity somewhat general. The number of hopeful converts does not I believe, in many if any towns exceed 30. It is difficult to get accurately the number. The towns where there has been most attention in this field of missionary labors, are Poultney, Essex, Georgia, Swanton, Waterbury, Westfield, New-Haven and Middlebury. There are some hopeful beginnings of a work of grace in several other towns, indeed there seems some hopeful appearance that the work spreads. There is a good degree of seriousness in Addison, Bridport, Westford, Underhill &c. There are several places on the east side of the Green mountains where God appears to be at work. In most of the places that have been mentioned, God has, for wise and holy ends, made use of Missionaries as instruments in this work; I trust in answer to the prayers of the godly for their success, and to reward and animate the good people of Connecticut, who have contributed to promote this benevolent design. I have thought, while on my mission, when I have been called to converse with those who appear to have been made monuments of saving power, how refreshing such a revival must be to those who have had their hearts so much on this great design. If but a small number should be converted what a reward to the godly! what gems in a crown of glory!

“The people in general, whatever may have been said to the contrary, entertain a high sense of gratitude to the state of Connecticut, and particularly to the Missionary Society, for their benevolent attention to the interests of religion here. In the towns in general they have expressed their gratitude to the Society, and in some towns they have requested me, by a Committee, to return the thanks of the town.”

Extract of a letter from Rev. David Bacon, dated Detroit August 25, 1801.

“I still continue to preach at this place, though only in the forenoon of each sabbath. As my meetings were thin here in the afternoon, and as I had a call from the people at the River Roup, a settlement about six miles from this place, I have undertaken to preach there in the afternoon; and I think there is a prospect of my being made useful there. I find the people in general here are more attentive to the word preached than is common at the Eastward.

“Since my last, Nanga and several other Chiefs have paid me a visit. He said they were very glad to see me; and observed, that notwithstanding all he could say to them, some of them were so foolish as to believe that I never would return. But he said that now they began to get their eyes open, and to have some sense. He said that the chief who had been most opposed to my coming among them, had now acknowledged to him that he believed I was an honest man, and meant to do them good. I then proceeded to give them an account of the Missionary Society, and what they had in view with respect to the Indians. I informed them, that the expense and difficulty of instructing them by an interpreter were so great that it was thought best I should remain here at Detroit, until I could preach to them in their own language; and that it was uncertain where I should then go, as it would be my duty to make a beginning where there was a prospect of doing the most good. I told them that we had two kinds of people among us; how differently they felt towards the Indians, and what different treatment they must expect to meet with from them. I observed to them that our good people never did wish to hurt them, or get away their property from them without paying them for it; but were always disposed to do them good; and that they were now exerting themselves to send Missionaries among them, to make them happy in this world and in the world to come. I mentioned to them the destructive consequences of drunkenness, and how sorry I was to see them give way to it. I made use of a number of arguments to dissuade them from it, and pointed out the means they must make use of in order to avoid it. Nanga acknowledged the truth of all I had advanced, and observed that he did not know how it would be with the rest, but (putting his hand to his ears, and then spreading them out) he said that his ears should always be open to my instructions. They then agreed to have a council and hear my speeches the next time they came to Detroit.

“Since this interview with the chiefs, Mr. Denkey, one of the Moravian Ministers, has been to see me, informing me that his brethren had sent on another Missionary to supply his place among the Delawares, requesting him to begin his mission with the Chippeways as had been proposed. He observed that it was his desire, and the desire of his brethren, that he should begin with the Chippeways who lived nearest to their village in Fairfield; but that as this would require him to take those at the River St. Clair, he would not do it without my consent, and wished to know whether I was willing. All things considered, I did not hesitate to give my consent; and assured him that I would use my influence with the Indians in his behalf.

“We make but slow progress in the Indian language. I find it hard work to commit their words to memory; and when I have learned them, I find it extremely difficult to construct a sentence according to the idioms of their language. It seems to be full of irregularities. But if life and health are spared, I hope and expect we shall be able to surmount every difficulty. The Chief's frequently call to see us, and appear extremely pleased to hear us talk their language, and do what they can to help us.”

MISSIONARIES.

THE Missionaries, now in the service of the Missionary Society of Connecticut, are the Rev. David Bacon at Detroit: the Rev. Joseph Badger in New-Connecticut; the Rev. Messrs. Seb Wiliston and David Higgins and Mr.

Henziah May in the western counties of New-York ; and the Rev. Mels'rs. Job Swift, Jedidiah Busb-well and Jeremiah Hallock in Vermont. Another Missionary will soon go to New-Connecticut ; in December one will go to Black river and parts adjacent ; and probably another to Vermont to supply the place of one or two of those now there, who will then return.

POETRY.

COMMUNICATED AS ORIGINAL.

Atheism Exposed.

A Poem on Psalm 139, 14th verse.

" I am fearfully and wonderfully made."

PROUD Atheist, could a giddy dance
Of atoms, lawless hurl'd,
Produce so singular, so fair, so harmoniz'd a world ?

Why do not Arab's driving sands, the sport of every storm,
A palace here; the child of chance, or there a temple form ?

Presumptuous wretch ! thy self survey,
That lesser fabric seek,
Tell me from whence the immortal dust,
The reptile, man !

Where wast thou when the embryo earth,
From chaos, burst its way ?

When stars exulting sang the birth, and hail'd the new born day ?

Or tell me whence the wondrous speck,
The miniature of man,

Nurs'd in the womb, with fashion'd limbs to swell with life began ?

What fingers traced the tender nerves,
The wondrous fibres spun ?

Who cloth'd in flesh the hardning bones and wove the silken skin ?

How chanc'd the head, or tender heart,
life's more immediate throne,

Where fatal every touch, to dwell enclosed in solid bone ?

Who taught the stomach to digest the silver flood of Chyle ;

Or in the jaundic'd gall compress'd the saffron surfac'd bile ?

Who taught the wandring tide of blood to leave the vital urn ;
Visit each limb, in purple streams, and faithfully return ?

How delicate the winding ear, to image every sound ;

The eye to catch the pleasing view, and tell the scene around ?

How know the nerves, to hear the will, the obed'ent limbs to wield ;

The tongue ten thousand tastes discern, ten thousand accents yield ?

How know the lungs to heave and pant ; who taught the fringed lid

To guard the faithful eye, and brush the solid ball unbid ?

Who bid the babe, new launch'd in life, the milkey draught arrest,

And with its eager fingers press the nectar streaming breast ?

Who with a love too big for words the mother's bosom warms,

Along the ragged paths of life to bear it in her arms ?

A God ! A God ! Creation shouts, A God each insect cries ;

He moulded in his palm the earth, and hung it on the skies.

Now let us make a form divine, and stamp a God on clay,

To govern natures humble birth, and bear an earthly sway.

He spake. With strength and beauty clad, young health in every vein,

With thought enthron'd upon his brow, walk'd forth majestic man.

Around he turns his wandring eyes, all natures works surveys,

Admires himself, the earth, the skies, and tries his tongue in praise :

Ye hills and dales, ye meads and woods, and all this shining frame,

Fair creatures, tell me, if you can, from what or whence, I came :

By whom ye cross the flowery fields, or thro' the forest stray,

By whom I feel unknown delights, and drink the golden day ?

What parents power, all great, all good, do those around me own ?

Tell me, fair creatures, tell me, how t' adore this vast unknown ;

Who gave the wondrous tongue to sound, the wondrous eye to see,

Who gave th' amazing thought to soar, th' amazing soul to be.

THE
Connecticut Evangelical Magazine.

[PUBLISHED ACCORDING TO ACT OF CONGRESS.]

Vol. II.]

DECEMBER, 1801.

[No. 6.]

A Letter on the divine inspiration of the holy scriptures.

SIR,

ALL scripture is given by inspiration of God.* This is a cardinal truth—the main pillar on which the knowledge of every thing important to man is built. To question this is an attempt to set the world afloat without pilot or compass. By scripture is meant the holy bible in all its parts, without the exception of a single paragraph or word. The sentence, “All scripture is given by inspiration of God,” is a quotation from the writings of the apostle Paul. He had particular respect to the scriptures of the old-

* This is not to be understood, that every speaker in the holy scriptures, spoke as moved by the Holy Ghost; or that every word or speech narrated in them, is true. The serpent said to Eve, “Ye shall not surely die;” and Job’s friends did not always speak the thing which was right concerning God. The erroneous opinions of even good men, as well as their faults in practice, are often related in scripture. All we understand to be intended is, that the penmen of the bible, in every word of it, were guided by unerring inspiration.

ERRATA.

testament; for the new-testament was but in part written. It however applies as well to the one testament as to the other. Perhaps the apostle wrote this by the spirits of prophecy, and intended to include them both. Both are written by the same inspiration, and equally bear the stamp of divine authenticity. This will appear as we proceed.

The inspiration of God here intended, is a divine, infallible superintendence of every portion that is written, so that God is the author of the whole. There is however some difference with respect to the agency of the Holy Spirit in the inspiration of the various parts of which it is composed. Some part of it was written by an immediate revelation of the things contained to the inspired writers, of which they had been entirely ignorant before. Of other parts the writers had more or less acquaintance of the things recorded, either by ordinary information, or their own personal knowledge. The history of the creation of the world, and most of the events before the flood claim to have been matter of pure revelation. Moses, who has given us an account of these things, must have been ignorant of the time taken up in the work of creation, and of the order and manner of God's proceedings in it, until it was immediately revealed. God saw it best that mankind should be informed of the beginning of the world, and that they should have a short compendious history of its first ages, which could not have been given but by revelation. Many parts of the scriptures are prophecies of things which were to take place in times then future. This is true both of the old and new-testaments. Thus the bondage of the people of Israel, and their deliverance out of Egypt, their conquest of Canaan, their Babylonian captivity, and their present dispersion were foretold. Almost every thing which respected the birth, life, death and resurrection of Christ, was recorded before there could have been any probability, in the view of any man, that such a character would make his appearance, at that or any other time, in our world. There are also numerous predictions respecting the concerns of individuals and nations, and especially of the church. These make up a large portion of the holy scriptures. And as these could not have been foreseen by the penetration of the writers, they must have had their knowledge of them by express revelation. Besides; the numerous commands of God are given to us as matters of revelation. The writers profess to have received them in this way from God. The laws and directions given to Moses respecting his conducting the children of Israel from Egypt to the borders of the land of promise, the ten commandments, the whole of the levitical institutions, which were, in a great part, a prophecy of Christ, and of the gospel salvation, and all the messages of the prophets, claim to be matter of immediate revelation. These commands, institutions, and directions, make up another large portion of the scriptures. Further; all that is said in the scriptures concerning the exercise of divine mercy to this sinful world, the redemption by which the way of mercy was opened, the methods by which men may become partakers of it, all the directions concerning it,—its doctrines and all Christian institutions and instructions, and the declarations made respecting a future world, and the interests and circumstances of it, and of the day of general judgment which precedes the retributions of eternity, all are such, that if they are true, they are matters immediately revealed to the penmen of the scriptures; for they could not have obtained the knowledge of them in any other way. This also forms another great part of the scriptures.

Some other parts of the bible are histories of events, which were more or less known to the writers. Such were the miracles wrought by Moses in the land of Egypt, at the Red Sea, and in the wilderness,—the destruction of the Egyptians, and the deliverance and journeyings of the Israelites. The general histories of the people of Israel in after generations might have been known, in some measure, by the writers, by information and records, or they might in many instances have been eyewitnesses of the facts which they recorded. This also was the case with the evangelists, and the writer of the acts of the apostles. The inspiration of this portion of the scriptures has been doubted by some who profess to believe the truth of the scriptures in general, on the ground that in this case inspiration was not needed. But though an immediate revelation of things well known was unnecessary, yet it was necessary that there should have been a divine, infallible superintendence, as much over this, as over any part of that book. It was necessary, because the historians would otherwise be liable to mistakes, thro' misinformation and erroneous apprehensions, to which all imperfect beings may be subject. It was also necessary, that those and only those things should be recorded, which might render the scriptures perfect, and entirely fitted for the uses for which they are intended. A very small part of the history of persons and things is related. Every thing unnecessary is suppressed. There is nothing redundant—nothing wanting. Some things which were written, the writers could not have tho't important, as the history of Ruth. But God saw it was necessary, to give the lineage of Christ, and especially as in this instance it was of Gentile extraction. It was therefore necessary that God should make the selection. The superintendence of God, in these things, consists in his revealing to the writers what things they should record, and taking care that no errors, false colorings, or other imperfections should enter into their histories. And this is fitly called the inspiration of God, tho' in some cases not an immediate revelation of facts. By the inspiration of God is therefore meant, either the immediate revelation of his Spirit, or his inspiring men to select and relate such facts, with infallible rectitude, as he saw were for the benefit of his people. In this way the old-testament was inscribed. And in the same way the writers of the new-testament were under the guidance of the Holy Ghost. Christ promised his disciples the Holy Ghost, who should reveal to them all necessary truths, and bring all things to their remembrance, whatsoever he had said unto them.

It will be demanded, what evidence we have that the scriptures are given by such inspiration? There are numerous evidences; some of which will now be mentioned. The scriptures exhibit a God whose character is incomparably more excellent than any inhabitant of this world could have invented; for it is now, tho' revealed, beyond our comprehension. It is a consistent character, and every where supported, by all the writers, and perfectly compared with the events of providence. It differs widely from the character which all the heathen philosophers gave of him whom they called the father of gods and men. It is in every respect infinitely superior to theirs. They could not conceive of a being without a beginning, and their gods, all have a genealogy up from son to father. The scripture God is without beginning of days, self-existent and independent. Their God was only a great man. They represent him with all the evil passions of a man, capricious, deceitful, false, lascivious and malignant, subject to every vice which belongs to the most infamous characters among men, and yet possessing also the excellencies of men. They had no idea of a perfect character, and depraved beings could not originate such an idea. But the bible draws a character new to the world, and altogether perfect in unbounded excellency.

The character given of Jesus Christ is another evidence of the in-piration of the bible. It is singular. It exhibits a perfect moral character, entirely supported, under all the various and most trying circumstances incident to human life. A thousand human writers have exerted all their talents and inventions to exhibit a perfect human character; but all have failed for want of a model. They appear exceedingly low, erroneous and deficient when read and compared with the bible history of Christ. It was written by four different men, of no erudition, each of whom has infinitely exceeded all the other writers of our world.—They were certainly inspired.

The laws, precepts and morals of the scriptures are uniformly supported in perfect harmony, by all the different writers, they are faultless and complete.—worthy of being given by such a being as God, expressive of his infinite intelligence, purity, goodness, righteousness and universal perfection.—They infinitely transcend every thing of the kind ever published in our world for their extent and excellence.—The gospel in all its parts,—the view the bible gives of a future world,—the motives it presents to impress duty,—its development of the human heart in all circumstances,—all are truly wonderful, and wholly unequalled by any thing that ever was seen or imagined by mankind. They bring an infinite weight of evidence that it is derived from the inspiration of God.

It has been already noticed that a large portion of the scriptures consists of prophecies. God only could know what he designed to bring to pass. Hundreds, if not thousands of these prophecies have been already fulfilled, and all in their due order, and they are now in a train of accomplishment before our eyes. The state of the Jews; of the successive monarchies of the eastern world, of the Grecian churches, of Antichrist, and so these much more might be added; all demonstrate that the scriptures were inspired of God.

The miracles which are recorded as having taken place in confirmation of revelations from God, still continue to give evidence of it. If they were wrought at the time, they certainly were evidence. The nature of the miracles related was such as could not admit of deception. Let us single out the miracles of Moses in Egypt, at the Red Sea and in the wilderness as a sample of the rest. These are some of the most ancient miracles. The people of Israel could not have been deceived in respect to these by the low tricks of legerdemain. Had they not been true, the people of Israel could never have been made universally to believe them. And it was impossible in a few generations after they had arrived at Canaan to have invented them, and made the whole nation believe that they were true, and that they had always understood the same things from their fathers, and from the records of their nation. It would be now impossible to palm such things upon Americans, respecting the coming of our fore-fathers from Europe. They must have been true:—And besides, the occasions on which these, and all the other miracles related in the scriptures, are said to have been wrought, are worthy of them. They were to attest a revelation from God, of infinite concern to our world. It is reasonable to suppose that in such a concern, the Most High would give the most striking and incontestible evidence that it was a revelation from him. This of itself goes far towards rendering all those miracles credible. Other evidences of the divine inspiration of the holy scriptures might be given. Among them are the representations of the relations subsisting among intelligent beings, and the duties which result from them.—The reasonableness and importance of all the doctrines and duties stated, and the peculiar evidence of true believers from the communications of the Holy Spirit: but those which have been briefly noticed are conclusive, and I cannot but be confident that my friend will esteem them so. But before I close this letter, which has already imperceptibly become very long, you will permit me to make several other observations with reference to yourself, and to the account which you give me of several of your neighbours. It seems that some of them are unwilling to submit implicitly to the testimony of the scriptures respecting things which they cannot comprehend. Others deny the present obligation of the old testament, and some the spirituality of the new. And a few openly question the authenticity of the whole; while others spiritualise it into nonsense and mystery, as unintelligible as the jargon of magicians and sorcerers, and give it any meaning, or no meaning, as their fancy, impiety, enthusiasm or blasphemy directs. These are all much alike so far as it respects their opinions on the divine origin of the sacred scriptures. All tend to one point—to the rejection of the whole.

Since all Scripture is given by inspiration of God, you see that all parts of it come to us authenticated by the same authority.—Nothing is to be relied upon with the same confidence as another. That which will shake the grounds of belief in any one instance, will in every one. If we question one idea, one piece of history, one command, promise, threatening, or any one representation, we may as well question another, and another and the whole. If we would be consistent, we must believe either that the whole of it is true, or that no part of it is the word of God. When men say, we do not know but that it may be all true; but this part is probable, and that improbable,—this is true, but of that we do not know what to believe,—we do not believe nor disbelieve it, they have then taken the ground which entirely subverts the whole. Every thing which dissatisfies their reasonings, or displeases their passions or inclinations, will be passed over as improbable. Unless we place implicit confidence in the scriptures, whether the thing written might seem probable or improbable to us,—unless we believe it upon the bare testimony of the bible, all confidence is gone in the only direction to the way of salvation, which is afforded for our world. The testimony of God is then subjected to the decisions of our own perblind, partial reasonings, which are always swayed by our prejudices and inclinations, and are too narrow to comprehend the interests of the universe. When these scriptures are thus subjected to our caprice, we have in fact become infidels, and the bible will be believed or disbelieved as we please, and construed or misconstrued to favor our lusts, and support our favorite opinions. Every degree of deviation from the belief of the plain meaning of the bible as it stands, according to the natural import of every part of it, comparing it together as its own interpreter, is a step towards infidelity. When men profess not to know what to believe about certain things in the bible, as for instance the slaughter of the Philistines by Sampson, because it would seem improbable, their foundation is gone, the testimony of God weighs very light with them, and they have unworthy ideas of the scriptures. What they believe, they believe because it is probable, and not because it is the word of God.—You have perhaps heard some excuse their unbelief in particular things, by saying that they do not doubt but that the penmen of the scriptures were honest men, and wrote according to their information and belief of things, and that they may be depended on in the main, tho' in some less things they might mistake. Such deny that all scripture is given by inspiration of God. They rely on human integrity, not on divine veracity. You have read some authors, who have taken this ground to convince infidels. They have in this met them half way, and done mischief to the cause. Since all scripture is given by inspiration of God, we are under infinite obligation to give equal and entire credit to every individual thing it contains. If it be an affront to a man, your equal, to accuse him of false representations, what must it be to question the most High.

Since all scripture is given by inspiration of God it follows, that all the directions given in it are of indispensable obligation upon us. Every thing omitted, or done contrary to the instructions of the scriptures is a direct refusal to submit to the authority of God.

The evidence we have of the divine authenticity of the scriptures, renders it certain that all the precious promises, and awful threatenings of the bible will be accomplished. There is no room for doubt. It is important that we believe them, and take heed to ourselves accordingly.

It will also follow, that all the doctrines contained in the scriptures are true, whether we can, or cannot see the reasonableness and consistency of them. They are written; That is sufficient, they must be received.

Finally, since all scripture is given by inspiration of God, you cannot but unite with me in acknowledging that we have abundant reason to bless God, that he has given us an infallible standard of truth and duty. We are not necessitated to examine every new theory of religion that is obtruded upon the world—are not left to the mercy of the winds and waves, to be carried about with every wind of doctrine. We have a sure word of testimony, unto which we do well to give heed, as to a light that shineth in a dark place. It is idle, it is impious to leave this, and be forever examining all the wild theories which teem from the heated imaginations, distracted heads and corrupted hearts of infidels and fanatics.—Let us honestly study, believe, meditate on, and obey those scriptures which are given by inspiration of God, or we shall be ever learning, and never come to the knowledge of the truth. That by a stedfast adherence to this infallible guide you may rejoice in God, and inherit the promises, is the ardent wish of yours, &c.

MIKROS.

MESS'RS EDITORS,

IF you judge the following tends to public edification, please to give it a place in the Magazine.

THOUGH the word justification, is used in several senses, yet in the sacred scriptures, and particularly, in the gospel, the justification of a sinner before God, doth always mean his being discharged from the punishment he deserved as a transgressor to suffer, and his being restored to the privileges, which, by his sin, he had forfeited. There are but two ways in which a person can be justified before God, viz. By his own personal righteousness, or for the sake of the righteousness of another, as a surety yielded in his stead. That no mere man, since the fall, can, or ever did so keep and obey the divine law, as to be justified on account of a personal righteousness of his own, will be acknowledged, even by many, who nevertheless, do practically contradict it. How many of those who openly and before men profess this truth, yet do secretly in heart, before the heart-searching God, practically contradict it? In seeking to build up a righteousness of their own, which they dare not indeed wholly depend upon for their justification before God, yet they hope that that, together with the righteousness of Christ, will suffice for that infinitely important purpose. It is much the drift of the gospel to teach and persuade us, that no person of all the human race, is, or can be justified before God, on account of any personal righteousness of his own, or by the deeds of the law.

The other way of a sinner's justification before God, is on account of the righteousness of another, as his surety yielded in his stead; and that yielded by Jesus Christ, as the only surety and Saviour of sinners, satisfies law and justice, and is therefore that only which can be sufficient for a person's justification in the sight of God.

Some there are who conclude and please themselves with the notion, that there is now under the gospel, such an abatement in the law, that if a person is but sincere, he is justified before God, on account of his sincere, though but imperfect righteousness; but this is in effect, to seek and expect justification in the way of the law, and by the deeds of the law; and such as do so conclude, must, I think, entertain very wrong notions of the holy and unchangeable law of God, as if it was too strict before, or as if by the coming and mediation of Christ, the law was altered in its commands and demands, under the gospel constitution. If God did justify the sinner, releasing him from deserved punishment, and restoring him to forfeited privileges, on account, or for the sake of the sinner's own personal righteousness, which is utterly deficient in view of the law, however sincere he may be, how would God, in so doing, be just? as the apostle assures us that he is; Rom. iii. 26. "To declare at this time, his righteousness, that he might be just, and the justifier of him that believeth in Jesus."

It is not for the sake of any person's defective and imperfect righteousness that God doth justify any one; but for the righteousness' sake alone of Christ, the sinner's surety, whose righteousness is so every way adequate to all the claims and demands of the law and justice of God, so that even his holiness, truth and justice did not descry any, even the least deficiency or imperfection in it; it is only for the sake of that law-fulfilling and justice-satisfying righteousness of Christ, as a surety, whom God hath appointed, and who voluntarily obeyed; and whom the believing sinner doth, by faith receive, that God doth justify any one of the human fallen race. So that believing in Jesus Christ, doth very much consist in a person's denying all dependance upon any righteousness of his own, for his justification before God; and depending therefor solely upon the righteousness of Christ, as the sinner's surety and only Saviour. He is said to be the surety of a better testament, Heb. vii. 22. Not better because of the abatement in the law (beforementioned) or because the sinner may now be justified, (if sincere) on account of his imperfect righteousness; but on account of the manner, in which the benefit or privilege may now (under the gospel) be attained by sinners. Under the law, the condition of a person's justification, was his yielding, in his own person, obedience or righteousness sufficient for that purpose. The language of that covenant was, do and live; the language of the new covenant or gospel is, believe and live.— Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, who has yielded a most full and complete obedience and righteousness, and God is just in justifying thee on account of that perfect righteousness, even for the sake of that suretyship righteousness of Christ, who has made such a complete atonement for sin, and satisfaction to divine justice, that on its account, God is just in justifying every one who believeth in Jesus Christ; just to himself, just to his truths and holy law, in so doing. There was none of that abatement (pretended) made to Christ the surety; no, he fulfilled the law in every iota and tittle of it; he perfectly satisfied divine justice, and it is only on account of his perfect righteousness, that any one of the guilty human race, is, or can be justified before God. Hence

Christ is said to be the end of the law for righteousness, to every one who believeth in him, Rom. x. 4. and no where else can a righteousness be found, sufficient for this infinitely important purpose, viz. The sinner's justification before God; but in Christ, the surety and only Saviour of sinners; he hath brought in a complete and everlasting righteousness, and that only is sufficient for the sinner's justification. Isaiah xli. 24, 25. "Surely shall one say, in the Lord have I righteousness and strength; even to him shall men come; and all that are incensed against him shall be ashamed: In the Lord shall the seed of Israel be justified and shall glory." None of all the human, fallen race of mankind may glory in their own imperfect righteousness, as being in any degree sufficient for their justification and salvation; those infinitely important blessings and favours, are bestowed solely on account of the all-perfect righteousness of Christ.— That the sinner is justified in the sight of God, on account of any righteousness but that which is all-perfect, leads to unanswerable difficulties and fatal errors. The justification of a sinner, in the sight of God, on account of the all-perfect righteousness of Christ, is the foundation of the Christian's faith and hope, when he sees the great imperfection of his own righteousness, and his soul is cast down within him, in a realizing view of his own great guiltiness, and non-conformity to the holy and good law of God. How animating and comfortable must it be to him, and the very foundation of his faith, hope and joy, to consider that Jesus Christ, his surety (in whom he trusts) hath by his obedience fully satisfied the law and justice of God? So that in his justification and salvation, God's holiness, justice and truth, are jointly united with the honors of his mercy and grace; and that therein all the divine attributes do sweetly accord and harmonize; that God is just as well as merciful, in justifying him that believeth in Jesus Christ.

And here I would briefly observe, that the apostles Paul and James, use the word justification (or the thing itself) in two different senses. The apostle Paul, in treating of the justification of a sinner before God, shews us abundantly, that it can be only on account of the perfect righteousness of Christ, without the deeds of the law. Rom. iii. 20—31. and in many other places. The apostle James, particularly in the 2d chapter of his epistle, from the 14th to the 26th verse, speaks of a person's justifying, or proving the truth and sincerity of his faith and Christian profession before men; and shews, in order to it, the necessity of good works, and that it is but in vain, for a person to say that he hath faith, or to profess that he is a true disciple and follower of Christ, who at the same time neglects those good works which are properly evidential thereof, and appears to indulge himself in those which are contrary to such a profession. And when we consider the matter in this view (which I think is right) we may see, that there is no contradiction nor inconsistency, at all between those two apostles.

And here, let all persons be warned against abusing this doctrine, as if it led to sinful licentiousness; or as though sinners being justified freely of God's grace, through the righteousness of Christ, this doctrine any way allows them to live and indulge themselves in transgressions of the divine law. The apostle Paul, in several places, shews that this is a very heinous and dangerous abuse of God's grace, through the Redeemer; particularly in the 3d chapter, to the Romans, where, after shewing in several verses, the only way of a sinner's justification before God, he concludes the chapter with plainly obviating the objection against this doctrine, with saying, as in the last verse,—"Do we then make void the law through faith? God forbid: yea, we establish the law." Though the law ceases to be a covenant of life to believers in Christ; yet it ceaseth not to be a rule of life to them; and their justification of God's free, and infinite grace, through the righteousness of Christ, ought to be, and will be, a most powerful and persuasive motive, to their strivings and endeavours, to live in obedience to his holy and good rules and precepts in the gospel; though they will not depend upon even their best obedience, but solely upon what Christ has done and suffered, as the ground of their justification before God. It is in Christ, as their surety, and the only Mediator of the new covenant, that they see they can possibly have a sufficiency of righteousness and strength, and on him they depend for righteousness and strength for their justification before God, and to carry them through the whole course of their Christian race and warfare in this world; and to bring them finally to heavenly glory and happiness.

PHILALETHES.

FOR THE CONNECTICUT EVANGELICAL MAGAZINE.

Mess'rs. EDITORS,

AMONG other objections to the doctrines of divine love

reignty and election, this is brought as one; that God is no respecter of persons—that he does no more for one than for another previous to their repentance: But whenever they repent, and turn to God, his compassion is excited, and he shows them favor. To support this objection, the words of Peter are quoted, as recorded in Acts x. 34, 35. “Then Peter opened his mouth, and said, of a truth I perceive that God is no respecter of persons: but in every nation, he that feareth him, and worketh righteousness, is accepted with him.”

To show the false construction, which, I conceive, has been put upon this passage, and exhibit its true meaning, I would offer the following observations.

Peter, although he had been with Christ through all his ministry, seen his miracles, received his instructions, and a commission to go forth and preach his gospel, had not yet obtained just ideas of Christ's visible kingdom in this world. He considered the offers of salvation as confined to the Jewish nation, being the descendants of Abraham, from whose seed God had promised the Saviour should arise. But God, as a holy sovereign, having mercy on whom he will have mercy, brought Peter to see and acknowledge his mistake. Though the gospel had been preached only to the Jews, yet God had determined to send it to the Gentiles, and thus convince the apostles, that he is no respecter of persons. To prepare the way for this, God sent an angel to Cornelius, a devout man, who was ignorant of the plan of salvation by Jesus Christ, directing him to go to Peter for instruction. God also taught Peter, in a vision, to receive Cornelius, although he was a Gentile, with whom the Jews did not associate. By this, Peter saw that the offers of salvation were not confined to the Jews only, but were to be made to all nations, and that God is a sovereign in the dispensation of his favors. Hence he declares as in the passage above stated, that “God is no respecter of persons,” &c.

Here let us enquire, in what sense God may be said to be no respecter of persons? It cannot mean that God treats all mankind alike, as some assert; for facts abundantly prove the reverse. We see that some are favored with firm, robust, and healthy constitutions, and scarcely know what it is to feel sickness, or pain; while others know as little what it is to enjoy health, or ease. And this difference takes place without any distinction, as to moral character. Some have an abundance of this world's goods, while others, of the same moral character, have scarcely enough to support nature, and would gladly receive even the crumbs, which fall from the tables of the rich. Many labor, and toil hard thro' life, and can scarcely obtain a comfortable support, being constantly subject to losses and disappointments; while to others, every thing seems to turn to advantage, and wealth rolls in upon them like a flood. Some are raised to honor and preferment, and receive the adulation of the surrounding multitude; while others, equally worthy, and perhaps much more so, remain unnoticed, and die in obscurity. Indeed, it is abundantly evident, that there is a great disparity in the situation, circumstances, and treatment of mankind, by the Deity, separate from any consideration of their moral characters. For, among the healthy, rich, and honorable, are the humble Christian, who loves God, obeys his commands, and delights in the paths of piety; and the proud and haughty, the profane and vicious, the profligate and abandoned, who neither fear God, nor regard man, but delight in the service of Satan. So likewise among those, who are always feeble and infirm, and who are destitute, even of the necessaries of life, are the truly pious, who delight in divine things; and the vile and infamous, the pests of society. Facts teach us, that in these respects, God does not treat all mankind alike.

There are also facts recorded in scripture, which prove that all mankind do not receive the same treatment from God. Noah and his family, some of whom were wicked persons, were very differently treated from the rest of the antediluvian world. God also showed more love and favor to Jacob, than to Esau his brother. He says, before either of them had an existence, "Jacob have I loved, and Esau have I hated." God showed more favor to Joseph than to the rest of his brethren—more to Moses, Joshua, David, Solomon, and many of the prophets, than to others of the same nation. He has also much more highly favored some nations than others. To some he has afforded great prosperity, to others the reverse. To some he has given a revelation of himself and character, the knowledge of a Saviour, and the plan of salvation; while others are left in darkness and barbarism, with very little more than the light of nature to teach them the being of a God, his attributes and perfections. That God is no respecter of persons, does not, therefore, imply that he loves and treats all alike; for fact proves the reverse.

Neither does it imply that he does no more for one than for another. He did more for Abraham than he did for his brethren. They were all an idolatrous nation, and were very ignorant of the character of the true God. But God saw fit to take Abraham from among his idolatrous brethren the Chaldees, regenerate his heart, bring him into the land of Canaan, which he gave to him for a possession, with a promise that from his seed the Saviour should arise. He did vastly more for the Israelites than for any other nation in their time. He preserved them from famine; delivered them from bondage; cleft a passage for them through the Red Sea; destroyed their pursuers; fed them, in a miraculous manner, with bread from heaven, and with water from a rock; defended them from their enemies; carried them to the fertile land of Canaan, and gave it to them for a possession. He gave them the best laws, and institutions, and was called their God in a peculiar sense.

God does more for one nation than for another, at the present day. He does more for this nation, than for the heathen. He gives us his word, teaches us his character and our duty, and points us to a glorious immortality, by a crucified Saviour.

So also among individuals, God does more for one than for another. He endues one with greater abilities than another, and places him in a more eligible situation. To some he gives ten talents, to others five, and to others one. He awakens some to attend to the means of grace with anxious concern for their souls, and brings them to realize the importance of religion; while others are left to remain stupid and secure. He re-regenerates the hearts of some, and fits them for heaven; while others are left to persist in sin, and go down to ruin. In various ways, God does more for some, than he does for others. It is, therefore evident, that God's being no respecter of persons, does not imply that he does for all alike.

Neither does it imply that he does not choose one and leave another; for we learn from scripture, that he does choose one and leave another. He chose Abel and left Cain. He chose Abraham, and left others of his nation and kindred. He chose Jacob, and left Esau. He chose Paul, a self-righteous pharisee, and a persecutor, and left many others of the same character. And thus it is now. He comes into a family, awakens, convicts, and regenerates some, and leaves others. He pours out his spirit on one town, and brings many into his kingdom; while others are left to remain in stupidity. God causeth it to "rain upon one city, and causeth it not to rain on another." "He hath mercy on whom he will have mercy, and whom he will he hardeneth."—"Who maketh thee to differ? and what hast thou that thou didst not receive?"

But what is meant in the text, by God's being no respecter of persons, must be this: He does not respect, or approve of one, rather than another, on account of any situation in life. He takes the high and low, rich and poor, bond and free, according to his sovereign will and pleasure. Therefore he says; "I will have mercy on whom I will have mercy."

Peter had before viewed God as having a peculiar respect for the Jewish nation, and supposed that none could be interested in Christ's atonement but the Jews. But by the conversion of Cornelius, who was a Gentile, and the circumstances which attended it, he was brought to renounce his former prejudices concerning the difference between Jews and Gentiles, and to see that God is no respecter of persons—that he accepts no man, nor bestows favor on any, merely because he is of such a nation or family; nor that he so determines his regards, as to confine his favors to the Jewish nation, or to the natural seed of Abraham alone. But all, who truly fear God, and work righteousness, "who are the called according to his purpose," whether they be rich or poor, bond or free, learned or unlearned, he will accept. There is nothing in the character of any natural man, which he respects, or on account of which he bestows favor; for all are wholly sinful, every imagination of the thoughts of the heart being only evil continually. All his favors are dispensed according to his eternal will and purpose. "He doeth according to his will in the army of heaven, and among the inhabitants of the earth." Yes, "his counsel shall stand, and he will do all his pleasure." And we have no other reason to give, for his choosing one, and leaving another, than this; "Even so Father, for so it seemed good in thy sight." And this is sufficient.

From a view of this subject, we are taught, that God never injures one of his creatures, though he leave many to perish in their sins. He requires no more of any one, than he is naturally able to perform. Those, who have but one talent, are required to occupy but one. But the truth is; all mankind are sinners, and justly condemned. No one would have been injured; had salvation never been purchased, as offered. It is matter of infinite gratitude, that God will have mercy on any. And since no one has a right to salvation; but all justly deserve punishment, he has a right to have mercy on whom he will. If God take one, and leave another—if he take a poor despised heathen, who has not been favored with the word of God, and leave others to perish under the light of the gospel, he has a perfect right so to do: for "he is no respecter of persons."

We are also taught, that those are under a mistake, who are opposed to divine sovereignty, in regeneration. Mankind being all sinners, and justly deserving the divine displeasure, have no claim to any favor. And being all God's creatures, he has a right to show favor to whom he pleases. "Hath not the potter power over the clay, of the same lump to make one vessel unto honor, and another unto dishonor?" So God hath a right to act as a sovereign in the work of regeneration, taking whom he will, since no one would ever come to Christ, except the Father who hath sent him draw him. Therefore the doctrine of election is the only door of hope for the fallen race of man. For if God had never chosen any to salvation, but mankind had been left to the dictates of their own hearts, there would never one have been saved; but all would have perished, notwithstanding all that Christ has done and suffered.

DELTA.

Reflections on the 10th Chapter of Paul's Epistle to the Hebrews, particularly the 38th verse.

NUMBER I.

THIS chapter seems a connecting link in the chain of Scripture, between the old and the new-testament. It casts peculiar light upon both dispensations of the covenant of grace; discovers a perfect consistency, mutual subservience and uniformity of design. The great end of both being the glory of God, in the redemption of sinners by Jesus Christ, the several things necessary to the attainment of this end, are in both contained, though with different degrees of clearness and perspicuity.

The character of God, and of the sinner, are here opened to view—all the duties, which as creatures and as sinners, we owe to God as our creator and moral governor, are pointed out; and these too enforced by all the weight of precept and example, and under the infinite sanction of divine authority.

The chapter is introduced with a view of the weakness and insufficiency of the law-sacrifices. They had no merit or efficacy but as they typified and respected the meritorious sacrifice of Christ. They were only shadows of good things to come. For, though they were often repeated, even year by year, they could not purge the conscience of the worshippers, nor make the comers thereunto perfect. It was impossible in the reason and nature of things, that the blood of bulls and of goats should take away sin—but in the blood of Jesus there is infinite merit—complete satisfaction for sin. When therefore this sacrifice was actually made, the types were all accomplished by their antitype—the end of all the law sacrifices fully answered, and neither necessity nor propriety remained for their continuance. No addition could be made to the atonement of Christ, for by "one offering he hath perfected forever them that are sanctified." To this one great sacrifice, this infinite atonement of Christ, the Apostle points our views, and directs our faith, as the only foundation of human hope, the all-sufficient source of every spiritual blessing. The covenant of grace, in which exceedingly great and precious promises are made, is ratified and sealed by the blood of Christ, and witnessed to every true believer by God's spirit, both in his word and by his work upon his heart.

The Apostle then, resting with perfect assurance upon this permanent foundation, infers its practical and important uses to believers. With great animation and engagedness he exhorts his Christian brethren to realize the blessed comfort of their hope—to enjoy the rich and distinguishing privileges of their justified state, by drawing near to God with holy boldness and full assurance of faith, in that new and living way which he hath consecrated for us. He exhorts them to hold fast the profession of their faith, with an unwavering confidence in the faithfulness of God—to cherish in themselves and in each other that spirit of love, of mutual and disinterested good will, which the gospel inspires, and to abound in those good works, those peaceable fruits of righteousness, which it is designed to produce. He then holds up to them, in a very solemn manner, the evil nature and dreadful consequences of the opposite temper and conduct—the aggravated sin of unbelief—the contempt of gospel grace, and the dear-bought salvation of Jesus Christ—that it is most surely connected with inevitable and eternal destruction.

As motives of encouragement and comfort, of constancy and perseverance in the Christian faith, he puts them in mind of the happy and blessed effects of their religion which they had already experienced—that inward strength and comfort by which they were supported under the most trying outward circumstances; while suffering all the reproaches and persecutions, with which an unbelieving and malicious world could afflict them. Such was their comfort in the enjoyment of God, and the hope of his glory, that they were willing to sacrifice all their worldly ease, interest and comfort to the gospel of Christ, and the promotion of his cause. They were not only patient and resigned under the injurious treatment of their enemies, "but," says the Apostle, "ye took joyfully the spoiling of your goods, knowing in yourselves that ye have in heaven, a better and an enduring substance." From their past experience of the grace of God, he draws an argument of encouragement to inspire them with patience, and with trust and confidence in the faithfulness and all-sufficiency of God—that he would continue to support them under all their future trials, and grant them strength according to their day. He reminds them, that their conflicts tho' sharp, would be short—they should soon be crowned with victory, and their faithfulness rewarded with eternal glory. "For yet a little while, and he that shall come, will come, and will not tarry." And then to sum it all up in a word, and bring the whole weight of his exhortation to a point, impressed by the united influence of hope and fear—holding up their duty and interest on the one hand, and disobedience with its evil consequences on the other, he says, "Now the just shall live by faith, but if any man draw back, my soul shall have no pleasure in him!" The manner of this expression adds very great solemnity and weight to the passage. It differs from the phraseology of the former part of the chapter, and is not the address of one mortal worm to another, even with the advantage of revelation, or the gift of inspiration. It is spoken in the name of God, and as such carries its authority in its very form. As if God, had in his own person sealed and attested the truth of all that the Apostle had previously declared by the inspiration of his spirit. It is as if the great God had with an audible voice from heaven, immediately addressed this solemn declaration to mankind, "Now the just shall live by faith, but if any man draw back, my soul shall have no pleasure in him."

If we have the faith which is here spoken of, we shall receive it as thus delivered and thus addressed. It is only with this solemn and believing impression, that we can hear the voice of God, speaking to us in his word.

Here is held up before us a contrast of character and state, and whatever quality is affirmed of the one, is denied of the other. The one lives by faith—the other draws back, and is destitute of faith. The one is the object of the divine complacency—in the other, God's soul hath no pleasure. If the expression contain a promise of life eternal to the believer—it also denounces eternal death against the unbeliever. The disapprobation of God, is death to the soul—but his favor is life. "To be carnally minded is death, but to be spiritually minded is life and peace."

Much important instruction is contained in this short passage of sacred writ. It opens an extensive field for useful meditation, and religious improvement. Almost every word in the sentence is emphatical and weighty. The more closely we examine it, the more we shall find it contains.—The character of God—the character of the saint—and of the sinner—the moral affections, conduct and state of each—the hopes of the one and the fears of the other—their common obligations, the divine promise to the Christian, with the time, manner of enjoyment, and particular kind of good promised, are all here contained in close connection, either expressed or clearly implied. The inquisitive mind will here find satisfaction in all these respects. Supposing the following questions be put—Who are the persons, to whom this happiness is promised in the sacred text?

They are described by their moral character—they are at heart conformed to the eternal rule of righteousness, and actuated with love to universal being—they are, the just. What is the subject of the promise, or the good annexed to the character? It is life. But what kind of life? Is it animal life, the enjoyment of sensual pleasures, and worldly delights? or, is it the improvement of their natural understandings in the pursuits of science, and the attainments of knowledge and natural philosophy? Neither of these; but something infinitely superior to both. It is that life which consists in the knowledge of God and of Jesus Christ, exercised in love, submission, hope, trust and desire. When, or at what time, may this life be experienced—this happiness enjoyed? Is it a present or a future good? The answer is now, in the present state of things—in our present state of probation; amid all the surrounding evils to which we are exposed; and under all the outward trials and distresses, crosses and disappointments which we may suffer. "Now the just shall live by faith," &c. He that believeth hath eternal life. "The life which I now live in the flesh" said this holy Apostle, "is by faith on the Son of God."

But what is the security of the just, for the enjoyment of this life?

The covenant promise and faithfulness of God. "Now the just shall live by faith."

The enquiry may be pushed a step further, and a ready solution be found.

Are all others excluded from the approbation and enjoyment of God? Are there not some who do not acknowledge Christ, who yet from their exemplary conduct—their moral lives—their kind, obliging and inoffensive carriage; and especially from their eminent usefulness to mankind, may expect the divine approbation?

The answer is, If any man draw back, &c. let his pretensions or his virtues be what they may; however beloved, revered and caressed by mankind, so that his praise is the theme of every tongue, and his worth extolled to the skies;—yet if destitute of this faith, by which the just do and shall live—if he have not that holiness which characterizes the saints, he is an abhorrence to God, and infinitely offensive in the pure eyes of his glory, "my soul shall have no pleasure in him." The holy nature of God cannot approve of such a character. It is infinitely impossible. God seeth not as man seeth—he looketh on the heart. He is no respecter of persons, but judgeth according to truth. Without faith it is impossible to please God. Whatsoever is not of faith is sin.

ASAPH.

(To be continued.)

Prayer; a weapon peculiar to those, who fight under Christ, the Captain of our Salvation.

NUMBER I.

MESS'RS EDITORS,

IT appeared to be the subject of the Missionary sermon, preached at Hartford, on the day of the last General Election, to stir up Christians to the duty of extraordinary prayer. The preacher if I mistake not, held up this idea, That there was, perhaps, no way, in which the friends of the Redeemer might do more to advance the interest of his kingdom than by prayer.

It then appeared to me that the thought was just, and very important. But the more I have meditated upon the subject, the more important it appears, that all the followers of the Lamb should become wrestlers in prayer.

The thought has struck my mind with force, That prayer is a weapon peculiar to those, who fight under Christ, the captain of our salvation. It is a weapon which they, and none but they ever use. The enemies of Christ can use the bow and the arrow, the sword and the spear as well as his friends. The enemies of Christ use the press, and even the pulpit, as well as those devoted to his interest. And they even make use of some weapons to advance their cause, which Christians dare not bring into the service of their master. But here is one, piece of armour, which none but Christian soldiers ever did, or ever will bring into the field; and by this they will come off conquerors, and more than conquerors—It is prayer.

A little attention to those contests, which have subsisted between the people of God and their enemies, will serve to give us a striking view of the great advantage, which the former have obtained over the latter, by reason of their having liberty of access to the throne of grace. This gave Jacob the advantage of his brother Esau. When Jacob was returning from Padan-aram, Esau set out to meet him in a hostile manner, at the head of 400 men. It was a trying time with Jacob. He did not wish to fight his brother. If he had wished it, he could not; for he had nothing but a defenceless company of women, children and flocks. In this trying time, Jacob remembered the God of his father Abraham, and the God of his father Isaac; and he remembered that he was a prayer-hearing God—to him he went and poured out his heart; and entreated his blessing. The night before he met his brother, he never shut his eyes to sleep; but spent the whole time in the most fervent prayer. His importunity held out to the very last; even at the breaking of the day, he said to the almighty Angel, with whom he wrestled, I will not let thee go, except thou bless me. And the sequel shows us that he did not wrestle in vain. He, who turneth all hearts whithersoever he will, disarmed Esau of his rage, so that the next morning they met like two twin brothers; see Gen. 32d and 33d chapters. Whoever reads the account and believes the truth of it, will see, that prayer was the weapon, with which Jacob overcame his brother. In this contest, this weapon was used only on one side. Esau was a profane man; his portion was in this life. Such men do not pray: "Ye cannot serve God and Mammon." Esau had the most men on his side; but Jacob had God on his side. While the one was marshalling his troop, the other was praying to his God—and prayer got the victory.

In the 17th chapter of Exodus, there is an account of a battle between Israel and Amalek, an attention to which will throw light upon the subject before us. "Then came Amalek and fought with Israel in Rephidim. And Moses said unto Joshua, Choose us out men, and go out, fight with Amalek; to-morrow I will stand on the top of the hill, with the rod of God in mine hand. So Joshua did as Moses had said to him, and fought with Amalek: and Moses, Aaron and Hur went up to the top of the hill. And it came to pass when Moses held up his hand, that Israel prevailed: And when he let down his hand, Amalek prevailed, &c. The holding up of the hand is expressive of prayer: Lam. iii. 41. "Let us lift up our heart with our hands unto God in the heavens." Now observe in the case before us, there were two ways in which Israel fought against Amalek, and but one in which they fought against Israel. They both had armies, and, no doubt, generals to lead them; but Amalek had no Moses to pray. By attending to the whole passage, we learn that the battle issued in favor of Israel but not until God had given them decided proof, that they must not expect to overcome, by superior force, but by humbly supplicating aid from the Lord of hosts. The Amalekites could fight with carnal weapons as well as the people of God; but they had no prayer on their side. In other respects, it seems, they had the advantage; for when Moses let down his hand, they prevailed; but as soon as his holy hand was again lifted up to God in the heavens, they were discomfited. They could not stand before prayer, tho' they could force their way against the naked sword. From this important piece of scripture history, we learn that prayer is a weapon peculiar to the Israel of God. How careful then they ought to be to keep this part of their armour in use and to keep it bright. Even Moses had fainting turns; his hands grew weary and he let them fall. What a mercy it was, that Aaron and Hur were with him to stay up his hands—Had it not been for this, Israel, instead of Amalek, would have been discomfited. "Wo unto him, that is alone when he falleth; for he hath not another to help him up."

It was by prayer, that Joshua gained a victory over the five kings, on that day when the sun stood still. And there was no day like that before it, nor after it, that the Lord hearkened unto the voice of a man; for the Lord fought for Israel; Josh. x. 14. We are not to understand that this was the first and last day, in which the Lord ever heard prayer (a God hearing prayer is his memorial throughout all generations) but this was the only day, in which the sun ever stood still in answer to the prayer of a man. And this is a great monument, erected in the history of the church to show the efficacy of prayer.

Prayer was made great use of by David. Tho' he was a man of war and fought much with the sword; yet he fought more with prayer. Read the book of Psalms and you will be convinced of this. He says, Psalm cix. 3, 4. They compassed me about also with words of hatred; and fought against me without a cause. For my love, they are my adversaries; but I give myself unto prayer.

This was his resort in all his troubles. He trusted in God. He did not depend on his own foresight, courage nor strength; but availed himself of the wisdom and power of Jehovah. And prayer was the stated way, which he took to draw forth those supplies which he from time to time needed. "In all thy ways acknowledge him and he shall direct thy paths." It was in this way, that David had the advantage of Goliath and Saul. In other respects, he was not a match for them. Goliath was stronger and better armed than he, and Saul had the power of the kingdom on his side; but David had the power of the eternal king on his side; for he was eminently a man of prayer.

It was by prayer, that king Asa, gained such a victory over that great army, under the command of Zerah the Ethiopian. And Asa cried unto the Lord his God, and said, Lord, it is nothing with thee to help, whether with many or with them that have no power: help us, O Lord, our God; for we rest on thee, and in thy name we go against this multitude: O Lord, our God, let not man prevail against thee.* Zerah had the most formidable army, but he did not make such a prayer. It is probable, that in all his numerous army, which consisted of more than a thousand thousand, there was not one praying man. Doubtless they prayed to their dumb idols; but nothing can be more ineffectual than such prayer. In the controversy between Elijah and the prophets of Baal, prayer was resorted to on both sides; but Baal's prophets were not heard, tho' they cried aloud. There is but one prayer-hearing God. David addressing himself to the Most High, saith, O thou that hearest prayer! It is as much as to say, that Jehovah is a prayer-hearing God, and that he is the only God, who does hear prayer. Therefore all prayer offered to other gods is, in reality, no prayer; but words scattered in the wind. And there is but one way, in which prayer can be offered up to the living and true God, so as to be accepted. Without faith, it is impossible to please God. The sacrifice of the wicked is abomination to the Lord; but the prayer of the upright is his delight. The external of prayer is not peculiar to the people of God. Pharisees and hypocrites have prayed much in their way; but it is the prayer of the righteous alone, which avail-eth much. No other prayer avails any thing; so that prayer, considered as prevalent is peculiar to the people of the founts of the most high God.

* 2 Chron. xiv. Chap.

That prayer gives the people of God a superiority over their enemies is clear, from reading the 20th chapter of the 2. Chron. When Moab and the children of Ammon came against Jehoshaphat with a great multitude he acknowledged before the Lord his inferiority to the enemy, and his entire dependance upon him for help. "O our God, wilt thou not judge them? For we have no might against this great company that cometh against us: neither know we what to do, but our eyes are upon thee." Hear the answer, which the Lord sent by his prophet to this praying king; "Ye shall not need to fight in this battle; set yourselves, stand ye still and see the salvation of the Lord with you, O Judah and Jerusalem; fear not, nor be dismayed; to-morrow go out against them, for the Lord will be with you." It was even so. Prayer and faith had done all—God made the enemies of his praying people destroy one another. What a blessing it was to Judah to have at the head of the kingdom such a praying man as Jehoshaphat. He was to them, under Heaven, a greater defence than walls of brass. Who can believe the bible, and not feel the importance of having pious rulers? It would give great delight to all the pious part of a state or kingdom to have reason to believe, that their rulers were daily supplicating the king of kings for wisdom and direction, and for his blessing on the nation.

Judah was blessed with more than one praying king: And more than once did the kingdom obtain a great deliverance, in answer to the prayers of its Prince, in union with others, who delighted to call on God. Sennacherib threatened to destroy Jerusalem, in the reign of the pious Hezekiah. His army was great; his success had been great, and he was perfectly confident, that enfeebled Jerusalem could not withstand the force he brought against it. Hezekiah felt his own weakness, and the weakness of his people; he was also acquainted with the strength, the valour and the success of the king of Assyria: But he knew there was a king in heaven more mighty than he. He felt for himself and his people; but he felt more sensibly for the insulted Majesty of heaven, whom this idolatrous king had ranked with the gods of the heathen. "And for this cause, Hezekiah the king, and the prophet Isaiah the son of Amoz, prayed and cried to Heaven. And the Lord sent an angel, which cut off all the mighty men of valour, and the leaders and captains in the camp of the king of Assyria; so he returned with shame of face to his own land." What a mighty weapon is prayer! If John Knox was a Hezekiah* in prayer, it is no wonder, that Queen Mary should say,

* Hezekiah's eminency in prayer will also appear by reading 2 Kings, chap. xx.

"She had rather have an army of ten thousand men against her than the prayers of John Knox."

It appears from reading the book of Nehemiah, that the advantage, which he had over Sanballat and his companions, who endeavored to hinder the Jews from rebuilding Jerusalem and from setting up the worship of God there, was greatly owing to his fervent prayers. Before he set out for Jerusalem, he *sat down and wept, and mourned certain days, and fasted and prayed before the God of heaven. After he had built the wall, he kept a solemn and public fast at Jerusalem; at which time he made a most excellent and well adapted prayer.† It is evident also, that he kept at the throne of grace, while the work was going on;— "Nevertheless we made our prayer unto our God, and set a watch against them day and night, because of them."‡ Here, brethren, is a pattern for all of us. This holy man began, carried on and ended his work, with prayer to God. This did not keep him from using other means. He was remarkably laborious and vigilant. He put his own hand to the work: he did every thing to excite others to diligence. No threats, no flatteries could start him from his post, until the work, upon which he had his heart so much set, was finished.— When he was solicited to go into the temple to avoid the attacks of his enemies, he nobly answered, "Should such a man as I flee? and who is there that being as I am, would go into the temple to save his life? I will not go in."§ It was that daily intercourse, which he had with God in prayer, which gave him this zeal and presence of mind. It was owing to this, that he was so superior to the power, malice and intrigues of his enemies, and the enemies of the peace of Jerusalem. Such a man was remarkably fitted for the great work of building up the walls of Jerusalem.

—"O rise some other such!"

The book of Esther will help to establish this point, That prayer is a weapon peculiar to those, who fight under Immanuel. Haman sought the destruction of Mordecai and of all the Jews throughout the Persian empire; and for a while every thing seemed to favour his wishes. He had obtained a decree for their entire destruction, in that kingdom, where it was a fixed maxim of the government, that no decree once passed, should, on any account, be reversed. He now felt sure of his prey, like the ravenous wolf, which has the tender, defenceless lamb already in his paws. In such a critical moment, what could Mordecai and the feeble Jews do? Blessed be God! some of them knew the way to the throne of grace. They knew a King, who could alter the laws even of the Medes and Persians. They agreed to keep a fast of three days, which time was no doubt devoted to confession of their sins, and supplication for God's unmerited mercies; particularly for the special interposition of his Providence to rescue their devoted nation from the jaws of a devouring monster. Prayer was almost the only weapon, with which the y

* Nehem. i. 4. † Nehem. chap. ix.

‡ Nehem. iv. 9.—see also 4th and 5th verses—see also chap. vi. 9. "Now, therefore, O God, strengthen my hands."

§ The whole book of Nehemiah is calculated to stir up a spirit of prayer, to strengthen the weak, to animate the languid, and to lead the desponding Christian to hope in God. For this purpose let it once more be read.

could oppose their enemy; and with this they triumphed gloriously. Haman was hung on the high gallows, which he had prepared for Mordecai; and the day, in which the Jews were to be destroyed, was a gloomy day to their enemies. How wonderful are the ways of the Most High! What honor does he put upon his praying servants!

Daniel and the three children were eminent for devotion. By prayer, they baffled all the efforts and wiles of their enemies. It seems, their enemies discovered that holy weapon, through which they were invulnerable, and they sought to wrest it out of their hands.* But in vain do tyrants make laws to prohibit the children of God from praying. They may put them into a fiery furnace—they may put them into a lion's den, but they cannot stop them from praying. As a boiling spring must boil over; so a gracious soul must flow out in prayer and supplication with thanksgiving to God. The enemies of religion put the feet of Paul and Silas in the stocks; but the gracious affections of their hearts they could not confine—even at midnight, they prayed and sang praises to God. Prayer is something, which the world cannot give nor take away. "Blessed is the man, whom thou chooselt, and causest to approach unto thee."

(To be continued.)

Observations on the parable of Dives and Lazarus; especially on this passage, I pray thee therefore, Father, that thou wouldst send him to my father's house: for I have five brethren, that he may testify unto them, lest they also come into this place of torment.
Luke xvi. 27, 28.

* Daniel iii. 12. and vi. 4.—9.

THE parable of which these words are a part, is replete with interesting and solemn instruction. It brings the two worlds, heaven and hell, with their respective joys and sorrows, into the most clear and affecting view. It teacheth the immortality of the soul, and the future happiness, or misery of men, according to their moral character. That the soul will exist after its separation from the body, in a state of incalculable bliss or woe; and that death translates it instantaneously into one or other of these states. The beggar died, and was carried by angels into Abraham's bosom. The rich man also died, and was buried. And in hell he lift up his eyes being in torments. The parable also teacheth us, that the state of mankind in the invisible world is unalterably fixed. There is no possibility of exchanging it for another. The language of Abraham to his apostate son was, Between us and you there is a great gulf fixed: so that they which would pass from hence to you cannot; neither can they pass to us, that would come from thence. It gives us also a striking representation of the astonishing changes which a few moments may make in the state both of saints and sinners; and how wonderfully different it may be in different worlds. The saints are instantaneously translated, from the depths of poverty, pain and wretchedness, into the paradise of God, into all the dignities and beatitudes of the father's house. From the cross and the faggot, from beggary and contempt, at the gates of the rich, they are exalted to crowns and joys in heaven. But the wicked go from their gilded domes, their downy beds, scarlet, fine lincn and sumptuous fare to the pit of destruction, are wrapped with flames, and lift up their eyes in torments. The saints who had their evil things in this life: will be comforted in the next; and the wicked whose eyes stood out with fatness, and who had more than heart could wish, will be tormented.

But that which it is now more especially designed to notice, as of most serious and singular moment, is the prayer of the rich man, in the quenchless flame, that his brethren might be warned not to come into the same place of torment, and be eternal companions with him in his dark abode. He found his torments to be unutterable, and that he could obtain no relief or mitigation of them; not a drop of water to cool his burning tongue. He was therefore anxious to prevent the increase of them. He was compassed with tormentors already and trembled at the increase of their numbers. He knew his brethren had been most intimately connected with him in his sins, that by his infidelity and horrid example, he had been leading them to destruction, and done them immense injury; and that they above all other persons could witness against him, expose him to shame and eternally torment him. These are the only reasons to be assigned for his desire to prevent their coming into that place of torment. There is no benevolence, or holy love in hell. Were men holy they would be saints, and dwell in heaven, and not with devouring fire. Men have no natural affection in hell. Some in this world arrive at such a degree of wickedness as to have none;* much less will they have any in hell. The divine oracles teach us, that from him that hath not, shall be taken away even that which he hath; or even that which he seemed to have.† That is from such as have no grace, no faith or love, from them shall be taken away all those gifts, all that humanity, natural affection, and whatever had the appearance of good in them. All restraints will be withdrawn from them, and they will, like the infernal spirits, be abandoned to all evil. They will be implacable haters of God, his glory and kingdom. There will be no principle within them, by which they can be induced to seek the holiness and happiness of men. The request of the miserable Dives therefore respecting his brethren, was wholly selfish. It originated in his fears that they would increase his torments. A consciousness of his neglect of the duties he owed those near relatives, and of the injuries which his wicked examples had done them, harrowed up his very soul, and was a dreadful source of his agonies. It increased the gnawings of the undying worm, and administered fuel to the devouring flame. Apprehensions that they might soon arrive, to testify against him all his wickedness, and with that implacable hatred and revenge which a sense of the immense injuries he had done them might inspire, to reproach, execrate and torment him, filled him with the most dreadful alarm. The divine Saviour, before whom hell is naked and destruction hath no covering, knew how perfectly to represent the case; and, for the warning of near relatives, friends, and accomplices in sin, has given them these intimations, that they will be the greatest tormentors of each other in the future state. This, it is apprehended, is clearly the doctrine of this interesting passage.

* Rom. i. 32. 2 Tim. iii. 3.

† Math. xiii. 12. Luke viii. 18.

There are various considerations which may serve to corroborate this point. The near relation in which brethren and sisters, and other relatives and friends stand to each other, the peculiar endearments which subsist between them, the special advantages and opportunities which they have to do each other good, and mutually to promote one another's spiritual welfare; in conjunction with the commands of God, enjoining upon them all relative duties, must, beyond all calculation, enhance their guilt in neglecting them; and of being, by their errors and wickedness instrumental of each other's perdition. God will render to them according to their deeds. They will have a most affecting knowledge of the magnitude of their offences, and of the injuries which they have done to each other. A consciousness of these will continually press them with the most intolerable shame and anguish. The presence of those whom they have thus injured and destroyed, will keep alive and more deeply impress this consciousness. It will incessantly and eternally increase and give edge to their self-reproach and self-condemnation. Such friends who have destroyed each other, will be everlasting monitors of each other's wickedness. Thus they will blow up the flame and increase the torment.

Further, none can so disclose all the wickedness of one another, as those most acquainted with each other, and most intimately connected and leagued together in courses of sin. They can most clearly and fully bring it into view, most positively witness against it, in all its ingratitude, baseness and aggravations. They, above all others, will therefore be able to publish their crimes, and forever to paint them in the most degrading and hateful point of view, and to be putting a sword into the hands of all the powers of darkness, to wound and torment them. They can, above all others, not only harrow up each other's consciences, but furnish all the infernal legions with materials for the same infernal work, and rouse them to action.

Besides, the mutual injuries which they will now know, that they have done each other, how they have deceived, blinded and hardened each other in sin, how they have tempted, beguiled and like infernal spirits, urged one another on to the burning pit, will eternally blow them up to the highest possible degree of hatred, revenge and rage against each other. The company, and even sight of each other, like that of the most inveterate and implacable enemies will inflame their mutual rage and miseries. Their mutual hatred and tormenting of each other will for ever keep alive, and increase the torments of their infernal prison.

Some profitable remarks may be made on these representations.

1. That the poorest and most miserable saints are blessed. They are not only pardoned, adopted and made heirs of all things; but they shall soon exchange their beggarly garments for robes of righteousness and joy; their indigence and hunger, for feasting and fullness; their sores, sicknesses and pains, for health, ease and pleasures for ever more. O indigent, afflicted christian, take courage, lift up thine head and sing, hallelujah! A spark of grace, even with poverty, reproach and pain, is better than all the gold, scarlet and sumptuous fare of the wicked. Be patient, contented, and bless God for his grace, and you shall be comforted : and your joy shall no man take from you.

2. That there is no just ground to fret at the prosperity of the wicked, or in the least degree to envy them, in their most glorious state. After all, it shall be ill with them. They have their portion in this life. It is unsatisfying and momentary. When the wicked spring as the grass, and when all the workers of iniquity do flourish ; it is that they shall be destroyed for ever. This night their souls may be required of them.* Then whose will be their scarlet, fine linen and sumptuous fare. To whom will they flee for help ? And where will they leave their glory ?

3. That hell must be a place unutterably dreadful, as there all are tormented with the burning flame ; as there is no relief ; not a drop of water to cool a scorched tongue ; as the state of all is unalterably fixed ; and thence is no possibility of escape. How must it be rendered still more tremendous, in that there not only satan and all his infernal legions will be tormentors, but even brethren, sisters, all friends and associates, who have lived and died in sin will also unite in the dreadful employment ? Yea, will be among the most enraged, and terrible tormentors of one another ? So much the more as they have lived together in delicacy and pleasure ; so much the more as they have been leagued together in jovial clubs, mocking at sin ; reproaching good people ; concerting plans to destroy their influence ; setting up a laugh against the scriptures, blaspheming the Saviour, and animating each other in sin, so much the more torment and sorrow will the Lord give them. So much the more will they give one another. Wo unto you that laugh now : for ye shall mourn and weep.

4. How cautious should brethren, sisters and other near relatives be of injuring each other, by vicious lives and bad examples, least all their mutual endearments, their influence with each other, and the whole tenor of their living should terminate in endless sorrows ? Where persons are united in the tenderest ties of nature, they have great influence with each other, and their bad examples will have the most deadly tendency. A sensual, wanton, gambling, wicked brother, or sister, may ruin a whole family. Wicked husbands may destroy their wives, entail the curse of the Almighty upon their posterity, unto the third and fourth generation, and be instrumental of their mutually and eternally execrating and tormenting one another.

5. It is a natural reflection, that it immediately concerns all near relatives and companions in sin, who live at ease, in wealth and pleasure, most seriously to contemplate what the end of these things will be. Yes, that they behold the miserable Dives lifting up his eyes in torments :—Hear his unpitied groans, and unavailing prayers : Contemplate his fixed, unalterable condition, and know, that except they repent, they shall all likewise perish.

BOANERGES.

An account of a work of divine grace, in a revival of religion in the town of New-MARLBOROUGH (Mass.) in the year 1799 ; communicated to the Editors by the Rev. JACOB CATTIN.

GENTLEMEN,

AMONG the wonderful and glorious works of God,

* Psal. xcii. 7.

that of divine grace, in the conversion of sinners, holds the first rank. In compliance with the wish of many, I have concluded, very briefly to give a general statement of the late work of divine grace among the people of this parish.

In the summer and fall of the year 1783, which was previous to my ministry and acquaintance in this town, there was a very considerable revival of religion; the happy fruit of which was, that nearly fifty were added to the church. This was the first special and visible work of divine grace, after the settlement of the town, a term of about forty years.

In consequence of this revival, lectures and conferences were frequently attended, for several years. This was the pleasing state of things, until, and after my settlement in the gospel ministry, which was in the summer of 1787.

Attention to things divine had, by this time, however, greatly declined, and a growing inattention, among the body of the people, was manifest, for about ten years.—During this interval of special divine influence, sad were the scenes of controversy in town, respecting the location of a new meeting house; and in the church, respecting discipline and practice.

When all these evils had subsided, and infidelity, which had been, formidable, in troublesome times, in a great measure disappeared; there was discoverable, in serious professors, an uncommon concern for the welfare of Zion. Near the beginning of the year 1797, it was privately contemplated by serious members of the church, to set up a religious conference, to be attended, at least, once a month. The plan was proposed to the church; and it was recommended to individuals to use influence to persuade their connections and neighbours to attend. The conference was small in the beginning, but constantly increased, during that and the following year. In the winter of 1798, we had, in different neighbourhoods, two, and often three crowded conferences in a week, eagerly attentive to the discussion of bible doctrines, and the explanation of difficult passages of scripture. This, together with prayer and singing, was the whole business of our conferences; and some people attended, even for years, merely as to a school for improvement in knowledge. But it is apprehended, that there was an uncommon spirit of prayer among a few, for the outpouring of the spirit of God. Not more than five or six hopeful conversions had been manifested in the parish for ten years; and the chief of these were within the first year, after the serious resolution of attending conferences.

But in the month of October 1799, after all means had seemed to become unsuccessful, and prospects had become very gloomy, it pleased God to manifest his glorious power, in arresting the attention of multitudes, not merely to dry speculations, but to the vast concerns of their own souls.—Though it is to be acknowledged, that, under the greatest pressure of conviction, we generally discovered the most solemn attention to the doctrines of total depravity, election, regeneration, atonement and pardon by the blood of Christ, &c.

The agitation of people's minds was not very visible, under their convictions; nor did we discover any thing which borders on enthusiasm, in those who obtained a comfortable hope of reconciliation to God, through Jesus Christ. We think, that the appearances of persons who were subjects of divine influence, were not ostentatious, but serious. Difficulties we had to encounter, as is commonly the case, on similar occasions. About this time, originated the greatest exertions to propagate the doctrines of universalism. The prospect of success in these exertions was for a season, very threatening. There were many besides, who viewed awakenings in an unfavorable light; and were induced from appearances, to neglect the house of God, and even to speak reproachfully of what we considered as the work of the Lord.

Under these circumstances, it is easy to conceive, that our assemblies on the Lord's day were not increased, though our conferences were greatly crowded. All our hope, therefore, that the church and society would be supported, depended on a belief of the doctrine of divine sovereignty. This doctrine became very precious in those days of trial; and to this we found many stubborn enemies converted.

As visible and hopeful fruits of this glorious visitation of divine grace, about fifty-five have been added to the church; and several more have been added in consequence of a revival of their hopes of an earlier date. Sixty-six is the number added, since the beginning of the late revival.

It is remarkable, that by examination for admission to the church, it has appeared, in many instances, that serious impressions began, one, two, or three years before any visible appearance of awakening; and, that these impressions were concealed, in some instances, even from bosom friends, until after a hope was entertained of saving conversion to God.

It is now more than a year and a half, since there has been a visible abatement of serious impressions; and an increase of that stupidity and vanity, for which mankind are notorious. But, in a review of past scenes, and past events, it is hoped, that some among us feel the importance of walking in the path of the just.—Conferences are yet attended frequently; but not by large numbers. It is hoped, that Christians among us will feel their peculiar obligation and encouragement, to persevere in the improvement of this, and all other means of instruction, and it appears to be the ardent prayer of some, that God would return unto us in loving kindness, and not take away his holy spirit from us.

JACOB CATLIN.

New-Marlborough, }
March 4, 1801. }

Memoirs of Mrs. REBECCA MILLS, consort of the Rev. SAMUEL MILLS of Chester, in SAYBROOK, CONNECTICUT; and Extracts from her writings.

MRS. MILLS was the daughter of Col. John Belden of Wethersfield, Connecticut. She was born A. D. 1764. From her infancy she discovered a tender and lovely disposition, which endeared her earliest years to her valuable acquaintance. She was very respectful to her parents—her grandparents also, who lived to advanced age, found the tender assisting hand in this grand daughter. Her youth was adorned with becoming sobriety. She was very assiduous to obtain a good education, and to promote the learning and good conduct, of a younger brother and sister.

Her father once moved with his family into a retired situation:

this proved a great trial for a season to this daughter, as she was, by this removal, deprived of the society of a large circle of acquaintance, whom she highly valued. But while she lived in this retired place, she found as she conceived, that solid peace "which the world cannot give, nor take away."

While here, she spoke of having her eyes opened, on a certain morning, when walking^b out into the field, to behold the glory of God. All his works seemed to her to praise him, and her soul was drawn forth in admiration and love. From this time, she was led to a particular love and attention to the great affairs of religion.* She soon viewed it her duty, to name the name of Christ, and to come to his table.

On the Lord's day previous to her partaking of the holy supper, she heard a discourse concerning the new-birth.—She examined with close attention, and hoped she found some good evidence in herself, that she had experienced this blessed change. She continued ever after a faithful attendant on public worship, and the Lord's supper.

Her father soon returned to his former seat at Wethersfield; but died not long after, with the consumption—her mother followed him within two years after the death of her husband.

Now was this affectionate and bereaved daughter sorely pressed with heavy sorrows! She being

* The writer of these memoirs, has not been able to obtain a particular account of her exercises while under conviction, or before she received comfort—but so far as he can learn, she had been for a considerable length of time, under serious thoughtfulness and concern for her soul. She was upwards of 20 years old, when her views of religion were altered as related above.

the eldest of a numerous family—three sisters and a brother being in their childhood. In this difficult situation, she conducted with surprising discretion—doing the duty of a parent as well as sister—she kept the family together in peace and tenderness—promoted the unfinished education of the young sisters and brother, and labored to allure them in the paths of virtue and pure religion. She conducted as one tenderly concerned both for their temporal, and everlasting welfare.

And when God in his providence, appeared to call her to enter into the marriage relation, she parted from her little charge, as a most tender and affectionate mother would from her children. †

Her regard for religion induced her to contemplate the station of a minister's wife, as highly important. This appears not only from her after conduct while she lived; but from the following extract from her writings, dated Jan. 1, 1799.

"O God, thou who hast all ' power in thine hand—bless this
 ' new year—this new situation to
 ' my soul.—It is an important sta' tion thou hast placed me in—
 ' make me faithful in every duty—
 ' may I so live as I shall wish I had ' done, when I come to die: As
 ' my day is so let my strength be.
 ' Bless my partner, and make him
 ' a help-meet to my soul, in the ' way heaven-ward.—Make me a ' blessing to him, while life shall
 ' last. O my heavenly Father,
 ' make me faithful and my last
 ' days my best days, most devoted
 ' to thee, and when I have done
 ' with time, may I be fitted and
 ' prepared for, and received into

† She was married to Mr. Mills Feb. 1798, being about 33 years of age.

thy holy habitation, which I ask for Christ's sake."

Mrs. Mills gained the high esteem and charity of her pious acquaintance, and of the people where she lived.—Her husband in her truly found, "a wife from the Lord." She behaved towards his motherless children, with great tenderness and affection †

That she wrote much by way of diary is highly probable, as it was found after her death, that she had ordered a sister, to burn up a large bundle of her manuscripts. Only a few scraps of her private writings, are left behind. But a spirit of piety runs through all her letters to her brothers and sisters; some extracts from which the compiler purposes to subjoin to these memoirs.

Her humility and self-abasement appear in a note, Feb. '99. The text from which she had heard a discourse was, Matth. v. 16. "Let your light so shine," &c. "How was I weighed in the balance, and found wanting! How little have I done for God, and the world of mankind? How poorly has my light shone!—Come short in every duty—yet God hath kindly lengthened out my life, and given me further opportunity."

In a note, dated Oct. 25th '98, "This night do I desire to devote myself to God without reserve, to be as willing to be ruled by his mighty power, as to be saved by his mercy. O dear Redeemer, appear for me, and shed abroad thy love in my heart, that I may love thee with my whole soul; take me into thine arms of love and bless me, forgive my sins, blot out all my transgressions, from the book of thy remembrance."

† She was his second wife. His former at her decease left 8 children, the most of them small.

Among her manuscripts was found the following covenant with her maker, dated July 12, 1789.

"Incomprehensible being, who searchest the hearts, and triest the reins of the children of men.— Thou knowest my heart; my thoughts are all unveiled to thee. Thou knowest, O my God, the greatest desire of my soul is to be entirely thine. The spirit is willing and ready to obey, but the flesh is weak. O heavenly Jesus, be thou my support, my guardian to direct me aright.— Heavenly Father, in thy presence I religiously devote myself to thy service, and entirely submit myself to thy will, knowing thy all-searching eye is upon me. I renounce the vanities and amusements of the world, and choose thee as my happiness, my felicity and everlasting portion. O thou supporter of the weak, by whose power alone I shall be able to stand, establish this resolution in my soul. Put thy fear into my heart, that I may never depart from thee. Let not the world with all its flatteries, draw me from thee. Keep me in the hour of temptation, deliver me from every evil. O my God, I secretly rest in thee, through the blood of thy Son, that thou wouldest strengthen me with this resolution.

BECCA BELDEN."

The following is an extract from another covenant. "I do hereby disclaim all other ways of salvation, and betake myself to thee as my only Mediator and Saviour—I gladly accept of thee as my Prophet, Priest and King, to plead my cause with the Father, by thy meritorious death, and powerful intercession. I re-

' nounce all my own righteousness,
 ' and come unto thee naked, hun' gry and thirsty, casting all my ' cares at thy feet—implore thy
 ' aid to direct me aright.—O Lord
 ' Jesus, by thy grace I do hereby ' renounce all the enemies of the ' holy Trinity;—the world, the ' flesh, and the devil.—I do sur' render myself to thee, Father,
 ' Son and Spirit, one God, to be ' thine, and thine only. Seeing
 ' above all things, thou requirest
 ' the heart, I do now make a sur' render of mine, to thee. O Lord
 ' take it, and form it for thyself—
 ' make it entirely new—holy, pure,
 ' free from sin—put thy fear into
 ' it, that it may never depart from
 ' thee, for I have found it corrupt,
 ' wicked and deceitful, and dare
 ' no longer pretend to manage it.—
 ' O my God, I sweetly rest my ' soul on thee."

It is evident from some remaining scraps, that she was a very faithful and profitable hearer, of a preached gospel, and a devout attendant on the Lord's supper.

June 12. "Had another oppor' tunity to sit at the holy festival, to ' commemorate our dying Lord.
 ' But how frozen was my heart! I ' sought him, but I could not find ' him, as I wished—returned not ' satisfied—began to doubt wheth' er I had a right there—took up
 ' Mr. Wadsworth's guide for the ' doubting, and cordial for the ' faint—read the eleventh case—
 "Didst thou ever know a dead
 ' man hungry, or thirsty, or com' plain for want of food?" These ' words comforted my heart."

July 13. "O my heavenly
 ' Father, I have again been per' mitted to visit thy holy courts,
 ' to wait on thee according to thine
 ' appointment.—Thy word has ' been sweetly dispensed there—
 ' and glorious things have been spo' ken of thee, O city of God—

 ' praised be thy holy name my ' God, for thy mercies this day.
 ' I have relished thy word this day,
 ' and it has been sweet to my soul
 ' —Let this day ever be remem' bered by me. Bless it unto my ' soul O my God."

March 30th, 1794. "Brought
 ' again to the house of God this ' holy morning: O how good to ' wait on the Lord! Sweet has the ' word been this day to my soul."

There are several of her notes besides, which the compiler has omitted. They all breathe forth the same spirit of piety and devotion.

Let us now attend her, in her last sickness and death.

Mrs. Mills the summer before her marriage, fell into a very low state of health, and her case threatened a confirmed decline. Tho' she in some measure recovered, she ever after remained in a feeble habit. Her last illness began more perceptibly. In June 1801, she declined gradually, until about 3 weeks before her death, when the progress of her disorder became more rapid.

She endured her illness with much patience; not a murmur dropped from her lips, through the whole scene of her distress.

But in her lengthened indisposition, while she daily viewed death approaching, she labored under distressing doubts and fears, lest all her hopes had been gounded on a sandy foundation. Pious acquaintance and Christians of different denominations, who visited her, considered her as a child of God, and admired her charity;
 but while she entertained a good opinion of others, she had a low esteem of herself. She had such a deep and affecting sense of her own guiltiness and unworthiness,

she sometimes feared she should leave the world in despair. But towards the close of her life, she had some momentary relief, from particular passages of scripture; but her comfort would soon vanish, and leave her again in a state of very painful anxiety and keen distress of mind.

The morning that she departed, being August 19, 1801, was after several days and nights of great bodily distress;—extorting from her breast, continual groans. At seven in the morning she desired to be set up in her bed. She was raised accordingly, and supported by her husband. As soon as she was in this position, she ceased to groan, conversed a few words rationally, and then fell into a very ardent, pathetic prayer, for herself—in which she prayed as one that must be heard. She repeated her petition for herself,—prayed for the family—for the world of mankind; then desired to be laid down. This being done, she earnestly prayed with a distinct voice, ‘Do thou, Lord Jesus, receive me to thyself!’ When seeming to be about repeating the same words, she died away without a groan or struggle. The breathless clay forthwith resumed its tranquil appearance, and reminded the beholder of these lines:

“Ah! lovely appearance of death.

“How blest is our sister bereft,

“Of all that could burden her mind:

“How easy the soul that has left,

“This wearisome body behind.”

“The memory of the just is blessed.”

She has left behind a bereaved husband, and a promising son, about sixteen months old, whom she desired might be suitably educated, and devoted to the gospel ministry.

Here follow some extracts from her letters, which were in the hands of her brothers and sisters, at her death.

To one of her sisters she writes thus:—‘Ever dear, dear sister, ‘Your letter gave me inexpressible ‘pleasure——And especially to ‘hear that you was making the ‘great enquiry——concerned for ‘your soul——mourning for sin.— ‘How great, how good is God! ‘To remember mercies in the ‘midst of affliction——call some to ‘himself, while others go astray. ‘You ask my advice, concerning ‘some remaining doubts, in taking ‘that solemn covenant upon your- ‘self. I am not capable of in- ‘structing you, for I have much to ‘learn. But this I can advise you, ‘to have recourse to the word of ‘God; try yourself there. In ‘this sacred volume, there is a ‘balsam for every wound. It was ‘for the sick soul that Christ ap- ‘peared. “He did not come to ‘call the righteous, but sinners to ‘repentance.” If you see yourself ‘thus poor and helpless—your un- ‘done state within yourself, and ‘that there is help in no other but ‘Christ; the promises are yours. ‘We cannot merit any thing of ‘ourselves. If you feel that you ‘would freely give up all for ‘Christ; then the word of God ‘speaks sweetly for you; Christ ‘died for you.

‘Does your husband go with ‘you? How charming to see a ‘whole family walking the heav- ‘enly road! How it sweetens ‘every care, and greatly adds to ‘the happiness of this life, but joy ‘inexpressible in the life to come! ‘Do tell him the great duty in- ‘cumbent on him, as the head of ‘a family, not to neglect family ‘prayer——nor that great duty

‘ of giving up his child in baptism.
 ‘ O my friends, with this child,
 ‘ you have a precious soul com‘ mitted to your care—see to it that ‘ you do your duty, and walk be‘ fore it with pious examples.—
 ‘ May God grant the sweet influ‘ ences of his Holy Spirit upon ‘ you, scatter every doubt, and ‘ give you free access to him, thro’
 ‘ the merits of his Son.”

In another letter to a sister, dated Chester December 22, 1800, she writes thus, “ I hope you are ‘ enjoying all the sweets of health :
 ‘ If so, you have great opportunity ‘ for reading, meditation and pray‘ er. In the morning of life, im‘ prove those precious moments.—
 ‘ Not with vain books, which will ‘ not profit—but the bible, that ‘ best of books. Let it be early ‘ treasured in you mind—It will ‘ guide and direct you in every ‘ scene of life. Besides, there are ‘ many and a great variety of very ‘ excellent books, in which we ‘ may improve the mind, if we ‘ have a heart disposed for it. If ‘ we sit still, we shall perish. But ‘ there is every encouragement for ‘ us to press forward. God has ‘ promised to “ be found of them ‘ that seek him.”

‘ His favor and love are of ‘ more value than ten thousand ‘ worlds. Should we not leave ‘ all for him ? This world is a dark ‘ world without Christ. O may ‘ he be our light and life. I wish ‘ you every happiness for time and ‘ eternity.” B. M.

In a letter to a younger brother,
 June 1799, she writes, “ O my ‘ brother ! more than brother, my ‘ child ! How are you ? What are ‘ you doing ? How do you spend ‘ your time ?—Perhaps you may ‘ think me impertinent ;—but I ‘ feel interested in every concern
 ‘ of your life ;—and long to have

‘ you lead a heavenly life, and so ‘ live, as you will wish you had ‘ done, when you come to die.

‘ Rise early ; devote your morn‘ ing hours to your God, and to ‘ his holy word—there are sweet ‘ counsels and directions, that will ‘ lead and guide you at all times,
 ‘ in every duty—listen to its still ‘ small voice. Do not let the bu‘ sy world draw your feet aside.
 ‘ But O may you be kept from
 ‘ the many temptations that sur‘ round you, and be found in the ‘ way of your duty—husbanding
 ‘ your time to the best advantage—
 ‘ knowing that we are proba‘ tioners for a short space. Happy
 ‘ they, that are found with their ‘ lamps trimmed and burning, wait‘ ing for the coming of their Lord.
 ‘ My dear Brother, be found in ‘ that happy number.”

In another letter to a sister, she writes “ Many thanks for your kind ‘ favor, presented by the hand of ‘ sister B——. Your just senti‘ ments in religion rendered it tru‘ ly agreeable. O my N——,
 ‘ may you profess it in sincerity
 ‘ and truth. Find God a father ‘ to you at all times, the Holy ‘ Ghost your sanctifier and preserv‘ er. In enjoying God, you pos-‘ sefs all things that are truly valu‘ able, for time and a never ending ‘ eternity. Now you have a talent
 ‘ put into your hand, improve it—
 ‘ you are not hurried in business—‘ a great opportunity to read your ‘ bible, the best of guides—attend
 ‘ it while young, it will direct you
 ‘ in every scene of life.”

God grant that the amiable temper, and pious examples which this person has exhibited, may be imitated by all her surviving friends and acquaintance, and by all into whose hands these memoirs may come !

JOSEPHUS. !

Admonitions from the Death-Bed.

(Continued from p. 153.)

NUMBER IV.

AN aged Lady, who had passed her ninetieth year, appeared in the morning to be comfortable, except the common infirmities of age; nor were there any symptoms in her case, of speedy death. Sitting at a window, she observed her minister passing in the street and desired he might be called in. On his entering, she told him that for several weeks she had been much troubled with the apprehensions of death, which must be near to a person of her age.— Supposing she had lost the evidences of her Christian sincerity and interest in Christ, he began to bring into view such marks of trial as would most sensibly excite the feelings of her heart, and thus assist her to regain that peaceful hope which she had enjoyed for many years, and which he believed to be safely grounded in the gospel. Perceiving his design, she told him she had no special doubt of her own sincerity; that though an unworthy sinner, she could say, “Whom have I in heaven but thee;” and that she was not afraid to be dead: Also that she was not much afraid of the pains of dying; but that her fear was, lest through pain or some other cause she might do something that would dishonor Christ and religion. A fear of this appeared to have taken deep hold of her mind. Various things were said to inspire her with confidence, that he who had given her grace to live, would also give her grace to die as a Christian. She then desired him to pray with her, and particularly to intreat that God would so order the circumstances of her death, that she might do nothing to dishonor him or religion. Her desire was complied with, and her request particularly urged at the throne of grace. Immediately after this duty, he left her seated in a chair, without any apprehensions of his own, or in her friends around her, that she was soon to die.

Being a little wearied with the conversation, immediately on his departure, she retired to an adjoining bed. She was no sooner laid on the bed, than she expressed a feeling of strong pain from the crown of her head to the sole of her feet, and was instantly dead.

The event was singular. Whence came her anxiety on the subject, when there was no particular indication of approaching death, from the state of her health? Whence her concern to die as a Christian; and her spirit of prayer for divine support in that trying hour? All the circumstances, as they took place one after another, in the sight of men, appeared to be casual; but viewed in their connection after the solemn event, appear to have been the special ordering of a good God, who heareth prayer, and in whose sight the death of his saints is precious. The Lord gave to this his child the spirit of prayer, that he might answer it to the praise of his grace. She feared not to be dead, and he so ordered the circumstances of her departure, that no dishonor could come on her Christian profession, even from the frailties and weakness of a tender female constitution. It is best that God should order the circumstances of death for his people. It is not uncommon for Christians, who have a confirmed hope in the grace of God, to be anxiously concerned about the circumstances of their death. Let them, from the many instances of divine care which we see; learn to trust this matter in the hands of a wise and good Redeemer. If they will make it their chief concern and daily prayer, that God may be glorified in their death, he will be faithful to see that their prayer is graciously answered.

PRESBUTEROS.

Thoughts on the danger of being instrumental of hardening others in sin, and of aiding them in the destruction of their souls.

IN tracing the evil consequences of sin, the unrighteous ought not to stop at the destruction of their own souls; for it is often the case, that they are instrumental of bringing ruin on many others, whose souls are of as much worth as their own. Viewing their connection and influence in society, the loss of their own souls may be but a very small part of the evil resulting from their ungodly lives. The unfaithful minister, in consequence of his concealing the truth, and prophesying smooth things to the people of his charge, may go to destruction with the blood of hundreds of souls found in his skirts. The wicked parent, in consequence of his irreligious life, may lie down in everlasting sorrow, accompanied by his children, and his children's children.

Though every sinner will be taken away in his own iniquity, yet his ruin may be the natural fruit of the example or the instructions of some other person. Formed, as we are, for society, we necessarily have influence on each other. We are practically inviting each other to pursue the broad way which leadeth to destruction, or to walk in the straight and narrow way which leadeth to life eternal. As far as our influence extends in society, so far we are leading others to that which is good, or to that which is evil. We are undoubtedly instrumental of forming each other's characters for eternity. This is a most solemn thought! Considering our relation to our families—to our neighbours and to all our acquaintance, the loss of our own souls may be as nothing, compared with the evil which may come upon others, as a fruit or consequence of our wickedness; and yet, they be taken away in their own iniquity.

Every person who indulges himself in the practice of sin, whose conduct evidences that he has no fear of God before his eyes, may be considered as being infinitely mischievous to the souls of his acquaintance. It is true, God may interpose, by his power, and prevent the mischief. But what if he does?—What if God by his almighty grace, prevent others from being ruined by his wicked example? Surely no thanks will be due to this ungodly person, nor will his criminality be lessened. We are to look upon that as being the natural tendency of sin, which would appear to be its tendency, if God did not interpose and prevent its mischief. Considering the corruptness of the human heart, it is no less dangerous to set bad examples before our families, and before our neighbours, than it is to drop fire where there is a quantity of combustibles. In both cases, evil will follow without some special interposition. Depraved men are wise to do evil. They may easily be influenced to forget God, to trample upon Christ, and to break his laws. All this is natural to them. Only let divine restraints be taken off, and nothing will be too bad for them to be taught.

That head of a family, who lives in the neglect of family-prayer, does the same as to tell his children, that they may dispense with prayer. He gives the same instruction to his neighbours and to all who are acquainted with his practice. His example, as far as it is known, influences others to forget God, and to live without God. He exhibits evidence of not being afraid of aiding his family and others in the destruction of their souls.—That person who neglects public worship, and who pays little or no respect to God's holy sabbath, spending it in carnal rest, or in performing unnecessary labor, does no better than to tell his family and his neighbours, that public worship is of no great consequence, and that a strict observance of the sabbath may be dispensed with. His example is calculated to have a most pernicious influence on their souls. Placed, as he is, at the head of a family, he is a blind leader of the blind. That he ought to have influence in his family, all will admit; but while he is so regardless of the word and institutions of God, his influence operates directly against God. He tramples the religion of Christ under his feet, and teaches others to do the same.

They, who have been convinced of the worth of souls, feel that their example, as others are respected, is of great consequence. When they have any proper feelings on this subject, they are constrained to look diligently lest any one, through their means, should fail of the grace of God. God has given the benevolent some sight of their own lost state, and they know how to pity others. They are afraid of being instrumental of hardening them in sin. They are afraid that the blood of the souls of their partners in life, their children and their neighbours may be found in their skirts. Convinced that God makes use of means to harden men, as well as to arouse and awaken them, they know that whenever they yield to sin, they countenance and support it in the view of others, and if God do not prevent, this will certainly be a mean of hardening them.

In the application of a subject of this nature, men cannot be too critical, because it concerns their daily practice, and in matters too, in which their future peace, and the future well-being of those who are capable of being influenced by them, are deeply interested.

H.

Religious Intelligence.

Extract of a letter from a pious woman in NEW-CONNECTICUT, to her parents in this state, dated AUSTINBURG, September, 1801.

“HONORED PARENTS,

“I IMPROVE a favorable opportunity to inform you how we get along in this wilderness.— We arrived the 21st of July, and found the inhabitants of our settlement in general well. They all appeared to welcome us here, and to rejoice that the Lord had made our way prosperous. Bloomfield Church was the last that we passed, and we hardly found a Christian or any appearance of religion till we came to this settlement. The first sabbath after our arrival, we attended meeting; and to see our little assembly, which consisted of about fifty persons, meet with so much solemnity, was matter of so much joy, that I almost forgot the privileges I had left behind. Mr.

Robbins* letter was read, which brought to mind our worthy pastor, and deeply affected the hearts of all, even those who were strangers to him; so that it was with difficulty the last prayer was made. We have very good meetings. There are several people who assist in the service, who appear to have the gift as well as the grace of prayer. At our meetings a sermon is read, and we have good singing. Our assembly is solemn; Christ appears to meet with us, and we almost forget we are in the wilderness. It is true we do not hear what God is doing in other places as we used to do; yet we have the consolations of religion in relying on his word, that he is carrying on all his designs. I wish our friends would continue to pray for us that we may be prospered; that we may have pious inhabitants come in, and that God would plant a church here and water it with heavenly dew;—that one branch of Christ's Church might arise here and shine, and that the gates of hell may never prevail against it.

“The Rev. Mr. Badger, the Missionary, preached here August 9th, the first sermon that was ever preached in this place. His text was Acts viii. 5, 6, 8. He was very much admired, and appears deeply interested for the welfare of the people in these new settlements. On Tuesday he preached a lecture and catechized and instructed the children. On Thursday he preached again from Colossians ii. 6, a sermon particularly adapted to those of his hearers who were Christian professors. He remind them of the privileges they had enjoyed before their removal into the wilderness; pointed out to them the danger of their present situation, and exhorted them to speak often one to another. After meeting he conversed with our leading men respecting establishing a church, and drew up the form of a covenant for the purpose. Since then the people have had several conferences on the subject, and have agreed to have a church established on Mr. Badger's return from the Indians. I must close my letter with asking the prayers of our Christian friends, for we are indeed a little feeble band.”

* Many of the settlers of Austerburg removed from Norfolk, in this state. Mr. Robbins, pastor of the church in Norfolk, last summer addressed a pastoral letter to them, which is the one alluded to above.

Extract of a letter from one of the Connecticut Missionaries in VERMONT, dated WATTSFIELD, October 6, 1801.

“The open door for Missionary labors in this state far exceeds my expectations. The country is large and rapidly settling. There are some eminent Christians in every place, and in many towns there are awakenings. At Essex, Westford and Swanton, the appearance is like many towns in Connecticut, the beginning of the year 1799; and the work is perfectly the same. God has greatly smiled on the labors of Missionaries, in these parts, and I trust that neither the Missionary Society, nor the good people who contribute and pray, labor in vain. There is more business than ten Missionaries can do on this side the mountain, north of New-Haven. “And the sound of a going is heard in the top of the mulberry trees.”

MISSIONARIES.

Nov. 5. The Rev. Ezekiel J. Chapman, entered on a mission to New-Connecticut.

ORDINATIONS.

Ordination of the Rev. Ezekiel J. Chapman.

At a Meeting of the Association of Tolland County, convened, by adjournment, in the first Society of Hebron, October 27th, 1801.—Present,—Rev. Mess'rs John Willard, Amos Bassett, Royal Tyler, Nathan Gillet, Diodate Brockway and Ephraim T. Woodruff.

The Rev. Nathan Williams, D. D. Moderator of the Association being absent, the Rev. John Willard was chosen Moderator.

A Letter from the Committee of Missions, appointed by the Trustees of the Missionary Society of Connecticut, addressed to the Association was read, in the words following, to wit,

At a Meeting of the Committee of Missions, appointed by the Trustees of the Missionary Society of Connecticut, holden at Hartford, October 13th, 1801.

Voted, That application be made to the Association of Tolland County to ordain to the work of the gospel ministry, with a particular reference to his laboring as an Evangelist in the new settlements, Mr. Ezekiel J. Chapman, a licentiate from their body; and that for this purpose the following letter be transmitted to said Association.

To the Association of Tolland County, to be convened at Hebron the 27th of inst. October.

Whereas the Trustees of the Missionary Society of Connecticut at their session the 2d of September last, passed a vote in the words following, to wit,

“Voted, that if the Committee of Missions, during the recess of

“the Board, should appoint a Candidate for the Ministry, a Missionary to New-Connecticut, the said Committee request the Association where said Candidate was licensed, to ordain him to the work of the gospel Ministry, particularly as an Evangelist, previous to his entering on his mission; and that the Rev. Mess'rs. Levi Hart, D. D. and Cyprian Strong be requested to attend, as a delegation from this board, and assist in the ordination of said Candidate, if upon examination he should be judged qualified for the work.”

And whereas the Committee of Missions have appointed Mr. Ezekiel J. Chapman, a Candidate for the Ministry, licensed by you, to go on a mission to New-Connecticut, the said Committee, in pursuance of the above vote of the Trustees, hereby request you to ordain the said Mr. Chapman, if upon examination you should think him qualified for the work of the ministry; and that you admit the Rev. Mess'rs Levi Hart, D. D. and Cyprian Strong to sit in council with you and assist in the ordination, as a delegation from the Board of Trustees. The Committee also request, that, in case you should proceed to ordain Mr. Chapman, you transmit to the Trustees a certified copy of the minutes of your proceedings on the subject, that they may be lodged among their files.

In the name and in behalf of the Committee of Missions,
ABEL FLINT, Secretary.

Whereupon Voted, that the Association resolve themselves into an ordination Council, for the purpose specified in the above letter from the Committee of Missions; and that the Rev. Mess'rs Levi Hart,

D. D. and Cyprian Strong, who are present, be invited to sit in council with the Association, pursuant to the request of the Committee of Missions.

The Rev. Messrs Abel Flint and Amasa Porter, being present, were also invited to join the Association as an ordaining Council.

The Rev. Amos Bassett, Scribe of the Association, requesting to be excused from officiating as Scribe on the present occasion, the Rev. Abel Flint was appointed Scribe of the Council.

The Council was then opened with prayer by the Moderator.—The Council proceeded to examine Mr. Chapman, respecting his knowledge of the doctrines of Christianity,—his belief in those doctrines,—his ability to teach them to others,—his experimental acquaintance with the truth,—his views in entering on the work of the ministry,—his qualifications for a missionary, and his motives for entering into that service, and gaining full satisfaction on these points,—Voted unanimously to consecrate him to the work of the ministry, with peculiar reference to his laboring as a Missionary in the new Settlements in the United States of America; and that the solemnity of his ordination be attended at the Meeting house in this place to-morrow at half past ten o'clock, A. M.

Voted, that the several parts of the ordination service be performed by the following persons,—the Rev. Royal Tyler to make the introductory prayer; the Rev. Levi Hart, D. D. to preach the Sermon; the Rev. Cyprian Strong to make the consecrating prayer; during which the Rev. Messrs John Willard, Levi Hart, Cyprian Strong and Amos Bassett to lay on hands;—the Rev. John Willard to give the Charge; the Rev. Amos Bassett to give the Right Hand of Fellowship; and the Rev. Amasa Porter, to make the concluding prayer.

Passed in Council,

Attest,

ABEL FLINT, Scribe.

On Wednesday October 28th, 1801, The Rev. Ezekiel J. Chapman, in pursuance of the above vote, was solemnly consecrated to the work of the ministry.

After the minutes of the Council were read, the following questions were put:

Question 1. To the Rev. Cyprian Strong. Mr. Strong, do you, Sir, in the name of the Committee of Missions, now publicly renew their appointment of Mr. Ezekiel J. Chapman, as a Missionary to the new settlements, and their request that he be consecrated to the work of the gospel ministry as an Evangelist?

Answer. I do.

Q. 2. To Mr. Chapman. Mr. Chapman, do you now publicly accept of your appointment as a Missionary to the new settlements, and do you consent to receive ordination with that view?

A. I do.

Q. 3. To the Moderator. Mr. Moderator, do you, Sir, in the name of this Council, approve of Mr. Ezekiel J. Chapman, as qualified for the work of the gospel ministry, and for the Missionary service?

A. I do.

Q. 4. To the Moderator. Shall the ordination solemnity now proceed?

A. It shall.

The customary religious services were then performed. Doctor Hart preached from Acts xxvi. 16—18.

Ordination of the Rev. Samuel Leonard.

ON Wednesday the 21st of October, the Rev. Samuel Leonard, was ordained to the work of an Evangelist, at Richmond, Massachusetts, with a view to Missionary labors. The Rev. John Morse, of Green-river (N. Y.) made the introductory prayer; the Rev. Alvan Hyde of Lee, preached the sermon, from 1 Tim. iv. 16; the Rev. Thomas Allen of Pittsfield, made the consecrating prayer; the Rev. Dr. West of Stockbridge gave the charge; the Rev. David Porter of Spencertown (N. Y.) gave the right hand of fellowship; and the Rev. David Perry of Richmond, made the concluding prayer. Mr. Leonard is appointed by the Missionary Society in the County of Berkshire to go on a mission of two months into the northern counties of Vermont, and has entered upon his mission.

Ordination of the Rev. Alvan Underwood.

On Wednesday May 27th, the Rev. Alvan Underwood, was ordained to the work of the gospel ministry in the second Society in Woodstock. The Rev. Daniel Dow, of Thompson, made the introductory prayer; the Rev. Walter Lyon, of Pomfret, preached from Matt. xxviii. 20, latter part; the Rev. Eliphalet Lyman, of Woodstock, made the consecrating prayer; the Rev. Andrew Judson, of Ashford, gave the charge; the Rev. William Graves of Woodstock gave the right hand of fellowship; and the Rev. Abiel Williams, of Dudley, made the concluding prayer.

ANECDOTE,

Extracted from a scarce and valuable publication.

THERE was an Italian Bishop who had struggled through great difficulties without repining, and who met with much opposition in the discharge of his Episcopal functions without betraying the least impatience. An intimate friend of his, who highly admired those virtues which he thought it impossible to imitate, one day asked the prelate if he could communicate the secret of being always easy? 'Yes,' replied the old man, 'I can teach you my secret, and with great facility—it consists in nothing more than making a right use of my eyes.' His friend begged him to explain himself. 'Most willingly,' returned the Bishop. 'In whatsoever state I am, I first of all look up to heaven, and I remember my principal business here is to get there; I then look down upon the earth, and call to mind how small a space I shall occupy in it, when I come to be interred; I then look abroad into the world, and observe what multitudes there are, who are in all respects more unhappy than myself. Thus I learn where true happiness is placed, where all our cares must end, and how very little reason I have to repine or complain.'

POETRY.

COMMUNICATED AS ORIGINAL.

Messrs. EDITORS,

IF you think the following little pieces, or any of them, deserving of a place in your very valuable publication, they are at your service.

PHILANDER.

Lynch, (Virginia) O^c. 30, 1801.

HYMN I.

The Christian's review of his former state

1. LONG in the paths of sin I trode,
And wander'd far away from God;

By mercies and by threats unmov'd,
Tho' conscience oft my deeds reprov'd.

2. Chain'd down to earth, a willing slave,
To her vain toys my heart I gave;
A thousand disappointments found,
Yet still pursu'd the weary round.

3. The gospel oft I heard proclaim'd,
And Christ a precious Saviour nam'd;
His glory was conceal'd from me,
Because my need I did not see.

4. I heard of God's most righteous law,
But nothing of its beauty saw:
Its curse alarm'd my soul in vain;
I soon return'd to sin again.

5. To think of death I could not bear,
Because it fill'd my soul with fear:
Immers'd in schemes of earthly bliss,
'Gainst heav'n itself I clos'd my eyes.

6. Thus sinking fast to endless woe,
My dang'rous state I did not know;
Dreaming that all would yet be well,
I slumber'd on the brink of hell.

7. How great the pow'r, how rich the grace,
Which snatch'd me from that dreadful place!

No less than grace and pow'r divine
Could break the death-like sleep of sin.

8. Thy hand, O God, which form'd the light,

And pour'd it forth thro' ancient night,
Thy hand alone could make me see
And know aright myself and Thee.

HYMN II.

The Lord's-day Morning.

1. LORD, to thy house I now repair,
The house of public praise and prayer;

Let this vain world be left behind,
Nor trifling cares distract my mind.

2. O meet me in thy courts to day,
Teach me acceptably to pray;
And when I join the sacred song,
Let pure devotion move my tongue.

3. Th' attentive ear to me impart,
The humble, understanding heart;
Thy heav'nly counsels make me know,
And teach my soul to prize them too.

4. Strengthen my trembling faith, O
Lord,
Shine by thy Spirit on thy word;
Its sacred influence make me feel,
And all my unbelief dispel.

5. This dulness from my heart remove,
Reanimate my drooping love;
Let my best treasure be on high,
And ev'ry sinful passion die.

6. Then in the midst of deep distress,
When pain and sorrow me oppress,
I'll call thy promises to mind,
And there sweet consolation find.

HYMN III.

The cross of Christ.

1. BLEST Jesus! when thy cross I view,
That myst'ry to the heav'nly host,
I gaze with grief and rapture too,
And all my soul's in wonder lost.

2. What strange compassion fill'd thy breast,
That brought thee from thy throne on high
To woes that cannot be express'd,
To be despis'd, to groan, and die!

3. Was it for man, rebellious man,
Sunk by his crimes below the grave,
Who, justly doom'd to endless pain,
Found none to pity or to save;

4. For man didst thou forsake the sky,
To bleed upon th' accursed tree:
And didst thou taste of death to buy
Immortal life and bliss for me!

5. Had I a voice to praise thy name
Loud as the trump that wakes the dead;
Had I the raptur'd seraph's flame,
My debt of love could ne'er be paid.

6 Yet, Lord, a sinner's heart receive,
This burden'd, contrite heart of mine, (Thou know'st I've nought beside to give.)
And let it be forever thine.

HYMN IV.

The dying Christian.

1. THO' on the bed of death I lie
Oppress'd with pain and care,
Yet in the Lord I put my trust,
And find sweet comfort there.
2. What tho' I sink in sorrow low,
I never will complain ;
My God will raise my spirit up,
Nor let my hope be vain.
3. Sore trials now my Father sends
To prove my faith and love ;
His grace supports and fits my soul
For rest and joy above.
4. There is a glorious world to come,
I view it from afar,
Where sin and sorrow are no more,
Nor peace is mixt with fear.
5. The grave shall not confine me long,
This feeble flesh shall rise ;
Then shall I fly with raptures new
To dwell where Jesus is.
6. There free from interposing clouds Shall I behold his face ;
And endless ages be too short
To sing redeeming grace.

HYMN V.

On Time.

1. TIME flies apace,
In ceaseless race
Man hurries to the tomb,
In bliss or woe,
Ere long to know
His everlasting doom.
2. Then let thy heart,
Whoe'er thou art,

To wisdom's voice incline ;
" Use well this hour
While in thy pow'r,
The next may not be thine."

PHILANDER.

On the late Revivals of Religion.

1. HOW dreadful was our wretched state,
Ere Jesus did appear ?
Heedless of our impending fate,
We thought no danger near.
2. We took the road of sin and death,
Despis'd a Saviour's love, Nor fear nor hope, nor grace, nor wrath
Our harden'd hearts could move.
3. Thy people, Lord, did only weep ;
Sorrow had drench'd their eyes,
Had laid their faith and hope asleep ;
Their days were spent in sighs.
4. But God in mercy heard their groans,
How gracious are his ways !
Rebuk'd these unbelieving moans,
And turn'd their sighs to praise.
5. See sovereign mercy wake the dead,
And crouds of sinners rise !
The Holy Spirit on them shed,
Immortal life supplies.
6. They fix their streaming eyes on God,
Repentance in their souls,
And love, praise, wonder form a flood,
Which o'er their spirits rolls.
7. This is thy work, Almighty Lord,
And thine be all the praise.
Thine holy name shall be ador'd,
Thro' everlasting days.

MIKROS.

Donations to the Missionary Society.

From a friend of Missions,	-	-	-	10 Dollars.
From do. do.	-	1	1	10 Do.

T H E

Connecticut Evangelical Magazine.

[PUBLISHED ACCORDING TO ACT OF CONGRESS.]

VOL. II.]

JANUARY, 1802.

[No. 7.

The REVIEW of times past, and contemplations on future prospects, humbly attempted for general instruction, and to excite pious and useful meditations, &c. : Or, the Editors' New-Year's Gift, to their generous readers.

[Contin. from Vol. I. p. 250.]

REASON was given to man that he might contemplate ; and that by contemplation, he might become wise, useful and happy. The subjects of contemplation, which invite his consideration are numerous, entertaining and important. He may, with great advantage, contemplate himself, his Creator, his word and wondrous works. He may so consider his own ways as to make haste and delay not to keep the commandments of his God. The end of days and years are proper seasons for review and serious consideration. The events of years, prospects for time to come, our own particular state, our progress in knowledge, in virtue or vice, our preparation for the end of time and the commencement of an eternal state, are all subjects of special contemplation upon a New-Year's day. We will therefore upon this, as a continuation of the Review which we presented to our readers the last New-Year, invite them to a contemplation of these very interesting subjects. We shall begin with some of the events of the last year, in Europe, and with moral observations which they will suggest. We will then contemplate such as respect America, and ourselves more immediately.

At the close of the last year, the pacification of Luneville had left France, Spain and the Batavian republic at full liberty to employ their whole strength in support of the French conquests in Egypt, and against Great-Britain. At the same time the northern coalition was completely formed, and the several princes which had combined were strongly engaged to carry its designs into execution. Britain, therefore, saw all the great powers, and almost the whole maritime force of Europe combined against her. The aspects of providence with respect to her were indeed gloomy and alarming. She was under the necessity of submitting either to such terms of peace, as her haughty enemy should please to dictate, or to continue the war, until his disposition should be more amicable and conciliatory. She magnanimously determined on the latter. The armies of France were numerous and powerful. They were stimulated to action by the thirst of glory and an implacable spirit of revenge. The greatest exertions were made to reinforce her armies in Egypt, and to be prepared for a descent on Great-Britain. At the same time, the northern powers were with expedition, firmness and unanimity, preparing for their own defence and to carry into immediate effect the designs of the coalition. Britain, with a vigor and dispatch which such a crisis demanded, prepared to defend herself at home, and to annoy the enemy abroad. Early in the spring a powerful armament was sent into the Baltic. Two great events, under the divine superintendence, soon took place, which changed the whole aspect of affairs in the north.

On the 23d of March, 1801, Paul, emperor of all the Russias, the leader, most engaged and powerful prince in the coalition, was no more. Alexander, a prince of a better mind, and different politics, ascended the Imperial throne. A few days after, April 2d, Lord Nelson, in a most dreadful action of four hours, destroyed the fleet of Denmark, lying before Copenhagen, and having made himself master of the harbour, the capital of the nation lay at his mercy. These great and unexpected events broke the northern coalition. The Danes, to save their capital, agreed upon an armistice which has not been broken. By treaty, the difficulties subsisting between Great-Britain and Russia, were soon after amicably adjusted.*

* June 17th, 1801.

Nearly at the same time, when these events took place in Europe, Lord Keith, with a powerful fleet and a large body of troops, appeared near Alexandria in Egypt. Early in the month of March, general Abercrombie landed the army under his command in Egypt. The French, having collected their troops from Cairo and other parts of the country, on the 21st of March, made a well-directed, furious and persevering attack upon the British army. After a long and hard fought battle, in which great generalship, exertion and heroism had been displayed by the respective armies, and great losses in officers and men had been sustained by both, victory declared in favor of the English. The consequences were fatal to the interests of France in Egypt. Great exertions were made by the French people to reinforce their armies in that country, but the great superiority of the British navy rendered it impracticable. By the same means, the English were enabled to reinforce their army from all quarters, and, it seems, finally have captivated and brought off the whole French army. Such is the naval force of Britain that she has been able to defeat her enemies in the Baltic, to send a powerful armament into Egypt, and at the same time to blockade the principal ports of France, Spain and Holland; and to prevent any attempts of the enemy upon her own coasts. These events have finally terminated in preliminaries of peace, between the British and French nations. By these a foundation is, probably, laid for the pacification of all Europe, by a definitive treaty. This will be another great and most desirable event.

While these things have been accomplishing, and preparing the way for a general pacification, considerable progress has been made in carrying into execution the articles of the treaty of Luneville and France, Germany and Italy appear to have been progressing toward a state of rest.

Another event which claims special notice, and was probably an article of that treaty, is the re-establishment of Popery in France, Italy, and some other parts, even with a numerous train of Jesuits, an order so mischievous, so repugnant to the liberty and happiness of mankind, as, many years since, to have been suppressed in all the Roman Catholic countries. As the pope nevertheless is divested of temporal dominion, and his revenues in a manner annihilated, he must be considered as in a manner fallen. His power is circumscribed, his influence is exceedingly diminished, and his very existence is dependent on the precarious will and convenience of the first consul of France, or of other despots, who may succeed him, in the government of France and Italy.

While popery is so weakened and fallen, the Turkish empire seems to be exceedingly rent and broken, by numerous internal factions and rebellions, and rapidly hastening to a total dissolution. These are some of the principal events of the last year, which merit our notice, in Europe and other foreign parts.

These events, viewed in their connection with the extensive and bloody war which they have terminated, with the views with which it was undertaken and the manner in which it has ended, will afford many interesting observations. They afford the most demonstrative evidence, That the Most High ruleth in the kingdoms of men, and giveth them to whomsoever he will:

That in the course of his providence, for their correction, and the accomplishment of his own wise and holy purposes, he often setteth up over them the basest of men: That, in a most wonderful manner, *he disappointeth the devices of the crafty and carrieth the counsel of the froward headlong. Never, perhaps, was this in any instance more strikingly exemplified than in the progress and termination of the late European war. Not a single design has been answered, for which any of the belligerent powers professedly began it. The emperor of Germany and the king of Prussia embarked in it to assist and save the king of France, and to humble his rebellious subjects. From the high tone with which the duke of Brunswick began his operations, it appeared that he expected soon to be at Paris, and set the king and royal family at liberty; and that if any opposition should be made, he should triumphantly mark his route with blood and carnage. But instead of this expected triumph, the combined armies were obliged to retire with great loss and shame. The king of Prussia, to save himself, soon withdrew from the war. The opposition which had been made, inflamed the French people, and instead of giving any relief to the king and royal family, precipitated their destruction. The emperor of Germany, with all the assistance of his allies, has been unable to defend himself, and has been obliged to submit to the humiliating terms of a great diminution of his empire. England and Spain embarked in the war to support monarchy in France, and to preserve the balance of Europe; but they effected neither. Spain was obliged to make peace with France and even to unite with her in the war, against other nations, to prevent her own ruin, by the power and intrigue of the French people. Great-Britain, though she hath exhibited great prowess and performed wonders on the seas, hath gained nothing sufficient to indemnify her for the war. She has had hard labor and been put to an immense expense to defend her dominions, and maintain her extensive commerce. France commenced the war for the destruction of kings and despotism, and to restore to the French people the rights of men, and equal liberty. But after all her brilliant victories and success upon the land, the war has terminated in an usurper and despot; who has the lives, property and liberties of the nation more entirely at his disposal, than any monarch, who has ever sat upon the throne of France. Tho' she hath extended her territory, yet millions of her inhabitants have been sacrificed, some of her most ancient and renowned cities have been destroyed, her navy and commerce ruined, and the nation involved in an enormous debt. With respect to those bloody men who were the principal leaders of the first revolutions, God hath, in a manner no less wonderful, disappointed their designs, and righteously rewarded them according to their works. They sought their own aggrandizement, and the accomplishment of their own selfish and party schemes, and successively lost their heads, in their unprincipled career. While like wicked Haman they were climbing for glory, they came to that ruin which they had projected for others. Thus God taketh the wise in their own craftiness.

* Job v. 12, 13.

Further, it was the design of the first revolutionists to abolish the sabbath, all public worship, and the Christian religion, in the French nation. But even in this their designs have been equally frustrated. It is now found necessary, after the boasted age of reason, after all the light of philosophism and illuminatism, that France should have a religion. Its re-establishment, by the first consul, is indeed remarkable; and that he should hold the right of the former monarchs of France, of presenting persons to all ecclesiastical livings; and that the pope is to do his pleasure in approving and consecrating them to office. The aid of religion is necessary for the order and happiness of a people, even under a despotic government. Much less can any people be free, and happy under milder forms of government, without Christian morals. Further, a review of the war naturally leads us to reflect on the terribleness of the divine chastisements, and what reason all men and kingdoms have to fear before God. He corrects like himself, and is known by the judgments which he executeth. When he assumes the rod, *whats his glittering sword and his band takes hold on judgment, he will render vengeance to his enemies and reward them that hate him. He does not barely correct individuals, particular cities and nations, but a world of sinners. How have Europe and the four quarters of the earth, in the late war, trembled at his rebuke? How have the nations melted like wax before him? How have cities and kingdoms been shaken and overthrown? How have millions been swept from the earth? How have they died in a moment, in the very glory of life? What a large proportion of the earth hath been filled with blood and carnage, distress and mourning? Hath not God made his arrows drunk with blood, and bath not his sword de-voured flesh? Has not this been a righteous retaliation of the wickedness of the kings, courts, and people of Europe? Of the Roman Catholics and Turks? Has it not been a faithful accomplishment of the divine threatenings? They have wonderfully apostatized from God, been leaders in infidelity and debauchery, countenanced philosophism, deceit and corruption; and exalted themselves above God. How righteous has he therefore been in causing their wickedness to shake their thrones, depopulate and impoverish their kingdoms, and to make their subjects miserable? How righteous and how conformable to the threatenings of his word, that he should give to the Roman Catholics and the Turks, those implacable enemies, blood to drink? God hath not only shown his great power, justice, and hatred of sin, but his truth and veracity, and the uniformity of his providence in punishing the great apostacies of mankind. He punished the wickedness of the old world with an universal deluge: Of Sodom and Gomorrah with a total overthrow, by a storm of fire and brimstone from heaven: Of the Canaanites by a general extirpation: Of his own covenant people by the Babylonian and Roman captivities and dispersions: Of the Christian church by the Turks, Goths, Vandals and other barbarous nations. The great apostacy of Europe he hath punished with the late horrible war. Thus he fills the earth with his glory, and causes the wrath of man to praise him. Thus he warns all the nations of mankind that if they will do the works of apostates, they shall also be partakers of their plagues. He teacheth by his providence as well as word that obedience is the only way of safety, and that righteousness exalteth a nation.

* Deuteronomy xxxii. 41.

But how should we rejoice, that God for a moment is suspending his awful chastisements? That this dreadful war is terminated? That peace, with her olive branch, once more gives rest to Europe? O how do we rejoice for the sake of human nature, that the flow of human blood is stopped? That the doors of doleful prisons are opened to the captives, and that the distresses of millions are relieved? That thousands are returning from captivity and the horrors of war, to the bosoms of their respective countries, and to the embraces of parents and friends? What matter of joy, that millions to whom there was no safety when they went out or when they came in, when they lay down or when they rose up, may now repose themselves in peace? But how should we rejoice more especially for the sake of our fellow-Christians, our brethren in Christ Jesus, that their distresses are relieved and their condition meliorated? That they may enjoy sabbaths and ordinances in peace, and serve the Lord without fear and distraction? That the means of communication with each other, for the purposes of information, mutual quickening and joy, and for concerting the great interests of their common Saviour will be more facile, safe and expeditious? That this will afford happy advantages for the spread of the gospel, for extending the knowledge, kingdom and glory of the Redeemer to the most distant parts of the earth? In these we will rejoice. O sweet benign peace, great nurse of science, commerce, wealth, religion and public happiness, with what joy do we hail thee to our tumultuous world? To Europe, and especially to the land of our forefather's sepulchres? With what cordiality do we congratulate the millions of Europe, and especially our brethren in Christ Jesus, on this auspicious event? How does it enliven the joys of this New-Year? Our animated thanksgivings shall ascend with theirs to his throne, who maketh wars to cease unto the end of the earth, and maketh peace in his high places. From past experience may they learn the madness of war, cultivate the arts of peace, obediently and thankfully improve its inestimable blessings.

From a contemplation of foreign events let us return home, and review those of our own country. The events of the year in America have been peculiarly expressive of the divine patience and beneficence. The very providential arrival of the American squadron in the Mediterranean, while the ships of the Tripolitans lay at Gibraltar, the blockade and total defeat of that armament without the firing of a gun, the preservation of hundreds of our countrymen from the most dreadful captivity and servitude, and the retaining of so much American property as was secured by that event, merit our notice and praise. The ratification of the treaty with France, the peace we have enjoyed the past year with foreign kingdoms, and with the wild men of the American forests, and that there have been no insurrections among ourselves, challenge our religious acknowledgments. That general health and plenty have pervaded our villages, cities and states; and especially, that our churches have had rest and been edified, and that in some places the word and ordinances have been attended with unusual success, are further manifestations of the divine beneficence. The flourishing state of our schools, and especially of the college in this State, the application and good order of the students and the increase of their numbers are worthy of notice*. How numerous, great and extensive have been the public blessings of the past year? With what propriety may America adopt the language of the psalmist? Praise the Lord, O Jerusalem; praise thy God O Zion, For he hath strengthened the bars of thy gates: He hath blessed thy children within thee. He maketh peace in thy borders and filleth thee with the finest of the wheat.†

But to make these contemplations still more interesting let every one review the past year with respect to himself. I, let each one say, have lived another year, crowned with mercy and loving-kindness. I have enjoyed all this national good, with countless personal and domestic blessings! What have I rendered, and what am I rendering to the Lord for all these benefits? Has all this good led me to repentance? Has it filled my heart with gratitude and my lips with praise? Or do I live in ingratitude, and after my hardness and impenitent heart treasure up unto myself wrath against the day of wrath, and revelation of the righteous judgment of God?‡

Let the professor say, I have sworn allegiance to my Lord, his vows are upon me, and I cannot go back! Have I lived the life of a Christian the year past? Have I

* A large beautiful college has been erected the last year; and in five years the number of students has increased about one hundred.

† Psalm cxlvii. 12, 13, 14.

‡ Rom. ii. 4, 5.

paid unto the Lord my vows ? What have I done more than others ? Have I grown in grace and in knowledge, in faith, in patience, in contentment hope and joy ? Have I visited the fatherless and the widows, in their affliction, and kept myself unspotted from the world ? Have I wrought righteousness, dispersed abroad and given to the poor ? Have I loved the church of God, and exerted myself for the furtherance of the gospel ? Have I made some advancement indeed, in the habits of piety and righteousness ? And are my desires and resolutions to be the Lord's more ardent, constant and fixed ? Can I review the year with a humble hope, and the pleasing satisfaction that these have been the happy labors and fruits of it ? Or am I, O unhappy soul, like the professors of Sardis dead while I have a name to live ? Am I not among the foolish virgins who, when they that are ready shall enter in, and the door shall be shut, shall stand without and find no admittance to the wedding ?

Let the impenitent sinner say I have spent another year in sin. My long suffering Creator has kept me another year from the dark grave and the quenchless flame, while many other wicked persons are gone into them. He hath loaded me with his benefits, but I have abused all his goodness, and have apparently been living to fill up the measure of my sin. The score of my guilt is far greater than when I began the last year ; my wicked habits are more strong and fixed, I am more like the Ethiopian who cannot change his skin, and like the leopard whose spots can never be washed away, than I ever was at any period of my life before. I never before appeared so like a vessel fitted to destruction. This year it may be said to me, thou shalt die. And art not thou alarmed, O my soul ! Shall I continue in sin until I lie down in sorrow ? O let me escape for my life ! Let me fly, without a moment's delay, as the man-slayer to the city of his refuge, and as the dove to her windows, to lay hold on the hope set before me !

But what are the prospects before us ? Look forward and you will see, in the present year, many barren trees cut down, the hopes of many hypocrites perishing, and like the giving up of the ghost. Many who fare sumptuously every day will die, be buried, and lift up their eyes in torments. Many of God's chosen ones will rest from their labors and be carried, like the pious beggar into Abraham's bosom. Yes, among one or other of these numbers, may, probably, be seen some of the Editors, and many of their readers. Shall we then be idle ? Does it not behove us to work while the day lasteth ?

So far as we can understand the signs of the times, the days which are to come will be days of trouble. Iniquity remarkably abounds, and the love of many waxeth cold. New, strange and licentious doctrines almost every where are broached ; and God will visit for these things. The man of sin, though supported by consuls and kings, must totally fall ; the Turkish empire must be broken, and the long arrears of blood must be paid. Though there may be a short calm, the storm will be gathering, and the earth will yet be more terribly shaken. While therefore we behold the tumult of the people, the violence and changes which are in the earth, and the mutability of all human things, let us the more rejoice that there is a throne and kingdom which cannot be shaken ; a city wherein dwell leth righteousness. With what solicitude and perseverance should we seek an inheritance and settlement in that blessed country, that in our appointed time we may fly away and enjoy everlasting rest!

Reflections of the Editors on the commencement of a New-Year; and a serious address to their readers.

HOW momentary are the days of man? Are they not swifter than a post? Rapid as the eagle's flight when she hasteth to the prey? How soon has ever-fleeting time terminated another important portion of our lives, and borne us on to the commencement of a New-Year? Yes, solemn momentous thought! We are advanced one year further towards that awful period when we shall write and speak no more! When we shall make our bed in the dust; stand before the judgment seat of Christ, and render an account of ourselves, and of our ministry! How we have watched, labored and prayed for the souls committed to our pastoral care!—With what views and desires we and our correspondents have written and published for our readers! And how we have conducted ourselves towards God and men, in every period, relation and condition of life! With what seriousness, O our souls, should we review the years which are past?—With what shame and penitence for past sins and unprofitableness?—With what gratitude and praise for the patience and goodness which our common Father hath exercised towards us? And with what solemn attention and impartiality should we examine ourselves with respect to our preparation for that most awful moment, on which we have been meditating, when time with us shall be no more? How great and momentous are the events of a single year? What changes are made in individuals, in families, in our churches, and congregations? How many countenances hath God changed and how many people of every sex and age hath he sent away, in the course of the last year? How have we followed the young, the gay, and the thoughtless, the man of mature age, the grey headed and the babe to the grave? Nay, how many pious brethren with whom we went to the house of God in company, met at the table of our common Lord, and with whom we took sweet counsel together, have exchanged worlds, and winged their flight from this strange land to the Father's house? Yes, how many of our respective hearers are gone before us to judgment, and are witnessing for, or against us, in the eternal world? What numbers of our readers, in the past year, have been unalterably fixed with them, in the same everlasting state? View them, O our souls, rejoicing in the paradise of God, or sinking in the abyss of woe. Hear how they sing, or mourn! How are they gone, forever gone, from the instructive, warning and comforting voice of the gospel? How are our hearers and readers constantly going into the grave? How is their harvest passing away and summer ending, from week to week, from month to month, and year to year? Should not these contemplations and views awake all the solicitude and energies of our souls, and impel us to do whatever our hand findeth to do, with all our might, for them as well as for ourselves? How solemn and momentous is the work of the evangelical ministry? How dreadful must sloth and unfaithfulness be in this divine service! What supplies of grace, what abundant watchfulness and prayer are necessary, that we may finish our course with joy, and the ministry which we have received of the Lord Jesus, to testify the gospel of the grace of God? What occasion have we to address all good people in the language of the Apostle, Brethren, pray for us.

While we contemplate, that God hath counted us faithful, putting us into the ministry; and that notwithstanding our great unprofitableness and ill-desert, we, through strength obtained from him, continue unto the present time, and may once more congratulate our readers on their entrance upon another year, we confess, that we have reason to be filled with holy admiration and astonishment, at the distinguishing forbearance and goodness of God toward us. Especially, when we consider the advanced period of life to which some of us have arrived, and how many much younger than ourselves, and some who were eminent for genius, literature, piety and usefulness have been dismissed, the last year, from their labors,* it serves further to enhance the riches of the divine patience, and to exalt our ideas of the divine beneficence. That we have been thus distinguished, is to be resolved wholly into the mere sovereign goodness of God. Even so, Father, for so it seemed good in thy sight.† Not unto us, not unto us, O Lord, but to thy name, be all the glory.‡ That the people of our respective charges behold their teachers, that they are not in sackcloth and widowhood: That they enjoy general health and peace among themselves; and that mutual esteem and friendship subsist between them and us, challenge our grateful notice. All the success we have had in our ministry, in the quickening, edification, comfort and joy of our hearers; all the enlargement and spiritual pleasure we have experienced in the duties of our office, and in the duties of religion, in the closet, in the family, and in the house of God, are further arguments of wonder and praise. The success of this magazine, the pleasure we have in contemplating the great things which God has done for his churches, in publishing them, and in communicating a variety of instruction to so many thousands of readers; that they might participate in our pleasures, be with us mutually quickened and animated, and unite their joys and thanksgivings with ours, demand our praise. Indeed, whatever blessings we enjoy ourselves, whatever instruction, quickening, comfort and joy, we have been instrumental of communicating to others, or what ever good we have been enabled to do to individuals, or to any part of God's great and holy kingdom, increaseth the countless obligations we are under to be the Lord's, and constantly to glorify him in our bodies, and in our spirits which are his. These are all blessings which flow forth from his sovereign goodness and triumph over all the ill-desert and baseness of men. They proclaim the immense excellency and glory of his nature, and his worthiness of universal praise. Do not our hearts burn within us while we thus contemplate his beneficence and glory? Can we thus behold him and not love him? And not desire to praise and enjoy him? We will therefore bless the Lord at all times &

* Dr. Jonathan Edwards, President of Union-College, who died on the 1st of August last, was distinguished in all the particulars above mentioned.

† Math. xi. 26.

‡ Psal. cxv. 1.

his praise shall continually be in our mouth. Bless the Lord, O our souls, and all that is within us, bless his holy name. Bless the Lord, O our souls, and forget not all his benefits.

Thus we wish to praise the Lord, for all his patience, long-suffering and goodness to us, to the church, and the whole human race. O that men would praise the Lord, for his goodness, and for his wonderful works to the children of men! We wish our readers, our correspondents, and all who love the name of our God would unite with us, in offering all thanksgiving, and blessing and glory unto him for his own glorious perfections, and for his goodness to us, to them, to the churches of Christ in this State, in all the United States, and to the church universal! The more we love and praise God for his excellent greatness and mighty acts on the commencement of this New-Year, the more gratefully we recount the mercies of the last, and of all the past years of our lives, and the more powerfully we are led to repentance by them, the more eminently shall we begin the year with God, the more acceptable shall we be in his sight, and the more profitable shall we be to ourselves and others. In just such proportion as we begin our days and years with gratitude and praise, shall we be employed in the business, and enjoy the blessedness of Heaven. In the same proportion shall we be prepared to bid adieu to days and years, and to begin the more sublime and perfect services of the celestial city. We therefore beseech our readers to accept it as the best pledge of our brotherly affection, and as an additional effort to all our former attempts to do them good, that while we congratulate them on all the happy circumstances of the New-

Year, we also invite and stimulate them to this noble and angelic employment. It is good to sing praises unto our God, it is pleasant, and praise is comely for the upright.

Further to warm our own and your hearts, and to raise them to the highest elevations of gratitude and praise, let it be considered that every moment we live, every breath we draw, the health of our countenance, the length of our days, our friends and all our comforts of every kind are his sovereign gifts, and flow from this uncreated infinite fountain of good. In him we live, and move, and have our being. Of him, and through him, and to him are all things. To whom then, but to him shall all creatures in heaven, and on earth ascribe glory and dominion forever! All the intelligence, holiness and happiness of saints and angels in heaven, all the life, reason, beauty, natural and moral good on earth and in the seas are an emanation from him? He hath filled them both with his riches. Jesus Christ that unspeakable gift, all the pardons, peace, comfort and joys of the saved, in time and in eternity are the effects of his love. What exalted ideas must these views give us of the divine fulness, beneficence and glory? But should we proceed in our contemplations, and view all this communicated good, but as a spark to the sun, or a drop to the ocean, when compared with the essential infinite goodness of his nature, it must still, beyond all calculation exalt our conceptions of his glory, and worthiness to be praised.

His goodness as it respects men is rendered still more affecting and wonderful, from a consideration of their exceeding sinfulness. The sins of every man exceed all comprehension, both as to number and magnitude. Who can understand his errors? The sins of wicked men are numerous as their thoughts and actions. The sins of many of them are enormous and heaven-daring. Thefts, perjuries, murders, blasphemies and all abominable iniquities are found in their skirts; yet God hath patience with them, and from year to year, loads them with his benefits. If the sins of individuals are numerous and great beyond conception, how much more so are the sins of great bodies of men? Of cities, nations, and the whole world of mankind? Could the curtain be drawn, and the wickedness of one great city, only for one day be brought into view, as God sees it, how would it astonish all the living? But the sins of the whole world are all naked and open to the divine view, yet he hath patience and fills the earth with his riches. The sins of his own people are many and attended with great aggravations, yet he pardons them, will never leave nor forsake them. By no means. He will be their God, and cause them to inherit all things. O sovereign, triumphant, surprising goodness of God! Can we thus contemplate him, and not love and obey him with all the strength and desire of our souls? And not adore and bless his name forever? Can we view him ruling over all, doing good to all, and reigning forever, and not with united love, gratitude and joy, sing with the hosts of heaven, Amen, Alleluia!

Further, if possible, to inflame our own and your love and gratitude, and to awaken all our hearts to praise and obedience, let us contemplate the goodness of our common Benefactor, the last year, notwithstanding all our public and private offences, to the American States, to this State, and to us in particular. What distinguishing blessings have we enjoyed in the health, peace, plenty, civil and religious privileges experienced by the nation in general, and by this State in particular? In the continuation of the important lives and usefulness of our governor and council! Of our senators and representatives in the national congress, and of the judges of our courts? That they are all living to participate with us in the joys of the New-Year? That among the numerous clergy of this State there have been but two instances of death? That the liberality of the good people of this State, hath abounded towards their brethren in the New-settlements, and towards the Pagans of America, beyond all former precedent? That the divine smiles have attended the Missionary Society and that the preaching of the Missionaries has been attended with such happy effects? That the legislature continue to countenance our charitable designs? That the Missionary spirit, in Europe and America, continues; that the number of missions is annually increasing, and the door of faith and salvation appears to be opening more extensively to the Heathen both on the continents, and on the islands in the sea. Besides, several of our churches in this State, in the New-Settlements, and in the sister States have experienced a time of refreshing from the presence of the Lord. Their numbers, zeal, beauty and order have been happily increased. Numbers of our hearers and readers have, probably, been born and adopted into the family of heaven, and begun to live to God. Some have experienced the fresh anointings of the spirit, and been filled with hope and joy. Others have made progress in the divine life and all the habits of grace are more confirmed, and all the fruits of their righteousness increased. What immense blessings are these to enkindle our love, and awake our praise? Faith indeed may look forward to the glorious days when all God's people shall be righteous, when every destroyer shall be cut off from his holy mountain, and the whole earth be filled with the knowledge and glory of the Lord. Nay, it may look further still, and contemplate that plenitude and eternity of happiness which the saved shall enjoy in his presence, and further see his glory and worthiness to be praised. In these most comprehensive views which we are able to obtain of the glorious Jehovah, let us unite now and eternally to praise him. Sing forth the honor of his name and make his praise glorious. Live as well as speak his praises.

* The Rev. Mr. Langdon of Danbury, and the Rev. Mr. Thompson of Montville.

Praise him with the united and supreme affections of your souls. Praise him with the voice of your lips. Talk of his mighty acts, and of the glorious majesty of his kingdom. Praise him by an imitation of his goodness; doing good to all men as ye have opportunity, and especially to the household of faith: By loving the mount Zion which he hath loved; by the most spirited and persevering exertions, the most fervent and abundant prayers for the furtherance of the gospel, and its greater prosperity. Praise him by an universal obedience to his commandments in all your relations and in all conditions: By serious contemplations upon the vanity of man, and the exceeding mutability and uncertainty of all human things; and on what may be the events of the year which we have now begun: That this year you may die, or your dearest enjoyments may be removed into darkness and silence; and that great changes may be made in the church of God. In these views praise him, by numbering your days in such a manner as to apply them all to wisdom. Praise him by an unreserved submission to his will with respect to all events, whether prosperity or affliction, life or death be appointed unto you. By a holy confidence in the divine power and goodness to support you under all your labors and trials, and to prepare you for all events. By this practice of piety and righteousness, and by these exercises of faith, submission and hope, wait all the days of your appointed time until your change shall come. By thus offering praise you will glorify God. For you to live will be Christ; and if you shall die in this, or any future year it will be your eternal gain. Then, when Jesus shall say, Surely I come quickly, you will be prepared, in the language of the church, to re-echo to the solemn words, Amen. Even so come Lord Jesus.

—

On the person of Jesus Christ.

D ID the human soul of our Lord Jesus Christ exist before his incarnation?

Christ is the author of salvation for our world,—the object of the Christian faith. It is important to obtain just ideas of his perfections, that we may exercise suitable affections towards him. If our views are false, we must of course have an erroneous faith, and erroneous affections. And as error produces error, it will have a pernicious influence, and may endanger our salvation. For these reasons, the holy scriptures have very particularly revealed to us the person and character of Christ. All questions which respect him are important, and, among others, the present is not the least worthy of attention.

It is believed, for the following reasons, that the human soul of Christ did not exist before his incarnation.

1. Christ Jesus is a perfect man, possessing all the qualities of a man in union with his divine nature. This is granted in the question; but if it were not granted, it is evident from the holy scriptures. Moses speaks of him as man, when he says, "The Lord thy God will raise up unto thee a prophet, from the midst of thy brethren, like unto me." Isaiah predicts, that he would be a man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief. Paul calls him The man Christ Jesus; and tells us that he took not on him the nature of angels; but the seed of Abraham, and that it behoved him in all things to be made like unto his brethren. He often called himself The Son of Man; and his appearance in his birth, life, sufferings and death, as related by the evangelists, declare him man. There is all the evidence of his being man that there is that any inhabitant of this world is a man. Therefore, unless there is something in the scriptures to the contrary, we have no reason to suspect, but that his human soul and body began their existence, as to time, in the same relation to each other, as the souls and bodies of other men.

2. The pre-existence of the souls of men in general to their bodies is without evidence either from scripture or reason; and to believe it without evidence is absurd. Reason and scripture both contradict the supposition. The intellectual improvements of children, from infancy to maturity, are from a state of perfect ignorance, to a good degree of understanding, by a regular and gradual progress; and the appearance entirely corresponds with the idea, that the soul began its existence no earlier than the body. It proves that it did not before this begin its existence as a soul—an intelligent nature, capable of intellectual improvements; for it is manifest, that no such improvements have been made. The scriptures do also support this idea. They teach us that men shall be judged according to the deeds done here in the body. But if souls existed before their bodies, and were intelligent beings, they were virtuous or vicious—were moral and accountable agents, and of course amenable for other things than the deeds done here in the body; and therefore at the last day, merely these deeds, would not be the righteous ground of rendering judgment. Besides, men are conscious to themselves of nothing before their residence in the body: Which appears worthy of notice in determining the question, as it respects men in general. Therefore since men are not conscious of any pre-existent state of their souls, and there is nothing done before their union with bodies either virtuous or vicious, which is to come into judgment, it does not appear, that there are any ends to be answered by such pre-existence, which goes far to convince a rational mind, that there is no such thing.—Further; The scriptures assert that Adam begat a son in his own likeness, after his image, and called his name Seth. This imports, that according to a divine constitution, Adam was the cause of his existence. But the body alone was not Seth, and was not the principal thing belonging to him in which he was in the image of his father. His soul—his superior part was also in Adam's likeness and seems to have been the chief, or only thing intended in the expression. He was therefore equally the father of both. This instance will doubtless apply to his posterity in general. Thus we have no evidence of the pre-existence of souls to their bodies in ordinary cases, many considerations contradict the supposition, and it is reasonable to conclude that there was no such pre-existence.

3. If the souls of men in general begin their existence with their bodies, we have reason to believe this of the souls of all men, and of the human soul of Jesus Christ, as well as of any other man, unless there is some evidence, that in this respect, he is an exception from the general constitution of God in this matter. But what evidence have we of any such exception? It is true that the man Christ Jesus was conceived in the womb of the virgin, in a supernatural manner that he might be perfectly holy and without original taint. But it does not appear but that his existence as a creature began and was bro't to perfection, in all other respects, according to the usual course of nature. His human soul and body were subject to all our infirmities which are not of a moral kind. The idea of the pre-existence of his soul is very inconsistent with the history of his appearance in his infancy and childhood, as it is given us by the evangelists. Had he appeared with all the acquirements of four thousand years spent in the presence of God in glory, even from the creation of the world, he would have astonished the world in his infancy, unless he either lost or dissembled his attainments. But no such thing is recorded of him. It is only said, the child grew, and waxed strong in the Spirit, and the grace of God was upon him,—and he increased in wisdom, and stature, and in favor with God and man. This suggests, that in early life, like other pious and diligent children, he made a progressive, tho' more rapid increase in wisdom and understanding; so that at the age of twelve years he could understand, and propose pertinent questions to the Jewish doctors. And the reason for this uncommon improvement is given, 'The grace of God was upon him.'

4. The scriptures acquaint us with the reasons, why it was necessary, that Christ should assume humanity. The reasons they assign are sufficient; and we have no right to suppose any others beyond what are written. The scriptures are our only rule in matters of faith, and especially respecting the person and offices of Christ. I know of no reasons which they assign for his taking upon him the nature of man except the following, That by his obedience and sufferings he might furnish a complete redemption for our sinful race and know how by sympathy to succour the tempted; that he might be our example on earth, our judge at the last day, and the visible head of the church in glory. The whole history of Christ, all that is said of him by the Prophets, Evangelists and Apostles, it is conceived, give us no account of any thing that he has done, or is to do in the human nature, or which requires humanity, except the above. Neither of these required the pre-existence of his human soul. Those expiatory sufferings, by which he made atonement for sin, did not commence till his incarnation. It was after he took upon him the form of a servant, that he became obedient unto death for our justification; and it was after he had offered his vicarious sacrifice for sins, that he sat down on the right hand of God, as the visible head of his church, awaiting the subjection of his enemies. Therefore, so far as appears, the only things for which the scriptures tell us his humanity was necessary, are subsequent to his incarnation; and so did not require the pre-existence of his human soul.

5. It is presumed that the history of Christ's incarnation never suggested the idea of the pre-existence of his human soul. It was probably invented to support some favorite system; and being adopted, the scriptures were narrowly searched for something to support it. A number of texts and expressions have been adduced; but none of them require the construction that has been imposed upon them for this purpose. Some of them require a very different one to be consistent with themselves, and all to be consistent with the general tenor of the scriptures on this subject, which it is believed has been already stated. These passages are few, and the principal ones will now be noticed.

One passage that is bro't to prove that the human soul of Christ existed before he came in the flesh is Philip. ii. 6—10. "Who being in the form of God, tho't it not robbery to be equal with God: but made himself of no reputation, and took upon him the form of a servant, and was made in the likeness of men, and being found in fashion as a man, he humbled himself, and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross; wherefore God hath highly exalted him, and given him a name which is above every name: that at the name of Jesus, every knee should bow, of things in heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth."—It is said that this passage must refer only to the human soul of Christ, because his divine nature could not be humbled and die; and that it refers to his human soul in a pre-existent state, when it was in the form of God; and that it must have been originally in an exalted state, or it could not properly be said to have been humbled, and to have taken the form of a servant; and that his divine nature could not have been exalted in consequence of his humiliation, because it was always infinitely exalted.

That this objection may be answered, it is necessary to premise, that the scriptures do not speak of the divinity and humanity of Christ as two persons, but as two natures combined in one person. But the objection considers these natures as two persons, and derives all its apparent force from that consideration. The objection is at once removed, by admitting the scriptural idea, that the second person in the sacred Trinity has assumed humanity, and is one person still. He humbled himself by condescending to take upon him the subordinate office of a Mediator between God and sinners, by veiling his divinity for a while with humanity in the sight of creatures, by placing himself in the form of a servant, by obeying as one subject to law, and at length offering himself up as a sacrifice for sin. All which was wro't in his own person, as God and man united. This person was afterwards exalted. His divinity was no longer shrouded by his humanity. It became manifest that in him dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily. His humiliation and sufferings had hid the foundation for the whole of his own glory, in the office he had undertaken, as Mediator and King in Zion, and for a more transcendent manifestation of divine glory than creatures had ever before seen; for the display of those perfections of wisdom, justice, mercy and faithfulness, which distinguish the gospel dispensation above all the known works of God. God was manifest in the flesh, and seen of angels in this advanced glory, in consequence of his mediatorial work. And as Mediator, he is highly exalted and made head over all things to the church, whether they be things in heaven, or things in earth, or things under the earth, that under his direction they may contribute to his kingdom of grace. And in this, as the brightness of the Father's glory, and the express image of his person, he exhibits his perfections before angels and men.

But if this passage, as is objected, related only to the human soul of Christ, as distinct from his divine nature, could it be said to have been in the form of God? Would it not have been pride, arrogance and blasphemy to have claimed equality with God? Was it no more than man that was humbled? Did humanity only complete the great vicarious atonement which furnishes salvation for a world of sinners? And is it to humanity only that every knee shall bow in heaven and earth and under the earth? But this is the construction that must be put upon it, to make it support the pre-existence of his human soul.—Besides, on the supposition that this was spoken only of the human nature of our Lord, it would overthrow itself. It exhibits not an human, nor an angelic nature, but one unspeakably above them both. It would inevitably lead us to conclude that he never became man, but only a super-angelic nature incarnate. And the equality with God, ascribed to this created nature, would on Arian principles supersede the necessity of a union with the uncreated Deity; and so carry us the whole length of that dangerous heresy. This construction of the passage goes to the denial both of his divinity and humanity, and is equally inconsistent with the whole tenor of the scriptures, and the scheme which it is brought to support.

In answering the construction imposed upon this passage, an answer is also furnished to a similar one, put upon John xvii. 5. "And now, O Father, glorify thou me with thine own self, with the glory which I had with thee before the world was." And to a like construction upon 2 Cor. viii. 9. "For ye know the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, that tho' he was rich, yet he became poor." And upon John vi. 38. "I came down from heaven." The idea that the two natures of Christ constitute but one person, removes all objections, that are grounded upon any texts, which represent him in a state of humiliation.

It has been objected, that Christ often rendered himself visible before his incarnation, and therefore his human soul must then have existed; for God is invisible. It may be replied, that so also is the soul of man. It must have been as great a miracle for his soul to have become visible, supposing it existed, as for his divine nature to have produced a visible shape, or the symbol of his presence. These appearances would sooner favor the pre-existence of a body, that is by nature visible, than of a soul. Therefore they must have been the effect of omnipotence, and the only reality in them was divine. Agreeable to Genesis xvii. 1. "The Lord appeared to Abraham and said I am the Almighty God." Rev. iii. 14. "The beginning of the creation of God." This is spoken of Christ. It is objected that it means, that the human soul of Christ was the first thing which God created. The original word for beginning is Archē, which indifferently signifies the beginning or the chief and is used in both senses in the Greek testament; and it may either import that the second person in the sacred trinity was the creator of the universe, which is a truth supported by other scriptures; or that Christ in both natures is chief or head over all things to the church, which is also a bible doctrine, and seems best to agree with the occasion on which the words were here introduced, which was to authenticate his message to the angel of the church of the Laodiceans.

But one more passage will be noticed, which is cited to prove the pre-existence of Christ's human soul. Col. i. 15—18. "Who is the image of the invisible God, the first-born of every creature. For by him were all things created that are in heaven, and that are in earth, visible and invisible, whether they be thrones or dominions, or principalities, or powers. All things were created by him, and for him. And he is before all things, and by him all things consist. And he is the head of the body, the church; who is the beginning, the first-born from the dead; that in all things he might have the pre-eminence." It is objected that this cannot respect the divinity of Christ; for it would make God the image of himself. That the expression, 'The first-born of every creature,' is not applicable to his divinity, and must denote the pre-existence of his human soul; and that this soul was the creator of heaven and earth—angels and men.

Here again the objection is founded on the unscriptural supposition, that the two natures of Christ constitute two persons. The apostle was describing the Mediator, possessing both natures in one person. He is the image of the invisible God, as in him dwelleth all the fulness of the God-head bodily.—God manifest in the flesh. And as Creator, Governor and Redeemer, it is he only who brings the perfections of God into the view of any of his creatures, in heaven or earth. By his being the first-born of every creature cannot be meant the birth of his pre-existent human soul; for that was not born, if pre-existent. But it either denotes the eternal generation of the second person in the holy Trinity, or his being the first-born from the dead, or rather expresses his pre-eminence over all creation, by an allusion to the ancient rights of primo-geniture, as its connexion apparently suggests. Besides, the passage is inconsistent with the scheme for which it is adduced. It exhibits a nature so far superior to man and even to angels, that they are all but the works of his hand, and on the supposition that it was a created soul which is here meant, it must land us in Arianism.

Finally, the supposition of the pre-existence of Christ's human soul is inconsistent with his being properly man, and like unto his brethren. An anglic or super-angelic nature united to a body would not be man; but an angel, or more than angel incarnate. It militates also against the important scripture doctrines of the sacred Trinity, and the divinity of Christ; for the same construction is imposed upon those passages of scripture, that have been noticed, which those, who deny the Trinity, and the Divinity of Christ, make use of to support their scheme. And it is said to be a project devised by Arius to enable him more effectually to oppose the doctrine of Christ's Divinity. And have not many, who have adopted this opinion, been soon led to deny, or be very doubtful of his divinity? Or to think the denial of it no very essential error? It does an immediate injury to the faith and comfort of God's people, by perverting the scriptures. And so far as this opinion prevails, we have reason to fear that the important doctrine, of the real Divinity and even of the humanity of Christ, will be gradually disbelieved. It is therefore not only unscriptural; but a dangerous heresy, because it stands connected with mischievous and destructive consequences, subversive of the glory of Christ, his vicarious atonement and the Christian faith. And because with the unsuspecting appearance of being but an harmless opinion, and even honorable to Christ, it lays an insidious train to decoy men to commit themselves on the side of infidelity, before they are aware.

MIKROS.

Reflections on the 10th Chapter of Paul's Epistle to the Hebrews, particularly the 38th verse.

[Continued from p. 216]

NUMBER II.

The Scripture character of a just man.

THE true character of the just man is of importance to be clearly understood; for if this alone be the character which infinite rectitude approves, a mistake in this point is no less awful in its consequence than the loss of eternal happiness. And yet in no one point are we more liable to mistake. In no thing perhaps are mankind, more divided, than in their views of the character of the just man. This diversity of opinions is as great, as that respecting the character of God, and flows as a consequence from it. It is congenial with the ignorance of the proud, selfish heart, blind to the infinite beauty of Jehovah's character, to call evil good, and good evil—to put darkness for light and bitter for sweet. And it is to this spiritual blindness alone as the source to which this ignorance and error are to be traced. The pen of inspiration, the light of reason and the voice of conscience harmoniously witness to the same character, as the object of the divine complacence. And yet if we affect to walk without the guidance of the former, we immediately stumble in judgment and embrace error for truth. Hence in every age of the Church, so many are found, with the Pharisees of old "trusting in themselves that they are righteous, and despising others." To all such that expressive reproof of the Saviour pointedly applies, "Ye do err, not knowing the scriptures."

The character of the just man, tho' it contains much, and in the extensive sense of scripture includes all moral goodness, may yet be expressed in few words. In the summary of the divine law we have a concise and perfect definition. "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, soul, strength and mind; and thy neighbour as thyself."—

The idea of justice necessarily implies relation. There is a certain and necessary relation subsisting between all the various orders of moral beings, and between the various beings of the same order. From this relation certain duties arise, and are as indispensable in their nature, as the relation is unalterable. Hence the ground of all moral obligation, and of the various duties which moral beings owe to each other and to themselves; I mean, the relation which they individually sustain to each other, and the place which each occupies in the system. The general division of being, is that of Creator and creatures. From this relation, duties of common obligation are binding upon all creatures towards their Creator, enforced by the laws of their creation. Among created beings, relations are multiplied and various, and consequently their duties. Justice therefore consists in acting according to truth, or the natural order and fitness of things, or acting conformably to the relation the agent sustains to the rest of the system collectively; and especially to that part of it immediately affected by the action. To act contrary to this, is to act unjustly—it is a practical falsehood, as it is a denial of the established relation and fitness of things. In a word, therefore, the character of a just man consists in rendering to every being his dues.

1. The just man renders to God the things which are his due, or voluntarily performs those duties he owes to God, as his Creator and moral Governor.—The character of God as Creator, is distinct from that as moral Governor, and may be distinctly considered. The character of God as moral Governor, is, according to the order of nature, and our conception of things subsequent to that of Creator. Hence his right to rule appears to arise from his power to create, or his having actually created. "Thou art worthy, O Lord, to receive glory, and honor and power; for thou hast created all things, and for thy pleasure they are and were created."* God's act of creation respects us only as rational creatures, produced by his power, and made capable of moral exercises and moral government. The just man will, therefore render to God his due, as his Creator—will acknowledge his hand, and his power in the formation of all things. He lives by faith; and "thro' faith we understand that the worlds were framed by the word of God; so that things which are seen, were not made of things which do appear."† He will feel and acknowledge himself to be the product of divine power, and that he is absolutely dependent for life and all things—that in God he lives and moves and has his being. He will acknowledge from the heart that God's last end in the creation of the world, was his own glory—that if he existed before creatures, and is infinitely greater than all creatures, this must be true. He will acknowledge that God had just right to create all things for himself, and the wicked for the day of evil‡ of the same lump to make one vessel unto honor and another unto dishonour—to make every creature with a view to answer his own purposes, and accomplish his own designs—to determine to display his justice upon one and his mercy upon another, according to the good pleasure of his own will, and none hath a right to say unto him what doest thou. He will therefore acknowledge God's propriety in him—his right to dispose of him as he pleases, both as to his present and his eternal state.—He hath no will, but the will of God, is cheerfully resigned to the dealings of his Providence and makes it his last end to serve and glorify him.

* Revelation iv. 11. † Hebrews xi. 3. ‡ Prov. xvi. 4. § Rom. ix. 21.

Again, The just man will render to God his dues as moral Governor, by obedience to all his commands, or compliance with all his revealed will. It is the high prerogative of God, as moral Governor of the universe, to enact a law infinitely binding upon the consciences of his creatures, for the regulation of all their exercises and actions—to sanction this law with the most heavy denunciations of his wrath against the transgressor, and promises of the most glorious rewards to the obedient. Such a law God hath given, transcribed from his moral perfections, and exhibiting the beauty of his moral character. It is also sanctioned by promises and threatenings corresponding to the infinite dignity of the Lawgiver. This law however, is not a code of arbitrary rules, making virtues or crimes of actions in their own nature indifferent, and which might have been thus or otherwise, according only to the mere will of the Lawgiver, and for no other reason: But the whole and every part of the divine law is founded in the highest reason—the most perfect equity; and it is morally impossible that it should be in the least respect different from what it is; for the law of the Lord is perfect. It will not admit of the least alteration or amendment. It does the most perfect justice both to God and the creature. It explains and enforces the eternal rule of right, or fitness of things, which was antecedent to the existence of creatures, or the promulgation of any law, and is as necessary as the being and perfections of God.—God is love, and his character is fully expressed in his law. It is a law of love, and every part of it speaks the purest good will to being.—Every act of obedience to God's law is an exercise of love to being as such, and is varied only according to the different objects or parts of being to which it has immediate respect. The rule by which we are to apportion our love is perfectly reasonable and just; that is, to prefer the greater good to the less—the universal to the limited—to love every being in proportion to his worth and importance in the system, or according to his quantity of being, and capacity of enjoying happiness. This is a dictate of reason, and is at once approved by the conscience as just and right. That law of God, therefore, which is built upon this foundation, is a most reasonable and just law. It is perfectly reasonable and right that the creature should be required to love the Lord his God, with all his heart, soul, strength and mind—for God is infinitely the greatest of all beings, and his happiness is of greater worth than that of all his creatures. He is therefore infinitely the most deserving object of affection. Hence we are to love him with the whole strength of our affections, and in the highest possible degree. The whole of our love is due to God.

Here, perhaps, a question may arise; how is this consistent with the duties of the second table—the duties we owe to our fellow-men, comprised in this "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself?" If the whole of our love be due to God, what remains for our fellow-creatures? We cannot give more than the whole?

This doubt may be easily solved. The seeming difficulty will vanish, when once we entertain properly enlarged views of God, and the immensity of his being. God is not only the source, but the sum of all being. He doth neither diminish, nor add to his being, by giving existence to creatures. Infinity can neither be lessened, nor increased. All creatures live in God, and have no existence independent of him; for it is in him, we live and move and have our beings. Love to God, therefore, is love to all beings; as the greater implies the less, and the whole includes all its parts. Creatures, then, having no being independent of God, we are not to love them, unconnectedly with him. The second command, we read, is like unto the first, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." It is a love, the same in kind, and has the same ultimate object. He that loves his neighbor as a creature of God, loves him for God's sake, as well as for his own sake, and this is as truly an exercise of love to God, as to love a child for the parent's sake, is an exercise of love to the parent.

Such is the nature, the moral beauty and excellency of the law of God. It is the rule of conduct which God himself observes both in relation to himself, and his creatures. It is an expression of the moral affections of the divine mind, and here they meet and centre with the feelings, affections and desires of the just man. God is a being of infinite justice, in acting according to his own law. There is the same reason why God should love himself infinitely, as that we should love him with all our heart and strength, and it is in the exercise of this love to himself, that he loves his creatures—as the creatures of his power, and capable of partaking of his infinite happiness. And, therefore, it is true too, that God loves his creatures as himself—that is to say, with the same kind of love, and in degree according to the worth and importance of each one in the system.

This law is the rule of the just man's conformity to God.—It also lays a foundation for his highest complacency in the divine character. He loves supremely that infinitely benevolent character, which the law expresses. He approves of the law as holy just and good. It is the subject of his daily and most delightful meditation. It is written upon his heart and every precept of it copied out in his life, in acts of cheerful constant obedience, thro' all the various duties both to God, and his fellow men. The law of love is the rule of his life. He renders unto all their dues—tribute to whom tribute is due, custom to whom custom, fear to whom fear, honor to whom honor. In all his intercourse with his fellow men, and in the various relations he sustains he exercises the spirit of his station, and has a sacred regard to that golden, universal rule of equity, "to do to others, as he would that they should do to him."—But

2. The just man, not only renders to God, and his fellow creatures their dues, but he gives to himself his due. He is just to himself.

There is more importance in this thought, than what, perhaps, may at first be imagined. It is one distinguishing mark of the just man; and certain it is, that if destitute of this he forfeits the character. Unless he does justice to himself, he does justice neither to his God, nor his fellow creatures. There are many who professedly approve of the law of God, and profess to love that character of God, which the law exhibits;—their visible conduct too is unimpeachable—none can charge them with injustice to their fellow men; when at the same time they are unjust to themselves—they refuse to render to themselves their dues. This fully proves their hypocrisy. It evidences that the law was never written upon their hearts, and that they render to no being his dues. They will acknowledge that the penalty of the law is entirely, infinitely just—that mankind are universally transgressors of the law and consequently justly deserving to suffer its penalty. This acknowledgment is perhaps but conforming to the established orthodoxy of the society to which they belong, and which from infancy they were taught to believe; it is therefore easily made in wholesale—it costs them nothing; for the fact is they have a secret reserve in their own favor, and do not bring themselves into the account. But when they really come to apply it to themselves the case is materially altered—they are so dishonest they will not own their true character—will not acknowledge the guilt, the law charges upon them, and the justice of its threatened punishment. The language of Hazaël is the reply their proud hearts will immediately suggest—"Is thy servant a dog that he should do this? I have no enmity towards my God I love my heavenly Father, who is so kind and beneficent to me, does me so much good—it is impossible not to love him, and not to feel a disposition to obey him. Some sins of ignorance and human frailty, it is true I have committed, but I am not infinitely guilty, and deserving to be eternally curst and sent to hell."

But the just man has different views of the subject. He does himself better justice. In his application of the law he is impartial. He hears it as speaking to, commanding and threatening himself as well as others. His convictions of truth begin at home. He reads them in the humble penitent, exercises of his own heart, realizing the penalty of the law, as aimed directly at himself. His heart says amen to the sentence, even tho' he should be the subject of it. He feels it is just. He acknowledges it to be right—that he is a hell-deserving creature, and divine justice would shine bright and glorious forever in his destruction. He is vile and guilty in his own view, and tho' he loves himself as a creature of God, yet he can exercise no complacency in his own character. Humility is his honesty. Pride is a dishonest exercise. Supreme, exclusive self love is the highest kind of injustice, of which a creature can be guilty. It is withholding from God, and all creatures their dues, and paying them to—myself.

3. The just man renders to Christ his dues. He ascribes to him the appropriate titles, and incommunicable character of the supreme God.—He also cordially acknowledges and embraces Christ in his Mediatorial character and offices, as God and man united in one person—the promised Messiah, the anointed and sent of God, the faithful and true witness; the light of the world, the Redeemer and Saviour of men—the King of Zion—the Lord of heaven and earth and the judge of quick and dead. He believes the record God hath given of his son—of his doctrines, miracles, life, death, resurrection and ascension—that he is seated at the right hand of God, and ever liveth to make intercession for his people—that he is continually carrying on the work of redemption by giving repentance unto Israel and forgiveness of sins, and applying by his spirit to all his redeemed, the saving benefits of his death and purchase; as the King and Lawgiver the head of all authority, and of all vital influences to his elect Church, unto whom he is made of God, wisdom, righteousness, sanctification and redemption.

Such is the high and holy character of the Lord Jesus Christ, to which the heart of the just man is conformed and assimilated. He rejoices in the manifestation Christ hath made of the divine righteousness, and the honor he hath paid to the divine law. His character and offices, cause and interest, intercession and mediatorial government are unspeakably endeared to him. Christ is precious to his soul—the object of his supreme affection—the foundation of all his hope and trust, and his only way of access to the Father. He reveres his authority, submits to his government, renders obedience to his laws, and devotes himself to his service, and thus renders to Christ the things that are his due.

These are the outlines and distinguishing marks of the character of the just man. It is but imperfectly sketched, yet may be profitably improved. Let me intreat the reader to bring the subject home to his heart in a realizing self-application of the truth. In this exercise, we shall be led to see that the character of the just man, and the happiness attending it, are neither so easy, nor so common attainments, as are by many imagined. It is a great thing to be just in the sight of God. And if God condemns us it is of no consequence to us, who else shall justify us. If God accounts us unjust, it is not the united voice of the universe of creatures can reverse the judgment, or make us just—for it is God who justifieth. If we have taken a correct view of the character of the just man, it is certain that none but the regenerate are just, or render any part of their dues, either to God, or their fellow-men. It is in vain for us to flatter ourselves that we are just, while our hearts are at enmity with God, and opposed to his character and law. We must be born of God, before we can be led by his Spirit. The heart must be made good ground before it can yield the fruits of righteousness. Let all realize this important truth, and feeling justly condemned, and spiritually slain by the law, be led by faith to Christ, who is the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believes.

ASAPH.

(To be continued.)

Prayer, a weapon peculiar to those, who fight under Christ, the Captain of our salvation.

[Continued from page 220.]

NUMBER II.

“IT is good for me to draw near to God,” said the holy Psalmist: And so says every one, who ever did draw near to God, in the duty of prayer. There is a present pleasure in it, which cannot be described to men, who have not felt it. Besides, prayer is one of the greatest means of procuring those blessings, which we need for time and eternity. We have shewn, in a former number, what victories the old-testament saints obtained over their enemies, when they fought with this their peculiar weapon. By it they slew kings, yea famous kings. One chased a thousand and two put ten thousand to flight.

Let us now look into the new-testament, and see if we cannot find something there to encourage Christians to be more abundant in prayer. No doubt, Herod that proud tyrant, who fought the life of the Babe of Bethlehem was overcome by prayer: Not by the prayers of those superstitious, hypocritical Pharisees, who stood at the corners of streets, that they might be heard of men; but by the prayers of such humble supplicants, as Joseph and Mary, Zacharias and Elizabeth, Simeon and Anna. The prayers of Anna alone were enough to counteract the malice and wiles of Herod. St. Luke says, "She was a widow of about fourscore and four years; who departed not from the temple, but served God with fastings and prayers night and day." Simeon waited for the consolation of Israel. Prayer is one thing necessarily implied in waiting upon God. These praying few, who were, at that time, scattered thro' the land of Israel, will no doubt be honored of God as the champions, who, by their prayers, rescued the infant Saviour from the hands of those, who sought his life.

Jesus of Nazareth had many powerful and bitter enemies. They were continually seeking to get something, whereby they might accuse and condemn him. At last, they came out against him with swords and staves to take him. They employed carnal weapons against him; but during the whole of his life, he used no such weapons. That passage in the 109th Psalm has a very particular reference to Christ; "They fought against me without a cause.* For my love they are my adversaries; but I give myself unto prayer." By this passage we learn how it was that Christ opposed his enemies; he gave himself to prayer. He was eminent for prayer. In this thing, he was the true antitype of David, whose prayers and praises make a most precious part of the holy scriptures. We read of Christ's spending the whole night in prayer; and of his rising up a great while before day to retire into a solitary place to pray. This, my brethren, is the man, who hath left us an example, that we should follow in his steps. In that memorable night, when his Father took off restraint, and let his enemies loose upon him, he gave himself unto prayer. He first prayed with his disciples, and then he poured out his soul to his Father in secret. He prayed and he prevailed. They came against him with swords and staves—he was given up into their hands to mock, to condemn and crucify. He fell; but when he fell, he conquered. "Who in the days of his flesh, when he had offered up prayers and supplications, with strong crying and tears, unto him that was able to save him from death, and was heard in that he feared."† The prayers and intercessions of Christ are very prevalent. In answer to them, God will bestow pardon and eternal life upon all the redeemed. It is the Father's appointed way, in bestowing blessings upon our fallen world to have respect to the intercession of Christ; "Ask of me," my Son, "and I shall give thee," &c.

* Compare this with John xv. 25.

† Heb. v. 7.

In answer to the petition of Christ, his incorrigible enemies will be made his foot-stool forever*.

Just before the blessed Jesus was received up to his Father's right hand, he commanded his disciples to tarry in Jerusalem until they should be endued with power from on high. This command they obeyed, and we learn from Acts i. 14. how they filled up the time: These all continued with one accord in prayer and supplication, with the women, and Mary the mother of Jesus with his brethren. In this way they waxed valiant to fight. A few days after, they were not afraid to tell the crucifiers of Christ, that they had killed the prince of life. They stood up against all the power of the Jews and were not afraid. They had committed their cause to God and they were confident. In answer to prayer the Spirit of God was poured out, and converts were multiplied. This increased the cloud of incense, which daily ascended to heaven. † Now the Christian army, though small, was strong. Their enemies had the greatest number of rulers, learned men and soldiers on their side—they had the jails, dungeons and stocks on their side: But the Christians had all the love, all the truth and all the prayer on their side. Therefore the word of God grew, and multiplied against all the threats and punishments, which were made use of by the enemies of the cross.

There is an extraordinary instance of the efficacy of prayer recorded in the 12th chapter of Acts. Herod killed James: And because he saw it pleased the Jews, he proceeded further to take

Peter also. He confined him in prison, and surrounded him with a strong guard, with a design after Easter to bring him forth to execution. "Peter therefore was kept in prison; but prayer was made without ceasing of the church unto God for him." This was all the church could do for that dear apostle, for whose sake many of them would, no doubt, gladly have laid down their own lives, if this could have rescued his more useful life. They would not have gone to break open the prison, by force, if they could have done it, because this would be walking disorderly. They probably could not have access to Herod—if they could, their prayers would have had no influence upon a man so void of principle. What then should they do? Should they sit down in despair, and say there was no hope? They knew that all things were possible with God; and that he had said, "Call upon me in the day of trouble: I will deliver thee and thou shalt glorify me." This was a day of trouble, and they did call upon God. The efficacy of prayer was now tried. The whole church at Jerusalem, which was now large, was deeply engaged in this duty. They did not pray once and then give out—they prayed without ceasing, like true sons of Israel. They were not discouraged because they did not see their petition immediately granted; they did not mean to leave the throne of grace, while there was any hope. God, in his wisdom, deferred to answer their request until the last extremity, not because he did not hear them before, but because he would bring them to the highest pitch of holy importunity; which was the best way to promote his glory and their happiness. The moment had now almost arrived, when wicked Herod expected to embroe his hands in the blood of the apostle. The very next morning he was to be brought forth to the people. It seems Peter was not greatly distressed about the event of the next day: "The same night Peter was sleeping between two soldiers, bound with two chains." "So he giveth his beloved sleep." This was the Lord's helping time. Peter was delivered from the prison, by the ministry of an holy angel. After the angel left him, he came to the house of Mary, where many were gathered together praying. How evidently this deliverance was in answer to prayer. Peter had composed himself to sleep; but it seems his friends had slept none that night. There were many, who had gathered together to pray. It appears, that, like Jacob on another extraordinary occasion, they had determined to devote the whole night to wrestle with God. How exceedingly did this prepare them to receive the favor, which they desired. O how sweet was this mercy! It was a Samuel, "asked of God." Whoever reads this important clause, in the history of the apostolic age, will be convinced, that prayer is a glorious privilege, and an important part of that armour, with which the Christian army are to fight the good fight of faith, and overthrow the hosts of hell. It is a weapon, which the more it is used, the brighter it will grow, and the more important it will appear to him, who knows its worth. It appears from the epistolary writings of the apostles; that they were men of prayer, and that they recommended it in the strongest terms to their Christian brethren. It also appears that they made great dependance upon it, as a mean of procuring the blessings, which they needed. Paul writes thus to the Corinthians; "Who (i. e. God) delivered us from so great a death, and doth deliver; in whom we trust that he will yet deliver us; you also helping, together by prayer for us." Had we a history of all the victories, which prayer has gained; and of all the blessings, which have been bestowed in answer to prayer, "the world itself could not contain the books which should be written." But these are written, that we may believe that Jehovah hath never said unto us, "Seek ye me in vain."

* Psalm xxxiv. and Heb. x. 13.

† Acts ii. 42, 46. Acts iv. 31. Acts v. 4.

Perhaps, some may think, that this essay is calculated to trample down other Christian duties and gracious exercises, by making every thing of prayer. This is our reply: Prayer we believe to be a pre-eminent duty; but by no means the only duty incumbent upon us. In writing to the Ephesians, the apostle exhorts them to take to themselves the whole armour of God; particularly, that they be girded with truth, shod with the preparation of the gospel of peace, taking the shield of faith, the helmet of salvation and the sword of the Spirit. He then closes by exhorting them to pray always with all prayer, &c. Mr. Henry, commenting upon this passage observes that "the Christian's armour must all be buckled on with prayer." Prayer keeps it all tight, and keeps every thing in its place. A man of prayer is a man of truth—a man of Christian fortitude—full of faith and hope, and one who knows how to use the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God. In the eleventh chapter of Hebrews, the apostle sets forth a list of worthies, distinguished for their strong faith. Strong faith always leads to fervent prayer; therefore these worthies must have prayed much as well as believed much. The apostle's subject then led him to distinguish them by their faith, instead of their prayer. But let it always be remembered that he, who believes with all his heart, prays too.

Some may also think, that in this essay, prayer has been made to usurp the place of the Almighty. Let nothing, which has been said, be so construed as to take away any glory from God; or keep him out of sight, as the great All in All. It is to his honor, that he is a prayer-hearing God. He does not do any thing, in answer to prayer, which his wisdom and benevolence do not lead him to choose to bring to pass: Yet he always answers the prayer of faith. Here let it be remembered, that it is God, who excites as well as answers prayer. He pours out a spirit of grace and supplication. The spirit helpeth our infirmities; for we know not what we should pray for as we ought: but the Spirit maketh intercession for the saints according to the will of God. It was the will of God to deliver Peter out of the hand of Herod; therefore he sent his Holy Spirit remarkably to stir up the minds of the church to pray for his deliverance. Does not God, evidently, appear more glorious, in bringing about his deliverance, in answer to the united cries of so many of his dear children, than if he had brought it about without their interceding cries? The same almighty Angel, who wrestled with Jacob, and said to him, "Let me go," secretly strengthened him to keep his hold, and encouraged him to say, "I will not let thee go except thou bless me." He designed to bless Jacob; but it was most for his own glory and for Jacob's good, that he should wrestle hard for the blessing before he obtained it. God is brought clearly into view, when he is considered as the great agent, who produces in the hearts of his children a spirit of prayer, and every thing else which is good. This essay upon the peculiar advantages which Christians derive from prayer, in combating their enemies, will lead to several useful inferences.

1. We learn why there are such pressing exhortations to the duty of prayer, scattered all over the bible. Pray for the peace of Jerusalem*—Ye that make mention of the Lord, keep not silence and give him no rest†—Men ought always to pray and not to faint‡—Pray without ceasing§—Continuing instant in prayer||—Call upon me in the day of trouble¶—Pour out your heart before him—Be careful for nothing; but in every thing, by prayer and supplication, with thanksgiving, let your requests be made known unto God.†† If prayer be the Christian's weapon, if it has been so effectual as we have recounted, it is no wonder that we are so pressing urged to make a constant use of it.

2. In view of what has been brought forward to show the prevalence of prayer, we can see why the hopes of God's people, respecting Zion are revived, when they discover an increase of the spirit of prayer. The more they see the Christian army using this all-conquering weapon, the more they have reason to hope, to see them soon gain some glorious victory over the powers of darkness. The powers of darkness flee before a little company of praying ones.

"And Satan trembles when he sees
The weakest saint upon his knees."

* Psalm cxxii. 6. † Isaiah lxii. 6, 7.
‡ Luke xviii. 1. § 1 Thes. v. 17.
¶ Rom. xii. 12. ¶ Psalm l. 15.  Psalm lxii. 8. †† Phil. iv. 6.

When a minister obtains evidence that his church are favored with an uncommon degree of humble, and persevering prayer, he is apt to conclude, that he is about to see some success of his ministry, in the conversion of sinners; And if prayer be so prevalent, as we have seen it to be, he has something from which to draw this favorable conclusion. He ought not on this account to be viewed as an enthusiast. The holy one of Israel has said, "As soon as Zion travailed she brought forth her children." Is not fervent prayer an important part of the travelling pangs of Zion?

3. We are taught by this subject, that it is altogether suitable, that in times of extraordinary difficulty and danger, the people of God should have recourse to extraordinary prayer. It is their peculiar weapon; and should they not make a peculiar use of it, in times of imminent danger? Should we not think that a very stupid nation, who made no extraordinary preparations for defence, when their enemies were making the most extraordinary preparations for an attack? So it betokens great stupidity in the people of God if they are not peculiarly roused up to pray, when Zion is in trouble. The language of every true Israelite at such a time should be, "For Zion's sake I will not hold my peace, and for Jerusalem's sake I will not rest, until the righteousness thereof go forth as brightness, and the salvation thereof as a lamp that burneth." When Esau was coming to meet Jacob with 400 men, the good patriarch thought there was a call for extraordinary prayer. The night which is commonly devoted to sleep, he devoted to prayer. When the Jews throughout the Persian empire were threatened with a total destruction, Mordecai and Esther and others of their nation, who dwelt at Shushan, devoted three days, at once, to fasting and prayer. When Peter was in prison, the church had extraordinary prayer, on his behalf. Is there not a call for extraordinary prayer at this time? Is not infidelity exerting every nerve to crush the cause of Christ? And has it not made the most alarming progress? Infidels are combining together to spread their poison around the world. And shall not Christians unite in defence of the truth? It is not enough that we publish books in defence of Christianity. We must let them see this holy religion in our very exemplary lives. We must walk even as Christ walked. We must also be abundant in prayer. Here is the way that Christians must overcome infidels. Infidels, some of them have no God; these therefore cannot pray. Others have a God, whom they own, but in works they deny him; for, there is not one of them, that will pray to him. Prayer makes no part of their religion. Here, then, is their weak place. Here, Christians, you must make the attack. They despise this peculiar piece of armour, with which the Captain of your salvation has furnished you; they think it of no use to you; therefore they will make no preparation to resist it. This gives the disciples of Christ great advantage over the followers of Voltaire. While these meet together to concert measures to "crush the wretch," (to use their own blasphemous watch-word) let Christians form Concerts of prayer to beseech the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ to pull down the kingdom of Satan, and build up the kingdom of his dear Son, and spread the sweet favour of his name through the world! Prayer-meetings, and explicit concert in prayer are things highly becoming the church of a prayer-hearing God. This matter is set in a clear point of light in President Edwards' "Humble Attempt to promote explicit agreement and visible union of God's people in extraordinary prayer for the revival of religion," &c. Every Christian ought to read this book. If prayer is such an all-important mean in advancing the kingdom of the Redeemer, why is it not suitable that the subjects of this kingdom should take great pains to stir one another up to this duty—and has it not been found, by experience, that explicit agreement has greatly increased the spirit of prayer? In many places such explicit agreement, between a few Christian friends, has issued in a general revival of religion.

Some think it wrong to take any part of the six laboring days to attend upon prayer-meetings. Did Esther and Mordecai think so, when they fasted three days in succession? Did the disciples of Christ think so, when they from day to day continued in prayers and supplications just before that remarkable out-pouring of the Spirit on the day of pentecost? There are others, who are greatly prejudiced against night-meetings for prayer. I hope such will not think it wrong to take even the whole night, on extraordinary occasions, for secret prayer; since we have the example of the patriarch Jacob, and the more eminent one of Jesus Christ. Jacob prayed all night, and had his name on this account changed into Israel (one that hath obtained a princely power from God). Here is an eternal mark of honor, put upon this holy wrestler, who, by faith, kept his hold of the Angel, through all the darkness of the night. Let the name of Israel keep us from being ashamed of such extraordinary devotions. If this be not enough, let us remember, it is recorded of our blessed Lord, that he went out into a mountain to pray and continued all night in prayer to God. These, it is acknowledged, are instances of secret devotion; but night meetings for prayer are not new things. There was certainly such a meeting that night, in which Peter was delivered from prison. And it seems that God was not displeased with them for spending the night in this way, tho' "many were gathered together, praying." Probably if Peter had come to this house the night before, he would have found the same company, employed in the same holy exercise; for "prayer was made of the church, without ceasing, unto God for him."

I would not dictate to my brethren, but would join with the preacher, referred to in the beginning of this essay, in suggesting, whether it be not expedient for the people of God to take some effectual measures to promote a spirit of prayer, by a more general and explicit agreement for this purpose. Let us all pray for direction in this matter—let us pray, that God would pour out a spirit of grace and supplication, and revive his work in the midst of these years of declension, and appear in his glory!

"What various hindrances we meet,
In coming to a mercy seat?
Yet who that knows the worth of pray'r,
But wishes to be often there?"

"Pray'r makes the darken'd cloud withdraw;
Pray'r climbs the ladder Jacob saw;

Gives exercise to faith and love,
Brings ev'ry blessing from above.

"Restraining pray'r we cease to fight; Pray'r makes the Christian's armour bright;

And Satan trembles when he sees
The weakest faint upon his knees.

"Have you no words? Ah think again,

Words flow space when you complain,
And fill your fellow-creature's ear
With the sad tale of all your care.

"Were half the breath thus vainly spent,

To heav'n in supplications sent,
Your cheerful song would oft'ner be,
Hear what the Lord has done for me."

NOTE. The Publishing Committee of this magazine, impressed with the importance of the duty of extraordinary prayer, as above inculcated, take the liberty to recommend to their Readers, to unite together, in such numbers as shall be convenient, on some one day or evening in each week, and spend a season in social prayer for the outpouring of the divine spirit. The Committee would not presume to dictate, but as there would be a great propriety in a general uniformity with regard to time, in such meetings for prayer, they would suggest that those who shall adopt this plan, set apart Thursday afternoon or evening for the purpose.

An account of a work of divine grace, in a revival of religion in the East Society of GRANVILLE (Mass.) in the years 1798 and 1799, communicated to the Editors by the Rev. TIMOTHY M. COOLEY.

GENTLEMEN,

THOSE pages in your useful Magazine which contain a narrative of the late revival of religion in this country, are read with peculiar satisfaction. They give joy to the people of God. I beg leave to submit to your examination the following account of the displays of sovereign, all-conquering grace, among the people of my charge, which you are at liberty to publish if you please.

WITHIN half a century past there have been three seasons of uncommon attention to religion in this place: And at other times, individuals have been awakened and hopefully renewed. This people have enjoyed a more than common share of the effusions of the Spirit, and have been much disposed to converse upon experimental religion. The necessity of the new birth has been taught by parents to their children, and very few, if any, have denied this important doctrine.

For a few months previous to the late revival, it was a time of very great stupidity. The wise and the foolish slumbered together. Our youth had become much addicted to sinful diversions. In one of their scenes of amusement, God was pleased to frown upon them in a very awful manner. While they were engaged in their thoughtless recreations, two young men were seized violently ill, and carried out of the ball-chamber. A young woman in consequence of a cold which she took on the same evening, was in a very short time taken with a fever and delirium, and brought to the brink of the grave. She afterwards recovered, and became a hopeful subject of divine grace. One of the young men above mentioned, after a short illness died. This unhappy youth, being told by his weeping mother, that he was dying, replied with his expiring breath, "O I cannot die, 'I'm unprepared." These alarming visitations of providence solemnized the minds of the young, and gave a check to their sinful pleasures. Many were then convinced of the danger and criminality of those amusements, which they once esteemed innocent.

In the spring of the year 1798, professors were much awakened, and ardently desired a revival of religion. Christian parents were anxious for their children; and it was common to hear pious people in conversation, breathing out their earnest desires for the effusions of the Spirit. There was a visible engagedness among professors; and many like Simeon of old, were "waiting for the consolation of Israel."

I invited a number of the youth into my study, and urged upon them the necessity of the "One thing needful." This was a very solemn meeting, and will probably be long remembered by some who were present.

On the second sabbath in June, a very plain sermon was preached from Ezek. xxxvii. 3. which was blessed to the awakening of a number of secure sinners. In the evening a conference was attended, which exhibited evident marks of unusual seriousness. The next sabbath evening a conference was attended, and many appeared to feel the weight of truth at heart. The next Tuesday a number of young people met for a civil visit, and the violin was introduced, which instead of producing the usual hilarity, occasioned a flood of tears. The work of the Spirit, which had been for several days concealed in the heart, now burst forth. It could be no longer concealed. It was found that numbers had for some time felt a very serious concern for their future well being, and thought they were alone in it; being ignorant of the feelings and resolutions of others. Two young persons, who had been very active in the follies of youth, mutually agreed to begin a new life, little suspecting that a number of their companions had secretly formed the same resolution.

The glorious work spread with surprising rapidity through the parish. There was all of a sudden, a noise among the dry bones. Christians were animated, sinners were awakened, and scoffers were struck silent, at the powerful work of the Almighty. There were but very few, whether old or young, who did not experience some serious alarms. It was truly a remarkable season with us, and the most aged had never witnessed the like before. I shall give the reader an imperfect idea of that surprising change, from apparent thoughtlessness, to universal alarm, which took place within two or three weeks. Those who were not at first truly convicted, were solemnized at what they saw in others, and afterwards became the subjects of genuine convictions.

The next sabbath, the assembly appeared almost as solemn, as if that day were to close their earthly existence. The assembly, tho' crowded, was almost as still as the burying-ground. Our meetings were distinguished for a still, solemn, listening attention to the word, and the audience hung upon the lips of of the speaker, as if they realized that their all for eternity was at stake.

The rapidity of the work must be ascribed primarily to the all-conquering influences of the Holy Spirit. But it is worthy of notice that most of the inhabitants of this place, are descendants of five or six families. There is consequently a great degree of friendship, and intimacy among them, and a striking similarity in their feelings, manners and sentiments. Those who were first impressed, communicated their feelings and resolutions to their relatives of a similar age, and urged them to join with them in living a new life. These private warnings were a means of spreading the work.

Their views and feelings, while under convictions, were as follows :

They encouraged themselves that by a few weeks' seriousness and diligence in duties, they should prepare themselves for regeneration. After persevering for a while in these external duties, they thought their prayers and cries had been sufficient to prevail with God to show mercy. They secretly found fault with God for withholding his grace. The heart arose against divine sovereignty. Some tho't hard of God for giving comfort to others, while he denied it to them. The enmity of the heart rose up, like a venomous serpent, against the Almighty. Such exercises as these discovered to them the total depravity of their hearts. They felt convinced that the garment of self-righteousness, which was so pleasing to them, covered a heart full of opposition to God's character. They were before convinced that they had been guilty of many outward acts of sin, but now they saw something of the fountain of pollution within. They were convinced that they had never prayed, read, or cried as God required. They still persevered in duties, but seemed, as they expressed it, "to grow worse and worse." They discovered that God's law justly condemned them, and that they must be rescued by sovereign mercy, or suffer its awful sanction.

The views and exercises of those who obtained a hope, were, in general, as follows :

There was a great variety as to the manner in which divine light was let into the mind, and at the same time a wonderful similarity in their feelings after the admission of true light. Some obtained relief by a view of the glory and excellency of Christ. He appeared to be "the chief among ten thousand, and altogether lovely." Others were first led to see the excellency of the gospel plan and its fitness for sinners. Others felt a happy and joyful submission to God as a sovereign, and were willing to be entirely in his hands. When God's time had come to show mercy, their opposition was subdued. They felt willing to be wholly in the hands of that God who "hath mercy on whom he will have mercy." They had new views of God, of the Saviour, of the bible and of Christian people. "Old things were passed away, behold all things were become new." They felt a sweet calmness of mind, but in most instances, had not a thought at the time of it, that what they experienced was regeneration. It was sometimes several days, before they dared to hope, they were "new creatures." They rejoiced with fear. In many instances, a hope was obtained, and gradually confirmed, by comparing themselves with the word, and finding a degree of that submission and disinterested love, which characterize those who "are born again." The work of the Spirit in this place has been remarkably free from enthusiasm and confusion. There have been no instances of very great distress, or outcries under convictions, nor of enthusiastic rants of joy, after receiving comfort. The work was mild.

This revival of religion has been productive of these happy effects : The bible has been studied—family prayer revived—the instruction of children promoted—the sanctuary crowded—and the distinguishing doctrines of the gospel more thoroughly studied and understood.

Zion's God has discovered his sovereignty as well as his mercy among us. Some of the most gay and thoughtless have become hopeful converts, whilst others, who were more sober and moral, were passed by. Some have been hopefully new born, who were educated in irreligious, prayerless families, while others were passed by, who enjoyed a pious education. But it must be confessed that those who had been religiously educated, were more generally the subjects of special grace.

Within one year after the beginning of the awakening, upwards of 50 united with the church. Others have been since added. And about 20 more, mostly young people, have obtained a hope in this "season of refreshment," and by a sober life they give evidence of a real change, but through prevailing doubts and diffidence have not dared to make a public profession.

In some instances almost whole families fled to the ark of safety. In one family I found seven or eight, and in others five or six, who thought they could rejoice in God. We had the pleasing sight of four sisters offering themselves to receive Christian baptism, and unite with the church.

It is now above three years since the beginning of this glorious work, and I can give a more ample testimony to its genuineness, than I could have done in months past. "By their fruits ye shall know them." Many who received slight impressions have become like the "seed which fell upon stony places." And to some for whom we entertained a hope that they were renewed, "it hath happened according to the true proverb," 2 Pet. ii. 22. And with great concern we may conclude that "Their last state is worse than the first, seeing they crucify to themselves the son of God afresh and put him to open shame."

VOL. II. No. 7.

But those who have made a profession of religion, and a number of others who have not professed publicly, appear to be steadfast and immovable: And their conversation is in a good measure agreeable to the gospel. There may be "tares among the wheat," and "let him that thinketh he standeth, take heed lest he fall." Nearly one half who have lately become professors are in youth. They have cheerfully relinquished their former sinful amusements; and have often declared, that they have enjoyed more real happiness in one religious meeting, than in all their past follies and sinful mirth. They in general appear to be ornaments to their profession, and by their presence at our sacramental table, render the communion a very delightful duty.

"The Lord hath done great things for us, whereof we are glad." The repentance of a number of Christless sinners in this place, has doubtless given joy to angels and saints above. And we trust that a hopeful number will praise God to eternity, for what they have experienced in this revival of religion. "The Lord hath brought them up out of the horrible pit, out of the miry clay, and set their feet upon a rock; and he hath put a new song into their mouth even praise to the living God."

I am yours, Gentlemen, with sentiments of esteem,
TIMOTHY M. COOLEY.

Granville, East-Society, }
(Ms.) Oct. 1801. }

*Further thoughts on 1 Corinth. xv.
19. by another writer.*

TO THE EDITORS OF THE CON-NECTICUT EVANGELICAL MAG-AZINE.

GENTLEMEN,

IF the insertion of the following will not prove the suppression of something more useful, please to give it a place in your Magazine.

An exposition of 1 Cor. xv. 19.

IF in this life only we have hope in Christ, we are of all men most miserable." The meaning of the apostle, in this passage, is easily understood; but the truth of his assertion does not so readily appear. Doubtless his meaning is this: If the body dies, no more to live, and if the soul separate from the body ceases to exist; then we can hope for no benefit from Christ, but in the present life: And if so, we, his followers, are of all men in the world the most miserable. There are none so wretched; so much to be pitied. Allowing this to be the sense of the apostle, how does the truth of his declaration appear? It has been generally answered to this enquiry, "Christianity found so many, and such violent opposers, amongst all classes of people, especially in the days of the apostle, that those who embraced it hazarded their honor, their property, the comforts of life and even life itself. They had the trial of cruel mockings and scourgings, of bonds and imprisonment. They were stoned and slain with the sword, were destitute, afflicted and tormented. These great sacrifices they must make and these great evils endure, in order to be Christians in profession and practice. The world have not to sacrifice these enjoyments, nor to subject themselves to these evils. And if Christians have no good to expect from Christ hereafter as a compensation for their loss here, if death be an eternal sleep, they are of all men the most miserable." It is true that the apostles and primitive Christians suffered great evils on account of their religion. It is also true, that if there be no future state of existence Christians cannot derive benefit from Christ beyond this life. But then, are good men, even the apostles and primitive Christians in the midst of their hardships, more miserable than the wicked? Does religion when most unpopular make us more wretched on earth, all things considered? Have we not a full compensation in the comforts of religion for all the sacrifices we make in becoming and acting like good men? If we have, then the right meaning of the text has not been given. And that we have, is capable of full proof. I may appeal to the testimony of good men. We often hear them say, that they have far greater enjoyment and more solid satisfaction in the duties and doctrines of religion than they could derive from any thing in this world. And hast not thou, my Christian reader, had that comfort and pleasure in the contemplation of divine things which surpassed all worldly enjoyments? Hast thou not had peace and refreshment of soul, which nothing else could yield but religion? Not what arose from hopes of future happiness, but from what was then seen and felt? That the good man is happier than the wicked is capable of scripture proof. We hear the Psalmist, the wise man and the apostle uniting their testimony in support of this truth. Great peace have they that love thy law and nothing shall offend them.—the ways of wisdom are ways of pleasantness.—The peace of God passeth all understanding—there is great joy in believing,

Our Saviour saith to his disciples, Verily I say unto you, there is no man that hath left house, or brethren, or sisters, or father, or mother, or wife, or children, or lands, for my sake and the gospel's, but he shall receive an hundred fold, now in this time, houses, and brethren, and sisters, and mothers, and children, and lands with persecutions. That is, His happiness shall be an hundred times greater, in this life with all his sufferings, than if he still possessed these sources of enjoyment free from persecution, and remained a sinner. Since the comforts of religion make amends for all worldly sacrifices, and the good, tho' poor, despised, afflicted and persecuted man is happier than the wicked, though he be rich, wise and great; I say, since this is the case, it appears that we have not put the right construction upon the text. I shall, therefore, venture to give a different meaning.

In order for this, we will consider the feelings of the good man towards God, Christ and the holy society of heaven.

The Christian loves God. He derives pleasure from the contemplation of his adorable and lovely perfections. The words of the Psalmist he can make his own: Whom have I in heaven but thee, and there is none upon earth I desire besides thee. All God's attributes appear to him harmonious, and such is their glory as to ravish his soul. These attributes as exhibited in the divine law, afford him matter of delightful meditation. O, how love I thy law. Great satisfaction accrues to the saint from contemplating the government of God in which all his perfections are employed. The son of God largely shares in the affection of the Christian. His character comprizes all that is morally excellent, being the brightness of the Father's glory and the express image of his person. He is considered as the way, the truth and the life. The believer can say of him, Whom having not seen, I love; in whom, though now I see him not, yet believing, I rejoice with joy unspeakable, and full of glory. Christ, in his person and offices and in his relation to the believer is accounted precious and altogether amiable. The good man loves the service of his Maker. He aspires after no greater felicity than to enjoy, serve and glorify God without interruption and the hindrance of sinful imperfections. By some foretastes of heaven, he has learnt what sublime enjoyment and treasures of good remain for the Christian. No object can be so highly prized as God, no employment can be so pleasing as his service, no society so agreeable as the society of heaven and no subjects so delightful as divine subjects. All these will continue forever, yielding him consummate & unailing happiness. Allowing these to be the feelings and views of the good man, which I presume no one will question, what must be the state of his mind were death to close his existence? Imagine the saint, fully impressed with the idea, that he should soon cease to be, and yet having lively views of the glory of God's character, of the loveliness and worth of Christ and the beauties of holiness; and how wretched must he be! Here is his treasure, something he prizes above every thing else, something on which he cannot place a value equal to its worth, which can make him completely and forever happy; but he must relinquish all hopes of enjoying it. What thought more unwelcome! Who can tell his loss! How could he endure the wounding reflection of being forever denied a participation of that sublime happiness of which he has tasted? Such reflections must make him of all men most miserable. He could not endure the thought of parting with God, of being separated from his beloved Savior and never to think of their perfections—never more to love, serve and enjoy them. “O wretched man that I am! if this be true—if I must cease to think, cease to love and cease to enjoy by ceasing to exist! How can I be separated from the object of my love—from the only satisfying good in the universe! Painful thought, that I must cease to be and lose such a treasure as God! The belief of this, kills all my comforts, overwhelms my soul with grief and renders me of all men most miserable.”

Sinners! Think not religion to be a gloomy and unprofitable thing.

Saints! Be thankful for that gospel, which has brought “life and immortality” to light.

SHAPHAN.

*Letter from a Father to his Son,
on the existence of God.*

VERY DEAR SON,

GOD, in his wise and holy providence, has brought you to that period of life in which the laws of our country permit you to leave the family, where you have been born, and received the kind and instructive offices of your parents. You are called now to act your part for yourself on the broad theatre of life. It is an important period in your life. It is a period in life perhaps more important now than ever, because it is an evil day in which there are many enticements to error and dissipation. A young person needs all the experience of old age, and the restraining hand of a kind providence, to avoid all the ways that lead down to disgrace and ruin. When I look back on my own life, and the period when I began to act for myself was not stigmatized with the error and dissipation the present is, I think it almost miraculous, and it certainly was owing to nothing but that kind providence which has always protected me, that I escaped those ways which are ruinous to our usefulness and comfort here, and our happiness hereafter. Having been young myself, and experienced all the feelings incident to your age, my observations will have the greater weight on your mind, especially they will be received as a kind effort of an anxious and affectionate Father.

I might write you some profitable thoughts respecting the choice and management of your worldly affairs, respecting the company you should keep, and what general deportment you should observe, to render yourself agreeable to the steady, sober, virtuous part of mankind. These are important objects and should suitably interest your attention.

But I feel, my dear Son, more interested in your future and eternal good. And I am happy, that while you are removed from my verbal instruction, I can communicate to you by letter, my ideas, on the important subjects which I think very much tend to this.

It is of the first importance that your heart be renewed by the spirit of God. Until this is your state, you will not enjoy those pleasures suitable for rational creatures, you will not serve your maker acceptably, nor answer the end of living, and you will be all the time unsafe, exposed constantly by the brittle thread of life over the abyss of destruction. Considering this of vast and infinite importance, I think it well to put you in mind of it in this place. Hereafter I shall write more fully on the subject. All my observations on doctrinal subjects, you may consider will profit you nothing without this, nay, as they enlighten your mind, your opposition of heart will be more heinous in the sight of God, and your soul will be prepared for greater misery.

You have come into active life in an age in which the holy word of God is denied. Many who do not deny its heavenly origin, disbelieve its fundamental doctrines, and do not practise agreeable to its sacred requirements. There is great danger, therefore, that you will hesitate respecting the divine inspiration of the scriptures, if not positively deny it, and that if you receive the scriptures as the word of God, your doctrinal belief will be erroneous, and inconsistent. You will therefore attend diligently to the feeble effort of a Father to instruct you into the great doctrines of Christianity.

The fundamental doctrine of religion is the existence of a God, who created us, the world in which we live, and all the things in it. This is the bottom-stone which supports the whole religious superstructure. Hence the Atheist, disliking the system of truths revealed in nature, and the word of God, and seeing he must believe them if there be a God, strikes at the root, and denies the existence of any God. You doubtless will hear much said on this subject. It will be said, There is no God: This world, and all in it come into existence by chance, or by some way, beside by a self-existent, eternal, uncreated God. I wish you to attend, my Son, to the following chain of arguments on this important subject, and let it ever fortify your mind against any attempt to establish you on erroneous and Atheistical principles.

I cannot conceive, and I appeal to you, my Son, and to the most established Atheist, if you, or he can conceive of any other way for the existence of ourselves, the world, and all things in it beside these. They must have been created by chance, by their own creative power, by some finite being, or they are eternal and never were created, or they were created by an uncreated God. These I will take up in order.

In this world and the things in it we discover perfect order, and regularity. Search into the formation of men. Extend your views to the great planetary system, of which this earth is a part. View all the parts and appendages of this world. See the various movements of the whole, and say, if there be not system and order discoverable, and say, my Son, if these be consistent with chance. You are possessed of rational powers sufficient to show you that the very idea of chance excludes that of order and system. If we believe these things created themselves, we shall be involved in this evident absurdity that that which is not, can create. A being that creates himself must exercise creative power before he exists. I presume your conviction of this absurdity makes it unnecessary for me to say more.

You will easily see that these things were not created by any finite being. This being must have been created; and we cannot believe him to have been created by chance, or by himself, without involving ourselves in the above absurdities.

And when any will show the history of an interminable line of rational beings, and produce the improvement which we may reasonably expect from them; when they will convince any candid mind that there are not in the world itself, evidences of its having a beginning, and of its coming to an end there will be reasonable ground to doubt the existence of a God. We have no history extending farther back than about six thousand years. The most ancient of this is quite brief, and in some instances obscure. Would there not be a longer line of history, would there not have been able historians thousands and thousands of years ago, if the world were eternal, whose histories we should now have free from all brevity and obscurity? Would there not have been greater improvement than there is? Our long line of ancestors must have been very idle and stupid people if we admit the idea. Every one must be sensible he lives in a perishing dying world. The best astronomical principles will teach us the world must come to an end, that it is not eternal.

There is therefore no consistent belief respecting our own and the world's existence, but the belief that it sprung from the creative hand of an uncreated God.

This argument, my Son, establish in your mind. It is conclusive in proof of the being of a God. And this is a foundation for the most valuable and important ideas, some of which I shall suggest to you in my future letters.

Yours, &c. PATER.

MESSRS. EDITORS,

Nothing is more baneful to a life of real piety and growth in grace, than the trifling amusements and dissipated pleasures, which are but too common in the most of our towns, perhaps, it will not be unacceptable to the real friends of religion, to trace the unhappy effects of such scenes of dissipation upon the heart, in rendering it cold, and unmindful of the sweet duties of fervent devotion and benevolence, and in depicting in the countenance such follies and vanities, as plainly show the prevailing influence of sin. Dissipation and religion can never dwell long together; for he, who neglects his heart, will consequently neglect his secret prayers, and soon obliterate the soul-delighting remembrance of his God. Retirement and devotion easily mingle their joys; and the Christian in his closet, away from the entangling snares of a delusive world, mounts on the wings of faith, and, forgetting all earthly vanities, soars away to the throne of God, to contemplate the unspeakable glories of the Lamb, slain from the foundation of the world, while he prostrates himself before him, in the most humble adoration. The truth of these remarks appears to have been confirmed, in the following anecdote of an amiable young Lady, extracted from the writings of Lavater.—“A noble, amiable, and innocent young Lady, who had been educated principally in the country, saw her face in the glass as she passed it with a candle in her hand, retiring from evening prayers, and having just laid down her bible. Her eyes were cast to the ground, with inexpressible modesty, at the sight of her own image. She passed the winter in town, surrounded by adorers, hurried away by dissipation, and plunged in trifling amusements. She forgot her bible and her devotion.

‘ In the beginning of spring she returned to her country-seat, her chamber, and the table on which the bible lay. Again she had the candle in her hand, and again saw herself in the glass. She turned pale, put down the candle, retreated to a sofa, and fell on her knees: “ O God! I no longer know my own face. How am I degraded! My follies and vanities are all written in my countenance. Wherefore have they been neglected, illegible, to this instant? O come and expel, come and utterly efface them, mild tranquillity, sweet devotion, and ye gentle cares of benevolent love!”

AMANA.

Religious Intelligence.

Extract of a letter from one of the Connecticut Missionaries, dated COOPERSTOWN, O^C. 20, 1801.

“ NOTWITHSTANDING all the difficulties which attend my Missionary business, I find myself supported and encouraged, by considering the excellency of the cause,—the all-seeing eye of that God whose cause it is,—and that the desires and prayers of all Christian friends attend me and are united in my success. The promise, “ Lo I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world,” is extensive and animating. Good Missionaries may plead it for themselves, and the people of God may plead it for them. I hope to be so faithful as to share a part of this promise, tho’ unworthy of the blessing contained in it.

“ I have already visited, in my Missionary tour, many settlements in the counties of Delaware and Orsego; and have uniformly found a very friendly reception among the people where I have labored; a general readiness to hear the word, and in many places a strong desire after spiritual nourishment. Could the good people of Connecticut behold the attention, the gratitude and the joy expressed in the countenances and language of those who assemble to hear sermons and religious conversation, they would not consider their annual contributions as money spent in vain. In many places which I have visited, where the attention was special the last year, I have found great engagedness in religion. The sentiment is often expressed by the people whom I have visited, and expressed with every mark of gratitude, ‘ that the Missionary business is the most benevolent and glorious that was ever undertaken in America.’ May the Lord give me grace to be faithful.”

MISSIONARIES.

The Rev. Jeremiah Hallock lately returned from a mission of 4 months to the upper part of Vermont.

The beginning of December, Mr. Hezekiah May returned from a mission of a few weeks to the western counties of New-York.

About the 20th December, Mr. James W. Woodward entered on a mission to Black River and parts adjacent. And about the same time, it is supposed the Rev. Soloman Morgan commenced a missionary tour of a few weeks to the northern counties in Vermont.

All the Missionaries continue to write that the call for missionary labors is great, and that in many places they have reason to hope their labors are attended with a divine blessing.

ORDINATION.

On Wednesday December 22d, 1801, the Rev. Andrew Yates was ordained as colleague pastor with the Rev. Eliphalet Williams, D. D. of East-Hartford. The Rev.

Walter King of Norwich made the introductory prayer; the Rev. Doctor Dana of New-Haven preached the sermon; the Rev. Doctor Perkins of Hartford made the consecrating prayer; the Rev. John Marsh of Wethersfield gave the charge; the Rev. William Lockwood of Glastenbury gave the right hand of fellowship; and the Rev. Henry A. Rowland of Windfor made the concluding prayer.

POETRY.

COMMUNICATED AS ORIGINAL.

MESSRS EDITORS,

IF the following hymns, written under bodily weakness, shall be tho't worthy a place in your invaluable Magazine, they will perhaps, if my life be spared, be a prelude to other communications. Yours, ELPIZON.

A prayer for heavenly mindedness.

O Glorious God, supremely wise,
Enthron'd in light above the skies:
Life is a span, the time draws near,
When at thy bar I must appear.

This mortal frame will soon decay,
And moulder to its native clay;
But my immortal soul remains,
For endless life or endless pains.

O may a sense of this abide Upon my mind, my actions guide;
Nor may I wish to put away,
Far from my tho'ts the evil day.

This day with me may be the last;
The next, probation may be past;
My body with corruption mix'd,
My state unalterably fix'd.

O may the tho'ts of Jesu's love;
Of rest prepar'd for saints above;
Of judgment, and eternity;
Draw off my soul from earth to thee.

Help me, O Lord, to watch and pray,
Nor let me from thy precepts stray;
But guide me in the heav'nly road,
To thine eternal, blest abode.

Christians call'd to exertion.

THE Spirit and the word
Are mighty in the earth;
The vineyard of our Lord
Is freed from dismal dearth*;
For sinners fear,
That dreadful hour,
When God, in pow'r,
Shall call them near.

The saints in glorious state,
Redeemed of the Lamb,
And angels approbate,
Who ever praise his name,
In raptures sing,
That wand'ring souls
Approach the folds
Of Christ their King.

Can those, who long have rest
To see their Judge descend, Possess unthankful breasts,
To see their friend amend,
For mercy call,
Their Saviour bless,
Own and confess,
Him Lord of all?

Let Christians then arise,
For lab'ers are but few;
A glorious harvest lies Matur'd before their view,
And spare no pains;
But give and pray,
That heathens may
'Scape satan's chains.

Let God for worthier keep,
Your blessings in reserve;
And leave your souls to sleep,
As you for sins deserve;
And justly make
You to remain,
Like Sodom's plain,
A fruitless lake.

ELPIZON.

* Alluding to the late revivals of religion.

Donations to the Missionary Society.

From Rev. Benjamin Trumbull, D. D. avails of his sermons.	-	-	-	-	10 Dollars.
From a friend of Missions,	-	-	-	-	5 Do.
From do. do.	-	-	-	-	1 Do.
From a young Lady.	-	-	-	-	3 25 cts.

THE

Connecticut Evangelical Magazine.

[PUBLISHED ACCORDING TO ACT OF CONGRESS.]

VOL. II.]

FEBRUARY, 1802.

[No. 8.]

Attempts to propagate the gospel among the Indians in New-England and parts adjacent.

TO THE EDITORS OF THE CONNECTICUT EVANGELICAL MAGAZINE.

GENTLEMEN,

IT is proposed to publish, in a series of numbers, in your valuable Magazine, as far as necessary documents can be collected, An Historical Account of the attempts made in former, and succeeding times, to propagate the gospel among the Indians in New-England, and parts adjacent, or not very remote—Of the success which has attended the endeavors of the Missionaries among many of the tribes, together with the want of success among others; with some, at least, of the probable causes—The state of the Christianized churches, and congregations, in various periods, as far as can be ascertained, from the foundation of the first of them, about the middle of the seventeenth century, down to the present day.

To which may be subjoined, some thoughts upon civilizing the heathen, in connexion with gospelizing them.

VOL. II. No. 8.

The historical part will be abridged and compiled from various publications done by writers of information and ability; and exhibited, as far as may be practicable and convenient, in chronological order. An epitome of the life and character of the most distinguished Missionaries, will be included in the work.

A general compilation of this kind has not, as far as we can learn, been executed; and particular accounts, respecting the propagation of Christianity among the Indians, lie scattered in many books; some of which, particularly the ancient ones, are very scarce; and probably may not have been seen and read by one in very many at the present day.

It may be useful to many, and very grateful in particular to pious persons (provided the work shall be tolerably executed) to have a brief collection made from several writers in different ages, who have given an account of what was within their observation, or came to their knowledge; we may add, that such a collection may be of service to young missionaries : The experience of their predecessors, some of whom had labored long in this most benevolent employment, may, being thus published, suggest some thoughts to them, which, carried into practice, may greatly promote the design they have in view.

M m

By the specimen of the performance I now send, and submit to your inspection, you will judge, Gentlemen, whether it is done in such a manner, as to have a probable tendency to promote the general interest you have in your eye, in the useful Magazine of which you are Editors, and will be acceptable to the body of your readers : If it shall meet your approbation, the compiler will endeavor to proceed in the work, as fast as his health and other circumstances shall permit ; if otherwise, let it be suppressed, and something more valuable be substituted in the place it might otherwise have held.

I am, Gentlemen,
Your friend and servant,
LUCELLUS.

CHAPTER I.

Concerning the labors of the family of Mayhew to propagate the gospel among the Indians, particularly on Martha's-Vineyard.

INTRODUCTION.

IT may be proper to premise, " That on the 10th day of October, 1641, James Foret, agent for the earl of Stirling, grants to Thomas Mayhew of Watertown in the colony of the Massachusetts, and Thomas Mayhew his son, Nantucket and two small islands adjacent ; and on the 23d day of the same month, Martha's-Vineyard and Elizabeth islands ; and agreeable to the opinion of that day, grants the same powers of government, which the Massachusetts people enjoyed by their charter : Mr. Mayhew was called Governor of the islands. The grant of the soil of these islands could not vacate the right of the Indian Sachems, and proprietors".* Accordingly the English settlers, at an early period, purchased land of one of the Sachems. Rev. Experience Mayhew gives this account. " Tawanquatuck was the chief Sachem on the east end of Martha's-Vineyard, where the English first settled in 1642."

" He was, as I have been informed, willing to let the English have land to settle on ; but several of his council, or chief men, being much against his selling any land to these new comers ; he, to quiet them, gave several parts of his Sachemdom to them ; and then sold to the English a considerable part of what he reserved to himself, to make that settlement on, now called Edgartown".† And Gov. Hutchinson, writing near the middle of the last century, observes, " I suppose, most of the present inhabitants and proprietors, derive their titles from Indian grants posterior to the grant made to Lord Stirling, or to that made by his agent to Mr. Mayhew, and his son."

The family of Mayhew, from the early days of the settlement of New-England, has been noted for their zeal and diligence in propagating the gospel among the Indians. It is worthy of particular notice, that missionaries of five successive generations inclusive, have labored in this evangelical work, and all held in great esteem.

* Gov. Hutchinson's Hist. of Massachusetts, V. 1.

† Mayhew's Indian converts, p. 80.

Those in public stations in the church (for of them chiefly our subject leads us to speak) were esteemed men of distinguished mental abilities, of sound judgment, and unaffected piety. Neither credulity, superstition, nor enthusiasm were characteristics of the family. We rather mention this in our introduction, as we shall make much use of their writings in compiling the history of the Vineyard Indians.

Rev. Experience Mayhew, superintendent of the Indian churches and congregations on Martha's-Vineyard, from whose writings we shall make many extracts, was highly valued by his contemporaries: The associated ministers of Boston, Dr. C. Mather, Dr. Colman, Dr. Sewall, Mr. Prince, and the other pastors of the congregational churches there, in the year 1726, give him this honorable testimonial, in their attestation prefixed to his book, containing an account of the conversion of many of the Indians, viz. "The author of this history, Mr. Experience Mayhew, is a person of incontestable veracity. He was born and bred in the midst of the Indians; and has been all along intimately acquainted with occurrences among them, and is a descendant from ancestors, that, for several generations, have laudably done their parts in gospelizing them. He is a judicious, faithful, constant preacher of the gospel to them; and on the week days, as well as on the Lord's days, he is an unwearied worker with God, and for Him among them. Among all the instruments of the good work, which brings the Indians into the Kingdom of God, he shines as one of the first magnitude. Several things written by him, have, by the press, been here-before conveyed into the world, and found a favorable reception: And, in those narratives, we again say, his truth may be relied upon, and his fidelity is irreproachable."

An honorary degree (a thing very unusual at that day) was conferred upon this gentleman in the year 1723, by the overseers of Harvard College, which was an evidence of the judgment they formed of his learning and merit. He lived to a very advanced age, and supported to the last, an amiable and excellent character. He was, for more than 60 years (as one of his sons has published to the world) a preacher of the gospel to the Indians on Martha's-Vineyard, employed by the commissioners of the London Society for propagating the gospel in New-England, and the parts adjacent in America.

He was born, January, 1673; began to preach to the Indians, March, 1694; and died about the year 1754, or 1755, aged 81 or 82 years. He left an excellent character, and sundry valuable composures in print, which were evidences of a judicious mind, and pious heart.

SECTION I.

On the missionary labors of the Rev. Thomas Mayhew, jun.

Of his great benevolence, zeal and diligence—The way he took at first to lay a foundation for Christianity among the natives; and of the subsequent methods he made use of to carry on the work; and the assistance he received from the first Indian convert, the memorable Hiacomoes—Of his self-denial, and the hardships he endured in the important business of gospelizing the Indians—What tended to obstruct the propagation of Christianity among the Indians—What conducted to remove the obstacles—Of Mr. Mayhew's success at different periods in bringing the natives to the knowledge and profession of the Christian faith—Of the method he took to settle civil order, and some degree of gospel discipline among the Indians by their express desire—Who and how qualified those were who were esteemed Christians—Of the moral and religious conduct of the Indians, who professed Christianity under the ministry of Mr. Mayhew, and his successors—On his setting sail for England to solicit help in carrying on the good work he had begun—Of his premature death, and the pungent grief it excited in Mr. Eliot, and others; and very particularly in the minds of those Indians, whom he had been an instrument of converting to the Christian faith—Some traits of his character by the Rev. Henry Whitefield.

IN 1642, Thomas Mayhew, Esq. sends his only son, Mr Thomas Mayhew, jun. with a few other persons, to settle at Martha's Vineyard. This young gentleman was about 21 years of age, when he first took up his residence on the island. He was favored with a good education—was esteemed a person of very good mental powers, and was viewed as a man of real and distinguished piety.

Soon after his settlement at this place, his father removed to it, and became the governor of the island.

The small plantation of English, sensible of the worth of Mr. Mayhew, jun. and satisfied with his qualifications for the work of the ministry, soon called him to this service.

But his English congregation being then but small, he was earnestly desirous of being more extensively useful. With great compassion he beheld the natives, consisting of several thousands on this and the adjacent islands, perishing in utter ignorance of the true God and eternal life; laboring under strange delusions; worshipping for Deities creatures of their own imagination, or of that of their ancestors; and in such a miserable situation as the apostle represents the Ephesians before their conversion,—“Without Christ, being aliens from the commonwealth of Israel, and strangers from the Covenants of promise, having no hope, and without God in the world.”

It must be spoken to the lasting honor of Mr. Mayhew, that he so early, and diligently thought upon this question, “What can be done in order to the salvation of the miserable Indians,” whom he, with compassion, saw perishing for lack of vision—that he began so soon, after his settlement on the Island, to make attempts to bring them to an acquaintance with the gospel. His heart was in the work; and we shall observe in the sequel, that he pursued it with unremitting diligence, and fervent zeal.

He first endeavors to gain some acquaintance with them, and by a friendly behaviour to conciliate their affections.

That he might be more useful to them on spiritual accounts especially, as well as for other reasons, he soon set himself to learn their language, and with diligent application became a good master of it.—He was sensible, that it was of great consequence to become well acquainted with it, that he might more effectually teach them Christianity, and have a fairer prospect of success. Every one must be sensible, that he judged wisely in this matter.

It was doubtless then, as well as now, difficult to obtain interpreters with requisite qualifications, men, who are not only well acquainted with both languages, and have quickness of thought and ready utterance; but persons of prudence, of fortitude, and of engaging manners, by which they may ingratiate themselves with the heathen—persons of a pious mind, and zeal in the cause—men of an exemplary life, and good proficient in sacred science, so that they will easily apprehend the meaning of the instructor, and communicate his ideas readily, clearly, and with precision.

However, on supposition such interpreters could be obtained, (not to mention the expence of supporting them) yet it must be obvious to all, that religious instructions cannot be given to so good advantage in this way, as by an immediate address by a well qualified Missionary, who is competently acquainted with the language of those, whom he is teaching. In the former method doctrinal knowledge will, in a comparative view, be gained but slowly. There is greater danger that the speaker will be misunderstood in the former, than in the latter way. Besides the Indian language is said to be destitute of many terms, by which some of the peculiar doctrines of Christianity could be directly communicated; and it requires particular skill, and attention in a missionary to convey tolerably just ideas concerning these points. An understanding of the language of his hearers must evidently be of particular benefit in this case.

It may be added, that when the Indians ask questions, as has been customary after the sermon, and public prayers are finished, the preacher will be under superior advantages to understand and answer them; and much time may also be saved in this way. Mr. David Brainerd regretted, that he had not been able to gain a better knowledge of the Indian tongue. And Mr. Sergeant, the first missionary at Stockbridge, found that his acquaintance with it was of very great use to him in his mission.

Mr. Mayhew, having acquired the necessary knowledge of the Indian language, immediately applied himself to the missionary work. He well knew, that it was of the utmost importance, in order to obtain desired success, to ingratiate himself with the natives, and gain a passage to their hearts. He conversed with them in a pleasing and affable manner, by which means he wrought himself into their affections and thus had the easier access to their minds. He treats them in a friendly and condescending manner; denies himself, and does his utmost to oblige and help them. He takes all fitting occasions to insinuate and show the sincere and tender love, and good will he bare them: And as he grows in their acquaintance and affection, he proceeds to express his great concern and pity for their immortal souls. He tells them of their deplorable condition under the power of Satan, that envious and malicious spirit, who not only kept them in ignorance of those earthly good things, which might render their lives in this world much more comfortable; but of those also which might bring them to eternal happiness in the world to come; what a kind and powerful God the English served, and how the Indians might happily come into his favor, and protection.*

Under existing circumstances, Mr. Mayhew deemed it not expedient, at first, to make an attempt to gain a public audience of the Indians: He was, it seems, either convinced, that he could not succeed, were he to make a trial; or, that if he should succeed, it would not subserve the cause so well, at that time, as other measures. He therefore applies himself to the work with great diligence and zeal in more private ways; hoping, that after some time, his sphere of action, and usefulness might be enlarged, as, to his great encouragement, he afterwards found. Sometimes he goes to particular houses of persons, whom he esteemed most rational and candid; at other times he discoursed with particular men.

The first Indian, who embraced the motion of forsaking the false Gods, and adoring Jehovah, was Hiacoomes: His conversion was in 1643.† This Indian, living near the English settlement, formed an acquaintance with them; and being a man of a sober, thoughtful, and ingenious spirit, he not only visited their houses; but also their public, and religious meetings; at which time Mr. Mayhew took particular notice of him; discoursed often with him; invited him to his house every Lord's day evening; gave him a clear account of the nature, reasonableness, and importance of the Christian faith; and by the energy of the divine Spirit, he was quickly brought to

* Matthew Mayhew's triumphs of grace.

† Governor Hutchinson observes—
"The first instance of an Indian, who gave any hopes of becoming a real Christian, was that of Hiacoomes—Hist. Mass. Vol. 1, p. 161.

a firm and resolute adherence to it, notwithstanding those many trials he experienced in consequence of his profession, which would have shaken the constancy of one, who was not rooted and grounded in the faith.

Mr. Mayhew having, by the blessing of God upon his pious endeavors, gained Hiacoomes; he first employs him as a faithful instrument to prepare his way to the rest of the natives; instructing him more, and more in this new religion; and showing him how to recommend it to them, and to answer their arguments, and objections against it.

And as Mr. Mayhew endeavored the good of these heathens, by discoursing with as many as were willing to have any conference with him; so with Hiacoomes in particular, whom he from time to time, earnestly desired to communicate the knowledge, which he had received, to those, whom Mr. Mayhew could not so easily meet with. Thus they united their counsels—wrought together, and by the blessing of God, soon gained some others.

After a little while, Mr. Mayhew had the pleasure to observe happy consequences resulting from these private interviews, which he, and his faithful friend Hiacoomes, had with the natives.

And he persisted in these pious attempts to gospelize the heathen, 'till a way was opened for addressing them in public in the year 1646, the occasion of which will be related in the sequel.

As soon as Mr. Mayhew had once entered upon his public services, he found his labor, and hardships to increase; and that he had greater need of self-denial than before.

He redoubles his diligence—is incessant in his pious endeavors. He does not spare his body either by day, or by night. He readily travels and lodges in their smoky wigwams; and cheerfully submits to self-denial, and such hardships to which heretofore he was a stranger.

His way in public then was, by preaching a lecture every fortnight, to which both men, women, and children came. He first prayed, then preached, then catechised, then sang a psalm, and all in their own language. After sermon, he generally spent more time than in the sermon itself; reasoning with them in a more familiar manner, answering their questions, removing their doubts, silencing their cavils, and resolving cases put to him.

Every Saturday morning he confers with Hiacoomes more privately about his subject matter of preaching to the natives on both parts of the following day; Mr. Mayhew directing him in the choice of his text, and in the management of it.

When abroad upon his mission, and obliged to lodge in their wigwams, he usually spent a considerable portion of the night, partly in relating the ancient histories in the holy scriptures, a subject with which the natives were at first greatly surprized, and not a little entertained; and partly in discoursing upon such other topics, as he judged most conducive to promote their benefit: He particularly proposes to their consideration, such things, as he thinks requisite in the first place: He fairly solves their subtle objections; and tells them that they might plainly see, that it was purely in good will to them, from whom he could expect no reward, that he spent so much time, and pains, and endured so much cold and wet, fatigue and trouble.

For several years the gospel made but slow progress among the natives. Mr. Mayhew, as well as other missionaries, before and since, found many obstacles. Various things tended to obstruct the good work.

The Indians, in common with other Heathens, must be supposed to have been prejudiced in favor of, and firmly attached to the religion, in which they had been educated. "All men have naturally a veneration for the religion of their ancestors; and the prejudices of education in a false religion are commonly insuperable without the extraordinary grace of God." "Hath a nation changed her Gods, which are yet no Gods?"*

They would reason, as many in heathen countries had done before them; "Shall we forsake the Gods, whom our forefathers, from time immemorial have worshipped, Gods who have been kind to us, for a strange God, utterly unknown to us?—Shall we abandon a religion, which our ancestors embraced?—A religion venerable for antiquity—a religion, which approves itself to our minds: Shall we forsake this for one to which we are entire strangers, which is brought to us by foreigners, with whose character we are not sufficiently acquainted; and who, for ought we can tell, may have some sinister end in view, in proposing to us to receive it; and may not, in the least degree, have our good at heart?

Thus many stood strongly for their own meetings, ways, and customs, as being in their account much more advantageous and agreeable, than ours, in which, as they said, there is nothing but praying, and talking, and this, in a manner too still and sober for them.

This attachment to their own

* Jer. x. 11

religion was a general obstacle, and a very powerful one, which it was extremely difficult to remove.

Another great impediment was the opposition made by the Sachems. Like most princes, in the early times of the gospel, they would not give any countenance to that new religion, which was proposed to them; on the contrary, they used strenuous endeavors to prevent their subjects from embracing it. Almost all of them, and of their other chief men, either openly, or privately opposed it. The Sachems seemed to fear, that if their subjects should receive the gospel, their own authority would be diminished—that Christianity might introduce some great revolution in the government to their detriment—that they, who were for introducing Christianity among them, might have it in contemplation to overturn their civil, as well as religious polity. The lower grades of the people stood in awe of their princes; and were much afraid of counteracting their will: And their example must be supposed to have no small influence; as nothing is more obvious, than that the examples of men in power, and other distinctions, have much sway over the minds of their inferiors and dependents. It required no small degree of faith and fortitude to break thro' this obstacle.*

Ridicule was also tried upon the new converts; particularly upon Hiacoomes. This is what some dread, almost as much as fire and sword. This is a weapon, upon which infidels, in all ages, from the first date of Christianity, down to the times of lord Shaftesbury, Thomas Paine, and others of a similar turn of mind respecting revelation, have had great dependence. These untutored Indians were not unacquainted with the force of it. They assaulted Hiacoomes with this weapon, but, as will appear hereafter, he with skill and dexterity parried it off. They doubtless thought, that as he was the first convert among them, the most strenuous advocate for Christianity in that small number, who had embraced it, and very zealous in propagating it, as far as in his power; if, by ridicule, they could drive him to renounce it, others, less firm, and less established in this new religion, might follow his example; and the multitudes, who still adhered to their old religion, might be deterred from so much as examining into the grounds of Christianity, and giving any encouragement to those who might be desirous of making any further essays to propagate it among them; and so this seed, which was planted only in a few minds, might be destroyed.

* Matthew Mayhew, triumph's of grace—Indian Converts, p. 2, 3, 77, 283.

In 1644, Hiacoomes, the year after his conversion to Christianity, went to an Indian's house, where several of that nation were met together: Upon his entrance, they laughed and derided him, "Here comes the Englishman." A Sagamore present joined with the other Indians, and spake in the manner following; "I wonder, that you, who are a young man, and have a wife and two children, should love the English, and their ways, and forsake the powows"—and he added a dissuative, drawn from the topic of family and personal safety; "What would you do, if any of you were sick? Whither would you go for help? If I were in your case, nothing should draw me from our gods and powows."

After Mr. Mayhew and Hi-

coomes were allowed to address the natives in public, in the year 1646, and Mr. Mayhew was defired by Tawanquatuck, the first convert among the Sachems, to preach in a stated course to his people, the infidel Indians derided and scoffed at those, who attended the lecture, and blasphemed the God, whom they worshipped, which very much damped the spirits of some in the way, which they were pursuing; and hindered others, for a time, from entering into it, or even casting an eye towards it. Such power has ridicule over the human mind!

NOR were these the only impediments to the success of the gospel on the island: For so inveterate was the hatred of some to Christianity, that, not only was Hiacoomes abused by blows by an ill-natured and malicious Sagamore; but even the life of Tawanquatuck was in great danger by a daring attempt made to assassinate him. This was in the year 1647. Tho' he lost not his life, for that was remarkably preserved; yet he did not escape without a wound. The cause of this murderous attempt was, as the Indians said, for his walking with the English: And Mr. Mayhew observes, that it was supposed both by them, and the English, that the Sachem's forwardness for setting up, and continuing the lecture mentioned above, was another thing, which incited the wretch to this cruel undertaking. A regard to personal safety would undoubtedly so operate upon many timorous minds, as to prevent them, for a season, from paying attention to the gospel*.

(To be continued.)

On God's making his own glory his last end.

THE term glory, as it relates to the Most High, is sometimes used, in the holy scriptures, to denote the inherent excellency of the divine nature; at others, the respect and honor due to his holy name. In the former sense it appears to have been used by Moses, when he besought the Lord to shew him his glory: For, the answer was, "I will cause all my goodness to pass before thee—and the Lord passed by before him, and proclaimed, The Lord, the Lord God, merciful and gracious."—In the latter, by God himself, when he says, "I am the Lord; that is my name; and my glory will I not give unto another." When the glory of God is spoken of as an end for which he may be supposed to act, it means, either the intrinsic excellency of his own nature, or the manifestations of it—either that, which constitutes the real worth and beauty of the divine character; or, a display of it, in its genuine fruits. The former is usually termed the inherent glory of God; the latter, his declarative.

The inherent glory of God, as the term respects his moral character, consists in the affection or disposition of his infinite, eternal mind; the declarative, in the visible, external manifestations of this affection, or disposition. What the inherent glory of God is, consisting in the moral disposition of his eternal mind, the holy scriptures very clearly teach us. The apostle John tells us, that God is Love. The same is implied in the name, by which God proclaimed himself before Moses. This constitutes the whole moral nature of the ever blessed God. The divine, eternal mind is wholly made up of goodness and love. The moral character of the infinite God is all made up of love. The Lord exists to do good—For purposes of goodness it is, that he reigns.

* Indian Converts, page 3, and 81.

This being the excellent nature and disposition of the divine mind, it must be that his highest delight is in doing good. God's own enjoyment and happiness must be, in producing and diffusing happiness. He enjoys the good which he does; and enjoys it to an infinitely higher degree, than his creatures, who receive it. A disposition to do good, rejoices in the good which is done. As love seeks, so it enjoys the happiness of others. It is, therefore, the glory of God to do good—to do excellent things. In this way God seeks his own glory—In this way, glorifies himself. This was his motive to create: The same influences in his whole government of the world.

For God to make his own glory his last and highest end, is no other, therefore, than to exercise an infinitely strong disposition to do good; and, to be primarily and principally influenced by it, in the whole of his works and administration. In no other light can the divine character appear so excellent, so lovely and glorious. For God to make his own glory his highest end, naturally and necessarily comprises the greatest good and highest felicity of his moral kingdom. In his making this his highest end, his own happiness and that of his creatures are united—they are so united, that they cannot be separated from each other. God accomplishes his end only in the production of a good, which will satisfy his own infinite good will. In this way he is glorified, and will be glorified forever.

If these observations are just,

and this be the sense, in which God makes his own glory his last end, it will follow,

1. That it is a most desirable thing that God should make his own glory his great and ultimate end. This implies, that the highest felicity of the infinite Being himself is in doing good. Were not the disposition of the divine mind such, that his chief and highest delight is in doing good, what reason have we to suppose, that his laws would be holy, just and good? And what certain evidence could we have, that his government is, or will be wisely administered? Were not this the divine moral character—were not this the disposition of the Eternal Mind, what reason could we have to rejoice, that the Lord reigns? But that a Being, whose love and good will are absolutely infinite, should make his own glory his highest and last end, represents his character in the most excellent light, and renders him an object worthy of the supreme and highest love of his creatures. There is no other or higher end, for which it can be desirable, that the holy God should act. In what can it be desired, that the great God should more delight, than in doing good—in diffusing happiness? When we consider what the moral character of the divine Being really is, as represented in the holy scriptures, we evidently detract from it, by supposing him to be influenced, in his wonderful and excellent works, by any other, or lower end, than his own glory.

2. God's making his own glory his last and highest end, is the fullest and only security for the best and highest good of the created system. Here, and here only, we find evidence, that a good will take place adequate to the purposes of infinite love and good will—a created holiness and happiness, in which God himself will rest satisfied—which will satisfy the infinitely strong desires of divine, unbounded love. We accordingly find it promised to Christ, that he should see of the travail of his soul, and be satisfied. Could that love, that travail of soul, which brought the Lord of glory into our world, and to the cross, be satisfied with a good—with a created felicity, which might have been exceeded? If infinite power and wisdom and love fail of producing such measures of created holiness and created happiness, as cannot be exceeded; the great and glorious God fails, for aught we can see, of accomplishing his last and highest end. And, failing of this, how can he rest satisfied in his works, and enjoy complete and infinite felicity?

3. As God makes his own glory his last and highest end, it is most desirable, that he should be an absolute sovereign. The sovereignty of God principally intends his being influenced to acts of goodness purely by the inherent goodness of his own glorious nature—taking his motives wholly from within himself—his own wisdom alone adopting and directing the measures for accomplishing the purposes of his love. Were it not that the glorious God is this absolute sovereign, where would it have been possible for him to find a motive for saving sinners! Where, but in his own infinite good will, could there have been a motive for God's being manifest in flesh—for Christ's dying, and himself becoming a curse! Had not the holy God been moved to give his only begotten Son—had not the glorious Redeemer been influenced to that humiliating and painful work, which lays the only foundation for the recovery of sinners, purely by the inherent, infinite good will and love of the divine nature itself; the work of redemption never would, or could have been accomplished: Nor could sinners of mankind ever have been saved. And, whatever disposition might have existed in any one for the salvation of sinners, had not God's wisdom alone devised the plan, and chosen and directed the measures for its accomplishment, we must, all, infallibly have perished forever. It is infinitely best, that the unerring wisdom of God should alone direct the measures for accomplishing such good, as his own infinite love alone can incline him to accomplish. What can be more desirable, than that such a Being as the Lord is should be an absolute sovereign! Considering the moral character, and the infinite perfection of God, what more precious doctrine, than that of his absolute sovereignty! Who, that is a friend to the greatest good, can understandingly be an enemy to it!

4. It is easy to see that, had there not been such fallen, sinful creatures as we are, there would have been no opportunity for a discovery of such infinite strength of divine love and good will, as evidently appear in the recovery and salvation of sinners.—Creatures would have had no advantage to see, that the divine Being possesses such treasures of good will, as to be influenced to such wonders of goodness—infinite undeserved goodness, by nothing but the mere infinite benevolence of his own heart! That glorious sovereignty, which implies self-moving infinite goodness—a disposition to do good, for the pleasure of doing it—doing the greatest possible and the most undeserved good, for the sake of the delight there is in doing it.

never could have been seen in its glory, had there not been such infinitely unworthy and ill-deserving objects as we are, toward whom it may be displayed, and on whom it may operate.

5. If God's own glory be his last and highest end, and if his goodness is his glory, it might reasonably be expected, that he make some monuments of his just and everlasting displeasure. Should the infinitely good God make no distinctions among mankind, having mercy on whom he will have mercy; how apt would creatures be to suggest, that there were other motives for the good which he does to sinners, than those by which he designs to make it appear he is solely influenced—other reasons, than the supreme delight, which the infinite God has in doing good! Without such a distinction, how could that glorious sovereignty, which is the highest evidence of infinite, incomprehensible love, ever have been seen and enjoyed!

God is so ordering things, and will forever so dispose them, as to exhibit the brightest evidence, that he is goodness itself—pure, infinite goodness and love. This is God's great end—This is to act for his own glory—This is his wise and glorious sovereignty. And what abundant reason have all creatures to rejoice, that God makes his own glory his last end—That such a Being is a sovereign and will glorify himself—his own great and excellent name!—To rejoice in a glory and sovereignty to do good—the most and greatest good! Infinitely greater will be the felicity of his moral kingdom, for these glorious attributes, forever and ever.

What a beautiful and blessed harmony is there in the doctrines of the word of God! How are they all fitted to make the most lively impressions, and give the most exalted views of the transcendent and incomprehensible excellency of the moral character of the glorious God! No one but he, who possesses, could have drawn and exhibited such a character!—a character so infinitely friendly to the greatest good of the universe; and, which so certainly and perfectly secures it! In contending with those doctrines, which represent the Lord as an absolute sovereign, ever acting for his own glory, why is it not evident, not only that we oppose our own greatest and best good, but that we are enemies to God's highest and most excellent felicity, and the greatest good of the moral system!

TO THE EDITORS OF THE CONNECTICUT EVANGELICAL MAGAZINE.

ONE of your correspondents has requested an explanation of 1 Peter, iv. 6. "For, for this cause" was the gospel preached also to "them that are dead, that they" might be judged, according to "men, in the flesh; but live, according to God, in the spirit." If the following attempt to explain the difficult passage should appear to reflect any light upon it, you are requested to publish it.

I THINK the phrase to them that are dead, or, to the dead, as the original word is strictly rendered, is to be taken literally, intending those who had finished their course on earth, and not metaphorically, intending those who were spiritually dead, or dead in sin. I incline to this opinion for the following reasons.

1. The words immediately preceding "Who shall give account" to him that is ready to judge the “quick and the dead” lead to this construction; there, the word rendered the dead is the same as in the passage in question, and is evidently used in its literal sense, and it would be arbitrary, unless the scope of the writer plainly required it, to depart from the literal meaning of the word, in explaining the passage. In those words of our Saviour “Let the dead bury their dead,” the sense requires a variation in the meaning of the word dead, it is first used metaphorically, and then literally: But here, the sense does not appear to require a variation. On the contrary, the consideration, that Christ was ready to judge the dead, as well as the living, naturally led the apostle to point out the general design of the preaching of the gospel with respect to all, in every age, and under every dispensation, from the beginning, as well as to those, who were then living, and on whom the ends of the world were come.

2. The word also, which is essential in the translation, supports the same construction; “For this cause was the gospel preached also to the dead”; the phrase is elliptical, the correlative part is not expressed, but clearly understood. The sentence completed would stand thus. “For this cause was the gospel preached also to the dead, as it is to the living.” Now it is evident, that in such a connection the term living must stand directly opposed to the term dead, they must be taken both literally, or both metaphorically; if metaphorically, the sentence would stand thus. For this cause was the gospel preached to the spiritually dead, as well as to the spiritually alive; or, more simply, to sinners as well as to saints, that they might be judged, &c. but there seems to be no good reason, in this view of the words, for discriminating these opposite characters; because the end of preaching the gospel expressed in the words that they might be judged, &c. whatever may be their meaning, is the same with respect to both; and the sentiment would have been better expressed in general terms. For this cause was the gospel preached to men that they might be judged, &c. but if the term be taken literally, it will express, in a word, what is illustrated and dwelt on, in the epistle to the Hebrews, as a matter of great moment, that the gospel has been preached, though under types and shadows, under all former dispensations, from the beginning, and that its design was ever the same.

3. The verb was preached in the past indefinite, which is correctly rendered from the original, is proper, if the expression the dead be taken literally, but not so if taken metaphorically; for, in that case, the sentiment would be better expressed, in the present tense. For this cause the gospel is preached to dead sinners; its import then would be as extensive as the subject requires, and would apply, without limitation, to dead sinners, in every period of time, past, present and to come; for whatever be meant by their being judged, &c. it will apply as well to all, in every age, as to those in former ages.

4. The expression in its literal sense is analogous to that in the 19th verse of the preceding chapter, “By which also he went and preached unto the spirits in prison,” that is, to the sinners of the old world, who were in prison, or in the state of departed souls, reserved unto judgment, at the time when the apostle wrote. It is also perfectly similar to that in Ruth, i. 8. “The Lord deal kindly with you as ye have dealt with the dead, that is, with their father-in-law, and their husbands, who were dead when Naomi spake the words. The expression therefore, in this sense, is not solitary, and may be said to be in the manner of this apostle.

I proceed now to consider the import of the phrase "that they might be judged, according to men, in the flesh; but live according to God, in the spirit." When the apostle says, "For, for this cause, was the gospel preached," &c. the cause is not to be sought in what precedes, but in what follows; the words recited express the cause. It is proper to remark, that the two members of the clause are perfectly contrasted with each other, and even the parts of those members are so; that they might be judged, and that they might live according to men and according to God: in the flesh and in the spirit. To live, according to God, in the spirit, seems to be the same as to be renewed in holiness, and, in the actings of spiritual life, to walk according to the will of God. To be judged, according to men, in the flesh, then, will mean to be sentenced and slain by the law, as to that depraved nature and evil concupiscence which is common to men in their fallen state, and which is enmity against God and his law.

Several of the divine writers give a kind of distinct personality to the opposite principles of sin and holiness in men, the sinful principle or nature is called, the old man, or the flesh; and the holy principle or nature, produced in the new-birth, is called the new man, or the spirit. The former is represented with respect to all Christians as crucified with Christ; as buried with him in baptism; as the man or person over whom the law hath absolute dominion as long as he liveth; as slain by the law; and as dead to the law by the body of Christ: The latter is represented as risen with Christ; as married to Christ; as freed from sin; as the servant of God; as delivered from the dominion of the law; it is represented as succeeding the former in every saint, but, during the present life, co-existing and conflicting with it; and, at death, through the grace of Christ, triumphing. The passage in question appears to be of like import; it comprehends, in a word, what is distinctly illustrated in other parts of the new-testament; and it may, on the foregoing principles, be thus paraphrased.

For this end was the good news of salvation proclaimed to sinners, under every dispensation of grace, in the past ages of the world, as well as to those now living in the days of the gospel, that the depraved nature, common to men in their fallen state, might be sentenced and slain by the law, under which it is holden; and that a new and holy nature and life might be formed and supported in those, to whom the proclamation is made.

That this is the true sense of the passage is further evident from the scope of the apostle's reasoning. From the sufferings of Christ for our sins, mentioned in the 18th verse of the preceding chapter, the apostle begins this, with an exhortation to Christians to put on the mind of Christ, as their best armour; or to imitate his divine temper, in the exercise of faith, trust, hope, and joy in God, and of meekness and patience under reproaches and sufferings, in the cause of God; and for this he urges the further reason, that he that hath suffered in the flesh, as Christ had, and as every Christian has, being crucified with Christ, both ceased from sin. Christ ceased from sin, in ceasing to be an offering for sin, and the Christian, in crucifying the flesh with its affections and lusts; in dying to sin and living to God; and, therefore, he ought to arm himself with the mind of Christ, in order to maintain a consistency of character. He further urges, that having ceased from sin, the Christian ought not to live, the rest of his time in the world, to the lusts of men, but to the will of God; and that the time past of his life may suffice him to have wrought the will of the Gentiles. The apostle having next noticed the abusive treatment the Christian receives from the unbelieving world, for refusing to run with them to the same excess of riot, and the account they must render to him that is ready to judge the quick and the dead, introduces the words in question; by which he shews that mortification of sin, and holiness in heart and life, to which he exhorts Christians, are the genuine fruit of the gospel in all those who hear and embrace it.

OMICRON.

TO THE EDITORS OF THE CONNECTICUT EVANGELICAL MAGAZINE.

Please to publish the following, if you judge it of sufficient importance.

THAT infidelity or a rejection of Jesus Christ, the Son of God, either openly and avowedly, or more secretly, is very prevalent, admits not of a doubt. And those who reject Christ, by unbelief, very generally flatter themselves, that they love God. They profess high friendship for the Deity, although they reject Christ the Son of God. A question may arise, whether it be not certain, that such persons do deceive themselves—whether such as do not receive and embrace Christ, in his mediatorial character, are not just as far from receiving and loving God; or whether it be not as certain that men reject God as that they reject Christ, and so that a rejection of Christ and an atheistical heart, or rejection of the true character of God are always united? It appears to me that the sacred scriptures do, in a very clear and decisive manner, answer in the affirmative; that such as by unbelief do reject Christ, in his mediatorial capacity, do reject God, and so are, however they may profess, really atheists at heart. We read John v. 23. That all men should HONOR the SON even as they HONOR the FATHER. He that HONORETH NOT THE SON, HONORETH NOT THE FATHER. On these words it may be observed, that in the first place, all men are required to honor the Son even as they honor the Father; that is, in the same manner, and with the same honors. By the Son is undoubtedly meant Jesus Christ, in his mediatorial capacity. By the Father is undoubtedly meant God, the Father of all.—By honoring the one as we do the other, can be meant nothing less than bestowing the same affection and exercising the same respect to one as to the other. I would observe further, that what is meant when it is enjoined on all men, to honor the Son even as they do the Father, is not, merely, that all men should honor and treat Christ the Son as they do the Father, but to honor him as they ought to honor the Father.—To bestow the same honors on him, and to manifest the same respect for him that they ought to exercise towards the Father. When men treat the Son with the same respect, and exercise the same love and affection for him which they ought to exercise towards God the Father, then they will answer the demand which is made in the verse above quoted, that they should honor the Son even as they honor the Father.

It may be observed further, on the passage under consideration, that all men are not only required to honor the Son even as they honor the Father, but it is also asserted, that they do in fact treat the Son and the Father in the same manner, whatever they may conceive of their own exercises. For it is added, "He that HONORETH NOT THE SON, HONORETH NOT THE FATHER." The meaning of which must be this, that he who does not receive, love and obey the Son, does not receive and acknowledge God the Father; or, he that rejects Christ does reject and disown the Father also. They always go together. Men have no more love to God the Father, than they have to the Son.—This is not only the plain language of the words under consideration, but the gospel every where proceeds on this idea. A man's character and relation to God, is every where determined, by the manner in which he treats Christ. If he believes in him and receives him, he is considered as the friend of God. "To as many as received him to them gave he power to become the sons of God." It is further said, "WHOSOEVER SHALL RECEIVE ME, RECEIVETH HIM THAT SENT ME." On the other hand it is said, "HE THAT DESPISETH ME, DESPISETH HIM THAT SENT ME." It appears clear therefore, that the gospel does proceed on the idea, that men do really treat the Father just as they treat the Son. If they receive the Son and love him, they also receive and love the Father. But if they reject and despise the Son, they reject and despise God the Father also. They are as certainly atheists and rejectors of God in their hearts, as they are unbelievers and rejectors of Christ. It is hence we find, that unbelievers in Christ and idolaters are yoked together, in Rev. xxi. 8.—And that it must be the case, that such as reject and disown the Son, do reject and disown the Father, appears very evident, from the few following observations, which I beg leave just to suggest.

1. The Son has the same character which the Father has. "He is the brightness of his (i. e. the Father's) glory." The fulness of the Godhead dwelleth in Christ. Now as the character of Christ is the same with that of the Father, so those who reject the one will reject the other. There must be the same objections to the one as to the other.

2. The same thing is evident, as the Father and the Son are united in one and the same cause and plan. The hearts of the Son and the Father are equally engaged in the work of redemption. A rejection of the Son as mediator must imply a rejection of the Father, as being equally concerned in the same work.

3. The same thing becomes further evident, from this consideration, that by rejecting the Son, men do as really reject the testimony of the Father and deny his truth, and make him a liar, as they do the Son. The rejector of Christ practically says, that there is nothing in his pretences—He is not the Son of God nor the saviour of men—I will not receive him as such. Which is as much as to say, that he is an impious impostor; and if so, he is the most impious impostor that ever undertook to impose on mankind. Which is as much as to say, that the Father is a liar as well as the Son. If there be an imposition in the affair, the Father had as high a hand in it as the Son. The Father did every thing which could be done, to testify, that Christ was his Son and the Saviour of men. His mighty power was exercised in the miracles Christ wrought, which are as well authenticated as any facts can be. The Father raised the Son from the dead; thereby acknowledging him to be his Son; which is a fact that cannot be reasonably questioned. The Father did, therefore, in the most open and public manner attest the truth of Christ's pretensions to being the Son of God, and the appointed Saviour of men. The same imputation, therefore, by a rejection of Christ, falls on the Father as on the Son. There is equally a denial of the Father's truth and veracity as of Christ's. A rejection of Christ is as plain a declaration that the Father is a liar, as that the Son is. Precisely in this manner is the case considered by the apostle John. "He that believeth not God hath made him a liar, because he believeth not the record, that God gave of his Son." A rejection of the Son therefore, is always attended with a rejection of the Father; as it always implies and includes in it, a rejection of the truth and veracity, both of the Father and the Son.

4. It appears from the tenders which the Son makes, that a rejection of Christ the Son, is also a rejection of the Father. The tender which Christ the Son makes to men, is, of the Father, through himself as mediator;—as the way and medium of access. The very act of rejecting the Son includes in it a rejection of the Father. It is a direct declaration, I will not have the Father.

From this view of the case it appears, that men although they may not honor the Son as they ought to honour the Father, yet, in fact do treat the Father just as they do the Son. If they despise and reject the Son, they certainly do despise and reject the Father also.

A few remarks, which are important, may be made on the truth above illustrated.

1. One remark is, that the requirements of the gospel evidently suppose, that Jesus Christ is really God as well as man.

We are required to honor the Son even as we honor the Father. To give him the same room in our hearts, and to pay him the same respect that we do the Father. This necessarily implies his divinity. That he is considered as being really God; otherwise he cannot be considered as being worthy of the same honor.

2. We may remark, why unbelief in or a rejection of Christ is considered as being so very criminal as it is in the gospel.

It is because it is a rejection of God. It is a refusal to own him—It is a virtual declaration that God is a liar; and a refusal to receive and acknowledge Him.

3. We see from what has been said, that a rejection of Christ and atheism go hand in hand. It is true that all unbelievers in Christ do not avowedly reject God. But they do in their hearts. They reject one who has the same character and perfections—They reject his authority and testimony. "He that despiseth me, says Christ despiseth him that sent me." And, "He that honoreth not the Son, honoreth not the Father."

4. It appears from the foregoing observations, that such as reject Christ do deceive themselves, if they conclude in their own minds, that they have any true love to God. They may love such a God as they may form in their own minds, but not the God of the bible. For, "He that honoreth not the Son honoreth not the Father." Men pay no more regard to the Father, than they do to the Son.

Finally. We may remark, that those who reject Christ the Son, have no reason to flatter themselves of being saved by the mercy of the Father.

Those who reject Christ, altho' they do not expect he will save them, yet they hope the Father will have mercy on them.—They go on through life (unless God shows them their delusion) comforting themselves that God will have mercy on them. But why do they flatter themselves that the Father will save them! Do they not reject and despise the Father just as much as they do the Son! If men will keep on scripture ground they must conclude, that if they reject the Son, they do reject the Father. And that, if an absolute rejection of either destroys the foundation of confidence, they cannot flatter themselves of sharing in the mercy, either of the Son or the Father. If they leave that ground, they may sleep in the arms of delusion for a season; but let them beware of the consequences!

GAUUS.

This life a pilgrimage and conflict.

THERE is no permanent rest to individuals in this life. Men are swiftly passing thro' all its stages from infancy to old age. Each stage has its burdens and trials. The infant cries—the schoolboy has his troubles—youth its vexations—middle age its cares, and the aged have their infirmities. Disappointments, dangers and evils succeed each other. Men are always constrained to be on their guard, and to exert themselves to accomplish one object or another, and to surmount, or endure this difficulty and trial, or that. They have no opportunity to sit down in quiet, unemployed and unconcerned. Every day brings its evils. Sickness, wounds, enemies, imprudencies, contentions, poverty, or other troubles keep us in a perpetual agitation. This is strikingly illustrated in the book of Ecclesiastes. It is very much the subject of the whole book. And the affairs of this world are pronounced vanity and vexation of spirit.

There is no rest in the political concerns of nations, any more than in the private walks of individuals. Men who are called to attend to these things, always see something important on the eve, which alarms their apprehensions and demands their most vigorous exertions. They have one evil against which they must now guard, and that is scarce suffered or surmounted before another is presented to their view. At one time war, at another a revolution; in one instance intrigues, in the next insurrections and disasters keep the public mind in perpetual commotion. Now a real alarm is sounded, and then one that is false. One thing must now be done, and then another; and public characters are constrained to be always on their guard, and exert all their activity, invention and abilities, or serious calamities will involve the nation in distress. So things have gone on with all nations who are the subjects of history, and so they will doubtless go on in future.

There will never be a time in which the officers of a nation may sit at their ease, and say, We may now lay aside fear and exertion, all is well, and like to be well without our further anxiety and care.

Again : There is no rest to the church of Christ in this world. Satan is continually plotting its destruction and giving it disturbance. He is artful and malicious, and has numerous agents, who are willing to be employed at his pleasure. Now he is introducing one error, and then another. At one time he attacks it with heresies, at another with covered or open infidelity. Sometimes he introduces discords and separations, at others ignorance and enthusiasm, or cold unfeeling opinion, which does not affect the heart. External difficulties have sometimes oppressed the church, and sometimes it has labored with internal embarrassments. The church has frequently appeared to have its very existence endangered, sometimes from one cause, and then from another. On these accounts, the ministers of Christ, and all the members of his church have been constrained by absolute necessity to be vigilant, prayerful and active, continually exhibiting the evidence, importance and excellency of the truth, and the falsehood and pernicious tendency of error in innumerable shapes, answering objections, repelling attacks, and combatting enemies and false pretensions. The watchmen are necessitated to stand continually on the watch-tower, and all the soldiers of Christ to lie upon their arms. How many different attacks have been made upon the church in the present generation ? Universalism, deism, unbounded catholicism, atheism, attempts to divide it into parties and denominations who hold no communion or visible charity with each other, endeavors to relax discipline—to introduce carnal men—to excite differences and opposition respecting the ordinances of the gospel—to sink it into contempt, and to destroy it in one way or other, have been all employed for its ruin. And ministers and Christians are called upon to exert themselves to counteract all these devices—defend the truth—inculcate the doctrines of the gospel and unite to promote harmony, discipline and vital piety, the spread of gospel truths, and the awakening and salvation of souls. Care and warfare are always to be employed ; there is no season in which we may put off the harness. Unlooked for evils are daily coming ; one attack and perplexity is succeeded by another. Vigilance and activity are always demanded. Hence Peter says, “ Be sober, be vigilant, because your adversary the Devil, as a roaring lion, walketh about seeking whom he may devour, whom resist, steadfast in the faith ” If we look back into the histories of the church, we shall find that it has always had to combat with much opposition, and many have been called to contend even unto blood. The church has suffered by persecution, by false teachers, by corruption, by heresies, by enemies without, and by false brethren who have crept in at unawares to spy out and subvert its liberty. And this will be the case, until the angel spoken of in the Revelations, shall come down from heaven with a great chain in his hand, and lay hold on the dragon, that old serpent, which is the devil and satan, and bind him a thousand years.—This world is not a resting place for the church, which is in a militant state. There remaineth a rest for the people of God ; but it is in the coming world.

Further ; There is in this life no rest to individual Christians. They have so many trials and temptations, and such a swarm of remaining corruptions, that they are obliged to watch and pray without ceasing. Some insidious enemies concealed at every turn, and there are many that are openly set against them. They are assailed by ridicule and insinuating enticements, perplexed with the sophistry of such as lie in wait to deceive, are always encumbered with a body of death, and a law in the members, warring against the law of the mind. Now worldly troubles and perplexing cares, steal upon them, and now they are injured by outward prosperity. At one time they have little of the light of God's countenance and sink almost into a state of despondency, and then they are in danger from spiritual pride, and an over confidence in themselves. A strange unfeelingness palsies their hearts and prevents their fruitfulness at this time, and a false zeal annoys them at that. Peter was too confident one hour, and too timid the next. Their exertions one day are successful, on the day following they seem to labor in vain and spend their strength for nought. Smiles and chastisements come upon them in a varied succession. They are often surprised on a sudden with unexpected trials and temptations, which wound them before they are aware.—All believers, who have any considerable acquaintance with the Christian life, will bear me witness, that their past experience corresponds with this representation. This is certainly the language of the holy scriptures*. Christians must expect that such things will remain until they arrive to glory. We must thro' much tribulation

* Romans vii.

enter into the kingdom of God.* Thus there is no rest for men in this world as individuals or communities—not even for the church and people of God. Therefore it is folly for men to flatter themselves, that if they can surmount the existing difficulties, they shall have no further occasion for anxiety. It is as idle, as for the infant to say, If I can but obtain that straw or rattle, my sorrows will be over and all will be paradise. It is not the design of providence that we should in this life be free from the necessity of care and exertion. Nations will continue to be in critical circumstances. It is folly for the church in the present age to expect the day when there will be no enemies, corruptions, heresies, divisions and difficulties. Offences must needs come, that the true disciples may be tried and stand approved ; but woe unto him by whom the offence cometh. Individual Christians, in this militant state, have no reason to promise themselves much quiet repose. They may receive an hundred fold in this life ; but Christ says it will be with persecutions. They may rejoice ; but it must be in tribulation. They may have great peace with God ; but it will be with much running, wrestling, striving and fighting. When one difficulty is passed, perhaps a much worse will succeed. Raised expectations of tranquillity will only multiply disappointments. But Christians are not to faint or be discouraged on this account. There remains a rest, and an heavenly inheritance for them, when they will rest from their labors, and their works will follow them. It is our business—our proper calling to conflict with evil in this life. ' Despise not the chastening of the Lord, neither faint when thou art rebuked of him.' 'In due season we shall reap if we faint not.' Christ has promised that 'the gates of hell shall not prevail against his church.' He will raise them up faithful ministers, and give his people that firmness, vigilance, activity, faith and prayer, by which they shall come off conquerors, thro' him that hath loved them. These labors are the things which shall work out for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory. 'Fear not, little flock, it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom.'

How suitable it is that we should account ourselves pilgrims and strangers on earth. What folly to suffer our hearts to be fixed upon any thing here. We should set our affections on things that are above, and seek a city which hath foundations. How miserable to be intoxicated with any thing on earth.—How sweet will heaven be to the people of God, after being weather-beaten, and tossed by the storms of this world through life. How sweet for soldiers to obtain the victory, and be permitted to lay aside the watchings, fatigues and dangers of an hard campaign. How delightful to hear our Lord say, 'Well done, good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord.' Then the labors of this life will be richly compensated.—But how wretched must they be, who never enter into rest. 'There is no rest to the wicked saith my God.' It will be quite insupportable to contemplate an hopeless eternity, of extreme wretchedness, in endless prospect. Let us then lay hold on the hope that is set before us, and fight the good fight of faith.

MIKROS.

FOR THE CONNECTICUT EVANGELICAL MAGAZINE.

Heb. v. 7. "Who in the days of his flesh, when he had offered up prayers and supplications, with strong crying and tears, unto him who was able to save him from death; and was heard in that he feared."

THESE words have a plain reference to the prayer and agony of Christ in the garden, of which the evangelists give a history; and perhaps to what he said when on the cross, when he cried with a loud voice, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" In these supplications and this agony he prayed that the sufferings of which he now had an extraordinary, and more dreadful and overwhelming view and sense, than he ever had before, he asked that if it were possible and consistent with the will of the Father, that the dreadful hour of suffering, the bitter cup which was now full in view, and filled his soul with distress which seemed intolerable, might pass from him, and he be excused from drinking: But if this could not be, that he might be supported and carried through this dreadful scene, so that all the ends of his suffering might be fully answered, in the glory of God and the complete salvation of all the elect.

It was wisely ordered, and of great importance, that the human nature of Christ should have a clear and full view of the sufferings he must undergo in order to make atonement for the sins of men; while he bore their sins, and took the guilt and punishment on himself, and knew what it would cost him, that he might voluntarily give himself up to this, and consent to bear it all, in the most impressive sense and view of it, caufed by the immediate hand of God. In order to this the cup he must drink in his sufferings was set before him in the garden, in all the dreadful bitterness of it, that he might have opportunity to refuse or choose to drink it, while it was thus before him in all the dreadful-ness of it. And what he said in this situation, served to make the most clear and affecting discovery of the impossibility of the salvation of sinners in any way but by his drinking this cup, and suffering all that was implied in it; and of his love to God and his people, in voluntarily giving himself up to these sufferings, in a full view of them, on the supposition of the impossibility of the salvation of sinners in any other way consistent with the will and glory of God.

There is no reason to suppose that the agonizing feelings and exercises of the Saviour were caused by the influence and assaults of Satan on his mind, at this time. The scripture intimates no such thing. But the whole transaction is represented as being between his Father and him, except that it is said, an angel was present to assist and strengthen him.

From the above representation, and other passages of scripture it appears that the cup, and the hour which Christ prayed might be taken away, was not his distress, and agony which took place in the garden, fearing this would put an end to his life. Mark xiv. 35. it is said Christ prayed, that if it were possible the hour might pass from him. And in the following verse the same thing is expressed by this cup. Hence it appears that the hour and cup are the same thing: But the hour did not mean what he suffered in the garden; for after this was over, he said, not the hour is past; but "The hour is come; behold the son of man is betrayed into the hands of sinners." verse 41. And, the hour and his hour is frequently used to denote the time of his last sufferings, Matt. xxvi. 45. "Behold the hour is at hand, and the son of man is betrayed into the hands of sinners." John xii. 27. "Now is my soul troubled; and what shall I say? Father, save me from this hour? But for this cause came I unto this hour." chap. xiii. 1. "When Jesus knew that his hour was come, that he should depart out of this world." chap. xvii. 1. "Father the hour is come; glorify thy Son," &c. And that the cup does not mean what he suffered in the garden is certain, from his speaking of drinking this cup after that distress and agony was over. When Peter had cut off the right ear of the high-priest's servant, Christ said to him, "Put up thy sword into the sheath: The cup which my Father hath given me, shall I not drink it?" John xviii. 11.

It has been supposed that Christ praying the cup might be removed in the sense above explained, is inconsistent with what he says John xii. 27. What shall I say, Father, save me from this hour? But for this cause came I to this hour. Here he seems to say, that he neither could nor would ask to be delivered from death on the cross; as he knew the great design of his coming into the world was to suffer this death, as without this no sinner could be saved.

Answer 1. The human nature of Christ was not in itself omniscient or unchangeable; his feelings and exercises were according to the view he had of the objects which were before him, and he gave more attention to, and was more impressed by those scenes which were immediately before him than with those which were further off, and more out of sight. When the city of Jerusalem and the miserable inhabitants were in full view, and their folly and miserable end were impressed on his mind, he wept over it, saying, if thou hadst known, even thou, at least in this thy day, the things which belong unto thy peace ! But now they are hidden from thine eyes, &c. At another time, and a different situation, he rejoiced in spirit, and said, I thank thee, O Father, Lord of heaven and earth, that thou hast hid these things from the wise and prudent, and hast revealed them unto babes.

The different situation in which Christ was when he prayed in the garden, from that in which he spake the words recorded in John, and from which he had been in all his life before, which has been described above, will account for his different feelings and language, especially if we consider the design which was to be answered by it, which has been briefly mentioned. Different feeling and language ; but not contrary : for,

Ans. 2. He did not say in the garden, Father save me from this hour, unconditionally ; but if it were possible and consistent with the glory and will of God, and the salvation of the elect, otherwise he did not ask or desire the cup might pass from him. His language still was, Father, glorify thy name.

Ans. 3. It would be really inconsistent with his words which John relates, and his knowing and often predicting that he should die on the cross, to pray now that he might not die in the garden ; for this was inconsistent and impossible if he were to be crucified. Therefore the objector by trying to avoid one supposed inconsistency, runs into a real and palpable one, in making the objection.

But it has been said, that when Christ prayed earnestly unto him who was able to save him from death, he was heard, and delivered from the death he feared, which therefore must be his being saved from dying in the garden, which he feared ; for he was not saved from dying on the cross.

Answer. It is not said, that in being heard, he was saved from death, either in the garden, or on the cross ; but that he was delivered from the evil which he feared. This was not merely dying on the cross, as he actually did, but sinking down and perishing under the wrath of God against sinners, whose place he had taken, and the weight of their amazing guilt which now he clearly apprehended, and was soon in a true sense, to fall on him. He felt that the human nature was altogether unequal to bear up under this infinite weight, and go through this scene of suffering, so as to answer the end proposed ; but would certainly sink and perish, and fail of the whole design proposed in the redemption of the elect, unless he was supported by the almighty hand of God. This was what he above all things feared ; and in this he was heard, and delivered from such a death. When he had resigned to the will of God, and was willing to suffer, he, under the apprehensions just mentioned, agonized and prayed more earnestly that he might be supported and carried through the awful scene before him with propriety and success, so that all the glorious purposes of his sufferings might be answered, and all the elect obtain salvation.

It is now left to the reader to judge between the explication here given of this text, and others which have appeared in this magazine.

R.

Thoughts on Matthew xi. part of the 21st and 23d verses.

— “For if the mighty works, which were done in you, had been done in Tyre and Sidon, they would have repented long ago in sackcloth and ashes.

— “For if the mighty works, which have been done in thee, had been done in Sodom, it would have remained until this day”

I CONCEIVE, we are to understand from scripture, that the means and methods of grace, are not, of themselves, saving, or do not produce true repentance. They are made effectual, only by the special operations of the Holy Spirit. The sinner is inclined to resist all means that are used with him; all the methods which God takes for his salvation. God, indeed, affords him most powerful light and evidence; but these he opposes, and still remains determined to cleave to sin. His inclination or love to sin, is not altered or abated, by all that is done for him, in the way of means, but remains in full force. The methods of grace, are indeed, wisely ordered and well adapted. We may believe, that they are the most perfect and best that can be. And it is altogether reasonable that we should submit to them: if we acted agreeably to our duty, we should do it. But, instead of this, we stand out against them. And they have no effect to alter the bias of our hearts. They may, perhaps, put us under some restraint, and produce a sort of external reformation, as in the case of Ahab, but they are wholly ineffectual to produce any real heart-felt change.

We persist, notwithstanding all the methods, which God takes with us, in his word, in our adherence to sin. And we remain resolutely determined to persevere in a state of impenitence. Our sinful inclinations have a fixedness, which no moral motives, no arguments, and no evidence and light in God's sacred word, are able in the least, to alter or abate. Every mean, the most cogent and pressing, our natural heart, makes out to resist; it will not suffer itself to be wrought upon, by either God's word or providence; but remains still unrenewed, and firmly set in the love and choice of sin.

If, therefore, nothing more be done for sinners, not one of them would be saved. If, only the gospel be provided, and set before us with all the most winning invitations, and earnest entreaties to accept, not one of us should ever be brought to saving repentance. This may be learnt from the marriage supper. We should, like those who were there bidden, all go our “ways, one to his farm, another to his merchandize.” We should, persist in our sins, and live and die Christless and impenitent. This we learn, likewise, from our Saviour's words, “Ye will not come to me, that ye might have life.”—Sinners will not come to Christ; will not hearken to the gracious call; will not accept the proclamation made in the gospel. And, were there nothing further done, all would alike want a desire or will after Christ and holiness. All would alike be totally destitute of saving evangelical repentance.

This being the case, God does more for the sinner, who is renewed. He adds his special saving grace, in applying the redemption purchased by Christ. He sheds down the enlightening, renewing operations of the Spirit. These operations are effectual, in changing our hard and stony hearts. These produce a moral change, consisting in regeneration and conversion. They excite holiness, or true gospel repentance. And nothing short of the energies of the Holy Spirit, is able to effect any radical change, or, in the least, to alter the inclination. The Holy Spirit, in the view of gospel means, subdues the heart, slays its enmity, and brings us to lay down the arms of rebellion, in a cordial submission to Christ and his government. All holy exercises and affections in man, are the effect of the Holy Spirit. And by his influence alone, divine revealed truth, and all religious institutions and means, become efficacious and salutary. Paul "planted—but God gave the increase." "It is the Spirit that quickeneth." The gospel stands "in demonstration of the Spirit, and of power."

If, reader, this be a just representation, then the repentance spoken of in the passage above, must mean, either imperfect repentance, such as was that of Ahab, and many other wicked men; consisting, not in a radical moral renovation, but in a strong check and restraint, laid upon their sinful inclinations, and which may be produced, by means, without special grace.—This sort of repentance is, sometimes, availing to avert God's threatened judgments. It was so in the case of Ahab: and in Sodom, if there had been even such external reformation and repentance, "it would have remained until this day." And such a kind of repentance, Christ asserts, his 'mighty works' which were done in Capernaum, would have produced in Sodom.

Or, else, if it be evangelical repentance, in the passage, (which I think is not probable) then the meaning of the 'mighty works' must be extended, so as to include the special influences of the Spirit, by which alone holiness and real gospel repentance, are produced. And the effect is ascribed to the mighty works, which is actually, the effect of the Holy Spirit. This is a manner of expression which often occurs in the scriptures— "The word," it is said, "is able to save our souls." But this can mean only when attended, and set home, by the influences of the Spirit. And all the efficacy which the word has to save, it derives from God's special and sovereign grace.

We will now close with two reflections.

i. We hence learn the totally lost, and wretched condition of mankind.

Our hearts are naturally so entirely bent on sin, that no means can prove effectual to our repentance and saving good. We obstinately resist all the gracious methods which God kindly uses with us; and resolutely persist in sin, continually acquiring greater degrees of obduracy and hardness of heart. We are fixed in our opposition to God. Our natural hearts are so firmly inclined to sin, that if God leave us, barely to the effect of his word and providence, we shall certainly persist in our wickedness, and plunge ourselves into remediless woe. Here, then, we see our great sinfulness, and wholly lost state, since all the gracious methods which God in his infinite wisdom has contrived, have no saving operation upon us, and produce no holy affections.

2. We are taught the necessity of the Spirit to renew the heart. We have need, not only of a Mediator to be set before us, but of divine sovereign grace to change the heart. Tho' Christ has been provided for us, yet we are disposed to reject Christ and the gospel, and it is sure that we shall not accept, unless we are made willing in the day of God's power. The infinite almighty power of the eternal Spirit, is alone sufficient to operate upon, and effect a moral renovation of our natural hearts. Unless God, by sovereign, rich, and all-powerful grace, save us, we perish. Let us then feel the need we have of the new-birth, and of the Holy Spirit to produce it. And let us be deeply impressed with this consideration, that we must be saved, "by the washing of regeneration, and renewing of the Holy Ghost." Y. Z.

Admonitions from the Death-Bed.

(Continued from p. 233.)

NUMBER V.

A true record of the triumphs of religion, in the day of death, is calculated to produce a happy influence on society, by recommending to gay and inconsiderate youth, in the most feeling manner, a life of early piety. I am therefore induced to communicate the following imperfect sketches of the life and death of a young lady; being real facts which happened a few years since.

LOUISA, (for under this name I shall describe the person the circumstances of whose death I am now to relate) was born of reputable parents, who lived in a country town in Connecticut, and were professors of religion. As might be expected, in the enjoyment of such advantages, she was early instructed in the doctrines and duties of religion. She was a very docile child, possessing a lively and ingenious fancy, a quick discernment, and a clear judgment. At twenty years of age, her figure was agreeable, her manners pleasing, having been improved at a boarding school in a distant town; and her prospects in life were such as the world call the most favorable and happy. But, though from her education and good manners she paid decent outward respect to religion, at this age, it did not appear, that she had any real experience of its vital power and heavenly consolations. Dress and show, and the amusements of youth seemed to banish from her mind the plain duties, and more substantial joys of religion. She then seemed not to comprehend a Saviour's ineffable love, nor considerately to feel a sinner's guilt and wretchedness. Returning home, one rainy night, from a ball, she took a hard cold, which brought on gradually a consumption, of long duration. Though this flattering disease, which so often deceives those whom it afflicts, often encouraged the hope of a restoration to health; yet, as affording Louisa retirement, her active mind was turned upon the great duties of religion, and the weighty consideration of changing worlds.—She became serious, prayerful, and desirous of Christian conversation. She read considerably, gained a general knowledge of the great gospel doctrines, and became awakened to a feeling sense of her deplorable condition, as a guilty, miserable sinner, who had greatly abused her religious opportunities and privileges. Her conviction of sin was not accompanied with so many legal terrors, as is sometimes the case with awakened sinners in times of great religious revivals; but it seemed to be from an enlightened understanding, and a full belief of the necessity of regeneration for admission into the kingdom of heaven. She, at length, admitted the hope of having experienced this desirable change. Her anxieties and distresses were removed; and she appeared to be filled with a sweet tranquillity of mind, daily rejoicing in Christ, and often speaking with delight of the astonishing wonders of redeeming love. She obtained the religious diary of an eminent Christian, which she often read with pleasure, feeling her own experiences corresponding in many particulars. At this period, she looked forward to an approaching day of death with great tranquillity of mind, and professed a readiness to die, at God's will; appearing to have the most lively hopes of joining glorified saints and angels in heaven, in singing the song of Moses and the Lamb. The distance of time prevents me from distinctly recollecting many of her own words, which were some of them peculiarly expressive and interesting. She lamented that she had done so little for God and the interests of religion in the world, and that she had spent the most interesting and impressive period of this life, in walking in a vain show. She longed to redeem that precious time, which had been inconsiderately wasted in the vanities of youth—but knowing this to be impossible, her only refuge was in the all-sufficient righteousness of the great Redeemer, whom she believed to have been wounded for our sins and bruised for our iniquities, that with his stripes the penitent believer might be healed.—During her sickness I frequently visited her, and conversed freely with her upon the nature and duties of saving religion, and upon her own views and hopes beyond the grave.—A few days before her death, she sent for me, for the last time, to come and pray with and for her, as she expected daily to die. I found her greatly debilitated in body, (her voice reduced to a kind of loud whisper) and threatened with every appearance of speedy death; but her understanding was sound, and her mind completely tranquil.—Finding her clad with spiritual joys above the terrors of death, and fully sensible of its near approach, the conversation was chiefly turned upon the interesting nature of a change of worlds. I told her that death would close her probationary state forever; that as she died, a sinner or a Christian, so she would arise, and be found in the day of judgment, and so she would remain to all eternity. She appeared to be fully sensible of this, and in substance replied, that she hoped she had humbly and seriously considered the matter—I then told her, that if she was deceived in her hope of being interested in Christ, in whom she now professed to trust with so much confidence, when she should come to appear before the great searcher of all hearts, her professions here would be in vain, and she must fail of being an heir of salvation. She, in substance, replied, that she felt this to be a very solemn thought, and a most weighty consideration, which had considerably tried her mind; but, that she felt that full belief and joy in Christ, which she could not think to be a delusion.—I told her, that death was in its very nature terrible to man, as separating the soul from the body, and closing our eyes upon our friends, the world and all its enjoyments; and asked her what impressions the thoughts of it made upon her mind. She replied, “I “ have no desire to live any longer in this vain world. I see nothing in it worth living for.— I am not afraid to die ; nor am I afraid to be dead.—My friends I leave in the hands of a merciful God.—I hope to see them again in a better world.”—She spoke these words in a most sweet and tranquil manner, expressive of the genuine feelings of her heart.—To see, and hear a person of her age, natural talents and improvements in life, with the most pleasing worldly prospects before her, (feeling herself to be on the very brink of the grave) converse in this humble, rational, resigned and tranquil manner, on death and the prospects of eternity, naturally impressed the mind of the beholder, with a deep sense of the propriety of Balaam’s wish, “ Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his !” —How great must be the power of religion, how lively its joys, and how strong its faith to raise a naturally timid, feeble mortal, in this triumphant manner, above all the terrors of death !—But, the trying moment, which, like the refiner’s fire, tries all hearts, was not yet come.—Perhaps, thought I, this bright star, in the gospel firmament, will yet go down, in a dark cloud. Let me wait, and watch its last appearances.—A few days after, Louisa died. After sitting up some time, in an easy rocking chair, she was led to her bed, and gently laid upon it, upon which, she immediately appeared to be dying. A friend standing by her, told her she was dying. Louisa turned her eyes upon the person, with a wishful look, accompanied with a tranquil countenance and a gentle smile of triumphant joy, and clasping her hands together, spake with an audible voice,—“ O blef-

sed ! Blessed !” —Meaning, by these words, as was supposed, to express the greatness of her joy in dying, in the strong and pleasing hope of entering immediately into glory. She then died, in a moment, without a struggle or a groan.

“ Ah lovely appearance of death,

“ —————

“ How easy the soul that has left

“ This wearisome body behind.”

If ever the appearance of death was lovely, it was lovely in Louisa.— O redeeming grace, how superior thy glory !—Never did vain philosophy yield up the immortal spirit to the Almighty Creator, with such composure, dignity, and sweet resignation, joyfully anticipating an immediate entrance into the paradise of God.—Louisa’s faith overcame the world. She knew in whom she had believed. She trusted in the covenant mercy of the living God, and in the all-sufficiency and glorious promises of the great Redeemer. She was truly a pilgrim on earth. She sought an heavenly country, fearless of the usual terrors, which are experienced in the valley of death. Perhaps, nothing will better serve to show the power and glory of religion manifested in her death, than contrasting it with the death of Leonora, a different character, as recorded in the 275th page of the first volume of the Magazine. For both were much alike in their natural figure and vivacity ;—both died at nearly the same age of life ; and both were carried to the grave by the same disease. Seriously read then, the history of the one and of the other ; and if I mistake not, you will sign your approbation of a life of early piety, and join the great cloud of witnesses, which have gone before us, in saying, “ Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord.” ZEPHO.

Letter from the Directors of the London Missionary Society, to the Trustees of the Missionary Society of Connecticut.

CHRISTIAN BRETHREN,

UNITED as we are in the faith and fellowship of the gospel, and engaged in the same blessed cause, the extension of the knowledge of that glorious Name by which only men are saved; we cannot but feel towards you brotherly affection, and wish you good speed in the name of the Lord. It is a subject at once animating to us in our own endeavours, and calling for congratulation to our fellow-laborers, that the Lord hath been pleased to spread abroad in the minds of his people in every place a spirit of earnest prayer for the fulfilment of those glorious promises which relate to the prosperity of the Redeemer's Kingdom; and that as the best evidence of sincerity their prayers are accompanied with corresponding exertions. Is not this the usual course of the divine conduct? Is not this a sign that the time the set time to favor Zion is at hand, if not come? Did God ever say to the seed of Jacob, seek my Face in vain? Let us, therefore, dear Brethren, by such views as these,—by the consideration of what is to be done,—by the obligations we are under to our blessed Redeemer and the souls of our fellow-men,—by the recollection of the shortness of the time and the animating hope of the recompence of reward, encourage one another; and in the strength of him who has promised to teach our hands to war and our fingers to fight—"go forward" and cease not from the conflict till Zion shall become the praise of the earth.

The Lord is in various ways doing great things whereof we are glad. He has given seals to the administrations of those actually laboring in the missionary field, both under the patronage of this, and of other societies. The publication of the sermons and of the report of the Directors, given at our late seventh annual meeting will have informed you, before this letter can reach you, of the number and circumstances of our actual Missionary Stations, to the time of that meeting. We shall not therefore repeat what you will there find.

Most of the accounts since received from our several Missionaries are consolatory and animating. Those from our venerable brother, Dr. Vanderkemp are peculiarly so. God continues to uphold and strengthen him, and to surround him with such signal manifestations of his providential care as strongly to revive in our minds the recollection of the wonders which he did of old in the land of Israel. To enumerate these would be pleasant, but as they could only be mutilated accounts we shall not abridge the pleasure you will receive from the unaffected recital of them in his own words, which will be given in an early number of the Evangelical Magazine. But what is better, he has reaped the first fruits of his labors among the unenlightened Caffres with whom he dwells. Our other brethren too are not without encouragement, both from past experience and future prospects. Several heathen have been baptized, one at least among the Boschemen has died in the faith; others seem to be awakened. There is even ground to hope that God will render the poor native employed as an interpreter to the Boschemen, not only a reporter of what he is told by others, but a relater of what he himself has seen, tasted and felt of the word of life. We have farther to add respecting our brethren in that quarter, that we trust they will labor with increasing encouragement and effect, from the assistance they will receive from the Missionaries lately sent out to their aid and of whose safe arrival at the Cape we have just had the happy intelligence.

Since our last meeting we have received, both by letters and by the arrival of some of our late Missionaries to the South Seas, from New-Holland such accounts as tend to remove the remaining apprehensions we entertained for the safety of the brethren who remained behind, and even to encourage the hope that the Lord has gracious designs towards that people, although he has been pleased to fit as a refiner among the instruments engaged in carrying on the work. We are anxiously waiting for the account of the arrival of the brethren sent out to their help in the Royal Admiral, and trust that we shall ere long, receive good news from that far country.

The accounts received also from our Missionary, Mr. Mitchell, who is laboring at the Bay of Chaleur, are pleasing and excite in our minds a desire to listen to the earnest call sent to us from the people of that quarter to come over to help them still more effectually. Could not you, dear Brethren, afford that place the temporary aid at least of sending thither one Missionary till we can provide one or more to relieve him? Letters of an equally agreeable import have arrived from Mr. Hillyard laboring at Newfoundland.

Thus, dear Brethren, although we have had many discouragements we are not without grounds of thankfulness; and would acknowledge with unfeigned gratitude to the Father of our mercies, that he has accompanied our feeble efforts with signs following. Yet we account not ourselves to have attained. These things we consider as but the laying of the first stones of future and more extensive buildings. And at the same time that we would confirm and enlarge the stations already occupied, we are not unmindful of such other new ones, as the calls of providence, or an enlarged knowledge of the state of the world point out to us. These rise continually to our view. At present we have but one Missionary in the extensive region of India. It is, therefore, near to our hearts to send him out ample assistance as soon as the Lord shall furnish us with men, suitable for the work. The large and populous island of Ceylon, also attracts our notice, and we trust shortly to be able to send out laborers to it; for we are daily expecting the arrival in London of several Missionaries sent by our brethren in Germany, whose knowledge of the Dutch language will render them peculiarly adapted to that station. The several settlements in the West-Indies and on the continent of America, which in the dispensations of providence have come under the dominion of our crown, share likewise our attention, and strongly excite our prayers, that the Lord of the harvest would send forth more laborers into his harvest. The unenlightened tribes of the interior of your country we rejoice to think, will be the objects of your zeal and exertions, so that great and extensive as is the field, we have good ground to indulge the hope that it will not be long before every region of the globe shall have in it some one to repeat the angelic chorus "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace good-will towards men." God seems indeed to be taking unto himself his great power, and manifesting it by the instrumentality of his servants. He is raising up new helpers in the work; new societies are forming; plans varying in their means but uniting in their end, are every where adopting. Our brethren of the church of England have engaged in the work. Their Society is yet in its infancy but we trust "the little one will become a thousand." On the continent of Europe, the flame has broken forth. Men unknown to each other have been devising methods for propagating the gospel, and were astonished to find when they began to communicate their views that they were an host. Our correspondence with various parts of your quarter of the globe, is in this respect consolatory in the highest degree; and the more so, as the same evidence of divine approbation which has we humbly hope distinguished our endeavors, has also marked theirs; that in proportion as the minds of God's people have been concerned for the salvation of the natives of distant countries, religion has revived and spread in their own.

Among other excellent modes of co-operation in the blessed work, we should not omit to mention that which now engages considerable attention here and elsewhere; the publication of the holy scriptures in the language of several nations which are either totally destitute of that inestimable treasure, or possess it in a very scanty measure.—We have reason to think that we shall see a copious edition of the word of God in Arabic and a translation of it into Chinese published in England: the last accounts received from the Missionaries of our Baptist brethren in India, inform us that the publication of it in the Bengalic language is nearly completed; and our own society is taking measures for printing and circulating in the Catholic countries of Europe, a large impression of the New Testament in the French language, accompanied with an extensive introduction, by our respectable and learned brother Mr. Bogue, the English edition of which is at the point of publication.

Our chief difficulty in our Missionary work is, procuring instruments well adapted for the arduous stations they are intended to fill, and to this we are directing our attention. We have lately established a Seminary for the instruction of those who are in other respects qualified, under the care of our above mentioned brother, Mr. Bogue. At present there are but two young men in preparation, but they are both highly promising for piety and talents.

Such, dear brethren, are our present situation and future designs. But time would fail,—our hearts warm with the subject would lead us to transgress the bounds of a letter. We must therefore refer you for further information to the intelligence which is from time to time communicated in the Evangelical Magazine, which is known to you.

We have read with pleasure the few numbers of your Evangelical Magazines which have reached us. The account it gives of the various revivals of religion in your country exhilarate our hearts, and strengthen our humble belief that we may inscribe upon our mutual endeavors, "Jehovah Shammah."

Favor us, dear brethren, with your correspondence. Freely communicate to us your views, your measures, your difficulties and your success. Be assured we shall weep when you weep, and rejoice when you rejoice. In no cause more than this, can hearty co-operation be either more needful or more effectual. Above all, let us strive earnestly together at a Throne of Grace. The Missionary seed must be watered by prayer. Let us plead the promises relating to the extension of the Redeemer's Kingdom—they are as ample as our hearts can wish; let us rely on the faithfulness of him who hath made them,—that is sufficient security for their accomplishment.—How animating is it to think that all the sovereignly mysterious dispensations of divine Providence now abroad in the earth, and which terrify the nations, tend to further the objects we humbly trust we have in view, the declaration of the glory of our God in the salvation of sinful men.

And now, dear Brethren, we commend you and your work to the care and blessing of him who is able to make you perfect, establish and strengthen you, and to him be glory for ever and ever.

We are, dear Brethren, in the name of our Society, your affectionate well wishers,

*Joseph Hardcastle, Treas.
John Eyre, Secretary,
William Alers,
John Townsend,
Robert Corwie, James Steven.*

London, October, 1801.

A Narrative on the subject of Missions; and a statement of the Funds of the Missionary Society of Connecticut, to the close of the year 1801. Addressed by the Trustees of the Society to the Ministers and People of the State.

THE TRUSTEES of the MISSIONARY SOCIETY of CONNECTICUT, ask the attention of the clergy and people of the state to the following account of missions to the close of the year 1801; and of their proceedings in the discharge of the important trust committed to their management.

The Missionaries concerning whom the Trustees have information to communicate, are the Rev. Seth Williston, the Rev. Jedidiah Bushnell, Mr. Amasa Jerome, Mr. Robert Porter, Mr. Hezekiah May, the Rev. David Higgins, Mr. James W. Woodward, the Rev. David Huntington, the Rev. Jeremiah Hallock, the Rev. Job Swift, the Rev. Solomon Morgan, the Rev. Joseph Badger, the Rev. Ezekiel J. Chapman, and the Rev. David Bacon.

The narrative published last year contained an account of Mr. Williston's missionary labors to the end of February 1800. From that time to the end of the year he labored chiefly in the counties of Onondaga, Cayuga, Ontario and Tioga, in the state of New-York. From the first of March to the middle of December, he spent 36 weeks in the service of the society; during which time he preached almost every day, and attended conferences as opportunity presented. He visited from house to house; catechised and instructed children in public and in private; attended funerals, and visited the sick. He formed one church at Camillus; admitted 17 persons into churches already formed in different places; administered the Lord's supper 6 times; and baptized 3 adults and 52 children. The following remarks are extracted from his journal:

“During this period of my mission, I have to acknowledge the

'divine goodness manifested in many ways. I have enjoyed my health to such a degree as never in a single instance to fail of attending to my appointments to preach and hold conferences. I have been kindly received and hospitably entertained almost without an exception. In general I have found it pretty easy to get people to assemble to hear the word, not only upon holy but also upon common days. Though I have not labored in the most fruitful part of the vineyard, nor seen such a flocking to the standard of Christ, as those who have been in Delaware and Otsego counties; yet I have to acknowledge, to the praise of free grace, that I have seen very solemn assemblies, in which the goings of our God and King were quite visible. It will appear from my journal, that my labors have been more confined than what has been common for the missionaries. But I supposed usefulness was the object of the Missionary Society.— I thought, so far as I could judge from the pointings of divine Providence, that the Lord told me to continue in the country round the Cayuga, with encouragement that my labors there would not be in vain. I did not know how to leave those places where I saw such anxious countenances, and where numbers were asking, What must we do to be saved? The ingathering has not been so great as we hoped for, but perhaps the seed which has not yet sprung up, is not all lost. The places which have been mostly my field of labors the year past, are large and full of inhabitants. Some of them would have been glad to have employed a minister themselves, and not to have been dependant upon the Missionary 'Society. Their willingness to do something towards helping themselves will appear by the accounts of the several contributions which I have received; which accounts is subjoined to this narrative. The people would be able and willing to do much more, if they could make their contributions in the produce of their farms. Money with some is scarce."

In the early part of the year 1801, Mr. Williston spent four weeks, in the counties of Tioga and Otsego; and performed a short tour of about three weeks to the settlements on Black River. In both these missions he met with a welcome reception; and found many people who were anxious to be visited by missionaries.

In the spring he made a visit to Connecticut, and in May returned to Lisle in Tioga county, to take the pastoral charge of the people of that place, for three-fourths of the time, by consent of the board of Trustees, and to labor as a missionary the other part of the time. During the summer and fall, he made four short circuits, amounting in the whole to eight weeks, in the counties of Onondaga, Cayuga, Chenango and Tioga, in the state of New-York, and in the county of Luzerne in the state of Pennsylvania. In these circuits he visited some settlements where there had never before been any preaching; he daily preached lectures; and performed other ministerial services, as opportunity presented or occasion required. In many places, false teachers were endeavoring to propagate erroneous sentiments; and there still is an increasing necessity for zealous, faithful missionaries to counteract their baneful influence.

In the last narrative, the Rev. Jedidiah Bushnell is mentioned as then laboring in the western counties of New-York. He returned in January, having spent eleven months and nine days on his mission. In his journal he observes : " During my mission, I formed 2 churches ; administered the sacrament of the Lord's Supper 73 times ; preached 242 sermons ; attended 86 public conferences ; and baptized 237 persons ;—28 of them were adults who were baptized on profession of their faith in Christ, the others were children of professedly believing parents. The sermons were delivered in the following counties, 9 in the county of Albany ; 5 in the county of Schoharrie ; 2 in the county of Ulster ; 3 in the county of Chenango ; 6 in the county of Tioga ; 5 in the county of Luzerne, state of Pennsylvania ; 4 in the county of Steuben, state of New-York ; 14 in the county of Cayuga ; 3 in the county of Onondaga ; 3 in the county of Oneida ; 4 in the county of Herkemer ; 4 in the county of Delaware ; and 143 in the county of Otsego. Most of the conferences were attended, and the Christian ordinances were mostly administered in the counties of Otsego and Delaware. Both of the churches were formed in Otsego county, one in union society, at the head of Otego creek, the other in the town of Worcester."

" From the above statement it will be seen that the counties of Otsego and Delaware have been the principal field of my labors the last mission. This was in consequence of the late revival of religion in those places. The former of these counties lies upon the head-waters of the river Susquehannah, the latter upon the head-waters of the Delaware.

" The counties united comprehend a tract of country nearly as large as the state of Connecticut."

Mr. Bushnell then gives a particular account of a remarkable revival of religion in those counties, which, as it has been already published in the Connecticut Evangelical Magazine, the Trustees think it unnecessary to insert in this narrative.

Mr. Bushnell closes his journal as follows : " I have been treated kindly in the wilderness. The people present their thanks to the Missionary Society and to the inhabitants of Connecticut, for their liberal contributions and exertions for the support of missions to the new-settlements. They wish the people in Connecticut grace, mercy and peace, an hundred-fold now in this life, and in the world to come life everlasting."

Mr. Amasa Jerome, a candidate for the ministry, returned from his mission the beginning of May last, having labored as a missionary 48 weeks and 4 days. He visited most of the western counties in the state of New-York, and during his mission preached 205 sermons ; attended 68 conferences and 5 church meetings ; and examined 23 persons for admission to church privileges.

Last spring, Mr. Robert Porter, a candidate for the ministry, performed a missionary tour of about 10 weeks to the settlements on Black River. He preached 52 sermons, and attended on other ministerial duties as opportunity presented. From remarks in his journal, respecting the religious state of that country, it appears highly important that missionaries be sent there. In many places the sabbath is little regarded ; and erroneous sentiments and immoral practices are very prevalent. There are a pious few scattered over the country, who are disposed to make every exertion in their power to promote religion and to check the progress of error and vice. Their exertions however are necessarily limited to a small sphere, and they greatly need every assistance which can be derived from able, faithful missionaries, until the towns become sufficiently populous to support the regular preaching of the gospel.

Mr. Porter, in the close of his journal, observes: "The rapidity of the settlements on Black River is beyond all conception. It is an excellent country, the soil is good, the water pure, and the climate healthy. The people treated me kindly and with attention. They generally attended my lectures, and although nothing remarkable occurred, yet almost every sermon appeared to do good. It seemed to bring to their minds reflections to which before they were strangers. Many of the inhabitants often expressed a wish for the regular preaching of the gospel. They reflected, with a sigh, upon the blessing they once enjoyed, and often lamented their misimprovement of it while it was in their possession. Two or three towns were induced to set up regular meetings upon the sabbath; and there is reason to hope that happy fruits will follow. It would rejoice and animate the heart of every pious person in Connecticut, if he could only realize the good which is continually flowing to the new-settlements from his bounty. How much infidelity, profane swearing and sabbath-breaking are prevented, and how many immortal souls are probably saved, by the labors of missionaries, through the blessing of ' God! Parents are by their means ' awakened and animated in the ' education of their children; and

' in one or other of these respects
' scarce a single sermon appears to ' be lost. In two or three towns
' I visited, I preached the first ser' mon. But two or three years ' past, the name of Jesus was not ' known in those places; no hu' man voice was heard but that of ' the wandering savage, and no
' worship but pagan idolatry. May ' this first attempt in those places to ' exhibit the cross of Christ be ' blessed to the few who heard;
' and may the Christian name and ' spirit continually spread till the ' whole world shall become Em-
' manuel's land!"

Last fall, Mr. Hezekiah May, a candidate for the ministry, went on a mission of 10 weeks to the counties of Delaware, Otsego, Chenango, Tioga and Steuben, in the state of New-York, and Luzerne county in Pennsylvania. He visited many of the vacant settlements in these counties, and while on his mission preached nearly 50 times. In the western part of his tour he found among the people a general inattention to religion; though many were glad of an opportunity to hear preaching. Infidelity and false principles are prevalent; and the situation of the people is such as greatly to need the exertions of the friends of the truth to prevent the further spread of error. The country is extensive and rapidly settling, and opens a wide field for missionary labors.

Early in September, the Rev. David Higgins entered on a mission to the western counties in the state of New-York. The following extract of a letter from him, dated Canandagua, Nov. 25, 1801, will show the progress of his mission to that time.

“ I first visited many of the settlements in the counties of Delaware, and Otsego, where I found the people generally attentive to the business of my mission. Many were desirous to be fed with the sincere milk of the word; and others impressed with a sense of sin and guilt, and solitious for salvation. I have been able to behold, in many instances, the good effects of a work of grace in these counties the last year. Though the churches which have been formed in these parts are small in number; yet they exhibit a pleasing specimen of the life and power of religion.”

“ From Otsego I proceeded through the upper towns in the county of Chenango into Onondaga and Cayuga, preaching to large and attentive assemblies. I find in all these regions an extensive harvest but few laborers. The mission which I have thus far performed I have reason to believe has been acceptable, and I hope useful to the people. I have experienced no instance of opposition or neglect; but have generally received every expression of kindness I could desire. The inhabitants have uniformly expressed a high sense of gratitude to the Missionary Society, and a strong wish for the continuance of their favors. As one important effect of missionary labors, I find that the people, in almost every considerable settlement, are calculating and preparing for the establishment of gospel means among themselves; and in several places have already effected it.”

“ Since I have been on missionary ground, I have preached between 50 and 60 times; administered gospel ordinances repeatedly; visited the sick and persons under conviction; and attended conferences. I have found my tour laborious and fatiguing, yet highly pleasing. On my return I design to visit a number of places where I have not yet been and many which I have already visited. In the town of Sangersfield I found a very considerable work of grace going on among the people. Several infidels have lately been converted to the belief of Christianity.”

Mr. Higgins returned the 6th of January instant, having spent 17 weeks in the missionary service. A journal of his travels from Nov. 25, 1801, to the close of his mission has not as yet been communicated to the Trustees.

The above is all the information the Trustees have to communicate respecting missions to the western part of New-York state; except that Mr Williston still continues in the service of the Society for a part of the time; the remainder he spends at Lisle, supported by the people of that place.

Mr. James W. Woodward, a candidate for the ministry, has recently entered on a mission of four months to the Black river settlements.

Other missionaries will be sent to New-York state in the course of the present year.

An account of missions to the state of Vermont will next be given.

The Rev. David Huntington, returned in March last from a tour of 22 weeks to the northern counties of the states of Vermont and New-York. He went up the west side of Vermont, crossed lake Champlain and having spent some time in the northern part of New-York, returned into Vermont, crossed the state and came down the east side. The following is extracted from his journal: “ I have endeavored, and I hope by the help of a most merciful God, I have been enabled in some measure to be faithful to the sacred trust reposed in me. Through the wonderful goodness of God, I have been highly favored with the kindness and attention of the people in almost every place that I have visited. I have preached 120 times in the whole. I visited and conversed with the people, and also the schools as frequently as I could in the intervals between set seasons of public worship. I often attended conferences in the evening, and from the strictest observation and my own experience, I must say, that those more private and occasional religious exercises have been, and if rightly managed in future may still be of incalculable spiritual profit to many precious and immortal souls. God has given me opportunity, and made me instrumental to gather and form two churches, one in York state, consisting of 14, the other in Vermont, consisting of 10 members. I baptized 17 children and one adult. The whole has been a scene of mercy, in which the Lord has given me sure testimonials that he owns the cause of missions for the propagation of the gospel as his own cause, and will support it. The gratitude and thanks of the people, which they expressed in public by manual votes, by letters which they wrote, and as individuals in a more private way, to the Missionary Society and all those of the state of Connecticut, who have combined influence and interest to supply them with the preaching of the gospel in the new settlements, I cannot give a full idea of. Their strong and grateful emotions were often witnessed with many tears."

Mr. Huntington's remarks respecting the religious state of the country which he visited, evince that there is a great call for missionary labors. The harvest is great and the laborers few. The people are much divided in their religious sentiments; owing to the want of regular instruction, and to the influence of false teachers who are creeping in unawares, and disseminating the baseful poison of error. The towns are fast filling up with inhabitants; and as they come from different places they bring with them different customs, and a considerable time must necessarily elapse before they can assimilate and unite in any important object. Hence the urgent necessity of their being visited by judicious and pious missionaries, to instruct them in the great doctrines and duties of religion; and to lead them, when they shall have ability to the regular establishment of gospel worship and ordinances.

(To be continued.)

A Constitution for the Missionary Society, in the County of Hampshire, in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

I. THE name and style of the Missionary Society shall be the Hampshire Missionary Society.

II. The great object and business of the society, shall be to promote the preaching and propagation of the gospel of Jesus Christ among the inhabitants of the new-settlements of the United States and the aboriginal natives of this continent.

III. The society in future shall or may consist of members of the following descriptions and qualifications, that is to say, of all the congregational and presbyterian ministers of churches in the county of Hampshire: Of one delegate from each church of the congregational and presbyterian denominations in the county, to be annually chosen for the purpose: Of each and every person residing either in or out of the county who hath subscribed or shall subscribe and pay to the use of the society, Ten Dollars, and he shall continue a member during the term of seven years, and ever after, so long as he shall annually in the month of January pay the sum of Two Dollars to the use of the society: Of each and every person residing in or out of the county, who hath subscribed or shall subscribe and make himself accountable to the society for the sum of Two Dollars to be paid annually in the month of January for seven years, and he shall continue a member during the term of seven years and ever after so long as he shall annually in the month of January pay to the use of the society the sum of Two Dollars. The claim of subscribers to be considered as members shall be ascertained from the books of the Recording Secretary kept in such manner as the Trustees shall direct, and exhibited at each meeting of the society. And any person, who may be of peculiar advantage to the society, may be made a member by a major vote at any meeting after having his name entered as a candidate for admission at a previous meeting.

IV. There shall be holden annually at Northampton, in said county, a meeting of the society on the Thursday of the week appointed by law for the holding of the Court of Common Pleas, in the month of August, at two o'clock P. M. for the purpose of choosing by ballot a President, a Vice-President, a Treasurer, a Recording Secretary, a Corresponding Secretary, and twelve Trustees, of whom the President and Vice-President shall be two, and six of them shall be ministers of the gospel and six laymen; and of choosing any other necessary officer:—Receiving the reports of the Trustees and other officers:—Forming rules and giving direction to their officers:—And transacting all other matters advantageous to the interests of the society.

The society shall have power to alter the time and place of holding the annual meeting. All the annual officers shall continue in office until others shall be chosen to succeed them. And the Trustees, at least fourteen days previous to any meeting of the society, shall give public notice of the time and place of holding such meeting. And the members who shall convene, one of the Trustees, or the Treasurer, or either of the Secretaries being present, shall constitute a quorum for doing business.

V. The business and powers of the Trustees shall be to appoint for themselves a President pro tempore, in the absence of the President and Vice-President,—to form rules for the government of their meetings and proceedings—to appoint a Treasurer, a Recording Secretary or Corresponding Secretary, in case of the non-acceptance, death or removal or incapacity of such officer, to serve until the next meeting of the Society—to call for the attendance of the Secretaries who shall officially act for the board of Trustees—to call for the attendance of the Treasurer, who when required shall exhibit to them his books and accounts, shall receive of them such directions as they shall give, and shall receipt and account for all the sums of money committed to him by the Trustees, and pay the same to them or their order—to manage and economically improve and apply the monies, and other property and estate of the society—to appoint, contract with, send out, direct, recal and pay missionaries, catechists and schoolmasters, as shall best answer the design of the institution—to purchase and distribute among the Indians and the inhabitants of the new-settlements, copies of the holy bible, and other pious and Christian writings, and necessary school-books—to appoint such subordinate officers and agents as shall be necessary in managing the interests and property of the society—to maintain a diligent and friendly correspondence with other Missionary Societies—to call special meetings of the society upon emergent occasions—and to do every other thing conformably to the general directions of the society and the first principles of the institution as expressed in the second article of this Constitution, which shall be advantageous to the propagation of the gospel of Christ.

The trustees shall meet twice in each year and as much oftener as they find necessary, and seven members at any meeting shall be a quorum for doing business.

VI. The Trustees shall report to the Society at every annual meeting their doings the preceding year, and propose such measures as they shall judge to be useful to the Society.

VII. The Society shall annually appoint a Committee to examine the accounts of the Treasurer, and make a report of the state of the treasury at the next annual meeting.

VIII. Any amendment may be made to this Constitution, provided it be proposed in writing at an annual meeting of the Society, and adopted at a subsequent meeting by two-thirds of the members present.

IX. The officers of the Society in the first instance shall be chosen by the Convention by whom this Constitution is ratified.

The above Constitution was passed and ratified as the Constitution of the Hampshire Missionary Society.

Sam'l Hopkins, Vice-Presid.

Attest Enoch Hale, Sec'y.

The officers of the Hampshire Missionary Society, appointed by the Convention to serve until the annual meeting in August next, are

His Excellency

CALEB STRONG, Esq. President.

Rev. SAM'L HOPKINS, Vice-Presi.

Hon. John Hastings, Esq.

Rev. Joseph Lathrop, D. D.

Hon. Ebenezer Hunt, Esq.

Rev. Joseph Lyman, D. D.

Justin Ely, Esq.

Rev. Solomon Williams,

William Billings, Esq.

Rev. David Parsons, D. D.

Charles Phelps, Esq.

Rev. Rich'd S. Storrs, Trustees.

Ruggles Woodbridge, Esq. Treasurer.

Rev. Enoch Hale, Corresponding Secretary.

Rev. Samuel Taggart, Recording Secretary.

Subscription papers for obtaining monies for the funds of the Society are lodged with each Minister in the County, and in vacant parishes with the Senior Deacon; to which the attention and patronage of the liberal approvers of the design are solicited.

QUESTION.

An explanation is requested of 2 Corinthians, i. 9. "But we had the sentence of death in ourselves, that we should not trust in ourselves, but in God who raiseth the dead."

Further account of the sales, &c. of the first twelve numbers of the Connecticut Evangelical Magazine, to the end of the year 1801.

Number on hand, June 20th, 1801, as per last statement,	-	2034
Of these there have been sold,	-	1739
Given gratis to subscribers,	-	37
On hand at present,	-	258	2034
			<hr/>
			Dolls. Cts.
Profits to the institution by last statement,	-	-	1759 60
Avails of Magazines since sold,	-	220 50
Expenses for postage, &c.	-	10 6½
			<hr/>
		210 43½
Profits since last settlement,	-	-	210 43½
			<hr/>
Amount of profits to the present time,	-	-	1970 03½
			<hr/>
Of the above amount of profits there is now
due from subscribers,	-	358 10
Paid by the publishers July 8th, 1801,	-	1000
Cash now in the hands of the publishers,	-	611 93½
			<hr/>
			1970 03½

The above sum of 611 Dollars 93½ Cents, was paid, January 6th, 1802, to the Committee appointed by the Trustees of the Missionary Society of Connecticut, to receive the same, and by said Committee paid to the Treasurer of the Society, as per the Treasurer's receipt, as follows:

Hartford, January 6th, 1802.

Received from the Hon. John Treadwell, Rev. Nathan Strong and Abel Flint, Committee of the Trustees of the Missionary Society of Connecticut, the sum of Six Hundred Eleven Dollars and 93½ Cents, for which I am accountable as Treasurer of the Missionary Society, having given a duplicate of this receipt therefor; it being avails of the Connecticut Evangelical Magazine.

A. KINGSBURY.

Donations to the Missionary Society of Connecticut.

	Dolls.	Cts.
Avails of Connecticut Evangelical Magazine,	-	611 93½
From Rev. David Higgins, contributed in New settlements,	19	66
Rev. Jedidiah Buthnell, Do.	-	79 27
Rev. Job Swift, Do.	-	7 18
Rev. Lathrop Thompson, Vermont,	-	7
A friend of Missions,	-	2

Erratum. In the list of names at the end of the letter from London, page 312, for Wm. HERS, read Wm. ALERS.

THE

Connecticut Evangelical Magazine.

[PUBLISHED ACCORDING TO ACT OF CONGRESS.]

VOL. II.]

MARCH, 1802.

[No. 9.

Letter from a Father to his Son on the perfections of God.

DEAR SON,

IN my former letter I attempted to establish you in the belief of a first cause of all things, of the being of an uncreated God, without which belief it is unnecessary to say or even think of what I shall now write you. The principal ideas in this letter flow from the substance of the other.

All things being made by God, we are enabled to learn from them his true character. They exhibit perfections which can belong to none but the Creator, and which place him before us in an infinitely exalted and amiable view.

But what benefit shall we receive, my son, if we search into and describe the character of the great Creator of the world and our hearts be opposed to him? We have, by nature, opposition of heart to God. Though you may now think you feel tolerably well pleased with him, yet if ever you are awakened to a sense of your state, you will find the most inveterate opposition, waked up in your heart against every exhibition God has made of himself in his works.

These effects will arise even from my present endeavors if your heart be opposed to God. If you attend, your understanding will be enlightened and you will be prepared to exercise love to the character of God should he ever renew your heart. And should it never be renewed, these endeavors will be means of vindicating the divine conduct toward you in that solemn and important day, when, my own and your state will be unalterably fixed. The justice of God in your condemnation will be evident when it appears you have continued in stupid opposition, notwithstanding your mind had been enlightened by these kind exertions. And the way will be prepared for every holy being to say amen; and to sing "Just and true are thy ways, thou king of saints," when your sentence shall be pronounced by the judge of all the world.

If we admit the idea that God is the Creator of all things we must believe he has infinite power. No power short of this could have created man, the earth on which he lives, and the vast bodies in the heavens above. We know that no finite power can raise heaps of earth in mountains to the skies, or pile together ponderous bodies of massy rock, or make the unfathomable deep. No one ever saw finite power produce any thing that had no being before. A finite arm never gave existence to inanimate things, much less existence and faculties to animate and rational beings.

By the same kind of reasoning we must believe God has infinite wisdom. If we search the anatomy of the human frame, see the delicate and fine spun parts that compose it, and the necessity of every part being in tune to promote health and life, we are led to believe no finite wisdom created it or keeps it alive. But this is not more expressive of infinite wisdom than most, if not all the works of creation.

The same may be said of the world, of the regularity and order of the heavenly bodies, of the motion of the earth around the great centre, producing years and their several seasons, and on its own axis producing a regular succession of day and night, the earth being suspended and moving in the wide expanse, and in the rapidity of its motion all beings and things cleaving to its surface, among other things the ocean rolling its lofty billows and yet keeping its own limits, of the fruits and productions of the earth, of every plant and blade, every beast and reptile, and indeed of all the things we see. They show that the great Creator is infinitely wise. Finite wisdom can not make one kernel of grain to sprout, one blade to shoot forth, or one insect to live. Even the most simple things in creation outstrip it in an infinite degree.

If you yet suspend your assent, my son, think of men possessing a soul. Think of the union of spirit and matter so that at the volition of one the other moves. Think that the body contains that which can call up the transactions of past years, stretch forward on the wing of imagination into futurity, contemplate and reason with precision, and communicate knowledge by speech, and say, if God who created him be not infinitely wise. The statuary may form images in the likeness of men. But can he form thinking images or were they ever heard to speak?

From the same source we learn the goodness of God, or his moral rectitude. If the perfections which have been mentioned exist in God separate from mere rectitude, he is a dangerous being, capable of doing infinite hurt. His moral rectitude or his goodness disposes him to bring about the greatest good of his kingdom, and makes his character infinitely lovely.

When we see the earth created for man's residence, producing objects to delight the eye and employ the mind, producing food for his table and sustenance for his cattle, see the elements so ordered that man can breathe and enjoy health, see him supplied with a suitable degree of light, visited with alternate periods of darkness suited for his retirement, nourishment and rest, and all things adapted to his convenience and happiness, we have sufficient evidence that God is infinitely good.

There are in the nature of things, motives to virtue and discouragements to vice, which should teach us that the great God of nature is a friend to the former and an enemy to the latter.

The moral rectitude of God, which may be discovered in nature, is what makes the impenitent heathen without excuse. The apos-

the Paul, in the first chapter of his epistle to the Romans, twentieth verse, saith, So then they are without excuse. They have no revelation of God's moral character but in nature, and their obligation to love and serve him is built on this alone. They therefore cannot be inexcusable for neglecting to love and serve God, if his moral rectitude is not discoverable in nature.

The scriptures represent that God's moral character is discoverable in his works. Psalm xix. 1. The heavens declare the glory of God: and the firmament showeth his handy work. The glory of God is his moral character. Rom. i. 20. For the invisible things of him from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made, &c. The invisible things of God are his moral character, his holiness. This is clearly seen from the creation of the world or the things that are made.

You may think, my son, that the evils in this life, the pain and misery we endure will operate against the idea that there is evidence of divine goodness in nature. You may think there is more evidence from nature that God is malevolent than that he is good. It is true God permits pain and misery to be in his world. But if we consider the moral state of man, that he is depraved and deserving no good, we must suppose God to be good in bestowing upon him one favor, even if he brings upon him innumerable evils. Yea, considering his desert, if God show him no favor it will not prove that he is malevolent. Man may know he is a sinner and therefore deserving the indignation of God. He may see himself at the same time in the enjoyment of many favors, which is enough to teach him that the God of nature is good.

You may also object to the idea, upon the supposition that it supercedes the necessity of a divine revelation and flings a weapon into the hands of deists against revealed religion. It is one thing to have divine goodness revealed in nature, and another for men to discover it. Man is so depraved that he never would discover the moral character of God from his works. The nations without divine revelation in the scriptures never have discovered it, and it has been owing to their depravity of heart. But this does not prove that it is not discoverable. If these nations were holy they doubtless would have discovered and rejoiced in the moral character of God in all his works.

Besides, the revelation in the scriptures is necessary to discover to sinners the way of salvation through Christ. Though we may learn that God is good from his works, yet we cannot learn that he will save sinners, or how he will save them. We may learn from nature that we do wrong and therefore deserve punishment. Our reason will teach us that our punishment should be proportionate to our crime, which must be infinite, sin being against a Being of infinite authority and who has an infinite right to our love and service. If infinite, how can we know, how can we even hope that God will save us. Though he may show us some favors, yet we do not know that he will hereafter. And if we should know that he would save us, we could discover no way for God to maintain the honor of his law and save sinners. That glorious plan which fills heaven with wonder and praise, which holy beings desire to look into, would be unknown to us. There therefore is need of the divine revelation in the scriptures, notwithstanding God's goodness is discoverable from nature. This therefore is not a weapon in the hands of deists but against them. It is confusing them upon their own ground. It is acknowledging their premises and drawing a conclusion from them to their own destruction.

This God, my son, is my greatest joy. When I meditate on his character my feelings are in harmony with those expressed by the Psalmist and verified by Dr. Watts.—

"Were I in heaven without my God,
'Twould be no joy to me;
And whilst this earth is my abode,
I long for none but thee."

What can be more lovely than a being of perfect rectitude possessing infinite power and wisdom? It is impossible for him to do wrong. He will accomplish the best ends. He will be influenced to this by his goodness, and his wisdom and power will enable him to do it. There is perfect safety in his hands. O, my son, if you wish for happiness, love and confide in him. Renounce all other Gods and unreservedly give yourself up to the Lord Jehovah. The holy scriptures hold forth abundant motives for this. But without scripture, even from nature, you have evidence enough that it is your duty and that this is a ground of holy consolation. Without delight and confidence in this God, you may seek rest but will find none. If you do not settle down in awful security, you will spend your life in fruitless enquiries, will be perplexed and distressed, like the troubled sea that cannot rest, and when you die you will have no God, no glorious displays of divine beauty, and no ground of eternal joy. That you may have the favor of this God is my ardent prayer.

Yours, &c.

PATER.

A tribute of praise to the Holy Spirit.

IT is observable that in the works of the Deity there is a beautiful progression. They are continually advancing to a higher degree of perfection, or to the completion of the idea of the divine mind, which comprehended all his works from the beginning. One event brings on another, that a third, and so on in endless succession, all verging to one grand point, all rising higher and higher, bringing more clearly into view the glorious character of the great Author. The works of creation were designed as preparatory to the still greater works of providence, as the design of building a house is that it may be inhabited. The works of providence contain a series which no finite being can comprehend. By creatures they must necessarily be viewed in parts more or less detached, yet they constitute one great whole, like so many links of a chain inseparably connected, or like the parts of a great building, all framed and compacted together with the most perfect symmetry and firmness. It is the same God, the same infinitely perfect and most glorious Being who is displayed through the whole.

As the work of creation was preparatory to the works of providence, of which redemption is the chief, so the work of redemption as wrought out by the Son incarnate, was preparatory to the work of renovation or making all things new by the Holy Spirit. As God created the world to be a theatre for the great work of redemption, to the Son of God assumed our nature, obeyed the law, suffered and died, that there might come forth a new and more beautiful creation by the Holy Spirit.

When the persons of the Trinity are distinguished in their operations, the great work of making effectual application of the benefits of the Redeemer's purchase, is manifestly attributed to the Spirit. It is God the Spirit who arrests sinful men in their stupid and mad career down to eternal ruin, who convinces them of sin, and after effectually humbling them, acquaints them with the things of Jesus and leads them to embrace the Saviour. Thus by faith he constitutes a vital and most blessed union between perishing sinners and the Lord of glory. As the Spirit regenerates or begins the work of sanctification, so he effectually carries it on under all circumstances thro' life, and at length prepares the happy subject for glory complete and ineffable.

It is the glorious character of the same God which shines in creation, redemption and sanctification. But in redemption and sanctification, with the greatest possible brightness. Hence we read of the riches of the glory of his inheritance in the saints. This astonishing work of grace on the hearts of those who were chosen by the Father in Christ Jesus and fore-ordained unto eternal life before the world began, which is daily carrying into effect by the Holy Spirit, is the crowning point or grand issue of all the operations of the Deity of which we have any knowledge. And when it shall stand forth in all the perfection of Jehovah we may rest assured its glory and beauty will far surpass all which the eye of man hath seen or his heart conceived.

In order to this, every chosen vessel must be gathered in and rendered perfect both soul and body in the glorious likeness of the Saviour. All the members must be perfectly conformable to the head; must be brought into the most intimate union and be filled with all the fullness of God, as his spiritual, living and most glorious temple, in which he will delight to dwell forever and ever.

Since then the operations of the Holy Spirit on the hearts of sinners are so glorious to the Deity and so happiness to man, they are worthy to be recorded and had in everlasting remembrance. Is there joy in heaven over one sinner that repenteth? Is the event viewed as of sufficient importance to be published thro' the heavenly world and doth it cause the holy angels and saints in glory to rejoice; and shall it be overlooked by the church militant? Verily so important is every instance of saving conversion that it is worthy to be proclaimed thro' heaven and earth, and to be celebrated thro' everlasting ages.

In this view authentic narratives of the revival of religion, or of the wonderful operations of the Holy Spirit in one place and another, are to be perused and contemplated with pleasure. They are to be viewed as a tribute of praise to God, and when thus offered up by those who love his appearing, they must ascend as sweet incense before his throne. They are the echo of his effectual call, and reflect back to himself the glory of his grace, which he is pouring into the vessels of his mercy.

They exhibit to the world the most incontestible evidence of the reality, excellence and importance of religion. As they are most powerfully calculated to awaken, convince and convert perishing sinners, so perhaps no means are more frequently blessed to this end.

They are eminently calculated to quicken, edify, comfort and support the Lord's people. As their hearts are bound up in the prosperity of Zion, so no news can be to them so refreshing. In this way they become extensively acquainted with what God is doing in the earth. Their hearts rejoice and they give glory to God. By intelligence of this kind exhibited of late in Rippon's Baptist Register, in the London, Missionary, and Connecticut Evangelical Magazines, how is the revenue of Divine glory increased, how many thousands of Christians are made acquainted with the most gracious and wonderful works of the Spirit, and with those dear brethren and sisters whose faces they never saw in the flesh! What a foundation is thus laid for those delightful personal interviews among the redeemed, recognizing each other and recapitulating their particular histories, or the dealings of divine mercy in bringing them severally home to glory; which may probably occupy no small portion of the first ages of a blessed immortality!

The writer is aware of an objection which may be raised to an encouragement of publications of this kind, viz. There is such danger of imposition, and so many specious appearances prove abortive, that it is more prudent to leave all these matters in an undigested mass, and wait the decision of the great day. In answer to this objection, it is to be observed, that tho' no man can pretend with infallible certainty to determine the heart of another, yet these astonishing changes are manifestly wrought by the power of divine grace, which satisfy the mind of every believer, and hardly admit of a doubt. Now should we forbear to notice such instances because possibly we may be deceived in some, we should neglect to acknowledge the finger of God when most conspicuous, and undoubtedly grieve the Holy Spirit. For if God the Spirit be indeed operating upon the hearts of some of the children of men in the manner supposed in this essay, it manifestly calls for the most grateful acknowledgments and the sublimest praise of heaven and earth. Should these hold their peace the stones would immediately cry out. Undoubtedly he designs to make his own efficiency so conspicuous in these operations that those who do not acknowledge him, must be sealed up under the condemning sentence of unbelief. Undoubtedly there are genuine marks by which a true work of the Spirit of God in the revival of religion in any place may be known, a denial of which would be very prejudicial to the cause. It would be yielding a point highly gratifying, no doubt, to infidels. But so long as there are any remains of the precious faith of God's elect on the earth, this point will never be conceded. It is ever to be remembered the present is a state of great imperfection. The wheat it must be confessed it little in bulk to the chaff, but blessed be God, there are some kernels, and for these we never can be sufficiently thankful. In the exercises of the soundest converts or the best saints on earth, there is a mixture. There will be false and impure affections mingled with those which are genuine, but shall we on this account throw away the whole? God forbid. Wherefore let God be praised for all his wonderful works, but above all, for the gracious operations of his Holy Spirit.

PHILO.

How a person becomes justified by faith?

MESS'RS EDITORS,

IF you see fit, please to give the following a place in the Magazine.

NO person is justified before God, for the sake of any merit there is in his faith; though it be, in the gospel, a fixed term of pardon, reconciliation to God, and of eternal life; yet these precious benefits and inestimable favors are not bestowed upon any of the sinful human race, for the sake of any merit there is in faith. In the gospel, we are repeatedly said to be justified by faith; but no person is from thence to conclude, that any one is justified, for the sake of any merit there is in faith; but by it (faith) as an instrument and means, in special ordained of God as the believer's union to Christ, and interest in the saving blessings of his purchase: as the righteousness of Christ (the result of both his active and passive obedience) is the sole meritorious cause of the believing sinner's justification, as faith is appointed of God as the instrument and means of believers in Christ becoming united to him, and interested in his righteousness (the only meritorious cause of justification, and of all the saving blessings of the covenant of grace) in this sense only, I apprehend, any can be said to be justified by faith.

PHILALETHES.

Satan's perversion of the decrees and promises of God.

THE following statement of Satan's reasoning upon the decrees and the remark upon it, are submitted to the Editors of the Connecticut Evangelical Magazine.

Matthew iv. 5, 6.

"Then the Devil taketh him up into the holy city, and setteth him on a pinnacle of the temple, and saith unto him, if thou be the Son of God, cast thyself down: for it is written, he shall give his Angels charge concerning thee, and in their hands they shall bear thee up, lest at any time thou dash thy foot against a stone."

IN this assault on the Son of God, the grand adversary was more artful and plausible, than in all his other temptations. He transformed himself into an angel of light, in covering with Christ upon the decrees. He admitted the doctrine in full, and urged him to cast himself down, because it was written, or decreed, that the angels should have charge over him, and bear him up in their hands, so that he could not at any time dash his feet against the stones. The plain import of his reasoning with Christ upon the decrees, was this:—
 "You profess and claim to be the Son of God. I challenge and demand the proof. For if you make this high profession, and pretend to be the Christ, you must show a sign from heaven, or exhibit convincing evidence of your character and claims. Now if you be really the Son of God, and not an impostor, you will acknowledge this obligation on yourself, and comply with my proposal.—
 The decrees of God, your professed father, shall be the criterion, to try, whether you are in reality his Son. These are eternal and immutable. If God, by his absolute and unchangable decrees, owns you for his Son, the matter will at once be decided. In his holy word, this particular decree is written and revealed concerning the Messiah. "He shall give his angels charge over him, and in their hands they shall bear him up, lest he dash his foot against a stone." Now prove, by fulfilling this everlasting decree, that you are the Messiah. Cast yourself down from the pinnacle; and if the angels come and bear you up in their hands, I must believe and acknowledge, that you are the Son of God. This will be full and demonstrative proof, be your own witness, and the witness of God, your Father, to your profession and claim to be the Christ. His honor and your own, are equally concerned in the manifestation of your person and character. You cannot reasonably refuse to comply with the proposed trial; for it is obligatory on you to exhibit evidence of your divine mission; proof of your claim to be the Messiah, or otherwise, you ought to be considered and treated, as a vile impostor. If I were only in your situation, and there was such a decree concerning me, I should not refuse to satisfy any one in so proper and reasonable a request, but should be pleased myself, to have my father acknowledge me for his Son by his eternal decrees. I should not hesitate in the least, to take the flight; for whatever God has decreed and fixed, he is necessitated to fulfil in the minutest particular. He cannot lie; and therefore, cannot break his own absolute decrees. You need not indulge the least distant apprehension of danger in casting yourself down. The angels will as certainly come, and bear you up in their hands, as the everlasting and unchangeable decrees of God are certain of accomplishment. These decrees never were, and never can be broken by all the powers in heaven, earth, or hell; but as soon as you even begin to descend, the angels will instantly appear, ease you in your passage down, and gently rest your feet upon the ground." Thus reasoned Satan the grand deceiver, upon the decrees, which he said, were written and revealed in the bible. But he reasoned no more absurdly from the doctrine, nor perverted scripture any more, than many of mankind do, at the present day. The following are their statement and reasoning upon the decrees.—

 "God hath absolutely and unalterably decreed and fixed all events and things from eternity to eternity, and hath unconditionally elected to salvation, all those, who will finally be delivered from the wrath to come: Therefore, if we are to be saved, we shall be saved, let us live in sin, or do as we please; but if we are to be damned, we shall be damned, let us do what we may."

The decrees of God, they state justly; but the conclusions, which they draw from them, are absurd. They reason upon them in a similar manner with Satan, the subtle adversary; and answering him, will equally answer them. The following remarks will show the deception and fallacy of Satan's reasoning with the Son of God upon the decrees.

1. The reasoning was his own, and like himself. He is a liar and deceiver, the father of lies, and the truth is not in him. Since his sin and rebellion against God, his constant object has been, to deceive. This liar from the beginning, is not to be credited, unless we are willing to be fatally deceived. Christ, our example and pattern, did not believe Satan, nor comply with his temptation, which is a clear proof, that his reasoning upon the decrees was false, and is an admonition to us, not to believe his suggestions, nor comply with his subtle devices.

2. The reasoning was a temptation. Christ considered the matter in this light, and said, "Thou shalt not tempt the Lord, thy God." But if Satan's reasoning upon the decrees had been just, there would have been no temptation in it; and Christ might with safety have complied with his proposal, and cast himself down. The tempter knew, that he, as a man, would have dashed against the stones. This was his sole object, to tempt the Redeemer to kill himself.

3. Satan, in his reasoning upon the decrees, artfully perverted scripture, and left out a part of the passage, in which the doctrine was revealed. The passage which he quoted is in the ninety-first Psalm. "For he shall give his angels charge over thee, to keep thee in all thy ways. They shall bear thee up in their hands, lest thou dash thy foot against a stone." The part which he designedly left out, is, "to keep thee in all thy ways." This shows, that there was something for Christ to do; some way in which he was to go. When he was on the temple, it was not his way, to cast himself down, as the deceiver urged him. It was not decreed, that the angels should keep him in that way, and bear him up in their hands, if he had presumptuously thrown himself down, and tempted God.— They were to keep him in his way, that is, in the use of appointed means of preservation.

4. Satan, in his reasoning on the decrees, separated the means from the end. The scripture, in which the decree concerning Christ was revealed, connected the means with the end. The angels were to keep him in all his ways. He was to use means to preserve his own life; and not use means to destroy it, as the tempter's reasoning implied.

There are two extremes into which men run, in reasoning upon the decrees. The one is, to separate means from the end, and run every thing into fatality. The other is, to deny the doctrine wholly, and run every thing into chance. The true decrees, as stated in divine revelation, are a middle course between these two extremes, and connect means with the end. In the decrees of God, the means are as necessary, and as much appointed as the decrees themselves. "Created anew in Christ Jesus unto good works, which good works, God before ordained, that we should walk in them." The elect of God are said to be "chosen from the beginning unto salvation:" but how are they chosen, and through what means will they be saved? "Through sanctification of the Spirit, and belief of the truth." Their sanctification of the Spirit and belief of the truth come in, as means in fulfilment of their election, and are absolutely necessary to their salvation. Upon this ground, they are commanded "to give all diligence to make their calling and election sure, and to work out their own salvation with fear and trembling." From the word of God it is manifest, that the means and the end are inseparably connected in his universal and absolute decrees, and those, who separate them, and run all things into fatality, reason just as absurdly, as their father, the devil, did with Christ. "Ye are of your father, the devil, and his reasoning ye will use."

Before this subject is dismissed, it will be proper to take notice of two ideas which naturally occur.

1. The doctrine of the decrees is a true doctrine. If the doctrine had been false, Satan would not have misrepresented and perverted it. This would not have been agreeable to his nature and object. He would by no means pervert false doctrines; but on the contrary, he uses all his influence to make men believe them. He often transforms himself into an angel of light, and takes true doctrines from the Bible; but before he leaves them, he mutilates and turns them into false ones by drawing wrong consequences and conclusions. This was the case in his temptation with the Son of God. His use of the decrees with him, is a clear proof, that the doctrine is true.

2. The subject affords a reasonable warning to those, whom Satan tempts by reasoning upon the decrees, and whose consciences he is quieting in lives of sin. His language to them is: "The decrees are eternal and fixed. If you are included in the election of grace, you will be saved at last; therefore, eat and drink; indulge yourselves without restraint in the gratification of your passions and inclinations, and take your fill of pleasures. But if you are destined to misery, you cannot help it, nor alter the case in the least; therefore, give yourselves no anxiety, or concern, about your future state, but enjoy as much happiness as possible, through life." Such persons are in a very alarming state; on the dangerous ground of the subtle adversary of souls. The decrees are emphatically, his strong hold. He used them in one of his temptations with Christ; and we may be assured, that he would use his most likely means to succeed with him. Without doubt, he more often succeeds with mankind, in this, than in any other way. Many at the present day, appear to be taken by him upon this ground, and strongly holden. Their mouths are full of the same kind of reasoning upon the decrees, which he used with the Saviour of the world. They are now led captive by him in the same way to ruin, in which thousands and millions of the human race have been before them; and unless a sovereign God have mercy on them, and dispossess Satan of his strong hold, they will ere long, to their everlasting sorrow, see the fatal deception of his, and their reasoning upon the divine decrees.

PROTEUS.

Nymphs to Sospater.

LETTER I.

DEAR FRIEND,

WHAT friend of Jesus, who that loves his name and wishes well to mankind, but must feel grief and a pious indignation in contemplating the zeal of the scoffer, to destroy the Christian religion, and to take away the key of knowledge? Who will not themselves enter into the kingdom of heaven, nor suffer those who are entering to go in. Like the old Pharisees, they compass sea and land to make profelytes, and are unwearied in their exertions to spread the poison of their infidel principles, far and wide. Ought not their zeal to put the friends of Christ to the blush, who have espoused the same glorious cause, which brought him from heaven, and yet are so very lukewarm, so very indifferent as to its success that it is almost hard to say whether they be friends or enemies, or to what camp they belong. Is not this, my friend, lamentable? Especially when it is remembered that the glory of God, the honor of the Redeemer, the salvation of sinners, and the glory and the highest felicity of that kingdom which shall continue forever, are all concerned and inseparably connected with that truth which scoffers oppose and hate. When we consider the beauty, the sweetness, the excellency and infinite importance of that system of truth the Son of God testified by all he said, did and suffered, and sealed with his very blood; it would seem all its friends would be zealous and indefatigable in their endeavors to be possessed of it, and to have it dwell richly in their hearts; yea, more, that they would be indefatigable in their most vigorous endeavors to diffuse the knowledge thereof, far and wide, even to the ends of the earth. Indeed this is only to suppose what was real fact, when the sweet light of divine truth came into the world by Jesus Christ. The apostles and the first Christians seemed inspired with the very Spirit of their divine Master, and expressed the most ardent zeal to diffuse the heavenly light through the world. It is reported of the apostles, prophets, evangelists, pastors and teachers, that they went every where preaching the gospel; that their sound went into all the earth, and that the brethren were fellow-helpers to the truth, and gloriously exerted themselves for the furtherance of the gospel. It appears that every Christian church was a pillar of the truth which was inscribed upon it, to be known and read of all, that it resembled the sun, the light of the world. Blessed be God, this Spirit of Christ is not entirely gone from the world. There have been pleasing appearances of it, in the glorious and yet too feeble exertions which have been made for the spread and furtherance of the gospel in our times: May there be more and still more, of this Christ-like Spirit, and may ministers and professors remember from whence they are fallen, and be led to imitate the fervor and ardent zeal of their divine Master and the first churches. When we remember the Son of God, a person of infinite dignity, become incarnate, lived, bled and died, to be the light of the world, to be a witness to the truth, and that all the interests of God and his holy kingdom are involved in it, we might expect all its real friends would burn with a pious zeal, that their souls would be inspired with the most fervent desires to do every thing in their power that the gospel might run and be glorified, and unnumbered millions who now sit in darkness, might see the heavenly light and walk in it. It would seem each one would be a Paul, ready to pass through many regions to proclaim the good tidings of great joy to all, to the utmost extent of his power. It would seem, like him, each one would be nothing moved by the most threatening dangers in his way. It would seem impossible the enemies of the truth should be more engaged to exterminate it from the world than its friends are to diffuse the sweet knowledge thereof far and wide. Yet alas! it is a sad fact, contrary to all supposition, the zeal of many of its friends, for its furtherance and support, bears no proportion to that of its enemies; for its utter extirpation. The former neither say or do any thing for the defence and confirmation of the gospel, compared with what the latter do for its extirpation. Many of the friends of revelation are sleeping, while its enemies are all awake and doing with their might what they find to do. These things ought not to be so. Contemplating the present state of things, my head would be waters and mine eyes a fountain of tears, were I not myself stupid and unfeeling, plunged in the cares of the world and troubled about many things. I trust you more sensibly feel, and it is my earnest wish the Lord may grant you abundant communications of his grace and enflame your whole soul with love to the truth and an ardent zeal for its defence and furtherance. May you blush to come behind the scoffers of the present day in the zeal and the fervor of your endeavors, and may you sensibly feel your dependance on the Lord, for grace to direct and assist you. The cause in which you are embarked is indescribably grand and glorious—all heaven is on your side—the truth is great and will prevail.—Soon its weight like a rock will fall on its enemies and grind them to powder, while it will forever remain the broad foundation of the joy and consolation of its friends. That you may every day see more and more of its beauty, taste its ineffable sweetness and feel its energy and infinite importance, is the fervent wish of your affectionate friend.

A letter to a friend upon the subject of conversing with the sick.

Belfast, (Maine) Nov. 15, 1801.

DEAR SIR,

YOU doubtless recollect that I was on a visit at your house in the time of your son M——'s sickness. We all looked upon his case as very critical, and it was the opinion of the most skilful physicians you consulted that he could never be relieved from his complaints, but must die in the compass of a few days. From a long acquaintance with the family and as long experience of their kindness, I felt deeply interested in their welfare and heartily sympathized with you in your affliction. I thought it must greatly mitigate your sorrow and comfort your mind, provided your child should give satisfactory evidence of repentance toward God, and friendship to his character and government. For in that case, your loss would be his greater gain. I therefore requested you to send for the minister, as you probably remember. He was accordingly sent for, and speedily came. As he was going to the apartment of your now deceased son, you requested him to say nothing about death, or upon the subjects of religion; not so much on account of his weakness, as the uneasiness it might give to his mind. I must tell you, sir, that I was greatly surprised at your request, since I supposed that you saw, and, in some measure, felt the importance of religion, especially on the near approach of death. The minister was as much surprised as myself. He immediately halted upon bearing your request, and returned the following answer: "I cannot see your son under this restraint. I must converse with him according to my best judgment; and I utterly refuse to see him, unless I have liberty to bring up to his view the all-important subjects of religion, to call his attention to the character and danger of the impenitent sinner, and to the obedience and blood of a crucified Saviour as his only hope. This is a duty I owe him as a fellow-creature, as a friend, and especially as one committed to my charge. If I neg-lest this duty, and, in consequence of it, your son perish, my own conscience will give me no peace, and his blood, God will require at my hand." I thought that with this resolution, you very reluctantly allowed him access to your child. But I no less admired his answer and the spirit which it breathed than I was surpris'd at your request.

I am apprehensive that you have become one of those fashionable Christians, who wish to think favorably of the character and state of their dying and departed friends without any reason, and who wish to keep religion at a distance, in health and in sickness, in life and in death. However contrary to your opinion and practice, I am fully persuaded that this modern treatment of dying friends is only a refined scheme for landing them in destruction.

As you may again be placed in similar circumstances, please to allow me the liberty to suggest several ideas upon the subject, which now occur to my mind.

I thought that you placed your minister in a very disagreeable condition. Since he greatly loved and respected you and your family, he was very loath to give you offence by denying your request, or do any thing, by which you might suppose he forfeited your friendship. To grant your request, he must be unfaithful to his own conscience, unfaithful to your beloved son, and unfaithful to God. I should by no means wish to place any person in such an uncomfortable state, and I presume you will blame yourself when you reflect upon your conduct.

You cannot be insensible, sir, that we incur great guilt in tempting others to sin or to neglect duty. It is therefore worthy your serious consideration, that you tempted your minister to omit what both he and yourself knew to be an indispensable duty. You endeavored to persuade him to be unfaithful. Your want of success can be no consolation to your mind, since it was your hearty desire to succeed, and you would have rejoiced in it. Due attention to this idea will surely prevent you from doing the like again in similar circumstances.

I observed that the attendants of your sick friend would frequently inquire of him about his feelings; whether he was in pain, or thirsty, and wished for drink or medicine; in what posture he would sit, and how he would lie. These questions he answered correctly, and often inquired concerning the affairs of the family and business of the farm. Wherefore the mention of death and religion was not omitted because he was unable to discourse or could not endure conversation. But could it be, sir, that you thought religion unimportant? You believe there is a holy and just God; that the soul is immortal and sinful; that there is a Saviour provided for such as trust in his merits, and that all who reject him by unbelief must perish. With these ideas upon your mind, how could you refrain from inquiring after the state of his soul, and exhorting him to repentance? And especially how could you refuse the pastor this liberty? You wished your friend to recover; and did you not wish his soul to be saved? The immortal part is infinitely the most valuable, and therefore the greatest care should be taken of it. We have reason to believe that seasonable and suitable conversation with the sick, upon subjects of religion has, in some cases, been a mean of exciting the attention, enlightening the mind, and converting the soul to the truth. If there has been but one instance of the kind, the salvation of the soul is such an important object, that we should be justified in making it an universal practice to converse with the sick upon the things of the gospel. And we have also reason to fear that many have died senseless and stupid who might have been greatly profited by religious discourse. If one soul has perished through such neglect, it is a sufficient reason why serious conversation with the sick should never be omitted. To hide from them their danger, and let them go out of the world thoughtless and secure, without once calling their attention to the things of religion, is acting a most unfriendly and cruel part. This part you was acting, sir, with respect to your son, when you made the request to your minister we noticed above. If any human measures would probably prevent his repentance and salvation, and render his destruction certain, you doubtless adopted them in what you did. You was far from doing a friendly office to your child. You seemed to strip yourself of all parental tenderness and your conduct was like that of an enemy.

Perhaps, you will say, in excuse for yourself, that the physicians urged the necessity of perfect silence upon the subjects of death and religion, in order for a favorable operation of medicine. But, be serious, sir; is there one instance to a thousand, in which we have reason to believe that a sick man's recovery is prevented by calling his attention to the truths of the gospel? I have visited many people in their sickness and never have met with an instance, in which the efficacy of medicine was thought to be injured by this cause. And supposing it were; is not the life of the soul of more worth than the life of the body. Allowing that we destroy one chance in ten for the recovery of our friend by conversing with him upon religion and by this means create one chance in a thousand for his salvation, we should be wise in doing it. For the soul is not only immortal, but capable of the sublimest happiness and the most exquisite misery, as durable as the soul itself.

It is likewise to be remembered, that the physicians who attended upon your son were unfriendly to religion. We are not therefore to be surprised that they cautioned you against speaking to him upon religious subjects. They wished to hear nothing about religion and see nothing of it in their patient.

I observed that I admired the answer of the minister to your request. I repeat it. For I think he manifested a suitable concern for the best good of your child, and felt his accountability to God how he discharged the duties of his office. And I would now put the question to your own conscience, Sir; How could he have answered it to himself, to his divine master and to your son, if he had neglected to call his attention to the things of his peace? Considering his place and business, would not such an omission of duty be an implicit declaration to the dying man that he was going to rest, however unfit for the kingdom of heaven? I am persuaded, Sir, that if you will speak the language, not of your heart, but of your conscience, you will join with me in this sentiment, that it is the indispensable duty of ministers to use their exertions to awaken the stupid sinner, on his death-bed, and summon his attention to the eternal concerns of his soul. The word spoken, may be a word in season which God may please to set home upon the heart. However you may affect to despise the idea of vital piety, and the danger of impenitent sinners, you must know, if ever you have read your bible, that a man cannot be saved unless born of the spirit of God. A moral change is necessary in every natural man to fit him for heaven. And this change you and I must experience or we both shall perish; yes, sir, perish forever.

I had the unhappiness to notice, that the prayer of your minister was no less displeasing to you than his conversation. He prayed that the sick might have grace to exercise patience, resignation, submission, repentance and faith. You thought such a prayer was discouraging and that he ought to have comforted your son by praying that he might continue to exercise these graces.

But have you not here also charged your minister foolishly. You must acknowledge that your son gave no special evidence that he was a good man. We will suppose he was not; which I fear was the case. If the clergyman had taken it for granted in his prayer that he was a saint would not your son have concluded with himself, I will calm my anxious mind and dismiss my concerns and enquiries; for the minister acknowledges that I am fit for heaven with my present feelings, views and character. This is the foundation of his peace. With this hope he leaves the world. But dreadful to relate! His hope perisheth. In the light of eternity he discovers his fatal deception. His minister deceived him. Instead of saving he has ruined his soul for eternity. Let me here ask you a question: In this case, would not the blood of your Son be justly required at the hand of the spiritual watchman? The dying sinner is like the drowning man; they both will catch at a straw to save them. Therefore it is dangerous to give him the least encouragement to hope without sufficient reason. Consider that the situation of your minister is most solemn and never complain of his faithfulness. But encourage him in his labors and may they be effectual to your own salvation and that of your family; which is the hearty desire and prayer of your affectionate friend

SHAPHAN.

An explanation of Isaiab xlii. 19, 20. In answer to the question in the Magazine, vol. 1. page 319.

“Who is blind, but my servant? Or deaf, as my messenger that I sent? Who is blind as he that is perfect, and blind as the Lord’s servant? Seeing many things, but thou observest not; opening the ears, but he heareth not.”

TO render an explanation of these verses profitable, it will be necessary just to mention the leading particulars of the whole prophecy, in the chapter. From the first to the tenth verse the prophet has described the office of the Messiah, and God’s promise to preserve him, and give him “For a covenant of the people, for a light of the Gentiles; to open the blind eyes” of all nations, and bring to an end the worship of graven images. From the tenth verse to the end of the chapter he calls upon Jews and Gentiles to praise God, for this unspeakable gift of his Son, mentioning in the 21st verse, God’s well-pleasèdness in his righteousness, as an expiating sacrifice for sin, magnifying the law, through his obedience and sufferings, and making it honorable for justice to pardon the penitent believer. Thus, the prophecy respects 1st, the office character of the great Redeemer; and 2dly, the obligations of gratitude, a sinful world owe to God for such an unspeakable gift.—In the 16th and 17th verses the prophet foretold the shame of the Gentile nations for their idolatry, and their conversion to christianity after this manifestation of Christ, in the flesh. “And I will bring the blind by a way that they knew not,” &c. That is, I will bring the long-blinded Gentiles by a way that they knew not, and make them a peculiar people of God, trusting in the Redeemer. “They shall be turned back, they shall be greatly ashamed, that trust in graven images, that say to the molten images, ye are our Gods.”—He then in the 18th verse calls upon them thus to hear and examine the evidence of the gospel,—“Hear ye deaf; and look ye blind, that ye may see;” and takes it for granted, that, when thus divinely privileged, they would believe on the Lord Jesus. He then, by way of contrast, in the 19th and 20th verses turns from a description of the Gentiles to a description of the Jewish nation, foretelling their hardened obstinacy, their unbelief, and their national rejection of Christ. “Who is blind, but my servant?” Answer, who is blind, but my servant Jacob—but the seed of Israel? That servant stands here for Jacob, and therefore for the whole Jewish nation, appears from the prophetic application of it, Isaiah xliv. 1. “Yet now hear, O Jacob, my servant, and Israel whom I have chosen.” And Isai. xliv. 2. “Or deaf, as my messenger that I sent?”—Ans. Or deaf, as the high priest of the order of Aaron and the whole Jewish priesthood, my messenger that I sent to explain the law of Moses, and to explain the prophecies, to my chosen nation, respecting the coming and kingdom of Messiah? “Who is blind as he that is perfect, and blind as the Lord’s servant?”—Ans. Who is blind as the Jewish priesthood, who profess to have a perfect understanding of the nature and ends of the moral and ceremonial laws, and of all the prophecies respecting Messiah; and blind, as these servants of the Lord, who, as blind guides, instead of conducting the people, to whom they are sent, to the acknowledgment of Messiah, shall by a strange, blind zeal, harden them in unbelief, and in the rejection of him?—“Seeing many things, but thou observest not;”—Ans. Seeing a long series of Messiah’s miracles, in healing, by a word or a touch, diseases, which had for years baffled all human skill—in opening blind eyes and deaf ears—in feeding thousands—in casting out devils and raising the dead, from which astonishing and supernatural evidence, thou oughtest, as the Lord’s servant to have proclaimed Jesus to the people, the real Messiah; but, as if totally blind, thou observest not the amazing proof, but wickedly ascribest it to the agency of the devil. “Opening the ears, but he heareth not.”—Ans. Often going to hear him preach, and asking signs of his divine mission, as if willing to be convinced; but at the same time, paying no regard either to the purity and heavenly nature of the doctrines he taught, or the irrefragable arguments he adduced in proof of his divinity.—How descriptive this prophcy of the real character of the Jewish nation, at the time of Christ's manifestation in the flesh! What people were ever so strangely blind, as the Jews, under all the means of knowledge they enjoyed? How astonishingly blind their Scribes and Pharisees, and chief priests, both to the real character of Christ, and to the abundant evidence he gave them of his mission from heaven! How amply were all the particulars of this prophecy fulfilled in their conduct!—Christ pointedly stiled them blind guides, answering to this prophetic description, Mat xxiii. 16, 17. "Woe unto you, ye blind guides! Who say, whosoever shall swear by the temple, it is nothing: but whosoever shall swear by the gold of the temple, he is a debtor. Ye fools and blind!" &c. And verse 24th, "Ye blind guides, which strain at a gnat and swallow a camel." And he appealed to this, and to other prophecies of Isaiah, in describing their national character and rejection of him. Mat. xiii. 14, 15. "And in them is fulfilled the prophecy of Esaias, which saith, by hearing ye shall hear, and shall not understand: and seeing ye shall see, and shall not perceive. For this people's heart is waxed gross, and their ears are dull of hearing, and their eyes they have closed; lest at any time they should see with their eyes, and hear with their ears, and should understand with their heart, and should be converted, and I should heal them." A. B.

TO THE EDITORS OF THE CONNECTICUT EVANGELICAL MAGAZINE.

GENTLEMEN,
OBSERVING that copies of papers on religious subjects written
Vol. II. No. 9. T

by females as well as others, are inserted in your Magazine, and perused with entertainment and instruction by your pious readers—I take the liberty of transmitting you extracts of three letters. They were written by a young lady, then living in Connecticut, soon after she had first experienced the comforts of religion; to her mother in another town. The accompanying influences of the Spirit of grace gave them effect, in her awakening and hopeful conversion. They are copied almost literally from the original, and the signature only is fictitious. Should they be thought worthy of a place in your Magazine, you have liberty to insert them.

LETTER I.

January 17, 1799.

THE tenderness and love you manifested when I was with you last, was very endearing. I wish to be ever grateful for the blessing of so good a parent still continued to me. Providence saw fit to deprive me of my father at an age too young to realize the worth of a parent. This loss I have long lamented, and alas! have often been so wicked as to secretly call in question the goodness of Providence in that particular. But, for that, and all my other innumerable sins, I hope thro' the merits of my Redeemer to be forgiven;—if not, God will be glorified. I feel, my dear Mother, that there is a sufficiency in Christ for every sinner, the greatest as well as the least; and it is intirely free, for every one that will come shall find mercy. I believe that all who perish, will find it was wholly owing to the obstinacy of their wills. We know, that by nature, the heart is totally depraved, and entirely opposed to all good. We are not willing that God should be on the throne, and have the power of casting off one, and saving another. But is it not just for God to do as he seeth fit with his own? We know he is infinitely wise as well as good, and therefore, that he hath adopted that plan which will best promote his own glory, and the greatest good of the universe. How unreasonable is it then, that we sinful, dependent creatures, should rise up and oppose it. Had we but a proper sense of what awfully wicked hearts we carry in our bosoms from day to day, I believe we should tremble and enjoy no peace till they were created anew by the sovereign grace of God. It is owing to sovereign grace that one soul is saved—it must be sovereign, or it is no grace at all. We certainly do not deserve mercy—we have forfeited all favor, and therefore have no imaginable claim. I feel, dear Mother, an ardent desire for the salvation of your soul and of the souls of my brothers and sisters, and of all my fellow creatures if consistent with the will of God, whether I share in his mercy or not. If he finally cast me off, he will do me no injustice.

That we might see the sinfulness of rejecting Christ, and be brought cheerfully to yield, and submit ourselves to him, lay down all opposition, and make it our chief motive to promote his interest—and that the dread of offending an holy God, might keep us ever watchful and prayerful, is the daily prayer, of your affectionate daughter.

FIDELIA.

LETTER II.

February 23, 1799.

DEAR MOTHER,

WHEN I hear and see the wonderful displays of God's sovereign power and free grace, in this and the adjacent towns, I cannot but feel an earnest desire that the people in the place of my nativity may be remembered in the like manner. Their souls, however, in the view of an impartial Being, are no more precious nor worthy than the souls of others: But on our partial, selfish minds, our friends and relatives usually lie with the greatest weight. I am anxious to know your views and prospects of futurity. Our friends here conjecture you have obtained a hope, and enjoy the comfort of religion. I wish it might be true. I should rejoice to hear it of you all. Perhaps, I am not qualified to judge, but to me it really appears that in contemplating the perfections of Deity, the glorious character of the Redeemer, and in tracing out the beauties of the divine law, there is more solid satisfaction to be enjoyed in one hour, than in a thousand years of sensual gratification, were it possible to live so long.

I am sometimes filled with fearful apprehensions that I am deceiving myself, and building on a foundation that will not stand at the dread tribunal; but I have at different times, and for several days past, felt that witness within me, which serves to confirm and establish my faith, giving that delight and satisfaction which far surpasses all I have ever before enjoyed. I think I can truly say that my chief comfort lies in this, that there is such a perfect and glorious being upon the throne who will dispose of all things for his own glory, and the best good of the universe. I firmly believe that he is no respecter of persons—that he will bestow mercy on all who sincerely desire it, and can do no injustice to any of his creatures. I think the 9th chapter to the Romans may convince any one that God hath power, and an absolute right to do as he will with his own; and the longer we dispute it, the greater will be our condemnation. The most adviseable, most rational, and only safe way then for us, is to submit—give God the throne, and yield a cheerful compliance with his requirements. His law is holy, just and good, and his service is a reasonable service.—What monstrous wickedness then is it to stand quarrelling and cavilling with our Maker and Preserver! I am astonished when I reflect how long I have been contending with God who should have the throne, that he should suffer me to live; especially in a day when he is manifesting his glory and power in the salvation of sinners. My mind, this afternoon, has been deeply affected with a sense of the vile part I have acted towards the Saviour of the world; when I consider how he left his heavenly abode, came down to earth, assumed human nature, suffered with patience every insult depraved nature could inflict, and even an agonizing death, to glorify the Father, and honor that law, by which we were justly condemned, the penalty of which would, otherwise, have been inflicted on all the human race; but now thro' his merits, salvation is offered to all who will accept. Upon these reflections, if our hearts are not filled with humility, love, gratitude and admiration, great, indeed, must be our stupidity. Mr. B.—in a sermon, the other day, made this striking observation, that “God made us and every thing we possess, gives us life, health and strength to enjoy the blessings he is constantly bestowing upon us; but instead of making him suitable returns, we go and dedicate ourselves, and all we have to the service of Satan; telling him if he will live with us, we will never make a prayer, nor obey one of God's commands.” How shocking the thought! Yet, I believe it is too true.

My kind love to all the children. Tell them that those truths which they so often hear from the pulpit and read in the bible, are eternal realities, and it is infinitely important that we attend to them now before the harvest is past, and it be forever too late.

Your affectionate daughter,

FIDELIA.

LETTER III.

March 9, 1799.

MY DEAR MOTHER,

I SIT down to write you with an anxious, aching heart. What shall I say? If we are yet in a state of sin and death, there is no created being can afford any consolation. But we are called upon with the most endearing invitations to look up to Him who made us—who has a just right to dispose of us according to his own eternal purpose, and who hath graciously promised that none who come, desiring to be filled, shall be sent empty away. But if we will not apply to Him—there is no alternative—we must perish. Dear Mother, my heart bleeds for you. The critical situation in which I left you, lies with great weight on my mind. I recollect when, in much the same situation that you now are, Mr. G—remarked to me that it was certain death to go back, and death to stand where I was, and I could no more than die, if I yielded, and resigned myself up. We are in the hands of God, and ever shall be; but the great affair is to be willing to have it so. God will accept of none but those who come voluntarily. If he should, how much would his glorious character sink in our esteem. How can we be so unwilling to put our trust in Him, who is the fountain and source of all happiness? We know that to be separated from him implies perfect misery. Arguing then from reason only, why are we not prevailed upon, to try the experiment of unconditional submission? It certainly cannot alter our situation for the worse, and possibly may lay a foundation for our eternal happiness. What advantage can arise from cavilling, and telling God that He made our hearts—they are such as they are, and we can't change them? Surely, since we have such wicked hearts, and are inexcusable too, it is our wisdom to use every possible mean to search and find them out, and become thoroughly acquainted with their internal pollution—for unless we sensibly feel ourselves sick, we cannot feel the want of a physician. As it respects our criminality, the enquiry whence our wicked hearts are ultimately derived, is perfectly idle. It matters not who made them—while we know that we possess them—that we exercise them, and that they are totally depraved, and we never can enjoy a good conscience—never can be happy, until they are changed.

You have no earthly friend, however near, who can help you. The controversy is between God and your own soul; and the change must be on your part, not his:—He is unchangeable. He is perfectly right; and if you cannot submit and become reconciled upon his terms, your case will be desperate, and the consequences, to you, most dreadful. You told me, Madam, that you have now become so old, and grown so hardened in sin, that there is no hope for you. This I boldly pronounce an artifice of Satan, designed to discourage and prevent your exertions. How many are called in at the eleventh hour! You have no reason to be discouraged. In this world of hope, it is unreasonable, it is wicked to despair of mercy, because we are too old or too wicked to be forgiven. On the contrary, if you are arrived to the eleventh hour, there is the more need of greater exertion, and speedy application to the mercy of God. I wish, Madam, to have you try with all your might—you must try your own strength before you will be convinced that you can do nothing. O, my dear Mother, may you not reasonably take courage in persevering to seek after God,—now he hath come even into your own family. How much ought we to thank and praise Him, that he hath, as we hope, been pleased to open the heart of Lydia, and bring her out of the horrible pit and miry clay.—Blessed be his holy name, for all the wonderful displays of his mighty power and rich grace, in subduing the proud hearts of guilty rebels.

I can do no more than pray for you, nor can I do that, unless God give me an heart, which I hope he will grant for the Redeemer's sake. Do give yourself up cheerfully, and you will find that peace which is in no other way to be found. That this may be your happy case, is the daily prayer of your affectionate daughter,

FIDELIA,

A Narrative on the subject of Missions; and a statement of the Funds of the Missionary Society of Connecticut, to the close of the year 1801. Addressed by the Trustees of the Society to the Ministers and people of the State.

(Continued from p. 317.)

ABOUT the first of December, the Rev. Jeremiah Hallock returned from a mission of 16 weeks to the northern counties of Vermont. He preached in between 40 and 50 towns; assisted in the formation of 2 churches; baptized between 30 and 40, some of them adults; rode about 1000 miles; and preached on an average 6 sermons a week, besides attending a number of conferences. He remarks: "Christians are found more or less in every place; and in general they appear to have fresh anointings. There are at present awakenings in as many as 15 towns which I have visited. Several others have had revivals within two or three years past, where the precious fruits still remain. And in a number of other places there are hopeful beginnings; here and there one under conviction and the people in general more serious and attentive to meetings. The gospel chariots, and the goings of the most mighty Lamb are evident in many places in the northern part of Vermont. Things appear on the reform; religion seems to be taking root; and the call for missionary labors is urgent and extensive. I say for missionary labors, because the situation of many places is such at present, I see no other way for them to have preaching. But if they can now have a little help, it is hoped that by the blessing of God, they will soon, in many places at least,

' have matters prepared to settle
' the gospel, and be liberal contri' butors for its being sent to o' thers"

During the past summer and fall, the Rev. Job Swift performed two missions of 8 weeks each, to the northwestern and northern parts of Vermont. Concerning his first tour, he writes as follows:

"I preached once in the county of Bennington, 4 times in the county of Rutland, and 39 times in the counties of Addison, Chittenden, Franklin and Orleans. I attended frequent conferences, and baptized two infants and one adult. I should have preached oftener, but the latter part of the time people were extremely busied in their harvest. I rode about 800 miles. As I followed Mr. Bushnell in most of the towns I passed, except in the county of Orleans, there was but seldom occasion to administer the ordinances; as he had, but a short time before, administered in all or most of the churches that were formed on the field of missionary labors. In the county of Orleans, the settlements are new, and no congregational church formed; nor did the people think in any town which I visited, that there was a sufficient number of persons qualified to form a church. I think the encouragement for missionary labors great. God seems graciously to have owned the missionaries as instruments in the conversion of sinners, in the establishment of worship in many towns, the formation of churches, and their edification and increase. It is observed by people, that there is, in some towns especially, by their influence a reformation as to the observance of the sabbath, and other moral and Chris“tian duties. I trust the blessing “of many ready to perish has come “on the state of Connecticut, for “their liberality to promote so “good a design.”

In his other tour, Mr. Swift preached about 50 times, in 23 different towns; attended a great number of conferences, admitted several members into churches; administered the Lord's supper 5 times; baptized 18 children and adults; and spent much time in conversing on experimental religion with people who were subjects of the awakening in towns where there was a revival of religion.
In his letter to the Trustees, accompanying his diary, he observes:
“I have not now confined myself to “the newest settlements, but have “labored principally in and about “the towns where there are ap“pearances of religious revivals;
“as here appeared to be the great“est call for missionary labors. I “can inform you, for your comfort
“and joy, and that of all concern“ed in the business of missions,
“that the work of God is prevail“ing and spreading where you “have sent missionaries. Numbers “were called in the course of the “summer, and the work appears “to be spreading into many towns.
“Had those exertions been made “years ago, I trust that many “towns now broken would have “been preserved in some degree in “a state of union, and would prob“ably now have been in the en“joyment of stated gospel admin“istrations.”

“I have ever thought the plan “of sending missionaries into our “new settlements important, but “it appears more so now; and I “believe it is attended with most “happy consequences. It will like“ly have influence for ages. It “will be matter of joy to all pious

“people to understand the work “of God is evidently prevailing in
“the counties of Addison, Chitten“den and Franklin. Let this en“courage the godly to pray and “contribute to promote so benevo“lent a design. This is putting “into bags that wax not old.”

The Rev. Jedidiab Bushnell is still in the northern part of Vermont, or in the northern counties of New-York west of Lake Champlain. He went to Vermont in February last, intending to spend a few weeks there and then proceed to the western part of New-York state; but in consequence of a revival of religion in many towns in Vermont he judged himself called in Providence to continue in that state. He has labored there through the spring, summer and autumn. He has not as yet transmitted to the Trustees a particular journal of his travels and labors;
but in a letter dated June 2, 1801,
he gives the following general account of his mission to that time:
“When I arrived at Tinmouth,
“I viewed myself upon missionary “ground, and tarried and preach“ed one week. After this I vi“sited a number of the neighboring “towns, particularly Middletown “and Poultney, in both which “places there is a revival. Then
“I directed my course north, vi“siting the towns as I passed along “until I came to New-Haven, “where I found an uncommon at“tention. Here I tarried a num“ber of days, preaching, attending “conferences and visiting from “house to house. After this I “went northeast to the mountain “towns; where there are many “valuable people, and probably “they have been too much neglect“ed by missionaries. Some sin“ners heard the gospel with tears
“in their eyes. Then I directed

' my course down Onion river almost to its mouth; then north again visiting most of the towns between the lake and the green mountain. In several of these towns I found an increasing attention."

In another letter, dated October 17th, Mr. Busbnell writes as follows: "The principal field of my labors this summer has been between Middlebury and Canada line. I have visited the mountain towns three times, and the islands in lake Champlain once. In the beautiful range of country between Middlebury and Canada line, there is a divine work of God in many towns. Some of the towns east of this range, upon the Green mountains, are also highly favored. I have been treated kindly this mission. The other missionaries speak the same language; and the great body of the people in this state feel grateful to the Missionary Society of Connecticut notwithstanding some few individuals may oppose their benevolent design and attempt to ridicule the whole business of missions."

These are all the missionaries that have been sent to Vermont the past year, excepting the Rev. Solomon Morgan, who entered on a mission to the northern part of the state about the 20th of December.

The Rev. Joseph Badger returned the first of the present month from a mission of 14 months to New-Connecticut, during which time he went over the whole of that country and visited every settlement. A particular narrative of his labors and travels he has not yet transmitted to the Trustees. He is reappointed a missionary to the same settlements and it is expected he will go out again, within a few weeks.

The Rev. Ezekiel J. Chapman left Hartford the beginning of November last, to go to New-Connecticut, there to labor as a missionary, during the pleasure of the board of Trustees. No intelligence has been received from him. Previous to entering on his mission, he was ordained to the work of the ministry, particularly as an Evangelist, by the association of Tolland county, at the request of the board of Trustees; Mr. Chapman being a licentiate of that association.

From the preceding account of missions to the new settlements, it will be seen that during the year 1801, upwards of 220 weeks missionary labor were performed.—The expense to the society for these missions is nearly 1400 dollars, which with 200 allowed to Mr. Bacon, and the charge for printing the narrative and some other small charges for postage and stationary, makes the whole expense of the Society for the year about 1650 dollars.*

The service performed this year is considerably more than in any preceding year; the liberality of the good people of the state having been such as to enable the Trustees to employ a greater number of missionaries. But altho much has been done in years past, much yet remains to be done; and it is hoped that the stream of liberality will continue to flow, and to grow broader and deeper in its course. The field to be watered by this stream is annually becoming more extensive. The northern part of Vermont, the northern and western parts of New-York state and the northwestern part of Pennsylvania are rapidly settling. New towns are continually forming, and filling up with inhabitants, chiefly from the New-England states; and the tract of country thus settling is many hundred miles in extent. Many years must elapse, before the various obstacles to the regular establishment of the gospel, necessarily attendant upon all new settlements, will be so far removed as to render it unnecessary to send missionaries to them; or before it will cease to be the duty of a people, highly favored as the inhabitants of Connecticut are, to contribute to so important an object. The judicious, steady part of those new settlers feel the importance of being assisted in this respect. They are therefore urgent in their requests to be visited by missionaries; and during the past year the Trustees have received many letters expressing gratitude for past and earnestly soliciting future favors. It will also be seen, from the statement of the funds of the society, that many towns and private individuals have expressed their gratitude, not only by words, but by contributing, according to their ability, to further the benevolent designs of the society.

* Some persons, inimical to the cause of missions, have propagated a report, that much of the money contributed for the support of missions has been expended to pay the expenses of the Trustees, &c. In contradiction to this report, the Trustees assure the public that no officer of the Society has ever demanded or received a single cent for his services or expenses.

It has been said by some of the enemies of the cause of missions, that the missionaries spend too much of their time in large towns where the inhabitants are sufficiently numerous and wealthy to settle ministers. To this it is answered, that in many such towns, which have been several years settling, the greater part of the people from having been so long unaccustomed to religious worship, have become loose in their sentiments and morals, and greatly need to be warned of their duty, that they may be induced to adopt measures for the regular establishment of the gospel.

Another field of missions, daily becoming more extensive, which must be highly interesting to the inhabitants of Connecticut is the tract of country called New-Connecticut. This is settling principally by emigrants from this state; by people the most of whom carry with them an attachment to those religious institutions with which Connecticut has been so long and so happily favored. That this attachment should be continued, and that similar institutions should be established in that new country, as soon as may be, is highly necessary for the present and future welfare of our children, brethren and friends who have gone from us to people the wilderness. One powerful mean for the accomplishment of this desirable end, under the blessing of God, will be to send good missionaries to them to inculcate their duty upon them.—Another consideration which should induce the citizens of this state to contribute generously to this important object, is that it is in a sense but paying a debt they owe to those settlers. Are not our children schooled, in part at least, by the avails of the purchase money which has been paid for that land? And in what more suitable way can we make compensation to the settlers than by furnishing them with the means of obtaining religious instruction, until Providence shall place them in a situation to render our assistance in this respect unnecessary? Impressed with these ideas, the Trustees have determined to keep two missionaries there for the present, and to add to this number as the settlements increase, provided the funds of the Society shall be found to be adequate.

The Trustees feel tenderly affected towards the poor pagans on our borders, who are perishing for lack of vision. They wish to diffuse among them the light of the gospel, and thus to carry into effect one important object for which the Missionary Society was instituted. As yet however they have not been able to devise a plan which promised success. They are anxiously waiting for the leadings of divine Providence to point out to them a way to convey to some of the tribes the light of divine truth. They have given much attention to the subject; but the difficulty of obtaining suitable interpreters, without going to greater expense than the funds of the Society will admit of, is at present an insuperable bar in the way of sending missionaries to the Indians. There is a prospect that this difficulty will soon be in part removed. The Rev. David Bacon is at Detroit, where he has been since the first of May last, learning the Chippeway language; and while attending to this language, he is also aiding the general cause of missions, by preaching at Detroit and the neighboring settlements. He has likewise an opportunity, in that place, of forming an acquaintance with many Indian chiefs. Some of them have already given him encouragement, of affording him every assistance in their power, when he shall have acquired their language to such a degree as to be able to speak to their nation.

By a recent vote the Trustees have directed that Mr. Bacon and a young man attached to his family, who is learning the Indian language, proceed on the opening of the spring to some settlement of the Chippeway tribe, and that he make known to them as far as his imperfect knowledge of the language will permit, the object of his mission; that he acquaint himself with their circumstances, manners and customs; that he deliver to them the talk composed by the Trustees and receive their answer; that he endeavor to instruct them in the first principles of religion, and make report to the Board of his proceedings and prospects.

It is devoutly to be wished that God would make them instruments, of leading many to a knowledge of himself, who are now worshipping they know not what.

The contributions last spring were much more liberal than they have ever been before. This shows that the people of the state are becoming more and more sensible of the utility of the object for which their alms are solicited; and it affords a pleasing prospect that as the demand for their charitable donations increases, their hearts and hands will be opened to meet that demand.

Of the balance now in the hands of the Treasurer, there is due to missionaries upwards of 650 dollars, and a much larger sum will be wanted before the contributions of next spring will be paid into the Treasury. This will greatly reduce the present balance.

The Trustees think it advisable to keep a considerable sum on hand; that if at any time there should be a call for an extraordinary number of missionaries, they may have it in their power to send them; and also, if any prospect should present itself of doing something effectual among the Indians, that they may not lose the opportunity for want of funds. When therefore the people of the state consider that the field for missionary labor grows wider, that the call for missionaries increases, and that in our very extensive western country, which is yet to be settled, new and still more spacious fields will be opening, it is hoped that instead of diminishing they will increase their contributions the ensuing spring; and thus put it in the power of the Trustees, to comprehend a much larger circle than formerly, in their annual plan for missions.

Before closing, the Trustees would turn the attention of the ministers and people of the state to that God who hath the hearts of all men at his disposal, and who turneth them as the rivers of water are turned. It is owing to his divine smiles that the exertions of the friends of missions have been thus far succeeded. All our missionaries concur in representing the inhabitants of the new settlements as in general grateful for the exertions which are made on their behalf; and in many instances God has wonderfully blessed the labors of his missionary servants. His spirit has attended them: Sinners have been awakened and converted to God; and saints have been comforted and edified: The poor and destitute have had the gospel preached unto them: Churches have been formed in places which, but a short time since, were a howling wilderness: The desert and solitary place have been made to bud and blossom as the rose; and to become vocal with the praises of God and the Redeemer.— What a satisfaction must it be to the pious and benevolent to reflect, that the little they have contributed has, under the blessing of God, been the means of producing such beneficial effects? And what a motive is this for continued and increased benefactions?

Let praise be given to God who hath thus graciously interposed to build up the kingdom of his dear Son, and to protect it when assailed by numerous foes. The enemies of religion are unremitting in their efforts to prevent its spread. At the same time, the friends of truth may console themselves with the reflection that God will maintain his own cause. He has pledged his faithfulness that the gates of hell shall not prevail against it; and, supported by this promise, his people, instead of desponding, should continually wrestle with him in prayer, and make those exertions which the course of events, in divine providence, shall point out as most proper for continuing the gospel where it is already enjoyed, and for propagating it where it is yet unknown. The multiplication of missionary societies in Europe and America, the zeal with which their members appear to be animated, and especially that spirit of prayer and supplication which God has poured out upon so many of his people afford the highest encouragement to hope that he will greatly prosper the missionary cause. While therefore the friends of Christ, in obedience to his command, pray that his kingdom may come, and his will be done on earth as it is in heaven; while it is their heart's desire and prayer to God for their brethren that they may be saved, let them generously contribute of their earthly substance to accomplish that object for which they pray. Then may they hope that their prayers and their alms will rise as an acceptable memorial before God; and that he will reward their labors of love with a rich inheritance in the heavenly world.

JOHN TREADWELL, Chairman.

Passed by the Board of Trustees,

January 7th 1802.

Attest

Abel Flint, Secretary.

NOTE. A statement of the funds of the Society for the year 1801, will be published next month.

London Missionary Society.

THE Editors have lately received from their correspondents in London several numbers of the London Evangelical Magazine for the year 1801. They contain many things encouraging to the friends of religion and of missions. Some extracts from these will be published next month. The Editors now present to their readers the substance of a Report made to the London Missionary Society by the Directors in May 1801. This will show the state of their missionary establishments to that time, and the objects which then occupied the attention of the Society.

THE directors of the Missionary Society, by the good hand of God upon them, have brought their labors to another annual termination; and they now present a report of their proceedings, during the past year, to the general meeting of the Society; which, through the same divine goodness, is again permitted to assemble for the purpose of consolidating the strength and renewing the exertions of this important institution.

The real state of the Society will be best appreciated, when the directors shall have detailed its various concerns in the progress of this report. It is only necessary in this place to observe, that although in the past year no new missionary stations have been formed to extend its operations, much intelligence has been received to animate its hopes and to guide its counsels; and it may reasonably be expected, that the benefits of experience, which are on all occasions great, will be found peculiarly important and useful to the Missionary Society.

The directors will now proceed to give an account, in order, of the missions established, by this institution.

Mission at Otaheite.

Since the last annual meeting, letters have been received from our brethren at that island: they bring intelligence to the 13th of January, 1800, and are peculiarly cheering, after the melancholy recital of the separation of their brethren, which had been previously received, and the painful apprehensions for their safety, which in consequence had been felt. If these preceding and seemingly calamitous circumstances are excepted, the mission to Otaheite presents views of an hopeful and encouraging nature. It has assumed consistency and order; it combines integrity of character, fortitude of mind, and fixedness of resolution, with a continued progression of effort, for the exalted purpose of presenting the doctrines of the blessed gospel to the acceptance of the perishing Heathen, and of exhibiting an uncorrupt example of their tendencies and effects, in their own characters and conduct.

The kind providence and the tender mercies of God have been remarkably experienced and warmly acknowledged by our brethren at Otaheite. The gloomy prospects and painful trials which they anticipated, when the separation of the mission took place; of being plundered and dispersed among the Heathen, have been dissipated and prevented; and instead of these calamities, "they enjoy good health of body, peaceable habitations, and unmolested means of grace." When these circumstances are considered, it will appear, that our reduced mission at that island (at the date of the last letters which have been received) enjoyed as many advantages as can be expected in a Heathen land; and gave as great prospect of establishment and success as from their temporary residence and imperfect proficiency in the language and habits of the people, can reasonably be cherished.

The mission that sailed in the Royal Admiral, was prepared in circumstances of comparative darkness and uncertainty. The directors endeavored to act with prudence and wisdom in its equipment and destination; and altho' some variation would doubtless have been made, if the last dispatches from Otaheite and Tongataboo had been previously received, yet they hope that neither the number, the condition, nor the equipment of the missionaries will be found inconvenient, embarrassing, or useless; and that, under the continued auspices of the heavenly Protector, they have, before this time, joined their brethren at Otaheite, to promote with redoubled activity the work of God on that island, and to extend their exertions, at a suitable opportunity, to other islands in its vicinity.

In February last, the directors received letters from the missionaries in the Royal Admiral, dated at Rio Janeiro, 27th August 1800. So far, they had proceeded on their voyage; and except the death of Mr. Turner, Surgeon of the ship, and the temporary but severe illness of some of the missionaries, in consequence of a malignant fever among the convicts, no circumstances of moment or of sorrow had occurred to them. Their journal gives a very satisfactory account of the commendable and profitable manner in which they employ their time: a great part of it appears to be spent in such exercises of devotion and improvement, as especially regard their intended missionary services.

Mission to Tongataboo.

Since the last general meeting, three of the missionaries who were left at that island, have returned to this country; two have tarried at Port Jackson; one has chosen to remain at Tongataboo (but in such a state of mind and conduct as to afford no expectation of any benefit being derived from his continuance there;) and the other three of our brethren have fallen victims to the intestine commotions of the island, and the ferocious dispositions of some of its inhabitants. The directors have deeply and seriously examined the brethren who have returned home, on the subject of their mission. The result has been, that they have to lament its unproductiveness, as well as its fatal and sanguinary termination. Still, however, they think that impressions favorable to the characters and the purposes of our brethren, have been made upon many of the natives of Tongataboo, which in the event of another benevolent visit being made to that island, may be found to have produced some fruit, though of an inferior nature and of inconsiderable growth, to his praise and glory, who has often seemed to make the blood of his beloved martyrs the seed of a future Church.

South African Mission.

The state of this mission, when the preceding annual report was made to this society, afforded the directors abundant matter for gratitude, and admiration at the goodness of God, and at the zeal and devotedness of the brethren who were then engaged in it. Since that time the four brethren, who sailed in May 1800, have arrived at the Cape, and have commenced their missionary labors in its vicinity; and three brethren from Holland, who took their passage in January last, have, it is hoped, reached the same destination. The mission to that part of the Heathen world has been thus continually increasing in its strength; and the directors are happy to add, that the last letters which have been received from thence, include a call for additional missionaries to labor in a field of increasing extent, and of encouraging expectations. The spark of missionary zeal which was wasted from this country to the Cape of Good Hope, appears to have been kindled into a flame in the bosom of our Christian friends at that station. Already it seems to have taken hold on the outskirts of Satan's kingdom; and with the continued assistance of its Almighty inspirer, it bids fair to spread its holy energies into some of the recesses of the infernal empire. The Missionary Society at the Cape, in August 1800, had no less than 1900 Heathen under their tuition, and since that time, the number has considerably increased. Our venerable friend Dr. Vanderkemp, was, in December last, still among the Caffrees. His trials appear to be great, his safety precarious, his situation lonely and cheerless, and his encouragement not so great as might be expected from his exemplary diligence and zeal. Still, however, this missionary champion strengthens himself in his God, and patiently waits for liberty to visit his friends at the Cape; or for an opening in providence, that some of the brethren may be sent to him. May deliverance and success be afforded to this valuable and distinguished servant of our Divine Master!

The brethren Kicherer and Kramer, after having labored with acceptance and success in the country of the Boschemen, have agreed to go eight days journey toward the Great River, agreeably to an impressive and often repeated invitation which they have received from near a thousand Heathen of various tribes, who reside together; and who earnestly desire religious instruction. The brethren Anderson and Edwards are intended to reside among the Boschemen, to carry on the work which has been so propitiously begun. Brothers Lingen and Read are at present in Waggonmakers Valley, assisting the Rev. Mr. Van-Sulk, whose ministry is attended by about 300 Heathen, among whom there are, it is said, "many strong believers," and many others on whom the work of God appears savingly to be begun. At a suitable time these brethren are intended to assist Dr. Vanderkemp, in his labor among the Caffrees. Brother Tromp perseveres, with most commendable zeal, to instruct both Heathens and Christians. The efforts of our missionaries appear to be well supported by the kindness and generosity of the Christian friends at the Cape and its vicinity; and the Dutch ministers at several of the settlements, are laboring with diligence and success among their countrymen, and in the instruction of the surrounding slaves and Hottentots. With such encouraging prospects, and in compliance with an earnest request from the society at the Cape for additional missionaries, the directors have determined to accept of three German brethren, who have offered themselves for the work of God in Africa; who are well recommended by the Rev. Mr. Strache, of Hatshausen in East Friesland, and who, at present, are receiving appropriate instructions under the Rev. Mr. Jznicke, at Berlin. The directors were authorized by a resolution of the last general meeting, to "enlarge the missions in Africa, and to establish such new ones as circumstances should render expedient." They have acted in the spirit of this resolution, and trust, that the provision of missionaries which they have made will not be thought to exceed the extent and importance of the work which the Providence of God appears to set before this society, for its patronage and execution.

East-Indies.

A letter, dated 5th August, 1800, has lately been received from Mr. Forsyth, the society's missionary in India. At that time he was well in health; had made considerable proficiency in the language of the country, and was about to begin a school for the instruction of the children of the natives. Mr. Forsyth appears to possess a true missionary spirit; and he exhibits fidelity and disinterestedness of character and conduct. The directors have long since been authorized to increase the mission to that part of the world; but circumstances have occurred to frustrate their desires and intentions. It is an object, however, which they think by far too important to be forgotten or neglected; they are, therefore, continuing their enquiries and their correspondence for the purpose of obtaining suitable persons to assist Mr. Forsyth, or to labor in any preferable parts of India.

Twillingate, in Newfoundland.

Since the last general meeting, two letters have been received from the Rev. Mr. Hillyard, who is stationed at that place, under the patronage of this society. Mr. Hillyard's account is pleasing, encouraging, and satisfactory. He appears to labor with diligence in the work of his ministry, in the instruction of youth, and in catechizing children. Having visited some of the adjacent islands, he has recommended to the directors, that another missionary be sent from this Society, to preach the gospel at Fogo, Bonavista, and Green-Pond Island. This measure has been maturely considered; and it has been resolved to comply with Mr. Hillyard's recommendation, whenever a suitable person shall be accepted and qualified for the proposed station.

Mission to Canada.

The directors reported to the last general meeting, that two missionaries had been sent to Quebec, in compliance with several applications which had been received from respectable persons united in Christian society at that city; and which represented the province of Canada to be in a deplorable state, from the almost total want of religious institutions. Mr. Bentom and Mr. Mitchell, on their arrival at Quebec, met with kind reception and suitable encouragement; and after preaching alternately in a place hired for the purpose, it was settled, that Mr. Bentom should continue his labors there, and that Mr. Mitchell should proceed to Montreal, in prosecution of similar services. By letters from Mr. Bentom, it appears that some circumstances occurred which, for a time, seemed to present an obstacle to his continued acceptance and usefulness; but his last letter, dated 4th November, 1800, is more satisfactory and encouraging, as it states that the hearers and subscribers at Quebec are on the increase, and that the cause of God is patronized by some very respectable inhabitants. On account of the subscription which has been raised for Mr. Bentom's support, it is presumed that his residence at Quebec will occasion little or no expense to this society.

The directors are sorry to report, that Mr. Mitchell's reception at Montreal was discouraging; and that, after having preached there about six weeks, without meeting with any patronage or support, or prospect of success, he thought it his duty to leave that city. Mr. Mitchell, it appears, made inquiries respecting the Indians in the vicinity of Montreal, with a view of endeavoring to be useful among them; but the information which he received was, on many accounts, so unfavorable to such an undertaking, that he thought it prudent to decline it, and to avail himself of a desire which some persons, at the bay of Chaleurs, (about four hundred miles from Quebec) had expressed, of having the benefits of a gospel Ministry. The directors suppose that Mr. Mitchell has proceeded to this settlement; and they hope he will prove faithful to his engagements, and successful in his labors.

Port Jackson, New South Wales.

The directors, perhaps, cannot strictly include this settlement among the number of those which are missionary stations; yet, as many of the missionaries returned thither from Otaheite and Tongataboo, and as some of them continue there to the present time, it is thought right to notice circumstances of such appropriateness in this report. The directors feel some satisfaction in stating, that the apparently calamitous providences which cast our brethren on the shores of New South Wales, have not been wholly unimproved, by those of them who could engage in ministerial offices. Messrs. Cover, Henry, and Hassell, have preached the gospel in many districts of the colony; alternately with beclouded expectations and sanguine hopes; but Mr. Cover having since arrived in England, and Mr. Henry having gone to Otaheite, it is feared that little, if any progress, has been made in conciliating the dispositions and converting the souls of the colonists. This indeed appears to be a work of mighty enterprize; for although no opposition can resist the energies of Almighty power and grace, yet it becomes us to consider and to act upon the appropriateness of human means; and in this view the profligacy and impiety of the inhabitants of the colony are represented to be so excessive and enormous, as to require ministerial ardor, fortitude, and patience, of the very highest kind and degree.

If it should please God to impress upon the hearts of any of his servants the duty and importance of undertaking a work of such peculiar difficulty, but affecting benevolence; and it should appear that the Holy Spirit of God has endued them with suitable gifts and graces, the directors think, that the patronage of this society, to introduce them and to assist (if necessary) in supporting them, would be legitimate and beneficial exertions. Such a mission, in itself, must be regarded as an object of great interest, on account of the increasing state of the colony, and of the number of children that stand in need of learning and Christian instruction; besides which, it should be remembered, that in the event of a religious interest being, by the Divine blessing, established and enlarged at Port Jackson and the settlements in its vicinity, our missions in the South Seas may be visited with comparative frequency and facility; and be relieved, removed, supported, or enlarged (as circumstances might require) with peculiar advantage. It is therefore hoped, that these considerations, on a subject of manifest importance, will not be unimpressive on the minds of the present meeting, nor be unimproved in the deliberations of future directors.

At the last general meeting, two objects of great importance and of close connection with the designs of this society and the general interests of religion, were committed to the execution of the directors. They were authorized to take suitable measures for printing as large an edition of the Bible, or of the New Testament only, in the French language, as should appear to them necessary, with a preliminary dissertation on the evidences of its divine inspiration for the purpose of their being distributed in France and Belgium, by eligible and efficacious means. And they were also authorized to appropriate 500*l.* per annum to the improvement of a certain number of missionaries of promising talents and approved piety, by affording them appropriate instruction for the space of two years previously to their actual entrance on missionary duty; and to carry these measures into effect conformably to the report made on this subject to the said general meeting.

The directors have, subsequently, taken both of the above mentioned objects into their consideration; and are pursuing measures to carry them into effect.

The directors have now concluded a report of their operations during the last year, with respect to the missions that had previously been established by the society, and to such other objects as in their judgment are legitimate, benevolent and important. And they have presented such a view of the interests and efforts of this institution as they think is calculated to engage the attention, encourage the hopes, and animate the exertions, of every Christian, in behalf of a well-connected and greatly-enlarged work of God.

To cherish and increase a missionary spirit, by suitable representations of the pitiable state of Heathen and unenlightened countries, and the highly impressive duty of holding forth to them the word of life and salvation;—to employ with discretion, wisdom, and energy, such means and missionaries as the Providence of God shall present to their patronage and superintendence; and by a correspondence with every part of the Christian world to disseminate missionary knowledge, and to direct missionary efforts; these it is hoped, will be the continued objects of the Society's solicitude, and of the Directors future labors. Of the benefits to be derived from an enlarged and attentively cultivated correspondence with respectable individuals and Societies in foreign parts of the world, the Directors think very highly. In the course of the past year letters have been received from America, Holland, and various parts of Germany, which evince, that by the dissemination of missionary intelligence, missionary zeal has been created and put in action. In America, several societies have been formed, and have commenced encouraging exertions for the purpose of instructing and converting the native Indians. In Holland and Germany similar institutions have been established; respectable and prudent individuals have offered their patronage and co-operation: this society has, in consequence, been supplied with some valuable missionaries; and at the present time six esteemed and suitably instructed missionaries are at Berlin; waiting the directors' acceptance of their offers to preach the gospel among the Heathen nations in Africa.

A missionary society, of great respectability and promising aspect, has also lately been formed at Tain and Inverness, in the northern extremity of Scotland.

Among other acceptable proofs of an increasing zeal for the introduction of our Saviour's kingdom among the Heathen, we notice, with satisfaction, the association which has lately been formed by several pious and respectable clergymen, and other eminent members of the Church of England, for promoting that object. These worthy characters being of opinion that their exertions as a separate and distinct society might be more beneficial than by an union with ours, (which comprehends other denominations as well as members of the establishment) have accordingly formed a missionary institution, whose operations are intended to be more especially directed toward the continent of Asia and Africa; our most ardent prayers shall be offered for a distinguished benediction on their zealous endeavors; and we trust we shall have to unite our thankfulness and joy on account of their abundant success. The energies of Christians of every name are demanded, in a field so bounded in extent and important in its consequences; and we indulge the hope that every minister especially, who feels the immense importance of this cause, will impress upon his congregation and connection a proper attention to this subject, that we may be furnished with an adequate supply of faithful and devoted men, who are desirous of introducing the gospel among the Heathen nations, and possess the self-denial, patience, and other qualifications which are requisite for so ardent a work.

From such a widely extended foundation of substantial knowledge and enlightened zeal, a superstructure of eminent worth, of a durable nature, and of divine efficiency, may reasonably be expected; and no human means (than those just mentioned) seem better calculated to bring about that universal diffusion of piety and happiness, which being predicted in "the sure word of prophecy," shall certainly be accomplished;—"when the earth shall be filled with the knowledge of the glory of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea."

Religious Intelligence.

IMMEDIATELY on hearing of a revival of religion in Kentucky, sundry efforts were made to obtain correct information, from those who had been eye witnesses of the scene. The following communications are the first that have been received. They are given to the public, leaving all to judge for themselves. Many will applaud, many will condemn—let him that judgeth do it in the fear of God.

The following is an extract of a letter from the Rev. Archibald Alexander, President of Hampden Sidney College in Virginia, to the Rev. Nathan Strong, Hartford. Mr. Alexander is a gentleman of eminent science and judicious piety, and by his late tour through New-England, became known and beloved by many of our Christian Readers.

Prince Edward, Jan. 25, 1802.

REV. AND DEAR SIR,

I HAVE deferred writing until this time, that I might have it in my power to communicate some authentic intelligence of the extraordinary revival of religion which has lately taken place in Kentucky. The inclosed letter was written to me, by the President of Washington Academy, in this state; who visited Kentucky for the very purpose of examining into the nature of the remarkable religious appearances which existed there. In this inquiry he obtained complete satisfaction, and now entertains no doubt of its being a glorious work of God, as you will see by the contents of his letter. I scarcely know a man on whose judgment, in a matter of this kind, I could more confidently rely than upon his. Possessing a clear, discriminating mind, and rational piety, he was in as little danger of being deceived by delusive appearances as any other person with whom I am acquainted. You will however judge of the narrative for yourself, and may make what use of it, you think proper. I have sent it with a view to its publication in the Evangelical Magazine, if the Editors think it would be useful to the public.

In N. Carolina a revival attended with similar appearances, has lately taken place, chiefly amongst the presbyterians. I am not able to furnish you with the names of the counties or congregations, but I am informed it has extended over a tract of country about twenty miles square. The congregations are nearly as large, and instances of falling down as common as in Kentucky.

In this state, religious appearances are something better, than when I left it. At Christmas a number of ministers of different denominations, met together in the county of Bedford, to consult upon the best measures for uniting their efforts, in defence of Christianity against the torrent of vice and infidelity which threatened to overflow the land. Their meeting was remarkably harmonious,—prejudice and party-spirit seemed to have no place amongst them, but with one accord they consented to a scheme of friendly intercourse, and general union. Whilst they were together many sermons were delivered, and the effect was great—An uncommon awakening has taken place amongst the people in that neighborhood—and it is hoped a revival of true religion has commenced.

Washington Academy, Jan. 1, 1802.

REV. AND DEAR SIR,

I NOW sit down, agreeably to my promise, to give you some account of the late revival of religion in the state of Kentucky. You have no doubt been informed already respecting the Green-River and Cumberland revivals. I will just observe, that the last is the fourth summer since the revival commenced in those places, and that it has been more remarkable than any of the preceding, not only for lively and fervent devotion among Christians, but also for awakenings and conversions among the careless. And it is worthy of notice, that very few instances of apostacy have hitherto appeared. As I was not in the Cumberland country myself, all I can say about it depends on the testimony of others; but I was uniformly told, by those who had been there, that their religious assemblies were more solemn, and the appearance of the work much greater, than what had been in Kentucky. Any enthusiastic symptoms, which might at first have attended the revival, were greatly subsided, whilst the serious concern and engagedness of the people were visibly increased.

In the older settlement of Kentucky, the revival made its first appearance among the presbyterians last spring. The whole of that country about a year before was remarkable for vice and dissipation; and I have been credibly informed, that a decided majority of the people were professed infidels. During the last winter appearances were favorable among the baptists, and great numbers were added to their churches.— Early in the spring, the ministrations of the presbyterian clergy began to be better attended than they had been for many years before. Their worshipping assemblies became more solemn, and the people after they were dismissed shewed a strange reluctance about leaving the place. They generally continued some time in the meeting-houses, and employed themselves in singing or religious conversation. Perhaps about the last of May or the first of June, the awakenings became general in some congregations, and spread through the country in every direction with amazing rapidity. I left that country about the first of November, at which time, this revival in connection with the one on Cumberland had covered the whole state of Kentucky, excepting a small settlement which borders on the waters of Green-River, in which no presbyterian ministers are settled, and I believe very few of any denomination.

The power with which this revival has spread, and its influence in moralizing the people, are difficult for you to conceive, and more so for me to describe. I had heard many accounts, and seen many letters respecting it before I went to that country; but my expectations, though greatly raised, were much below the reality of the work. Their congregations, when engaged in worship, presented scenes of solemnity superior to what I had ever seen before. And in private houses it was no uncommon thing to hear parents relate to strangers, the wonderful things which God had done in their neighborhoods, while a large family of young people collected round them would be in tears. On my way to Kentucky, I was informed by settlers on the road, that the character of Kentucky travellers was entirely changed; and that they were now as remarkable for sobriety as they had formerly been for dissoluteness and immorality. And indeed I found Kentucky, to appearance, the most moral place I had ever seen. A profane expression was hardly ever heard. A religious awe seemed to pervade the country; and some ecclesiastical charasters had confessed, that from whatever cause the revival might proceed, it made the people better.

Its influence was not less visible in promoting a friendly temper among the people. Nothing could appear more amicable, than that undissembled benevolence which governs the subjects of this work. I have often wished, that the mere politician or the deist could observe with impartiality their peaceful and amicable spirit. He would certainly see, that nothing could equal the religion of Jesus for promoting even the temporal happiness of society. Some neighborhoods visited by the revival, were formerly notorious for private animosities and contentions; and many petty lawsuits had commenced on that ground. When the parties in these quarrels were impressed with religion, the first thing was to send for their antagonists, and it was often very affecting to see their meeting. They had both seen their faults, and both contended they ought to make the acknowledgments, till at last they were obliged to request one another, to forbear all mention of the past, and to receive each other as friends and brothers for the future. Now, sir, let modern philosophists talk of reforming the world by banishing Christianity, and introducing their licentious systems; the blessed gospel of our God and Saviour is shewing what it can do.

Some circumstances have concurred to distinguish the revival in Kentucky from almost any other of which we have had any account. I mean the largeness of their assemblies on sacramental occasions—the length of time they continued on the ground, in the exercise of public or private devotion—and the great numbers who have fallen down under religious impressions.

On each of these particulars I shall give you some remarks.

With respect to the largeness of their assemblies. It is generally supposed that at many places, there were not less than eight, ten, or twelve thousand people. At one place called Cane Ridge meeting-house, many are of opinion there were not less than twenty thousand. There were an hundred and forty waggons which came loaded with people, besides other wheel-carriages: and some persons attended who had come the distance of two hundred miles. The largeness of these congregations was a considerable inconvenience. They were too numerous to be addressed by any one speaker. Different ministers were obliged to officiate at the same time at different stands. This afforded an opportunity to those who were but slightly impressed with religion, to wander backwards and forwards between the different places of worship, which created an appearance of confusion and gave ground to such as were unfriendly to the work, to charge it with disorder. There was also another cause which conduced to the same effect. About this time the people began to fall down in great numbers under serious impressions. This was a new thing among Presbyterians. It excited universal astonishment, and created a degree of curiosity which could not be restrained. When people fell down even in the most solemn parts of divine service, those who stood near were so extremely anxious to see how they were affected, that they frequently crowded about them in such a manner as to disturb the worship. But these causes of disorder were soon removed. Different sacraments were appointed on the same sabbath which divided the people; and the falling down soon became so familiar as to excite no disturbance. I was in that country during the month of October. I attended three sacraments. The number of people at each was supposed to be about four or five thousand; and every thing was conducted with strict propriety. When persons fell down, those who happened to be near took care of them, and every thing continued quiet till the worship was concluded.

The length of time the people continued on the ground was another important circumstance of the Kentucky revival. At Cane-Ridge the people met on Friday morning, and continued till Wednesday evening, night and day without intermission, either in the public or private exercises of devotion; and with such a degree of earnestness, that heavy showers of rain were not sufficient to disperse them. On other sacramental occasions, they generally continued on the ground till Monday or Tuesday evening. And had not the ministers been exhausted and obliged to retire, or had they chosen to prolong the worship, they might have kept the people any length of time they pleased. And all this was or might have been done in a country, where, not a twelve-month before, the clergy found it a difficult matter to detain the people during the common exercises of the sabbath. The practice of camping on the ground was introduced, partly by necessity, and partly by inclination. The assemblies were generally too large to be received by any common neighborhood. Every thing indeed was done which hospitality and brotherly kindness could do, to accommodate the people. Public and private houses were both opened, and free invitations given to all persons who wished to retire. Farmers gave up their meadows before they were mown to supply the horses. But notwithstanding all this liberality, it would in many cases have been impossible to have accommodated the whole assembly with private lodgings. But besides, the people were unwilling to suffer any interruption in their devotion, and they formed an attachment for the place, where they were continually seeing so many careless sinners receiving their first impressions, and so many deists constrained to call on the formerly despised name of Jesus. They conceived a sentiment like what Jacob felt at Bethel, when he said, "Surely the Lord is in this place—this is none other but the house of God, and this is the gate of heaven."

The number of persons who have fallen down under serious impressions in this revival, is another matter worthy of attention. And on this I shall be the more particular, as it seems to be the principal cause, why this work should be more suspected of enthusiasm, than some other revivals. At Cane-Ridge sacrament (the place mentioned above) it is generally supposed, that not less than one thousand persons fell prostrate to the ground, and among them were many infidels. At one sacrament which I attended in that country, the number that fell was thought to be upwards of three hundred. Persons who fall are generally such as have manifested symptoms of the deepest impressions for some time previous to that event. It is common to see them shed tears plentifully for about an hour. Immediately before they become totally powerless, they are seized with a general tremor; and sometimes though not frequently, in the moment of falling they utter one or two piercing shrieks. Persons in this state are affected in many different degrees. Sometimes when unable to stand or sit, they have the use of their hands and can converse with perfect composure. In other cases they are unable to speak, their pulse grows weak, and they draw a hard breath about once a minute. And in some instances their hands and feet become cold, and their pulse, and breath, and all the symptoms of life forsake them for nearly an hour. Persons who have been in this situation have uniformly avowed, that they suffered no bodily pain, and that they had the entire command of their reason and reflection; and when recovered they could relate every thing which was said or done, near them, or which could possibly fall within their observation. From this it appears that their falling is neither the common fainting nor the nervous affection. Indeed this strange phenomenon appears to have taken every turn it possibly could to baffle the conjectures of those who are not willing to consider it a supernatural work. Persons have sometimes fallen on their way home from public worship, and sometimes after their arrival. In some cases, they have fallen when pursuing their common business on their farms, or when they had retired for private devotion. I observed above, that persons generally are seriously affected for some time previous to falling. In many cases however it is otherwise. Numbers of careless persons have fallen as suddenly as if struck with a flash of lightning. Many professed infidels, and other vicious characters have been arrested in this way; and sometimes at the very moment, when they were uttering their blasphemies against the work.

At the beginning of the revival in Shelby county, the appearances, as related to me by eye witnesses, were very surprising indeed. The revival had previously spread with irresistible power through the adjacent counties; and many of the religious people had attended distant sacraments, and were greatly benefitted. They were much engaged, and felt unusual freedom in their addresses at the Throne of Grace; for the outpouring of the divine Spirit, at the approaching sacrament in Shelby. The sacrament came on in September. The people as usual met on Friday, but they were all languid, and the exercises went on heavily. On Saturday and Sunday morning it was no better. At length the communion service commenced, and every thing was still lifeless. The minister of the place was speaking at one of the tables without any unusual liberty. All at once there were several shrieks from different parts of the assembly. Persons fell instantly in every direction. The feelings of the pious were suddenly revived; and the work went on with extraordinary power from that time till the conclusion of the solemnity.

These phenomena of falling are common to all ages and sexes, and to all sorts of characters; and when they fall they are differently exercised. Some pious people have fallen under a sense of ingratitude and hardness of heart; and others under affecting manifestations of the love and goodness of God. Many careless persons have fallen under legal convictions, and obtained comfort before they arose. But perhaps the most numerous class of all, are those who fall under distressing views of their guilt, who arise with the same fearful apprehensions, and continue in that state for some days, perhaps weeks, before they obtain comfort. I have conversed with many who fell under the influence of comfortable feelings, and the account which they gave of their exercises, while they lay entranced, was very surprising. I know not how to give you a better idea of them, than by saying, that they appeared in many cases to surpass the dying exercises of Doctor Finley. Their minds appeared wholly swallowed up in contemplating the perfections of Deity as illustrated in the plan of salvation. And while they lay in all appearance senseless, and almost destitute of life, their minds were more vigorous and active, and their memories more retentive and accurate, than they had ever been before. I have heard respectable characters assert, that their manifestations of gospel truth were so clear, as to require some caution when they began to speak, lest they should use language, which might induce their hearers to suppose they had seen those things with their natural eyes. But at the same time, they had seen no image or sensible representation, nor indeed any thing, besides the old truths contained in the bible. Among those whose minds were filled with the most delightful communications of divine love, I but seldom observed any thing ecstatic. Their expressions were just and rational; they conversed with calmness and composure; and on first recovering the use of speech, they appeared like persons just recovering from a violent sickness, which had left them on the borders of the grave.

I have sometimes been present when persons who fell under the influence of convictions, obtained relief before they rose. On these occasions it was impossible not to observe how strongly the change of their minds was depicted in their countenances. From a face of horror and despair, they assumed one which was open, luminous, and serene, and expressive of all the comfortable feelings of religion. As to those who fall down under legal convictions and continue in that state, they are not different from those who receive convictions in other revivals; excepting, that their distress is more severe. Indeed, extraordinary power is the leading characteristic of this revival. Both saints and sinners have more striking discoveries of the realities of another world, than I have ever known on any other occasion.

I trust I have said enough on this subject, to enable you to judge how far the charge of enthusiasm is applicable to it. Lord Littleton in his letter on the conversion of St. Paul observes (and I think very justly) that "Enthusiasm is a vain, self-righteous spirit, swelled with self-sufficiency, and disposed to glory in its religious attainments." If this definition be a good one, there is perhaps as little enthusiasm in Kentucky as in any other revival. Never in my life have I seen more genuine marks of that humility, which disclaims the merit of its own duties, and looks to the Lord Jesus Christ as the only way of acceptance with God. I was indeed highly pleased to find that Christ was all and in all in their religion, as well as in the religion of the gospel. Christians in their highest attainments were most sensible of their entire dependence on divine grace; and it was truly affecting to hear with what agonizing anxiety awakened sinners inquired for Christ, as the only physician who could give them any help. Those who call these things enthusiasm, ought to tell us what they understand by the Spirit of Christianity. In fact, Sir, this revival operates, as our Saviour promised the Holy Spirit should when sent into the world. It convinces of sin, of righteousness, and of judgment; a strong confirmation to my mind, both that the promise is divine, and that this is a remarkable fulfilment of it.

It would be of little avail to object to all this, that perhaps the professions of many of the people were counterfeited. Such an objection would rather establish what it meant to destroy. For where there is no reality there can be no counterfeit; and besides, when the general tenor of a work is such, as to dispose the more insincere professors to counterfeit what is right, the work itself must be genuine. But as an eye-witness in the case, I may be permitted to declare, that the professions of those under religious convictions, were generally marked with such a degree of engagedness and feeling, as wilful hypocrisy could hardly assume. The language of the heart when deeply impressed is easily distinguished from the language of affectation.

Upon the whole, Sir, I think the revival in Kentucky among the most extraordinary that have ever visited the church of Christ. And all things considered it was peculiarly adapted to the circumstances of the country into which it came. Infidelity was triumphant, and religion at the point of expiring. Something of an extraordinary nature appeared necessary to arrest the attention of a giddy people, who were ready to conclude that Christianity was a fable and futurity a dream. This revival has done it. It has confounded infidelity, awed vice into silence, and brought numbers beyond calculation under serious impressions.

Whilst the blessed Saviour was calling home his people and building up his church in this remarkable way, opposition could not be silent. At this I have hinted above. But it is proper I should observe here, that the clamorous opposition which assailed the work at its first appearance has been in a great measure borne down before it. A large proportion of those who have fallen, were at first opposers; and their example has taught others to be cautious, if it has not taught them to be wise.

I have written on this subject to a greater length than I first intended. But if this account should give you any satisfaction, and be of any benefit to the common cause, I shall be fully gratified.

Yours with the highest esteem.

GEO. A. BAXTER.

Rev. Archibald Alexander.

Extract of a letter from a gentleman in Philadelphia to his friend in Hartford.

"I was last Sunday evening to hear Mr. — speak at the old College—it is fitted up so as to accommodate at least 1500 persons and it was so crowded the greater part of the audience were obliged to stand the whole time.— His subject was, the great condescension of the Almighty in reasoning with his creatures to persuade them to come to the truth; whereby their happiness would be increased here and hereafter.— Great attention and solemnity appeared in the people the whole time, and a more than common concern has taken place here on the subject of religion, and many enquiring what they shall do to be saved."

Given—By two friends of Missions, 1 doll. & 16 dolls. 90 cents.

THE

Connecticut Evangelical Magazine.

[PUBLISHED ACCORDING TO ACT OF CONGRESS.]

VOL. II.]

APRIL, 1802.

[No. 10.

FOR THE CONNECTICUT EVANGELICAL MAGAZINE.

Attempts to propagate the gospel among the Indians in New-England and parts adjacent.

(Contin. from p. 289.)

NUMBER II.

Concerning the propagation of the gospel among the Indians in New-England, &c. particularly among those on Martha's-Vineyard.

IN the first number some account was given of the missionary labors of the Rev. Thomas Mayhew, Jun. among the natives on Martha's-Vineyard—of his benevolence, zeal, diligence, and self-denial in the work—of the measures he took, first in private, then in public to promote the reception of the gospel—some obstacles to the good work were mentioned; others remain to be noticed.

Mr. Experience Mayhew mentions another thing, which was a temporary impediment to the propagation of the gospel among these Indians, viz. "In the year 1643, there was a strange disease among them: They ran up, and down, as if delirious, till they could run no longer: They would make their faces as black as a coal, and snatch up any weapon, as tho' they would do mischief with it; and spake great swelling words; and yet they did no harm."

"Many of these Indians were, by the English, seen in this condition. Now this, and all other calamities which the Indians were under, they generally then attributed to the departure of some among them from their own heathenish ways and customs." Like some among civilized people, who yet have been better instructed, they read the judgments of heaven upon this occasion.*

It seems probable, from the ancient accounts transmitted to us, that the opposition to Christianity

* Possibly this was a stratagem of the powows, who might employ some confidants, who acted their parts so well, as to impose upon the other Indians, and even upon the English themselves. Such pious frauds have not been peculiar to civilized nations. Suppose this a fraud, or otherwise, the powows knew how to take advantage of it, to prejudice the minds of the Indians against Christianity.

VOL. II. No. 10.

X x

made by the powows, was the greatest obstacle of all. The common people knew not how they should come off from them. They were extremely afraid of offending them. They not only dreaded their supposed power, of wounding and killing whom they thought fit, by their enchantments; but they were afraid of displeasing them on another account, as they made great dependence upon them in times of sickness, as men, who had a preternatural power in the cure of diseases. This, it seems, was the strongest cord that bound them to their heathenish rites. The powows, by one mean and another, kept them in the most slavish fear and subjection to them; so that, for a considerable time, few durst desert them.

The powows and those who adhered to them, about the year 1646, seeing two meetings of the praying Indians*, set up in opposition to that way, which themselves, and their fathers had long walked in, were very much disturbed and enraged: And now they thought to terrify Hiacoomes, and the rest of the praying Indians, by threatening to destroy them by force. One powow in particular told them, "That the powows could kill all the Meeting [i. e. Christianized] Indians, if they set about it."†

To the end they might terrify the new converts, and drive them, if possible, to renounce their profession, several Indians went to a meeting of the praying Indians,

* Praying Indians was a term commonly used in early times, and applied to those natives, who had embraced Christianity, and prayed to God in the name of Jesus Christ, the Mediator, to distinguish them from their heathen countrymen.

† Indian Converts, p. 7.

and there told many stories of the great hurt, which the powows had, in the way of their enchantments, done to many. Such a power in them, being generally, if not universally believed by the Indians, seemed, above any thing else, to discourage them, for a time, from receiving the true religion, now published among them; tho' those few, who had already embraced it, were not so terrified as to relinquish their profession.

During this meeting, this question was asked by one, who was on the side of the powows, "Who is there, who does not fear the powows?" To which another of them answered, "There is no man, that is not afraid of them." Probably they spoke the real sentiments of their hearts, at least, respecting the main body of the Indians.

It may be difficult, at this day, fully to determine the character of these powows. The people of New-England in ancient times, particularly the writers in the seventeenth century, generally supposed them to be wizzards, in the common sense, in which that word is used. That they had special communications with evil spirits, and produced some preternatural effects by their assistance; that they had, not only actual conversations, but explicit confederacies with devils. Receiving the testimony of the natives, our ancestors were of opinion, that many persons among them were, by the zeal of their parents, dedicated to their infernal gods; but that the demons accepted only some here, and there, to make dangerous powows, or wizzards of them. They were of opinion, that these powows often employ their demons to smite their neighbors with blindness, lameness, wounds, and other mischiefs; and sometimes to kill them, and sometimes to cure their maladies.

The powows themselves made great pretences to such a power; and the Indians perhaps universally believed, that they were invested with it: And those of the natives, who became Christians, had no scruple, that the powows had a preternatural power, communicated by some spirit, inferior indeed to Jehovah, and subject to His control, but when permitted by Him, could, and did, by the instrumentality of these men, produce effects beyond human. The Indians told our ancestors strange stories about the feats of the powows; and doubtless, in many instances at least, related what they supposed to be strictly true.*

The powows were ever ready to proclaim their own extraordinary power, and their people stood ready to believe them. Governor Hutchinson mentions one Passaconaway, a great Sagamore upon Merrimack River, who was the most celebrated powow in the country: He made the Indians believe strange things; that he could make water burn, rocks move, and trees dance; and metamorphose himself into a flaming man; that in winter he could raise a green leaf out of the ashes of a dry one, and produce a living snake from the skin of a dead one.† Indeed, they, who assumed the least, made pretensions of performing works beyond the power of mere mortals. The poor, ignorant Indians were doubtless, in many instances at least, deluded themselves: Vile frauds were practised upon them; and sometimes, without doubt, those that were cruel in the extreme. They told the early settlers what they themselves believed; and it may be, the former were not so careful, and strict in their examination of reported facts, as they might have been. Allowance is also to be made for the credulity of that age, in respect to some particulars; which was indeed, by no means, peculiar to New-England. In that period, many men of great learning, and sound judgment in most things, seemed too apt to give credit to the marvellous, without that evidence, which their good sense would have required in most other cases: And some good Christian Indians, who communicated an account of the extraordinary power of the powows, and their astonishing actions, might be mistaken, being imposed upon by the art, and dexterity of these cunning men; for the generality of the natives had such a fixed awe upon their minds of the great power of these men, and such a veneration for their character, as those, who had immediate communication with their deities, and direct influence from them, that they would not be likely to examine with strictness their supposed extraordinary feats.

Mr. Neale, after quoting from some of the ancient writers, several accounts of the uncommon, and, as they supposed, preternatural actions of the powows, which were attributed to the assistance given them by evil spirits, concludes with this remark: "I shall leave the reader to pass what judgment he pleases, upon these relations; but, in my opinion, they are so far from proving the doctrine they are brought to support, that they carry in them the greatest air of juggle, and imposture in the world."

As to the true and full charac-

* Some accounts are so romantic, that we may say concerning them, what the Roman poet says in another case, "Credat Judæus Apella."

† Hist. Mass. v. 1. p. 474.

ter of the powows, we shall leave it, in some respects, problematical. If any, upon the evidence they may obtain, are led to think, that they were in confederacy with the infernal powers, in such a manner, and in such an high sense, as the ancient writers thought, they have a right to enjoy their opinion: If others may suppose, upon careful examination of the proofs, that they were not confederated with evil spirits, and aided by them, any more, than other very wicked men may be said to be, whose imaginations may be frequently and strongly impressed by these invisible evil powers, they have equal right to theirs. Every one will determine for himself, as he has grounds.

Thus much is undoubtedly true, that they were, at least, cunning jugglers; who by some dextrous managements, and strange feats, astonished the ignorant multitude, and gained an ascendancy over them. The body of the people, if they did not love, yet feared them; received their dictates with the most implicit faith; and obeyed their commands with the most servile submission.

The powows were encouraged to persist in their trade, by means of the pelf they drew from their votaries. They made great pretensions to the art of curing disorders by their charms, and the assistance they received from their deities; at the same time must be well paid for their attendance: If they failed of recovering the sick, they had a salvo ready at hand, "The gods were inexorable, the person's time was come."

These men, as observed before, were, at first, the most violent opposers of the gospel; and for the same reason, that Demetrius, the silver-smith, was, That by this craft they had their wealth, such as it was. They were apprehensive, that if Christianity prevailed, their power and influence would be lost; and those streams of property, which flowed in upon them from their abused countrymen, would cease to run.

Such were the difficulties which Mr. Mayhew had to encounter in his missionary attempts. Such were the obstacles, which lay in his way. Such were the discouragements, which rose in the minds of the poor natives. But none of these obstructions prevented Mr. Mayhew, and his faithful friend Hiacoomes, whom he had joined to himself, as an associate in the work, from a vigorous pursuit of the important business upon which they had set out. They viewed the cause, as highly interesting; and their zeal, assiduity, and perseverance were in proportion to the magnitude of the object.

In the year 1646, some of the impediments to the good work began to be removed. Mr. Mayhew had the happiness, sometime before his death, to see a great alteration in this respect. God, who had qualified him for the work he had undertaken, inspired him with love to the perishing natives, and zeal to promote their eternal salvation, was pleased to interpose, by his providence, and gradually removed obstructions; so that before the death of this pious missionary, many hundreds of the natives professed the Christian faith; a very considerable number of whom were ornaments to their profession, as will appear in the sequel.

We shall now take notice of some things, which tended to remove obstructions, and promote the gospel on the Vineyard.

In the year 1646,* the Indians

* Indian Converts, p. 5 and 77.

were visited with a severe distemper, which proved mortal to many of them ; but apparently less so to them who had given any countenance to the great truths, which had been proposed to them, and shewed any regard to them ; those were far more gently visited with the disorder, than others ; and Hiacoomes, and his family, who openly professed the gospel, were scarcely, at all, hurt by it.

Whether mere natural causes in the usual mode of operation, according to general laws, or the particular and special providence of God made the distinction, we shall not stand to inquire. This is very worthy of notice, that a wise and gracious God over-ruled this discrimination for the good of the heathen. They, who sometime before attributed a strange disease among them to the anger of their deities, because some of the people forsook their old religion, and chose a new one, now questioned with themselves, whether the present sickness, with the concomitant circumstances, was not brought upon them by Jehovah, as a token of his displeasure, on account of their generally rejecting Christianity. By means of this sickness, and the distinction made in it, many of them were put upon serious consideration of the things, which before they slighted ; and some began earnestly to desire to have the truths of the Christian religion explained to them ; and to hearken, with great attention, to the things which were, by Mr. Mayhew, and Hiacoomes, preached among them.

About this time, Mioxoo, being the chief man of the place where he lived, sent a messenger in the night to Hiacoomes, about five, or six miles, entreating him to come to him ; and Hiacoomes receiving the message about break of day, readily went to Mioxoo's house. When he came, he found many Indians collected there, among whom was Tawanquatuck, the chief Sachem of that end of the island.

Mioxoo received Hiacoomes with great apparent pleasure, and told him, what he desired of him ; the sum of which was, " that he would shew his heart to them, and let them know, how it stood towards God, and what they ought to do."

Hiacoomes very cheerfully attended to the proposal : He immediately laid hold of the opportunity to instruct them ; explaining some important points of natural, and revealed religion.

Having finished his speech, Mioxoo asked him, " how many gods the English worshipped ?" Hiacoomes answered, " One, and no more." Upon which Mioxoo reckoned up about 37 principal gods, which he had : " And shall I, said he, throw away all these thirty seven for the sake of one only ?" " What do you yourself think ?" said Hiacoomes. " For my part, I have thrown away all these, and many more some years ago, and yet I am preserved, as you see, this day." " You speak true, said Mioxoo ; and therefore I will throw away all my gods too, and serve that one God with you."

Mioxoo having expressed this resolution, Hiacoomes proceeded more fully to instruct him, and the rest of the company with him, and did, as Mioxoo desired, open his heart to them. He told them, that he did fear the great God only ; and did greatly reverence his Son, who had suffered death to make satisfaction for sin for all those, who trust in him and forsake their sinful ways ; and that the spirit of God did work these things in the hearts of the children of men. He told them also, that he was very sorry for his own sins, and desired to be redeemed by Jesus Christ from them, and to walk according to God's commandments.

Hiacoomes also now told these, his poor countrymen, of the sin and fall of Adam, and what a dreadful state mankind were thereby brought into; and did also, with Christian freedom, reckon up their own sins to them, and charged them home upon their consciences, as that of having many gods, going after powows, &c. And having thus opened his heart to his hearers, he concluded his discourse, by telling them, that if they could obtain such hearts, as thro' grace he had, they should receive such mercies as he did.*

This discourse of Hiacoomes being ended, several of his hearers were much affected; and some of them said, "That now they had seen their sins."

Such impressions were made upon the heart of Mioxoo as were deemed to be abiding. He supported a Christian character thro' a long life.

Tawanquatuck, an Indian Sachem being present, as an hearer at the meeting just mentioned, was, it would seem, so affected with the discourse of Hiacoomes, in connexion with the sickness, which had been so prevalent and distressing, that a short time after, he invited Mr. Mayhew to preach publicly to his people; and he himself became a constant hearer of him.†

On Mr. Mayhew's first going to preach to the Indians upon this invitation, the Sachem told him,

"That a long time ago, the Indians had wise men among them, who did in a grave manner, teach the people knowledge; but they, said he, are dead, and their wisdom is buried with them; and now, men lead a giddy life, in ignorance, till they are white-headed; and tho' ripe in years, yet they go without wisdom to their graves." But added, "He hoped the time of knowledge was now come." He then also (others joining with him) desired Mr. Mayhew to preach in a stated course to the Indians to make known the word of God to them. And soon after, going to Mr. Mayhew to encourage him, told him, in the figurative language of his country, "That he should be to them, as one that stands by a running river, filling many vessels; even so shall you fill us with everlasting knowledge."

He also told Mr. Mayhew, that the reason why he requested him to preach to the Indians, was, "because he was desirous, that they should grow more in goodness; and that their posterity might inherit blessings after he was dead; and that he himself was also desirous to put the word of God to his heart; and to repent of, and throw away his sins, that so after he should cease to live here, he might enjoy eternal life in Heaven."

Mr. Mayhew was highly pleased with the proposal, and gladly complied with the pious request of this good Sachem, preaching to him, and to as many of his people, as were willing to come to hear him. Thus a more effectual door was opened for introducing the gospel among this poor people. Thus, it is hoped, that this bodily sickness which was grievous to so many, and mortal to some, promoted the spiritual health of not a few of the survivors.

* Indian Converts p. 78.

† Indian Converts, p. 80.

It has been observed, that the Sachems at first, and for some years, made strenuous opposition to the gospel. Mr. Mayhew senior, the governor, observed this. He had the Christian cause much at heart; and was very desirous to strengthen the hands of his son, and encourage him in the good work of gospelizing the heathen. He was sensible, that to remove the prejudices of the Sachems was of no small consequence to success. He, as he had opportunity, took much pains with them, that he might facilitate their reception of the gospel, and induce them to permit, and encourage their subjects to hear, and pay attention to it. By his wise management, many of the Sachems were induced to think more favorably of Christianity, than they had done; and finally to renounce heathenism, and become disciples of Jesus Christ, and to encourage their subjects to embrace Christianity. In these things he was a fellow-helper to the truth.

This gentleman observing, that the Indian governments were absolute monarchies; one main obstruction to the progress of the Gospel on the Island, seemed to be, the jealousy the princes conceived of the invasion of their government, thro' the pretence of religion, and the eclipsing their monarchical dignity; and finding that the princes on these Islands, tho' they maintained their absolute power, as kings, yet were bound to do certain homage to a more powerful prince on the bordering continent; and tho' they were no great people, had yet been wasted by intestine wars, wherein the great princes on the main, not unlike the European princes, for like reasons of state, were not unassisting, whereby the Islanders were necessitated to make those princes the balance, or umpires to decide their controversies, by presents annually sent to oblige them to give their assistance as occasion required; and seeing his son using zealous endeavors for their conversion, he judges it fit that they should unite in their several places to promote the great design: And therefore he wisely takes the advantage of this situation of the Indian affairs to attach them to him by the following method:

He tells the Island Indians, that by order of the crown of England, he was to govern the English who should inhabit these Islands: That his royal master was, in power, far above any of the Indian monarchs; but that as he was great and powerful, so he was a lover of justice; that therefore he would in no measure invade their jurisdictions; but, on the contrary, assist them, if need required; that religion and government were distinct things; and their Sachems might retain their just authority, tho' their subjects were Christians. And thus, in no long time, he brought them to conceive no ill opinion of the Christian religion.* After a few years some Sachems, and other principal men became Christians, and some of them preachers to their countrymen.

Another thing which conduced much to remove impediments, and to promote the great work of propagating the gospel, was the institution of a school for the instruction of the Indian children and youth, in reading, writing, and the first principles of Christianity.

Mr. Mayhew very well knew, that humanly speaking, the gospel must make a much slower prog-

* Matthew Mayhew's Narrative.

refs among those, who are wholly destitute of letters, than among those who have some acquaintance with them. That the Indians might become more intelligent Christians, a considerable number of their children at the first setting up of the school; and many years after, the generality were taught to read, and many of them to write.

The school was opened in January 1652; at which time, not only were parents invited to send their children; but any young men, who were willing to learn, were asked to attend. They were pleased with the proposal: About thirty Indian children soon came in; they were found apt to learn; and more and more were coming in every day for some time.*

This school, it may be presumed, was of great service to promote the knowledge, and practice of Christianity. Those adults, who did not learn to read, might reap much benefit by attending upon the reading of those, who did. By the speculative knowledge of Christianity gained at school under a pious and faithful master; by the public and private instructions of Mr. Mayhew, and by the operation of divine grace upon their hearts, not a few of the pupils were, after some time, qualified to become public teachers of Christianity among their countrymen; and others to promote the same general cause among their neighbors in a more private way, as Aquila and Priscilla gave instructions to Apollos.†

* Indian Converts p. 289.

† It is of no small moment, that they who are employed as schoolmasters among the Indians should be men, not only well qualified to teach the common arts; but persons of real religion, and good proficient in sacred science.

The faith, fortitude, and constancy of Hiacoomes had no small influence to remove some obstacles, and prepare the way for the more general propagation of the gospel among the natives.

Neither the ridicule nor reproaches of his infidel countrymen; nor their threatenings, nor those of the powows themselves, dreaded, in the extreme, by the other Indians; nor his sufferings of any other kind, could shake his faith and constancy. He nobly resolved to be obedient, and faithful to Jehovah, and firm in the Christian cause, tho' he should be singular in his purpose, incur the displeasure of his friends, and even fall a victim in the cause of truth.

At a Meeting of the praying Indians, some of their heathen neighbors came together, with a view to intimidate them, if possible, from paying any further attention to Christianity, by representing the personal dangers to which they would expose themselves by means of the resentment of those formidable men, the powows; which, tho' mentioned on another occasion, may yet be repeated on account of what took place immediately after. One, who espoused the cause of the powows, asked this question, "Who is there, that does not fear the powows?" To which another of them answered, "There is no man, who is not afraid of them." Upon saying this, he looked upon Hiacoomes, who protested most against them, and told him, that "the powows could kill him;" but he answered, that "they could not;" and added, "I believe in God, and put my trust in him; and therefore all the powows can do me no hurt." The Indians then wondering to hear Hiacoomes speak thus so openly, several of them said to one another, "That tho' they were before afraid of the powows; yet now, because they heard Hiacoomes's words, they did not fear them, but believed in God too."

By teaching the Indian youth the first principles of Christianity, and pressing upon them the importance of holiness, they may much facilitate the labors of the missionaries, by laying a solid foundation for them to build upon.

Some time after this, on a Lord's day, after meeting was closed, where Hiacoomes had been preaching, there came in a powow very angry and said, "I know all the Meeting Indians are liars; you say, you don't care for the powows;" then calling two, or three of them by name, he railed at them, and told them, "that they were deceived, for the powows could kill all the Meeting Indians, if they set about it:" But Hiacoomes then told him, "That he would be in the midst of all the powows on the Island, that they could procure; and that they should do their utmost, by their witchcraft to kill him, he would, without fear, set himself against them by remembering Jehovah." By this answer he put the powows to silence, as to any injury they could do him by their skill and ability; tho' they pretended, that none but he could resist their power, and elude their arts.

He declared before the Sachems, powows, and a great assembly, that he was ready to acknowledge, that the God, whom they worshipped had great power, yet it was limited, and subservient to the God he had now chosen: Therefore, tho' by means of the powows, many had suffered much, and some were killed; yet he despised their power, as being himself a servant of Him, whose power overruled all power, and ordered all things."

VOL. II. No. 10.

The expecting multitude wait the event, which they concluded would be sickness, or death; but to their astonishment, he remained unhurt.*

Upon this they esteemed him happy, in being delivered from their terrible power, as they viewed it.

Several of the assembly desired Hiacoomes to tell them, what this great God would have them to do; and what were the things that offended Him: He immediately applied himself to prayer and preaching; and by an happy recollection, readily mentioned a great number of particular sins committed among them, and as many contrary duties neglected; which so surpris'd them, and touch'd their consciences, that many of them resolv'd against those evils, and to walk with God, and attend his word.

Thus the faith, fortitude, and constancy of this good man had an happy influence in removing some impediments, and preparing the minds of not a few to receive instructions in the truths of the gospel, and to strengthen them against those objects of fear, which, as a lion in the way, had prevented them from entering into, and pursuing the paths of wisdom. Their sentiments of the great ability of the powows were changed; and they concluded, that there was some invincible power, superior to that, who, as they thought, actuated the powows; and that the God, whom Hiacoomes worshipp'd, was that Great Being.†

The conversion of some of the powows had an happy aspect upon the propagation of Christianity. We have seen, that they were the

* Matthew Mayhew's Narrative.

† Indian Converts, p. 6, and 284. Matthew Mayhew's Narrative.

most virulent enemies of the gospel. The conversion of some of them gave a great blow to heathenism, from which it never recovered. They became firm supporters of that gospel, which once they were earnest to destroy; and espoused the cause of Christianity with as much zeal, as once they had done that of their false Gods.

(To be continued.)

The doctrine of election, not inconsistent with the use and necessity of means.

NUMBER I.

2 Tim. ii. 10. Therefore I endure all things for the elect's sake, that they may also obtain the salvation, which is in Christ Jesus, with eternal glory.

TO elect means the same as to choose, and the elect are the same as the chosen. Therefore the same Greek word is sometimes translated elect, and sometimes chosen. These terms elect, election, chosen, and others of similar import, were often used by the Lord Jesus, and his inspired apostles, in the sacred scriptures. The divine Saviour says, "Many are called, but few chosen" or elect. "But for the elect's sake those days (of great tribulation) shall be shortened. False Christs and false prophets shall arise, and shew great signs, inasmuch that (if it were possible) they shall deceive the very elect. The Son of man shall send his angels with a great sound of a trumpet, and they shall gather his elect, from one end of heaven to the other."

Paul says, "Who shall lay any thing to the charge of God's elect? The purpose of God according to election shall stand. There is a remnant according to the election of grace. The election hath obtained it, and the rest were blinded." James also says in his epistle, "Hath not God chosen (or elect) the poor of this world, rich in faith, and heirs of the kingdom."

It is certain from these, and many other similar passages, that there is such a thing as election, and that some are elect or chosen of God. It cannot be denied without contradicting the most express declaration of sacred writ.

And it may be further observed, that the elect are chosen to holiness and salvation. For the apostle declares to his fellow-Christians, "Brethren, beloved of the Lord, God hath chosen or *elect*ed you to salvation. Hath chosen us, that we should be holy—and whom he did predestinate or elect, them he called, and justified, and glorified." Such passages teach the certain connection between election, and holiness, and salvation, and glorification.

But it may be inquired, when does God thus choose the elect or real Christians? Is it before, or after they believe in Christ? Let us hear "what saith the scripture." The inspired apostle, speaking of himself and fellow-Christians, says, "God hath chosen (or *elect*ed) us in Christ Jesus before the foundation of the world"*. "Brethren, God hath from the beginning chosen you to salvation, through sanctification of the Spirit and belief of the truth"†. "God hath saved us, and called us with an holy calling—according to his own purpose and grace, which was given us in Christ Jesus, before the world began"‡. It is certain from such express declarations of the word of God, that real Christians are chosen or elected to salvation before the foundation of the world, or from eternity.

* Ephes. i. 4. † 2 Thess. ii. 13.
‡ 2 Tim. i. 9.

This truth is also manifest from reason and the divine perfections. God is unchangeable—is the same yesterday, to-day, and forever, and with him there is no variability, neither shadow of turning; therefore all his purposes and determinations must be eternal. If then God ever chooses any to salvation; it is certain, that his choice of them must be from eternity.

But it may be again asked, Did God thus eternally choose the elect on account of any foreseen goodness, holiness, or willingness to repent and believe in the Lord Jesus, antecedent to their being renewed by his Holy Spirit? What say the scriptures on this point? It is declared in a passage already quoted, "God hath chosen us in him, before the foundation of the world, that we should be holy." Here it is evident, that Christians are elected or chosen, not because they were good or holy, but that they might be so. They are chosen to holiness, and are made holy in consequence of their being thus chosen.

Again it is said, "God hath saved us and called us with an holy calling, not according to our works, but according to his own purpose and grace. Not by works of righteousness, which we have done, but according to his mercy he saved us by the washing of regeneration, and the renewing of the Holy Ghost." Do not such passages plainly teach, that the elect are not chosen and called or renewed on account of any holiness or good works, but according to God's own mercy, purpose and grace?

But the words of the apostle, Rom. ix. are still more explicit and decided on this subject. He is there illustrating God's wise and holy sovereignty and purpose of election by his choosing Jacob in preference to Esau before their birth. "For the children being not yet born, neither having done good or evil that the purpose according to election might stand, not of works, but of him that calleth." So chap. xi. it is said, that election is of grace. "And if by grace, then it is no more of works." Can any words more fully or expressly declare, that God's purpose of election or choice of the elect, is wholly of grace, and not at all on account of any goodness foreseen to be in them, antecedent to their election or regeneration.

This will be further evident from a consideration of the character of mankind, while unrenewed. The scriptures teach, that while in this situation they are "dead in sin"—"enemies to God"—that "every imagination of the thought of their heart is only evil continually," and Christ says, "No man can come unto me, except the Father draw him."

They are therefore wholly destitute of all holiness or moral good, and have no disposition to repent and cordially embrace the gospel, until renewed by the Holy Spirit. Consequently it is impossible, that the elect should be chosen and regenerated on account of any foreseen goodness or willingness to go to Christ in faith and love. For if God were never to elect any to salvation, till he foresaw, that they would of themselves be disposed to repent, it is certain, that none of the human race would be elected or saved. What our Saviour said to his unbelieving hearers is equally true of all impenitent sinners, "Ye will not come unto me, that ye may have life." None will go, unless drawn by the Father.

But it is often objected, that if the doctrine of election is true, it can be of no advantage for ministers to preach the gospel, or for people to hear, and attend upon the means of grace. For it is said, that those who are elected will be saved, and those who are not, will never obtain salvation; whether they attend to the means of salvation, or not.

In answer to this objection, it may be observed, that the inspired Paul was of a very different opinion from the objectors on this subject.

No writer of the new testament more frequently and plainly taught the doctrine of election than Paul. Yet he was so far from supposing, that this rendered means unnecessary, that he was the most laborious and successful of all the apostles in preaching the gospel; travelling from country to country, and ceasing not to warn and exhort every one with tears, night and day, as he had opportunity. Speaking of the afflictions he suffered in preaching the gospel, he says, "I endure all things for the elect's sakes, that they may also obtain salvation;" shewing, that in his view means were useful and necessary to bring persons to repentance and salvation.

Accordingly he expressly teaches the necessity of the means of grace, declaring, that "faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the word of God," and that it pleased God "by the foolishness of preaching to save them that believe." He therefore commands ministers of the gospel in his epistle to Timothy to be constant in preaching both in season and out of season.

These considerations plainly shew, that the doctrine of election affords no just reason, why ministers should not faithfully preach the gospel, and people carefully hear and attend upon the means of grace. In further illustrating this truth, it may be observed:

1. That by election is meant the eternal purpose of God to render the preaching of the gospel, religious knowledge and instruction, and other means of grace, efficacious in awakening, and bringing a certain number to repentance, faith and holy obedience, that they may in this way obtain salvation.

Now God's determination, that preaching and other means of grace shall be instrumental of bringing a number to repentance and salvation, certainly cannot render these means unnecessary, or of no advantage. Can it be any just reason, why ministers should not faithfully preach the gospel, warn, and instruct mankind, because God has eternally determined to render these means effectual to the salvation of a certain number? Does not this consideration, on the contrary, afford them great encouragement to persevere in their exertions to promote the salvation of their fellow-creatures; since they have reason to hope, that it is the divine determination, that their labors shall be successful in saving some souls?

Or can God's eternal purpose, that a number shall be brought to repentance and salvation by the preaching of the gospel and other means of grace be any just reason, why these should be neglected, or considered unnecessary?

Were it determined, that a certain particular number, (who or how many we know not) should have plentiful crops next season by means of careful cultivation; would this render cultivation unnecessary, or be any just reason, why we should not diligently cultivate and sow the earth? Would it not be very absurd to object, that because God had determined that a certain number should have crops by means of cultivation; therefore cultivation was unnecessary, and there was no encouragement for persons carefully to till their land? If they did not till and sow, it is certain, that they would have no harvest. But the more diligently they cultivated their farms, the greater would be the probability, that they were of the number, who by the divine determination were to have a plentiful harvest.

And is it not equally unreasonable to object, that preaching and other means are unnecessary, or that there is no advantage in seriously attending upon them; because God has determined, that these means shall be instrumental to awaken, and bring a number to repentance and salvation?

Those, who are in a state of impenitence know not, whether they are elected to salvation or not.

But while careless and neglectful of divine things and their eternal concerns, they may know, that they are in the greatest danger of perishing, and are hastening down the broad road to destruction. But the more sensible they are of their sin and danger, and the more attentive they are to divine things, the greater is the probability of their being chosen to salvation. None can ensure salvation, unless they yield a cordial compliance with the duties of religion, and make them their highest concern. It is therefore as unreasonable to neglect a serious attention to the means of grace and our eternal interests on account of the doctrine of election; or because it has been determined, that these means shall be effectual to the salvation of a certain number; as it would be to neglect tilling and sowing, because it was determined, that a particular unknown number shall have crops by these means. A careless neglect of the means of grace and duties of religion is as direct a way to ensure our destruction, as a neglect of cultivation is to have no harvest.

Thus it is manifest, that the doctrine of election does not render the preaching of the gospel and other means of grace at all unnecessary, and affords no reason, why all should not seriously attend upon these means. H. E.

FOR THE CONNECTICUT EVANGELICAL MAGAZINE.

Question. Why could not God give repentance and remission of sin, and restore sinners, by his Holy Spirit, to holiness and happiness, without the sufferings and death of his Son?—Or, in other words, Why was the divine laws and government so constituted, that the penalty could not be remitted to the transgressor, in any other way, but by the suffering and death of Christ?

I BELIEVE there are few, who read and hear the gospel, but, at some period of their lives, have had something like the above queries pass through their minds. Want of proper light, and of receiving just ideas on this important subject, has led into wrong sentiments concerning the gospel, and to many doubts, whether it is in fact a revelation from God. To attempt a full answer to the questions above stated, in their various connections and consequences might swell the subject to a volume. All therefore that will now be attempted, is, only to arrange a few thoughts, that will bear much enlargement.

1. The first thing I shall observe, by way of answer, is, that the character of God is perfect.

No other, than a character every way perfect, can answer what is seen and declared of God in his works of creation, and providence, and in the volume of inspiration. In all these, he is declared to be self-existent, independent, and the first cause of all things that exist.

In our ideas of perfection in God we unite natural and moral attributes, in the highest possible degree. The natural attributes ascribed to God are rational, intelligent existence, such as wisdom, knowledge and power, in a much higher degree than any created being is able to conceive.

But a being possessed of such unbounded knowledge, wisdom and power, might be unspeakably dreadful to creatures, if his moral character or attributes were not good.

That the moral character of God is also infinitely perfect in holiness, justice, goodness and truth we have abundant and ample testimony both from nature and revelation.

In this view of the natural and moral character of God, he is the sum of all perfection, nothing can ever be added to his knowledge, wisdom or power; or to his holiness, justice, goodness or truth, and nothing can ever be taken from them, for he is unchangeable.

2. Every thing that exists, beside God himself, had its origin in him and according to his will: They must then be according to, or agreeable to his wisdom; i. e. agreeable to infinite wisdom, power, holiness, justice, goodness and truth. If God acts, he must act himself, or according to his nature. And as all things originate in him, and are brought into existence by him, it is impossible he should have any inducement to act otherwise,—

“he cannot deny himself.” All the divine operations and counsels of God are perfectly holy. All possible things are before him, and he chooses, and cannot but choose, agreeable to his holy nature, that which is best—should he not choose that which is best in every thing, it would denote imperfection, it would be acting contrary to his holy nature, he would deny himself, which is impossible.

3. As all intelligent existence is comprehended in God and rational creatures, the holiness of his nature would lead him, in all his acts and dispensations, to regard the highest good, happiness and glory of the whole; this must be true benevolence and impartial goodness. Of the being that does this, we may well say his name is love.

God was acting thus when he gave to creatures his holy law. This law he gave as a perfect rule of duty tending to perfect happiness, and without conformity to it no creature from the very nature of things, ever could, can, or will be happy. This divine law, in no part of it, proceeded from any thing arbitrary in God, he did not in its precepts and penalties have it thus because he would, when he might as well have had it otherwise; but it originated both in its precepts and penalties from the holy and perfect nature of God, and from the reason and nature of things (for the latter arises from the former.) Therefore for God to alter this law, which commands us to love him with all the heart and our neighbor as ourselves; or to alter or set aside the penalties annexed to it, would be to act contrary to his perfect nature, contrary to the reason and nature of things, contrary to the gospel itself, which is not introduced to destroy but to fulfil this law, to magnify and make us honorable, to restore sinners to a conformity to it, as the only possible way to make them happy. Yea to alter or change this holy law, in any respect, would be to deny himself. Thus our divine Lord said heaven and earth shall pass before one jot or tittle of it shall fail.

The law of God therefore in its precepts and penalties must remain as unchangeable as the nature of God himself.

Human laws are changed, and penalties are remitted; but this arises merely from their imperfection: were they perfect. They would admit of no change, this is the case with the law and government of God, it is perfect and admits of no change.

If God's law, in all its precepts and penalties, originates from the unchangeable and infinitely perfect nature of God; if all his operations, determinations and government harmonize in forming one uniform, unchanging glorious character; then the transgressor of God's law must look in vain for any change in him, or remission of those penalties which God views infinitely right.

How can God pardon the transgressor and receive him to favor, till he has suffered the penalties of his law, and not be inconsistent with himself?

If the sinner suffers the penalties, when will they end? While he is a sinner, and continues to sin, the penalty of the law grows heavier and heavier upon him; for his obligation to love God, and obey his law, can never in any situation cease. At best he is but a creature, and if perfectly holy he can render nothing more to God than his due; he can do no work of supererogation. If under the penalty of the law he can suffer nothing more than the law requires, therefore all his sufferings can make no atonement for past sins, even though in future he committed no sin.

How amazingly dreadful then is the state of a sinner, who has broken the holy law of God! Where is the possibility of his being forgiven? God is unchangeable, his government is perfect and cannot be altered. Nothing presents but absolute and everlasting despair. God alone is able to say if there is any possible way, by which sin may be forgiven, consistent with the infinite perfection and glory of his character and law.

This, O my fellow-sinners, this way of forgiveness God has revealed, in the gospel of his Son. He can be just to his own character, law and government, and yet the justifier of him who believes on his Son. And there is no other name given under heaven among men, by which we can be saved but by the name of Jesus.

The question may again be asked, How does it appear that such a way of forgiveness and salvation is effected and wrought out by Christ, that God can be just to his character, law and government and yet justify and forgive the sinner, who believes on his Son?

In attending to this all-important subject, we must obtain all our light from divine revelation—and on this point it is abundantly explicit and full. All that can now be attempted is to arrange some of the most important and leading ideas, and leave enlargement to the reader.

1. It appears from the sacred writings that the divine law does admit of a substitute or public head. In this situation Adam stood in regard to his posterity. By divine constitution they were all involved in his fall, so that by his disobedience many were made sinners. And the contrary seems equally plain, that had he obeyed many would have been made righteous.

2. The scriptures bring into view the compact or covenant of redemption as being voluntarily entered into between the Father and the Son from eternity, and that those, who believe, were chosen in Christ even before the foundation of the world. Thus the undertaking to redeem man from sin and misery on the part of the Mediator, was voluntary and of free choice.

3. The person who undertook the work of redemption was the eternal Son of God: No creature let him be ever so exalted could be equal to the task, for he could do no more than his duty. In the holy scriptures, all the attributes of the God-head and equality with the Father are ascribed to the Son.

4. When every necessary preparation was made for the Redeemer to enter upon his work, he took upon him the human nature, and was really man as well as God. God manifest in the flesh, the brightness of the Father's glory and express image of his person. He took not upon him the nature of angels, but that nature he came to redeem. As the first Adam had broken the law of God and entailed death upon all his natural seed whose representative he stood, so, that in consequence of his disobedience, they all come into the world with a depraved, sinful disposition and so under the curse. The second Adam, our Lord Jesus Christ, obeyed the law of God as the substitute or representative of all his spiritual seed. His obedience is accepted with God as theirs would have been had they never sinned, or the first Adam fallen; for perfect obedience, to the divine law, is necessary in order to eternal life and justification before God, nor can it be dispensed with.

But the spiritual seed, which Christ represents, are children of the first Adam. They are sinners.

They are condemned by the holy law of God. Obedience entitles to life, only where there is no sin: It cannot make atonement and satisfy the penalty of the law of God. Therefore something further than obedience must be done by the Redeemer or not a sinful child of Adam can be saved. The penalty of the law cannot be dispensed with under the perfect and just government of God.

This the God-man Mediator freely submits to suffer. He gave his soul an offering for sin. He was bruised for our iniquities, the chastisement of our peace was upon him, and by his stripes we are healed.

When he hung on the cross, light and comfort from the God-head were withdrawn and he was treated as a sinner. This caused the bitter cry, "My God, My God, why hast thou forsaken me?"

Thus the human nature of the man Christ Jesus was sacrificed upon the altar of his divinity, which sanctified and gave infinite efficacy to the gift; and to which all preceding sacrifices under the Mosaic law pointed. Being a divine person united to the God-head his suffering the penalty gave infinite honor to the holy law of God. I may say a greater honor than if it had been insisted in everlasting punishment on the guilty themselves.

This work being completed by the Redeemer the way is opened for the exercise of divine mercy. God can be just and yet the justifier of him who believes. But though the way is open for the exercise of mercy to all who are united to Christ by faith; yet man being dead in sin has no heart to believe and to love the holy character of God, and unless something still more was done would never receive any saving benefit from the atonement.

To remedy this evil and render things pertaining to salvation complete, in consequence of the obedience and death of Christ, the Holy Spirit is given to renew and sanctify the heart, and apply the benefits of redemption to the soul.

The Mediator himself after rising from the dead ascended to Heaven there to appear in the presence of God for us; to ask and receive all that is necessary to carry on the work of redemption; to support and finally bring his people to eternal life.

How wonderful is this plan of saving mercy, how harmonious in all its parts! Mercy and truth meet together; righteousness and peace embrace each other. How astonishing is divine love! How much it has done! Our obligations to love and obey God are unspeakably increased, by the way provided, and freely offered to redeem sinners. How aggravatedly dreadful the sin, and how black the ingratitude to refuse such offers of love and grace! If he that despised Moses's law died without mercy, of how much sorer punishment shall he be thought worthy who treads under foot the blood of the Son of God?

ZETA.

TO THE EDITORS OF THE CONNECTICUT EVANGELICAL MAGAZINE.

GENTLEMEN,

SINCE the decease of the late President Edwards, there have been many enquiries why the public were not furnished with a particular account of his life? It is desirable that these enquiries should be gratified. I have taken pains to collect the necessary materials, but my success has been retarded by a number of causes, arising from the particular situation of those by whom the facts, concerning his life, could be furnished, and, from several other unforeseen, and, of course, unavoidable obstacles. I have been in possession of the materials but few days, and now, with pleasure communicate them to you.

VOL. II. No. 10.

I am, Gentlemen, &c.

February, 12th, 1802.

JONATHAN EDWARDS, D. D. President of Union College in Schenectady, was the son of the late Reverend Jonathan Edwards formerly minister of the church of Christ in Northampton, in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, and afterwards President of the College at Princeton in New-Jersey, and Mrs. Sarah Edwards, daughter of Rev. Mr. Pierpont of New-Haven. He was the second son of his parents, and was born at Northampton, on the 26th day of May O. S. 1745. However promising his capacity may have appeared in early childhood, and however ambitious he may have been of excelling at that age when the mind begins to unfold itself; this period of his life was attended with a number of singularly embarrassing circumstances, the tendency of which was to refresh his exertion, and to discourage his ambition. In early childhood, he was afflicted with an inflammatory weakness in his eyes which almost entirely prevented his learning to read until a much later period than is common for children in New-England. This weakness resisted mary and long continued applications; until by the shaving of his head, repeated often, and for a long time, the inflammation in some degree, abated, and he was enabled to apply himself moderately to the rudiments of learning, and to revive in his anxious parents the hope that he would not be entirely lost to the literary world. During his childhood also, the unhappy contest rose to its height, between his father, and the church and society of Northampton, and terminated in their separation, by the dismissal of Mr. Edwards. When Mr. Edwards, with his family, removed to Stockbridge, this son, was but six years old. In addition to the infirmity in his eyes, new and important difficulties attended him; during his residence in Stockbridge. There was no school in the settlement but one which was common to the Indian children, and the white people—and there were so few of the latter, either in the school, or the town, that he was in danger of forgetting entirely the English tongue. Whilst at school here, he learned the language of the Mohokaneew, or Stockbridge Indians so perfectly, that the natives frequently observed “that he spoke exactly like an Indian.” This language he retained, in a good degree, through life, and the public is in possession of some interesting remarks upon it, which he published a number of years since.

As his father intended him for a missionary among the Aborigines, he sent him, in October 1755, when he was but ten years of age, with the Rev. Gideon Hawley, (now of Mashpee on Cape Cod) to Oughquauga on the Susquehannah River, to learn the language of the Oneida Indians. Oughquauga was, then, at the distance of about one hundred miles (in the wilderness, from any English settlement. At this place he continued but four months by reason of the war which broke out between England and France, and extended itself into their colonies. Whilst he was with the Oneida Indians during this short time, he made rapid progress in acquiring their language, and in engaging their affections. They were so much pleased with his attainments, and his amiable disposition, that, when they thought their settlement exposed to inroads from the French, they took him upon their shoulders, and carried him many miles through the wilderness, to a place which they deemed secure. After this he never returned to them any more.

In the month of February 1760, when he had almost completed his fifteenth year, he commenced the study of the Latin language, at a grammar school in Princeton, in New-Jersey; and was admitted a member of the College in the same town, in September of the year following; and in September 1765, he received the degree of Bachelor of Arts. In the year 1763, and whilst he was at College, at a time of general awakening in Princeton, he obtained a hope of his reconciliation to God through Christ. This was during the Presidency, and under the impressive preaching of the late Doctor Finley.

The following dedication of himself to the service of God, which was made by him at that time, was found among his papers after his decease.

Nassau-Hall, Sept. 17, 1763.

“ I Jonathan Edwards, student of the College in New-Jersey, on this seventeenth day of September 1763, being the day before the first 'time I proposed to draw near to the ' Lord's table, after much thought ' and due consideration, as well as ' prayer to Almighty God, for his ' assistance, resolved in the grace of ' God to enter into an express act

 ' of self-dedication to the service
 ' of God; as being a thing highly ' reasonable in its own na' ture, and that might be of emi' nent service to keep me steady in
 ' my Christian course, to rouse me
 ' out of sloth and indolence, and ' uphold me in the day of tempta-
 ' tion."

"Eternal and ever-blessed God!
 ' I desire with the deepest humilia' tion and abasement of soul, to ' come in the name and for the ' sake of Jesus Christ, and present
 ' myself before thee, sensible of ' my infinite unworthiness to ap' pear before thee, especially on ' such an occasion as this, to enter ' into a covenant with thee. But ' notwithstanding my sins have ' made such a separation between
 ' thee and my soul, I beseech thee,
 ' through Christ thy Son, to vouch-
 ' safe thy presence with me and ac' ceptance of the best sacrifice
 ' which I can make."

"I do, O Lord, in hopes of
 ' thy assisting grace, solemnly make
 ' an entire and perpetual surrender
 ' of all that I am and have unto ' thee, being determined in thy ' strength to renounce all former
 ' Lords who have had dominion
 ' over me, every lust of the eye, of ' the flesh and of the mind, and to ' live entirely devoted to thee and
 ' thy service. To thee do I conse-
 ' crate the powers of my mind,
 ' with whatever improvements thou
 ' hast already or shalt be pleased
 ' hereafter to grant me in the lite' rary way; purposing if it be thy
 ' good pleasure to pursue my studies
 ' assiduously, that I may be better ' prepared to act in any sphere of ' life in which thou shalt place me.

 ' I do also solemnly dedicate all ' my possessions, my time, my in' fluence over others, to be all used
 ' for thy glory. To thy direction
 ' I resign myself and all that I ' have, trusting all future contin' gencies in thy hands, and may
 ' thy will in all things and not
 ' mine be done. Use me, O Lord,
 ' as an instrument of thy service!
 ' I beseech thee, number me among ' thy people! May I be clothed
 ' with the righteousness of thy Son;
 ' ever impart to me through him
 ' all needful supplies of thy purify' ing and cheering spirit! I be' seech thee, O Lord, that thou
 ' wouldst enable me to live accord' ing to this my vow, constantly
 ' avoiding all sin; and when I shall ' come to die, in that solemn and ' awful hour, may I remember this
 ' my covenant, and do thou, O
 ' Lord, remember it too, and give ' my departing spirit an abundant
 ' admittance into the realms of ' bliss! And if when I am laid in ' the dust, any surviving friend
 ' should meet with this memorial,
 ' may it be a means of good to him,
 ' and do thou admit him to partake
 ' of the blessings of thy covenant
 ' of grace, through Jesus the great
 ' Mediator, to whom with thee,
 ' O Father, and thy Holy Spirit,
 ' be everlasting praises ascribed, by ' Saints and Angels! Amen."

JONATHAN EDWARDS.

In 1767, he was appointed a tutor in the same College and continued in this office two years.

Sometime before he had entered upon the study of Divinity, the favorite study of his life, under the instruction of the late Rev. Joseph Bellamy, D. D. of Bethlem in Connecticut; and in 1766, October 21st, had been licenced to preach the Gospel, by the Association of the County of Litchfield. The eleven months between the time when he was licensed to preach, and the time when he was recalled to Princeton by his appointment, the writer believes he spent as a candidate for the ministry; but where he was during this period has not been ascertained.

During his residence at Princeton, he was invited to preach to the society of White-Haven, in the town of New-Haven, in Connecticut. On the 5th day of January 1769, he was ordained to the pastoral charge of that Church and Society, and continued there until the month of May 1795; when he was dismissed by an Ecclesiastical Council, at the mutual request of the Pastor and Society. For several years previous to his dismissal, an uneasiness had subsisted in the society, arising from different religious opinions which sprung up, and were adopted by some of the leading, and most influential men among his parishioners. Those sentiments, which originated the uneasiness, were of a nature opposite to the sentiments of Mr. Edwards, and of the Church and Society, at the time of his ordination. This diversity of sentiment and opinion, may justly be considered as the principal cause of the separation between Doctor Edwards and his people; though others of inferior moment, and taking their rise from this principal one, had their influence; but the ostensible cause assigned by the society, was their inability to support a minister. Doctor Edwards did not continue long in this situation, for in January 1796, he was installed Pastor of the church in Colebrook, in Litchfield county, in Connecticut, where he continued ministering to a very affectionate people, until June 1799. In this town he intended to have spent the remainder of his days, had it been the pleasure of his Divine Master. A change of audience enabled him to relax from the duty of a weekly preparation for the sabbath, and furnished him with more time to pursue his favourite study of theology, in a less confined manner. To this the retired situation of Colebrook greatly contributed. Nor was this favorable opportunity, of pursuing his studies neglected. But his continuance in this desirable retreat was not of long duration. In the summer of 1799, he was elected President of a College in the town of Schenectady and the state of New-York, which had recently been instituted and endowed. The election was immediately communicated to him, with an invitation to remove, as soon as he conveniently could. In consequence of this invitation he was again dismissed, by an Ecclesiastical Council, from his pastoral office, in the month of June, and in the July following he removed to Schenectady. From this time his talents and attention were appropriated, with uninterrupted assiduity, to the concerns of this newly instituted seminary. In this situation he continued, until about the middle of July A. D. 1801, when his labors were suspended by an intermitting fever of the regular type, unattended with any immediately alarming symptoms. But about eight days before his decease, nervous symptoms shewed themselves, and indicated his approaching dissolution. The progress of the disease, from this date, was very rapid, and he experienced its impairing effects so much, that, within three days, he was almost entirely deprived of his speech, of the regular exercise of his limbs, and, at intervals, of his reason. Thus he continued regularly to decline until the 1st of August 1801, when he expired. By the effects of his disorder, he was unavoidably prevented from expressing his views and feelings on the approach of eternity for the five last days of his life. In the early stages of his illness however, he expressed his entire, and willing resignation to the pleasure of God; and is gone, we hope, and confidently trust, to receive the reward of his faith and perseverance, at the hand of his beloved Lord and Master.

The year after Mr. Edwards was ordained to the charge of White Haven society in New-Haven, he married Miss Mary Porter, daughter of the honorable Eleazer and Mrs. Sarah Porter of Hadley, in Massachusetts. By her he had four children, three of whom survive him. This excellent lady was drowned in the month of June A. D. 1782. The circumstances of this unhappy event were these: Doctor Edwards and his wife were taking an airing in their chaise, in the north eastern part of New-Haven, and at some distance from home, the Doctor was called away to attend to some necessary business. As Mrs. Edwards was returning, she suffered the horse to drink at a watering place, in a small river, with the depth of which she was wholly unacquainted. The horse suddenly plunged and fell, and threw her from the chaise into the river, where she was drowned.

After the death of Mrs. Edwards he married Miss Mercy Sabin, daughter of Mr. Hezekiah and Mrs. Mary Sabin, of New-Haven; she is still living. The surviving children of President Edwards, are one son, and two daughters.

In reviewing the life of President Edwards, we are presented with many particulars which furnish a striking resemblance to the life of his father. A few of them deserve to be mentioned. They had the same name, were liberally educated; were distinguished scholars; were tutors in the seminaries in which they were educated; were preachers; were settled in congregations, in which their maternal grandfathers were also settled before them; were dismissed on account of their religious opinions; were settled again in retired situations; were elected to the Presidency of a College, and within a short time after they were inaugurated, died the one in the 56th and the other in the 57th year of his age. To this may be added, that in person, mind, and life, they were remarkably alike.

Doctor Edwards when a child was singularly dutiful and conscientious; a spirit which manifested itself through his life.

About the time that he first dedicated himself to the service of God, when he was little more than eighteen years of age, he began a diary of his religious life. This he continued a few months, and then very abruptly relinquished it—for what reason is not known. It is probable that it was a reason which he had deliberately weighed, as he never resumed it afterwards. From this diary he appears early to have determined constantly to strive against sin and temptation, and to live in a manner becoming his holy profession, and to devote himself wholly to the service of God. The blessing with which God accompanied these pious exertions, was visible throughout the remainder of his life.

By nature Doctor Edwards was of an ardent, irritable disposition, of which he appears to have been early conscious. Whilst he was quite young, he formed a resolution, uniformly, and with an unabating watchfulness, to withstand this propensity, until it should be subdued. This he entered upon, as upon an important business for life—as an achievement which must be accomplished, however difficult, and arduous the task might prove. And such a blessing attended his diligent, and indefatigable vigilance as enabled him to possess an unusual command over his passions, and to pass through a life, attended by many trying circumstances, with the reputation of uncommon equanimity. Like St. Paul, “he knew what it was to be abased, and also what it was to abound.” But in prosperity and adversity he appeared the same. His fortitude under trials, was great; a fortitude founded in a constant reliance in Providence, and in resignation to the will of God; as different as possible from the frigid apathy of the Stoic. As a man of learning and strength of mind, he probably had not a superior in the United States, and but few in the world. His logical powers were pre-eminent and little, if at all, inferior to those of his father; and, being blessed, generally, with good health, he improved his talents for the defence, support, and advancement of that religion which he professed, and of the cause in which he was a champion. As a preacher, in his manner of delivery he was bold and animated—but he addressed the understanding and conscience rather than the passions of his audience. All who have had the pleasure to hear him, will acknowledge with readiness, that, in his own mode, he was rarely, if ever exceeded. His reasonings were strong and conclusive; and, as might be expected from such a mind, his writings were closely confined to his subject; always presenting something new, original, and instructive. He was a son, worthy of his parents.—As a brother he merited, and possessed, the respect, esteem, and affection, of all his brothers and sisters.

As a husband and parent, he was kind, faithful and affectionate. Being blessed with good health, he generally rose early, and immediately began his regular diurnal routine of duty and business, which he observed through life with great uniformity; and from which he was not easily diverted. He considered his immediate duty to his Creator as requiring his first obedience and attention; and then the relative and social duties of life, were not to be neglected in their turn. His exercise, studies, and all his other concerns, so far as was consistent with his parochial duties, were systematized, and regularly attended to in their proper seasons.

He possessed and merited, the respect and affection of an extensive literary and ministerial acquaintance—the latter looked to him, under God, as to one of the firmest pillars, and ablest defenders of the church, in this day of declension and infidelity; and in his death, the cause, both of science and religion, has suffered a loss which God alone can repair.

His literary productions are 1st, a work entitled, “The Salvation of all Men strictly examined, and the endless punishment of those who die impenitent, argued and defended, against the reasonings of Doctor Chauncey, in his book entitled the Salvation of all Men.” 1 vol. 8vo.

2d. A Dissertation on Liberty and Necessity. This was written during his residence at Colebrook.

3d. Observations on the Language of the Stockbridge Indians.

4th. Three sermons on the Attonement of Christ.

5th. A variety of occasional sermons, separately published.

He also edited, from the manuscripts of his father, several volumes, particularly the history of the Work of Redemption. Two volumes of sermons; and two volumes of "Observations on Important Theological Subjects." He has left manuscripts with which it is hoped the world will be favored in due time.

Such was this great and good man, both in life and death. In the language of Shakespeare, we may with propriety say,

—Take him for all in all,
We (scarce) shall look upon his like again.

Admonitions from the Death-Bed.

Continued from p. 303.

NUMBER VI.

Mess^{rs}'s EDITORS,

I SEND you an account of an Infidel, brought under conviction, and as I hope savingly converted on his dying bed, lately communicated to me by a friend, which you will please to publish as another number of Admonitions from the Death-Bed.

Yours, &c.

PRESBUTEROS.

FUNDAMENTAL errors in religion, embraced, and followed in their consequences, will end in Atheism, as an infant if it lives, will grow up to manhood. Whether Manassah be called an Arminian, an Universalist, a Deist or an Atheist, is not material. He had, at different times, fallen in with these sentiments. He tho't sometimes, that an honest life, in dealing with men, would save him. At other times, he thought all would be saved. At times he professed to believe that death put an end to man's existence; and that there was neither happiness nor misery after this life. To a neighbor, a day or two before he was taken unwell, he said, "I do not know whether there is a God or not, and if there be, I know nothing about him." An expression like this, he used, when conversing upon divine revelation, with the same person. In this man, the bad influence, which pernicious opinions have on practice, was very apparent. He tried to disbelieve every thing divine and sacred; he, therefore, not only lived in the total neglect of Christian duties; but religion itself was a subject of his ridicule, and highest contempt; as were the ministers of the gospel, and the professors of religion. He was a man of a sprightly mind, and active body; and one who, in his common intercourse with mankind, treated them kindly.

He had formerly labored under a particular bodily infirmity, but by very careful attention had regained his health. On Wednesday evening the 4th of November last, after laboring hard through the day, his old complaint returned with alarming symptoms. Medical aid was called in but to no effect. His pain was exquisite and continued to increase until Saturday, when a council of physicians was called. They told him that if he would submit to a painful and dangerous operation there was some probability he might recover. The operation was performed tho' not with the wished for success; and on Monday following the surgeon told him frankly, "The difficulties you labor under exceed the skill of man, and the power of medicine to remove; You must die. This was Monday evening November 9th, 1801.

Through all this distress, and although the prospect of recovery was growing less and less, yet Manasseh's mind was as stupid as it was when he was in health. He had been prayed with and conversed with. But as is said of Jonah, he was fast asleep. But about midnight he awoke out of his spiritual sleep; and began to think seriously, and to talk upon serious subjects. He now reflected upon himself, for living so wickedly, treating religion with so much neglect and contempt, &c. And before the dawn of the morning, his conscience was harrowed up with distress and horror, indescribable.— He would say, “the distress of my body is extremely great, but it is nothing to the horror and distress of my mind.” After asking for some drink, at a certain time he added, “I am like the rich man, with this difference only, I can now have water to cool my tongue, but by and by shall be where I cannot have it.” He said also, I once thought that moral honesty would save me, but I give up the idea, there must be love to God.”

On Tuesday morning, soon after day light appeared, a neighbor went to see him. Manasseh addressed him in this manner:— “This night I have been convinced that I am the greatest sinner that ever lived. I fear I have sinned away my day of grace, and there is no mercy for me.” It was observed to him, “It is not too late for you to repent; your duty is now to submit yourself to God.” He replied, “It is true, but I find so much opposition in me!—It is that which gives me this horror of conscience. Oh that I had lived a life of religion, this bed on which I lie would be soft as down, but now it seems like rolling in burning embers. Many times I have spoken lightly of you* and all professors of religion: and particularly Mr. —, (calling the minister of the place by name) but now I am convinced that religion is a solemn reality. I have endeavored to live a jovial, smooth life, but not a religious life.”

He desired I might be sent for. One observed, to him, “I have often heard you speak very light of our minister, why then do you wish to see him?” He replied, “It is true, but I have been convinced, this night, that he is right, and I am wrong; and the doctrines which he has preached are the truth. Oh how I lament that I have ridiculed him, and all professors of religion! I have ridiculed you and other religious people for attending religious meetings. I have endeavored to live a merry life, but now lament that I have neglected and ridiculed religion. I cannot die in peace, unless I see my minister.”

A messenger came and informed me, and I immediately went to the house where was the sick man. On going to the bed side, he addressed me with a solemn and engaging air, in the following words, as nearly as can be recollected.— “I could not die in peace until I had made a confession to you. You have always treated me well, and been a kind neighbor to me. Much good counsel and advice, you have given me; but I always hated you. I believed you was a servant of Jesus Christ, and I hated you for that, because I supposed you preached truth. I am a poor miserable creature ; have lived a stupid life, in contempt of all instruction, and in neglect of all religion ; and know I shall die soon, I ask your forgiveness for all my ill conduct towards you, in which I have treated you so basely."

* The man he was conversing with was a professor of religion.

He then observed to me, "I have tried to be an universalist." He was asked whether he felt so well satisfied with the sentiment, that he was willing to risque it. He said, "I rather wished it was true, than believed it to be true ; my mind, therefore, did not feel easy,—I was not satisfied."

It was now about the rising of the sun, on Tuesday morning. The case of the sick man being somewhat singular, and there having been such a surprising change in his mind, the neighbors soon collected in such numbers, that the house was almost filled with people, old and young, the greater part of the day. Manasseh had yet a good degree of strength of body ; his understanding was clear, and his ideas distinct : He now spent all the time in conversing, except when paroxysms of pain were so severe, that he could not speak.—Of the conversation which took place between him and others, a small part only will be noticed. His observations which are here mentioned, are not arranged, perhaps, in the same order of time in which they were made ; nor are his particular modes of expression always used ; but the sentiments and the ideas are meant to be correctly expressed.

A number of persons standing round his bed, on a certain time, he says ; "You see me lie here, a poor, miserable sinner, just about to die, and I have lived a wicked life all my days. By me take warning. Such a distressed situation as I lie in, is a poor time to prepare for death. Do not neglect religion as I have done. You must die. Now, while in health, is the time for you to prepare for death. Oh do not neglect !"

To one of his former gay companions he observed to this effect : "You have a gay, light mind, you keep company with such people ; but, my friend, this will not do. Look on me. I am dying. Oh attend to religion. Remember, when I am dead, what you now see and hear, and tell my friends, that it may be a warning to them."

He observed to one, "I have lived in the neglect of all religion, and I now view myself a dying man ; and Oh, what an awful condition I am in ! I now view myself a sinner, and fear I shall be miserable forever. But I hope I shall find mercy in the sight of God. I have despised religion, and labored to persuade myself, that the doctrine of the universalists was true, but yet doubted it. My wife* has endeavored to convince me, there was something in religion, but I did not believe her. And now what a shocking situation this is to prepare for death. Oh that all would attend to this business, while in health, and not put it off as I have done."

At another time he said, "I have been a wicked man ; have sinned against heaven ; have run away from God ; my wicked life flies in my face ; I have often resisted conviction, by running into bad company."

One of his neighbors remarking upon his distressed situation, he replied ; "Yes, my situation is distressing ; but I do not think myself dealt by unjustly, altho' I am thus distressed, and my neighbors are not ; for I deserve it more than any of them, as I am the worst of all."

* She was a professor of religion.

A friend giving him drink which was pleasant and nourishing he says, "All that keeps me alive is that you gave me, and nourishment I receive from Jesus Christ."

A neighbor, who had been absent a day or two, returned home on Tuesday, late in the afternoon, and immediately went in to see Manasseh, who took him by the hand and said, "The Lord has wrought a great work on my soul; I am willing to die, I believe Jesus loves me,—I think I love him."

To obtain some ease in his restless situation, if it might be, he desired the tenders to carry him about the room in a blanket; and while they were performing this office of kindness, he said repeatedly, "Soon I shall be in the arms of Jesus."

On Tuesday night, a few hours before he died, he said to the watchers, "I have but a little while to stay in this world, I am submissive, I can trust my family with God, for he will do right."

A short space of time before he departed this life, the watchers standing by the bed-side, he prayed with an audible voice, in the following words, as nearly as could be recollected. They were soon committed to paper, by one who was present.

"O God! look down with compassion on us, and grant that these, my friends and neighbors, who stand around my bed, may take warning by me, and not put off making their peace with thee, until they lie on a dying bed, as I have done: But by thy sovereign grace may they be brought to submit to Christ. O God, have compassion on my family, and may they be submissive under all their afflictions. I leave them, and all my concerns with thee; grant that I may be patient and submissive. May I not be deceived in my last moments, but be reconciled to thee through Jesus Christ. I commit myself into thy hands to be disposed of for time and eternity as thou seekest best. May I have an easy passage out of time into eternity, and find mercy with thee, thro' Jesus Christ. Amen."

A few minutes before he breathed out his life, sensible he was then going, he says to the bystanders, "Let this be a warning to you all, and take heed that you never forget it."

Sundry questions, which were proposed to him with his answers, will now be mentioned; though not perhaps in the order in which they were proposed, as this cannot be ascertained with precision. Many of the questions came in very abruptly, arising from some previous conversation which is not mentioned; and the reason the observations are past over in silence, is, a recital of them all, would protract the narrative to a very great length. If all the dying man said, pertinently, upon religious subjects, for the space of thirty hours, was written, it would, no doubt, be sufficient to fill a small volume.

Q. Are you sensible of the wickedness of your heart?

A. I am wholly a sinner, and have done nothing but sin, all my life.

Q. Do you feel your dependance on God?

A. I am sensible I am wholly dependant on him and entirely in his hands.

Q. Do you believe this to be true, not only in regard to your present state, but also your future state?

A. I believe that I, and all men are in the hands of God, to be disposed of forever, as he pleases.

Q. Are you willing to be in the hands of God, and disposed of by him, in time and eternity ?

A. I hope I am—I think I am.

Q. Then you feel reconciled to God, do you not ?

A. Yes, I think I do ; I am willing to die, if it be his will.

Q. Do you think God can have mercy on you ?

A. God can be glorified in having mercy on whom he will have mercy.

Q. You have been opposed to the doctrines preached by our ministers ; but do you now believe them ?

A. Yes, I do.

Q. Then you believe that there is something in religion, do you not ?

A. Yes, I know there is ; and people need not wait to see me lie in my present situation to be convinced of it ; there is sufficient evidence in the bible.

Q. How do you now feel ?

A. I am entirely easy in body and mind.

Q. But do you not feel yourself a sinner ?

A. Yes. And if God does have mercy on me, he will have mercy on the greatest sinner on whom he ever had mercy.

Q. Would God be just if he should send you to hell ?

A. Yes. And if God cannot be glorified otherwise, let me go.

Q. Why do you wish to live any longer in this world ?

A. That I may live to the honor and glory of God.

Q. If you should live longer, do you think you should live to the honor and glory of God ?

A. I believe I should, God enabling me.

The foregoing narrative exhibits some very remarkable circumstances. That a man, who had lived such a life as Manasseh had, should, just at the close of it, have his mouth opened, to speak for God and his cause, as he did ; that he should acknowledge, and converse upon the fundamental doctrines of Christianity, which he never had attended to, with so much clearness and propriety, is remarkable. He appeared to have as just ideas of human depravity, divine sovereignty, special grace, man's absolute dependance, &c. &c. as if he had been a student in Christian theology. When he spoke of depravity, or of dependance on God, and the like, he appeared to speak what he felt, and not what he had learnt. It brought to mind this declaration of Jehovah. Unto me every knee shall bow, and every tongue confess. Whether his heart bowed or not, we leave ; but his knee bowed and his tongue confessed. It is remarkable that so many people, old and young, should call to see him on that day, when he was pleading the cause of God and religion. God designed they should hear the solemn message, almost like to one sent from the dead ; that if they would not regard, they might be left without excuse.

It was a singular case, that one, after passing thro' so much distress of body and mind, should, notwithstanding, have the full exercise of his understanding, and that his mental powers should be clear and firm. Hence he was able to address persons of different characters, with a very great degree of propriety.

When some of his former gay companions came into the room where he lay, he would desire them to come to his bed side. It was affecting, it was enough to melt the hardest heart present, to hear him address them in the most solemn manner, charging them to attend to religion, and not forget what they then saw and heard. Those who had spent hours of mirth and vanity with him, now stood, as it were arraigned at the bar before him, weeping and trembling, like little children under the rod. Thirty people or more in the room, and not a dry eye among them all.

Here is a wonderful instance of almighty power, operating on the mind of man. Those who, while in health, were neglected, despised and ridiculed by him, were now the persons he wished to be his companions; and in whose company and conversation he took the most pleasure.

May not only we who saw and heard, but those also who read, receive instruction & reproof. *For he that being often reprov'd, hardeneth his neck, shall suddenly be destroyed, and that without remedy. And let universalists and deists attend to the solemn business urged on them by one who is now in eternity. He wished to believe, but could not, what they are trying to believe, but cannot. Let them take heed lest they go down to destruction half disbelieving their own creed. And thou mourn at the last, when thy flesh and thy body are consumed, and say, How have I hated instruction, and my heart despised reproof. And have not obeyed the voice of my teachers, nor inclined my ear to them that instructed me!†

That very striking exclamation of the dying man, which has been mentioned, "O that I had lived a life of religion, then this bed on which I lie would be soft as down, but now it seems like rolling in burning embers!" bro't to my mind the following lines:—

"Jesus can make a dying bed,
"Feel soft as downy pillows are;
"While on his breast I lean my head,
"And breathe my soul out sweetly there."

ISAIAH.

Amanda and Lyfander. A Fragment.

IN commendation of a departed friend, Amanda said to Lyfander. "He was pleased in seeing a person happy." "So am I," answered Lyfander, "if his happiness be rational." "He was pleased in seeing every body happy," rejoined Amanda. "So am I," replied Lyfander, "provided their happiness be derived from the love and practice of religion. But to say that I am pleased in seeing every body easy and happy in their present state and pursuits I cannot, consistently with my views of the holy scriptures, as they treat of God and man. I will give you my reasons.

"We both believe the bible to be the word of God and all its contents to be truth. In this book we see the divine being to be great and merciful, holy and just, true and faithful, the moral governor of all his rational creatures. Here also we see man, tho' a rational and exalted, yet a fallen and sinful creature, an enemy of God, a rebel against his government, a transgressor of his law and of consequence unfit for heaven, unworthy eternal life and exposed to endless perdition. The gospel makes provision for the salvation of the humble and obedient believer, but leaves the unrenewed and impenitent sinner under the curse of the law. You

* Prov. xxix. 1.

† Prov. v. 11, 12, 13.

' must concede that this is a scrip' ture representation of the state
 ' and character of the sinner, and ' that his condition is dangerous and ' alarming. When I see a person
 ' destitute of all seriousness and love
 ' to religion, how can I wish to see ' him happy in his present state of ' unbelief? His condition is cer' tainly alarming, since he is oppo' sed to a holy God, and his sin' ful heart will render him misera' ble. He ought then to be con' cerned and anxious for himself.
 ' And shall I rejoice to see him un' concerned and happy in the midst ' of danger? It would argue a ' malevolent heart. No! I will ' not, I cannot, rejoice in seeing ' sinners at ease in Zion. I wish ' that they might see themselves to ' be wretched, and miserable, and
 ' poor, and blind, and naked in ' their state of alienation from God.
 ' It is infinitely more desirable to ' behold them mourning over their ' sins than happy in committing ' them. For the true riches will ' be given to the humble sinner, and
 ' his happiness be perfect in the ser' vice and enjoyment of his Maker.

"What then," says Amanda,
 ' you wish your fellow creatures
 ' miserable!"

"No!" replies Lyfander, "I
 ' only wish them to feel the truth
 ' and have a sense of their ruined
 ' state, that they may fly to the ' Saviour and be happy forever. If ' a man feel contented and happy
 ' all his life, in a state of impeni-
 ' tence, he will never seek enjoy' ment in holiness where only it can ' be found; but will die in his sins
 ' and be miserable. If a person ' has disjointed or broken a bone,
 ' he must expect that replacing it,
 ' in order for a cure, must occasion
 ' him temporary pain. Man, be' ing alienated from his Maker,
 ' most generally has distressing ap-

' prehensions of divine wrath and ' wounding reflections, before he is ' restored to the favor and image
 ' of God. This is the natural ' consequence of groundless disaf-
 ' fection and unreasonable opposi' tion when the offender comes to ' himself.

"Is it not commendable," says
 Amanda, "to use our endeavors
 ' to render our fellow creatures hap' py while in the world?"

"Certainly," answers Lyfander,
 ' not only commendable but an im' portant duty. To make them
 ' happy, however, I should not re' commend thoughtlessness, impen' itence and vice—I should not ' urge them to frequent places of ' dissipation and sinful pleasure.
 ' No! Amanda, this is not the ' path that conducts to happiness.
 ' If you have sought it in this way,
 ' I presume you have failed of your ' object. A degree of enjoyment
 ' may, for a time, be derived from
 ' these things; but then it leaves
 ' the mind unsatisfied, furnishes
 ' new matter of charge for an ac' cusing conscience, and unsuits the ' soul for the pure and sublime en' joyments of religion. A thought' less, impenitent, pleasurable and ' vicious life prepares a person for ' an unhappy death, and a misera' ble eternity. Perhaps you may ' think that no guilt is attached to
 ' a life of impenitence and that vain
 ' mirth and youthful follies are ' harmless. But however innocent
 ' you may look upon impenitence,
 ' it is an implicit justification of all
 ' past offences, and a declaration
 ' of opposition to God and rejec' tion of the Redeemer. And as ' for sinful diversions, which you
 ' rank under the name of innocent
 ' amusements, you must know as ' well as I, that they are unbecom' ing candidates for eternity whose
 ' time is precious and whose work

' is important. They certainly ' unfit the mind for the duties of re' ligious and the solemnities of death
 ' and judgment. I cannot there' fore recommend these pursuits to ' my fellow mortals as the way to ' happiness ; neither can I rejoice
 ' in observing them contented and ' happy in this course. Peace of ' mind in this world and glory in
 ' the next, are the blessed fruits of ' a reconciliation with God and a ' course of strict virtue, seriousness
 ' and religion. When I see a per' son cheerful and happy in this ' course and with these prospects, I ' can rejoice with him ; for I am ' persuaded that his state is safe,
 ' that his hopes are rational, and
 ' his prospects truly animating and ' glorious. But when I behold a ' person cheerful and happy in the ' midst of carnal security and sinful
 ' pleasures, it rather excites pity in ' my heart than joy ; I know his ' state to be dangerous and all his ' hopes of happiness to be visiona' ry. I think him an object of pity,
 ' because he is in danger of the ' greatest evil, while he feels him' self safe. I view him a wretch' ed creature, in the direct path to ' woe, and, perhaps, just at the ' gate of hell, altho' in the midst
 ' of gaiety, cheerfulness and mirth.
 ' Say, Amanda, say, can you ' wish to see a person contented and
 ' happy in this state of danger, just
 ' upon the brink of eternal death?"

SHAPHAN.

Religious Intelligence.

DENMARK.

Letter from the Danish Society for propagating the gospel, to the Missionary Society of London.

Most dearly beloved Brethren in Christ, the venerable Directors of the Missionary Society,

GRACE and peace be with you from God our Father, and Jesus our Saviour, and with all who truly call upon the name of the Lord.

At our general Annual Society, held the 11th of the Calends of July, we read with deepest emotions of heart your most welcome letter of May 26th. Glory be to God who so mightily strengthened and exhilarated our hearts with the confidence given of your love and intercession for us, and by that blessed union of Spirit, in which we are truly one with you. The German Society of Basil hath also communicated to us your very animating epistle to them, which hath stimulated them to persist, by the grace of Jesus, in the race so happily and prosperously begun. In your letters, so full of momentous intelligence, dearest brethren, we understand they have been accompanied with papers informing us, among other things, what you have been attempting abroad and at home, and what you farther purpose. But these papers have never reached us ; why, we know not. What refreshment, instruction, and cause of prayer and thanksgivings would they not have afforded us ! The loss of them is truly grievous to us ; having kindly designed them for us, we cannot, dearest brethren, but apprise you of our disappointment.

Fully persuaded of your cordial participations in our blessings, we with delight (thanks be to God our Saviour) can inform you, that he continues, in the most blessed manner, to be kind and favorable to us ; and manifested his presence and benediction in our last annual assembly. The Lord was indeed in the midst of us ; we broke up with fresh courage and inclination for the work. We are at present engaged in executing the designs entered upon at this meeting, from which, as far as it regards our great object, we entertain much hope, God the Saviour supporting and giving his benediction. We can also inform you, that we hope to form an association with some faithful witnesses for the truth in Sweden. There our little pamphlets, especially our Evangelical Magazine, are read with pleasure.

In Norway, a peasant, whose name is Hans Houge, with several like-minded assistants, travels about, far and wide, preaching the gospel with great earnestness and efficacy, as we are informed. During the two years past, they have awakened a great concern on the minds of many, so that the number of those who have by his means been led to a deep concern for their souls, is said to amount to 1800. Some of them, and Hans Houge himself in the number, have been together, and repeatedly seized and imprisoned; but when examined before the magistrates, no criminal charge could be proved against them, and they have been discharged. We fully purpose to gain a more explicit knowledge of, and acquaintance with, these men, and wish to be able to help them in the work. In Jutland, the beginning of a similar work of God appears, the issue of which we wait. We rejoice greatly in your fraternal participation with us, dearest brethren, and are assured we shall share in your fervent prayers to God for us.

Since the edict published by our government respecting the bounds of the liberty of the press, and the obedience due to magistracy, the libels which very lately swarmed against the bible and Christianity, have been somewhat repressed; but the fatal principles of the new philosophy have long been disseminated, and extend their influence daily. Nevertheless, Jesus Christ, the great Head of his Church, doth not forget the congregation of his own upon earth. He laid the foundations of his church; and the gates of hell can never prevail against it! This sure and happy hope, your letters, most distinguished brethren, tend strongly to confirm.

With your kind leave, we beg to testify our fervent desire to hear some farther intelligence from you, and particularly respecting the papers you were so kind to send, but have not reached us.

May God the Saviour, forever adorable, prosper you and your Missionary Society, deeply lying on our hearts, with all the designs you plan and the labors you are engaged in for the glory of his holy name.

Let brotherly love continue.

For the Danish Society for propagating the gospel.

U. E. BOESEN.

Faaborg, 6th Aug. 1801.

Wm. Odensee.

IRELAND.

Several Protestant missionaries have lately been itinerating in Ireland and preaching the gospel to the Irish Catholics in their own language. Their labors have been attended with great success, and many of that benighted nation have been brought to a knowledge of the truth as it is in Jesus.

SCOTLAND.

During the year 1801, there was a revival of religion in many places in Scotland. The last accounts from that country represent the work as still progressing.

KENTUCKY.

Extract of a letter from a gentleman in Kentucky to his brother in Lower Virginia.

“Passing from domestic intelligence, I hasten to lay before you the outlines of the most august proceedings of the people of God that ever were seen in this state. The people known by the appellation of Presbyterians assembled, on Friday last, at Concord meeting-house, by way of preparation for the Lord’s Supper. I did not attend until sabbath day, when I saw the ordinance administered, and many of the people prostrate on the ground crying for mercy. I passed the day as an impartial spectator; but frequently wrapped in amazement, wonder and doubt. Anxious for certainty, I retired to a solitary part of the woods and there prostrated myself before the great God of heaven and earth, and frequently prayed to be directed in the right way; but alas! I returned with a most obdurate heart, ready to vilify—ripe for reproaching and persecuting the people of the most high God. I styled it enthusiastical levity—I called it a delusion of the devil, in conjunction with hypocrisy, operating on the minds of the illiterate and credulous, by the power of oratory. Notwithstanding, said I, it may turn the wicked, alter the drunkard and finally reform the prodigal. Nevertheless, I thought it derogatory to the laws of God. You may easily see, by this, that I returned much displeas’d with the proceedings of the day. I did not intend to return the day following; but while I slumbered on my pillow, that monitor that never sleeps, while we are surrounded

‘with the blackness of darkness, gave me a severe wound. I rolled in my bed and cried for mercy; but found none. I rose with a view of prostrating myself before Almighty God; but returned without making the attempt. Surrounded by the silent slumbers of my family, I struggled through the dreary horrors of the night. In the morning, I mounted my horse, in hopes of finding tranquillity in recreation; but the words which I heard the preceding day, “those that were bidden and have refused shall never taste of my supper,” obstructed my way, while the tremendous sound of “Go ye accursed,” &c. re-echoed through every nerve of my body, while tears of guilt and contrition poured over my face. I saw myself on the awful precipice, and the mouldering brink crumbling under my feet, my soul took the alarm, and for the first time shrunk back at the thoughts of a hell.

“Construe this as you please, my dear brother; but whether you call it insanity or imbecility, I am again involved in a similar situation. The review of my past guilt has watered my face afresh. I am become a profelyte in some degree; but a stranger to regeneration.

“I returned and resolved to go to meeting that day also. Accordingly, accompanied by your sister, the partner of my cares, we halted to the place of meeting. A more tremendous sight never struck the eyes of mortal man. The very clouds seemed to separate to give way for the praises of the people of God to ascend the heavens. While thousands of tongues with the sound of Hallelujah, seemed to roll through infinite space. Hun'dreds of the people lay prostrate

 ' on the ground crying for mercy.
 ' Oh! my dear brother, had you ' been there, you would have been ' constrained to have cried out, as ' I was obliged to do, The Gods
 ' are among the people. Nor was
 ' this confined to the commonalty
 ' alone; but people of every de' scription lay prostrate on the ' ground. There you would have ' seen the learned pastor, the steady
 ' patriot, and the obedient son cry' ing, Holy, holy, holy, Lord
 ' God Almighty. There you ' might behold the honorable mat' ron and the virtuous maiden cry' ing, Jesus, thou Son of the most ' high God, have mercy upon us.
 ' Turn your eyes a few paces fur' ther and you might see the prodi' gal and the professed libertine cry' ing Hosiannah to God in the high' est, there is no other name given ' under heaven among men, by
 ' which we can be saved but the ' name of Jesus. You might also ' have seen the poor oppressed Af' rican, with his soul liberated,
 ' longing to be with its God. Me-
 ' thinks I hear you say, by this ' time, these are strange things in' deed! but I think it the height
 ' of arrogance in poor, insignifi' cant, diminutive man, whose ' knowledge bears no proportion to
 ' the knowledge of the Great
 ' Eternal, to dare to criticise or ' censure in the least degree the ' works of an Almighty power,"
 '&c. &c.

The following is extracted from a letter of the Rev. J. Hughes, a minister of the Ohio presbytery in the state of Pennsylvania, dated Nov.
 23, 1801. He is a man respectable for sound judgment and piety.

"I arrived at the Rev. J.
 Welsh's in Lexington, on the
 Vol. II. No. 10.

' sabbath morning of the sacra' ment there. Here the solemn,
 ' pleasing and wonderful scene be' gan to open, which it is impossi' ble for me to describe. While
 ' in that country, I attended on ' three sacramental occasions; at ' each place there were from 5 to
 ' 6 or 7 thousand. In general,
 ' there was great liberty and enga-
 ' gedness in preaching, and all the ' religious exercises, and many ap' peared to be the subjects of a ' powerful and I hope saving work
 ' of God. Often have I, at once,
 ' heard the distressing groans and
 ' cries of ten or twelve, lying pro' strate under a sense of their sin
 ' and danger; and at the same time
 ' the praising shouts of as many
 ' more, under a view of the divine
 ' glories and the mysteries of re' demption. In general, the Lord
 ' seems to make a short work of it,
 ' so that those who fall in great dis' tress and lie for a time, agonizing
 ' under a sense of their sins and ' dangerous condition; perhaps in ' the course of 3 or 4 hours, open
 ' their mouths with praises and ad' oration recommending Christ and
 ' the plan of salvation; and in the ' most moving manner warning and
 ' exhorting sinners to fly to Christ.
 ' Amongst these, there have a num' ber of the avowed and most bold
 ' infidels been brought down, made
 ' to acknowledge the divine power
 ' and perfections, and to espouse
 ' the religion of Jesus. It has ' been reported in some parts of ' our country, that there is great
 ' disorder and confusion attending
 ' this work. This is by no means
 ' so great as has been represented,
 ' and perhaps little more than might
 ' be expected or than can be avoid' ed, where such vast multitudes
 ' are assembled and of such vari' ous characters. On the whole
 ' I have no hesitation to conclude

“that God is doing a great and good work in that country, and that hundreds have been made the subjects of the saving operations of his spirit,” &c.

Virginia, the Carolinas and Georgia.

There is a remarkable revival of religion in many parts of the southern States. Recent accounts from that country represent the work as increasing and becoming very extensive.

Encouraging accounts respecting a revival of religion have also been recently received from many other places in America.

MISSIONARIES.

The Rev. Jedidiah Bushnell returned sometime since from a mission of about eleven months to the northern parts of Vermont. His missionary labors were, through the blessing of God, attended with great success in many places.

The Rev. Ezekiel J. Chapman arrived at New-Connecticut the beginning of December last; where it is expected he and the Rev. Joseph Badger, who has lately removed to that country with his family, will continue to labor as missionaries through the year.

The Rev. Seth Williston is still in the western counties of New-York, itinerating as a missionary one half of the time, and preaching the other half at Lisle.

The Rev. Solomon Morgan is in Vermont, unless he has recently returned.

Mr. James W. Woodward is at present at Black River where he will continue several months.

Two other missionaries, one to Vermont and one to New-York State will be sent out this Spring.

A remarkable interposition of Divine Providence.

TO THE EDITORS OF THE LONDON EVANGELICAL MAGAZINE.

GENTLEMEN,

WHEN I reflect on the many happy hours in my youth, spent in private conference, and praying societies, I can neither forget the men, nor yet the distinguished mercies of the Lord, who rendered them a blessing to my early instruction, edification, and consolation. And such as are able to realize the ideas of past friendship, and to associate the feelings of gratitude for the past, with the hope of enjoying in a few days, or years, a still more pure and perfect communion with endeared but departed saints, will not condemn me for bringing to light, and rescuing from oblivion, any singular instance of the Lord's care and kindness towards his hidden ones, in the days of their pilgrimage; and the following, I hope, will prove both entertaining and instructing to the poor of Christ's flock.

It has been often observed, that the Christian's greatest extremity is the time of God's gracious opportunity. Few things are more evident, than that some of the darkest dispensations, in the experience of the saints, have been opportunities for the divine care and kindness to be made known and manifested towards them; and those temporal supplies, that are given in an extraordinary way, such as the ravens feeding Elijah, in a particular manner, answer the designs of our Lord; they are the fruit of the wisdom of him who hath said, “I will never leave thee; I will never forsake thee.”

Thomas Hownham, the subject of the following providence, was a very poor man, who lived in a lodge house or hut upon a moor, called Barmour-moor, about a mile from Lowick, and two miles from Doddington, in the county of Northumberland. He had no means to support a wife and two young children, save the scanty earnings obtained by keeping an ass, on which he used to carry coals from Barmour-coalhill to Doddington and Wooler; or by making brooms of the heath, and selling them around the country. Yet poor and despised as he was in consequence of his poverty, in my forty years acquaintance with the professing world, I have scarce met with his equal, as a man that lived near to God, or one who was favored with more evident answers to prayer. My parents then living at a village called Hanging-Hall, about one mile and a half from his hut, I had frequent interviews with him, in one of which he was very solicitous to know whether my father or mother had sent him any unexpected relief the night before. I answered him in the negative, so far as I knew: At which he seemed to be uneasy. I then pressed to know what relief he had found; and how? After requesting secrecy, unless I should hear of it from any other quarter (and if so, he begged I would acquaint him), he proceeded to inform me, that being disappointed of receiving money for his coals the day before, he returned home in the evening, and to his pain and distress found that there was neither bread, nor meal, nor any thing to supply their place, in his house; that his wife wept sore for the poor children, who were both crying for hunger; that they continued crying until they both fell to sleep; that he got them to bed, and their mother with them, who likewise soon went to sleep, being worn out with the sufferings of the children and her own tender feelings.

Being a fine moonlight night, he went out of the house, to a retired spot, at a little distance, to meditate on those remarkable expressions in Hab. iii. 17—19. Here he continued, as he thought, about an hour and a half; found great liberty and enlargement in prayer; and got such a heart-loathing and soul-humbling sight of himself, and such interesting views of the grace of God, and the love of his adorable Saviour, that though he went out on purpose to spread his family and temporal wants before his Lord, yet, having obtained a heart-attracting and soul-captivating view of him by faith, he was so enamoured with his beauty, and so anxious to have his heart entirely under his forming hand, that all thought about temporals was taken away.

In a sweet, serene, and composed frame of mind, he returned into his house; when, by the light of the moon through the window, he perceived something upon a stool or form (for chairs they had none) before the bed; and after viewing it with astonishment, and feeling it, he found it to be a joint of meat roasted, and a loaf of bread, about the size of our half-peck loaves. He then went to the door to look if he could see any body; and after using his voice, as well as his eyes, and neither perceiving nor hearing any one, he returned in, awoke his wife, who was still asleep, asked a blessing and then awoke the children, and gave them a comfortable repast; but could give me no further account. I related this extraordinary affair to my father and mother, who both heard it with astonishment; but ordered me to keep it a secret as requested; and such it would ever have remained, but for the following reason : A short time after this event I left that country ; but on a visit, about twelve years after, at a friend's, the conversation one evening took a turn about one Mr. Strangeways, commonly called Stranguage, a farmer, who lived at Lowick-Highsteed, which the people named Pinchme-near, on account of this miserly wretch that dwelt there. I asked what had become of his property, as I apprehended he had never done one generous action in his life-time. An elderly woman in company said, I was mistaken ; for she could relate one, which was somewhat curious : She said, that she had lived with him as a servant or house-keeper ; that about twelve or thirteen years ago, one Thursday morning, he ordered her to have a whole joint of meat roasted, having given her directions a day or two before to bake two large loaves of white bread. He then went to Wooler market, and took a piece of bread and cheefe in his pocket, as usual. He came home in the evening in a very bad humor, and went soon to bed. In about two hours after he called up his man-servant, and ordered him to take one of the loaves and the joint of meat, and carry them down the moor to Thomas Hownham's and leave them there. The man did so, and finding the family asleep, he set them at their bedside, and came away.

The next morning her master called her and the man-servant in, and seemed in great agitation of mind. He told them that he intended to have invited a Mr. John Mool, with two or three more neighboring farmers, (who were always teasing him for his nearness) to sup with him the night before ; that he would not invite them in the market-place, as he purposed to have taken them by surprize near home, as two or three of them passed his house, but a smart shower of rain coming on, they rode off, and left him before he could get an opportunity ; that going soon to bed he did not rest well, fell a-dreaming, and thought he saw Hownham's wife and children starving for hunger ; that he awoke and put off the impresson ; that he dreamed the second time, and endeavored again to shake it off, but that he was altogether overcome with the nonsense the third time ; that he believed the devil was in him, but that since he was so foolish as to send the meat and bread, he could not now help it, and charged her and the man never to speak of it, or he would turn them away directly. She added, that since he was dead long ago, she thought she might relate it, as a proof that he had done one generous action, though he was grieved for it afterwards.

This is the fact ; let those that read make their own reflections.

J. R.

Deptford, Oct. 4, 1793.

Donations to the Missionary Society of Connecticut.

	D.	C.
From a Friend of Missions,	-	20
From do. at New-Hartford,	-	3 10

A STATEMENT OF THE FUNDS OF THE MISSIONARY SOCIETY OF CONNECTICUT.

No. 1.

ACCOUNT of Monies contributed in the several Congregational Societies in the State of CONNECTICUT, for the support of Missions, on the first Sabbath in May 1801, pursuant to a Resolve of the General Assembly of said State, passed October 1798.

HARTFORD COUNTY.

	D.	C.
Hartford, North Society,	60	65
South Do.	18
West Division,	29	51
Berlin, Kensington,	16	04
New Britain,	21	32
Worthington,	9	06
Bristol, Cambridge,	21	11
West Britain,	10	16
Baptist Society,	2	63
East Hartford, First Society,	20	48
Orford,	23	78
East Windsor, First Society,	13	25
Second Do.	14
Enfield,	11	19
Farmington, First Society,	84
Northington,	13	42
Glastenbury, First Society,	28	41
Eastbury,	4	83
Granby, Salmon Brook,	7	23
Turkey Hills,	5	14
Hartland, First Society,	6	62
West Hartland,	16	41
Southington,	21	77
Suffield, First Society,	9
West Suffield,	4	06
Synsbury, First Society,	12	53
West Synsbury,	42	04
Wethersfield, First Society,	70	25
Newington,	13	38
Stepney,	28
Windsor, First Society,	15	19
Wintonbury,	12	41
Total Hartford County,	665	87
NEW-HAVEN COUNTY.
New-Haven, United Society,	26	20
West Haven,	25	26
Branford, First Society,	19	25
Cheshire, First Society,	19	53
Columbia,	4
Derby, First Society,	7	24
Great Hill,	1	47
East Haven,	11	29
Guilford, First Society,	24	01
North Guilford,	12
Hamden, Mount Carmel,	19
East Plains,	6	23
Milford, First Society,	50
Second Do.	34	50

	D.	C.
North Haven,	21	33
Oxford,	9	85
Wallingford, First Society,	8	43
Meriden,	9	66
Waterbury, First Society,	10	14
Salem,	10	02
Middlebury,	15
Woodbridge, Amity,	14	08
Bethany,	12	62
Wolcott,	9	18
Total New-Haven County,	280	89
NEW LONDON COUNTY.
New London,	33	10
Norwich, First Society,	37	37
Chelsea,	22	56
Bozrah,	4	67
Colchester, First Society,	4	56
West Chester,	6	06
Franklin,	8	94
Lisbon, Newent,	14	35
Hanover,	6	28
Lyme, First Society,	7	79
North Quarter,	7	85
Montville, First Society,	12	50
Preston, North Preston,	45
Total New London County,	210	98
FAIRFIELD COUNTY.
Fairfield, First Society,	15	02
Green's Farms,	13
Danbury, First Society,	16	18
Bethel,	1	68
Brookfield,	5	93
Greenwich, Second Society,	33	28
Huntington, Ripton,	16	43
New Stratford,	10	20
New Fairfield, North Society,	4	88
South Do.	8	81
Newtown,	7	88
Norwalk, First Society,	31	64
Canaan,	28
Reading,	8	50
Ridgefield, First Society,	9	24
Ridgbury,	10	11
Stamford, First Society,	31	01
North Stamford,	8	43
Stanwich,	11	65
Stratford, First Society,	9	96
Stratfield,	9	99

	D.	C.		D.	C.
Trumbull,	12	52	Southbury, First Society,	13	14
Wetton, First Society,	7	50	South Britain,	11	33
Norfield,	6	77	Torrington, First Society	21	03
			Torringtonford,	33	03
Total Fairfield County,	318	61	Warren,	28
WINDHAM COUNTY.			Washington, New Preston,	16	56
Windham, First Society,	9	50	Watertown,	17	52
Scotland,	5	16	Winchester,	12	03
Ashford, Eastford,	4	50	Woodbury,	13	32
Westford,	9	80
Brooklyn,	2	26	Total Litchfield County,	656	33
Canterbury, First Society,	3	17	MIDDLESEX COUNTY.
Westminster,	3	66	Middletown, First Society,	15	7
Hampton,	37	36	Upper Houses,	6
Lebanon, First Society,	45	21	Westfield,	2	26
Crank,	12	35	Haddam,	9	11
Goshen,	7	57	Chatham, First Society,	11	62
Exeter,	7	12	East Hampton,	2	21
Mansfield, First Society,	25	25	Middle Haddam,	1	21
North Do.	11	66	Durham,	26
Plainfield,	12	66	East Haddam, First Society,	16
Pomfret, First Society,	9	02	Millington,	9	22
Abington,	12	05	Had Lyme,	5	76
Woodstock, First Society,	11	20	Killingworth, First Society,	3	50
Muddy Brook,	15	14	N. Killingworth,	24	68
Total Windham County,	244	64	Saybrook, First Society,	11	04
LITCHFIELD COUNTY.			Second Do.	16	50
Litchfield, First Society,	33		Third Do.	5	40
South Farms,	17	06	Fourth Do.	7	18
Northfield,	6	75	Total Middlesex County,	174	02
Barkhamsted, First Society,	5	98	TOLLAND COUNTY.
Winsted,	7	50	Tolland,	14	25
Bethlem,	30	25	Bolton, First Society,	30
Canaan, First Society,	20	42	North Bolton,	12	67
North Canaan,	7	50	Coventry, First Society,	15	63
Colebrook,	15	60	North Do.	16	15
Cornwall, First Society,	12	50	Andover,	7	42
Goshen,	96		Ellington,	7
Harwinton,	21	75	Hebron, First Society,	9	10
Kent,	18	80	Gilcad,	8
New Hartford,	50	50	Somers,	21	33
Norfolk,	61	59	Stafford, First Society,	3	06
Plymouth,	12	75	West Stafford,	2	57
Roxbury,	15	40	Willington,	6	50
Salisbury,	40	02
Sharon,	17		Total Tolland County,	154	28

SUMMARY.

	D.	C.
HARTFORD COUNTY,	665	87
NEW-HAVEN, do.	380	89
NEW-LONDON, do.	210	97
FAIRFIELD, do.	318	61
WINDHAM, do.	244	64
LITCHFIELD, do.	656	33
MIDDLESEX, do.	174	02
TOLLAND, do.	154	28

Total, 2805 62

No. 2.

FUNDS of the Society, arising from other sources than the Contributions in May 1801.

	D. C.
Share Contribution in May 1800, received since January 1801, Contributed in New Settlements, viz.	8 25
To Josiah B. Andrews,	20 48
Amasa Jerome,	50 99
Rev. Jedidiah Bushnell,	48
Rev. Seth Williston,	81 95
Robert Porter,	1
	<hr/>
Avails of Hartford Hymns,	202 46
Do. of Doctor Trumbull's Sermons,	40 54
Do. of Connecticut Evangelical Magazine,	51 78
	<hr/>
Donations by sundry friends to Missions, viz.	1000
1 in Coventry,	1
1 unknown,	10
1 do.	1
1 do.	5
	<hr/> 17
Donations by sundry Strangers, viz.
1 unknown,	3 55
1 in Berlin,	5 50
1 unknown,	0 55
1 do.	11 16
1 do.	1
1 do.	1
	<hr/>
	22 76
By Ladies' Society in Norwich,	13
By a Young Lady,	3 25
By Nathan Beers, Esq. New-Haven,	10
By Daniel Morris, Norfolk,	1
By Rev. George Colton, Bolton,	20
By Mr. Nathaniel Hubbard, do.	50
By Mrs. Eunice Stone, Lebanon,	7
By Rev. John Willard, Stafford,	10
	<hr/>
	114 25
Interest received from January 2, to December 31, 1801,	307 35
	<hr/> 1764 32

No. 3

Disbursements by order of the Trustees.

	D. C.
1801 Jan. 20. To Rev. David Bacon, Missionary to the Indians,	100
Mr. Salmon King, Missionary to New-York State, balance,	1 03
Rev. Abel Flint, Postage and Stationary,	3 30
Mr. Josiah B. Andrews, Missionary to New-York State, balance,	83
Rev. David Bacon, Missionary to the Indians,	200
26 Rev. Jedidiah Bushnell, Missionary to New-York State, on account,	228
Feb. 2 Mr. Robert Porter, Missionary to Vermont, balance,	1
11 Mr. Amasa Jerome, Missionary to New-York State, on account,	128
23 Mr. Robert Porter, Missionary to do. advance	25
Mar. 18 Rev. David Huntington, Missionary to Vermont, on account,	85

Apr

Missionary Funds.

[APRIL,

May 2	Mr. Amasa Jerome, Missionary to New-York State, do.	71
8	Rev. Joseph Badger, Missionary to New-Connecticut, do.	100
13	Mr. Amasa Jerome, Missionary to New-York State, balance,	1 64
	Messrs Hudson & Goodwin, Printing & Stationary,	29 85
26	Rev. Seth Williston, Missionary to New-York State, on account,	274
	Mr. Elisha Colt, for assisting the Treasurer,	3 33
June 1	Mr. Robert Porter, Missionary to New-York State, balance,	38
	Rev. William Storrs, Missionary to Vermont, do.	1
29	Rev. Jeremiah Hallock, Missionary do Advance,	25
July 30	Rev. Joseph Badger, Missionary to New-Connecticut, on account,	50
25	Rev. Job Swift, Missionary to Vermont, on account,	40
28	Rev. David Huntington, Missionary do. balance,	1
Sept. 2	Messrs Hudson & Goodwin, Printing & Stationary, Rev. Abel Flint, Postage,	11 59
	Rev. Job Swift, Missionary to Vermont, on account,	8
15	Mr. Hezekiah May, Missionary to New-York State, advance,	26
Nov. 3	Rev. Ezekiel J. Chapman, Missionary to New-Connecticut, do.	40
Dec. 1	Rev. Jeremiah Hallock, Missionary to Vermont, on account,	61
12	Mr. James W. Woodward, Missionary to New-York State, Advance,	25
17	Rev. Joseph Badger, Missionary to New-Connecticut, on account,	40
	Rev. Ezekiel J. Chapman, Missionary, do. do.	40
	Rev. David Higgins, Missionary to New-York State, do.	27 85
		<hr/> 1767 09

No. 4.

Treasurer's Account Current.

Dr. {	The Missionary Society of Connecticut in Account Current with Andrew Kingsbury as their Treasurer	Cr.
To amount of disbursements by order of the Trustees as per inclosed account No. 3.	1767 9	By balance due the Society as per settlement December 29th, 1800. } 3830 38
To balance carried to credit of new Account.	6633 22
Dolls.	8400 31	By amount of Contributions in May 1801 as per inclosed Account No. 1. } 2805 64
To amount of Permanent Fund.	2404 62
For support of Missions,	4228 60	By amount of donations. Interest, &c. in year 1801 as per inclosed Account, No. 2. } 1764 32
Dolls.	6633 22
		Dolls. 8400 31
		By balance due the Society as above. } 6633 22
		<hr/> 6633 22

A. KINGSBURY, Treasurer
to Missionary Society.

JOHN PORTER, Auditor
to Missionary Society.

Hartford, December 29, 1801.

THE

Connecticut Evangelical Magazine.

[PUBLISHED ACCORDING TO ACT OF CONGRESS.]

VOL. II.]

MAY, 1802.

[No. 11.]

The natural evidence of the goodness of God.

WE are told in the Scriptures that the work of God is perfect; the reason is, it perfectly exhibits the character of its author; we have indeed but imperfect views of his work, and therefore clouds and darkness are round about him; but so far as it is comprehended, it exhibits him as the Father of Lights, from whom cometh down every good and every perfect gift. By the work of God is meant the whole compass of events, which have taken place, or which ever will take place, as well those which come to pass thro' the intervention of means and second causes, as those which are produced by his immediate power.—

The agency of creatures is concerned in the production of innumerable events, and those of the greatest importance, in which they are actuated by distinct and opposite principles and views; but these events are nevertheless the work of God, as much as any other events whatever. They may flow from a sinful taste in creatures, and be the proper evidence of such a taste; while they result from and fully demonstrate the holiness of God. Joseph's brethren, in selling him to the Ishmaelites, meant it unto evil; but God meant it unto good: They meant to destroy him; God meant to save him and them and the whole nation, from whom was to proceed the Saviour of the world.

The great objection which has ever been made against the government of God by men of corrupt minds is, that it admits the existence of evil, both natural and moral, and suffers it greatly to prevail in the world: thus they condemn sin with the breath which the love of sin inspires. They ask, could not God have prevented it? And, if infinitely good, would he not have done it? Here men embrace different systems. Some deny that God could have prevented the existence of sin without destroying the free agency of creatures; and as this would be to render them incapable of moral government, a much greater evil than the existence of sin itself; it was as important that they should be left to the freedom of their own will, without any previous bias or inclination to any given exercise, as that they should have a moral nature given them. Thus, in providing a salvo for the Divine character, they render both angels and men wholly independent on God for all their moral conduct, their support in existence being supposed; and therefore they who have continued in a state of holiness and happiness, or have returned to God after their defection from him, will have whereof to glory; and indeed must ascribe their perseverance or return, to themselves and not to God. At the same time, instead of establishing, they wholly destroy, the free agency of creatures; unless they can act freely, when they have nothing to move or prompt them to act at all. Others, perceiving the absurdity of such a system, and not satisfied how evil can have place under the government of a Being of infinite power and goodness; whose hand and council must be concerned in its existence, and especially to such an extent as is visible in the world, and to continue, as the sacred Scriptures inform us, for ever, are led first to pervert those Scriptures and then to deny their divine authority; and being still pressed with the difficulty from events of perpetual occurrence, which they feel and see, they are further led to doubt, and at last to disbelieve the being of a God. Between these two extremes, equally remote from the truth, and fatal to the souls of men, such as are brought to submit to the dominion of God, cordially receive and embrace the truth, that the agency of God only wise and ever blessed, is visible in all events, and that all events, rightly understood, in their nature and relations, considered as the fruit of his agency or disposal, are a direct expression of his perfection and glory.

That positive evidence of the goodness of God arises from the general frame of nature, and the stated course of events, resulting from the laws of nature, is a truth which forces itself upon every considerate mind.

This may appear from the following considerations. 1st, Every man has a witness in his own breast of the goodness of God, which, if duly attended to and regarded, would afford entire satisfaction; and that is natural conscience, or that moral sense by which he discerns the difference between right and wrong in moral conduct. It is this alone which distinguishes him from a mere agent, and constitutes him a moral agent. It is a much nobler faculty than that by which he perceives the difference between truth and falsehood in natural things. It is that which renders him capable of moral government; of praise or blame; of rewards or punishments. It is above reason. As the perception of simple truth and falsehood is the foundation of all reasoning in natural things: so the perception of right and wrong in moral conduct is the foundation of all reasoning in moral things. It appertains to the intellect and not to the taste of the heart. That principle or action may be seen to be right which we hate: and that principle or action may be seen to be wrong which we love. If the principle or action be brought fully into view of conscience it will decide infallibly: if it be not, it may decide wrong; but the fault is in the will and not in the conscience. If it be listened to with respect, its perception will be acute; if not, it will, by degrees, become insensible.

as if seared with a hot iron. It has been very emphatically, and very properly termed God's vicegerent in the soul. It is the law of God written on the heart, by which infants and heathens will be judged at the bar of God. All who have not the written law are, by this, a law to themselves: and they know it to be thus written on their hearts by their accusing or acquitting, one another. To perceive an action or principle to be right, is the same as in their judgment to approve, though not the same as to love: and to perceive an action or principle to be wrong, is the same as in their judgment to disapprove, though not the same as to hate. The actions or principles which it approves, when brought fully into view, are always such as promote the general good of society: and the actions or principles which it disapproves, when brought fully into view, are always such as injure society.

God has ordained that a course of virtue shall be attended with delight; and that a course of vice shall be attended with remorse. This delight and remorse are self-approbation and self-condemnation, accompanied with a presentiment of future good and evil, as a retribution. A course of virtue then, though arduous and self-denying, insures that peace of mind, which alone is true enjoyment: and a course of vice, though easy and self-gratifying, produces a state of unrest, like the troubled sea continually casting up mire and dirt. The spirit of a man, while sound, can sustain his infirmity; but a wounded spirit who can bear? There is no peace saith my God to the wicked; and universal experience confirms the truth of the declaration. In this law then, we have the testimony of God in favor of virtue and against vice; therefore God is good. Again,

If God were a malevolent being, who gave existence to creatures to make them miserable, it is unreasonable to suppose he would give a faculty to any of them, to discern his own moral deformity, and so to lay them under infinite obligations for ever to hate himself, as the most detestable of all beings. His having therefore in fact given to angels and men a faculty to discern good and evil in moral characters, affords full evidence of his own moral rectitude.

2d, The laws which regulate the motions and revolutions of the heavenly bodies—those which produce the regular alternation of summer and winter, seed time and harvest and day and night—those which govern the winds and tides—those which produce hail and snow, and the former and latter rain in their seasons—those which clothe the earth in spring and summer with verdure, and cause it to bring forth grass for the cattle and herb for the service of man—those which crown autumn with precious fruits for the support of man and beast—and, to mention no more, those which operate in the multiplication, defence and support of the various creatures, after their kinds, make one kind subservient to another and all subservient to man, proclaim the goodness of God, in a language which is understood by all men, even the most savage and barbarous. Be it so, that they are all, under certain circumstances, the occasion of evil, yet the evil produced bears no proportion to the good: their general nature and tendency is obviously good, and this will determine the design and character of him who established them. It is not pretended that men, in their fallen and depraved state, and under the dominion of a selfish, partial temper, will see the goodness of God in his works; nor will they any more see it in his word. Their not seeing the evidence of his goodness, however, is no proof that there is none. If they hate the light and refuse to come to the light, their refusal proves nothing but their own perverseness; the evidence of the being of light may be irresistible, to all who open their eyes. Accordingly we find that the best men in every age, whose hearts have been right with God, have made the works of God, as well as his word, a theme of rapturous praise; but if the evil which prevails in the world annihilates the evidence of God's goodness from his works, so that his goodness cannot be seen in them, they must have been no better than mere rhapsodists and enthusiasts in making the works of God a theme of praise. But,

3d, The truth I have endeavored to prove is manifest from the sacred Scriptures.

The Psalmist says, "The heavens declare the glory of God and "the firmament showeth his handy work. Day unto day uttereth speech, and night unto night showeth knowledge. There is "no speech nor language where "their voice is not heard." But the glory of God is his goodness; the natural perfection of God is indeed of infinite worth, but it is so only as a mean to an end, and that end is the communication and diffusion of infinite goodness. Paul and Barnabas, speaking of the heathen nations, say "That God "suffered them, in time past, to "walk in their own ways. Nevertheless he left not himself without "witness, in that he did good, and "gave us rain from heaven and "fruitful seasons, filling our hearts "with food and gladness." The witness for God, among those nations, was not revelation, but rain from heaven and fruitful seasons; these bare witness for God that he is good, sufficient to leave them and all others without excuse. Again, St. Paul says, "The invisible "things of him from the creation "of the world are clearly seen, "being understood by the things "that are made, even his eternal "power and Godhead; so that "they are without excuse: Because, that when they knew "God, they glorified him not as "God, neither were thankful." Sufficient evidence then of the Godhead is exhibited to men by the works of creation, to render them without excuse, in not glorifying God as God, and in not being thankful: and surely this implies evidence of his goodness. These passages do not assert that God is good, but they assert, that he is proved to be so, by the works of creation and providence. Whatever difficulty therefore there may be, in making out the proof from this source, by logical reasoning, we have the testimony of God, that the evidence is conclusive; and this will satisfy all who receive the Scriptures as a revelation from God.

But, if the works of God referred to afford sufficient evidence of the goodness of God, to render men inexcusable for their ingratitude to him, then it is certain that the existence of sin and misery in the world, in all their extent, affords no proof to the contrary: or indeed any evidence at all, which can have any weight; for if it does, it must destroy the evidence which is shown to be conclusive. Satisfactory proof cannot exist on the opposite sides of a question; of course where one side is proved, the other has no proof at all. We may be certain then, that if God is proved to be good from the works which have been considered, there can be no evidence at all of the contrary, from the existence of sin or misery, or from any other quarter.

But it may be useful just to mention some of the reasons of this.

1. Sin proves nothing against the goodness of God. This affection of heart is in itself wrong and hateful. It is opposed to the general good; but the evil of it lies wholly in its nature; it is the affection of the sinner; we need only look upon it to discern its nature and to pronounce it wrong and hateful; we can argue nothing from its nature, to the nature of its cause. If God can, in his treatment of the sinner, either in his condemnation and punishment, or in his pardon and salvation, display his own glory and promote the general good, which must be admitted to be possible, then his regard to the general good, or his holiness itself will ensure its existence. In order then to prove that the existence of sin makes any thing against the goodness of God, it must be demonstrated, that God himself cannot over-rule it for the display of his glory, or the happiness of his creatures.

2. Natural evil or pain and misery, which prevail in the world, prove nothing against the goodness of God. 1st. Because all men as sinners or violators of God's law deserve all the pain and misery which they suffer in this life, and much more. Whether every one is sensible of this or not is immaterial; it is sufficient, that full proof of this may be produced to every candid and inquiring mind. The divine law is inscribed on the heart of every man; the untutored savage discerns as perfectly between right and wrong as those who enjoy revelation: All men are conscious of having violated this law; they do that themselves which they condemn in others and so are self-condemned; they know, or might know, that the judgment of God is according to truth against such as work iniquity; and have no reason to expect to escape his judgment themselves. 2d. Because the system of divine operation is not yet fully unfolded to the view of creatures; it is yet in a state of progression, and it cannot reasonably be pronounced imperfect or defective, before it is entire. We ought, in this weighty affair, to judge nothing before "the time, until 'the Lord come, who will bring to 'light the hidden things of darknesses."

But to advance one step further. It is believed, that the existence of sin and suffering in the world is so far from proving any thing against the goodness of God, that it increases the evidence in its support. 1st. Of suffering. If it be admitted that men are sinners and guilty before God, and that they have the means, in all conditions, of knowing this; it will follow of course, that their sufferings, whether viewed as penal or corrective, display the divine goodness. He that spareth the "rod 'hateth his son, but he that loveth 'him, chasteneth him betimes." Common sense always decides in favor of the father who suitably corrects his stubborn child; and pronounces it to be an unequivocal act of goodness; it equally pronounces in his favor, who disinherits, and casts out of his family and protection, the child who proves obstinate and irreclaimable. The judge who, with inflexible severity, pronounces sentence of death upon the murderer, legally convicted, gives evidence of his goodness to all impartial men; or, which is the same thing, shows his regard to justice and righteousness; and his heart is in the sentence, in proportion as he regards the interests of society. The application is obvious.

But to illustrate this truth in a few particulars. Part of the pain which we endure is premonitory. We come into the world in a feeble, helpless state; we have every thing to learn by experience; we are at first wholly unacquainted with the nature of surrounding objects; we learn their nature by the pleasure or pain which they give; the flame of a candle is a pleasing object of sight to the infant child, he reaches forth his hand to grasp it, and learns its nature by the exquisite pain it excites; he has innumerable falls while learning to walk, and finds by experience what dangers he is to shun; and all this he acquires, under the tutelage of the fond parent, without any serious hazard; and gradually becomes acquainted with the objects around him, and his relation to them, so as to guard himself from mischief. Now does it not evince the goodness of the universal Parent, that he has established a law of nature so effectual to guard us from objects which are calculated to destroy the body? Will it be asked, could not God have made us mature and perfect at first? The answer is, it does not appear but he had good reasons for making us as we are; it is enough, if his parental care is conspicuous in our preservation, even in the pain which his laws create.

When we are guilty of conscious wickedness we feel the twinges of remorse; this constitution of God proclaims his goodness; it is the monitory voice of God to the sinner; its language is, this conduct will end in ruin, in never-ending woe; repent; avoid it in future as you tender your eternal interest. Be it so, that the pain of remorse is extreme, and sometimes even intolerable; yet it proves the goodness of God various ways; it shows that God hates and avenges wickedness; it is a foretaste of the eternal retribution of impenitents; it restrains all men more or less from sin; it saves, thro' the grace of God, many souls from death, and it keeps the earth from being filled with violence.

Part of our sufferings is for correction and in judgment. The Psalmist tell us, "The Lord is known by the judgment which he executeth." But in what character? Doubtless in his true character, as a righteous governor, and the fountain of good. This passage of sacred scripture is a full proof, to such as acknowledge its divine authority, of the point in question; and shows, that the moral perfection or goodness of God is displayed in all the various evils he brings upon the world, as well as in giving rain from heaven and fruitful seasons.

Some of the most memorable judgments of God upon a sinful world have been recorded in history, both sacred and profane. The universal deluge which swept the world of all its inhabitants, except Noah and his family, has been considered by all succeeding ages and nations, to whom the event has been handed down, by revelation or tradition, as a judgment of God upon the world for their wickedness. And though many, especially in these last days are willingly ignorant that this was by the word or appointment of God, yet the great and awful event has gloriously declared the divine righteousness, and has been a great restraint upon the lusts of men in every age. The destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah, by a storm of fire and brimstone from the Lord out of heaven was a most signal exhibition of the wrath of God against those cities, for giving themselves over to fornication, and going after strange flesh; and they are set forth for an example, suffering the vengeance of eternal fire. We find that the terror of the Lord was upon the nations of Canaan many years afterwards. Had it not been for this awful event the iniquity of the Amorites would probably have been full long before the appointed time, which did not happen till more than four hundred years afterwards. Doubtless it was a powerful mean of restraining the wickedness of the neighboring nations, for ages; and of preserving the church of God in the world; nor has it lost its efficacy to the present day. The terrible judgments of God executed upon Pharaoh and the Egyptians, ending in the destruction of Pharaoh and his host in the Red Sea, for their rebellion and hardness of heart, and, not long after, upon the nations of Canaan, have gloriously shewn his power and declared his name throughout all the earth; and the happy effects of these memorable judgments, which have been mentioned, will be felt to the end of time.

The excision of the Jewish nation, after they had filled up the measure of their fathers, in crucifying the Lord of Life; and the awful judgments, temporal and spiritual, which have followed that people ever since, as well as their miraculous preservation in their dispersion throughout the whole earth, are events, which have many ways contributed to the honor of God, to the preservation and enlargement of the true church, to the increase of divine knowledge, to the fulfilment of the scriptures, and to prepare the way for a most glorious display of divine mercy to them and to the world, at the period, fast approaching, when the knowledge of God shall cover the whole earth.

The destruction of Antichrist, which has, in part been accomplished by the bloody wars which have, since the reformation, desolated Europe, and especially by the late infidel-war, the object of which has been to extirpate from the earth whatever bears the name of Christian, will, in its progress, be total and complete, and so terrible, as to be a fit symbol of the day of judgment: yet in full view of it, the holy inhabitants of heaven are represented as uniting in solemn praise to God, saying, Alleluia, for the Lord God omnipotent reigneth. They viewed it at once as a work of righteousness and of mercy.

The foregoing examples are adduced because they are among the principal judgments which God has seen fit to inflict on a wicked world; not because there is any thing peculiar in them to support the present argument; for all the judgments of God display his mercy and his justice as well as these: they are indeed works of mercy, as much as the giving of rain from heaven and fruitful seasons. The whole of the cxxxvi. Psalm is taken up in recounting God's works of mercy. The Psalmist calls upon men to give thanks for various mercies in creation and providence; among which are the following.

"To him that by wisdom made the heavens : for his mercy endureth for ever. To him that stretched out the earth above the waters : for his mercy endureth for ever. To him that made great lights, &c. To him that smote Egypt in their first born : for his mercy endureth for ever. To him that overthrew Pharaoh and his host in the Red Sea : for his mercy endureth for ever. To him that slew famous kings : for his mercy endureth for ever. Sihon king of the Amorites : for his mercy endureth for ever. And Og the king of Bashan : for his mercy endureth for ever." Here God's smiting Egypt in their first born, his overthrowing Pharaoh and his host in the red sea, and his slaying the kings there mentioned, are celebrated, as works of mercy or goodness, as much as his creating the heavens and the earth ; the sun to rule by day, and the moon and the stars to rule by night.

2d, Of sin.—If the sufferings which God brings upon men, whether corrective or penal, display his mercy and goodness, as well as his righteousness, then it is certain, that sin equally displays it : because it is the ground of correction and punishment, without which, neither of them can possibly exist. If sin were any reproach to God's government, taking place as it must through his directing providence, it never could be an act of justice, much less of goodness, to punish or even to correct it. If then to correct or punish sin be an act of justice and goodness in God, as has been shown, its existence can be no reproach to him ; but, on the contrary, is just as essential, as such act of justice and goodness.

With this agree the words of inspiration. "Surely the wrath of man shall praise thee : the remainder of wrath shalt thou restrain." On this it is obvious to remark, that the wrath of man is the sin of man ; that God controls and limits it as he sees fit ; and that all the wrath, or sin that takes place shall praise him ; it shall not only not dishonor, it shall praise, it shall glorify him, not that its nature is to praise him, but he will glorify himself in counteracting its tendency, in showing his wrath and making his power known on the vessels of wrath ; and in making known the riches of his glory, on the vessels of mercy.

The sum of the argument is this ; conclusive evidence of the goodness of God arises from the general frame of nature, and the stated course of events resulting from the laws of nature ; the objection which is by many urged against this, that the existence of sin and suffering annihilates this evidence, is wholly unfounded, and on the contrary, their existence is so far from annihilating or diminishing the evidence of this truth, that it serves greatly to increase it.

Before I proceed to what I have further in view on this subject, I shall submit the following remarks.

1st, The opinion that the works of creation and providence afford no proof of God's goodness or moral rectitude, while it professes to pay homage to revelation, really tends to subvert it. For suppose we are satisfied that the Bible, in distinction from all other books, is a revelation from God ; still what evidence have we that the things asserted in it are true. Truth is essential in a good character ; and therefore if we have no evidence that God is good, we have no evidence that he is true ; or that his word may be depended on ; when we come then to read the Bible, as a revelation from God, we can have no just prepossessions in its favour, that it is either good or true. When we read in it, that it is impossible for God to lie, it would be reasonable for us to suspend our assent till we had some further proof of it than his own word : for certainly, where there is no evidence that a being is good, there is no evidence that his word is true. If, indeed, we find by experience, or the testimony of others, that God has been, as far as hitherto observed, faithful to his word, in fulfilling his promises and threatenings, and in verifying his predictions, we have so far evidence of his truth, but the nature of the evidence is no higher, than of that which we may have of the truth of a fellow creature, though it will indeed rise much higher in degree, in proportion as it has been invariable for many thousand years. If we have found a man to be uniformly true, for many years, we have reason to rely on his word ; still it is not impossible but he may lie ; and if God has always been found to be true, from the beginning, he is worthy of trust and confidence in proportion : still, I do not see how it can be said, that it is impossible for God to lie, if we have no proof of his truth but what results from experience ; if it be impossible, it is because it is absurd and self-contradictory, and if this be the case, it must result from immutable rectitude of nature. On the ground I oppose the evidence of God's truth has been constantly increasing from the beginning, and will increase, if his truth continue, to the end. In this view of the matter, the antediluvians were less to blame in not believing God than we are, in proportion as they had less experience of his truth. It seems however that God saw their wickedness to be great enough to call for their utter destruction. Our first parents would have had the least reason of all to believe the word of God, were it not that they could not object to the goodness and truth of God, the existence of sin and misery in the world ; as, in the opinion of some, it seems they might after they had sinned, and as all their posterity may. That the holy scriptures rightly understood fully prove the goodness of God is granted ; but they prove this not as the mere word of a being, of whose moral character we have no knowledge from any other source, but as a work of transcendent greatness and excellence. It proves its author is divine as the heavens and the earth do ; the nature of the proof is the same in both cases ; the only difference is, that the proof from the scriptures is more illustrious and abundant ; the reasoning is from the effect to the cause. But if there is abundant proof from the scriptures as a great and glorious work, of the goodness of God, it may be demanded, how the argument which denies, that the work of creation and common providence afford this proof, tends to subvert the scriptures ? To this the answer is, if the argument is conclusive in the case in which it is urged, it will be equally so, to set aside the proof of God's goodness from divine revelation. The argument is, creation and common providence afford no proof of the goodness of God, because of the existence of sin and misery in the world. But if this have any weight, it will have equal weight against the proof resulting from revelation ; for, tho' this has brought life and immortality to light, yet it has also revealed that both sin and misery will be eternal, and in a sense infinite, and that myriads of God's rational offspring, both angels and men, shall be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of his power. This awful truth, which the Bible reveals, is the main reason why men disbelieve and reject the Bible. They cannot feel it to be just and good in God to inflict eternal torments on the creatures he has made. If it should be said, that men would not object to this, if their hearts were right towards God; and that their objections are always removed, when they are renewed by divine grace: The answer is, their objections are, in such case, equally removed which arise from the sin and misery, they see in this world, and they can and do see the glory of God in the sun, the moon, the stars, the earth, the sea, the winds, the rain, and, in a word, in that fulness of good which God has provided for all creatures, suited to their respective natures, and by which he satisfies the desires of every thing which has life, as well as in the gospel of Christ. 2d, It confirms the truth contended for, that the Bible presupposes us to have the knowledge of God, and it opens upon us accordingly "In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth." And God frequently appeals, in the scriptures, to the common sense of men, to judge of his conduct, in his treatment of them. As in Exekiel xviii. 25. Hear now, O House of Israel, is not my way equal? Are not your ways unequal? When a righteous man turneth away from his righteousness, and committeth iniquity, and dieth in them, for his iniquity that he hath done, shall he die. This appeal certainly supposes they were capable of judging, whether God's ways would be equal or not in condemning the sinner to death, and also that they knew his so doing would be equal. If it should be said, that they enjoyed revelation, and therefore were better capable of judging than others, it may be replied; that according to St. Paul, the Heathens always knew that they who commit iniquity are worthy of death; and that the judgment of God against such is according to truth. 3d, It is a great advantage, after being satisfied that a book, which claims to be a revelation from God, is indeed so, to commence and prosecute the study of it, with a certain persuasion that God is essentially and immutably holy and true; for, in that case, we have only to learn its true meaning, or what it contains, to receive it with all readiness of mind, and, in things which are above our comprehension, to bow our reason to the testimony of God; knowing, that nothing can be more certain than this, that it is impossible for God to lie.

OMICRON.

(To be continued.)

Doctrine of election the only just ground of encouragement to the use of means.

NUMBER II.

(Continued from p. 373.)

1 Tim. ii. 10. "Therefore I endure all things for the elect's sakes, that they may also obtain salvation."

HAVING shewn, in a preceding number, that the doctrine of election afforded no reason, why ministers of the gospel should not faithfully preach and instruct, and people seriously hear and attend upon the means of grace; it is now proposed to evince, that this doctrine is in fact the only just ground of encouragement, which either ministers or people have to pay any attention to divine things.

As the impenitent are dead in sin and enemies to God and holiness; so they will never repent and cordially embrace the gospel, unless influenced by the spirit of God—It is therefore declared, that no man can go to Christ, except the Father draw him—that Paul planted, Apollos watered, but God gave the increase—that Christians are God's workmanship, and that he worketh in them both to will and to do. Such passages plainly teach, that ministers depend wholly upon God for success in their preaching. If therefore he had not eternally determined to render the gospel and means of grace effectual to awaken and bring a number to repentance, or thus elected some; there would not be the least encouragement to preach, warn, and instruct mankind in divine things. For all these means, without the attending influences of God's spirit, would be wholly ineffectual to dispose a single individual to become holy, or comply with the terms of salvation. Yea, no human power or means can renew a depraved heart, or bring persons to evangelical repentance. Had God therefore elected none to salvation, it is certain, that none ever would repent and be saved.

The only just ground of encouragement then, which any can have to preach the gospel, is the doctrine of election, or the divine determination to render such means efficacious in quickening and bringing some to faith and holiness. Were it not for this, all ministers, who believe the scriptures, and are acquainted with their own hearts, would wholly despair of all success in preaching the gospel.

This doctrine is also the only just ground of encouragement, that any person can have to pay any attention to the means of grace. Had not God, of his mere grace and mercy, determined to render these means effectual to the salvation of some, none would ever have been saved; and so there would have been no encouragement to attend upon any means. But since God has determined to make the means of grace efficacious in awakening and saving some in every age; there is now great encouragement seriously to attend upon them, and make divine things our highest concern; as this is the way in which persons are generally brought to repentance, and is the most probable method of obtaining salvation.

How great then the mistake of those, who object, that the doctrine of election renders the means of grace of no advantage, and tends to discourage a serious attention to divine things? This, we see, is so far from being the case, that it is on the contrary the only foundation of hope for depraved sinners, and so affords them the only just ground of encouragement to attend to the means of salvation.

Were it not for this doctrine, sinners under a just conviction of their depravity and opposition to God would be in total despair. For when by the convicting influences of the holy spirit they are brought to a just sense of their character, and feel, that they are dead in sin, and their carnal mind is enmity against God; they are then sensible, that they have nothing to commend themselves to the divine favor—that they shall never go to Christ in faith and love, unless drawn by the Father, and that God might in justice leave them to go on in sin to everlasting destruction. And in this view of their situation, their only ground of hope is in the sovereign electing grace of God—that he, of his mere mercy, has determined to awaken, renew, and save some guilty unworthy sinners, and that therefore he may have mercy upon such great sinners, as they feel themselves to be. But did they suppose, that God would never forgive any, till they had done something good or holy to commend themselves to his favor, or till they were of themselves disposed to repent and cordially believe in Christ; they would be thrown into utter despair. Hence it is, that sinners, under deep and genuine conviction, so generally fall into the doctrine of election, which they are before so inclined to deny and oppose. They then see it to be their only ground of hope.

The subject suggests a number of important remarks, some of which will be noticed.

1. It appears, that the doctrine of election is a very important and useful truth, which ought frequently to be held up to view in preaching the gospel. This is evident from various considerations. It was frequently taught by the Lord Jesus, and his apostles, which shews that they considered it as an important doctrine, useful and necessary to be inculcated. Preaching the doctrine of election or the sovereignty of God brings his real character into view, that all may examine, whether they are cordially reconciled to it; and thus it has a tendency to convince formal hypocrites and careless sinners of their opposition to God. For if they are opposed to the sovereignty or electing grace of God, it manifests, that they are enemies to his true character, and under his wrath; and so tends to convince them of guilt and danger. It has a peculiar tendency to shew mankind their real character and situation—strip them of their self-righteousness and self-dependence, make them sensible of their dependence upon the mere mercy of God, and thus prepare them to receive Christ and the grace of the gospel. This doctrine also affords the only just encouragement for ministers to preach, and people to pay any serious attention to the means of grace, and is necessary to prevent sinners under a true conviction of their guilt and depravity from utter despair. These considerations shew, that it is a very interesting and useful doctrine, and that it ought to be plainly held up to view in preaching the gospel.

How great then the mistake of those, who, altho they allow the truth of this doctrine, yet suppose it to be a hurtful and dangerous truth, which ministers ought seldom or ever to preach? Is it not highly impeaching the wisdom and goodness of God to suppose, that he has in his word so frequently and plainly revealed a truth, which is of a hurtful and dangerous tendency, and which preachers ought not to inculcate? Is it not presuming to know better, than the Lord Jesus and his inspired apostles, what truths are useful, and ought to be taught? Besides, the scriptures teach, that ministers are not to shun to declare all the counsel of God, whether the people will hear or forbear. Is it not then very wicked and presumptuous to object, that the doctrine of election, if true, is of a hurtful and dangerous tendency, and ought seldom or ever to be preached?

2. The doctrine of election is inseparably connected with regeneration or a divine influence in renewing the hearts of sinners. If God by his Spirit does renew the heart of his people, and make them willing in the day of his power, as the scripture declares; then it is certain, that he has determined, whose hearts he would renew, and whose not. And this his determination must be eternal, since he is unchangeable in his purposes and designs, and known unto him are all his works from the beginning. If then we allow, that regeneration is the work of God's Spirit, which no real Christian can deny; we must also allow the doctrine of election, which is inseparably connected with it. Then the denial of election necessarily involves the denial of regeneration, which is the foundation of all real religion in the hearts of depraved sinners.

3. Since the doctrine of election is so plainly and frequently taught in the word of God, and is so inseparably connected with the great essential truths of the gospel; is it not very wicked and presumptuous to oppose and revile it with such bitterness, as many do? Many openly declare, that if this doctrine is true, God is a partial, unjust, unreasonable Being—that they will not acknowledge any such God, and use many other hard and bitter expressions against it—Yea, some are so opposed to the sentiment, that they can hardly bear to hear it mentioned without being offended. But since none can deny, that this doctrine is frequently taught in the scriptures—that most when awakened and renewed, do at once embrace it, and that this is often the case with those who were bitter opposers, while unawakened; ought not these considerations to render persons very cautious of bitterly opposing and reviling this sentiment; lest haply they be found fighting and speaking against God? For if it is a scripture truth, their opposition and reviling are directly against God, and their mouths are against the heavens. They should remember, that the Lord Jesus is coming with ten thousands of his saints to execute judgment upon all, and to convince ungodly sinners of all their hard speeches, which they have spoken against him.

A bitter opposition against this important doctrine, so plainly taught in scripture, affords a degree of evidence, that those persons have never become cordially reconciled to the divine character or the truth of the gospel.

4. It appears from our subject, that those, who are opposing the doctrine of election, or the sovereign grace of God in renewing and saving sinners, are opposing the only just ground, on which any of mankind can hope for salvation. Could they overthrow this truth, and establish the sentiment, that God had chosen none in particular to salvation, and would not renew any, till they had done something to procure his favor, or render themselves worthy of his grace, it is certain from scripture, that none would ever be renewed or saved. Thus the opposers of this truth are foolishly laboring to overthrow the only ground of hope for fallen man; and could they really destroy this truth, as they wish, they would ensure the eternal destruction of the whole human race.

5. A just statement of the doctrine of election shews at once the absurdity of the objection, that persons will be saved, if elected; whether they attend to divine things and the duties of religion, or not. Election is God's determination to render divine truth efficacious in awakening and bringing a certain number to repentance, faith, and a serious attention to the duties of religion, that they may in this way obtain salvation. Since therefore election is the divine determination, that a number shall obtain salvation, by repenting and forsaking sin, believing in and obeying Christ, and living in a careful observance of religious duties; how absurd and contradictory to assert, that any can be saved, whether they comply with these conditions, or not; and that it is no advantage to attend to these means? This is as absurd as to assert, that if it is determined, that a certain number, unknown to us, shall live 80 years by means of temperance; they will certainly live this time, whether they are temperate or not, and therefore there is no advantage in endeavoring to preserve our lives these 80 years by means of temperance.

In both these cases, the divine determination renders the means necessary to obtain the end. It is therefore as impossible for any to obtain salvation without repentance and a serious attention to divine things; as it would be to live eighty years without temperance, when this was to be the means of preserving our lives so long. The more temperate a person was in this case, the greater would be the probability of his living these eighty years. So the greater sense persons have of their sin and danger, and the more attentive they are to their eternal concerns, the greater is the probability of their salvation.

6. The doctrine of election gives none any just occasion to charge God with partiality, as some imagine. As all mankind are sinners, so all justly deserve destruction—And as none will ever go to Christ for salvation, unless drawn by the Father; so God might in justice leave all to go on in sin to eternal ruin. He has therefore a just right to bestow his grace upon one and not upon another, as he sees best. And by sending his Spirit to awaken and renew some, he does no injury to those who are left to follow their own sinful inclinations, and thus go to destruction. Those, who are thus left, will never suffer any thing more than they justly deserve, and therefore have no reason to complain of any injustice.

Neither does the doctrine of election afford any just excuse to any for neglecting divine things, or living in impenitence. The calls, warnings, and invitations of the gospel are to all—"God now commandeth all men every where to repent" The language of his word is to all, "Turn ye, turn ye; for why will ye die?" "Whosoever will, let him take the water of life freely." There is no obstacle in the way of our going to Christ and obtaining salvation, but what arises from our own wicked opposition of heart. God's determination to send his Spirit to awaken and bring some to repentance, does not at all prevent others from repenting, if disposed. It is still true, "Whosoever will, let him come, and take the water of life." If any therefore, who enjoy the gospel, perish; it will be through their own neglect and opposition, or because they will not go unto Christ, that they may have life.

Finally, how unreasonable and dangerous for any of us to be neglectful of divine things, and our eternal concerns.

Our situation in the present world is very solemn. We have begun an existence, which will never end. Before us lies everlasting happiness or misery. Yes, we shall in the eternal world be forever rising in glory and felicity, or sinking deeper and deeper in woe and despair. And upon the improvement of the present life, our eternal welfare depends. We have now a space given for repentance, — a season allotted us to prepare for eternity. The terms of salvation are irreversibly fixed. We must repent, forsake our sinful practices, cordially receive Jesus as our Saviour, yield a careful obedience to the divine commands, and make religion our highest concern, or we can never obtain salvation. For without faith, repentance, and holiness, it is certain, that none can be admitted into heaven, or enjoy its holy happiness.

The means of salvation are appointed, and many motives set before us to awaken our attention to divine things, and to excite us to secure our eternal interests. God hath favored us with his word, and the preaching of the gospel to instruct us in the truths and duties of religion, and to remind us of its infinite importance. He sends his ministers to pray us in Christ's stead, "Be ye reconciled unto God." He has instituted the holy sabbath for the express purpose, that we may have opportunities of attending to our eternal concerns. He is also calling up our attention to these things by the strivings of his Spirit, by sickness, and by deaths of others around us. All these things conspire to urge us to make divine things our chief concern, and to lay up our treasures in heaven. But if we make light of religion and its duties, misimprove the sabbath, neglect a preached gospel, and live in impenitence; we shall treasure up wrath against the day of wrath, and bring upon ourselves an aggravated condemnation. It will then be justly said unto us, "Because I have called, and ye have refused; I will also laugh at your calamity, and mock, when your fear cometh." "Then shall they call upon me, and I will not answer." Our probationary state is hastening to a close, and at furthest will soon be gone. How soon we may be arrested by the stroke of death—be summoned to meet our judge, and receive our final sentence, we know not; for in such a day as we think not, the Son of man cometh. How infinitely important then, that we "work out our own salvation with fear and trembling, and give all diligence to make our calling and election sure."

H. E.

FOR THE CONNECTICUT EVANGELICAL MAGAZINE.

Thoughts on the forgiveness of sin.

FORGIVENESS, as exercised towards some of our rebellious race, is a wonderful act of God. It is always a display of unmerited and sovereign good will. No one can be a subject of forgiveness, unless he is viewed as having previously done wrong; and, when forgiven, it is supposed he is treated altogether better than he deserves. It would be absurd to talk of forgiving an innocent person. When a parent forgives a child, it is always supposed that the child has been disobedient, and has merited some kind of punishment or correction. When the criminal, under sentence of death, receives from his sovereign a pardon, this pardon does not imply an extenuation of his guilt, nor that the sentence of death was too severe; but it necessarily carries with it an idea that he was deserving of all the evil expressed in the sentence, and also that it was an act of mere mercy in his sovereign, that the sentence was not executed.

Thus when God forgives sinners, who have been carrying on rebellion against him, and who are sentenced to eternal death by his holy law, it is not to be supposed he has seen any thing in them to lessen their criminality—their real desert. This is never the ground of forgiveness—nay, to admit this would destroy the very idea of forgiveness. If criminality and desert of punishment are not seen in the sinner the very moment he is forgiven, there is no grace, no mercy, in the act of forgiveness; for there is nothing to be forgiven. When God forgives sinners, he forgives them as being vile, polluted creatures, and deserving nothing better than to be punished with everlasting destruction from his presence and from the glory of his power. The more sinful and vile they are, the greater and more astonishing is the display of God's mercy in their being forgiven. This idea is very clearly communicated by the divine Saviour. In the course of his ministry, he went, by special invitation, into the house of a Pharisee, and sat down to meat. While at the table, a woman who had been a notorious sinner, placed herself at his feet, and began to wash them with tears, and to wipe them with the hairs of her head; and she kissed his feet, and anointed them with a precious ointment. This filled the mind of the Pharisee with indignation, because the woman was a great sinner. He was a poor, self-blinded man, and had no idea of the nature of forgiveness. The divine Saviour was sensible of his case, and undertook to instruct him, by calling his attention to a story. "There was a certain creditor (said he) which had two debtors; the one owed five hundred pence, and the other fifty. And when they had nothing to pay, he frankly forgave them both. Tell me, therefore, which of them will love him most? The Pharisee answered and said, I suppose that he to whom he forgave most. And he said unto him, Thou hast rightly judged." From this representation of the nature of forgiveness, it appears that sinners have nothing to pay—nothing, by which they can lessen their criminality—nothing, by which they can purchase forgiveness, or which they can offer as the least consideration.

Seriously considered, it is astonishing that the salvation of men is not declared to be impossible. Blessed be God that he forgives sinners! Impressed with this thought, we view, we feel ourselves to be prisoners of hope.

To explain the nature of forgiveness, and to point out the foundation on which it is exercised, is the great subject matter of those who speak for Christ. It is the very essence of the gospel. The scriptures, however, will not warrant those, who are consecrated to give gospel-instruction, to say that God forgives all indiscriminately, without regard to their characters and conduct. It is clearly revealed in the scriptures of truth, that some of our race will be left to conduct in such a manner, as that they will never have forgiveness, neither in this world, nor in the world to come. This is expressly affirmed of Judas, the unhappy man, who was left to betray our Lord. "Good were it for that man, if he had never been born." The day is approaching, when mankind will be divided; as appears from the following passages—Matt. xxv. 46. "These shall go away into everlasting punishment: but the righteous into life eternal." Rev. xxi. 7, 8. "He that ever cometh shall inherit all things, and I will be his God, and he shall be my son. But, the fearful, and unbelieving and the abominable, and murderers, and whoremongers, and forcerers, and idolaters and all liars shall have their part in the lake which burneth with fire and brimstone: which is the second death."

If, therefore, forgiveness will not be extended to all the human race, what can be the ground of discrimination? And what are the conditions of forgiveness? In answer to these enquiries, it may be observed.

1. The ground of discrimination is the sovereign will and pleasure of God. "It is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, but of God that showeth mercy." When we read in the holy scriptures, as we certainly do, that some of our fallen race will be subjects of forgiveness, and that others will die in their sins, and never have forgiveness, we must ascribe this difference to the holy sovereignty of God. We ought to be satisfied with saying, "Even so Father, for so it seemeth good in thy sight." It is God, that holy God, who made all things, and who hath a right to all things, that maketh one to differ from another. The whole human race are sunk in iniquity, and God pardons as many as seemeth good in his sight. This is primarily the ground of that discrimination among men respecting forgiveness, of which the scriptures so abundantly speak. But justice to this important point requires that some farther observations be made to elucidate it.

2. God exercises forgiveness, not for the sake of the sinner, but for Christ's sake. The doctrine of the forgiveness of sin can never be consistently proclaimed, only in and through Jesus Christ. When the apostles preached forgiveness of sin, they always exhibited the merits of a Saviour as its sole ground. They represented him, as having magnified and made honorable the law which sinners have broken, and which, without his mediation, would have been an eternal bar in the way of their salvation. As to the forgiveness and salvation of sinners, Christ is the way, the truth and the life. He is all in all to them. That person, who has obtained the infinite blessing of having his sins forgiven, is wholly indebted to Christ for the bestowment of the favour. It came in and through him, and in no other way. The language of scripture is "He was delivered for our offences"—"He died the just for the unjust."

3. Forgiveness is extended to none who do not repent and believe. The gospel plainly states this as a condition of forgiveness. I would not be understood to mean, that repentance and faith are considered as meriting forgiveness. In atoning for the unholy, rebellious life of a sinner, repentance has no merit; not even the smallest degree. It has already been observed, that the merits of a Saviour is the sole ground of forgiveness. Notwithstanding this, the scriptures assure us that God will forgive none, while they continue in stupidity and rebellion. Sinners must turn unto the Lord by repentance, by breaking off from wickedness, and forsaking it, or they may never expect to be subjects of forgiveness. Those whom God forgives, he takes into his holy family; and it would be dishonourary to him to forgive any one, while he persists in his native stubbornness. Tho' Christ has died and made a full atonement, and though all who are forgiven, are forgiven wholly for his sake, yet it is never done, not even in one instance, unless the sinner exercises repentance. The sinner must himself be a proper subject of forgiveness,—he must possess a moral fitness for such a favor. He must leave the side of God's enemies, and take his place among his friends. Would our rulers proclaim a pardon for one, who had been guilty of treason against the government, while the person was yet carrying into execution his wicked and malicious designs? It could not reasonably be expected. No more can it be supposed that God will ever extend pardon to the sinner, while he persists in a life of sin. The condition of forgiveness, therefore, as the character of the sinner is respected, is repentance. A broken and a contrite heart God will not despise,

4. God forgives none, who do not themselves possess a spirit of forgiveness. On this the Saviour insisted in his public and private instructions. He taught, that if men hoped to be forgiven of God, they must learn to forgive one another. This thought he introduced in that excellent form of prayer which he gave his disciples. Forgive us our debts, as we forgive our debtors. This part of the prayer he was particular to explain and enforce immediately after he uttered it. "For if ye forgive men their trespasses, your heavenly Father will also forgive you. But, if ye forgive not men their trespasses, neither will your heavenly Father forgive your trespasses." Here a spirit of forgiveness is stated as a condition of being forgiven. It is a qualification no less requisite than repentance. If men do not possess this temper, they are morally unfit to be forgiven.—It has now been made to appear that the ground of discrimination among mankind, as to their being forgiven or not forgiven, is the sovereign will of God—that whenever God does forgive, it is wholly for Christ's sake—that he never forgives where there is no repentance—nor where there is not a forgiving temper.

The attentive reader, of this essay on forgiveness, will naturally infer, that the bestowment of pardon is very different from the palliation of a crime. Men in authority are prone to connive at wicked practices, which come within their cognizance. They sometimes do this, that they may avoid the trouble of a faithful discharge of duty, or that they may not risk their reputation and influence among the wicked, by properly executing the law. They palliate crimes, and let evil doers go unpunished. This, all will see, is very different from the bestowment of pardon. Pardon supposes a knowledge of iniquity, and bears testimony against it. Men in authority, who practise in this way, instead of being a terror to evil doers, as they ought to be, are partakers of their evil deeds. Parents are very apt to palliate the crimes of their children, and to excuse themselves from discharging the duty which God has enjoined upon them.—They connive at the first dawning of sin, and as their children progress in iniquity, they grow more fruitful in their excuses for them. This criminal indulgence of parents is not pardon—it has nothing of the nature of forgiveness. It is far from it. It is the covering over of iniquity, and is infinitely mischievous to the souls of their dear offspring. God never thus palliates sin, in any of his creatures—not in his own children. It is true he pardons, he forgives the very chief of sinners; but when he forgives, he does not make sinners feel that their crimes are small. He does not incline them to make the best of their case; but he brings their sins into light. He gives them conviction—he makes their hearts appear awful to themselves—he causes their wickedness to stare them in the face. The consequence is they do not feel, that they are better than others—that their sins are not very great, and that from this consideration they have some reason to expect pardon. When God forgives, he never causes sinners to have such feelings as these; for, with these feelings, they would not be in a situation rightly to appreciate the mercy of God in forgiving them. Therefore, it is usually the case, that sinners, before they become acquainted with the comforts of religion, have a season of conviction, and distress of mind. This prepares the way for them to have a more clear sight of the blessedness of those whose transgressions are forgiven.

H.

The agency of created unembodied Spirits, whether good or evil, on mankind in this world.

IN attending to this subject, it is not proposed to consider the case of demoniacs, nor of prophets, to whom the will of God has been revealed, by the ministry of angels. These are preter-natural: but to attend to the usual agency of such Spirits on men.

It is necessary that such agency be first proved, for the spirit of the age, in progressing towards infidelity, is leading many to question the agency of any invisible created beings with man, and to consider the idea romantic: even the pious do not, so much as formerly, attend to the subject.

Is it not an argument of some weight, in proof of the agency of such Spirits with us, that their existence is revealed? If they had no intercourse with us, and we no concern with them, the knowledge of their existence would perhaps be useless; and if so it is not reasonable to suppose that it would have been revealed, any more than the existence and circumstances of the inhabitants of the planets, if, according to analogical arguments, there are any such. If it be objected, that we have no organs, by which such spirits can have access to our minds, it is sufficient to observe, that the objector will doubtless candidly confess, that he does not so fully understand the structure of the mind, nor that of created spirits, as to have sure grounds of confidence that his objection is well founded. It is reasonable to believe that unembodied spirits have some means of intercourse with each other, and therefore corporeal organs in their situation are not necessary to mutual intercourse, and can we conceive of any thing to prevent their having some similar way of access to us?

Besides: The general dependence of one part of God's works upon another, as far as our acquaintance extends, renders it at least probable, that there is some communication with those spirits. But the holy scriptures furnish us with full evidence.—Respecting the agency of evil spirits, we are informed, that Satan worketh in the hearts of the children of disobedience,—blindeth the minds of them that believe not,—filled the hearts of Annanias and Saphira to lie to the Holy Ghost,—entered Judas the apostate.—sent his messenger to buffet Paul,—and even tempted Christ himself. On this account men are warned by the scriptures to take heed that they do not fall into the snare of the Devil, and are directed to resist the Devil, with assurance that then he will flee from them.—Since evil spirits have such an agency on men, it is but reasonable to suppose, that good spirits have at least an equal agency, and the scriptures confirm the idea. They inform us, that God giveth his angels charge over his saints, to keep them in all their ways,—that they are ministering spirits, sent forth to minister to them who shall be heirs of salvation. I pass over the numerous instances in which they have been commissioned to bear the special messages of God to Lot, Manoah, Mary, the shepherds and others. It is presumed the agency in question is proved.

The nature of their agency will be next considered. Unembodied spirits do not act immediately on the hearts and affections of mankind. No created being, whether in the body or out, is able to do this. It is the prerogative of God alone. If they affect the heart, it is indirectly by motives. Nor do they ordinarily act on the understandings of men, so as to reveal to them things of which they were ignorant. It is true they have been sent by express commission to give revelations from God, as Gabriel to Mary, &c. yet we have no evidence that they ordinarily have a natural power to do this, and it is certain, that nothing of this nature commonly takes place.

But the agency of such spirits appears to be wholly on the imagination, and is effected by suggesting thoughts to our minds, and placing them in true or false colors, adapted to influence us to duty or wickedness. Evil spirits, in this way, practise their wiles to lead men into sin, as Satan tempted David to number Israel,—and Annanias and his wife to lie to the Holy Ghost; or to distress Christians, as in the case of the messenger of Satan to buffet Paul. This also takes place in the infidel and blasphemous thoughts suggested to the mind, by which people of eminent piety have been sometimes fearfully harassed.—On the contrary, good spirits have a salutary influence on the people of God; for they have a charge over them, to keep them in all their ways, lest at any time they dash their feet against a stone.

The suggestions of evil spirits are artful and insidious. Satan sometimes, that he may deceive, assumes the guise of an angel of light; and we read of the snares, wiles and devices of the Devil. He is called a deceiver and liar, and it is in the practice of these arts that he goeth about seeking whom he may devour. His subtily consists very much in adapting his suggestions to the circumstances, passions, leading objects and cast of mind, of such as he assails. He applied himself to the covetousness of Judas, Annanias and Saphira. He wrought upon the pride of David,—the fear of Peter, and he laid his temptations to ensnare our Lord by the most artful quotations of scripture, and by attempting to make him concerned to prove himself the Messiah, even to Satan, as if it were questionable. Saul of Tarsus was wrought upon by an application to his ambition, and by Satan's affecting the angel of light, to fan to a flame a false zeal for religion. To the gloomy, his temptations and suggestions are calculated to excite despondency,—and to the cheerful, levity. His suggestions inflame the lust, pride and avarice of such as are given by habit or constitution to these things. May I say, he presents himself as a magnifying glass between the imagination and the little objects of sinful pursuit, and enlarges them out of measure, and that he reverses it, to diminish the infinite motives to duty, and godliness, or throws in his suggestions to hide them from the view of the mind entirely; so that such as do not resist the Devil, but give heed to his illusions, are led astray by his fascinations? Thus he takes much the same methods, that artful and insidious men take, to ensnare and pervert people for their own purposes, by taking advantage of their circumstances, and every trait of their character and passions.—It is also reasonable to believe, that good spirits, like good men, suggest truth to the mind, and remove illusions, and false colorings, so far as men will attend to their suggestions, that they may confirm the people of God, and recover them from the snares of the Devil; so that he may not have dominion over them, and lead them captive at his will; and that it is in this way, that they keep the saints, that they should not dash their feet against a stone, so and they become ministering spirits to the heirs of salvation. Nor is it unreasonable to suppose, that while sinners are in probation, and are not judicially given over as reprobates, that good spirits urge upon them also, in the same way, the motives of the gospel, by suggesting to their minds a consideration of their importance. The Spirit of God is the great agent of sanctification, but how much we are indebted to good angels, for our seriousness, and preservation from sin, it is impossible for us to decide. God often uses their ministry.

If the above remarks are true, it will follow, that no created beings, good or evil, with or without bodies, can do us any moral good or hurt, any further than we voluntarily listen to their suggestions: Our hearts are beyond the coercive power of created beings. However guilty our tempters may be, they form no excuse to exonerate us from guilt.

The preceding remarks urge the importance of keeping our imaginations under the strictest discipline. These are too often neglected, and left entirely open and unguarded to the adversary: and it should be remembered, that this is giving him the only advantage which he desires, from which alone he can assail and ruin us. The imagination should be guarded with a jealous eye, be preserved chaste and pure, and be consecrated to God and duty. Men never can be very religious unless their imaginations are turned into holy meditations.

Further: If we would derive any benefit from those who are ministering spirits to the heirs of salvation, and appointed by God for this purpose, we must be concerned, carefully to cherish every scriptural motive to duty, which arises in our minds, whesher suggested by reading the scriptures, by Christian conversation, by our peculiar circumstances, by meditations, or by seeming accident; for it is by taking advantage of such occasions that these salutary suggestions are usually made to mankind.

We further remark, that men are not to think any better of themselves, because motives to religion frequently arise in their minds, nor any worse of themselves, on account of the most blasphemous suggestions made to their imaginations, from without, any further forth than they approve of them, or voluntarily admit them to remain, and have influence upon them.

Finally : the preceding observations should convince us, that no suggestions or impulses are a rule of action. They must be tried by the holy scriptures, or we run an infinite hazard. MIKROS.

MESS'RS. EDITORS,

YOUR plan comprises biographical sketches. The one now presented is submitted to your disposal. You may rest assured the writer has assumed nothing in his relation, but a different name from the real one of the person whom he describes ; and this for reasons too plain to mention.

EMILIA was born of reputable parents, and lived the most of her short life in one of the flourishing towns in Connecticut. Her father has long been improved in public life and enjoys a plentiful estate. Emilia from her infancy, was a child formed to gain attention—lively and quick in her imagination, she pleased her little acquaintances, and made them admire her. But especially she engaged the affection of her parents and older connections, whose breasts often heaved with a joyous sigh, in anticipation of her future brilliancy. In addition to her natural vivacity her figure was graceful, though rather slender—her skin transparent, tinged with the rose—her eyes and features expressive, and well animated, and her manners naturally easy and delicate. Having passed the days of infancy and childhood, her mind brightened with her years. Her education, though much short of what so promising a subject merited, was sufficient to lay open the qualities of her mind, and entitle her to some of the most flattering prospects in future condition and usefulness. Emerging from the confinements suitable to early life, and approaching the scenes of youthful amusement, her relish for those scenes soon became lively and predominant.—Until now, she did not either know or feel the commanding influence of her amiable endowments. And happy for thousands in like possessions had they never known them. But Emilia, sensible of these, vanity elated her heart. To dress, to visit, to be admired in the gay circle, the ball-room, and the pew, seemed to absorb all her thoughts. At length, being full of sensibility, and accustomed to adulation, pride naturally increased, and nothing fully pleased her. Ambition and ideas of elevated life raised her quite above the uncultivated and rude of every description ; and led her to seek for satisfaction among the delicacies of refined society. This taste carried her abroad frequently, to visit her kindred and friends in places of thick population and elegant manners. Her reception in those places was gratifying to her. The parties and circles into which she was invited viewed themselves complimented with her company, and paid her that attention, which marked both their sense of her merit, and the obligation conferred by her agreeable conversation. But even here, her felicity was incomplete. In the full tide of worldly joys, the soul of man does but seem to be refreshed : at the moment of highest enjoyment, it is most deceived, and soon alas ! the mighty void and deep chagrin are felt. This was the case with Emilia. Not satisfied with her own wishes, every amusement ended with a sigh. She conceived some imperfection in every pleasurable pursuit, which produced the alloy and blighted her expectations. This, as in all similar cases, only excited new and more ingenious efforts to extract the alloy: but by no means abated the fervor of pursuit after the ever illusive phantom which dazzled before her, called happiness. After five or six years of her youthful bloom had glided off; occupied in gathering all the innocent sweets of that vernal season; she found the accomplished Horatio, the friend and joy of her heart. He was respectable, affluent and well established in business. In the course of a few months, sufficient time had elapsed to come to a full explanation of their mutual regards and wishes—the consummation of their alliance was contemplated, and fixed. But here, I must begin the chilling passages of her exit. Her family inherited a constitutional tendency to that deleterious complaint, the consumption. Whether by taking cold, or otherwise, it is not certain, the symptoms of this disorder made their appearance. Emilia, thought but little of her real situation; and was by no means prepared for these gloomy forebodings!—Alas! how covertly, death approaches the young! Borne on the tide of youthful spirits and pursuits, they are prone never to suspect or fear this enemy, till embraced in his cold arms: then how sudden—how great—and eternal is the change they feel!! But Emilia had many premonitions of her departure. The first whispers of the last messenger were clear and distinct; but she could not hear—they were repeated and louder; but still, she could not hear. How could it be possible for a youth of her turn of mind—accomplishments—and prospects to be diverted from her innocent gaiety, her company, and above all her loved Horatio, by so dismal a call as that of death? No, she could not hear; but bid him pass, for she was preengaged. Her disorder in the course of twelve or fourteen months, made very sensible advances, and clearly portended what was to come. Her friends became very anxious. But Emilia could give no serious attention to her health. To yield to medical aid or direction, would be to confess herself sick. This was forbidding. Her indispositions would remit from time to time, and then she would resume again, her air of cheerfulness and keep her objects of pursuit in view. The time at length drew near which was contemplated, to complete her earthly felicity in ratifying her connection with her dearest beloved friend.—But, O what a prospect this! Yet resolved to pursue it—A prospect to pall the feelings of any but Emilia, and such as are deaf and blind to the approaches and warnings of eternity.—As if resolution would baffle omnipotence—or elude the grave! How futile—how deceived!—The propriety of forming the connection, under existing circumstances became a question with her parents, and others most interested. The result however issued in favoring the measure. Preparations accordingly were hastened as rapidly as convenient, for the celebration of the union.—It took place on a set day, with testimonials of joy, very gravely expressed.—The well chosen and costly furniture of Emilia was conveyed to the mansion prepared for her future residence. Her friends accompanied her thither; and the connections of her joyful Horatio gave her a very hearty welcome.

Introduced now, to the zenith of her wishes, what can be wanting to complete her Paradiſe? But alas! the ſecret tabes, ſteals upon her vitals, and turns every pleaſure into taſteleſs inſpidity. Still, ſhe dressed, ſhe went abroad, and at times affected cheerfulneſs, and would ſeem to imply ſhe was happy; but really enjoyed nothing.—At home the richeſt luxuries had no reſiſh—The ſilent night—or ſoſteſt down could give her no reſt. She received company—ſhe took the reviving anodyne, and exerted every nerve to beguile her feelings and enjoy her friends, and make them happy—but all was feigned—violence to nature, kept on the thin maſk of fashionable joy and ſatiſfaction. How pitiable was her caſe? Invited to her friendly circle, my eyes witneſſed with real pain, the conſiſt of her ſoul.—While nobly generous and anxious to maintain her dignity, and delight her gueſts, the purplè bluſh glowed in her pale cheek—her hollow accents betrayed her fatal malady—and the involuntary ſigh beſpoke the poignant anguiſh felt within. How vain to contend with death, or urge pre-engagements when he calls in earneſt!! Compelled to relinquish company and all its parade, ſhe retired to her apartment—ſought and obtained the beſt medical aſſiſtance—diſmiſſed domeſtic cares—ſaw nobody except a few ſelect friends, and took the air but ſeldom. Soon ſhe perceived that her phyſician, although he treated her tenderly, gave her only cordials, and entertained no idea of affording her any permanent relief. Her friends alſo conveyed their deſpondency in their attention and countenances—and Horatio's heart was ſmiten. It ſeemed now to be impreſſed upon her mind for the firſt time, that ſhe muſt die!—But O what a thought was this? It thrilled through and through her withering limbs!! Had the reſurrection trumpet ſounded, it could hardly have alarmed her more. “What; ſhe ſeemed to ſay; muſt this body ſoon be mouldering in the duſt! Theſe limbs which have been ſo much my idol! Yes, O yes, the unalterable decree is paſt!! But where will my ſoul appear? Am I ready for the judgment? to appear unclothed before God? No, no! I have whirled away my life, in the giddy mazes of worldly ambition, pleaſures and follies, and never ſpent a moment in employments conſonant to this hour, or a belief of eternity! To die as I am, how alarming! I already feel the condemning ſentence—I am loſt forever!! What can I do, what can I ſay!”—Reviving from the firſt ſhock of realizing her approaching diſſolution, ſhe betook herſelf to that long neglected book, the Bible: and read in it by turns very attentively. But ſuch a darkneſs covered it; having never looked into it with ſerious concern; that it ſeemed to do her but little good, and ſhe would ſoon lay it by again—She attempted to pray; but, neither did this afford her much relief; ſhe knew not God, nor felt any thing of him, but a ſenſe of his power and anger.—A dejection in her aſpect and manners became viſible—ſhe hinted to ſome of her moſt confidential friends, her apprehenſions. They endeavored to ſoothe her diſtreſs, but without effect. Her bodily complaints ſeemed almoſt forgotten, under the preſſure and affecting views of eternal realities. Even the ſcriptures themſelves, together with her heartleſs cries to God, did but augment her horrors, in diſcloſing to her, the depths of ſin in her own heart—and her loſt condition. In the courſe of a few days, the fashionable shame of appearing religious almost vanished. It was suggested to her, whether it would not be agreeable to see her minister? She consented. He was accordingly called—He came. But what could he do? She could not converse upon religion, for she had not studied it—and much less felt it. People of fashion must not know, or seem to know any thing about religion!! True indeed, Emilia had been brought up in a family, who venerated religion, and always respected the sabbath, according to custom, and attended the preaching of the word: But she had never seriously thought of these things as having any personal concern in them: here lay the difficulty. The clergyman, seeing her embarrassment conversed tenderly with her, but plainly—endeavored to lay open the extreme sinfulness of the human heart, and let her see, by plain inference that doubtless she had such an one by nature; and without repentance and renewing grace, salvation was impossible. She assented to his remarks with little or no reply.—It was mentioned by some one, that it would be agreeable to join with him in prayer—He gladly complied—The scene was truly affecting and I may add solemn almost as the entrance into eternity—He then withdrew with deep concern, but very slight impressions of the real state of Emilia's mind.—But here, reader, pause for a moment—if you ever knew the grace of God in truth—permit me to desire you; while your soul sits trembling for the fate of the distressed, the despairing Emilia; to fall down before that God, whose stupendous mercy, through the Saviour, wrests the souls of sinners from eternal flames; and with holy gratitude praise him, for his complete deliverance of this distressed soul!! Emilia is born again!! She who was dead now lives: who was lost, is now found!! But you wish to know the manner in which this grace appeared. After the solemn season to which we just referred, Emilia continued a number of days extremely anxious—struggling with fears of death, but more especially the dread of those endless torments which awaited her afterward in consequence of sin. Her sense of the entire justice of God in her condemnation, increased in proportion as her sins revived in her view, and silenced all her hard thoughts of God, although his anger appeared inevitable and intolerable. Notwithstanding she had never deviated in her conduct from the most rigid precepts of propriety in a worldly consideration, yet, at this time, she looked upon herself the most depraved, and sinful of all human beings; and could expect nothing but unutterable woe.—While revolving these things in her mind, and at times wrought up to high agitation, a delightful calmness took place—she felt relieved—her heart lost its hardness—its darkness in a measure vanished—She could say with feeling, God be merciful to me a sinner! It felt right to be in God's hands and at his disposal—now he appeared infinitely excellent and amiable every way considered—every thing put on another appearance. She knew not what to make of it: but was quite happy. This frame continued till next day. The Saviour, of whom she knew little or nothing before except the name, now appeared in Divine beauty, and to be the wisdom of God and the power of God to such as repent and trust in him. A new and unspeakably pleasant feeling sprung up in her heart towards God, and Christ, the law of God, the way of salvation, and divine truth in general. While she contemplated these things her soul was filled with comfort. Her heart was so full of joy, that she seemed to be compelled to entertain a gleam of hope for herself. But she dare not. Her sins looked worse than ever, and she did not know as she repented of them sincerely. She knew that pardon was promised through Christ, to penitents: but she had lost the sense of God's wrath, and her sins so far exceeded her repentance, that she doubted, whether she repented at all. But still, her heart grew warm, at every view of the Divine character—likewise the Saviour in all his offices, and the unfathomable grace manifested to sinners in his atonement. She felt as if she could rejoice in these things, whether pardoning mercy ever reached herself or not. While meditating upon these subjects, and drinking in the pleasure, she loathed herself on account of sin, and her heart prayed without ceasing. She told me on the third day after this pleasing alteration, "That she had enjoyed more real, solid satisfaction and pleasure, in the two preceding days than she had in all her life till that time." Directly upon this, her mind appeared to expand surprisingly, and comprise a general idea of the whole gospel scheme: and from her easy and ready reception of the word of life, it was manifestly an ingrafted word which was able to save the soul. She rested on the alone merits of the Saviour with the most entire confidence, as on the Rock of eternal safety, and her heart was, satisfied as with "marrow and fatness." About this time, prompted by impulses from her own breast, (for she told her friend afterwards she did not know that such a thing was customary) she wrote with her trembling hand the following short covenant and dedication of herself to God, and committed it to her confident to keep, as the only thing she was able to do for God, as a testimonial of her repentance and desire to glorify him on this side the grave—"O my Creator, and blessed Redeemer—Thou art all I love: all I adore: and whom I cannot cease to admire.—To thee I give up my Heart and Soul and all I have, (that is worthy of thee to accept) in a Covenant, never to be broken, nor forgotten, living or dying—And here I willingly, and with the most ardent love and sincerity, sign, this instrument. M..... Dec. 20, 179..."

While she was thus engaged in the concerns of her soul and eternity, and seemed scarcely to think of her bodily complaints, they made rapid advances in undermining her house of clay—it trembled to fall. She was soon confined to her room, and almost directly to her bed. It was suggested to her, whether she did not wish to profess Christ, and join herself to his visible kingdom before she left the world. "O yes, replied she, by all means if it can be done." It was mentioned to her, there was no difficulty in the way provided she wished it, and the church being notified had no objection. Accordingly a day was fixed upon, as soon as the prerequisites could be accomplished, for her admission. The time being come a few of the church attended—and after prayer, in which she appeared to have the greatest interest and sincerity while raised a little from her pillow she assented to a confession of faith and received the ordinance of Baptism—and gave up herself to her God and Saviour with unfeigned able satisfaction.—The very next day the trying conflict drew on. She felt her nature sinking—her bodily pains were keen and tormenting—she wished to join with her pious friends in prayer—and to plead for patience under her agonies.—Her heart rose in this exercise above her distresses, and she felt a sweet acquiescence in the divine will—resigned her body and soul and all which she had into the hands of God, and in a few moments was released from a world of sorrows to join in the song of the redeemed forever.—“Unto him that loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood—to him be glory and dominion forever and ever, Amen.”

The life and death of Emilia are replete with impressive instructions. The writer cannot forbear hinting a few particulars.

1st. The vanity of trusting to any external personal qualifications or circumstances to make us happy. Emilia shone in all these. Naturally bright in her intellects—refined in her taste and sentiments—easy in her deportment—reputable every way—and well endowed with the conveniences and even elegancies of life, it seemed as if she had nothing further to desire: But what of all these things? could they impart the rich boon of satisfaction? Surely no. An alloy and disappointment attended every attempt to fill with joy her immortal spirit. Every scene of fashionable amusement; however refined; carried this alloy with it, and ended in mortification. When most gratified she was most deceived and ultimately disappointed proportionably. But still, no disappointment dissuaded her from the pursuit. Her taste for worldly pleasure remaining lively, gave a spring to new, and as fruitless attempts to obtain it, in ceaseless rotation.

Now is not this the real state of all persons who depend upon their superior endowments and circumstances to make them happy?—Certainly it is. It is said of the Idolater* “He feedeth on ashes.” So does the idolizer of himself or the world. For the natural appetite to crave ashes, proves it disordered—while this disorder continues, let the person attempt ever so often to satisfy his cravings by receiving ashes, instead of food, he neither is satisfied nor refreshed—the consequences are his nature decays and his disappointment encreases. So in a moral view, to crave this world supremely proves our moral taste disordered; while this disorder continues, let us actually receive the good things of the world in their profusion, and with the most enlarged capacities to enjoy them, still we do but feed on ashes: our souls find out the deceit, and mortification ensues. If therefore the most flattering abilities and circumstances terminate thus—we must be convinced of the vanity of trusting to any of these things to give us felicity.

2. We are taught the danger which accompanies the possession of those superior gifts of nature and providence. They give their possessors an extended opportunity for indulgence—indulgence stupifies and hardens the heart, and leads on to the most astonishing temerity and presumption. Emilia, filled with her own consequence and the scenes of worldly amusement which invited her could not attend to so serious a subject as religion. Real piety in its angel form of meekness and humility, casts a check upon worldly pleasures. Emilia bated

* Isaiah xlv. 24.

this check—it seemed to reprove her in her innocent gratifications ; and she saw plainly that people in high life disregarded it entirely—excepting a very few. Religion therefore and the vast concerns of eternity were rejected from her thoughts. Let sabbaths and the most lucid truths of the gospel be presented to her, as often as they might, she seriously thought of none of these things—and presently, when walking on the brink of the grave and endless perdition for months, she could not more readily think of them. Nay, the course she pursued, indicated a determination to disregard all admonitions, and to put off death, by appearing totally deaf to all his calls, and engaged in other things. What stupidity ! what presumption ! Yet Emilia acted perfectly upon natural principles, and in unison with thousands. Superior abilities with opportunity for indulgence lead directly to this hardness of heart, and resistance of religion and eternal concerns. Where these unite in the higher walks of life, the restraints and checks of religion are treated with disdain, and as fit only for the weak and vulgar—The proud and hard heart can yield to no caution, administered by the teachings of God's word, or the admonitions of death. Arguments are lost upon these self-wise, elevated spirits. Their cheeks would burn with blushes, to appear as if they regarded the sabbath or piety, or Heaven or Hell, any further than common decency and custom warrant—and when the inexorable summons of death arrests them, they foolishly turn aside—bid him call again, and so think of something else ! !—How dangerous are elevated, un sanctified gifts.

3. The example before us presents an astonishing display, of the all-conquering power and grace of God—Consider Emilia in her disposition and habits of life—totally indisposed to reflect upon her future well being—and carrying her resolutions of worldly pleasure to the very confines of death and endless misery—Who can help shuddering for her fate ! ! But at this awful crisis, that almighty power which raised the Lord Jesus from the dead, and that grace which flows from his atoning blood reached her, and saved her with an eternal salvation. While Heaven resounds with Alleluias to sovereign grace, for this display of it ; O let christians universally join their feeble voices and swell the praise ! How many when they arrive at the trembling point, in which Emilia began to reflect, die as they have lived : and with the rich man lift up their eyes in torment—Their resolution is suffered to continue firm ; resisting with blind and unappalled audacity, the alarm of conscience and the terrors of death, till they sink, forever to eat of the fruit of their own ways and to be filled with their own devices !—This mere escape of Emilia, while it permits others in like circumstances to look to the same almighty power and grace in their extremity, yet, the multitudes who are left to pass stupid and blind into the quenchless lake, is a terrible admonition to them not to put off the concerns of their souls to this critical moment—Will you bear with me, to urge you to treat yourselves better, and never be so unwise as to think that by no concern you can overcome Omnipotence—out-brave death—or escape misery ! No. Treat yourselves better—yield to eternal wisdom—consider, embrace the Saviour and be happy.—Finally, The tranquil and joyful state of Emilia's mind after she experienced the power of religion naturally introduces a question to which youth of every grade, and all who are disposed to pursue worldly pleasures, are invited seriously to attend—viz. What there can be in the nature of religion which gave Emilia in her weak debilitated condition such pure delight and solid satisfaction, as to enable her to say, that she had enjoyed more of this, in two days, than in all her life till that time?—A sickly, decaying state is not a time to enjoy, on natural principles—but a season of languor and universal infelicity. Youth, and health and opportunities for gratification till the age of twenty-two, forms a period in which the most exquisite earthly pleasures may be tasted—Emilia had gone through this latter period previously to her decay, and relished every innocent amusement equally with any one. Now, hear her say on her dying bed, that in two days she had enjoyed more pure delight and solid pleasure, than in all her life before, and then think what there can be in the nature of religion to inspire this?—is religion vain?—Are you pursuing the right road to happiness!!!

NUNCIO.

TO THE EDITORS OF THE CONNECTICUT EVANGELICAL MAGAZINE.

GENTLEMEN,

Should you judge that the following account of some late revivals of religion in the State of Vermont, is calculated to edify the people of God, and subserve the interests of Christ's kingdom, you may give it a place in your excellent Magazine.

THE attention to religion, in Vermont, the year past, has been the most general in the north-west part of the state; in the counties of Addison, Chittenden and Franklin; other parts of the state, however, have been considerably favored with revivals. In these three counties, there are a number of wealthy, flourishing towns, but many of the settlements are in their infancy. There have been no very great revivals of religion in these counties since their first settlement; consequently they have but few Christians, churches, or houses of divine worship. The moral state of the inhabitants previous to the late religious attention, was similar to that in other new-settlements, where they do not enjoy the stated means of grace. There were a few excellent pious people scattered through the country, but the great body of the inhabitants were inattentive to the great concerns of eternity.

God has been preparing the way for this revival of religion, for many years. Missionaries and some stationary ministers, who have preached in this country, have not labored in vain; they have sowed the field which now produces a rich harvest. It is not uncommon to hear the converts of the last year, date their convictions to sermons, which they heard delivered years ago. Most of the preachers of the gospel, who have travelled through these counties, are cited by the people, as instruments of awakening some sinners. The progression of the work has been uncommonly gradual. It can only be said of the ministers who have preached in this field of labors the last year, that other men have labored, and they have entered into their labors.

In the summer of the year 1800, sinners began, in some places in this country, to make more than common enquiry about the things of religion; particularly in the towns of Essex and New-Haven. From that time serious inquiries respecting religion become more frequent and earnest; and the people of God were more given to prayer and other duties of religion; and there were frequently some hopeful conversions. The prospects continued favorable; and in the spring of the year 1801, the blessed work spread with light and power. Many sinners have been convicted of their lost state, and many it is believed, have come to a saving close with Christ.

The attention has been remarkable for its apparent genuineness. No irregularities, I think, can justly be charged upon it. Sinners under awakening have been convinced of their danger, of the divine rectitude, and of their lost state by nature. They have complained much of stubbornness of heart, and sometimes shown the most dreadful enmity against God, and the plan of salvation. When converted, they have spoken much of their sins against God, have appeared to loath themselves as sinners. A holy God, law and government, and all the great truths of the gospel have been exceedingly pleasant to their souls. At times they have been astonished at the method of salvation through a Saviour. God's works and ways have appeared new to them; they would say sometimes, I am in a new world; I can see the glory of God stamped upon the whole of creation. The Bible also appeared new to them; and by their attention to it, one would think, they thought every line of it was worth a mountain of gold. All have not been brought to Christ with equal clearness; there has been a great difference in this respect. Some have been under clouds, and gained evidence of their good estate by degrees; others have been admitted to broad day light at once, or seen Christ to be the desire of their souls.

The revivals in those counties have not been so general among the people, as they have been in some parts of our land, within a few years. That the reader may form a just idea of the extensiveness of the late revival, an account shall be given of all the Congregational churches in the three counties mentioned, and of the additions made to them the last year. The church in Cornwall consists of 132 members, 18 have been added within one year; the Rev. Benjamin Wooster is their pastor. The church in Bridport has 63 members; the Rev. Increase Groves is their minister; how many have been added to this church of late is not accurately known, they have shared in the late awakening. Middlebury church has 82 members, 53 have been added since the late revival; Mr. Atwater the President of the new College in that place, preaches for them; his labors have been hopefully crowned with success. The church in New-Haven has 49 members, 34 have been added since the late revival. Monkton church has 32 members; the church at Hinsburgh has 13; no additions have been made to either of late. Waitsfield church has 30 members, 9 added since the revival; the Rev. William Salisbury was ordained their minister in October last. The church of Waterbury was organized since the late revival, it now consists of 21 members. The church in Richmond was organized about the same time; it has fifteen members. Essex church has 44 members, 28 have been added since the late revival. Westford church has been formed since the late revival; it now consists of 34 members. The church in Georgia has 41 members, 22 have been added since the late revival. Swanton church has been formed since the late revival, it has now 25 members. There is a small church in Fairfield of thirteen members, these have mostly been added of late. The church in Williston has been increased much of late. There is another church at Jericho, probably of about 30 members; and another at Cambridge of about the same number. The Rev. Ebenezer Kingsbury is pastor of the church at Jericho. There are two churches more in the southwest part of Addison county, but their numbers are small. There are no other regular Congregational churches in these three counties.

In the late additions to these churches, some have been added who were old professors, but the number of young converts who have not yet made a public profession of their faith, is great. Probably, therefore, one may form nearly a true estimate of the late revival, by the numbers added to the various churches. In some other parts of these counties, there has been a gentle effusion of the Holy Spirit, and numbers of people hopefully converted.

In the southern parts of the state there have been some revival. Middletown, Poultney, and some other towns in that vicinity, have experienced pleasant days, in respect to the Redeemer's kingdom. Also on the east side of the Green Mountain has been a powerful work of grace in some towns; particularly in Barnard, where about one hundred souls have been added to the Congregational church, and some with other denominations. Brookfield, under the preaching of the Rev. Mr. Lyman has had a refreshing shower, and some towns in that vicinity have been considerably awakened. On the whole the cloud of divine mercy has stood over Vermont, this year; at least there have been some small ones well stored with divine grace, whose contents have been poured down upon the hearts of men.

Notwithstanding these revivals in some parts of the state, the great body of the towns through that vast country have remained unmoved. There is a great field opened to the northward for missionary labors. May Zion pray, that the great Lord of the harvest would send forth his laborers.

JEDIDIAH BUSHNELL.

February 16, 1802.

N. B. The above account is brought down to the end of the year 1801, since which the Editors have heard of several other places in which a particular seriousness is begun.

Remarks on 11. Kings vi. 16.

IN the 11. Kings vi. 16. we read: Fear not; for they that be with us are more than they that be with them.

THESE words, though uttered by Elisha with particular reference to himself and servant when surrounded by the Syrians who sought his life, have led my thoughts to that division which exists between intelligent beings as holy and sinful, and to the strength, cause and prospects of the sinner, and the strength, cause and prospects of the saint: Every child of God may encourage his fellow-saint, when desponding in view of the dangers of the times, with the words of the prophet; Fear not; for they that be with us are more than they that be with them.

The whole intelligent universe is divided into two opposing parties. There is the kingdom of darkness and the kingdom of light, or of sin and holiness.

Let us first consider the strength of the sinner. The wicked man is not alone; there are multitudes, who lend him their aid. All impenitent sinners on earth espouse his cause in opposition to the saint and the kingdom to which he belongs. There are no neutrals, no idle spectators. He that gathereth not with Christ scattereth abroad. And what an army of wicked men is now on the stage, who lend their power, their wisdom, their influence and wealth to support the cause of error and sin! The infidel, the scoffer and sensualist can bring their thousands to the field. They are found in every quarter of the world, amongst gospelized and heathen nations. It is probably the case that the far greater part of mankind with respect to numbers, abilities, science, authority and riches contribute to the support of the sinner's cause directly or indirectly.

The departed spirits of all who died in their sins declare for the wicked man. By changing worlds they have not changed their feelings and become subjects of another kingdom. They have only renewed the oath of allegiance and sworn eternal fidelity to the kingdom of unrighteousness. What a vast company is formed by all the wicked who have lived and died since the world began!

The fallen angels are in league with the sinner; that great company of once holy, happy and exalted beings, who revolted from God and are reserved unto judgment. They are using their influence to blind sinners to their state and character, to ruin the saint and destroy Christ's kingdom. They present temptations and employ their seducing arts to lead astray and destroy the soul. These evil spirits too often succeed in their attacks upon the Christian for his honor and peace.

At the head of this numerous army stands Satan, their leader, He was the first in the rebellion of heaven and the instigator of man's rebellion on earth. He is the most able and active supporter of the kingdom of darkness. The scriptures represent him as the adversary of saints and as a roaring lion going about seeking whom he may devour. This prince of the infernal kingdom is most crafty in his schemes and most violent and successful in his attacks of any fallen creature. The same spirit pervades this whole mass of wicked beings whether on earth or in hell. They are united in their desires and object. It would rejoice their hearts to destroy the saint, overturn the kingdom of Christ and dethrone Jehovah. Notwithstanding their desires, their expectations and great exertions they will not succeed, for there are more that be with the saint than with the sinner. This leads me to observe,

That the saint is befriended by all virtuous and godly men on earth. All the children of God in this world form but one family. They are subjects of the same kingdom and united in the same cause. In this respect, their parentage, their nation, their place of abode and outward circumstances make no difference. Whether in honor or obscurity, in affluence or poverty, in the eastern or western continent, they possess the same spirit and support, the same kingdom. All Christians are bound together in love and daily meet at one spot, the throne of divine grace. ET ry faint is forwarding the glorious work and is encouraging and assisting all his fellow-saints by his example and his prayers.

The saints in heaven are amongst the friends of the good man; even all the ancient worthies and the eminent Christians since the days of Christ, that have fallen asleep. Though gone from earth they have not forsaken the cause, nor is their attachment to it in the least diminished, but greatly strengthened. To these who had espoused the cause of Christianity Paul writes in the following manner, Ye are come to the general assembly and church of the first born, which are written in heaven and to the spirits of just men made perfect. Saints in heaven and saints on earth form but one body and have but one interest.

The angels that maintained their integrity and now dwell with God are one in temper and aim with the believer. They are ministering spirits, sent forth to minister for them who shall be heirs of salvation. They are commissioned to protect, support and guide the children of heaven through the world; to save them from the temptations of Satan and bring them safely to glory. Saints are said to have come unto mount Zion and to an innumerable company of angels. Michael, the archangel; the seraphim, the cherubim and all lower orders of those shining beings are on the side of the saint.

In addition to all these forces, there is Christ the Son of God, who leads them forth and fights the battles of the Christian as the captain of his salvation. He has established his kingdom on a firm foundation and will ever maintain it, since he has wisdom to plan and power to execute. God the Father and Spirit, as well as the Son are engaged in the same cause. Irresistible might, infinite wisdom and every divine attribute are employed in building up the kingdom of holiness. That God, whose counsel standeth and who doth all his pleasure; from whom Satan and all his subjects derive their power and wisdom; that God, who can restrain any of his creatures within what bounds he sees best; who can make the evil designs of the wicked productive of good and destroy his adversaries with the breath of his mouth; this being engaged for the defence, the welfare and final triumph of the saint.

Here we behold all the intelligent beings in the universe forming two vast hosts, Satan at the head of one and God the Redeemer at the head of the other. Several important inferences may be drawn from the above statement.

1st. It is an honorable thing to be Christians. Good men are connected with the most respectable part of mankind and the most worthy and exalted beings in the universe. They are united in the same body with the virtuous and godly on earth and with the patriarchs and all those ancient worthies, who are now in heaven. They become subjects of the same kingdom and members of the same society with the holy angels. Yes, my Christian readers, you are one with Christ, and Jehovah takes you under his peculiar care adopts you into his family and calls you children. How much honor do you derive from your new connections? When you become acquainted and connected with the first and best families of the land you feel yourselves honored. How much more, when you are connected with all the righteous in ancient and modern times, with those spotless beings who surround the divine throne, with the Lamb, the Son of God and the great and holy ruler of the universe! You need not be ashamed of your connections, for none are so honorable.

2dly. It is dishonorable to be wicked men. Impenitent sinners are of the same society with all the vicious, filthy and profligate wretches that have appeared in the world. They side with such as constitute the off-scouring of our race. Yes, sinners, you are fellow-workers with the infernal spirits, with the angels who turned enemies to God. You are the servants, the soldiers, the subjects and children of the devil, who is the prince of darkness and father of lies. Are these connections honorable in your estimation? Though you disown and despise them, they are the most honorable connections you have formed. You have attached yourselves to their interest and heartily co-operate with them in upholding and promoting the same wicked, wretched cause.— You would not be thought to have formed such dishonorable connections amongst men; yet you actually form such connections in a spiritual sense much to your disgrace and I fear to your ruin.

3dly. There is safety in being good men. Power, wisdom and goodness are on the side of the Christian. Departed saints and holy angels—the Father, Son and Spirit are all united with the righteous in the same cause—the cause of virtue, truth and religion. The saint will never be disappointed as to his ultimate object. That in which he feels most interested will terminate well. O man of God! I would envy thee sooner than I would envy the sons of pleasure and fortune, or the princes of the earth with whom there is power and honor: For your cause will prosper and the desire of your heart will be given you! Your foes are only dependent creatures; while your preserver and the defender of the cause of truth is an uncreated, independent and all-sufficient God. The strength of your enemies, therefore, and all the success they meet with in opposing you and the kingdom of light are given them by the Lord, for a display of his perfections, and a trial of your faith. I may address you in the language of the apostle Paul to his Corinthian brethren; “All things are yours, whether Paul or Apollos, or Cephas, or the world, or life, or death, or things present or things to come; all are yours, and ye are Christ’s, and Christ is God’s.” Not only mercies and the aids of the divine Spirit are given you in covenant love, but even afflictions, the assaults of Satan and the temptations of the world: These are all designed and ordered by God for your spiritual and best good. If you live a humble, watchful and prayerful life you will be kept by the power of God unto salvation. The assaults of your enemies are like the raging billows of the sea, which are broken at the foot of the stupendous rock against which they dash. The Lord is as a wall, as horses and chariots of fire round about you. Trust in him and fear not the powers of darkness, for they that be with you are more than they that be with them.

As you see iniquity abounding and the enemies of the cross increasing both in numbers and zeal, perhaps you are alarmed for the interests of Zion. For your consolation, remember that the King of Zion reigneth and that the Judge of all the earth will do right. The cause of truth and religion is defended by the united force of infinite wisdom and might. The cause of virtue and piety is the cause of God ; who then can oppose it and prosper ? The heathen rage, the people imagine a vain thing ; the kings of the earth set themselves and the rulers take counsel together against the Lord and against his anointed. But give not way to despondency.—Christianity will be upheld and finally triumph : For God hath set his king upon his holy hill of Zion, and he will give him the heathen for his inheritance and the uttermost parts of the earth for his possession. Perhaps you may see a mountain of difficulties to prevent the prosperity of Zion and impede the progress of the gospel. But who art thou O great mountain ? before the divine Zerubbabel thou shalt become a plain.

4thly. We may infer that to be wicked men is dangerous. All sinners are engaged in a cause which will certainly come to ruin. Satan with all his forces cannot win the victory nor support his kingdom. The conquests he has made will in the end be his overthrow and his empire will tremble and fall. The sad consequences of this catastrophe must be felt by all his subjects. We live in a day when the friends of christianity feel the importance of greater union and more vigorous exertions in defence of the truth and spread of the gospel—a day also in which the enemies of Christ are uniting in the propagation of dangerous error and in the support of the kingdom of darkness—when the devil has come down, having great wrath, because his time is short. He brings his millions to the field and is drawing up his forces in battle array for the complete destruction of the followers of Christ. Ye sons of infidelity and wickedness ! Your boldness, your zeal and your art are great. Your numbers are vast. Many amongst you are famed for their brilliancy of talents, their worldly wisdom, their wealth and power. Your measures of opposition to Christianity have ripened to a system. Your labors have not failed of the desired success. The things of your policy are in a promising train. You soon expect to “ crush the wretch,” banish religion from the world and render your victory complete. You already begin to exult and triumph. But “ let not him that girdeth on his harness boast himself, as he that putteth it off.” The day is not yours. Your victory is partial, your triumph momentary. Your fortitude, zeal, art and strength will not render you victorious, for God is against you. You are fighting against the Lord of Hosts whose kingdom will stand and whose dominion will have no end. Your schemes will be defeated, your expectations will perish, your cause will be ruined and in its destruction you will be destroyed. Zion’s God liveth and he is on the throne. Therefore the gates of hell will not prevail against her. He will break her enemies with a rod of iron, and dash them to pieces like a potter’s vessel. “ Be wise, now, therefore, O ye kings ; be instructed ye judges of the earth,” refrain from your opposition to Christianity, “ lest ye be found even to fight against God,” “ and ye perish from the way, when his wrath is kindled but a little.”

SHAPHAN.

FOR THE CONNECTICUT EVANGELICAL MAGAZINE.

MESS’RS EDITORS,

You have published, from different writers, observations on Heb. v. 7. If you think it not improper, that further remarks on this passage should be admitted into your Magazine, and do not disapprove of the following, they are at your disposal.

IT is presumed that the key to a right exposition of this text, will be found to be a just idea of that fear, which the apostle here ascribes to our Lord Jesus Christ. And was heard in that he feared. In our translation a verb is made use of, he feared. In the Greek a substantive. He was heard for—because of—on account of his fear. The original word is not phobos, the term commonly made use of by the Greeks, to signify a dread of evil, misery or distress; but eulabeia which signifies reverence or reverential fear, that fear of God which the Psalmist tells us, is clean, enduring forever. And which comprises in it all true holiness. Accordingly the marginal reading is, he was heard for his piety.

These facts naturally lead to the following paraphrase. “Our blessed Saviour, the great High Priest of his Church, in the garden of Gethsemane, when his mind was deeply impressed with a perfect foresight of the dreadful sufferings that were before him, offered up prayers and supplications, accompanied with strong crying and tears to his Almighty Father, who was infinitely able to deliver him; that, if it were possible, if it were consistent with the highest divine glory in the salvation of sinners, he might be exempted from that bitter death. His human nature, though perfectly holy, shrunk from the thought of such inconceivable sufferings. But yet, amidst this keen anguish which the prospect offered, he did not ask for deliverance unconditionally, but expressly on the condition already mentioned.—O my Father, if this cup may not pass from me, except I drink it, thy will be done—And he was heard, that is accepted and approved, both in his prayer and submission, for the perfection of his filial fear and piety.”

To this paraphrase I will add a few observations. The impressive sense which our Saviour had in the garden, of his future sufferings, was beyond measure agonizing, as the history of the Evangelists fully evidences. Sufferings, and especially extreme sufferings are dreadful to nature; no less so, to innocent and holy beings, than to the unholy. The desire of avoiding misery, is natural and irresistible in all. None can be willing to suffer, but for valuable considerations. The prayer of our Saviour was excited by a clear prescience of anguish and distress, far exceeding the powers of our conception. At the same time he knew the infinite gain to the universe, which those sufferings would effect. If all this good could not be obtained by other means, he freely submitted to sustain the tremendous load himself. This entire submission to his heavenly Father, amidst a prayer for deliverance, excited by the agonies of his holy soul was the highest act of his obedience, and most decidedly proved its absolute perfection. It gave an additional value and lustre to all that he did as Mediator. For this as the final act, he was heard and accepted of his Father, and secured in the endless enjoyment of all the infinitely great and glorious rewards of his sufferings.

The preceding view of the text may not be free from objection; but it is believed not to be liable to several, which lie against other constructions, which have been adopted. J. T.

Messrs EDITORS,

YOU will please publish in your Magazine the following letter, should you judge it useful to those under affliction, or in any degree contributing to the glory of God.

DEAR FRIENDS,

YESTERDAY, we heard the melancholy tidings of the death of your daughter, Mrs. ——. If the compassion of friends can afford the shadow of consolation, you have my tenderest sympathy. You have, also, my ardent prayers to heaven, for divine support to be given to yourselves, and family; and very especially to the surviving husband, the friend of whose youth, the soother of whose sorrows, and the companion of whose happiest days, is now no more. Our only consolation, in trials, like yours, when friends can only drop an unavailing tear, is the righteous sovereignty of God and his covenant mercy to the faithful. "The cup which our heavenly Father giveth us, shall we not drink?" God is now saying to you, by the voice of his providence,—Son, daughter, lovest thou me, more than this child? May your hearts, by faith, reply, Lord thou knowest all things: thou knowest that I love thee; and that, at the command of thy righteous sovereignty, I can give up my child, my nearest friends, yea my own life also. May God's will be your will; May afflictions teach you to know no desire, but the Lord's pleasure. You will say, perhaps,—“My spirit is willing” and resigned “but the flesh is weak.” Be it so: yet it is written “My grace is sufficient for thee.” “I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee.”

Perhaps you have placed too great an affection on your beloved child. If so;—God has now removed her to teach you, that your trust, and dependence, and love must be supremely fixed on that heavenly friend, who will never fail. Thus may the rod of God, be to you as the rod of Aaron, blossoming with divine blessings, and bringing forth holy and heavenly fruit.—Truly our heavenly Father can make our bitterest afflictions to become the richest mercies. He hath promised that “all things shall work together for good, to them who love God.” Happy would it be for us, if we could learn to depend more on heaven and less upon the earth. Happy would it be for us, if we would learn to take up the cross, and follow Christ. The cross is the way to the crown. Our Saviour hath travelled in this path, and hath left behind him this lesson for all his children, “If ye will be my disciples, ye must take up the cross and follow me.”

To a Christian, the bitterness of the cup of sorrow must be greatly sweetened by the consideration, that the friend of sinners has taken it before us, and has given us a command to do as he hath done. The greater our trials are, the pleasanter will be the heavenly rest of the faithful at last. Let us, then, do our duty, and trust in God. He has not suffered all this to befall you by chance. It is the ordering of infinite wisdom. The exact time, and manner, and circumstances of her death were all decreed by a holy, benevolent and righteous Sovereign. Surely this must be a consolation to a child of God. Could you now see, as you will hereafter know, if you are found among the faithful, you will rejoice that every thing has been ordered as it hath taken place. You will not wish that a single circumstance had varied, in all the trials, which your heavenly Father hath appointed you.

Believing, now, his infinite wisdom, and goodness, shew forth the spirit of a dutiful, and childlike resignation. If need be, we are afflicted. God sees when it is needful, and what is needful. "What he does, we know not now; but we shall know hereafter." Leave all things therefore to his holy guidance, look to him for support; and while every affliction serves to break a link of that chain, which confines our affections to the creature, let us so improve our trials, that they may advance us nearer to that world, where sorrow and mourning shall forever cease. The scriptures give many intimations, that faithful souls will see and know each other in heaven. What a joyous consideration is this? How ought it to animate you, and the family, and the surviving husband of the dear deceased, to wait, with faith, and patience, for that day, when you hope to see your friend, in a better world, and renew your affection, with heavenly purity, and without the most distant fear of a second separation. Oh my friends! what comfort is there in religion. Religious consolations are never more precious, than in time of earthly sorrows. They are never more ready for our support, than when we most need them. Afflictions are precious seasons for the faithful. They ripen our graces, they increase our joys, they advance us heaven-ward, they prepare us to taste the sweets of piety, and mature us for the service of that God, "in whose presence is fulness of joy." I hear that your daughter left two little children behind her, when she died. Precious remembrances of the dear deceased? They must be a comfort to you, in the absence of their mother. They must be doubly dear to their surviving parent, under his present weight of sorrow. May God spare the little lambs to grow up and be blessings to you on earth. May they, one day heighten the joy of your interview in heaven, and be found among the Saviour's jewels.

N. B. To-morrow begins a New-Year. It opens with mourning, but may it close with joy abundantly proportioned to your present sorrows.

TO THE EDITORS OF THE CONNECTICUT EVANGELICAL MAGAZINE.

GENTLEMEN,

In your Magazine some observations have been made respecting the usefulness of what is termed conference meetings. The inclosed are answers to several questions which were put at such meetings. The question was given at one meeting to be answered the next, in writing or viva voce. Those I send you were written by a young woman of eighteen who had become a hopeful subject of efficacious grace. Possibly they may be thought to be only a summary extracted from some writer on the subjects. Should this appear to be the case, I think a considerable degree of ingenuity is discovered in condensing the subject into so small a compass. But as there are answers to several other questions written by the same hand, some of which I know are original, and as I do not recollect any such phraseology in any of my reading, I fully believe that they are not extracts but original compositions on the subjects. They are submitted to your judgment. Yours, ALANSON.

Question. What is it to see sin as sin?

To see sin as sin, we must see that it is an infinite evil—contrary to a holy God, and an enemy to all his glorious attributes. Sin is contrary to the law of God and the good of our own souls. It strikes at the nature and being of God—it sets us dreadfully distant from a conformity to, and delight in the glorious perfections of God. It is vile and odious as against the infinite grace and mercy of God in Jesus Christ—To see the horrid nature of sin let us view the sufferings of our Saviour, when sin was imputed to him—He hung—bled and expired on the cross.

Question. What is the condition of those that are out of Christ?

Those that are out of Christ are in a very deplorable state. Every moment in danger of death—are unprepared for eternity, and at an awful uncertainty of what will become of them forever—They have no respect to the glory of God in any of their performances, but are continually going off from God—at enmity with him—loving sin and hating holiness. They are exposed to the dreadful penalties of the divine law—and to have the wrath of almighty God burst forth in fury upon them, and sink them into the regions of everlasting despair, there to spend an awful eternity with the damned in hell.

Question. What should we desire to go to heaven for?

That we may be perfectly holy, and perfectly exercised in the holy employments of the heavenly world, in praising and glorifying God, in loving, admiring, and adoring him to eternity. Also that our souls may be perfectly freed from all sin, and perfectly conformed to God, and a full enjoyment of him—that we may there join the angelic host in admiring and adoring, the infinite beauty, love and condescension of our glorious Redeemer, viewing of him with everlasting surprise and admiration, as an object ever new, and infinitely entertaining, throughout a boundless eternity.

Religious Intelligence.

ORDINATION.

On Wednesday April 21st, the Rev. Josiah B. Andrews was ordained to the pastoral care of the second Church and Society in Killingworth. The Rev. Joseph Washburn of Farmington made the introductory prayer; the Rev. Abel Flint, of Hartford preached the Sermon, from Acts xxviii. 31.—The Rev. Thomas W. Bray of North-Guilford made the consecrating prayer; the Rev. Cyprian Strong, of Chatham gave the charge; the Rev. David Selden of Middle-Haddam gave the Right hand of Fellowship; and the Rev. Nathan Perkins, D. D. of West-Hartford, made the concluding prayer.

MISSIONARIES.

The Rev. Solomon Morgan lately returned from a mission of a few weeks to the northern part of Vermont.

The Rev. Alexander Gillet is about to enter on a mission to the same settlements.

POETRY.

COMMUNICATED AS ORIGINAL.

The Birth and Kingdom of Christ.—
 Luke ii. 9—14. Isa. ix. 6, 7.

LO! Jesus comes, with men to dwell,
 To save a world, from sin & hell;
 Th' angelic hosts their God attend,
 And with him from his throne descend.
 The' enraptur'd Seraph speeds his way,
 To where the flocks in Bethlem stray,
 While glories bright around them blaze,
 And fill the shepherds with amaze.
 Fear not, saith he, for lo! I bring
 The joyful tidings of your King!
 Tidings of joy, to latest time,
 To every land; and every clime.
 To you is born, the heavens record,
 A Saviour, who is Christ the Lord;
 And this the pledge to you assign'd,
 The babe in Bethlem you shall find,
 In swaddling clothes, behold him dress'd,
 And lowly in a manger rest.

The signal given; the theme divine,
 The angelic hosts the herald join,
 In heavenly strains, begin the song,
 And notes sublime the praise prolong.
 Glory to God, in realms above,
 His wisdom vast, immense his love!
 On earth let heavenly peace prevail,—
 Good will to mortals never fail.

Behold the saints, in glad amaze;
 Respond the notes, which angels raise.
 To us, to us, a child is born,
 All hail the day! th' auspicious morn!
 To us, to us, a Son is given,
 The Son of God, the Heir of Heaven!
 With him the government accords,
 Great King of Kings, & Lord of Lords!
 Seraphs must own his sovereign sway,
 And all the hosts of heaven obey;
 To him must earth submissive lie,
 And every creature bow the knee.
 Let heaven and earth with joy proclaim,
 His wondrous, his adored name!
 Great Counsellor! whose plans of old,
 His wisdom, grace, and truth unfold:
 The mighty God! the God above!
 The source of being, life, and love!
 At his command, the beauteous frame
 Of worlds immense, from nothing came.
 To him belongs the throne of heaven,
 To him be power and glory given:
 The Prince of Peace, to whom pertain Dominion and the right to reign.

His government shall peace extend,
 And bless the earth's remotest end;
 His praise be sung, in climes unknown,
 And distant realms his empire own;
 His kingdom spread thro' every land,
 And thro' eternal ages stand!

TROPHIMUS:

The New Jerusalem,

BORNE by the Spirit to a mountain's height,
 Where boundless space lay stretch'd before the sight,
 Fair in my view the heavenly Salem stood,
 Array'd in beauty like the Bride of God.
 Her form was square—a wall of jasper rose,
 To guard her subjects from external foes, Around her, gates of pearl in splendor shone,
 And her light mock'd the radiance of the sun.
 Beneath her, glowing streets lay stretch'd immense,
 And pav'd with gold, reflected light intense,
 On every side the purest gems were found,
 And dazzling diamonds sparkled on the ground.
 Before the throne seven lamps resolute
 glow'd,
 And from the midst a living fountain
 flow'd.
 There cloth'd in white the great Assembly stood,
 And shouted praises to the Lamb of God,
 Crowns of pure gold their radiant heads adorn,
 And palms of triumph in their hands
 are borne.
 High in the midst, and circling round
 the Throne,
 "All life, all soul," four living creatures shone;
 Around, the Saints their ceaseless as-
 thems sung,
 And God's almighty voice thro' heaven's broad concave rung.
 There no pale moon appeared to cheer
 the night,
 By day no sun disclos'd his feeble light;
 But great Messiah lent his glowing ray,
 And God's own glory spread eternal day.

Donations to the Missionary Society of Connecticut.
 From a Friend of Missions,

5 Dollars.

THE

Connecticut Evangelical Magazine.

[PUBLISHED ACCORDING TO ACT OF CONGRESS.]

Vol. II.]

JUNE, 1802.

[No. 12.

FOR THE CONNECTICUT EVANGELICAL MAGAZINE.

Attempts to propagate the gospel among the Indians in New-England and parts adjacent.

(Contin. from p. 370.)

NUMBER III.

Concerning the propagation of the gospel among the Indians, particularly on Martha's Vineyard, by the ministry of the Rev. Thomas Mayhew, jun. &c.

OBSTACLES being, in some degree, removed, the gospel made much greater progress, than it had done before. In each year, for many in succession, natives of the island were coming in, and making profession of the Christian faith; in some years a very considerable number, till at length, very few speculative infidels remained upon this, and the neighboring islands.

We have already taken notice of Mioxoo, and Tawanquatuck; the former, a man of distinction; the latter a principal Sachem in that part of the island where he lived. These appear to have been the first converts among men in power.— Their example was followed with happy consequences: They not only embraced the gospel themselves; but encouraged others, particularly their dependents, to attend upon the means of instruction, that they also might be led to the truth: Like good Cornelius, they called together their relations, intimate friends, and neighbors, that they also might partake of those important blessings, which they themselves were desirous of enjoying.

In the year 1648, there was a general meeting of all who were inclined for Christianity, to confirm, and assist one another in adhering to it. This assembly was held in Mr. Mayhew's presence; and he observed, that twelve of the young men went and took Sacochoanimo, the eldest son of Tawanquatuck, the Christian Sachem, by the hand, telling him, they loved him, and would go with him in God's way; and the elder men encouraged them, and desired, that they would never forget these promises; and so after they had sung part of a psalm, in their own language, they returned home with expressions of great joy, and thankfulness.

In the year 1649, there was a considerable accession to the number of praying Indians at one time. In this year Hiacoomes preached a sermon at a place called Nunpau, in which discourse he reckoned up many of the great sins, of which the Indians were guilty; and as many good duties which ought to be performed by them, (but were neglected.) Upon his finishing this discourse, no less than twenty-two of his hearers, at this time, professed their resolutions against the sins mentioned, and that they would walk with God in newness of life: Of this number Momonequem, a man of no small note among his countrymen, was one; and seemed, above all the rest, to be exceedingly affected; for to the great admiration of all the Indians then present, with much apparent sorrow of heart, and indignation against sin, he did now enumerate twenty of his own sins; manifesting his repentance of them, and professing his resolution to follow the only living, and true God against all opposition: Mr. Mayhew, from what he observed of him after this, was persuaded that he was a real Christian.

About this time, a famous powow, called Tequanonim, entertaining thoughts of turning from his false gods, to the one only true God and Jesus Christ, the only Saviour of sinful men, providentially meeting with Momonequem in the woods, opened his case to him, and took his advice upon it; and the effect was, that this powow became, as there was reason to believe, a sincere convert and good Christian.

Momonequem being esteemed by the praying Indians, as a man of wisdom, and prudence, they soon began to resort to him, when they wanted counsel and encouragement in any of their difficulties; and such as inclined to become Christians, did so too.

After this, he became a minister, and preached every Lord's-day to his countrymen; and that he might be the better prepared to address his hearers, he waited on Mr. Mayhew the last day of the week, in order to his assisting him in his preparation for the work of the ensuing day*.

And now in the year 1650, comes on the critical point of the credit of the powows among them: For Hiacoomes, as we have seen, openly renouncing and protesting against the false gods, which he had worshipped, and all the powows, whom he viewed as their familiar ministers; and with a surprising courage, under all circumstances, despising and defying their power; they were greatly enraged, and threatened his utter destruction; but to the surprise of the people, and their own confusion, they were unable to hurt him.

Soon after this, God was pleased to give growing success to the zealous and laborious services of the missionaries. For in a little time after, an Indian standing up at Mr. Mayhew's lecture, confessed his sins, declared his repentance, and desire to forsake them; and then going to Tawanquatuck, before mentioned, and some other Christian Indians, and then to Mr. Mayhew, he expressed the warm affection he had for them; and in his native simplicity added, "I greatly desire to go along with you for God's sake." Upon which they received him with much pleasure. After this there came five men more ; and by the end of the summer, there were thirty-nine Indian men of this meeting, who had the knowledge of the main points of religion, professed their belief of them, and solemnly engaged to live agreeably to them ; beside the well-instructed and believing women, who were supposed to exceed the number of the men.

* Indian Converts, p. 12, 13.

Within this year an event took place, which surprised the whole Island, and turned to the great and speedy advancement of the Christian religion.

For it pleased God, who had drawn a considerable number of the Indians from the powows to worship Himself, at which the powows were very much offended, yet now, even to persuade two of themselves, to go after those, who sought Him, and desire that they might walk with them, in the ways of that God, whose name is Jehovah. They came under deep convictions of the sins they had lived in, and especially powowing ; revealing the mysteries of their unlawful profession ; and expressing the most sincere repentance, and utmost detestation of them ; entreating, that God would have mercy upon them, pardon their sins, and teach them His ways for Christ Jesus' sake. And very affecting it was to Mr. Mayhew, and all who were present, (to use his own words) " To see these poor, naked sons of Adam, and slaves to the devil from their birth, to come towards the Lord, as they did, with their joints shaking, and their bowels trembling, their spirits troubled, and their voices, with much fervency, uttering words of sore displeasure against sin and Satan, which they had embraced from their childhood with great delight : And now accounting it also their sin, that they had not the knowledge of God ; that they had served the devil, the great enemy both of God and man, and had been so hurtful in their lives ; but yet being very thankful, that thro' the mercy of God, they had an opportunity of being delivered out of their dangerous condition."^a

The Christian Indians exceedingly rejoiced to see the powows begin to turn from their wicked ways to the Lord. In a little time after, on a lecture day, at the close of the exercise, there were several more of the natives, who expressed their desire to become the servants of the most high God ; among whom was Tequanonim, before mentioned, another powow of great esteem, and very notorious.

At the same time came in about fifty Indians more in one day, desiring to join with the worshippers of God in his service ; confessing their sins ; some those actual sins they had lived in ; and others, the wickedness of their hearts, desiring to be made better ; and for this end, to attend on the word of God, and look only to Jesus Christ for salvation. And upon this occasion Mr. Mayhew observes, that they generally came in by families ; the parents bringing their children with them, introducing them with this short speech, " I have brought my children too : I would have my children serve God with us : I desire that this son and this daughter would serve Jehovah." And if the children could but speak, the parents would have them say something to show their willingness to serve the Lord : And when the commandments were repeated, they all acknowledged them to be good, and made choice of Jehovah to be their God ; promising, by his help, to walk according to his counsels : And when they were received by those, who were before in a general covenant (of which we shall give an account soon) it was by chearful voices, and giving thanks to God, that they were met together in the ways of Jehovah.

^a Letter, Oct. 1651, published in London, 1652.

These additions to the number of praying Indians were all made before the end of the year 1650.

By the midst of the year 1651, there were 199 men, women, and children, who had professed themselves to be worshippers of the great, and everliving God. And now there were two meetings kept every Lord's day, the one three miles, the other about eight miles from Mr Mayhew's house. Hiacoomes taught every Lord's day at the nearest, and Momonequem as often at the furthest. On every Saturday they both came to Mr. Mayhew to be informed and instructed in the subject they were to treat of; and God greatly assisted them : And Mr. Mayhew had then undertaken, by divine assistance, to keep two several lectures, which would be, at each assembly, once a fortnight.

By the end of the year 1652, there were 282 Indians, not counting young children in the number, who were brought to renounce their false gods, and powows, and publicly, in set meetings, before many witnesses, had freely disclaimed, and defied their tyrannical power. Even eight of the powows, had now forsaken their wicked craft, and profitable trade, as they held it; and now made profession of their willing subjection to the true God. And as not any of these were compelled thereto by power; so neither were they allur- ed by gifts, having received none from the very beginning.*

Mr. Mayhew, this worthy servant of Christ, continued his almost inexpressible labor, and vigilant care for the good of the Indians, whom he justly esteemed his joy and crown. And God was pleased to give such a victorious success to his unwearied labors, that by the year 1657, many hundred men, and women were added to the Christian society of such as might truly be said to be holy in their conversation; and for knowledge, such as need not to be taught the first principles of the oracles of God; besides the many hundreds of looser, and more superficial professors. †

* Indian Converts, 290.

† Matthew Mayhew's Triumphs of Grace.

Protestants could not approve of some methods, which have been made use of by Roman Catholics for the conversion of the Indians, or inducing them to make profession of Christianity. "In Maryland a great number of Indians in ancient times, submitted to be baptized by the Popish Missionaries, for the sake of some new shirts presented to them, to encourage them to receive the ordinance. But the poor creatures not knowing how to wash them, when foul, came, after a little time, and made a motion, that the Roman Catholics would give more shirts, or else they would renounce their baptism." †

Some Catholic Missionaries to Indian tribes in the Province of Maine, in the last century, used, after public instructions were closed, to encourage them to attend again, by giving them a liberal draught of ardent spirits! Protestant Missionaries take no such ways to gain profelytes: Nor, when they can do it, do they ever use force, to accomplish this end; sensible, that such a procedure is in direct opposition to the example and precepts of Jesus, and to the whole system of Christianity.

† Magnal. B. III. p. 204. — New, Vol. I. p. 284.

After a considerable number of the Indians had made profession of Christianity, being convinced, that they could not bring themselves under too strict engagements to conform their lives to the sacred precepts enjoined by the founder of the religion they had chosen, a great part of them, in the spring of the year 1652, of their own accord, made a motion to Mr. Mayhew, that they might have some method settled among them, for the exercise of order and discipline, that so they might be obliged to live in a due subjection to the laws of God; and they desired to enter into a covenant, that a sense of their duty might be more deeply impressed upon their minds, and their obligations might not easily be forgotten.

The praying Indians did also, about the same time, earnestly desire, that Christian civil government might be set up over them; and that transgressions of the law of God might be punished according to the rules of his word. They desired Mr. Mayhew to inform them, what were the punishments, which God had appointed for those, who break his laws, to which they were willing to subject themselves; and that they might have some men chosen among them, with his father and himself, to see, that the Indians walked in an orderly manner; encouraging those, who did so, and dealing with those, who did not, according to the word of God.

Prior to the time of their entering into the solemn covenant proposed; and in order to prepare their minds for that serious, and weighty transaction, a day of fasting and prayer was appointed to promote repentance of their sins, and to implore the Divine presence and aid; Another day was set apart soon after for the same purpose, and to complete the work they had in view: Being then assembled, some of them spake for the excitation of themselves, and of others; and about ten, or twelve of them, prayed, as Mr. Mayhew describes their devotion, "Like men endowed with a good measure of the knowledge of God, their own wants, and the wants of others, with much affection, and many spiritual petitions, favoring of an heavenly mind."

The same morning Mr. Mayhew drew up a covenant in their native language, which he often read, and made plain to them; and they all, with free consent and thankfulness, united in it, and desired the grace and assistance of God to enable them to keep it faithfully.

When they chose their rulers, Mr. Mayhew observed, that they made choice of such, as were best approved for piety, and most like to suppress all wickedness, and encourage goodness; and that afterwards they were, upon all occasions, forward to show their earnest desire of rulers of such a character.*

The praying Indians, who were in covenant, paid particular attention to the disposition and character of those, who wished to join them. Mr. Matthew Mayhew informs us, who, and how qualified those were who were esteemed Christians; what measures they took to satisfy the congregation, with which they were desirous of joining.†

"When such a number professed the Christian religion, as gave occasion to the Indians in general to esteem them a sect different from themselves, and by the denomination of praying men, to signalize that difference; and that their number was such, as to meet publicly to worship God: Such, who forsook their heathenish worship, professing themselves to become Christians, declared, in the public assembly, the grounds, and reasons moving them to renounce heathenism, and embrace Christianity, with their resolution to pray, to serve and to endeavor to obey the true God in Jesus Christ; how this resolution was wrought in them; what temptations had obstructed; what reason, scripture, and strength from God had encouraged, and enabled them to retain such resolution; how they had often prayed to God, and yet been overcome by discouragements, temptations, &c. they closed all, by professing a resolution, by divine assistance, to pray to, and serve Him, and Him only. At the same time, they entreated the prayers of the congregation on their behalf. After they had finished their speech, many of the congregation took them by the hand, in token of love, and goodwill."

* Indian Converts, p. 82 and 209.

† Triumphs of Grace.

"If after such public profession any were observed not to perform the usual worshipping of God in praying with their families, desiring a blessing on their food, and the like (who yet constantly attended in their public meeting) they were publicly examined of the same."

After such a particular account has been given of the large numbers on the Island, who professed Christianity under the ministry of Mr. Mayhew, jun. it is natural to enquire particularly, what was their moral and religious conduct in his time, and in that of his successors? This was very briefly mentioned before; but a more particular account may be expected.

As it was in the primitive times, so it was among the natives of this island who professed to receive Christianity; some were merely nominal Christians; others gave pleasing evidence, that they were Christians, not in name only, but in deed, and in truth.

As to many professors among these Indians, it cannot be denied, and ought not to be disguised, but lamented, that they did not conduct according to their profession, and sacred engagements. There were too many, whose characters were similar to those drawn by our Saviour in the parable of the sower, who never bare fruit: Their ministers could lament over too many of those, who professed Christ, as St. Paul did over not a few in his day, particularly a small number of the Philippians, "For many walk, of whom I have told you often, and now tell you, even weeping, that they are enemies to the cross of Christ, whose end is destruction, whose God is their belly, and whose glory is in their shame, who mind earthly things.*"

However, among the professors of Christianity on this island, a good number behaved in such a manner, as to adorn the doctrine of God their Saviour. Rev. Experience Mayhew, esteemed by his numerous acquaintance, a judicious and pious divine, has published an account of many among the Indians on the Vineyard, both adults and children, who exhibited very satisfactory and agreeable evidence, that they had received the truth in the love of it.

In general, their religion appeared rational, free from the glooms of superstition, and the airy flights

* Philip. iii. 18, 19.

of enthusiasm : They seemed to avoid ostentation, and to exhibit that poverty of spirit, which is characteristic of the real Christian.

In respect to adults, particularly heads of families ; the deep sense they seemed to have of sin, of the corruption of their hearts, and their countless offences in act—their humiliation under a sense of these things—the necessity they expressed of having a share in the redemption purchased by Jesus Christ, of which they often spake with pleasing wonder and gratitude—the need they experienced, and freely mentioned, of the divine spirit to form their hearts to holiness—the humble, unaffected expressions of the vileness of their hearts, at the same time, their cheerful reliance on the Almighty Saviour to cleanse them from the pollution of sin, and grant them the pardon of their offences—their magnifying the mercy of God, discovered in the redemption and salvation of sinners by Jesus Christ, and expressing the most lively gratitude to God, that he had led them to an acquaintance with the glorious gospel—their apparent, unaffected piety in its various branches—the care they took to support religion in their families, by reading the scriptures, or causing them to be read in their houses, when practicable ; by regular attention to prayer in their families, and in many instances to psalmody—their care to train up their children in Christian knowledge and virtue, by catechetical instructions, and otherwise, by teaching them early to call upon God in prayer, and taking pains, that they were taught to read, as soon as opportunities presented, that they might reap greater benefit by the sacred writings—their conscientious and strict observation of the Christian sabbath, both in public and in private—their benevolence to their infidel countrymen, in making zealous efforts to bring them to an acquaintance with the truth, an acknowledgment of it, and conformity to it—their Christian attempts to reduce their vicious neighbors from paths of wickedness, particularly from the abuse of ardent spirits, to which, as a people, they were so strongly inclined, and which was pernicious to many of them, and led on to a train of natural and moral evils of fatal tendency—the temperance and diligence, many of them discovered, and the habitual observance both of the private, and social virtues in general—the deep repentance expressed by those of them in general, who gave offence by some censurable actions (for there were some pitiable instances of some professors falling into open sins, contrary to their general behavior, which were matters of offence)—their ready compliance with the rules of gospel discipline, when such melancholy events took place—their improving such falls, as affording solemn admonitions to be more circumspect in future life—their habitual care, after this, to avoid, as far as might be, temptations to all sins particularly to that or those, which did most easily beset them—their benevolence and fidelity, both when in health, and when sick, and near the grave, in giving weighty advice, and as need required, admonition and reproof to their families, and others, with whom they had occasional interviews—the pains they took in representing the excellency and inculcating the necessity and infinite importance of vital religion, and recommending, with great earnestness, an immediate attention to it—the affecting sense they renewedly expressed of the evil of their hearts and practice—their renouncing their own merits, and expressing a firm trust in those of the divine Saviour, and with their dying breath committing their souls to him—these several things now mentioned will satisfy the mind, that they had heartily embraced the gospel.

There were many happy instances of early piety among these Indians. Many youths, and young children gave agreeable evidence to their pious friends, that they were sincere disciples of Christ. Forsaking the vanities and follies of childhood and youth, they appeared to devote themselves to the service of God; and habitually to make religion the great business of their lives. Many such proofs of real religion, as were exhibited by the adults, were discovered by them. They seemed to have an heartfelt sense of sin, of its pollution as well as guilt; expressed their repentance for sin, and trust in the blessed Saviour for pardon and sanctification; and habitually behaved themselves agreeably to the laws of Christianity. In general, they seemed earnest in their endeavors to learn to read, that they might have the better advantages to gain knowledge from the holy scriptures, and those other books, written upon divine subjects, which were translated into their language. They seemed to delight in the public and private exercises of religion; and were supposed generally to perform the secret duties of it; many of them, at times, being unexpectedly found in postures of worship in retirement, and affording other presumptive evidences of their attention to these offices of piety. They were careful observers of the Christian sabbath. They were habitually dutiful and obedient to their parents; and performed in general, with laudable diligence and fidelity, the services assigned them, whether in the school, the field, or elsewhere; and made it their habitual care to avoid the sins and follies of childhood and youth. Their conversation, while in health (childish and youthful imperfections excepted, to which the best of children are liable) was agreeable to the gospel. They were free in confessing their faults, and professing their resolutions to guard against them in future, and in the main fulfilled their engagements. The knowledge of many of them, in divine things, was much greater, and more extensive, than could be expected in those of their age, and under such natural disadvantages for improvement; which, in connexion with various other things, afforded good presumptive evidence, that their minds were specially illuminated by the Spirit of Light to understand the truths and mysteries of the gospel. The speeches of some of them in their last sickness, (as some of them died in early life) were really surprising, and not a little edifying to the adult, who attended upon, or occasionally visited them. Many of them, with great earnestness, addressed their youthful companions upon the subject of early piety; inciting them to keep in mind the uncertainty of life, and the infinite importance of preparing for death; that by all means they would remember their Creator in the days of their youth.

Those, in general, of whom we are speaking, "died with comfortable hopes of future happiness, thro' the mercy of God, and the merits of the glorious Saviour; and some of them with great serenity and uncommon light, without even the smallest interposing cloud."

This general account of pious young persons among the Vineyard Indians, shall be closed with an anecdote, which I am persuaded will be grateful to the serious reader. Many others, very pleasing, and interesting might be adduced; but, at present, I shall confine myself to one, viz. to that of Eleazar Ohhumuh, who having had a religious education, appeared serious from his very childhood. The father of this youth was somewhat addicted to the vice of following strong drink, while his son lived; and he was, by bad neighbors, too often drawn into the company of such as inflame themselves with it. The pious youth viewed with deep concern, and piercing grief, the vicious course his father was pursuing; and did, several times, go to the place, where his father was drinking, and with such earnestness, and so many tears, intreat him to leave his drinking company, and go home to his family, that he was not able to withstand the importunity of his afflicted child; but, at his desire, left the drinking tribe; and when he came home, owned the victory, which his son had obtained over him."*

This dutiful and benevolent conduct of the religious youth, but especially his premature death (for he died at the age of sixteen years) so affected his father, that by the divine blessing, they were means of producing a compleat reformation in the man, in respect to intemperance; "He totally quitted his immoderate use of strong drink."†

* Indian Conv. 225.

† Happy, might many fathers at the present day, among those who call themselves civilized, have among their children, such dutiful, kind and faithful monitors; and that their filial respect and benevolence might produce effects equally good, and lasting.

Rev. Experience Mayhew, who has transmitted an account of many scores of Indians on the Island, who appeared to be real Christians, observes, that he could have given many more examples of those, both adults, and children and youth, who furnished good evidence, that they were found converts: But as his book was already larger, than he first intended, he should omit them. And as this great, and good work was begun among the natives in the days of his great grandfather; doubtless had constant and full records been kept by him, and his posterity, still many more instances might have been adduced; but their continued, and unwearied labors, in the evangelical work, doubtless prevented them from leaving many memoirs, which otherwise they might have done; which had they performed, would still have more magnified divine grace, and been, to the devout and pious mind, a pleasant and instructive part of Christian history.

However, the historical sketches of the lives of many Christian Indians drawn by Mr. Mayhew, and published to the world, must be a grateful, and improving entertainment to the serious and devout Christian; and lead him to ascribe praise to a gracious God, who, from ignorant and brutish heathen, the very ruins of the rational creation in this world, raised up those, who were, in some good degree, civilized, and embraced the faith of Jesus, and lived like Christians in all holy conversation and godliness.

The Rev. Thomas Prince of Boston, above seventy years ago, made the following observation concerning the Vineyard Indians, "That God had produced as evident instances of pure, sincere, and unaffected piety among that poor and unpolished people, as are to be seen in the politest nations."

Mr. Mayhew observing so many good effects of his ministrations among the Indians, was encouraged to pursue with vigor his pious labors down to the year 1657. He then found the harvest so plentiful, and the laborers not in proportion to the extent of the field, that he came to a resolution to make an attempt to obtain assistance from abroad. He understood that God had inclined the hearts of many good people in England, upon hearing of the success of the missionaries, to advance a considerable sum of money to encourage the propagation of the gospel among the New-England Indians: He therefore determined upon a short voyage to England, to give a more particular account of the state of the Indians, than he could do by letter; and to pursue the most proper measures for the advancement of religion among them. In order to promote a more general good, he supposed that he might, with propriety, leave them for the little time he expected to be absent, under the general inspection of his father, who was considerably acquainted with their language, intent upon promoting the good work to the utmost, and who was beloved, and venerated by the Indians; and under the particular instruction of some preachers of their own nation, whom he had found competently acquainted with the most important doctrines of Christianity, zealous in the cause, and faithful to their trust. The school, which he instituted in 1652, for the instruction of the Indians in reading, writing, and the principles of religion, was furnished with a Mr. Peter Foulger, an Englishman, for an instructor; a man esteemed for his piety, and for his ability to teach, not only the common arts, but also the doctrines of the gospel, having a good acquaintance with the holy scriptures.

Mr. Mayhew took passage in a ship with his wife's brother, and an Indian, who was a teacher among the natives: But—"The ways of heaven are many times dark and intricate to mortals"—The vessel was doubtless foundered; neither the ship, nor any of the passengers were ever heard of more!

Thus came to a premature death Mr. Mayhew, jun. who was exceedingly beloved by his Christian Indians: They sincerely lamented his untimely death; and for many years after his decease, he was seldom named without tears. He died in the 37th year of his age, having ministered to the Indians thirteen, or fourteen years.

His death excited pungent grief in the breast of the celebrated Mr. Eliot, the evangelist of the Indians. In a letter of his the following year, he expresses himself in these affectionate terms; "The Lord has given us this amazing blow to take away my brother Mayhew! His aged father does his endeavor to uphold the work among the poor Indians, whom, by letters, I have encouraged what I can."

In addition to what has been already said concerning this excellent man, I shall quote the words of the Rev. Henry Whitfield,† who had been the first minister of the church in Guilford, Connecticut.

In his voyage to Boston, in order to his return to England, in the year 1650, he happened to put in at the Vineyard, and tarried there about ten days.

† The character of this worthy, and amiable divine may be seen in Dr. Mather's Magnalia, B. III. p. 217; and in Dr. Trumbull's History of Connecticut, Vol. I. p. 309.

He attends Mr. Mayhew to a more private Indian meeting; and the next day to the Indian lecture, where Mr. Mayhew preached, and then catechised the children, who answered readily, and modestly in the principles of religion, some of them answering in the English, and others in the Indian tongue. Then Mr. Whitfield adds the following lines, which set Mr. Mayhew's character, as a gentleman of piety, benevolence, zeal, industry and self-denial in a very fair point of light.

"Thus having seen a short model of his way, and of the pains he took, I made some enquiry about Mr. Mayhew himself, and about his subsistence, because I saw but a small, and slender appearance of outward conveniences of life, in any comfortable way. The man himself is modest, and I could get little from him; but after I understood from others how short things were with him, and how he was many times forced to labor with his own hands, having a wife and three small children, who depended upon him to provide necessaries for them; having not half so much yearly coming in, as an ordinary laborer gets there among them; yet he is cheerful amidst these straits, and none hear him complain. The truth is, he will not leave the work, in which his heart is engaged; for on my knowledge, if he would have left the work, and employed himself elsewhere, he might have had a more comfortable maintenance. I mention this the rather, because I have some hope, that some pious mind, that reads this, might be inwardly moved to consider his condition, and come to his succour for his encouragement in this great work."

"Blessed is that servant, whom, when his Lord cometh, he shall find so doing."

(To be continued.)

Nymphas to Sospater.

(Continued from p. 332.)

LETTER II.

IN the present eventful period, at this solemn crisis, when iniquity abounds and blasphemy grows bold; when the most dangerous errors prevail and a deluge of infidelity is spreading through our nation and through Christendom; it would seem impossible any believer in revelation, who loves the Lord Jesus in sincerity, and feels strong wishes for the salvation of sinners, can indulge to sloth. Rather it would seem he must feel deep, solemn concern to do every thing which can be done at any expense, at a risk of all dangers which may threaten. Never, never were the gates of hell more moved, never were the enemies of religion more thoroughly awake and active, than at the present time, while the unclean spirits like frogs are going out to the kings of the earth, and the whole world, to gather them to the battle of the great day of God Almighty. In this most solemn crisis, when the powers of darkness, are all awake and the enemies of Christ are in motion, vigorously exerting themselves to exterminate the name of the blessed Jesus and his religion from the world, shall his few friends sleep on and take their rest? Shall they desert his standard at such a time as this, be lukewarm and indifferent in his cause, and be forgetful of Zion? Rather they should be all awake, all zeal, all activity in the glorious cause they have espoused, after

if possible, go beyond their enemies in the ardor of their exertions and the fervor of their zeal. At such a time they should watch, take the whole armour of God, stand in their lots and keep their garments, lest they walk naked and their shame be seen. At such a time, it behoves them to lean on the arm of their almighty Saviour, to repose on his power, to have recourse to his fulness, to be replenished with his grace, and to drink in large measures of his Spirit that they may stand in this evil day, and like good soldiers under the great Captain of our salvation, fight the good fight of faith.

Do you not, my friend, when you look around and contemplate the present sad state of things and the horrors of that increasing darkness which broods over Christendom, feel the benign influence of love to Christ, to his dear Zion and to the souls of men sweetly constraining you to exert yourself if any thing can be done by you, to oppose error, and to arrest the progress of infidelity? I have confidence you do. But I think I hear you saying with yourself, what can I do in my humble station, and with my abilities? If the Lord had placed me in some conspicuous station, blessed me with brilliant powers of mind, and favored me with a literary education, I might with some prospect of success exert myself. But being what I am in my humble station, what, alas! what can I do? Will you suffer me, my dear sir, to assure you, much of duty lies upon you, the Lord justly looks for much from you, and much, through the Lord's grace may be done by you, though you are placed in the common walks of life, and have not been withered with any very special advantages for making great improvements in divine science.

I wish you to believe me when I tell you, that to come to the help of the Lord against the mighty, to exert yourself to arrest the progress of error and infidelity, and to lay out yourself for the upbuilding of Zion in these troublesome times, it is not necessary that you be in some elevated station, or that you receive your education under some renowned Gamaliel of the present day. As a volunteer in the army of the King of Zion, you and every Christian are designated to be a witness to the truth, to hold forth the word of life, to fight the good fight of faith, to contend earnestly for the faith once delivered to the saints. It is as really your duty as it is the duty of the best champion in his army. Do you ask, how you may and ought to exert yourself? I can only say in brief, by closely following Christ your leader, by breathing his spirit and treading in his steps. His word of command to his whole army and to you is, follow me. In looking to him, the great Author and Finisher of the faith, you keep him full in your view, and watch all his motions and actions, and learn of and follow him. You will act a worthy part in the grand contest now depending, and your Lord will soon say, "Well done good and faithful, to you it is given to sit with me on my throne, and to reign with me forever and ever." He the great Author of the faith delivered to the saints, could say, "To this end was I born, and for this cause came I into the world to bear witness to the truth." It is your honor that you are set for the defence and confirmation of the gospel, to bear witness to the very same truth, and to hold it out to the world, and you are to bear witness and give in your testimony in the same way, that is, by saying, doing and suffering. He has left you his own example, as well as his commands, for your directory. With his example in view and his precepts, it is evident as the light, that you are not to contend by fire and sword, but by an open, bold profession of the faith. He was not ashamed of the gospel. He was active, persevering and indefatigable in diffusing divine knowledge, in spreading the sweet light far and wide, and he was ready to do and suffer, to spend and be spent, to live and die for the diffusion of the heavenly light, for the spread and furtherance of the gospel. O how much did he say, do and suffer for the truth's sake, which is the glorious foundation on which Zion rests and the happiness of his eternal kingdom. In this way, you are to give in your testimony and if called, seal it with your best blood. You are with the greatest advantage to hold out the truth, in word and deed. Your speech should be always with grace, your tongue should be like the tree of life—you are to walk in the truth—you are to exemplify its beauty, energy, and benign influence by a living example, by a conversation becoming the gospel, and you are readily to make any sacrifice of ease, honor and pleasure you are called to—you are to be ready to part with any thing, however dear, yea, with every thing—yea with life itself, if called thereto. In this way, you are to come to the help of the Lord against the powers of darkness, and all the scoffers of the present day. In this manner are you to contend for the faith once delivered to the saints. That the Lord may enable you to see more and more the importance of the controversy now depending, and by his grace dispose you to contend earnestly for the faith once delivered to the saints, is the earnest wish and prayer of yours, &c.

—
Thoughts on Romans vi. 14.

“—For ye are not under the law; but under grace.”

THE apostle wrote this epistle, and directed it to all that be in Rome, beloved of God, called to be saints. He sent it to them, to awaken their zeal and faithfulness in the service of Christ. In the passage under consideration, it was the object of the apostle to persuade his readers to perfect obedience to God, as may be seen by reading the paragraph. The phrase ‘not under the law,’ therefore cannot mean that saints in this world are not under indispensable obligations to conform in all things to the requisitions of the divine law, as much as if there had been no way of grace opened for men. Christ, the author of grace to man, came to magnify the law, and make it honorable, not to sink it into contempt, by absolving his people from obedience to it. For God to dispense with his law, would be to open the floodgates of iniquity and misery upon his creatures. It surely was not to procure this, that he sent his Son into the world. He came not to give his people unbounded licence, but to save them from their sins. God has not made a most excellent and necessary law, and then taught his people to trample it under foot. But has not grace reduced the law from its too great strictness; so that God will accept imperfect obedience, and justify his people upon that? Can it be thought that God will suffer his people to be licentious to a certain degree, and justify them in it: or that, if we are unwilling to yield entire obedience to his will, he will accept of that which is imperfect,—of a small degree of obedience,—of that which we are willing to render him? Will he by doing this, openly acknowledge that his law is too strict? Did Christ die to atone for the crime of having made a law too rigid and severe? By no means. God will not thus conspire with his enemies to sink his law, dishonor his name, and ruin his own kingdom. No man will ever be justified for imperfect obedience. If imperfect creatures are ever justified, their righteousness will be no part of the grounds of their acceptance.

Nor does the consideration, that believers are not under the law, but under grace, render obedience to the law of less importance. The law was ordained against sin, because it is in its own nature and direct tendency reproachful to God, and injurious to the happiness of his kingdom: and certainly it is no less reproachful and injurious in its direct tendency, when committed by those who are not under the law, but under grace; than by those who are under the law. Has the mercy of God to believers lessened their obligations to holiness, or made it of less importance that they should be holy as he is holy? Instead of this, it has greatly increased them.

In what respects then are the saints not under the law? They are not under it as a covenant of works. They do not hope for justification on account of any obedience to it, perfect or imperfect. They plead guilty, and consider themselves justly condemned by it to eternal wrath, and their hopes of acceptance with God are on other grounds. They are under grace, in distinction from the law, in that they hope for justification as matter of mere mercy. They trust in an atonement and righteousness wrought out by Christ, and are assured that all who condemn themselves, and cast themselves upon Christ by faith, shall be justified freely on his account; and they hope for justification by the covenant of grace and not of works. They are already under grace, and are justified by it, and made heirs of the promises.—Therefore,

Believers are not under the law in this respect, they are not subject to its curse on account of any past or future disobedience to it, or however great their sins. Christ is the end of the law for righteousness to them that believe. Though the obligations of the law, as a rule of life, are as indispensable as ever, yet believers are forever delivered from its curse. They are not absolved from obedience to the law, but are justified by grace.

But it is said, that this idea, of being forever justified from all sin, past or to come, is very dangerous, because men will take licence from it to indulge themselves in their lusts, with the hopes of impunity. The apostle noticed this objection in the next verse. "What then? shall we sin because we are not under the law, but under grace? God forbid." It is acknowledged that men may abuse this doctrine. It is acknowledged that they do abuse it. Careless sinners, because they hope for pardon, are much more quiet in their sins, and because sentence against an evil work is not speedily executed, their hearts are fully set in them to do evil. Hypocrites are often known to indulge themselves in their lusts, and live without any regard to the power and spirituality of religion, because they do not consider themselves under the law. They say in their hearts, what is it to us how much we abuse God, so long as Christ is our surety. And it might be wished that real Christians were never so low, as to be guilty of something of the same nature. But in the main it has a quite contrary effect upon them. So far as they are renewed, they are no longer mercenary servants, but have the ingenuous spirit of children; their hearts are drawn by the cords of love; they are exceedingly affected with the infinite mercy of God, and are more effectually drawn by his grace into holiness and obedience to his law, than they could be driven to it by terror. God treats men as they are. If they can be influenced by no motive but terror, they are kept under the law; but when he sees in them an ingenuous spirit, he uses the motive of mercy to excite them to their duty. If then, people find that they take licence to sin, because they conceive that they are not under law, but under grace, it should convince them, that they are not under grace, but are condemned already, and the wrath of God abideth on them. It is only when this consideration excites them more effectually to deny themselves, and take up their cross, and follow Christ, that they have reason to conclude that they are under grace. It is not therefore in itself a dangerous doctrine, but is a rule of trial, of great use, by which to judge ourselves, whether we are true believers, and is a powerful motive to quicken the people of God to obey his law, and devote themselves more zealously to his service.

It is important that men seriously consult their consciences on this subject. Let a man ask himself, have I never indulged myself in sin, on the presumption that I hoped that God would pardon me? Have I not lived more quietly in rebellion against the law and authority of God, because I considered him a merciful being? Have I not done this every day from my youth upwards? Has any consideration given me half so much relief and ease of mind, in sinning against God, and rejecting Christ, and trifling with every thing sacred, as the consideration that God is gracious and merciful? If so, what a wretch am I? How depraved and desperately wicked my heart? What greater evidence can I have that I am a child of wrath? And what more powerful motive to give all diligence to agree with my adversary quickly, while I am in the way with him, lest I be cast into that prison, from which I can never escape, till I have paid the uttermost farthing.

• MIKROS.

Thoughts on Luke xvi. 8, 9.

“THE lord commended the unjust steward, because he had done wisely: for the children of this world are in their generation wiser than the children of light.— And I say unto you, make to yourselves friends of the mammon of unrighteousness; that when ye fail, they may receive you into everlasting habitations.”

MANY have found difficulty in understanding this passage. Some perverse and avaricious minds, use it as a warrant for their selfishness. Others, to avoid this inconsistency with the current of scripture, suppose, that the conduct of the steward was the effect of his repentance, for his extortions on his master's customers. Both of which, I conceive, are totally wrong: And, some other constructions, perhaps, are equally wide of the truth.

It should, always, be remembered that parables are not to be understood as applicable in all respects; they have one particular point in view; if that is attained, it is of little consequence how dissimilar they are in other views. Our Saviour, in this passage, recommends to his followers the right and diligent use of the gifts of providence, both worldly and spiritual; which, as a Christian duty, may be very consistently enforced from the bad example of the steward. For, though his, and his master's interest were divided; yet, the interest of God and man is not divided: God's glory is man's highest interest. Christ might, therefore, from the selfishness of the steward, very consistently recommend to his followers the best possible personal use of the gifts of divine providence: What is man's highest personal good, is most for God's glory.

These things being premised, we will take a direct view of the text before us. The steward, upon information that he should be dismissed, made no attempt to excuse himself, nor any promises of amendment. He was merely anxious for a future livelihood—What shall I do?—I cannot dig, to beg I am ashamed—I am resolved what to do!—Like other wicked men, instead of repenting and reforming, he resolved to pursue his ways of unrighteousness; and to strike a bold stroke at his lord's expense, that he might make to himself friends of his customers, and bring them under obligation of gratitude to him. Accordingly, he called every one of his lord's debtors, and gave in a certain large proportion of their accounts; and thus, he paved the way for a hearty welcome to their houses.

His lord, when he heard of the policy of his steward, was astonished at his knavery, but could not help admiring his worldly wisdom. He acknowledged he had been crafty and wise for himself; and had dexterously provided a livelihood without the drudgery of digging, or, the the shame of begging. Nothing more than this, I conceive, is meant by the lord's commending the wisdom of his unjust steward.

Our Saviour, very naturally observes, upon this parable, that the children of this world are in their generation wiser than the children of light. The worldly man is vastly more diligent, wise and crafty in getting and using the things of this world, than professing Christians are in the right spiritual use and improvement of them. Look! How diligent—how indefatigable is he in all his labors?—He spares no time nor pains to make gain.—He is wise to plan, eagle-eyed to spy and take advantage, and vigorous to execute. What a shame is this to professors of religion! Will the avaricious man thus toil for false and perishing riches; much more ought we to strive for the true riches. Therefore, said Christ, Make to yourselves friends of the Mammon of unrighteousness: Suffer not the covetous and unjust children of this world to out do you in care and diligence; but be ye as prudent and industrious in the ways of charity and virtue in the use and improvement of the talents entrusted to you, as they are to provide for themselves false and perishing riches.

The term, Mammon, is here used in a large and general sense, not only implying riches, but all worldly talents, privileges and acquisitions. These may be called unrighteous, on account of the craft, intrigue, oppression, hypocrisy and various means of dishonesty, generally practised in getting and using them. The original word, here, translated unrighteousness, however, may signify false or uncertain; and is thus contrasted with true riches, in the 11th verse of the context. If, therefore, ye have not been faithful in the unrighteous Mammon, who will commit to your trust the true Mammon. The duty therefore, stands thus, Make to yourselves friends of the false riches of this world.

This duty is inculcated on us, upon the idea that we are stewards of God in the gifts of Providence, the good things of this life; and bound to be faithful to him. Every one of us have talents committed to us, for which we must give an important account. To make friends of these talents is the great business of life. They must be so used as to advance God's glory, our own and neighbor's good; then they will be our friends: they cannot reproach us in this world, nor condemn us in the next. But if we use the gifts of providence to aggrandize ourselves—oppress the poor and needy, or gratify the lusts of the flesh, they will certainly be our enemies. For though, by a misapplication of talents and privileges we may increase the quantity of our good things; yet, we shall lose proportionably in their good quality, and consequently, in their friendship. The wise and prudent use of what we have, is better than a forced and perverse accumulation of that which is forbidden. The little that a righteous man hath, is better than the revenue of many wicked. Would we obtain the true riches, saying grace and eternal life, we must make friends of the false riches, the Mammon of unrighteousness, by carrying our views beyond this life, and acting in all things, with reference to an eternal state. To advance God's glory, through the use of created things, is our highest personal good.

The motives for such a course of conduct, are of infinite weight and importance—That when ye fail, they may receive you into everlasting habitations.* We shall soon fail—our life is a shadow—death is at hand; yet, forgetful of this truth, we seek riches, honors and pleasures; and think we lay up durable happiness—but we are deceived. The acquisition of these things is uncertain, the enjoyment precarious and unsatisfactory, and at best, of short duration. It is folly in extreme to set our affections on them. They will soon leave us, or we shall leave them.

To this failure of our stewardship, we must add the certainty of accounting for it.—It will be of infinite importance that we be found faithful in the false Mammon, otherwise, God will not commit to us the true riches; but punish us for our abuse of the false riches. And how distressing will it be to reflect, that of all the numberless gifts of providence, we have not made friends of any, so as to lay hold on eternal life in Christ Jesus? Our loss will be infinite—Not one friend in heaven, nor on earth! Are not our minds callous to every spiritual sensation,

* Some eminent men have supposed that the word they in this passage refers to the Trinity—Father, Son and Holy Spirit; and to elect Angels, &c This construction appears, to me, foreign and forced; I have, therefore, chosen a different one. They, is doubtless a relative to friends.

such a motive must excite us to diligence, and faithfulness in the use and improvement of the good things of this life.

But on the other hand, do we, like the unjust steward, use the goods of our divine Master for our own best personal good, the glory of God, eternal and glorious will be our reward. Our friends, the good improvement of transitory things, will receive us into everlasting habitations. They will evidence our love and faithfulness to our divine Master, through which, we shall be received into his favor. Though riches and honors of this world fail, our good improvement of them will be everlasting gain.

Though we fail on trial of strict justice at the bar of God; yet, through the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, our good improvement of the false Mammon will be laying up treasure in heaven, where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt, nor thieves break through and steal. Thus, the friends we make of the false and perishing riches of this world, will receive us into everlasting habitations. They will stand an everlasting evidence of our faithfulness to God, in the stewardship, to which he appointed us: and, as such, will introduce us, with a welcome to the joy of our Lord. To such, Jesus our King, will say, Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you: For I was an hungred, and ye gave me meat; I was thirsty, and ye gave me drink; I was a stranger, and ye took me in; naked, and ye clothed me; I was sick, and ye visited me; I was in prison, and ye came unto me. Verily, I say unto you, in as much as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me.

ISRAEL.

The work of God perfect.

(Contin. from p. 410.)

NUMBER II.

HAVING, in a former number proved, if I mistake not, the goodness of God from his works, and obviated the great objection urged by some to invalidate this proof, arising from the existence and prevalence of natural and moral evil in the world; I proceed to take several other views of the work of God, illustrative of its perfection, in its being calculated to exhibit the character of God, as the fountain of good, and of course the character and dependence of creatures. Our Lord Jesus Christ has told us, "There is none good but one, that is God." The truth of this appears in every part of the work of God.

1st, Nothing can be more certain than this, that whatever of greatness, goodness, or happiness creatures possess, is from God. Still this truth is displayed to much better advantage, in the endless variety visible in the degrees of excellence or happiness communicated to creatures, than if they were less, or not at all, diversified. To consider this variety more particularly. God has imparted to inanimate matter, various degrees of excellence, from mere stones and dirt to the light of heaven. He has superadded to certain portions of matter vegetative life, animal life, intelligence, incorruptibility and immortality. The sensitive creatures below us have animal life, various low degrees of intelligence, the power of volition and self-motion, suited to their design and place in the creation; they are impelled by certain propensities and passions to what is necessary for their support, defence, and the multiplication of their kind : but force is their only law of order ; and having no capacity of knowing or enjoying God, they have only a fleeting existence ; and seem necessarily subject to pain, decay and death.

To man God has given far nobler powers. In moral and intellectual excellence he is capable of endless improvement ; he perceives the difference between right and wrong in moral conduct ; he is capable of knowing God, of being like him, and of enjoying him ; of course, he is capable of praise and blame, rewards and punishments : And it being important that God's perfection and glory should be always seen and enjoyed by creatures who are capable of it, and are like him in temper and character, as they shall be displayed both on the vessels of mercy and on the vessels of wrath, God will give him immortality This prerogative is common to all men. In their original powers and inclinations however, individuals are greatly distinguished. But all are equally fitted to bring to pass that part of the universal system of events, fixed in the counsels of God, which his wisdom saw fit to connect with their several volitions and exercises. Moses, David and Washington were not better fitted for their work, than Pontius Pilate, Herod and Judas Iscariot were for theirs. In every age, some are raised up to be lights in the world ; some to produce important changes in the state of things ; some to move in the walks of more private life ; and others to pass their days in the vale of humble obscurity.

It seems evident, that a like variety takes place among the angels, with respect to their several orders ; as may be gathered from the distinct names given them in

Scripture, of thrones, dominions, principalities and powers ; and also, to the individuals of the same order, as may be gathered from the names angel and archangel : so we read that Michael and his angels fought with the dragon, and the dragon fought and his angels.

To crown all, it appears, God has given to the man, whom he hath appointed to be the head of all principality and power, such transcendent glory and excellence, as are far above all blessing and praise.

To create the smallest particle of matter requires, indeed, Almighty Power ; still we seem, more distinctly and forcibly to apprehend the glory of creation, in viewing the different grades of being and perfection communicated to creatures. They afford a sort of relief to the mind, as it soars from one degree of being and perfection to another, until it arrives at the highest : and as we judge of great or small by comparison, we can make a juster estimate of created beings, and of the fulness of the Creator, in tracing and retracing these various degrees, than if the same degree of perfection were given to all creatures ; and the whole is more clearly seen to be from God. But what is still more important, we are able to trace the goodness of God, in communicating his own fulness to his creatures, according to their respective natures ; and the footsteps of divine wisdom, in causing every part of a system, infinitely complex, to unite in this design ; that the whole might be to his praise. No finite understanding can comprehend fully the use of every part of creation to this end. Yet, it is easy to see, in general, that this earth was made for the habitation of man ; that the sun, the moon and the stars were ordained for times, for seasons for days and for years; that the inferior creatures were made subservient to him; that the fulness of the earth and seas was made for his support and delight; and that he himself was made to know and enjoy God, to the end that God might be glorified.

2d, The same economy is observable in God's conduct towards the angels. Some of the angels God has upheld, through their time of probation, in their original state of holiness and happiness; their election of God is now made sure. They excel in strength, they do God's commandments, harkening unto the voice of his word: They are ministering spirits sent forth to minister for them, who shall be heirs of salvation.

They will always behold the face of God, and be of that glorious society, each member of which will be filled with all the fulness of God; and on whom the infinite love of God will rest and be satisfied. Others, and probably of the brightest orders, who might be like Lucifer son of the morning among the other stars, kept not their first estate; but fell into a state of sin and rebellion against God, and were turned out of heaven and reserved in chains under darkness to the judgment of the great day. These have been in a state of open hostility to God and his kingdom from the beginning, and they are heaping up wrath against the day of wrath and revelation of the righteous judgment of God, when the wrath of almighty God will be made known in their utter and eternal destruction.

This great event demonstrates, to the view of all, by fact and experience, and with irresistible evidence, that all holiness and happiness in creatures are from God. The sinning angels were, as just observed, among the brightest, it not of the first angelic orders. If creatures as such had any power to persevere in a state of holiness and happiness independently of God, they must have possessed it. Whichever difference there might be between them and those who kept their first estate, was probably in favor of the former; their fall therefore was not owing to any defect of nature or of temper, peculiar to themselves. However sin arose in their hearts, it is evident it could not be owing to a sinful cause in them, for this would suppose the first sin was before itself. Whenever it existed, and by whatever cause, either positive or negative, it was enmity to God and his kingdom, and infinitely hateful; and they deserved that everlasting fire, which is prepared for them. Their state might have been different; but this must have been of divine appointment. If the trial of the angels was their prompt obedience to the will of God ordaining that one, made lower than they, should be their head and Lord for ever, as seems probable; their supereminent greatness and dignity might have been the occasion of that pride which was their condemnation; or, which is the same thing, the distinguishing bounty of their Creator, might have been its occasion. Be this as it may; when it existed, it was wholly their own; it was not the affection or exercise of any other being, either created or uncreated. But whether it arose from the withdrawal of that divine influence, which was at first imparted; or, as seems most likely, from their peculiar state and circumstances; in which, disobedience, at a fatal moment, presented to their minds a good, which they viewed as superior to that which they enjoyed, or might enjoy, through obedience, it must have been the fruit of God's appointment and disposal. Doubtless God could have upheld them in their first estate, if he had seen fit; as he did the other angelic orders, whom he had chosen to eternal life; and who are called, in scripture, Elect Angels. These were not elected, because they persevered, but they persevered because they were elected. The others fell because they were not elected. God upheld the man Christ Jesus, who was made a little lower than the angels, notwithstanding the trial of his obedience was inconceivably greater than that of any other creature, whom God had placed, in a state of probation. He overcame, not thro' his own strength, as a creature, but because God gave him the Spirit, not by measure. Though he was united to the second person in the Trinity, so as to become one person with him; yet, as a man, he was as liable to fall as any other man. It was indeed impossible for him to fall; but this depended on the promise of effectual support. He is the first of elect creatures, and the Lord of angels and men; but he obtained eternal life, because he was elected to eternal life, in a course of unfailling obedience. From the fall of the sinning angels, then, it appears, that all holiness and happiness in creatures are from God, and are a communication from him alone; —that all elect creatures will enjoy eternal life as the free gift of God, secured by his immutable counsel and decree, and not from indefectibility in the nature of creatures, however great and excellent they may be, and however intimately united to the divine nature.

There were reasons, in the divine mind, for leaving these bright orders of angels to fall, which in fact did fall, rather than others; among which, that suggested, was probably one; that the defectibility of creatures as such might be incontestibly demonstrated, and that the intelligent system might have the proof of this truth for ever in view, That there is none good but one, that is God. It may be said, that God might have revealed this truth to creatures, without having recourse to measures so expensive; but, in answer, it may be observed, that the proof, which God has chosen, is infinitely more impressivè on the minds of creatures; and it would seem, there cannot be too much evidence of a truth, which is the basis of the happiness of God's universal kingdom, and of his own eternal praise. Besides,

In this great dispensation of providence God has taught creatures a lesson of humility, in a way in which none can teach but himself. The event will most powerfully serve to keep them from being lifted up with pride, and so from falling into the condemnation of the devil; to maintain in them a deep sense of their dependence on God; to keep them in their proper place in the system; to fill them with awe of the divine majesty; and to inspire them with lively gratitude and praise for distinguishing and sovereign goodness. In view of this great work, and the other marvellous works of God, the winged Seraphim, in expressions of humble reverence and prompt obedience, with twain do cover their faces, with twain they cover their feet, and with twain do they fly, and cry one to another, and say, Holy, Holy, Holy, Lord God Al- mighty. Be it so, that elect creatures are secured from apostacy by God's eternal counsel and decree ; still, God's counsels and decrees are brought to pass by means. Those means, which serve to give the most distinct and impressive views of God, seem to be essential to preserve creatures from falling away. And the great event under consideration is among the most important for this end. Doubtless it is essential to the order, felicity and perpetuity of God's kingdom. Again,

As sin, in its nature, tends to destroy all happiness in the universe ; and, if it became universal among creatures, would in fact do it, by wholly defeating God's benevolent designs in his works, the gratification of which is the source of his own blessedness, it is strictly an infinite evil. God must therefore be opposed to it with all his heart and with all his strength ; and it seems fit that this opposition should not only be expressed, but fully expressed. And the goodness of God will be as gloriously displayed in making his power, that is Almighty power, known, in the eternal destruction of sinners, as it will be, in giving eternal life to the righteous. This truth is fully confirmed in scripture. Thus when God, in answer to the request of Moses, made all his goodness pass before him, and proclaimed the name of the Lord, he did it in the following words. "The Lord, the Lord God, merciful and gracious, long-suffering, and abundant in goodness and truth ; keeping mercy for thousands, forgiving iniquity and transgression and sin, and that will by no means clear the guilty." It is to be observed, that the guilty are not cleared who are pardoned for Christ's sake, for their guilt is expiated by his suffering as their surety. God's not clearing, or his punishing the guilty then, is as real a display of his goodness, as the exercise of his grace and mercy ; nor can all his goodness be proclaimed without it. Once more :

It appears from this great event, that God is under no obligation to keep any of the holy inhabitants of heaven, or any other creature, from falling into sin and remediless ruin, in point of justice to them as creatures. There is nothing to secure them, but his own good pleasure, in their present holy and happy state. He has, doubtless, pledged his faithfulness to those inhabitants, and also to those amongst men, who have fled for refuge, to lay hold on the hope set before them, by two immutable things, in which it is impossible for God to lie, that they might have strong consolation. But eternal life is the free gift of God to angels as well as to men. The former, indeed, are not ill deserving, as men are, but they are equally undeserving ; they cannot claim it as a reward, on the ground of merit ; they enjoy it as mere bounty ; and this consideration will, above all things else, endear to them both the happiness of heaven ; and will be the only ground of endless gratitude and praise.

3d, I proceed to consider, in several particulars, the work of God in relation to man, in which it will more fully appear, That there is none good but one, that is God.

By the fall of man we are taught many of the truths, which are taught by the fall of the sinning angels. But, as these were of the highest, so man, in his original formation, was the lowest order of moral beings, of whom we have any account ; and by his fall and apostacy from God he rendered himself more vile and brutish than the beasts that perish. But, as God had purposes of mercy towards man, he has, in the measures taken for his recovery, disclosed a scene of wonders, which the angels desire to look into. And the manifold wisdom of God is made known through the church, unto the principalities and powers in heavenly places.

The great object which God had in view in this wonderful work was to destroy the works of the devil, designed to bring dishonor upon God and ruin upon man ; to redeem an elect number of the human race from death and hell ; to raise them into the place left by the sinning angels, or to bring them into nearer union with himself than even the holy angels ; to the intent, that they might be to the praise of his glory for ever.

To attain this object, the glorious mystery of the Trinity of persons in the Godhead is brought into view ; a manner of subsisting essential to the all-perfect Being ; and the ground on which rests the whole fabric of redemption ; and without which, it must have ceased for ever. Each Divine Person, pursuant to the eternal counsels of God, assumes an appropriate office, in the economy of redemption. The Father, that of a righteous governor and judge, demanding satisfaction of men for his violated law ; the Son, that of a mediator to reveal the mind of God to men, to declare the divine righteousness, to atone for sin, and for this purpose to become manifest in the flesh, and to offer up himself without spot to God, to set up a glorious kingdom, to reign in the hearts of his willing subjects, and over all things for their good ; and to plead his merits before the throne of God in their behalf ; the Holy Ghost, that of the comforter, to convince, renew, sanctify and prepare for the vision and fruition of God, here in foretaste, and hereafter in perfection.

Pursuant to this economy the Son of God, in due time, assumed human nature, declared the truth of God ; obeyed the divine law for himself and his followers ; died an accursed death on the cross to satisfy its penalty on their behalf ; arose from the dead ; ascended on high ; and intercedes before the throne of God for all who were given to him in the covenant of redemption ; exercises universal dominion over all creatures and things ; will judge the world in righteousness ; subdue all his enemies under his feet ; and, in the end, deliver up the kingdom to the Father ; when God shall be all in all. The Father is well pleased with the righteousness of his Son ; is propitious to those who believe on his name ; and always hears with grace and favor his intercession ; and the Holy Ghost is sent down to convince the world of sin, of righteousness and of judgment ; to renew and sanctify the elect ; and to form a holy and spiritual kingdom which, when perfected, shall be a full expression of infinite power, wisdom, and goodness ; the view of which, always perfect in the mind of God, is the source of his own eternal enjoyment.

Man being justly obnoxious to the penalty of the law which he had broken, being eternal death, it is manifest, that the plan for his recovery in its origin, development, and completion, must be grace, or unmerited favor. For who, in this, hath known the mind of the Lord, or who hath been his counsellor, or who hath first given unto him and it shall be recompensed to him again? And the peculiar glory of this most excellent part of the work of God is, that it is the highest expression of divine power and wisdom, in concerting and employing the means of exhibiting to creatures, in the most glorious light, this truth, That there is none good but one that is God, and that his goodness is (disinterested) free and infinite.

—But to be more particular; 1st, The events which take place in the course of God's common providence, which are a part of the means which God uses in man's recovery, are calculated with design to prove, and to keep forever in view, this great truth. Some regions of the earth, which formerly were as the garden of the Lord, are become brimstone and salt and burning; while, in others, the wilderness has become a fruitful field. Some are destined to eternal frost or drought; while others are impregnated with the genial rays of the sun and the rain of heaven. God causes it to rain on one city, and he causes it not to rain on another city. One piece is rained upon; and the piece whereon it raineth not, withereth. The most promising hopes of the husbandman are often cut off by frost, drought, mildew, locust or caterpillar. The great and the honorable are often tumbled from their seats; and the poor are raised out of the dust, and seated among princes. Riches make to themselves wings and fly away as an eagle towards heaven. He taketh the wise in their own craftiness, and the counsel of the wicked is carried headlong. We find that the race is not to the swift, nor the battle to the strong, neither yet bread to the wise, nor yet riches to men of understanding, nor yet favor to men of skill; but time and chance happeneth to them all. One dies in infancy, another dies in full strength; his breasts are full of milk and his bones are moistened with marrow; another dies in the bitterness of his soul and never eateth with pleasure. Some enjoy uninterrupted health till old age; others are tortured with disease, and linger out a life of misery. Some possess ease, friends, affluence; others suffer the loss of all things. The base and the wicked are often preserved to old age, and are a burden to all around them; while others, who are pillars in church and state, are cut down in the meridian of life, and in the midst of their usefulness. One builds a house, and another inhabits it. One plants a vineyard, and another eats the fruit of it. Some enjoy the powers of reason; while others fall under the power of distraction. And while most men are, through the mercy of God, solicitous to preserve their own lives and the lives of their dearest connections, some are suffered to be impelled by the temptations of the devil, with horrid rage and madness, to lay violent hands upon them, and to close the dreadful scene, upon themselves. The subjects of the great monarchies of the East, from age to age, suffer the lowest degradation under the pressure of unrelenting despotism. The Tartars, the Arabs and the wild men of America, and of the islands in the South Seas, while they retain more personal liberty, suffer the sharpest vicissitudes of perpetual wars, which, in their state of society, reach the condition of individuals, and inflict on them the most poignant distress. The Hordes of Africa, in addition to this, are subject to the miseries of personal slavery to one another, or in a foreign land ; and to transmit the fatal inheritance to their children from generation to generation. While the nations of Europe, and those in America which originated from them, have, from age to age, under the peculiar smiles of heaven, attained to pre-eminence above the other nations, in that knowledge, which is calculated to embellish society, to elevate the human character, and to lead to the most substantial enjoyments.

Now it is evident to every reflecting mind, that the state of things which has been described, is wisely calculated to teach men, that God is sovereign in the distribution of good and evil—that he is under no obligation to creatures in point of justice—that he has a right to give and take at pleasure—that all which men enjoy from the hand of God is mere bounty or grace—that they are wholly dependent on God—that they have no power of themselves to procure, or to retain any enjoyment—that God is the fountain of all good, and has a right to demand and to receive our homage, gratitude and praise ; nay more, to require us to give up ourselves unto him, as a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable in his sight, which is our reasonable service—that we ought to look to him, in the way which he has appointed, for all needed good ; and from a sense of the insufficiency and uncertainty of present enjoyments, to seek a portion in God, which shall never fail.

Were we to assume the point, that God designed, by the events of his common providence, to engrave these interesting truths upon the minds of men, all which may be summed up in this—That there is none good but one, that is God ; we cannot conceive of any state of things more perfect, than the one which actually exists for this purpose. Be it so, that the sufferings involved in this system are great, yet they are an essential part of that plan of discipline which is necessary, effectually, to teach men a truth, most important to their own well being, and to the honor of God ; and so they are as necessary, as that the truth should be known, or fully known, or they are as necessary, as that God should be glorified, and that man should be happy in the knowledge and enjoyment of him.

OMICRON.

(To be continued.)

*Prædical Remarks on Exodus xiv.
13, 14, 15.*

“And Moses said unto the people, fear ye not ; stand still, and see the salvation of the LORD, which he will shew to you to-day : for the Egyptians whom ye have seen to-day, ye shall see them again no more forever.—The LORD shall fight for you, and ye shall hold your peace.—And the LORD said unto Moses, wherefore criest thou unto me ? Speak unto the children of Israel, that they go forward.”

VARIOUS are the methods of illustrating the nature and manner of the salvation of God, and of meeting the objections raised by carnal, unbelieving hearts, against the sovereignty of divine grace, in the deliverance of sinners, and leading them to glory.

Among these, the conduct of Jehovah in the redemption of Israel from Egyptian bondage, and leading them to the land of promise is eminently one method, improved by the inspired writers of the New Testament, for this purpose. The bondage of those natural children of Abraham, their deliverance and earthly Canaan, were all typical of our spiritual bondage in sin, deliverance from it, journey to, and rest in heaven.

The passage before us leads the contemplative mind to a remarkable era of God's ancient church, and to one of the most remarkable events of providence, ever recorded either in sacred or profane history. This memorable passage of sacred writ, may, at first view, seem to be inconsistent and self-contradictory; but on candid enquiry, be found to be harmonious and full of instruction. To make these manifest for general instruction and improvement, is the present design.

For these purposes, let us first view the circumstances, and the Divine intention.

The whole numerous multitude of Israel were now flocking out from Egyptian bondage—were collected in a body, with their women, children and substance, and with Moses for their leader, under the immediate direction and conduct of Israel's God. In the preceding chapter, we read of their taking their journey, and encamping in Etham, in the edge of the wilderness; to human reason, their best way, but infinite wisdom saw better. God had yet the most glorious purposes to answer, for the manifestation of his great name, to the end of time, and to all eternity, in the destruction of his enemies, and salvation of his chosen.

Therefore the Divine order, at first full of mystery, and soon after full of glory, was, to vary from this course to the straits of Hiroth. This from Etham to Pihahiroth, was turning short off to the right hand, from a direct course through the wilderness, without any sea intervening, to the land of Canaan; and going in between two ranges of high, craggy and impassible mountains, between Migdol, a garrisoned city of Egypt and the red sea, over against Baal-Zephon, another place on an eminence, with a garrison. Pharaoh, who resembled the grand adversary, had a malicious, persevering design to oppose God, and ruin Israel; Jehovah designed to triumph gloriously in his utter ruin, and in the salvation of his people, in a method that should still further manifest their entire dependence on him, and signalize his special providence and grace in Israel's deliverance. All this was typical of the destruction of Satan and all his legions; and of the great deliverance of the redeemed church and people, under the captain of our salvation.

Sinners, who are under the bondage of sin and Satan, must, in their own view, and agreeable to what is real, be brought into great straits, out of which, neither they themselves, nor any other creature can extricate them, in order to the illustrious display of the power and riches of sovereign grace in their salvation.

God's thoughts and ways are immeasurably above ours, as the heavens are above the earth. Pharaoh considered the case of Moses and the Israelites as that of a lost people, who in their bewildered state, had brought themselves into that embarrassed situation, which he determined to improve to their ruin. So would the God of Israel have it, that he might take the wife in their own craftiness. See the context.

With these circumstances and designs in view, we proceed to some remarks on the passage of sacred history before us. I would observe, our subject divides itself into three parts.

1. And Moses said unto the people, fear ye not; stand still, and see the salvation of the Lord, which he will shew to you to-day.

2. And the Lord said unto Moses, wherefore criest thou unto me?

3. Speak unto the children of Israel, that they go forward. How is this to be reconciled with the first order to stand still?

Under the first part of our subject thus divided, it may be proper to remark, that there are two important things intended.

1. To quiet all heart-risings against God and his government, and all the tumultuous passions of unbelief, in times of trouble and darkness.

It is natural to say to a child, when passionate and tumultuous, stop; be still. May not God speak thus to his sinful, unworthy children? Surely, he may; for his own honor and their good. Their fear was not filial, Godly fear; had it been, they would not have conducted as they did, and have justified themselves in it; nor would they have been commanded to cease from fear, and be still. How gross are the absurdities of ingratitude and unbelief? Crying to God in distress is a reasonable duty, and most precious privilege; but crying to God, and murmuring against him, and with a wicked baseness, quarreling with his providence, and justifying ourselves in it, is inconsistent, and very sinful.

How often is this the case in the time of trial with God's own children, and always the case with the un sanctified, even under strong convictions?

God by Moses would have the people know, that they had no great struggle but with themselves. Were they right with him, he would soon end the contest—Therefore,

2. There is a standing still, when, having followed the Divine direction, we leave it all with God, willing that he should have all the glory, and in the way of duty, wait on him alone for his salvation.

As if Moses should say, “the mountains swell and are impassible on the right hand, and on the left; the sea is on our front, and the chariots and armies of Egypt trained for war, on our rear. What then? More is for us than against us. By the Divine order we are here, and let us not rebel. It plainly appears that salvation is not, even in part in us, but wholly in Israel's God. Now then quiet the tumultuous fears of unbelief, your murmurings against the blessed God. This is not your peace and safety. Bring your mind and will entirely to the mind and will of Jehovah; give over your whole salvation into his hand, be willing that he should accomplish it in his own way, and for his own glory. Thus stand still, for in this you have nothing to do, and wait for the salvation of the Lord; and see how he will, this day, bring it to pass.”

Is not this an illustrious example of temporal salvation, familiarly instructive in things spiritual and eternal? Is not every sinner reduced to this in true conversion? Does not the church of the living God thus come up, out of bondage, leaning on her beloved? Sinful rebels, in true conversion, are thus forced to a stop—all their confidences are taken away—sin revives, and they die, as to all vain helps, and they are shut up to the faith. In a spiritual sense, they are brought to Pibahiroth, to impassible mountains on the right and left, the sea is before them, and dreadful armies behind them. What shall they do? What can they do? Shall they here stand to dispute their Maker? Set up their wills against his will? Shall they attempt to run away from God, and turn back to Egypt, and die there? Shall they leave the word of God, the gospel of the only Saviour, for human projects, and the oracle of reason? Vain projects all, and broken reeds! With respect to all these, give them up; hold thy peace, and be still. There is no going back, or forward, to the right or left but in God; he, and he only, against whom you have sinned, is your help; if this fails, all must fail, and you forever sink. Stand at the foot of the cross; with a consenting heart say, let the sovereign Lord alone be exalted; let him, of whom, to whom, and thro' whom are all things, have all the glory, and thou shalt this day see the salvation of the Lord.

II. And the Lord said unto Moses, wherefore criest thou unto me!

Query, was God displeas'd with Moses for praying? I answer, by no means. The design of this peculiar expression, as I humbly conceive, was to satisfy his faith. "I have heard and answered thee, wherefore dost thou, at this time, cry any longer to me." The Chaldea paraphrase is, "I have accepted thy prayer; wherefore shouldst thou press thy petition any further, when it is already granted: Again, this peculiar expression was to quicken his diligence to other urgent duties. "Thou, under-captain of my people, turn thy prayer into action; the present important business requires haste. You must now be at you post, and receive, and give orders from me, as properly as if the victories and glories of the day depended on it." Thus it pleas'd the sovereign God of salvation; and in his own way, will he be honored and glorified.

Prayer is a duty inexpressibly precious; but it is not all our duty, nor if we truly practise this, may we be excus'd in the neglect of others. There is an uniformity in religion; thro' the whole Christian journey, every duty is to be attended agreeable to the directions of God's word, and the calls of his Providence. "Then shall I not be ashamed, when I have respect to all thy commandments."

III. Speak unto the children of Israel, that they go forward.

How is this to be reconciled with the first order to stand still? Had not the man of God, with a divine warrant, just before said to the people, fear not, stand still and see the salvation of God? Now the order is, Speak to them that they go forward. How is it that we stand still, and yet go forward? I would illustrate this by a similitude. Thus when any light thing is bor'd up on the bosom of a river; it has no separate or contrary motion of its own, but is uniformly carried on by the gentle current. So the person, who in heart and conduct is resign'd to God, having no separate interest from his will and glory, having given over all its salvation into his hand, and in the way of duty, taking all its directions from him, does, as to itself, rest, and is still; yet moves forward in, and with God, as the cork on the flowing stream. Thus, O Israel, be still, as to all distrustful, distracting fears; all vain confidence, quarreling with God. In cheerful obedience to all his will, go forward, giving up thy salvation into his hand, and wait the issue in their deliverance, and the destruction of thine enemies.

The work of salvation in respect to purchase is done without our help. All human merit is excluded; in this we have no part.

This is not inconsistent with the most vigorous exertions till we arrive at the heavenly rest. We are to pray for the peace of Jerusalem, and endeavor to advance it. If the Lord say, go forward, and lift up thy hand over the waters, do all he commands; yet remember, the effect is all of divine power and grace, as truly, as when the sea divided to the rod of Moses, stretched over it. The means are of divine appointment; to succeed them is all of God. In times of darkness and trouble be calm and submissive; in patience possess your souls. Make the munition of rocks your strength; bring all, submit all to God, and wait for him. He that bringeth his people into trouble, will bring them out, and be honored in their salvation; and on all the glory create a defence.

Through dismal straits and swelling seas,

With Egypt in the rear,
Our glorious captain leads our way,
And bids us cease to fear.

Thou fearful faint, fresh courage take;
The clouds you so much dread,
Are big with mercy, and shall break
In blessings on thy head.

MARCUS.

An account of a work of divine grace in a revival of religion in Durham settlement, town of Freehold, county of Greene, state of New-York, communicated to the Editors by the Rev. Jesse Townsend, pastor of the church in that place.

MESS'RS EDITORS,

TO aid the work in which you are engaged, and to furnish to the friends of Zion, a faithful account of the work of divine grace we have experienced in this town, I herewith send you a statement of what God has recently done for us.

EARLY in the autumn of 1799, a work of divine grace began in this settlement. A spirit of prayer appeared first to be given. Those stirred up to prayer, soon felt disposed to associate for this special duty, and began to speak with freedom to one another concerning the interests of Christ's kingdom. Conference meetings were set up, and pretty steadily attended, by a small number from the fall of 1799 till the spring of 1800. In this time, considerable doctrinal knowledge was gained, though in other respects, to human view, the work progressed very slowly. In this time, however, some I believe were earnestly wrestling with God in prayer for Zion's prosperity. Like Jacob they wrestled and like Israel prevailed. The good news which about this time reached us from divers parts of our land, was as the sound of a going in the top of the mulberry trees, and increased the animation of Zion's friends. A spirit of prayer was revived, and the church began to awake from the dust and sing. In June 1800, having been for a few days providentially absent from my people, I found on my return home, that about twenty male members of the church had agreed to meet together on the very day of my return, for special prayer to God for the outpouring of his spirit in the revival of religion among us. I returned home just seasonably enough to attend; and a most solemn meeting we had. All seemed sensible of great remissness in duty. The church began to hear the voice of her beloved knocking, and could then say, "My beloved put in his hand by the hole of the door and my bowels were moved for him." Our conference meetings had, for a few weeks previous to this, been omitted. But now a brighter dawn advanced, four young persons appeared under conviction, and we earnestly hoped that soon the sun of righteousness in all his glory would rise on us with healing in his wings. The church had several meetings for special prayer, and we trust their prayers were heard. A general seriousness on the face of the congregation began now to appear, and people more than ever to attend punctually to public worship. Great solemnity now prevailed, and the enquiry, what shall I do to be saved? began to be a matter of personal concern. In the mean time, some were hopefully converted, who were made use of as instruments of great good to others. They could say to their fellow sinners, as the woman of Samaria once did to the men of the city; "Come see a man that told me all things that ever I did. Is not this the Christ?" Our conferences now began to be crowded, and a much greater freedom in religious conversation obtained. Important religious subjects were introduced and freely discussed—among which were the following: the nature of the divine law, its extent, purity, and spirituality;—human depravity; moral impotency and its criminality; the nature and necessity of special grace in regeneration; the importance of daily prayer; of fully searching the holy scriptures, and of heart examination; the duty of immediately loving God with all the heart, and the criminality of neglecting thus to do; the nature and criminality of selfishness; the nature and happy tendency of benevolence or disinterested affection; the sovereignty and riches of divine grace; that all who are saved, are saved as poor miserable sinners, through the righteousness of Christ, and that all who are condemned and perish, suffer the just demerit of their sins, from the hand of a righteous sovereign. These, with other things, calculated to persuade men to accept of Christ on the terms of the gospel, and to search and try the professor, and to detect the hypocrite, and give comfort to the believer, have been again and again brought into view in our conferences.

In the course of the last summer and autumn, the out pouring of God's spirit was very special in this settlement. Since the awakening first began, fifty-six new members have been added to the church; twenty-nine of whom were admitted on Lord's day, 2d of August last; when it was judged that our assembly of people met for religious worship was about eight or nine hundred; this was a day of great rejoicing with Zion's friends. About eighty have given hopeful evidence of having experienced a saving change since the awakening first began, all of whom appear to come very fully into a belief of the doctrines of grace. Of these, some may be stoney-ground-hearers, as yet however, they hold out well, though some, who neglect to profess Christ before men, appear not to have so favorable an opinion of themselves as their Christian friends have of them; but it is to be hoped, they will at last be found among the number of Christ's true followers.

God has had mercy on whom he would have mercy, and persons from between fifty and sixty years old, down to the age of about fifteen, have been made the hopeful subjects of this great work. God has most mercifully preserved us from all appearances of enthusiasm. Though the word has been like the hammer and the fire to break in pieces the rock, yet the work has not been with noise and tumult. The new converts appear to ground their hopes of a change of heart on the sensible evidence they have within themselves, that they have a new taste, a relish for holiness, and a reconciliation to the gospel method of salvation in and through Jesus Christ. At present our conference meetings continue; but our number of attendants is much smaller than it has been. We hope, however, there are some who are yet earnestly enquiring what they shall do to be saved. What has taken place among us, is we trust, the Lord's doings and it is wonderful in our eyes. The Lord is in this way, lifting up a standard against the enemy who is coming into our land like a flood. Let the children of Zion be joyful in their King, and in him put their trust.

I remain, Gentlemen, with esteem, your brother in the best bonds,

JESSE TOWNSEND.

April 12, 1802.

FOR THE CONNECTICUT EVANGELICAL MAGAZINE.

A narrative of a hopeful conversion near the close of life.

THE subject of the following account was a young man of about 24 years of age. Until about eight weeks before his death he lived in a great measure thoughtless of God, and insensible to the concerns of the soul. About the beginning of March, 1801, he was suddenly taken with inward bleeding, which resisted every remedy, brought on a rapid decline, and in a few weeks finished his days.

In his own apprehension, his dangerous disorder found him wholly unprepared for the solemn scene, to which, it finally brought him. He was, therefore, much alarmed, and constrained to cry to God for mercy. After the first attack of his disorder, alternate hopes and fears were entertained respecting his recovery, and the agitation of his mind, in some measure, abated, and gave him opportunity, for deliberate reflection and enquiry. At first, and through the course of his sickness, until his hopeful change a few days before his death, he was rather reserved in speaking on his religious state and prospects. Still, however, he fully intimated his wish to hear and be instructed, and to enjoy the prayers of Christian friends. By words and other signs he gave the most unequivocal proof, that, from the beginning of his sickness, he was wounded, not only in body, but in spirit—that his soul was exercised with fear, anxiety and distress. Most commonly when hearing discourse on the nature and importance of religion, tho' his tongue was silent, tears could be perceived freely flowing from his eyes. At a time in the early part of his sickness, (on a day when his symptoms were more favorable, and some hopes of his life were entertained) as it was observed to him, that whether he were to recover of his present illness or to die, it made little difference as to the importance of attending to the concerns of his soul, that it became him in his present situation to make it his highest concern to be prepared to die, he replied with great earnestness, "That is all I care for," and burst into a flood of tears which quite overcame him. He fully intimated that he was more concerned for his soul than for his body. Until his hopeful, happy alteration, tho' frequently enquired of, he but once expressed any hope that he was prepared for a better world. One day, when interrogated as to his prospects, he said, "I have some hope;" but the following day, it had all vanished, and he still felt, that he was without hope and without God in the world. When asked from day to day, if any thing new and comforting appeared to his mind, he continually replied, "No." When directed to pray, believe in Christ, trust in God and the like, he used to reply, "My heart works against me. My heart is against God. My prayers are abomination in the sight of God. I have no rest." Until the Lord, as we hope, put a new song in his mouth, one or two of these short, but significant expressions was the most he would say at an interview.

On Monday, a week before his death, when he was expected to continue but a few days, after enquiries respecting the state of his body, he was asked as usual, if he could say any thing more favorable than heretofore as to the state and prospects of his soul; he answered with a voice and countenance expressive of deep anxiety and distress. "I wish I could." He was then told that he was in the hands of a just and merciful God, who could do him no injustice if he left him to perish, and who would have mercy on him or not, as seemed good in his sight. He was now, indeed, to a serious mind an affecting spectacle, an immortal soul daily expecting to meet his God and receive his sentence for eternity and yet without a hope of any preparation!

But the time of his hopeful deliverance was drawing near, when his prison doors were to be opened and his captive soul enlarged. The next day, on Tuesday, towards night, he called his mother to his bed-side, and told her to this effect, —that he now felt willing to die; that he had been thinking of the goodness of God to him all his days, and it appeared most wonderful and glorious, as it never appeared before, strongly and repeatedly expressing his admiration and love. At the same time, in connection with this view of the goodness of God, he expressed a strong and lively sense of his own ingratitude, abuse of divine mercy and exceeding sinfulness. "I wonder, (said he) that God hath spared me so long in the world—that he hath not long before now cut me down in my sins and sent me to everlasting misery." From this time until his death, on the following Monday, he appeared, when in the exercise of reason, so far as can be judged from his conversation and deportment, almost constantly to enjoy clear views, and a lively sense of the beauty, glory, and loveliness of the divine character, and especially as it shines in the face of Christ. "Oh the beauty, the loveliness of God—the sweetness, the glory of Christ," was his continual exclamation.

In consequence of this apparently happy alteration in his views and feelings, he was not barely resigned to death, but most of the time ardently desirous to die. Tho' at times, in view of some particular very desirable object, he would say he was willing or desirous to live, yet in general, and always when directly contemplating the glory of his God and Redeemer, he chose and earnestly desired to depart. On Wednesday morning, the day following his change, he said to a visitor almost as soon as he spake with him, "I am willing to go any minute when God is pleased to call for me. If my heart do not deceive me, I am ready when God is ready. I shall die in peace." (If my heart do not deceive me, was an expression which he very frequently intermingled with his strong professions.) It was observed to him on his expressing very ardent desires to die, that he must patiently wait God's time. He answered, "I am willing God should do with me just as he pleases. If he were to put it to me to choose for myself, I would put it back again to him." He spoke repeatedly and almost continually of his satisfaction and contentment with the will of God. When enquired of by his friends, who called to visit him, how he was, he very often replied, "I am well—well off." During his severest distresses, which were frequent, he would continually say, "It is right, all is right. Whatever God does is right. I am contented with the will of God. I would have every thing just as he would have it." On Wednesday as he had been strongly expressing his sense of the loveliness and glory of God and Christ, he was asked, if sin appeared evil and hateful, he replied to this effect, "I abhor myself and repent in dust and ashes. I hate all sin. I cannot bear any sin." Being asked if it now appeared that it would be right and just in God to cast off such a sinner and punish him forever? He answered, "It would be perfectly right. I should not have a word to say." Previous to this, during his sickness, when the same question had been repeatedly asked him, he could not answer it in the affirmative. He could not submit to the justice of God in punishing sinners forever, and especially as it applied to himself. But now he saw and submitted to it with all freedom and fulness, and repeatedly expressed the same feelings in the strongest terms. On Friday about 11 o'clock he was seized with convulsions in which both he and his friends expected he would die. At this time he appeared to be perfectly rational and clear in his views and hopes. As the writer of this account went into the room and spoke to him, he said, "I am going; I am going to Christ. Oh the beauty, the glory of Christ! I long to be with him. Behold the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world!" After coughing severely, as he perceived one of his convulsed turns coming on, in which he expected to expire, he called for the family to come to the bedside and bade them all farewell, saying, "I am going—I shall soon be in heaven." As he recovered of this and similar turns, he would say, "I hoped that would have been my last turn. I hoped I should have gone then." Once he said, "welcome death, O, how I long for thee!" At another time, "O death where is thy sting! O, grave, where is thy victory!" From time to time he said, "I long to die that I may see God—that I may see the lovely Jesus. I long to be in heaven with the angels praising God and the Lamb." As expressing his desire to die, at a certain time, he was asked why he felt such desires? He answered, "That I may glorify God perfectly. I have been sinning against him all my days, and now I long to be in heaven that I may glorify him forever." At another time he said, "When I look backward on my past life, it looks dreadful, but when I look forward, Oh how glorious! I long to be in heaven with the angels praising God and the Lamb." He greatly abounded in sentiments and expressions like those now related. In his views and exercises towards God and all spiritual objects, old things seemed to be passed away and all things become new. Nor was he less altered in his feelings towards his fellow men. He expressed repeatedly a most ardent love to their souls, and fervent desires for their salvation. He addressed those who came to see him with much propriety and solemnity. To a number present at a time when he was supposed to be dying he said, "Come see me die! You must all follow me. See what you are all coming to!" To one of his sisters, who was out of health, sitting on his bedside tenderly weeping, he said, "Do not weep so. Do not weep for me. You will kill yourself with weeping. Go, and get ready to die. See that you be prepared to die. Remember what I say." At the same time casting his eye on a number of young persons in the room, he says, "I advise you all to prepare yourselves to die. Call upon God to have mercy on you." He repeatedly charged his friends not to weep for him, but to weep for themselves, and prepare to follow him to a better world. He frequently expressed earnest desires and prayers for the salvation of the people where he lived, and especially for the young, and particularized some of his former companions. Soon after his hopeful change he said, "I long that the young people of this place might have their eyes opened. I know not but I long for their salvation as much as I do for my own." He used at all times when this object was in view, to express desires that he might live, at least for a season, to use his endeavors with his connections and acquaintances, to persuade them to accept of Christ, and to love and serve God. "If ever I should get well" (he said) "I would talk to my friends. I want they should love Jesus." Among other objects which occasionally drew from him desires of living, one was, that he might be useful to his mother who was a widow and had peculiar dependence on him for aid and support. He said at a certain time casting his eye on his mother, "I have but one desire to live; that is, for my mother. But my brother will take care of her. As long as he lives, she will want for nothing!" He was also, at times desirous of living that he might have opportunity to own Christ before men, and join with his people in commemorating his dying love at the sacramental table. From the time of his hopeful change, he felt himself and appeared to others to be a new creature, and in a new world. He seemed to realize that he was snatched as a brand from the devouring flames. "Had I died a week ago" (he said) "I should now have been in hell" He was abundant in ascribing the change he had experienced to the power and grace of God. The morning of the day in which he died, on Monday, as he was expressing his sense of the evil of sin, and that it would be just and right in God to cast him off forever, it was observed to him that a little time before, he was not willing to express himself in that manner, he replied, "True; but I am now a very different person from what I was then." And who has made you to differ? (he was asked.) He answered with emphasis, "Who made the world?" After this he said little more that was rational and intelligible, and in the after part of the day expired: and as we have reason to hope pas-fed another change greater and more glorious than the first. "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord."

Observations on the revival of religion in Kentucky.

THE religious intelligence from the state of Kentucky has considerably occupied public attention. Concerning it, different sentiments are entertained and various observations made. All this from the nature and circumstances of the work, might naturally be expected.

Verbal intelligence, which is too often incorrect, is not the only means, by which, we are acquainted with the remarkable work, which is going on in that state. I have read several letters written by eye witnesses, beside those published in the magazine. They all correspond concerning the revival; especially, with respect to those appearances, which distinguish it from others.

Multitudes meet and continue long together for religious worship; particularly on communion days. This may be accounted for, from the practice of the Presbyterian societies, among which the awakening has more generally prevailed. It has been, and now is, a common practice of the Presbyterian churches to have religious worship both preceding and following the communion day; and also for societies to visit each other on those occasions.

But the circumstance of persons falling down under religious impressions, which has been common in the revival in Kentucky, is singular and strange.

On this, which has led many to suspect the genuineness of the work, I design to make some observations.

The falling down of persons under religious exercises, however unusual and remarkable, is not, it is thought, a sufficient argument to prove it a work of error and delusion. This may appear by the following observations taken in their connection.

1. It is plain from common observation, that an intimate connection subsists between soul and body. They mutually affect each other. No sooner are impressions made on the bodily senses, than correspondent sensations and ideas exist in the mind. And in like manner; when the emotions and passions of the mind are excited, correspondent effects of body are often produced. How sensibly is the body often agitated by the sudden passions of joy, anger, and fear? These are daily observable in children; and not, uncommonly, in those of riper years. By great joy or sudden frights persons are sometimes overcome, divested of strength, and fall to the ground.

2. The objects, which occasion religious impressions are vastly more important, interesting, and sublime in their nature, than any others imaginable! What objects conceivable are, so eminently calculated to excite the feelings and agitate the power of the soul as those of eternity—Heaven and hell—the perfections of God—the purity of his law—and an heart of enmity in opposition and consequent exposedness to the everlasting wrath of the Almighty! These, surely, surpass all others in rousing the passions of the soul.

3. God is able to bring those objects into the view of the mind, in a most clear and sudden manner. For he is not limited in the circumstances of manifesting truth to his creatures. God can uncover hell to the sinner, and heaven to the saint, in a more gradual or sudden manner; in more faint or lively colours, as seemeth him good. For his thoughts are not our thoughts; neither are his ways our ways. Great effects on the countenance and body would no doubt follow such sublime and sudden discoveries of divine things as God is able to make.

4. God has not, precisely, revealed all the circumstances attendant upon the manifestation of his truth. The spirit is promised to convince of sin, righteousness, and judgment; and to create a new heart and renew a right spirit. But, as to the various circumstances, degrees of operation, and immediate visible effects he has not informed us. Therefore, in surveying the holy scriptures, we are totally unable to measure the terrors of the law, which the sinner may feel; or the glory of the gospel, which the saint may behold. The scriptures do not determine, whether religious impressions shall be gradual or sudden; small or great; faint or clear. Neither do they designate the immediate effects; whether they shall be attended with sober solemnity or flowing tears, still contemplation or audible outcries, sadness of countenance, trembling of body, or falling to the ground.

5. The sovereignty of God is abundantly manifest in the marvelous work of grace. And, particularly, in the diversity of their exercises and operations, in whom the same spirit is produced. A careful attention to the various religious experiences of Christians will corroborate the remark.

Although all the real friends of God are brought, in degree, to a sense and love of the same gospel truths; yet there is almost an incalculable variety respecting the measure of conviction, suddenness of operation, clearness of discovery, and the immediate effects produced on the countenance or body.

This is confirmed by common observation; and to the truth of it, the sacred scriptures bear testimony, in the various relations they afford us of Christian experience. In surveying them, we find many, who embraced the truth by sober consideration, until the day star of the gospel arose in their hearts. But some, the hearers of Peter, by a single sermon, were cut to the heart, and suddenly cried out, men and brethren what shall we do? and believed immediately. The Lord opened the heart of Lydia to attend to the things spoken by Paul, until she believed in Christ. But, when the woman of Samaria had found the Messiah, she immediately left her water pot, and hastened to the city, and proclaimed him. Felix trembled at the reasoning of Paul, upon righteousness, temperance and judgment to come. But Paul, himself, in his persecuting journey to Damascus, was instantly struck to the ground by divine light and truth, and cried out, Lord what wilt thou have me to do?

Once more: Christ endured the penalty of the law in the sinner's stead. He drank the cup of divine wrath, when he expired on the cross. Of which awful scene, he had a previous view, while he was in the garden. And what was the effect on his body? We are told, he was in an agony and sweat, as it were, great drops of blood falling to the ground!

In review of the above remarks taken in their connection, what shall we say of the singularity apparent in the revival at Kentucky? Bearing in mind the usual in-ence of the body and mind, will it be deemed inconsistent with the nature of things, to suppose, that the passions of the mind may be so powerfully excited, as to occasion all those appearances which distinguish and characterise the supposed work of religion in Kentucky? May not God, in perfect consistency with his word and sovereign pleasure, overcome the bodies of men, by the clear and sudden manifestation of truth to their minds? A hardened Felix trembled, and a persecuting Paul fell and cried out, by the application of divine truth and a sudden view of eternal realities! and may not similar causes produce similar effects at the present day? Who hath been the counsellor of God? Who can set bounds to the operations of his holy spirit? And say hitherto shalt thou come and no farther!

But, notwithstanding what has been observed, it is, doubtless, unwise hastily to decide, either in favor or against the awakening, at Kentucky, merely from the peculiarities of it. Other attendant circumstances, which indicate the genuineness of the work, are less fallible criterions of decision. And the subsequent fruits, which may in future appear in the life and conversation of the subjects, we humbly hope, will give abundant occasion to rejoice in the victory of divine grace.

To conclude: Let the enemies of this remarkable work, wait and be cautious. And, instead of venting their opposition, by calling it the work of Satan, or the Kentucky enthusiasm, be exhorted to take the advice of Gamaliel: refrain; for if this work be of men, it will come to naught; but if it be of God, ye cannot overthrow it; lest haply, you be found to fight even against God!

Letter to the Trustees of the Missionary Society of Connecticut.

GENTLEMEN,

I SINCERELY rejoice in the establishment and reputation of Connecticut Missionary Society: I fully believe it has been instrumental of promoting that kingdom which is not of this world. The members receiving no compensation for their services manifests a spirit truly disinterested, and gives great consistency to the charitable establishment:

Being highly pleased with the missionary object, and with what I hear in relation to the success of those who have been, and are engaged in the benevolent business; and wishing to do something to encourage the continuance and the increase of exertion for the spiritual good of my fellow men, I transmit to you, by the bearer of this, one hundred dollars, which I beg you to receive as a sacrifice to the Lord—Upon the ground that existing emergency can be sufficiently attended to. I am pleased with the idea of funding property the interest of which only to be appropriated for the propagation of the gospel; but being apprehensive that the present call for missionary service is very great, it is my choice that what I send you be put to immediate use, and I entertain no doubt but you will gratify my wishes.

The well authenticated information of happy revivals of religion in many parts of the new countries, is, gentlemen, truly animating.—“This is the Lord’s doing—it is marvellous in our eyes.” May God continue to lift up his standard against infidelity and irreligion, may he inspire all his friends with increasing ardor in his glorious cause, may he give unto those who are called to dispense the unsearchable riches of Christ, a double portion of his spirit; and may he from time to time raise up benefactors through whose liberality the interest of Zion in our infant settlements, and among the heathen may be greatly promoted.—I am gentlemen respectfully yours,

CHENANIAH.

May 9th, 1802.

QUESTIONS.

MESS'RS. EDITORS,

A CONSTANT reader of your excellent Magazine, wishes that some friend to missions would give us his thoughts on Mark xvi. 15. "Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature." Does not this command now extend, in a sense, to all Christians? And what must they do, to comply with it?

MESS'RS. EDITORS,

OBSERVING in your Magazine explanations of several difficult passages of scripture which are highly gratifying to me, I take the liberty to request through the same medium, an explanation of Hebrews, vii. 1—3.

H. S.

ORDINATION.

On the 5th day of May last, the Rev. Asa King was ordained pastor of the first Church of Christ, in Pomfret in the room of the Rev. Aaron Putnam, dismissed. The public exercises commenced at half after 11 o'clock A. M. and were performed as follows. The Rev. Elihalet Lyman made the introductory prayer. The Rev. Moses C. Welch preached from Acts, viii. 5. The Rev. Eliha Atkins made the consecrating prayer. The Rev. Josiah Whitney gave the charge. The Rev. Walter Lyon gave the right hand of fellowship. And the Rev. John Sherman made the concluding prayer.

A versification of the 18th chapter of the first book of Kings.

JHOVAH'S awful voice the silence broke,

And thus his message to Elijah spoke :
Go shew thyself to Israel's king again,
And on the earth I'll send a mighty rain.

The prophet went, nor fear'd the tyrant's hate,
He met him walking near the city gate.

The king had left the furnish'd courtly halls,
To seek for grafs for beasts of royal stalls.

For three long years, the brazen heavens distil,
No dew nor rain, such was Jehovah's will !

For Jezebel's and Ahab's wicked deeds,
From righteous heaven this judgment just proceeds.

The trees all wither through the land, and round,
No vegetation clothes the parched ground ;

The pool, the spring, the brook no longer flows,
And the broad rivers their deep beds disclose :

Famine and pestilence attendant stand,
And wave destruction round the guilty land :

Once fruitful Israel, now a barren heath,
Is fill'd throughout with monuments of death.

When Ahab saw the prophet's reverend head,
" Art thou the troubler of our land ?" he said.

The seer replied, " thy land I trouble not,

" But thy own crimes these mighty woes have brought ;

" Go, therefore, send thy heralds round the coasts,

" And at Mount Carmel gather Israel's hosts :

" Let the whole race of idol prophets hear,

" And with the people at the Mount appear."

The king obey'd, and through all Israel's land,
The heralds bear their monarch's dread command.

The people and the idol prophets all,
Attend obedient to their monarch's call.

Elijah then address'd the assembled throng,
And mighty inspiration mov'd his tongue.

"How long, ye halting sons of Israel's name

"Shall two opinions still expose your shame?

"If the Almighty is your chosen God,

"Obey his word, and tremble at his rod;

"But if this heathen Baal you adore,

"Serve him alone, and serve the Lord no more."

Abash'd with conscious guilt, the people stood,
And numerous thousands answered not a word.

Again the prophet speaks, the people hear,

With mute attention listens every ear.

"I singly stand, a prophet of the Lord,

"Alone escap'd the queen's destroying sword.

"The idol prophets here before us stand,

"By hundreds gather'd from all Israel's land:

"Let two unblemish'd bulls for sacrifice,

"Be here produc'd before the people's eyes;

"Let them take one, and as their rites require,

"An altar raise, for sacrifice prepare,

"Call on their God to answer them by fire:

"I also, who proclaim Jehovah's word,

"With stones will raise an altar to the Lord,

"The other bullock for the offering slay,

"The wood prepare, the flesh in order lay,

"As laws divine and holy rites require,

"And call on God to answer me by fire.

"That God whose offering burns with heavenly blaze,

"Shall be the God to serve, adore and praise."

To this dread trial, anxious for the event,

The waiting multitude proclaims assent.

The idol prophets then without delay,

Their altars raise, the appointed bullock slay,

The wood prepare, the flesh in order lay;

Then to their senseless Idol raise their cries

For kindling flames to burn their sacrifice.

At noon Elijah mocked their fruitless prayer,

And thus address'd them with sarcastic air:

"Call louder, louder still, your God perchance,

"Is journeying, talking, or in sleep entranced."

Their cries increase, they shriek in accent wild,

Their flesh they cut, with blood they are defiled,

'Till near the time for evening sacrifice,

Invoke their Idol God with unavailing cries.

Then near the people great Elijah stood,

And there repaired the altar of the Lord.

He took twelve stones, the number of the tribes,

As ancient rites and Moses' law prescribes;

The bullock for the offering then he slays,

The wood prepares, the flesh in order lays,

Then round the altar digs a trench profound,

The offering wets, and fills the trench around.

The Prophet then to Heaven address'd his prayer,

With faith not doubting, yet with contrite air;

"God of our fathers, let it now be known

"That thou the Lord our God art God alone;

"That I thy prophet, who before thee stand,

"Have done these things at thy supreme command;

"Hear me, O God, and let this people see,

"And turn their stubborn hearts again to thee."

The Prophet ceas'd, when their astonish'd eyes

See Heavenly flames consume the sacrifice,

The wood, the stones, and dry the moisten'd ground,
And lick the water from the trench around.
The people bow'd themselves with one accord, [Lord
And solemnly engag'd to serve the Again the Prophet spoke, and at his word,
The host obey the servant of the Lord :
" Take all these Prophets, this deceiv-ing band,
" Who bring down judgments on your guilty land.
" Let none escape." The host the Prophets took,
Elijah led them down to Kishon's brook,
And slew them there, while their polluted blood
Condens'd the stream, and crimson'd all the flood.
The prophet then the people left behind,
On Carmel's top his Reverend head reclin'd,
His servant sent, to view the skies and main,
And watch the symptoms of the approaching rain.

He seven times went, at last he sees arise
A floating cloud, like a man's hand in size ;
It blackens and expands throughout the night,
The moon and all the stars are hid from sight ;
The vault of heaven is spread with sable clouds,
Unusual darkness all the concave
shrouds,
Then on the Earth descends a mighty rain,
The spreading inundation flows the plain.
The storm subsides, the skies from clouds are clear'd,
One universal voice of joy is heard,
All vegetation feels a newborn spring,
The beasts rejoice, the birds with transport sing,
The murmuring streams again are heard to roar,
And the big rivers dash against the shore.
Health and returning plenty cheer the land,
Such were the wonders of Jehovah's hand.

Donations to the Missionary Society of Connecticut, in the Month of May.

	D. C.
From Rev. Solomon Morgan, contributed in new settlements, - - -	6
Lady's Society in Norwich, - - -	9 50
Solomon Goodale, Jamaica Ver. - - -	20
Rev. Doct. Trumbull, avails of his sermons, - - -	10 34
A Stranger, a friend of missions, - - -	100
Augustus Thompson, Goshen, - - -	20
Samuel Hillhouse, do. - - -	6 50
A young lady in Thompson, - - -	1
A friend of Missions in New-Milford, - - -	1
A stranger from Berlin, - - -	6
A friend of Missions, - - -	2
do. do. of New-Haven, - - -	24
Hon. John Davenport, jun. - - -	100
A friend of Missions in Danbury, - - -	1 83
Israel Kelsey, Middletown, - - -	1
A friend of missions, - - -	3

312 17

C O N C L U S I O N .

A SECOND volume of this Magazine is now completed. The work was originally undertaken with a view of promoting two important objects ; to disseminate religious knowledge, and to raise money for the support of missions to the new settlements and among the Indian tribes. The number of subscribers to this work has far exceeded the most sanguine expectation of the Editors ; and consequently the profits to the Missionary Society have been more than was anticipated. How far the other object, namely, the dissemination of religious knowledge, has been promoted, the Editors will not presume to determine. They will however venture to say, that from information they have received from many places, they have reason to hope that God has blessed this work, and made it instrumental of promoting the cause of the Redeemer. From the encouragement which they have received the two last years, the Editors think it their duty to continue the Magazine. They return their sincere thanks to those who have communicated to them pieces for publication, and earnestly solicit their assistance for another volume. To their original plan they will continue to adhere ; and they hope their brethren in the ministry, and others who are friendly to the work, will give them such assistance as to enable them to furnish their readers with instructive essays and useful information.

The account of sales of the second volume, and of the profits arising therefrom, will be published as soon as it can be ascertained ; and an accurate statement will be made from time to time, that the generous patrons of this work may see that the profits are faithfully applied according to the original proposals.

N n n

I N D E X.

	page
A
ADDRESS of the Editors on new year's day, to the inhabitants of the new settlements, the people of Connecticut, -	248 113 312, 341
Admonitions from the death bed, 67, 108, 151, 232, 306, 383	383
Afflicted, consolations for the, - -	437
Africa, mission to,	349
Agency of spirits on men,	419
Alexander, Rev. Archibald, letter from,	354
Amanda and Lyfander,	388
Andrews, Rev. J. B. ordination of, -	439
Anecdote of a young lady, an Italian Bishop, Earl of Rochester, Thos. Hownham, two Squaws,	278 238 192 394 159
Angelina, experiences of,	105
Answers to questions, 135, 175, 292, 335, 439, 455	455
Appeal to the Christian's heart, - -	38
Association, General of Connecticut, proceedings of,	116
Atheism exposed, - is a rejection of Christ, - -	200 295

B

Bacon, Rev. David, intelligence from, -	159
letter from,	198

Badger, Rev. Joseph, letter from, - -	118
Baptized for the dead, meaning of, -	175
Baxter, Rev. George, letter from, - -	354
Botany Bay, mission to,	357
Buel, Rev. Samuel, life of,	147 179

C

Canada, mission to,	350
Carey, William, letter from,	156
Chapman, Rev. Ezekiel J. ordination of, -	236
Christ, birth and kingdom of, - - -	440
death of, -	17
on the person of,	252
rejection of is atheism, -	295
's prayer in the garden, thoughts on,	100 193, 301, 435
's sufferings and death necessary,	373
Christian communion, essay on, - - -	47
the dying, -	240
reviewing his former state,	239
Christians called to exertion, 280 330, 451	451
not under the law but under grace,	453
on the discouragements of,	165
Churches in the new settlements, plan of govern-	,

INDEX.

ment for, 116 Circumcision, remarks on, 53 Communion, Christian, es- say on, - 47 of the Holy Ghost, 5 Conference meetings, let- ters concerning, 188 Contributions for missions, 397 Conversion of a deist, 27 narrative of a, 73, 471 Cross of Christ, - 239 D Danger of embracing false sentiments, 186 evil examples, 233 David's improvement of his fall, - - 94 Death-bed, admonitions from, 67, 108, 151, 232, 306 383 Death of Christ, necessity of, - 373 Emilia, - 422 Decrees of God, remarks on the, - 13, 327 Delaware county, revival of religion in, - 100 Denmark, intelligence from, 390 Depravity human, eviden- ces of, - - 121 Discoveries special made to believers, - - 50 Discouragements of Chris- tians, - 165 Dives and Lazarus, 221 Donations to Miss. Soc. of Con. 40, 80, 120, 160, 240 280, 320, 360, 396, 440, 480 Dreams, remarks on, 97 Durham (New) revival of religion in, - 469 E East Indies, mission to, 156, 350 Edwards, Rev. Jonathan,	life of, - - 377 Election, doctrine of, 126, 153 370, 410 Emilia, life and death of, 422 Erroneous principles, dan- ger of, - - 186 Evidences of human depra- vity, - - 121 Evil tendency of relying on dreams, - - 97 Examples, evil, danger of, 233 Excellency of scripture, 168 Exhortation to prayer, 216, 263 Experiences of Angelina, 105 F Faith, justification by, 327 Fidelia, letters from, 337 Forgiveness of sin, thoughts on, - - - 415 Funds of the Missionary So- ciety of Connecticut, 78, 397 G Glory of God, - 289 God, existence of proved, 276 evidences of his good- ness, - 401, 458 glory of, - 289 greatness of his mercy, 91 perfection of his work, 401 458 perfections of, 321 sovereignty of, 209 trust in, importance of, 36 Gospel, how it should be preached, - - 129 Granville, revival of religi- on in, - 270 H Hampshire Missionary So- ciety, - - 317 Haweis, Rev. Doctor, let- ters from, - 31, 117 Heavenly-mindedness, prayer for, 280
--	--

INDEX.

History of New-England
 Indians, 281,361,441
 Holiness of saints, why not perfect in this life, 86
 Hownham, Thomas, anecdote of, - - 394
 Hughes Rev. J. letter from, 393

I

Jacob, remarks on the life
 of, - - 36
 Jerusalem, the new, 440 Indians, propagation of the gospel among the, 281,361
 441
 Infidel, confession and conversion of an, - 27
 Inspiration of the scriptures, - 153,201
 Journal of a missionary, extract from, - 117
 Ireland, intelligence from, 391
 Julia and Negotio, - 143
 Justification by faith, - 327 grounds of, 296,327
 Just man, character of the, 258
 the, live by faith, 213,258

K

Kentucky, revival of religion in, - 354,392 observations on, 475
 King, Asa, ordination of, 478

L

Lady, a young, anecdote of, 278
 Lazarus and Dives, - 221
 Lenox, revival of religion in, 136
 Leonard, Rev. Samuel, ordination of, - - 238 Letter, from a father to his daughter, - 153 gentleman in Philadelphia, 360 physician to his sister, - 183 woman in New Connecticut, - 234

 Denmark, - 390
 London Missionary Society, - 309
 Matilda to Maria, 70
 Præco to the Editors, - 188
 Rev. Archibald Alexander, 354
 — David Bacon, 198
 — George Baxter, - 354
 Serena to her Pastor, 189
 Sperina to her Pastor, - - 189
 William Carey, 156
 on conversing with the sick, - 332 to a careless sinner, 195 an awakened sinner, 111
 a young gentleman in college, - 112 friends under affliction, - 437
 the Trustees of the Miss. Soc. of Con. 477 Letters, and writings of Mrs. Rebecca Mills, 226 extracts from, 76,117, 118,197,234,235,279,
 360,392,393
 from a father to his son, - 276,321
 Doctor Haweis, 31,117
 Fidelia, - 337
 Nymphas to Sospiter, - 330,451 on conference meetings, - 188 Life a state of pilgrimage, 298 of Doctor Buell, 147,179
 Doctor Edwards, 377
 Long, Rev. David, ordination of, - 39
 Louisa, death of, - 306
 Lyfander and Amanda, 388

INDEX.

M

Magazine, sales and profits of, - - -	79,320
Manasseh, death of,	383
Matilda, letter from,	70
Mayhew Family, -	282
Meetings for prayer recommended, -	270
Memoirs of Mrs. Rebecca Mills, - - -	226
Merey of God, greatness of,	91
Missionaries, accounts of,	33,
77, 119, 159, 199, 235, 279,	394, 439
letters from,	118, 197,
235, 279
to N. England Indians,	281, 361, 441
Missionary's journal, extract from 2, -	117
Missionary Society of Berkshire, -	77
of Connecticut,	33, 71 312, 341
donations to,	40, 80, 120
160, 240, 280, 320, 360	396, 440, 480
funds of,	78, 397
of Hampshire,	317
of London, intelligence respecting it, -	31, 347
letter from,	309
of Massachusetts,	77

N

Narrative of a conversion,	73, 471
missions,	312, 341
Nature proves the goodness of God, -	401, 458
Negotio and Julia, -	143
New England Indians, history of,	281, 361, 441
Newfoundland, mission to,	350
New-Marlborough, revival of religion, in, -	224

New settlements, address to the inhabitants of,	113
plan of government for the churches of,	106
Nymphas to Sospater,	330, 451

O

Operations of the Holy Spirit, -	45, 324
Opposition to scripture doctrines, - - -	183
Ordination of Andrews Josiah B.	439
Chapman Ezekiel J.	236
King Asa,	478
Leonard Samuel,	238
Long David,	39
Underwood Alvan, -	238
Yates Andrew,	279
Otaheite, mission to,	347
Otsego county, revival of religion in, -	100

P

Perfection of God's work,	401,
458
Perfections of God,	321
Plymouth, revival of religion in, -	23, 60
Poetry, viz.
Atheism exposed,	200
Birth and kingdom of Christ, -	440
Christians called to exertion,	280
On time, - - -	240
revivals of religion,	240
Prayer for heavenly mindedness, - - -	280
Remedy for a sad heart,	120
The Christian's review,	239
cross of Christ,	239
dying Christian,	240
holy Sabbath, -	40
Lord's day morning,	239

INDEX.

New Jerusalem, 440
 Thoughts on a thunder storm, - - 40
 Version of 1st Kings 18th chapter, 478
 Job 20th do. 119
 Job 30th do. 160
 Praise to the Holy Spirit, 324
 Prayer, hymn on, - 269
 meetings for, recommended, 270
 utility of, 216, 263
 Preaching the gospel, best manner of, - 129
 Pre-existence of Christ, 252
 Preface and plan of the Magazine, - 3 Presbyterian General Assembly, proceedings of, 75, 78, 116
 Probation, state of, - 7
 Providence, remarkable interposition of, - 394
 Psalmody, duty of, 14, 57

Q

Questions, 39, 74, 117, 135, 319, 439, 478
 answered, 135, 175, 292, 335, 439, 455

R

Reflections on New-Year's day, - - 248
 Religion, true and false,
 how distinguished, 134
 Religious intelligence, 39, 75,
 117, 156, 197, 234, 279, 353,
 390, 439
 Remedy for a sad heart, 120
 Review of times past, 241 Revival of religion in Granville, 270
 Kentucky, 364, 392, 475
 Lenox, - 136
 New Durham, 469
 New Marlboro' 224

Otfegocounty, &c. 100
 Plymouth, 23, 60
 Vermont, 429
 Winthrop, 176
 Revivals of religion, hymn on, - - 240
 Ridicule, not the test of truth, - - 190
 Rochester, Lord, anecdote
 of, - - 192

S

Sabbath, Christian, duty of observing, 151
 hymn for the, 40
 morning, hymn for, 239 Saints, discoveries made to them, - - 50
 Sanctification, why progressive, - - 86
 Satan's perversion of truth, 327
 Scotland, intelligence from, 391
 Scripture, excellency of, 168 inspiration of, 153, 201 texts of illustrated, viz.
 Genesis xvii. 23. 53
 Exodus xvi. 13, 15. 465
 2 Kings vi. 16. 431
 Psalm cxxxviii. 2. 168
 Isaiah xlii. 19, 20. 335
 Ezekiel x. 8—12. 20
 Obadiah verse 18. 99
 Matthew iv. 5, 6. 327
 — xi. 21, 23. 304
 — xxvi. 39. 193
 Luke xvi. 8, 9. 455
 — — 27, 28. 221
 Acts x. 34, 35. 209
 Romans vi. 14. 453
 1 Corinthians vii. 16. 142
 — — xv. 19. 172
 — — — 274
 — — — 29. 175
 2 Corinthians xiii. 14. 5
 Philippians vi. 11, 13. 38
 2 Timothy ii. 10. 370
 — — — 410
 — — — iii. 16. 201

INDEX.

Hebrew v. 7.	99,301
_____ x. 38.	213,258
1 Peter iv. 6.	292
1 John i. 3.	47
_____ iii. 16.	17
Self-examination, essay on,	81
Sick, on conversing with the,	332
Sin, forgiveness of,	415
Sinner, awakened, a letter
to, - - -	111
Social worship;	14,57
Sopater, letters to,	330,451
Sovereignty of God,	209
Spirit holy, on the communion of,	5
praise to,	324
operations of,	41,
	324 Spirits, their agency on men, - - -	419
State of probation,	7
T
Tendency of false doctrines,	186
Thunder storm, hymn on a,	40
Time, hymn on, -	240
Tongataboo, mission to,	348
Trustees of the Miss. Soc.
of Conn. report of,	33,71
addresses of, to the inhabitants of the
new settlements,	113

addresses of, to the people of the state,	312,341
letter to, - - -	477
Trust in God, importance
of, - - - -	36

U

Vermont, revival of religion in, - - -	429
Version of 1 Kings, chap. 18.	478
Job, chap. 29.	119
Job, chap. 30.	160
Vicissitudes of life,	298
Underwood, Rev. Alvan, ordination of, - - -	238
Utility of the doctrine of election, - - -	126

W

Winthrop, revival of religion in, - - -	176
Worship, social, duty of,	14,57

Y

Yates, Rev. Andrew, ordination of, - - -	279
Year's, new, gift, - - -	241
reflections,	248

Z

Zeal in support of truth,
necessity of - - -	330,451

